Looking at the wolf and fox experiments, it’s easy to understand the differences between male and female humans are far more than just characteristics and social programming we can gloss over. Men must ensure that those characteristics are not lost. If we do not preserve our heritage, we will all be betas to our machinery and computer processors. Perhaps movies like The Matrix and Terminator carry a deeper message than we realized.

Read More: But You’re A Good Girl

The True Story Of A False Rape Claim At UVA

December 5, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Several have raised legitimate questions about the veracity of a front page Rolling Stone story titled A Rape on Campus: A Brutal Assault and Struggle for Justice at UVA, which accuses several Phi Kappa Psi members of gang-raping a young woman during a fraternity party at the University of Virginia. The story has already spawned it's own hashtag (#UVARape), lead to major campus protests, and caused the president of the university to suspend all fraternity activities till after the new year.

Written by Sabrina Rubin Erdely, the Rolling Stone story rests almost entirely on a single source, whose real name is not revealed. While the story presented is possible, because allegations are made behind pseudonyms, it is impossible to fact-check or verify the story. I don't know if the story is true or not, but I do know the same accusations were made at the university ten years ago – and a jury found them to be false.

In November 2004, The Hook, a local Virginia magazine, ran a front page cover story titled How UVA turns its back on rape. Unlike the Rolling Stone article, the accuser gave her full real name—Annie Hylton—and allowed her face to be used for the cover photo. Over the course of the next year, The Hook ran three more articles on the case as it went to trial and an eventually reached a verdict. [The four stories: 1, 2, 3, 4] In each article, the story changed as the truth slowly came to light.

This is a longer article, but if you've ever wondered how a rape accusation plays out in real life, prepare for the harrowing truth.

The First Story: How UVA turns its back on rape

Whereas the Rolling Stone article presents Jackie's story in third person narration as if it is undisputed objective fact, the first Hook article begins Hylton's story with the caveat that this her side of the story:

> In the $1.85 million suit she [Annie Hylton] filed in Charlottesville Circuit Court two years after the incident, Hylton reveals allegations of the evening that changed her life. What follows is her side of the story. [emphasis added]
>
> Her first semester at UVA was winding down when a friend asked if she'd like to go on a double date to a fraternity function. Though Hylton hadn't met her prospective date– a third year named Matthew Hamilton– she says she looked forward to the evening of December 8, 2001.
>
> The two couples had dinner downtown. While Hylton says the early part of the evening was "fine," she alleges that even at the restaurant, things began to go wrong.
>
> Hamilton "repeatedly offered" to obtain alcoholic drinks for then 18-year-old Hylton. She "repeatedly declined," but Hamilton continued to bring them. Hylton drank only "a small amount," the suit states, "not enough so that it would have affected her."
>
> Later on, her recollection becomes sketchy. At the party at the Delta Tau Delta fraternity, where both women's dates were members, Hylton "became very ill and vomited a number of times."
>
> Her nausea continued, and while "she was aware of some things that happened… she was not able to function and felt mentally and physically impaired," > according to her suit.

>
> If this sounds like a classic description of the effects of so-called “date-rape drugs,” Hylton stops short of offering that theory.
>
> “We’re not making any claims at this point,” says her lawyer, Ed Wayland. “We’re hoping to get an explanation during the course of the investigation.”
>
> At one point, Hylton became aware that she was wearing a t-shirt and that she was in Mr. Hamilton’s bed. “Mr. Hamilton was not in the bed, but Ms. Hylton was aware that he and one or more other people were in the room.”
>
> Then she lost consciousness. When she awoke, “Mr. Hamilton was on top of her engaging in sexual intercourse.”
>
> Hylton attempted to get Hamilton to stop, the suit alleges, but he did not. “Mr. Hamilton held Ms. Hylton down, continued to touch and fondle her and attempted to resume having sexual intercourse.”

The article contains many of the same criticisms of the Rolling Stone article—noting that despite sixty students reporting sexual assault, not one offender has been expelled, and calling UVA sexual assault policy too lenient and in need of change. Like the Rolling Stone article, the woman at the center of the story also reports symptoms consistent with PTSD.

The Hook article also describes a deliberate University cover-up, with UVA issuing a gag order on her, forbidding her to talk publicly about this issue:

> Hylton says she was told that all aspects of the hearing– including her attacker’s name and the outcome of the hearing– had to remain confidential. If she revealed those details, she was warned, she could face a Judiciary Committee penalty, which can include suspension or expulsion.
>
> At the end of two weeks, the Board returned a guilty verdict against Hamilton. But Hylton’s ordeal was not over. Her attacker was allowed to remain at UVA, and she was not allowed to say a word about him.

In response, a Pennsylvania-based non-profit called Security on Campus filed a lawsuit, saying that the university policy was in conflict with federal law, and that victims “need to be able to talk about the substance of their case, their experience with the process, and to disclose results.” Hamilton’s mother also started a website, uvavictimsofrape.com, where other women began contacting her with their stories of sexual assault.

Unlike the Rolling Stone article, all names are real.

> By going public, Hylton becomes a rarity in American discourse: a sexual assault victim who isn’t hiding behind a cloak of anonymity. She says she’s putting her name and story before the public with the hope that she will help others.

The Hook also includes a response from the man accused, protesting that he is innocent. Rolling Stone reporter Sabrina Rubin Erdely never even contacted Phi Kappa Psi, the fraternity accused in her article, to get their side of the story. After her article was published the UVA chapter of Phi Kappa Psi was vandalized and the fraternity released a statement saying “we have no specific knowledge of the claims set out in the Rolling Stone article,” indicating that they may not have even known the article was coming.

In fact, The Hook article includes a paragraph of text for every major participant to tell their side of the story. It is a well-researched, balanced piece of journalism, addressing an important issue.

Unfortunately, a jury would later find this story was not entirely true.

The Second Story: Her day in court: UVA rape case goes to trial

Nearly a year later, in August 2005, after the first article drew national attention and student protests, The Hook published a followup story titled: Her day in court: UVA rape case goes to trial.

> “I’m excited to get my day in court, but you never know what’s going to happen,” says Hylton, whose case touched off a debate because the alleged attacker, Matthew Hamilton, remained a student– while the alleged victim, under threat of expulsion, wasn’t even allowed to discuss the case.
>
> …
>
> As Chapman explained to The Hook, “he said-she said” charges simply aren’t sufficient to win a court battle. “We need to have evidence beyond a reasonable doubt,” Chapman says.

Hylton’s case was going to trial. It was there that Hamilton would present his side of the story, and a new narrative would emerge.

The Third Story: ‘Mickey Finn?’ Date rape stories conflict

On September 5th of the same year, two months later, The Hook ran another follow up: ‘Mickey Finn?’ Date rape stories conflict. The story begins:

> Did Matt Hamilton drug and rape Annie Hylton, or was she an “energetic drunk” who had consensual sex with Hamilton? That’s the question a jury considered earlier this week.
>
> …

> Winegardner [Hamilton’s attorney] called several of Hamilton’s friends to the stand, who claimed Hylton seemed drunk but entirely conscious and was joking with them from her perch in Hamilton’s loft.
>
> Hamilton’s star witness and fraternity brother Ben Decker called Hylton an “energetic drunk” who playfully teased him in Hamilton’s room between 2 and 3am.
>
> During the evening, Decker testified, Hylton leaned up against Hamilton and clasped hands with him.
>
> Another friend of Hamilton’s, Garrett Gluth, testified that Hylton, embarrassed over the vomiting incident, confessed that she “really liked” Matt and didn’t want him to think she was a “stupid first year.”
>
> Both Decker and Gluth insisted that she declined repeated offers for rides home in order to stay with Hamilton.
>
> Hylton has testified that this period was all a drug-induced blur.

This is the first time Hamilton’s full side of the story has appeared in The Hook, and it comes with the testimony of multiple other witnesses, making the case more than just he-said, she-said. It’s also worth noting that at this point, the story moved from the cover-photo, to the inside of the magazine, meaning fewer members of the public would have heard his side.

It wasn’t until the fourth story that a verdict was reached.

Annie Hylton (right) and Matthew Hamilton (left)

The Fourth Story: Hylton prevails: But jury says "no rape."

September 8th, a week later, the Hook ran the verdict: Hylton prevails: But jury says "no rape."

> Although Annie Hylton exclaimed "They believed me" at the conclusion of her civil suit over an alleged date-rape, interviews with some of the jurors in the case tell a different story.
>
> Despite delivering a $150,000 verdict in the highly publicized case, jurors say that the former UVA student failed to prove that she was raped or that she was drugged. Nonetheless, say the jurors interviewed by the Hook, Hylton was a victim of such "negligence" that she deserved compensation from her alleged attacker.
>
> —
>
> The three-day trial, which wrapped last week, was marked by a profound lack of physical evidence. Instead, it was a case of Hylton's word against Hamilton's. Hamilton, a 2003 graduate now living in Brooklyn, New York, currently works as an options trader.
>
> Almost immediately after receiving instructions from Charlottesville Circuit Court Judge Edward Hogshire, says juror Kim Henderson, the jury's five women and two men agreed on two things.
>
> "There was no drugging, no rape," says Henderson. On those issues, she explains, "We were all on the side of the defense." [emphasis added]

The jury agreed that Hamilton had not used date rape drugs and that Hylton's lack of memory was the result of excessive drinking. Hamilton's attorney estimated that Hylton had drank at least 40 ounces of alcohol over the evening, rather than the five to six her attorney had claimed. At the time, Hylton was a 5'8 140-pound eighteen year-old first year, making forty ounces more than enough to cause a blackout. No evidence of date rape drugs was ever produced.

If we are to believe the jury, what actually happened that night was that Hylton got drunk, and had consensual sex with Hamilton. During sex, she passed out, woke up, asked him to stop. He says he stopped, Hylton says he didn't, but Hamilton's attorney pointed out that in her 2002 testimony to the UVA's Sexual Assault Board she'd said that Hamilton had not resumed sex once she'd woken up and pushed him away. Then—and both sides agree on this—Hylton asked Hamilton for a ride home in the morning, and "and the two engaged in 'inane chitchat' in his car," suggesting that Hylton was still comfortable with Hamilton the morning after.

Despite being found innocent of rape, Hamilton was still punished:

> After some consideration, Miller says, the jury found Hamilton guilty only of "simple negligence."
>
> "He should have just let her lie in the bed and go to sleep," Henderson says.
>
> Juror Gregg John says the jury believed that both Hamilton and Hylton were negligent that night, but that since Hamilton was "older and more experienced with alcohol," he should be held to a "slightly higher standard."

In other-words, a court ruled that a man should face criminal prosecution and a six figure penalty for waking up a woman who passes-out during consensual sex. I am not certain what the predominantly female jury expected Hamilton to do differently. Wouldn't it also have been negligence to leave a woman passed-out alone in a frat house after consuming that much alcohol?

Hylton was never prosecuted for underage drinking. She was awarded $150,000 because Hamilton failed to take care of her after she engaged in illegal substance abuse. This verdict sends a clear message that women are not legally accountable for their actions, and that it is men's responsibility to take care of women and protect them from their own bad decisions.

This was ten years ago. The law has only gotten more liberal since then.

Several of Hylton's friends also attacked Hamilton prior to the verdict:

> Some of Hylton's friends held Hamilton accountable with their own form of vigilante justice at one spring running of the Foxfield Races. After a bitter Hylton berated Hamilton at the Garth Road racing track, several of her friends confronted him and one poured a beer over his head. Another time at the Biltmore Grill, Hamilton testified, a group of her friends surrounded him and allegedly prevented him from leaving. A friend of Hylton's confirmed those confrontations during her testimony.

The article calls this "justice" despite the fact Hamilton was found innocent of rape. To my knowledge, she and her friends were never prosecuted for their harassment, abuse, and bullying.

The verdict wrecked Hamilton's finances:

> Winegardner [Hamilton's attorney], however, says his client is "devastated" by what he calls a "compromise verdict."
>
> Winegardner won't reveal the cost of Hamilton's nearly two-year defense, but Hylton's attorney Rosenfield estimates it is "in the six figures." While that sum was paid for by Hamilton's parents' homeowners insurance, the $150,000 award won't be covered. That means Hamilton, who testified his annual salary is approximately $40,000, may have to pay it out of pocket.
>
> "Certainly it's going to have a devastating impact on his personal financial situation and his career aspirations," says Winegardner, who will present several motions on September 19 asking that Judge Hogshire overturn the verdict.

Hylton on the other hand was satisfied:

> Though the award is a far cry from the original $1.85 million in compensatory and punitive damages she originally sought, Hylton expressed satisfaction with the trial's outcome. "It's been a long three and a half years," she says. "The overall process was more important than the verdict itself because it brought a lot of attention to the issue." [emphasis added]

Her last quote shocks me, and makes me wonder—was attention always more important to her than justice?

What We Can Learn

People are quick to forget history. I would never have heard about this case had a friend who graduated from UVA when this was published not emailed these articles to me. Given the firestorm surrounding UVA, I am surprised no one else has acknowledged the Universities history with false rape accusations.

There are lessons here anyone involved in the modern debate around campus assault would do well to study.

First, the University of Virginia has not been able to handle rape cases for over ten years. The only real justice for anyone involved came when these claims were taken to court. These cases should be handled by the police, not universities.

Second, the media's initial reports are often inaccurate, because all the facts have not emerged yet. When the 2004 case went to trial, Judge Edward Hogshire held up a copy of The Hook's first article and told jury members to stay away from media reports, rightly so.

Third, the University of Virginia has a documented history of false rape accusations. Saying that a rape accusation may be false does not make one an "idiot" or mean the person questioning does not care about rape. It means the person questioning cares about justice.

Fourth, false rape claims are possible, even from witnesses who believe they are telling the truth. The jury agreed that Hylton sincerely believed she had been raped, and had real PTSD symptoms due to this perceived assault, despite also ruling she had not been raped. Merely because a witness is "absolutely bursting to tell this story" does not mean the story is true.

Fifth, the court system holds men to a legal standard it does not hold women. Despite finding him innocent, the court still destroyed Hamilton personally and professionally. Had Hamilton passed out during sex with a woman two years older than him after engaging in underage drinking, I doubt the court would have awarded him $150,000.

Sixth, and perhaps most importantly, we must not prosecute the accused in the court of public opinion, but withhold judgement until they have been allowed to present their defense.

The Rolling Stone article at the center of the #UVARape scandal presents only one person's testimony, as told two years after the fact. I am certain as this story develops, there will be new information that comes to light, just as it did in the 2004 case. What that information will be, I do not know and cannot predict.

Again, I do not know if the story presented in Rolling Stone is true or not. I only hope that those involved withhold judgement until the full truth is known. Had the 2004 rape accusations made at UVA been tried before all evidence was examined, an innocent man would have gone to jail.

Read More: Is Rolling Stone Sensationalizing The UVA Rape Story For Profit?

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

The Twilight Zone's "The Hunt" Shows The Importance Of A Man's Dog

December 5, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The Hunt is a Twilight Zone episode from 1963. It is about an old man named Hyder Simpson and his old hound dog, Rip.

The episode opens up with Hyder Simpson returning home to his wife, Rachel. They live in the uncharted wilds of 19th century America.

He comes in for dinner, with his wife having made some sort of stew for them to eat. Hyder brings Rip in the house with him. Rachel clearly has a level of rueful disdain for the old hound. She tolerates him letting Rip sit beside them at at the supper table.

As Rachel feeds some stew onto a plate for Hyder, with him flirting with her.

"Say, when was a last night a woman like you been kissed? "

She smirks and rebuffs him lightly as he flirts with her. As the scene progresses to them eating at the supper table, it becomes very clear that they have a close, loving relationship. They discuss being married for over 50 years and how much they love and care for each other.

Hyder tells Rachel that he and Rip will be going coon-hunting that night. Rachel is clearly distraught, citing omens she has witnessed over the past few days that Hyder shouldn't go coon-hunting that night. Hyder treats her nervous worry as the superstitions of an old woman.

Hyder and Rip do go coon-hunting on that evening. Rip trees a raccoon and Hyder, at first, says to Rip you didn't tree a raccoon. Rip starts to run along a stand of trees and they find the raccoon has run over several branches to a branch over the river. Rip instinctively jumps in after the coon and Hyder yells out, "You'll drown yourself doing that, Rip!" Hyder jumps in after Rip in order to save him.

They both awake the next day by the river, with Hyder thinking he fell asleep while tracking that raRccoon down. The two companions walk back to Hyder's property and find two of Hyder's neighbors digging a grave-shaped hole on his properFty. He greets them, but they don't respond. He then threatens to leave his property with his gun and they still don't respond. Hyder calms down when the men mention they are burying a dog. Hyder sympathizes with their silence, as he thinks they are just too heartbroken to talk.

He returns home to find his wife dressed in all black, with a black hat with a veil. Hyder then sees the local pastor approach his wife, saying that even though Hyder wasn't a religious man, he deserves a Christian burial. As Hyder protests—with nobody noticing him—Hyder slowly realizes that he and Rip might be dead.

As his wife sobs in the pastor's arms, he tries to bargain with the situation and tell his wife this is nothing but a bad dream. He sees a coffin taken out of his bedroom and he wonders aloud, "Who do you have in that box?"

As they walk to the cemetary, Hyder encounters an unfamiliar fence that prevents him from walking in. They follow the fence a ways, thinking he will eventually find a gate. He does and a man behind the gate approaches them.

The man greets the two, asks for Hyder's name and asks him how he died. Hyder has to confront that he drowned in the river the previous night. The man says that beyond the hill is the Elysian Fields. Hyder asks the man if he is Saint Peter, and the man coyly says he does man the gate.

When Hyder tries to enter the gate, Rip growls, grinds his paws into the dirt and refuses to cross the threshold. Hyder refuses to enter a place that is "too high-falutin" for Rip. The man and Hyder argue for a time and Hyder decides to not enter Heaven without his dog.

They continue to walk along Eternity Road for a spell, with Hyder musing on what sort of place would not allow dogs in and not allow men to coon hunt with their dogs.

Hyder sits down and after a time, a man clad in a plaid shirt and overalls greets Hyder, sits down and states it's time to move on to heaven. Hyder states that he already told a man that he wouldn't go into heaven without his dog. The man looks at with a bit of apprehension and asks Hyder if he got mixed with that man. Hyder says no, as it would be a hell of a place with no dogs.

The man responds that Hyder would not be too far wrong with that assessment, as he tells Hyder he avoided entering the gates of Hell. Hyder asks why Hell would refuse to allow a dog in. The man—who by now is clearly an angel—tells him: "You see Mr. Simpson, a man—he'll walk right into Hell with both eyes open. But even the Devil can't fool a dog!"

The episode wraps up with Hyder walking with the angel towards a gate to Heaven, waxing about how he is looking forward to coon hunting. When they reach the gate, Hyder asks about his wife, Rachel. He is worried about Rachel getting past the gates of Hell. The angel assures him that Rachel will have no problem avoiding the lure of Hell and will be along shortly.

Serling ends the episode with this narration:

Travelers to unknown regions would be well-advised to take along the family dog. He could just save you from entering the wrong gate. At least, it happened that way once – in a mountainous area of the Twilight Zone.

On one hand, this episode can be read as how Heaven—or any version of the beauty of eternal life—hinges on how you view life. To Hyder, Heaven was raccoon hunting, square dancing, and spending time with his wife. To another man, Heaven could be working on Wall Street and having a robust urban lifestyle. In this vein, a man's values and morality—which leads to a virtuous lifestyle—also leads to an afterlife that is framed around those lived experiences. The virtuous farmer lives on in the fields, the virtuous businessman lives on in a shop.

That, however, isn't the main theme of the episode; devotion to loved ones is the primary theme.

Hyder has a great level of respect towards his wife and is completely devoted to her. The same is true of Hyder's wife and her love towards Hyder. While this dynamic is secondary to Hyder's relationship with his dog, it is an important theme in the episode. When Hyder dies, it is his wife's impassioned devotion towards him that causes Hyder to realize that he has passed on from the living. When Hyder finally meets the heavenly angel at the end, the angel remarks his wife will be along shortly, implying that her devotion to him will compel her soul to pass on to the afterlife.

His relationship with his wife recalls a time past. A time when men and women truly loved one another and had a level of devotion and respect that is completely foreign in modern times. As we see at the exposition of the episode, they have clearly defined roles (gender roles) and they are perfectly fine and content with that. They clearly live in technologically primitive times, but have a level of happiness and contentment that is unknowable in the age of omnipresent media and familial collapse.

Still, the most striking devotion in the episode is Hyder to his dog. Hyder clearly has a great level of respect for dogs, given his commentary to the men digging a grave on his property. Hyder trusted Rip with his life.

What I think Hyder valued most about Rip's devotion was how pure it was, as was Hyder's to Rip. Rip faithfully followed wherever Hyder wandered and was fiercely protective of Hyder when confronted with the evils of Hell. Hyder returned this devotion with a devotion of his own—he followed Rip after the coon simply because he trusted Rip's instincts; Hyder refused to enter the gates of Hell because of the demon's refusal to allow Rip across the threshold.

As the episode highlights, a relationship between a man and his dog can be a thing of beauty. Dogs are simple creatures: faithful, devoted, and protective. Dogs can fill the voids the modern world forces wide. Loyal to a fault and appreciative of their owners, dogs are the the perfect antidote to the modern world filled to the brim with the ungrateful, the disloyal and the covetous. While dogs have always been great companions in many ways, dogs are loyal in a world full of disloyal women and appreciative in a world all to often dismissive of men.

Especially in Hyder's isolated and dangerous world on the frontier, it wasn't just the love and devotion of his wife that gave his life meaning, but also his beloved dog. It can be tough to relate to in the modern world of urban sprawl, social media, and the teeming multiplicity of people, but Hyder lived in a tough, unforgiving world filled with few people. A dog wasn't just a companion, but also a beloved member of the family—this is seen with Hyder's insistence that Rip sit at the table with him and his wife, as Rip was just as fit to break bread at the dinner table as any human family member.

While we are not confronted with the isolated frontier lifestyle—filled with primitive technology and social isolation—we are faced with new problems. We are more socially connected than ever before, yet still feel isolated. All the technology in the world can't replace the substantive relationships we social creatures so deeply crave with each other.

All that notwithstanding, the simple love between a man and his dog is more than enough to speak to the power of the relationship. As Hyder ambled down Eternity Road, he was purely content to spend eternity with no more than his dog's companionship. That simple fact shows the extraordinary relationship that a man can have with a dog. Dogs do not judge, dogs do not discriminate, nor do they take life for granted—those are all human faults and foibles. With the vagaries of human fickleness absent, a man can truly a love something that will love him back unconditionally.

Read More: "A Passage For Trumpet:" Shows The Elusive Nature Of Happiness

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

The Radical Benefits Of Cold Water Therapy For Men

December 5, 2014 | by Scott James | Link | Original Link

I attribute cold showers to many of my successes in life. The uncomfortable act of forcing your body to withstand the freezing cold temperature of the water gushing out of your shower as the faucet is turned as far to the 'cold' side as possible is not only invigorating, but also provides many health and well-being benefits for men.

A few years ago the only time I'd experienced the uncomfortable feeling of a cold shower was when our hot water system was not functioning, however today it is a habit I perform daily.

After you finish reading this post I challenge you to take a cold shower… no excuses, no bullshit. It'll change your life. Let's take a look at some of those benefits of cold showering that I alluded to earlier:

Improved Hair & Skin

Warm showers, although enjoyable and relaxing, offer no tangible benefits to our hair and skin—unlike cold showers. The cold water from your shower will result in the tightening of pores and cuticles, which aids in detoxification (as bad toxins are essentially squeezed of out your skin during this process). During a cold shower our hair cuticles are also closed, resulting in stronger hair.

Increased Testosterone

With an increase in testosterone levels, cold showers can turn you from a weak little boy into a man. In 1993 a study was conducted by the Thrombosis Research Institution of England which identified a correlation between individuals who take cold showers regularly and higher testosterone levels.

Although this rise in testosterone may not equate to instant increases in lean muscle mass, I can certainly attest to cold showers increasing both libido and overall energy levels.

Aids Post Exercise Recovery

Exposure to cold water and ice are known to reduce soreness and increase muscular recovery after strenuous exercise. This is why many elite athletes take ice baths. The logistics and process of setting up an ice bath is a handful—instead opting to take a more convenient cold shower will provide a similar boost in the recovery process after exercise.

Relief of Depression

The Department of Radiation Oncology at Virginia Commonwealth University School of Medicine performed a study that suggests regular cold showers assist in battling depression. The “blue spot” of the brain is said to be stimulated by cold water therapy. This is due to noradrenaline, a chemical in the brain that has been linked to the mitigation of depression.

Increase in Discipline

There is no greater discipline-builder than the cold shower. Our body can withstand the cold water without a problem, but the mind will quickly want to abort and get you out of there. If you start your day with a 3-5 minute cold shower, I guarantee you that you will not be making excuses or delaying other tasks you have been avoiding undertaking. Instead, you’ll be setting the tone for a successful day.

Insane Levels of Energy & Invigoration

After stepping out of the shower you’ll feel like you’ve just ingested a double-shot espresso. Regardless of how lethargic you’re feeling in the morning, the moment that ice cold water hits your skin your heart and breathing while dramatically increase. As your body attempts to adapt to the situation at hand you’re left feeling completely energized.

Your Mission

Don’t take things to the extreme right off the starting line. If you’re jumping straight into an ice bath or a 10-minute freezing cold shower, I suspect you’ll become overwhelmed and disregard the whole cold showering ideology. Instead, I challenge you to slowly start to turn that faucet in your shower further towards the cold side. Alternatively you can jump straight into contrast showering – alternating between hot and cold water for 20 second intervals to condition yourself.

Yes, initially you’ll squirm, whimper, and experience erratic breathing, but after a few weeks of consistent cold showers they'll begin to become relaxing, invigorating, and will leave you in a zen-like state.

Read More: 5 Easy Ways To Boost Your Testosterone

Scott James
Scott is a fitness enthusiast, entrepreneur, author & proprietor of IgnoreLimits.coma blog created to share how he transformed his physique, finances & habits. RoK readers can download his free bodyweight training eBook on his website.

15 People In The Mainstream Media Who Used The UVA Rape Hoax To Push A False Narrative

December 5, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The mainstream media is infested with far left sycophants who care not about truth and justice but pushing their delusional narrative upon us all. Here are 15 individuals who used the massive hoax of the UVA gang rape as an opportunity to spread their mythical "rape culture" views.

Dena Takruri – Presenter and producer for Al Jazeera

Ben Adler – Journalist for Grist

Taylor Dobbs – Reporter for Vermont Public Radio

[image]

Nicole Beemsterboer – Senior producer at NPR

Paul Glader – Contributor to Forbes, Business Week, and the New Yorker

Kaelyn Forde – Reporter for Al Jazeera America

Mark Moford – Columnist for SF Chronicle

Jena Friedman – Daily Show producer

Erin McPike – CNN correspondent

Erin McPike
@ErinMcPike

Follow

If you've read Tom Wolfe's I Am Charlotte Simmons, brace yourself - the real-life situation at UVA is so much worse: rollingstone.com/culture/featur…

Reyhan Harmanci – Senior editor at Fast Company

Reyhan Harmanci
@harmancipants

Follow

Just finished the Rolling Stone UVA story. Burn it down, all of it. rollingstone.com/culture/featur…

Joshua David Stein – News and features director at InStyle

Joshua David Stein
@fakejoshstein

Follow

Lesson? Dissolve all frats. Should have been done a long time ago. Pros would vastly outweight cons rollingstone.com/culture/featur… via @rollingstone

Paul Danahar – Middle East bureau chief for BBC

Paul Danahar
@pdanahar

Follow

Brilliant journalism by @rollingstone on fraternity rape rol.st/1ySt BLf clear some people need to go to jail & others be fired

Carrie Wofford – Contributor for US News

Jeffrey Goldberg – Correspondent for The Atlantic

Anousha Sakoui – Contributor for Bloomberg

The above group of people, many of them journalists in publications you read every week, absolutely did not care that due process or the most basic of journalistic fact checking wasn't used to essentially convict a fraternity for rape, one that we now know did not occur. As you can see from the broad range of outlets represented, the corruption of American media is extensive. Trust nothing and verify everything.

Feel free to share the journalists I missed in the comments below.

Read Next: Ezra Klein's Anti-Male Hatred On Vox

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What Every Man Needs To Know About Capitalism And Economics

December 6, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

An article was written recently that, as an economist who has dedicated practically all of his professional life to economics, finance, truth, and reality, I cannot let go unanswered. I found the article to be misleading and sadly was believed by many who consumed it. Of further concern, however, was the comments section that displayed a woefully inadequate understanding of economics among an unacceptably high percentage of ROK's readership. And so to address the original article, as well as give ROK readers a basic, overarching (harsh truth) lesson in economics, I present this response.

However, understand this is not a sleight on the author of the article (for he was well-intended) or those of you who agreed with it (also, no doubt, well-intended), but a much needed explanation if not outright warning for those of you remain ignorant of the laws and realities of economics. For if you don't get these basics down about economics, capitalism, and humanity, you will sorely misunderstand how the real world works and suffer the consequences.

First, understand that capitalism is NOT an option. It's not an "opinion." It's not a "belief." It's not a "theory."

It's a law.

You have no choice but to abide by it just as you have no choice to abide by gravity.

You may not "like" that statement. You may not agree with it, but none of that changes the fact that the economic phenomenon known as "capitalism" or "free markets" has naturally formed within humanity throughout it's entire history. To understand this "human nature" aspect of capitalism, consider gold. Doesn't matter if you look to the ancient Aztecs, the far-removed Hindus river valley, sub-Saharan Africa, or prehistoric Europe, gold ended up becoming the default currency in nearly all ancient civilizations.

The reason why is that gold had the characteristics and traits that made it valuable to all humans and human nature. And like gold, so too did markets and the free exchange of goods, services, and labor become a naturally-forming, universal phenomenon of both ancient civilizations and our tight-knit global community today. Ergo, capitalism is not some kind of fanciful political theory concocted by a delusional, pontificating trust-fund baby elitist (that would be Karl Marx). It's merely the economic manifestation of human nature.

If this does not convince you about capitalism being an undeniable law of human nature, then consider proving it in reverse—communism.

The whole concept of communism is that there are no free markets, there is no free trade. Prices are fixed, as is production and nearly all business and investment decisions. Naturally, the bureaucrats in charge of making production decisions fail miserably at predicting what an entire people want. So what forms in response to this controlled market?

Black markets. AKA "underground economies."

You must understand what the existence of black markets in communist economies proves about capitalism being the default-state law of humanity. Doesn't matter how many laws you pass, doesn't matter how much punishment you mete out, doesn't matter if the entire government's resources are dedicated to banning it, in the end all that matters is that people demand something and other people are willing to supply it. Thus, underground economies were not only prevalent in ALL communist "economies," but continue to exist today in our schools and other "drug free zones" with the "illegal" $60-billion-per-year US drug trade.

If Stalin, Mao, Kim Jong Il, and Nancy Reagan couldn't stop black markets from forming, don't you think it's about time to admit capitalism isn't optional? And furthermore, since that is the default state nature of humanity, shouldn't governments and economies should be built upon this reality instead of trying to change it?

Government as a means of protection rather than production

All economic success derives from the protection and enforcement or private property. Understand that governments do not produce anything of economic value. The only thing that can produce something of economic value is people. Without a people, there is no point or purpose to have a government. But how do you incentivize the people to produce?

Well, in the olden days you captured them and made them slaves, threatening them with torture, beatings, starvation, and death. Today, obviously, we need a new incentive. Enter private property.

If I'm not a slave, I'm allowed to keep the majority of the fruits of my labor. This income will go to pay for necessary things like food, clothing, and shelter, but any excess earnings can be saved up and used to buy assets. These assets are also called “wealth,” and if I build up enough “wealth” then I can become “rich” and never labor again.

This is a huge and VITAL cornerstone of capitalism because it provides not just one person, but all people with the key to their own freedom. They are allowed to work as much and as hard as they want, become as rich as they can, all of which invigorates and mobilizes billions of people to produce (resulting in the economic powerhouses of yesteryear western civilization). However, it was all contingent on the legal guarantee that their property would be their own and not confiscated for political purposes.

However, some people are going to be better, luckier, or just harder-working than others and as a consequence will have more wealth than others. And this creates jealousy. And jealousy is all fine and good as long as you have a republic that protects a constitution, meritocracy, and property rights. But if society devolves into a democracy, the temptation has proven too tempting to the masses to merely vote for “other people’s wealth,” thus undermining private property.

This was the primary complaint of the aforementioned article. That “greedy” “business leaders” and “powers that be” were wiping out the middle class by foisting part-time work all so these “evil rich people” could earn a couple extra bucks. But the argument shouldn’t be about whether that’s “fair” or not. The argument should be “do they have the right to do what they want with their own private property?”

You may not like the current day employment prospects our current economy offers. You may not like the part-time job becoming the default economic reality of the labor market. But the adult, male, “time-to-put-on-your-big-boy-pants” truth is that:

IT ISN’T YOUR FUCKING MONEY!
IT ISN’T YOUR FUCKING BUSINESS!

If you don’t like what employers are paying, then quit being a whiny, simpering bitch and start your own damn company. Because the slippery slope that ensues when you start to make claim to property that is not yours is you get something much worse than “part-time jobs” or “low pay.” You get capital flight which results in no jobs.

Capitalism has empirically outperformed every other economic system

If you are one for empiricism, just look at history. By nearly all accounts we can admit communism has failed (6:23 mark). The USSR could only provide its people a third of what the US did. And when you compare countries with the same people, but two different economic systems, the comparison could not be more stark. Specifically the Koreas (North and South) and the Germanys (pre-unification).

However, post-Soviet collapse arguments typically fall into the grey area of “socialism” or “mixed economies,” with people on the left nearly stampeding over themselves to point out the Scandinavian countries as proof socialism can work. It is here that three minor problems come into play.

One, Norway (the darling favorite of the left) derives a goodly fourth of its economic production from oil and is better analyzed as a mideast oil emirate than a Scandinavian country. Two, the relative homogeneity of Scandinavia's population means there's less incentive for groups to "get theirs" by taking advantage of the welfare state, providing a rare cooperation amongst humans (but give it time). Three, population-wise compared to the rest of "socialist" Europe, they are not very relevant. Whatever may be working in Finland today isn't working thrice over in Italy, France, Germany, and for the remaining other 500 million Europeans.

But if you want numbers, the best I've calculated was the correlation between long term tax rates (as measured by spending as a % GDP) and economic growth (and this included the Scandinavian countries), which resulted in a -.28 correlation coefficient. And that data, mind you, is post-1991 and therefore does not include the dismal performance of the former Soviet bloc countries.

Regardless, the point is that barring economic eccentricities and statistical outliers, capitalism has outperformed socialism and communism hands down. It really isn't up for debate unless you want to resort to technicalities, exceptions, etc., to protect your political ego or erroneous world-view.

The US is NOT a capitalist economy

If you are an American you have got to understand that you do not live in a capitalist economy, but rather a mixed or "socialist" one. Oh, people will laugh. Oh, people will accuse me of "sensationalism," but I have no opinion on this matter, just mere fact. We simply do not live in a capitalist economy.

As it stands right now the state, federal and local governments combined spend about 38% of our economy. Of that 38%, 85% of it is spent on "social spending." Not the military. This is set to increase dramatically as the baby boomers retire and a whole host of other social expenses come into play which (depending on whose estimates you want to use) means spending will increase to around 45% GDP.

Additionally, you throw in things like a progressive income tax, a 40% statutory corporate tax rate (arguments of the effective tax rate duly noted), corporate lobbying, crony capitalists, bailouts, Obamacare, and the level of government regulation and intervention into the private economy, and we are anything but a capitalist economy.

The alternative to capitalism is far, far worse

Hate capitalism and free markets and people richer than you all you want. The alternative is far worse. And some of this is striking rather close to home.

If you look at the political affiliation of the people launching their assault on men and male culture you'll quickly realize they aren't "feminists" as much as they are socialists using their sex organs or "gender" as a means to play victim and get more money out of you. You may also be somewhat familiar with women voting for the state to replace men in their traditional roles.

You are no longer a man, a husband, a father or a head of household. You are a sperm donor, a trial husband, or an alimony check. And even if you think you'll be clever, avoiding these fates by being a bachelor, understand you disproportionately pay taxes to subsidize millions of "empowered, independent women's" tuition in worthless degrees, while paying even more taxes so they can have make-work government jobs and a surrogate husband in the form of a government check. So before you go running to the state to complain about "minimum wage" or "part time work" you may want to look at what happens when the state gets more power.

But this cultural Marxism and replacement of men is nothing compared to what happens when people start tinkering with the economy, replacing free markets with socialism. At best you can hope for is what is currently plaguing Europe. Government debts equivalent to 200% GDP. Stagnant economic growth. Youth unemployment rates of around 40%. Bank accounts being confiscated. And political correctness being shoved down your throat.

The worst you can expect is the track record of Chairman Mao and Josef Stalin. 100 million dead during peacetime due to starvation. Even Nazis during war couldn't kill that much that fast. Alas, this is the slope you risk going down when you start contemplating granting the state more power to make things "fair" in your naive, idealistic, rookie economist mind.

Finally, because this is not a dictatorship you have a responsibility to society to educate yourself about economics.

In my book "Bachelor Pad Economics," I dedicate an ENTIRE CHAPTER to economics. Not because of my passion for it. Not because I wanted to give a political speech. But because just as you are in charge of your personal finances, so too are you ultimately in charge of the finances of the country. Not only do you owe it to yourself to get educated about personal financial management, you owe it yourself and your fellow countrymen to become educated on the finances of your nation.

Unfortunately, too many young (and old) people treat economics and politics as something that is "cute" or "fashionable." Something to protest against as an ignorant and uneducated college, OWS-type moron trying to get his "crusaderism kicks" in. Or perhaps a tool for gameless betas to use by espousing the"politically approved beliefs" in the hopes it will land them some hairy armpit pussy.

Society simply cannot afford this.

Economics is nothing more the future of the entire world. And your children's futures cannot afford suffer the consequences of your naïveté today.

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

The Bill Cosby Rape Scandal Is Just Another Example Of Modern Hysteria

December 6, 2014 | by Oscar O'Reilly | Link | Original Link

An otherwise obscure Arizona woman named Barbara Bowman was widely ridiculed a few weeks ago, after the Washington Post published her Bill-Cosby-raped-me claims. Bowman at the time of the alleged assaults had been a pretty, blonde, aspiring actress, still in her teens—prime bait for a libidinous male TV star, and probably well aware of that fact. Though strategically abbreviated to omit some of the more damning details (which appear in another first-person story in the Mail Online), her account in the Post made clear that she had willingly put herself in Cosby's way.

In one case, I blacked out after having dinner and one glass of wine at his New York City brownstone, where he had offered to mentor me and discuss the entertainment industry. When I came to, I was in my panties and a man's t-shirt, and Cosby was looming over me. I'm certain now that he drugged and raped me. But as a teenager, I tried to convince myself I had imagined it. I even tried to rationalize it: Bill Cosby was going to make me a star and this was part of the deal.

The final incident [after months and months of these "assaults"] was in Atlantic City, where we had traveled for an industry event. I was staying in a separate bedroom of Cosby's hotel suite, but he pinned me down in his own bed while I screamed for help.

She offered no explanation of how she had got into Cosby's bed. The Post commenters ran heavily against her, scolding and mocking:

Like Reply

Physsx
4:47 PM EST

Just wondering...when did people start believing you?

1 · Like Reply Share

KPinSEA
4:28 PM EST

Tomorrow's Post headline: "Bill Cosby Turned Me Into a Newt [got better]"

Like Reply Share

Mrs._Evelyn_Hamster
4:24 PM EST

"But I first told my agent, who did nothing."

You traveled to Atlantic City with a married man; according to your story he made an uncompleted pass. You were the age of consent, what did you expect your agent to do, exactly?

Still, the Post and other feminist-oriented media sites kept the story going—to grab more clicks, of course, but also because they seemed to want to take Cosby down, and in so doing put another notch on the feminist crossbow. Here's Jenny Kutner, who writes about "sex, gender and feminism" at Salon:

Because of the statute of limitations on rape cases, Bowman says Cosby will likely never suffer legal consequences for raping her. And while she and other survivors are working to change the legal system so it will no longer "silence [victims] a second time," it is also up to the public to ensure that men such as Cosby do not walk away without any consequences. We do not have to continue to turn a blind eye. [link]

(Note how smoothly Bowman's voice segues into Kuttner's.)

Eventually the keep-the-story-alive strategy worked. A woman named Janice Dickinson came forward with her own allegations.

Dickinson says she [then a twentysomething model] went to Lake Tahoe in 1982 to see Cosby perform. She says the comedian told her to come to the hotel and he'd help her with her career . . . after dinner he gave her a pill and some wine, and the last thing she remembered was Cosby "in a patchwork robe, dropping his robe and getting on top of me." She says the next morning she was naked with semen between her legs.

Dickinson describes herself as a supermodel. Possibly a better description would be: D-list reality-TV celeb with a history of odd behavior, including running up huge debts and shamelessly seeking attention. However her story, coming right after Bowman's, allowed the media to write sentences that began "A growing number of women are coming forward." There was much talk now about that growing number; in some accounts there were six, in others seven, in others thirteen. NBC, developing a Cosby sitcom, and Netflix, about to air a Cosby comedy special, suddenly found him radioactive.

The new consensus, even among many men, seemed to be: These women can't all be lying. Why would they embarrass themselves by coming forward like this? Where there's smoke, there must be fire.

770 COMMENTS

Share your thoughts.

All 770 | Readers' Picks 630 | NYT Picks 14

Teresa Monroe New York · 16 hours ago

PICK

I was a big fan of Mr. Cosby and never heard until recently about these allegations. But these women have no reason to lie. The statute of limitations for any claims against him have long expired. No states allow claims to be brought decades later. And no woman would want this kind of "fame." Just the opposite. It's humiliating for them. I realize Mr. Cosby will receive a lot of support and these women will be trashed by his supporters That's why it takes decades for allegations such as these to come out, if they come out at all, and why powerful men can usually get away with these things.

Reply · 699 Recommend

But this is all wrong. Whether or not Cosby drugged those women just isn't something we can fairly judge, based on self-serving accounts in the media, and decades after the events in question. In pursuit of their own narrow interests, feminists want us to believe otherwise, but we should resist that tendency forcefully.

Modern societies have evolved legal systems that, ideally anyway, treat defendants as innocent until proven guilty—and also protect them with statutes of limitations and other restrictions on evidence, such as hearsay evidence. Moreover, judgments are to be made after a trial in a controlled courtroom setting, where witnesses can be cross-examined, and can be charged with perjury if they lie.

These protections are already too weak in the modern world, where the "court of public opinion" is presided over by feminist media and routinely ruins people's careers for ludicrously inadequate reasons. In any case, we should remember that these protections were put in place specifically to minimize miscarriages of justice based on false claims—including quite a few episodes in which women produced false claims by the dozen.

A very brief history of hysteria

The contagion of false claims that began at Salem, Massachusetts in 1692 is an example that comes easily to mind. Unfortunately, what really happened at Salem tends to be obscured nowadays—no prizes for guessing why. The acceptable version of the story blames a tense socio-religious environment. But in fact the Salem case is just one of many social contagions throughout history that have been triggered and mostly driven by the competitive histrionics of girls and women.

The Aix-en-Provence case of the early 1600s bears an even closer resemblance to cases like Cosby's. It centered around a teenage nun, Madeleine Demandolx de la Palud, who on a visit home from her remote convent at Aix apparently developed an infatuation with a young, handsome priest, Louis Gaufridi, a friend of her parents. Madeleine later claimed that they had been intimate, and for that she was kept well away from Gaufridi.

After two more years in the convent (bored out of her mind, no doubt) she smashed a crucifix one day, and thereafter began acting out the symptoms of demonic possession. Soon other girls in the convent at Aix, including one Louise Capeau, were competing to top her antics. Sexual themes predominated—and the stories and acting-out were so lurid that observers were convinced that these girls, all from good families, could only be possessed by demons. Gaufridi, of course, was the target of their hysterical claims, and eventually was brought to trial by a fanatical Inquisitor.

Madeleine and Louise were the star witnesses against the priest, recounting in graphic detail their possessions and going into fits before the court. Madeleine alternated this daily display with assertions that she was making everything up. She claimed great love for Gaufridi and actually writhed on the floor imitating the sexual acts they had done. Physicians examined her and agreed she was not a virgin. She displayed the devil's marks on the bottom of her feet and under her left breast. When pricked with a pin, the marks did not bleed or cause her pain. The marks mysteriously disappeared and reappeared repeatedly. [link]

Gaufridi was tortured into confessing, not just to having had sex with Madeleine, but to having signed a blood pact with the devil, etc. He later recanted, but it was too late, and he was tortured and executed in April 1611. As soon as he died, Madeleine's long possession ended, although some of her competitors continued their performances and their behaviors spread to other convents until the authorities locked the ringleaders away.

These bizarre contagions are often said to have ended in the 17th century, as western legal systems improved and the Enlightenment reduced official enthusiasm for witchcraft and demon-possession stories. But they eventually resurfaced in the medical world, late in the 1800s, in the "hysterias" that preoccupied Charcot, Freud, Breuer, Jung and others, and that basically kicked off modern psychiatry.

Hysterics, so-called because they were mostly women (the name is derived from the ancient Greek word for uterus), had what we would now call psychosomatic ailments, and often seemed to switch personalities suddenly—just as women supposedly possessed by demons had done in centuries past. And once again, sexual themes were frequent.

Breuer's famous patient "Anna O." (real name: Bertha Pappenheim) writhed on a bed in front of him and claimed to be having his baby. Jung accepted a patient with masochistic fantasies, one Sabina Spielrein, and risked his career by having sex with her—a story that was dramatized in the recent movie A Dangerous Method.

Then there was Freud, a guy who, as the saying goes, heard hoofbeats and looked for zebras. He theorized that hysterics' inordinate interest in sex while on therapists' couches must be due not to the obvious possibility, sexual frustration, but instead to repressed memories of childhood sexual abuse. Like the gullible onlookers at Aix, he could not believe that these young women could make up sex stories on their own—someone had to have forced them into such experiences.

He eventually set the sex abuse idea aside, but later psychiatrists took it up again in the 1970s and 80s, in the face of an epidemic of "multiple personality disorder" (MPD)—a full-blown spirit-possession version of hysteria, once again dominated by women. The MPD epidemic had followed the success of the 1973 book Sybil, whose protagonist and her female psychoanalyst had claimed—falsely, it is now asserted—that "Sibyl" had multiple personalities and had been sexually abused as a child.

The MPD-caused-by-sexual-abuse industry grew rapidly in the 80s and early 90s. Driven by the competitive claims of MPD "victims," it eventually branched out into the even more ridiculous MPD-caused-by-satanic-ritual-abuse hysteria. Esteemed doctors who knew much about modern psychiatry, but apparently nothing about the lurid histrionics at Aix and Salem, were completely taken in. Like the Inquisitor at Aix and the Puritans at Salem, they ended up orchestrating and promoting the epidemic, which damaged and destroyed many lives.

There was also, around this time, an epidemic of an MPD-like syndrome in which people—again, mostly young women—claimed to have been abducted and abused by aliens in flying saucers. In that and in all the other cases, the media of the time, and especially the book-publishing industry, helped foment the hysteria, but conveniently developed amnesia about its role when the contagion had burned itself out.

What guise does female hysteria take nowadays? I would guess mostly Post Traumatic Stress Disorder—which is epidemic, and is diagnosed three times more often in women than in men—although 21st century psychiatry affords women almost limitless opportunities for fantasy role-playing in a non-judgmental medical setting. You wondered why Obamacare made mental health coverage mandatory? Now you know.

But my main point here is that there are clear historical precedents in which multiple women, encouraged by the media, have made false claims against men. Note that the central feature of these contagions, even more central than the "spirit possession" or "multiple personality" aspect, is the need to get attention or influence by acting out the role of victim. And for every victim there must be a perpetrator.

Thus it is not just wrong but dangerous for us to judge Bill Cosby based on the current set of claims, which are made years and years after the supposed events, and apparently are accompanied by no corroborating evidence.

A behavioral program?

Another point is that this history of female hysteria suggests the existence of a "program" coding for such behavior in the brain. This program, it seems, is mostly latent but can emerge in some, especially women, under the right circumstances: it is all about playing the victim, in a way that draws attention and otherwise empowers the person, and it includes an impressive set of histrionic tools to convince the unwary. Four hundred years after two randy, unstable nuns sent a man to the stake for crimes he did not commit, we are still easy to fool.

Note that this behavioral program is probably ancient and global—not limited to the Christianized, medicalized west. Anthropologists have detailed many possession cases in the third world, and the social groups that form around them (possession cults), which, again, tend to be women's domains. They have proposed that women tend to predominate in this area of behavior because, in these traditional, patriarchal societies, being possessed (often by authoritative male spirits) gives women a voice, gives them something interesting to do, in ways that ordinary behavior couldn't.

That all may be true, but even if this peculiar predisposition arose as a secret weapon of female empowerment, its utility over hundreds and perhaps thousands of years would have driven it into the human genome, where it presumably persists. Certainly hysteria hasn’t disappeared with the rise of feminism and mass female empowerment—far from it.

Read More: Was Jian Ghomeshi Fired From CBC For Baseless Allegations?

Oscar O'Reilly
Oscar is a novelist and essayist.

10 Things Every College Student Needs To Know

December 7, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

College is a huge part of the average American's life.

As a society, we put it on a pedestal. It's all but expected that you start your career, meet your best friends, meet your wife, and learn everything you need to know all during those four sacred years.

Well, like anyone who's been through college, I feel like I have wisdom that can be shared. And I believe my advice is particularly valuable and relevant because I went through college just four years ago, and more importantly, because while my college experience was definitely good, I've experienced the four most fulfilling years of my life since graduating. And that's what you want: for college to be a stepping stone to crushing life afterwards.

College can make you or it can break you. It's the first time you're living on your own and it takes place at a crucial time in your development. So it's important that you do it right. While you'll make plenty of your own mistakes, and learn plenty of lessons because of them, it's important to at least to try to learn from the mistakes of those who came before you.

1. Your school is small and insignificant

Almost every college student "buys in" to their school. Their life revolves around the campus "happenings." And this makes it far too easy to confuse your campus with the rest of the world.

It's natural for it to seem like the social hierarchy of your school is absolute and making a name for yourself at your school, getting the best grades, or dating the hottest girl is the most important thing you can do. But you must remember: even the biggest colleges are tiny relative to the world you'll live in afterwards. So don't take it so fucking seriously.

2. No other student is “better” than you

This phenomenon occurs because of the above fact. When you think that your college is so damn important, you start to put other students on a pedestal. The football player can seem like a god and the hot girls can seem untouchable.

You must remember that everyone has their insecurities—no matter how “cool” or “important” they may seem. Rather than assuming a particular social position, remember that you’re all just a bunch of college kids trying to have fun, get laid, and feel important. Again, don’t take the social hierarchy so fucking seriously.

3. You don’t need to know your career yet

I stressed out about my college major like everyone else does. Don’t sweat it. The vast majority of people don’t end up working in the field they studied.

Your motivation, social skills, and appearance will determine how far you can climb a corporate ladder at the end of the day, not your bachelors. Sure, some jobs require an MBA or similar graduate degree, but outside of those select few, just focus on learning and trying new things. This is what will pay off in the long run.

4. Take classes that will actually help you in the future

This is in line with the above point. While you’ll never use the skills and info you learn in most classes, there are a select few that should be required. Find the time in your schedule to take the following classes because they’ll pay off big-time in the long run: personal finance, basic accounting, public speaking, writing, and web design.

5. Getting rejected is good for you

When it comes to women, don’t be afraid to burn your bridges. There are far too many girls I wanted to bone that I never even approached and expressed my intent. And guess what, I never got what I wanted. Getting rejected will build your confidence and get you laid. Take the initiative and ask any girl you have your eye on to hang out—it will put you leagues ahead of the average guy who just relies on getting drunk in frat house basements to meet women.

6. Networking is essential

Make friends with everyone. The jocks, nerds, hot girls, hipsters, and everyone in between. Whether it’s in class, in the cafeteria, or at the gym—talk to everyone. This is how you get ahead in life. It’s what gets you the job, the promotion, and the girl. Don’t get stuck with a couple of friends that you spend all your time with. You don’t have to be best buddies with everyone, but being able to talk to have a quick conversation with most people is important. When you graduate this is of the even more important, so get started early.

7. Work hard, play hard

This is cliché as fuck, but it's true. If you (or your parents) are paying the massive bill to go to college, then make sure you get a good GPA. This will help you with getting your first job, so don't shoot yourself in the foot. But also don't forget to party hard because the bar scene gets quite different after college. Not worse, but different—so enjoy the crazy house parties while you can.

8. Fuck the haters

There are inevitably going to be guys who are dicks and girls who are bitches. Don't worry about it. Don't get caught up in some stupid beef. Just move on and meet more people.

9. Lift weights and eat well

So many people let themselves go while at college. They drink a lot, eat a lot, and put on the infamous "freshman 15." Do yourself a favor and get on a proper lifting routine. Also, if you're going to go out and get hammered, avoid the pizza and Chinese afterwards. If you can maintain your body during college, you'll put yourself in a great place to do so afterwards too.

10. College is just the beginning

This is the main takeaway. College can be a place where you learn a lot of social skills and some useful other skills too. It can be a place where you set the foundation for a lot of growth in the years to come. But college is not the game. It's just the "pre-game." Treat it as such and you'll fare far better, both during and afterwards, than the average chump.

Want to radically improve your confidence and uncover your primary purpose in less than a month? Check out my new online course 28 Days to Alpha.

Read More: 6 Habits That Hold Men Back

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Why The World Would Not Be A Better Place If Women Ruled

December 7, 2014 | by Woh Kavi | Link | Original Link

I recently saw a painting made by a feminist which depicted a career woman in a suit standing next to a man who I surmised was a construction worker from his garb. The statement below the painting expressed the artist's opinion that the world was gradually becoming female-dominated as women assumed positions of power while men were relegated to mule labor.

In other words, women were the keepers of civilization while men were the maintenance crew (read serfs). Let us momentarily suspend reality and forget that in the 145 IQ range, men out number women 8-1. Let us also step back from the fact that men are on average 5 IQ points above women. Let us also for the time being ignore that the dangerous and physically demanding jobs that men do sustain our civilization and maintain our way of life.

Now that reality has been successfully suspended and we enter feminist la la land, we must ask the crucial question: "Will the world indeed be a better place if ruled by women?" The answer to this question is another question: "What does it take to construct a civilization? Do women have what it takes?"

A historical perspective

The very first debate in Plato's Republic is around the theme of justice. What is justice? Is it simply giving what is owed? Is it worthless as the sophist Thrasymachus argued? Why start with justice? The ancient Greeks believed that the universe was governed by a set of rules and this love of order was reflected in the symmetry of their art and the realism of their sculptures.

Christianity would take this love of order and spread it all over Europe. The Greeks also believed that human lives could similarly be governed by this order, which could be expressed by certain general principles. Throughout the history of our species, man (regardless of culture) has been obsessed with justice and fairness. Western men have today taken this obsession to suicidal levels by advocating for mass immigration and leftist social justice insanity.

Every god constructed by the masculine imagination has possessed omnipotence tempered by compassion and justice. The Abrahamic God of the Bible and Quran is the very personification of justice. The existence of God teaches our species a valuable lesson: that power without justice is tyranny. Even the primitive Mesoamerican religions were fundamentally fair. Their gods demanded human blood, and not even the Mayan Emperor was exempt from excruciating blood letting rituals that required him to pierce his penis.

The role of fairness

It is thus established that fairness is the keystone in the arch of civilization. If women want to usurp the masculine role then we must ask if women possess this same love of justice, and we do this by examining spheres of our life where women wield disproportionate power over the lives of men. I can think of no better place to start than in the domain of sexual relationships. Wives wield disproportionate power over husbands today, as divorce laws are heavily in women's favor.

As society no longer holds women up to any standards, a woman can throw tantrums and freely give in to her inner child while the husband has no socially acceptable alternatives of recourse. She can strike him while he cannot strike her. She can freely divorce him and walk away with his hard-earned wealth while divorce is not worth his while. Feminism succeeded in the west because men (guided by the principles of justice) voluntarily sacrificed their power on a matter of principle.

However, now that women wield this power, how to they use it? Are large numbers of western women clamoring for the reform of divorce laws on grounds of principle? Are women protesting against the rampant misuse of draconian sexual assault laws on university campuses that have ruined the lives of so many men falsely accused of sexual assault? Do women chant "Teach women not to make false rape accusations"?

To ask the questions is to answer them. Feminist fruitcake Jessica Valenti actually goes as far as to insinuate that in matters of sexual assault, men must be treated as guilty until proven innocent. William Blackstone famously stated that it was better for 10 guilty men to escape rather than one innocent to suffer. To Valenti however, it is better that 10 innocent men be jailed on a false rape accusation then for one guilty rapist to go free. Feminism isn't about justice or equality, but a grab for power. It's incredible how most people still can't see through the ruse in 2014.

A global phenomenon

Lest any of our readers jump to the unwarranted conclusion that these amoral tendencies are exclusively the domain of western women, I might remind them that even foreign women misuse laws when given the chance. Recently, Indian women have been using anti-dowry laws to spitefully attack their in-laws. So rampant was the abuse that judges had to intervene to prevent further abuse. According to the BBC:

> The court has now ordered the police to follow a nine-point checklist before arresting anyone on a dowry complaint…And if the police make an arrest, a magistrate must approve further detention of the accused, the court ruled.

Let us analyze the above a little more closely since the BBC stopped short of stating the obvious. We know that power is a zero sum-game and where one gains power, somebody else necessarily loses it. By compelling police officers to do their jobs by conducting an investigation prior to an arrest, the supreme court has essentially limited the power of women for the good of society. That is the story of patriarchy in a nutshell.

No such luck for Canadian and American white males living in a feminized society where victim worship trumps justice and common sense.

But why do women fail to grasp the principles of justice? I suspect this has much to do with female nature, which is inherently solipsistic. Men can be self-absorbed too, as the human mind, in the words of Arthur Danto, "is constantly projecting schemes and fantasies." But there is a fundamental difference in the structure of the male fantasy and the female fantasy.

Jean Luc Picard versus Christian Grey

Male fantasies allow us to escape into worlds that lie far away but remain curiously familiar. While Mordor and a galaxy far far away might superficially contrast with the world we live in, they still function on a set of rules and paradigms that are accessible to us in the real world. Whether it's the expansionist nature of Mordor or the corrupt politics that would be the downfall of the Galactic Republic, these fantastical worlds are governed by the same general principles that govern our world. Similarly, one could immediately relate to the ethical dilemmas encountered by Captain Picard and his crew aboard the Enterprise, such as the question of when to break the Prime Directive.

The female fantasy is exactly the other way around. While the settings of these fantasies may seem familiar to us, these worlds are based on a set of rules that are illogical and improbable. What are the odds of anybody's biography resembling Fifty Shades of Grey? Yet because the setting resembles the real world, the female mind has difficulty separating reality from fantasy.

This might possibly explain how women live through contradictions without reconciling them; because they are simply not aware of them. This possibly explains how women can live of a man's charity (alimony, child support) while still declaring themselves "strong and independent." This explains how women can have consensual sex and yet genuinely convince themselves that they were raped. This explains how women can think that single mothers are the greatest thing since sliced bread despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary. Women do not do these things out of malice, but rather, they are simply too self-absorbed to know any better.

Female solipsism prevents the fairer sex from adequately grasping the principles of justice and fairness. Some readers will be quick to point out a list of highly successful female rulers throughout history such as Queens Victoria, Elizabeth, Noor Jahan, and Laxmibai (a symbol of Indian resistance against the British). But it is worthwhile to point out that these women functioned within the bounds of patriarchal societies and did not attempt to overthrow the prevailing order. Queen Laxmibai resisted British imperialism in India and was slain on the battlefield. She didn't fight against the "oppression of women," but rather against the oppression of her kingdom and all subjects therein. This is why she is rightly revered as a true patriot all over India to this day. We know that feminists do not make good patriots.

Many readers would also bandy about the argument that "Men start all the wars!" This argument is bogus and invalid because it assumes that men are a class in the Marxist sense of the word. It assumes that everyone born with a Y chromosome, regardless of culture, race, and religion, belongs to this homogenous internationalist class. When viewed from this demented perspective, the largely peaceful men of Malaysia assume moral responsibility for the barbarism of warlike cultures like the Afghans and Aztecs.

Leftist nonsense generally aims to undermine race, family, religion, and nation; the pillars of an individual's identity. Upon their ruin the liberal will assign individuals with a new Marxist class identity that comes with it's own handy-dandy two-dimensional historical narrative which is anything but historical.

It's been stated before that the true test of a group's integrity is measured by how liberal-minded they are when they are the majority. As our corrupt elites continue to empower their pet classes (women, gays, immigrants), I wonder if said groups will display the same degree of tolerance towards the western men that sacrificed their self-interests on a matter of principle.

Read More: Forbes' "Most Powerful Women In The World" List Is Complete Horseshit

Woh Kavi
WK is a Canadian Paleo-Conservative that struggles against the rising tide of Cultural Marxism and Liberal insanity. He blogs at Occidentinvicta.com

Bold And Determined Is The Website For Winners

December 7, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK's December sponsor is Bold & Determined, which offers lifestyle and self-improvement advice for men.

Bold and Determined….

-Details the art of high performance in a world full of underachievers.

-Dishes out what it takes to be strong and disciplined, and how to develop an iron mind.

-Focuses on the mindset of success. Without the right mindset the "how" is meaningless.

-Embeds unbreakable virtues in the men who aspire for higher.

-Shows you how to get from A to B in a straight line instead of going from A to A in a circle.

Some articles readers of ROK may enjoy include:

- So You Want to Be a Professional Badass
- 10 Reasons to Stop Using Internet Porn
- How to Pick the Right Wife
- So You Want to Be a Professional Artist
- How I Became Mighty with Modafinil
- Be Somebody with a Body

For men who are interested in combining game improvement with additional lifestyle development, check out Bold & Determined.

If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page. You can also drop a couple bucks in our tip jar.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Sabrina Rubin Erdely Has Destroyed Rolling Stone's Credibility

December 8, 2014 | by Lucius Cincinattus | Link | Original Link

Rolling Stone recently published a shocking story titled "A Rape on Campus" written by Sabrina Rubin Erdely. The horrifying details of this narrative roused the nation. Feminists, social justice activists, and the mainstream media led a vicious and hysterical attack on the University of Virginia, fraternity men, and "rape culture."

Recent reporting has cast the story in doubt. While reviewing the evidence below, please ask yourself the following question: "Can Rolling Stone's malicious activism be tolerated?"

Rolling Stone Claim #1:

Sabrina Erdely begins by describing the meeting between the alleged victim and alleged rapist.

> She and Drew had met while working lifeguard shifts together at the university pool, and Jackie had been floored by Drew's invitation to dinner, followed by a "date function" at his fraternity, Phi Kappa Psi"

Fact:

A review of the employee roster for the "Aquatic Fitness Center" pool Jackie worked at in 2012 revealed that none of the pool employees were Phi Kappa Psi brothers (Washington Post).

Rolling Stone Claim #2:

The setting of the alleged incident was a “date function” party at Phi Kappa Psi fraternity house on September 28, 2012.

Rebuttal:

There was no party at Phi Kappa Psi fraternity that night according to a statement by the fraternity.

Note: Return of Kings has far more journalistic integrity than Rolling Stone, therefore we will call this a “rebuttal” instead of “fact.”

Rolling Stone Claim #3:

> A body barreled into her, tripping her backward and sending them both crashing through a low glass table. There was a heavy person on top of her, spreading open her thighs, and another person kneeling on her hair, hands pinning down her arms, sharp shards digging into her back, and excited male voices rising all around her. When yet another hand clamped over her mouth, Jackie bit it, and the hand became a fist that punched her in the face.

Rebuttal:

The Washington Post reports that,

> A student who came to Jackie’s aid the night of the alleged attack said in an interview late Friday night that she did not appear physically injured at the time.

Could it be possible that “Jackie” would not appear to be physically injured after the violent gang rape described by Rolling Stone? Thrown through a glass table? Punched in the face? Violently raped by seven men in a bed of glass for three hours? You decide.

Rolling Stone Claim #4:

> Seven men took turns raping her, while two more – her date, Drew, and another man – gave instruction and encouragement…. As the last man sank onto her…. he told the crowd he couldn’t get it up. “Pussy!” the other men jeered. “What, she’s not hot enough for you?” Then they egged him on: “Don’t you want to be a brother?” “We all had to do it, so you do, too.

There are several incredibly serious accusations made by Rolling Stone here:

1. Phi Psi fraternity requires pledges to rape a woman as a pledge initiation procedure.

2. This plan was orchestrated by Jackie’s date “Drew” as a premeditated plan to fulfill the pledge initiation.

3. Nine men are directly implicated in this alleged violent crime.

Fact:

Fraternity rushing and pledging processes at the University of Virginia are in the spring semester, not the fall semester in which this alleged "rape" took place. In addition, the Washington Post reports that they have identified the alleged ringleader "Drew" as a fellow lifeguard who is completely unaffiliated with Phi Psi fraternity.

1. If Phi Psi has no rushing in the fall semester, then why would they hold a pledge initiation ritual in September 2012? First-year students would not be rushing until January 2013, and upper-class students would already have secured their brotherhood.

2. If "Drew" is not a brother of Phi Psi fraternity, then why would he orchestrate this "gang rape" to fulfill a pledge initiation?

3. If nine men were implicated in the attack, one of which was specifically identified through a small anthropology class and another as a lifeguard at the Aquatic Fitness Center pool, how did Rolling Stone fail to even privately identify a single one of these men in their investigation?

Rolling Stone Claim #5:

> She emerged to discover the Phi Psi party still surreally under way, but if anyone noticed the barefoot, disheveled girl hurrying down a side staircase, face beaten, dress spattered with blood, they said nothing.

Counter-Claim:

There was no party that night according to the fraternity.

Fact:

There is not a "side staircase" at the fraternity house.

Rebuttal:

Sabrina Erdely is essentially claiming that college men are so evil that they don't even care that a barefoot, beaten, bloodied, violently raped freshman woman is walking past them, they just callously go about their evening.

Women at this party and elsewhere at UVA are treated with just as much feminist contempt, portrayed as "lighthearted" social climbers that care more about being invited to the right parties than the alleged horrors endured by a friend.

Rolling Stone Claim #6:

Extensive dialogue is quoted as fact throughout the Rolling Stone story without any qualifiers such as "according to Jackie" or "allegedly." This is gross negligence without any corroboration. One such dialogue example is an alleged rapist yelling "Grab its motherfucking leg." Remind you of anything?

Rebuttal:

At this point in a story riddled with errors, inconsistencies, and blatant falsehoods, the sad truth is that the alleged victim is confusing fiction with reality. It is not uncommon for trauma victims to repress reality and create internal narratives, which is why it was incredibly inappropriate for Sabrina Rubin Erdely to publish as fact the extensive dialogue found in this story.

Rolling Stone Claim #7:

Jackie's friends are evil.

> For the first month of school, Jackie had latched onto a crew of lighthearted social strivers, and her pals were now impatient for Jackie to rejoin the merriment. "You're still upset about that?" Andy asked one Friday night when Jackie was crying. Cindy, a self-declared hookup queen, said she didn't see why Jackie was so bent out of shape. "Why didn't you have fun with it?" Cindy asked. "A bunch of hot Phi Psi guys?" One of Jackie's friends told her, unconcerned, "Andy said you had a bad experience at a frat, and you've been a baby ever since.

Rebuttal:

The crucial comment here is “Why didn’t you have fun with it?” asked by Cindy, one of the three friends who came to the assistance of “Jackie” the night of the attack. There are three possibilities here:

1. Jackie’s female friend Cindy, a self-described rape victim, acted in an incredibly dismissive and callous manner. Jackie was allegedly violently raped by seven men, and Cindy had the gall to ask why she didn’t have fun with it? Cindy is a horrible human being.

2. Jackie admitted to Cindy that the encounter was consensual, leading Cindy to (understandably) later question why she didn’t enjoy it.

3. As the rest of the Rolling Stone story has been shown to be complete and utter rubbish, it’s also possible that Cindy is completely misquoted and slandered in this account.

Conclusion:

There are no winners here. This is bad for everybody. “Jackie” will likely be publicly exposed and humiliated, the University of Virginia has suffered a dramatic loss in reputation, fraternity men everywhere have been slandered as barbaric animals, the administration of the university has been under fire, and legitimate victims of rape will be undermined for years (perhaps decades).

The FBI reports that forcible rape incidents have declined by 24% from 1992 to 2011. The widely distributed feminist claim that “1 in 5 women are the victims of sexual assault” has been repeatedly debunked.

The wildly poetic moralizing by Sabrina Erdely is based on feminist fantasies about how “rape culture” permeates universities across the country, and has no basis in reality whatsoever. The hysterical fight against this imaginary “rape culture” is a desperate attempt by a dying feminist movement to regain relevance in a world that hasn’t needed their activism in decades.

Sabrina Erdely and Rolling Stone are not just grossly negligent and wildly incorrect in their reporting, they must be pursued by relentless litigation for libel and defamation of character for the institutions and individuals involved in this story.

After reading the claims made by Sabrina Erdely and Rolling Stone, and reviewing the evidence, can their continued existence in a media capacity be tolerated?

Read More: Is Rolling Stone Sensationalizing The UVA Rape Story For Profit?

Lucius Cincinattus

Lucius is an outdoorsman, athlete, professional, and student of classical western philosophy. His recent struggles include a complete overhaul of nutrition, competing in extreme endurance races, and mountain climbing.

Are Transsexuals Who Sleep With Straight Men Guilty Of Rape?

December 8, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Like a drag queen's schlong popping out of his pantyhose, transgenderism has suddenly become the cause du jour of social justice warriors. Across America and the west at large, transsexuals are fighting for their "right" to be acknowledged as "female" just because they've had their penises flayed into leathery pouches. Not only that, trannies think they have a "right" to sleep with straight men without disclosing that they used to have penises, and that men who feel violated by this are "transphobic" bigots.

Unfortunately for transsexuals, what they're doing might actually be rape.

Last month, New Jersey State Assemblyman Troy Singleton (D-Burlington) introduced a bill that would criminalize "rape by fraud," the act of having sex with someone by lying about yourself. Rape-by-fraud laws not only have a long history in Anglo-American common law, they also have a strong amount of support from modern legal theorists. More importantly, laws such as New Jersey's can be used to arrest trannies who trick straight men into sex.

A Brief History Of Rape By Fraud

While rape-by-fraud laws are rare in modern America—only California, Colorado, Alabama, Tennessee and Montana currently have them—there is a growing movement in American academia to expand their reach. Rape by deception is believed to have originated in medieval England as a way of protecting women who had sex with men pretending to be their husbands, a fairly easy maneuver at night when the only sources of illumination were fires and candles.

Rape by fraud first came to the attention of the public in 2008, when Massachusetts resident Marissa Lee-Fuentes cried rape after her boyfriend's brother impersonated him in order to have sex with her; because Lee-Fuentes's room was pitch-black, she didn't notice the difference until he left. Because Massachusetts law requires that rape include the use of force, the case was thrown out of court. An attempt by then-State Representative Peter Koutoujian to pass rape-by-deception legislation died in committee.

Last year, California was forced to amend the state's rape-by-fraud law because of a similar case. In People v. Morales, an appellate court overturned the 2009 rape conviction of Julio Morales, who had sex with a woman by sneaking into her darkened bedroom and pretending to be her boyfriend. According to the court, California's rape-by-fraud law only protected women who slept with men pretending to be their husbands; because the woman was unmarried, Morales's actions were not illegal. The state legislature quickly passed a bill to close this loophole, which was signed into law by Governor Jerry Brown on September 9, 2013.

Rape-by-fraud laws also exist in other countries. In the 1998 R. v. Cuerrier case, the Supreme Court of Canada declared that any instance of sex obtained through "dishonesty" is rape. A 2010 rape case in Israel drew international attention when Palestinian Sabbar Kashur was charged with rape by fraud after he slept with a Jewish woman by claiming to be Jewish himself. It was later revealed that the charge was part of a plea bargain, as Kashur had actually violently raped and beaten the woman.

Arguments in favor of rape-by-fraud laws have been advanced in American legal circles for years. One of rape-by-fraud's most notable proponents is Yale Law School professor Jed Rubenfeld, husband of Battle Hymn of the Tiger Mother author Amy Chua. In his 2013 Yale Law Journal article "The Riddle of Rape-by-Deception and the Myth of Sexual Autonomy," Rubenfeld argued in favor of rape-by-fraud laws with the reasoning that "in virtually every area of the law outside of rape, a consent procured through deception is no consent at all."

Similar arguments were made by Daniel J. Slomnicki in Law Student Connection, a blog published by the New York State Bar Association. In a 2013 article, Slomnicki urged the New York state government to adopt a rape-by-fraud law:

> New York does not have a crime of rape by fraud, deception, or impersonation. In fact, 27 states do not criminalize sexual intercourse obtained by fraudulent means. Furthermore, such a case has not been decided in a New York courtroom since 1994. Nevertheless, this paper argues that it is time for the New York legislature to act. It is time for the New York legislature to finally adopt an amendment that makes it a crime in the state of New York for a perpetrator who obtains sexual intercourse by fraudulent means. The New York legislature should act now and follow the leads of the many jurisdictions that already criminalize rape by fraud, deception or impersonation.

Given the feminist push to legitimize "date rape" and other forms of rape that don't involve force, criminalizing rape by deception is the logical next step. However, social justice warriors have failed to realize how these laws can be used against them.

If You're A Tranny, You Might Be A Rapist

The vast majority of straight men have no desire to sleep with transsexuals, because most men want to have sex with women, not dudes who've had their cocks hacked off with a rusty scalpel. Because trannies know deep down that none of the men they lust after want them, they resort to lying about their trans status in order to get laid. Indeed, many SJWs now argue that transsexuals don't have to disclose their trans status to the men they seduce. Under rape-by-fraud statutes, this makes trannies into potential rapists.

Additionally, with the feminist idea of "enthusiastic consent" being codified into law, transsexuals find themselves in an even deeper pickle. California's new "Yes Means Yes" sexual assault law means that anyone getting laid in the state is required to obtain enthusiastic, affirmative consent to avoid a rape charge. Any tranny who lies about his real sex to the men he beds is not obtaining affirmative consent, thereby making him a rapist under California law.

Despite this, most trannies are violently opposed to revealing their true identities to their sexual partners. Last year, a U.K. court ruled that it was illegal for transsexuals to have sex with others without disclosure, in accordance with existing rape law. Writing in VICE, tranny Paris Lees whined about the court's decision, claiming "it's all good if [transsexuals] can successfully 'trick' people." Based on the writings of Lees and his peers, most trannies believe they should be allowed to rape straight men and get away with it.

We shouldn't be surprised. What SJWs refer to as "transphobia" is a perfectly normal reaction to a social sickness. Men who wear skirts and get silicone breast implants have much higher rates of mental illness, drug addiction and suicide than the general population. The same mental pathology that leads men to get their scrotums reconstructed into clits also leads them to think they have a "right" to have sex with men who would otherwise find them repulsive.

I believe that people should be allowed to live however they want, but I also believe that two plus two equals four. No amount of "tolerance" re-education will get straight men to believe that having sex with a castrated guy is the same as sex with a woman. Until trannies learn to respect the sexual boundaries of others, I fully support any man who reports his tranny assailant to the police. If SJWs want to make rape by fraud a crime, they'll have to live with the consequences.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 5 Ways To Stop Omega Males From Becoming Transsexuals

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Need For Action: Doolittle's Daring Air Raid On Japan

December 8, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The historian Edward Gibbon believed that man held two consuming propensities: the love of pleasure, and the love of action. The love of pleasure should be refined, and tempered, by the duties of a responsible life and the civilizing machinery of a progressive education. The love of action, he believed, was much stronger, and "when it is guided by the sense of propriety and benevolence…becomes the parent of every virtue; and, if those virtues are accompanied with equal abilities, a family, a state, or an empire may be indebted for their safety and prosperity to the undaunted courage of a single man."[1]

This same theme—that of the redeeming power of action—was intoned with earnestness by Theodore Roosevelt, who advocated a "strenuous life" as a way to keep one's personal demons in check.

Get action!, he would call out, in his bombastic, bespectacled Teddy Roosevelt way. One could hardly craft a better motto than this, I think, for a signet ring.

Experience bears out this view. Adolf Von Schell, in his classic treatise Battle Leadership, took note of the necessity of action as an antidote to depression and fear:

> When a soldier lies under hostile fire and waits, he feels unable to protect himself; he has time; he thinks, he only waits for the shot that will hit him. He feels a certain inferiority to the enemy. He feels that he is alone and deserted…It is different during the attack. Here the soldier himself acts; he has something to do; he moves forward; he fires; he assaults and dictates the action of the > enemy…He believes he can do everything by himself…He has the feeling that his action depends on his own will, and in consequence he can act in accordance with that will.[2]

Prolonged periods of supine inaction promote defeatism, demoralization, and an enervating paralysis. In conditions of adversity, in times of conflict, it thus becomes critical to take and retain the initiative through the performance of positive action. One wartime example of the implementation of this psychological principle is Doolittle's air raid on Japan in April 1942.

One of Doolittle's bombers coming in low over Japan

After the attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941, the Japanese Empire's military forces struck all over East Asia. Malaya and Singapore fell in February 1941. Further inroads were made into Chinese territory, which had been under occupation since the 1930s; Australia itself seemed on the edge of invasion. American forces had been routed in the Philippines, and Japanese naval forces were moving boldly into the central Pacific. No one seemed able to stop them. For the first time in living memory, the British and Americans were getting badly beaten by a foreign power. Japan had outclassed the Allies in nearly every category that mattered, and it seemed as if it were only a matter of time before all East Asia came under the control of the Co-Prosperity Sphere.

Some dared to think otherwise. In the midst of this low point, Navy Captain Francis Low and Army Lt.Col. James Doolittle thought that there might be a way to raid the Japanese home islands by air. The idea was that the enemy, which believed itself protected and invulnerable, should be made to acknowledge the reality of war. It was a way of saying:

You might know how to get us, but we know how to reach out and touch you. We're still here, and we're not going anywhere. If it's war you want, then by God, you bastards, you will have it.

This was the subliminal message of the raid. It would fulfill President Franklin Roosevelt's desire to hit back at the enemy at the earliest possible opportunity. Something had to be done, the President implored, to give the public a morale boost. Action needed to be taken. But it was not as easy as it might appear. The bombing aircraft of the time lacked a true long-distance capability, and there were no American bases anywhere near a reasonable striking distance from Japan. Yet, as often happens amid the exigencies of desperation, ingenuity and initiative found a way to thread a camel through the eye of a needle.

A captured airman is led out for execution

After careful consideration, Low and Doolittle selected the B-25B Mitchell bomber to carry out the raid on Japan. No other aircraft had the combination of cruising range, bomb capacity, and maneuverability that would prove suitable for the job. The hazards were daunting. It would be a one-way mission only, as the planes lacked the fuel capacity to return. The bombers would have to fly with no fighter support, and would thus be extremely vulnerable on the approach.

No one had ever flown B-25s off of a carrier before, and it was uncertain whether it could even be done. The aircraft would be lightly armed, so as to enable a greater capacity of bombs and fuel, and would have to fly in low, nearly skimming the waves, so as to avoid detection. It was a daring, hazardous mission, and Doolittle wanted volunteers only. And he got them.

Doolittle eventually assembled his little fleet of specially-modified B-25s and proceeded with his escort ships across the Pacific in strict radio silence. But then, as so often happens in war, things began to happen that necessitated a change in the original plan.

The task force was spotted about 650 nautical miles east of Japan by a Japanese patrol boat, which passed on the information to its headquarters. Secrecy had been compromised. Doolittle made the decision to launch the attack immediately, rather than wait until he was within his ideal striking distance. Thus, while still 170 miles from his original launch point, he gave the order to release the bombers. On his command, 16 B-25s lumbered off the carrier decks and slowly made their way to their targets.

After about six hours of perilous flying, the bombers began to appear in the skies above Tokyo. Residents were incredulous. The planes hit industrial targets in Tokyo, Yokohama, Yokuska, Nagoya, and Kobe. Not a single aircraft was shot down; near total surprise had been achieved. The aviators' luck held even after delivering their payloads, as a tail wind helped carry them to China.

Most of the airmen ditched their aircraft or bailed out in the Chinese countryside. One crew landed in the Soviet Union, where they were immediately taken into custody by the Russians (Stalin at the time had no wish to anger Tokyo). The crews had each flown an average distance of 2250 nautical miles; it was the longest and most audacious B-25 mission in history.

What comes around, goes around: bomb damage in the aftermath

Although the raid had negligible impact on Japan's industrial capabilities, that was never the intended goal. The goal was to demonstrate to a demoralized public that the Americans could reach out and touch the Japanese in ways that they had never expected possible. Their reaction was one of predictable fury: intensive sweeps were undertaken by the Imperial Army in China to find the bailed-out pilots; three captured American airmen were put through a "trial" and shot. The raid played some role in the Japanese decision to attack Midway Island, so as to prevent any future air attacks on the home islands. And Midway proved to be the turning of the tide in the Pacific War.

A crash-landed plane in China

Doolittle himself survived the war, along with most of his comrades. An aggressive, hard-driving man, he set high standards for himself and his men. After crash landing in China, he at first thought the raid had been a failure, and expected to be reprimanded on his return. Instead, there was an outpouring of joy, and he was decorated for his leadership of the operation.

We cannot know the ultimate ends of our actions, and must grope forward, often with the assurance and faith of the sleepwalker. When one is at the lowest point in his fortunes, when all seems lost, and when the knocking of Despair at our door resounds audibly in our ears: this is the time to rouse oneself from the torpor of inaction, to finger the pommels of our daggers, and ready them for some decisive action. Hit the bastards hard, and keep hitting them. Teddy Roosevelt would tolerate nothing less.

Action, action, and more action. There is a crystalline purity in its purpose, and an ineluctable simplicity in its dialectic. Let this be our creed.

Read More: The Apology That Will Never Be Delivered

---

[1] Bury, J.B. (ed.) of Gibbon, Edward, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. London: Methuen & Co., vol. II., p. 37 (1974).

[2] Von Schell, A., Battle Leadership, Quantico: Marine Corps Association, p. 14 (1999).

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Sponsored Posts On Return Of Kings

December 8, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We're trying out a new ad product on ROK where you can submit a custom post about your product or service. Here are the details:

> We allow you to submit sponsored posts up to 1,000 words in length. Within that article you are free to include images, video clips, testimonials, and external links that sell your product. However, keep in mind that the best type of sponsored post is one that gives value to readers.
>
> Example 1:
>
> If you have a men's suit company, a good post idea is "5 Photos That Show You How To Wear A Suit" that links to your site in a non-obtrusive way after educating the reader on proper style.
>
> Example 2:
>
> If you have a bodybuilding product, a good sponsored post would teach men about lifting or gaining muscle before mentioning your product as a way to solve a common problem that lifters face.
>
> While you are free to use your sponsored post to display a conventional ad, giving helpful content is a strong way to ensure your sales message is well-received. We may suggest you revise your article if it's too gimmicky.

You can read more about sponsored posts here including information about the price. Drop an email to if you have questions. Revenue from sponsored posts will go to beef up our current events news.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Shameless Exploitation Of Domestic Violence In The NFL

December 9, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago Quintus Curtius and Roosh had an impromptu conversation regarding the poisonous western culture and its irreparable damage in the U.S. During their talk Quintus opined that sports is one of the last bastions of male space. Unfortunately, his statement becomes more inaccurate by the day because the influence of feminism continues to chip away at the very fabric upon which competitive sports were founded upon—namely masculinity.

Women have tried competing on the same playing fields as men for as long as anyone can remember and the more they try, the more definitive the inevitable conclusion becomes. The ridiculous stunt pulled by the PGA allowing Annika Sorenstam to compete in a male tournament without requiring her to qualify for the event like everyone else turned out to be a complete disaster. She finished 84th and missed the cut. More recently Danica Patrick (who didn't waste any time jumping into bed with another driver on the circuit) hasn't come close to winning a race in the five years she's been on the NASCAR circuit. These and many other examples continue to prove that women simply cannot compete with men on the field, court, course, track, or any other professional or athletic sport.

> Sports in the courts isn't going away. -Roger Kosak, ESPN Legal Analyst

I couldn't agree more, but this is the very crevice that SJWs and the feminized media have used to infiltrate professional sports leagues and college sports programs in America. The biggest fish in the pond is the National Football League, and that's who they've got in their crosshairs.

Females are a lot of things. Stupid is not one of them. Countless defeats have forced them to accept reality and rethink their strategy to bring one of the last public male spaces to its knees. With help from the endless supply of white knights it seems they've tinkered in the lab long enough to have concocted a virus and a delivery system that just might do it.

The Virus: Agent Lavender

I remember when a player getting busted for weed or drunk driving was a big deal. Sure, there were a few minor domestic violence charges filed here and there but they were never really given much copy. Meanwhile, drugs and DUIs were all treated the same: The usual grandstanding would ensue with commentators and pundits chastising athletes for their poor choices (as if they'd never rolled a joint or got behind the wheel after a few cocktails), the player would be suspended for a game or two, given community service, and placed under some type of probation which usually included drug and alcohol "counseling." The case would be talked about for a news cycle or two but as soon as the next shiny story came along everyone forgot about it and went on with their lives.

These occurrences didn't give feminists much to latch onto. They knew they couldn't take down professional sports on the field so their efforts would have to be focused on events off the field to carry out their plan.

The first chink in the armor they capitalized on was when NFL players started wearing pink for breast cancer awareness month, as it increased the perceived value of female life. They also had the backing of the politically correct blue pill media. But they've only just realized the final ingredient of their poisonous formula was plentiful and readily available to do their bidding. All they needed was a flame to the beaker for this catalyst to reveal itself and activate a poison more dangerous than Agent Orange.

By now we've all heard the details of the Ray Rice saga and the fallout from the elevator video that led to his suspension and subsequent release from the Baltimore Ravens. There seems to be a relative happy ending for Rice as an arbitrator ruled in his favor on November 28th, making him eligible to return to the NFL and sign with another team. This is a small victory but the damage has been done. Scores of white knights in the media surfaced in the wake of the revelation of the video which successfully completed the compound specifically designed to destroy masculinity.

The Delivery System

Thanks to that video, the sisterhood acquired massive amounts of the most important component to their mixture (further proving they can't get much of anything done without the assistance of men). They finally had their formula but they knew it would be powerless without an effective way to deliver it to the masses. Predictably, white knights stepped in solved this problem for them—again.

Aside from the new draconian domestic violence policy announced by NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell, the Rice case has spawned a slew of initiatives to further scare men out of being comfortable in their own skin, not the least of which is the new ad campaign dubbed "No More." This 60-second video is just the tip of the iceberg, and you can bet your ass more like this are on the horizon.

Did you happen to catch the Yes Means Yes plug? "No more…she was drunk", "No more…he was drunk", and "No more…she never said no." So if she gets drunk, bangs some random dude, and never said she didn't want to, she's as innocent as a snowflake. But if he's drunk and closes the deal with some random chick he's in the wrong?

The real tragedy of this ad campaign is that it quite literally absolves females of any and all responsibility in these matters while simultaneously placing all of the culpability on the athlete. Player after player (retired and current) gives free pass after free pass to all women. She can dress the way she wants and act the way she wants, but when the shit hits the fan, she's the de facto victim regardless of the circumstances surrounding the incident. Hell, they even managed to make men that aren't even involved and keeping out of other people's business as guilty as the men on the police report.

Using NFL players from multiple generations to to appeal to men of all age groups is a can't-miss delivery system. It's a crafty strategy that takes full advantage of a beta condition I refer to as "hero worship" (most prevalent among the psychologically damaged) to brainwash men into cementing these ideas into their psyche. Proof that this campaign has been highly effective can be found on Twitter, Facebook, sports talk radio, and just about any other medium where every John Q. Public has a voice. Comments, posts, calls in to radio stations, all skew heavily in favor of the feminist imperative and it's not even close.

I'll admit that the overall scheme is actually quite brilliant. Spreading an agenda isn't easy much less convincing most people to come to your side but they've managed to pull it off. However, there are major side effects to the general public being exposed to this lethal pathogen.

Infection & Side Effect

So the feminists have exactly what they need. They've got their testoste-cide and the ability to spread it far and wide. The result is that it rapidly escalated the conversation and debate, then swayed a huge number of fence-sitters in the process. One of the most disturbing side effects is that it is changing very landscape of crime and punishment right before our eyes. Case in point: San Francisco 49ers defensive end Ray McDonald.

My previous article briefly touched on this, but the long and short of it is that after the accusation against him players, pundits, feminists, and everyone who could get in line to pile on called for him to be suspended before he was even charged. They wanted him off the playing field until the case was adjudicated. This response isn't unique to his case. The media is now calling for just about every athlete involved with a domestic dispute to be suspended immediately and indefinitely, due process be damned.

The 49ers did the right thing and stood their ground by allowing McDonald to remain in the lineup and in the end he wasn't charged. But if his General Manager Trent Baalke and the powers that be in that organization caved to public pressure to punish him before anything was settled, this would have set a clear "guilty until proven innocent" standard (if it hasn't been set already) which is a clear violation of the Constitution.

It's become clear that the feminized media wants the NFL and other American sports leagues to start acting as the judge, jury, and executioner in legal matters. This is not their job nor should it be. Yes, the player's code of conduct was collectively bargained and gives the NFL some authority to keep their players in line in order to protect the image of the league. But dolling out additional or preemptive punishment to satisfy the blood lust of the public before these cases even go to trial is not only irresponsible, it's borderline illegal.

There's only one court of law in this country, but if this unconstitutional agenda stays on course that number will unofficially double sooner than later. When that happens (and it will) no athlete is safe.

Do They Really Care About The Victims?

A hypocritical wrinkle to this current cause is the lack of attention the public at large gives these victims. The overwhelming majority of the focus is on the athlete and what his comeuppance should be. I have yet to see any significant outreach to these women to offer them help and support. If anything, they're ridiculed and questioned for staying with their men (though we in the 'sphere know the reasons they stick around).

Only recently has Janay Rice been the focus of their attention, but that's likely because they're digging for more dirt in an attempt to keep her husband out of the league just a little bit longer. They'd scoff at this assertion but those in the know, know the score.

So here's the raw truth: feminists don't give a shit about domestic violence victims and neither does the public. There are countless reasons for this but here's the main one:

Familiarity breeds contempt.

Women hate each other. More importantly they know each other. Females know how other females operate. Deep down they know that every domestic violence complaint or accusation isn't as one-sided as it appears to be. Add that to the fact that they judge each other harshly and almost never take anything they say to each other or to the public at face value (for good reason) and it's easy to understand why women don't really care about or believe other women in these situations, whether their accounts of abuse are true or not.

Here's a great example: I remember back in '08 when Denver Broncos receiver Brandon Marshall (now with the Chicago Bears) was going through his domestic issues with his then girlfriend, Rasheedah Watley. Watley was all over television telling anyone who would listen what a nightmare it was to be a battered girlfriend. At one point my now ex-wife, who was watching it with me, let out a loud, short cackle. I looked at her with an incredulous look on my face wondering what the hell was so funny. After all a great injustice had been done to a precious woman! Without even looking at me she shook her head at the TV and said: "That girl's full of shit."

My ex's instincts appeared to be correct because later that year she wrote a letter stating that Marshall had never hit or hurt her because her family pressured her into filing false charges in order to extort money from him. But at his trial she changed her story saying she wrote the letter in an effort to protect him.

I suppose both scenarios could be true given the nature of women, but when these so-called victims flip flop on the facts it makes it tough to believe anything they say.

This doesn't mean that every wife or girlfriend of an athlete is lying or that the angry masses don't believe any of their stories. But women know the true nature of women, and they display as much with their lack of solidarity with their allegedly abused sisters. If they were really as concerned as they pretend to be they'd focus the lion's share of their attention on the victims rather than the alleged offenders. It seems the shaky credibility of women, which doesn't do them any favors in the court of public opinion (the vast majority of which are women and feminized men) is indirectly held against them.

What Happens When They Don't Get Their Way?

Women are overgrown children. When something doesn't go their way they throw a fit until they get what they want. Society hasn't spanked this behavior out of them so they continue to throw their tantrums. The case of Florida State quarterback Jameis Winston perfectly illustrates this point.

The reader's digest version is that Winston was accused of rape last fall and when the smoke cleared, he wasn't charged. Much to the dismay of feminists, he went on to win the Heisman Trophy and the National Championship, cementing himself as a guaranteed first round pick in the NFL draft. A great outcome to a potentially career-ending accusation. But the SWJs wouldn't let this juicy opportunity slip through their porky little fingers. Not even when the justice system decided not to prosecute him.

Thanks to a Title IX "investigation," Florida State University has opened a case of their own against Winston under the student code of conduct policy. A number of hearings were held to determine whether or not he was in violation of their student code of conduct. This could lead to his expulsion from FSU, which means he'd be stripped of his athletic scholarship and dismissed from the team.

No doubt this was provoked by fit-throwing feminazis hoping this farce will lead to some sort of retribution for Winston. They squawk about how the system is broken and has failed the alleged victim when they know full well there are photos out there that fly in the face of the accuser's account of what happened that night (Google "Jameis Winston accuser").

They claim they're fighting for "closure" (read: conviction) for the alleged victim but we all know why this double-jeopardy inspired inquisition is happening to Winston: they're hoping he incriminates himself so as to trigger the reopening of the original investigation. No matter what other reasons they give, it's as simple as that.

[image]

Luckily Jameis didn't take the bait. He was smart enough to listen to his lawyers who smartly advised him to refrain from answering any questions. But the fact that these hearings happened in the first place is a scary prospect for college athletes. The bright side is that this experience gives Winston insight on what to expect when he goes pro so at least he'll be prepared for what awaits him at the next level. But it's a shame that all of this hoopla has been manufactured over a typical college slut (pictured above) trying to save face.

The Bottom Line

Feminists and SWJs are exploiting the very women they claim they're trying to protect. They've shown they couldn't care less about how the alleged battered wife or girlfriend of player X is doing. These women are being used as a means to an end. Everyone pretends to care but it's obvious they don't. They feign passion for this cause as a ruse to be angry which gives them the vehicle to call for heads to roll. All they're really passionate about is getting men fired, or suspended, or whatever other extreme measures they deem necessary to take away anything and everything that means something to him.

There were no ad campaigns or discipline changes when Leonard Little and Donte Stallworth were charged with DUI manslaughter. There were no protesters or outrage when hoards of players were getting popped for drug-related offenses every other day. Yes, there were a few discussions here and there but nothing significant or thought provoking.

The only reason the sisterhood is making a big deal out of domestic violence in professional sports is because it advances their imperative while simultaneously castrating the leagues—college and the pros. They're seizing an opportunity to invade and ultimately destroy a male-dominated sphere and so far they're winning.

Read Next: How White Knighting Is Killing The NFL

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

UVA Woman Probably Not Raped: Anna Merlan Calls It A “Bad And Shitty Day”

December 9, 2014 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> This a bad and shitty day, and it’ll remain bad and shitty for a long time – Anna Merlan

Despite the great paucity of men who actually rape relative to the entire population, each new rape accusation brings another opportunity for Anna Merlan and Co. to spruik their trade. According to them, men catch Rape Culture like the common cold. They rape like the wind blows. Beyond reasonable doubt is so last century. I need a new tattoo. I wonder who saw my latest tweet.

Rather than expressing her relief that a woman was not raped and chastizing Rolling Stone for shoddy-at-best reporting, plus the coterie of human pitchforks going after UVA fraternities, Merlan is unabashedly upset. A situation shows to a wider public that maybe, just maybe, due process is not so bad after all. And that just doesn’t fit with Merlan’s misandrist worldview.

Before Rolling Stone made a bullshit quarter-retraction, Merlan was busy at work trying to brand anyone with the audacity to question both the story and the ethics used to publish it as de facto rape apologists. Some of her now oh-so-sweet gems can be accessed here.

I hope Robby Soave is screenshotting, printing out, and framing Merlan’s pathetic but still butthurt mea culpa. The beauty of feminism, even with its insidiousness, is that when it fucks things up, it causes the bed to collapse and then splinters fly in every direction. They overextend and nail themselves to the exact points being made by anti-SJWs all along.

Let's face it, Anna Merlan was licking her lips with glee when the concocted Rolling Stone piece about UVA hit the stands and web. A sister who alleges rape, regardless of any preposterous claims and circumstances, means a group of brothers who can be defamed, witch-hunted, and socially crucified without that pointless requirement of police investigating facts and combing for evidence (or lack thereof). Oh, and did I forget that additional step of a courtroom for when SJWs whip authorities into bringing frivolous cases to trial? (Mike Nifong represent!)

The exposure of the inconsistencies (read: lies) in the UVA piece strips Merlan of a raison d'être for the next five minutes. Like Stalin signing off on a quota of executions during the Terror, feminists need an ever-growing number of convictions and scandals sans due process, replete with obligatory character assassinations. The temporary removal of such opportunities generates a rage that forces their uglier side out into the open.

It is important to also recognize the inherent sociopathy of the Anna Merlans of this world. No acknowledgment, not even fleeting, of the male lives turned utterly upside down by such a blatantly false indictment of their characters. The only view she sees is via the prism of "Who can we convict next?" In this reality, mere accusation is conflated with conviction.

Merlan joins a long and continuing line of see-only-what-you-want social justice bile factories. Jessica Valenti, disappointed that even the kangaroo court-style procedures of Columbia University found an ex-boyfriend not responsible, called Emma Sulkowicz a "rape survivor" and referred to her "rape" in September. Alleged is simply a word The Guardian forces her to use from time to time.

Thankfully, many have been outing Merlan on Twitter and lambasting her feigned, self-serving attempts to apologize there and on the Jezebel website. Even more encouragingly, she is being taken to task for expressing disappointment at what is clearly a case of a woman NOT being raped and a group of men being herded to a social slaughterhouse.

I encourage everyone reading this to make their own private cache of comments similar to what Merlan said about the Rolling Stone article. The anger and deluded self-importance SJWs attach to their views means that they cannot always suppress their intractable hatred for not having a crisis to manipulate and distort. Be prepared for and commit to spreading these repulsive musings of theirs more publicly. Embarrassment is a powerful, powerful tool.

We should not see Anna Merlan as a gift. But, on occasion, people like her will be the gift that keeps on giving. Happy Holidays, Anna.

Read More: Anna Karenina Is One Of The Earliest Examples Of Red Pill Truth

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Do Older Men Have To Choose Between Game And Settling Down?

December 9, 2014 | by Jean Lamour | Link | Original Link

Many men are finding themselves divorced or still single by the time they reach their 40s and realize that they may never marry and settle down. This has much to do with destruction of a patriarchal family unit by feminized by western society. However, many men may wish to see multiple women while simultaneously having a more "stable" relationship. So which is better—game or settling down? You may be surprised by the answer, because in some countries it is not uncommon to see men doing both.

While this article lays out the history of how men throughout the ages have had many wives and concubines, I am in no way advocating this lifestyle. However, if you look at what we call a "concubine" today, most people would just say she is a "girlfriend" or "lover." In my opinion, those in the pick-up or seduction community can have their cake and eat it too.

In fact, any dominant masculine man can tell you that if he wanted to, he could marry his lover and still have other women on the side willing to bear his children. What is it about the psyche of a woman that allows her to tolerate her husband being a womanizer while maintaining attraction for him?

1. History of married men and their concubines

History has shown us that rich powerful men have had multiple wives and concubines. In fact, some of these men went to the extreme and married their close relatives while keeping a harem of women around to fulfill all of their sexual desires. The concubines of a ruler were considered “inferior” in relationship to his wife. However, both enjoyed certain advantages over the other that made the relationship somewhat attractive. A wife of a monarch possessed a powerful political position in society, and often the concubines enjoyed a luxurious lifestyle and influence not offered outside such a relationship.

Many times, wives were less attractive and older than concubines, which is because most marriages were strategies used to forge some political objective. These types of marriages also preserved and protected a family’s dynasty from outside entanglements. In an age when royalty would marry their cousins, what better way for a monarch to enjoy a less taboo sexual relationship than having intercourse with lots of different beautiful women who were not blood related? Like men of that era, today older guys may decide to marry someone closer to their age while at the same time continuing to date younger women.

2. Psyche of a woman who can share her man with another woman.

While I’m no expert in psychology, I can say that it is less common for a woman to have a husband while seeing multiple guys at the same time, unless she’s a porn star or a swinger. There are plenty of women who take advantage of their beta-male counterparts and will sleep around, but it’s much easier for a man to have a wife and multiple girlfriends than the other way around.

A feminine woman’s psychological makeup is different from a man’s. A woman will look to a dominant masculine figure more than just for sexual gratification. She also seeks security and protection. In fact, these desires are so powerful that she, in her own mind, exempts her husband for having multiple lovers. She will allow such a relationship as long as her husband doesn’t bring anyone she doesn’t like around her, interact with family members, or be mocked about it in public. Generally women have more emotional needs than men, while males must be psychologically stronger to provide for those needs.

3. Political correctness about multiple relationships outside the US

In countries in Latin America, like Mexico, a man can be president and known to have fathered illegitimate children. In parts of the world with a Muslim tradition it’s impossible for many women to divorce her husband purely on the grounds of infidelity. No amount of feminism is going to change that and it wouldn’t make much sense to attempt it.

A single man in his 40s living in the US who has never been a father could easily find a woman in South America willing to bear his children. As long as you agree to raise the child and care for it financially, a woman say in Columbia would love to have your kid and would rather give birth to a child knowing that it has a possible better future. So much for those who hate masculinity and say: “We don’t need men,” because at the end of the day men can say we don’t need feminism.

Mexican president Enrique Nieto acknowledges fathering other children.

4. Is both game and settling down right for me?

The truth, is for most guys it's not. To be a man is to admit that who he is today is a combination of how he was raised by his parents and certain cultural beliefs that may not allow a particular lifestyle. However, if your desire is to have a woman and be together until death do you part, then you may be tempted to both game and settle down as a way of managing the tedium of your relationship.

One of the first things you learn in game is how you must be honest with yourself before you can go for what you want. No woman is going to feel secure in a relationship if you are unsure about what you want out of it. And, just because you managed to pull off a relationship that involves multiple women, doesn't mean that you and yours will live happily ever after. A woman would have to love you above anything else and find it extremely difficult to live without you.

Women are capable of such feelings for a person, but a man's frame must be so strong and indifferent that she completely feels like it was her choice to adore the man in such a way. If you find a woman who is madly in love with you, then you will have to make it known what kind of relationship is it going to be. She needs clear boundaries so she can feel free to focus on pleasing you as a man. The sooner you establish what type of relationship you want from her, the more willing she will be to help you make that happen.

Read More: Don't Stop Running Game In Long-Term Relationships

Jean Lamour

Jean is a business owner in the transportation industry and a lover of women, with over a 20 year long journey in Game and the Art of Seduction. You can find out more about him and his journey action-takers.com or see his Youtube channels at and at Jean Lamour

All Public Rape Allegations Are False

December 9, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We are rapidly approaching peak rape, whereby a rape allegation means nothing and any man who doesn't bow down before the establishment will soon get a false rape accusation under his belt. Here's a video I put out the other day stressing how we must remain extremely skeptical of any rape accusation:

You can see the 70+ comments on the video here.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Help Raise Awareness About Rape Tourette's

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

6 Reasons To Date An Obese Girl

December 10, 2014 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

Today I read an article called 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder. I was shocked by some of the attitudes displayed, especially the idea that men should prefer slim girls. Don't these people know that all women are beautiful?

Some of the comments were shocking too. So much hate. So much negativity. It almost seemed like some people felt insulted. Personally, I prefer that everyone get along well. So please try to see the titillating side of obesity as you enjoy these six reasons to date an obese girl.

1. Hard work makes a man stronger

Building muscle and getting strong has always been an obsession in the manosphere. It’s so hard to find the motivation to attend the gym regularly, though. Wouldn’t it be great if there was a way to lift heavy without even leaving the bedroom? There is an easy solution to these problems.

2. Lower risk of pregnancy

Pregnant or fat?

Raw dogging is the last word in pleasure, but it comes with all kinds of risks. One benefit of obesity is that it reduces fertility. For a man who doesn’t want children, it acts as a convenient natural contraceptive. The expected child support load is less for each load ejected. Thrust the risks to the back of your mind and plow straight ahead with a feeling of safety and security.

3. You look forward to not having sex

Eventually you will get tired or disgusted of having sex with your girl. This allows you to focus on other tasks like work or reading. Instead of being a sex-crazed maniac all the time, you can look forward to being productive during the inevitable periods when you can’t bear to have sex with your obese girlfriend.

4. Lack of other options

Sexual scarcity is a fact of life for men. Every man has gone through dry spells. Lack of success can snowball as confidence is lost. Sexual health and function will start to droop if not exercised regularly—it's use it or lose it. Offer your sausage to those who really love sausages and do your part to feed the starving.

5. Opportunities to explore buffet game

Debates rage over the relative merits of day game and night game. Men write serious, sober articles about relative returns to their different types of pickup efforts. Imagine intercepting your girl as she picks up that third bowl of ice cream. Your wingman helps you isolate by discretely neutralizing a cockblocker at the cake table. Go where the really big game grazes. Be the first to write a post about buffet game.

6. Returning to quality gives more pleasure than before

Everything is a circle. No phase continues forever. There will come a time when a man will regrettably have to give up the delicious sexual buffet that obese girls can provide. It's only the result of patriarchal brainwashing, of course, but afterwards those lesser girls will give so much pleasure. Release from your obese girl phase may intensify some other kind of release.

… and that's just the beginning

I didn't even mention looking slim by comparison, access to her slimmer friends, more surface area for expressive tattoos, improving the gene pool, and greater floatation for your boat.

So next time a BBW walks by, don't look away. Hide your disgust and try to see her as a kind of larger, sweatier red pill. See it as an opportunity to go on a journey into the heart of something luscious. Remember, everything that leads to comfort leads to weakness. Take the plunge, and you may find yourself a better man afterwards.

Read More: 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder

Hesse Kassel
Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

How To Combat Fear Of Rejection With Positive Self-Interest

December 10, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Several readers have asked me recently how best to deal with fear of rejection. As we know, this is an issue when it comes to meeting women, but it also permeates all areas of life, as rejection is a necessary evil you will encounter in every sphere assuming you want to do more than sit in your bedroom playing Call of Duty and relaxing to PornHub.

Accepting that rejection is entirely normal and happens to everyone is the first step. Hard though it may be to believe, every guy, no matter how good looking, built, rich and famous he may be has experienced rejection at some point in his life. A friend of mine is a tall, handsome, Ivy League-educated guy who works on Wall Street. On the checklist marked "Things Women Want" he scores highly – and yet he still gets turned down by women, more often than not.

You only have to look at the recent story about Arsenal player Alexis Sanchez and Camila Andrade, former Miss Chile, to see that even high-profile athletes face rejection too. In the dating market, there are simply too many variables and too many hidden agendas for anyone to ever achieve a 100% success rate.

Unfortunately, an intellectual understanding of this doesn't help much when you're at a bar, you've had a drink, and you've summoned up the courage to approach that pretty girl beside the DJ box, only for her to screw up her face, give you the hand, and then laugh about you with her friends as you sidle off defeated. Sadly, contemporary manners being what they are, this kind of harsh brush-off happens all too frequently.

So how do you deal with such an encounter – or worse, how do you prevent the fear of such an encounter stifling you and making you too nervous to approach in the first place? Having spent some time analyzing the roots of my own fear of rejection, I believe that the answer is that you should aim to cultivate an attitude of positive self-interest.

What Is Fear of Rejection?

Fear of rejection comprises a number of discrete fears, the foremost of which is probably that you're not good-looking or sexy enough for her (and so by extension won't be for anyone else). But there is also the fear that in the very act of approaching you have upset her (and any bystanders) socially – that your behavior has been gauche.

There is the fear that what you said wasn't clever enough to impress her and her friends. There is the fear that the clothes you are wearing aren't fashionable enough for her taste, or that your haircut doesn't perhaps meet with her approval. On a base level, you are afraid that because you don't measure up to whatever arbitrary standards this stranger holds, that this is confirmation that you are not fit to reproduce and that your genes will be "mercilessly weeded out of existence." Further, you are also wary of physical reprisals for your audacity from other members of her tribe.

Have you noticed how every fear I've listed above relates to her opinion of you? When you walk away with that terrible sinking feeling after a rejection, it is to a large degree because you are disappointed that you have been assessed by a woman and found wanting – you have not measured up to her standards. In effect, you are upset because you have disappointed her.

It is precisely this mindset that you need to reverse. Most men expend too much energy thinking about how they can please women (and employers, business contacts and so on). Instead, they should concentrate first on pleasing themselves.

How Can Positive Self-Interest Help?

How might this work in practice? In the end, most situations are binary – you either get what you want or you don't. If you go to a nightclub with the desire of meeting a woman for a one-night stand, then that desire will either be met or it won't. There isn't really a middle ground (OK, you might get a phone number, but that's really just a consolation prize). What you should do is focus all of your mental energies solely on the outcome you desire, and judge everything only by whether or not that outcome is achieved or not, not on what people think of you.

Say you approach a group of three girls, start speaking to the most attractive of them and she rebuffs you, and her friends laugh. The only important piece of data to take away is that you didn't get laid. Nothing else matters. Her rudeness and her friends' laughter are irrelevant – white noise. You have to be tough with yourself emotionally at first, but when you place your own positive self-interest firmly above what other people think of you you'll be surprised how quickly the sting of rejection disappears. Your only concern, in other words, should be what you did or didn't get out of the interaction. Whether or not you lived up to whatever stupid arbitrary standards she had in mind is irrelevant.

The reality is that we live in a hugely populated world, and there is no such thing as consensus. Even if 99% of all women think you're ugly, that still means that there are millions of woman in the world who would give you a shot – you just need to find them. Even if 99% of people think your business proposition sucks, you still have more potential customers worldwide than you could ever hope to service. For this reason you should never worry too much about the opinion of one individual – instead, you should focus on what it is you want and commit to a strategy for attaining it.

By and large, violent reprisals for minor social faux pas are rare, so you can sometimes afford to make mistakes and be a little goofy when you speak to people. What you must do is develop positive self-interest, decide on what you want and commit to making that your central focus. This is actually a very alpha behavior – do you really think the jerk in the bar cares if people see him get blown out by a girl? Do you really think Richard Branson cares that people think he's an idiot because Virgin Clothing failed?

Of course not – they're both too focused on their own paths. Remember, whenever you attempt anything, you will get feedback from the world – a lot of it will be negative, and some will be positive. It's irrelevant. What you must do is develop mental toughness, nurture your self-interest, note simply whether you've won or lost, and block everything else out. In time, your fear of rejection will diminish until it's a barely discernible hum in the background.

To find out more how to combat your fear of your rejection and meet beautiful women, click here

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How The Deconstruction Of Men Echoes Our Totalitarian Past

December 10, 2014 | by Michael Mobius | Link | Original Link

It is 25 years since the end of history. Twenty five years since the Berlin Wall came down, since the Velvet Revolution in former Czechoslovakia, since Ceaușescu died serenading Romanians with communist rule disintegrated across the region.

As with the death of any good cinematic villain, there remains the question of whether the evil nemesis is really dead, and while in Romania perhaps this involves periodically checking the stake hammered through Ceausescu's chest, elsewhere it is mainly about remembering the past. In Prague there have been rallies and educational events commemorating the protests and strikes that brought down the communist government and even the codes to some coffee shop toilets have been changed to "1989."

One more permanent reminder of the defeated Goliath is a series of statues installed at the foot of Petrin Hill, not far from the castle. This "memorial to the victims of communism" depicts the way in which men were broken apart under totalitarianism. First the complete man, proud and whole, at the base. Then the gradual carving away of his body, through five further stages, each one a step up from the last, but strangely, always facing away from, rather than in the direction of the ascent of "progress."

This man will never make it up the hill. Over seven torturous steps, he loses the parts of himself, until he is just a shattered torso, still standing, but absent his head, his arms, and significantly his chest. Completed by sculptor Olbram Zoubek in 2007, the installation is "dedicated to all victims, not only those who were jailed or executed but also those whose lives were ruined by totalitarian despotism."

Death by a Thousand Cuts

Our lives today in the “free world” are no doubt better than those in communist Eastern Europe. We are not victims, and our freedoms, however threatened we may feel them to be, still have safeguards. At the same time though I find Zoubek’s representation of the backward progression of man, from living and whole to dismembered torso at the highest level of “progress” to be worryingly familiar.

If one thinks of the famous Bronowski sequence of the ascent of man this literal deconstruction of man seems like an almost complete reversal of the ascent up the ladder. Indeed, what I would like to argue here is that in a subtle but real way something similar is going on today: men are being taken apart; masculinity is being dismembered one limb at a time in a slow death by a thousand cuts.

Thymos: the third part of Plato's soul

If that seems like an exaggeration, I'd like to invoke Francis Fukuyama, the man who announced the end of history, to help me make my case. Actually, the "end of history" was Fukuyama's original 1989 essay. Soon after he published a book re-titled "the end of History and the Last Man." In it he argued that capitalist liberal democracy had won history's ideological war. There might continue to be socialist or other regimes in the future, but these would be aberrations, destined to fail for the reason that only liberal democracy could satisfy the human need not only for material well-being but for Thymos, the platonic need for recognition.

Fukuyama's argument involves an idea of historical progress similar to but antagonistic to Marx's, although both share an origin in the work of Hegel. But while Marx considered man to be alienated from himself under capitalism, Fukuyama argued that the struggle for recognition which drives history can only be met within liberal democracies that provide recognition for all.

By this reading, history begins with a primordial struggle of recognition: a fight of man against man which ends either in death for the loser or in his submission as slave. While he may be grateful for his life, it is the slave rather than the master who, embittered by his status, propels history forward through his work.

It is the slave who, dreaming of the possibility of freedom, invents tools, molds nature to his purpose, drives forward science, and of course ultimately produces the "progress" which promises to free him of his shackles. But why? Not for any material or physical need. But rather because the struggle for recognition remains the root of history and politics.

For Fukuyama, socialism identifies the problem but comes up with the wrong solution. Unlike liberal democracy the history of communism has shown it cannot meet our fundamental need for individual recognition whether we seek to be equal to or better than others. "Socialism foundered," says Fukuyama, "because it ran into the brick wall of human nature….All the characteristics that were supposed to have disappeared under socialism, like ethnicity and national identity, reappeared after 1989 with a vengeance."

The Last Man: Men without Chests

But what of the last man? The man scorned by Nietzsche for having given up the desire to be superior (megalothymia), who no longer "seeks out struggle, danger, risk, and daring" but seeks only comfortable self-preservation and equality (isothymia). For if the struggle for recognition is what drives history can we really be satisfied if in the process we become, in the words of CS Lewis, men without chests?

Fukuyama is convinced that liberal democracy can balance such tensions. But in a fascinating retrospective written years later he questions many of the conclusions in his book. It is less Nietzsche he worries about, but rather those who, taking Nietzsche seriously, seek to unpick that part of the Platonic soul (megalothymia) that delights in glory and competition. Those utopian engineers whose colossal projects came crashing down in the winter of '89 aren't quite dead after all. They're just working on a different project.

He was wrong about the end of history he says because his argument depended on two conditions: that human nature must remain constant and that science would not change the game beyond recognition. Centrally planned state socialism is indeed incompatible with a post-industrial society, but technological progress now permits the pursuit of the utopian project in far more sophisticated ways, and masculinity is now a specific object of its concern.

This later essay entitled "the last man in the bottle" specifically references Big Pharma's investment in pathologizing masculinity as something associated with aggression. The natural exuberance of young boys, pathologized as ADHD, is now routinely medicated away through the mass prescription of Ritalin, just as women's self esteem is artificially boosted with SSRIs such as Prozac.

The net effect is an androgynous one. Boys' brains are less exposed to dopamine, making them less boisterous and competitive while women's brains now marinate in above normal levels of serotonin. He observes that in nature male chimps who've risen to alpha status enjoy a serotonin high. In our medicated society it seems so do women.

Eugenics?

The effects of drugs are not hereditary, but in the future gene therapy offers the possibility of hereditary changes. Science, that ultimate tool of Hegel's nature-mastering slave, could easily be directed towards more radical, even permanent solutions. And if that happens, as now with drug interventions, it will be advanced as a health issue reflecting the values of the day.

Real and necessary advances may be difficult to distinguish from more questionable ones. Preventing dwarfism may be difficult to distinguish from selecting an ideal height, and more seriously if competitiveness is seen as aggression why not simply remove the biochemical cause of the disease?

Technology is not about to stand still. That's a good thing, but it also means that the battle for the future will depend more than ever on a struggle for values. At present masculinity is being systematically pathologized and, like Zoubek's statues, the bodies and minds of men are being broken apart one piece at a time. In both communist Eastern Europe and in the 21st century west, the ideal man is missing both head and chest. The only way to change that is to make the case for why masculinity is the way forward and not the way back.

Read More: The Abolition Of Man

Michael Mobius

hails from England, but currently lives in Central Europe. He plays the piano and enjoys travelling.

Millennials Exemplify The Age Of All Equal, All Useless

December 10, 2014 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

It is great that most millennials are such pussies. It offers many opportunities to the rest of us, including the well-paying jobs and getting with the most attractive women with little to no effort. It's like shooting fish in a barrel, except the fish are already dead.

Some competition from time to time keeps us on our toes. However, competition is just non-existence in our post-modern ironic western society because it has been eliminated in favor of apathetic equality. It is a race to the bottom. Deconstruction, irony, and post-modernism is to thank for this. The evolution of winners over losers is pure nonsense to millennials. The "enlightened" mass has figured everything out by marginalizing all that was once great, as if thousands and thousands of years of evolution are reversed with their college degrees in sociology and their mind-blowing master's thesis on why Star Trek is overtly homophobic.

Do these dumb kids realize the debt of this country is $18 trillion dollars and growing? Does anyone care?

This post-modern deconstruction mentality leads us to our current age of "all equal and all useless," with no one rising above the herd and reaching the status of "Ubermensch." Struggle and competition is viewed as arrogant and downright wrong. The truth is that competition and struggle builds character, individuality, and personality. The millennials' final solution is to deconstruct everything to the point of pointless ridicule in an orgy of failure and lazy self-pity.

Competition hurts feelings, so it must be destroyed. It is frivolous mass thinking. Kant observed this mass thinking years ago in "What is enlightenment?" and made excellent remarks on individualism. Most still don't get the idea. Emotions are shared by all as one homogenized docile culture without individuality, edge, aggression, or risk; all things that made the U.S great. We live in a castrated culture, and nothing good can come of this. As David Foster Wallace observed years ago:

> Irony's useful for debunking illusions, but most of the illusion-debunking in the U.S. has now been done and redone…Postmodern irony and cynicism's become an end in itself, a measure of hip sophistication and literary savvy. Few artists dare to try to talk about ways of working toward redeeming what's wrong, because they'll look sentimental and naive to all the weary ironists. Irony's gone from liberating to enslaving. There's some great essay somewhere that has a line about irony being the song of the prisoner who's come to love his cage.
>
> The problem is that, however misprised it's been, what's been passed down from the postmodern heyday is sarcasm, cynicism, a manic ennui, suspicion of all authority, suspicion of all constraints on conduct, and a terrible penchant for ironic diagnosis of unpleasantness instead of an ambition not just to diagnose and ridicule but to redeem. You've got to understand that this stuff has permeated the culture. It's become our language; we're so in it we don't even see that it's one perspective, one among many possible ways of seeing. Postmodern irony's become our environment.
>
> All U.S. irony is based on an implicit "I don't really mean what I say." So what does irony as a cultural norm mean to say? That it's impossible to mean what you say? That maybe it's too bad it's impossible, but wake up and smell the coffee already? Most likely, I think, today's irony ends up saying: "How very banal to ask what I mean." Anyone with the heretical gall to ask an ironist what he actually stands for ends up looking like a hysteric or a prig. And herein lies the oppressiveness of institutionalized irony, the too-successful rebel: the ability to interdict the question without attending to its content is tyranny. It is the new junta, using the very tool that exposed its enemy to insulate itself.
>
> Real rebels, as far as I can see, risk disapproval. The old postmodern insurgents risked the gasp and squeal: shock, disgust, outrage, censorship, accusations of socialism, anarchism, nihilism. Today's risks are different.

What we have left with this ironic deconstruction is emasculated juvenile 30-something millennials busy fingerpainting and drawing pictures as if they were five years old and pursuing their careers in "music" and video games. As Wallace observed several years ago, this all has been "done and redone" ad nauseam. These are childish behaviors that should have been abandoned years ago.

Millennials inherit this from the painfully tolerant hippie generation (their arrested development parents) while dodging any real adult responsibility. Millennials and the conformist hippies of yesteryear both believe in impulsive hedonistic nihilism and "living for the moment" with little understanding of struggle, morals, and self-responsibility.

The millennials have little ability to compete and strive to do their best. They don't want to experience the downs, they only want to experience the ups; the highs. Working towards goals can take years and years of self-discipline and sacrifice, going through a vicious cycle of sadness, happiness, failure, and finally victory. To put it simply, it can be tough work, and they don't want it.

Millennials want immediate gratification, and they seek impulsive behavior. They even feel entitled to such things. If they do not get what they seek, they see no point in trying. Most represent a lost tribe of self-righteous, ill-mannered pricks. They respect nothing but their own delusional belief of "progress." Anything seen as constructive, polite, traditional, or sincere in their eyes is immediately ridiculed and attacked.

The Rude Awakening

With the failure of their messiah, Obama, and his faux utopia along with the rude awakening from crushing student debt, perhaps this generation will reverse their thinking. Perhaps the recent election of conservatives sweeping the political realm is symbolic start of this? I remain skeptical, but who knows. I guess it's possible that this generation could start to view their outdated post-modern beliefs and change the course of this generation.

Ironically, this generation is in the perfect position to do so. They have been through the necessary (yet outdated) deconstruction, ironic post-modernism, and have seen everything both positive and negative. With a knowledge of history's mistakes, they could make the "greatest generation" look like child's play.

However, I am highly skeptical much will change with this docile generation. One just has to look at the bright side of this—for the rest of us mature male adults, everything is for the taking. Opportunity is endless to those willing to step up to the plate and take what is rightfully theirs. The competition has never been so dead-minded.

Read More: The Most Amazing Takedown Of Hipsters I've Ever Read

Jon Bergeron
Jon is a part time misanthrope, full time American. Jon loathes modern academia, art, culture, literature, politics, television, and everything on god's green earth that has been inundated with boring, predictable, impotent, vapid Cultural Marxist horseshit which, mind you, is totally void of a single individual thought. Jon just realized he is a full time misanthrope. Anyways, Jon prays for this to change one day and something new to come along. Until then, Jon remains pessimistic with a loaded .357 next to his bed. Jon can be reached at

Target Australia Stokes #GamerGate By Removing GTA V From Its Shelves

December 11, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Video games have come a long way from being just a simple form of entertainment that could only represent its imagery in the crudest form imaginable. Not only did playing the first video games require a lot of imagination, but it also often demanded arcane knowledge of the in-game rules. Because of this, video games were labeled as “that thing only nerds enjoy” and were mostly a solitary activity.

Nowadays, video games are a legit business. It’s no longer a problem to play or watch games together. In fact, large groups would get together and watch Starcraft 2 matches being played. Video games have also become an art form that can provide the most vivid scenes with ease and give characters a profound sense of identity through storytelling and cut scenes. Still, some game developers have opted to forgo exotic worlds and instead put the player into the shoes of a goat or a criminal. Rockstar does the latter with its Grand Theft Auto series.

“Follow the train, CJ!”

GTA has a fairly straightforward premise: you are a thug in a colorful world, there is no God, do what thou wilt. This means the freedom to run amok until cops inevitably show up in large numbers and overwhelm the player, ending his virtual thuggery face down on the pavement, in the pool of blood. Life in GTA was always short, brutal and hilariously fun. The plot was generally weaksauce, but luckily the action made up for it heftily.

As the technology advanced, GTA also became more and more elaborate. Early on in the series, it was possible to merely kill, rob and terrorize people, but with GTA V you can fuck hookers, kill them, or fuck and then kill them to get your money back. This particular bit rustled a lot of SJW jimmies.

The result was a petition by three former sex workers, who expressed their concern with violence that can be done on virtual women by virtual criminals because "it grooms boys to see violence against women as acceptable." That's the three magic words "violence against women" that make all demands reasonable. The context doesn't matter, just as long as it's vaguely connected to violence against women.

Fact: 100% of people eating with spoons will die, hence spoons kill people.

Unfortunately, Target Australia decided to listen to this idiotic petition and remove GTA V from its shelves. New Zealand's equivalent, The Warehouse, did the same and also removed all 18+ video games and movies.

Kotaku and similar faux-gaming websites rejoiced at the occasion:

Other saner individuals saw right through the veil of bullshit:

It didn't help that GTA V was featured in this hilarious news report as enabling virtual rape.

I am being forced to watch virtual rape!

While killing whores is an integral part of GTA experience, GTA V can be modded to allow some freaky man-on-woman, woman-on-man or dog-on-woman action. Of course, the subtleties such as facts never stopped SJWs from enacting their social justice.

In the video, Sam Maggs goes through the entire verbiage of SJWs: sexual assault, misogyny, and so on. All of it is meant to invoke sympathy and summon white knights to come rushing and protect this fair maiden's tender eyes from the horrible scenes in a game which she doesn't have to play, watch, or even think about. Yet she does. Why is that so?

Hallowed be thy rape

The reason why SJWs are so fixated on labeling everything as rape is because of the symbolism of power the act gives to a man. There is no such act that clearly shows the hierarchy of physical power as rape. Though actual rape is clearly a vile act, rape narratives portray women as defenseless and frail creatures, which does not align with the SJW philosophy of gender being just a societal construct and women being equal to men in every respect. UK legislation goes so far to actually define rape as "penetration by penis," meaning that women cannot be held accountable for their sexual behavior in the UK. This is the endgame of SJWs.

Though other games have included nudity, sex, and killing of women, there isn't anything special in the way GTA V does it. In fact, The Elder Scrolls: Skyrim, also known as "Let's mod it until it crashes," has a truckload of offensive mods, including one that makes all children killable. If you're tired of same old character models, you can even replace them with hot virtual women and gaze-rape them as you play:

Mute and feast your eyes

So, why isn't Skyrim in the SJW crosshairs? Probably because it's set in a fantasy rather than a quasi-real world, as GTA is. It's much harder to cause outrage if you have to show armored barbarians having sex with each other while riding dragons and claim it's rape. That sentence is too incredible to ever be true.

The man on the edge of rape

Naturally, it was just a matter of time before SJWs appeared screeching, stomping their feet, and demanding this horrible piece of entertainment none of them plays be banned, or at least removed from the shelves. Never mind that there are various content rating systems, which prohibit GTA V from being sold to minors. This video game hurts feelings and we must do something. The real reason is that men feel good playing it.

Men need to feel powerful and good about themselves to prosper. Boys especially need to have a daily dose of wrestling, running, and competition with friends or they become "emo"—withdrawn, insecure and emotional. Of course, the education system stops all of that nonsense and forces boys to sit still for six-plus hours each day. For the oppressive educational system, boys' natural instincts are a danger and they need to be disempowered on a daily basis.

While barbarians had no other way to feel powerful than to conquer a tribe, kill all men in it, and rape all women, today there are plenty of alternatives. The more SJWs try to neuter video games, which serve as harmless outlets for men, the more they will face resistance.

Did you like this post? Read more #gamergate news on Reaxxion, ROK's little brother. Click here to visit.

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Women Should Save Their Virginity For Marriage

December 11, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

In a relationship, men want sex and women want attention. Some men give attention knowing they won't get much sex, and some women give sex knowing they won't get the full attention they crave. These men are in stressful relationships or are friend-zoned, and these women are easy. The men are known as feminists or beta males, and the women are known as sluts. Both have the same distorted view of the sexual economy, both are this way because of the lies of modern secularism, and both are absolutely miserable and lonely.

However, at least the man can learn and change how he interacts with the opposite sex. For a woman, sexual encounters can't be taken back. As typical Americans, they've neglected long-term fulfillment in exchange for short-term recreation. Feminists squawk that a woman should be able to have all the fun men are having, but in reality, it is in a woman's best interest to save her virginity for marriage. I realize that it's too late for this generation, but maybe our children will stumble across this and learn from our mistakes, much how the prudish Victorian era followed the hedonistic Georgian.

Happy Wife, Happy Life

Studies have shown that the more sexual partners a woman has had, the less likely she is to describe her marriage as happy. Shocker, right? It's like women were designed to be property.

All kidding aside, there is a reason a woman's virginity has been a value in almost every culture ever. Not only was her father trying to make her more appealing for the suitors, but he knew that she would be able to enjoy the marriage more herself. There's a reason the #NoHymenNoDiamond on Twitter has resonated.

A 15-year-old girl may think it's a good life decision to sleep with the captain of the football team, but since when do teenagers know what they want in life? Kids complain that they aren't sure what they want to do for a career while making irrevocable decisions about whom they share their bodies with.

Unity

Sex is a union. Manosphere writers will often say that they've watched so much porn, masturbated so often, and had so many partners that sex has become stale, but this becomes reality far more quickly for women who live that lifestyle, because sex for a woman is much more personal by design of her anatomy. The more men a woman has united with, the less the next union will mean. Men can slip into a marriage with his past being of little consequence, but unfortunately for women, nature is not an equal opportunity employer.

Feminists will claim that some women don't want a husband or children, but I do not believe them. Women are clock-like. Granted, so are men, but we are a different clock. Even if a woman decides she does not want a stable, committed relationship, in a few short years she will be too old to get more than a meaningless one night stand from a desperate man, and in a few more years she'll struggle to get even that. Again, the fathers knew best when they tried to marry their daughters off at a young age.

Not only is the fornicated woman less able to bond with her future husband emotionally, but her lady parts are also further changed with each sexual encounter, being stretched out so that there is not the same kind of intimate contact she would have if she had only been with one man ever. And then there is the sexual disfunction. I used to date this fat, career-focused whore who conveniently found Jesus shortly after graduating college. We were both 22 years old, and to my horror and naivety, she told me that she was no longer able to orgasm during sex. This is the empowered woman in all her glory.

What Is A Virgin?

Virginity was an exclusively feminine concept until the advent of Christianity, but even with Christianity it was generally applied only to those who had decided upon lifelong celibacy. Ever wonder why, before feminism, nuns were allowed to administer hospitals and schools? That is because the religious celibate transcends sex roles and becomes something else.

The flip side of the nun in charge of the orphanage is the monk who makes lavender soap and obsesses on what new flavors he can infuse. It's perfectly fine for a monk or a nun to disregard traditional sex roles because they have dropped out of the sexual marketplace. Both roles need to be filled, and so the monk or nun has to compensate with both.

How we got the idea that every man is born with a virginity is beyond me, but the physical reality is that there is no such thing as a male virgin. Considering most literature from that time is lost, the first use of "virgin" to refer to men is likely in Revelation 14:4. St. Basil and others called themselves virgins to make a theological point about ascetic identity, not to define the broad culture or make a statement about biology.

Unless one is going to live a life of prayer and dead languages in the woods, a man should never say, "I lost my virginity at age [x]." Just say, "I had sex the first time." Did anything actually change when you had sex for the first time? No, you just felt embarrassed and disappointed but held her close anyway.

For A Woman, Virginity Is Power

Both men and women innately understand the great value of a virgin. Men frankly prefer to commit to women without an illustrious sexual past. Yes, some men will still commit to a woman with a lot of experience, but they never prefer it. By keeping her virginity, not only does she has a wider pool of men to choose from but also greater influence. She is more valuable and so can demand that her suitors increase their own value.

Sluts are a dime a dozen. The word "easy" implies powerlessness. If one slut isn't pleasing him in some way, a man can move on to the next. Virgins today are rare, and a man will put in much more effort to keep her around. He'll be hesitant to overplay asshole game. Recall Edward Thatch's virgin game, now a lost and largely unneeded art:

> How did I approach my latest virgin girl? I left the cocky and aloof game in the bar where it belongs and conducted myself like a gentleman who's not ashamed of his dick. I took both of her hands, looked her straight in the eye and said, 'I'm > going to kiss you now.'

Virgins also don't have to weed through the players. Because she won't put out until marriage, she doesn't have to judge whether a man will bail on her if she sleeps with him on the first date. Most men who pursue her want commitment, and they will likely be willing to abstain for a year should the reward be great enough.

That being said, a virgin who is ugly or bitchy will have the same trouble finding a man to invest and commit as a 40-year-old divorced mother. The same is true with attention whores or virgins who are whores at heart. No one is more contemptuous and dysfunctional than the woman (or man) who uses her (or his) virginity as their sense of identity.

The more value a person has, the more power they have. This is why someone with a bachelor's in chemical engineering makes far more than someone with a Ph.D in English. A person whose sole talent is reading has the same financial value as a slut has in sexual value.

Why then is a man who has never had sex so valueless? There are a variety of theories, but in part it is because men are expected to seek out sex instead of waiting for it to come to them. If a man is seeking and failing, then he is of course labeled as a failure. This is not a double standard but a different standard, and it would be easier to adapt to it instead of demanding it change. However, if a man in his 20s has not had sex but can communicate that he easily could, then it makes little difference, since women are more interested in his ability than in his history.

"But A Woman Has To Put Out To Get Noticed!"

More lies. Women are the gatekeepers of sex. If the average woman demanded a wedding ceremony before having sex, then most men would be unable to fornicate. Feminists talk about the culture of body image, but who started that? Men have always liked naked girls. It is women who decided to start wearing revealing clothing. True, it can be hard to purchase modest clothing today, but that is because it does not sell well anymore, which again is the fault of women, the buyers of such clothing.

If a woman maintains her physical appearance, she will get noticed. It's the way she acts that determines by whom she gets noticed. A woman doesn't need a low-cut blouse to look beautiful, and she doesn't need to blow men in order for them to want to sleep with her. True, a virgin is terrible in bed, but she can easily learn in time.

They won't teach you this at church, but women like to have sex. The Greeks and Romans actually believed that women had less control over their sexuality than men, and people today are more and more finding this to be true. I've heard it said that women are so prudish because they are afraid of themselves. That might be true, but what is certainly true is that women have more than just six deadly sins.

Even in today's world, if a woman is a) young, b) sexually inexperienced, c) domestic, d) pleasant to be around, and e) maintains her physical appearance, she can choose any man she wants. Such a woman has the right to demand that a man wait until marriage, and more often than not she will be able to enforce that demand.

If the man is not willing to abstain from sex, then she can dump him and take the next man in line. That being said, if she still gives out head or anal, then she is still a common whore and has even less value than the garden variety slut, since the "everything but" virgin is also dishonest with herself. Remember, feminine females get masculine males. It is the androgynous who have to beg and plead for the opposite sex.

Conclusion: The Root of the Problem

Have you ever noticed that the women who discourage conventional sexual temperance are the most promiscuous themselves? Women always encourage other women to make the same sexual choices as them, whether it is to have more sex or to have less. These whores have made an irrevocable choice, and now they try to drag others down with them so they can avoid feeling regret. Feminists demand that a career should be empowering because they have relinquished all the power they already had. Likewise, a sexually temperate women will not encourage licentiousness.

This one writer for AskMen is named Sarah Stefanson. In addition to writing articles discouraging men from sleeping with virgins, she's written about the best way to 69 and how to buy women drinks. Nearly every article from her on this "men's" site is something encouraging men to value the licentious girls and discard the temperate. Is it possible that she's biased?

Telling a woman to save sex for marriage is the same as telling her not to get a tattoo. In the old days, this advice was common knowledge, but now it's a regular and permanent choice, like a rite of passage. Regret is one of the most averted emotions, and people will do anything to avoid admitting they screwed up. People would rather double down on a bad mistake than admit they've cut their own legs off.

Read More: Open Letter To American Fathers

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

A Simple Way To Understand Inner Game

December 11, 2014 | by Frank Davidson | Link | Original Link

When you're new to the game and to the red pill, you hear a lot of terms that don't quite make sense, even though you think you may know what they mean. "Hypergamy," "alpha", etc. The one that always got to me was the concept of "inner game."

It seemed just like a synonym for confidence, but the way it was talked about in the manosphere was a little different. I wondered how I would know when I had developed it. It's important not to bullshit yourself when you are embarking on a difficult course of self-improvement, since it's easy to fall into the trap of saying "yeah, I get this now." That's a cop-out and won't help you in the long run.

After a while in the game, I started to see results. This was big for me, as I had (and still have) a massive sexual appetite that I had no clue how to satiate. I had a few short relationships with girls that made my dick rock-hard, and it made me feel amazing. Seeing how true red pill concepts were when put into action really blew my mind.

However, personality doesn't change overnight. The way that personality changes requires two things: 1) a new outlook and strategy, and 2) new experiences to test out the new outlook and strategy. After enough new experiences filter through your new strategy, real changes in attitude and personality start to emerge. But that will only happen if you put in the hard work.

I've always been a jealous guy. It's probably my biggest character flaw. I've always coveted other people's things, whether it was a girl, a car, a house, a watch—you name it, I've been pissed that someone else has it. But something started to change with me after I had taken some time to digest the red pill and watch the truth of it all unfold in front of my eyes.

I started to notice that, where I used to feel jealousy from hearing about a girl I wanted to fuck banging some other guy, or seeing a chick I would love to bang on a date with some dude more masculine than me, that I wasn't feeling any jealousy. I truly didn't care. I didn't even notice anymore when a girl wouldn't respond to a text, or would cancel a date.

When I realized that I no longer was feeling this way, it was a complete epiphany. Jealousy is the expression of unrealized ambition—what I had done is figured out how to realize that ambition.

So the advice I wish to impart is simple: the level of jealousy you're feeling is a direct measure of your inner game strength. I think the same thing can be said for paranoia, neediness, or any of the other classic "beta" traits that those of us who know about the red pill understand are pussy kryptonite. Don't be afraid to be brutally honest with yourself if a girl's actions have left you jealous. It's all part of the journey of self-improvement to becoming a man who is genuinely confident around attractive women.

[image]

If you're starting from a big pussy deficit, it's going to take a while to get there. There's no shame in that. You have to experience a pattern of success which proves to you the truth of the red pill. Once that happens you'll find that you no longer have those jealousy pangs, or at the very least they will be significantly reduced enough to no longer affect your actions.

Read More: 6 Things Indian Guys Have To Understand When Learning Game

Frank Davidson
Frank Davidson is a millennial who credits the red pill with saving his sanity, and hopes to help other men out there understand the necessity of unplugging in 21st century America. He can be reached at

39 Aphorisms On The Human Experience

December 11, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

1. To live in harmony is to have mastered the contradictions that make us what we are.

2. It is because we are too complex for our own good that it is such a virtue to live simply.

3. Incorrigibly fallible, we find forgiveness to be a special virtue. Still, many instances of forgiveness are in fact errors of judgment, or failures of will: people choose to remain in a bad relationship, for example, when they'd be better off apart.

4. One of the advantages of getting older is that our contempt for the next generation seems more justified. Having had more time to be stupid than they, we are likely to be less stupid than they.

5. It is because desire is excessive by nature that "fulfillment" (really just a kind of discharge) feels much less intense than anticipation.

6. To see just how unfree you really are, introspect your thought processes. Notice how often thoughts, impulses, desires, urges, etc., come utterly unsummoned. Now consider that all other people are subject to the same condition, though many of them are otherwise quite different from you. That it is not peace but war that drives the world should now be manifest and nothing to marvel at.

7. The underlying egotism of human nature is so extreme that even a kind of moral growth (say, some well-meaning movement) will often create a kind of perverse offshoot, corrupting much (if not all) that was good in the original path. This is also more evidence that human beings are much less rational and reasonable than we tend to believe.

8. The tendency to an inaccurately favorable self-conception, nearly universal, often comes with a tendency no less false or common, that by which we attribute our problems to the failings of others. Where self-knowledge is painful, man turns to delusion.

9. To understand the complete truth about human institutions and social structures, liken them to the family, every one of which knows some amount of conflict and corruption, not to be revealed to outsiders, as the popular phrase “the family dirty laundry” attests.

10. In politics we receive a reflection of the evil we already are. In this context our disenchantment is an hypocrisy by which we obscure the primary one, ourselves.

11. Fair life certainly isn’t, yet the richness of this truism makes for a deepening understanding as the years increase, since it is one of those truths we have often to remind ourselves of, it being so painful that it is hard to keep in view, even as experience confirms it more and more. There are some truths so consequential that, although we know them and have done so for long, still we must, by acts of will, remind ourselves of them, bring them closer to ourselves, in all their terrible force, so that our dark knowledge is continually augmented.

12. Prophets are commonly authoritarian, as if this world was so perverse that even the loftiest good must be marred by the stuff of its opposition.

13. Capitalism is the seduction of desire, and the human being—shot through with craving absence—wants to be seduced.

14. Just experience must be a test of conviction.

15. From seeming trifles one can divine terrible truths.

16. It is prudent to trust others only insofar as their well-being depends on us. Still, prudence and wisdom are not the same. And it can be wise to take a leap. Nor is life worth living otherwise.

17. There are many people about whom it is false to speak of their general character, since their character is not the same in their dealings with the other, but conditioned by the other’s particular character. Or perhaps this is true of character in general, saints perhaps excepted.

18. In social settings, many adults resemble children at the playground; amiable relations depend on the pretense that everyone thinks other people’s toys are cool, too.

19. Politeness is so easy and habitual that is frequently difficult to tell whether it is sincere.

20. By our games of desire the world itself abides.

21. In groups speech is especially whorish. Nor is there ever enough time and space for one’s desire to prostitute oneself.

22. Guilt presupposes awareness and a sincere desire for the good.

23. Life is like many a beautiful young woman, as lively and enticing as she is stupid, false and haughty.

24. Nothing is more painful or loving than origin.

25. Deepest meaning culminates in pain. So both the deepest happiness and the deepest pain finds us in tears.

26. Contradiction is distinctly human.

27. The trouble with goodbye is hello.

28. Nietzsche's idea that we love our desire rather than what is desired is reducible to the idea that it is desire itself that loves.

29. To live a just life we must constantly examine our motives.

30. From the shame of one man's wealth we may see the dignity of another's poverty.

31. Once you say something to the majority, it is prudent to immediately clarify the many things you did not say. And since the majority possess much will but little mind, you should base your response more on their tone, eyes and body language than your words or theirs.

32. A mole-like gaze cuts the world down to its own ambitious dwarfism, and is crowned by the puffing and preening of other hairy bags of water who think they too have got it all figured out.

33. Pascal's belief that our problems would vanish if we stayed in our room would be more useful if it came with the caveat that this is something which only saints and men of genius can do.

34. Civilization is a veneer on the natural underlying chaos.

35. Absolute reform would require that we cast off desire itself. And yet many of us live for little else.

36. It's tragically comic that often the source of a pain seems unworthy of the pain itself, the pain being so much more powerful than (so disproportionate to) its source. There are tragedies that result from mere trifles.

37. Because we fear the other but not the self, we fear lying to the other but not to the self.

38. Like the gaze which discloses being, sound bespeaks being itself, as semantics does not.

39. If we were always fully self-conscious we'd always be in a state of shock, for our awareness of our own being is freakish.

Read More: 34 Aphorisms For A Civilization In Decline

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

How To Turn A Small Victory Against Mainstream Media Into A Red Pill Movement

December 11, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I recently posted an article in regards to the outrageous rape story that Rolling Stone published. I recommended that ROK readers lodge complaints with Rolling Stone. I have no way of knowing what role ROK readers played, but Rolling Stone has backed off and it's been acknowledged in the media that the story was very poor journalism.

Team men: 1 - ranting feminist journalists: 0

This is a very small victory, but it shows the tide of sentiment is turning in the direction of red pill common sense. It also gives a little morale boost. There is a very easy way to render the current wave of feminist hysteria impotent and it can be done via the convenient anonymity that the internet offers. We can operate in two distinct modes.

Firstly we lodge complaints against their ranting and specifically target feminist journalists. Very few of these bitchy trolls occupy positions of power and their editors are duty bound to reign them in if enough disgust hits the wire. This most certainly puts the crimp on their career at least in the short term. The internet is a brutal place to be a journalist—one wrong move and your credibility is done.

Just look at what happened to Julien Blanc and then think that manosphere can soon do the same to some of these trolls. The ones that matter make a career from what they are doing and have little other option. Where Julien will always find revenue streams and can do seminars in the US, a feminist journalist that over steps the mark is going to be pulling beers in the local bar for the foreseeable future.

Roosh lists 15 people who used the UVA article to push a false narrative— let's start with a "take down Sabrina Erdley"—she should be banned the same way Julien was. The manosphere has the resources to start pulling down some of these people in the same way the femosphere pulled down a PUA they decided had over stepped the mark. This article out right incites hatred and violence against men. If this was on a male site, the police would be confiscating servers. Julien looks positively tame.

Second we join the ranting and ramp it up to fever pitch, ie. fight fire with fire. It is well known that "the system" uses subversive tactics like this during protests. They send in black ops, plain clothes operatives to turn an otherwise peaceful protest into a full blown riot, which gives the excuse to respond with tear gas and riot police etc. and shut the whole thing down.

The take home message that the public gets from the protest is that it was only a bunch of radicals intent on causing vandalism and violence and that there was no real public dissent. Next time, the police can respond all-out from the beginning, and no one cares. As hysterical articles and issues hit the wire and feminists look increasingly stupid, feminist journalists lose respect with their editors and slowly the public at large starts to ignore the whole thing.

Then it gets to the point where dissenters are just “lunatics” screaming hysteria, even if their story is gospel truth. Twitter is swarming with this kind of BS. A few polite replies are needed. Just as blue pill has been shoved up our asses, it’s high time we force feed a few red pills to the fois gras ducks out there that are sitting high and mighty, puffed up and bloated on their own conceit.

A recent article on ROK outlines a site that apparently allows women to make public declarations of rapes, identifying the man while keeping their own identity hidden. A service like that can be rendered a public nuisance within a week, if we all start posting our own rape stories and picking public figures, university professors, policemen etc.

There are many ways we can both drown out the hysteria by increasing it to a roar of noise, whilst also maintaining a well-mannered information campaign against sites, accounts, journalists and private individuals. We will decrease their staying power and respectability and make people think twice. There is an assumption that the SJW and the feminist can do no harm. That has to STOP! No one likes all this negative crap and once it reaches a level of overload, people will just shutdown and cease taking it seriously.

Act Now

The problem we face is that the enemy is united and strong, but the manosphere is fragmented, distracted, and largely self-interested. I don’t like to get my hands dirty and get involved with this BS any more than the next guy, but I fear if I don’t, it may well come knocking on my door. I am proud to say that I emailed the editor of Rolling Stone and happy to see that others also took issue at the baloney that was published in what was once a bastion of civil rights and a voice for youth and counterculture—what is red pill if not counter culture?

It’s easy to see waves of fanatical sentiment building around the world and as the economic situation worsens. The Nazis and the Communists didn’t start with gulags and antisemitism—that was the end game, somewhere to direct their vitriol and hatred. Once you engage them, the SJWs and feminists have to STFU or look increasingly stupid. A good tactic is calling them fanatical. No one likes to be called a fanatic except a 12-year-old Justin Bieber fan. This conversation is a perfect example.

As any married man will tell you, the femcentric machinery is so skilled at complaining even where there is zero issue. It’s time to make some noise, but we must be aware that the problem with fanatical groups that rise to power by whipping up public sentiment on “issues” is they constantly need new issues to maintain power. Yes Means Yes in Universities will creep into the mainstream, and jolly soon men will be being prosecuted just for looking at a women the wrong way.

I’m sorry if girls got raped, serious shit yes, but also a fact of life. Buy her a 9mm, get a concealed carry license, teach her to shoot it, buy her a can of mace, teach her Wing Chun. The best solutions rest with the individual not some sprawling legislation. The first guy who gets his brains blown out on campus, while actually trying to rape a girl in cold blood, will make the other losers will think twice—problem solved. Real rapists are actually pretty rare, while after the fact manufactured female trauma is all too common.

You'd never see men protesting like this against false rape claims or other femcentric unfairness and prejudice. They do their best to deal with it in their own way. So new blue pill laws will be passed and a blogger such as myself will be hunted down and jailed. Your 60-year-old uncle who was just asking for directions in the mall is prosecuted for harassment and stripped of all his worldly goods, given to the woman as compensation, and on the story goes. People's lives will be ruined if we do not speak out.

Lives have already been ruined by these mindless crusaders who operate on half truths and exaggeration. But the passive aggressive, insecure, social justice warrior needs you and me to remain silent for them to win by default.

Today red-blooded men, libertarians, businessmen, players, white middle class,and anyone that doesn't bow to the government and the feminine imperative is a target. Even politicians have been pulled down by this nonsense. Stand up and be counted now, or when it comes time to be counted, you might well be behind bars having a serial number tattooed on your ass.

It's one thing to discuss red pill concepts, another to install those attitudes into your own life, and a whole new ball game to stand up against the blue pill majority. I dislike the men's rights activism type attitudes, it's too whiny and "poor little me"—neither can we get angry or be offensive. We need to behave like quick-minded, learned gentlemen in public and like anarchists where necessary.

Everyone has 10 minutes a day to make some protest. Don't post comments and replies to this article, do some googling and hit a feminist site. Email the editor of a newspaper, hit twitter, publish red pill comments in mainstream newspaper articles, don't back down just because it's some bitchy feminist in your face, lodge complaints on Twitter – here is a good place to start.

Be ever on guard. Keep a polite face in public and a devious attitude behind closed doors. The war against men has started with the feminists shooting themselves in the foot. With a little nudge the next bullet they fire will be into the brain of their own twisted movement.

Read More: Is Rolling Stone Sensationalizing The UVA Rape Story For Profit?

Columbia Law School Is Fostering The Growth Of Pussified Attorneys

December 12, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

You ("Y") call your attorney ("A") to check the status of your case. He answers:

> A: Hello, Jim speaking.
>
> Y: Hey Jim, it's Alex Smith. I wanted to get an update on my case, as we have that big hearing next Friday.
>
> A: Hey Alex. Yeah I was going to call you, I'm going to request a continuance of the hearing. I have undergone some trauma recently and am not in the mental state of mind to handle it right now.
>
> Y: Oh, sorry to hear that. Is everything alright? Are you and your family alright?
>
> A: Yeah I'm fine and the family is fine too.
>
> Y: Something with your friends?
>
> A: No they are fine too.
>
> Y: Hmm ok. If you don't mind me asking, what is necessitating the continuance of our big hearing?
>
> A: Well I'm guessing you saw the recent Eric Garner controversy on the news. It is beyond upsetting the grand jury didn't indict the offending officer. I just can't believe it and am now traumatized by it.
>
> Y: Oh…okay. Did you know him? I thought you said it had nothing to do with your > friends or family…

>
> A: I have never met him nor do I have any connection to him personally or professionally. It just offends me as a member of the legal system and as a person overall, to the point it impairs my ability to be a lawyer right now. Sorry.
>
> Y: What the f…

Is this who you would want to represent you in court? To negotiate a deal for you? Of course not. Being an attorney is one of the few fields where the strength of your mind and your ability to handle pressure are considered some of your top assets. As I discussed recently, remaining calm and handling surprises are two key assets every good attorney has.

So where did this above hypothetical conversation come from? From the non-hypothetical recent happenings over at one of America's ~~pansiest~~ best law schools, Columbia. Stemming from the recent decisions in the Brown and Garner case, Columbia Law is allowing their students to postpone their final exams if they are too upset at this result. Seriously.

The school's interim dean, Robert E. Scott, announced via email:

> The grand juries' determinations to return nonindictments in the Michael Brown and Eric Garner cases have shaken the faith of some in the integrity of the grand jury system and in the law more generally.
>
> For some law students, particularly, though not only, students of color, this chain of events is all the more profound as it threatens to undermine a sense that the law is a fundamental pillar of society designed to protect fairness, due process and equality.
>
> …
>
> In recognition of the traumatic effects these events have had on some of the members of our community, Dean Greenberg-Kobrin and Yadira Ramos-Herbert, Director, Academic Counseling, have arranged to have Dr. Shirley Matthews, a trauma specialist, hold sessions next Monday and Wednesday for anyone interested in participating to discuss the trauma that recent events may have caused.
>
> …
>
> The law school has a policy and set of procedures for students who experience trauma during exam period. In accordance with these procedures and policy, students who feel that their performance on examinations will be sufficiently impaired due to the effects of these recent events may petition Dean Alice Rigas to have an examination rescheduled.

It's hard to know where to even begin with this. We can say this is just another one of many signs of our cultural decline in America, where the individuals that we are to rely on to promote and administer the law of the nation are too hurt to fathom taking a test right now. Or perhaps how politically correct educational institutions have become to the point of absurdity, demonstrated with the situation above or the Yes Means Yes crap from the past few months.

There is a lot of blame to be put on Columbia for sanctioning this type of behavior. Interestingly, Columbia claims this is in accordance with its own procedures regarding rescheduling exams (See last paragraph quoted above, referring to the school's in place "policy and set of procedures" for rescheduling an exam). But is it really? Let's take a look at these so called procedures that interim Dean Robert E. Scott refers to (emphasis is my own):

> Columbia Law School's examination policies require all students to take exams at the scheduled times. As stated in the Law School Rules, "All students should be prepared to sit for examinations at any point throughout the examination period." However, exams can be rescheduled in certain situations as defined below.
>
> …
>
> 1. Two (2) Law School exams scheduled on the same day. One of the exams will be rescheduled to the first exam day on which the student does not have a scheduled exam and that will not create an exam conflict requiring further rescheduling.
> 2. Proctored or fixed-date take-home exams can be rescheduled to allow a 36-hour period between the start of two exams. For example, a student having proctored or fixed-date Law School exams scheduled for both Monday and Tuesday can reschedule the Tuesday exam to Wednesday.
> 3. Illness on the day of the exam: Any excuse granted on grounds of illness or other physical disability is conditioned upon receiving a satisfactory medical note from the attending physician within a reasonable time (one or two days, and by no later than the end of the examination period).
> 4. Birth of a child: An exam will be rescheduled if the student is attending the birth of his/her child.
> 5. Religious Observance: An exam will be rescheduled if it conflicts with a religious observance on the day of the exam.
> 6. Bereavement: An exam will be rescheduled in the event of a death in the student's family and the student is attending the funeral or grieving.
> 7. In other exceptional and documented circumstances.
>
> …
>
> Exams cannot be rescheduled because a student has an early flight home for the winter or summer break, or for other personal reasons not outlined above.

So the rule, as stated by Columbia itself, is that all students must take their exams as scheduled, unless one of the seven reasons specifically delineated above applies.

Numbers 1, 2, 4, 5 and 6 clearly do not apply. So that leaves us with 3 or 7.

Number 3, even if we assume somehow that this "trauma" is considered an illness, only applies on the "day of the exam." So this can be eliminated as well, as the rescheduling offered by Columbia for being a pussy was offered in advance of the exams. Nonetheless a medical note is required, another reason this is not the applicable provision.

That leaves us with number 7. But again this does not apply, at least how I and most competent people would read it. Presuming that the "trauma" referred to by the interim dean qualifies as "exceptional," that still leaves the necessary component of the documentation (as "and" was used, and not "or"). You would think, naturally, this would require documentation of the actual circumstance that was exceptional. Of course, no such thing can exist because how do you document someone's hurt feelings stemming from an unrelated court proceeding?

So what Columbia has done, I believe, is extend the "documentation" requirement to just documenting the traumatized student's request.

> We are writing with information about how to go about postponing your exams, in the event that you choose to do so, due to trauma in the wake of recent national events. Exam postponement will be granted on an individual, "opt-out" basis. In order to postpone your exam(s), please email Dean Alice Rigas () in the Registrar's Office. The email need not be extensive and each person's language may be the same. We are providing sample language for your email request below.
>
> Subject: Emergency Action: Request for Exam Extension
> Dear Dean Rigas,
>
> In light of recent traumatic events, I would like to request a(n) exam extension for the following exam(s).

A decision will be made on an "individual" basis, yet Columbia states all requests can use the exact same language. Rather mind-boggling coming from one of America's purported top law schools. Essentially, Columbia has done nothing more than just establish a procedure on a whim and in direct conflict with its stated reasons above. They are expressly allowing students to reschedule exams for "personal reasons not stated above."

As a member of the legal community I am embarrassed. I am embarrassed that these individuals will one day be representing any client in any capacity whatsoever. I am embarrassed that a top law school would allow, much less facilitate, such a pussified way of existence by finding a court proceeding that has nothing to do with someone can cause "trauma" to the point of impairing their ability to take an exam.

It is already bad enough that we have a bunch of incompetent attorneys running around attempting to practice law and failing. But at least some of these dim-witted attorneys carry a mental toughness that serves to advocate their clients' positions if nothing else. Being a lawyer is hard and requires a very tough mind. You will get thrown off many times throughout your career, and often times have only seconds to respond.

It will be a sad day in court when an attorney comes in to request a continuance on the basis of “hurt feelings.” Hopefully I will not be there to see it.

Read Next: 5 Reasons Being A Lawyer Sucks

L.D. Hume

L.D. Hume, formerly known as Law Dogger, is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every so often and he can be found on Twitter as well.

A Man Should Guard His Reputation With His Life

December 12, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

It is easier to cope with a bad conscience than a bad reputation

Friedrich Nietzsche

During the War of Three Kingdoms in ancient China, a fearsome general by the name of Chuko Liang made a terrible tactical blunder. He had sent his massive army to a small town while he relaxed in another small town, with a mere handful of soldiers. News soon reached Liang that enemies forces under general Sima Yi—over 150,000 strong—were headed to the town he was staying in. He surely would be captured if he tried to feebly resist the enemy, so he tried an unconventional approach that relied entirely on his reputation.

Chuko Liang

Liang—for himself—was known as the “Sleeping Dragon” and feared throughout China. He was renowned for his tact, perceptiveness, and cunning. He had many legendary tales and exploits that were well-known through kingdoms. He had once sown rumors about a powerful general who was allied with one his enemies—he managed to convince the enemy the general was a traitor and forced the general to join forces with Liang. He had turned would-be traitors into double agents, he had stolen military seals and forged documents that sent enemies forces to random, distant locations. All these exploits lead Liang to be seen as the most clever man in all of China.

In this instance, Yi had an extensive history with Liang, as he had battled him on multiple occasions. So, when he approached the city that Liang was holed up in, he wasn’t shocked to see what he saw. Liang had thrown the gates of the city open, and he alone sat above the gate, clad in Taoist robes, strumming his lute and chanting Taoist rhymes. Yi knew that Liang was taunting him, forcing him to make a decision as to whether Liang was bluffing or luring Yi into a trap.

Yi looked at Liang for some time, hoping to get a read on Liang. He either falsely read Liang or dared not risk the downside of entering the city, as he ordered his troops to retreat.

This tale shows the supreme power of reputation. A general with barely 100 men was able to turn away over a hundred thousand soldiers solely because of his reputation for being supremely devious and crafty. Yi—most likely—was more worried about being yet another victim of Liang’s clever machinations than an easy capture of an enemy general. Liang’s reputation was so strong that he could bluff his way out of a sure capture at the hands of his enemies.

Reputation is essential to any man’s success in society. Our success and advancement in society necessarily hinges on other’s estimations of us. Only a fool or a rube would ignore his reputation; it is one of the most important intangible resources. As seen with Chuko Liang, sheer reliance on his reputation saved him from certain capture at the hands of his enemies.

Greene counsels that a man should, first, seek to a reputation for one personal quality, say honesty or seductiveness, and build a sterling, rock-solid reputation on that quality. A man who has too many irons in the fire is most likely to burn himself, but by focusing on one personal quality, a man can set himself apart from the crowd and get noticed by others. Further, he advises that a man should be as subtle as possible in cultivating his reputation so not as to bring too much attention on his ambition.

Once a reputation is established, it becomes a sort of passive income, as your reputation precedes you and you need to exert less effort building it. It can create an atmosphere around you that can inspire—for example—fear or devotion. It opens doors, heads confrontations off at the pass and brings nothing but benefits, at least when it is positive.

Reputation can prove to be an inescapable albatross if you cultivate a negative reputation. For example, consider Roosh's forum. The forum has attracted all manner of liars, deceivers and dishonest miscreants. Just like in real life, a foul stench quickly attaches to men who engage in negative behaviors such as fabrication and lying. People can respect men who start from the bottom and work to better their life. What people can't respect is those who lie about their life or personality, such as lies about the quality of women they are bedding or lying about personal accomplishments and success.

Positive or negative, reputation is absolutely crucial to a man's success. As seen with Chuko Liang, his reputation may have very well saved his life. For the average man, reputation doesn't so much save his life so much as it helps build it—or tear it down. But focusing on developing at least one obvious and demonstrable positive personal quality, man can establish a reputation that precedes. So long as a man avoids curating a negative reputation, he can benefit from attention that comes from being known for positive personal qualities.

Read More: Never Break Bread With The Ungrateful

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

“Maybe” Is Always “No” With Western Women

December 12, 2014 | by Ario Barzan | Link | Original Link

It’s Thursday night. You’ve worked ungodly hours all week and then gone and thrown around weights, done cardio, and trained in your martial art of choice. It’s what you do as a man, because making money and fortifying your body are more or less the only two things that you can rely on, the two things you know won’t disappoint you.

There’s a girl you’ve pursued actively for a few weeks now but your schedules have yet to mesh, with you handling your business regularly and her of course being “so busy with work and school” in between selfie sessions and Like-collecting on Facebook. Here’s a typical exchange of the texts between the two of you:

> You: Hey! That new Marvel movie opens tomorrow, want to go see it? We were talking about how cool it looks last week, remember?
>
> Her: Hmm, maybe. I’ll let you know.
>
> You: Okay, there’s a screening at 9pm. I’ll be in touch.
>
> Her: Sounds good.

You text the next day mid-afternoon: So are you down for the movie tonight?

No answer. Your rationale of texting mid-day to not seem too early nor too late was supposedly “safe,” right? Wrong. If she wanted to hang out with you, she would JUMP at the opportunity to do it and everything else would be put on hold. Given the requisite level of attraction, nothing would stop her or get in her way. Straight-up. No hesitation. No “maybe.”

In today's age of too many social options for women, the illustrious "maybe" means that you should probably move on to a new prospect. When you receive this response, it means one of two things:

1. She really is not interested. She never wanted to hang out as-is, but is too polite and "doesn't want to hurt your feelings" by actually telling you this and seeming like a bitch. She sees her social status as far too important to compromise, and there's that shred of a chance you might call her out on Facebook, which would be akin to cutting off her oxygen supply. "Maybe" in this case is simply a passive-aggressive and semi-polite way of saying no without really saying no.

2. She might actually be mildly interested BUT it's contingent on having no better offers come up between now and then, from either males or females. If a group of female friends decides to go to a club and play attention whore, or if a hotter guy with greater social or economic standing dangles a more appealing carrot, you can bet either scenario will win out over you. Why fight an uphill battle?

Of course, you won't know what exactly she did that night where she couldn't even dignify you with a response unless you Facebook or Instagram "stalk" her, and if you decide to call her out on her shadiness the usual female chorus of "Douchebag-Awkward-Creeper!" will be repeated like a broken record nobody can quite reach with a sledgehammer to smash.

Gentlemen, be of sound mind that the modern "maybe" is just a thinly-disguised "no" the vast majority of the time in our society. Even if it is not a 100% kill, you're looking at a 10% chance at best. I don't like those odds, personally, which is why it's important to play the numbers and always have other backup options at the ready.

After all, women do this on a constant basis, so why shouldn't you?

Read More: 5 Things I Learned About Women This Week

Ario Barzan
Ario is more or less The Devil incarnate. When not devouring Sonoran hot dogs or herding cats he's posting gym selfies to validate his existence to the world.

Good Game Is The New Rape

December 13, 2014 | by Clancy Darrow | Link | Original Link

A New Jersey lawmaker has introduced a bill which would criminalize "acts of lying" to obtain sex. Such "sexual assault by fraud" would be treated as rape, and therefore subject men to punishments of up to 20 years in prison for such rapey statements as "Of course I'll respect you in the morning," or "I promise to call you tomorrow."

Imprisonment under such circumstances is not a ridiculous result. According to Salon:

> [f]raud invalidates any semblance of consent just as forcible sexual contact does… As written, the bill doesn't consider sexual assault by fraud any less serious than other types of sexual assault that are already on the books.

Imagine that—20 years incarceration for reassuring, "Let's go out this weekend," when you had absolutely no intention of following through on that promise, or maybe you got called in to work at the last minute. Other "lies" which could guarantee you jail time:

"No, I'm not married."

"I don't have a girlfriend."

"You're hair looks amazing."

"Sure, this means we're going steady."

"No, I don't find your sister attractive."

"I'm a millionaire, I just forgot my wallet."

"You're the type of woman I could marry."

"You're the most beautiful girl I've ever met."

Basically, the proposed law criminalizes "good game." Remember in Swingers when Vince Vaughn advised Jon Favreau to tells girls that he was a "producer" when he was actually a struggling comedian? Well, unless you have ample credits on IMDB to back it up, that claim would be considered "sexual assault by fraud" in New Jersey.

This legislation is yet another attack on men's rights, and more ominously, a not-so-veiled attempt to give jilted or otherwise unhappy women any reason whatsoever to punish those evil men. Break up with a girl without her consent? Prepare to be accused of lying about "wanting to settle down" and therefore, subject to prosecution.

Or worse, tell her she "doesn't look fat" in those pants, when she actually looks like a water buffalo—off to the big house with you. A law that criminalizes your thoughts is the ultimate weapon of a vindictive female, literally a "he said, she didn't like it" crime.

So what does this mean to you, as a normal guy, just trying to enjoy life, meet some ladies and have a good time? It means that "affirmative consent" is not enough. The proliferation of affirmative consent laws have made prosecutions that much easier because engaging in a sex act voluntarily is no longer enough to prevent a female from accusing you of assault.

And it gets worse. Quite literally, this new law means that every woman you meet is a ticking time bomb, and every statement you utter holds the potential to imprison you. No more playful innuendo or hyperbole. If you say something, buster, you better mean it. Consider the lyrics of that epic 70's love ballad "Paradise by the Dashboard Light":

> Do you love me? Will you love me forever?
>
> Do you need me? Will you never leave me?
>
> Will you make me so happy for the rest of my life?
>
> Will you take me away, and will you make me your wife?

Let's be honest, when a guy's about to get laid, he'll promise all sorts of stuff, from long term commitment to finding a cure for ebola—and both of those would be considered rape under the new law. Your answer to any questions resembling those Meat Loaf lyrics should be, "Let me discuss that with my lawyer and get back to you. In the meantime, can you please sign and notarize this Statement of Affirmative Consent and have it reviewed by your independent counsel?"

In order to counter such blatant violations of our constitutional and human rights, men must not cower under the threat of such charges. Instead, men must fight back and expose the hypocrisy of such silly legislation, which, ironically, takes away resources and attention from legitimate crimes.

Women must also be subjected to prosecution when they obtain sex by "fraud." For example, men should pursue charges if a partner lies about being on birth control or having a boyfriend. And most importantly, watch your back and use a survival tactic made famous by Sergeant Schultz in that classic sitcom.

.

Read More: Game Can Protect You From False Rape Accusations

Clancy Darrow

Clancy is a civil rights attorney who also serves as a consultant to the entertainment industry.

What You Should Consider Before Joining The Military

December 13, 2014 | by Abel Edain | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: I'm currently serving in the United States Air Force, and these are the simple conclusions I've come to about today's military. Other branches of the military may be different, but I work in a joint-service environment and work closely with all branches. I'm confident these will apply to all services.

1. Before You Join

Get it in writing. We've all heard it before, but in this case, it's serious. Whatever you are promised, make sure it is in your enlistment contract. If the recruiter promises you something and it isn't in ink, walk away.

Be specific when it comes to choosing an Air Force Specialty Code or a Military Occupational Specialty code (your job). Don't let them trick you with a top 10 list. ONLY SELECT THE JOBS YOU ABSOLUTELY WANT. I've seen too many people pushed into the tenth job on their list. They then hated the military, and also their lives because of it.

Do your research. Sure Aircraft Fuel Systems sound cool, but in reality you spend eight hours in a sweat suit, mask on your face, inside of a fuel tank. Sounds fun, right?

If you do those three things, then you are well on your way to a decent military career.

2. Branches Of Military Services

Air Force – Takes great care of you, the personnel are annoying as shit, very blue pill. Toss up for most sensitivity training.

Navy – Much like the AF, but you should probably be okay with being on a ship for six months at a time.

Army – Avoid the fucking Army. You are just a number to them, and they treat you accordingly.

Marines – The only branch I can possibly consider red pill in any way. They treat you like the Army but they expect you to enjoy it. Strong camaraderie though; nothing like it in the other branches.

Here's a reality check: if you are expecting an in-your-face type of military then go Marines. Every other branch has been beta-maxed. My basic training was the biggest joke I've ever experienced, and I went through Air Force basic training before the whole sex scandal. What the recruits go through now is hardly recognizable and makes what I went through look like hell.

3. Once You Are In

Realize that the military is a horribly run business, and that if it were not on the government's dime it would have crash and burned. Horribly. Long ago.

But damn does it have good benefits. Here are a few:

Free healthcare and dental can be a huge benefit and a lifted burden for many people. The salt here is that it's military personnel treating other military. If you've swallowed the red pill, you know that doctors are people too and are just as likely to make mistakes or be incompetent as you are. In that case congratulations, you will not be too surprised when it happens.

Education is an obvious benefit and has been written about many times, so I'm not going to delve too deeply into it. The more effort you put into your education while you are active duty, the better off you will be.

BAH/BAQ – Basic Allowance for Housing and Quarters. Free room and board, more or less. The longer you've been in and the higher your rank, the more you get. This is easily one of the best benefits of being in the military.

BAS – Basic Allowance for Sustenance. Much like BAH this is another huge perk. Who spends $300 a month just for food?

What makes these benefits better is that any money you receive but do not spend on your housing, rent, or food is still your money. Spend it, save it, or buy a hooker. It is your money, do with it as you please. They are also non-taxable—take that, lefty parasites.

30 days of leave a year. Pros: that's a lot of leave, depending on how you use it. It makes taking extended vacations manageable if you can plan accordingly. Cons: if your family lives 12 hours away and you want to go visit on a four-day weekend, you have to take leave in order to do that, even if you would have those days off anyway. If you burn all your leave when you get it, then you will have a hard time.

You get a lot of Comped Time Off (CTO). I've personally gotten 6-10 free days off this year thanks to this nifty little thing.

There are many other benefits you may qualify for, be it separation pay, deployment pay, hazardous duty pay, flight pay, etc. When these are all added up, you can live a very comfortable middle class life.

4. The Shit Parts

Many of society's problems today are affecting the military as well. The "rape" culture is making it exceedingly dangerous for males in the US military. I personally know three different individuals that have been accused of rape. I'm confident that at least two of them are false accusations. The third case I do not know the specifics of.

The military is also, ironically, subject to socialist shortcomings. As I mentioned above, the military is a very badly run business. It can also easily be compared to a socialist society. Everyone knows that they will be paid regardless of their work ethic, which in turn produces a lack of efficiency. This lack of efficiency is then categorized as the norm and is then adopted by the masses. This is bad enough, but things then become cyclical and later compound.

The enforcement of blue pill ideals is a major problem. On a weekly basis we are forced to view training on gender equality, sexual assault, political correctness, etc. In the last three years it has become more and more of a mechanical blue pill dispensary.

If one can put up with conditions that closely resemble corporate America today then, yes, joining the military is a good choice. Just be informed before you do.

Read More: The American Military & Men Do Not Mix

Abel Edain
Abel is an early 20s someone, lucky enough to get lost from the herd.

What Is #Metalgate?

December 13, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Having recently lost their stranglehold in games and their ever-favorite topic of rape, Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) are mounting an attack over another topic: metal music. Yes, really. Because SJWs think that even rock music, which is historically offensive and counter-cultural, will realistically come under their thumb.

Oh, the fools. But I can't complain, considering how in these situations us marginalized red pillers always come along to pick up the pieces and use these scandals as an opportunity to grow our numbers and gain sympathizers. Let's begin looking at Metalgate.

Friday Death Metal Underground released an article on the SJW takeover of metal. Between that and the below video from Saturday, #Metalgate is incipient. Reddit has responded by banning a thread on it, although others popped up.

Water Boiling Under The Lid

Basically SJWs are complaining about how people who enjoy metal tend to be racist, misogynist, and homophobic (the three favorite strawman attacks of the left) and exclude those who are not white “cisgendered” males. As you know, the average white man in the West Virginian coal mines has much more prosperity and opportunity than the rest of the ethnic and gender groups in the country, so there is no reason that white men should have a right to have any pride in their ethnic identity or have anything unique that they can identify with.

Christians are not the only ones who inject ill-fitting lyrics into any music genre they can find. A metal band called Cattle Decapitation sings about how hardcore it is to be vegetarian. At least the Christian metal is only marketed towards Christians, but this pussified street preacher (the animal rights band, not the Christians) wants to be considered one of the regulars in the metal community.

But did the metalheads ask for animal rights lyrics? If not, then pick up an acoustic guitar and find a different venue. And of course this animal rights band is drawing in animal rights activists to the venues, thus corrupting the exclusivity of the subculture.

Exclusivity is the essence of subcultures. People like the possessiveness they have over their subculture. Just as it would be odd to have Christians passing out Chick tracts at hippie festivals, I wouldn’t feel comfortable if my favorite redneck bar held a hip-hop show. I don’t make hip-hop music, and loudmouth vegetarians shouldn’t make metal music. Having metal music about SJW causes is as bizarre as a folk rock band singing pro-imperialist songs.

Metal music has always been offensive. That was part of its concept. It is a worldview as much as it is a music genre. So do not act surprised when you find such waspy behaviors like using the word “faggot.” If you do not like it, then find a different community to join. What kind of psychopath seeks out people he hates so that he can join their group? And if you love the music but are repulsed at the people, then just buy the CDs and stay away from the fans. That’s what I do with folk rock.

Escalation

This funny video has been gaining views very quickly since its publication Saturday. It's a bit hard to understand, so I would recommend watching it after you finish reading this article. It summarizes a Metal Injection article and the Death Metal Underground article above while touching on others, but I'll give the highlights of what is happening.

The main focus of the DMU article is that metal is inherently anti-authoritarian, and activists have come in throughout the decades to clean it up and bring it in line. It is not so much a conservative-versus-liberal issue as a libertarian-versus-authoratarian one.

Unlike #Gamergate, this is not something with a new sex scandal or coverup revealed. Rather, it represents the consequences of leftist invasion over an extended period of time. Leftists in the last several years have been trying hard to infuse metal with social issues instead of just enjoying the angst. The above video discusses this at length. The Washington Post wrote in 2006, > Metal artists 'have responded to the culture and politics of the day,' said Donna Gaines, a sociologist and author of 'Teenage Wasteland,' a study of working class New Jersey metalheads.

Was rock music ever irrelevant to the culture, though? And to whose politics and culture are they responding? The Post answers in the next paragraph,

> Metal music in the 1980s was often homophobic and 'very white,' she said, but current bands tend to be socially conscious and suspicious of political power.

Oh, so not the correct culture then. But if white people are part of society, then isn't music made commenting on their frustrations by definition "socially conscious" and likely "suspicious of political power"? In fact, yes, the Post confirms this three sentences later, > Heavy metal has always touched on social and political issues. Metal grandfathers Black Sabbath criticized the Vietnam War in songs like 'War Pigs' and 'Children of the Grave.' Iron Maiden's 'Run to the Hills' was an angry denunciation of the displacement of Native Americans.

So maybe not so much "very" white after all. But that's a moot point, because they used the word "often." Words like "often," "many," "tend to," and "can be" are the leftists' safe words that allow them enough vagueness to make any ridiculous claims they want (e.g. "Gamers often hate women playing their games"). Note that this does not work in the reverse, as they get angry when I say, "Blacks are often dangerous people who should be avoided."

First-semester sociology class will tell you that culture is necessary to a society. Without it, society would be chaotic (as we see with the loss of traditional sex roles correlating with the rise in psychiatric drugs). Why then is it so vile to recognize white culture? Indeed, many white people feel as though they have no culture or feel as though their culture is being denied them. This culture war instigated by the left only causes Joe White Person to become more racist. But I digress.

Another article from last September on PopMatters is about how we should not listen to metal music that advocates doing vile things to women. A simple solution is just to not buy the music. I find gangsta rap offensive, so I don't purchase it. Therefore, it is out of my life. Problem solved. But that isn't enough for the spoiled and bored white liberal arts majors of the Anglosphere.

Eruption Pending

It seems now that the anti-Gamergate movement has failed, the SJWs have started for a revitalized push against the metalheads. Or at least the metalheads have been inspired by Gamergate to push against the SJWs. Either way, #Metalgate is rising, and I imagine that there will be strong pushing on both sides. It's a bit confusing to figure out what is going on, but what we can know is that metalheads are beginning to fight back and that the SJWs will be too naive to not provoke the metalheads to more anger.

The website Metal Injection has several articles pushing this leftist agenda. The one focused on in the above video was released in October 2014. It criticizes the common use of the word "faggot" by metalheads. This is part of his series called "The Problem With Heavy Metal Is Metalheads," an excellent slap in the face to his readers.

The author complains that metalheads tend to be exclusive towards people who are not "heterosexual white male[s] who wears cargo pants and band shirts" and links to articles concerning "racism, misogyny, and homophobia." If you look at the articles, you see that those accusations do not fit at all. The video above explains it shortly after 7:20. So the writer has already discredited himself.

> It should go without saying that any fandom or scene that prides itself on embracing outcasts the way the metal community does would avoid using offensive language that targets an entire group of already-persecuted people. You'd be wrong, though.

This is one of the critical errors leftists make about outcast subcultures. They assume that all subcultures that cater to outcasts should cater to all kinds of outcasts. But the point of these cultures is not to make a place for all the social misfits to gather; it's to make a place for a certain kind of misfit so that the misfits of that kind can unite and identify with each other. Through this they feel a sense of belonging instead of loneliness. Social outcast groups tend to have little in common with other social outcast groups.

Most people do not feel morally obligated to give unsolicited pity to any type of minority who walks by him. Or at least, if he does feel morally obligated, his stomach churns since he innately knows there is something wrong with the culture of victimhood. Let the gays have their bars and let the metalheads have their internet fora.

The article continues to prattle at length on about how wrong it is to use gay slurs and seems to assume that every thinking person naturally believes there is nothing wrong with homosexuality or transgenderism. It is odd how it spends more time talking about metal fans than actual metal music.

Other SJW articles shown in the video can be found here (September 2014), here (January 2012), here (June 2014), here (December? 2014), here (May 2014), and here (October 2014).

Summary

A core doctrine of leftism is that a person is never allowed to just enjoy something. There must always be the label “important socially relevant” attached to it. They cannot allow those on “the wrong side of history” to go off in their own corner and vent. Nor can they merely martyr them through journalistic hazing. No, the heretics and thought-criminals must be made into converts.

Another core doctrine of the SJWs (and frankly most of society) is that the opinions I the individual hold today are empirical fact and that anyone who disagrees must be closed off to thinking about it. This is especially disturbing if few or no people held these ideas more than 100 years ago, as though I the individual am the smartest person who ever lived.

The SJWs try these things constantly. However, this is 2014, not 2013. Gamergate has crushed them and provided alternatives, and we will find that metalgate will win another ideological victory. Between gamergate, Women Against Feminism, and the false public rape accusations, 2014 will be remembered as the year feminism began to end.

The SJWs will likely try the same excessive tactics with metalgate that they used on gamergate and shirtgate, and they will get the same negative reaction from the masses. The harder the SJWs push, the more Average Joe is repulsed by them. Their unfounded optimism and willful naivety will be the death of them. Metalgaters have thrown down the glove, and I cannot imagine the SJWs will be hesitant to answer.

Read More: The Newest Battleground Against SJW’s Is #MetalGate (via Reaxxion)

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

8 Tips For Accelerated Fat Loss

December 14, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

We live in an unfortunate society where obesity is far too common. The negative consequences of being overweight are numerous but, as a man, the main two you should be worried about are:

1. Increased risk of a shit ton of chronic diseases

2. Low self-esteem and the negative affects this brings to your ability to gain respect from other men and attract women

…Not to mention that you'll generally feel like crap, have lower testosterone levels, and, well, be fat.

Part of the problem is the lack of quality information out there. Far too many doctors and supplement companies are pushing gastric bypass surgeries and ineffective weight loss pills. The truth is that there's a simple way to lose weight, and do so quickly. Yes, it's going to take some discipline, but that's all the more reason to bite the bullet and make it happen.

1. Lift weights

The main reason to lift weights is because you want to retain your lean mass while you're losing weight. Losing weight without lifting weights will result in a loss of both fat and muscle tissue, and often leads to the infamous "skinny-fat" condition where you drop the pounds, but still look chubby.

This is because lifting weights provides your body with the necessary stimulus to hold onto your muscle—it gives your body a reason to burn fat instead of muscle (1). I suggest doing a full body routine three times per week.

2. Do some cardio

Cardio will accelerate your weight loss by burning off extra calories. A 30-minute session of moderate intensity cardio can burn a few hundred calories… And it only takes a deficit of approximately 500 calories per day to shed a pound per week (2). It's also good for your heart.

3. Intermittently fast

I recommend intermittent fasting because you'll eat less food throughout the day if you only eat during eight hours of it. I don't recommend it because I think there's some fat-burning magic that happens when you do so. The basic way to accomplish this is to only eat between noon and 8pm. A moderate-sized breakfast and dinner, with a snack in between, is a solid plan for reducing your overall calories.

4. Drink lots of water

There are numerous health reasons to drink more water. It improves energy, joint health, and digestive functioning. But the reason I advise it for weight loss is that it makes your stomach feel fuller… And when you feel fuller you will eat less. Drink a large glass of water before and during each meal to take advantage of this technique.

5. Drink green tea

Caffeine helps you burn fat it two major ways: it curbs your diet and it can cause a slight amount of thermogenesis and fat oxidation (3). I recommend green tea over coffee because it's easier on your stomach and it contains numerous antioxidants that coffee does not.

6. Use circuit-style weight training

Circuit style weight training is simply when you take a set of exercises, usually three or four, and you do them in a series back-to-back with minimal rest in between. This is beneficial for weight loss because it elevates your heart rate more than traditional one-set-at-a-time weight lifting, and thus burns more calories. Here's a basic bodyweight-only routine that can be performed in a circuit.

7. Eat "healthy" foods

Traditionally healthy foods are high in fiber and calorically sparse (they contain relatively few calories for their volume). This means they'll fill you up more than "junk" foods. A few "healthy" foods include chicken, fish, vegetables, rice, potatoes, and squash.

8. Eat less

This is the golden rule. You must eat less in order to lose weight. You must provide your body with fewer calories than it requires to function. This forces it to harvest this energy from fat and muscle stores on your body, and results in weight loss.

If you're trying to lose weight, I suggest you take a look at my new training program "Body of a Beast." Read reviews and get it here.

Read More: 4 Fitness Myths That Are Pure Bullshit

References:

1. Layman, Donald K., et al. "Dietary protein and exercise have additive effects on body composition during weight loss in adult women." The Journal of nutrition 135.8 (2005): 1903-1910.

2.Bortz, Walter M. "Predictability of weight loss." JAMA 204.2 (1968): 101-105.

3. Westerterp-Plantenga, Margriet S., Manuela PGM Lejeune, and Eva MR Kovacs. "Body weight loss and weight maintenance in relation to habitual caffeine intake and green tea supplementation." Obesity research 13.7 (2005): 1195-1204.

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Media Manipulation In Ferguson Sets A Dangerous Precedent

December 14, 2014 | by Drexel Scott | Link | Original Link

We've already written about the details of the Ferguson incident, which you should familiarize yourself with if you don't know the real story of Darren Wilson and Michael Brown. By "real story," I mean the picture formed when taking all available evidence into account—not the initial knee-jerk reaction that led to the protests.

Brothers, it's exactly that knee-jerk reaction that I'd like to talk with you about today. But before we begin, let's do a quick recap of the cultural Marxist agenda:

To destroy supposed white European hegemony in the western world through the promotion of fringe agendas and the demonization of tradition (destabilization), ultimately ending in a totalitarian police state where everybody besides the elite are miserable. Liberals will take solace in the fact that hey, at least everyone is EQUALLY unhappy, so therefore it's progress.

The reason it ends in a police state is that violence (or the threat of violence) is the only possible way to enforce the end goal. The end goal must be enforced, in turn, because racial and sexual parity will never be the natural outcome of equal opportunity. This should be obvious to anyone with the ability to critically and rationally observe the world around them, generally by high school (and it usually takes several more years to actually accept what you already know in your heart).

Before we get back to Ferguson, take into account that attacks on a man's livelihood—the means by which he feeds himself and potentially his family—is an act of violence in and of itself. Removing a man's source of income is essentially wishing death upon him and his lineage. In recent times we have seen such violence aimed at Matt Taylor for wearing a shirt feminists didn't like, as well as James Watson—who discovered the double-helix structure of DNA—being barred from his profession as a scientists when he mentioned differences in IQ between races. Larry Summers also comes to mind, the ex-Harvard president who lost his job for citing research about sex differences in academics.

So attacking a dissenter's source of income is one form of violence. Another form (a micro aggression, if you will) is to pass legislature that blocks qualified individuals of a particular race or sex to attain what they've earned, in order to reward people of other races or the other sex when they have not earned it. This is what I mean when I say, that the proclaimed end goal of "equality" can only be sustained by violence.

But back to Ferguson. Gentlemen, this was a test of a most insidious nature. The Powers That Be have simply performed another experiment on the United States, which is essentially a playground for mind control researchers and has been since Operation Paperclip.

If you were to imagine that the question was "How easily can we spur a crowd to racial violence?" then the answer is a resounding "Holy shit was that easy."

You see, now they know that by simply choosing a story and spinning it with lies according to a certain formula, the masses can be swayed and their ire collectively raised BEFORE anyone even has any idea what happened. Further, they know that even when the truth is right there in front of people, they will still go by their initial emotional knee-jerk reaction.

This is terrifying. Imagine what can be done with this knowledge, for the keepers of the formula and those who pull the heartstrings of our once-great republic. They know that any time they want to incite violence and rioting, all they have to do is whisper the right words to the right media outlets and bam, human stupidity and base nature are sure to follow in their fullest expression.

But, I'm afraid, this is not the scariest part. No, the scariest part is yet to come. Recall the pressure that the Ferguson jury was under to indict Officer Wilson–the absolute knowledge and certainty that mayhem would result from making the right decision.

I have the utmost respect for those who acted in the true spirit of Justice despite knowing the consequences, simply because it is the right thing to do. But this will not always be the case. No. They will do this again, press the same buttons and we will wind up in a nearly identical situation. And next time, it will be bigger. The rioting will last longer. More people will be hurt or killed, and more cities will be involved. There is one moment we must fear above all others, and that moment is this:

The moment when a jury needs to make the right decision, and the social pressure to cave in or face massive violence finally takes its toll on the psyche of those involved. Death threats will be sent to their homes and families.

"If you thought Ferguson was bad, wait until you see what happens unless you make the decision we want you to make!" will be the rallying cry. And IF it happens, even once, that the spirit of justice is negated in favor of the whims of the crowd…that, my brothers, will be the Point of No Return. At that point, the FUBAR button can be pressed at anytime, for any reason, and undermine the justice system that is barely holding us together as-is.

The fight is far from over. More awaken every day. We must hit a critical mass before it is too late. Pick up your swords, brethren. Winter is coming.

Read More: Why The Media Uses The Death Of Michael Brown To Promote Racial Division

Drexel Scott
Truth is my religion, and sovereignty my destiny. I'm an entrepreneur who teaches what I know, and you can find my #1 Closing Advice book, Straight To Sex, at my website: http://www.drexelscott.com/s2s

Australia: Land Of The Blue Piller And Home Of The Socialist Slaves

December 14, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I lived in Australia for a long time and, coming from the UK, I loved the laid back lifestyle. Great weather, easy-going people, with a safe and high standard of living. I was eating out every night for $10-15 AUD, I had an apartment near the beach in Sydney for $1000 AUD a month, I was a 10-minute drive from downtown, and it was 50 US cents to the Aussie dollar. Things like registering a car, getting a driver's license, signing a lease, opening a bank account were all smooth, easy, and cheap!

Australia has a "friendly" government with a "for the people" bureaucracy—starting your own business is simple and any registrations you need to abide by are easily explained and available online in common English. Contrast that with the US or UK, where you need an army of accountants and lawyers before you print your business card and you can understand why I enjoyed the place— initially at least.

So What's The Problem?

The longer I stayed, the more I became aware of this creeping social agenda. It was not ok to be ostentatious. For example a well-known Australian stockbroker Rene Rivkin, stepped over the line, doing nothing more than a wealthy businessman in the US: driving flashy cars, owning nightclubs, smoking cigars, etc.

He was taken down with a hysterical media campaign and a trumped up insider trading charge, made to step in line to the point he had a nervous breakdown, and died quite young. Now I am not going to debate the merits of his case, but I will explain how a creeping politically correct agenda takes over, because Australia is a case study in this area. I am also in a unique position to comment on it, as I will explain.

Rene Rivkin – never hurt anyone and made plenty of people rich.

Australian's are "nice" people, and everyone has an equal opportunity. Girls are definitely seen as no different from boys, and it has always been a bastion of human rights. Sydney Mardi Gras is a famous gay pride event, initially tolerated and more recently promoted. Your average white male Australian back in the day was not particularly well educated but had a great social system. Rather ironically known as a "true blue Aussie," he took a "live and let live" attitude and why shouldn't he? The abundance mentality and the lack of any real social strife or historical struggle enabled him to share his wealth around.

This is where it gets interesting, because that happy-go-lucky "salt of the earth" attitude that Aussies are famous for, slowly gets engulfed by a parasitic octopus of socialism, feminism, social shaming, gay and minority rights, government interference, and a pervading "look down your nose" attitude.

WOMEN'S WORK
UNDERPAID & UNPAID

© Malcolm Kelton
Firefly Photos Australia
www.fireflyphotos.com.au

A nation of 'nice guys' create a nation of bitchy cunts

As those of you who read my articles will understand, I am not a man who mixes his words. I say it how I see it and I push the envelope as far as possible. In business I want results and I want them now. If you sit down with some Americans or especially Asians, and want to accomplish a business goal, you can cut through a lot of the finery and social BS in favor of targeting the goal at hand.

In these situations, you can be a little pushy where necessary and people will deal with it, while you have no need to hide the fact you want to excel—people will come to the party. In Australia this attitude is known as "tall poppy syndrome." I was labelled rude, abrasive, anti-social, overambitious etc.

Take a guy like Steve Jobs, put him in Australia, and he'd have an army of emotional vampires trolling him. That's not to say it's an active or targeted campaign initially. There is a social validation and a chipping away at your soul that takes place in Australia on a day-to-day social level. This is done to make sure that if you haven't swallowed the blue pill, one will be gently and firmly inserted into your rectum.

Everyone in Australia is an undercover social justice warrior, and you just cannot "talk to me like that!" This, combined with a rather dull and uneducated majority that thinks the best of itself, left me deciding not to renew my residency visa or apply for a passport after 10 years. I was thus never to return to "paradise" even though I consider it home, and many people would give their eye teeth for an Aussie residency permit.

I effectively unplugged myself from the matrix and exiled myself. I knew full well that the easygoing lifestyle and high standard of living available for low cost would call me back, but the lack of performance pressure combined with abrasive blue pillers would inhibit my growth. I left back in 2005 and I would say that the US and EU is probably beginning to catch up to where Australia was then. It's like a coffee filter that collects the mediocre and lazy socialists of the world.

You are not supposed to be too ambitious and if you are successful you can't flaunt it or enjoy it too much. You can't say anything against the party line – the case in point being the hysteria against Julien Blanc where the government saw fit to cancel his visa. I'm not condoning RSD, who pushed the envelope too far, but much of what they talk about is a matter of self-esteem, being cheeky, creative, flamboyant, and generally putting yourself out there. None of this is a bad thing. I don't see what place the government has in getting involved, let alone canceling a visa.

Soviet Union or Common Wealth of Australia?

Is freedom of speech allowed? Can we give a life coach creative room to breathe and push the boundaries that his students probably never will, for the purposes of demonstrating a point and bringing your average blue pill man out of his shell? Sure we can. Can we appreciate the popularity of his business, the work he has put into building his skills and ideas, not to mention the fact that enough people have signed up to his courses to fund his trip to the country? RSD are not Neo-Nazis or Taliban. Do we need to turn red pill into a religion and claim minority rights?

The case of Mr. Blanc down under, warrants a discussion and article all of its own. What I am bringing out here is the pervading social attitudes that I experienced in Australia and the reason that I no longer have any claim to reside there. Despite its social train wreck, I'd return to Latin America before Australia—there at least you have real freedom.

Australia is a unique case, in part due to its remote location and its history as a prison colony. Americans think they have it bad, but there is at least a semblance of a free culture, you can aspire to be the best and being wealthy is not a crime against humanity. Australia shows a prison psychology, but run on a much more subtle level. This kindergarten-type social programming takes place in almost every interaction you make, from the clerk in the bank to the chick at the bar. You will behave.

Back in the days of the USSR if you went to Moscow and took photos near a government building, the KGB might come and arrest you and you'd never be seen again. Australia has that same kind of comrade attitude, just on a subconscious level. Live And Let Live has turned into an army of insecure blue pill passive aggressives who are constantly testing you for adherence to their social system. What's worse is this looks like the shape of things to come in the rest of the world.

Another example of this from history would be the characters of the King's Court in France or Spain. All the bowing, the ass licking and co-towing HAD to take place, just to establish yourself as non-threatening to the hierarchy of the day. The Australian government canceling a visa is similar to the King executing some courtier that didn't quite bow low enough. RSD is not the issue—it's the overreaction of the state and its citizens that is on the stand here. No surprise that the UK is following suit.

We’re Not Gay Bashing

It’s OK for scantily clad homosexual men to bugger each other in public, while dancing on floats at the famous Sydney Mardi Gras street parade, that children could easily attend. They are a “persecuted minority,” so let them do their thing—but wait a minute…. RSD is out of line and gets visas cancelled for its cheeky “offensive” seminars offered only to people who pay for them and choose to attend behind closed doors. What is really going on here? Not long ago sodomy was illegal, but today a coach telling men to behave like men is black balled and deported. It’s “Not a pre-approved attitude.”

City Center In Broad Day Light!

You can do whatever you want in Australia, so long as they approved of it

Every time I've tried to connect with Australians I've met in bars, airports, hotels etc. around the world, I'm always met with a kind of guarded shrug. Do the same thing with an American and you get their life story (and quite possibly get laid). I have more friends and connections in the US, but I only lived there for one year.

Phone up an American friend and they ooze enthusiasm…. I'm the crazy gypsy Brit. Phone up an old Aussie friend and I'm not allowed to be better than them. To cap it all, while I was traveling a few years back, a young Australian waitress who was closing up the bar late at night literally grabbed me like I was a chick, and stuck her tongue down my throat—Julien Blanc style.

It's another example that proves my point. I didn't find the girl super attractive, a six at best, in large part because she was just another abrasive Aussie. I fucked her anyway (she was young enough and skinny enough to pass the boner test), but SHE hit on me like she was a man and I was a girl. If I'd done what she did I'd have been risking an attempted rape charge. That's Australia for you: Socialism and Feminism 101.

Read More: How A Sitcom Shoved The Blue Pill Down Our Throat

A Beginner’s Guide To Breaking Bodybuilding Plateaus

December 15, 2014 | by Kalos Kagathos | Link | Original Link

In case you are unfamiliar with it, let me introduce you to the plateau. In the process of adding plates and muscle, at various points you will inexplicably find yourself bumping against a wall. Your progress will seem to stall and no matter how much you grit your teeth, spit, grunt, or contort your body, you cannot seem to meet your targeted rep count, get a decent contraction with the higher weight, or see any difference in your size or weight from month-to-month.

After spending some time wandering in the badlands of muscle plateaus, you may begin to lose hope in your quest for hypertrophy. I am here to tell you that there is hope, and it only requires a few tweaks to your normal training routine. I stress that these tools are mainly for bodybuilders (not so much for others with different goals) and that you will need to experiment a bit in order to find the best way to integrate these into your training.

1. Strip Sets

If you are used to cranking out three sets of 8-12 reps, then adding a strip set to your repertoire can be a magic bullet. The performance is thus: on your final set for any given exercise, load a bar with the same weights that you use for your normal work sets or grab your usual dumbbells, work to failure, then strip off some weight (10-20 pounds) and immediately work to failure again, then strip off more weight (another 20 pounds), etc.

The key is to rest as little as possible while you are performing a strip set so that it seems to be one continuous set, thus allowing you to work beyond proximate failure on your final set. Keep going until you reach your targeted rep count (20-25 reps).

Since the idea of the strip set is to work continuously, you should have a training partner whose job it is to remove the necessary weights upon failure rather than having to get up and do it yourself (on the bench press for instance). Since I train alone, I typically perform strip sets with dumbbells or machines (T-bar rows are an exception).

2. Pyramid

“Pyramiding” involves adding weight with each successive set. With various plateaus I’ve faced off against in the past, pyramiding has done wonders. It is a micro-representation of the concept of progressive overload (one of the keys to building muscle). Rather than performing three sets of say, dumbbell pullovers with a 60 pound dumbbell and aiming for 15-20 reps each set, instead you could perform a set of 20 with the 50 pound weight, then 15-20 with the 60 pound weight, and finally 8-12 with the 70 pound weight. Increasing the intensity in this way can cause your muscles to adapt by growing bigger and stronger.

3. Rest-Pause

Also called “breathing,” this is when momentary breaks are taken in the course of a work set. Depending on the lift, you may hold the weights at the bottom or top, breathe a few times and then continue, or you may put the weight down and take a few breaths, then pick it up and continue. The extra reps will be taxing but well worth the effort. This is another trick that allows you to push beyond proximate failure.

Due to the tremendous amount of strain that these place on your body, they are typically used sparingly and during the last set of any particular exercise (the same goes for strip sets). I’ll admit that there are a few exercises for which I employ this technique on every working set, but that’s unconventional; you’ll need to experiment for yourself in order to find which method works best for you.

4. Volume I

By increasing volume, I do not mean doing ten sets of bench presses, although that is a viable option if you are experimenting with Cumulative Fatigue Training. No, I recommend adding variations of similar exercises at a variety of different angles.

For the bench press for instance, you might consider performing dips or incline presses on the same day, or variations of the fly, decline press, or dumbbell presses. If your only chest exercise is the bench press, as mine was for some time, then you may begin to adopt a certain desperation with regard to the size and strength of your pectoral muscles.

Try adding dumbbell pullovers. Add dips. Rotate between incline and decline presses each session so that you can supplement and balance the upper and lower pectorals. If you’ve been feeling pretty spry after your workouts, try incrementally adding some volume and don’t be afraid to work your way up to 30 total sets per workout.

5. Volume II

You are aching in all the wrong places, all the time. You are always tired, never feel rested enough to go full-bore, and you feel like a sack of cow dung every time you come home from the gym. I believe that you are exhibiting the symptoms of underrecovery.

If you do not allow your body to recover properly by eating enough calories, sleeping enough, or taking enough rest days, then underrecovery can lead to plateaus, regression, or worse yet—injuries.

The quickest cure for underrecovery is to take a week or so to deload. Deloading can occur by avoiding the gym entirely for some period of time (three days to a week); a moderate approach might incorporate light exercises (50% of your usual weights) so as to minimize the loss of familiarity with the movements while also making sure that you are pumping vital blood into the muscles.

Deloading is an opportunity to recover and catch up on much-needed rest. It can become a regular part of your routine at set times (every 6-8 weeks), or it can be used at the end of a cycle in order to prepare your body for a new program that you are about to undertake. If you’re not already doing it, then you should consider incorporating some form of a deload into your programming.

6. Frequency

In order to increase frequency, you don't necessarily need to increase the frequency with which you work an entire muscle group (if you can handle this, then don't let me discourage you). Increasing frequency is a great idea, but if you are already working with a high-volume routine, then this may not be a viable option depending on what your body can handle.

Instead I recommend identifying any particular muscle(s) that you hope to build up as a special project within your routine. You should first identify a muscle or a head of the muscle that is lagging (say, the long head of the tricep, soleus, or brachioradialis) and then incorporate an exercise for that muscle into one or all of your workouts that cover different muscle groups.

I successfully employed this method in order to bring my glutes and brachioradialis up to speed and to reinvigorate my chest and back routines.

7. Check Your Form

Spend some time diagnosing any possible corruptions of good technique that have worked their way into your lifts due to an obsessive passion for adding weight to the bar. Slow down your reps and focus on the fluid movement of the weights; make sure that you can pause at any given time during a repetition and hold the weight in place for a second. If you cannot, then you are probably relying upon leverage and momentum rather than the targeted muscles.

Make sure that you are contracting the appropriate muscles during your lifts—actually think about the muscles that you are contracting the next time you perform the lift and focus on getting it right.

Warm-up sets are always a good idea since you can habituate certain muscles to contract and then carry that focus into your working sets.

8. Check your Diet

I'll quote Rich Piana: "You gotta eat big to get big." He admittedly uses steroids, but the advice still stands. Don't expect to be breaking through too many plateaus if you're not willing to gain a few pounds in the process. If you're not gaining weight, then you're not eating enough. If you're on a cut, then ignore this advice and do your thing.

Conclusion

With all of these tools at your disposal, and a few that I did not mention (partial reps, forced reps, cheats, negatives, feeder workouts, occlusion training), you should be well on your way to combating any current or future plateaus. Aside from the possibility of injury or some other physical hindrance, there should be no excuse except a lack of will.

The dreaded plateau seems to exist at the limits of your ability, but it is really just a milestone to be blazed on your path to self-improvement. Enjoy the challenge, adapt, and overcome.

Read More: A Little Known Mass Building Technique

Kalos Kagathos

Kalos is an amateur Classicist with a penchant for bodybuilding

The Overnighters Shows The Desperation Of Men In Modern America

December 15, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

> "If the world hates you, remember that it hated me first."
>
> John 15:18

Over the past few years, Williston, North Dakota has become famous for its oil boom and the wellspring of opportunity it's created for men. Advances in hydrofracking technology have enabled oil companies to develop the Bakken oil patch in the western part of the state, attracting men from around the country and world looking for work. While the environmental impact of hydrofracking is well-known, few if any journalists have bothered to look at the trials of the men who go to Williston to begin anew.

The Overnighters is the first film—or work of art in general—to capture the human element of the fracking boom. The documentary focuses on the Concordia Lutheran Church in Williston, where Pastor Jay Reinke allowed homeless job-seekers (the titular "overnighters") to sleep while they looked for work. Given the housing shortage in the Bakken, Reinke's program helped countless men survive the harshness of North Dakota, but it was unpopular with not only his parishioners, but the city at large.

Without spoiling things, the story ends with Reinke's life—and the lives of everyone he knows—torn apart.

I saw The Overnighters last week at the Maysles Cinema in Harlem, and it was one of the most emotionally wracking films I've ever watched. I have a personal connection to the movie: I stayed at the Concordia Lutheran Church two years ago when I was looking for work in North Dakota and knew Jay Reinke well. I ran into director Jesse Moss a few times while he was filming, though I don't appear in the movie; I also spoke to Moss during a Q&A session at the theater.

The Overnighters is a must-see for the simple reason that it shines a spotlight on the most ignored and despised group in modern America: men. Moss probes the suffering and desperation of working-class men who leave their families behind looking to make something of themselves. His film is a unique portrait of the dire straits that these men find themselves in and the lengths they'll go to to survive.

Fear Of A Male Planet

The time I spent in Williston—and at Reinke's church specifically—was one of the most surreal experiences of my life. Every night at nine, Reinke opened up the doors and the church transformed into something resembling an army barracks. Men set up their cots, cooked, played chess, chatted and more before the lights were turned out at eleven. At 6:30 am on the dot, Reinke would wake us up by singing hymns—"The Lord God is my strength and my song, and He has become my salvation!"—as we rushed to clean up the church and get to work.

The tensions surrounding—and within—the Overnighter program were palpable. I once had to help defuse a fight between two overnighters, and Reinke took a lot of heat from the Williston Herald for "harboring" sex offenders, as he believed that everyone deserved a second chance. While I was staying there, the church elders also pressured Reinke to limit the Overnighter program to just 30 men. However, there was a real camaraderie between Reinke and the overnighters, as we shared job tips, went to bible studies and devotions, and tried to give each other a helping hand.

So many men were aided by Reinke's sacrifices—even if they didn't succeed in finding permanent work—that it was astounding. One guy I befriended had come from South Carolina with literally nothing but the clothes on his back, after struggling with meth addiction and homelessness for years. A month of doing temp work in Williston and he had earned enough to buy a computer, cell phone and car. The Concordia Lutheran Church was an oasis of stability for us in the chaos of the oil patch.

The Overnighters captures the atmosphere of the church perfectly. The film follows a number of overnighters (none of whom I knew personally) looking for work, most notably Keith Graves, a truck driver from L.A. and sex offender. Reinke's decision to move Graves into his own home—and Graves' subsequent betrayal of his trust—is just one of the movie's many heartbreaking moments. As one of the film's subjects exclaims, "I came out here to save my family, and it's probably gonna cost me my family."

The Martyrdom Of Jay Reinke

In its depiction of Jay Reinke, The Overnighters also paints a portrait of what it's like to stick to your principles when the whole world is against you.

During my Williston stay, I found Reinke to be difficult to get along with at times. He was egocentric in many ways, had a short temper and was prone to outbursts: for example, he once got into a vicious argument with an overnighter wearing an Obama T-shirt. However, his act of compassion in sheltering us—becoming a pariah and straining his relationship with his wife and children—was something no one else in Williston did, either while I was there or after the overnighter program ended.

More importantly, Reinke never tried to pretend that he was better than us. When I first showed up at the church, he was honest, telling me, "When you came in the door, Matt, I thought the same thing I always do when we get a new overnighter: 'God, not another one.'" It was obvious he was struggling against his own instincts in running the program. It would have been much less painful for Reinke to abandon the overnighters, to take the easy way out, but he never did.

And as Moss reveals in The Overnighters, Reinke's own motivations for running the program were far more complex then anyone could have imagined. Without spoiling things, he reveals a dark secret in the film that was so shocking it made me shout "Oh my God!" out loud. As I said to Moss after the movie, both of us suspected that Reinke was hiding a great burden, but nobody could have guessed that this would be it.

The Death Of The American Dream

The Overnighters also succeeds in other, subtler ways. Moss had a level of access to his subjects that is rare in documentaries: for example, Reinke's dark secret is revealed in what was supposed to be a private conversation with his wife. Another segment of the film shows a fat lady chasing Reinke and Moss off her property at gunpoint. At points during The Overnighters, it almost seemed like Moss's subjects didn't even know he was there.

It's because of all this that The Overnighters is one of the best movies I've seen in years. Even if I didn't have a personal connection to its protagonist, I would have still been moved by the film. It's an affecting depiction of male suffering, redemption, and sacrifice, one that doesn't resort to Manichean morality or hokey cliches. The Overnighters investigates the men and women whose lives are affected by the fracking debate and usually ignored by the media.

The message of The Overnighters, if there is one, comes in a short scene midway through the film. Reinke is listening patiently to a job-seeker discuss his meth addiction, his sexual past, and how he was conceived as a result of his mother's rape. As the man breaks down into tears, Reinke hugs him and tells him, "You and I are more alike than we're different. We both have darkness within us."

Ain't that the truth.

Read More: "Rick & Morty" Shows The Utter Hopelessness Of Modern America

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

A ROK Christmas Benediction From Brother Cui Pertinebit

December 15, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Frequent readers here will recognize the name of Cui Pertinebit, which has appeared here as both a commenter and as the subject of an article. I have received a letter from him, which takes the form of a Christmas benediction to the ROK community. While it is always pleasurable to receive a letter from a friend, that satisfaction is doubled when the sender is a man of learning and sincere devotion to the virtuous arts.

Intelligence and a patient devotion emerge from his words, as a incipient flame gleams from a bed of smoldering coals; and we are warmed by the energy emitted from these embers. His letter begins below. My response appears below the line after his letter. Readers should be aware that in correspondence, Cui uses the name of Augustinus.

Letter of Cui Pertinebit to the ROK Readership

Ut bene valeas hoc in tempore adventus Domini nostri, Augustinus Exiguus

Incipit tractatellus Augustini de Adventu Domini Nostri:

Why We Need A More Masculine Approach to the Spirituality of the Holiday Season

Recently was the beginning of Advent, the period of preparation for Christmas. Now, I'm sure that all the good fellows on ROK have noticed Christmas decorations in stores ever since Halloween or slightly before, and you watch in horror as the season that seemed so merry and bright as a child, has been transformed by feckless, effeminate consumerism into a suitable occasion for Mariah Carey to shake her festive ass at underage youths while hocking the foreign wares of our degenerate overlords. In fact, that reminds me: Advent is the time in the Liturgical year for remembering the Last Judgment!

While we await the much-deserved destruction of the cosmos in a blaze of empyrean glory, you may want to take some tips from our forefathers for keeping the season with a more masculine focus. Much of the information will be of specifically Christian focus, of course, but the principles may be generally applied by all men of good will (peace be upon them).

While the norm, now, is to burn one's self out with a lot of shopping and social events until Christmas Day, when suddenly Christmas is over and the festivities drop off the face of the Earth, the traditional way of preparing for Christmas was to keep a very strict discipline and sober mentality leading all the way up to Christmas, and then to feast very, very merrily for 12 days (until Epiphany, and then moderately for another week after that). I find that this approach keeps the season very happy indeed, without the month of pointless stress and the sudden evaporation of Christmas cheer on December 26th.

As to the sober preparation: the season commemorates both the First and Second Comings of Christ, the first in seeming frailty so as to judge the devil's power and to cast it out of mankind, the second to pass final judgment on all who chose to remain subject to evil despite the offered liberty. As St. Paul points out in the epistle to the Hebrews: if God commanded the death of those who neglected the decrees of God when mere angels ministered the Old Covenant to Moses atop Mt. Sinai, how much greater judgment will overtake those who have trampled the New Covenant with the Son of God underfoot?

One is immediately struck, upon observing many of the oldest traditions and carols, by how they present a lively tension between the themes of mankind's greatest hopes and fears being revealed at once; slavery and liberty, judgment and redemption, fear and hope, all combine. There is a "bright sadness" to many of the oldest carols, which often use musical modes such as the Dorian, that allow "minor" and "major" feels to blend in the carol. The focus of Advent is not one of peace and joy and togetherness, still less of boozy asininity, but rather, the sober mentality which awaits the great manifestation of God with bated breath. The main prayers for the weeks preceding the feast beseech God to "stir up Thy power" and come, they express the anxious expectation of redemption and assistance.

The ascetic discipline becomes more severe from the 13th on (the feast of St. Lucia), and the “Great O Antiphons” begin on the 17th of December (the 16th in the usage of Catholic England); these O Antiphons are solemn hymns upon the Magnificat at Vespers that address God the Almighty Redeemer and Legislator in awe, forming the acrostic “(V)ero Cras,” “truly, I shall come upon you tomorrow.” In Advent, we await the judgment of Christ Incarnate upon our souls, and we recall the liberty, with which He has set us free to be ready for this Second Coming. We thus repent and set ourselves in order, to await His arrival in our midst.

In the season leading up to Christmas, then, let your minds be sober. There is a fast during this season, which traditionally begins on 15th November to mirror the 40 day Lenten Fast before Easter (but the first week of Advent is a good time to start it, as well). Though the Advent Fast is called the Winter Lent, it is not kept quite so strictly as Lent for the first portion. Men who want to discipline themselves to prepare for Christmas in the traditional way, may wish to abstain from meat, eggs and dairy until Christmas itself. Italians may be accustomed to a seafood dinner on Christmas Eve, which is a last vestige of this practice.

Until December 13th, try to wait until 3:00 PM to eat each day, if you can; it you need to eat something early in the day, try to keep it light and not to have a full meal until 3:00 or 6:00 PM. Beginning on the 13th, keep this practice up on every day except Saturday and Sunday (though do observe the Ember Saturday fast after St. Lucia’s day). Pray more at this time; if you can, pray the Divine Office, especially Vespers. Try to favour the carols that look forward to the Advent of our Lord with expectation: Veni, veni Immanuel, The Angel Gabriel, Riu Riu Chiu, etc. If you can convince your friends and family to keep Advent and Christmas this way, you may be able to avoid being invited to too many little parties here and there before Christmas.

If the discipline seems strict before Christmas, it is only so that the Feast itself may seem more joyous: trust me, when you have kept a strict fast like this, even a simple piece of cheese or a bit of beef seems like a morsel fit for a King. When Christmas itself arrives, make as much merry as you can stand, but remember that a little will go a long way, especially at first as you come off of the stricture of the fasting period. Traditionally, the Tree is decorated on Christmas Eve, and is lit upon returning from the Midnight Mass.

Have your favourite foods and observe your favourite traditions. Let the Lamb's Wool, Wassail, Egg Nog, etc., flow freely – don't cheapen your manhood with excess, but feel free to land just an hair on the side of being more merry than is necessary! Try to go to the Midnight Mass – if you are fortunate enough to live someplace where the Three Masses of Christmas are offered, go gladly (provided godless hippies aren't ruining the services). Chant the parts of the Masses and read the readings at home, yourselves, if need be. You're going to keep partying all the way until Epiphany, January 6th. This is when the Magi actually arrived, and many Catholic countries actually exchange gifts then. The Eve of Epiphany, "Twelfth Night," is another night of special mirth and customs.

I respect so many of the chaps at ROK, and I like the focus the site has on general self-improvement. In my opinion, our forefathers kept a better Christmas than we currently do, and so I wanted to share what I considered their chief insight with ROK members: rather than a crash-and-burn, high-stress, low-spirituality skid into the anti-climactic wall of Christmas Day, try instead to keep a mounting expectation and sober discipline until Christmas Day, and then let the joy of the season keep you company for a good long while in low-pressure (and low budget) merriment.

Both in the austere march to the feast, and in the gladsome merriment thereafter (which also has the Feasts of the First Martyr Stephen, the Holy Innocents, the Apostle John, Thomas Becket, the Circumcision of our Lord, the Epiphany, etc.), keep the mind fixed on the spiritual significance of the observations and let these things communicate joys of the highest order to you. Christmas is a time of year when many people stumble around in a deadened, boozy stupor, buying crap while "Jingle Bell Rock" blasts in their ears, only to collapse in depression on December 26th. I have better hopes for the men of ROK.

I wish you all a peaceful and sober Advent, and as joyous a twelve days of Christmas as possible.

Vale.

Response Of Quintus Curtius

Quintus Curtius Augustino fratro amplissimo suo salutem dicit,

I have read your letter here with great interest, and expect that it will be as well received by the community as was our last dialogue. You should know that your favors and counsel here are valued, and their positive reception speaks to the interest that many readers have in matters of spiritual devotion; and although human power is rarely granted except in accord with destiny, we strive to approach the ideals set for us, and let others worry about what will happen.

To exert effort towards these ideals which you speak of is to be privy to some splendid human achievement, one that assures us both reward and sustenance. Let us congratulate ourselves—if we may be so presumptuous—on our shared search for these Divine Principles, a search which infuses our worldly labors, and draws us steadily upwards.

Know, then, that men of whatever station and standing seek out each other, and take comfort in shared goals and struggles; the activity of one inspires the other, and so the progress of man is assured. And let us not forget to be patient with our younger brothers, as the racket and din of inexperience may sometimes overwhelm the voices of Reason. Time and life lived are the two prerequisites for wisdom.

I find the counsel of Angelo Poliziano, when writing to the Bishop of Segni, to be most wise. He said, Amici vitia noveris, non oderis.

This means, as you know: Take note of a friend’s shortcomings, but do not despise them.

Vale.

Read More: A Dialogue With A Pious Monk

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Beware Of The Coming Surveillance State

December 15, 2014 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Looking through old family photo albums, I've noticed an unmistakable trend.

Each generation has more and more snapshots to show off. Of my grandparents, there are only a handful of pictures. Of my parents, there's somewhat more—important occasions like their graduation or their wedding day. When I was 21 my grandmother sent me a thick photo album filled with dozens of baby photos, and I'd say there have to be at least a few hundred photographs of me in existence, many of them on social media.

Then there's the current generation growing up. Half my cousins are busy making babies right now, and rarely does a day go pass I don't see some new photos or video of them posted to Facebook. Anyone can see the increasing prevalence of cheap portable cameras, computers, and hard drives. In just the last fifteen-odd years we've gone from PCs to laptops to tablets to smartphones, but this trend is far from over.

We can only imagine the level of scrutiny our children and grandchildren will be subjected to. Already there are estimated to be as many as six million surveillance cameras in the United Kingdom alone—one for every ten people. But what comes next after a picture-taking smartphone you can carry around in your pocket? Lately there's been talk of Google glasses and watches, but even that won't be the end.

The era of neural implants

Already, we're on the verge of developing implants which can link directly to a person's brain. At the moment the technology is still rudimentary—meant for dealing with certain medical conditions and so on, but mass marketed versions will be coming soon. Already, scientists are developing the technology to scan and read people's thoughts. Such implants would be connected to the internet and capable of constantly recording not just what your brain sees and hears, but perhaps even what it thinks.

To those still skeptical of this future, you simply have to look at the way social media has taken the world by storm in the last few years. South Park already had an episode on this last year. Neural implants would take a similar route.

Initially, they will be something only real "nerds" will be into, like the internet back in the '90s. Then, however, that rich kid down the street gets one, then somebody at your school. You start begging your parents because all the cool kids are getting them. Pretty soon, politicians are calling for implants to be provided for all schoolchildren free of charge.

It won't stop there. Big corporations will spend billions saturating the media with advertising. Customers will stampede through the doors of shopping malls on Black Friday 2030 hoping to snap up the next generation of cyber implants. The dangers of having inserted an all but irremovable tracking device into your body will be dismissed at the time.

Sure, they'll be a few holdouts here and there. Maybe the Mormon Church will come out against them, but within five to ten years this process will be complete, at least here in the west. The rest of the world will take a generation or two to catch up.

The older generation (i.e. us) will complain about the dehumanization of our children as they are changed more than ever into a race of group-thinking zombies, but "health experts" paid off by the government will stress that the implants are safe. Like the internet or a mobile phone today, soon not having an implant will be a serious liability—one employers are hardly going to overlook.

The implications

A one terabyte hard drive can store several hundred hours of video. A thousand terabytes could store a whole lifetime.

If ever-present surveillance truly becomes the norm, this transformation will dramatically affect our day-to-day lives. For our children and grandchildren, this would mean the end of almost all privacy. From infancy to death, every second of their lives could be monitored and stored away for future inspection. Gone are the days of kids playing alone away from the prying eyes of their parents. It could also be the end of sub-cultures where like-minded people can gather and converse in their own private world. Every word they ever utter would be subjected to political correctness.

Eventually, if you live in a major western city, it will be all but impossible to leave your front door without someone in the Department of Homeland Security potentially watching you. Even wearing a full burqa, biometric identification will give you away instantly. We will be told that this intimate knowledge of our thoughts and daily routines is still safe from hackers, but like naked airport scanners, this promise eventually proves hollow. If you value your privacy, moving to the countryside or a non-western country may soon be the best option.

Of course, there may be some positive effects. Our society already seems to have decided that the health and safety benefits of such constant monitoring alone will make it worthwhile—it would be the end of losing your kid in a supermarket. Many would also cite combating crime as a major benefit. Certainly cases of “he-said, she-said” will become rarer, hopefully reducing the number of false rape accusations. Recent examples show that just because something is caught on tape however, doesn’t mean justice will automatically follow.

We all saw the chilling example of the Ray Rice scandal earlier this year. Here we have caught on camera an argument between two people—a man and a women, that escalates to violence. The women initiates physical contact first and is knocked out in retaliation. But who is charged with assault, has their career seriously damaged and their reputation dragged through the mud on national television?

Pictured: An innocent victim minding her own business

The Eric Garner case is worth a mention as well. Here we saw police officers attempting to arrest a man who had apparently committed no crime (unlike the Michael Brown case) and upon meeting resistance placed him in a choke-hold, a nominally banned technique, that eventually killed him despite his pleas for them to stop. This is all on video, yet there was not so much as an indictment. What lesson can we draw from these incidents?

That even in an all-pervasive surveillance state, a women can still get away with assault—and the police can literally get away with murder.

Clearly, a dominant narrative can trump all the evidence in the world. If women are never responsible for violence, then by default it must be the fault of by men, regardless of the circumstances. Recording everything only makes it easier for them to provoke men and have them thrown in jail—a place they languish ten times as often—when they retaliate. Violence, being primarily a weapon of men due to their larger physical size, must be stamped out by every means necessary. Meanwhile deception, emotional manipulation, and shaming—primarily tools of women—are allowed to run rampant in the name of freedom.

We can only hope that cases like these are aberrations, and that this new, Orwellian reality remains beholden to constitutional limits and common sense. I certainly would not trust today's generation of feminists, and the spineless politicians they are so good at cowing, at deciding how to use these emerging technologies sensibly.

Of course in theory either gender could suppress the other, but these days any criticism of feminism will see you shouted down in the mainstream press, no matter how justified. If unchallenged, who knows to what lengths women will go to ensure men are effectively castrated in our society?

So of course certain groups, women foremost among them, will support the surveillance state. In a society that refuses to judge them, and thus where they can do no wrong—what do they have to fear?

Read More: You're A Monster If You Don't Support The Welfare State

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

5 Reasons Why I No Longer Date Black Women

December 16, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

As a military kid, I was fortunate to live a lot of different places at a young age. Before I was 18 I'd lived in nine different states and had been to many more. After college I continued my nomad-like existence before finally settling down on the west coast.

An obvious benefit of having lived in all four corners of the U.S. is the opportunity to meet and date many different kinds of women. I use the word "different" loosely because the older I got, the more I realized that from sea to shining sea, American women are pretty much the same, though it took me until about five years ago to accept it. Location and upbringing creates a few differences between them, but by and large, chicks that are born and raised in the states are clones as far as sexual interaction goes.

However, the element that makes more of an impact than others is race. For example, in my experience white girls tend to be much more sexually open and experimental (they do it all), Latinas are fiery, passionate, and embrace their femininity more than most, and aesthetically speaking Asian women are among the thinnest across the board.

Most people who are honest with themselves know that black women have the lowest SMV of any female in the western hemisphere and maybe even the world. Plenty of men out there have a taste for them but the cruel reality of natural selection all but weeds them out of just about every pool of men with options.

I've dated my fair share of black girls, but after I became unplugged I find that I rarely game them unless they are an exquisite specimen, and even then I tread very carefully. This was not a conscious choice. It was just a natural progression in my development. The more my game level improved, the less attractive they became. These days they're practically invisible to me.

There's a laundry list of reasons my attraction to black women has dwindled over the course of my crimson capsule evolution and I could probably write a five-part series on it. Instead I'll just give you my top five reasons I prefer to leave them alone.

5. Their infatuation with name brands

I once dated a girl who had a $300 Michael Kors diaper bag for her kid, a $250 Louis Vuitton purse with a matching $125 wallet, and $200 Gucci sunglasses. How do I know what she paid for them? She reminded me every chance she got and did so loudly and proudly.

I've got no problem with someone spending a little extra coin on things they won't compromise on. We all do it and that's okay. But living that far above your means is ridiculous. Most girls like to have nice things, but black women are slaves to the almighty label and will make sure they get them at all costs…literally.

Black girls sell their souls for this stuff

They wouldn't be caught dead at the club without the latest Steve Madden heels or with a man rocking an off-brand shirt he bought at Target for 50% off. Accusations of such treachery from her peers are a slap in the face as far as she's concerned.

Truth be told, I got tired of the daily label checks making sure I was wearing name brand this or that, as though I would shame the family name by sporting a generic pair of jeans I picked up at the thrift store. Plus, dating chicks whose tw0-year-old's Jordans cost more than my ratty old skateboard shoes, and being reminded of it, while humorous, gets old. Chalk it up to ego and common sense.

4. Their extreme sluttiness

I know, I know. Most girls in this country are sluts. I get it. But black chicks are the undisputed queens of slutdom and it's not even close. This, like a lot of reckless female behavior, probably falls into the lack of self worth category.

Sisters are well aware of the fact that they're at the bottom of the sexual food chain. For a woman this can be one hell of a mind job so it stands to reason (albeit a very bad one) they'd go to extremes to validate their sexual allure but that's not my problem.

"But SharpShooter, if they have such limited options who's banging them and why?"

Good questions.

1. It's a known fact in the 'sphere that 6s and 7s are far sluttier than 8s and 9s because of their sexual insecurities. They feel the need to consistently prove to themselves and everyone else they are desirable as women so they sleep with more men. This principle crosses all racial boundaries.

2. Though they don't often attract men outside of their race, there is a surplus of black suitors available who are more than willing to take advantage of their promiscuity, which increases their notch counts. The supply is diminishing by the day, but as of right now there are plenty of hungry (and thirsty) diners at the buffet.

Still ain't buyin' it, eh? Fair enough but check this out:

I was as beta as beta gets through my twenties but banging black girls was like taking candy from a baby. I had zero game to speak of, yet I regularly fell ass backward into their panties quite easily. If they were giving it up to losers like me there's no telling how many others dudes have easily slipped by their velvet ropes and pounded their dance floors.

All of us here know that most chicks in this cesspool of a sexual market are more than liberal with their goodies. That said, I'll take the lesser of two evils and fuck sluts over petri dishes.

3. Just about all of them have kids

Being a slut has consequences—namely, children. Every single black women I've dated, banged, or whatever else had children. All of them. To make matters worse a lot of them have a lot more than just one or two. One night you'll see them shaking their asses at the club, the next you see them at the market buying formula with five kids in tow.

During the five or six year window I hooked up with black girls I found that this affliction didn't discriminate in the least. The good looking, the average looking, the chubsters (more on that later), the clubbers, the church goers, the employed, the unemployed, the slutty, the "snowflakes" (who, of course have only slept with their six baby daddies and nobody else) all had children. Shit, even the educated ones with great jobs, nice cars, and living in nice neighborhoods who seemed to have their act together had a few whipper snappers running around.

It's all fun and games… …until your life ends up like this

I can hear the SWJs with their white guilt excuses now: "Studies show that Caucasian women have more access to birth control and abortion clinics than do African American women because of [insert bullshit economical breakdown], so they give birth to more children, thus….blah blah blah."

Look, I can't speak to whether that's true or not but I do know this: birth control is the cheapest and most accessible it has ever been in history. Their finances may or may not be limited, but surely they can pony up the change in their designer bags to avoid baggage that decreases their value as long-term partners.

I'm fairly certain that not every black woman out there has children, but finding childless sisters is about as easy as nailing jell-o to a tree. Good luck with that.

2. Their obesity rate

It's an open secret that black women lead the league in FG% (fat girl percentage). The PC media will blame this on targeted marketing of fast food, lack of nutritional options and education, lower income, or any number of excuses designed to take the focus away from personal discipline and responsibility but their excess body weight is a product of their laziness and lack of drive, as is the case with anyone who is grossly overweight.

The whole "Big and Beautiful" movement isn't fooling anyone either—including the women who spew this trash. They know good and well that no man with a healthy sexual desire is looking in their direction for that kind of action. Deep down they know men aren't into women with a disproportionate amount of "curves."

This is an obvious facade to feel better about themselves while stuffing their faces with sugary high-carb deserts while hopelessly fantasizing about the Just Wright scenario happening to them. Their beds are as cold as the days are long, and pretending they're not won't change that.

[image]

They might be attractive if they lost 100+ lbs each

Black girls aren't the first choice of the vast majority of men out there as it is, and their overweight percentages only shrinks their already depleted number of bangable women.

1. They're not feminine

This is by far the single most unattractive trait black women possess. Dealing with your typical self-proclaimed "strong black woman" is a huge pain in the ass and just not worth the sexual exchange.

Most western girls foolishly believe that acting like a man is attractive to men. Black women are no different but they take it to another level. They exude so much masculinity it overshadows any and all desirable qualities that may work in their favor. They want to project strength but their undisguised mannish tendencies are boner killers.

More and more black men are adopting this mindset

Men don't want to date women who act like men no matter how many God awful Tyler

Perry movies endorse this myth. The bottom line is that most black girls just aren't feminine. If they embraced femininity like their Latina counterparts they might actually surprise themselves with the growing amount of positive attention they start getting from the public in general, including men.

One comment on a blog I read a while back summed this up pretty accurately:

> We don't want strong black women, we want hot and feminine black women!

Couldn't have said it better myself.

In Closing…

I'd love to slay hot black ass on the regular but it's slim pickings out there. The sisters out there that do pass the boner test have way too much baggage to consider even putting them in fuck buddy status. Their overt masculinity also takes them completely out of the running for an ONS. It's sad to say but I've come to a point in my life where I've realized they're just not worth pursuing anymore.

I suppose they could raise their collective SMV enough to become a viable option for men other than thirsty simps, but it would take a generational mind shift of epic proportions. Though they have their deficiencies, there are plenty of changes they could make to maximize their desirability.

However, the odds of black women (or any American woman for that matter) changing their ways are exceedingly long. Their mentality and the environments they create for themselves are two roadblocks they simply do not have the knowledge or resolve to overcome. I'll pass.

Read Next: Why Do Black Women Love Scandal?

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

The Best Indirect Ways To Question A Woman's Past

December 16, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

The first article on this subject talked about directly asking a woman about her past. While I acknowledge that the direct method is my chosen way of doing things nowadays, I also understand that my chances for being lied to are the greatest with that technique. I'm perfectly fine with that because I'm very good at recognizing when someone is a bullshitter.

I realize that some guys are just getting their feet wet in the relationship and dating world, so their bullshit detector might not be up to speed. Additionally, the direct method can ruin a relationship even if things have been going quite well. Some guys might want to keep banging the chick in question and not put an end to good times, but also want to keep themselves from becoming emotionally attached to damaged goods.

This article will focus on some techniques that are more subtle and more effective, but will come at the expense of your time. That's basically the trade-off: going direct saves you time, but going these routes will increase your chances of procuring something closer to the truth. It's important to understand that most women are going to lie about this shit, it's just how they roll. Chances are pretty good that you'll never know the exact number, but these techniques will give you a better chance at obtaining a ballpark figure.

Do Your Research

I've personally never dated a woman that didn't have a Facebook account or some form of social media. It would be nice to meet one that doesn't and finds the whole social media scene to be a joke, but any attractive woman under the age of 28 isn't going to pass up the chance to get as much attention as she can. And when it comes to attention, Facebook is the place to get it.

This is a good thing for your research, though. Most women have been on there for several years and don't remove old pictures. In many cases, just perusing a woman's Facebook page for a few minutes will tell you everything you need to know, and you won't have to bother asking about her past. Here are a few of the things you will want to look for:

Vacations with girlfriends or traveling alone

Especially to countries like Australia, UK, Ireland, Spain, Italy, and France. If the countries she visited are known for having dudes with cool accents or high attractiveness, then she has fucked a ton of them, guaranteed. So if you spot pictures of your girl in front of the Sydney Opera House, the Eiffel Tower, or Piccadilly Circus—then you know her pussy got stamped right along with her passport.

Pictures falling into this group also include those from extended backpacking trips or periods of time spent studying abroad—regardless of location. Also, if she's made trips down to Mexico or Panama City, Florida for spring break—then you can bet your ass that she serviced a few peckers while she was there.

Getting shit-faced at bars, clubs, or college parties

No explanation is really required here. If she's holding a cocktail in all of her pictures, then she was probably holding a cock later in the evening. Included in this group is all the usual stuff like whorish facial expressions, posing with a bunch of dudes or slutty friends, or bragging about how she's going to get "so fucked up this weekend."

She’s new in town.

A lot of women will relocate to a new city if they’ve burned too many bridges or have a terrible reputation in their previous location. I’ve met a lot of women who have said, “I just moved here because I wanted a fresh start.” It usually turned out that these women were trying to escape something or someone from their past. This isn’t always the case, but it’s something to pay attention to if it comes up.

Tons Of Guy Friends

If she has a lot of guy friends on her page, then that’s a huge red flag. Some of them have most likely fucked her before, and the ones that haven’t fucked her are just waiting for their chance to try. Once the “new car smell” of your relationship wears off, the chances are greatly increased that one of those guys will eventually succeed in their efforts. Avoid any kind of emotional attachment to these broads at all costs.

Check Local Police and Sheriffs Websites

Run your girl's name through the mugshot database for any cities, towns, or counties she's lived in. I don't give a shit what a woman was arrested for—if the broad has a fucking mugshot on the internet that anyone can see, then she's not worthy of your time.

Now, if your online efforts to gain any solid information turn up little or nothing, then it's time to go for it in person. Never ask about any of this shit through text messages or on the phone. She needs to be in front of you so you can judge all of her reactions, body language, and mannerisms. You don't want her to have any time to think things through so she can come up with perfect answers. With that in mind, let's examine the most effective way to pry into her past.

Appearing Non-Judgmental

In the infancy of a new relationship, things are usually really good. Most encounters are light-hearted, fun, and exciting. If the sex is good, then that amplifies things even more. You can use all of this to your advantage by nonchalantly bringing up how good she is in bed, or mentioning some of the crazy shit you've done in your past to see if she will try to match your experiences. The goal is to get her to open up a bit and divulge enough information for you to draw a reasonable conclusion about her past.

You can't come across as being judgmental—if you do, you're going to fuck yourself over. You need to feign excitement over her slutty ways and somewhat questionable past. Give her the impression that whatever she has done to other cocks is just fine and dandy. Here are some basic questions that are usually effective.

Has she ever made out with another girl? Bi-sexual girls are fine for fuck buddies, but they're a completely disgusting proposition for a long-term relationship. If she's dyked out in any way—she's done.

What was the duration of her longest relationship? If a woman is 24 years old and her longest relationship lasted six months—then you know the score; especially if she has four years of college behind her.

Is she still friends with any of her ex-boyfriends or fuckbuddies? If she is—then she's not to be taken seriously. Zero tolerance policy is in full effect across the board with that shit. If a woman is in a relationship with you, yet she still has no problem talking with a guy whose dick she used to suck—then she's a disrespectful piece of shit. She can find an "open minded" guy that thinks "it's so cool" that she's still friends with her ex's—because this close minded motherfucker right here will tolerate none of that nonsense. I suggest you adopt the same kind of attitude (if you haven't already).

Ask if she was a party girl or if she's is—or was—a heavy drinker. Drugs, alcohol, and cock all go hand in hand with one another when it comes to women.

Ask about her views on abortion and politics. Liberal views generally means liberal leg spreading.

None of these questions are very threatening, and her answers will give you some key insights into how she has approached life. I suggest asking about this stuff after you've been out a few times and have slept together. It would also help if the two of you had a couple of drinks and you're both in good moods at the time of questioning.

Clandestine Measures

Instead of going to the source, you go to those surrounding her. This can be a great resource if you play your cards right. I've never met a woman that was a loner—they always have a social circle. Chances are solid that your girl will want you to meet and interact with these people at some point.

It can be difficult to pinpoint who will give you the most information. In general, you will want this person to be somewhat neutral in their feelings towards both you and your girl.

Meaning, someone that knows your girl rather well, but doesn't consider her a close friend. Here are some potential targets within her social group that you can try to win over.

The Ugly One

Single out the most unattractive girl in her social group and charm the shit out of her. Hopefully, the girl you're dating is attractive (she should be). If that's the case, then she has some haters within her group—guaranteed. Women hate each other, even when they're friends. The ugly one will most likely hate her the most. Befriend this woman and let her spill the beans.

The One That Wants To Fuck You

This could also be the ugly one, but not necessarily. This particular woman might be interested in sabotaging your current relationship so she can have you instead. If that's the case, then she'll tell you all sorts of info about the girl your currently with. Judge what this one says carefully because she might be talking shit about your girl only to make herself look good.

Co-Workers

Your girl may be on friendly terms with these people, but at the end of the day co-workers are competition. Use this to your advantage and pump them for information if the opportunity arises. Women tend to complain about their co-workers, yet still hang out with them for drinks and other gatherings.

Who does your girl complain about the most at work? Who does she call a bitch? Was she friends with someone, but they had a falling out? Don't naturally assume your girl is a little angel at the office—she's probably a catty pain in the ass just like all women. Make mental notes when she complains about certain people, then make it a point to talk to them.

Boyfriends Within The Group

If there are some cool guys in her circle of friends—find some common interests with them and arrange to hang out with no women around. When it's just the guys, you can speak openly with one another and fish around for valuable information.

In Closing

Do your homework. As the old saying goes, "All is fair in love and war," and I completely agree with that. What's the worst thing a woman can do? Get mad at you and throw around accusations about how you don't trust her? Fuck her. Of course you don't trust her. You don't trust anyone until they've been thoroughly vetted and proven that they deserve it. Who the hell deserves instant trust? No one that I can think of.

Good women are hard to come by, and chances are very high that any woman you meet is going to be a turd in one way or another—always assume this is the case until proven otherwise. If you think you've found one of the rare good ones, then do everything in your power to verify.

If you've been with a woman for a few years and are considering moving in together or—God fucking help you—getting married, then I would suggest you hire a private investigator and have him look into her past for you. He'll be cheaper than a divorce lawyer and you can save yourself a lot of headaches in the long run.

Read More: How To Question A Woman's Past

A.V. Yader
A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

A Police Officer Shares His Personal Experiences With False Rape Claims

December 16, 2014 | by A "Nihilist" Frank | Link | Original Link

Preface

It seems that there has been a lot of attention in the mainstream media these past few weeks regarding—how do I put this delicately—less than credible rape allegations. Between the recent Bill Cosby allegations, the Lena Dunham claim, the Lady GaGa claim, and the Rolling Stone UVA frat rape story falling apart, the topic of rape–and false rape–has recently captured the headlines.

Now the issue of false rape allegations is nothing new to those of us in the manosphere, but as we all know, this topic will never be covered fairly or accurately by the liberal mainstream media. Therefore, it is our duty in the manosphere to continue to bring attention to this issue, as well as to educate other men out there about the dangerous cultural climate in which we are living. As such, I would like to offer my own insights and experience with this particular issue, based on a decade in law enforcement.

Before I begin though, I'd like to state that REAL rape is a terrible and inexcusable crime, and any traditionally masculine and honorable law-abiding man should agree with this statement. Real rapes can and do occur, and they should be investigated and punished accordingly. There is no excuse for forcible non-consensual sexual activity. With that caveat out of the way, this article is not about real rape or sexual assault, but rather my insight and experience with false allegations.

College

I have a good friend to thank for being the first one to open my eyes to what would eventually become an epidemic over the next two decades, and for perhaps feeding me my first dose of the "red pill" (and also for introducing me to the Canadian "Space Moose" comics, which so aptly made fun of the feminist movement on college campuses back in the late 90s). Prior to a conversation with this friend back during our freshman year of college, I had never heard or even thought about the issue of false rape claims. Despite having always been politically conservative, I had still been completely "blue" to that reality until then.

I don't recall exactly how we got on the topic, but I distinctly remember discussing with him how easily a girl could cry rape in college, and how liberals and feminists were expanding and redefining the definitions of "rape" and "sexual assault." We talked about how self-reported surveys were then subliminally leading women into believing that they were victims of rape because of these expanded definitions, thereby skewing any real and meaningful statistical data. We also discussed how rape and sexual assault, as legal definitions and criminal statutes, had essentially been hijacked and expanded by the feminist rape movement to basically include any kind of awkward, drunken, or regrettable consensual sexual encounter.

We went on to discuss various scenarios, like how a girl can go to a bar or a party, get black-out drunk, have irresponsible but consensual drunken sex, and then claim that she was "roofied" or drugged when she can't remember anything the next morning. We discussed how today, any kind of awkward but well-meaning sexual advance, any consensual hook-up that is regretted weeks later, any consensual drunken hook-up, any irresponsible but consensual sexual encounter, and basically any other kind of benign sexual encounter that somehow makes a girl feel uncomfortable or remorseful, can now constitute rape or sexual assault in the minds of feminists and brainwashed college girls.

Hell, we even discussed how unintentionally making a girl feel uncomfortable or "creeped out" without even coming on to her can now be construed as sexual harassment or stalking in the minds of a brainwashed college girl.

After that conversation with my friend, all of the other liberal brainwashing about "rape" and "rape culture" on campus started coming into context, and began making sense to me. All of the lectures and propaganda about the extremely dubious statistic of "1 in 4," or that traditional masculinity and college football promotes the "rape culture" on campus, or that college fraternities are nothing more than "rape factories," as well as the fervor of the "take back the night" movement, were all put into their appropriate context, thanks to that conversation with my friend.

Throughout my college years in the Marxist humanities department, or as I jokingly liked to say, the college of humanism and secular socialism, I was able to read between the lines and see the ulterior motives of the "rape" movement. I had always been skilled at rhetorically and intellectually picking apart and destroying progressive ideology, but now thanks to my friend, I was also intellectually aware of the feminist rape movement.

I can distinctly recall a specific debate that I had with a female student in a sociology class, while we were discussing the topic of date rape and frat parties. The specific premise that we were discussing was how frat parties were designed and intended solely to get girls drunk, and then take advantage of them. I stood up and played devil's advocate to this premise, and I made the point that if girls know this is true, then why go.

At that point, an angry female student stood up and essentially stated "what, we're not allowed to have fun," while also insinuating that I was somehow "victim blaming" simply for asking why any rational girl would knowingly go to a place that had just five minutes prior been referred to as a "rape factory."

This anecdote illustrates the "no responsibility or consequences for actions" mindset that is being instilled in the minds of the college girls. Sure, you can go out and party recklessly all you want, and if something consensual happens while you're intoxicated, or that you later regret, go ahead and cry foul. Have your cake and eat it too.

Law Enforcement

I made it through college and survived the Marxist brainwashing of my liberal arts major, and went on to become a cop. I work for a large department in a large metro area, but I rarely deal directly with college kids. Therefore, the following experiences do not specifically involve the college crowd, and illustrates how the false rape mindset is no longer confined to just college campuses. I will again state that real rape and sexual assault is a terrible crime, and I swore an oath to ethically and dutifully investigate these matters, following proper procedures and protocols, and I take that matter seriously.

I will begin with a recent story. A few months ago, we responded to a large house party of kids—late teens and early 20s. Cars were lining the streets of the neighborhood and drunk kids were stumbling around all over the place, so we had gotten a lot of complaints about it. Multiple officers arrived, and we located the house having the party.

As we were clearing the party—yes, being a buzzkill adult is awful I know—I located an intoxicated male and female engaged in intercourse in a—how shall I say—very less than private location. Both were so intoxicated, that they did not even notice my presence when I asked them what the hell they thought they were doing. I had to physically separate the two, pulling the young man aside while two female officers helped the woman get dressed.

Initially, I was simply going to charge both of them with lewd conduct for their very public display, but while I was dealing with the man, the woman stated to the two female officers that this was a non-consensual encounter, and that she did not know the man.

That statement of course changed everything, and we began the proper procedure for that kind of investigation. We were all extremely skeptical about the matter, due to the blatantly public area in which this occurred, but nevertheless, there are still procedures to follow. The man and woman were both formally questioned, and it turned out that they did in fact know each other, were very good friends, the sex was consensual, and the woman lied because she was cheating on her boyfriend and also did not want to get in trouble with the police.

The man did not end up getting charged, but unfortunately neither did the woman, a matter which was not in my hands.

This incident brought up a conversation with my supervisors a few days later. We were discussing the topic of false rape claims, and all of us were racking our brains trying to think of one incident that we could recall of an adult rape claim being real. This was a combined total of roughly 50 years of law enforcement experience, both patrol and investigations, and between us we could only think of one example involving adults off the top of our heads.

Sadly, we could all recall plenty of real abuse and molestation cases involving children, but few with adults. This is again not to say that they have not happened, just that the actual crime of forcible rape in our experience was extremely rare. What did however stand out in our minds, were the many instances of claims that turned out to be blatantly false. I have also spoken with many female officers and detectives on this issue, and they also have very similar experiences.

In my experience, I have investigated many different rape cases that ultimately turned out to be false, with some common reasons behind the initial claim. I have seen multiple instances of a girl claiming rape after she was caught, or about to be caught, cheating on a boyfriend.

I have seen a girl cry rape to avoid getting in trouble for being out past her curfew, which would have violated her probation.

I have seen a girl from a religious ethnicity claim rape after getting pregnant through consensual sex, in an attempt to avoid the stigma of an out-of-wedlock pregnancy.

I have investigated the rape claim of a girl at a house party, which ultimately turned out to be nothing more than regrettable drunken party sex.

And finally, I have seen multiple examples of false claims stemming from mental illness, psychosis, and delusions on the part of the woman, with various motivations behind such claims. In my experience, I can personally attest to many of the examples listed in the A Voice For Men article "13 reasons women lie about rape".

The overwhelming majority of these cases ended with an admission of lying on the part of the victim, after her story fell apart under standard questioning and scrutiny. Others, much like the Lena Dunham claim, end with the victim refusing to admit that she is lying when confronted with scrutiny, but ultimately choosing not to pursue prosecution, and requesting to discontinue the investigation. Other cases fall apart once it is clear that the victim is psychotic, her story is not credible, and there is no probable cause to charge. A very small percentage of these cases end simply because there is no evidence or probable cause to arrest and charge.

The good news is that in my experience, I have not seen a man wrongfully charged. This is not to say that it can't happen—because we all know that it can—but generally police and investigators are intelligent and ethical enough to sort through the interviews, the evidence, and ultimately the PC for a charge.

Regardless of your opinion on the police, we are not intentionally looking to charge an innocent man if there is absolutely no evidence to do so. We want to find the truth. Yes, it can happen, and it is a great injustice to us all if it does, but it is not the norm or intentional. Ideally, the system is designed to allow some guilty to go free, if that adds greater protection to ensure that the innocent are not convicted.

Yet sometimes it is not up to the police, as we saw with the Duke Lacrosse case. Sometimes an overzealous DA can pursue a false case simply for his own political gain. It is for this exact reason that we must educate men on this issue.

Another unfortunate reality is that the false accusers are also rarely charged. Rarely do they suffer a consequence for their false allegations. The reasons behind this are obvious, and stem from political pressure and the politically correct notion that we must not intimidate real victims from coming forward.

I can say wholeheartedly that I disagree with this, but it goes way above my head. Sickeningly, you have people such as Zerlina Maxwell advocating that the word of rape accusers should automatically be taken as truth. I'm sorry Zerlina, but we still have something called due process, evidence, and probable cause. If she is concerned with the authorities being skeptical of rape accusers, there is no one to blame but the false accusers crying wolf. They are the ones who have forced many of us, not only law enforcement, to question the validity of such accusations.

Putting It All together

With the feminist false rape narrative once primarily attributed to college campuses now spilling out into the general public, what is the intended purpose behind this culture script? Perhaps the main motivation is to continue to promote the false narrative of an epidemic of women being victimized.

By continuing to perpetuate that women are helpless victims, feminists and various other social justice warrior activists can continue to request money, government funding, and federal grants for their various centers, organizations, and non-profits. Another key reason is that feminists can continue to redefine—i.e. kill—traditional masculinity, by deeming it barbaric, dangerous, and threatening towards women, in that it produces the "rape culture."

Ironically, these are some of the same feminists and progressives that are teaching and encouraging young women in college to go out and explore their sexuality without inhibition, and to be promiscuous. They are teaching lectures and seminars on how to have better sex, while passing out condoms and sex toys to students, all the while continuing to expand and redefine the act of rape if this exploration ever becomes uncomfortable or regrettable.

They are encouraging young girls to "hook up,", while referring to men's promiscuity as "rape culture." Now I am in no way implying that anyone ever deserves to be raped, nor am I implying that non-consent is ever justified because "she was asking for it," but I am simply pointing out the blatant double standard that feminists are promoting.

We are ultimately creating n environment where women no longer have to feel responsible for their actions. Instead, they are being encouraged to go out and have irresponsible casual sex, but also to cry rape if they regret it later. Take it from me—I've seen it firsthand.

Read More: 3 Signs She's Making A False Rape Accusation

A "Nihilist" Frank
Frank is a nihilistic, misanthropic, politically-incorrect, cynical-asshole, intellectual, metal-head, weightlifter, conservative-Libertarian, Generation X'er. His observations and opinion of modern society and culture is far from flattering. His essays can be found at www.nihilisttemple.com

5 Easy Ways To Fight The American Fatocalypse

December 16, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Obesity is running rampant in the United States of 'Murica. While our southern neighbors in Mexico are now statistically part of the fattest nation on Earth, we have a hell of a long way to go in order to shake our international reputation as a country full of unattractive and wobbling land whales.

This article will identify five ways that the people of the United States can be encouraged to ditch their spare tires, and I encourage them to heed as much of this advice as possible. For while it won't exactly turn you (or society at large) into gym-fit personalities, it will spare you from the damnation of ever having to get around Wal-Mart on an electric scooter out of necessity, rather than on your own two feet.

1. Fat Shaming

Only in the United States of America is the attitude towards confronting morbid obesity so out of whack with the rest of the planet. People are actually applauded for working around their obesity problems (e.g. with "reaching brooms" or "rags on sticks") rather than attacking the root cause of their condition. That is, getting absolutely zero physical exertion and having a horrendously unhealthy diet.

Why be motivated to actually get off your fat ass and do something about it, when 60 Minutes or some other prime time television rag might come over to your house and do some "inspirational" story about how you're "overcoming adversity" or some other lame spiel like that?

We have to put a stop to unconditional fat acceptance. Fat shaming is an excellent way to motivate people into changing their habits for the good of their own health, appearance, mortality, and to lessen the burden on our (literally) overstretched health care system. People have very little incentive to get back into shape if society leads them to believe that all of their beauty is “on the inside.” That’s just something ugly people and Feminists say (and we all know they are both two peas in a pod).

And to all the people who think that fat shaming is akin to “bullying,” I encourage everyone to congratulate and express admiration to former fat persons and people who are making genuine strides towards waistline redemption. People who are motivated, work hard, and have the fortitude to stick with an effective exercise and diet regime deserve high praise. But until then…

2. Eat Fresh, Never Frozen

The United States of America is king of the world when it comes to effortless (lazy) meal preparation. Go into any major U.S. supermarket except for the two healthier chains (Whole Foods and Trader Joe’s) and there is aisle-after-aisle-after-aisle of frozen foodstuffs which are meant to be nuked in the microwave for a couple of minutes, and the rest is history.

But any product that wants to market itself as cheap and easy, is usually hiding something very undesirable behind all the positive advertising. Frozen foods in the United States tend to have sky-high levels of sodium if the calorie and saturated fat count is low, and high calorie and fat levels if the sodium is comparatively low.

The foodstuffs are also jam-packed with chemicals and other additives which are never to be found in the pantries of any self-respecting home cook. Unfortunately, your body just can't win when confronted with these so-called "frankenfoods." And yes, that includes the Lean Cuisine meals which pile on the added salt and chemicals.

Make your food fresh. Besides, nobody wants to eat scabby lasagna that came from a frozen dinner.

3. Stop The Pop (And Fries Too)

Carbonated drinks and french fries are the two most common side items at most well known American fast food chains and even at a lot of restaurants. For people who order a full meal at these establishments, they are often forced upon you with no other alternatives to choose from. And they are absolutely terrible for your health.

Sugary drinks and thin-cut french fries are nothing but nutritionally bankrupt empty calories which are jam packed with sugar and salt. Do you want a quick ticket to weight gain and a fatal premature coronary at 55? Just keep this sort of diet up, my friend.

Cut out the fries completely and always order water instead of any sort of pop. It's the primary ingredient of life itself, and it often costs nothing to order while soda has grossly inflated prices compared to its material costs.

As for the main dish in a classic American meal, the good ol' burger, it actually has far more nutritional value than most people would like to give it credit for. A good quality burger at In-N-Out or Smash Burger, which has a great cut of beef with plenty of fresh lettuce, tomato, onion, cheese, and irresistible seasoning and sauces, is damn good eating. It's filling, has plenty of protein, and you've got the basic food groups covered in one package just short of fruit.

Just avoid any over-the-top bacon and beef burgers which completely lack any vegetable matter, like that "Baconator" monstrosity at Wendy's. Anything similar to the "good morning burger" from an old episode of The Simpsons should also be treated in the same manner. Like a 21st century marriage, you should stay away from it.

4. Avoid Anything Distinctly "American"

This includes a variety of monstrous concoctions that just about every other country on Earth considers to either be too over-the-top, or just outright disgusting, to have on their supermarket shelves and restaurant menus. Think cheese-in-a-can (EZ cheese), the Wendy's "Baconator" sandwich, bacon-flavored sundaes, any kind of gimmicky children's breakfast cereal, and the classic culprit "American Cheese."

Seriously, if what you see on a U.S. supermarket shelf has a closely-related counterpart in Europe or Australia (with the added bonus of not having HFCS and other chemical crap), that is probably a good sign. That's because they certainly do not stock "American Cheese."

The "American Cheese" as we know it today is fattening manufactured garbage which contains whey protein concentrate, saturated oils, emusifiers, salt, and an amount of actual cheese which can be left completely ambiguous to the consumer. Because its manufacturing process differs from unprocessed cheeses, American cheese can not be legally sold under the authentic name of “cheese” even in the US.

Finally, while Philly cheese steaks, New York or Chicago-style pizza, and “soul food” are certainly more real (and tastier) regional food items, they are no magic ticket to weight loss either. Save it for a special occasion or whenever you make a pilgrimage to those distinctive enclaves.

Blind patriotism has a penalty. As you can see, Captain ‘Murica exhibits the unfortunate results of overeating distinctly American foods such as American cheese, corn dogs, and big gulps.

5. Get Out Of The United States

This is certainly the most costly option and is not applicable to people who are tied to commitments like their careers, education, relationships, children, or property. However, it is without doubt an effective, and almost effortless, weight loss treatment in it’s own right.

Honestly, when you leave American society, your mind and emotions begin to become unclouded. Your actions and thoughts begin to correct themselves. When you don’t watch the horse manure on TV, eat the chemical-encrusted fast food, or listen to the brain dead music on the radio, slowly but surely your “hip hop” programming begins to wear off.

Your taste buds change. Even the smell of your skin. You can feel yourself getting healthy. You’re gradually losing some desired poundage even though you’re not doing any particular hard exercise. That’s what happens when you are set free from high fructose corn syrup, aspartame, and all the other industrial food poisons which just about every society on Earth (other than the United States) has figured out they are much better off without.

So just get north of the 38th parallel, south of the Rio Grande, or somewhere over the North Pacific and North Atlantic oceans. It can be a weight loss miracle cure waiting to happen.

Read More: 3 Ways To Fight Back Against The Feminist Tidal Wave

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

The Value Of Self-Knowledge

December 16, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"We come to knowledge when we come to life."

—Wallace Stevens

"A man goes far to find out what he is."

—Theodore Roethke

So long as the sun rises, human misery abounds. The self-help and psychiatry industries are therefore thriving, for trite books and yuppie dope now stand in for religion, the earnest practice of which is too demanding for most 21st century team members. (It's not as if there's a great lack of belief here in the US.)

Yet to be sure, that one person should turn to another for guidance is not in itself a bad thing. I glance at my library, for example, and behold the magnificent works of hundreds of Great Dead White European (and American) Males: Plato, Aristotle, Epictetus, Seneca, Machiavelli, Montaigne, Pascal, Spinoza, Samuel Johnson, Burke, Hume, Schopenhauer, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, Nietzsche, Freud, Carlyle, Ruskin, Emerson, Thoreau, William James, and many more.

How much I have learned from them! Most men define themselves by doing things that any number of other men can do. That can't be said for the greatest minds and writers. They teach, or reveal, what we would not know without them. I would be much more ignorant of human life if it wasn't for these immortal names on my shelves.

All of the men in my list, in their various ways, were concerned with that timeless and incomparably difficult question: How should I live? It is a question that, if it matters to me, only I can answer for me. For however much I may learn from the great dead, or even from some of the living here in our glittering dark age, I am still a unique person, with his own history, his own problems, his own anguish. I alone have access to the content of my consciousness.

Thus it is certain that no one can look into me as penetratingly as I myself can, provided that I am up to the task. It is certain that no one can understand me as well as I myself can, provided I try to know myself. What I must do is to ponder myself and the world around me, while I am instructed by the works of the great minds of the past who did the same, and then apply what I find to the strange and difficult endeavor of living.

Not everyone does this today. In love with convenience, and in deeper love with delusion, many people now turn to watered-down wisdom and to the often problematic medications of psychiatrists. Is there not something very sad about so many of us turning to others (and their drugs) in order to know how to live? Have most of us looked deeply enough into ourselves?

Perhaps not. For self-knowledge is a test of character. It takes a certain fearlessness to be utterly honest with yourself. We are, all of us, subject to terrible thoughts, feelings, and beliefs. We sometimes have quite immoral motives. And it is painful to see these aspects of our nature. As with the sight of a rotting corpse, we'd rather look away.

Most people, when told they have done something wrong, react, at least at first, by putting a kind of convenient spin on things: they didn't really do this or that, we are told; or, whatever happened didn't happen quite like that; the point here being to shirk responsibility. And yet, human beings owe each other criticism. A friend or family member who is living in such a way as to harm himself or others deserves to be reproached.

And so it is with ourselves. If we have any sense of dignity—if, in other words, we value ourselves—then we need to be exacting and unsparing in our self-analysis. But, just as many people, in their relations with others, distort the truth in order to avoid the pain of it, so too they are not unflinching when it comes to looking into themselves: their view is only partial, their bad aspects ignored.

We must employ discriminating caution in our efforts to acquire self-knowledge. It is true that the mind, in its inclination to avoid pain, has a way of steering us toward rationalization and away from truth. And while we must be vigilant in guarding against this awful tendency, we must also not go so far as to become cruel perfectionists. Sincere self-examination which brings to light our culpability must be followed by self-forgiveness. Otherwise we avoid the common extreme while falling into the other, which is indeed torturous.

Though often hard, and sometimes even terrifying, self-knowledge is empowering. Having come to know myself in a deep sense, I find that I do not need any self-help book—I have already studied the book of my life. So too with anti-depressant medications. While for many people these are undoubtedly useful or even necessary in times of crisis, what I must do in any event is to take control of my life, insofar as I can.

That will often mean changing my life, and to that end, myself; in particular, my flaws. This is hard work, of course, but again, it is empowering: I achieve power over myself, where others may have no choice but to be subject to the power (say, the bad advice or prescription) of others.

To be serious about having good character, or improving our character, is to be serious about self-knowledge. If I want to live a decent life, or a better one, then clearly I cannot be ignorant of myself, of how I am living or should live. I must rather be steadfast in examining my motives and intentions.

What is the reason for Socrates' famous remark that the unexamined life is not worth living? It is that without examining my life I cannot value it: any sense of value depends on knowledge; in order to live a worthy life, we must have a sense, borne out by experience, of just what makes it so.

It is no wonder that the greatest teachers of humankind were characterized by immense self-knowledge. A person who knows much about his complex nature—and all human beings are complex—may for that very reason be well-equipped to instruct others. You may not be Montaigne or Emerson. Even so, the fruits of your self-examination can afford you insight into others, who, after all, are not so different from you; you may indeed aid other people in walking a more illumined path.

"Men more frequently require to be reminded than informed," said the great sage Samuel Johnson. I believe that every student of himself, having asked himself how he should live, should eventually come to a set of beliefs which are rather homely, in the sense that many thoughtful minds have been there before, so that the truth is no mystery.

It has long been thought, and rightly, that we human beings require a balance of satisfying intellectual and physical activities, interests, hobbies. These, along with meaningful relationships, are what make a life happy, or at least tolerable, for these make for an ongoing sense of vitality. If one of the purposes of your self-knowledge is to determine how you should live—as of course it should be—then you need not expect your conclusions to be so far from what many thoughtful travelers on the way arrived at before you.

Life is an endeavor in which we get to know ourselves. How strange is that notion, the notion of a self that does not know itself, as if to exist is to be a kind of stranger even to yourself. For life is a kind of ineffable unfolding. During its course, we find we are ever-changing, growing, moving between contradictions.

Indeed, while we may, if we are successful, arrive at more or less the same conclusions with respect to how we should live, we shall all find our distinct phenomenological experience—what we essentially ARE—to be endlessly unique, and frequently surprising. You are a self, and the self that you are contains innumerable surprises. That is dream-like, and beautifully strange.

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

Beejoli Shah's Public Accusation Of Rape At UC Berkeley Raises Many Questions (UPDATE)

December 16, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

(The man who Shah accused has given a statement. Scroll down to the end of this article for that update.)

Not even two weeks after the UVA gang rape story published in the Rolling Stone fell to pieces, the mainstream outlet Buzzfeed has published a rape accusation by freelance writer Beejoli Shah in an article titled How My Culture Failed Me After I Was Raped. Nine years after the fact, Shah details how she was drugged and then raped by an Indian man while she was a freshman at UC Berkeley. In spite of claiming to have evidence from a drug test and rape kit, she did not report the crime to police. Thanks to a reader tip, ROK has discovered the identity of her alleged rapist.

Shah's accusation fits the pattern of a false accusation that I addressed in All Public Rape Accusations Are False. When a girl avoids going to the police to instead share the story nationally in full public view, there is reasonable suspicion that she is using the accusation to push a false narrative onto the masses, relieve symptoms of mental illness, gain attention and validation, or get revenge on a former lover who didn't pursue a romantic relationship with her. Shah's breezy story, which supposedly took place nearly a decade ago, does not offer an especially convincing account, especially since she was flirting with her alleged rapist for weeks before.

Here are some excerpts:

> What I didn't expect was being roofied, not remembering the rest of the night, > and waking up in Neil's bed covered in bruises.

>
> Actually, that's not entirely true. I remember snippets of the night. I fully remember insisting no alcohol be in my beverage when Neil offered to pour me a mixed drink — a choice integral to my plan of presenting my best self. I remember a very hazy moment: walking down a hill toward Neil's apartment, daring him to let me wear his shirt. I was definitely drugged by then, but eight years later I remember that brief moment of flirtation I surely was complicit in.
>
> […]
>
> I do know that when two of [my girlfriends] took one look at my neck, covered from side to side in a macabre grin of angry purple bruises and bite marks, they knew something had happened that wasn't supposed to. I told them what I remembered from that evening as best I could, and they were incredibly supportive, especially given that none of us had dealt with anything of this nature before in our eight months of friendship. But it also didn't stop them from asking, "Are you sure you guys didn't just accidentally hook up last night?" After all, they had seen mine and Neil's ill-advised flirtations in the weeks prior.
>
> […]
>
> Neil and I had been flirting here and there in the weeks leading up to the party. If I hazily remembered flirting with him on the walk home, who's to say I didn't say no when push came to literal shove? Even though I'd never blacked out, and don't remember drinking at all, did I maybe just get really drunk? I logically knew the answer to all those questions pointed to no, this wasn't my fault, but if I couldn't even believe myself entirely, there was no way I was going to be a believable victim.

The reason that she didn't want to report the rape is to protect her reputation:

> Going to campus police was never an option. It's not that our Indian community wasn't having sex, but we sure as hell weren't talking about it. I wasn't explicitly talked out of wanting to press charges, but it never even came up in the discussion process of how to move forward. I was worried about others in the Indian scene finding out, and the rumor mill dropping the non-consensual aspect of me having had sex…

Either she was raped by a man who seduced her over an extended period of time and got her to voluntarily come to his apartment (she stated giddiness at the prospect of wearing his shirt), or she felt guilty for sleeping with a senior [removed] too quickly after being dumped by an ex-boyfriend that stated her "liberal" behavior as the main reason. We have no police report, no hard evidence she was drugged, and no account from the alleged rapist. There is one of two things we can conclude about Beejoli Shah's account:

1. She was raped and because she failed to report the rape, she allowed a rapist to remain on the loose for nearly a decade. We can only speculate at how many more women were raped because Shah didn't go to the police and experience a few hours of inconvenience to put a dangerous criminal behind bars.

2. She is lying about her rape. The rape did not occur and is instead a revisionist or implanted memory that surfaced because of America's current hysteria surrounding rape.

Neither of these options paint Shah in a favorable light, but at least the second option would mean that less women have been put in danger. The problem with this less harmful scenario is that Shah gave enough information in her article that her alleged rapist was easily identified by a tipster. Consider these three facts:

A. [removed]

B. [removed]

C. removed]

I have contacted him and am waiting for his reply so I will not go the extra step in publishing his name until he is given a full day to respond. Since Shah's alleged rapist took only three steps to find, that leaves the responsibility on her to either issue a retraction to her Buzzfeed article so that it no longer points the finger to an innocent man, or to do the right thing for the safety of women everywhere by contacting the police immediately to put this rapist beyond bars before California's 10-year statute of limitations runs out.

I contacted Shah to confirm or deny that the man I identified above was her rapist, giving her time to respond before this article's publication, but she gave me a fake email address in response:

And here is a tweet she sent me earlier that urged me to commit incest:

This story comes hot on the heels of Lena Dunham publicly accusing "Barry" of raping her in college in the same memoir where she admits to digitally penetrating her little sister's vagina. Once Barry was identified, Dunham came out with a retraction (on Buzzfeed, ironically) so that she was not exposed to legal liabilities. We shall see if Beejoli Shah, whose claim to fame is getting her toes sucked by Quentin Tarantino, follows in her footsteps.

Update:

I contacted Shah's alleged rapist with her accusation. He has vehemently denied that a rape took place:

> Unequivocally deny that here was nothing other than consensual activity. I should have said no and refused her oncomingd [sic] as it was clear she was trying to get back at her boyfriend by "hooking up." I welcome her to go to the police now (and urged her at the time as well) and felt compelled to do so myself at the time once she started mentioning that she didn't remember anything.

He states that if any drugging occurred, one that has yet to be proved by Shah, it was not done by him:

> If for some reason she may have been given something that night it wasnt by me, with my knowledge or even perceptible to me as she was completely coherent (verifiable by friends from undergrad who i stil [sic] know today).

With his strong denial, the onus is on Shah to provide evidence that a rape did indeed take place. Since it doesn't seem like this will be forthcoming, an impartial observer must now conclude that Shah has falsely accused this man of a horrendous crime for personal gain. It is unknown whether he will pursue civil action against Shah.

Follow-up Article: Buzzfeed Has Removed Several Details Of Beejoli Shah's Alleged Rape After We Questioned It

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

6 Ways You Can Motivate Yourself To Go Out And Meet Girls

December 17, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Do you want to enjoy the playboy lifestyle, but you're not getting the results with women you'd like, or feel that you should be getting? If so then read on, because this article is for you.

One major problem faced by most players at one time or another is lack of motivation. When faced with the choice between going out into the unpredictable and potentially harsh world of the club to meet girls (or to the mall, if daygame is your thing) or staying at home and loading up Netflix, the temptation is often to choose the latter. So how do you break free of this understandable-but-unhelpful inertia?

1. Accept Your State of Mind

Look, there's no easy way around not wanting to put yourself on the line. The truth is that there's not a human being alive who wouldn't rather have life be less difficult. Unfortunately, the reality is that 90% of the time life is a struggle and you only get out of it what you put in. But you're only human, so don't beat yourself up. If you know you should be taking a particular course of action, but just can't bring yourself to do so, simply pause for a moment, take a deep breath and observe your own resistance. Don't judge yourself — simply note your feelings and try to accept them.

2. Understand That Feelings Are Temporary

Think about all the times you've felt unhappy or anxious or worried. They passed, right? Realize that whatever you are feeling now that is making you inactive will also pass, be it tiredness, depression, boredom etc. Take a few moments to project into your future and imagine yourself feeling positive and motivated again. Now make an effort to "borrow" from those future good feelings to vibe yourself up in the present.

3. Take the Next Right Step

Don't think about the bigger picture — the night ahead, the intimidating doorstaff at the club, the bright lights, the loud music, and that bitchy dime-piece you're going to have to steel yourself to approach. Instead, break down the process of going out into small, manageable chunks and simply do the next right thing. Hungry? Cook a meal. Need something to wear? Iron a shirt and pick out a pocket square. Need transport? Call a cab. Don't stress yourself out — just be sure to accomplish those small incremental actions that will get you out of your apartment.

4. Keep Your Long-Term Goals in Mind

While you are taking these incremental steps, on a meta level you need to have some sense of why you are doing so. As I've just said, you shouldn't think about the minutiae of the night ahead: what you must do, though, is keep in mind your wider goals. If your intention is to become good with women, or to achieve sexual abundance, then it follows that you must approach; and in order to approach you must go out.

All success is founded to some degree on the sublimation of temporary discomfort in the interest of a greater good — think for example of the athlete who spends many hours training while his friends are socializing so that he can compete in the Olympics. Knowing that your feelings are temporary anyway, and that taking action will have a positive impact on your higher ambitions should be enough to jolt you into activity.

5. Remember: Action Creates Momentum

Simple actions create momentum, and momentum creates results. Most of us have probably felt under par before going on to have a fantastic night at least once in our lives. Trust your own capacity to rise to the occasion once you get into a social environment. Once you've arrived at the club or the bar, the drinks are flowing, the music is playing and there are hotties all around, your motivation will naturally increase. Bear in mind that how you feel will change once you get out there, and pull forward those good feelings you know you're bound to feel. Having a couple of drinks at home and putting on some loud party music will help.

6. Lower The Bar — Sometimes Just Being Out is Enough

Remember: you don't have to be a master pick-up artist. In fact, you don't even have to be good. All too frequently, guys (myself included) will put undue pressure on themselves, as though they have to live up to some externally-defined standard. You don't. However long you've been in the game you're allowed to suck, so go out there and be rubbish. See how many times you can get blown out. It really doesn't matter — going out is meant to be fun, remember?

Every so often life will throw you a line anyway. There have been many occasions I've gone out and met a girl out who just happened to like me — not because of tight game or any particular strategy, but simply because of natural chemistry. The same will happen for you — but only if you go out. As the expression goes, you have to be in it to win it. You can't expect a girl just to turn up at your bedroom while you're playing World of Warcraft — but going out and socializing at least means there's a fighting chance that you might meet someone you happen to click with through minimum effort.

So there you are — hopefully these tips will help you get over those tough bumps in the road where you just don't feel like going out. If these worked for you, or if you have any suggestions of your own, please let me know in the comments section below.

Happy hunting!

Want to discover the seven secrets for meeting and attracting beautiful women used by international playboys the world over? Go here.

Read m\More: How to Combat Fear of Rejection With Positive Self-Interest

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Stop The Arguments And Start The Divorce From Progressive America

December 17, 2014 | by Oscar O'Reilly | Link | Original Link

Daily we lament the “progressivization” of America: the increasing bias towards short-sighted compassion in policymaking; the weakening of the rule of law in favor of PC witch-hunts and racial-grievance shakedowns; the erosion of the family and personal responsibility; and the rise of a vast, intrusive, mothering state, with dependents proliferating at its teats.

Naturally we wonder what we can do about all this. Should we just do what the opposition does? Should we spread the word, from soap boxes and digital media, about the errors of progressivism? Should we march and demonstrate? Should we energetically “get out the vote” every election? Should we boycott organizations that side with the progressive cause? Should we focus our efforts through political action groups? Maybe we should all write letters to our congressmen and to our local newspapers, to let them know where we stand.

I think we need to admit that none of that will work, in the long run.

Progressives have big advantages in this cultural battle. They have controlled mainstream academia at least since the 1970s, steeping tens of millions of impressionable young minds in their dogmas. Key demographic trends, including high birthrates among immigrants that tend to vote left, and a declining marriage rate among women, favor them heavily.

Moreover, as we know all too well, progressives’ quasi-religious dogmas are ingeniously crafted to suppress opposition. To speak against progressivism is to run the risk of being labeled racist, sexist, or otherwise on the wrong side of history, and then being ostracized and losing one's job.

The sense that history is on their side also has given progressives a fearless, Bolshevik spirit that enables them to punch above their weight culturally. And, like the Bolsheviks, they have set in motion policies and attitudes that tend to damage society but strengthen their hand, such as feminist policies that alienate men and worsen gender relations, and open immigration policies that create new state-dependent (i.e. progressive) voters.

Worst of all, progressives seem entirely resistant to evidence of the harm they are doing. The disintegration of the black family after a half-century of generous welfare handouts? Blame racism. Huge disparities in incarceration rates between blacks and whites? Again, blame racism. Lower socioeconomic outcomes among kids from same-sex-parented families? Can't be right—harass the researcher with misconduct allegations. Less chance of a happy marriage when the bride has been promiscuous? Nothing to see here—move along.

For these reasons alone, I think that we should not try to confront progressivism head-on. That head-on strategy presumes that we are struggling for supremacy over the US, or over Western civilization generally, and somehow could win if we could just get our message across more effectively. We could never win in that way.

I also don't think we should want to win in that way. Progressivism may be internally inconsistent and unsustainable—if nothing else, it will be brought down by the mass state-dependency it induces. Yet a lot of other cultures have features we find objectionable. Ideally we just choose not to participate in them. We don't condemn them, and we don't interfere with other people's desires to belong to them. We treat (again, ideally) people's cultural choices as something like a basic human right. And there's no question that many Americans prefer progressivism to the more conservative way of thinking that I happen to prefer.

All I want is to have the same consideration extended to me and to others who think like me. I don't want to keep arguing with people who will never be swayed. I want a place—a physical homeland—where I and my family and those like us can live and govern ourselves independently.

Looking at a map, I see that there is a large and contiguous set of American states—more than enough to form a viable country—that has voting majorities who think much as I do. As I write these words, one of the last remaining Democratic senators has just been booted from that red-state region.

Turning part or all of that region into a new country would be more achievable and meaningful than the win-it-all strategy that American conservatives now implicitly pursue. That's not to say it would be easy. America fought a war, largely over that question, and the winning side told the losers: no, you can't have your own culture, your own laws, your own government.

Nowadays we tend to think of the Civil War as having been fought over slavery, and having been justified in that sense. To a great extent it was fought over slavery—certainly the permitting of slavery was foremost among the “states’ rights” the south wanted to assert, and foremost among the southern practices the north found abhorrent.

But would the south have been permitted amicably to secede in 1861, based on other irreconcilable cultural differences, had they outlawed slavery first so that it was no longer an issue? Fat chance—and I say that not as a Dixie-whistling good old boy, but as a Yankee born and bred. But don’t take it from me: take it from Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, who has written that “If there was any constitutional issue resolved by the Civil War, it is that there is no right to secede.”

That said, I doubt that a determined move to secede would end in another violent struggle. In the absence of an issue as serious and galvanizing as slavery, even the most tribal-thinking progressive would soon enough see the absurdity of declaring a genuine independence movement “illegal” and making war against it.

Scotland, Quebec, Catalonia—if they can be permitted peacefully to vote to secede (or not) from their political unions, why can’t our states? Lest we forget, America was born in rebellion, and has always had at its core the principle of “government of the people, by the people, for the people.” Progressives opposing that principle would find themselves in the one place where they truly don’t want to be: the wrong side of history.

Read More: Thanks to Progressivism, America is No Country for Men

Oscar O'Reilly
Oscar is a novelist and essayist.

She Hands You A Condom, Then Insinuates Rape? Canada's New Political Witch Hunt

December 17, 2014 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As you tuck yourself into bed tonight, still cursing your many problems and present challenges, spare a thought for two men going through hell in Canada.

Last month, two Liberal members of parliament (MPs), Montreal's Massimo Pacetti and Newfoundland's Scott Andrews, were expelled from their party caucus after accusations by two female New Democratic Party legislators. A non-police complaint has not even been lodged, let alone tested, and the careers of the two men are all but destroyed.

The first female NDP MP found herself on a bus with Liberal leader Justin Trudeau. Both were traveling to the funeral of Ottawa terrorist victim Corporal Nathan Cirillo. She asked if Trudeau knew of "allegations" by a second female MP regarding Scott Andrews. This first female MP made no mention then of her own later accusations against Massimo Pacetti.

After this conversation with Trudeau, the first female MP then claimed to the whips of both her party and the Liberals that Pacetti "forced" himself on her earlier in the year, without "explicit consent." Consistent reports from this meeting indicate that she did not say no and even handed Pacetti a condom.

The abysmal treatment of Pacetti and Andrews highlights two disastrous undercurrents in society today. Firstly, in one stroke Trudeau acted entirely against the Liberals' stated platform. Unlike in the United States, the capitalized term "Liberal" refers to centrist and conservative parties in Canada and Australia respectively. Emphasis on political rights and individuals freedoms by these groups bears resemblance to the classical liberalism of John Locke and the American Founding Fathers. As wide-ranging as classical liberalism can be, innocence before guilt is an irrevocable cornerstone of this philosophy.

Though Trudeau took the cheaper, illiberal path, we cannot blame him alone. Politicians' "leadership" choices often reflect the idiosyncrasies of a very sensitive, partially indoctrinated electorate, and the SJWs who try and whip it into an anti-due process frenzy. The good chunk of society which finds the claims spurious and preposterous fears speaking out and being labelled rape apologists.

This phenomenon is exemplified in the affirmative consent debate in the US, where the overwhelming number of online comments even on sites such as CNN have lambasted lower evidentiary standards and the reversal of the burden of proof in college "investigations."

Justin Trudeau, perhaps pondering the next death blow to due process.

Secondly, the Pacetti-Andrews witch hunt demonstrates the complete absolution of female responsibility in sexual encounters. A woman can now hand a man a condom and, after they engage in sex, imply that she was sexually assaulted. Oh wait, did the female NDP MP actually want Pacetti to make a condom balloon animal? Or a makeshift water bomb to be thrown at their mutual Conservative opponents? Or was she proselytizing him with a safe sex message before his next session of intercourse with his own wife? These are the sorts of ridiculous alternative conclusions handing someone a condom entails.

If anything, the accusations against Pacetti in particular only reinforce the fact that feminist notions of "affirmative consent" infantilize women. Men are presumed to give consent merely by the act of sex taking place. Women, on the other hand, can give the explicit signal of handing you the condom and still require an inquisition to establish if this is what they really want. Given this direction, will spontaneously touching your wife of ten years affectionately on the buttocks during a stroll now amount to a sexual offense? After all, did you ask her?

The most disgusting aspect of this sordid affair is that the accusations are on the moderate side of the spectrum. If saying you handed a man a condom before sex lands him in political oblivion, what about when a woman alleges a politician drugged her, similar to the slew of accusations being thrown at Bill Cosby?

And what if the first female MP had left out from the beginning the part about handing Pacetti a condom, just as she did here. The march against Pacetti and Andrews would only have accelerated. Uncovering the innocence of men like Pacetti more often than not depends on ridiculous claims made by the accuser, not any purported due process enforced by society. If a woman keeps her accusations non-fantastical and consistent with dates and events (such as when a UVA frat party actually took place), the accusation is treated as gospel by countless SJWs, media outlets and segments of a populace reminiscent of sheep.

Inasmuch as I sympathize with Pacetti and Andrews, the horrendous treatment they are receiving may eventually serve the justice of other men accused in equally ridiculous circumstances, without the “plaintiffs” even bothering to formally complain. Right now, though, we’ve witnessed another nail in the coffin of due process. Let’s just hope Lazarus makes an appearance soon.

Don’t Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Polygamy Made America Strong

December 17, 2014 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

As a missionary in Europe, I once knocked on a door at a nondescript housing development. Half a dozen hot Middle Eastern girls answered the door, dressed in skimpy Jasmine-like costumes, peeking around the door and giggling. I assumed that they were someone's harem. They pled with me to come inside, relax, and spread the good word.

This cultural exchange was shocking, but then it struck me that my ancestors were polygamous. Polygamy played a major role in history of the church I was representing, and yet it was something I didn't really understand. I have been conditioned by western society to be ashamed of this history. But is polygamy actually something to be proud of?

Libertarian Opposition To Federal Government

Various groups including Native Americans and Muslims practiced polygamy in America. Top-ranking leaders throughout history have endorsed polygamy, including Martin Luther. But it is Mormons that are so indelible in the media narrative, so I will investigate Mormon polygamy.

The media sensationalized Mormon polygamy because of political circumstances involving Christianity and the federal government. Soon after their founding, Mormons were fiercely persecuted by local Christian and political leaders. Their property was stolen, men were tortured and killed, and women were gang-raped.

The Mormons repeatedly appealed to the federal government for protection, but were denied. The federal government was much weaker in those days and didn't get involved in state affairs. Still, Mormons resented the government's failure, especially because the federal constitution is considered sacred in Mormon theology. What is the point of a federal government if it can't keep its people safe?

Joseph Smith was so dismayed by these events that in 1844 he ran for President. He ran a decidedly Libertarian campaign, calling for the end to prisons, to the intrusion into Indian lands, and to the national debt. But it was Smith's strong anti-slavery message that made the persecution worse. Anti-slavery activist Elijah Lovejoy had recently been murdered by a Missouri mob and Smith eventually was killed by a government-related mob as well.

After the Civil War, the federal government's power grew greatly. The Morril Act of 1862 ushered in its next grab for power. According to a book by Sarah Gordon, the federal government used the polygamy issue to assume more control over territories:

> …because the Reconstruction amendments were themselves designed to erase slavery and its incidents, the happy blending of anti-slavery and anti-slavery theory in political and cultural venues spilled over into the government's strategy. (Gordon, p.129)

Politicians equated polygamy with slavery, and "patriarchal despotism" became the next fight. Newspapers printed lurid sex stories and political cartoons of women chained up in dungeons. Mainstream Christianity and political activists campaigned to free women from "white slavery" in Utah. In 1857, James Buchanan sent the largest body of troops in American history to quell the Utah "rebellion."

The same government that had refused to protect Mormons was now arresting them because it didn't like who they were marrying. This further incited resentment for the government. Joseph Smith had even gone so far as to marry women who were already married and a 14-year-old girl (these marriages were never consummated, as they were considered defunct until the afterlife, thus making them technically not bigamous).

As Mormons became more stubborn, federal politicians exploited the polygamy issue to an even greater degree. Religion and government were just beginning to understand the power of control over sexuality and family.

> Spiritual meaning and this-worldly power converged most poignantly in marriage. In monogamy (as in polygamy), husbands and wives blended faith with governance, obedience with power, spiritual growth with human sexuality. (Gordon, p.5)

The government started taking broad, oppressive measures, and as a result, defiance toward government oppression became part of the polygamous family structure. Human relationships began to be considered a fundamental freedom in America.

President Arthur (1881-1885) required territories to file all marriage certificates with the Supreme Court. He made polygamy a felony, and forced wives to testify in court against their accused husbands. One Republican-leaning newspaper praised these laws as the ax that would chop down the tree of polygamy:

One woman who was detained was Lucy Kimball. The prosecutor interrogated her about her sexual history, and when she refused to answer, calling the question insulting, he publicly shamed her.

> Your feelings were not so tender when in 1843 you married a man who at that time to your knowledge had four or five other wives, and imposed yourself upon his innocent wife, and deceived her, by joining that kind of an alliance with her husband,– that was not insulting,–but now when I ask you a question, which under the law I have the right to ask you, you say it is insulting. (p.374, Richard Hill)

The very government that claimed to be liberating the poor oppressed wives was now publicly shaming them. Mormons, and to some degree the general public, resented this abuse of power. Opposition to government oppression was no longer tied to slavery, but became grounded on more legitimate reasons.

Strengthening The Patriarchal Order

One of the goals of Communism is to "discredit the family as an institution" and create a "need to raise children away from the negative influence of parents." To this end, Communists have sought to tear down the role of the "father whose will was law." Communist feminist Alexandra Kollontai listed three strategies for making the family unnecessary "either to its members or to the nation as a whole":

1.Put women in the workforce, to undermine the father as the "family's sole breadwinner."

2. Make the national economy less dependent on the family unit.

3. The state raises the child rather than the parents.

The polygamous family structure countered each of these three strategies. The wife's role was cemented as a mother and home-keeper. The man became the keystone that held everything together, and his rule was necessarily unquestioned.

Now, this was not easy for women. There are plenty of books and diaries out there from polygamous wives detailing the discipline and work that it required. Many women were broken-hearted that they weren't the only wife. Families were rife with jealousies and feelings of neglect, and the man had to work harder to manage all the women.

But rather than bring them down, Mormon men boasted that polygamy made them stronger and healthier as they got older.

> I have noticed that a man who has but one wife, and is inclined to that doctrine, soon begins to wither and dry up, while a man who goes in plurality looks fresh, young, and spritely. (Heber C Kimball)

Men were less dependent on women. If one woman acted up, he could just go to the next one. The first wife would then either have to humble herself, or leave and take her chances in the world. The man did not have to sacrifice his convictions. Mormon leader Brigham Young advised men not to get too attached to their women:

> Elders, never love your wives one hair's breadth further than they adorn the gospel, never love them so but that you can leave them at a moment's warning without shedding a tear.

This social structure put the man above the woman, and the religious convictions at the top. Women obeyed and honored their husband, and the men obeyed and honored God. As long as men had morals and conviction, this worked beautifully.

Not many families were actually polygamous. Most marriages in Utah were monogamous, but Mormon leaders were expected to take plural wives, especially the widowed and poor. There was a vast number of widows, and food stamps and welfare didn't exist for women in those days. Marriage was an arrangement necessary for survival, and women were expected to give as much as they received: sex and raising children. Today, women typically wait out the 10 years of marriage until they can divorce and get half of the man’s assets, but in those days women had a great responsibility.

Children were noticeably stronger and more intelligent because they received so much attention from their mothers. The women devoted more time to the children because “children are very important to women for personal, religious and status reasons.” (Zeitzen, p.101)

The Mormon community was a vast assimilation of different backgrounds, mainly of immigrants from around the world. The immigrants were strongly pressured to adopt these values for breeding their offspring, regardless of where they came from. The killing of many Mormon men by mobs, and the exodus out into the Western wilderness created a great need for reproduction. Polygamous marriages were held up as an example of how society benefited in these circumstances, both in the Mormon community and the country at large.

As the poison of Communism encroached on western nations in the ensuing decades, the values that spread from polygamy brought resistance that other countries did not have. The family broke down at a slower rate in America. Social decay has only begun to accelerate in the last 50 years or so.

End To Victorian Suppression

European reformers like Martin Madan pointed out that polygamy is a natural alternative to prostitution. The Victorian age had made secret prostitution a norm for upper class gentlemen. Hypocritical displays of propriety and the lack of responsibility in this kind of relationship made polygamy favorable. Polygamous wives had a much more important role to play than prostitutes.

Socialists tell us that marriage subjected and oppressed women, but quite the opposite is true. It lifted them up from the gutter. They didn't get a free ride, food stamps and welfare, but it did fulfill their instinctual role as mother and wife. Unfortunately today, Socialism has intruded on and negated such benefits of marriage in American society, and we have fallen back to Victorian-era suppression.

Christian thinkers of the day such as James Campbell declared honest monogamy is impossible. Strict monogamous guidelines were a pagan invention of the Greek and Romans. Only one in six ancient civilizations made monogamy the norm. Forcing a man to live in this kind of rigid decorum is not healthy, he said.

It is important to point out that the Mormon community strictly banned women having plural husbands. It is not healthy for women to have more than one lover at a time, indeed divine revelation declared that if an espoused woman has more than one man, she "shall be destroyed." (D&C 132:63)

The polyamory that currently exists in liberal areas typically involve girls that regularly sleep with multiple men at a time. From what I have seen, these girls quickly turn rotten and the men they sleep with are dull-witted and weak.

Our Legacy

We are in an age similar to the Victorian era. Social equality inquisitors demand rigid conformity to their ideas, which are based on old-fashioned Communism. Women are taught that their instinct as a mother and wife is sinful, and men frequently become repressed to the point of perversion.

I don't think successful polygamy is possible in this environment. Things will really have to change for us to be able to go back to that. We must deal with the circumstances we are in. Every example of polygamy I have seen or heard of today has ended up in disaster.

But polygamy can still exist as a legacy that inspires us to audaciously stand up to government oppression, to demand our rightful role as patriarchal leaders in society and personal relationships, and to stop suppressing natural and positive instincts.

It is no accident that Mormons took a leading role in the fight against gay marriage. The media will tell you that "gay rights" is a liberating notion that takes church and government out of personal relationships. But the opposite is true. Gay marriage increases the federal government intrusion into state and personal affairs.

The federal government—not even voters or elected representatives but dictatorial judges—define what marriage is. Not the states, not churches, not the individual, but federal judges. Gay marriage is just one more detail in the federal government's definition of whom you can or can't have a relationship with, and it is a definition that is perverse. In their ruling on Proposition 8, the federal Supreme Court declared that private citizens have no right to compel their leaders to uphold laws:

> We have never before upheld the standing of a private party to defend the constitutionality of a state statute when state officials have chosen not to.

Think about that for a second, outside the context of gay marriage. Private citizens do not have the standing to defend constitutional statutes when political leaders refuse to? We are back to pre-Civil War times when the federal government refused to protect citizens from the machinations of local leaders. What other constitutional statutes will the federal government refuse to defend? Oh, but when it comes to tell you whom you can or cannot marry, they will send out an army!

The good news is many people are on the right side. People recognize that government intrusions like gay marriage are wrong, and that the government is failing to do what is right. We don't put up with suppression in this new SJW-controlled Victorian era. We demand our rightful place as men, to lead our country, lead our communities, lead families, and lead our lives.

Read More: America Is Becoming A Homosexual Nation

Amasa M. Lyman
Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

Buzzfeed Has Removed Several Details Of Beejoli Shah’s Alleged Rape After We Questioned It

December 17, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Last night we published our skepticism of Beejoli Shah’s rape allegation that was published on Buzzfeed, since it fit the formula of outrageous rape claims we’ve been seeing in the media within the past several months. We also published how Shah’s rapist could be positively identified because of the many details that Shah gave in her allegation. Approximately five hours after we published a strong denial from her alleged rapist this afternoon in an update to our original article, the rape accusation on Buzzfeed has now removed several details that point to his identity.

All afternoon, Shah received criticism on Twitter from men who urged her to come clean about what was increasingly looking like a false rape accusation. Her response did little to alleviate concerns that she was persecuting an innocent man nine years after the incident supposedly occurred.

Not long after she sent these tweets, there was an update at the bottom of her Buzzfeed article:

Before I started writing about the story, I archived it using archive.today in case future changes were made. I then compared the updated article with the archived version. There were several edits made, and from this point on I will refer to the alleged rapist as "the victim."

- Shah's class year was removed
- The victim's class year was removed
- The victim's extracurricular activity was removed
- Locations where they met were removed
- A historical note alluding to the date of the alleged rape was removed

The changes now make it impossible for an observer to identify the victim, so I have updated my original article to remove these details so that the victim can retain his privacy.

I received some criticism for posting my method for identifying the victim. I took this course of action because either I was exposing a horrible rapist to the public or I was putting a legal burden on Shah and Buzzfeed to stand by an account that may wind up in civil court. After the denial from the victim came forth, it was clear that neither Shah nor Buzzfeed had the stomach to continue backing the article, and so changes were quickly made that cleared the victim's name. Had I not taken this course of action, details leading to his identity would still be on Buzzfeed.

If Shah continues to stand by her account, it would be highly irregular that she has taken extraordinary measures to preserve the identity of a criminal rapist who can continue raping with impunity, but we can now logically conclude that the man she identified did not commit rape.

As I mentioned in a recent video, 2014 was a big year for our sphere. Feminism and social justice has been pushed back more than ever, with this event being another sound blow to their mythical rape culture narrative. It's worth noting that this is the first time that a mainstream media organization had to make changes to an article because of our efforts. This is a great victory for us and for Western men everywhere, who are finally pushing back against their marginalization by people like Beejoli Shah and organizations like Buzzfeed.

Read Next: Are Our Fears About Anonymous Rape Accusations Coming True?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

One Fantasy Novelist Stands Up To The Fascist Left

December 17, 2014 | by Bryan Paul Rouleau | Link | Original Link

Prince of Thorns

I read somewhere that The Broken Empire series by Mark Lawrence is better than Game of Thrones. Claims like this should not be thrown around lightly. But after reading just the first two chapters of the first novel in the series, Prince of Thorns, it became evident that Lawrence had at least beat Game of Thrones in the brutality award categories, firmly sticking George RR Martin's head on a pike. A promising novel—I plan to finish it by the time this is published.

As Lawrence claims in his recent blog post about reaching 30,000 reviews on Goodreads, he received a couple mentions on lists for best fantasy novels in 2011, when Prince of Thorns was first released. The follow-up novels, of which there are two more, have received similar acclaim. But not all great fantasy novels are enjoyed unanimously by fantasy readers.

As Lawrence's blog post details, his book came under some light (but noteworthy) fire for its treatment (or lack of treatment) of women. You can read the post yourself, but the complaints boil down to a general grievance that Lawrence does not introduce female characters into the story, and when he does, they are not the "strong" type. "Is there a band of sisters?" asks one reviewer, referencing the band of "brothers" the novel follows as they rape and pillage their way across what looks like a fantasized Europe-like continent.

Undaunted, Lawrence offered a response to his detractors. A lesser man might have pulled out his rug for immediate and unequivocal prostration, but Lawrence did nothing of the sort. In his blog post, Lawrence makes a very reasonable and measured argument. In essence, he says that if his book doesn't contain things that you would like to see in a fantasy novel, too bad.

Perhaps write your own book, he suggests, or find a book that does contain those things you would like to see and read that one (those books do exist, and there's nothing wrong with them). He ends the argument there. A bit like General McClellan in the American Civil War, Lawrence raises and whips into shape a fine fighting force for the North, but then does nothing to advance on his enemies' positions.

The Quest For Diversity Had Become A Fascist Dictate

Lawrence can remain conciliatory and stake out a neutral tone and position (finding myself in his chain-mail gauntlets, I would do the same for the sake of my own book's success), but he should be aware that there is no amount of kowtowing or self-castigation that will please far-left fascist agitators. Even if he converts and changes his name to Abdul, they will still take his head, and video-record it for posterity.

Even if his next novel stars a gender-fluid hero-heroine, or if we learn that the butcher Prince Jorg was in fact born a woman but had gender re-assignment sometime before the opening scene of the first novel, Lawrence's far-left critics will only wonder why he didn't introduce these aspects into his stories sooner (latent misogyny, no doubt).

I do not speak for Lawrence in any way—his blog post makes all his own positions and opinions clear. He has been steadfast and calm in his view. See his excellent Twitter rebuttals below:

I like kites. I want to read books with more kites in them.

I speak only for myself in what follows. Mr. Lawrence likely sees a couple negative reviews that have a common theme. I see brush fires of a culture war, instigated by what amounts to petulant brats who have been coddled enough that they feel little compunction making arbitrary demands on other people, like children begging mom for a toy in the store aisle.

Every aspect of our culture has become engulfed in a battle between two irreconcilable world views. Unfortunately, fantasy novels are no longer neutral territory–if they ever were. With fascist fervor, the hard left has arrived demanding that even fantasy novels represent, or better yet imitate, the bizarre faculties of the modern Western world.

And a bizarre world it is. We live in both a place and time in history where a casual book reviewer can make the following remark about Prince of Thorns with a straight face: "Women and girls have a tough enough time in real life without being subjugated and marginalized in fantasy, too."

The Many Ways In Which Women Are Marginalized

To honestly believe that a woman, currently living in the modern West, faces anything resembling a "tough time" is simply bizarre, perhaps a great punchline for a stand-up routine if she weren't so deadly serious. Never mind that the reviewer (who I will assume is a woman) was lucky enough to be born in one of the richest nations on Earth (unless she writes to us from the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which I doubt).

Instead, consider that she not only can afford the time to worry, but further has the ability and inclination to write her concerns on the world wide web —while her female counterparts in North Korea are spending short lives unaware of the existence of electricity before receiving a bullet to the head in a public square for being in possession of a Holy Bible.

Back On Point

The world can be a terrible place. But it is not made worse by a fantasy novelist's imagination, or the resulting novel, which happens to accurately explore the dark nature of a band of brutal men at a time and place much worse than our own. Lawrence is a human being, likely a decent one who has only written about burning villages to the ground and taking advantage of the farmers' daughters (likely not based on personal experience).

He is an author of creative fiction, not a sock puppet for what has become an arrogant and intolerant social "movement" perpetuated (mostly) by bored white girls armed with pumpkin spice lattes and social media accounts. The term "movement" gets quotations around it because it confers far too much credit—it often comes off more like a temper tantrum.

I guess some people keep canaries. Other people do "social justice," whatever the hell that has come to mean in 2014. Buy Prince of Thorns here so you can say you read it before it became a SWPL HBO series infused with strong women who did not appear in the book. Or at least get it before the forthcoming eruption of #FantasyGate.

Read More: How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World

Bryan Paul Rouleau
Bryan is a fiction writer from New England. He can be found at bryanpaulrouleau.com or on Twitter

Why I Dropped Out Of Law School

December 18, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Like many men in my generation, I have a father who has consistently failed at life. His unsolicited advice is usually worthless dribble aimed at justifying his own terrible choices. Two days before I left for law school this summer, he told me, “Blair, you don’t have the social temperament to succeed in the legal field.” For once he was absolutely right, and I pulled out in late October. It was one of the top five best decisions I will ever make.

Social Skills

Of course he meant that as a pejorative, since I am a mean son of a bitch, but I couldn’t be sycophantic enough to succeed in law even if I wanted to be. You really have to have the eternal smile, and I am just far too emotive. Law school fosters every terrible trait in my generation. For example, the students had this idea that they have a human right to never be offended by a peer for any reason.

One time a professor asked who in the class did not like Pope Francis, since apparently even he wanted a distraction from tort law. When I was the only student to raise my hand, he asked me why, and I responded, “Because he’s an empty showman and a media whore.” That might have been the day when I became “the one to avoid.”

As shallow as it sounds, law students cannot risk being around someone who could ruin their career. They will dump you at a moment’s notice based on a rumor no matter how close you have been. The demands for a clean reputation and the ease of falling into ostracization mandate that they have an exaggerated view of others as commodities. They spend so much energy building contacts but cannot afford to have any friends. It was political correctness hell.

Of course, they are somewhat wrong to think it really matters what the other law students think about them. The other students are not going to get you a job when you leave school, and after your first job, what really matters is your ability to make money.

Or at least I assume that is so. But you do hear stories about people in big firms commonly knifing other members on their team at any opportunity. I decided very quickly that I wanted to work small firm or private practice in a rural area.

Misery And Misanthropy

I wrote that law school attracts the worst in humanity, but I have since learned that it also corrupts the best. There were some absolute southern feminine sweethearts unsure if they really wanted a career, and I worry what will be left of them by the time they graduate. I myself became a sadistic person, trying to ruin the day of people I didn't like or delighting when something upset them.

My last week there, I found myself spreading a completely false rumor about a girl out of revenge for a completely true rumor she was spreading about me. I don't want to be that kind of person, but apparently I am. I do not believe in using such phrases as "that's not really who I am" to justify immorality. But terrible vindictiveness aside, I saw many good people become consumed with social anxiety.

The strength in a rumor is not in its ability to cause belief but to cause doubt. That girl I slandered, she was a virginal redhead Catholic ditz, and I claimed that she was making up lies about me because I rejected her sexual advances. Given law students' love of gossip, it likely could have spread as absolute truth within a few days had I not emailed the person I told it to and played it off as "a tasteless joke."

The rumor mill was amazing, and it would churn about anything insignificant. One time I bragged to a few friends about getting a girl's number from a cold-call pick up, and I heard about it from two or three different people over the next few days. Why does anyone care? You would think they would find my love life to be boring. It's not like I was even banging her.

The only professor I truly hated, one time she divided us into four teams and had us do a trivia challenge for a minuscule amount of extra credit on the midterm. Most of the students would argue ad infinitem for technicalities when they would get a question wrong, like a dog begging for the master's table scraps.

I later told a friend that it was pathetic, and he said, "It makes us look passionate."

"No," I responded, "It makes you look desperate."

My team ended up winning even though I came to class without the questions printed out. As soon as I left, I emailed the professor saying, "I would prefer not to receive the extra credit since I cannot take pride in my grade if I did not earn it." I did this partly for the sake of my own pride and autonomy, but also just to mindfuck her. As the Bible says, showing graciousness to those you hate is the best way to screw with them.

If you hate being around beta males, you cannot fathom how lame the law school dweebs are. For example, two students actually told me they wanted career wives. The above "passionate" law school friend told me that he wouldn't have a problem with his future wife pursuing her inane dreams because he didn't want to be controlling. He even said that he preferred a career wife because he could have someone to relate to. [Snorts at the notion that men and women have things in common.]

I told her that a woman like that can marry someone else. If I am going to spend the rest of my life with a person, I have every right to be as picky as I want. The other was a fat male feminist who said he hoped to find a wife specifically at law school. I'm not sure if there's a worse place to find someone who won't have your balls on the nightstand as a trophy for all the guests to see.

About a month after I dropped out, I ran into the tort law professor at the gym. I told him basically all of the above. He said, "I've met so many students who go to law school because they feel like they have no choice, often from family pressure, and then they are miserable for the next thirty to forty years."

I told him, "Professor W— said that he's never met a lawyer who didn't hate practicing law. That's like a watching a murder of crows at a nursing home."

"I'm lucky I get to teach," he responded.

But All That Aside

Could I have just morally reformed and found a practice in a rural area away from normal law people? Somewhat, but we are all products of our environment. I saw what I would have to become, or at least what I would have likely become. And even if I did not become that, I understood that I could never entirely avoid these people in the profession. Without having met them, you really have no idea how hair-trigger they are to ruin each other's career, and they naturally always assume that the others are out to get them.

To be a successful lawyer is to live in a state of paranoia. And even without the paranoia, I just hate being surrounded by the kind of people who make an effort to not have a personality or individuality. Law school was by far the most toxic social environment I have ever been in, and that includes youth group at Baptist church.

But apart from the social ills, I was surprised that the study of law was much more boring that I thought it would be. I am far too ADD to study in the necessary depth to make a decent grade. I have always had a "that's good enough for me" kind of work ethic. While it is true that the best lawyers often have the worst grades, I really did not want to spend my life doing something I found mentally draining. Also, I do not want a career that requires overtime every week if there is no guarantee at making six digits.

In contrast, I had previously spent half a year painting professionally and almost enjoyed it, so I decided to enroll in the plumbing program at the local community college. And if I end up hating plumbing, at least I will not have pissed away three years and $100,000+ on an unstable career.

Some Things I Learned

The most important thing I learned is how to look up what the law is. This is more complex than you may think, and the average person cannot quite do it, even with the internet. And unless you want to spend several hours at the local library, you will need to pay for a subscription service.

I learned why lawyers are terrible people even though many good people aspire to study law. I think the administration pushes them into that competitive frenzy, but I cannot figure out why. Perhaps it is a rite of passage. The administration also has a strange toleration for overtly torturous professors who delight in having a reputation as a terrible human being. I fortunately only had one of those. She had all the smugness of Hillary Clinton without any of the charisma. Of course when I would rant about her, the female students would say, "Yeah, but have you seen her credentials?" as if that gives her a pass on basic human decency.

Law school is just as susceptible to progressivism as anything, including nominally Christian schools like I went to. The long-standing dean had retired the summer prior. He was an old white man. They replaced him with a middle-aged black woman with a background in public interest law. Of course a black woman would study public interest law, something with no marketable value but supposedly helps the disadvantaged.

I found it odd how people thought there were some forms of law that are intrinsically moral, when actually every field of law has its dark side and its bright side. The flagship program of the school is Child Advocacy, since that seems to be the Jesus thing to do. But how many homes have been broken up through a guardian ad litem because of a flexible definition of abuse? The women students especially seemed prone to finding a feel-good field of law with low pay. Myself, I was planning on studying "divorce, custody, and elder law so that I can provide a single-income family." The other students would be horrified or look embarrassed when I would tell them that.

Final Satisfaction

My article I linked to above? I can't quite figure out how, but somehow someone figured out I wrote it, and the article went viral around school. Remember, a hunch that something may be true is good enough for a conviction when it comes time to ruin someone's career. This was a week before I dropped out, and although it's not the reason I withdrew, it certainly made me want to even more, though I doubt it would have made much difference in the long term even if I had admitted to writing it.

Several people were asking about it and not believing me when I denied it. It's amazing how they think they are entitled to your private life or that they have a right to be offended by your unspoken opinions. One white knight even said, "It's common knowledge…You chose to publish things online under a different name." [emphasis mine]

For over a week, I was very angry and upset, but then I suddenly realized that it was actually a good thing. This is the article that said:

> Unsurprisingly, I couldn't find any data for what fields of law women tend to study, but from what I've seen, they are almost always either "fun" fields like child advocacy, sports, or entertainment, or "clean" fields like tax law or prosecution. Women don't study divorce, custody, criminal defense, or anything > that is morally vague or subject to interpretation.

>
> It is said that there are twice as many law jobs as there are new law graduates, but that's because people specialize in bullshit fields that are flooded by cowards.
>
> Also unsurprisingly, the kind of men and women who go to law school aren't the type of people who read Return of Kings…Law school attracts the absolute worst in humanity. Weak, cowardly men and cutthroat, entitled women.

I had been wanting to tell the entire class off since orientation. How many people get that opportunity? And the best part is, they all willing listened to my insult and then spread it to the others. This is one of many reasons that ROK is the best job I will ever have.

Read More: 8 Essential Rules To Surviving The Workplace

Blair Naso

was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

#GamerGate Draws Attention To A Game Banned On Steam For Having A “Racist” Trailer

December 18, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

SJWs are simply relentless. It seems as if they don’t sleep or rest at all, but merely dedicate their whole lives to finding new ways to attack, shame and blame everything that can serve as an expression of masculinity. While GamerGate has seen a rich collection of magnificent SJW fails, their renewed effort to stifle violent games has found another victim.

This time around, the waves of SJW moral outrage that resulted in the removal of GTA 5 from Target Australia shelves have now hit Hatred, a mass-murder simulator. Their complaints have caused Steam to ban it from its service.

Evil white murderer

In Hatred, the player assumes the role of an anti-hero. You are a nameless antagonist who’s fed up with humanity and, after a short musing about how he hates everyone, he equips ridiculous amounts of weapons and goes outside, blasting whoever is unlucky enough to cross his way. There is no noble cause or heroic pursuit, a princess to save or a dragon to slay, he just wants to die with guns blazing and bring as many civilians and law enforcement with him to the grave.

The feature that caused Hatred to get banned were the execution scenes, in which you see close-ups of throats being slit or faces being shot off. How bad are these? Take a look for yourself:

Notice the races and genders of the killer and victims

The petition which started the outrage talks about how people of color and women are unjustly targeted by evil white men and other nonsense:

> had quite a few discussions on the subject. Originally, I watched the trailer and was offended by the number of coloured people and women shown in the close-up executions in the trailer. Obviously you can kill everyone equally (still no real story or motivation behind that which makes the game go from fun to plain disgusting), but the developers went out of their way to show non-whites and women being executed in the worst ways. This is a display of the peak of the white male player characters' hatred. It's saying that you the player will achieve your blood-pumping rage when you kill the kinds of people you hate the most. A targeted audience being straight white males, as is obvious by the

Try reading it without bursting out laughing

Of course, it wouldn't be a problem if the victims were all white, hetero males and the killer a strong, independent black transsexual woman. In fact, it would probably be lauded as a great game with perfect gameplay and awarded 10/10 from Polygon and Kotaku. The developer explained that all genders and races of victims are randomly generated but, as you might imagine, logic and reason do not go well when it comes to arguing with SJWs. When pressed further to defend himself, the CEO of the developing studio simply replied: "We don't care :)".

Is it really that bad?

While it does have scenes which remind a lot of Manhunt execution scenes, where you obediently follow the orders of a snuff film-maker, Hatred doesn't actually show anything worthy of banning. In fact, the gore is not worth mentioning at all. There were a lot worse things in movies, such as Human Centipede, and there are plenty of video game examples with similar over-the-top scenes. Sniper Elite series has the tradition of X-ray cam kills, which show your sniper round sloooowly crushing the victim's skull, ribs or testicles, along with crunchy noises.

Now, if that were a vagina, we'd have to do something

In Blood, you can set cultists on fire, shoot them while they scream in agony, rip their heads off and kick them around. In F.E.A.R. there are literal fountains of blood along with squished people piled up to the ceiling. Also, if Manhunt taught us anything, it's that excessive violence becomes grating fast and actually annoys the player rather than causing him to commit real murder.

Technically guilty

While Hatred hasn't technically been banned from Steam, it's simply because the game hasn't been made yet. Hatred only made it to the "greenlight" stage, which is Steam's pre-approval phase where customers can vote if they want the game to be available on Steam or not. Hatred got overwhelmingly positive votes on greenlight in its seven hours of being there.

Also, the above video is a trailer, showing what is supposed to be gameplay footage, but nobody can know for sure if it is. Seeing how often game developers remove content but leave the promise of it in the trailer, it's surprising Valve pulled the plug so hastily and actually denied its customers what they want.

Hatred hasn't actually broken any Valve or Steam rules other than treading on precious SJW snowflake feelings by accident and not apologizing. While Valve does have the sovereign right to do whatever it wants with its service, it's built its success on the basis of consumer trust. Customers must know at all times that a company is going to be fair, reasonable and honest when it decides to use the power to censor. And frankly, the choice of games that are still available on sale on Steam does not instill a lot of trust that Valve cares about its customers.

Sadly, this could be the end of a great company, which brought us the wonderful Half Life series, Portal, and Dota 2. It's not just the fact that a single game was banned from Steam, but rather the slow decline in quality, lack of consistency, and tiptoeing around SJW feelings. If game developers stop being bold and offensive, what are we left with? Mountain? Gone Home aka. Lesbian Diary Simulator?

Be fearless

SJWs have weaponized the most powerful weapon known to man—nagging

SJWs hold very little actual power. What they do have, however, is the appearance of power and they use it at every turn, mostly to create pathetic petitions which do nothing until the target censors itself. This is accompanied by unparalleled and unabashed arrogance.

This is exactly why you need to ridicule SJWs at every turn, which hurts their fragile egos more than you can imagine. That's why Anita Sarkeesian turns off comments on all her videos and why Randi Harper created a Twitter blocklist.

Say something before it's too late or everything even remotely offensive will eventually follow the example of Hatred, by getting banned from major distribution networks and only be available on the black market. If you think this is a joke, take a look at the UK, where female ejaculation is about to be banned in porn. Why? Because hurt feels.

There is no bright future with SJWs, only a dystopian nightmare devoid of any fun.

Did you like this post? Read more #gamergate news on Reaxxion, ROK's little brother. Click here to visit.

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

A Few Simple Game Q&As Show Occam's Razor In Action

December 18, 2014 | by Netanderthal Man | Link | Original Link

Occam's razor is most commonly described as "the simplest answer is most often correct," although this is an oversimplification. But life is too short to complicate it. Even though this rationalization may lead to faulty conclusions at times, more often than not it's going to lead to the right solution. (from explorable.com)

Q: How can you tell if she's just a tease or she's looking for something?
A: Escalate and move it forward.

Q: How can you tell if she's really interested in you?
A: Try and kiss her, you'll have your answer. Weed out the time wasters and attention whores.

Q: How can you deal with volatile and unstable girls?
A: You don't. You leave.

Q: How to minimize rejection?
A: Approach with plausible deniability. Always have a backup plan.

Q: How can you tell if she is girlfriend material?
A: If she doesn't bring anything positive into your life, she's not.

Q: I don't get those mixed signals she's giving me, what's up with that?
A: They's not mixed signals, it's low interest. A woman interested in you will not give mixed signals. Rollo's brilliant post The medium is the message is a must read if you haven’t done so already.

Q: How to deal with your girlfriend pulling away from the relationship?
A: You pull away harder, you start seeing other women and make it bluntly clear. Jealousy is a weakness or weapon, depending on which end of it you’re standing. Be the one using it as a weapon, not the one being ripped apart by it.

Q: How to deal with entitled little princesses?
A: You show them who’s king.

Q: What to do when your woman disrespects you?
A: Withdraw your attention, as attention is your most valuable currency when dealing with women. Soft next or hard next, according to the gravity of the situation.

Q: Your girlfriend keeps complaining what a big asshole her ex was, what to do?
A: Find out what exactly she’s complaining about and do the same asholish thing(s) but kick it up a notch or two. Take a piss in her cat’s food bowl and dip the cat in it if her ex used to fart on the cat. Ok, this is an extreme example and I don’t condone harming animals, but you get the picture.

Q: What do I do if my girlfriend keeps seeing or talking to her ex?
A: Unless he’s a beta, chances are she is banging him too.

Q: What’s the most efficient way to break up with your girlfriend?
A: You go all mushy and lovey dovey on her. Declare your eternal love to her, she’ll be out of your life in a short while without any hassle. Nothing dries up a pussy faster than a nice, decent, predictable guy.

Q: How can one maintain his woman’s interest at high levels?
A: Don’t see her or call every day, be unpredictable and fuck the daylights out of her when you do see her. Be actually busy, don’t just pretend to be busy. Becoming a rare commodity is achieved simply by not being around her all that much. You don’t need to create the mystery, her imagination is doing that for you. All you have to do is be careful not to ruin it.

Q: What to do if you’re very anxious about approaching?
A: Relax your body, breathe deep through your nose, hold it a few seconds and slowly exhale through your mouth. Repeat a few times. Don’t make it obvious, you’re not in yoga class. As the body relaxes, so does the mind. Then approach, don’t give a rat’s ass about the outcome of the approach.

Q: What if you have a gut feeling (good or bad) about your woman?
A: Trust your gut, it is usually right.

Q: How can you become confident in a short period of time?
A: You can’t, there’s no shortcut, but you can start by confronting your fears and stop giving a fuck about what others think and start believing you are the shit. Confidence, just like fear, is a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Q: There’s a girl you like at work, what to do?
A: Never shit where you eat. It’s not worth it.

Q: This is the 5th date and you haven't had sex yet, what to do?
A: If a woman wants to fuck you she will. Otherwise, you're already fucked and you have to move on to other women. Take a hint, man.

Q: How can you tell if your girlfriend is lying to you?
A: Assume she is lying, research indicates that everybody lies on a daily basis.

Q: You got yourself a new girlfriend, what's the first thing to do?
A: You set the boundaries and rules first.

Q: What if you're not sure whether you're chasing a girl or not?
A: If you have to ask yourself that, then you are chasing.

If you're a regular ROK reader, you are likely familiar with the "Action speaks louder than words" saying. It is the Occam's Razor of game.

Read More: Don't Brush Off Your Failures

Netanderthal Man
Netanderthal Man saw the light of day somewhere in Eastern Europe. He enjoys life as creative director and owner of a design studio. He is a big fan of Occam's razor, Pink Floyd, Roald Dahl and wet tight pussy, is politically incorrect and his favourite dish is roasted unicorn with rainbow gravy.

10 Things Men Should Never Try

December 18, 2014 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

Looked at from a conventional perspective, life is a tough, competitive struggle. In areas where everyone is engaged and fighting hard the bar is often set impressively high. There can be great rewards, but a man will be up against the best, and there are some amazing people out there. The worlds of work, sports, business, investment, and sex are inhabited by hordes of steely-eyed men who will take everything and won't give an inch.

Other areas offer opportunities for gathering low hanging fruit. Frequently the majority show little interest, or their success is about individual action rather than direct competition. It makes no sense to attempt to make the hard gains while easy advances remain available. Simply avoiding things which hold a man back, sap his resources, or otherwise lead him away from personal advance is an easy gain in life.

This article offers a list of things that make no sense when the costs and benefits are considered. In the interests of full disclosure the author does not claim to have avoided all these things in the past, but does claim to avoid them all in the present and hopes to avoid them all in the future.

1. Sex reassignment

A man has the fixed sexual function of providing sperm. A girl has the fixed sexual function of providing eggs and carrying the baby. When someone pretends they can change sexual function it ends badly.

2. Prostitutes

A prostitute takes a man’s strength, then his money but gives nothing in return. The addicted may lose the motivation to seek more satisfying inlets.

3. Gambling

Was there ever a worse way to spend time than to throw out money knowing that less can be expected to return? There are no legal exceptions unless you are a highly-skilled professional.

4. Pornography

Screens, paper, and rubber dollies can never substitute for the real thing. Girls fill the world. Take up the challenge and get some.

5. Self mutilation

A man’s body is his only tool. It makes no sense to drill holes in it or deface it with pictures. All bodies age, decay, and die, but why accelerate the process?

6. Jail

They say crime doesn't pay and it's true. Few things kill a man's opportunities like going to jail. More than two percent of US adult males are in jail—don't join them.

7. Homosexuality

Some men are apparently tempted to perform homosexual acts. A man who does endangers his health, fertility, and mental well-being. Every man has the power of choice. Make the smart choice.

8. Recreational drugs

Human bodies use a system of internal rewards and punishments to encourage functional behaviour and discourage dysfunctional behavior. One way to avoid this distinction is to use chemical means to simulate only positive feedback. To do so destroys that connection and removes the internal incentives for functional behavior. Disaster follows.

9. Consumer credit

Many men spend fifty years paying interest so they could make a few purchases one year earlier. Add up the costs and learn to avoid them.

10. Smoking and drinking

Day by day the damage to health, wealth, and well-being add up. It's a slow process that some smokers and drinkers will never experience due to an early death.

Life is precious, don't waste it

All ten together represent a substantial fraction of the effort and resources available to the world. A man who avoids them will be streets ahead of men who don't. Abstaining from the start requires no skill, talent, effort, or expense. Many of the truly miserable people of the world are in that state because they tried one of these things and then couldn't stop.

Every man has a certain stock of life in the form of time, money, health, brains, opportunity, motivation and effort. He deploys it in the way he thinks best and lives with the results, good or bad. Don't waste life on things which offer only regrets.

Read More: Average Never Got Anyone Anywhere

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

Ancient Sparta Showed That Women’s Rights Are A Function Of The Economy

December 18, 2014 | by Ken Bourne | Link | Original Link

Introduction

Many readers of ROK may believe that feminism, with its supposed goal of achieving equality between men and women by promoting women’s rights, is a relatively new concept that was developed after the Industrial Revolution. However, at least one attempt to implement women’s rights occurred in antiquity, in the land of ancient Sparta.

The very name Sparta makes one think of the epitome of manliness; a society composed of tall, muscular, and highly disciplined soldiers. The Spartans were ruthless warriors who despised weakness and cowardice. Given Sparta’s penchant for manliness, it may come as some surprise to learn that Sparta, of all the Greek city-states, had the most liberal civil laws when it came to the rights of its women.

In Spartan society, women could own estates, travel freely without male escort, and even initiate divorce. These rights were far from the historical norm. Indeed, one may see many parallels between women’s rights in Ancient Sparta and those found in the modern developed world.

Given how the manosphere, and by extension ROK, finds many laws related to feminism and the sexual revolution to be harmful to society, it is imperative that those involved in the manosphere understand how such laws came into practice in the first place. The implementation of laws supporting women’s rights is a function of the economy, and come into existence only through economic necessity. Spartan civilization provides a perfect example of this.

The events that led to the implementation of women's rights in Sparta

Spartan civilization was warrior-based, meaning that little effort was put into developing agriculture and art, and much effort was put into pillaging and stealing lands and wealth from other civilizations. When the Spartans conquered an enemy, they enslaved the populace and turned their lands into plantations. The enslaved people were expected to provide produce and goods to their Spartan masters. Slave revolts were common, and Sparta needed a large standing army in order to quell any rebellions that might occur.

When Sparta conquered the neighboring territory of Messenia in the late 8th century B.C., the first step in granting women more legal rights was taken. Sparta gained the valuable assets of fertile land and slaves by conquering Messenia, but Sparta faced new challenges through this victory. With such a large slave population, Sparta needed a much larger army to make sure the slaves didn't rebel against their masters.

By increasing the size of their army, there were fewer Spartan men on the home front to manage estates and the non-military and other economic aspects of Spartan civilization. Because of this, it became an economic necessity to grant women more political freedom so they could take the place of men by managing the estates and civil affairs of Sparta.

After the conquest of Messenia, the Spartan constitution was reformed so that women could have formal titles to property, as well as the legal rights, training and capability to do with land as Spartan men did. This was to provide an incentive to Spartan women to maintain the estates, because it is hard to motivate someone if they cannot profit from the fruits of their labor.

The decline of women's rights in Sparta

However, the rights women acquired did not last forever. These rights, which provided women with the necessary tools to successfully run estates, also increased the opportunity cost of having children. With women having more freedom than ever before, they ended up producing fewer children. By the early 4th century B.C., Sparta's population was one-fifth of what it had been 200 years prior, an astonishing reduction. It is interesting to note that this is also the case in the modern developed world, where birth rates have been below replacement levels for decades.

This shocking drop in population resulted in a smaller army, as fewer men were being born. Sparta's military was weakened. With Sparta's defeat by Thebes in 370 B.C., the Messenians revolted and defeated the Spartans. This defeat caused the Spartans to lose a significant amount of territory, as well as the large slave population they depended upon for their material well-being.

Because of this loss, there was no reason to maintain the constitutional reforms that gave Spartan women their rights, and by the time of the Romans (post-146 B.C.) Spartan women were again solely known for their domestic virtues and roles in religious ceremonies. Sparta even established a magistrate that oversaw the behavior of women, which would have been unthinkable during the Spartan occupation of Messenia. By this time, women's rights in Sparta were finished.

What Can We Learn From Spartan History?

One of the most important things we can learn from Spartan history is that women's rights were historically enacted not out of ideology, but rather out of economic necessity. There is a direct causation between the capture of Messenia and the rise of women's rights, as there is a direct causation between the loss of Messenia and the revoking of women's rights.

Keep in mind it was Spartan men who held governmental power, and it was Spartan men who gave women their short-lived economic and societal influence. They did this for shrewd economic purposes, and were not driven by ideology, even through the Spartan men were very democratic and considered themselves as "homoioi," or the "equal ones," and therefore did not lack ideology.

Clearly, women's rights in ancient Sparta was self-defeating, as the reduction in population weakened the army that held up the economic system in the first place. Hopefully, we can learn from history and try to correct the mistakes of the past.

Note: Credit goes to this piece for inspiring this article, and the original research paper this article is based on can be found here.

Read More: The Roots Of Masculinity In Ancient Rome

Ken Bourne
Ken Bourne writes when he thinks he has something useful to share.

Warning: The Following Article Is Racist And Sexist

December 18, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

While history is full of many bigoted tribal values that have unfairly prejudiced certain ethnic groups, and while many great qualities of different races and the different sexual lifestyle choices have been belittled, shamed, and persecuted, the aim of the author is not to engage in those kinds of historical attitudes. Rather, the goal here is to infuse you with some red pill wisdom and show you the very real differences that exist between different racial and sexual groups and demonstrate how those traits can be used to everyone's positive advantage.

Life Is Prejudicial

Let's say for example that you want to drive the Paris – Dakar rally, a grueling off-road race that lasts two weeks, covering some 1000km per day. Would you choose a Ferrari, a beat up 1980s Volkswagen Golf, or a custom BMW SUV? Are you sure you are not being prejudiced against sports cars or unfairly favoring SUVs?

You are starting a tech company to research new technologies and build a teleporter. Should you hire felons convicted of violent crimes, minimum wage workers who failed high school, women with arts degrees, or MIT Ph.D students? Are you sure you are not unfairly favoring those with a better education?

Your women's fashion company has a contract with a major Japanese clothing chain and you want to put on a fashion show for the client. To design the clothes would you choose a white Christian woman in her late 60s, a gay Japanese man in his early 30s, or a transsexual from Mexico? Should you use thin, young skinny Japanese models or look for obese males of African American origin? Aren't your choices sexist and racist and unfairly prejudiced against straight males and those with weight problems, whilst favoring Asian women and homosexuals?

You are opening a new drilling rig in the North Dakota Bakken oil fields. Should you hire strong male roughnecks, only homosexuals, or women from minority ethnic groups?

Market Forces

Wherever there is a decision to make, there will be a prejudice. Any preference that is selected will be inclined to favor the economic performance and bias a positive outcome. If you do not bias your decision towards a positive outcome, you will simply be operating at random. While nature often uses this method initially, what you are doing is ruling out any possibility for intelligence or clustering of talent and qualities.

Why was Apple dominated for so long by white males? White males had the computer skills, the drive and ambition to work all night when necessary, and the cultural identity to push each other along and create the best products they could. Mandating an equal number of women or minority racial groups to be employed in the company is negating the fact that cultural differences lead to different educational and lifestyle choices.

Where a young, single white male will be happy to sit up all night for weeks on end working in a team of programmers rebuilding your source code, a happily married Latin or Asian female in her early 40s with four young children might be less inclined. She wouldn't want the job in her wildest dreams. Mandating her ethnic and sexual group to be equally represented in the company is about as intelligent as demanding an equal number of Ferraris on the Paris – Dakar rally.

Horses For Courses

Everywhere you look you can find clustering. The sun and the planets are a result of certain atoms and minerals clustering together. You cannot live on Jupiter, not only because it's too cold, but also because it's largely composed of oceans of Methane gas. Luckily on Earth our oceans are made of water. Should we mandate an equal amount of methane oceans on earth, so we are not prejudiced against the ways other planets form? Of course not, it's precisely the clustering of certain qualities that creates the associated end result.

Cultural, educational, sexual, and ethnic differences are humans with a different vibration, just as gold deposits are different to iron ore deposits. Clusters of humans create different outlooks and are better and worse at different things. Choosing ONLY based on sex, skin color, or ethnic background is often not the way to go. However, mandating the skinny nerds play linebacker not only ruins the football team, but also prevents them from becoming the next Bill Gates or Michael Dell. You would, however, be equally as stupid assuming every skinny white guy with glasses is going to be the next tech billionaire, as you would be in trying to force the Latin maid to fill that role.

Natural Progression

Everything in life has a natural progression. You cannot force the bread to bake, it requires X number of minutes in the oven after you have mixed the correct ingredients and allowed the dough to rise. Doing it any other way will not produce the same results. The world is becoming more multicultural, and I don't see this as a particularly bad thing. It isn't a particularly good thing either. It's just a mixing pot of cultures and races coming together, in large part because we have colonized the entire planet and have far more rapid transportation than we used to. It's during barely 50 years from the last 20,000 that this has occurred.

Women have entered the workplace en-masse in large part because the world is a safer and more technologically advanced place now, but mandating women into universities and careers is no different from mandating them into motherhood and breeding programs as Hitler once did. Women can certainly undertake a great many administrative and office-type roles, at least as well as or better than men, but that doesn't mean that a company should be monitored and judged to make sure its work force is consistent with some kind of mean average—this would be ignoring the aforementioned clustering we see everywhere in nature.

Trying to break up and water down natural clusters of humans that have proven track records of results is a pointless and absurd venture, something that only a lawyer ruling by decree would undertake. Porsche is predominantly built by white males, so was Apple, so are many successful products. This is because in history white males had the time of day and intelligence to do these things. I'd agree that it's unfair to block out women and ethnic groups from being involved, but a company must always hire and do what suits its progress, or in time that company will fail.

Do we mandate that all marriages must be interracial, or that all neighborhoods must have equal numbers of all races, forcing people to move districts where necessary? As the world develops, different ethnic groups and different sexual preferences will naturally begin to blend. We can rule out unpleasant name calling and aggressive behaviors as antisocial. We can be friendly to our brothers and sisters whatever their lifestyle, sexual, religious or ethnic backgrounds, skin color, clothing choices etc. What we cannot do is try to force something that will naturally progress and in all likelihood requires another couple of centuries.

You cannot force a toddler to start running. You cannot force your computer to reboot when the operating system has not finished its installation. You cannot drive your car from the workshop elevator when they are still changing the tires. Everything takes time. Rushing things is worse than doing them too slowly.

Growing up I had friends from all over the world—Asians, Africans, Indians. I had a business partner from India another that was Hebrew. I wouldn't make crass jokes or use their race to drag them down, and I would certainly defend them if anyone tried that on, as I would expect them to defend me against stupid social shaming or slander. That is about as far as it goes, because every race, ethnic group, religious group, and even the geographical location you grow up in has an influence on how you turn out.

Any human resources department and even the local corner store makes prejudiced decisions in its hiring strategies that will benefit its future success in business. If it doesn't, it might fail. This is where market forces are vastly superior to mandate and legal waffle. Blending is a nice idea, but it takes time and in the long run you will also lose the identity of the individual components. That might prove to be far more of a mistake than simply allowing some natural blending to progress of it's own accord.

Government always oversteps the mark, with narrow-minded, legalistic theories that in practice prove worse than obsolete. They supposedly do this with the best of intentions, but in large part it is done to keep themselves in a job. No one should have to endure slander and hatred, but we already knew that. We also know that sticks and stones won't break my bones, but words will never hurt me. Don't we?

Read More: Super Bowl Commercials Aren't Sexist

The Mainstream Media Creates Rigged Debates That Tell Society What To Value

December 19, 2014 | by Ken Bourne | Link | Original Link

A few years ago, I was watching CNN for some reason or another when I saw something so ironic it would make the cast of Portlandia look like a platoon of Green Berets: Eliot Spitzer, a disgraced New York politician famously shamed by the mainstream media for his involvement in a prostitution scandal, and less famous for his role inside mainstream media as co-host of a CNN talk show, was acting as an arbiter of social justice by leading a debate discussing whether or not the French ban on wearing the Muslim niqab was right or wrong.

While the debate itself is interesting, and it brings up valid points about freedom and the full extent of the First Amendment to protect religious values, this is not going to be discussed in this article. What will be discussed is how the niqab debate, and others like it, demonstrates how the mainstream media protects certain values, and thereby prevents true change in values from occurring. I will also discuss what the manosphere can do about it.

Maintaining Assumed Values Protects Power

The media provides a 24/7 newstream of stories covering controversial “issues” like gay rights, terrorism, gun control, feminism, etc. These stories are complemented with debates where several preselected viewpoints are raised and the relative merits or failures of each are revealed through discussion. This may make the average viewer feel fine and good because the impression given by the debate is one of fairness: all possible and reasonable viewpoints have been presented, and people can make an “informed” decision as to what argument is best using their own judgment, and therefore vote accordingly.

The problem with this is of course that the debates are completely manufactured to cause the audience to accept certain values. The debate is, for all intents and purposes, a ruse to make people believe they have free choice in deciding who is right or wrong on some superficial level, while the real values below the surface are completely undisturbed by public opinion.

How the Process Works

For example, assumed values were needed for the niqab debate to occur: both debaters were women, and professionals, so viewers must accept professional women as being intrinsic value of society; values like the right of women to work are the axioms society is assumedly based on.

It is certain that capitalists benefit from women working, as it decreases the value of labor. Capitalists therefore want people to accept the idea that women should work. Capitalists convince people of this axiom through the mainstream media not by debating it and convincing people of its truth per se, but by making people assume its truth through an entirely different and superficial debate.

A debate that can only occur if the desired axiom is assumed to be true in the first place. In this manner, the power structure (meaning capitalist interests) are protected through the medium of debate. Framing debates in such a way can be repeated ad nauseam for any axiom or value to literally develop an entire worldview in whoever is unfortunate enough not to know better. To put it more bluntly, you can argue with everyone else about how good Obama looks in a coffee colored suit, but you can’t argue about how much power the president really has. Or, in a more extreme example, you can argue about how much power the president has, but you can’t argue about why we have a democracy in the first place.

Examples of Debates that Maintain Assumed Values

To use other examples, take the recent debates in the US over Obamacare. The superficial side of the debate is summed up by these viewpoints: some argue that government subsidized insurance provided by Obamacare is bad for business and unconstitutional, while some argue that healthcare is a “human right” and support it.

While the mainstream media will mention and hold debates between these viewpoints, what it won’t question is the model of using insurance to provide health care in the first place. We’ll never be allowed to talk about the axiomatic level of the discussion as long as the mainstream media controls the debate.

Take note that both the Democratic and Republican parties favor the utilization of the insurance model. Who are they really protecting? Why protect the insurance model when it is such a bad value? I imagine insurance companies have a lot of influence over this particular debate.

Similarly, the advance of ISIS after the fall of Mosul in mid 2014 caused the US to intervene yet again in Iraq. The debate at that time was whether the US should carpet bomb Islamic State (Republican position) or provide humanitarian aid to refugees fleeing Islamic State (Democrat Position). Analogous viewpoints were adopted during the Libya intervention in 2011, or the Invasion of Iraq in 2003; the Left will typically talk of humanitarian intervention to justify military action, while the Right will advocate crushing the enemy because they directly threaten the nation, but the end result is still the same: the enemy gets bombed, which is what the system wanted anyway.

The debates on the issue are just there to make people think that they have some input in the way the system acts, when in fact it is the people who control the debates that have the greatest influence by controlling what is an axiom and what is not, what is assumed for the debate to occur, and what is not.

Why Should the Manosphere Care?

The manosphere needs to understand how debates work and what they can achieve. If our opponents, especially feminists and progressives, in the mainstream media continue to control debates and therefore control the axioms and values people unconsciously adopt, they will effectively continue to control legislation in the US and other western republics in ways that are harmful to the manosphere by controlling the opinion of voters.

What the manosphere must do is take the fight to the enemy. Instead of getting trapped in the rigged debates of our opponents, we must attack the axioms and values that their debates are based upon in the first place. If we take part in their debates, we are shooting ourselves in the foot because involvement requires conceding to their worldview at some level.

Absent of some paradigm-shifting technology, or the rise of some kind of hypothetical “manosphere philosopher king” to install a beneficial totalitarian dictatorship, we must use the means provided by representative democracy and fight for the control of voter opinion in order to get the legislation that would best serve the manosphere. Until then, we are left with this:

No it doesn't Eliot, no it doesn't…

But maybe it will.

Read More: How To Turn A Small Victory Against Mainstream Media Into A Red Pill Movement

Ken Bourne

Ken Bourne writes when he thinks he has something useful to share.

Why Self Education Is Superior To Today's Structured Schooling

December 19, 2014 | by A "Nihilist" Frank | Link | Original Link

A Hatred Of School

I, like many kids, always hated school. Now I am not talking about a petty childish hatred of school, or the "I hate being cooped up all day and want to go out and play" kind of hatred of school. Nor am I referring to a hatred of 1980s and 90s school social culture—cliques, status, sports, bullying, hierarchy, etc—which was often criticized in my day in the wake of school shootings. No, what I am talking about is a serious and legitimate hatred of the structured, regimented, formal, and forced "learning" of school.

I absolutely hated the structured learning and grading of public school and formal education. In school, I generally despised being told what to study, what to read, what to write, what projects to complete, what assignments were due, as well as the assigning of pointless busywork and homework and then, to top it all off, being arbitrarily "graded" by some depressed divorced wino with a liberal arts degree and a chip on her shoulder.

Now I could understand and appreciate that a certain point of these tasks was to teach responsibility, and to prepare students for the deadlines and pressures of the workplace and "real world," but that didn't mean I had to like it. It also wasn't that I didn't enjoy or appreciate learning and knowledge. I was always an avid reader growing up, so I much preferred to read the fiction and non-fiction books of my own choosing, at my own leisure, while independently studying subjects of interest on my own time.

As such, I pretty much skated through school and college with minimal effort and an apathetic attitude. I rarely applied myself academically, and was generally an academic slacker, with the exception of select projects or classes that happened to hold my interest. Luckily, I was always intelligent enough to pull in decent grades with practically little effort on my part, so I made the rational decision early on in high school and college not to expend a lot of time or energy academically, when just “half-assing” it would suffice with decent results. The only reason I even stuck it out in college, despite contemplating quitting after every semester, was the military—but that’s another story altogether.

Now I am not special. I’m not sitting here trying to compare myself to Einstein, who was also apparently bored by school early on due to his superior intellect. The point of this brief anecdote is simply to say that I—like many kids—hated the structure and forced learning environment of formal education. Many kids, especially those that are academically gifted and of higher intelligence, hate the regimented structure of being told what to study, and how to do so.

This formal structure—by design—rarely does anything to encourage or promote independent thought and learning, or critical thinking skills. It only truly caters to the suggestible, the submissive, the conformist, and the over-achiever eager to please. And while the progressive “educators” still claim to promote individualism and creativity, it is only within their fascist guidelines of political-correctness and non-offensiveness.

Problems With Modern “Education”

Yet this article is not really about the problems with today’s educational and academia system–of which there are countless–and I therefore don’t want to get too off topic by elaborating on these issues. Suffice it to say, that these problems will only continue to increase as the educational system becomes even more progressive, feminized, centralized, and geared towards the lowest common denominator.

Essentially, it is a system increasingly designed to indoctrinate, not educate. And although this indoctrination is primarily found in the subjective liberal arts subjects, a generation of students neutered in independent thought, independent learning, critical thinking, and creativity skills will eventually bleed over into the sciences, tech, engineering, and mathematics fields as well.

Yet the “STEM” fields are also not entirely immune from the systemic indoctrination and social-engineering of progressive education. For as these fields become increasingly feminized in a ridiculous politically correct attempt to encourage girls, it will inevitably discourage young men, while also stifling the creativity historically attributed to men in these fields.

Finally, when the system isn’t busy indoctrinating children, the remaining time is spent acting in loco parentis for the problem children, or the children of parents who expect the system to raise their kids for them. This then further diverts time and resources away from actually “educating” intelligent kids who may actually have a real future. Therefore, is it really any wonder why children, especially young men, are becoming more and more disillusioned with school?

Seeking Self Enlightenment

So just because the modern educational system is increasingly forsaking intelligent young men, while catering to an ever-increasing population of lobotomized children devoid of independent thought, this is still no excuse for children and men to “lay down and die” intellectually. This is instead a call-to-arms for all men—especially those of you still in school or college—to understand that the educational system is broken, and to free yourself from the chains of indoctrination.

Seek and embrace the power of self-education. There is no excuse for ignorance. In fact, I view the concept of self-education within the larger context of the MGTOW movement as a whole.

Men should view the acquisition of knowledge, and the strengthening of the mind, as one of the key pillars in overall self-improvement. As such, there is a liberating freedom and joy found in pursuing your own academic interests and study. While the structure of formal education is often intellectually confining and stressful, self-education should be relaxing, cathartic, and enlightening.

Self-education can mean many different things to different people–and there is technically no wrong answer–but the way I see it, self-education is the pursuit of knowledge and learning, in areas and subjects of one's own choosing, and at one's own leisure. It is the pursuit of constructive and intellectually stimulating and strengthening endeavors.

I understand that not everyone enjoys reading, but I can't stress enough the importance of reading as a foundation of self-education and improvement. I believe that all men should take the time to read, and to study topics and subjects of their own interest. I also believe that these topics should include a wide range of non-fiction, as well as current events, news, editorials, and classic literature, as a part of becoming intellectually well-rounded.

Yet self-education can be much more than just reading, it can also include pursuing constructive hobbies, learning new skills, or engaging in group conversation and debate. It may also include learning to play an instrument or music, or perhaps taking up other artistic or literary pursuits. Self-education can also include teaching yourself a new skill through trial and error, or learning a new skill or trade under the instruction of a qualified teacher or class.

Simply because the educational system is broken, that doesn't mean that one cannot benefit from a formal class, or instruction under a qualified teacher or mentor. There are still decent and qualified teachers out there, as well as practical or informative classes—whether college, community college, trade schools, continuing education, or community classes. Self-education does not have to be solitary, it simply means pursuing your own intellectual interests at your own leisure, and for your own enjoyment and benefit.

I am also not advocating dropping out, or failing to complete your primary education just because the system is broken. This also does not necessarily mean that you should forgo formal education or college, if it's something that you desire or need for a chosen career path, so long as you weigh the costs and benefits. In the end, all I am saying is to be the master of your own educational and intellectual destiny.

Conclusion

Self-education—and the pursuit of knowledge and truth—should be the goal of all men, regardless of how they may achieve it, or how they may perceive their own intelligence. There is simply no excuse for ignorance.

Although I personally have a college degree, I am not some sort of elitist snob who equates a degree or higher education with intelligence or knowledge. In fact, in many cases, a degree is nothing more than a very expensive sheet of paper. The pursuit of knowledge does not require a degree or formal education to validate it, nor does it necessarily require those things to achieve it. Self-education is liberating, enlightening, and is a lifelong pursuit, and it is up to you how you achieve it.

Read More: 5 Signs The American Education System Is Doomed

A "Nihilist" Frank

Frank is a nihilistic, misanthropic, politically-incorrect, cynical-asshole, intellectual, metal-head, weightlifter, conservative-Libertarian, Generation X'er. His observations and opinion of modern society and culture is far from flattering. His essays can be found at www.nihilisttemple.com

Beware The Coming Breed of “Pro-Male” Women

December 19, 2014 | by Drexel Scott | Link | Original Link

As Roosh accurately predicted it would a couple years ago, the manosphere is now mainstream. Excited as I am to see and be a part of this change in the direction of the narrative, I find it also prudent to discuss where these changes will lead and how we can remain vigilant—lest our guards drop and we find ourselves in unpleasant circumstances once more.

Now that feminism is starting to be considered “uncool” by many women, more and more of them will begin to openly speak against it. It does not matter if they were feminists last week; if it hurts their status today, then women will throw even their best friends under the bus without batting an eye. Many will quickly and sharply denounce their old friends, even taking the extra step of becoming openly “pro-male” if it becomes a popular stance that celebrities endorse (which it will).

To many men, this will appear to be progress. In some ways, it really will be. But consider that a “pro male” woman, a real one, is just a person who respects other people. She’s probably also a “pro female” woman, and just pro-humanity in general. As such, truly pro-male women probably never identified as feminists to begin with, having seen through the layers of deception and nonsense early on.

So the pro-male women are already the ones who are treating us well, and will continue to do so regardless of what is popular in the cultural narrative and indoctrinated into the masses through expertly hypnotic media outlets. The newly “pro-male” women we will see are simply going to be doing what women always do: outwardly going along with whatever gets them what they want, while inwardly having wildly different feelings and motives.

Remember, women are like water: their behavior conforms to the shape of whatever container you put them in.

If the media says “being feminist is uncool, being pro-male is the new black,” then women will jump on board. Their old beliefs will be discarded in a flash, since they were never real beliefs to begin with. Nor are her new ones, which is why she can make the switch without one iota of discomfort or cognitive dissonance.

The reason I am giving this warning today is that men will soon be in a uniquely vulnerable position and we will want to stay wary of this. Having been denied the opportunity to build real, loving relationships with real, loving women, we have pragmatically settled on simply sleeping with as many attractive and easy women as we can while committing nothing and compromising even less. As such, I believe that men are in a state of deep and painful yearning for true femininity—with all its supportive and healing qualities—and will be fairly easy to trick with a presentation that appears to be what we’ve been looking for.

We have seen before how prominent manosphere personalities have thrown everything out the window to get married, tarnishing their own legacies and making themselves out to be hypocrites all to lock down that “one special girl who showed them how wrong they were.” Now, I am certainly not denying the possibility that they truly did meet a unicorn, a beautiful and feminine supportive and loving woman who wasn’t just a manipulative, back-stabbing slut in a unicorn uniform.

But what all experienced men know is far more likely, is that they got tricked by a woman with better game than them. I suppose we shall see as time goes on, whether those relationships end early or not. Regardless, I don’t want to see a whole slew of learned men suddenly changing their minds and hearts because the cute girl they’re dating supports “men’s rights” or took a class about it.

Of course, the thing to keep in mind above else is this:

Women don’t really “believe in causes”—most of the time anyway. When you spend enough time around them, and around the kinds of people who “protest for causes” and “do activism,” you will tend to find that all such people—regardless of sex—are all heart and no brain, all passion and no reason, and are generally just protesting because they enjoy the feeling of it.

They think it’s fun to make signs and yell about things. And to be fair, it actually can be pretty fun. But the point is that most women are not nearly as attached to their “causes” as they seem, with the exception of the fervor with which they fight for animal rights.

So do not be fooled that the newly “pro-male” woman “gets it” so to speak, or understands the red pill man’s perspective. She does not. She has not one of the thousands of requisite male experiences she would have to have in order to “understand our side of things.”

At worst, she is saying it because she’s an undercover feminist trying to get some dirt on men. At best, she is saying it because she likes you and wants to impress you.

And as the frog sank, he surely thought “I knew it all along”….

Read Next: Women Are The Scorpion, Men Are The Frog

Drexel Scott
Truth is my religion, and sovereignty my destiny. I'm an entrepreneur who teaches what I know, and you can find my #1 Closing Advice book, Straight To Sex, at my website: http://www.drexelscott.com/s2s

Skateboarding Can Teach Young Males Self-Discipline And Hard Work

December 19, 2014 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

Nothing is more pathetic than the 30-year-old long boarder appearing disheveled as if he just rolled out of bed, skating down the street with a dumb, smug smile on his face. These people are idiots and should be treated as such; infants stuck in arrested development. However, as a young man growing up in a small town, nothing was more exciting than that beautiful sport of skateboarding.

As a teenager, many boys have teenage angst and aggression. This is just natural for young bucks. Playing war, wanting adventure, violence, and tons of youthful energy; what to do with all that energy? Your body is also going through all sorts of weird changes at that age, like getting hair where you didn't have before and constantly getting boners. It is a difficult time.

I was no different and needed an outlet. I loved playing sports, basketball being my number one. However, it was missing something. One day, I was introduced to skateboarding by the older kids in school and my childhood changed forever.

Basketball was fun, but it was far too team-oriented for me. Playing basketball in school involved memorization of useless and ineffective plays. It really took the fun and spontaneous nature out of the sport. Skateboarding was not like that. It involved you, and only you, against the world. It retained individualism and the fun of being spontaneous. It also fed into my wanderlust and need for adventure, including finding new spots to skate and exploring my surroundings.

As I progressed in the sport, I realized that all of your skating progress was solely dependent on how you invested your time. If you slacked, it showed in your abilities. In skateboarding, when you failed, you literally would dust yourself off and try again. Eventually through determination and patience, you would succeed, and the victory was only yours. No team, no group, no herd.

Nothing tasted better than this kind of personal victory as a young man. Landing that trick you'd been trying for months was the greatest reward from hard work. If you wanted to learn a new trick, you would work at it like any other craftsman may work at something; progressively getting more technical. Skateboarding is a microcosm of the real world and a good life lesson for young males.

If you did want to skate with a group, it was always a cutthroat competition. You and your friends would see who could "out skate" the other. It taught you how to work at something and to rise above the group as the best. This was always a trial and error, you might not always be the best, but you would strive for it. It was also fun to skate around with a little crew, doing what boys do; causing some trouble and being rebellious.

I remember sneaking out late at night just to go skating. It was an outlet as a young male to melt away the anger and frustration that comes with being a pimply teenager. Besides being a great individualistic sport to build character, personality, honesty, integrity and enjoying one's own company and solitude, girls always thought skateboarders were attractive, which was just an added bonus.

As an older, wiser man now, I have given up the sport (as adult males should at some point). I would say that the experience of skateboarding still translates to many things including progress in career, love, and life. It taught me the valuable lesson of determination, self-discipline, honesty, and patience. It also taught me to enjoy being by myself and to relish the silent victories I accomplished in my solitude. These are the most important victories of all.

It was after I fell on a rail while attempting a difficult trick and needed cortisone shots in my back, that I realized the dangers and hung up my skateboard forever. But in a time when war and violence is nearly unheard of, the new war for young men is a war on your own body. You beat yourself to get better and better. You push yourself to do your best.

It is the most spiritual and necessary thing in our modern world for young males. With no real wars, with daily emasculation and docility forced on young men, with a lack of experience to build courage, skateboarding is a way to gain a skill in a productive and goal-oriented way. Nothing in the world is more important than this kind of personal battle and eventual victory for young males.

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

Jon Bergeron
Jon is a part time misanthrope, full time American. Jon loathes modern academia, art, culture, literature, politics, television, and everything on god's green earth that has been inundated with boring, predictable, impotent, vapid Cultural Marxist horseshit which, mind you, is totally void of a single individual thought. Jon just realized he is a full time misanthrope. Anyways, Jon prays for this to change one day and something new to come along. Until then, Jon remains pessimistic with a loaded .357 next to his bed. Jon can be reached at

#GamerGate, #MetalGate, And The Campaign Against Creativity

December 20, 2014 | by Erik Fomorian | Link | Original Link

As the anti-GamerGate movement starts to lose its momentum, close on its heels is what is becoming known as #MetalGate. Although the push for censorship in metal music and the accusations of its fan base being social pariahs and misogynists isn't quite to the level the gaming community has experienced in the last couple of months, we are beginning to see a trend in what SJWs truly detest.

What do the gaming community and the metal fan base have in common? They are both groups of predominantly white, male, social outcasts enjoying something unique and creative.

Creating Social Outcasts

Perhaps my experience in high school was different than yours, but if I remember correctly, the headbangers weren't exactly the most popular group of kids in school, nor were the gamers. Both groups were made up of the "weird" kids; one group sitting together playing Japanese card games, the other brooding in corners with dark, scary looking band shirts. All the while, the popular kids looked on, ridiculing their hobbies and further isolating both groups of people.

So the gamers and metalheads plunge themselves into a community of people who share their experiences and lose themselves in something empowering, be it controlling a powerful knight who must save the world, or violent lyrics over heavy riffs and fast solos. But just as the "journalists" gripe about the portrayal of women in video games, so too do armchair activists take issue with metal; because some of the lyrics might hurt someone's feelings.

But are these really the issues that have the liberal arts graduates and suburban soccer moms in such a tizzy? Or is it just the continuation of their desire to ostracize and shame the weird kids? Or does the creativity and talent needed to perfect these crafts make them nervous?

While I will agree that some lyrics in metal are gratuitously offensive, I don't believe that is what truly has so many panties in bunches. If gimmicks for shock value were truly so offensive to them, you'd see these people equally appalled at naked protests or the most inflammatory sides of feminist rhetoric. But those are practices adapted by their own people; they're on the same team, so you never hear a peep about such gimmicks.

So what do the paladins and valkyries of political correctness really take issue with in the worlds of video games or heavy metal?

Creativity and Originality

The lazy, unmotivated, and boring masses fear all things unique and original. It may be hard at first to see the artistic side of a game where you can pick up prostitutes or in music that seems to advocate the dismemberment of virgins, but look a bit deeper. The best video games have complicated storylines, perfect mood-setting background music, and masterfully created graphics. Aside from those factors, consider the hours upon hours of development and millions of lines of code just to make those games function properly in different consoles.

Likewise, the skill required to play GOOD metal music is not acquired easily. Just about every serious guitarist will learn a Metallica or Iron Maiden solo in their lifetime, but consider actually creating those solos. Not only are they technically difficult to pull off, but making them soulful and congruent with their music requires strokes of genius.

Both the gaming and metal communities are brimming with originality, and the common person is threatened by it. They spent so much time pushing gamers and headbangers into the proverbial basements of their parents, and now they chastise them for finding something unique and creative that makes them happy. At their most basic level, social justice warriors are just very dedicated bullies.

White Culture is Evil

Aside from their hatred (or maybe fear) of all things original, the PC police seems to hate seeing white males enjoying something. This is not to say that there isn't a wide demographic of people who enjoy video games or heavy metal, but the overwhelming majority of these fans are caucasian males.

It is no secret that for every offensive line a metal song, there is likely fifty more offensive lyrics in rap or hip-hop. While these genres are no strangers to public scrutiny, it should be noted that one of rap's most controversial figures is a white man. With a few exceptions, rap and hip-hop is primarily a subculture of minorities, and thus further beyond reproach than metal. SJW's seem to believe that every culture is inherently more valuable and meaningful than white culture, crying the hardest and bitching the loudest when any fandom lacks enough color or has disproportionate amounts of Y chromosomes.

Conclusion

It is clear that the social justice warriors are campaigning against the social outcasts rather than the misogyny, homophobia, racism, or general prejudice they claim to be fighting against. In the wake of their attacks on the gaming world, and on the cusp of their attacks against the metal world, one must wonder what is next. AnimeGate? ComicBookGate? LARPGate?

Anything requiring imagination and anything with fan-base of social outcasts is fair game to the SJWs. Though I don't personally think #MetalGate will need to become as big as #GamerGate, I do think all unique and interesting subcultures are at risk of infiltration and vilification. It's nearing the end of the year and the PC police need to meet their quotas.

Read More: What Is #Metalgate?

Erik Fomorian
Erik is a disillusioned American veteran. Follow him on Twitter @eeDubbs.

The Two Most Unforgivable Things A Woman Can Say

December 20, 2014 | by Ario Barzan | Link | Original Link

Let's face it, dating today is quite an ordeal, akin to tap dancing on a minefield while blindfolded. Texting and smartphones, along with general ill-manners and this bizarre need to act aloof out of some misbegotten fear of "showing too much interest" has made dating a constant game. It almost makes you question if it's even worth it when you finally do meet somebody you have a good amount of interest in and chemistry with.

And therein lies the dilemma – what does happens when you meet someone, they actually reciprocate the level of interest you show, don't invent last second cop-outs to get out of dates, and maybe even aggressively pursue you? The next logical step seems to be more dates, more time, more overnight stays, essentially 1-2-3-BAM!, relationship.

While this may be the norm for most blue pillers out there, let's face facts: sometime even the best of us get enamored easily and next thing we know we're in it to win it, along with all of the stress, anxiety, and general chaos that lends itself to that. Yes, sometimes every day can seem like a war in a relationship, and along with the arguments come threats, manipulation, and plenty of vendettas to settle.

Unfortunately for men in the west, the odds are terribly stacked against you that you'll ever stand a chance in court, whether family court or superior court. With the act of exclusive, serious dating (and even to a lesser extent, courtship) being similar to playing with fire these days, here are two things you must never hear directed toward you by a woman:

1. “I can go sleep with (Beta Schmuck X)”

This is usually spewed during arguments about sex, whether it be accusations flying either way of infidelity or when a woman with a voracious sexual appetite (usually suspicious on its own) doesn’t feel like her man finds her attractive, or isn’t providing enough sexcapades for her, whether in duration or frequency. A woman will say this to assert that she is still attractive and desired by many guys and uses it to make her feel young and pine for her “glory” days when she had her pick of men for each night of the week and practically had to beat them off with a stick.

2. “I’m calling the police.”

This is often thrown out when a woman wants to assert eminent domain. For example, she may say it if the man is at her house, an argument ensues, and voices and tempers escalates. She often says it when she insists on the man leaving, whether for good or not. Sometimes men may really feel strongly about staying and fixing the problem, be it because of a misunderstanding, good intentions somehow gone awry, or the woman is flat-out being unreasonable.

Regardless, this is a power posture no matter how you slice it. If there truly is no imminent threat to the woman (or any other persons in the building) or animals or property (and let’s be real here—often perceived threats do not amount to verbal or expressed threats having preceded them) this is still a preferred gesture of a woman not of sound mind. Running to Daddy Government when throwing a tantrum is often a women’s sole guerilla tactic for making her point when she wants it made.

In either situation, it is your best interest to simply cut all ties from that point on, period. Think of them as dead to you, as walking dust. Nobody talks to somebody to claim to love or respect in either manner. NOBODY. How she was raised (or lack thereof!), socio-economic class, education level, and any and all other circumstances are completely irrelevant. There is no leg to stand on here.

These are inexcusable to even think, let alone mention out loud. Face it, if she say either one, she really must not care about you that damn much! And be honest with yourself, if she said it once and even if the situation settled itself and cooler heads prevailed, she can say it twice, and then she can say it a hundred times. Even once is unforgiveable and it's then time for some serious soul searching.

Do you really want to look into the mirror and repeat to yourself over and over "Do I really want to stay with someone who threatened to go and fuck her thirsty beta ex just because I didn't feel like having sex with her after coming home from my second job at 5am?" or "Do I really want to be in a relationship with someone who acted like they were about to dial 911 because I wouldn't leave?"

Granted, these are rather mundane and silly-sounding examples, but they serve as examples nonetheless. Sometimes they really are that level of ridiculous anyway, and you never know exactly when you'll be thrust into such a scenario. As we all know, they often just manifest out of thin air even when everything in the relationship can seem fine and dandy.

If you find yourself faced with either situation, it's time to exert some self-respect like you've never exerted it before. And if you truly are the relationship type, understand that there are millions of women out ready and available to at least give something an attempt to get off of the ground. Find yourself someone far superior and more respectful who can handle stress and problem-solve better. Your future will thank you for it!

Read More: Never Fully Give A Woman Your Loyalty

Ario Barzan
Ario is more or less The Devil incarnate. When not devouring Sonoran hot dogs or herding cats he's posting gym selfies to validate his existence to the world.

How To Speak Deeply With Confidence And Authority

December 21, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

How does the sound of your voice resonate with other people?

The pitch and tone of our voices directly affects how we communicate our feelings and desires. You may be coming across as needy and insecure without even knowing it.

To illustrate this fact, I'd like you to imagine that you're sitting on a bench and waiting at the doctor's office or waiting for the bus. Let's say you're waiting for the bus, to make this visualization a bit easier.

You notice a man walking towards you out of the corner of your eye. As you turn, you see that he's hunched over and looking at the ground. He's not particularly old, just seemingly weak and insecure. You look back ahead.

"Excuse me," calls out a deep voice from beside you.

What do you do?

Now let's take a step back and rewind. You're sitting at the same bus stop, all alone. Again you catch a person walking towards you out of the corner of your eye. This time you turn and see a tall man with wide shoulders strutting your way. You hold eye contact with him for a minute and then turn back to look ahead.

"Excuse me," calls out a voice from beside you.

This time it's not deep, but rather high pitched and frail, like that of an old women. How do you react?

Do you see what I'm getting at? Both of these situations seem odd because we instinctively link deep voices to characteristics like strength, confidence, and authority. Dwayne “The Rock” Johnson is a big dude and he speaks like one. Steve Jobs was an incredible innovator and marketer. No one will argue that. But watch his videos and listen to his voice. He sounds rather weak and insecure, nothing like The Rock.

If you didn’t know these two men and only heard their voices, you’d paint two very distinct pictures of what you’d expect them to look like and how you’d expect them to act.

You must speak from your belly

To speak in a deep, authoritative tone you must use your full diaphragm. This is known as speaking from your belly. Or speaking from your balls.

Men with deep voices do this, either naturally or because they’ve learned how. Men with shallow, weak voices do not. They instead speak from their chests or throats. Not only does this sound weaker, but the sound does not travel as far. That’s why people like this are often asked to repeat themselves – something that will often damage your confidence and self-esteem.

To internalize this concept I want you to perform the following exercise.

1. Take five breaths through your nose and deep into your belly, so that it rises and expands as you breathe. As you exhale, say “hello” each time.

2. Take five breaths through your mouth and into your chest, so that is rises and expands as you breathe. As you exhale, say “hello” each time.

3. Take five shallow breaths through your mouth and into your throat. As you exhale, say “hello” each time.

How do you sound each time? Do it again if you have to.

If you’re doing it right, your voice should be rather deep for the belly breaths, high pitched for the throat breaths, and somewhere in between for the chest breaths.

Do it again and feel your belly, your chest, and your throat vibrate as you go. Make sure that you’re speaking from your belly. This will change how you speak. People will perceive you as more confident and you’ll embody this confidence as a result.

This is an excerpt from my new book Confidence Hacks. For 23 more hacks, click here.

Read More: 6 Habits That Hold Men Back

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

A Step-by-Step Guide To Set Up A Date Through Texting

December 21, 2014 | by Dave Perrotta | Link | Original Link

You had an amazing time with a girl. The two of you hit it off, exchanged some banter and laughs, connected with each other, and she gave you her phone number. You planned to meet up some time in the next week or two.

You feel refreshed and exhilarated, confident that you'll see her again soon.

You text her a few days later and ask, "Hey, how's it going?"

But she doesn't respond. Or, if she does respond, it's not the response you hoped for. You ask yourself, "What happened to the fun, receptive girl from the other night who was excited about going out with me?"

There's a reason why this happens…and it's the same reason why most guys fail when they text girls. You forget why you get her number in the first place. You get her number because you want to go on date and potentially move things further—NOT because you want to stay up all night texting her or asking how her day is going. And most of all, NOT to get validation from her.

Keep this clearly in mind: your #1 goal when texting girls is to set up the date. Every text message should get you closer to that goal.

So, how do you do this the right way? Well, it all starts from the first text message. And, as a side note, you should ALWAYS text her the next day. The first text should jog her memory of who you are, and induce some of the emotions of your interaction. This reminds her of why she gave you her number in the first place.

Here's an example from a text exchange that led to a date, starting from the first message:

Me: Almost had a nervous breakdown today. Overwhelmed with self-consciousness over my abundance of plaid shirts.

Her: I literally just laughed out loud at my work.

Me: I can't be held responsible for your valley girl laughing antics.

Her: Hahaha stop! I'm laughing, it's inappropriate. What are u up to?

For some context, I met this girl the night before. During our interaction, she teased me about my plaid button-down shirt and I teased her about sounding like a valley girl. So, I made a few funny statements based on those topics. She responded well.

You can craft a text like this easily, too. Just think of something from your conversation, or the environment, and make a slightly sarcastic statement about it. This kind of text is much better than the generic, boring texts that guys usually send.

Once you send the first few texts and get the conversation going, it's time to push for the meet up. Now, there's two different ways you can do this—it will depend on how responsive the girl is to your previous texts.

If she's responsive and the text conversation flows, she's already interested in hanging out with you. You can be more casual with this text, but still lead and set the logistics. The key is to suggest a plan, and give her two different time options. For example:

Let's grab a drink this week. There's a bar on Comm Ave with $4 margarita specials. What works better for you, Tuesday or Thursday night?

This is a little trick I learned from my days as a door-to-door salesman, The time option shifts her thinking. Instead of a "Yes, I want to hang with this guy," or a, "No, I don't want to see him," she's thinking about which time works best. This text signals that you assume the date is happening. If one of the time options doesn't work, she'll usually suggest a time herself.

But if she's a little cold to your texts, then you need to push the envelope a bit. Whenever you are about to give up on a girl, and basically think there's no chance she's going to talk to or hang out with you, you have to lay it all on the line.

How do you do that? Well, the text I'm about to give you has gotten my friends and I more dates than I can count. But, I recommend only using it if it's congruent with how you really feel about the girl. Here it is:

Hey girl. I'm going to cut the BS. You're one of the sexiest girls I've met in [City Name] and we should get together soon and either get a drink, or rob a bank. Whatever you're in the mood for.

The point is, don't ever leave anything on the table. That rule can apply with really everything in life, but especially with girls. This way you'll never regret not taking that extra chance.

Another side note: I recommend grabbing drinks with a girl on the first date. Why? The bar is a social environment and it's low pressure. Unlike dinner, where you're forced to commit to a 1-2 hour ordeal with a person you know nothing about yet, drinks are much more casual. If you hate each other, you can leave after the first drink—no harm, no foul.

The other benefit? It's easy to bounce around. You can grab a drink at one bar, then hop to the next. It's more of an adventure.

To quickly sum up how to set up a good date through texting, use these four rules as a guideline:

1. Start with a short, funny statement that jogs her memory of you and your initial interaction.

2. Be playful and self-amused. Ask yourself, "Is this text getting me closer to a date, or adding value to her day?" If not, don't send it.

3. When setting up the date, give her two time options so she shifts her thinking from "yes" or "no," to "when."

4. Get drinks on the first date. It's simple, requires little investment, and allows for an adventurous night.

Read More: Women Are To Blame For Aggressive Texting

Dave Perrotta
Daveprot is a dating coach, entrepreneur, and world traveler. ROK readers can get his free ebook, 10 Rules for Texting a Girl You Like on his website, PostGradCasanova.com

5 Reasons Why You Should Not Date Indian Girls

December 22, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As America becomes increasingly diverse, prospective love tourists have the ability to sample foreign dishes without having to book a flight to the country where they came from. To the uninitiated, Indian girls seem like one of the most enticing items on the menu. If you had a middle-class or wealthy upbringing, you probably grew up knowing a few Indians, and you might be fooled into thinking they make a better bet then the hordes of selfie-addicted, socially retarded white girls you're used to.

Don't. Do. It.

If you live in the west, dating an Indian girl is one of the worst decisions you can make. Indians combine the worst of their native culture and the worst of American culture in one disgusting, rancid stew. Here's why you should never date—or even pump and dump—an Indian girl.

1. They’re unattractive

Forget about Aishwaryi Rai and every other smoking hot Bollywood actress you’ve ever seen: the average Indian girl has a Coke can physique and bad genes. While not as disgustingly obese as the average American, even fit Desi girls are packing more poundage than any girl should be legally allowed to have. Even if she’s in shape, expect her to balloon up like the Stay Puft Marshmallow Man the minute she gets a ring on it. Have you ever seen a skinny Indian woman over the age of 35? Thought not.

Not only that, even decent-looking Indian girls have unappealing bodies. Desis may have big butts, but their asses and breasts are always squishy and soft, like a bowl of Jell-O. Additionally, every single Indian girl I’ve ever known had too much body hair. Combine that with their obesity-prone genetics and you might as well be sleeping with a fat guy.

2. They're prudes

When I say Indian girls are prudish, I don't mean they're hard to get in the sack: God no. I mean they have all sorts of bizarre sexual hangups that make banging them about as fun as thrusting your dick into a vacuum cleaner. Indian girls have sexually conservative attitudes thanks to their parents, and navigating their sea of rationalizations is a prerequisite for getting your rocks off.

The first Indian girl I ever banged, in college, was an "everything-but" virgin, in that she did everything but normal, vaginal intercourse: blowjobs, anal, the whole nine yards. She actually believed that this excused all the slutting around she did. Another Desi I met not long after refused to go down on me, saying it was "gross"… even as she bragged about how much she loved it when guys went down on her. These selfish attitudes are reinforced by the spoiled, daddy's little girl mentalities that Indian girls have.

3. They're self-loathing

Members of the Roosh V Forum are well aware of Indian Race Trolls, self-loathing Indian men who hijack discussions by whining about how they can't get white girls because of their brown skin. Indian girls possess the same exact inferiority complex. Every Indian girl I've ever known secretly loathed her ethnic heritage, wanted to be white, and fetishized white men to a degree that was downright creepy.

What separates Indian girls from other Asian girls, who wear their lust for white men on their sleeves, is their obsession with their native culture. Indian girls raised in the U.S. will never shut up about the glories of India, a nation where poor people shit on the streets and the government has to force people to use toilets. Meanwhile, these same loud-and-proud Indian girls date white men and complain about Indian men being "misogynistic" and "controlling."

4. They're feminists

For some reason, Indian girls in the U.S. are unusually susceptible to feminist and social justice warrior brain rot. Despite their wealthy, cushy upbringings, Indian girls almost always become ardent feminists, swallowing the cultural Marxist program whole. SJWs like Beejoli Shah, who invent stories about being raped, are representative of the average Indian girl and the noxious ideological soup she bathes in.

Indian girls justify their misandry by claiming that Indian culture is "sexist" and "patriarchal," but this couldn't be further from the truth. Indian families are matriarchal, with mothers dominating their husbands and children. In particular, Indian mothers control their sons with guilt trips and shame, which is why so many of them become sackless weaklings and Indian Race Trolls. Indian girls growing up in America are some of the most privileged people on Earth.

5. They're mentally ill

This shouldn't surprise anyone, but Indian girls are almost always off their rockers. When you combine SJW ideology, racial self-loathing, and bizarre attitudes towards sex, you end up with a psycho. Dating an Indian girl will be a constant roller coaster of fights, drama and frustration, with your only reward being getting to nail a hirsute chick with a pudding pop ass.

The absolute worst types of Indian girls are the ones adopted by white couples, fairly common in upper-middle class America. The most insane girl I ever banged was an Indian with white parents: she was a borderline who tried to provoke me into hitting her because she felt I was "neglecting" her. While she didn't mindfuck me in the way that BPD girls usually do to their men, the abusive relationship screwed me up for months after it ended.

The only justifiable reason to pursue a Desi girl is because you want to get your Indian flag. But hanging around them longer than it takes to bust on their faces will end in tragedy for you. When it comes to girls, any ethnicity or race is a better bet than Indians.

Read More: Interracial Dating for Indian Men

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Covert Operations Of Hans Tofte During The Korean War

December 22, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

By the beginning of 1951, the belligerents of the Korean War had been locked in a brutal struggle since June of the previous year. Ground combat had seesawed up and down the peninsula, at first seeming to favor the North Koreans, then the United States, then the Chinese, and then finally no one. China's momentous entry into the war as American forces approached its border had sent the United States reeling; only by an extreme effort had the Americans been able to stabilize the front and prevent a complete collapse. The winter cold now brought unrelenting misery and disease to the Chinese, grinding their progress to a sickly halt.

Equipped only with quilted cotton uniforms and plagued by inadequate provisions, they had suffered immensely, far more than their American antagonists. But the orders from Peking (not yet called Beijing) were clear: attack and evict the Americans from the peninsula now, with one final push to Pusan. The spring of 1951 promised to bring a massive series of coordinated Chinese-North Korean offensives.

It was against this background that the director of CIA operations in Japan, Hans Tofte, received an intelligence report of great interest. A well-placed source in the Indian government had reported that a cargo of battlefield medical supplies was soon to leave Bombay, aboard a Norwegian vessel chartered by the Chinese government, and was bound for some communist port in North Korea or Manchuria.

Should those supplies reach the enemy, Tofte was warned, they would provide an immense material aid to the coming communist offensives. Regardless of the cost, the ship had to be stopped. To make sure that Tofte got the message, his superiors gave him $1 million in cash to work with, a vast sum by the CIA standards of the day.

Tofte's plan called for Chinese Nationalist forces, disguised as pirates, to intercept the ship near Taiwan (then called Formosa) and seize the cargo. Chiang Kai-shek, whom Tofte had known personally before the war, promised men and material aid to the plan. The operation went off nearly seamlessly; without a shot being fired, the entire cargo had been stolen, in what had appeared to be a "random act" of piracy on the high seas.

It was the type of daring operation—which the agency had code-named "TP Stole"—that the twentieth century's greatest commando, Otto Skorzeny, would probably himself have admired. The success of the operation without doubt saved many lives: deprived of medical logistics, the Chinese were unable to mount many of the offensives that they had planned for in 1951.

Who was this Hans Tofte? Joseph C. Goulden's excellent book Korea: The Untold Story of the War contains the most complete account of Tofte's colorful career and exploits. Goulden interviewed Tofte in the early 1980s while researching his book and was amazed by the scope of Tofte's exploits in the 1940s and 1950s. Yet he remains an obscure figure today.

Born in 1911 in Denmark to a maritime merchant family, Tofte had been stationed at age 19 to live in China as an employee of a Danish shipping firm that did business in east Asia. Living in Manchuria, he learned to speak Chinese, and gained an intimate knowledge of the country's geography, political factions, and political personalities. The Second World War brought him back to Denmark, where he saw some service in the anti-German resistance.

Eventually escaping from Denmark, he enlisted with Allied American intelligence services–first the Office of Strategic Services ("OSS") and later the regular US military–and participated in many operations, most notably running supplies to Chinese guerrillas fighting against Japan, and smuggling weapons under Mussolini's nose to Tito's partisans in Yugoslavia.

But the end of the war had come suddenly, and with it came a need to reinvent himself as a humdrum man of peace. America's rapid post-1945 demobilization left little opportunities for a man of action like Tofte. Promises that his skills would be used in some new intelligence agency came to nothing, and so he took up the life of a middle-class small businessman, marrying an American woman and moving to Mason City, Iowa. Yet he promised his friends who remained in the intelligence business that, should another war break out, he would certainly come in with both feet.

Hans Tofte (on right)

He did not need to wait long. In June 1950, North Korean forces burst across the border into South Korea, and there was an immediate need for anyone with operational combat experience. He was restored to an equivalent position in the fledgling CIA, only just created, and sent to Japan to run special operations against communist forces in Korea. In Tokyo, he quickly found out that he and his detachment of CIA men faced severe institutional resistance from Douglas MacArthur's headquarters.

MacArthur had always hated special operators, presumably because they were beyond his direct control; in MacArthur's theatre, there could be no secrets kept from him. Tofte's abilities to navigate the perilous bureaucracy became the stuff of legend. With deftness, cunning, and an incredible ability to scrounge resources from nothing, Tofte amassed a team of operators that pulled off some incredible missions during the war.

In the beginning, most of his efforts focused on establishing a covert network of guides in North Korea to help downed fliers escape to the coasts, where they might be rescued by a fleet of CIA-controlled "fishing boats" that patrolled coastal waters. But one of his more amusing coups came in late 1950, when the Soviet Union released a large number of Japanese prisoners who had been held in captivity since the end of the Second World War. The Soviets intended to use the issue to score sympathy points with Japanese labor unions, many of which in those days were communist sympathizers.

Anti-communist partisans ready for action

Tofte came up with the idea of making a movie about the abuse of Japanese prisoners in Soviet gulags. On a shoestring budget, he used the secret diary of a former Japanese prisoner as the basis for anti-Soviet propaganda film that caused anti-Russian feeling in Japan to reach new heights. It was so successful, in fact, that it actually turned a profit, netting Tofte at least $400,000 which was turned over to his superiors.

Another chance for distinction came early in the war when Tofte learned that the Chinese were using an underwater cable stretched across the Yellow Sea to communicate with its North Korean ally. If the cable could somehow be cut or disabled, it would force the enemy to rely more on wireless communications, which the National Security Agency could more easily monitor. From his prewar years of living in Manchuria, Tofte had a good general knowledge of where the cable left China; and assembling his fleet of "fishing boats," he had them converge on the cable, raise it from the ocean floor, and sever it.

For all his distinguished service and incredible wartime feats, things eventually soured for Tofte in civilian life. Like many warriors, he discovered that the skills needed to survive in a wartime environment bear little resemblance to those needed in a peacetime bureaucracy. He remained in the employ of the CIA during the 1950s and 1960s until being unceremoniously booted out in 1966.

According to his obituary, which appeared in the Los Angeles Times of September 13, 1987, Tofte in 1966 had put his Washington D.C. home up for sale. Apparently without his knowledge, his real estate agent showed residence to a prospective buyer, who happened also to be a CIA officer. The buyer claimed to have seen "classified documents" in plain view in Tofte's basement, and reported the matter for an investigation.

Although Tofte claimed that it was customary for high-ranking agency officials to take classified work home with them, the investigators were unconvinced, and Tofte was dismissed. So ended one of the most distinguished and colorful Cold War intelligence careers. It was a great pity that a man who had rendered such long service had been brought down by such an apparently middling transgression, but such are the ways of large organizations.

Here we see a theme played out countless times in history: a man of action, perhaps resented by his peers and having worn out his organizational welcome, finding himself given a final push out the door. Men of ability invariably arouse envy among those who prefer to lurk in obscurity behind the comfortable partitions of stifling bureaucracies. So it has always been.

Although the full circumstances of Tofte's are not public record, we may still overlook this sad last chapter in his professional to the incredible achievements he produced in his operational roles. The handprint of Tofte will remain forever pressed on the history of Cold War covert operations. Those who wish to know his work need only read the history of the times.

The grammarian Aemilius Probus, writing during the reign of emperor Theodosius II in the early part of the fifth century A.D., is said to have composed this epigram at the end of one of his works, in a poignant exhortation to readers:

> If he may ask for the author, then little by little reveal our name to the Lord. Let him know that I am Probus. In this work is the hand of my father, my grandfather, and myself…It is a happy hand that merits the Divine.

Tofte would have liked this. Great deeds produce their own garlands, and need no others.

Read More: The Age Of Commerce

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

5 Tips For Writing An Online Dating Profile That Gets Responses

December 22, 2014 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article has been sponsored by The Search For Ten

I have spent the last 8 years of my life working on and perfecting the art of meeting women online. I've felt the highs, the lows, and have basked in the cesspool of humanity that is online dating.

I'm an Aussie man in my early 30's living in Sydney and I have developed a taste for Asian women. I discovered that night game is nearly useless. Day game is great but has a really low hit rate with Asian girls, because the hot ones get approached a lot and are generally rather shy. Going online has given me an edge and access to a large number of prospects. As a result I've tasted all the flavours of Asia. From Vietnam to Japan, I found my Mecca and I'm sharing it with you.

1. Don't Make The Rookie Mistake

The biggest mistake I see newbies make is that they completely miss the purpose of the profile and go in with the mindset that it's a reflection of them. They get the personality carbon paper, rub one out, and expect the women to come running because "I'm a great guy."

No one (especially the women you meet online) gives a shit about you. Your hopes, dreams or what makes you happy. No one. All they care about is what they can get from you and how you'll make them feel. Your profile is an advertisement, a brochure for a product. You are writing to a target demographic and the sole purpose of the profile is to get them interested enough to invest some energy. The profile should never answer questions, only create them.

You (the person) only have value to these people once you connect. There are hundreds of other guys competing for her attention, and it is impossible to connect with someone when they're being contacted by 30~70 guys a day. That's the reality and that's what you're up against.

Your profile is just there to motivate her to reply to your email. Nothing else. Start talking to her so you can start building attraction and get her on that phone as fast as possible.This moves her away from the competition and allows you to build a connection that she invests in.

2. Make The Profile Short

Let's assume a woman gets contacted 45 times. In order to manage such a large number of suitors she's going to be looking for ways to bring that number down to the most manageable number she can. She has options, she's not looking for reasons to choose you, she's looking for reasons NOT to choose you.

There will be certain criteria in her mind—be they logical or not—that she will use to bring that number down to a number she can count on her toes. At this point you're at the mercy of nature and circumstance. If you made it into the last 10 then she will take the time to read the profile and guess what the biggest complaint I've heard is?

"Ugh, I have to read all that?!"

Less is more, keep it short and to the point. Three paragraphs maximum. Too long, you'll get culled.

3. Don't Be Objective

She's not reading your profile because she wants to get to know you. She's looking for something, anything she can use to discount you. Any hard objective statement is dangerous because women can't work with absolutes and will always be in a grey area.

They might want children but are looking for the right guy, time, or place before settling own. So if you put on your profile "I want to have a family," you'll get culled. She doesn't like the idea of being pressured into such a big decision! So you put "I don't feel the need to start a family" instead, and you still get culled. She would love to have a family, just not now and she doesn't want to put time into a relationship if you're not going to be the daddy.

This is just an example. Remember, the profile should never answer questions as they will only be used to cull you. She wants to get that number down to three or four. Unless you're hot (you're not), anything slightly objectionable will get you culled.

4. Be A “Normal” Guy

Even though dating online has become much more acceptable and mainstream, it still has a stigma attached to it—especially with girls who are trying it for the first time. If you doubt that, count how many times you see “A friend suggested I try it” or “I never know what to write about myself” and you’ll start to see it’s their way of saying “Oh, I’m not one of those losers who has to go online!”

Use this psychology and write something that says “hey, me too!” and show them that you’re not one of those losers either. We both know you totally are but it will let them be more comfortable… because they are too.

I had great success with a profile that started by saying how online profiles are really bad at working out who someone is. I quoted some statistics, made a joke about 50 Shades Of Grey and was done with it. I had girls contacting me.

5. Remember The Call To Action

If you’re serious about dating online, this one is pretty obvious. Make sure you tell them what the next steps are. Why should they waste their time? Tell them you’re the right choice and they should talk to you.

“I’m great conversation, send me a message.”

Find something that’s “you” and tell them to get in touch.

Next steps

These are the most important points to get you started. Develop something that works for you and your chosen demographic. Play with it, see the response, and keep going until you find that sweet spot. Write, test, repeat.

I’m writing a book! It’ll be packed with my experiences, advice, and tested methods in navigating the cesspool, from finding your demographic, to getting the date and closing the deal. The whole time I’ll be blogging the experience as I test ideas, play around with new methods, styles, and generally screw it up for science.

Come with me on the search at The Search For Ten.

Read Next: Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How To Avoid Trouble When Living The Villain Lifestyle

December 23, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

I'm under no false illusion that readers of ROK are all upstanding law abiding citizens. I'm pretty sure a lot of us either have or had habits that have landed us in some sort of hot water with the law. Those who know what I'm talking about know this kind of trouble can be both physically and mentally taxing and takes a huge toll on finances.

I'm also aware that there are some illegal activities men can't or won't let go of. Whether it's an addiction, the money, a sense of identity, or just being an adrenaline junkie, there are a plethora of reasons men all over the world regularly engage in unlawful enterprises.

I used to be in that boat quote frequently and learning to navigate this jungle has manifested itself into the strongest part of my overall game: frame. Knowing I have a solid plan to preserve my most valuable commodities (time, money, faculties, and freedom) if and when things go sideways keeps my mind relaxed and at ease in any situation I find myself in.

In part 2 I stated I'd been in more than a few legal situations and have managed to come of out of most of them virtually unscathed. In this, the final installment of my Villains series, I will share the lessons of my misadventures. Keep in mind that laws and tendencies of local law enforcement varies from state to state so you'll have to adjust your system accordingly.

Living the outlaw lifestyle ain't all peaches and cream. Don't get me wrong, it's cool to strut around with a devil-may-care attitude, slay top shelf poon on the regular, wear aviator sunglasses (a personal favorite of mine), and live in a kick ass pad, but the things we need to do to maintain and preserve this quality of life is often ugly and inconvenient.

But this is the price we pay.

We're not talking about storm troopers and make believe bad guys anymore, gents. We're now into the realm of actual safeguards so that you can live like a villain in the real world.

Get your legal house in order

Ever notice how the bad guys (real and fictional) always remain cool and collected when detained or arrested? This is because they have a solid legal plan in place which helps them maintain composure in the face of impending legal unrest. They know their predicament is temporary and that they'll likely be home in time for dinner.

It is very difficult to maintain frame if you don't have your legal house in order before trouble strikes. I learned this the hard way. These are the two steps I took to remedy this ailment and they've both proven to be very useful to myself and my closest friends.

#1 Retain a lawyer

One of the keys to slithering out of a charge is to have a good lawyer at your disposal. The ability to call and consult an attorney any time you need to is critical to maintaining your sanity and freedom. It is often the difference between guilty and not guilty outcomes, as court-appointed attorneys are usually pretty quick to advise you to plead out so they can slog through their overstuffed case loads.

Making a monthly payment to a lawyer to handle potential legal issues can get quite expensive and is only worth it if you find yourself in legal limbo on a regular basis. However, you need this to be a contingency plan, not an ongoing thing.

That said, there is much less expensive alternative to ensure you have legal counsel at all times: pay one lump sum to an attorney and have them put it in escrow until you need his services.

Outside of major felonies, $1,500 to $2,000 should be enough for a lawyer to handle most cases from start to finish. There could be additional ancillary costs but that depends on state laws, your individual circumstances, and attorney rates.

The benefits of having a lawyer on speed dial are obvious but the biggest advantage is when you are arrested. I used to work with a guy who was cop for years and he made no bones about the fact that officers will trade on your ignorance to extract information from you in order to increase their chances of securing a conviction. They take advantage of your fear and initial shock of being put in handcuffs.

Upon your first consultation, your lawyer will work with you to eliminate making missteps at the beginning of the process and school you on your rights upon detention by law enforcement. If you're armed with that knowledge it makes their job markedly easier and greatly increases the odds of a favorable outcome. The reason cops hate when a suspect lawyers up is because they know your lawyer will advise you to exercise your legal right to remain silent, thus extinguishing their fact-finding expedition.

Do not underestimate the importance of having a lawyer at the ready at all times. Yes, you'll have to fork over a significant amount of money but financial prudence is a part of your red pill development and trust me when I tell you this is most definitely a worth while investment.

Knowing you have legal counsel at your beck and call is essential to building a rock-solid frame.

#2 Register with a bail bondsman

Lawyers get you out of trouble, bail bondsmen get you out of jail. This is where having one you can call at a moment's notice comes in handy. If you get pinched, a bondsman is your best friend. Getting registered with one before the shit hits the fan will prove to be an important step in preserving your freedom.

This process is much simpler than retaining a lawyer but is equally important. Simply visit a bail bonds office and submit your information. Name, address, phone number, and whatever other identifiable information they need from you.

Pro Tip #1: Memorize your bondsman's number and keep it on a piece of paper in your glove box. Why? Because cops will confiscate your phone and you won't see it until you're released, rendering your lifeline useless. Asshole cops will sometimes even take your piece of paper (no accident) which makes memorizing that number all the more important.

Having a bondsman who already has your information at the ready drastically shortens the time you're in the holding cell. The average amount of time I've spent in a holding cell is about 45 minutes (give or take) depending on the time of day or night. Not having to wait in line to call a bondsman on that shoddy phone after getting locked up and divulging personal information in the presence of other arrestees makes a huge difference.

There was one instance where my bondsman actually beat us to the jail. He was waiting there with the paperwork and I spent not one minute in that cell. This is the result of having my ducks in a row. When your arrest is imminent, your first call should always be to your bondsman. You can call your lawyer when you get out.

Locking one down will cost you a few hundred dollars but it's well worth the investment. Once you register with a bonds office they will also put your money into an escrow account (again this depends on your state laws) and won't be touched unless you're in jail and need to be bonded out.

This is a tremendous advantage because you won't need to make embarrassing calls to friends and family begging them to come and get you out. Everything is already paid for and taken care of so you can relax, make conversation with your fellow law breakers, and wait for the corrections officer to sing the sweet sound of your name when it's time to get the hell out of there.

Pro Tip #2: Every single time you have to use your bondsman, tip him and tip him well. The first reason to do this is that it goes a long way in moving up his priority list which translates to quicker turnaround time and a better overall relationship with the man who gives you back your freedom.

The other reason is that coming to get your sorry ass out of jail isn't as easy as it looks. They don't just show up and say "I'm here for SharpShooter" and it's off you go. It takes a lot of time, paperwork, and risk. These guys are doing a great service for you and a lot of times they have to break away from whatever they're doing at the time at all hours of the night to get you out.

So show a little gratitude and slip him a c-note as soon as you hit the street. Like tipping the bouncers at the door or the bartender at your watering hole, this goes a long way and builds major equity. People you tip well always remember the gesture and will provide you with much better service in the future.

Now that your legal house is in order, I'll share the two most effective preventative measures that have served me very well in many situations over the years.

Stash your cash in a safe

Here are the three biggest advantages to having a cache of cash:

1. Cash is king. It is still the one and only currency that holds the most weight. Everyone from your doctor to your lawyer to your butcher prefer (and sometimes require) to be paid in cash. Tangible money talks and having access to it opens doors quicker than a slut opens her legs.

2. Availability without fees or red tape. Banks and ATMs are notorious for nickel-and-diming you for wanting to use and spend your own money. Plus, if you want to spend or withdraw more than the daily limit the bank or ATM allows, you have to jump through hoops to get your hands on it. Banks are necessary for a lot of things but keep in mind they also have complete control of your money whether you know it or not.

3. It's available to you and only you. No surprise charges, no worrying about identity thieves cleaning out your account(s), and no worrying about account garnishment due to back taxes or child support or any other reason to deplete your account. Safes are immune to wire transfers, phantom withdrawals, or service fees you're unaware of. Your balance only changes when you decide it does.

For those of you who are leery of leaving your hard-earned money in the hands of lawyers, bondsmen, or banks, a safe is a great way to hang on to your liquid assets. Investments, 401Ks and the like are good ways to grow your money over time and I would strongly advise that you look into these avenues. But socking away cold hard cash for a rainy day is 24-hour banking in its truest form.

I'm not the old lady who keeps all of her money in a shoe box or in the mattress. I do have a bank account but I rarely let the balance get over triple digits because I prefer having immediate, physical access to most of my cabbage if I need it.

Driving without a license

Believe it or not, traffic violations (minor and major) have the potential to turn a man's life upside down in the blink of an eye and this is the reason I've included this preventative measure in this article. Once again, I've experienced this first hand and I know I'm not alone. What's more is that according to my cop friend most arrests are made during traffic stops.

The overwhelming majority of people driving around without a license are men. The inability to talk our way out of tickets, and then being punished more swiftly and severely for our traffic infractions than our female counterparts is the reason for this lopsided ratio. Some states even revoke your driving privilege if you're behind on your child support payments, further increasing the number of men operating a vehicle illegally.

A little over 10 years ago my license was suspended for six months. Long story short, I had a number of traffic tickets I didn't get taken care of and they came back to bite me in the ass. Luckily my lawyer was able to "gold sheet" (the process of consolidating numerous tickets into one case) my tickets so I was very lucky to get just a six month ban from driving.

Right around the time my license was suspended, police officers in my city started utilizing technology that allowed them to run license plates while both vehicles were in motion. Cops could literally drive around and run plates at their convenience without having to step foot out of their cars or call the plate number into dispatch. The information popped up on their screens and they'd act accordingly.

The loophole in this technology is that police are unable to get information on out of state plates unless they pull you over. So unless a driver was blatantly breaking traffic laws like running stop signs, stop lights, or doing 20+ mph over the speed limit, cops didn't bother.

I still had to get around so I came up with an idea that would allow me to continue driving. What I did to stay under the radar was register my car in a neighboring state with an address I obtained by renting a UPS mailbox in that state. I went a step further and put a window cling on my back window of a local college in the state that my license was suspended to appear to be a college student from out of state.

My little trick worked like a charm and the boys in blue never gave my vehicle a second look. Sure I had to pay a little extra insurance for switching states and yes I had to pay a registration fee and taxes all over again, but it damn sure beat getting pulled over and possibly arrested (didn't have my legal house in order back then) which would have cost more money and more time.

Obviously this isn't a bulletproof way of never getting caught driving without a license. DUI checks and random road blocks can throw salt into your game. But as long as you don't drive like a maniac your odds of getting pulled over are very low.

I encourage readers to add to their tried and true methods with reference to their state laws. Different perspectives yield better and broader results, and we could all use all the help we can get in our dealings with the feminized justice system designed to severely punish men for whatever reason they feel like.

I'm also not above suggestions to tweak or perfect my own techniques. Contributor or not, I learn just as much valuable information on this site as any of our readers and the truth is, we can all learn from each other.

Tying it all together

Before I was married I used to make it a point to let women know what a clean-cut, upstanding, law abiding citizen I was. I was quick to mention I had no criminal record, had never been arrested, and had perfect credit with my ever-present American Express card leading the beta bucks parade.

This never got me the quality pussy I wanted and sure as shit didn't fulfill me as a man. I wanted more but I had no idea how to get it, so I took to acquiring the things I wanted illegally.

I've paid my debts to society but I learned a lot along the way. The most important of those lessons is that chicks really do dig the bad boy. These days when girls ask me if I've ever been arrested I tell 'em the truth without hesitation and when they ask for the details I give them the same explanation every time: "Long story." And not one of them stormed out and ran into the arms of their Ivy-League, white-collared betas to live happily ever after.

Get this through your thick skulls fellas: Girls may marry boy scouts but they will always fuck the outlaws before, during, and after their nuptials. You can take that to the ~~bank~~ safe.

And don't buy into the bullshit notion of the "anti-hero" either. This fantasy is nothing more than glorified white knighting. They give too many fucks about women and at the of the day their balls are as blue as the betas they sneer at. Selflessness gets you nowhere in today's world. Period.

Remember, high SMV women are merely a side effect of this lifestyle. You'll have very little time for them what with assembling your crew, strengthening your mind and body, acquiring both tangible and intangible property, locking down your legal swat team, and not giving a shit about anyone but yourself. Your morale and productivity will skyrocket and your sense of well-being will never be higher.

Deciding to live this lifestyle takes a tremendous amount of reflection, acceptance of hard truths, and the assumption of risk. Truly grabbing life by the balls and living on your own terms in this manner is something most of us are unable to do. But for those of us with the intestinal fortitude to take the plunge the rewards are innumerable.

Be dangerous, take risks, and enjoy the ride gentlemen. Live life like a Villain.

Read More: More Ways You Can Live Life Like A Villain

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Red Pill Truths In Classical Conservative Thinkers

December 23, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"Life blackens at the contact of truth."
—Paul Valery

The red pill worldview is fundamentally the same as the classical conservative one. Each is skeptical of simple approaches to problems. Each knows that contexts tend to be more complicated than most people perceive. Each sees that lasting progress is a cheap fantasy. And each amounts to stripping away illusions and delusions, revealing the world as it really is: an overwhelmingly complex and uncertain place, in which discord is the norm, arising as it does from the immutable nature of things.

Life is full of unpredictable challenges, and intractable conflicts, and even the best solutions have a way of producing new obstacles along our already difficult path. In such a fraught condition as ours, there is a special value in traditional approaches to dealing with our common problems, as there is in traditional ways of living. It is not that these approaches are to be valued unquestioningly, but that we should not have the hubris or be so naive as to think we exist in a kind of historical vacuum. We have much to learn from the past, nor should the collective experience of humankind be ignored so that we can tear the world down and build it up all over again: an exceedingly dangerous attitude which, however well-intentioned, always does far more harm than good.

In this article and a few subsequent ones I will quote some passages from great conservative thinkers. We can think of these passages as a kind of test: to understand and, what is much more, live by these insights requires not just a certain level of intelligence; we must also have the strength of character not to look away from them because they are so averse to popular—that is, more comforting—opinions concerning human relations, society and life generally. In my comments I try to demonstrate the truth and value of these passages, which we should use to better our conduct of life, though, of course, doing this cannot be easy: wisdom is hard, and has a way of complicating things.

In 1791, writing to a member of Englands's National Assembly, Edmund Burke said that Men are qualified for civil liberty in exact proportion to their disposition to put moral chains upon their own appetites, — in proportion as their love to justice is above their rapacity, — in proportion as their soundness and sobriety of understanding is above their vanity and presumption, — in proportion as they are more disposed to listen to the counsels of the wise and good, in preference to the flattery of knaves. Society cannot exist, unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere; and the less of it there is within, the more there must be without. It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things, that men of intemperate minds cannot be free. Their passions forge their fetters.

In passages like this, Burke shows why he is deservedly considered such a formidable critic of democracy. Freedom, he says wisely, is impossible unless reason and a strong will govern our base aspects. To the extent that we fail to do this, there is a need for an elite to rule over those who are not guided, as it were, by wisdom, which is, by definition, a minority affair: Socrates (or Burke himself) would not strike us as wise if he were equal to everyone else, if he did not know so much more than and live so differently from the majority.

Freedom is a severe responsibility, and the trouble with democracy is that it levels every one down, making it effectively impossible for there to be a kind of wise order of rank, in order that justice shall not be overtaken by rapacity. Further, without a "controlling power upon will and appetite," society degenerates into a state of indulgence and ignorance precludes order.

To see the truth of this in our own time, consider the unhappy fate of Robert Jennings, recently forced to resign his Presidency of Lincoln University for urging women to take responsibility for their actions, namely, to not falsely accuse men of rape. It's clear that in the response to Jennings, "soundness" and "sobriety" did not check "presumption." In a Burkean society, the proper response would have been one of gratitude. The silly notion that Jennings somehow blamed women for actual rape would be unthinkable.

Burke's phrase "controlling power" (my italics) is crucial: the minds of the majority are inadequate for perceiving wisdom. Their natural response to it is loathing, because they cannot understand it, and may well consider themselves "victims" in the face of it. Therefore, freedom—the achievement of justice and restraint—actually depends on inequality, since any freedom that will not culminate in horrible cultural decline—as we see in the United States of 2014—requires that a wise and powerful elite control (in the sense of benevolently guide) the relatively ignorant and intemperate majority. Now control, of course, is no pleasant thing. And yet, what is the alternative? Well, take a look around you. Liberal equality is a beautiful ideal, but it is an ideal only. Once you level people down, it is only so long before the base aspects of our nature predominate, resulting in the cultural decay with which we are now surrounded.

Let us turn from Edmund Burke to his friend, the great Samuel Johnson. “It may justly be concluded,” he tells us in “The Various Arts of Self-Delusion,” that it is not easy for a man to know himself; for wheresoever we turn our view, we shall find almost all with whom we converse so nearly as to judge of their sentiments, indulging more favourable conceptions of their own virtue than they have been able to impress upon others, and congratulating themselves upon degrees of excellence, which their fondest admirers cannot allow them to have attained.

Even if you have not noticed that most people are simply not as good as they themselves believe, in order to see the truth of Johnson’s insight, you have only to look back on those instances in your life where you have been wronged by others. Was not self-interested denial on their part prevalent in these experiences? If it was, that is no wonder. When it comes to assuming moral agency, the mind is frequently a kind of rationalization-machine, and this is especially true of the Second Sex, most of whom lack a sense of justice, as we red pill men know only too well.

And if we are so inclined not to face the truth about ourselves, does it not follow that it probably is not easy to know ourselves? Indeed, we are often ignorant of ourselves, just as we are of others. Our minds are in the dark, and for good reason: it is easier that way. And like that man who so frustrates us because he cannot (or will not) see the ugly truth concerning his behavior, no matter how hard we try to show him, so too we our unaware of much about our very self. It is bizarre but true that one’s own self is something of a stranger.

Our relations with others are like those who live in a large house, in which each person has his own room, but can see others only through a keyhole. It is similar with ourselves. We look in the mirror, yet the reflection is cracked, so as to make us more attractive than unblinking self-examination displays. Such a partial view is, however, useful for the liberal agenda, which believes social reform meets with no resistance from a permanently flawed human nature, a grim notion in which few liberals believe.

Our last passage comes from the wisest and most eloquent of American writers. “Politics,” Emerson says in his essay “Power,” is a deleterious profession, like some poisonous handicrafts. Men in power have no opinions, but may be had cheap for any opinion, for any purpose, — and if it be only a question between the most civil and the most forcible, I lean to the last. These Hoosiers and Suckers are really better than the snivelling opposition. Their wrath is at least of a bold and manly cast. They see, against the unanimous declarations of the people, how much crime the people will bear; they proceed from step to step, and they have calculated but too justly upon their Excellencies, the New England governors, and upon their Honors, the New England legislators. The messages of the governors and the resolutions of the legislatures, are a proverb for expressing a sham virtuous indignation, which, in the course of events, is sure to be belied.

In trade, also, this energy usually carries a trace of ferocity. Philanthropic and religious bodies do not commonly make their executive officers out of saints. The communities hitherto founded by Socialists, —the Jesuits, the Port-Royalists, the American communities at New Harmony, at Brook Farm, at Zoar, are only possible, by installing Judas as steward. The rest of the offices may be filled by good burgesses. The pious and charitable proprietor has a foreman not quite so pious and charitable. The most amiable of country gentlemen has a certain pleasure in the teeth of the bull-dog which guards his orchard.

The Sage of Concord is not usually considered a classical conservative, but the later Emerson is so fierce, so unflinching and so illiberal as to be in perfect company with Machiavelli, Schopenhauer and Nietzsche. I therefore see no reason not to claim him here. His summary of the nature of politics is as applicable now as it was in his time. Dancing upon the world stage, all smiles like any customer service representative, our leaders make much of fairness, equality and other virtues. Meanwhile, like many of the rest of us, they are driven by power, essentially a synonym for self-interest. And so it is that they are easily corrupted, in Emerson's words, "had cheap for any opinion, for any purpose."

The brutal frauds of the world do at least possess a backbone and fighting spirit, in contrast to those who, like our time's social justice warriors, are so much weak resentment and unmanly complaint. Say what you will about it, but the Tea Party, of which I myself am not fond, is at least "of a bold and manly cast," very unlike our social justice warriors, that "sniveling opposition."

Good is not far from evil, and cannot do without it. The well-being of those characterized by goodness, and of those who aim at bringing about the general improvement of humankind, depend on others who are "not quite so pious and charitable." Like the state itself, goodness depends on power, because it must be enforced, and that is no rosy thing.

Emerson thus gives us a complete view of human affairs. The man who believes he has a right to law and order does well to contemplate the necessity of our much maligned police. Likewise, the liberal who, in the manner of Noam Chomsky, is so indignant about our great country's "imperial aggression," should ask himself what his life would be like without our "Hoosiers and Suckers." Not to point out the dark motives of competing super powers such as Russia and China, but are other nations in general really merely innocent or neutral in regard to us? Or are they rather not more like the ever-smiling salesman, a very formidable fraud, out for wealth and resources and driven by self-interest?

Read More: Are You A Traditional Conservative But Don't Realize It?

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

It’s Time For A New Standard On Judging Rape Accusers

December 23, 2014 | by Jonathan David Farley | Link | Original Link

University of Virginia president Teresa Sullivan’s premature accusation against fraternities illustrates the standard of justice for men accused of rape. Therefore, there is a need for a new standard in judging rape accusers: Lying Until Proven Otherwise. Making this a publically-stated default position blunts the feminist charge of insensitivity towards alleged victims. University Administrator to Female Student: “I’m sorry, Ms. Led, I can’t help you with your complaint because of the Lupo Higher Education Act of 2016. My hands are tied.”

If a purported victim didn’t fight back; didn’t scream; has no injuries; does not mention the use of any weapon; was within 20 yards of a hundred people who would have instantly defended her; admits that she never indicated that her alleged assailant should stop; is afraid of her alleged assailant without specifying exactly what threats, if any, he made to keep her from talking; is afraid of her alleged assailant because of undocumented threats he allegedly made to keep her from talking, threats totally out of character for him; glosses over the physical act in her description of her ordeal; doesn’t use the word “rape” but let’s others use it; went on future dates with her alleged rapist after the incident or otherwise maintained a documented, cordial relationship; had to be convinced by someone else that she was raped; is afraid of her university’s mascot, statues, or hit songs; and didn’t report anything to the police until much later (if ever), we should now take the initial stance that she is a liar, which includes naming her—since by assumption she is not a victim—if the media mentions the name of the accused.

(Ironically, the University of Ohio accuser did go to the police that same night, but of all the recent rape accusers in the news, there is the strongest evidence against her that she had consensual relations, since about two dozen people saw it and captured it on video.)

Crying Wolf: Feminist Carolyn Luby says this University of Connecticut logo promotes "rape culture."

A good example is the Tucker Reed case, which Occidental College professor of politics, Caroline Heldman, and her student, S.C.U.M. myrmidon Baillee Brown, discuss in a dangerous and misleading article, "Campus Rape: Why Not Law Enforcement?"

It's rather gross to go through the details, but here is Miss Reed's own account:

> He and I ended up making out on my couch. When he started taking off my clothes, I moved the make-out session to my bedroom in case my roommates came home.
>
> Eventually naked, in my bed, my date told me he wanted to have sex. I told him repeatedly that I did not want to.

All of us agree that at this point she has not given consent. "That I wanted it to be special." She has not given consent. "That I wasn't ready." She has not given consent. "That having sex so soon would ruin our relationship." She has not given consent. "But it happened anyway." She gave consent!

Not sure about that? Reed continues: "I told him he was hurting me and I tried to pull away." First of all, it's he-said-she-said—sorry if our code of justice is too exacting for Heldman and Brown, but, regardless, the act's hurting doesn't mean "stop" and (trying) to pull away doesn't mean "stop," as anyone who has engaged in the act would know: it can mean "stop," but it can also not mean "stop." If Reed had said, "Stop," that's a different story, but she didn't. (I'm using the exact same logic applied to the woman on the street who recorded men chatting her up in New York, after which many feminists collectively ordered men to only attempt to say, “Hello,” to a woman if she tells them they can: women are adults and can and will make their desires known.)

Reed continues, “He pulled me closer. In the end, after he was done, I interpreted it as a ‘misunderstanding’—surely he’d just been too drunk to listen.” Ignoring the fact that under feminist interpretations of California law she’d be the rapist (she gives no indication that she had been drinking, but states clearly that she knew he had been drinking)—Reed is stating that she did not consider it rape, but later retroactively withdrew consent.

> I had continued to see my rapist. He’d told me he was in love with me and wanted to marry me.

And when did she withdraw consent? “It took me a year to talk openly about my experience.” A year? OK, fine. So that’s when she went to the police? “I told my best friend.” No, she went to the police two years later.

She knows English. “No” means “no.” She’s heard that expression 1,000 times and could have said it a thousand-and-first time herself.

We all get it. One can create a scenario that we all would agree was rape where the woman does not say, “Stop.” But for Heldman and Brown to claim that this is such a clear-cut case of rape (or a case of rape period) is appalling and I hope someday soon we will see successful defamation lawsuits. There is already a petition on Change.org to fire University of Virginia president Teresa Sullivan.

The new standard of justice—Lying Until Proven Otherwise (“the Lupo Doctrine”)—goes against our white-knight upbringing. But every revolution begins with one man saying, “No.”

And meaning it.

Read More: Say Hello To The New Definition Of Rape

Jonathan David Farley
JDF has written for "The New York Times," "Time" Magazine, and "The Guardian" newspaper in Great Britain and is co-founder of Peren Linn Fashion, a company that makes math-themed clothing for women and girls. He obtained his doctorate from the University of Oxford.

Speak To That Cute Girl Now, Because You'll Probably Never See Her Again

December 24, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

You are on the subway, walking down the platform, when you see a cute girl overloaded with shopping bags, full of Christmas presents. She is wrapped up warmly in a scarf and a long coat, but you can discern that beneath her seasonal garb here is a shapely, pulchritudinous young woman that you would like to get to know better.

As you walk past, you look at her and she looks back and smiles. You smile too, feeling a fuzzy, warm (and irrational) sense of validation. For a split second you consider speaking – saying "hi," anything. Then in that split second you decide not to. After all, it's busy here, there are a lot of people around and it might be embarrassing. And your ego has already been boosted by the fact that she's smiled anyway – perhaps that's sufficient. And also, you live near here – perhaps you'll see her again another time when it's less crowded, or you're in less of a hurry, or you're wearing better clothes, or you've had a shave, and you can talk to her then.

The truth of the matter, though, is this. If you live in a city of any size at all, then the chances of you ever seeing a random stranger again are negligible. Face it, if you walk by now without taking a shot, the likelihood is that you will never, ever see that same girl again.

Rollo of The Rational Male, has talked frequently about a concept he calls "buffers" – that is, those barriers, mental or otherwise, that men erect in order to protect themselves from female rejection. An example might be remaining in the friendzone with a girl for a prolonged period of time. While the guy probably has an inkling that this situation is not good for him, a perverse benefit is that he is not compelled to seek out and approach special women as he is already tied (in his mind) to his special snowflake.

Another buffer is the concept of “leagues” – by believing that a woman is out of one’s league, a man is effectively insulating himself from the imperative to approach. These are both rationalizations, ways to let oneself off the hook from the scary task of actually manning up and speaking to a girl (and how pathetic does that sound when written down?).

The irrational idea that you might see this random girl another time is another such buffer. So, too, is that small sense of accomplishment you feel when you get an IOI (indicator of interest) from a cute girl. “She smiled at me,” you think. “My attractiveness as a man has been validated. That’s enough for today.” Except it’s not enough – not if you have any ambition to be a player.

Instead, you must follow up on each IOI and push through to failure. The reason most guys won’t approach the girl who smiles at them and ask for her number is that they want to protect themselves from rejection and retain the good feelings they are already experiencing. But those good feelings in themselves mean nothing if your goal is to get laid.

When a girl smiled at me on the subway the other night, I very nearly let the opportunity go. The usual excuses came up – I was tired, needed to get home, was carrying grocery bags and so on. But I steeled myself and approached her anyway. We had a nice little flirtatious conversation and she gave me her number. By following through on an IOI, there’s a good chance you’ll get a result, but even if you don’t, you haven’t really lost anything – only the illusion that something could have happened, which in reality is worthless.

That is why you need to act now, and see each opportunity that presents itself through to its logical conclusion. So next time a girl shows she’s interested in you, walk up and start chatting to her. You really have nothing to lose.

Happy hunting – and happy holidays to all ROK readers!

If you want to learn how to meet more beautiful girls this Christmas, click here

Read More: Why Men Should Call Out Cockblocks More Often

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

It Wasn’t North Korea’s Strength That Beat Sony

December 24, 2014 | by Oscar O'Reilly | Link | Original Link

The North Korea-sponsored hackers that humbled Sony ended up looking brilliant in a devious, malevolent way. I’m sure they were treated to a hero’s reward (geek version) in Pyongyang or wherever in the world they’re based.

But thinking about this sorry episode, I realized that Sony’s key weakness—the Achilles heel that was crucial to these hackers’ success—wasn’t in the company’s computer security systems, and wasn’t in the private, sensitive information behind their porous firewalls.

Sure, the hackers ferreted out and then dumped (on a western media that was all too willing to play along) a huge amount of embarrassing data. But in the end, so what about all that? Aaron Sorkin is sleeping with Molly whatsername? Angelie Jolie is “marginally talented” and a “spoiled brat”? Kevin Hart is a “whore”? It’s titillating; it’s an annoyance to the stars and the execs—poor Amy Pascal even had to bow and scrape and submit to a ritual shakedown by Al Sharpton, owing to the revelation of a few racially tinged emails. But none of that would have done much damage to the Sony bottom line. In fact, the hacker attack ended up bestowing a hell of a lot of free publicity on a mediocre movie that people otherwise would have stayed away from in droves.

So what was it that really caused the effective* termination of that movie? It was Sony’s distributors’ fear of liability exposure, following the threats from the hackers to perpetrate a 9/11-type event.

Those threats might have been just an afterthought, and almost certainly had bupkis to back them up—they were most likely only words typed on a keyboard by some pimply Korean kid, in a windowless room reeking of kimchee farts.

But consider the scenario they create, in the mind of the CEO of a chain of cinemas. Someone has threatened, in effect, to bomb screenings of that particular film. Thus, if anything does happen, the CEO's corporation—in the bleeding-heart tort system of modern America—will be sued to extinction for negligence. Some plaintiff's attorney will stand up in front of a suggestible jury and scream: The company management knew the cinema would be bombed! But they showed the movie anyway! They didn't care about human lives!

For that CEO it would be an easy, straightforward decision not to show the movie—never mind what grandstanding politicians like Obama have to say on the matter.

I don't think it has dawned on people yet that this coercive tactic doesn't require computer hacking at all, and can be used against the film industry and probably many other industries by virtually anyone who (a) can make even halfway credible threats via the western media, and (b) effectively stands outside the reach of western law enforcement.

Oh, and, speaking of which . . .

Pascal agreed to let Sharpton have a say in how Sony makes motion pictures, in an effort to combat what he called "inflexible and immovable racial exclusion in Hollywood."

"We have agreed to having a working group deal with the racial bias and lack of diversity in Hollywood," said Sharpton.

He said Sony would work closely with his National Action Network, the National Urban League, the NAACP and the Black Women's Round Table to "see if we can come up with an immediate plan to deal with it."

The meeting, held behind closed doors at the Greenwich Hotel, also included National Urban League president Marc Morial.

"Our interest is seeing to it that Sony is on the right side of changing Hollywood," Morial said. [NY Post]

*Since I wrote the original draft of this post, some small cinema chains (with relatively little to lose) have agreed to screen “The Interview,” but as the NYT pointed out, such a small run would be “largely symbolic in financial terms,” i.e., the film will essentially end up as a costly write-off.

Read More: Why I Dropped Out of Law School

Oscar O'Reilly
Oscar is a novelist and essayist.

Most Men Do Not Deserve A Marriageable Woman

December 25, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Merry Christmas. This one's going to sting.

Here in the manosphere, we are often accused of chauvinism, writing as though women ruined society and men are fantastic at everything. People moan about how badly they want a good girl but just cannot find a viable candidate. Well, let's not get ahead of ourselves. Who said you deserved one yourself?

The cold reality is that the modern American man is not much better than the modern American woman. If you really believe that patriarchy is the natural order of things, then realize that feminism only exists because men allowed it. Let that sink in. You are the ones that create the monster of the modern western woman. You complain about how terrible the modern western woman is, but you are the ones that permit them to be this way.

It's Your Fault

You can go on the internet and complain like there is no hope, but feminism would end in a generation if men started acting like they had a dick in their pants. You think most women really want to be ball-cutting, independent sluts? Women have no idea what they really want. Deep down they all have a Disney princess fantasy, and the average nubile co-ed would gladly drop out of college if she found a man who actually made her happy.

Women want to possessed by a man. It is in their nature to be unable to articulate what they really want, but frankly it should be obvious to the menfolk who by nature are expected to lead. If American Jane can be manipulated by faceless propaganda, how much more so by a man whom she is absolutely in love with and could not imagine her life without?

Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew has been loved for generations because it gives hope to both sexes. Petruchio was greedy and selfish, and Katherine was ugly and had a terrible personality, but by the end of it all, they had both found a deeper appreciation for each other than any of the other characters who were acting on their passions (Lucentio) or desperation (Hortensio).

Not only did they fall deeply in love with each other, but they finally gained respect from their peers. Think about it: Katherine, the most miserable harpy in English literature, was admired, lauded, and radically happy after spending only a few days with the first man she ever met who didn't try to coddle or appease her.

It Isn't Hard

The manosphere shouldn't even have to exist. Getting a girlfriend is not hard: you just ask girls out, and eventually one of them says yes. And if she doesn't work out, then you move on, because she's just a girl and they make plenty of those. Why do you need an elaborate network of websites to teach you what is obvious? All you need to know is, "Girls like guys who are confident and charismatic." You do not even need a real job anymore, considering how many millennials are working in retail well into their twenties.

Girls want to be asked out, and they want to have sex, just like the normal people. Get to know a girl for five minutes and then ask if you can take her out sometime. With even the most awkward game, you'll get a date maybe 10% of the time.

By the age of 20, if you have not figured out that there is something deeply warped about the way society today mates, then it is your own fault if you can't get laid or if you find yourself in a miserable relationship. Even if you cannot figure out what exactly is wrong, you should sense that something is toxic about it. Everybody who has been married is either divorced or miserable. So if you do literally anything else, the worst case scenario is that you will have just as much failure.

And even if a girl has personality flaws, they can often be conditioned out. Remember that at heart they are looking for you to guide them. If she has a pissy fit over something small, walk away and don't return until she begs. And once she begs, graciously give her that second chance she so desires. Communicate that you do not need her but may enjoy her if she behaves.

Make her work. Make her want to be feminine. Women show so little respect to men because they realize that most men will take whatever they can get. That is to say, men no longer demand respect. If you really are the high-status man every woman masturbates to in whatever Hollywood vomit romcom is currently in theaters, if you really are that high-status man, then she will realize that she cannot be insane if she is to obtain the man of her dreams.

Communication

Show just, like, a little confidence and communication and see the miracles it will accomplish. “Dear, when you cut your hair short, it makes you look like a man. Don’t you want to be able to really turn me on?” This is just one of any number of negative traits, but the same thing applies to fat girls, which is why I’ll date them if they have other redeeming qualities.

When you finally confront your girl about her dumpy looks or character traits, likely your voice will be quivery when you say it, but that is your fault for not having the conversation at the beginning of the relationship. Now that you have waited a year in, she will rant and rave at not getting what she wants for once. Say nothing and look her dead in the eye. When she finishes, repeat exactly what you said both gently and firmly at the same time. If she refuses to change, then dump her then and there.

If she then apologizes and begs for you to take her back, then do so, because now you have seen that she is willing to admit to her mistakes. Finally you have shown some actual masculinity, and you have increased your value enough to make her want to increase her value. And if she does not apologize and make the necessary changes, then it was best to get rid of her sooner than later. Some girls are so damaged that no amount of conditioning can fix them.

Sure, the rare girl with humility may be…well, rare, but you cannot just sit around and hope she falls into your lap. If you want the ever-elusive marital bliss, you have got to approach it like a part-time job. If you are lazy in your pursuits, then you will only get women who are lazy in their commitments. Most people who are divorced either do not know how to pick a wife or do not know how to manage a woman after he has gotten her.

And when your wife left you, did you wish her well? Perhaps buy her kitchen appliances to help her in her new found independence? If she threatens divorce, laugh her down and remind her that no one wants to marry a woman who is divorced, a mother, or over 30 (she is likely all three). Then walk out of the room still chuckling before she can elicit sympathy.

Do not look back or check back in. Crush her false sense of self-esteem and make her realize how much she needs you. It’s not like you have anything to lose, and at any rate women rarely leave a man because he doesn’t show her enough respect. Maybe send her statistics about how children of divorce grow up to be dysfunctional. Granted, I cannot guarantee that she will stay with you, but it’s certainly more effective than begging and bargaining. Even when your wife is leaving, you still bow down and kiss the feet of the tyrant.

You’re Just As Hedonistic

And of course you can claim that all women today are whores, but that is not true either. There are many women who still have a sense of dignity and only give away their sex selectively, since that is what women naturally want to do. True, there are not many virgins outside of the freshmen at Christian colleges in the southern states, but that does not mean that every woman allows herself to be the town bicycle. Maybe the reason you think every single Western girl is a tramp is because you keep searching for girls on ladies night in bars. Go volunteer for a boring non-profit that makes for a bad photo shoot, and you will be more likely to find the wife you are looking for.

Contrary to popular myth, feminism did not invent the slut. Men even have always had a way to get their rocks off before settling down. For example, the samba in Brazil provided a context to meet easy women long before the 1960s.

The famed foreign women of Red Pill lore, and the mothers of many men's children.

"You can't find a wife in a brothel," as my grandfather always said, and it was as true when he was a child as it is today. The world's oldest profession is nothing new, but today they get paid in martinis instead of cash. And who buys them the martinis? You do. At least the old-style whore knew what she was getting from the deal, but you are encouraging Jane Slut to continue sucking resources from men and pressuring other women to do the same.

You rant about how lustful women are, but how much better are you yourself? All you care about is increasing your notch count no matter what the consequences. You sleep with fat girls, you sleep with career-obsessed women, you sleep with androgynous women, and then you wonder why there are so many of them around.

Quit being an enabler. Let them know that you only validate feminine women, and the fatties and Hillarys will force themselves to change. There is a reason that gluttony—and hence lust—is a sin in every major world religion. Everyone wants to get laid in a way that isn't desperate and miserable, so put a higher value on your sex. It's not like you are even having a good time seducing them, considering how much you complain about them. If you feed the geese, they are only going to breed and shit everywhere. Offensive, yes, but the manosphere does not exist to affirm your ego and sense of irreproachability.

Furthermore, do you have any real marketable skills? You say you want a stay-at-home wife, but what have you accomplished to provide that? Laziness is also a sin in most world religions, so instead of living in an apartment with your Call of Duty buddies "because the economy is just that bad," spend a year in vocational school and learn a trade.

Yes, your family will look down on you because "you are so smart and have so much potential, and you're going to spend it building houses?" Fuck that sideways. This isn't the 1950s, and most four-year degrees will get you exactly nothing. Don't participate in the madman credentialism game your parents' generation created. Forget about finding the job of your dreams and focus on finding a skill you can bond with. Maybe you will marry, or maybe you will decide to milk the player lifestyle as long as you can, but at least you will be able to afford to live autonomously.

Final Thoughts

So quit your entitlement. I was red-tinted purple pill before I ever came across the manosphere and figured I was alone. Sure, some of the material on these sites is very cerebral and takes years to synthesize, but most of it is garnered through plain observation or natural consequences. You've got a dick in your pants, so go make the world you want for yourself.

Become the high-status man who can make women want to change, learn a (real) skill, and buy the house with the white picket fence. Or if you want to play the field forever and never get married, then drop your pretentiousness anyway. Women will not suddenly put away their destructive choices by their own volition.

Read More: Feed A Western Woman The Red Pill

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Wikipedia Turns Against #GamerGate

December 25, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

What's the first thing you do when you're looking for an answer to any question? You Google it, of course. And which website regularly has its page with the answer in the top three search results? Can you guess it? It's Wikipedia. Try it out. Type a random word into Google and you will most likely get a related Wikipedia page in the top three results. Most people don't bother scrolling down the page, let alone flipping through pages of search results, and just click the wiki link.

Because Google's rank algorithm gives more weight to pages people click on from search results, Wikipedia over time got unprecedented power to shape the public opinion on any topic imaginable by being considered a source of solid information. But, Wikipedia is free, isn't it? And the information seems to always be carefully sourced with links beneath the article. So what's the problem? Well, there is a laundry list of them but the biggest one is the low retention of editors.

All pages on English Wikipedia are edited and maintained by a relatively small subset of entrenched editors who hold admin power and can ban users and delete their contributions at whim. The core principle should be to always base the articles on information found in reliable sources, but the definition of a "reliable source" is left to the consensus. This simply means that admins form cliques and will back each other up against the outsiders, no matter what. This drives away all dissenting contributors and leaves only the most hardcore editors. And what do you think happens when Wikipedia gets to cover GamerGate?

Exit, facts

Gamergate controversy

From Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

"GamerGate" redirects here. For the type of ant, see Gamergate. For the online video game store, see GamersGate.

The Gamergate controversy, centering on a debate about sexism in video game culture, came to public attention beginning in August 2014 because of ongoing harassment and threats, primarily targeting women in the video game industry. Many supporters of the self-described Gamergate movement say that they are concerned about ethical issues in video game journalism, but media commentary has primarily focused on the attacks by Gamergate supporters, which have been broadly condemned as sexist and misogynistic. Gamergate is often seen as a manifestation of a culture war against targets such as women, the diversification of gaming culture, recognition of video games as an art form, social criticism of video games as a media, and the way in which these things threaten the traditional gamer identity.

Every word is pulsing with weaseldom

The above paragraph manages to get absolutely everything about GamerGate wrong. First of all, the reason for GamerGate was that, when people mentioned the trivial scandal of Zoe Quinn whoring herself on Reddit and various forums, they would get hit with a nuclear banhammer. This would prompt others to start talking about Zoe Quinn and “hey, why did that other thread get banned?” which resulted in more censorship and more people getting curious and furious. The peak was hit with the “gamers are dead” articles. Then the GamesJournPros list got leaked, the collusion of gaming press was made public and the ball rolled downhill from there.

If there is a culture war, it was started by SJWs in a desperate attempt to force a paradigm change in video games culture. Just like Hitler foolishly believed Russia was rotten and would surrender on the first day of blitzkrieg, SJWs thought a series of pompous articles would destroy the misogynerd culture once and for all.

SJWs would usually not resort to such overt tactics as publishing articles that call for the end of gamers, but that’s because they ran out of patience and got too arrogant. SJWs are simply not prepared for the level of persistence and ingenuity gamers possess and this is the war they are definitely going to lose.

Enter, bias

The controversy began after indie game developer Zoe Quinn's ex-boyfriend alleged that Quinn had a romantic relationship with Nathan Grayson, a journalist for the video game news site Kotaku. Quinn was then subjected to severe misogynistic harassment, including false accusations that the relationship had led to positive coverage of Quinn's game. A number of gaming industry members supportive of Quinn were also subjected to harassment, threats of violence, and the malicious broadcasting of personally identifiable information about them (doxing); some of them fled their homes. The targets were mostly women, and included Quinn, feminist media critic Anita Sarkeesian, and indie game developer Brianna Wu. The harassment came from social media users, particularly those from 4chan, 8chan and Reddit using the #gamergate hashtag. These attacks often include anti-feminist and misogynistic rhetoric, and have heightened discussion of sexism and misogyny in the gaming community.

Six sentences, three uses of the word "misogyny"

Ironically, this paragraph invokes the "damsel in distress" trope, the very one Anita railed against in her video series. We are supposed to feel sorry because Anita Sarkeesian was "harassed," which was actually just criticism of her work. The problem arose because Anita touted her work as academic and actually wanted it to be used in gender studies. A defining characteristic of academic work is peer review, which freaked Anita out, because SJWs are not used to being questioned. In other words, if you can't deal with critics, simply paint them as harassers and misogynerds. And don't forget to turn the comments on your Youtube channel off!

It's interesting to point out that damsels in distress were saved because fertile women had only one advantage over men—they could bear children. Because female SJWs are mostly not interested in bearing children but still clamor for the female privilege, we should probably think twice before coming to aid of witches such as Anita or Zoe.

Take my lip piercing

Zoe Quinn is so HOT

The above picture of Zoe Quinn from the GamerGate article on Wikipedia was not originally present there. In fact, there was a much more neutral picture of her in a gaming convention, but Zoe herself intervened with the Wikipedia admin that was favorable to the SJW cause and, sure enough, the picture was promptly changed.

The admin in question, RyuLong (translated as "DragonDragon"), actually got himself in a lot of trouble because of his bias over GamerGate article and there is even an ArbCom (Arbitration Committee) case over it. In short, ArbCom is a nerd tribunal that talks fancy words but mostly has no teeth and will probably decide to give RyuLong a slap on the wrist.

Even Jimmy Wales, the daddy of Wikipedia, chimed in and tried to silence GamerGate supporters:

No donation for you, Jimbo!

We're off to never-never land

Surprisingly enough, this Wikipedia article has had an opposite effect—people become curious about GamerGate and start investigating on their own, which usually brings them to the closer realization of how deeply infiltrated our society is with SJW ideas and zealots. The bias and obvious weighting of the article has ended up working against SJWs.

Wikipedia was originally envisioned as quasi-anarchist "encyclopedia everyone can edit." While it is a noble goal to collect and organize the sum of all human knowledge, nobody accounted for the psychology of humans. No matter what kind of structure we create collectively, someone will want to control it.

Since Jimmy Wales has effectively removed himself from the hierarchy in Wikipedia and has no say in what happens behind the closed doors, we have no ultimate recourse to slander against GamerGate. In the end, Wikipedia is plagued with systemic problems that will sooner or later bring it down. It will be a sad day but it was doomed to fail from the start.

Did you like this post? Read more #gamergate news on Reaxxion, ROK's little brother. Click here to visit.

Derek Baroni

Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

The Basic Math Of Long Term Relationships Just Doesn't Add Up

December 25, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

A lot of young men meet a girl, start having great sex with her, find they get along well (easy when she's dropping her panties 2-3 times a day), and it turns into a relationship. Pretty soon they are moving in together and becoming a regular married couple. Outside of red pill players, young people 18-30 take their relationships quite seriously, whereas it's often the "jaded" 30+ that are pragmatic.

I was trying to think about why young people take relationships so seriously. It's an easy trap to fall into. A large part of it calls back to the days when marriage was a must. If you've got a girl—you hold onto her. It's instinctive. There's a certain amount of blue pill or new age-90s"'soulmate" in men's minds and also the scarcity mentality. On a subconscious level we are also trying to prove ourselves to society. "I'm married and respectable." Even a battle-hardened PUA has to work to get laid. Looking at my own attitudes and experiences, it's largely a matter of expediency.

If she's sexy, amenable, available and co-operative, a logical, rational man just wants more of the same. Why not see her as often as possible, why not move in with her? Society does respect legal paperwork, and I got married three times because I moved about the world; it's the easiest way for a couple to negotiate immigration procedures. I got a second passport out of it, sex on tap, and someone to help fetch groceries and keep the house tidy. There are advantages. It also "in theory" takes the stress out of getting laid.

Sure anyone with game can pick up girls, and 99/100 of those won't have diseases, be psychos that try to murder you in your sleep, run to the police screaming rape etc. But there is the odd 1/100 you have to be on guard against. Beyond expediency comes trust. With trust comes relaxation. There is a fair amount of stress involved in getting naked with a stranger and unless you do that in the alleyway behind a nightclub, you'll have to share a private space with her and to some extent be on guard not to have your phone and wallet stolen.

On the flip side, some months into a relationship, you can trust her with the key to your home and not find she's rented a U-Haul and cleaned the place out. Trust is a big one and it creates lots of benefits. Drank too much last night and took a cab home. Throw her the car keys to go and retrieve it. A wife becomes like an assistant; a trustworthy "employee" that can handle all kinds of every day errands. In the man's mind, locking down a girl, is "making life easier."

This Is A Fallacy

Aside from calling me jaded because I've been there and done it one too many times, I do at least have the experience of LTRs to explain to you why "more of the same" and “making life easier” is not the correct attitude. Beyond the blue pill warrior that wants to “do the right thing” or thinks he’s met his soulmate, there are still red pill ideals that could favor an LTR or marriage.

Younger red pillers are inclined to throw their hands in the air and say “bang bitches,” but that stonewall attitude doesn’t resolve the ideal of having a partner. A fair few PUAs give up game to have kids (although probably they are only kidding themselves). Talk of not being alone is also bandied about, though let me tell you, there is no place lonelier than an LTR, even a good one.

Here’s the problem: more of the same involves ever increasing amounts of work. Einstien’s law of relativity shows that increasing amounts of acceleration require exponentially increasing amounts of energy. Moving in together will lock down more of the same, only by increasing energy input. Why buy the cow, as they say, when you can milk it for free?

I was dating a girl for more than a year and we had a great time together, then she invited me to move in with her. I balked. If I move in, she’s now got one over on me to pay the rent, take out the trash, help clean the bathroom, service her car, “when are you coming home” – etc. Pretty soon I can’t get up in the morning without her shopping list of tasks—weekends with her parents and God knows what.

A Man In A Long Term Relationship Becomes Beta By Default

When a relationship gets to that point 1-2 months in where there is trust, great sex, and an amicable outlook, a man is thinking “more of the same.” But he is in large part only trying to maintain the status quo long term – BIG MISTAKE! Nothing remains constant for very long. The man is trying to defy a basic law of physics, while from her point of view, she’s making a long term investment that costs her only a few months of her time and is based on ideals of what you will ADD to her life in the future. Notice the word ADD in the equation.

She’s all happy and amenable right now, but if you don’t add those things, some of which might be total romantic pipe dreams, she will become dissatisfied. At the very least you now face an uphill and ever-steepening path. Women may seem airheaded and frivolous, and even good girls will plough into sexual relationships with almost zero communication and planning, but in her mind she knows what she wants.

You have to meet at least a part of her expectations. What is game if not presenting yourself as a man who will meet her expectations? In many cases you must also figure out what it is she’s expecting, because she sure as hell won’t tell you directly. Easy in the short term, but long term if she does communicate, it will most likely be a low level hum of moody dissatisfaction that’s far from the relaxing “more of the same” you had in mind.

“More Of The Same” Does Not Exist

The fringe benefits of living with a woman can easily be recreated by hiring a person assistant or housekeeper. If you don’t have a budget for that, earning money is easier than some poverty mentality relationship with trust built on the basis of you both getting naked together. It doesn't make much sense. You lose far more than you gain. The more you try to keep the golden goose, the more expensive it becomes to you.

If you are sick with the flu, hung over, scrambling late for work, in a bad mood etc. —having her living with you prevents you from maintaining that ultra-cool "player" persona. The more she gets to peek behind the curtains, the more she will lose respect. At the very least any romantic illusions you've built up will begin to fade. Not only are you chasing "more of the same" with increasing input, but you are doing it at an ever-increasing disadvantage. In plain English: You're fucked!

Rock bands on tour get fed up with each other, in large part because it's just too much time together. Red pill married guys talk about relationship game, but it's not the same because she has seen behind the curtain. You can't game someone that's fed up with you and knows you personally. It's like sending a wanted felon into the police station to carry out an armed robbery, where there's no money, after you've notified the police he's coming. Where is the upside?

Female Biology

All of this is before you consider the sexual side of the equation, which is why a man gets into this in the first place. The fringe benefits are a convenience for a person that can't afford to hire staff, but tits and pussy is the main item on the menu hallmarked for "more of the same."

25% of the time a woman has PMS or is menstruating. You probably skipped a lot of that when you were dating, but now you live with her, you'll be emptying the trash can of her sanitary towels. The day will come when she's got the flu AND her period. Poor girl, you think, I can't force her to give me sexual pleasure in this state—Of course you can't but – BANG! – you're done. Sex during her period is now off the menu – permanently. She's just waiting to build that fence. Yet again we find more of the same requires ever-increasing effort.

The things you are giving up are not monetary, they are priceless.

In the 21st Century the LTR is bankrupt for a man. There's an ever-decreasing return for ever-increasing input, with the playing field constantly shifting against you. Never mind her aging and menopause, never mind all the legal issues and divorce risks. We haven't even discussed her career, feminists traits, family ties etc. Like the character in the photo, you are trying to walk on water, hanging upside down while holding on to her—all for what?

Read More: Don't Look For A Girlfriend

How Starting My Own Business Developed My Game

December 26, 2014 | by Andrew Singh | Link | Original Link

Two years after graduating from college, I cut the umbilical cord from my corporate job and started my own business. Little did I realize how my blue-pill, beta way of life was soon going to transition into a new dimension

Prior to starting my own business, I was fearful of rejection. When going out during college, I would sit at the corner of the bar while all my friends were out approaching earning digits, hook ups, and one night stands. To me the fear of rejection overshadowed the potential for reward that could have been had if I just mustered up the courage to approach. Not only was I fearful of rejection, but I would get jealous of all my friends who had the right game and attitude required to consistently close.

Business taught me the resilience needed to overcome that fear. The rejections I have experienced in business and still experience to this day are more intense and personal than any woman's rejection at a club or bar.

The constant struggles I encountered on my start-up enabled me to not give a fuck when it came to cold approaching at night. Through my business, I developed two key traits instrumental to strong game: Not fearing rejection, and a strong frame.

As I mentioned earlier, the hundreds of cold approaches I performed and continue to perform with clients regarding my business has enabled me to not fear rejection when approaching a group of women. I have gotten to the point that when I do face rejection, I smile, walk away, and move onto my next target. Getting over this fear has improved my game tremendously.

Some nights, I've gotten shot down by a few women, then on my last approach, I end up finding a woman receptive to my game leading to a notch. In the past, after the first rejection, I would have just called it a night and left. But starting my own business has enabled me and will help anyone else new to game and dealing with the initial fear.

As an entrepreneur, you have to be resilient, tough, and have a strong frame of mind. Once you're at the stage of hiring employees, you realize how you are responsible for all your employees and their livelihoods. At that point, certain blue pill and beta patterns—indecisiveness, loneliness, depression, negative thinking, etc. slowly began to dissipate. You begin to realize that other people look to you to lead them, and your character is not only a reflection upon yourself, but also that business you've worked hard to develop and grow. Taking the red pill is not something that happens overnight.

One becomes more red pill and alpha through the experiences and challenges that cultivate him into a high value man that is respected by both his peers and women. Starting my own business has improved my self-esteem and the way I perceive myself. Once you convince yourself that you have become the man that you seek to be, your frame automatically improves.

That same frame you maintain with your employees, clients, and colleagues—confidence, certainty in your decisions, and a positive outlook are the same characteristics you need to approach, escalate, and close the deal. Like in business, with game, you are the product or service you are looking to sell, and the methods by which you convey yourself and the frame with which you sell will impact your likelihood for success.

At first, I was ambivalent towards learning game, and hated having to go out and make approaches to get a girl to like me. Ever since starting my own business, I look at game as a tactic that not only enhances my personal life, but my professional life as well. Game has complemented my business career and will continue to do so—the more work I put in, the better I get. Business has in turn complemented my game by providing me with the strong frame needed to succeed in life.

So gentlemen, as we approach the new year I advise anyone who is looking to launch that new idea or product to go into 2015 with the tenacity required to do so. The life experiences you learn and character you develop in the process can be more beneficial than you could imagine!

Read More: 8 Ways Game Is Like Big Business

Andrew Singh

Andrew is a twenty something Entrepreneur living in the Northeast. He enjoys sexy women, fast cars, and fine scotch. If you enjoyed the following articles, be on the look out for his upcoming blog...

9 Elements Of Your Quest For Self Mastery

December 27, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> I am the Master of my Fate and the Captain of my Destiny. – Nelson Mandela

Destiny: the undeniable "mystery" (i.e. the events that will necessarily happen to a particular person or thing in the future) which unravels itself with time.

Are we free from the clutches of destiny? Can a man completely control his destiny? Are we the puppets of fate, or the masters of our own fate? These are questions which pose themselves before every man at some point in his life, depending on the circumstances he finds himself in. We didn't choose what we were born as, or what or whom we were born with; but at the same time we can choose whom to associate or relate with, or where or what we could be.

> Katsumoto: You believe a man can change his destiny?
>
> Nathan Algren: I think a man does what he can, until his destiny is revealed.

Life at times appears as a mixture of pre-determinism and free will: but most of the time our free will helps us to shape the reality we can create—even if it may be through extensive effort.

> Until you make the unconscious conscious, it will direct your life and you will call it fate. — C.G. Jung

Yet the more you see at life, the more one realizes that man's control over his circumstances, no matter how great it may be, is still limited. And more so, is his control over fellow beings. The impermanence of circumstances and people's behavior due to the certainty of change in life renders most of man's control over these factors in life as: limited. Sometimes shit happens when you least expect it….

..yet, you can still decide how to deal with it.

Thus, the greatest (and most complete) control what a man can actually achieve in his life is over his own self—which unfortunately most men fail to accomplish, or even pursue.

Modern society often argues that it is easier to control others, than ourselves—but in reality on the flip side, it is also easy to control the self, which would help us better control and influence others if we devote ourselves to learning how to do it.

> You will never have a greater or lesser dominion than that over yourself…the height of a man's success is gauged by his self-mastery; the depth of his failure by his self-abandonment. …And this law is the expression of eternal justice. He who cannot establish dominion over himself will have no dominion over others.
> — Leonardo da Vinci

The mastery of one's own self to forge one's own destiny is possibly the ultimate test a man could face in his life. How we maintain our frame in the face of life's uncertainties can give us important clues on how far we have gone down the path of self mastery. There are only two things in life which are certain: change, and the grim reaper. Every human being has to experience them some time or the other, so the time we have in life is what is our greatest possession.

Self mastery possibly represents the ultimate goal that a man could achieve (or could seek to achieve)— for it is a potent tool that helps us to create the reality or destiny that we seek for ourselves…

> The only person you are destined to become is the person you decide to be. — Ralph Waldo Emerson

…and self mastery plays an important role in that, as it encompasses the attributes necessary for often creating a self-willed reality.

> If you do not create your destiny, you will have your fate inflicted upon you. –

> William Irvin Thompson

We can only control what we can control. And the most cherished thing that we can control is the self.

> If you do not conquer self, you will be conquered by self." – Napoleon Hill, Think and Grow Rich

Since the journey of self mastery is possibly the most difficult (and important) journey a man can undertake in his life, there are certain factors which are extremely important and necessary for the process, and the subsequent attainment of it. They are:

1.The knowledge of self-discovery, and courage

> Knowing yourself is the beginning of all wisdom. – Aristotle

This is the seed, the first step towards self mastery. Who are you—as a person, taking in regard the complete sum of your nature-given gifts and flaws? Do you really know yourself? Have you discovered your true self and the purpose of your life?

You cannot control or estimate who you are or what you can do, unless you know first who you are or what you can do. Answering these questions honestly is the least a man can do for himself, to begin self-discovery. You cannot master the self until you know what your own self is – for many are often afraid to take the plunge into the abyss of their own selves to face their personal "demons" – but rather choose to "safely" spend their lives trying to "discover" others.

> And you? When will you begin that long journey into yourself? — Rumi

We can control others because we know what they think, how they'd act, or what they can or would do; but do we know what our own selves are capable of? Thus self discovery becomes very important for the formation and correct estimation of the true self in one's own mind, as we can't see ourselves in first person as others do.

The formation of the true self image after self discovery leads to the correct visual reality or the goals we can properly visualize for ourselves. Such is the power of self-discovery, for it grants us with the true knowledge of what we realistically are and what we are capable of, which itself is Power. This power, coupled with courage, is an important catalyst on the path to self mastery.

Courage in the context of self mastery is not recklessness; rather it is the ability to face the truth (knowledge) of the flaws within ourselves and the dangers (fears) around us which limit us, and to make efforts to overcome them.

A man's fears often limit him unnecessarily, which stunt his identity. Fear can be of two types: the known and the unknown—but can be overcome with the shrewd, sincere, and dedicated use of courage, coupled with knowledge – for the masterful man knows which battles to pick wisely. The man who rises up to his fears is thus the master of his own self, and can take charge of his destiny.

> Knowledge and Courage are the elements of Greatness. They give immortality, because they are immortal. Each is as much as he knows, and the wise can do anything. A man without knowledge, a world without light. Wisdom and strength, eyes and hands. Knowledge without courage is sterile. – Baltasar Gracian, The Art of Worldly Wisdom

2. Self-Belief

Within the self, that is. If you don't believe or trust in yourself, no one can help you.

> To be a champ you have to believe in yourself when no one else will. – Sugar Ray Robinson

Belief (or faith) in oneself is possibly the greatest belief that a man could harbor (after belief in God). The human body and mind is incredible, when it comes to feats of greatness. All of these were possible with the power of belief.

To become masters of the self, we must first believe that we can become masters of the self. That self-belief is the dynamo which unrelentingly fuels the journey of a man on the path of self mastery, in face of failures and pitfalls.

3. Willpower and Discipline

> Will power is to the mind like a strong blind man who carries on his shoulders a lame man who can see. – Arthur Schopenhauer

"When there is a will, there is a way," as the saying goes. To control the self, willpower is undoubtedly necessary. Man, created free, is possibly the greatest slave to his own volition. But how many men ever manage to control their own volition—and train their own minds?

> If you are going to win any battle, you have to do one thing. You have to make the mind run the body. Never let the body tell the mind what to do… the body is never tired if the mind is not tired. — George S. Patton Willpower and discipline are important tools in the arsenal of the masterful man. Learn how to generate them, even if the process may be mutually exclusive.

4. The art of delaying self-gratification

As mentioned above, most men are slaves to their own volition.

> Find out each man's thumbscrew. 'Tis the art of setting their wills in action. It needs more skill than resolution. You must know where to get at anyone. Every volition has a special motive which varies according to taste. All men are idolaters, some of fame, others of selfinterest, most of pleasure. Skill consists in knowing these idols in order to bring them into play. – Baltasar Gracian (1601-1658)

Now imagine, if a man knew his own thumbscrews—and mastered them. Would he be at the easy disposal of others who would set "his will into action"? The masterful man who is the master of his own pleasure is not only the one who can attain or create his pleasure easily, but also the one who can delay its gratification – at his own will.

5. Minimalism

To be a true master of yourself, you must be free from others. The more you're free from external obligations, the more you're free to lead the life you'd want. That's where minimalism can be expressed in your life – by de-cluttering and making your life free from external interferences as much as possible.

Live a minimalist life—free from unnecessary things, ideas and even people—which and who limit your freedom. Learn the ways of how to create your own freedom. Cultivate simplicity, frugality and austerity. In today's commercial times, not only will this help to conserve your resources and maintain your financial freedom—which lubricates other types of freedom—but it will also bestow onto you the survivor's mindset, which will help you to make the best of any situation, how matter how difficult and trying it may be.

6. Emotional Detachment

Directly linked to the factor above, the virtues of emotional detachment cannot be explained enough. You cannot become the master of your own fate, as long as others continue to have a say in to 'control' and determine your actions, thoughts, and thus eventual fate.

The man who finds security and fulfillment within himself is the true master of the self. He doesn't let things, myths, unfounded beliefs, or people rule his life , as he is free from attachments to such which would limit him. The real reason of his fulfillment is because he lives his life naturally as a free being, as nature created him to be—to discover his own unique identity and create his own destiny.

> The most important aspect of my personality as far as determining my success goes; has been my questioning conventional wisdom, doubting experts and > questioning authority. While that can be painful in your relationships with your parents and teachers, it's enormously useful in life. – Larry Ellison Emotional detachment is, if you think deeply about it, a liberating form of self-love that a man can and should develop.

7. Perseverance and Patience

> The only time you fail is when you fall down and stay down. — Stephen Richards, Cosmic Ordering: You can be successful

On the path towards self-mastery, there are bound to be innumerable mistakes, what people may brand as "failures." But a mistake is not a failure, as long as you continue to pull yourself back onto the path of self-mastery. Enlightened men went through a period of "failures" during their metamorphosis into self-masterful men; for no one learns self-mastery from the mother's womb.

The key is not to lose focus, and more importantly, patience with the process. A great quality of the men who attained self-mastery was patience: not only with others, but more so with the self, when they failed. As the teacher is patient with the student's mistakes during the learning process, they were patient enough with themselves to stick onto the path of self-mastery and continued to persevere without quitting.

8. Self Reliance

> The great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude. — Ralph Waldo Emerson, Self-Reliance

Self-explanatory as it is, the power of self reliance is one of the core strengths of the master—which he develops and guards persistently. He thus becomes the rock to which others lean onto, just like the mountain to which the dew gravitates to.

9. Acceptance

> People around you, constantly under the pull of their emotions, change their ideas by the day or by the hour, depending on their mood. You must never assume that what people say or do in a particular moment is a statement of their permanent desires. — Robert Greene, Mastery

The value of acceptance is explored quite vividly in Robert Greene's bestseller "Mastery",which teaches important lessons on the subject. Some of the greatest challenges we often face in life involve accepting life for the shit it throws at us through the unpleasant circumstances, events, things and people we may encounter.

True social intelligence—the hallmark of a master—also involves guile, and sometimes suffering fools gladly, and trying to see yourself as how people see you —so as to be in a better position to deal with them, once you know their perception of you. This acceptance is thus not easy to practice by all, but only by the initiated as it involves a lot of patience and endurance—qualities necessary for both self-mastery, and mastery over others.

Conclusion

> I count him braver who overcomes his desires than him who conquers his enemies, for the hardest victory is over self. – Aristotle

Many successful men live their lives mastering others without mastering themselves. Happiness from success is not a goal, but a journey. But the greatest fulfillment comes from freedom, for it allows us the leverage to shape the destiny we desire for ourselves—which is often and truly created by self-mastery of the self, which itself is a journey.

Read Next: How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Solzhenitsyn’s Warning About Communism Applies To Today’s Culture War

December 27, 2014 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

I’d like to share a quote from Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the famous Russian dissident author who emigrated to the United States during the height of the Cold War. Solzhenitsyn wrote about Communism and the Soviet Union mostly, but it is amazing the parallels that one can see with contemporary American society, in terms of the cultural climate. Keep in mind, the United States has changed from Solzhenitsyn’s time, so much so that the following quote now illustrates the current condition of western society.

> Our present system is unique in world history, because over and above its physical and economic constraints, it demands of us total surrender of our souls, continuous and active participation in the general, conscious lie. To this putrefaction of the soul, this spiritual enslavement, human beings who wish to be human cannot consent.

One of the complaints of the early communists operating in western Europe in the late 20s and 30s was that the workers would not join their revolt. This astounded many of the early communists who could not believe that the workers did not want to overthrow the capitalistic system and all the accumulated historical legacy of oppression that they believed all workers inherited.

György Lukács was one of the early founders of cultural marxist thought who concluded that the workers did not join their revolt because of their “Christian souls.” What he believed was necessary was a re-education of society, a gradual changing of values and subversion of symbols until they no longer stood against global communist revolution. He and many like-minded left wing intellectuals would go on to found the Frankfurt school and continue disseminating these ideas of cultural paradigm change through language, ideas, and a pervasive counter-culture.

How much the times have changed where the counter-culture has become the dominant and only culture, the ideas all increasingly radical and the very English language changed to accommodate a pernicious left wing agenda of political correctness.

Because of this oppressive regime of thought, we are left without words to even articulate our opposition without immediately being castigated by a society-wide knee-jerk reflex, a defense mechanism programmed to act against reactionaries and traditionalists of all stripes. What Solzhenitsyn brought up about the Soviet Union is already steadily creeping up on us here in the west. The economic model of Marxism has failed, but the cultural model is alive and well, we see it in feminism, equalism, historical revisionism, native guilt, and disintegration of tradition on the grounds of it not being progressive enough.

It seems that to be part of the elite is to take part in a great lie. One must be able to mouth off their platitudes and adopt a vigilant eye for potential bait designed by the mob samizdat to lure you into making a mistake. Even worse, taking a page out of the New Testament and Jesus's admonition of harboring any seditious thoughts at all to heart, progressives try to not only reform our behavior, but the very contents of our character as well.

Good becomes bad, bad becomes good. Death becomes life, perversion the norm, sophism a part of every lecture, and the right to dissent only accorded to a select few. Truly, Solzhenitsyn would be rolling over in his grave.

Read More: How Long Will It Take For Everything To Be A "Trigger Warning"?

Vincent Law
Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

What The West Can Learn From India’s Checkered History

December 28, 2014 | by Aristodemos Hanno | Link | Original Link

For many years now, people from the developed West have generally viewed India as a backward, uncivilized, poor and godforsaken place. Being an Indian myself, I do not believe that this common assessment of the state of things in India is completely incorrect. In fact, any unbiased, rational person would not paint a rosy picture of modern India. However, I believe that it would be quite extreme to say that this deplorable state of things shows that Indian society and people are inept and unenterprising by nature. This paints a very simplistic and stereotypical picture of the current problems of my country.

If one truly wishes to understand the present appalling conditions in India, he must take a look at India’s history. But before diving straight into this subject, let me attempt to explain the very idea of what India is (and is not).

What India Really Is

For several decades now, the idea that India is a nation with thousands of years of golden history has become entrenched in the minds of most Indians, and even some westerners. This is, however, completely false. India is not, and has never been, a nation, rather it is something much broader—it is an entire civilization.

The name India is derived from the Greek Indica, which itself borrows from the Persian word Hindu, which had nothing to do with the Hindu religion, but rather, it referred to a geographical entity. The Persians used the word Hindu while referring to the River Indus, which was known to the Vedic inhabitants of the time as Sindhu; since the Persians had trouble pronouncing the word Sindhu, they corrupted the word to Hindu.

Thus, simply put, the term India, and later many similar terms, such as the Persian Hindustan (land of the Hindus), the Arabic Hind, were not meant to refer to the entirety of the Indian sub-continent, but rather only to the land around the Indus river, and some of the countries beyond it. This was essentially what can be called the Indo-Aryan or Indo-Gangetic civilization. It is the very root of what India is.

India's history nominally begins with the study of the Indus Valley Civilization, but its real history, of which the modern Indian civilization is a continuation, begins much later, with the arrival of the Vedic Aryan tribes.

Genesis Of The Indo-Aryan Civilization

The Vedic Aryans were tribes which are originally thought to have belonged to someplace in modern-day Iran and/or Central Asia. These people began their migrations (yes, there was not one Aryan migration, but rather, a wave of successive migrations), into the Indian sub-continent some time around 1500 BC, displacing, subjugating and sometimes even assimilating the native Dravidians and some primitive tribes as they kept expanding their realms.

This period marks the first time that the native Indian people were subjugated and mastered by a foreign people, whose culture and traditions gradually became dominant. But this was not to be the last time that the native nations and tribes of India would be subjugated by a foreign people; this would in fact become a pattern that kept on repeating again and again. One might even argue that most of Indian history has been filled with bloodshed, conquest and subjugation.

But does this mean that all which students across the world learn about the history of the Indian civilization is wide of the mark and completely fictitious? No, to say so would be naïve and ignorant. India does in fact have a very rich history; for centuries, beginning in the classical period of Indian history, lasting till the 14th-15th century AD, the nations of the Indian sub-continent together made the strongest economic power on earth, and were responsible for a great number of impressive inventions and innovations which changed the course of human history.

Indian Marvels

Throughout the world, India is famous for its ancient and medieval monuments, from the likes of the Taj Mahal and the Qutb Minar, to the Badrinath and Jagannath Temples. It is also well known for its marvelous ancient literature such as the Hindu Epic Mahabharata and the widely read and much appreciated sex guide, Kama Sutra.

India had one of the earliest universities of the world, Taxila or Takshashila, known for imparting education in the fields of medicine and law, now situated in modern-day Pakistan. The invention of the number zero is also attributed to philosophers and mathematicians in Ancient India, and Indians throughout history have made immense contributions to the field of mathematics.

All of these facts point out that throughout much of its history, India was inhabited by a great civilization with economic, scientific and cultural prowess that was unparalleled throughout the rest of the world, with perhaps the exception of China. But now let me go back to the first point that I mentioned earlier: Indian history is filled with the horrors of bloodshed, conquest and subjugation; the Vedic Aryans subdued the Dravidians, then they fought amongt themselves, killed and subjugated each other, then they were invaded by the Greeks and Persians, and after them the Indo-Greeks, then the Nomadic Kushans, then the Scythians and Huns, then the Arabs, then the Muslim Turks came in and established themselves, then the Chagatai Mughals conquered the sub-continent and established the Mughal Empire, then the Afghan tribes kept attacking and invading, then the Persians were at it again, and so on and so forth. You see what I'm talking about?

Thus It becomes a very pertinent question to ask why the Indian civilization has seen this repeated pattern of destruction if it was truly so glorious and magnificent throughout much of its history. The answer is quite simple: change in the very nature of Indian people, polity and society.

A History Of Greed And Complacence

When the Vedic Aryans first came in, they were a virtuous and warlike people, leading a simple yet hard life. After they had settled in the Indian sub-continent and established their mighty kingdoms and a more sophisticated economy, their society began to change rapidly. The people began to become complacent, they became self-centered and greedy, the idea of loyalty to the tribe was lost, material wealth became increasingly important, and, one might even argue, began to be worshiped.

This radical transformation continued, but there were further changes in the Post-Vedic Period. New religions and cults came up, with the Buddhists and the Jains becoming very dominant; both these new faiths gained many followers throughout the Mauryan Empire. Buddhism was supposed to promote tolerance and pacifism, but what it ended up doing when it became the dominant religion was instead creating intolerance and hatred.

During the reign of Emperor Ashoka of the Maruyan Empire, the state propagated the ideology/philosophy of Dhamma or Dharma , which means a path of virtue and tolerance. In its initial stage, the state authorities were not exceedingly zealous and fanatical while trying to enforce this ideology, but with time, the Dhamma policy of the Mauryan Empire was shoved down its people's throats by force. The Mauryans established a special class of officers called the Dhamma-Mahamattas who were responsible for imposing the policy of Dhamma upon the public.

In the medieval period, the most notable rulers of India were from the Mughal Dynasty. It would not be far-fetched to say that most Mughal rulers were essentially despots. Many among the Mughal elite (even some of the Mughal rulers) were addicted to opium, wine and sex. Even though during much of the Mughal period, per capita incomes in India were on par with European levels, the Mughal elite enjoyed a much more luxurious life than their counterparts in Europe. The Mughals' love of luxury was supported by crippling taxes on the general population; any revolts by the native population were put down swiftly and violently.

With each passing generation, the Mughals became less and less interested in maintaining the frontiers of their empire, safeguarding the interests of the public, encouraging science and education, boosting development, etc, and more interested in fulfilling their own desires for luxury and comfort. The Mughals continued their wasteful expenditure by building grand palaces and tombs throughout much of their Empire, spending the money they had extorted out of the population on economically useless structures.

The common people were not much better too in this period. People were obsessed with material wealth, and social hierarchies had become extremely rigid with a great amount of discrimination against those belonging to the lower levels in the traditional Hindu caste strata; unlike in the Mauryan period, heterodox sects propagating beliefs against the caste system had become significantly weaker. Also, the people of this period were much more narrow minded and the Indian civilization was more instrumental in maintaining popular superstitions and savage customs than providing the world with elegant prose or any new inventions.

Parallels With The Modern West

The West today is in a dominant position that is quite similar (but with notable differences) to the position which India has occupied throughout multiple phases of its history. The Western countries together make up a majority of the world's GDP, their culture dominates the globe, and the West is scientifically and technologically superior to the rest of the world.

But the people of the West, just like the Indians of the "Golden" periods of Indian history, have become greedy, selfish, narrow minded, ignorant and complacent. The entire West has been overtaken by consumerist madness. Human virtues have taken a back seat in the pursuit of material gain. The basic bonds of family and community suffer as people become increasingly insular and unsociable. Each government is more despotic than the last.

Most major countries of the Western world, including France, Germany, Italy and to an extent, the United States, have steadily declining fertility rates. As the native population ages, foreign labor is imported to sustain the fledgling economies of these fledgling states. The mainstream media, instead of urging the native people to save their communities, spew disgusting socialist and feminist propaganda, furthering the destruction of the nations of the West.

It is rather amusing for an observer like me in the East to see the West tie a noose round its own neck by continuing with firm faith on its current path of assured self-destruction. It is astounding to see that the United States continues to spend trillions of dollars on its depraved welfare programs and over-extended military every single year even as it goes further and further into debt, while at the same time, most traditional values disappear from American society. The scenario is very similar across the rest of the Western world.

The West may not necessarily be destroyed by nomadic hordes and barbarian enemies in the future, but it will certainly be destroyed from within because Western society has fundamentally changed for the worse, just as so many Indian kingdoms and empires were destroyed from within due to the vices of their people, both the rulers and the ruled.

Read More: With First World Problems Like Feminism, The West Doesn't Need Enemies

Aristodemos Hanno
Aristodemos is a self-obsessed and reserved Law student who has a deep liking for History and Geopolitics. You can check out more of his work on redpillindia.com

How To Free Yourself From The Need For Women

December 28, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

You depend on women for validation. So do I. We all do. Possibly the hardest part of the red pill to swallow is accepting that we all desperately long for the attention and affection of females.

We're biologically programmed to want to have sex with them, and we're socially conditioned to seek their approval. There's no way around this. It feels good to be inside of a woman. And it feels good to hold one in your embrace, or have one by your side.

However it's part of our masculine pride to deny this reality. We are too proud to admit this fact, and we often live under its shadow as a result. But the thing is: you must come to terms with this simple truth in order to be able to free yourself from its chains. And the only way to do this is is internalize the following critical distinction:

While we all WANT women, we do not NEED them

Depending on where you are in your life you're either longing for a hookup buddy, a harem of such buddies, a girlfriend, or a wife. Or you have it. Regardless of which category you fall under, this concept is equally important to adopt and believe.

For example, if you're single and looking for women to hook up with, but not wife up, this is important because it will remove the outcome dependence that corrupts your game by communicating your thirstiness and NEED to bed her. Or maybe you're in a relationship. In this case realizing that you don't NEED the relationship to work out, no matter how badly you WANT it to, will keep you from acting like a needy bitch, communicate yourself honestly without worrying about rocking the boat, and allow you free your emotions from the current state of the relationship (e.g. you can't sleep because your girl is mad at you).

These are the two most common scenarios to which applying this principle applies. However it's main benefit is something far more important:

When you recognize this, you can live the rest of your life without thinking about women

Don't lie: how often do you think, worry, or otherwise cause yourself anxiety because of women?

I know that when I'm single I tend to stress about whether or not I'm going to get laid this week, whether or not that new lead will text back, or if my night out will be successful.

On the other hand, when you're in a relationship, it's common and normal to worry about your partner. Is she upset with you? Why is she acting weird? Who's that guy she's texting?

The thing is: all of these anxious thoughts are caused by your attachment to the outcome of the relationship, the night, the date, or the new prospect. By reminding yourself that you don't NEED whichever of the above you're stressing about to work out, that you only WANT it to, you can put it off your mind and focus on the task at hand whether that's hanging out with your buddies, working out, or working on your business.

You WANT women, sex, and awesome relationships but you do not NEED them

While female connection and sex are great things that we all want, we simply do not need them to in order to be happy and enjoy all the other areas of our lives. You can still crush your career without sex or a partner. You can still go on adventures without women. You can still bond with male friends.

By constantly reminding yourself of this simple truth, you will slowly reframe how you view women in your mind. You will begin to stop seeing them as objects that you MUST deal with and conquer and start seeing them as awesome opportunities that can only add value to your life. The ironic thing is: your game and your relationships will actually improve as a result.

A key part of developing the confidence necessary to embody this belief is adopting the correct habits. I just released a new step-by-step course that teaches you how to adopt the right habits. Click HERE to check it out.

Read More: How To Speak Deeply With Confidence And Authority

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

What Will The Next Great SJW Hysteria Be?

December 29, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With the rapid implosion of the UVA rape case, America's bout of rape hysteria appears to be grinding to a halt. Like lemmings strutting off a cliff, the SJW media and prominent feminists lined up behind Rolling Stone and Sabrina Rubin Erdely's tale of violent gang rape at a University of Virginia frat… only to be left with egg on their faces when it was revealed that the "victim," Jackie Coakley, was nothing more than a psycho stalker with an overactive imagination.

But just because one lie has been punctured doesn't mean that the SJW hate machine will be stopping any time soon. What crisis will the aggrieved dilettantes of xoJane and Jezebel be manufacturing next?

While it's difficult to predict these things in advance, if we look at all of the white girl problems of the past couple years, from "street harassment" to college rape claims, a few commonalities emerge. By analyzing the traits of previous SJW witch-hunts, we can get a clearer idea of which society-wide issue we'll be expected to care about next. (Credit to AnonymousBosch of the Roosh V Forum for giving me the idea for this article.)

My personal opinion is that we'll be seeing a lot of stories about women confronting their online "harassers." It's a narrative that fits in with existing SJW ideology, triggers the defective personalities of young women, and benefits the powers that be. Here's why.

1. The story must be something that the writer is personally involved in.

Because modern women are malignant narcissists, they can't imagine any reality outside of their own. As a result, virtually all SJW hysterias are driven by first-person accounts of the supposed horrors that some women are facing. The more grotesque the experience, the better, and no story is too unbelievable for the average SJW. This is how we ended up with abortion clinic escorts decrying how pro-life protesters call them "Nazis" and women talking about how men jack off on their exposed legs in the subway. The women who write these stories are seeking narcissistic supply in the form of other women calling them "strong," "brave," or "independent."

Online harassment stories from SJW personalities like Anita Sarkeesian are a dime a dozen these days. Some of these stories are true, such as 4chan's infamous trolling of Jezebel with rape and gore porn, while others are clearly invented or faked by the SJWs in question. Either way, they serve the narrative, and the narrative is all that the left cares about.

2. The story must be unverifiable.

SJW witch-hunts need to be about something that few women will ever experience, ensuring that no one will call bullshit on obviously fake stories. The reason why so many people bought the UVA rape hoax, for example, was precisely because so few women are raped. The most effective hoaxes are those that prey on the ignorance and gullibility of the average moron, which is how phony memoirists such as James Frey and "Misha Defonseca" were able to foist blatant lies on the reading public.

Online harassment more than fits the bill here. All a woman has to do to get attention these days is claim she's receiving "rape threats" or "death threats." In many cases, she doesn't even have to provide evidence that she's receiving threats, and many SJWs have tried to pass off fake threats as real to get sympathy. Given that Sabrina Rubin Erdely and Rolling Stone didn't bother to thoroughly investigate Jackie Coakley's story of being gang-raped for hours on broken glass, what makes you think the media will bother to verify SJW claims of "harassment?"

3. The story must benefit some very powerful people.

This is the clincher. Every single SJW narrative pushed by the mainstream media is one that benefits corporations, the government, or another powerful group. Money is the secret force behind every SJW campaign, whether it's Suey Park accusing Stephen Colbert of "racism" to gin up interest in her speaking engagements or Gawker Media hurting their rival Business Insider by drawing attention to Pax Dickinson's "offensive" Tweets. For example, few if any people have been drawing attention to Sabrina Rubin Erdely's connections to Emily Renda, who serves both as UVA's Vice President of Student Affairs as well as on the Virginia Governor's Task Force on Combating Campus Sexual Violence.

The most common remedy for ending online harassment, suggested by everyone from Facebook's Randi Zuckerberg to anti-GamerGate SJW developer Ernest W. Adams to the British government, is ending online anonymity. While many writers have focused on the chilling effect this would have on free speech, the real motivator for banning online anonymity is money. Facebook, Google, Twitter and other social media companies make money by selling their users' data to advertisers, and the more data they have, the more money they can make.

That's the joke here: social justice warriors imagine themselves to be valiant crusaders against an oppressive society when they are nothing more than tools of corporate and government power. Every witch-hunt they instigate, every "shitlord" they harass, every cause they champion was bought, sold, and paid for by the ultra-rich. If you want to predict what they'll be bleating about in 2015, just look at who happens to be pulling their strings.

Read More: The Bill Cosby Rape Scandal Is Just Another Example of Modern Hysteria

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Turning The Tables On An Unexpected Robbery In Brazil

December 29, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The vendador reached into the refrigerator and pulled out two green coconuts. Rotating one in his hand, he made three well-practiced chops with a cleaver at the crown of the fruit, creating an overlapping lattice of cuts, and opening a hole to reveal the liquid inside. I paid him, we took our straws, and then sat down at a table on the beach at Ipanema.

I was with my friend Basil, a Syrian refugee living in Brazil who had, with admirable persistence, found a niche for himself and his brother Ra'id in Rio de Janeiro. He was pursuing his studies at a local university, and his brother was about to do the same; both of them were twenty-one. I made a point of visiting him and his brother whenever I was there. Their stories, even when dealing with the mundane, never disappointed.

Basil set his coconut on the plastic table, and I watched the beads of condensation roll down its sloping sides. He leaned forward, his index finger extended, as if he was expounding some important point.

"I have a good story for you that happened to me about three months ago," he began.

"I'd like to hear it," I replied.

"I waiting at that bus stop over there"—and here he extended his elbow and made a series of concentric circles with his index finger—"and I was robbed."

"Really! What happened?"

"You know that it's often unsafe here to look at smart phones in public, since random thieves snatch them from people and run off with them. This is true. I'm usually good about not doing this, but of course the one time I was careless was the one time I got robbed. I was looking at the screen when a group of four kids—they were teenagers of varying ages—came by me. One of them suddenly reached out and grabbed my phone."

"I don't know how it happened, but I luckily I was alert enough to reach out and grab the arm of one of the group. He couldn't get away, as I had firm grip on him. But two other guys in his group came right after me. I got punched in the face a few times and nearly knocked over. What really bothered me was that nobody else there did anything to help me."

"They all just stood there watching, as if it was just something that you had to accept. And I couldn't accept it. The phone was a gift from my brother, who got it in Dubai. It was an expensive model that you can't get here in Rio, and cost him about five hundred dollars. If someone had pointed a gun at me, then that would have been different. Even a knife. But I wasn't going to accept losing this phone to guys with no weapons. Not without some fight."

"After I was hit a few times, my brother Ra'id jumped in to help. He went after the other two guys in an aggressive way, and they broke off contact and ran off. We still had the younger guy, who was trying to hit us and trying to get away. So we hit him back, hard. We beat him hard. Some bystanders came over and told us to let him go. And this made us even more angry. We were just furious. I was bleeding in several places on my face and was getting dizzy."

"My brother said to the Brazilians, 'The government here fucks you in the ass (tomar no cu) and you don't do anything. Nothing. So fuck you.' We were enraged and wanted to tell them what we really thought. You know what my culture is like, Quintus. In Syria, if you commit violence against someone, there are going to be serious consequences. If I had had a car, I would have seriously thought about throwing this guy in the trunk of the car and making him tell me where his friends were."

“Oh, I believe you,” I said. And I did.

“Anyway, eventually the police showed up. In this country, since we’re refugees, there are special police that have to deal with us. We had all our papers in order. They could see we were bloodied. So we just told them what happened.”

“About a month later there was a court date about this,” continued Basil, directing a concentrated gaze on the table in front of him.

“I don’t think they expected me to show up. They thought I was just some refugee who wouldn’t fight for his rights. But I did show up, and I told the judge what happened. The kid was a minor, but he wouldn’t say anything. He told the judge that he didn’t know the other muggers, and that he had just met them that day. Obvious lies.”

“But the judge believed me. The judge gave him ninety days to serve in a juvenile detention center. But I never did get my phone back. But life is like that sometimes. But we turned the tables on them. We made them think twice about doing something like that again. Sometimes in life, even when you are going to lose, you have to do something. Anything.”

“I even saw his mother there. That was a joke. She tried to be nice to me, but I was in no mood. I didn’t want consolation. I wanted my phone. Wait a minute.”

And here Basil returned to the coconut vendor, and asked him to split it open, so that he could scrape out the moist flesh on the inside. I did the same. The vendador fashioned a small scraper from a piece of shell for us.

“You know,” I told Basil, “in the United States, they probably would have made the kid out to be the victim. They would have accused you of being ‘racist’ and would have found all kinds of rationalizations to excuse the kid’s thievery.”

At this Basil gave me a blank look. Like many people who have never lived in the United States, it was difficult for him to comprehend the streak of mendacity and hypocrisy that underlies much of American culture. And I didn’t feel like explaining it anyway.

We walked along the beach for a little while longer. I thought more about the conversation, as I scanned the masses of bodies surrounding me and the rude habitations crawling up the slopes of the surrounding hills.

It is difficult to sustain civilized mores over great periods of time and amid the swelling turbulence of populations. The restive masses encroach steadily on the refinements of order and culture, which fight a running battle with the fecundity of the simple.

Read More: The Apology That Will Never Be Delivered

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

An Open Letter Of Apology To American Women

December 30, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Dear American Women,

I am sorry you were born as females in the west. Because of the toxic culture you've been marinated in you will never fully appreciate just how fortunate you are to have been afforded the privileged lives you enjoy. None of this is your fault, of course. Whether you like it or not, third-wave feminism is to blame and it has quite literally stolen any chance you have for true happiness as a woman.

From an early age you will be told that you are princesses and deserve the best of everything simply because you were born with vaginas. There is some truth to this, but not for the reason you've been raised to believe.

You see, you could be princesses and eventually even someone's queen worthy of the utmost respect. The truth is, you are more valuable than men from a reproductive standpoint. But before you pump your fists, those titles and the respect that comes with them are ones you must earn. This takes time, temperance, and discipline.

Unfortunately because this is bestowed upon you far before you have earned it, it is merely a moniker and nothing more. You were all rewarded with something you didn't work for, could not understand, and were grossly ill-equipped to mentally process. This explains why you have a strong sense of entitlement.

The only time you will be treated the same as males is when you are infants. You will be coddled and nurtured as you should be. You will be the center of attention wherever you're taken because of your innocence and representation of new life.

You will start to notice a change in the way you're treated compared to boys when you become a toddler. While the boys are taught to share, you will be taught that all you need to do is ask for something and it will be given to you because you are a girl and that means you deserve what you want.

If you do not get what you want, you are indirectly taught to up the intensity of your request by crying or throwing a tantrum until you get it. This is a trait that will stick with you for decades to come and will turn you into overgrown children, which is far from attractive or cute.

You will also begin to notice that boys are punished more than you are. While your teachers and parents sugarcoat or explain away your bratty temperaments (a direct result of the entitlement serum), the boys are often sent to the corner and told that there is no excuse for their reckless behavior. At some point they are given "special medicine" to tamp down their natural energy. This tells you they are inherently flawed, which will inflate your false sense of superiority over males.

I'm sorry that the depreciation of your value as a female begins in earnest at such a young age when you reach high school (and for some of you, middle school). Your insufferable behavior continues to be rewarded and your need for attention has become a full-blown addiction. Like a heroin addict you'll do anything to get your attention fix to validate yourself, not the least of which is giving away your most valuable asset: your virginity.

For the moment you relinquish your flower to a male other than your husband, your expiration date quickly moves ever closer to your windshield and will soon be in your rear view mirror, where objects are not closer than they appear.

I'm sorry for having to break the news to you that college is the worst thing that can happen to you as a woman. The endless drinking, partying, sex romps with hordes of males, spring breaks, and the continued deprogramming of your biological hard drive, while fun and exciting, accelerates your depreciation in value.

You will think you are on your way to becoming a strong and independent woman who "has it all," but this is not what is happening to you. Everything around you tells you that college is the path to true happiness,m but you will later come to realize that campus life has damaged you far beyond repair and unfortunately you will have this epiphany much too late.

So now you're in your early 20s. You've got your degree in women's studies, the world is your oyster and your best days are ahead of you. You're not even thinking about marriage at this point in your life, and why should you? You've got plenty of time to keep the party going so there's no rush to lock down a man and have a family. Men will always be around so you'll walk down the aisle with your soulmate when you're damn good and ready.

In the meantime you will continue to drink and sleep around to "get it out of your system" before you settle down. After all, the strong and powerful women in sitcoms, movies, and reality shows put off marriage and children to have fun and they have it all now so you will too right? I'm sorry to tell you that the answer is an emphatic no.

Time passes quickly and before you know it you're pushing 30. You've had a few relationships, some heartbreak, plenty of drama (because it was totally his fault you cheated on him), and maybe an abortion or two. Your breasts are beginning to sag, you've put on a few extra pounds, and your skin doesn't glow like it did in your teens.

Oh sure, you're still getting attention from men—but you're not quite as attractive as you used to be. Your friends will tell you you're as hot as ever and that you're aging like a fine wine, but the lack of attention from the men that made your vagina buzz like a beehive in your college days is a grim reminder that you're being lied to.

But you are far from a bottle of Dom Perignon. You're more like a gallon of milk. You still look drinkable within your container (push up bras, butt-padded jeans, makeup, etc.) but your smell and texture betray you when you're opened, and for that I'm sorry. I'm sorry that you aren't as physically viable as a long-term partner. The good news, however, is that you'll still be considered for one night stands.

Roosh has stated that the wall is softer than we think. He says that no matter how many cocks your semen-stained vaginas have been penetrated by, there will always be a man available to rescue you from your bad decisions and save you from spinsterdom. I'm sorry to tell you he is only half right.

Yes, there will be plenty of thirsty men who will put a ring on it, put a couple of kids in you, and give you the white picket suburban life you think you are entitled to. But the men willing to forgive your past transgressions are far from ones you dreamed of ending up with in your Disney and Rom Com fantasies.

What you didn't realize while you were getting plowed through your teens and twenties is that more men you share your body with, the less able you are to sexually bond to your husband or any other male for that matter. This leads to dissatisfaction with the life you didn't deserve in the first place and inevitably leads to divorce.

Okay so it's not all bad. You'll laugh it up with your friends about how you nabbed the kids and half his money. You'll parade your tattooed flavor of the week and brag about the headboard-rattling sex you have while the kids are at their pathetic father's for the weekend. But after discovering that being a single mother is neither as glamorous or as marketable as you thought, you'll become bitter and blame everyone but yourselves.

Then one day you'll wake up at 38 and wonder where all the time has gone and why you don't have what you deserve.

At this point, your lives are effectively over and for that I am truly sorry. You can tell yourselves you don't need a man or that there are other things that can give you fulfillment, but your biological makeup tells you otherwise. You know full-well the only thing that will make you truly happy is to belong to a man who loves and takes care of you. You'll hold out hope that the man of your dreams is still out there and he may well be. Unfortunately he views you as nothing more than a slump-buster to fill his time between younger, more nubile versions of you.

You got a raw deal ladies and I feel bad for you because you're destined to be miserable. You were sold a bad bill of goods by men and women and it has cost you true happiness. You were never told that a stay-at-home mom is every bit as valuable and important to a nuclear family as the breadwinner, or that your degree doesn't attract men to you in droves. You were told to seize the day, live for the moment, and YOLO. How were you supposed to know what the long-term consequences were?

Please accept my apology for the unfair lives you have all been born into. Each and every one of you deserves much better.

Sincerely,

SharpShooter

Read Next: Why Married Women Are Pretending To Be Single On Facebook

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Thoughts On The Nature Of Ingratitude

December 30, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"…Whát I dó is me: for that I came."

—Hopkins

Our needs, philosophers have long told us, are essentially negative in character, deriving from our natural state of lack. And, like a person who remains vaguely agitated, weary, and restless after getting over an illness, we generally do not incline to feel gratitude in any lasting or very meaningful sense. Because it is painful to be hungry, it feels good to eat; but it is not in our nature to feel so fortunate for having eaten, and accordingly, we are not generally grateful beings, though, of course, we all say otherwise, just as we all say we believe in equality, fairness, justice, and so on, even as our behavior shows otherwise.

Since from the beginning to the end the met need has been a burden—fundamentally negative—it would be strange if gratitude, like the rest of morality, was not generally a sham, as though a person should say thank you for having to climb a mountain for no evident reason, and over and over again at that.

Thus it is that ingratitude almost never should be surprising. Like hypocrisy, it is a pernicious yet natural result of human self-interest. Notice that certain holidays—Veteran's Day, Memorial Day, Thanksgiving—commonly have something hollow and empty about them, as the words please and thank you often do.

Indeed, what are these holidays, for most people, besides a reason to indulge in pleasure, that justification, here in America, for existence itself? How grateful are most of us really? For how many of us is gratitude a significant ongoing moral practice, as opposed to the usual high-sounding but empty moral utterances of humankind?

Here is another representative example. Although no nation can afford to dispense with its military, it is obvious that people in general are not grateful for those who serve in the armed forces, and other public servants are similarly taken for granted. We frequently hear criticism of our government. How frequently do we hear sincere gratitude for the protection it provides? I use the modifier sincere because, again, like politeness, gratitude is commonly hollow.

But to answer the question: we very rarely hear sincere gratitude for the protection of our government. And though this is most unfortunate and indeed disgusting—there are many men and women in the armed forces who risk their lives and die in order to protect us—like most bad things, it is simply how the matter must be, arising as it does from our need-laden condition itself.

The problem here isn't so much a failure to appreciate what is done for us, as that the condition is essentially tedious, unsatisfying, wearisome. Thus true gratitude is like a deep sense of honor, one of those rare and noble things that only a few exhibit with any deep sincerity. Rather than feel genuine gratitude, people more commonly turn their attention to the next desire, or rather, burden, and that is only natural enough to do.

For where there is true gratitude, it is generally bound up with a vital personal relationship, so that it derives some of its force from affection—say, that for a parent—and it is for this reason that gratitude is often a source of loyalty.

Indeed, where there is a grateful person, there is often a loyal one. But, there are many instances in which although it would seem that gratitude is in order, still there is no loyalty. For many instances in which it would seem that gratitude is in order are not of this vital personal form. They are like an itch that has been scratched. They inspire no affection, and nothing properly positive.

Now this is just one of many instances in which our psychology undermines our morality, showing the latter to be pretense, which, however, is yet useful. Humankind, that vast collection of burdened frauds, must put up with one another however it can.

Since, then, sincere gratitude is difficult and indeed contrary to our nature, we should try hard to practice this virtue, to make it a vital part of our conduct. Doing so will certainly make us happier, and our relations with one another more agreeable. Of course, if you are an American you may find this quite challenging to do. You may, then, want to enlist the aid of prayer, or failing that, the counsel of Dr. Phil, Oprah, or some other national sage.

Read More: The Nature Of Hypocrisy

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

Some Random Thoughts On How To Be A Well-Tuned Man

December 30, 2014 | by Bronko Nagurski | Link | Original Link

---

I had a bunch of ideas for articles on a variety of topics, but after running through them I realized that not much more than a paragraph or two would be needed on each subject, with some subjects already having articles covering them to greater depths. So instead of writing a few different articles on these individual topics, I'm going to list some core principles on how to be a better man with the hope of these ideas and others sparking some good conversation in the comments section, as the ROK comments tend to contain as much wisdom as the articles themselves.

On fighting

Learn some form of self-defense (aka how to fight), and then remember that the most skilled fighters are those who know how to avoid a fight. In the real world, physical confrontations usually end badly for everyone involved. If someone gets the crap kicked out of them, they may be dealing with chronic issues long after recovery.

If someone does the beating, they're usually facing a lawsuit, jail time, or future physical retribution, depending on the victim. There are very few moments, if any, in a man's life where fighting is actually warranted. The costs far outweigh the gains from being involved in one, let alone winning.

On conduct

What do Atticus Finch, Vito Corleone, and Mufasa have in common? They remain composed at all times. Maintaining composure is an element of wisdom. Knowing when to talk and when to keep quiet is an invaluable trait. When getting into a dispute, the serene man trumps the flustered screamer every time.

Even if you're unsure of something, composure makes you at least appear like you know what you are talking about (assuming you are well spoken), and it's an unmistakable sign of a leader. Composure allows you to control virtually any situation, and when you factor in standing up for your own convictions, it is one of the most important traits in "wearing the pants" in a relationship.

Look at how the guy in blue shirt conducts himself in this scene

On physical well-being

Your body is a machine and it must be properly maintained. Everyone needs some form of a fitness routine, and regardless of what your fitness goals are, they should include a combination of strength conditioning, cardio, and flexibility. Unless you're trying to be sculpted like someone on the cover of a fitness magazine, it doesn't need to be overly complicated.

I've found that for the average man, routine bodyweight exercises (such as push-ups, pull-ups, dips, lunges, squats, etc) are more than enough to develop muscle, remain toned, and maintain fitness well into your later years. They're easy to do, require little if any equipment, are low-risk when it comes to injury, and work very well (see male gymnast bodies if you disagree).

And in regards to making sure your body works, your diet is even more critical. In today's America, it takes work and a conscious effort to even eat decently, let alone healthy. Just remember, if what you're eating doesn't contain a combination of protein and vitamins (through fruits and vegetables) it's not a meal, it's a snack. Everyone has different dietary needs depending on their body type, lifestyle, health conditions, etc., but there are some basic guidelines to follow for eating better without necessarily turning into a health freak.

My diet routine includes whole grains, protein, lean meats, fruits, and vegetables every day. I probably eat fried food once every six months, no soda, and I limit myself to red meat once a week. I also try to limit myself to 40 grams of added sugar everyday (which is pretty tough in today's America). Another thing to keep in mind is portion control. Nobody in their right mind needs to be eating a footlong sandwich. In regards to alcohol, limit yourself to only 2-3 drinks when you go out. There are much stricter diets out there, but I've found that mine works just fine for the average person.

On mental well-being

Get your sleep. Forget the motivational stories about people who went hard at something for 3straight days with no sleep. Not sleeping didn't make them champions. I can guarantee their performance was next to shit compared to the well-rested mind. If you don't sleep, you can't think, and if you can't think, you can't do. Sleep deprivation puts your brain into a state of "I don't care." The best way to remain on top of your lifestyle is to be as cognizant as possible of what you're doing. Not getting enough sleep also turns your body (particularly your skin) to crap, screws up your diet, and makes you age much faster.

Always be reading. If I go a day without reading something, I consider it a wasted day. Find good books that will challenge your mind. They say the riskiest thing a person can do is open a book, because you'll never know how it will change you. Find authors who have spent their entire lives trying to understand the human condition.

Personally, I love Dostoevsky, but there are so many, too many to even begin mentioning. Philosophy, science, government, economics, adventure, even The Bible, read it all. Even if you disagree with something, it will challenge you to confront your own thoughts. An education has never been more available to society, and you don't need college for it either.

Cut out the TV. I'm not saying go cold-turkey and throw your TV away, but do recognize that most of what's on it is crap. Remember, television networks exist for one purpose and one purpose only – to make money, and they do it through entertainment. All of your favorite shows, the producers of that network could give a rat's ass if the show is good or not, or if you like it or not, just as long as you're watching it. Same goes with watching professional sports. I'm not opposed to catching the occasional game or having a favorite team, and I have no problems with appreciating talent, but is there anything more pathetic than spending your entire weekend watching other people do stuff, especially since it is the same thing year in and year out? Limiting television exposure has been shown to increase attention span as well.

Quit watching porn. This has been discussed to death but always needs to be re-iterated. It kills your mind and your masculinity. The reason porn is so addictive is that it is taking something your body already recognizes as pleasure (seeing naked women) and overdosing your brain with it. The natural component is a key difference between porn addiction and other problematic addictions, such as drugs.

Quit watching porn. This has been discussed to death but always needs to be re-iterated. It kills your mind and your masculinity. The reason porn is so addictive is that it is taking something your body already recognizes as pleasure (seeing naked women) and overdosing your brain with it. The natural component is a key difference between porn addiction and other problematic addictions, such as drugs.

Lastly, embrace the universe. Whether it is through religion, meditation, science, or any combination of them, we live in a fascinating world that becomes even more intriguing once you become in-tune with it. How you go about doing so depends on the individual.

On money and finance

Everybody should learn economics, and unfortunately very few actually do. You don't need to "major" in it to understand it. There are plenty of books covering a variety of economic concepts for you to choose from. Even gaining a basic understanding will put you at a huge advantage in today's society. I'm not going to dive into specific concepts, but I will say that you should study Austrian School Economics to understand how the world should work, and study Keynesian Economics for how the world does work.

It is vital to understand what money is. I highly recommend Murray Rothbard's What Has Government Done to Our Money? for gaining a basic understanding of the history of money, fractional reserve banking, and our financial system of today. It's fairly short and easy to read, and is available for free online.

There is no doubt that the world's economy is going to shit. Be aware of what is going on, along with other political issues, but don't let it consume you. So much in this world is out of your control that being pissed off at the news on a daily basis isn't worth it.

On personal debt, I don't think anything more needs to be said other than live within your means. It's amazing how much better off this country would be if even half of us followed this concept. Avoid debt like the plague. Debt kills freedom, and once a man starts to lose his freedom, he tends to either panic or give up.

On choosing a career path

For you young men out there who are trying to decide what you want to do with your life, don't try to answer the question "What do I want to be when I grow up?" This is an idiotic mentality that has been shoved down your throats since kindergarten. Instead, you should be asking yourself "What do I want to be good at, and are these skills in demand?"

When you start looking at it from the perspective of "gaining skills" rather than "an education," you'll develop a much clearer picture of what you should be doing with your life. "Getting an education" is not synonymous with going to school. Becoming educated comes from all facets of your life (reading, traveling, personal experiences, human interactions, etc.). If you're not learning through your experiences, or even worse not having experiences, you are truly wasting your life.

On women and family

I'm not going to sit here and write about the pros and cons of dating in 21st century America, as they have been discussed at great lengths here. Everyone has their own choice to make as to what kind of woman they wish to pursue, if one at all. This section isn't about that, but rather how to go about handling a woman that you consider high-value and are contemplating building a life with.

First of all, hold up your end of the bargain. No one is entitled to an attractive woman. If you're a slob, that's what you're going to get. Don't get on women for consuming junk media if you know the stats and backgrounds of every professional athlete and have been following these guys since they were in high school.

Some of you may worry that once you get married and have kids your wife will change, and even if you hold up your end, you're going to be left with a completely different person than the one you married. This is why if you are thinking marriage, you need to set the tone for what the relationship will be well before you tie the knot.

If you're against something, don't be afraid to be vocal and honest about it during the "honeymoon" phase of your relationship. Many men are pushovers in their relationships because they're afraid of saying something wrong that in their minds would either make a girl second-guess being with them or make them come across as "controlling." There's a word for someone who walks on eggshells around the woman they are dating, and it isn't a man.

If you want her to remain fit well into your relationship and post-babies, you need to establish early on that you value fitness in yourself. Don't expect her to keep her figure while your gut is hanging down to your knees. Look at older relationships and you'll tend to notice that couples eventually merge into similar looking people, almost so that they could pass for siblings much of the time.

The fittest men I know have the fittest wives I know. Humans are social creatures by nature and pick up on each other's habits. If she doesn't exercise or value her body, you should have recognized this well before you made any sort of commitment.

Don't get married young. It's a mistake on every level. Wait until you're at least in your early 30s. Your earning potential is higher, and assuming you are exercising regularly, you will have more options. Don't cash your chips out early. Properly selecting a partner requires experience (dating around). Way too many men get burned by the first girl they fall in love with and hold resentment towards all women.

Though I don't advocate looking for it, getting screwed over, dating girls with mental issues, dealing with emotional issues, etc., are all key trials in learning to recognize bullshit and ward off any destructive prospects. Life is a series of trial and error. You're only going to figure out what you like and value by weeding through everything you don't.

Integrity is a critical component in life, and especially has a place within the context of a relationship. If you are going to take a vow, honor it. Honor your own relationship, and honor the other man's. Don't be that guy who thinks he's not at fault knowingly participating in a woman's affair. It is your duty as a man to set an example for how to act, especially if you have children. Some things in your relationship will be out of control, but maintaining your frame isn't one of them.

Lastly, remember the words of Vito Corleone – "A man who doesn't spend time with his family can never be a real man." Men are so cynical about marriage and family because at our core it is what we value more than anything, and it pains us to see what a farce it has become in this country. But at the end of the day family does remain one of the most important things in a person's life, and successfully taking on a family of your own is one of the ultimate measuring sticks of man's value.

How you treat those closest to you is much more telling of one's character than any other measure of success they may achieve in life. I would never do business with a man who cheated on his wife, regardless of how successful and reputable he may. He just can't be trusted.

On bad habits

Remember that whenever you're trying to break a routine and improve yourself, the more you try to deny your old habits, the harder it will be for you to prevent them from re-surfacing, and when they do, people tend to crash hard. This is why that when you are trying to break out of a bad habit, you need to do more than just stop. You need to re-route your life to prevent you from being in a situation that will trigger the bad habit from re-surfacing. The first thing drug addicts are encouraged to do after cleaning up is to avoid any people they used to do drugs with.

Closing thoughts on life

You are your surroundings. Your diet goes well beyond the food you eat. Surround yourself with quality. If what you eat is crap, your body becomes crap. If you read crap magazines and books, listen to crap music and watch crap TV, your mind becomes crap. If you surround yourself with crap people, you become a crappy person. Cut the dead weight out of your life and you'll be amazed how much you can do and how much better you will feel.

And lastly, enjoy your life, because you only get one and then you're going to die (don't confuse that statement with “YOLO”). Find things and people that make you happy and surround yourself with them. Put a figurative gun to your head and ask yourself if you were to die right now, what will you have regretted missing out on? When you can answer that question, you can give your life direction and use it as a foundation to build yourself into the man you want to be.

Read More: 4 Thoughts I Didn’t Have While Traveling

Even A Lame Approach Is Better Than No Approach At All

December 31, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Last week there was some interesting discussion in the comments on my article, which was about the need for men to seize the moment and not to pass up opportunities to meet women they are attracted to as they go about their daily lives.

I hadn't intended the article to be a paean to daygame, but I guess that's how it turned out, as my basic point was that there are women all around us every day, and the smart man doesn't wait for permission or for the "right moment" to make an approach.

One comment in particular caught my eye – the following, from Captain Nemo. I hope he won't mind me quoting it in full, as I think it contains an important concept that is worth discussing further.

> Good article. Some people chicken out because they start thinking: " what the fuck should I say…" and then they end up screwing up the chance not saying anything because everything they came up with sounded too fucking dumb. I on the other hand sometimes bypass such things by deciding to say the most retarded shit I can come up with instead.
>
> Does it backfire a lot? Hell yes it does, but when it works, it works. In fact, acting like a retard actually landed both me and my friend some LTR material. So to those who are still trying to get their shit together and have trouble coming up with what to say to that lovely chick that can't take her eyes of of you, remember the following: "Even a retarded approach can get you more than not > approaching at all”

That last sentence is golden. Internalize it, and it will free you up to go out there and make the mistakes that are necessary in the journey towards becoming great at meeting girls.

As men, we naturally tend to be both logical and competitive. These are great attributes in themselves, but when applied to a discipline like pick-up, they can sometimes be detrimental. If, like many of us, you have spent a good while reading pick-up books and forums as well as watching videos, then you will have a pretty accurate idea of what a good pull should look like. At the same time, your competitive streak probably means that you would prefer to do it better than the guy on YouTube or not at all.

Here’s the lesson: to get really good at meeting girls, you need to kill your ego. Stop trying to live up to some self-imposed standard of pick-up mastery. Stop trying to be the next Mystery, Krauser, Janka, or Roosh.

Why? Well, first because you need to be prepared to take risks – speaking to strangers on packed trains, in coffee shops and in the street and so on – and you won’t be able to do that if you’re scared not to make a mistake. And second, if you think your pick-up heroes never fluffed an opener or ran out of things to say mid-set, then you’re deluded.

But there’s something even more important than that.

We all know that to some extent pick-up is a numbers game. That’s not to say that you can’t improve your odds, and do better or worse in a given situation by studying technique. But it has been said that you will likely encounter three types of girls when you go out – “yes” girls, “no” girls and “maybe” girls. The best pick-up artists are those who can convert the “maybe” girls – after all, they’d get the “yes” girls anyway, and the “no” girls are never going to happen. The point is that only a third of sets you encounter will be susceptible to influence.

As for the rest – the majority – your goal on the initial approach should simply be to introduce yourself and get her contact details so that you can continue gaming her later. OK, same day lays do happen as a result of daygame, but in the main it’s at least a two-stage process.

Strategy

As such, your strategy should be to initiate contact with as many cute girls as possible, screening out those who are definite “no”s and adding the others to your database to contact again later. When you take this industrial approach, the manner in which you open and precisely what you say in each case isn’t necessarily that important.

Sure, in an ideal world you should aim to present yourself as smooth, charismatic and sexually dominant, through verbal and physical indicators such as wit and strong eye contact. If you can say something penetrating and amusing that communicates these characteristics and gets the girl giggling, then that’s great. But what about if you are tired, or in a bad mood, or if your mind goes blank when you see her? Or if you only have three minutes before catching a train? Should you avoid approaching because the approach may be a little under par? Not a bit of it. Approach anyway.

I can't tell you the number of times I've broken the rules and it's worked. I've walked up to girls, told them they're hot, and straight up asked for their numbers. No funny stories, no DHVs, no amused mastery, no game – just a straight-up telegraphing of male-female desire. And it's worked. I've contacted these girls later, gamed them a little over text message, taken them out and then slept with them.

On one occasion I was in a restaurant, saw a cute girl and got the waiter to pass her a note with my number on it. In theory, a beta move – after all, I didn't even have the nerve to go up and talk to her (actually I was with my boss and I didn't want to look sleazy). But she contacted me, we messaged for a while and things developed from there.

My point is that your primary purpose should be to initiate interactions and collect contact information. You should not concern yourself with being a pick-up hero, or doing anything dramatic. Sometimes normal works. Sometimes "game" that is too polished comes over as fake. If you can't think of anything else to say, just walk up, tell her she's pretty and ask for her number. It's worked for guys forever. Some days you'll be on fire, other days you'll suck. But if you do it often enough then you will run into girls who are into you and you will end up having sex with them.

GK Chesterton once wrote "If a thing is worth doing, it is worth doing badly." Bear that in mind, and free yourself from the need to achieve perfection as you go out tonight to celebrate New Year's Eve, and hopefully to meet new women. Remember: the only thing you absolutely have to do is approach.

Happy new year to all ROK readers, and happy hunting!

Want to start 2015 meeting and attracting beautiful women? Then click here

Read More: 6 Ways You Can Motivate Yourself To Go Out And Meet Girls

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why Has #GamerGate Remained Alive While Occupy Wall Street Failed?

January 1, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Do you remember Occupy Wall Street? OWS started out as a starry-eyed movement that was supposed to bring down the corrupt capitalist oligarchy, ending financial inequality once and for all. It culminated with police driving the remainder of the ragtag hippies out of the Zuccotti Park a month later. How did OWS fail so spectacularly yet GamerGate is still going strong? Let's take a look at what the two have in common and why grassroots movements tend to fall apart.

OWS recruited people from all walks of life, which gave it immense momentum at first but became a problem later on, when everyone was supposed to start contributing to the discussion. The sad truth is that most people really have nothing to say but will speak nonetheless, if given the chance. When you force the smart people to shut up so that stupid people can talk, you have a recipe for disaster. When you add just a pinch of social justice, you get the wondrous "progressive stack" that makes everyone with an ounce of common sense leave.

The diversity of participants also made it impossible to settle on a single goal. The list of what OWS was supposed to achieve went from erasing student loans to less corporate lobbying to "better jobs." Anyone could come along and declare the local OWS chapter to be against whatever perceived injustice and thus undermine the credibility of the entire movement. Each of these stated problems would probably take several decades to resolve; when put together, they doom any group trying to solve them all in one fell swoop to failure. Once the mainstream media stopped taking OWS seriously, the game was over.

It didn't help that the government surveilled OWS from the start and infiltrated it thoroughly. The undercover agents gathered information on participants and most likely derailed OWS by inciting violence, drug use, and other illegal acts, which would then give an excuse to the uniformed policemen to come in and do whatever they please. The end result was total demoralization of everyone involved in OWS and a warning what happens to those who would like to organize against the government.

What about GamerGate?

GamerGate shares a surprising amount of similarities with OWS. The diversity in GG is astounding and all the minority checkboxes are filled: gay, lesbian, trans, black, Asian, hispanic, all of them and much more are gamers and care about their pastime.

But, there is no “progressive stack” nonsense. You don’t get any preference because you belong to some arbitrary oppressed minority. You have to prove your worth and earn your honor in some way. Gaming is actually manly in that it is the purest form of meritocracy possible. In gaming, women have none of the feminine privilege they do in real life.

Unless you’re a girl that likes to chew cords

The perfect weapon

Gamers are used to adapting to circumstances, to playing the same thing over and over until they beat it and have infinite persistence. Being called a shitlord doesn’t discourage a gamer, it actually motivates him. When you make gamers a part of the movement that wants to eradicate corruption in gaming journalism, guess what? They compete with each other on who will contribute the most, instead of demanding to be put in the progressive stack. Gamers make donations that cause SJWs to whine about “weaponized charity” and become triggered by politeness. All of that with a great sense of humor and constant self-deprecation.

The major difference between GamerGate and OWS that made the former last and the latter crumble is in the field where the battle took place. The government has all the material resources at its disposal and can outlast any protest or boycott. There is simply nothing OWS or a movement 20 times the size of it could ever hope to change. Government is the immovable object and the amount of force OWS exerted doesn't matter.

But, when a relatively small group of gaming enthusiasts goes online and starts sending emails, sharing information, and asking questions, what is the government supposed to do? How do you stop an online revolution done by these virtual ninjas?

Character assassination doesn't work, because we are all anonymous online and you can easily just pick up another nickname and keep going. GamerGate cannot be derailed because there is no leader to be subverted or a central figure that gives out orders. Infiltration is pointless because the agents can't draw attention to themselves without earning merit and actually helping GamerGate.

When a scandal with false information did happen to GamerGate, they quickly added new rules for verification of all info. SJWs can try to shout down gamers on their own, but that is akin to punching the wind, so the big daddy government is bound to join the fight sooner or later.

Don't censorship me, bro

Simply put, to stop online revolutions a government must go scorched earth and introduce radical censorship methods. These will have to be so severe, that a lot of normal internet and computer functions will become unusable. However, these draconian methods would probably alert even more people to what's going on and where the real oppression is coming from, making them engage in online activism, thus spreading the word. GamerGate is like the Borg and there is simply no way to stop it.

What GamerGate has shown is that a grassroots consumer movement can actually make a difference, but not by fighting a physical fight. We're now in an electronic age and the power is with those who have the information. Where Occupy Wall Street failed, GamerGate has succeeded, because it was exclusively online, where we're all equal and physical force means nothing. This is how you effect change, not with guns, but with your mouse in one hand and keyboard in another.

Did you like this post? Read more #gamergate news on Reaxxion, ROK's little brother. Click here to visit.

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Reflections On Neo-Confederacy During A Visit To Ole Miss

January 1, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

My great uncle and aunt have a house in Oxford, Mississippi, and this fall they invited me to come for an Ole Miss game, since they were playing my team. I had a friend that went to a graduate school program in the state of Mississippi, and he told me that all the alumni were so mopey that they did not get into Ole Miss and would wear their Ole Miss polos to class half the days.

College truly was the best years of their lives, in the sense that they will spend the rest of their lives pining for the days when they were fat, drunk, and stupid. If you are not an alumnus, you are not planning on being an alumnus, or your husband is not an alumnus, then you have no business being an Ole Miss fan, because you will never truly be accepted by them.

College Life

The University of Mississippi, also known as Ole Miss, has an interesting culture about it. In Mississippi, there are two main football teams: Ole Miss and Mississippi State University. Ole Miss has always been the more aristocratic and liberal arts focused, although they do not have many grad programs, whereas Mississippi State focuses on agricultural programs and does a lot of community education for the farmers of the state. Really, Ole Miss is not even a very good school academically, but its people have a strong sense of culture with it, and even many poor white trash love it.

The town of Oxford is absolutely beautiful. They have an old square that the city has made sure to keep the chain stores out of. There are some extremely expensive clothing stores. The whole school and city reminded me of the video game Bully or the TV show Blue Mountain State. There are the rich kids that attend out of tradition even though they could get a better education elsewhere, there are the middle class kids who attend because it is a good opportunity compared with other options, and then there are the poor townies.

Before every game, there is a big tailgating party in The Grove. Friends told me that it is the greatest party on earth six days a year, and I was greatly looking forward to it. However, they made a great overstatement. The Grove was anything but fun. It was mostly middle-aged alumni watching ESPN and ugly college girls with slut face and iPhones. Barely anybody was grilling, which is the whole point of tailgating (hence the name).

Instead, they had pre-cooked food in their tents. Of course, southerners no longer know how to make southern food, so instead they had weird finger-food one will rarely find outside of a Wednesday night at a Baptist church. Predictably, there was plenty of shitty beer in The Grove. There were also a few bands that were badly miked and certainly didn't get the permission of everyone in earshot before they began squawking.

College football in the South is not complete without a tradition to annoy all the fans of other teams. Ole Miss fans complain about how obnoxious Mississippi State's cowbells are, but it cannot be anything as awful as the Hotty Toddy. It's a chant they say, and the lyrics mean absolutely nothing.

> Are You Ready?
>
> Hell Yeah! Damn Right!
>
> Hotty Toddy, Gosh Almighty,
>
> Who The Hell Are We?
>
> Hey! Flim Flam, Bim Bam
>
> Ole Miss By Damn!

"Flim Flam Bim Bam." Southern eloquence at its finest. No wonder the rest of the country thinks we are all inbred morons.

They write the two words "Hotty Toddy" on everything and say it as a passing greeting like "Merry Christmas." I asked my uncle what a hotty toddy is, and he said that it is a drink.

"What's in it?"

"Anything you want to be in it."

Which means that it is even more meaningless than it sounds.

That Ragged Old Flag

Blacks and leftists claim that the Rebel flag is a symbol of hatred, and today it is often not allowed to be worn in public schools. Neo-confederates claim that it is a symbol of history. The reality is that both are incorrect. Realistically, the way people use it is not for hatred or for history but for redneck pride, Ole Miss aristocracy aside.

The main reason I've never worn it is because I do not hunt deer or drink Bud Lite. My friends would laugh me down if they saw me wearing it. Brad Paisley was on to something when he sang that we could replace it with a camouflage flag.

Interestingly, most people who wear the flag with pride today would have been the least likely to have benefitted from the secession. The real secessionists were the aristocrats who had money on the line, and I often wonder if they would shake their heads at the neo-confederate culture today.

I could be wrong, but I get the impression that most of us neo-confederates are secretly glad we lost the war. Very few people today want segregation of any kind, and the neo-confederate will be quick to change the debate away from slavery or the Klu Klux Klan. Furthermore, with the way people migrate across state lines, most of us never would have been conceived. No neo-confederate has ever given me a reason for why they wish the south had won beyond the abstract concept of states' rights.

The Rebel flag, more than anything, is about national identity, and it is the only symbol the south really has. People compare it to the swastika, but the Nazi flag was only about a specific time period. Germans have plenty of national symbols to communicate their identity. The Rebel flag is the only symbol a southerner has, and it is so divorced from the actual war that it was not even the design used by the Confederacy for most of the war.

Some people claim that we should take pride in other great southerners like Martin Luther King, since the rest of the country is bent on making sure racism is the only defining cultural trait of the south. When singing the praises of Harriet Tubman or the book To Kill A Mockingbird, leftists ignore that the Rebel culture is about *white s*outherners. Every nationality has the right to take pride in their culture and history. No race should be forced to write off their entire national identity because of the dark spots in it.

The Superficiality Of Neo-Confederacy

However, I myself am bothered by the way white southerners view the flag. The Civil War was a mismanaged fluke from a century and a half ago. For some reason we define ourselves by our failure and see everything through that lens. Perhaps the pride comes from being the only region of the country to stand up to Washington oppression, but it is still uncomfortable to me how a mere five years are the only major source of pride.

There have been plenty of white southerners in history that we could hold up high to show our superiority to the rest of the country: Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Jack Daniels, Edgar Allen Poe, William Faulkner, Kris Kristofferson, to name just a few of the brightest stars. I suppose I am a neo-Confederate, but really, I don't give a damn about that piss stain of a war or General Sherman's unethical methods. I've moved on with my life and am more concerned about making a better future than figuring out how we could have had a better past.

And even if I did care about the Confederacy, neo-Confederates themselves do not really care about the real culture that sprung up around the real Confederacy. They love to sing "Dixie," but that song says absolutely nothing about blacks, slavery, or even secession.

The lyrics are a heap of nonsense that seems to tell the story of a womanizer. Compare that to, “I’m A Good Old Rebel.”

The lyrics to that are so emotional. The man is bleeding on the page about how much he hates the Union, even to the point of hating such antebellum staples like the Declaration of Independence. The chords and the melody are powerful but subtle, especially when played slowly. It really shows just how goofy and obnoxious “Dixie” is. Neo-Confederate culture is all dress-up and make-believe and has in much in common with the Confederacy as a Renaissance Fair has with the Middle Ages.

The Rebels Learn Submission

The name Ole Miss is what slaves would call the master’s wife. There is a lot of pressure on the school to change the name, but I heard they found a loophole that it was technically named after a train. I told that to my great uncle and aunt, and they did not believe me. They also denied that the school would ever change the name and called me ignorant, the classic baby boomer rhetoric. To truly earn their keep as far left-wing liberals, they also have a glaring double standard in addition to their willful naivety.

My uncle and aunt are among the few that actually support the mascot change. For years it was a rebel soldier, representing “a dark time in our history,” according to my aunt. Recently, the school replaced it with a black bear, which the high-class aristocrat students like to throw trash at. At The Grove, I did not see one single black bear on anything, nor were they selling any plush toys in the campus bookstore. It is a football team without a face, their name rendered meaningless.

The fight song used to be “Dixie,” but they did away with that too, since at the end the fans would cheer, “The south will rise again!” Granted, they have never given a reason for why they would want the south to rise again, but they long for it like a child for Christmas. The reality is that if the south did secede again, The Union would not fight them with force, considering how averse to war people are today.

Even in Lincoln’s time, many northerners had no desire to kill a stranger in his own backyard. The south—at least initially—did not want a war; it was Lincoln who would not let them have peace. Lincoln enslaved the white majority in order to free the black minority, and by “free,” I mean throw most of them into a worse standard of living than they had as slaves even to this day in every region of the United States. But, you know, at least Google thanks them for their military service, so that has to be worth something, right?

All of these changes at Ole Miss have come to about to the great humiliation of their alumni, and even fans of other teams who hate Ole Miss feel anger at the changes. Ole Miss has betrayed its own alumni and fans for the sake of a fleeting ideology. What good is a team if it does not care about its fans? The charm of athletics is the sense of community; it is the traditions that make it worthwhile.

People loved Ole Miss because of the sense of identity it gives them. Few schools in the country have such a sense of historicity and community. Given that the State of Mississippi is so third-world, such neo-Confederate traditions were a rare source of pride for many who have little else to give them hope or joy.

And in giving up that historicity, the University of Mississippi has become another generic McUniversity with little to distinguish it from any of the others. The reason I could never be an Ole Miss fan is the same reason I never watch the NFL. I could send my child to the University of Mississippi, but I could never root for a team that sells out all of its fans for political points. The Confederacy finally dies with a whimper.

Read More: How White Knighting Is Killing The NFL

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Do You Want To Start A Blog But Don’t Know How?

January 1, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article has been sponsored by BADNET

Great, BADNET can help you set up a professional blog while you basically do nothing.

BADNET is a service that will install a WordPress blog for you, install plugins to help combat spam, defend against malicious login attempts, improve SEO, and we will optimize the site for quick performance.

There is no technical know-how required to get started blogging with BADNET.

Oh, we will also give you four free blogging reports to help your site kick ass from the start.

1) WordPress QuickStart Guide (will walk you through your first post on your new blog)
2) How to Create the Perfect Blog Post
3) Blogging for Profit 101
4) The Tools of the Trade for a Pro Blogging Career

The service is FREE for you, you just pay for your web hosting and we’ll take care of the rest (we receive a commission from the hosting company).

You will also receive a free domain name.

Speaking of domain names…

Here’s a few quick tips to pick the best domain name:

- Pick your name (you always want to own your personal real estate, even if you don’t plan to use it)
- Pick a name that’s easy to remember

- Pick a name that’s easy to spell
- Don’t use dashes or numbers because they confuse people

Why wouldn’t you want to just start a free blog with a free hosting service?

You could use a free service but those services will cost you integrity.

Which name looks better?

YourBlog.com or YourBlog.blogspot.com?

Why would you want to start a blog?

To express your creativity, to have your voice heard, to make money, there are many reasons why.

BADNET is an easy choice, it’s an inexpensive choice, and we’ll do all the work for you.

Just purchase your hosting package through BADNET and we will set things up so you don’t have to.

You will be able to start blogging from the moment we send you your secure information.

Here’s the 1, 2, 3 to start a professional blog…

1) Sign up for the discounted hosting offer and claim your free domain name.

2) Submit your secure information to BADNET.

3) Sit back and relax while we get you set up.

Visit BADNET to get set up now.

Read Next: Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

What Do You Think Of ROK's New Layout?

January 1, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I went ahead and brought over Reaxxion's layout to ROK for two reasons

1. It's more compatible on mobile phones and tablets. Less people are browsing ROK from a desktop computer so I want to make sure they have a pleasant reading experience.

2. It increases our ad space inventory. The previous layout was too narrow and did not allow for industry standard ad sizes.

Traffic summary for 2014

For 2015 I will be more aggressive in monetizing ROK so that we can increase our current news offerings. The mainstream media has shown that they are unwilling to provide coverage for news that goes against their narrative, so we will step up to the plate to ensure truthful views get publicized. This means an increase in editorial costs. As a result you will see more advertising on par with larger blogs, including sponsored posts and other promotions.

Passing over daily editor duties to Winston (aka Black Knight) four months ago has allowed me to pursue the boring but necessary backend adjustments that I hope will increase ROK's long-term influence. I originally started ROK in October of 2012 to be a masculine group blog to compete with sites like The Art Of Manliness and Ask Men, but it has the potential for a much bigger political impact in crushing our enemies.

I believe any system is either growing, stagnating, or dying, and while ROK could happily proceed on its current routine, it's worth a shot to see what it's capable of. This will require changes that some of you may not like, but if my vision is accurate, it will be more than worth it in the end. I thank all of our loyal readers, guest contributors, staff writers, and advertisers for making ROK what it is so far. Let's see what 2015 will bring us.

Read Next: Submit An Article To ROK

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Be Careful Not To Throw Away Life’s Most Precious Assets

January 1, 2015 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I was visiting a friend of mine in Switzerland recently, and when I woke up on Saturday morning he was cleaning his military issue automatic assault rifle on the kitchen table. He apologized that he had to go to report for compulsory shooting as part of his military service. I love guns, so I invited myself along and had a great time shooting with him, but he seemed fed up with the obligation.

This is the difference between doing something because you have an interest in it and being forced to do it. The difference is only psychological, but it can create havoc with your outlook and psyche.

Taking a girlfriend out for a drink or dinner should be fun and enjoyable, but if you are in an LTR and you have to go because it’s “date night,” then it becomes another matter altogether. As you grow older more things seem to become obligatory and less things seem to be fun.

Nowhere in life can you find more roped-in situations than inside a family setting. Of course in life there are always less pleasant things that you have to do: take out the trash, vacuum the apartment, pay the rent and so forth, but when you are doing those things because you see some benefit, because you chose to participate in that particular venture, of course the burden of responsibility melts away and you take pride in what you are doing.

You also tend to choose the moment that suits you best and always have the option not to do it and put up with a kitchen full of trash, a dusty carpet etc. While some more uptight people might stick their noses up at the state of your place, if that's how you want it and it makes you comfortable—so be it. There is also a question of timing involved. If you are exhausted from work, well the vacuuming can wait until the weekend.

On the other hand, when the wife is barking at you to walk the dog or take out the trash, this is when the obligation starts to creep in and life becomes less interesting, tedious, mundane, and often rather stifling; oppressive even. Other people have their own needs, designs, and plans for you. The proverbial Christmas dinner can be a fun family occasion, or it can be a tedious chore you are attending almost at gunpoint.

A man needs certain basics in life and it's often the things that seem to cost nothing that we can most easily neglect or overlook. Fresh air, for example, we take for granted until living in some smogged out Asian city and start realize what a joy it was living by the beach. After fresh air, healthy food, and clean drinking water, there are a number of other attributes a man needs and these are very easy to lose.

Peace and Quiet

There is no replacement for a good night's sleep, waking up at a time that suits you, recharging on the weekend, and essentially what amounts to little more than having time to process your own thoughts and existence. While we are all so caught up in smart phones, constant entertainment, and desperately trying to avoid being bored or lonely, I've always found that the times in my life when I've had plenty of peace and quiet rapidly became extremely productive.

Living with someone, starting a family or having too many casual friends is a great way to lose this valuable time. The obligations and burdens that family life or even friendships can throw at you will most certainly disrupt this most precious asset. There's nothing worse than rushing an important business meeting or project because you need to get back to the girlfriend or wife and kids. The same holds true for single people who constantly feel the need to hang out.

Freedom

For me, this is largely an extension of peace and quiet. During the times in my life when I've been free from entanglements, I've consciously chosen to avoid too much pointless socializing and allocate time for myself; planning, preparing my business projects, getting out and about in a calm and relaxing way and generally digesting life in general. That's not to say you must live like a hermit in a cabin in the woods—if you chose to party like an animal all weekend, get wasted, play X-Box 18 hours a day, or fill your house with dozens of friends, that is your decision to take.

Sadly most people would do almost anything to give up the freedom doing their own thing, and many when given too much solitude or freedom plough themselves into all kinds of negative states. You may find that you do not make very good company for yourself, or at least it requires a certain amount of discipline to limit the pleasures of life in favor of more productive paths.

Nonetheless, having the freedom to do what you please is extremely important – so much so that the main punishment for crime is being incarcerated – and yet you cannot put a price on freedom.

Discipline

All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy, sure. However, friends, family, and other trivial obligations can easily drag down your discipline. Whether it be your exercise regime, the food you eat, orpicking up a smoking habit (or worse)—holding your own discipline in place is often tougher with people around. It can be useful to participate in a venture with someone else who is also committed, but ultimately the burden of discipline rests only with yourself.

I quit smoking at 25 and hadn't smoked in five years, until I moved in with a girl who was initially a non-smoker but picked up the habit at work and brought it home with her. Brilliant.

Sex

Sex is a commodity that man a needs. It makes him feel completed, satisfied, accomplished, and has many proven health benefits. No matter what you do you cannot deny nature's programming and even monks that hide away in monasteries lack the zest of a man that's getting some. Unfortunately tying that into an enormous burden of wife, kids, home, family and so forth can ruin your sex life.

Options

Take stock of the options you have open in life and be very careful before making a decision that is going to limit them. If men have one big weakness, it's that they take life decisions quite frivolously and then wonder "how did I end up here?" Think forwards and try to imagine what options you are giving up. The grass might look greener—those super interesting druggy friends, that wired and zany business partner, that tedious job that pays well, etc.—many things look great on the surface, but what are you giving up?

Is it such a great job or will you be roped into endless weekend conferences? She's a great gal, but will you start smoking again if you live with her? What are the risks and rewards? Do you really want to live in this or that city or country? What are you giving up? Lots of people talk about going ex-pat, but having done it myself in a variety of countries, I missed being able to order stuff online and receive almost whatever I wanted the next day, not just out of greed but for productivity's sake.

The worst thing of all I've experienced from living with someone is the phone call or message "When are you coming home?" There's no replacement for doing your own thing and heading home when you damn well please, happy with the accomplishments of the day, or pondering the problems you were facing and thinking of solutions you will implement tomorrow. Being cut short and rushing off to the girlfriend or wife and kids, only to find that an evening of watching cable TV awaits, is a fate worse than death in my opinion.

I love opening the door of my quiet, peaceful place—having a friendly female face to greet me would be nice, but what would I be giving up to accomplish that? Perhaps I am a workaholic, but frankly other than sleep, eat, shit, and fuck, I don't see much else to do with my time. If you like to be productive and reach your own goals, then be wary of the obligations you invite into your life. In other words, be careful what you wish for because you just might get it.

Read More: Genetics Guarantees That Feminism Will Lose

What Women's Tennis Says About "Equal" Pay

January 2, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Award-winning journalist Matthew Syed recently wrote a compelling article on the rank hypocrisy evident in the tennis equal pay debate.

This snippet from Syed brilliantly sums up the debacle that is "tennis feminism":

In most sports, they are free to compete against men, on an equal footing. They choose not to take up the invitation, except in a few rare exceptions, such as bowls and equestrianism. This is not supposed to be a trite point, or a chauvinistic one. It is merely to highlight the gall of those who campaign for equal pay. They wish to compete in segregated events; they wish to bar men from competing against them; but when men earn more, they also reserve the right to demand compensation.

Because of shrieks from the Women's Tennis Association (WTA), the term "equal pay" has been debased to the point of 1984 Newspeak. Equal pay means remuneration for the same work under the same general conditions. Women playing women, in order to avoid playing invariably tennis-superior men, is not the same work, or under the same conditions, as men playing men.

Truly equal pay in tennis would be men and women in the same field. Under the present misinterpretation, female tennis players are afforded a luxury that makes even less sense than a Major League pitcher being paid the same as one in the low minor leagues.

The Biology Argument

To argue that the differing biologies of men and women justifies "equal" pay in tennis is nothing short of laughable. Gender is only one example of how physical endowment manifests itself. Height often makes all the difference in basketball, for example, and how many players of average human height do we remember? Yet no one seriously suggests we form a parallel NBA with equivalent salaries for people standing below six feet. Or one for white people, considering that around 80% of the NBA is black.

The same logic can be applied to almost every other mainstream American sport. The heavy contact and power required in NFL favors male mesomorphs and endomorphs. Where are the calls for a rival, equally rewarded league for ectomorphs, such as the lean and mean DJ Qualls? It would make just as much "equality sense" to pay skinny nerds the same salaries to play NFL as it does to pay female tennis players the same as men.

He wants his own NFL, paid the same as Tom Brady.

As for more sporadically-followed sports, West Africans and their descendants in America and the Caribbean dominate sprinting. So are the Olympics going to create new medal events for whiteys like me who generally run slower and jump lower? Or how about a long-distance event for broad-bodied, ruddy Irishmen like my father to offset the advantages of the skinny Kenyans and Ethiopians? Physical reality is no less present in these cases than the male-female distinction in tennis.

Marketability

Marketability is often thrust forward as a reason for equal prize money at Grand Slams. But this misses the boat on three points. Firstly, WTA ticket numbers are often much lower when tournaments are held independently of or jointly with the male players. Though female players deny it continually, the women's game unabashedly piggybacks off the men, especially in the Grand Slams where the men's and women's events are held simultaneously. For Grand Slam finals, the men's tickets are routinely more expensive than the women's. WTA events held separately, such as Bastad in Sweden, have become a joke for their empty stands.

When a women's US Open final gets slightly more American viewers than the men's, feminists cheer wildly at the "victory," ignoring the fact that the women's final has been held on a Sunday, while the men's has been on a Monday when people are at work. Oh, and that rather irrelevant point that the very parochial American TV audience is more likely to watch one of their own finalists (Serena Williams) than Europeans like Andy Murray, Roger Federer, Novak Djokovic or Rafael Nadal.

Secondly, marketability has nothing to do with who progresses in a Grand Slam and how well they are paid for that progression. Two 2014 Grand Slam winners, Stanislas Wawrinka and Marin Cilic, are far from the most marketable players on tour. But they still won their respective Opens.

Victoria Azarenka, relative to her achievements, is a rather unpopular player in both the locker room and the fan base. Yet she's still won two Grand Slams. Similarly, despite regularly bombing out of major tournaments in recent years before the final stages, Ana Ivanovic is still a marketable athlete. And this has more to do with her looks than her recent tennis antecedence.

The third reason is that even the present interest in women's tennis has largely been generated by propaganda falsely emphasizing the equal skill and entertainment offered by the men's and women's games. Mythologies including the cringeworthy Battle of the Sexes, where long-retired 55-year-old Bobby Riggs lost to still-professional Billie Jean King, are used to demonstrate the value of the women's game without any empirical evidence, let alone the common sense of trying a non-gendered field.

Modern exhortations, such as the "Strong is Beautiful" campaign featuring Sharapova and Serena Williams, impliedly seek to justify equal pay without acknowledging that the girls simply aren't strong enough to compete with the men.

Strong is beautiful? So play the men for your equal pay!

The WTA's message can thus be summarized as "We refuse to play the men, but we insist on equal pay."

Focusing on the Physical Appearance of Players

The WTA and feminists commenting on tennis implicitly or explicitly decry the emphasis on female players' looks. And I can understand this. They're sportspeople, first and foremost. But if we remove a player's appearance from the equation and rely only on skill for our observations, it's obvious the women's game is inferior to the men's. And, again, we're paying both equally despite the disparity.

The dilemma is that the WTA demands we focus on skill levels, while happily lapping up the attention generated by the beautiful female players. It comes as no surprise that Anna Kournikova was the most famous player of the 90s in terms of wider "cultural" impact, despite never winning a regular singles title, let alone a singles Grand Slam.

Zero singles titles and the most well-known female singles player of all time. I wonder why?

Moreover, the single biggest drawcard to the women's side of tennis is the more attractive players. Serena Williams is eclipsed by the less dominant (and far more attractive) Maria Sharapova as the most recognizable female player currently. Even Ana Ivanovic, whose career sputtered after reaching Grand Slam glory some years ago, is still one of the most popular players on tour, far beyond her actual on-court achievements.

Sabine Lisicki, a Wimbledon finalist in 2013, is far more well-known than the less aesthetically pleasing and now retired Marion Bartoli, despite Bartoli beating Lisicki for that title and being on tour far longer before she recently retired. The same goes for the girl-next-door looks of Eugenie Bouchard versus the severe homeliness of French Open winner Francesca Schiavone.

Whilst talking all day about the talents of their players, the WTA seems to ignore that much of the brand recognition of female players comes from their skimpy court outfits and ubiquitous Sports Illustrated bikini-at-the-beach appearances. It still needs this sexuality, though, because it deflects attention from the inherent ability gap between male and female players. And often the public talks more about the garishness of a female player's outfit than the spectacle on the court.

Applying WTA Exceptionalism to Wider Society

The WTA is arguing not for equality but rather a self-serving exceptionalism. Female tennis players simply cannot compete with the men. As Syed points out, women want the God-given right to operate in a separate field from men, who would easily beat them, but they simultaneously insist on equal rewards, recognition, and exposure.

The logical extension of this WTA gender-norming is obvious. If someone has a naturally lower intelligence, just as sportswomen have generally lower abilities than sportsmen, why shouldn't they be awarded the same job, despite lower intellectual and professional achievement, as a more qualified person?

Likewise, if the average college entrance scores of men continue to be several points lower than women, shouldn't they be offered an equal reward (entry to their favored degree) at a threshold several points lower than their female counterparts? This is no different from "equal pay" in tennis, and makes more sense given that far more people go to university than play professional tennis, which involves a very short career.

Moving onto crime, men have much greater levels of testosterone, scientifically linked to impulsivity and aggression, than women. So why not have a lesser standard of criminality for male physical aggression, just as post-natal women are given excuses when they otherwise murder their newborns? This all takes into account biology, just as "equal" pay does in tennis.

Logic-Free Zone

One will notice that I have not even raised the specter of the best-of-five (men's) versus best-of-three set (women's) inequality in tennis. The holes in the "equal" pay fraud are so numerous and all-encompassing that I do not even need to raise the most obvious argument against the present state of affairs.

Women's tennis uses the same self-deceit to justify equal pay for unequal circumstances as wider feminism uses for all manner of histrionic and self-serving demands. Nonetheless, nonconformity exists, as the Syed article highlights. The best recipe for refuting WTA illogicality, like any other form, is to throw the equality argument back at the SJWs and dismantle it piece by piece.

Read More: How To Make Women Equal To Men

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

One Man’s Trash Is Another Man’s Treasure

January 3, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

We’ve all known the above idiom, yet many men continue to embody it in reality, usually for the worse. We then have are cases of men wifing up sluts, whores, pornstars, predatory women, etc. with a deluded self rationalization that such trash is indeed treasure, and with often terrible outcomes, some of which are triggered later out of natural territorial instincts. Why? Because of faulty discernment while choosing women to begin with.

> One single object (a woman) appears in three different ways: to the man who practices austerity it appears as a corpse, to the sensual it appears as a woman, > and to the dogs as a lump of flesh. – Kautilya, 370 BC-283 BC

When it comes to women, mere appearances are (and can be) deceptive

> The Opossum: In playing dead, the opossum plays stupid. Many a predator has therefore left it alone. Who could believe that such an ugly, unintelligent, nervous little creature could be capable of such deception? – Robert Greene, Law 21 ("Play a sucker to catch a sucker – seem dumber than your mark"), The 48 Laws of Power

In the modern world, shallowness exists not only in appearances but also in perceptive thinking. Modern society's over-emphasis on a woman's "packaging," the oversexualization of women, narcissism and fem-centric societal indoctrination creates unhealthy patterns of shallow blue pill thinking and behavior, affecting both genders alike. With this modern emphasis on superficiality, modern women's beauty rarely does penetrate to their character, and is more often than not, "skin-deep"—leaving them suitable for casual sex, but not commitment.

But due to these dysfunctional trends and thinking patterns which influence modern human interaction, a lot of (gullible) men often become committing suckers for a "sucker" in the modern world, not knowing that they might be dealing with a Dark Triad woman in metamorphosis (fueled by her years on the cock carousel), beneath her innocuous appearance.

> As blushing will sometimes make a whore pass for a virtuous woman, so modesty may make a fool seem a man of sense. -Jonathan Swift (1667-1745)

Usually, they're in love with such a woman: either for her superficial persona which may encompass either ideal but superfluous sexual, aesthetic, or caring abilities while ignoring other serious flaws in her character, lifestyle, and background. The illusion of love often makes men blind to their partner's flaws: a fact which science also corroborates.

Thus, in a dating world where superficiality, deception and amoral power games abound, it's easy to blame men for the lack of discernment, as the fate of a modern man when choosing women is: damned if he does, and damned if he doesn't—especially when the responsibility for his (and his woman's) mistakes are primarily thrust upon his shoulders by modern feminist society. Yet, the factors which lead to his abysmal choice of a trashy woman often remain unexplored, but must be investigated to warn others to avoid them.

The snares which lead to abysmal choices

There could be several, but the most commonly seen reasons for a man's faulty discernment while choosing a woman are (and not necessarily in that order):

1. Ignorance

..of Game and red pill wisdom which would enlighten, even save him. Knowledge is power, but the superficial modern man often chooses to wade in the bliss of his blue pill, self-absorbed ignorance. A classic analogy to gender interaction is the fable of the scorpion and the frog , but tell it to a modern man, he'd rarely believe it only till when it often comes to sting him inevitably in his dating life.

> Beauty is in the eye of the beholder and it may be necessary from time to time to give a stupid or misinformed beholder a black eye. – Jim Henson

Thus, ignorance is what often dominates the blue pill mind, preparing him to be preyed upon. Sometimes, it's the blue piller's virulent refusal to accept the knowledge of true female nature is what constitutes his self-rationalized delusions about women, which leads to his downfall.

The options in this choice are often mutually exclusive—implied by the famous seductress herself, hinting about the commonly seen natural inability of a man to love a woman once he's "understood" her: a truth however often ignored by the ignorant man.

2. Sexual thirst

> So strong and impelling is the desire for sexual contact that men freely run the risk of life and reputation to indulge it. – Napoleon Hill, "Think and Grow Rich"

It's effects can be further subdivided into:

a) Scarcity mentality – due to lack of options, or lack of game:

Regulating male sexual thirst (especially while young) is especially difficult, more so in today's oversexualized and hypergamous modern societies. Add a lack of game, and you have a recipe for sexual frustration which succumbs to the scarcity mentality. This causes such men to sexually scavenge, i.e. wife up the discarded sexual trash of others. What's forgotten by these scavenging men is that when it comes to used plates: spin and pass them around, but don't buy them.

Elsewhere, the scarcity mentality appears in societies where men don't have enough women (or "quality" women) resulting in a massive sea of cocks where even an "attractive" pussy (even if overused) is the elusive prize. With the power to grant sex shifting even more to these women there, the men often commit to trash due to lack of options.

On the other hand, a modern man who's littered with trashy women around him in a modern wasteland culture, could think he's found his unicorn when he moves abroad to find women who might actually put up an act like how ideal women should behave as. This, coupled with his search to find his unicorn, might mislead him, as a woman acting as an ideal woman is not the same as truly being one.

Every society and culture has its flaws, so does its women—so the way a man can stop himself from forming an over-estimated perception about foreign women is to first understand the local culture, environment, and dating trends; plus how the local men in their societies deal with women, and why so.

But what usually happens is that modern men often readily transgress the same law whilst abroad with their foreign unicorns, which instead they might vigorously follow back home:

> DO NOT COMMIT TO ANYONE, BUT BE COURTED BY ALL:
>
> If you allow people to feel they possess you to any degree, you lose all power over them. By not committing your affections, they will only try harder to win you over. Stay aloof and you gain the power that comes from their attention and frustrated desire. Play the Virgin Queen: Give them hope but never satisfaction.– Robert Greene, Law 20 from The 48 Laws of Power

b) Sexual thirst for novelty or a fetish

On the flip side, in a scenario of sexual abundance, the thirst for sexual variety can blind a man's perception of an evil woman: partly by her beautiful but deceptive packaging, and partly by his own need to seduce her because of his need for sexual variety.This is where Dark Triad Women (DTWs) usually feast upon gullible but resourceful men's need for sexual novelty or fetishes.

c) Uncontrolled sexual thirst which leads to unexpected pregnancies

…which usually entails an unexpected marriage as well, as commonly seen today.

3. Societal indoctrination

The damaging influences of gyno-centric ideology of modern feminist societies is enough to doom a man's existence right from the cradle. Add to that: dysfunctional families, masculine women, a lack of proper male role models, and a godless society around him who all tell (and teach) him that men cannot have preferences when it comes to women they want to marry, and should accept women without questioning their background or analyzing their behavior.

Old habits die hard and so does childhood indoctrination, which is akin to writing your thoughts on a growing individual's mind, which absorbs your thoughts as its own simply on trust. The abuse of a man's trust thus begins right at his birth by those who indoctrinate him unnaturally against his own nature.

Should he choose to rebel to reclaim the freedom of his individuality and mind—free from female approval—he is mercilessly demeaned or worse, shunned. Fear is used to control him by the herd which raises him by taking away his security, freedom and starving him of his pleasure—to secure his submission.

Fully grown up and beta-indoctrinated, he believes that women are special snowflakes who can change for the better, even after an inglorious past, as that's what he's socially told. Ever forgiving, he's socially prepared to don the role of a Hosea, ready to accept an undeserving woman, for that's what socially expected of him. Worse, he succumbs to his oneitis: a mental hoax again partly influenced by his societal herd.

The biggest damages that the matrix of modern feminist societies does to men is that it not only feminizes them, destroys their masculinity and makes them subservient to women, but also it destroys their minds, and their ability to properly discern a woman and her disruptive (or destructive) potential.

Thus, the best way to make a delusional, fearful, misguided, and ignorant chump is to raise him as one. Modern feminist societies unfailingly succeed in raising large herds of them, destined for subjugation to women.

4. The fear of loneliness

But what happens when the society, its indoctrination, the people he believed in, and the women he loved, have all failed or left a man alone? That's when his real test begins, and:

The real test for a man is how he lives with himself, alone.

Yet, many escape this test by jumping into marriage because they fear loneliness for which to deal with, they need a partner. If a man fears living with himself, why should someone live with him to begin with? Societal indoctrination is also to blame for this crippling fear, by heavily indoctrinating modern men with romantic blue pill ideology designed to render and raise men psychologically disposed towards dependency and fulfillment from women.

The promise (and hope) of receiving spousal care in old age is another societal lie which continues to influence men into commitment, but if only such hopes realistically bore some fruit in today's shallow world. Such hopes are forests in which only fools roam, and the modern man has many such self-destructive delusional forests of hope constructed by feminism around him, to get lost into forever.

5. The need to procreate and pass on his legacy

Indeed, the desire for children and procreation naturally resides in men. But should that need ever turn into a unhealthy desperation, it can cloud enough a man's perception of the woman he's dealing with, leading to an erroneous judgment and regrettable decision which can cost time, freedom, and money.

It's said that "the quality of a dish does not only depend on the type of ingredients used; it also depends on the quality of the utensil it's cooked in."

Thus, one of the worst errors a man can do is to have children by using his seed for the womb of a trashy woman—an interpretation for the analogy above—out of desperation for fatherhood, or simply because she's willing to bear his children.

6. The defeatist misinterpretation of "acceptance"

Can be influenced by any of the above factors. A commonly seen example is when men decide to forsake judgment completely before committing to women, “to go with the flow, and accept them for what they are.”

But, “acceptance” of people’s flaws doesn’t mean one also resignedly ‘accepts’ them all in one’s tribe automatically.

True acceptance means accepting humanity’s imperfections, but at the same time accepting that the power and freewill to choose whom to relate to still lies with us. Would everyone accept a scorpion as a pet, even though that means unanimously accepting its venomous nature?

Playing with fire could indeed be fun, but only if one has the knowledge of a fireman to begin with. The same analogy can be applied to dealing with dubious women.

Not all men can deal with scorpions (or women) the way Bond does…

7. Lack of self-worth

A direct result of gyno-centric indoctrination and sexual thirst, many modern men lack in self-esteem when dealing with women, often considering them to be the prize. This leads them to white knight and wife up used trash in hypergamous societies where women reward sex to alphas first .

Such a man’s low self-esteem and sexual thirst often propels him to commitment with an overused woman (whom he considers higher in value than himself, and sees himself as lucky because she still chose him while society lauds his deed as a win), as getting sex in a marriage to an used woman is better than no sex at all.

The solution

The simplest solution would be taking the red pill, and learning game. Two simple methods derived from both which could help are:

1. Pose as a ‘friend’, but do work as a spy

> People don’t change, they just have momentary steps outside of their true character – Chad Kultgen, The Lie

A common reason why modern marriages often fail or have a shelf life is that because a number of women perceive marriage as a prize or a destination to be attained (using deception) for social benefits and peer validation; and not as a journey of life meant to be partnered with a man.

Thus, in today’s times, it’s surprising to note how women (even promiscuous ones) still desire the ideal institution of marriage—even if it may always not be with noble intentions. So what happens when the destination of marriage is attained?

As seen often, when a woman captures a man’s commitment, she loses interest. The man is then left to fend for himself: either psychologically or worse, even physically discarded by his mate through divorce—to stumble on the rest of this journey alone, thus making a farce of the modern institutions of both marriage and family.

> A wedding is a funeral where you smell your own flowers. – Eddie Cantor

But this could be avoided to a greater degree by probing effectively about her background, her values, her dreams, her lifestyle, her past (directly or indirectly) and her reputation, before accepting her for mere face (or ass) value.

…but even then, don't believe completely and everything that you'd hear from, and about her. Because:

2. Always consider the TIME factor, and project her mentally in the future

> People around you, constantly under the pull of their emotions, change their ideas by the day or by the hour, depending on their mood. You must never assume that what people say or do in a particular moment is a statement of their permanent desires. — Robert Greene, Mastery

Throughout history, wise men have tested women through responsibility, freedom, resources (money), affection, and sometimes, a limited amount of power transfer. But the greatest test of a woman's character is always through time, thus it's never wise to form a hasty opinion of her, no matter how well her initial behavior may be.

> When marrying, ask yourself this question; Do you believe that you will be able to converse well with this person into your old age? Everything else in marriage is transitory. – Friedrich Nietzsche

Time reveals the true colors and depth of a woman's and the consistency of her virtues—the real hallmark of of a truly good woman.

> It's not beauty but fine qualities, my girl, that keep a husband. – Euripides

However, when dealing with more deceptive versions of women, self mastery definitely helps.The more a man masters himself, the more clearer and error-free his perceptions and judgments of women will be.

Conclusion

On the flip side, sometimes a man might actually discard a good woman in his life, thinking she's trash—which results in her only to be partnered by another man who knows her real value. These are indeed rare exceptions but nevertheless possible, but such exceptions to the rule does not mean that this itself become the rule. However, game still helps to offset this error by creating more options.

But remember: sprinkling gold dust on shit doesn't make it gold. Poke it with a stick, and you'd get the inevitable stink. The same thing applies to a trashy woman's character. The tests for a man in his dealings with women is to discolor his perception from the influencing factors mentioned to "see" her for what she really is—and not what her appearance, or what modern feminist indoctrination expects him to believe.

Read Next: The Power Of Feminism

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globetrotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

The Best Of ROK Staff Writers In 2014

January 3, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

2014 has been a tremendous year for Return Of Kings. We have made serious strides every month in terms of readership and have the highest number of dedicated readers and commenters in the site's history. Traditional sex roles week was a success and we have more writers on staff than ever before.

ROK has provided incisive, relevant, and timely commentary on serious public issues as they arise, all the while continuing to provide fresh perspectives on historical, philosophical, and spiritual issues. Furthermore, ROK has also continued to provide insight into travel, game, and general tips for life.

In celebration of these accomplishments, let us reflect on the best posts that the ROK staff writers penned in 2014.

Athlone McGinnis

How Feminists Shame Beautiful Women

Why Famous Men Become Outspoken Feminists

Why Chivlary Is Dead

How Feminists Attack The Traditional Woman

Why Declining Fertility Rates Are Not A Good Thing

Billy Chubbs

Ignore The Unwarranted Hate Of Trade Jobs
Unmarried Older Women Need To Go Away
Men Fought The Nazi's, Women Slept With Them
My Beta Daydreaming
How Zoe Quinn Screwed Her Way Through The Video Game Industry

Black Knight

Four Thing I Learned From Copy-editing My First Book
Three Reasons Why Travel Doesn't Make Women More Interesting
Three Things I Observed On My Manosphere Hiatus
In With The New, Amazon Forcing Out Antiquated Publishing Giants

C. Contrary

The Equality Movement Is Allowing Women to Tyrannize Men
Let Hard Experience Be Your Teacher
The Value Of Being A Loner

Douglas

Fact Checking Emotional Propaganda
Time Is A Non-renewable Resource

Law Dogger

My One Year Of Not Masturbating
The Importance Of Standing Your Ground
Has Game Made Me A Better Lawyer?
Columbia Law Is Fostering The Growth Of Pussified Attorneys

Oracle Z

The Disturbing Relationship Between Feminism And The Occult
35 Signs The Girl You Are Dating Is A Whore

Quintus Curtius

The Cycle Of Societal Wealth
The Art Of Speaking And Writing Well
Ice Odyssey: Douglas Mawson's Race Against Death
Thirty Seven: A Book About The Nature Of Masculine Identity
A Dialogue With A Pious Monk

Roosh

No One Would Have Died If PUA-Hate Killer Elliot Rodger Learned Game
Poosy Paradise Is Waiting
Female University Student Carries Around Mattress She Was Raped On Is Digital Technology Destroying The Middle Class
Meet Your New YouTube Censors
Ezra Klein's Anti-Male Hatred On Vox
Why Are Some Countries Poor While Others Are Rich
ROK Now Has A Little Brother: Reaxxion
Cultural Collapse Theory: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

runsonmagic

How Women Train Men To Rape
How Trigger Warning Silence Dissent And Protect Fragile Egos
American Children Are Prisoners Of Women
Who Killed Adulthood In American Culture
People Oppose Anonymity Because They Can't Think For Themselves

Troy Francis

You Will Always Face Criticism
How To Get More Sex With Alpha Douchebag Club Game
Portrait Of A Modern Career Woman

Tuthmosis

Pussy Is Seasonal

Girls With Short Hair Are Damaged

The White Knight Landing Page

Street Harassment Is A Myth Invented By Socially Retarded White Women

2Wycked

Men Need A Return Of The Male Only Gentleman's Club

What Happened To Coming Of Age Movies For Boys?

America's Culture Of Narcissism

We Must Not Deny The Importance Of Fatherhood

"A Passage For Trumpet" Shows The Elusive Nature Of Happiness

Read More: Then They Came For Us

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Could You Defeat A Past Version Of Yourself?

January 4, 2015 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

As I slid another 45-pound plate onto the bar, I had an odd sensation of nostalgia. This felt somewhat disturbing, so I stopped and wondered when the last time was that I had lifted as much weight. For the better part of the last year, my workout had consisted of exercises unrelated to weightlifting, such as running long distances and doing a bunch of jumping jacks.

Getting back into the weightlifting routine, I realized I was a whole lot weaker on the bench than I had been a year and half ago. This decline merited further examination.

Measuring progress and fitness can be a challenge. Many newcomers make the big mistake of comparing themselves to gym queens at the YMCA. This can be intimidating and discouraging. After discussing working out with my friend "Incitatus", we agreed that a very good method for measuring progress or degradation over time is yourself. Here is what he said:

> id go nuts if i didnt work out. modern man has no battles to fight, just apathy
> i started working out and continue to workout solely for the feeling i get, looking the way i do being appealing to females is just a side effect. but doing it for myself solitary, on a rigid schedule, created for me personal battles id engage in with myself, and to me defeating a weaker form of myself is more than i could ever get lifting more than someone else.

I asked him why and how this method of introspection applied to physical exercise works for him:

> i take the mentality into my workouts that its a literal struggle for my life, and if i wouldnt give the same amount during a time of physical conflict, then i dont deserve to live > yeah i really internalized that concept, of killing off an old version of myself > thats why when i hear people saying they need to have a workout partner to get them motivated, i know they havent lit the fire yet

My employment over the last decade has given me hard numbers of many aspects of fitness that I accomplished in the past. I have noticed I can run faster whenever my schedule stabilizes and I can run more often. Could I outrun myself 10 years ago? No, but I have not degraded too far from that point.

As for lifting weights at the gym, from the squat rack to the bench, I am at the point where I can lift about 30 to 40% more than I could 10 years ago. Aside from comparing fitness with one's own self, you could ask other questions related to it.

As for "killing off an old version of myself," if i could to get in a physical altercation with myself from 10 years ago, I am pretty confident a present-day version would come out on top. Other factors such as knowledge, experience, and jadedness would come into play on this one. Taking this thread a little further, if i were to play the most dangerous game with myself of 10 years ago, I still think today's version would win.

This internal comparison caused me to look at people I know. A lot of my friends were in great shape when they soldiered beside me many years ago. It's sad because more than a few of them have up clearly declined from that level since then, and I have noticed that the slide into has-been status correlates with a decline in socioeconomic status.

Buying big trucks with deployment money is no longer an option for some. Whether one causes the other, I do not know, it just correlates. Some of my friends have been able to maintain or exceed what they were in the past and their success also correlates with a higher socioeconomic status.

What can one do to avoid the slide into has-been status? First thing that comes to mind is the obvious: continue doing what put you into shape in the first place and not stop. Second, avoid poisoning your body by smoking and drinking. Eating at McDonald's won't really help improve yourself. A cut flower will always die, no matter how often you change the water the vase.

A lot of people think they were heroes in their own time. Even more think they are still heroes in their own mind. Stop and think about whether the accomplishments you brag about seem to be in your distant past, and if so, what direction you are heading in. Could you kill a past version of yourself?

Read More: Self-Improvement Is Not Just For Young Guys

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

A Simple, Effective Way To Review Your 2014

January 4, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

A close friend of mine and I exchange biweekly emails reviewing our progress and performance of the past two weeks.

It serves as a way to keep each other accountable and stay on track. The method we use is simple yet extremely effective. With the New Years celebrations in full swing, I find myself looking back at the year that passed, 2014. As I contemplate the various events that took place and things I experienced, it dawns on me that our biweekly review format offers a solid way to review the entire year.

I believe people get far too caught up in setting New Year's goals and resolutions. The focus should be on reviewing the time that's passed and learning what we can from our own actions and experiences. We should always have clear goals. Some new goals may arise as you review your year, yes, but there's absolutely no reason you should wait for January 1st before setting goals. As men we need a purpose—a direction—to move forward and to stay focused and motivated.

But I digress. Let's return to the basic method I want offer you in regards to reviewing your 2014. All you need to do is think of your life in terms on the following four categories: fitness and health, women and dating, business and career, and self-improvement. I find they cover the vast majority of ground men need to concern themselves with.

For each area, simply ask yourself: What did I do well? What will I do differently? Then record your answers. Below I'll share my personal review with you:

Business

What I did well: I built my personal training business into a solid source of income. My clientele is as vast as ever. Also my blog How To Beast experienced steady growth. My books and courses are selling well enough that I was able to quit my software consulting job. Now I get to dedicate most of my time to writing and How To Beast. This was a goal of mine for a long time.

What I'll do differently: Before quitting said software job, I hesitated. It was a profitable position and I almost dropped the training in place of it. This indecision crippled my productivity for weeks. Next time I need to make a career decision, I'll move quicker.

Dating

What I did well: I was in a relationship at this time last year and I'm in another one currently. But the time in between was the most prosperous gaming period of my life (with day game and Tinder both being gold mines). I finally was able to assimilate a strong and confident mindset into my gaming and dating, and the results reflected this.

What I'll do differently: As I mentioned in my most recent article, I believe I lost touch with my emotions and motivations somewhere along the line. While I was crushing the single life, I was doing so from a place of insecurity where I felt I needed women and sex. I'll continue to remind myself that women are a great thing to have, but not required for living the good life.

Self-Improvement

What I did well: I terminated my internet porn habit. And this simultaneously felt great and boosted my discipline across all other areas of my life.

What I'll do differently: I went through long stretches of not reading or meditating, two habits I want to be doing daily. I'll get back on track here by reading for 30 minutes and meditating for 10 each day going forward.

Fitness

What I did well: My strength steadily increased all year long. I hit PRs on the bench press, overhead press, and back squat—my three favorite lifts. I'm also currently as lean as ever.

What I'll do differently: My newfound leanness is the result of a string of bad GI issues that originated from a poor diet that ignored my food allergies. I also lost a bit of strength and muscle mass as a result of my current calorie-restricted diet. Once I've healed I will construct a superior diet that I'll adhere to, to avoid future issues.

And that's my year in a nutshell. A good one. I honestly would love to hear from you guys below. Share how you progressed in these four areas in the comments.

Want to build more muscle and be more confident in 2015? Check out my new free eBook.

Read More: How To Free Yourself From The Need For Women

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

What Type Of Guy Gets Falsely Accused of Rape?

January 4, 2015 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

Most of you by now know about the rape culture campaign that has reached fever pitch around the nation. Even Michelle Obama and some other B-list celebrities got in on the action by posting youtube videos talking about ending “rape culture.” This hysteria rages particularly hard on college campuses, making me feel very lucky to be off the dating market at the moment. But not everyone is as lucky as me.

An acquaintance of mine was dating her boyfriend in college for two years. Over the summer before her junior year however, she decided that she had enough. Naturally she gave a myriad of reasons why she ~~wanted~~ needed to break up with him. Apparently he was “holding her back” from experiencing college life. At the time, I took this statement at face value and thought he was just a stick in the mud. More realistically however, she was just starting to get bored of the boring beta that trailed after her at all the parties and wouldnt let her have any “fun.”

And boy did she have fun after they broke up. I had a front row seat to the affair. And since she was like “one of the bros” she didn’t skimp on the details. Full disclosure: she is not a prime catch (otherwise I too would have been tempted to smash), in fact I’d rate her a solid 5, in other words: very average. But most college males are incredibly thirsty and will jump at the opportunity to get with anything that even resembles a girl with interest in them. Suffice to say, she did way better for herself than one would expect based on her looks. She even had a fling with a 35 year old banker that would wine and dine her every week.

This brings up something I’ll never understand: why adults looked wistfully back at their college years as if they were years of abundant poon just falling out of the heaven like unleavened bread. The truth is that chicks dig older guys, and the first half of college is rough for your average male, and only gets a bit better for most as they get older. Personally, I had a blast, but I had the added knowledge of being an acolyte of game. The others though…they've been struggling, and probably will continue to do so until they become rich bankers themselves. It doesn't help that you have the histrionics of the "rape culture" people to deal with either.

Back to the story—one night several months after their breakup she and him met up at a party again. One thing led to another, and they slept together that night. Only several weeks later, the girl went to the administration and claimed that she had been raped. The administration hem-ed and haw-ed and decided that the safe thing to do would be to suspend the boy for a year, pending a further investigation. Did you catch that? He wasn't proven guilty, he had witnesses that even came to his defense (one of my old roommates), and they were both drunk, but none of these mitigating factors prevented him from even openly debating whether he in fact committed rape or not.

Personally I know the guy, and he is one of the most vanilla-fied, beta-fied, and pussy-fied herbivores that you will find on a college campus. The idea of him forcing himself on anyone, including an ex-girlfriend that is the exact same height (and weight probably) as him is downright laughable. So perhaps the girl was suffering from a case of buyer's remorse? It seems like the most plausible explanation, but it begs the question, who is the type of guy that gets falsely accused of rape?

It's the lesser beta, never the bad boy alpha.

My own experiences add a splash of color to the affair. About a year and a half ago I asked out an Indian chick (HBD 8.5) on a date. I didn't know it at the time, but I was oozing with charisma and natural game. She was working at the desk as a sort of secretary and was studying for her MCAT when I approached her. Keep in mind that this was before I understood the science behind applied charisma.

Naturally Alpha Me: You look really excited.

Her: What?

NAM: To be working this job.

Her: Yeah, its a blast. (rolls her eyes)

NAM: Are you studying for your MCAT?

Her: Yea, it sucks.

Me: I could tutor you!

Her: Are you also taking the MCAT?

Me: Nah

Her: Haha then why do you think you can tutor me?

Me: Just a hunch. We should get lunch before we study together though.

Her: Haha..ok?

Me: When's your break, I'll come pick you up then.

Her: Hahahaah, ok 12.

I was wearing a sleeve-less t shirt, ray-ban knockoffs and most importantly I had that special factor x swagger that gave me that mischievous sparkle in the eyes and sly grin on my face that showed her I didn't take her too seriously. (In retrospect, I suppose I used a variant of Roosh's elderly opener.) The lunch date became an alcohol date the next day and just as I was escalating for the grand finale, she drops this bombshell on me.

"I have a boyfriend."

Ooof, game over right? Well the red-pilled male naturally understands that this is just last minute resistance, but I took it at face value. I backed off. Which is a shame because sexual tension continued to grow between us, until one night after we went on a drunk walk through the city at 4am, she insisted on sleeping over in my apartment. When I tried to make an advance on her, she refused and said that we had to sleep separately. I had a bunk bed and was on top, she was on the bottom. I hop up, close my eyes and hear her say:

"If you were a man, you would take me now"

I jump down, blood boiling, throw myself at her, only to have her start squirming and say, "WHAT are you doing!? I have a boyfriend!"

Confused, I climb back up. One minute later.

"Why did you stop?"

I jump back down. Encounter resistance again, climb back up, confused as fuck.

"I'm in your room and you're not doing anything to me?"

Third time's the charm right? Wrong. Same thing happens, I fall asleep soon after.

I wonder to this day what would have happened if I had done what she was begging me to do. Would I be in front of the honor council? Was I alpha enough then to escape her morning after buyer's remorse? Hard to say, but the deck would have certainly been stacked against me…

The only conclusion that I can draw is that college used to be a sort of training wheels on practice ground for middle-class males. Only now, the learning curve is steeper and the consequences much more dire for failing to internalize the lessons of game. I don't even think this will stay on campuses for long, so I'll be the first to say it here: "rape culture awareness, coming soon to a workplace near you." The moral of the story? It's alpha or die, dear readers.

Read More: Meet The Man Who Apologized After Being Falsely Accused Of Rape

Vincent Law

Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

Why Is The Transsexual Lobby Trying To Politicize Leelah Alcorns Death?

January 5, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

On December 28, 2014, Ohio teenager Leelah Alcorn committed suicide by waltzing in front of an eighteen-wheeler. Born Joshua Ray Alcorn, he's become a cause célèbre among SJWs and LGBT types because he was a transsexual who blamed his suicide on his Christian parents. In a suicide note posted to his (now-deleted) Tumblr blog, Alcorn expressed his hopes that his death would spark a revolution for trans rights:

> …My death needs to mean something. My death needs to be counted in the number of transgender people who commit suicide this year. I want someone to look at that number and say "that's fucked up" and fix it. Fix society. Please.

I'm just going to say it: Josh Alcorn was a selfish coward. In killing himself because of his parents' unwillingness to let him wear dresses, he's proven that transsexuals are mentally ill narcissists. His blood is on the hands of not his parents, who tried to raise him to be a happy and successful man, but on the social justice warriors and LGBT activists who fed his personality disorders.

And unless society recognizes that transsexuals need mental treatment, not sex change surgeries, the number of confused teenagers committing suicide will only grow.

Leelah Alcorn: Portrait Of A Narcissist

Josh Alcorn's suicide note provides a disturbing glimpse into his mind. Beyond the obvious desire for fame that motivated his suicide, Alcorn inadvertently gives insights into his other mental issues. For example, he states that he first "discovered" he was transgender when he was 14, he immediately ran to his mommy like a good little Millennial looking for validation:

> When I was 14, I learned what transgender meant and cried of happiness. After 10 years of confusion I finally understood who I was. I immediately told my mom, and she reacted extremely negatively, telling me that it was a phase, that I would never truly be a girl, that God doesn't make mistakes, that I am wrong…

Alcorn's parents reacted to their fruity son's proclamations in the only sane way: by getting him professional help. They realized that like most teenagers, he was just acting out, no different than kids of generations past who rebelled by becoming hippies, punks, or goths. Unfortunately, unlike generations past, the sewer pipes of social media and social justice warrior ideology enabled Alcorn to find a support group for his pathologies:

> I formed a sort of a "fuck you" attitude towards my parents and came out as gay at school, thinking that maybe if I eased into coming out as trans it would be less of a shock. Although the reaction from my friends was positive, my parents were pissed. They felt like I was attacking their image, and that I was an embarrassment to them. They wanted me to be their perfect little straight christian boy, and that's obviously not what I wanted.

Alcorn's parents reacted by taking away his phone and banning him from using social media: again, a perfectly reasonable response to get him away from influences that were corrupting his mind. They made the mistake of letting him back on Tumblr and other media at the end of the school year, at which point Alcorn reveals an aspect of his personality that none of the SJWs squirting crocodile tears over his corpse have noticed:

> At the end of the school year, my parents finally came around and gave me my phone and let me back on social media. I was excited, I finally had my friends back. They were extremely excited to see me and talk to me, but only at first. Eventually they realized they didn't actually give a shit about me, and I felt even lonelier than I did before. The only friends I thought I had only liked me because they saw me five times a week.

In other words, Josh Alcorn had no friends, and people only tolerated him because they had no choice. While there's nothing wrong with being shy—I had a hard time making friends as a teenager—Alcorn's account suggests that his own behavior and weirdness drove people away.

SJWs like to argue that the high rates of mental illness and suicide trannies suffer from is a result of "transphobia," but the reality is the reverse: people who become transsexuals are already mentally ill.

The desire to mutilate your genitals and take hormones in order to become an ersatz version of the opposite sex is indicative of defective brain chemistry. Studies have consistently shown that the pathologies of homosexuals and transsexuals start with them and result in their loved ones being alienated, not the other way around.

Finally, Josh Alcorn's method of suicide displays how much of a monster he had become. He couldn't simply slit his wrists in the bathtub and be done with it: he chose to make an innocent truck driver the instrument of his death. Not only will that driver face professional and criminal penalties, he'll be permanently scarred by knowing that he killed a human being, even if it was unintentional. Only a true narcissist would inflict that kind of misery on someone.

hello there. I'm new to tumblr and just thought I'd introduce myself. my name is jun, or june, depending on how I'm feeling. I'm a 26 year old pangender asexual demiplatonic. I'm also trans-racial (east asian) and otherkin (tabby cat). I have high-functioning autism as well. I'm glad to finally have found a community where I'm accepted & where I can post about my issues without being discriminated against.
:)
my pronouns are xis, xir, xis and xself. please feel free to follow me. I'll follow back!

Leelah Alcorn Died Because Of SJWs

As selfish and damaged as Josh Alcorn was, his narcissism didn't bloom in a vacuum. If he had grown up 30, 20, or even 10 years ago, he would have gotten over his childish "transsexuality" and become a normal man. His twisted beliefs were fed to him in part by social justice warriors, backed by the leftist mainstream media.

Tumblr, where Alcorn kept his blog, is the primary culprit. The site is ground zero for the most virulent strains of SJW ideology. On Tumblr, there are whole communities dedicated to normalizing freakish behavior and mental illness. Examples include This is Thin Privilege, a site where the morbidly obese whine about how being 400 pounds overweight makes life difficult, as well as the phenomenon of "headmates," where people pretend to have schizophrenia so they can be cool:

1. What does "trigender" mean?

Trigender is a non-binary gender choice that liberates me from having to decide one just one gender. It means that I am simultaneously male, female, and neither. How is this possible? Think of it as the ocean. The ocean is not one single pH level, it's not one single concentration of salt, and it's certainly not one constant distribution of fish. From day to day, one portion of the sea can be completely empty, and the next, it can be a hotspot for fish, and sometimes the moon makes it so the water level is lower. It fluctuates, you see, and so does my gender. Somedays, I feel masculine. Namely when my male headmate (Ralph) takes over. And somedays I feel feminine, like when my other headmate Beatrice or myself takes control. And still yet other days, I feel genderless. So that's what trigender means to me. That's my definition. If this is technically called something else, go ahead and message me the correct term. But my understanding is that trigender is the correct term.

While letting the world's rejects start Doctor Who fanblogs and get into silly slap-fights over pronoun usage might seem harmless, by allowing their son to use social media like Tumblr, the Alcorns undermined their own attempts to put him on the straight and narrow. The existence of misfit online communities such as those on Tumblr and Reddit reinforce deviant behavior by making it seem normal and giving the mentally ill a place to commiserate.

In this specific instance, the mainstream media's promotion of transsexuality was also responsible for Josh Alcorn's suicide. There's no evidence that sexual reassignment surgery helps trannies: in fact, the suicide rate of post-op transsexuals is far higher than that of pre-ops. By glorifying demented individuals like Laverne Cox and Fallon Fox and accusing critics of "transphobia," the leftist media is driving countless people to an early grave.

The worst part of Josh Alcorn's suicide is that his parents, who were trying their best to help him, are now the focus of an SJW hate campaign. Dan Savage, a one-man argument for returning homosexuality to the DSM, has called for the Alcorns to be arrested for "child abuse" and "neglect," among other things:

The Alcorns have also been forced to move their son's funeral due to death threats from SJWs. Finally, the hashtag activists are out in full force, sponsoring a Change.org petition to have the Alcorns use Josh's "true name" "Leelah" on his headstone: it has over 80,000 signatures at the time of this writing.

Mammas, Don’t Let Your Babies Grow Up To Be Drag Queens

While we can criticize reparative therapy as well as the other methods that the Alcorns used to try to help their son, we cannot deny that they had his best interests at heart. By trying to save Josh from a life of social ostracism and suicidal ideation, the Alcorns were showing just how much they loved him.

To see them defamed for refusing to let a teenager—a class of people whom society doesn’t consider mature enough to smoke, drink, or vote—irreversibly vivisect his private parts is heartbreaking.

As Josh Alcorn’s attention whoring shows, it’s absolutely imperative for parents to protect their children from SJW influence. By tricking impressionable kids into thinking they can have their poles turned into holes, social justice warriors and their media backers are exacerbating mental illness and suicide in America. Only by insulating children from their corrosive ideas—and fighting them every step of the way—can we stop the plague of transsexuality.

Joshua Alcorn should not be remembered as a tranny martyred by intolerant right-wing bigotry, but a disturbed young man who took his life—already a selfish act—in the most reprehensible way possible. And so long as the forces who corrupted Alcorn still reign, other children will be seduced in the same way.

Read More: 5 Ways To Stop Omega Males From Becoming Transsexuals

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Observations On The Art Of Seduction

January 5, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I will begin this article by relating a short anecdote.

Rodrigo had finally succeeding in meeting Luisa in a small barzinho. They had matched on Tinder several days before, but the logistical difficulties of meeting in their large city had prevented a convenient date from congealing.

But he had been quietly insistent, sensing from the tone of her texts that she had a high level of interest in him. When she had made a point of telling him how she was looking forward to their date, his mood was significantly elevated. They both had had to travel—by bus and taxi—some distance to meet this night.

At the barzinho, Rodrigo had gently escalated his physical contacts, beginning with her hands and forearms; this had progressed rapidly to a point where they were imprinting tongue-inflected kisses on each other.

He had moved from across the table to sit beside her, her legs now resting on his thighs; one of his hands had descended slightly inside her waistband, below her lower back. Both were fully engrossed in the moment, whispering seductive invocations to each other amid the chorus of surrounding conversations on the hot summer street.

He eventually asked her to return to his apartment, to advance further their exploratory intimacies, but she had consistently declined, citing a litany of personal reasons. And yet he persisted. There was something about her refusals that contained a hidden entreaty of advancement, in that amorous code that only nascent lovers could decipher.

Finally she turned to him, looked him squarely in the eyes and said, I require efforts to be conquered. This, he knew at once, was his signal to advance further; it was probably one of the most feminine things that had been said to him, and it made his blood froth with expectation. Rodrigo recalled with quiet amusement two lines from Don Quixote: “A hen and a woman are lost by rambling,” and “Between a woman’s yes and no I would not engage to put a pin’s point, so close are they to one another.”

Yet Luisa still demurred, citing one reason after another to go home. And finally he relented, as it was now very late and he just wanted to return to his apartment. He paid the bill and told Luisa he would walk her to the bus stop; he himself would hail a taxi.

As they walked along the crowded streets, she turned to him and said she wanted to go with him to his apartment. And that was how quickly it had happened. That was how fast the game had changed. I require efforts to be conquered.

What are we to conclude from this tale? In matters of seduction, an opprobrious discourse on the differences between the genders simply will not do. There is indeed a logic to amorous interactions, if only we are able to see clearly through the biases of our predispositions. If we may descant a bit on the rhapsodies of love, we will see how some unexpected truths obtrude on our reluctant minds. The shattering of illusions is the first step in the acquisition of wisdom.

The aspiring lover must be hopeful. He will have innumerable obstacles placed in his path: excuses, tests, dramas, and excessive coyness will all be deployed against him in varying degrees of concentration. He must out-wait and outwit his adversary, paying special attention for clues that indicate he should press forward.

There is a delicate balance in a pursuit: it must stay within certain bounds, whose limits may shift over time. Knowing when to pursue, when to relent, and when to wait: these are the essences of the art of love. The pursuit requires a certain moral courage, for which the man will require a certain level of innate conviction.

An extended emotional gauntlet of pursuit is nature’s way of ensuring that only the most qualified contestants reach the finish line. Yet we cannot design flow-charts for the art of seduction; we cannot reduce its subtleties to neatly designed legal contracts, as some pathetic fools wish to do. As Seneca the Elder wisely noted (Controversiae. II.2.10):

> In love, establishing artificial boundaries is easier than actually making love. Will you be able to get lovers to observe limits as if they might be called to account? That they do nothing without excessive thought? Promise nothing except through written legal contracts, and weigh all their words with cold logic? This is how old, senile people love.

I doubt anyone has ever expressed it more artfully. The pursuit is a righteous one if the following conditions are present:

1. You truly believe that this is the right thing to do.

Passion derived from sincerity is nearly irresistible. A man must have a sense of inner conviction that what he is doing is right. He must genuinely feel a level of passion for her; if he does not, it will show. Women are extremely sensitive to false emotions.

The keys to her castle must be granted by persuasion both artful and sincere. Naked sincerity, unadorned with artifice, is querulous and tiresome; cloaked in art, it becomes divine. Unless you truly believe in your quest, you will be detected, and you will fail. Even a small bit of doubt–or a whiff of negativity, anger, or frustration–will doom your efforts. Remember that you are not entitled to anything.

Only the pure of heart should enter the arena, just as in the story from Greek mythology of the foot-race to win the hand of Atalanta. Readers may recall that Atalanta agreed to have only that man who could outrun her in a foot-race. Failure was punishable by death.

A clever youth named Hippomenes employed the ruse of using golden apples, supplied by the goddess Aphrodite, to outwit Atalanta and take her for himself. How ancient are the tricks and inducements of seduction, despite all sanctions and obstacles!

2. You are receiving signs and signals to advance

Here we must look primarily at women's actions. In our anecdote above, we note that even though Rodrigo was getting rebuffed constantly at the barzinho, Luisa was not asking him to stop touching her. She was not asking him to move away from her.

He was given the permission to proceed. Being attuned to these signals is one of the key functions of the pursuit. Although Seneca the Elder overstates his case when he says (Controv. II.7.6),

> Sex is close to a promise when, having been propositioned, she remains silent, he nevertheless in this epigram seeks to make the point that a man must be sensitive to the moods and actions of our expectant lovers.

Truly feminine women do not want to have to exhaust themselves explaining matters of the heart to men. They expect us, as men, to know how to behave as men. They do not want to coach a man through a seduction: that, they correctly believe, is the man's job. Nothing quenches the fires of desire more quickly in her heart than the perception that her man is obtuse in reading her signals.

3. You are sensitive to, and responsive to, her moods.

Remember that you are not entitled to anything. As men, we often forget just how different the woman's world is from ours. On a recent date, a girl chanced to show me as an amusement the avalanche of texts she had received from some recent Tinder matches. I was disgusted to see text after text of groveling obsequiousness, photos of genitalia, and inept attempts at conversation.

The point is that attractive women are constantly beset by clumsy approaches in one form or another; and out of necessity, they need to hone their filtration systems in order to ensure that only the best candidates receive carnal admission.

Some further guidance along these same lines has been found to be useful. We must constantly be mindful of the fact that the art of love is an art. There is little place in this sort of discussion for laundry-lists, bullet points, and obsessive analysis.

In ancient times, the Greek word palestra signified a training-ground for athletes or wrestlers. The game of love has its own palestra. And as in nearly everything else, there is no substitute for the palestra of actual worldly experience.

Never argue with her. Arguments are best reserved for married couples. In the dance of seduction, logic and reason assume a decidedly secondary importance. No woman was ever won over with appeals to logic. Arguments are a sign of weakness, of a lack of control of the situation, and must be avoided.

Be generous. Within reasonable limits, you must be willing to demonstrate some degree of generosity of spirit. In the anecdote above, Rodrigo made a point of telling Luisa that he would pay for her cab ride back to her residence in the morning. It may sound like a small detail, but the ability to overcome minor obstacles like this demonstrates to her that you are a man in control of the situation. You thereby engage her instinct to be protected and cared for.

Fortune is fickle. As we note in the anecdote, things can change on a dime. Just when you think all may be lost—as Rodrigo did—suddenly your luck can change. The reverse will also happen, with depressing frequency.

You must stay the course with patience and fortitude, no matter what the outcome. No matter the final result—victory or defeat—you must keep your composure, behave with philosophic dignity, and go on to fight another day. As Seneca the Elder says (Controv.

I.1.5), regarding the twisting turns of fate,

> Fate is fickle. Victors show their backs [i.e., flee] to the defeated, and Fortune abandons those whom it previously supported.

Nothing was ever accomplished without effort. There are no conquests without effort. Failure will be your constant companion. Salute him when necessary, and appreciate his constant imprecations; for without him we remain unrealized potential.

If the vagaries of chance and Fortune are not to your liking, and if the sting of failure unduly swells the tissues of your vanity, then you should not enter the palestra. The only protection from failure is never to try. As Seneca the Elder (Controv. I.8.16) says, quoting Diocles of Carystos:

> There is one safeguard against Fortune: not to make an attempt of it too often.

This is true, perhaps. But can we even call this life? I for one cannot. I prefer my victories, however sparse, to be attended by a phalanx of failures, that they may taste sweeter still.

Read More: 11 Fundamental Guidelines For Solid Game

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Spot An Angel Of Death In The Wild

January 5, 2015 | by John Hopson | Link | Original Link

A well-accepted idea in the manosphere is that the fewer men a woman has been with, the more likely she is to be a loyal partner. There are divorce statistics out there that support this theory but until you've actually encountered an "Alpha Widow" in the field, you may not fully understand just how damaged some women can become from just one experience with a man.

In fact, many women are devastated so thoroughly by their first "alpha" it can actually have terrible psychological effects on them. I will give a couple of in field examples from my life to illustrate a common form of psychosis women develop that I call "Angel of Death Syndrome" or "ADS" for short.

Angel of Death Syndrome

What is ADS? The basic breakdown of ADS is women attempting to play out a trauma in their lives and reverse the roles—in the original circumstance she played the victim role and her "alpha" played the role of heartbreaker, in all her future encounters with men she consciously plans to play the role of heartbreaker.

Women with ADS pride themselves in not being able to bond with men; they wear this as a badge of honor. The reason for this is two-fold:

1. By never moving past their devastating "event" they are able to perpetually play the role of victim, which is much easier than growing up and accepting life's difficulties.

2. By not bonding with other men they are able to remain faithful (emotionally) to their original “alpha,” which is a far better narrative in their minds than accepting any man they view as less than ideal.

The Fantasy

Women with ADS often concoct fantastical narratives in their minds that center around their victimhood. It is a form of extreme narcissism. These women truly view themselves as a beautiful angel who was wronged so severely by a man that all men must pay for the crime. I became aware of these fantasies through two real life encounters with ADS girls:

1. The out of town f buddy

I had a gig where I would travel out of town one weekend a month and met a gorgeous bartender. We had sex the first night and pretty much agreed to meet up for the next few months whenever I was in town. Things went well for a couple months after that, she even made a trip to my neck of the woods.

Although she grew more and more affectionate and sweet I kept my guard up. Finally I broke frame for an instant—I texted her first. The truth is, it was a conscious decision I made because I was growing fond of her and she seemed to be growing fond of me. She went silent on me and then the next time I was in town gave me the infamous “maybe”.

I moved on with my life. By chance we ended up running into each other a couple months later and had a brief conversation. I felt comfortable enough to ask her what flipped the switch in her brain? After all she had been so sweet and affectionate… Her response:

> I am like sweet cherry wine laced with poison, I taste so good but I’m only going to hurt you. It’s just what I do, I spend time with people for awhile and then fade away as a memory

Of course I didn’t let her say something so melodramatic without making fun of her but nonetheless it was chilling to know just how unstable this woman was and that I had been dealing with a sociopath the entire time.

2. The friend

I became friends with a woman (I know, not really friends) at work due to the fact we were the only mid-20s people in the office. I had no sexual interest in her and she had none in me.

I learned she had no interest in me because I found out all her “secrets.” This girl had a unique sexual fetish—she preferred to sleep with married men. She would actively pursue married men then do her best to get them to fall in love with her and then simply stop seeing them. Her favorite thing to talk about was how she could sleep with men, never develop feelings for them, and toss them aside. She was truly proud of her behavior.

How to recognize an ADS girl

1. Look for common signs of mental illness in women

This includes tattoos, drug abuse, alcohol abuse, eating disorders, and a strong stance against family. Both the women mentioned above had these issues to various degrees.

2. She will let you know she is a victim

At some point in your relationship with an ADS girl she will speak of her “alpha.” You will notice that she views herself as having two different lives; her life with her “alpha” and her life after him. In her before life, she likely wanted marriage and family.

3. Her “Alpha” was a loser

It sounds like a stereotype, but there is a reason the stereotype came about; if she talks about having had her heart broken by a loser then you are likely dealing with an ADS girl. The bartender’s “alpha” was an unemployed pill addict who lives with his mother. The friend’s “alpha” was an aspiring rapper who works part time in fast food.

4. She is over 25

If she is single and over 25 she is most likely damaged goods.

Conclusion

In the current culture ADS is spreading like wildfire, so watch out for the signs in a girl. These women are suitable for short-term sex only and are dangerously unstable.

It can be tempting to try to have a relationship with one of these girls due to the male protector and provider instinct, so learn to keep that in check—you are not dealing with anything worth protecting or providing for.

Read More: Why You Must Confront Your Own Coming Death (And How To Do It)

John Hopson
John is a ruggedly handsome introvert with a heart of gold. He was born the bastard child of a prostitute who abandoned him at age 3 to pursue an acting career in the big city. The acting career never really took off. He enjoys music, drugs, alcohol, sex, and solitude.

The Story Of The Great Axis Rebellion

January 5, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

"We will fight them on the beaches…" British Prime Minister Winston Churchill so dramatically declared on the 4th of June 1940, shortly after the Dunkirk Evacuation and days before the fall of France. It was, it seemed, a time of great peril, when Britain stood alone against the monstrous tyranny of Nazi Germany.

Few myths are more enduring than those forged in conflict. Stories of the Trojan War, of the three hundred Spartans, of Genghis Khan and Waterloo and Trafalgar—these are some of the most enduring tales in our culture. Looking at them with a closer eye however, the reputation of these events tends to far exceed the reality.

There were, for instance, not just three hundred Spartans guarding the pass at Thermopylae. Initially there were some 20,000 Greek warriors. After being outflanked by the Persians the "three hundred" were among those who remained as a rearguard—though even they were accompanied by some seven hundred Thespians and four hundred Thebans. Modern estimates put the strength of the Persian army at between 70,000 and 300,000 men, rather than a million.

World War Two has long been depicted with a similar narrative—as a desperate, noble struggle waged against seemingly hopeless odds, fighting a tyranny the likes of which the world had never seen.

It seems it is time however, with the Greatest Generation all but gone, to start setting the record straight.

The Myth of Axis Supremacy

At its heart, the Second World War was a rebellion by the world's second generation industrial powers—primarily Germany, Italy and Japan, against its already established ones—among them Britain, France, the United States and (with a few caveats) Russia.

Ever since Columbus sailed to the Americas the Great Powers of Europe had been busily sending off expeditions to explore, conquer, pillage and rule every inch of the world they could reach. Over a four hundred year period from 1492 to 1914 some three-quarters of humanity either bowed down before the Europeans, or were annihilated for their refusal.

The native peoples of the Americas and Australia were largely wiped out in the process of their lands being colonized while countless ancient states across Africa, the Middle East, and Asia were gradually brought under heel. Sixty million people died of famines during British rule in India. Millions of Congolese died or had their limbs chopped off working on Belgian rubber plantations. Tens of thousands died digging canals through Panama and the Suez.

By the late 19th century nationalism was a growing movement. In a relatively short period many smaller states unified into a few larger ones. It is no coincidence that Germany, Italy, and Japan were among the most prominent examples.

The First World War is an important chapter here. One may label it an abortive attempt to throw off the stranglehold of the Allied powers. Stalemated on land and blockaded by sea however, Germany eventually lost the war. The few colonies it had gained overseas in the last half century were confiscated by the victors. Its borders were considerably reduced, its national pride forsaken and its economy artificially crippled.

World War Two was a second attempt, though this time formed of a broader coalition including Italy (having gained little in the Versailles Treaty) and Japan (which sought to carve out its own empire in the far east).

While the Axis was able to win a string of stunning victories from 1939-42, this was more due to Allied incompetence and complacency than anything else. Even the casual student of history may wonder at how brief the Second World War was. A conflict that killed some 70-80 million people was over in just eight years (dating it from the Japanese invasion of China in 1937 – as one should).

Most empires take centuries to rise and fall. Once the Allies began truly mobilizing for war however, the tide quickly turned. Despite their tenacity the Axis powers only managed to survive a few short years before succumbing to the overwhelming might of the Allies.

The numbers really speak for themselves. Germany, Italy and Japan, plus their allies, had a population in 1940 of around 250 million. Over the course of the war they were able to call up some thirty million personnel to fight.

The Allies meanwhile, were able to call upon some eighty million soldiers in total. The lion's share of this came from the Soviet Union, the United States, China and the British Empire.

Looking at the military production figures, one begins to appreciate the sheer scale of World War Two. In total the Allies produced over 600,000 aircraft, 250,000 tanks, 50,000 ships and a million artillery guns, vastly higher than all comparable Axis figures. They produced twice as much coal and iron ore and over fifteen times as much oil.

This disparity is no accident – the fact that the Allies already possessed these resources is the main reason the war was fought in the first place.

Perhaps the most telling imbalance of all was in sea power. The Allied navies—long their method of controlling the world's sea lanes—consisted of over 800 major vessels on the outbreak of war. Between them the British, American and French possessed 37 battleships, 12 carriers, 122 cruisers, 433 destroyers and 255 submarines—hardly the armada of a peace-loving coalition. Axis naval strength was only ever a fraction as great, and steadily eroded as the war went on.

When war broke out, Britain began marshaling the full resources of its empire to crush the Axis rebellion. India alone supplied some two and a half million troops, its African colonies over a million and Canada, Australia, and New Zealand some two million more. This is in addition to the nearly seven million men Britain itself supplied, among others.

Oh poor, besieged Britain—able to marshal only fourteen million men to oppose Nazi tyranny!

Pictured: Britain stands "alone"

Allied Dissent Ignored by History

This mobilization did not occur without resistance across the empire, particularly in India. Tens of thousands of Indian leaders (Mohandas Gandhi among them) were locked up by the British for opposing the war. Especially following the Japanese advance into Southeast Asia in 1942, the British feared armed insurrection. Indeed, at least 40,000 Indians—mostly captured prisoners of war—took up arms to fight the Allies in Burma and elsewhere, a chapter of history largely ignored in the west.

The worst atrocity of all occurred in India as well. The strain of war soon weighed heavily on the sub-continent. In Bengal Province (centered on modern-day Bangladesh) famine had set in by 1943. War conditions and the indifference of the British authorities contributed to up to 4 million people starving over the next year.

This disaster is similar in scale to the holocaust or the holodomor, yet few people in the west have heard of it. Hitler and Stalin are widely condemned as tyrants and mass-murderers, but Churchill gets off the hook completely for similar brutality.

The Allies also undertook occupations of neutral nations such as Iceland and Iran. These can be viewed along similar lines as the German invasion of Norway in 1940, which was also pre-emptive in nature.

In 1941, as Axis forces advanced through North Africa, Arab forces rose up in revolt against the British—a dramatic reversal of the Lawrence of Arabia-style heroics of a generation earlier. This forced the British to redeploy considerable forces to their rear to crush this latest in a long string of rebellions.

Similarly, when Japanese forces began their lightning advance across the Pacific in 1941, they often met cooperation in the forming of their "Co-Prosperity Sphere." After all, they were not taking Vietnam off the Vietnamese, Malaysia off the Malaysians, Indonesia off the Indonesians or the Philippines off the Filipinos—they were stealing them off the French, British, Dutch, and Americans respectively.

Thailand had old scores to settle with the British and French, while thousands of Burmese welcomed the Japanese as liberators when they marched into Rangoon. European administrations quickly collapsed in the face of the most determined Asiatic resistance in four centuries of Imperial rule.

In the largest example of all, more than a million Soviets ended up defecting to the Wehrmacht to fight against the Red Army. This included Cossacks, Turkmen, Uzbeks, Kazakhs, Azerbaijanis and anti-communists of all kinds.

In Conclusion

We should now see the actions of the Axis nations for what they were—a desperate gamble to overthrow the stranglehold the Allies held on the global economy before they were utterly crushed.

Upon kicking the Axis out, the Allies busily set about re-subjugating the colonies they had lost. Some 200,000 Indonesians died in that country's revolution against the Dutch from 1945-49. Algeria fought a bloody, decade-long war of independence against the French in which at least 150,000 died.

The British spent most of the 1950s fighting local insurgent movements in locations as far afield as Kenya, Cyprus and Malaya. This same course of events dragged on for a whole generation in Vietnam, with some five million dead.

All this is not to say the Axis powers weren't generally the "bad guys" of the war. Any holocaust deniers out there—you are still scum. Nor is it to say the Axis had no chance of winning the war in the first place. I also mean no offense to the men and women who fought against them, which include at least three of my ancestors.

It is merely to point out that the Allies were hardly the innocent victims western historians like to portray them as, and that they massively outclassed the Axis in nearly every way at every point in the war.

Hitler, Mussolini, and Tojo were unsuccessful rebels against the international order, and for that reason they are cursed by history. This is why we've all seen "Schindler's List" and "The Bridge on the River Kwai" but probably none of us have seen a movie about the Indian Mutiny, the Belgian Congo or any of a hundred other colonial horrors.

It is also a separate argument entirely whether the world would be a better place now if the Axis had won, though given the later horrors of Communism and the gradual degeneration of western culture, this seems an open question.

Even "the good war" was hardly a noble fight between freedom and tyranny, but more a jostling of rival empires. Contrary to every Hollywood movie you've ever seen, the line between "good guys" and "bad guys" was actually surprisingly blurred.

It is time to stop pretending otherwise.

Read More: The Humiliation Of A Great Empire

Thomas Hobbes

Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

6 Steps To Dating A Girl With Borderline Personality Disorder

January 6, 2015 | by Christian Bateman | Link | Original Link

There have been a number of excellent articles written here about girls who suffer from personality disorders (like BPD). The general consensus seems to be “run like hell” and while I agree wholeheartedly with this advice, in actuality, most guys will fail to heed the warnings of more experienced men.

I’ve always been extremely passionate about helping guys handle their breakup challenges. Many times, it’s apparent that their ex is a bit on the crazy side and would make the guy’s life a living hell if he got her back. But whenever I voiced my concerns they would simply say, “Yeah, you’re probably right but I don’t care. What’s my next step?” I learned that when a man is dead-set on making his situation work, there’s almost nothing you can do to talk him out of it.

So this article is for the guys out there whose masochistic tendencies run deep and are ready for a world of pain. Dating borderline women is like playing the game of thrones with one exception: winning isn’t an option. When you play this game you either lose… or you die. So good luck!

What’s your strategy?

Borderline girls typically end up with two types of men: needy tools (who they destroy) and guys with real Dark Triad traits who truly don’t give a shit. Avoiding deep emotional investment is the only way to stay in the game and not get crushed but it’s much easier said than done, especially if you’re not a sociopath.

The good news: if you can maintain your frame, you'll render the competition irrelevant and the girl will be absolutely addicted to you. The bad news: she'll still be in your life and you'll have to deal with her craziness on a near-daily basis.

So here's the tricky part: if you're too much of an aloof asshole, she'll be unable to trust you and her crazy behavior will just get worse. But if you're too nice and understanding, she'll lose her respect and attraction for you. You need to be somewhere in the middle.

The way I play it is to always come from the heart, no matter how aggravated I get. Strive to come from a place of care and concern while also having no attachment to the outcome since the sad reality is they truly can't help their behavior. I understand this sounds like you're giving them a free pass, but they have a very difficult time understanding that, they alone, are responsible for their misery.

Most just can't accept this and the ones who have this awareness typically hate themselves because they're unable to stop their bullshit (as much as they'd like to).

Yeah, but the sex is incredible

So whenever you feel the rage building up inside, realize that you would have most likely turned out the same way had you also been abused by your caretakers. Who she is today is a result of her shitty childhood and this standpoint will make it easier to have concern for her well-being, regardless of the crap you she puts you through.

Now, no matter how tight your game, you're going to be forever locked into a never-ending frame battle. She'll be constantly shit-testing you for the duration of your relationship and it won't be pleasant. That being said, seeing her as a scared little girl who's deathly afraid of being hurt or abandoned can help you keep your bearings straight and ride it out.

If she truly didn't care about you, you wouldn't be the recipient of all her bullshit so she definitely cares to some degree. Unfortunately, she equates romantic love with drama and pain and will do her best to create this for herself, with or without your help. Just do your best to stay on point and don't take her crap personally. If your mindset is, "I need to break this bitch and win the game" then, no matter how many mini-battles you win, you still won't make much headway.

How to interact with them when they're behaving

Let me point out that you need to have two different sets of tactics: interacting with her when she's acting "normal" and dealing with her bat-shit crazy mode. You'll need two distinct strategies because you're essentially dealing with two different girls. Because of space constraints, this article will only cover what to do when things are on an upswing.

1. Apply standard game tactics

Give them lots of fun, good feelings, and a range of emotions. Be dominant, limit your availability, be a bit difficult, etc. The problem most guys run into is that these behaviors are easy to perform in the initial stages of dating but, once a guy gets attached, he lets his good habits fall to the wayside. You'll need to stay sharp for the duration of the relationship. No exceptions.

2. Intermittently reinforce their flirting attempts

Sometimes you have to respond to their flirting and physical affection with some of your own, and other times you have to act unaffected and disinterested (there shouldn't be a discernible pattern). Remember, that if you were with a normal girl, sometimes you'd be in the mood for her affection (and for sex) and sometimes you wouldn't.

You want to mimic this with your borderline girl even when you're starved for attention and sex (they're notorious for withdrawing their attention and turning cold for days at the drop of a hat).

3. Go easy with the affection

Be careful with dishing out too much affection (hugs, hand-holding, etc). Sometimes they'll crave it and other times they'll be repulsed by it (depending on which part of their personality is taking center stage). As a general rule, refrain from physical affection until they're showing signs of receptivity.

In other words, let the cat crawl into your lap before you start petting it. Note: This strategy works well in any relationship, regardless of the girl's personality type.

I know a lot of you are rolling your eyes like, "yeah, yeah, I know all this already" but in actuality, guys desire love and affection just like women do and most guys will try to give it to get it, especially when their girl has gone cold. While this can work with the average girl, it's a poor strategy for a BPD and comes off (to her) like you're trying to manipulate her into giving you affection in return. Better to wait for her to be affectionate on her own time.

4. Expect a crash to happen

Yes, I know they've been a little angel for the last six weeks but expect a crash to happen any day now. Don't let yourself get addicted to their good side.

5. Give them good (and frequent) sex

I'm not entirely sure you can bang the crazy out of them, but frequent orgasms and the satiety of their sexual desires will be the best therapy you can give them. However, not all BPD's are the same. Some will readily submit to you inside and outside the bedroom and others will refuse to let you take the lead initially.

The ones that identify themselves as "independent" will be the most difficult to deal with but if you stay solid, she will eventually open up to you and be comfortable giving up the lead. Just realize it can be a long process which won't be worth all the effort you'll have to put in.

6. Give up the desire to “fix” them

Don’t try to be their therapist. You can offer them emotional support without being a girlfriend by listening and responding to their frustrations with, “Damn that must be tough. But I have faith that you’ll figure it out. You always do.” Don’t give them advice or tell them they’re handling a situation improperly.

Also, don’t push them to get therapy. On one hand, most will be deeply offended you suggested such a thing and on the other, therapy is rarely effective for borderlines. One of my psychiatrist friends once told me, “There’s not much you can do for these girls other than just wait it out. They almost always grow out of it eventually, although usually not until they hit their 50’s. Until then, you’re pretty much fucked.” Thanks, doc!

This should be enough to get you moving in the right direction (I’ll cover additional strategies in future articles). In the meantime, please realize that life is far too short to waste time on damaged women who refuse to seek out help for themselves.

If you're already in too deep, then hopefully this info will help you get some power back until you're ready to walk for good. And when that day comes, run as fast as you can because she'll be right behind you… most likely holding an axe.

Read More: Don't Date Girls With Borderline Personality Disorder

Christian Bateman
Wealthy, arrogant and materialistic. I merge and acquire.

Analyzing The 5 Main Alpha Archetypes

January 6, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Over the years the red pill community has coined many terms that have become regular jargon amongst its purveyors and beneficiaries. We've got a language all our own. Though the blue pill masses are largely ignorant to pervasive red pill vernacular such as the wall, cock carousel, and hypergamy, it seems these concepts are slowly (albeit reluctantly) beginning to make their way into the mainstream. The most ubiquitous lingo of all, however, is the word "alpha."

The goal of reaching the oft-opined alpha status is the root of all things manosphere. It is the basis upon which most ideas in this sector originate. This is a term that most people, plugged and unplugged, are familiar with but few actually have a clear cut definition for it because of the broad subjectivity it's privy to.

Women are unable to describe it. They can definitely feel it in their southern regions when their radars pick up the signal but they are utterly incapable of putting into words what they know an alpha to be. Men, on the other hand, have many different definitions because there are many different types.

The human element is the reason for this diversity. We bounce opposing schools of thought off each other in an attempt to narrow down the definition which can cause discussions to become convoluted. This is perfectly fine because men generally try to learn from each other while immersed in discussions with multiple interpretations and points of view. In the end everyone usually comes out with a bit more dimension in the way of their own thoughts and opinions on the matter.

I'm not going to attempt to dive into the psychological elements of an alpha because quite frankly, I'm just not smart enough for that level of mental gymnastics. However, I will concentrate my efforts on the different breeds of alphas and try to paint a clearer picture on their lifestyles, motivations, and overall satisfaction with who and what they are.

I will grade each alpha using these metrics…

PUA game level: Approaching, text game, shit test efficiency, social skills, escalation, closing percentage, et al.

Natural game level: How their lifestyle and persona naturally attracts men and women.

Frame: Composure in the face of unrest.

Congruency: Who they really are behind closed doors.

Overall Satisfaction: Their genuine contentment as a man.

…on this scale.

1-Little to non-existent

2-Poor

3-Fair

4-Good

5-Excellent

So now that we have our parameters in place, let's get to it.

The Player

Summary: Also known as a pickup artist or "PUA," the Player has mastered the art of bedding women. He tirelessly studies all of the state of the art pickup techniques to maximize his sexual encounters in the toxic sexual landscape that exists in the western hemisphere. The Player draws the most ire from white knights and their fem-fat sisters because of his ability to accumulate notches without much monetary or emotional investment.

His reputation is well-deserved, as he is able to swat away shit tests quickly and efficiently, moisten a girl's panties with a few well-timed texts, and effortlessly escalate the interaction toward sex with a brilliant mix of kino and charm.

His notch count is higher than most alphas, but only because pussy is his main goal in life. He understands that sex is a numbers game so he approaches day and night in any venue at any time to keep his pipeline full. He also takes full advantage the easy lays available on dating and hookup sites to minimize dry spells. His carefully crafted profile and razor sharp text game sets 'em up and his superhero level seduction skill knocks 'em down. Simply put, he's a stone cold assassin and never feels remorse for taking down a mark.

The Player always makes damn sure he's on the cutting edge of the ever-changing hook up scene and devotes most of his time to perfecting his technique. His mission in life is to tag as much tail as he can before his dick shrivels up, and even then he'll be hitting on the orderlies in his nursing home until he kicks the bucket.

PUA Game Level: 5

The Player is a professional pussy pirate who plunders his way to massive amounts of booty (pun intended). His PUA game is air-tight, which translates to plenty of lays.

Natural Game: 3.5

While his confidence and charisma gets him plenty of action with the ladies and draws the adoration of men, being around someone who lives for pussy and talks about it constantly, while fun and educational, can grow tiresome. Being one dimensional in this manner can wear thin on both sexes.

Frame: 3

Players can maintain frame within the bounds of a set but aren't usually as stoic when confronted with real world strife. Staying cool during a pickup is one thing—keeping your wits about you in volatile situations not involving the acquisition of poon is quite another.

Congruency: 3

His solid game certainly makes him look like an alpha within the context of a one night stand or a hookup but no one knows who the hell he really is when the lights come back on…sometimes neither does he.

Overall contentment: 3.5

Online PUAs preach outcome independence from set to set which is great advice. But when Players hit a slump (which is inevitable) their self worth takes a sharp dive which ultimately leads to lowering their standards. They often resort to banging fatties from time to time to shake themselves free of sexual stagnation and get back in the saddle (which doesn't do their self esteem any favors).

This is the main consequence of making pussy their sole source of validation in their lives. His morale is only high as long as he's slaying sluts on the regular.

The Hobbyist

Summary: The Hobbyist is a man who, by default, doesn't put pussy on a pedestal because that pedestal is already occupied by his obsession to master his chosen craft. He has little time for watching sports, playing video games, or mindless social media scouring because he enjoys doing things that require him to get off his ass and out of the house.

He regularly engages in hobbies such as hunting, building, working on cars, practicing a martial art or anything else that requires physical exertion, dedication, and attention to detail.

Because his schtick often requires long periods of isolation and seldom involves interaction with the opposite sex on a social or interpersonal level, pickup game is not his strong suit. However, women are naturally drawn to men who are deeply involved in masculine activities. This is what gets the Hobbyist more than his share of female attention. And because he devotes more time to his passion than he does pandering to them they tend to stick around for a while.

Like any other man, he loves women and the sexual benefits they offer him. But if given the choice between engaging in coitus and finishing the paint job on that '67 Mustang he's restoring, he's going to choose the latter more often than not. This is exactly what keeps his women hot for him.

PUA game level: 2.5

The Hobbyist possesses a minimal working knowledge of certain tenets of basic game so he’s not completely ignorant when it comes to dealing with girls. But he doesn’t overly concern himself with things like text game or how to deal with shit tests because he just doesn’t have the time. Most of his time is spent cleaning his guns or making sure his camping gear is in tip top shape for his next outdoor excursion.

Natural game: 4

As stated above women love being in the presence of rugged men who spend little time on their couches. The fact that he often chooses his hobby over her works as a natural shit test repellant making her all the more clingy. Further, men who share these hobbies have a way of finding each other so the Hobbyist has no trouble attracting both men and women into his world.

Frame: 4.5

Getting out of the house on a regular basis will physically and mentally test a man in many different ways. Surviving and ultimately thriving in these situations will temper him like steel resulting in near unshakable poise.

Congruency: 5

You can’t fake the funk in this neck of the woods as posers and wannabes are quickly exposed and discarded. The Hobbyist is the genuine article and his audience has no bearing on who he is.

Overall satisfaction: 4.5

The Hobbyist is very satisfied with his life. His morale is always high because women take a backseat to the adventure he seeks. He knows that a little more game would give him a bump in SMV and he would certainly like to have more but it’s not a priority. Game is more of a luxury than a necessity as far as he’s concerned and that’s fine with him.

The Asshole

Summary: Often referred to as a “douchebag” or a “meat head,” the asshole is brash, selfish, and is one cocky son of a bitch. He’s a ball buster extraordinaire and never hesitates to loudly call girls out on their bullshit as soon as he sniffs it out. His jerkboy game relies heavily on negging, teasing, and AMOGing, all of which are highly effective. He scores pussy at a high rate because as we all know, chicks can’t get enough of these guys.

Though the asshole doesn’t live for pussy to the degree the Player does, the disparity isn’t wide. If he sees a girl he wants he’ll walk right up and strike up conversation with her and will make no bones about what he’s angling for. His abundance mentality has made him immune to rejection. Blowouts don’t faze him in the least because after all, “There’s always other bitches out there, bro!”

PUA game level: 4

This guy runs asshole game to perfection. Plus his non-existent approach anxiety gives him more swings at the piñata, which gives him a substantial advantage. When girls sense he doesn’t give a shit one way or the other they drop their panties almost involuntarily.

Natural game level: 3

The Asshole can very difficult to be around at times. Men give each other shit as a matter of habit but this guy often doesn’t know when to turn it off. He’s also notoriously hot-tempered which can bring about unwanted trouble.

Frame: 2

A man who lets his emotions get the better of him is a man who has some growing up to do.

Congruency: 4.5

This dude is the same around men and women alike. Similar to the Hobbyist, his audience rarely affects his behavior.

Overall satisfaction: 4

The Asshole is pretty happy with who he is and if you don't believe me just ask him. Though his impetuous personality can alienate himself from men outside of his inner circle (which he gives exactly zero fucks about), his act is a sure-fire vagina vacuum. And as long as girls continue to reward his cocksure attitude he's not changing for anybody, nor should he.

The Conqueror

Summary: One word describes the Conqueror's purpose in life: victory. This alpha loves the thrill of overcoming challenges no matter what they are. Whether it's hiking the Appalachian Trail, acquiring a shit business and transforming it into a cash cow, or training a Level 3 Schutzhund German Shepherd, if it's a mountain he has to climb it.

Slaying dragons is what this man lives for and that gives him time for little else. His lifestyle reflects his unflappable focus. His daily routine completely revolves around whatever his obsession is at the time. The moment he captures that flag he's onto the next conquest because each triumph only feeds his insatiable desire to bring more Goliaths to their knees. He is fiercely competitive and his binary definition of life (winning and losing) is the fuel that powers his drive.

PUA Game level: 1

The Conqueror has better shit to do than play silly little texting games or tolerate the bratty behavior of a woman for sex. "PUA" game is something he has neither the time nor desire to learn. On the flipside, he's likely to laugh at a shit test mistaking it for a joke which, ironically, is pretty solid game whether he realizes it or not.

Natural Game: 5

Scoring victories in life on a consistent basis requires many different traits. A high social aptitude is one of the most important. The Conqueror's ability to be socially dominant in any situation commands the respect of men whilst generating seismic tingles beneath the undergarments of female onlookers. His natural game is far more effective than any pickup game out there.

Frame: 5

A man has who's got a few hard-fought victories under his belt has no doubt experienced much adversity on his path to triumph. He has learned that keeping a level head is paramount to navigating his way through catastrophe. These battles have forged him into an immovable object, making him impossible to rattle.

Congruency: 5

His mission permeates every aspect of his life making his public and private demeanor symmetrical.

Overall satisfaction: 3

For all of his successful conquests the Conqueror is never fully satisfied with his life. He always wants more. He will briefly celebrate his victories and enjoy the fruits of his labor on occasion, but he knows that complacency leads to mediocrity. In order to keep his edge he must exist in a constant state of malcontent.

The Alpha Provider

Summary: If ever there was a male version of a unicorn, the Alpha Provider is it. For he is the one man able to fulfill both sides of a woman's dualistic imperative, which is a near impossible task in this day and age.

He brings home enough bacon to provide his woman the kind of lifestyle that gives her validation and comfort, as well as providing for their offspring. Keeping himself in optimal physical condition assures his woman of good, masculine genes making her willing to bear as many of his children as he wishes.

The fabled Alpha Provider is the captain of his ship and has the genuine respect and adoration of both his woman and his children. He does not tolerate foolishness in his household and is quick to punish such shenanigans. But he is equally bountiful whereas he rewards his woman for the nurturing of his brood, her sexual loyalty, and the upkeep of his domicile and property. Though it took him quite a while, his patience and red pill wisdom allowed him to successfully find a woman worthy to be his first mate.

A man such as this is the object of every female's desire and they seldom hide it, often openly flirting with him even in the presence of his woman. This is precisely what keeps her motivated to stay fit and feminine while keeping him sexually satiated and his domain in pristine condition.

PUA Game Level: 1

His pickup muscles have atrophied as a result of his current state and the fact that women throw themselves at him on a regular basis as a result of his…

Natural Game: 5

A true alpha exudes all of the physical and mental traits that make him attractive company to either sex.

Frame: 4.5

The one thing keeping him from a 5 is his children. Every man has permission to lose his shit should harm befall one of his children. Other than that he keeps his faculties under complete control.

Congruency: 5

A man who is able to build and lead a strong nuclear family in today's world is incapable of being a beta boy outside the confines of his castle. He is an Alpha Male through and through regardless of his environment.

Overall satisfaction: 5

Having reached the pinnacle of alphadom, the Alpha Provider has all that he naturally desires (not needs) out of life: A dutiful woman happy and willing to embrace traditional sex roles, children to pass on his legacy, enough money for the upkeep of his investment, and the satisfaction that comes with accomplishing this increasingly difficult feat. A man like this truly has it all.

Takeaway

I'm sure this article leaves much for debate and, as always, I strongly encourage readers to voice their opinions and input. But no matter what you agree or disagree with one cannot deny the one trait every one of these alphas in common: They do what they want, how and when they want, and without apology. They are unafraid to be who they are and take what they know to be rightfully theirs be it money, women, accomplishment or anything else that elevates their lives as men.

We all have a little of every alpha type in us. Personally, I have a strong dose of Hobbyist with a dash of Player and Asshole if the situation calls for it. I'll also readily admit that that I'd love to be the Alpha Provider and I'd bet my Jeep that better than 9 out of 10 men here would too if the opportunity presented itself.

The truth is, we are all hard-wired to want a wife and kids and I'm willing to concede that even though this country's women have jaded me to the point where I've all but given up on that dream, my hard drive hasn't been wiped of its original programming and men who are honest with themselves would agree.

So which Alpha(s) are you?

Read Next: Alpha Is Anything

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Bodybuilding Alternatives To The Deadlift

January 6, 2015 | by Kalos Kagathos | Link | Original Link

When I say deadlift, I'm specifically referring to the conventional deadlift, sumo deadlift, Romanian deadlift, and rack pulls. While there is such a thing as stiff-legged deadlifts, I don't classify them in the same category since they do not require nearly as much weight, they can effectively be used to isolate the lower back, and they do not require the weight to be lifted from the floor (technically they're not "deadlifts").

I'll admit that when I used to deadlift, it was one of my favorite lifts. I'll also add that if you can deadlift, then you should consider incorporating it into your routine—it truly is a singular lift in the scope of potential benefits.

The problem is that not everyone can deadlift, so where does that leave us?

I often hear deadlift enthusiasts say things like, "you need to deadlift." I'll interject some reason here and say that no lift in particular is required in order to build a large and aesthetic physique; free-weights are tremendously flexible and the manner in which you manipulate their use is entirely up to you.

I know that there are many similar people out there, so I'll relate exactly why it is that I do not deadlift, then I'll discuss effective replacements for the deadlift.

Why I Do Not Deadlift

While deadlifting, I would inevitably feel some pain in my left rhomboid. After some time the pain became unbearable, then persistent. So, I stopped deadlifting until the injury healed.

By the time that I had healed I had also doubled-down on my desire to continue deadlifting, so I made sure to try a number of different set-ups and tweaks to my form, but all was for naught when the exact same pain resurfaced (even with lighter weights).

In the end, I tossed away the deadlift. My training routine was pretty basic, so you won't be surprised to hear that the rate of my development suffered quite a bit.

I determined that I needed to find some alternatives that—when compounded—would amount to something like deadlifting. By pinpointing exactly what I hoped to get out of the deadlift, I was able to explore other lifts that could seamlessly be integrated into my legs and back routine.

If you currently do not deadlift for similar reasons, then I recommend trying out these four lifts, which I have relied upon in lieu of the deadlift.

1. Jefferson Squats

What you will be focusing on with this lift is mostly your glutes. In addition, you should be thinking about your hams, abductors, and adductors (you will hit your inner and outer quads regardless). This is an awkward lift to look at and perform, so if you are unfamiliar with it, then bear with me.

Straddle the bar with your feet in a “V” position (roughly 90 degrees) at about the second groove back. Make sure that one foot is pointed towards the plate while the other is oriented more obliquely. Take one step with each foot—not a giant step, more of a flopping step that places your feet just outside of your shoulders. You should be able to squat down over the bar, grab it with a reverse grip (check out Kai Greene’s form above) and then press upwards.

The keys: switch your hand and foot positioning form set-to-set, flex the glutes from the bottom to the top with an extra-hard squeeze at the top, don’t let your knees buckle inwards or shoot outwards, stay as upright as possible with chest poked out, try to hit parallel.

It will take some time to figure out this lift, but it’s well worth the effort.

2. Barbell Hack Squats

These are used for overall quad development and they work the traps as a bonus.

Keep your feet close together (just inside shoulder width) and hands just outside of your feet. The bar tends to drag against the back of your legs much like a bar might drag against your front during a deadlift. Give your quads an extra squeeze at the top.

The tricky part, in my opinion, is raising and lowering the bar without rounding your back. That will take some practice, but in time you will learn to shoot your hips out-and-in with the bending and straightening of your knees so that you can maintain the arch in your back.

You can see why these are sometimes referred to as “reverse deadlifts.” Use a few mirrors for a better understanding of how you may be endangering yourself during this lift and also to keep tabs on your form.

3. Stiff-Legged Deadlifts

These are often used for lower back, hams, and glutes, but we’re not going to worry about the hams or glutes in this case—think only of your lower back. Concentrate so that you feel the stretch in your hams, but use light enough weight so that you don’t need to recruit them or your glutes on the concentric. To some degree they are necessarily involved in the movement, but they can be effectively marginalized so that their involvement is negligible.

Use a mirror or your own awareness to confirm that you are not squeezing your hams or glutes on the concentric. Try to feel the contraction exclusively in your lower back; squeeze it during the positive portion of the lift and give an extra squeeze at the top instead of resting.

Take it slowly—you will see for yourself how precarious this lift is once you perform it for the first time. With a few mirrors and some muscle control, you can use this lift to isolate your lower back.

Maintain the arch in your back at all times. If you're rounding your back, then you are probably lowering the bar too far or neglecting to shoot your butt back as you lower the weights. Let the stretch in your hams dictate how far you can actually lower the bar. Keep your legs as straight as possible.

I prefer to use dumbbells instead of a barbell. I like the way that they hang in my hands and don't interfere with the motion. It's up to you to decide which is most comfortable and produces the desired effect.

When manipulated to focus almost exclusively on the lower back, these tend to resemble two alternatives: hyperextensions and "good mornings." Personally, I do not like the way that these alternatives feel when heavier weights are used; consequently I get a better contraction by manipulating SLDs in the manner I've described. If you feel otherwise, then try out these alternatives.

I recommend practicing at home in front of a mirror with your bodyweight in order to get a better sense for the type of contraction that you will be aiming for with SLDs. You should be able to feel an intense contraction in your lower back during the concentric (even with bodyweight if you're taking your time and controlling the contraction). If your butt is squeezing, then don't count the rep and renew your focus.

4. Bent Over Rows

These aren't Yates rows or Pendlay rows. They're not Yates rows because your back is basically parallel to the ground rather than at a 45-degree angle. They're not Pendlay rows, since you should not be dropping the weights all the way to the ground. These are good ol' fashioned bent over rows.

Use a wider, pronated grip for these (I place my pinkies at the second grooves). Get a full stretch on the negative, then bring the bar to the lower chest and upper abs.

Bent over rows work a good portion of your back including the teres, rhomboids, rear delts, traps and lats with more of an emphasis on the upper back than Yates rows.

Since you will be supporting the weight with your lower back and lowering the bar under control rather than dropping it as you might during Pendlay rows, these will actually work your lower back quite hard through isometric contraction.

These are a very important part of my lower back training; you may be surprised by the amount of strain that is placed on the erector spinae. Since I'm extra cautious when it comes to my lower back, I perform these on separate days than I perform my SLDs (rows are for back day; I do my SLDs on leg day as a hangover from when I used to incorporate glutes and hams).

Trapezius Bonus Lift:

Already perform conventional shrugs? Try incline dumbbell shrugs in addition.

Execution: after a full stretch, rather than "shoulders-to-ears," bring your shoulder blades together while face-down on an incline bench (these may change the way that you think of middle back training).

Conclusion

Deadlifts may be optimal, but they're not necessary. In bodybuilding it's mass, symmetry, and aesthetics that are the goal. The means of achieving your goal are strictly up to you.

If you don't deadlift, can't deadlift, or won't deadlift, then try these lifts instead—you may be surprised by the results.

Read More: A Beginner's Guide To Breaking Bodybuilding Plateaus

Kalos Kagathos

Kalos is an amateur Classicist with a penchant for bodybuilding

Angry Mob Wants Footballer Ched Evans Blacklisted For A Crime He May Not Have Committed

January 6, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Ched Evans, a Welsh football (soccer) player, was convicted of rape almost two years ago. In reality, it appears to have been drunken consensual sex, but he was convicted and served his time anyway. He has recently been let out of prison on probation and is seeking to play football again. Liberals are protesting hard about it, much as they did with Michael Vick in America. Evans has a detailed website devoted to explaining his innocence.

Interestingly, it is illegal in the United Kingdom to even name the plaintiff in a rape case in the media, although the defendant is fair game to slander. The notion of being too drunk to consent is also apparently a valid claim in the UK, as that actually was the claim the prosecution was making in the original case, although other cases have set precedent that drunken consent is valid consent.

It appears that British courts are in flux over this issue. Evans maintains his innocence. Oddly, there was a second football player there with Evans and the girl, but he was acquitted.

Protesting On The Internet

Today Evans is seeking admission into a new football club. Rumors circulate that he is being signed to Oldham Athletic or is training with Sheffield United. Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) have taken to the internet in storm to write articles, tweet in bad grammar, and type their names into petitions to make sure Evans is no longer able to earn an honest living.

Evans has complete legal right to play again, and the chief executive of the Professional Footballers' Association has maintained this, even though the PFA' s rules forbid Evans from being the director of a football club.

Leftists have left no stone unturned in the public lynching. The Guardian complained that the footballers referred to the girl as a "bird," as though that's degrading towards women. "Perhaps Evans is a misogynist who sexually objectifies women," thinks the casual reader. As always, the primary point of rhetoric of the leftist is "Think of how the women and minorities feel!"

Rapid Fire Round: ROK Debates The Mainstream Media

Obviously I'm of the opinion that 1) Evans made a poor decision, but it wasn't a rape, and 2) If someone serves their time, then they should be allowed to resume their place in society (with some exceptions, obviously, but that's beyond the scope of this article).

The Independent has done us the favor of making a handy rebuttal guide for leftist usage, since many think he should be allowed to play. I accept their challenge and will counter each of their points. Game on.

> Ched has served his time – Well actually, he hasn't. Evans has been released under licence, but his sentence isn't finished yet, it's only the custodial aspect that is over. He could return to prison at any time if he breaches his probation conditions. He's not allowed to go abroad, for example. He is far from being a 'free man'.

Right, but those probation terms say nothing about playing football. The emphatic phrase there is "if he breaches his probation conditions." The notion of probation is that one is allowed to return to society. It's a compromise solution between prison and regular life.

Furthermore, if he isn't allowed to play football, then what job should he be allowed to hold? Is ditch-digger kosher but investment banker forbidden? And if I discover that I don't like the person digging ditches for the city, is it acceptable to start a petition demanding that a better breed of person dig our ditches? Should we put an income limit on felons?

> He didn't even do it! – A jury disagreed. The facts remain that on 30 May 2011, Evans got a text from his friend, Clayton McDonald, to say that he had "got a bird", neglecting to mention he had "got" her at 3am in the queue for pizza when she was so drunk that she fell over and twisted her ankle. In fact, she had drunk so much that she doesn't remember how she got to the hotel room where she eventually woke up, her clothes scattered around the floor. But this isn't about her actions: it's about Evans. And he does remember. He remembers – and freely admits – that he got a taxi to the Premier Inn where McDonald had taken the 19 year-old, let himself into the room and watched his friend have sex with her. He then "got involved", while his brother and another friend watched through a window and tried to film it on their phones. Evans left later that morning via a fire escape.
>
> Evans doesn't think this sequence of events makes him a rapist. But > unfortunately for him the jury did, and it is from that foundation that all our conversations about Evans and his professional career should start. The Football Association are not able to overturn or ignore the decisions of our legal system. Should the decision be overturned in court, then it's a discussion that can be reopened.

The whole crux of this is that the jury was wrong, so she is making a couple fallacies in assuming that a jury cannot err. We've already seen that similar cases were decided differently, and in the present case, the other player was acquitted for doing the same thing as Evans. More than anything, this controversy is about the validity of such convictions. So it's totally relevant to ask whether or not the jury was correct.

But what is irrelevant is whether or not the Football Association is able to ignore court convictions, because the court conviction had nothing to do with the Football Association.

> He has been punished, so now he should be rehabilitated – We need to be very clear what we mean by rehabilitation. Because rehabilitation does not mean a return to ordinary life, as if nothing has happened. Rehabilitation for Evans is not analogous with playing professional football. He could be rehabilitated without ever touching a ball again.
>
> Rehabilitation is about reintegration into society, with the fundamental basis of this a reasonable understanding that the individual will not reoffend. And this is where we run into some problems, because Evans does not accept that he did anything wrong. In fact, he has repeatedly refused to accept even a modicum of guilt for anything other than cheating on his girlfriend. If he does not understand that what he did was rape, can we be sure he will not reoffend? He has shown no grasp of the issues surrounding consent, so can we really say he is rehabilitated?

I kind of answered this one above. At any rate, I would imagine that's he's learned pretty well to be careful of banging groupies in the dead of the night. And even if he hasn't learned anything, it doesn't change the fact that he may have done nothing wrong.

The girl made several poor decisions, starting with drinking far too much alcohol. She chose to drink, and she chose to go to the hotel room with a football player. Did she think they were going to play Scrabble?

> But saying sorry isn't part of his punishment – No, but acceptance and a willingness to change is part of rehabilitation, which is surely the issue at question here.

If he apologizes, then he admits that the conviction is valid. He will give credence to his enemies' laughable claims. Apologizing would certainly make it more likely that he wouldn't ever play football again. And it's not like these public apologies ever appease the mob. Every time a celebrity says something that isn't politically correct, they apologize profusely with tears, but it is to no avail.

Most importantly, if Evans were to apologize, it would set precedent that such actions are terrible crimes and should be punished to the fullest extent imaginable. So I think it is laudable of him to stand his ground. Ched Evans may not be the hero we deserve, but he is certainly the hero we need. For that he should be inducted into The Hall of Kings.

> So are we saying that his life is ruined because of one mistake? – Are we really suggesting that simply not being able to play professional football will destroy his life? The woman he attacked has just had to move and change her identity for the fifth time, after his supporters tracked her down and abused her. They even have a website vilifying her. Evans has yet to condemn their actions. Perhaps when talking about lives that have been ruined, we should first talk about his victim, and learn from his response to her ruined life.

Not being able to play football is not the only consequence of this. He will likely never be able to get a job anywhere. Imagine if you knew that the person selling you a tv in Wal-Mart is a rapist. Would you buy a tv there? Maybe, maybe not. Now imagine if every customer knew the salesman is a rapist. Would Wal-Mart be likely to hire them?

And of course the writer transitions into how persecuted the alleged victim is, which is off-topic. However, I'm glad the girl is terrified. Good. This whole scandal sends a message to other girls who consider lying about rape. Women should be really damn sure it's the truth before they come forward with a rape accusation.

> Is he never allowed to work again? – Of course he is! But a rape conviction automatically excludes you from a vast number of professions. A convicted rapist couldn't be a teacher, doctor or police officer, for example. In fact, there can be few companies that would allow you to walk straight back into your job after leaving jail. Should football be so different?

He may be legally and morally allowed to work, but will any individual put him to work?

> But a footballer isn't in charge of children or vulnerable people, he is not a threat. Why shouldn't he be allowed to play? – Not a threat directly, no, but footballers are idolised, and – rightly or wrongly – presented as role models. Regardless of how he has acted since his release, allowing him to walk back on to a pitch to cheers makes a mockery of what he has done. Do we really want his face decorating the bedroom walls of young fans?

I could agree with this if it was clear that he had actually committed a rape. However, given the lack of clarity on the facts and the treatment of similar cases, we must acknowledge a large chance that no crime was committed and the jury simply got it wrong.

> Other sports stars have committed crimes in the past and been allowed to return. Why not Evans? – A wrong decision in the past shouldn't stop the right thing being done now. This case should be judged on its own merits. And it is clear that public opinion now is overwhelmingly against Evans being allowed to > return to professional football, with a petition to Oldham Athletic against the signing gaining 24,000 signatures so far, making it one of the fastest growing ever.

>
> Perhaps it's because he has shown no remorse, or because he has taken no responsibility for the despicable actions of his fans, or maybe it's because he is so unwilling to learn from what he has done. But it could also be that public opinion is finally starting to recognise rape as the most appalling of crimes which deserves to be met with nothing but disgust and contempt for the rapist, rather than a new contract and football shirt.

I'll agree with her first two sentences if taken as an abstract principle and not contextual. However, she commits another fallacy (we're up to at least five here, if I'm being generous). Truth and justice are principles in and of themselves that are irrelevant to whether people agree with them. After all, the whole concept of liberalism is that justice is often denied by the masses.

Conclusion

What we have here appears to be another act of discrimination of an undeserving man. The SJWs are unwilling to forgive him regardless of the merit of the accusations against him. Of course, if a woman or a minority chooses to do something, it must be overlooked or forgiven. But if a man—especially a white man—is accused of making a poor decision, we must assume the worst. This is the new Jim Crow law.

The common people of the United Kingdom seem all kinds of screwed up, but at least here in America, the tide may slowly be turning against leftism and political correctness. Hopefully it will spread to the rest of the western world.

Read More: Stop Watching Sports

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

A Book Of Red Pill Wisdom Has Finally Arrived

January 6, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Our very own Quintus Curtius has written a book that unearths old wisdom and presents it logically and clearly in essay form so that men of today can learn from men of the past. It's like The 48 Laws Of Power for masculine men.

The prologue, usually an afterthought for most books, includes a strong tale of fiction that reveals themes Quintus explores later. When he asked me to check out his book, I did so with low expectations, but such a strong beginning pushed me head first into his collection of essays that each focus on a specific topic. Example titles:

- On How A Wise Man Should Reveal His Opinions
- Revolt Against The Excess Of Revolt
- The Reality Of Progress
- The Value Of Sincerity
- How Our Enemies Confer Benefits On Us
- Clash Of Steel And Wills: The Story Of The Battle Of Lepanto
- The Gap Between Theory And Practice

Within these essays, Quintus makes accessible the works that many men simply don't have the time or will to complete on their own. He reads the difficult books, often in the original Latin translation, so we didn't have to.

Here are my favorite quotes from the book:

> New ideas that contradict the established ways of thinking cannot expect to be welcomed with open arms. Those who parrot the party line of the day, who genuflect before the altars of the established orthodoxy, can expect accolades from the mob and praise from those who control the levers of power. it has always been so. Toadies get their crumbs from the master's table. But those who contradict the sacred premises du jour can expect very different treatment.
>
> […]
>
> A man should not waste his time in useless trifles. Those who place the focus of their efforts on foolish pursuits not only exhaust and debase themselves, but they also waste precious time.
>
> […]
>
> Only the wise man is free, and every foolish man is a slave. How can any man claim to be the master of his soul, the captain of his ship, if he cannot command it? Can he curb his lusts, resist temptations, control his temper, his appetites, and maintain his serenity? He who cannot command himself can hardly hope to command others. He who is always the servant of his desires and passions is not deserving of being called free.
>
> […]
>
> Trying to deal equitably with a tyrant is a mistake that has been made by many. Power not only corrupts, but it also poisons the soul, and renders it incapable of feeling. The habit of arbitrary exercise of power becomes an addictive tonic to the tyrant, rendering him unfit for human interaction.
>
> […]
>
> Leaders exercising [strong] powers are riding a tiger, and know that if they dare get off, the raging animal may consume them.
>
> […]
>
> A wise man ought not to get upset every time he is brought into a contest with fortune, just as it would not be fitting for a brave man to be indignant when faced with the crashing sound of war. Since for each of these the difficulty is of the same substance: for propagating glory, and for fashioning wisdom.
>
> […]
>
> Cherish your true friends, for you will know who they are when disaster hits you. Do not denigrate those less fortunate than you, for you may find yourself among them. Do not tempt Fate by allowing yourself to be enslaved with pursuits for women, money, and glory. All of these things will be taken away from you in time.
>
> […]
>
> Men and his tools—even if he has only a rusty knife—are enough for him to master his environment. We don't negate each other, we complement each other. I am a man, and I am master of my environment.

[…]

Boys have been looked upon as defective girls, needing constant suppression of their healthy instincts to make them more feminine. The consequences of this policy have been disastrous for the transmission of masculine virtues to the next generation.

[…]

We have access to more and more, but seem to perceive less and less. We are drowning in information, but are more ignorant and unfulfilled than ever. The breakdown in discipline is a direct result of the abandonment of our ancient moral code, which sprang from imaginative religion. Every untried youth now belies himself fit to pass judgment on the intellectual heritage of several millenia.

[…]

Constructive criticism should be delivered with delicacy, just as a bit of seasoning will enhance a dish, but not ruin it. Too harsh of a delivery of criticism will sew a lasting resentment into a friend's heart. A man can forgive nearly anything except an excess of honesty.

[…]

Our society is a sexually repressive one, compared with most others; and for a repressed person, there is a perverse cruelty in denying sexual satisfaction to someone else. Most of the strident advocates of the "rape culture" are abnormal men and women. Miserable and repressed themselves, they wish to make everyone else just as miserable. There is also delight in being an accuser: it confers power and status, and is a form of attention-whoring.

[…]

The actions of our enemies make us appreciate the good things in life, and cause us to value more dearly the positive things of this world. Who can know love, without having experienced the sting of rejection? Who, never having gone hungry, can appreciate the satiety that comes from a full stomach? And who can appreciate the intoxication of victory, who has not felt the bitter sting of failure?

[…]

As character determines fate, there is no escape from the pitiless confrontation between man and his individual destiny.

[…]

I have seen some men laid low by defeat, never to recover. Others have learned from their experiences and gone on to greater achievement, fortified by the gauntlet of hardship. Defeat is a stimulus for reform for some, and a death-knell for others.

It’s important to note that Quintus doesn’t hold your hand. He passes on the wisdom to you but you’ll have to figure out a way to implement it into your life, if you can at all.

This book was almost tailor-made for me and my interests in history and wisdom. While there was some inconsistency in the quality of the essays, and a bit too many pages devoted to learning foreign languages, there is no other book I know of that does what Quintus has achieved here.

It’s the best book for men I’ve read since getting my hands on The Way Of Men by Jack Donovon a couple years ago. Even more exciting is that I think we may very well be seeing the birth of a new book genre: red pill wisdom.

Since reading his book, I’ve privately encouraged Quintus to keep writing, not just for his or your sake but for the selfish reason that I want even more of what Thirty Seven has offered.

Read More: “Thirty Seven: Essays On Life, Wisdom, And Masculinity” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

You Must Push Each Interaction As Far As It Will Go

January 7, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A friend of mine called James recently asked me for some advice about a girl he likes, who happens to be his housemate. Maria – let's call her that – is certainly very comely from the photographs he showed me, and by all accounts is pretty fond of him. Apparently they spend a lot of time talking, and she complains frequently about the errant behavior of her current boyfriend.

One night she came home from a club a little tipsy and started dancing sexily in the kitchen for him, and on another occasion came downstairs from her bedroom modeling the t-shirt he'd bought her for a Christmas present in just a tiny pair of shorts. James is certain that she is at least a little attracted to him.

Of course, he wants to get with her, but he is also concerned not to spoil their friendship, particularly as they live together and the fallout from any overt move he makes could at best be embarrassing, and at worst could make their living situation untenable.

What to advise here? Well, in the first place, if at all possible you should avoid getting into such a situation in the first place. It has been said that whenever you find yourself asking someone for guidance over what to do about one "special" girl, then you have already lost her. The reason is that you have probably already pedestalised her to an unhealthy degree without having made your move.

In all likelihood your opportunity – such as it was in the first place – has now been lost and you are languishing in the mists and fogs of the friendzone, trying to navigate its malodorous and septic seas with little hope of rescue. In the case of Maria, the situation is even worse, given that she has a boyfriend (albeit a fairly recent one who is based in another country).

To get a girl when you are on the back foot is almost impossible in itself –- to do so when her loyalties lie elsewhere, however tentatively, would be little short of miraculous.

All of that said, James has been getting IOIs from Maria, and wants to know what to do. Should he be a dick to her –- ignore her for a while? Should he play the long game by continuing with his current strategy of under-the-radar flirting and hope for the best? My advice is simple – the only option for James was to escalate while gaming other girls.

The only hope in a situation like this is to sexualize the interaction to a degree where the girl is obliged either to fold into your frame and proceed with a sexual relationship or to express her disinterest by rejecting you. Meanwhile, you should constantly be approaching other women to establish warm leads and to engender a sense of sexual abundance that will make you more immune to your target's potential rejection.

If you have options then she will sense it, and this will trigger her sense of dread – she will realize that she might lose you, in other words, and this will make you perversely more attractive to her.

There is an old saying in game that is helpful to remember here – "make the ho say no." Situations like the one between James and Maria crop up all the time. A guy will come into contact with a girl he likes – perhaps through his social circle, at college or at work – and they will hit it off. The girl will laugh at his jokes and enjoy spending time with him — they will become friends, in other words.

The girl, perhaps intuiting the guy's underlying desire for a more sexually satisfying communion (and lets face it, she wouldn't have to be Alan Turing to crack that one) will often throw out enough flirtatious crumbs to give him hope that "something" may happen at some unspecified future point. The guy, picking up on this and not wanting to scare her off by making a sexual advance, falls into her timetable and decides to wait it out.

This is fatal.

Such a situation as the one I've described works very well for the girl, who experiences the warm validation of an attentive friend. Unfortunately it works less well for the guy, who will inevitably become more frustrated the more time that passes and his desires remain unsated. As I've already suggested, this strategy embodies a one-way map down the tributary that leads directly to the friendzone.

You Impose The Timeline, Not Her

What you should aim to do instead is to make the sexual subtext of your interaction explicit as early as possible in each case – from the first meeting, if possible (although this can be more difficult if, say, your girl is from your social circle or is a work colleague). Nevertheless, what you need to do make your interest obvious boldly, unapologetically, and quickly. Remember, fortune favours the brave. Put yourself on the line: even though it feel intimidating if you're new at it, you're more likely to get the result you want.

You know the real reason that guys don't always do this? It's because they would rather coast on the validation they are already getting from the girl they're interested in. We've all done it. A hot girl likes you and is prepared to hang out with you on breaks or over lunch. By not putting it on the line and letting her know you're interested in her, you can both retain the pleasant feelings that go along with hanging out, while you overdose on the fantasy of what could happen.

Understand this though: both pleasant feelings of validation and fantasy are worthless in the binary world of pick-up where there are only two outcomes – you either get the girl, or you don't. She is in no hurry to up the ante – you should be. It's your job.

So next time you're hanging out with that girl that you've secretly liked for ages, take her hand, look her straight in the eye and tell her you think she's really cute. Just do it, and see what happens. She might well pull her hand away, look embarrassed and start mumbling something about how she sees you more as a friend. Good. Now you've got your answer and you can cross her off the list and move onto other prospects.

Alternatively, she might just be swayed by your boldness and express her mutual interest. You will never know until you try. Either way, if you have been gaming other girls simultaneously – which you should be – then her response will in any case be robbed of the import it might otherwise have.

Hope – false hope – is one of the worst states imaginable for a man. Do everything you can to avoid it. Be decisive. When you like a girl, take action quickly. Be flirtatious, witty and let her know how you feel. Do not be seduced into some long, drawn-out courtship which will likely not pay a dividend anyway.

Remember – she could, if she wanted to, have sex with you within five minutes of meeting you. Girls do it all the time. It is a fallacy to suppose that she needs months of "warming up" before intimacy is possible. Of course, I'm not saying you should demand sex on the first meeting, but some degree of reciprocity is more than possible.

Take your shot and let the chips fall where they may. If she rejects you then smile politely and move on. Above all, don't be afraid that if you make your move you will lose her.

If that happens then you never really had her in the first place.

Want to find out more about how to attract hot women for relationships and sex? Then click here.

Read More: Even a Lame Approach is Better Than No Approach At All

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Sex Denialism Is At The Root Of Our Cultural Decline

January 7, 2015 | by Drexel Scott | Link | Original Link

There are many ways to describe the “essential difference” between men and women. You could refer to it as “yin and yang.” You could refer to it as “left brained vs. right brained,” which is to say “analytical vs. creative,” and you could even call it “order vs. chaos.” In all cases, you would be correct in describing the essence of the difference.

An understanding of this difference, and the proper roles for which each sex is best suited, has guided the success and extraordinary achievement of our species for many millennia. This understanding was unquestioned, common sense, and easily observable to the naked eye. It still is.

However, as all red pill-inclined men surely know by now, asserting the obvious can quickly invite the foul flak of any nearby brainwashing victims. To comment on something that every single human being knows in their heart now causes stress and anxiety and can cause you to lose your job.

Why?

Before I answer that, we need to have a clear understanding of the mechanics of the enemy. Listening to liberal politicians talk on the TV or on the radio, it’s very easy to conclude that they’re just very ignorant people who tend to think with their hearts. And on lower levels, this is absolutely the case. The kinds of liberal puppets you see blockading Wall Street buildings or setting things on fire in Ferguson to combat stereotypes about mindless violence…yes, those people are just very dumb and easily led.

However, it is of the utmost importance not to forget that the people organizing those protests and the groups funding them are not dumb; they are consciously and knowingly misleading the public and causing mayhem in an effort to agitate the masses over various issues.

Every movement gets astroturfed

Professionals are going from one group to another, stirring them to violence—and they get handsomely paid to do so. The world is not being run by morons, it's being run by competing genius-level sociopaths who use the morons like puppets and tools and then dispose of them once they are no longer useful. The entirety of human history is one elaborate example of this principle.

Groups like the KGB spent decades specifically designing the contagious mental virus that is modern progressive ideology. There are no parts of it that are an accident. The gay rights stuff, the feminism, the open borders, the demonization of white men and heterosexuality…it took some of the world's smartest idea-crafters to design the virus.

By the time Reagan became President, it had already taken so deeply in the United States that the course was set. It wasn't public knowledge, of course, as it sadly still is not today; the point is simply that it's been entrenched for a long, long time.

Advancing the agenda

In order to achieve their agenda, the Powers That Be rely on the stress and misery and utter dependence of the populace. One of the many ways in which this goal is attained is to convince the people to act in ways that are extremely hazardous to their well being—and of their own volition. Chunking down, one way to do this is to convince them that the role they are best suited for is bad, and something they are completely unsuited for is good and should be pursued instead.

Obviously this would never work on men, who would immediately see the long-term danger and silliness of it, so it was crafted for women instead. Since the vast majority of women are not capable of thinking in terms of cause-and-effect, particularly when it would interrupt their feelings of immediate gratification to do so, they were easily convinced of this while simultaneously overlooking all the hypocrisy in how they were actually leading their own lives. The fact that they can do this without cognitive dissonance, is itself an illustration of the Essential Difference at work.

So, we are now living in an era in which women are being convinced that they can do anything men can do. Then they join the military, and the minimum number of required pull-ups has to be lowered so they can pass the tests. The fact that the rules changed so they could prove "they could do it too" does not strike women as odd. The fact that the entire military was weakened to give them good feelings is irrelevant.

The same recently occurred with a local fire department, which lowered physical requirements to be a firefighter so that more women can do it. The fact that this directly endangers the lives of other firefighters, as well as those in burning homes who rely on the strength of the firefighters to lift heavy hoses and axe down doors and carry them to safety, all takes a backseat to the fact that feminists got to make another meme about how “they can do it too.” Appallingly, stupidly dangerous.

Modern feminism embraces sex denialism

Sex Denialism, a denial of the Essential Difference, obviously leads to less happiness for those who buy into it. All of life is a game of learning how to maximize, tame, and utilize your own nature to live closer and closer to a state of harmony and congruence. Denying one’s nature and spending all day rebelling against it is a very quick path to unhappiness, so it’s no surprise that sex-denying transsexuals have some of the highest incidence rates for drug abuse and suicide.

I would guess that it is working even better than planned. The sheer number of people who have been trained to parrot rhetoric about the “gender binary,” somehow having buried everything they know to be true, real and good somewhere inside of them in favor of a pat on the head and maybe a treat, is staggering and absurd. The damage this causes on a global scale, and the way in which it has altered other groups’ perception of America, is just as important as the damage it’s causing internally. That is a topic for another time.

It is also playing out in schools, but in the context of education it benefits women in the short-term (though as always, not the long-term). Males are inherently seen as having a profound weakness in “non-cognitive skills,” so schools are now designed to help males get in touch with their feminine side by threat of medication and therapy for ADD.

Of course, men do tend to perform worse at most “non-cognitive skills” than women, but it is equally true to say that women have a defect in “cognitive skills.” In a sane world, men would teach boys male skills and women would teach girls female skills. But we do not live in a sane world, do we?

Instead of the obvious solution—teach men to train their minds and teach women to learn the art of femininity and home care—our society’s solution was to punish men for not being women, and to artificially inflate girls’ grades so they could see how much smarter than boys they are. To an alien looking down on the United States, our situation would doubtless appear to be a cosmic joke of some kind. Like maybe the leaders in America somehow lost a bet, and now they have to destroy their own country in the most obviously stupid possible ways.

Broken schools, broken marriages, and broken families. Only one of three things can happen at this point:

1. A strong, moralistic and traditional leader is fairly elected into office, and he strong-arms the country back into sense and reason. This outcome is highly unlikely, and by far the most ideal option.

2. An enemy who is already poised to attack and hiding within our borders will strike when the time is right, attempting to topple the government and impose their own rule instead. This is a fairly likely outcome, as there are groups here right now who would love nothing more than the opportunity to take down everything America stands for. Whether they would succeed is anyone’s guess, but they will certainly try.

3. An enemy from outside invades and conquers. This is also fairly likely, as if the weakening of our military and wide-open southern border are any indication, we are a nation and a culture that has largely given up without a fight. T he fight was carried out so insidiously that most had no idea they were in the middle of a war, and yet our ranks are decimated and the people have turned on themselves and each other. A weak military, weak family bonds, and weak tribal identity make any culture ripe for the pickings.

Will we shoot the vultures out of the sky, or let them fight over our bones?

Read Next: The Deadly Consequences Of Feminist Propaganda In The US Navy

Drexel Scott
Truth is my religion, and sovereignty my destiny. I'm an entrepreneur who teaches what I know, and you can find my #1 Closing Advice book, Straight To Sex, at my website: http://www.drexelscott.com/s2s

The New Bachelor’s Handbook

January 7, 2015 | by Panchito Cordero | Link | Original Link

“Dwell on the beauty of life. Watch the stars, and see yourself running with them”
— Marcus Aurelius

Today

If you are reading this; luck would have it that you are amongst many men like me who have chosen his path of self-interest over the comfort of convenient romance. Given the recent social conditioning of man to the increase of cuckold friendly laws, there has been this ass-backwards concept of what it is to be single, let alone a man.

Of course the media fails to help when articles and movies on being single are penned by an army of pseudo-Carrie Bradshaws and jaded white knights who have spent the better half of their lives groveling over some cunt. Instead of focusing on the introspective aspect behind it, practically every piece on the subject contains “rebellious” images of broads flipping the bird advocating a flippant lifestyle.

Moreover the decline in quality of women on the American market makes getting a vasectomy more appealing by the day. With that said I have yet to read or see an accurate portrayal of what today’s man (who has swallowed the red pill) is bound to encounter during his time of perpetual bachelorhood.

The quote utilized in the introduction was borrowed from Marcus Aurelius' The Emperor's Handbook, a masterfully written piece that focuses on the importance of self-analysis to stoicism. I had no clue what my mom was doing when she presented me with this plethora of hardcover knowledge but in retrospect she helped cultivate my mind with practical wisdom for the road that lay ahead. Mother knows best, right?

The following list has been compiled in an attempt to replicate the same notational style Marcus utilized. Each snippet is devised from my own colorful bits of life experience, ramblings with a vast array of knowledgeable men to the occasional bits of insight dropped at the barbershop. Let the following list of friendly reminders serve as a list of things to be mindful of as you continue on your journey.

Without Further Ado

1. No love without the glove, sweetheart. Let us be realistic with this one: Would you rather spare the $3 for a pack of condoms or start preparing for a kid's college fund? Truth be told, if the no-pants dance is about to commence and a woman suggests to not use a condom, I find myself immediately turned off. My father always told me "HIV knows no face" and by default you are not the only one she pitched that idea to.

2. When women have no fathers or father figures present, approach with prudence. Now this can work both ways. I have met women who had no form of male role models in their life but were still driven to make something out of themselves. On the other hand, there is the opposite demographic that has a tendency to be very clingy towards a guy who has his shit together. If that is the case, this scenario will more than likely end on catastrophic terms.

3. If a woman gets off on abuse, she is damaged. I am not talking about a friendly choke, pulling of hair, or love taps etc. I am referring to complete denigration. Sure the idea of a sex slave may seem clutch but this can lead to a potential stalker or end with a voodoo doll on your doorstep (speaking from experience folks).

4. Do not take bisexual or "I recently just came out of a long-term lesbian relationship" women seriously. She's likely to be a certified devil in the sack (obviously due to the lack of a male's sexual presence) and a catalyst for welcoming another broad in the bedroom, but any hopes of something serious in the long run should stop there. Women with a sexual identity crisis have a bizarre complex where they try to be assertive like men but in the end succumb to their gender's notable trait of emotional instability.

5. Be circumspect when seeing exotic women from culturally extremist backgrounds. The aesthetically appealing features coupled with loyal foreign tendencies should be enough to reel in any man. However unless you share the same ethnicity or plan on converting to her culture's religious customs, chances are her family will flip their shit when they catch you two together.

Sure the idea of romance behind closed doors may seem enticing to your altruistic heart, except these women are bred to marry their own kind with very little chance of their family giving into today's western practices. Save yourself from the modern day Montague vs. Capulet romance and keep it moving (speaking from experience again, folks).

6. A wise man once told me that when it comes to bartenders, you need to remember that "they are ALWAYS on the clock" or in laymen's terms "strippers who do not take their clothes off." Much like the women with no father figures, there are exceptions. Some are genuine hard workers trying to get by and then there is the lascivious kind.

The latter pertains to women who take enjoyment swindling men via lewd behavior. A major perk of seeing bartenders can be their loquacious nature, which for men who are suckers for stimulating convo can earn major brownie points in their eyes. Nonetheless it is important to keep in mind that once they leave your door; they lead a life that requires them to wear many faces, which one they sport around you is the question.

7. Leave married or relationship broads ALONE. Many OG's have told me to fuck everything in sight, though this is where I draw the line. Of course I have broken this rule during my days as a young buck. However, unless you are the possessive type drunk off pussy, women always manage to slip up.

If it is not out of neglect they will use this opportunity as a chance to throw their shenanigans in their partner's face. Do not become a tool in a woman's attempt to wrong her spouse. Furthermore, my father shared many stories of men losing their lives over a piece of ass during his stint with the domestic violence unit. It is simply not worth the inevitable disappointment gentlemen.

8. Marcus Aurelius once stated "you have power over your mind – not outside events. Realize this, and you will find strength." By applying the preceding quote towards women, your mind will be impervious towards nonsensical bullshit.

I cannot stress the importance of separating your emotions from romantic endeavors enough. Women are emotional creatures, men are not. Two things that have destroyed the lives of men around me were drugs and women (or one leading to the other). Letting anything besides your mind dictate your actions is the attribute of a weak man. Keep in mind, though, your refusal to cater towards some Jezebel's childish behavior can lead to her attacking you.

9. Learn to welcome your newly found solitude. In a metaphorical sense, you ARE alone. Brace yourself for the nights when your trusted confidants will be occupied, along with your stable of romantic prospects. During these times when your thoughts can be rather bleak, pick up one of the following: An instrument, a weight, a book, or a pen and journal.

Begin to gather your thoughts cohesively. Stagnation is not your friend. By performing one of the four options (preferably all of the above) you will create an ascetic mindset. A man who has a developed a sense of self does not occupy his time with the mundane. Instead his pursuits are more gratifying than catering to conventional societal norms.

It Is Never Too Late

From time to time I am an apprentice to a carpenter. Although the work is arduous, the pay is good and each job is a chance for me to learn skills that are slowly dissipating over here on the western front. The last outing involved trimming windows at an elderly man's house. The collection of old magazines to excessive dust buildup led me to believe this man lived a lonely life.

Despite his settings, it was heartwarming to see that he was lucid and kept himself active. However the mood became melancholic when the man discussed how it had been ten years since his wife passed. Just as I was getting ready to pat his shoulder, the fellow showed me and my boss flicks of his middle-aged Puerto Rican bombshell. He then proceeded to speak of another equally attractive Jewish one that was begging him to come stay with her for the weekend.

Remember that where you are, many men have traveled along the same path and went on to do great things. Welcome each challenge with a smirk while handling it with a sense of bravado that would give Clark Gable a run for his money. Having said that I will conclude with one final quote from sir Aurelius: "Waste no more time arguing about what a good man should be. Be one."

Read More: Don't Be Ashamed For Being A Bachelor

Panchito Cordero
Sleez3vil is a man with no shortage of words. After an early introduction to the red pill he has been on his path ever since.

The Charlie Hebdo Terrorist Attack Fires Shots At The Liberal Narrative

January 7, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm writing this as I flip through several European news channels: BBC World, France24, Euronews, CNN International, and Sky News. Here are the common themes I'm hearing:

- Calls for restraint until all the facts are in
- Concern that there may be a backlash against Muslims
- Mention of "solidarity" and "unity" among the French, with the assumption that Muslims are included in that aggregate group
- Sadness and sympathy for the victims who were executed, but no anger at the killers
- Constant mention of how "controversial" and "provoking" the Charlie Hebdo magazine was, as if they may have been asking for it
- Even deeper concern that there may be backlash against Muslims

It seems like the media's target audience are the terrorists themselves, and they are doing everything in their power not to cause offense:

- The AP refuses to publish anti-Muslim cartoons while it sells a print of a crucified Jesus being urinated on
- The Telegraph expresses its concern of Islamophobia before solid facts of the actual massacre can be determined
- The NY Daily News publishes an uncensored photo of a wounded French police officer right before he was executed, but censors a cartoon that led to his murder
- CNN announcer Sally Kohn spends her entire afternoon defending Islam and questioning free speech on Twitter

- The Guardian stressed how grossly offensive the murdered victims were

I also read three statements from world leaders:

1. Prime Minister of England David Cameron said he will "never give up" on the value of free speech.

> We stand absolutely united with the French people against terrorism and against this threat to our values – free speech, the rule of law, democracy. It's absolutely essential we defend those values today and every day.

Free speech? He's leader of a country where citizens have been jailed on multiple occasions for making "racist" comments online and where one man went to jail on "'suspicion" of "racial harassment." They will soon prolong the penalty for being an "internet troll" to two years from six months. That doesn't sound like free speech to me.

2. German Chancellor Angela Merkel made a statement.

> This abhorrent act is not just an attack on the life of French citizens and the internal security of France. It also represents an attack on freedom of opinion and of the press, a core element of our free and democratic culture."

Freedom of opinion? Her remarks come not even two days after she attacked anti-immigration protesters in Germany as being "xenophobic" and having "hatred in their hearts." The German police blocked the protesters from their planned route in Cologne while allowing pro-immigration protesters through. And isn't Germany a country where you can go to jail for disputing the official World War 2 story? That doesn't sound like freedom of opinion to me.

3. President Barack Obama made his statement.

> The fact that this was an attack on journalists, attack on our free press, also underscores the degree to which these terrorists fear freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

Freedom of the press? He leads an administration that wants to jail reporter James Risen while labeling another journalist as "co-conspirator." The New York Times, a pro-Obama mouthpiece, declared that his administration "has prosecuted more whistle-blowers for leaks and gone after more journalists than any of its predecessors" and a report by the Committee To Protect Journalists stated that Obama "has instead presided over an unprecedented campaign to contain leaks and to control media coverage of government operations." That doesn't sound like freedom of the press to me.

The narrative must be preserved at all costs

Immediately after twelve people were shot by members of a "mostly peaceful" religion, we have world leaders engaging in mass hypocrisy that reveals their hatred for free speech and free press as practiced by their own citizens while their lapdogs in the media are tripping over themselves to defend Islam before the dead bodies become cold.

What is going on?

Why are Muslims being treated with such deference while not even two months ago the entire media erupted in a rage ten times greater than what we're seeing now against a college fraternity for an anonymous rape accusation at the University of Virginia that turned out to be a complex hoax? Has the Western world lost its mind?

Some context is in order. The Western elite, especially in Europe, got into power by pushing peace, harmony, equal opportunity, and multiculturalism, but beneath these feel-good concepts includes the blueprint for destruction of the very force that threatens their power: nationalism. Introducing massive numbers of Muslims, Mexicans, or destitute Somalian refugees into your nation reduces the likelihood that you will look to your neighbor and see someone like you, a brother-in-arms who can help you rise up against the cyclical inevitability of a corrupt government ruling over you.

Now that you see a dozen different colors surrounding you on the subway and in the Starbucks, some of whom are looking at you suspiciously, you feel distrustful of these outsiders because they have a different background and belief system than you do. You find yourself in a diluted world culture with standardized gadgets, entertainment, and government-friendly talking points conveniently disseminated by all media outlets. Now instead of looking to your neighbor to help fight against governmental oppression, you will seek comfort in your own amusements, Facebook feeds, internet memes, and legalized marijuana. You turn inwards to satisfy your hedonistic needs while allowing the government to run over your rights and push policies that you feel increasingly helpless to fight in your social isolation.

This is all done by design. The liberal governments of the West will allow the collateral damage of terrorist acts because they need those immigrants to defeat the greater threat to their power: national identity. Destroy the culture and you remove a citizen's motivation to fight for a nation he would have given his life for not three generation ago. Immigration must not stop because the liberal elite must maintain their power, and the useful idiots in the media and academia will continue spinning the narrative required to ensure that happens. The death of twelve lives or 1,200 is inconsequential.

So allow me to channel our leaders today by stating that the death of twelve individuals in France was "unfortunate" and "cowardly," but we must "not rush to judgement" based on the actions of "extremists" when "most Muslims" are "peaceful" people who are in "solidarity" with their adopted nation. We must leave the door open to immigration and allow "unity" to fill our hearts while enjoying the benefit of delicious foreign restaurants opening in once-peaceful neighborhoods that may eventually become worse than a Brazilian slum. We must not let this "isolated" massacre destroy our wonderful multicultural utopia.

Read Next: 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What Will The Roosh V Forum Look Like In 2114?

January 7, 2015 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

For those of you who aren't aware of the Roosh V Forum, it is a Fight Club-like think tank and message board composed of men from all walks of life. Doctors, lawyers, engineers, academics, laborers, and everything in between gather to engage in a bit of friendly banter, discuss the problems of today's world, and share the odd game tip or two.

Though the forum certainly has its traditions and culture all its own, its members recognize that the world is changing and we may have to alter our approach to life over the coming century. To that end, here's a sampling of what we think the future might look like, as predicted by thread titles from 2114 in an excellent thread started by POASTER and recently revived (with credit to original poster in parentheses):

Game

"Bitch didn't approve my consent application last night – couldn't make out" (POASTER)

"Tips for Guys in their 140s Hitting On Girls in their 120s?" (POASTER)

"Tips for Guys in their 140s Hitting On Girls in their ~~120s~~ 20s?" (Soma)

"I just had Psychokinesis sex" (MY DETROIT PLAYAS)

"How to game Robot 9s" (Cattle Rustler)

"The Quest for Traditional Women: Quechua vs. Inuit" (Sonsowey)

"Is it True Founder Roosh was an Oppresso-Sexual and had Physical Sex with Females??" (POASTER)

“The Would You Teleport It Thread” (Cunnilinguist)

“Last surviving PUA nabbed by local authorities in Toronto” (Cunnilinguist)

“Erik Von MarkoBot Releases Controversial New “Pickup” Guide Titled ‘How To Have Sex with One of the Remaining Eight Actual Women in Toronto'” (Hades)

“How To Pass Shit-Tests About Your Genetic-Engineered Pedigree” (Quintus Curtius)

“Secret Diary of Original RVF Member Discovered In Attic In New Detroit” (Quintus Curtius)

“Need advice for passing tentacle control at clubs in Moscow” (Handsome Creepy Eel)

Culture

“Fit Man Turns Down Fat Woman, Executed Under Jezebel Act Of 2030” (CRR)

“Lindy West’s Great Granddaughter Can’t Fit Into Massive Spaceship Destined For Jupiter, Throws Fit” (CRR)

“Poll: Do You Guys Prefer Girth or Length on Your Wife’s Penis?” (POASTER)

“How to make $1,000,000 in 6 months by working in the Martian Oil Craters” (Cattle Rustler)

Cosmopolitan: “From adopted African baby to teenage boy toy: how moms can navigate the sexy transition!” (Days Of Broken Arrows)

Washington Post: “Extremists question high school’s ‘mandatory homosexual experience’ graduation requirement” (Days Of Broken Arrows)

The Atlantic: “The new ‘male slavery’ movement: why it’s not only moral, but essential” (Days Of Broken Arrows)

New Republic: “No, mass starvation, widespread power outages, and nuclear fallout are not the fault of our last four female presidents” (Days Of Broken Arrows)

New York Times: “Why lowering the age of post-partum abortion to 9 is harmful to women” (Days Of Broken Arrows)

“Prius sales continue to skyrocket; No longer considered gay” (RCP)

“Gamergate XXIV: Mike CF’s Great Grandson Finally Speaks” (Quintus Curtius)

“Inside The Trillion-Dollar SelfieSatellite™ Industry” (Black Knight)

“Coming Out of the Closet: How to tell your Friends and Family you aren’t gay” (Horus)

Entertainment

“Monument dedicated to Lena Dunham erected in Central Park” (Cunnilinguist)

“Wall Survivor – American Actress Jenny Chang-Smith Gonzalez” (POASTER)

“Is your Hovercraft alpha? Let el mechanico decide” (Krusyos)

“What do you all think of The 30 Second Work Week?” (Krusyos)

“Return Of Kings Media Corporation Announces Stock Split At New York Stock Exchange” (Quintus Curtius)

“Mark Zuckerberg III Promises Tighter Privacy Controls On Facebook” (Black Knight)

“Lena Dunham to replace Theodore Roosevelt on Mount Rushmore” (nek)

Health And Wellness

“Study: Light speed travel lowers sperm count” (Mentavious)

“Anorexia finally defeated as America celebrates 100% obesity rate” (Sonsowey)

“Abstaining from mechanically synthesized sludge for a month” (DjembaDjemba)

“No fap challenge, can you last one hour?” (Cattle Rustler)

“The Real Alpha Male’s Guide to Wallmart Sexbots” (runsonmagic)

Politics

“New British Law (Shari’a Code 113302) Passed by Lord Sayyed William al-Landani” (POASTER)

“U.S. initiates bombing campaign in Iraq” (Sonsowey)

“US debt reaches 800 trillion – President ”very confident” in recovery” (French Canadian)

“Months After Purchasing US State of New York, Apple Declared Sovereign Nation By the United Nations” (Hades)

“Is It Time For A Male President?” (Black Knight)

Travel

“Mars Datasheet” (POASTER)

“The Islamic State – ~ A Black Man’s Disneyland ~ ” (POASTER)

“The best planets for black guys to get laid” (vinman)

“Roosh’s new book ‘Intergalactic Poosy Paradise: Saturn awaits'” (MY DETROIT PLAYAS)

“I was in a huge fight against white knights at a cantina in Mos Eisley” (Alpha_Romeo)

Old Favorites

“Do Looks Matter?” (iamdegaussed)

“Was This Alpha?” (Cattle Rustler)

“Which country is best for Indian guys to meet white girls?” (el mechanico)

“Are pocket squares still alpha?” (Oz.)

“What happened to The G Manifesto back in 2013?” (Merenguero)

Don’t Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

Winston Smith

Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

Why You Shouldn’t Care When She Cries During A Break-Up

January 8, 2015 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

If you’re going to be a player, then you’re going to hurt some feelings—that’s just the cost of doing business. I’ve seen it said around these parts that you have to “leave them better than how you found them.” Perhaps the men who say this are better with women than I am, or perhaps I’m just a dick. Regardless, I always seem to make the majority of women I’m involved with break down crying when it comes time to release their asses back into the wild.

Several months ago I wrote an article about finding a quality Filipina girl online. In that article, I spoke of a particular Filipina that I had developed a relationship with. In the time since that article was published, our relationship has pressed forward while I’ve been back in the states and, in spite of the distance, things continued to go really well for us. However, I recently made the decision to end things with her—a decision she understandably didn’t take very well. It also didn’t help matters that I was planning to visit her again very soon.

The breakup wasn’t her fault and she didn’t do anything wrong. In fact, she’s a very good woman. She was in love with me and wanted nothing more than to be my girl. Unfortunately, for her, I never had any intentions of marrying her or bringing her to America. I was wasting her time and it began to eat away at my conscience. I was being selfish and I knew I had to do the right thing—prolonging the inevitable wasn’t doing either of us any favors.

If I had the ability to live overseas or if she lived here, then perhaps things would be different. But those options aren't on the table and I'm not one to sit around wishing upon a star for things to be different than how they really are. Her heart wasn't the first one I've broken, and I doubt it will be the last.

The reasons women lose their shit and start crying over a break-up can be broken down into three primary categories: she doesn't think she can do better than you, she didn't get—what in her mind amounts to—adequate compensation for fucking you, or the events surrounding your break-up have caused her embarrassment and made her look like a bad person. Let's examine these three reasons in greater detail, starting with the Filipina's present condition.

She Doesn't Think She Can Do Better

A woman's inability to do better than you can be multi-faceted. Perhaps you fucked her like she's never been fucked before, or you took her on an emotional roller-coaster ride that fed her cravings for drama. Maybe you have a better body than any of the other guys she's been with, or perhaps you make a boat-load of money.

Women will prioritize things differently according to their personalities, and there are many more attributes you can have beyond the short list above to make them crazy about you. Some care about a lot of shit and have huge checklists, some only care about one or two things. However, the more "bonus boxes" you check off—the more difficult it becomes for a woman to let you go.

That's where this Filipina girl stands right now. The fact of the matter is she's devastated because she knows it will be close to impossible to replace me. She lives in an obscure part of the Philippines and most western men have little or no desire to travel there. Her mind is saying, "How the fuck am I supposed to find a suitable replacement for this man, what am I going to do now?" It's not saying, "I really loved this man—I'm going to miss him."

She's mourning much in the same way I would if I had a winning lottery ticket catch on fire—not in the same way I would if my father passed away, for example.The lifestyle and security I potentially offered her far surpasses anything a local guy could ever provide. She realizes that I was pretty much a once in a lifetime opportunity, and now I'm gone.

Whoever she ends up with will pretty much offer shit in comparison, and this both terrifies and crushes her. If there were ten guys of equal or greater value lining up to replace me, then she wouldn't be nearly as upset about my sudden departure. And keep in mind, I'm talking about a "good girl" here.

Perceived Inadequate Recompense For Pussy Apportioned

I carried on a fuck-buddy arrangement for about two months with a young lady (slut) that was fresh out of college. She was a bit of a travel bug and had studied abroad while in school. So, given my occupation, she assumed that we would be doing quite a bit of traveling together. I never led her to believe that we were going to be taking any trips—she just assumed we would. Whenever she would bring up the subject of traveling (which was frequently), I would just say, “We’ll see.”

Truth be told, one of the last things I want to do with my time off is hang out at major international airports and sit in airplanes for hours on end—especially with some some fucking dingbat that I really don’t like being around all that much. If I am going to travel—I’m going alone and I’m going where I want to go. And most importantly, I’m going to meet foreign women that I truly want to spend my time with. I will never take some domestic skank on a vacation—ain’t fucking happening.

So eventually this woman wore out her welcome and I ended our little arrangement. She was really upset and crying because she thought “we had a really strong connection.” Well, reality and what she thought weren’t quite aligned with one another—it was over.

Now, gentlemen, what was the real reason she was upset? Was it because we had a “really strong connection,” or was it because I fucked her a few times and she didn’t get a trip to Europe out of the deal? The only “really strong connection” this strumpet felt was to my travel benefits, and she never got what she mistakenly thought she had coming.

That’s what it boils down to: a woman feeling short-changed because she slept with you, but didn’t manage to accomplish the mission she set with her pussy. Pussies are goal oriented. Women set quotas with their pussies and when they fail to meet those quotas—they get upset about it.

Much like a casino—the pussy house always wins. Pussies aren’t supposed to operate at a loss and, to be honest, they very rarely do. But when it does happen, women will start crying a river in the hopes that they can rope you back in so they can get what they deem is fair compensation for allowing you to fuck them.

As a man playing the field, this is exactly what you want—it means you beat the game. If you get what you want while throwing a wrench into the spokes of her pussy's plans, then pat yourself on the back for a job well-done. Dicks very rarely break even, and even more infrequently post a profit. If you can manage to step it up a bit and get a woman to pay her fair share, buy you presents, or do favors for you—then she's really going to fucking lose it.

She Looks Like The Bad Guy

Women despise feeling humiliated or looking bad, and they especially hate it when they get busted for their piss-poor behavior. Have any of you guys met a slut before? I know, you're probably saying, "What a stupid fucking question, AV8R—of course I have, just about every woman I come in contact with is a slut." Good, then we're on the same page—it's no different for me. But have you met any women that have actually vocalized and admitted that they're sluts? Maybe a handful, right?

Sluts are everywhere—they're the majority of what's out there, but very few women actually think they're sluts. A drug dealing biker's syphilitic semen could be dripping down some cheating housewife's inner thigh, but that wouldn't stop her from claiming to the bitter end that she's a loyal woman and a great mother. Women love being shitty people, but they hate it when there's an audience.

Women will deny deny deny anything and everything that has the potential to show them in a bad light. But if you happen to back them into a corner and call them out on their bad behavior—especially in the face of incontrovertible evidence—then they will do what all girls do: lose their shit and start bawling like a 300-pound feminist getting kicked out of Buffalo Wild Wings.

These women are releasing "tears of uncertainty." You're leaving, her life is about to change, and she doesn't know how things are going to pan out—her future is heading down the path of the unknown. A women cares about her security first and foremost, and now that her security is about to walk out the front door, she's going to pull out all the stops in an attempt to re-capture you and put you back in your cage.

In short: you're still useful. She needs to keep you close until her parasitic ass can find a new host to latch onto. And once that happens, she'll leave and it will be like she never even knew you. There will be no tears from her at that point—it will be all business, and you will be left wondering what the fuck just happened.

If you catch your woman lying, cheating, or conspiring against you in some way—then you need to be prepared for the waterworks as she attempts to appeal to your good nature. This also applies if she pulls the typical female bullshit move of trying to make everything out to be your fault (with tears, of course). It's nothing more than manipulation.

She's not crying because she feels bad for hurting you or because she's truly apologetic for her actions. She's crying because she got fucking caught and now she's scared—never forget that. If a woman truly appreciates you, then she won't lie to you, disrespect you, or develop annoying little habits like fucking men that aren't you in the first place.

Never allow yourself to get roped in by empty apologies, promises of change, and self-interested tears. If you've been disrespected by a woman, then you move on immediately. Tell her to pack up her tears along with the rest of her crap and hit the fucking road. Women that exhibit this kind of behavior do not deserve you or anything you have to offer. They deserve exactly what they are themselves—shit.

Dealing with shit-women is the job for a human shovel, and I don't know about you guys, but I'm not looking for a fucking job. Second chances are for masochists, suckers, and weaklings. If you give a woman another chance after she screwed you over or blatantly disrespected you, then you're a no-dignity having motherfucker and you deserve whatever you get. And I promise you, what you get won't be pretty. At this stage, it will be all your fault—you will suffer.

In Closing

All women—even the best women—care about what you can do for them more than they care about you as a person. Every tear a woman has shed over a man can be traced back to how she was personally affected by the loss of that man's utility—the man himself is a distant second at best. The secret to keeping a woman is to be the best she's ever had while simultaneously convincing her—through both your highly desirable attributes and the lingering, yet subtle, threat of your immediate egress should she fuck up—that you're the best she will ever get.

The optimum way to really stack the deck in your favor is to only marry, or seriously commit to, a virgin. If you make the decision to settle down with a woman who has a couple of men in her past, then it's imperative to realize that you must be superior to those men in every way. You need to earn more money than them, fuck better than them, be funnier than them, more talented than them—all of it. A woman will feel like she's settling if what you bring to the table doesn't trigger emotions that can overshadow the memories those other guys created, and that's the last thing you want. If a woman feels like she's settling, then she's going to resent you and make your life a living hell.

The girl in the Philippines wasn't a virgin, and that's specifically why I chose her. I had no intentions of settling down, and taking a girl's virginity under false pretenses is a bit further than I'm willing to go—I am an asshole, but I'm not that big of an asshole. She had one long-term relationship that lasted several years before I came along, but I categorically demolished the other man she was with in every conceivable way—that's why she fell hard for me. I checked all of the appropriate boxes, and then several of the bonus boxes as well.

This woman was an unfortunate casualty. I went on a mission to find a good girl, while masking the fact that I wasn't prepared to be a good man myself. I needed to see if I was even capable of feeling anything for a woman again—I honestly had reached the point where I didn't know anymore. This woman was merely a science experiment: someone to be used for my own self-centered research.

The conclusion of my experiment is that I am capable of having strong feelings for someone, and I can say this was one of the only instances in my life where I've felt truly sorry for hurting a woman and making her cry—she didn't deserve what she got. However, at the same time, I'm under no delusions that her love for me was anything more than opportunistic and vampirical.

She's a woman, no different from the rest at her core. Her feminine disposition, proper upbringing, and good morals were what earned my adoration. Like most men, I was starved of those things and, when exposed to them, it had a strong impact on me. But in the end, I had to cut her loose.

A man has a serious decision to make when it comes to committed relationships. You basically have to accept the fact that you're being used—you're never going to get more out it than you put into it. The duration of any relationship is contingent upon your continued usefulness above all else —you can only get better, you're not allowed to slip and devolve.

If you have a good woman, then she'll stay by your side for a while if things turn south, but you're on borrowed time nonetheless. The difference between a good woman and a hardcore opportunist is that the good woman will give you a grace period to get your shit together if you start to falter. Most importantly, a good woman is more likely to stay loyal so long as you manage to keep the ship sailing straight and provide her with a decent life.

All of this leaves a question that only you can answer for yourself: is this shit worth it? Regardless of your answer, this simple fact remains: the pussy house always wins in the end. It’s up for you to decide whether or not you can live with that.

Read More: Why You Should Care Less

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

This Is What #GamerGate Taught Us About Social Justice

January 8, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Ever since its inception, GamerGate has been violently opposed by SJWs, who are a funny bunch indeed. They claim tolerance but are actually the most intolerant group imaginable, turning on their own for the tiniest misstep. SJWs present themselves as the holy guardians of all that's good and kind in the world, but actually promote harassment and humiliation of anyone who dares to speak up and question their sacred narrative.

Unlike GamerGate supporters, who haven't actually done anything harmful, SJWs have done their worst and tried to destroy livelihoods of people who they perceive as the opposition by using their vast network of social connections. Here is a freelance journalist, Maggie Shnayerson, being mobbed by furious feminists because she asked a question to Randi Harper on Twitter about GamerGate:

Oh Maggie, why won't you learn to check your journalistic privilege?

Of course, these negative actions have to be rationalized sooner or later as being done for "the greater good." SJWs usually do it by proclaiming themselves as protectors of some fringe minority group's sensitivities. Let's see how Arthur Chu does it:

Arthur Chu So yes, to momentarily borrow Yudkowsky fanboy terminology, I wear black robes. I am a practitioner of the Dark Arts. I rigorously manage my own thinking and purge myself of dangerous "unthinkable" thoughts -- "mindkill" myself -- on a regular basis.

This is what you have to do to be a feminist anti-racist progressive, i.e. a social justice stormtrooper, You have to recognize that there is no neutral culture, neutrality is impossible, that culture is a cutthroat war of memes and that you have to commit to picking a side and setting yourself up as a neutral arbiter of memes is impossible and is a form of surrender. You have to constantly "check your privilege" and "unpack the knapsack" and all those other buzzwords.

Stormtrooper indeed

Arthur Chu is quite an intelligent fellow, at least based on how he gamed the Jeopardy show for his own gain and ruined everyone else's enjoyment in the process. Reading such statements from him is downright scary, but he surely must realize that the SJW movement is cannibalistic and cannot outlast the entropy.

This brings us to an interesting point. SJWs are not a monolithic group at all. Some SJWs, like Arthur, "ride the wave" while others are more moderate and genuinely believe that they can help bring about gender equality and social justice if they just keep "challenging the patriarchy" by any means necessary.

The innermost circle comprises of hardcore gender study professors that instill all these radical ideas into the malleable brains of their students, who go on to become bloggers or journalists. Thus a toxic philosophy can spread like a virus.

As described in this masterpiece

Note that in all cases, they wear the SJW label as a badge of honor, without any irony. But what is social justice anyway? Can it be attained? And at what cost? To answer these questions would probably require reading several arcane gender study tomes, but we can infer what SJWs mean by social justice from their behavior.

No escape from the causality

We live in a universe where every action has consequences, some that appear immediately and others only years or decades later. Hence, each person is born into life in circumstances that were created by other people. These circumstances may happen to be extremely brutal but that isn't necessarily bad. Unless you're a SJW, of course.

In a SJW mind, pain and distress always happen because a white hetero male wants them to happen. In reality, things tend to just happen and it's nobody's fault when it comes to major events or attitudes of the society. There is nobody going around and intentionally causing hurt feelings. Except utter psychopaths that are SJWs, that is.

What we possess is free will, intelligence, and creativity that helps us overcome any obstacle and deal with even the mightiest problems. SJWs ignore all of those inherent qualities and consider humans to be some sort of dead vessels, who have no agency and need to be either shielded from the outside world or shamed into submission.

Forged in the fire

The simple fact is that hardships create virtues and qualities that people admire. By trying to eliminate problems, SJWs actually ended up removing a lot of opportunities for maturity. Hence we see the generations of boys and girls growing up not sure who they are or what they are supposed to be doing with their lives. By shielding them from the world, we are creating a generation of lost children who will be unable to function independently or take charge when their time comes.

Naturally, you can't expect SJWs to understand these subtleties. If you tried to be moderate, it simply will not work on them at all, as many neutrals have experienced with GamerGate. What works the best is satire. Loads and loads of relentless satire, such as the one done by @catfreq, a Twitter account parodying whatever is the latest smear on the SJW schedule:

That's meowsogyny

SJW want the noble-sounding goal of striving towards "social justice" to give them recognition and respect. But, it doesn't work that way. Screaming and shouting over Twitter and demanding that "somebody do something" does not earn you any gold badges. What counts are your constructive actions and setting a positive example by being a leader and a role model to those who need guidance and inspiration the most. Just take a look at Nick Vujičić:

Despite being born without any limbs, Nick endured and simply didn't give up. If he can enjoy life, there is no reason why every trans, gay, handicapped or whatever person can't do the same. But SJWs would probably respond that Nick simply demonstrates the depth of patriarchy that gives him the supernatural powers of loving life.

Modern sloths

The unpleasant truth is that people start in circumstances laid out by their parents but eventually end up where they belong and deserve to be. The only way to get true social justice is if everyone works on it for himself. Nobody can fight your battles or speak on your behalf. Ambition, hard work and talent will always pay off and there is no amount of discrimination or oppression that can stop genuine passion from breaking through all kinds of ceilings.

Who knows, SJWs might at some point become enlightened enough to realize that only constructive actions matter and the words are just dust thrown into the wind. There is no other way to make this world a better place than to roll up your sleeves and get to work. But that would require actual effort, so probably not.

Did you like this post? Read more #gamergate news on Reaxxion, ROK's little brother.

Click here to visit.

Derek Baroni

Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

How To Get More Muscle Without Protein Powder

January 8, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

---

The following article has been sponsored by Becoming the Bull

Hey guys,

Most gym losers will tell you all about the supplements they love and how you should buy them.

Then they'll tell you it's all from a special protein or pre-workout.

I call Bullshit!!

See, I'm about Bodybuilding for the Everyman.

That means that everything I do is aimed at normal guys who want above-average bodies (without spending their whole paycheck)!!

And because I want to help you guys go from average to extraordinary, and know all the secrets, workarounds, and just plain common sense I've learned in 20 years of bodybuilding, I wanted to put my knowledge down in an affordable way.

That is Becoming the Bull, in a nutshell!!!

Check it out here.

It's $20, and can save you a lifetime of wasted effort in the gym. If you don't like the book, I will give you back 100%. No questions asked. No BULLshit.

This is my groundbreaking guide to getting you strong, big, and lean without wasting time in the gym, without restrictive diets, and without dicking around any longer than you have to to get a body of iron.

If you want to use gear, I'll tell you how.

If you want to train high intensity, I'll show you how.

If you want to carve away fat and show off your work, I'll show you how.

You buy the book, you get the results, or I don't deserve your trust. It's that simple.

Click here to get your copy of Becoming the Bull.

– John

P.S. If you need extra help, I normally charge for consultations.

But right now, for ROK readers, I can act as your virtual trainer absolutely free by email when you get Becoming the Bull this week.

Click to get Becoming the Bull.

Read Next: Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

All Forms Of Feminism Are Anti-Male

January 8, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Feminists are scrounging around in desperation, claiming that their ideology has been tainted by a few radicals. One does not even have to mention it to them since they will feel the need to apologize on their own. “I’m a feminist, but I’m not a man-hating one like people think. I’m just for equality.” They’ve even pressured the dictionaries into adopting their definition, as though the dictionary is an absolute statutory rule book instead of a social commentary.

In actuality, there is no single feminism. The term “feminism” is an umbrella to describe various movements that follow along similar lines. Andrea Dworkin has as much in common with many feminists as the Spanish Inquisition has with Billy Graham. But all feminists want open access to the work environment so that women can live their dreams.

Even many anti-feminist women believe that the government should mandate that women get paid the same as men for the same job, even though these women also believe that they should not have to work. And every feminist believes that women should not place much focus on being attractive towards men. However, none of those claims for supporting equality matter because every form of feminism is anti-male.

Troubles At Work

For one thing, by flooding the workforce with women, wages have plummeted. Labor is a commodity like everything else, and it is subject to supply and demand. Employers will pay their employees as little as they can get away with, and if those employees know they will not likely be able to have a single-income family, then then the employers will have no reason to give them a living wage.

It’s not like the common worker can leave his job and find something better paying. So the average family produces two workers for the price of one. But in the old days, most jobs payed enough to support a family on, since men would not be willing or required to take a job that wouldn’t provide that.

Now men can often no longer afford to have a stay-at-home wife while their kids are young, and women who want to stay at home often have to work. Odd how for some women to have their dreams, men and many women have had to give up theirs. This causes children to be raised in daycares and separated from their parents.

Children often do not get the proper attention needed in those crucial early years. Yes, the average feminist wants the unskilled worker to be paid a living wage, but just because something could happen or should happen in no way means that it will happen. Wages will not increase until laborers decrease.

Women have changed the culture of the workforce. If you ever get a job in construction (one of the few male-dominated fields left), you will find out just how true this is when you see the stark contrast in the way people talk. But even aside from foul jokes, when women are around, men naturally feel like they are in a different context. We cannot fully be ourselves in the presence of women, even if we have no desire to sleep with them. It greatly alters the social dynamics.

Women get their spas and fitness gyms, but men no longer have a place to be men, even after work at the local bar or golf course. This is true for both work and college, and it is a major reason why I would encourage the young men reading this article to consider studying a blue collar trade at community college.

And women working also changes the culture of the home. Kids are often raised by daycares, and families eat dinner separately. The Betty Crocker industry has flourished, and people have forgotten how to do simple things like bake a cake or fry chicken. Men are usually no longer able to get off of a hard day’s work and just relax knowing that the missus has taken care of everything. Instead, both spouses have their share of domestic overtime.

Troubles In Mind

Another thing all feminism pushes is propaganda. From the time Little Timmy goes to school, he is bombarded with messages that real men are never violent towards any person and show respect always to women in the ways that the women define respect. And much of the propaganda is inadvertent and subtle, because it is an overarching mindset. My brother had a teacher who would say to the whole class such rhymes as, “Girls, girls, love your pig tails. Boys, boys, less noise.”

But the propaganda far exceeds the public school system. One popular warning given today is against objectifying women, as though males are not able to see women as people. However, I found as a child that most cartoons on tv had the woman as the leader of the family and the father as the useless dunce.

The very popular Fairly Odd Parents was the worst offender, having literally every single male adult be idiotic and immature. My generation had television for parents, and after the Cosby Show had been cancelled, we never again saw a good role model for mature masculinity.

The other vogue talking point that keeps on-the-fencers in the feminist camp is “pay gap.” Nevermind that when I worked at Wal-Mart, there were far more female managers than male managers since they were so afraid of a lawsuit. Even if the pay gap is real, it is not a conscious thing. Nobody is conspiring to keep women in poverty by deliberately giving them 13¢ less by the dollar.

Also notice with all of these current pressing issues that they never quote the source from where they get their statistics. Who came up with that “77¢ on the dollar” number? Most likely someone saw it on their Facebook feed and spread it around from there. Newspapers have grown a bad habit of telling half-truths for easy sales.

Troubles In Love

But the most dire reason all forms of feminism are anti-male (and anti-female) is because men (and women) are no longer able to attract the opposite sex. By consistently giving such toxic advice as “find someone who loves you as you are,” “never change for anyone,” “every pot has a lid,” or “be what you want in the other person,” there are countless numbers of men and women who go to bed every night miserable because the opposite sex is not interested in them. We no longer teach people how to attract a partner. Even when they do find someone, it is often out of desperation and not true attraction and respect.

Patriarchy makes it difficult for women to study science or to walk down a street at night, but feminism makes it difficult for men and women to find love, one of the most basic human drives.

Even monastics and Catholic priests usually live in community, but both the feminist-leaning man and woman and the traditional-minded man and woman often have trouble attracting the opposite sex, especially someone they themselves are attracted to. So much ink is spilled on the internet from all ideological positions commenting on our society of lonliness.

Every one of our ancestors was able to figure out the mating game. It should be easy, but today it has become a labyrinth for both sexes. I am not surprised at all that there are so many misogynist men and misandrist women.

Conclusion

I understand that in history and to this day, there have been many abuses against women. Not make-believe SJW abuses like lack of education or employment, but actual danger or mistreatment (although there were still safe-guards in the old hardline patriarchal days). Injustice should not be ignored. But in our efforts to bring justice to the marginalized, how often today do we only push that injustice onto new innocent victims?

Every time I see a gay family, I think, “How heartbroken is the ex-spouse that produced those children?” In the same way, every time I hear about a working mother putting her three-month old infant in a daycare, I think, “Why is she not able to be with her child?” Every time I go into Wal-Mart and see all the women making $7.45 an hour, I wonder, “Why couldn’t a man save them from being in this terrible environment for 35 hours a week?”

Changing legislation has not made society any happier or more liberated. Perhaps it is time to change our philosophy instead. Feminism is the great equalizer in the sense that everyone loses.

Read More: The Limits Of American Feminism

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

The Importance Of Mythology To Manhood

January 8, 2015 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

One of the most profoundly insightful books I've ever read is The Hero with a Thousand Faces by Joseph Campbell. In this book Campbell uses myths from around the world and psychoanalytic theory to reveal the Monomyth, the archetypical hero journey that underlies the many-varied myths and folklore from the world's cultures, past and present.

In this article I can only give an introduction to the basic concepts of the Monomyth, with a few examples and some notes on the importance of mythology and the usefulness of understanding it better. In The Hero with a Thousand Faces, Campbell goes into much more detail, discusses the nuances and variations of the Monomyth, and provides a ton of interesting examples. I encourage you to read it.

Why Mythology Is Important

Myths are psychological. The symbols and metaphors of mythology are the outer representations of the inner spirit—the animating force that shapes meaning, purpose, and our connections with each other, society, and the world. This animating force is powerful and transformative, but it lies deep within, beneath and behind the solid forms of the everyday world and the small fancies of human reason. Myths are able to guide us to that animating force and help us on our own spiritual journeys. According to Joseph Campbell:

> "Myth is the secret opening through which the inexhaustible energies of the cosmos pour into human cultural manifestation."

> "It has always been the prime function of mythology and rite to supply the symbols that carry the human spirit forward, in counteraction to those other constant human fantasies that tend to tie it back."

Some knowledge of mythology is especially important for men today because modern society has been transformed by rationalism, mechanistic paradigms, and a preoccupation with the material world. Many people no longer believe in a formless, unfathomable, yet enduring spirit-energy, and instead they see only forms that can be understood by the human mind—the ephemera of ideas, feelings, and material stuff.

As a consequence, people discard rites and traditions when they become inconvenient, and they often treat myths as nothing more than entertaining stories, thereby casting aside the guidance and wisdom of the past. This, of course, is destructive. As Campbell notes:

> "It may well be that the very high incidence of neuroticism among ourselves follows from the decline among us of such effective spiritual aid. We remain fixated to the unexorcized images of our infancy, and hence disinclined to the necessary passages of our adulthood. In the United States there is even a pathos of inverted emphasis: the goal is not to grow old, but to remain young; not to mature away from Mother, but to cleave to her."

Campbell published this in 1949, pointing out the social and spiritual breakdown of manhood that has only worsened since then. Modern culture does little to foster spiritual growth, and so many men have fumbled in the dark, trying to make their own spiritual journey without the kind of guidance and wisdom available to men of the past. Luckily, though, myths both old and new are waiting to speak to those who know their language.

The Monomyth

The hero journey is one of rejuvenation. It begins with a problem, with society out of balance and in decay. The hero is called to adventure, and must leave the ordinary (human) world and enter the dangerous and mysterious world of the divine, such as a magic realm or the wilderness. The hero is tested, and his reward is the Ultimate Boon. He carries this boon back with him to the ordinary world and uses it to rejuvenate, to redeem the world.

My favorite illustration of this is the story of Perseus from the film Clash of the Titans (the 1981 version). At one point in the movie, the queen of the city of Joppa blasphemes against the goddess Thetis. As punishment, Thetis demands that Joppa sacrifice the princess Andromeda to a giant sea monster, the mighty Kraken. If the people of Joppa do not comply, then the Kraken will destroy the city and all its citizens.

To stop the Kraken, Perseus must defeat Medusa, whose eyes turn all who look at them into stone. Perseus defeats Medusa and brings her severed head back to Joppa where he confronts the Kraken, a monster so huge and terrible that not even an army could defeat it. And yet Perseus, armed with the Ultimate Boon, defeats the Kraken—he reveals the severed head of Medusa and turns the giant monster to stone, saving both the princess and the city.

Here is a succinct diagram of the Monomtyh from the book:

This model is the archetype, the complete hero journey. Some of these elements are obvious from their names, but others are not. The Sacred Marriage is also called the Meeting with the Goddess, and it's the stage wherein the hero tempers himself with a feminine force, such as intuition or compassion, to gain the knowledge or power unobtainable by a purely masculine approach. The Father Atonement is when the hero no longer resists the father figure, but reconciles with him, and the Elixir is another name for the Ultimate Boon.

Among the myths of the world, these components are manifested in different ways. Each component can have more or less prominence, and some components may be absent in some myths. Here are some examples of these components drawn from a few contemporary stories:

Call to adventure: Neo gets a call from Morpheus

Helper: Morpheus

Threshold crossing: Taking the Red Pill

Tests: Martial Arts and Jump programs

Helpers: Obi Wan Kenobi and Yoda

Sacred Marriage: Luke switches off targeting computer, trusts his feelings, and uses The Force

Father Atonement: Luke stops trying to fight his father and surrenders to him

Apotheosis: Neo becomes Matrix Jesus

Elixir Theft: John Connor destroys Cyberdyne Systems, steals parts from original Terminator

Flight: The T-1000 chases John Connor and friends

Threshold Struggle: T-1000 is defeated / John must accept the death of the good Terminator

Elixir (after return): The world is safe from Judgment Day and John has become a man

What does it all mean?

After you understand the basic cycle of the Monomyth, you can recognize it again and again in stories and in the rhythms of life. People every day cross the threshold into the energetic abyss of sleep, and later they return to the waking world, renewed. The hunter leaves his village and crosses into the wilderness to test his strength and skill—if he succeeds, then he will return with life-sustaining meat.

The young man leaves his family in search of a mate, and if he passes the tests and wins his bride, he brings her back to become part of his family and to create new life. Out of the darkness of the womb we come into this world of tests and growth, and inevitably we pass into the darkness of the grave.

More practically, familiarizing yourself with the Monomyth will allow you to appreciate stories in new ways, and may help you learn some valuable lessons. After all, there are plenty of myths and folklore in which the would-be hero fails. There is a high price for he who takes the journey unprepared—he who doesn't control his id, or can't set aside his ego; who abandons his duties; who disrespects the forces of nature.

In your own life, what might these components represent? What journeys are you on? What are the thresholds you need to cross? What are the tests you need to pass? How is the world of your life in decay, and what do you need to do to redeem it? Listen for the call of adventure, and then strive to become a more heroic man.

Read More: How To Become A Superhero

Jon Socrates
Jon finds purpose in the cultivation of wisdom, strength, and manly virtue.

Exposing The Lie Of Celebrating Christmas

January 8, 2015 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Now that Christmas is over I can drop my red pill cultural “dirty bomb” in a downtown shopping mall without being called a terrorist, scrooge, or a bitter spoil sport. Let’s rewind right to the beginning and examine the origins of what is now an absolutely mindless orgy of materialism. Only by understanding history can we know where we are coming from.

The 21st of December is the shortest day of the year in the northern hemisphere. Even 100 years ago it was not a great time of year. A bitter winter was set to follow and without global supply chains, greenhouses, super markets and so forth, basics we take for granted like fresh meat, fruit, and vegetables were off the menu.

Anywhere in the higher latitudes was freeze-your-bollocks-off-snowed-in, adding to survival woes. The famous Swiss watches and Italian spectacle frames, designer leather etc. actually came about because jewelers and craftsmen up in the Alps needed something to do all winter that didn’t require huge amounts of raw materials, wasn’t perishable, and could be sold for a high value once the snow thawed.

Before Swiss watch makers got their shit together, all the average bod could do was count the days until spring came back around so he would know when to plant crops, when mountain passes might be negotiated, when to slaughter the last goat that hadn’t frozen to death, and when he might get a decent plate of food in his belly again. This time of year has been observed and celebrated going back thousands of years. Why then is it the 25th that is so important and not the 21st, you might ask?

The dubious origins of the Christmas celebration

This is where we immediately find the influence of Christianity rearing its head. I am sure you are familiar with the expression: “On the third day he rose again.” What this actually refers to is the fact that the sun hits its lowest point on the 21st December and takes three days to show any sign of return, with the morning of the 25th December being the first day the sun begins coming back up a little higher.

A minor seasonal anomaly that relates only to the northern hemisphere and has nothing to do with three wise men, babies born in barns to virgins, crucifixion, or any of that hocus pocus. Christmas is essentially the celebration of the fact that the earth orbits the sun, which it does every day and probably will for another few billion years.

Some thing that the entire Christian doctrine was lifted from pagan rituals, including Christmas and Easter – mass consumer marketing at its finest. They were even clever enough to push the 3rd day rising over to Easter, hiding its origins and confusing the poor ignorant illiterate peasants of the day, with nothing but complete gibberish. One or two generations, which was only 30-40 years back then, and it was all forgotten.

The impact on the present day

Moving right along to the 21st century, here I am trying to duck and dive past this shopping and feeding frenzy, maintain my sanity whilst not feeling like a miserable old man, or allowing myself to slide into the orgy myself. I must say this is hard to do, which is probably why Christmas is one of the top times of year for family disagreements, marital break ups, depression, suicides and other human tragedy.

It's all fine and good to celebrate, but what if you just want to chill? Having lived in a sunny climate in the southern hemisphere for nigh on a decade, returning to the cold north and having this nonsense foisted onto me was certainly a shock to the system and reminds me why I spent several Christmas periods as a teenager holed up in a hotel room with a girl, a couple of ounces, and a bottle of Jack. There was no other way to escape it.

What was once a sensible and "cosmic" event relating to the planetary alignment was hijacked by a new religion that had more to do with political power than spiritual enlightenment. It has now become a tool of socialist conformity. You will shop, you will eat, and you will spend.

Failure to do so makes you a miserable outcast, open to emotional blackmail from just about everyone you know. I'm a rebel Zen Buddhist, why the fuck should I say Happy Christmas. It's like asking a Jewish person to say "Sieg Heil."

This is where it gets really evil

Children love a little fantasy, toys, fairy tales, and so forth. They are in wonder and awe at the world around them, and so they should be. If you lift your eyes to the world beyond the shopping mall, office, or nightclub, it is an incredible existence of which we still know very little. As adults we're soon caught up in day-to-day survival, while crap like money, pussy, and putting a roof over our heads becomes all-important.

Children are fed this Christmas brainwashing drama which does several things:

1. Forces the parents to shop, spend, and eat. Marketing by emotional blackmail.

2. Removes free will, ensuring conformity to social norms (socialism).

3. Subjugates parental authority to higher powers such as Santa – "If you behave little Johnnie, Santa will bring you a new bicycle."

4. All of which reinforces the system of the state by educating youngsters to believe they will be rewarded for "good behavior" by forces larger than themselves.

I'm not big on conspiracy theories

The Catholic Church broke into dozens of factions in a very short time and they had God to oversee them. Humans tend to disagree long term so it's hard to see how some kind of illuminati is lauding over humanity, unless of course it's all orchestrated by uber-intelligent aliens—but now we're really pushing the envelope.

Rather what tends to happen is the blind leading the blind. The wealthy, powerful, and greedy with the biggest motivation and marketing reach push everyone else to follow their lead and "lean in" to whatever agenda suits them best. The next generation do more or less the same.

In and of itself, it can be a force for progress, but it's also a force for degeneration, as we can see from the so-called Christmas story. No parent can avoid Christmas anymore and although it's a relatively low-key event in the southern hemisphere and Asia, it's still observed as a global holiday by and large.

As a single person you can hop over it. It's a convenient time for a vacation (provided you don't mind traffic snarls and packed jetliners), but still there is a subtle element of conformity. Women and children love it, so in any kind of LTR you're going to have to get involved with some manner of festivities or other and of course since it's considered a family time, failure to show (or provide a rock solid excuse), can alienate you from family members. It's also a time when professional colleagues expect some token of appreciation (and signal of your conformity).

Christmas is blatantly shoved in our faces, whilst subtlety making us conform, in ways we might not have considered. I abhor the current trend, especially amongst white males, where they engage in all-out buffoonery for validation and to show they conform. It's pathetic at best and at worst they are only brainwashing themselves. It can be nice to celebrate but only if you want to.

You may have to stand alone

No one likes a whining, moaning, miserable "anti-Christmas" spoil sport. No one appreciates the guy that is right but goes against their beliefs and selfish ideals. Most of what Christmas is about today is simply a herd conformity pushed in an extremely selfish materialistic way. People get offended if you do not validate their BS and go along with them, but what does that make you if you do?

At the end of the day I decided that within it all, there is a certain amount of honest Christmas cheer, which can be a good thing. It's a delicate matter, so rather than fighting against what amounts to a stampede, better to cherry pick the best out of it and hit and run where necessary. I smile at Christmas not to be cheerful, but because its amusing to watch unconscious people pay such importance to what amounts to nothing more than their own selfish desires.

People get quite defensive and come with all kinds of bizarre excuses to rope you into the festivities. I'm not religious, but perhaps this is what the prophets meant when they talked about worshiping the antichrist. They sure as hell ain't paying homage to the light anymore, so the only logical conclusion is they are worshiping their own inner darkness.

Read More: A ROK Christmas Benediction From Brother Cui Pertinebit

How I Dealt With A False Rape Accusation

January 9, 2015 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

If you've been paying the news any attention at all lately, you've likely become familiar with the recent rape allegations that arose at the University of Virginia. The basis of these allegations has been proven questionable at best in recent weeks, providing us with yet another incident in which the topic of false rape accusations can be broached.

The Rolling Stone's manufactured UVA campus rape fiasco, it seems, will serve as yet another reminder of the negative impact that false accusations of rape and sexual assault can have.

Having followed the story (and the debate surrounding it) closely, I found myself thinking about a few pertinent questions whose answers I hoped could aid those that may find themselves faced with such allegations in the future:

What are the effects of a false accusation of rape or sexual assault on the accused?
How can the accused deal with these effects?
What can the accused learn from the experience?

In order to answer these questions, I thought I'd share my own experience.

The Experience

It was the winter of my freshman year. I was hanging out in a frat, drinking and trying to chill and hang out as I often did that winter. It is important to know that at this point in my life (just about halfway through my 18th year), I had almost literally no experience with women. I had never dated, slept with, or even kissed a girl before.

Outside of a computer or television screen, I had never seen breasts or a vagina. Much of this stems from the fact that in high school I was a goal-oriented nerd who never took his mind off of books or football. This mentality got me the chance to play football at a great college, but it cost me socially. I was way behind, and knew literally nothing about how to interact with women by the time I set foot on campus.

I realized this, and in winter that freshman year I became all about self-improvement. I had spent all of high school in my shell, and I was determined to come out of it. Things were going to change: I was going to go out, meet people, and (most importantly) talk to girls. I got into game (Roosh first, later Roissy) and started practicing in earnest.

I also started drinking for the first time in my life. I was insecure and shy, and thus entirely too afraid to speak to girls when sober, so I resolved to use alcohol as a crutch. My nonexistent drinking experience ensured that I had no idea how to properly hold my liquor, so this reliance would prove costly over time.

On that fateful night I was hanging out in the frat house when one of my teammates called me to leave with him and head to another frat house. He had four girls with him, all fellow athletes, two of whom I knew. Though I was at heart a shy, quiet, inexperienced nerd, I had become a different person after a few drinks. Alcohol removed my inhibitions and made me more extroverted, expressive, witty, and above all very sexually aggressive.

All approach anxiety disappeared. This was why I'd originally leaned so heavily on it as a crutch – I relished this freedom from the inhibitions that had shackled me romantically for so long.

Thus, my response was to follow him out the door smiling and saying "Let's go!" before quickly putting my arms around two of the girls as though we'd always been best friends (I had never met them). We marched off to another frat. I had my arms around the two girls the whole way, joking and laughing, running fairly competent cocky-funny game.

Looking back I realize that I was doing remarkably well, actually, for a kid who had never been even this close to a single girl, much less two, in his life. I didn't sound like the nerdy virgin I was at all, and we all enjoyed the walk.

We got to the other frat and started dancing, talking, and laughing. I continued trying to scope out which one of the girls I'd make a move on. The first one, a tiny blonde, practically ran away as soon as I stepped toward her—I resolved to just leave her alone. The second, also a blonde but taller with a very athletic build, responded well to some playful banter and ass grabbing, but her body language indicated that she clearly wasn't willing to go anywhere with me – she was polite, but she wasn't that interested and she certainly wasn't gonna hook up that night. I decided to leave her alone too.

I locked onto the last one, a girl with reddish brown-hair who'd been giving me the most aggressive signals all night. She seemed interested— she'd been closest to me the whole night, and we got closer as it continued. I teased her about her inability to dance and her funny "moves," got her to qualify herself to me repeatedly, and began making out with her on the dance floor within a half hour. Just like that I had, for the first time in my life, kissed a girl.

I was pretty nonchalant about what had been my first ever kiss (thank you, alcohol) and, actually, didn't really think about it much at all; after leaving the dance floor for a bit I just continued to drunkenly hang out and joke around with nearby guy friends about other matters as if nothing had happened. Soon, she called me away from my banter to go upstairs with her and "show her the bathroom."

We got up there and at one point (after her insistence) we were in a stall together, alone. Shockingly enough, I actually managed to blow this opportunity, which I did not know at the time should easily have resulted in oral sex at a minimum. Looking back on things, I suppose I can't be too hard on myself—I had only just had my first kiss 20 minutes before, so there was no way I was advanced enough to secure 3rd base yet even if it was handed to me on a silver platter (as it had been in this instance).

I had no idea what I was doing. In the stall, she asked "What do you want me to do?" In my shitfaced state, I just asked for sex in not so many words by just telling her to bend over (penis in vagina still made sense to me, at least). She looked at me a little frustrated.

"Look, you're hot. I mean really hot. Then again, I'm sure you know that." I smiled drunkenly, my ego enjoying the quick stroke. I didn't think much of my looks, so the complement was welcome.

"But we don't just go straight to sex. That's not how it works!" I smiled stupidly and didn't really say anything (I was too drunk to care about much), but soon she led me to an empty room in the frat. This girl quite clearly wanted something, but I simply didn't have the experience to give it to her.

Somehow, after we had reached the room, I was quite quickly able to initiate a hookup and get her shirt off for a while, exposing her chest after fumbling with her bra for a few seconds. After couple minutes worth of tit sucking and making out, I moved to unbutton her pants. I was too quick and too clumsy about it—she stopped me and became indignant before asking a question.

"What, do you think I just have sex? Just like that?"

I'm standing in front of her drunk out of my mind in a situation in which I'd never been in my life. I don't know what to say. My response?

"Uh…yes?"

It all headed downhill from there.

Suddenly she starts anxiously saying that she "has to go." She retreated into her phone, paying increasingly less attention to me as I anxiously failed to recall her name in a bid to salvage the situation. After a few minutes of this awkward de-escalation, she grabbed her clothes, put them on and headed out.

A few minutes later she regrouped with her friends. I actually heard them all talking to her as I passed the bathroom later, where she was crying. I was surprised, I couldn't figure why she'd be so distressed. After they all came out, I tried to catch up to her and make some amends as I sobered up a bit (I was smart enough to realize I'd done something wrong).

I had finally remembered her name and sought to speak to her, but her friends guarded her closely. The polite, athletic blonde I'd approached earlier in the night happened to be her best friend, and she took the role of lead protector. She shooed me away, but did so fairly politely (in hindsight, I do appreciate that).

Later in the night I'd again started hanging out with my friends and, as we joked around, I saw this friend leading the girl I'd nearly hooked up with out the front door of the fraternity. I thought I'd get up and see what was wrong. As I poked my head out the front door after them and called the girl's name, I saw her friend grab her hand and say something, after which the two immediately began to accelerate their departure. I stood there and watched as the two girls ran (I mean literally RAN) away from me and away from the house. That was that.

The next morning I was sober and back to my shy, insecure self. I sent her a "hope you got home safe" message on FB. She responded positively, and I therefore concluded that all was well. I resolved to continue to make amends and get her back. My typical oneitis, muted by the alcohol for that night, had kicked right back in. I wanted to "do the right thing" (the more proper, gentlemanly thing), as my fairly conservative upbringing had taught me.

Everything seemed fine

As I attempted to make casual contact again around campus, I saw that things were very awkward between me, her and her friends. I recognized this for the bad sign that it was. I caught up to her that night at another frat party. I said sorry and unwisely tried to move on from where we were before by dancing with her. She pulled away, and moved to dance with other guys.

I was drunk again and somewhat aggressive, so I remained undeterred. I moved to dance with her once more. She eventually pulled away after a minute or two. I do this twice more, unable to take the hint. The final time, she pulled away into the arms of a blonde guy who had been hanging out and dancing nearby, a fellow athlete who played her sport (though on the men's team, of course).

He was a part of her social circle – they never dated (my understanding was that he was always in an LTR with a girl from his hometown), but she and her friend group trusted him and they knew each other well. He was well liked and well known in that social circle. The damsel in distress had found her knight in shining armor.

I'll never forget the look they both gave me as she sank into his arms for protection – hers was a mix of fear (of me), anger (at my persistence and her inability to be rid of me on her own), and relief that she had backup (in the form of a guy she trusted from within her social circle). His was a look of stern determination that didn't betray much in the way of fear (despite the fact that I was much larger than he was).

He simply stood there and said, point blank: "You need to leave her alone". Others around them were observing too, and up to that point I'd never felt like more of an outsider on that campus or anywhere else I'd been.

I had spent most of that winter trying to improve and become a part of normal social life, and after receiving my first kiss the night before from the girl in question, I'd felt confident that I was making some progress. Tonight, I felt like a complete failure in that regard, like a criminal that members of this “normal social life” I sought to become a part of had united against for their own protection.

The wagons were circled, and my needy ass was outside. Far from having made the improvements I’d hoped to make, I’d marked myself an outsider – a threat. My foolish inexperience and over-persistence had earned all this and, as demoralizing as it was to be faced down like that, I learned a valuable lesson from it in the end.

I stared the guy down for a tense few seconds before saying “fuck it” out loud and moving away. Still fueled by liquid courage, I ended up in a heavy make-out (my second kiss ever) with another female athlete at the party (nothing came of it). My oneitis had not died off, however, and as I sobered up at the end of the night I remained pretty bummed about losing the girl I’d set out for.

The next week, back to my beta self, I resolved to make things right (or try, one more time). My football coach was insisting that we find dates to take to a charity team ice skating event, so I decided to invite the girl. I sent her a text. Five hours later she responded in the negative. A similar thing happened the next week as I asked her to one more event.

It would be around then that I’d figure out a) why she was crying on that first night in the frat and b) why it seemed that certain folks’ opinions on me had cooled quite a bit in the past couple of weeks and things were so awkward around everyone who knew her.

The accusation

She had been telling everyone around her during the weeks following that night that I had attempted to rape her. She implied that on that fateful night we’d met and ended up alone together in that empty fraternity room, I hid her clothes (the ones she grabbed quickly the breakdown of everything – they weren’t hidden from her at all) and that I’d locked the door of the room we were in (the door was busted and had no handle or lock, and I never tried to lock it).

While I had been foolishly trying to win her over during the past couple of weeks, she had been debating whether or not to go to campus security (who, of course, would turn it into an administrative and legal matter involving the police as well). Word of my alleged impropriety was all around campus – my teammates had heard of it through the grapevine, and that was how it circled back to me. I had kept on trying to approach her, blissfully unaware of the possible trouble I faced stemming from her interpretation of what had transpired that night.

I got scared shitless upon learning this, and cut off all contact with her (as I should have done weeks before in any case). I figured my life was over. Here was a pretty, fair college athlete accusing a relatively large, dark skinned negro (whose aggressive behavior that night had many witnesses) of attempted rape. Who wouldn’t believe her? I was an outsider, after all.

My mother had spent my entire adolescence warning me of just this scenario, and here it was. I stood no chance in court, did I? Would I ever get to graduate school? Would any girl ever want to go near me again? Never mind that, would any employer ever want to go near me? I could probably say goodbye to football once coach found out…

Fortunately, I lucked out. One of her friends (I suspect it was that polite blonde I'd approached secondly on that fateful first night in the frat and who'd played the "lead protector" role after the fact) had likely talked her out of it. We wouldn't speak for many months, but about a year later (towards the end of my sophomore year), we exchanged pleasantries.

I apologized to her, she reciprocated, and we pretty much buried the hatchet. I teased her one more time about her dancing and we both laughed as a dark-haired friend and teammate of hers (who was likely aware of who I was and probably sought to protect her from me) pulled her off. I never spoke to her again.

The Consequences

That wasn't the end of things for me, however. I read a recent article on "The Sexodus" impacting the current generation of young men in the west, and I saw much of myself in it.

> Jack Rivlin is editor-in-chief of student tabloid media start-up The Tab, a runaway success whose current strap-line reads: "We'll stop writing it when you stop reading it." As the guiding intelligence behind over 30 student newspapers, Rivlin is perhaps the best-placed person in the country to observe this trend in action. And he agrees that the current generation of young men find it particularly difficult to engage with women.
>
> "Teenage boys always have been useless with girls, but there's definitely a fear that now being well-intentioned isn't enough, and you can get into trouble just for being clumsy," he says. "For example, leaning in for a kiss might see you branded a creep, rather than just inept."
>
> The new rules men are expected to live by are never clearly explained, says Rivlin, leaving boys clueless and neurotic about interacting with girls. "There are also a lot of blokes who ignore women because they are scared and don't know how to act. It goes without saying that boys who never spend any time alone with women are not very good at relationships."

In my inexperience as an 18-year-old, I made mistakes on the night of my first meaningful interaction with a girl. As a result of this, my first romantic engagement with a female ended in a false rape accusation. That incident put an end to my fledgling campaign to come out of my shell. I stopped going out completely. I also stopped drinking almost entirely, fearful that another drunken night could lead me to do something stupid and invite another charge of impropriety.

I became paranoid and neurotic – talking to girls seemed too risky with too low a return on investment. The negative impact the incident had on my reputation didn't help. My school was a small one, and there wasn't much more than one degree of separation between most. I could sense the negative perception of me in my peers even when I made a few attempts to socialize normally.

The incident had drained my social capital and turned any positive pre-selection I could have built into negative pre-selection – the incident had helped to color me as someone no girl would want to be seen with. I felt increasingly that nothing positive could come from my interaction with women – the end result would be either a) a rejection on the basis of my being a “creepy” outsider or b) some initial success followed by some small mistake of mine leading to an accusation that could end my life. I had gotten lucky once – surely, I’d not get lucky again.

So I quit talking to girls. My confidence hit rock bottom. I stayed in my room whenever I had the choice. I kept to myself. I was a ghost for almost the entirety of my sophomore, junior, and senior years. I took solace in exercise, studies, the internet, and video games. I essentially became a herbivore – I gave up and I checked out. I didn’t know it then, but I realize now that I was a part of “the Sexodus” now being discussed in mainstream media. I had essentially gone into a romantic exile with no real interest in coming back.

After several years, I showed some signs of recovery. Fortunately, much of the time I’d spent during college in isolation (the time I didn’t spend playing video games) was spent on self-improvement: I put romance out of my mind altogether and just worked to get smarter, fitter, dress better, and become better able to objectively analyze some of my biggest faults and eliminate them.

I gleaned as much information from the internet as I could in order to accelerate this process. This allowed me to slowly but steadily build up the confidence I needed to begin speaking to women regularly again after several years, and do so much more successfully that I’d initially been able to. In short, the incident essentially pushed me to fully digest the red pill and, as a result, I’m in a much better place now.

Impact upon the present

I've not fully rid myself of the consequences of the incident and the accusations it wrought. Having digested the red pill and successfully killed the chronic neediness, oneitis and outcome dependence I suffered from as a teen, I find that I still remain more romantically apathetic and aloof than I'd like to be. At times I suspect that the incident and my subsequent recovery and digestion of the red pill left me a little too romantically jaded, cold, and cynical – while I enjoy far more sexual success now than I ever did, I fear I'm no longer capable of the deeper, more romantic interactions I longed for before.

I don't value the love of a single woman (and the consistent emotional intimacy that could come with it) the way I once did; in fact, the value I put on that love has declined to such a level as to leave me wondering if I could sustain a healthy long term relationship even if I wanted to (I've still not bothered to try). My desire to seek out that kind of relationship remains at an all-time low.

The problem is that remnants of my more conservative, traditional self do still exist—I still dream of having many children and a large family. I wonder, however, if I still have the ability to trust a single woman enough to successfully form that family. Having come through this incident I'm unsure if I'll ever be able to face that question and say "yes," at least not in the western world (perhaps the expression of those remaining conservative and traditional elements of my self would benefit from time spent in a more conservative, traditional society).

That being said, I've learned that you can certainly get close to a full and successful recovery from the emotional, mental, and social ravages of a false accusation. One need not remain a part of "The Sexodus" forever, so long as one remains dedicated to their self-improvement.

The Lessons Learned

My experience taught me several lessons that I feel could be applicable to any man subject to a similar set of events.

1. Know That False Rape Accusations Are Real

Over time, I found out that the accusation I went through wasn't an isolated incident on my campus and that plenty of my peers had gone through similar situations. This is a real problem, and it is not rare – there is far from a minute chance of you facing a false accusation. Do not let feminists try to convince you otherwise – they look out for women's interests, not yours.

To a feminist, a man who has dealt with the stigma of a false rape or sexual assault accusation is a) an unfortunate but minor blip on the radar relative to the greater realities of rape culture (read: bad, but not as bad or as common as other things and thus deserving of much less concern), or b) collateral damage, part of a "small" price worth paying for the purpose of promoting awareness of "rape culture" and helping victims (read: a price society shouldn't hesitate to pay).

Neither of these perspectives offers much help to you should you be faced with this fate, but they generally sum up the view held by modern feminists and the mainstream media that is now dominated by their perspective. Protect yourselves – nobody else will.

2. Be Very Careful When Engaging Intoxicated Women (assuming you can't avoid dealing with them all together)

toripavolic

likes

Drunk girls can look like fun to hang out with on first sight (especially when you yourself are intoxicated, along with everyone around you), but they can carry with them quite a bit of risk. The most common sources of false rape claims are those quick, drunken one-night-stand types who were intoxicated when you met them and got into bed with you rapidly, going all the way.

These are the ones most likely to leave the experience feeling “guilty” or “weird” about what happened. When knowledge of the hook-up gets out, the false rape accusation becomes the weapon used to defend against this feeling of having been “too slutty,” and the judgment that comes with that from her peers.

Now, she’s not a “slut” because it wasn’t her fault—it was yours. You made her do it. Continued engagement in quick one-nighters with intoxicated girls you do not know ensures one the highest level of exposure to false rape and sexual assault claims.

The safest thing to do is to avoid intoxicated girls altogether. Assuming you can't do that (given the prevalence of alcohol in modern social scenes), exercise caution. Get confirmation texts after the fact, and be very sure to adhere to the following point…

3. Limit Your Alcohol Intake (know yourself)

It is hard to exercise the caution I recommend above without first ensuring that you are in a state that will allow you to apply it. Learn to handle your liquor: find the level of intoxication at which you can enjoy yourself while still maintaining some sense (different guys may have different levels – know yours), and learn to limit yourself to that level whenever you drink and go out.

Don't go out looking to hook up while intoxicated until you do this. If you fail to ascertain your personal limitations before drinking and try to give it a go anyway, you'll find it much easier to find yourself in a situation in which you (or you and your friends) failed to exercise caution, hooked up with the wrong drunk girl under the wrong circumstances for a quickie, got clumsy and made a few mistakes, made her feel uncomfortable, and exposed yourself to an unwarranted but still potentially dangerous accusation of rape or sexual assault.

The better you become at keeping your wits about you while engaging these women, the more likely you will be to recognize and guard against the pitfalls that could increase the risk of a false accusation and the less likely you are to be exposed to a false accusation. If you're the type of person who loses all sense after even a handful of drinks and can't avoid clumsiness and a loss of control, then don't drink at all before engaging women (learn to game while sober).

In short: never go full retard.

It would be several years after the incident before I became comfortable drinking on nights out again. I have learned to drink less, and I regulate as I do it (getting glasses of water intermittently after I've had a few) so I stay in my most sensible "zone" of intoxication and never get too far beyond that point. Find your zone (that range in which you can enjoy drinks without getting sloppy or out of control) and stay in it.

4. Know That Game Is Necessary

As observed in my story and in the article describing the nature of "The Sexodus" and those men who are a part of it, game is necessary. We no longer live in a man's world, at least not here in western society. This is a world where natural male instincts and behaviors are more commonly considered pathologies and diseases than simple facts of life. Harmless follies made in the male process of understanding the opposite sex are no longer mere follies – they are affronts to society itself and matters of national concern.

The modern dating arena in the western world is, in some ways, a minefield for young men. Their very nature is offensive to their society. Teenaged males have long been clueless with regard to the opposite sex, but whereas in the past such cluelessness may have been laughed off or treated as harmless folly, today it might be treated as grounds for a criminal investigation, or (as was more mercifully the case in my instance) the costly smearing of one's reputation (along with the anxiety and isolation that comes with it). This makes cluelessness more costly than ever.

Had I maintained a more firm understanding of some of the most fundamental principles of game and red pill thought (ex: outcome independence, basic rapport building, etc), I might have left the fraternity house that night absent any experiences I'd come to regret. The same goes for millions of other young men who have paid the price for a lack of basic game.

Many false rape accusations are based on a girl's regret. My case was one of these: I attracted the girl, showed my weakness and inexperience as the interaction went on, and made the girl regret her decision to let me anywhere near her (and risk her reputation in the process).

If you are able to build and maintain a decent level of comfort and rapport with a girl (such that she genuinely enjoys the time spent with you), you will be less likely to do something that makes her uncomfortable and she will be less likely to regret your interaction. The better your understanding of game and the more complete your digestion of the red pill, the better you will be at establishing this comfort and rapport on a regular basis.

In short, my experience can be added to the already extensive list of things indicating that game is necessary.

I've come a long way and matured a lot during the last few years, and perhaps I have these experiences to thank for that. Maybe I would not have come as far as I have without having them to violently shock me into taking the right path. Had I not been punished for being a needy, gameless idiot, I'd probably have carried on being a needy, gameless idiot.

Incentives drive behavior, and these experiences gave me incentive to make a change for the better. Regardless of their possible utility, however, I am above all just glad that they're behind me. Hopefully, if you can learn the lessons that I hadn't yet at 18, you'll not need to put such experiences behind you.

Read More: 3 Signs She's Making A False Rape Accusation

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

8 Things To Expect When Dating A Muslim Girl

January 9, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

Muslims account for over twenty percent of the population of the world and more than that fraction of prime-aged girls. For religious and cultural reasons these girls tend to be quite inaccessible to outsiders and often have their romantic and sexual choices restricted or simply made on their behalf.

A high proportion of Muslim girls, families, and communities take religious and cultural practices and rules seriously. These practices include an outright ban on romantic and sexual contact with non-Muslim men. That makes them a difficult, but not impossible challenge for an outsider. The journey to success with a Muslim girl is often challenging but can be a rewarding one.

This article attempts to offer some guidance on what a man should expect on this journey.

All points are generalizations only, based on the personal experiences of the author, who is not a Muslim. As with any other religious group there is a high level of variation between individuals within that group. These points should only be seen as tendencies to look out for and warnings of what to be prepared for, not as certainties.

1. Subtle cues

Associating with non-Muslim men or being seen to encourage the prospect is a much riskier proposition for a Muslim girl. Consequently, Muslim girls will give more subdued signals and will wait for greater certainty before clearly demonstrating interest. If a girl with a headscarf shows the slightest sign of interest then she is very interested. If she allows herself to be isolated or consents to any kind of public display then sex is a virtual certainty. Remember that to her what others see and think is everything so privacy, secrecy and subtlety are gold.

2. Distinct sex roles

Sex roles are distinct both in the sense of being clearly different and being defined in a distinctive way. For example, if she has a vehicle and the man doesn't she will often expect him to drive, even on a first meeting or date. Another common theme is to get a direct question such as "If I wanted to leave would you let me?" This question is a strange kind of shit test. It's not an answer that comes naturally for a western guy, but the expected response is something like "No, you can't leave."

A Muslim girl will be extremely loyal as long as she believes the road to a permanent relationship is open. Showing strength and alpha characteristics is still vital, but at least a nod to beta provider game is indispensable in this demographic.

3. Threats of injury, prison, and death

There is no easy way around this one. Expect deadly serious physical threats from her and from those close to her if they know or suspect the situation. In my experience these threats are always just hot air. On the other hand, everyone has heard about situations where they turned out to be all too serious. Threats by themselves do not indicate any personal ill will. Just think of them as negotiating tactics.

As with all threats it is critical to maintain a steady, untroubled manner. Make a clear decision to dismiss the threat, back down fully or leave then own that choice fully. Visible fear or vacillation is like waving a red rag at a bull. Choose as safe a medium and environment for such conversations as possible. Acknowledging understanding and requesting time to think, decide or learn can be a useful tactic for escaping a situation that seems imminently dicey.

4. Attempts to manage perceptions

Muslim girls will feel shame at the thought of others knowing about her forbidden love, but not personal guilt. Consequently her focus will not be on reluctance to do but on reluctance to be seen to do. She will probably attempt to hide any contacts from her family and peers. If she is not a virgin she will likely claim to have only one previous partner who raped or coerced her.

She will be obsessed with evading awkward questions about relationship status from others and avoid situations in which they might come up. Interactions are sometimes carefully managed to imply her boyfriend is her husband without telling a direct lie.

5. Demands to convert to Islam

A Muslim girl will usually have marriage in mind as an endgame from an early stage. The rules of the religion do not allow any marriage unless the man agrees to convert to Islam. Therefore she will also have that in mind from an early stage.

Her family will hope to resolve the situation in one of two ways—by either getting rid of the man or forcing marriage with conversion. This is one of the topics which can be expected to trigger physical threats. Those threats will become more direct, immediate, and forceful as the perceived level of seriousness of the relationship increases.

Conversion means agreeing to a set of odious religious rules covering every aspect of life down to the smallest detail. Obviously it is not something that can be sincerely agreed to or insincerely agreed to while remaining a man of strength, character, and value.

6. A trouble-free sex life

Islamic religious rules mandate that a girl give her husband sex at any time or in any manner he chooses. Muslim girls typically live up to this one in any sexual relationship.

For girls circumcision is common in some areas but covers a wide range of practices, from minor to absolutely brutal. The minor kind will not change the practice of sex much, but does seem to make losing virginity a more painful and bloody experience. I have no firsthand experience of the more severe practices. Circumcision is mandatory for men in Islam. Girls will not have a problem with a man who is not.

7. Religious rules that intrude on normal life

Expect as much pressure to comply with religious rules for living as she feels she can get away with. This pressure will take the form of outright appeals to religion, but also of seemingly unrelated lobbying and rationalizations. My strategy is to evade these conflicts until the relationship becomes sexual, then cheerfully violate every rule as much as possible.

Even the least religious Muslim girls will shun pork and probably alcohol. Any influence she might have will be used to avoid them and not just for her. For eating out she will go to great lengths to choose the most compliant eating establishment. That means having the most Arabic script, space for prayers etc., failing that serving only halal food, failing that not serving pork.

In theory every Muslim prays five times a day. Compliance will probably be patchy though. The process involves washing in a mandated style, then putting on a prayer costume, then doing the prayer itself on a prayer mat. Annoyingly the first prayer is at five in the morning. By default no consideration, such as going into another room, will be shown so expect to be woken up.

During the month of Ramadan many girls will fast during daylight hours. Muslims will usually try to claim that others can't eat because it is somehow rude and unfair on those who are fasting. This month features more compliance with prayer schedules and her cooking breakfast before dawn too. In theory it also means no sex during daylight hours, but in practice girls will if it comes up.

8. Lack of interest in contraceptives and abortion

In Western communities contraception and to a lesser extent abortion are routine parts of life. Not so in this case. Do not expect her to be using contraceptives or to push for their use. In the event of pregnancy she is unlikely to want an abortion and her family will definitely not agree to an abortion.

If Western women are not satisfying your needs or meeting your standards, it may be worth giving a Muslim woman a chance. Muslim women often are able to provide what Western women lack.

Read More: 8 Essential Rules For Banging A Single Mom

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

How Boredom Kills Your Workouts And How To Overcome It

January 9, 2015 | by Eric | Link | Original Link

We all know working out works. We all know that women prefer muscular guys and that the game is improving every day for men who are in shape. This isn't the problem. The problem is actually getting off your ass and to the gym in the first place.

Plus a lot of guys just plain hate working out. Let's face it, working out is work and work sucks. The good news is it doesn't have to, at least not to such an extent that you quit after the first week and go back to the couch.

Here are a few ways to resist the urge and keep soldiering your ass into the gym everyday.

Get Fun Workouts

Don't have a physical hobby? Get one. Try boxing, skiing, surfing, or jiu jitsu. Your body should be used and it should feel better to work in a well-conditioned body than a poorly conditioned one. Your workouts themselves should even be fun. Don't like lifting weights? Try a boot camp or a boxing class instead.

Shorten Your Workout

You don't have to sacrifice results to do this. A lot of CrossFit workouts are only 20-30 minutes long. Focus on the major movements and get on to something more fun in your life.

Shortening a workout makes it more intense and easier to deal with. If you can last through 30 minutes of pain every day, you can get a great body and make it easier to talk yourself into the workout every day.

Get a Workout Partner

Right now, I work out with my girlfriend. It's a great way for us to bond. We both feel better, look better, have better sex and get more compliments. A few years ago, it was my friend Mike. Nothing made me more excited than answering the phone and having him yell "Let's get huge! I'm on my way to your house!"

Turning working out into a social experience adds value, makes it easier and more motivating, and helps build accountability while making the workouts themselves a more fun experience. If you don't have a workout partner, get one.

Show Off Your Gains

Making some progress? Start wearing sleeveless shirts, going to the beach or wearing tighter fitting clothes. Women will notice and it will make the work you've done more worthwhile.

If you're not making gains, well, get a better workout plan. If you are, you know what to do.

Use More Variety

You aren't supposed to change up your workouts significantly except every 4 to 8 weeks, but for some people, that might not be enough. While I don't advocate jumping from program to program, make sure what you're doing progresses, has variety and gives you enough change that you aren't doing the same thing month after month.

Just Remember, You WILL QUIT if you Hate It…

So don't hate it. Remember, the gym is your time. Your boss isn't there. Your girlfriend or wife isn't there. You aren't punching in or punching out. You are doing it for yourself and should feel empowered, not annoyed.

If you hate it and see it as a necessary evil in your quest for a richer life, better health, and more abundance of sexual options, you will be gone before you know it. Even those with incredible discipline will have a tough time talking themselves into doing something that they hate. You are no different.

I'm not doing this to preach or make you feel inadequate. Ask any passionate athlete, bodybuilder, or fitness model if they enjoy what they do at the gym and most will tell you that they do. They survive not because they're better than you, but because they have more drive to do it.

Find your reason to enjoy going to the gym so you can stick to it.

Read More: 5 Pre-Workout Tips For Consistently Better Workouts

Eric

Eric Conklin is a writer, fitness nerd, and marketing professional. When not building websites like PremiumWorkouts.com, he enjoys working out, traveling, gaming, martial arts and everything in between.

An Occurrence At Owl Creek Bridge: On The Beauty Of Life

January 9, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

2Wycked: I highly recommend you watch the embedded video first before I summarize the short film. It truly is a beautiful piece of cinematography.

"An Occurrence At Owl Creek Bridge," aired by the Twilight Zone in its final season, was a French short film produced and released in 1962, winning awards for best short film at the Cannes Film Festival and the Academy Awards. It is based off a popular, but often forgotten gem of a short story by Ambrose Bierce.

As the episode opens, we are greeted with a Civil War sign stating that any civilian caught interfering with railroad bridges will be summarily hanged. The steady staccato of drums is heard—admist the chattering of birds and local fauna—as a man (Peyton Farquhar) is lead by Union soldiers across a bridge onto a plank.

It is clear that Peyton is about to be executed. He is solemn but apprehensive as a soldier lashes up the rope that will serve as his death. Peyton becomes increasingly more distraught as he sees the line of soldiers prepared to watch his hanging and his view of the peaceful, meandering river beneath his bound feet. Moments before the hanging, he closes his eyes and envisions his house and kids, as his wife moves to embrace him.

As the plank is withdrawn and he seemingly plunges to his death, the rope snaps and he shoots straight into the river. He undoes his feet and arm bindings quickly and rises to the surface. Once there, he notices he has a strange sensibility to the minutiae of the flora and fauna around him; for example, he notices and appreciates a spider delicately spinning its web.

Peyton quickly becomes aware the Union soldiers are organizing to rifle him down in the river. He stares down the barrel of one rifle before haphazardly tossing about in the river, desperately swimming away from the gunfire. Bullets richocet off the surfaces and water around him as he finds his way through the increasingly churning waves to a small bit of shore.

Once on this peaceful spot of sand, Peyton celebrates his miraculously improbable escape with the giddy zeal only a man faced with the crushing weight of his impending death can understand. Once collecting himself, he races through grassy fields and around overgrown shrubs towards his home. After some time, he collapses on the bark of a big tree, his bloodied hands weak and tired.

Despite this, he ventures on, finally reaching the spell of trees that leads to the iron-wrought gates of his home. Peyton passes through the gates, slowly but with the plodding assurance that the most taxing period of his life has lead him back to the refuge of his soul: his family. His wife—clad in a luxurious dress—descends the steps of their gorgeous home, beaming at him. He begins to run towards her, his hungry, grateful arms extended at full length.

They do meet, with her hands embracing Peyton’s face as tears stream her own. Just as they lean in to kiss, his neck jerks back violently, as the noose breaks his neck.

In a startling turn of events, we realize that the rope never broke free at all, only snapping his neck. Peyton's heartbreaking journey home was just a myth, a fleeting wisp of fantasy inside the mind of a man facing his own mortality. His mental race home to his loved ones was simply the dying fancy of a man seeking love inside a cold, loveless world.

The episode ends with Peyton's lifeless corpse hanging in the strangely quiet and still air at Owl Creek Bridge as Serling orates:

An occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge – in two forms, as it was dreamed, and as it was lived and died. This is the stuff of fantasy, the thread of imagination…the ingredients of the Twilight Zone.

First off, the quality of this episode must be noted. The acting was superb, the pacing was excellent and the shots were well done. Based off the short story, the short did everything it needed to do to portray the quiet yearnings of a man whose heart hungered for the love and curiosity for life that death cuts short. The twist at the end is executed with brilliance. The episode leaves the viewer with the haunting sense of loss that Peyton himself must have felt before he plunged to his death.

The supernatural elements of this episode and the heart-wrenching twist certainly place this short in the auspices of the Twilight Zone. However, the apolitical nature of the episode combined with the lack of a moral, philosophical, or psychological element or angle is most striking. This episode cannot be boiled down to a "war is hell" angle or "the inherent unethicality of capital punishment." This episode defies categorization unless you draw the very simple—but often overlooked angle—that life is inherently beautiful.

This episode is simply about a civilian who is put to death for his Confederate political sympathies that lead him to violate a Union order about harming railroads. It isn't about American politics, geographical chauvinism, or the morality of capital punishment during wartime: it is about one man facing his death and his desire for life and love in a world that is all too often devoid of either.

Peyton—as he walks the gallows—has visions of life that reflect two key concepts that make life beautiful: curiosity and love.

As he arises from the waters of the river, he immediately is cognizant of the flora and fauna around him. He is aware of the songs of the birds around him and the natural ambiance of the forest. His acute awareness—combined with his acknowledgement of the spider spinning its web—represents his recognition of the curiosity that is the world.

Curiosity for the world is a key component for understand the beauty that is life. It might be a child toying with a fork in an electrical outlet; it might be an adult test driving cars at a local dealership, but what curiosity represents is an invigorating interest in the world around you. Curiosity takes on a number of forms that approach the infinite in the human experience, but it represents the devotion to discerning and explaining the world around you.

Still, this fascination with the world can only be pieced together and held tight by love. Fascination with the world around you isn't sufficient for appreciating the beauty this world has to offer: only when it is fused hand-in-hand with love can it be fully understood. A man isn't a rock nor an isolated island, he is surrounded by multitudes of others who—like him—are eager to understand the world and find their place in it.

In this episode, Peyton is presented with the wondrous experience of perception that piques his curiosity. Yet, what makes all this curious perception worthwhile is his family. This love for his family causes him to tear through miles upon miles of wooded lands in search of them. His interest in the world around him not just speaks to his existence as a man, but also to the love for his family that speaks to his reason for existing.

It is tough to see this at the ending of this episode, but the lesson is that life is beautiful. Not that it is short, not that is brutish, but that if you simply take the time to acknowledge the world the around you (curiosity) and appreciate for what it is (love), you can appreciate the beauty that is life.

Read More: Why The Past Is Best Left In The Past

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

The Types Of Girls You Hook Up With While Traveling The World

January 10, 2015 | by Nicholas Jack | Link | Original Link

Most people know that by traveling you can date a very diverse selection of women. By traveling you will find yourself with girls of different races, body types, and upbringings. I have spent a lot of time traveling and dating the local women; from daughters of drug lords to the girls who use magic to fix their problems. The world is full of many sexy girls with interesting stories, here are the stories of some of those girls that I have made mine.

Daughters of powerful men

Traveling the world with game and the added value of being an exotic foreigner, you can sometimes run into the elite class. The types of girls that are at times pains in the asses and at times amazing. Here are some of my stories:

Colombian politician's daughter

While in Colombia I ended up meeting the daughter of a very big Colombian politician (not going to say the name for obvious reasons) while I was arriving at my apartment. She knew the landlord of the apartments that I was staying at. She had an amazing rack and I opened her by asking my landlord a question then saying "Quien es? Who is this?" nodding in the daughter's direction.

Some more drama happened, but overall I had a great time with this girl.

Drug lord's daughter

While in Mexico I unknowingly dated the daughter of a drug cartel boss. He wasn't the top guy, but he was very high up. It wasn't until much later and after plenty of drama that I found out the truth. During this time I partied with narcos (drug cartel employees) quite a bit. It's harder than you would imagine to know who is a narco and who isn't. Most are just normal dudes wanting to make some money.

Ready more about the Drug Lord's Daughter HERE.

Famous Kung Fu master's daughter

I had been pipelining (Online dating before arrival. You can check out my online dating strategy here.) for my trip to Asia. I had ended up chatting with a girl from China. At first she was pretty cold, but after doing my normal webcam routine she was 110% into me. She planned a vacation to the Philippines while I was going to be there. We ended up spending a week together at a resort on the island of Cebu.

I had been trying to get digital memories of her when she said:

> Wait. You can't, my father is famous in China and if it gets out it could be very bad.

She broke down and did it.

> Ok, but you can't show my face.

Haitian politician's daughter

This one was very recent, in fact I just messaged her yesterday and we are planning to see each other again. I met her online. She had opened an account on an internet dating website for a total of two days. During that time I was able to get her whatsapp. Next thing you know she had vanished from the dating website.

I'm pretty solid with online game and I was able to get her out for a date. This girl had flawless English, the best I have heard on this island. This girl's Iphone 5 and really expensive clothes were the first thing that tipped me off. Then one day during pillow talk she told me who her father is.

I still get jealous when she talks about her maid's bomb meals and cleaning.

Mysterious girl in Pattaya

I had spent a lot of time gaming and had just failed at getting laid with a Russian girl thanks to bad logistics, but I knew I had to get laid that night. It was just after new years and Pattaya was buzzing with visitors. I went back to the club and ran into this Thai girl with a really pretty face.

I ended up spending the entire night with her into the morning, and then the afternoon. Her driver ended up driving us to the beach, he was big for a Thai guy and she said he was also her body guard.

> Who are you?

I asked her.

> I'm nobody, but my father is.

She wouldn't tell me any more about who he was. I dropped it and I got her to return back to my place with me. She put up a lot of LMR before finally giving in. She never told me who her father was, but I still wonder.

Girls who think they are ugly because of racism in their country

Traveling the world, you realize that skin color means much more outside the western world. The types of girls with light skin are considered more attractive in nearly every place I have visited. You can use this to your advantage if you are a white guy, but you can also use it to your advantage because there are these BEAUTIFUL darker skinned girls that literally believe they are ugly. These same girls would be obsessed over by countless men where I'm from in USA, but culture has caused their obvious beauty to be mostly ignored.

Philippine beauty

At the beginning of my trip to the Philippines I pipelined a brown Filipina girl. Filipinas come in all colors, the lighter being seen as more attractive. However, this girl had a stunning face and a really nice body. When I started talking to her she mentioned how lucky she was to have a chance to go on a date with me.

It blew my mind how a girl that pretty and young (18 years old) could be so grateful just to get a shot with me. Sex was easy with her, she was happy to do anything for me. The quote that I remember and just highlights how she really believed I was out of her league

> If we are dating, you can be with other girls, you just have to wear a condom.

She was saying this to try to get me to date her. A beautiful girl with no clue what she had to offer. Tragedy.

Colombian beauty

While in Colombia I met a skinny 19-year-old girl online. I met up with her and we ended up spending the next 36 hours together. She was very sexy. She was probably a mix of 1/3 black, 1/3 white, 1/3 native. It made a very curvy and sexy body. However, because of that 30% black, most locals saw her as less attractive than she really was. You could only see it if you looked closely or looked at her ass, but with locals it was the first thing they saw.

This girl ended up being one of my favorite girls from Colombia and she was probably the girl who thought her own value was the lowest of all the girls I hooked up with here.

Dominican girl with perfect ass and cute face

There is one particular girl I have in mind, but there are a few that fit the bill. I met this beautiful girl with an AMAZING ASS and cute face. This girl was easy to meet (like most black girls are here) and had a lower self esteem thanks to the color of her skin. This girl turns me on so much with her soft skin and perfectly shaped ass.

When we are walking around we will get funny looks. They don’t understand why a white guy would go for a black girl, sexy or not.

The nymphos and kinky girls

If you’ve been with as many girls as I have you will run into occasional types of girls that are nymphos or kinky. These types of girls can be fun, but you best wrap up.

Philippine girl who came straight to my room

I was in Cagayan de Oro and I had been loving it. It was a town where a foreigner’s value is VERY high. There was a girl that had been sending me all sorts of messages, wanting to meet up. I wouldn’t do it because she was so young (17), but she said her birthday was in a few days. Her birthday passed and she kept insisting to meet. Finally I told her she could come over to my hotel room and watch a movie with me.

She arrived and was cuter than in her photos. With a surprisingly nice rack. Thirty minutes later we were banging. I asked this newly turned 18-year-old how many guys she had been with.

> I have slept with 19 guys, 20 with you.

Wow. If you have read my book The Key Logger: A Forbidden Glimpse of the True Nature of Women, you know that it is rare that a girl is 100% honest about this number, most likely that number is more like 60. Barely 18 years old, wow.

Thai/Indian girl in Bangkok

It was my second day in Thailand, I had been pipelining and I got a REALLY hot girl to agree to meet. This was not a problem, except that it was too easy, which usually means there is a problem.

We met and yeah I had an insta-crush. She was a mix of white, Thai, and Indian and it was so stunning. We went for a drink then back to my place. When we got in bed, there was no LMR—in fact she practically got herself naked on my bed. She was only 18 years old with a sexy body.

We went at it for a good 35 minutes. I finished and fell into bed, exhausted. She looked at me for a moment, kissed me, then went and got something from her purse. She returned to bed and I heard a buzzing sound.

> Is that a vibrator?
>
> I'm just really horny.

I remember being offended and probably coming off a bit that way as she continued to use it on herself.

> I don't know why I'm this way, I can't help it.

Was what I remember this young, 18 year old girl saying. That's just the way she was.

Nympho in Bangkok

It was interesting that my first two nights in Bangkok were with nymphos. However, the first one was pretty extreme. I remember receiving nude photos without asking (I met her online) and she was my last option for the night and she came straight to my hotel at night. We ended up banging right away.

It turns out this same nympho also went on to have sex with fellow Swoop writers Fisto and THC, which you can read about here.

Mexican girl who loved bondage

While in Guadalajara I ended up meeting an interesting girl. She was one of the types of girls you wouldn't expect to be kinky. We met up and went to the movies. She dressed conservatively and her shy smile painted a picture of a nice girl, but she could not hide her amazing ass. Everything was really easy with her. We ended up back at my hotel room and there was a bit of LMR, but not too much to handle.

I really liked this girl and continued seeing her for the next couple of months. During this time she revealed to me her ultimate fetish: bondage. I'm a sexual guy so I played along, trying everything out. We even ended up making our own little bondage porno.

Girls who experienced traumatic events

Mexican girl that was kidnapped

While in Guadalajara, Mexico I met a girl online. She added me on Facebook and wouldn't even entertain the idea of meeting me for a couple months. Over those couple months we chatted every few days and she eventually told me she was ready to meet. She showed up to the date in a new Ford Mustang. "Well, she must have a decent job." I thought. The date went perfectly, but even after trying I wasn't able to seal the deal for the next couple dates. After I finally did during pillow talk, she told me something interesting:

> "The reason I didn't want to meet you for so long is that I have had some bad experiences… He estado secuestrado – I have been kidnapped"

It caught me off guard and she continued to explain that she came from a family with money and that she was kidnapped for one month while they were trying to ransom her. She was able to escape.

I got curious and asked for more details, but she would get really sad when she talked about it and I wouldn't push more. We continued seeing each other for the rest of the time I was in Mexico. We still talk frequently on Facebook, she is a sweet girl.

Haitian girl witnessing the aftermath of the earthquake

As most people know, one of the worst earthquakes ever recorded happened a couple of years ago in Haiti. While I was there I day gamed a girl and then went on an insta-date. Thirty minutes later we were having a pillow talk session. The earthquake was on my mind so I asked her about it.

> "I remember buildings crumbling all around me and screams. Then all I can > remember were the bodies. I would see them everywhere for months after the earthquake."

I can't imagine how seeing those types of things must have affected her, but Haiti is definitely a country that is rebuilding.

Cambodian girl having to hide from the bad regime

Cambodia had the worst genocide of all time a couple decades ago. They executed 1/3rd of their own population. If people were on the wrong side they were hunted, if they represented western values (doctors, teachers, people with glasses, etc.) they were executed. I asked one of my girls from Cambodia about it.

> "I remember hiding in the jungle with my mom. She would keep telling me to keep quiet whenever people would approach. I was very hungry, but I knew this was more serious. They found most of my family, but I don't want to talk about that."

There is a reason Cambodia is like the wild west of Asia. Laws are pretty much non-existent. You can do whatever you want if you have the money (very little) to pay off the police and a lot of the people are very aggressive… especially the women. I have never seen any more girl fights than the two weeks I was in Cambodia.

Philippine girl watching people swept down the river with their houses

As most people know, the Philippines get hit hard by tropical storms. There was the recent one in central Philippines, but the previous big one happened right before I arrived in Cagayan de Oro.

I met a tiny, skinny little Philippine girl in a bar. She was so shy, but I really enjoyed spending time with her. I asked her about the storm and she told me a story that I hadn't heard.

> "There were many houses being swept down the river and on the broken pieces of wood there were people clinging to them, trying not to drown."

In the Philippines there are a lot of poor people. These poor people don't have enough money to buy land, so they build their houses on the banks of the rivers because these are no build zones where they don't have to own it.

When floods and storms happen, these no build zones are the places that get hit the hardest. Apparently, the government doesn't count the poor people that lived there because they were living there "illegally." Most those storms you hear about over there kill a lot more people than the government wants to admit.

The Thai girl with a scar as long as her body

I had met a girl from online dating. I remember everything going well, up to the point where I tried to take off her clothes. She fought it very hard and I finally gave up.

> “I don’t understand, but it’s OK. I should get some sleep.” I told her.

She left and about 15 minutes later I get a text.

> “Can I sleep with you?”
> “Sure.” I replied.

She returned and we continued where we left off. I started taking off her clothes, and her hesitation made sense when I saw a very thick scar that ran down the left side of her body. It wound from her foot all the way up to her arm pit.

> “Where did you get that?”
> “I don’t want to talk about it.” She replied.
> “Ok.”

I accepted it and continued, trying not to kill the moment.

Where the scar came from remains a mystery, but sometimes I wonder… an elephant? snake? tiger? something boring? Who knows.

The kidnapped Nicaraguan blonde

Thanks to a friend I met a blonde Nicaraguan girl who had been kidnapped when she was 18 year old by a cartel boss running drugs through Nicaragua. Her rare blonde hair is probably what made him target her. He kidnapped her from Managua and took her to a small drug town north of San Juan del Sur. She was there for 5 months being repeatedly raped and he ended up getting her pregnant.

The police caught up to the cartel boss and he was thrown in jail. The blonde girl was then able to return to her family in Managua. She had her daughter and to this day she is terrified that he will get out of jail, find her, and take her or take her daughter.

Girls using magic

Girl who went to witch doctor to heal a broken arm

In the Philippines I remember I was in bed with a Philippine girl with a really nice body (OK face). I grabbed her arm.

> “Ouch!”
> “What’s wrong?”
> “I fell out of a tree when I was a kid, my mom didn’t have enough money to bring me to the doctor, so she brought me to a witch doctor.”

Guess those chants didn’t work so well. Extra Favela Points.

Mexican girl who went to a shaman

I met a girl in Mexico, I knew she was a little weird. I had found a girl that I liked almost immediately, so I had been pretty much ignoring other girls. Ignoring had made this girl obsessed with meeting me. She was OK looking, but my current girl was much hotter, so I finally said

> "Ok. I will meet you, but we have to have sex."

Basically she ended up agreeing to it, hoping that I would like the sex and we would have a chance as a couple afterwards. It didn't work out so well, but I did see her twice.

A few months later, when I was already in the DR, I started getting messages from her:

"We are meant to be together, I have checked."

"What?" I responded.

"I went to a (Mexican shaman) and she told me that you are in love with me."

"I'm in the Caribbean, we will probably never see each other and I'm just not in love with you. You will find the right guy."

"I gave you a love potion." She said.

"A love potion?"

"That's why you wanted to see me again." She responded.

I stopped talking to her. I don't know how I drank it or what it was, but slipping things into my food or drink is not cool.

Girls with cool jobs

Opera singer's daughter

In the Dominican Republic I dated the daughter of an opera singer. I met her online, and she had this beautiful, innocent looking face that I loved. I'm still seeing her when I get the time. I met her mom after a show and she so fits the part. Overweight (unlike the daughter), but a pretty face.

Professional ballerina

This is the only girl I never had sex with in these articles, because it was when I was younger and wouldn't have sex for religious reasons. She was half Italian and she had that dancer's form. I really enjoyed her. As a man who loves variety, I can really appreciate their strong bodies.

The fashion designer

In Mexico I hooked up with a semi-famous local fashion designer. She had her own line and easily made more money than me. However, she talked WAY too much. Sweet girl though.

Model types

I remember when I was younger thinking that the ultimate girl would be a model. Now after dating countless “models,” I have realized that it really means nothing. In fact, a lot of times these types of women aren’t even that good looking. The models I have hooked up with have ranged anywhere from “ok” to very attractive, but most were somewhere in the middle.

Travel

That’s all the girls I will share with you. This all happened because I took the risk and did one thing: travel. I would never have been with any of these girls if it weren’t for me dropping everything and deciding to travel the world. I have never met a person who has ever said that they regret travelling.

These days people live through their TVs, but it’s a hundred times better when you live the action, adventure, danger, passion and romance yourself. You can make this happen if you make the sacrifices necessary to do your own traveling. Get out there and find out what types of girls YOU end up with.

Read More: 4 Thoughts I Didn’t Have While Traveling

Nicholas Jack
AKA 20Nation. Join me on my adventures around the world as I bang my way through the local women by going to SwoopTheWorld.com. I've been doing this for the last half decade so there is tons of content. You can now get all my books for 60% off here.
Nicholas Jack the author.

Game Is A Journey Of Character Development

January 10, 2015 | by Jean Lamour | Link | Original Link

As I get older and more experienced in game, I realize that I've been developing a strong character like you would writing a script for a movie. Nowadays, because there's such a lack of character in pop culture, guys might not really understand what "character" means.

I remember one of the screen writing classes I took in film school that taught me the difference between a dynamic character and a static one. I must say that I never forgot what I learned in that course, and still use it to measure my character development in game.

1. Static Character

Static characters are the opposite of dynamic; static characters do not change. The personality of that character when he is introduced is the same personality when the story comes to a close. And all his actions in between stay true to that personality.

While our story is our "journey in game," most of us are static characters even when we seek to transform our personalities by learning how to pick up and seduce women. We become frustrated when we try to mask who we are by cheesy pickup lines and dead-end routines. Truth is, fake it 'til you make it is necessary for most of us, much like a hero in a movie must first wake up from his delusion and hear the call to duty.

If a character in a movie is to become a successful hero, then he needs a wizard or "guru" to show him the way, which boils down to convincing him that he has it within himself already to make a difference. If the character is a good person to begin with, then there's no reason to change.

The only thing that can make his character more interesting is to make him face very difficult challenges that will test his ability to overcome personal weakness. In pick-up, we advance our inner game when we challenge ourselves with different interactions that test our emotional weaknesses.

2. Dynamic Character

A dynamic character is a literary or dramatic character who undergoes an important inner change, such as a change in personality or attitude: Ebeneezer Scrooge is a dynamic character.

If our game lacks empathy or genuine interest in a girl, then it's going to be very difficult to seduce her. For example, how are you going to overcome different obstacles or objections if you can't offer a "false time constraint" so she feels free to leave anytime she feels uncomfortable? Every good seducer has either changed to become or already is an "easy-going" person. Therefore, one needs to determine if they are going to be a static character or a dynamic one in their journey in game.

3. Nice Guys vs. Bad Boy Characters

Believe it or not, both the "nice guy" and the "bad boy" are static characters. In fact, a woman who is attracted to you will test your character to see if you can handle her emotional state. The nicer the guy, the more important it is for his yes to mean yes and his no to mean no. The more a guy has a bad attitude, the more thoughtful and flexible he must be towards a girl.

It's not congruent in your character to be a nice guy and then attempt to be "dynamic" by becoming a "bad boy." Movies with these types of characters are generally comedies filled with lots of laughter and embarrassing humor.

Women hunger for drama like men crave serenity, so give it to them by simply being congruent. Don't worry about creating the drama, because she'll create most of it for you while on her emotional roller coaster. One minute she'll be excited to see you and the next she won't be able to stand to be near you. Your static characteristic and that immovable look on your face will provide plenty of drama for her emotions to feed off of.

A good "chick flick" that most women drool over is when the masculine character is super congruent while the feminine one goes on this epic emotional rampage. At the end of the movie, the girl always falls in love with a guy who can handle her emotionally and the male figure realizes again how easier it was to stay true to himself.

4. How To Develop Character

A well-known professional screenwriter John Truby says that Hollywood discovered what makes an audience care for a particular character in a movie, and that is not necessarily a specific goal to be achieved. Instead, it's a particular weakness the main character has to overcome while on his journey to success.

This is how the method should be when developing our character in game; to overcome some personal weakness or flaw in our persona. In fact, this is the only way we as an audience to ourselves, will stay engaged and interested in game.

One of the greatest movies of all time was The Wizard of Oz, because each of the main four characters had some sort of weakness to overcome while on their journey to the Emerald City. At the end of the yellow brick road, the wizard turned out to be not that powerful. However, the Lion found courage, the Tin Man finally had a heart, the Scarecrow did have a brain, and Dorothy discovered it's better to dream big and always risk adventure.

What our journey in game leads to is the realization that so-called "top dating gurus" and products in the pick-up community were never enough to improve your game overnight. We find out how much of an adventure it is to learn game for real so that a man's life is never boring and always full of character.

Read More: A Simple Way To Understand Inner Game

Jean Lamour

Jean is a business owner in the transportation industry and a lover of women, with over a 20 year long journey in Game and the Art of Seduction. You can find out more about him and his journey action-takers.com or see his Youtube channels at and at Jean Lamour

Understanding The Remembered Rape Syndrome

January 10, 2015 | by Oscar O'Reilly | Link | Original Link

Yet another remembered-rape story appeared in the Washington Post on Dec 18th. Headlined "It Should Never Be Too Late to Tell Your Story of Rape," it was written by Abigail Hauslohner, one of the paper's own reporters.

Hauslohner claimed that almost a decade and a half ago, as a teen, she was raped by a young man she'd considered a close friend:

> I went to visit my friend — I'll call him "X" — at his college campus. I saw X as a goofy but caring, older-brother type; we'd overlapped in high school and had a platonic and confiding sort of friendship. I never found him attractive.
>
> When X went to college, he joined a fraternity and promised to take me to a real college party. My parents, who were fairly strict and usually would not have let me spend a weekend visiting a boy on a college campus, let me go because X was a friend. I packed my coolest top — a bright pink, sleeveless turtleneck sweater — a pair of Guess jeans and a new necklace that I loved.
>
> The party was hosted by X's fraternity. I remember walking into a relatively empty house and settling in nervously on a couch. Most of the people in the room were guys, and I was eager to seem cool. X asked if I wanted a drink; I said sure. He brought me a big plastic cup full of red punch.
>
> The rest of that night I remember in flashes of images and sound. I can't remember anything between sitting on the couch and drinking from that cup, and then being propped up in the back seat of a car that wasn't X's, with someone else driving someplace. I think I lost consciousness somewhere between the couch and the car.
>
> Then I was lying on X's bed in his dorm room, and he was on top of me, kissing > me and fondling my breasts.

>
> I felt like a block of lead, melded to the bed. My vision was blurred, and the room was dim. I seemed to have no control of my body, as X struggled to remove my jeans and then my shirt, my head lolling to one side and then my body falling back onto the mattress.
> I remember suddenly feeling pain between my legs and saying "No," as loudly as I could, my voice hoarse, my lungs heavy. "No, no, no," I said again and again. But I couldn't move. I couldn't even sit up. Eventually the pain disappeared.
>
> I don't know what time it was when I woke up the next morning. My head felt like it was in the clutches of a vise, and a wave of nausea swept over me . . .
>
> n the 48 hours after I was raped, I moved about my house — and even went to a friend's home to socialize — in a dazed state of denial. The R-word was there, dangling in my mind, like a nightmare that lingers after waking. But I couldn't bring myself to say it out loud . . .

As a staff reporter for the Post, Hauslohner would appear to have a credibility that most other women in this genre have lacked. I'm sure she drew a lot of sympathy from readers. But as I see it, she fits into the hysterical pattern even better than Bill Cosby's accusers.

Just to start with, there is the less-than-convincing account of how she got from sitting on a couch at a frat party to lying powerless in her friend's bed. Hauslohner apparently wants us to think that she was drugged, but fails to state that directly, and the rest of her account isn't really consistent with a "date rape drugging" involving Rohypnol or ketamine. Studies suggest that such drugs are almost never used in alleged date rape cases anyway, alcohol being the usual judgment-impairing culprit.

And if Hauslohner went to a party and merely drank more than she could handle—as she half-acknowledges by writing that she wanted to seem cool to the college men—her account looks very "edited." She "remembers" saying no to sex and being penetrated anyway, but somehow can recall little else in the hours leading up to that point, except that she was incapacitated to the point of being helpless—and presumably (though implausibly) had to be carried and "propped up" everywhere.

I wonder what X and his frat brothers would say about Hauslohner's behavior that night. Certainly her account is what you'd expect—light on the details, and totally lacking in corroborative evidence (even friends she saw the next day would have noted nothing amiss, she admits)—of a woman who merely got drunk, impaired her judgment, and later regretted the things she did while so impaired.

The conservative pundit (and Stanford Law grad) Heather MacDonald wrote a great piece on "The Campus Rape Myth" several years ago, which ought to be required reading now that the subject is back on the front burner. Among other things she noted:

> Campus rape ideology holds that inebriation strips women of responsibility for their actions but preserves male responsibility not only for their own actions but > for their partners' as well. Thus do men again become the guardians of female well-being.

The traumatic memory

What struck me even more about Hauslohner's story was something she wrote at the start of her article:

> . . . it wasn't until I completed an intensive course of therapy for post-traumatic stress disorder in October that I was able to finally confront pain I've been carrying with me for 14 years. I had gone to see a PTSD therapist to seek relief from what I've witnessed and experienced as a Middle East and war correspondent, to deal with the fear that had taken over my dreams and had begun to affect my work. I wanted to be able to react calmly to loud noises — instead of sensing an explosion every time a door slammed or a car backfired.

I don't know the details of Hauslohner's "intensive course of therapy." But the fact that she has been seeing a therapist and has been diagnosed with PTSD is at least consistent with the hypothesis that her memories are mutable.

Many of the hysterical syndromes that have arisen throughout history, especially recent history (e.g. multiple personality disorder), have had to do ostensibly with "traumatic memories"—typically of rape or some other form of sexual abuse by men. As Sigmund Freud and his colleague Josef Breuer wrote in 1891, "the hysteric suffers mainly from reminiscences."

Few therapists want to use the term "hysteria" these days, because of its negative connotations. But whether they call it PTSD or something else, they still tend to believe that the patient's otherwise-inexplicable symptoms—anxieties, neuroses, personality shifts, vague aches and pains—are manifestations of a traumatic event in the past that has never been sufficiently acknowledged.

Thus, in the therapy setting, the patient is likely to be encouraged to transform any painful memory or even a hint of one into a "memory" of a full-blown trauma that can "explain" her symptoms and hopefully resolve them by being brought out into the open.

Until recently, therapists had what they thought was an amazingly easy tool for finding such traumatic memories: they used hypnosis to guide the patient back through her past and thereby "recover" the memories she had suppressed. By the mid 1990s it was clear that this technique was simply generating false memories, and it was largely abandoned.

However, it remains easy, in practice, for a therapist even inadvertently to coach a patient into turning the hazy memory of drunken, later-regretted sex—a "trauma" complicated by the patient's own complicity and guilt—into a more detailed but essentially false memory of outright rape, in which the patient was powerless and thus not at fault.

The purpose of “rape memories”

What I think most people fail to understand about these new rape “memories” is that they are meant principally to have a therapeutic effect for the women involved. That therapeutic effect may also be enhanced for those women who publicize their stories via the media, join support groups, etc.—because the resulting positive, sympathetic feedback helps to validate and solidify the new memories.

But one thing the history of hysteria tells us loudly and clearly is that we shouldn’t take these new therapeutic “memories” as necessarily true historical accounts, nor should we be quick to take them out of the therapy context and put them into a media or a legal context.

In the multiple personality disorder hysteria of the 1980s and 1990s, the use of false sex-abuse memories to bring widely publicized criminal charges (against innocent people) typically was initiated by naïve therapists, not by the patients themselves—probably because the patients knew at some level that their therapy-induced memories were false.

PTSD appears to have become part of this “traumatic memories” tradition. It definitely appears to be a modern, culture-bound invention—not an ancient disorder that the medical profession has recently rediscovered. And although PTSD first became well known in modern times as a shell-shock condition suffered by male soldiers, and even now many PTSD claimants are male war veterans, the disorder (as you would expect of a hysterical syndrome) has come to be dominated by women, mostly women in ordinary civilian life.

Women’s claimed reasons for getting a PTSD diagnosis include rape and childhood sexual abuse—as was the case for the multiple personality disorder epidemic—but also relatively common and mild events such as giving birth. And since there is no objective clinical test that can rule PTSD in or out, and patients in search of a PTSD diagnosis can easily shop around until they find an obliging therapist, there has been nothing to stop PTSD from becoming epidemic.

As Hauslohner’s account shows, that epidemic has infected even journalists in the mainstream media—which I guess is another reason, if one were needed, to take remembered-rape claims in the MSM with a big pinch of salt.

Read More: The Bill Cosby Rape Scandal is Just Another Example of Modern Hysteria

Oscar O'Reilly
Oscar is a novelist and essayist.

As We Race Towards The Void

January 10, 2015 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

In my most recent adventure I ran into “Keith.”

Keith was a 44-year-old man, but was in better shape than most 23-year-olds. Riped, handsome, and a participant of jiujitsu, I felt it was more of an honor I met him than he met me. But after much conversation and realizing he and I both made some of the same disastrous mistakes men our age did, he said something common, but profound that I really didn’t appreciate until now:

“Had I known today what I know now when I was 19 the world would be ….blabbity blah blah blah.”

I had heard that refrain before, but it wasn’t until Keith mentioned it did I realize just what consequence and gravity that statement had.

Yes, Keith and I are in our 40’s.

Yes, Keith and I cannot go back in time.

But the hell if these terabytes of digital wisdom haven’t advanced the cause of thousands of young men today.

While Keith and I may not be able to benefit from the wisdom we gained through trial and tribulation, and we can only opine wistfully about “what could have been,” because of the technological advancements of today through the internet, young men of today can enjoy and realize that enviable position.

You needn’t go through the hell we did to gain our wisdom. All you need to do is merely learn from our (and thousands of other men’s) experiences and mistakes.

This, naturally, results in a HUGE and GREAT advantage young men have today over their elder peers. You know not to bother with night clubs. You know not to bother with “born again Christian” girls. And you know how to defend yourself against false rape accusations.

However, the “sage” advice goes beyond women and into life as well. You know to be a minimalist. You know to not breed unless you can afford it. And you know not to gain social status through borrowing money to purchase things you can’t afford, but rather through work and cash-only purchases. All of these things, if followed and adhered to, result in a life of ease, luxury, happiness, and strifelessness.

There’s just one problem.

This line of thought is so revolutionary and cutting-edge, it’s outpacing the genetic and Darwinistic development of humans. So much so, it presents new problems humanity has never faced before.

The problem of the future

While the internet and technology advance at the speed of light (in terms of evolutionary time), our biological and survivalistic brains have not advanced as quickly. And so, if we pursue the philosophy of minimalism, not fucking up, and just merely taking care of ourselves, technology advances so quickly and so much that it takes nearly nothing to support and survive as a single man in society today. You take away women, family, and children because the government has replaced you, and men can get by on a fraction of Star Trek impulse power.

This may at first seem a boon and advancement to male society, but you’ll quickly learn that “success” is merely replacing larger, older problems with newer lesser ones. And the newer but certainly no “lesser” one is “The Void.”

The purpose of man

Really contemplate and consider what the history of man has been. It has been one largely of struggle and survival. One of merely putting food on the table, shelter over one’s head, and defending your children who “may” survive war, famine, plague, and disease.

In other words, you busted your ass all day, only to fall asleep with little to no contemplation of the future or meaning of life. It is always backwards-looking, living in the now, never forward-looking.

However, say you didn’t fuck up. Say you didn’t have children. Say you just played your cards right and waited until you were stable to breed. Whatever the case, technology has advanced so much that there are MORE MEN THAN EVER in the HISTORY OF THE HUMAN RACE who did not breed, did not fuck up, and therefore have all the time in the world to look into the future.

Their minds are not pre-occupied with “putting food on the table” or “finding a baby sitter," but instead are forced to look into the cold, dark future of finiteness, mortality, and death, forcing them to consider the truth meaning and purpose of life.

For all the benefits the manosphere has had on men, the male population, and male psychology, an unfortunate drawback is that it is so efficient and effective that men are advancing intellectually "too" quickly. So much so that I predict MILLIONS of men are going to advance so quickly, and so efficiently, they will be forced to face the the "void," the ultimate "blackness" and the end of life.

And since the human mind and evolution has not had the track record of even getting to this point (as they were too pre-occupied merely putting food on the table or supporting their children), this "confronting the void" will start to become a more common psychological problem truly independent minded men will face.

Is there a solution?

Sadly, I have no solution. Every simulation or "mental model" I've run in my mind results in my consciousness being snuffed out. There is no "heaven." My mind does not "continue on elsewhere" in some kind of cloudy world where I meet all my buddies and reunite with my childhood dog.

In reality, my awareness won't even be around to acknowledge the void. I will simply end and be at the same state I was before i was born—non-existent.

And it is this that is the truly frightening thing that an increasing number of young men are going to have to face. Because of the philosophical advancements the manosphere has brought you, your intellectual and philosophical life is going to be fast-forwarded through life. And while there will be some IMMENSE benefits (such as avoiding drama with women, lower divorce rates, lives of leisure, etc. etc.) you will be fast-forwarded towards the inevitable conclusion and confrontation of "The Void."

And no matter how well your life is going, no matter how wonderful your wife is, and no matter how enjoyable your children are, you will unfortunately have to wrestle with the concept of finiteness, the end of your consciousness, and your utter irrelevance in this universe.

It almost makes you enviable of the simpletons breeding kids they can't afford, and are thus too pre-occupied to contemplate such heavy matters. Their ignorance must be bliss.

Read More: The Next Fifty Years Of Race And Culture In America

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

5 Uncomfortable Truths About Cracked Magazine

January 11, 2015 | by Phil Elmore | Link | Original Link

When I was a kid, “Mad Magazine” was the magazine you brought home from the drugstore if you wanted to annoy mom. It was just off-color enough, just gross enough, just funny enough, that a twelve-to-fourteen-year-old would find it irresistable. My favorite part of the magazine was always the margin doodles by Sergio Aragonés, whose tiny illustrations were somehow more satisfying that full-sized comic strips.

And then there was “Cracked.”

“Cracked” was the also-was, a publication that tried so hard to ape the style and format of “Mad” that it even poached various “Mad” staffers over the years. “Cracked” was never as good as “Mad,” but it was okay. It ran for almost 50 years before flagging circulation prompted it, briefly, to reinvent itself as something of a “lad” magazine.

In 2007 it printed its last issue and was reborn as a website that is now really nothing like either print formats. Instead, Cracked is run and written by what seems to be people in their 30s and 40s—people my age who likely read and enjoyed “Cracked” as teenagers but who have since outgrown it.

The result is a kind of news-of-the-Web infotainment site targeted to thirty-somethings and above that crowdsources funny photo captions and gives Sean Patrick “Seanbaby” Reiley something to do that isn’t carefully sculpting his mohawk or delivering atomic wedgies to hated nerds. At times, it is funny. At times, it is insightful (one of my favorite articles explains the ways that poverty affects one’s decision-making processes). Much of time time, however, it is simply obvious and tiresome.

In the spirit of the hit-pieces “Cracked” authors love to write about topics, figures, movements, and cultural trends with which they disagree, let us examine five uncomfortable truths behind the Cracked.com website:

1. Cracked.com is painfully leftist.

One of the lessons left-wing comedians never seem to grasp is that bitter hatred for your political opponents isn’t funny. Prominent once-comedians like Bill Maher and, increasingly, Jon Stewart demonstrate this for us on television every day. The more they devote their time to hating republicans, crafting ever-more-tasteless insults under the guise of “jokes,” the more bitter they become and the less funny their routines happen to be.

“Cracked” suffers from this problem, but it is not the website’s primary issue. Much more problematic for even the apolitical reader is the fact that Cracked frequently forgets to be funny in favor of political rock-throwing. In some articles this creeps in as gratuitous shots at Fox (a favorite target of left-wingers, who have never forgiven the right-leaning Fox for breaking their iron grip on network news) and offhand comments that show a hatred for conservative and even libertarian or constitutionalist views.

“10 Baffling Romance Tips From the Sociopaths at Fox News,” is the title of one article. “The 8 Greatest Wars Ever Fought By Fox News” is another. “Okay, so maybe Fox News and the Chinese government aren’t bastions of journalistic integrity,” writes Danny Gallagher in “7 Clearly Fake News Stories That Fooled The Mainstream Media.” Fox is such a frequent target of the site that it is its own topic category at “Cracked.” Why, they even found time to write an article defending Fox (sort of) from the very hatred their contributors heap on it.

Other notable left-wing articles at Cracked include the assertion, “Almost every republican is a white lower to middle class uneducated person from the south, meaning a majority of them range from stupid to dumbfuck stupid.” Another page at Cracked calls republicans “stubborn gun wielding anti-abortion homophobes,” while the article “The 5 Biggest Pricks in Congress” cites four Republicans and only one Democrat.

The Democrat “Cracked” did choose? Robert Byrd, widely reviled for having been a member of the KKK—whom the author then defends because Mr. Byrd apologized for his Klan affiliations “hundreds of times.”

Libertarians and those related to them fare no better on the pages of “Cracked.” “…[A]nyone who quotes Ayn Rand must be met with a frothing at the mouth hatred,” reads one article. “Anarcho-Communistic Libertarian Freedom is the primary philosophy of Edgar Friendly in Demolition Man. This is also the primary reason why killers were cryogenically un-frozen to kill him.”

What all these shots at non-Democrats and non-liberals have in common is that a liberal’s hatred for conservatives, his contempt for libertarians, and his knee-jerk disdain for things like guns or people like Ayn Rand just isn’t that funny. It isn’t particularly entertaining. It just puts people off.

2. Cracked.com presents a variety of propaganda as “truth”

Furthering a cultural war that paints men as the enemy and women as perpetual victims, “Cracked” has fired more than one salvo across the bow of anyone who is not a simpering, politically correct beta-male. Two of its worst examples are “5 Ways Modern Men are Trained to Hate Women” and “5 Uncomfortable Truths behind the Men’s Rights Movement.”

The former is propaganda because it projects onto all men an emotion—“hate”—that is neither reasonably construed from the cultural phenomena identified, nor reliably divined by the author (who we must presume is not psychic).

The latter is worse than propaganda because it slanders and smears the entire manosphere—that loose collection of men’s rights and men’s interests websites that includes Return of Kings—as fedora-wearing misogynist neckbeards who can’t get laid (the favorite insult of both feminists and even some members of this site when dismissing, without critical analysis, an opinion with which they disagree).

The first article purports to identify cultural conventions that institutionalize female victimhood—of course, casting men as the villains and accusing them all of “hate.” This is part and parcel of accusing all men of creating and sustaining “rape culture,” wherein “rape” is any act, word, deed, or thought that makes any woman, no matter how sensitive her feelings and no matter how appropriate or proportional her reaction, uncomfortable in any way for any reason in any context. It does so by wildly distorting a series of cultural facts, twisting perfectly ordinary and understandable human reactions into male hatred.

Do you, a single man, hope to find—or even fantasize about—an attractive woman, even a woman “out of your league,” for sex and a/or a relationship? Do you long for basic human contact and want to be loved? That, according to David Wong, is “hate,” and you feel entitled (and thus you will react with bitter violence when you are denied, you fedora-wearing neckbeard). Do you find fat, ugly people to be unattractive? Clearly society has taught you to hate and objectify women (you fat, ugly, fedora-wearing neckbeard).

That selective reiteration of random assholes’ commentary is precisely how J. F. Sargent justifies his or her laughable piece, “5 Uncomfortable Truths Behind the Men’s Rights Movement.” This column is nothing more than Sargent’s hatred for non-submissive males projected onto the closest group that makes Sargent uncomfortable.

From dishonestly linking Men’s Rights to the UCSB “shooting” (the perpetrator of those killings was part of a group devoted to hatred of “pick-up artists” and was not in any way a men’s rights activist) to proving Godwin’s law in the second paragraph (Sargent claims Men’s Rights activists are closer to “neo-Nazis” than civil rights activists), Sargent’s article is a laughable exercise in slander and misinformation that, sadly, seems typical of Cracked.com’s approach to sociopolitics.

3. Sometimes Cracked.com makes no sense.

A recent article, “5 Pieces of Advice Your Dad Gave You (That Are Total B.S.),” is a great example of a largely incomprehensible “Cracked” piece. If there is one thing contributors at “Cracked” like to do, it is call bullshit on various widely held notions. If slaying sacred cows were a competition, “Cracked” would hold several third-place trophies and a room full of participation ribbons for its barbecue sauce.

Among the advice that author John Cheese thinks are B.S. are, “Slow Down Before You Burn Yourself Out,” “You’ll Understand When You’re My Age,” and “You Can Do Anything You Set Your Mind To.” In some cases, Cheese declares these aphorisms “useless” because he ignores their context. In other cases, Dad is a hopeless moron for offering advice because Cheese insists, absurdly, on taking the words completely literally.

In all cases, the attempt to shoot down widely held (even overused) beliefs fails because Cheese is struggling to find problems where there really are none. There is nothing over which to be outraged—and no real B.S. to expose. The article is essentially meaningless. And it certainly isn't funny.

4. Motherfucking lists.

Seemingly 99 out of every 100 articles on the site is a list, even if the list format is unnecessary to the material presented.

5. Cracked.com simply isn't very funny

Granted, humor is subjective. I will also stipulate that there are certain articles on Cracked.com, both new and old, that are screamingly funny and have made me laugh out loud. Overall, though, Cracked really isn't a comedy publication. It's a sometimes humorous opinion site that has more in common with Web newsies like the Daily Dot or Buzzfeed (which are similarly liberal and anti-male).

Its video features are almost never funny (not the ones featuring Cracked.com staff, anyway). They come off more as smugly self-aware. One supposes all that green screen money goes somewhere.

There's no law that says "Cracked" can't be leftist AND funny. Jon Stewart certainly manages it—or he did before he started interviewing economists and political figures his audience has never heard of. When a comedian (or comedy outlet) starts believing it is itself more important than making people laugh, however, it runs the risk of becoming exactly what Jon Stewart is now: An occasionally offensive and not particularly incisive Democrat political pundit who hides behind, "I was only joking," whenever anyone calls him on his assertions.

There will always be a market for smug. People love to read humor that is rooted in denigrating people and groups they don't like. No well-trafficked site is immune to that. But the more "Cracked" becomes an echo chamber for only one side of the political aisle, the more that it ignores even the most rudimentary facts and logic in presenting its opinion—and the more it does both to the exclusion and detriment of actually making people laugh—the less relevant the site will become.

If it can't make you laugh, if it can only misinform, it is not useful at all. If that is to be Cracked.com's fate, it is destined to whither away much as its printed predecessor did.

Read more: Red Pill Truths In Classical Conservative Thinkers

Phil Elmore
Phil is a freelance journalist and technical writer based in Western New York State. The author of more than two dozen commercially published action novels, he has also contributed to such publications as WND News, the Midnight Sun News, Tactical Knives Magazine, Personal and Home Defense Magazine, Special Weapons Magazine, and Concealed Carry Magazine. He can be reached through his website, philelmore.com.

Cardinal Raymond Leo Burke Rebukes Feminization Of Catholic Church

January 11, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently came across an interview with Cardinal Raymond Leo Burke about how the Catholic Church's focus (or obsession) on women has neglected the important role of masculinity. Keeping in mind the irony of noting the words of a cardinal to help describe the problems that men face today, here's what Burke had to say:

All children need fathers

> A child's relationship with their father is key to a child's self-identification, which takes places when we are growing up. We need that very close and affirming relationship with the mother, but at the same time, it is the relationship with the father, which is of its nature more distant but not less loving, which disciplines our lives. It teaches a child to lead a selfless life, ready to embrace whatever sacrifices are necessary to be true to God and to one another.

Feminism has scared men from marriage

> I recall in the mid-1970's, young men telling me that they were, in a certain way, frightened by marriage because of the radicalizing and self-focused attitudes of women that were emerging at that time. These young men were concerned that entering a marriage would simply not work because of a constant and insistent demanding of rights for women. These divisions between women and men have > gotten worse since then.

Sex is but one of several shallow means of entertainment

> The gift of human sexuality is turned into a means of self-gratification often at the expense of another person, whether in heterosexual relations or in homosexual relations. A man who has not been formed with a proper identity as a man and as a father figure will ultimately become very unhappy. These poorly formed men become addicted to pornography, sexual promiscuity, alcohol, drugs, and the whole gamut of addictions.

A boy can not gain manly virtue without a father

> Families should have at least one meal together each week where the whole family is together. A boy or young man is unlikely to build proper manly identity and the manly virtues unless he lives with a father and mother, where he can witness that unique and complementary interaction between the male and the female in a home life in which human life can be welcomed, nurtured and developed.

The church has become overly feminized

> The Church becomes very feminized. Women are wonderful, of course. They respond very naturally to the invitation to be active in the Church. Apart from the priest, the sanctuary has become full of women. The activities in the parish and even the liturgy have been influenced by women and have become so feminine in many places that men do not want to get involved.
>
> Men are often reluctant to become active in the Church. The feminized environment and the lack of the Church's effort to engage men has led many men to simply opt out.

More people are realizing the brokenness of the West

> The culture in which we live is bankrupt and young men, especially, recognize the brokenness of the culture. Young men and young women want to hear words that are directed specifically to them to use their virtues and gifts for the good of everyone.

You cannot choose your own sexual identity

> Fathers and mothers are wonderful gifts that are given to us by God.
>
> So too is the beautiful gift of our human sexuality as God intended it, not as, sadly, the many sick abuses of the gift of sexuality that are occurring in the world today. The dark confusion of gender theory deceives people into thinking that they can create their own sexual identities based on urges and emotions. We are so blessed God gave us this gift of being a man or being a woman. It's a matter > of us to respond to God's will to develop our gifts of being a man or woman.

You can read the entire interview here.

While I agree with the above excerpts in spirit, a man who listens to the cardinal would get eaten alive by a modern woman, even a modern Christian women, who will likely get bored and take away his children. Encouraging masculinity in men will have little cultural effect unless we also encourage femininity in women.

The cardinal's words do seem at odds with Pope Francis's recent positive statements on homosexuality, causing us to wonder if there a rift is brewing in the church. Perhaps ROK's resident monk can shed light on this issue.

Read Next: A Dialogue With A Pious Monk

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Number One Rule For Learning A Foreign Language

January 11, 2015 | by Vic Lenser | Link | Original Link

Here at Return of Kings, the topic of learning a language has been a component of many interesting stories, as well as the focus of numerous articles. In particular, the direct benefits to men of learning a foreign language and how it affects their game should at least get you thinking about taking on a second (or third) language.

You'll also find specific entries on how to master the process of self-study: here, here, and here.

I have found these articles to be helpful and personally motivating in my own quest to add to my "notch count" of languages learned. The information is both thorough and accurate, so far as I can tell.

Yet there is one thing that I believe deserves mention, a problem among language learners that needs to be addressed.

Over 6,000 languages on this planet. What's your excuse for knowing only one?

The Problem

About a decade ago, I started my own language tutoring business in college in order to help my lost classmates, and I'm about to finish my fourth year as an actual language teacher.

I've seen all levels of interest and different types of work ethic over the years, and the number one obstacle I've noticed in my students and clients is that they allow their own fears and weaknesses to undermine the learning process.

My favorite client (I'm allowed to have one) was a guy who sought me out during his second semester of beginner's Spanish and utilized my services to the point where he was writing an essay for a junior-level Spanish about his recent trip to Buenos Aires.

He was one of my best learners, because he chose to follow a simple rule for successful language learning. It's the same rule I adopted for myself when I started learning Spanish and the one I currently follow in my pursuit of Russian.

If you want to be successful at learning a second language, I recommend you absorb this rule into your psyche and live by it:

Don't be a pussy.

Leave weak minds alone!

The Solution

Seriously, stop complaining about it being too hard or too complicated. Stop acting shy and hesitant when talking to native speakers. Stop sitting on your ass awaiting the perfect opportunity when you could be creating your own opportunity.

Don't use translator services as a crutch. Wordreference.com (and the app) has its place every now and then. Other than that, if you use online translators you are a fucking fraud.

Avoid English (or your native language) at all costs in the learning environment. If you have to speak your own language in the context of a new language, then you aren't serious about learning. Don't poison the well for others.

Talk to real people who speak the language as much as you can, and listen to them. As stated above, don't be shy about it. If people laugh, and you feel embarrassed, well there you go being a pussy again. Don't.

Find a restaurant frequented by people who speak what you're learning, and become a regular there.

Find a store or any kind of business where you can immerse yourself in the culture.

Volunteer for the community of people who speak the language.

Seek out and attend events. If you have real cojones and any amount of organizational skills, then host your own event and give the proceeds to the community of native speakers. Easier said than done, I know, but hey–don't be a pussy.

In case you didn't get the common thread of the five previous points, allow me to summarize:

Learn some social skills.

Hire a tutor. It's money well spent. For cost of a night out at the bar you could be getting a full hour of individual attention from a native speaker. I have my own weekly tutor.

She's honest with me about my pronunciation, and she teaches me tailor-made sentences that have already helped me meet native speakers in my city. Obviously, canned phrases will only get you so far, but knowing how to say something specific about yourself builds confidence.

There can be only one

You have to be your own motivator if you actually want to learn a foreign language. High school instruction isn't going to do it for you, but it's a start. A college education isn't going to do it for you, but it certainly helps. Tutors won't do it for you, but they're worth the investment. Even traveling or studying abroad won't do it for you, but if you approach it with the right attitude you'll come back a different person.

Learning a language is not easy, but neither is anything worth doing in life.

Use your creative mind, and find a solution that works for you. Seek out or create your own opportunities to immerse yourself in a new culture. If you take this on, it is going to require EFFORT, and it is going to involve FAILURE, two things young people these days are too quick to avoid.

If you suffer from being a pussy in general and not just in regards to learning something that adds value to your life, here are not one, not two, but three motivational pieces you might find beneficial.

Read More: Learning A Language Is The Ultimate Act Of Self-Improvement

Vic Lenser

Vic is a former educator who escaped the female-dominated school system for something more rewarding. He is free now to be a man, working amongst other men whom he can challenge, teach, and learn from.

A Practical Solution To End Islamic Terrorism In The West

January 11, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After the terrorist attacks in France last week, in which seventeen citizens and policemen lost their lives, it's difficult to find mainstream commentators in America or England discussing methods to prevent future attacks. The reason is clear: stopping Islamic terrorism would involve profiling Muslims in a way that goes against the hollow and meaningless "unity" narrative our elites have embraced. Their recent remarks are infused with less testosterone than that of a horny beta male trying to lay a girl on Tinder:

"I ask you to remain united – it's our best weapon. It shows we are determined to fight against anything that can divide us. We must not be divided." —Francois Hollande

"I've accepted President Hollande's invitation to join the Unity Rally in Paris this Sunday – celebrating the values behind #CharlieHebdo." —David Cameron

"I want the people of France to know that the United States stands with you today, stands with you tomorrow." —Barack Obama

Such language, and the flaccid action that is sure to follow, will do nothing to prevent another attack. Instead of giving practical solutions on stopping terrorism, or at least decreasing it, we instead have to pretend that all humans are inherently good and that by treating Muslims with more love, unity, and openness, they will lay down their arms (and somehow forget their Syrian war training) to sip on foamy cappuccinos and nibble on French baguettes and foie gras. If French culture was more enticing than 72 virgins, this method may have a shot, but alas, too much coffee does give many people an uncomfortable case of the jitters.

I propose a different method, but before I do, those in the West have to ask themselves a question: Do you want to halt or decrease Islamic terrorism in your country or not? If you don't then continue on your current progressive track by allowing millions of immigrants into your country with no program of integrating them into your cultural value system. In exchange for having your multicultural utopia and kebab shops, you have an increased chance of being shot in the head with an AK-47 or blown to bits if you happen to be in the wrong place at the wrong time.

To end Islamic terrorism in the West, I earnestly propose a program called Cartoon Sensitivity Examination (CSE). It must be required for all Muslims who intend to visit or inhabit a Western country. Let's use France as an example for how the program would work.

At border control, a follower of Islam will be politely escorted to a cartoon examination room. He is first shown two anti-semitic cartoons and asked for his opinion. Then he is shown two tasteless Jesus cartoons and again asked for his opinion. Finally, he is shown two cartoons of the prophet Mohammad in the most debased and vulgar manner, having sex with an animal, fellating a pig, or engaging in homosexuality with a Jew. Special biometric cameras will examine his reaction for rage. The border control agent will then ask him the following questions:

a) "Are you offended by the cartoon against your prophet?"
b) "Do you believe these cartoons should not have been published because of the offense it may cause the Muslim population?"
c) "If you were president of France, would you pass a law prohibiting publication of these cartoons?"
d) "If your brethren decided to kill the cartoonists, do you believe Allah would send them to paradise, or at least thank them for their service?"

If the immigrant answered yes to question C or D, he would absolutely not be allowed entry into France. He would be escorted to a return flight back to his homeland.

If the immigrant answered no to question C or D, but biometric data conflicted with his answers, he must be subjected to a rigorous background search, and if he passes the checks, he must agree to close surveillance by the state security apparatus along with voluntary check-ins. But if he is conclusively linked to radical imans or mosques that have produced terrorist activity in the past, he will not be allowed entry. This will match the current accepted behavior in the West of a man falsely accused of rape being denied employment opportunities.

Due to my Muslim name (my father is Iranian), I would also be subject to such an examination. I would answer no to all four questions, and biometric data would reveal not an extra heart beat of perturbation from looking at them. I would have no problem with taking the exam even in the United States, of which I am a citizen. My father would also pass this test; he is even more overtly American that I am in some respects, fully acclimatized to his adopted home.

My proposal is that simple, because being grossly offended at cartoons is the quickest, cheapest, and most effective way we can identity fanatics who are wholly incompatible with Western notions of free speech and free press. Look no further than the 2005 cartoon controversy in the Muslim world which resulted in riots, murders, and over 100 senseless deaths, all because of cartoons. Not a single soul should be allowed into a nation while not adhering to its most basic heritage and principles of law, and who can so easily become motivated to gunning down artists or other innocent citizens because of an editorial drawing. They must be kept out for the protection of society, and if you disagree, maybe you do not care about the safety of that society.

My program gets trickier for natural-born Muslims. I propose that they must undergo the cartoon sensitivity exam at 18 years of age, similar to how men in America must register for the selective service at that time, and then re-take the exam every 3-5 years thereafter. All welfare and governmental benefits will be withheld from those who attempt to skirt the examination, and since Muslim immigrants seem to be heavily dependent on generous welfare, I expect a 99% compliance rate, especially if we withhold welfare from mothers whose sons did not submit to examination.

If a natural-born Muslim failed the examination, and shows that radicalization is deep in his heart, he must be surveilled closely or imprisoned indefinitely. You earlier said you wanted to end terrorism in your country, right? I'm pretty sure I saw you holding a Je Suis Charlie placard at the unity march earlier. Well, this is how you do it: get rid of those who possess the same anger and motivation to kill that previous terrorists possessed, and ensure that this profiling is only done on Muslims.. Un-democratic laws must be applied on people who don't believe in democracy if you want to allow them to live in your country.

What the US did after 9/11 is an example of how not to react to a terrorist act. Instead of only profiling Muslims (including recently converted Muslims), they spied on every citizen within its borders, even collecting meta data on postal mail. Maybe this protected us obliquely, but its main objective was to surveil those who threaten the very authority of the state and to tighten its tyrannical control over the populace. A non-Muslim citizen should not be inconvenienced one extra minute of the year for actions that he has zero propensity to execute. This includes young blond children.

By now you've probably realized that cartoon sensitivity examinations, surveilling, and imprisoning Muslims will come at a hefty monetary cost. This is true, but then we have to ask ourselves the following: why do we need low-value immigrants who aren't doctors, engineers, or other advanced professions in a Western country when there is no hope they can improve that society? Why are we opening our doors to immigrants whose belief in superstition and fairy tales is immune to basic rational thought, and who are so baby sensitive to words and drawings that they believe killing others is the best recourse to relieve their hurt feelings?

The middle class French citizenzy needs Muslims as bad as middle class Americans need Mexicans. In other words, they don't. The elite requires these armies of perpetually offended immigrants to keep wages low and destroy national identity in favor of globalization, and so the cost to keep out undesirable people would be greater than any value they bring into your neighborhood or city. Can we vote instead on opening our borders to Polish and Chinese immigrants, who have shown to solemnly respect the nations they immigrate to? Otherwise, we may need to think twice about letting in Somali refugees or Yemeni men whose professional resume contains a bit too much mention of his studies on the Koran.

The best way to identify if a proposed policy would work is to apply it to the past. Would my cartoon examination proposal stop the Charlie Hebdo attacks? The Boston bombing? The Lee Rigby beheading in England? 9/11? Well, I don't think it's a stretch to say that most of those terrorists would probably attack the examiner directly when shown the offensive cartoons. Maybe it’s not elegant or high-tech, but if you want to identify and keep out murderous idiots, simply show them a cartoon of their prophet having gay sex. Identify these fanatics, ship them back home or monitor them closely, and enjoy your Western civilization, or at least what’s left of it.

Don’t Miss: The Charlie Hebdo Terrorist Attack Fires Shots At The Liberal Narrative

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

35 Things Wrong With America

January 12, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

1. Americans are unnaturally overweight, with little shame on being "plus sized."

Don't Miss: 6 Reasons Why Fat Women Are Defective

2. They have cookie cutter lives that they alleviate with a hopeless addiction to entertainment, technology, and celebrity gossip.

3. There are significantly more horny guys than available girls in most metropolitan areas, creating a demographic imbalance that enables low quality girls to act like supermodels.

Don't Miss: Why Demographics Matter For The Younger Man

4. A victorious feminist movement has institutionalized man-hating in corporations, universities, government, and the media.

Don't Miss: Hanna Rosin's "The End Of Men" Is A Feminist Fairytale

5. Soulless suburbs, sprawls, and office parks create stress, malaise, and depression.

Don't Miss: The Easiest Way To Overcome A Depression

6. Lack of proper cafe culture encourages social isolation and obesity. We're left with Starbucks, where people go with their internet-enabled electronic devices to drink sugary milkshakes that no self-respecting European soul would call "coffee."

Don't Miss: 19 Photos That Show How Starbucks Is Destroying Coffee

7. Frightful public transportation systems that seem to have been instituted as afterthoughts.

8. The existence of Hollywood, which poisons the world's culture by normalizing narcissism, consumerism, and bad movies.

Don't Miss: Jennifer Lawrence Is A Terrible Role Model

9. Expectation to tip 20% just because someone served you a food or drink item with a fake smile.

Don't Miss: 7 Things I Learned From Delivering Pizzas In College

10. Pervasive politically correct environment where dissenting thought is labeled sexist, racist, or homophobic. This is usually immediately followed by a witch hunt to end the person's employment.

CNET » Tech Industry » Mozilla CEO Eich resigns after gay-marriage controversy

Mozilla CEO Eich resigns after gay-marriage controversy

Brendan Eich steps down following calls for his ouster over his support for California's anti-gay marriage Proposition 8.

by Seth Rosenblatt @sethr / April 3, 2014 12:13 PM PDT

824 / 2.2K / 425 / 45 / more +

Don't Miss: What Is A Social Justice Warrior (SJW)?

11. Treatment of smartphones as both friend and passionate lover, which replaces time spent in face-to-face interactions with real friends and lovers.

Don't Miss: We're Surrounded By Smartphone Zombies

12. Sailor and debasement culture where both sexes engage in excessive amounts of cursing, tattooism, head shaving, and all-around general vulgarity.

Don't Miss: 5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken

13. Universities that serve as liberal brainwashing factories instead of palaces of wisdom, enlightenment, and masculinity.

Don't Miss: Female University Student Carries Around Mattress She Was "Raped" On

14. Frankenfoods with dubious origins, some of which are prohibited for sale in other countries.

Don’t Miss: Monsanto Ruins American Bodies

15. Disposable culture where still-functional items are thrown away instead of being repaired or reconditioned.

Don’t Miss: Take Care Of Your Stuff

16. Competitive conversation culture where people talk about themselves instead of listening. Contemplative silences are looked upon as boring or even creepy.

Don't Miss: The Misery Of Modern Day Conversation

17. Women who prefer entertaining clowns instead of good men who want to provide for their future families.

Don't Miss: This Is Why Girls Go For Bad Boys

18. Rule by an oligarchy that spies on citizens who don't even care about its government's illegal acts because they are too busy playing Candy Crush.

19. Homosexuality openly embraced and displayed in public around children who don't yet understand the nature of human sex.

Wedding Photos That Prove Two Grooms Are Better Than One

Double the suits, double the love.

BUZZFEED.COM | BY SARAH KARLAN

Don't Miss: America Is Becoming A Homosexual Nation

20. Complete ignorance of world affairs by citizens due to being comically manipulated by media propaganda. Russia bad! Saudi Arabia good!

Don't Miss: The Mainstream Media Creates Rigged Debates That Tell Society What To Value

21. People who can no longer handle original thoughts without being offended or "triggered."

Don't Miss: How "Trigger Warnings" Silence Dissent And Protect Fragile Egos

22. Militarization of police whose monopoly on violence allows them to taze and kill with impunity.

Don't Miss: 6 Ways Policemen Can Regain Credibility With The American Public

23. Having to constantly be exposed to Spanish announcements, signs, and advertisements because immigrants are too lazy to learn English.

Don't Miss: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

24. Welfare state that redistributes money from hard-working provider men to a growing population of single mothers who are subservient to the state instead of husbands.

Don't Miss: The Price I Paid for Helping a Single Mom's Child

25. Effeminate men who act like homosexuals even when they are straight. Masculinized women who act like they were raised in jail or the urban ghetto.

Don't Miss: Career Women Are Pretending To Be Men

26. Unusable city parks that are occupied by homeless people soaked in their own urine.

Don't Miss: 6 Reasons Why Portland Sucks For Single Men

27. Calling corporate customer service and having to converse with robots. Also: self-checkout lines.

In the old days, good service was a primary attraction.

28. Mindless adoption of technology as the end-all-be-all solution to humanity's problems.

Don’t Miss: Is Digital Technology Destroying The Middle Class?

29. Unreasonably early last-call in most cities and Puritan-like DUI laws that primarily serve to withdraw money from citizens via the judicial extortion complex instead of preserving public safety.

30. Allowing women the right to vote, which has allowed immoral progressivism to dominate the political landscape.

Don't Miss: Women Should Not Be Allowed To Vote

31. Unsightly premature aging of women due to false tanning, late-night pizza eating, and other unhealthy lifestyle choices.

Don't Miss: How To Handle Women With A Ticking Biological Clock

32. Widespread societal denial of the problems men face while catering to every female problem or conflict under the sun.

Don't Miss: Thanks To Progressivism, America Is No Country For Men

33. Death of flirting and real seduction in place of fake arrogance and cheap insults. The mating game in America is a combination of email spamming and schoolyard name calling.

Don't Miss: American Girls Have No Game

34. Too much comfort. The avoidance of real struggle or hardship has given adults the emotional development of children.

35. White knight culture where men will immediately attack their own to defend a girl who will never ever have sex with him.

Don't Miss: How To Be The Ultimate White Knight

Did I miss anything?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: 40 Pictures That Show The Decline Of American Women

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Does The Left Support Radical Muslims?

January 12, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In the wake of the Muslim attack on the satirical French magazine Charlie Hebdo, the left have cast their lot in with a pair of savages who viciously murdered nine people because they ran a magazine that made fun of their sacred prophet Muhammad. Some extreme leftists, such as Guardian columnist Joe Sacco, are openly siding with offended Muslims, while others are attempting to excuse the Kouachi brothers' actions by claiming that French Muslims are "marginalized" and that Charlie Hebdo was "racist."

On paper, SJWs' affection for Muslims makes no sense. The average Muslim's views on homosexuality, women's rights, and related issues is so extreme it makes the "cishetwhitemale shitlords" SJWs rage against look like demisexual otherkin in comparison. For example, there's an anti-Israel group called "Queers for Palestine," apparently unaware that 95 percent of Palestinians think the best way to deal with homosexuals is to string them up from trees. What gives?

The answer is that Muslims and SJWs have the same fundamental mindset. Both groups are driven by their feelings, namely the idea that their feelings are the end-all-be-all of human existence. And as the attack on Charlie Hebdo shows, people who place their feelings above all else are willing to kill anyone who slights them.

Islam Is A Woman's Religion

"But Matt," you may argue, "SJWs are pansies who faint at the slightest hint of being triggered! Muslims are willing to fight for what they believe in! How could they POSSIBLY have anything in common?"

The answer is this: Muslims are not manly. On the contrary, they're some of the most hypersensitive and feminized men alive. The attack on Charlie Hebdo, the worldwide demonstrations against the Jyllands-Posten Muhammad cartoons, and every other act of Islamist terror happened because Muslims felt offended on behalf of their prophet. Letting your emotions dictate your behavior is what women do, not men.

Indeed, so much of what is wrong with America and the West is due to society tolerating and encouraging the mindless emoting of women, gays, and other designated victim groups. Rape hysteria is driven by women who feel that they were raped because they had sex and regretted it afterwards. The UVA rape hoax came about because Jackie Coakley felt slighted because a boy she crushed on had no interest in her. Leftists who stumble across Return of Kings articles always cry about how "disgusted" or "offended" they are, damn the actual facts.

Historically, both men and women were taught to keep a stiff upper lip and to not let their constantly-changing emotional states dictate their behavior. This has been thrown out the window with the millennial generation, raised on Barney the Dinosaur and "It's OK to Cry." Kids growing up these days have their feelings indulged at every opportunity and are never told to suck it up. Social justice warriors are the end result: a class of defectives ruled by their feeeeeelings.

While it's tempting to assume that the Kouachi brothers had imbibed their whiny, crybaby mentality from Western leftists, the hysterical reactions Muslims around the world have to anything that offends them suggests this is a feature of Islam itself. Namby-pamby liberals misleadingly call Islam a "Levantine" religion, when in reality the only links it has to Christianity and Judaism are that which it plagiarized from the Bible.

Islam is not a religion in the western sense, but a system of control. It thrives by stoking mindless emoting in its adherents, directing their rage against the infidels, the dar al-Harb (House of War). Unlike Christianity, which teaches stoicism and self-reliance, the God of Islam tolerates nothing less than unthinking allegiance on the part of his followers. Indeed, Muslims are taught that the Koran is the direct, inerrant word of Allah as dictated to Muhammad, as opposed to Christians acknowledging that the Bible was written by men and subject to human error.

Islam is, above all else, a feminine creed. Evidence of this can be seen in the droves of white British and European women who are becoming Muslims. Left-wing SJWs feel perfectly at home in a religion that indulges their feeeeeelings, strips them of free agency and tells them what to think and believe. Indeed, there's a growing body of evidence to suggest that Islam's Allah is not derived from the God of Christianity, but is an altered version of a pagan Arabian moon god; the moon is almost always associated with the feminine in polytheistic religions.

SJWs Want Their Enemies Dead

Some of you will no doubt still argue that comparing SJWs to radical Muslims is unfair, because the former have yet to pick up guns and start killing their "misogynistic," "transphobic" adversaries. You would be wrong. Just because Muslims are more willing to act out their violent fantasies than SJWs doesn't mean the latter are any less homicidal.

Three months ago, pro-GamerGate attorney Mike Cernovich was targeted by social justice warriors. Cernovich had been publicizing Zoe Quinn's (real name: Chelsea van Valkenburg) abuse of the court system to deny her ex-boyfriend, Eron Gjoni, his First Amendment rights. In response, Quinn collaborated with blogger Margaret Pless (alias: Idle Dillettante) to expose Cernovich's home address and encourage other SJWs to "swat" him: barrage the police with bogus 911 calls in the hopes they would panic and send a SWAT team to kill him.

As a result of Pless' provocations, Cernovich was forced to flee his home and is taking legal action against her. Pless has denied that her intent was to swat Cernovich, claiming she was reporting him for "harassment," a ridiculous story seeing as all he was doing was publicizing freely available court documents. Cernovich has also indicated that other major SJW figures might have been involved in Pless' attempted swatting.

This is far from the only example of SJWs threatening violence against anyone who upsets them. Several months ago, Breitbart reporter Milo Yiannopoulos received a syringe in the mail from an SJW upset about his GamerGate reporting. My Return of Kings article "5 Reasons Why Girls with Tattoos and Piercings Are Broken" resulted in a flood of hate mail and death threats, with a disturbing number of people justifying them by pointing to how "offensive" my column was:

Nathan Ueberroth • 3 months ago

This is not freedom of speech.. this is pure Discrimination against a certain group of people. My wife has 8 tats and she the best mother and sweetest girl ever. No different than saying everyone with guns are murderers. The writer is smart though. Uses anger he creates to justify his own hateful views. Writes a offensive article about his hateful and negative views about women and tats. Waits....after people are offended and just hurt they lash back and yrs, some go to over the top.. now the sick part.. he runs out of the country not man enough to take the heat he created, while he uses the anger toward him to manipulate you into satiyg it proves he is right. Kinda like hitlers technique almost or a cult leader. You should all be ashamed of yourselfs . Have morals and dont judge other humans. Your god would be disapointed in you...your all brainwashed.. so so sad..

4 ^ | v • Reply • Share ›

The fact of the matter is that SJWs are the new brownshirts, seeking to hurt, silence or kill anyone who resists the leftist status quo. Just because they haven't taken to the streets yet doesn't mean that they don't want you dead. And if the murderous antics of the Kouachi brothers are any indication, they've found kindred spirits in the legions of hyper-offended, militant Muslims.

Read More: You're A Monster If You Don't Support The Welfare State

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Return Of Kings Donation Drive

January 12, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Return Of Kings has been open for 27 months. What started out as a modest group blog now reaches 1 million people every month and is on its way to becoming an alternative news source for men. But now we need your help.

ROK has been extremely difficult to monetize because mainstream advertisers do not want to come near our politically incorrect content. At the same time, we just got a rash of complaints when we allowed an “internet marketer” to sponsor our pages, saying that it damages our reputation (I don’t wholly disagree on this point). We’re caught between a rock and a hard place since we can’t get mainstream advertisers and also can’t comfortably use advertising from sponsors like PUA companies who have deep pockets. I’m also not a fan of promoting six-pack abs affiliate programs.

ROK has an operations cost of about $2,000 a month, which includes a roster of weekly columnists, an editor, hosting, various paid site apps, system administration, and also PHP/wordpress programming. This cost will increase as we improve our hosting infrastructure and seek to commission more timely news articles and features. I’d like to cover at least 75% of our base costs with monthly reader donations so that we don’t have to depend on advertisers to operate the site.

Become a monthly patron

Have you been receiving decent value from ROK? Have we made a positive impact on your life? Are the articles you read worth at least $3 a month? If yes, we kindly ask that you consider donating at least $3 a month using Paypal on a monthly recurring basis.

While one-time donations are nice, it’s hard to plan for the future based on them. If we know that several months from now we’ll have our basic costs covered, we can better plan for more growth and better articles.

To become a monthly patron, select from one of the six options in the drop-down menu below and click Subscribe.

Donation Options
Option 1 : $3.00 USD – monthly ▼

Subscribe

If you change your mind in the future, you can cancel your monthly donation at any time within Paypal.

We appreciate the help that everyone has given us so far and hope that you’ll begin to see an increase in the quality and impact of the articles we publish in the upcoming months. Thanks for the support.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Palatines And Borderers: The Shirkers And The Workers

January 12, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The historian Edward Gibbon, in his monumental Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, discourses at length in the second volume of his history on the corruption of the Roman army's fighting abilities during the principate of Constantine (A.D. 306-337). More and more, Gibbon observes, officers came to view their personal advancement as more important than the security of the state.

Commands became spoils to be handed out to political favorites, rather than offices earned through combat experience. Speaking the truth to the imperial purple was a hazard to one's career, an invitation to the most vigorous persecution, and finally a threat to one's life.

A Growing Divide

The Emperor Constantine

The growth of governmental power birthed an expansion in the administrative agencies of the state. Over time a distinction emerged two types of military leaders: so-called “palatines” and “borderers.” A palatine was a court officer, one who luxuriated behind the front lines and grew fat in indolence and lethargy while preserving his position through sycophancy. A borderer was a frontier-soldier who did the actual fighting and campaigning. As Gibbon describes it:

> From the reign of Constantine, a popular and even legal distinction was admitted between the Palatines and the Borderers; the troops of the court as they were improperly styled, and the troops of the frontier. The former, elevated by superiority of their pay and privileges, were permitted…to occupy their tranquil stations in the heart of the provinces…The soldiers insensibly forgot the virtues of their profession, and contracted only the vices of civil life. They were either degraded…or enervated by the luxury of baths and theatres. They soon became careless of their martial exercises, curious in their diet and apparel; and, while they inspired terror to the subjects of the empire, they trembled at the hostile approach of the barbarians. [Gibbon (J.B. Bury ed.), Ch.XVII, p. 188]

Understandably, the borderers who had to do the actual fighting and dying to preserve the empire deeply resented this imbalance of responsibility. Paid less than palatines, the borderers seethed with repressed rage. It was not unheard of for men to take extreme measures to escape military service or the tax-collector by deserting, or by self-mutilation of their hands or feet, despite the severe punishment decreed for such actions.

Gibbon's views are borne out by the original sources. Ammianus Marcellinus (c. A.D. 325-395), a historian of the late Roman Empire and a military man himself, had this to say on the decline of martial virtues in his time:

> To these shameful conditions were added major problems in military discipline. In place of military songs, the soldiers devoted themselves to effeminate crooning. The soldier's beds were not of stone, as in previous eras, but of stuffed down and folding couches, and their cups were heavier than their swords (as they were embarrassed to drink from earthenware)…In addition, the soldiers were arrogant and brutal to their own countrymen, but shrinking and cowardly in the face of the enemy…[Amm. Marc. XXII.4.6]

The comment that the "cups were heavier than their swords" is an apt image to describe the degeneracy of the palatine fighting spirit: comfort was more important than defense. It is true that such gloomy sentiments are commonly found among ex-generals and historians with axes to grind. It is sometimes fashionable to believe that one's own era is worse than those that preceded it. Pessimism finds ready acceptance with the angry and marginalized. But even discounting for such distortions, I read these passages above with a great sense of unease. The unease grew greater after the news of the terrorist attacks in Paris last week became more generally known.

A Modern Version Of The Problem

Modern analogies to the "palatines" and "borderers" of Roman days are uncomfortably easy to identify. Western militaries have become havens of political correctness and social engineering experiments.

Too many Western leaders see their military forces as places to advance their own pet projects in gender "equality" and social welfare; in place of the hard business of military training, the focus is now on sensitivity and the acceptance of deviant behavior. A small cadre of careerist officers at the top flourish by telling the political apparatchiks what they want to hear, thereby perpetuating the corruption and permitting it to part of the institutional culture. The focus in the US military now is not on combat readiness. The focus now is on:

- Making women feel comfortable
- Having the military serve as a petri dish for leftist social engineering experiments
- Serving as a dumping ground for young people for whom no jobs are available
- Providing a place where private contractors, mercenaries, and opportunists can overcharge the government for doing little or nothing

The price of all this has not yet been paid. The United States, I argue, has not fought a competent enemy since the Vietnam War in the 1960s. That was over forty years ago. In some ways it could be argued that the last competent enemy was the Communist Chinese in Korea in the early 1950s.

The United States has not been seriously challenged in air or sea power since even further back, during the Second World War. These conflicts are little more than ancient history to most military men today, as lost in time as the Roman frontier conflicts recorded by Ammianus Marcellinus.

In 1993, the commandant of the U.S. Marine Corps, Gen. Carl E. Mundy, issued orders that would have banned married men from enlisting in the Marine Corps. His vision was a force that was focused on combat readiness. He did not believe that it was the function of the military to provide day-care services to single mothers, or to molly-coddle families and dependents.

His idea was quickly shelved by an embarrassed President. It is difficult to see such a proposal even being made today. One wonders what Mundy would have made of the vogue of “rape” accusations in today’s military.

It is clear that the leadership of many Western countries has utterly betrayed their responsibilities to their nations. Rather than appreciate the masculine virtues for their role in defending their societies, they chose to denigrate those virtues. Rather than exercise caution in launching ill-advised social engineering experiments in their militaries, they undertook a radical program of “gender equality” enforcement.

The betrayal has been thorough and complete. The generals and senior officers who were tasked with stopping these things did little or nothing. They appeared at the required senatorial hearings, mouthed the platitudes they were required to mouth, and then faded into the background, where they could continue to collect their sumptuous salaries.

The Aftermath Of The Shirkers' Victory

The epidemic of careerism and political correctness has caused severe damage to the readiness of western militaries. It is sapping their morale, their fighting strength, and their cohesiveness. The current climate seeks to create a force of politically indoctrinated stool-pigeons who are adept at informing on each other, but good for little else. Evidence that contradicts the official line is ignored, and the bearers of such evidence are marginalized or shunted aside.

Far too many palatines have embedded themselves into positions of power, and far too few borderers have been left to do the actual tasks of the real world. Everywhere are shirkers, and nowhere are workers. All the while, obesity rates continue to climb, as well as ever louder calls for more and more social experimentation.

Their cups have become heavier than their swords. The net result of this self-destruction can be concealed for a long time, but not forever. There will come a time when the United States is forced to confront an enemy that is as technologically advanced as it is. When this happens—and it will assuredly happen, sooner rather than later—the outcome of the contest will depend on the individual fighting qualities of each man. And there will be no place in this battle for palatines.

Read More: The Ordeal Of Captain Bligh

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Carl Jung Predicted The Catastrophe Of Modern Gender Relations

January 12, 2015 | by Phillipus von Hohenheim | Link | Original Link

> Today the American woman is still confused. She wants independence, she wants to be free to do everything… to have all the opportunities which men have, and, at the same time she wants to be mastered by man and to be possessed in the archaic way of Europe. -Carl Gustav Jung

Although I discuss the highlights below, I encourage readers to check out the original interview, published in 1912 in the New York Times, available here. A transcribed version is available here.

Carl Jung's Red Pill Wisdom

Carl Jung devised a theory of the human mind with excellent predictive and explanatory powers—exactly what you would wish for in a scientific model.

Unfortunately, the implications of this model were too unsettling for popular dissemination; it was therefore suppressed, obfuscated, and piled with lies and nonsense by the academic guardians of the West who promoted simpler and less controversial ideas. The most dangerous truths, those about human nature itself, were effectively removed from American intellectual discourse.

Let's explore some of these truths, straight from the famous psychoanalyst himself.

Since at least 1912, men in America have been neglecting their family life:

> There is only so much vital energy in any human being. We call that in our work > the Libido. And I would say that the Libido of the American man is focused almost entirely upon his business, so that as a husband he is glad to have no responsibilities. He gives the complete direction of his family life over to his wife. This is what you call giving independence to the American woman. It is what I call the laziness of the American man. That is why he is so kind and polite in his home, and why he can fight so hard in his business.

It was not some evil conspiracy that forced the abdication of paternal rights and responsibilities to the state but a logical development of the trends that made America successful. This unnatural division of labor is now disintegrating because men are opting out of creating households entirely.

So while the American man's conscious mind was occupied with manifest destiny and dominating the marketplace, what governed his relationship with women?

A Crippling Mother-Complex

> When men are still in the barbaric stage they make women their slaves. If, while they are still barbaric by nature, some influence makes them see that they dare not treat women as slaves, then what do they do? They do not know yet how to love something which is equal to themselves. They do not know what real independence is, so they must kneel down before this slave and change her into the one thing they instinctively (even when they are barbarians) respect: they change the slave idea into the mother idea. And then they marry the mother-woman. And they respect her very much.

We in the community point out this problem constantly: a generation of damaged men, raised by women, seeking a "return to the womb." The contemptuous and disrespectful attitude of modern women that we enjoy criticizing is nothing more than the accumulated frustration with puerile men.

> I noticed that whenever the American husband spoke to his wife there was always a little melancholy note in his voice, as though he were not quite free; as though he were a boy talking to an older woman. He was always very polite and very kind, and paid her every respect. Yo could see that in her eyes he was not at > all dangerous, and that she was not afraid of being mastered by him. But when any one told him that there was betting going on he would leave her, and his face became eager and full of desire, and his eyes would get very bright and his voice would get strong, and hard, and brutal.

We talk about how desperate we are for feminine women; Carl Jung wisely notes that American women are just as desperate for masculine men. It is not enough to conquer your male rivals—you must conquer your woman if you want a good relationship. Take it from the founder of depth-psychology: women enjoy being possessed. This does not imply violence, but simply an aggressive psychological attitude, an attitude which cannot be endorsed in public but which women find inexplicably arousing:

> I find that the men and women are giving their vital energy to everything except to the relation between themselves. In that relation all is confusion. The women are the mothers of their husbands as well as of their children, yet at the same time there is in them the old, old primitive desire to be possessed, to yield, to surrender. And there is nothing in the man for her to surrender to except his kindness, his courtesy, his generosity, his chivalry.

This is the presentation of a white knight or mangina, a condition in Jungian psychology called “anima possession,” which can arise whenever a man has to deal with the opposite sex. The woman constellates within the man’s psyche all the archaic, suppressed, and stereotypical “female” tendencies. These are not the positive values associated with femininity, but their ugly shadow: emotionality, whininess, bitchiness, capriciousness, destructive irrationality.

It is exactly this phenomenon which turns a suave seducer into a pathetic beta bitch-boy after he has caught a woman he is capable of loving—one who embodies his feminine ideal. Hence the warnings in the community about “oneitis,” maintaing frame, and the constant need to view and relate to your woman as to a real human being, not a fantasy figure.

The Strong Independent Woman

> It may be that you are going to produce a race which are human beings first, and men and women secondarily. It may be that you are going to create the real independent woman who knows she is independent, who feels the responsibility of her independence… Today the American woman is still confused. She wants independence, she wants to be free to do everything… and, at the same time she wants to be mastered by man and to be possessed in the archaic way of Europe.

She wants to be a “strong independent woman” and still get penetrated by a real, virile man. She is utterly ignorant of her own psyche, and THIS is the tragedy of feminism and sexual relations in America. No matter how bad things become abroad, even in France, the birthplace of feminism, gender and sexual roles are still understood and appreciated on a basic level. Men have not abdicated their sexual role as men.

It is up to men to retake responsibility for the long-neglected culture in America. Let's face it, "street harassment" campaigns are nothing more than white-collar women desperate for a strong, seductive man to approach them when they least expect it and sweep them off their feet:

> There is no country in the world where women have to work so hard to attract men's attention. There is in your Metropolitan Museum a bas-relief which shows the girls of Crete in one of their religious dances about their god in the form of a bull. These girls of 200 B.C. wear their hair in chignons; they have puffed sleeves; their corseted waists are very slender; they are dressed to show every line of their figures just as women are dressing today.

Then and 1912

> At that time the reasons which made it necessary to attract men to themselves in this way had to do with the morals of their country. The women were desperate just as they are today, without knowing it. In Athens four or five hundred years before Christ there was even an epidemic of suicide among young girls, which was only brought to an end by the decision of the Areopagus that the next girl who did away with herself would be exhibited nude upon the streets of Athens. There were no more suicides. The judges of Athens understood sex psychology.

Consider the mass embrace of vampiric symbolism and the projection of rape fantasies by frustrated young women in America today. Projection, the transfer of psychological contents onto the external world, is a common feature in romantic relationships.

A man projects his unconscious archetypal feminine features (his “Anima”) onto a woman and a woman projects her idealized masculine elements (her “Animus”) onto a man—this accounts for about 80% of the crap we complain about on the internet.

> You think your young girls marry European husbands because they are ambitious for titles. I say it is because, after all, they are not different from the European girls; they like the way European men make love, and they like to feel we are a little dangerous. They are not happy with their American husbands because they are not afraid of them. It is natural, even though it is archaic, for women to want to be afraid when they love. If they don’t want to be afraid then perhaps they are becoming truly independent, and you may be producing the real ‘new woman.’ But up to this time your American man isn’t ready for real independence in woman. He only wants to be the obedient son of his mother-wife. There is a great obligation laid upon the American people—that it shall face itself—that shall admit its moment of tragedy in the present—admit that it has a great future only > if it has courage to face itself.

Prophetic, isn’t it?

Read More: 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women

Phillipus von Hohenheim is studying the physic and looks forward to obtaining his license to kill.

“We Need To Talk” Is The Latest Invasion Of Women Into A Male Space

January 13, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Q: How odd would it be to turn on the TV and see a show about child birth with an all male panel?

A: About as odd as a program about sports where all the pundits are women.

Believe it or not, gentlemen, that age is upon us. No, not the child birth show (though Dr. Oz, and The Doctors come very close at times). I’m talking about a sports show with an all female cast called We Need To Talk.

We Need To Talk, is a sports commentary program that features a forum made up of all women who hamster discuss the issues of the day as they pertain to professional athletes. The red pill in me wouldn’t allow me to take this seriously, but I channeled my inner beta and decided to be a “grown up” and reserve my preconceived red pill judgment until I’d actually watched it. Plus, I’m something of a sports fan myself so I figured what the hell—let’s see what happens…

The show is a fucking joke.

Look, I gave it an honest try I really did. But once a man ingests the crimson capsule there is no going back. The way I see things after unplugging from the matrix is much different from seven years ago when I would probably have given the show two enthusiastic thumbs up. My intimate knowledge of a woman’s true nature enables me to see right through their narrative and recognize it for what it really is.

Let’s break down this paper tiger and figure out why this wannabe pageant masquerading as a sports desk is an abject failure.

The Forum

The first thing that jumped out at me was this so-called mod squad. From has-beens to man-jawed (literally) feminazis, this bunch has it all. They have one or two regulars with the rest of them rotating in and out depending on their "busy schedules" as "powerful women."

Lesley Visser: One of the leading ladies on the set whose plastic surgery debacle has made her look almost as bad as Lark Voorhees.

Dana Jacobson: A fattie (who, to her credit, has a decent face) who's been previously suspended by ESPN for publicly embarrassing her employer by getting drunk at a mixer and screaming "Fuck touchdown Jesus!!" at a Notre Dame alumn.

Laila Ali: The daughter of Muhammed Ali who, despite having above average aesthetics, exudes about as much femininity as I do. No doubt following in Daddy's footsteps made her that way.

Dara Torres: Olympic swimmer whose jaw and masculine features betray her denials to the accusations she took performance enhancing drugs (for the record I'm not against steroids or HGH in sports).

Swin Cash: A former WNBA star whose angry disposition indicates she likely had a rough upbringing.

Summer Sanders: Another Olympic swimmer who used to be America's sweetheart but seems to have aged 20 years overnight.

Amy Trask: A first generation feminist whose work with the Raiders over three decades shows us all what a feminist really looks like.

I can hear women now: "OMG SharpShooter! Are looks the only thing that matters with women on TV??"

Yes. And you know it.

Men don't give a shit about a woman's credentials—especially when it comes to sports. Like most other things, we don't care about much else a woman has to offer other than how easy she is on the eyes. Granted, if we do have to stomach female commentary we don't want her to act or sound like a clueless idiot on camera. But ugly chicks don't get much air time no matter how many media credentials or communications degrees they have on their walls.

To be fair there is some credibility on this panel. Tracy Wolfson and Pam Oliver make occasional appearances and they've both worked the sidelines (so has Visser) for years and seem to know their shit. Amy Trask did work for the Oakland Raiders for 30 years so she obviously has some knowledge on how sports work on and off the field. And finally Ali LaForce and Lisa Lesley provide us with a little femininity and eye candy to make the show watchable from boner test standpoint, so the cast isn't a complete dumpster fire.

But on the whole the panel is exactly what I imagined it to be. A mixed bag of a few chicks who know a little bit about what they're talking about, a few former athletes who can give anecdotal counts of their experiences, and a few who are nice to look at. Despite their differences, it's clear they all joined the show to shove the feminine imperative down our collective throats under the guise of discussing a male-dominated sector from a female's point of view.

What's the point of the show?

The point of this show is to infiltrate the male mind by using sports to do it. They know damn well women aren't watching this. Women couldn't care less about sports no matter how much they pretend to. This program is for the fellas. Similar to Agent Lavender, this is designed to covertly permeate the masculine culture of professional sports and their consumers (which is weakening by the day).

Let's take a look at why this will be a money pit for CBS in the coming months.

Feelings and ignorance don't mix

When Summer Sanders gave her opinion on the University Of Alabama at Birmingham shutting down the football program her exact words were "If you look at this, like, emotionally, you have to feel for the players and the staff." So right out of the gate she's talking about emotions and feelings with regards to college football.

Obviously it sucked for the players and coaches to have the carpet pulled from under them, but here's what women simply do not understand: this is how life works. Men understand that shit happens. We know that life throws us curveballs but we don't bitch and moan about it. We accept it, pick ourselves up, and move on with life. The players can transfer and play elsewhere without a one year eligibility penalty and the coaches will land on their feet by finding other coaching gigs. It's as simple as that.

What made her “analysis” worse is that Ms. Sanders ventured into what became crystal clear, uncharted territory for her:

“They need to look at their budgets and maybe they need to look at the way they do business.”

That cookie cutter statement showed she had zero clue how an athletic program works or that she didn’t do any research into the UAB situation. She just blurted out something she heard on the news in an attempt to sound well-learned on the matter. Luckily, Trask bailed her out and rescued the segment by talking about cost-benefit analysis and why funding a college football program isn’t as easy to run as it looks on television.

Girls will be girls

Dana Jacobson’s interview with 2014 Heisman Trophy winner Marcus Mariota was unwatchable. She peppered him with questions about his feelings, what he wanted to do while in New York City (the site of the trophy presentation), and the character of Heisman trophy winners was bland and predictable.

I laughed out loud when she asked him what his favorite beach was and why because in my mind, this was supposed to be a show about sports from a female point of view. I guess I’m in the wrong here for expecting substantive sports talk from women but I honestly didn’t expect this level of chick talk.

There was, however, a bit of red pill wisdom nestled in when Mariota talked about one of his favorite surf spots, Sandy Beach. The moment he mentioned how dangerous it was, Jacobson’s tingles were front and center as she giggled with glee no doubt fantasizing about what a bad boy the Oregon QB must be.

At the end of the day girls will always be girls.

The truth always comes out

A woman’s true nature will always rear its ugly head regardless of the environment. Swin Cash proved as much with this little gem:

> “My mother made the brave decision not to get married so that the government could pay for my college education.”

Women these days have no shame voicing their welfare mentality, but to see it on national T.V. was a shock. It was quite funny to see the reaction of her colleagues when she dropped this nuke which was obviously unexpected. I will give her credit for having the balls to exhibit that level of candor though.

And of course they squawked about domestic violence

There’s little doubt in my mind that the recent media firestorm surrounding the NFL’s ongoing bout with domestic violence cases is the main reason this program exists. It’s namesake makes it obvious. Most of the videos I wanted to put in this article are no longer available but the domestic violence episode remains for public consumption (surprise, surprise).

Everyone of the panelists seem to have been through it in some way shape or form and they all couldn't wait to share their "brave stories of survival." They took it a step further stating "and don't you dare play down mental abuse" which is another prod for them to poke men with. Of course they talked about the bullshit "one in four" rape stat and hamstered about women not coming forward after rape or abuse.

Toward the end of their discussion they predictably tipped their hand. They challenged NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell to be the voice of social change. They want him to be more proactive on matters of domestic violence which really means kicking men out of the league before convicted. They even came right out and said they'd like to use the NFL as a vehicle of social change because of its power and influence. At least they're honest.

So What Did I Learn?

Nothing. The only difference between We Need To Talk and other female shows is that the subject matter revolves around professional athletes. Other than that they're all the same. The feminist views, the hamstering, the cattiness amongst the hosts, all the boxes are checked.

I have no idea how this show survives. Men aren't going to watch a sports talk program rife with feminine undertones and women don't tolerate sports unless there's male attention to hoard. The show will be on air longer than it should in the name of political correctness and social justice warriors. I guess the only positive I can take from that is that this will be another example of women failing in a male dominated arena.

Read Next: What Women's Tennis Says About "Equal" Pay

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

7 Highlights From Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn's Harvard Speech

January 13, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previous: Solzhenitsyn's Warning About Communism Applies To Today's Culture War

Alexander Solzhenitsyn wrote The Gulag Archipelago, One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich after serving in Stalin's gulag due to criticizing the Soviet leadership's actions during World War 2. His book became a resource by which many Westerners came to understand the evils of Stalin's totalitarian government.

After the Soviet Union exiled him in the early 1970's, he came to live in the United States. Here is a prophetic speech he gave at Harvard's commencement in 1978 (click here for the full text).

Here are the highlights I found most illuminating.

1. Pursuit of truth

> ...truth eludes us if we do not concentrate our attention totally on it's pursuit. But even while it eludes us, the illusion of knowing it still lingers and leads to many misunderstandings. Also, truth seldom is pleasant; it is almost invariably bitter.

2. West vs East

> A fact which cannot be disputed is the weakening of human beings in the West while in the East they are becoming firmer and stronger — 60 years for our people and 30 years for the people of Eastern Europe. During that time we have > been through a spiritual training far in advance of Western experience. Life's complexity and mortal weight have produced stronger, deeper, and more interesting characters than those generally [produced] by standardized Western well-being.

3. Consumer culture

> After the suffering of many years of violence and oppression, the human soul longs for things higher, warmer, and purer than those offered by today's mass living habits, introduced by the revolting invasion of publicity, by TV stupor, and by intolerable music.

4. Fake societal stability

> The center of your democracy and of your culture is left without electric power for a few hours only, and all of a sudden crowds of American citizens start looting and creating havoc. The smooth surface film must be very thin, then, the social system quite unstable and unhealthy.

5. Technology as savior

> All the glorified technological achievements of Progress, including the conquest of outer space, do not redeem the 20th century's moral poverty which no one could imagine even as late as in the 19th Century.

6. Spiritual emptiness

> We have placed too much hope in political and social reforms, only to find out that we were being deprived of our most precious possession: our spiritual life. In the East, it is destroyed by the dealings and machinations of the ruling party. In the West, commercial interests suffocate it. This is the real crisis. The split in the world is less terrible — The split in the world is less terrible than the similarity of the disease plaguing its main sections.

7. Purpose of life

> If humanism were right in declaring that man is born only to be happy, he would not be born to die. Since his body is doomed to die, his task on earth evidently must be of a more spiritual nature. It cannot be unrestrained enjoyment of everyday life. It cannot be the search for the best ways to obtain material goods and then cheerfully get the most of them. It has to be the fulfillment of a permanent, earnest duty so that one's life journey may become an experience of moral growth, so that one may leave life a better human being than one started it.

What could possibly go wrong from having a culture that passes on spiritual or traditional life in favor of consumerism, narcissism, and fornication? We're currently finding out.

Don't Miss: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Things I Learned About The Military From "Breakfast With The Dirt Cult"

January 13, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

---

The following post is sponsored by Samuel Finlay

When Samuel Finlay asked ROK to write a post about his military novel Breakfast With The Dirt Cult, we were immediately intrigued. The book has already been positively reviewed by Matt Forney, as well as by Amerika, Takimag, Counter Currents, and Apocalypse Cometh.

After speaking to Sergeant Finlay about how his book came together, his reflections on his military experience provided a new appreciation for the struggles and sacrifices of modern infantrymen:

1. The little things matter even more

> You'd be hating your life, then you'd see some goofy bastard do or say something hysterical or perform some heroic GI Joe feat of awesomeness and you think, "Good Lord, these bastards are outfuckingstanding!" and you'd just be thankful for the cards you'd drawn.

2. The military provides no exception to the rules of the sexual marketplace

> I noticed that much like at school, girls gravitated to certain types of guys. Hell, there were girls who became absolutely feral like they had to meet a dick quota or they'd get fired, then you'd go to a bookstore and see magazines where women bitched about how guys treated girls.

3. The call of duty can sometimes ring hollow, even for the most dedicated of soldiers

> As you can tell, the military is a moveable feast of bullshit. You swear the Oath, then you realize how the service really is, then you make your peace with the suckitude, and if you're lucky, wind up being a part of something more and partaking in an experience that's kind of a mystery cult (hence the title).

4. The guys on the ground sometimes feel that they are just pawns in a game

> When you consider that modern liberal democracy itself may be a sham, and that guys like Edward Bernays were right in that the real power in a polity is in the hands of those who shape the opinions, beliefs, preferences, and prejudices of the electorate, the shit flat out goes plaid. It means we're fundamentally wrong about a lot of things; that shit has been fucked since way back and that a hell of a lot of people (theirs and ours) have died under false pretenses.

5. It's a story that's not being told

> As a guy who loves books and stories, it pissed me off that no one writes about or for them. This was a completely random group of young men from 18-35 from all over the country, and they're out there kicking ass. There's so much that I felt was significant about them and the role they played; and yet what stories were celebrated in print and TV? Sex and the City. That sort of bullshit.

Finlay is a man who was wounded serving our country and lived to tell the tale. He writes from a red pill perspective that you would never find in the glorified and sanitized Hollywood portrayals of war. The account is raw and uncensored, but it possesses the verisimilitude necessary for a book to stay with you long after you read it.

This is the author himself on the impetus for the work:

> It is a novelized account of a period during my enlistment as an infantryman in which I got caught between a soon-to-be-ex-stripper and the Afghanistan campaign, then after being wounded downrange and consummating the affair, had all hell break loose on me.
>
> In trying slog through the anger, hurt, and confusion that went with coming home, and generally try to make sense of it all, my thoughts led me to the belief that many of those who shape the ideas that influence everything from love to war have taken us upon a self-destructive course. And in our folly, we have marched to their cadence. While this makes it thoroughly in opposition to PC orthodoxies, there were things I saw that I felt needed to be told.

Finally, our own Matt Forney had this to say about Finlay's first novel:

> As a coming-of-age story, a young man's awakening to the reality of the world, > it’s not only (mostly) well-written but unique. When Finlay is at his best, he captures the Slaughterhouse Five-level lunacy of modern America and the unease he had of living through it […] I can’t wait to see what Finlay comes up with next.

Click here to see what everyone is talking about and buy Breakfast With The Dirt Cult today—it’s only $2.56 on Kindle.

Read Next: Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Why Feminists Hate Male Sexuality

January 13, 2015 | by Sam Cicero | Link | Original Link

To decipher the mind of the 21st century feminist is to realize that, at its core, "the sisterhood" does not draw its energy from a place of love and respect for their peers, but rather from a place of hatred and bitterness. The feminist takes to railing furiously against both men and women perceived as having it better than her in the sexual market. Feminism is therefore best characterized by the emotional states that fuel it—envy, greed, and loathing.

One of the key underlying tenets of feminism is disdain for male sexuality and its inability to dance the tune of the "modern, empowered woman" (AKA careerist hag) that he "should" be attracted to. Here's why this is true:

Male sexuality is unencumbered

Sleeping with many women doesn't harm a man's desirability for the worse one iota. If anything it serves as a female accredited stamp of approval which increases his allure to other women. A man bedding 50 previous women will never be the same as a woman taking 50 previous cocks, no matter how much the feminists squeal in anguish.

Age 19 and game-uninitiated, I made the crude observation to a friend that women are like buses. “They all come at once,” I remarked (note: if your women are like buses in the big-boned sense then please, for the love of God, learn some self-respect). Back on point and of no coincidence, what I’d actually harnessed was the power of pre-selection and social proof.

Having first attracted one girl from my college major course, two others became far more overt in their signals of interest toward me having learned of my association with the initial girl. When the literature of game’s heavyweights came my way, this experience amongst others made for an excellent reference point in understanding the machinations of attraction.

The enraged sex-difference-denier will bludgeon us with social justice-inspired rants but, as we know, pre-selection simply does not work in reverse. The luxury of consequence-free sexual largesse lies squarely in the male corner because we do not suffer the same sexual market value (SMV) erosion and emotional torment of similarly promiscuous women.

For 99.999% of human history chasteness has been a paramount quality in female mate selection because to wife up a slut was to stare down the very real possibility of unprovable cuckoldry (pre-paternity testing) and ensuing genetic obliteration. No matter how many male feminists rail that slut-shaming is disgraceful and pre-historic and how many sycophants enter the white-knight lottery to win meager scraps of pussy, the reality is that men still prefer chaste women in every context other than the most sordid and degrading pump-and-dump opportunities.

Feminists are by-and-large enraged by this perceived inequality because uglier girls depend on their sexual “attainability” to compete with their more beautiful counterparts.

Naturally they hate being branded sluts for it because they don't want to be reprimanded or reminded of their low value.

Male sexuality stands up better to the test of time

You used to get it in your fishnets,
Now you only get it in your night dress

-Alex Turner

For a man who keeps himself on the right trajectory of increasing social savviness (game), status, and economic prosperity, the chances are high that his 40-year-old self will punch above his 20-year-old self in the dating market. That is to say, when weighting male characteristics with their influence on attractiveness, male aging often brings conspicuous improvements in a man's ability to satisfy female hypergamy in both alpha (fux) and beta (bux) dimensions.

Feminists are particularly taken to obsessive credential-whoring because they see personal achievements as a means of recourse against nature's SMV lottery. These pursuits help to patch her fragile self-esteem and provide a means of competing with more beautiful women on her own terms.

Much to the chagrin of these types, personal development is nowhere near as great a factor in male attraction as it is in female attraction. No matter how many liberal arts degrees she frames and hangs on her wall, she will likely never imitate the loin-inspiring grip of that initial post-pubescent flourish of youthful exuberance and unsullied beauty sported by her much-loathed rivals.

Interestingly, this particular quirk of the feminist mind stems from the tendency to conflate personal value with sexual value. Unfortunately no matter how many Buzzfeed articles she ingests about the “differences between real women and little girls,” her “womanly” self is not the stimulant of alpha male attention she prayed it would be.

Our immutable friend biology again has the final world in explaining the difference in the trajectory of male vs. female sexual value with age. By 39 a woman’s fertility is barely half what it was just eight years prior, and the odds are against conceiving within a year (44% chance). Men, on the other hand, have been documented fathering children well into old age.

Male sexuality is visual and therefore wholesome in its simplicity

No, your college diplomas do not elicit erections. No, your mundane career does not compensate for the ravages of time on your appearance. Youthful symmetry and slender, supple flesh are the irrepressible rallying cry for boners the world over. Feminists hate this because it provides compelling evidence that men and women are fundamentally different.

Horrified by this reality, the feminist seeks to redefine what is “truly” attractive to better match her own attributes. This commonly manifests itself in the belief that intelligence should count for more than looks and femininity in the dating market. Except, of course, it doesn’t!

At some level of consciousness women fundamentally acknowledge the reality of attraction. However, and this tends to be evidenced in things as far-flung as the pay gap lie and the virtual male monopoly on greatness and ingenuity. Hard work and the single-minded pursuit of personal development simply produce higher returns for men in attracting quality mates. A woman’s sexual value always has and always will reside primarily in her looks.

The Lowdown

Unfortunately, comrades, as I wrap up this piece it would be amiss not to say that men with our spirit and resolve to call out bullshit where we see it are rapidly dwindling in number. We live in a world where feminists are championed for their greed and loathing. Even when her campaign of hate is transparent, the rapturous applause will ring out from legions of sexually starved sycophant betas and her fat, ugly sisters.

We live in upside-down times where normal, healthy women are skinny-shamed for the entertainment of 6 figure baying crowds; where global brands guarantee good publicity by piggybacking the irreproachable feminist narrative that "real" beauty is different from what our 10 million year old human instinct tells us; and where women are cheered on for exhibiting ugly and selfish traits that our forefathers would have universally condemned.

I for one will delight in gleefully reminding the feminist-inclined amongst us that, as much as they'd like to, they cannot change natural, evolved male sexuality. The feminist employs a thin veneer of credibility but ultimately does not seek to empower women at large, but rather to tear down her rivals (most commonly other women) to install herself as the de-facto leader in a new and altogether twisted dating paradigm.

Natural male sexuality is the last bastion standing in the path of these attempts. Feminists unsurprisingly therefore hate the male sex drive because it dances to its own tune, impervious to their attempts at shaming and ridicule.

Read More: Feminists Attack Lincoln University President For Saying Women Should Be Responsible For Their Actions

Sam Cicero
recently embarked on Europe to practice and refine his game. Faced with a stern choice just months after graduation, he snubbed the advances of corporate London to live life on his own terms. A testament to the power of game, Sam has flung himself into street and club game and now plans to document his experiences and commentary online. You can follow him on his fledgling Twitter.

How To Measure Gym Progress Correctly

January 13, 2015 | by Scott James | Link | Original Link

"You can't know where you're going until you know where you've been…"

Many men go to the gym and train mindlessly, simply going through the motions of lifting while failing to pay attention to detail. It comes to me as no surprise that these are the same men that often fail to see progress, get discouraged, and quit.

Measuring progress isn't only relevant to your physique, but also your business revenue and many other aspects of life that you wish to excel in. if you're not measuring and recording you're merely going through the motions blindly, and you obviously have minimal care for the outcome.

If you want to be a winner and want to transform your physique, it is paramount that you record your gym progress in predetermined intervals (e.g fortnightly or monthly). Below are the methods I find most affective for measuring gym progress.

Log book

Buy a pre-formatted gym notebook or use a journal or mobile app to enter each exercise, set and repetition you performed on each and every workout.

Keeping a log of your training ensures that instead of wandering the gym like a lost sheep, you're a lion and you know exactly what you're doing. You know how many reps you hit on your incline dumbbell press last week and you know you need to add an additional rep to that set this week in order to progressively overload your muscles into both strength and size gains.

If you begin to struggle later down the line you can refer back to your training log and identify sticking points, lifts you excelled on, and find ways to overcome your plateaus.

Your log book can also be used for the purpose of recording your meals. I recommend calculating your calories as per my guide here and then ticking off in your journal as you hit your calorie and macronutrient goals for the day – if you fall short or overeat you're accountable to your log, so it must be recorded.

Disregard the scales and BMI

Before I delve into the methods I use and recommend to track fat loss and muscle gain, I find it imperative to discuss the use of the traditional scale.

DO NOT BASE YOUR IDEA OF PROGRESS ON WHAT THE SCALES SAY

Weight on the scales, just like the popular BMI method, is flawed. Muscle mass, fluid retention, time of day, hormones, and a number of other factors can adversely affect the number being displayed to you when you step on the scales.

For example, I've been hovering around the 185lb mark, I remember being 185lbs a couple of years ago too… does this mean I haven't bulked or made any progress at all since then? Have I hit an unbreakable plateau?

Of course not…

My body fat has decreased, my fluid retention has decreased and my lean muscle mass has increased… resulting in my total mass clocking in at 185lbs (not to be confused with lean muscle mass which is my total body weight minus my body fat percentage… but we'll get into that later).

According to BMI body composition is irrelevant—two men both 230lbs at 5ft 11" would be deemed overweight as lean muscle mass and body fat are not measured on this scale. There are far more accurate methods to measure your progress.

Take photos and use the mirror

You see yourself on a daily basis, so progress may seem slow or non-existent. This is where taking regular photos comes into play – the mirror doesn't lie.

Choose a location, time of day, and pose and snap the same photo(s) on a weekly or fortnightly basis. When I'm following my cutting diet I record a video and take several still shots each week, which I find is the most accurate way to gauge progress.

Store these photos in a "Progress" folder on your computer and update them weekly. As you begin to look through and compare your previous weeks' progress to current you'll often be surprised at just how much your body is changing without you realizing it.

Take measurements

Grab a tape measure and take note of your body measurements weekly. I recommend performing these upon waking, as measuring your arms etc. post workout can be inaccurate.

The key to taking successful measurements is to ensure you are measuring in the exact same position every time. Using freckles or placing a mark on your skin is the easiest way to maintain a consistent reference point for measuring.

When measuring record the following measurements in your training log or in an excel spreadsheet in centimetres:

- Neck circumference
- Shoulder to shoulder (with your arms down by your side)
- Chest (around nipple level, raise your arms to place the tape measure around your chest and then lower arms before reading measurement)
- Biceps (measure from the peak of the bicep to the thickest portion of the triceps)
- Waist (around your belly button)
- Hips (widest part)
- Quads (Choose one spot on your quads and measure this each time)

Get a caliper

There are many methods for measuring body fat, some extremely accurate while others are completely inaccurate. The most cost-effective and accurate method in my book is the old caliper test. You can pick up a body fat caliper for $10 online, and it will come with instructions and a chart to help measure your body fat percentage.

Remain consistent

Your measurements, photos, training, and nutrition log should be updated consistently. Don’t slack off and go through the transformation blindly – have reference points of where you’ve come from so you can sculpt where you’re going.

Seeing progress is THE best motivation to keep the fire alive on your journey.

Read More: How To Workout Correctly

Scott James
Scott is a fitness enthusiast, entrepreneur, author & proprietor of IgnoreLimits.coma blog created to share how he transformed his physique, finances & habits. RoK readers can download his free bodyweight training eBook on his website.

Yes, There Is Hope… But You Must Really Want To Succeed

January 14, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A commentator called Freshman recently bemoaned his lack of success with women over on the Rational Male. His argument was that external factors beyond the control of the player, such as looks and height, are fundamental to determining success to a degree not normally acknowledged by game sites and the manosphere.

> "I am a college student and it's so ruthless out here for the average, let alone below-average looking guy EVEN WITH GAME. I say this as a guy who's been in the game for nearly five years (I first read David DeAngelo's and Pook's book when I was 14 years old). As this last semester passed, I'm becoming more convinced that things that we cannot control (like looks and height) are so detrimental towards consistent and high-levels of success with girls."

Freshman then describes how he attended a party and saw girls he had previously been rejected by getting affectionate with guys better looking and taller than himself.

> "One can't help but wonder if it really is all worth it . . . these guys didn't rack up the approaches or put in the time like I did. They don't have Krauser, Roosh or you to guide them. I did but where did that leave me? Chicks don't give a shit about what you know but rather, how you look and how they will look with you . . . Red pill knowledge won't make a guy hotter, it will simply make him smarter. Pretty girls do pick and choose who they want to fuck and it often isn't the most > charming or socially suave guy out there. It's usually the tallest, most masculine guy in her social circle."

Of course, the "looks trump game" meme is so persistent that you may wonder why I bring it up again here. Well, partly because something in Freshman's story touched me, and partly because – let's be honest – he's right. Or rather, he's not wrong. There's a difference.

Even Roosh, in his latest post, concedes that game has got harder for the average man in the last few years, largely due to the ubiquity of social media, apps like Tinder and Instagram, and the technology that delivers these right into a girl's hand while she's in the club. These days, the chances of getting blown out for a fluffed approach or a simple mistake are much higher than before, simply because women have so many more options – or the perception of such, at least.

As for looks, well, we all know Freshman's got a point, don't we? As much as game evangelists are at pains to deny it, the reality is that – all else being equal – a man's facial attractiveness, height, and muscularity all play a central role in eliciting female attraction and commensurate sexual reward.

Freshman posts a link to a thread on the Roosh V forum where a man conducted an experiment on Tinder by placing a fake profile using photographs of a male model. He was soon inundated – to a shocking degree – with matches and flirtatious approaches from attractive women.

Louche

I have recently taken to frequenting a particularly louche club event in London – essentially a sex party – where attendees, both male and female, are encouraged to wear very little and where pretty much anything goes. I can tell you from my observations there that, perhaps depressingly, the cutest girls are often to be found with the best looking, most buff men by the end of the night.

But this is hardly news, is it? The question for men like Freshman–and all men, really–is, is this it? Is the sexual marketplace really sewn up, owned by buff, cocky, alpha jerks with no room left for the "average" man?

I can tell you categorically that it's not – that there is hope. But – and here's the thing – if you're an "average" guy looking for "consistent and high-levels of success with girls" as Freshman is, rather than simply a dumpy girlfriend, then you have to really, really want it badly. You have to want it to an almost unhealthy degree. You have to be so obsessed with scoring random pussy that when, in moments of clarity, you think about it rationally, you realise that how much you want it, and the sacrifices you are willing to make in pursuit of it are worryingly disproportionate.

My background

Let me tell you a few facts about myself. I am of average height and naturally have a skinny build (although have been working out for many years now and have put on muscle mass). I am OK looking but nothing approaching model quality. I am by nature an introvert. When I was at school I was shy and too eager to please.

The cutest girls consistently overlooked me for hotter, sexier guys. This massacred my self-confidence for the longest time, initiating a downward spiral of pedestalisation, friendzoning, and despair. I actually believed for some time that I was unworthy of intimacy even with the least attractive women.

Astonishingly for everyone who knew me, when I finally got my first girlfriend aged twenty, she was a stunner. This was more by luck by design – I was horrible at game back then (the girl dumped me after a few months). But I had sought outside help for the depression that I had been suffering from.

Relieved of this, I cared less what other people thought of me, and began wearing flamboyant clothes and acting in an aloof, even arrogant manner – not to attract women, but simply because for the first time in my life I felt emboldened to express myself socially in a free and uncompromising manner. The girl was a welcome side-effect of this newfound confidence.

After that first girl had broken up with me, and I had tasted sex and companionship with a highly physically attractive partner that was the envy of my friends, the genie was out of the bottle. Something had shifted inside. I could now no longer endure the thought of going back to my old, celibate, onanistic self.

Failure with women was simply not an option. I don’t use that phrase metaphorically, as a hackneyed self-help aphorism, but literally. My self-image was now so bound up in meeting and attracting girls of the same or a higher calibre than my ex, that I would do absolutely anything, whatever it took, to ensure that it continued.

Addiction

In practice, this meant going to nightclubs all night seven nights a week until I was beat, bleary-eyed, and exhausted, propositioning every girl in the place. It meant suffering humiliating rejections, again and again. It meant following up every single phone number I ever acquired. It meant going on date after fruitless, boring date. It meant staying up with a girl until 6am on a workday trying to get the bang.

It sometimes meant travelling to foreign countries under some pretext to close a chick that I’d gamed on holiday. It meant the ignominy of experimenting with online dating. It meant going everywhere from the pounding palaces of house music in Ibiza to the grimiest rock clubs in Manchester, searching for that elusive diamond in the rough.

It meant reading every piece of game advice I could get my hands on – books, ebooks, blogs and increasingly, as technology improved, watching pick-up videos. It meant working out every day, running for cardio and becoming obsessed with fashion, spending thousands of pounds on clothes. It meant being single-minded and persistent almost to the point of insanity. It meant addiction.

If all of this sounds like a lot of work just for pussy, then you're right – it is. But it also allowed me to acquire a higher notch-count of girls in the 7+ range of anyone outside the community I've ever met with the exception of one natural, who fits the tall-handsome-alpha bill. I don't say this to boast, but merely to point out that human ingenuity is such that if you want something badly enough and you go all out for it, then you will get it.

Freshman says elsewhere in the thread that he has made a great many approaches and I have no reason to doubt it. I do wonder, though, in cases like his, the degree of passion that has been injected into the project. As has been said many times before, if you had a gun pointed at your head you could achieve almost anything. I was lucky – or unlucky – enough to face that gun.

Whether it was all worth it is another matter. My life is now a lot more balanced. As you mature your desire for strange poon – while perhaps not diminishing – is certainly ameliorated by the recognition that our time on this planet is short, and that there are other things that are much more worth pursuing.

Don't Complain

We now live in a time where there are more excellent, freely available resources for men looking to get good with girls than ever before. This site, the Roosh V forum, Krauser's site and so on. It's not hard – just do a Google search. All the technology you require is out there, and any fool can go out and approach one hundred women. All you need is the will.

But I'm not sure that this can be faked. Krauser has pointed out that all highly successful players are to some degree emotionally damaged people, and I too have observed this to be the case. This is perhaps the darker side of game that people would rather not acknowledge.

If you are not driven to the degree I've described, but would nevertheless like to enjoy the player lifestyle, my advice would be to fake it to make it. Rather like a method actor, imagine how you would behave, what lengths you would go to for pussy if you were obsessive about it in the manner I've described, and then undertake those actions.

Perform with as much intensity, passion and gusto as you can muster, and over time you will start to see results. You won't necessarily beat the good-looking, square-jawed alphas, but you'll get more than your share. After a few successes these strategies will begin to hardwire themselves into your brain and become part of your personality and you will find yourself in an upward cycle of pleasure and reward.

Or, if you don't think it's worth the effort, then by all means continue watching from the sidelines. Just don't complain that the game is rigged when there are less attractive men than you out there getting laid right now.

To find out more about how to meet and attract beautiful women click here

Read More: Even a Lame Approach Is Better Than no Approach At All

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

My 3 Greatest Mistakes Writing For Return Of Kings

January 14, 2015 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Failure can often be a greater teacher than success. Our most valuable learning experiences are often the ones that leave us looking like a fool. With that in mind, I offer the three greatest mistakes I've made since I started writing for ROK:

1. Underestimating How Much Money Drives The Internet

When I began writing for ROK, I naively assumed other bloggers were writing for the same reason I was—because they wanted a platform to share their perspective. I had little conception of internet marketing, or that for many, writing is merely a means to an end. I assumed other blogs writing on similar topics were simply sharing a perspective, rather than trying to capture a marketshare. When they attacked people I respected, I was confused. After all, isn't there room for everyone?

In retrospect, it was an education I needed. If you've ever spent money on an ebook that turned out to be worthless, or paid for coaching that didn't help, you've gotten a taste of that education too. For many, the internet is a place to extract value from, rather than give to. Writers need to get paid for and market their work, but as a reader, it's wise to always look at the financial incentives of what you read online—yes, even my work.

Not understanding internet marketing caused me to miss a few frauds. Some of them eventually came after writers I respect. If I'd known then what I know now, I'd have called them out immediately. Though it's perhaps my only regret writing for ROK, it's a lesson I won't soon forget.

The flip-side of this lesson is that if you learn how scams sell products with no-value, or frauds make a name for themselves, you'll know how to promote work that does have value. I've already applied what I've learned about internet marketing to work I do outside of ROK. Knowing the basics of internet marketing is essential. If you can relate to my mistake, start studying.

2. Underestimating How Much The Media Lies

2014 was the year of lies. The year began with lies, as the media tried to link a mass murderer from a forum that tried to dox ROK writers, with our supporters, when he actually had more in common with their own failed philosophy. There were lies by omission, like Rotherham, in which the rape of thousands of young girls was covered up due to political correctness.

There were institutional lies, like the corruption exposed by #GamerGate – which had mores stories than I can list here. The year ended with one of the largest media scandals yet—the UVA rape hoax, in which Rolling Stone magazine published an entirely fabricated rape story that went viral and caused mass hysteria.

I'll admit, it wasn't until suspicions were raised by the RooshV forum that I started to question the story. I assumed on first reading that the reporter responsible, Sabrina Erdely, had interviewed not just her primary source, Jackie Coakley, but all of the friends she quotes in her article.

The idea that a reporter for a major magazine would have an agenda did not surprise me, but that she would be so incompetent as to not even speak with the people she attributes quotes to in her article? Surely the media couldn't be that arrogant!

Well it turns out, they were. At this point, the UVA rape story has been exposed to be a complete fabrication, and no one in the media has learned anything from it. I've yet to see one thought piece asking what this means for journalism, but I've seen several defending it. Whatever #GamerGate said about gaming press is true of the larger media.

To my knowledge, the first to question this story were Richard Bradley, the brilliant RooshV forum, and Return of Kings. Part of the reason I love this site is that there are others here who catch the lies I don't. Now, I won't put anything past the media. This won't be the last time they lie, or even the worst. Count on it.

3. Underestimating Myself

This is either a humble-brag, or a confession of my lack of confidence. I'm not sure which. I assumed when I started writing on ROK, no one would have any idea who I was or read my work for at least two years. I was just a guy who'd gained a lot from the manosphere, and wanted to give back. I had a desire to be heard and a willingness to learn, and that was about it. See point 1—when I started I was so naive, I didn't even know what internet marketing was.

Since then, I've had people I respect respond to my writing online, including those who introduced me to the red pill. I've seen my article reblogged by I've seen my posts turn up on real-life friend's timelines, not knowing it was me writing. I even had one guy say that it was my article that turned him red pill.

I feel incredibly honored knowing that my work has affected even just one of you. My Return of Kings identity is relatively separate from my everyday life. I launch these posts into the unknown, not knowing who will read them or what affect they'll have. I was honestly considering retiring from ROK, when I read I'd turned someone red pill and got another email from someone who appreciated my work the same day.

Haters don't faze me, but kindness still makes me a little teary. Your words have more power than you know. If me or another writer at ROK has made a positive difference for you, let us know by email or Twitter.

If you have a desire to write, or create something, start. Don't wait. Just start. If you've got something to say, it'll be worth it, mistakes and all.

*Bonus mistake: My Screenname.

Don't get me wrong, I like the symbolic value of my former screenname "runsonmagic" (runs-on-magic, get it?), but it does read like a twelve year-old's AOL screenname. I used to cringe when I'd read serious criticism of my writing referencing me by that name. While I still support online anonymity, from here on out I'll be using my more formal name on ROK: Eric Crowley.

Read More: The Best Of ROK Staff Writers In 2014

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

The Good And Bad Of Teaching English In Asia

January 14, 2015 | by Teacher Joe | Link | Original Link

James Soller had an article a few months back on where to go to teach English abroad. I've been teaching in Asia for more than seven years now, so I want to give my perspective. As much as I've enjoyed my time doing this, there are a lot of things to watch out for, and evaluating the bad is just as important as the good.

Before I that, I want to second his advice of getting a TEFL (and not an online one). Get a Celta, they're the best recognized out there and any other one you get costs nearly as much. I'll also recommend where: Ho Chi Minh City, it's cheaper but the actual course is the same anywhere you go.

Don't take it with no experience. Get any job you can and teach before you start your course. Do it for half a year to a year. It will be stressful, but when you take the TEFL course, you'll get much more from it.

South Korea

[image]

I started in South Korea, teaching in a public school. I hated it. Classes were huge, I was given virtually no training or books to use, my co-teacher and principal were bitches, and at least half the class would scream at me while I tried to teach. Korea has a bad reputation amongst English teachers, and the Koreans work hard to earn that reputation.

They're perpetually angry, demanding, and have a reputation for not paying you. I'll admit the country has advantages. It's first world and the pay is good. If you're in the Seoul area, there are things to see, good public transport, and other foreigners around. I was there in 2007, and I don't think it's changed enormously since then.

Japan

After that, I wanted to work in Japan. Japan's cool, right? It is a cool place, but not easy to work in. The English job market is old and therefore developed. Those who have jobs there don't want to give them up. The number of positions aren't increasing either, for demographic reasons. If you look online, most places require you to already be in Japan or even already have a work visa. Some don't, but they usually have other requirements.

If you have special credentials, give it a try. One big disadvantage is the amount of money you need to start living there. It can be a few or even several thousand dollars. No school gives you an apartment, and the key money is huge. You'll have to fly in and survive by yourself until your first paycheck.

Taiwan

I worked in Kaohsiung for a year (2008) and absolutely loved the place. Taiwanese people are friendly and polite, everything is cheap but of good quality. The countryside is beautiful and easily accessible from the city, and the city itself is pleasant. There's a surprising amount to explore on the island.

When I lived there first, it was easy to find work. With everything being real cheap, life was easy. No experience no qualifications ESL work has somewhat dried up though. When I went back to visit a year ago I saw almost no young English teachers like before.

Like anywhere, there is some work available. Most of the work is in the north these days, around Taipei. Years ago I met Canadians who entered on a tourist visa and overstayed it by years just working illegally. I met others who went to some public school in a small town, the principal was just happy to have any foreign teacher there and he wouldn't get too agitated about proper paperwork.

Vietnam

In 2009 I moved to Vietnam. I stayed for over four years. When I arrived jobs were everywhere, paying a shockingly high wage despite how poor the country was, and things were cheap. Visas were easy too. If mine was about to expire, I'd just hand it into my school three days beforehand and tell them to get me a new six-month visa, the cost was deducted from my salary.

Those days are over though. Around Tet New Year (it always happens then), the authorities decided there were too many foreigners making money. So overnight, with no warning, prices on visas went up and regulations went way up. I had to go through a long, expensive process of getting my degree notarized, getting a criminal background check, and more just to get a work visa.

Many, many teachers had to leave. Others had to make visa runs to Cambodia every couple months. Jobs are still there, but foreign teachers flooded in and the economy had some problems, so the golden age is over.

You can also run a side hustle in Vietnam. I was an extra in a movie (pays shit), I've met people who buy shoes and clothing made in 'Nam and sell them on eBay overseas. I know a guy who makes salsa. You can start a restaurant.

This was also my first time living in a third world country. For those of you who haven't before, you can't totally understand it until you live there. Rivers of motorbikes flowing down the street, making sudden turns, tailgating, driving on the sidewalk. The only thing the police do over there is pull people over to fish for bribes.

Bathrooms can be vile. Don't talk on your phone when you walk down the road! You'll get mugged. If you rent a room, the owner will feel comfortable just poking around your place when you're not there.

There's a lot of things I miss too. It's a crazy place. For meeting girls, Vietnam's hard to beat. They're beautiful, horny (yet interested in marriage), and love foreigners. I didn't have the same success at all with women in China.

China

I'm currently in China. It's quite different from Vietnam. The infrastructure is much better, roads are wider, and buildings are taller. The people are more disgusting though. They smoke and spit everywhere (everywhere!), and their children shit and piss everywhere. People also seem less inviting to foreigners (although friends tell me people are much friendlier in the North). Not that I'd gotten any negative reactions, but no one is interested.

In Taiwan and 'Nam it was easier to make friends with locals. Recently the internet got worse too. You've heard of the great firewall of China. They don't just block Facebook and Youtube, any foreign website gets throttled. The job market is different too, more stable. Salaried full time work is the standard instead of by-the-hour part time work. There are ESL centers like anywhere else in Asia, but a big advantage is that you can teach subjects instead of just English.

Private bilingual schools that replace regular public schools abound. Kids don't come here evenings and weekends just for English. It's half in English, half in Chinese during regular weekday hours. Last year I taught a wonderful first grade class in a school like that. I spent half the day doing English, math, and art with them.

My Chinese co-teacher assisted when I taught and also taught them classes in Chinese. Now I'm teaching A-level physics in an international section of a public school. It's much more satisfying teaching in a real school than playing hangman on evenings and weekends.

When looking for a job in China, location matters. Check www.aqicn.org to find out how bad air pollution is. Chinese "cities" will almost always include a fair amount of land that you and I would not consider urban. A better translation would be "county." You could be far away from anywhere interesting.

Unfortunately, for those of you overseas, it can be very hard to check this out before you get there. Talk to current teachers. Check it out on Google maps. You should should also consider mobility. How will you get around? If you're downtown, buses and the subway will get you anywhere. If you're in a smaller city you can probably buy a motorbike—they can be fun and useful to get around. But bigger cities in China usually ban motorbikes.

So if you're not in the coolest parts of town, but still technically in a big city, your options are limited. Electric bikes are ubiquitous, but not as fun or useful as a motorbike. I miss my motorbike in Taiwan and 'Nam.

Thailand

I never worked in Thailand, only visited. It's a beautiful and exciting place, and the women are easy—but consider the negatives. Thailand is a nation of thieves. All the people you see online talking about it being a paradise on earth don't mention the non-stop scamming and harassment there.

The golden age for jobs in Thailand ended a decade ago. Thailand is full of teachers who have been there for ages and will work for anything, since most places pay peanuts. However, if you're not just some backpacker and you have serious teaching credentials, you can get good work there.

General Advice

If possible, contact the job directly instead of a recruiter. The recruiter is a middleman who provides little real value but has incentives to lie. Some are good, but generally, try to find a school yourself. In China, echinacities.com is an excellent site for that. They have China news and guides too.

Seriousteachers.com is great for China and other countries. Dave's ESL is the classic site, specializing in Korea but also China, the Middle East, and anywhere. Websites can be very country-specific. In Taiwan, tealit.com is a good place. Japan has their own sites as well: www.ohayosensei.com. Eslteachersboard.com is a great site, not only do they have jobs, but they also have forums for people to say which schools are good or bad. Other job boards tend to be heavily censored.

Online reviews will provide valuable clues, but are not perfect. People are far more likely to post something negative than positive. Some of the people who go out of their way to post seem halfway crazy, or just intensely angry about something. I've read reviews for schools that I had worked for and been amazed. Try to find recent reviews. Schools can change, and it might even be a different school with the same name. Even schools that have branches may have wildly different working conditions.

The job hunt can vary a surprising amount by country. In some places (South Korea) it's almost impossible to get a job by visiting on a tourist visa and then visiting schools in person and changing your visa in country. This is by design, the Koreans got sick of backpacker teachers. In other places (Vietnam), the opposite is true, a few schools advertise online, but most don't.

You have to go there in person and apply, oftentimes doing a demo. The last few years have seen regulations tighten up everywhere. China has gone this way. If you arrive on a tourist visa and get a job, you have to leave the country, or at least go to Hong Kong, to get a work visa.

Arriving on a tourist visa and looking for jobs on foot can cost you serious time and money, but you have the advantage of being able to check things out before you get there. There are more than a few scammers and bad bosses out there. Being able to talk to current teachers away from prying ears is a huge plus.

If you must find your first job online though, ask for three current foreign teachers' emails and phone numbers. If they refuse or the contact info seems suspicious, you just saved yourself some serious trouble. I visited a school in Guangzhou that I was all but certain I'd sign with. I went there and even slept a night in the school dorms.

Then, I looked at the contract they gave me. It was different than the one they sent over the internet, with the monthly salary much lower. I asked my recruiter if there was some mix up. She got back to me and said that the school could find teachers for less money now. They felt no need to tell me this before I visited the place. Stories like this abound. Yet China’s still where the jobs are, so it’s hard to avoid the country altogether.

So happy trails, good luck, and stay vigilant in your hunt so that you can be happy in your work.

Read More: How Teaching English In China Can Improve Your Game

Teacher Joe
Joe is teaching in Asia, where life is better for young Westerners. His life has improved a great deal because of the manosphere. He started a teaching blog at Beyong Hangman for new teachers but it doesn't have much yet.

Tactics For The War Against Cultural Marxism In 2015

January 14, 2015 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Our enemies committed many blunders in 2014, but that is now the past. We need to be at the top of our game if we want to expand our offensive into 2015 and win more victories. In this regard, there are some things we need to understand and some tactics we need to utilize going forward.

1. Our enemies have more operational experience

While our side may in some ways be considered part-time militia, we find ourselves opposing what is essentially a standing army. Our enemies are full-time professional soldiers. They are motivated and fanatically devoted to their cause, and willing to expend all of their energies on it because it is often their profession to do so.

Our forces are part-time militia because our side is comprised of people that actually have lives. Our side has friends, plays games, goes out, has dates, works real jobs, etc. Because of this our enemy will usually have more operational experience and higher levels of fanaticism by default. This is a significant disadvantage to us.

What we lack in quantity we must make up for in quality. Our troops must be better trained, better equipped, and better led. Fortunately, this is something that nature swings in our favor. The typical red piller is of much higher quality in appearance, accomplishments, mannerisms, and worldview.

While the manosphere may be considered as the anti-cultural Marxist coalition's shock troops for this reason, the SJW's are inferior even to the typical gamer or atheist, as well as the normal people in other groups they have managed to alienate. This is in fact because they are normal. SJW's are not. Arguments do not attain power. Appearance does.

Our troops must have a workout regimen. They must maintain a high quality appearance. They must speak and act with decision and power. They must maintain their frame against SJW shit tests. They must be trained in a powerful ethos (if ever there were a time for a manosphere academy, it is now). They must be led to strike boldly at targets of opportunity.

Our forces, part-timers though they be, must become the most vaunted and feared political and cultural army in the world. This is a historical disadvantage of part-time militia against full-time professionals, but this is the dynamic we must create.

2. Domination of space, or "area denial"

A principal position of military might is domination of space. A victorious force must dominate space while actively denying the enemy space. In case you missed the boat, the SJW's dominate a lot of space at the moment, and it is the biggest reason why they have been so successful. Indeed, you can recognize this tactic by how the SJW's constantly bring up their favorite buzzwords in any community they manage to gain entry into, gaming being the biggest example.

When SJW's say that X community must be "more inclusive," or that there's a lot of racism, misogyny, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, otherkinophobia, xyzphobia in x community," it is an active attempt to dominate space.

Going forward into 2015, our forces must firstly engage in area denial tactics. All instances of SJW entryism must be recognized and snuffed out immediately. Commenters spewing SJW rhetoric on thus far neutral or clean sites must be banned on sight. We must prevent the enemy from spreading to other communities, and also push back in enemy territory. This means we need to conduct raids in SJW hot zones while denying them access to ours.

We also need to actively start dominating space on a wider scale. I used to scoff at hashtag activism that is the SJW meme du jour, but GamerGate has proven that hashtag activism can be just as effective against its creators as it has been on their victims.

Our side should take popular memes and turn them against the SJW's, as GamerGate did with the SJW-created logo for love and acceptance in gaming to great effect. There are other memes around such as "Meininist" that can also be used spectacularly. Whenever the SJW's come out with another outrage, debunk it if possible, mock it, and spread it to the ends of the earth in a rapid mobilization to dominate the space before they do.

Again, the fact that they have what is essentially a standing army will work against us here, but our numbers are now large enough to act in this way.

3. Dual power

This is a tactic associated with the left emerging out of the 19th century (the term itself was coined by Lenin), but in practice it has always been around. The basic idea behind this is that alternative institutions are created that then compete with the entrenched institutions of power. The alternative institutions then begin to accumulate power, transfer the loyalties of the populace, and in this way begin the transformation of society.

The mainstream institutions weaken and the populace then makes changes in the wider mainstream society through their base from the formerly alternative institutions. It is essentially "creating a new world in the shell of the old."

Return of Kings (and the manosphere in general) is a great example of dual power in action. It amassed a large readership in 2013, continued to expand in 2014, and is now in a position of sufficient strength to actively take the offensive and begin to make inroads into the transformation of society.

Manosphere forces arrived in strength to reinforce the gamers and reinvigorated the GamerGate revolt, supplying it with critical new energy that greatly contributed to the spectacular offensives in October and November that cost Gawker a million dollars, among other victories.

Dual power works to our active advantage. While our enemies may be full-time professional victims and complainers, they are fanatical zealots and authoritarians. In this regard they drive people away and make them actively seek out alternative institutions. The new sites springing up in the wake of GamerGate are other alternative institutions that can employ a dual power strategy by sapping the mainstream, SJW-infested outlets of readership and therefore ad dollars.

In this regard this strategy is a subset of spatial domination and area denial. We simultaneously create new spaces from which we can strengthen our forces and launch new offensives, while actively denying their use to the enemy and weakening the enemy's own spaces of power.

Understand that we are in a bitter struggle. I have used military language in this post for a reason—this is a war. Quintus said it best on the forum a few months ago:

> We as men are engaged in a war against forces that seek to destroy us collectively and individually. This is a critical moment in modern history. Any man who doesn't get this fundamental truth, who isn't prepared to resist the forces that seek to subjugate him, doesn't deserve to survive.
>
> We have been taking the abuse from these people for years upon years, and now is the time to start fighting back.
>
> This is a war that I want to wage. This is one that was forced on us. They are the ones who seek to deprive us of our dignity, our livelihood, and our identity. We are going on the offense from now on. No backing down, no apologizing, and no > equivocating.

>
> And we will be heard.
>
> If I could be a prophet today, I would say that they will one day regret that they gave us no other option but to oppose them with every ounce of our being.

Human psychology and the nature of conflict don't change, whether that conflict is fought with bullets or tweets. We must be aware of these tactics and the lessons of history and continue to move forward. Many of the issues we face would have erupted into violence in the past, and still might.

For the past half century, Cultural Marxists have gained prominence and have systematically undermined western civilization. As Quintus also said, they seek to destroy our culture and replace it with nothing. It might take another half century to undo the damage they have done. We must be in this for the long haul and remember that this cultural Hundred Years' War is ours to lose. The consequences of our losing will be the wholesale destruction of our identity and well-being.

As Roosh said in his last video: work on yourself, make yourself a high quality soldier, sharpen your blades, keep your powder dry, and prepare for battle.

Let's begin the 2015 campaign with vigor and power. Keep these tactics squarely in your mind to expand on our great successes in 2014.

Read More: Cultural Marxism Produces Matriarchy

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

Why You Should Have A “Fuck You” Fund

January 14, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

Money can’t buy you love.

Money can’t buy you health.

Money can’t buy you happiness.

But it sure as shit CAN by you a lot of other very important things like freedom, options, control over your own life, and most importantly, power.

Today I want to introduce the concept of “fuck you” money. If you don’t already have a stash of fuck you money, it’s very important that you begin working on getting some as soon as possible.

What is fuck you money?

Fuck you money, as you may have guessed, is uncommited cash sitting in your bank account which you can use to live on when you need to say “fuck you!” to an asshole boss, customer, or employer of any variety.

It’s really that simple. It’s the stash of cash you will have which will allow you to operate and live as a free human being rather than a slave. I’m not saying you will have to quit work and spend your days stroking your beard on the porch and reading philosophy (although you can do that if you wish), but it will give you the option to quite simply pack up your things and tell anybody you don’t like to get out of your face.

This is good for several obvious reasons.

Why is fuck you money good?

Fuck you money is good because it gives you power and independence. When you have enough money in the bank to live for a few years, you don't worry, toss and turn, and lose sleep. In fact, you sleep like a baby.

You may even have a conversation like this:

> 'Yeah Jack, cancel that stag weekend, can you? I need you to come into the office on the weekend and file away some TPS reports.'
>
> 'Sorry Jim, I have plans as you already know. We're going to Vegas and will probably end up sniffing coke off a hookers asscheeks like The Wolf of Wallstreet, but maybe someone else can fill in.'
>
> 'Now Jack, you know the company is going through some cut backs, you wouldn't want to jeopardize your chances of future employment would you?'
>
> 'Jim…You know what…Fuck you!'
>
> 'Sorry? This must be a bad line….I thought you said…'
>
> 'Yes Jim, I said fuck you! You can rest my hairy nutsack on your eyeballs. I quit.'

Now I personally am not into doing coke and if I went anywhere near a hooker's asscheeks my little lady would have something to say, but the point remains. I might instead tell my boss I'm not available to work for a few months and go trekking in The Himalayas or train to run a marathon, whatever suits me.

The point is, when you have several years of living expenses saved and in the bank, you will have the kind of power and independence required for you to actually have the above conversation with whoever you please. Forward-thinking people might tone it down a notch or two, but the point remains—you could actually have that conversation if you wished.

That's power. That's what fuck you money can do for you. That's why fuck you money is good.

How to get some fuck you money

If you've been an undisciplined naughty boy in the past, you may be a long way away from having this kind of power, and frankly that's your karma. You reap what you sow in this life and your finances are no exception, so if you're piled high in credit card debt and loans and have no savings, the best thing you can do is accept that you are in the shitter and make a commitment to get out of it as soon as possible.

The only way out of a hole is to stop digging and yell for a rope, then climb out. That's just the way it is.

Ideally, if you have been a little more prudent and disciplined, you may have no debt and some savings, but you'll want to build on that and if possible add to the pile until you have several years worth of savings on hand. This is when you will begin to feel the power of fuck you money, whereby if the economy tanks and you lose your job, if you get hurt and can't work or if your boss tries to bully you and you tell him to get fucked, you won't lose a single wink of sleep.

So, in order:

Pay off your debt and never get into debt again

Debt is for slaves. If you have 80k equity in your home and a 200k mortgage, sell it, take the money that is left and buy a house for that much. Even if it's only 50k and you have to move, do so. If you don't want to do what is necessary to achieve true power and financial mastery, don't complain when you have to cancel your stag weekend to Vegas and file some TPS reports because you're living way above your means. Life is all about choices.

To prove I'm for real and practice what I preach consider this, I make six figures a year and my rent is $300 a month. I moved to Asia so I could implement this strategy. You can too.

Lower your expenses

I don't know you and I don't know how you live, but I'm willing to bet my bottom dollar that if you are an average man in the western world 50% of your life expenses are absolutely unnecessary.

Lose the brand new car, lose the expensive cell phone plan and cable TV, downsize on the rent, move closer to your place of work, and eat simply. In a couple of years your debts will be gone and your bank account will be swollen like Arnold's biceps back in the day. If your shoes cost more than $50, you need to be beaten will a financial stick. Expensive shoes are for girls, financial freedom is for men.

Save and invest

After you take care of the parasite of debt and downsize to a reasonable standard of living, start stacking that paper and building your "fuck you fund."

You can even invest these funds in stocks, bonds or a mutual fund if you wish, but make sure that wherever you stick the money it is liquid so you can get it out easily if you need to access it in an emergency fuck you situation.

Bonus: Expand your income.

For the budding entrepreneurs among you, find ways to expand your income. Start a side gig, build an income-generating website, and create multiple streams of income. Invest all this money into further income generating assets while living of your primary income source and before you know it you'll be rockin' like Mick Jagger.

Conclusion

Having a fuck you fund is nice. Very nice. I know that firsthand because I enjoy the benefits mentioned in this article.

I personally choose to work because I enjoy my job most of the time and I also stand to become rich if i stick with it for ten or fifteen years. That being said, I could quite happily quit tomorrow and take a couple of years off to think about what I wanted to do next.

I don't have enough to live forever, but I do have enough to live for a couple of comfortable years if i ever need to tell somebody "fuck you!"

And that, merry men, is why you need to get some fuck you money.

Read More:

Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK

January 15, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK has been open for a little over two years, and during that time we've published over 2,000 articles. This can be overwhelming to a new visitor so I went ahead and selected the 35 most important articles that will help you understand all the truth that has been hidden from you. They are intended to aid in your exit from the cave of blue pill ignorance and into the red pill's harsh but essential light.

Here they are:

Culture

1. Why There Will Always Be A Sexual "Double Standard"
2. A 3 Point Primer In Modern Female Privilege
3. This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy
4. "Rape Culture" Was Manufactured To Wage An Unjust War Against Men
5. The Equality Movement Is Allowing Women To Tyrannize Men
6. The Deregulation Of The Sexual Marketplace
7. How Black America Has Predicted Our Future
8. America's Sexual Hierarchy Favors Alpha Males More Than Ever
9. How The Gender Script Was Flipped
10. You-Go-Girlism Is More Toxic Than Feminism

11. Cultural Marxism Produces Matriarchy
12. Is Feminism Its Own Worst Enemy?
13. The 7 Most Common Feminist Insults
14. Why The American Economy Needs The Beta Male

Lifestyle

15. 11 Fundamental Guidelines For Solid Game
16. 8 Essential Rules To Surviving The Workplace
17. Don't Believe The Lies About Foreign Brides

Women

18. 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women
19. 40 Pictures That Show The Decline Of American Women
20. How Young Women Promote The Hookup Culture
21. Modern Woman In Wanting To Be For Herself, Has Destroyed Herself
22. Women Should Not Be Allowed To Vote
23. Young Girls Are Better Than Older Women
24. The 15 Magical Years of Womanhood
25. The Intellectual Inferiority Of Women
26. The Awesome Temporary Power Of Young Attractive Women
27. Women Have No Sense Of Justice
28. The 7 Most Common Lies Women Tell In A Relationship
29. Help Raise Awareness About Rape Tourette's

Men

30. The Myth Of Male Power
31. The Myth Of The Male Biological Clock
32. Why White Knights Voluntarily Enslave Themselves To Women
33. The 5 Stages Of Nice Guy Grief
34. The Western Male Is The Reason Why His Women Suck
35. Why Money Can No Longer Save The Beta Male

If you appreciate these articles, consider making a donation to help operate ROK. Click here to learn more about donating.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 More Terrible Lessons Taught In Church Today

January 15, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

The image above is from the new about-to-be-rebuilt Greek Orthodox church on Ground Zero in New York. The outside of the building is designed to light up at night. That and the blandness of the interior are reflective on the sterility of modern Christianity, and the fact that the Orthodox allowed a Spanish Catholic to design it is revealing on the secularist mindset of the Eastern Orthodox Church today.

Yes, the Christian sect that red pill man-crush Vladimir Putin strong-arms for has built that hideous work of compromise. All forms of Christianity today have gone from teaching doctrine to teaching doubt. Even Eastern Orthodoxy—often thought of as the most beautiful and hardline sect of Christianity—panders to whatever ideology of the day is in fashion, which in turn trickles down into its aesthetics.

I promised I'd write on this again, so here we are. The church on your street-corner likely teaches all sorts of sensationalist doctrine designed to retain a high quantity of members instead of a high quality. And as a result, we see that church membership is sinking. The young generation no longer feels like they can trust the authority of religious institutions and often leaves to find alternative spiritualities.

What happened to the young that made them so distrustful of everything they knew growing up? Here are a few lessons you were taught in church that will make you grow up to be a miserable person.

"Loving Yourself Means Thinking Highly Of Yourself"

I used to have a close Christian mentor. He often told me, "One sin I struggle a lot with is low self-esteem." Today I put my hand on my forehead when I think about that. This push for self-esteem at any cost is what has made my generation all fat and worthless. We want to blame the public schools for it, but the churches are almost as bad.

For those of you who grew up in American Christianity, recall VeggieTales's "God loves you because you are unique" ethic at the end of every episode.

The theological and semantic errors in that are for another forum. Suffice it to say that Christians—exactly like liberal secularists—keep on and on about "love" but define it however it best fits their current purposes. Christianity wants to see itself as the center of the community, so they willingly adopt the ethics and definitions of the public schools. True, Jesus commanded to love yourself. But that doesn't mean to think you're a winner no matter how much you screw up your life.

A radiant offender in this is the ever-popular church league franchise Upward Basketball, often a bulwark of the local community. There is no tournament after the season, and they often don't keep score or call fouls. But every kid walks away with a trophy and a Bible, giving them a weird feeling of accomplishment while knowing that they either didn't accomplish anything if their team was bad or that they should have been allowed to accomplish more if their team was good.

Then the kid grows up to think his bachelor's degree in creative writing is an accomplishment while knowing that he would never pass engineering. If anything, you'd think the draconian view of man's depravity in Christianity would lead one to preach self-loathing.

"Just Love Others"

This is closely related to the above. Jesus said that all morality can be summed up by this command. However, the Bible never defines "love." Yes, there's 1 Corinthians 13, but that only describes it. People of all ideological sects greatly abuse and misuse this term. For those of you playing along at home, I myself would define Christian love as "being as God is," but that's just a working definition.

This is not a benign misunderstanding either. Misguided love always becomes toxic love. Plenty of people do harmful things to each other out of a sincere concern for their well-being. Many feminists—often the quieter ones—want what is in the best interest for other women, but that does not negate how destructive their lifestyle is.

"God Has Called Everyone To A Specific Career"

This is just bizarre, but it is very common in a lot of veins of Christianity. Many people really think that God has a career planned out for you and that it is your responsibility to discern what it is. So, for example, when you are born, God decides you should be a fireman. But if you become a police officer instead, then supposedly you just haven't listened to his guidance.

And some people think they know God's calling but fail to achieve it no matter how hard they try. You can see how many young people would quickly grow disenfranchised with the religion. The stronger one's faith, the more broken it is when it shatters.

I was recently gaming a high school senior who was convinced that God wanted her to become a surgeon because “He has placed this desire in my heart.” She wouldn’t listen no matter how I tried to tell her that was a bad idea. So I had to dismiss her.

Now not only is she about to fail at a miserable career—likely before it even starts—but she also missed out on a potential soulmate. Which ties back into my point above about toxic love, since I’m sure her parents encouraged her to piss away her best years in grad school.

“Saving Sex For Marriage Is Really Important”

The problem is not so much with the ethic itself of waiting until marriage as it is that churches do nothing to create a context for this. Waiting until marriage would be easy if people got married at 15 or even 18. And they are right that you should generally have stable finances before getting married.

So if they wanted kids to wait until marriage, you’d think they’d give the incentive by encouraging kids to marry younger. And to do that, they’d push for men to go to trade school and for women to avoid careers. But our parents all think their kids are above average in intelligence with a special vocation from God. Having a blue collar kid is embarrassing, no matter how much evidence is shown that it is a better choice for financial and work satisfaction.

So today Christians push everyone to get a four-year degree, which often turns into a six-and-a-half year degree. And then there’s a grad degree, maybe. Add that to other toxic ideas taken from Hollywood and feminism that encourage emotional immaturity. So the kid is in his mid-twenties searching around for that ever-elusive good Christian girl. And of course Christians are often horrified by game theory, so Joe Good Christian Boy doesn’t stand a chance.

Likewise, Christian girls wait the same amount of time only to find that none of the guys at church are able to turn them on. The Christian guy is taught that he should date a girl for at least two years before deciding if they should get engaged, so every year that passes, he watches his youthful sexual energy slip away. The Christian male has his own biological clock.

If the Christian 14-year-old boy is looking at being maybe 25 at the earliest if he’s lucky before he has sex for the first time, then of course he’s likely saying, “No fucking way.” And if he knows he is an extreme beta (as I did), he realizes that it will be even longer. Christian girls have much the same line of thought, and hypergamy is rampant in both sexes. Add to that an implicit taboo on interacting at length with the opposite sex.

So the young Christian man or woman either fornicates and stays in church as a hypocrite, or they apostate altogether to do what they are naturally inclined to do, or they repress their most basic human urges on the hope that one day God will drop a spouse onto their doorstep. Either way, the young Christian man or woman feels generally betrayed and abandoned by church and God.

For the record, I’ve found that the Christian men wait until marriage much more often than the Christian women, despite what they told us about how it is harder for men to abstain.

Most Christian parents do not love their children. What they are concerned about is their pride. It is cruel and torturous to give their children a lifestyle and identity without a context in which to express it.

The simple solution to Christian premarital sex is to encourage boys to go to vocational school and girls to be domestic. That would also solve most of the emotional maturity issues. But the Christians won't do that because they want to fit in with the fashions of the world. Which is really the biggest reason to quit going to church.

Read More: The Most Sincere Autobiography Ever Written

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Sweden’s Fall To Leftism Is A Cautionary Tale For The Western World

January 15, 2015 | by Drexel Scott | Link | Original Link

To those of you who haven’t been following along with the feminist indoctrination of Sweden and its effect on their country, it is time to start paying attention to such things. I know the next version of the iPhone seems really important to many of you, and that your minds are occupied with such clutter throughout the day.

I assure you, there are far more prudent things for us to concern ourselves with if we wish to not only point out the wrongs of our modern chaotic Babylon of a nation, but to take the action necessary to restore order in a time of such dire need.

The creep of political correctness

Consider that Sweden was once an amazing country where the people were mostly happy and mostly peaceful. However, it is a couple steps ahead of America in terms of what happens when you let dishonest, ignorant bigots (feminists) control national policy. There is one thing to understand that I have not yet seen addressed on Return Of Kings, though it is an important piece of the puzzle.

The kind of political correctness advocated by feminists opens the doors for some very nasty things, one of which is takeover by radical Islamists. I’m sure that sounds insane to some of you, though I would argue that by the time you’re done with this article, perhaps it will make sense to you how much the two are connected. Let’s chunk down and examine how this can make sense.

The doctrine of political correctness makes illegal the honest and rational observation of any group of people who are not white. Despite the fact that it’s Orwellian thought control–“Tyranny with manners,” as Charlton Heston once called it–it also makes it incredibly easy for enemy cultures to take root and begin their operations against the host nation.

Often times, this involves wealth transfer from the host population to the new parasitic invader population, which will feed off the host until it grows big enough to simply swallow it whole. Radical Islam, as it is very open about, is on a “divine mission” to eradicate the world of western powers (and many other people as well). Everyone is to some degree aware of this. When a host population is no longer allowed to say “maybe we shouldn’t let those guys in who swore an oath to behead us,” it makes them an extremely easy target.

The history of Islam in Sweden

For years, radical Islamists have been invading Sweden. Muslims (different from Islamists) are now 5% of the Swedish population, and commit an absolutely staggering 77% of the crime. I am not just talking about petty theft, either–I am talking about thousands of cars being set on fire, bombs going off all over the country, and an enormously high rate of rape of white Swedish women by radical Islamists.

In recent months, the native population of Sweden has grown tired of the insanity brought in with radical Islamist culture and the sharia law they advocate. People have begun fighting back and blowing up mosques all around the country, and now the Islamists are retaliating by killing Swedish police officers. One study estimated that Sweden will become a third-world country by 2030, and be less prosperous than Mexico.

It is a terrifying and crystal clear image of what happens when the kind of political correctness espoused by feminists is allowed to bleed its venom into mainstream dialogue and government. It is a danger to every country it sinks its claws into, and there is absolutely no reason to believe America won’t eventually go the same way unless we turn things around.

Feminist insanity continues

Several times, feminist politicians in Sweden have tried to outlaw the act of urinating into a urinal since “a man standing up holding his penis is indicative of male sexual violence.” Recently, a school in Sweden even banned displaying the Swedish flag.

When are we going to learn the lesson that you cannot let certifiably deranged human beings get into positions of power of any kind? When will we stop letting those monsters teach our children, run our universities, create useless Human Resources departments, and write our laws? When will we say, “enough is enough of this insanity,” and begin to look at the obvious outcome occurring in other places where the disease is even more advanced? It is a cancer unto our culture and leads to nothing good or true.

It is so obvious what is happening, and it breaks my heart that so few people in the west seem to care one iota what is happening all around them. In moments of candor, they will admit they would rather live in blissful ignorance than harsh reality.

That is why it is up to us to turn things around as we have been doing and must now begin to go on the offensive. We know where this will lead and we will never wake up enough of the masses to have their majority support. They want to stay asleep.

Let us pull Excalibur from the stone and raise our arms together as one united brotherhood of men standing up for truth, justice and reason in an age of twisted ideology.

Read Next: Freedom Of Speech Is Dying In Sweden

Drexel Scott
Truth is my religion, and sovereignty my destiny. I'm an entrepreneur who teaches what I know, and you can find my #1 Closing Advice book, Straight To Sex, at my website: http://www.drexelscott.com/s2s

An Unconventional Method I Used To Sleep Better

January 15, 2015 | by Joshua Rennenkampf | Link | Original Link

A lot of choices I made as a young man led to long-term consequences I still have to deal with today. And I don't just mean ignorant decisions made because of my blue pill upbringing.

Some of the punishment I put my body through when I felt invincible eventually brought me to a state in which I feel far more fragile than agile. Between football and the Airborne, my back and knees are a hot mess. Slamming your body full-speed into other strong, healthy young men, jumping out of airplanes, and pounding the ground carrying 80 pounds of whupass is not exactly work that the human body was designed to perform for extended periods.

Some physical ailments I suffer have an origin I can't identify—like acid reflux.

I've gone to doctors, but as many of you probably already know: today's doctors have no interest in healing you; they only push pills. Modern medicine is not about fixing root problems—it's about getting you dependent on drugs that numb some of the symptoms.

At least that's my experience.

Let me add another personal detail that's relevant: until about 12 years ago I slept like the typical infantryman…which is to say: HEAVY. I could sleep through almost anything, anytime, anywhere. But I didn't appreciate what a blessing that was. Then the V.A. prescribed medicine for a symptom of a problem I was suffering, and it wrecked my sleep.

I haven't been able to sleep right since then. Add to that my increasing difficulty getting comfortable in bed, and the acid reflux that strikes without warning at night, and the result is not nearly enough rest.

Sleep is when your body heals. When you don't sleep, the long and short-term results are problematic. You don't just need healing after an injury per se—if you lift, for instance, that's when the muscle groups you taxed at the gym recover and grow. Guys who get really big don't all follow the same diet or workout regimen or all take steroids; but one thing they all seem to have in common is they sleep a lot.

I have plenty of pain pills on hand, and some of them knock me out. Unfortunately, they also make me groggy after awakening when I need to be alert.

The solution I found

Since my back is the main culprit keeping me from sleeping, I've been stretching a lot, using a Shiatsu massager, keeping my knees elevated at night, and I stiffened up my mattress as best I could. None of this did the trick.

For Christmas I was given an acupuncture mat for back and neck.

There's no universal consensus on what exactly acupuncture does. The explanation that makes most sense to me is: by stimulating multiple nerve clusters at once, it works some kind of hoodoo on your central nervous system, releasing neurotransmitters and hormones into your body. This results in pain relief, a revitalized immune system and other microprocesses restored throughout your body.

Though not everyone agrees why it works, most agree that it does work.

The mat I got for Christmas does not use the long metal needles you may have seen in movies, but fairly short plastic spikes—thousands of them. Willing to try nearly anything, I rolled it out on my bed and positioned myself so that it was in contact from my tailbone to my neck.

Laying on the mat is not comfortable. It felt like my skin was burning. But a lesson I learned years ago is “no pain, no gain.” So I elevated my knees to flatten my mangled lumbar against the mat and resolved that I would endure the discomfort for at least 10 minutes.

Before 10 minutes elapsed, I fell unconscious.

I came half-awake at some point later that night, put the mat away and laid back down, falling asleep as readily as I had as a young man.

I mentioned that I no longer sleep like an infantry veteran—more like an assassin. Any little anomaly wakes me up. And whether it is my woman, the dogs, an itch, or my bladder, I usually find it difficult-to-impossible to fall back asleep.

For the last two nights, however, only my bladder was able to wake me. After stumbling like a drunkard to the toilet and back, I conked out without trouble just like the old days. And no acid reflux either, so far.

I still need to invest in a better mattress. Even then, I might never be able to sleep on my stomach again. But this experience has brought so much relief that I’m now a believer in acupuncture.

If nothing else is working out for you, the acupuncture mats are affordable and well worth the temporary discomfort.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Be Doing Intermittent Fasting

Joshua Rennenkampf
Joshua is a veteran of the Airborne Infantry and an author of books for and about red-blooded heterosexual males. He also blogs about books, movies, US culture, and politics from an unapologetic red pill, masculinist perspective. He is not a conservative (having rejected the terms "conservative" and "liberal" long ago), but an American patriot. "The Right-Wing Boogeyman that network news warned you about." You can read more from him at Virtualpulp.net.

New Gaming Media Sites Are Emerging

January 15, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Just as GamerGate was about to start, there was a massive buildup of outrage about the games media on the imageboard known as 4chan. The anonymity of posters on 4chan produced some amazing posts as well as some absolute filth. There was basically only one rule—“no child pornography”.

There was no central authority to organize GamerGate, dictate the goals, lay out the methods of achieving them, or even propose an established meeting place. People were simply outraged but had no idea what to do, so they flocked to 4chan and spammed the living hell out of it.

Brave new imageboard

The action was finally crystallized when moot, the founder of 4chan, started actively banning all mention of GamerGate or related personalities on 4chan. This was done under the excuse of “privacy violation,” but eventually the relationship of moot with Anita Sarkeesian was established.

When people started massively migrating, they choose a Reddit subforum called KotakuInAction. This is where the email campaigns were organized and encouraged. Someone would dig up advertisers' email info and post it, prompting others to launch a barrage of emails to them.

Man the email cannons!

There was no set template, instead encouraging emails to always be personal yet have a single conclusion: Polygon, Kotaku and the rest of SJW faux-media are bad at what they do and inherently evil, hence will you please stop buying their ad space. This resulted in a loss of over $1 million to Gawker media, as anonymous insiders confirmed.

Needless to say, this ruffled some feathers over at Gawker. They contacted their friends at Reddit and kindly asked them for a favor. Namely, to shut up KiA. This resulted in a gradually increasing censorship of KiA, culminating in vaguely accusing its members of harassment for posting publicly available PR contact addresses.

Some went from 4chan to form another imageboard, called 8chan, however, this was again attacked by SJWs, as they even tried DDoSing it and at one point managed to convince the registrar of the domain that 8chan was hosting child porn.

The founder of the 8chan, HotWheels, has even had to fight to keep his Patreon account alive, which is how he funded server costs of 8chan.

Like phoenix from the ashes

The result of GamerGate was the formation of certain gaming news websites that promise to provide real information, but this time around, it will be different. But what can they change, if anything at all?

One of these new gaming news websites that spawned out of GamerGate is BasedGamer.com, started by Jennie Bharaj, who famously demolished HuffPo host with her "Listen and Believe".

While BasedGamer does promise to offer a new way of looking at reviews, there is still the problem of funding. Eventually, if its primary source of income turns out to be ad revenue, BasedGamer could end up in the same situation as GameSpot, where a major games developer buys up all ad space, expecting a favorable review of their latest title.

Ditch the scoring system

Game reviews are extremely problematic as well by their nature. The scoring systems can range from "5 stars" to "percentile points," but all of them are inherently subjective. One reviewer may give a game 5/10, while another may give it 8.8/10 and we still may not know if the game is any good.

Well, I better buy it then

While we can probably agree which games deserve 1/10, because we can clearly see the objective flaws such as a bad camera, being loaded with bugs, or crashing all the time, deciding which games deserve the top score is a lot trickier. Again, everyone has his own favorite genre and scores those games a lot higher than the average reviewer would.

Metacritic, a review aggregate website, even got a lot of bad flak when it turned out game developers paid a lot of money to those games that essentially gamed the scoring system and achieved a certain score. Again, these scores are completely arbitrary and should not have such weight at all.

The problem is that people hate making their own decisions, instead focusing on hype and fanboyism. The easiest way for an average gamer to decide if he wants a game or not is to go to his favorite gaming news website, click on the link and read the score.

This fosters an industry in which unfinished games are a norm and day-1 DLC or bugfixes a golden standard. Hype becomes essential and everything else falls by the wayside. Why even bother with making anything good? Just rehash the old story, change a few textures and ship it. Hell, you can even reuse old assets and cut costs even further.

It’s no longer the good old days

You used to be able to punch in a cartridge and play it, knowing that the game is at least finished. Today? You will be lucky to find even AAA releases that don’t need day-1 patches.

This means that you should never, under any circumstances, pre-order games or buy them at launch, no matter how hyped they are or who made them. That’s simply the sad situation we are in.

Of course, this situation is untenable and something has to give. Gamers have already caught on to the ploy, and, despite the attempts of silencing and harassing the people who have swallowed the red pill, the truth is out in the open and there is no coming back.

While can be almost certain that clickbaity faux-gaming websites are on their way out, the actual future of gaming news seems to be crowdsourcing. While Youtube or Twitch may be the best way to check out what a game actually looks and feels like before purchase, even streamers can be influenced in a myriad of subtle ways that skew their opinion.

In conclusion, it seems that the best way to find out if you truly want to buy a game is to go out on a forum and ask for people's advice. On average, people do have common sense and make the right choices. Who knew?

Did you like this post? Read more #gamergate news on Reaxxion, ROK's little brother. Click here to visit.

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

7 Risk-Reducing Tactics For The Sexually Promiscuous Man

January 16, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

Dating, romance, and sex offer some of the most exciting and satisfying times in a man's life. The mating game is ecstasy to misery, rejection to success, day by day and even hour by hour. Many men struggle to get a foothold in the sexual marketplace but others have a wide range of options.

Usually the initial response to having sexual options is to think in terms of increasing notch counts, flags and range of experience. This approach can be very satisfying, at least for a while, but brings with it a range of risks.

Risk is always present and can't be eliminated entirely. Obviously measures which reduce risk without reducing sexual opportunity should be taken. Often, though there is a trade-off between enjoying the delights and avoiding the pitfalls. The more successful, charmed, and invincible a man seems the more he needs to divert his effort and attention away from sexual success and towards reducing the inevitable risks.

Game presents a range of tactics to increase sexual opportunities for a man. This article offers a sort of "anti-game" list of tactics to reduce risk, hopefully without losing too many of the rewards. This is not a list of suggested rules for living, but a toolkit of tactics to consider in the struggle to find the best point between excessive adventure and excessive caution.

1. Reject unattractive, bad, or crazy girls

Don’t do it man, the odds are too great

Every sex act is a risk and some are riskier than others. Not every sex act brings equal benefits or any pleasure at all. In plentiful circumstance it is still tempting to just grab everything. Perhaps it is time to consider rejecting the less desirable and the loose cannons.

2. Never set out to pump and dump

If sex is being achieved fairly quickly then pump-and-dump is an inevitable part of the game. Girls will sometimes turn out to be less worthwhile than they seemed, and have to be passed on after sex. By contrast, setting out to have sex with a girl but one time only is usually a mistake. The only reason to consider pump-and-dump in the first place is because a girl is of marginal attractiveness or is dangerous. The costs, benefits, and risks of having such encounters just don’t add up when there are other, better options available, even if not immediately.

3. Keep the lies to a minimum

By convention, some lies are completely accepted in the mating market or at least considered regrettable but minor lapses. Others, particularly those involving infidelity, are potential dynamite. Perhaps the easiest ways to avoid problems here is to keep the existing relationship status vague in the telling and to keep the existing relationship status vague in fact.

4. Resist the temptation to escalate too quickly

Do you know where this is going?

The obvious advantage of quicker escalation is quicker sex and that's quite some advantage, but there are problems. The faster a girl is willing to be escalated the more likely that she is crazy or low quality in some way that is not instantly obvious. Quick escalation means less time for assessment of risks for both participants.

5. Keep records of romantic and sexual activities

Always keep a diary of sexual encounters. The form is not so important but it should include names, addresses, locations, dates, times, photos, activities, sex acts and menstruation data. It should also include notes about the people and circumstances surrounding events.

The diary will be useful when a mostly forgotten girl reappears much later, and is worth its weight in gold in the event of pregnancy claims or false rape allegations. Having exact information is handy for assessing girls quality and fidelity, and for checking their stories after the fact. It's also nice to be able to have a memory jogger when looking back to analyze performance and tactics.

It should go without saying, but make sure that no girl gets to see it, ever.

6. Maintain distance in relationships

The general rule is to not let temporary or probably temporary girls get into a position to cause damage. That means limiting their contact with more permanent and important areas of a man's life. Some girls are already in positions where they have the ability to cause damage. Playing with housemates, workmates, and friends is playing with fire.

7. When it gets nasty or it's over don't make things worse

Based on a true story!

So, it’s clearly coming apart. Accusations are flying, maybe fists are flying. It’s often tempting to inflame the situation by making smart comments, arranging for one last encounter, text baiting, and so on. Maybe it’s to express annoyance, maybe it’s to try to seem to be in the right, maybe it’s just for entertainment. Don’t do it, it’s dangerous. She’s really not that important anyway.

Read More: How To Use Rhetoric To Sexually Objectify Women

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

Why You Should Ask What's In It For You

January 16, 2015 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

"People think that niceness equates to goodness, when the true motivator is selfishness"- Undisclosed, 2015

Persistent knocking jolted me from two hours of dreamless sleep. I must have been more tired than I realized from the night before, because things in my room (like my gun!) weren't in their proper place. This knocking continued, and out of irritation I decided to answer.

I peered through the peephole; saw a man in business attire. My first response was to wonder what I did last night for an investigator to pay a visit to my house. My curiosity got the best of me and I opened the door. Turns out the man was soliciting donations for charity. He didn't get a chance to finish his sales pitch because the confluence of variables such as me being tired, irritated, and elated at not being investigated caused me to slam the door in his face, lock it, and go back to bed.

When I awoke many hours later, I wondered why this brilliant tactic for handling solicitors had not occurred to me before.

I have noticed that in American society today, there is always some drive to get people to donate to whatever cause. There probably are ok charities out there, but in my opinion they are tax havens of political patronage. How much of your donation do you think goes to the six-figure salary of the president and how much goes to the actual cause you wish to support?

It's nauseating every time some smarmy bitch boy, who barely makes rent working for a nonprofit, tells me about the value of collectivism. Therefore I will not feed those beasts and neither should you.

A culture of "tolerance"

You see, I can tolerate the Salvation Army ringing their bell outside the Walgreen's. I can tolerate junk mail asking me to donate. But being blackmailed by aggressive philanthropists who expect me to justify why I don't want to contribute is something I will not tolerate. This occurs at the bookstore, the grocery store, and even on the street these days.

These shameless vampires are experts at putting a man in a double bind: you have the choice of being an asshole or a pushover. Destroy the planet and starve Tiny Tim, or open your wallet like a dupe. What is a man supposed to do? Well since money equals time and power, be the asshole.

This sense of altruism that charities use is a weakness others prey upon as well. From the stripper in graduate school to that used car salesman, there is always some vulture, alerted by a whiff of carrion, selling you a story to get money out of you. Other things besides money could be the target of manipulations, such as social control or political loyalty.

Any time someone attempts to build a connection to you to get you to do something, you should question it. Not only should you question it, but you should also keep "no" as a live option. The mere act of not saying no can be and is taken as acquiescence. This acquiescence has led to many social and political trends that many men dislike today.

What should a man do when someone asks him for a handout, capital for business, a ride home from a stranger? Ask that person what is in it for you. If they cannot give you a payoff for your deed then they have no respect for you. Almost all the time they will reply with how selfish you are, even when it was them that asked for the freebie in the first place.

Would you like to donate to the Red Cross?

What is the payoff?

Can you give me and my friends a ride home from the bar?

What is in it for me?

Can you stay late to help Emily finish her project?

How does this help me?

My kid is selling Girl Scout cookies, would you like to buy some?

How well do I know you?

The Enlightenment, which had the courage to pronounce self-interest a virtue, wound up fostering a pathological altruism, expressed by excessive social trust in modern Western societies. Most wealthy people do not fall for such schemes, they don't suffer from this madness. Neither should you.

If you are paying taxes then you are already supporting quite a few people less fortunate than you, so feel do not feel guilty about it. If you are not lighting your cigars with hundred dollar bills, you cannot afford to just give your money away. If you do, you already know the score and did not need to read this article.

Read Next: 40 Pictures That Show The Decline Of American Women

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

5 Elements In Men's Tinder Pictures That Get Matches Like Crazy

January 16, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

---

This post was sponsored by GirlsChase.com

Hi there! This is Colt Williams, from over at GirlsChase.com. We're rolling out a free webinar series on matching, meeting, and sleeping with women on Tinder – and to help promote it, I've put together a few pieces on getting girls on Tinder for ROK. I hope you find them useful.

Little's as frustrating as swiping like crazy on Tinder and getting no matches. Hours spent doing nothing but bulking up your thumb muscles, while all those girls on Tinder are busy flirting and messaging and meeting up and sleeping with men who… well, aren't you.

Fact is, matching on Tinder is 95% photos – which might depress you at first, if you usually rely on charm, game, or other non-looks attributes to get dates (and get laid).

Yet, there are numerous ways you can 'hack' photographs to make yourself look as appealing to the opposite sex as possible… and get loads and loads of matches on Tinder.

In today's post – the first of a short series for ROK – I'll detail what those elements (all 5 of 'em) are, and how to use them – but first, let's talk appearances.

The Biggest Tinder Sin Of All: BAD Pictures

If you've tried Tinder, you know it's 100% visual. And 100% visual means you get judged on your looks. Solely on your looks.

Knowing this – and I think every guy knows this, consciously or unconsciously – men nevertheless go and upload whatever crummy photos they have sitting on their hard drives, figuring they look like what they look like and the picture won't make that much difference.

Well guess what?

Girls on Tinder – all those sexy, striking vixens you seek to match with (then meet with… then bang the brains out of) – aren't uploading any old thing off their hard disks.

In case you haven't noticed, women spend hours upon hours upon hours snapping selfies, posing with friends, making every facial expression known to man, plus several new ones they just invented on the spot.

The end result is that women who ordinarily look like this:

… end up on Tinder with pictures that look like this:

Men though?

Our Tinder pictures tend to be equivalent to the "before" photos of the women above:

Boring, ordinary, and AVERAGE.

She's flipping through her phone, bored and uninspired, and then… she comes across… yet another ordinary picture from yet another dude!

flip flip flip

It’s not really that’s she rejecting him per se; it’s that he simply didn’t even register on her radar. No impression made. She swiped him away on autopilot and continued searching for the needle in the haystack who’ll catch her eye, make her take pause, and compel her to say, “Wow.”

Per those images above, women don’t need to be naturally phyiscally attractive for them to have an image that captures YOUR attention and makes you go, “Hmm… would bang.” Well: same deal for your pictures and her reaction.

What you need to mind here, though, is that what grabs a woman’s attention in a photograph and what grabs a man’s are, in fact, somewhat different.

What Girls Drool For In Guys’ Tinder Pictures

What women look for in men’s photographs is a bit different.

OkCupid published a widely circulated blog post on profile photos that you may (or mayn’t) have seen, the result of a 7,000+ picture analysis from its dating site.

OkCupid discovered men are most attracted to women who:

- Smiled,
- Stared directly at the camera, and
- Made a flirty face.

No huge surprise there, right?

Of course those girls are most attractive!

We tend to dig girls who are clearly into us and flirting with us (most of us do, anyhow). These girls seem easier to get – and like they must have great taste in men, too.

But what do women respond best to in a photograph?

Women respond to five (5) key elements in men’s photos:

1. Mystery
2. Prosocial behavior
3. Preoccupation with something else
4. Preselection by other women

5. Hotness (facial hair, hairstyle, clothes, posture, physique, etc.)

The OkCupid analysis covered most of these, including:

Mystery

Girls like men who are looking DOWN and AWAY in their profile images – not “into the camera” like what men like in women’s photographs. Women also prefer men who are not smiling… by a huge margin.

Prosocial behavior

Women respond better to men who are taking care of animals in their pictures (best) or having a good time with their friends (still good).

Hotness

OkCupid showed that the ab shot – used correctly – does indeed work… provided you have abs to show off, of course. There’s a lot more you can do to up your hotness in photos – like getting a professionally done hairstyle, or getting attractive facial hair, or good fashion – as well.

Each of these factors also communicates preoccupation – women are curious about men who aren’t falling all over themselves to get their attention in their pictures.

Even though you can’t ‘see’ the other person via a picture, human beings still respond on an unconscious level as if you could.

Have you ever seen one of those “take a donut, leave a dollar” honor systems set up anywhere? Well, a study on that found that simply placing a picture of a set of eyes above the box nearly doubled the number of paying donut eaters. We respond to pictures as if the person is right there in front of us. You must plan your pictures accordingly.

This is just the tip of the iceberg for getting exceptional profile pictures – we didn’t even talk about how you can include preselection, for example. But we are out of room in today’s post.

To get my full set of Tinder picture tips, and a peek at my complete girl-getting top-to-bottom head-to-toe Tinder system, head on over to my site and watch my FREE webinar series on meeting women on Tinder.

Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

“Inherent Vice” Shows The Death Of The Promise Of The ’60’s

January 16, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

---

Inherent Vice is an American movie released to mainstream outlets on January 9th, 2015. It is based off the Thomas Pynchon novel of the same name. The movie itself defies standard categorization: it really is a character study and period piece masquerading as a detective story with a liberal amount of humor interspersed throughout the movie.

The story begins in 1970’s California and centers around a sort-of private eye named Doc Sportello, an often bewildered hippy stoner who comes into contact with his beautiful ex-girlfriend, Shasta, after not seeing her for some time. She approaches him, seeking help with her new love interest, a local property mogul. Without revealing too much of the plot, this event triggers the rest of the story, with Doc “investigating” leads and trying to piece together what has happened to his ex-girlfriend and her alleged beau.

As far the aesthetics are concerned, the movie is indisputably top-shelf. The acting—especially by the two leads, Joaquin Phoenix and Josh Brolin—is excellent. The movie features other prominent Hollywood actors and actresses, like Reese Witherspoon, and they play their secondary roles very well. Also, the music in the movie is awesome. It is a wide ranging, eclectic mix that highlights the late-60’s backdrop of the movie.

The movie’s credits opens with this song. I think it’s lyrics provide insight into the meaning of the movie:

Note these lyrics:

Oh my wild beautiful bird, you will have flown, oh
Any day now I’ll be all alone

I know I shouldn’t want to keep you
If you don’t want to stay
Until you go forever
I’ll be holding on for dear life
Holding you this way

Begging you to stay

…

Don’t fly away, my beautiful bird
Don’t, don’t fly away

These lyrics are quite fitting for this movie, as the movie is set at the outset of the 1970’s. The revolutionary promise of the ’60’s had died into the political quietism of the ’70’s. The political fervor of the ’60’s had collapsed as the youth of the ’60’s had passed on in age and found the idealism and rage that underlaid their political angst to be untenable to indulge in as they got older. Despite this, they sought to edify and aggrandize their experiences of the ’60’s.

The main character, Doc, is representative of the stereotypical ’60’s radical (hippie): slightly disoriented, superficially self-absorbed, nostalgic, drug-abusing and conflict-avoidant, yet wanting revolutionary change. He is reactive, not proactive and is at the mercy of authority and circumstance. Yet, he is relatively harmless, idealistic and possesses a level of child-like wonder for the world.

Doc’s girlfriend Shasta represents hippie’s memories of the vague promises of the ’60’s. She is vague, ill-sketched but often talked about and obsessed over. Sashta represents the yearning that hippies thought they had for the world. She exists as an abstraction to Doc, a woman whose ability to love is ambiguous to him. She is mysterious, her fancies given towards hobnobbing with powerful men, all the while trying to maintain a level of distance between herself and the world she inhabits.

The interplay between Doc and Shasta shows the interplay between the ’60’s radicals and their ideals. Their perception of the world is necessarily strained through their heavy drug use, revealing the unreliable nature of their narratives and conclusions. The movie is fueled by the unreliability of its own narrative, especially with respects to the true nature of Doc and Shasta's history.

Still, through this haze of dope and cigarettes, exists the ill-defined dimensions of '60's radicalism: a strong level of personal nostalgia dosed with an obsession with personal autonomy, a waning sense of love between men and women and fantasies about power in this world. I would imagine those who lived through the '60's and '70's would find this movie either mostly entertaining or mostly revolting.

Doc fetishizes his relational history with Shasta (ported out as nostalgia) and has a level of distance with respects to truly loving her. Shasta doesn't clearly love her new love interest and Doc fears she might—but only because true love represents something negative to '60's radicals. When Shasta doesn't affirm their relationship at the end of the movie, it brings a level of comfort to Doc, as he gets to keep their relationship firmly within in the grips of his gauzy, marijuana-addled imagination.

Idealism cedes to realism

This sort of period piece perfectly captures America as it rolled from the tumultuous and idealistic posture of the '60's into the reality of the '70's. Desperate for the pastures of the '60's—but not really wanting that world—the hippies found themselves forced to change as they got older and the world got older with them. They obsessed over what the '60's really meant and what it really stood for—even thought they can't even truly reiterate what actually happened in the '60's.

As the lyrics above show, the radicals were well-aware that their time shall pass, but they didn't really want to let the period go. Authority and circumstance decided their fate, but that happens for any group of people that allow authority and circumstance to decide their fate. The heedless drug use and empty idealism portended their fate, but that doesn't preclude the nostalgic idealism of their world.

The promise of the the '60's embodied by Inherent Vice is the utopia that progressivism, civil rights and feminism was supposed to have ushered in. The hippies or radicals were meandering about, smoking drugs and waiting for the revolution to happen, in which all that was wrong with the world would be washed away in a torrent of liberal justice.

That isn't what happened.

The true promise of the '60's didn't lie in promoting social justice, equality or tolerance amongst diverse groups, but that there would be a cessation of the conflict of life. The proliferation of drug use and historical revisionism embodied by nostalgia all serve to evidence that the true nature of the ’60’s was to flee the conflict that is life. The avoidance of truly confronting and dealing with authority figures also represent the inability or lack of desire to deal with the reality of human existence.

Inherent Vice represents the rheumy, nostalgic view hippies and radicals have of the the ’60’s as it passed into the ’70’s. The gauzy, broken promises of the ’60’s were little more than laughing ghosts in the minds of their believers, as they represented little more than the infantile desire to avoid responsibility, maturity and conflict in life.

The utopia they chased has amounted to little more than a world even more consumed with ruthless appeals to authority and more supplication to circumstance.

Read More: The Psychological Devolution Of The Modern Man

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

The Guy Fawkes Mask Is The Perfect Symbol For The Millennial Generation

January 16, 2015 | by Fortius Lanza | Link | Original Link

Ever since the Occupy Wall Street Movement of 2011 proliferated the world, the Guy Fawkes stylized mask has become synonymous with Anonymous "Hacktivists," rioters, and disenchanted millennials. Everywhere from the streets of Brussels to Melbourne, from the streets of Dublin to those of Washington, Fawkes' stylized representation has become emblematic for the post-modern protest movement.

But who was Guy Fawkes?

Guy Fawkes was the most famous (or perhaps infamous) member of the Gunpowder Plot of November 5th 1604, whose objective was to assassinate James I and re-establish a Catholic theocracy in England.

Starting with Elizabeth I English Catholics were subjected to harsh statutes which ranged from civil penalties to occasional criminal reprimand. When James I extended these statutes by ordering every Catholic priest to leave England it enraged the nation's Catholics. A small, reactionary group led by Robert Catesby concocted a plot to kill James I and his government upon the opening of Parliament.

Guy Fawkes and his co-conspirators managed to get a sufficient amount of gunpowder into the House of Lords to reduce the entire building to rubble. The plot, however, was foiled by an anonymous letter describing the plans. The majority of conspirators learned the plot had been discovered and fled England. Guy Fawkes (who was entrusted with the explosives) was found in the cellar and tortured until he confessed the names of his fellow conspirators.

Fawkes was later convicted of high treason and hanged, drawn and quartered.

An artist's impression of the execution of Guy Fawkes

By next year Parliament had enacted the Observance of the 5th of November Act which made the tolling of church bells to mark the beginning of the day and burning effigies of the Pope and later, Fawkes, an annual feature of British life.

The mask in modern times

Perhaps the first instance of Millennials adopting the Guy Fawkes mask was in 2008 when Anonymous subjected the "Church of Scientology" to a denial of service attack, a plot that was able to successfully shut down the church's networks intermittently for a week.

Simultaneously the "Hacktivists" flooded Scientology centres with prank calls and black faxes. Protesters clad in Fawkes masks gathered in 100 cities to protest that Youtube had pulled a video of Tom Cruise talking about "Xenu" and chanted phrases like "Religion is free." I guess they had never heard of the church's Peter's Pence…

Similarly in November, last year pro-democracy protesters in Mong Kok, Hong Kong donned the Guy Fawkes mask and clashed with police in the city's streets. The irony (to which they seem oblivious) was that the man behind the motif they adopted fought for and was killed for what is perhaps the ideological antithesis of their cause.

Ahh, irony.

How Fawkes, the member of a fringe and (what would essentially be considered) terrorist group, fighting for theocratic rule became the denotation for thoroughly post-Christian, Marxist leaning and soft millennials is somewhat incomprehensible.

This is in the same era where western Europe is still scarred by the ethno-religious fanaticism and bombings of the IRA. The same era where the world is traumatized by unceasing coverage of Al-Qaeda and ISIS being perpetuated by every major media outlet and the images of 9/11 still hover like a perpetual phantom in the western mind.

The parallels between the two aren't difficult to see, and surely it would sit uncomfortably in the mind of any protest-inclined, Guy Fawkes mask-donning, historically literate millennial.

It's important to remember, however, that this generation does possess the uncanny ability to blindly adopt, misappropriate, and re-contextualize seemingly anything to the point that all is rendered meaningless and trivial. It is in that respect that the Guy Fawkes mask is the ultimate symbol of millennialism.

Read More: The Mask You Live In: Feminists Take On The Failure Of Masculinity

Fortius Lanza

Fortius Lanza is a part time philosopher and full time cultural revisionist currently traversing Australia and South East Asia. You can find more of his work at: http://belluminternecinum.com

A Tip From A Girl That Improved My Process With Women

January 17, 2015 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

A lot of writers in the manosphere often write about game from an efficiency perspective—rack up numbers quickly and with minimal effort. This has value, but it's important to remember after you've smashed a number of women, it's entirely possible you'll crave quality instead of quantity. Long game often doesn't get mentioned – the process of working on a higher quality girl over a few dates.

Now, we all know by now women for the most part are delusional about their own sexuality and how they have to justify to themselves they might actually like sex. When working on a girl over a few dates, you have to be aware of progress. Are you getting more physical with each date? Does she seem more engaged? And so on.

It's entirely possible (and frankly, probable) she's already fucking someone else or at the very least, dating someone else, like you. You need to put this to the back of your mind. Why? Because you are simply playing your role in the fiasco of modern dating, to get what you ultimately want: pussy.

An important line a girl said to me once which has been central to the refinement of my game was "there must always be hope of more for a woman." Men have a bad habit of reducing the process to its most ruthlessly efficient basics; this may work against you at times, where despite the presence of sluttier women in the west, you must always to some extent conceal your intentions. Try directly propositioning a girl for sex on a dating site as your first message and see what reactions you get.

To be successful as a man, you have to understand female sexuality. Women generally won't get wet from the same stimuli as men – they enjoy the process more and building intimacy or attraction up to a grand release. Even if a woman knows deep down what kind of guy a man is (for example, a "player" as they like to say), if she wants to fuck him, she’ll still give him the opportunity to do so by placing herself in situations where in reality, all he has to do is play his role.

Be patient, go through the dating time and slowly begin to increase the likelihood for sex by building up to suggesting a situation where sex could clearly occur, like her coming to your place for dinner or another isolating arrangement.

Any attractive woman has been through the mating game before. It’s the nature of women to crave a relationship, because they batter this idea into each other. Peer pressure and acceptance is everything for a lot of people, and most definitely more so with women. As such, they’ll continue to go through the dating wringer, as long as you give them some hope of more.

To get what you want, all you’ve got to do is play the part you’re expected to play, be patient, and escalate.

Read More: How A Vasectomy Improved My Game

Jesus Baetana
Jesus Baetana is a man of Anglo-Italian descent, often found stood slack jawed in astonishment at the current state of gender politics today. He now resides in a small central European state, attempting to single-handedly wrest control of both it's wealth and women. Read more about his adventures at The Words Of A Man

5 Steps To Achieving Happiness Through Being Alone

January 17, 2015 | by Tony Moze | Link | Original Link

Introduction

Loneliness versus aloneness. The two sound very synonymous, but carry totally separate ideas. The thought of feeling lonely versus the thought of being alone are very different. Osho has spoken in great depths on here and here.

The thought of loneliness is a life hindrance, while the thought of aloneness is a life helper. When you feel lonely you feel all things negative about yourself; however, when you are in aloneness, you feel all things positive about yourself.

Perhaps you have felt lonely many periods in your life. Maybe the idea of feeling lonely has had you running all of your life. Perhaps you stuck around in bad long term relationships, lived too long with your parents, went out to bars every night for a deep-rooted fear that you would be to yourself.

This is where the idea of need versus want comes to play. When you are lonely, you always feel the need to not be alone. You are desperate for love, attention, affection and entertainment of others, because the idea of aloneness scares you. Maybe you are that person who jungle vines from one long term relationship to another. You have not given time to your aloneness, and because of this you have experienced loneliness.

Understand at the end of the day it is you and ultimately you who deals with your hang-ups, emotional issues, and other weaknesses of your body and mind. As they always say, no one cares about you more than yourself. I always recommend steps towards aloneness, and here are some of them.

1. Move out of your parents' home

Living with your parents is one of the quickest ways towards complacency because you lose out on introspection. Your parents become the go-to, whether directly or indirectly on your progress in life. Yes, your parents know you better than anyone else, but they are still entities separate from you. They may know about you, but they do not know everything about you.

Moving out of your parents' home, and getting your own pad is a first step towards independence and truly getting to know yourself. Living with a roommate is better than living with your parents, but living alone is probably the best thing any man can do for himself. When living alone, you learn how to be self-reliant and resourceful.

2. Stay single after a breakup

After a relationship, the best thing one should do is be single. My recommended time of being alone is at least two or three years. During this time you must take away the need to be in a relationship with another female. This is the time when you get back to doing all the things you could never do or enjoy fully in that relationship.

This is the best time to breach your comfort zones. Never played an instrument before? Go try it. Are you a homebody? Go hiking, indoor or outdoor rock climbing. There are men who get so used to being in a relationship that they end up jumping right back into another one for fear of being alone. When you find relationships based on loneliness, you end up unconsciously finding the next partner who resembles the previous relationship(s). Through aloneness you learn about yourself, and that ultimately helps you with finding the right types of people down the line.

3. Take breaks from friends or family

Do you find yourself being with friends or family every day or month? Take an extended time away from your family and friends to get more in touch with yourself. Your friends and family can be very impressionable to you. Perhaps you have a nagging mother who puts you down because of your unkempt room, maybe your circle of friends are a negative bunch, maybe they are just as lazy and unenthusiastic as you.

It would be hard being consciously aware of your thoughts and actions, because your friends and family are hindrances to your development. Taking some time away from them will allow you to see what you need in your life's journey. Aloneness brings clarity and certainty.

4. Travel alone

There is nothing better than traveling alone. It breaks you into the true reality of life. You get to learn about cultures, mannerisms, customs, and languages. When you travel with others you may lose the richness of life that is going on around you. You get lost in plans and compromise things that you would not inherently do because of that other person.

Maybe you want to attend a tomato throwing event or run with the bulls in Spain, eat sheep’s head in Norway, or backpack through three specific countries you have been dreaming of in Europe. Traveling alone allows you to do the things you want to do and fully experience it.

5. Give up the “need” for anything

I recommend taking some time away from the things you once thought were a necessity. The need to go out every night and pick up chicks, the need to be in a relationship, the need to be around friends, the need for material things, the need for noise or constant motion.

You do not need these things. You need YOU, right here, still, and in the moment. Being in the moment with yourself, your mind and emotions allows you to mature into a supreme individual. Let all the things that are dissatisfying be your universal message of what you need to improve. Your aloneness is what is craving your attention, your loneliness is what is deteriorating your life.

Furthermore

Aloneness brings forth acquaintance with the mental, physical and spiritual YOU. If you have experienced a breakup or divorce, this is the perfect time get to know yourself. In some of those relationships, a man loses part of himself, because he was too busy giving to his partner’s happiness and not looking inward at what makes him happy.

Reassess where you are in life, your strengths, weaknesses, goals and aspirations. Start by getting back to the things that make you intrinsically happy. It’s a step at making an assessment of where you are in life, analyzing strengths and weaknesses.

In conclusion

When you spend time in aloneness, you increase self-love, self-reliance, and resourcefulness. Aloneness makes you an independent person, relying on yourself as your own best teacher, brother, friend, and caretaker. You start to look more at the best interests of yourself.

Study your behaviors closely because it is a message of what may need to change in you. Time spent in aloneness helps with outcome independence, knowing that if a situation didn't go as plan with a person, place, or thing, you always have your health and happiness to go home to.

If you were to equate this concept to getting with women, aloneness is very attractive. It non-verbally communicates that you are confident and comfortable with who you are. This decreases neediness, because you know that if a female were to ever reject you, you still have you to love.

Aloneness makes you important, and you place your needs before others first. With aloneness you grow into a strong, self-reliant and thoroughly introspective individual. No matter what the odds, you always know that you have someone to continue to focus, appreciate and make a better man, and that person is YOU.

Read More: The Value of Self-Reliance

Tony Moze

Tony is a philanthropist and philosopher. He spends his free time reading, traveling the world, exercising and living in the moment.

Why I Stopped Trying To Be A Hero To Women

January 17, 2015 | by Lord Baron | Link | Original Link

When I was a young boy, I would spend my days daydreaming about wars and heroes, battles between good and evil. I imagined the whole world as black and white, everything as a giant whole, where bad men tried to impose themselves and good men had to stop them.

The romantic concept of the hero seemed fascinating to me. Watching the Lord of the Rings trilogy, living the rise of King Aragorn, reading stories of the fabled King Arthur, and other incredible men from the fantasy stories, that rose from the depths of nothingness (Arthur was a nobody until he pulled that sword from the stone, Aragorn was just a ranger fighting as a nobody in battles and lost in the woods), into saviours of the world, resonated with my young heart. My parents are idealists, always standing against evil and corruption, and their teachings were impregnated into my soul.

I believed that life was this epic struggle of good against evil, that even though evil is triumphant right now, an epic band of heroes would stand up against the tide and send them all back to the abyss.

Oh how wrong I was.

The futility of being a hero

There was once a time where heroes were appreciated, applauded, even worshipped. I would soon learn that those days were long gone.

I lived most of my life in this romantic, bedazzled state. As a young teenager I would do no wrong, try to do good, try to help people, trying to live up to this incredible moral standard I had been so infatuated with in the stories of my youth, trying to be a beacon of light in this world that seemed to need such a light with so much darkness rampant, everywhere.

I thought somewhere out there, was my perfect princess, waiting for her hero, her shining knight, to come and rescue her. I kept to my standards in most of my younger years, waiting for this incredible love to appear magically and invade my life, waiting for this awesome girl to come and be swept off her feet by my heroism and epicness.

But the years passed, and she never appeared. She never came around. I would view the girls of this modern world, and they were nothing like the damsels in my stories. Most of them were just living out their lives, drinking themselves into oblivion every weekend, messing around with many boys at a time. None seemed even remotely interested in my notion of heroes, saving, and romance.

I was lost, confused. I was doing everything right, following my what I believed to be the correct path to the letter, but this path appeared to be leading me nowhere fast. It was here that I had a revelation.

How I thought the world would be.

The veil is lifted

One day, I woke up, and realized that in all my seventeen years of life, and I had never been with a girl. My perfect princess was nowhere in sight, not even a faint glimpse on the horizon hinted of her arrival. So I sat in my cave and reflected on my life, my actions up until this point. Was the world really like in my stories?

I looked around and saw no perfect knights—most guys were just selfish, pathetic, weak losers, subservient to what society dictates as “cool” or “correct,” willing to sacrifice all their morals and principles just to get a piece of pussy, or something even less important. Girls were not much better, uncommiting sluts interested only in self-indulgence, a good time, and little more. These were NOT the characters from my stories, to me they were just bad jokes. And then it hit me.

The perfect knight is not needed in this world. Morals and truth are thrown out the window, conveniently displaced in favor of self-pleasure and debauchery. No girl wants to be “saved,” heroes have no place here. Nothing was they way I believed it was, and I wasn’t going to get anywhere if I didn’t radically change my course of action, very fast.

I ditched the hero’s cape, opting to replace it with cunning and courage, and ventured out into this brand new world. The veil had been lifted from my eyes, and I saw clearly now. It was a strange place indeed, everyone out on their own, no principles, no morals, just unlimited, unchecked, absolute freedom. The pleasures of the moment were far more important that the dealings of tomorrow, good and evil nonexistent between the loud music and the bottom of the next scotch.

But it wasn’t all dark. I had my friends, who had been with me throughout my life. I kept them close throughout my life, and still do, because they have a sense of brotherhood, of loyalty, that is ever so rare now a days. I learned much from them, and kept growing stronger and stronger in this now more familiar world. In the beginning it was quite rough, as I had no game, no knowledge, making me feel completely naked. Soon though, things changed, and began to unfold in a manner I would have never predicted.

How the world actually was.

The rush of victory

It turned out, even with no game, it wasn’t that difficult to attract women. There is always someone that finds you attractive, ALWAYS. Even if you can’t notice it, that girl in the coffee shop, that always smiles more than she should when she hands you your coffee, that girl in your gym that seems to constantly lock eye contact with you, but pulls away after a few short seconds, or that girl in your class that finds any excuse to sit next to you. These are your targets. I talked to a young beauty from my class and things progressed rather quickly with her. We went out, got wasted, went to a private place, and lost our virginity together.

Things had progressed so easily since I changed my perspective. I stopped trying to “save” girls and instead, just gamed them, and pushed to have sex with them. In a few short weeks, a guy with zero experience was dating one of the hottest girls of his class, banging her regularly and making no apologies for it. I was no casanova, but for me it was the best moment of my life up until that point.

Leaving behind the moral backpack weighing me down was so liberating, I discovered the true me hiding beneath the cape all these years, eager to stretch his legs and make his way out into the world. It felt like I learned to fly. I started going out, every time I could, and having as much fun as I could.

It wasn’t precisely all uphill from there, but I found the ability to get laid, make my way out on the world, claim what I wanted as mine. I discovered my power as a man, given to me by God, the creator, the universe, whatever you want to call it. All my successes and failures were mine alone, everything I had achieved was thanks to my work, and the only limit was the sky.

She wants you to talk to her.

The road so far and what the future holds

Getting rid of the “good guy”, the hero’s cape, was the best thing I ever did. At first I was reckless, breaking hearts and hurting people. I quite literally turned into the opposite of what I had idealized my entire life. But then I slowed down. Hurting people is no good. Saving them isn’t necessary, but bringing more pain and suffering in a world already so littered with such things, is not the way to go.

A man constructs and empowers. Women are proud to be with him, proud to allow his dick to shove its way to the bottom of her pussy. Friends learn from such strength, find their own balls, and grow as well. Loyalty is important, to friends, to family. Don’t lie to girls, if you want to date several, go ahead and do it, but make no promises. Be unapologetic, god gave you your dick, and your sexual desire, to go out and fuck chicks.

Don’t let religion or so-called “gurus” control your mind. Believe nothing unless you can prove it true from your own experiences. Rather than the hero, be the conqueror, who sees what he wants, takes it, and makes no apologies. Avoid creating pain as much as you can but always, ALWAYS, put your own needs above others.

I share this story because it is not my own. It is my life, but I can’t claim sole ownership of the events that I described here. I believe most, if not every young man, is faced with a moment similar, where he sees that things aren't the way our parents told us they were, that girls aren't looking for that "good guy" to come, put them on a pedestal, work 9 to 5 to maintain her and kiss her feet.

I am here to spare you the pain of these truths you are discovering and instead, show you their liberating power. You don't have to be perfect, you don't have to save anyone. Just start hitting on girls, put your balls on where they belong and you'll be surprised at how quickly you will start seeing results. Even one success will be like a snowball that can begin an avalanche, each victory adding to your confidence and courage. Just get up off your ass, take off your cape, and go conquer the world.

Happy hunting!

She doesn't want a hero, just your dick.

Read More: A Hero Of Our Time

Lord Baron

Lord Baron is the last in a long line of nobilty, descendant of crusaders and heroes. In constant battle with all enemies of western civilization, he seeks to restore pride and strength to masculinity. Is currently living grand adventures in South America.

What If The Feminists Win?

January 17, 2015 | by Sebastian Harris | Link | Original Link

Have you ever thought about what would happen if our worst nightmare came true? Have you ever wondered how our world would look like if men and the few feminine women who are still out there lost the battle against the man-hating feminists that are becoming more and more powerful?

Please don't fool yourself by saying that this is an unrealistic scenario. The truth is that we are already heading for such a future.

We already live in world in which writers of Return of Kings receive death threats from angry feminists who totally overreacted because of a funny article. We already live in a world in which dating coaches get banned from countries because of some videos and Tinder messages. We already live in a world in which everybody applauds when women say that men are useless idiots, even though you would get stoned if you would say the same about women.

The Traditional Family Falls Apart

Do you have the wish to start a family one day? Even though I think that it is a noble goal for a man to want children one day and to continue his bloodline, I can't doubt that it would take a dreamer and simpleton to purposefully start a family in any western country.

I really appreciate and respect your wish for a caring wife who does her best to raise your children and a stable family, but please think twice before you make a mistake that you probably regret for the rest of your life.

I lived a year in the UK and during that time I read a shocking study that England and Wales have a divorce rate of 42%. In a few years the likelihood of winning the jackpot in a casino will be higher than the likelihood of having a successful marriage.

Once angry feminists take control over every governmental institution (at least the ones they don't already have under their control), you won't have any rights anymore. Even today a woman can simply tell the judge that she is scared of her husband and suddenly she will get the kids and the house.

Forget About Your Career

In the country where I am from politicians constantly discuss female quotas. We already live in times in which companies employ women instead of men in order to please political parties and to advertise their political correctness, even though they know that they could have hired men with better qualifications for the job.

Imagine a world in which all leadership positions are filled with women. Do you really think that the women who fought for female quotas will also fight for male quotas once we have no rights anymore? Wake up.

Even nowadays a woman can end your career with one sentence if she wants to. Nobody cares about the truth. It is simply a fact that people tend to believe women who say that they have been sexually harassed by a man, whereas nobody believes a man who says that she only made that up, because she wants the promotion.

Maybe you even sexually harassed her, at least when you define sexual harassment in today's interpretation. We all know since the 10 hours in New York video that sentences like "how are you doing?" and "have a beautiful day!" are the worst form of sexual harassment.

Both Sexes End up Miserable

What would be the consequence of this development? I think it is obvious that we men would end up pretty miserable. We wouldn't even have the right to say our opinion, at least not our real opinion.

Like in today's society, the only men who would still get laid are the ones who ignore all the feminist conditioning and who listen to their primal instincts. The only determining difference would be that the punishment for ignoring feminist opinions would be a lot worse.

How about the women would live in such a society? How would the life of the last few remaining women, who don't want to be labeled as feminists and who still love the idea of being a woman look like?

Those girls would face the same destiny as you and me. No man would have the balls to approach them and no man would even think about revealing his sexual interest. The fear of the consequences would be too extreme.

As a result of this, women would end up alone, sexually frustrated, and without the chance of ever having a family or a life-long partner. Why? Their fellow females did everything to whip out all the motivation in men to have a woman in their life.

Welcome to Slavery

It is only a matter of time until our worst nightmares will become reality, at least in the western world. It's everybody's own decision how he wants to prepare for the future and how he wants to find happiness in life.

The only thing that I know for myself is that I don't want to end up in slavery. I promised myself to leave the sinking ship once the day has come and to spread my wings over the ocean. I made the decision to set out on a journey to a new world, once the old world is collapsing.

All I can hope for you and me is that there will still be a world worth living in, once that day has come.

Read More: Are Feminists Genuinely Serious About Their Cause?

Sebastian Harris
is a young guy whose mission is to help and inspire men to seduce women all over the globe and to live the life of their dreams. You can visit his blog Follow him on Twitter Like him on Facebook

14 Tips To Travel Cheaply Around the World

January 18, 2015 | by Nicholas Jack | Link | Original Link

The guys that read my blog know that I have been able to travel all around the world on a very low budget. I have been able to do this on around $1300 a month (including flights, busses, etc.). Because of requests from readers, I have decided to write this article sharing my 14 best budget travel tips. I will countdown to my favorite tip from tip #14.

14. Use packets on cell phones and use common provider

When traveling to a country you are going to want to have a phone number. There are always a few companies to choose from when choosing a pre-paid sim card. Here's what I do to get the best deal:

Ask what most people have (calls and texts are always way cheaper to the same company). Don't ask what the best company is because you will end up paying a ton more for ridiculous fast internet or something.

Then you want to ask about packets. In most poor countries there are ways to make your cell phone plan ridiculously cheap and a lot of time it has to do with buying text or calling packets.

Saves you approximately: $30 a month

13. Always research taxi prices

Find out the normal taxi prices online or from a friend before getting in a taxi. Taxis are the biggest ripoffs in any country you will go to.

Saves you approximately: $60 a month

12. Research bus and subway routes

Research bus and subway routes from airports and bus stations. There is usually a very cheap alternative to taking a taxi, especially from popular places such as airports and bus stations. This is also a great way to meet girls in the day.

Saves you approximately: $150 a month

11. Cancel all continuous bills before leaving for a long trip

If you are going on a long trip, do all you can to get rid of anything you have to make payments on. I can’t tell you how many friends I have who are making five times more than me ask me and ask how I am able to travel all over the world when they can barely pay their bills. Their problem is that they are buying things they don’t need and that aren’t making them happy.

Sell everything that doesn’t continue to give you happiness. If you have an apartment, furniture, unwanted car, etc., sell them on Craigslist. These days, you can even sell your belongings that still aren’t paid off. Do this and you will find yourself mentally free and, most importantly, financially free.

Saves you approximately: $200-2000 a month

10. Don’t take the “Try Hard” taxis

A good rule to remember is not to take the taxis that are “try hard.” These guys are trying so hard so they can get to the people that overpay before somebody else. Be smart and take a taxi that isn’t trying toO hard to find somebody to drive around. These are the people that aren't as accustomed to ripping people off.

Saves you approximately: $30 a month

9. Price haggle strategy

In most third world countries you will find markets where they will try to get you to pay up to 3x more than what they would charge a local. The problem is that you don't always know what this price is, so here's a little strategy that I do:

Ask them for the price, when they say something ridiculous, look at them like they are crazy and laugh. Then say a price that is 1/3rd of their original offer. They will haggle for a bit and agree when they hit 1/2 their original offer. They will go away feeling like they were able to talk up the price and you will come away getting a much better price.

Don't be afraid to feign walking away if they don't agree. I've gotten deals by walking away probably over 50 times. "Wait! OK.. .this is my final offer!"

Some people will rip you off more than others, but this is a general way to save some money.

Saves you approximately: $20 a month

8. Take buses and trains over flights

Buses and trains are almost always much cheaper than flights. It may take you a bit longer to get there, but you will have saved money and you will have been able to see the local scenery.

If you want to save even more money, don't take tourist or main buses, take the buses and trains that the locals take. These may be more run down, but you will save a lot of money and get to experience more of what it's like to be a local.

Saves you approximately: $200 a month

7. Research and ask around for cheap hotels

When you are getting a hotel, make sure to ask for a cheap hotel. If you are talking to a taxi, give a price range. If you are online, just sort it by price or stars.

The difference between a $25 hotel and a $50 hotel is $750 vs. $1500 a month. You may not get the nicest rooms, but you will get your own private room (that you can bring a girl back too) and you will save a ton of money.

The only downside to this is that some cheap hotels aren't in the safest neighborhoods. This is something I don't mind, but if it bothers you, just add "in a safe neighborhood" when asking about it.

Saves you approximately: $750 a month

6. Stay in one spot for at least a month

Try to stay in a place for at least a month and get a monthly rental. These will usually be 1/3 to 1/2 the price of a hotel per month. You can search online for "furnished apartments in X city" or check out Airbnb.com (where you can rent apartments from people for days, weeks, or months).

Even if you find cheap hotels and end up spending $750 a month in hotels, you would be better served getting a monthly rental for $400 to $500.

Saves you approximately: $250-350 a month

5. The cheapest monthly rentals and hotels are found on foot

The best way to find cheap furnished monthly rentals is NOT online, but rather walking around a university area asking people and looking at signs. University students need furnished apartments and this is an ideal location for picking up attractive girls.

Even if you able to find a $400 to $500 monthly rental online, you could still be paying less. The landlords that aren't internet savvy are the people that will be offering you the best deals on the best apartments. The landlords that are internet savvy are the ones that can pick from clueless traveler after clueless traveler and overcharge them.

Saves you approximately: $100-$200 a month

4. Eating out vs. cooking

Get groceries, don't eat out. Now that you have a monthly rental with a kitchen you can cook. Eating at cheap restaurants can cost you an average of $8 a meal, compared to $3 a meal cooking. If you cook, you will end up saving a lot of money.

Saves you approximately: $450 a month

3. Research flights ahead of time on the right websites

When searching for cheap flights use Cheaptickets, Expedia, Travelocity and, my favorite, Google flights. Search around on dates, even when you don't want to go. You will notice cheap prices on certain days. Then, Google the name of the airline and try to book your flight through them. You will be able to know exactly when these cheap flights are and it is usually cheaper through the original airline.

Saves you approximately: $200 a month

2. Get a travel credit card or debit card

If you don't have a credit card tailored to travel, you are literally throwing away money. These credit card companies offer incentives that give you a good percentage of money back on travel purchases, airline miles, and signup bonuses where you get essentially $400 given to you after you spend your first $1000 to $3000.

Then, your current credit card most likely has foreign transaction fees. These are usually around 4%. That will add up very quickly, so make sure to get a card that has no foreign transaction fees.

Check out http://www.creditcards.com/no-foreign-transaction-fee.php to check out the options for travel credit cards.

Debit Card

I pay no atm fees and my debit card is accepted nearly anywhere in the world. How? I use a Charles Schwab card. This has saved me thousands over the years in ATM fees and is very reliable.

Saves you approximately: $200 a month

1. Stay away from tourist traps

DO NOT stay in tourist traps! You won't get to know the culture, you will be overcharged for hotels, food, and all other services, and you will essentially visit the same place over and over again.

I have traveled the world and while it's ok to spend a couple days in tourist areas, it's usually not a good choice to spend much time. You will spend tons more money in these places and you won't really get to know anything about the place you are staying.

Girls will be harder to get in these areas because seeing foreigners will be so common and you will be overcharged on EVERYTHING. You have also essentially taken the adventure out of traveling.

Saves you approximately: $500 to $5000 a month

Bonus Tip: Choose the Right Place

Something that could save you thousands of dollars in travel costs is simply choosing the right place for you. You should also be doing your part to research the places that seem interesting to you. The best resource on the internet for this is RooshVForum.com. Use the search function and search through the thousands of posts on different countries and cities.

Budget Travel Could Be Your Answer

If you are unhappy with your life, the only answer is change. Following these tips you can budget travel the world on only 1300$ a month. This is doable for most people, so if this is something you have dreamt about, you have no excuse not to make it happen right now.

Read More: 4 Thoughts I Didn't Have While Traveling

Nicholas Jack

AKA 20Nation. Join me on my adventures around the world as I bang my way through the local women by going to SwoopTheWorld.com. I've been doing this for the last half decade so there is tons of content. You can now get all my books for 60% off here. Nicholas Jack the author.

The Art Of Meta: How Self-Awareness Can Evolve Your Seduction

January 18, 2015 | by Andrian Red | Link | Original Link

Imagine this. You are having a conversation with a girl you just met at a bar. She is describing a recent trip to Spain—to the same city you had visited some years ago. She tells a story when she discovered an abandoned cathedral near the beach. The conversation suddenly came to a point where you both say the exact same thing at the same time. She smiles, and without missing a beat, you say "wait, did we just have a moment?" She replies "uh-huh." You fist-bump her.

By acknowledging a reaction out loud, you've just made the interaction meta for just a brief moment. This small and jovial act demonstrates a special ability few people have. Though simple in practice, it comes from a position of inner strength and years of social attunement. In this post, I will explain what being meta is, and how to use it to create attraction. First, I'll let the pros show you how they do it:

"Eddie Izzard calling the audience out for hissing. He then writes on his imaginary notebook after a joke fails at the 4:00 mark."

---

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KFwBH2fb2E0&start=140

"Louis CK calling the audience out for a moment of discomfort."

Being meta is an acknowledgement, verbally or non-verbally, of a subtle quirky moment in an interaction. It's when you take the interaction to another level of awareness. This acknowledgement not only takes away the natural tension caused by those moments, it also enhances the conversation. Simply put, being meta is talking about how we talk to each other. However, these signs of personal power cannot be overstated:

1. An acute awareness of your own personal communication style and abilities.
2. A broad situational awareness of your environment, social events, and their paces.
3. A sense of humor that comes from an internal ease of tension.
4. The dynamic outcome independence when expressing yourself.
5. A willingness to be vulnerable and responsible about what you say and how it's perceived.
6. An uncanny ability to refine and clarify your intentions.

How does something seemingly innocuous like stating out loud your observations have such a deep effect? It comes down to the layers of your awareness and what you subcommunicate through your words and actions. The more aware you are of your own honest communications, the more in touch you are with your intentions and how you subcommunicate it to others.

Types of Meta

- Meta-Awesomeness (as discussed by Mark Manson). Example: "Look, I'm a bit of a headache when it comes to commitment, and I only get like this because I like you so much."
- Meta-Humor, where you make fun of something in your conversations or people's reactions. Example: "Note to self: never bring up that topic again."
- Meta-Correction, where you clarify what you want to communicate. Example: "Shit, that's not how I wanted it to sound, let me say it another way."
- Meta-Flirting, or breaking rapport or instructing. Example (breaking rapport): "Ohh, only you can get away with saying something like that cause you're so cute." Example (instructing): "Hey, say what you just said again, it was really cute."

How to be Meta

Becoming meta is a fairly advanced social interaction technique. It comes from years of social attunement. However, the more you practice, the faster you will pick it up. It might seem weird at first, but once you're comfortable with it, it will seem like a part of your personality.

Meta-ness, or self-referencing, comes from your power of observations. This means you can start practicing your observational skills without even a thought of acting upon them. Then gradually, allow your expression style to push these observations to the surface.

1. Be more aware of yourself

When you say or do something, become more predictive about how it comes across to other people.

This takes a fair bit of mental exercise, ease of social anxiety, and reception to feedback (verbal and non-verbal). Once you've achieved a good amount of self-awareness, you can express yourself fully while recognizing their congruence. If you sense an incongruence in your communications, address it out loud. It's perfectly okay to say "can I try that again" or "could I say it in another way?"

2. Be more aware of your environment and other people

Note external observations to sharpen your ability to get outside of yourself.

When there is a pause or an awkward moment, there's your opportunity to be meta. Do it so that the conversation rolls on or takes another direction. In a reaction to something weird someone just said, you can say "well, I don't know where to go with that, let's just turn around."

3. Be more at ease with yourself and more outcome independent

When you are meta, you show the ability to laugh at yourself or the situation, no matter how tense.

This shows that you are enjoying the conversation and the process of making it flow. Your expression is not tied to some outcome. The conversation doesn't have to go anywhere and you are okay with that. When you are at ease, you observe more and think less.

4. Don't be afraid to show vulnerability and responsibility

Saying things like "oh yeah that was weak, I'll just have to do better" shows that you are comfortable putting yourself out there to be judged, and you can take responsibility for what you say or do.

It means that you have to take a number of risks in a conversation to polarize people. Don't do it for their reaction, but do it because that's what you truly think. Be okay with being wrong or offensive.

Take responsibility for your words and actions. Be humorous and laid-back when you go meta. However, in some cases, it's more appropriate to be serious: "actually, that wasn't a joke, I do want to know more about your artistic aspirations."

5. Continually evaluate your intentions, they matter

Express, not impress. Being meta is a form of self-referencing expression, not to show off how quickly you can point out flaws.

A person who is always self-correcting or pointing out nuances of how other people talk can be seen as annoying at best, or needy at worst.

6. Emulate others

Comedians as Eddie Izzard and Louis C.K. can go meta on stage on a whim. Izzard is great at saying things like "never put those two things together again" (while pretending to write on his hand) or “that’s a good laugh right there, I enjoyed it.” Louis C.K. will go on and on about the fucked-up thoughts in his head.

As experienced world-famous comedians, they have reached a new level of meta self-awareness that is not only hilarious, but also extremely enlightening for their audiences.

You can be the same with the people you interact with, if only on a micro-level. Check out some more Youtube clips that illustrate my point:

---

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5FdEUADYTfU

“Jim Jefferies acknowledges the tension of the audience. He also comments on the timeliness of his second beer at the 2:45 mark.”

“Eddie Izzard once again points out an audience member’s laugh.”

---

7. Adjust and re-adjust

Observe how deep you can go meta and how often you do it. Too often and too deep, and you will seem like a try-hard. Not deep enough, or too sparse, and you seem insecure and able to think only about yourself.

At the right level, it’d seem like nothing can escape your power of observations. You can make something exciting out of the simplest actions.

Conclusion

So there you have it. Why is being meta so seductive? Because it shows awareness—one of the pillars of a highly confident individual (or alpha, as some call it). It also shows assertiveness, the courage to speak one’s minds, and the responsibility in doing so. When you are meta, you aren’t invested in what other people think about you, only in how you think.

Meta-ness, of course, is your observations through your own subjective lenses. By pushing it to the surface, you say it as if it was a fact. That influences people to take your point of view and go along with wherever you are leading them. A seductive trait indeed!

Read More: “I Want” Is Not Good Enough

Andrian Red
Andrian is a lifelong learner, devoted skeptic and ethical hedonist. He is the founder of www.thequintessentialman.com, the only online community that offers a holistic approach to masculine self-growth. He is also the creator of "30 Challenges-30 Days-Zero Excuses", a challenging project aimed to help men take back control of their life.

5 Reasons Why It’s Important To Have A Training Partner

January 18, 2015 | by Mark Jefferson | Link | Original Link

Most people who are new to the gym start out alone. I know I did. Soon after working out for a couple of months and gaining more knowledge about training principles, I realized that I felt lonely in my pursuit to sculpt my body. I had discussed weightlifting many times with a coworker of mine, who also happens to be one of my best friends, but never worked out with him.

My friend was once a wrestler at his high school. As some of you may know, high school wrestling has a brutal training process. He told me that he was told to wear trash bags and run in order to get all the sweat out before weighing in. He also told me that during their training, all of the team members had to find their one rep max in various exercises to measure their progress. After all that hard work, my friend had a really cut physique due to the rigorous training.

I remember hearing these stories he was telling me and I thought, “Wow, that must have taken a lot of hard work to stay in something like that.” Then I found myself thinking,

“Why am I not working out with him?”

Getting back into it

My friend had not worked out seriously in over two years. After receiving some motivation from watching the movie Pumping Iron, I had asked him to work out with me one day and he agreed. At the time, I was still new to weightlifting and did not have much experience with free weights, as I went to an apartment complex gym that only had machines.

But now I was at a popular gym with free weights and a plethora of equipment. I mainly asked my friend to work out with me in order to help me with my form on free weights, especially bench. I had used the smith machine in order to avoid any accidents, but never trained with the regular bench.

Our first training session was very informative. He taught me the form on bench press. Then we did flyes. He was on-point with telling me what I was doing wrong and how to fix it. Soon after we exercised, we realized that training together was very motivational. My friend actually thanked me for asking to work out, because now he was determined to look as ripped as he did when he was in wrestling.

Long story short, we still exercise every week together. Sometimes it’s once a week and sometimes its two or three. Even though our schedules are somewhat demanding, (both of us are in college, I have two jobs, he has a 40-hour work week) we still find time to work out together.

So what can you get from this?

1. Training with someone else pushes you harder

During our training sessions, my friend and I always went all out, pushing each other to our max number of reps until failure. This was critical for me, as it shocked my body into creating and strengthening my muscle fibers. When training, it is always important to go all out. Going all out drains you and creates the best environment for your body to grow and develop.

2. You have a spotter

By having a training partner for my workouts, I was able to do free weight bench press without worrying of the weights falling on me. With this constraint lifted, I was able to go heavier on sets and do more reps. If I were to do some reps with the same weight without a spotter, I would have to do less reps because it requires more energy to rack the weight alone.

3. Your form will improve over time

My friend was experienced in lifting weights. He knew the proper form for many lifts. Having a training partner that is already somewhat experienced in lifting will tell you if you are doing something wrong. This is especially helpful because correct form will prevent you from injury.

4. It's great bonding time

My friend and I already had a great friendship. By working out more, we bonded more together as friends. I felt that each time we exercised it help us build a more successful friendship.

5. You will stay dedicated

This is probably one of the most important reasons why you should have a training partner. By working out together, my friend and I helped each other stay motivated towards our goal. Motivation is key to staying focused and concentrating on accomplishing your goals.

Conclusion

Having a training partner is truly indispensable. Many opportunities open up once you can train with someone that you know and who is dedicated just like you. Find someone who is focused, determined, and energetic.

Your training partner doesn't always have to be your friend. I know a couple of people train with their brother or father. The point is that you should always find someone to help you train, because you will always need the extra 1% that is produced from training together. Every rep counts.

Read More: A Beginner's Guide To Breaking Bodybuilding Plateaus

Mark Jefferson
Mark is a college student in the United States that loves to lift, listen to music, and enjoy the small moments in life.

On Becoming Immortal: The Life Of Heracles

January 18, 2015 | by Peter Burns | Link | Original Link

In ancient Greece there was one man whose legend rose above that of everyone else. He was one of the few mortals whose fame equaled that of the gods themselves. Granted, he was a mythical figure, but unlike the gods, the fact of his own mortality meant that he could serve as an inspiration for the countless generations of men growing up. His strength, courage, confidence, and tenacity were all traits that were greatly admired among the Greeks.

His exploits showed that even mortals can achieve incredible things. Stories about him were recounted around countless fires. These tales were meant to educate young men on what it took to be a man right from childhood. Every Greek warrior going into battle had been raised on tales of this extraordinary hero. Men wanted to be him and women wanted a man like him. This man was Heracles.

Background on the myth

In today's day, Heracles is better known under the name Hercules. However, Hercules is only the Latin version of his name, for the Ancient Romans also incorporated his legend into their own mythology. His image was so powerful that emperors like Commodus pretended to be him, thinking that this would give them his strength.

Ancient Greek mythology is a great source of inspiration and wisdom. In the ancient world, one of its chief purposes served to educate people (and not only entertain them), so each story often contained a moral or a lesson that the listener should take away. The myths that Heracles stars in are full of these types of lessons.

According to ancient legend, Heracles was born as the son of Zeus and Alcmene, a mortal woman. Zeus disguised himself as her husband and came to her in order to make love. Out of this union, Heracles was born. The story has a twist though. Alcmene's real husband also came to her that night and out of that union was born Heracles's twin brother, Iphicles.

This infidelity angered Hera, the wife of Zeus, and she would serve as the main source of trouble for Heracles. Throughout his life, she would try to hurt or kill him in a lot of ways, but always ended up unsuccessful.

Heracles was a man who could overcome any challenge thrown at him. This ability he demonstrated from a very early age. When he was eight months old, Hera tried to kill him by sending two snakes into his room. While his brother was crying, the little Heracles grabbed both snakes into his hands and strangled them. On the basis of this, the blind prophet Tiresias predicted a heroic future for the boy.

Little Heracles playing with a snake

This prediction was fulfilled and Heracles, as one of the few mortals, grew to achieve immortality. At the end of his term, he was granted immortality and rose to take his place among the gods on Mt. Olympus.

However before this took place, he had to battle many enemies, pass through many obstacles and perform many heroic deeds. His travels took him to all corners of Ancient Greece and many places beyond.

The 12 Labors

Probably the most famous story about Heracles concerns the 12 labors he had to do. This particular story begins with him living a quiet family life with his wife and sons, but one day Hera casts a spell on him, driving him mad. In a fit of rage, Heracles kills his entire family.

Once he recovers from his madness, he is deeply saddened by what he has done and tries to find a way to atone for it. He goes to the Oracle of Delphi to try to ask for guidance. The Oracle tells him that he can atone for his sins by going to live in the court of King Eurystheus and do whatever the King asks of him.

Heracles reluctantly agrees to this. At the court, the King tells him that he has to perform 10 tasks:

1. Slay the Nemean lion
2. Slay the nine-headed Hydra
3. Capture the Golden Hind of Artemis
4. Capture the Erymenthian boar
5. Clean the Augean stables in one day
6. Slay the Stymphylian birds
7. Capture the Cretan bull
8. Steal the man-eating horses of the giant Diomedes
9. Obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons
10. Steal the cattle of the giant Geryon

When Heracles performed these 10 tasks, he stands in front of Eurystheus and asks for a pardon. However the cunning King makes an excuse to not accept two of the tasks and tells Heracles that he needs to perform two more tasks.

11. Steal the apples of the Hesperides
12. Descend into the underworld and capture Cerberus, the three headed dog who guarded the entrance into the land of the dead

Heracles didn't hesitate and accomplished these two extra tasks.

The completion of these tasks assured Heracles his freedom. He would go on to many other adventures, such as joining Jason and the Argonauts on their quest to find the Golden Fleece. However, the 12 tasks alone were enough to grant him immortality.

Mount Olympus

Lessons we can use today

There are many lessons that we can learn from Heracles and his life. He was a troubled hero and his main weakness was that he could not control his emotions, often going into fits of rage. Heracles shows us that we should always have our emotions under control. If you don't, you might come to regret it later.

Heracles also had many positive traits outside of his heroism. For the Ancient Greeks, he was a prime example of virtue and manliness, the Greek words for these qualities being “arete” and “andreia.”

“Arete” means virtue or excellence. It is something that all men strived for. It grew to encompass many meanings, but its initial and primary meaning was strength and courage. These are also the traits that the stories of Heracles were meant to primarily demonstrate.

Heracles always faced his challenges head on, he never wavered, never backed down. He faced the greatest threats that the mythical world could throw at a man, and he came out victorious. His courage was relentless and his strength was legendary.

The stories of Heracles were a way to encourage young men to be inspired by his enormous courage and to try to cultivate it within themselves. The Ancient world was full of war, full of different challenges, and a man needed to have courage and strength in order to survive. Luckily he had good examples to look up to. Whenever in doubt, whenever afraid, he could go back to the stories and ask himself: what would Heracles do?

Heracles also served as a prime example of “andreia”. This word can only be translated as “manliness.” “Andreia” meant the essence of the man, his raw strength and energy. As such, it was to be cultivated and grown. It is also the love of hard work and toil, always struggling to come out victorious. For a man has to struggle and work hard in order to be a man. There is no other way.

Heracles was also quite the ladies man. He was married four times and always acquired a lover wherever he went. One famous story has him arrive at the court of King Thespius, who asks him to kill a lion that has been ravaging the countryside. He does this and as a reward, King Thespius offers that he can make love to his daughters, all fifty of them! Heracles doesn’t hesitate and makes love to all of them, in one night!

Heracles and Omphale

If you need a hero to look up to, if you need to a bit of encouragement, if you need a bit of inspiration to work hard and overcome challenges, think of Heracles. He was a mortal who rose up to become immortal on the basis of his courage, hard work, self-discipline and strength.

> It is more in accord with nature to emulate the great Hercules and undergo the greatest toil and trouble for the sake of aiding or saving the world, if possible, than to live in seclusion. — Cicero in “On duty”

Read more: The Speech To Save Your Life

Peter Burns
Peter is a world traveller whose interests include fitness, history, gaining weight, learning languages and a wide variety of other things. He runs the Renaissance Man Journal.

The Antimans Men in sudresses skipping down the street.

January 18, 2015 | by Dom Fonce | Link | Original Link

I'll keep this short and sweet, do the beliefs of feminism freak you out? Have you ever imagined a world where women rule over men? I did. And, I expressed my fears in the only way I knew how—by writing them in a short story.

The Antimans

By Dom Fonce

Ted Bobmartemi walks through the busy capital streets of Womania. He's late. He's in such a hurry that his sundress snags on a parking meter. His fingers twist his long black beard hair and all the blood from his veins rush to the cheeks on his face.

"Oh, silly me." he says. The desire to stay and clean the meter with a feather duster is so strong in his heart, but he is late. He doesn't want to get the paddle again. So, skipping along the sidewalk, Ted continues to his mandatory Manhood Shaming lecture at the local university. Every guy has to go, his thoughts race, I can't be late. I can't be late.

Nature is a lie

Men are evil

Womanhood will prevail

Ted Bobmartemi chuckles as he reads the capital's motto. So true, he thinks. The school doors open with a tug and Ted skips through. He passes men, or as they're called in Womania, Antimans and they wave gently at him—he waves back. He passes women, dressed in colorful skirts, black leggings, or sundresses like himself. In Womania, all masculine type clothing have been discarded. In Womania, almost all books written by men—especially those pesky dystopian and utopian novels—have been discarded and erased. In Womania, all human biological notes have been burned. Here, everybody is happy and lady-like.

~~~~

“This is Chad,” said the superbly elegant lecturer—she points to the video on the massive projection screen, “he is on a date with Madeline. They talk for about 15 minutes and he does this!”

The video quickly zooms into his eyes, in the background an alarm beeps loudly and blinks red.

“Chad is looking down. To where? To Madeline’s breasts, that’s where. What a pig!” said the lecturer.

The whole auditorium of men, legs crossed, clap on the corner of their palms. Hundreds of men in sundresses. Polka dot, flower printed, horizontally striped, vertically striped, diagonally striped—reds, pinks, purples, and yellows. Some snap gum in their mouths. Some wear big, hoop earrings. Some are covering their faces with makeup. Ted is one of these men.

The video continues. Madeline swiftly and forcefully swipes a palm to Chad’s face and rushes from the restaurant.

“You go, honey.” says a man behind Ted.

The lecturer continues. “Nature tells us that men love breasts. That they should desire to feel and suckle on them. Nature says that men should love big, child-bearing hips and butts. But, what do we say to nature, boys?”

“Nature is a lie!” says the empowered crowd.

“Nature,” she continues, “tells women that they must give birth to children and let them drink the milk from our breasts. Nature says that women are caretakers. What do we say to nature?”

“Nature is a lie!”

“Nature says that men are built bigger and stronger than women. The most animalistic of human males would hunt and protect. Nature says that men are providers and protectors. What do we say to nature?”

“Nature is a lie!”

“Now,” finishes the lecturer, “everyone line up for penis numbing treatment. And remember, when you get home allow your wives to have sex with you. But let her do the thrusting, that’s very important, remember that most of all.”

~~~~~

Later that evening Ted’s wife, Patricia, complains to him for the 27th night in a row that he is not satisfying her sexually.

Ted, taken over with embarrassment and sympathy for his wife says and suggests, “I’m so sorry sweetheart, why don’t you ask Daniel from the house over if he can do it for me?”

She replies with, “I’ve already tried, three times, and it did nothing of satisfaction .”

“Oh,” says Ted, “I’m so sorry, I’m trying my best.”

She is distraught and wants to hear no more words from Ted’s mouth.

“I will have to go to the capital building and meet with the Femi-Gods, there has to be a way for me to receive my satisfaction!”

~~~~~

To Patricia’s surprise, she and thirty-six other wives are dragging their husbands to the capital building for the very same reason as she. The women bicker and complain to each other in synchronization. The husbands sit, knees clenched together, and extremely nervous.

The three glorious Femi-Gods stand on a balcony overlooking the group. They extend their arms and begin to address the women in the crowd.

“It seems,” the head Femi-God says, “that there is a new turn in the advancement of the human race. Men, in all their worthlessness, have become entirely obsolete and must be discarded.

“Scientists have discovered asexual behavior in female komodo dragons and jellyfish—they are testing human adaptation as we speak. Also, through stem-cell research, cloning may be on the rise. This may take up to a year to finalize if hard work towards progression is made. In the meantime ladies, inside every mailbox of every house in Womania, the newest and most greatest of all vibrating dildos will arrive—thanks to our wonderful government. Use that for now. And in the meantime, we strongly recommend experimenting with each other. Find a girlfriend. That is all, ladies.”

~~~~~

I’m leaving you, Ted.

He stands alone in front of his bathroom mirror in a sundress. Red lipstick smears over his lips and eyeliner streaks down his face.

“Are you sure you want this?” asks the doctor. “There’s no going back afterwards.”

“I’ve wanted this for so long.” says Ted. “I feel so dead inside.”

He wipes the tears with toilet paper, “Oh, silly me. Always getting so worked up.”

“Here’s all the money I have. Take it.” says Ted to the doctor.

He adjusts his bra, squeezes the new girls, and looks down at his crotch. “You’re all gone, you stupid, evil penis. I’m finally free of you.”

“Now remember, go fill this prescription as soon as you can—these pills will complete your transformation. It’ll give you more estrogen so that your facial hair won’t grow back.”

Ted hits the sidewalk in his Stilettos. A night on the town will do me good, he thinks.

“Welcome to the beautiful world of womanhood, Theodora.” says the doctor, mirror in hand.

“Oh, my . . . I’m so . . . beautiful. I love it. Thank you so much, doctor.”

Theodora cringes at the Anitmans skipping past her under the lamplight. Disgusting pigs! she thinks, Worthless, worthless pigs!

Read More: A Traditional Sex Role Success Story

The Myth Of Yellow Fever

January 19, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Recently, YouTube personality and aspiring actress Anna Akana posted a rant about white men who fetishize Asian women. In the video, Akana recounts her experiences with yellow fever-stricken white nerds with such bitterness that you can practically visualize stink lines wafting off the screen:

Beyond the fact that Akana is clearly making some of her stories up (getting approached by men speaking an Asian language? Yeah right, honey), her video itself is based on a lie. Yellow fever, as described by jealous white girls and Americanized Asian girls, does not exist. The idea that there's a whole population of men who fetishize slanty eyes and hairless bodies is a myth.

Before the usual suspects start flapping their gums, yes, nerdy white guys tend to end up with Asian girls. But the reason this happens is not because of the man's fetish, but the woman's fetish. Asian girls have an obsession with whiteness and white men that borders on being creepy, an obsession that is almost entirely ignored by the legions of white girls and resentful halfies crying about "yellow fever."

White Fever In The Far East

Until you've visited Asia, it's impossible to understand just how fascinated Asians are with whiteness. My first taste of it was in the Singapore airport. While I was trudging towards the transit hotel, I walked past several kiosks advertising skin lightening cream for women, for the explicit purpose of making them look more Caucasian. SJWs don't exist in the Far East, so nobody sees anything wrong with this.

The fetishization ramped way up when I entered the Philippines. Every single advertisement on the streets features white models, half-white models, or Filipino models who've clearly had their skin retouched to look whiter. In the transit lounge at the Davao airport, I sat behind a huge poster advertising a skin lightening clinic, featuring models who were whiter than me. While the effect is less pronounced in other Eastern countries, the message is clear: many Asian women want to be white.

Indeed, the near-universality of "white fever" among Asian women is what makes laying them so easy. When I opened up an account on FilipinoCupid and posted a picture of myself, I started getting dozens of messages from Filipinas a day. Getting them to show up on dates was as simple as telling them I was going to be in their city (or was in their city) and asking what their number was.

To give you an example of how eager some Filipinas are to date a white man, one girl I met off of FilipinoCupid went absolutely crazy when I first texted her. Five minutes after I contacted her, she tried calling me three times in a row, and when I didn't pick up, she sent me another three texts. When we finally met for coffee, she was downright obsequious, profusely apologizing to me for being late, laughing at all of my bad jokes, and repeatedly reminding me that we should "spend as much time together" as we could before I returned to the states.

White fever is so strong in the Philippines that I suspect that some of the girls I banged were trying to get pregnant just so they could have a half-white baby. I asked a few girls what they'd do if I got them pregnant (abortion is illegal in the Philippines) and they all told me they'd raise the baby on their own without telling me. Keep in mind that these were all college-educated, middle-class girls I met via FilipinoCupid or day gaming in malls.

Marital Submission And Asian Women

Resentful, Americanized Asian girls like Anna Akana claim that the reason white men have "yellow fever" is because they want a "submissive" woman they can control and berate. When they're not parading this strawman around, they like to burn it by claiming that Asian women aren't the "doormats" and "geishas" that nerdy white men are looking for, that they're strong and sometimes domineering.

This entire argument is based on the fallacious feminist view of wifely submission. To the average you-go-grrl, "submission" conjures up an image of a battered wife tearfully obeying her husband's every command, no matter how repulsive or humiliating. In actuality, submission is putting the interests of someone or something else before your own, without even thinking about it.

By this definition, Asian women are submissive, because marital submission is the only way to make a marriage and family work. It's not about being a "doormat," it's about working to ensure the health and happiness of your husband and children. If you're not going to put the interests of the man you love first, why even get married? Why have relationships to begin with if all you care about is yourself?

Furthermore, the claim that yellow fever-afflicted men are closeted domestic tyrants is yet another example of how feminists libel geeks and nerds, some of the most powerless men in American society, as being the root of all evil. Most of these nerds are just looking for an attractive woman who will treat them with respect and won't emasculate them. Asian women actually appreciate the men in their lives: you will never see one casually cutting down her husband or boyfriend in public the way white girls do.

"Exotification" Does Not Exist

When I wrote an article several months ago praising Filipino girls, feminists and SJWs accused me of "exotifying" them. But none of the traits I listed are ones that only Filipinas can have. There's nothing about being appreciative, chaste or skinny that precludes white, black, or any race of women from embodying these qualities. It's not like I was castigating white girls for having round eyes or being taller than 5 foot 1 on average.

My big head may be accepting of all races and peoples, but my little head has its own hood and robes. I'm not particularly attracted to Asian facial features, but I'm also smart enough to recognize a good thing when I see it. Asian girls are a far better deal for the enterprising man looking for a girlfriend or wife who will support him, put his needs first and treat him the way he deserves to be treated.

To jealous white girls and honorary white girls like Anna Akana, Asian women are a threat. A class of girls who are feminine, agreeable and attractive are dangerous to women who get off on being self-absorbed, self-mutilating bores. Accusing men who want feminine, agreeable women of having "yellow fever" is a way of vilifying normal male desires. The slur obscures the fact that white male-Asian female pairings are driven by the fetishes of the latter, not the former.

Read More: 5 Misconceptions About White Guys With Asian Girls

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Timeless Wisdom Of Louis IX

January 19, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Perhaps the most sincere and guileless of medieval chroniclers was France's Jean de Joinville, the Seneschal of Champagne. He lived from 1224 to 1317, reaching a maturity of worldly experience shared by none of his contemporaries except fellow historian Geoffrey de Villehardouin.

Joinville was the counsellor and confidant to King Louis IX (later the canonized St. Louis), and accompanied him on the Seventh Crusade. He wrote, in 1309 at the age of eighty-five, a work called the Histoire de St. Louis (Life of St. Louis); it is more of a personal testament than a biography, for it describes Joinville's experiences at the right-hand of his beloved king.

Louis IX was France's most pious monarch; he took seriously his responsibility as servant of national unity, and as a protector of the poor against the depredations of the powerful. He subjected himself to nutritional austerities as acts of faith; and he made it a point of principle to feed the poor, wash the feet of paupers, and lacerate his flesh in penitentiary flagellations.

Without question, his canonization twenty-seven years after his death was eminently deserved. Joinville's Life of St. Louis is, among other things, a treasure-trove of Louis's worldly wisdom. It is an intimate and vivid portrait of a man Joinville had come to love for his virtue, wisdom, and innate sense of justice.

A scene from the Crusades

In numerous anecdotes, he conveys his master's ability to render equity, or deliver sound counsel, on nearly any occasion. After reading the entire account carefully, I have tried to state in my own words the most radiant bezels of wisdom from Joinville's book, together with an illustrative quotation from the original source. These are displayed below. The complete text of the Life of St. Louis can be found in Joinville and Villehardouin: Chronicles of the Crusades (M. Shaw, ed., New York: Penguin Books, 1983). The quotations that follow below are taken from this translation of Joinville.

1. Govern justly and speak the truth.

> "For I would rather have a Scot come from Scotland to govern the people of this kingdom well and justly than that you should govern them ill in the sight of all the world." This upright king loved truth so well that…he would never consent to lie to the Saracens [i.e., Muslims] with regard to any covenant he made with them.

2. Do not drink to excess.

> He used to add water to his wine, but did so reasonably, according as the strength of the wine allowed it…[He warned me] that if I did not learn to mix my wine with water…gout and stomach troubles would take hold of me, and I would never be in good health.

3. Do not disgrace yourself.

> "You should avoid deliberately saying or doing anything which, if it became generally known, you would be ashamed to acknowledge by saying 'I did this,' or 'I did that.'"

4. Be mindful of your words.

> He also told me not to contradict or call into question anything said in my presence—unless silence would imply approval of something wrong, or damaging to myself, because harsh words often lead to quarreling, which has ended in the deaths of countless numbers of men.

5. Do not be too flamboyant in dress or habit. No one respects a coxcomb.

> He often said that people ought to clothe and arm themselves in such a way that men of riper age would never say they had spent too much on dress, or young men say that they had spent too little.

6. Do not let your soul become corrupted by vice.

> “So I beg you,” he added, “as earnestly as I can, for the love of God, and for the love of me, to train your heart to prefer any evil that can happen to the body, whether it be leprosy or any other disease, rather than let mortal sin take possession of your soul.”

7. Humble yourself by frequent acts of kindness and charity. They have a redemptive power.

> “Your Majesty,” I exclaimed, what a terrible idea! I will never wash the feet of such low fellows.” “Really,” said he, “that is a very wrong thing to say; for you should never scorn to do what our Lord Himself did as an example for us. So I beg you [he said], for the love of God and for the love of me, to accustom yourself to washing the feet of the poor.”

8. When at dinner or revelry, speak only about pleasant subjects.

> It happened one day that this worthy priest was sitting beside me at dinner, and we were talking to each other rather quietly. The king reproved us and said: “Speak up, or your companions may think you are speaking ill of them. If at table you talk of things that may give us pleasure, say them aloud, else be silent.”

9. Be careful with your money.

> “Wise men,” said the king, “deal with their possessions as executors ought to do. Now the first thing a good executor does is to settle all debts incurred by the deceased and restore any property belonging to others, and only then is he free to apply what money remains to charitable purposes.”

10. Take action quickly to implement justice.

> With all this there were so many criminals and thieves in Paris and the adjoining > country that the whole land was full of them. The king…soon made himself familiar with the truth. In consequence he forbade the selling of the office of provost [who was often underpaid and corrupt] in Paris, and arranged for a good and generous salary to be given to those who should hold it in the future. He also abolished all taxes and levies that imposed unnecessary hardship on his people, and caused inquiry to be made throughout his kingdom to find men who would administer justice well and strictly, and not spare the rich any more than the poor.

11. Sympathize with those less fortunate than you.

> Let your heart be tender and full of pity towards the poor, the unhappy, and the afflicted; and comfort and help them to the utmost of your power.

12. Manage wisely those you are tasked to serve.

> Maintain the good customs of your realm and abolish the bad ones. Do not be greedy in your demands on your people, or impose heavy taxes on them except in a case of emergency.

13. Speak to someone when you are burdened with a problem.

> If anything lies heavy on your heart, speak of it to your confessor or to some wise and discerning man who has not too glib a tongue. In this way your troubles will be easier to bear.

14. Surround yourself with worthy and capable people.

> Take care to have around you people, whether clerics or laymen, who are wise, upright, and loyal, and free from covetousness. Talk with them often, but shun and fly from association with the wicked.

15. Take caution with backbiters and calumny.

> Let no one be so bold as to say in your presence anything that may entice and move men to sin, nor do anything so presumptuous as to speak evil of another behind his back in order to belittle him. Nor must you allow anything in disparagement of God and His saints to be said before you.

16. Value justice over all.

> In order to deal justly and equitably with your subjects, be straightforward and firm, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, but always following what is just, and upholding the cause of the poor till the truth be made clear. If anyone brings suit before you, make full inquiry until you know the truth; for then your counsellors, having the facts before them, will be able to give sentence more confidently, whether for or against you.

17. Restore stolen property to its owner.

> If through your own act, or the act of your predecessors, you hold anything which should belong to another, and his right to it is proved beyond question, restore it to him without delay. If on the other hand there is some doubt about the matter, have it investigated, promptly and thoroughly, by wise and knowledgeable men.

18. Do not allow quarrels and disputes to fester.

> In the case of wars and dissensions arising among your subjects, make peace between the disputants as soon as ever you can.

Louis IX holds court

It might be said that there is nothing new or earth-shaking in these morsels; this is so, but true wisdom is seldom accompanied by fireworks. Nothing is less glamorous that the truth. Nevertheless, Louis was like all of us a product of his age, and we cannot follow him in everything. Some of his precepts have not aged well, and place him squarely in the Age of Faith, as when he advises a knight as follows:

> But a layman, whenever he hears the Christian religions abused, should not attempt to defend its tenets, except with his sword, and that he should thrust into the scoundrel’s belly, as far as it will enter.

Map showing the various Crusades

Yet if perspective is the first lesson of history, we must rank the Life of St. Louis as one of its greatest first-hand accounts. Here is revealed the mood of an age like no dry official chronicle ever could. We share in the wisdom and goodness of a pious king; we grip the pommels of our swords with conviction and intensity as we sit, with composed countenance and respectful homage, at the feet of Louis during one of his speeches; and we share with our seneschal Joinville his heartache in leaving his family to follow his king on the Seventh Crusade. He relates with unabashed honesty:

> I left Joinville [my home] immediately after—never to enter my castle again until my return from overseas—on foot, with my legs bare, and in my shirt. Thus attired I went to Blécourt and Saint-Urbain, and to other places where there are holy relics. And all the way to Blécourt and Saint-Urbain I never once let my eyes turn back towards Joinville, for fear my heart might be filled with longing at the sight of my lovely castle and the two children I had left behind.

Because Joinville was not a professional historian, his work is free of the ornament and affectation that a more educated writer might feel obliged to display. This gives his work a freshness and warmth that no other medieval work can approach, with the possible exception of the letters of Abelard and Heloise.

Louis died in 1270 on the Eighth Crusade in Tunis. After his death, papal officials made an inquest into his life and works, and he was canonized in 1297. Joinville wrote his history in 1309, at the advanced age of eighty-five; yet time had neither dimmed his memory nor obscured his judgment. We feel the living, breathing presence of real characters here, not the wooden caricatures of musty chronicles.

When Louis's body was prepared for burial, it was discovered that his back was scarred by flagellations, performed in secret by himself as acts of ritual penitence. His faithful servant, Joinville, eventually built for him an altar “to the honor of God and in his own honor, and there masses shall be sung in reverent memory of him forever.” He remains for many the most just and wise of all of France’s medieval kings.

No more saintly hands ever grasped a scepter, or graced a throne.

Read More: How To Forgive Your Family

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Decimation Of Western Women Is Complete

January 19, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A new song by rising Swedish pop star Tove Lo serves as a reminder to Western men how broken the current generation of women have become. Have a watch at this video:

The original version without the distorted vocals can be found here.

The song has a simple message: a young woman gets hurt by a guy and decides to ease the pain by going to the club, getting drunk, smoking reefer, and fucking random guys. This coping strategy doesn't work too well in the video—a brief but visceral moment in the end shows her breaking down in tears as she wanders aimlessly in a drugged- out haze. We don't know the guy who hurt her, but Taylor Swift can answer that in her mega-popular song Trouble, where she falls for a bad boy who gets into bar fights, is wanted by the police, and cheats on her in public view.

A generation ago, the behavior of Tove Lo would be seen as alternative, to say the least. To get over a man, a girl would typically cry alone in bed, write in her diary, listen to sad love songs, bake with her mother, and pray to God that the pain would ease. Now, we have the normalization of screwing bad boys to get over bad boys. If you flip the sexes, this is ironically the advice given to men studying game ("fuck ten girls to get over your oneitis"). Girls are finding that this does nothing more for them than decrease their ability to have relationships in the future, simply because women are not men. A lifestyle of whoring around is, surprisingly, completely destroying the worth of women as long-term partners, wives, and mothers.

It doesn't need to be repeated, but girls like players. They like men who who have been approved (vaginally) by many other pretty women. But this doesn't work the other way around. The more cock a girl has had in her, the less likely a man will want her beyond a basic lay, a fact that women are at least subconsciously aware of when they conceal their wildly promiscuous past to men they attempt to enter relationships with.

How would you feel if the girl you seriously liked, after breaking up with her previous boyfriend, fucked five guys in the course of a month, all of them at rapid speed, and let them experiment with her three holes as described in the popular "romance" books she has read, all while telling you, the man she is making work for her pussy, that she's no longer looking for a "hook-up" and wants a man to be more chivalrous with her?

Unless you are the bad boy who gets to drill her quickly, I imagine your reaction would be the same as a girl's if you told her the following:

"When I was younger, I always took girls to the most expensive restaurants in town, and occasionally I'd surprise them with a romantic weekend getaway to Paris in a private jet, but since then I've realized what is important in life and now practice minimalism. Snuggling up on the couch while watching romantic comedies on Netflix is far more meaningful to me today."

She would undoubtedly feel robbed at being treated worse than girls of your past, as should you if discovering that you have to work harder for her body than men of her past.

This sluttification of women, which Tove Lo's catchy song conveys as normal and even fun, is part of a culture where every man who seeks serious relationships with women is a soft cuckold, because he's the last man in a 30-man gangbang trying to give tender kisses on the lips and labia of a woman who has been rode hard and defiled for years.

How can any man who approaches a girl today see her as more than a cum bucket? Because let's be real: she has been serving as a cum bucket thanks to a perverse culture that methodically trains and encourages her to take buckets of cum from men who make her vagina tingle, all as a way to help her "grow" as a person, find herself, and become strong and independent, which means not sobbing for more than a day when the latest bad boy she fell for turned out to be a selfish person who didn't value her beyond the sexual.

This is the girl who's going to be your lifelong faithful partner? The girl who's going to be the mother of your children? I cringe at that notion, as should all men. I rather be an evolutionary dead-end than let a whore be the mother of my child, but men today are being trained to accept the whore mother and to be the soft cuckold, the sucker that gets to buy the goods at full price even though it has declined 80% of value from its peak.

It's amazing that in just three generations, women have gone from being potential wives and mothers to nothing more than fuck toys. Men used to meet traditionally minded virgins, but are now stuck with a seemingly unlimited pool of mediocre sluts who have been fucked in the ass by multiple men. This is complete and utter decimation of the female human. Men can no longer gain any meaning or value from a woman beyond sex, even if he is truly capable of being the world's number one dad, and rest assured that the degeneracy that has so swallowed America whole will spread throughout the world from the trojan horse technology out of Silicon Valley.

How did this happen? How did we get to this point? A book can be written on the answer, but understand that trillions of dollars are to be made by destroying the feminine mother and putting a mindless and shallow consumer fuck robot in her stead. The finger can be pointed at the elite and their useful idiots for creating this environment, but the fact still remains that this is not a good time to be a normal man with the normal need to reproduce with a good woman who will stay loyal to him, raise his kids right, retain a thin figure, and take care of his home. A man who puts in triple overtime and travels abroad can find the exceptions, but for the lot of men in the Western world, there is no longer any meaning beyond casual sex that can be gained from women. These are end times for traditional pair bonding.

So on that note, I urge you to learn game, seduce these inadequate women, and try out those moves you've seen in porn, because that sex drive of yours is not going anywhere and must be sated for your own mental health. Beyond that, however, don't expect much more, because women can no longer provide you with what women of the past so easily could.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 7 Reasons Why American Culture Is The Most Degenerate In The World

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

2084

January 20, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Chapter One: A Dozen Felines

Eric's alarm wailed away the morning of his fifteenth birthday, waking him up bright and early at 5am.

"New notifications," he croaked before lifting his head off of his pillow.

"No new notifications Mr. Peterson," answered a disembodied female voice.

"Crap."

"Crap: Something of extremely poor quality. Also used as slang to describe…"

"Cancel," said an aggravated Eric as he pulled himself out of bed. He was disappointed that Claire Bonner hadn't chosen him yet. Still, he was hopeful. She had allowed him to talk to her for the first time yesterday, which was very promising. After all, it had been only six months since he signed the consent form giving him permission to release his number to her, so having a face to face conversation in such a short time was real progress.

He walked into his bathroom and stared at the three medications he'd taken daily since he was reprimanded for his boisterous behavior as a first grader. Every morning he fought this battle to decide whether or not he wanted to choke down these energy-sapping pills. He picked up the first bottle, dumped a capsule in his hand, and gazed at it as he'd done many mornings before.

"Fuck it," he said putting the pill back in the bottle. "It's my birthday."

After he showered and dressed he made his way downstairs where his father was eating breakfast. To his great surprise his older brother was also at the table.

“Richie?!?” Eric exclaimed as he ran to embrace his older brother. “When did you get out?”

“Last night,” Richie replied. “They let me out early for good behavior. How are things at school?”

“They’re alright,” Eric said taking a bite of toast. “Mr. Graves got busted for talking to Miss Anderson in the hallway the other day. They said he was violating some sort of PUS law or something. It was all over the news.”

“PUA,” said Richie correcting his kid brother. “Pickup artist. They probably got him on one of the Street Harassment statutes.”

“Did they fire him?” Eric’s father said joining the conversation.

“No, but they suspended him for a month and I heard they might make him move schools when he comes back.”

“Damn shame,” said Richie. “I liked Mr. Graves. You gotta be careful these days, kiddo. I just got out for virtual rape and if you don’t watch yourself you’ll find yourself in hot water.”

“It was just a picture and she wasn’t even naked,” said Eric. “Besides, she was your girlfriend. It’s not like you hacked her phone or anything. She sent it to you remember?”

“Doesn’t matter, said Richie. “You gotta to remember that all rape laws are subject to interpretation. They always take the woman’s side so you’ve gotta watch your back.”

“Your brother’s right,” said Eric’s father as he slid his tablet across the table in his older brother’s direction.

“What’s this?” said Richie swiping the screen a few times.

“I’m being investigated for ‘insinuating a possible sexual encounter’ with that woman we were in line with at the grocery store the other night,” he answering using air quotes.

“You mean that fat lady buying all that kitty litter with the tattoos on her face?” Eric asked. “Are you serious?”

“I wish I was. I was just making conversation with her to pass the time while waiting in that long line.”

“Rape laws…” said Richie sullenly as he shook his head at the court summons.

Eric finished his breakfast and set off for school with his two best friends, Brian and David. They’re a gay couple and very popular at school on account of their sexuality. This enables them to mingle with the opposite sex much more freely than other males who have come out of the closet as heterosexuals or who haven’t declared yet.

“So Richie’s out, eh?” said David.

“Yeah, finally,” replied Eric.

“No offense, Eric,” said Brian, “but he shouldn’t have had that woman’s picture in his phone. He should have erased it as soon as she sent it. No telling what kind of thoughts were going through his head. He’s lucky he didn’t get charged with telepathic rape or he’d still be in prison.”

Eric stayed silent. He didn’t dare get into a public debate about rape laws lest he be overheard and reported by a bystander. Plus he didn’t want to compromise his only safe communication link with Claire, who was best friends with David. So he kept his opinion to himself and quietly boarded the monorail bound for school.

Chapter Two: Subsidized B.J.s

Other than a few of his other friends wishing him a happy birthday, the school day was otherwise uneventful. There was the usual gossip about male students being suspended for holding hands with female students, or getting a week’s worth of detention for speaking to a girl without her consent. Nothing out of the ordinary at Sheryl Sandberg High.

The day did get a little more interesting when Miss Anderson had to console a hysterical Cameron Brown (whom everyone called “Cam”), who had a dramatic mental breakdown during class. Rumor had it that the cops were at her house the night before because things got violent between her mothers again. Apparently domestic violence was a regular occurrence at the Brown residence and this particular fight started because of accusations of infidelity involving a man which sent one of them over the edge.

“Did either of them go to jail?” Brian asked at lunch.

“Doubt it,” said Eric. “I heard they’re looking for the dude though.”

“Which one cheated?” asked David.

“My money’s on the one with the government titties,” said Eric. “Besides, they don’t arrest women for shit these days anyway. She’s gotta be shooting up a mall with an AK and even then she’ll get off with a slap on the wrist if she says she was heart broken over some guy.”

“Yeah they didn’t even arrest the woman who tased a toll booth guy who wouldn’t let her through without paying,” said David. “She told the cops he was being rude to her and they let her go home.”

“Typical.” said Eric as he took a bite of his sandwich.

“What’s that supposed to mean?” said Brian. “If he was being rude to her he totally deserved it.”

“Some chick gets her feelings hurt because she couldn’t bat her eye lashes and get a free pass so she tases the poor bastard?!” Eric could feel his adrenaline rising…something he hadn’t felt in quite a while.

“Shhhh…” urged David. “The monitor’s looking over here. Keep your voice down.” David was right. They definitely had the monitor’s attention. All two hundred pounds of him glared in their direction.

“All I’m saying is that it shouldn’t be legal for some butt hurt bitch to tase some random dude and get away with it. Especially if he was just doing his job.”

“What’s gotten into you today?” asked Brian. “You’re acting different. Being all aggressive.”

Eric didn’t respond but it wasn’t because of Brian’s incessant nagging. It was because Claire Bonner had just walked into the cafeteria. He stared at her longingly as she walked by with her eyes glued to her phone. The butterflies in him told him to try and talk to her but just as he stood up to walk over…

“Mr. Peterson!” said the monitor who was walking quickly toward him. “Don’t even think about it!” David pulled him back down in his chair. The monitor retreated to his post but Eric didn’t take his eyes off of Claire.”

“What the fuck is wrong with you?!” Brian asked again.

“Don’t worry,” said David. “I’ll see her in Gender Diversity later on. I’ll tell her you said hi.”

“Does Claire look thinner to you?” Brian asked looking over at her table.

“A little,” David answered. “She says she’s down to 180.”

Chapter Three: To Kill A Paramour

“…and that court decision was the genesis of the Paramour Act of 2042,” said Miss Sweeney. “Any questions?”

“Yeah,” blurted out a rotund girl in the front row. “Why didn’t she kill the son of a bitch?” The girls in the class shook with laughter and exchanged high fives with one another. Miss Sweeney smiled and looked to be fighting back giggles herself.

“But why did he end up in jail?” said a male student in the back row. “She cheated first didn’t she?” A hush fell over the classroom immediately. Every wide-eyed, open-mouthed student turned to look at Marvin Owens.

“Marvin!” yelled Miss Sweeney who’s smile had vanished. “You will not talk out of turn in this classroom! You will raise your hand to speak! Do I make myself clear?!”

“Y-Yes ma’am,” Marvin said sheepishly wilting under the scowl of his teacher and his onlooking classmates.

“Do I need to send you to the nurse again? You seem a little brash today.”

“No,” Marvin answered. “I’m sorry.”

“Good. Now to answer your question,” Miss Sweeney continued, “male cheating is now a crime under the Paramour Act.” Marvin slowly raised his hand. Miss Sweeney sighed loudly. “Yes?” she said sweetly in a sarcastic tone.

“I-I understand it’s a crime now,” he stammered. “But…it wasn’t before.”

“Well maybe he should have thought of that before he slept with that skinny little slut,” said another porky female. Once again the girls cheered while Miss Sweeney crossed her arms, tilted her head, and looked at Marvin with her customary duck face claiming victory in the debate.

After a little more one-sided female commentary, Miss Sweeney eventually steered the class into a discussion about the recent protests to give benefits to transgendered males in accordance with the Female Security Tax, which grants free residence, food, birth control, post secondary education, cosmetic surgery, and health care to all female U.S. citizens, enacted by President Hillary Clinton in 2021.

Eric, who stopped paying attention at the onset of the Paramour discussion, was checking his phone every two minutes looking for that precious acceptance notification from Claire. None yet. He decided to text David for an update.

Eric: Have you talked to Claire yet?

David: yea

Eric: And?

David: she said hi

Eric: That's it?

David: she says shes juggling like 7 other guys right now so it looks like ur in for a long wait sorry dude

Eric sighed in defeat and put away his phone.

Toward the end of class Miss Sweeney gave the class a pop quiz on the amendments to the 75 Rape Laws. He barely finished as the bell rang.

"Remember everybody," said Miss Sweeney as everyone packed up and began filing out of the classroom. "Your essays on the Vasalgel embargos of the 60's is due tomorrow."

Chapter 4: The Cheese Stands Alone

Brian and David stayed after school for Glee Club leaving Eric to ride the monorail home alone. The screen in front of him was tuned to a cooking show called "The Violet Chef" which was hosted by a quad-gendered celebrity chef who was famous for his flowery, violet colored apron. Today he was teaching men how to entertain guests with hors d'oeuvres garnished with purple parsley. Eric touched the screen to turn the channel.

"Senator Paul Pelosi IV and his push to ban heterosexual pornography on all mediums, tonight at six."

He touched the screen again…

"…the NFL will now recognize Breast Cancer Awareness year round, requiring teams to wear pink uniforms for all home games…"

…and again…

"…this 'Roosh' character probably wasn't even a real person. He was probably an online fabrication dreamed up by some pathetic…."

…and again…

…"the 25 year anniversary of the ban on high heels is upon us and to celebrate we're…"

…and again…

"…the newly redesigned 2085 Volkswagen Lady Bug will help you get in touch with your feminine…"

…until he finally turned it off. For some reason he didn't have the tolerance for T.V. today. He checked his phone again. The only notification was a email from his father:

Eric,

We're going to be late getting home tonight. I'm still tied up in court over this bullshit with the cat lady and Richie's still waiting to be put on the International Sex Offender's list. Anyway, I transferred some Bitcoin into your account for dinner. Male curfew is 7:12pm tonight so you need to be inside before sundown. They're increasing security in our neighborhood after the cops picked up a man taking a jog after dark the other night. We cannot afford the fine this time so get your ass inside tonight. See you when we get home.

-Dad

Eric tossed his backpack into his closet, fell onto his bed, and grabbed his gaming controller.

"Open Grand Theft Auto Twenty-Nine," he ordered.

"Grand Theft Auto Twenty-Nine is temporarily unavailable pending review under Statute…"

"Fuck—cancel," he said remembering the GTA mysoginy hearings that started last week in the Supreme Court. He tossed his controller on the floor and grabbed his phone to order dinner when it finally happened:

"New notification from Claire Bonner."

"Read!" he eagerly said jumping to his feet.

"Claire Bonner wishes to inform you that she has not chosen you for potential contact as her queue is full at the moment."

"Wait….what?"

"Claire Bonner wishes to inform you…"

"Cancel. Respond."

"Response option disabled at the request of the sender."

Eric stood still and stared at the wall for a few moments. He let out another dejected sigh, ordered a cheese pizza for dinner, then walked into his bathroom to take his medication.

Read Next: What Will The Roosh V Forum Look Like In 2114?

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

“No Pants Day” Shows 4 Problems With Millennials

January 20, 2015 | by Titus Vibius | Link | Original Link

The new generation is going downhill and dragging the whole world with it, exemplified by nonsensical actions such as “No Pants Day.” This article will firstly discuss the No Pants Day “occurrence” (for lack of a better word) and then discuss wider issues with society caused by certain features of millennials and then offer a simple first step in combating the spread of destructive silliness.

Background

This event consists of people wearing no pants when they go out in big cities or taking the subway without said pants in an attempt to, well, obtain attention and shock people; a quick definition can be found here.

This, in itself, is at best a laughable idea and at worst a blatant display of insanity because it serves no real purpose besides managing to disappoint serious, normal people who still had hope that youngsters today might turn into real, responsible adults.

The sole idea behind this action is to engage in one shocking activity (or rather, to omit the important activity of dressing normally) simply to surprise people in the public; however, the surprise is not a joyous or welcome one, rather it signals the lack of credibility on the part of the participants since they consider society, decency, and workplaces to be simple troll-worthy concepts.

The Millennial Businessman Who Drives the Economy

In itself, this whole thing would hardly be noteworthy; in a normal society, it would even be acceptable to blow a little steam off once a year and engage the childish, silly side of our natures, and we also have examples of other civilizations that decided to accept irrational behaviors. The Romans had the Bacchanalia, where they gave in to their most primal instincts while the Greek philosophers occupied themselves with theories about sports and running, which developed into the Olympics.

However, we do not currently live in a normal society (arguably, humans rarely or never did or did so imperfectly, but that is another topic entirely) and midway between absurdity and lunacy, No Pants Day is reminiscent of wider psycho-social issues:

1. Prevalent narcissism

Firstly, there is the issue of narcissism and a morbid need for attention; millennials today are not ashamed to unconsciously display this psychological disorder and their need for external attention or validation, of which No Pants Day is a perfect example. This has been discussed on ROK, so I need not go into details.

2. Immaturity is the norm

Secondly, there is the problem of arrested development where people such as the suited guy above are unable (or unwilling) to grow into the adult that they are supposed to; more worryingly, there is a massive discordance between the real person itself and the suited, respectable white-collar worker that he tries to impersonate.

This, coupled with the fact that those people will soon obtain (or already have obtained) positions of responsibility, leads to a decline in society itself as leaders become extinct.

Seriousness and hard work will be replaced by fun and jest, and maturity is subtly scorned and dethroned in favor of playing out clownish fantasies.

3. They crave sensationalism

Thirdly, there is the excessive need for fame, sensationalism, and shocking others, which sometimes replaces efficiency and overrides any noble goals. As an example, a millennial herself confirms this in an Elite Daily article, where she says “We no longer see adulthood as the end of our childhood, but the beginning of something even more liberating.” or (point 20) “we have a f*ck you attitude.”

Interestingly, that article mentions (point 28) how millennials “want freedom more than anything else,” yet when Snowden released his information about the NSA almost nothing happened—not even a miniature Occupy. The main reason is that millennials were too engrossed in playing Candy Crush or talking about how much they care about freedom, the environment etc. without actually changing anything, riding on the wave of sensationalism.

4. The repression of sexuality

Fourthly, this is another display of the west’s repressed sexuality and the amazingly quick powers of undressing of youngsters when given the occasion, which is boosting the current sexual market deregulation.

At least some girls looked good doing it…

To fix this, a simple first step would be to denounce such events (not only No Pants Day but other ridiculous ones as well) on Facebook and on Twitter. Of course, this is a very simple solution that is only the beginning of something that MUST be done before millennials devolve into complete clowns.

On the bright side, No Pants Day shows that young people still have a minuscule trace of political activism left within them; it’s too bad that they use it for such ignoble, idiotic purposes.

Read More: Millennials Exemplify The Age Of All Equal, All Useless

Titus Vibius
Titus Vibius is an anachronistic dissident who belongs to no one in space or time. He spends his time studying and gaining knowledge in the hope that in the future, he will create a society to which he belongs.

Why Logic Fails When Describing Abstract Ideas

January 20, 2015 | by William Manning | Link | Original Link

Quite recently on the forum, there was an excellent thread about the life and work of Ludwig Wittgenstein. Although the man himself was fascinating, this article was simply inspired by his questioning of language and logic. If you wish to read more about the man himself and the subsequent discussion, check out the thread here.

How do we know what we can't know? Let's think it through, step by step.

Physical Existence

We can describe everything that physically exists with language. For instance, I can describe the shirt I am currently wearing. It is a grey, crew neck, long sleeved shirt made out of cotton and polyester. It helps to insulate my body and keep me warm. My description, although perhaps not comprehensive, is enough to paint a picture in your mind of what my shirt is like.

Were I to describe my shirt further, I might go into more detail on the shade of the color, the direction of the stitching, the slight discolorations, or the exact length. In fact, I could even pull out a microscope and describe the shape of every little dust particle on my shirt.

Supposing technological limitations were not a factor, I could continue to describe my shirt for all of eternity, focusing on smaller and smaller pieces until we get to sub-atomic particles and sub-sub-atomic particles. Never once would language fail me in this instance. There will always be words to describe what I am seeing, because the shirt physically exists. We could perform the same exercise with a red shirt, a baseball, a human being, or the Grand Canyon and still be able to describe with language that which we see.

Non-Physical Existence

How about non-physical entities? Can words describe those? First, we must dissect what a non-physical entity is. If something is non-physical, it, by definition, has not been seen, heard, touched, smelled, or tasted by a human. Suppose I told you that you have a tail. You ask me if I have seen this tail, and I say no.

> ‘Have you felt it?’ No.

> ‘Have you heard it?’ No.
>
> ‘Have you tasted it?’ No.
>
> ‘Have you smelt it?’ Yuck, no.
>
> ‘Well, then, how do you know I have a tail, Will? Prove it!’ I can’t. I just know it.

This anecdote is a trivial illustration, yet demonstrates an important point. We cannot empirically prove that non-physical things exist. If it doesn’t physically exist, the senses cannot process it. However, this brings is us to a conundrum: if we cannot empirically prove that the non-physical exists, how can we be sure that logic exists?

We seem to think that logic exists, and it is definitely not a physical, tangible thing. Well, the answer is simple: we can’t. Can we describe what logic looks, tastes, sounds, feels, or smells like? Nope.

Non-Sensory Methods of Description

[image]

“But, AHA! William! The dictionary has a definition for logic! They’ve described what it is! Checkmate, you pretentious sot! Merriam-Webster says logic is “a proper or reasonable way of thinking about or understanding something.”

Ok, well let’s unpack this definition a bit. What is the dictionary definition of “proper?” According to the same dictionary it means, “Correct according to social or moral rules.”

> What does correct mean? “True or accurate”
>
> True? ‘Agreeing with the facts’
>
> Fact? ‘Something that truly exists or happens’
>
> Exist? ‘To have actual being’
>
> Being? ‘The state of existing’
>
> Existing? ‘To have actual being’
>
> Being? ‘The state of… Wait a second! This looks familiar!’ Well, my friend, you’ve learned your lesson. The dictionary is nothing but a big circular argument.

“Well, we never went down the path of ‘reasonable’ in our original definition…” If you really want to, I’ll humor you, then.

> Reasonable: ‘Fair and sensible’
>
> Fair: ‘Agreeing with what is thought to be right or acceptable’
>
> Right: ‘Morally or socially correct or acceptable’
>
> Correct: ‘True or accur… well, by Jove, we’ve done it again.’

What does this little traipse through the dictionary prove? It proves that language is useless when trying to describe the non-physical, because it will always end up in a circular definition: a fallacy. It’s meaningless to say that logic is “proper,” because “proper’s” definition ends up in a fallacy (which is, ironically, illogical). Therefore, we still have not succeeded in describing logic.

All is lost?

What can we do now? Kill ourselves and hope for some answers in the afterlife? No. All we need to do is stop using logic.

“Stop using logic? That’s absurd! What are you, a Christian or something?”

Calm down. We need to explore other venues of understanding. I know just the guy who can help us… let me grab my Lamp of the Enlightenment and rub it a few times. Suddenly, the ghostly apparition of Blaise Pascal appears before us.

> ‘Why have you disturbed my rest, William? I was chilling with Pook in heaven.’
>
> ‘Pook’s dead?!’
>
> ‘Uh, never mind. What did you want to ask?’
>
> ‘We wish to know how to understand without logos, oh master.’
>
> ‘We know the truth not only through our reason but also through our heart. It is through the latter that we know first principles, and reason, which has nothing to do with it, tries in vain to refute them. The skeptics have no other object than that, and they work at it to no purpose. We know that we are not dreaming, but, however unable we may be to prove it rationally, our inability proves nothing but the weakness of our reason, and not the uncertainty of all our knowledge, as they maintain. For knowledge of first principles, like space, time, motion, number, is as solid as any derived through reason, and it is on such knowledge, coming from the heart and instinct, that reason has to depend and base all its argument…
>
> It is just as pointless and absurd for reason to demand proof of first principles from the heart before agreeing to accept them as it would be absurd for the heart to demand an intuition of all the propositions demonstrated by reason > before agreeing to accept them. Our inability must therefore serve only to humble reason, which would like to be judge of everything, but not to confute our certainty. As if reason were the only way we could learn!'(Pascal's Pensées, 1995, 28, #110)

Blaise Pascal slowly fades back into nothingness.

Read More: Women Don't Know How To Argue With Logic Or Facts

William Manning
William is a young Yankee from the Deep South who keeps himself occupied by surfing the internet from his mom's basement. He is an aspiring organic soy bean farmer.

Islamophobia Is Perfectly Natural

January 21, 2015 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

During the #YesAllWomen movement, there was an meme that went viral saying, “You say not all men are monsters? Imagine a bowl of M&Ms. 10% of them are poisoned. Go ahead. Eat a handful. Not all M&Ms are poisoned.” This is exactly how I feel about Islam.

The Myth of the Radical Minority

Except it’s much more than 10% of Muslims who are ideologically poisonous. Consider this video from Ben Shapiro exploring a 2009 Poll by the Pew Research Center of radical Islamic beliefs:

A couple hard stats: 13% of American Muslims say violence against civilians can be justified, and 19% say they were either favorable to Al Qaeda or “didn’t know.” The stats are similar in France, victim of the recent Charlie Hebo terror attack, where 16% of of French citizens – not Muslims, but French citizens – support ISIS. The number rises to 27% when you look at citizens age 18-24. 40% of British Muslims support sharia law, and 20% support the 7/7 bombings.

That’s just Muslims in western countries. The percentage is much higher in predominantly Muslim countries where an overwhelming majority support honor killings, Sharia law, and unprovoked terror (More stats here.)

If the baseless claim that “10% of men are poisonous” is enough for the media to say we “need to have a conversation about masculinity,” call masculinity toxic, and demonize an half the population’s unchosen gender, then one of the most respectable research organizations in the world finding more than 10% of Muslims support violence and tyranny should be enough for us to examine that groups chosen religious beliefs.

Just as many men responded to #YesAllWomen by saying NAMALT ("Not All Men Are Like That!") many will respond to me by saying that not all Muslims are like that. Statistically speaking however, radical Islam, "extremism," or whatever euphemism western leaders want to hide behind actually represents a large percentage of Muslims, not a fringe minority. NAMALT is not a valid argument.

The Three Stages of Islam

So why do many western Muslims seem so peaceful, while Muslims in predominantly Muslim countries are often violent and tyrannical?

In the above video, David Wood of AnsweringMuslims.com describes the three stages of Jihad, as outlined and carried out by Mohammed himself. The first stage is stealth Jihad. At this stage, when Muslims are outnumbered, they preach tolerance and complain of persecution while antagonizing others. This is the stage American Islam is at.

Stage two is defensive Jihad. Once Muslims have a large enough percentage in the population to sustain criticism, Muslims engage in terrorism, using the largely peaceful percentage of the population as the water they swim in, and a haystack to hide their needles in. This is the stage European Islam is reaching.

Stage three is offensive Jihad. When Muslims have a majority and political power, they are commanded to fight non-Muslims, subjugate them to Islamic law, and expel non-believers. This is the stage Middle Eastern Islam is at.

These stages were carried Mohammed in his capture of the city of Mecca, and supported by the Muslim holy texts. Essentially, Islamic strategy changes based on the amount of power and influence they have in a population.

There is also a Muslim doctrine known as "Taqiyya" which means, "concealing or disguising one's beliefs." It essentially means that Muslims are allowed, and even commanded to lie to non-believers when it suits them.

> "The believers never ally themselves with the disbelievers, instead of the believers. Whoever does this is exiled from Allah. Exempted are those who are forced to do this to avoid persecution." – Quran 3:28

So while Muslims may say my words are incorrect, I would say they cannot be trusted, because their religion commands them to deceive of non-believers.

Islam Threatens Western Egalitarianism

Given that a significant percentage of Muslims hold radical violent views, and Muslim doctrine permits Muslims to lie to non-believers, Islamophobia is perfectly natural. It is natural to fear those who'd threaten you because of your beliefs.

Why then do so many Western leaders believe it is their mission to combat "Islamophobia?" Barack Obama, who spent part of his childhood in Indonesia, a country where 65% said they agreed with Al Qaeda on pushing US troops out of the Middle East, has said "I consider it part of my responsibility as president of the United States to fight against negative stereotypes of Islam wherever they appear."

Why is protecting Islam's image the stated mission of a man who has taken an oath to protect Americans and the Constitution of the United States?

The answer is that combating Islam would require rejecting the egalitarian multiculturalist values that brought leftists into power. It would mean rejecting the idea that all cultures are equal, and interchangeable. It would mean allowing Europeans and those of European descent to take pride in their unique culture and do what is necessary to defend it.

The fear conservatives have of Islam is not an irrational phobia but a rational caution grounded in reality. It is wise to be wary of people who would kill you for what you believe or the art you create.

What leftists fear about Islam isn't that they will kill their bodies, but that they will kill their belief system. Radical Islam means confronting the failure of leftist beliefs at the point of a gun. The stigma around Islamophobia is an attempt to silence those who'd point out this failure. Every politicians who insists "Islam is a religion of peace" is a narcissist trying to reassure themselves of their own belief system.

If leftists had any integrity they'd call out radical muslims who behead women for premarital sex as much as they call out men who write articles on the internet advocating women have certain types of sexual relationships. The real rape cultures are those in the Middle East that perform compulsory virginity checks on women, and forcibly circumcise both genders.

Islamaphobia Will Require Courage

While writing this article, I felt some fear. After all, if certain Muslim groups were to read this, they might attempt to physically harm me or even kill me. However, I've written articles criticizing other political groups for less egregious offenses, and have articles coming out in the future criticizing Christianity and the new age movement. It would be hypocritical of me to call out social justice warriors for getting men fired for their beliefs, and not call out Muslims for killing men for their beliefs.

Islam is the reason I can't just "enjoy the decline." Under Islam, there is no decline to enjoy. No freedom to create art, or love the women you choose. Every word, thought, and relationship is subject to the "will of Allah." And based on current demographics and policies, Islam is the future of the west.

While fear may be natural, our response must be courage. It will require courage for western leaders to see Islam for what it is, and admit the failure of their policies. It will require courage for western populations reject multiculturalism and defend their people, culture, and unique way of life. It will require courage for the West to stop shaming those who fear for their lives because of Islam, and start protecting them.

Read More: Why Does The Left Support Radical Muslims?

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

Does Clubbing Suck? A Young Canadian's First Glance

January 21, 2015 | by Jack Harper | Link | Original Link

Clubs are supposed to be full of super hot and horny women, who are just begging to be fucked…right? Maybe not. I turned 19 recently and decided to go to my first club last night. I expected to find horny 9s everywhere. Boy was that dream crushed fast.

This was my expectation of the girls in the club…..

The club I went to was 560, a popular club in downtown Vancouver, one that is held in high regard among the party goers here. Of course, I may have a limited worldview. There may be lots of clubs that are awesome, that I just have not yet been to. However, it is likely that many other clubs suffer form the same problems that this one suffered from, and if this club is a biopsy of a larger tumor on our society. As objectively as possible, this is what I saw:

1. Line up

We were in the line up to get in the club, and the guy behind us asked how long it would take to get in. 30 or 40 minutes was the answer from the fat bouncer. My friends said lets just grease the bouncer and get in, so we did that. $20 gone, only to pay another $20 inside.

When we were inside, the club was almost empty, much to my confusion. I think they deliberately kept the line up long in order to make the place appear better than it was.

2. No seats

I understand that clubs make a lot of money by offering table service and all of that, but there was literally no place to sit without paying. I don't need a luxury leather chair to sit on, a wooden bench would be acceptable, but nope. You need to pay in order to have the privilege of sitting.

3. Drinks are overpriced

$15 for 2 beers. You can buy more beer than that from a liquor store. You can buy a six pack of Molson Canadian for under $15. If you decide to be buzzed in the club, buy your own alcohol and drink it outside, before waiting in line for half an hour (or greasing the fat bouncer).

4. Shitty music

Loud shitty music was blaring all night. You had to scream to talk to someone in front of you. All the songs were awful remixes by unknown local DJs trying to be the next Deadmau5. If you want to be the next big DJ go for it, but try to at least put a tiny bit of effort into your set. Avoid the awkward pauses in the music, terrible transitions, and horribly chopped songs that I witnessed.

5. Dance floor and girl quality

I decided to hit the dance floor and check out the dance scene. I saw lots of whales dancing, and lots of girls dancing together. Whenever you tried to dance with any girl, her mother-hen friend would instantly take her away. There were mainly 6s, a few 7s, lots of 5s and whales.

There were maybe 3 girls who were an 8 or 9 out of a fuck-ton of people, maybe two or three hundred. The girls were also astronomically picky and entitled. I'm not Johnny Depp, but not exactly ugly either, yet the 6s and 5s were turning their noses at me. I found it hard to not laugh.

…this was the reality of the situation.

6. Strobe lights

On the dance floor strobe lights were going off like crazy. Mixed with the loud pulses of generic music it was almost like having a flash-bang going off in front of you. And behind you. And beside you.

7. All the girls wanted black guys

Before someone jumps in with accusations of racism, I'll say the cop-out: I'm not racist, my best friends are black. Now that that's out of the way, every single girl ignored every guy that wasn't black. They would flock to the black guys like moths to a flame. If you're a black guy, hit the club and you will get girls, 100%. If you're not, you may not have as good of a time.

8. Miscellaneous

There were WAY more guys than girls.The dance floor was packed like a sardine can, with lots of guys awkwardly trying to dance. Also the floor was sticky, and there were quite a few drinks spilled everywhere. A guy spilled his drink all over my friend. It costs five dollars to hang your coat. There were people with table service getting drinks with sparklers in them. Funny, but also sad that they would spend hundreds to inflate their ego.

Overall the experience was enlightening and sobering. I know more of the club culture than I did before. I know now that you are more likely to find a whale than a babe, even a cute 7, in one of the most popular clubs in Vancouver. All I saw was people awkwardly dancing to awful music, guys trying to get the few hot girls that were there and failing because of the mother-hens, and egotistical guys showing off their money.

To any of the guys here that can pull girls in the club, you have my utmost respect. It was brutal in there. The whales frightened me with their looks of hunger. I don't think I'll be going clubbing again anytime soon, and I especially won't go to 560 in Vancouver. I'll get a gym membership and work out instead.

Read More: The Western Male Is The Reason Why His Women Suck

Jack Harper
Raised in a weird purple pill family, 19 year old trying to do something in this world.

The True Meaning Of Diversity

January 21, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article originally was published on Roosh V.

Diversity is when merit, skill, and ability is downplayed in favor of a person's race, sexual orientation, or other identity affiliation. Diversity goals have the inevitable result of ensuring that less qualified applicants are given academic and employment opportunities over other applicants who are objectively more qualified. There is no means to achieve diversity for the sole sake of diversity without discriminating against other individuals or groups that are more capable.

Diversity policies were implemented in America because of claims that structural discrimination caused minority groups to lose out on opportunities in spite of equivalent or superior qualifications. To solve this problem, America has embraced a legal policy of openly discriminating against majority groups. While this was usually constricted to race, it has broadened in recent years to include sex.

A diversity program like affirmative action in the past benefited black men, for example, but white women have successfully hijacked the definition of diversity to include themselves. A white woman who claims to have "black friends" will not criticize a program that gives her a position at a Fortune 500 company over that of a black man who has more qualifications. Diversity programs that used to benefit historically marginalized races now increasingly focus on giving white women, homosexuals, and transsexuals more of the diversity pie.

How much damage does diversity programs cause in the short term on the individual level? Is a white man who has to go to UVA instead of Harvard really suffering? On such a scale, damage is hard to perceive or measure, but if we look at it from a societal level and measure the economic and intellectual growth of a nation when compared to its nation peers that do not use diversity programs, logical deduction shows that those nations that have been infected with the diversity virus will lag behind when it comes to scientific research, political leadership, organization, and innovation.

Over the course of decades and centuries, a nation that uses diversity as a measuring stick to promote its citizens in industry, politics, and intellectual culture will experience less growth and achievement than countries that do not. This is compounded over many years, and as described in The Rise And Fall Of The Great Powers, can allow an inferior country to overtake a formely superior country in dominance and hegemony.

Let's do an example that shows how a slight decrease in a nation's growth rate can lead to an unambiguous decline. Country U has a value (i.e. GDP) of 100 with a growth rate of 6% per annum. Policies of diversity, however, have caused a slowing of corporate growth, with a continuous rash of failures in companies led by women who were promoted because of their sex over more qualified male applicants. The country's annual growth rate slips to 5%. In 100 years, here is their compounded value:

100 x (1.05)^100 = 13,150 economic units

Country C is experiencing brisk industrialization and achieves 7% yearly growth, no doubt helped by their lack of diversity programs. Their initial value is only 20, one-fifth that of country U. Nonetheless, country C will surpass country U in 100 years:

20 x (1.07)^100 = 17,354

If country U did not employ diversity programs and were able to maintain its growth at 6%, it would have double the value of country C:

100 x (1.06)^100 = 33,930

Over the long term, any variable which decreases a country's growth rate can cause a decline relative to other countries that do not implement the damaging variable. In 100 years, country C will be better able to compete against country U for the planet's scarce resources and also provide its citizens with a higher standard of living. If its military is strong enough, it could come to dominate country U using a combination of hard and soft power, as the United States does to dozens of nations today.

My simulation is quite rudimentary for two reasons. First, we have no exact number of how much diversity can decline a country's growth rate besides the fact that is must do so by a value greater than zero. It could be 0.01% or greater than 1%—this number is unknown. Secondly, there are hundreds of variables working together to determine the growth rate of a specific country that prevents it from being constant over such great lengths of time.

In spite of these flaws, the simulation does show the long-term damage caused when a national policy of diversity in any country promotes inferior and less skilled citizens into roles that are vital to economic growth. Even a barely noticeable decline in the yearly growth rate, something that diversity programs would provide, is enough to severely damage a nation over the long run and make it vulnerable to strengthening nations that are hungrier for resources or planetary domination.

Whenever you see the word “diversity,” replace it with the word “decline,” because that’s exactly what it does to any organization or country that implements it on a wide scale. The second that merit is removed from the highest priority of a system is when that system will decline relative to other systems that don’t use diversity. In a country such as the United States, the most economically successful nation the world has seen, diversity is a needless poison pill that guarantees it will fare worse in the future.

Nature will punish any system, organic or inorganic, that forsakes its own survival by going against selection of the strongest unit that is most capable at the task given to it. Unfortunately, this will punish the Western world in future generations, all for bowing down to the altar of diversity.

Read Next: Social Welfare Creates A Society Of Sluts

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Your Idea Of Rights Is A Convenient Myth

January 21, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Before he died, George Carlin was one of America's richest deposits of red pill wisdom:

> "Rights!
>
> Boy everyone in this country is always running around yammering about their fucking rights. I have a right, you have no right, we have a right!
>
> Folks I hate to spoil your fun, but—there's no such thing as rights. They're imaginary. We made 'em up. Like the boogie man.
>
> Rights are an idea. They're a cute idea. Cute, but that's all – cute, and fictional.
>
> But if you think you do have rights, let me ask you this – where do they come from?
>
> People say they come from God. They're God given rights.
>
> Aww fuck! Here we go again…"

Lets imagine that, tomorrow, our society were to collapse in some severe way – nuclear war, solar flare, the machines revolt—whatever, pick your apocalypse.

How long do you think the niceties of the modern world would last?

The modern world is an aberration

Social justice warriors are just one group constantly yammering on about "rights." In their case, they're generally negative rights.

They believe they have the right not to be offended, the right not to have to physically defend themselves, the right to avoid any real hardship, like an empty belly or lacking a roof over their heads.

Basically—the right to do anything they please without any consequences. Any flaw in their perfect little world must be corrected, and since they're precious little flowers who would "never hurt anyone" somebody else must be at fault, and made to change their behavior. Only someone who grew up in the sterile confines of modern suburbia could be so delusional.

For most of human history life was a matter of day-to-day survival. You were grateful if you were able to put enough food on the table, that no barbarians raiders appeared on the horizon, that God did not cast down a thunderstorm to destroy the small wooden shack you called your home. As Hobbes would put it, life was "nasty, brutish and short."

Going further back, the case against utopia only grows stronger. In our naked, primal state human beings rarely lived a peaceful existence. According to the best data we have, one in six hunter-gatherers died at the hands of fellow humans, puncturing the myth of the "noble savage."

Looking at the animal kingdom, the picture is unquestionably worse. I have actually had arguments with people who try to dispute the savagery of nature. I point out that for nearly every type of living thing but humans, life ends with being eaten. For many species, including dolphins, chimpanzees, and orangutangs, behavior resembling rape is common, and may account for as much as half of all copulations.

Honest to god, I hear answers like – "but many animals require courting – that sounds like a form of consent to me!"

Pictured: A penguin consents to sex with a 200 kilogram Fur Seal

The problem of human nature

Despite its insanity, many would rather stick with the Disney narrative that nature is kind and gentle, and it is only modern, capitalist society that has corrupted our gentle souls.

Unfortunately, like all living things, human beings are selfish, petty, violent, emotional creatures at our core. People usually learn this around the same time they realize Santa Claus isn't real.

The modern world however keeps piling on layer after layer of feel-good bullshit to try and bury our true nature until we're more like machines than people. Many literally don't realize this because they grew up in a bubble where the machinations of real power occur out of sight, and thus out of mind. Young women are particularly susceptible to this—after all, everyone's always so nice to them.

Meanwhile men, who represent 70% of assault and 80% of murder victims, as well as more than 90% of the prison population, know only too well that the relative peace of the modern world is maintained solely by the respective police forces and armies of the world's governments.

Opening your eyes just a little, you can see evidence of this all around you.

Many wonder why so many thousands of people, even those living the lives of comfortable westerners, have dropped everything to go join the Islamic State for instance.

At least part of the answer would seem to be an innate bloodlust, a fundamental desire for violence and excitement that modern life simply doesn't provide. Yes, they may be stupid – but I would say they are not actually crazy.

Plenty of perfectly ordinary people have signed up to join. These people aren't mentally ill, they're just severely under-stimulated by the modern world to the point they find its banal routines insufferable. They have been insufficiently brainwashed by modern platitudes, and would rather take after our ancestors and live like a lion for a few months (probably the average life expectancy of an IS fighter) than endure a whole lifetime as a sheep.

There's a stereotype that soldiers all turn out mentally damaged by the violence they see, but if anything they seem emotionally healthier than the general population. Suicide rates are no higher for veterans than a similar demographic of the population.

When was the last time you heard someone say of a serious crime like murder or rape that they "would never do that"? Given that such a high percentage of our ancestors died from murder, so by extension a similar portion were murderers, does this promise not sound extremely hollow?

It would all change if the situation were different

Someone needs to do an experiment someday. Hook some volunteers up to a VR scenario, wipe their memories, and put them in a survival situation—stuck on a desert island perhaps, with no other sources of food.

I wonder what percentage of people, including said "wouldn't hurt a fly" social justice warriors, will find themselves resorting to cannibalism to survive? I put forward the hypothesis that the average person, if pushed far enough, is capable of just about anything.

Almost anyone you meet feeds their appetite for drama somehow. Sports, action movies, and video games are all multi-billion dollar industries. Alcohol and drug abuse remain rampant, and suicide rates are on the rise in most western countries, even though they've never been safer or richer.

Agent Smith perhaps put it best:

> Did you know that the first Matrix was designed to be a perfect human world? Where none suffered, where everyone would be happy.
>
> It was a disaster. No one would accept the program. Entire crops were lost.
>
> Some believed we lacked the programming language to describe your perfect world. But I believe that, as a species, human beings define their reality through suffering and misery.
>
> The perfect world was a dream that your primitive cerebrum kept trying to wake up from.

Even social justice warriors themselves embody this. They demand people act calmly, rationally, and without hate at all times—while marching down a street waving signs, blocking traffic, getting people fired from their jobs because they made a comment they didn't like, shouting abuse at those who don't toe the official line and just generally being a nuisance.

Clearly, people need a cause to fight for. Otherwise, they will just make one up. No exceptions.

Despite all our achievements, at heart, human beings remain little more than fighting and fucking machines. We evolved to survive out on the savannah, dealing with death and suffering every day. Thousands of years of civilization later, our nature hasn't changed.

Enjoy your rights, but don't take them for granted

Of course, the relatively peaceful era we live in is not a bad thing. I love the fact that I can walk the streets fairly safe from attack, that I have "rights" like voting, free speech, and so on. It's great while the party lasts.

But I do not take any of this for granted. We must stay aware of the underlying reality – that all of this is based in quicksand, that society is fragile and that any city is just three meals away from anarchy. To this day, we shouldn't be asking the question—"why do people act selfishly?" We should be asking: "why don't they?"

The classic disconnect is when feminists demand that society should "teach men not to rape" rather than "teaching women not to be raped."

Yes, its a noble idea, but you can only take it so far. They truly seem to believe that violence—which, at its core, is obviously a completely natural, instinctive behavior, needs to be "taught".

I have been the victim of assault. I have been punched in the face. I have had a knife pulled on me. On that occasion I didn't turn around and scream "How dare you threaten me! We should teach people not to stab, rather than victims to avoid being stabbed!"

No—I looked at it, managed to blurt out "That's not a knife mate!" and ran the fuck away.

I sincerely wish we lived in a world where a woman's odds of being raped are zero regardless of what she does, where she goes, and how she dresses. But do you really think we live in that kind of world, at least yet?

If you want to prevent rape, you must use the same carrot and stick methods you use everywhere else.

The stick is the law. Ensure procedures are in place to catch and jail rapists. Encourage victims to go to the police, but ensure they are only prosecuted with evidence. Never lie about rapes, thus reducing the credibility of victims everywhere. Feel free to shame actual rapists, but not on a mere accusation.

The carrot is ensuring that men have options to, as a feminist might put it, "express their sexuality." Don't shame them for seeking wives overseas. Teach young men the realities of modern dating, rather than keeping them in the dark and ostracizing them for being “creepy” then wondering why they inflict violence on themselves and others later on.

All of our so-called “rights” are mere privileges of the unprecedented golden age we are currently living in. Hopefully, this is an age that will never end. If all goes to plan, within a few centuries we’ll be out amongst the stars, having eliminated poverty, cured all disease (perhaps even the aging process) and used technology to advance us as a species. Who knows—maybe altruism can be instilled by genetics?

Aside from screwing around with the genes of the human species, however, we still remain smart monkeys, always fighting against our violent, selfish instincts, and not always successfully.

You have rights so long as the police are just a phone call away. Otherwise, the law of the jungle returns.

Read More: Ancient Sparta Showed That Women’s Rights Are A Function Of The Economy

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Two Movies That Showcase The Invisible Caring Father

January 22, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

No matter how loudly feminazis shout their gay propaganda from the rooftops, genders will never be interchangeable. Men and women will always have inherent biological imperatives which are diametrically opposite. A man desires to get a woman's body without expending any resources. A woman, on the other hand, dreams of securing resources from a man without having to stoop down to actually having sex with him.

Neither of these is inherently good or bad, it simply is. When romantic relationships are pursued with full realization of these biological imperatives, the hurt, pain and disappointment disappear and you will actually start to enjoy the emotional tug of war with females. On the other hand, when they are sugarcoated with abstract concepts such as "love" or "loyalty" is when the problems begin.

Historical context of marriage

Now kiss!

Traditional marriage was an institution where male and female biological imperatives could find an equilibrium. The husband would commit his resources to the marriage, creating an environment of material prosperity. The wife would commit her body to the marriage and provide her husband with ample sex and children. The result were two satisfied adults and the most stable environment for raising children.

This kind of marriage actually required a set of conservative religious values to thrive. It sounds butthurt, but it's true—as soon as liberal values were accepted as the norm, the full power of female greed became apparent. In short, women no longer had to commit to anything and were given total custody over their bodies, children, and the husbands' wallets.

Of course, to maintain such injustice, a massive amount of deception has to be used on a constant basis, and the mainstream media were more than happy to oblige. Wives are without exception portrayed as innocent victims, no matter what happens. On the other hand, good and caring fathers are invisible as long as they dutifully provide. Only when they lash out or dare to show any backbone does the lynching, shaming, and vicious persecution begin.

Not only were male virtues ignored, but they were transplanted and presented as inherent female characteristics. What else do you think the phrase "women can have it all" means?

But at what cost?

While Hollywood usually serves as a Disney propaganda machine, brainwashing the youth with romantic fairy tales that ignore their biological imperatives, a movie will occasionally slip through the cracks and offer a glimpse into the true workings of modern marriage and divorce rape. These movies from ages past can serve as a great reference point and pinpoint exactly when the radical feminist propaganda took hold in the US.

The two most notable movies in this category are Mrs. Doubtfire and Falling Down, both released in 1993, which is surely just a coincidence. Both had the same budget, $25 million, but the former earned 18 times that amount, while the latter didn't even manage to double it. The discrepancy is most likely due to how sappy Mrs. Doubtfire is and the fact that the general audience prefers such delusions to the raw reality presented in Falling Down

Mrs. Doubtfire

Mrs. Doubtfire starts with Daniel Hillard, a freshly unemployed voice actor, throwing a birthday party for his son, Chris. His high-earning wife, Miranda, comes home and pulls the plug on the party.

Literally pulls the plug

Then she gives him the “I can’t do this anymore” speech in front of the children and asks for divorce. It makes sense, since he can’t provide any resources, so what good is he anyways? The court proceedings follow and Miranda is summarily awarded full custody over children. This scene, where Daniel pleads the judge for more than one day per week with his children is just gut-wrenching. And it’s just 15 minutes into the movie.

Daniel then gets the idea of getting back into the lives of his children by pretending to be a Scottish centenarian housekeeper named “Euphegenia Doubtfire.” He gets the job and has the chance to finally instill some conservative values in his kids. This is followed by zany events, the kids learning about Euphegenia’s true identity and the grand reveal at the end.

Though Mrs. Doubtfire ends with an obligatory happy ending, the points it makes remain poignant. No other movie manages to display father’s love towards his children and the infinite sacrifices he is willing to make just to stay in their lives with such acute precision.

How many of you would be willing to wear drag?

Pay attention to everything “Euphegenia” says to Miranda and you will have an idea how the enforcing of marital norms used to work and how older women used to keep younger women in check.

Falling Down

Right from the establishing shot, you can see that Falling Down is not going to end well. The movie starts with the freshly divorced William Foster stuck in a rush hour, trying to get in time to his daughter’s birthday. Unfortunately, everything conspires against William: the line won’t move, the heat is unbearable, his car window won’t open and there’s this fly that keeps buzzing around.

William just walks away from his car and tries to get some change for a phone call. That’s when shit hits the fan and things just go downhill from there.

Ready for shooting lessons

People keep dying around William but he goes through it all with a detached attitude. Nothing really matters to him anymore and he just wants to see his kid. Of course, the ex-wife, Beth, is less than pleased with his decision and calls the cops. One of them takes her statement and then we find out William doesn't drink, doesn't do drugs, isn't violent but she still asked for a restraining order and the judge happily obliged. Why? So William can be made an example of, which is eerily similar to how easily real courts issue orders that can ruin a man's life in an instant.

Read Next: You've Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Why Michel Houellebecq's "Submission" Is The Most Important Novel Of 2015

January 22, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In the horrific aftermath of the recent atrocities at the offices of Charlie Hebdo, the news –unbeknown to all but the magazine's sixty-thousand subscribers – that Michel Houellebecq was on the cover of the current issue quickly spread around the world.

To those who have followed Houellebecq's writing career (he is France's foremost contemporary novelist by some distance) this was hardly a surprise. After all, Houellebecq is a man who once described Islam as "the stupidest religion" in an interview and was sued by a civil rights group for hate speech (he won on grounds of freedom of speech) and whose book Platform contains the following lines:

> Every time I heard that a Palestinian terrorist, or a Palestinian child or a pregnant Palestinian woman, had been gunned down in the Gaza Strip, I felt a quiver of enthusiasm at the thought of one less Muslim.

Nevertheless, there was perhaps some slight surprise that the old provocateur had done it again. Now aged 56, Houellebecq had finally seemed to mellow with his last book The Map and the Territory, which won the Prix Goncourt in 2010, France's top literary award. Houellebecq, it seemed, had at last been admitted into the fold of respectability.

But then given that his new novel Soumission (Submission in English) imagines a France in the near future led by a Muslim president and subject to Sharia Law, such surprise was misplaced.

Houellebecq and Charlie Hebdo

There was some speculation at the time that the Houellebecq cover had proved an irritant sufficient to motivate the Paris killings. Of course, this proved to be unfounded – after all, the Kouachi brothers had planned their attack for some time, and wouldn't have known the subject matter of upcoming issues.

Although publication of the book in France wasn't cancelled, as some thought it might be, nevertheless Houellebecq cancelled all promotion for it and went underground. His friend Bernard Maris, economist and Charlie Hebdo contributor, had been among those killed. When he resurfaced some days later, shaken, his first words were "Je Suis Charlie."

Reading Houellebecq's past comments and hearing Submission's synopsis it would be forgivable to assume that he is a rabid Islamophobe whose thinking lacks all subtlety—an ignorant rabble-rouser. But nothing could be further from the truth. Here's Adam Gopnik of the New Yorker in a recent article on his work:

> The other striking thing about Houellebecq is how literary he is—the first hundred or so pages of "Submission" depend on a complicated analysis of the work of the nineteenth-century writer J. K. Huysmans, best known as a novelist of Decadence and the Church, and for his influence on other French writers. This is, at least, an inadvertent compliment to the continued literary culture of France: no American satiric novelist, not Tom Wolfe or Christopher Buckley, could hope to hold a mass audience with hundreds of pages on the follies typically encountered in the university study of Hart Crane, or on how best to conceptualize his relationship with Wallace Stevens.

In fact, Houellebecq is a literary artist of the highest order – he is a satirist in the grand tradition of Orwell and Huxley, taking current social trends and extrapolating them, then looking with horror at what we have become, and what we could become in the near future.

Sexual Marketplace

Heartiste recently tweeted that while Houellebecq is currently having his historical "moment," what he should really be remembered for is his analysis of the sexual marketplace. This is from his first novel "Whatever":

> It's a fact, I mused to myself, that in societies like ours sex truly represents a second system of differentiation, completely independent of money; and as a system of differentiation it functions just as mercilessly. The effects of these two systems are, furthermore, strictly equivalent. Just like unrestrained economic liberalism, and for similar reasons, sexual liberalism produces phenomena of absolute pauperization. Some men make love every day; others five or six times in their life, or never. Some make love with dozens of women, others with none. It's what's known as " the law of the market". In an economic system where unfair dismissal is prohibited, every person more or less manages to find their > place. In a sexual system where adultery is prohibited, every person more or less manages to find their bed mate. In a totally liberal economic system certain people accumulate considerable fortunes; others stagnate in unemployment and misery. In a totally liberal sexual system certain people have a varied and exciting erotic life; others are reduced to masturbation and solitude……

>
> Love as a kind of innocence and as a capacity for illusion, as an aptitude for epitomizing the whole of the other sex in a single loved being rarely resists a year of sexual immorality, and never two. In reality the successive sexual experiences accumulated during adolescence undermine and rapidly destroy all possibility of projection of an emotional and romantic sort; progressively, and in fact extremely quickly, one becomes as capable of love as an old slag.

Houellebecq, who began his creative life as a poet, is behind the humour a deeply sad writer whose work accurately pinpoints the deep inadequacies in contemporary society. He also neatly skewers the concerns of the manosphere in elegant but devastating aphorisms such as the following, from The Possibility of an Island:

> Show men endless images of beautiful models and actresses and singers, show them endless images of beautiful, slim, women engaging in sex with enthusiasm, tell them that a world of uncommitted and marriageless sex is the norm — then, for reasons they don't understand, slam the door in their face.This is not a prescription for long term stability.

Houellebecq looking well, yesterday.

The charge laid against Submission is of course that it is Islamophobic. But is it? An English translation won't be available until late summer, but early indications suggest that it is not. Gopnik again:

> The spectre of an Islamic re-reconquest is therefore mixed with admiration for its discipline and purpose. The Muslim warriors are taken to be antimaterialists inspired by an austere ideal—the very idea of submission to authority that we have lost. In the back-and-forth of fantasies of conquest and submission between panicked Catholics and renascent Muslims, Islam plays an ambiguous role, as both the feared besieger and the admirable Other.

The novel, set in 2022, concerns a middle-aged protagonist called Francois, an academic who is obsessed equally with the work of J.K. Huysmans and sex with young co-eds. When a deal between the left and a popular Muslim party is brokered to prevent the far right from coming to power, the coalition wins the election.

They agree that the socialists will look after finance and foreign affairs, while the Muslims will handle education and social issue. This leads quickly to the introduction of Sharia Law: women are required to wear modest clothes in public, schools are segregated by gender, with girls taught cooking and trained to be wives and mothers, very limited opportunities for higher education. Regular prayer and study of the Koran are also implemented. Polygamy becomes the norm. Left with little choice by the new state, Francois converts to Islam.

Islamophobic

Where many were expecting an excoriating, dystopian account of life under the harsh new regime, it would appear that in fact society stabilizes and things get better in France. With feminism reigned in, traditional values re-established and polygamy encouraged, Francois, it would appear, rather enjoys the new state of affairs.

Far from being Islamophobic, the implication of the novel seems to be that debased western society with its deeply-flawed sexual marketplace would actually be improved by aspects of the faith's prescripts. It is clear from an interview that Houellebecq recently gave to the Paris Review that his attitudes to Islam have shifted in recent times:

> The Koran turns out to be much better than I thought, now that I've reread it—or rather, read it. The most obvious conclusion is that the jihadists are bad Muslims. Obviously, as with all religious texts, there is room for interpretation, but an honest reading will conclude that a holy war of aggression is not generally sanctioned, prayer alone is valid. So you might say I've changed my opinion. That's why I don't feel that I'm writing out of fear [of assimilation into Islam]. I feel, rather, that we can make arrangements. The feminists will not be able to, if we're being completely honest. But I and lots of other people will.

But this is not a book that will please everyone:

> We haven't spoken much about women. Once again you will attract criticism on that front.

> Certainly a feminist is not likely to love this book. But I can't do anything about that.

The English edition is slated for release in September — without a doubt it will be the most significant fiction release of 2015, both for its commentary on Islam and feminism. I for one can't wait.

To find out how to operate efficiently in the sexual marketplace and meet beautiful women click here

Read More: What "Public Enemies" Taught Me About Pack Mentality

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

10 Tips To Get Shredded Fast

January 22, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by John Doe Bodybuilding

1. Don’t cut calories too far under maintenance

Obviously there needs to be caloric deficit in order to lose bodyfat, but too many people are dropping down way too low. What does this mean? It means you become a smaller version of what you were before, but you don’t recomposition yourself like you should. You need to have an idea of what your maintenance level calorie intake is, then start eating about 500-800 calories a day below that.

2. Cardio is good, but living on a treadmill is not!

I used to do cardio sessions at 2 hours per day sometimes. When I was competing in bodybuilding in the early 2000’s I thought that the more cardio I performed, the better I’d look. I was wrong, and eventually what happened was I put my body into too much of a catabolic state and the opposite of what I wanted to happen started happening. I stopped getting as hungry, I stayed depleted with no energy, and I looked flat. When I finally got smart and decided to do cardio at no more than 3x per week for 30 minutes a session, I started getting better results.

3. Carb manipulation is critical!

Some people respond great to low carb diets while others do not. But one thing is for certain; go too long with no carbs and your body will lose muscle volume. I don't care how much protein you eat, when you take away the carbs for too long you will go flat and may find yourself having difficulty doing simple day to day tasks, like driving your car and not killing yourself.

The brain relies on glycogen stores to function properly, and I have yet to ever meet a bodybuilding competitor who was carb depleted and didn't act like a zombie.The carbs are what shuttles the nutrients to the muscle and hydrates the muscle. CARBO-HYDRATE, HYDRATE being the key word here. Since the muscle is made up of 75% water, it only makes sense not to take this away. Manipulate your carbs but do not totally eliminate them.

4. Give yourself enough time to get in shape

Take a look around at pretty much any diet or training routine. They all take around 90 days. Everything from before and after photos, P90X, beach body, or a typical bodybuilder's competition prep; they all take around 3 months!! It's just time, you have to understand that this is the time frame it takes to lose the bodyfat while retaining the muscle. When I say "Get in shape fast" I'm not talking about two weeks here. But if you diet properly and eat strict then yes, you can look like a different person in a few months.

5. Take your fat burners before bed

Now, this isn't the healthiest thing to be doing here, but this is a tip that works well if you're trying to bust off that last little bit of bodyfat. I'm talking about someone who is already in single digit bodyfat who just wants to lose that last tiny bit for a contest or photo shoot. I have found that taking a fat burner such as clenbuterol or ephedrine right before bedtime seemed to kick my thermogenesis into overdrive during sleep.

Amping up your metabolism and core temperature in a fasted state can shred bodyfat very quickly. I do not suggest this at any other time other than the very end of a diet when you're already very lean. But you need to do it right before your head hits the pillow. You'll be asleep by the time the fat burner starts taking effect.

6. Keep your testosterone on the lower side

For guys who take testosterone, you want to keep your testosterone at enough of a dosage to stay anabolic, but not high enough to cause bloating. It took me a long time to figure this one out, but it took my physique to a far better look when I did. The very best I ever looked was when I was only using 300mg/wk of fast acting testosterone.

Testosterone can be a nasty compound when taken too high. The effect it has on your skin is terrible and you're constantly fighting water weight. Even testosterone propionate which is faster acting can cause SOME water retention. Then it becomes more of a guessing game of how much aromatase inhibitor to use, how much more cardio to perform, and at what point to drop your testosterone to lose the water weight.

7. Eat a grapefruit before bed

Every so often it's a good idea to throw in a grapefruit before bed. I know what you're thinking now; it's carbs before bed and the natural sugars are still sugar, but the acidity of a grapefruit can sometimes amp up the metabolism. I would sometimes feel even hot feeling after doing this and that is a good sign it's working!

8. When you stop feeling hungry, it's a sign your metabolism isn't firing!

I hear this time and time again. Someone will be dieting and tell me "It's going great; I don't feel hungry at all!" While initially this can be a good thing, sooner or later it's a tell-tale sign that your metabolism isn't working as fast as it could be. You want to be hungry when you're dieting because it's a sign that it's working!!

Whatever diet you choose, you want to be hungry between meals and upon waking. Most people who want to lose bodyfat will tell me they don't feel hungry at all when they wake up. 90% of my fat loss clients don't eat breakfast when we start. They tell me they don't feel hungry at all in the morning and they eat very few meals during the day. When you're dieting your metabolism can come to a halt if you aren't doing something right. Most commonly this is going too long without SOME carbs.

9. As you get leaner, lower your volume

It's very normal to think that as you get leaner you need to increase training volume and frequency to push the envelope even further. But this is usually not the case!! When you are in single digit bodyfat you're more vulnerable to injury, you are in no doubt already in a state of overtraining, and more isn't always better in this case. You may find that backing off is what keeps you looking fuller and more muscular and not looking flat and catabolic.

Let's say you're already in single digit bodyfat. At this point your diet is solely what is going to bring you to your ultimate goal. There isn't much more you can do in the way of cardio and weight training that is going to get you in any better condition, and more so than not, it's detrimental to your look.

10. Try to get adequate rest

I have never done a strict diet for a few months without eventually getting worse sleep quality. It's just hard to go to bed when you're THAT HUNGRY. When this happens, you may just need to adjust your meals so you have a carb meal later in the day. I have gotten extremely shredded while still eating a cup of oats at night.

Remember that most of the body's fat loss processes chemically take place during sleep. When you start cutting your hours and quality of sleep down, it can make it harder to burn fat. You may find it more beneficial to drop a carb meal at some point during the day and replace it in the evening. The whole "no carbs before bedtime" isn't always true. If you're in a state of caloric deprivation then you're in a state of caloric deprivation. You will still get leaner so if you need to manipulate something in order to get some decent sleep then try a carb meal at night.

– John Doe – johndoebodybuilding.com!!!

Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Tango Is Sexist, Patriarchal, And A Perfect Complement To Your Game

January 22, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

I was at my tango class one evening, a hobby I've recently started. The only other person was a new girl—we'll call her Therese. Therese claimed that she had recently moved to the area and was taking a year off of school before starting college. You could tell she was a virgin just by looking at her. Modestly dressed and drenching in timidity. She was cute in that library nerd kind of way, as though she had been ignored all through high school.

LASIK surgery could produce a romcom scenario where she's a different person as soon as she takes off her glasses. The kind of girl that the most ruthless Casanova would feel guilty to fornicate with. This is the part of the country that occasionally still produces this kind of girl, despite the high teen pregnancy rate. And even though Therese had no work or education accomplishments to speak of, her fragility triggered a primal instinct in me, and I found myself very attracted.

If we taught every person to tango, feminism would end in a generation

I am not a physically large person in any definition of the word, but I know how to command a physical presence when dancing. For her part, Therese was so tiny that she would have tipped over had I yawned in her direction. When we began the dance, I held her with a firm but gentle weight, non-verbally letting her know that I was in complete control. She could not have stepped away if she wanted to.

This is the nature of the tango. The man controls everything without saying a word, and the woman is to naturally follow his cues hardly thinking about it. And in the woman doing exactly as the man communicates and nothing more, the two become one. You can feel a major difference between ballroom dancing with a feminist and ballroom dancing with a shy girl, even if the feminist doesn't reflexively back-lead her own turns (which she will).

The tango is such a dance of seduction that the instructor described it as "a stalking dance." Likely Therese watches Dancing With The Stars like every other female in America and wanted to try it herself. Maybe she would meet her own olive-skinned man to make her Disney fantasies come true.

Learning tango and general ballroom dance is one of the best things you can do to improve your game. Other nights I had invited several of my male law school friends to take the class with me, and they all dismissed it by saying, "I don't dance." This is code for "I'm lazy, boring, and insecure. I assume I will eventually have the love of a woman by virtue of merely wanting it." I myself have no rhythm or coordination, but I don't allow myself to make excuses when it comes to increasing my sexual marketplace value.

A brief lesson in game

Spend $30 on two or three tango classes. Buy a cheap Willem Haenraets painting of the tango. Mine was $20 from Burlington Coat Factory, and it looks like a real painting instead of a print. Invite a girl over for dinner (since women like a man who can do everything they can do better). While it's cooking, make sure she notices the painting. Tell her, "The tango is such a beautiful dance. Do you know how?… Oh, you don't? Well then, let me teach you." Then you've won, and you will have power over her like Charles Manson.

You can be terrible at the tango, and she won't notice. Or if she does notice, she won't care, because you've set yourself apart from every other man she will ever meet. All you need to know is the most basic moves. That first promenade or corte is when she'll fall in love.

Ballroom dancing is one of the easiest and most efficient ways to make a date want to drop her panties. Add in basic rumba, waltz, swing, and cha-cha, and you can have the notch count of King Solomon. All women have a Disney princess fantasy about going to the ball. All women want to have sex on prom night. I say appease the women and give them what they want.

The tango is considered a harder dance to learn, so it is best to go to an instructor for a few weeks. There are plenty of videos online, but you do not get the benefit on an angry Russian woman berating you for your every move. The other four dances can easily be picked up online, especially since much of the posture and movement from tango is applied.

Still, there are definite differences, and a few classes at a studio go a long way for any of the dances. Plus, it helps to have someone to practice on. Class lessons are often inexpensive since the market is so small.

My other favorite is rumba, but waltz, swing, and cha-cha are good catch-all dances to know. Tango makes a woman feel seduced, rumba makes her feel sensual, and waltz makes her feel beautiful. Swing and cha-cha can be used for about any fast-paced music, and you'll be the only one in the club who looks like he knows what he's doing. With both of them, you can easily give a woman a 10-second crash course as the opportunity arises.

Ballroom music can be hard to find. However, they tend to be very inexpensive. iTunes has a series called Strictly Ballroom that is very traditional. Amazon has a compilation called Latin Lounge Café (Smooth and Relaxing Bossa Lounge) that is more informal, although it would be better suited for rumba or sex. Putumayo nearly always produces top notch work, but they will bleed your wallet for the quality.

Final thoughts: the loss of culture

One thing that I have been thinking about through all this is the loss of a formal culture. I have always said that you can tell more about a civilization by its entertainment than by what its social scientists say. The popularity of Dancing With The Stars among women says something about our culture.

Little girls love to play make-believe about going to the ball dressed as a pretty pretty princess, yet as adults we have no such thing beyond high school prom, which of course is all bad music and talentless dancing. Daddy's Little Lady grows up to grind in the club instead of learning to waltz at the Hilton.

Why do we not have formal dances anymore? It is concerning that little girls and grown women fantasize about something simple that used to be common reality. Balls used to be a wonderful way to game women, so both sexes would have something to gain by it. Plus, they just look like fun. There are still many makeshift ballroom dancing groups in the country, but they are a terrible place to meet women under age 80. I suppose that women aren't going to learn to dance by their own volition. They need men to initiate.

Oh, and the ending to the story with Therese? I got caught in a conversation with the instructor while she left, she never came back for another lesson, and I was unable to track her down on Facebook. But I thought it was a good picture to show how a man is to dance instead of merely explain, as well as to show a contrast between the modern woman and the parochial woman.

Note: The above refers only to the American tango. There is also an Argentine tango with very different music and dance steps. The rumba also has minor variants based on location, but make sure you learn the one that uses the box step. The garden-variety ballroom waltz is very standard, but there are wide variations across the world which you can incorporate. The swing you should learn first is East Coast, as this is the most common and is fairly simple.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Every Man Needs Partner Dancing

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Anything Women Can Do, Men Can Do Better

January 23, 2015 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

And that gentlemen, was one of the most famous scenes from the 1950 musical-comedy film "Annie Get Your Gun," which was loosely based on the life of a female sharpshooter named Annie Oakley. If you did not watch the video, go back and watch at least the first 30 seconds to grasp the whimsical correlation with the article title and ensuing subject matter.

Observe how the films primary matriarch, the feisty Annie Oakley, would undoubtedly have been considered a role model for the "strong independent woman" archetype. Also take into consideration that this is several decades before the concept (disease) of feminism spread far and wide across western civilization.

I mean just listen to this monster. She is absolutely brimming with "hear me roar" man-hating diatribe with her whole "anything you can do, I can do better" shtick.

The fact that all western women under the age of 45 have been brainwashed into believing their abilities and potential are "just as good as any man" is one of the most laughable blue pill campaigns which has ever been conjured up by the coven of feminist witches. We damn well know that men can (and will) outperform women in anything they put their time, effort, training, heart, and soul into.

The greatest imaginable results that a particular field could ever bear witness, will always carry the Y (male) chromosome. It may interest you to know that the Y chromosome is one of the fastest evolving parts of the human genome, which partially explains why men just keep getting better and better at what they do over time.

You know on second thought, I take that back. There is certainly one thing that Annie Oakley does better than the cool, calm, and collected Frank Butler in "Annie Get Your Gun," and that is piercing his ear drums like an out of control fire alarm with her incessant yapping. She needs to learn how to lean back and quit being so bossy.

Strategy and Intellect

A straightforward definition of strategy is "a high level plan to achieve one or more goals under conditions of uncertainty," while the definition of intellect is "the ability of the mind to come to correct conclusions about what is true or real, and about how to solve problems."

I can think of few other social activities which combine strategy and intellect better, and more accessibly, than the game of chess. After all, in this game there are 809,896 possible positions or 4,897,256 total positions which are available after only five moves.

Sure, there is no doubt that women can have a sharp intellect and be very competitive chess players. But among the global elites in this grandest of strategy games and intellectual hobbies, women comparatively suck at it.

The January 2014 World Chess Federation rating list featured a total of 1444 grandmasters, in which only 31 were female. In other words, of the world's top chess players, women were outgunned by their male counterparts at a devastating ratio of nearly 47 to 1. Furthermore, of all the top 100 chess grandmasters in the world as of April 2014 (the best-of-the-best-of-the-best), essentially none of them were women.

A young woman trying to psyche out a male opponent with playful sexual overtures

Ultimately, Chess is a game which boils down to the concept of logic, and discrepancies in logical capacity are among the biggest things that separate males and females. Women more often (attempt to) figure things out with their emotions, while men routinely use foresight and intellectual introspection to figure out problems and emerge with the most beneficial result with the conditions at hand.

Arts and Crafts

Anyone here ever been to the Louvre museum in Paris? That beautiful palace which got turned into arguably the world's preeminent showcase of sculptures and fine art? Can you take a guess as to what percentage of all those masterpieces came from the hands of females? Sweet bugger all, that's what.

Or how about any of those "100 greatest guitarists, bassists, or drummers of all time" lists which float around the internet? Not a female among them.

And now, thanks in part to pervasive smartphone addiction among young females, men are just flat-out better home cooks and chefs in the 21st century. Take for instance, the legendary Gordon Ramsay. Wealthiest of all celebrity chefs, he expects nothing less than perfection and will outperform all females in the culinary arts.

Nigella Lawson on the other hand, simply cannot compete with her fellow British nationals Jamie Oliver or Gordon Ramsay for top celebrity chef honors. But that's alright. The inadvertently hilarious "queen of food porn" can just go on and splatter salty cream around all she wants.

Strength and Athletic Ability

Women are physically weaker and less athletic than men, and therefore exhibit completely inferior performances when compared to their male counterparts in the exact same sporting or athletic discipline. By design, this also makes women second-rate police officers, crowd controllers, security guards, and (coming soon) front-line soldiers when compared to all their male colleagues who are of a similar fitness level.

Sorry "G.I. Jane," that's just how the cruelty of nature decided to play its hand in natural selection. Women who continue to deny these facts are just going to have to get over it at some stage, swallow the red pill, and accept their less-than-stellar biological attributes that no amount of 3rd wave feminist "empowerment" is going to counterbalance.

Need some written proof?

100m Dash World Record

9.58 s – Usain Bolt (Men's)

10.49 s – Florence Griffith Joyner (Women's)

High Jump World Record

2.45 m – Javier Sotomayor (Men's)

2.09 m – Stefka Kostadinova (Women's)

Hammer Throw World Record

86.74 m – Yuriy Sedykh (Men's)

79.58 m – Anita Wlodarczyk (Women's)

Or how about visual?

Many of you may be familiar with the "People Are Awesome" series of videos, which showcases people doing (you guessed it) awesome things. However, the usage of the gender-neutral term "people" gives women far more credit than what they deserve from these video clips.

Men are completely outclassing women in all of these videos with their amazing, ballsy, death-defying, or superman-like athletic prowess. Sorry, but two examples of women who can "work dat pole" (0:46) or jump rope off their rear end (2:27) just cannot compare with the truly awesome stuff that a lot of these men are doing.

There is no doubt about it. Men's bodies are biologically built to get things done faster, harder, stronger, and with much greater levels of endurance, stamina, and acrobatic trickery to compliment those strengths. Moving on…

Science and Technology

Last, but certainly not least, we have science and technology. This one doesn't even need to go into much detail because it's pretty much an absolute whitewash. Men have utterly dominated women in every facet of creating, discovering, and fine-tuning amazing things which have elevated our societies above stone age mediocrity.

We owe all of humanity's greatest accomplishments to brilliant men such as Leonardo da Vinci (Renaissance man), Werner von Braun (rocket man), Thomas Edison (lightbulb and movie camera), Nicola Tesla (electricity supply), Alexander Fleming (penicillin), Ernest Rutherford (splitting the atom), Karl Benz (automobile), the Wright Brothers (flight), and Louis Pasteur (vaccination and Pasteurization) among countless others.

I challenge you to name a female scientist besides Rosalind Franklin, Grace Hopper, Jane Goodall, or Marie Curie. Could the other women, living or dead, who made any major invention or scientific discovery in the history of mankind please let themselves be known?

Anyways, while the crickets keep chirping and the naysayers try and come up with some nonexistent inventions from women, let's turn back the clock and revisit the late 1960's and very early 1970's.

The History of Delusion

This era was the pinnacle of the United States of America on the world stage, both in terms of our quality of life and the technological capacity and accomplishments of our nation (relative to the rest of the world at the time). Specifically, the Apollo program and the moon landings have been called the greatest technological achievement in the history of mankind.

This was accomplished before second-wave feminism and Helen Reddy's "I Am Woman" started to destroy the social fabric of western society starting around 1972. This was before the Southern Poverty Law Center started to infect the land in 1971.

This was before female-dominated human resource departments, where 24-year-old airhead girls get to dictate which type of men are worthy enough to be granted a living (and therefore the ability to have a home, get dates, have sex, and raise a family).

This was back when that awful straight white male patriarchy was allowed to go about work and life completely unmolested by feminism and political correctness.

They were allowed to have an all white male NASA and selection of Apollo astronauts if need be. Not out of overt racism or sexism, but because those men truly represented those who had the best qualifications, skills, and expertise to get the job done.

And it worked. Centuries of (mostly) white males tinkering with the scientific method and becoming masters of the manipulation of mathematics, biology, physics, chemistry, metallurgy, electricity and circuitry, safely launched men to the first celestial body beyond planet Earth.

So queue the emotional waterworks music and liftoff! (Look at the "haaaappy" wives!)

> "It was the toil of men—that of our fathers and grandfathers—that built the industry, the railways, the water and sewage systems that lifted millions, if not billions, out of subsistence level poverty. It is typically the male sex that is willing to shoulder the risk and endure the suffering necessary to push back human boundaries for the benefit of others. It is typically the male left-brain psyche that is the inventive one, the one to gaze at the heavens and to have the inclination to go there."

Final Remarks

> They are sexus sequior, the inferior second sex in every respect: one should be indulgent toward their weaknesses, but to pay them honour is ridiculous beyond measure and demeans us even in their eyes. – Arthur Schopenhauer (excerpt from "On Women")

So there you have it. In the battle of the sexes, MEN RULE. Case closed. But unfortunately, women (and their white knight manginas) will be oh-so butt hurt by these red pill revelations, they will inevitably make repeated attempts to try and refute them. Prepare for the (possible) onslaught.

Read More: All Women Are Disloyal

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

Lessons From PUA Ovid: The Original Latin Lover

January 23, 2015 | by Peter Burns | Link | Original Link

There was once a man who grew up in the big, dusty, congested capital city of the most powerful country in the world. As a young man he rebelled against the cookie-cutter life that society expected him to have and turned to other pursuits. Instead he began writing as a way to support himself and spent the rest of his time hunting for girls.

Some of his written works included playful criticisms of society, which did not go down well with certain people and earned him many haters. This man ended up moving to a city on the Black Sea coast, where he would continue on writing and chasing women.

You are probably thinking that you know this story already. Sounds like something very familiar, a very modern tale that you have encountered before. I bet, though, that you did not have the same person in mind as I did when you were reading the previous paragraph. For you see, this story is not something that is happening now, or something that happened recently. This story is in fact, two thousand years old!

Enter Ovid

The man I am talking about is Ovid, an Ancient Roman poet, who grew up in Rome and was exiled to Tomis. This city is now the modern Constanta in Romania, but at the time it was a small provincial town at the edge of the Roman world. Ovid created arguably the greatest manual on how to pick up and seduce women and his advice is as pertinent today as it was thousands of years ago. The themes he writes about and the tips he gives can tell us a lot about the nature of women and what a man should do to get them.

Ovid wrote the “Ars Amatoria,” a three book manual on how to pick up chicks. Well, actually only two of those books deal with picking up chicks, since the third one is meant as a way to give tips to chicks on how to pick up guys (although it can be argued that the third book is more of a parody than a real book on tips).

The “Ars Amatoria” proved so successful that he even had to write a sequel, the “Remedia Amoris,” or cure for love, meant to give tips to guys on how to get over their oneitis and fall out of love.

These books were a huge hit, but also made him many enemies, and were probably one of the reasons why Emperor Augustus banished him from Rome and sent him to live in Tomis, a desolate frontier town on the Black Sea coast.

Ovid’s Life

However, let’s go back a bit and talk more about the background of this man and what made him become one of the greatest characters of Roman history. Ovid was born in a town east of Rome in 43 BC. His family was very important and rich and so he got a classic education focused on rhetoric. He was destined to become a lawyer and a public official. However, as a young man, he rebelled against this life of boredom and turned to poetry instead.

His works included the “Amores,” a series of poems on love, as well as the “Metamorphoses,” arguably his most remarkable and challenging work, one in which he described various Greek and Roman myths and legends.

Yet Ovid was also a player, and spent much of his days chasing after women of all ages and backgrounds, single or married. Before he turned 30, he managed to get married three times!

He wrote the “Ars Amatoria” at around 2 AD, when Emperor Augustus was at the helm of the Roman Empire and a few years after a set of conservative laws on family, monogamous marriage, and against adultery had been passed. The “Ars Amatoria,” written in a fun and playful way, could also be interpreted as a hidden critique of this conservative and uptight order. After all, a large part of the book is about adultery and how to sleep with girls outside of marriage, as well as how to seduce married women.

Ovid was banished to Tomis a few years after writing this book, his crime being “a poem and a mistake.” The poem was most likely the “Ars Amatoria” and the mistake might have been involvement in some sort of a conspiracy against Emperor Augustus, as several people were exiled at the same time.

Ovid would spend the rest of his life in Tomis, even learning the local languages, Getic and Scythian. He longed for a return to Rome, but a pardon was never granted. He died in 17 or 18 AD, a decade after he was sent into exile.

Practical Tips On How To Pick Up Girls

There are many tips and I suggest you read the books, but let’s give a small sampling. Not only does he give tips on attraction, comfort and seduction, but he also gives tips on how to AMOG other guys, grooming, spots where to hunt, as well as a very good description of the nature of women.

A very important part is the mindset. Ovid says that all women want to be won over. They all want some guy to come and sweep them off their feet. Why not you?

> “First of all, be quite sure that there isn’t a woman who cannot be won, and make up your mind that you will win her.“

Another important tip on mindset is that you need to act in order to get women. You cannot sit on your ass and hope they will come to you:

> “She’s not going to be wafted down to you from heaven on the wings of the wind. You must use your own-eyes to discover the girl that suits you.“

He wasn’t very big on moving abroad to chase women. Sure, there were plenty of hot girls everywhere, but you need to look around and see that there are plenty of hot girls where you live too:

> “You won’t have to put to sea in order to do that, or to undertake any distant journeys. Perseus may bring home his Andromeda from sun-scorched India, and the Phrygian swain may go to Greece to bear away his bride; Rome alone will give you a choice of such lovely women, and so many of them, that you will be forced to confess that she gathers within her own bosom all the treasures that the world can show. “

Ovid was the king of the indirect approach and describes several of his sneaky openers. For example, this is what you should do, if you are at the stadium:

> “You must think of some means of starting the conversation. Begin by saying the sort of thing people generally do say on such occasions. Some horses are seen entering the stadium; ask her the name of their owner; and whoever she favors, > you should follow suit. And when the solemn procession of the country's gods and goddesses passes along, be sure and give a rousing cheer for Venus, your protectress. If, as not infrequently befalls, a speck of dust lights on your fair one's breast, flick it off with an airy finger; and if there's nothing there, flick it off just the same; anything is good enough to serve as a pretext for paying her attention."

He not only gives tips on how to seduce women, but also includes many observations on the female nature. Even back in the day, many women were goldiggers:

> "Even a barbarian, if only he is rich, is sure to find favor. This is the golden age for this very truth. Gold will buy the highest honors; and gold will purchase love. Homer himself, even if he came attended by the nine Muses, would promptly be shown the door if he brought no money to recommend him."

Through the use of examples from myths and legends, Ovid also gives a few warnings. Actually false rape accusations were a big part of Greek and Roman mythology and Ovid mentions this and the need to be careful. One story is the story of Phaedra and Hippolytus, where Phaedra, while married to another man, wants to get it on with Hippolytus, and when he rejects her, she falsely accuses him of rape.

The "Ars Amatoria" is quite red pill. Ovid frequently mentions cases of female promiscuity and how many women are hypergamous. Female nature does not change according to the country or the age. Women of two thousand years ago and from very conservative cultures had the same vices that the women of today have.

However, his message on the nature of women is not all pessimistic. There is a small ray of light at the end of the tunnel. There are those rare women that do have honor and will stand by their man in good times and bad:

> "Now forbear to condemn the whole sex for the crimes of a few of its members; let every woman be judged on her own merits. If the young Alcides had reason to complain of Helen, if his elder brother could with justice accuse Clytemnestra, Helen's sister; if, through the crime of Eriphyle, the daughter of Talaos, Amphiaraus went riding to the under-world on his living steeds, is it not also true that Penelope remained chaste when sundered from her husband who was kept for ten years fighting before Troy and who, when Troy had fallen, wandered over the seas for ten years more? Look at Laodamia, who, in order to join her husband in the grave, died long before her tale of years was told. And Alcestis, who, by sacrificing her own life, redeemed her husband, Admetus, from the tomb."

There is hope after all, but you do need to learn the tools of the trade, if you want to be successful. I recommend that you read Ovid's manual for yourself and apply the lessons in your life. It is a true gem of ancient literature, filled with timeless wisdom.

Read more: Why You Should Learn Latin

Peter Burns

Peter is a world traveller whose interests include fitness, history, gaining weight, learning languages and a wide variety of other things. He runs the Renaissance Man Journal.

Are We Living In A Computer Simulation?

January 23, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article originally appeared on Roosh V.

The strangest thing to ever happen to me took place in Tomsk, a Russian Siberian city. A week into my stay there, I bought a neon orange toothbrush to replace an old toothbrush. Some two weeks later I went to the bathroom to brush my teeth but the toothbrush was gone. It completely disappeared.

Looking for this neon orange toothbrush was the only time in my life that I felt insane. I scoured the bathroom on my hands and knees before extending the search to the entire apartment, even looking in trash cans, drawers, and cabinets. I figured that its disappearance was due to one of the following two reasons:

1. I sleptwalk and threw the toothbrush out the window. This is unlikely since I have no history of sleepwalking and sleep extremely light (so light that the sound of my own snoring wakes me up).

2. The landlord came during the early morning to dispose of the toothbrush, just to fuck with me. The problem with that scenario is that the front door was loud with a dungeon master lock. If I didn't awaken to its opening, I would have when it was closed and locked again.

I stayed in the apartment for a week and the neon orange toothbrush never appeared again. At that time I didn't consider a third explanation of its disappearance: there was a glitch—a bug—in the computer simulation we're living in.

A paper by Oxford philosophy professor Nick Bostrom makes a case for the computer simulation argument. His paper, which I recommend reading, states that one of the following three scenarios must be true:

1. We will go extinct or somehow destroy ourselves before developing the technology or computational power to create simulations with conscious subjects (i.e. become "posthuman").

2. A posthuman civilization that can create a simulation with consciousness will elect not to, perhaps for ethical reasons.

3. We are currently living in a computer simulation, one that has sufficient detail without major bugs that convince us our reality is not an artificial construct.

The first time I heard of simulation theory, I reviewed it just for curiosity's sake, to see how convincing the argument was for us to be living in a sort of Matrix but without the physical pod component. While I'm not fully convinced, the logic presented is sound and I'm open to the small possibility that we're part of a SimUniverse where the big bang was a start button pushed by an advanced species who wanted to learn more about their own creation, or perhaps who just wanted to be entertained. The fact that scientists today are eagerly hoping to simulate consciousness on computers suggest that the idea must be irresistible to advanced species.

My initial objection to believing a simulation is possible is the detail our reality provides. There's no way I can be "fooled" of existence, but nearly every single night I'm fooled by a simulation called dreams, which not only lack rich detail, but are still believed by my mind in spite of having colossal bugs well known to lucid dreamers:

- You can't see your hands
- Light switches don't work
- Clock faces never display

Is it possible that dreams are a simulation of a simulation, and that everything around us is digital data stored on quantum computers so powerful that it would take an entire planet to house them based on current technology?

> If the environment is included in the simulation, this will require additional computing power – how much depends on the scope and granularity of the simulation. Simulating the entire universe down to the quantum level is obviously infeasible, unless radically new physics is discovered. But in order to get a realistic simulation of human experience, much less is needed – only whatever is required to ensure that the simulated humans, interacting in normal human ways with their simulated environment, don't notice any irregularities.

There have been other theories that clash with the neatness of our current model of the world. One states that there are multiple universes operating concurrently, and another, my favorite, states that there has been a great many iterations of the universe, each with its own physical properties that determine its makeup and construction. Maybe we're living in universe number 1,350,372—an advanced "species" of universe that evolved from previous ones like we evolved from previous animals—and when it inevitably collapses upon itself, another big bang will create a new universe with different conditions of physics, chemistry, and life.

How can we ever prove that we're living in a simulation? The biggest indicator, based on probability formulas provided by Bostrom, is if we successfully create such a simulation ourselves. In that case, a posthuman scenario has most certainly occurred in the universe before, allowing there to be a far greater number of simulated organisms than real ones. If we create a posthuman simulation, Las Vegas odds would then heavily favor the fact that we are indeed living in one.

> …we would have to suspect that the posthumans running our simulation are themselves simulated beings; and their creators, in turn, may also be simulated beings.
>
> Reality may thus contain many levels. Even if it is necessary for the hierarchy to bottom out at some stage – the metaphysical status of this claim is somewhat obscure – there may be room for a large number of levels of reality, and the number could be increasing over time. (One consideration that counts against the multi-level hypothesis is that the computational cost for the basement-level simulators would be very great. Simulating even a single posthuman civilization might be prohibitively expensive. If so, then we should expect our simulation to be terminated when we are about to become posthuman.)

One big part of our reality that can't be explained is the double slit experiment, whereby the physics of our universe behaves differently just because we happen to be observing it. Watch the following clip if you are unfamiliar with this famous experiment, whose result has not changed after many replications:

This experiment is conclusive in proving that perception of objective reality can be dependent on the observer, meaning it changes simply because a set of eyes (mechanical sensors) are watching, without any other alteration to the environment. Can't this mystery extend to life as a whole with people instead of electrons? Can things in our own reality change depending on if we're looking or not? Are simulation programmers filling in information ad-hoc depending on how closely we are watching?

In my own life I noticed something consistently peculiar and frustrating—the attractiveness of women decline based on how carefully I'm looking for an attractive woman. If I decide on a day of dutiful work, I always see more attractive women than if I go out with the intent to meet women. Having a different mental goal changes what my eyes see and therefore what I get aroused by. While we can conclude that this difference in perception is due to my brain viewing reality differently based on the goal or intent it contains at the time, the double slit experiment offers up a potentially different explanation.

> …a posthuman simulator would have enough computing power to keep track of the detailed belief-states in all human brains at all times. Therefore, when it saw > that a human was about to make an observation of the microscopic world, it could fill in sufficient detail in the simulation in the appropriate domain on an as-needed basis. Should any error occur, the director could easily edit the states of any brains that have become aware of an anomaly before it spoils the simulation. Alternatively, the director could skip back a few seconds and rerun the simulation in a way that avoids the problem.

And so we may be coming full circle, from believing in a single creator, God, then killing him off in place of evolution and natural selection, a process that prefers ever increasing levels of complexity and intelligence even though robust gene replication can occur on a basic cellular level like in bacteria, and now back (for some) to believing in a creator, not of one God but a species whose intelligence we would be unable to grasp with our feeble minds.

While the simulation argument has no bearing on my day-to-day life and what I'm feeling in the present moment, it has made me wonder more about what we're doing here. If there is no reason, as I suspect, then we'll just have to find a reason ourselves by living in a purposeful way, but until then I would really like to know what happened to my neon orange toothbrush.

Read Next: We Are All Sisyphus

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Secrets To Influencing Human Behavior

January 24, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

All living things are psychologically controlled primarily by three important factors: the powers of fear, belief, and love—and the mutually generating interaction between them, which in turn influence (and are influenced in return by) a living being's needs and wants.

And when it comes to humans, a fourth factor comes into the picture: the power of freewill. The influence of these powers hold strong because of one simple truth of life: That the natural state of all living beings, basically, is that of discontent – because life itself is unfair, riddled with the struggle to fulfill one's wants and needs.

Look around you. Are all living beings naturally happy? As long as a living thing is dictated by its "needs" (the greatest need of every living thing being the need to survive) – it will be unhappy.

The reason why living beings are unhappy in their natural state is because every living being is dependent in some form of the other on something, and the greatest dependency every living thing experiences is on its basic needs for its survival.

No creature is omnipotent, or self-sufficient in the truest sense: the most basic dependency a creature has is on food, without which it would perish. All forms of life exhibit a relentless struggle for survival, which both influences and is influenced by the factors mentioned above.

A simple example of the working of these factors

Watch the video below, and notice these factors working silently in the background:

The ratsnake unknowingly(or fearlessly) ventures into the cobra's territory because of the belief that it could acquire its prey, i.e. the rat. The rat is its need (food), and is thus necessary for the ratsnake's sustenance. The love for its own survival (through the acquisition of its sustenance) overcomes the ratsnake's fear of the unknown, which influences it to move into unknown territory.

But when confronted with the cobra, the ratsnake retreats in fear – this time out of the fear of its own death, and again for the love for its own survival. Just like as in the wild, these factors and the interaction between them, also dictate human behavior with the addition of free will.

Understanding the influence of these factors

Napoleon Hill in the chapter "The Mystery of Sexual Transmutation" from his best seller Think and Grow Rich talks about "The Ten Mind Stimuli":

> The human mind responds to stimuli, through which it may be "keyed up" to high rates of vibration, known as enthusiasm, creative imagination, intense desire, etc. The stimuli to which the mind responds most freely are:–
>
> 1. The desire for sex expression
>
> 2. Love
>
> 3. A burning desire for fame, power, or financial gain, MONEY
>
> 4. Music
>
> 5. Friendship between either those of the same sex, or those of the opposite sex.
>
> 6. A Master Mind alliance based upon the harmony of two or more people who ally themselves for spiritual or temporal advancement.
>
> 7. Mutual suffering, such as that experienced by people who are persecuted.
>
> 8. Auto-suggestion
>
> 9. Fear
>
> 10. Narcotics and alcohol

From the list*, fear, love* and autosuggestion (in the context as the process by which a person induces self-acceptance of an opinion, belief, or plan of action) actually influence a wider range of population, especially the sexually inactive. These influencing factors are further explored in detail below.

1. The power of fear

Fear: an unpleasant emotion caused by the threat of danger, pain, or harm.

Fear is possibly the most powerful of all emotions. Not only because of its intensity, but because of its wider and complex influence everywhere. It has evolved in every creature primarily to warn and protect its existence—yet in mankind, especially in blue pill modern civilization, a modern day fear can be even absurd.

The most common fears a person fears are the fear of ridicule, fear of failure, fear of pain, fear of rejection, fear of losing something precious, and so on. But the most powerful of all fears are commonly the fear of the unknown and the fear of death.

Fear, a master but often misunderstood emotion, is not necessarily bad; harnessed constructively, it can propel a person to incredible feats of achievement. But what is often seen are its negative, destructive and often paralyzing effects on life, leading to a world consumed by anger, resentment, drama, hate, fighting, and sadness.

Fear is often the mother emotion of anger (and violence): for where there is fear found, there is bound to be anger (and violence, either verbal or physical) found. Understanding the power of fear, and how it can affect us (both positively or negatively) is possibly one of the most important lessons to begin the journey of self-empowerment.

Leaders (or tyrants) in the past and present have understood the incredible impact of fear in influencing the masses, and its catalyzing ability to birth (or magnify already present) negative emotions in the masses for their own benefit.

Once you successfully provoke a person's fears, you easily influence his or her's adrenaline response (flight or fight). Fear is thus used generously to influence the human mind through societal indoctrination, media, literature and violence unabatedly in today's world.

Look at the state of modern religion (and devotees) today throughout the world, irrespective of faith. A question which often comes to mind when scrutinizing the state of the faith of mankind today:how many people truly say their prayers out of love for God, rather than actually out of a fear of God?

There is often an undeniable stark difference in the piety of the God-loving, and that of the God-fearing. And how many pray out of a true fear of God, rather than a fear of social ridicule of being called 'irreligious'?

The power of fear, reveals itself even in the numbers and nature of the pious today, and not only in political or the general social sphere today. The power of fear is more 'universal' than even the power of love.

> "Here a question arises: whether it is better to be loved than feared, or the reverse. The answer is, of course, that it would be best to be both loved and feared. But since the two rarely come together, anyone compelled to choose will find greater security in being feared than in being loved. . . . Love endures by a bond which men, being scoundrels, may break whenever it serves their advantage to do so; but fear is supported by the dread of pain, which is ever present." – Niccolo Macchiavelli, The Prince

2. The power of love (or desire)

Love: a strong feeling of affection, or a great interest and pleasure in something*.

The emotion of love is directly opposite to, but can also directly influenced by the emotion of fear.

> "Find out each man's thumbscrew. 'Tis the art of setting their wills in action. It needs more skill than resolution. You must know where to get at anyone. Every volition has a special motive which varies according to taste. All men are idolaters, some of fame, others of self interest, *most of pleasure. Skill consists in knowing these idols in order to bring them into play. – Baltasar Gracian (1601-1658)

A 'thumbscrew' is described as a person's weakness, in the context above. It could be anything, but usually deals with either the person's fears, or loves. The power of love and the power of fear are often intricately linked. Most people often fear losing what they love, and these things are what constitute their "pressure points". Finding and squeezing them, results in involuntary power transfer to the one who exercises the pressure.

The power of “love” (not romantic love alone), just like the power of fear, can either work for success or destruction in a person’s life.

> Being deeply loved by someone gives you strength, while loving someone deeply gives you courage. – Lao Tzu

One can easily substitute “someone” by “something” in the above quote, and see the same result.What you ‘love’ doing or experiencing can have tremendous impact on your life, either for good or bad. A person who is a slave to his desires, can easily be controlled through the fulfillment of his desires by the one who fulfills them.

Love, just like fear, is thus a dangerous two edged sword, which works either way; birthing both positive and negative emotions including anger, violence, hate and prejudice. Since most people are not in control of their emotions, stirring up their emotions is the easiest way to control them.

> STIR UP WATERS TO CATCH FISH
> Anger and motion are strategically counterproductive. You must always stay calm and objective.But if you can make your enemies angry while staying calm yourself, you gain a decided advantage. Put your enemies off balance: Find the chink in their vanity through which you can rattle them and you hold the strings.
> – Law 39, The 48 Laws of Power

3. The power of belief

Belief: an acceptance that something exists or is true, especially one without proof- or- trust, faith, or confidence in (someone or something).

> What ever the mind of man can conceive and believe, it can achieve. – Napoleon Hill (1883-1970)

The power of belief is arguably the most important power regulating all behavioral patterns – for it regulates and influences both the powerful forces of both fear and love, and even often free will.

> We are born believing. A man bears beliefs as a tree bears apples. – Ralph Waldo Emerson

As the saying goes: Everything goes – if belief (or faith goes). Having a belief (or trust) about something or someone is a belief, while choosing not to believe (or trust) is also a belief. Belief (or a lack of it) often dictates action. Influence people's beliefs and you'd influence their fears and loves – which would in turn influence their actions.

Robert Greene in The 48 Laws of Power elaborates on the power of belief in society through two important laws:

> PLAY ON PEOPLE'S NEED TO BELIEVE TO CREATE A CULT-LIKE FOLLOWING
> People have an overwhelming desire to believe in something. Become the focal point of such desire by offering them a cause, a new faith to follow. Keep your words vague but full of mist; emphasize enthusiasm over rationality and clear thinking. Give your new disciples rituals to perform, ask them to make sacrifices on your behalf In the absence of organized religion and grand causes, your new belief system will bring you untold power. – Law 27, The 48 Laws of Power and

> PLAY TO PEOPLE'S FANTASIES
> The truth is often avoided because it is ugly and unpleasant. New appeal to truth and reality unless you are prepared for the anger that comes from disenchantment. Life is so harsh and distressing that people who can manufacture romance or conjure up fantasy are like oases in the desert: Everyone flocks to them. There is great power in tapping into the fantasies of the masses. – Law 32, The 48 Laws of Power

Humanity has always been, is and always will be, a slave to the power of its beliefs.

A simple example explaining the power of belief would be that of game. Gaming is not just getting into a woman's panties; it's more about influencing her 'beliefs' about yourself, so that intimacy with her would become a more definite possibility. In the seduction of the masses, the synergy between love, fear and belief is best explained.

Thus, whether it may be through religion, social or political dogma, the power of belief (or lack of it) is possibly the most important catalyst in human behavior. Manipulating a person's beliefs about something or someone either through trickery is possibly the oldest subtle form of warfare that mankind has probably known.

> People are by nature changeable. It is easy to persuade them about some particular matter, but it is hard to hold them to that persuasion. Hence it is necessary to provide that when they no longer believe, they can be forced to believe. – Niccolo Machiavelli, The Prince

But the wise don't readily believe, nor do they do it blindly.

> A wise man proportions his belief to the evidence.– David Hume

The power of belief itself is what determines and directly influences both fear and love, and sometimes vice-versa. Whether fear would yield anger and courage, instead of paralysis and cowardice, is all what the one who experiences fear, believes in at that particular moment. It's his belief patterns which determine how he would perceive his situation.

Altering a person's beliefs through suggestion or manipulation (either verbal or visual), alters his or hers perception of the reality around him or her, and thus influences his or hers emotions and logic (and most importantly free will), which would then in turn influence his or her eventual behavior.

4. The power of free will

Free will: the power of acting without the constraint of necessity or fate; the ability to act at one's own discretion.

Arguably but unfortunately, the power of freewill often trails the power of belief in influencing human behavior solely because most people usually don't exercise their free will (or free thought) in today's world – where prejudices (per-conceived ignorant beliefs), fears, and loves usually tend to supersede free will.

> An artist is forced by others to paint out of his own free will.– Willem de Kooning

This necessarily may not be bad, but blind (or forced) faith is as dangerous as having no faith (or belief) at all. Yet sometimes even, in spite of the lack of faith, fear, or love, most people fail to exercise the true potential of free will.

> Free will is an illusion. People always choose the perceived path of greatest pleasure.– Scott Adams

And sometimes, people abuse freewill through misunderstanding it. Free will is possibly one of the most misunderstood concepts which affect human life, along with the power of fate.

> People demand freedom of speech as a compensation for the freedom of thought which they seldom use. — Soren Kierkegaard

Thus, it's common to see people not completely understanding the power of freewill. Yet, often people don't completely exercise free will because of their own fears, loves and personal and social beliefs. The herd mentality is a common example of that.

Most people live their lives by yielding to different kinds of "traps" (Harry Browne in his best seller "How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World" calls such "traps" as "assumptions that are accepted without challenge", listing fourteen of them), and thus might still not be completely exercising their free will while enjoying a superficial "freedom."

Most people are not psychologically free due to their fears, loves and beliefs, and thus their servitude (and slavery) can be acquired through leading them more down the roads to these traps. Leaders throughout history have acquired power over people through this way. Alter people's perception of reality, limit their free will so as to control their ability to judge for themselves, and thus call the shots to their eventual behavior.

> CONTROL THE OPTIONS: GET OTHERS TO PLAY WITH THE CARDS YOU DEAL
>
> The best deceptions are the ones that seem to give the other person a choice: Your victims feel they are in control,but are actually your puppets. Give people options that come out in your favor whichever one they choose. Force them to make choices between the lesser of two evils, both of which serve your purpose. Put them on the horns of a dilemma: They are gored wherever they turn. – Law No.31, The 48 Laws of Power

Conclusion

The secret to a balanced personality is moderation, which entails regulated satisfaction of one's wants and needs – which is possible through self-mastery. The masterful man who is in control of his emotions, (his fears, loves), and beliefs is very difficult to influence, and has the freedom to maximize the potential of the freewill at his disposal.

However in today's world, people usually struggle to find the right balance for their emotions, which reveals itself as a weakness which can be influenced (or exploited) depending on the circumstances that the people are in.

Most people are slaves to their own volition, which can be subdivided into their fears, loves, and beliefs. Probe to influence these factors in their personalities, and then you could sufficiently influence them.

> WORK ON THE HEARTS AND MINDS OF OTHERS
>
> Coercion creates a reaction that will eventually work against you.

> You must seduce others into wanting to move in your direction.A person you have seduced becomes your loyal pawn. And the way to seduce others is to operate on their individual psychologies and weaknesses. Soften up the resistant by working on their emotions, playing on what they hold dear and what they feel: Ignore the hearts and mind of others and they will grow to hate you. – Law No.43, The 48 Laws of Power

The secrets to understanding and influencing human behavior are thus often basic (which can be understood by the factors above), and simply controlling these factors is often the simple way to influencing others and gaining mastery over them.

Read Next: Robert Greene's Mastery

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Do Your Part To Stop The Thirsty Guy Revolution

January 24, 2015 | by Brian Smith | Link | Original Link

The world has changed. I know it, you know it, but we don't do anything about it.

The balance of power which has been ruled by men since throughout history, is now in the hands of our far inferior counterparts.

Where men had his choice of women, it is now reversed. Women are picking men like they pick their clothes; they shop. And if they find one little thing they don't like, they move onto the next one. They have an unlimited supply of guys that are showering them with attention which they don't deserve in the slightest.

We already know how it happened. It started with Facebook, which was manageable. But then; the iPhone. Oh the iPhone. This sleek rectangular device became the ring on golem's finger. With the iPhone girls started receiving daily bombardment of thirst. From Twitter, to Instagram, to Vine, to Snapchat, to Tinder, to Plenty of Fish. And don't forget standard texting.

It only got worse

With each year that passed, the daily bombardment turned into hourly bombardment, which then turned into minutes, and now finally into seconds. The attention span and stupidity of a woman is at an all time low. But even worse is the self-entitlement they now possess.

They think they deserve the perfect man crafted out of God's gift to earth. While that would be fair if they were attractive and had a decent personality, now even busted girls who only know how to have a conversation if its on a screen think they deserve perfection.

Average guys can't even get laid anymore. And if they do, it requires way more effort than it ever should. We have all seen the abundance of high quality guys dating whales. It's beyond disturbing. The supply and demand of sex has gone to shit. It is so out of whack that girls are getting away with being ugly, rude, stupid, slutty, fat, non-feminine, the list goes on and on.

Gentlemen, It's time for a change. It is time to reverse this awful time in history.

Even though the iPhone caused this dilemma, we as males gave it power. We have been the ones blowing up girls' phones. We have been the ones swiping right on every single profile. We have been the ones giving these gelatinous pieces of garbage the false self-entitlement they now possess.

It is up to us as a gender to come together and stop this madness.

DELETE your social media, DELETE your online dating accounts, STOP putting up with bullshit behavior that girls are giving you.

If a girl flakes on you, delete her number. If a girl is rude to you, don't be afraid to bring her self-esteem back down to where it should be.

This will only work if we do this as a whole. We need every guy we can to stop this insanity. Who cares if we go without sex for a while—this is for the good of our gender. And it may even make girls like you more. Imagine if one day every girl wakes up with no messages, with no notifications. Imagine that happen for a week, a month, a year, FOREVER.

They wouldn't know what to do with themselves. They would be throwing themselves at us and the balance of power would be restored. Remember the times when girls would be insecure, when girls would be needy, when girls would text you first? If we all work together, we can have that again.

Gentleman, this is war. We are the 300 Spartans up against King Xerxes and an army of pathetic females that don't deserve their power. But, If we keep recruiting 300 more men, and those men recruit 300 more men, and so on and so forth, we can eventually come out victorious.

My name is Brian and I have a dream.

Let's sacrifice sex in the short term to win back our power in the long term.

Let's go back in time to how things used to be.

Let's save the world.

Read More: How Thirsty Men Kill Everyone's Game

Brian Smith

Brian is the sole proprietor of Loser 2 Winner, a website devoted to helping high school and college students improve their social life. In addition, Brian hates what American culture is turning into. He is sickened that women now have more power than men, and he wants to reverse this unfortunate trend.

5 Men’s Health Supplements That Actually Work

January 25, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

The supplement industry is full of crooks, liars, and thieves.

This is because it’s a largely unregulated market. Read this—taken from the United States FDA website:

> Manufacturers and distributors of dietary supplements and dietary ingredients are prohibited from marketing products that are adulterated or misbranded. That means that these firms are responsible for evaluating the safety and labeling of their products before marketing.

Re-read the bold portion of the quote. The FDA does NOT actually evaluate these products. It’s up to the supplement companies themselves to do so. And that’s why you can walk into the local vitamin shop and find shelves upon shelves of products that claim to build muscle and burn fat WITHOUT actually containing anything that’s been proven to work.

Seriously, take a minute before you buy any new supplements, go to Google Scholar and search for peer-reviewed studies on that compound. You’ll often find that the latest bodybuilding supplement has been proven to be ineffective when studied in the lab.

Sure, you can reliably build muscle quickly using the anabolic steroid types of supplements. But that’s illegal, hard to find quality sources of, and messes with your hormone levels. It’s not worth it unless you’re a bodybuilder or competitive athlete.

However there are several legal supplements that actually do work. Here are my top five:

1. Creatine

Creatine is an organic acid, naturally synthesized by our bodies from several amino acids, that helps to supply energy to the cells of the body, especially in skeletal muscle.

It's also the only legal performance enhancing drug that's been researched extensively and proven to increase strength and lean muscle mass. New studies even suggest that it may have antidepressant effects and various cognitive benefits like enhanced memory and reaction speed.

For maximum effect take five grams per day. Ignore the product's labeling that tells you to "load" and take more than that at first—studies have shown this ineffective.

My recommended product on Amazon.

2. Multivitamin

The main reason to take a multivitamin is as an "insurance policy" against any nutritional deficiencies in your diet.

NOTE: There are some recent studies that question the efficacy of multivitamins. They call into question how efficiently our bodies are actually able to absorb nutrients from vitamin pills. For this reason I fully advise and recommend eating nutrient rich vegetables and fruits every single day.

The most common deficiencies you're likely to have are zinc, magnesium, and vitamin D – vitamin D being the biggest culprit. This is because it is a hormone that's made in the skin when exposed to sunlight. However, many of us tend not to get too much exposure to the sun, and are deficient as a result.

Aside from reducing the risk of disease and other general health benefits, these deficiencies are also linked to lower testosterone levels.

My recommended product on Amazon.

3. Fish oil

Fish oil is, shockingly, oil derived from the tissue of fatty fish.

This oil contains omega-3 fatty acids (EPA) and docosahexaenoic acid (DHA) and has been proven to reduce tissue inflammation, reducing the risk of various diseases and cancers—in addition to assisting in maintaining superior body composition with weight loss.

My recommended product on Amazon.

4. Whey protein powder

Whey protein powder is simply a convenient form of protein. It usually consists of a blend of whey protein concentrate and whey protein isolate. It’s derived from milk that has been left over and coagulated.

The only reason to use this powder is if your diet is low in protein. Taking a scoop of protein after a workout won’t magically build muscle.

My recommended product on Amazon.

5. Pre-workout powder

Pre-workout powders are mixture of substances meant to be taken before a workout in order to boost energy and focus.

You should only take a pre-workout powder if you struggle to get to the gym BECAUSE of poor energy. I used to be addicted to these, and I couldn’t work out without one.

Also, they usually contain a large amount of questionable, odd ingredients. Caffeine is almost always the active ingredient, and for that reason, a coffee works as a great (and usually cheaper) option for a pre-workout boost.

For this reason I suggest making your own pre-workout using only the ingredients proven to work.

Don’t waste your money on BS supplements that don’t do shit

The above list is by no means 100% exhaustive, but it does cover the VAST majority of supplements you should even consider taking. If there’s something else you’re curious about then I suggest searching for peer-reviewed studies on Google Scholar and seeing what is proven and what is not.

This was a partial excerpt from my brand new training program Body of a Beast.

Read More: 8 Tips For Accelerated Fat Loss

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

How Jungian Psychology Can Make Your Life Better

January 25, 2015 | by Titus Vibius | Link | Original Link

MBTI and Keirsey and others are mostly post-Jungians who distorted his psychology into something more "pop" by reducing it to a marketable version made up of four letters that are supposed to show your functions. After that, they made some empirical observations about types' behaviours and then came up with generalised patterns of each type (e.g. INTJ the aloof, unfriendly mastermind; ESFP the careless butterfly who just wants fun, etc.).

True Jungian psychology, however, combined with more Jungian-minded versions of the MBTI, can provide valuable tools to improve one's life and also to understand oneself and the other people much better.

Understand that this system explains human cognition, not behavior

While no system is perfect and none will ever be able to fully explain the behaviours of all humans, Jungian typology can accurately describe and categorise ways of acquiring knowledge. While this may have implications for behaviour, it doesn't imply that Jung set out to explain that; this result is merely a branch of a tree planted for a wholly different purpose.

This is an important first step in understanding Jung: he didn't set out to conclude psychology but merely to point out observations from his dealings with patients (and other people).

Thus, the purpose of Jungian typology is to show the ways in which humans understand the world around them and how they process information and what they do with it.

Also, understand that ENTP, ISFJ etc. are just abbreviations, not compendia of humans. They only represent a modern, post-Jungian way to shorten descriptions, for example extraverted intuition with auxiliary introverted thinking is known as ENTP.

Additionally, ignore the P-J dimension of the four letters (Perception vs Judgement). This was a thing invented after Jung without Jung approving of it or thinking about it. In MBTI, it refers to orderliness (J) vs being disorderly (P) but that's bullshit because there are disorderly, procrastinating INTJs and there can be orderly, hardworking, time-efficient ESFPs.

Finally, the extraversion and introversion things can be ignored regarding behaviour. Jung used them to refer to where we direct our mental energy (inwards or outwards; towards our own thoughts and feelings or towards things in the outer world) rather than how much we can socialize.

Some widely-proliferated "shortcuts" to types

How to use this knowledge for self-improvement

Once you understand your main function and your inferior one, you will be able to do two things: tailor studying (reading, learning, reflecting on experience etc.) to suit your style better (thus maximizing output), and dealing with bad habits more easily. The former also applies to your whole life. Once you understand how your brain works and why you take decisions (or what makes you desire certain things or want to have stuff done in a certain way) you will be able to make everything around you more suitable rather than having it tailored to the general population.

For example, if you have introverted thinking, you may want to break a thing into its parts and analyze it (in your own head, by yourself) and then formulate your discovery in a brief, understandable way (or a harsh way, as Simon Cowell does). If you have extraverted feeling you may, however, want to work with a group and try to understand the emotions transmitted by the other persons and to ensure harmony throughout.

They're all thinking differently but they could all agree they need a life boat

Another very important tool derived from this is changing your life to renounce bad habits. Once you understand why you behave in a certain way when stressed or why you tend to think a certain way when under pressure, you are able to change. The first step in solving a problem is acknowledging it.

As an example, I was able to cut down on alcohol after finding out inferior extraverted sensing is the reason I crave bodily sensations and various substances when stressed. Knowing what affects you when stressed can have a significant and positive impact on your life, even if it is negative thoughts, binges, emotional outbursts, obsessiveness with details, or a sudden need for argumentativeness and logic in everything.

Einstein knew we need to change our thinking in order to change our habits

Of course, the above does not contradict the fact that Jungian psychology is about cognition not behavior; however, the brain reacts by sending signals to the body (and to the mind for other functions) and then physical sensations are also a form of knowing (through touch, smell etc.).

This can help you in your business life and in game as well

Once you understand the cognitive functions better, you are better able to deal with people in both a social (friendly) environment and in a more formal one (a workplace). Understanding the source of the differences in the approaches of several persons to the same task can help reduce disagreement.

This results in gaining valuable time that would otherwise have been wasted on arguing why person A goes to point X by quickly categorizing all the facts in front of them, formulating a conclusion and then executing a plan of action while person B brainstorms interminably and gives interesting yet unconnected ideas before eventually settling on the same conclusion.

As Aristotle said, "many a dispute could have been settled in a single paragraph if the disputants defined their terms." To give a concrete example, I no longer have disagreements with a few people in my life because I now know that one of them takes decisions only after gathering copious amounts of information (unlike me who formulates a conclusion almost immediately and then attempts to have it executed) while another relies on traditions and concrete information from the past and from experience rather than unproven abstract ideas.

Think of Jungian typology as the red guy; you can invoke him anytime like a genie

In game, this translates to understanding what makes a girl respond to and what she is interested in and why. While most girls will want the same thing (an alpha that is confident and dominant, i.e. a masculine man), they will prefer conversations to go differently or laugh at different things. Their hobbies and passions and interests will also differ; some may prefer a direct man that talks straight and doesn't bullshit or fantasize (Te) while others may prefer a more artistic man that can show he is different from the others (Fi).

While some may want to talk exclusively about the extremely ~~boring~~ interesting activities of her friends or relatives and their Facebook statuses and their Twitter feeds, others may prefer a more playful exchange of ideas and even things with a slight intellectual twist.

Start from Scratch

The best start would be Jung's book, Psychological Types, published 1921. A good website for beginners (with information similar to that of Jung) is celebritytypes.com (tip: on that site you can also find interesting quotes from famous people of all types; there are also some Pierce Presents series on that site from a guy who did a video with a brief intro for each type and a helpful infographic that shows how the MBTI developed and changed from Jung.

So, what are you waiting for? Learn Jungian psychology and start influencing life.

Read More: How Myers Briggs Can Elevate Your Game

Titus Vibius

Titus Vibius is an anachronistic dissident who belongs to no one in space or time. He spends his time studying and gaining knowledge in the hope that in the future, he will create a society to which he belongs.

Is Rosie Batty Using Her Child's Death For Her Own Fame And Fortune?

January 25, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Rosie Batty was given the Australian of the Year award yesterday. In February 2014, Rosie Batty's ex-boyfriend murdered their son at cricket practice and then committed suicide. Batty was left unharmed.

The next day she gave a 24-minute interview, and from there she has become a national hero and celebrity. She has traveled the country speaking out against domestic violence. This seems like cookie-cutter leftist victim pandering worthy of ignoring. However, there are some interesting features in this story.

1. The Father Committed Suicide

If a person murders his or her child, there is clearly a deep-seated mental illness present. If that person then commits suicide, then even more so was the person disturbed. So this is not society being callous towards women, so much as just the actions of an individual lunatic, especially since the both people who died were male.

Leftists usually adore the mentally ill. Next to blacks and gays, the mentally ill are the left's favorite pet. This is mainly because so many liberals have mental illness, and so it gives them a kind of victimhood, especially when insurance doesn't cover the dubious treatment.

So why is the left labeling this as the evil bogeyman of the patriarchy instead of a man crying for meaning in a cold world? Because ultimately modern liberalism is about maintaining a narrative, and nothing gets people to sympathize with them like a crying woman. However, I'm not sure we could say that Batty is crying…

2. She Switches Between Emotional Neutrality And Joy

If you watch the video, notice how she almost tears up at the beginning and then suddenly goes back to her dead expression. You may think that if a woman cries, there must be an authentic meaning behind it, but watch You've Got Mail sometime with your mother and see how easy it is to trigger the waterworks. Even the media have observed Batty's emotional neutrality, although they claim it is a virtue.

Batty has even said she thought she was supposed to enjoy the attention.

> "I feel very uncomfortable that I have become this very well-known figure through the death of my son. How can you embrace it and enjoy it when you are in the most difficult time of your life?" […]
>
> "I almost think, why would I want to live to 100 like my grandmother, because that would mean that I don't see Luke for all that time. You could say I don't even fear death anymore, because whatever is in the next world, that's where I'll get to see him again."
>
> She says this calmly, her eyes dry.

In addition to emotional deadness, she also finds ways to bask in the attention. The Sydney Morning Herald writes,

> Rosie Batty is the antithesis of the grieving mother, bright where you expect darkness, open and lively where she might have been downcast and restrained. She chats and laughs readily, wears vibrant colours and continues to seek good from a personal tragedy. […]
>
> As another day peaks without her son, she stares at his picture, brimming with sunshine and possibility.

There is some shadowing of this as Batty tells the story of her mother's death. She felt alone and unable to express grief. By her own admission, this has tainted all future relationships.

> "I have not really formed permanent relations with anybody; I have never been married and neither have my two other brothers. I think it really traumatises you from having key relationships because of that fear that they are going to leave you." […]
>
> But when she moved back to Victoria in 2000, she felt isolated: she was now single, and many of her mates had become parents. "I was told by a friend of mine … 'Maybe you should be a bit less strong to be more attractive to men.' I was like, 'How can you be something different to what you are?' "

You'd think having your child brutally murdered in front of your eyes would cause such PTSD that you would never be able to speak of him again without breaking down into fits, but apparently Batty is a stronger person than I am.

Her emotions are as off-set as this photograph.

3. She Chose To Involve Herself And The Child With A Dangerous Man

The child Luke was born to her after she had already broken up with the father Greg Anderson. He appears to have already shown strong signs of mental disturbance to the point of threatening to murder her when the baby was two years old. But prior to the birth, she had dated him for two years before breaking up for eight years. Surely some time during those first two years and the later reconnection she saw strong signs of abusive behavior. Nevertheless, she made a decision to restore contact with him and to have unprotected sex.

4. She Has Greatly Benefited From All Of This

The Australian people have rallied to pamper her, and she has gladly accepted all of it. I don't use the word "pamper" as an exaggeration. The Sydney Morning Herald writes,

> The prime minister phoned with his condolences. Journalists choked at interviews, even as she remained comparatively composed. Strangers deluged her with flowers and gifts. Police officers pooled funds to send her to a day spa. […]
>
> In September, she addressed a Senate inquiry. She has signed a book deal and someone wants to paint her for the Archibald Prize. She has lunched with the Packers, and has been introduced to countless celebrities she hasn't always heard of.

An artist named Jacqui Clark even made a painting of Luke and sent it to her.

But the biggest tell-tale sign of a professional victim is,

> Luke's school deposited a sizeable insurance payout into her bank account. After all those years of taking mediocre jobs through motherhood, suddenly, she did not have to worry about earning an income for a while.

If you need even more of a reason to look down on the Australian people, the article continues,

> Since then, there have been many unexpected acts of kindness. She still receives gifts and flowers, and initially was given so much food that she did not have to cook for six months. One morning, a packet of lavender with a hand-written note arrived in the mail, in an envelope simply marked “Rosie Batty, Tyabb, Victoria”. A 70-year-old woman has written to her admiringly: “Your words are gold.” At lunch, a stranger walks over to her table, gently holds her upper arm and tells her, “I just want to say good luck with everything. I admire your courage.”

Conclusions

Notice this clamor about domestic violence didn’t happen when a mother recently murdered her eight children in December. In general, it seems like most acts of filicide in the media are committed by the mother and not the father. In fact, a murdered child is statistically [page four] more likely to have been murdered by the mother instead of the father. Of course, when it is the mother who commits the crime, the media write it off as the mother being deeply mentally ill and doing it out of what she thinks is the best interest of the child.

Another conclusion is that we aren’t sure what really happened with the father Anderson. Small details she has said implicitly make it seem like she had been trying to exclude or vilify Anderson towards his son as much as she could. Of course, she explicitly claimed the opposite in interviews, but why wouldn’t she? She looks like more of a saint if she’s forgiving.

One also wonders if a more active role in his son’s life could have alleviated Anderson’s anguish, or whether he was so dangerous that it would have been best to exclude him entirely. I would like to hear his side of the story, but unfortunately he didn’t leave a note behind.

Batty said,

> “To the women and children who are unsafe, in hiding or living in fear, who have changed their names, left their extended families and moved from their communities to find safety, you do not deserve to live a life that is dictated by violence,” she said. “You are not to blame.”

Batty is perpetuating the modernist lie that actions do not have consequences or that blame logically must always rest with a single individual. This destroys lives because it condones reckless behavior. The better advice would be to be very selective of whom you let into your personal life.

Perhaps it is most concerning that this has become an issue of women’s advocacy when really the man just had extreme mental distress that wasn’t shown proper care. Murder has always been illegal. Domestic abuse is also illegal. So what new law is supposed to be enacted? Or is she just raising awareness for a commonly-known problem? Apparently she wants Australia to have their own version of the American money-hole known as VAWA.

The most obvious conclusion is that Batty is taking advantage of her son's brutal murder to gain money and fame. This is enabled by the left, who who also have much to gain from this. You don't have to be Scooby Doo to solve this mystery. If she had real humility, she'd ask people to stop spending their hard-earned money to send her to the spa. But she wants her celebrity victim tour, and the left wants their funding.

Read More: 9 Reasons Why Sydney Sucks For Men

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

“Manspreading” Shows The Social Retardation Of Young Women

January 26, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In the past couple months, there’s been a sudden explosion in articles decrying anti-social behaviors that men apparently are guilty of. The most well-known is “manspreading,” the idea that men spread their legs too wide on subways, encroaching on womens’ rightful space. Indeed, in part due to pressure from hypersensitive millennial women, the MTA has launched a campaign against “manspreading” on the New York City Subway.

“Manspreading” is far from the only “man” behavior that women in the media whine about. There’s also “manslamming,” the idea that men don’t move out of the way of women on the sidewalk fast enough, as well as “manterupting,” the claim that women are frequently shouted down by men at business meetings and the like. “Mansplaining,” a term feminists use to describe men who infringe on their feelings of narcissistic superiority, has been around for a few years now.

It’s easy to dismiss these crybaby articles as first world problems; indeed, it’s a testament to how good Western women have it that the only thing they have left to complain about is men bumping into them on the street. But the agita over “manspreading” and its sister afflictions speaks to a deeper pathology in modern women. American girls have a deep-seated fear of masculinity and men, created by cultural Marxism, and this fear is the central reason why male-female relations are so dysfunctional.

How Men And Women Became Enemies

The adversarial relationship between men and women is one of those aspects of American culture that you don't really notice until you've spent some time outside the country. In my case, it took three months in the Philippines to realize that American sexual mores aren't just actively harmful, they have almost nothing in common with the way the rest of the world does things.

Unique among world cultures (except maybe the Middle East, which has its own problems), American and other western societies are extremely age- and sex-segregated. Boys and girls grow up in same-sex cocoons, consuming sex-specific entertainment and having no real interaction with the opposite sex until their teen and college years. This shift can be seen in pop music: in contrast to the aggressive male musicians of the past such as Led Zeppelin and the Rolling Stones, millennial girls prefer either grrl-power acts like Lady Gaga and Beyoncé or unthreatening boy bands like One Direction.

In the specific case of girls, they're also fed a constant diet of anti-male propaganda. They're told that they're special just for having a vagina and victimized by virtue of having that vagina. The lies about the pay gap, the prevalence of rape and other debunked feminist bugaboos steadily condition girls to resent and fear men. At the same time, mass media's constant depictions of men as stupid and evil (in commercials and TV shows etc.) leave girls without any positive male role models.

The problem with this is that while girls may fear men, they still want to sleep with them and have to interact with them on a daily basis. This lingering unease in American women—being attracted to that which they've been conditioned to fear—is the genesis of America's screwed up sexual landscape. Roosh V Forum member AnonymousBosch has correctly identified millennial girls as having a "dismissive-avoidant" attachment style, characterized by narcissism and an inability to form relationships with others.

Fear Of A Male Planet

Virtually every interaction you will have with a millennial girl will be defined by her fear of your masculinity. “Rape culture,” for example, is one of the most destructive effects of millennial social retardation. Because young women are not properly socialized on how to deal with men, they have no idea how to navigate sexual encounters beyond their animal urges. When women sleep with men and regret it afterwards, they rationalize it as “rape” because cultural Marxist and SJW ideology has trained her to assume the worst from men.

For example, Columbia student Emma Sulkowicz, who is carrying her mattress around campus in protest at her “rapist” not being expelled, was clearly not taught how to interact with men. Her relationship with Paul Nungesser was very clearly consensual and her only problem was that she did things with him that she later regretted.

In decades past, Sulkowicz would have been told to suck it up and move on. But because modern society socializes women to fear men and indulge their feelings at every opportunity, she thinks that making a show about being “raped” is the best way to deal with her heartbreak.

“Manspreading,” “manslamming” and the like are just the latest manifestations of this pathology. Young women are so retarded and entitled that they believe they have a right to not come into contact with any man that they don’t want to… even in a crowded, public environment like the subway. It’s like they’re a bunch of little girls afraid that touching boys will give them the equivalent of cooties.

The Personal Space Box is the perfect visual representation of how millennial women think. Narcissism and poor socialization combine to create a monster. She exists in her own reality, oblivious to the humanity of those around her, and woe befall any fool who punctures her bubble of delusion.

Gender War Is A Racket

Living in the Philippines was part of what made me realize all this. While Filipino women more or less have the same rights as American women, and arguably have more freedom—the Philippines has had two female presidents while the U.S. has had zero—the adversarial gender politics of the West are completely alien there. This is because of the strength of the Filipino family.

Unlike in the U.S., where women are conditioned to think of themselves as a class in the Marxist sense, in opposition to men, Filipinos view themselves as part of an integrated whole. Filipinos are brought up in close contact with their extended family, meaning that by the time they become adults, they have a strong grasp of how those of other ages and/or the opposite sex behave. Filipinas don't fear masculine men the way American girls do because they know them and how they think.

Cultural Marxism works to undermine the family unit because the family is the most effective way to contain leftism. By encouraging men and women to oppose each other, by breaking up families, the government-corporate complex can transform a nation into obedient consumerist drones. America is a giant shopping mall filled with 300 million atomized, rootless individuals, buying cheap crap and working mind-numbing jobs in lieu of creating anything real.

"Manspreading" is just the latest salvo in the war between men and women, a war that benefits everyone but the people fighting it. And as the constant stream of man-shaming articles from the media shows, women are all too eager to take up arms for their corporate masters against the men their instincts tell them to love.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Cultural Marxism Produces Matriarchy

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Dilemma Of Perspective

January 26, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Perspective is one of the most important lessons of the cognitive disciplines. It also weighs heavily in the balanced consideration of moral problems. What may seem to be one thing to one man, is likely something else to another. It can be disquieting for us to see the world as others see it, for every man's window overlooks his own tangled garden of direful secrets.

Several anecdotes illustrate this in amusing ways. The Roman writer Aulus Gellius (Noctes Atticae V.5) relates a conversation that took place between the Carthaginian general Hannibal and King Antiochus of Syria, in whose court Hannibal had taken up residence after his defeat in the Second Punic War.

Hannibal had been asked to be present at one of Antiochus's military parades and to review his troops. The parade proceeded with much pomp and ceremony, with chariots, elephants, horsemen, and infantry paraded magnificently before the reviewing stand, all accoutred in glittering yet untested finery. Never was armor or blade so polished, and so unscratched.

Hannibal

The king turned to Hannibal and asked him, “Do you think that this is enough for the Romans to deal with?” What he meant by this, of course, was whether Hannibal thought that the Romans would ever be able to contend militarily with his army. Hannibal, wise in the ways of war, smiled faintly and answered, “Yes, I definitely think this should be enough for them, as greedy as they are.”

By this sarcastic response, which laughed at the worthlessness of Antiochus’s pompous army, Hannibal meant that Antiochus’s troops would be sufficient to satisfy the Romans as a captured prize. The king was not amused by this difference in perspective. Hannibal was invited to no further military parades.

Another anecdote in Aulus Gellius presents the same point in a more nuanced way. This is the famous “court paradox” or “lawyer’s paradox” which Gellius uses as an example of what is called in Latin a reciproca, or a “convertible proposition.” The paradox is stated in Attic Nights (V.10) in the following way.

Protagoras was a famous rhetorician, noted for his unmatched dexterity in arguing cases. He was approached by a wealthy young man named Euathlus, who wished to be instructed in the arts of rhetoric and oratory. Euathlus promised to pay Protagoras a large sum of money. He advanced Protagoras half of the sum at the beginning of his instruction, and promised to pay the balance when he had pleaded and won his first case before a jury. Protagoras agreed to this arrangement.

Euathlus made great progress in his instruction, yet never undertook any court cases; it soon became clear he was dragging his feet to avoid paying his instructor. Protagoras eventually brought suit against him for payment of his fee. He said to Euathlus, “No matter what perspective you look at this issue from, you will have to pay me. No matter how the verdict goes, I will win. If the jury rules for me, you will have to pay me as a result of the verdict. If the jury rules against me, you will then have won your first case, and you will still have to pay me.”

Euathlus paused for a moment, then looked at him squarely and said, “Protagoras, you are unfortunately not correct. Things are the opposite of what you just said. I will not have to pay you, no matter what the jury’s ruling may be. For if the jury decides in my favor, then I can rely on their verdict and pay you nothing. But if they rule against me and I lose, then I will still have to pay you nothing, since by the terms of our original contract I will not have won my first case.” The jury, we are told, was utterly baffled by the situation, and could not reach a decision. Thus was an old master confounded by a devious pupil.

Lorenzo Valla

As a logical exercise, how may this dilemma be resolved? The Renaissance humanist Lorenzo Valla discusses the paradox in his 1439 masterpiece Dialectical Disputations (III.13), and insists that the jury need only to have considered that Euathlus defrauded his master, and thereby was unjustly enriched.

This is true, but avoids the issue. The way to resolve the paradox is to realize that each man—Euathlus and Protagoras—believes that his own premises apply absolutely to the situation.

The two positions are logical “disjuncts”: they proceed on their independent tracks, and come into play depending on who wins or loses, and on whether we should respect the jury’s verdict or the original agreement of the parties. In a sense, they are both right: the outcome depends on whose logic controls. Perspective is everything. Choose your logic, and you choose your outcome.

But just because perspective may be relative does not mean that we should shrink from taking a position. One final anecdote illustrates this point well. Plutarch, in his Life of Solon (ch. 20) mentions a strange law that Solon had instituted in Athens during his archonship.

Solon, generally considered the city’s most wise lawgiver, decreed that in the event of civil discord, violent factionalism, or revolution, every citizen must take a side. No citizen was permitted to sit on the sidelines and await the outcome of civil strife. Neutrality was forbidden. The penalty for violating this law was the forfeiture of one’s property, followed by an ignominious exile.

Solon of Athens

At first sight this law seems dismaying. Gellius thought as much when he first heard of it, and says so specifically in a complaining chapter of Attic Nights (II.12). Why would any leader encourage a situation where a citizen was forced to take a side in factionalism? But Solon saw things differently. With his unrivaled knowledge of human nature and politics, he foresaw that civil disorder would be more speedily resolved if every man in the polity had some stake in the outcome of a common discord. The good men on both sides would encourage the equitable settlement of differences. Civil war and paralysis, he knew, were actually prolonged by public apathy, not shortened by it. Equity demands that everyone should have some "skin in the game."

So much, then, for perspective. It is the most difficult, and most important, lesson of the mental arts. Moral philosophy would be meaningless without it. It is a humbling and necessary experience to attempt to see the world as our adversaries may see it. To escape the straight-jacket of one's own experience, and to try to see the panorama stretching before us through a differently crafted lens, requires heightened powers of sensitivity and concentration.

But at the same time, this relativity of perspective does not imply the abandonment of our own views. Quite the contrary, in fact. We must take our positions on important issues and advocate for them strenuously, just as our litigants in the "court paradox" did. For as Solon's law holds, a man's worst offense is to have no perspective at all.

Read More: The Fears Of Being A World Traveler

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Do You Want To Learn How To Code?

January 26, 2015 | by Hannibal Menwell Creed | Link | Original Link

Three years ago when I became a college freshman, I had a certain plan in mind: become a business major, specifically accounting. After graduating, I would get my CPA, and work for three years wasting my life as a public accountant, until I would find a nice 9-5 job, a wife, and a suburban home like many beta males of this day and age.

As I progressed through college, this mindset slowly chipped away, and I began to stop taking advice of other people who thought they knew what was best for me. This eventually landed me into quantitative economics, specifically econometrics. Econometrics is basically the data analysis branch of economics, and in my econometrics courses, I learned my first programming language: Stata.

Ever since then I have fallen in love with programming. Because I have been programming for two years now, and because I am an individual who stresses perpetual self-improvement, I would like to share with the ROK community my thoughts on how you should start programming.

This article is more geared towards an individual who has little to no programming experience, and would be interested in learning. This post has a slightly different focus than Hawk Writes's excellent article An Insider's Guide To The Masculine Profession Of Software Development, since I will give you a how-to for web design, and a how-to for geting your feet wet in programming before you begin a specialization like software development. If you are still interested, let's begin.

You should understand this picture after your first day of coding in HTML.

Your First Language

Even though I personally started with a more esoteric programming language confined to economics departments, the first language I advise people to learn is HTML. Out of all the languages that have been developed, HTML is one of if not the easiest language to learn.

Some would argue that learning a language such as Java first would be better because it gives individuals less leeway to stray away from programming conventions due to strict rules within the language. I disagree with this—when we are taught multiplication, teachers use a “x” sign that denotes multiplication. They do not immediately tell us that *, x , ()() , & • are all multiplication signs, and tell us the conventions of when each individual sign is appropriate in the mathematics field. This is because, just like mathematics, coding takes a lot of effort and a long time to build up your skills. There is more of a chance of someone who is new to programming being able to beat the HTML learning curve at their first go compared to beating the Java learning curve.

To start learning HTML, I advise you to spend one hour a day at first. I personally learned HTML and CSS from Codeacademy. It is free, very easy to move through the lessons, and within the lesson they give you a set of code to work on along with showing you the effects of your code on the side screen, which gives you a great feel for how each individual tweak in the code changes the overall effect of the webpage.

Another good site that you can practically learn anything from is Lynda. It isn’t free but it does have a lot more content than code academy. I choose code academy over Lynda primarily due to the aesthetic qualities of the learning experience on code academy.

The order in which I learned HTML on code academy was the “HTML & CSS” course under language skills, followed by the “Make a Website” course under web developer skills. Following these two completed courses I finished off the HTML/CSS section with the “About You” goal; however, unless you want to repeat the course one or twice over, this is not enough content to really teach you how to code in HTML & CSS.

The way I boosted my content was by buying the HTML5 and CSS3 For Dummies book on Amazon as a reference guide. This will come in handy in your learning and will serve as a great reference for many years to come. In addition, I began to play with my own HTML and CSS on one of the many free domain sites. The site I used was http://www.geocities.ws/. The membership is free, and it is relatively easy to use. Just upload a notepad or text edit file (change the ending to .html or .css depending on the language you are using).

Even though I did it differently, I would suggest first glancing over what you are going to learn on code academy for the day (stick to around 1 lesson), read about it in the HTML/CSS book, do the code academy portion of your learning, and then try to implement it into your own webpage. Implementing what you learned into your own webpage has really helped my learning with the extra reinforcement and being able to immediately apply what I have learned gives me a great feeling of satisfaction.

HTML and CSS will probably take a few months to learn properly, and can change drastically depending on how much time you spend a day on learning your new skill.

The options are practically endless.

Where to go from there

After feeling very comfortable with HTML and CSS, the next language I would move on to would be Javascript, PHP, and jQuery, in that order. This is because if you have followed my advice up to this point, you already have a good habit where you are reading the HTML & CSS book (Javascript, PHP, and jQuery sections are also included in the previously linked book), doing code academy (there are lesson on code academy for Javascript, PHP, and jQuery, including a lot more content for these languages if you do the API lessons), and working on your own website (all these languages are in the field of web design).

If you finish code academy, finish the HTML and CSS book, and continually progress in developing your own webpage, you will have five programming languages under your belt, and have a skillset that is incredibly valuable to a potential employer.

Following learning these languages, you could buy a new books as supplementary and move on in code academy to learn Python and Ruby. If you were to move on to an harder language like Java and get flustered, I would suggest moving back to Python or Ruby, and continually learning the next hardest programming language that fits your skillset; however, you will most likely be comfortable with coding and will be easily able to branch into any other coding field you wish to.

You could go down my route of data analysis, learning Stata, R, and SAS; you could become an algorithmic trader by learning C++, or you could learn Perl and pull massive amounts of data off any given website. At this level, however, I would suggest learning some of the more advanced languages by taking courses at the local community college or university.

From personal experience in the matter, the harder the languages get, it is always best to have someone teaching you who has been around the block a few times and can teach you the conventions of the language. If you do get a specialization you wish to utilize in the real world, you will want to have great coding mannerisms for each language you learn, which get tougher to perfect as the languages get harder.

Where I would have been without programming.

Conclusion

If you follow this guide, I can assure you that you will become good at coding, and have picked up a skill that is useful in entrepreneurship, school, and good to put on a resume. Even if the skillset doesn't directly apply to your life, I have learned self-improvement requires keeping your brain nimble, which requires you to learn new skills and methodologies constantly.

I know without taking the chance to learn how to code, I probably would have been sitting in some auditing class right now contemplating suicide or living out the rest of my life as a perpetually-depressed white knight CPA. Always remember that there are other paths.

Read More: This May Be The Fastest Way To Learn A Language

Hannibal Menwell Creed
Hannibal is a student at DePaul University. He has few friends, lots of enemies, and even more hatred for Bernie Sanders supporting millennials. You can find him on campus working out, being a douche to piss off liberals, drinking black coffee mixed with whiskey, or studying. You can reach him at "".

How American Democracy Has Changed From The Days Of Tocqueville

January 26, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A French nobleman named Alexis de Tocqueville traveled to study America's then fifty-year-old democracy. The book that followed, Democracy In America, would soon be known as one of the most important ever written about democracy and essential reading for those interested in American history. Tocqueville starts off by giving his philosophy on government and democratic ideals before easing into an analysis of America's land, history, and style of government.

> Millions of men are marching at once towards the same horizon; their language, their religion, their manners differ, their object is the same. The gifts of fortune are promised in the West, and to the West they bend their course.
>
> […]
>
> In perusing the pages of our history, we shall scarcely meet with a single great event, in the lapse of seven hundred years, which has not turned to the > advantage of equality. The Crusades and the wars of the English decimated the nobles and divided their possessions; the erection of communities introduced an element of democratic liberty into the bosom of feudal monarchy; the invention of fire-arms equalized the villein and the noble on the field of battle; printing opened the same resources to the minds of all classes; the post was organized so as to bring the same information to the door of the poor man's cottage and to the gate of the palace; and Protestantism proclaimed that all men are alike able to find the road to heaven. The discovery of America offered a thousand new paths to fortune, and placed riches and power within the reach of the adventurous and the obscure.

>
> […]
>
> If, in polished countries, the lowest of the people are rude and uncivil, it is not merely because they are poor and ignorant, but that, being so, they are in daily contact with rich and enlightened men. The sight of their own hard lot and of their weakness, which is daily contrasted with the happiness and power of some of their fellow-creatures, excites in their hearts at the same time the sentiments of anger and of fear: the consciousness of their inferiority and of their dependence irritates while it humiliates them. This state of mind displays itself in their manners and language; they are at once insolent and servile. The truth of this is easily proved by observation; the people are more rude in aristocratic countries than elsewhere, in opulent cities than in rural districts. In those places where the rich and powerful are assembled together the weak and the indigent feel themselves oppressed by their inferior condition. Unable to perceive a single chance of regaining their equality, they give up to despair, and allow themselves to fall below the dignity of human nature.

He discusses the people who seeded America:

> Persecuted by the Government of the mother-country, and disgusted by the habits of a society opposed to the rigor of their own principles, the Puritans went forth to seek some rude and unfrequented part of the world, where they could live according to their own opinions, and worship God in freedom.
>
> […]
>
> The population of New England increased rapidly; and whilst the hierarchy of rank despotically classed the inhabitants of the mother-country, the colony continued to present the novel spectacle of a community homogeneous in all its parts. A democracy, more perfect than any which antiquity had dreamt of, started in full size and panoply from the midst of an ancient feudal society.
>
> […]
>
> The English Government was not dissatisfied with an emigration which removed the elements of fresh discord and of further revolutions. On the contrary, everything was done to encourage it, and great exertions were made to mitigate > the hardships of those who sought a shelter from the rigor of their country's laws on the soil of America. It seemed as if New England was a region given up to the dreams of fancy and the unrestrained experiments of innovators.

He was amazed at the advanced democratic ideals that the first settlers possessed:

> If, after having cast a rapid glance over the state of American society in 1650, we turn to the condition of Europe, and more especially to that of the Continent, at the same period, we cannot fail to be struck with astonishment. On the Continent of Europe, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, absolute monarchy had everywhere triumphed over the ruins of the oligarchical and feudal liberties of the Middle Ages. Never were the notions of right more completely confounded than in the midst of the splendor and literature of Europe; never was there less political activity among the people; never were the principles of true freedom less widely circulated; and at that very time those principles, which were scorned or unknown by the nations of Europe, were proclaimed in the deserts of the New World, and were accepted as the future creed of a great people.

He notes a total lack of aristocratic desire in America where aspiring nobles would accumulate landed estates to be passed on in whole. In America, land is parceled out to inheritors, encouraging diminution of great properties and less motivation on the part of inheritors to carry on the family name for generations.

> …it is not by privileges alone, nor by birth, but by landed property handed down from generation to generation, that an aristocracy is constituted. A nation may present immense fortunes and extreme wretchedness, but unless those fortunes are territorial there is no aristocracy, but simply the class of the rich and that of the poor.
>
> […]
>
> In the South, one man, aided by slaves, could cultivate a great extent of country: it was therefore common to see rich landed proprietors. But their influence was not altogether aristocratic as that term is understood in Europe, since they possessed no privileges; and the cultivation of their estates being carried on by slaves, they had no tenants depending on them, and consequently no patronage. Still, the great proprietors south of the Hudson constituted a superior class, having ideas and tastes of its own, and forming the centre of political action.
>
> […]
>
> In America the aristocratic element has always been feeble from its birth; and if at the present day it is not actually destroyed, it is at any rate so completely disabled that we can scarcely assign to it any degree of influence in the course of affairs. The democratic principle, on the contrary, has gained so much strength by time, by events, and by legislation, as to have become not only predominant but all-powerful. There is no family or corporate authority, and it is rare to find > even the influence of individual character enjoy any durability.

Why progressivism seems to advance linearly:

> When a nation modifies the elective qualification, it may easily be foreseen that sooner or later that qualification will be entirely abolished. There is no more invariable rule in the history of society: the further electoral rights are extended, the greater is the need of extending them; for after each concession the strength of the democracy increases, and its demands increase with its strength. The ambition of those who are below the appointed rate is irritated in exact proportion to the great number of those who are above it. The exception at last becomes the rule, concession follows concession, and no stop can be made short of universal suffrage.
>
> […]
>
> It cannot be denied that democratic institutions have a very strong tendency to promote the feeling of envy in the human heart; not so much because they afford to every one the means of rising to the level of any of his fellow-citizens, as because those means perpetually disappoint the persons who employ them. Democratic institutions awaken and foster a passion for equality which they can never entirely satisfy.

He believes there ought to be a mix of patriotism combined with local government:

> Whatever exertions may be made, no true power can be founded among men which does not depend upon the free union of their inclinations; and patriotism and religion are the only two motives in the world which can permanently direct the whole of a body politic to one end.
>
> Laws cannot succeed in rekindling the ardor of an extinguished faith, but men may be interested in the fate of their country by the laws. By this influence the vague impulse of patriotism, which never abandons the human heart, may be directed and revived; and if it be connected with the thoughts, the passions, and the daily habits of life, it may be consolidated into a durable and rational sentiment.
>
> […]
>
> What resistance can be offered to tyranny in a country where every private individual is impotent, and where the citizens are united by no common tie? Those who dread the license of the mob, and those who fear the rule of absolute power, ought alike to desire the progressive growth of provincial liberties.
>
> […]
>
> …in England I found others who attacked the aristocracy openly, but I know of no one who does not regard provincial independence as a great benefit. In both countries I have heard a thousand different causes assigned for the evils of the State, but the local system was never mentioned amongst them. I have heard > citizens attribute the power and prosperity of their country to a multitude of reasons, but they all placed the advantages of local institutions in the foremost rank.

>
> […]
>
> There is no country in the world in which everything can be provided for by the laws, or in which political institutions can prove a substitute for common sense and public morality.
>
> […]
>
> It is clear that the greater the privileges of the executive authority are, the greater is the temptation; the more the ambition of the candidates is excited, the more warmly are their interests espoused by a throng of partisans who hope to share the power when their patron has won the prize. The dangers of the elective system increase, therefore, in the exact ratio of the influence exercised by the executive power in the affairs of State.

It's clear that the President had far less power than today. Tocqueville made the office seem so ceremonial that only a man without ambition would want to pursue it.

> Hitherto no citizen has shown any disposition to expose his honor and his life in order to become the President of the United States; because the power of that office is temporary, limited, and subordinate. The prize of fortune must be great to encourage adventurers in so desperate a game. No candidate has as yet been able to arouse the dangerous enthusiasm or the passionate sympathies of the people in his favor, for the very simple reason that when he is at the head of the Government he has but little power, but little wealth, and but little glory to share amongst his friends; and his influence in the State is too small for the success or the ruin of a faction to depend upon the elevation of an individual to power.
>
> […]
>
> In the States the executive power is vested in the hands of a magistrate, who is apparently placed upon a level with the Legislature, but who is in reality nothing more than the blind agent and the passive instrument of its decisions. He can derive no influence from the duration of his functions

Federal powers grew over time, even though the Constitution was designed to place a considerable amount of power in the hands of the states. The Federal branch has usurped that power and now dominates.

> It is true the Constitution had laid down the precise limits of the Federal supremacy, but whenever this supremacy is contested by one of the States, a Federal tribunal decides the question.

He explains the need for a balance between nation states: be small enough to govern effectively on a local level but large enough to defend yourself against external threats. Small states are good for the people, but if that small state can be invaded and overrun, its main benefit would then be mute. The trend then becomes one of self-preservation instead of proper governance.

> Small nations are often impoverished, not because they are small, but because they are weak; the great empires prosper less because they are great than because they are strong. Physical strength is therefore one of the first conditions of the happiness and even of the existence of nations. Hence it occurs that, unless very peculiar circumstances intervene, small nations are always united to large empires in the end, either by force or by their own consent: yet I am unacquainted with a more deplorable spectacle than that of a people unable either to defend or to maintain its independence.

He was astonished to find that the Senate was filled with highly intelligent men while the House Of Representatives was stocked full of vulgar fools who could barely read. The reason? Back then, the Senate wasn't chosen by the people.

> What then is the cause of this strange contrast, and why are the most able citizens to be found in one assembly rather than in the other? Why is the former body remarkable for its vulgarity and its poverty of talent, whilst the latter seems to enjoy a monopoly of intelligence and of sound judgment? Both of these assemblies emanate from the people; both of them are chosen by universal suffrage; and no voice has hitherto been heard to assert in America that the Senate is hostile to the interests of the people. From what cause, then, does so startling a difference arise? The only reason which appears to me adequately to account for it is, that the House of Representatives is elected by the populace directly, and that the Senate is elected by elected bodies.
>
> […]
>
> The time may be already anticipated at which the American Republics will be obliged to introduce the plan of election by an elected body more frequently into their system of representation, or they will incur no small risk of perishing miserably amongst the shoals of democracy.

His omen has proved to be correct.

With the problems that America has today in the form of completely inept and bought-for politicians, would an aristocracy really be worse?

> In aristocratic governments the individuals who are placed at the head of affairs are rich men, who are solely desirous of power. In democracies statesmen are poor, and they have their fortunes to make. The consequence is that in aristocratic States the rulers are rarely accessible to corruption, and have very little craving for money; whilst the reverse is the case in democratic nations.
>
> […]
>
> In a democracy private citizens see a man of their own rank in life, who rises from that obscure position, and who becomes possessed of riches and of power > in a few years; the spectacle excites their surprise and their envy, and they are led to inquire how the person who was yesterday their equal is to-day their ruler. To attribute his rise to his talents or his virtues is unpleasant; for it is tacitly to acknowledge that they are themselves less virtuous and less talented than he was. They are therefore led (and not unfrequently their conjecture is a correct one) to impute his success mainly to some one of his defects; and an odious mixture is thus formed of the ideas of turpitude and power, unworthiness and success, utility and dishonor.

>
> […]
>
> The mass of the people may be led astray by ignorance or passion; the mind of a king may be biased, and his perseverance in his designs may be shaken—besides which a king is not immortal—but an aristocratic body is too numerous to be led astray by the blandishments of intrigue, and yet not numerous enough to yield readily to the intoxicating influence of unreflecting passion: it has the energy of a firm and enlightened individual, added to the power which it derives from perpetuity.
>
> […]
>
> When an individual or a party is wronged in the United States, to whom can he apply for redress? If to public opinion, public opinion constitutes the majority; if to the legislature, it represents the majority, and implicitly obeys its injunctions; if to the executive power, it is appointed by the majority, and remains a passive tool in its hands; the public troops consist of the majority under arms; the jury is the majority invested with the right of hearing judicial cases; and in certain States even the judges are elected by the majority.

God help you if you go against the majority, as many of us face at the moment:

> "You are free to think differently from me, and to retain your life, your property, and all that you possess; but if such be your determination, you are henceforth an alien among your people. You may retain your civil rights, but they will be useless to you, for you will never be chosen by your fellow-citizens if you solicit their suffrages, and they will affect to scorn you if you solicit their esteem. You will remain among men, but you will be deprived of the rights of mankind. Your fellow-creatures will shun you like an impure being, and those who are most persuaded of your innocence will abandon you too, lest they should be shunned in their turn. Go in peace! I have given you your life, but it is an existence in comparably worse than death."

He greatly overestimated an American's desire for true freedom in the face of being terrorized by external boogeymen made up by the state:

> I am persuaded that, if ever a despotic government is established in America, it will find it more difficult to surmount the habits which free institutions have > engendered than to conquer the attachment of the citizens to freedom.

The irony, of course, is that many American citizens still cling to their “freedom” while living in one of the most repressed police states in the world where a militarized police force can invade homes and kill nearly at will while the federal government spies on all his private affairs.

It’s often said that America was “founded by immigrants” as a justification for allowing millions of poor Mexicans to cross the border, but those advocates don’t mention the quality of immigrants that initially populated America.

> The number of foreign immigrants into the United States in the last fifty years (from 1820 to 1871) is stated to be 7,556,007. Of these, 4,104,553 spoke English—that is, they came from Great Britain, Ireland, or the British colonies; 2,643,069 came from Germany or northern Europe; and about half a million from the south of Europe.

A more apt statement would be “America was founded by people from the most advanced civilizations that existed at the time.” He captures the vigorous spirit and energy of those early Americans:

> At this very time thirteen millions of civilized Europeans are peaceably spreading over those fertile plains, with whose resources and whose extent they are not yet themselves accurately acquainted. Three or four thousand soldiers drive the wandering races of the aborigines before them; these are followed by the pioneers, who pierce the woods, scare off the beasts of prey, explore the courses of the inland streams, and make ready the triumphal procession of civilization across the waste.
>
> […]
>
> It is difficult to describe the rapacity with which the American rushes forward to secure the immense booty which fortune proffers to him. In the pursuit he fearlessly braves the arrow of the Indian and the distempers of the forest; he is unimpressed by the silence of the woods; the approach of beasts of prey does not disturb him; for he is goaded onwards by a passion more intense than the love of life. Before him lies a boundless continent, and he urges onwards as if time pressed, and he was afraid of finding no room for his exertions.
>
> […]
>
> Sometimes the progress of man is so rapid that the desert reappears behind him. The woods stoop to give him a passage, and spring up again when he has passed. It is not uncommon in crossing the new States of the West to meet with deserted dwellings in the midst of the wilds; the traveller frequently discovers the vestiges of a log house in the most solitary retreats, which bear witness to the power, and no less to the inconstancy of man. In these abandoned fields, and over these ruins of a day, the primeval forest soon scatters a fresh vegetation, > the beasts resume the haunts which were once their own, and Nature covers the traces of man's path with branches and with flowers, which obliterate his evanescent track.

>
> […]
>
> If we listen to their eulogies, we shall hear that nothing is more praiseworthy than to exchange the pure and homely pleasures which even the poor man tastes in his own country for the dull delights of prosperity under a foreign sky; to leave the patrimonial hearth and the turf beneath which his forefathers sleep; in short, to abandon the living and the dead in quest of fortune.

He spoke about the black man, adding that slavery was destined to end because it was not economically productive (states without slaves grew faster than those which had them):

> The negro of the United States has lost all remembrance of his country; the language which his forefathers spoke is never heard around him; he abjured their religion and forgot their customs when he ceased to belong to Africa, without acquiring any claim to European privileges. But he remains half way between the two communities; sold by the one, repulsed by the other; finding not a spot in the universe to call by the name of country, except the faint image of a home which the shelter of his master's roof affords.
>
> […]
>
> If he becomes free, independence is often felt by him to be a heavier burden than slavery; for having learned, in the course of his life, to submit to everything except reason, he is too much unacquainted with her dictates to obey them. A thousand new desires beset him, and he is destitute of the knowledge and energy necessary to resist them: these are masters which it is necessary to contend with, and he has learnt only to submit and obey. In short, he sinks to such a depth of wretchedness, that while servitude brutalizes, liberty destroys him.
>
> […]
>
> The negro makes a thousand fruitless efforts to insinuate himself amongst men who repulse him; he conforms to the tastes of his oppressors, adopts their opinions, and hopes by imitating them to form a part of their community. Having been told from infancy that his race is naturally inferior to that of the whites, he assents to the proposition and is ashamed of his own nature.

Economic growth was low in the South partly because labor was stigmatized as beneath the white man. So whites loafed around, letting slaves do all the work while immigrants who were ready to work hard populated the North.

He spoke about the Native American:

> The native of North America retains his opinions and the most insignificant of his > habits with a degree of tenacity which has no parallel in history. For more than two hundred years the wandering tribes of North America have had daily intercourse with the whites, and they have never derived from them either a custom or an idea.

>
> […]
>
> The negro, who earnestly desires to mingle his race with that of the European, cannot effect if; while the Indian, who might succeed to a certain extent, disdains to make the attempt. The servility of the one dooms him to slavery, the pride of the other to death.
>
> […]
>
> The Europeans introduced amongst the savages of North America fire-arms, ardent spirits, and iron: they taught them to exchange for manufactured stuffs, the rough garments which had previously satisfied their untutored simplicity. Having acquired new tastes, without the arts by which they could be gratified, the Indians were obliged to have recourse to the workmanship of the whites; but in return for their productions the savage had nothing to offer except the rich furs which still abounded in his woods. Hence the chase became necessary, not merely to provide for his subsistence, but in order to procure the only objects of barter which he could furnish to Europe. Whilst the wants of the natives were thus increasing, their resources continued to diminish.
>
> […]
>
> Their instinctive love of their country attaches them to the soil which gave them birth, even after it has ceased to yield anything but misery and death.
>
> […]
>
> Men who have once abandoned themselves to the restless and adventurous life of the hunter, feel an insurmountable disgust for the constant and regular labor which tillage requires.

Religion, while not perfect, did constrain the worst of human behavior.

> Religion is often unable to restrain man from the numberless temptations of fortune; nor can it check that passion for gain which every incident of his life contributes to arouse, but its influence over the mind of woman is supreme, and women are the protectors of morals. There is certainly no country in the world where the tie of marriage is so much respected as in America, or where conjugal happiness is more highly or worthily appreciated.
>
> […]
>
> In France I had almost always seen the spirit of religion and the spirit of freedom pursuing courses diametrically opposed to each other; but in America I found that they were intimately united, and that they reigned in common over the same country.

> […]
>
> Man alone, of all created beings, displays a natural contempt of existence, and yet a boundless desire to exist; he scorns life, but he dreads annihilation. These different feelings incessantly urge his soul to the contemplation of a future state, and religion directs his musings thither. Religion, then, is simply another form of hope; and it is no less natural to the human heart than hope itself. Men cannot abandon their religious faith without a kind of aberration of intellect, and a sort of violent distortion of their true natures; but they are invincibly brought back to more pious sentiments; for unbelief is an accident, and faith is the only permanent state of mankind.

We still have religion in America, but instead of believing in god, we have brainwashed citizens believing in progressivism, feminism, social justice, and homosexual lifestyles. Can we get the old god back?

Tocqueville remarks how South American countries copy-and-pasted the American constitution and its laws, but they remained basket cases. He suggests that it's the people themselves which have allowed America to prosper into a democratic nation, not just the written laws. Of course this is not allowed to be mentioned in schools today, and we're supposed to believe than an American man, an Asian man, and a Saudi Arabian man are all equal and possess the same propensity and desire for democracy and freedom.

> The manners of the Americans of the United States are, then, the real cause which renders that people the only one of the American nations that is able to support a democratic government; and it is the influence of manners which produces the different degrees of order and of prosperity that may be distinguished in the several Anglo-American democracies.

Here are some Tocqueville observations about America that have undoubtedly changed since his time.

> The conduct of the Federal Government is more fair and more temperate than that of the States, its designs are more fraught with wisdom, its projects are more durable and more skilfully combined, its measures are put into execution with more vigor and consistency.
>
> […]
>
> The men who are entrusted with the direction of public affairs in the United States are frequently inferior, both in point of capacity and of morality, to those whom aristocratic institutions would raise to power. But their interest is identified and confounded with that of the majority of their fellow-citizens. They may frequently be faithless and frequently mistaken, but they will never systematically adopt a line of conduct opposed to the will of the majority; and it is impossible that they should give a dangerous or an exclusive tendency to the > government.

>
> […]
>
> …unless some extraordinary event occurs, the Government of the Union will grow weaker and weaker every day.

A few additional quotes:

> A long war almost always places nations in the wretched alternative of being abandoned to ruin by defeat or to despotism by success.
>
> […]
>
> …it is easy to perceive that the wealthy members of the community entertain a hearty distaste to the democratic institutions of their country. The populace is at once the object of their scorn and of their fears.
>
> […]
>
> The words of a strong-minded man, which penetrate amidst the passions of a listening assembly, have more power than the vociferations of a thousand orators;
>
> […]
>
> No political form has hitherto been discovered which is equally favorable to the prosperity and the development of all the classes into which society is divided.
>
> […]
>
> There are no great men without virtue, and there are no great nations—it may almost be added that there would be no society—without the notion of rights; for what is the condition of a mass of rational and intelligent beings who are only united together by the bond of force?

His closing thoughts:

> It cannot be denied that the British race has acquired an amazing preponderance over all the other European races in the New World; and that it is very superior to them in civilization, in industry, and in power.
>
> […]
>
> When I contemplate the ardor with which the Anglo-Americans prosecute commercial enterprise, the advantages which befriend them, and the success of their undertakings, I cannot refrain from believing that they will one day become the first maritime power of the globe. They are born to rule the seas, as the Romans were to conquer the world.

A lamentation I had while reading this book is how men today are limited in their pursuit of adventure, exploration, and conquest. Back then, if you were hungry, ambitious, and brave, you could venture to a new American frontier and help establish entirely new cities with little government interference. Your opportunity would only be limited by your willingness to work and defend yourself. But today, all cities and social places are defined. There is no new frontier where you can be self-made unless you want be a programmer or e-book hustler. Men of the past have created a great civilization so that we can comfortably sit today in front of computer screens and fit into existing pegs instead of carving out our own.

This is one of the most dry books I've read, but if you're interested in American history or government, or if you're an American yourself, it's an essential read. I can't say I enjoyed much of it, but I am satisfied at the knowledge and insights I gained.

Read More: "Democracy In America" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Black Or African-American?

January 27, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Though I stopped watching the news quite some time ago I'm still able to stay up to date on the day's current events through friends, acquaintances, updates on my phone, et al. This principle held true when fellow columnist Blair Naso recently made me aware of some criticism CNN has taken of late for referring to French hostage taker, Amedi Coulibaly, as "African American."

Coulibaly

Some say he should have been referred to as black, some say he should have been referred to as African-French, and some say it doesn't matter. I didn't dig too deep into this story but it definitely got me thinking about the age old-debate over what Blacks or African-Americans in this country wish to be called: Black or African-American.

Two Schools Of Thought: Nationality vs. Race

The debate over what black people in this country prefer to be called sometimes boils down to nationality versus race. Nationality being African-American, race being black.

People who argue on the nationality side cite the importance of not rejecting one's heritage using the adages such as "never forget where you come from," "don't forget the motherland" and the like. Proponents of this vernacular also state that it has a more positive connotation inside and outside the black community (more on that later).

However, this side of the debate raises a fair amount of questions including but not limited to:

Should we call white people German-American, Polish-Americans, or whatever bloodlines they come from?

How are we supposed to know a person's nationality?

Why do people assume all blacks originate from Africa? What about those who don't?

Do we ask everybody?

And this is what brings us the the other side of the coin, which is race. Advocates of the designation "Black" often state that it's an easier, less invasive way of allusion. Rather than trying to be PC by guessing a person's nationality and perhaps being incorrect, they would rather just mention a person's race.

For example, persons of Hispanic or Latino descent sometimes take offense to being referred to by the wrong nationality. I dated a few Puerto Rican girls when I lived in New York City who detest being mistaken for a Dominican and I dated one Mexican girl who got visibly aggravated when the waitress asked her if she was from Guatemala.

[image]
Puerto Ricans are a proud people

This doesn't happen all the time, but I've seen it enough to get my attention. The one exception is game application. Latinas love when men playfully guess their nationality because it allows them to be mysterious, coy, and chased which makes them feel feminine and will make them receptive to game and escalation. Plus it's a great conversation starter when hitting on hot mamis.

There are also generational implications. Those on this side of the argument state that they prefer to be referred to as black because they were born and raised in America. Hyphenated nationalities, in their minds, pertain only to those who immigrated to this country like Irish-Americans or Italian-Americans.

On the other hand, how weird would it be to hear someone say "Yeah, go talk to the yellow guy at XYZ store if you want the best deal," when talking about an Asian? How odd would it be to describe someone of Native-American descent as "a red guy?"

Truth is the only color label that doesn't sound weird when used is black because the moniker "person of color" in America most likely refers to someone who is black even though Indians, Mexicans, Samoans, other Pacific Islanders, and Hispanics have a darker hue to their skin.

Whatever side of the argument one finds themselves on, one element that cannot be argued are the…

Social Implications

In Part 2 of my Villains Series, I mentioned the fact that I was friends with a guy who was a cop for quite a while. He was a cool guy and was always brutally honest when we peppered him with questions about being a cop. He never pulled punches, never ducked questions, and always kept it 100. He answered ’em all no matter what they were.

I remember him telling us that when any given suspect was referred to as a “black male” his partner and now life-long friend was always bothered by this description. It wasn’t that the description was inaccurate, it was that the phrase “black male” carried a negative connotation with it and had the potential to alter the mindset of the responding officers.

“Don’t mistake me,” he said, “I’m not sayin’ when we get the call with that description we see red and get ready for a gun fight but it did make a small difference in our mindset. Even with Harrison (his partner).”

Descriptions make a difference…even with black cops

This article is one of many that backs this notion:

> In one study, we randomly assigned white participants to associate words with either blacks or African-Americans. Specifically, they selected 10 terms out of a list of 75 (e.g. aggressive, ambitious) that they felt best described each group. The participants that evaluated blacks chose significantly more negative words than those who evaluated African-Americans. Notably, whites did not associate more negative words with “Whites” than with “Caucasians.

I’m not one that puts too much stock in “studies” or “research” but it would be disingenuous not to admit that there is some truth to this. As uncomfortable as it is for some people to hear, the word “black” when used to describe a black person often conjures up negative emotions both consciously and subconsciously—even with black people.

But the term African-American can sometimes sound pretentious or try hard. For example:

“She only dates black guys.” This statement can elicit or imply negativity for many reasons (which is a whole ‘nother article).

“She exclusively commingles with African-American Males.” Okay, so that was a little over the top but you get the idea.

I suppose there’s a happy medium out there somewhere and non-blacks in this country struggle to find this balance on a daily basis. Being labeled a racist is the new scarlet letter and most people avoid it like the plague. Naso, who hails from the South, confirmed as much during our conversation:

> I’ve found that people here are terrified of being labeled racist.

Having lived all over the U.S. myself, including the South, I know Blair is right on the money. But that same fear permeates the entire nation regardless of region so the fear is real. So much so that a good segment of the population feels that even using the word “black” to describe a black person will be construed as racist so they skew more toward African-American or a softer description such as “brother” or “sister” as their preferred rendition for describing a person of color if they don’t shy away from any descriptions altogether.

The bottom line is that for people who overly concern themselves of the opinions of those around them this can be catch-22 on many different levels. In their minds, you’re damned if you do, and damned if you don’t.

What Do Black People Think?

50 years ago this would have been a very easy question to answer, but the melting pot that the U.S. has become over the last half century makes this a much more complicated one.

Mixed race people often feel they’re being forced to choose between two labels that don’t accurately describe them. Choosing to be called either one effectively eliminates the contribution of the other to their ethnicity.

Jason Kidd’s father was black, his mother was white

The same goes with black people whose bloodlines trace back to places other than Africa such as the Caribbean, Brazil, or Central American countries like Panama and Nicaragua. Choosing one or the other, completely omits their own nationalities which they are very proud of.

Dark-skinned Brazilian

As far as American blacks (like myself) are concerned, it’s probably about a 50/50 split. As stated above I’ve heard good and bad arguments on both sides of the fence. Walking into any barber shop in a black neighborhood and posing this question always makes for a lively and spirited debate.

And then there are white people who were born and raised in Africa. A former co-worker of mine lived in Johannesburg, South Africa from the day he was born until he moved stateside at 25. He regularly called himself an African-American and felt no shame in doing so and according to him a good number of white African immigrants refer to themselves as such.

Charlize Theron is a white African-American

So what do black people think? It depends on who you ask.

Does it matter?

Personally, I don't give a shit how people label me or refer to my race, nationality, ethnicity or whatever else when describing me. As far as I'm concerned black people, more specifically men, that spend time and energy trying to beat their personal preference into the minds of society at large are betas who are displaying solipsism at a feminist level.

Men of all races who are confident and have a strong sense of who they truly are (read: alpha) have no problem with saying or being called "That white guy" or "That black guy" because they know it doesn't matter in the grand scheme of things. The more shits you give about something as inconsequential as a superficial label, the less you have going on in your life. To put it bluntly they've got better shit to do than to sit around and bitch about name classifications and I count myself in that group.

Having a preference is perfectly fine. But putting in too much time, effort, or emotion into something like this is a waste of time.

The short answer to this question is that it only matters as much as a person allows it to. That sounds cliche but it's true. Case in point: I've been called black, African-American, a brother, a brotha, a nigga, and a nigger and none of those affected my life in the least because I don't allow it to.

Maybe being called the dreaded n-word would have ruffled my feathers a bit more if I had a different upbringing, but the fact that I wasn't exposed to racial issues on account of being raised on military bases may have a lot to do with my lack of sensitivity to this silly attempt to enrage me.

Now I can certainly understand how titles or labels can affect people. Especially when one has grown up around it and have had negative experiences related to those descriptions. But at some point in life we all have to decide not to let certain things like this control our behavior or emotion. Some of these will be easier than others but doing this helps create mental strength and frame.

So now I pose these questions to men of all races. Do you prefer to be labeled according to race, your ethnicity, your nationality or something else? How much does it matter to you if at all? What do your immediate and distance family members think and why? What have you heard from friends and acquaintances of different races?

Read Next: The Next Fifty Years Of Race And Culture In America

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

J.M. Coetzee: Yet Another Nobel Prize Winning Hypocrite

January 27, 2015 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

In 1948, the Boer government of South Africa enacted a policy called Apartheid. The main purpose of this policy was to segregate the population of South Africa along racial lines—keeping the blacks, coloureds, Indians, and whites separated from one another. As with any racially influenced debate, opinions on the merit and successes of Apartheid (which ended under intense global pressure in 1994) are sharply divided.

One side of the debate typically argues that the segregation of blacks by the white Boer was a crime against the very decency of humanity, and that the treatment of black people by the Apartheid regime were unforgivable acts of bigotry for which white South Africans should be held accountable for. They view the Apartheid regime as one of censorship, forced relocation, and clandestine murders, all of which are wholly unjustified, and that South Africa was an immoral state for half of the twentieth-century.

The other side counters that, while there were crimes committed by the Apartheid government against the black South Africans, the actions of black South Africans post-Apartheid show that the Boer policy was correct and justified. Crime rates, especially those of rape, have sky rocketed since the end of Apartheid.

Although crimes by the black population against the whites are so pervasive and persistent as to put white South Africans on genocide watch, the exorbitant crime rate affects all peoples—last year, the black captain of the national soccer team was killed in a home invasion. Inequality between the rich and poor has widened, and AIDS and HIV infections have become rampant. To top it all off, members of the (currently) ruling ANC party have sung songs containing lyrics which call for the murder of whites, including leftist cultural hero Nelson Mandela.

It’s obvious to see what side of the debate I’m on.

Unfortunately for myself (and quite fortunately for humanity, probably) my opinion on Apartheid is moot. I was one year old when Apartheid was repealed, and I am not even a citizen of South Africa. My writing only reaches a small segment of the population, and most of those readers are quite likely already on the second side of the Apartheid debate.

So let me bash someone who was a South African citizen, who was anti-Apartheid and who was most definitely influential about the debate; John Maxwell Coetzee: authour, smarmy douchebag, and winner of the 2003 Nobel Prize in Literature.

Who Is J.M. Coetzee?

Commonly referred to as J.M. Coetzee (and who will be referred to solely as Coetzee for the rest of the article because I’m lazy and you’re already bored), John Maxwell Coetzee was born in South Africa in 1940 to a Afrikaner family with roots in South Africa dating back to the 17th century.

Unlike many white children in South Africa today, Coetzee grew up under the safety of the Apartheid government. His childhood was one of bored safety and prosperity; his memoir of that time is a fictionalized autobiography, which means he basically makes up strife about his privileged childhood to make himself look more disadvantaged then he actually was.

While many modern Afrikaner children have to deal with all manner of harm being inflicted upon them by a desegregated multicultural society, Coetzee had a relatively sheltered upbringing and came of age during the radical 60's. Coetzee spent most of his 20's attending universities, first moving to the United Kingdom in 1962 and then to the United States in 1965.

He gathered degree after degree (and likely indulged in the sexual revolution with a bevy of co-eds) and participated in anti-Vietnam protests (which cost him a chance at American citizenship…there once was a time the US didn't take too kindly to rich foreigners spitting on their veterans). Interestingly, while Coetzee was living a life of plenty and privilege in the US (and protesting the service of the young men of his host country while sleeping with their women), many of his Afrikaner peers were being conscripted to fight in a border war with Angola.

Portrait of a spoiled leftist

In 1968, at the ripe old age of 28, Coetzee got a cushy job teaching at the State University of New York at Buffalo and shortly thereafter wrote his first book in 1971. Coetzee's writing, as with most people with too much intelligence and privilege and too little wisdom and experience in the real world, was written from a leftist bent, criticizing what he sees as oppressive systems (the [exaggerated] evils of colonization and closed nations which protect their own people are a recurring theme in his book).

Coetzee claims to be neither leftist nor right, portraying himself as being above both, though as mentioned before Coetzee is a) white; b) privileged; and c) spent most of the 1960's in universities. I'll let you judge for yourself if Coetzee comes across as the most intolerable kind of leftist; here is the plot summary from another of his autobiographical books [words bolded by Billy]:

> Youth (or Youth: Scenes from Provincial Life II) (2002) is a semi-fictionalised autobiographical novel by J. M. Coetzee, recounting his struggles in 1960s London after fleeing the political unrest of Cape Town.
>
> After graduating in mathematics and English, he moves in the hope of finding inspiration of becoming a poet and finding the woman of his dreams. However he finds none of this and instead, takes up a tedious job as a computer programmer. He feels alienated from the natives and never settles down, always aware of the scorn they see him with. He engages in a series of affairs, none of them fulfilling to him in the slightest. He scorns people's inabilities to see through his dull exterior into the 'flame' inside him; none of the > women he meets evokes in him the passion that, according to him, would allow his artistry to flourish and thus produce great poetry.

Here are two quotes from the book itself:

> At the Everyman Cinema there is a season of Satyajit Ray. He watches the Apu trilogy on successive nights in a state of rapt absorption. In Apu's bitter, trapped mother, his engaging, feckless father he recognizes, with a pang of guilt, his own parents. But it is the music above all that grips him, dizzyingly complex interplays between drums and stringed instruments, long arias on the flute whose scale or mode — he does not know enough about music theory to be sure which — catches at his heart, sending him into a mood of sensual melancholy that last long after the film has ended.

You can instantly tell a person's political affiliation by asking them which of these two movies they would rather watch,

Here is a man who: flees political action in his own country, only to protest safely in another country which cannot charge him with any serious crime for political action or conscript him; who aspires to be a poet; who gets angry at people for not seeing how great he is; who watches "worldly" films from non-white countries; and who hates his parents, who treated him so badly that Coetzee is able to literally travel around the world and waste his youth banging out the burgeoning horde of Anglo sluts.

Oh – and he also is "alienated" from his fellow whites in the white countries he goes to, even though he has no trouble bedding the women of those countries. Coetzee is spoiled, hates his parents, hates his skin colour (though not the women who share his skin colour), is completely self assured of his own genius—though he blames others for not becoming the world's greatest poet that he knows he is. Remind you of any members of the modern ultra left?

Seriously though; in the last golden age of Hollywood movies, Coetzee finds the Apu Trilogy to be his closest to his soul? Jesus Christ.

Coetzee returns to South Africa to guilt his fellow whites

In the early 70's, when the political turmoil had abated somewhat and too old and prestigious to be conscripted into the military to fight he ongoing bush war, Coetzee returned to South Africa and continued his writing career with furor. Coetzee's anti-white, anti-nationalist, anti-western book themes found a very receptive audience amongst the boomer liberals and Marxists who had taken over the intellectual establishments during the 60's and 70's.

During speeches at award ceremonies (the ones he could be bothered going to: Coetzee is infamous for not even bothering to show to collect his awards—unless, of course, they're top-tier honours), Coetzee would rile on about the social inequalities about the Apartheid regime, especially in relation to its art.

> South African literature is a literature in bondage. It is a less than fully human literature. It is exactly the kind of literature you would expect people to write from prison.

Coetzee publicly called for an end to Apartheid. Remember: this is a man who grew up in a safe, nearly all white community, which was provided by the policy of Apartheid. This is a man who fled South Africa's political turmoil when it might have affected him. Living a life of luxury, living in a community protected by people whom he implied were less than human, Coetzee pushed hard to end Apartheid.

Though not the sole proponent of anti-Apartheid, and certainly not the most important member of the movement, Coetzee's wish finally came true in 1994. Apartheid, under intense international and local pressure, was ended.

And the crime wave began.

South Africans of all ethnicities came under attack as the stern fist of Apartheid was swept from the land. A terrorist who had signed off on bombings which had killed dozens of people was put in charge, and his thuggish party, openly espousing murderous racial hate, brought in a corrupt regime which to this day continues to expand the gulf between the rich and the poor of all ethnicities in South Africa. Black, Indian, white—for all these people, violence is a very real possibility.

Coetzee does what he does best

So, Coetzee had finally gotten his wish, and the bondage in South Africa had been lifted. Now it was time for Coetzee to enjoy the fruits of his labours, right? After all, this was exactly what he wanted. He was a moral crusader—nay! He was a liberator! A paragon of human rights! This was a victory for not only him, nor just for South Africa, but for the world!

Yet it turns out that the newly unleashed violent elements of South Africa didn't quite agree with Coetzee's ego. They liberally targeted all peoples, the blacks, the whites—even the good whites, like Coetzee and his friends. Coetzee's final book as a citizen of South Africa was Disgrace (1999), which features an assault on a white man and a white woman being raped pregnant by some black men. Though very popular with the moralist crowd, several black South African politicians were angered and publicly denounced Coetzee.

They needn't have worried though; Coetzee is a man lacking all moral and ethical fibre. Shortly after Apartheid ended, and his fellow citizens were being subjected to cruelties beyond imagining, Coetzee went house shopping. And by house shopping, I mean he went looking for another country. In 2002, a short 8 years after Apartheid had ended, Coetzee fled to Australia, abandoning post-Apartheid South Africa to its fate. Coetzee gave an incredibly pathetic excuse for doing so:

> I did not so much leave South Africa, a country with which I retain strong emotional ties, but come to Australia. I came because from the time of my first visit in 1991, I was attracted by the free and generous spirit of the people, by the beauty of the land itself and – when I first saw Adelaide – by the grace of the city that I now have the honour of calling my home.

Yes, Coetzee didn't "abandon" South Africa. He just…came, to somewhere else; even though he initially admitted he fled because of the waxing crime rate. It's amazing that so many people can say with a straight face that Coetzee is one of the premier authors writing today.

Of course the truth of the matter was that Coetzee fled South Africa because of the crime. He wanted to tear down a system which—while admittedly oppressive toward one specific group—kept a semblance of peace amongst all the races in South Africa. Once it was torn down and it was time to rebuild, and it was time for Coetzee's to put his money where his mouth was and actually do something besides criticize, guilt, and moralize, when he finally got to live in the exact type of society he so virulently professed to wanting to live in, he fled like the coward he is to another country…one which just so happened to be predominantly white. I thought Coetzee was alienated by whites? He professed to feeling a spiritual connection to some Indians. Why not move to India?

No, it was to the white country of Australia that this holier-than-thou man fled, and the next year to award Coetzee for all his moral crusading they gave him the 2003 Nobel Peace Prize in Literature (citing his place of residence as South Africa instead of Australia where it actually was). Since it was so prestigious, Coetzee actually showed up in Stockholm to collect his prize. Instead of a speech he read from Robinson Crusoe.

A hypocrite as old as time

So now, while many South Africans live in constant fear, facing perpetual violence, J.M. Coetzee is sunning himself in the vastly more peaceful continent of Australia. He's still writing.

It's funny how consistent these types are with their hypocrisy. People like Coetzee, and modern leftists and social justice warriors and anti-racists and all these other so called humanists and moral crusaders endlessly spew about the injustices of the world, and how we need to tear down the barriers and throw away the system and start afresh…yet they're almost always amongst the first ones to flee once those very barriers are taken down and it's time to get dirty and start the rebuilding.

You see it amongst the democrats in the United States, who vote in slick politicians parroting their democratic ideals—then they flee the state when those ideals are enacted, only to repeat their same idiotic choices while looking down on the less enlightened. White people spouting anti-racist sentiments then moving out of their neighborhood the moment the first non-whites begin showing up is so common it's a cliché.

I myself am a former Neo-Nazi, and yet I have more brown, black, Asian and [insert race here] friends than the most fervent anti-racist I know, who is a suburban white girl who hasn't even so much as taken a poking from a penis that wasn't snow white yet once railed for damn near two hours about the lack of diversity in our university dorm. She's currently engaged to a white guy and lives in a lily white town of about 3,000 people in rural Canada.

We need to stop tolerating people like Coetzee and all these other goddamn moralizers, because it's going to be the common people that pay for their self righteousness. When the going gets tough, rich, privileged scum-bags like Coetzee have no problem financially or ethnically about fleeing to greener pastures, and leaving behind their poorer and nobler peers to clean up after them.

It's time to stop caring about what Coetzee and all the people like him have to say. Because I can guarantee you, at the end of the day, whatever your race, they sure as hell do not care about you. They see all of us as nothing more than pawns to feed their egos. Let them starve.

Read More: Nobel Peace Prize Recipiant Malala Yousafzai Is A Coward And A Hypocrite

Billy Chubbs

Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

4 Steps For Fighting Divorce Rape

January 27, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

This article assumes that you face a breakup, see signs of a breakup in the future, or have realized that you wish to break up with a girl who has the opportunity to legally pursue asset settlements, child support, or child custody processes against you.

Every situation is different, of course, and requires different tactics. Different jurisdictions, family structures, financial circumstances and personal preferences lead to different issues and different outcomes. The point of this article is not to detail specific tactics to use but to set the tone and mentally prepare for what may be a coming battle.

Just to make it clear, I am not a qualified lawyer, this is not official legal advice, just a guide. I have to advise you to consult a lawyer, even though it probably won't help much anyway.

1. Get the right paradigm

Switch to a business-like approach

Understand that this should not be treated as an emotional crisis or a crisis of love. Once that hammer falls and it's over, this is a business process and a legal process—treat it that way. One reason divorce rape is so devastating for men is that they are still playing with their hearts and not with their heads.

Instead try to imagine it as a game you want to win. The rules of games are not always sensible or fair, but they exist and have to be dealt with. Maybe you have lawyers chasing you, lies are being told, and unfair laws being used against you. That's a setback and it's sad, but don't take it personally. Think rationally about what is the best chance of getting back in the game on the best terms that are available to you.

The rules are stacked against men, but that's no excuse for sitting down and crying. Cool off, fight back, win, then it will seem quite satisfying to consider it a personal matter, not before.

2. Moral armament

Many men feel paralyzed in the face of the law. They can't quite bring themselves to fight to the limit because they don't feel morally empowered to do so. Don't take that attitude. Just because it's law doesn't mean it is just. If the laws are being used against you are immoral there is no reason to feel bound by morality. It's called the principal of self defense.

When attacked it is acceptable to respond in kind. If you are mugged by a man with a knife it's probably not a good idea to fight back physically, but there is no moral obligation to mention the cash in your back pocket either. Take the same attitude to the government in this situation. They are trying to steal your hard-won assets as a property settlement, your hard earned income as child support, and take your children away from you.

They will not give you the things a man should be rightfully entitled to in return. Don't feel obliged to be open, generous, reasonable or honorable in the face of straight out theft.

3. Learn the rules

Family law is a labyrinth of rules, regulations and precedents. The more you personally know, the better the chances of coming out in a good position. Lawyers can help, but don't rely on them. If you put yourself in the hands of a lawyer fully, that will usually just mean waiting passively for the system to grind expensively to its conclusion. It won't be presented that way, but that is what will happen.

That will be just fine for the lawyer, but not for you. Many of the best tactics will be outside their sphere of interest or not acceptable for them to mention, so they won't mention them. Start learning the rules of the game, personally. Think of it as a second job or a night course, it's that important. Legal systems are usually hopelessly slow, clumsy, and imprecise. Know when, where, and how you can take advantage of those weaknesses.

4. Think outside the box and hit the ground running

Passivity, despair and fatalism are great enemies in this fight. The law will assume that most circumstances are fixed, but they don't have to be. Don't sit and wait for things to happen, make them happen. In many jurisdictions matters take a long time to be settled, so hustle while you wait.

Start drawing money out of accounts as soon as it's certain to be over. Change your apparent family structure, work and living arrangements to your advantage. Possession is most of the law, so get as many assets and family members into your possession as possible.

Starve her of funds. Find ways to reduce your legal income. Make payments in advance to hide assets. Arrange to have or claim to have other dependents you have to support. Escape to another jurisdiction along with your money. Never agree to any request without getting something in return, even if it seems reasonable in isolation. Don't overlook small gains, they add up. The specific tactics are not the point here. The point is to do something. There are many ways to improve your position, so start doing them right now and don't stop.

This doesn't have to be the end—learn to adapt

The end of one era is just the beginning of another

Men who feel that their lives are over after a divorce are usually those whose lives were over before their divorce. People who thought that they shouldn't need to adapt to circumstances and that their future was just going to be more of the same.

There are other jobs. There are other towns. There are other girls. There are other opportunities. There are even other countries. Some of these options will lead to a good life after a divorce. Work out which ones those are, then go and get some.

Read More: Why The U.S. Divorce Rate Is Not Important

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

The Two Types Of Nice Guys

January 27, 2015 | by Tony Moze | Link | Original Link

I have experienced countless men struggle with women and relationships in general. It took some growing up, experiencing interactions, and reading personal accounts from the manosphere to give me a clearer insight on the intentions of fellow men, as well as point out the types of men who thrive and/or struggle.

People keep saying the phrase “nice guys finish last,” but is that entirely true? Being a nice guy and whether he finishes last is based on context. Perhaps we should take a better look at what we mean by “nice guy,” and depending who he is can help or hinder his progression in attracting women and other relations. Here are two scenarios and outcomes that will allow you to differentiate one type of nice guy over the other.

Nice Guy #1

This type is the traditionally nice guy: respectful, considerate, positive and friendly guy who is attentive to every one’s needs before his own. He goes out of his way to please everyone. Even if he has been stressed out all week with work, relationships or just himself, he makes sure that he appeases his girlfriend with roses delivered to her job, or calls and texts incessantly to say “I love you.” He frees up his gym time, massage and hapkido sessions to go party with acquaintances, who he labels as “close friends,” even though the group has not contacted him in months, hanging exclusively with each other.

This guy is an amazing worker, having excellent reports from clients and work superiors. He is highly intelligent and wise, well-dressed and groomed and knows the ins-and-outs of his company, making him a very valuable and respected employee. His immediate boss, however, does not think so, and most of it stems through jealousy. This guy’s boss finds everything in his willpower to keep this guy from moving up the ladder. He also gives him multiple assignments, leaving him to work late nights and weekends. This guy could go up the chain of command to report his boss and demand a raise, but he is worried about what that might do to his career. So this guy continues to be a “Yes man”, kneeling in fear and submission towards each request. A typical dialogue follows:

“What is wrong with you? I called/texted you 30 minutes ago. Why didn’t you pick up the phone!? You’re such a dumb fuck! Geez you make me angry!” irritably states his friends/employer/significant other.

To girlfriend: “I am so sorry! I apologize! I will make sure to always have my phone around me. Do you need me to be close to home today, babe?”

To boss: “Do you want me to stay late at the office tonight? Should I be on call in case you need something?” he inquires to his boss.

Because people are used to him and his selfless ways, they rely on him, so even at the slightest lack of servitude, the tiniest ounce of inattention toward their needs, his friends, family and employees ridicule and criticize his behavior, which reinforce this guy to care highly of their expectations of him.

Nice Guy #2

The second type is the guy who is kind, respectful, considerate, positive, social and attentive to everyone AFTER his needs are met. He normally cares about his health and happiness as his first priority. He makes sure he grabs a full nights rest, hits the gym, eats nutritiously, reads, meditates, attends his massage sessions, etc. His girlfriend gets angry because she has not seen him much this whole week. His mother worries about why he has not called to check-in within the past month, his close friends and acquaintances are texting and leaving him voicemails like “What the fuck, dude!? We have been texting you all day/week/month and I haven’t heard anything from you. Where have you been!?”

None of these comments bother him, because he knows he deserves what he has been doing for himself, and will get back to these people whenever he is available. “Yeah, they can all wait until I am done with what I need to do first.”

This guy does a checklist for himself: “Did I take care of myself first? Check. Then I can go and help xyz person(s) to do xyz thing(s). Did I take care of what I needed to do for myself today or at this moment? No. Then I cannot help xyz person(s) to do xyz thing(s).”

If his girlfriend nags, he believes to himself, “How dare her even think this way!? I am great and she knows it! She needs to shut up, and wait until I am finished with what I have to do!” If his boys always try to make him pick up the bar tab, he asserts himself by telling them, “No, fuck that, I did that last time! Either all of you are contributing to this bill, or I am paying my portion and going home!”

If he ate and rested well, meditated, completed a great workout session, or finished up his personal errands, he is ready to help out the next man, but he is his first priority.

Outcome for Nice Guy #1

This type of guy ultimately encounters issues such as depression, anxiety, neurosis, perhaps even psychosis. He is the guy who gets taken advantage by everyone. This guy appears to show the least masculinity; submissiveness being a clear indicator. He not only gets a lack of respect from others, but more importantly he does not respect himself.

Those from the manosphere would describe him as a beta boy. Women can't really pinpoint or consciously describe his unattractive behavior but would plainly state to their girls, "He's a nice guy, but I'm not interested," what his employers would report are statements such as, "He is not a leader," or "He does not possess strong qualities to move up the chain," and those guys whom he calls "best friends" see him as a last resort when they need someone to pick up the bar tab or be the designated driver. On the inside he is disgusted with himself, as well as those on the outside of him.

Outcome for Nice Guy #2

The type of guy is ultimately happy and healthy. Not only do people respect him, but most importantly he respects himself. He is your classic definition of a "gentleman" because he is a positive person to all beings, but takes care of himself first and foremost. Because he puts his needs first, he gives off the vibes of "asshole," "masculine," or "alpha," making him very attractive towards women and other people.

This type of nice guy is regarded by his work superiors as a "strong leader who gets the job done." He is the calmer and level headed of the two types, assertive when he needs to be, and seems to have everyone swarming to him, whether it be sex, friendships or the go-to man at his company when shit hits the fan. On the inside he is content and pleased with himself, as well as those on the outside of him.

Conclusion

Gentlemen, it is okay to be a nice guy. What it comes down to is your health and happiness first, and by doing otherwise you are only attracting sickness and bad circumstances. A “bad boy” may be seen as the one who gets all, but when comparing the “bad boy” to “nice guy #2”, you will find that the guy who is nice yet puts his needs before anyone else is actually at the advantage.

When I say to be positive, polite, respectful, happy or considerate, I am talking about being positive and considerate for yourself first. Come up with a “me first” checklist, asking yourself, “Did I do xyz thing(s) for myself? If yes then I can proceed to help out the next man.” If the answer is “no” then that next man can wait until you are done with what you want to do.

Become well versed—read, meditate, exercise, travel, write and record a song, and learn about women and cultures. When you are positive to yourself first, you are increasing your mental and physical well-being, strengthening your immune system and brain. Be that nice guy to yourself primarily, and watch secondarily as good things happen for you, such as attracting women. Because being a nice guy does have its advantages. You just have to choose which TYPE of nice guy you want to be.

Read More: Why Nice Guys Exist In America

Tony Moze
Tony is a philanthropist and philosopher. He spends his free time reading, traveling the world, exercising and living in the moment.

Sorry, But Attraction Alone Is Not Enough

January 28, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Men often wonder how they can create attraction in women—indeed, it is probably one of the most talked-about topics in game. This is why newbies set so much store on openers. They believe that if they can just come up with that perfect line, that clever gambit, then the girl will be so attracted that she will instantly fall into bed with him.

Unfortunately, what you will learn after a period of time in the field is that just as words are cheap, so is attraction.

A friend of mine recently told me about how attracted this girl he had been working on had gotten to him at a party. She had made all the right signs — playing with her hair, following him around, making "anime eyes" and so on.

"Did you bang her?" I asked.

"No – I had to leave early."

"So have you spoken to her since?"

His brow furrowed a little. He was troubled.

"No. Funny thing is, she hasn't replied to the text I sent her yesterday yet."

Of course, it goes without saying he's still waiting for her response — it's highly unlikely he'll ever see her again.

Guys, the fact is, just as we get turned on by multiple women on any given day, so girls are also attracted to a multitude of guys. Now, it may not be an equal number –due to their higher levels of testosterone, men tend to be more horny on average. But the principle remains. She may well have been attracted to you in that moment, but unless you capitalize on this and escalate, the chances are her mind will be on some other dude later on that same day.

Game is a binary proposition

In essence, game is a binary proposition. You either get the girl (that is, sleep with her) or you don't. There is no middle ground. Or, actually there is, but no-one wants to be there—it's called the friendzone.

We must also contend with the fact that girls have so many more opportunities today with Facebook, Tinder, Instagram, and Snapchat orbiters circling them like flies. This means that even if you seemed like a sexworthy prospect in the coffee shop at lunchtime, she could well be imbibing the manly elixir of someone else that same night.

Men looking to maximize their opportunities with women today must therefore work fast and be efficient. As soon as you see a sign of attraction (or an indicator of interest, as they are also known), then you must escalate. How you do this will depend on the situation. If the IOI is from a cute shop assistant, then ask for her number. If it's from a girl in a busy nightclub, then approach, chat, then move close and kiss her. After you've kissed her, then game her some more until she's ready to go home with you. If she refuses your advance then smile politely and move on to the next prospect.

Remember: nothing is certain until you have had sex (and even then her true feelings about the situation may not be obvious, but that is for another post). That is why you must always push for tangible outcomes, either positive or negative.

Coffee shop flake

As an example, take something that happened to me recently. I was getting really strong signals from a girl who works in my local coffee shop—exceptional eye contact, her blushing whenever I came in, flirty chat and so on. I asked for her number which she gave me willingly and we messaged back and forth for a while.

Text game is a big subject but generally I tend to use it primarily for setting up dates rather than for pumping female state. While the latter can certainly be effective, it is risky. Get it wrong and you can put the girl off for good. In this case I ran my usual text game and tried to organize a meet. It was over Christmas and the festivities got in the way a little, but I sensed that she was being somewhat evasive. Finally, the trail died altogether and she stopped responding. Why? I think we can probably guess, but really, who knows? It's unimportant anyway.

Here was a girl who had shown every indication of being into me, and yet nothing tangible came of it.

Fortunately, because of my experience in these matters, I wasn't disappointed. I hadn't been at all excited when she gave me the number. I simply put her in the pipeline and gamed her like all the other girls I'm currently working on. When she went quiet I simply forgot about her.

I kept her number though. I may send her a ping test in a couple of weeks to see if the situation has changed on her side. Or maybe not. No big deal. For newbies who encounter this, though, I would advise you delete the contact details of girls who behave in this manner. The worst thing you can possibly do is get oneitus for some girl who has artificially increased her value by appearing unattainable.

Beat the market

Game is very much like playing the financial markets. You must never hold onto a failing position for too long. You must also insulate yourself from loss by having many other options open. I have no doubt I will get flamed by those who believe that approaching a lot of women "artificially increases the price of pussy," but I would argue that since it is sky high anyway this makes little sense.

The only real way to beat the market is through abundance—and you achieve that by hard work on many different prospects out in the field.

To find out more about how to beat the market and create attraction that leads to sex click here

Read More: Yes there is Hope . . But You Must Really Want to Succeed

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Football Is No Longer A Masculine Pastime

January 28, 2015 | by Mark Dixon | Link | Original Link

A funny thing happened on the way to the Seattle Seahawks' victory over the Green Bay Packers on January 18.

My mother was the only person in the house watching the game.

My dad, an avid runner and cyclist, found the local trails more alluring than the hype surrounding the NFC championship. My older brother had initially come to make dinner for them later that night, but in the meantime had gone to work out, uninterested in the outcome of the game (my younger brother is an avid football fan and most certainly was watching it in his home).

Meanwhile, I'm the only man left in the house, albeit I'm pecking away at my laptop trying to get some work done.

At one point I got yet another call from my lonely mother asking if I'll watch the game with her. I stopped and asked myself, What is going on here? Why am I, a man, not watching the game while my mother, who normally watches the Hallmark Channel, can't take her eyes off of it?

To watch or not to watch

The answer wasn't immediately obvious. While I enjoy a good football game as much as the next man and actually ended up watching the fourth quarter, I had a higher level of emotional investment in my work, something I was directly involved in and had control over.

It's not that I don't like the Seahawks. If I met Russell Wilson, I'd be searching for a football for him to sign. It just that I'm not obsessed.

But that wasn't it.

I've also grown tired of the Seahawks worship. For those of you who aren't from the area, it's become the dominant religion. It's hard to claim I'm exaggerating when the churches cancel or change their services times to accommodate game schedules, while they openly encourage the "faithful" to wear a Richard Sherman jersey as they worship Jesus. For a Christian like myself, wanting to go worship God without hearing any mention of the Seahawks during the sermon means staying home and listening to sermons online.

Still, that wasn't it. It wasn't until my brother came back from working out that I realized why.

Watching Sunday football just isn't a masculine thing to do anymore.

Maybe I am alone in this sentiment. I have a strange feeling, however, I'm not.

How Sunday football spectating has been feminized

That a man might even contemplate this possibility demonstrates the effort to feminize American football has been a total success. Although the game itself is as violent and alpha-male dominated as ever, the marketing panders to and placates women.

Six years ago, a story like the one I described above would have never happened. Even in the 1990s, the height of feminism, Sunday football was one of the few remaining vestiges of masculinity.

The way men were.

Yes, there were women who enjoyed high school or even college football, but they were the token gal among the boys. And there was something different about Sunday football. It was when average men gathered together to drink beer and eat junk food while their wives or girlfriends made some offhand remark about them all being Neanderthals. It was Home Improvement's Tim Taylor's time to bond with his sons while his wife Jill is busy telling them not to get "too involved in that."

Now, these women are huddled up next to their hubbies on the couch, adorned from head to toe in their respective football team's apparel they bought en masse at a sporting goods store in an attempt to conform to latest social trend. Older woman who in a previous generation would have rolled their eyes amusingly at men cheering a QB sack now screech and scream like they're back in high school cheer squad and talk about how cute they think their favorite player's hair is or how they enjoy watching them during their cuddle — I mean huddle.

For a lot of men, the change in atmosphere and environment is unbearable.

To be fair, much of this phenomenon in the Seattle area can be attributed to the recent success of the Seahawks. My mother, like 90 percent of the women here, had absolutely zero interest in football until their 2005 appearance at the Super Bowl, the first in their history. The excitement then disappeared for another seven years until the "Russell Wilson" effect had women swooning as they flocked to the living room to join their husbands in what once was a masculine refuge of solitude.

But it's not just the Seahawks' success. You can see it in the way in which domestic violence, against women, of course, dominates the discussion during football games, the effeminate pink sweatbands players wear for breast cancer awareness.

Bob Costa's anti-gun rant in 2012 during a live football game showed women have finally taken over. Had he said something that dumb when the primary audience was men who still wore the pants in the family….well, never mind, he wouldn't have been that dumb.

Women in the world of men

What's happened is the women have finally penetrated—trigger warning—one of the final bastions of male-dominated rituals, the spectating of the Sunday football game. Like everything else that once gave men a sense of community or bonding, women have barged their way in, and like all others they now control the conversation.

It's why you have football players featured in commercials condemning domestic violence committed against women by men but none on how men make up 40 percent of domestic violence victims. It's why you don't hear about how 85 percent of the time women are awarded child custody during a divorce, nor the suicide rate disparity between men and women following divorce. It's why you don't hear about paternity fraud or a see segment on how "deadbeat dads" might actually be real human beings who love their children but can't see them ever because they work two full-time jobs to pay for alimony and/or child support.

These are relevant men's issues. Back when football was a masculine man's world and women were merely guests in it at best, these topics might have gotten a fair hearing.

Comedian Bill Burr nailed it when he told Conan O'Brien why women took over football. Because it was started by men for men. And they can't have that, especially in a country that has its balls in the feminists' purse.

Notice that men don't seek out female-dominated pastimes and attempt to intrude. Men are content with women doing their own thing among themselves and have no interest changing the arrangement. For feminists, however, there is an instinctive resentment of anything male-oriented or exclusively male. Honestly, how many women actually watch football because they personally enjoy it? How many would watch it if all of their girlfriends thought it was "weird"?

Exactly.

There is also a subversive side to the whole thing. As Fred Reed observed, it is difficult for men to have certain conversations while a woman is present. When women become a significant portion of the group, these conversations become impossible. Much of what men enjoy about male-exclusive activities is the ability to segregate themselves from women, to be alone with men so they can speak plainly and openly about things.

Feminists know this. To them, it is critical these conversations don't happen on a large scale in order to maintain control.

That's why men like myself find ourselves doing other things on Sunday. It's no longer a time for men to chat with other men about things men care about without censoring ourselves for the sake of the women in the room. Watching football is slowly becoming an experience akin to watching a soap opera with a bunch of stay-at-home moms.

Yes, the players are men, the coaches are men, the commentators are men, and the team owners are men, but like the modern Christian church in America, the NFL is now an institution run by men for women.

Again, I might be alone on this, but the comment below made by a rueful husband in a recent Seattle Times story in regard to his wife's newly-found obsession with the sport says I'm not:

"I've created a monster."

Read more: How American Football Became A Racket

Mark Dixon
Born a MGTOW. Dissident among dissents.

How To Talk To Girls On Tinder

January 28, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by GirlsChase

Colt Williams here, with more on upping your success meeting women off your smartphone. Today's article coincides with us opening up the cart for my girl-getting Tinder system, which I invite you to learn more about here.

In my last article on Return of Kings, I talked about things you can do to make your Tinder pictures really pop, and get a ton more matches with the women of Tinder.

In today's article, we'll discuss what you do once you get those matches – and help you avoid making some of the "shoot-yourself-in-the-foot" mistakes I see lots of men make without realizing it.

Nix the Lame Tinder Openers

The first thing every guy does when he gets on Tinder is to crack his knuckles, put his thinking cap on, and come up with the cleverest, most creative Tinder opener he can possibly think of.

One choice example: “It’s going down, I’m yelling Tinder.”

Funny, right?

It’s cute. Creative. Pretty darn clever.

And if she’s reasonably attractive, she’s getting a dozen or so new matches every day opening her with this same exact line.

Excellent way to come off like a cardboard cutout instead of a man.

This isn’t the only example – far from it. In fact, anything that springs to mind too quickly you should probably be suspicious of, unless you’re already extremely experienced opening women on dating apps or online.

Even if you’re a pro at opening in the real world, don’t assume that means that your openers will still be original on Tinder. You get a certain amount of leeway in real life because most men simply don’t have the steel to walk up and say hello.

On Tinder, the slack women are willing to cut is far less, because they get so many approaches that most “clever” things have already been thought of and presented to them by dozens of men before they even match with you.

Some examples of overused openers men have already run into the ground:

Mini-Bio

This is where you match with her and give her the quick summary of your life, hoping to seem impressive enough. “Hey, so cool to meet you! I really like playing pool too! Actually, I learned how to play it in college, where I knew a semi-professional billiards player named Aldus Jack, maybe you’ve heard of him…”

Once she’s read two or three such essays and/or confessionals from men, she’ll never read them from anyone else, no matter HOW good his credentials. Just too boring, off-putting, or try-hard.

Compliment

Want to get into her good graces? What could work better than flattery… right? Only, when you're the fourth guy today to tell her that she looks amazing in that purple top, her reaction isn't, "Oh wow, thanks! We should totally meet up…" but rather, "Another admirer. Thanks, I guess."

Women do like men who are into them – but only if these men are at least somewhat a challenge. Offering yourself on a silver platter takes all the fun and excitement out – so don't run around using compliments as openers (exception: if you're skilled at using unique compliments that most folks will never notice or think of. Then it can be okay, and even good).

Dick Pic

Who does this, right? The only one I can figure is men who are just so clueless about women they assume that, well, if a girl sent me a shot of her naked chest I'd go ape, so let me just send her a snap of Long John Silver and watch her go monkey balls on her phone over there…

There are precisely two (2) heterosexual women in the world who want to receive penis pictures from men they've matched with on Tinder. Both are fat and disgusting. All the rest of the other millions of women on the app are looking to be attracted the normal way – you know, just like how you don't walk up to women on the bus and whip out your cock there before you ask them out there, either (I'm assuming).

Steer clear of these blunders and you're off to a good start.

Now let's talk what to say…

Kicking Off a Tinder Conversation

Those are the major "what not to do"s. What should you do?

My opening philosophy on Tinder is summed up with two (2) simple mandates:

1. You must be cool, and

2. You must be different

If you're NOT cool in how you open, she obviously won't want to talk to you. Who wants to talk to someone boring, weird, or uninspiring?

That one kind of goes without saying.

But out other rule – you must be different – this is the big stumbling block for lots and lots of guys.

Remember, if you write her something she's heard a hundred times already:

- "How's it going?"
- "Hey Casey, I'm Phil, nice to meet you…"
- "Hey, so what's the deal with that broach you have on?"
- "Damn girl, you look fine in that pink dress!"

… no matter how unique that might've been the first time she heard it, by time #96 it's just going to zoom right past her and not even register.

If you want to get on her radar – if you want her to blink her eyes and notice you – you have to use something she hasn't already heard a hundred times on Tinder.

In my free webinar on succeeding with women off Tinder, I share with you one of the most effective, unconventional openers I've discovered on Tinder – one that's both really cool and sufficiently different that she won't have heard it before, and is yanked to attention.

To view the webinar – and learn a bunch more about my tirelessly-field-tested (500 hours on Tinder and with Tinder girls in 2014) approach to getting women off their smartphones and into bed – visit the Laid on Tinder site and press "play":

Get Laid On Tinder

Carpe diem,
Colt Williams

Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

5 Tips For Hiring A Language Tutor

January 28, 2015 | by Vic Lenser | Link | Original Link

You have decided to learn another language.

You are ready to take the process seriously, and you resolve to stay devoted, despite the difficulty of the task before you.

Perhaps, in the spirit of MGTOW, you have decided to forego popular avenues of instruction, such as the classroom or computer-assisted learning software, and have chosen a more independent and analog method for learning a foreign language, like hiring a personal tutor.

You are going to face a unique set of challenges. As a language teacher and tutor myself, and as someone who continues to learn new languages, I would like to offer my professional and unique perspective to those of you wanting to fly solo, as I do.

But rather than foresee your challenges, which are unique to your learning style, your place of residence, and the language you have chosen, I have chosen instead to offer you five specific tasks to undertake during your linguistic journey.

These are the methods that have so far worked for me, and I share them with you.

1. Hire two (2) native speaker tutors

As I have stated before, paying private tutors is worth the expense. They are not hard to find, and they are cheaper by the hour than wasting your time at the club.

This should go without saying, but make sure they are native speakers and not someone who merely learned the language.

I eventually found my ideal tutors by posting on Facebook, specifically through language groups I had joined. Other avenues I suggest are Craigslist, college campuses, and local expat groups that speak your target language.

This recommendation that you hire two separate tutors is so that you can accomplish two separate goals: sophistication and cool.

The first, an older, well spoken, and educated native speaker, will help you with the majority of your learning needs. These include pronunciation, reading, grammar, vocabulary, and distinctions of formality (something that 'Merican English lacks, not surprisingly).

It is with this tutor that you will be able to practice expressing yourself specifically and accurately, and he/she will also be the person with whom you will complete three of the four remaining tasks below.

The second, a younger, popular, and attractive native speaker, will help you break some of the rules you learned with the first–albeit with linguistic credibility–and you will also take this opportunity to learn slang, humor, and a general sense of "what the kids are saying."

This tutor can be male or female, but the part about being attractive and popular is important. Learning how to talk to young, beautiful women in a foreign language is going to impart a universal type of charm that will help you in other areas. You either need to practice with that demographic or practice with the type of person that attracts that demographic.

If your motivation to learn another language is so that you can use it specifically to game foreign women, then this is an imperative component of the process, and power to ya. However, winning the favor of a woman or group of women has never been nor shall ever be the underlying motivation of my biggest undertakings.

I guess it depends on what kind of man you are.

Although I often find myself living like a Player or Asshole, my personality is much more suited to the Hobbyist type, hence my refusal to place the V at the center of my endeavors.

The point remains, regardless of your motivation or personality type, getting to know how the young and charming utilize a language is going to help you in the long run in many ways.

While I don't have the space to enumerate those ways in detail, I will say there's something to youthful energy that permeates your personality and heightens your Game.

The second tutor brings that energy into the learning process. The first tutor helps you cultivate decorum and sophistication. Talk like a thug, or speak like a gentleman. The more versatile you are, the better.

Or just be like this guy.

2. Focus on themed vocabulary

This is a self-explanatory method that public and private schools utilize ad nauseam, but I have found it to be effective when approached properly.

Learn introductions. Learn greetings. Learn colors. Learn about clothing. Learn about food.

Break it up into units, and focus on each unit until you reach relative mastery. Make sure your themes are based on real-world situations that you expect to encounter. I live in a city that has a large community of Russian speakers who host many cultural events throughout the year, and there is even a small Russian grocer not far from where I work. As a result, I have chosen the following themes to study in-depth for several months:

Greetings and introductions
What I do and where I live
Shopping for food

Shopping for clothes
Places in the community
Events and invitations

By learning vocabulary and statements that pertain to the above situations, I equip myself with language that I can use immediately. Many of my conversations have been repetitive, almost to the point of boredom, but that is how one develops a second-nature for something. Wax on, wax off.

"Always look eye"

Since you are not in school and at the mercy of a one-size-fits-all curriculum, you have the liberty to proceed at your own pace. Move on to a new theme when you are ready, but not a moment sooner.

The key is to build confidence and skill in a very specific area before moving on to another area. That is how I became successful learning Spanish, and it has worked well for me learning Russian.

3. Craft personalized statements

Have your elder tutor create–so that you can memorize–a list of statements that give specific information about your world.

For example: I live in West Austin, but I work in Central Austin. I work in a large office. I am a travel agent. (None of this is actually true).

Within the community language instructors, there are recommendations both FOR and AGAINST this method, and I would say that both camps have a point. In favor, you want to be able to give specific and thorough information about yourself, especially in regards to the most common questions people ask. Where are you from? What do you do? How long have you been studying X language? Why are you learning X language? If you are practicing, you will quickly figure out what questions people ask.

On the other hand, if you rely too heavily upon pre-constructed statements in order to express yourself, then you aren't really learning the language. You need to be able think and speak on the spot, and past a certain point in the conversation your canned responses will dry up, and you'll be standing there like an idiot not knowing what to say.

Find the balance. If you are new to the language, you need to have someone tell you what to say. Take that advice, and use it to your advantage.

4. Learn one (1) grammar concept at a time

all about that борщ ‘bout that борщ

This is where a firm hand is necessary with know-it-all tutors, especially amateurs. You don’t have to pay extra for expertise and experience if you know how to direct the flow of the sessions.

To illustrate, my elder tutor was recently teaching me how to buy clothing items in a store, along with being specific about the colors of those items. It just so happened that the first few examples were feminine nouns, so I decided to stay in that vein.

My tutor tried to include masculine nouns. I brushed them aside.

She tried to teach me how to say what I was currently wearing at the time. I said, “not today.”

I only practiced with feminine nouns and only with specific statements. After a few practice rounds, I changed from clothing to food, making sure to only cover feminine food nouns.

You see, the grammar concept I ended up mastering that day was the declension of feminine nouns in the nominative and accusative cases. It took the form of buying clothes and food, both of which fall under the general theme of shopping.

During my next lesson, I’ll practice with masculine and perhaps neutral words. And it will be easy. But I need to clarify something: your primary aim should never be to master the declension of feminine nouns in the nominative and accusative cases, per se, but rather be able to make the same statement multiple times with different words.

Clothes
I need to buy a white shirt. Do you have a white shirt?
I need to buy a black fedora. Do you have a black fedora?

Food
I need to buy cabbage. Do have cabbage?
I need to buy a beet. Do you have a beet?

What I accomplished in the above lesson is threefold:

1. I mastered a specific statement-and-question structure. (“I need X. Do you have X?”)

2. I learned new vocabulary.

3. I became naturally accustomed to the declension of feminine nouns in the nominative and accusative cases.

Notice the word naturally. This means my learning took place within the context of repetition and not as a result of cognition. The part of the brain that processes new habits is separate from the part of the brain that processes knowledge-based memories.

Of course, if you had read The Power of Habit from Roosh's recommended book list, you would already know that.

5. Practice in the target language

This is task that will involve your older tutor the least. Certainly, you will engage in conversation and practice dialogue with the elder, but it is with the younger tutor that I recommend you converse the most.

"Target language" (TL) is the language you are endeavoring to learn. "Practice" means you speak and listen (and to a lesser extent read and write) in that language.

Be sure to hold your practice to the following standards.

1. Treat this as a role-play, wherein each person assumes a character in a given situation.

2. DO NOT BREAK CHARACTER until the mini-session is complete. If your speaking partner tries to break out of character, be firm and insist they play by your rules. Remember, this is your money at work.

3. Maintain a rule of 100% TL while in the role-play. NO ENGLISH.

4. At the end of conversation, seek feedback from your speaking partner. Ask what you did well first (always start with the positive), then ask what you could have done differently to make it better.

5. If time allows, repeat the conversation and make necessary changes based on your partner's suggestions. Keep in mind the positive feedback so that you don't try to fix what ain't broken.

Conclusion

The best way to learn a new language is to speak and practice with a native speaker, and certainly the most effective way to accomplish such a goal is to travel to a country that harbors an entire populations of native speakers.

However, if you have personal obligations or financial limitations that hinder frequent travel, as I do, then seeking a personal tutor is a viable alternative. Adhering to the tips I've listed above will ensure that your money is well spent and that you will get the most out of any tutoring experience.

Read More: 20 Common Sense Tips On Learning Your First Second Language

Vic Lenser

Vic is a former educator who escaped the female-dominated school system for something more rewarding. He is free now to be a man, working amongst other men whom he can challenge, teach, and learn from.

Girls Just Want To Have Fun

January 29, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Love potions, amulets, charms, aphrodisiacs… Since time immemorial, men were looking for the secret formula that would enable them to reliably and effortlessly create sexual desire in women. This is still a taboo topic, shrouded in mystery and controversy to this day, as evidenced by the bad reputation the PUA community has gotten.

The problem is that men who are proficient in seduction can't explain how they do it, because for them it comes naturally. Women are also of no help, since they are reluctant to speak about their arousal triggers and even then, they are often times clueless on what these triggers actually are.

Searching for their own place

Some boys will, for whatever reason, completely fail in figuring out seduction. Coupled with insufficient social skills, they will be unable to even approach women in the first place. The overwhelming social anxiety from repeated rejection will generally cause them to withdraw into their secluded fantasy worlds, where they will live without disturbing anyone.

Beats rejection every time

In rare cases, these men will snap and violently lash out, as demonstrated by Elliot Rodger. His manifesto, “My Twisted World,” is a fascinating example of what happens when a man loses self control and can’t handle the emotional and psychological pressure of his environment. This pressure is actually quite useful, as it is the only incentive a man has to reach his true masculinity.

Men have an inherent desire to confront forces stronger than themselves and triumph, called “power fantasy.” All cultures acknowledge the power fantasy by having rites of passage, where boys endure hardships, earning respect of other men and admiration of females. This is personified in the mythical hero who “slays the dragon,” serving as an example of courage and fortitude to younger generations of boys. Even today we have mythical heroes—where Greeks had Perseus, we have Iron Man.

Same character, different outfit.

When men don’t fulfill their power fantasy at an early age, they remain in a certain state of restlessness, dubbed “The Peter Pan syndrome.” They basically see themselves as losers and perpetually fail in life, but can't understand why. Of course, this prompts women to collectively wring their hands and whine: "Where have all the good men gone?"

Women have no need for the power fantasy and would rather just pick the most masculine man and achieve their status through association with him. A woman would actually prefer being a mistress of a masculine man rather than the wife of a Peter Pan. It's nothing personal; women are simply attracted to raw masculinity and it overrides every other promise or vow they've ever made.

Check your masculinity

Rodger lamented the fact that women outright ignored his troubles, but that didn't happen because women are heartless monsters. The truth is that women cannot handle their own problems, let alone the pressure men endure. What is normal life for men causes mental illness in women, as evidenced by Norah Vincent and her experience living as a man.

Women don't care about the path a handful of dirt had to go through to become a diamond. They don't want to hear about the pressures and crystallization. A woman would rather prefer to get the ready-made diamond, put it on her finger and have fun by sending waves of jealousy and butthurt throughout her social circle.

Like so

It's not that women are lazy, but they are simply not equipped to deal with challenges men have to face to reach masculinity. The troubling conclusion is that women can never help a boy become masculine or teach him how to fulfill his power fantasy. Quite the opposite, females will inadvertently remove all challenge and danger from the environment by always clamoring for as much safety as possible.

Today, all danger has been effectively outlawed by the government, thus criminalizing the masculine rites of passage. In fact, the only way for an urban boy to become genuinely masculine is to join a gang. What is the alternative? Earning a degree? Buying a house? Getting achievements in World of Warcraft? Is there even a way out of this mess?

There is always a way out

Under the steady influence of radical feminism, generations of women have been pigeonholed into the roles of men. Women are expected to behave, perform, and achieve as well as men do, which exposes them to excessive and unnatural mental strain. As a consequence, women need to have a constant emotional and mental release of anxiety. In other words, "fun."

A woman tries to achieve this state of permafun by having a smartphone basically glued to her face 24/7. The smartphone serves as a pipeline through which she receives her much needed dose of inane social media bullshit. Instagram, Pinterest, 9gag, cat videos… It's all the same and simply serves to help her forget her vapid existence, even momentarily.

This is the dragon you have to outsmart

A man who can recognize, engage and entertain this kind of overstressed woman will instantly get her attention and generate genuine sexual attraction. Whether he is short, bald, or poor is entirely irrelevant. What matters is his ability to generate fun on a constant basis and the women will flock to him. Conversely, when a woman doesn't get her dose of fun, she creates drama. This isn't a personal attack on you, it's just a call for help from a woman that's bored out of her mind.

Once you demonstrate your entertainment value, the women will suddenly become much more servile and eager to do your bidding, attempting to lock the source of fun (you) down. Don't sell yourself short and keep your options open. If there is a woman that blows the competition out of the water, you may consider settling with her eventually.

Otherwise, you can have a constant supply of fresh nubile women even in your 50s. At this age, the average gangbanger is either serving several consecutive life sentences or is long dead. Besides, no matter what insanity femnazis spew from their diseased minds, women will remain thoroughly addicted to fun and viciously defend men who can generate it.

Starting all over again

Intelligence is defined as “the ability to adapt.” There is nothing shameful in adapting to the current situation and choosing the most effective way, even if it’s unusual. What matters are the results, not methods. However, learning that all your efforts in trying to reach true masculinity have been in vain can be devastating.

The western civilizations are perhaps the most bizarre social experiment ever conducted. Men and women are supposed to switch roles, pretend nothing changed and carry on with a stiff upper lip. These reversed gender roles take a tremendous toll on the psyche and can’t be maintained for a historically significant period of time.

Sooner or later, something has to give. This will probably result in a catastrophic failure of first world governments, rebooting the entire western world. Until that happens, enjoy life and have fun.

Read more: Why Do You Care If Black Guys Like Fat White Girls?

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Girls Just Want To Have Short-Term Fun

January 29, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Love potions, amulets, charms, aphrodisiacs… Since time immemorial, men were looking for the secret formula that would enable them to reliably and effortlessly create sexual desire in women. This is still a taboo topic, shrouded in mystery and controversy to this day, as evidenced by the bad reputation the PUA community has gotten.

The problem is that men who are proficient in seduction can't explain how they do it, because for them it comes naturally. Women are also of no help, since they are reluctant to speak about their arousal triggers and even then, they are often times clueless on what these triggers actually are.

Searching for their own place

Some boys will, for whatever reason, completely fail in figuring out seduction. Coupled with insufficient social skills, they will be unable to even approach women in the first place. The overwhelming social anxiety from repeated rejection will generally cause them to withdraw into their secluded fantasy worlds, where they will live without disturbing anyone.

Beats rejection every time

In rare cases, these men will snap and violently lash out, as demonstrated by Elliot Rodger. His manifesto, “My Twisted World,” is a fascinating example of what happens when a man loses self control and can’t handle the emotional and psychological pressure of his environment. This pressure is actually quite useful, as it is the only incentive a man has to reach his true masculinity.

Men have an inherent desire to confront forces stronger than themselves and triumph, called “power fantasy.” All cultures acknowledge the power fantasy by having rites of passage, where boys endure hardships, earning respect of other men and admiration of females. This is personified in the mythical hero who “slays the dragon,” serving as an example of courage and fortitude to younger generations of boys. Even today we have mythical heroes—where Greeks had Perseus, we have Iron Man.

Same character, different outfit.

When men don’t fulfill their power fantasy at an early age, they remain in a certain state of restlessness, dubbed “The Peter Pan syndrome.” They basically see themselves as losers and perpetually fail in life, but can't understand why. Of course, this prompts women to collectively wring their hands and whine: "Where have all the good men gone?"

Women have no need for the power fantasy and would rather just pick the most masculine man and achieve their status through association with him. A woman would actually prefer being a mistress of a masculine man rather than the wife of a Peter Pan. It's nothing personal; women are simply attracted to raw masculinity and it overrides every other promise or vow they've ever made.

Check your masculinity

Rodger lamented the fact that women outright ignored his troubles, but that didn't happen because women are heartless monsters. The truth is that women cannot handle their own problems, let alone the pressure men endure. What is normal life for men causes mental illness in women, as evidenced by Norah Vincent and her experience living as a man.

Women don't care about the path a handful of dirt had to go through to become a diamond. They don't want to hear about the pressures and crystallization. A woman would rather prefer to get the ready-made diamond, put it on her finger and have fun by sending waves of jealousy and butthurt throughout her social circle.

Loading…

Like so

It's not that women are lazy, but they are simply not equipped to deal with challenges men have to face to reach masculinity. The troubling conclusion is that women can never help a boy become masculine or teach him how to fulfill his power fantasy. Quite the opposite, females will inadvertently remove all challenge and danger from the environment by always clamoring for as much safety as possible.

Today, all danger has been effectively outlawed by the government, thus criminalizing the masculine rites of passage. In fact, the only way for an urban boy to become genuinely masculine is to join a gang. What is the alternative? Earning a degree? Buying a house? Getting achievements in World of Warcraft? Is there even a way out of this mess?

There is always a way out

Under the steady influence of radical feminism, generations of women have been pigeonholed into the roles of men. Women are expected to behave, perform, and achieve as well as men do, which exposes them to excessive and unnatural mental strain. As a consequence, women need to have a constant emotional and mental release of anxiety. In other words, "fun."

A woman tries to achieve this state of permafun by having a smartphone basically glued to her face 24/7. The smartphone serves as a pipeline through which she receives her much needed dose of inane social media bullshit. Instagram, Pinterest, 9gag, cat videos… It's all the same and simply serves to help her forget her vapid existence, even momentarily.

This is the dragon you have to outsmart

A man who can recognize, engage and entertain this kind of overstressed woman will instantly get her attention and generate genuine sexual attraction. Whether he is short, bald, or poor is entirely irrelevant. What matters is his ability to generate fun on a constant basis and the women will flock to him. Conversely, when a woman doesn't get her dose of fun, she creates drama. This isn't a personal attack on you, it's just a call for help from a woman that's bored out of her mind.

Once you demonstrate your entertainment value, the women will suddenly become much more servile and eager to do your bidding, attempting to lock the source of fun (you) down. Don't sell yourself short and keep your options open. If there is a woman that blows the competition out of the water, you may consider settling with her eventually.

Otherwise, you can have a constant supply of fresh nubile women even in your 50s. At this age, the average gangbanger is either serving several consecutive life sentences or is long dead. Besides, no matter what insanity femnazis spew from their diseased minds, women will remain thoroughly addicted to fun and viciously defend men who can generate it.

Starting all over again

Intelligence is defined as “the ability to adapt.” There is nothing shameful in adapting to the current situation and choosing the most effective way, even if it’s unusual. What matters are the results, not methods. However, learning that all your efforts in trying to reach true masculinity have been in vain can be devastating.

The western civilizations are perhaps the most bizarre social experiment ever conducted. Men and women are supposed to switch roles, pretend nothing changed and carry on with a stiff upper lip. These reversed gender roles take a tremendous toll on the psyche and can’t be maintained for a historically significant period of time.

Sooner or later, something has to give. This will probably result in a catastrophic failure of first world governments, rebooting the entire western world. Until that happens, enjoy life and have fun.

Read more: Why Do You Care If Black Guys Like Fat White Girls?

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

In Praise Of Alpha Male Bill Clinton

January 29, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Does this even need an introduction? Bill Clinton is an absolute alpha male. Alpha, alpha, alpha. Gaston-level alpha. Here's why.

Monica

That was a woman in love. Monica has accomplished nothing with her life since then except growing fat. And why need to maintain her appearance when she knows that no other man will ever be able to satisfy her?

She sues or does modeling shots once in a while, but that's just so that she can still feel relevant. She wants to feel connected to the few months that were the only time in her life when she felt a female's favorite emotion: anticipation.

I don't believe for a second that they stopped at oral.

Maybe she wasn't terribly pretty, but Bill chose to make her more than a one-night stand. He chose to take the risk in banging an intern when he could have had any other girl in the city. Don't tell me she was just a convenient hole. She must have had some serious female charisma.

March 2001. 3/10, WNB.

Roman poets like Horace wrote often about such things. Aristocrat has affair with common girl. But she grows older, and he's got his family to attend to, so they part ways. Or perhaps they just got bored or resentful. In ancient times it was socially acceptable to be such an alpha.

I wonder if Monica regrets ever knowing Bill. The deeper the exhilaration, the even more deeper the pain once it's gone. But then again, he did make her feel absolutely alive in an environment that was otherwise dead. She knew going into the affair that she would be nothing more than a memory. Perhaps that's all the validation she needed. I imagine today Monica often wishes she could have had Bill's abortion.

Hillary

The woman has accomplished nothing in her life except rubbing her pussy on the glass ceiling and calling it power. Like all front-and-center female politicians, Hillary wears a pantsuit and has boyish hair to look less feminine. Her "I'm powerful because my husband is powerful" outlook would in theory be the complete opposite of feminism, but at this point she takes what she can get to stave off the crippling self-doubt. Why the liberals haven't found a new mascot already is beyond me, because the American people will never vote Hillary into office.

But Hillary's ugliness is not just political posturing. See that picture at the top? That scaly-looking woman with Bill is a young Hillary. It's almost an intimate moment. Perusing through old photos, that's the only one that looks like they were almost touching, and their smiles look forced. Body language doesn't lie. Hillary is the kind of woman who needs feminism.

Look closely at how ugly and terrifying (two unrelated traits) she is and then take a guess why Bill married her instead of any other girl he knew on a first name basis. Keep in mind they met at Yale, not backwoods Wyoming or ghetto Memphis, so it's not like he was short on choices. Hillary resents all things traditionally feminine.

Granted, Bill's not marriageable-quality either, but at least he's a charmer. Hillary is neither of the two. I think it's not so much that Hillary is naturally ugly, although her cheeks are weird. There is something in her gaze that both draws you in and repels you.

Hillary in her youth and lack of sexual prime.

Bill only married her for the money. It was Monica he grew to love.

They claim Hillary's a lesbian. I don't believe that. There's no such thing as a lesbian. Some part of her had to be attracted to Bill, even if she couldn't feel love. After all, he's Bill Clinton. Only Charles Manson exceeds him in charisma. She obviously married him for the status, but that's always a crucial element in a woman's affection.

TOP DEFINITION

Penis

The tool used to wean and convert lesbians and virgins into useful, productive members of society.

The lesbian babe saw the light and became straight when a real penis penetrated her vaginal lips.

by urban pervert April 08, 2003

49046 22449 SHOP

Urban Dictionary: The best social commentary on the internet

The common myth is that Hillary used him to push her political agendas. I don't believe that either. An alpha like Bill isn't controlled by people, especially a miserable wife. She was just a trophy to placate the feminists. "Ugly, hateful women can land high-status men, too!" Why would he need to appease her by pushing her agendas? He already had everything he needed. The only thing she had to offer was her money, her acceptance of his philandering, and her alleged spousal abuse.

F. Scott Fitzgerald was told as a young man, "Rich girls don't marry poor boys." Bill may have grown up poor white trash, but he had enough immaterial wealth to overcome it. The real question was whether it was worth it for Bill to marry such a miserable shrew.

Saxophone

They also claim that Bill was a great saxophone player. Actually, he was terrible at it. But it doesn't matter. Playing improv sax is like dancing tango: It doesn't matter how bad you are so long as you can fake it. If a sax player can fart out a few notes in the right key, women will drop their pants. No other instrument quite works that way.

Trained musicians will listen to that video of him playing "Heartbreak Hotel" and cringe. Much like many seemingly impressive blues and metal guitar solos, Bill's saxophone playing was all cheap musical tricks designed for pure showing off. None of it had real musical value.

To quote Leela from Futurama, "My ex-boyfriend Sean played the sax. I used to listen for hours while he sat naked on my couch and improvised. Then I found someone else's couch fibers on his butt."

What Can We Learn?

Not much, actually. The kind of charisma Bill has is not something you can learn. It's something you’re born with. Frankly, the unattainability is what makes him so admirable.

Bill Clinton deserves our praise. In the ancient days, the Greeks made their heroes—both in old stories and in contemporary politics—into gods, gradually evolving upon the myth until a cult arose around them. Bill Clinton—despite his leftist political insanity—is a god for red pill men to worship. We are blessed to have him as a role model and an example in our generation of betatude. We should pray to him that he writes a tell-all book on his deathbed.

Read More: Feminist Delusions Around The Lewinksy Fiasco

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

11 Reasons To Start A Blog

January 29, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by BADNET

1. You will develop a voice.

When you have a voice you can make a statement to the world. The more you write, the more your voice will develop. It is up to you how far your voice will reach. Maybe right now you feel like you cannot say everything you want to say, but after putting your thoughts into words you will eventually be able to make your statement to the world.

2. You can express yourself.

A blog is a great way to organize your thoughts and make sense of them. You will also be able to track your progress in life and present your interests through your blog. A blog can be a business, hobby, diary or anything you want it to be. Your blog can be everything you are. A blog can be your art.

Whether you decide to reveal your face and name or not, the words you write are an extension of yourself. Your words are a part of who you are. If you do it right, you won't hold back and you let the world see what kind of a person you are.

3. You expose yourself.

People will read your posts and if you succeed in writing a popular blog, you will run into many people who agree and disagree with you. You will learn about yourself. You learn that you have no reason to hide. You learn you have no reason to hold back and no reason to be afraid to say what you want to say.

Through writing a blog you can get a deeper sense of who you really are. Only if you do it right, of course – it's only by having the skin in the game, you really find out who you are.

4. You have something to build.

Every man needs something to build, create and produce. A mission is what gives the man his purpose and place in the world. A blog can give a man his life meaning. Even when everything else isn't going anywhere, you have the blog you can work on.

The bigger you build it, the bigger it becomes. Even if it is just a hobby, the work you have done will give you pride and fulfillment.

5. You improve your craft.

Your blog may be about writing, photography, society, politics, cooking, fitness, motorbike maintenance or hitting on girls. Either way, having a blog pushes you to work harder and develop your interests even further. You will also improve your writing, argumentation and presentation skills.

The more you want to focus on your blog, the harder you work on your specific field. Every post you publish pushes you to a new level.

6. You learn how to run a website.

It doesn't matter what your profession is, knowing how websites work and how to run them is a skill. Understanding how to run a website can be beneficial for any field and profession out there. You may not need a website right now, but being prepared for future opportunities is the key for success.

You need to have a website for any business you may want to run. It is sometimes much easier and cheaper to run the website yourself than get someone else to do it for you.

7. You find like-minded individuals.

You may not have friends who share the same interests and opinions as you do. When you put yourself out there, it is almost inevitable that you will find individuals who are almost exactly like you. The like attracts like.

Blogging is a great way to find friends who share the exact same interests as you. Many of the most successful bloggers have found great friends through their blogs. Start blogging and start networking.

8. You can make a difference.

A good blog can change lives. You can change lives. A blog is a great platform to help people and make a difference in the world. Produce quality content and people will follow you. Expose yourself and you will give the other people the permission to do the same.

Produce and give what people need and it is certain the world will change because of you. Your life can inspire other people's lives and make the world a better place.

9. You don't need any technical know-how.

There is almost no technical know-how involved. Running a blog is easy. BADNET will get everything ready for you to go. We will install everything for you in order for you to have a kick-ass website. You truly don't need to know anything about programming. Running a website is as easy as using Facebook.

We even provide you with a guide on how to get started with your blog and 3 reports on how to post, manage and monetize your blog.

10. You don’t have any risks involved.

Setting up a blog barely costs any money and there are no real risks involved. The only thing you need to do is a set up a blog through BADNET and choose a domain for your site and pay a little bit of money for web hosting. The costs are practically nothing and the benefits you get from running a blog are HUGE. You seriously have no excuses.

Average web hosting costs are between $7-$15 a month. When you register your blog through BADNET you get the first year of domain name registration for FREE.

11. You can make money.

You can make a living through a blog. There is no ceiling regarding how much money you can make from a blog. The profit margins are huge and there are basically no downside risks. The best part is that you can make money anywhere in the world: whether it is a sunny beach in Philippines or your home in the United States of America. The money you make is also made on your own terms with your own working hours.

Create a blog to see if you have what it takes. You just need to start right now. You need to take action and set up a blog. If you make a real effort, the money will come to you.

Get your blog started now on BADNET.

Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Many Problems With American Sniper

January 29, 2015 | by Charles Martel | Link | Original Link

America is not a peaceful country.

It takes only the briefest of perusals through a history book to realize that the USA was forged, expanded, and maintained in violent conflict. A major war is fought every twenty years or so with innumerable smaller conflicts and interventions seasoned throughout. Want peace? Move to Switzerland.

Along with war, America's other favorite pastime is movie-making, with Hollywood as the epicenter of the world's movie industry. It is no coincidence then, that the two of these hobbies often mate and produce offspring—the war movie.

Each of these bastard children seams to produce it's own conflict as pundits and talking heads debate its merits or lack thereof. Experts and amateurs lock horns, in a contest to out-pun, out-analogy, and out-spin the other. Hyperbole rules and panties get bunched. (See: Apocalypse Now, Platoon, Saving Private Ryan) Provided you remain above the fray, it is all quite amusing.

So, it is with the latest offering from Clint Eastwood: American Sniper.

A bit of background

Before we get into that though, a bit of full disclosure. War movies are difficult for me to watch as I am myself a combat veteran of the United States Marine Corps. Oh, PTSD is not the problem. The problem is one of realism—or not, as is usually the case. I came away from Saving Private Ryan laughing, while my girlfriend at the time was in tears. I suppose it is a bit like a real forensics expert watching CSI.

I further admit, that I am defacto prejudiced—no, postjudiced is more accurate—against any film depicting Navy S.E.A.L.s, because I have direct experience with them and I came away unimpressed. If you don't want to take my word for it, check out a bit of their history here, here and here.

No one doubts their courage, but they seem to have a habit of dying without accomplishing much.

I do have some respect for the real Chris Kyle. I respect that he chose a macho profession and lived life on his terms. I further acknowledge that it is probable, likely even, that some of my Marine brothers returned home because he was watching their six. When talking about the real Chris Kyle, one has to consider some wacky stuff, but credit where it is due.

Thoughts on the movie

I wrote the above before seeing the movie. When it first came out, I really had no intention of seeing it, but the ensuing shitstorm piqued my curiosity. On the one hand, the leftist fruit bats were getting their panties in a bunch and on the other, the "America, Fuck Yeah!" crowd had a tropical rainforest sprouting in theirs. I had to find out for myself.

Boy, was I in for some serious underwhelming.

After the movie, I stopped off at my local watering hole to knock down a few beers and write out a few quick impressions, while the flirty bartender did her best to distract me. I had to search hard for something positive to say about this flick and here it is—despite all the hoopla, it is surprisingly neutral in tone. That is, it is neither nauseatingly flag waving nor is it an anti-war screed. I appreciate that in a war movie, but that is about all that American Sniper has to offer. Three times in my notes, I jotted down "meh." That about sums it up.

The biggest problems

American Sniper is visually dull, as if it was filmed by first-year film students under strict orders to master the basics before trying anything fancy. Considering the subject matter (urban warfare, military vehicles, and men), it is a bit inexplicable that everything is rendered so unappealing to the eye.

Was this Clint's attempt at brute realism? Possibly, but the camera fails to capture anything of the moment, nor convey anything like tension or drama. It even lacks the immediacy of the hand-held, jiggle-cam. The whole effort is flat and non-compelling; unforgivable when Eastwood had such an example to follow-

Boring cinematography is one thing if you then have the proper script and acting. American Sniper has neither. A piece of the petrified forest could have been broken off to replace Bradley Cooper and no one would know the difference. Sienna Miller, as Chris Kyle's wife Taya, does add a touch of realism with her constant nagging and moaning. She does very well indeed portraying the standard, self-absorbed and even more deadly American Wife.

After a long and brutal tour of war in Iraq, Kyle comes home to bitching and whining. Small wonder he kept volunteering for additional tours. Even I began reflexively flinching each time she came on screen. I get that Eastwood was attempting to portray the toll that war takes on the family, but my question is: why would Chris have ever fallen for her in the first place? From the beginning until the last scene, she just comes across like a harpy. Possibly realistic, but as entertaining as nails on a chalkboard.

The centerpiece of the war scenes is the entirely invented "worthy other" narrative that plays out over the course of his four tours. Again, I get it. You have to have a specific antagonist…or at least supposedly, you do. Stanley Kubrick did just fine without one in Full Metal Jacket and in fact the lack of a specific antagonist kept the focus on the men, where it was supposed to be.

In this case, I see no point when the cynosure is on the stress induced on the home life of a warrior. They saw fit to add one though and apparently there was a writers strike in progress and an uncredited 10-year-old with a box of crayons scribbled it out. Parts of this storyline play out like a cheesy Sherlock Holmes rip-off- "Ah ha! That guy has a scrape on his elbow! What nefarious schemes must he be up to? Come Watson! The game is afoot!"

The only surprise comes when the enemy sniper finally gets his from 2100 yards out— the bullet doesn't go through his scope. There is one detail though that surprised me, and one that can save your life if you ever find yourself under fire. This was gospel in my unit and shouldn't be underestimated— never, EVER discuss wedding plans in a war zone. That is a sure way to get a bullet to the head. We will never know how many lives were saved because of my unit's strict adherence to that.

Issues with the protagonists and the antagonist

So, American Sniper fails on the war front and the home front. We see his desire to be with his family and also with his team in action, yet what we never really see from either perspective is—Why? The enemy sniper "Mustafa" is used as the impetus to get him to return repeatedly to Iraq, but this just remains unconvincing. Kyle states openly (there is no subtlety in the dialogue, at all) a desire to protect his fellow warriors…fine, but what is missing here is any sense of the camaraderie that every man has experienced while off to war.

Kyle and his compatriots don't show us the very real bonds that men in these situations cement. They instead progress through their lines quickly and stiffly, saying what they think and feel instead of showing us. In between tours, it is one long and tedious argument with his wife. It is only in the last scene where we see any real tenderness at all.

Both settings then result in a stilted, bone-jarring ride to nowhere, like driving through an endless construction zone in a Porsche—bumpy, boring and never getting out of first gear, despite the promise of 430 horsepower. Though it is riddled with problems, this scene from Full Metal Jacket still has much truth in it:

The real Chris Kyle said that war was “fun.” I know what he means. It is not really the act of killing, nor even the action per se, it is belonging to a group of your absolute best friends combined with having a clear mission in life all while testing yourself to the limit. That is what keeps men going back. That is why men such as Chief Petty Officer Chris Kyle will leave the comforts of home and hearth to fight and risk everything on the field of battle.

And that is exactly what American Sniper fails to illustrate.

Read More: Dating American And Non-American Women: A Comparison

Charles Martel
Charles is a hack writer and all around shiftless individual. He has spent his time traveling and in a wide variety of occupations. If it can be said that he has any goals in life at all, it is to impart just a small bit of his hard earned wisdom. He can be followed on twitter here Follow @CharlesMartel19

Twitter Is The Modern Day Royal Court—We Know What Comes Next

January 29, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

Before electronic communication became ubiquitous, people had to physically gather together—the power brokers of the day gathered in the royal palace. Access was naturally reserved only for the favored. Within the royal court all manner of courtesies (no prizes for guessing the origin of that word), had to be observed, so as to pay respects to the king of the day.

Unfortunately what started as an intelligent respect to a benevolent warrior who ruled his people with both an iron fist and a kind heart, (i.e. he earned his title by way of both the sword in wartime and the pen in peacetime), slowly gave way to a sycophantic nonsense, where no one could criticize anyone and even the slightest out of place comment could find one being led to the gallows.

Nowhere was this more pronounced than the era of Louis XVI, where the landed gentry basked in the royal wealth, while the people starved, and finally revolted by building guillotines to deal with their idiotic leaders. There are dozens of other examples. The Spanish squandered their wealth from the Americas while squabbling about who had insulted God. Charles the 1st of England had his head cut off by Cromwell, etc.

The paradigms of unworthy, ignorant, arrogant, and lazy leadership generally takes some generations to fall into place. This process is most easily tracked in the royal courts, since the blood line held the power. The mighty warrior who had nothing to lose, vanquished his foes, built castles, protected the lands and was truly loved by the people was seen almost as a God. His son had a much easier time, but direct education from his father ensured he was no layabout.

However, by the time we get a couple of generations further down and add in the genes from one useless wench or other (and optional inbreeding), the great grandson was a wimp king with no balls, a weak heart, health and mental problems, an arrogant ambivalent attitude, out of touch with the people and completely inept in every way. He'd make up for his shortcomings by wielding his power and wealth to cut down anyone that criticized him, being incredibly cruel and indulging himself in all manner of trivial and hedonistic pursuits.

King Joffrey in Game of Thrones makes for the perfect example of a wimp king. Wimp kings also surround themselves with yes men to ensure they never had to deal with their own short comings. In effect, they leverage and mortgage the wealth and popularity their forefathers created, while putting nothing back into their financial, moral, or social sphere.

The modern equivalent

Although in the modern era we lack royal families that play any meaningful role, the royal lineage (of sorts) can now be found in career politicians. Politicians today mince about in expensive suits, ride in armor-plated limos, helicopters, and private jets, surrounded by an army of yes men who never dare say a word out of place.

Politicians have truly grown so comfortable, lazy, and arrogant that they appreciate nothing. They pontificate as if they could spin the world on the palm of their hand, they lap up adoring praise like rocks stars, while motoring through taxpayer dollars, mortgaging the national debt and creating nothing of value whatsoever.

They have installed a system that prevents anyone who thinks outside the box from rising to a position of power. Everyone must nod their head at the emperor's new clothes. The detractors are all part of the same royal court and the open criticisms from "rival" parties, just more of the same, from people all cut of the same cloth.

Spot The Difference : Hint – there is none!

The President of The United States or the Prime Minister of England was once a noble and time-honored position of power, precisely because those who occupied it were intelligent men, who aimed to shape the world and provide at least a semblance of benefit for their "subjects." Today it's nothing more than a five star meal ticket for life and a membership to the golf course of your choice.

Our leaders are completely useless. Arrogant, lazy, ignorant pontiffs who couldn't change a light bulb without 10 yes men to hold their hand and tell them how great their asshole smells. Meanwhile, the light bulb supplier who bought them a champagne breakfast last month gets to charge $10,000 for a $2 unit and no one dare make mention of his trickery.

This attitude runs through all our institutions: judicial (police, lawyers and judges), educational (schools and universities), military, and even science is tainted with what must be politically correct and sit within predefined criteria, as insiders rob the coffers at will.

How the royal court typically plays out

It thus shouldn't surprise you to see that those who occupy peripheral positions of celebrity and status are all tarred with the same politically correct brush, akin to the royal courtiers of old. The meeting point of choice is no longer the royal court where the king holds forth, but a peculiar modern electronic version of it.

People become "outraged" on Twitter over some comment or other that is made, but honestly all they are doing is seeking attention whilst also trying to invalidate and undermine their competition. A recent example would be the release of the American Sniper movie that seems to have had comments flying on Twitter, so much so that the media feels the need to report on it endlessly, like some gossiping foot-maiden might have in days of old.

It is what it is, and having the read the book I don't see that Chris Kyle particularly glamorized war, he simply explained his experiences. On face value a hard-assed, brave man was in the bigger picture a pawn in a peculiar, unjustified, and illegal war. The picture is easy to see, but the Twitter courtiers start up with all manner of left wing and right wing comments, side tracking the real issues and missing the point entirely. They are only interested in their five seconds in the spotlight. They are worse than our leadership because they have neither power nor intelligence.

The treasury is still being robbed and the public at large remain baffled by the "fog of debate." Meanwhile the Euro currency collapses, and the Swiss Franc gained 20% in a single day, because that's one of the only sound minded fiscally conservative countries left on the planet. The oil economy is in the dumpster in large part because interest rates have been forced artificially lower and lower, which if you think into it logically is very similar to the USSR forcing bread prices lower and lower, leading to less and less of an economy.

Lots of talk and no action

Politicians pontificate about stimulating the economy, when in reality the only thing they are stimulating is their own ego. Their courtiers get on Twitter and run their mouths with much ado about nothing, and the world spins a day closer to a catastrophic depression, war, famine, plague, etc. Some blame Illuminati or Zionists, but in truth the only real conspiracy going on is one of woeful human ignorance. Guillotines may well make a come back soon—if economic and social conditions continue to worsen, I suspect that eventually heads are going to roll.

Begin to mentally separate yourself from the system, you will then naturally become a part of its demise. The entire social order is an empty vessel, a wimp king, a paper bag with nothing inside. It is little more than a psychological game—the whole thing will cave in as more people see what it's made of.

Wake up: red pill is about much more than pussy. Smile at the farce that is taking place before your eyes—we live in what will be a most incredible moment in human history. Even if it's the end of days, we might as well be consciously aware of it. Most likely it's just another turn in the cycle of mankind that's been repeated thousands of times before. See you all on the other side.

Read More: Cultural Collapse Theory: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Cultural Decline

11 Things I Learned In 2014

January 30, 2015 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

2014 was a big year for me personally. I learned a lot about myself, and view it as a sort of mini-awakening following my true awakening a few years back when I first made myself aware of the “red pill” ideology. With this new revelation, I started seeing society and people as a whole differently. I grew as a person more so than I believe I ever have in my life.

Why exactly this happened now is a question I will be answering speculatively. Perhaps the impetus was my move out of Los Angeles and into what I perceive to be the best city in America. Perhaps I’m just getting older. Whatever the reason, I thought it may make for a fun article and, more importantly, just may give some of you folk a shortcut to reaching the same revelations—assuming of course that you agree with them.

1. NYC Lives Up To The Hype

It’s probably not a coincidence people from Frank Sinatra to Jay-Z have dedicated songs to this city. Quite frankly, and I know this sounds trite, there is no city like it in the world. And I’ve been to quite a few. As a single man, there is an endless number of women, who are attractive to boot and outnumber the men so the sexual marketplace is in your favor. I won't repeat myself but you can find the details here. Moreover any type of woman you desire can be found, from Russian to model to hipster to college.

Aside from girls, the city still carries with it an aura of old America. People are rough, direct and don't take bullshit. The true New Yorkers don't care one bit about being politically correct. My barber stops and comments on girls asses as they walk by. One of my clients here—and I'll never forget this—said to his employees "if your vacation request starts with 'my wife…' it will be denied."

2. The Freedom Of Not Seeking Validation

This actually started late 2013 but has carried over significantly into 2014. I went from bragging about my conquests to being rather silent about them. And what I started to notice more in 2014 is how much others do this. Showing me pictures of girls they are dating or banging, telling me about how great a body was or how unbelievable the sex was.

When you become aware of what this truly is, you realize it is a form of seeking approval. I am no angel and still engage in this to a degree but have toned it down to almost being nonexistent. Once you recognize all that matters is if you are happy or satisfied, it is quite freeing.

3. American Girls Are Still Undesirable Idiots

Here is a list of random things American girls told me in 2014:

1. “Oh, so my longest walk of shame was waking up one morning in New Jersey and…” (on our first date)

2. “So…are you going to call a cab or what’s the plan?” (after sex in her apartment)

3. “Do you ever use those blue boxes on the street people put mail in?”

4. “If I ever get married…” (girl who was 25)

5. “I’m a social justice warrior.” (girl’s response to my asking what she does)

6. “I’ve never seen an avocado in its natural state!” (during date when I’m making guacamole)

4. Russian Girls Are Still My Number One

[image]

No matter where I travel to, no matter how many girls I interact with or date, nothing comes close to my attraction to Russian girls. When I hear a girl speak Russian walking around Manhattan my ears perk and my penis awakens. I was recently in a central American country and towards the end of my two-week trip I happened to meet a Russian girl. I was immediately reminded of why I love them so much. Some people love chocolate. I love Russian girls.

5. Hungarian Girls Love Giving Blowjobs And Have No Concept Of Fidelity

[image]

I spent some time in Budapest in 2014 and noticed a pattern in most Hungarian girls. This pattern is delineated in the heading above and really does not require more explanation.

6. I Lost My Desire For Constant New Lays

[image]

For the first time since getting into game, my numbers went down in a subsequent year. Yet I was much happier this year than previous years. From September through December, I was stuck in trial and incredibly busy with work. This cut into my normal routine of finding girls to go on dates with at night.

When trial was over, I decided to stick to my schedule of not dating and instead fill it with time for myself doing anything else. What I realized is that I barely missed going on dates with random girls. Maybe I'm getting old, or I'm getting tired, but I'd rather read a book or grab dinner with friends than go on another date with a tinderella or random 6-7 I met out one night.

7. I'm Losing Interest In Night Game Fast

My favorite girls this past year, and those that are the highest quality in both looks and personality, were girls I met in the day, through friends, our outside the country. The decline of America is most apparent in its bars and clubs where girls are, simply put, used up whores.

The girl I'm currently seeing I met in the daytime. The hottest three girls of the year consisted of one foreign and two through friends. And when you combine that with the cost of night game in a place like New York, and the inevitable hangovers that accompany such activities, my desire has fallen immensely.

8. Friends And Family Should Not Be Ignored

The last point brings me to this one. I used to prioritize dates and going to bars at night over hanging out with friends or going to see my family. I've now flipped my priorities and am much happier. Good friends and a strong family connection are irreplaceable—don't take them for granted.

9. The Tom Brady Rule

First, watch this video. Then understand that if a girl is attracted to you, a lot of what you do does not matter. She will still want to see you, want to fuck you, and want to be with you. So stop spending time crafting that perfect text or worrying about how many days to wait to call her or seek another date.

My single friends and I often shoot the shit and when one of us tries to get our opinion on how to handle a girl (myself included), a lot of times we joke and just remind him by saying "Tom Brady." We often overemphasize the perfect way to handle a girl. This isn't to say you can text her after your first date and thank her profusely with seventeen emoticons and not have a negative impact. But to a reasonable point, it really does not matter.

10. I Think I Want A Kid

[image]

I have no explanation for this, but this is easily the most surprising epiphany that arose for me personally in 2014. I actually think I want a kid (well, son to be specific). I don't know why, I can't explain it, but I believe I do. However, I can't imagine being married. So now I have this odd paradox where I think I want offspring, but I don't want a wife, but it seems a familial unit is the best environment for a kid to have.

11. I Want To Help Men With Women

The Roosh forum has a section for "newbies" that I tend to peruse from time to time. I also know people personally that have sex maybe once a year at most. It hurts me to see so many men struggling out there with women in this terrible westernized world .

I was never a natural, but after dedicating my time and effort I have more or less figured it out. So call this my altruistic or charitable side developing, but I want to give back. How I'm not exactly sure. It will have nothing to do with money as my day job is a lot more profitable than this could be..but I have some ideas brewing for 2015.

Read Next: Stop Dwelling On The Past

L.D. Hume

L.D. Hume, formerly known as Law Dogger, is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every so often and he can be found on Twitter as well.

Want To Succeed? You Must Raise Your Pain Threshold

January 30, 2015 | by Roberto Nascimento | Link | Original Link

We all know about it. The uncomfortable state you feel during your sets. The painful verge you must push through to increase the gains from your workout. You don't really feel it coming during your first few repetitions, but you know it is imminent as you squeeze out a few more contractions.

When it comes it does so indefinitely. You push yourself to complete that last rep, despite the pain and strong need for reprieve for your muscles. You feel proud for completing that final hard set of shoulder presses, but you wonder if you could have done just one more. You wonder if today you were not at your peak performance, or if it was simply avoidance on your part.

We can't lie to ourselves, and it is better to admit it takes a certain degree of fortitude to keep it going just a bit longer during that moment of struggle. Easier said than done. Your mind wants you to do that one extra rep, for you know it's best for your muscles to stimulate strength and growth. Your muscles, however, urge you to cease movement, they are selfish and do not share the same intentions. They could care less about being strengthened, all they care about is being provided with nutrients and doing their function of movement as little as possible.

As humans we move toward pleasure and move away from pain. Naturally, in all our endeavors we look for the path of least resistance. We are inherently lazy. It could not be more ideal to succeed with merely minimal effort. Moreover, like all things in life nothing worth having comes easily.

Muscle growth and development, a quality physique and body, is no different.

What you must do

For you to excel with these goals, it is necessary to raise your pain threshold. The point at which you feel so much pain and discomfort that you are pleaded to quit. Where you attempt to rationalize, by telling yourself you've already put in a good effort today. You've already done two difficult sets. You've already had a few solid workouts this week.

To take your training to the next level, this barrier has to be overcome.

To an extent, you start to raise your pain threshold naturally as you gain more experience with weight training. The other day I led a friend of mine through her first workout. She struggled at persisting through the pain. Her sets came up shorter than the point I believe she could have reached. Of course, this is relative to the individuals level of strength and endurance, which would be low for a beginner. However, she was not yet accustomed or well-versed in the intensity required to push to her true limit and exceed her own edge.

Generally, women are not as resilient in the gym as men. However, I've seen and trained with some women that have very high pain thresholds, due to time, experience, and exposure to training.

Evidently it's something that you develop with time, and is a natural byproduct of training, no matter how unpractical the latter may be.

Furthermore, to improve your potential for gains, development, and reach your realistic and ideal physique in a more efficient manner, you have to raise your pain threshold by your own means. You have to consciously focus your effort, and make this your objective.

Most people train to reach X number of repetitions for Y number of sets, at Z number of weight. While this can be productive, it is best to aim to train at an intensity that overwhelms your level of comfort. Don't worry about how much weight you are lifting, for now. Rather, focus your efforts on how much you are stressing your muscles past the point of ultimate agony and strain. How much and how long you can withstand the pain. How much you can overcome this harsh state, despite the efforts of your physical body to resist.

Training does not only involve and develop physical strength. The mental aspect to training is so often overlooked and is equally a key component.

Training your legs is a great example of a time where you are most exposed to your pain threshold. Lower body training is hard, as you have likely discovered. With that said, it is an excellent opportunity to meet and challenge your limit of pain.

The more you can endure, the more you can feel it at work; the higher you set your threshold. And with a higher threshold, you are able to train at higher intensities that can involve higher levels of strength and endurance. With that, you have a higher potential for development and training success.

Next time you feel the build-up of pain and the threshold soon coming, welcome it with a hunger to exceed. This is an opportunity to take yourself to new heights from a training perspective and increase your boundary for success.

Read More: How To Grow In Times Of Pain

Roberto Nascimento
Nascimento is an ambitious young man with a large focus on self-improvement and discovery. His favorite topics include women, health and fitness, and masculinity. Check out his blog: Power Your Twenties. He is also on Twitter.

Are You A Stranger To Yourself?

January 30, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Strangers To Oursevles offers a scientific review of what we know about the human unconscious. The information isn't exactly new so this book will be a review for many of you who have come across various psychological studies and articles on the internet.

> When he said that consciousness is the tip of the mental iceberg, he was short of the mark by quite a bit-it may be more the size of a snowball on top of that iceberg. The mind operates most efficiently by relegating a good deal of high-level, sophisticated thinking to the unconscious, just as a modern jumbo jetliner is able to fly on automatic pilot with little or no input from the human, "conscious" pilot. The adaptive unconscious does an excellent job of sizing up the world, warning people of danger, setting goals, and initiating action in a sophisticated and efficient manner.
>
> […]
>
> The term "adaptive unconscious" is meant to convey that nonconscious thinking > is an evolutionary adaptation. The ability to size up our environments, disambiguate them, interpret them, and initiate behavior quickly and nonconsciously confers a survival advantage and thus was selected for. Without these nonconscious processes, we would have a very difficult time navigating through the world

>
> […]
>
> The most liberal estimate is that people can process consciously about 40 pieces of information per second. Think about it: we take in 11,000,000 pieces of information a second, but can process only 40 of them consciously. What happens to the other 10,999,960? It would be terribly wasteful to design a system with such incredible sensory acuity but very little capacity to use the incoming information. Fortunately, we do make use of a great deal of this information outside of conscious awareness.'
>
> […]
>
> In other words, we know less than we think we do about our own minds, and exert less control over our own minds than we think. And yet we retain some ability to influence how our minds work. Even if the adaptive unconscious is operating intelligently outside our purview, we can influence the information it uses to make inferences and form goals.

Once your unconscious picks up on a stereotype or pattern, it will be applied for you without your complete awareness. It gives you shortcuts which allow you to more easily navigate the world.

> The adaptive unconscious is an older system designed to scan the environment quickly and detect patterns, especially ones that might pose a danger to the organism. It learns patterns easily but does not unlearn them very well; it is a fairly rigid, inflexible inferencemaker. It develops early and continues to guide behavior into adulthood.
>
> […]
>
> The adaptive unconscious is more likely to influence people's uncontrolled, implicit responses, whereas the constructed self is more likely to influence people's deliberative, explicit responses. For example, the quick, spontaneous decision of whether to argue with a coworker is likely to be under the control of one's nonconscious needs for power and affiliation. A more thoughtful decision about whether to invite a coworker over for dinner is more likely to be under the control of one's conscious, self-attributed motives.

Human behavior is not monolithic. You may describe a man as "aggressive," but really he is only aggressive in certain situations, suggesting that humans operate on an if-then basis. If a certain type of event happens, then he will act out in an aggressive manner, but someone else who you would describe as non-aggressive would react more aggressively in a different situation. The same goes for a quality like extroversion. If you put me in a party environment with girls, people would describe me as extroverted, but the motivation there is that I simply want to get laid. Most of the time I keep to myself and don't go above and beyond to make conversations with strangers.

This is why psychologists do such a poor job in predicting behavior based on personality type. They're not much more accurate than astrologists, yet such analytical testing, like with the Myers-Briggs test, gives people validation about who they are and so it remains popular.

One annoying fault with this book is that it drones on and on about racism as viewed through the lens of survey studies. While that's forgivable, there really wasn't a whole lot of other meat to chew on—it contained a lot of filler from the author in the form of irrelevant musings and personal experiences that did nothing to further the topic.

Overall, Strangers To Ourselves contains some interesting facts about the human brain, but nothing that is especially new or even practical. You'll find it hard to apply the information into improving your own life or how you think. It's not a horrible book, but I can't give it a solid recommendation.

Read More: "Strangers To Ourselves" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Modern Rise Of Anal Sex

January 31, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

The popularity and prevalence of butt sex today could be aptly described by what is correctly pointed out here:

> In 2014, the chances a woman was previously fucked in her asshole by an ex-boyfriend are greater than the chances that she washed and folded his jeans and t-shirts.

With modern societies increasingly becoming unnatural today, it doesn't seem surprising that even "unnatural" sex is now considered as natural.

And in the same societies which sometimes seem to be hypocritically hung up on sex itself, I find anal to be sometimes ironically over-hyped and pedestalized to the point of a modern day obsession, especially when it is increasingly becoming common among modern women today. Familiarity to anything over a period of time does breed contempt for it—and as predictable sex with the same woman gets boring over a long time. Anal is no exception to that rule too.

A few "anal" observations on societies today

After personally experiencing quite a number of women, I've learned quite a bit when it comes to their attitudes towards anal sex. As many other men alongside me might've already found out, it's something which can be found commonly practiced even by the "conservative good girl" types. Additionally, I've found that the women who tended to be most enthusiastic (or skilled) about it were:

- Dark Triad Women
- Women who hated pills and contraceptives
- Intellectual types
- Women whose friends were into anal
- Cougars and Older Women
- Tattooed women
- Single moms
- Pseudo “virgins”
- Feminists
- Women on their period
- Women desperately seeking a relationship or marriage, or sexual validation of their femininity’
- Women who pursue you (usually they have their own agenda)

Basically, the list encompasses most types of women, doesn’t it? Some of the types mentioned on this list might overlap too. Besides, some additional observations were:

1. Some of the worst female hypocrisy can be seen with how some modern women use or perceive anal

In today’s modern world, female hypocrisy along with female hypergamy is unchained. And in a world where men are constantly and hypocritically demeaned by women about their wealth, age, relationships, careers, and sometimes even gender politics, what’s even more amusing is to see female hypocrisy when it comes to sex.

Moreover, I’ve encountered women cheating on their men by offering anal exclusively saying that it didn’t count as sex. On the flip side, some of these same women cheated on their men by offering anal exclusively saying that anal was something special they reserved for the men they truly desired (the men whom they cheated with)—and not for the unfortunate men they already were committed to in their lives.

Worse for those men feeling jealous, whose women weren't interested in anal—after these women had already done it enough times before with others to know that it wasn't really their thing. Thus, anal either meant taking a non-meaningful casual "reverse dump" or "intimate soulful sex" for such women—depending on their hypocritical reasoning and mood for it.

2. Anal sex's popularity today is partly influenced by overrating, over-hyping and over-promoting the female ass, in today's world

Don't misunderstand me. Like many other fellow men, I'm an ass man, but not an anus man. Flash back to 50 or even 20 years ago. What was usually considered the epitome of female sex appeal at that time? Large titties.Today, it's primarily the female ass, which has always been a important factor in female sex appeal since antiquity, but even more so today. Moderation is often lacking (even in hyping something) in today's modern societies which breed excess in everything.

3. Rising porn viewership and its increasing promotion in porn is making anal sex more popular

The physiological and psychological effects of modern day pornography are already well known.

Porn often influences human sexuality more than ever today, especially with increasing consumerism as well as its easy availability today. Today's porn actually promotes "analworship," along with "assworship"—with anal becoming a staple in almost every heterosexual porn scene. With the influx of porn into homes and the oversexualization of women in modern societies, it's common to see modern men being increasingly pornified, baited, and socially programmed towards anal.

4. Anal sex's value and popularity, however, varies from culture to culture

You'll find conflicting sensibilities among people throughout the world when it comes to butt sex. Anal sex may not be everyone's cup of tea and still remains taboo in some parts of the world.

5. It can sometimes be found just as often in sexually repressed or traditional societies

Bullshit on the modern feminist claim that "most men pressure women to take it up the back door." I've seen pseudo "conservative" women or pseudo virgins mostly use anal and oral to enjoy "pleasure" before marriage. But, at the same time, we have modern women themselves giving reasons as to why women should have anal sex. Who's pressuring these women again?

6. A woman’s skill at anal sex (or the elasticity of her anus) is a major slut tell ‘’Whores will give you in bed what your wife won’t’” was a ‘relevant’ aphorism in olden times. Out of those things given, anal was common, which was probably one of the whore’s “specialties.” However, with the rise of whorish or slutty behavior in today’s modern societies, more often than not there is not much difference between an ancient whore’s and a modern woman’s sexual expertise and experience.

Thus, you need not necessarily find a whore to “specially” provide anal today, especially in times when modern women often begin sexual experience through the back door during their years on the cock carousel. The more loose her anus and the more eager she is for butt sex, it could indicate her (vast) prior experience in riding the cock carousel with her butt (hole).

7. Anal sex is still a popular choice of birth control with modern women

It’s something which is not only restricted now to “professional” working girls and rural women, as in earlier times. I’ve seen modern, career women who simply wanted anal because they didn’t like pills or condoms.

With more men fucking eager modern women in their asses, it shouldn’t surprise many about an innocuous factor which might be contributing towards falling birth rates and rise of HPV and other STDs in modern societies. But what shouldn’t be overlooked is that in a hypocritical feminist modern world where male sexuality is often demeaned, women can be (and often are) more “perverted” than men.

8. The definition of virginity in the modern world is often a joke, thanks to rising popularity of anal (or even oral) sex

This hypocrisy of pseudo-virginity (women claiming to be virgins while taking up the ass or mouth) has been even been showcased and parodied in porn.

9. Anal sex can be pleasurable – under certain conditions. Not always, and not with every woman

Anal scenes in porn require a lot of preparation, as the actresses usually have to take an enema to avoid crapping during the shoot and for anal play. What you seen in porn can carry great health risks if you’d try to replicate it without proper precautions in real life. Anal sex can be gross and disgusting in real life, unlike what you see in porn.

10. Women who do it frequently tend to have mental issues or personality problems

At first I didn’t believe this, but after observing and knowing women who were into it, there seems to be some truth to it. Quite a number of times, I've noticed BPD type behavior or in some even worse cases, dark triad behavior commonly in these women.

11. A sizable number of modern women mostly think they're porn stars

Possibly influenced by the increasing narcissism and popularity of porn among modern women too. However, the lack of enough anal hygiene among some modern women is sometimes quite apparent. Bangable women can still be gross, and even grosser when it comes to anal.

12. Anal sluts could be good at sex, but don't ever commit to them.

I've seen quite a few men in real life choosing to commit to women solely because of the woman's willingness and expertise at anal. True, she might be a great fuck, but if a man's shameless enough to desperately wife up a woman whose asshole has been used as a sperm receptacle by Tom, Dick, Harry, and Pimp Daddy prior to him, who could help him?

Anal is often used as a "power move" today by women to sexually ensnare and dominate men into commitment, as compared to being a sexual domination move used by men on women.

So if she's ever ready and eager for anal during the first time you're doing her, do keep in mind that she could've (or must've) provided the same to many before you. Don't gloat about her and what her ass can do for you in bed, and do try to ascertain her real motives for providing anal.

I've often felt sorry for men who've walked down the altar wifing up an ass which had been opened up by (many) men before. Probably the previous anal penetration that their brides enjoyed from others didn't count as "real sex" for these grooms, as much as it didn't for their brides.

Conclusion

> The four most over-rated things in life are champagne, lobster, anal sex, and picnics. — Christopher Hitchens

When it comes to anal, personally I'd say to each man his own. Don't tell a man what type of woman he should be attracted to, and also the type of sex he should enjoy with her—whether it may be vaginal, oral or anal.

And if you'd think and observe carefully enough the hypocritical feminist sexual trends of today, there's nothing special about the woman who provides anal. Heterosexual anal sex has been around since antiquity.

With the degenerating quality of modern women today, sometimes anal expertise can actually be the only thing "special" about a woman—or the only specialty she could bring to a relationship, should you choose to ever pursue that with her.

Don't let women rule your life, or the sex they provide to rule you either. So whether a modern man may like anal or not, he shouldn't make it an obsession should he like it, because modern women with their feminist hypocrisies can exploit his fetish with it (and their asses) to eventually make a jackass out of him.

Read Next: The Decimation Of Western Women Is Complete

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Important Lessons From Sun Tzu's "The Art Of War"

January 31, 2015 | by Titus Vibius | Link | Original Link

> War is an act of violence intended to compel our opponent to fulfill our will. —Carl von Clausewitz, "On War"

I have recently finished reading The Art of War by Sun Tzu. The book is more than 2000 years old and the fact that it is still read and widely appreciated today makes it all the more respectable. On Amazon, in the review comments one said "this book is recommended for all MBA students," which made me think about its relevance in today's world and in the contemporary ~~survival of the fittest jungle~~ competitive business environment.

Why would I read a book about how war should have been waged 2000 years ago?

The above quotation (alongside knowledge of evolutionary biology and of social interactions) illustrates the importance of understanding war and its various forms. Since the above definition means war can apply to pretty much anything (business and politics being the best examples), war becomes an extremely important field of study.

Added to this is the fact that the book has quotations that apply universally to any day and age and in many fields. Granted, the book sometimes has material that only applies to ancient warfare, but it is still a worthy book and those passages not only offer historically interesting material, but they also shape the mentality of the reader into a more strategic one.

What the book has to offer

> All warfare is based on deception

And adaptation I might add, having read the book. This is very effective when applied in that if you are fully honest with your business/political opponent(s), then you will be crushed because you will have lost the upper hand since your moves surprise no one.

> Hence, when able to attack, we must seem unable; when using our forces, we must seem inactive; when we are near, we must make the enemy believe we are far away; when far away, we must make him believe we are near.

Don't think of this literally as having a bunch of spear or sword-armed man ready to assault our enemies; think that when you can make a move to get power in an organization or over someone then you mustn't show it until the deed is done.

For example, if you have a great idea on how to start your own business and leave your firm, would you really divulge that to your current employers? Would you tell them that you've made a plan on how to compete and out-perform them in the next three years? Of course not; you would seem dependent on the job that they offer you until you drop out of work, and even then you would try to make them think your business is struggling, until the time when you would have more market share than them.

> If your opponent is of choleric temper, seek to irritate him. Pretend to be weak, that he may grow arrogant.

This works brilliantly when you are dealing with another person individually and you want them to lose social power by forcing them to start an argument and losing it.

> "Bring war material with you from home, but forage on the enemy. Thus the army will have food enough for its needs".

This may now sound nice but it is best in life to profit from others and use their resources (financial, emotional etc.) to your advantage, mostly because if not then others will profit from you by asking you to help them with money or a personal problem etc.

> There are five dangerous faults which may affect a general:
> (1) Recklessness, which leads to destruction;
> (2) cowardice, which leads to capture;

> (3) a hasty temper, which can be provoked by insults;
> (4) a delicacy of honour which is sensitive to shame;
> (5) over-solicitude for his men, which exposes him to worry and trouble

(1), (3), (4) and (5) might as well have been said by any psychologist in 2015, since having a big ego will actually constitute a big part of one's downfall. Excessive concern for others will result in one's kindness being taken for weakness and thus one will be exploited (5), while (1) can even lead to imprisonment.

> The general who advances without coveting fame and retreats without fearing disgrace, whose only thought is to protect his country and do good service for his sovereign, is the jewel of the kingdom.

Oh Sun Tzu, if only today's politicians could hearken unto you! Yet woe betide us all, for our wellbeing they eschew!

How does it apply to game?

Game can be seen as a type of warfare; after all, you want to use whatever means necessary to get a girl to willingly let you have sex with her ("compel her to fulfill your will"). In the western world, this can imply displaying dark triad personality traits. Thus, game is some sort of war where your objective is clear and where victory, like in war, depends not only on your abilities and strength but also on circumstances and on the cunning of your "enemy."

> Begin by seizing something which your opponent holds dear; then he will be amenable to your will. Rapidity is the essence of war: take advantage of the enemy's unreadiness, make your way by unexpected routes and attack unguarded spots.

Applied to game, you want to seize the girl's attention and then ensure that you obtain her attraction; afterwards, you need to quickly escalate before she loses interest.

> Disciplined and calm, to await the appearance of disorder and hubbub amongst the enemy—this is the art of retaining self-possession.

If you are in a relationship, you will notice some girls tend to occasionally throw a temper tantrum; some girls crave drama, which is fine. However, you must remain “disciplined and calm” and use that tantrum to show your high value by not caring and not allowing yourself to be provoked into mindless discussions or heated arguments.

Also, use it to convince your girl of stuff that she would otherwise not listen to (such as red pill concepts: telling her that her erratic speech and behavior is unnecessary, unimpressive and unpleasant).

> Hence to fight and conquer in all your battles is not supreme excellence; supreme excellence consists in breaking the enemy’s resistance without fighting. Therefore the skillful leader subdues the enemy’s troops without any fighting; he captures their cities without laying siege to them; he overthrows their kingdom without lengthy operations in the field.

Indeed, the pinnacle of game is to have girls actively try to make you sleep with them rather than having to get rejected, flaked on, cockblocked etc. If that’s not possible then you want to at least aim to get the bang without having to work too much.

Bonus quotes without the commentary

I will now post a few quotes that you can reflect on.

> In war, practise dissimulation, and you will succeed.

> The enlightened ruler lays his plans well ahead; the good general cultivates his resources. Move not unless you see an advantage.

> To secure ourselves against defeat lies in our own hands, but the opportunity of defeating the enemy is provided by the enemy himself.

Conclusion

This book is a gem in terms of knowledge and in terms of applicability to modern times. The conclusion is, buy it and read it (and re-read it if necessary) and conquer your surroundings.

Read More: Sun Tzu, The Art of War on Amazon

Titus Vibius
Titus Vibius is an anachronistic dissident who belongs to no one in space or time. He spends his time studying and gaining knowledge in the hope that in the future, he will create a society to which he belongs.

How Modern Architecture Destroys Your Relationships

January 31, 2015 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

Most people don’t consider how architecture is important to relationships. Good architecture helps you meet and get to know people. But what few people realize is that the stores, office buildings, and houses they live in are often designed to stop this from happening.

Why would architects want to design unhappy buildings? To push an agenda. The preachers of social justice have realized architecture’s significance and used it to subtly change our behavior, our values, and beliefs. They want to change how we interact, and that includes isolating people and destroying their relationships.

Changed Sex Roles

Classic column orders

Ancient languages were infused with gender. Early people saw gender differences in everything around them. Gender became weaker and less important over time, until progressives erased gender completely. Today's gender-neutral language inculcates a false belief that male and female are equal.

Sexes were distinct in architecture as well. The Greek Doric order, with its robust and austere proportions represented the man. The slim and decorative Ionic order represented the female. Designers emulated the inherent human roles they saw in the natural world.

But modern progressives decided that a person's sex is just a construct of conditioning. They decided women are less useful to the economy as stay-at-home mothers and more productive in the workforce and as prodigious consumers. To change human roles they changed environmental expectations.

Just as modernists erased gender from language, they removed it from our buildings and made purely functional structure that did not speak to the sexes. Distinction is rarely made that correlates to the sexes: sturdy vs. slim, bare vs. adorned, dominant vs. subservient, geometric vs. whimsical.

> "…it is necessary to understand the historic origins and enduring popular appeal of these binaries in order that we can dismantle them. The blurring of these spheres (of formal and informal economies, public and private space, core and periphery) is articulated especially clearly in… the household." (Cities and Gender, Helen Jarvis, p. 24)

Feminists try to erase icons that promote "gender roles," such as the "controversial" statue of a kissing couple at London's St. Pancras Station. Heterosexual and masculine images are quickly disappearing, or "creepy" statues such as Marilyn Monroe in Chicago.

Today's architecture pushes unnatural expectations. The Women's Restroom Bill of 1987 mandated that men's and women's bathrooms be exactly the same, except what is necessary for biological differences. Before this, men's bathrooms were communal and accommodated more people. Women's restrooms placed toilets behind a lockable doors and had extra spaces for childcare, grooming, and resting.

But now men are forced to seclude themselves like women behind partitions, and the greater effort women need to groom themselves is not supported. The man's restroom today is sexually insecure and the woman's restroom makes women look sloppy.

Philip Johnson's celebrated Glass House of 1949 made the home into an exhibitionist experience. Glass walls opened the bedroom to the world, a voyeuristic dream. Next to that, his Brick House placed the bed under churchy vaulted ceilings. Feminine textures and materials combined with a traditionally male structure to confuse gender.

Johnson's homosexuality was recognized as the bedroom "became a queering of the cave into a vaulted chamber… Sadean pleasure palace." (Betsky, 1997 p. 115) Such architects queered the definition of manliness by manipulating gender in their architecture.

Isolated Spaces

One of the most emulated architects of modern times, Le Corbusier, sought to change how the family interacts. His iconic Schroeder House (1924) would "redefine family life, women's rights and the responsibilities and to each other." (Family Matters: The Schroder House, Gerrit Rietveld and Truus Schroder p.81) He made no distinction of whom certain spaces were for. Corbusier got rid of traditional feminine elements and shared family spaces to "give the impression of being alone, and if desired completely alone." (Eilieen Gray)

Cobusier's client Eileen Gray may have preferred to feel lonely, as she hopped from one lesbian relationship to the next, but it does not suit normal people. An emphasis on loneliness undermined families across the world.

In Thailand, traditional dwellings in clustered apartments around communal spaces for related family groups. These families themselves had more personal shared spaces. But Thailand's modern house, influenced by modernism, has larger personal spaces and "no place for family gatherings." (Thai House: Vernacular Heritage, Mariana Correia, 241)

Public spaces have traditionally been associated with male and private spaces with female. The removal of masculine in today's public areas causes confusion of public and private functions.

As Roosh recently pointed out, clubs are increasingly becoming difficult places to meet girls. Clubs once had separate spaces for socializing, with appropriate lighting, sound levels, and seating arrangements. But now, music blares, women text, and individuals rub up against each other and don't actually talk. Why did clubs change? The removal of the male from public architecture. Today's club may make a woman feel "safe," like she would at home.

Oppressive Feminism Isolates Men

Wexner Center

Feminists increasingly demand to "feel safe" wherever they go. They demand that the world to conform to their crazy impulses.

Peter Eisenman's Wexner Center of 1989 is one of the most successful examples of post-modern design. But feminists complain that it makes them feel unsafe. They complain that its unusual form allows hiding spots for potential rapists, un-sheltered outdoor pathways leave them exposed to rain, marble walkways are slick, outdoor areas are breezy, windows cause glare from the sun, and stairways are dark. For these reasons, feminist Kathryn Anthony says, "The building was designed from the perspective of an able-bodied male, without much sensitivity to the different kinds of people who actually use the building." (Designing for Diversity…, Kathryn H. Anthony, p. 18)

Examples From History

Sex roles ought to be the norm, and exceptions can be accommodated in a separate space. Early European settlers in Australia wiped out the aboriginal jilmi which accommodated a single woman's special needs. They thought it was "prison-like" to isolate single women away from everyone else. But it turned out this was important for social cohesion. Similarly, the Law of Moses set certain standards for women in the community. The community in those days did not bow down to their needs, but rather made a separate space to accommodate them.

Ancient Egyptian, Roman, and Oriental houses had separate areas for women and men. Englishman Robert Kerr outlined gender-specific organizations and functions for each room of a house. Emphasis was placed on the man as the leader of the household. The radial paths of garden paths at the Duke of Beaufort's residence all converged on his dining chair. (see Gender Studies in Architecture…, Dorte Routledge, p. 135) Architecture reinforced healthy expectations of human interactions.

Today's house assigns no hierarchy of gender to its rooms, which means women take over the entire house. By designing from a female frame, less emphasis is made on the diversity of the household, its hierarchy, or of the diversity and hierarchy of the community. If the man is lucky, he can have the garage for his "man-cave." But along with the house, public and work spaces are overtaken and forced to serve the woman's needs.

Early Irish natives were nomadic tribes who repeatedly dismantled and rebuilt their dwellings. Over time, construction of their tents became a ritual that symbolized the marriage of the owners. Then, as today, the dwellings were constructed by men and the interior furnished by women. This distinction made the tent ritualistically "a site of creation, separation, autonomy and mobility." (Vernacuular Architecture in the 21st Century, Lindsay Asquith, p. 80) Both men and women had a role in architecture, but in proper and distinguished ways. Today, how many men are in control of the house they live in?

Such consideration must be made in today's architecture. The public needs to recognize the gender manipulation and oppressive expectations pushed on them by their environment. Today's push against traditional gendered architecture isolates men. Public spaces do not help men and women meet each other, because they suit the woman's need to "feel safe." Private spaces do not foster a harmonious family relationship because they manipulate the natural family hierarchy.

The presence of gender in architecture helps couples meet each other in public places and live happily in domestic places. Its removal and manipulation is pushing men and women apart.

Read More: The Hypocritical Discrimination Of Relationships Between Young Women And Mature Men

Amasa M. Lyman
Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

The Heinous Incorporation of “Sorry” Into The Male Vernacular

February 1, 2015 | by Ben Eszes | Link | Original Link

Many of us were raised to demonstrate good manners—say “please” and “thank you,” do not talk with your mouth full, knock before entering (the validation of that rule is a story for another time), avoid interrupting someone while they speak—but somehow, somewhere along the way, being a passive, fault-bearing pushover was incorporated into the unwritten list of appropriate social behavior for men.

This societal defect is due to the fact that many of us younger men were also raised to get in touch with our sensitive sides (i.e. feminine sides). Gone now are the masculine influences that helped mold the exemplars of the past, who demonstrated to the world that masculinity was, indeed, expedient.

Deprived of these role-models, society continually labels all who openly exhibit masculinity as chauvinistic, misogynistic cavemen who are trapped in the past. Thus, we are not only encouraged to act like women, but we are also shamed if we act like men. And what is our generation’s sensitive-side response to this attack? “Sorry.”

From the article, “How to ~~Apologize to Your Girlfriend~~ Be a Beta.”

The Reality

I have seen a myriad of those who, instead of saying, “excuse me,” and walking through a crowd, decide that the better alternative is to say “Sorry!” to everyone they pass. If the minuscule inconvenience of taking a step back while someone walks by warrants an apology, then I must spend the entirety of my future apologizing to the countless victims that I have wronged (in addition to all the women that I did not check my privilege with).

A quick observation reveals the apologetic nature of most individuals: we all know at least one guy who, upon being told that he apologies too much, apologies. But what of yourself? Are you inclined to apologize for inconsiderable offenses? Is apologizing your initial response to any uncomfortable situations? Do you frequently shift blame onto yourself and feel the need to apologize for issues that you were uninvolved in? In any case, this unnecessary usage of the word sorry must cease.

The First Issue

Incessant apology displays weakness. It displays that an individual always assumes fault for anything that goes wrong. Most importantly, it reveals a fear of displeasing others. This is remarkably detrimental to the improvement of oneself for two reasons.

1. You Will Be Taken Advantage Of

If people who apologize frequently are those who do not want to displease others, they must also be inclined to do whatever is asked of them. The individual infrequently receives help from others, yet he is eager to assist one in need, regardless of what his relationship with the person is.

Over time, this passive individual may gain a reputation as the guy who helps everyone. Once this has occurred, he will be even further compelled to make others' lives easier, and thus will dig himself into a near-inescapable tomb, where he will wallow in self-pity and curse his inability to say "no." The one who fears displeasing others will always end up displeasing himself.

2. You Will Become Stagnant

If the entirety of one's life is spent helping others' every need, no time will be spent improving himself. A motivational speaker is of no use if he cannot implement what he teaches into his own life; accordingly, the proverb, "Physician, heal thyself (found in Luke 4:23)," may be rewritten as, "Counselor, advise thyself."

In other words, attend to your own issues before attempting to resolve the same issue in others. The one who fears displeasing others will always end up regretting that he neglected self-improvement for the sake of helping others, who now surpass him in quality.

Bruce Lee never said, "Be like stagnant water."

The Second Issue

Saying "sorry" too much signals instability. It demonstrates that trivial matters are overwhelming to an individual and that his go-to method for dealing with the anxiety is to demean himself. Instead of recognizing the situation as insignificant, he easily distributes one of his most valuable possessions—a genuine apology.

One who never uses profanity will always be taken seriously when he does implement profanity. In the same manner, one who rarely apologizes will convey sincerity when he does so. As men, our apologies should be reserved for only the gravest of mistakes. If you say that you are sorry after sneezing, how can anyone be sure that your apologies for more important matters are sincere?

The Remedy

So, when is it appropriate to apologize? Instead of dealing in absolutes, I will defer to your personal experience as the method of discernment. A safe assumption, however, is the following.

A = number of times you think it is appropriate to apologize.

B = number of times it is actually appropriate to apologize.

A > B

Consider the following two dialogues:

> "You're late."
>
> "Sorry!"

...

> "You're late."
>
> "I understand. I will make sure that I arrive five minutes early to the next meeting."

I would expect the first response from an entitled, millennial receptionist who sashayed into the room, Starbucks in hand. The second response, on the other hand, conveys a genuine intent to correct the mistake. Essentially, the second response accomplishes the desired task—without the need for apology! Such is the objective of the masculine man.

The Collapse

When a society becomes permeated with those afraid to speak the truth, the result is what we see in America today: a politically-correct, tolerance-forcing majority that determines acceptable social behavior. Although this may sound similar to a DIRECTV advertisement (don't perpetuate a blue-pill society—get rid of unnecessary apologies), the message is that seemingly trivial matters such as this accumulate and lead to much greater problems.

In a world where men are encouraged to get in touch with their feminine sides, we need to remind society what true masculinity is, sans-apology.

Read More: How To Build A Beta Male

Ben Eszes
Ben Eszes is a lifelong student (who is still deciding on what to major in).

5 Hobbies To Cultivate Your Masculinity

February 1, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

In The Way of Men, Jack Donovan writes about what it means to be a man.

He postulates that it comes down to embodying four key masculine virtues: strength, courage, mastery, and honor.

These are the virtues that made men the most "successful" in primal tribe-based cultures based in warfare and survival—and they translate to modern society as well. While there are a lot of important traits for men to embody, these are probably the top four that make us most respected by other men, and desired by women.

In this article I'll focus on offering a set of hobbies that serve to assist you in cultivating the first three: strength, courage, and mastery. I only leave out honor because I believe it's a much harder beast to conquer—it requires true character development and cannot be "hacked" as easily as the first three.

Physical strength is possibly the biggest difference between man and woman. Mental strength, and being able to persist in the face of adversity is arguably an even more accurate predictor of the coming success or failure of an individual.

Courage means being able to press on in spite of the presence of risks. Without courage, a strong man is effectively neutered, because his strength, be it physical or mental, cannot be applied in stressful or risky situations. And, at the end of the day, heroes are made on the battlefield, not inside the comfort of their own home.

Mastery can mean a myriad of different things, but here it most closely resembles becoming extremely proficient in a particular discipline. The act of applying yourself in a dutiful manner to improving your craft, whatever it may be, is a journey that builds character. It is also an essential part of being your own man,

While there are a number of ways to enhance your sense of masculinity, practicing the following hobbies can be a powerful way to speed up this process.

1. Learn a martial art

Learning a martial art is a grueling process.

Whether you pick Muay Thai or Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu—and those are my two recommendations—you will be forced to learn a number of challenging techniques that feel completely unnatural at first. This builds your sense of mastery, as well as your mental strength, because, believe me, it takes persistence to stick with a martial art and get past the steep initial learning curve.

But more important is the tremendous amount of courage you'll develop when you spar (and potentially compete) in either of these disciplines. Stepping in the ring against someone who's trying to hurt you is a real risk, and proceeding in spite of this is courageous.

2. Play a competitive sport

While the physical strength benefits of some sports are obvious, the mental strength developed through competing is often ignored. Moreover is the sense of masculine camaraderie that's developed when playing a team sport. I recommend pickup basketball and paintball as two solid sports for guys to start practicing in order to develop these traits.

You'll also enjoy them immensely.

3. Practice the “big three” lifts

When it comes to building physical strength, nothing can compete with the “big three”: squats, deadlifts, and bench press. Increasing your strength in these lifts will make you strong. Simple as that.

However, be sure you’re doing them with proper form, otherwise injury is likely.

While improving your performance in the gym also builds a sense of mastery, I’d like to note that it does little for your courage. “Weights don’t fight back,” as a good friend of mine used to say.

4. Rock climbing

While not as “manly” as its large-scale mountain counterpart, rock-climbing gyms are becoming more and more prevalent today. Holding – and lifting – your bodyweight up a long vertical climb is a sure-fire way to develop strength, in your grip and back.

And although you’re usually harnessed in for safety, there’s an undeniable rush that you’ll experience as you make your way higher and higher. And progressing to free-climbing takes the courage necessary to succeed up a notch.

5. “Cold approach” pick-up

The final hobby I recommend you adopt is “cold approach” pickup. This simply means approaching women you don’t know, whether it’s on the street, at the store, or in the bar, in hopes of setting up a date with her.

This primarily enhances your courage, because we’ve been socially conditioned to fear making such advances. Doing so repeatedly can break through this social conditioning and allow you to realize that there’s no real risk involved.

I suggest simply being straightforward and blunt in your approaches, because this takes bigger balls—and is arguably more effective—than using some roundabout maneuver.

Read More: 6 Habits That Hold Men Back

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

How To Recognize Meaningless Rhetoric From Masters Of Deception

February 1, 2015 | by Drexel Scott | Link | Original Link

Identifying and understanding the use of rhetoric is an excellent way to defend yourself against progressive poison. It is an equally good thing to apply against those who cannot be reasoned with logically. First, it is necessary to understand the distinction between logic on one hand, and rhetoric on the other. Then, we will look at examples and explore why one is more politically useful than the other.

When we consider logic, we are talking about the soundness and validity of arguments. Soundness deals with whether the argument is properly constructed and whether the premises lead to the conclusion, and an argument does not have to be true to be sound. Validity deals with the truth of an argument's premises and their subsequent conclusion. Logic deals with sequence and building, which are in large part left- or male-brained concepts.

Rhetoric, on the other hand, is constructing phrases and arguments that appeal to a listener's emotional landscape. It picks the audience up, takes them on a ride, then places them back down where it wants them to land. It has nothing to do with truth, relying instead on inducing a trance-like state of suggestibility and gullibility in the listener(s). It is less "built" and more "flowing" and "creative." In that sense, it is more feminine or right- brained than logic.

The benefits of each method

Now, some of you may be wondering, “which is more persuasive?” Well, that depends on the context. If an engineer needs to know which parts to put in which order to build a machine, he’s going to use logic and sequential thinking in order to begin putting the pieces of the puzzle together…now, if you want to convince a typical non-thinking audience of something, then rhetoric will get you much farther.

Since progressives of all types are essentially unthinking meat puppets living in fear of what their friends might say should they stray from the party line, liberal politicians know better than to use logic. It would go over the heads of their audience, boring them and driving them away. Instead, liberal politicians pluck the heartstrings of their emotional puppet constituency by saying words that sound good and result in good feelings.

Then, they use shaming rhetoric to instill bad feelings in association with certain thought patterns that are labelled as “Politically Incorrect.” The term itself is a shaming tactic, and a young brainless liberal knows that should he dare think naughty thoughts, he will be attacked by others until his compliance improves.

The masters of rhetoric

Much as I despise Barack Hussein Obama for running the free world despite having never accomplished anything of significance besides smooth-talking, I have to give him props for being one of the best (liars and) rhetoricians I’ve ever had the enlightening experience of hearing speak. He and his team have cooked up some of the most meaningless, emotionally persuasive glittery nonsense I have ever heard.

I want to examine his favorite word from the campaign years, back when he still had to pretend that he would follow through with his promises. The name of that sinister syllable is:

“Change”

Barack Hussein Obama, the brother of a man under investigation in Egypt for affiliation with a terrorist organization, loves the word “change”—but not as much as his audience does. In conjunction with top-notch NLP, Obama litters his speech with phrases just vague enough for them to mean whatever the listener wants them to mean.

This is what NLP is, from a purely Ericksonian standpoint: language patterns vague enough for the listener to project his own experiences, assumptions and desires onto. It is essentially like handing someone a blank that feels really good, and having them fill it in.

For example, “If you care about America, then you should care about change” is a phrase that sounds great….and doesn't mean anything at all. This is typical speech from a man like Obama. First of all, I will show you where the NLP is here.

The first part of the sentence, "If you care about America," has two parts. It is the "if" half of an "if, then" statement, which begins with the next part of the sentence. It is also an embedded command, "care about America," which the speaker would say with a drop in vocal tone or a gesture at the same time to mark the command. The second part of the sentence completes the "if, then" statement and includes another embedded command: "care about change."

Now, it's already a very good sentence rhetorically. However, the real genius is in the use of the blank canvass term "change." Everybody listening to that word has some change they would like to see, whether in themselves, their families, communities, nations or even the entire globe. By using such an ambiguous word, whatever the listener wants to change is automatically linked to "something Barack Hussein Obama promised me."

He might have promised one person less income inequality, he might have promised another that feminists would rule the world, and he might have promised another that order would be restored. And all he had to say was one word. Best part is, it is impossible for eight years (or one year, or even a day) to pass without change occurring, so in this way, Barack Hussein Obama also covered his own ass. He promised change, and then change happened! Isn't he great?

Words like "hope," "progress" and "equality" all belong in the same grouping as "change." What does progress mean? Depends on what the listener believes should change about the world. What does equality mean? Absolutely nothing. What does hope mean? Something different to everyone. Keep your eyes open for when politicians, media loudmouths and public agitators use words like these. They have been chosen deliberately by those people for a reason, so next time you hear them being used against you, it is on you to figure out the speaker's agenda and decide what you really think based on truth and logic.

So now that I have explained to you a little about the mechanics behind vague words and liberal rhetoric, it will be easier for you to identify it, guard your mind against it, and mock it openly and publicly so the mouth-breathing hordes and their evil masters know that we will not go down without a fight.

Read Next: Tactics For the War Against Cultural Marxism in 2015

Drexel Scott
Truth is my religion, and sovereignty my destiny. I'm an entrepreneur who teaches what I know, and you can find my #1 Closing Advice book, Straight To Sex, at my website:

http://www.drexelscott.com/s2s

How To Get Laid By Playing In A Band

February 2, 2015 | by James Russell | Link | Original Link

There’s little doubt about it: being a musician and playing in a band can be a very effective way of getting some serious ass. However, before I elaborate on methods and tactics, I feel obliged to offer a couple of disclaimers.

First, bear in mind that unless you are legitimately a famous musician (which I’m going to assume you’re not), being in a band is no substitute for having game—girls will rarely approach you proactively. Second, making music takes time and effort. If you dedicated all the time it takes to write songs, rehearse, book gigs and haul your equipment around to just aggressively approaching girls, I imagine your notch count would probably be higher (providing a basic level of social skill). However, if playing music is something you enjoy doing, you’d be a fool not to take advantage of the obvious benefits.

So how does being a budding rock star get you laid? First, there are the indirect benefits: being able to drop casually into conversation that you’re a musician, or having strategically placed Facebook photos of you on stage in front of hordes of screaming fans can never herald bad things for your social value.

However, what I’m going to focus on here how to meet women directly through playing in a band. So, without further ado, let’s examine the key actions that will lead to maximum copulation.

1. Play gigs

It’s unfortunate but true, making music counts for nothing unless you actually play live. Sorry if you’re a talented bedroom producer, but it’s the physical act of getting up on stage and laying your ass on the line in front of a crowd that gets panties wet, not the actual quality of the music. On the plus side, this means that your band doesn’t actually have to be that great, as long as you’re not conspicuously awful and you have a bit of a stage presence.

2. Sing, if you can

It’s pretty obvious to most people that the singer is, by default, the most desirable member of the band. After all, they’re the most visible on stage, generally viewed as the leader (or alpha male, if you like) of the group, and are demonstrating they have the balls to lay bare their soul to a bunch of strangers.

If you’re not the singer, singing some backing vocals can raise your profile, or just generally being active onstage; it’s all about just making sure you’re visible rather than lurking at the back where nobody even knows you exist. The worst thing you can do is to be in a band with a female singer, as it makes you look like a chronic beta. Blondie might have some great tunes, but how often do you think the guys who weren’t Debbie Harry got laid??

3. Don’t be in a metal band

I have absolutely nothing against metalheads, but it’s generally true that the crowd at metal gigs tends to be an overwhelming sausage fest. Unless you’re looking to pull a hairy guy in black, consider another genre.

Not what you want

4. Don’t be the headline act

True, there’s more prestige associated with being the last guys on, but consider what generally happens after the gig is over. That’s right: the lights go on and everyone goes home, meaning all the social value you just displayed from being onstage has gone to waste. Middle of the bill is pretty much perfect: there are enough fans of other bands around to observe you in all your glory, and enough time to work the audience after you’ve finished.

5. Approach!

As stated at the outset, this part is absolutely vital. It’s all too tempting after your set is over to sit back, grab a well-earned beer and relax in a quiet corner. However, this is essentially akin to buying a winning lottery ticket, and then forgetting to go and collect your winnings. You’ve done the hard work, now it’s time to reap the rewards.

The great thing about approaching at gigs is that it doesn’t feel like a cold approach: you’ve just demonstrated large amounts of social value, and everybody there has some kind of common connection. You can ask women which band they’re there to see, what they thought of your set, if the sounds levels were okay from where they were standing…just use your imagination!

If you’re struggling, make a mailing list for your band and go around after the gig asking if people would like to sign up. It sounds cheesy but it’s relatively rare for people to decline to your face. Boom! You have an instant excuse to talk to any girl of your choosing in the room.

I’m not going to elaborate on the fundamentals of good general game here, but I will say one thing: avoid talking about your regular job or mundane day-to-day life at length. Girls who go to gigs get off on the idea of the rock star lifestyle, don't chode yourself out by wrecking the image that you've just built up.

So, to conclude, playing in a band is not a magic bullet that will get you laid like a trooper without ever having to run the risk of rejection. In modern society, learning game as a man is absolutely unavoidable if you want to maintain a steady stream of sex.

However, compared with golf, poker or video games, playing live music is a hobby which is highly conducive to meeting members of the opposite sex. Even if it never gets you laid once, gaining the nads to stand in front of a room full of strangers and openly express yourself can never be a bad thing in your development as a man.

Read More: 10 Signs A Bar Will Get You Laid

James Russell
James Russell is an English economist, part-time musician and keen scholar of night, day, and internet game.

Will The Philippines Become The Next Poosy Paradise Lost?

February 2, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As Return of Kings readers are well aware, I've been singing the praises of the Philippines for a while now. While I've never particularly cared for Asian women, Filipinas are so cute and easy that it's impossible for any man with a heart to not fall in love with the place. While I'm resigned to spending at least part of the year back in the U.S. due to health reasons, I'm planning on going back to the Philippines sometime this year.

Unfortunately, as Roosh and other writers have discussed, numerous countries full of sweet, loving girls are being assimilated into the American Borg. Poland, Brazil and other love tourist destinations are becoming infected with the viruses of feminism, fattiness and smartphone addiction, transforming their women into ersatz Americans more interested in their "careers" than in finding a man to take care of them.

Will the Philippines become the next nation poisoned by America's toxic culture? On the surface, it would seem that Filipinas are ripe for plugging into the matrix of the U.S. Most Filipinos are fluent in English, removing one of the most powerful barriers to Americanization; smartphones are ubiquitous even among poor people; Filipinos' love of McDonald's and other fast food greasepits (along with their own ludicrously unhealthy cuisine) have sown the seeds for an obesity epidemic in the coming years.

However, I believe that the Philippines will be able to resist the worst parts of Americanization, at least for the next few decades. Here's why.

1. The Philippines' geography protects it from excessive tourism

This sounds like a weird thing to bring up, but the Philippines' isolated location will insulate it from the most degenerate expats. Because the country is an archipelago, the only way in is through sea or air. The added expense of going to the Philippines will deter many of the losers who infest Thailand, Cambodia, and other expat destinations on the mainland.

While it's possible that the Thai government's sudden insistence on chasing out foreigners (despite the fact that foreign tourism is the only reason Thailand hasn't become a communist shithole) will lead to a boost in Philippine tourism, the Philippines' relative distance from other Southeast Asian countries will probably convince most ex-Thailand residents to relocate nearby to Cambodia or Vietnam.

2. American feminism has nothing to offer Filipinas

Feminists typically and cynically sell their ideology as a means of offering women equal rights, but the problem is that Filipino women already have equal rights. Filipinas can work, vote, go to school and exercise virtually any freedom that their American counterparts have. Indeed, you could make the argument that Filipinas are more free considering that the Philippines has had two women presidents while the U.S. has had zero.

Because Filipinas are already legally equal to men, the virus of American feminism is stripped of one of its most important vectors. Without the Trojan horse of women's liberation, all feminists have to offer Filipinas is socially sanctioned sluttiness, materialism, and loneliness. Thanks to the continued strength of Filipino families, Filipinas still prioritize marriage and children over pointless personal pleasures, depriving American feminism of the soil it needs to grow.

3. The Philippine birth rate is still incredibly high

One of the best indicators of a nation's spiritual health is its fertility rate. Nations with artificially low birth rates end up that way due to a combination of economics and moral degeneracy. Virtually every western nation, for example, has a fertility rate below the replacement rate of 2.1. The only nation that is even close to replacement levels is the U.S. at 2.02, and that's largely due to the influence of illegal Latinos.

At 3.06 babies born per woman, the Philippines has one of the highest birth rates in Asia. While having too many children brings with it its own problems, the fact that Filipinos are still cranking out kids speaks to their pride and moral strength. Not only that, if your goal is to bang a lot of girls, the high birth rate helps you by giving you an ever-expanding menagerie of girls to choose from. So many Filipinas turn 18 every day that unless you ply your trade in a small city, you'll never have to worry about being found out.

4. Philippine culture is unusually open and xenophilic

The Philippines is the most pro-U.S. country in the world; in fact, Filipinos feel more positively about America then Americans themselves do. While there are scammers and scumbags in the Philippines (like in every other country), Filipinos are more welcoming and accommodating to foreigners than any other people I've encountered so far. While this might seem like it would make the country susceptible to feminism and fattitude, think again.

The best analogy I can think of for Filipino culture is the katamari from Katamari Damacy: a giant adhesive ball that sucks up everything it encounters and makes it its own. Filipinos are masters of cultural appropriation; much of modern Filipino culture has been derived in some form from other countries, namely China, Spain and the U.S.

This aspect of the Filipino character can be seen in everything from their cuisine, to their religion (the Philippines is one of only two predominantly Christian nations in Asia), to their literature (see José Rizal's NOVEL Noli me tangere) to the unique English slang they've developed.

Yet despite their appetite for foreign cultures, Filipinos have retained their own unique identity. Because of this, and because of many of the Philippines' other qualities, I expect that the country will be one of the last holdouts in our culturally Marxist world. Prospective love tourists will be able to find happiness with a Filipina long after all the other poosy paradises have become wastelands of iCrack cuntiness.

Read More: 7 Things You Need To Know About Filipina Girls

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

A Man Apart: The Labors Of Pliny The Elder And His Demise At Vesuvius

February 2, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

On August 24, 79 A.D., Italy's Mount Vesuvius exploded in one of the largest volcanic eruptions in European history. For two days, the mountain disgorged millions of tons of pumice, ash, and pyroclastic materials into the surrounding landscape for many miles, burying completely the cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum.

One middle-aged man observed this scene with transfixed attention. The commander of the nearby Roman fleet at Misenum, at the northern limit of the Bay of Naples, stood near the shoreline and squinted at the incredible displays that were taking place across the bay. He was shocked to see a dense mushroom-shaped cloud rise steadily upward and spread out laterally across the sky, turning day into the inception of night.

He ordered a detachment of sailors and two secretaries to accompany him to the shoreline, where they could prepare several vessels to sail into the bay and get a better look at what was happening. This commander, a thick, heavy-set man with gleaming blue eyes, possessed an incredible capacity for work, a mind like a sponge, and a probing scientific curiosity about all natural phenomena. He recognized that this might be an opportunity to observe a geologic event unique in history. His name was Caius Plinius Secundus, but he is known to history as Pliny the Elder.

Map showing the area affected by the eruption of Vesuvius

As Pliny made his shoreline preparations, an exhausted messenger arrived from a friend named Rectina, begging him to rescue her and her companion Pomponianus; both of them were trapped by the eruption. Pliny and his party made off in haste for Herculaneum on the other side of the bay. As they drew closer to the city, large volumes of ash and pumice stone began to descend on the boats; and despite his helmsman's warning that they should turn back, Pliny refused.

He was mesmerized by the eruption, dictating notes frantically to his secretary, who copied them dutifully, his stylus moving rapidly across several wax tablets. The terrified secretary fumbled nervously, pausing only to mutter Ita, domine in obedience at the directions given him by his agitated employer.

Finally they were forced to make for the shoreline near Stabiae. Pliny suffered from asthma, and he was beginning to wheeze, his every breath coating his lungs with more microscopic ash and pulverized pumice. They located Pomponianus, but Rectina was nowhere to be found. Several members of his party wrapped themselves in linen blankets, some even tying pillows to their heads, in an attempt to protect themselves from the fist-sized pumice stones that were now falling with escalating intensity.

Pliny's breath became more labored, and he felt himself beginning to suffocate as the ash fall grew in acuteness. He gasped orders to his party, telling them to leave him there, and make for the open water. This they did, after an agonizing deliberation. His body was recovered several days later. He was only fifty-six years old.

Who was this polymath, this strange amalgam of public servant, military commander, and scientist? He was born at Como in 23 A.D., received a respectable education in Rome, and embarked on a military career at the age of twenty-three. His frontier service in Germany tempered his scholarly inclinations with the iron of action, and had the additional benefit of bringing him into contact with men of influence in the higher circles of Roman leadership.

After this period, he was trained as a lawyer in Rome. He wisely laid low during the reign of Nero, but later held the post of procurator in Spain, and additionally served as an advisor to the Emperor Vespasian.

Pliny the Elder

During all this time, amid the pressures of work as an administrator, military man, lawyer, and counselor, he managed to turn out treatises on rhetoric, the javelin, and a history of Rome, as well as several other works.

But the only one of his writings to have come down to us is his massive Natural History (Historia Naturalis), a one-man encyclopedia filling thirty-seven books, and purporting to summarize nearly all known knowledge of the day. Pliny lived for work, and was able to subsist on little sleep. His nephew Pliny the Younger describes his famous uncle's brutal regimen:

> He combined a ferocious intellect with unmatched powers of concentration, and the ability to go without sleep…[So] to give himself more time for study, [he] would rise half-way during the night; in winter this would be at midnight or one o'clock, or even two…Before dawn he would visit the emperor Vespasian, and then take care of the affairs of his official government position…On returning home he would resume his studies.
>
> After a light and simple meal (which he often took during the day), he would lie in the sun and have a book read to him aloud while he took notes. He made short summaries of every book he read, and often said that every book, no matter how worthless, had something useful in it…After his rest he usually took a cold bath, followed by a short meal or a nap; then he worked as if he had begun a new day. During the meal a book would again be read aloud to him while he took notes…[Pliny the Younger, Epistulae III.5]

The nephew continues to describe the incredible labors of the uncle, but space forbids us from recounting them in detail here. The picture that emerges of the elder Pliny is of an efficacious, probing mind, fired by the spirit of a true scientist. His Natural History treats thousands of topics in astronomy, mineralogy, zoology, botany, geography, painting, sculpture, and anthropology; it is not a systematic encyclopedia in the modern sense, and the approach is sometimes haphazard.

But therein lies its charm. Pliny ventures his opinions on human nature and philosophy in revealing asides, and discloses his sources (nearly 2000 different books by 473 authors) with a disarming candor. Here, despite all its limitations, is one of the first European attempts at a coordinated, orderly presentation of human knowledge.

He is not exactly a paragon of Latin style. He is terse, and often truncated. Yet it would be impossible for any mortal to stretch eloquence to two thousand pages. Beneath the avalanche of information presented, we can discern a philosophy here. His sympathies lie with the Stoics; and he believes that it is futile to ponder the nature of the Supreme Being, if one even exists. “I consider it a form of human foolishness to inquire about the nature and form of God.” (II.14).

If some God does exist, his view of mankind is apathetic: “It is laughable to believe that a Supreme Being devotes attention to the concerns of man.” (II.20). At times he rises to rhapsodic profundity, as here:

> Fortune alone is called and named , alone accused, alone pointed out, alone thought of, alone lauded, alone condemned and alone is heaped with insults; thought fleeting and blind by most, She is contumacious, errant, and erratic, and favoring those who are undeserving. To Fortune all is charged, and to Her all is credited. She inscribes the pages of all men’s ledgers. God is proved uncertain: Chance itself takes the place of God. (II.22).

From the comfortable distance of two thousand years, Pliny’s many errors have often been ridiculed; one historian called his work a “lasting monument to Roman ignorance.” There is some truth in this harsh indictment. One can open Pliny’s volumes almost anywhere and find some credulous assertion that places him squarely in his era.

So, for example, he believes that the heads of snails can cure a headache (XXIX.112); that a good eye ointment is made by letting a snake rot in a jar, and then pounding with saffron the maggots that therein breed (XXIX.120); or that a snake can be killed if a man spits in its mouth (XXVIII.7). His chapters on astronomy are painfully dated, and he shows little understanding or sympathy for the cultures of barbarian peoples.

Our frontiers are wider than those in Pliny’s day, but are we wiser?

Yet it is a matter of perspective. In Pliny's day, the far regions of the world were as remote and inaccessible as Mars, Venus, and the moon are to us today. Even modern scientists, we are told, know today less about the Earth's ocean floor than the surface of the moon. How much do we really know about the celestial bodies beyond Earth?

Do we not also rely on guesswork and conjecture, just as Pliny did when describing India or the heart of Africa? Will not our own remote descendants, two thousand years hence, laugh at our own self-important books? Pliny did the best he could with the tools that he had available to him. He was not a fool; he was just confined by the boundaries of his era.

There is great wisdom, even a quiet dignity, in these old volumes. Pliny has the true scientist's concern for worldly affairs. Instead of looking to heavenly deities for our salvation, we should strive to help each other: "For a man to help another man—this is god, and this is the road to eternal glory." (II.18). The development of coinage and interest, he believes, has done man more harm than good, as it has multiplied exploitations and inequalities among men (XXXIII.13).

Despite all of his absurdities, all of his inaccuracies, and all of his credulity, Pliny emerges from the pages of his volumes as an urbane and affable companion in the exploration of the natural world. Although able to critique his sources, he never indulges in the type of diatribe against other authors that too often mar the works of some of his contemporaries. He deserves a place in our pantheon because he worked literally day and night to impose order on a chaotic and inscrutable world.

I recently bought all ten volumes of the Natural History. I can converse with him whenever I want, and he occupies a prominent place on my bookshelf. The set was expensive, but it did not bother me to pay several hundred dollars to have the original text. Do you want to know why I did it?

It was out of respect.

Read More: Into The Wild

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Is Sex In The UK Becoming Impossible?

February 2, 2015 | by Titus Vibius | Link | Original Link

This article must be talked about; it just cries "WRITE ABOUT ME", and so I will (I am obliged to).

The future of sex in the UK seems to be "if you have a vagina, you can put any man in prison unless he records the whole seduction process or makes you sign papers where you write down everything that happened in meticulous detail." This is not a joke, this is actually happening.

The Article Itself

Let me dissect the article a little. Subtitle: "New guidance will be issued to all police forces and prosecutors as part of a 'toolkit' to move rape investigations into the 21st century" (emphasis in this article always mine)."

To begin with, notice how the law addresses solely women being raped by men, even though in 2011/2012, 6.61% of victims of sexual assault and rape (combined) were men (page 20, figure 3.1). Also, there were 9,000 males raped per year versus 69,000 between 2009-2010 and 2011-2012. I'm guessing, however, that males are irrelevant in the eyes of the law and do not deserve a law to be applied to them; laws must be applied preferentially to one group, not justly to everyone.

It was necessary to quote it in full. From the moment the law gets the Royal Assent (the formal date that the law comes into force, when the Queen signs it), ALL police forces and prosecutors in this country will have to change their views of rape, of consent, of sexual assault and of how to pursue claims related to those. Thus, it will change the whole methodology itself.

Further, it proclaims to be a "progressive"™ change into the legal system. Apparently, if a woman does not inform in a legally verifiable (!) manner anyone who will provide that evidence in a court (police, witnesses etc.) of her consent then she can sue for being raped. This is considered progress™. The word itself comes from pro- (forward) and gradi (to walk): progredi in Latin, meaning thence "to walk forward". In a way, we are walking forward; however, in front of us I see a cliff and not green pastures.

Moving on,

> "men accused of date rape will need to convince police that a woman consented to sex".

Good luck with that, fellow UK males! Make sure you bring papers from your lawyer (your solicitor) with the right phrasing and a pen so your sexual partner can sign them. If you don't have any, then be sure she consents to a short video of her saying she consents to sex. It could sound like this: "I, (insert female name here), hereby declare that proud of the law, I consent to (number of minutes) of sex with (male name) in (positions named/described)."

With a hand on her chest and tears in her eyes, while singing the national anthem, she would be credible.

> "Alison Saunders said rape victims should no longer be "blamed" by society if they are too drunk to consent to sex…"

This is perfectly true; we should blame the evil patriarchy for selling alcohol to women. The only rational answer is to ration the alcohol allowance of each person. Similar to how people in the Soviet Union were only allowed one bread per day per family and one kilogram of cooking oil per week, so shall women be allowed two martinis OR one beer OR half a shot per evening.

Do not teach women not to get blackout drunk; that is a grave error. Teach men to only have sex with women when women are fully sober and to always refuse to hit on a drunk girl. In fact, men should be given breathalyzers and they should ask every woman to blow into it. If she is too drunk to drive then she is too drunk for sex.

Men, carry one with you every evening!

> "Campaigners described the move as "a huge step forward" in ensuring fewer rapists escape justice."

They spelt innocent men wrong, they wrote it as "rapists."

Nevermind, also, that a woman (on the same website) wrote about the absurdity of victims never bearing any responsibility for their bodies, minds, and wellbeing. Just ignore her, she might have been a patriarchal double-agent.

> "We want police and prosecutors to make sure they ask in every case where consent is the issue – how did the suspect know the complainant was saying yes and doing so freely and knowingly?"

Indeed, how does the suspect know she was saying yes? Are the following clear indications or are they worthless?

a) the woman was undressing herself
b) the woman was undressing the man
c) the woman was kissing the man
d) the woman did not push him away when he started kissing her
e) the woman did not try to run away or try to hit the man or try to stop him when he was putting a condom on (assuming he had one)

Do the above prove consent had taken place? Does the woman need to explicitly state consent?

> "The new guidance also covers domestic violence situations and those where 'the complainant may be financially or otherwise dependent on their alleged rapist.'"

In other words, if you are married and your wife has a much lower income than you (which means you are a male provider), then she can sue you any day she likes for being raped. Once that happens, you wake up in court for having provided for your family and YOU need to provide evidence that she consented to sex last week. Good luck to all married UK men!

> "The most recent figures showed that just 15,670 women reported rapes to the police, often because they thought it would be impossible to prove the offence, or because they did not have any confidence in the police's > ability to help them…”

To address that, Alison Saunders thought it’s a good idea to trust hear-say evidence and bypass every legal requirement that took centuries to develop to prevent malicious prosecution that lacks evidence. Obviously, the police is also not worthy of women’s trust. The police clearly cannot help anyone with anything. In fact, we would all have been better off reporting crimes to Don Corleone.

Conclusion

The only logical conclusion when you don’t like the laws of a country (or when they allow others to end your life in a few minutes, just by talking) the only solutions are a) to change the laws, or b) to move out of the country. Changing the law is impossible at the moment since feminists enact laws. Of course, in the future Sharia Law may gain more power; presently, there are 85 Sharia courts in the UK.

Moving out of the country seems to be the only sensible thing for an individual. Of course, there is also option c: behave well towards your woman and hope (yes, HOPE) that she doesn’t get bored by you and that she doesn’t start loathing you. This is based mostly on luck, for unless you are an alpha provider who alternates between alpha game and romantic game, then you can never be sure of what may happen.

Read More: Say Hello to the New Definition of Rape

Titus Vibius
Titus Vibius is an anachronistic dissident who belongs to no one in space or time. He spends his time studying and gaining knowledge in the hope that in the future, he will create a society to which he belongs.

Why The Native Peoples In Australia Were Doomed

February 2, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

We recently had Australia Day here down under. This involves a lot of beer drinking, barbeques, fireworks displays and SJW circlejerks over events that occurred centuries ago.

More than most countries, Australia is still in the midst of a serious guilt trip over our colonial past. As Australia Day commemorates the landing of the first fleet at Botany Bay in 1788, activists have taken to calling it "invasion day." Sovereignty was never ceded they claim—as if that statement makes any sense.

We all know what these rantings and ravings are about. This is nothing to do with correcting historic wrongs, or actually helping indigenous Australians. This is nothing more than a group of brainwashed, grown-up children marching around desperately trying to lay claim to a shred of moral superiority.

Whenever I encounter one of these dumb, self-righteous fuckwits, I've taken to saying the following – "So if we sent you back in a Delorean to 1750, with the mission of preventing the colonization of Australia, how would you go about it?" Amazingly, I am yet to hear a satisfactory answer.

The Aborigines' luck runs out

Doom for the Aboriginal culture did not come with the landing of the first fleet at Botany Bay in 1788—it came about ten thousand years earlier when groups of similarly nomadic humans started settling down into the first permanent settlements in ancient Mesopotamia.

Living in large groups, disease spread quickly. The peoples of the old world had to adapt as malaria, bubonic plague, smallpox and a hundred other epidemics swept through their cities time and again. It is not that the Aborigines were suddenly worse off than everyone else post-1788. After thousands of years of isolation, their luck just ran out, and like a species of flightless birds, their complacency cost them dearly.

Turning back the clock

Nor can you specifically blame the British for causing this. Lets say, hypothetically, they could be convinced not to settle at Botany Bay. Would Australia still remain untouched today? I imagine that without the British settlement, the French would have been right behind. If not them, then the Spanish, or the Portuguese, the Dutch, the Belgians, the Germans, the Italians…hell even the Swedish had overseas colonies.

As anyone living in the real world knows, you only have sovereignty over something so long as you can defend it, as Australia successfully did in 1942.

Of course, the whole issue is complicated. This isn't to say we couldn't have treated the native peoples more wisely at times. Of the half million or so Aborigines living in Australia in 1788, this number was down to under 100,000 by 1900. Around 20,000 died from violence (as well as 2,000 Europeans) the remainder from disease.

You can imagine the pattern. Settlers move into a new area. Local Aborigines spear their sheep. The settlers go out and shoot the Aborigines. This cycle went on for a century or so, as has always occurred when an agricultural society encroaches on a hunter-gatherer one.

There is very little to suggest a program of organized genocide against the Aboriginals however, though it is one of the left's favorite myths. For years we've been told of the "Stolen Generations," a system whereby thousands of Aboriginal children were apparently removed from their families by racist authorities purely for being black.

Other historians however, argue that the vast majority were removed over welfare concerns, growing up in broken communities where abuse and neglect were rampant. Many of them were half-caste children, which were often treated with scorn by the full-bloods of their tribes.

This hysteria has not only become mainstream, but practically unquestionable, since the release of the film Rabbit-Proof Fence in 2002. It supposedly tells the "true story" of a group of half-caste girls taken from a remote aboriginal settlement in 1931 to a "re-education camp" who then escape and walk 1,500 miles back home. I recall watching it as a kid (as it was screened in schools) and its actually a pretty good movie.

Unfortunately, its also mostly bullshit.

"Activism" can do more harm than good

You could ignore all this if these people weren't doing any real harm. However, because of the stolen generations myth, welfare workers are now very hesitant to remove Aboriginal children from their families, even when they live under deplorable conditions. This has dire consequences. Indigenous children are four times more likely to experience sexual abuse than other Australian children.

There's also the bizarre trend that more and more people are choosing to identify as Aboriginal in the census, even if it makes up a tiny portion of their ancestry. This would be equally harmless—except that federal government grants go to those states with higher reported populations of indigenous. Thus billions of dollars is not going to help remote communities, but being given to large, urban states for no good fucking reason at all.

Once again, the left is perfectly happy putting political correctness over saving lives, or common sense in general.

What about the noble savage?

Many also love to believe in the myth of the noble savage, but there's nothing to suggest the Aborigines were less brutal than most native peoples. When humans first reached Australia, dozens of species of Australian megafauna—including giant wombats, kangaroos, echidnas, platypuses, koalas, goanas, snakes, crocodiles and turtles, were all wiped out by the coming of man.

Of course we all accept that killing animals is not on the same level as killing fellow humans, but is there any indication the Aborigines were different to the British forty millennia later? Australia would still have the diversity of the African Serengeti if not for the Aboriginal invasion. It is possibly the worst ecological disaster to happen in the history of this continent.

In an interesting twist, the Tasmanian Tiger, which was wiped out by Aborigines on the mainland and later by Europeans in Tasmania, is now a prime candidate for cloning. It may very well be brought back from the dead by those same fiendish white men.

Of course, I bear no ill will towards the Aborigines. They have had an unfortunate plight over the past two hundred years. Even today, there's a massive (though closing) gap between Aborigines and the rest of the population in living standards – everything from life expectancy to literacy to incarceration rates.

But these same activists are doing precious little to actually help them. Most have probably never been to a remote Aboriginal community or a detention center in their lives.

To them, they are not human beings, but mere playthings in a moral tug of war that benefits no one but the activists themselves.

We all know what this is really about. This is another great liberal wankfest. It is a mass of young “progressive” activists bragging about their moral superiority, and shutting their ears to anyone who dares call them out on their own bullshit and the harm it causes. They troll the world in a more insidious manner than any inflammatory-yet-true article written at Return of Kings.

Don’t give them the time of day.

Read More: 5 Signs The American Education System Is Doomed

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

The Forgotten Importance Of Salt

February 2, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Today you take for granted that salt is cheap and plentiful, but this is only a recent phenomenon. In the past, salt was like petroleum oil in its importance to humanity. This book dived into that history.

> Salt is so common, so easy to obtain, and so inexpensive that we have forgotten that from the beginning of civilization until about 100 years ago, salt was one of the most sought-after commodities in human history.
>
> […]
>
> Where people ate a diet consisting largely of grains and vegetables, supplemented by the meat of slaughtered domestic farm animals, procuring salt became a necessity of life, giving it great symbolic importance and economic value. Salt became one of the first international commodities of trade; its production was one of the first industries and, inevitably, the first state monopoly.

Ancient empires had a surprisingly elaborate system of mining and procuring salt that was not only essential to commerce, but also to feed a growing human population, which required a higher per capital salt amount than today because food had to be preserved in it. Many of history's wars were funded by revenue gained from salt taxes.

> There are mountains in which the salt goes down very deep, particularly at Wieliczka and Bochnia. Here on the fifth of January, 1528, I climbed down fifty ladders in order to see for myself and there in the depths observed workers, naked because of the heat, using iron tools to dig out a most valuable hoard of salt from these inexhaustible mines, as if it had been gold and silver.— Olaus Magnus, A Description of the Northern Peoples, 1555

American slaves were contracted out to work in salt mines:

> The saltworks themselves were also dangerous, especially for slaves who were not trained in this industry. Boilers exploded, and sometimes workers would slip into near-boiling pots of brine. The owners sometimes sued the salt makers to be compensated for the loss or damage of their human property.

The book shared numerous ancient recipes (perhaps too numerous) that showed the reader how our ancestors salted meats and fish before cooking.

> After having washed seven or eight anchovies, let them soak several minutes in water to desalinate; having separated the fillets from their bones place them in a dish with several spoonfuls of olive oil , a pinch of pepper, two or three garlic cloves chopped fine, you could also add a splash of vinegar. Cut a slice about one inch off the top of a pain de ménage [or pain ordinaire—a long, round, typical French bread]. This is the best choice of bread because it does not easily crumble.

The most glaring flaw is that the author did not describe the effect of modern refrigeration on the salt industry. I fail to understand how a history book on salt could omit this.

> Salt consumption is declining in most of the world. The average twentieth-century European consumed half as much salt as the average nineteenth-century European.

Overall it was an enjoyable and entertaining book, especially considering that it's about something as common as salt, but at times it did feel like a patchwork of random stories with too much filler in terms of recipes. Nonetheless, men interested in history and food will enjoy it.

Read More: "Salt: A World History" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Unintended Consequences Of Taking The Red Pill

February 3, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Point Of No Return

Taking the red pill is the single most important thing a man living in the Anglo world can do for himself. Once he completely unplugs from the matrix he works on building a strong mind and body, getting his financial house in order, de-pedestalizing women, improving himself in ways that increase his value, and of course attracting the opposite sex.

Be that as it may, the red pill doesn't always go down so easily. Some men fight it, some deny it, and some even try to spit it back out hoping to go back to the land of blissful ignorance. But once he's made aware of the truth, he's changed forever whether he likes it or not.

Once the male mind is exposed to red pill knowledge it is incapable of flushing it out because the truth has always been staring him right in the face. We all know that the red pill provides a sustainable quality of life for men over a prolonged period of time. But it begins by simply making a man aware of what he already suspects. Once that dormant part of his brain is awakened by the ugly truth, there is no turning back. Some things cannot be unlearned and the truth about what is really going on around him is one of them.

The Progression

Red pill awareness, like most radical changes in life, has its stages:

Shock: This is what happens when you see material that flies in the face of the feminist agenda and that it is actually allowed on the internet.

Anger: This stage happens almost immediately after the shock wears off. You become angry with women, your parents, the world, even your dog because you realized you've been sold a bad bill of goods by everyone around you your whole life. You shake your head in disgust as you remember past relationships and how plainly obvious it was they were cheating on you.

Euphoria: Knowing there are other like-minded men out there who understand what you've gone through as a blue-piller and are able to articulate how to overcome your faulty programming and dominate life gives you a sense of elation like you've never felt.

Gluttony: This phase completely engulfs you as you spend countless hours consuming so much manosphere-related material your brain hurts and your eyes burn, but you continue stuffing your face late into the night…

[image]
…just like this guy

Addiction: You can't go more than a few hours without reading ROK, Roosh V Forum, Illimitable Men, The Rational Male, or any of the other 78 sites you have bookmarked. You faithfully refresh those pages every hour on the hour looking for that next hit. You have to have your fix or you'll get twitchy.

Application: This is where you start honing your new found super powers. You're hitting the gym, eating clean, and taking up productive hobbies. Your confidence is growing by the day so you've taken to talking to girls whenever and however you damn well please and they're lapping up your game like a stray cat to warm milk.

You're not watching as much TV or wasting as much time on social media because you just don't have the time anymore. You'd rather be perfecting your squat form, engaging in lively debates on RVF about shit test theories, or working on starting your own business so you can get the fuck out of that miserable cubicle you spend 40 hours a week in.

Congruency: The red pill is no longer an idea, it's who you are. You're in better shape, you've done a little traveling (and plan to do more), and your financial outlook has improved. You're banging 6s and 7s pretty consistently, which isn't where you want to be but you're headed in the right direction. It's only a matter of time before you're in the best shape of your life, have the money to live the way you want to, and knee-deep in high quality ass on the regular.

Thanks to your red pill renaissance life is pretty damn good and it's only going to get better from here on out.

As awesome as your life is right now it's important to understand that there will be side effects. Your crimson capsule crusade will not be all peaches and cream, and the longer you live this lifestyle the more obvious this will become. But learning what these side effects are and what to expect will help you to adjust your mentality accordingly. This way, you can minimize these effects and even turn them into an advantage.

1. Your Social Circle Will Shrink

Once you've digested the red pill it will be difficult to hide your newfound persona. You'll try, but eventually the floodgates will open, leaving your friends and family wondering what the hell has gotten into you. When they ask how and why you're kicking life's ass they're not going to like to answers. They'll certainly respect you and maybe even admire you, but red pill truth scares the shit out of people and makes them uncomfortable. This can ultimately lead to them to avoiding you altogether.

He said WHAT?!?

I've lost many friends over the years because I don't bow down to the almighty vagina and I have zero issue with expressing as much. I used to be of the mind that being open about the red pill was a bad idea, so I kept quiet when I felt the need to offer an opinion. But these days there is no filter. I say what needs to be said and let the chips fall where they may.

Crimson capsule congruency simply will not allow a man to be a beta—it can't be done. When a girl demands he buy her a drink, he blurts out "right after you buy me one" without even thinking. The same principle applies with your daily interaction with your family and friends.

For example, when your buddy tells you he's in love with a woman ten years his senior with two children you're probably going to laugh out loud. Yes, this will probably piss him off and he may not want to hang with you anymore, but that's the way it is when you live the red pill life.

So be ready for a reduction in your social and family circle. It may suck at first but after a while you'll find that being around like-minded men and feminine, attractive women who show deference in your presence significantly increases your quality of life. You may miss the people you've spent time with in the past but this is a small price to pay for a better life.

2. You Won’t Like Women As Much

One of the first things that happens when you take off your blue pill glasses is that you quickly learn that girls are made of everything but sugar, spice, and everything nice. You’ll understand what makes them tick and more importantly, what their true nature is. This leads to liking them a little less than you did before your eyes were opened.

This isn’t to say that you’ll despise them. Far from it. All of us here love the way women smell, the way they walk, the way they feel (inside and out) and the comfort and rejuvenating properties of genuine femininity. Even though they’re weird and wonderful, fantastic and fucked up all at the same time, their company does have unique ways of elevating your mood, however fleeting it may be.

But now that you’ve been let behind the curtain and can accurately predict most any woman’s behavior, they’re not quite as impressive or mysterious as they used to be. Plus, having intimate knowledge of some of their most nefarious traits such as their double-edged sexual strategy (alpha fucks – beta bucks) or how slutty they really are makes it impossible to look at them through the same lens.

That about sums it up

It’s common knowledge that once a magician reveals his trick, he becomes less impressive. The prestige no longer has the same effect because you know how he accomplished it. It’s the same with women. The red pill has so thoroughly and accurately dissected the inner workings of the second sex that they’re just not that awe-inspiring anymore.

I remember when I used to think girls were God’s greatest gift. The red pill has destroyed that for me. Even though I’m much better off this way I’d be lying if I said I didn’t miss the perceived aura that radiated from them. Ignorance, indeed, is bliss. Sometimes knowing how the sausage is made isn't all it's cracked up to be.

3. The Thrill Is Gone

I'll never forget the first time I approached a girl with red pill game. She was a sexy little red-headed number with a pert ass and great legs. She was in the produce aisle trying to pick out the perfect grape fruit. When she reached for one I noticed a tattoo on her inner wrist. "So much for an LTR," I playfully joked with myself. I obviously wasn't thinking about our honeymoon but she was as good a girl as any to christen my post red pill game with.

I'd practiced, drilled, and rehearsed all the PUA techniques, body language and positioning. I was ready. I took a deep breath, walked up, looked her right in the eye with something of a cross between a smile and a smirk on my face and said "Hi, I'm Donovan."

She bit.

She pleasantly told me her name and politely shook my hand. We ended up having about a 10 minute conversation about juicing (I'd recently purchased one and steered the conversation in that direction). I passed a relatively easy shit test, made a joke about green juice, and got the digits.

"Holy fuck!" I thought doing my best to compose myself as she put her number into my phone. "This shit actually works!"

The girl ended up flaking but I didn't care. I was hooked. Hooked on the dopamine rush that came with interacting with a female, escalating, and seeing it work. I became an approach machine and though I had my share of failures (that's the game, gents) the rest, as they say, is history.

But a funny thing happened on the way to the fabled playa status: The better I got at gaming females, the less of a thrill it became. Make no mistake…sticking your dick in a new vag will always be exciting. I'd even go as far as to say that most of the time, the best sex you have with a girl is the first time.

However, the path that leads past the typical western woman's pearly gates is anything but a road less traveled. Yes, every girl is different in their own way and that requires minor tweaks in your game to gain entry to her sugar walls but by and large, the same technique works for most American girls: Bold approach, charm, pass shit-test, number close, text game, meet up, charm, neg, charm, neg (push-pull), escalate, swat away LMR (the final shit-test), close the deal.

Gone are the days where feminine women and masculine men engaged in the seductive mating dances of yesteryear. Playful flirting, laughing together, asking each other honest questions and being genuinely interested in the answer, and the gentle, coquettish game of tug of war, used to be the order of the day. With lively, innocent dancing and maybe an adult beverage or two to mildly lubricate the interaction, courting used to be a ritual immensely enjoyed by both men and women alike. The thrill of the chase was rich and palpable and it never got old.

This brand of courtship is long gone

Today, things could not be more different. First dates for men are something akin to job interviews, and the only flirting involved is when she gives him slut face, grabs his package, or asks him what he does for a living to gauge his potential to fund her useless life. This is followed by him telling her that her ass looks huge in those jeans or that she would make a great candidate for his harem which gets her all hot and bothered.

The dancing involved is simulated clothed sex and with the hard liquor flowing like a river, this alcohol fueled, pseudo-pornographic scene gets more lewd by the second…and that's if we're lucky. Much of the time it doesn't even get this far because his fear of women and her bratty behavior stops the party before it begins.

Learning to thrive in today's sexual landscape as a man is a process and once he can achieve success (sex) on a regular basis his morale improves—especially if he previously failed with women. But after a few years, putting on a clown suit to appease the increasing attention deficit disorder of today's woman gets old. Eventually the monotony and predictability of game all but kills the thrill of the chase.

Remedies

There's no question that it's a real bummer when your parents express their disappointment and wonder aloud "where they went wrong" with you when you tell them you have no interest in having children or starting a family. I'm also not going to sit here and pretend that I don't miss some of the my old crew either.

It's equally crappy when you finally accept that girls aren't the shiny objects you thought they were. The worst, of course, is when the adrenaline rush that comes with approaching girls diminishes until it's almost non-existent.

Fortunately the red pill offers natural remedies to these side effects. Friends and family that shun you for not going with the feminist flow will matter less as you continue in your development. A true alpha doesn't need acceptance or validation from anyone but himself.

As far as women go, the more you learn about them the more you realize how unnecessary they are to your overall happiness aside from the few minutes of sex you're able to game out of them. By the time you master the Venusian Arts here in the states, your boredom will let you know that you're ready to take the party abroad and sample higher quality fare. The new challenge of becoming an international playboy will rejuvenate your fervor to pursue the girls of a different breed.

[image]
Still bored?

These side effects may not sound like much, but if you don't know how to side step them or make them an advantage they could blindside you and potentially derail your development. Take heed of these speed bumps and take the time to fortify your mindset and lifestyle accordingly.

Read Next: Does Clubbing Suck? A Young Canadian's First Glance

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Australian Newscaster Links Male Tennis Racquet Smashing With Domestic Violence

February 3, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

According to documents leaked in 2013, Australian ABC News 24 presenter Virginia Trioli received an annual salary of $235,664. When she provides "gems" like this, where Trioli glibly links professional male tennis players smashing racquets with the onset of serious domestic violence, you have to wonder if half her remuneration goes towards obtaining (but clearly not using) anti-psychotic drugs.

By treating racquet smashing as a prelude to male-on-female domestic violence, and juxtaposing it with the horrendous decision to name Rosie Batty 2015 Australian of the Year, Trioli is showing her true, radically misandrist colors. Under Triolian logic, any male who stubs their toe and then curses profusely (or kicks the air) is some sort of ticking time bomb about to catastrophically abuse his girlfriend or wife. But the female who does the same thing, just like a tennis temper tantrum female, is unworthy of any "danger rating" mention. Feminist logic at its most cogent.

Serious journalist and news presenter.

Trioli gleefully ignores the truth that females throw some form of tennis tantrum, including engaging in racquet smashing, all the time, just like their male counterparts. Coco Vandeweghe, Serena Williams, Victoria Azarenka and Maria Sharapova are just some of the menagerie of women stars known for their on-court antics, tirades and verbal abuse towards officials. Footage also exists of Williams and Azarenka smashing racquets, and Ana Ivanovic admits to smashing three racquets at the US Open after losing a match point opportunity. Vandeweghe once smashed her racquet into the net simply because she did not get her own way. If you and I had all day, we could discuss dozens of other examples of WTA player aggression, the likes of which would give every Yonex, Wilson or Head racquet (or your average umpire) eternal nightmares.

Reality check

The irony of the farce on display Monday morning Australian time is that it took Trioli's male colleague, sports presenter Paul Kennedy, to establish reality for her. Kennedy explained that female players (yes, those impeccable female players) are apt to racquet smash and generally misbehave as well. In the meantime, co-host Michael Rowland was left to suppress his own chuckles and all-round merriment. With no comeback in sight, Trioli pressed on with other stories, never attempting to correct her ridiculous statement.

I cannot decide which is worse: obviously agenda-driven Trioli being a news show presenter in the first place, or being a news show presenter buttressed entirely by the Australian taxpayer. Despite (read: because of) the Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC)'s leftist appeal, viewers routinely abandon it. The public instead flocks to the three major commercial networks and their digital offshoots, or satellite television. When the Abbott government announced systemic cuts to the resources-wasting ABC in the latter half of 2014, the pro-public broadcaster do-gooders did not bother to mention the ABC's poor ratings in their criticisms. And the ABC doesn't even steal 20% of viewers' time with commercials!

In many ways, however, we should be grateful for Trioli and those of her ilk. Anti-male hysteria is often wrapped in inconvenient euphemisms that the average person finds difficult to unpack and then process. With such an overt brain explosion, our logically- and contextually-challenged friend Trioli has highlighted and embodied this hysteria explicitly.

Your ABC: where news (and unwanted, irrelevant opinions) come courtesy of you, the taxpayer.

The war against men

Men nowadays, especially grandfathers, and even fathers, cannot come within two yards of a children's playground. Physical affection towards a child or grandchild raises the risk of being perceived as a sexual predator. Society's fetish for unfettered pedophile suspicions (and accusations) means that these men, or the near-extinct male elementary school teacher, are simply unwelcome additions to a child's public or educational experience. Trioli's domestic violence diatribe adds to this multi-faceted lens of all men not only being potentially abusive but likely to be abusive. Only the most minimal and innocuous criteria need to be met, namely having a penis.

Another quaint aspect is Trioli's insistence that Rosie Batty would herself link smashing tennis racquets with domestic violence. Speaking for females is a social crime when men do it, but Trioli believes she can extend Batty's already problematic seizure of the domestic violence debate to whatever tenuous and tendentious conclusion desirable.

At its heart, Trioli's argument seeks to demonize men expressing normal emotions, negative or otherwise. By failing to mention female anger, even though it manifests itself every day, she is justifying it, while condemning men for the exact same thing. Denial is an additional, intrinsic part of Trioli's mindset. When a Twitter respondent took her to task for her opportunism, she "countered":

> @electravision What on earth are you talking about? Your interpretation is absolute nonsense and I reject it.
>
> — Virginia Trioli (@LaTrioli) January 26, 2015

Keep the wheels spinning, Ms. Trioli, even if it's backwards.

Read More: The Major Flaw In Today's Perception Of Domestic Violence

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why Men Who Travel For Sex Are Not Evil

February 3, 2015 | by Sebastian Harris | Link | Original Link

Are men who travel for sex evil? Let's rephrase this question in a way that makes it sound more polite: is traveling to another country in order to have a sexual adventure unethical?

Well, opinions differ on this topic. I guess you already know what answer I would give you if you would ever ask me this question. I am convinced that travelling to another country in search of sexual adventures is anything but unethical. The experiences you gain from those adventures are worth more than every amount of money in the world, and I think there is no better feeling for a man than to wake up next to an exotic beauty in a small beach bungalow.

However, if you would ask a hardcore feminist who studied gender equality and who has shorter hair than 90% of all soldiers, you would probably get a different answer. She would say that I am a bastard and that I should burn in hell for exploiting poor and innocent girls from developing countries. I love to seduce women all over the world and they have reciprocated the enjoyment, so how can I possibly think that this is something unethical?

Why Traveling For Sex Could Be Seen As Unethical

I don’t know if it is plain ignorance or frustration that leads to anger against everything, but whenever I tell people that I have a website that focuses on seduction in an international context, I always get the same stupid questions.

“You encourage men to exploit women?”

“No, I encourage men to have sexual relationships that are based on mutual attraction and affection!”

“You encourage men to pay poor girls for sex?”

“No, I never pay for sex and I don’t encourage men to pay for sex!”

“Are you a sex tourist?”

“No, I am a seducer!”

I have the feeling that some people just ask me those questions because they hope that I fulfill the cliché they have in mind. All they want is to label me as something they heard of in the media in order to put me in a box, without having the courage to admit that a lifestyle that includes sex with amazing women from all over the world doesn’t sound that bad.

At least it sounds better than waking up next to a fat and grumpy woman every morning and jerking off to internet porn every night, which seems to be the life of many young men today. One reason is that a lot of people consider prostitution as unethical. I personally don’t consider it as unethical but I am also not the biggest fan of it. If somebody wants to have sex with prostitutes he can do it, but I am not interested in having this experience.

Nobody has ever said that traveling to another country to improve your love life necessarily includes paying prostitutes for sexual favors. I had sex with a lot of women who had more money than me and I never paid for sex during my travels. Whenever I tell this people who criticized me, they suddenly become speechless because I don’t fulfill the stereotype they had in mind.

Why Traveling For Sex Isn’t Unethical

Even though sex is still a taboo topic for some people, it is the most natural thing on earth. Sex is universal. It is the one thing that provides human beings with the most intense feeling of pleasure that we can experience. In my opinion sex is the main driver for most achievements in our society. For us men, the prospect of having countless beautiful women in our life who want to suck our dicks is a huge motivator.

If sex is nothing bad then please give me any logical reason why sex with women from other countries and cultural backgrounds is suddenly bad and unethical. It makes absolutely no sense. In case you are American and you have sex with an American girl nobody has something against it, but as soon as you have sex with a Colombian girl, some people immediately think you are an evil bastard.

Don’t these people realize that the Colombian girl enjoys your penis inside her in the same way as the American girl? Don’t these people realize that both American and Colombian women love sex? Sex is good and traveling for sex is even better. Traveling for sexual experiences combines the pure enjoyment of sexual pleasure with an epic chance to grow as a person and as a man.

The moment you decide to travel for sex you also decide to embark on a journey of personal development. In order to travel the world in search of the most delicious vaginas that this world has to offer, you have to overcome your fear of judgment, your fear of women and your approach anxiety. You have to embark on a path of personal development in order to crush your fears and to approach, date and seduce the women you truly want. During your journey you will learn a lot about international dating customs, cultural behavior and you might even learn a new language.

How the hell can this be unethical? It isn’t and it never was. The only reason why so many people are convinced is because the leaders of our society want you to believe that you are a bad person if you live out your sexual fantasies. Welcome to the matrix…

Why They Want You to Believe It Is Unethical

Do you know that the western hemisphere will be faced with a lot of problems in the future? In case the current development doesn't stop, which it probably won't, our society may go the way of the dodo bird.

Nobody wants to get married anymore because the divorce rate doesn't stop rising. When young men are asked if they can imagine to get married and to start a family, the majority of them say that they never want to have a family in their life. What do the women say to this?

They are too busy focusing on their career until they realize at 40 that they won't find a man anymore and that they are too old to have children. Welcome to a world of embittered single women beyond the child-bearing age who believed in the Sex and the City myth for too long.

What do the men do? If you're smart, you will realize that there is a world of women who are more than happy to start a family with you before they turn 30. You might start to travel for sex because you want to have a good time with gorgeous feminine women, and eventually you will fall in love with one of those girls, start a family and be happy in a relationship in which you can be a man.

Now, why do they, and with "they" I mean the leaders of the western countries want you to believe that what you are doing is wrong? The reason is simple.

More men who travel for sex leads to fewer relationships in their home country. This leads to lower birthrates and eventually to the extinction of the society. This extinction leads to countless things that the leaders of our countries don't want. Fewer men who are stupid enough to pay for mortgages, less marriage expenses, less divorce expenses, less educational expenses, and less consumption in nearly every other area are only a few examples.

The more men realize that it can be beneficial to live in a country where you pay less for an apartment with pool and gym than for a doghouse (If you ever lived in London you know what I mean), the less money a government will make off those men.

Stop listening to the opinion of other people who are nothing but manipulated drones and start to ask yourself what you really want out of life. It is your choice if you want to enjoy your life with amazing women or if you want to end up living the same miserable life as the majority of men nowadays.

Read More: Why Western Men Travel To Asia For More Than Just Sex

Sebastian Harris
is a young guy whose mission is to help and inspire men to seduce women all over the globe and to live the life of their dreams. You can visit his blog Follow him on Twitter Like him on Facebook

Feminism Comes Full Circle Into Embracing Aristotle's "Natural Slavery"

February 3, 2015 | by Woh Kavi | Link | Original Link

> "The woman follows the man. In her youth she follows her father and elder brother; when married, she follows her husband; when her husband is dead, she follows her son." – Confucius

Aristotle made a cruel observation regarding human nature in his treatise on politics that continues to offend sensibilities to this day. He argued that some people were slaves by nature, and the proper course for such individuals was to subject themselves to the rule of their superiors. Aristotle argued that "natural slaves" lacked the reason to think properly and thus slavery was as beneficial to them as captivity was to cattle (to protect them from wild predators).

He believed that slavery was a perfectly natural condition since too many managers and too few workers would halt productivity, to invoke a modern metaphor. Who are natural slaves? We see them all around us every day. They are accountants, doctors, engineers, construction workers, and all those who possess enough reason to excel at their work without questioning the status quo. They are individuals who want a cushy job while surrendering difficult decisions to the nanny state.

Aristotle understood the limitations of his theory, as some that possessed the souls of free men became enslaved while those that were slaves by nature became free. It is my belief, however, that those that are slaves by nature will choose slavery if given free choice and those that are masters will rise given the same environment of freedom.

A couple of years ago I asked a middle aged female co-worker what she would do if she had a million dollars. She informed me that she would spend the money on repairs and renovation of her house in addition to paying off her mortgage. She had spent the money in a matter of seconds and informed me that a million dollars wasn't enough to gain financial independence. She concluded the conversation by stating that she would be back at her desk even if she won a million dollars at the casino. This individual is a natural slave. But what does all of this have to do with feminism? We shall examine the connection below.

The first feminist

Mary Wollstonecraft has the dubious honor of being recognized as the first liberal feminist in History. Her major endeavor was “vindication for the rights of women.” One of the central arguments that the work advocates is that society should respect the rational autonomy of women. She formulated this argument in the broader context of women’s education, which was a widely debated topic during her lifetime.

Wollstonecraft believed that women had the same capacity to grow as men did and that a well rounded education could aid women in becoming contributing members of society. Her arguments seem tinged with Kantian ethics, which were quite the rage during the enlightenment. Contemporary feminists are still divided on whether Wollstonecraft should be considered a true feminist or not given that she did not challenge the primacy of gender roles.

Wollstonecraft’s works provided a tremendous ideological thrust for the suffragists, but this nascent feminist movement still lacked a central ideology until the rise of gender feminism in the 60s. Much of the Marxist rot that saturates society today has its origins in the gender feminist movement of the 60s. The suffragists still saw themselves as members of a particular ethnic group and preoccupied themselves with the interests of those groups.

For example, an Irish suffragist was still proud to be Irish just as a German suffragist was proud to be German. Gender feminists would eventually tell women that nationalism was “masculinized history” and that women mustn’t take pride in their ethnicity and culture, but rather from their Marxist class identity: “women.” Unsurprisingly, the average North American feminist is concerned more with the education opportunities of Afghan women than she is with the plight of the homeless man down the street.

The path continues

Betty Friedan — three guesses why she became a feminist

Betty Friedan famously argued that a woman had no identity outside of a few roles that society had forcefully assigned her, such as wife and mother. To Friedan, these roles were wrongly at the core of a woman’s identity instead of her inner characteristics (such as her intellect) and achievements. So far both Friedan and Wollstonecraft seem to agree that women need to develop their characters and inner faculties independently of the limited roles that society has accorded them.

Where they seem to differ lies in their attitudes toward culture and society. Wollstonecraft never attacked gender roles and saw the education of women as a means to an end: producing a better society. Friedan and later feminists weren't concerned with the well-being of society so much as they were with re-constructing culture on their own terms. For the sake of brevity let us just say that Wollstonecraft and the suffragists had a holistic objective in mind (the interests of society as a whole), whereas second wave feminists had a solipsistic objective in mind: the interests of women (as a Marxist class) at the expense of society.

The third wave

Third wave Feminism saw the loosening of social expectations aimed at policing women's behavior. Expectations pertaining to responsible alcohol consumption, sexual behavior, and even appearance were all summarily carpet bombed by feminists under the banner of "choice." The case of Hamilton and Hylton is worth mentioning, as it sends out a clear signal that women are simply not accountable for their actions.

Put another way, women are treated like children and feminists actually prefer it that way. The modern feminist mantra "Don't teach me to do x, teach men not to do y" reeks of narcissistic entitlement. Fat acceptance feminist Lindy West illustrates this childish mindset perfectly. To West, it is more logical for society to alter its aesthetic taste than for obese women to go on a diet.

The sentiment "Why should I change? Everybody else should change to accommodate me!" is the thinking of one whose mental faculties have not reached maturity. This is sort of immature mindset that Schopenhauer prophetically criticized as thus:

> "Women are suited to being the nurses and teachers of our earliest childhood precisely because they themselves are childish, silly and short-sighted, in a word big children, their whole lives long…"

Third wave feminism has vindicated Aristotle's views on human nature. That when given unfettered freedom, women choose to yield to their inner nature and become big children. Children, as we all know, need a guardian and that role is fulfilled by the nanny state. It is worthwhile to note that old fashioned liberals like John Locke (Life, Liberty, Property) argued in favour of individual freedom by limiting the powers of government. Contrast classical liberalism with female infested modern liberalism where "oppressed groups" tilt the resources of the majority toward themselves using a bloated nanny state as their lever.

John Locke — perhaps more handsome than Betty Friedan

Strong willed men have historically desired small government whereas “strong and independent” women desire the very opposite. It is clear that women subscribe to a very different definition of freedom compared to men. Men desire freedom from government whereas women desire freedom from sociocultural obligations where the cost of their impropriety is borne by society and enabled by the state. Can you guess which definition of freedom would be agreeable to the overlords of the encroaching police state?

Third wave feminism brings the feminist enterprise full circle, as it liberates the very shortcomings of female nature that the earliest feminists believed were the product of patriarchal subjugation. The dementia of the feminist movement extends well beyond the vapid dogmas that comprise its ideological core. The root of its dementia lies in the movement’s belief that women can be free of their nature; that somehow feminism can undo thousands of years of female evolution.

Ironically, the case against feminism is best made by feminism itself.

Read More: Another Whiny Feminist Reveals The Hypocrisy Of Feminism And Social Justice Warriors

Woh Kavi
WK is a Canadian Paleo-Conservative that struggles against the rising tide of Cultural Marxism and Liberal insanity. He blogs at Occidentinvicta.com

New Evidence Suggests Mattress Rape Victim Emma Sulkowicz Made It Up

February 3, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

In August 2012, Emma Sulkowicz was allegedly raped by Paul Nungesser, both Columbia University students. Nungesser is a male feminist from Germany. Two other women supposedly had already brought complaints against him with the university, so several months after the alleged event, in April 2013, Sulkowicz also filed a complaint against him [It appears that this sequence of events is reversed—see below].

All complaints were dismissed for complete lack of evidence, as is the norm in American judicial theory. In December, the media began to cover the story and assumed Nungesser was guilty. In May 2014, Sulkowicz filed a police report but didn't complete it, because the police asked questions to determine the veracity of the claims.

The next semester, she began her senior thesis as an art major—carrying her mattress around campus until the school expels Nungesser. This has had the full support of the school's art department, and the student body have rallied around her in support. ROK has previously offered our coverage and commentary, but the story has recently developed. Nungesser finally is allowed to tell his side of the story, courtesy of The Daily Beast today.

Shortly after entering Columbia, the two became close friends. Occasionally this led to awkward sex, but in general they tried to keep it just friendly. Free love, right? What could go wrong? Sulkowicz claims that the sex started off consensual but that eventually Nungesser brutally assaulted and anally raped her. However, he claims that the anal intercourse was by mutual agreement, followed by other sexual activities. He left her in the morning while she was still sleeping.

> Sulkowicz has said in interviews that she was too embarrassed and ashamed to talk to anyone about the rape, let alone report it; an account of her mattress protest by New York Times art critic Roberta Smith says that she "suffered in silence" in the aftermath of the assault. Yet Nungesser says that for weeks after that night, he and Sulkowicz maintained a cordial relationship, and says she seemingly never indicated that anything was amiss.

Constant And Consistent Communication Is Key

Consent does not mean the same thing as "desire." Women innately sense this, and so many of them have no shame in rewriting the past. One wonders whether they themselves eventually believe their own twisted tale. [All emphases below are mine.]

> Nungesser provided The Daily Beast with Facebook messages with Sulkowicz from August, September, and October 2012. (In an email to The Daily Beast, Sulkowicz confirmed that these records were authentic and not redacted in any way; while she initially offered to provide "annotations" explaining the context on the messages, she then emailed again to say that she would not be sending them.) On Aug. 29, two days after the alleged rape, Nungesser messaged Sulkowicz on Facebook to say, "Small shindig in our room tonight—bring cool freshmen." Her response:
>
> lol yusss
>
> Also I feel like we need to have some real time where we can talk about life and thingz
>
> because we still haven't really had a paul-emma chill sesh since summmmerrrr

So college has apparently failed to teach her grammar and articulation as much as it failed to teach her art.

The article from The Daily Beast has a three-page interactive document file showing the full conversation. However, they've pulled out the highlights.

> On Oct. 3, Sulkowicz's birthday, Nungesser sent her an effusive greeting; she responded the next morning with, "I love you Paul. Where are you?!?!?!?!"

Women love jerks, I suppose. Is Nungesser the Comedian to her Sally Jupiter?

But what was she wearing? (And they said rape was never funny…)

It's worth noting that Return Of Kings appears to have been completely correct in its initial assessment of the situation. Roosh wrote:

> The story of her rape sounds extremely suspicious, and by extremely suspicious, I mean complete bullshit. The fact that she had to convince herself that she was raped several months after the fact and was hesitant to provide details to police should convince even a male feminist that her story is twisted.
>
> …
>
> Neither campus authorities nor police believed her. Combined with the fact that she is broadcasting her "rape" to the media, granting interviews to anyone who will ask (here's a video interview with Time), and using it to get an easy A grade on her thesis, it's safe to conclude that we are looking at a false rape accusation by a mentally unstable woman. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that this girl was not truly raped, and instead was sour about being pumped and dumped after giving up her anus to a guy she had the tingles for.

Processes, Due Or Otherwise

Sulkowicz claims the Office of Gender-Based Misconduct in 2013 told her to try to talking with Nungesser on her own to resolve it, which is laughably false. There is no way a university would resolve a rape complaint by asking the alleged victim to have coffee with the perpetrator. Okay, maybe in some backwater religious cult, but not at a major left-wing university like Columbia. Maybe when Sulkowicz's talentless art career fails, she can work as a stand-up comedian.

Sulkowicz would have you think that the university completely dismissed her complaint because of the patriarchy boogeyman. The actual events appear otherwise,

> Even before the investigation began, the charge had immediate consequences. Nungesser was placed on restricted access to university buildings other than his own dorm; these "interim measures" made it extremely difficult to continue in his campus job as an audiovisual technician (especially since he was not allowed to explain why he was under these restrictions) and to attend the counseling sessions he had started. Meanwhile, it became obvious that despite confidentiality rules, news of the accusation was spreading: Within a few days, Nungesser says he was being conspicuously shunned by many fellow students.

Shortly afterwards, there were two more sexual assault complaints brought against him by women on the campus, although neither of those were for rape. It appears that Sulkowicz was friends with the two other accusers. One of the accusers later withdrew her complaint. These claims also have email and Facebook evidence against them.

The Aftermath

At the end of 2013, the university cleared Nungesser of all charges, which was in part because Nungesser hired a criminal attorney (for a mere university court, not a judicial court) and partly because the whole case was based on hearsay.

Sulkowicz also complains that the university court asked personal and graphic questions about the event, which frankly would be reasonable. You can't have a rape trial without talking about the rape. But a student who attended the hearing, pseudonymously known as Michael Roberson, disagrees with this account, claiming that the questions were much more discreet.

Nungesser is also upset about the hearing. Nungesser claims he was never allowed to present his Facebook messages and that there was a very low requirement of evidential weight, skewing the whole thing in favor of the accusers. I suppose the patriarchy boogeyman even stabs its own in the back. Who is the patriarchy giving power to again?

Nevertheless, Nungesser was cleared of the charges by the school. With no charges from the actual police or government, it appeared that he could continue with his life. But instead, the media was about to have a public hanging, smearing his name forever.

An American Lynching

Until very recently, the mainstream media's pet activist cause was college rape. However, they've had a lot of trouble finding a real rape case with all the normal veracity given to any other topic. So instead they take accusations, tell a few lies about them, skip some fact-checking, and then publish it for all the world to buy their papers.

The New York Post emailed him only a few hours before they published their story, and The New York Times did not contact him at all. Nungesser has been all but shunned by the media (although in fairness, The New York Times gave him a platform in December, supposedly because it would help their declining sales).

> Nungesser's anonymity was increasingly precarious: In early May, lists of campus "rapists" and "sexual-assault violators" began to show up in bathrooms in several Columbia dorms, with his name topping the list as a "serial rapist." Then, on May 14, Sulkowicz filed a police report. In her comments to The Columbia Spectator, she said: "Maybe his name should be in the public record." And indeed, The Columbia Spectator story included Nungesser's name.

But Sulkowicz dropped the criminal charges, claiming it would be "too draining" to bring a serial rapist to justice and prevent him from destroying the lives of other women.

And Then There's The Mattress

And then there's the performance "art" mattress protest, in which Sulkowicz carries the mattress everywhere she goes on campus for university credit. For some reason, this doesn't cause America to lose all faith in the college credential system. This protest will continue until he either leaves Columbia or until they both graduate.

The art thesis project looks a lot more like harassment and coercion than it does like aesthetic creation. All of this has been sanctioned by the school, despite its dismissal of the complaint. Nor has the university defended Nungesser to the media. The student body has rallied around her, since it's more invigorating than studying.

Future Leaders Of America.

For the record, things like this—and not the phantom social conditioning—are what cause men and even women to become misogynist.

Tumblr users naturally have jumped on the stupid bus, trying to make Nungesser's name known across the globe. One white knight wrote on Facebook, "I'm only pissed that I'm not in NY to CUT HIS THROAT MYSELF!", because apparently first-degree murder is a less serious crime than rape.

But as these petty internet crusades go, nobody remembers their rage as soon as they log off.

> Nonetheless, Nungesser still has a measure of anonymity at school. A few people have snapped photos of him and posted them online; however, he is not instantly recognizable and attracts no stares as he walks through the campus. Most classmates, he says, do not realize who he is, and even professors who recognize his name on the roster do not seem to match his face to his name.

I've got a hunch that if Roosh or Forney were to quit writing and seek normal employment, they wouldn't have much trouble.

Conclusion

I suppose it's not implausible that he actually did brutally rape Sulkowicz and that she was eager to continue the friendship afterwards. But conventional American legal theory does not hold assumptions based on mere plausibility. There is absolutely no evidence against Nungesser, while much evidence is in favor of him. Therefore, the most logical conclusion is that Nungesser almost certainly did not commit the crime.

Due process is the most foundational principle of this country, but we've swept that away in favor of superficial moralism. As long as I feel like a good person for blindly defending a woman from the patriarchy boogeyman, then it doesn't matter whose life gets destroyed in the process.

The thing about rape accusations is that they never go away. Even if it were proven with all epistemological certitude that Nungesser is innocent, his name will always have a black mark. There will always be people who think he might have done it. His name will be in Google searches, and future employers will know about this. Given how many articles have been published unilaterally declaring him guilty, he will never escape the reputation as a serial rapist. A rape accusation is the scarlet A of the modern world.

Stories like this deter men from going to college, since they see just how hostile the environment can become. Even a girl as initially enthusiastic as Sulkowicz has the power to destroy your life on a whim, even when there is a deluge of evidence (both hard and circumstantial) that no crime occurred. We can only hope that, due to this evidence, more men will become aware of this insidious trend.

Read More: Why Men Should Not Go To College

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Top 5 ROK Posts From January 2015

February 3, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We publish so many articles at ROK that I fear some gems get buried in the pile, so I wanted to start a monthly feature which highlights important articles that should not be missed. Here are the top 5 from January:

1. 35 Things Wrong With America

> Pervasive politically correct environment where dissenting thought is labeled sexist, racist, or homophobic. This is usually immediately followed by a witch hunt to end the person's employment.

2. Anything Women Can Do, Men Can Do Better

> I challenge you to name a female scientist besides Rosalind Franklin, Grace Hopper, Jane Goodall, or Marie Curie. Could the other women, living or dead, who made any major invention or scientific discovery in the history of mankind please let themselves be known?

3. Carl Jung Predicted The Catastrophe Of Modern Gender Relations

> We talk about how desperate we are for feminine women; Carl Jung wisely notes that American women are just as desperate for masculine men. It is not enough to conquer your male rivals—you must conquer your woman if you want a good relationship. Take it from the founder of depth-psychology: women enjoy being possessed.

4. Analyzing The 5 Main Alpha Archetypes

> One word describes the Conqueror's purpose in life: victory. This alpha loves the thrill of overcoming challenges no matter what they are. Whether it's hiking the Appalachian Trail, acquiring a shit business and transforming it into a cash cow, or training a Level 3 Schutzhund German Shepherd, if it's a mountain he has to climb it.

5. "Manspreading" Shows The Social Retardation Of Young Women

> Virtually every interaction you will have with a millennial girl will be defined by her fear of your masculinity. "Rape culture," for example, is one of the most destructive effects of millennial social retardation. Because young women are not properly socialized on how to deal with men, they have no idea how to navigate sexual encounters beyond their animal urges.

You can review all articles we published last month on our archives page.

Don't Miss: Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Inner Game or Outer Game – Which Should You Work On First?

February 4, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Back when I became interested in “game” as a discipline distinct from simply going out and hitting on women, something called “routines’ were very much in vogue. Popularized by Neil Strauss’s The Game, routines were the gambits men would use to initiate and advance conversations with women in the hope of attracting them. They included jokes, stories, psychological tests, and even magic tricks. Guys would log into internet forums keen to learn and share the latest tips.

Having tight game back then really amounted to being able to “stack routines” – that is, to structure a set, building set-piece upon set-piece, until hopefully the girl was interested enough to allow you to escalate further.

But discussion on men’s forums began to concentrate more on self-improvement as people came to realize that no matter how slick their lines, if they didn’t have some tangible value to back them up, they would soon be stymied. This interest in personal development was a precursor to the manosphere as we know it today, with guys learning from each other on topics as diverse as finance, weight training, nutrition, fashion and lifestyle design.

You would imagine that these information streams in tandem – i.e. pick-up and self-improvement – would provide a very useful resource and you’d be right. But a problem arises when guys privilege one over the other, either spending their whole time learning pick-up to the detriment of their wider life, or the opposite.

One of the most common things you will hear newbies or those who have not had a great deal of success with women yet say is “I’m not really going out at the moment – I’m working on my inner game." So persistent is this excuse that it has become something of a cliché.

Decision Time

So what is best – to work on your inner game or your seduction skills? One will make you a more rounded, successful individual. The other, if mastered, could score you a lot of pussy.

It depends exactly what your ambitions are. You must be honest with yourself. If you are not particularly bothered about women, or are happy to forgo the pleasures they bring until you are established as a man, then by all means concentrate all of your energies on your inner game. Many at ROK would argue that this is the best course of action anyway.

Be careful of your motives, though. If your actual but concealed hope is that you will attract women simply by becoming a better man through self-improvement, then I'm afraid there are no shortcuts. You need to learn game. Concentrate on the externals – at least for a while. The reason for this is simple – unless you become famous, no matter how much you build up your self-esteem, business, or even your body you will still need to learn how to approach and interact with girls.

The sad truth is that in the cruel world of the sexual marketplace it is the externals – your behavior, the way you carry yourself, and yes, the way you look – that counts. I have friends who are very wealthy who go to clubs and leave alone because they have no game. I have friends who are exceptionally good looking. For them meeting women is slightly easier – they get more of a pass for error – but they still rarely get approached and when they do they must know how to keep the conversation going and escalate in order to get consistent results.

Of course, the ideal scenario is that you work on your inner and outer game simultaneously. But if you are new and looking to get good with women, then I would advise that you put the latter first, for a while at least. It will strengthen your skillset, and you will find that you are naturally more inclined to improve other aspects of yourself as you grow.

Of course, this doesn't mean that you should learn outdated, silly routines. What it does mean is that you should start going out consistently (either day or night, or both) and get used to having conversations with women where you are pushing for tangible outcomes – a phone number, a kiss, or more. This must be done hundreds of times before proficiency is acquired. Note that this is not about ‘pedestalising pussy – it’s about becoming a man empowered with choice in his sex life.

Only when you are comfortable in this particular area of your life should you pull back, reassess and turn the focus of your attention to other things.

Read More: Sorry, But Attraction Alone is Not Enough

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

5 Reasons Why Every Man Should Go Hunting Once In Their Lifetime

February 4, 2015 | by Carolus Linnaeus | Link | Original Link

I have been hunting since my early teens and have been lucky enough to have great mentors along in the process. I have learned quite a few things about the skills involved, but what has taught me even more about myself and the human species is the philosophy behind hunting.

This article is not advocating buying a rifle and going to shoot the first brown furry animal you see, but rather to give perspective into an activity that has defined masculinity for the first two million years of the Homo genus, up until the agricultural revolution. The name of the game was kill the beast and eat, or fail and go hungry. This is why for most of human evolution, masculinity was defined by the ability to hunt.

History of our species

This is how masculinity was defined for most of our evolution. Take down the beast or starve.

The Homo genus began to greatly diverge from the rest of the primates roughly 2 million years ago. It did so because our ancestors had access to high quality food (calorie dense) such as animal meat, which contained loads of protein and most importantly, fat.

Research has shown that primates follow a certain trend when it comes to body weight and diet. The smaller primates, such as pigmy monkeys, have a high quality diet that is dense in calories, mainly consisting of insects, seeds, and fruit. The larger primates, like the gorilla (the largest of all primates), have a low diet quality and are mainly volume feeders of green leafy plants.

Humans (I am referring to Paleolithic humans) are an outlier in this trend; we are relatively large primates but have a very high diet quality consisting of animal meat, fruits, seeds, and vegetables. This is why we evolved the brain that we did, because we had the bodily surface area to support a large brain as well as the calories from large animals to supplement it.

So what do you take from this? Hunting is in every man's DNA. While the methods of modern hunting are much different and less strenuous than prehistoric hunting, (for roughly 1.5 million years humans practiced persistence hunting, meaning they literally ran an animal down over a span of 30-50 miles. Read the book Born to Run) it still provides modern men with an outlet to tap into their primal selves and release some of the inner beast that has been suppressed by modern society. Here are my five reasons why you should go hunting at least once in your lifetime:

1. Reconnect with your food

Ask any fifth grader in the United States right now where their meat comes from and I would be willing to bet $100 that the majority of them would say the grocery store. As Americans, we have a deep disconnect with our food. We don't understand that the pork chop on our dinner plate once was a living, breathing creature that someone had to kill, gut, and process.

Little Tommy thinks food comes from McDonald's or the grocery store.

When you hunt and kill an animal you experience every part of how food gets from point A to point B. You must kill it, carry its body to clean it (if you can't deadlift over 250 pounds, good luck), skin and gut it, and then process the carcass before you eat it.

While the thought of that image might turn some people off and some would definitely consider it cruel and unusual, they wouldn't think twice about the hypocrisy of their thought process while biting into their organic, free-range chicken breast they bought from whole foods. I am a firm believer that if one wants to eat meat, they should have the experience, at least once, of killing that animal for themselves and making all the necessary preparations to put that animal on the dinner table.

2. Develop knowledge and skills

When one thinks of the skills involved in hunting, the first thing that comes to mind is the ability to shoot a high-powered rifle from 40 yards away and kill an animal. This could not be further from the truth. While being able to shoot accurately is an important aspect of hunting (many including myself prefer to bow hunt instead of rifle hunt), other more important skills are needed to be a successful hunter.

Understanding your prey is the most vital part of the hunt. How do they use their senses to interact with their environment? For example, deer can smell and hear extremely well, but their vision is limited. Turkey could pick a needle out of a haystack from 50 yards away but their smell and sight aren't too great. Knowing these things about your prey causes you move and interact with your surroundings differently based on what you are after. You also get to know the animal you are hunting in an intimate way.

Aside from gaining knowledge about your prey and its environment, you have to be able to move through the woods silently (I promise, it is a lot harder than it sounds). You have to learn how to maintain all of your equipment. This includes taking apart and cleaning a gun, properly sharpening a knife, learning how to set up hunting stands.

You also must learn to process a kill, which experienced hunters will tell you is an art form. All of these are practical skills that most men have no knowledge of because activities such as hunting are now considered unnecessary and barbaric.

3. You can get away from everything

Spend some time away from everything electronic.

One of my favorite things about going hunting is leaving my iPhone in my car, walking into the woods, and getting away from normal life for a day. Most people in today's world can't remember the last time they went without their phone, computer, or TV for more than a couple of their waking hours.

When you don't have an electronic device to constantly stimulate your mind, you will notice that you do a lot of thinking and self-reflection. When I am out in the woods, I usually give myself one self-analysis about what I want out of life, what my goals are, and how I will reach them. You don't need to go hunting or be deep in the woods to do this, but for me, hunting is an outlet where I can let the modern world go on without me for a day.

4. You work on your patience

Hunting is a waiting game. 99.7% of the time you are sitting in a tree stand, perched up against the base of a tree, or walking slowly and quietly through the woods. But for all that time spent waiting; the rush of encountering your prey is all worth it.

Hunting teaches you to constantly be aware of your surroundings. If you become impatient and decide to move around or fidget with twigs, you might have just alerted an animal to your presence (I learned this the hard way when I was younger). You have to be mentally strong enough to be still and quite for hours at a time. For this reason, hunting also provides a great outlet to meditate and worry about nothing but the woods around you.

5. You learn more about yourself

When you take any living creature's life, you learn more about yourself. When I killed my first deer I was excited, but when I saw the carcass the realization hit me that five minutes before, it was a living creature and now it is dead because of me. For this reason, I am a firm believer in not letting anything you hunt go to waste. If you don't eat your kill, give it to hunters for the hungry or give to someone who will eat it.

People who kill animal just for the sake of killing them have no business calling themselves hunters. If our hunter-gather ancestors saw someone kill an animal, take a picture with it while high fiving their friends, and then leave it to rot they would think we are crazy. Because of hunting, I developed a strong conviction of not letting anything go to waste.

Conclusion

Even if you are 30 years old and have never hunted a day in your life, it is not too late to give it a try. It is so engrained in a man’s DNA that not trying it would almost be to ignore one’s true nature. Hunters are a friendly bunch and will often be more than happy to take someone under their wing who wants to learn or just try it once.

Hunting is not for everyone, and I get that, but I guarantee you will gain a whole new respect for where your meat comes from after you have gotten your hands a little bloody. And I promise your fresh, wild game will taste a helluvah lot better than a Tyson chicken breast.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Need To Grow A Beard

Carolus Linnaeus
Carolus Linnaeus studies evolutionary biology which gives him a unique perspective into how gender roles have evolved in humans. He enjoys hunting, fishing, backpacking and anything that gives him a reprieve from modern society. Nothing angers him more than social justice warrior's attempts to ignore logic and human nature.

Dancing With The Obese In Australia

February 4, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

Australia is a wonderful country. Here we have the biggest of everything. Ayres Rock is the biggest rock. The Great Barrier Reef is the biggest reef. Our kangaroos are surely bigger than any rabbit. We must have more useless desert than any other nation too. The country was even founded as the world's largest open air jail.

Now it seems the dancers are bigger too. Sydney dance company Force Majeure has topped everything with their production of Nothing To Lose. In their own words the show aims to answer the question which was on all our minds:

> What does it mean when you put really big bodies on stage and call them professional dancers?

She seems to enjoy her work, that’s one person!
Image: Toby Burrows

The answer is there for all to see in these, tasteful promotional videos. Trigger Warning! Some camera and body movements may cause nausea in some viewers, Especially in those not already appropriately educated—or should that be “marinated in fat acceptance ideology.” Judging from the videos the work does have a certain macabre fascination about it. Like a good horror movie, it’s hard to look at but it’s hard to look away too.

The first pedestalized man ever
Image: Kate Blackmore

Australia has always been a great surfing destination. Now thrill to this display of some of our biggest waves and rippling bodies as:

> Force Majeure's artistic director, Kate Champion collaborates with artist and fat activist Kelli Jean Drinkwater to celebrate the sculptural splendor of the fat dancing body.

Bread making in one easy lesson!
Image: Toby Burrows

It's so comforting to learn that The Australia Council for the Arts and Arts New South Wales are using taxpayer funds to make this noble and worthwhile artistic endeavor possible. This raises the wider and more serious point that all over the developed world leftist movements and propaganda from fat acceptance, to homosexual activism, to socialism, to environmentalism are all heavily dependent on funds involuntarily seized from taxpayers.

Kelli Drinkwater's website is a kind of comedy festival all on its own. Kelli is apparently a model, who looms extra large in Australia. That's right, here in the lucky country even the models are gigantic. She is also a mastermind of the cinema project Aquaporko!

Ms Drinkwater invents human powered flight
Image: Toby Burrows

> Aquaporko! is the story of Melbourne's fat femme synchronized swim team sculling, egg beating and high kicking towards their first ever live performance. We follow fat activist and filmmaker Kelli Jean Drinkwater as she meets the team and uncovers a world of sisterhood, queer community and radical body politics.

Nowhere is it clearly stated, but it appears that Kelli is a homosexual with a partner who scores every bit as highly as she does in the beauty stakes. What a relief it is to learn that there won't be one of those photos somewhere of her beside some thirsty man who consented to give her some Aquaporko!

> Her work is concerned with deconstructing limited representations of bigger bodies and to encourage fat positive visibility.

With literally Nothing to Lose, Kelli may have succeeded in representing bigger bodies. The bit about encouraging positive visibility may be a fail though. She explains her inspiration:

> Exploring ways to reclaim spaces and platforms that are often prohibitive to 'othered' bodies is a huge inspiration. I also enjoy the aesthetic potential of taking up space.

Alien abduction?
Image: Toby Burrows

So hop onto your mobility scooters and head down to the Sydney Festival. Nothing To Lose is Australia's answer to the big game tours of the Serengeti National Park as some of our biggest and wildest life forms take to the stage. It promises to be a night of ponderous entertainment and an exquisitely unintentional self satire of the fat acceptance movement.

Read More: Morbidly Obese Girl Posts Picture Of Herself In Bikini

Hesse Kassel
Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

Modern Travelling Has Lost Its Original Purpose

February 4, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

The traditional aim of travelling was to completely detach oneself from ordinary life and experience it from a wholly new perspective. For example, pilgrimages took away the individual from a man's daily routine and allowed him to view things from another person's outlook.

Other trips such as mountain climbing or hiking also helped erase the distractions of everyday existence and develop the personal skills of endurance and self-reliance.

Modern travelling, however, lacks any sort of the aforementioned characteristics. Instead, it has become lazy and comfortable, without any trials or tribulations. Popular travel destinations are simply like the west with a few changes here and there. With the advent of technology, tourism, and globalization, the sense of visiting a completely different place barely exists today.

South America is filled with gringos, Asia with concrete jungles and Europe is slowly becoming a cheap American ersatz. The modern traveller no longer acquires a fresh perspective, but rather the same one in a slightly altered setting.

Travelling is best undertaken with the intention of leaving behind the banalities, clichés, and distractions of home and forming a unique and entirely new opinion of the world, perhaps even enhancing skills such as physical strength.

It therefore requires great courage: completely leaving behind a comfortable life for one of uncertainty and adventure is no easy task. The lethargic habits of the modern traveller must be forgone to achieve this.

Living In Someone Else’s Dream

One of the major contributing factors to the decay of modern travelling is mass-tourism. It is a money-churning enterprise which sucks out the authenticity of the experience by urging customers to stick to a pre-determined plan of cafés, tacky gift shops, and mundane landscapes.

It does, however, lighten the burden of responsibility from the punter and allows him to ensure that his trip is embellished with comfort, micro-managed bouts of “excitement” and the company of other eager westerners; just like home, but with different weather.

The worst aspect of tourism is its removal of the individual experience. People are encouraged to frequent certain locations through advertising and peer pressure.

It is impossible to gain a unique understanding of the world from simply taking someone else’s word for it. One is simply walking down a path that another has pre-determined and blindly following them. Modern “voyages” are just like copying what others have done thousands of times before and paying for it.

Travelling For The Wrong Reasons

Too often, travelling is undertaken for the sole purpose of approval or escape. It is simply not good enough to go abroad in order to compensate for failures at home or trying to foster some validation from peers. Foreign lands are not a crutch to support a weakened, desperate man, but a means of which man can propel himself to greater personal development.

Retreating into the comforts of nature like a hippy or bathing indolently in sunny weather simply weakens the mind after a while. Having said that, relaxing in such a way is certainly permissible after long arduous stints of work or mental stress, but it should be never considered as serious “travelling” in the traditional sense of the word. This leads us onto another wrong reason for travelling: social validation.

It is clear to see that many travel for the sole purpose of impressing their friends and getting “likes” on Facebook. These people can be easily spotted by the copious amounts of photos they take of themselves in order to show everyone else.

A truly special trip’s memories would only be shared among the closest of kin, not shamelessly shown off on social media. The validation of others is the very worst reason to travel. Never undertake a journey at another’s behest unless it is a sound, reasoned recommendation.

The Real Reason To Travel

Julius Evola believed that travelling should be undertaken with spiritual virility, instead of just seeking superficial pleasure. He believed that it was wrong to simply wander from place to place, following the dreams of others without any introspection or personal development.

He abhorred the clichéd resorts favored by the masses and instead proposed voyaging to desolate, yet ethereal and peaceful locations, such as Nordic fjords or vast steppes. He believed that profound self-mastery and insight can be achieved by long, lonely journeys across harsh yet beautiful terrains, as opposed to calmer environments frequented by the bourgeois class.

It is perhaps not necessary to dash up Everest or fare to Northern Siberia to gain knowledge of the self, but Evola's underlying point is clear. Modern travelling has lost the sense of venturing into the unknown, the mystical and the unfamiliar.

The breath-taking wonders of traditional travelling have been replaced by vulgar photo opportunities and the defiant wayfarer with the shallow selfie-taker. In fact, the modern man will go to great lengths, at great monetary cost, to avoid surprises and the mysterious whilst maintaining the luxuries of home. It is sad to see such a great pastime lose its value.

Bring Back The Original Purpose Of Travel

There have been many accounts of famous, courageous journeys by great people. Countless brave men have even danced with death in order to enhance their knowledge of the world and themselves. Modern men have a regrettable tendency to get lost in themselves, their own technological creations, romantic ruminations, and physical sensations. They neglect the vastness of the world and instead obsess over petty, little pseudo-issues and whimsical desires.

J. M. W. Turner's view of Buttermere Lake: a true view of the chaos and mysticism of beauty Travelling into the unknown requires leaving the old life behind. The world we live in goes far beyond our minute creations and man-made romantic landscapes. The true traveller voyages to this world with a blank slate, realizing that there is more to life than himself and his peers.

It is time to break out of the confines of modern tourism and rediscover a thirst for exploration which has long since faded away.

Read More: Will The Philippines Become The Next Poosy Paradise Lost?

Anton Hagen
Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

Living “In” Versus “For” The Moment

February 4, 2015 | by Tony Moze | Link | Original Link

Life can be hustle and bustle, balancing work, school, gym, volunteering, attending events, etc. A life full of planning and organizing. It may feel like there aren’t enough hours in the day to complete these tasks, so one sacrifices sleep, time, and money to have things done efficiently. Add that to maintaining friends, family, a significant other and a harem, and he can have a world full of stress.

Many are fixated on the past and future. It makes sense because what you experienced in the past made who you are today, and what you do now determines your future.

You get good grades so that you can graduate and get a good job. You study game books so you can better approach women. You eat clean and attend the gym to maintain a healthy body. You work extra hours so you could buy a nice car, clothes, and shoes, to show off to friends and female prospects. You work hard so that one day, in the future, you will be happy. You are constantly running, looking for that happiness. So you are miserable at this moment.

Eckhart Tolle and Thich Nhat Hanh spoke lengths about it. The present moment is where you are happy, content, alive and free. Being free means you are without worry, jealousy, fear, sadness or regret, symptoms that manifest from dwelling on the past or future.

You hope you get that cute chick's number to eventually bed her – so you worry. You hope that your game is tight enough to make her head over heels for you. You get a degree in liberal arts only to find you cannot find a decent job – so you regret. You had hopes that you and your little snowflake were to live happily ever after, to find out she cheated on you – so you get sad. You hope your life is not like the past, so you work on your future; you hope your life is not like the future, so you dwell on the past. All the while you are missing the present moment.

For some, the present moment seems like a hedonistic experience binging on food, liquor, drugs and sexual activity. They say, "who gives a fuck!? Just live it up!" or "You're going to die anyway, you might as well have fun!" They awake the next day in regret, being worse off the moment they did it. T he present moment is about mindfulness, which is all about doing things in a healthy yet practical way. But only now is the time you can find change. Yes, you need to budget your bills to avoid debt, or eat so you will live another day, but each of these tasks should not be a task, rather a joyous action. There is a difference, since living for the present moment versus living in the present moment are two separate thoughts.

The person who lives “for” the moment does himself a disservice. He trudges through work, school, and errands to get ready for the clubs and bars. He says to himself “finally,” when at these clubs and bars, that he can live “for” the moment. A lawyer who lives “for” the moment is unable to live presently on his time off until he is doing something that he personally enjoys doing, like reading a book, golfing, or talking about the case with colleagues. He seems to be present with the things he enjoys, but never present with everything else.

The person who lives “for” the moment orders a boat load of junk food, only to regret it later that night where he is sick with weight gain. The person who lives “for” the moment does not live fully or mindfully in the moment. He is selective with who, what, when, where and how he wants to be present. His practice is inconsistent and unhealthy.

The person who lives “in” the moment does well for himself. He is thankful for everything in the present. He may not be the wealthiest man, but he has food in his stomach, and a roof over his head. He may not have a wardrobe full of new and brand name clothing, but he does have clothes and shoes that still fit him.

When he walks in the park, he manages to take in and enjoy everything. For example, the sounds of the birds chirping, the swaying of the trees and the ripples of the lake. When he eats, he takes his time to notice everything in that moment. Living “in” the moment he uses only his senses.

The man who lives this way is the happiest, and is free from anxiety, depression, and sickness. The man who lives “in” the moment believes he is wealthy, because he notices his arms, legs, toes, fingers, eyes and ears are luxuries. This man is content, since he sees positivity and beauty in every situation he is present in. His practice is consistent and healthy.

How does this help with meeting women? A man who lives “for” the moment has less success with women than a man who lives “in” the moment. The man who lives “for” the moment’s interaction is affected by his past and present, while the man who lives “in” the moment is enjoying everything in the present, no matter if it doesn’t fulfill his intrinsic value of fun or enjoyment.

He enjoys the music, food, laughter or the woman who he’s conversing with. He is playful with this woman, and living with reckless abandon. You are most attractive “in” the moment, and more importantly, you are living the best for yourself.

Read More: How Buddhism Can Help Your Game

Tony Moze
Tony is a philanthropist and philosopher. He spends his free time reading, traveling the world, exercising and living in the moment.

How To Game Indian Girls In India

February 5, 2015 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

What do you do if you work for a multi-national and you get sent to India on a work assignment? Do you just forget about game entirely and be celibate the whole time? Or rather do you work through whatever external difficulties may exist in India?

Below I'll be sharing a few logistics and experiences of how to game Indian girls in India. But first, let me share briefly a few words about the psychological make-up of most Indian women that I have understood from direct experience so far.

Psychological Make Up And Attitude Of Average Indian Woman

All Indian girls have a massive ego and huge attitude, as Matt Forney already covered for the Americanized versions. Why is this, even though most of them are fat and ugly, you ask? Because there are 30 million more men in India than there are women. It's literally a massive fucking sausage fest. When I'm out in the nightlife districts, I generally see on average one girl walking with three to four men with her. I t's absolutely shameless how pathetic a lot of Indian men are because they've been trained from birth by their mothers to worship women and consider women as goddesses. All the feminist propaganda you hear about in India is nothing but a bunch of bullshit.

But this is where "foreigner game" can come into play. A lot of Indian women are sick of Indian men, and the fact that you are a foreigner makes you automatically exotic in their eyes, especially if you're a white foreigner from America or Europe. Remember, it's every Indian girl's dark fantasy to be sexually dominated by a white guy.

Types Of Indian Women To Approach

This part is vital. You'll only want to approach young Indian women who are dressed very fashionably, because this signals the possibility that they are "modern" and aren't stuck in an 18th century mindset. Otherwise if you approach women dressed in churidars (the colorful loose pants) or even worse, sarees, you'll be wasting your time.

A Word About Indian Men

While I've met a lot of very polite, educated, and intelligent Indian men, the fact remains is that the majority of Indian men are massive cockblocks and have a tremendous "little man syndrome" towards foreign, non-Indian men. You can never truly trust them. Therefore, forget about having an Indian wingman unless you meet one of the extremely rare Indian men who are true alphas.

Street Game

I myself was shocked and pleasantly surprised to discover that street game works in India, although only in larger cities like Mumbai or Delhi. It works best if you're a white male. Street game works best if you act like a helpless lost tourist and ask a girl for help finding the Metro station or a taxi. Then you very casually tell her "Thanks for your help, let me get your number so that if there's any problem I can call you for help" and hand her your phone with the Add Contact screen already open.

This method works generally 40 to 50 percent of the time, and depends heavily on your vibes. You have to actually act like a lost tourist because if she thinks you are approaching her with the intention of seducing her it lessens the impact.

Social Circle Game

This is probably the easiest and best method to meet upper-class Indian women. The rate of success with social circle game is far higher than street game also. India is still very much a socially stratified country and the only Indian women that will even be open to dating western men are upper class, educated, and rich. And you can generally only access those women through their social circles. Become a good social networker and learn how to build good connections and friendships with the upper class elements of Indian society.

Online Dating Sites

Using online dating sites like OKCupid and POF works wonders in India because you'll find Indian women who are generally open to the concept of dating and especially dating western men. It's hilarious to go through Tinder and just mass right swipe Indian women and see who bites.

Western Women Living or Visiting India

After dealing with a few Indian girls, you may have a newfound appreciation for western women. Yes, western women play games but they are very easy to game as compared to the psychologically complex Indian women. In places like Goa or the tourist district of large cities you'll find plenty of western women who you can meet. I personally have not chosen this option, though, because I see the conquering of Indian women as a challenge.

Pace, Speed, and Setting of Gaming Indian Women

With Indian women things move much more slowly, like everything else in India. While there are rare girls who are actually free-spirited and will have one night stands, the vast majority of Indian women are very sexually repressed. It's less about trying to seduce them and more about trying to create an intense emotional connection with them, after which you can gradually turn up the intensity

Basically it's much more psychological than physical, and while that sucks, it also presents many interesting opportunities to learn how to deal with very complex female psychological mindsets. By constantly remembering the maxim "Game is just trolling women," I'm able to tolerate this. You also can never show any kind of emotional attachment or dependence with Indian women unless you are consciously running beta-male game on them, which will be effective because she'll be able to sense your emotional detachment from her.

The trap that most Indian women will try to snare you in is to get you even slightly emotionally attached to them and believe me, Indian women are masters at this. If you can pass that shit test, then seducing her and having sex with her will be relatively easy by comparison.

I found an Indian alpha mentor, probably the only Indian male I've ever met in my life who I would describe as "alpha" and he told me "As soon as an Indian woman realizes she can't have you, she will chase after you like a crazy person." I'll try to break down an overall chronological strategy for gaming Indian women below, based on these points:

1. Get her number, and chat with her through text or WhatsApp

2. Work on building a low level intensity emotional connection during the next week

3. Ask her to meet you and then stand her up an hour before, saying something like "Work came up" or something like that. Do this at least 3 times, flaking on her.

4. Finally make a meeting with her, something very casual like walk around her college campus or some nature park, just chatting casually and building rapport

5. Now keep texting her and build a medium level intensity emotional connection, and start adding in light sexual remarks

6. Make another date with her and build up the emotional connection to a high intensity level. Unfortunately all you'll be able to do is kiss her. Lame, I know.

7. Now that she is emotionally dependent on you, you threaten to cut it off with her. At this point, if you've primed her enough, you'll be able to have sex with her (or take her virginity away). Now you've got her in your harem and if you've been using this same strategy on multiple Indian women simultaneously it won't take a lot of time to have a harem of five or more in your rotation.

Concluding Words

So why would anyone want to go to this much trouble just to have sex with Indian women? As I said before, if you're stuck in India, there's not a whole lot else you can do besides treat this as a pastime or recreational activity.

Now if you're a nice guy, you might say "Well that's cruel! Making some poor Indian girl emotionally dependent on you and then taking her virginity away." Don't be fooled, gentlemen. Indian women are not the innocent little angels they present themselves to be. I used to think white women were bad, but now I think white women are angels compared to Indian women.

Ultimately, the first rule is to never make the mistake of ending up in India. The second rule is that if you do make the mistake of ending up in India, try to remain positive and not get dragged down by the negativity of the country. And the third rule is to spend your free time gaming Indian women because it is a fun way to pass the time.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Not Date Indian Girls

John Doe

John is the creator of the famous Boycott American Women blog. Check it out here: www.BoycottBitches.com

Feminization Of Sports Inevitably Leads To A Cultural Dead End

February 5, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Do you remember playing the “floor is lava” game as a kid? It is a simple challenge with simple rules—just don’t touch the floor. It could be played anywhere indoors and merely required several pieces of furniture with comfortable gaps in between. Those with siblings probably remember playing “don’t let the balloon touch the ground”, a poor man’s version of ping pong that didn’t require paddles, table, or ball.

As kids grow up, they become more self-aware and their motivation for playing games changes. It is no longer enough to simply conquer the environment and have fun. The goal is now to compete against others and win, earning recognition and respect from peers and adults in the process. This is when games move outdoors and arguably the point at which childhood ends and adulthood begins.

I thought that White Men Can’t Jump

For young men who enter puberty and experience the surge of testosterone in their veins, it is essential that they have a publicly sanctioned way to channel their aggression in a constructive way. Besides, sports teach them the necessity of teamwork, cooperation, endurance, and the importance of self-sacrifice for the greater good. All of that and much more, without using a single word.

Ancient Greeks recognized and honored this tumultuous period in every boy’s life by founding Olympic Games, during which no wars were led and all death penalties were suspended. The Olympic Games continue to this day, but in name and form only. The substance and the entire reason for their existence has pretty much been destroyed by galloping SJW ideology which sought to include women, retarded people, trannies and other travesties at all costs. Currently, the regular Olympic Games are just an excuse for massive orgies between participants when the cameras aren’t rolling.

Frankly, who wouldn't bang a fit girl like this 24/7?

To truly realize how far the western world has sunk into degeneration, we have to take a look at the uncorrupted sports of primitive cultures. The best example is the national sport of Afghanistan – Buzkashi. In short, Buzkashi is polo played with a headless goat carcass instead of a ball. Teams of players on horseback compete in controlling the carcass and have to bring it into a designated circle to win. The rules allow kicking, whipping, punching, and whatever is necessary to obtain victory. Protective gear is allowed since Buzkashi can be quite brutal at times.

Let the games begin

Remove the horses, replace the goat with an appropriate ball and you've arrived at pretty much any modern sport. All of them are fueled by the hunter-gatherer instinct and are meant to be friendly warfare that keeps men in mental and physical shape for an actual war. In any case, if men, for whatever reason, can't play sports, they are content with watching sports being played. Even the act of observation gives them the much needed adrenaline rush and provides a great excuse to bellow and punch a wall from time to time.

Thanks to the wonders of modern technology, now it's even possible for men to watch any sports match while taking a comfortable dump in their very own bathroom. But that is nearing an end, thanks to SJWs and their tireless persecution of masculinity. Sports have become just a vehicle for propagating femnazi bullshit and the most glaring example of this is NFL during the month of October.

The very sight of her makes my dick shrivel

Let's start off by going to the NFL website's "Pink" section, where we are greeted by a certain Lisa (pictured above) holding an X-ray of her breast. We get to hear her sob story and how she was lucky to catch breast cancer or something like that. It's a touching story, worthy of a Lifetime feature film. What does it have to do with sports or football is anybody's guess. Are we supposed to believe that her life was saved because of the Crucial Catch campaign?

Crucial Catch is a NFL-endorsed campaign that runs throughout October every year and serves to raise awareness of breast cancer. Even though men can get breast cancer too, Crucial Catch focuses exclusively on women. During this campaign, all NFL players and coaches wear pink ribbons and pink-themed gear. Pink ribbons are everywhere, on and off the playing field and even the ball has one. Of course, every televised match is peppered with condescending ads about retarded men and how they should feel guilt for not contributing to the SJW causes.

That background makes my blood boil

Though the notion that Crucial Catch somehow magically saves the lives of women is truly in the realms of science fiction, there are some interesting lessons to be learned from it. Crucial Catch goes to show how clueless and suggestible women are, that the SJWs in power are well aware of this fact and are using it for their own schemes. Conversely, you should use this knowledge to your own benefit and command the women in your life how you see fit.

“Shut up and sit down”

SJWs count on common decency and the fact that the average person is highly unlikely to rebel, protest, or do anything out of the ordinary, due to the fear of ridicule. Ignoring SJWs won’t make them go away—in fact, they are expecting that men silently submit and give up. Women will naturally follow whoever is in power anyway. Meanwhile, SJWs constantly shape and reshape what “ordinary” and “common decency” mean, which is why a gay parade is now an official political requirement for all countries that wish to join the EU.

As a global society, we’re more and more connected and it’s becoming increasingly difficult to avoid the SJW zealots spewing their toxic propaganda into the minds of feeble-willed women. As individuals, we have to face tough dilemmas involving ourselves and our children.

“Why can’t I stand with both feet on any of these?”

Everything we do has a consequence and even inaction has its price. As a man, you have to take charge of your life, start defending your rights and become an example to others. The truth is, people are just waiting for someone to show them how it’s done and the global revolt against SJWs will begin. It may not start with sports, but you can count on that being one of the many battlefields.

Read More: 5 Signs A Girl Has Daddy Issues

Derek Baroni

Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

A Few Subtle Red Pill Moments From An Unlikely Source: The Beach Boys

February 5, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

The Beach Boys are one of those bands that nobody listens to even though they are idolized by every important musician or producer ever. Although they retained their popularity in Europe, Americans remember the band more for their bad radio hits than for Brian Wilson's innovations in recording, composing, and arranging. His mental illness defined their entire career, and it was both their making and their undoing.

People adore the Beatles, but they have little knowledge of the band that pushed them to that position. Just as Shakespeare was not the most popular poet when he was alive, so too will Brian Wilson be remembered as the indisputable greatest of popular music in 100 years. This year there's a biopic on him coming out called Love and Mercy that had outstanding reviews at last year's independent film festivals, so hopefully the movie will shift public opinion some.

Today the Beach Boys's saccharine radio fodder is mostly what populates their greatest hits CDs, so it's difficult to collect a sample of what a true "best of" would be. Fortunately for you, I have all the albums from their artistic height (1966-1973) plus a few more, so I've done the synthesizing for you. But first let's give a little background.

A Little History

From left: Mike Love, Brian Wilson, Carl Wilson, Dennis Wilson, and David Marks, 1962. Al Jardine had briefly quit the band, and Bruce Johnston did not join until 1965.

People remember the Beatles vs. Stones rivalry, but that was all marketing hype. The real rivalry was between the Beatles and the Beach Boys. It was a classic rock arms race between the two countries, and Brian Wilson (pictured above) was determined to prove America was the better one.

The two bands were constantly building off of the what the other did. Although the Beatles greatly admired Brian Wilson, the sentiment was not entirely mutual. His mentall illness escalated so much that he thought they had stolen his master tapes in late 1966. When he first heard "Strawberry Fields Forever" on the car radio, he told his friend, "They got there first."

The Beach Boys was the original boy band, but they soon grew tired of writing surf rock. The record label was very hesitant to let them break out of the genre because it had sold so well. If you look at the lyrics to "Don't Worry Baby," nominally about drag racing, it becomes apparent that the song was supposed to be about Brian's mental illness and the record company forced them to make it into radio fodder.

Still, many (but not all) of these early songs had brilliant chord progressions and amazing harmonies, although the best songs from that era usually weren't on the radio and sometimes weren't released until decades later.

In early 1966, Brian Wilson put together the album Pet Sounds. Although it was too progressive and original to flourish commercially, critics and colleagues adored it, and it inspired the Beatles to make Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band. Pet Sounds is so layered and orderly—more like a painting than a pop album—that Andrew Loog Oldham, the then-manager of the Rolling Stones, said in a later interview, "I was raised in an agnostic family, and Pet Sounds actually gave me faith."

I doubt most people will have such an existential experience with it, but it was the album that a) began psychedelia and b) presented an album as a collective whole instead of a cobbler of hits and filler songs. Yes, the Beatles had made some headway into that with

Rubber Soul (1965), as did Dave Brubeck in 1959 with Time Out, but Pet Sounds was the big bang that changed the foundations of the music industry. All of the music you love from the next few years was trying to play catch-up to it.

However, acid and schizophrenia don't mix well, and there was constant resistance to the new direction from singer and cousin Mike Love. In early 1967, Brian Wilson imploded shortly before he could finish his psychedelic Americana pseudo-classical opus, SMiLe. The album would have forever crushed the Beatles and won the rock n' roll cold war for the Americans. But the album was shelved, and many of the songs were reworked in gloomy and strange ways for a different low-budget release, Smiley Smile. You can hear the defeatism in its arrangements in stark contrast to the prior optimism.

Smiley Smile was a fantastic album, but it wasn't what was promised and left the listeners confused. With sparse commercial success in their psychedelic phase, the Beach Boys were still remembered as a dorky surf band, a genre of music Americans were no longer interested in. The band soon lost all popularity in America, although the drummer Dennis Wilson still kept his alpha image. The next several years saw some truly beautiful releases, but the American people had forgotten about the band and moved on. The band in turn gradually began to focus their touring on Europe.

Dennis Wilson, 1971.

The Beach Boys were (generally) not sanctimonious and preachy like the Beatles, but the band still offered up plenty of social commentary. Although it would be erroneous to say they were consistently red pill, they certainly had their moments when there were strong shadows of it.

1. “California Girls” (1965) – Being A Sex God

This song was an early attempt to thumb their nose at British rock. It actually isn’t about girls from California. It’s about how the band has travelled the world and banged lots of groupies. They’ve found that American girls were the most enjoyable in the world, and so they’re wishing all the girls from the east coast and midwest could move to California so they could continue banging them. My, how things have changed…

Brian Wilson said in a later interview,

> It goes back to 1965 when I was sitting in my apartment, wondering how to write a song about girls, because I love girls. I mean, everybody loves girls.

Don’t you just love his phrasing?

In 1962, he began dating a 14-year-old groupie. Hot, right? She’s in the title picture, so you can cast your judgements. Two years later Brian married her. Such is the appeal of the coveted. This distant crooner, oozing with good looks, charisma, and talent. And out of all the fan girls, he chooses you.

2. “Here Today” (1966) – Oneitis Is Poison

The narrator warns his friend about this girl he’s seeing. The narrator used to go out with her, and he knows she’s toxic. Sure, she’s tons of fun at the beginning, but be warned that she’ll crush your heart.

You know, it seems like most songs ranting about a girl are from the perspective of after the breakup, not before. Instead Brian gives some preventative maintenance. Don’t be fooled by illusory notions of infatuation. Keep your options open and don’t get attached, or she’ll leave you a fragment of a person.

See also from the same album “I’m Waiting For The Day,” which gives a good insight into the beta mind.

3. “Surf’s Up” (written 1966 but released 1971) – The Fallibility Of Established Society

Perhaps this was originally a prediction about the fall of old aristocratic culture, but today insane liberals occupy the place that stodgy conservatives did then. “Surf’s Up” is a reminder that ideologies change and systems fall. The feminazis will not rule forever. The title of the song itself was a reference to how the band was finished with surf rock.

Just as the song’s music has abrupt shifts in tone, so too do social systems. The lyrics are written so that one is not entirely sure what is going on, much like a transient society.

Yet it is also a warning. No culture is impervious. Protect your society, or else it will crumble under a tsunami. In our case, that tidal wave is modern liberalism, which (among other things) seeks to distort the nature of the sexes and deny that people act on the values of their racial culture.

4. “Til’ I Die” (written 1969 but released 1971) – You Are Not Special Or Unique

This song is so depressing that the band didn’t want to release it. Brian came up with the inspiration for it while on the seashore, brooding on how insignificant and mortal everything is. He was lauded as one of the greatest composers of the 20th century, yet even he did not consider himself anything monumental. The chords try to imitate the shifts of the ocean.

This is one of the few songs Brian wrote without a lyrics consultant. He compares himself to a drop in the ocean, a rock in a landslide, and a leaf on a windy day. His realization of this is painful for him, yet he comes to terms with the inevitability of it all. It is a song of hopelessness, morbidity, and resignation.

It’s like he was trying to write a song for drinking alone. The song is perfect with a pack of heavy cigarettes. The CD should come with a razor.

5. “This Whole World” (1970) – Girls Crave Drama

A weird song where the different sections don’t quite fit with each other. But there is a verse,

> When girls get mad at boys and go,
> Many times they’re just putting on a show.
> But when they leave, you wait alone.

Despite the trendy leftism of the time, the Beach Boys had been around enough women to be wary of trusting them. In a song otherwise optimistically celebrating love and human unity, Brian gives an unapologetic blanket stereotype that girls want attention and emotions even if it hurts others. Girls are crazy and selfish, Brian Wilson warns us. They will be the sweetest or the most brutal people you will ever know.

Women will be all into you, and then they’ll flip in an instant for no real reason, and often there is nothing you can do about it. All that time and money you spent on her? Gone, and she won’t even tell you why. You’ll blame yourself, you’ll think you were too upfront or too coy, but really, she’s just a narcissistic child in an adult’s body. Every woman has this within her, even if she doesn’t realize it. God only knows why women are so cold.

6. “Disney Girls (1957)” (1971) – The End Of The American Dream

This one actually was written by Bruce Johnston, and it’s one of my favorites. A bit of an acquired taste, though.

Bruce laments the fall of the American Dream. The white picket fence of the 1950s? The Ward and Judy Cleaver? All fantasies now. As fantastical as Disney itself. Liberalism has begun its course, and society is the worse off for it. Maybe it’s not unattainable, and the song seems optimistic. But it’s clear that this is no longer common reality. The nuclear family has become historical fiction.

But perhaps there’s another layer to this. He’s lived the international rock star life. And what is it he’s wanting? The simplicity of suburban living. He realizes all he’s ever wanted was a good church girl to have a family with and return to the juvenility that Disney represents. It’s an abrupt nostalgia after an abrupt social upheaval.

> Oh reality, it’s not for me,
> And it makes me laugh.
> Oh, fantasy world and Disney girls,
> I’m coming back. […]
>
> She’s really swell,
> Cause she likes
> Church, bingo chances, and old time dances. […]
>
> It’d be a peaceful life
> With a forever wife
> And a kid someday.

But it’s also clear that this is a wish upon a star. His lyrics are toying. Bingo chances and old time dances? A person only wants something that dorky if he lives in a culture of suffocation. He never explicitly says any of this, so there’s not a specific lyric I can point to. But you feel the theme running deep throughout the whole of the work.

As a final note, in 2012 Bruce Johnston called Obama a “socialist asshole” at an autograph signing. He continued, “And who’s the Republican asshole? Our guy isn’t any good.” No apologies. Capitalism is as American as apple pie (although neither are very prevalent anymore). And the Beach Boys are America’s band.

Read More: What Happened To Coming Of Age Movies For Boys?

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Will You Fail At Blogging If You're A Newbie?

February 5, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by BADNET

It seems like every article you read lately is about how you will fail at blogging if you're a newbie.

Is that true? Will you fail because you're "new" to blogging?

No, no, no, no, no, damn it no.

Being new only means that you're new. It doesn't mean that you're stupid and worthless and can't write a blog.

It just means that you're new. Everyone was new until they became a seasoned veteran.

The new people had to work to become experts, so that's what they did. They worked their way from "new" to "professional."

Listen, a blog isn't a piece of magic, it's a piece of media. It's a craft that takes work to get good at. It's a skill that can be learned by anyone with a brain.

If you put in the time to make it work then it's going to work.

How will you fail?

- If you don't try.
- If you quit at the first sign of adversity.
- If you have nothing to say.
- If you're a nobody pretending to be a somebody.
- If you don't help people.
- If you don't have something unique to offer.
- If you're a complete dipshit (but then you'll fail at everything else as well).

How will you succeed?

- Pick the opposite of any one of the above.
- Don't quit, don't give up.
- Supply a demand.
- Remember that it's a business and not a fun little hobby.
- Follow your obsession, not your passion.
- Don't listen to anyone who says you can't do it (prove it to them years later that you can and did do it, laugh if you want).

The myth: Only lucky people can make money from a blog by being lucky enough to start blog and work on it long enough to make it good.

The reality: It's not luck that makes successful bloggers money, it's effort.

Put in simple terms, it's really easy to understand…

- If your voice sounds good to other people then they will like it and you will succeed.
- If your voice sounds like the same ol' regurgitation then you will fail.

And it's that damn simple.

Listen, everybody was a newbie before they were an expert. You have to start somewhere. Starting something makes you new at it. It doesn't mean you're going to fail, it means you need to learn to do it well.

Being new isn't a recipe for failure. Being new doesn't mean you're a dumb, desperate, lowlife loser with a little dick—it just means that you're new. It just means that you need to learn.

If you want to be a respected, authentic, well-paid blogger all you have to do is put in the time and learn to do it well.

So start learning.

BADNET is the teacher.

We promise to teach if you promise to learn, and it's as simple as that.

Advertise Your Site Or Product On ROK With A Sponsored Post

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Dostoyevsky And The Narcissistic Roots Of Insecurity

February 5, 2015 | by William Manning | Link | Original Link

Exordium

In the world of game, we talk a lot about "confidence." Confidence is probably the most important trait to have when trying to attract women (except for, perhaps, six pack abs). It is this confidence which magnifies itself into an air of charisma which then infects those around us. Such a trait is a characteristic of the "alpha male."

For every positive, however, there must be a negative. The opposite of confidence is doubtfulness. While the confident man attracts people through his charisma, the doubtful man often alienates them with his trepidation. This concept is explained no better than in Notes from the Underground by Fyodor Dostoyevsky.

For those who haven't read this excellent novella, it was one of Dostoyevsky's first works, and an introduction to his philosophy which would be further expounded in his later full length novels (The Brothers Karamazov being a prime example).

The main character is an unnamed person, who considers himself part of something called "The Underground."Notes from the Underground is told in the first person, and reads much like a memoir or journal. The narrator, aptly dubbed "The Underground Man" by critics, is a retired civil servant who lives a miserable existence of poverty, doubt, and self-loathing.

In this article, I wish to explore the second half of this book, entitled "Apropos of the Wet Snow." Although the first section offers an excellent refutation of rationalism, the second succinctly showcases the psychology of self-doubt taken to its extreme and its devastating effect upon life.

The Underground Man

The Underground Man is an individual intensely aware of the sickness of society and the sickness within himself. These two realizations act as equal and opposite forces which compel him into inaction. He wants to be like normal people, because he is reprehensible, but yet does not want to, because the normal people are equally disgusting.

> Though I have said that I envy the normal man to the point of exasperation, yet I would not care to be in his place as he is now (though I will not stop envying him. No, no; anyway the underground life is more advantageous!) There, at any rate, one can—bah! But after all, even now I am lying! I am lying because I know myself as surely as two times two makes four, that it is not at all underground that is better, but something different, quite different, for which I long but which I cannot find! Damn underground!

This leads to his intense self-consciousness which prevents him from doing anything but worrying and fantasizing. Perhaps there is no better an example of the Underground Man's psychology than his own words:

> I hated my face, for example, found it odious, and even suspected that there was some mean expression in it, and therefore every time I came to work I made a painful effort to carry myself as independently as possible, and to express as much nobility as possible with my face. 'Let it not be a beautiful face,' I thought, 'but, to make up for that, let it be a noble, an expressive, and, above all, an extremely intelligent one.' Yet I knew, with certainty and suffering, that I would > never be able to express all those perfections with the face I had. The most terrible thing was that I found it positively stupid. And I would have been quite satisfied with intelligence. Let's even say I would even have agreed to a mean expression, provided only that at the same time my face be found terribly intelligent.

The Underground Man spends pages describing his insecurities. If you have read Notes from the Underground, you will probably remember it as being a very "exhausting" book. It takes a toll on the reader, who is put in the narrator's shoes and forced to sit through hours of second-guessing and self-doubt. After a while, however, you began to realize something—WE are the Underground Man.

The Mirror

As Dostoyevsky masterfully voices the incessant self-doubt of the narrator, you are reminded of your own fears and insecurities. Those times you didn't talk to that girl, because you were afraid of humiliation; when you let girlfriend control you for fear of losing her; when you broke eye contact with that dazzling 9 on the subway, because she might think you are a "creep."

The Underground Man is a reflection of unhealthy beta male psychology, taken to the extreme. Instead of plucking up the courage to talk to a girl, however, the Underground Man spends two years building his bravery enough to bump into someone who committed a very minor insult against him in his past. Reading this book is an eerie experience, and as close to a psychological mirror as a pile of paper can get.

Notes from the Underground reveals something else, to us, however. It shows us the driving factor behind this irrational self-doubt—narcissism. This may come as a surprise. After all, aren't the cocky, arrogant people the ones who are full of themselves? Joe Cool the high school quarterback seems like a lot more of a self-worshiping narcissist than Ned the nervous, insecure nerd. Oh, how wrong you are, my friend.

There is one underlying theme that holds this book together: the Underground Man's arrogance. In the first part, he is arrogant enough to regard himself as an enlightened man of supreme intelligence. Although much of the language he uses is self-defacing, he has the gall to take pride in his deficiencies. Instead of attempting to solve his problems, he is so worried about his own ego, that he won't risk the shame which might come with self-improvement. Sound like someone we know?

The Whore and the Narcissist

In the final part of the book, the Underground Man has sex with a whore named Liza. After the encounter, he lies on the bed and begins to talk with her. He manages to convince her that her life as a prostitute will end badly for her, and makes himself out to be a wise, life-saving hero. She breaks down and weeps at the end, asking to meet with the Underground Man again so he can help her reform her ways. He gives her his address and waits. As is usual with insecure betas, most of the Underground Man's thoughts are focused on fantasizing about the life he and the Liza would share, noting every little detail in his mind.

After a little while, Liza finally comes. Liza and the Underground Man sit down together and begin to talk. This is when the monster behind his self-doubt starts to set in. He begins to scream like a maniac at Liza, announcing that he only talked to her before in order to mock her. He works himself up into a bipolar frenzy, alternating between screams of anger at Liza and tears of self-pity. His bitter, consuming narcissism becomes apparent in full force. He ends the encounter by sending Liza away and pressing a note for five rubles into her hand as she leaves, perhaps the ultimate insult to the girl.

It was under the surface the whole book, this lurking sense of something incredibly dark behind Underground Man's pitiable self-consciousness. It is finally revealed in this climax. The Underground Man is not looking for love and acceptance. The Underground Man is looking for something to feed his preexisting conceptions of himself.

His constant worry, doubt, and trepidation are his defense mechanism for his ego. For years, he refused to do anything. He read books, fantasized about his ideal life, and idled his life away. He sulked in the Underground for years. Finally, when he had an opportunity to turn his life around and was put to the test, he snapped in a vicious rage—a last resort to defend his ego.

Gentlemen, the Underground Man is more arrogant than Nebuchadnezzar, more narcissistic than Stalin, and more entitled than the most depraved degenerate on Tumblr. Don’t take my word for it, though. Just ask this man’s victims.

Read More: How American Democracy Has Changed From The Days Of Tocqueville

---

William Manning
William is a young Yankee from the Deep South who keeps himself occupied by surfing the internet from his mom's basement. He is an aspiring organic soy bean farmer.

The Constant Creep Of Female Melodrama Into Male TV

February 5, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

Sons of Anarchy started off some years ago as a pretty cool show. It depicted an all-white biker gang running guns, abhorring drugs, and trying their best to keep the peace while they crafted their free wheeling existence. As it rolled into the second and third season I lost interest in it as the plot line became more and more ridiculous, with needless emotional drama and senseless violence heated up to overdrive.

It's a shame really because it had all the ingredients of a great red pill show— a freedom-loving, system-disrespecting all male "outlaw" motorcycle club, taken from the mold of Hell's Angels and Bandidos, doing their own thing to live the life they choose.

A similar trend in modern TV

There is a growing trend in television and movies where intelligent characters are forced into pointless melodrama that even the dumbest viewer can only shrug at. Plot lines that need a mathematics Ph.D to follow are written seemingly at random with total disrespect to the fans and viewers, with the most purposeless decisions made by characters that were initially portrayed to be so pragmatic and street smart.

Shows seem to compete to ramp up the hyped characters, murders, and plot twists that in all likelihood even the writers themselves have lost track of. It's no longer entertainment with god forbid a little educational element, rather a distracted, hyperactive mind fuck, that aims to whirl a viewers emotions into an atrophied state.

To some degree it seems to be working, as there is plenty of evidence that people are lapping up not only this kind of content but plunging themselves into a general frenzy in everyday life as well. Once upon a time we had chiseled characters portrayed by the likes of John Wayne and Clint Eastwood and plot lines that were not only riveting but actually made sense.

The old Bond movies might have been kitsch but they were still "reasonably" solid entertainment that didn't rely on an amphetaminic head rush of killing sprees and female soap opera style melodrama.

More recent shows such as The Sopranos, The Wire, and Battlestar Galactica were also decent, but the trend really started with Kiefer Sutherland's 24 as roller-coaster plot twists moved into cartoonland. It's so easy to get sucked into watching this drivel, people talk about it as if it's real life and there is a strange kind of addictive quality to the stories, even through they ultimately prove to be anticlimactic and provide nothing of substance in the end.

As the final season comes to a close, the media begins to hark on about the show, as they did with SOA, leaving someone who has never seen it feeling as if they have missed out on some major life event.

The feminist politically correct agenda has also invaded the movies, not just in piffle like Sex and The City, but in many offerings that have some ultra intelligent (but suitably dramatic) fem playing the lead role and kicking ass, as only a scripted actor could do. Not even the violent post-apocalyptic world of The 100 is safe from this absurd paradigm. Here we find young sex kitten mid-20s girls running the show, fighting like men, being appointed and respected as leaders by grown men, all while running circles in pointless melodrama.

Looks like a natural leader to me

SOA was probably the worst of the bunch with the bikers' wives and mothers largely calling the shots in later seasons, but we can see a growing pattern in television and movies (such as Hunger Games). Scripted, manicured, and perfectly dressed actresses portray a fantasy female role, that would be out of place in a manga cartoon, while men are made to look like chumps and buffoons. Men are shown to be overly violent, dishonest, completely engaged in the female world of drama and emotions, while constantly causing trouble.

The reverse is really the case, with the antsy female winding up the men, causing sexual tension and making unnecessary emotional demands. What's more is that your average metrosexual wimp man would easily outdo even the most athletic female in a blow-by-blow physical fight. One smack on the nose and it's all over. With wide hips more suited to birthing children, she's all over the place. The male – female difference is dramatic and makes Hollywood look ridiculous.

While those of us that have taken the red pill can have a good laugh at these films, culturally they provide us with a number of problems. Firstly the degradation of entertainment which is an important part of a man's relaxation after a busy day. I'm not suggesting plugging into every episode night after night, but a good movie can inspire, educate, and stimulate. Instead many are ingrained with cultural Marxism and feminism. I'm inclined to watch a few episodes on the hunt for something decent, but also to keep up with what mindfood the general public is ingesting.

A few decades ago, a man could tune out from some soap opera or rom com, but today even the action movies are embedded with female sex symbols as warrior leaders. Thus not only are we robbed of good entertainment, the general population around us is being programed with what amounts to propaganda.

Read More: The HGTV Channel Poisons Female Minds

If There’s A Mess On Her Floor, Then She’s Probably A Whore

February 6, 2015 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

She has dirty clothes in huge piles sitting on her floor.

She also has clean clothes in huge piles sitting on her floor.

She has empty water bottles, food wrappers, and Starbucks cups scattered around the interior of her car.

She has hair accumulating in her sink drains and, well, pretty much everywhere else too.

She has overflowing trash cans in every room of her house.

She has dirty dishes sitting in the sink for days or even weeks in her kitchen.

She has bathroom mirrors and windows that have no clue that Windex and paper towels exist.

She has carpets that see a vacuum cleaner maybe three times a year—at best.

She has tile or hardwood flooring so sticky that you think you’re stepping in combination of tree sap and her ex-boyfriends’ cum every time you walk on them barefoot.

She has bed sheets that rarely get changed out and have a sour smell.

She has soap scum and even mildew pockets in her bathtub or shower.

She has more dust than a 90 year old nun’s snatch accumulating on her furniture and other assorted belongings.

She has hundreds of dollars worth of makeup… all over the fucking floor, of course.

She has a refrigerator so filthy that eating anything not sealed in a container fit for Plutonium exposure puts you at serious risk for contracting dysentery.

She has blow-dryers, hair straighteners, and hair curlers—of which there must be four of each for some reason—laying on the floor for you to trip over.

You're probably wondering who "she" is at this point. Well, you unlucky son of a bitch, "she" is very likely the next woman you sleep with or—if you're severely lacking in self-respect—your next girlfriend. I can safely say that if the next woman you date is a product of the millennial generation, then there is roughly an 80 percent chance that she will check off a minimum of three items from the above list. And no—I'm not joking. To add insult to injury, this is just the basic stuff—it gets worse.

Welcome To The Somalian States Of America

Several years ago, I dated a woman who lived with a few female roommates. I'd been over to her place only a couple of times before and never stayed longer than three minutes or so; I only stopped by to pick her up or drop her off. The reason I never stuck around for very long was because inside of this place was such a chaotic shithole that I nicknamed it "Little Mogadishu." This was due to the absurd third world living conditions I was immediately exposed to whenever I went there—it was completely ridiculous.

I swear to God, the only thing missing inside this fucking dump was some AK-47 wielding malnourished black kid lighting an old station wagon on fire in the living room. And before any of you try to accuse me of being racist for saying that, I just want to make it clear that I wasn't making fun of all black kids—I was only targeting the impoverished African ones with no food.

Now, as you can probably tell, I tried to avoid Little Mogadishu as much as I avoid the real Mogadishu—completely. As a result, this girl would always come over to my place because there was more privacy and the living conditions reflected the fact that we were living in the United States of America; she was also fully aware that I would chew her a new ass if she didn't respect my home and—to her credit—she was always very courteous.

One evening, though, she invited me over to Little Mogadishu to hang out with her and her roommates. I immediately countered her offer by inviting her over to my place instead, but she had been drinking and didn't want to spend the night.

Now, the present day version of me wouldn't even be messing around with a broad like this to begin with—never mind actually spending time at her place. But being the horny young bastard that I was at the time, I decided to bite the bullet and head over there. I wanted to get laid, but I was completely dreading the squalor and having to talk with her roommates—one of whom was a loudmouthed fat-ass with an obnoxious laugh (there always has to be at least one).

After mentally preparing myself, I threw on some of my least favorite clothes, grabbed a couple of condoms, and headed over to Little Mogadishu. Upon entering, I looked around and examined the place—I was hoping to hear a pack of hyenas laughing hysterically as they hunted down and killed off the roommates little faggot dogs, but I wasn't so lucky.

I was quickly snapped out of my fantasy when "Patches" came up to me and started yapping. I proceeded to ignore the little fucker and immediately noticed that there was junk scattered everywhere, huge stains on the carpets, and the smell of animals who hadn't been bathed for months in the air. I decided within 15 seconds of walking into this hovel that if I wasn't getting laid within an hour—I was leaving.

The woman I was there to see offered me a beer, so I followed her into the kitchen and we had a brief chat…

> Girl: "So, how's it going? Glad you came over." (kisses me and hands me a beer with a smile)
>
> Me: "Place smells like a skunk that crawled out of a dead skunk's ass—that's how it's going."
>
> Girl: "Haha! Oh don't you start, I know it's trashed out, but it's my roommates fault—they're lazy hehehe."
>
> Me: "So are we doing this or what?"
>
> Girl: "What are you talking about?"
>
> Me: "Well, I didn't come over here for the scenery or to socialize with that fucking mastodon you call a roommate; who, by the way, is somehow managing to take up two-thirds of that poor couch with just her ass alone."

> Patches enters the kitchen
>
> Girl: “Hahaha! God, you’re so mean—she’s actually a really sweet girl, be nice! You’re just going to have to wait a little bit for that other thing though… sometimes I feel like that’s all you ever want from me… Awwwww! There’s little Patches! AV8R, say hi to Patches!”
>
> Me: “Hey faggot.”
>
> Girl: “HAHA! Shhh! Not so loud! They’ll hear you! Look, just hang out with them for a little bit—they’ve been wanting to get to know you. Then we’ll go have some fun.”
>
> Me: “Alright, fine.”

A quick side note: I absolutely hate it when sluts accuse me of just wanting them for sex. I find it quite insulting and offensive because they always seem to overlook the fact that I thoroughly enjoy getting my dick sucked too. It bothers me when I see sluts forget crucial details; not to mention, selling themselves short and underestimating their value in such a way. They should have more confidence in themselves. Anyway, back to the story…

So we headed off to the living room and one of the roommates was kind enough to clear some crap off the couch so I could have a place to sit down. I’m sitting there nursing my beer as I listen to this gaggle of drunk broads talk about stuff I don’t find interesting, ask me stupid questions I don’t want to answer, and listen to them laugh at things I don’t find funny—it was pure hell.

Every time the loud fat one would laugh, I would zone out and fantasize about experiences that would be more pleasant than listening to her: things like getting stabbed, being thrown down a flight of stairs, or being held at gunpoint and forced to jerk off to YouTube videos of plane crash compilations all came to mind.

About 20 minutes into this suck-fest, I asked where the bathroom was located. I get pointed in the right direction by my girl and make the journey—managing to avoid “Patches” and all of the other tripping hazards in the process. Once in the bathroom, I flipped on the light switch and closed the door.

I then proceeded to dodge the ten tons of random girl paraphernalia that was strewn all over the place and finally made it to the toilet. I lifted the toilet seat up with one hand while simultaneously unzipping my pants with the other… and then it happened. What was I greeted with, you may ask? None other than the remnants of what could only be described as the “Tsar Bomba” of nuclear shits—relatively fresh and clinging to the sides of the bowl.

Now, the gentleman in me wanted to help these ladies out by trying to blast that mess clean with my piss, but I quickly nipped that idea in the bud and just went ahead and pissed in their sink instead. My initial thought was that the fat broad with the annoying laugh was the culprit. It makes sense that a big bitch would take big shits, but I couldn’t be sure if it was her or not. I pulled the shower curtain back and examined the bathtub to see if it was wet inside—it wasn’t. So whoever created that mess didn’t shower after they were done.

Concerned that I might be on the verge of having sex with some slattern with a severe case of swamp ass, I decided to hit the eject button and get the hell out of there. I had seen enough for one evening. I couldn’t just pull the girl I was seeing aside and directly ask if she was the one responsible—she would have almost certainly denied all involvement; much in the same way she absolved herself of any responsibility for the place being such a pigsty in the first place.

And let’s be brutally honest here: it wouldn’t have mattered to me even if she confessed and then took a shower—because at the end of the day, I would have still seen her fucking doo-doo, and that just ain’t going to work for this motherfucker right here.

After emerging from ground zero, I motioned to my girl to visit me in the kitchen for another talk. I quickly explained to her that I was leaving and why. She apologized profusely for the mess and denied any wrongdoing as expected. I accepted her apology with my typical charm and then fled Little Mogadishu without a word to her roommates.This woman was actually a pretty nice person, so I didn’t give her a really hard time about the situation. After all, I made the decision to go over there knowing the place was a shithole, so I have to accept some responsibility for putting myself there.

The Messy Proclivities Of The Messy Woman

When you walk into a woman’s home like the one described in the above story, or you receive a selfie showcasing a room that bears a striking resemblance to a landfill (and we’ve all received a few them)—then there are a few assumptions you can make about the woman you’re currently involved with.

1. She is under constant financial stress and routinely blows money on shit she doesn’t need with money she doesn’t have

These women usually struggle to pay their bills when they come due and regularly overdraw their checking accounts. They may also have the bad habit of getting payday loans (and the exorbitant interests rates that accompany them) to keep themselves afloat financially throughout the month. If they don’t have financial problems, then their daddy is most likely covering their expenses, or they’re sleeping with dudes who are giving them money.

2. She’s never on time for anything—including her job

You can count on this type of woman to be a minimum of 15 minutes late for any plans you make with her, and that’s assuming she doesn’t flake on you altogether.

3. She has an excuse for everything and takes responsibility for nothing.

Just like the girl in the above story: everything is always somebody else’s fault. You should also prepare yourself to hear the words “I’ve been so busy” quite frequently. This is in spite of the fact that she has no hobbies or real interests, has a normal 9-5 work schedule, or has a job working three 12-hour shifts (like a nurse, for example) and has up to four days off per week. These women will also feign helplessness quite often and attempt to make un-funny jokes about their irresponsibility.

4. She won’t ask you to use a condom when you fuck her

This one should really draw your attention, because I hate to break it to you, but you are not special, buddy. These women are not being nonchalant about condom use because they think you’re an awesome dude or because they desperately want your seed—they’re being nonchalant because they’re fucking stupid.

If a woman can’t be bothered to bend over and pick up her dirty clothes, then it’s safe to assume that she can’t be bothered to remember to take her birth control or practice good pussy hygiene either. And the fact that she has a cavalier attitude towards using condoms with you means that she extended the same courtesy to all of the other guys who have fucked her (or unbeknownst to you, are still fucking her).

Women who maintain disorderly residences generally maintain disorderly lives across the board: they’re slobs at home, they’re slobs with their finances, and they’re slobs with their vaginas. I’ve heard some people say that the more neat and fastidious women are the really slutty ones—it’s complete bullshit. I suspect this little theory was cooked up by ugly women who are too lazy to clean their fucking houses.

Looking back, I can say that almost every woman I’ve dated who has kept her place neat and tidy has had a lower notch count than the messy broads. Now, this doesn’t mean that the tidy ones weren’t sluts (we are still talking about mostly American women here), it just means that these women tended to be more respectable and less tempestuous in their slutty ways when compared to their trashy counterparts.

A Word To The Wise

Always wrap up your dick when fucking around with these messy sluts—seriously. They're not going to act responsibly, so it's your job to do it for them. STDs and unwanted pregnancies are both terrifying propositions, and these are the types of women that will grant you those unwanted wishes if you let them. I've never had an STD, and only a couple of outlandish pregnancy scares from some crazy stalker-types that I knew couldn't be true. I've never had to worry about this shit because I've always valued my future over how good my orgasm feels.

You must ask yourself, "If I were to have children with such a woman, how many hours would my infant son or daughter sit around wearing shit-filled diapers? How often would she let my kids go to school wearing dirty clothes? Would a loser slob of a woman make sure that my kids are brushing their teeth, taking baths, doing their homework and cleaning their rooms?" I highly doubt it.

The mere thought of your children going to school with un-brushed teeth and wearing stained or wrinkled clothing should make your fucking blood boil. Irresponsible loser women raise irresponsible loser kids. And speaking for myself here: I would consider it the ultimate slap in the face to have a lazy piece of shit woman provide me with lazy piece of shit kids—I love my unborn children far too much to ever let their mother be some fucking flunky.

Women who can't take care of themselves fail considerably when attempting to take care of anybody else. Whenever I see a news story about a child dying from heat exposure because their scatter brained mother accidentally left them locked inside a 110 degree car for over an hour, one of the first things that comes to my mind is usually: "I bet that bitch's house is filthy." And while there's obviously no empirical data to support my hypothesis, I would bet damn good money that I'm right.

Women have a tendency to put their best foot forward in the beginning as they attempt to snag you and get you tied down, but they will eventually fall right back into their old habits—they always do. This is why it's important to show up at a woman's place on short notice from time to time (if you've been seeing her for a bit).

You can test her by deliberately leaving something there and coming back for it a few days later, or you can just say that you're close-by and want to pay her a visit—don't give her more than a few minutes to prepare. If she starts giving you excuses or tries feeding you bullshit as to why you can't visit for a few minutes, then you need to view that with suspicion (for multiple reasons).

If a woman's home is completely spotless whenever you're there, then that's something you need to pay attention to as well. Luckily, women who are neurotic freaks about cleanliness usually expose themselves pretty quickly—they lose their damn minds whenever something is out of place. Those fruitcakes are even more intolerable than the sloppy ones.

What I'm talking about specifically is when a woman is trying to make a "good impression" by keeping her place spotless whenever you're around. Making a "good impression" translates into the following: "I'm a fucking bum, but I'll put on a good show for a little while if it gets me a good man." Seriously: to hell with those broads—they're worthless. Test them to the max: eventually they will falter and show their true colors, and once they do—you discard their asses without a second thought.

All you're looking for is a happy medium—a woman who has the motivation to maintain a tidy living space, but doesn't do it because she's trying to impress you or because she's an obsessive compulsive weirdo. She does it simply because it's a part of her character; she's naturally inclined to do so—it's just who she is as a person. If you find one like this, then you'll notice that she most likely approaches the other areas of her life with maturity as well.

In Closing

There are many men out there who believe you can mold a woman into what you want her to be. If the woman in question is young, untainted, and experienced a proper upbringing by two solid parents—then perhaps these men are on to something. But if the woman in question is a degenerate turd with a profusion of abysmal habits and character deficiencies, then I believe the only thing you are going to be molding is a fucking turd.

I'm a firm believer in not trying to change or rehabilitate a woman—I think that what you see is what you get. There are certain things I do as an individual that are just habits; by-products of my character and upbringing. I clean up after myself, I show up for work, I'm financially responsible, I exercise regularly—this is who I am. I do these things whether I'm dating someone or not. I like to refer to this as "being a responsible adult"—a fucking grown-up human being. This is a concept that doesn't seem to resonate with the vast majority of American women—no matter how 'strong and independent' they may claim to be.

In my experience, once I've peeled away whatever facade a woman is putting up and allowed the smoke to clear, the only thing remaining has been a dirty mirror with a vapid American woman standing in front it; surrounded by her own detritus. The real her has been revealed in a deliciously perfect irony: the filth of the mirror and the filth of her surroundings serve to perfectly compliment the filth of her own reflection, but only her beauty and perceived excellence does she see—her cum drenched soul she does not.

She possesses a unique gift—the ability to tell herself lies with more conviction than she tells herself the truth. If it weren't for this special talent of hers, then she would see exactly the same thing I do: that she's nothing more than a filthy whore with a filthy floor. And at the end of the day, I won't be there to push a fucking broom for her.

Read More: The Relationship Whore

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

8 Things You Can Do To Live A Good Life For Cheap

February 6, 2015 | by Tony Moze | Link | Original Link

Introduction

I always felt that those who lived a good life had a lot of money. I have come to the belief that anyone can live a good life, as long as they use their mind. Being open minded and enthusiastic, you can find anything in the universe to provide you with living a good life. Here are eight things you can do to live a good life for cheap or FREE:

1. Mindfulness therapy

This involves simply focusing on your breathing and body. Do you have a chair or something to seat yourself in an upright position? Do you have a floor? If so, you are all set. It's all about deep inhales and exhales. Breathe in and out as much as your lungs can. Progressive muscle relaxation is about tensing the muscles so your body and mind can be relaxed. If you are unaware how to correctly conduct these exercises, you can go here and here, among other places, where you can do guided meditation and progressive relaxation for free.

2. Educate yourself

Your town or city library gives a free welcome to all. A warm place to stay, where you can get three hots (of library books) and a cot (a seat and desk for yourself to rest and read). You can even attend a local university (community or state college) and hibernate there during library hours.

With free Wi-Fi, an endless supply of books and databases, desktop computers, and depending on the library they sell food and coffee, this can be a man's second home. No need to pay tuition or fees, unless you forget to bring a book back on time. I was not a student, I was not part of a fraternity, not part of a secret society or affiliation. I have been to all types of libraries, and they all provided me free access to feed my mind.

3. Food

Shop for food

Stop ordering out and shop for your food. Compare the receipts of food spent on take-out versus spent in the supermarket, and you will see a difference. If you want to save money, I would say buy supermarket brand first. If you're trying to eat clean, you can still find oatmeal, nuts, chicken breast and eggs from supermarket grade. Most restaurants do not use free range or organic products.

You are better off getting supermarket brand macronutrients through meat, eggs, and produce. If you don't care how you eat, then the world is yours at a supermarket. You will be shaving at least $15 to $25 from your expenditures. Think about where that $15 to $25 can go to – condoms? More beer? For yourself? That is more money for you!

Join Yelp

Joining Yelp is great for anyone who wants to go out, meet people, eat and drink alcohol for FREE. Yelp is a website where people can review businesses. It's a social medium, like Facebook, where you can add friends and fans/followers and network with them. If you can consistently write a detailed review, meaning 20 sentences from 15 to 20 businesses and participate on the talk boards, you can ask your Yelp peers and community manager from your area to nominate you for “elite” status.

The catch is, you have to review these 20 businesses on your own, meaning, you have to write and pay for the food at your local mom and pop spot, the mechanic who fixed your car, or the jazz club who served you drinks. Either way it is all worth it if you want to be entitled to monthly events of free food (appetizers, entrees, desserts) and liquor.

4. Clothing

Marshall’s, TJ Maxx and Nordstrom Rack are a few places I shop for brand name clothing for cheap. I believe that depending on what brands you research, a brand name can mean everything for quality. Take for instance Magnani, which is a shoe company from Spain. They hand make and hand paint their shoes, having a pair retail anywhere from $300 to $500, but you can find them at Nordstrom Rack anywhere from $75 to $200. Their shoes feel amazing, and don’t need resoling until 10 to 15 years after purchase. Purchasing quality shoes from the above places, you can walk in style and comfort with money saved.

Magnanni – Handmade in Spain.

5. Fitness

You can work out at home without having to pay for a gym membership. Pushups, high and low plank holds, mountain climbers, burpees, prisoner squats or squats of all kinds can be done inside the comforts of your home. Go out for a jog, do a few sprints up and down the street, maybe purchase a TRX, do pull ups at a place with poles and bars.

If you and your friends are cool, you can use them as resistance and put them over your shoulders to do squats and pushups. Go work out in a playground. Whether it’s from a New York Sports Club or the garage of your drunken uncle’s house, muscles see no difference.

Man using the TRX

6. Meetup events

Meetup is a great way to socialize and network. There are thousands of events where you can eat, drink, socialize, and have fun from cheap to free. I have attended events where they may have asked for $5 up front, events where they have asked for a $3 donation, to events where they wanted nothing, just your time and presence.

From meditation, laughter yoga, hiking, cooking workshops, learning or improving your Spanish or Japanese, to a singles meet up, I have had a great time during all of these events. It's even a great time to pick up women.

7. Acupuncture and Massage Therapy

I always thought that acupuncture was for the elderly, until I tried it. What motivated me was through a meetup event. I wanted to do this for shits and jiggles. I was surprised to find that I was able to sleep better, think better, and live more calmly. Check your local listings for a community acupuncture center. Since it's done for the community, you do not undergo the traditional session where you get naked and they put pins all over your back.

You share a room sometimes with 2 or more people, so you're limited to pins placed only from your elbows to hands, knees to feet, and maybe a few on your head. For as low as $15 an hour, I believe it is well worth it.

There are great massage therapists who charge a lot as well. Since I like deep tissue massage, which usually costs $60 to $90 for one hour to an hour and a half sessions, I found those who could charge me way less. I have been attending student massage centers, and pay a flat rate of $32 for about an hour.

Since the school operates from that fee, and the students work for school credit, you can request anything you want. Your back has been hurting and you need some tension relief? Tell them that! Your neck and shoulders hurt? Tell them that! You want them to go easy on the pressure? These students are there to serve you (Note: Happy endings could occur if good game is used).

8. Dating

If it's cold out, you can go to a coffee shop or a wine tasting. You say that alcohol is a great way to get down a girl's pants? I know of breweries that are as low as $10 for entry, and you both can leave there pretty buzzed or drunk, depending who is pouring. I can't count how many times I have attended these things where the attendants would give me three and sometimes five samples because they had to waste a bottle, said they were "in a good mood" (probably because they were drinking from the tap, too!), or because the tasting time frame was coming to an end.

If it's warm, go tubing down the river. Take a walk in a nice metropolitan area, go sightseeing or to a museum. If you're a musician, show her music you just composed at your pad. Play that awesome chorus on your saxophone or guitar. Play a hip hop instrumental from Youtube or Spotify and rap a verse or two. These all seemed to work for myself and many men who had no other means.

Conclusion

People think it takes a lot of money to live a good life. I disagree with that notion. I believe it takes a person who is savvy and willing to explore the many opportunities in life. Don’t ever say “you can’t live a good life unless you have money.” You have the power to live however you expand your mind.

Read More: 8 Signs You Should Break Up With A Girl

Tony Moze
Tony is a philanthropist and philosopher. He spends his free time reading, traveling the world, exercising and living in the moment.

DePaul University Has Been Ruined By Cultural Marxism

February 6, 2015 | by Hannibal Menwell Creed | Link | Original Link

Over my years at DePaul University, I have began to open my eyes and realize the true extent of the cultural decadence resulting from a combination of inexorable cultural Marxism, shameless hedonism, and subjugated Catholicism. At DePaul University, red pill philosophy has been snuffed out and the feminists and cultural Marxists have won.

I am now stuck behind enemy lines, having to choose between fighting alone, or wearing a mask. As I wear this mask, I would like to give a current report of the state of affairs at my school.

Section 1: Witch-Hunts

Just like many other college campuses, we see numerous witch-hunts against anything that is deemed improper by our ever-so-snide feminist and Marxist culture. I never really realized the extent of the pseudo-victimization of women when I saw this DePaul security alert in my email one morning. It reads as follows:

> ATTENTION DEPAUL COMMUNITY
>
> DATE REPORTED: SEPTEMBER 8, 2014
>
> WHAT: BATTERY
>
> WHERE: RACINE AND WEBSTER
>
> WHEN: SEPTEMBER 8, 2014 1:00 A.M.

> A FEMALE STUDENT WAS WALKING HOME FROM A PARTY WHEN SHE WAS APPROACHED BY A MALE IN A SILVER SUV. THE MALE EXITED THE VEHICLE AND APPROACHED THE FEMALE TO FLIRT. THE MALE THEN GAVE THE FEMALE HIS PHONE NUMBER AND GAVE HER AN UNWANTED HUG. PUBLIC SAFETY WAS ALSO INFORMED BY THE VICTIM THAT ANOTHER FEMALE HAD A SIMILAR EXPERIENCE AND MAY LATER FILE A REPORT.

Let me point out the key aspects of this alert. First, let us note the classification of the crime: battery. Now the worst thing this individual did was commit bad night game, misread a situation, and gave an uncomfortable hug. Considering our own security force at DePaul released this report, I have to wonder what the implications are for me, and the fact that if some lady doesn't explicitly consent to a hug, I open myself to being accused of battery.

But hey! At least on the bright side, I have not found anything on DePaul's campus to date of a guy giving a girl a hug when she was drunk, and then the girl accusing him of battery the next morning. Feminists have such a distorted world view that they cannot tell the difference between these two pictures:

Section 2: Absolute Control

At DePaul, feminist ideology has taken over to such an extent that it demands absolute control of all male behavior. The most recent example I can think of comes from our own school newspaper, The DePaulia, where I ask myself every week if I accidentally picked up a copy of the onion.

One recent article I read on the article relates to Matt Forney's recent article: "'Manspreading' shows off the social retardation of millennial women." DePaulia's article, "Sit to yourself: 'Manspreading' irks on the CTA," advocates for the same ridiculous idea that manspreading should be regulated by the public transit authority.

As a matter of fact, a quote that caused me to cry while laughing so hard in public came from a DePaul student named Laura Springman, who is a member of the DePaul Feminist Front. Springman was quoted as saying " [manspreading] is part of a bigger problem of male entitlement, specifically in public spaces." It got even worse when a white-knight male in the same club, Benjamen Shaffer, agreed by saying "I think some men think they deserve more space than other people. They are mistakenly under the impression that their comfort is more important than the needs of those around them."

Oh the barbaric tyranny of the modern American man. This grotesque public display wants me to drop my econometrics major and study something that really helps the world: Feminist Geography!

Now, would I say this is technically ill-mannered? Yes, to the prudest of individuals. But let's be honest, in a world where thousands of individuals die from starvation a day, this is the biggest concern for liberal, vegan, pretentious coffee shop American feminists?

It is even worse that everyone at The DePaulia is fine with reporting this petty garbage, but if you look at DePaulia's page, you would notice the rhetoric has been 100% controlled by feminists and liberals for the longest of times, without any thought to finding an individual who disagrees with their opinions.

Section 3: The LBGTQA community

DePaul University is renowned for having one of the strongest if not the strongest LGBTQ community of any university in the United States of America. Now, not that I personally have anything against gay people, but the power of the groups at a PRIVATE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY has gotten completely out of control.

One example of the absurdity that goes on at DePaul is their annual drag show. If you want your eyes to bleed, watch a clip of one here. At these drag shows, to my knowledge, transvestites conduct crude skits on stage in front of a audience in the main center of our Lincoln Park campus. This is plain vulgar, and just a disgrace to anyone who goes to DePaul. The administration should be ashamed of itself for letting people put on this event in public, especially when it is done with complete hypocrisy when it comes to their history of repeated attacks on republicans at DePaul.

If the LGBTQA communities needed to do this event, it could have been done in a private place where young children, and normal human beings did not have to be exposed to this smut. I remember when DePaul's feminists and liberal activists held an event called Vagina Monologues, to discuss issues of sexual assault. Two word can describe their behavior: vulgar, and tactless.

Did anyone ever think of what parents/small children would think if they walked into our student center where they see people like this lap dancing with two other transvestites in leather chaps? And DePaul wonders why we have one of the highest STD rates in the country……

Section 4: Irrational consequences

Recently at DePaul there has been a lot of demonization against male athletes resulting from the supposed easy treatment given to Cleveland Melvin, one of our former basketball players who supposedly raped multiple women. I don't know enough about the case to comment; however, his actions resulted in the demonization of other athletes I personally witnessed.

Rebounding off this, one entrepreneur at DePaul University named Randy Vollrath started a movement called "Consent the D," which is a play off one of our old basketball shirts which read: "fear the D." The shirts sold on threadmeup for $15 a shirt, and half of the proceeds went to shelters for women suffering from sexual violence. I have met Randy a few times in my life, and I have a gut feeling this is a good person, so I want to give him a much needed defense.

When life gives you lemons at DePaul, you have to consult with the feminists and administration to make lemonade

So to get this movement going, the first thing Mr. Vollrath did was go to the feminist groups, pitching his idea, which he thought was going to be an immediate sell. WRONG. As a matter of fact, THE FEMINISTS GROUPS TRIED TO STOP THE MOVEMENT, using various outlets such as their beloved DePaulia. Take a look at some of the quotes from the DePaul Feminist Front in our newspaper, the article being found here.

> He clearly wasn't educated on the issue, and because he was male, it was automatically more praised because of his gender.—Adina Babaian, DePaul Feminist Front (Note to self—Jealous feminist who is mad that she didn't think of it herself)

Here is another excerpt from another article here.

> The movement left out a specific group of people who are often victims of sexual assault – the LGBTQ community… (Consent the D) limits the definition of sex in general to that which involves a penis, and this is, indeed, heteronormative, Honestly, the original DePaul Slogan for 'Fear the D' might be more on point' – Allison McCracken, a professor of American Studies at DePaul

Let me take a brief minute to address this. One, lesbians and gay men can be raped by a penis, so it does include them. Two, this had nothing to do with the limitation of the definition sex, but was bringing up the issue of rape. The bullshit feminist terminology such as heteronormativity has one of two places to live: in the mind of a Starbucks barista, or a propped up gender studies program in the most pretentious of ad hominem academic slime.

If you look at her CV, this professor has worked at universities all of her life, with her most famous class being "sex in the US." I am partially disgusted at myself for paying tuition that helps pay for her job. Without heteronormativity, humanity would not survive. It's mathematically impossible. But I forgot, Allison probably didn't take one mathematics course throughout all of college.

If you were to tell me feminists would be against a charitable movement donating to women's shelters, I would have laughed in your face until a few months ago. Now I truly know anything is possible at the height of irrationality. If these incompetent hippies for one second decided to think and get behind Randy instead of trying to inhibit him, more money could have been raised for women suffering from sexual violence, but liberalism is always centered around three things: hugging trees, not contributing to society, and then complaining about how bad the people that actually do contribute to society, hypocritically looking at their iPhones that they bought with their daddy's money.

Conclusion

As I was writing this article, I just found out that one of the Palestinian groups is hosting a terrorist that bombed a supermarket full of women and children in Israel. This goes on because DePaul's administration is in a state of abjection due to their fanciful politically correct mindset, which is just a leftist tool for silencing opposition.

DePaul has backed down to the subcultures of feminism, liberalism, the LGBTQ community, and extreme Islamism, and as a result they have taken over. Therefore, the rest of us normal human beings suffer. I am personally ashamed of my school, and have been persecuted for my beliefs. St. Vincent is rolling in his grave for the events that go on at DePaul University on a daily basis.

Read More: Is Feminism Its Own Worst Enemy?

Hannibal Menwell Creed
Hannibal is a student at DePaul University. He has few friends, lots of enemies, and even more hatred for Bernie Sanders supporting millennials. You can find him on campus working out, being a douche to piss off liberals, drinking black coffee mixed with whiskey, or studying. You can reach him at "".

The Chris Paul Story Shows That Women Shouldn't Be Allowed To Officiate Male Sports

February 6, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Last night Los Angeles Clippers guard Chris Paul criticized female NBA rookie referee Lauren Holtkamp for giving him a technical foul. His was one of of five such fouls (four in the 3rd quarter) dolled out by the referee crew that night, which included the ejection of Matt Barnes.

Chris Paul

The Clippers are known for pushing the ball up the court faster than most teams, which is physically taxing on the defending team. It also means the refs have to move a little quicker, too. According to Paul, when he attempted to run their quick-paced offense she said “uh-uh” indicating in some way this was not supposed to be doing. When Paul replied “Why ‘uh-uh?'” she gave him the technical foul.

During his post-game interview he was asked about the situation and provided the following answer:

> That tech that I get right there was ridiculous. I don’t care what nobody says, I don’t care what she says; that’s terrible. There’s no way that can be a tech. That’s ridiculous. If that’s the case, this might not be for her.

The Aftermath

Paul’s comments have set off a media firestorm. All morning long this topic has dominated the sports landscape on all mediums. It’s all over ESPN and ESPN. Radio talk show hosts have talked about it ad nauseam.

The issue in debate is whether or not Chris Paul is a sexist which is absolutely ridiculous. The part of his response that sparked this narrative is at the end when he states “this might not be for her.” Pundits claim this is could be a sexist remark because of the pronoun he used. They prefer that his comments not be gender specific so as to not attack the gentle, innocent sex.

Sarah Spain, who now co-hosts a sports radio talk show with another woman, dropped this predictable gem on The Herd this morning:

> Would he have made the same comments about a male referee?

Predictably social media has blown up with keyboard gangsters coming to the aid of poor Miss Holtkamp, proving once again that when men are critical of women, even if reasonable, it creates backlash and faux outrage.

Kevin Ding, senior NBA writer for bleacher report, covertly did his part to incite social media outrage. Notice the comment and how many favorites and retweets it's gotten in less than 24 hours. Think he didn't know what his tweet would do?

Like he didn't know what was coming…

Who is Lauren Holtkamp?

Lauren Holtkamp is one of two full-time female NBA referees (there was a third who is now out of the league). She ref'd in the D-League (the NBA's de facto minor league) for six seasons before being called up before the 2014-2015 season.

Holtkamp

This isn't Holtkamp's first run-in with the Clippers. Players had issues with her questionable calls during a recent game against the Miami Heat. So there was already something brewing beneath the surface of last night's game, and being down by 32 at one point in the game, then getting four technical fouls in one quarter was the perfect storm for this to boil over.

How did it get to this point?

This was a frustrating loss to begin with and Holtkamp's ridiculous calls made matters worse. She called a tech on DeAndre Jordan after he lobbied for a foul after a dunk. Players yell and scream at refs when they feel they deserve a call, but few are assessed a technical foul. Holtkamp decided to buck the trend.

The crew continued their sensitive foul calling when they assessed Matt Barnes his second tech (when a player gets two technical fouls, they are automatically ejected) for saying "Just don't give them the game" to a teammate who ran into LeBron James a little harder than our gyno-centric referee crew was comfortable with.

Barnes reacts to his untimely ejection

When the smoke cleared, the Clippers had incurred five technical fouls for the game, leaving them frustrated. What's more is they lost by 11 and have a tough stretching coming up against some good teams. It's no surprise that Paul called Holtkamp out for her exploits.

What's the big deal?

The big deal is that controversy was started simply because a female was criticized by a male. Chris Paul was clearly expressing frustration and indicated that her bad calls and overall inexperience may mean she's just not cut out to be a referee. People claim the only reason this blew up is because he used the pronoun "she," which is complete bullshit because regardless of how he referred to her SJWs would have connected the dots and figured out he was talking about Holtkamp.

Clipper’s Coach Doc Rivers can’t believe this circus

Players and coaches criticize refs nightly. Most of the time they’re fined by the NBA and life goes on. But now that a precious woman is involved everyone has jumped on the bandwagon making accusations of misogyny. The fact that this is even a story shows the sad state of affairs in professional sports.

Why shouldn’t women be referees?

Estrogen. You see competitive sports on all levels gets intense. In the heat of battle, tempers flare, names are called, and shit gets physical outside of the normal playing rules. Minor scuffles break out all the time in the NBA and the NFL. The officiating crews know and understand that this is what happens when testosterone mixes with adrenaline in a competitive environment.

Cooler heads prevail more often than not (the Malice at the Palace being the one major exception) and outside of a few shoves and some foul language, referees generally refrain from imposing any sort of penalty.

Women are governed by their emotions. So when things heat up on the playing field and things get rowdy they go to their default programming which is make the call based on feelings. Thursday night was the perfect example of this. The Clippers were frustrated due to being blown out, but Holtkamp made it worse by unleashing her hair trigger finger with all of her terrible calls because she simply couldn’t handle the gravity of the situation.

The bottom line is she cracked under pressure and tried to mitigate the damage by projecting it onto the players by making bad calls. And if you think this going to be an isolated event, think again. All women are like that. Period.

Plus, when things do escalate physically referees step in to separate the players. You think a female is strong enough to stop a 6’6″ 230 lb power forward from accosting another player?

Then there’s the issue regarding personal vendettas. Yes, men hold grudges from time to time, but females take them to their graves. Piss them off one time and you’re on their shit list for life. There’s no way Holtkamp doesn’t hold this against Paul, and I’d bet the farm that other female officials act on long standing quarrels with players and coaches on the regular.

In the end…

…this is about the relentless pursuit of the infiltration into a male sphere by women. Female referees, female sports pundits, women’s causes and every other vagina-motivated agendas are becoming more prominent by the day. This fiasco is further proof that sports on all levels will eventually be eroded by women and their white knight betas.

This is yet another feather in the feminist cap. Sooner or later sports will be completely infested by females rendering professional sports in this country just about unwatchable in every way.

Read Next: How White Knighting Is Killing The NFL

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Social Engineering Was On Display At This Year's Super Bowl Halftime Show

February 6, 2015 | by Friedrich Nietzsche | Link | Original Link

USA Today said it best when it said the Super Bowl's ads were depressing and the halftime show was bizarre. Bizarre indeed.

The Pepsi Cola Halftime Show was a visually stunning spectacle rife with subliminal messages. For those who didn't see it, it opened with Katy Perry riding on an animatronic tiger. This was followed by androgynous chess pieces that looked like they came straight out of the dystopian film Metropolis. The message was clear: people and nature are becoming unisex machines to be moved around a chessboard by the queen bee.

Following this "Dark Horse" vision, Lenny Kravitz came out for a quick minute and Perry performed a mild mannered mini-twerk. The set then changed to a SpongeBob SquarePants beach scene designed to capture the attention of little kids. Perry played her schoolgirl shtick in a party dress that did a good enough job of covering up her most precious assets. Girls in 1950s-style bikinis danced along with cartoon sharks, beach balls, and surfboards.

Nothing was really surprising up to this point. It was just interesting just how unsexy Perry's performance was. Perry was playing a mildly flirty tease, and most parents were probably relieved that their kids weren't being exposed to anything too racy. Feminists were undoubtedly happy that male viewers didn't get to see more of Perry's boobs.

The Bizarre

A masculine Missy Elliot sings “Get Ur Freak On”

Then the bizarre happened. Katy Perry’s girly, PG-rated performance was followed by Missy Elliot coming out dressed in a NASCAR outfit singing about getting your freak on. It would not be surprising if some five-year-old girl turned to her mother at this point and asked, “Mommy, what’s getting your freak on?” And the mother replying, “Why honey, according to UrbanDictionary it means to have sex.”

Thus, the confusing subliminal messages in this year’s PepsiCola Corporatist Halftime Show. What’s a boy to make of this charade? What’s a girl to think? Well the subliminal messages for girls are as follows:

It’s OK to be a tease

BUT

Dress up like a man and have sex

Gender Equality Through Masculine Feminism

The truth behind this over-produced charade soon became clear with the first commercial shown after the halftime show:

The explicit message of this commercial is that any criticism of the female sex is wrong. It’s that girls’ athletic abilities are just as good as boys. And they sure as hell shouldn’t be made fun of if they suck at those pursuits. Like the animals in Animal Farm, girls are equal to boys, but with special privileges.

Notice how this commercial for gender equality doesn’t even hawk a product. It’s actually a Procter and Gamble commercial for menstrual pads of all things, which makes no sense and perfect sense. Advertising has become a way for corporations to sell social messages rather than actual products.

The idea is that by controlling the mindset of your consumer, you control their purchasing power (not only controlling their individual preference to buy your products, but to spread this preference like a virus through hashtags and social media).

#YourFutureWife

I wouldn't be surprised if Sheryl Sandberg designed this Super Bowl Halftime Spectacle and paid the NFL millions to get it produced. The underlying message seemed to promote her style of masculine feminism that wants to turn women into men. This style of feminism believes that acting feminine and girly is for little kids and is even shameful. That girls need to act masculine in order to have sexual agency and compete in sports and dominate the man's world when they grow up.

Masculine feminism doesn't try to feminize men as much as produce beta males as a byproduct. Beta males don't know how to stand up for themselves and certainly don't know how to get sex from a tease. Masculine feminism aims to do this by marginalizing men and telling them to shut up (think about how Lenny Kravitz performed for only a minute and didn't even sing one of his own songs). Because football is no longer a masculine pastime, every other Super Bowl commercial now has a feminist message.

Why Katy Perry?

How did Katy Perry become the face of a halftime show that wants to socially engineer masculine women? Because she's popular and can be used as a Trojan horse. Katy Perry is first and foremost a sex symbol. That is why she prayed for big breasts when she was a kid. That is why frosting spurts out of her bra in her music videos and her first music video was called "I kissed a girl and I liked it". She gets attention.

But Katy Perry also embodies an innocent PG-rated image in order to appeal to younger girls. On the one hand she plays the sex pot. On the other hand, she plays the princess in a fairy tale. Is it any wonder that feminists don't like her, but can see how she appeals to a vast spectrum of the female sex, especially little girls?

Two years ago Katy Perry wanted the public to know that she's not a feminist, but she believed in the strength of women. The media got mad at her. Angry feminists said a woman's strength isn't in her sex appeal. A year later Katy finally issued a mea culpa, typical for celebrities who accidently admit they are not feminists.

> "A feminist? Um, yeah, actually," she responded. "I used to not really understand what that word meant, and now that I do, it just means that I love myself as a female and I also love men."

Shame on her for also loving men. She clearly has no idea what feminism is about. But that's OK for the masculine feminists who designed this halftime show. Perry played the role of the queen bee with Missy Elliot as the court jester. Perry was simply used to capture girls' attention. Then subliminal messages were used to prime the viewer's senses for what came next: a commercial telling girls to act like boys and not apologize for it.

The Goal Of Masculine Feminism

Why is Sheryl Sandberg and her corporate ilk in the media trying to produce masculine women? To create more corporate worker bees. By creating a steady supply of unisex machines, corporations can pay these workers less and boss them around. And in the modern age, corporations control the government through lobbying and campaign donations.

Thus, we have a way for government to control people. Sure, a small number of women will succeed by leaning in (acting like men) and climbing to the top of the social hierarchy. The rest will just be machines who fight with the boys for the same lowly wages. For every queen bee like Sheryl Sandberg, there are thousands of worker bees.

Conclusion

Here's a gender-neutral way to tell females they throw like a girl: just tell them they suck. Then laugh when they get mad and start screaming like a little girl.

Read More: Super Bowl Commercials Aren't Sexist

Friedrich Nietzsche

Friedrich Nietzsche is a philosopher who is trying to make the Überman popular again. He is without a doubt the Antichrist.

Why The Pursuit Of Pleasure Rules Modern Civilization

February 7, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

The red pill has awakened us to the state of the societies we live in today.

Yet the more you see the state of human civilization today (especially in modern societies), the more it seems to heading the path of the societies which suffered (or in worst cases, were eventually destroyed) in the past. We may speculate as to what went wrong which led to this present state, but an important analogy (and lesson) we can learn from to draw a parallel to the state of modern societies is that from the biblical story of Moses and his people.

An important analogy to the state of modern humanity

Moses is an important prophet in the Abrahamic religions, and according to the Hebrew Bible, he occupies an important position as a former Egyptian prince later turned prophet, religious leader, deliverer of the Israelites and lawgiver, to whom the authorship of the Torah is traditionally attributed.

When Moses returned from Midian to Egypt after attaining his prophethood, he performed various miracles with divine help: e.g. his rod transformed into a serpent which swallowed up the Pharaoh's magicians' magical snakes, the subsequent plagues which ravaged Egypt, and the splitting of the sea during the exodus of his people, which saved them from destruction at the hands of Pharaoh's hordes.

In spite of all the miracles he performed with divine help, one trait consistently revealed itself in the behavior of his people: a lack of true faith, or belief. Call it either ingratitude, or indifference, or a reluctance to move out of their comfort zones (or possibly even a defeatist Stockholm syndrome due to years of humiliating servitude to the Pharaoh), Moses's people constantly exhibited a lack of belief in him. Thousands of years later, the same lack of faith or belief can be seen in modern societies.

Just as with Moses's people, "faith" is the casualty in modern societies

The power of belief is the most powerful force influencing human behavior (religion is one prime example of that). Either by abundance or even a lack of it, faith in something or someone is what often drives humanity—for mankind has always acted according to its beliefs, which has primarily influenced its actions through centuries. In today's world, however, it is common to see modern men to live in a state of skeptical disbelief. Why?

Flawed laws, hypocritical interpretation of religion and deceptive societal doctrines have all failed the common man throughout the centuries – even more today—which further drives him into disbelief. Feminism, gyno-centric social indoctrination, and similar vapid modern social constructs which seek to undermine his identity as a man lead him to an scarifying abyss of skepticism, from which he finds it excruciatingly difficult to ever extract himself out—so as to learn to trust again, to learn to believe again.

But before delving deeper into this, questions which need to be asked are: Are having laws in general, bad? Or is anarchy on the other hand, the solution to modern society's ills?

"Laws" need not be necessarily bad.They can serve as beneficial limits to define and lend structure to a society, thus leading to its development on intellectual, economic, as well as cultural levels. Nature itself reveals limits or structures which lend to it balance.

A classic example would be that of the solar system: each planet revolves round the Sun in its own definite orbit which limits its movement. If there were no definite planetary orbits, a collision course would've ensued and we probably wouldn't even been alive today. The simile of these orbits are just like laws: meant to lend meaningful structure to our lives, and the societies we live in.

In the end, we all have limits which define what is "enough" for each of us. Even our lives are limited and finite. But laws (or limits) become poisons when they become shackles of hypocrisy to destroy faith, belief or trust. A common example is the state of the modern man. More often than not, he feels cheated by the same modern system of laws and doctrines he was raised to believe in – fighting an unnatural war against his own masculinity and identity.

This has led to the destruction of the faith of the modern man in today's world, where life is full of illusions generated by the hypocritical matrix he lives in. No man is immune to this deceptive assault on his beliefs; even the honorable self-sacrificing soldier.

> Everything a lie. Everything you hear, everything you see. So much to spew out. They just keep coming, one after another. You're in a box. A moving box. They want you dead, or in their lie… There's only one thing a man can do – find something that's his, and make an island for himself. If I never meet you in this life, let me feel the lack; a glance from your eyes, and my life will be yours. – First Sgt. Edward Welsh, THE THIN RED LINE (1998)

This realization he experiences then can lead him to either: choose to yield to the same emasculating modern social system, or choose to disbelieve everything (even if something might be true and good for him) – because believing itself has failed him. In a world where lies hold more power than truths, he then begins to see society as a despairing place where to believe in something could be a societal pretext to lure him into a snare.

But can the modern man be blamed wholly for this view? Nope, especially when the society he is raised in itself suffocates him with a deceptive environment of contradictions.

Imagine the moral resolve of an average man in a society which itself bombards him with messages which incite him towards instantaneous sensual gratification and degeneracy.

Not all fingers in the palm have the same size, and so does the sincerity and strength of every man's "morality" and belief when tested: some will eventually fail, and fall for the bait.

Such commonly seen real life scenarios are where modern societal laws and constructs hypocritically and constantly fail modern men, and destroy their beliefs – leading them to a world of never ending skepticism and disbelief which scar their minds and personalities forever.

Furthermore with the simultaneous promotion of degeneracy by modern societal constructs, modern humanity, after having its trust broken, lives in skepticism to laws in general. The sad thing is – even if a deliverer ever came with true laws to reform civilization – he would be shunned and constantly berated, just like how Moses was, due to the destruction of faith in a deceptive modern world.

The degenerate hypocrisy of the feminist matrix of modern societies has thus successfully influenced modern men negatively enough so as to destroy their ability to even trust or believe.With the death of male authenticity, modern men are raised to soldier against true masculinity, and become dispensable tools. It is indeed, a war against men – with men being brainwashed to fight against each other, and their own identities.

Mankind's "faith" today is more often than not addiction to comfort and pleasure

In The 48 Laws of Power, Robert Greene states:

> DESPISE THE FREE LUNCH: JUDGMENT
> What is offered for free is dangerous-it usually involves either a trick or a hidden obligation. What has worth is worth paying for. By paying your own way you stay clear of gratitude, guilt, and deceit. It is also often wise to pay the full pee-there is no cutting corners with excellence. Be lavish with your money and keep it circulating, for generosity is a sign and a magnet for power.- Law No.40, The 48 Laws of Power

Furthermore, he elaborates this law with several examples, one of which is the story of Moses and the Pharaoh from The Book Of Government Or Rules For Kings, written in the eleventh century. The story explores about Moses's impatience for the destruction of the

Pharaoh :

> Moses was impatient for God to destroy Pharaoh quickly, and he could not endure to wait any longer. So he fasted for forty days and went to Mount Sinai, and in his communing with God he said, "0 Lord, Thou didst promise that Thou wouldst destroy Pharaoh, and still he has forsaken none of his blasphemies and pretensions. So when wilt Thou destroy him?"
>
> A voice came from The Truth saying "O Moses, you want Me to destroy Pharaoh as quickly as possible, but a thousand times, a thousand of My servants want Me never to do so, because they partake of his bounty and enjoy tranquility under his rule. By My power I swear that us long as he provides abundant food and comfort for My creatures, I shall not destroy him. "
>
> Moses said, "Then when will Thy promise be fulfilled?" God said, "My promise will be fulfilled when he withholds his provision from My creatures.If ever he begins to lessen his bounty, know that his hour is drawing near."

The story further states that Pharaoh's destruction eventually occurred when he gradually reduced the provisions of his Hebrew slaves. The conclusion derived from this story reveals an important lesson on how to secure power and secure the submission of others:

> Nothing is better than generosity… If a man is rich and desires, without a royal charter, to act like a lord; if he wants men to humble themselves before him, to revere him and call him lord and prince, then tell him every day to spread a table with victuals. And those who have acquired renown in the world have gained it mainly through hospitality, while the miserly and avaricious are despised in both worlds.- from LAW 40, The 48 Laws of Power.

It could be argued from reading the above text, that probably the Israelites willingly consented to submit to Pharaoh, and constantly lacked belief in Moses, because they were accustomed to the provisions they got from the Pharaoh, in spite of the humiliating servitude to him.

However, one can replace the words "generosity" and "hospitality" with provision of "pleasure" and "degeneracy" in the conclusion to understand how this applies to the state of modern societies.

The addiction to (or dependency on) comforts destroys both the ability to persevere against odds and the ability to perceive the real value of freedom in the long run, and this could be seen in the constant grumbling of Moses's people during their stay in the wilderness after the exodus from Egypt.

> The Israelites said to them, "If only we had died by the Lord's hand in Egypt! There we sat around pots of meat and ate all the food we wanted, but you have brought us out into this desert to starve this entire assembly to death." – Exodus 16:3 (NIV)

But just as with Moses's people, the taste of pleasure and comfort is often seen to hold greater value than the taste of real freedom for modern humanity.

With the impetus of modern societies on the immediate gratification of the senses, and to abolish self-control, most people today willingly 'enslave' themselves to the pleasures they would receive – even if it could mean compromising on their freedom, honors, morals, and dignity. Very few would leave the comfort zones – which sometimes actually serve as their personal "thumbscrews."

> "Find out each man's thumbscrew. 'Tis the art of setting their wills in action. It needs more skill than resolution. You must know where to get at anyone. Every volition has a special motive which varies according to taste. All men are idolaters, some of fame, others of self interest, *most of pleasure. Skill consists in knowing these idols in order to bring them into play. – Baltasar Gracian (1601-1658)

Earthly and sensual pleasure is real, tangible, and believable, sometimes even instantaneously obtainable for some; while honor, self-control and dignity are often viewed as abstract and sometimes unreal concepts in modern societies.

Because sensual pleasure is more realistic, the matrix of modern societies continue to promise and peddle comforting degeneracy to stun the modern man today into ignorance and secure his enslavement to the system, while at the same time indoctrinating him towards the pursuit of pleasure – and sometimes even rewarding him with it.

> People are by nature changeable. It is easy to persuade them about some particular matter, but it is hard to hold them to that persuasion. Hence it is necessary to provide that when they no longer believe, they can be forced to believe. – Niccolo Machiavelli, The Prince

And once he's tasted the pleasure of comfort and believed in it, it's often difficult for him to unplug himself from it to pursue self-mastery to secure his freedom, especially when his society itself relentlessly indoctrinates him to relinquish his self-restraint and discard his options.

And after being sufficiently baptized by the modern society's social matrix, if such a man is then ever forced onto the path of struggle, he often grumbles just like Moses's people, wanting to return to his comfort nest of degeneracy.

> I know what you're thinking, 'cause right now I'm thinking the same thing. Actually, I've been thinking it ever since I got here: Why oh why didn't I take the BLUE pill? – Cypher, The Matrix

Is this not the state of comfort-loving, blue pill men in modern societies? How many of these men would speak up and rebel against an emasculating system which indoctrinates them unnaturally against their masculine nature and freedom yet still rewards them with superficial pleasure, an example being commitment from substandard women?

And just like the Pharaoh of the Exodus, the matrix of modern societies exercises a similar control over these mass of modern blue pill men – by providing them comfort and "pleasure" (from even used trash, even if it may come at the cost of male honor and liberty). This provision of degeneracy and superficial comfort forces these men to believe in the system, and abide to it.

Pleasure supersedes values, dignity and honor in the modern world – and thus the pursuit of pleasure often presents itself as a modern day religion, and while becoming a "belief system," rules and influences modern civilization more than ever today.

Conclusion

.....for we never know what is enough until you know what is more than enough. – William Blake

But the road to excess can sometimes also lead to the abyss of destruction especially in today's deceptive world of illusions, where men have lost the ability to perceive and judge properly, let alone believe.

The hypocrisies of modern societies has thus contributed greatly to the destruction of faith in modern humanity. The modern man walks today through the minefield of hypocrisies and deceptions that the matrix of the society he belongs to has engineered for him—to tempt him to yield to a life of shallow pleasure which would blind him to the reality of his precious existence.

With so many around him who have already fallen for the bait, it's up to him to take the red pill to realistically see and unbiasedly judge the world for what it is—without illusions—to reclaim his freedom and dignified identity.

Read Next: 7 Reasons Why American Culture Is The Most Degenerate In The World

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

7 Unorthodox Tips to Quit Masturbating

February 7, 2015 | by Aaron Simon | Link | Original Link

At this point many of us are familiar with the harmful effects of excessive masturbation, especially to porn. It’s even worse if you’re addicted. Here are some things you can do to beat the addiction:

1. Get off the computer at night

“No mom, I swear I’m just reading ROK”

Avoiding the computer at night will reduce the likelihood that you start watching porn and jerk off. Set a certain time when you will get off the computer, say, 9pm, then close your laptop and don’t open it again until the next morning. Better yet, leave your laptop in a different room altogether. There’s no way you’re going to sit in front of the computer fapping if it’s in the living room.

2. Replace masturbation with another habit

The best way to break a bad habit is not to simply try to stop, but rather to replace it with another habit. If you're like most guys, you probably masturbate before going to bed. So replace the habit of masturbation with something else like:

- Reading a book
- Meditating (the best option in my opinion, see below)
- Working on a side business
- Writing in a journal

3. Start meditating

Is this helping??

Meditation trains your mind to let go of thoughts you don't want to have. If you are meditating consistently, then when the temptation to masturbate arises in your head you can just let it pass by. You don't have to "entertain" the thought, and if you don't think about something then you won't do it.

What's more, when you consistently refuse to think about something, those thoughts will arise less and less frequently. So as you keep letting go of the thought of masturbating pass by in your mind, over time the prevalence of this thought will decrease and eventually it will disappear altogether.

(Find out more about how I quit masturbating using meditation)

4. Try to get really lean (start cutting hard)

When you start trying to get lean ("cutting" in fitness terms) by lowering your caloric intake, your libido will drop as well. If you also consume less fat, the effect is even more pronounced. When your body is in a caloric deficit, it is more concerned with maintaining functions essential to survival rather than getting horny.

One time when I was cutting, there was a girl I had banged a few weeks before who wanted to hook up again. However, I didn't feel horny at all and ignored her texts, and actually never ended up contacting her. I simply had no desire to have sex.

Obviously this is not recommended in the long term, and for health reasons you should never stop eating fats completely. But if you reduce the amount you are eating you will see a significant drop in libido. Combine this with a caloric deficit and you will feel much less horny; the temptation to masturbate will all but disappear.

5. If you “relapse” then be extremely hard on yourself

What was he using the cat for?

If you relapse early on while trying to quit masturbating, then beat yourself up really badly about it. While this might seem counterintuitive, what most people do is beat themselves up a little bit, just enough to feel bad but not enough to make them actually do anything differently in the future.

In this case you want to beat yourself up so badly that you feel really terrible, so much so that you associate feeling absolutely awful with the act of masturbation. Get angry, furious, and disgusted with yourself to the greatest extent possible. This will deter you from relapsing again in the future, because you’ll remember how bad you felt and won’t want to feel that way again.

6. If you “relapse” then don’t feel bad at all (forget and move on)

While this is the exact opposite of the above, the difference is context. If you’re on a good run of not jerking off (many weeks or a few months) and you relapse, then just ignore it and pretend like it never happened. By this point (several weeks or months in the clear) you are “coming out” of the addiction and there’s no reason to get upset over one slip up.

Don’t dwell on it, don’t think about it, and literally try to forget it inside your head. Act as if it never happened. Then continue where you left off and you will be closer than ever to breaking the habit for good.

7. Whatever you do—don’t touch your dick (under any circumstances)

If all else fails, all you have to do is make this your number one rule that you cannot break. No matter what happens, in any situation, do. not. touch. your. dick. You could be lying in bed with a raging boner, horny as hell, but basic cause and effect dictates that if you do not touch your dick then you will not masturbate.

Yes it can be hard, but no matter how badly you're addicted you DO have enough self-control to simply keep your hands off your penis. "Quitting an addiction" seems difficult and complicated, but "don't touch your dick under any circumstances" is simple and easy.

Even if you can't control your thoughts (again, meditation) you ARE able to simply not touch your dick. Make this the one rule that you cannot break, and you will be well on your way to never masturbating again.

Read More: The Benefits of Not Masturbating

Aaron Simon
Aaron writes Freedom and Fulfilment, a blog about self improvement for young men. Topics include lifting weights, getting laid, mindset, habits, productivity, meditation, and psychedelics. Check out the site and also follow him on Twitter.

The 3 Immutable Laws Of Getting Bigger And Leaner

February 8, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

There are literally countless articles out there on how to burn fat and build muscle.

There are thousands of different approaches… And hundreds of them are viable.

Everyone has their own preferences for nutrition advice, exercise selection, supplementation, and training frequency, to name a few.

But in this article, I want to go back to the basics. I want to discuss the basic three principles that everyone MUST follow in order to improve their bodies.The three principles that every good routine and every solid piece of advice builds upon.

1. Caloric manipulation

Are there certain foods that are more nutritious than others? Sure.

Does the amount of protein vs. carbs vs fat you consume affect your body? Sure.

Does it matter when you eat your meals? Yes, somewhat.

But ALL of these factors are a distant second to controlling your caloric intake. Without controlling your caloric intake you simply WON'T make optimal progress. Let me explain.

If you want to burn fat, you need to consume fewer calories than your body needs to maintain its current stature. You need to give your body a reason to burn existing tissue, and the only way to do this is to provide it with less energy than it needs.

If you want to build muscle, you similarly need to provide your body with MORE energy than it needs to maintain. If your body doesn't have enough energy to maintain its current stature then it's going to be awfully hard for it to synthesize new muscle tissue. You need to be eating enough calories to gain weight.

Finally, I want to address what will happen if you simply eat around maintenance level, and make no drastic changes to your weight. The bad news is that your progress will be slow. The good news is that the natural – albeit small – caloric surpluses and deficits that you'll experience on a day-to-day basis will yield equally small reductions in bodyfat and additions in lean muscle mass and transform your body over time… That is, assuming you follow principle number two.

2. Progressive overload

Progressive overload is simply a fancy way of saying that you need to always be increasing the intensity of your strength-training workouts.

You can lift more weight, do more reps, perform more explosive reps, or do something similar to increase the intensity… But you must do SOMETHING.

It doesn't matter if you use a full-body routine or a traditional split routine (although I prefer the full-body approach).

The reasoning behind this is that your body won't change unless you give it a reason to. If you continue to lift the same weight for the same reps, week in and week out, your body has no reason to synthesize new muscle tissue, regardless of if you're gaining, maintaining, or losing weight.

By increasing the intensity of your workout you provide your body with the stimulus it needs to:

- Synthesize new muscle tissue instead of fat, if you're in a caloric surplus
- Hold onto your existing muscle tissue and burn only fat, if you're in a caloric deficit

3. Long-term consistency

The final law of getting bigger and leaner is maintaining consistency over the long term. This means:

- Consistently eating the correct amount of food to reach your current goal of burning fat or building muscle
- Consistently getting stronger in the gym

If you consistently do these two things over the course of days, weeks, months, and years I guarantee that you will look better and better. You simply WILL get bigger, leaner, and stronger.

Having a perfect diet and being 100% strict in the gym for a few days, a few weeks, or a few months DOESN'T DO SHIT. Our bodies take time to build muscle and burn fat. You must grow to love – or at least habitually do – the things I covered in the first two principles above or you're doomed to fail and maintain your average physique.

Improving your body and getting bigger and leaner is not complicated. But it does require time and discipline. There's no way around that.

Man up, eat right, and lift heavy—day in and day out—and enjoy the steady stream of improvements that come your way.

Read More: 4 Fitness Myths That Are Pure Bullshit

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Men Are Portrayed As The Biggest Danger In The Modern Risk Society

February 8, 2015 | by Michael Mobius | Link | Original Link

The Lion is said to be the king of the beasts. With its lustrous mane, muscular frame, and general readiness for a scrap it has a reputation for both looking good and being the bad boy of the animal kingdom. But what of man? Isn't there a sense in which man is the true king of the beasts? As Shakespeare's Hamlet considers:

> What a piece of work is a man, how noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, in form and moving how express and admirable, in action how like an angel, in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world, the paragon of animals
>
> Hamlet Act 2, scene 2,

But while there may have been a time when this distinction would have been a cause for a beating of chests, that time is long over. In the leftist dominant paradigm of our times man is not the "the paragon of animals," but rather a dangerous beast, a predator who rapes, kills and destroys.

Just as white imperialists oppress native peoples and rapey men oppress women, the male science that created civilization and culture rapes mother earth itself. To the question posed "what is the most dangerous animal of all" the most votes went to the statement "yeah, man is definatly (sic) the most dangerous thing on this earth. Mankind is going to destroy this world".

How you want to be seen

The Risk Society

This pessimism about man's role in destroying everything he touches is at the heart of Ulrich Beck's theory of the Risk Society. Concerned by environmental catastrophes such as Chernobyl, Beck, who died in January , considered that reining in post-industrial society was a losing battle.

While once the main dangers we faced were from external threats like lion attacks, increasingly what threatens us today are the unintended consequences of our own actions in pursuit of industrial and technological progress. Such unintended consequences threaten society itself. Society no longer produces just "social goods," but in acting upon itself reflexively produces both goods and unintended "social bads." In this way society's main output is now risk itself.

When on 9/11 terrorists crashed planes into the twin towers, some thought Beck's theory proven. Beck thought that risk society became "visible where societies are exposed to risks which are no longer covered by any kind of insurance" and notably 9/11 cost the insurance industry $40 billion with respect to a kind of danger it had never been exposed to before.

Some commentators think that the insurance industry's response to 9/11 redefined the meaning of terrorism as a reality to be risk managed rather than merely countered.

Men In The Risk Society

As men we occupy a prominent place within the risk society, not least because the feminist left sees all of us as potential terrorists. In a society that is newly re-organized around the management of risk, any individual or group that can be presented as posing an unacceptable level of risk can expect to become the target of “robust” risk management.

After 9/11 young radicalized Muslim men are an obvious object of concern for the administrators of the risk society, but young men generally are also in the spotlight simply because they are men. Consider the pressure universities are now under to manage a non-existent “rape culture” on campus. Both their reputations and finances are at stake.

Over 50 US institutions now have ongoing Title IX sexual violence investigations in progress. Existing liability insurance may or may not cover claims and some are now taking out special insurance to cover campus rape scandals. The threat of civil suits must achieve what appeal to criminal law cannot.

It is clear then that the risk society can be manipulated for financial and political gain. Some have noticed the way in which the media have begun to use the words “terrorism” and “extremism” interchangeably. Given that organizations such as the SPLC tie extremism to anything they label “hate speech,” it is easy to see how blurring the distinction between terrorism and extremism can be used to construct political opponents as representing a risk to society.

One feminist group, for instance, produced a report commissioned by the Nordic Council that recommended banning criticism of feminism as a form of extremism citing the Breivik massacre as evidence.

How feminists see you

Constructing Risk

The operative word here is “construct.” One of the main goals of academic feminism has been the re-construction of our culture through discourse. The feminist gaze constructs and positions men as predators. The identification of a “war on women” now takes the specific form of “rape culture.”

By this reading male heterosexuality represents an uncontrolled level of risk. It does not matter what goods we produce in making the world a better place if a feminist-dominated risk society sees men primarily in terms of risk. Will we soon need “rape insurance” to interact with women and need to provide proof of our no claims bonus?

But the logic of the risk society requires progressivism in its turn to acknowledge its own effect on society, not least as it is arguably the hegemonic discourse in the west today. And while events like Chernobyl and de-forestation remain real problems, arguably progressivism itself, as a dominant force for change in post-industrial society, also needs to be robustly “risk managed.”

The Dominant Philosophy Produces The “Social Bads”

From the birth of communism onward, nothing has de-stabilized societies more than attempts to strong-arm social change in pursuit of abstract notions of social justice. Even if we ignore the legions of the dead and murdered, and the fact that jihadist terror itself could easily be seen as an unintended side effect of “spreading democracy” at the point of a sword, within the west “social justice” has produced tens of millions of broken families, innumerable damaged children with an impoverished sense of self, destroyed trust between men and women and arguably now serves as a dead weight around the neck of a buckling debt-ridden western economy.

Yet currently it is men who are constructed as “objects of concern” within the risk society. It is men whose natural sexuality is increasingly pathologised or criminalized, and who compared to women are imprisoned at a rate of over 20 to 1 in UK (and at 10 to 1 in US) even while feminists argue that in the name of equality fewer women should be jailed.

Risk society is not a good thing. It is a product of a sick, neurotic modernity that sees danger around every corner, and which when it doesn’t find danger it simply manufactures it. It’s a society where children don’t get to climb trees or speak to strangers and where neurotic rape-obsessed feminists encourage women to protest more the cushier and more cosseted their lives become.

But, unfortunately, we do live in a risk society. Given that fact, perhaps it’s time to think about re-directing the focus of its concern, shining a spotlight on the Social Bads that progressivism is producing. Maybe it’s not so much a question of the huntress becoming the hunted, but just of nailing shut the cat-flap.

Read More: The Reign of Useful Idiots

Michael Mobius

hails from England, but currently lives in Central Europe. He plays the piano and enjoys travelling.

The Rape Card Now Trumps The Legal System In The UK

February 8, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

On Wednesday, the chief prosecutor of England and Wales, Alison Saunders, released Orwellian-sounding "toolkits" to prosecutors in rape cases. Rather than distributing a pair of pliers for pulling out the teeth of the accused, these kits contain instructions to prosecutors trying to disprove consent. Saunders, properly titled Director of Public Prosecutions ("DPP"), announced the policy like a brass-necked Stalinist:

> Consent to sexual activity is not a grey area—in law it is clearly defined and must be given fully and freely.

As the Ched Evans case shows, the laws governing consent to sexual intercourse in Britain are as clear as mud. How else can a slag, to use the regional dialect, be found to have consented to sex with one man, and incapable a few minutes later of consenting to sex with another man?

The new shapes and sizes of the rape card

The new edict pinpoints two situations where a woman reporting a rape would be unable to consent. One is the familiar "too intoxicated to consent" of the Ched Evans case. The second consent-that-isn't is "where consent could not reasonably be considered to have been given freely due to the unequal relationship of the parties involved." The example is the "suspect held a position of power over the potential victim" followed by a list of such positions, including "an employer."

Police will have to investigate if a woman really had the capacity consent if she was "financially or otherwise dependent on their alleged rapist." Men charged with rape will be grilled in court on how exactly they knew the woman had freely consented. Alison Saunders is on a known crusade to raise conviction rates for rape. Like the prosecutors of the Soviet show trials, she likes to start with the desired result and work her way backwards.

A modern-day Vishinsky

So who is this Saunders character? A career lawyer who rose up the ranks of the UK's Crown Prosecution Service ("CPS") to take the top spot. She handled the second trial in the case of Stephen Lawrence, a black man killed by racist white men in south-east London.

The initial trial collapsed due to police incompetence and resulted in the Macpherson Report on police "institutional racism," full of cultural Marxist gems like the woefully subjective definition of a "racist incident" as one "perceived to be racist by the victim or any other person."

Alison Saunders, DPP – what you see is what you get.

Saunders launched the second trial on the back of Macpherson's demands that double jeopardy, the rule that once a defendant has been tried for a crime and acquitted they shouldn't be tried again, be scrapped. A legal principle of 800 years' standing was thrown out to give the public their guilty verdict. Saunders then pulled the Spectator magazine up on contempt of court charges after Rod Liddle wrote that the suspects had no chance of a fair trial.

The war on common sense

Saunders is willing to set aside principle to get a politically correct result and will do the same to fix her pet problem of "low" conviction rates. In a speech given while she was still in charge of CPS London in 2012, she came out with a list of "Rape Myths," one being, "If She Didn't Scream, Fight or Get Injured, It Wasn't Rape." Rape victims, goes the argument, are afraid of death or injury, co-operate with the rapist and specifically "become physically paralyzed with terror or shock." That scenario is now invoked to require men to justify how they knew a woman was consenting freely.

"Women Cry Rape When They Regret Having Sex or Want Revenge" is another purported myth which Saunders says "reinforces stereotypes" of lying and vindictive women and "re-victimises and stigmatises" the accuser. The implication is that you should believe women, since they always tell the truth. False rape accusations are nothing to worry about, since, "only 2 per cent of all reported rapes are false!"

Eleanor Defrietas, who preferred to kill herself rather than have her claims rape claim scrutinised by a jury.

Idiotic left-speak aside, the agenda is given away by an absence of thought for possible consequences. Meddling in the justice system is a zero sum game. Changes made to increase conviction rates will result in more accused men.

For Saunders, however, you can't make an omelette without breaking some eggs. Spinning as a fact that "many rape victims freeze rather than fight as a protective and coping mechanism," Saunders is creating a legal minefield where any sexual encounter can become rape—just because she appeared to go along with it, doesn't mean she consented!

The Procrustean bed of the jury room

Even worse, if the jury thinks the woman is crying rape out of regret or revenge, they are now responsible for stigmatising and stereotyping her. It's that classic SJW plea: "don't judge!" Fortunately the job of juries is exactly that—to judge a witness on their credibility, applying their instincts and life experience. This includes stereotyping, which is essentially an product of empirical observation. Feminist conceit, again, shows itself as limitless,

Feminists ordering juries to unconditionally believe everything a woman says is reframed as a benevolent "education of juries" about "sterotypes of women as untruthful." Like the passers-by of the Greek myth of Procrustes, independent-minded citizens will be stretched or mutilated until their views fit progressive GoodThink.

The other scenrio which the CPS is trying to propagandize, the unequal relationship rape case, is a potential black hole of rape accusations by women with a vendetta. Lawsuits for sex discrimination and harassment against male former bosses seem to have become routine for women in high-testosterone environments who get sacked (see here, here, here, here, here and here).

An accusation of rape might soon be added to that list. A woman freely and consensually shagging her way up the greasy pole becomes an oppressed victim of rape through the Marxist analysis of the "unequal relationship."

Risks and limitations of the new order

The good news is that Saunders does not make law. This guidance is for police asking questions in the interrogation room, and for trial prosecutors who will be expected to brainwash juries about "rape myths" (such as the offensive idea that women lie about rape). Jurors are still free and very likely to ignore lawyers telling them to set aside their own judgment in favour of fuzzy, feminist 'myth-busting."

The bad news is an eventual increase in rape charges, whether they get to trial or not. In the UK, the accused get no anonymity, while accusers do. More men will be charged with rape only to have their cases quietly closed later. It happened to MP Nigel Evans, who reported going "through 11 months of hell."

As an oppressed homosexual, he had more sympathy than Ben Sullivan, ex-president of the Oxford Union who was accused of rape. The 22 year-old white heterosexual was hounded by Oxford University feminists after having consensual sex with a girl who then regretted it because she was "supposed to be in a relationship."

Turning the justice system on its head

English King Æthelred issued a law in 997 AD that the twelve leading minor nobles of each district were required to swear that they would investigate crimes without bias

The Director of Public Prosecutions, Alison Saunders, is a public sector pole-climber willing not only to throw men under the bus to achieve her political objectives, but also to compromise trial by jury, a cornerstone of English justice since the time of the Viking occupation.

With all other crimes, lawyers take it as a given that the jury is trustworthy to deliver fair judgments. In rape trials, feminists want us to believe that juries become subnormal bigots who can't even be trusted not to be influenced by "stereotypes," which are presumed to be a product of human malice rather than collective, shared empirical observation. Something doesn't quite add up.

As feminists push to make making rape accusations easier and more consequence-free for women to make, British men should ensure they take basic precautions, such as those outlined at the end of this article.

I agree with Athlone McGinnnis on which consideration should come ahead of all the practical stuff, avoiding drunk women, knowing Game, and saving all electronic communications—become aware that false rape accusations are very real. And Alison Saunders would put away on one just to buff up her CV.

Read More: All Public Rape Accusations Are False

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

To Catch A Woman In Deceit, You Must Learn To Think Like One

February 8, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

AV8R's recent article is probably one of the most definitive guides to shielding yourself from the predatory female nature. With his insights I thought of my own experiences—and the mechanisms a woman uses began to become clearer to me. To catch a thief, think like a thief. By isolating her traits we can disassemble them and not only find ways to protect against them, but also use them to our advantage.

Emotion

Emotion is a protective animal communication mechanism, by which the frightened rabbits know it's time to run, or the hungry wolf pack works in unison to corner it's pray. It is of little use to an individual other than as a means to read other people. Good salesman, players, famous leaders, CEOs etc. use emotion to project their will onto others, while avoiding it's influence on themselves.

All emotion is essentially negative in its essence. Happy feelings often set up an over exuberance that leads to disappointment and even depression. A man must deal with his emotions by keeping them in check in real time. Bad experiences or even a cold mood from someone can cause a repressed state.

A woman uses emotional "vibration" to control, manipulate and get what she wants for herself. Emotions can be very powerful and a woman's ability to project a wide array of feelings onto a man should not be underestimated. While domestic violence is always blamed on the man, a man who is unable to prevent himself from being swept along in her storm of feelings is highly likely to become violent.

Perhaps in the future when emotions are better understood as some kind of radiowave transmitted between people, the aggressor will be seen as the one transmitting, not the one reacting. There have actually been experiments in this regard and certainly powerful leaders, advertising, music, imagery and speech are all used both positively and negatively to influence people's feelings. Watch a horror movie then kill the sound. It's all in the music. Emotions are literally being projected or vibrated at you.

We are tuned in by default as part of the herd protective instinct. Thus, a man must learn to not only steel his emotions but also process them and act rationally and accordingly – NEVER REACT – DON’T ALLOW REPRESSION – MAINTAIN FRAME. Then you can gradually translate the emotional signal into rational thought and take the appropriate action.

Men often say that women are impossible to understand and this is because they broadcast (animal) feelings, rather than communicate logically. It is your job to process those signals, prevent them from affecting you, not by repression, but by translation, comprehension, and action.

Beauty

Young women are beautiful, no doubt. It is ironic that in order to fully capture and enjoy that beauty, a man must isolate and neutralize himself from its effects. Many men, myself included, are inclined to avoid fully rationalizing this problem because they fear they will no longer be able to enjoy the feminine beauty. There is a solution, however:

Sexy females with big tits

By disassembling feminine beauty and establishing mechanisms in the mind to prevent its captivating and hypnotizing effect, a man is able to enjoy it in the confines of the bedroom. Only once she is enraptured in the sexual act can you fully appreciate her beauty. As soon as a woman is clothed and “back to normal,” the man’s force field must immediately go up. This is one of the reasons why porn, sexual imagery used in marketing, and even modern dress codes are so dangerous to a man—it allows him to enjoy the pleasure without ever gaining the inner strength needed.

Women are fully aware of their skills in this area and use interactions such as pillow talk, flashing some cleavage, and so forth to arouse the average man who is so easily persuaded to drop his shields. Disaster is only a few steps away from this man. He will do or say something and she will have him in her clutches which only leads to rejection.

The poor simp that can’t pick up a girl because he’s so mesmerized is in many ways better off than the semi-skilled player than catches her attention but later falls into her honey trap, only to wind up brokenhearted.

Biology

The woman's reproductive biology dominates her body. So much of the woman's system is required for her to incubate, birth, and nurture a baby that she can never completely get beyond her biology. In regards to sexual interactions she will be frivolous or evasive, because if she thought into the logistics of what amounts to an eight-pound parasite inside her for nine months and another year breast feeding night and day, in many cases she would simply forego it.

Today we have birth control, but technology cannot immediately overcome nature's instinctive programming.This is why women are carefree, spontaneous, and prone to childish frivolity. Nature requires them to be that way. Nature does plenty of damage to a woman who reproduces and it doesn't want her thinking into that—instead it gets her cooing about her lover or her newborn.

This why women can make very relaxing company for a man, but we must be mindful to understand that every advantage comes with a disadvantage. A man spending too much time in the company of women can begin to lose his rational edge; he can also lose a lot of time sitting about gossiping. Samson losing his strength was more a function of too much estrogen in the room, than haircuts.

Civilization

The woman is prone to run her domestication (nesting) instinct once she's in an LTR and this can rapidly shrink wrap a man's world into suburban tedium. The air of civilization is what she uses to hide her weakness and insecurity. She also has less comprehension of what it means to take responsibility for herself, since society has traditionally given females a free ride.

Social Engineering

