A busy man is not necessarily focused on social dynamics. In this technologically driven world, many professional fields require little social interaction. The blue pill wimpiness of modern day can be as much assigned to our technological world as it can to feminism, single mother upbringings, and false chivalry. The rise in professional PUAs charging for seminars is testament to this fact. Men know they can learn, but many simply forgot how.

A man must watch his behavior, especially around women of interest. A player will tell you that even the wrong “creepy” glance at a girl in a club will ruin any chances of picking her up. In this politically correct world anything you do or say may be used against you. It’s wise to bare that in mind whenever there is a woman in the room (for this purpose at least, they are all on the same team). An innocent comment overheard by her BFF may lead to gossip and a divorce suit in the making. The walls have ears and the female, while not as good at logistics and rational comprehension, is recording everything.

Performance, accomplishment and financial gain count for a certain amount, but even the wealthiest man can be brought down by a small social error. The social judgment is slow and runs over many months. There’s little need to get into huge details in this area, since it’s covered by game, sales, body language, positive mindset, frame, fitness, diet, appearance, and so forth. For a person to become more socially viable they simply need to make more efforts. It can be taxing for a man that just wants to roll out of bed and go to work in his overalls, or sits on a PC all day in baggy jeans and a T shirt – does appearance really matter?

How To Cope

A man needs space to prepare and also time alone to let his guard down. It’s my theory that the loss of privacy and ability to simply chill rapidly leads to the demise of many marriages. You can never fully relax around a women, until you have your cock insider her and she’s moaning your name. Frame, leadership, behavior, language, body language, appearance, even pretense must be maintained at all times outside of the sexual act. This of course is unrealistic 24/7 and a man should be wary to maintain his privacy.

Some writers present the impossible ideal that “game” becomes inbuilt and natural at one point, but a man that becomes all about presentation and social dynamics rapidly turns into a limp-wristed, politically correct loser. In the past men had their own bars and clubs where they could relax their language and presentation and operate in a purely male way.

The manosphere laments the loss of these things and the general female invasion of everything male, but by understanding her social skills we also understand exactly why she wants to rob a man of his privacy. By being aware of all the dynamics and weapons the predator uses, now we are better able to counteract them, even use them against her.

America’s Booty Obsession Is Another Symptom Of Social Decline

February 9, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Ayn Rand once wrote, “Show me the woman [a man] sleeps with and I will tell you his valuation of himself.” If this applies to American men in general, our nation is rocketing towards Gomorrah like a fat kid on a water slide. No less than an authority than the New York Times has declared that booty is in, with pop singers and movie stars like Iggy Azalea and Beyonce showing off their asses and music videos for songs like “Booty” providing a butt buffet for America’s simpletons.

This is not a good thing.

I don’t mean to trample on anyone’s preferences, but America’s increasing ass addiction is further evidence of our decline as a society. Not only is booty worship associated with primitive, backwards cultures, but America’s burgeoning butt cult is yet another expression of female narcissism. By cheering on the likes of Meghan Trainor and other ambassadors of ass, you are helping perpetuate the degradation of women into fat, self-centered sluts.

Ass, Class And Status

It's universally accepted that a man's preferences in female beauty are indicative of his class and attitude. Historically, ass fixations were considered trashy, because butts signify the primal and hearken back to our animal origins. Boobs were associated with working-class men (think the original Playboy), while legs were the preference of the upper classes because they signified good breeding (since height is an indicator of good nutrition and genes).

This was confirmed by a recent Pornhub study analyzing the types of search strings their sites get. The map below displays whether boob or butt searches are more popular in certain countries:

As you can see, asses are preferred in Africa, South America, and the Middle East, regions known for their crushing poverty and corrupt governments. The civilized, wealthy nations of the world, from Europe to Asia, prefer boobs. Egypt and Argentina, historically the most advanced countries on their respective continents, also prefer boobs. The U.S. is the only first world nation in the Butt column, and that's primarily because of our large black and Latino populations.

Looking at a state-by-state breakdown, we see the exact same pattern. The states where boobs reign are the whitest ones, as well as the ones with the highest quality of life, the least corrupt governments, and the lowest crime rates. Vote Ass if you enjoy paying 50 percent of your taxes to a government that can't even pave the roads or protect you from criminals, while your city devolves into a third world cesspool.

Those Phat Asses Aren't For You

So maybe you think my civilizational explanation is cracked out, or you just don't care about the fate of the U.S. But even if that's the case, there's still a very good reason to oppose the MSM's booty crusade: it's feeding the self-absorption of young women.

The reason why asses are considered low-class is because developing a big ass requires less discipline then any other female beauty standard. The butt is the only part of a woman's anatomy that improves when she gains weight. Contrary to what fat girls think, getting obese doesn't make for better boobs, because a fatty's tits are veiny, distended, and saggy. Absolutely no effort is required for a girl to get a big ass; perfect for a nation in which the majority of women are turning into cellulite-ridden hambeasts.

This is the most troubling aspect of America's butt cult: virtually all the ass anthems being pushed by the media are paeans of self-love. Take the video for Meghan Trainor's "All About That Bass" as an example:

Trainor is a fat white girl rapping about how she's fine just the way she is, how beauty standards that expect her to cut down on the bon-bons are oppressive, and denigrating women who have "stick figure," "Barbie doll" physiques. The message to girls is clear: don't work on yourself, don't take care of your body, and any man repulsed by your undulating stomach flab and toilet paper-infested asscrack is a meanie misogynist.

The same attitude is present in last year's other major butt worship song, Jennifer Lopez's "Booty." When that video first came out, I was talking about it with some friends and one commented on how anhedonic and unsexy it was. I told him that "Booty" wasn't supposed to be sexy. J.Lo and Iggy Azalea aren't flaunting their butts because they want to look hot for men, they're doing it out of narcissism: "You better worship my big booty, or else!"

Contrast these music videos to Sir Mix-a-Lot's "Baby Got Back," which ass-lovers point to as an example of how butts have gone mainstream. "Baby Got Back" is sexy and appealing because it was sung from a man's perspective, about what men liked. It wasn't even representative of black America's tastes, because the majority of attractive black women didn't emphasize their butts, even going all the way back to the sixties (NSFW link).

The current crop of ass anthems are by women, about women, and are about shaming men for not giving these women the deference they think they deserve. What you prefer as a man is irrelevant: big booty is the only item on the menu, and if you don't like it, you can starve for all they care.

Planet Of The Asses

It's fine to prefer booty, but the left never stops at tolerance. Gay rights were originally sold to the public with the "tolerance" canard, but in the year 2015, Christian bakers are getting sued left and right for refusing to make gay wedding cakes. Eventually, if you don't worship the flabby ass of every narwhal lumbering down the street, you'll be treated like you're personally jamming your finger down the throat of every bulimic in America.

Again, if you like asses, there's no problem with that. But the booty cult being pushed by the mainstream media isn't the product of what men want, it's yet another way to bolster the already inflated egos of women. Iggy Azalea, Meghan Trainor and their ilk are horsewomen of the female narcissism apocalypse, slipping poison in the ears of this nation's already slovenly, slutty, selfish girls.

Is Democracy Dying?

February 9, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

What form of government is the best? Which type of authority best accommodates the nature of man, and his aspirations for advancement, prosperity, and security? These are expansive and brash questions, ventured with some trepidation. As the poet Alexander Pope has said, only a fool would hazard such queries:

> For forms of government let fools contest;
> Whate'er is best administer'd is best:
> For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
> His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.
> [Essay on Man, Epistle III.6]

But as fools, we are not deterred, and will proceed. We take as our starting point one of the most underappreciated works of political theory from the Italian Renaissance, Aurelio Lippo Brandolini's Republics and Kingdoms Compared. This fascinating treatise, unpublished during the author's lifetime, was composed sometime between 1492 and 1494, and takes the form of a dialogue between the Hungarian King Mattias Corvinus and a Florentine knight and merchant named Domenico Giugni.

The king, Mattias, begins the discussion by posing this question: which would a man rather live under, a kingdom, or a democratic republic? Domenico, coming as he did from the Florentine republican tradition, at once states his preference for republics. Republics are preferable, he says, for three reasons. First, there is greater liberty in a republic. Citizens of a democracy are "subject to no one, and obey no one," while their counterparts in a monarchy are subject to the king's whims. Second, there is greater respect for justice in a republic. Laws are less capricious and more justly enforced; as a consequence, the "arts and disciplines" are more likely to flourish.

Finally, a government composed of the many is more stable than the arbitrary rule by a lone sovereign. Policies can be carried through with greater consistency, over longer periods, and are less subject to the inconstancies of the crown. (I.35).

King Mattias of Hungary

The king methodically rebuts each of these assertions. He beings by noting that the imagined “free voting” of republics is often an illusion. After Giugni’s winded explanation of the hurly-burly of the republican balloting process and its attendant demagoguery, the king notes, with a twinkle in his eye: “I see from what you’ve said that citizens are sometimes forced to say things they don’t want to say, and sometimes to be silent about things they do want to say.” (I.60). In practice, free voting devolves into little more than a sham:

> What disease could be greater, what faction more ruinous, than a situation where bad men can hold their opinions with impunity, and good men cannot hold their opinions without suspicion, and when no difference is made between them? The bad ones are permitted to hide their pernicious views, and the good men cannot openly offer their good deeds. What you say is “free voting” is little more than unjust oppression. (I.63).

By similar arguments, Mattias is able to show that citizens of republics are similarly unfree with regards to taxation, the legal system, and in the choice of magistrates. He concludes with this astute observation:

> The republic, I can see, is not free but rather serves itself; the better it is administered, the more it is harassed by servitude and unease. Everyone must watch out for the common good; if someone wants to be a good citizen, he cannot at the same time be safe or tranquil. (I.77).

Having disposed of the illusion of democratic elections, Mattias (Brandolini’s mouthpiece) then turns his attention to the administration of laws. It is a mistake, he asserts, to believe that governments of assemblies are superior lawgivers than individual sovereigns. All of the great lawgivers—Moses, Lycurgus, Solon, Minos, and Numa Pompilia, to name a few—were individuals, not legislative bodies; the best guardians of the law are kings, not venal politicians. Being far removed from the laws, kings are better able to judge their efficacy and weigh their import; and only a king can be as swift and severe in taking punitive action when needed.

Domenico, flustered, offers that at least republics have a better record of conducting commerce and industry than kingdoms; they possess a vitality of trade matched by few kingdoms. Not at all, responds Mattias. Commercial relations bring about as much evil as good, perhaps more; trade, he proposes, is overrated. Commerce is fundamentally actuated by the allurements of rapine. In the mouth of the king, Brandolini places an eloquent condemnation of exploration:

> What is this insanity, truly, of sailing to the Ethiopian or Indian Oceans to collect gems or pearls? What irrationality is this, wandering the whole world for the sake of gluttony and luxury? Why do you think [the king chides Domenico] that because we don't do this, we are detracting from the human race? We don't detract from trade, we don't despise society, but we are free of the unbridled lust for money. (II.27)

And in any case, did not the great trade revolutions come about through the actions of kings, such as the sovereigns of Portugal, Spain, or England? Domenico protests that the king has misrepresented him, but to no avail.

Domenico saves his best arguments for the assertion that republics offer more longevity and stability than kingdoms; power derived from an assembly will inherently be more stable than that flowing from a royal scepter. Mattias, of course, begs to differ. Factionalism and intrigue, he argues, multiply with the presence of political parties, and a state cannot have more than one leader at once; the supposed "balance of powers" in a republic devolves into a cabal of the most powerful to perpetuate their control over the nation. Rule by the many becomes something akin to "limbs without a head (sine capite membra)." Many men can disagree with themselves, but one man cannot (plures inter se dissentere possunt, unus non potest).

All in all, Brandolini's little book is a ringing defense of absolutism, despite his pirouetting around the less savory aspects of monarchial rule. It is certainly true that monarchy has been the most common form of government through history; equally true is that it has produced far more regal mediocrities than it has enlightened rulers. History abounds with idiots wearing the diadem and purple. Yet Brandolini manages to say much about the psychological nature of ruler and ruled, as in this incisive aside, relevant to any age:

> Citizens who become deficient in their observance of the law and good conduct, gradually accede to the vileness and ruin of the vices, unless they are corrected regularly, and cultivated like fields. (III.72).

"The three strongest things in nature," we are told, "are wine, a king, and the truth." (III.83). Yet pinning down the truth is the problem that always frustrates us; it is a moving target that requires an expert huntsman to capture. Democratic republics in Brandolini's day had only existed historically in the form of small city-states, where factionalism and intrigue could easily paralyze the workings of government. Brandolini makes no attempt to disguise his contempt for democracy as it existed in Florence and the other Italian city-states. Like Machiavelli, he looked hopefully to a strong, centralized government as an antidote to the fratricidal wars of the Italian micro-republics. Democracy in his day had a middling record, and had earned it.

Modern democracy has really only existed since the French and American revolutions of the late 18th century. Ancient Athens, often cited as a model democracy, extended the right to vote only to fifteen percent of its citizens; the remainder were disenfranchised laborers, foreigners, women, or slaves. Democracy is the most difficult form of government because it requires an educated and engaged citizenry. As mouths multiply and education declines, so do democratic freedoms.

Even modern democracy, as found in western Europe and America, seems to be slowly reverting to authoritarian models, under the steady pressure of technological changes and the loss of privacy rights. What has been most surprising is the ease with which these rights and freedoms have been quietly appropriated in recent decades by many supposed "democratic" governments. Many democracies of the West are hardly worthy of the name, as elections increasingly become a pantomime of oligarchs changing their seats at the dinner table, without offering the common citizenry a meaningful seat at that table.

Perhaps the proper focus in the modern era should be on the results produced by governments, rather than on their outward form. What matters is whether governments respect what Hugo Grotius (an early theorist of international law) called "natural law (ius naturale).” Grotius’s landmark 1625 study, The Law of War and Peace, held that every man, by virtue of living in a society, had certain basic and fundamental rights that his government had to respect. As long as these were respected and honored, it mattered little what type of government ruled over him. This was an idea noble in conception, and often ignored in practice.

The idea of the “monarchy”—or as we would modernly say, the authoritarian state—seems to be poised for a revival, assisted by the growth of technology and the apathy of the ruled. With passivity and acquiescence, the citizens of many Western democracies watch these developments, content to gape at their smart phones and frolic in the pleasure-gardens of a consumer culture. Brandolini may have been right after all.

5 Things You Probably Didn’t Know About Juicing

February 9, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article has been sponsored by Juice Power by Mike Cernovich

It’s difficult to stay healthy in the modern world. With xenoestrogens pumped into our body via our drinking water and plastic containers, forced sedentary lifestyles due to office jobs, and mass-produced food engineered to make us fat and depressed, sometimes it seems that there are no simple solutions to help us live a happy and healthy life.

Until now.

Can the solution to many modern health problems really be as simple as grinding up vegetables and drinking them? In his new book Juice Power, Mike Cernovich makes an airtight case that the practice of juicing fruits and vegetables confers serious health benefits in the short and long term.

Mike has compiled information from his Fit Juice blog and previously unreleased material into three well-edited, visually appealing, and easy to understand ebooks. Here are five things from the books that you may not have known about the manosphere’s fastest growing staple habit:

1. It might be the fastest known way to supply your body with nutrients

Nutrient consumption and absorption is a problem in today's society, where two thirds of the population are overweight or obese due to the consumption of nutrition-bereft Frankenfoods. Juicing may be the fastest way to remedy this deficiency. As Mike writes,

> As Jay Kordich noted, "Your body is a juicer." That is, your intestines extract the minerals and phytonutrients from the fruits and vegetables. Juicing gives your body a break by doing the work for it.
> Since the juicer has done all of the masticating for you, the plant's nutrients are immediately absorbed into your intestinal walls.
> The most efficient way to extract the nutrients from your food:
> 1. Juicing 2. Blending 3. Eating.

2. You can save lots of money by getting a better juicer

Unlike other products where you pay a premium simply for a brand name, spending more on a juicer actually produces better and more juice, an investment in both monetary and health terms. In the long run, your marginally higher initial investment will pay off handsomely:

> I know for a fact that a masticating juicer will give you 50-100% more juice from your leafy greens. Whereas a centrifugal juicer may only yield 2-4 ounces of juice from a large bunch of kale, a masticating juicer may yield up to 4-8 ounces.
> Bar none the best masticating juicers are the Omega brand juicers. Omega juicers come with 10-15 year warranties. They are high quality and high yield.
> The top contenders for best masticating juicers are the Omega J8006 and Omega VRT 350.
> These are commercial grade juicers that are made to last. Omega stands behind their juicers. If you buy a new juicer from Amazon, you will receive a 10-year warranty. (Breville only offers a 1-year warranty.)
> Buying an Omega juicer is a lot like buying in bulk. You pay more money up front to save money by not having to make several smaller purchases.

3. The nutrient explosion from juicing actually helps your body rid itself of toxins

Mike shows us the science behind juicing's myriad positive effects on the body and explains it in layman's terms:

> The liver is the organ responsible for detoxing your body. Although there are many "cleanses" marketed as liver detox systems, the truth is that your liver needs the vitamins and phytonutrients present in whole foods in order to cleanse and detox itself. The liver also needs amino acids in order to filter out those toxins.
> The most important foods for a liver detox are sulfur-rich foods (allium vegetables like onion and garlic and cruciferous vegetables like cabbage, broccoli, cauliflower, Brussels sprouts, and bok choy)

4. Juicing can raise your testosterone

In the supplemental ebook Juicing For Men, Mike writes extensively about how juicing can boost your testosterone and fight estrogenic environmental factors:

> Little did I know that pomegranates raise testosterone while also improving penile blood flow. Like beet juice, pomegranate juice is nature's Viagra. Viagra's little blue pill has become a byword for giving your sex drive a boost.
> But scientists have found a daily glass of pomegranate juice could also liven up your libido.
> Men and women who drank a glass a day for a fortnight were found to have increased levels of the sex hormone testosterone.
> A study on 58 volunteers aged between 21 and 64 found "significantly increased" testosterone levels in both sexes at the end of the two week experiment.
> Pomegranate juice increased sex drive in both men and women. It also improves their moods and overall mental health.

5. Juicing will give you an athletic edge

The most dangerous man on the planet juices vegetables. Coincidence?

Professional athletes spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on training regimens, specialized drugs, and peak nutritional practices to compete at the highest level. If you're an endurance athlete, combat sports enthusiast, or just a guy trying to hit some PRs in the gym, juicing can provide a serious boost to your training. Mike shows evidence that an invaluable asset might be sitting on the shelf at your corner bodega:

> Beet juice is so great for exercise that elite cyclists around the world have been using it for years to make them more powerful and to improve their endurance.
> The nitrates in beet juice increase vasodilation, that is, beet juice causes your blood vessels and capillaries to expand. Wider blood vessels and capillaries mean you have more blood flowing into the muscle.
> More blood flowing into the muscle means you have better "pumps" in the gym as well as increased performance.

Ideal for both beginners and veteran juicers, the books take you through the mindset behind improving your health, how to buy your first juicer, and recipes to help you start possibly the single best habit you can add to your daily routine. It also presents extensive evidence that juicing can fight depression, prevent diabetes, make you more attractive, and ward off sickness.

Mike also released two supplements available to the main Juice Power book, and he recently reduced the price to $14.99 for all three volumes including the excellent Juicing For Men and Juicing For Athletes. With the tips included on how to get the most economical juicer and optimize the cost-effectiveness of your juice recipes, the books will pay for themselves after just a few cycles.

Fight Against The Exclusive Portrayal Of Men As Drunk Drivers

February 9, 2015 | by Luke Maelstrom | Link | Original Link

You've seen the public service announcement before. An inebriated man stumbles out of a cocktail bar with a group of coworkers after having one too many. He fumbles for his keys and gets behind the wheel. He doesn't notice the police officers blended seamlessly into the surrounding buildings.

After swerving a couple times, the driver pulls into a DUI roadblock. Busted. The narrator proclaims "They'll see you, before you see them." The PSA ends with the crestfallen man in the back of a police cruiser, and the final stated admonition of "Drive Sober, or Get Pulled Over."

There are many others like this, including men getting pulled over with a comical amount of alcohol spilling out from the car when the driver rolls down the window. Others show men crying like a baby after getting arrested for DUI, with accompanying mugshots.

These ads certainly get our attention, and it seems as though they benefit society by discouraging drunk driving and improving road safety. Although, if you have paid any attention at all, you would notice that in every single one of these PSAs, the drunk driver is portrayed as a man. Half the population is being ignored entirely.

Now, if this were just one brief series of ads, it could be a pure coincidence that all the drunk drivers were men. But this has been a long running public awareness campaign produced by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA). Dozens of ads have been produced over many years. Not once has the NHTSA shown a woman driving drunk, despite the most recent FBI Statistics which show that 1 in 4 of those arrested for driving under the influence are women (and that doesn't count the ones that are pulled over but let go). They have no problem profiling and stereotyping men, while ignoring the danger that female drunk drivers pose behind the wheel.

A woman driver who didn't pay attention to drunk driving PSAs

What We Can Do

The NHTSA has a contact form. We can let them know how we feel about this lack of equality in the "Drive Sober or Get Pulled Over" public awareness campaign. Send a polite message to NHTSA administrator Mark R. Rosekind. Go to http://www.nhtsa.gov/Contact, and click the email link.

To fight back against the negative portrayal of men as drunk drivers, we should take a page out of the Social Justice Warrior playbook. Make it all about protecting women and considering them equal to men.

Babe, I got this, nobody thinks women drive drunk

Ask the NHTSA to stand with us in a true act of equality and diversity. Let them know that we are rising up against this potentially lethal ad series which doesn't deliver the same safety message to women as it does to men.

If women do not get this particularly effective form of messaging, we could be looking forward to a tidal wave of female vehicular homicide. Turning a blind eye to 25 percent of drunk drivers endangers not only the perpetrators of the crime but also our society as a whole. Equality means to treat women the same as men. It does not mean to ignore their potentially lethal actions.

But officer, I swear I only had like two appletinis

How We Should Reach Out To The NHTSA

Some recommendations for your letter to have the biggest impact:

1. Write that you are concerned that it is unfair to women that they aren't depicted as drunk drivers.
2. Thank the government for taking the effort to make our roadways safer.
3. Explain that exclusively showing men as drunk drivers could bias the public and discourage them from reporting female impaired drivers.
4. Document a high profile case of a woman drunk driver killing innocent bystanders, such as Margo Bronstein who ran over four people outside a California church in December 2014. Suggest that it could have been prevented had she seen an NHTSA ad showing a women getting arrested for drunk driving.
5. Ask if the NHTSA will embrace equality and make our roads safer by depicting women as drunk drivers as they do men.

If several thousand of us all take a little time out of our day to send a friendly email to the NHTSA, we can lodge a big strike against widespread demonization of men, and turn the tide on the plague of female drunk drivers. This is a government agency that is truly in an indefensible position. They just haven't been challenged yet. That's where we come into play.

If our letters resonate and we see a single woman depicted as a drunk driver in a future ad, we will have been victorious. Until then, let's crank out these emails. I recommend the polite approach I outlined above, but ultimately it's up to you.

12 Signs She’s Not Who You Think She Is

February 10, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

You’re putting gas in your vehicle one sunny afternoon when a car pulls in to the pump next to yours and out steps a fit, long-legged brunette your eye balls can’t tear themselves away from. She has a pretty face, no visible tattoos or crazy body piercings, and could easily pass for an 8. She slides her card and begins pumping her gas. Being the stone cold assassin you are you immediately open her and strike up conversation.

She’s receptive to your game and engages in a short but pleasant conversation. She seems kind and feminine so you number close her—successfully. Over the next day or so you run solid text game, and arrange a meet up. The two of you have a great time and agree to meet again that weekend.

The next few weeks go particularly well for the two of you. She seems to genuinely enjoy your company, she’s giving you regular sex, her femininity and kindness seem to be the real deal, and best of all your slut-dar hasn’t picked up any blips yet. Sure, there are a few minor cracks here and there but nothing to be overly concerned about.

The more time you spend with her the less you’re wanting to spend with other chicks on your roster. After a while you decided she’s earned LTR status and give her the title. This isn’t a bad thing because spinning plates can become tiresome and much of the time more trouble than it’s worth. You understand that while the game never ends, it’s nice to be able to relax on some level and concentrate your efforts on one girl for a while.

You've done your homework and read 25 Reasons Your Girlfriend Is Overrated because you know there are quite a few red flags most men aren't aware of. But you're investing time and resources into this girl and you want to make damn sure all your I's are dotted and T's crossed so you're digging into your red pill archives to make sure you leave no stone unturned.

After all, it's been a while since you've been committed to one woman and there are some pretty stark differences between LTR and ONS game.

Well you're in luck my friend, because I've got a dozen more "qualities" for you pull the emergency break on before you get your hopes up. This version's going to be a little different in that I will break each one down in two different ways:

1. What it could mean: This will describe the outlier situation. Odds are this will not be the case but there are always exceptions (albeit very rare).

2. What it probably means: This will describe the norm as it pertains to the typical western female.

"Hang on, Donovan. Your last article made it very clear that these 'so-called qualities are merely fool's gold.' All women are like that, remember?"

That's a fair statement and trust me when I say you're getting nothing less than 100% agreement here. But while we all understand the AWALT doctrine, this doesn't mean some girls (and by some I mean a minuscule percentage) can't possess a few authentic traits that increase their value as mates, however scarce they may be. Though they're few and far between it's very important to recognize, appreciate, and cultivate the honest to goodness qualities in your woman.

By the same token it would behoove you to stay on your p's and q's in order to ensure those qualities maintain status quo and to recognize and act accordingly if and when they start to erode.

So without further ado, here are 12 more so-called qualities about your girl you may need to rethink before bragging about them, or prematurely congratulating your buddy for snagging a “keeper.”

12. “She’s well-traveled”

What it could mean: She’s done some traveling and has been exposed to many cultures which gives her an appreciation for different perspectives, ways of life, and how lucky she is to have been born America. She has very interesting stories to tell which makes for great conversation.

What it probably means: She’s been to a bunch of spring break destinations and other party-like countries notorious for exploiting the overt sluttiness of American girls. You can bet your bottom dollar her notch count is exorbitant if she reminisces about trips overseas where she was no doubt fellating foreign phalluses most nights.

11. “She’s educated”

What it could mean: She didn’t attend a traditional four year college but has numerous certifications in early childhood development because she enjoys children and hopes to start a family soon. In the meantime she she makes her living by working in a daycare center. This hones her nurturing and child rearing skills which have the potential to make her a good mother.

What it probably means: She went to a typical four year college and got a useless degree which she likely earned by cheating or fucking (or both) her way to a passing grade. She did, however, pass Sex Ed 101 with flying colors, which was taught nightly at the Alpha Chi Alpha house (classes at the Beta Phi Omega house were cancelled due to continuous false rape claims).

10. “My girl’s got curves”

What it could mean:

What it probably means:

9. “She’s spontaneous”

What it could mean: She follows your lead and is up for whatever you are at any time whether it be an impromptu weekend getaway, meeting you in the back room at your buddy’s house for a random quickie, or a night on the town at the drop of a hat.

What it probably means: She’s impulsive, has little control over her emotions, and rarely thinks things through. When she finds herself in situations such as whether or not to buy those new shoes or new phone she can't afford, or whether or not to meet up with the hawtee she's texting while you're at work, she yields to temptation more often than not.

8. "We have sex ALL THE TIME"

What it could mean: She likes having sex with you and enjoys satisfying you.

What it probably means: She's either laying the groundwork to control your behavior by withholding sex (similar to drug dealers who always give first time clients a freebie to get them hooked, then price gouge them later) or waiting for you to "screw up" (incessant, labyrinth-style, unpassable shit-tests). As soon as you lose frame or show the vulnerability she nags you to reveal, her legs will snap shut like a bear trap.

7. "She can cook"

What it could mean: She is capable of preparing proper, home cooked meals for breakfast, lunch, and dinner. She rarely uses the microwave and is always trying to improve her cooking as the alerts on her phone are often "The Recipe of the Day."

What it probably means: Microwavable meals, box dinners that are "quick and easy and prepared in minutes!", and the nearest delivery restaurants are the extent of her culinary aptitude. On the flip side she just loves to surprise you with her gourmet hot dogs and oven baked fries.

6. "She has a sense of humor"

What it could mean: She's self-aware and playfully makes fun of herself. She occasionally pokes fun at you in a flirtatious way as an excuse to make physical contact with you or to get your attention.

What it probably means: She's a loud, brash, wannabe ball-buster who thinks she's funny because women she sees on TV and movies are rewarded for the mannish comedic behavior. This is also a typical projection play. She wants a man who calls her on her bullshit and is unafraid to make fun of her so she assumes the role herself thinking this tact produces boners.

5. “She played hard to get”

What it could mean: She knows her value and understood that being too easy would misrepresent her. So she channeled her natural instincts and innocently played coy whilst simultaneously dropping hints that encouraged you to keep pursuing because a) she liked you and b) she, like all women, loves being pursued and subsequently taken.

What it probably means: Her responding to your texts every six hours wasn’t her playing hard to get—she was playing musical cocks. Her long response time and delayed commitment was a tell-tale sign your that game wasn’t tight enough to secure a seat when the music stopped.

She likely chose you because the guys she responded to every 30 seconds fucked and chucked her and you were the only one still looking for a chair.

4. “She never gets jealous”

What it could mean: She knows two things: 1) she’s a quality female and 2) she’s holding it down as your girl. She’s a kind, sexy, feminine, submissive, woman who understands and abides sex roles and most importantly, keeps your balls drained.

She’s acutely aware that she is a rarity and isn’t worried about some purple-haired slut with a lip ring and a tramp stamp taking you away from her. When you do flirt with other girls in front of her (remember fellas, the game never ends) she doesn’t get jealous—she gets naked.

What it probably means: You’re not running dread game or openly flirting with other girls in front of her so she doesn’t think you’re going anywhere. Smart money says she’s got backup cock on stand by ready to be deployed if you continue to fail to generate tingles only the drama of impending infidelity can provide.

3. “She spends money on me”

What it could mean: She doesn’t mind picking up the tab from time to time because she wants to do her part to help you, contribute to the relationship monetarily, and ease your financial burden a little. She does this to express her appreciation for you and to let you know she doesn’t view you as a meal ticket or an ATM.

What it probably means: You’ve been banging her brains out for two weeks whilst simultaneously running extreme asshole and dread game to perfection. You dominate her body, her mind, and her soul. She’s addicted to you and thinks she’s “in love.”

Girls who fall head over heels this quickly are severely damaged and will do anything to keep you around in order to get those hits of euphoric ups and downs you supply to her. You are her drug and she gladly compensates you handsomely, both sexually and financially, for your pharmaceutical-grade emotional roller coaster rides.

2. “We dated for three months before sex so she’s a good girl”

What it could mean: She is a good girl—a high quality female with a low notch count (two or less). She knows her value so she doesn’t give it up to just anybody. She gave up the goods when and only when she was damn sure you weren’t a beta in an alpha’s clothing (read: PUA).

What it probably means: She was fucking other dudes on the side showing that, once again, your game didn’t warrant her sexual submission (this is what you get for paying for dates without getting the goods first). The only reason she started ponying up the poon was because her FWB pipeline dried up and she needed validation.

1. “She tells me she loves me”

What it could mean: She is verbalizing genuine appreciation for a man who protects her, provides her great sex, takes care of himself, and doesn’t allow himself to be emotionally manipulated by her. She is so grateful for these attributes she can only describe it with that magical four letter word. You, of course, know better than to reciprocate often responding with “I know,” or “Join the club” which only solidifies her feelings.

[image]

What it probably means: She’s throwing out beta bait because she sensed your scarcity mentality and wanted to confirm her suspicions. Tossing out that chum is the shit test to end all shit tests and if you tell her you love her too you’re finished.

So there you have it. A few more hidden red flags for you to look out for when you make a girl your main chick. I’ll say it again: Do not get your hopes up if you think your girl has any of these faux attributes. Chances are, she falls under the probably category.

Of course you don’t, sweetie.

It Doesn’t Matter What Women Think Of You

February 10, 2015 | by Drexel Scott | Link | Original Link

There comes a time in every player’s journey–generally towards the very beginning–when he realizes that women’s collective perception of him is not favorable. Recall that most women will treat a man the exact same way as most other women, which is entirely based on how their vaginas feel around him. In that light, the young slayer-to-be has come to the realization that dry vaginas around him means loneliness, bitterness, anxiety, anger and self-doubt.

Being a male and therefore capable of connecting cause to effect, the young man decides to alter his presentation, body, haircut, belief system, and whatever he must change in order to more usefully impact the vaginae of his peers. If and when he does so successfully, he begins to live a life of sexual adventure that most men can only relate to because they’ve seen it in porn. One-night stands, 15-minute pulls, threesomes and bondage regularly. All without a shred of real commitment. Yes, now the young man is surely living the dream!

But change is a law of nature, and so eventually the young man grows tired of it. Depending on how far down the rabbit hole he goes, he may even realize the utter futility of attempting to find a suitable LTR in the modern dating and hookup scene. If he goes all the way to bottom of the rabbit hole, he eventually hits the Truth that trumps all others he learned on the journey:

Women's opinions of you are completely meaningless. As mentioned, the only thing that interests them is your utility, measured by the frequency and intensity of vaginal tingles when they see or think about you (or, if you're a beta male, measured by the amount of money in your bank account).

Whether they want to sleep with you, hate you completely or utterly ignore you, not one of those opinions is truly based on your character, your values, what you've accomplished, whether you are righteous or wicked, or what kind of man you are in general.

Eventually, should you attain a certain level, you will come to find that you would much rather spend time in the gym, reading books, playing music or working on your business than trying to "win" childish mind-games with women who will sleep with you a few times and then either move on become difficult.

And this is the point at which your game because even more focused and efficient–because now you are living in an abundance of yourself, which is far more important than an abundance of women. Abundant with self, game will become the shortest possible path between two points, with no extra effort exuded and it makes absolutely no difference to you whether she's on board or not–so long as you find out quickly so you can either escalate or leave.

Then, once you have NEXTed enough women for slight grievances that earlier on your path might have caused you to engage in battle, an enormous weight will be lifted. The pressure to perform will be gone. It will be on women to impress YOU and not the other way around, and they can smell this truth in the air when they're near you.

It is a myth that you need money and social power to think and behave like a king. That is the wrong order of cause-and-effect. In everything, mindset comes first and creates the results in physical reality. Many call this the Law of Attraction, which is true but only one small part of what is true.

And then, brothers, once your boundaries are drawn within and around yourself—then you will realize your rightful place in this world.

Two Powerful Tactics For Winning The Culture War

February 10, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

It's probably obvious to you that our enemy had a bad 2014. Feminists, SJW's, and their totalitarian liberal buddies were on the ropes for much of the year and for the first time had to play defense to their delusional and incorrect beliefs. One of the reasons they've been successful up to now is that they pretended to be moderate. They simply preached the idea of "equality" and the cessation of violence against women. What monster would be against that?

But now many moderates are finding out that they wanted much more than equality. They have pursued censorship and hate while advocating for the removal of due process for men and their marginalization in order to make them second-class citizens. As they've made rapid gains over the past few years, their cry for equality has been rightly outed as a anti-man movement.

Since moderates tend to be reasonable—perhaps foolishingly so—in that they want to hear both sides of the story before making a decision, I believe they can be convinced of our correct views if we pursue the following two tactics:

1. Label the enemy mentally insane

Once a moderate finds out that they are being pressured by someone who has a host of psychiatric disorders, they are less inclined to believe them. This will be easy to do since the enemy has adopted transsexuality as their pet cause.

Let's be clear that transsexuality is not being biologically born with mutated sex parts from two sexes like a hermaphrodite. A transsexual is someone who was biologically born with one sex but feels they are another. This is a legitimate psychiatric disorder, one of the most severe you can have, because it increases your rate for drug addiction and suicide while leading to irreversible surgical changes to your body that leave you as neither man nor woman.

The American Psychiatric Association, however, has stopped calling it a disorder for the sole reason to "reduce stigma," a political decision that does not change the fact that transsexuals are grossly ill, exhibiting a behavioral pattern that you simply don't see in non-humans. The fact that narcissism is labeled a disorder while transsexualism is not should clue you in to how science is no longer being used in the APA.

You can make the argument that some homosexual behavior is found in the wild, especially in primates, but have you ever heard of an animal biting off its penis because it wanted a vagina instead? Yet they are letting transsexuals and those who support them dictate policy that affects sane men while trying to normalize their deranged behavior. You must call it out for what it is.

The video I did on Laci Green, a prominent Youtube feminist who suffered from suicidal ideation and had to be given medication so she wouldn't end her life, shows that most of these people are mentally sick in some way, with a host of serious personal demons that preclude them from coming up with public policies or mandates when they can't even take care of themselves without popping pharmaceuticals or mutilating themselves. Take your pick from this list—they likely have more than one conditon:

- Antisocial Personality Disorder – irritability and aggressiveness, failure to conform to social norms, consistent irresponsibility
- Anxiety Disorder – fear and confusion, inability to relax, constant worry
- Borderline Personality Disorder – identity disturbance, emotional instability, feelings of emptiness, inappropriate and intense anger
- Depression – feeling sad and depressed, not being able to experience pleasure
- Female Sexual Arousal Disorder – inadequate production of vaginal lubrication during sex
- Histrionic Personal Disorder – attention-seeking behavior, extreme emotionality
- Narcissistic Personality Disorder – need for admiration, lack of empathy towards others, disdainful attitude
- Obsessive Compulsive Disorders – disturbing, recurrent, and uncontrollable thoughts
- Panic Disorder – feelings of terror

People with mental disorders should get the treatment and medication they need (at their own expense) instead of trying to change the world into their image by legitimizing and normalizing their frightful psychoses.

2. Show how women are consistent liars who can't be trusted

We've long known that women are essentially overgrown children who are unable to take care of themselves or act in moral and virtuous manner when not properly influenced by a male figure. Even a dog, when let loose from its master, does not begin to go on a rampage of destruction like women do when released from their traditional role.

When left to their own devices, their true nature implores them to pursue base behaviors of narcissism, attention whoring, deceit, backstabbing, cheating, manipulation, status-seeking, golddigging, and violence against men. These qualities prevent her from being a loyal wife, fit mother, or even a barely informed citizen who knows more about geopolitical issues of the day than which celebrity is fucking who.

Give a girl the "empowerment" and "independence" to go to university and she'll pop out four years later with a million selfies on her smartphone and a notch count of at least 20 while being unable to come up with one good idea to advance civilization in a way that men have been doing for centuries. Without male guidance, a woman becomes useless in her natural motherly role.

This fact is important when dealing with today's rape hysteria. We must make it clear to moderates that women are liars who have been proven to lie in the past and who will continue to use lies against men for their own personal gain. Once the legitimacy of a woman's word is undermined, moderates will no longer stand by while their preach their myths of rape culture, patriarchy, and the unequal wage gap. They will be skeptical and treat women as they ought to be treated.

Whenever a woman alleges rape, tell your confused friend the following: "Women have lied in the past about rape, such as with Brian Banks, the Duke Lacrosse team, and also with the recent UVA hoax. Without clear evidence that can be used in a court of law, we must remain skeptical." Clearly show how women behave in a way to maximize their attention and validation for personal benefit while shaming, disparaging, and denouncing innocent men that have done no wrong. Call out bogus "1 in 4 women have been sexually assaulted" studies whenever you see them by highlighting methodology so flawed that it would offend even a Haitian voodoo priest.

The key word is "skepticism." Once you get people in the habit of being skeptical of any claim by a woman, their hysterics and rantings will then be ignored except in cases where true harm against them was performed (i.e. real rape, something that has been declining in America for decades).

Red pill ideas against the enemy is spreading rapidly, and you can now commonly see them in the comments section of mainstream publications (the ones that haven't removed them, anyway). I believe the two tactics above will quicken the pace in getting more people over to our side.

While we should not dilute our message or moderate ourselves to win these people over, we should help spread doubt that those who are trying to influence them are either mentally insane or flat out liars (commonly both). Hammer that into their brains over the next year or two and they will properly disregard the latest rantings and accusations that attempt to further escalate the war against men. While I don’t want to declare that victory may be within sight, I can say we’re inching ever so closer.

Evidence For Blue Pill Brain Damage Puts Modern Democracy Into Question

February 10, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

Democracy is widely accepted as being the fairest political system. Anyone who dares question its legitimacy is usually cast out as a fascist or a moron. Despite this fact, few people seem to understand how their beloved structure actually works. Democracy literally means power to the people, but as they hold the power, they also bear great responsibility, as the old maxim goes.

This responsibility comes in the form of coming to a collective understanding of the world's problems and working as a cohesive unit to solve them. For this system to function, however, the majority must work rationally to be able to tackle them. Quintus Curtius touched on this point from a historical perspective in his essay yesterday, and now we will look at its modern applications.

Collective irrationality

Recently, various articles have been written about certain topics, all of which have an underlying aspect in common: collective irrationality. In each case, there has been a fundamental rational error committed and its effects have multiplied exponentially as more people have got involved. Therefore, if the majority of humans are incapable of operating rationally, how can a system which relies on them having a fundamental basis of understanding the world function properly?

Take for example the UVA Rape scandal: the specific details of the case were not clarified properly before a verdict was made. Widespread outrage accompanied with mass-confusion could have and should have been avoided by literally a few seconds thought: did the evidence point to a rape, or not?

This is similar to the Zoë Quinn affair(s) in which the overwhelming and unambiguous evidence pointed to Quinn being guilty of sleeping with men for her video game's approval whilst in a relationship, yet thousands came out in their droves to defend her.

Unreasoned thinking is evident in global issues as well. For example, liberals continue to support Obama despite his sickeningly anti-liberal drone strikes and torture policies. People also continue to support the premise that CO2 emissions cause the ice caps to melt, even though the Antarctic ice sheets have expanded in volume since 2012. Blue-pillers continue to overlook very simple facts in their hundreds of millions.

How emotions override reason

The worrying fact about all of these errors is their simplicity. The logic behind these problems is in no way complicated or ambiguous, so much so that were the issues stripped down to their finest details; they could be resolved within seconds. It is far easier to work out whether the UVA Rape case was false or whether Obama is liberal than tackling questions on an elementary school reasoning paper.

It is wrong to suggest that people make errors because they are not intelligent enough. Even the simplest of human intellects is perfectly able to understand the cases described above. The errors arise not because the brain's reasoning circuits are too weak; they arise because they get overridden by the brain's emotional circuits.

In other words, blue-pill thinkers make elementary errors not because they lack the intelligence, but rather because they lack the ability to control their emotions.

Scientific breakthroughs in the last fifty years support this claim. Drew Westen, the director of clinical psychology at Emory University conducted a study which proves that the frontal cortex, responsible for rational thought, literally switches off when blue-pillers try to analyze information.

In his study, both Republican and Democratic party members were asked to evaluate information which threatened their preferred candidate while their brain activity was monitored. Westen discovered that:

> "none of the circuits involved in conscious reasoning were particularly engaged. But there was a rise in serotonin levels after the information was ignored."

The awful truth that this experiment reveals is not that the blue-pillers in this experiment were not thinking incorrectly, it is rather they were literally not thinking at all. Instead, it was the emotional part of the brain which was being triggered.

The subjects reacted to the information as someone would a shocking scene in a horror movie, or as primate would a snake. Furthermore, after they had ignored the information, they experienced a feel-good rush that one would normally expect to happen after riding a rollercoaster, not after analyzing facts and figures. Stefan Molyneux elaborates on this phenomenon in his video:

Blue pillers' brains are in a pre-philosophical state

The ignoring of information and emotional reactions observed in the test subjects are the same processes which occur in blue-pillers across the globe. The UVA Rape protestors' emotionally react to words such as "rape" and "violence," triggering a wide range of irrational emotions and prejudices and coming to an incorrect conclusion after no thinking has taken place.

The Obama supporters are similarly responding to his skin colour and handsome face as opposed to looking at his statistics. Emotions override reason in each case.

This is proof that the human brain has developed very little since its reptilian past, despite our firm belief that we have made great evolutionary steps since our primitive roots.

Reasoned thinking has simply not been important to our survival: historically, we only needed to react quickly to fears and impulses to survive and reproduce; the cavemen who sat and pondered about their predators all died out. Humans cannot override hundreds and millions of years of evolutionary brain development.

The worst part about these conclusions is the fact that despite these results, we continue to believe that we are in fact philosophical and reasoned when we simply aren't. We have constructed massively complex and interdependent systems which rely on our capability to be rational thinkers.

The population has grown so large and technology so advanced that a basic error in judgement can have extreme effects: simply look at the drunken oil futures selling incident or MF Global. How can we expect to avoid errors like these if we aren't even capable of working with even the very simplest of facts and figures?

Democracy = Rule by the blue pill

Let us return to the original issue of democracy. Can it really be functional if the people are physically incapable of thinking? In our current system, any transgression by the government is acceptable as long as the majority of people accept it, no matter how immoral it is.

Democracy legitimizes stupidity. As the UVA Rape case and the Quinn affair have shown, even so-called "smart" people will believe the most ludicrous of claims without evidence, just as long as it is presented in a way that appeals to their emotions.

Democracy would be a perfectly fair system if the world had no problems which require rational thinking to solve. However, this is simply not the case. Democracy is not adequate to tackle the problems of massive debts, declining birth rates, and peak oil because the majority of people are not capable of thinking rationally.

In today's democratic system, the tiny minority of red pill thinkers have substantially less power than the mass of Obama supporters, global warming enthusiasts, and the idiots who support Sarkeesian, Sulkowicz, Quinn and co.

We must therefore ask ourselves the question: is the right to vote really worth anything if it is offset against an irrational majority?

Embrace Your Local Sausage Fest

February 10, 2015 | by Tony Moze | Link | Original Link

Whenever I went out for some social time with my boys, it almost always seemed there was an objective. “We gotta get ass tonight,” one of my boys would say. “If I don’t get chicks’ numbers tonight, I am going to be pissed the fuck off,” said another. “This better not be a sausage fest. If there is one, I am fucking leaving!” said the third anxiously.

It seemed to me that having fun was based on getting with a girl. Out of all the many things that could exist at the party, be it good food, cocktails, a good DJ, free prizes, a chance to get on stage and do an impromptu performance, and overall fun, they believed that their happiness could only occur if it was female-based.

I say, whenever you are at a party or social event, gentlemen, embrace the chorizo sausage fest. Stop running away from it because you may miss out on an opportunity to learn from those who will help you advance in your life.

Why

It takes men to understand and help out men. The great Quintus Curtius from ROK stated in an article, “There is no better school of instruction for our own lives than in learning about the lives and trials of great men.” When I have attended events where there were majority men, instead of run out the door, I embraced it and saw it as an opportunity to network and learn from them.

I have met CEOs and entrepreneurs of all ages. They have all brought something interesting to the table. They have taught me the power of belief, how to start a business and be better resourceful with my money, or how to be a leader, learning the mannerisms of the wealthy. It was these men who I learned alphadom.

Places

I started to frequent male dominated places. From barber shops to Bourbon tastings to members-only cigar clubs, these places gave me the opportunity to meet some top brass people of America. A great time to sample some bourbon to add to your home bar, taste the array of cigar types, and converse with men about serious to not so serious things.

These are great places to unwind and enjoy bonding with fellow masculine men. Some of these places only asked for a $10 fee, while others allowed entrance provided you bought a cigar in-store.

What I learned

Through these interactions I have learned camaraderie and self-improvement. I learned self reliance, confidence, how to converse better, starting and maintaining a business and learning to deal with women. You get a global sense of knowledge when interacting with men, especially men of high caliber.

Conclusion

If you find yourself at a social event with a bunch of guys, don’t leave, but rather embrace the chorizo fest. See it as a time to learn from other men, maybe their flaws, insecurities and strengths. You might have been chasing women too often, leaving at any sign of too much sausage. Maybe you have had your fair share of ass for the week.

Take a break, and see the situation for what it is. Stop and embrace those who represent you, which is your masculinity. Hanging around women too often will only socially reinforce you to decrease in your masculine nature. Sometimes you need a change of pace to recharge your masculine essence. So go ahead, bond with a group of men.

You need to maintain what you were born with. Plus, you might learn a thing or two.

Beware Of The Silver Digger

February 10, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

> "I ain't saying she's a gold digger" (but she'll squeeze a nickel at a time.)

Everyone has heard of the term gold-digger to the point that women operating in this mode are now being socially shamed and their tactics disabled, at least to some extent. Even feminists are apt to have a go at the chick pouting her cleavage to land a wealthy whale.

The silver-digger is a term I coined to describe another sort of women who's endgame is far more subtle. I later discovered it actually exists, so I obviously tuned into some group consciousness right there. A wealthy guy with high social standing can most afford to take on a trophy wife and pay the penalties. However, a silver-digger operates a more cunning plan that can effect anyone.

Initially she might seem like a real unicorn. She's modest, doesn't want you spending too much time or money on her and is open about enjoying sex. Attempts to upgrade her status in your life, especially if it involves material gains, are often met with surprise or her declining. "Don't do it just for me," she'll say. What a great gal you think—low maintenance.

Like many women, though, the words coming out of her mouth don't match her endgame. The false modesty is designed to relax your guard. Let's say you invite her on a relatively costly weekend away. She declines, by saying she doesn't want you spending money on her. By constantly downgrading herself, she does several quite clever things:

1. Makes you open to having her around casually, allowing her to invade your world by stealth. "She's easy and amenable, I can do less to impress (or so you think)." Instead of a weekend away, now she's around at your place, where she gains much more information (and power) over you.

2. She declined the holiday but she will capitalize on that down the track, by getting whatever she wants in return for denying your ideas. She knows what you are up for, now it's just a question of getting what she wants.

3. She decreases and shrink wraps your world. You wanted to go on an expensive trip for yourself, not just for her. You were happy to take her with you, but now you end up not going at all and later on, she'll put on you for something more modest that she wants.

“Let’s just stay home,” she says, and what man would decline a weekend at home in bed with free pussy (If only he knew the real costs!)?

4. If she sees you modify your plans for her, now she knows she has the remote control for next time and she’ll switch it on with the “poor little me.” She’s turned it around and made it all about her, your needs are irrelevant.

5. You will end up doing things for her, because “she’s so modest” – and these might be activities you really don’t have the time of day for. Be warned: small costs add up.

6. She loves to see you frustrated, thwarted, and blocked because it gives her more control—now you need her to console you.

The long con

While the gold-digger makes no real effort to hide the fact that she’s out for material gains (not entirely a dishonest relationship), the silver-digger is playing a long term game of taking power from you. By projecting a false modesty and undermining your ideas, offers and plans, she is able to impose her own, whilst limiting and restricting your world. The silver-digger isn’t after a $10,000 diamond ring. “Oh don’t buy that for me,” she’ll say, “I hate diamonds.”

“Great!” you think to yourself, “low maintenance, easy going, a real catch.” But now you are relaxed and buying her dinner. $5 slips your wallet for a bus home because she’s short of change. She’s captured your nice side AND she knows it. Silver-diggers are good at using the friendzone, while being a sex buddy at the same time. The gold-digger wants to party all night and have a ball, but her modest Cinderella sister must be home by midnight, all tucked up in bed with yours truly.

Beware the cute easy-going, low maintenance girl that runs on high levels of melodrama and emotion. A gold-digger might only be a 6 or 7, mutton dressed as lamb, but a silver-digger can be a solid 8. A silver-digger will never ask for money or gifts, but she’ll always want a loan, help, or your time. Until it’s her birthday and then you better dance like a performing seal. A silver-digger is not in it so much for the money, but for the control.

Silver-diggers will deliberately hit on hard-working men so they can divert the man's energies into their own designs. You don't have to be wealthy to pick up a silver-digger and in fact this girl is the typical "blues" that the old bluesmasters used to sing about. Where a gold-digger will leave you if you go broke (fair enough really), a silver-digger will drive you broke by slowly dragging your life down to her level. Having you on minimum wage and doing nightly house chores is fine by her. She has control.

Gold brings warmth and a genuine material exchange to the interaction, but silver is always cold, prone to tarnish and it's value a pretense. Silver is many times more common (I'd say 30-40% of women run this game) which is far more easily over looked—interestingly most silver is mined in tandem with gold, and thus a silver-digger is by default highly likely to be gold-digging too, if only at a middle class level.

Gold-digger skillfully pans for nuggets, while silver-digger strip mines.

How did Joe the plumber wind up mortgaged to the hilt in suburban hell?

The silver-digger is out to create a co-dependent scenario where you come running at her beck and call. Eventually you simply can't leave her because so much of your world is tied up in hers. This takes quite a period of time involving a subtle siege warfare on your independence.

Let's say you get into an LTR with this girl. She'll decline you buying her a car, but now you have to drive her. She'll decline the credit card that you can monitor and put a monthly limit on, but hit you up for pocket change and $20 bills. She'll decline the iPhone on your contract but now you can't easily communicate because her prepaid is low on credit. It's all a put up job to frustrate and limit your world. Later she'll take the double.

The manosphere complains bitterly of narcissistic women— these are easy to spot, where the co-dependent silver-digger is engaging. She's helpful and caring (at least superficially), but she has more of a shopping list than her gold-digging sister and much of it can't be paid with cash. It involves you, your time, her power over you AND your world sinking into a narrow minded poverty-mentality relationship.

Silver-diggers being so co-dependent are also difficult to break up with. They can often be found switching the sex and "love" back on like a tap, and are able to change moods accordingly. They are highly manipulative and insecure people, who feel they deserve better, but don't know how to get it; wolves in sheep's clothing. As amenable as she seems, she's not only expecting you to provide all the benefits but help her enjoy them too – and only the way she wants. If you notice:

- Sex is more about what she wants.
- She constantly tries to steer your activities and time with false modesty.
- You offer her things that make both your lives easier, but she declines.
- She says she wants a 'loan' or – 'I'll pay you back'.
- Her friends are way fatter and uglier than she is (ie. she's very insecure).
- Constantly relies on ugly male orbiters, white-knights etc. often with 'poor little me' stories. Casual targeted drama is her BFF.
- Is so engaging and friendly, but somehow never quite co-operates, often by stalling with false promises, or trying to wrestle the lead off you.

…then she's probably a silver-digger. Silver-diggers are also prime material for 'accidental' pregnancies, another way to get you at her command.

Platinum or titanium is what you want, gold if you must. Aluminum or stainless steel if nothing else can be found. But stay away from silver. It's a poor man's gold and a road to ruin. Throw it down the wishing well where it belongs.

You Have To Learn To Love Rejection

February 11, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

If your ambition is to get good with girls, there's one immutable law of game that you must recognize and accept right now – you will face rejection.

Unfortunately, even for the most experienced and best-looking players, rejection is simply an integral part of the process.

People have a natural tendency to avoid situations and feelings that are uncomfortable. If you put your hand in the fire, it's going to hurt. Therefore our inclination is to protect ourselves as far as possible from adversity.

There's no two ways about it – rejection is painful. When you walk up to a smoking hot girl, say hi and she ignores you, mumbles something and walks off, or worse insults you to your face, then you will feel terrible – at first. Why? Some game theorists link it back to our tribal requirement for acceptance. To get knocked back in prehistoric times meant excommunication from your social set, violence, or even death.

Of course, in the vast majority of normal interactions we face none of that today. But rejection remains a deep fear of many who are new to game, and even persists to some extent in those who've been macking chicks forever.

This is because when you approach a woman you are putting yourself on the line in a fundamental manner that is extremely unusual in any other area of life. Essentially, you are presenting yourself to another person and asking them to judge your fitness as a sexual prospect, even as a human being.

We live in a society where we are increasingly protected from taking personal responsibility. "Team work" is the norm, and if the team fails, then it's not entirely your fault, right? PC culture with its insistence on egalitarianism posits that everyone is equal and that any failure is not the fault of the individual, but must be attributed to circumstances beyond his control – his upbringing, his social background and so on.

Suckling on the teat of these comfortable notions for most of our lives, we are encouraged to believe that when we don't measure up it is someone else's fault.

The Sexual Marketplace

Unfortunately, in the cruel arena of the sexual marketplace, there is nowhere to hide. Some people say that rejection in game is not personal. I am inclined to disagree. I think it is personal in many cases. True, she could be married or simply a bitch, but generally speaking if a girl turns you down, she does so based on the manner in which you present yourself – your personality, your looks, your dress sense. Your degree of masculine dominance – or lack thereof. You put yourself forward to be judged and you were found lacking.

Fortunately, the good news is that most of these things are within our control. If you're out of shape, go to the gym. If your verbal game sucks, take an improv class. If you lack style, book an appointment with a personal shopper. And so on. These measures will improve your chances. But the law of averages being what it is, you will still face knock backs. Maybe you're just not her type.

The point of this article is not to give you a pep talk – I've already done that here. The point is simply to make it clear that rejection is not only an inevitable part of the process, but it is also a desirable one. You should be facing rejection – you should be getting rejected every day. It is only through doing so that your game will improve, and by racking up the numbers that you will meet more women who are into you.

Knowledge is no substitute for action. You can read a hundred books and have learned discussions online spouting theory, but in the end, true game is putting yourself on the line. If you go to a club, stand around with a drink talking to your wings, and make a couple of half-assed, "hey, are you having a good night"-style "approaches" then you're not really putting yourself on the line. You're making the minimum effort.

What you need to be doing is walking up to girls displaying confident masculine dominance with the clear subtext that this is a man-to-woman interaction. You need to push for tangible outcomes – make-outs, phone numbers, sex. This is truly risking rejection as a man, this is putting yourself on the line, this is game. If she still turns you down, then fine, nothing lost and at least you've been congruent with yourself. You need to get to a mental place where you relish the challenge of being judged – where you come to crave the high-wire risk of loaded sexualized interactions.

Approach like you mean it, and approach frequently. These are the iron rules of Troy. You have to learn to love rejection. How? By recognising that by putting yourself on the line unequivocally, and by taking the greatest risks, you will achieve the greatest rewards. You may get knocked back, but at least it will be on your own terms. Anything less isn't game but trolling, wasting both your time and hers.

7 Ways To Step Your Game Up

February 11, 2015 | by Demitrius Rex | Link | Original Link

In your quest to become the best man that you can be in all areas of life (including game), I have distilled many of the best practices in the manosphere down to seven strategies.

These strategies were chosen for their synergistic effects on one another. By improving ones financial standing, physical appearance, communications skills, and subject matter mastery alone, the other aspects of ones life are noticeably improved.

1. Develop a side hustle

In this age of global economic uncertainty, relying on a job as your sole stream of income is a dangerous proposition. You will forever be at the beck and call of “the boss,” and at the mercy of economic forces that can change the employment landscape in a moments notice.

Do not make the mistake of relying on a job to secure your future. Your military enlistment will one day end. Your company will one day go out of business. The economy will tank and jobs will be lost (again).

Having a side hustle—a stream of income that you create independent of your primary occupation—grants you a measure of insurance against these forces while increasing your disposable income and net worth.

Over time, your side hustle can grow into its own small empire that grants you the freedom to live life on your own terms with your own schedule. With so many free resources available, there is no excuse not to start building your empire immediately.

2. Train your body with a purpose

Needless to say, exercise is mandatory for any man seeking self improvement. However, the goal of going to the gym in order to look good is shortsighted. Cranking out rep after rep of heavy lifts and doing triple digit situp sets might make you look good, but exercise alone is not a replacement for developing ability.

For years I spent hours in the gym bulking up. While I scored a number of lays from my physical gains, I felt sluggish, slow, and stiff for most of the day. I changed things up by joining a boxing gym to develop the ability to defend myself if needed. The results were spectacular. I had more energy, a well honed physique, and the confidence of knowing I could hold my own against a potential adversary. That last point increased my inner game more than the size of my biceps ever could.

Take up boxing, mixed martial arts, or practice functional strength training and put that muscle mass to work.

3. Be the best dressed man that you know

Lets face it, we live in a world where looks matter. Until you open your mouth, your appearance is the only thing the world can judge you on. Your appearance is a statement of value to the world and more importantly to yourself, so when you look good, you feel good and both your performance and bearing reflect it.

In order to communicate your true value to the world around you, strive to be the best dressed man that you know. Learning to dress well is a skill like all others that can be acquired. Start with versatile wardrobe staples that match well with almost anything — basic items like white shirts, dark blue jeans and grey sweaters.

Many men think they have to be on top of all the latest trends to become more stylish. However, when you start out, developing your own style is vastly more important. Once you figure out what image you want to portray, you can start adding trends that will work with that image.

Another misconception is that a large wardrobe is a better wardrobe. The opposite is actually true. Avoid filling your wardrobe with lots of clothes, thinking this will offer you variety. You won't need lots to have a great arsenal of stylish outfits. Shoot for quality over quantity.

As your side hustle yields more disposable income for you and you become better at spotting value, you can experiment with trends and interesting pieces that set you apart.

4. Develop mastery over a subject

Robert Greene's must-read book Mastery has been the subject of a number of articles here at ROK, and for good reason—the pursuit and development of great skill drives every man worth his salt.

In a world where being a Jack-of-all-Trades is the status-quo, gaining mastery over your area of focus will place you above and beyond the layman. Not only will you command more adoration from the women around you, but you will also garner the respect of those you serve as customers of your side hustle.

For example, When getting your car fixed, do you prefer a master mechanic or someone looking under the hood for the first time? If the cost were the same, would you seek out the master or the apprentice? When given a choice we automatically pursue and pay the more skilled individuals.

5. Never complain. Never explain.

Complaining and explaining are hallmarks of an inferior man. To complain is to resort to the only means the powerless have to express their displeasure. The way of the superior man is to take ownership of the issue at hand and take measures to correct it. Likewise, the superior man need not resort to explaining himself unless he is teaching others. If those around you cannot trust your behavior, then you have yet to let your results speak for themselves.

On the subject of a man's words: Word play is a form of foreplay, and every man should have command over his native language. This is not to say you should bludgeon the women you meet with million-dollar words packed into every sentence. Rather, subtly intermingle interesting and rarely used words into everyday conversation.

Stepping up your vocabulary will set you apart from the average slack-jawed monosyllabic beta. Commit yourself to learning and adding a new word to your vocabulary daily. This guidance applies to learning and speaking foreign languages as well.

6. Live an Epic Life

In the early days of the pickup community, neophytes were encouraged to tell stories that demonstrated their value as fun, adventurous men worthy of the adoration of every woman within earshot. As a shortcut to actually living an epic life that produces these stories, many would instead fabricate or memorize stories from other members of the community in an attempt to pass themselves off as men of high value.

Understand this: There are no shortcuts to living an epic life. Telling other people's story in lieu of your own does nothing for your self-esteem. Even worse, if you are simply passing off someone else's story as your own, you are living a lie.

The stories that you tell should be your own. If you dont have any, go our into the world and create them. Write a book. Skydive. Quit your job and travel to China to study at the Shaolin temple. Go climb a mountain. Live an epic life and you will never cease to have stories to tell.

7. Develop a strong sense of humor

A sense of humor demonstrates both confidence and interpersonal skills as well as the ability to put others at ease. Everyone has their own unique sense of humor that, if developed and expressed, can lend to your quest to build a respectable harem.

As a bartender I have the priviledge of watching social interactions go down in real time, and I can assure you that playful banter will get you laid exponentially more than serious, cold, mechanical approaches. While we are not here to be sideshow acts for women for the sake of getting laid, I challenge you to find your own sense of humor and make others laugh. It will pay you dividends.

Gentlemen, if you would like to share your specific strategies for stepping your game up, I look forward to hearing them in the comments below!

How American Men Are Being Institutionally Oppressed

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Successful political and social agitation by the progressive movement has cemented such gains that men can now be considered institutionally oppressed in America, even according to feminist definitions of oppression. Here are three definitions:

From a Slutwalk Wiki:

> Institutional oppression is the systematic mistreatment of people within a social identity group, supported and enforced by the society and its institutions, solely based on the person's membership in the social identity group.

From Wikipedia:

> Institutional Oppression occurs when established laws, customs, and practices systematically reflect and produce inequities based on one's membership in targeted social identity groups. If oppressive consequences accrue to institutional laws, customs, or practices, the institution is oppressive whether or not the individuals maintaining those practices have oppressive intentions.

From about.com (cited in feminist papers):

> Oppression is the inequitable use of authority, law, or physical force to prevent others from being free and equal.

Before I make the argument that men are oppressed, I want to first ask if you can document or describe any oppression that women are facing today. Is there a place or environment in America where capable and qualified women are actively discriminated against while men are not? I can't think of a single example. We have completely solved female oppression, because as I've documented in the past, women are coddled at every stage of their lives and given more opportunities and leeway to fail than men while having the full backing and support from every single institution in America (besides the manosphere).

Females are so privileged in America that a woman can pop out three kids from different men and have free money automatically deposited in her bank account, have a wide variety of mainstream corporations (even men's organizations) fight for any future disease she may contract, and have feminist-friendly writers on sites like Huffington Post and xoJane explain how men should man up and marry her because she's strong and independent, regardless of the fact that she's dependent on her government husband. If you believe women are oppressed in America, it's possible you're mentally ill (i.e. a social justice warrior) or living in a sheltered echo chamber with an allergy to truth and facts.

We've arrived at the point where men are so consistently oppressed from birth to adulthood that any notion of female oppression can be immediately laughed at on its face. Here are just a few examples:

— Young boys are drugged and zombified with methamphetamine based pharmaceuticals at three times the rate of girls, all for exhibiting normal male behavior. [1] [2]

— Young boys are methodically excluded from programs that can aid them in science, math, and computer programming, leaving them to fend for themselves. [1] [2] [3] [4] [5]

— Young girls are encouraged to invade traditionally male spaces like gaming and sports while men are excluded from female spaces. [1] [2] [3] [4]

— College males are presumed guilty when a female accuses him of rape and then subjected to a kangaroo court that can eject him from college without due process. [1] [2] [3]

— Media spreads propaganda against men by lying about their propensity to commit rape and violence while completely ignoring male victimization at the hands of women or while serving as custodians of the state in prison. [1] [2] [3] [4] [5]

— Women are being college educated at greater rates, leading to the relative economic impoverishment of men. [1] [2] [3] [4]

— Women live longer than men. [1]

— State legislation like California's "Yes Means Yes" bill and New Jersey's proposed "Rape By Fraud" law explicitly target and punish men for deeds that women will be given a pass for. [1] [2]

— The Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) elevates the worth of a woman's life above that of men while making every man a hostage in his own home when it comes to his wife being able to imprison him with a single phone call to the police by fraudulently claiming domestic abuse. [1] [2]

— Media treats a woman's word as sacred truth, far more valuable than the word of a man. This allowed a case like the UVA rape hoax where the media establishment bought a completely fictitious 7-man gang rape story that was wholly invented by a privileged white woman. [1] [2] [3] [4]

— Men are publicly shamed as “sexist” and “creepy” for exhibiting a preference for young beautiful women while women are empowered when they state their male preferences, whatever they happen to be. [1] [2] [3] [4] [5] [6]

— Divorce laws and courts give children to the mother by default even if the father showed he was more responsible. The court will also imprison the man if he’s financially destitute and unable to make payments while dragging its feet when the mother is shown to be unfit. [1] [2] [3] [4] [5] [6]

True equality between the sexes, in terms of women not being oppressed greater than men, was achieved decades ago, but we have massively overshot to where it’s absolutely clear that men are treated as inferiors, criminals, and biologically deficient when compared to women.

All major institutions in America treat men like second-class citizens while elevating women no matter how morally challenged they are or how many mistakes they make in their lives or to the lives of their children. In other words, all boys born today will see less fairness, due process, and economic opportunity compared to girls with the same birth date. A boy born today will be institutionally, systematically, and deliberately oppressed by all facets of society while a girl born today will be given undeniable preferential treatment over him.

The first step any oppressed group must make is to be aware of their oppression. This awareness among men has accelerated in the past three years where more men have begun speaking out and putting their foot down at their further marginalization by American institutions. The only question that remains is what these men will do when the enemy, who will not voluntarily give up the power it has gained in the past three decades, decides to put down his revolt for good.

Having Trouble Managing Your Relationships? You Only Need These 3 Categories

February 11, 2015 | by Andrian Red | Link | Original Link

If you are an ambitious person by nature, you will most probably realize at some point that your relationships, just like your life, need to be managed effectively in order to get the most out of them. Unfortunately most people fail to invest in this area and most commonly end up experiencing feelings of dissatisfaction and regret.

These feelings usually originate from our attempt to view the world from a more utopian angle, hoping that things will work out alone. Sadly, once we realize that we have barely evolved from our primitive ancestors, only then do we start to pay more attention to the importance of management.

In my attempt to get into the nuts and bolts of how to do it effectively, I decided to divide the people who surround us into three main categories; the party people, the partners, and the followers.

Although you should take my advice here with a grain of salt, this categorization wasn't a result of some momentary epiphany. It is mainly a result of years of social interactions and experiments and is also influenced by the opinions of well-known and respected psychologists and philosophers.

The purpose of this categorization is not to create stereotypes and discrimination among your relationships, but rather to give you a better understanding of behavioral dynamics and how you should use them to get the most out of your relationships.

1. The Party People

These are people in your environment who can be great assets when it comes to social gatherings. They are usually extroverted by nature and can easily adapt to dynamic and high-energy environments. If you are an introverted character, those people can help you discover your extroverted edge and also help you create new acquaintances. If you are an extroverted character, these people can supplement you in a great way and also boost your social value even more.

The caveat when it comes to party people is that their management requires extra attention when you want to keep them around you for a long time. They are usually people who seek validation and will most probably demand from you to reach their energy levels in order to get along with them.

There are usually three ways to successfully manage them:

- Give them validation in small amounts so they can keep coming back for it.
- Don’t stay too close to them and avoid speaking about personal matters that have no relation to the party environment.
- If you feel comfortable with meeting new people, introduce them to each other and also use a churn-approach when the fun you used to have with them is being jeopardized.

2. The Partners

These are people who you can build a strong emotional connection with. This connection usually comes from sharing common beliefs, values and ideas. They can become great romantic partners, business partners or intellectual partners and you can experience mutual benefit when it comes to emotional and intellectual activities.

The success of your relationship is founded upon the ideas of respect, loyalty, and understanding. If these ideas are not present, a partnership can never flourish and grow. Both you and them need to be constantly aware their presence and actively communicate it through your words and actions.

It is also crucial to understand that if your relationship with them branches out to the other two categories, you are flirting with the idea of imbalance. Partying with them, although it is an option, could lead to you questioning your relationship with them.

3. The Followers

These are people who admire you a lot and believe that they can be positively influenced by your presence. Although we have the bad habit of associating the word "follower" with something negative, we need to realize that we all are or were followers at some point in our lives. So the idea of a follower is great if you are conscious about the help you can provide.

From your perspective, a follower is a person that respects you a lot and looks up to you, thus helping you boost your confidence and increase your value as a person. From his perspective, the interaction with you can help him solve some personal problems and also put him in the right track for further growth.

Followers can become partners at some point, depending on how well you can evaluate your relationship with them, but in order for this to be accomplished both of you need to become aware of it and move from a follower-leader to a leader-leader approach in your relationship.

Although the three categories are open to further analysis, in a more surface level, they are the only categorization you need.

It is always up to you how and why you will decide to manage your relationships, but in the end of the day the famous African proverb makes a bit more sense:

> "If you want to go fast go alone. If you want to go far go with others."

3 Ways Your Job Is Crushing Your Soul

February 12, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Have you seen the movie Office Space? Directed by an astute observer of society, Mike Judge, Office Space shows what the little guy goes through in the daily course of his pathetic cubicle existence. The movie opens with one such average guy, Peter Gibbons, trying to min-max his way through the Monday morning rush hour.

Peter arrives at work at Initech, a faceless software firm, but before he can zone out in front of the computer screen, his douchebag boss arrives to casually complain about trivial bullshit.

If you could recognize this guy, that'd be great

Peter is a spineless loser who can't say "NO!" to his boss, puts up with crap from a girlfriend who is way out of his league, and essentially gets no respect, except from his two colleagues, Michael and Samir. Peter's girlfriend, Anne, suggests that the two of them go see an "occupational hypnotherapist", who puts Peter in a relaxation trance but gets a heart attack before cancelling the suggestion. At this point, Peter just stops giving a fuck about everything and that's when the movie gets interesting.

Squashing Y2K bugs

Initech is in the middle of downsizing and a pair of "efficiency consultants" interview employees to decide who gets axed. Peter, in his newfound state of lucidity, tells them that he only does enough work to not get fired, which is actually about 15 minutes per week. Why? Because he is not motivated to do any more than that.

The plot quickly becomes much more epic as Peter starts enjoying life, taking more risks and eventually decides to rob Initech with his two buddies. Their highly improbable plan involves shaving off a few cents from each transaction and siphoning it to a separate account, supposedly generating millions over time. Peter also dumps his former bitchy girlfriend and upgrades to a hot waitress.

You might have seen her before

Office Space is worth watching just for the printer destruction scene, but there are many subtle hints about what the profit-driven capitalist system does to the regular guy who just wants to have a normal life.

The idea of motivation as a crucial factor that determines efficiency in a corporate environment is well known and understood. However, the ways to make employees motivated are not that obvious. Some companies decide to motivate them with awkward team building exercises while others hire motivational speakers who give speeches peppered with fake zest. Neither of these has a long lasting positive effect, if it has one at all.

So, why not just pay employees more? Throwing money at a problem until it fixes itself seems like the best possible solution, but that's not the case at all. There have been numerous actual studies done about this problem and the answers are surprisingly unusual. As it turns out, this is also the secret to personal satisfaction in the workplace.

These are the three factors that cause people to just space out in the workplace:

1. You don’t have any autonomy

Everyone has the inherent desire to be self-directed and possess a feeling of agency. This means the ability to set your own goal and choose the means to achieve that goal. This is completely against how management and top-down decision making works.

Not only are you not allowed to make any decisions, but due to political correctness, everything you say or do can and will be subject to harsh criticism or other repercussions.

Each cog has the illusion of movement, but stays firmly in place

After a certain amount of time spent in such environment, you will either adapt by becoming a faithful servant to the machine and learn the art of passive-aggressive backstabbing or quit outright. In other words, management is great for situations where compliance and abiding by the rules is of utmost importance. For any other situation that requires innovation or creativity, it simply doesn’t work at all.

2. Your job can’t be developed into a mastery

Not only does each cog in the machine have its place, but it has to have its own, strictly defined function and never be allowed to deviate from it. That’s because employees who do one thing only are easily replaced and loss of any of them doesn’t stop the business from earning more money.

Employees that can learn something other than the given function may become crucial for the business and therefore set their own terms. From a purely economic standpoint, having specialized workers as a way to maximize profits is completely understandable.

Well, as long as profits keep rising…

However, economists also think that having fun or hobbies is absolutely unreasonable. Why would you ever want to do something that's not making you money?

The truth is, from the day you are born, you strive to become better at things you do, whatever those might be. The ultimate reason is personal satisfaction. Having an insufficient outlet for mastery at work makes the person depressed, apathetic, and waiting for the work hours to run out every single day.

3. Your job lacks purpose

Finally, we come to the most transcendent issue—having a job with greater purpose rather than just simply making money. This doesn't necessarily mean you have to be religious and believe in a supernatural being. Simply put, your job has to have some noble cause, it has to somehow do good deeds and make the lives of others better.

Without a greater purpose, the worker will do his job sloppily and run the risk of becoming corrupt, since there is nothing he won't do for some extra cash.

I was told there will be a greater purpose

If this sounds too romantic, let me remind you of the most recent case where greed and corruption had a global impact—the 2008 financial crisis. Instead of being money-lending institutions that gave money to people so they can buy houses to live in (a noble cause), banks turned into profit-driven machines that sought whatever generated the most cash.

The end result was the global recession that rivaled The Great Depression from the 30s. Even though those bank managers had autonomy and mastery at what they did, they pursued their own selfish agendas and ended up threatening the entire world.

Don’t stop dreaming

Thankfully, you don’t have to slave at the cubicle anymore if you don’t want to. Globalization has made the world a much more hospitable place for English-speakers, while the internet has opened up countless new and exciting ways to make money while you sit in your underwear at home.

Who knows, maybe it’s your version of sexy Facebook that’s going to provide you with the lifestyle you always wanted.

Women Want A Fantastical Fairy Tale Ending But Without The Plot

February 12, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

I have always had a certain affinity for folklore. I wrote a paper in college with the thesis that nothing is more true than mythology. Myths and folklore are not made up by one individual but by a whole society, and so they tell a message about that society and often about ourselves as humans. Even if the actual events are false or exaggerated, the myth connects to us in a way that no other book can.

Authors imitating or adapting them like Hans Christian Andersen or Euripides often incorporated these elements into their stories, likely with little consciousness of the significance. The original "Little Mermaid" by Andersen follows the template so well that it could easily be confused as being anonymously written. It aligns with the Disney story most of the way, but it ends with the prince marrying someone else and the mermaid princess committing indirect suicide. It is not a story about "love conquers all" but a cautionary tale about leaving your role.

But I also love folklore because of the world it puts you in. Andersen's Little Mermaid is rich in its descriptions, not only of the undersea kingdom but also of the metaphysical world. It has a theological undercurrent about the nature of mortality and the soul that does little to change the plot but frames the entire story into several contexts.

The descriptions of the world in Andersen's story are vivid and detailed. The characters have lifelike motivations that allow you to connect with them, and the plot, while predictable, guides the reader into its turns. Mythology and folklore are not so much about the destination but the journey.

Disney took all of this but made it optimistic and child-friendly. Little girls have adored these princess stories for centuries, and when they grow up, they graduate to romantic novels and movies. Romantic comedies are a huge market share of the film industry, and we all remember the annoying Twilight fanaticism not quite ten years ago. Bella Swan is the modern Andromeda or Eurydice.

The Fantasy Continues

Despite the successes of feminism, women still crave a man's leadership. Some women may claim they don't need a man, but women are to be judged by their actions and not their words. We red-pillers mock romantic movies for their grand displays of beta seduction, since those things no longer work in real life.

Nevertheless, women still eat it up on the big screen because they want the grand romantic gestures to work. They want to fall in love by candlelight to a kind, gentle man who only has their interest in heart and will keep them safe from all the dangers of the world. The fact that such cliches are worthless is irrelevant to the fantasy women have in their minds.

And so we get such trite advice about how to impress women. "Always hold the door for them," "Compliment her," "Treat her like your sister," et cetera ad nauseam. Women didn't come up with this advice to play a prank on the menfolk. Most women honestly believe that this will work and will get angry should a man suggest otherwise.

Women want an alpha jerkboy like a meth addict wants to sell his food stamps for drugs. A woman in such a relationship is desperately addicted to him no matter how much she despises him, and she hates herself for being unable to break free.

Break In The Narrative

Today's world is a long way from that of Ariadne and Sleeping Beauty. What do you notice about the Disney princesses below?

Except for the black chick and pasty girl in purple (the two newest characters, not coincidentally), they're all hot, right? Most of them have beautiful flowing hair. Their gowns are gorgeous. None of them are holding Louis Vuitton purses. They have make-up and jewelry in the right proportions that complement their appearance instead of dominating it.

In short, you can tell by their appearances that they are feminine, in need of provision, and likely virginal. Not just their clothes and hair, but in their facial expressions and posture. Why, I bet that Sleeping Beauty chick is an excellent cook. And Cinderella can probably sew. Belle looks like she can hold an interesting conversation about books, and I would lay money that Ariel has musical talent.

I couldn't imagine Snow White grinding in a night club. Pocahontas probably knows the ins and outs of folk medicine, but if she tells you that she slept with Chief Big Stick "just that one time," then you know she's a liar, because a woman never did the dirty "just once with only one guy."

But women don't look anything like that anymore. Sure, the above is formal-wear specific to a time and place, but there is still something distinct about the aura of the women. Maybe it's partly the photoshopping that happens in animation, but Anglo/American women today usually don't have the same exudation about themselves.

Now compare a modern rendering of the same characters.

Their hair is unnatural and uninviting. Their facial expressions look conceited and mistrustful, like that of an abused dog. The way they dress makes me worry that I'll be paying child support for another man's kid. On rare occasions a tattoo can look good on a girl, but theirs are so excessive that you cannot appreciate what may actually have been beautiful, healthy skin. Nor can you even tell what the tattoo is supposed to be of.

Feminists decry the prince rescuer trope, claiming that women can function without a man. They are actually somewhat correct, but not in the way they think. The women above, in their heart of hearts, want a prince rescuer just like every woman. However, what kind of man will want to rescue them? Why would he feel a need to?

The women do not induce a picture of fragility. If one of them got into a fight, I'd pull out my camera phone. Marrying an androgynous woman is like marrying a dude, but with a snarky sense of self-importance.

Furthermore, what would he have to gain by rescuing them? Good for a victory bang, but you can tell they'd be miserable to spend time around. I will judge a book by its cover, because that is how a book is marketed. The women above have made their advertisements very clear.

Of course, I know those pictures are exaggerated examples. But even though most girls today don't look a Texas whore, they have the same attitudes. Slut is a state of mind, after all, and there are plenty of virgin teenagers hoping to let the baseball captain get to second base. And yes, attention whoring is a close cousin of real whoring. And no, you cannot turn a whore into a housewife no matter how much she thinks Jesus has saved her.

Beta Heart, Alpha Soul

Men, in their heart of hearts, want to be a white knight. They want to come to the rescue of a defenseless woman, correct injustice, and be lauded as a good person. We want to believe that all women are innocent and pure, that they need us. We want the validation that comes with being a hero.

I think this is why some men marry former porn stars. Men are fixers, after all, and although the former porn star (or unwed mother) may not be innocent and pure, she certainly may be helpless. They see this broken creature and desire to fix her, as though she's an appliance merely in need of a new motor.

But most men aren't that dumb. Most men are reluctant to marry an unwed mother or a divorced woman, especially if they themselves haven't yet had kids or been married.

And the very few quality girls left? They're still part of our culture. Your 15th-century beta game will easily be misconstrued for the lack of genuineness that is the typical nice guy's hallmark, especially since these girls generally come from rural areas where patriarchy runs deep in the family.

New World Order: Not Much Different From The Old

Despite all of the supposed smashing of traditional sex roles, women want the same narrative they have always wanted.

> There are three comedies coming out this fall aimed at women. You have seen them all before, but you will see them all again… "Wait, that's me," you think. Yes, that's the point. We all think that… The romantic comedy is the modern fairytale, and we're the princesses… We're not just living unfulfilling lives in a castle waiting for Prince Charming. Now we have impressive careers [brief pause] that are unfulfilling… So you're single, happy, loving your job. I mean, who are we kidding? Work sucks.

For a comedian who claims to be a feminist, Sarah Haskins is full of inadvertent red pill commentary.

Yesterday's Prince Charming is today's Ashton Kutcher. Did you see No Strings Attached? I enjoyed it enough to buy the DVD from a bargain bin, but don't tell me there isn't a deep pathology lying underneath. Woman with an awesome career sluts around before meeting an alpha chiseled like Hercules with a temperament of dominance and respect. He's into grand sweeping romance ("Let's look at the twinkling lights"), but she just wants sex.

Or so she thinks, because really she's just afraid to trust someone else. Then she loses him. Cries. Eats chocolate donuts. Misses her sister's wedding or something. But surprise! Happy endings for all, because she gets him back, and then they're all happy and shit for the first time in their lives.

Whoever wrote that film needs to see a therapist. But then again, in some sense every woman wrote that film. The romcom is the new mythology. It holds the mirror to our society.

There's a whole market dedicated to feeding women the notion that they can have their romantic narrative exactly as their diary has planned it. Youtube and Amazon are full of information trying to help women get men to commit. I would imagine very few of them give advice like, "The sooner you sleep with him, the more likely he will forget about you," or, "Do you have any talents and charisma that would be attractive to him?" or, "Are you fat or androgynous?"

Nobody ever claimed the red pill went down pain-free, but both men and women must take it. It's the chemotherapy of the self-help world. And of course, the red pill is a bit different for women than it is for men.

In the unlikely event that women were to have the intellectual honesty to admit they want this narrative they spend so much money on, then the logical next question would be, "Why am I not getting this?" It's easy to claim that men are hypergamous or immature, but when will the women ask, "What am I doing wrong? What can I do to increase my chances?"?

Ideas Have Consequences

So the moral of our tale is that women want the fantasy story but are unable to realize that they no longer merit it. Women no longer induce the drive in men that makes the men want to rescue them. "The way to a man's heart is through his stomach," as the saying is, but women today lean on Betty Crocker like a man on hospice with his oxygen tank.

Even with the draconian family courts, men would still be willing to commit should a woman be able to seduce him properly. Let's be honest, men. We've accomplished amazing things throughout history, but add in a woman with a chance of sleeping with her, and suddenly we start thinking with a different head. We turn into complete morons around women. Nor is it always mere physical desire. Don't think you're impervious to the sirens' call of infatuation.

Women today are often very good at getting a man's sexual attention, since all they have to do is show up. Some play hard to get, but many figure out they just have to rub their tits in his face, whether metaphorically or literally. But women do that innately, hardly thinking about it.

What each generation of women has to be taught—and what has now been forgotten—is how to make a man want to stay. This isn't terribly hard, although it is very easy to screw up. In the 1950s, this was common knowledge. Most women back then could get a man to commit. Generally today people tell men they're doing women wrong by avoiding marriage, but, to use their phrase, "It takes two to tango." What is the modern woman missing?

Domesticity is the common answer, but often overlooked is cheerful servility. You see, female submission is not the heavy-handed slave relationship it is slandered as today. After all, there's no love if the server has no choice.

Rather, female servility is more like, "He's asked me to run an errand, and I know it would make his day a lot easier if I were to do it for him," or, "He's really into his football game, so I'm going to surprise him with home-breaded chicken fingers just so I can enjoy the smile on his face," or, "We're disagreeing over this major decision, but I know he usually has good judgment, so I'll trust him and let him have his way," or, "I don't like him drinking, but I know work is stressful for him, so I'll tolerate him having a few beers before bed," or, "I'm not in the mood, but it's been a few days, so I'll make love to him and pretend to be into it."

Yes, men can do these things for women too, but it doesn't induce the same sense of, "Wow, I have the best girlfriend in the world. Let me take every precaution to ensure I don't lose her, because I will never find another this amazing." Granted, no game technique works every time. But feminine submission greatly increases a woman's options and chances.

Men are taught to become something to attract women, but women are taught by feminism to wait for the right man to accept them as they are (which, oddly, is the same "princess in the tower" mentality feminists hate). This is the equivalent of the liberal arts major waiting for "the right job" with a six-digit salary when he has no marketable skills. Women are unwilling to admit that there will always be a thousand double standards in both directions between men and women, even though the women themselves expect those double standards to be in place.

Men only want to marry a woman who can offer him things he can't get elsewhere. I can have deep conversations, enjoy movies, and hear great jokes with my male friends. A woman will never be able to relate to me as well as another man can. What do you have to offer me beyond your used-up body and lack of personality?

Women today whine about being merely a sexual object, but most do little to cultivate their individuality or charisma. And yes, there can be a deep preciousness in female companionship, but the nature of it is radically different from male companionship.

Women today are so focused on the "I" that the "you" is only relevant to how it gives them validation. They are unconcerned about what men want from the relationship. A woman may throw a man a compromise cookie, but ultimately she wants to paste him into her life instead of join two together. Someone explain to me why people are surprised that men no longer want to get married.

Your princess is in another tower, I'm afraid.

The Solution

Unless women remain chaste, feminine sweethearts, they will not be able to hold onto the real-life Ashton Kutchers, if they are able to attract them at all. Unless women stop trading their most desirable years of beauty and fertility for college and careers, they will not be able to win the commitment of a Ryan Gosling.

Unless women return to focusing on their families instead of their petty ideologies, then they will never be more than a convenient hole to a Colin Firth with limitless candidates. Dido lost Aeneas for the same reason women today stew in spinsterhood and boring marriages.

Nor do they merit such a man. Daddy was right when he told her, "Wait for the man who appreciates you for what you are," but he didn't realize his daughter is little more than the community dumpster. Men appreciate a woman like that exactly for what she is and nothing else. She'll get exactly the kind of man she deserves—the man who has no other options. Can you face the looking-glass, Alice?

How You Can Unleash A Girl’s Natural Sexuality

February 12, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article has been sponsored by Captain Jack of getabeautifulgirlfriend.com

A “society loophole” exists which will help you unleash a woman’s pent-up sexual demand. Like most attempts at suppression, this one backfired and is tremendously beneficial for the guys who know how to get around it.

Using this loophole, I’ve been able to have sex with hundreds and hundreds of beautiful young women, often the very first night I met them, despite being technically obese (My BMI was about 32 when I developed this).

Disclaimer

But, before we get into the meat of this I want to warn you… this is NOT for the faint of heart. Many men just cannot handle the TRUTH about a woman’s raw sexuality. They prefer to think of most girls as good girls and just a few as “sluts.” NOTHING could be further from the truth. The way a girl acts, what she is willing to do, and how quickly she wants to do it has ALMOST EVERYTHING to do with the male she is being seduced by… and almost NOTHING to do with her own preferences, rules or upbringing.

If the male defers to her preferences, society’s rules, or her upbringing then he gets no sexual attraction.

But, if he interacts with the woman as a sexual being with an almost unfulfillable sexual appetite, who loves the thrill and adventure of a smooth, powerful seduction ending off in intense orgasms then he gets what all the guys around her want but are too chickenshit to actually go for…

My name is Captain Jack and I achieved all of this by first examining the “mental model” of hot young women and working within that to break out of it and persuade them sexually. I called this body of work “Sexual Framing” and used it to have fast time frame sex with women all over the United States.

The nuts and bolts of sexual framing

Sexual Framing derives its power from a cultural phenomena which exists in nearly every society. When a girl is young, either through overt control or subtle manipulation, her parents, her teachers and almost all of society communicate to her that sex is wrong.

However, her body tells her different. Her body CRAVES sex. Most women report, even before puberty, they would stare at males and imagine them rubbing them, groping, and fondling them. This is at an age when they often did not even know HOW sexual reproduction took place or what a penis WAS much less what it looked like or what was done with it.

Her body is more real and closer to her “reality circuits” than all the people telling her sex is wrong… but, she is FORCED to suppress the sexual energies.

Why? Because as a child she knows intuitively that she depends on those same authority figures for her very survival.

Therefore, she suppresses those urges and does nothing to risk being ostracized from those she depends on. As she grows older and hits puberty her very real sex drive and her accepted truth battle viciously. And, they continue battling each other her whole life.

Pent-up sexual demand

So, the goal of the seducer is to create an interaction where all that pent-up sexuality gets unleashed directly at him.

How you release that pent-up sexual demand is what "Sexual Framing" is all about. But, before you can unleash the flood you have to show her that you are non-judgmental. That you are NOT one of "them"—the suppressors. You have to show her that you 'get it', that you value it and that you think it is right. And, you'll have to let her know that you never kiss and tell.

Once you demonstrate that is NOT the case, the dam that is holding back years and years of pent-up sexual frustrations crumbles before your very eyes. This 'loophole' overrides her Template Male… the tall, dark, handsome and funny guy she says she wants as a boyfriend.

Because, once she feels that intense surge of sexual energy flowing through her body she'll use the fact that you are NOT that guy as the very reasons her feelings MUST be real and true sexual feelings.

Example of sexual framing

There are six basic Sexual Frames I establish in nearly every interaction. They handled 90% of the "Dam" holding back her sexual desire. Here's a quick example of three of those I've used on the way to MANY lays. It is called "Captain Jack's Rings on Fingers" Routine:

> CJ: I read in this magazine where two researchers said that what fingers you wear your rings on says a lot about your personality.
> Girl: Really?

(If she has no rings on, I'll ask: "What fingers do you normally wear rings on?" If she has rings on I'll start off this way…)

> CJ: Yeah, I don't wear jewelry often but if I do wear a ring, it's on this finger. That means I'm not judgmental. As long as someone isn't hurting another person they should be able to do what they want. (This establishes the 'Non-Judgmental Frame' which sets me apart from the Sexual Suppressors.)

> Girl: blah, blah (What she says is not terribly important… nod and listen, then deliver the next frame).
> CJ: I see you are wearing one on this finger (touching ring)… that means you become aggressive when you see something you want… so if you're sexually interested in a guy you become aggressive and let him know. I love that.

I'm establishing the "Sexual Aggressor Frame." Because I've already told her I'm not judgmental this tells her it is ok to become sexually aggressive. I notice a change in behavior after these two frames are set.

> Girl: Blah, blah
> CJ: You aren't wearing a pinky ring. That has to do with 'keeping secrets and being discrete.' Since neither of us have one we'll have to pinky swear if we do anything naughty. I never kiss and tell.
> (This establishes the Discretion or "Keeps Secrets" Frame. Remember, being too sexual threatens her survival so she doesn't care to have it blasted out in public.)

I've never experienced such intense fuck me eyes, sexual aggression and soaked panties as I have from using each sexual frame, in the right order, which systematically removes those society barriers.

It unleashes that pent-up sexual demand and from that point, it is easy.

Sex And The City Is Full Of Red Pill Wisdom

February 12, 2015 | by Brian Drums | Link | Original Link

Let me start by saying I've seen every episode of Sex and the City multiple times. I know the characters names, the men (and women) they've dated and what they do for work. While this may be odd to hear coming from an avid ROK reader and red-piller, keep in mind that many of us were betas and white knights before our awakening.

I grew up with only my mother and older sister in the house. After two years in the college dorms (the equivalent of attending a feminist reeducation camp) I rented a house with four women and soon thereafter moved in with my girlfriend. Up until recently I have, regrettably, only lived with women.

Throughout high school and most of college I was beta to the core; a typical fatass couch dweller who spent a solid six hours a day in front of the TV. Obviously this was no good and, fortunately, I realized this in my 20s. I'm 31 now and have turned my life around in many ways (ROK has been a tremendous help in this regard) but that's another article for another time.

Recently I stopped by a friend's place to have a drink before heading out to dinner. We were having a conversation about work when I noticed his girlfriend was in the living room watching Sex and the City. I peeked over to see which episode it was when something hit me: Sex and the City, the quintessential "You Go Grrl!" television show, is full of red pill truth.

Impossible you say! Surely there must be hundreds of examples from the show that disprove my thesis. Perhaps, but understand that, at its core, Sex and the City is about the relationship between its lead character Carrie and her on-again-off-again love interest since the first episode, a man simply referred to as Big.

The Alpha

Big is as alpha as they come: a successful, cocksure, good looking older man brimming with confidence. Big is a man who gets what he wants (granted he would be banging a steady stream of mid 20's ass instead of a late 30's hag, but humor me) and never loses his cool, even in the face of Carrie's clear mental instability.

My favorite Big moment comes when he and Carrie are out at dinner. At some point in evening he lights up a cigar at the table, which visibly annoys Carrie (who responds by pouting silently instead of having an adult conversation). What follows is classic:

> Waitress: Excuse me; you can't smoke that in here.
> Big: Really? You're absolutely, positively sure about that? Because I checked the zoning on this particular table and I'm pretty sure this table is in a cigar-friendly zone.
> Waitress: (clearly intimidated and aroused) Uh, I don't mind, but it's for the other patrons.
> Big: You mean if those five patrons don't mind, it's okay with you?
> Waitress: Sir, I'm going to have to—
> Big: —Just one second. (Walking to a table of two beautiful women) Excuse me; this is my last day on earth. I'm being executed tomorrow morning. That's my parole officer there. Would you mind terribly if I smoked this, ladies?
> Ladies: (giggling) Not at all
> Big: Thank you. (Walks over to next table) Excuse me, I'm sorry. Would it be okay > if I smoked this? Please, let me preface this by saying: I'd like to buy everybody a round of drinks (they applaud him). (To the waitress) Apparently, the other patrons aren't bothered at all.

> Carrie: (Inner monologue: I didn't have the guts to tell Big that he was actually kind of bothering me). They won't tell you the truth. No one is going to say to your face they hate your cigar.
> Big: Good.
> Carrie: You are very arrogant.
> Big: I thought that's what you liked about me.

At this point a solid piece of ass walks by the table and Big takes a look, probably debating whether or not he should follow her to the bathroom. Carrie storms away and he calmly follows her outside:

> Big: What?
> Carrie: I hate that cigar.
> Big: (Takes a puff, breaks it in half and throws it down, flashes a smirk) And you told me right to my face.

Now that we've established the Big character let's talk about Aidan, Carrie's steady boyfriend throughout most of season three and four.

The Nice Guy

Aidan is the guy that every girl supposedly dreams of meeting. He is constantly complimenting Carrie, buying her gifts and going the extra mile to prove his love (driving across the city to help her injured friend, making homemade furniture for her other friend's wedding, etc.) He is the quintessential "nice, sweet" guy with a sense of humor that all girls pine for.

Aidan spends the first couple of weeks always being available and eager to get together.

Carrie complains that she is feeling smothered so Aidan stops calling or stopping by unannounced. Carrie starts to miss him and asks why she never hears from him anymore, to which he replies he was being less available because that's what she wanted. Carrie more or less responds by saying "Well this month I feel like seeing you so now you can be around more."

Aidan decides that Carrie is the one so he takes it slow despite clear signals that she is ready to spread her legs at any time. Date after date he leaves her at the door with nothing but a kiss. Carrie is confused; I mean she's been dating this guy for weeks! How has he not fucked her six ways 'til Sunday by now?

But Aidan is a sensitive, sweet man so instead of bending her over the bathroom sink he's lighting candles and drawing a bubble bath. The next episode sees Carrie spend the entire time complaining about how good Aidan is to her and how there is no drama in the relationship.

Carrie has had enough and decides to ride some alpha cock at a nearby hotel (I'll give you one guess as to who she's there with). That's right, while the long awaited "nice" guy is redoing the floors of her apartment she is gagging on Big dong (in all fairness it should be noted that Big is cheating on his wife, a 26-year-old piece of ass he met in Paris). Carrie spends the next few episodes getting banged out by her married ex and projecting her guilt onto Aidan, who combats these wild mood swings by spouting gems like "You never let me hold you anymore" and "Why do you keep running away?" or there's my personal favorite pointing to her heart "How do I get in there?"

We All Know How This Story Ends

Eventually the affair with Big ends (only after his wife catches Carrie is their condo) and she confesses to Aidan. He gets teary eyed and tells her to go to the wedding by herself. Of course he shows up outside the church an hour later lamenting how sad he is and how much he loved her. She tries to win him back but he refuses and the episode ends with an inner monologue ruing the fact that Aidan is gone but hey, at least her girlfriends still love her.

Fast forward to next season: Carrie begs Aidan to take her back and of course he does, soon after which he tells her that she can't be friends with Big. She flat out refuses this request and he responds by buying her a new laptop. A few episodes later some drama ensues at a house in the country, culminating in a brawl between Aidan and Big that could more accurately described as a gay mud wrestling match, after which Aidan makes everyone breakfast.

The Verdict

A few episodes later Aidan proposes and Carrie accepts. He moves in and buys the apartment next door so they can tear it down and turn it into one big space where they'll live happily ever after. Carrie responds by yelling at him about his stuff being in her way, complaining that he doesn't go out enough and, finally, freaking out about getting married and dumping his ass. Her friends assure her she did the right thing and the series wraps up with her going back to Big.

There you have it: red pill truth, plain as day, at the heart of the girl power manifesto. When given the choice between the “asshole” and the “nice guy” Carrie made the decision they all do. Ask any girl who loves the show if she’d rather be with: Big or Aidan. More often than not she’ll answer the former (and any girl who answers the latter will change her mind after a two or three minute conversation on the subject).

Even when they get to write the script women cannot help but fall for the alpha.

Don’t Tell A Man What Type Of Woman He Should Be Attracted To

February 12, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

What would women think if we told them who they should find attractive? What if morbidly obese men in the USA declared that they are the male ideal, and then used multiple mainstream media outlets to shame women for not liking men with beer bellies, no muscle mass, low monthly incomes, and bad comb overs? What if this group of fat male writers would also announce that if women liked the opposite of what they deemed attractive, they were “shallow” and “stupid” with no understanding of what a “real” man is?

If this really did occur, women would rightly call the men insane and delusional, arguing that they are free to choose the type of men they want to be attracted to, a choice made either consciously from their current tastes or subconsciously due to genetics that tell them to land the most resourceful and fit men in order to pass on good genes to their offspring. The fat male writers would be shamed and ostracized.

This scenario has not actually happened because most men are not idiots—they know that women are attracted to status, money, bad boys, and good looks, but the same can not be said of women. Through a media effort that at times seems conspiratorial, they are trying to brow-beat men into liking unattractive women. Their agenda scolds men for not liking…

- single moms (women who made the decision to keep spawn of a bad boy who wanted little or nothing to do with the child)

- overweight women (women who are ugly, gluttonous, gelatinous, and lacking in all manner of self control)
- strong women (women who are overbearing, masculine, annoying, irritable, and whiny)
- women who have had dozens of prior sexual partners (women who don't know the word "loyalty" unless it pertains to buying an Apple product)
- older women (women who are less fertile and more likely to pass on genetic defects to your child)

Attraction is not a social construct that can be brainwashed into a man. While taste can be influenced socially, such as whether a man prefers a blonde girl versus a brunette, he still wants a beautiful blonde girl, where beauty is defined objectively through symmetry, facial structure, and those three numbers that compose her body shape. Even black men who like thick girls still want a proportional thick girl who has curves instead of being shaped like a milk jug.

If a white man is accidentally born in a Chinese village without a connection to the outside world, will he grow up to wife up an asymmetrical midget hippopotamus who already has spawn from multiple fathers and is well past her peak fertility? Put another way—would any man in any part of the world prefer such a woman if he could do better? Of course not, and this is why 99% of women would prefer to get inseminated by the genes of Brad Pitt than Danny Devito.

Since you're a man, you have something called a logic module hardwired into your brain. If something you're doing is not helping you accomplish a specific goal, you make adjustments to improve your chance of success. American women, who lack this module, instead say that the goal they want should become sentient and drawn to her just because. Her existing behaviors and habits should be enough to give her a lifetime of happiness, and if that happiness is not realized, a man or a culture of patriarchy is to blame.

In the past, women who think like the ones we have to endure today would have had to spend time in mental institutions, but there was a breakout in the asylum and now the crazies want big rewards for just existing while shaming and attacking you for the biological and natural desire for beauty and fertility. And with every ten pounds of weight they gain, their writing takes on a renewed sense of urgency, as if they want to trick just one man into loving them before it's all too late.

The interesting fact of DNA is that it can't be persuaded. No matter how many wildebeest and spinsters declare themselves to be worthy of the best men, those men will follow their biological desires. Trying to persuade men what to like will all be for naught, but at least we can point and laugh at the broken and ugly women who suggest it.

Fifty Shades Of Grey Proves Women Want Male Dominance

February 13, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Fifty Shades of Grey is hitting cinema screens globally this month. And feminists are fucking scared. At least 100 million people, the vast, vast, vast majority of them women, voted with their feet, eyes, purses, and credit cards and purchased the woefully-written book, which is nonetheless simultaneously a masterpiece of anti-feminism.

Now comes the film, which will only further titillate millions of middle-aged and young women, and underscore the female desire for male assertiveness and their own submission to such masculine control.

SJW's are unsurprisingly on the move, panicking that their narrative is under attack from not only reason but also the bull-rush footsteps of a usually socially dumbed-down female population. Donations to women's shelters and "anti-domestic violence" charities have gone up. One Massachusetts college professor, Gail Dines, initiated a "50 dollars not 50 shades" campaign to boycott the film and "inspire" cinema protests.

Her campaign and others like it are gaining huge traction within the SJW zoo. We may feel differently much of the time, but SJW's are still a fraction of the overall, usually slumbering female masses. This time, though, the numbers are firmly stacked against them. Then what's the moral of this story? Entrenched, quotidian feminist propaganda cannot reverse the biology of women.

An inconvenient reality

Before Fifty Shades, feminist "discourse" has avoided uncomfortable truths for decades. Female use of the word "slut," which either rivals or equals its usage by men, is desperately ignored by feminists, lest it destroy their only-men-are-that-sexist argument. A litany of studies showing gender symmetry in domestic violence, the role of life-balance free choice in women working part-time (and therefore explaining why they earn less) and anti-male bias in the family court system are all thrown on the proverbial scrapheap so that they don't need to be addressed.

Consequently, feminists are in a damaging spiral on this issue. There is no gender equivalence here; women are the ones thronging to see what SJWs call serious sexual abuse and rape culture on screen. If men were doing it en masse, they could call it misogyny. But the delicate leftist creatures dare not label their less uptight cinema-going sisters with the badge of misogyny. It would destroy the whole glass house that these intellectual lightweights inhabit.

Fifty Shades of Grey is the newest example of this hyper-tunnel vision. But unlike dry yet perfectly accurate scientific studies, E. L. James' flawed pseudo-classic is demanding that women pay attention with its visceral appeal. Despite its literary bankruptcy, including sentences that would make a horny fifteen-year-old boy cringe, the book cuts to the heart of the female sexual identity.

Rape culture and male oppression of women are highly effective fictions used in the western world to vilify men. But in Fifty Shades, Anastasia voluntarily thrusts herself into Christian Grey's palm. She even tries to pry it open herself, figuratively, just so she can be under his thumb.

There's no story reminiscent of feminist fear-mongering here. Anastasia doesn't start an initially placid relationship which becomes twisted with the stereotypical growth of "male abuse" and the exercise of roid rage-like violence against her. Instead, Anastasia signs a "contract" for the BDSM activities. It's Anastasia who wants this.

The plot devices James uses to superficially tone down the raw sexuality of the book series (yes, there are three of them!), such as the injection of Grey's "vulnerabilities" and Anastasia's signing of the contract, are merely mechanisms to maintain a woman's plausible deniability and that of the female audience.

The author herself, given her poor writing abilities, was probably unaware of the purpose of these devices. When reading the book or watching the film, which I saw today, women can live this plausible deniability vicariously through Anastasia.

If you were going to see the film before reading this, still go see it. And if you did not plan to go see it, change your fucking mind and go. Some of the scenes will be unbearably corny and the teeth-grinding dialogue will repel you, but you will witness a perfect encapsulation of the female sexual drive. Even in the dark, pay heed to any noises from the mostly female crowd.

Perhaps in the corner of your eye you'll catch the illuminated faces of some women. Soak in the rapt attention they give to the spectacle before them. Before and after the screening, notice the excitement of groups of women, the emotions they express and the completely different vibe they give off. For them, this is no regular film and they'll be treating it, irrespective of whether they're not dressed up, as a festive occasion. This is their psychology and fantasies they are paying to see.

Most potently, when you pay to watch this film, as the women are, you are paying to watch patriarchy in action. The film may be set in "our time" but the world that Anastasia must make herself enter represents her deep-seated patriarchal dreams and cravings. And that forms a mirror reflecting the primal desires of all normal women.

Fifty Shades of Grey doesn't just incapacitate feminism. It ties it up, flogs it, and chokes it unconscious.

The Double Blue Pill Can Be An Insidious Weapon Of Reaction

February 13, 2015 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

The 20th century was, in a sense, dominated by questions about "society." The question was no longer "which system of government is best," but rather "which one serves best the needs of society." But beginning sometime in the 1990s, what appeared to be just another logical step began to look like a mutation. An early and myopic diagnosis of this change was that of a "culture war." What had in fact occurred was that the "social" had metastasized.

Arguably, the "left-right paradigm" was never relevant to American society, since no European model has ever mattered much here. European ideas only appealed to the fringes of society. The wealthy New England transcendentalist aspired to prove to his relatives across the Atlantic that his "people" were capable of "culture."

And the incorrigible misfit, sometimes disguised as a Christian pastor, latched onto socialist memes and assembled a following that was as meaningless as it was devoted. With notable exceptions like Prohibition, small groups of lunatics have racked up few victories in politics and their influence has been contained.

The roots of social justice

It's no secret that just about any cause, no matter how bizarre, can be claimed to be a matter of "social justice." From the faux outrage about equal pay to politically correct speech to multiplying concepts of gender identity, this lunacy continues ad infinitum. Considering historical context, it actually makes sense. Why would these crusaders keep whipping an old mare like abortion, which involves the inconvenient detour through Roe v. Wade, with all its legal arguments and jurisprudential subtleties?

What's to be noted about social justice warriors and other would-be political "movements" is their rhetoric. They produce talking points, not arguments; buzzwords, not facts. Of course, anything can be treated as an argument, and if most social justice warrior talking points were examined on that basis, 90% are weak or fallacious.

It is to their advantage that most people have at least a smidgen of that democratic faith in reasoned debate. It means they will usually be given a forum and a sucker who will attempt to argue against their points. But as I've already hinted, if you try using reason against lunatics, you are outsmarting yourself. Pitting rationality against irrationality is a fool's errand. The most effective tactic to counter the blue pill in a public forum is the double blue pill.

What is the double blue pill?

The double blue pill is merely doubling down the social justice irrationality to counter itself.

Looked at from one angle, social justice warriors are a cohesive force united by their use of the notion of "social justice." But a closer look reveals that they are really united by less noble sentiments: resentment, envy, a lust for power coupled with incapacity.

This is a clue to why just about any cause can label itself "social justice." The spectrum of social justice causes is a toxic, combustible mixture of irrationality, and this allows you to neutralize one cause by invoking arguments for another one.

Take old Atticus Finch, the iconic defense lawyer from To Kill a Mockingbird. The story is set in depression-era Alabama, where a young white girl and her father falsely accuse a black man of raping her. A literature teacher may include the book in his syllabus in order to advance a narrative about the evils of racism.

But now introduce the concept of "rape culture" into the discussion and you've turned things on their head. Atticus Finch is no longer the brave, color-blind attorney upholding the law in the face of systemic racism: he is complicit in a patriarchal society that "blames the victim."

The knife of the double blue pill will cut very deep. Not only will double blue pilling expose the absurdity of any type of argument offered by social justice warriors, in their attempts to refute your arguments they will attack other aspects of social justice. They will eat each other. Since you really have no vested interest in the argument, the more heated it gets, the more entertained you are.

Situations

Revealing red pill status in a college classroom is a very bad idea. This may seem too obvious to bear repeating, and repeating it may sound like a lament, but the temptation to argue honestly with thoroughly dishonest people is likely to be a person's undoing. By using the double blue pill counter to social justice advocacy, one does not set off alarm bells in the Marxist thought police.

It is also useful in the office-type environment with liberal Nazi human resources departments. Any type of action to counter you is an actual attack on social justice itself, just a different aspect of its broad coalition of victims. For the even more adventurous type, you can use the double blue pill to game liberal woman at the martini bar while they talk about the price of tea in China. The sky is the limit with the application of double blue pill.

Complexity

You can wield the double blue pill as a reply to ignorant statements made in passing. For example, someone may bitch in front of you about the law in Saudi Arabia which prohibits women from driving. You can just call the person our on their "Islamophobia," since the law makes perfect sense within the legal and religious culture of Saudi Arabia.

Or let's say someone gives you an in-depth lecture on income inequality throughout the globe, you can say people have their own cultures and they don't need to be influenced by some first world economist according to Kipling's "white man's burden." Or you can just keep it simple. When some woman complains that you don't hold the door open for her or offer to buy her a drink, call her a sexist dinosaur. After all, isn't she upholding traditional gender roles and denying equality?

Insidiousness

This is a wicked method, and that is what makes it so beautiful and so much fun. Any retaliation or retribution does not actually hurt you. And with the current climate of political correctness, any attempts to counter your arguments will get your opponent in trouble with the thought police. I would like to see a college dean or human resources manager write you up for espousing positions that are pro-equality.

Conclusion

The double blue pill is powerful weapon, but as with any powerful weapon, if the operator is incompetent, its effectiveness decreases dramatically. You must be able to present the case with a straight face convincingly so any observer will see an honest argument.

Highlighting the absurdity of the various social justice causes is the goal. This method leaves your hands clean while doing it. It also brings a level of consternation to your opponent where he realizes he cannot fight back.

The 6 Levels Of Game

February 13, 2015 | by Tony Moze | Link | Original Link

When thinking about game with women, one should see it in terms of ranks or positions in the corporate world. Each position has a level of education and field experience to be qualified, which grants them a certain level of income and benefits. Welcome to “Game, Incorporated” and here are the positions that are available for consideration.

Greetings, sir. I’m here for the interview.

1. The Janitor

This would be the lowest level in the corporate world. No educational or field experience in game, therefore this position picks up the scraps from the floor. He grabs the dirtiest jobs, getting chicks from the physical attractiveness ranges of 1 to 3 out of 10. His wage is pretty low, so he only gets a few of these dumpster chicks every year.

He has little to no benefits (meaning, he does not have a harem, booty calls or LTRs) and his position is pretty expendable (meaning, chicks friend zone and keep him as a beta orbiter and white knight). The attrition rate for this position is very high (meaning, he will feel like a loser and drop out of the game community very quickly).

Low income (meaning, low pussy earnings) leads to a very disadvantaged life for janitors.

2. Temp Worker

This is the second level up in the corporate world. Maybe a little educational or field experience in game, but he still gets the shit work. He can pick up chicks from the physical attractiveness ranges of 1 to 4 out of 10. His wage is pretty low, and he receives no benefits, since he sees his chances in game as a temporary thing to “try out.”

He is expendable, having those more superior to him (meaning: alphas) moving up on the ladder. The attrition rate for this position is very high. He finds himself having another job on the side (meaning, masturbation) to make ends meet.

3. Floor Staff

This is the third level in the corporate world. He has some educational and field experience with game. This man is inundated with the steady stream of females he attracts. However, these chicks are your average customers, on the physical attractiveness ranges of 4 to 6 out of 10. He works off commission, so even though his income fluctuates, he manages to have a pretty good weekly or monthly cash flow (meaning, high amounts of ONS and LTRs).

He is a very busy man, picking up the fat, ugly, young, and old The attrition rate for this position is medium, for 50% of this position gets burned out. Billy on the other hand has been showing management that he is a leader. He has been racking up an all-time high in sales (meaning, approaching and closing with chicks above the physical attractiveness of 6 out of 10), and these customers (meaning, the women) have been referring him to other customers. Billy has been considered for a promotion.

4. Lower Management

This is the fourth level in the corporate world. This position must have a good level of educational and field experience with game. To be considered for this position, one must possess these qualities:

- Strong frame
- Excellent communication skills (oral and text)
- Can manage a harem of women (minimum of 3 is sufficient)
- In good physical shape to lift 95+ pounds (of woman)
- Flexible – willingness to travel and approach late on nights and weekends

This position gets a steady stream of 7s on the physical attractiveness scale. The job can be very demanding, since he is requested to travel often to make sales (meaning, escalating and getting sex). Granted he has acquired a pretty good client base from the floor staff position, he notices he is not very impressed with salary pay.

This means he has to work from morning to late night and weekends picking up chicks, and he will make the same income (which could be two chicks rated as 7/10s a week). However, this position receives great benefits – 401k retirement plan (meaning, he has many chicks whom he’s banging that want an LTR with him), full medical (sex) and dental (they give him on the spot oral when he needs it).

5. Upper Management

This is second highest position in the corporate world. It demands a high level of educational and field experience in game. He exceeds the requirements of the lower management position. At this position, he can occasional sit back and watch the steady stream of 8 out of 10s come his way.

Excellent pay and benefits, high job satisfaction, he is the guy (read: alpha) who is terminating any janitor or temp worker that comes his way. When he walks into the corporate business building (meaning, the bar, club or any social event), all positions beneath him stand at attention and make sure they greet him.

6. C.E.O.

This is the highest level in the corporate world. Being a master of his craft, he possesses many years of educational and field work experience to be considered the highest ranking officer in gaming women. His income is so high that he can do whatever he wants with it. Money (meaning, women) attract to him everywhere he goes.

He has a big job, but knows how to handle a harem of five women or more. He has excellent benefits, such as his severance pay (meaning, if one chick cuts him off, he will always have an endless supply of women still coming at him). Like most CEOs he likes to donate (meaning, his cock) towards other organizations and charities (meaning girls below 8s).

He may not like this but knows that donations are good, for at the end of the year his business (meaning, his cock) gets tax exemptions and receives a nice refund (meaning, more chicks pile up in his line of steady vagina). As stated in the laws of attraction, high level executives understand this rule that if you give you will receive, and so his business gets rewarded handsomely through his donations.

Conclusion

Where do you fit into this corporate ladder of gaming women? Do you feel there is a glass ceiling, where you may see chances to move up, but somehow are not moving anywhere? Do you hate where you are in your position? Are you satisfied?

Upper management and CEOs are where they are due to their belief systems and work ethic. Way back when they first got the job at "Game, Inc." they, too, were once janitors. It took hard work and persistence to move up the ranks, approaching day in and day out, working nights and evenings.

So, are you ready for a position at "Game, inc."? Then go to school, get out in the field, and perfect your craft! The client base is seeking potential leaders like you.

6 Ways Poland Is Becoming Degenerate Like America

February 13, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

I've recently written of my intense disappointment in returning to a country in which the women and culture are becoming more like what we have in America. Here are six negative changes I've noticed in Poland since my first visit in 2011:

1. More tattoos

Young men and women are disfiguring themselves with the typical sort of tattoo scribbles that is already epidemic in America. Polish people are deciding to pursue their individualist side by permanently drawing obnoxious things on their body instead of actually achieving something worthwhile that makes them superior to the common man.

2. More ear gauges

Tattoos are tame compared to the sudden, prevalent, and frankly shocking use of ear gauges, whereby people irreversibly stretch and mutilate their ear lobes to appear cool. While it's possible for the occasional tattoo to look good, ear gauges never look good, and make it seem like the victim is hoping to gain membership in a backwards jungle tribe that has yet to encounter electricity. Since tattoos and ear gauges go hand in hand, you can only imagine the freakshows Poland now has on display.

3. More in-your-face homosexual behavior

Displaying your homosexuality used to be culturally forbidden and even dangerous in an former Soviet satellite like Poland, but you’re starting to see an increase in guys who are gay, proud, and loud. Just last month for the first time in Eastern Europe ever I saw two men passionately kissing in front of a pizza shop. If what’s happening on USA soil is any indication, being gay in Poland will soon be seen as hip, trendy, and progressive. Both men and women will experiment with it, as if catching a sort of virus, and step back from more traditional and humanizing features of Polish culture that have historically been centered around religion.

4. More binge drinking

The only country I had to do the ‘vomit slalom’ was Iceland. This is where I had to look down while walking around the club district at night during the weekend so I didn’t step in vomit because of how common Icelanders puke on the street. This didn’t use to be needed in Poland, but now it does.

Both men and women are competing to consume near-lethal amounts of alcohol while partying. This is so consistent, especially among the men, that a good way I display value to women is to simply be sober at 3am and speak in complete sentences without slurring or swaying my body, but now even girls have so taken to drink that it’s getting harder to have normal conversations with them in night venues than in the recent past.

5. More smartphone addiction

The technology virus has infected Poland. Most Poles who own a smartphone are unable to endure a minute or two of downtime without obsessively checking something on their phone or distracting themselves with music. A girl who would normally look up to the person who walked into the room is now looking through her Facebook account or playing a silly game, oblivious to her surroundings. While girls don't yet have multiple online dating accounts, that's just a matter of time.

Human interaction in Poland is being steadily replaced by technology that has America's narcissistic and brain-dead ways of behaving built right into the device. No formal learning required.

6. More career-obsessed women

Polish women have always been feminist in that they wanted their own career alongside family, but now they are throwing family under the bus. I've begun noticing Polish girls shaming their friends who decide to get married early, something you would never see in Ukraine and Russia.

Even worse is that I'm encountering a lot of Polish girls who speak of long-term travel and "Euro trips." While it's possible for men to find themselves through travel, the only thing a girl finds is exotic cock. Polish girls are racing to become corporate whores at the same time they're becoming actual whores for sexy Mediterranean men who spit a smooth game.

What amazes me is the speed at which a culture can degrade. I was so unsure that the observations above were objective that I had to discuss them with other men to be sure—both Polish and foreign. They've confirmed that the changes I've seen are really occurring, that Poland is adapting the worst of the West and that there isn't much to be done about it. The women will lead the way to the bottom and the men will have no choice but to keep up with them in order to squeeze out the last drop of genuine intimacy left before Western degeneracy crushes them completely.

There is no stopping the decline of the sort that Poland is experiencing. It's too hard to change the minds of a large percentage of the population who have been deceived in thinking that the West's soulless value system is their path to happiness and riches. When they approach the end of the rainbow they'll be surprised to find that there is no pot of gold, and that they've lost what can never be regained.

In Defense Of American Women

February 13, 2015 | by Colin Post | Link | Original Link

There are few absolute truths in this world. Before you condemn your culture for another, know what you are getting into. You are a gringo, more liberal than you realize. Deny your identity at your own risk.

This is a message of moderation to the manosphere about American and “western” women.

I am married to a Peruvian woman and I am happy. My wife brings my meals to the table. I do not ask to be served; I am served. The dishes, the laundry, the house-cleaning – she does it all. She cares for our baby every day. I change a diaper every other day or so (maybe 10% of total diapers). When we visit her family, her mother takes over these duties. As a man, I am expected to do none of this.

When I temporarily worked on a landscaping crew in St. Louis, I came home filthy and exhausted. My wife was horrified by my state, heartsick with concern. She insisted I remove my shoes so she could rub my dirty, sweaty feet. I would offer to shower first, but she would insist that I needed relief immediately.

It is not a free lunch. Every benefit comes with a cost.

Disclaimer: On the cultural spectrum, my wife ranks extreme on all the Latina stereotypes. So while my situation is rare, it also gives me the unique perspective to explain the virtues of gringa women.

The downsides you may not see

Any woman who worships you emotionally and physically is not going to understand personal space. She is not going to be cool with your getting shit-hammered at the bar until 4 a.m. Believe all you want about your game, but a woman whose happiness and well-being depend on you, by definition, will not be happy with you having fun with others.

She will be jealous and possessive – two of the most typical traits of Latin women. If you think you can have a woman who will wash and press all your clothes before rubbing your disgusting feet after you cut the grass, and then passively sit by while you go out on a bender, you may be deluding yourself.

I know many gringos married to Latin women. Some of these husbands have the freedom to go out and do what they want, but those wives are relatively westernized and do not do 100% of the cooking, cleaning, and laundry work. My wife is the opposite, but "personal space" does not translate to Spanish. If I asked my wife to wipe my ass, she would do it. However, if someday I said I wanted to do it myself from now on, she would protest. It might be tough to get that job back.

Plenty of gringos meet up with me in Colombia or Peru. My wife insists on coming along. Her English has not always been up to par, so she would sit at the next table without understanding a word. She just wants to monitor the happenings, to make sure there are no other women in the picture, no flirtatious waitresses, no unexpected personalities. Some gringos are reading this right now and laughing, "I had a beer with Colin [in Lima or Bogota or wherever] and his wife sat at the next table the whole time, not drinking or eating, she just sat and watched us talk!"

Maybe you do not want to take on the traditional roles for men. We attended a basketball game in Peru. It was the city championship game, and I used to play for one of the teams. All the players are my friends, and I was tuned into the action when my wife said she needed to go to the bathroom. Sure, go ahead.

Instead of going, she looked at me, waiting. Seated on my other side, her police officer father told me that I needed to accompany her to the bathroom, or he would. So I walked her down the steps, past the court in front of hundreds of spectators, and to the bathroom, where I waited outside for her to finish.

That lesson reminded me of when I lived in Tucson, Arizona. I used to be at the downtown bus station a few times a week, and it was always crowded with Mexican-American youngsters. Coming from Missouri, it struck me how the young Mexican guys would always have their arm around their girlfriend. If not the arm draping, they would be holding hands or something – never just walking side-by-side like cold gringos.

Manosphere readers may call “BETA!” but understand you are judging from a liberal paradigm. My father-in-law explained, after we came back from the bathroom, that some other man could take my wife away. I doubt it, I countered. But it was no use. In a traditional family in a traditional society, males have gender roles too. You can try to fight it. You can also piss into the wind.

In the early days after shacking up, my wife sometimes asked for permission to go out with her friends after work. Being the liberal gringo I am, of course it was OK. I don’t care. She never went out on any of these occasions. She came home at the exact same hour as always every time she had requested prior permission (I now suspect she did this just to see what I would be doing).

I did not realize it at the time, but in effect, she ceased having friends. She still chats with them on Facebook, but they never meet. And her friends understand. In traditional cultures, family is life. Life is family. Any time spent with friends costs time with family. Maybe I have been in Latin America too long, but I have come around to seeing it this way too.

I have given up the idea of friends. I allow myself just once a month to meet up with a friend away from family. If a month passes without scheduling a hangout, I miss that month. No sweat. Are you willing to give up friends? Are you willing to spend seven days a week with your family?

Contrary to what you may believe about American women

The United States is a land of extremes. There are many obese American women, but American women are also the world’s fittest. While they may not be as overweight, the feminine Latina is not inclined to doing heavy barbell squats, power snatches, or burpees. After so much time in Latin America, seeing the athletic builds on women in the United States is always a surprise. Soccer, track-and-field, and CrossFit girls are a distinctly western breed.

Many American women want to be faithful wives and mothers. I lived with my college sweetheart for two years, a 100% American gringa. She was highly desired by other men and a social butterfly among women. She did the majority of the housework (I did a slightly less-than-fair share), and I had guys' nights out. She had a gang of beautiful girlfriends whose mission in life was to get hitched and start families. All of her gang, including her, are married with children now.

Before coming back to Peru, I worked at a bar where a Catholic group of young adults had a monthly party. I worked this group several times and was always taken aback by the girls – they were beautiful and healthy. Definitely not the type to be at hook-up bars. Certainly some have been seduced by a player somewhere along the line, but most seemed to be looking for a husband while learning the teachings of Thomas Aquinas over a beer (rarely more than one or two).

What the manosphere presents about American women is real, but so is my reality in America. And mine is significant. It is not small. Those American women are not just my ex and the girls from the Catholic drinking events. I have cousins, friends, friends of cousins, and cousins of friends who want to settle down with a man and be traditional wives.

These are American girls who will not insist on you spending seven days a week with your family. They will not flip out over every girl who leaves a comment on your Facebook update. They grew up with the same cultural influences you did.

It is no coincidence that some of the top manosphere writers hail from Washington, D.C. The American women I describe are not in places like DC, New York, or Los Angeles. They are in Missouri, Michigan, or Georgia. They are in the suburbs and red states. If you live in New York, you might have to venture out to Long Island. If you live in Chicago, try the burbs. If you are in California, you may just have to leave.

Furthermore, these women are not childless at 30 years old. They will have found men to start families with by that age. You have to find them in their early-to mid-20s. If you are over 35 and want a traditional American girl, you either need to devise a cradle-robbing strategy or settle for a single mother.

Before you believe the grass is greener on the other side, you would be wise to see your own backyard's benefits. The neighbor's may have weeds that you cannot see from your side.

The UK's "Take Me Out" Embodies All That Is Wrong With Society

February 14, 2015 | by Ricky Clarridge | Link | Original Link

I watched the UK version of dating game show Take Me Out the other night. For those of you fortunate enough never to have witnessed this emasculating abomination, the format sees 30 single women each standing on their own lit-up podium to show how special they are.

Each one has a button to turn their light off. In each round some hapless simpleton—sorry, lucky male contestant—lumbers out to try to impress them by dancing, singing, and revealing intimate details about his personal life.

If the girls want to date him they keep their light on and if they don't they turn it off, often in the opening segment (which is based purely on looks). At the end, having pranced around and humiliated himself on national television, the contestant then gets to choose which of the remaining women he'd like to treat to a short getaway to Cyprus.

If all the girls turn their lights off, the beta walks off to a humiliating rendition of Celine Dion's All By Myself as the girls sway their hands back and forth above their heads. Honestly.

Given this unprecedented level of entitlement, you'd think the girls would at least be stunners. Far from it; some of these self-indulgent bints are bonafide hogs. In the interest of journalistic objectivity, here are a few pictures of women who have actually had the gall to appear on the show. You can judge for yourselves.

England’s finest.

Case closed.

So why write this article now given the show has existed for some time? In short, the latest episode represented a new low for this degrading insight into the UK’s slut-on-a-pedestal ideology.

The slutty ex

Whilst I was busy shaking my head and tutting at another contestant reassuring his prized pig that it “didn’t bother [him]” that she was more than a decade his senior and had a kid, out walked Nick. He was a little too hipster for my liking but seemed harmless enough, and fared well with nearly half of the girls still interesting moving into the final segment.

Host Paddy McGuinness then checked how it was going with a couple of the girls. It was at this point that the audience met the cuntishly-named Looci (spelt Lucy in 99% of the world) who revealed that Nick was actually her ex-boyfriend.

“He is a beautiful person from head-to-toe, inside and out” she cooed through pierced lips before revealing that she’d dumped him. She patted the tattoo on her chest which covered her black heart, feigning genuine emotion, and her little act paid off. The other girls immediately turned their lights off with the exception of one particularly desperate manatee.

The kind of face only a mother could love.

“He was the last serious boyfriend I had” she admitted in a thinly veiled hat tip to her glory days on the cock carousel following the breakup. Stuck between a rock and a fat place, Nick foolishly opted for his cock-gobbling ex-girlfriend and the two walked off into the distance holding hands as the audience applauded the downfall of humanity.

In his ensuing 10-second interview Nick gave us a frustratingly submissive insight into his decision. “She broke my heart. I’m hoping this is a second chance at something with her…I’ll try not to cry” he whimpered.

How can anyone, even a beta as feeble as our antihero Nick, consider taking back a piece of shit like her? Let’s rewind, shall we Nick? You were together three years and she broke your heart when she gave you the elbow. She then spent “a long time” without a “serious boyfriend” as she sucked off every man and his dog before applying for the show in search of more attention and more penetration.

She had your number. She didn’t call you. She chose the show.

Then, young Nicholas, you appeared. At the first hint of you actually moving on and enjoying some time with a girl who wasn’t a grotesque, tattoo-ridden demon with more shrapnel in her body than a World War II veteran, she pulled a cock-blocking move of mammoth proportions. Have some pride. Put out her light. Spit in her face (optional).

What it means

Whilst we can all collectively weep for what will inevitably be a torrid second dumping for Nick it was, of course, largely his own fault. The real problem here is the ramifications on a national audience. The show pulls in around 3 million viewers which is a significant figure in the UK. Think of the impressionable teenagers and young adults watching this who think that this is actually the way men should behave in society.

The idea that men should have to parade themselves around and quite literally put on a performance to impress these brain-dead and largely unattractive women sets a worrying precedent. What makes them so desirable? Why should men pander to them for the privilege of giving them a holiday? Why is there no alternative of a woman vying for the attention of 30 fat, slobbish men with tattoos and piercings?

This piece of shit show is a microcosm of the modern western world’s skewered perception of gender roles. Women, no matter how uninteresting, unintelligent, and unattractive, are raised with a sense of entitlement which makes them believe they have an innate right to be fawned over by men.

Despite being uneducated and well-versed in the universal language of dick, girls like Looci continue to trap blue pill betas like Nick and condemn them to a life sentence of tolerating damaged goods.

Shows like this will come and go. The lasting imprint on our culture will not.

How To Identify The 3 Types Of Teases

February 14, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

The epidemic of flaking has been discussed and explored before. In today's modern feminist societies, it's quite common for a man to meet a girl who sexually "instigates" him deliberately, yet:

- She ejects from physical contact (directly or indirectly) or turns into an ice queen once he tries to escalate after revealing his interest
- She doesn't divulge her contact details while instead flirtatiously cajoles him into giving his first
- She seems to have all the time in the world for others – except him, especially when he tries to close her
- She keeps their interaction only to about herself and the amount of attention guys lavish onto her, after successfully gaining his interest
- She clams up about her past and personal details once he tries to probe about it
- She disappears without sex once he's spent some resources or his time on her

Yes, those are some of the common and numerous indications that he – or even you – could be dealing with a tease.

> Cock-tease (noun, derisive sexual slang):
> a woman who acts in a sexual manner to lead men to the mistaken belief that she is likely to have sexual intercourse with them,without actually fulfilling the sexual actions.

As mentioned earlier, it's more advisable to walk away than to waste time on these women. But what must be understood is that there are different types of cock-teasers, and so are their levels of cock-teasing "game."

Analyzing her psychology and behavior

The behavior of the cock-teaser can be efficiently interpreted as the practical demonstration of certain laws from Robert Greene's The 48 Laws of Power – depending on her type and level. Her cock-teasing is a part of her game to gain power over the minds of her orbiters. However, one law which basically defines the core psychology of every cock-teaser is:

> DO NOT COMMIT TO ANYONE, BUT BE COURTED BY ALL:
> If you allow people to feel they possess you to any degree, you lose all power over them. By not committing your affections, they will only try harder to win you over. Stay aloof and you gain the power that comes from their attention and frustrated desire. Play the Virgin Queen: Give them hope but never satisfaction. – Law 20

The cock-teaser gives hope, but never satisfaction or gratification—in return for the attention she craves, courts or receives—since that's the nutrition for her self-esteem. In worst cases, she'll cock-tease to pit men against each other, while enjoying the pleasure of the attention of her orbiters whom she'll mercilessly play with or even exploit for her aims.

> COURT ATTENTION AT ALL COST
> Everything is judged by its appearance; what is unseen counts for nothing. Never let yourself get lost in the crowd, then, or buried in oblivion. Stand out. Be conspicuous, at all cost. Make yourself a magnet of attention by appearing larger; more colorful, more mysterious than the bland and timid masses. – Law 6

Furthermore, even if she is not a virgin' or a queen, she often acts like one.

> BE ROYAL IN YOUR OWN FASHION: ACT LIKE A KING TO BE TREATED LIKE ONE

> The way you carry yourself will often determine how you are treated: In the long run, appearing vulgar or common will make people disrespect you. For a king respects himself and inspires the same sentiment in others. By acting regally and confident of your powers, you make yourself seem destined to wear a crown. – Law 34

The cock-teaser actually manufactures or conjures up the fantasy of sex with her….

> PLAY TO PEOPLE'S FANTASIES
> Life is so harsh and distressing that people who can manufacture romance or conjure up fantasy are like oases in the desert: Everyone flocks to them. There is great power in tapping into the fantasies of the masses. – Law 32 through compelling, selective and "generous" acts of sexual flirting or display…

> CREATE COMPELLING SPECTACLES
> Striking imagery and grand symbolic gestures mate the aura of power-everyone responds to them. Stage spectacles for those around you, then, full of arresting visuals and radiant symbols that heighten your presence. Dazzled by appearances, no one will notice what you are really doing. – Law 37 or sometimes even kindness and affection….

> USE SELECTIVE HONESTY AND GENEROSITY TO DISARM YOUR VICTIM
> One sincere and honest move will cover over dozens of dishonest ones. Open-hearted gestures of honesty and generosity bring down the guard of even the most suspicious people. Once your selective honesty opens a hole in their armor, you can deceive and manipulate them at will. A timely gift-a Trojan horse will > serve the same purpose.– Law 12

…effectively baiting men into believing that she would reward them with sex…

> MAKE OTHER PEOPLE COME TO YOU-USE BAIT IF NECESSARY
> When you force the other person to act, you are the one in control. It is always better to make your opponent come to you, abandoning his own plans in the process. Lure him with fabulous gains-then attack. You hold the cards. – Law 8 yet prolongs it (indefinitely) while enjoying male attention and other benefits from men.

> CONTROL THE OPTIONS: GET OTHERS TO PLAY WITH THE CARDS YOU DEAL
> The best deceptions are the ones that seem to give the other person a choice: Your victims feel they are in control, but are actually your puppets. Give people options that come out in your favor whichever one they choose.- Law 31

In certain cases, she acts as a confidante, deliberately pushing herself close to men…

> POSE AS A FRIEND, WORK AS A SPY
> Knowing about your rival is critical. Use spies to gather valuable information that will keep you a step ahead. Better still: Play the spy yourself In polite social encounters, learn to probe. Ask indirect questions to get people to reveal their weaknesses and intentions. There is no occasion that is not an opportunity for artful spying. – Law 14 in reality to discover men's weaknesses…

> DISCOVER EACH MAN'S THUMBSCREW
> Everyone has a weakness, a gap in the castle wall. That weakness is usually an insecurity, an uncontrollable emotion or need; it can also be a small secret pleasure. Either way, once found, it is a thumbscrew you can turn to your advantage. – Law 33 essentially trying to prey on men's minds and hearts, to implant herself strongly there…

> WORK ON THE HEARTS AND MINDS OF OTHERS
> Coercion creates a reaction that will eventually work against you.You must seduce others into wanting to move in your direction. A person you have seduced becomes your loyal pawn. And the way to seduce others is to operate on their individual psychologies and weaknesses. Soften up the resistant by working on their emotions, playing on what they hold dear and what they feel: Ignore the hearts and mind of others and they will grow to hate you. – Law 41

…so as to create or feed a powerful illusion of the possibility of having sex (sometimes even love) with her in men's minds, so as to keep them psychologically attracted, attached and dependent on her presence.

> LEARN TO KEEP PEOPLE DEPENDENT ON YOU
> To maintain your independence you must always be needed and wanted. The more you are relied on, the more freedom you have. Make people depend on you for their happiness and prosperity and you have nothing to fear: Never teach them enough so that they can do without you. – Law 11

A man's emotional attachment is the prize which women seek. While she may not actively seek a man's commitment (physical attachment), the cock-teaser basically thrives on male attention (psychological attachment).

Suffocate her from male attention, and see how she would (often instantaneously) change her behavior around men. But since there are different types of such women, below are mentioned some common types (some of whose traits may overlap) that men usually encounter .

Types of cock-teasers

1. Dark triad

The most dangerous type of cock-teaser, for she makes cock-teasing as a wicked art form for personal leverage. Since her cock-teasing is essentially her 'gaming' you to get leverage with worse outcomes for you – it's best to stay clear of her. There are two kinds of dark triad cock-teasers: the one who has a known notch count, and the one with the unknown notch count – but both are equally dangerous.

Categorize her as either a slut or whore depending on how she would provide sex, the dark triad cock-teaser with a known notch count is usually promiscuous – and yet men are irresistibly attracted to her allure. But the years on the cock carousel have psychologically and emotionally hardened her enough to separate sex from love and commitment, so she has perfected the art of running her sales pitch on men.

2. “Virginal”

One of the worst ways a virgin could cock-tease men is by making them believe that one of them could take away her precious virginity. Reading through history, one would’ve across quite a number of such accounts where men sacrificed even their lives fighting against each other for the sake of a maiden’s hand (for the hopeful deflowering of her precious hymen subsequently in a relationship).

One red pill truth is that : the Madonnas and the Whores are the same girls – for the whore was also a virgin at one point in her life. Water takes the shape of the container it’s put in, and so is the nature of women. The virgin might actually be or remain a virgin not more so out of personal choice, but out of fear, lack of options and societal constraints—especially if she comes from a society or community where virginity is prized.

I’ve wondered how some of these virgins used to embark on their own post-marriage cock carousel, cheating on their husbands with various men, once their virginity was deflowered legally in a marriage. Felt sorry for the husbands though, for these men (often ignorant of female nature), probably thought their virgin brides would still remain virtuous later on.

3. Conservative

The conservative cock-teaser is quite similar to the virginal one. The only difference is that she is not a virgin, having lost it “honorably” within a relationship. Nevertheless, her modus operandi remains similar to the virginal cock-teaser: apart from baiting prospective sex, while the virginal type promises the prize of her virginity, the conservative type instead promises the prize of her commitment and a rewarding companionship— and both promises are flakes.

4. Relationship whore or desperate for relationship

The relationship whore cock-teases her orbiters using her “easy” reputation—just like the dark triad type. Some relationship whores actually represent the transition phase between casual sluthood and dark triad, and sometimes the emotionally hardening years on the cock carousel sometimes replaces her immature mentality with a more cunning one later on.

Sometimes a relationship whore never psychologically hardens, for she might be actually flirting to really mean her willing sexual receptivity. But a beta usually blows it up with her by investing too fast and too much of himself into his interaction with her, that she then decides to withhold sex because he’s lowered his self value and she’s getting his attention what without dishing out sex in return.

In addition, there are certain factors which support a cock-teaser’s girl game.

The factors which favor her “game”

Cock-teasers usually take advantage of certain factors, which can be neutralized by men once men understand how they work. They are:

1. Male sexual thirst

While it can propel a man into actively seeking sex, sexual thirst can also screw up his judging skills, perception, and game—thus making him lower his standards and blind him to the type of women he might be dealing with. A woman who correctly deduces the intensity of sexual thirst of the man she’s dealing with can thus choose to cock-tease him at will.

One of the greatest tests for a man when it comes with dealing with women is to emotionally detach his sexual thirst from his perception and eventual judgement of them. Difficult as it may sound, but it is an important step towards self-mastery. Most men don’t know how to regulate sexual thirst, let alone master it.

2. Lack of game among men

As some red pillers say, game is essentially trolling women—but a part of that trolling involves either telegraphing male sexual thirst in an effective way, or sometimes camouflaging male sexual thirst altogether. Even if a man doesn’t want to have sex with the woman he’s interacting with, game knowledge will help him to understand her better, and harness his own mind and sexuality better to his own advantage.

But the man with no game doesn’t know how to deal with his sexual thirst, nor does he understand female psychology. Usually he becomes a slave to his own thirst, and eventually to women.

3. Demographics

Women are the gatekeepers of sex. In societies where men exceed women in number, such sausage-fest situations usually end up covertly in favor of women when it comes to peddling sex (even though this may not apparent at first), in spite of men being socially stronger there. With women having more sexual options and greater sexual power as compared to men in these scenarios, men then have to deal with more instances of cock-teasing from women.

4.Societal indoctrination and culture

Female hypergamy unchained is an irrefutable truth in modern societies today. With women increasingly rewarding alphas with sex first in such gyro-centric societies where women call the shots, the situation of flaking and cock-teasing would worsen even more in such societies should men exceed women in number, which would further give women an entitlement complex simply because she was born with a vagina.

Secondly, women migrating to such societies then usually get brainwashed into adopting all the undesirable traits of sluthood, whoredom, misandry and cock-teasing – which all feminism usually leads to.

Birds of the same feather flock together, and women migrating to such societies usually end up as loyal members of the same feminist herd they would be indoctrinated to be a part of, upon arrival.

> Whatever men set about to impress women with, counts for nothing in the world of women. Only another woman is of importance in her world. – Esther Vilar, The Manipulated Man

Conclusion

Depending on your expertise at game, it's still possible to seduce a cock-teaser. However, most of the time they are not worth the effort and time. The good old adage says "it's always better to choose your battles wisely," and the same applies to choosing your seductions.

The Southern Poverty Law Center—known for its public slandering of allegedly hateful people—now seems to have a worse stain on its methods than any crazy right wing group. On Wednesday, a militant atheist in North Carolina named Craig Hicks murdered three innocent Muslim students at Chapel Hill. He then turned himself into the police and is currently in jail.

He has not spoken yet, and the government has not released an official report. Current speculation is that it was a hate crime. Hicks's Facebook page is full of atheist and far-left propaganda, and he liked several progressivist pages, including HuffPo and SPLC.

The SPLC has a map of people's addresses who are considered hateful to facilitate vigilante social justice. One would assume this merely means letter-writing, but I cannot think of any effective means short of bullying that such a map could provide.

The Map

In 2011 an assassin used the map to target a Christian group but failed, murdering a security guard in the process. Now some claim it has happened again with a militant atheist murdering three Muslims, although this seems impossible to know for certain at this time.

The mainstream media has tried to dismiss the man's religion as incidental, and they've outright ignored his far left wing political views, which can be seen on his Facebook page. He clicked like on several far left wing and atheistic groups, including SPLC. But to the media, he is practically a Bible-beating Republican or at least has the same frame of mind.

However, I'm not sure the people murdered were on SPLC's hate map, since the only Muslims on the map's North Carolina list are black separatists. Even if they were on it, I doubt Hicks could have used it to find the individuals. They appear to be three random Muslim students at Chapel Hill.

Nevertheless, it could still plausibly be motivated by his ideology. To my knowledge, no red-piller has ever murdered anyone because of ideology. And of course this happened in North Carolina, the freakshow state in the South.

The Narrative Continues

The media is also trying to claim that the man doesn't represent "real" atheism, because that way it gives their philosophy a pass on doing away with absolutes (the similarities between secular-liberals and the evangelical Christians I grew up with never cease to amaze me). People love individualistic philosophies because it gives them an excuse when the consequences of the belief system manifest in ugly ways.

Good news, though. A candlelight vigil is being scheduled in DC, so I'm sure that makes it all right. I imagine the pope will give a forgettable address about the whole thing that will offend nobody accept his own adherents. Then the Onion will write something to inspire the masses, and it'll be the same cycle we encounter every month. Leftism is like a woman—it has to get cranky and bleed every 28 days.

Ideologies

How much of a connection there was between the murders and Hicks's leftism may not ever be known, but more and more right-wing online journals are making the connection. It may be a convenient conjecture, but it may not be a false narrative either.

In addition to leftist and anti-theist likes, his Facebook is full of atheistic quotes and memes. There are no posts explicitly SLPC-driven, although he is very pro-LGBT. He also has a picture of a gun he just bought. You'd think his meme about bringing atheism to the mideast to end religious wars would be contradictory to that.

Information Pending

But at this time there is not a whole lot of information available. Nor was there any blog or forum he's written on. His Facebook notes were written over a year ago and are inaccessible to non-friends. Perhaps in the near future he'll give a press statement of some kind.

Meanwhile, the SPLC has yet to make a statement about this. They're currently distracted by a controversy about adding and then removing potential president candidate Ben Carson from their list of extremists for his comments against gay marriage.

The Ignoble Savage

THIS IS WHY I NEED CHILDISM

People have an innate drive to conquer others with violence, and they often use their ideologies to justify it. No amount of pacifism or love will ever curb der wille zur macht. Indeed, it appears that progressivism—whether 2nd century Christian or 21st century secularist—always finds its way back to the base drives. If we didn't fight over sacred ground or oil possession, then we'd kill each other over the color of the wall.

European philosophy speaks often of the noble savage. This is the belief that aboriginal peoples were free-living hippies devoid of materialism and hatred, like Pocahontas painting with the colors of the wind. But the historical American Indians and many other non-Western peoples were extremely industrious and bloody. The Europeans did a lot to settle them, even if their methods were sometimes unethical.

Hicks's murder truly shows the futility of leftism. We find the more liberal a person is, the more hateful and miserable he is. Do liberals want equality, tolerance, and peace, or do they want a complete abandonment of unprogressive ideas? The activist can never make up his mind. Stalin understood this dualism, that two contradictory ideologies could not exist in harmony.

Which makes me wonder why one should even bother with activism or ideology. Instead of trying to save the world, wouldn't the easier thing to do be to find a house in the mountains and just focus on enjoying yourself?

The Great Tom Brady Nearly Never Happened

In the pantheon of great sporting stars, Tom Brady is placed amongst the elite of the elite. Whilst many will doubt whether he is the greatest NFL player ever, he is undoubtedly the biggest achiever relative to his draft pick order. His fourth Super Bowl early in February (and third Super Bowl MVP award) only further exposes the lunacy that he was not recognized as a future NFL god when a rookie.

Or was it really lunacy? Maybe Brady's greatness lies not in what he showed in his early days, but rather in what he developed into after that time. Instead of a meteoric trajectory, the story of Brady closely resembles an evolution. And for almost all men, evolution, not being something from the start, is the only answer to life and obtaining success.

Few casual observers of football (and even many aficionados) realize that Brady was the 199th draft pick in 2000. An athlete good enough to make the draft in the first place, the time it took for him to be picked was nonetheless hardly stellar. Top draft picks may regularly sputter, yet few would have predicted that the 199th pick of a draft was to become the defining player of his generation. The Patriots, in fact, only chose Brady as that particular pick at the last minute.

Who would have guessed that this guy would “get” four Super Bowls and three Super Bowl MVP’s?

Going back further, Brady was not even close to a star in his first half of college at the University of Michigan. His playing time and psychological woes were so bad that he resorted to a sports psychologist. The mental anguish of the struggle was so consuming at the time that he seriously weighed the idea of returning to his home California.

Even in the far more prosperous second half of his college career, Brady was often neck-and-neck with Drew Henson for playing time, despite always being a starter. His UM junior and senior year record-setting and an Orange Bowl win aside, he had a mixed college experience at best.

Relative Deprivation

Malcolm Gladwell, in his excellent book David and Goliath, explores the concept of “relative deprivation,” where people judge themselves and their own value according to their immediate peers. A play on the “big fish in a small pond” theory, it is as much a part of academia as professional or college sports.

At an elite university, for example, students who otherwise scored very high to enter college regularly perceive themselves as average or even dumb. What matters (to most) is the context, not where you stand across the board. And this, Gladwell explains, is why Ivy League STEM majors drop out at the same rate as students from mediocre or “terrible” universities.

In Brady’s case, playing football at a competitive university was an achievement in and of itself. But when he was making the transition from college football, it would have been hard not to compare himself unfavorably with other elite college players, many of whom had received plaudits much greater and more effusive than Brady. He was good, but not that good. And when you're only good in a field of elite performers, you feel about as accomplished (and feel like you're being rewarded as much) as the shelf-stacker at Walmart.

Forget yards and guiding touchdowns, Brady's greatest asset has been his early-days self-belief.

Athletes, like human beings, tend to take on the labels that society or their peers give them. Being picked 199th in an NFL draft would mean to almost everyone that you're good enough to be on a roster but not good enough to be a football great.

In that sense, your worth and potential are seen as predetermined, something the individual will usually, and tragically, start to believe themselves. At best, under this belief, you'll achieve moderately more than what people anticipated. For Brady to have become not only the best player of that 2000 draft cohort but of the last two decades is nothing short of brilliance. It demonstrates both hard work and an extraordinary self-belief to work hard without reference to any label thrown at you.

Longevity (Usually) Kills Success

Brady's age (now 37) is another factor underscoring his greatness. Exposure to injury over so many years depletes both a player's physical capabilities and, most importantly, his mental and emotional drive. Intense pressure, which only increases with public recognition and attention, can easily sap the confidence of even the greatest player.

Tiger Woods, unlike Brady, has been a shadow of his former self for some years. Since his return to golf after a series of sex scandals, Tiger's seen less Majors or other success than a 100-year-old man sees sex. The pitfalls are always there and Brady, to his great credit, has almost universally avoided them.

Overall, Tom Brady has weathered the storms of high-profile life consistently, even after he joined the non-football celebrity world. A rather turbulent relationship with Bridget Moynahan, his first taste of fatherhood and the scrutiny of the paparazzi over his personal life, not usually as common with NFL players as other celebrities, did nothing to dim his overall career ascendancy. Neither has his subsequent marriage to the world's most well-known supermodel, Gisele Bündchen, and two more children by her.

Pressured by the rise of flashier, younger stars with much, much more to prove, Brady continues to reach for and seize success. In this sense, the mental battles Brady had in his less lauded days of college and draft picks have taken a new form.

Fighting complacency and resisting resting on your laurels isn't as "sexy" a battle as doubting yourself in your early days, or being looked over at the start of your career, but it is just as compelling and arguably more important. If anything, Brady works harder now, with a couple hundred million under his belt and a supermodel wife, than he did when he had nothing special to his name.

Mental game counts more towards Brady's success than the physical variety.

Am I asserting that Tom Brady has always delivered? No, of course not. Like all of us, his career is littered with mistakes, albeit mistakes on a much more watched and scrutinized public stage. Brady certainly has innumerable haters, detractors, and just plain character-bashers. He is routinely underestimated and vilified. Results, however, of which Brady has seven from the Super Bowl alone, speak for themselves.

Resist the labels, implied and otherwise. When you act and go after goals, be like Tom Brady. You never know how high it may take you.

What 5 “Alpha” TV Characters Can Teach You About Confidence

February 15, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

Confidence is a combination of having high self-esteem and being sure of your abilities.

We all know that confidence is the key to success in life. When you’re happy with yourself and you believe that you can do something, things tend to fall into place.

Getting the job, the promotion, or the girl you want simply isn’t much of a challenge when in your mind you already know that you can do it. However, defining confidence and describing the material results it can bring you do little to assist you in actually embodying it.

And this is one area where having a mentor is invaluable. When you have someone who’s more skilled than you in a particular discipline they can show you the ropes. Just watching a buddy who’s great with women will boost your game. Lifting weights with a friend who’s bigger and stronger than you will similarly facilitate your physical growth.

However, we’re not all blessed with such skilled and motivated friends. And this is where fictional characters can sometimes be of service. While television writers and movie directors can manifest whatever the fuck they want onto the screen, this doesn’t mean everything you see on TV is a fairy tale. In fact, I believe that closely watching the behavior of certain characters can be beneficial to your growth.

For example, the following 5 “alpha male” TV characters can teach you a thing or two about confidence…

1. James Bond – Body Language

Good body language is key to a strong first impression

Learning good body language is probably the easiest way to boost your perceived confidence—it's just not that hard to implement.

And James Bond displays superb body language in just about every scene he's in (regardless of which Bond actor you're watching). He moves with a slow and deliberate pace, takes up space, makes strong eye contact, stands up tall, and always appear relaxed and comfortable.

These are the key ingredients to good body language. Watch any bond film (I'm a huge fan of the latest "Skyfall") and pay close attention to how Bond carries himself throughout the movie. Now try and infuse these tendencies into your day-to-day life.

2. Jack Bauer – Persistence

Persistence is the ultimate belief in your abilities

24 is one of my favorite shows. It's so addicting and gratifying to watch because in each season Jack Bauer must persist endlessly and overcome impossible odds to stop a new terrorist threat.

While you and I are not counter terrorist agents working against time to locate and defuse a nuclear weapon, we all face our own obstacles. And if we don't persist past these obstacles, we're unlikely to accomplish anything meaningful.

Persistence is a crucial part of confidence, because when you give up instead of persisting, you're basically admitting that you don't believe in your ability to complete whatever it is that you're trying to do. Watch 24 and admire this man's persistence as he pushes on despite the fact that everyone, his friends and allies included, don't believe in him.

3. Omar Little – Courage

Courage isn't a lack of fear, but rather the ability to confront it

Omar Little of HBO's The Wire is a thief, but one who only robs drug dealers.

Despite his homosexuality, this man is alpha as fuck. His trademark is walking down the street and whistling, with a shotgun slung over his shoulder, as he approaches his target. Talk about confidence.

And while the average man's fears – which include being rejected by women and losing their job – don't quite measure up to his, we can still be inspired by his impressive courage. Why fear rejection and embarrassment when this beast is gunning down criminals?

4. Tywin Lannister – Decisiveness

Making a decision is more important than making the right one

Far too many men are crippled by indecision. When you over-analyze a situation and can't make a decision, you paralyze yourself. And you eat away at your confidence.

Tywin Lannister of Game of Thrones is the king of decision making. He definitely always doesn't make the best tactical decision—and always making the right decision is a fucking pipe dream, so you shouldn't try to do it—but he never hesitates. And for this reason, he's the most powerful character on the show.

The same thing will happen to you if you can become as decisive as him. People unconsciously recognize decision makers. And they naturally begin to view them as leaders. Learn from Tywin and start making faster decisions, regardless of the consequences… You never regret a decision that you DID make.

5. Mal Reynolds – Humor

Don’t take yourself so fucking seriously, bro

Mal Reynolds of Firefly is one of the most confident TV characters of all time. He courageously leads his crew through a myriad of dangerous situations and displays tremendous decision making abilities as well.

But the most important thing you can learn by watching him is the importance of maintaining humor in your life. Even if you’re crushing it, when you lose your sense of humor, life becomes far less enjoyable. No matter how “alpha” or confident you are, being bitter and forgetting to laugh will destroy your happiness.

Watch Mal as he finds a way to make even the most treacherous situations funny. And strive to do the same – and stop taking yourself so fucking seriously.

Pirates, Government, And Red Pill Anarchy

The TV show Black Sails got me thinking about a recent article I wrote about governments. An extension and prequel of Robert Louis Stevenson's Treasure Island, it's the story of Caribbean pirates in the 1700s based out of freewheeling Nassau, running their operations of trade and pillage.

Of course in the modern day we can only expect it to be infused with a certain amount of the feminist agenda; an unrealistic hard-assed blonde hottie running the trading post and the inevitable (and predictable) lesbian scene to juice up the viewers in the first episode. That aside it provides quite an interesting study in the age old competition between capitalism and socialism driven by cultural Marxism.

On the one hand, the pirates are free. They live and die by their wits and dwell outside the rule of the crown. They establish their own rules, many based on violence, survival of the fittest, and capital punishment. However mob rule is an ever present threat, with captains and their financiers painfully aware of the need to maintain politics and morale.

In episode seven there is an interesting conversation between Captain Flint and his quartermaster. The storyline of the first season revolves around the plot to capture a Spanish treasure galleon, which is returning to Spain without a full escort. Being a democratic and anarchistic operation, the share of the treasure will be divided between the captain, crew and their financiers.

Captain Flint plans to secretly sequester a portion of the treasure, (effectively cutting out the crew from some of their winnings) to finance the development of Nassau, acquire armaments, build forts, and develop the island as an independent territory that the British cannot re-take by force.

His impassioned speech to his quartermaster displays a man, who thinks himself above the rest. The quartermaster most accurately shines a light on Captain Flint's designs, which amount to a tax on his crew. He's doing the exact same thing as any king or president. "They'll just piss it all away," he declares.

> Quartermaster: You're lying to them
> Flint: And if I don't who will? Everyone is lied to for their own good. Every mother who tells their child it will be alright, every solider who's told by his commander that courage will see them through, every subject whose told by his…
> Quartermaster: His King! – Is that what you are to us now, a sovereign, levying a tax.
> Flint: If no one knows, everyone wins.
> Quartermaster: Don't play games with me.
> Flint: I'm quite serious – who loses? Absent their worst instincts, their pride, their greed, their suspicion, in the light of pure reason, who says no to this. They will be rich men in a safe place, rather than dead thieves on a long road. I am going to deliver them into something better.

Having the situation portrayed in the confines of a pirate ship allows us to see the folly of what amounts to socialism, and yet Flint may well be correct in stating that the wealth divided up will be squandered. Flint's plans to build up Nassau and keep the colonial forces out, is similar to what Washington did putting an end to the taxes levied by the British Crown.

However, a couple of centuries later we find an enormous, wasteful, and arrogant socialist state that levies taxes on its subjects often in excess of 50% and is arguably more oppressive than any King. At least in the 1700s you did not carry a smart phone that takes your fingerprints and reports your location.

It seems social necessities of man are inclined to lead automatically into socialism, but at the same time, as "safety" and services are installed "for the benefit of the greater good," a degeneration occurs and freedoms are lost. People are forced to pay for things (via taxes) they don't need or want, while the governmental operation becomes increasingly oppressive, money hungry, and wasteful.

You have to wonder whether the human being will ever be able to overcome this hypocrisy. It's certainly true that the internet has whittled down the power of the few and politicians are desperately clinging onto 19th and 20th century political models that seem set to collapse.

On the other hand if they do give way, the alternatives are outright Mad Max-style warlords (monarchy) or oppressive communist states that have already been tried and failed miserably. The pirate captains are ever aware of the need to avoid mob rule, whilst also preserving the democratic and anarchistic status quo, by lies and dissembling truth if necessary.

Democracy is a messy business because the man in the street lacks the intelligence, knowledge, perspective and will to fully understand complex situations. Politicians break down social goals into meaningless anecdotes and outright lies:

> "You'll be fine"
> "For the greater good"
> "Change you can believe in"

They do this to get a resolution and a group mandate enabling their agenda, at the same time as keeping them in power (massaging their pride and wallet). Perhaps the hypocrisy lies in having a single human in this role at all. As our computers become increasingly advanced could we not build a future free from leaders and pontiffs?

Government is just a business

The services on offer: roads, schools, utilities, healthcare, law courts, judges, police, prisons, military – essentially amount to little more than business opportunities that could be run by private enterprise. The reason government controls these things is a bi-product from the medieval monarchy who were the only ones wealthy and powerful enough to maintain them.

Rather than role back the reach of the ruler (as originally promised), the politician is a managerial gangster intent on monopolizing these services. To make matters worse, most of them are talentless lawyers with zero real life practical or economic experience who are content to rule by decree while implementing mindless academic theory.

Government has zero performance incentive or profit motive

Take a product like Jack Daniels or Kellogg's, famous iconic brand names that exist precisely because the producer put his name to them and used to literally sign each packet to ensure its authenticity to the consumer. The United Kingdom or The United States are (were) held in high esteem in large part because their "brand name" represented equitable and well-enforced property rights and a balanced rule of law.

A proactive and prudent private police force would be well-renowned, a good law court that provided balanced justice held in high esteem – poor ones, soon out of business. Prisons would provide real correction and education whilst profiting from the spoils of the offenders. Local areas could very easily govern themselves and chose their own service providers, just as we do today with telecoms, utilities, etc.

Where our old fashioned governments build ever larger institutions to consolidate their mafia style stranglehold on power, what is actually needed is smaller and smaller units that rely on service providers and their reputation.

The only leader we need today is one who tells us his job is obsolete

If you take the red pill in regards to government, what you will see is that the internet has given us the ability to govern ourselves, maintaining well organized, regulated, and cost-efficient services. Those Facebook likes will soon tell us which law court is fair and which is corrupt. Twitter gives an immediate feedback on any event or problem; add in some complex algorithms that analyze the data, computers can be absolutely politically impartial.

Forums such as those on ROK give everyone a voice and allow dissemination and discussion. At the high level, democracy is a joke, but on a lower level every aspect can be cross examined and voted upon in real time, every user ranked by algos. Thus, what you suddenly have is instant democracy and a free and fair neural network where the intelligence and input of everyone is combined openly and justly. Political direction can literally be assigned in realtime like a computer game.

People get terribly scared when you talk about anarchy, but networked anarchy where every little bit of information counts is something only attainable in the last decade. Communism is dead, socialism is desperate and dying, we cannot go backward to monarchy. The most intelligent future is one where everything and everyone counts.

If you disagree, then tell me why I must report my income to government via forms so heinously complex I must pay some "expert" to complete them. Why must I prepare and store records going back a decade at my own expense, that can be audited and declared incorrect with fines and new charges levied at gunpoint if necessary?

I have no objection to paying for services I use, send me an invoice, let me understand the exact cost structures (cough …. 100 x $100M jet planes). If the services are communal I want to see a breakdown to two decimal places and understand the contributions of other users.

This is so easily achieved with modern computing, and yet we still find ourselves muted and subjected to the 18th century protection racket of the crown. It's time this came to an end. It will come to an end, but the only question is how belligerent the current leaders will be in stepping aside and how much damage will be done to society in removing the cancer of government.

Governments claim that without their stewardship, corporations and rich will create monopolies, but just as the British encouraged pirates (privateers) to raid Spanish ships, it's the government that encourages corporations to monopolize the marketplace, so it is more easily controlled and any competition is undermined.

There is a better way offered by free and open communication combined with computing power that can literally account for every fine detail and every individual. The threat is not ISIS or some random terrorist—as ever, the "threat" is government monopolies verses the free thinking man. I raise my banner, and I hope others will too.

11 Signs You're Being A Wuss

We need to have a little talk, you and I.

No one is perfect. No one is exempt from lapses in discipline, or failures to maintain proper bearing. The important question is whether we will correct our conduct, and get back on the right track.

We need to talk about this, because it's an important subject. In my day-to-day life, I often see men who act like wusses, wimps, or pussies. Some of these people are easy to identify. Some are not. None of us is exempt, from time to time, from occasionally veering our ship into these pussified shoals. Inside every successful man, no matter how great, is an inner wuss that must be checked and restrained.

What is the "inner wuss"? It's that little voice inside your head that tells you to do wuss-like things. It's that voice telling you to write a malicious, dickish comment on a blog that you know is cowardly bullshit. It's that little voice telling you to go easy on yourself, to sit back and coast, to dodge responsibility for your life, to snipe at people more successful than you, and to take a "wait and see" approach to everything.

It's that voice crying out for other people to comfort you in your wussified behavior. You know what this voice sounds like. Because you hear it every day. We all do, to some extent.

You can't achieve the goals you want in life without keeping your inner wuss safely locked away in the basement: and I mean chained and bound. You can't empower him. You can't listen to him. He doesn't want to help you. He wants to hurt you.

But how do we know when we're acting like fucking wusses? How do we know when our inner slimebag is trying to ooze out? Here are some guidelines. I want you to read this list carefully.

1. You make things easier on yourself

Wusses like to take it easy. They don't want to be challenged. They would rather take the short cuts in life, to copy someone else's homework, to skate out of their responsibilities. Wusses like to come up with elaborate rationalizations as to why they can't stop being wusses.

On a long enough timeline, the wuss in you can dominate all of your dealings in life. And when that happens, you're just like all those other worthless sacks of shit in America, sitting in front of the television, griping about imaginary bugbears. The problem is not what's on the television. The problem is you: you're a wuss.

2. You always have excuses

Wusses love excuses. They have them for every occasion. Just ask any fucking wuss you know, and he'll rattle off a whole laundry list of why he can't go to the gym, why he can't get laid, why he can't travel, why he can't get his business off the ground, why he can't learn his favorite foreign language. And you know what? It doesn't add up to dry shit. Because the problem is him: he's a fucking wuss. So you need to stop giving excuses.

3. You're arrogant and opinionated

This may sound counter-intuitive. Why would a fucking pussy be arrogant and opinionated? But the answer makes sense, when you think about it. The wuss is, deep down, afraid of being exposed. So he sublimates his fear, and projects it outward. He becomes an expert on everything. Just ask him! He'll tell you.

He knows everything about everything; and more importantly, he knows why everyone else is doing things the wrong way. Acting arrogant and opinionated is the wuss's way of channeling his insecurity outward.

4. You’re hypercritical of others

Not only is the wuss an arrogant prick, but he loves to tear down other people. Again, the driving impulse here is fear and insecurity. If the wuss is successful at taking down other people, he can feel better about himself.

5. You refuse helpful leadership

A real man is not afraid of being led by a real leader. But the wuss instinctively recoils from vigorous leadership. He doesn’t want to be told what to do. He doesn’t want to be corrected. He doesn’t want to be given guidance. He’s happy festering in his own shit.

6. You’re slovenly and disorganized

Yeah, yeah, I know. You think that your messy room, unkempt appearance, and fucked-up clothing are signs of how much of a cool rebel you are. You think your lack of preoccupation with worldly concerns makes you a wise person. Wrong: this is how wusses think.

No healthy thinking or acting can take place in the midst of slovenliness. It takes work and effort to look good and live in a good environment. Get your head out of rectal defilade and clean your act up. Lack of attention to personal grooming and hygiene shows only that you are one thing: a fucking wuss.

7. You dislike criticism and self-reflection

Wusses hate to look into the mirror. They hate to reflect on their wussiness. Wusses are hypersensitive about almost everything related to themselves. And most of all, they hate to hear other people point out deficiencies in their lifestyle.

Instead of looking at themselves, wusses love to project their neuroses and problems out on others. They externalize. They rationalize. But in the end, it never satisfies them completely. Because deep down, they know what the real problem is. The real problem is them: they're fucking wusses.

8. You avoid successful people or good things

Wusses hate good quality. They hate great things. Wusses hate winners. Wusses hate reminders of how pathetic they are. Wusses will perform elaborate somersaults to avoid coming into contact with healthy, strong characters. They hang around other pussies and wusses, so that they can feel better about themselves. If you look around you and see a bunch of wusses, then guess what? You're one too.

9. You take a "wait and see" approach too much

Lack of decision is not a good trait. Wusses like to sit back, see how things develop, and hope that problems sort themselves out. They are not problem-solvers. They are problem-dodgers. Yes, sometimes in life things can be solved by patient waiting. But that is not the game plan of the wuss. His inaction is not based on a calculated, rational plan. His inaction is based on the fact that he is a fucking wuss.

If you want to solve problems, you need to solve them. Not cogitate about them. Not start a thread on a forum about them, so you can wrap yourself in a fucking comfort blanket, and have everyone molly-coddle your insecurities. You need to take action. Like, right fucking now.

Don't tell me it's hard. Don't tell me it can't be done. The problem is one of willpower.

10. You're a malingerer

Wusses always seem to have some physical deficiency. They have lower back problems. They have upper back problems. They have fallen arches. They have fallen eyebrows. They have hangnails, carpal tunnel, arachnophobia, dorkophobia, sensitive skin, lactose intolerance, work intolerance, allergies, and a hundred other bloody things.

And amazingly, all of these physical problems flare up at convenient times when work needs to be done. Most people in the world have some physical issue or another. But they deal with it. Quietly. The real problem is you: you're a wuss.

11. You encounter the first obstacle, and then give up

Wusses can't carry complex tasks through to conclusion. When they are told to do something, or when they undertake something, they quit at the very first sign of difficulty. They take off their pack, sit on the side of the road, and give up.

No project in life that is worth doing is going to be easy. Nothing is going to be smooth sailing. There will be obstacles, roadblocks, and barriers placed in front of you at every step of the way. No one out there wants you to succeed. You need to push though all these obstacles.

If something doesn't work, try something else. If you find an obstacle, go around it. If you encounter a barrier, smash through it. Need a battering ram? Use your head if you have to. There is always a way.

So there it is. Keep this list at hand. You can even laminate it if you want to. Review it periodically. If you find yourself slipping into more than half of these habits, then you have a problem. You're acting like a fucking wuss. And you need to correct yourself.

Why All Men Should Consider A Vasectomy

February 16, 2015 | by Jack Lidstone | Link | Original Link

In this day and age, with medical technology being what it is, there is really no reason to have an “accident” with some slut you pulled on a slow night. There is much less of a reason for an accident when you factor in all the things you have to lose by surrendering your power to women in these matters.

You will have no legal position over what happens next if you knock a girl up. It is her body – it is her decision what happens next. She might have an abortion, or she might keep you on the hook for eighteen years. Do you really want to play roulette every time you get it on with a girl for the rest of your life? Why even stress about it?

Don’t be a dummy

If you think of the number of times you would like to have sex with a young beautiful women versus how many times you will want to impregnate one of these women, I think the argument for your vasectomy becomes rather straightforward. You want to have sex with as many young beautiful women as you can throughout your lifetime. Well of course you do, don't we all?

What's the maximum number of children you intend to father? I'd be surprised if the number was more than three. Are you really willing to risk your paycheck for eighteen years on the word of some girl that she has taken care of the contraception on her end? Every single time you have sex? Don't be an idiot!

The plan

You need to take some drastic action to keep those greedy little woman hands out of your pockets at payday. Go to a sperm clinic and "put your money in the bank" for later use. If and when you want a child, it can therefore be on your own terms. If it's good enough for the greatest stud animals in this world, then it's surely good enough for you. By keeping your sperm cryogenically frozen you keep the little fellas absolutely ageless and as healthy as they day they were put on ice.

Since your body is your own business (unless you choose to parade the fact you are firing blanks now to every girl you hook up with) you have now taken a little control over every relationship you ever enter into again.

Imagine you are dating this smoking girl and you happily believe this is all going smoothly. Then she drops a pregnancy bomb on you, not knowing that you are firing blanks. Do you think you just gathered some very valuable intelligence about this girl you were starting to fixate on? Next her, eject, and carry on.

What if you end up with a girl who truly wants you to settle down and she starts mewling for a baby? Enjoy trying for a while, then remember that this is what you put your money in the bank for in the first place! If you truly think she is motherhood material, here is your chance to be a father.

If she balks or bawls about things being unnatural, just tell her that you don't necessarily think abortions are natural either, but you respect a woman's right to choose. Tell her you expect her to be happy you were so selective about whom you fathered a child with and that if she is really not interested in being the recipient of your genetic potential she should simply move on. Save your money in the bank for a woman that's really worth gifting with your child!

These are desperate times, gentlemen, and so it is time for desperate measures. Sign up and get yourself cut. The only alternative is pay up and shut up. Choose wisely!

Why It’s Good To Date Both Older And Younger Women

I believe there is a benefit to anything in life. Whether it is short-term, middle-term, or long-term, sometimes you have to see it for what is. Although men on ROK believe that one way is always better, most normally stick to what they are comfortable with.

Older men generally stay with women of around their age, and younger men stick with women generally around their age. I feel more men should try dating those who are both older and younger than them. If you are 38 years of age and older, date women who are from the ages of 18 to 25. If you are under the age of 38, date women who are in their 40s and 50s.

When I say date, I mean have a casual relationship with them—nothing more, nothing less. Life is made to live fruitfully, so enjoy everything life gives you, including an abundance in variety of women.

Older men to younger women

I suggest older men to date younger. You get a vitality that you wouldn’t normally get from women of an older age. Plus, the belief is that the younger one is, the more liberal she is. Liberal in every way of life, compared to someone who is older.

Age and mentality

As you approach the polar end of youth, you experience a more free mentality; as you approach the polar end of elder, you experience more conservatism, a more “stuck in your ways” stubborn lifestyle. “Don’t tell me anything new, because I am a grown man and have life figured out.”

Think about the mind of a child, how free he is and how he approaches life with reckless abandon, basically rebellious. This child has no chronic thoughts of worry, resentment, or anxiety. He just lives happily and in the moment with no worry of the world.

Through aging in this world, you have been primed by many years of societal conditioning—whether you try to cope, resist, or acknowledge it, it is in your psyche, and that can be limiting. However, for a younger person it is quite opposite. Generally these types of people have not been pressed with the branding iron of societal conditioning; therefore they have a more optimistic approach with life.

Dating younger women is great for older men, because you get to learn about a different culture of women. Plus, being around younger women will break up the monotony of “adult” life. Being around younger women also increases testosterone. It’s a great trade off. You provide wisdom and life experience, while she provides novelty and excitement.

Attraction

They live more in the present moment; therefore they are more with their perceptions of life. How do you attract these women? They are no different than any women when it comes to attracting them. Continue demonstrating masculine traits (i.e., confidence and frame) and proper game.

Younger men to older women

I suggest that young men go ahead and date older women. Why? Older women provide a broader perspective to life. Contrary to belief, there are very sexy and gorgeous older women out there. You can normally find them in very affluent neighborhoods.

I remember when living in one suburb where the mothers looked just as good as their daughters. They went to the gym daily, ate clean with small portions, always had their hair and nails done, and wore the best outfits to accentuate their still fit bodies. Not only did these women have great bodies, but they also brought a little substance to the table.

Their life experiences have given them experience to become masters of their craft(s). That could be their profession, cultures, food and drink, and more importantly, sexual activity. Older women have built years of schema, which allows them to see the bigger picture of the world.

Through dating older women, you can attend higher quality places (restaurants, lounges, social events, etc.) and learn about the environment there. Older women tend to have their lives together. There are many older women out there who want to feel desired by dating a younger masculine essence. As a matter of fact, there are older women out there who are willing to spoil these men with money and other goods.

Attraction

How do you attract these types of women? The same goes with the above about older men attracting younger women. Continue to exert masculine traits (confidence and frame) and game (social skills, appearance, etc.). Contrary to belief, I have seen many women who were in their 40s to 50s having slender, lean, and toned bodies and dressing sexy.

Conclusion

Dating younger women brings forth a very revitalizing experience to an older man. For a younger man, there are also older women out there who would love to have a young masculine stud in their life. Plus, if you can date both of the spectrum, you're not only learning something new, you're also expanding your harem of women, which helps your game. Expand your mind, enjoy life, and meet women of all kinds.

Songs Against Sex: Collette's Dream Man By Andy Nowicki

NOTE: Andy Nowicki is a personal friend of mine, and this article represents my personal opinions on the merit of his work.

Western society is drenched in sex. Creepy "sex educators" teach prepubescent schoolchildren how to snap condoms onto cucumbers; videos of girls getting triple penetrated by horse-dicked men are accessible with a few keystrokes; the "right" of women to slut it up on the taxpayer's dime is reinforced by the ruling class. The left and right push the Gospel of Sex in their own ways, the former through slut empowerment and LGBTBBQ "rights," the latter through holy matrimony and the production of blue-eyed Aryan babies.

Nobody questions this arrangement: to moderns, sex being a Good Thing is as unquestionable as a jihadi's faith in Allah. Who doesn't love orgasms and fucking and good, non-judgmental fun? If you don't like sex, you're a freak, a weirdo who should probably be exiled to a basement somewhere so you can't rain on the fluid-swapping parade.

Andy Nowicki's novels and short stories seem paradoxical on the surface. His subject is sex: his characters often find themselves in grotesque sexual situations, and his prose style is erotically charged. But only a self-mortifying masochist would describe Nowicki's writing as arousing. He spins tales of depressed middle-aged adulteresses, sexually frustrated spree shooters, and other dregs of our sexualized society.

Nowicki's canon stands out because he stands against the deification of sex. While he doesn't identify as "anti-sex," telling me in an interview that being "anti-sex" doesn't make much sense, his work probes the oft-ignored dark side of man's carnal desires. While Nowicki is best known through his various scrapes with the manosphere (in his capacity as Alternative Right's co-editor), "red pill" folks will find his novels and stories to be poignant and thought-provoking.

Nowicki's most recent release, Collette's Dream Man, is a wonderful display of both his worldview and his storytelling talent. Originally included as part of his erotic short story collection This Malignant Mirage, Collette's Dream Man stands on its own as a complete work and a good introduction to his world.

Losers And Lovers

Collette's Dream Man reads like something by Michel Houellebecq, if Houellebecq decided to enter the priesthood. The title character is an attractive, virginal teenager at a Catholic high school, whose dreams are invaded every night by a mysterious man who has telepathic trysts with her:

> No, she decided—the corporeal alter-ego of her dream lover must of necessity be an older man, with elegant tastes and a trained, discerning, courtly manner: in short, a gentleman, one whose adolescent bestial stirrings had long ago been tamed, to the point where he now knew to approach a lady with polite airs prior to seducing her… These boys she'd known had no sense whatsoever of the very concept of seduction, much less an erudite awareness of the craft and art of such an essential pastime; the terrible need which held them hostage, perpetually demanding immediate attention, was far too pressing to admit of any delay to the consummation they devoutly craved.

I can't reveal much more without spoiling the plot (Collette's Dream Man is only about 40 pages), but Collette's nocturnal affair leads her to seek out actual sex with the man she believes to be her secret dream lover. Not only does she end up being dead wrong, the true identity of her dream man shakes her to her core:

> When he first began attending Benedictine as a freshman, his ghastly physical presence and ominous demeanor convinced most of his classmates to leave him alone. However, a few of the crueler ones—for cruelty is hardly the exclusive province of the fairer sex during one's teen years, despite the attention given to the depredation of "mean girls" these days—saw fit to mock and tease him extensively, calling him names like "Dr. Burnsides" and "Eye-sore," and pelting him with ketchup-laden french fries on several occasions, insisting all the while that he was a "human french fry," then chortling mercilessly as he slunk away with the seeming meekness of a lamb.

Nowicki's prose, while a little overwrought at times in the book, drives his theme home: sex, for better or worse, is the central corrupting influence of human existence. In his view, sex encourages mindless cruelty, relentless stupidity and public shame. Our mutual friend (and my Takimag colleague) Ann Sterzinger categorizes him as a horror writer, with sex serving as Cthulhu, consuming everyone in its wake.

Nowicki's motif of sex as corrosive goes all the way back to his earliest works. For example, his 2011 novella The Columbine Pilgrim is about a bullied nerd who shoots up his high school reunion as revenge for his teenaged torment:

> But I did no such thing. Instead, I saw myself shake, in fact, tremble with fear and embarrassment. And on this day, of all days, Patti seemed in a particularly frisky and sadistic mood, and uninclined to leave anything to anyone's imagination. She grabbed my neck, put her face close to mine, practically within kissing range, and her tone changed to one of frank disgust.
> "Have you got an erection, Tony?" she spat. "Who do you think you are, anyway? You really think I find you hot or something? You want to fuck me? Listen, you pathetic retard… YOU WILL NEVER FUCK ME. NEVER!"

While Nowicki's fixations and stories—therapists sleeping with their patients, self-mortifying virginal nerds, and teenage girls who are just a bit more worldly than their male peers—could easily devolve into obnoxious bathos, he deftly avoids falling into traps that would fell lesser writers. Nowicki has a remarkable amount of empathy, able to wring humanity out of even the greatest monsters in his books.

Le Petite Mort

By this point, I imagine the average Return of Kings reader has thrown up his arms in disgust: "Why are you PRAISING this dickless Nowicki guy? He sounds like a loser who can't get laid!"

For starters, talent is talent regardless of the politics, sex life or personal hygiene of the man (or woman) who has it. The reason why mainstream literature has vanished into a black hole is precisely because the publishing industry promotes writers based not on talent but on how many warm SJW fuzzies their vomitous novels induce. I disagree with Nowicki half the time, but I can see past those disagreements to acknowledge the depth and poignancy of his fiction.

Secondly, if you have anything resembling a soul, you'll admit that Nowicki has a point.

Despite his disagreements with the 'sphere, Nowicki's arguments about the corrosiveness of sex are ones most men can relate to. I realized this after reading his memoir/manifesto, Confessions of a Would-Be Wanker, over the summer. Sex is what drives men in the manosphere to remake themselves along "red pill" lines, to lift, learn game, and explore foreign lands in search of pussy. It rules us, and most of us aren't even aware of it.

While I personally find Nowicki's defeatism to be repellent, I can understand the logic behind his stoic philosophy of "wanking." Sex corrupts just as thoroughly as power does, and it's understandable why some men would want to retreat from it altogether, even if doing so is impossible. Nowicki himself is married and has children, showing that even he couldn't live up to the lofty path of the wanker.

In the end, it's talent uber alles for me. Whatever you may think of Andy Nowicki's life philosophy, there's no denying his skill at crafting twisted, bleak but intriguing stories. If you're curious about his work, Collette's Dream Man is the perfect place to start.

20 Signs That We're Not Living In A Patriarchy

Feminists typically justify their beliefs by claiming that America (and the west in general) is a patriarchy, a society where men dominate and women are subjugated. But does our world really privilege men over women? All the signs point to no. Here's why…

1. More women than men are attending college and earning degrees

According to Pew Research Center, 71 percent of women enroll in college after graduating high school while only 61 percent of men do, with the gap widening every year. Additionally, since 2006, women have earned the majority of college degrees at all levels, from associate's degrees to doctorates.

2. More women than men have jobs

Since 2010, women have surpassed men on American payrolls and consistently have a lower unemployment rate than men as well. This is in large part due to the current recession, which so disproportionately impacted men that media outlets have dubbed it the "mancession."

3. Men and women earn equal pay for equal work

Feminist claims of a "pay gap" between men and women are false. According to the Wall Street Journal, when pay rates are adjusted for education, marital status, occupation and other factors, men and women earn the same amount of money for the same work.

4. On average, boys perform worse in school than girls

Girls consistently earn higher grades than boys in grade school, including in math and science. Boys are also more likely to be diagnosed with developmental disorders such as ADD, ADHD and autism.

5. Men are jailed at much higher rates than women

According to the Bureau of Justice, there are more than ten times the number of men in prison than women, many of them jailed for drug possession and other nonviolent offenses. So many men are imprisoned in the U.S. that the “land of the free” now has the largest prison population in the world, larger than communist China (a country with four times our population) and other repressive dictatorships.

6. Men are more likely to commit suicide than women

From 2000 to 2011, the U.S. suicide rate rose to 12.3 per 100,000 people from 10.4, with men driving the increase: they are four times more likely to kill themselves then women. Middle-aged men and military veterans are especially at risk of suicide.

7. Rape rates in the U.S. are the lowest in decades

Despite feminist claims that American society fosters a “rape culture,” the rate of rape and sexual assault declined by 58 percent between 1994 and 2010. In 1994, five out of every 1,000 women were raped; in 2010, only two out of 1,000 were.

8. College students are much less likely to be raped than the general population

Feminists like to argue that one out of every five women in college will become the victims of rape, but according to the Department of Justice, only six out of every 1,000 female college students will be raped or assaulted. In other words, only 0.03 out of every five women are raped.

9. Domestic violence has fallen to its lowest rates ever

According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, the rate of nonfatal domestic violence declined by 63 percent between 1994 and 2012. Serious intimate partner violence against women also fell by 72 percent between 1994 and 2011. From 1993 to 2007, the annual number of women killed by their husbands, boyfriends or other intimate partners fell from 2,200 to 1,640.

10. More men in the U.S. are raped than women

According to the Department of Justice, in 2008, 216,000 inmates were sexually assaulted while in prison, compared to 90,479 rapes that occurred outside of prison. Because men are ten times more likely to be imprisoned than women, they are almost always the victims of prison rape.

11. The use of “roofies” and other date rape drugs is rare at best

According to a study in the British Journal of Criminology, “there is no evidence of widespread use of hypnotics in sexual assault, let alone Rohypnol, despite many attempts to prove the contrary.” Most women who claim to have been roofied were merely drunk.

12. Super Bowl sex trafficking is a myth, as is trafficking in general

Despite feminist claims to the contrary, there has never been large-scale sex trafficking around the Super Bowl. Indeed, according to government reports, sex trafficking of women and girls in general is rare.

13. The media treats women who claim to have been raped with respect, no matter how ridiculous their stories

From the Duke lacrosse rape hoax to the recent UVA rape hoax, women who cry rape are treated with reverence by the media, their claims never investigated or criticized.

For example, Columbia student Emma Sulkowicz made waves last fall when she declared that she would be carrying her mattress around campus until her alleged rapist either dropped out or was expelled. Not only has Sulkowicz been the focus of numerous positive news reports since then, she was invited to attend this year's State of the Union by Senator Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY).

This implicit belief in her story occurs despite a typically conviction-hungry district attorney's office declining to bring any criminal charges against the accused, and extremely strong circumstantial evidence that no rape actually occurred.

14. University of Virginia fraternities have been forced to institute new rules in response to a rape that never happened

Despite the fact that Rolling Stone's story "A Rape on Campus," about a brutal rape that occurred at a UVA frat house, has been proven to have been fabricated, UVA fraternities were forced to agree to more restrictive rules on their activities as a result of said story.

15. "Yes Means Yes" sexual assault laws are being enacted in states across the U.S.

Last year, the state of California enacted a new law requiring "affirmative consent" for all sexual encounters between college students. Despite being unenforceable and a clear violation of men's rights, several other states, including New York and New Jersey, are considering enacting their own versions of the law.

16. Ray Rice was nearly blackballed out of the NFL due to domestic violence charges that had been dropped

Last September, Baltimore Ravens running back Ray Rice was indefinitely suspended from the NFL after a video of him punching his then-fiancee Janay Palmer was released by TMZ. This was despite the fact that not only had criminal charges against him been dropped, Palmer married Rice not long after the incident. Rice successfully appealed his suspension last December.

17. Women are dominating high profile positions in government and business

Women are increasingly taking top spots in American business, with

Facebook COO Sheryl Sandberg, IBM CEO Virginia Rometty, and Hewlett-Packard CEO Meg Whitman among the most notable examples. Additionally, as of the 2014 elections, a record 104 women are serving in the U.S. Congress: 84 in the House and 20 in the Senate.

18. Public transit systems are campaigning against "manspreading" at the behest of young women

Last December, New York City's MTA launched a campaign against "manspreading," the supposed phenomenon of men spreading their legs too wide on the subway. The MTA's initiative came after years of lobbying by young women and blogs such as Men Taking Up Too Much Space on the Train.

19. Foreign women who use dating sites to seek American men to marry are protected by the Violence Against Women Act

In 2005, as part of the re-authorization of the Violence Against Women Act, Congress added a new statute, the International Marriage Broker Regulation Act (IMBRA). This law requires American men who use dating services to connect with foreign women to undergo invasive background checks, effectively privileging female foreign nationals over male U.S. citizens.

20. Twitter rewrote its harassment policy solely due to pressure from feminists

Two months ago, Twitter unveiled a new anti-harassment policy at the behest of feminists and those who oppose GamerGate, a consumer revolt focused on fighting corruption in video game journalism. Both groups have since abused this policy to get anti-feminist personalities such as Jordan Owen, Milo Yiannopoulos, and Slade “Roguestar” Villena suspended from the site despite the fact that they have never broken the rules.

As you can see, the idea that modern society is patriarchal is completely ridiculous. Not only are women doing better than men when it comes to education, employment and other metrics, women’s concerns take center stage in both the media and government. It doesn’t matter whether these concerns are based on myths, outright lies or completely frivolous: the power brokers in our society cater to women at every opportunity.

This is a woman’s world: men are just living in it.

Conquering Hispanic Women: 9 Tips To Put Your Spanish Learning On Steroids

February 17, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post is sponsored by PickupSpanish.com

Being able to speak Spanish in Latin America is the mating advantage. Being able to speak Spanish and being an exotic foreigner? You'll crush it. Foreign languages are an essential part of the international playboy's arsenal.

In this post I'll show you how to cut your time-to-Spanish-fluency in half and get better reactions from Latin American girls. Let's get into it….

1. Get Obsessed. Get Good.

People who reach an advanced level in a second language are not interested in the language per se. The language is a vehicle for the real topic that fascinates them – Mexican Banda music, regional accents in Spain, the women in Colombia. Especially the women in Colombia.

Fortunately, fascination and obsession are not states that randomly happen to us, we can engineer them.

Find a subject in a Latin American country and make it your new obsession. This fascination will drive you you through the frustrations and the hours of study needed to get to an advanced level.

2. Vocabulary – learn 200 words a day

As with all Latin-based languages, you are not starting from a clean slate. Actually, you probably have over 5,000 words already on that slate. Cognates are words that are similar in English and Spanish e.g. accident = accidente. Cognates are a great way to gain some early confidence in Spanish.

For any vocabulary beyond cognates, use mnemonics. Remember 'Every Good Boy Deserves Fudge' when learning the musical note scale of E-G-B-D-F? Get the mnemonic right and you won't be able to forget the word for years even if you wanted to.

3. Pronunciation – "I thought you were Colombian. You have no accent!"

People say you can never get rid of a foreign accent. Nonsense. Professional actors do it all the time.

Everybody wants to learn how to roll their r's but to be understood, syllable stress is much more important.

Even if you master a pitch-perfect Mexican accent, put the stress on the wrong syllable and the word you just said does not exist. On the other hand, you can have a strong gringo twang but if you stress the correct syllable in the word the locals will understand you much better.

Here are a couple of tips if you want to Meryl Streep your Spanish accent:

- Say words in English with a heavy Spanish accent.
- Sing Spanish songs. It will train you to link words together and give your speech more flow.

I actually learned to rap in Spanish to fool hispanics that I was more fluent that I actually was.

4. Grammar – FK Rosetta Stone

For years, popular language courses like Rosetta Stone have spread this myth of “learn a language like a toddler learns.” Sounds good in theory, but it’s actually a clever way for them to cut their production costs and add more profit to their bottom line. It’s a good business model, but not a superior method of learning.

It’s better to learn like an adult and leverage the power of associative memorization. Realize that as an adult, you have this pre-existing base of idiomatic English expressions and extensive grammatical knowledge. You can associate 20+ years of English knowledge with your new language through translation or association.

Constructing your sentences first in “Caveman English” and then translating to Spanish will improve your grammar accuracy.

Example: ‘It I want’ – lo quiero

5. Material before method

Like with martial arts, guys love to debate about the best language learning method. Michel Thomas vs Pimsleur vs Duolingo. Who wins?

I say before you obsess on the method, ask yourself some tough questions:

- “What do I hope to be doing with the language once I learn it?”
- “What kind of conversations do I hope to be having?”
- “What will be the content and the contexts of these conversation?”

Course content and vocabulary selection should be dictated by your interests and goals. The most important questions is: “What will you spend your time doing with this language?

A goal like “Be fluent” is not specific enough to give you any kind of roadmap or plan.

6. Groove your “Groundhog Day Conversations”

Focus on the conversations that you will have all the time in Latin America. In a foreign country you will repeatedly give the following speeches every time you meet somebody new:

- What you are doing in the country.
- How long you've been here.
- What you like about the country.
- Why you decided to come to this country.
- How long you are planning to stay.

Think ahead and rehearse stock answers that make you seem interesting and attractive. Your go-to material when it comes to talking to women in Latin America will be your opinions on her country and its culture. Commit to memory some observations that will spark further conversation.

Examples:

ir al salon es muy importante para las mujeres dominicanas no? (going to the hair salon is very important for Dominican woman isn't it?)

veo que a las colombianas les gusta mucho salir y bailar. en mi pais no es asi (I see that Colombian women like to go out and dance a lot. It's not like that in my country.)

Now you've got some solid Spanish in your locker, here's how to get with some curvy, tanned Latinas…

7. Don't over-game

It almost pains me to say it but, being a gentleman and giving the girls cheesy compliments earns you major bonus points in Latin America. My 'red-pill' instincts are to be aloof and bust their balls but over the years I've repeatedly seen US-style game backfire in Latin America.

While provider game and gushing compliments would get you chewed up and spit out in the US, it will work perfectly on Latinas.

8. Get off Badoo, Cupid, and other Latin dating sites as quickly as possible

These sites are good for "pipelining" and setting up dates as soon as you get off the plane. However, you'll want to ditch the training wheels and move on to day game as soon as possible. Here's why:

- I knew a girl in the Dominican Republic who was a solid 9 and she showed me her Badoo account. She had 900-odd unread messages from guys promising her holidays, expensive gifts etc. It is becoming a crowded channel.

- When you are in Latin America you will notice that the quality is so much better on the ground. Do some Spanish day game and you'll have zero competition and higher quality girls.

If you are already chatting to a Latina online, get her off the site as quickly as possible and move her to Whatsapp or Skype. The longer you remain her chat buddy, the more likely it is that she'll be distracted by another gringo in her inbox.

Use this line for the "digital bounce": tienes whatsapp por cierto linda? es mas comodo hablar por ahi (Do you have Whatsapp? It's easier to message each other using Whatsapp).

9. Stand out from the other gringos

So many gringos come to Latin America and bang "pre-pagos" (pros) or "interesadas" (semi-pros). These guys don't realize that their wallet and "white God factor" won't be enough to get the top-of-the-food-chain girls in Latin America.

You don't want to be guilty by association. Here's how distance yourself from these guys in the fewest number of steps:

- Don't do pay-for-play
- Speak the local language. Most other guys you'll meet are too lazy to learn Spanish.
- Stay in an apartment not a hotel or hostel.
- Have a good "backstory" for being there. (Even if it's not 100% accurate)
- Don't wear shorts and flip-flops. Fashion and style is the equivalent of the smell of chocolate to women in Latin America.

The key is to be able to represent your world (exotic foreigner) but also be comfortable in her world (speak the local language and meet her friends and family).

Jail For Sending A Girl’s Naked Photos, No Jail For Fracturing A Man’s Skull

Hastings Fredrickson may sound like a porno name, but it isn’t. Well, in a way it is. As I will demonstrate, the admittedly criminal behavior of Fredrickson is treated more seriously than countless examples of actually violent and more reprehensible acts, including where people (read: men) have had their skulls fractured.

Fredrickson, who was an Australian defense contractor and before that an army commando, was convicted of three counts of using a carriage service in a manner “menacing, harassing or offensive.” A carriage service is simply British-based legal parlance for postal services, phone, internet, and other telecommunication devices.

In the case of one woman he had sex with, Fredrickson filmed the encounter, without her consent, and then distributed pictures to a number of colleagues. These colleagues, who all had associations with the military or Australian military contractors, called themselves “The Jedi Council” and exchanged graphic, pornographic, and sometimes illegal materials and references to the women they claimed to have had slept with (and proved through pictures and films).

Watch Your Language, Padawans

More surprisingly and alarmingly, Fredrickson’s convictions for offensive use of a carriage service (it’s pretty clear the sharing with colleagues was neither harassing nor menacing) included his detailed written accounts of sex with women. In this correspondence, he named the partners.

Although using the word “slut”, “moll” and other terms is far from the most genteel use of language, which I don’t seek to justify, it is mind-boggling to understand how such usage should generate criminal charges under an already amorphous concept of “menacing, harassing or offensive.” Better not come to Australia and write a book about banging Australian girls, Roosh! Or at least keep it off your email.

[image]
Bang/Don’t Bang Australia might be a little risky…

Fredrickson received a 15-month prison sentence. The water gets murkier here, as the sentencing judge ruled that the man be assessed for an Intensive Corrections Order, which lies somewhere between a suspended sentence (no jail but the term reinstated if a sufficiently severe additional offense is committed) and jail itself. The coming weeks will determine whether Fredrickson does indeed enter a penitentiary.

I have no problem with, and fully support, Fredrickson being convicted for filming his sexual encounter with the woman surreptitiously and then distributing it. The same goes for anyone else in the group proven to have passed on secret recordings of sexual encounters.

Losing Touch With Reality

What I do find troublesome, however, is the sentence handed to Fredrickson, irrespective of whether he serves full-time jail or not. Compared to physical violence, which encompasses both physical and psychological trauma to victims, the 41-year-old’s behavior was sternly punished. Such a stern sanction can be rationalized only if violent offenders are hit with even stronger sentences. Much of the time, though, they are not.

Ravshan Usmanov’s jailing for six months started the trend of often treating the publication of certain photos and films more harshly than rendering someone permanently incapacitated, in a coma, or otherwise leaving them fucked up physically. It shows no sign of abating, either. Jail the Usmanovs of this world, by all means, even for longer than six months, but at least bother to mete out every punishment according to the real severity of the crime.

The context of Fredrickson’s convictions is an intense, usually bitter debate about the place of women in the Australian military. Despite being admitted to the military with inferior (and quite frankly pathetic) physical entrance requirements, women in the armed forces are immediately allocated with a “victim badge”, regardless of whether they have experienced discrimination in the first place.

Combined with a general legal climate where a woman having her naked photos sent to someone else is frequently considered more heinous than many instances of exposing a human being to risk of death through serious street violence, it’s not terribly shocking that Fredrickson is still getting huge media attention.

The victim impact statements, which featured one from a woman who was just named in an email containing graphic descriptions of sex, were clearly listened to by the court.

Sadly, it seems victim impact statements from those who are punched in the head, stomped on, and left to bleed are largely ignored when you evaluate the litany of times assault results in no criminal conviction, a good behavior bond or a suspended sentence. Maybe the judges' belief that "boys will boys" explains it?

The Theory of (Criminal) Relativity

We could argue indefinitely about the "best" and worst crimes, in terms of the physical and psychological impact on victims. Having multimedia of you naked passed around without your approval is deservedly a crime, particularly if you did not consent to or know about the original production of that multimedia.

But similar to how someone breaking my arm is less grave than that same person deliberately shooting me in the head, disclosing private films and images of naked women (or men) should not be treated with as much contempt as actual physical violence, especially where it exposes a victim to close to life-threatening harm.

This is even more so for graphic emails only naming women. Whatever one's opinion of the written content, the men involved had all coalesced voluntarily under the umbrella of "The Jedi Council." The typed descriptions were not publicly disseminated in a literal sense, which would probably and justifiably attract the "offensive" part of a carriage service offense.

Criminalizing graphic writing of a sexual encounter, shared by choice between friends and where the partner is only identified by name, is nothing short of a slippery slope smeared with many jars of Vaseline.

Fredrickson committed a crime, no doubt. But did he beat a man to an inch of his life?

Take a peek at the following three stories, bearing in mind for the first two that the first acts of physical violence received less than a slap on the wrist. For the third, the defendant received no proper punishment for even the most recent attack.

- Kieran Loveridge of Sydney killed 18-year-old Thomas Kelly, and assaulted another four young men in separate attacks on the same night. Loveridge had been given a mere good behavior bond for a previous assault.
- With a single punch Shaun McNeil, also of Sydney, ended the life of Daniel Christie, who died after falling into a coma. McNeil had had a multitude of prior assault convictions, for which the most "serious" sentence was a six-month suspended jail term. Cumulatively, the convictions before Christie's death could have hit the offender with twelve years of jail-time.
- For fracturing a man's skull, Tyran Pumpa of Canberra was sentenced to two years, eight months' jail, mostly suspended to just one year of periodic (weekend) detention. Ridiculously, the judge knew Pumpa had preexisting convictions for breaking a man's jaw (a crime where he received, yes, you guessed it, a suspended sentence) and punching a man in front of police. The victim with the fractured skull's additional injuries were permanent hearing loss, recurring pain and a heightened danger of him developing dementia.

It's worth reiterating that Fredrickson broke the law for filming his sexual partner and the subsequent sharing of photographs. I don't defend, condone or otherwise seek to minimize his damaging choices and the effect it had on that victim (forget those who were named). But I will always subject them to a test of relativity. Under this scrutiny, the Australian legal system gets an F.

How The Vegan Cat Principle Shows The Toxic SJW Mindset

February 17, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

A while ago, I came across this article:

Kitten nearly dies from vegan diet

KELLIE CAMERON MOONEE VALLEY LEADER JULY 22, 2013 5:00AM

SHARE SAVE THIS STORY

> Veterinarian Leanne Pinfold said the kitten was brought in this month by its > owners, who were believed to be vegan.

> She said the kitten's diet of potatoes, rice milk and pasta had caused it to become critically ill.
> The kitten was given fluids via a drip, placed on a heat pad and fed meat.
> The horrific case at a North Melbourne animal hospital has prompted a warning about the dangers of people "forcing ideologies" on their pets.

Here we have, I think, a perfect example of everything that is wrong with the modern left—arrogance, stupidity, idealism, a dangerously thin-skin, a lack of common sense, and reliance on "feelings" rather than "reason." This describes the social justice warrior mindset, and shows just what happens when it finally runs up against reality.

I feel, in fact, we can make a law of it. Henceforth, we shall call this – "The Vegan Cat Principle". It can be stated thusly:

> Even if you have the best of intentions, you can still fuck things up royally

The dangers of vegan cat thinking

There are so many examples of the Vegan Cat Principle in action, its hard to know where to start.

I imagine it is much the same vegan, Earth-loving people who try and give the finger to big corporations by drinking raw, unprocessed milk, despite the fact that it can kill you.

We never hear an end to screeching about "Islamaphobia." Perhaps this is why thousands of rape cases have gone unreported in England, over the course of many years, because the culprits were Pakistani gang members. Arguing against multi-culturalism is similarly taboo, even though immigrants often commit crimes and collect welfare cheques out of all proportion to their numbers.

The lovely ladies over at Jezebel recently gave a concerted fuck you to the Food and Drug Administration for declining to lift the long-standing ban on gay men donating blood. Never mind the fact that gay men are around fifty times more likely to be HIV-positive then the general population. We now hear that the FDA is considering revising its guidelines to allow gay men to donate if they have been celibate for more than one year, though even this medically dubious sacrifice to political correctness still isn't good enough for some.

Anti-nuclear hysteria has seen several countries, including Germany and Japan, implement plans to shut down their nuclear plants following the Fukushima "disaster"—a disaster in which literally no one was killed, and which will have negligible long term effects. Billions of dollars of infrastructure is being sacrificed because the left has panicked, and spineless politicians have given in to their delusions.

Of course, one can't bring up "left-wing hysteria" without mentioning climate change. Personally I believe the science behind climate change is actually pretty solid and, yes, we will have to get off fossil fuels eventually – but I absolutely do not trust the left to manage these issues properly.

Fossil fuels got us out of mud-brick huts, and alternate energies won't be cheap and common enough for decades. Many billions of dollars have already been wasted already on "green" projects that have done absolutely nothing to help the environment.

Similar thinking is probably why 19% of schoolboys in the US have now been diagnosed with ADD, despite other countries hanging around the 2-3% mark, and why 10% are now on some kind of medication for it – an unhealthy mix of feminist hysteria and a pharmaceutical lobby with dollar signs in its eyes.

Then there's the way Greenies have forced on us the notion that cyclists deserve equal use of our road system, because "environment." In 2013 the road toll in Australia fell to a historic low of 1,200. Cyclist deaths however, shot up to fifty, the highest figure in over fifteen years. There are calls to impose a mandatory one-meter gap between cars and bikes and spend billions of dollars upgrading our transport system to accommodate them. No one seems to consider the possibility that cyclists should not be on our fucking roads.

It is at the root of why feminists decided to dismantle the nuclear family, thinking they could be successful parents by themselves. This has resulted in a divorce rate around 50% and 45% of children today being raised by single mothers—who then grow up to comprise some 85% of the prison population.

Going back further, we can see much the same mindset in all sorts of "progressive" movements. Barely anybody in the modern left will own up to the tens of millions who have died due to communist economic policies, likely the most disastrous attempt at creating paradise in world history.

The Vegan Cat Principle at work in the People's Republic of China

And to top it all off, guess whether democrats or republicans, are more likely to believe in Astrology? And which gender is more likely to believe in reincarnation, ghosts, spiritual energy, that they have "been in touch with a dead person," have consulted with a fortune teller of psychic, or in the existence of the "evil eye" and other new age bullshit?

Sure, there are some issues where the right can be criticized more. Belief in evolution is now more than 20 points higher among Democrats than Republicans, but let us note that Black Protestants are one of the most skeptical groups of all, and belief in creationism is ten points higher among women than men—both core democratic constituencies.

Skepticism of vaccines is somewhat more dangerous, and an issue the left loves to use to bash the right over the head with, but one finds that self-declared democrats are almost as skeptical of government-imposed mandates for vaccines as republicans, the figures being 19% and 33% respectively. No less a liberal stalwart than Jon Stewart recently took affluent, California liberals to task for this.

Vegan cats – vegan cats all of them.

What is the cure?

Now why do people do this? What puts a person in the Vegan Cat mindset?

The reason could be a simple desire to be a hero. Everyone wants to think of themselves as one of the "good guys" on some level, but to be a good guy, one needs a bad guy to oppose. We are always looking for an injustice to rage against – never mind if it is one someone's just made up.

But on a more fundamental level, I think we really just try to use this image to impress others, particularly those of the opposite sex. In order to rescue the princess in the tower, white knights need a horrifying beast to fight against.

Then again, one man may already have summed up the social justice warrior mindset decades ago (1:50 to skip the intro):

> There's a place in the world for the angry young man

I agree—its called the street corner.

Replace “angry young man” with “social justice warrior” and Billy Joel’s anthem has it dead on. They’re free to talk, but just keep them out of our parliaments, our universities, our schools, our businesses, our courts and as far as possible our government bureaucracies.

The disease that is Vegan Cat thinking is something we must all try to treat. Hell, we ought to have a “Vegan Cat Awareness Month” where we come together as a society to remember all the victims of Vegan Cat thinking. Memorials should be built to all the nuclear power plants shut down because of spineless legislators. Schoolboys should be encouraged to burn their Ritalin pills.

On a simpler level however, the next time you’re going about your daily business and come up against the unwavering stupidity and idealism of someone on the far-left, just go up to them, tell them they’re trying to create a Vegan Cat, wish them luck, and walk away laughing.

Maybe, just maybe, the message will get through their thick skulls.

February 18, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

For many men, scoring no-strings sex with a hot girl is the pinnacle of game. The hotter the girl and the easier the sex, the better. This is not to say that guys don't want to get into relationships or to foster a deeper connection at a later stage, merely that certain times, uncomplicated mutual release is preferable to the complications of anything more involved.

But how do you go about meeting a chick willing to sign up to be your fuck buddy and how do you manage the relationship when you do? The following tips will help.

1. Pick the right girl

The reality is that some girls, depending on their life stage and circumstances, will have a greater desire or propensity to be fuck-buddies than others. Your task is to target the right ones.

In general, younger girls — those in their early twenties — are more carefree, less concerned about their biological clocks, and thus more inclined towards casual relationship. Also — and this is key — girls who have just come out of relationships can be particularly keen. This is because, having just been through the emotional turmoil of a relationship, the last thing they want is to get into another one, but that doesn't mean that they don't want sex.

Girls are horny creatures, and they love to fuck. You simply need to position yourself as the right guy at the right time.

2. Set the "fuck buddy" frame from the start

You must set the correct frame from the start — that is, you must NEVER position yourself as a potential boyfriend, and you must make it clear — covertly — that this is all about sex and nothing more. What this means in practice is that if she tells you that she already has a boyfriend, you should say something like "I'm not looking to steal you away from him," thus identifying yourself as a lover rather than a provider.

You must also escalate to sex on the first date, or at the very latest on the second. This is not about courtship and her assessing your suitability as a potential partner, but rather about quickly establishing a mutually-satisfying source of uncomplicated sex.

3. Don’t act like her boyfriend

How you behave the first few times you meet will determine how she views you, and in which box in her life she compartmentalizes you. If you steadfastly avoid doing the kinds of things a boyfriend would do — i.e. taking her for dinner, suggesting weekends away, cooking for her etc. — then she will soon see what the deal is.

You should quickly get to a position where you send her booty-call texts at short notice telling her to come over with no preamble. Don’t contact her too frequently in between meetings, keep text messages short and logistical, and don’t ask her whether or not she’s seeing other guys.

All of this is not to say that you can’t have fun with her too: I often take my FB for a few drinks to relax us, and chat to her about what’s going on in her life before going home to fuck, but there is a very clear covert understanding that the real purpose of our meeting is the sex rather than the socializing.

4. Don’t break the fourth wall

Don’t be explicit about what’s going on. Women are masters of covert communication, and you should be too. Saying something like “isn’t it cool how we just meet up to fuck and there’s never going to be anything more between us” not only lacks class, but it also risks triggering her anti-slut defense hard-wiring.

Once the true nature of your association is externalized, it might just perish. Far better just to chill and say nothing: she knows what’s going on well enough anyway.

5. Exercise 100% discretion

The fact is that even in 2015 many young women are afraid to appear to be sluts in front of their friends by having sex with guys they barely know, or on a casual basis outside of a relationship. Therefore, you must demonstrate through your every action that you are a 100% safe pair of hands who won't blow her cover and will keep your relationship a secret.

Quash any desire you mighty have to brag to your friends about fucking her — particularly if you have acquaintances in common. If it gets back to her that you've been talking then the goose may just stop laying those golden eggs. Ask yourself what is more important to you – the validation you get from your friends or the sex itself.

I have an FB who works for the same organization as I do — we've been meeting for several months. In that time, I haven't told a single one of my colleagues about the situation. We hardly speak or even look at one another at work. An outside observer would have no inkling that we even know one another.

What is even more interesting is that I don't think she's told anyone either (even though a close personal friend of hers also works there) which demonstrates the degree to which women will hide their secret sexual liaisons. This is how the "secret society" works — women have sex with those they regard as alpha sexworthy figures and literally no-one else is any the wiser.

Show that you too are a secret society member and that you understand this and you'll be reap the rewards.

6. Make sure the sex is good

It goes without saying, but if the main thing you are offering her is sex and you want her to keep coming back for more, then you must ensure that the sex is good, or at least better than may be available to her elsewhere. I don't intend to go into a sex tutorial here as there are plenty of sources available online, but what I would say is make sure you're in good physical shape — do compound weights in the gym and do some form of cardio — and then fuck her like it's your last time each time you see her. That should keep her satisfied and hungry for more.

Another benefit of the FB arrangement is that you can explore more advanced sexual fantasies together such as threesomes, fetish clubs and so on. Do this: not only is it fun, but you will also keep her intrigued. Show that you are a man before whom she can reveal all of her deepest sexual desires and that you are non-judgmental and accommodating — this will pay rich dividends.

One other thing: although frowned upon by many, watching porn is the sex education that many of us never had. It can really help — just don't get carried away and let it demotivate you in other areas.

7. Accept that she may be fucking other guys, and that one day she will stop fucking you

Because you are not putting pressure on her about whether she is seeing other guys or not, then the fact is that she might well be — particularly in today's fevered and hypersexual hook-up culture. Don’t ask, and don’t sweat it, and just make sure you always use condoms. In the end it doesn’t really matter if she’s banging other dudes or not you’re getting what you’re getting and that’s fine.

Finally, understand that FB relationships are not built to last: they are defined by their inherent obsolescence. This is just the nature of things: learn to accept it and to enjoy what you have for the moment. Don’t get emotionally attached — learn to compartmentalize. Some girls are keepers, or at least potential-keepers, while others are transitory companions. You are in a sweet spot so don’t sweat it.

This is not to say that an FB can’t be converted into a girlfriend of course, but unless you really like her then if you have a sense of abundance then this shouldn’t be necessary anyway.

UK Feminists Attack Barrister Because Of His Warnings About Rape Hysteria

February 18, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A veteran of the English Criminal Bar was trashed in the UK press over a blog post he wrote about consent and rape. David Osborne, who has been practicing law since 1974, warned that recent reforms to the way police and prosectors handle rape cases (which I wrote about here) have "serious consequences for all involved in casual sex":

> For the past ten years or more, a politically driven agenda has been thrust down the throats of court users about the deplorably low percentage of rape allegations that lead to conviction.

The lawyer, who was pilloried by women's groups, said the touted "deplorably low" conviction rate actually shows the system working as it should:

> most of those accused of rape are acquitted, not simply as a result of the brilliance of my advocacy, but because the jury did not believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the victim did not consent.

Osborne, who had his age of 71 reported while his detractors didn't, warned that trials in drunken consent cases will now to be pursued on the basis that the man must be guilty. He thinks the chief prosecutor behind the reforms > has decided, or rather it has been decided for her, that anybody who makes an allegation of rape must be believed, and everything possible in the trial process > must be bent towards the conviction of the accused.

Rape campaigners took exception mostly to his outrageous plea in favour of female autonomy—a bête noire of gender hucksters:

> I have always found it distasteful and unattractive the suggestion that as the victim was blind drunk she was therefore unable to give her consent to sex, or more to the point, she gave her consent which she would not have given had she been sober. In my book, consent is consent, blind drunk or otherwise, and regret after the event cannot make it rape.

Trial by media

Obviously a publication dedicated to serious news and truth

The left wing Mirror tabloid ran the story on its front page. The feminist seat-warmers piling in to comment included Rape Crisis "spokeswoman" Katie Russell, who was outraged at Osborne over his > unwillingness and inability to grasp the simple legal principle that consent must be freely and fully given by someone with the capacity to do so, he has merely illustrated the desperate ongoing need for measures to improve the criminal justice system for sexual violence survivors.

With characteristic chutzpah, Russell calls women who have drunk sex with men and then retroactively withdraw their consent (which Osborne is obviously referring to) as "survivors." She then ignores the substance of Osborne's point, which is that a woman, contrary to what feminists claim, can consent whilst blind drunk. No mention is made either by her or by the Mirror, of the following passage from Osborne's blog:

> It is also right to add that the converse is true, namely that if a woman does not consent, blind drunk or otherwise, it would be rape if sexual intercourse takes place. That is what the offence of rape is all about.

Osborne appeared on TV to defend his claims in a debate with the Mirror columnist Alison Philips, who relied on talking points about “vast number of rapes that happen every year” with “only a tiny number end up in a conviction.” She even engaged in outright False Rape Accusation denial:

> There’s no way that men are falling prey to these women who are dressed in short skirts and getting drunk and then waking up and trying to say they didn’t consent. That’s absolute nonsense.

To his credit, and in comparison to the usual castrated capitulations of public figures when found in breach of prevalent moral dogma, Osborne has stuck to his guns. He did so in both his TV appearance and on his blog, where he warned again of a “real prospect of a miscarriage of justice if the prosecution are allowed to move the goalposts as Alison Saunders is suggesting.”

Moral neophilia and the myth of progress

Russell

There is little to be gained in further analysis of the wailings of the professionally aggrieved, who went for the old lawyer like hungry dogs. However, one particular meme stands out. Katie Russell of Rape Crisis, in the laboured prose of the socially maladjusted internet feminist, said in the Mirror:

> On top of this, it is outrageous and depressing that someone practising law in the 21st century should be so unabashed about airing such baldly misogynistic and victim-blaming views.

Women Centre [sic] “national lead” Clare Jones hit a similar note:

> It’s appalling. We are deeply shocked that even today, in 2015, someone can > seriously suggest that the violent crime of rape could be provided with a complete defence if a woman was under the influence of alcohol or drugs at the time.

The Mirror also quotes a tweet response to Osborne's TV appearance:

> Rape is NEVER justfiable. What anyone wears/drinks is totally irrelevant. Such archaic views in 2015 is incredibly worrying.

The supposed obsolescence of existing morality is central tenet of the Social Justice mindset, which says: "your morality of is defective, and should be replaced with my new, improved version of it." Historian Neil Cameron calls it "Moral Neophilia," the epithet forming the title of his 2014 essay on Philip Rieff, a sociologist and scholar of Freud.

To Social Justice Warriors (SJWs), the rejection of existing values in favour of new ones, determined by SJW consensus as superior, is "progress."

Reading Cameron's summary, it seems Rieff argued civilisation to be underpinned by cultural interdicts, or taboos, which define what members of a civilisation are compelled to do. Rieff was against the 1960's neo-Marxist "liberationism" which sought to scrap these interdicts. He framed the attacks on such cultural interdicts as "egoistic transgressions," which, if they increase in scale and are not resisted, gradually usurp the old order. Sound familiar?

The Canadian historian explains how Rieff plotted western culture as a progression through archetypes—the classical political man, the religious man, the economic man, and the final archetype of the psychological man. Beyond ideals and illusions, the latter is "at best a narcissist, at worst a thug."

His children, raised without repressions, regard all authority as illegitimate. For Rieff, these were the slogan-touting hippies and dropouts of the 1960s counterculture. In modern times, they are the Social Justice Warriors.

The SJWs who clog up the ranks of NGOs and government bodies continue to perpetrate transgressions against the cultural interdicts inherent in the legal system, e.g. the subversion of the "beyond reasonable doubt" standard of proof and criticising the police for investigating false rape accusers.

They wish to eradicate the common sense of experienced men like Osborne, who are hardened to sob stories of regret rape and the allure of trendy morals. The desired outcome is the penetration of SJW morality, of which Alison Saunders' "rape myths" are an example, into common use. A solution to this dire predicament is found Cameron's closing of his essay on the (distinctly unfashionable) Rieff:

> Transgressions need to be resisted; otherwise they will destroy culture and civilization altogether.

How Being Beta Can Make You More Attractive

February 18, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Quick…what's your response when a chick asks you: "Are you gay?"

A) "No! Of course not!"

B) "No way! I've slept with hundreds of women!"

C) "I'm against homosexuality!"

D) "Oh tooootally. I'm actually a gay porn star. You've seen my website, right?"

If D was your answer then congratulations. You've passed a shit test favorite of many of today's Ameri-cunts. If you went a step further and added that the line should be delivered in an overtly sarcastic tone with a devilish grin while maintaining eye contact with your target until she answers your question, so you can tease the shit out of her for whatever silly answer comes out of her mouth and then quickly change the subject, then you, my friend, have got the makings of true player.

Shit test to be deployed in 3….2….1….

Men here know that exhibiting beta traits is demonstrating low value (DLV) which subsequently de-moistens the southern regions of the fairer sex. The earlier this occurs in the set, the more damaging this is to your chances of bedding her.

This is not exclusive to pickups, ONS's, or FWBs. This also applies to LTRs. Granted, you get a little more wiggle room in relationships but failing a shit test administered by your woman only encourages her to dole out more that will increase in frequency, intensity, and complexity. Continued ineptitude in dealing with them will inevitably lead to the messy end of your relationship.

There is, however, a time and a place for strategically exhibiting beta traits and believe it or not, it will make your woman even hotter for you if done the right way.

"Wait a minute…why would I intentionally betafy myself and to what end?"

Fair questions. The next three sections will explain what beta game is, the conditions necessary to run it effectively, and a few examples of beta game in action which will include a couple of my own personal stories.

Keep in mind that this is next level game. This will take practice and lots of it. There will be some who are able to pick up this technique rather quickly but by and large, this will not be easy to master. But when you do, the benefits will be well worth the work. Trust me.

What is beta game?

Beta game is the act of strategically allowing a woman to discover a perceived vulnerability or weakness you do not actually have. This creates the illusion that you can be tamed—giving the rabbit a carrot to chase of sorts.

It's no secret that girls have always loved the bad boys (as they've been consistently shitting out their offspring for eons). They also know these alpha cads are far from sexually loyal which doesn't make for optimal husband or boyfriend material.

But they just can't help themselves so they jump into love affairs with these players anyway being fully aware of the peril that will likely ensue. The vast majority of women would rather be cheated on by an alpha than worshiped by a beta anyway so as far as their hamsters are concerned it's worth the risk.

As men, we now know and understand that we are the true romantics. At some point even the most seasoned cassanova will lock a girl down if he falls for her because that is in our nature. I'd be lying if I said I haven't been kicking around the idea of giving LTR status to a girl I'm currently seeing and I'd all but sworn off anything close to a relationship a long time ago.

….the fuck???

I know, I know but look…as cool and exciting as it is to sleep with different women, the fact remains that game is fucking hard. It takes a lot of time and resources to regularly bed girls that ~~aren't land whales~~ are less than desirable. If your approach to lay closing ratio is 1 out of 10 you're a god even though you're failing 90% of the time.

So a little respite in the form of an LTR can do a man good and give him a bit of a break from the grind of game, provided he's exercised good judgement in selecting his girl and has laid the groundwork properly.

Even then, things can still go horribly wrong and unfortunately a long term relationship is one of the few things in this world that can bring a man to his knees. In order to reduce the odds of being unraveled by a woman, we utilize certain strategies to keep this from happening—game.

If you're a regular diner at the red pill buffet, you're intimately familiar with the standard game tenets of keeping a woman chasing you. There are a few unorthodox techniques out there that work (depending on the girl) but one method that doesn't get as much copy as it deserves and has proven to be quite effective is beta game.

Why beta game?

Though they won't admit it, women adore men they cannot change or bend to their will. They'll bitch and complain that "he doesn't [insert bullshit] enough" but they stick around because a man they can't control is a man they can respect and love.

However, when you strategically and intentionally give her the slightest glimpse of what she will characterize as a "redeeming quality" (I'll explain this later) her attraction to you will skyrocket. When done correctly you become her drug for which there is no rehab. This is how effective calculated beta game is.

Girls want to be with men who do what they want, when they want, without apologies or explanation. But she will relentlessly chase a man to the ends of the earth if she sees even slightest chink in the seemingly impregnable armor she's futilely tried to penetrate in the past.

Of course she doesn't really want to change you and you don't really possess the weakness or vulnerability you have led her to believe that you have—but she doesn't know that. Further, she doesn't realize that if she is successful in her endeavor to civilize you, it's game over; for a tamed man is an unattractive man.

But the continuous pursuit of the impossible fuels an inextinguishable fire that will burn within her so long as you do not cave into her demands or what she thinks she desires.

The necessary conditions for beta game to work

1. You must be alpha from the start

For calculated beta game to be effective you must establish and maintain your dominance, high value, and abundance mentality from your very first interaction with her. There is no margin for error here. You have got to be 100% congruent.

Beta game will have positively zero impact if you have failed multiple shit tests or if she detects even trace amounts of anything resembling symptoms of oneitis. Women have no interest in chasing a carrot they've already eaten. You're already a conquered mountain in her eyes so more of the same will give her more reasons to cheat on you if she isn't already.

2. Show…don't tell

This is absolutely paramount for beta game. A common phrase black women like to spew is: "Don't talk about it…be about it". This is one of the few things I agree with them on and it's intrinsic to beta game. The reason for this is simple: disclosure comes off as seeking sympathy; discovery will be characterized as a redeeming quality to her. Huge difference in her mindset by just keeping your mouth shut and letting things happen naturally.

For example, instead of telling a woman “I just love children!” like most betas do (which only her beta bucks radar picks up) show her. This particular brand of beta game is straight up chick crack as you’ll see in one of my anecdotes below.

3. Don’t stage anything

This where congruence pays off. Staging phone calls, or “chance” situations (like the movie Hitch) to build attraction will blow up in your face if your target learns your meeting is orchestrated (which will probably happen as women are born with a supernatural ability to sniff out things like this). Not only will your value plummet but you may actually lose the girl.

Hitch working on staging a “chance meeting.” This only works in the movies.

My high school baseball coach used to tell us “let the game come to you.” Same concept here. Simply be ready if and when the opportunity presents itself as opposed to forcing the issue.

A couple of personal examples

Old Man Peterson

Several years ago I was washing clothes at my complex’s laundromat when I heard someone yelling. I took out my earbuds and looked around but didn’t see anything. So I put my buds back in and continued folding clothes.

I heard it again.

This time I turned off the music and walked outside to see a very elderly man on the ground surrounded by his groceries which were sprawled about.

He'd lost his grip on his walker, fell, and couldn't get to his feet. I helped him up and walked him back to his apartment which happened to be right across the hall from mine. He thanked me and invited me to stop by later for a drink which I accepted.

Turns out the guy was a Vietnam War veteran and one of the coolest people I've ever met in my life. He was a great story teller as he relived his adventures while we both laughed and sipped our Cutty Sarks. He'd been married twice and was quite the rascal with the ladies. His liver was shot from a lifetime of drinking but he didn't give a shit. He knew he was on the back nine and nothing was going to stop him from enjoying the little time he had left.

The old man's poison of choice

His multiple back surgeries and severely arthritic knees earned him disability, but as we all know that monthly check is barely enough to make ends meet. I was as broke as a joke back then but I really wanted to help the guy out. So I decided to give him half of what I got for donating plasma every week which was roughly $30.

It wasn't much but it was the least I could do. He was always appreciative and paid me back in liquor and wisdom. Far as I'm concerned it's me who came out ahead in those transactions.

Anyway, one evening I was hanging out with my girlfriend when he came over to return the card the plasma money was loaded onto after donations. He usually just said "thanks" but this time he thanked me profusely for helping him out in his time of need and that he wished the world had more people like me and so forth (the sly old bastard still had a little wing man in him).

When he left, my girlfriend spewed all sorts of hyperbole about my character and my heart of gold and how that attractive quality was lost in today's man. She was all over me that night and her behavior substantially improved over the next few weeks.

This worked out beautifully because everything was already in place and when the situation arose, it worked to my advantage without me having to push the agenda.

Granted, I got a little help from a veteran player who was cognizant of the scenario and helped me out (he later asked how that night went) but the fact that I wasn't jumping at the chance to impress her made all the difference in the world.

Things like this had happened to me before but being unplugged and having a deeper understanding of women and their id helped me become aware of the power of beta game.

Adventures in babysitting

Two Christmases ago my sister and brother in-law came west to spend the holidays with me. Aside from their shopping and holiday preparations they wanted to do some gambling and maybe get into a bit of foolishness.

They have three young children (10, 6, and 4 at the time of their visit) so nights out on the town were a luxury rarely afforded them. I've never been much for holiday shenanigans so I was more than happy to watch my nephew and nieces while they headed downtown to indulge in the bright lights and casinos and enjoy a few kid free nights.

One such evening, a girl I had just started dating stopped by after she got off work. My nephew and I had a blast playing Halo while my nieces watched and enjoyed the spectacle. Afterwards we ate our weight in Christmas sweets (Uncle Donovan was always the cool uncle because "you let us eat all the candy we want!"). We all laughed and had a great time while my girl looked on with a dreamy look on her face she couldn't get rid of.

After I put them to bed my girl ranted and raved about how great I was with kids and how I'm going to make a wonderful father and how my kids are going to love me and so forth. We had crazy sex that night and it continued for quite a while.

Once again this little event changed our relationship for the better. She became more unselfish between the sheets, made more of an effort to look good for me, made herself available much more often and even took to cleaning my apartment when she came over. All of this was in an effort to push for an LTR, which she eventually verbalized.

Funny thing is, this girl had just turned 21 and made it very clear early in our courtship that she had no interest in having children or settling down (verifying the carousel ticket she no doubt received in her teens) which was fine by me. Yet, when she saw me interacting with my sister's children she stepped into a phone booth and turned into Supergirlfriend.

A few other examples

One girl I had over saw a group picture I had on my bookshelf. When she asked who they were I told her they were some people I volunteered at a shelter with. "Awwwwww" she said as she picked up the picture and swooned. I could almost see her hamster working overtime painting me as some admirable philanthropist extraordinaire.

Volunteer work is great beta game (…and no, that's not me)

Another technique that works well is carrying a picture of your mother in your wallet. Girls foolishly believe that a man who treats his mother well will treat women "well." When they catch a glimpse of that picture they assume that you hold her (your mother) in high regard which will, in her mind, elevate her status on account of the myth they've been fed about men treating their significant others the way they treat their mothers.

This blog (which is solid fucking gold and should be read by any and every male in the western hemisphere) is a great example of beta game in action:

> One of my friends is dating a 10. I mean a perfect, jaw-dropping, every man and woman in the club stops in amazement when she walks in 10. She's a 5'9" half Latina half American Indian fitness instructor with a tiny waist and large natural C cups. Dear god almighty it hurts just thinking about her.
> A few weeks ago we were all hanging out in a club and she was leaning in talking to me. She said "I wish Jeremy would just settle down. We're too old to be out clubbing like this." She's 26 years old, by the way.
> Thinking there was no way in hell I'd ever get her to leave my buddy – her 6'3" Abercrombie & Fitch model lookalike boyfriend, I decided to try a different approach on her. I tossed out the game, the negs, the framing, etc. and simply said:
> "I agree. We really are too old to be partying like this. I'm really at the point in my life where I just want to settle down with a woman I love, have a family, and enjoy the next phase of my life. I know it sounds strange to hear a man say this, but I think I'm finally ready for a baby."
> Her eyes dilated. She put her hand on my elbow. With her boyfriend not ten feet > away (albeit looking the other direction ordering more shots) she leaned in to me and said “You know, you’re a good man. If I wasn’t with Jeremy, I would so be with you.”

> Then she kissed me half on the lips/half on my chin and smiled. She waited a few seconds to gauge my reaction. I said nothing. I just looked at her. She said “We’re always in a group. Why don’t we just ever hang out together? We can do some grownup stuff like check out a museum or see a show.”

Beta game works, gents.

In Closing

Here’s the essence of beta game summed up in one image:

Showing women faux flashes of the man you “could” be and then quickly taking it away triggers a reaction in their brain similar to the dopamine rush that rom com fantasies give her. Teasing a woman with what she wants after giving her a taste drives her crazy with desire which leads to her stepping up her efforts to keep you around long term.

It’s important to remember that things like frame, congruency, and the organic presentation of your endearing quality are all key to successfully switching on your target’s acquisition mode in earnest. If you’re a beta schlub or come off as a try hard this isn’t going to work for you. Period.

Be careful though. This has the potential to turn your girl into that crazy ex if you dump her. Once a woman has it in her mind that you’re the one who will fulfill her wants and needs she’ll stop at nothing to reign you back in which could bring a lot of unwanted drama into your life.

Other than that, the upsides to CBG are well worth the effort. Any other ideas for calculated beta game out there?

This article is dedicated to my good friend,

4 Compelling Reasons You Should Stop Comparing Yourself To Other Men

February 18, 2015 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

I live about a 15 minute walk from the headquarters of Mozilla, Twitter, Salesforce, Yelp, and Charles Schwab, among many others. The main campuses of Yahoo, Google, Apple, and Facebook are less than an hour drive away. There is money everywhere. There are more BMW's around than Honda's, and making six figures won't impress anyone around here, and won't even guarantee that you don't with roommates. You may have already guessed that I am talking about San Francisco.

I am doing ok for myself, but I am not part of the tech world. I don't have equity or stock options in any of the promising start-ups or thriving tech corporations. Every time I go to some party or a networking event, I run into someone who cashed out on something, retired at the age of 30, bought five houses and is now looking where to invest his millions and where else to travel after having gone to 50 different places.

Hearing about it on TV is one thing, but being in the same room at a bar or at a house part with them is another. You can't help but compare yourself and ask why you aren't that guy. Comparing yourself to others, however, is a horrible idea, and you must stay away from it as far as possible for at least four major reasons:

1. It undermines your confidence on the deepest level

When you start thinking that you are less than the guy who is standing next to you, it will necessarily make you less confident in just about every way, including in your interactions with women. You can't have that attractive relaxed presence known as swagger when you feel like you are not as good as that other guy. You will feel threatened by other guys in the room or jealous. Your body language will announce to everyone that you are not comfortable and you don't feel like you belong or like you are good enough for the occasion and that is extremely unattractive to women, because they recognize that behavior as a major and sign of insecurity. A lot has and will be said about not putting any girl on a pedestal. But it's equally important to not put other guys on a pedestal as well.

2. It's not fair to yourself

You could say that in this life it's the bottom line that counts and excuses such as being an immigrant or coming from a disadvantaged background are just that—excuses. Still, you have to recognize that we all have a different path in life, different skills and different interests. If you are not interested in hedge funds or software development, you can't compare yourself to those who made it big in tech because they have been interested in tech since high school. This is the time to focus on what you want and what you are interested in doing, and becoming good and successful at that.

3. It makes you waste money

Familiar with the term "Keeping up with the Jones-es?" I bet you are. When you buy something to wear, drive, or live in not because you want it or you need it, but because you are trying to keep up with the neighbor or a friend or a co-worker, you already lost. You allow the wrong factors to influence your purchasing decisions, and your personal finances. This is yet another reason to stop comparing your house, car and wardrobe to those of others.

4. It is bound to make you feel like shit

There is always someone taller, richer, better looking and even more interesting than you are out there. There is always someone who has a better job, who is a better tennis player and who gets laid more with hotter women. The moment you start ranking yourself against that person, you lose. You need to stop doing that.

Striving to become a better person and having a great role model in life who you can look up to and learn from is one of the most effective ways of improving yourself, but it has to come from admiration; not from competition. Overcoming any kind of envy takes strength and independence of character, but it is well worth trying. When it comes to game, becoming a stronger, smarter and a more interesting guy, while enjoying that journey, is a key to developing real confidence with women.

Once you stop comparing yourself to others, you will be able to admire other people's accomplishments and possessions in a pure way. You will be truly happy for them without filling bitter about not having what they do.

Why Non-Christians Should Observe Lent

February 18, 2015 | by William Manning | Link | Original Link

As any student knows, we are now approaching the hardest part of the year—that miserable limbo between winter and spring. Work and school become drudgeries, the weather is neither warm nor cold, and ground is covered in half-melted ice and snow.

The feeling is peculiar—a kind of suffocating lethargy that is unique to February and March. The human race (in northern regions, anyway) seems to think in unison, “We’ve had enough of this damned winter. Just get it over with already.”

But that’s not it. A certain group of people have even another “misery” added to their late winter: liturgical Christians. Yes, my friends, it is indeed that time of year again when Lent approaches. Good high church families spend the earlier parts of this week desperately trying to eat up all the meat in the house before Ash Wednesday, when the fast begins[1].

However, for those who are unfamiliar with Lent, let this quote enlighten you:

> “Lent is a solemn religious observance in the liturgical calendar of many Christian denominations that begins on Ash Wednesday [February 18, 2015] and covers a period of approximately six weeks before Easter Sunday [April 5, 2015]. The traditional purpose of Lent is the preparation of the believer through prayer, penance, repentance of sins, almsgiving, atonement and self-denial. This event, along with its pious customs is observed by Christians in the Anglican, Calvinist, Lutheran, Methodist, and Roman Catholic traditions. Today, some Anabaptist and evangelical churches also observe the Lenten season.” (Wikipedia)

To get more specific, the most noticeable feature of Lent is that those who faithfully observe it refrain from eating the flesh of mammals and birds on Fridays. It is also customary to spend these (approximately) 40 days trying even harder than before to eliminate vices from your life.

"Well," you say, "This is nothing but one of those stupid Christian traditions. What the hell are you talking to us about this for? Does it have any applications to kino escalation?" This is a very good question to ask. I submit to you, brothers, that any man serious about improving himself should observe Lent, not for religious reasons (unless you want to), but rather for the reasons I will mention here.

1. It helps you develop self-discipline

In order accomplish anything worthwhile, you must have a delayed time preference. What does this mean? It means that you are willing to sacrifice pleasure right now for the promise of future reward. This concept is central to understanding how to find fulfillment in life. In almost every religion, self-denial is a central concept—the idea of limiting pleasure in earthly life to experience heavenly pleasures in their fullest.

Self-discipline is the primal struggle of suppressing your biological instincts and doing what you rationally know is best for you. It is quite literally taming the animal inside of you. Lent can help you do just that.

By setting aside a certain amount of time (around 40 days in this case) to focus on denying your base desires and cultivating your rationality and your soul, you are going into "monk mode." You are living life for a short time with as few distractions as possible in order to cultivate your character and focus on conquering the pet vices you hold.

The obvious objection to this reason is, "Well shouldn't we be doing that all the time?" The answer to that is "yes." However, during Lent, you should buckle down on yourself even more and really push yourself to the limits. To use bodybuilding terms, Lent is "progressive overload" for the whole man. You already don't masturbate? Try going without any kind of sexual release during Lent. You already read a book a week? Read two.

2. It forces you to innovate

This particular point falls under the assumption that all of you readers work out regularly. During Lent, you are not allowed to eat any mammal or bird meat on Fridays. This presents a problem for bodybuilders, who need to eat 10 chickens every day plus half of a cow and a huge scoop of ridiculously overpriced protein powder. You don't want to wreck your diet by not getting enough protein on Fridays, so what do you do? How do you get your protein?

That's for you to decide. Find ways to innovate. Discover new foods you never knew of before. Eat more fish. Discover the wonders of legumes. If it really is impossible for you to get all the protein you need on a Lenten diet and you don't want to just eat at maintenance, keep on eating meat, but make sure you abstain from something else that is dear to you. I guarantee, however, that you can find a way to make it work if you try hard enough. After all, it's just one day a week.

Your ancestors scratched a living from dirt. They dug up roots they had never seen before. They started farming. They adapted to their circumstances. And you're going to whine and moan about not having some pre-slaughtered meat.

3. You learn to enjoy the simple things

Learning to love everyday things is cliché, but so important if you want to be a truly joyful man. Allow me a moment of sappiness, gentlemen. To be able to take a walk and glory and nature is one of the most wonderful joys a man can possess. To delight in the taste of a strawberry, or breathe in the salty air of the seashore, or enjoy the endorphin high after a good workout—all of these things are what make life worth living.

If you can only find pleasure in the ecstasy of sex, or the false sense of accomplishment from a video game, or the savory flavors of fine cooked meal and not the simple smile of a little girl, the satisfaction of a job well done, or the simple sweetness of an apple, you are not living life to the fullest.

We take so many things for granted. Lent strips away the excesses of life and forces us to realize the beauty in the mundane. Once you choose to habitually refrain from meat, you begin to understand that tomatoes actually taste pretty good in their glorious simplicity. Then, once the pleasures we forsook are restored, we enjoy them even more than we did before. That ham on Easter tastes a lot better than that steak you used to eat every night before.

There are some simple rules when observing Lent, according to Christian tradition. The first is that you observe a full fast from all food besides water on Ash Wednesday (February 18) and Good Friday (April 3). On regular days, you should be careful to eat the meat of mammals and birds sparingly (though Anglicans and Orthodox refraining from eating it all together).

If you are feeling really motivated, don’t eat any dairy products or eggs on Fridays, either, though this probably isn’t realistic for someone looking to continue their bulking during Lent.

In addition to observing the fast from meat on Fridays, you should devote this time of the year to developing any skills you want to and eliminating any vices in your life. I will use my own plan as an example. I am trying not to masturbate or use the internet excessively during Lent, and I am trying to practice the guitar every day, read more, and get more writing done.

Just remember, the goal of Lent is to make you into a better man. Follow this advice, and I guarantee you won’t regret it.

Hope you like fish.

So You Want To Work On An Oil Rig?

February 19, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

Working on an oil rig is a great way to escape the 9-5 grind and build financial freedom.

Ever since I published How to get work on the rigs on my blog, guys have been emailing me asking how they can get into this much coveted line of work.

While I've covered most of the "how to" in that article, in this one I'll tell you a little bit more about what it's actually like and the various pros and cons of working on an oil rig, so that guys thinking about a different way of life can consider this lucrative business as an option.

One thing is for sure: life on an oil rig isn't for everyone. But if six months off per year, 100k+ annually and a pretty exciting, ever changing lifestyle strike you as rewards worth the challenges you'll face, maybe life on the rigs is a good way to go.

It isn't all sunshine, lollipops, and rainbows, but it sure beats the office cubicle and the 9-5 grind.

How I got started on the rigs

I moved to Indonesia in 2007 and for the first few years I taught English. Slowly, through socializing and getting to know other expats, I got to know some people involved in the oil and gas indistry. I also learned Bahasa Indonesia, the local language, to near fluency.

I was going through a little bit of a hard time financially when one of the people I'd grown close to asked me if I'd be interested in trying out for a position. I'd meet his buddy who ran the company and see what he thought. It would be low pay, hard work, and I'd have to go to West Papua for up to eight weeks at a time.

It sounded hellish, but figuring a man has nothing to lose if he tries, I said why not. I met the guy at his bar, talked to him about the work and he hired me on the spot.

I'm not going to lie to you, getting into oil and gas isn't easy. There's a catch-22 scenario whereby you need experience to get a job and you need a job to get experience. The only ways around this I know are to either have highly sought after skills, have previous experience in your field in a non-rig environment, or know somebody in the field who can bring you in.

The good side of working in oil and gas.

There are a lot of good things about working in the oil and gas industry.

First, you don't need to have a higher education to make good money. While there are people on the rig with mechanical engineering degrees and other kinds of education, most guys just have technical qualifications or high school level education. Even at the low end you can expect to make $300-$400 a day and move up from there, which can pretty much allow you to live like a mac-fucking-daddy anywhere, especially if living in Asia.

Secondly the holidays are immense. You get a full six months off per year so if you like to travel and explore this can be an ideal career. Exploring is pretty much what I live for, so this suited me down to the ground. Having this amount of time off gives you the necessary time to build a side business if that's what you want to do, which I've used to build this blog and another little side business.

Lastly, the work environment is pretty exciting. I get to go to work by chopper, meaning I don't have to deal with a bullshit daily commute. I can also change location often as projects tend to last a year or two then you have to move on to another, and possibly then another country. Some guys I know have worked all over the world from South America to the Middle East to Asia. I've personally worked in Papua, Indonesia and Australia in the last two and a bit years.

If astronomy is your thing (I'm into it), you'll never see a better night sky than from the middle of the jungle or 500 miles out in the ocean. You also catch some of the best sunrises and sunsets on earth every day.

Overall I'd say these rewards are worth the downsides of the industry, which I'll get into next.

The bad side of working on the rigs

The first downside of working on the rigs is the loneliness and isolation you can experience by being away from friends and family for a full six months a year. If you're a family man who has children, sometimes you'll miss out on Christmas, birthdays, and the like. This is hard on guys who have kids, but not so hard on younger guys without commitments.

I've been thinking about this point a lot since learning I'm going to be a father, but I'm not worried – I'll be able to spend immense quality time with my kid when I'm off. I can take him or her on vacation or exploring some cool reefs and mountains instead of coming home tired every day and watching mindless TV. To every cloud is a silver lining, if you just look for it.

Secondly, the work is manual and can be hard and dirty. I don't mind getting a sweat on and quite enjoy the manual aspect of the labour, but for some guys they were born to do this kind of work while others just weren't. I'm Irish, most of us are descended from some sort of viking or slave, so manual work doesn't bother me.

Lastly, working on the rigs can be dangerous, even deadly. Lots of guys get themselves killed every single year despite all the tools being in place to prevent this from happening. If you're careless, absent minded, or reckless, forget about working on oil rigs – you'll get yourself or your mates killed quickly.

On the rig itself

Being on the rig itself is a unique lifestyle. You're basically on board a floating (or jungle bound) prison for a month at a time. You'll have to go without sex and will basically be living a reading, writing, and gym lifestyle while you're there.

This can be tough both mentally and physically as you work 12 hours a day, 7 days a week, for 28 days straight. You need a routine to survive, but it is a unique chance to live the disciplined life. Some guys simply can't hack it and quit after a short time or end up as miserable whinebags bringing everyone down. I quite enjoy the solitude and time to reflect and plan my next escapade into the real world. I use the time to work on myself and my projects.

I read and write a lot on the rig to keep myself entertained and go to the gym several times per week to blow off some steam. Without that outlet I think I would probably snap.

With regard to food, on the rig I work on currently the food is great quality and plentiful – usually fish, chicken breast, or steak with vegetables and potatoes, so it's easy to live a life dedicated to fitness and strength building. We get five feeds a day and can eat as much as we want, so calorie increases while bulking are never an issue.

Some guys on the rig are actual beasts, benching within the 400-500lb range and eating 6-8 times a day. However, I've been on some rigs in Papua and Indonesia were the food is shitty and you're surviving on rice, eggs, fish and chilli sauce. It all depends on the location.

Overall I enjoy life on the rig. It's challenging and it's ever changing. It forces you to grow and affords you the time away from home to really enjoy your real life when you get back to it and appreciate the small things. A simple thing like your own bed and intimate time with your lover gets amplified by 1000x when you haven't enjoyed it for a month.

Despite enjoying it, when that chopper rolls around and it's time to go home to my family and life, I'm a happy man. The work is done and you can just forget about it, which is another good side of working on the rig – you get to completely switch off from the job when you're off.

The kind of people you meet on rigs

One of the best things about working offshore is the people you meet. They come from all walks of life and always have insane back stories, but the one thing they all have in common is that they're determined, successful and disciplined individuals. This is good because it's like surrounding yourself with a wolfpack of dedicated winners.

All the guys have investment properties, nice cars, vacation often and some of the older ones are millionaires with a whole history of success. These are the kind of people I want to surround myself with. I'm not into material things as such, but being surrounded by hardcore, disciplined winners helps keep me in the right mindset.

This of course also leads to valuable connections. In this industry, as in the rest of life, it's not what you know but who you know. As you work offshore for a while and get to know the right people, further opportunities will open up to you.

As an example of this, one day on a normal working day I went to do a rig survey at another site to get ready for a gear-up (equipment installation). I was having a coffee and started speaking Bahasa Indonesia to an old man who was sitting there having a smoke next to me (I don't smoke by the way).

Within a few minutes he gave me three phone numbers of people I should call – one of whom gave me my current job at three times more pay than I was earning at the time. Bingo! It's all about connections and oil rigs are one place to meet successful, driven, well off guys.

As far as friendships go it is possible to meet some people you stay in touch with in the real world, but my experience has been that work is one world and life is another. Guys I know on the rigs I don't see in the real world. That's just the way it is.

How does working on a rig help you develop as a man?

For all of the above reasons working on a rig will force you to grow, and fast.

This is a cutthroat business were mistakes are not tolerated and can have dire consequences. You'll get away with little errors but any major screw ups and you are gone.

You'll learn to be better with people. You're forced to work, live, and socialize with people you wouldn't necessarily gravitate towards in the real world so your people skills improve. You learn how to talk to almost anyone from any background.

You also will develop self discipline to a massive degree. I wake every morning at 5am, shower, read, and then eat and attend the safety meetings before a days work. Afterwards I go to the gym or write (on alternate days) before hitting the sack for eight hours sleep. I found this routine way of life carries over into my real life to some extent, although of course the day to day activities are different.

Working offshore will also teach you how to cope with isoation and being alone. One of the worst qualities a man can have in my opinion is being needy emotionally and not being able to stand on his own two feet. Working on the rig will quickly sort this out as you will have to learn to enjoy your own company, be indepedent of mind and able to both entertain and think for yourself. It's literally like having a "time out" from the real world.

Lastly, the work itself is physical, challenging and can at times be fast paced and urgent. This causes you to grow in many ways such as learning to stay cool under pressure, learning to think clearly, learning to lead a team and communicate effectively, as well as learning how to cope with failure and try again a different way, which carries over a millionfold into the real world where things are much less intense and mistakes don't have such dire consequences.

Summary

Life on the rigs demands a certain kind of individual. If you are super social and can't survive without going out and partying three times a week and meeting girls every night, if you can't cope with a month without sex, or if you don't like to sweat and get your hands dirty, forget about working on the rigs.

If you can cope with the bads i've mentioned in this article and you want the money, the time, and the life, then go for it. It's probably the best decision I have ever made and while I sometimes tell myself I'll "quit soon" while having a shitty day, I probably never will until I'm fully loaded and ready to retire and live the good life.

It's been fun writing this. I hope you've enjoyed it too. If you're considering a life on the rigs and have further questions feel free to ask.

Barbie Is The Perfect Role Model For Little Girls

Feminists claim that exaggerated beauty standards are toxic towards women. They point to Barbie as the supreme patriarchal oppression propaganda for little girls, no matter how often Mattel makes empowered versions of her. Doctor Barbie teaches little girls that women can both be sexually attractive and have a high-status career—as opposed to something embarrassing like an electrician or Applebee's manager. Barbie has it all, even though she can never convince Ken to settle down and give her a baby.

For feminists, what bothers them is that Barbie is beautiful. Feminism is an ugly ideology that overtly seeks to glorify both inner and outer ugliness. They claim that Barbie and other images cause girls to be so obsessed with their appearance that they turn to eating disorders. Furthermore, Barbie's physical proportions are so unrealistic that she would be dead in real life. To them, Barbie represents a vile standard of beauty.

Barbie Is Not A Standard

This claim of being a standard is a great misunderstanding. Barbie is not so much one to be copied as she is a hero in the classical sense of the word. Barbie is an over-man to little girls. She transcends reality and inspires admiration. Like Theseus for the ancients and Batman for today's boys, Barbie goes beyond what a normal person can do. Barbie is not a standard; she is an ideal. She inspires aspiration, not imitation. Barbie is the modern Aphrodite.

Nor is this a double standard. Little boys idolize Wolverine and He-man. They play make-believe to be like them. Little boys know they will never be as strong, fast, or accomplished as their heroes, but they play pretend just to have a little taste of that glory. Through these heroes, little boys learn to aspire to be their best. This finds its way into youth sports and education.

Little boys want to be as fast on the soccer field as Achilles or Flash is on the field of war. If public school was actually engaging to the mind, little boys would strive to be as quick-witted on their tests as Odysseus or Spiderman is in battle. Little boys view professional athletes in the same way little girls view models and pop singers.

Even little children know androgyny is to be avoided.

We all want someone to look up to. We all want to worship a person greater than ourselves. And most importantly, we want that person to have some kind of similarity to us. Many people—particularly in rural areas outside of North America and western Europe—have a heavy adoration given to particular Christian saints. Even Muslims in the near east have a deep reverence for Saint George.

Saints are the exaggerations of what it means to endure resolvedly through difficult times, the ultimate ethic of Christianity (as opposed to the feel-good "love" that is preached today). Reading some of these saint stories, whether eastern, western, recent, or ancient, one soon realizes that many of these people had severe emotional instability that is often confused for holiness.

That is of no consequence, for what their idolizers truly desire is someone to exalt above themselves. They want someone to imitate even if only as little as they are able.

Barbie Should Be Aspired To

If characters like Indiana Jones are the apex of masculinity, then Barbie is the same for femininity. She is beautiful, intelligent, domestic, social, gorgeous, hard-working, wealthy, attractive, outgoing, healthy, confident, pretty, talented, lovely, has great tits and hair, accomplished, alluring, charming, elegant, unblemished, graceful, and committed to only one man. The same is true for most of the 20th century Disney princesses, despite the spike in feminism during both's heyday of the 1990s.

Little girls want to be like Cinderella because Cinderella is desired both for her beauty and her mind. On every level of her person, Prince Charming wants her. It does not matter to him that she is the equivalent of a beta as a dirt-poor servant girl. Cinderella is beautiful and graceful, and that's all that matters to Prince Charming.

Cinderella is a pleasant person to be around and has a heart full of kindness. Prince Charming was the first person in Cinderella's life who ever made her feel like she was wanted. How could she not fall in love with him?

Both sexes are impacted by fascist beauty standards. Men have to grow muscle, which is a journey that is painful, expensive, and filled with misinformation. And if he's under six feet tall, his chances with women are drastically cut no matter what his other characteristics.

Women on the other hand have to buy an exercise video and keep their hair long. I suppose make-up can be time-consuming, but fashion is not nearly as expensive as women like to claim.

Exaggerated Beauty "Standards" Are Beautiful

I've written before that most men don't actually want a woman who is so skinny that she looks unhealthy. The sunken eyes, the skin that one could swear was translucent, the weird sag in her features, the lifeless hair. Eating disorder girls are not attractive.

Despite her long hair and otherwise pleasant face, 2/10 WNB.

It would be both mentally and physically unhealthy for a man to obsess about achieving the impossible body of Beowulf. So if Barbie and Aphrodite inspire women to turn to unhealthy practices (like eating disorders or fad diets) in a way that He-man doesn't to men, then what does that say about women?

Either it is a lie that strict beauty standards cause women to obsess at the risk of their own health, or it is manifest that women are mentally and emotionally inferior to men. If media is so damaging towards women, and if little girls are unable to want an ugly doll, then is it best to keep them outside of society in general?

Of course that's not what I'm actually advocating. My point is that exaggerated beauty "standards" are not harmful. Feminists would have you believe that there is a binary choice: A woman can either shove her fingers down her throat or she can be comfortable being overweight.

In reality, this is a spectrum, and the golden medium is called "growing up." Both anorexia and fat pride are shortcut cheats to beauty. Mature adults achieve what they want through hard work. Nothing says "strong, empowered woman" like diet and exercise to keep a good figure, and that is the kind of self-discipline that men are attracted to.

The face that launched a thousand blog posts.

Also, notice that the picture of Aphrodite at the top has a little bit of a belly. Golden moderation.

Drawn To Escapism

Since leftists assume kids are unable to tell fiction (toys and television) from reality (almost everything they encounter), the feminists have made a new alternative Barbie. You can give her acne, scars, stretch marks, and trash tattoos. Personally I want to see some eczema scars on that tramp. That'll make her just like my wife, and since Blairina is perfect as is, of course I would want a second one in doll form to replace her with.

Kids don't like entertainment that is realistic. Children want escapism, exaggeration, and utopia (c.f. every toy or movie made for kids during the 20th century). Kids are attracted to perfection, and the older they get, the more they sense that they won't get it from the world.

Escapism is the only entertainment that has ever sold. The fantasy and sci-fi genre developed off of European folktales collected by people like the Charles Perrault. The panty-wetting romcom was not invented by Hollywood, because Goethe had women literally killing themselves in the 18th century.

Action flicks and violent video games go back to the Iliad and on through historical fiction and folklore like King Arthur. The lyrics in music are just romanticizations of life emotions, whether a bad country-pop song in 2015 or an anonymous coal miner song from 1875.

Why Beauty Standards Are More Stringent Today

I'll grant that beauty standards formerly valued women who were slightly more plump. There's not as much difference as people today claim, but there has still been some change.

It is widely claimed that people used to value overweight and pale women because those traits were signs of wealth. However, I'm skeptical. After all, arts and entertainment were always geared towards the top 1% before the industrial revolution made it inexpensive to produce, meaning that the elite were more easily able to avoid images of poverty. I don't buy the narrative that society used to value obese women or that most people in all human history were on the brink of starvation.

My guess why beauty standards are a little more demanding today than they were 100 years ago is because today women are ugly. They are overweight, they have bad hair, they lack social grace, and they think hideous products are fashionable by sole virtue of their popularity. Women and little girls know this instinctually and over-correct through their fantasies.

Perhaps little girls love Barbie and Ariel so much because they see how frumpy mommy and their teachers at school are. Females have an innate need to be surrounded by beauty.

An ugly purse coveted only by ugly women.

If our world today—with its ugly people with ugly faux personalities buying ugly faux merchandise from chain stores and eating ugly faux boxed meals—If our world today is so ugly, then I would wager that this inescapable ugliness is what causes little girls to search ever harder for beauty. We live in a society of plastic and look-alike wood. Perhaps it is not a great mystery that Disney made such a strong recovery in the 1990s when feminism was at its strongest.

Despite their questionable morality, Disney cartoons are truly beautiful for all ages. And when little girls grow too old for princess stories, they turn to romantic movies and novels full of beautiful people with beautiful creative careers working in a bakery or advertising firm. And when they grow tired of that, they turn on the tv and watch beautiful people doing beautiful dances or singing beautiful songs on competition shows. And during the day before those shows come on, they watch shows about how to have beautiful houses or beautiful food.

Women just want to be beautiful and have a beautiful life. Barbie gives them the inspiration to achieve their dreams. Then feminism sweeps along and tells them to remain stagnant.

5 Old School Tips For Getting Ripped

February 19, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

Now – how would you rather look?

Nearly every single guy I survey reports they would MUCH rather look like the old-time strongman.

And yet – without even knowing it – most guys eat and train more like a modern-day bodybuilder than an old-time strong man. So in this article, I'll show you five ways to get a body like an old time strongman.

1. Back Away From The Bench!

While modern-day bodybuilders love the bench press, the strong men of yesteryear preferred a different upper body exercise.

Old school strong man Herman Goerner demonstrating the overhead press. Good exercise form, terrible fashion choice.

The Standing Overhead Press.

The old-timers considered the standing overhead press the ultimate test of strength. This exercise will strengthen your shoulders, your triceps and even your core – without over-developing your pecs like the bench press sometimes can.

Shoot for barbell overhead pressing your own bodyweight and you'll be on your way to true old school strength. So if you weigh 185 pounds, your goal is to press 185 pounds over your head for a single rep – without any knee bend.

When you can do that – you'll be stronger than 99% of all gym rats.

A gym from the turn of the century. No treadmills and, thankfully, no Katy Perry music either.

See any treadmills, elliptical machines or exercise bikes?

Yeah, me either. That's because the old-time strong men got lean and muscular by grunting, straining and lifting heavy objects – not by traipsing along on a treadmill at 3.2 miles per hour while watching daytime television.

Lift hard, lift heavy… and let your diet take care of the fat loss. And speaking of diet…

3. Skip The Shakes

The single best advice I can give anyone looking to build muscle, burn fat and achieve optimal health is also the simplest: Eat real food.

Cut out the cakes, cookies and chips. And – shocking as it may seem – you might want to cut out the sugar-laden protein shakes too.

Instead, eat like a man. Steak, eggs and veggies. You've got teeth for a reason – use 'em.

When you eat real food – no straw required – you might be surprised how fast your body changes. Here's an easy rule of thumb: If the food you're about to eat didn't exist when your grandfather was a kid… don't eat it.

4. Lift Heavy Stuff

Arnold deadlifting 710 pounds

It seems almost everybody in the gym lifts in the 8-10 rep range. And while that's fine for beginners, you're missing out on a lot of potential muscle if you never challenge yourself and lift heavy.

The old-timers lifted heavy – usually sticking with 5 reps per exercise. That's because 5 reps seems to provide a near perfect combination of strength and size gains. Sometimes, the old-timers would lift even heavier – often using weights they could only lift once or twice. This not only builds muscle, but also strengthens the joints, tendons and ligaments.

Recommendations: Every once in a while – after properly warming up and with proper spotters, of course – go all out and see how much you can lift on a given exercise for a true one-rep max. Not only will you strengthen your joints and ligaments, but when you return to your regular training weights they'll feel lighter and you'll find you can perform more reps.

5. Power Down To Power Up

This dude gets it

I'm fairly certain the old-time trainers didn't burn the midnight oil chatting away on Facebook or mindlessly melting into the couch while Jimmy Fallon laughs at his own jokes for the 90th show in a row.

Legendary strongman Doug Hepburn – arguably the strongest man in the world at his peak – slept 10 hours a night.

And we now know just how important sleep is for anyone interested in optimal health and fitness. While you sleep, your body produces human growth hormone, secretes testosterone and repairs muscle tissues. Believe it or not, you can actually gain muscle mass and melt away body fat just by getting upwards of 9 hours of sleep per night.

Let Tivo take care of the "must-see" TV and get yourself 9+ hours of sleep for just one week – you'll be absolutely amazed at how fast your body changes. You might think you're too busy to ever manage 9+ hours of sleep a night for a week.

But consider this: A leading strength coach tried this experiment and reported that his cravings for sweets vanished and he dropped an incredible 22 pounds in a week. Yes, 22 pounds in ONE week. So if you want to get into shape FAST, carve out some extra time for sleep.

Follow these five tips and you too can get a body like an old-time strongman. Whether you choose to compliment your new physique with a stunning handlebar mustache is completely up to you.

The New Ghostbusters Movie Will Be Ruined By The Feminist Agenda

February 19, 2015 | by JD Unwin | Link | Original Link

Hollywood has done it again— and by "it," I mean taking a franchise that features men as heroes and transformed it into yet another casualty of fashionable feminism. This is especially hypocritical considering that this movie is based on a franchise that features men as heroes and was judged as sexist by feminists for featuring only males as the heroes.

Slinging ectoplasm is man's work

Like the proverbial kid sister who would fume at the fact that her brother and his friends would lock her out of the male only clubhouse, the feminists and their mangina accomplices in the media once again demonstrate their need to forcibly intrude upon any perceived male bastions. Their solution? Take the all male cast and replace it with an all female cast, thereby sending the message that it's ok to be sexist, so long as you're sexist against men…then it isn't really sexist, but gender equality.

Recently in Entertainment Weekly, Paul Feig, director of that wonderful feminist cop fantasy "The Heat," was quoted as saying that he wanted to reboot the franchise by taking it in an entirely new direction with an all-female cast, while not ruining the memory of the previous all male cast.

The question begs to be asked: how do you show respect to the cast of Ghostbusters 1 and 2 by completely eliminating the history that those installments created in a second sequel?

The answer is: you don't. In the creative mind of Hollywarped, you show respect to the fans of a franchise by creating a new franchise from the raped carcass of the original. Like a xenomorph springing from the chest of yet another unfortunate host, the end result is less than the core audience expected, and more than anyone in the victim's place would want.

Is there a need for a reboot?

Why should this franchise be rebooted in the first place? Why eliminate the legend that helped make it a successful and beloved franchise in the eyes of many? Surely a new Ghostbusters featuring the sons (and daughters) of the core list of characters would have appealed just as much, if not more, to the main Ghostbusters audience and those less familiar with the franchise, so why neuter the Ghostbusters completely? This defies all logic—to say nothing of the fact that having the corpulent Melissa McCarthy run around the city with a 35-lb proton pack strapped to her girth defies the laws of physics.

Her next movie will be a starring role in the remake of The Blob

Wouldn't it have been fair to include both sexes as the next generation of Ghostbusters, in order to show respect to what was presented before? As the Shakespearean bard would say, therein lies the rub. It's not about fairness to feminists, it's about presenting women as superior to men, especially in instances where men are presented in a positive light and there is no female around to share in the glory. Sigourney Weaver's character didn't count, she was the damsel in distress and Janine was the comedy relief. In the eyes of feminists, this is especially unacceptable.

The adage "if it ain't broke don't fix it" doesn't seem to apply in Hollywarped, especially when you factor in the feminist agenda affecting this and similar movies. I suppose the phrase "if it ain't got estrogen, be sure and inject some" might be more fitting.

I have no problem with seeing a woman (especially a beautiful one) in a testosterone-driven plot provided she is relevant to the story and does not exist mainly to push some leftist gender-specific agenda. How many of today's major movies that you can name didn't have a token feminist representation in the lead or in a supporting role? Exactly.

Given this, I'm almost surprised Bilbo and company from The Hobbit film series didn't have to deal with an empowered female hobbit on their wonderful quest. Oh wait, there's just one thing…Tauriel substituted for that. As any reader of the series is well aware, she was made up for just that purpose, to offset all that dangerous Middle Earth masculinity the film series was in danger of providing. Peter mangina Jackson created this character with the help of two female writers. Mission accomplished.

Don't call me Link, i don't know who that is.

This situation isn't like to get fixed anytime soon, so long as mainstream cinema continues to churn out cinematic estrogen like chum for the consumption of the masses. Drivel like Lucy is becoming par for the course, and Ghostbusters 3 looks to be proudly following in this new tradition.

A bit of nostalgia

Remember when real men used to be represented onscreen as real men? Who can forget Vito Corleone in The Godfather, especially that memorable scene where he smacks Johnny Fontane? Vito was obviously a red pill man who dealt with matters the red pill way. Nowadays it’s more common to see a male represented as an ignoramus or a weakling, or seeing women acting like men.

In today’s twisted society, Johnny Fontane has become the norm and Vito Corleone has become the exception. I doubt Ghostbusters 3 is going to be any less twisted in pushing its cinematic feminist agenda.

Oh what a brave new world, that has such wonderfully feminist, sexist people in it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Russian Folktales Can Teach You How To Be A Man

If you want to live in a country and understand its people, you need to have an understanding of the stories that they grew up with. Whether these are folk tales, fairy tales, or movies, they leave an impact on the psyche of the individual person. They serve as a reminder of the traditions, as well as the moral values that the majority of the population holds dear.

Russia, and the surrounding countries of eastern Europe like the Ukraine or Belarus have a rich history of different folk traditions, among which the telling of folk tales and heroic epics is preeminent. Many of these traditions are shared between the three countries, while others exist only in some particular regions. These stories have been recounted from one generation to another. Many a grandson spent his nights sitting on his grandfather’s knee, listening to these wonderful tales, sparking his imagination with messages of courage and valor.

Russian folklore is based on old pagan Slavic mythology, mixed with newer Christian beliefs and historical events. Together with stories about princes, giants, and Baba Yagas (witches), you catch glimpses of mythical cities, powerful enemies, and old wise men with magic powers. These stories not only reflect the beliefs and history of the various peoples who tell them, but also serve as a way to impart moral lessons to the succeeding generations.

Old Heroes Could Kick Ass

One of the most well-known characters of the old heroic tales is Ilya Muromets. Ilya was a big guy, who however suffered from various illnesses as a kid, which left him unable to walk. So until the age of 33, he spent most of his life sleeping on an oven. Then one day, he is miraculously cured by two old wise men. From that day forward, he turns into a powerful warrior and goes on to perform many outstanding deeds, including saving the city of Kiev from invaders.

His story takes place in the era of the Kievan Rus, but mixes in various different time periods. Some parts of the tale recount historical events that happened in the 9th century, while others deal with events that happened in the 12th century. So just like a medieval James Bond, Ilya Muromets always stays the same age through various eras, battling enemies and slaying dragons.

His story can also serve as an inspiration for young men growing up, since Ilya transformed himself from being an incapacitated cripple to a bogatyr, a fighter and the savior of a nation. His courage, strength and willpower were meant to be an example to help instill these qualities in the younger generation.

During Soviet times, many of these epic tales and folk stories were made into movies. In 1956, the story of Ilya Muromets was made into a feature movie, directed by Alexander Ptushko, and starring Boris Andreyev, Shukur Burkhanov, Andrey Abrikosov and Sergei Martinson.

Another interesting Soviet film is Kashchey the Deathless, produced in 1944, directed by Alexander Rowe (the script was co-written by him and Vladimir Schweitzer) and starring Sergei Stolyarov, Alexander Shirshov and Georgy Millyar (whose original last name was de Milieu, since he was of French origin, but he changed it after the Russian Revolution). It was a black and white film that came out at the time of the victory of the Soviet armies against Nazi Germany. It had a symbolic meaning: after much suffering and heroism the invaders are driven out and the country is left free once again.

Analyzing The Stories

These different epic tales serve as metaphors for various repeating themes in Russian history. Many of these stories have recurring patterns, which was recognized by Vladimir Propp, a Soviet folklorist and scholar. He published his Morphology of the Folktale in 1928, more than two decades before Joseph Campbell published his book The Hero with a Thousand Faces.

Vladimir Propp was born into a Russian-German family and grew up speaking both languages (Russian and German). Since childhood, he was interested in different folktales and epics that he heard and decided to study them closer. His main focus became Russian folktales in particular.

Propp divides up these stories into 31 narratemes. Not all stories will contain all of these elements, but almost all stories will contain at least some of them. Many of these divisions are similar to what Campbell came up with in his structure (remember that Propp's structure came two decades before Campbell's).

It would take too long to list all of the 31 narratemes here, but they can be summarized into 5 steps:

1. The initial situation and the identification of a lack of something.

2. Once this lack is identified, the hero has to go on a quest in order to eliminate the lack.

3. During the quest, the hero comes across a magical helper (and a method to solve the initial problem).

4. The hero has to pass several tests and overcome many challenges.

5. The hero succeeds in his quest and returns home victorious.

Notice how these elements are common to many different tales that are around us every day, whether in movies, or real life. You can do a little experiment for yourself in order to try to apply this structure in practice. Watch Star Wars and try to identify the different narratemes that these movies contain. Having an understanding of these different elements will give you a new perspective and a deeper insight into different stories that you might come across.

Live The Life Of A Hero

These narratemes are not only present in legend and fiction, but also in many of the great stories of our history. You can even use this same structure to help shape your own life.

1) Identify something that you want to achieve and set a goal for yourself.

2) Go on a quest to reach your goal.

3) You come across a mentor or a method to help you. In modern times this can be a person, a book, a website, or a gathering of inspirational people. These can not only serve as mentors, but can also provide you with various methods to solve many of your problems.

4) In order to reach your goal, you will have to pass several tests and go through many obstacles. It won't be easy. Every good thing in life requires hard work.

5) Finally, you will succeed and reach your goal. Victory will be sweet.

Watch, read, listen and learn, then go on to apply the lessons that you learned. Learning about Russian folk epics, will not only make you more interesting when talking to Russian girls, but can also help you become a better, stronger man. You too can live the life of a hero, you just need to identify your goals and start your quest.

11 Myths About French Girls

February 20, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

I will soon bid farewell to the fair shores of my beloved Normandy in order to live in Poland.

Many factors influenced my decision. Their excellent martial arts clubs. The fulfilling previous stays. The nurturing, gentle nature of Polish women that Roosh described in his works (a nature that I personally encountered many times).

I will focus on another major one: French women and their mindset.

I discovered the concept of game with my best friend, who is from the other side of the iron curtain (his motto: “Fuck her. If it’s not her, it will be another one. They are all sluts, they all have a price”). After years of institutional brainwashing, I finally saw the girls of France under their true colours. Their flaws, their systematic rejection just for the sake of it, their hordes of white knights.

I left for six years, encountered many cultures and my skills improved. So did my well-being as a man. I recently came back home and had the foolish hope that my hardened opinion of the local girls would have mellowed with age and distance. That they would be different this time.

By Odin’s ravens, was I wrong.

But what are the myths that were sold overseas, that would make you want to have sex specifically with a French girl?

1. They are sexy and sexual beings

France's most coveted vaginas

The number one fear of the French girl is to act in a way that will lead others to think that she is a slut, even if, in all fairness, they take significantly more cock in their three holes than what their mother recommended. It might be the only factor that (relatively) spared us a copious amount of slut-walks.

Among all the cultures encountered, they are on top of my list with the amount of mind games played in order to delay sex and save appearances. They became masters in the art of breaking balls and wasting male time so they can laugh about it in their social circle and label any interested heterosexual male a creep.

They repress their sexuality but behind closed doors, same rules apply. Isolate, inebriate, initiate as John Hopson wrote, and they will give in. You will have to put in a fair amount of work and remain focused. Weak game won't cut it.

2. They express themselves with style

Extract of your average social network feed. Victor Hugo starts a slow clap from the underworld.

We have our cohorts of basic chicks as well, fellas. The French chick often thinks that she is a princess, regardless of her ordinary physique, and throws the according tantrums. They bombard the social network with attention-seeking statements and images. They also have the picture with the reverse snapback cap with "OBEY" or "SWAG" on it, modern mark of the uneducated masses.

They are enthusiastic artisans in the decline of the standard French language. Gangster talk is extremely popular along with English catch phrases (big up, love you baby…). The vocabulary is limited to little more than a thousand different words.

They indeed used to express themselves with class and wit. Those days are long gone. Classy French girls are like unicorns. I saw some once on the telly. That's about it.

3. They are direct

They will feign ignorance when a man wants to meet them alone. You made your intentions clear. You want to lower her knickers and play doctor but she will pretend that you just want to have the honour of sharing her company. Go through the text message hell and she will often asks if she can bring a friend or she'll bring one without asking. French girls could win a gold medal if cockblocking was an Olympic sport.

Compliment them, you are a liar. Neg them, you are an arsehole. They don't respond well to direct approach and day game. Any stranger that could talk to them is a potential sex offender. They also think that they will be considered sluts if they answer positively to one. Go through with your ramble, they will sigh, raise their eyebrows and look at you like a pile of manure while getting ready to cry rape.

In a club, you will often face the immediate turn of head or complete body as soon as you open your mouth, even after she displayed indicators of interest. It could be daunting for beginners. Insistence is sometimes rewarded but with their mind games, mixed signals and in view of the hard work needed, next her.

4. They are educated and cultured

They lack education or are too educated. You will rarely find something in the middle. Independent thinkers? They celebrate stupidity like any other western girl. Nabilla (French Kim Kardashian) is now a household name. So are Youtube pseudo-celebrities Cyprien and Norman. Individuals with no achievements are celebrated as their audience sees itself in their platitudes.

They love to hop on the social justice train and the latest trends. Harlem Shake, ice bucket challenge, share if you would save your mom from a house on fire, Je Suis Charlie, Like if you want little Joël to get his heart transplant. No need to understand or to analyse, they just follow.

5. They know how to cook and how to drink

It used to be a standard for a young French girl to know how to cook an array of quality meals. Their mother would warn them that no man would want them otherwise. By the destruction of the traditional gender roles, our women stopped aiming at being kind hostesses, masters of the culinary arts, to recently become vastly incompetent cooks, hardly able to boil an egg.

They also forgot how to drink properly. They only display three patterns:

1. They don't drink at all. They show their moral superiority to us, mere mortals. They are usually unattractive but will insist on leaving early, pulling their more bangable friend by the arm. "If I am not having fun, why should the others?"

2. They moderately drink but only what magazines told them to drink. Mojitos, Cosmos, to do like in Sex and the City.

3. They drink too much and poor quality drinks. Cheap beer, mediocre wine, and low-priced spirits drowned in soda. They often vomit after intoxication and collect decisions that they regret the next morning.

6. They will be able to raise children

They lost their traditional values of being exemplary mothers. American female authors recently wrote (bear with me) about French women educating their children well AND focusing on their careers. As you guessed it, it's going through the window.

Add a decline of fertility among white French couples, risky drinking behaviour endangering the possibility to bear children, female career-driven obsession since the events of 1968 (French equivalent of Woodstock, flower power sprinkled with a hint of nation-wide riots) where "A child with whom I want when I want" was the motto and we have a winner.

Abortion was legalized in 1975, many long-term and morning after pills are free with our healthcare, and the state will refund the money spent for an abortion. More tokens for the cock carousel.

It's okay to try a lot of cocks but don't spank children. Degenerate French female psychiatrist Françoise Dolto said "Let the child be king and express itself". Ideal way to create armies of ungrateful, uneducated and future criminal little shits. My dad used to say "A smack on the arse won't make it fall off."

7. They wear stylish clothes

There is a new widespread and convenient fashion where young French women are dressed like transgender bin liners. If not part of it, they just dress like millions of others, no effort or originality is needed.

They are always wearing trousers or jeans. They all have the same scarf, the same beanie, the same leather or denim jacket and the same fucking Converses. The “classier” alternative are flats or ballerinas. Forget high heels, lads, “it would make me look like a slut and it hurts my feet.”

French glamour

8. They are agreeable and have a sense of humour

The French girls you will approach without being previously approved by their social circles are likely to give you the cold shoulder. They will rarely be smiling if you interact with them. In the public transport, in the shops, at the post office, the “resting bitch face” is the norm.

They will often justify it, saying that if they smile or seem approachable, people (read “unworthy men by their standards”) will bother them. Whatever you say to them, they give you the feeling that they are about to die of boredom.

I am a strong supporter of telling the truth. If you don’t like what is being said, cut short to the conversation. That’s life. Humans interact when a community exists. Our girls have the skills to work as lighthouse keepers.

9. They are all slim

Even if France has relatively good dietary habits, the globalization of the fast food industry did not spare us and we face an unprecedented epidemic of obesity.

They have a junkie behaviour towards everything that is sweet. Whipped cream, custard, macarons, cupcakes… A sugar hit to compensate an absence of fulfilling experiences. They don’t need a man, they have a pound of chocolate with hazelnuts and all the seasons of Grey’s Anatomy to sob alone in their beds.

Many persuade themselves and the others nowadays that it is not their fault if they are fat, that they are “big-boned,” or “curvy.” Selfies and compliment fishing on the internet comfort them in their opinion, their slimmer friends leading the way so they won’t be the grenade that a poor sod will have to jump on. It is not acceptable to tell one of their large friend that she should hit the treadmill more often in order to be healthier.

“Whatever, my big friend is beautiful. You are just a big meanie. I like to keep her around when I go out then I receive compliments and free drinks from the thirsty lads.”

10. They are feminine

Cinema will make you think that you will find the likes of Emmanuelle Béart and Mélissa Theuriau in the streets of your average French city. We had feminine girls but they are a dying breed. The average Russian girl would laugh if she discovered what French girls consider feminine nowadays.

About body hair. It is not that they don’t wax or tend to it. They just do it in a lazy manner. Ah, the sensation of improperly shaven legs, the impression that you pulled a sandpaper doll at the club. It is especially poorly done around the armpits and the bikini area. You see the hairs growing back on the side, the cuts, the works.

But they can’t shave their pussy entirely. What would the public opinion be? The girls who shave it all usually shame it as well, or the crowd would once more brand them with the seal of infamy, the slut label. The French bush still lives in the minds of foreign lads for a reason. That and the one where the French don’t shower.

11. They appreciate a manly man

They only want you to spend money on them with nothing in return (if you're not the alpha that fucked her on the same night you met her). They cry day and night that they want total equality of the sexes. But try to split the bill and it will soon go south. They usually want to crush the male under their foot. In a relationship, she wants baby language, a beta that showers her with gifts, while she organises the life and whereabouts of the couple.

With a rising number of divorces, hippie values, and mottos like "I am a strong independent woman who does not need a man," daddy issues are common in France. It is all fun and games until the little angel brought into this world by these values replicates them. But the father figure that embodies authority is gone.

They are also largely supportive of effeminate men and androgynous models. Bodybuilding, martial arts, and hunting are still frowned upon as they are likely to be the mark of violent man, a woman beater and a sadist who enjoys torturing animals.

Conclusion

Many, like me, had enough. So we took our dicks and our knives, seeking adventure and greener pastures.

A lot of you will tell me "But Jean-Bat, I fucked a French girl, it went fine." I can almost guarantee that if you did, you are not a beginner in the game or it did not take place in France. Our girls travel overseas alone or with girlfriends for the same reason as yours.

Some lads consider travelling to France with the capture of their French flag in mind. There are countless reasons to discover my country but this one is not worth the investment.

My foreign brothers, if you still want to fuck a French girl after all that, I salute your thirst for a challenge and your testicular fortitude. By all means, go for it. But if you have the choice and a strong lack of patience like myself, look towards the Nordic "heavens," official residence of unredeemable sword swallowers or head for Eastern Europe to have your mind (and your knob) blown.

To my French countrymen, go check what happens overseas. See what they offer on the other side of the fence if you have not done it yet. And never forget why you left in the first place.

Women Get A Pussy Pass Even For Killing Children

February 20, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Here are two names, both child killers, which I would like you to know: Allyson McConnell and Arthur Freeman. Scrutiny of both cases exemplifies the tragic gender disparity in criminal responsibility, or lack thereof, for parents who kill their children.

Arthur Freeman is currently serving a life term for murdering his daughter Darcey. The earliest he can seek parole is in another two and a half decades. The nature of Darcey's death, being thrown off Melbourne's West Gate Bridge on what should have been her first day of school, was without a doubt heinous.

What drove me to write this piece was the continued prominence of the Darcey Freeman death in media circles even at the beginning of this year. Without begrudging such attention for a clear and barbaric crime, if the genders were reversed, a thimble's worth of focus would still be on the case.

The legal system sees Arthur Freeman as evil. Allyson McConnell was just “ill.”

Now here’s the other half. Allyson McConnell, who killed her two-and-a-half-year old and ten-month-old sons after searching online for drowning and strangulation methods, is now dead. She committed suicide in Gosford, a city just north of Sydney, in September 2013. Histrionic acts were an indelible part of her personality; she had attempted suicide in 2010, the same day she had drowned her boys in the family bathtub. This melodramatic (but reprehensible) streak is highlighted by the child killings taking place after McConnell’s husband Curtis sought a divorce.

Gender-Based Lunacy

Far from the effective life imprisonment of Freeman, McConnell served just ten months in a psychiatric hospital in Alberta, Canada, where she previously lived with her family of four. She was convicted of the mere crime of manslaughter, serious enough in and of itself, but a comedy when one considers the contextual, opportunistic circumstances of a marital court case and the clear research McConnell undertook in the weeks leading up to what I will sensibly call the murders.

She’s fine and dandy until her man leaves her.

Central to the farce that absolved McConnell of almost all responsibility was the fact she had once been impregnated by her father (or at least a proposition accepted by the court as factual). She had exhibited a history of suicidal behavior in her teens, behavior which was obviously assumed, without substantiation, as a form of causation for her sons' deaths nearly two decades later.

It is the infanticide equivalent of assuming Roman Polanski allegedly raped (and is therefore excused for raping) a thirteen-year-old girl, statutorily and through the provision of drugs, because his family died in the Holocaust. Untenable, unworkable and just plain preposterous.

Importantly, McConnell had managed to uproot herself from her native Australia at a young age, find gainful, respectable employment in Canada's ski resort industry (where she had met her Canadian husband), marry, and give birth to two children. When combined with the judge's ruling that there was "reasonable doubt that she had the specific intent to kill her children" (i.e. murder could not be established), I start to ponder whether we are considering a serious 21st century legal decision or a courtroom science fiction novel written by L. Ron Hubbard.

Disastrous Double Standards

Going back to our first story, Freeman had experienced both the long-term deterioration of his marriage and a reduction in his access to his children the day before he killed Darcey. McConnell, on the other hand, was left by her husband and the two were in the process of fighting out a custody battle, despite still living in the same home. She was not even close to losing access to her children in the same way as Freeman had lost time with his. All that had happened so far was that a judge, very reasonably, forbid McConnell from leaving the country with the boys.

Moreover, McConnell was searching online for terms like "How long does it take to drown?" three weeks before she murdered her children. She also left her wedding ring close by the bodies of the drowned toddler and infant, an incontrovertible "fuck you, I won" message to her husband for leaving her.

Across the world and a year earlier, Arthur Freeman had called his ex-partner just before killing Darcey, saying she would never see her children again. Without condoning Freeman's awful homicide, for which he is deservedly serving serious time, if either of these two examples was a crime of passion or rage (and I actually think both aren't), it is the murder of Darcey Freeman.

Curtis McConnell already had two tragedies when his sons were killed. A third came when his ex-wife got away with murder.

An average man, who sees considerably less of his kids after divorce than his ex-wife, has infinitely more to fear from custody cases than a woman does. We should not, however, justify any man killing his child after visitation or custody rights were restricted. But we should also realize that a woman who murders her offspring without even losing access to her children is part of an even greater breed of evil.

Another Attempted Murder-Suicide

If the comparisons between Freeman and McConnell were not enough, here's another one. Robert Farquharson was convicted twice for three murders, having driven his four-wheel drive into a dam and killing his young sons on Australian Father's Day 2005. He first received, unsurprisingly, three life sentences without parole for the deaths (reduced to a 33 year minimum term after a retrial).

What is illuminating about Farquharson is that he suffered extensive bouts of depression, enlisting the assistance of both a psychologist and psychiatrist to deal with his marital separation. He had been prescribed multiple antidepressants over a long period.

The lack of a causal link or mitigation between Allyson McConnell's alleged mental illness and her murders may also be replicated in the Farquharson case. Yet Robert Farquharson had a much more cogent argument for mental illness as it related to the deaths of his sons, having experienced episodes of mental illness far more copiously documented by medical professionals and of a more contemporary nature.

More broadly, if mental illness is blindly accepted as a defense so unconvincingly in the McConnell case, why isn't it being accepted far more generously for others convicted of homicide, who are by and large male?

Even in the 1990s, the US Department of Justice and its offshoots were keenly aware that experiences of childhood abuse amongst prisoners were the norm. In 1998, the National Institute of Justice relayed that in one (male) New York prison "68 percent of the sample reported some form of childhood victimization and 23 percent reported experiencing multiple forms of abuse and neglect, including physical and sexual abuse." I could sink the point further by supplying another fifty studies and reports, but that is completely unnecessary, as I'm sure you understand it.

After Allyson McConnell killed herself, skilled scumbag Thomas Lukaszuk, at that time Deputy Premier of Alberta, remarked: "Mental illness makes victims of all. Sad end to what already was a tragedy."

No, Thomas, the real tragedy, aside from the death of two boys and the pain of their grieving father and wider family, was that Allyson McConnell escaped justice simply because she is a female.

An Idiot’s Guide To New Western Sexual Orientations

February 20, 2015 | by Arson Greyer | Link | Original Link

Up until a couple of years ago, my basic understanding of human sexuality was roughly as follows: there are men, and there are women. A person’s sexual orientation could be defined as one of heterosexual (being sexually attracted to the opposite gender), homosexual (being sexually attracted to others of the same gender) or bisexual (being sexually attracted to both genders).

Recently, however, I’ve been coming across a plethora of new terms in mainstream cultural commentary that purportedly seek to describe other sexual orientations. I quickly found myself coming across such terms as “pan,” “demi,” and even “homoflexible,” wondering what the hell they all mean.

Even the dating app OKCupid has recently broadened the options on gender and sexuality its users can display in their profiles. What was LGBT has now expanded even further, with seemingly new sexual orientations materializing out of thin air on the regular. I’ve written the following “Idiot’s Guide” to help my fellow men avoid the same confusion I’ve suffered in making sense of this new alphabet soup of sexual orientations.

But first, a disclaimer:

You’ll notice that I’ve titled the article as a guide to new “western” sexual orientations. That’s because one would be incredibly hard pressed to find terms like “asexual” or “sapiosexual” being used in any non-western context. In fact, I can’t recall ever even seeing one instance of a woman on a Russian, Ukrainian, Asian or Latin American dating site ever mentioning she identified with one of these new-age, alternate sexual orientations.

Interestingly, the usage of these new sexual orientation terms seems to be primarily restricted to the discourse of two basic areas of the internet:

1. Articles by SJWs and feminists on known manosphere-hating sites (e.g. Jezebel).

I know I wouldn't.

2. The social media and dating profiles of young middle and upper-middle class white women.

feminist, panromantic, demisexual, agender and apparent fast-food lover

The definitions and examples I'll provide below are more relevant to understanding these terms as used in area "b," but nonetheless will provide clarity in other contexts also. Okay, let's begin:

1. Pansexual

Definition: sexual attraction to all sexes and gender identities.

Famous Alleged Pansexuals: Madonna, Lady Gaga.

More Accurate Description: Bisexual. Proponents of pansexuality claim that it differs from bisexuality in that it is gender blind, so allegedly pansexuals wouldn't know a cock from a vagina if it slapped them in the face. The queer "movement," however, claims both pansexuality and bisexuality can mean attraction to not just the male and female gender, but any gender (whatever those others are). So, they're essentially the same.

2. Sapiosexual

Definition: hetero, homo, or bisexual attraction based on intelligence.

More Accurate Description: Heterosexual women who, after a few jarring alpha pump-and-dumps, temporarily delude themselves into believing that they will get more tingles from nerdy Betas.

3. Homoflexible and Heteroflexible

Definition: bisexual, but majority of sexual activity with one gender, minority with another.

More Accurate Description: Bisexual without an exactly even 50/50 split of cock and pussy.

4. Demisexual

Definition: sexual attraction to another person contingent upon deep emotional and romantic connection.

More Accurate Description: Women who are approaching the end of easy riding on the cock carousel and desperately want to lock down a good man before the wall or have the "baby rabies."

With these in mind, a demisexual woman has resolved to restrict future access to her worn-out pussy to only those who want a deep, romantic connection (read: beta-provider LTR) with her. This is, of course, until she meets the next alpha who suits her fancy and is good for a quick one-nighter.

5. Asexual

Definition: is not sexually attracted to anyone; doesn't have sexual feelings.

More Accurate Description: A woman who has allegedly never experienced sexual feelings yet signed up for a dating site and posted several extremely slutty, suggestive photos under the guise of "trying this out" or "just to make new friends".

All indications indicate this woman has had multiple previous sexual encounters (including gangbangs), but is using the "asexual" label to discourage messages from thirsty betas who will pass over her profile because "she's asexual".

Jenni is in a relationship with Tim, who is not asexual

Twenty-one-year-old Jenni Goodchild does not experience sexual attraction, but in an increasingly sexualised society what is it like to be asexual?

"For me it basically just means that I don't look at people and think 'hmm yeah I'd have sex with you,' that just doesn't happen," says Jenni.

Anonymous 01/27/12(Fri)15:03 No.126886970

Good lord.
That guy got friend-zoned so hard he made it into the news.

Conclusion

What's common among each of these supposed new sexual orientations is that we already have a term that has long-described almost exactly the same kind of sexual attraction. This raises an important question: why are people classifying their sexual orientation under new, buzzword banners when there's already a well-understood term that describes it precisely?

The answer lies in the attention-whoring tendencies of the two groups – a and b – that use these terms the most. To be merely bisexual isn't counter-mainstream enough anymore and calling oneself that doesn't get the same kind of attention it once did, when few people identified as this. Therefore, to feed the egos of members of these two groups, new terms for already-existing sexual orientations had to be conjured up to maintain a fresh supply of new attention and coverage.

They're new labels for the same sort of old sexual behaviour. The next time you see an American woman who is calling herself sapiosexual, heteroflexible, or whatever new term is invented next month to describe long-standing sexual behavior, the most prudent option is to ignore it completely, as a shit test, and game on as you usually would.

These new sexual orientations are, for the most part, nothing more than a cry for attention. They win if we if give it to them.

4 Reasons Why We Should Praise The Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders

February 20, 2015 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

First of all, this article is not condoning male thirst, nor is it meant to put the Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders on a pedestal. Frankly, I don't even like American "Football" or the NFL in general. My inner libertarian despises the blue pill military worshiping culture surrounding it, and there are plenty of constructive things I could be doing with my time beyond watching multi-millionaire human rhinoceros barge into each other for more than three hours on a precious weekend.

More than anything else, this article is giving praise to the organization of the Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders.

The powers behind the iconic cheerleading squad, which represents "America's team", have continued to maintain their integrity and devotion to promoting a high standard of traditional femininity and beauty since 1960; a standard which has arguably been the highest, and most critically acclaimed, of all cheerleading organizations in the world.

In equal admiration, they have done this while successfully staving off the constant onslaught of 2nd wave feminism, 3rd wave feminism, and moral degeneracy that has been going on in the world around them since the 1970's. A state of degeneracy which has otherwise been put into overdrive in the second decade of the 21st century.

This article will identify four key areas as to why the DCC (Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders) deserves an obligatory cocktail salute and a silent nod of respect. Let's get started.

1. No Fat Chicks

“Fat Acceptance” is not in the vocabulary of professional cheerleading, and the DCC organization is certainly no exception. Having a very aesthetically appealing body weight is a vital component of any woman hoping to make the cut as one of these cheerleaders. Furthermore, maintaining that weight is equally important for staying on the squad during their tenure.

For the pen-pushers behind the scenes, the Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders are, first and foremost, a business. Therefore, it is absolutely imperative that the cheerleaders hang very close to the sweet spot on the body mass index (BMI) in order for them to have a successful business model.

Financially lucrative appearance fees would nosedive, and sales of DCC calendars and other photo spreads would tumble, if they suddenly developed a reputation for letting a few chubby chicks slip through the ranks.

Furthermore, thirsty beta males pay good money at a Dallas game to watch slender and fit females gyrating on the sidelines as an amusing sideshow. If they wanted to cast their eyes on land whales, they can just head on over to the local Walmart. Or better yet, it’s Texas after all. Land whales are everywhere.

2. High Standards Of Grooming And Appearance

The Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders organization does not have the time, the tolerance, or even the desire to accommodate the vast array of degenerate 21st century “fashion” trends into their ranks.

We’re talking NO visible tattoos, NO (visible) piercings, and NO unnatural hair colors.

While there is no specific requirement against short hair, few wind up making it onto the squad in any given year. A woman who is damaged enough to want to cut her hair short probably wouldn’t pass the tattoo requirement anyway.

Sorry, but any and every tattooed, pierced, and purple-haired yoga instructor can fuck off back to the state capital where they belong. Austin likes to “keep it weird” after all. The DCC demands classy women, and classy women is what they get. Observe.

Gym-fit bodies, tattoo-free skin, and long beautiful locks of natural hair dominate the landscape

3. They Demand (Some) Worthy Talents

Young women in the United States are growing up with absolutely no personal talents or skills. That is, unless you count speed-texting on a smartphone while being a “good driver” in their daddy’s sports utility vehicle as a distinct female talent.

Once upon a time, a mark of stature for a woman was to be at least one of:

1. An exceptional cook or home chef
2. A talented player of a classical instrument
3. Well-versed in French or Latin
4. An experienced ballroom dancer

Or at least something that took some extensive practice and repetition in order to achieve competency. Young women in the United States (and to be fair a lot of young men too) cannot do any of these things anymore. The “smartphone undertow” is clearly taking it’s toll on the younger millennials, as the following video demonstrates.

“Miss New York” Kira Kazantsev, a 23-year-old Manhattan native (as of September 2014), decided that a stupid frat party game involving the flipping of a plastic red cup was a solid first-rate choice for the “Miss America” talent competition last year. And guess what….. she still won!

> “The reason why I chose to do that talent is I wanted every single little girl in America to be able to see that you can do that talent — you can do whatever talent you want on national television — even with a red cup — and still be Miss > America and have the time of your life" – Kira Kazantsev

If that's how Ms. Kazantsev feels, sometimes I wonder if we are well and truly done for as a nation…

Thankfully, the DCC demands some visually appealing talents that, when put on public display, don't add up to being a national embarrassment.

Most professional cheerleaders have many years of experience in various dance styles, and their training probably did not include "twerking." Jazz dance and improvisational skills are particularly desirable, and the results certainly trump cup-spinning any day.

4. They Are Not Social Justice Pawns

Last, but certainly not least, the DCC are not used as figureheads to promote bogus social justice warrior campaigns which have a distinct anti-male slant to them. There is no raising "awareness" of "rape culture", encouraging women to "lean in" more because they are being "oppressed" by male colleagues, or whining about women earning only "77 cents on the dollar" for the same labor exerted by a man.

In fact, professional cheerleaders are paid garbage wages but they still sign up for the gig in droves. There is really a lot to say about that, especially when they are only competing for placement against other women.

On occasion, they do get involved in "awareness" campaigns for breast cancer and other problems of female biology, but at least those are legitimate issues (unlike "rape culture"). Still, their primary objective is to provide entertainment for the fans and the troops, and they mostly stay true to that.

Conclusion

Professional cheerleading is admittedly pretty stupid. Let's be honest with ourselves. It adds nothing of true value to a sporting match, and it's primarily a platform to sell bikini calendars and to provide mildly amusing girly entertainment at conventions and USO shows.

The fact that it's primarily (but not exclusively) an American institution, along with the stereotype that cheerleaders are the picture-book definition of a female American "airhead", naturally makes it a target for international parody.

However, the DCC are arguably the very best at what they do. Hence their tagline "The Often Imitated, Never Equalled, Internationally Acclaimed."

It's true that there are imitations galore, perhaps most notably by their (much sluttier) counterparts in South America. The Boca Juniors Cheerleaders in Buenos Aires.

However, we are here to (mostly) celebrate class, and not exclusively the ass. The Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders have it, while the same sentiment cannot exactly be shared with some of their Latin counterparts.

Would we still feel the itch to migrate to South America or Eastern Europe if the feminine qualities of the DCC were promoted as an ideal for women in the United States? Rather than giving a platform to chubby, short-haired, tattoo-covered, little sister-banging feminists like Lena Dunham and company? Probably not (quite as badly).

The DCC organization, and their expected standards, are a breath of fresh air in our rapidly declining and degenerate society. So for the ladies who want to take part and embrace their femininity, don't try to compete with men, don't get stupid piercings and tattoos, maintain a trim figure, keep their hair long, and have some extracurricular activities which don't involve their smartphone, we give a modest salute to you. Bravo.

3 Reasons You Should Lift Weights

Growing up, every boy wants to be so strong as to move mountains with one hand. This is a completely natural tendency, but going through the educational system of SJW brainwashing, their natural instinct to move, compete, and conquer the environment is smothered. In school, boys learn to shut up, sit down, and generally be as weak as possible, so as to not cause discomfort to females, which are usually in the majority of authority positions in the education system. Of course, females would prefer physically weak boys, since they tend to also be mentally weak and thus much easier to control.

This is compounded by the fact that the typical urban work environment today doesn't require a lot of physical strength. A typical guy today goes to work, sits for eight hours at the computer, comes back home, again sits six hours at the computer, goes to bed, and tomorrow repeats it all over again. If coupled with bad eating habits, this type of life creates a slob with disgusting manboobs and flaps of lard hanging on his sides.

Some boys will make it just fine, but others will learn to loathe themselves and despise physical strength. Since masculinity and displays of raw physical power are considered toxic and banished from the mainstream, positive masculinity role models were constrained to cartoons and obscure entertainment.

The only ones left today are superheroes, which always get their powers through some extraordinary event, rather than raw strength (except Hulk and Batman, which is why they're so awesome). Thus, boys have nobody to remind them of the importance of strong biceps. You are expected to be a puny castrated emo dude, one way or another.

Deep, dark, edgy and pathetically weak

If you recognized yourself in any of the above, then you've landed on just the right article for you. The bad news is that you've wasted many opportunities to improve your life and it will take you a lot of time and effort to overcome the inertia and move from the standstill. The effects will be minute and you will often be frustrated at how slowly you seem to progress.

The good news is that it's never too late to begin with lifting weights, no matter how old you are or in what condition your body is. In the end, however, you will be happy because having a strong body will:

1. Make people start respecting you

Despite the technological improvements, we still can't avoid personal contact in our daily lives. In communicating with others, your body language tells everything about you to those who are observant enough. Slouched posture, lowered head and looking at the ground or somewhere into the distance, feeble handshake… All of your other qualities are meaningless if you have the muscle strength of an algae mass.

Don’t let yourself become like this

On the other hand, standing straight, looking people right in the eye as you talk to them and having a firm handshake exudes confidence and generates trust, even with total strangers. A strong body means you will have a commanding presence and won’t have to raise your voice or exert yourself in any other way than gesture to have people obey you. Women feel instinctively attracted to chiseled bodies, so you won’t have to qualify yourself to prove your worth. Simply take off your shirt.

2. Help you avoid injuries and recover from them

It’s never comfortable to think ahead and plan for medical emergencies. In fact, if you’re a middle-aged man, you probably have no kind of medical insurance whatsoever. You simply feel indestructible and whatever happens, you simply grit your teeth and carry on. In the worst case scenario, such as your leg falling off, you pop an aspirin. This attitude is actually so widespread among young men that Obamacare was arguably created specifically so that exact demographic is forced to get any type of health insurance.

One simple fact about muscles is that, if they aren't used, they atrophy. This simply means that they wither and become almost useless. You can pretty much go through adulthood without thinking twice about muscle atrophy, but once you enter middle age, things become exponentially more dangerous.

That slip and fall that was a laughing matter when you were 20 becomes a potentially fatal injury when you're 60. This means that building your muscles becomes an obligation towards your older self. Lifting weights isn't just a niche pastime, it is a health practice of the utmost importance.

3. Lose weight and keep it down

In the 50s, you had to go to a freak show to see a comically obese man or woman, but today they are all around you in the US. Not only is having a weight problem a major inconvenience for the fatty, but others around them have to suffer the consequences as well. The half-ton beast has trouble moving, walking, let alone doing anything else, so everyone else is labeled "ableist" and has to accommodate for it. Being in such a helpless position makes hambeasts extremely irritable, lazy, and lacking any social skills.

Not so long ago, this was an exception

On the other hand, a large muscle mass in your body makes you burn calories, no matter what you do. Instead of counting calories or limiting your meals in arbitrary ways, you will actually be able to spend all calories that you ingest and drop weight by lifting weights. That's actually poetic, isn't it? The end result is an awesome body that moves and exerts force effortlessly. Strong leg muscles, such as from squats, will make you feel like you have iron springs instead of quads.

Whatever excuse you have to not start lifting weights right now is bullshit. You can buy dumbbells from Amazon, but even if you can’t afford it, take a few plastic bottles, fill them with water, wrap them in a blanket, grab all four corners of the blanket and start lifting the bundle. Despite being completely ghetto, this method actually works.

Once you start gaining muscle mass, you will be delighted to start your daily lifting routine. That’s it for instructions, go out there and build yourself into an awesome man.

The Advantages Of Dating In A Foreign Language

She turned up a half hour late, although she only lived a few minutes away. I banked on it, so I wasn't waiting long. I used the time to grab the number of a passing 8. It always helps to be as ambivalent as possible on a date; nothing speaks louder than actions. If all you can think about is the hot brunette that gave you the eye, the girl you are with is going to sense it in your cheeky confidence.

Her delay had been spent on hair and make-up, which was appreciated because she looked sexy and fresh. Her ample cleavage nested beneath a black lacy top, that suggested horny while remaining modest enough. We shared a bottle of wine. She spoke German and Turkish and a little Italian. Zero English, which is unusual. These days foreign chicks generally have a smattering of English they've picked up from the internet (and the latest Rihanna single). I had French, Spanish, English, and enough German and Italian to order a beer and tell someone to fuck off. We fumbled along morphing in and out of all these different tongues.

Initially it seemed stressful wrestling with the communication problems. Having made the effort to learn several languages it's been a while since I'd been in this predicament. A voice in the back of your head goes on overdrive. Half the time she's nodding and smiling even though you know she hasn't got a fucking clue – because you are doing the same when she speaks.

The mental anguish continues, under a smoke screen of smiles and nods

> How can I get to know this person, if I can't speak to them properly?
> This is so stupid, why did I even bother?
> I'm never going to be able to seduce her, since I can't talk to her properly.
> I must be coming across like a total retard.
> Perhaps we could just call off the date right now, what excuse can I use?
> Urgent business call – my server crashed! – I'm coming down with a migraine.
> Could I feign going to the bathroom and do a runner out of the fire exit?

The inner beta gets desperate, but of course excuses are too hard to translate. I refuse to be so omega to run away so I am in it to the finish. You try to share some amusing life story that's worked on so many dates before, but the language barrier not only makes a two minute chat into a ten minute verbal enema, but at the end of all your hard work it's pretty clear she's only managed to catch the basic gist and your punch line is lost.

Fuck this is hard work – or is it?

These days you can cheat with Google translate, but I advise against that. It brings smart phones to the table and has you staring into a screen looking like a lame beta. Relying on technology and getting stressed about being “right” is not as effective as maintaining frame. It gradually dawned on me over the course of the evening that I was doing way better than I realized and even had an advantage.

My first ever girlfriend was a virginal blonde 15-year-old, who only spoke German. She walked up to me in my local bar and simply sat down on my knee. I had my tongue down her throat before I even knew her name. I’d just finished failing my German exams, my German is terrible. She was in the UK to learn English, which to date went about as far as “hello, I love you.”

We spent most of our time kissing and smoking pot. It was about hanging out together, talking was less important. There used to be a cliche that foreign girls were more slutty, but IMHO it’s the language barrier that enables you to jump straight to sex. When conversation went dry, we’d just kiss.

Although the legal age in the UK is 16 and it was a long time ago, I didn’t want to push it and pop her cherry. I’d already understood that women can be unpredictable and I only had to wait a few weeks until her birthday. The last thing I needed at 17 was a 15-year-old foreign student sobbing to her legal guardian about this nasty druggy that plied her with booze and pot.

I learned that chilling and riding the language barrier can be a great thing. She’s at more of a disadvantage than you are. Once you get a woman talking, they never stop and you have to listen to all this drivel. If you roll with the communication breakdown, suddenly it’s all about frame, emotion, body language, confidence, charm and guess what – physicality. The PUAs call it “kino.” You are the cool, silent one.

Weakness is an advantage

Foreign girls seem more open to touching than Anglo girls too. Warming her up comes easily when she’s not blabbing on about her BFF’s pet chinchilla. You have much less chance to go and put your foot in your mouth, rambling on some geeky shit or your dreary life’s ambitions. This is a particular advantage in my case, since if I talk for too long, about one third of the female population pigeonholes me as criminally insane.

So with my past experiences of dating in foreign languages, that literally go back to my first ever date, I managed to remain chilled and do a pretty decent job, despite being out of practice. None the less we were both getting restless and tired, the wine was finished and so we grabbed the bill and left. I offered to walk her to her car, not least since mine was in the same parking station.

I leaned into kiss her goodbye and the cleavage in the lace top beckoned. I had nothing to lose. Those tits were too inviting, I’m never going to see her again. After kissing her on the cheek I made an old move of mine and simply planted a kiss straight on her lips, while pulling her into me with a hand around her waist. Worst case you get a slap. She reciprocated and it was one of the best kisses anyone has given me.

The language barrier had built up a hidden sexual tension and now it was all coming to the surface. What we lacked in linguistic skills we made up for in body chemistry. Sometimes you don’t fit quite right. It’s uncomfortable like a new pair of shoes, or worse like wearing someone else’s. But this chick was soft, fresh Italian leather.

After five minutes making out in the street, including her giggling as we knocked into a passerby, I pushed her to take me back to her place, but we’d both calmed down a little and I figured we’d just made such a good connection, the classy thing to do was wait. She was on the phone before I got home, inviting me for dinner at her place next week. Game over!

This is an example of how it can go in the most difficult language situations. The only rule you need to worry about :

If she’s still sitting there – you can still get her panties off!

Could it be that simple?

- She’s just as, if not more outside her comfort zone than you are.
- Much of her shit testing and bitch shields are disabled.
- If she’s still there – then she’s attracted on a physical level.
- She’s not passing time with you to learn English – She wants to get laid too.
- Ultra basic conversation can be remarkably effective at breaking the ice.
- The smoke of poor communication makes excellent cover, protecting you against all kinds of conversational mistakes.
- You don’t have to feign interest in her boring life stories.
- You lead by default by doing whatever you please.
- She will follow even if she hasn’t got a clue what’s going on.
- Learning words in her language shows good confidence.
- Quickly ask her to teach you: yes, no, 1-10, please, thank you, and start using them – then ask for a few flirty or dirty phrases.
- The best way to learn a language is by getting in bed with a native speaker – think of her as your tutor in the making.
- Laugh a lot, touch her often – and more and more.
- If there is any attraction at all, you can leverage it straight to kissing.
- She’s already outside her comfort zone and relaxing at the same time.
- Go in for the kiss – Everyone speaks the language of love.

Simply replace talking with touching and kissing

They say that men and women meeting for the first time decide subconsciously in about three seconds if they will have sex or not. Talking simply hampers that process. I would go as far as saying that it’s easier, quicker and less tedious dating a girl that doesn’t speak your language.

You can literally just hang out with her, project good vibes and then ask her if she’s DTF with a nice smacker on the lips. Don’t beat yourself up. Don’t worry about long silences. Don’t attempt complicated stories. RELAX! Her best way to escape pigeon speak and communicate her interest is physically.

If you want to carry it into a relationship, now you have free language lessons taught in the bedroom and a girlfriend that can’t make idle conversation – Perfect!. Perhaps I will finally master German after all—then again, perhaps it’s better not to.

The Attitude Of Gratitude

> Gratitude is not only the greatest of virtues, but the parent of all the others. – Marcus Tullius Cicero

The importance of gratitude in the character of the masterful man is undeniable. The master feels gratitude for himself, for his own noble identity as a man, even for the various vicissitudes that life throws at him to chisel him into evolving into a higher individual, and so on.

But the concept of gratitude has however become a very complicated subject, especially in today's increasingly amoral times, where it has sometimes even been used by some to psychologically enslave others.

Furthermore, more often than not today, we either see a complete lack of gratitude in modern societies—or instead sometimes an excess of it (bordering sometimes on sycophancy) among supplicating betas. This is especially because of the blue piller's inability to correctly perceive that the favors done to him by others may actually be ruses for the blue piller's eventual obligated servitude out of gratitude later.

What is further to be noted at the same time is the increasing impetus of modern societies on practicing gratitude today, as we are often bombarded with messages in today's modern societies that we must increasingly show it.

But are these messages always in good faith, or just another covert form of beta indoctrination? However to correctly practice gratitude, it then becomes extremely important to understand what gratitude in the context of today's world is to begin with , but most importantly than all, when and towards whom to practice it.

The benefits of gratitude

> Gratitude (noun): the quality of being thankful; readiness to show appreciation > for and to return kindness.

We as human beings have natural instincts to show love, compassion, care and kindness to others. And it is perfectly natural to feel gratitude for the ones who show and give us the same. In fact, gratitude is intrinsically tied to loyalty, another of the hallmarks of a truly evolved man.

> Cultivate the habit of being grateful for every good thing that comes to you, and to give thanks continuously. And because all things have contributed to your advancement, you should include all things in your gratitude. – Ralph Waldo Emerson

While we should be grateful for what we have, we should also make the best of what we have.

> We should certainly count our blessings, but we should also make our blessings count.— Neal A. Maxwell

Indeed, there could be several reasons why one could and should adopt an attitude of gratitude. Gratitude and loyalty help to build character, trust, camaraderie and bridges among people, and eventually build tribes which later could transform into new civilizations.

Ideally, there is nothing wrong in showing gratitude, for gratitude itself is a noble virtue. But at the same time we must also know whom and when to show gratitude, for most people often today become the victims of misdirecting their gratitude due to their lack of red pill knowledge and social intelligence.

The abuse of gratitude in today's increasingly amoral world

In spite of all the benefits that gratitude provides for the higher evolution of the human spirit and character, unfortunately in today's modern degenerate societies it is not immune for abuse or corruption, just like other virtues.

Since gratitude (or the lack of it) is a part of one's morality, it's often abused by others to enslave mankind into soul-crushing servitude and misery. Robert Greene in The 48 Laws Of Power effectively describes how a favor can be used to ensnare a person into unknowing servitude and submission:

> DESPISE THE FREE LUNCH: JUDGMENT
> What is offered for free is dangerous-it usually involves either a trick or a hidden obligation. What has worth is worth paying for. By paying your own way you stay clear of gratitude, guilt, and deceit. It is also often wise to pay the full pee-there is no cutting corners with excellence. Be lavish with your money and keep it circulating, for generosity is a sign and a magnet for power.- Law No.40

It's common for a lot of people to become victims of their own misdirected gratitude to beliefs, people, as well as relationships which didn't offer them anything but misery in the long run. The fault of these people: their misguided belief that all these factors were actually doing a favor onto them, when in reality these people were simply victims of the "selective honesty and generosity" from these factors.

> USE SELECTIVE HONESTY AND GENEROSITY TO DISARM YOUR VICTIM
> One sincere and honest move will cover over dozens of dishonest ones. Open-hearted gestures of honesty and generosity bring down the guard of even the most suspicious people. Once your selective honesty opens a hole in their armor, you can deceive and manipulate them at will. A timely gift-a Trojan horse will serve the same purpose.– Law 12, The 48 Laws Of Power

One of the commonly seen ways to influence a man's behavior towards your interests is to guilt-trip him or by creating a illusionary belief of obligatory gratitude in him towards you, out of a 'favor' (whether real or imaginary) done by you onto him.

> MAKE OTHER PEOPLE COME TO YOU-USE BAIT IF NECESSARY
> When you force the other person to act, you are the one in control. It is always better to make your opponent come to you, abandoning his own plans in the process. Lure him with fabulous gains-then attack. You hold the cards. – Law 8, The 48 Laws Of Power

And as seen in real life, a lot of blue pill men continue to fall for this bait, partly out of their inability to correctly perceive the real world and the real motives of those around them, and partly of the social indoctrination they are bred upon to become blind members of the herd mentality.

This sense of destructive gratitude is what continues to enslave, bind and destroy modern men who are unfree and trapped in unhealthy relationships, friendships, marriages, jobs, belief patterns and societies. Thus, it's unfortunate to note that in today's amoral world more than ever before, sometimes even a person's morality and virtue often becomes a tool of slavery for those who would use it against him to enslave him.

It's then common for such a man to be confronted with these questions at some point of his life in today's modern societies:

- Do I have to be grateful for a woman who disrespects me and disregards my contributions for her and existence?
- Do I have to be grateful to a social system which tells me that it is working for my profit, but instead uses me as fuel to power its own ideologies which demeans my masculinity and threatens my own identity?
- Do I have to be grateful for a job which crushes my soul, and stunts my growth as an individual?
- It's in my core essence as a man to show gratitude and other virtues, but are there any sincere people left who really deserve it and won't use it to exploit me?

More often than not, the realization which occurs to him some point later is similar to the quote below:

> Everything a lie. Everything you hear, everything you see. So much to spew out. They just keep coming, one after another. You're in a box. A moving box. They want you dead, or in their lie… There's only one thing a man can do – find something that's his, and make an island for himself.
> – First Sgt. Edward Welsh, THE THIN RED LINE (1998)

And the commonly seen result is thus: the destruction of trust, and the rise of disgruntled, cynical men who disregard virtue as a weakness, and smirk at the mere mention of masculine virtues and morality.

Either way, it's the values of true masculinity which suffer as a result, as modern men get increasingly lost when it comes to the choice of personal morality, and practicing masculine virtues – especially in modern societies which often exploit them for doing so.

Harry Browne effectively touches on the important and debatable subject of morality in today's world in his best seller How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World. He mentions:

> Morality is a powerful word. Perhaps even more powerful is the word immoral. In an attempt to avoid being labeled immoral, many people allow themselves to be manipulated by others.

It’s common to see modern (blue pill) men usually yield to the morality trap – a trap to which he devotes an entire chapter in his book. And yielding to that trap often ends up making a farce of the quality of gratitude, and virtue itself. Most of the time, people usually succumb to the absolute morality trap, described in the book as:

> An absolute morality is a set of rules to which an individual is expected to surrender his own happiness.
> There are two main characteristics of an absolute morality:
> 1. It presumably comes from an authority outside of the individual. It comes from someone or somewhere more important than the individual himself.
> 2. It proposes that the individual should be “moral” regardless of the consequences to himself. In other words, doing what is “right” is more important than one’s own happiness.

Most of the people who end up being victims of misdirecting their gratitude usually are the people who don’t correctly perceive the ulterior motives of those who favor them; yet these victimized people stand transfixed in their “morality” trap, regardless of the consequences that their gratitude may bring upon them – often suffering from an unwilling martyr syndrome.

But with such situations on the rise in the life of men who might end up being victimized out of a misguided sense of gratitude in dysfunctional relationships, careers, and societies, it then becomes very important for such men to detach their emotions from their discretionary powers to avoid being victims for a misguided sense of absolute morality.

Surviving the trap of forced gratitude

> Freedom comes only from seeing the ignorance of your critics and discovering the emptiness of their virtue. — David Seabury

Mankind lives today in societies where amorality and power struggles is the name of the game in every aspect of human life, probably more so than in the past.

In today’s world where amoral power games abound right from the lowest strata of society right up to the highest, mankind is forced to strangulate its innate morality – which can entail potential loss of power in today's ruthless world. Robert Greene states:

> The most important of these skills, and power's crucial foundation, is the ability to master your emotions. An emotional response to a situation is the single greatest barrier to power, a mistake that will cost you a lot more than any temporary satisfaction you might gain by expressing your feelings. Emotions cloud reason, and if you cannot see the situation clearly, you cannot prepare for and respond to it with any degree of control.
> Anger is the most destructive of emotional responses, for it clouds your vision the most. It also has a ripple effect that invariably makes situations less controllable and heightens your enemy's resolve. If you are trying to destroy an enemy who has hurt you, far better to keep him off-guard by feigning friendliness than showing your anger.
> Love and affection are also potentially destructive, in that they blind you to the often self-serving interests of those whom you least suspect of playing a power game. You cannot repress anger or love, or avoid feeling them, and you should not try. But you should be careful about how you express them, and most important, they should never influence your plans and strategies in any way.

As mentioned, the ability to master his own emotions is the hallmark of the true master. Emotional detachment is one of the keys to developing a powerful foresight, which helps to sidestep the pitfalls of a misdirected morality and the eventual vicissitudes that modern life would eventually throw at men today.

That's the difference between the red piller and the blue piller: the red piller is emotionally detached to the circumstances that life throws at him. He perceives the circumstances and people he is dealing with properly, and while being moral himself, he avoids the traps of a socially engineered forced morality which might be thrust on him.

The blue piller meanwhile shuttles between two extremes: he either blindly follows the herd's equally blind morality which is expected of him, or sometimes he follows the other side of the spectrum – hating morality itself , which often further leads to the lack of development of masculine virtue in himself.

Conclusion

Gratitude need not have to come at the price of one's dignity, honor and self respect. Gratitude indeed remains one of the core virtues of masculinity, but at the same time in today's world, more often than not, it is often abused.

But to correctly understand and practice the attitude of gratitude, the solution remains unchanged: it's imperative that one takes the red pill, for the red pill alone would grant the necessary ability to perceive and judge properly—unadulterated from the illusionary traps which would take away a person's freedom—to practice gratitude to its highest expression to the ones who deserve it.

February 21, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Jim Bob Duggar is the patriarch on TLC’s reality television show “19 Kids and Counting.” Yes, Jim Bob has nineteen children—all by his wife Michelle. Jim Bob and his wife are devout Christians who take the Bible literally when it says that “children are a heritage of the LORD: and the fruit of the womb is his reward” so they have tried to have as many children as possible.

While you might not subscribe to Jim Bob’s religion or want such a large brood, there are lots of reasons to aspire to be like him.

Jim Bob gets as much sex as he wants

Jim Bob has a lot more sex than most guys, especially married ones. In an interview with Today, Michelle Duggar said: “In your marriage there will be times you’re going to be very exhausted. Your hubby comes home after a hard day’s work, you get the baby to bed, and he is going to be looking forward to that time with you.”

Her advice to other women is to “be available. Anyone can fix him lunch, but only one person can meet that physical need of love that he has, and you always need to be available when he calls.”

Granted, not everyone would want to sleep with Michelle Duggar. This is a valid objection. Michelle is a little past her prime (she is pushing 50), but if you make allowances for the 80s fashion and hairstyle, young Michelle was actually attractive.

Young Jim Bob and Michelle

Others might raise the objection that Jim Bob has limited himself to sleeping with just one woman. This is also a valid objection, but seducing good-looking women takes time and effort, even for alpha predators. And not all guys are irresistible alphas. If you happen to look like Jim Bob, it might take a lot of effort, so Jim Bob's deal is actually pretty good.

While Jim Bob says he treats his wife like a queen, it still pays off. Michelle takes care of his needs. She has a home cooked meal on the table and cheerfully tends to his brood. There are many other men who treat their wives or girlfriends like queens and get TV dinners and no sex in return.

Jim Bob is not a wage slave

Early in their marriage, Jim Bob and Michelle made the decision to live debt-free, and it was a decision that paid massive dividends. Living debt free means that they are not able to play "keeping up with the Joneses" by accumulating status symbols like expensive cars and designer clothes. Instead, they shop at thrift stores and follow the motto "Buy used and save the difference." This kept living expenses low and freed Jim Bob from the wage slavery that accompanies working for an employer.

Instead Jim Bob started his own used-car business—the first of several successful businesses that he ran. Today, Jim Bob is a multimillionaire. While some of this is due to his television show, the rest can be attributed to frugality and entrepreneurship. Even without the show, Jim Bob would be financially well off.

Jim Bob is self-sufficient

Jim Bob tries to avoid paying someone to do something he could do himself. The Duggars currently live in a 7,000 square foot home that Jim Bob purchased as a kit for $82,000. Jim Bob, his sons, and fellow church members assembled the home. The Duggars treated the building of their house as a learning project: experts such as electricians and plumbers were only called in to teach Jim Bob and his sons how to do each task.

This mindset continues today. On a recent episode he had new carpeting installed at a rental property but made his boys “help out” thereby learning the trade for future endeavors.

Duggar Family House

Jim Bob is having an impact on the world

Most modern day parents abdicate their duties as primary educators of their children to the state and to popular culture. Jim Bob, on the other hand, has done a great job of instilling his values into his nineteen children. Assuming that each of his children has ten children, that will mean that within a few years, Jim Bob will be the patriarch of over 200 people. Few men are fortunate enough to establish that kind of a legacy.

Additionally, Jim Bob takes his role as father seriously. While many modern day dads provide little to no guidance about relationships and marriage, Jim Bob makes a point to teach his children the importance of picking a suitable husband or wife. And by home schooling his children and monitoring Internet and phone access he has managed to prevent the culture from corrupting them.

Additionally Jim Bob’s strict approach successfully prevents his daughters (and sons) from becoming promiscuous. No father, no matter how “progressive,” wants to see his daughters become grist for the serial pump and dump mill, and Jim Bob’s method has been successful so far.

The Duggar girls prove that not all western women are beyond hope. They were taught to cook, clean, and save themselves for marriage. And if they are like their mother, they will never deny their husbands sex. Jackpot.

Jessa Duggar and Husband

The Duggar's way of life is obviously counter-cultural. It might be too extreme for some men, but we can all still learn a little from Jim Bob's approach.

7 Basic Life Hacks Men Shouldn't Ignore

February 22, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

"We are what we repeatedly do."
– Aristotle

There are simple things you do every day that make you happy… And there are simple things you do every day that undermine your happiness.

The trick is being able to identify your habits, and then be able to determine which support you and which are bad for you.

However there are some habits that are universally beneficial for our confidence, happiness, and overall well-being. And, by the same token, there are some habits that are universally toxic.

In this article I want to share seven small hacks that, if applied daily, will have a large impact on your happiness, confidence, productivity, and all-around well-being.

1. Read 30 minutes per day

Reading is like an active meditation.

It allows you to focus completely on something outside of your head, and it allows you to learn valuable information at the same time.

However, with all of the video games, TV shows, movies, social media, and smartphones that exist in our culture, there's a large barrier that prevents most men from ever picking up a book. Fight past this barrier and find 30 minutes to read every day – you'll feel far more enlightened, happy, and motivated for choosing reading over browsing the internet or watching TV.

2. Stop watching porn

Porn is unsatisfying and detrimental to your mental health

There are many negative side effects to porn addiction. However the worst are probably sexual dysfunction, reduced motivation to have real sex, and the pedestalization effect it has on over-valuing women and sex.

There is no down side to quitting porn. You can always jerk one out without watching other people have sex – and really, this is what makes porn so pathetic. Go have your own sex.

3. Make fast decisions

Indecision is so dangerous because it leads to more and more indecision. And indecision almost always creates intense anxiety, that's usually coupled with a decrease in happiness and self-esteem.

Stop overthinking things, follow your guy, and practice making small decisions quickly. Choose what you'll wear, where you'll go, what you'll order and when you'll meet up with hesitating. You'll waste far less time and be that much happier for it.

4. Don't eat shit

Shitty food makes you tired, lethargic, and fat

The only upside to eating “junk” food is the pleasure of chewing it in your mouth and swallowing it.

Once it’s gone, it’s almost always followed by a decrease in energy and motivation. By simply avoiding shitty food throughout your day, you’ll be operating on a higher plane of existence than the masses of men who eat cheeseburgers, pizza, and ice cream every damn day. And you’ll look a lot better than them, too.

5. Stop watching the news

The news is just a big mish-mash of miserable happenings and depressing stories.

The only thing you gain from watching the news is “knowing what’s going on in the world.” And I don’t believe this is really that valuable after all. It’s certainly not worth the added anxiety and stress that hearing all of the other bullshit causes you. Stop wasting your time and stop watching that garbage.

6. Breathe deeply

Deep breathing is one reason you feel so good after working out

Focused, conscious breathing is, in my opinion, the absolute most effective way to cure a bad, depressive mood. It’s essentially a meditation in mindfulness.

When you catch yourself feeling anxious, depressed, or shitty – stop and focus on breathing deep breaths through your nose and into your belly. This opens up the front side of the body, where we tend to hold most of our stress and tension, and it calms us down.

7. Work out

The fact that working out is beneficial to our health is now common knowledge. It prevents chronic disease, makes us feel better, and makes us look better.

There’s literally NO REASON you shouldn’t be working out every single day. It doesn’t matter if you lift weights, run, cycle, practice a martial art, play a sport, hike, or do anything else physical – but do something. You’re subjecting yourself to shitty moods, a shitty body, and a shitty life expectancy if you don’t.

How To Identify 3 Common Types Of Feminist Bullshit

February 22, 2015 | by James Russell | Link | Original Link

When I saw a link to an article entitled "These Beautiful Drawings Showcase How We Stereotype The Female Gender & Why We Need To Stop" I could tell without reading a further word that it was going to irritate me. Yet, like a moth to the flame, I was compelled to click and absorb the propaganda that followed.

The drawings themselves depict a series of women who indulge in "frowned-upon" female behaviours, including having excessive tattoos, promiscuous sex, and neglecting to shave body hair. In each case, the artist concludes by assuring the reader that it's okay to indulge in each of these behaviours, because it's your choice to do so, and nobody else's.

Sure enough, by the time I reached the end of the article, my non-mouse hand was subconsciously massaging my temples in exasperation. I'd be very surprised to find I'm the only one who finds this kind of attitude obnoxious and deeply annoying, yet it's hard to put a finger on exactly why it causes this reaction. Moreover, if I were to criticise the article on Facebook I would come across as a raving misogynist.

So why is the work of this artist so eye-roll-inducing? The answer is that it is absolutely packed with sneaky feminist doublethink, designed to get the reader on board with crafty emotional manipulation, while logical fallacies are allowed to slip quietly under the radar.

In fact, this article provides a great example of three of the very largest themes of feminist bullshit. Once you learn to recognise them, you won't be caught out in the future. Let's have a look at each:

1. Moral blackmail

One of the key weapons in the arsenal of the feminist is an appeal to emotions rather than rational thinking. In this case, note that the first image in the series depicts a bald-headed woman (presumably) undergoing chemotherapy, who makes the courageous decision to no longer wear a wig in public.

I think most people would agree that you'd have to be pretty cold to criticize a cancer-sufferer for not covering her head. However, this example has now set the emotional tone for the rest of the article: if you're not okay with women becoming morbidly obese or covering themselves with ugly tattoos then you're essentially discriminating against cancer victims. You monster!

This tactic of using an irrelevant yet evocative topic to create an emotional response pervades modern feminism. Take, for example, the concept of "rape-culture." Rape itself is a very specifically defined crime, carried out by a very small minority of men. Yet when the act of catcalling or pumping and dumping a woman are labelled as "rape culture" it tars innocent men with the brush of rape. They might not actually be rapists (yet!), but through the act of normalising rape, they might as well be.

I could go on about this underhand tactic, but I feel our good friend Anita Sarkeesian (aka Feminist Frequency) demonstrates it better than I ever could:

Anita Sarkeesian displays her formidable grasp of causality

2. The "have my cake and eat it" mentality

Yes, it's very obvious that many feminists are a little too fond of eating cake, but I'm talking in the metaphorical sense here. Feminists often appeal to the concept of the "free society" — that individuals should be free to express themselves as they see fit.

However, in most cases, what they actually want is a society that is free on a highly selective basis. What they really mean is: "I should be allowed to behave however I like, and nobody else should be allowed to judge me for it." Are you a decrepit old hag who insists on wearing a bikini to the beach? That's fine! Everybody else can just look away, it's their problem!

This kind of mindset is exemplified by women who get trashy tattoos and then complain that they are excluded from job opportunities and viewed (correctly) as skanks by men. In other words, they are doing something specifically to make a statement to other people and then complaining that others are judging them negatively because of it.

True, there's nothing intrinsically wrong with the physical act of marking your skin with ink. However, like shaving your head or wearing Crocs, our society associates tattoos with a particular image; an image which women are very aware of, and are deliberately buying into when they go under the needle.

3. Pretending it's all about equality

"I don't believe it's enough to discuss exclusively the issues that affect a specific group of women. We also need to talk about racism, homophobia, transphobia, classicism, xenophobia and ableism," claims Rossetti, the artist behind the pictures. This sounds a grand, all-inclusive statement, but it is slightly at odds with the fact that every one of her pictures centres on women's issues.

Not a single one features a male protagonist. Rossetti gives an explanation for this apparent imbalance: she draws women because she identifies best with her own gender. However, call me a cynic, but I find a simpler explanation far more likely: she simply does not care about men.

The act of paying lip service to equality while focussing exclusively on issues which affect women is a fundamental feature of modern feminism. By painting themselves as long-suffering victims of the patriarchy, feminists are permitted to act with brazen selfishness, while maintaining the image of heroic fighters for justice.

How often do you hear the cry to “end violence against women,” despite the fact that men are massively more likely to be victims of violence? Scarcely a day goes by without hearing about the lamentable lack of women in CEO jobs and other positions of power, but to date I’ve yet to hear a feminist complain of the huge gender imbalance in dangerous and unpleasant professions, such as the armed forces, trash collection, and mining.

Conclusion

Knowing the readership of Return of Kings, I doubt that much of what I’ve said will come as a complete shock; all red pillers are fully aware of the rampant hypocrisy of modern feminism. However, what I aim to do is to equip the reader with an analytical framework to deconstruct the logical fallacies that underlie feminist propaganda — to be able to point out exactly why their claims are irrational bullshit, rather than just coming away with a vague sense of unease.

As a word of warning, bear in mind that for most people emotions tend to trump rational thought, so it’s advisable to tread lightly when calling out underhand tactics in the face of hyper-emotional topics such as rape and cancer. In the right context though, an awareness of these mind games can help you to avoid getting bogged down in logical quagmires, and to expose feminists as the selfish clowns that they are. Remember: knowing is half the battle!

4 Underappreciated Horror Movies

February 22, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Here there be tygers

-Stephen King, Skeleton Crew

The horror movie genre has to be the queerest genre of movies the world has to offer–outside, of course, actual gay shit. Why would anymore in their right mind enjoy being terrified? We live in a world chock full of poverty, sloth, and uncertainty. Isn't simply existing enough of a jolt and scare for the average person?

Truthfully, people do enjoy being scared. The horror genre allows us to indulge violent fantasies, confront the darkest aspects of the human existence and explore the outer limits of our consciousness. Our sometimes giddy desire to be terrified belies our secret desire to remove the artificial mask of civilization and indulge our basest instincts—whether they are based in fantasy or reality.

With that being said, let me proffer a number of horror flicks that I think are under-appreciated (either due to their age, nation of origin or limited distribution) and why they are relevant.

Pet Sematary

Pet Sematary is an adaption of a Stephen King novel with the same name.

When Stephen King wrote the novel, he actually shelved it for a period of time, as he thought it was too horrific to be published. Obviously, he did eventually publish the book.

The theatrical adaption is excellent. While the acting isn't top-shelf it is still quite good, as is the faithful adaption of the novel that drives the movie.

The movie is about a young family that moves to a house in the countryside in Maine. They happen to live near an old Indian burial ground that is rumored to be haunted with a curse that causes any being—animal or human—that is buried there to be reborn as a degenerate, haunted version of the buried.

The movie is terrifying because it plays directly on twin human impulses: the fear of death and the consequent desire to circumvent death. When provided the opportunity, would we attempt to stave off the reality of death and rebirth by attempting to play God? This movie explores this dark avenue with horrifying results.

Shutter

Shutter is originally a Thai film that was released in 2004 and was remade in a 2008 American release.

The movie revolves around an American couple in Japan (with the male protagonist pursuing a career as a photographer) who seemingly run over a body on a rural road, only to find that the body they thought they ran over isn't there. Over the course of the movie, the two confront strange visions in their dreams, weird lights in their photos and disturbing secret held by the male protagonist.

The film is eerily creepy and more of a thriller than pure horror. However, it is well-told, well-paced and well-acted. The twist at the end is rather unpredictable, as is the twisted secret of the protagonist.

This movie is remarkable because it shows that men can do awful, terrible things to women and not feel one ounce of hatred towards womankind. A highly unfortunate byproduct of western self-absorption is the reflexive impulse to blame the problems in the world on hatred.

In this instance, a feminist could accuse the protagonist of being a misogynist, as only misogyny causes men to hurt or abuse women. Not only is misogyny mostly an illusion perception, but it a uniquely western impulse to think that bad things happen to them purely because others hate them. Humans are a much more tangled mess of desires and emotions than can be laid at the feet of hatred.

Little Deaths

Little Deaths is a compilation of three movie shorts: each of which fit into the loose over-arching narrative of sex and violence..

The last short is simply called, “Bitch.” It involves a young man in a relationship with a young woman. This is an unsatisfying relationship, with him as the bottom and her as the top. She regularly takes him to a room adjacent to her bedroom to peg him—reminding him of his place in the relationship. He eventually breaks and decides to reclaim his power in this relationship. In the climax of the movie, her takes her life in an incredibly gruesome and horrific fashion.

As I have opined before on ROK, this movie is illuminating because it shows what can happen to a beta male without any self-awareness or desire for true personal betterment. The protagonist’s desire to kill his girlfriend isn’t just illegal and highly immoral, but also caused by his inability grow up and move on from a horrible relationship. Never take for granted a man’s ability to swallow his pride, take his lumps and move on from his bad decisions—without cracking like the main character did here in Little Deaths.

Curtains

Curtains is a Canadian horror movie that initially came out in 1983.

The movie centers around a number of women who are auditioning for the leading role in a director's new movie. They find themselves at an isolated hotel-of-sorts, bound by miles of snow. They find themselves cut down one-by-one, which causes them to suspect and accuse each other of being the murderer.

This movie is significant simply because Canada doesn't produce many quality horror films and this certainly qualifies as a cult classic. There isn't anything notably spectacular about the movie, but it is an enjoying and satisfying viewing.

Conclusion

Horror is quite possibly one of the most difficult genres of storytelling to pull off. However, when it is done well, it is done extremely well. Whether supernatural or drawing on the worst, base impulses of mankind, well-done horror is a truly a remarkable sight to behold.

Why Are Feminists Ignoring The Violent Gang Rape Of Porn Star Cytherea?

February 23, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last month, retired porn star Cytherea was the victim of a brutal gang rape at her home in Las Vegas. According to the Las Vegas Review-Journal, three teenage suspects, two of them minors, broke into the house, robbed Cytherea and her family at gunpoint, and raped her while her children were present. The rape and home invasion was so violent that not only are the minors being tried as adults, all three suspects could be sentenced to life in prison if found guilty:

> He forced her into another bedroom, pulled off her clothing and began sexually assaulting her. She begged him not to rape her. She told police he choked her as he raped her. Another suspect entered the room and demanded that she perform oral sex on him.
> A third suspect then came to the room and raped her. She begged him to stop.

If ever there was a story for feminists to get enraged about, this would be it. According to SJWs, America fosters a "rape culture," where sexual assault is trivialized and men are encouraged to feel "entitled" to womens' bodies. You can't get more entitled than a gang of ghetto thugs invading a woman's home and raping her at gunpoint.

Yet feminists have been eerily silent on Cytherea. A casual Google search for "cytherea rape" shows that the only articles about the story are from news outlets, porn industry sites such as TRPWL, and the conservative site The Daily Caller. Searching Jezebel, one of the most popular feminist blogs in the world, for “cytherea” returns a grand total of zero results. Porn star Mercedes Carrera recently made a video calling out feminists for their silence on the case:

Additionally, SJW Arthur Chu has accused #GamerGate of “weaponizing” Cytherea’s rape in an attempt to bash Anita Sarkeesian and other feminists. My Reaxxion colleague Ryan Carlson was specifically attacked by SJWs for writing about the story:

Feminists won’t address Cytherea’s rape because her story destroys their entire narrative. For the past decade, SJWs have been developing a false conception of rape that has become so ingrained in the minds of Americans that it’s now influencing government policy. Acknowledging what happened to Cytherea would ruin their con game.

The Color (And Class) Of Rape

One look at the race of Cytherea's alleged rapists and you can see a big reason why the left won't touch the story. The media is constantly on the lookout for what Tom Wolfe calls the "Great White Defendant," a criminal case featuring a white man who is utterly guilty of victimizing a woman or a racial minority.

This desire to demonize white men drives not only popular rape hoaxes such as the Duke lacrosse case or the UVA rape story, but white-on-black crime stories such as the Trayvon Martin case and the Ferguson debacle.

Feminists are also ignoring Cytherea's rape because of the class factor. The rape stories that SJWs squirt tears over—such as UVA rape liar Jackie Coakley or "Mattress Girl" Emma Sulkowicz—involve upper-class white girls being purportedly brutalized by "entitled," "privileged" white men. Cytherea is a former porn star, and while there are "sex-positive" feminists out there, they've been eclipsed in power by neo-Puritans such as Anita Sarkeesian and Lindy West who wax poetic about "affirmative consent" and think that porn is a tool of the patriarchy.

SJWs are so wedded to their narrative of rape being perpetuated by upper-class white men that they'll rush to defend any wealthy white girl who cries rape, no matter how obvious her lie. To illustrate this, contrast this video of Cytherea talking about her assault with Emma Sulkowicz discussing her "rape":

As Roosh V Forum member Kosko points out, we can tell that Cytherea is telling the truth and Sulkowicz is lying based on their respective body language. Cytherea blocks her body off from the camera by scrunching up and is unable to maintain eye contact, indicating authentic trauma. In contrast, Sulkowicz proudly displays her body and maintains eye contact with the camera virtually the entire time.

The reality is that the privileged white princesses who form the SJW rank-and-file will likely never be raped. Despite feminist claims that one out of every five women in college will be raped, the Department of Justice recently found that only six out of 1,000 college students (0.03 out of 5) are raped, a rate far lower than the general population. Rape itself also declined by 58 percent between 1994 and 2010.

We need to face the facts: feminists don't care about rape victims, and they never have. The "rape culture" narrative is driven not by a genuine concern for women who've been sexually assaulted, but by the neurotic fear young American women have of men and masculinity. "Rape culture" hysterics are driven purely by the narcissism and social retardation of the Millennial generation.

Modern Feminism Is White Girl's Narcissism

Last week, Return of Kings publisher Roosh Valizadeh posted an article on his blog titled "How to Stop Rape," where he facetiously suggested that legalizing rape on private property would bring an end to "rape culture." Despite the obviously satirical nature of the article, feminists reacted to it with violent rage. As of this writing, Roosh has been denounced by The Mirror, xoJane, Raw Story and more, none of whom have written about Cytherea.

We saw a similar situation several months back when it was revealed that Pakistani rapist-pimps had forced thousands of white girls in the English city of Rotherham into the sex trade for over a decade, but local authorities didn't do anything about it out of fear of being seen as "racist." Feminists all but ignored the Rotherham debacle in favor of wringing their hands over the "victimization" of Jennifer Lawrence and other celebrity white girls in the Fappening.

The reason why feminists are more upset over satirical articles and the "problems" of millionaires then by actual rape is because they're narcissists. Their agita about "rape culture" is driven by a desire to remake the world to accommodate their various flaws. "Yes Means Yes" laws, campaigns against "manspreading," and the like are smokescreens to disguise young women's fear of masculinity and discomfort with themselves. Roosh recorded a response video that expanded on this:

It's precisely because of SJW narcissism that they ignore real rape victims like Cytherea in favor of liars like Emma Sulkowicz or UVA's Jackie Coakley. The "rape culture" narrative is not about protecting women, but punishing men for being men. It's an expression of an entire generation of women's inability to cope with anything outside of their wealthy, upper-middle class bubbles.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Plutarch's Life of Aristides contains a compelling aside about the perfectibility of a leader. What he calls the "divine nature" of a great man has three attributes: power, virtue, and immortality. Of these, virtue is the most important; prestige must flow from it primarily, rather than from the uncertain reservoirs of violence or power. Continuing in this vein, he notes:

> So when we consider the three sentiments, admiration, fear, and reverence, which divinity inspires among mankind, we find that men appear to admire the gods and think them blessed because they are immortal and unchangeable…At the same time men long for immortality, to which no flesh can attain, and for power, which remains for the most part in the hands of fortune, while they give virtue, the only divine excellence of which we are capable, the last place in their scheme of values. [Life of Aristides, 6]

And it is here, he says, that we show ourselves to be fools, since justice comes from virtue. And the authority of a great man "still needs justice to make it divine." Power unsupported by justice and virtue is savagery; it corrupts him who wields it, and brutalizes him who is fated to endure it.

Sebastião José de Carvalho e Mello, known to history as the Marquês de Pombal, was the most powerful man in eighteenth century Portugal. Born in 1699, he was the son of a county squire whose piety exceeded his means. He saw to it that his son received a Jesuit education; a subsequent period of military service taught him the means and ways of authority. Marrying into a family of noble affiliation, he used his opportunities to advance a political career, and by 1739 had achieved a foreign ministerial post in London.

Study of English political institutions opened vistas of possibility for him on how ecclesiastical authority could be subordinated to temporal power; and it was here that he first likely began to imagine a Portugal free from the ancient shackles of clerical control.

What Henry VIII had done in England could, perhaps, be duplicated on the Mediterranean. These sentiments he did not disclose to anyone.

Joseph I, Pombal's patron

With clerical support, principally from the Jesuits, he secured an appointment to the cabinet of King Joseph I in 1749. His energy, industry, and will distinguished him from his contemporaries, and he soon came to dominate the king's ministries. Yet whisperings of disapproval of his ignoble birth continued to vex him, depriving him of the unqualified support of the aristocracy, for which he nursed a covert hostility. The Great Lisbon Earthquake of 1755 confirmed his indefatigable energy and brusque confidence.

The earthquake, with its accompanying fires and tsunami, devastated the city. Desperate mobs of looters swarmed in to pick over its heaps of rubble. Joseph granted him nearly dictatorial powers to deal with the crisis. Pombal ordered soldiers to occupy the city and shoot looters on sight; for the dazed citizenry, he instituted price controls, established relief camps, and began an energetic reconstruction program. Modern Lisbon is the product of his applied renovations.

Portuguese civil society in his day was heavily dominated by clericalism; education was nearly entirely in the hands of the Jesuits. The Inquisition still operated as a state-within-a-state, controlled at least nominally by the Vatican. In commercial relations, British companies wielded an undue influence.

For a man of Pombal's nationalism and stubborn pride, such a situation was intolerable. Echoing the sentiments of Richelieu and Henry VIII, he believed that the road to modernization must begin with the subordination of church to state. He would bring the Catholic Church to heel. To this task, he now turned his obdurate and ruthless stamina. He harbored no doubts that he was acting in his nation's best interests.

The Lisbon earthquake of 1755 gave Pombal the opportunity to rebuild the city

The Jesuits proved an easy target. Under the terms of a treaty negotiated with Spain in 1750, Portugal acquired seven reductiones (settlements) in Paraguay near the Brazilian border, on which the Jesuits had organized Indians in self-supporting communities. The treaty required the removal of the Indians, then numbering about thirty thousand; and when the Indians resisted their eviction, with apparent Jesuit backing, Pombal turned against the Society of Jesus with a pitiless ferocity. He now sought nothing less than the removal of Jesuit influence from Portugal's commercial and civic life.

But the Jesuits were as subtle as he was ruthless; they caught wind of his intentions, and plotted his overthrow. Their leader in Lisbon, Gabriel Malagrida, was a man of devout conviction and patient subterfuge; he sent out feelers to aristocratic families in the capital who shared a desire to remove Pombal, the upstart dictator of lowly birth. Joseph I, who by now was nearly Pombal's instrument, was coaxed by him to believe that the Jesuits desired to replace Joseph himself.

With successive edicts, the Jesuits were gradually purged from Lisbon's commercial circles; Pombal even incited opposing cliques in the Vatican against them. A failed assassination attempt against the king in September 1758 ended whatever doubts Joseph may have had about Pombal's direction; he now gave his minister unqualified support for the anticlerical program.

The attempt on the king's life was now used as the pretext to arrest and put to the torture a number of prominent aristocrats and Jesuits, including Malagrida. There was some evidence of a loose conspiracy, and nine nobles were publicly executed early in 1759. Pombal explained his actions in widely circulated pamphlets; sentiment against the Jesuits ran high in Europe. Pope Clement XIII argued for moderation against the Jesuits, noting their record of productive works and protesting that collective punishment for the misdeeds of a few was unjust. But by now, Pombal smelled blood, and pressed his advantage.

He had royal orders issued which confiscated all Jesuit property in Portugal, and mandated the expulsion of all Jesuits from the kingdom, as well as from Brazil. To make certain that Clement in Rome got the message, relations with the Vatican were severed in 1760. Not since the destruction of the Knights Templar by France's Philip IV in 1307 had Europe witnessed such a brutal repression of a religious order.

Deprived of all possessions except their clothing, columns of haggard Jesuits made their way to port cities in the Algarve for expulsion to Italy; many had been reduced to destitution by the hardships of the deportations. As the public watched with mounting unease at these cruelties, opinion slowly began to turn against Pombal and his government.

And yet, as these whisperings of dissent grew, he arrogated to himself full dictatorial powers with Joseph's blessing. The list of arrestees grew year by year; agents and informers proliferated; and aristocrats and clerics from all over Portugal and the colonies were clapped into jail for the slightest expression of opposition to the despot.

As his insecurity grew, so did his isolation and his arbitrariness. Prisons were stuffed with noble inmates, with many of these left to rot in detention for years. His old enemy Malagrida was finally brought to trial and condemned to death on trumped-up evidence after years of imprisonment; an old man of seventy two, he mounted the scaffold in 1761, utterly broken in body and spirit. Voltaire called the execution an act of "the most horrible wickedness."

His enemies nursed their hatreds in seclusion, and prayed for his downfall. The dictator's methods had laid a black hand on nearly every aristocratic family in the land; and abroad, Europe's elites, initially sympathetic to his attempts to modernize Portugal, were horrified at his excesses. His orders to burn the village of Trefaria for its resistance to his military recruiters confirmed him as a man who had now completely abandoned any pretense of decency.

The death of Joseph I, Pombal's patron or puppet, in 1777 marked the beginning of his downfall. Immediately after Joseph's burial, the new regent Maria I ordered the release of over eight hundred imprisoned Jesuits and aristocrats from Pombal's dungeons; public outrage swelled as word spread of the extreme state of their physical deterioration. The natural piety of the people reasserted itself. The tide had turned against Pombal.

Some prisoners, having languished for years under fraudulent writs, refused to leave their cells until their innocence had been publicly declared. Pombal was now unable to show himself in public. He tendered his resignation to Maria and was allowed to retire to private life, despite calls from her court attendants for his arrest and prosecution; forced to slip out of Lisbon in secret, he was nearly attacked by assailants.

Hubris is the downfall of many great men

He was now an old man of seventy-seven. Because he had been cunning enough to have his edicts issued under the late king's signature, he could not be easily prosecuted by Maria, the daughter of Joseph I. Yet he was hounded day and night just the same. Lawsuits and inquests accumulated; a panel of judges interrogated him for days on end until he nearly collapsed in exhaustion. The families of his political victims swarmed over him as a cloud of angry wasps. So the cruelties of the wicked are, by the humor of Fortune, turned back against their perpetrators. As Seneca tells us,

> As weapons drift away and intrigues cease,
> The mighty flounder under their own weight,
> And fortune vanishes, as itself a heavy burden. [Agamemnon I.85]

Many of those he had imprisoned were now exonerated, with their property and reputations restored by Maria. She officially denounced him as a criminal in August 1781; but to spare the country, or her family, the ordeal of a trial, she took no further action against him. He was not long for this world in any event. Some wasting disease had engulfed his body, covering it with lesions, and denying him the simple pleasures of rest and eating. His agonies came to an end on May 18, 1782.

He had aimed to modernize Portugal, and subordinate its clerical establishment to the crown; and in commerce, education, and foreign policy, he had overseen some modest successes. Yet his rashness and hubris had undone him: unable to control his passions, he had permitted himself to be consumed with hatred for the Jesuits, the aristocrats who had impeded his career, and finally, anyone who breathed a word of dissent against him.

He had sinned against his people, disrespecting their traditions and forcing on them an anticlerical program that was alien to their nature. He was once the ungrateful favorite of mistress Fortune; but as his impieties accrued, the insulted goddess revoked his privileges, and pursued him vengefully. In the end, it was not his enemies, but rather his own hubris, that proved to be his undoing. Fortune's day of reckoning with the insolent, the grasping, and the proud may be intermitted, or it may be adjourned, but it is never cancelled.

Hawaii Has Adopted “Yes Means Yes”

February 23, 2015 | by Michael Augustus | Link | Original Link

I regret to inform you that the “Yes Means Yes” proponents have reached their second milestone. The disease of feminism has swam across the Pacific and onto Hawaiian shores to infect its second host, the college campuses of Hawaii.

Recently, a mass email has been sent to all students and faculty informing them about the newly revised statutes regarding rape and sexual harassment. I fear it may be more strict than in California. The link is here if you wish to read it in it’s entirety.

1. How consent is now defined

A. Affirmative Consent[2]

Consent in relationship to sexual activity is defined in accordance with its plain and common meaning. With respect to sexual activity, "consent" means affirmative words or actions that show a knowing and voluntary agreement to engage in mutually agreed sexual activity (including pictures/video). For the purposes of this section, "affirmative consent" means affirmative, conscious, and voluntary agreement by both parties to engage in sexual activity. Mere assent (an affirmative statement or action) does not constitute consent if it is given by a person who is unable to make a reasonable judgment concerning the nature or harmfulness of the activity because of her or his incapacitating intoxication, unconsciousness, youth, language, intellectual or other disability, or other incapacity; or if the assent is the product of threat, coercion, or fraud. Past consent does not imply future consent; silence or an absence of resistance does not imply consent. Consent to engage in sexual activity with one person does not imply consent to engage in sexual activity with another. Consent must be ongoing throughout sexual activity and can be withdrawn at any time.

Any college campus accepting federal funding is required to adopt this rule. This is a case of extortion, (e.g. "We may not be able to force you by decree, but we can take away your food and drink, AKA funding"). I have no doubt that they did so without blinking. College is a business. As long as you pay your tuition, and purchase your mandatory $200 textbooks, they don't give a shit.

How can you provide evidence as the defendant to prove your innocence beyond hearsay? You can't, here's why. Though it states in the second sentence that you can use "(picture/video)" as evidence of affirmative consent, Hawaii state law says it is unlawful to, "install or use equipment in a private place for observing, photographing*,* recording, amplifying or broadcasting sounds or events*…without the consent of the person or persons entitled to privacy therein."* The only way possible to prove your innocence is outlawed.

Even if the girl miraculously continues to have sex with you after demonstrating massive betamaxness with your constant reassurance, you can't prove it. You're allowed to save text messages and record phone calls, but that can't prove affirmative consent, so it doesn't matter. There is a video, "Feminism for Bros – 105," about a beta going through the motions of pre-coitus with respect to "Yes Means Yes."

I want everyone to see how repulsive it is to witness in action. This is how the government expects you to conduct all sexual encounters.

2. Affected Areas

[2] The term "consent" with respect to sexual activity is not specifically defined by Hawai'i Revised Statutes.

In other words, this doesn't apply outside of college campuses. Something tells me that it's because it's unconstitutional or they're experimenting by easing its way into the federal law, waiting for it to be the new normal, then escalate to state laws, finally federal laws. Boil the frog slowly. Convincing the populous to relinquish their rights in the name of security of the divine female.

Also, the majority of the students are between the ages of 18-21, kids still dependent on their parents for provisioning. As you can imagine, most of the voters were probably parents, specifically those of daughters (anyone with a brain knows that this law wasn't intended for females). A parent's ideal path for their daughters would be virginity until marriage with a rich, handsome man. Then bland, innocent, clothed missionary sex would only occur for the sake of reproduction, and cease to exist there after.

That's a fantasy, but this allows them to provide a roadblock to their daughter's vagina, a meta-chastity belt if you will. The government knows that no parent would hesitate or protest. I bet if the government pitched this idea for the rest of the populace, with the video above as instruction, their would be an uproar.

3. Redefining Sexual Assault

Sexual Assault[7]

Under Hawai'i sexual offense laws, a person commits sexual assault, including but not limited to, when the person knowingly or recklessly subjects another person to an act of nonconsensual sexual penetration or sexual contact. This includes knowingly engaging in the behavior with a person who is unable to give consent due to incapacitation, intellectual disability, and age. Sexual assault also includes statutory rape, indecent exposure, and voyeurism or trespassing on property to engage in surreptitious surveillance for sexual gratification. Sexual assault can be committed by men or women and can occur between persons of the same or different sex.

As all red pill digestors here know, one of the goals of feminism has been to expand the definition of harassment, sexual assault, and rape to keep men's balls in a vice grip in order to complete their dual-sexual strategy successfully, while maintaining no responsibility for their actions.

First highlighted in the picture is "indecent exposure." The act of flashing your genitals to unwanting persons is unacceptable, yes, however, this does not constitute as assault. Assault on the senses, possibly, but not bodily harm as the name suggests. May I pull out my cock madam? The second highlighted is "voyeurism." A third party peering into anyone's sexual activities without consent is also clearly unacceptable, but likewise does not cause bodily harm.

Feminism is doing the same with domestic violence in the new movement referred to as "Purple Purse," the act of controlling how a women spends your money is "financial abuse." Expanding the definition of abuse and who qualifies as a victim. Your wife and children are covered under domestic violence, but guess who else is being pushed to qualify as a victim? Intimate partners—AKA your girlfriend.

There's a link below to the website, and also a video of it's campaign. The "victims," are referred to as "survivors," another example expanding the definition of a term without appropriately editing the label.

4. Standard of evidence

University proceedings need not await the disposition of any related criminal investigation or prosecution. The University has the right to proceed with an administrative investigation at any time.

In other words, “Preponderance of the Evidence” instead of “Beyond a Reasonable Doubt”. Many rape, abuse, and harassment accusations are false and the evidence cannot survive the scrutiny when upheld to the standard in the court of law where this should be handled in the first place.

The university can expel you from school, which is on your academic record (banning you from all schools), and publicly label you, while keeping the “victim” anonymous without any real evidence to support the notion. Your reputation can be forever ruined and may have physical consequences – assault by a group of white knights.

5. Anonymous tips

There may be instances when a victim of sexual violence declines to file a complaint but where the University must take action to prevent future incidents and to provide a safe and nondiscriminatory environment for all students and employees, including the reporting party. In these instances, where the more

This is perhaps the most dangerous part of all. An anonymous third-party who knows you’re sexually active with a female, can send a “tip” that you, a male, have sexually assaulted a female, not including themselves, to the administration of the school. The school can then interview the female who may confess that you guys did indeed have sex AND it was CONSENSUAL.

The school may then ask how did she consent and if her consent didn’t meet the standards of the “Yes Means Yes” rule, they must take action on her behalf. ON HER BEHALF! This is a hypothetical, but based on the wording, I don’t see why it couldn’t.

6. Long arm of collegiate law up depending on the circumstances. Similarly, if an incident occurs off-campus, the Title IX Coordinator or designee should be consulted in determining whether the conduct occurred in the context of a University education program or activity or had continuing effects on campus or in an off-campus education program or activity.[11]

The school will determine whether or not they have jurisdiction over the area in which this supposed event occurred, nothing wrong with that. However, if it has continuing effects on its jurisdiction, they can “prosecute.”

I’ll tell you what I think “effects” really means. I believe it means if both of you are college students from the same school and are accused of a rape that supposedly occurred outside of campus, and her emotional “trauma” from said event lingers on university jurisdiction, they can “prosecute” you. Over reaching at its finest.

Conclusion

This propaganda is everywhere: school (all grades), Hollywood, professional sports, prime time television, and even video games. The government is putting their nose in my sex life, and that’s none of their business. I take what I can from my courses since not all of it is brainwashing, but it’s tiresome to weed through the nonsense.

I used to approach and have gotten laid a few times before affirmative consent law here, but I may have to stick with self-pleasure and monk mode while on campus for the rest of my college attendance. It’s almost as if this was the intended consequence…

The only way to win is not to play. If your school adopts this law, and you want sex, do it off campus with a non-student, outside of work, and ask for ID. I would even add that you photograph or videotape your encounters with a smile on her face just to cushion the blow to your reputation.

Yes, it’s ridiculous a man must go through such extreme measures to satisfy his natural carnal desires in a manner that doesn’t dry up vaginas, get you expelled from school, tarnish your reputation, placed in a cell with Bubba, or get you fired. But you’re a man, you must adapt. Withdraw from the system and work on yourselves because if you’re a man, the only person you can ever rely on is yourself.

Jezebel Shows Us The Results Of Unrestrained Hypergamy

February 23, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

The lovely ladies over at Jezebel have outdone themselves yet again in their celebration of human debasement. A post from last month asked the site's readers a simple question: who's the most embarrassing person you've ever slept with?

The answers poured in, and with each the faith of a red pill man in a woman's true nature should be assured.

> – Racist (revealed later) drug dealer
> – Technically homeless musician(s)
> – Ugly dude who didn't really fuck me so much as grind my inner thigh with his dick
> – HS boyfriend with lip ring and Ronald McDonald dyed red hair

> He was this short, scrawny, metal dude with really long, luxurious black hair. He also had a big dick, but was such a douche I could not deal. He was a pizza delivery driver and completely nocturnal. He'd stay up noodling on his electric (not plugged-in, dude wanted to be Yngwie Malmsteen or something). And playing video games. I'd beg him to turn off the television and he'd launch into this diatribe about how going to college is for suckers and he was a freethinker and had attended the school of hard knocks. I hooked up with him for about 3 weeks.

> Hot Italian guy in my exchange program who smoked cigarettes (which I hate), treated women poorly and wanted to sleep with me because it would help him toward his one-from-every-country map, Barney Stinson style (although this was > ten years before Barney Stinson was a thing). I knew all these things and slept with him anyway.

> The most embarrassing ever was the ‘Famous Writer’. I thought I recognized him and we got to talking. He was clearly hitting on me and I said, “Aren’t you married?” He said yes, but that his wife was actually a lesbian and they had an “arrangement” so I went for it.
> Unfortunately the sex was really terrible. He had a micropenis and hadn’t developed any other skills to compensate. Still, I tried to be a good sport and act like I was having a good time, because, Famous Writer! Until afterwards, when, with this smirk on his face, he said he had to tell me something.
> Surprise, surprise, his wife was NOT a lesbian and they did NOT have an arrangement. (“They always fall for it,” he said. “I’ve done this like 100 times. I just get bored and have to ‘play,’ sorry. Thanks for the good time though!”)

> I slept with a guy who had to repeat his junior year and senior year twice in college. He was a white boy wanna be rapper. Got really drunk one night and almost died and was taken to the hospital…was told they found me being carried off by a dude to his apartment. A month later I had sex with the dude who was carrying me off the night I was drunk and incapacitated. So I basically had sex with my wannabe rapist.

> This guy was only ok-looking but he had crazy-good game. He was cheeky and a great conversationalist and he could charm the habit off a nun if he wanted to. He was also a known womanizer and he’d cheated on pretty much every girl he’d ever dated.

> 18 year old taxi driver with an obsession with Joey Buttafuoco and whatsername, who ran away from home, fleeing a shoplifting charge, trying to get to the Galapagos islands.

> I was on a mission to have a one-night stand, got really drunk and didn't notice the nazi tattoos on the dude I banged until I sobered up the next morning.

Neo-nazis? This was a surprisingly common theme actually –

> My very first. A loser wanna-be Neo-Nazi. Who was 15 years older. Did I mention that I'm a Jew?

> He drove a pick-up truck, was a hard drinker and a tough guy. We drank and fought constantly then had really rough sex. He was in the shower after one of those sessions and I started flipping through his CD's and seeing lots of cover art featuring guys with shaved heads and swastikas. Alarmed, I started snooping a little more and discovered that yep, I was fucking a white supremacist.

Do you need any more evidence that the manosphere knows what's what? How many times have we said that girls like bad boys? How many times have we warned of the results of unrestrained hyergamy? Do people understand now that being a nice, beta provider is about as obsolete as the horse-drawn cart or the cassette tape?

This brings us to the question—who is to blame here? Obviously the guys themselves are acting like scumbags, but hey, if something works—it works. Your average man will go to the ends of the Earth to bed a pretty lady. Say what you want about the morals of asshole game, but its merits are undeniable.

But do we apportion equal blame here? Or should the women take some responsibility for their behavior?

Any Jezebel writer would demand men bare the onus of restraining themselves when it comes to physical violence. We're naturally larger and stronger than women. It follows that it is our responsibility to maintain law and order in our society. It would be ludicrous to insist a five-foot-two girl should defend herself against a six-foot, knife-wielding mugger.

Biological differences cut both ways however, and the opposite is true when it comes to sexual restraint. Studies across the board show that men desire sex a great deal more. Women need to understand (then again – I'm positive they already do) that when it comes to sexual relationships, they hold all the cards. If you sleep with arrogant, dumb jerks, men with no jobs, principles or prospects, ones who will never make good fathers, that is what men will become.

People say men act this way because of "toxic masculinity" but the only thing toxic is women's base desires when allowed to run free.

And someone may argue – well these are meant to be the most embarrassing accounts. At least girls do feel embarrassed about it. But I digress. If something is the "most embarrassing thing" you've ever done, you take it to your grave. Bragging about something on the internet doesn't show embarrassment, it shows nascent pride.

The bottom line is, I basically agree that many of the men depicted in this article are assholes—but who are they trying to impress? Somebody needs to keep the country running, but if the blue-collar men of our society don't have a loving family to return to at the end of the day, why should we expect them to keep turning up for work?

It’s Time To Stop Hating Professional Athletes

Professional athletes have always been lightning rods in American culture. From Mickey Mantle‘s reputation as a womanizer to the gambling stories about Michael Jordan, sports stars have always been under a microscope.

As time has ebbed by the scrutiny of pro athletes has grown exponentially. While this increase in coverage can be attributed to a rapid growth in sports media, social media, and the 24 hour news cycle, the underlying theme to this increasing analysis is that outside of a few, people generally don’t hold pro athletes in as high a regard as they used to—in other words, they just don’t like them very much anymore.

Gone are the days where men like Joe Namath who earned the nickname “Broadway Joe” because of his gregarious personality, reveling in the New York nightlife, and his penchant for chasing women were revered by men and women alike. Today, athletes are crucified by the media and their fan bases for the same behavior.

This would not be a “salute” in today’s media

It makes sense that the more access we have, the more we know about their lives which ultimately leads to more criticism. It’s also no surprise that the demonization of masculine conduct both on and off the field is due to the rise of feminism.

Vitriol spewed by women about these men is par for the course these days and to be quite frank, this shouldn’t surprise anybody either. Women have always envied men and squawking about their superiority is how they deal with it. But the growing disdain for male pro athletes by men is white knighting at it's sickeningly worst and is a disturbing trend.

Now I understand that men in the media have to fall in line with the feminist agenda in public. Their livelihood depends on it. And while some of us may think "Well they should have picked another way to make a living before getting into it" we'd be wrong.

The carpet of masculinity has quite literally been pulled out from under them. Feminism hadn't infiltrated sports media on this level when most of the notable journalists, media members, and sports anchors started so I'm not going to pass judgment on men who have to toe the line in order to continue making a living.

No, I'm not suggesting that I can read their minds one way or the other. For all we know male sports reporters and pundits may very well be the manginas they present themselves to be. Nobody knows for sure but I'd be willing to bet that behind closed doors male media members probably have very different conversations about about the sexes than what we see on television or read in their articles.

When I listen to sports talk radio or follow sports blogs and hear (and see) male after male, regular guys as well as television personalities, attacking our brothers it reminds me of feminism. That is, we'd all like to be united but when one or more of us gets ahead we do our damndest to tear each other down.

One thing we try to preach on sites like this is solidarity. God knows the western hemisphere has wants us all thrown to the gallows and hung in the village square so why the hell do we continue to hate on each other?

Follow The Money

Back in mid November, Miami Marlins outfielder Giancarlo Stanton signed a 13 year contract for an eye popping $325 million—the largest contract in professional sports history. Miguel Cabrera wasn't too far behind having signed a ten year extension worth a shade under $300 million earlier in the year.

Stanton will make $25 million annually with Miami

Any time an athlete signs a mega deal like this people lose their shit which leads to predictable narrative like “These guys make too much money!” or “No athlete is worth that much!”

Admittedly I used to be in this camp. I used to take the so-called high road and complain about how our military service men, police officers, and teachers struggle financially while pro athletes who get to play a game for a living make more in a day than any of the aforementioned do in a year. But over the last few years I’ve gained perspective on this issue and have done a complete 180 on this.

Pro athletes get shit from everyone about their “outrageous salaries” but a fraction of a fraction of those detractors barely complain, if ever, about what the owners or commissioners make?

And professional athletes who’ve played the game since childhood haven’t?

NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell makes over $40 million a year (and he deserves every penny as he successfully runs a multi-billion dollar corporation) and former MLB Commissioner Bud Selig will get a $6 million pension. But it’s the athlete who is crucified for being greedy.

Life is good for the commish' and his $44 million salary

The fact is professional athletes have a very small window relative to the average person to maximize on his prime years and earn as much as possible. When his playing career is done, there are few ways for him to make a living because the sport he's played since he was young is pretty much all he knows.

Oh I can hear it now:

"He should have educated himself!"

"He can just make the transition to T.V. and be a commentator!"

With regards to "education" it's been well established in this sector of the web that a college education is next to useless for men and women alike. The purpose of a higher education is to train an individual how to best earn a living. The athlete gets this training on the field while in college. That is where he gets his education which is every bit the same as engineers, doctors, and lawyers who are also in training for their chosen career path.

Secondly, less than one half of 1% of professional athletes make it on television if they even get the opportunity in the first place. Guys like Terry Bradshaw, Ray Lewis, and Curt Schilling are a part of the very small fraternity lucky enough to transition smoothly from the playing field to the studio and make a decent living. They are the exception to the rule.

Then when you factor in the price their bodies pay for decades of abuse with the off season training, training camps, long regular season schedules (82 games in the NBA and NHL, 162 games in MLB, and 16 games in the NFL) and countless surgeries they undergo to glue their bodies back together to subject themselves to yet, more of this abuse it's no wonder athletes angle for larger salaries. They know that when they're playing days are over, their bodies will be in bad shape—much worse than the 42 year old math teacher in Omaha, Nebraska.

That's going to be sore in a decade or two

Lastly, when you consider the money that any given professional sports franchise makes over the course of a season and their overall net worth, the player salaries aren't as exorbitant as one might think relative to their value to that franchise. Everything from the parking, the ticket money collected at the gate, personal seat licenses, apparel, production, down to the hot dogs and beer and everything else that goes into a sporting event that generates cash is because of the athlete. These billion dollar television deals that bring in enormous revenue to these leagues and their franchises do not happen without the main attraction….the athlete.

Nobody shows up to watch coaches or owners coaching or owning. They show up to see the players which makes them far and away the most valuable asset to every franchise. This more than justifies any player's desire to make as close to his market value as possible.

Is any player worth millions of dollars per year? As long as professional sports continue to generate the billions in revenue year after year the answer is an emphatic yes. For without the athlete these billions don't exist.

So the next time you're engrossed in a conversation with someone about how you just can't believe that this player made that much money take into account the above factors at play and consider softening your stance a bit.

Performance Enhancing Drugs

It's common knowledge that today's scarlet letter in professional sports is domestic violence. Any athlete that finds himself at the center of so much as an accusation, regardless of merit, is subjected to an immediate "guilty until proven innocent" narrative which has the potential to derail and even end his career.

That scarlet letter, however, used to be steroids and still is to some extent. Any player suspected of using PEDs (performance enhancing drugs) has his name smeared through the mud. His statistics are called into question, they're dragged into court, and are turned into pariahs seemingly overnight.

Once again, I had that same mindset. Growing up, I idolized Barry Bonds. But when it became obvious he "cheated" I was among those who criticized him for it and once again, the red pill has completely changed my thinking on this.

No doubt he juiced

If you've spent enough time in the manosphere you probably now understand that steroids, HGH, and testosterone injections aren't the boogeyman the rest of the world would lead you to believe. Masculinity is under enough criticism as it is so when men find a way to increase masculinity in every way it shouldn't alarm anyone that PEDs have quickly found their way on society's shit list.

For those of you who think these substances are evil ask yourself these two questions:

1) If you were a 30 something athlete nearing the end of your career with a rookie who plays your position breathing down your neck, you know everyone around you is doing steroids and being rewarded for their performance with record breaking contracts, can you say for certain that wouldn't take the moral high ground you've been on your entire life and wouldn't so much as consider taking the needle?

2) If a doctor told you that you could take a supplement that would strengthen your bones, reduce joint pain, decrease recovery time, increase muscle, strength, and athletic performance, enhance your libido and performance between the sheets, and give you better, tighter skin you'd say no? You'd decline taking a drink from the fountain of youth?

And you'd chastise those who would answer yes to either or both of those questions?

The truth is none of us know what we would do in either of those situations unless we were actually in them. So why bag on athletes who've made the decision to improve their bodies with these substances for the purpose of enhancing their lives, improving and extending their careers and overall quality of life if we've never been in that predicament?

We all take performance enhancing drugs on some level even if it's not to the degree of testosterone or HGH. Caffeine, amphetamines (ephedra or ephedrine), whey protein, and creatine are all examples of substances taken by millions of men every day to improve their performances in their respective lives. To bash professional athletes for taking it one step further is not only silly and hypocritical but also lacks perspective and honesty.

Why do we hate athletes?

This one's simple: envy. We can talk all we want about how much money they make or how they're greedy cheaters or how they're terrible people but the fact of the matter is most of the perceived hate is nothing more than jealousy.

Pro athletes live lives of privilege. They make millions of dollars, they're physically superior to 99% of men, and have pussy literally thrown at them everywhere they go. Who among us wouldn't want that lifestyle?

But they're painted in a bad light by the media and unfortunately it's affected men everywhere. We make angry phone calls to radio shows, or tweet out some lengthy epithet about how this or that player is a terrible person because he tested positive for x-y-z substance or signed a deal worth north of $100 million because he didn't negotiate that contract in a way that makes us feel all warm and fuzzy inside.

Women who criticize athletes are equally as hypocritical. No matter what they say in public, we all know damn well they'd spread their collective lips and take as many loads of alpha seed as their uteri could handle in a New York minute if given half the chance.

Whose Side Are You On?

Understand this: I am in no way advocating worshiping professional athletes. Kids and early teenagers I give a pass to because of their youthful ignorance but 30 year old men who glorify their favorite players are mentally immature and psychologically damaged individuals on many levels.

On the other hand it makes zero sense to hate them. Simply admire them for their athletic ability and understand that they are human beings, complete with all the frailties anyone of us has. There is a happy medium and men are more than capable of finding it rather easily.

Nobody's suggesting we should feel sorry for them. Far from it. All the money, pussy, and adoration they get makes it impossible to feel any sort of sympathy for them. Though they have their trials, tribulations, and faults like everyone else don't kid yourself…life is pretty damn good for these guys.

But we as men need to stick together. Bitching about pro athletes amongst ourselves makes us look like petulant women who can't help but tear each other down if one of them happens to live a better life than we do.

Not to mention this is beta behavior. Being "against" steroids or talking about how it's a crying shame Player X makes more than Firefighters isn't going to win you any favors (pussy) from the opposite sex.

The bottom line here is that if you hate professional athletes that's a you problem. You are envious of these men and vocalization of your disdain is a beta tell. Men who are kicking life's ass have neither the time or energy to engage in this foolishness.

I used to be one of these men until I checked myself and got my mind right (read: took the red pill). Men here with that same complex would do well to do the same. It's time for us to quit hating on our allies, getting our fat, lazy asses in the gym, saving our hard earned money, and stop all this jealousy once and for all.

Leave the whining and infighting to the feminists. We're better than this, gentlemen. It's time to start acting like it.

Man Must Pay $30,000 Child Support For Someone Else’s Kid

Imagine a story that starts in 1987. Unbeknownst to you, your ex-girlfriend fraudulently claims you are the father of her child to “earn” welfare payments. In 1991, you realize for the first time that you’re a “dad” because a cop has pulled you over and says you’re a deadbeat parent who owes thousands in child support. Meanwhile, your scheming ex has received thousands in taxpayer funds as a result of her hideous lie.

Oh, but it gets worse! You’re incarcerated on another matter and a court server falsifies a document to make it look as if you refused to sign a court summons about the so-called child support debt. But how could you have? You were in jail. Once released from prison, you’re unable to track down the mother who’s your ex and the court-provided address for her is the wrong one.

You finally find your alleged baby mama in 2013 and a DNA test proves that you are not the father, and the woman freely admits she took you for a ride. Worse still, the real father is and has been involved in the now adult kid’s life.

Now guess what? You’re about to meet a judge with a broom so far up her ass that it’s touching both her spinal cord and the moon. And she’s making you pay $30,000 in backdated child support to that scamming ex of yours. All while falsely impugning your character and rubbing pounds of salt into your festering emotional and financial wounds.

Behold! A terrible human being named Kathleen McCarthy.

Meet a truly unlucky man

Thankfully for you, a casual observer, the man in this case, and it's a very, very real case, is named Carnell Alexander, a resident of Detroit. The details of the situation are truly gut-wrenching [1] [2] [3].

"I am outraged that Mr. Alexander for two and a half decades failed to take this matter seriously," bellowed Judge Kathleen McCarthy, who is now the leading contender for Bitch of the Century for her psychopathic condemnations.

McCarthy's "outrage" stems from Alexander's inability to appeal the paternity and child support issues earlier, as legally required within three years. Yet given the two massive frauds of both the ex and the server, not to mention Alexander's poverty and deprived education, it's hard to share her sense of being offended if you haven't been sniffing gasoline for a year.

The reason we have lawyers is because most people, understandably, lack the requisite legal knowledge in an increasingly complex and technical world. And the cost of seeking this knowledge through an attorney is usually prohibitive for the most upper middle-class families, let alone a poverty-stricken African-American from the Detroit area.

News reports allege that Alexander has but an eighth grade education. Even if he were college-educated, the idea that he should be held responsible for a welfare-scamming ex, a forgery-loving server and the false address information provided by the court system itself is as fanciful as the Philadelphia 76ers going on a 30 week winning streak.

Blame where no blame exists

Importantly, again, Alexander was destitute for much of the time since the birth of the child. At one stage he had been released from prison and didn't have a penny to his name. Inasmuch as he has made some poor life choices in other areas, an indigent person such as him has committed neither a fraud nor another injustice worthy of McCarthy's disdain and inhumane vitriol.

We cannot blame McCarthy for the law itself, which often rules squarely and dispassionately against common sense and any shred of fairness. But judges routinely, through what is known as obiter dicta, opine on aspects of the law not central to the determination of the case, which is called the ratio decidendi. For example, U.S. District Court Judge Orlando Garcia described the future legalization of gay marriage as a march towards equality, but was still forced to enter a stay upholding the present one-man, one-woman law.

Obiter dicta, which are often phrased sympathetically towards the losing party or side, can be found across all forms of law, even in the most banal commercial cases.

If Judge McCarthy had said her hands were tied, someone aware of a judicial officer's limitations could understand her position and defend it based on the separation of powers. She is, after all, only there to interpret the law. But the draconian way in which she treated Alexander, a victim of two gargantuan moral, if not criminal frauds, is beyond the pale and evinces a clearly anti-male bias in her reasoning. The mother and ex, a professional scam artist and clear sadist, received nothing of the same rebuke.

…and the welfare and other frauds it inspires.

Men are fourth-class citizens in family courts

As you must already know, Alexander's plight is far from the first not only unfair but moronic anti-male family court debacle. Take the older case of Ari Schochet. His court-ordered alimony and child support payments were astronomical, but affordable when he was earning the magical sum of $1 million per annum. But when the economy and his business both tanked, funds were harder to come by.

The lifetime nature of his alimony meant that the rate was locked in, irrespective of how much he was earning on an ongoing basis in years subsequent. Consequently, he frequently found himself in jail for “missed” payments based on his formerly huge but now vastly depleted income.

The only plus here is that Carnell Alexander’s loss and humiliation over nearly three decades will shine further light on a hysterical and virulently anti-male family legal process. In the meantime, let’s hope and pray that the man finally begins to receive the support and solace so long denied to him.

The One Way To Build True Confidence

The following article was sponsored by Freeman's Fitness

Mention the topic of how to create confidence and some of the most common answers are dress better, groom yourself, and improve your posture. These techniques may help you to start building confidence, but they will not do much for you unless you step over the line into challenges. Real confidence is only built by taking on challenges, pushing yourself further than before, and being outside of your comfort zone. Anything less is just mental masturbation.

In the same way as working out, confidence is built by constant progress. You can buy all the best gym gear, have all the best gym equipment and read all about the best techniques to gain muscle, but you will never gain any strength or muscle until you actually push your body and work out harder and harder each time. Confidence is no different—we must strive to challenge ourselves.

The modern day gives us many comforts and taking the easy way out generally leads to a lack of confidence. Life is so comfortable and people can get by without doing anything remotely challenging for the most part.

Want to meet a girl? Why talk to a real one on the street just message one on Facebook or look at some porn. Need some food? Why go out hunting when you can just pick it up from the store. Without some hardship and the ability to push through the pain barrier, be it physical or mental, we weaken ourselves and our confidence suffers as a result.

Action Builds Confidence

You cannot simply read about confidence, buy some nice clothes, stand up straight, and expect have developed any sort of real confidence. You have to keep challenging yourself; putting 5kg more on your deadlift or squat, running further and faster than before, expanding your business each year or improving your skills. If you are not challenging yourself to do more and more then you will not be growing in your confidence!

This is where many of us start to build confidence, especially if we were not very confident during our younger years. Lifting weights and getting strong makes us know that we capable and helps us to understand that we need challenge to grow. The big compound lifts are great not just physically, but also because it requires a lot more effort and confidence to hit a 200kg (440lb for you Americans) deadlift than it does to do lat pulldowns on a machine.

Weight lifting is not the only way to challenge yourself physically. On top of regular strength training in my gym, I regularly go for 1.5-2 hour trail runs, large hikes, and do strongman style workouts to push myself. These are tough to accomplish and contrary to popular belief won't make you lose your strength. Pushing yourself through regular physical exercise means that you will develop the confidence that you can take on any physical challenge that comes your way.

For help with exercise and nutrition, check out my online personal training program here.

Outdoor activities

I have been a firefighter for seven years and I am also part of a specialist team of firefighters who use helicopter insertion techniques. We winch into remote regions in small teams and build firebreaks with hand tools in 40+ degree C weather. This sort of thing is physically and mentally grueling and is a great confidence building activity.

There are many outdoor activities that require challenge. Long distance hikes, hunting (especially with a bow), basic survival-style camping. Anything that is hard to do is worth doing! Being outdoors is a big change from our comfortable suburban existence. It gives us a rest from the internet world and puts us into a more primal environment. The view was worth the five-hour trek up hills.

Your personal challenge

We all have different interests and hobbies and they can all be useful in helping us gain confidence. Your personal confidence boosting activities will be related to the things you want to improve most. Examples of this are public speaking, meeting new people, building a successful business, becoming better at a skill set, being a better father, the list goes on.

Whichever area you want to improve upon you must take stock of where you are at. Let's say you want to improve your public speaking ability to assist your professional life. Currently you don't do any regular public speaking at all and shy away from it. The only way to improve this is to build confidence by actively speaking in as many situations as possible, with bigger and bigger audiences and improving your ability and range of topics. Reading about techniques won't cut it, you have to get out there and start doing it immediately.

Persistence and Failure

The other part of building confidence that you need to develop is persistence so that you can destroy the fear of failure. We will all fail throughout our lives. The confident ones will learn from their failure and push forward even harder than before. Each time your confidence building activity doesn't work out, take account of what happened and ensure you work towards improving it next time.

Stop talking, Start DOING

The most important part of building confidence is actually acting upon what you need to do. Take stock of where you are at in life now and where you want to be. Maybe you want to improve your public speaking, become physically stronger, or talk to more women.

Whatever it may be, work out what it is and what you need to start doing today to improve upon it.

Confidence builds upon itself. The hardest steps are at the beginning but we must push ourselves constantly to go outside what feels comfortable and move into dangerous territory. Strive to take action daily to push yourself outside your comfort zone. A life of constant comfort is a life of weakness and will lead to a generation of weak, ill confident men.

7 Films Featuring The Ultimate Badasses

February 24, 2015 | by Ario Barzan | Link | Original Link

Fiction icons stimulate us and can often even inspire us. Film is a great medium to tell a narrative, is visceral, often surreal and sticks with you long after. You often remember a film because of its great storytelling pushed along but its great characters. Many such characters have been dark, masculine, and extremely Alpha. They get want they want and often don't give a fuck how. The ends ALWAYS justify the means for them.

Even though we don't wish to emulate their largely antisocial behaviors, we can learn a bit from watching these unusual men in action. Here are some of the finest examples of such characters within modern filmmaking. Yes, there are plenty more, and please give your thoughts on those in the comments section after the article. WARNING: SPOILERS!

Conan (Conan The Barbarian, 1982)

The Hyborean Age. As a young boy, Conan was taught by his didactic father the he could trust only his sword and nothing that breathes, and watches his village burn and his parents killed at the hands of snake cult leader Thulsa Doom and his raiding Vanir riders.

Sold into a youth of slavery grinding grain, then as a pit fighter pet as a young adult, Conan gets set free with only one goal in mind: revenge. Along the way he meets companions and is rather indifferent to them (he even abandons his woman without warning at one point), showcases an odd relationship with his god Crom, sheds no tears over the death of his woman, and after killing Thulsa Doom and his top brass sits down stone-faced and contemplative before burning down Thulsa Doom's fortress and wandering the lands in search of more adventure.

Khan Noonien Singh (Star Trek II: The Wrath of Khan, 1982)

Abandoned by a man he once trusted on a hostile planet, Khan and his loyal band of followers lie in wait for years before confronting Kirk and the crew of The Enterprise, and the hunt plays out in true Captain Ahab fashion in one of the greatest sequels in cinematic history (granted, the first film was quite the borefest as is).

Khan's vengeance is not only to serve himself, but also his beloved and loyal crew members. With a cool demeanor and menacing glare, Khan plots and calculates like a bird of prey (pun intended? Perhaps!) to get his revenge, only to go out in a blaze of glory quoting Captain Ahab with his last few breaths. At least Spock served as collateral damage of sorts in the end.

Richard Kuklinski (The Iceman, 2013)

Poor Little Richard. Dubbing porn films actually shot on film (I bet some gems were in there!) for the mob, Richard displays sociopathic behavior on the regular and gets sucked into doing hits for the mob instead. His wife and two daughters are completely ignorant of his "extracurricular" activities.

As much of a loose cannon as he is, Richard puts family above all and wants them to have the best of everything, even a private school education! Cross Richie and it doesn't matter who you are, you're going down, fast. Mob boss, mob crony, competitive hitman, anytime, anywhere. An undercover sting operation catches Richie and he gets sentences to two life sentences, never seeing his family again and languishing in prison before dying suspiciously right before he was due to confess against the Gambinos. Makes you wonder…

Tony Montana (Scarface, 1983)

Tony came from rather humble beginnings as a refugee during the last decade of Communism's yoke on half of the world, and at the nascent era of cocaine's glitz and glamor in Miami. Keen on the art of survival and cunning like a fox, Tony worked his way from menial jobs to building a cartel empire that reached all throughout the Americas, often stomping on whoever got in his way.

His unwavering devotion to a rather naïve sister and misunderstanding mother show how important family is to him, and his cronies are well taken care of. Tony's morals kick in when put on the spot to take out a group that includes a wife and children in a very "direct" way. In the end, Montana goes out in a fury of one-liners and a hail of bullets, standing his ground to the bitter end.

Lou Bloom (Nightcrawler, 2014)

A man without scruples, Lou is as sleazy as it gets. A wordsmith, a charmer, a fast talker, Lou's only goals seems to be money, and whatever he can use as cannon fodder in the process will do just fine. Living in a less than friendly area of Los Angeles, Bloom has no hesitations about pillaging and plundering to advance his agenda.

Starting with a crappy second-hand camcorder, Lou chases bloody, newsworthy scenes and sells the footage for a substantial sum only he can settle for. His car gets nicer, he sacrifices his awkward assistant's life for a few shots of a story about a pair of murderers on the run, and in the end has a full team with video production vans at his disposal.

Patrick Bateman (American Psycho, 2000)

The odd man of this list, Bateman is your typical Manhattan spoiled brat socialite but with inner demons he often isn't shy to display. Being into "murders and decapitations" (a play on "mergers and acquisitions"), Bateman gallivants around The Capital of the World cavorting every which way and indulging in the finest and most expensive of everything under The Sun (legal or not).

In true OCD-fashion must have every item pristine, set a certain way, and has to one-up everybody else within earshot. Delivering some of the most memorable lines ever, Bateman's slow descent into madness is shown in a very comical yet still jarring way. Yet in the end, it was all just in his head. The nightmare continues.

Daniel Plainview (There Will Be Blood, 2007)

Daniel is an opportunist, an oil prospector during California's oil boom of the last century. A mishap in New Mexico is mitigated by news of a potential large deposit in California, and what a large deposit it is. Daniel slowly starts acting like a stereotypical oil tycoon, displaying megalomania and even threatening the lives of others if they dare say anything he can interpret as in insult.

He doesn't hesitate to show his disdain for religion and mankind in general any opportunity he gets. Even his son isn’t spared his wrath, as he berates him and reveals to him that he was adopted and is glad he has none of his genes. The ending has the by now tiresome “I drink your milkshake” line of many stupid internet memes and a rather silly bowling alley sequence, and after Daniel throws one last tirade he sits down and simply tells his assistant “I’m done”.

Two Common Objections To Game

February 25, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Writing regularly for Return of Kings, I notice two objections to game that come up frequently in the comments section. I thought it would be useful to discuss them both in detail and relay my thoughts on them.

1. “Game pumps girls’ egos and inflates the price of pussy”

Some guys, whenever they read an article that advises approaching women frequently in order to get good or to maximize your chances of success, will argue that doing so is counterproductive. Women’s egos are sky high with constant Facebook and Instagram likes, Tinder matches, and so on. This is why they are frequently bitchy and entitled. Approaching ad nauseam simply increases their entitlement, worsening their attitude and consequently making it harder for other guys to get laid.

If we stopped feeding girls’ egos through game, the argument goes, then they would be less in love with themselves and some balance would be restored in a sexual marketplace that is spiraling out of control.

It is slightly odd how in a community where many men would suckle on the withered teat of Ayn Rand herself, so enthused are they about the “every man for himself” principles of self-determination in business, that when it comes to women, a much more egalitarian, socialist ideal is insisted upon. “Men shouldn’t fuck one another over,” we are told. “Don’t stroke girls’ egos unnecessarily and make it more difficult for everyone else.”

Would you approach?

Now, I am certainly not one for sabotaging other men's efforts – quite the contrary – but to me this is baloney.

For one thing, hot girls are validated constantly from their teenage years until at least their late-twenties anyway. Imagine for a second being a sexy twenty-three-year-old walking down a subway platform, all those eyes flicking in your direction, heads turning, smiles. Yes, social media may arguably have exacerbated the problem, but I remember the days before Facebook, and believe me, cute girls still thought they were the shit.

The vast majority of men are unable to help giving out some sign of their attraction, even if only on a subliminal level. And girls are highly attuned to picking up on the smallest physical and social cues. Trust me – letting her know that you're into her by approaching is a drop in the ocean.

And even if it did make a difference – how many guys do you think are actively out there in the field taking action on the stuff they read on ROK and other sites? It's a distressingly small proportion. I think Krauser estimates that only 5% of men who come into contact with game material do anything about it, and even fewer practice consistently.

In London where I live you can observe the hardcore daygamers out in force on Oxford Street doing “Yad stops” (Google it) and whatever else. But in other districts women hardly ever get approached. I have long told people that the tube is a goldmine for pick-up, and it is – I’ve gotten so many lays from public transport that I’d find it hard to recount them all. But as few have the balls to chat to girls there it’s almost an open goal. Far from pumping womens’ egos to preposterous levels, serious practitioners of game are in an extreme minority.

More important, though, is one’s mental attitude. If you want anything in life, you have to fight for it. I believe as much in sexual entrepreneurialism as I do in any other positive endeavour. I have no interest in limiting opportunities for other guys, but at the same time if I want something then I’m going to damn well go for it. That is a mindset you should develop too.

Of course we foster a community here for men to support one another, but at the end of the day, every guy must carve out his own destiny. That means stepping up to the plate and pursuing your desires, be they business-orientated, artistic, or sexual. The people who complain about this attitude are the same people who sit around complaining about guys with rich parents having a better start in life, rather than getting off their asses, working hard, and making something of themselves.

If you go out and approach girls regularly, you are not inflating the price of sexual access: rather, you are creating opportunities for yourself in the market.

2. “Learning game is a waste of time. You’re better off developing yourself as a man so the chicks will come to you”

Other guys, when presented with an article about game, will make this argument – that rather than wasting God knows how many hours chasing pussy, you’re better off doing something more constructive like studying, starting a business and so on. Actually, this is a viewpoint that I have some sympathy with. As anyone who has read David Deida’s The Way of the Superior Man will know (and all guys should) the most important thing a man can do is have a mission in his life that is unconnected with women.

If you genuinely decide that your sole focus (for now) is building that business, writing that symphony or climbing Kilimanjaro then by all means eschew women for that pursuit. I completely agree that such achievements far outweigh the mere scoring of pussy.

But – and it’s a big but – if you are secretly hoping that by making something of yourself women will flock to you, then I’m afraid you are wrong. Unless you become genuinely A-list famous then you will still have to graft like the rest of us – for the hottest girls, at least. As I’ve said before, I have friends who are extremely rich, good-looking, and accomplished who, lacking in game, have as much difficulty attracting women as anyone else.

You see, what getting girls really comes down to is creating attraction and escalating within a personal interaction. This is the same whether you are a barman or a millionaire. If you have spent ten years staring at a laptop screen building a business, then you will be no better equipped than the guy who lives in his mom’s basement and has severe social issues.

No time for girls, I'm working on my business

Some men will then advocate avoiding the market altogether through a simple strategy – pay for play. Rich, successful guys have always paid for sex, the argument goes. Why waste time on the vicissitudes of pussy chasing when you can simply pay for the services of a 10 for $500?

Now, personally, I have no issue with men wishing to use prostitutes either to supplement their normal sexual diet, or as their sole outlet if they wish – although this is certainly not something we promote here at ROK. But in the end, men can make their own decisions and do what they want. My only observation would be that sex with a hooker, no matter how attractive, is in most cases qualitatively inferior to sex with a willing, aroused partner who you have gamed successfully. ROK commentator Hernan Cortez had this to say when I made a similar point last week – I hope he won't mind me quoting him here :

> 'If paying for sex is not good enough, you simply confirm my previous points. This is not merely about a biological urge to have sex. No you see, in your mind set, its not enough to get sex. This is about wanting female acceptance. And hookers don't "Accept" you they just fuck you for money [but] that won't do.'

If there is a craving for "female acceptance" in wanting to fuck girls who actually like you, then I would argue that it is small. Most alphas I have known have got off on the fact that girls are attracted to them, even to the point of boasting about it to me and others. And yet they would scoff at the notion that their wider sense of self was in any way validated by a mere woman.

Of course there is an ego-boost inherent in a hot chick wanting you—I would say that this is natural for most men, alphas and betas alike, and it's something you don't get with prostitutes (in most cases). But most importantly, sex is almost always better with a woman who is aroused and genuinely wants to be there rather than with a paid bit-part actress who's simply going through the motions, however attractive she may be. So while a man may save time on gaming by getting in hired help, the quality of the sex his achieves through this strategy is likely to be lacking.

Overall advice

The best advice I can give is to work on yourself and game at the same time. By all means improve yourself as a man, but also recognize that pick-up doesn't need to involve seven hour nightclub stints every evening. An hour after work or on a break and a couple of approaches a day is all you need to improve and start to see results. Roosh has recommended one approach a day before. Getting into a routine and sticking to it consistently will lead to an upswing in your performance and results in no time.

Today, game is unavoidable. If you want to get laid with good-looking girls with any regularity, you need at least a working knowledge of it, and to have practiced it consistently over time. Stepping up to the plate can be hard and there are no shortcuts. Luckily, the internet is now awash with good quality advice and support. A decade or so ago this was not the case, so those learning now are fortunate.

While some guys make interesting and articulate points about the inflation of pussy stock through excessive gaming, and the benefits of avoiding the pick-up melee entirely in favor more important pursuits, my suspicion is that they do so to intellectually support their own reluctance to man up and face female rejection by approaching. If you want a regular and varied sex life, you can't afford to entertain the same mindset.

UK Government Funds Feminist Agitprop With “This Girl Can” Campaign

The latest arm of the UK government to fall under the feminist spell is Sport England, a quasi non-Governmental Organisation (“Quango”) funded by the Treasury and National Lottery and tasked with promoting sport in England. It is running an advertising campaign address the so-called gender gap in women’s participation in sport.

The method used is placing adverts on TV and a series of highly visible outdoor posters showing women doing some sporting activity. Through the obnoxious slogans, the campaign manages to be both alienating to men and patronising to women. Some examples of the outdoor posters follow.

The empowering allusion to violence against male genitalia

The delusion that this is anyone’s idea of hot

The actual hot

The fish rots from the head down

The Quangocrat heading Sport England is Jennie Price. She is paid a modest annual salary of £128,333 to oversee the distribution of a £1billion five-yearly budget to different sports projects across England. The rationale behind the decision to give ad agency FCB Inferno a chunk of this money to execute this campaign is given by Price:

> We looked very carefully at what women were saying about why they felt sport and exercise was not for them. One of the strongest themes was a fear of judgment. Worries about being judged for for being the wrong size, not fit enough and not skilled enough came up time and time again. We want to address that.

Jennie Price, a smug feminist in a highly-paid public sector job.

Price, who peppers her promotion of This Girl Can with calling-card phrases like “gender gap” and “women and girls,” seems to consider women to be mental inadequates incapable of overcoming imaginary mental barriers which prevent them from doing sport. Government must therefore intervene to mollycoddle these women into removing their fat arses from the sofa. Price continues:

> This Girl Can celebrates the women who are doing their thing no matter how they do it, how they look or even how sweaty they get. They’re here to inspire us to wiggle, jiggle, move and prove that judgement is a barrier that can be overcome.

What judgement? In my time spent in gyms and dojos, I have never experienced or overheard any judgement of out-of-shape newcomers. When I started training as a novice at a BJJ club, rather than judge me for my incompetence, senior belts went out of their way to show me the ropes.

In sports, an amateur will be made aware of his place in the hierarchy, such as ahead of major competitions. In combat sports, for example, experienced fighters get picky about who they spar with, a fighters vs. non-fighters split forms in the gym, and so on. That’s the nature of competitive sport, and not a reason to take things to heart. It’s not always about you, the special snowflake.

Real athletes direct their judgment inward, to their own performance. If people exist who intentionally give newcomers to the gym, the dojo or the club a hard time, they are not athletes, they are arseholes. Dealing with arseholes is a part of adult life. It is not for government to cajole and mollycoddle citizens who are paralysed by the remote possibility of having to dealing with a living, breathing arsehole.

Full Fat Ahead

The worst Shakespeare reference in history.

This Girl Can continues the initiative to shoehorn fat acceptance ideology into UK public discourse. The "I jiggle, therefore I am" spot features an obese female engaging in the notoriously effective weight-loss method of jogging. Kim Gehrig director of the video ads, says she "wanted to make the first advert that ever celebrated cellulite." Leanne Flinn, a casting director, says: "Our focus was on finding real women doing what they do… rather than adopt the kind of Nike/Adidas take on athletes which, for some, though aspirational is also quite alienating."

The message is confusing: This Girl Can is a celebration of women doing sport and also a celebration of out-of-shape women. It is an initiative to help women overcome their fear of judgment and also a judgment aimed at women who succeed in their ambition to look good. The latter are, apparently, not "real" women. In propaganda, logical integrity is not a priority.

The impossibility of pleasing everyone

Considering that the standard for what constitutes politically correct thinking seems to change by the hour, it is unsurprising that some feminists reacted negatively to This Girl Can. The flak came from Jessica Francombe-Webb, a career academic with an interest in "body image and identity politics" and Simone Fullagar, a self-described "interdisciplinary sociologist" with "a particular focus on gender and diversity issues" relating to sport and leisure. The pair saw some "serious problems" with the campaign, like women being referred to as "girls." They also complain about the slogans, which are:

> infused with popular post-feminist appeals to individual empowerment – "I jiggle, > therefore I am". This "can-do girl" is happy "sweating like a pig, feeling like a fox" and embracing being "hot and not bothered".

The TV ads similarly have "serious problems": they are too similar to pop music videos "where highly mobile, athletic female bodies are performing for a male audience":

> This sits uneasily with our concerns about the objectification of the female body. Research has shown that physical activity in the pursuit of desirability is something women eagerly "work on" under the auspices of the male gaze.

Stripped of the pseudo-intellectual language, Fullagar and Francombe-Webb's message is that women often try to improve their physiques through exercise for the benefit of the men they desire. For once, it seems like an organisation with a feminist agenda (Sport England) has used heterosexual desire to promote its work. For these two experts, however, this is sailing too close to the wind. To imply that women self-improve out of a desire to sexually please men means to accept innate differences between the sexes, a form of blasphemy to gender feminists.

The scholars go on to bemoan the fact that some fatties will remain fatties: "What is troubling about the hallmark of "have-it-all" femininity is that such identities are not equally available to all or equally desired by all women." The campaign, they say, is "push[ing] a neoliberal rhetoric of 'free choice' to look a certain way, or move in a certain way; yet the choices available are narrow, restrictive and predicated on a narrow version of sexiness."

Permanent revolution

To this priestly caste of grievance-mongers, no single, static order of things can possibly be acceptable. Women are "objectified" by the "male gaze" causing them anguish eating disorders. The solution to this? Body acceptance. Guzzle down high-calorie coffee products and cake, let your weight balloon and then make men culpable for not finding your repulsive physique attractive.

When heffalumps are clogging up GP's surgeries and studiously avoiding physical exercise, a new solution is needed: pay advertising professionals to convince them to take exercise. However, you must do it in the right way. If women are motivated to get in shape by the prospect of increased male desire, that is "problematic" to theorists like Fullagar and Francombe-Webb, so the baby is thrown out with the bathwater and the search for solutions begins anew.

Conclusion

A feminist counter-argument might say:

> But Gumbril, as a reactionary heterosexual male with a patriarchal ideal of the feminine physique, you should welcome a campaign like This Girl Can because it will create more fit, slim, healthy women.

It’s a tempting argument, but insufficient. The promotion of sport is a legitimate aim, but a project like This Girl Can siphons money away from real investment, whilst generating headlines for pharaonic pen-pushers like Jennie Price. Why build a new football pitch when you can fund a team to produce nice posters?

This Girl Can shows us how state-funded feminism works as a jobs programme for bureaucrats and their enablers in the creative industries. The sooner these vanity projects are torn up and the money redirected to tangible things that benefit both sexes, the better. I won’t hold my breath.

Understanding The Ideology Behind The Islamic State

February 25, 2015 | by Aristodemos Hanno | Link | Original Link

On 29 June, 2014, the group known at the time to the world as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (also known alternatively as the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, or more correctly, the Islamic State of Iraq and Al-Sham, i.e. ISIS), under the leadership of its Emir (roughly meaning commander or leader) Abu Bakr Al Baghdadi declared a caliphate and changed its name to simply the Islamic State.

This event received a good amount of public attention at the time, even though most commentators did not fully comprehend just how monumental this announcement was. In my opinion, this new Caliphate declared last year represents the single biggest threat to almost all other geopolitical entities across the world.

Even though the Islamic State has gained widespread media attention across the globe due to regular executions of foreign captives and an often violent implementation of what some say is an ultra-orthodox interpretation of Islamic Law, all this coverage has generally been very emotional and shallow, lacking in-depth analysis of what is really going on.

I believe that it is quite pointless to simply feel outraged and keep responding with criticism of this group's ways. This is because most people already realize that an organization such as the Islamic State is deeply motivated against principles and values which much of the rest of the world holds dear; such media attention does not serve to generate intelligent discussion that will enable people to understand the true gravity of the threat posed to them.

Instead, what is required is that everyone, or at the very least, policymakers, begin to understand the Ideology that has spawned this group. This will enable a response that is likely to be more successful and also, importantly, less costly in both blood and money.

Historical Roots

Greatest extent of the Rashidun Caliphate

I will begin my explanation of the Islamic State's Ideology by firstly talking about certain key developments in early Islamic History.

In the year 632, the final Prophet of Islam Muhammad, died, leaving behind a state that dominated almost the entire Arabian Peninsula. He was succeeded by one of his companions, Abu Bakr, who established the first Islamic Caliphate, and was followed by three successors as head of this State. These four caliphs came to be known as the Rashidun Caliphs, a term which in its original Arabic means the "rightly-guided" Caliphs.

The Rashidun period was marked by steady expansionism, leading to humiliating defeats for the Byzantine and Sassanid Persian Empires, both being world superpowers at the time. This period also witnessed the emergence of an organized Islamic system of law and administration and for many Muslims, especially Islamists, the Rashidun Caliphate was the only true Islamic caliphate in history.

The Ideological Framework

In modern times, a growing Islamic movement that looks upon the Rashidun period as a golden age is the movement known as Salafism or Salafiyyah. The Salafis preach the most orthodox version of Islam that you can find today. Their name comes from the Arabic word "salaf" which literally means "ancestor"; they're named so because they claim to follow the first three generations of Muslims, who are referred to as the Salaf.

It is their belief that a true Muslim must be guided in all aspects of his life by the Quran and the Sunnah (the teachings and practices of Prophet Muhammad). In this regard, they strive to emulate the Salaf because they believe that the Salaf were near perfect in their following of the Quran and the Sunnah.

Interestingly, Salafism is the official version of Islam that is propagated in nearly all the Gulf Monarchies— countries that are supposed to be staunch US allies. They share this variety of Islam with another set of people, that is, the Salafi-Jihadis.

The most well known example of a Salafi Jihadi group is Al Qaeda, which has for many years now been the biggest terrorist threat to the United States and its allies. Al Qaeda and its Salafi Jihadi franchises and allies such as Al Shabab, the Caucasus Emirate, Ansar al Sharia etc. do not see the supporters and defenders of the Gulf Monarchies as true Salafis, labeling them "Sheikhists," or "Murjites" (coming from the Arabic word Murjiah, meaning, "those who delay implementation of the faith").

The Salafis in general, and the Salafi Jihadis in particular, do not believe that the majority of the world's population that describes themselves to be Muslims, is Muslim at all. They believe that true Muslims are actually a tiny minority of the people who claim to be Muslims—due to their perception that most of these people have abandoned the path of Tawhid ("monotheism") and are in fact practically polytheists. These supposed "pretend Muslims" are treated with the utmost contempt, especially Shias, who are viewed as the worst of the lot.

This is the reason why every week, in a number of Muslim countries, hundreds of civilians die and many more are maimed in bombings and shooting sprees carried out by Salafi Jihadi groups. It is also the reason why you will have difficulty finding many Shias in territory controlled by the Islamic State's caliphate, even though you may still find some Christians left; the Islamic State today perhaps being the most anti-Shia Salafi Jihadi group in the world.

The Objective Of World Domination

The future according to the Islamic State

Due to its Ideology of Salafi Jihadism, the Islamic State wishes to bring back what it believes was the golden age during the Rashidun period, through the means of defensive as well as offensive jihad. Though the group has had a separation from Al Qaeda and others due to differences about the timing of declaring a caliphate, it still remains a formidable force which has withstood the attacks of its various enemies.

There is no basis for ideas such as democracy and equality in Salafi-Jihadi doctrine. This is because their literal interpretation of the Quran and the Sunnah sees therein no room for such ideas, but rather, the goal of putting every single piece of land across the world under the authority of the caliphate, and thus, establish the rule of Allah throughout the world.

This understanding leads us towards one conclusion: the caliphate established by the Islamic State will keep on fighting with cold steadfastness to remove every single other geopolitical entity from the face of the Earth. It is not going to be appeased. It will not change the way it rules. It is not going to stop until either it has been decisively defeated and decimated, or the entire world has been conquered.

Grab Your F*cking Nuts

February 25, 2015 | by Charlie Bena | Link | Original Link

Greg Plitt was a fitness model known for many things. From his ridiculously chiseled physique that allowed him to grace the cover of countless health and fitness magazines, to his amped-up motivational videos challenging people to transform their lives through attitude and dedication. He was a man that represented progression and never settled for anything less.

But perhaps the one thing I miss and remember him most for is looking into the camera in the middle of an almost-breathless workout sermon and yelling to the viewer,

"G*rab your fucking nuts!!!"*

I recently felt those words pound the back of my head and send a jolt of energy through my testosterone. I was enjoying Happy Hour in the company of a few coworkers and taking advantage of one of my four complimentary drinks. At my table were seated three men, ranging in ages from late 40s to mid 50s. Two of them were married and seemingly quite pleased with their lives. The other was thirstier than a third-world soccer player who had played a full 90-minute game due to being cheated on by his girlfriend.

As I sat there helplessly listening to a 50-something's sob story about a woman 10 years his junior, a cute brunette bartender was standing some 20 feet away from me. She was about five-foot-four with a chest that would make any white guy proud. She turned around so I naturally glanced over to see what she was working with from behind. She had the kind of ass that any self-respecting man, especially one of color like myself, could appreciate. I took notice. So did all 3 of my companions.

"He is single," yelled one of them.

"And gainfully employed," added another.

The cheated one added,

"You know, he is a really great guy. You should give him your number."

The alcohol-fueled debauchery was typical when in the presence of an attractive woman and older guys, particularly married ones. Men who insisted such antics were justified through their belief of temporarily living vicariously through a young single man. Someone that perhaps reminded them of a time when life may have been a bit simpler. Maybe they were younger or more fit or at least felt that way.

Regardless of what it was, it never bothered me. I often went along with the whole thing and the show would usually subside after a few feeble attempts to get Miss X's attention. This time, however, that would not be the case.

The taunting grew louder and more aggressive in tone. One of the guys went up to the young lady and asked for her number and then insisted on getting an answer when she did not comply. After that, he went back again and tried a second time insisting I "deserved" it and she would owe it to herself to give me a shot. Three guesses as to which Casanova pulled that stunt off.

All of a sudden, these guys are asking me loudly if I would like her number and repeatedly commenting on her beauty as if I was sitting several rows beneath them at Yankee stadium. I caught the girl making several uncomfortable faces and trying to disguise her emotions with bursts of nervous laughter. It was indeed a painful sight to see and hear for those around but even worse to endure.

After witnessing my other coworker make his rounds to remind her about my presence yet again, I had about all I could take and was ready to put an end to the whole spectacle. I did not need anyone playing “match-maker” for me and much less in the way these guys were going about it. I did find the bartender attractive but didn’t want to approach her in a way that made it seem I was being “peer-pressured” by my three coaches.

Maybe it was the fact that I was being tested or just wanting to enjoy the rest of my free drinks minus the buzz kill but whatever it was, I suddenly heard the phrase “grab your fucking nuts” and my legs began to move.

The Action

Even the fact that I was in crutches couldn’t deter me. I had so many thoughts and emotions going through my head as I made my way to her that I didn’t even know what was going to come out of my mouth. I mean, sure, she was hot and a notch from her would undoubtably earn a VIP slot on the belt, but to approach her in such a manner after such heckling went completely against my MO. I had more swag in my game, but at the same time, didn’t even know what was “right” anymore as I re-played the entire fiasco in my mind. The trip was short and I stood face to face with her before I knew it.

“Hey” I started with a smile. “Regardless of what you may think, I have never seen those men in my life until today. I promise you.”

Against all odds, my confession was met with a laugh and bashful glance that, to my surprise, broke down her barrier and opened the door for a natural conversation. It would go on for several minutes and end with us making plans for a future date and a kiss from me to her.

The experience taught me great things can happen when we are challenged, but only if you are wiling to take a risk. That risk, no matter how well calculated, might not always give you what you desire but it always gives something. If you win, you achieve satisfaction. If you fail, you become wiser. Remember to embrace the unexpected next time you may be faced with an obstacle or fearful of an outcome.

Grab your fucking nuts and take a risk! You may be surprised what you get out of it.

The Academy Awards Reminds Me Again Why I Don’t Watch Movies

February 26, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

When was the last time I watched the Oscars? Probably never. I don’t know any of the movies, and the actors’ clothing is uninteresting to me. Do men watch the Oscars? Apparently some do, but I have better ways to waste my life. I’ve heard though that the commentary is about more than prom dresses, so maybe there’s a good justification to tune in.

I Hate Movies

Some seven or eight years ago, a movie about gay people won an award or was nominated. It was either Milk or Brokeback Mountain. I can’t remember which. Probably both. I knew literally no one that saw them except my secular-liberal Catholic aunt, who went with her suburban housewife friends from the parish.

I figured out early on as a teenager that the Academy Awards was all politics, so I lost all interest in it. If they were going to support movies based on social consciousness and not artistic merit, then the whole system had no credibility in my eyes. Same thing the first time I opened Rolling Stone magazine. People get pissy about their listing of the 500 greatest albums or the UVA hoax, but I wasn’t aware anyone read Rolling Stone anymore.

I’ve also noticed over time that the more rave reviews a movie receives, the worse of a movie it is. Everybody and their kid brother told me The Avengers was amazing. I’m not much of one for superheroes or special effects, but I decided to see it anyway because of all I heard.

Turns out the whole thing was two battle scenes with no real plot or character development. I kept waiting it to turn good, for the plot to pick up or for a character to learn an important lesson I can apply in my own life, but aside from a few lines from Captain America, the whole thing was boring and sterile.

Remember that scene from season 15 of South Park where Stan is watching previews to the movies and all he sees is shit? That whole two-part episode is the story of my life.

If I want to see a movie, I'll wait until it's in the cheapo theater or just buy it on DVD for $15. I haven't paid to see a just-released movie since The Dark Knight Rises, and I probably won't again until Love And Mercy comes out this summer. If I'm going to piss away $11.50, I can make a bottle of bourbon last far longer than a two-hour movie.

Patricia Arquette's Political Pandering And The Left's Cannibalism

So this year a wealthy actress named Patricia Arquette won an award and said something about equal pay for women in her acceptance speech that ideally is supposed to be about film-making. This obviously was immediately praised by feminists and celebrities. The best part is that she implied people have fought too much for blacks' and gays' rights, so by the next day the rest of the internet liberals were attacking her with their micro-activisms (which a friend of mine predicted as soon as she said it).

Then you had the feminists coming out again to defend Arquette. It's quite beautiful how historically liberals have always had a tendency to devour each other. Divided they stand, united they brawl.

> "To every woman who gave birth to every taxpayer and citizen of this nation, we have fought for everybody else's equal rights," Arquette said in her speech. "It's our time to have wage equality once and for all and equal rights for women in the United States of America."

The only reason she won an award is because she's a white cishet. What a shitlord. Check your privilege, Arquette.

Also, does anyone find it weird how much feminism focuses on material gain? It takes a special kind of loser to bitch about low pay on camera when all of her employees and viewers at home are making less than her. That kind of loser no amount of money or social validation can turn into a winner. No wonder celebrity marriages always fall apart. I guess now that rape culture has been debunked, the pay gap myth is all they have left.

What kind of idiot gets their beliefs from a celebrity? In all the talk about Arquette, I don't recall anyone writing about her credibility as a social critic. But she's all out of good looks, so parroting pop-liberalism is the only way to keep herself in the gossip column. First the Oscars is considered sexist because they focus on the dresses, and three hours later they are on the cutting-edge of gender equality.

Arquette's Award-Winner

I hadn't heard of Patricia Arquette, so I had to look up the movie. it's something called Boyhood. I have no idea what it's about and couldn't give enough of a shit to look up the Wikipedia page until I decided to write this article. I'm going to guess it's smug coming-of-age white guilt onanism like To Kill A Mockingbird. Let's find out together.

children and a forced cutting of Mason's long hair. By 2007, Bill has become abusive as alcoholism takes over his life. When he assaults Olivia and endangers the children, Olivia moves the family to a friend's house and files for divorce.

In 2008, Mason Sr. learns that Samantha has a boyfriend and talks to her and Mason about contraception. He and Mason go camping at Pedernales Falls State Park and bond over music, Star Wars, and Mason's blossoming interest in girls.

In 2009, Mason and Samantha have grown into their new lives in San Marcos, a town close to Austin. Mason is bullied by other students at school and teased on a camping trip, but also starts receiving attention from girls. Olivia teaches psychology at college and moves in with Jim, a student and veteran of the Afghanistan/Iraq War.

In 2010, by his fifteenth birthday, Mason has experimented with marijuana and alcohol. Mason Sr., remarried and with a baby, takes Mason and Samantha to visit his wife's parents. He gives Mason a suit and a mix CD of Beatles solo songs; Mason's step-grandparents give him a personalized Bible and a vintage shotgun. Mason becomes interested in photography.

Excerpt of the synopsis from Wikipedia.

So based on the above, we can fill in our white-guilt checklist.

- We have it taking place not just in the south but in Texas, which for some reason is generally considered the most southern—and hence the most backwards—of the southern states even though many southerners don't consider Texas to be part of the south. [Cue comments section fighting.]
- There is a Bible and shotgun as a gift from elderly people. Old people, as we all know, are behind the times with their outdated morality. Jesus and assault rifles were great in the 1400s, but this is 2015, and our new world demands a new set of absolutes.
- The movie features alcoholic abusive men but probably not any women, even though you don't need many years of life experience to know that women are far more batshit insane on alcohol than men are. You know that "Isolate, Intoxicate, Initiate" piece ROK had a few months ago? One of the best summaries of game I've ever read, but be careful how much booze you give her. A man can drink hard liquor for hours before he's sloppy stupid all over Facebook, but a woman goes from giggly buzzed to violent wasted at Mach speed. To quote The Break-Up, "Apple martinis. That normally does the trick. But just two. Three, she'll get sloppy and you'll become a baby-sitter."

I'm surprised there wasn't any rape or racial tension. They should at least have had the old grandpa sitting in his front porch rocking chair snuffing tobacco and making a stray line about all the coloreds that have moved onto the block. He should have a leather KJV Bible flapping in the wind and an old Ford truck in the distance.

The main character also needed a closeted homosexual brother. But at least the mother chose to major in psychology, the bullshit major of choice for middle age female college students.

Based on the rest of the Wikipedia page, it seems like there's no climax or clear ending, but I can't really tell that without seeing the movie. Maybe I'll watch it in three years when it's on Netflix Instant.

The Elephant That Should Have Been In The Room

Finally, there was no mention at the awards ceremony of the century-anniversary of The Birth of a Nation, the innovative 1915 landmark film that popularized the movie industry (now available in its three-hour entirety on Youtube). They could have said, "Well, while we certainly disagree with the message and many of the consequences of The Birth of a Nation, we are at least grateful for the opportunities in cinematic art that it opened up. It's important to remember history, no matter how dark."

But instead they've decided to pretend the Jim Crow south never happened. I'm not sure what the rationalization for this is, because if someone tried to bury the Nazi holocaust in the annals of history, these same people would raise a fuss. I mean, sure, most people have forgotten that the Nazis killed five million gypsies, but at least we still remember the six million Jews.

And so in honor of our warts-and-all American heritage, I'd like to quote Roger Ebert from 2003,

> All serious moviegoers must sooner or later arrive at a point where they see a film for what it is, and not simply for what they feel about it. "The Birth of a Nation" is not a bad film because it argues for evil. Like Riefenstahl's "The Triumph of the Will," it is a great film that argues for evil. To understand how it does so is to learn a great deal about film, and even something about evil.

Well said. Here's a teaser:

3 Ways To Deal With Overly Emotional Females

February 26, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

We've all been there—one of the womenfolk is seriously mad at you for no good reason. Maybe you didn't take out the trash when she asked you to, maybe you forgot to arrange the coffee cups in a specific order or failed to read her mind—again. Whatever the reason is, rest assured that it's going to be trivial, completely random, and make her blow up like an overweight nuclear bomb.

She is right in your face, the spittle is flying everywhere, her fat rolls are quaking with the anger of thousand SJWs and her second chin seems to have developed a will of its own and wants to bitch slap you on the spot. Logic doesn't work. Trying to justify yourself is pointless. You are dealing with an overly emotional female and by God you are going to pay for your sins. Welcome to your worst nightmare.

Better dead than fearful

At moments like these is when you have brief flashes of lucidity and realize why Leonidas and his soldiers willingly died at the Hot Gates—they didn't want to endure yet another day of their wives' bitching.

“Tonight we dine in hell!” “So, your wife is cooking again?”

If heroic death in combat is not an option, then you will have to find an alternative. If you were to take sitcoms such as Everybody loves Raymond seriously, it would seem the best option is to simply endure in silence and whine to your best friend about how your woman “like completely changed.”

However, not all is lost. Forget about being an emotional whipping boy for women. It’s time to take control of your own life and stop taking the verbal abuse. Return of Kings is about to teach you the three simple techniques of dealing with overly emotional females, which are:

1. Dismiss her complaints

This is how naive men deal with emotional women. She is factually wrong and you are going to prove it to her. Sounds like a great plan, right? You will quickly learn that women are inferior to men in every aspect, which also includes reason.

However, you will find out that women are incredibly skilled at changing the subject and moving the goalposts without you even noticing. If all else fails, they can simply turn on the waterworks and start whimpering. It doesn’t matter if you’re right – look at what you’ve done, you bastard!

Sympathy generator [ON]

If you happen to be in public and start to argue with your woman, the sight of a crying female is sure to attract white knights eager to defend her, just like a hot girl in water attracts rapist dolphins.
In a politically correct hellhole such as US, this kind of scene can land in you some serious trouble. It doesn't matter what happened, the girl is crying and you shall pay for it. If you do decide to argue with a woman, be succinct, don't lose your temper, don't raise your voice and absolutely do not allow her to change the subject.

2. Ignore her

Women cycle through moods with a much greater frequency and amplitude than men due to their hormonal surges. Whatever the triggering issue seems to be, the underlying cause is always in her. In her ovaries, to be exact.

Women experience this emotional rollercoaster on a regular basis up until their mid 40s, at which point they enter menopause and become batshit crazy. Though you can try to pamper the she-beast and alleviate the symptoms, there is nothing you can do to fix the underlying cause of the problem.

The monthly cycle of happiness and suffering

You don’t have to deal with a woman in such a mood. In fact, she’s supposed to have a network of female friends that truly understand her problems and can empathize with her. If she doesn’t, it’s her own fault, not yours. If she tries to vent her inner frustrations and penis envy on you, simply don’t pay attention to her.

Since women crave male attention and validation, you are showing her that she isn’t worthy of your attention when she’s behaving like a harpy. This means leaving the woman to tend to her own needs and acknowledging her only when she’s calmed down and rational.

3. Walk away

If your bullshit tolerance is extremely low, you can just go do your own thing. This is an incredibly powerful method of showing the woman that unstable behavior won’t be tolerated. In all relationships, you should always give the appearance of being able to walk away at any given moment. If she persistently tests your patience, just walk away and don’t look back. You’ll thank me later.

Solitude is better than the company of insufferable women

Of course, the problem is compounded with how marriage and divorce is handled in today's society. More and more men are deciding that they simply won't tolerate this kind of bullshit and either won't marry or even live with a woman in a single building. This is supposed to help them avoid divorce, but the problem is that the government doesn't want to deal with women either and is always looking for a sucker who is going to support the lifestyle a woman is used to.

It's a (marriage) trap!

For example, in certain countries such as Canada and Australia, after a certain period of time has passed in a romantic relationship (the exact definition of which is up to the judge to decide), you are considered married to a woman. And that's it, she has the right to half or more of all your shit even though there is no official marriage.

It doesn't matter what you think about it, these laws are made to artificially prop up the plummeting marriage rate. You just happened to be born with a dick and thus have to suffer. Unless you live in a radical Muslim country, where women dress like ninjas, you absolutely cannot walk away from a marriage without losing everything you worked so hard to achieve. On top of that, you will probably lose your kids as well, since 85% of all custodial parents in the US are women.

Once you're invested in the relationship, it's hard to muster the willpower to leave. This is understandable, but always remember that life isn't meant to be a sandwich with two slices of bread and a piece of shit in between.

By using your wits and two hands, you can live a life far beyond anything any women can dream of achieving. Expect only the best from people around you and give only the best to those who have earned it.

It Takes Balls To Start A Profitable Blog. Do You Have Them?

February 26, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article has been sponsored by BADNET

Or are you are afraid because you don't have any balls?

It takes balls to start a blog. Here are three reasons why you don't have the balls to run a profitable blog:

1. You have to live your life to write a blog

If you don't live an actionable and fruitful life, no one is going to care about your blog. No one cares about a guy who is invisible and doesn't really even exist. Running a blog requires you to actually go out and live a life where something happens. It is not done by sitting in a dark room, browsing 4chan and jerking off to Japanese schoolgirls.

Do you have the balls to live your own life? Go out and prove it. You have to go talk to that girl you like, face your fears and make something out of yourself. Nothing is accomplished by avoiding action. You are not a pussy, are you? You will take action, set up a blog and that's why you will have meaning in your life.

Face your fears and the fears then get replaced with confidence. Confidence is the thing that gets you everything you possibly want: girls, money and meaning. Your blog will provide you with incentives to take action and live a life of success. A blog is the reason why people get the little extra push to build their beach body, pick up girls or make more money.

You have to have balls to take action in order to run a blog. Are you bad enough to do that?

2. It requires effort to run a blog

Writing a blog is like going to the gym. It is hard work. Hard work is what turns coal into diamonds and that's why you have to do it. It takes time to write posts for your blog, but that time is invested into something which will bring you future success. Not being afraid to work hard means you have grit, focus and discipline – qualities every man should have and has to possess in order to fulfill their potential.

Most men lack these qualities today. Most men are pussies. They shy away from hard work and that's why they never build anything great. Most men have nothing to make them proud. A blog is the equivalent of building a house in today's world where mental skills are favored over the physical. You build a blog, and you can proudly look at it and say: "This is where my hard work got me."

Nothing gets accomplished without hard work. You don't build a good body without going to the gym, and you will not build a good blog without putting the work in. BADNET has made it almost too easy for you to set up a blog, but you still need to write the posts by yourself. If you really put all the hard work in, you will turn your blog into money, success and fame.

Are you capable of working hard enough to build something of your own?

3. It takes heart and soul to write a blog

If you live according to the expectations of everyone else, everyone will know you are an imposter. Not only that, you will be invisible to everyone around you. Writing a good blog takes heart: you have to have the courage to write about things everyone else is afraid to say. You have to pour your soul into your blog and let people take it all in.You have to be willing to say things which go against the grain and make some people upset. You need to be ready to say what you know is right and be tough enough to take the heat for it.

After you do it the fear is replaced with confidence. You did it. It's done. You let people know what kind of a man you are and how little shit you take from babies. You know you aren't a pussy and that's why you don't care about pussies calling you out. You will express your masculinity regardless of feminine men crying about it.

That's what defines a real man. A real man has the balls to do what he needs to do and will stand tall when the whole world is trying to change him. A real man will take action regardless of feminists or social justice warriors complaining about it. A real man will start a blog and say what he needs to say whether it is socially acceptable or not.

A real man has no hesitation to call himself a BAD guy. Do you?

Hire People With These 5 Traits At Your Own Risk

February 26, 2015 | by Silas Reynolds | Link | Original Link

As a manager, supervisor, boss, owner, etc. it's imperative that you hire the best and brightest for your organization. An employee is an investment. That investment needs to be properly managed in order to grow and succeed.

Once that employee reaches his pinnacle of growth and success, you and he have reached the most optimal production output. It's a successful partnership and ultimately, the both of you are making more money.

However, not all employees, like men, are created equal. Only the best can ensure you reach that end game of mutual success. I've reviewed hundreds of resumes and held countless interviews, most pre-planned and others held at public job fairs.

The "new" adage, "Never judge a book by its cover" is completely false. It's the single quickest way for an interviewer to take a chance on a complete idiot, drug user, social justice warrior (never let them in your organization), slacker and piss poor employee.

So, let me make this crystal clear, judge. Life is about making judgments, but you need to be cautious and judicious with making decisions on potential employees. Typically, what you see is what you get when interviewing. The ones you don't see carry the greatest risk, but we'll save that for another day.

Below are some tried and true observations on candidates you should definitely pass on. At best, you have to spend additional hours you don't have correcting them and, eventually you'll be forced to fire them. At worst, you have the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) breaking down your door for a bullshit investigation, and that’s just the beginning. It only goes significantly downhill from that point on – i.e., lawsuits.

Only useless HR idiots and clueless blue pill men think the following is acceptable in an employee:

1. The Long Fingernail

I’m sure they just forgot to clip that one this morning.

Observation is important. In fact, it’s key to survival. You’d be surprised (or not) that HR departments just overlook that nasty long fingernail, guess it’s part of the interviewee’s culture. Nothing to see here.

But there is. Likely, they’re a drug user. There are probably other tell tale signs of drug abuse, but keep an eye out for the long fingernail. At the very least, they’ve got poor hygiene. A man with poor hygiene has his priorities off and doesn’t respect himself. If he doesn’t respect himself, he won’t respect you or your company’s mission. Pass.

2. Colored People

What’s the worst that could happen? No drama here.

We all know taking a chance on hiring a woman is a risk anyway, but that discussion is another entire article. Women with unnaturally colored hair – you’d have to be a certified retard to hire them. Chances are they’re going to fuck multiple employees, try to seduce you, cause emotional upheaval within the office and cause chaos.

They’re not fully developed adults. What kind of adult with responsibilities, drive and ambition would look like that? The answer is simple. None. They’re perpetual children and, like actual children, do not belong in the workplace. Easy pass.

3. The Pierced Tongue

You probably make good decisions; after all, you have a tongue ring.

I had a woman come in for an interview and the position required outbound phone call monitoring of our call center. She was a married stay-at-home mom and had been out of the workplace for several years. Before she left her professional life behind, she had been modestly successful. Her resume was decent and the position was slightly above entry-level, so I took a chance on interviewing her. My spidey sense was already tingling.

What walked in my office was a disheveled woman in mom jeans and sporting a tongue ring. Moms with tongue rings make the best matriarchs, everyone knows that.

I passed on her and informed HR. The HR director was naturally an entitled black forty-year-old woman. In other words, worthless. But, I outranked her. She asked why I passed on her and I told her it was because she had a tongue ring, among other things. She sat back with a mild expression of shock on her face and then said, “Silas, you’re too old fashioned.”

I looked at her for a long while and then said, “Monica, you do know this position requires listening to the call center folks, right?” “Yes, of course” she said without hesitating. “Well, how do you think the folks on the floor are going to appreciate a girl with a tongue ring explaining that their phone presence was unprofessional?”

“I guess so, but I liked her” she said. Of course, she did. Another easy pass.

4. The Lord Of The Rings

Frightening. This is from someone’s nightmare.

Pass. For God’s sake, please pass. Usually, someone wearing this many rings is batshit crazy. Believe in astrology? Check. Used to be a part-time beautician? Check. Has a lone white wolf baying at the moon mural on their van? Check.

Look them in the eyes and you can see the crazy just seeping through.

Any man that wears more than two rings is either a pretty boy dandy or moonlights as your neighborhood cross dresser. They have no business in your business.

5. My Kids Are My World

Sounds good, anything else? Nope.

HR likes to dictate to interviewers not to ask personal questions. Why? Because HR is stupid and worthless. So, ignore them, but approach this subject tactfully.

Finding out a potential hire's personal beliefs, values and priorities is critical. You wouldn't hire someone who revealed to you that they spend their weekends at a local commune and worship Gaia. To find these hidden gems, approach with care. It's easy, but don't bum rush it. Below is a snippet from someone I passed on:

"Max, what motivates you?" I asked.

"I'm not sure I know what you mean, like at home or at work, outside of…"

"I mean, what's important to you? It can be a whole host of things that drives you to be successful, what are those things?" I explained.

"Well, my kids are my world" he responded back.

Then, silence. And more silence.

"Family is important Max, that's for sure. Anything else?" I asked, hoping for more information. Something to illustrate to me that Max had a greater potential than playing piggy bank for his family. Nothing, that was it.

The problem was his kids were it and nothing else. The entirety of his life, aspirations, dreams and goals and his response is only "…my kids are my world." Nothing to expound or explain, just a plastic Hallmark, and essentially, meaningless expression.

It's a cop out and a pretty weak one at that. It's designed to express family responsibilities, warmth and togetherness. It's a woman's response.

The job isn't about warmth or family, it's about getting the job done. It's in black and white terms. Pass or fail. Win or lose. That warm and fussy family crap doesn't mean a hill of beans when a board report is due.

Didn't get that report to the board because your "world" had a cold or received out-of-school suspension and needed some special treatment? Well, that's just too damn bad.

Conclusion

There are many more observations other than the ones detailed above to spot bad hires. In fact, one could write an entire book dedicated to the subject. But, these are what I like to call "hard truths," they don't feel good and they don't pull any punches. They don't bend or break. They hurt.

Don't hire these people. They're frail and damaged weaklings; let beta males hire these people, so it lessens your competition.

Equal Pay Activist Virginia Trioli Earns $85,000 More Than Male Co-Host

February 27, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Newscaster Virginia Trioli is the gift that keeps on giving. You may remember this otherwise largely avoidable "celebrity" for her outlandish comments linking men smashing tennis racquets with domestic violence.

You may also remember Michael Rowland as one of two male colleagues present when Trioli made her moronic remarks. I indicated last time that Trioli earned some $235,000 according to leaked documents in late 2013. What I left for this piece, however, is the fact that Rowland, her co-host, earned over $84,000 less than Trioli. There is presently nothing to indicate that the gap has been plugged. Both still host the same morning news program.

When interviewed by The Australian newspaper's Business Review, Trioli, a "noted" feminist, extolled the equality agenda: "We still have to bang on about equal pay, subtle and not-so-subtle forms of discrimination…" But who is this "we" Trioli speaks of? Well, the "we" is the gender Trioli uses to sell her most recent book and increase her media profile.

Earth to Trioli, Earth to Trioli…

On what planet are we living exactly? The hypocrisy above comes from a woman who earns over 50% more than her male co-host. Unlike other journalism and presenting roles, where professionals may host entirely different programs, travel to entirely different countries or focus on entirely different spheres, Trioli and Rowland are sitting on the same couch, presenting the same news program on the same spin-off channel of the same government-owned TV and media network, reading the same news stories, part-by-part. If ever there was a battleground in journalism on which to wage an equal pay debate, it is the pay relationship between co-hosts like Trioli and Rowland.

Trioli will happily lap up and pontificate the feminist agenda of equal pay and other matters, earn royalties from her book (Generation F: Sex, Power and the Young Feminist) and play the card of entrenched patriarchy. What she does not admit is that in the one area where she could practice what she preaches (and speak out against unequal pay) she simply does not do so.

Patriarchy forced Virginia to earn 50% more than Michael for the same job. Oh, the victimhood!

Some may say that it is not Trioli's responsibility for how much Rowland is paid. Maybe and probably so. Yet the rank hypocrisy of presenting yourself as an equal pay advocate and earning money from your position, all while getting a 50% fatter paycheck than a man for the same job, is irrefutable. When a woman is paid more, Trioli sees no need for comment. But when a man is paid more, Trioli and Co. pounce, like in her book, with an entirely different "logic".

What drives Trioli is a virulent form of prima facie sexism. Unlike the normal notion of prima facie, Trioli's perceptions are impervious to later information or correction. Male earns more than female: sexism. Woman, especially one named Trioli, earns more: fine, dandy, not worthy of comment, a topic to be avoided.

But in the meantime, folks, here's her latest sexism-against-women-is-everywhere book and newspaper rant. It's confirmation bias at its most repulsive.

A Wider Media Problem

The other laughable (read: horrendous) aspect of the leaked ABC salaries was the reaction from certain elements of the press. The Australian Women's Weekly (AWW), which ironically specializes in the continual recycling of sexist, unverifiable gossip about famous women, decried the "gender imbalance" in pay at the ABC. As you might suspect, no juxtaposition of Trioli and Rowland occurred. Trioli only made the list of the top ten highest paid women at the ABC, without other comment, while Rowland was not mentioned at all.

Despite comparing the salaries and declaring them sexist, bereft of any indication it had considered the different jobs featured in the lists, The AWW avoided the most logical and fair comparison, that between Trioli and Rowland. Though I may be laboring the point, they share the same couch! If you want an apt equal or unequal pay case study, you find one here!

Of the twenty individuals across the two gendered lists, none, bar five journalists and presenters (Tony Jones, Quentin Dempster, Leigh Sales, Fran Kelly and Trioli), had close to the same job, and most of the rest were generally executives of different departments, many of which were subordinate to others.

Trioli's desire for "equality" is as fake as the make-up she's not wearing much of here.

Amongst them, major differences existed. At the time, Dempster and Kelly were heavily or predominantly involved in the ABC radio divisions (Dempster focusing on sports reporting and commentary and Kelly on program hosting). Trioli was and still is breakfast co-host on ABC News 24, a standalone TV channel.

Even the dissimilarities between Tony Jones and Leigh Sales, both on the main ABC channel, were and remain stark. Jones, although listed as a journalist by The AWW, actually hosts the highly popular (for the ABC) Q&A, among other duties. Sales, a woman, hosts the 7:30 Report, an investigative journalism program with interviews thrown in, another “winner” for the ABC but lacking the engagement and popularity with young people in particular after so many years.

Jones and Sales present different programs with different formats, requiring different roles to be played and different topics to be covered. Instead of dealing with one or two guests at a time, like Sales, Jones is dealing with five, at least two or three of which are usually high-ranking national politicians, moderating both them and an often boisterous or vocally engaged audience of several hundred.

Whether Jones or Sales were paid more, there is no “equal pay” comparison to be made. It’s akin arguing that a hospital cleaner should be paid the same as the person delivering meals to bed-ridden patients, simply because they both work in a hospital.

Hope Ahead

The leaking of ABC salaries exposed Trioli for the hypocrite and inveterate, self-promoting gasbag she is. In addition to undermining the legitimacy of a leftist media network which preaches socialism and SJW agendas whilst financially lavishing up a coterie of executive fat-cats and self-indulgent ideological presenters, we should be thankful that the revelations invalidated any claim to fairness by Trioli on gender-related matters.

Anything feminist-oriented uttered by Trioli, or those like her, needs to be re-evaluated through the prism of her own double standards. As Return of Kings stories frequently expose, to talk the talk you need to walk the walk, feminists.

Should You Quit Your Job And Follow Your Passion?

February 27, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

A quick look around the internet today will reveal an entire industry dedicated to telling people to quit their jobs, start a business and do what they love. Usually for a fee, these businesses can help you get started.

But should you actually go ahead and do this?

With increasing numbers of people stuck in jobs they hate or don't find fulfilling, it's not a surprise that an entire industry comes to the fore to service their emotional needs and provide them with opportunities to do so.

But there is in fact one minor obstacle to many of these plans: reality. Reality is reality and no amount of dreaming will make it different. It is objective. It exists whether you like it or not. It does not change via quantum mechanics to fit your individual needs as taught in The Secret. Reality is reality, and that is that.

So am I saying you should stick with your job and forget the start up? Not quite. Let me explain.

Get real before you get out

The “follow your passion” industry taps into something central in the human psyche, and this is why it is so successful. That thing is the human need to express ourselves, the need to use our creative gifts and share them with the world.

All of this is perfectly natural and good. Humans are almost entirely defined by our creativity and it is this gift that has allowed us to survive and thrive like no other species in the history of this planet. Opposable thumbs help too, but creativity is the main factor.

However, humans have been blessed with another amazing gift – reason. Without this to supplement our creativity we wouldn’t get very far at all and our desire to create cool boats out of logs and ride them over the edge of a waterfall for kicks would have long ago ensured we became extinct as a species, without the gift of reason to counterbalance our creative urges, that is.

So what am I saying here? I’m saying to take your idea for following your passion, which most likely involves using your creativity in some way, and subject it to a reasonable, logical analysis or even better – an empirical experiment.

Things to think through before taking the leap.

Using our gift of reason we can consider a few things before starting a business and quitting our jobs. Things to consider would be as follows:

Is there an actual market for what I am trying to sell?

This is a hugely important point. You can create the absolute best painted bananas on earth, but it’s pretty unlikely anyone will part with a significant amount of cash for one. Whether you like to admit the fact or not, your talent for painting exotic fruits in beautiful ways will likely not translate into a successful business and put food on the table for your family. Humans have another need as well as expressing themselves, the need to eat.

Do I have the finances to see myself through the initial period where the business isn’t profitable?

Another hugely important fact to accept before you take a leap is that most businesses do not become profitable until their third or fourth year of business. That means there will likely be some lag time between when you start a business doing what you love and when you actually begin to generate surplus cash from it. Plan accordingly and make sure you have a suitable cash stash to survive in the meantime while your start up takes flight.

Can I do it better than the competition?

When you enter a business, you need to realize that you are declaring literal war upon those who are already in the business. This is no joke. Far too many people approach the idea of starting a business as if it were a stroll in the park. It isn't. What you are essentially doing is attempting to divert somebody else's food supply away from them and towards you.

They aren't going to like this, and if you do successfully manage to divert a portion of it, they are going to try every trick up David Copperfield's sleeve to distract you, divert you and ultimately destroy you. Business is war. Make sure you have a strategy thought out.

So you wanna be the boss, huh?

Objection! Why are you so cynical, man? There's an abundance for everyone

While there is indeed plenty out there on this huge, abundant planet, I am not being cynical by stating the above facts. I am just being realistic and viewing reality and human behaviour from an objective standpoint. I don't buy woop-dee-doo theories like The Secret and I don't suffer from the delusion of subjective reality based models of reality.

There IS plenty out there for everyone, but there are also plenty of people trying to get a hold of all they can. Lot's of these people have considerable resources and vast armies out there hunting on their behalf, and you are likely to come into competition with them if there is a lot of dough to be made in your field. You need to accept this as a fact and prepare for the battle ahead.

I'm NOT saying you shouldn't do it, I'm just trying to make sure you have looked at it from all the angles and are not entering a venture on false, erroneous beliefs.

"So what, I should just quit and give up on my dreams?" I hear you ask.

No, you should not.

If you like painting bananas, you should continue. You should just realize this is not a profitable venture and perhaps give them to orphan kids who have no toys and make them happy.

If you do want to actually survive, however, and you have a great idea that will improve the lives of your potential customers and render some actual useful service to them, you should continue doing the job you dislike until you come up with an actual business plan, think through a strategy for how you are going to live for those first years and challenge the competition, and then, if at all possible, start your business on the side so as not to leave yourself up shit creek without a paddle if the venture fails.

Look – I'm not trying to be a killjoy and shatter your dreams. I myself started a side business and it is flourishing. However, it has been a long and drawn out battle and only after three years of mistakes are things starting to come good. Even now, there are no guarantees.

I still have a great job I can rely upon to pay the bills while my business takes off, and only when it is profitable (e.g. I am making more from it than I would by working for my company) will I consider quitting.

That's not fear. That's not cynical. That's not pessimistic. That's a realistic, healthy approach to the idea of starting a business and being the boss, while making sure my family continue to eat in the process.

That's something a lot of people out there need to come to terms with. Doing what you love won't pay the bills in every case, and if it will, a part time side version will prove it and provide you with empirical evidence of profitability before you take the full-fledged leap.

Dreams are great. Dreams combined with a healthy dose of reality, however, are always better!

Thanks for reading.

Silicon Valley Entrepreneur Is Target Of Public False Rape Accusation

February 27, 2015 | by Jonathan David Farley | Link | Original Link

Joe Lonsdale, the wealthy Silicon Valley entrepreneur whom the New York Times skewered recently, appears to be innocent of the charges of rape his ex-girlfriend brought against him. Assuming his records of the email correspondence between himself, his then-girlfriend Ellie Clougherty, and his then-girlfriend's mother are correct, this is simply a case of a crazy woman seeking revenge against a man who had dumped her.

You might be thinking that calling her "crazy" is a smear. No: she wrote, "I was taken away from my parents and locked up in a nearby mental health hospital, against my will." (Emphasis hers) "Looking at a bowl of spaghetti literally began to terrify me."

Terrifying

The New York Times, which used to be a great paper–don't get me wrong, I've written for it twice and I'd write for it again given the opportunity–went full McIntosh with its almost baseless smear against Lonsdale, entitled, “The Stanford Undergraduate and the Mentor.”

The dishonest reporter meant to convey the impression that Lonsdale was a Stanford professor preying on a student, when in fact Lonsdale met Clougherty a year before he took a “volunteer” position–I would guess this means “unpaid”–as a “mentor” for a course at Stanford she was taking. He even checked to make sure he wouldn’t be evaluating her.

Having said that, it’s important to make three points:

1. Feminists passed rules prohibiting student-faculty relationships so that a male faculty member couldn’t get away with harassing uninterested female students.

Yet now 99% of the time, the people using these rules are jilted female students seeking revenge against faculty members they freely dated. It can’t be “harassment” after the fact.

Feminists continue the trend to make the word “harassment” meaningless, as well as the trend to treat women as infants. After all, a woman willingly falling in love with a man is hardly “harassment,” and a university student is an adult.

Nobel laureate James Watson, who helped discover the structure of DNA, married an undergraduate and some 47 years later they are still happy. I don’t have psychic powers, but I had lunch with them and left thinking that’s the kind of marriage I want.

I know a woman who met her husband when she was a graduate student and he a professor. If they had not been married, the company they later worked for might not have reached the stage where it could be sold for $2 billion.

2. These rules prohibiting relationships may even be illegal, at least at public universities: they prevent two people from becoming romantically involved, even platonically, even when one is not grading the other, based on some vague idea of "unequal power." But women never want mates who have "equal power." They have always wanted to "marry up."

According to feminists, this is rape, because of the "unequal power" the two have.

3. I thought nothing could or should get in the way of love, or does that only apply to relationships 95% of the country views as degenerate?

The comment at 4:36 of this Huffington Post Live interview reveals the real agenda: It is a sin for an older man, especially a successful one, to have a relationship with a younger woman. (These days, one might have to leave one's job if one said that about homosexuality, like the CEO of Mozilla.) The problem is, younger women like it and men like it, so they have to outlaw it. Catharine "All Sex Is Rape" MacKinnon has won. Oh, and for the record, Lonsdale was 29 and Clougherty 21, $(1/2)x+7$.

Getting back to Lonsdale, months after the alleged "rape," Clougherty called him "the boyfriend every girl dreams about but doesn't think actually exists." "It makes me so happy to think there's someone like you in the world I can love and think about," she wrote nearly a year after the alleged "rape."

Her own friend signed an affidavit saying that the girlfriend tried to get her to lie and say that the relationship with Lonsdale was abusive, something the friend never saw: "I feel bad about testifying that my long-time friend is not being truthful."

Incidentally, I'm not sure why it should be illegal for a relationship to be non-physically abusive. An adult woman has legs. She can walk.

I'll mention only in passing that the mother begged Lonsdale to take her daughter back, because even though I believe that the mother was heavily involved in the daughter's love life ("Joe really really really seriously likes me," Clougherty texted her mother), I can't back that up so well with the email records. But it seems likely that the daughter would have told the mother that Lonsdale had hurt her if he had.

The rape of the word rape

Those of us in the know are now sick of the fact that any woman, no matter how crazy, can say 40 years later that she was raped, despite having told no one in the intervening time period and despite having maintained a cordial or even loving relationship with the alleged rapist after the alleged rape.

"I really love how much you care about me and like I told [redacted] in Rome, the love I feel for you is deep…, and I think I secretly want to take care of you more than you do me," Clougherty wrote a few months after their trip to Rome, where she claims she lost her virginity.

Feminists have raped the word "rape." "If I said no, he would slowly convince me/make it look like he was going to die if I didn't climb on top of him." Yes, that's what Clougherty thinks is rape or abuse: her climbing on top of him. Fortunately, this time feminists have taken on not some broke undergraduate, but a millionaire who can afford a legal Dream Team. Lonsdale's lawyers should help the falsely accused University of Virginia fraternity and the falsely accused Columbia University student.

Like the vast majority of public rape accusations, all signs point to this being false. Still, this false rape allegation will follow him and other accused parties around for a long time. Stanford banned him from the campus for ten years, denying the next Mark Zuckerberg or Steve Jobs a chance to easily meet and learn from him.

MIT removed the physics lectures of Dr. Walter Lewin–accused of "harassment"–from its website, denying future Stephen Hawkings around the world the opportunity to learn from a distinguished scientist. The allegations of prostitutes are drowning out Bill Cosby's message to the African-American community about how it can thrive. How much progress in science, how much economic progress, will feminism retard? Feminists have nearly reached Moscow.

Will you join our march to Berlin?

Don't break up by email, guys.

Forbes Confirms Men Still Create The Vast Majority Of Personal Wealth

February 27, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

From news to movies to documentaries to education, there is a constant drumbeat. Girls are now the equal of men as movers and shakers in the world. Girls are beating boys at school, a majority at university and touted as being the equal or superiors of men at making money. Lately the tempo seems to have increased. Some are even starting to claim that men are obsolete.

Most of these claims rest on a comparison of the sexes abilities at money making. However, the aim of any activity in the world of money is not to be working or to be in business or to be getting qualifications. The aim is to make money, to create wealth.

University drop out

Forbes magazine provides us with lists of the richest people. These are the true champions of wealth creation. Further, for the first time in 2014 their American list included a “self-made score” The score is a number from 1 to 10 with 1 meaning “Inherited fortune but not working to increase it” and 10, meaning “Self-made who not only grew up poor but also overcame significant obstacles.”

With this score, it is relatively easy to see who actually made the money and who just inherited it from someone who made it. Now for a bit of analysis of who is at the top, how they made their money, and how men and women compare.

America is still a land of opportunity

At the time of writing Forbes reports that 69% of the people on their list of the 400 richest Americans was self-made. That means that around 276 scored from 6-10 on their scale and can be said to “have truly made it on their own.” Meanwhile, the remaining 124 scored 1-5 and “inherited some or all of their fortune.” This group includes people who some might consider self-made, such as Donald Trump, who scores only 5 because he inherited a relatively small business.

Build buildings, build wealth

The first lesson from the list is that despite big government, high taxes, slow growth, all the problems and all the complaints, America is still a land of opportunity and reward for smart, hard workers. Most of the really rich people made their own money through their own effort.

The fact that some inherited their wealth simply shows that people who create exceptional wealth still get to decide what happens to that money and who it goes to when they die. This is all as it should be.

Of the richest Americans, 11% are women

The list shows that 44 of the richest people are women and 356 of them are men. One member of the list is a man who insists he is really a woman, known in some circles as transgender. Forbes chooses to support his pretence of being female, but here he is counted as his true sex, male. As might be expected of such an individual, he is not capable of being self-made and is classified by Forbes as class 1, inherited wealth.

At first glace it would seem that 11% of the top 400 wealth creators are women. It’s a small minority, but not an insignificant one. A closer look shows this to be an overstatement of women’s achievements.

Less then 3% of the richest self made Americans are women

This is where the new “self made score” comes in to show what is really happening. Using Forbes definition of self-made there are 276 self-made people, of whom 268 are men and 8 are women. That’s right—75% of the men on the list are self made, while only 18% of the women are.

So less than 3% of the self made Americans in the list are women. However, even this is probably an overestimate.

Of the eight self made women only four did it alone

A quick look at the biographical information of the so-called self-made women shows that four of them actually went into business with their husbands. There is no easy way to know what part of the contribution was actually from the women in these partnerships, but the breakdown of men and women in the overall list of wealth makers shows that skepticism is appropriate.

Men are the builders, innovators, inventors and creators

The advance of modern America is the same as the advance of historical America in this one feature. Men are still doing the vast majority of the advancing. The builders, innovators, and creators are almost exclusively male. There is little or no sign that is going to change.

What has changed is that women are now working and earning wages. However, with a very few laudable exceptions they are not the movers and shakers of the productive sphere. Think government generated jobs, dead-end drudgery, and non-productive work.

Lessons in this for men

Being second is not so bad

One of the negative features of the manosphere and the red pill generally is the victim mentality and culture of excuses often displayed. Some men, especially in the comments on ROK and other sites, make the claim that the world advantages women and is unfair on men to the point where no success is possible.

They claim that there are no opportunities and that robots will eliminate all jobs. They claim that raising children within a complete and rewarding family environment is impossible. They claim that all women are so horrible that casual sex and prostitutes are the only workable options.

Undoubtedly all these claims have a grain of truth. The world can be hard and sometimes it can be unfair. What is really happening though is that men are using these claimed difficulties and injustices as excuses to avoid taking hard decisions and expending effort. A quick look at the Forbes list shows that these men have made good on opportunities and become rich. Their biographies show that the vast majority of them have successful marriages and large families.

It is still possible to make it in America

The Forbes list shows that it is still possible to make it in America. There are money making opportunities in plenty. That doesn't mean it is easy. That doesn't mean that every man can be a billionaire or should aim to be a billionaire. It just means that the way is still clear for a man to take what he wants, if he has what it takes. So go to it chaps.

The Role Of Modern Entertainment In Beta Indoctrination

We've seen and discussed how social indoctrination in modern societies has brainwashed men to act unnaturally to the core qualities of masculine nature. Right from childhood, a man's indoctrination begins from his family, his teachers, and all the people who take care of him till his adulthood. Societal indoctrination thus begins directly in real life from those around him; but as he grows, more so through the entertainment he is exposed to.

The entertainment world today remains more powerful than ever, as modern civilization remains plugged to the virtual world more than the real one. Smartphone addiction is just an example of how much the modern human needs the virtual world. While literature may or may not be as effective in its influence today as many men may not have cultivated the reading habit, one important way of indoctrination which remains quite powerful in its influence is cinema and television.

We've also seen how sitcoms today promote feminist ideologies to modern men: the idiot box lives up to its name as an effective agent in peddling such idiocy to the masses – primarily women, who often derive their role models for their personal lives from such sitcoms. Men don't lag behind in falling prey to this as well – for these factors often influence modern men more widely than ever before.

Back then: the masculine era

The masculinity in the below clip itself shows the times which have passed. While it could be argued that such display of masculinity could still make women go weak at their knees today, what is to be inferred are the lessons what men today have lost, what they should've continued emulating from their forefathers.

Frame control. Male dignity. The ability to walk away in the face of a woman's emotional instability. The below clip further highlights an important seen truth in the dating world: the more masculine a man is, the more feminine his woman would eventually act to be.

But in today's times, would this masculine behavior be considered as justified in equality seeking, gyno-centric modern feminist societies?

Fast forward to today: feminist indoctrination in movies

Masculinity today has itself become a confusing minefield for modern men to walk through, considering the gyno-centric feminist societies which seek to demean it further. And in such degenerate societies with the lack of proper role models, it's common to see men increasingly long for role models to guide them down the actual path of masculinity.

For those lucky and smart enough to find the red pill, this problem gets addressed effectively. But for those who haven't yet taken the red pill, this problem gets usually compounded as they continue to seek male role models, which gets worse when the search for this "role model" ends on a pseudo "alpha" character on screen.

But what might appear as alpha on screen, may not be after all if you'd think deeply about it.

Should a man bear responsibility for and white-knight a woman who didn't wait for him? Is such behavior a proper role model that should men follow?

It's quite common to see action movies today (even superhero movies) to have a flawed message of covert feminist indoctrination, even if they might have stunning visuals coupled with pseudo-realism. As commonly seen in such movies (which target both young children and adults), the protagonist develops himself to the highest level of masculinity – in mind, body and skill – only to either yield to scavenge, or 'save' a heroine who lives a sub-standard life of moral ambiguity (or worse, no morality).

Not only do such movies further promote distasteful levels of entitlement among modern (slutty) women who are indoctrinated to emulate such dysfunctional cinematic caricatures of femininity, these movies also present dysfunctional role models of masculinity to growing male children and young men.

The same problem of beta-indoctrination is further shoved down the ears of modern men by modern music.The beta-indoctrinating messages often noted from these sources are:

- It's masculine to white knight and defend a woman at all times– even if she may unworthy of it due to her own stupidity and flawed character
- It's masculine to always forgive and forget a woman's past and flaws

- It's masculine to always jeopardize yourself to get a woman (even if she may be sub standard), even if it may be by putting yourself recklessly or needlessly in the line of violence – women are the prize men should sacrifice their resources, dignity or even lives for
- Women are entitled to have even the best of men, even if these women lived trashy lives
- Female agency exists: Men need women more than women need men

…and so on. You could also see more of such indoctrination through entertainment today – which the red pill has already debunked, as seen in the above links.

Even if the intellectuals might argue that it would be stupid to take these cinematic caricatures of modern masculinity literally as role models, one can't deny that not every modern man has the intellect to deduce so. With degeneracy on the rise in modern societies, it's not surprising to note that the intellect and wisdom of an average man to be shackled with blue pill prejudices and sometimes outright stupidity.

The main underlying cause of this problem remains humanity's predilection for man worship

> A wise man ought always to follow the paths beaten by great men, and to imitate those who have been supreme, so that if his ability does not equal theirs, at least it will savor of it. Let him act like the clever archers who, designing to hit the mark which yet appears too far distant, and knowing the limits to which the strength of their bow attains, take aim much higher than the mark, not to reach by their strength or arrow to so great a height, but to be able with the aid of so high an aim to hit the mark they wish to reach.
> — Niccolò Machiavelli, The Prince

Mankind has always needed "role models" over the centuries – whether it may be through saints, prophets, political or cult leaders, etc. But this need for role models further compounds the problem: when a "role model" appears, it's very easy to go to extremes to "deify" him – as usually the objects of man worship were "role models".

This is the main reason why the form of entertainment based indoctrination holds powerful; and additionally because mankind has habitually been inclined to man worship since antiquity, and entertainment media reaches in every home.

The red piller however does not "deify" his role model (a trap the blue piller usually succumbs to)—because the red pill makes him aware that even the best of role models have flaws, as no one is perfect. The truth remains: no human role model can be perfect, as the easiest flaws to notice are often in the human body itself. Similarly, these same "inadequacies" or flaws extend to a person's character or intellect – as there is always a possibility of human error.

Humanity however needs tangible examples of evolved human character to believe in, so as to emulate. But to emulate the human flaws of a role model is simply sheer stupidity.

This mistake occurs because it's easy to practice emulation excessively to the point of blind adoration.

Another reason which further exacerbates this problem is what has already been raised by some red pillers before: that the signs of a declining civilization is when the entertainment industry gets more public appreciation and sometimes, "deification" – than the thinkers and builders of the civilization, like in the times of today.

In such scenarios, if a man's personal role model is that of a male celebrity who plays pseudo-heroic caricatures of masculinity on screen, it's easy to deduce as to what his idea of masculinity would potentially be, and how he might potentially behave in his own personal life.

The sign that a man in a society would look to emulate a pseudo-real role model of masculinity which itself might be ambiguous, fake or convoluted to begin with, is itself an indication to the declining societies modern men are living in. When fake itself is perceived as real by modern men, what more could the matrix of blue pill societies ask for?

Conclusion

In a modern world where men often suffer from a lack of real role models of masculinity, it thus becomes even more important for men to be careful when selecting role models, especially from the entertainment world, both from on-screen and off-screen.The blue pill matrix of modern societies offers little room to escape for modern men from its emasculating snare, and modern entertainment often serves as an camouflaged but effective tool in its plan.

With the increasing addiction of modern civilizations to entertainment, the problem its poses to the masculinity of modern men is acute, especially since modern (blue pill) men often look to it for their role models. It becomes even more important for those unaware of this danger to take the red pill before, and to save themselves from such blue pill beta indoctrination.

The 4 Cardinal Virtues Of The True Womanhood Cult

February 28, 2015 | by Vic Lenser | Link | Original Link

As part of the required reading in literature courses throughout many liberal arts colleges, Barbara Welter's 1966 essay "The Cult of True Womanhood: 1820-1860" has become a staple academic source for feminist and deconstructionist literary critics.

The Cult of True Womanhood, a.k.a. The Cult of Domesticity, is a phrase that Welter uses to define the prevalent philosophy towards women in America during the mid-19th Century. The philosophy, which she portrays as a particular set of demands and expectations, is founded upon four tenets: Piety, Purity, Submission, and Domesticity.

I suggest you read the essay prior to going any further. It's a short piece, and the diction is easily accessible to modern readers.

Before I delve into these four tenets, however, allow me to provide a context for this essay and how it pertains to contemporary discussions of gender and society.

It is imperative for participants in the manosphere to be aware of this essay, for it underpins much of what feminism has become today. It is frequently cited as evidence of patriarchal constructs: horrible creations of man that feminists would have us believe are behind everything that makes them uncomfortable.

Not human nature, not biological imperative, not healthy norms, but… patriarchal constructs.

Step aside, John Henry.

This essay gives feminists the perception of authority they need to re-define natural, functional gender roles as incongruent demands being forced upon women by a dominant (white) male class. Consider when the essay was published: 1966, in the midst of the second-wave feminism movement.

Welter frames the issue by alluding to the consequences of violating this prevailing set of values, summed up in the following: “If anyone, male or female, dared to tamper with the complex of virtues that made up True Womanhood, he was damned immediately as the enemy of God, of civilization, and of the Republic.”

If you consider the above quote as the introduction, then it becomes clear that this essay is a focus upon the 19th-Century response to those transgressions, a focus which serves the underlying purpose of deconstructing the philosophy itself in order to render it problematic and obsolete in a Progressive™ 20th-century context.

Although Welter does not explicitly condemn the Cult—her essay is more informative than persuasive—she had to be aware of the political context in which she wrote.

She begins the essay by labeling Man as a “busy builder” and Woman as a “hostage.” These terms are not accidental. Furthermore, the assignment of the term “cult” to what is really a set of ancient norms and values allows Welter to subliminally present those norms as inane and excessive. It allows her readers to equate the brutality of the enforcement of the cult with brutality of the cult itself.

Having made that distinction, I will now illuminate the four cardinal virtues of the Cult of True Woman.

1. Piety

The virtue of religious devotion, which includes faith, prayer, and participation in church activities.

This trait, it seems, is the natural state of woman. Their brain is wired to believe in something they can't see.

Women already knew this in the 19th Century. Elizabeth "Mrs. John" Sandford said in her book, Woman, in Her Social and Domestic Character, "Religion is just what woman needs. Without it she is ever restless or unhappy."

When Welter mentions in her essay Sanford's view that Piety is a virtue, she says it thus:

"Mrs. John Sanford, who had no very high opinion of her sex, agreed thoroughly."

Emphasis is my own, in order to illustrate that Welter insists any woman's opinion that differs from her own must be "no very high opinion."

Solipsism? Welter, have a little faith in your elder sister!

2. Purity

True Woman Waits.

There is a biological imperative behind this value which ensures that women form stronger bonds to their husbands and as a result maintain healthier a family setting for their children.

Regardless of the aim of Purity during the 19th Century, modern research has shown that it is actually better for children to have their mothers maintain their chastity until the night of marriage to the father of those children.

The alternative? An Alpha Widow who accomplishes the following: she fails to form a proper bond with her husband, divorces him, then ostracizes him from the lives of her children.

No one wins.

Although Purity is easier to uphold for some than it is for others.

3. Submission

A woman's obedience to her man. A wife's deference to the wisdom and worldly experience of her husband. A daughter's respect towards her capable father.

The problem is not female submission to males, since it is a biological tendency common among mammals, but rather the abuse of power that natural feminine submission affords the stronger sex.

The abuse of gender roles by unrefined or lesser men does not constitute a delegitimization of the gender roles themselves. Individual men are the problem. Wrath is the evil, not power. Does gluttony make food evil? Does sloth make rest evil?

Is all sex evil because of the existence of lust? Is submission inherently bad just because it has gone wrong in the hands of the incompetent?

4. Domesticity

This virtue should be self-explanatory. It holds that a woman's ideal place is in the home and the kitchen.

Woman, Welter states, was "hostage in a home," but not so the man "work[ed] long hours in a materialistic society." How is it that a man enslaved to employment is not a hostage?

Regardless, the woman had specific roles while assuming the realm of the domestic: nurse, cook, and child-care giver, among others.

Nowadays, instead of mother fulfilling these roles, we have the government and multi-national corporations deciding how to heal, feed, and raise our children instead of the mothers who bore them from their womb.

I say this: anyone who seriously challenges the notion that the domestic sphere pertains to the expertise of woman has got to have serious mental issues.

Dismemberment of the cult

The Cult of True Womanhood is really a description of beliefs and attitudes towards women that can not be confined to a mere 40 years of history.

Indeed, the tenets of Piety, Purity, Submission, and Domesticity have been guideposts for women throughout the ages, in nearly all parts of the world, and they continue to hold sway in many dominant cultures and sub-cultures across the globe.

So what allowed the initial breakdown of the notion of True Womanhood in America? One possibility I propose is that the Industrial Revolution changed the business of men.

Subsistence farming, trades, and artisanry steadily lose their effectiveness at sustaining families when the demands and pressures of society change.

Mercantilism, on a government level, and capitalism, on a corporate level, raise the level of the dollar's importance not only for those actively seeking wealth but also for those passively living within the system.

Welter herself mentions that in America "the fathers, alas, were too busy chasing the dollar." As if the majority of them made a conscious choice to abandon their families for the sake of satisfying their own greed.

Rising materialism demands men to work as wage slaves, and these men carry their weariness and incongruency of spirit into the domestic sphere.

Rather than note, however, the threat that industrialization and materialism pose to the family unit, Welter and feminists in general look to deconstructing a core set of values that have served the survival and advancement of our species for thousands of years.

That is to say, rather than examine a more probable cause of unhappiness, they have decided to examine a side effect of the original cause (whatever that may be) and use that as an opportunity to demonize the age-old definitions of femininity, utilizing such terms as “cult,” “hostage,” and “patriarchy” in order to achieve their selfish goals.

Ideally, men work, build, learn, and discover, while women keep it all together at home. Life is demanding for men, and it is demanding for women. But what receives very little mention in today’s gender dialogue is that the expectations placed on men have changed very little in the past century.

We are still expected to study, to pursue a career, to provide, to be resilient, and to stand up for the weak and defenseless.

In addition, however, we are also now expected to be sensitive, to listen, to share domestic duties, and, most offensively, to ignore our natural inclinations and standards toward beauty, which are driven by biological urges to mate with healthy, viable potential mothers.

But if you want to bed attractive, quality women, you are expected to be fit, wealthy, witty, charming, and a combination of other qualities. There is nothing wrong with demanding excellence, but why does it apply to only one sex nowadays?

Hardcore feminists will try to convince us that it is backwards to uphold that women are delicate, gentle, and best suited to service. On the other hand, a message that men are brutish and given to violent tendencies gives feminism a reason to attack men and masculinity. A philosophy towards women that regulates their nature does not serve the aims of feminism, while a philosophy towards men that regulates their nature does.

Keep these ideas in mind the next time you encounter someone citing “Cult of True Womanhood” as evidence of patriarchal constructs. Remind them that it is nothing more than a feminist tactic to demonize the aspects of human nature which they consider to be inconvenient.

I originally intended to end this article by posing a question about the existence of a Cult of True Manhood, but then I realized that the very idea is as preposterous as a Cult of True Womanhood. Instead, I’ll end with a brief anecdote.

At work today, my supervisor (a woman), was on her way to get a fork so she could sample the birthday cake that another woman brought for the business owner (male, in case it matters).

I asked her to grab a fork for me as well, and she scoffed, saying, “I don’t even serve my own husband.”

“Really?” I asked in disbelief. “You don’t serve your husband?”

“Absolutely not,” she huffed, walking past me towards the cake.

(Most) Red Pill Men Are Not Adding To The Moral Decline

February 28, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

Once in a while, someone comes on the forums, wrestling with the same moral dilemma that we all do when first understanding red pill and PUA:

> "If you are learning how to better seduce women, then you are simply adding to the moral decline."
> "How can red pill men, denigrate slutty women, while at the same time seeking bangs and ONS".

Troy Francis touched on this earlier in the week, and I admit that I had the same issues. However, by thinking into the logistics, we rapidly come with a rational solution giving a clear reason for our modus operandi.

Men hold the key to commitment, women hold the key to sex

At one point or another if she wants commitment she will offer sex in exchange. With the advent of birth control, it's reasonable to expect a "try before you buy" experience. Women are essentially offering a product, men are the buyers. Women won't sell unless the price is right, men won't buy unless the product is good enough.

While it might seem crass to reduce sexual relationships to transactional interactions, the exact reason why a woman puts on makeup and clearly exhibits hypergamous behavior is to increase her value and obtain better benefits.

In the business world we increasingly find providers offering, free trials, free hardware, and building complicated business models with zero initial profitability (Facebook, Google, Whatsapp etc.). This paradigm was almost unheard of 100 years ago. You want it, you buy upfront (i.e. no sex before marriage).

Consumer credit is a 20th Century invention. In theory, this is progress towards a Star Trek-type society without money. If the service is built for the love of it, and users begin enjoying it, eventually money becomes an afterthought and finally a withered feature from a bygone era – a bit like pubic hair. If this utopian dream can't be achieved, we still live in a faster paced world; even houses are no longer the lifetime purchase they once were.

Why do I use Google?

Because I started using it and still do. That's the only reason anyone uses Google. The same logic can so easily be applied to women. Why I am still with this girl? Because I never broke up with her. Her qualities keep me coming back, but it's no longer the lifetime purchase it once was.

A Man Must Always Maintain Frame

If you say you want casual sex and to bang everything that moves, you may be breaking down moral barriers and misleading women. Your frame might be fake. This is what some men (and feminists) dislike about game.

However, there's an estimated 100,000 escorts in the UK. 100,000 escorts say that men love sluts – we just don't commit to them.By comparison there are only 10,000 gas stations. If 10,000 new gas stations open up and start offering free gas, I'll buy a 5L V8 and stop to fill up as I please, but I still won't make one my home.

Back in the day a man had to get married (or go to a brothel) to have sex. Some cultures were less inclined to castigate whores and even sent young men to lose their virginity with a pro. Most men would admit that the dream of having a great LTR and family with a feminine woman still remains in the back of their mind, much as dreams of returning to earth might for those living in a space station, even if the earth is a radioactive wasteland. There is also a certain breeding problem for the man who wishes to have kids.

We are not subjected to social boundaries and the match making of our parents. Society accepts we can find our future mate almost anywhere we please—even online. Classified ads used to be thought of as something tacky for the lost and lonely (and for hookers), but today it's a very common way to meet.

Progress? Or perhaps there are a lot more lost, lonely, or slutty women

If you can date hundreds of eligible females, why wouldn't you do that? There is no reason why a man would not want to become very skilled in the art of wooing a woman. It can be of great merit to him socially and psychologically.

Worst case is that he never finds "the one" but bangs 1000 sluts for no upfront cost. Best case he makes informed, educated, and practical life decisions. A used car dealer is selective about which beaters he purchases, but chances are he married the first girl that came along.

The road to failure

Shacking up with the first sex buddy available is about as desperate as eating from the dumpster. A man has many considerations to take when selecting a woman long-term. He is financially and morally liable, he has to find a replacement and deal with damaging emotional fallout if it doesn't work. Having taken the red pill, the only reason a man has to stop running game, is to focus on other pursuits. This should never be done as a cop out.

If a man has found the perfect lady, he might tone down his game in respect to her. If he chooses to garage his game, he ought to keep it well-oiled and ready for use. That doesn't mean he's cheating, merely a smooth ladies man.

My father never cheated in 25 years, but even at 70, I saw him at a dinner party recently; a newly wed blonde 20-something was hovering about him blushing and giggling; of course he's not fucking her, he just knows how to have masculine appeal. Her wimpy husband on the other-hand is a divorce rape in the making.

21st century women have been far too effective in demanding commitment while offering only a sniff of their dirty underwear. Like a 1990s cell phone contract, modern women are loaded with hidden charges and expensive cancellation clauses, while offering patchy reception, clumsy hardware and god help you if you go roaming.

Women make relationships, men have sex and build families

Why do you think women get jealous? They know a good man attracts women like bees to honey. As soon as a man starts trying to keep a woman happy, it comes apart. It turns a man into a spineless version of himself, a dynamic that makes her lose attraction. Buyers don't pander to salesmen. Have you ever seen dancing ice skaters where the woman leads and throws the man in the air?

Put more simply

You cannot herd cats. If the cat comes and catches mice and is friendly and useful – you keep it around. Unless he's banging a slut just for relaxation, I believe that the intention and hope of sustaining any sexual relationship long term is always in a man's mind. It is in his very nature. Even illicit lovers yearn to be together.

I'd go so far as to say that 95% of marriages break down because the man becomes trapped and miserable but doesn't have the heart (or experience) to break it up. She then senses his unhappiness and mirrors it by leaving him. He has effectively made her do his dirty work for him—a great strategy for teenage men; unwise for middle aged husbands with kids.

The primary difference between player and regular guy is that the player is more discerning and quicker to cut her off, because he knows there are many others who could take her place. If a man meets a beautiful 18-year-old virgin but a week later she turns into a nagging, jealous bitch, the man is within his rights to show her the door.

If the 39 year old, lesbian, single mother turns out to be an absolutely incredible catch, despite her meth habit and tattoos, break out the diamond ring. The LTR possibility is always there. IT IS THE WOMAN THAT HAS TO PLEASE THE MAN – not the other way around. Ultimately if the woman doesn't please the man, sex is impossible and the relationship never happens, no matter how much she stalks him or begs for sex.

What does she have to offer?

By embracing masculine-feminine sexual polarity, red pill men are raising the bar. It's up to women to set their standards, Slut, lover or wife. Some people want to reinvent the wheel and reverse the polarity roles, but most find themselves miserable.

The final argument is that women face a dilemma: If they offer sex too soon they are whores, if they hold back they are frigid. The word missing from the equation is MODESTY. I am not necessarily going to hold it against a woman that sleeps with me immediately, since to some extent it's my charm as much as her sluttiness that is to blame. A very skilled player might hold out on purpose to better assess her potential.

Neither do I have any objection to a couple of dates with a quality female who holds out—but I am highly aware that it's a sexual interaction and I need to know how to seduce her, before I'm just a simp paying for a stranger's drinks, while she texts the next prospective buyer. The dynamic of illicit lovers is well explained by Troy, and is the third (middle path), that both men and women enjoy – in part because it lacks the serious element.

Women wanted their emancipation, they have to deal with it and put modesty and love back into the equation. It's neither the man's job to pander to her emotions, nor his place to educate her. He can only select or reject according to a "try before you buy" paradigm that is available today.

- If women behave like whores, then men will be pimps or dominated betas.
- If women behave like lovers, men will too.
- If women are loyal and ladylike, then players will move towards being masculine gentlemen that betas try to emulate and ladies try to wed.

You can’t take advantage of a whore, since she sets the going rate. Today (like central bank interest rates) her tariff is zero and headed lower and the currency she accepts is “fiat” at best. Perhaps the dynamic of lovers or friends with benefits is the best, but like a cell phone contract, it doesn’t tend to last more than a year or two before you need an upgrade.

4 Non-Verbal Tricks To Make Women Swoon

March 1, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

Most guys get caught up in the verbal aspects of game.

What do I say? When do I say it? How do I respond when she says this or that?

This is all BACKWARDS. The easiest way to get "good" with women is to master the non-verbals… Hell, the best way to get "good" socially in general is to focus on the non-verbals.

I mean, let's flip the script: what makes you go crazy for a particular girl? Is it how she can masterfully construct witty sentences and always say the "right" thing?

No, it's not. It's how she carries herself. How she dresses. The overall "feel" you get when you're around her… It's her fucking ENERGY.

You must take advantage of the incredible power of non-verbal communication. You must control the key factors in your appearance and behavior that have the biggest impact on the image and "energy" you project to the world. Here are my top four ways to do this…

1. Intense Eye Contact

Good eye contact draws the other person in

Eye contact is a fundamental part of every interaction. Good eye-contact can build rapport and attraction. Bad eye contact can come off as creepy or insecure.

The key to mastering eye contact is holding it for just a bit longer than the other person can. This signals that you're more comfortable in the interaction than they are, and makes you the "leader." Generally, the other person will gradually get more comfortable holding it for longer as you go, making the interaction that much more personal and intimate.

The other main portion of good eye contact is breaking it by looking to the sides as opposed to looking down. Looking down signals weakness. Looking to the sides is natural.

2. Strong Posture

Standing tall and proud makes you look confident and self-assured. Being hunched over and closed off makes you look insecure and awkward.

The key to good posture is holding the crown of your head high and your shoulders back. This is most effectively accomplished by doing exercises that strengthen your back and rear deltoid muscles, like rows and reverse shoulder flys. Stretching your chest will also help immensely.

3. Basic Grooming and Style

Taking a few minutes to clean yourself up before heading out is easy

There are a lot of factors that go into good grooming and style, but I'll offer you three key pieces to make sure you have down:

- Maintain proper hygiene – this means take showers, brush your teeth, and wear deodorant. There's nothing more unattractive than body odor or yellow teeth.
- Groom your hair – this means getting a regular haircut and trimming your beard, if you have one. While a little roughness and shagginess can be attractive, it's better to err on the side of keeping a clean look.
- Wear clothes that fit – this means that your shirt gently hugs your chest and isn't super baggy around your waist, and that your pants are similarly on the "tighter side". This DOES NOT mean skinny "punk rock" jeans. Leave a little breathing room in there for comfort and style.

If you nail these three things down, then at the very least you're style should not hold you back from success with women, or just in general.

4. A Full Voice (and proper breathing)

While this could be considered a "verbal" technique, your tone of voice is non-verbal in nature, meaning that it doesn't have to do with the specific words you say.

You want to aim for a deeper voice, but avoid being monotone and boring. The key to mastering your voice is to control your breathing, and to breath deeply from your stomach as opposed to your chest or throat.

This allows you to use the full spectrum of your esophagus and utilize your "full voice", as opposed to an awkward or high pitch when you don't do this. Breathing deeply will similarly allow you to relax and quell any anxieties that you may have in social situations.

Why You Need To Appreciate The Time You Have

March 1, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

"The Trade-In's" is an episode of The Twilight Zone that originally aired on April 13, 1962. You can watch the episode here.

"The Trade-Ins" is a wistful and sentimental episode about an elderly couple —John and Marie Holt—living in the future. The couple goes to a corporation that specializes in "body swapping." "Body swapping" refers to when one person exchanges their body for another's body, typically an old couple seeking a youthful body.

John and Marie are presented with various youthful models and they are overcome with a sense of giddy, ebullient excitement when they consider the possibility of living their lives over again.

Unfortunately, they find out they do not have enough money for both of them. The operations require $5,000 apiece, when they only have $5,000 between them. In a desperate attempt, John goes to a poker game where he bets all of his $5,000. The sympathetic poker dealer asks why John is betting all his money and John tells him that he seeking a better life for he and his wife. After the dealer finds he has the better hand than John, the dealer folds and lets the man keep his money.

John goes back to the corporation with the idea he will swap his body and use his new body to work hard to save up to get his wife the swap. He gets the swap and is deliriously happy with his re-found youth.

Marie is happy until she realizes that she might die before he acquires the necessary funds and that—most importantly—there now exists an impossible chasm to bridge betwixt the two. Realizing this, he sagely decides to find peace in life in his original body.

With this backdrop, the old man and his wife walk into an uncertain future, held together by their love and devotion for each other.

Here is Rod Serlings' final narration:

From Kahil Gibran's The Prophet: 'Love gives not but itself and takes not from itself, love possesses not nor would it be possessed, for love is sufficient unto love.' Not a lesson, just a reminder, for all the sentimentalists in the Twilight Zone.

This episode is a sentimental venture into what many men ponder in their life: what would it be like to recover youth lost? This question inevitably plagues the minds of many men—especially as they grow older and they realize that the once open book of their life has slowly but surely become an increasingly rigid narrative with more written than is to be written.

The desire to chase proverbial fountains of youth is nothing new. Greek writer Herodotus spoke of fountains of youth, as have many writers in countless other cultures. Spanish explorer, Ponce de Leon, came to the America to find a fabled fountain of youth. There is nothing new under the sun and the desire to find a path back into one's past and reclaim the glory of youth is a universal impulse.

However, the desire often comes at a steep price for those who indulge it. Much like the proverbial Narcissus, the desire to relive or reclaim youth becomes an obsession that operates at the expense of real life. Narcissus stared into the pond, stirring at the water, dreaming of the possibilities his reflection could be. His body wasted away over the years as Narcissus only dreamed of what could be.

While nobody truly can waste their life staring at their reflection in a pool of water, they can waste so much of their life fretting over what could of been instead of leaving the past in the past and worrying about the future without actively bettering it. The nervous energy expended here operates at the expense at reality and can only result in depression and unhappiness.

The desire to reclaim youth often betrays a man who hasn't lived his life as he desired. A man only gets one shot at life, one chance to roll the dice and let the chips fall where they may. When a man lives by circumstance or fancy, he exposes himself to the merciless allure of chasing his own youth endlessly. When life isn't lived with deliberate purpose and love, a man sets himself up for restless unhappiness and racking discontentment.

Take John in this episode. He is an elderly man who has a loving wife and presumably has had a degree of success in life. Despite this, he felt the burning itch—along with his wife—to flip the pages of his life back to the beginning.

Walking amongst the displays, his spirit was buoyed and inspired by the ripe energy and blooming vigor of the youthful models. His mind and spirit was temporarily transported back to when the world seemed limitless and the dreams of today were the promises of tomorrow.

Of course, such callow aspirations are the province the young. As John has indubitably learned in his long life, the world is no man's oyster and dreams often wash up—tattered and torn—on the indifferent coasts of reality. However, there still burned a fierce ember in his soul that hadn't truly conceded to this realization. With his hand firmly in his wife's hand, he broached the possibility of one more shot at youth and all that it entails—a shot at glory, fame, wealth and love.

Having not accumulated the necessary wealth to reverse both and him and his wife simultaneously, John decides to transform himself and earn the funds necessary to whisk his wife back in time with him. Marie reacts poorly upon seeing his new form. His wife's horror at his transformation could be borne out of a couple reasons: he is no longer the man she fell in love with or her realization that they are transgressing the nature of the circle of life.

Regardless, John realizes that the arc of life has already brought him through youth, middle-age and into the quiet beauty of old age. He returns to his wrinkled, aged body and finds his rightful side beside his equally wrinkled and aged wife. While they walk away into an uncertain future, they go with the sure-footedness that only come from love and a life lived with purpose.

What John presumably learned about life can be distilled down into a simple rule: One must use the time he has while he has it. Time is the world's most awesome resource purely because it cannot be added, subtracted, multiplied nor divided. It indifferently marches on, without regard to any man. It passes on of its own accord, much like the current in a flowing stream.

John realized that he had lived his life as he wanted. He put in his years at a job, presumably raised a family and—most importantly—had found and stayed with the love of his life. When he beholds her terror at seeing his new, youthful body, he realizes that he was betraying one of the most important and life-affirming aspects of his life: the love of his wife. He had lived his life and it was time to let the circle of life run its course.

While this progression of life might not be for every man, a man must find what works for him. In order to feel a sense of accomplishment, contentment and personal gratitude, he must find what fits in life. By definition, this is an intensely personal inquiry that often is revisited and revised over the arc of a life.

However, when time is managed with deft precision and care, one can truly find happiness and contentment in this fleeting wisp of life. The mindfulness that springs from appreciating the ephemeral nature of time is a valuable tool. Indeed, it acts as a ward against the tempestuous and illicit allure of nostalgia and the chasing of youth vanished.

Tag The Sponsor Exposes The Depravity Of Modern Women

March 2, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Have you ever wondered how popular Instagram models can afford their lavish lifestyles? All of them post selfies in which they're showing off expensive sports cars or vacationing in exotic locales, yet they all work low-paid jobs as bartenders or waitresses.

You probably figured some chump was paying for their Louis Vuitton purses and trips to Cabo, but you didn't know the sheer depths these girls would sink to just for a few bucks.

The man behind the curtain has been revealed, and it's not a pretty sight. Say hello to Tag the Sponsor, a blog that exposes Instagram models for the craven whores that they are:

> In 2015 we should stop gassing up these Instagram "Models" like they're godsent. We are putting them on a pedestal for just showing ass. Too many #CaptainSaveAHoes defending them, like these bitches got some special skills to satisfy you… Instagram model means prostitute, they might as well start to put their rates under the pictures because they won't be fooling anyone for much longer. We are pro-prostitution. But we are against women who sell pussy and try to put down those who actually work and make a decent living calling them #Basic. We are against fraudulent hoes, pretentiousness and bigotry…

As it turns out, most if not all Instagram models make their living by being "sponsored," meaning they get paid to fly to Dubai and have sex with an Arab sheik and ten of his best buddies. But these hoes don't simply rent their pussies out for cash: they engage in some of the most disgusting sex acts you can imagine. Tag the Sponsor reveals just what these girls are willing to do for a little extra spending money:

> Yes this * is real, I know a guy who is a "model recruiter" who gets paid to find girls who are basically willing to whore themselves out to rich Saudis with oil money. The Saudis pay anywhere from $10,000 to as much as $50,000 per girl for each trip which last anywhere from a weekend up to 2 weeks and they basically * the * out of the girls multiple times a day with with just about every fetish you could imagine including * and pooping/peeing on the girls. The Saudis take pride in pooping/peeing on the girls and more often than not they make personal bets and hold contests to see who can get the most liquidy poop to drop on the girls faces, the winner gets to choose the next vacation spot and gets to pick his girls first.

That's right: the girls you see on Instagram with hordes of orbiters proclaiming how they would "suck a fart out of [her] ass" are getting paid to have Arabs squirt diarrhea in their faces. There's even a colloquial term for these tarts: "Dubai porta potties."

If Tag the Sponsor doesn't convince you that we've slid all the way to Gomorrah, nothing will. Here we have an entire class of women who are so lacking in decency that they'll shove salmon up their vaginas so they can afford to shop at Saks Fifth Avenue. A civilization where women sell themselves—not even to survive, but for frivolous luxury items—is a civilization in terminal decline.

How Selling Sex Corrupts Women

Absent from the debate on pornography, prostitution and the like is the spiritual element. The central problem with sex work isn't disease, degeneracy, or the Bible's disapproval. Transactional sex inherently ruins the souls of both women and men. I witnessed this first hand.

The Philippines, where I lived for part of last year, has a large and visible sex industry. Beyond the seedy strip joints and freelancer-filled expat bars in Manila, there's a sizable number of "normal" Filipinas who will accept money for sex if you proposition them the right way. Morons assume that Filipino girls are selling themselves out solely because of poverty, but the reality is more complicated than that.

The typical Filipina prostitute is a working-class girl, poor but not destitute. She lives with her family, doesn't have a college degree, and is a single mother more often than not. She whores herself out not out of desperation, but avarice. By Philippine standards, prostitutes, particularly young ones, make a damn good living. One girl I talked to at L.A. Cafe told me that she made up to 7,000-8,000 pesos a night (about $160-180) sleeping with tourists.

While it's true that most retail-type jobs in the Philippines pay horribly—say maybe 5,000 pesos a month (about $110), and you'll be working twelve hours a day, six days a week—these girls have a social safety net in the form of their family. They're not in danger of becoming homeless and they live in a society that values chastity and traditional morals. They whore themselves out because they're greedy, because money is worth more to them than virtue.

And frankly, it catches up to them quickly. The girl I talked to could charge so much because she was both young and cute. To give you a comparison, a few days later, I was at a club in Malate when a fat, thirtyish hooker offered me "boom-boom" for 1,000 pesos. She was ugly enough that I wouldn't have let her pay me. At the same time, I felt sorry for her: charging foreigners discount prices on blowjobs has got to be a depressing existence.

Other examples abound of how sex work degrades women. For example, Miriam Weeks, who became famous last year as the "Duke porn star" Belle Knox, recently admitted in an interview that the porn industry had made her "cynical" and "bitter." This is why it's incredibly irresponsible for the media to hold up women like Weeks as heroes. While not all women who end up in the sex industry will be ruined by it, enough do that it's not a choice any sane society encourages girls to make.

The Instagram models getting trolled by Tag the Sponsor have sipped from a poisoned chalice. Their souls are being warped by the repulsive acts their sponsors make them do. Even if they luck out and manage to find a chump who will marry them knowing what they've done, the memories of the sick acts they've committed will haunt them for the rest of their lives.

I wager more than a few Instagram models will become drug addicts (if they aren't already) and commit suicide before they turn 40.

How Paying For Sex Corrupts Men

There's another aspect to Tag the Sponsor that hasn't been discussed: the men who are blowing obscene sums of money so they can use pretty girls as outhouses. Again, observing the Philippine sex industry allows me to see how sex work degrades the men who partake in it.

Women like to flatter themselves by thinking that all they need to do is show up, look hot and men will be turned on. It's not that simple. Men need an emotional connection to the women they bang in order to enjoy themselves. I'm not talking about twoo wove, either: booze-fueled lust is more than enough.

If a man tries to bang a woman who is clearly not into him, who isn't giving off those pheromones of lust, his own body will revolt against him (this is why rape, despite feminist claims, is so rare).

There's a reason why whoremongers in Southeast Asia have to pop Viagra in order to get it up with hookers, and it's not because they have erectile dysfunction. It's because their bodies know that the hookers don't like them and are only sleeping with them for the money. Using artificial drugs is the only way they can trick their dicks into overcoming their innate repulsion to having sex with an unwilling girl.

In the specific case of these Arab sheiks, these are men who are wealthier and more privileged then the kings of old. But instead of using their fortunes to advance science, culture or philosophy, they pay women to have sex with German shepherds. They are degenerates in every sense of the word, fools who have squandered a great gift on pointless hedonism.

Get Those Girls Off That Pedestal

If there's one good thing about Tag the Sponsor, it's this: it'll help countless men stop sucking up to women.

Here's some cold, hard truth: there are no snowflakes. There are good women out there, yes, but as a whole, girls do not deserve your worship or praise. They are just people, nothing more. And in the case of the Instagram models, there's no reason to be intimidated by beautiful women. That drop-dead gorgeous girl you're crushing on is likely getting paid to have a Saudi sheik shit on her nose and watch it drip down her chin.

The next time you're tempted to Like a girl's selfie on Facebook or write a slobbering comment about how good she looks, just think of the "Dubai porta potties" and smile.

Into Desolate Sands: The Arabian Travels Of Wilfred Thesiger

March 2, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

On August 3, 2003, an old man of ninety-three died quietly in a rest home in England, leaving behind him a sixty-year legacy of travel experiences, a series of elegant books, and an incredible archive of photographs taken by him throughout the Middle East and Africa. His name was Wilfred Thesiger, and he was one of the most colorful and intrepid British explorers of the twentieth century.

He traveled extensively with, and lived among, the native peoples of the Sudan, Saudi Arabia, southern Iraq, and Kenya, enduring extreme hardships under the most arduous conditions. His only peers in Arabian exploration are Richard Burton and Johann Burkhardt, who belonged to the previous century.

An Englishman who dared to go where few had gone

Thesiger was born in what is now Ethiopia, the son of a career British diplomat. His experiences and memories there, he tells us, “implanted in me a lifelong craving for barbaric spendor, for savagery and colour and the throb of drum, and it gave me a lasting veneration for long-established custom and ritual…” His education was furthered at Eton and Oxford, though without the barbaric splendor. He did, however, excel in boxing and other vigorous sports, and displayed an affinity for languages.

During the 1930s, he participated in African expeditions in the Sudan and Abyssinia under the auspices of the Royal Geographic Society and the Sudan Political Service. These early experiences honed his proficiency in Arabic and Islamic customs, knowledge that would prove invaluable to him soon enough.

When war came in 1939, Thesiger was attached to a British auxiliary unit in the Sudan that conducted hit-and-run raids into Italian Abyssinia; he was decorated for his involvement in an attack on one garrison at Agibar.

The winding down of the war, and the British Empire, placed Thesiger finally in a position to execute a plan he had contemplated for years: to explore the remote, nearly unknown desert interior of Arabia. Even well into the twentieth century, the wastes of southern Arabia were known only to the few hardy Bedouin tribes who haunted them; and they, existing in a perpetual state of warfare with each other, revealed nothing to the despised عجمي (ajami), the “foreigner.” Even other Arabs knew well enough to give them a wide berth.

Not even the Romans had been able to subdue the peoples of this area. According to the Greek geographer Strabo, a Roman expeditionary force commanded by Aelius Gallus was sent to win over the region for the empire in 26 B.C. It was destroyed by disease and native treachery in the Arabian interior, after having been deceived by local guides.

Southern Arabia retained its independence, and no foreign power–neither the medieval Arabic caliphates nor the Ottomans–ever entirely controlled them. The situation had changed little in the intervening two thousand years. As Thesiger relates in his classic account of his travels, Arabian Sands (1959):

> The southern desert [of Arabia] stretches for nine hundred miles from the frontier > of the Yemen to the foothills of Oman, and for five hundred miles from the southern coast of Arabia to the Persian Gulf and the borders of the Najd. The greater part of it is a wilderness of sand; it is a desert within a desert, so enormous and so desolate that even Arabs call it the Rub al Khali, or the Empty Quarter.

It was into this cauldron of sand, heat, flies, and tribal conflict that Thesiger now plunged. Already proficient in Arabic, he prepared extensively by educating himself in Islamic rituals and customs, from the tiniest details of ablution to the most intricate and recondite aspects of Bedouin toiletry.

He would go barefoot, as the natives did, for Thesiger made it a point of pride to subject himself to as much brutal discomfort as possible. In this habit he was similar to his progenitors of Arabian exploration, Johann Burkhardt and Richard Burton. This passage in Arabian Sands gives a revealing view into the author's thinking:

> Soon after dinner I would spread out my rug and sheepskin and, putting my dagger and cartridge belt under the saddle-bags which I used as a pillow, lie down beneath three blankets with my rifle beside me. While I was among the Arabs I was anxious to behave as they did, so that they would accept me to some extent as one of themselves. I had therefore to sit as they did, and I found this very trying, for my muscles were not accustomed to this position…For the same reason I went barefoot as they did, and at first this was torture. Eventually the soles of my feet became hardened, but even after five years they were soft compared with theirs.

Thesiger's pretext to conduct explorations was his hiring by a British firm searching for locust breeding grounds in southern Arabia; but he appears to have financed a good deal of his travels himself. He had no family and would remain a bachelor until his death at the age of ninety-three; for such men, travel is the all-consuming passion of their lives.

This photo, taken by Thesiger, gives an idea of the desolation of the Empty Quarter

In 1946, he crossed into Arabia from Oman with a small party of Bedouin. Some of his party refused to continue, but he pressed ahead with several youths from the Rashid and Bait Kathir clans, whom he had won over with his humility and willing austerities. A second journey into the Empty Quarter was undertaken in 1947 from Yemen.

This time Thesiger was not so lucky; ignoring royal directives from the Saudi king to proceed no further, he was arrested and jailed in Sulayil. His charm quickly secured him release, and he eventually made his way to Abu Dhabi, which in those days was little more than a provincial backwater.

The details of these travels were collected into what would become one of the great travel accounts of the twentieth century: Arabian Sands. Published in 1959, it was written by Thesiger during an intense period of seclusion in Copenhagen, which he found to be a necessary aid to concentration. The book has a vigorous and unadorned prose style, and is illustrated with photographs taken by Thesiger himself. It remains a classic of its genre.

Thesiger was an outspoken opponent of petroleum exploration in the region, rightly believing that its attendant riches would corrupt both holder and recipient. An ardent traditionalist and romantic, he was a nineteenth century figure profoundly out of place in the postwar twentieth century world.

The remainder of his life would be occupied by travel and writing. He lived for a number of years among the so-called “marsh Arabs” (the Madan) of southern Iraq in the late 1950s, gaining their trust and learning their ways. These experiences were recounted in The Marsh Arabs (1964), a precious travel record in its own right.

Another one of Thesiger’s photographs taken in the Empty Quarter

Further travels followed to other regions of Africa and the Middle East, too numerous to mention here. He was knighted in 1995, and surprised himself by living into the new century. His extensive collection of photographs, numbering over twenty three thousand, show a remarkable eye for artistic composition and attention to detail. They are housed in a special gallery at the Pitt Rivers Museum in Oxford.

Thesiger was perhaps the last of the great British Middle Eastern explorers in the traditional mold. His place in the history of travel is assured, although we cannot quite rank him with Burton or Johann Burkhardt. Thesiger never traveled in disguise, like his predecessors, and never presented himself to be anything else than what he was.

Burton, however, was a far better linguist and ethnographer, and took greater risks; and Burkhardt was the original pioneer who blazed the way for both of them.

English gentleman, scholar, Arabist, and explorer

Yet Thesiger was perhaps the more accessibly human of the two; he is frank, self-effacing, and not without a wicked sense of humor. He is a gentleman, with a nobility of spirit that shines through in his obvious affection for the local peoples to whom he never condescends.

In him we feel the pulse of a man compelled to test himself relentlessly against the extremities of travail, to push the boundaries of his zone of comfort, and to seek the churning unknown inside himself. By navigating the wilds of the desert, with its desiccated features and ghastly expanses, he sought and found his own soul.

A Greatest Hits Collection Of Millennial Women, Internet Shaming, And Professional Victimhood

March 2, 2015 | by Georges Rigondeaux | Link | Original Link

A recent Guardian article revisits the curious case of Lindsey Stone. Ms. Stone, as you may remember, became internet famous in the worst kind of way by being tagged in a friend's picture at Arlington National Cemetery.

While approximately 4 million people visit Arlington every year, none before her had decided to take a tasteless and disrespectful picture and post it on social media.

Douchebag

Social Media Shaming

I personally know three men interred at Arlington. They were three of the bravest and best men I ever came across in my life. As you can imagine, none of their deaths were easy; in chronological order, they were due to mortar attack, sniper bullet, and helicopter crash.

Needless to say, I am one of many who found the picture of Ms. Stone egregiously disrespectful. The internet backlash caused her to be fired and she fell into “depression, [and] became an insomniac.” I can’t say whether or not poor Lindsey should’ve lost her job over the ordeal. I can say that I don’t feel that bad about it. Since the picture was taken on a trip for her job, I can understand a company wanting to distance itself from this kind of PR nightmare.

In perusing the Guardian article two years down the road, the most remarkable thing is that even though it tries to show her in a sympathetic light there was still a noticeable lack of contrition on the part of Ms. Stone. Rather, she is made out to be the victim instead of an adult responsible for her actions.

Instead of an admission of guilt or apology, there are hints at Facebook conspiracies and condemnation of her treatment at the hands of the media. Her solipsism does not let her understand the sensibilities of those legions of people who found her actions disdainful. She still thinks ‘It was just about a sign.” So in rushes Michael Fertik of reputation.com to save Lindsey from her internet infamy.

Triggering Intensifies

Also in the Guardian article is a rehashing of "Donglegate." Just shy of two years after the event, the author has a sit down with one of our favorite feminists of color, Adria Richards. What follows is a peek inside the twisted world of a social justice warrior.

When questioned about her initial reaction to overhearing a slightly risqué joke, Adria said she felt "Danger…Clearly my body was telling me, 'You are unsafe.'" When challenged on the absurdity most people would perceive of feeling threatened in a room full of 2,000 people, she pulls out the usual SJW trope: "Sure," she replied. "And those people would probably be white and they would probably be male."

If this is the case, how does this person leave their house? A joke between two of the most harmless-looking men on the planet scares you?

Run for your life!

Perhaps she wasn't frightened as much as she was affronted. How dare those two heterosexual white beta males behind her make a joke! The compartmentalization displayed by Ms. Richards is astounding to behold. Just like they did for Lindsey Stone, the Guardian tries to portray Adria in a sympathetic light. But she makes it very hard for them.

After the internet shitstorm she incited led to her termination, she laments, "I felt betrayed. I felt abandoned. I felt ashamed. I felt rejected. I felt alone.'' Probably not unlike the married father of three she had earlier caused to be fired from his job. But rather than empathize with the man she shamed other than grudgingly, she instead continues to play the victim and blame him for all her woes.

> "[H]is own actions that resulted in his own firing, yet he framed it in a way to > blame me… If I had a spouse and two kids to support, I certainly would not be telling ‘jokes’ like he was doing at a conference. Oh, but wait, I have compassion, empathy, morals and ethics to guide my daily life choices. I often wonder how people like ‘Hank’ make it through life seemingly unaware of how ‘the other’ lives in the same world he does, but with countless fewer opportunities.

The Struggle is Real

That’s right, she is blaming him for apologizing whilst concurrently refusing to take responsibility for her own actions. If you have to specifically list all of your admirable traits unsolicited, I have a strong suspicion you don’t actually have any. I certainly cannot ascertain and abundance of “compassion, empathy, morals and ethics” in Ms. Richards’ words and actions.

If she had any small degree of compassion or empathy, she would’ve at least remembered that the man whose life she tried to ruin had three kids, not two. There is a silver lining, inasmuch as the man she caused to be fired found a new job (in a female-free work place), and Adria had not.

It would be an exercise in futility to point out to her that she seems to spend at least as much time being a professional victim as she does being a “developer,” and such a person is a liability to any company foolish enough to hire her.

Shaming and Victimhood

Both Lindsey Stone and Adria Richards are typical millennial women, albeit from slightly different places on the spectrum of silliness. Both are readily able to blame anyone but themselves, and see fault in anything except their own actions. For both, the passage of two years or so has not led any self-examination or admission of wrong-doing.

The Feminine Imperative endemic in modern western society enables them, while simultaneously blaming every ill on the dreaded white-cis-het-male. So what are we as men to do? We must realize that shaming has had a long history in our social constructs. Dalrock wrote a great post about slut shaming and its role in the SMP of past and present.

Public shaming is something employed in an attempt to modify behavior. Case in point, the poor beta who was the subject of Adria Richards' public shaming: He admitted wrong-doing, apologized profusely, and showed genuine contrition. He admits the incident has influenced his behavior, specifically "I'm not as friendly. There's humour, but it's very mundane. You just don't know. I can't afford another Donglegate."

However, such things are no longer good enough for SJWs. So we modify our behavior, but not in the way they want. As shown by the backlash caused by donglegate, we have the means to fight back against SJWs' encroachment into our spaces. We must remember that the SJW worldview and inherit solipsism does not allow them to feel shame the same way we do.

Since part of their currency is the prestige and recognition of being "right-minded", exposing their hypocrisy and narcissism depletes their pretenses at both.

Conclusion

As evidenced by Ms. Richards and Ms. Stone, Millennial women are indeed quite shameless. Perpetual victims such as them can never be appeased short of a blank check and full societal control. Even pornstars know that they don't give a shit about actual victims.

Thus, the process of shaming them isn't to modify their behavior, but rather the behavior of others. As opponents of #Gamergate continually lose credibility, so too do its proponents gain leverage. The SJW cries of "victim blaming" are merely an attempt to absolve people of responsibility for their actions.

Call them on their bullshit. Expose them as the frauds they are. Better yet, hurt their wallets.

Invest In Your Sons

March 2, 2015 | by Dylan Frost | Link | Original Link

It wasn't until my siblings and I were fully grown that I realized the necessity of investing in your sons. I come from a family of three children, with me being that last in line with two older sisters. Growing up, I'd like to think that we were all raised rather fairly, without too much favoritism towards any one of us in particular.

But like most families, much of the preparation for raising children to become adults starts with the oldest child, and then down to the others. By the time both of my sisters had started college and had strained my parents financially, it was my turn to go to school and there wasn't much help my parents could offer anymore; I had to work and pay for myself.

Now, I don't want this to come off as a sob story; "Oh, poor me who had to pay for my own education!" But the results of the money my parents invested in my sisters first compared to their outcomes in life really struck me as to why it is important to invest in your son's endeavors.

A Case Study

My oldest sister, the star child of the group with straight As throughout school, ultimately ended up getting a degree in journalism (no surprise in today's climate) and has spent the last decade bouncing between odd jobs. By the saving grace of her recent fiancée (an engineer), she now lives comfortably doing whatever she pleases as he works as the breadwinner.

The thousands of dollars that went to her education have ultimately become a waste, and she seems to not have a care in the world about it. She recently lamented that she was “bored with life;” Oh, how hard it must be to have a man taking care of all of your bills while you sit around the house and aren’t out on the streets.

My next sister was the wild child. We were all surprised when she chose to go to college, but in the typical female-child mentality, she decided to get a degree in fashion design. Somewhere down the line, she became a repulsive hairy-armpit overweight vegan, and I shit you not, she now works as a vet tech taking care of cats. Obviously she had no backup plan when her dreams of being a fashionista were doomed to fail.

It happened to my sister. It can happen to your daughters too.

I guess the point is, it doesn’t matter what your daughters are going to do. The wild child is ultimately going to end up making poor choices and failing you as a parent, and even your little princess with the most promise will ultimately end up marrying a man who will turn her into a housewife anyway.

So this is why you should invest in your sons. I worked to save money, I learned two different languages, I paid for my own college education (international business), and I’ve spent the last five years living in both Tokyo, Japan and Seoul, South Korea while visiting another dozen countries to boot.

I can only wonder how much easier this process of getting to where I want in life would have been if only my parents had the foresight to understand how their daughters would turn out. Invest in your sons. They’ll get educations, they’ll open businesses, they’ll create wealth for themselves and travel and live the life of men with the world in the palm of their hands. Your daughters will become housewives at best, cat ladies at worst.

Mercedes Carrera Explains Why Cytherea's Rape Was Not Covered By The Feminist-Dominated Media

We recently reported on how the home invasion rape of porn actress Cytherea was met with complete silence by feminists and the media, in spite of the fact that they are actively pushing a "rape culture" narrative where men are portrayed as privileged date rapists.

> If ever there was a story for feminists to get enraged about, this would be it. According to SJWs, America fosters a "rape culture," where sexual assault is trivialized and men are encouraged to feel "entitled" to womens' bodies. You can't get more entitled than a gang of ghetto thugs invading a woman's home and raping her at gunpoint.
> —From Why Are Feminists Ignoring The Violent Gang Rape Of Porn Star Cytherea?

One of Cytherea's industry colleagues, Mercedes Carrera, was instrumental in publicizing the incident and starting a fundraiser with the help of the following video, which has received over 100,000 views on Youtube:

I interviewed Ms. Carrera to find out why there has been a lack of response to Cytherea's story. Below is our conversation, with my questions in bold.

Can you describe your relationship with Cytherea. Is it mostly professional or are you on friendly terms with her as well? How does she feel about your involvement in publicizing what happened to her?

Cytherea is a colleague of mine and we have mutual friends. She is beloved as a veteran of the porn industry. I got involved in fundraising because I heard the story through several mutual friends, did some research, and realized that her fundraiser could use more people to additionally boost it.

When I spent a little more time on it, I was disgusted by how the mainstream media was ignoring this very relevant story (as lately there's so much talk of "rape culture", yet a real rape against a celebrity was only reported on our industry websites). I made that brief video of my frustrations then talked to Cytherea, a few of her friends and other people in the industry. All have been supportive on the video and concurred with me. Even several long time industry veterans reached out to me specifically to thank me for saying what many of them have been thinking.

For me, this is and always has been about getting as much support for Cytherea as possible. As a result of the video and fundraising, Cytherea and I are in fairly constant communication and she has said she appreciates the efforts that we have all gone to to help.

You pointed out the feminist hypocrisy of glorifying fake victims (the cases of Emma Sulkowicz and the UVA rape hoax come to mind). Feminists have a platform where they seek equality and opportunity for women, but they were eerily silent when a woman was genuinely harmed and needed help. Why do you think that is?

I believe the feminists that get media attention these days are the same ilk as the wealthy Victorian era suffragettes: wealthy white women whose panties are in a bunch over imagined slights and imagined injustices. They do not, and never have, spoken for women who are on the outside of their exclusive group. Sex workers, women of color, economically disadvantaged white women are not part of their platform. Those women who have to think about how they are going to eat or live are excluded from the conversation. Women who cannot afford $29.95 "This is what a feminist looks like" t-shirts made by female slave labor in Madagascar are excluded from the conversation.

Additionally, because this was a random example of "rape culture" and the attackers were disadvantaged young black men (not wealthy white lacrosse players) it is too complex of a social issue for them to want to delve into. Issues of race, socioeconomics and rape cannot easily be deconstructed into the binary paradigms of "patriarchy" or "misogyny" so they'd rather ignore it altogether. Further, a sex worker is less "valuable" in their imaginary class system hierarchy than a "proper" wealthy feminist college student.

Bottom line: It cannot be politicized to fit their left marxist agenda. At the core, modern sex negative radical feminism is less about gender and more about the societal control of all groups that are not them.

In the manosphere we have a term called "red pill" to describe beliefs that go against the current cultural Marxist narrative that attempts to hide uncomfortable truths of our reality. It seems like you have come to very similar conclusions as myself and other men on Return Of Kings. What would you say are the main influences or experiences that allowed you to see the lies and fabrications that are pushed upon the masses by the media and their feminist allies?

Having had experiences in “blue pill” environments and having the faculty of discernment has led me to most of my current conclusions. Additionally, in my current environment, many of the players are surprisingly “red-pilled”. I believe this is the result of being in a fringe type industry that is often attacked by those who adhere to the current mainstream narrative. I was raised in an environment of working class people who had a lineage of, ironically, being members of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP). While I am most certainly not a member of this group, I grew up hearing stories of sedition and McCarthyism and am thus familiar with how far the reach of government, especially when working class people band together to protest the narrative.

You’ve been involved in Gamergate from the beginning, a consumer revolt against unethical journalists that have pushed the social justice narrative upon gamers. What seems to have happened in that gamergate has stopped being acute activism and now become a prolonged movement that is causing continuous damage to the SJW narrative. Do you see a connection between gamergate’s origins and how the media has been silent on Cytherea’s attack? How deep does the rot go?

I was not involved from the onset [of gamergate] but joined several months in when I saw the inequity of the reporting done by the mainstream media. What I see is a consumer revolt centered around the unjust media and corporate collusion happening in the microcosm of gaming. What I also saw were people who, instead of taking personal responsibility for their collusion, decided to paint all of their detractors as abusers and harassers.

The most out of place of these is Anita Sarkeesian, who made herself relevant by hijacking the media narrative and narcissistically turning this well needed consumer revolt into a conversation about her. Part of the reason I spoke out is these anti-sex radicals such as Sarkeesian make quite a lot of profit pretending to speak for women like myself. To me this is completely unacceptable and something I will not stand for. Additionally, having a minority female sex worker protest the media narrative that GamerGate is a misogynistic hate group has been hopefully useful in disbanding that myth.

I believe the silence on Cytherea proves again that the media is currently under the stranglehold of people who would like to monopolize the narrative for their own purposes. If rape culture is so prolific, then why not report on the rape? In fact, many of the sex-negative radicals have gone so far to victim shame and in some way disgustingly imply that because porn stars are responsible for “rape culture”, Cytherea in some way deserved the attack. This proves the point that the current anti-sex radical feminist groups are not about justice for women or about ending “rape culture” but rather are about weakening others so that they can control society with their ideology.

The truth is, that the only “rape culture” they want to focus on is that which they imagine exists on college campuses, which makes me wonder if their current targets are actually wealthy and middle class young men. If that is the case (and I believe it is) then it is consistent with a left marxist narrative to actually decimate the last remaining caste of people who might oppose their ideology.

An ideal world would ignore privileged women favored by the media such as Anita Sarkeesian and focus on genuine hardships that both women and men face. In terms of solutions, what steps do we need to take to get there? Is gamergate the ideal model for how the narrative can be beat? Or maybe you can give me direct advice since I publish sites that reach a lot of men, and increasingly as of late, women.

I wish I was as adept at identifying solutions as I am identifying problems. It seems, and correct me if I'm wrong, that the best solution would be a strong independent media. Fortunately, in spite of the current power play to monopolize the narrative, technology has allowed independent voices such as yourself to speak freely and reach larger markets than would have been possible several decades ago. I believe as independent sites pick up stories that mainstream media neglects, it will lead to you all gaining credibility as the voice of the people. Further, even though there is a current push to monopolize discourse, I believe more people than ever are questioning the drivel they are being fed by the mainstream.

Unrelated to Cytherea: Return Of Kings has a lot of male readers who are tired, frustrated, and even angry about how modern culture is pushing them aside and punishing their masculine instinct to portray them as a privileged gender that needs to pay back for the sins of men of the past. It doesn't help that modern young women are less interested in relationships with a good man than chasing 50 Shades-style excitement with bad boys. The advice I've been giving them so far is to simulate bad boy behavior by learning game or outright moving to countries that have women who primarily seek relationships. Do you have any advice for these men? What do you think they should they do?

Again, I see the problem clearly but not the solutions necessarily. I believe self awareness is key as well as not tolerating any bullshit behavior. As soon as people play games with each other their relationships are doomed. I do think there are many women out there who are just as tired of the modern culture (as is evidenced by the large female proportion of GamerGaters).

Although, at this point I would advise any young man on a college campus particularly to be especially careful when engaging sexually with a new woman and if possible have consent recorded in the form of text messages or other social media in case he is ever unfairly accused of rape. If I had a son college age, I would be particularly concerned about the rape culture hysteria and the potential possibility of false accusations (as we saw in the U.Va. case). As it stands, this behavior will be more damaging to young women than men, as more and more men decide to either marry foreign women or decline relationships altogether. I hope very much that the pendulum will swing the other way and young people will buck these trends that will have long term negative impact on their relationships.

For those who want to help Cytherea, how can they do so?

To help support Cytherea, please go to the You Caring fundraiser.

Additionally, we are collecting 30 second videos for Cytherea for those who would like to participate. #30SecondsForCytherea is the hashtag and people can email their links to me at These snippets will be compiled into a video in support of Cytherea.

Thank you again for your willingness to cover this story!

Teenage Girl Encourages Boyfriend To Kill Himself And Then Starts A Suicide Awareness Campaign

March 3, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Massachusetts high school senior Michelle Carter has raised thousands of dollars for suicide prevention over the internet after her boyfriend Conrad Roy III committed suicide on July 13, 2014 by carbon monoxide poisoning in his truck.

But now Carter is facing charges for involuntary manslaughter. Police have recently discovered that while committing the act, Roy texted Carter that he changed his mind and exited the truck. Carter texted him back, "Get back in." In American law, suicide is a form of murder, and therefore this could make her an accomplice to murder.

Legally there are a few issues. For one thing, Carter's cousin is the district attorney and has removed himself from the case. Also, it is unclear how much Carter influenced Roy and whether he would have committed suicide anyway.

Attention

It appears that Carter's attention whoring was premeditated. The Washington Post writes,

> [Police Detective] Gordon alleges that such a plan was evident because late on the night of July 11, two days before her boyfriend was found dead, Carter had "already started explaining (to friends) that it's her fault that Conrad is dead, even though he was still alive and speaking and texting with her regularly."
> That same day, Carter also texted Roy: "Let me know when you're gonna do it."

After the suicide, Carter rushed to Twitter to earn her social credits as a good person.

When Carter helped organize a fundraising softball tournament, Roy's close friends began to suspect she was just fishing for attention and status while she accused them of the same, claiming they were "taking credit for [her] idea." She kept making a point to insist on being listed on the Facebook page as an organizer until they finally relented just to appease her.

Carter also held the fundraiser in the town Plainville where she lived, whereas the other organizers suggested it be in Mattapoisett where all of Roy's family and friends were.

According to them, she also has a history of being attention hungry and "being the 'girl that cried wolf.'" His friends were unaware that the two had been dating, and at least one had never heard of her. That's very strange, since teenage boys (and really, all men in general) are known for showing off their women like a trophy.

But maybe he was just embarrassed to be dating what now appears to be a sociopath. I had a girlfriend in college I kept a secret from all but mutual friends for a few weeks.

Euthanasia Or Just Youth?

On September 15, Carter texted a friend,

> …his death is my fault like honestly I could have stopped him I was on the phone with him and he got out of the car because it was working and he got scared and I (expletive) told him to get back in… because I knew he would do it all over again the next day and I couldn't have him live the way he was living anymore I couldn't do it I wouldn't let him…

Maybe she really did tell him to end it all out of a concern for his well-being. Or maybe she's just running the hamster on the rationalization wheel and trying to retroactively weave a possibly good motive into a horrible act. I'm inclined to think the latter, but I'm cynical in general. But even if it was the former, Carter is still a horrible human being.

Personally I have some sympathy towards euthanasia, but I don't think anyone would qualify this incident as a good example of how that should happen. Why does an 18-year-old kid have the expertise needed to recommend that? Why would nothing be able to relieve Roy's suffering? His grandmother thought he had began to get better and could have been persuaded not to go through with it.

Every teenager thinks his life is terrible. Clinical depression has become a rite of passage. Notice that she doesn't say what it was he was upset about. Maybe his girlfriend telling him he was better off dead made him think no one loved him.

Or perhaps Carter encouraged him to do it because she was tired of watching him suffer?

No, that can't be it. The death would be far too painful for her than the depression. And she enjoyed too much fame afterwards. If it was some kind of stoic action from a dramatic war movie, then she'd ride off into the sunset and never speak about it again.

Train A Child In The Way She Should Go

Carter's parents, of course, are defending her. They claim that she is a good girl and that the media is trying to slander her name. They claim that the facts just aren't all released yet and that anyone who knows her will agree with her. Apparently Roy's friends from the fundraiser would disagree.

This is a common line of thought in western thinking over the last several centuries, that if I just give you enough information, you'll come to agree with my viewpoint. And if you don't agree with me, then you're "ignorant." The reason for this scandal isn't because Carter is a sociopath. It's because others just haven't taken the time to get to know her.

And maybe they are correct the facts aren't all out yet. But this seems pretty clear cut. What other facts are we missing? And why didn't the parents mention those facts in the interview?

This line of thinking also really bothers because they are unable to admit fault with their daughter. I don't have any kids, so I can't really know how I'd react if one of mine did something like this, but I'm assuming I'd view him like that kid in The Omen.

There's no negative reinforcement with the way the parents are treating their kid. Maybe she's just too pretty in that Disney kind of way to be guilty of something so henious. I get that they don't want her to go to jail, but at the least they could have the self-respect to decline commenting to the media instead of making a parade about it. Like mother, like daughter.

People claim that the millennial generation is worthless, but who raised us? Sometimes when the child misbehaves, it is the teacher who should be whipped. There should be more articles on the internet shaming the parents for raising such a blight on society.

8 Essential Rules For Banging Married Chicks

It's been said that as many as one out of ten children weren't fathered by the man they believe to be their dad. There are studies out there to counter this statistic (1 out of 25 is still too many) so nobody really knows for certain what the real number is. But the trend is disturbing nonetheless.

With or without paternity fraud we in the 'sphere are well aware that cheating is rampant among today's wives and unfortunately many of us have fallen victim to this epidemic—myself included. With glorified mainstream sites like Ashley Madison as well as countless forums women frequent to assuage their cheating ways leading the way in commercialized infidelity, it's become clear that the number of unfaithful wives grows daily and they aren't feeling the least bit guilty about their indiscretions.

Too many men have been down this road

What this means for you pussy pirates out there is that today's western wives are some of the easiest targets out there. Years of devouring salty loads from dozens of donors who couldn't give less of a shit about her has made it impossible for her to sexually pair bond with her husband. She may be attracted to him for his ability to provide and care for her children (Beta Bucks) but her loins will always yearn for the men who aroused her in her party years (Alpha Fucks).

This is where you come in.

Now before you manginas start crying about being a home wrecker, violating the “sanctity of marriage,” or preaching morality from on high, save it. Marriage is a joke and we all know it. When a woman decides to cheat, she is going to cheat whether it’s with you or someone else. So grab your balls, get off your white horse, and quit being a pussy.

Somebody will fuck these broads…guaran-damn-teed. It may as well be you.

Don’t act like you wouldn’t smash this

That said, there are landmines-a-plenty if you commingle with matrimonial madres. Having slayed a handful myself there are strict rules I have always followed when engaging in the cardinal sin. I learned these rules through friends and acquaintances who had to learn many of these lessons the hard way.

I am very fortunate not to have been bitten in the ass by one of these trysts. Though I’ve had close calls on more than one occasion because of a few minor slip ups, I haven’t suffered any major consequences. I was happy to soak up the knowledge without having sustained any of the collateral damage that came with acquiring that wisdom.

Banging slutty wives is easy. It’s the getting out clean part that trips most men up. No endeavor with a woman, married or single, is risk free. But the edicts below, when followed to a tee, will drastically minimize, if not completely eliminate your exposure to the potential perils of paramourdom.

8. Never meet her in town

This is non-negotiable. Meeting your vow violator anywhere close to where either of you lives, no matter how large the city, is a huge mistake. You run the risk of running into someone either of you knows and if that happens, it’s a mathematical inevitability that it will get back to her husband and things only get worse from there.

Always meet up with her a town or two (or three) over and never ride to your destination hotel together. Show up in separate cars and make sure she understands that this is an ironclad rule in your arrangement and that any deviation will result in the end of your affair.

7. No dates

Going out for dinners, movies, or anything that resembles a date is off limits. You don’t want her getting the idea that you might care about her. This arrangement isn’t about romance or feelings. It’s about sex. Nothing more.

Any time she suggests going out, tell her you two are ordering out and renting a movie. Not only does this keep her in check with regards to the status of your arrangement, it minimizes any risk of being seen in public together. If she objects, cancel the meet up.

I’ve had to do this with nearly every wife I’ve banged. Half the time they fall in and half the time they stop calling. That’s the way it goes.

This is a no-no

6. Never fuck the married co-worker

The pitfalls here are obvious but the main one is that she could end your employment rather easily by filing a sexual harassment claim against you if things go sour. And even if she didn't, you would both know she's got that ace up her sleeve that can be played at her discretion.

Office romances rarely stay under wraps, if ever. Messing with married chicks is playing with fire as it is. Fucking your married co-workers is just begging for a world of hurt. Any man who swims in these treacherous waters deserves what he gets. The warnings have been drilled into our skulls since we were young in the form of the old adage "never mix business with pleasure."

Abide by this rule and you'll steer clear of this life-altering booby trap.

5. Use a fake name

This isn't always possible but it's a good practice to get into if you spot a ring on the finger of your target. Using a fake name makes it very difficult for her to stalk you (e.g. on Facebook, where she can get familiar with the names and faces of your friends and family), dig into your personal life, or anything else she might do when she starts catching feelings and begins entertaining thoughts of a long term relationship with you.

The less she knows about your identity the more easily you can disappear when the time comes.

Pro Tip: A throwaway prepaid phone comes in handy here. You can get the service put in whatever name you choose which further throws her off the scent and reduces her accessibility to you…so long as this is the only number she has to reach you.

4. NEVER tell her where you live or work

A friend of mine broke this particular rule and saying that it cost him dearly is a gross understatement. Aside from having to find a new job and new residence, damage was done to his and some of his co-workers' vehicles. His jilted lover also used spray paint to let everyone know who was responsible for her rampage which dug him into an even deeper financial abyss.

Revealing where you hang your hat or swipe your time card is an egregious mistake of epic proportions. Keep this information under lock and key at all costs.

3. Always use protection

One would think I shouldn't have to put this on the list, but believe it or not there are a lot of idiots out there raw dogging married moms (hence, the paternity fraud epidemic).

Things can get pretty messy if she decides to carry the pregnancy to term. Paternity testing drama, child support hearings, awkward visitation, complications with custody arrangements, the list goes on and on. Not to mention your kid possibly being raised by her slutty ass and her beta husband.

Nobody wins in that scenario especially the kid.

It's bad news to knock up a a random girl but impregnating another man's wife will complicate your life like nothing else. So unless you're shooting blanks, wrap the fuck up…

…and you'll be as carefree as this guy

2. Do not get attached

Now before Captain Obvious(es) hit me with "well of course not!", this isn't as easy as you may think. The sex you will have with married women is some of the best you'll ever experience. Dick-deprived spouses are experimental, insatiable, and every kind of debaucherous adjective in between. She'll dress as slutty as you tell her to and will channel her inner porn star that has been begging to surface since she tied the knot.

Believe me when I tell you that it is very easy to get caught up in a woman who willingly satisfies your every sexual need every time you meet. Your brain grows more addicted to the dopamine rushes she faithfully delivers with every encounter, and before you know it you're entertaining crazy thoughts about running away together or whatever other ridiculous scenarios your mind stupidly thinks up in the midst of a sex-fueled psychosis.

The best way to avoid this is to limit your time with her. It won't be easy to cut back on her ball-draining techniques, but the less time you spend around her, the less likely you are to get attached.

1. Know when to hold 'em, know when to fold 'em

Being ready to walk away at any time is standard game application, but it's magnified tenfold with married women. If you get the feeling things may unravel get the hell out of there. Females are unstable by nature so be prepared for her implosion at any moment.

Don't freak out if she starts calling you more or demanding more time. That's perfectly normal and always happens in the beginning. You're dicking her good and she wants more—that's part of the gig. Handle it.

But when she starts talking about leaving her husband or getting careless with the covertness of your affair, hit that eject button immediately and disappear. When she starts exhibiting this behavior it's only a matter of time before she self destructs and if you're anywhere near her blast radius she'll take you down with her.

Bonus: She had better be attractive

There is way too much risk involved in these affairs to be fucking around with a fatty, an ugly, or both. Make sure this high risk has a high reward.

Not even close to worth it

Conclusion

Gaming married women is easy and difficult at the same time. On one hand they need alpha dick in their holes because they aren't getting it at home. If your game is tight she will respond. She can't help it.

But they don't want you or anyone else to see them for the cheating sluts they really are, so they can make it very difficult to interact with them depending on venue, mood, and situation.

Often times they unconsciously run push-pull game on you (this happens all the time so be ready, fellas) because they want you to pursue but they want to keep up appearances. A tricky proposition indeed.

But once you build attraction, trust, and most importantly create plausible deniability for her to fall back on, her anus is yours for the taking. And when you take it she will take you on a magic carpet ride you won't soon forget.

Bridal bitches will show you a whole new world

All the same, a lot of men aren't willing to take assume the risks involved with matrimonial meddling which is understandable. If a man falls into any one of the pitfalls of these affairs his life can go sideways in a hurry. I can't blame the man who wants to avoid these piranha-infested waters. This isn't for everyone and that's okay.

If you do decide to take the plunge, follow each and every one of these rules to the letter. Nothing is completely bulletproof but assessing and minimizing your risk with these techniques is very important. If you get the feeling that it's not worth it, walk away and regroup to fight another day. There's too much pussy out there to get in too deep for just one piece of ass.

I'm living proof that you can get in and out of these escapades unscathed, but it takes unflappable discipline not to deviate from your plan. Stick with the program and you should be fine.

I said it once and I'll say it again: Spare me the morality narrative. We all sit here and talk about how slutty women are and share stories about cheating wives and tales of their cockoldry. The fact of the matter is that you're not going to change anything by not banging that wife who's shooting off IOIs in your direction.

It's saddening that western marriages and relationships have been in the toilet for so long that infidelity is not longer shocking. But doesn't do any good to sit around crying about it either. So ignore that ring, get her number, and enjoy the decline.

The Top 3 Muscles That Make Women Want You

March 3, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Sixpack Shortcuts

Hey man, it's Mike Chang. You might know me from YouTube as the #1 most subscribed fitness trainer. Or you might have even watched a video on my sixpackshortcuts channel.

But here's what you probably DIDN'T know…

I've been a daily reader of Return Of Kings since 2012. Before that, I used to be your average frustrated blue pill chump. I was actually on track to get married and to have kids with the crazy girl I used to date…lol.

But (thankfully) in 2012 we broke up, and that led me to finally question everything I'd been taught about women, masculinity, and the world. That led to me discovering ROK and finally taking the red pill.

I've personally learned a ton from ROK, and I think it's safe to say I'll probably save over a million dollars over my lifetime from learning not to spend ridiculous amounts of money on WOMEN. So I contacted Roosh to see if I could use my expertise to help fellow ROK readers.

Now, you probably already know that most fitness advice out there is uni-sex advice intended to "improve functional fitness" or to "improve general health," whatever the fuck that means. But my approach to working out is different because my goal with working out is to get myself a body that gets maximum attraction from women and maximum respect from men – with minimum gym time.

Let's be honest… You don't care about being a bodybuilder or Crossfitter. You don't want to spend your life in the gym. You just want to know how to get a body that will attract women and make guys respect you in the shortest possible amount of time.

To do this, you can't use conventional training. So rather than just doing the same workouts everyone else does, you need to find out what type of body a woman REALLY responds to and design your workouts to build that body.

Specifically, you need to find out which muscle groups REALLY make the most impact on your attractiveness to women, and focus on these muscle groups. This is the enlightened, “red pill” way to work out.

Now, here’s what makes this tricky… the body parts that create the most attraction in women are NOT what most guys think.

So in my opinion, here are the 3 most important muscle groups that will attract women, along with a few simple exercises you can add to your routine to develop each one. This is based on a survey of women done by Men’s Health, and I can also confirm this from my real world experience.

#3 Powerful Forearms

It’s the most exposed muscle on the body so women see them a lot. Now, I don’t know if working them out non-stop is going to get you any woman you want. However, I can say with absolute certainty that this muscle isn’t as effective as #1… but it will still help a bit.

Tips To Get Powerful Forearms

Use Thicker Grips.

Boybuilding.com said, “as barbell thickness increased, so did neuromuscular response.” This means that using a different kind of grip will cause your body to respond and build muscle as a response to the change. For example, changing the grip when you do bicep curls will increase the way your muscles respond by activating your forearms to build more muscle. How do you do it?

- You can simply buy grips that you attach to the bar (the best known brand is Fat Gripz.)
- Or you can take advice from Men’s Health and, “ Simply wrap a towel around the bar” or dumbbells for added thickness.

Do More Deadlifts.

According to bodybuilding.com, not only do deadlifts activate every single muscle in your arm… but, “The forearms, in particular, are worked tremendously.”

#2 A Nice Butt

Yes guys… women can be shallow too. It increases their physical attraction to you, which “flips a switch” in their minds to see you as a more tempting mate… you know, for sex.

Tips To Get A Better Butt:

Use A Wider Stance When You Squat.

An academic study done at the University of Padova concluded that a wider stance will activate more of the gluteus maximus.

Do Barbell Hip Thrusts.

Bret Contreras, trainer of Olympic and professional athletes said, ""The move activates your glutes better than any other exercise, you can really load it up, and it's completely safe." So you can pack on the weight and see the results.

#1 Six Pack Abs

Don't take it from me… here's what Men's Health said, "You could have biceps the size of bowling balls, but if you've got the beginnings of a gut, any discriminating woman will think twice before considering you boyfriend material. Their fear: A little excess midriff meat now means one fat, sloppy bastard in 10 years."

Tips To Get Six Pack Abs:

Do Fat Burning Exercises – Not Ab Exercises.

Most guys turn to ab exercises when they are trying to get a six pack. However, the key to getting rid of the fat around your stomach and the love handles area is to do fat burning exercises… not ab exercises. Why? Well, because there is a layer of flab covering your abs… so in reality doing ab exercises can make you look worse if you still have a bit of fat to lose.

Activate The Afterburn Effect.

If you didn't know already, the Afterburn Effect is your body's ability to burn fat for up to 48 hours after your workout is over. And, it's the most effective way to get six pack abs because you aren't just burning calories during your workout… but, you are burning calories while you are sleeping, watching television, and even when you're eating.

Why Do Hollywood SJW's Still Defend This Admitted Pedophile?

March 3, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

To its credit, Poland has heeded American calls to hold an extradition hearing for one Roman Polanski. You may remember him as that award-winning Hollywood personality who pled guilty to unlawful sexual intercourse with a minor. Or, if you're a Hollywood leftist type, a victimized and bullied film director par excellence. The extradition hearing was adjourned in late February until April.

It is true that Roman Polanski is not welcome in the United States (aside from entering a jail cell with Big Bubba). But a veritable menagerie of European nations has been happy to house, welcome and protect Polanski, while the United Kingdom and other European countries have or are looking to ban PUA "guru" Julien Blanc. Australia and Singapore have also barred Blanc entry past their borders (he basically had to quickly pack up and leave the former), and South Korea and Brazil are sternly indicating that they will force him out too if he attempts travel there.

To be honest, I find Blanc's advice and seminars often puerile and perpetually gimmicky. But forbidding him entry while many European nations keep the doors open for Polanski makes a mockery of the immigration, border protection, and criminal systems. Even the French government, including former Culture Minister Frédéric Mitterrand (nephew of the former French President) has previously fallen over itself in defending Polanski.

Former French Culture Minister Mitterand is best known outside France for defending Roman Polanski (and his own bizarre time in Thailand with young male prostitutes).

All aboard the Hollywood hypocrisy train

Whenever Hollywood bigwigs express a political opinion, it is almost invariably a liberal one, which often intersects with “issues” of women’s rights, patriarchy, and gender discrimination. Celebrities such as Lena Dunham crave rape victim status without bothering to press charges and, as wealthy and powerful women, take a stand for the “little women” of the world.

This makes those backing Polanski particularly repugnant. They’ll back a woman who cries rape without any evidence, and believe her, but refuse to rally against a man who personally acknowledges that he raped a child, all because he’s a Hollywood “creative force.”

Polanski’s rape of a 13-year-old girl, now a middle-aged woman, was not just statutory rape. Statutory rape implies that the girl was sober and unaffected by any other mind-altering substances, but was simply legally unable to consent. This rape allegedly went much further, though.

The police’s initial charges reflected their understanding that Polanski plied her with alcohol and drugs, and then sodomized her. Feminists and SJW’s have been frothing at the mouth to lynch Ched Evans, despite a horrendously flawed conviction, yet Polanski produces warm feelings for Hollywood celebrities and rather muted reactions from professional leftist activists.

I’ve yet to see a major FEMEN protest against Polanski at Cannes, or a proper Jessica Valenti diatribe about the way Hollywood protects its own, contrary to the rights of women.

[image]
Scorsese is a superb director, but is a moron when it comes to defending Polanski the pedophile.

In my female child-killers article, I equated society's rationales for these murderers with excusing Polanski for raping the girl because he endured the Holocaust. Sadly, though, this was no exaggeration on my part, as Polanski's wartime experiences, and the murder of his pregnant wife Sharon Tate by the Charlie Manson Family in 1969, are often used as background softeners to mitigate his admitted rape of the 13-year-old girl in 1977.

Polanski's victim has gone on record multiple times to request that US authorities' pursuit of him end. She cites that he served an "average" sentence (he was in jail for six weeks pre-plea deal and then in detention or under house arrest in Europe in 2009-10 pending a Swiss extradition hearing) and that the exposure of the case has caused him considerable embarrassment and pain.

The victim is entitled to her opinion but, last time I checked, criminal matters are between the state and the defendant, who in this case openly admits criminal guilt. And Polanski made a large financial settlement with the victim, obviously requiring her to abstain from certain kinds of public commentary and actions. Moreover, feminists don't suggest that a man who actually hits his wife without provocation should be spared sanction just because the spouse doesn't wish to press charges.

There's no Apocalypto coming for Polanski's career

The juxtaposition of Polanski and another celebrity, a conservative Catholic, is truly mind-exploding. No one can deny that Mel Gibson was a train wreck for much of the 2000s. But his most significant "crimes" were of the DUI and verbal varieties. The latter of these weren't even the subject of legal investigations (though alleged domestic violence surrounding one of the verbal incidents was). He used anti-Semitic and anti-black slurs across these different outbursts. Not ideal and darn disrespectful, but it didn't involve sex with a minor.

Where was the New York Times open letter to support Mel Gibson, instead of the half-blacklisting he actually received? Now self-immolated Sony Pictures head Amy Pascal, who ironically used racial putdowns in a treasure trove of email correspondence, was a lead pitchfork-holder behind the scenes, undermining Gibson wherever she could.

But Polanski found himself buttressed by vociferous agitation from Hollywood's biggest names in a real New York Times open letter, including Harvey Weinstein of Miramax, and directors Woody Allen, Darren Aronofsky, David Lynch, and Martin Scorsese.

[image]
Childish or not, Gibson's antics didn't involve raping a 13-year-old.

Politico revealed that these public Polanski backers were often donors to Obama and the Democratic National Convention. So they tacitly (or explicitly?) support the watering down or obliteration of due process rights for men accused of sexual crimes, often without evidence, but simultaneously identify with one of their colleagues who did rape.

Right now, my mind is spinning. Maybe yours is, too. Inasmuch as I have read extensively about the Polanski case and have expected the worst, even revisiting old facts creates a mental mess each time.

In this world where SJW's imply that Mark Zuckerberg is a misogynist for wearing plain T-shirts and flirtatious comments to women are treated as tantamount to sexual assault, it's psychopathic for entire countries to continue ignoring the rape of a child by one of Hollywood's most famous sons.

Singapore’s Society Promotes The Decline Of The Modern Man

March 4, 2015 | by Justin Puck | Link | Original Link

Singapore is a unique Asian gem, often called the Switzerland of the east. It actually may remind you of what America used to be—reasonable rates of taxation, tough punishment for criminals, favorable business climate, and slender, attractive women. Though the cost of living is high, the economy is strong and crime is almost nonexistent.

You won’t see too many cops since like it or not, wherever you go in public, cameras will be watching you. Don’t worry, if you screw up, they’ll show up. The resulting safe society makes it a perfect place to raise a family—but, alas, only a family with daughters. For sons, the ironclad cocoon of security is proving to be a detriment to the development of Singaporean men.

Two kinds of guys

Singaporean sons tend to fall into two categories—either total losers living in their mom’s basement, ripping off the family money and never really amounting to much, or moderately to highly successful gents who nevertheless are soft, not self-assured, from families where the women are dominant.

Wives and mothers with strong personalities are quite common in every social strata. A female friend in Singapore explained it to me thusly:

> “In the decades since the founding of Singapore barely fifty years ago, all of the hard work has been done. The last few generations of Singaporean men, > particularly the Singaporean Chinese men, have never experienced real struggle. Although they usually need to work in order to support themselves, they are to some extent mollycoddled by the government and their families alike. If there is a problem, the reaction is almost instantly "The government needs to do something about XYZ.""

I was a bit surprised that two years of national service for men doesn't do more to imprint some degree of manhood and leadership. Apparently, however, this military experience has been watered down over time. Because of the low birth rate, they're even considering drafting women.

Recently there was a picture of a new recruit reporting to basic training with the family maid carrying his rucksack while he walked ahead of her, in uniform, unencumbered and absorbed in his smartphone.

Not sure if she also polished his boots, but probably.

Maids from Indonesia and the Philippines are affordable even for middle class families, meaning many young men can easily grow up to be just a bit lazy. I guess we should be grateful he's not carrying his girlfriend's handbag, since that's not uncommon either.

Smartphone Zombies

Speaking of smartphones, Singapore too is rapidly becoming a nation of smartphone zombies. In some respects it's even worse there, since at least in America some people read articles online (albeit usually shitty ones from Buzzfeed or Huffpo) or maybe they'll tackle a Kindle ebook.

Not so with Singaporeans, where nearly every person, especially the young, is either watching a video or playing some stupid game on their iPhones. Reading is for school, they reckon, not leisure or self-development.

Sliding doors prevent falling over into the subway tracks while texting.

For Singaporean men, the decades of safety and comfort have produced outwardly apprehensive, barely masculine men whose umbilical cords are never completely cut. Imagine a world where grown men don't know how to use a corkscrew and need to call AAA to change a flat tire.

All manual labor and construction is performed by immigrant labor (albeit legal, verifiable, and temporary immigrant labor), with the end result being the incapable, neutered state of modern Singaporean manhood.

At least the trains are on time, right?

Nowhere else is the maxim that comfort is the enemy of ambition more apparent than on this island nation. Our parents want "the best" for us, just as Singapore's government wants "the best" for its citizens. While the west produces legions of narcissistic and entitled liberal arts majors with no marketable job skills, they at least have to be careful for their personal safety from time to time.

Singapore effectively reduced nearly all security threats and physical problem solving to the point where a young man never has the training wheels taken off. He simply has less opportunity to learn by doing (and failing), and thus cannot fully mature into a self-reliant individual.

Great for your daughters, not your sons

Sure, Singapore is where I would want to be to raise a daughter—if something unthinkable did happen to her, the perp would be caught in a matter of hours and probably be caned or even hanged. But raising a son who becomes a man could prove difficult. Remove all risks and challenges from life and the bones don't harden, character does not resolve, leadership traits are not developed.

Sooner or later, the population takes what they have for granted and demands change to make things even more comfy. The obesity levels in Singapore are already creeping up; it's probably a matter of time before their oft-used death penalty goes away and eventually, national service is eliminated in favor of a volunteer military (though who will actually volunteer is another question).

Soon thereafter, an uptick in already loud protests from the gay community demanding "equality" just like they never cease doing in the west. One by one, the framework that brought a great nation into being will succumb to the same cancer of self-indulgence affecting America and the rest of the west.

How long can it last?

How much longer Singapore can last is anyone's guess, but with human nature being what it is, the status quo will not be permanent. As Tesla pointed out, the growing tendency of women to overshadow the masculine is a sign of a deteriorating civilization.

Singapore is not unlike every other society in history in that the more it does to improve itself, educate the masses, grow the economy and make everyone safe, in the end each overly complex civilized society is doomed to be the next Rome, just waiting for the fall.

Meanwhile however, the young women of Singapore are still mostly feminine, slender and pretty. They may find a man with a backbone and some hand skills both refreshing and desirable. If you're in the neighborhood for whatever reason, drop in and enjoy it while you can.

Meet Christina Kyle, American TranSniper

March 4, 2015 | by Friedrich Nietzsche | Link | Original Link

"A brave performance by Bruce Jenner anchors Kathryn Bigelow's feminist dramatization of the life of transgender Navy SEAL Christina Kyle"

Background on the film

You might remember the movie American Sniper from the year 2014 about the most lethal sniper in American history. It generated a lot of controversy. Filmmaker Michael Moore called snipers cowards. Actor Seth Rogen compared American Sniper to Nazi propaganda. Comedian Bill Maher called Real Life American Sniper Chris Kyle a "psychopathic patriot." Politician Howard Dean called the film's viewers "very angry men," clarifying that they are probably in the Tea Party. The film seemed to capture America's feelings about the Iraq war.

How things have changed since in four years. Hillary Clinton became America's first woman president, easily beating Sarah Palin in the election. ISIS took over the Iraqi government in the waning days of Obama's presidency. Clinton sent American troops to Iraq. Clinton then instituted the Equal Right to Combat Act that mandated quotas to make America's combat units at least 50% female.

The ERCA, of course, was a complete failure. Operation Hug ISIS failed when ISIS captured large numbers of female soldiers and released videos of them being raped.

We thought this would defeat ISIS

Enter Christina Kyle

Christina Kyle was the first female sniper in America's history to record at least one kill. She was also the first transgender soldier on the front line in American history. She somehow racked up a staggering 101 kills in her brief time in Iraq and earned the nickname "Badass" from her combat girlfriends.

The real life Christina Kyle. Notice her teddy bear grenade?

Upon her return to America, Christina Kyle was quickly hailed a hero by feminists for fighting Iraq's rape culture. Christina wasted no time writing a book called American TranSniper, and a famous photograph was taken of President Hillary signing the book. It was only a matter of time before feminist filmmaker Kathryn Bigelow made a movie that won an Oscar for Best Picture.

Critics have praised American TranSniper for its feminist message. Michael Moore called Christina Kyle "brave." Seth Rogen compared American TranSniper to a really good PBS special. Bill Maher said she was a hero for killing Muslims. Howard Dean said its viewers are empowered women, clarifying that they are the base of the Democratic party. The book even inspired Sheryl Sandberg to write her own book called Pull the Trigger encouraging young women to embrace their killer instinct, join the military and become four-star generals.

The Plot of American TranSniper

We first meet Christina (played by Bruce Jenner) as she's peeing over a hole in the dirt. Her penis is floating in the breeze, leaving the viewer to wonder when her sex change will be complete. Next Christina takes aim at her commander officer. She mutters "sexist pig" before putting her rifle down. She then writes "GIRL POWER" on the side of her helmet and draws a peace sign.

The film's first battle scene takes place in a chaotic sandstorm. Groups of overweight white female soldiers are running up to members of ISIS and giving them bear hugs. One long bearded member of ISIS is shown leading captured female soldiers to a large cage.

The camera zooms up on Kyle's face as she mutters that she wants to end Iraq's rape culture once in for all. After several misfires (where one male American soldier is shot in the head) Christina finally finds her target, who has just pressed record on his video camera.

Bruce Jenner getting ready to go on a mission in American TranSniper

Next we see Christina at Iraq's first lesbian bar. She drinks, smokes, and drinks some more before hooking up with one of the most feminist lesbians there (Lena Dunham). Dunham's character even gives Jenner some LMR before finally saying "fuck it" and dropping her army fatigues in a gender-neutral bathroom stall. This sequence perhaps provides the most literal possible metaphor for gender equality in the military.

Jenner, who had to drink and eat heavily for the role, is superb in the film's numerous sex scenes that are contrasted by her willingness to pull the trigger and fight Iraq's rape culture. Full of bitchiness and stern looks early on, her voice seems to soften as she recites the Equal Right to Die in Combat Regardless of Gender and Race Act (the ERDCRGRA) after morning reveille.

Perhaps the film's most humanizing touch is its willingness to show Christina pumping her fist after someone calls her a "hero," as if the word is both empowering and gender-neutral. The visual and editorial choices discreetly reinforce the clash between the fun of modern warfare (it's like a first person shooter for women) and the violence of Iraq's rape culture. The film's soundtrack, composed by Lorde, serves to heighten the drama as Kyle racks up kill after kill.

The film even has a cameo appearance by Kim and Kylie

Back in America

Back in America, the film focuses on President Hillary Clinton's obsession with Christina Kyle's kill count. Hillary is especially worried about whether Iraq's style of rape culture will spread to America. In one particularly dramatic scene at the White House, Clinton asks Christina whether she can take out Bill Cosby as well as Paul Nungesser. Christina simply responds, "I need to get back to Iraq."

During the film's climax, Clinton is informed that ISIS has defeated our forces in the Third Battle of Fallujah. After losing her temper, Hillary finds a way to end Iraq's rape culture once and for all. The screen fades to black just as a nuclear bomb is dropped on Baghdad. What's especially ironic, as President Hillary would later point out, is that Sarah Palin would have done the same to those bastards if she were elected president.

The ending of American TranSniper (before we are lectured about rape culture in the closing credits)

The reason why Christina Kyle got a sex change

Despite the brilliant cinematography and themes, the film glosses over the real reason Christina Kyle became a woman as remembered in Christina Kyle's memoir. Born Joe Smith, Smith dreamed of becoming a Navy Seal after seeing American Sniper.

Built like a linebacker, Smith easily passed the Navy SEAL fitness test. His mandated essay about rape culture did not get a passing grade though. Ultimately he was disqualified from the joining the SEALS because he "simply didn't have tits." He was simply "too masculine."

He later met the woman who would take his place in the SEALS, a "5'2, 200 lb. bitch." He finally realized what he had to do in order to join the SEALS: get a sex change. He changed his name to a feminine sounding version of his hero, Chris Kyle.

A typical Navy SEAL in 2018

The End

While the circumstances of Christina's death add a note of tragic urgency to the film's matter-of-fact examination of rape culture and violence, the moment itself is left off screen. Instead the closing credits recount how Christina's boyfriend violently raped and murdered her after finding out she was born a man, though the veracity of these claims are still widely questioned among a small group of "hate sites" on the internet.

The viewer is told that rape and violence happen because of men and we are then left with Christina's famous quote:

> If the Third World War is fought with nuclear weapons, the Fourth will be fought with curling irons and blow jobs.

How To Get Over That “One Special Girl”

March 4, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Understand this: really grasping the concept of abundance is fundamental to success with women. When I did so my results skyrocketed – and that will happen for you, too.

The opposite of abundance: ‘Oneitus’

The seduction community frequently discusses a condition it calls “oneitus”: in fact, the term it has become something of a meme simply because the phenomenon it refers to is so common. Oneitus, put simply, is the myth of “the one” – the belief that one “special girl” is the only person in the universe who can make you complete, and that without her life will be meaningless.

Often, although not exclusively, a man’s “oneitus” will be a girl he is attracted to but has not yet hooked up with for whatever reason. Perhaps she is a colleague at work he hasn’t had the courage to approach; or maybe he has approached her and she has rejected him with the infamous LJBF formula – “let’s just be friends” – a line women use to turn down men so frequently that it has become a trope in its own right.

This is the most painful place a guy can be – in the throes of what used to be called unrequited love. That terrible, soul-destroying craving for that one special girl. If you find yourself in this position, and indeed if you've come to this book to try to get that one special girl to like you, then you need to take steps to disengage from those negative feelings and forget about her.

Banish from your memory all those romantic movies you've seen where the shy, nerdy but good-hearted guy winds up getting his beautiful long-term crush to go out with him at the end – real life just isn't like that. The truth is that girls (like guys) categorize potential romantic and sexual partners very quickly – usually within the first few minutes of meeting. If you are in the wrong camp – i.e. a girl's "friend" camp – then you will find it is very, very difficult to get out and in most cases impossible.

Far better to walk away from this girl and move onto a fresh prospect, who (with the help of this book) you will present yourself to differently – as a potential sex partner. Later on, when the first girl has seen that you've had success elsewhere and notes your change in demeanor then she might – and it's an outside chance – reconsider, but don't count on it. Do yourself a favor and move on.

Do not, under any circumstances, buy into the "friends" frame. Women are happy to spin out these pretend friendships for months or even years, as they receive validation from them for minimal emotional investment. But the truth is you're not truly friends – there's an imbalance. You want something more from her than she is unwilling to provide and you both know it.

No true friendship can exist on these terms. Don't feel you owe her anything just because she's being "nice" to you (on the surface at least). Life is short and you need to put your own interests first. The frame with which you should approach your male-female interactions should be honest and straightforward: either this leads to sex and a man-to-woman relationship, or I walk.

If at this point you are thinking something along the lines of “but she’s special and different and I want to get to know her first before sleeping with her”; or you think it somehow crude to put sex first, then you need to take a reality check and realise how things really work. Sex always comes first – the “relationship” afterwards. It is not even necessary for a girl to especially “like” you in order for her to sleep with you. Attraction is all that’s required.

If you have come to this book hoping to “convert” a special girl, you’ve asked her out once or twice and you’re getting no traction with her then you need to rip the band aid off and move on. Here’s a six step guide on how to do so:

1. Accept that at the moment, the way things are, this girl is not into you in the way that you want her to be.
2. Break all contact with her immediately: stop calling her, don’t answer if she calls you, de-friend her on Facebook, block her on Twitter etc. Shore up all possible routes of engagement, basically.
3. Avoid all conversations about her with mutual friends. In fact, just cut out the mutual friends. The last thing you want right now are constant reminders of her.
4. Stamp on any unwanted or negative thoughts about her unmercifully. Whenever a thought comes up, don’t wallow—suppress it hard and move on.
5. Have guy friends you can talk to discreetly about it, but limit these to one or two at most. The friends must be male, and must be those who are going to understand and help you stick to your guns, rather than talk you out of your course of action. Don’t talk to anyone else outside of these people about the situation, and try to limit the amount of time you spend talking to them about it. Again, don’t wallow.

6. Go out and meet other girls.

The Russian Opposition Leader’s Girlfriend vs. The British Opposition Leader’s Wife

March 4, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

The wild west of Russian politics

This week the Russian opposition leader Boris Nemtsov was shot four times by gunmen at the Vasilyevsky Spusk bridge leading to Red Square, home the Kremlin. Whatever one’s view of Putin and Russian politics, Nemtsov was a man willing to put his balls on the line.

Driven to reform latent Soviet structures of governance, the one-time deputy prime minister of Russia was to be the great liberal (in the true sense of the word) heir to Yeltsin. In later years he campaigned against corruption and recently against the war in Ukraine.

Agent of American imperialism or not, he was opposition in a country where being the opposition can leave you with polonium in your breakfast. Many of his peers cashed their chips in and fled to London, to live in paranoid luxury.

Boris Nemtsov, who “loved women”

The key witness to the murder is Nemtsov’s 23-year old Ukrainian girlfriend, Anna Duritskaya, who was in the car with him when he was shot. Nemtsov was 55 when he died—more than twice her age. Duirtskaya is a model—flawless-skinned, high-cheekboned, long legged Slavic beauty.

She is currently under arrest as a key witness in the killing and is, like any good woman of the Eastern bloc who puts family first, upset about not seeing her grandmother.

The Mr. Bean-ization of British politics

Ed Miliband sporting a ‘This Is What A Feminist Looks Like’ T-Shirt and spindly arms.

While a Russian opposition leader is murdered in the streets of Moscow by the side of a lover half his age, his British opposite number cuts a more pedestrian figure. Ed Miliband is the privileged son of a Marxist academic who grew up in the leafy North London suburb of Primrose Hill.

His political career has mirrored that of many other comfortably-off British politicians: graduation from Oxford, job in the media, bottom rung position in the Labour Party apparatus followed by progress into the current leadership of of the party and a shot at the Prime Ministership.

Ed Miliband is married to Justine Thornton, a lawyer who, when not appearing in court, spends her time visiting girls' schools for the purposes of instilling feminist indoctrination in girls. The Evening Standard, owned by the Lebedevs and often pushing feminist propaganda, reports her as telling these young women to get their priorities straight:

> …it is 'really important' that women are able to have a successful career and a family.

She is also a dutiful militant for the reversal of gender roles, and:

> …hopes that in future there will be more 'political husbands.'

Justine Thornton appearing at a school in Camden, London to convince girls to become lawyers.

Mrs. Thornton, or Ms. Thornton, as the equalist naming convention might have it, will certainly have brushed up to a 7, maybe even an 8, back in her Cambridge days. However, the single-minded pursuit of a legal career has left her with with the deep furrows and sallow skin of a woman that spends inordinate amounts of time in deep thought surrounded by books.

The Milibands would certainly have put lots of cash in the pockets of East European nannies over the years.

Worlds apart

A brief snapshot of two leaders of political opposition and their conjugal arrangements, in two historical hearts of empires 1,500 miles apart, one dead and one living, one cavorting with girl in her sexual prime half his age the other hitched to an austere scold with a monk's haircut, tell us everything we need to know about modern Britain, its politics and its values.

First, the men themselves. Boris Nemtsov is eulogized as follows by, Anna Nemtsova (no relation), a Newsweek correspondent:

> He was a revolutionary, a walking storm, sometimes rude and rough in his comments, but always an optimist and a free thinker.

She goes on:

> If Nemtsov believed in something, he was never hiding behind anybody's back. He shot his ideas out without any self-censorship, or demonstrated them with a banner in his hands out in the street, bravely, no matter how many times police arrested him for his anti-Putin protests, no matter how many death threats he received.

Following another arrest, Nemtsov had told the same journalist: "Why should I leave my country? I love Russia. Let them, the thieves and criminals, leave." Like a man of valour, he stuck to to his principles, and as we saw this week, he paid the ultimate price.

Ed Miliband, on the other hand, is a politician from the age of perception management. British comedy legend Alexei Sayle told in a 2012 interview of being approached by him at a function to be mechanically told by Miliband that it was 25 years since Sayle had released his top 20 comedy single, 'Ullo John! Gotta New Motor?'

The politician claimed "they'd loved it in the Miliband house." Sayle said even this chunk of party small-talk seemed contrived:

> Later, I did think that his knowledge seemed a bit…fake. And I wondered if he'd just said to his assistant, 'Google some information about that —-, will you?'

In May last year Miliband managed to look a pillock again when, in desperate need of a photo-op that would make him appear like a man of the people, he agreed to eat a bacon sandwich. A couple months later, he declared that "photo-op culture" demeans politics, but by October was back at it again, dutifully posing in a "This Is What A Feminist Looks Like" t-shirt.

British men, know your place

Just as men like Boris Nemtsov should be free to pursue political change by fair means in the societies they live in without being murdered for their trouble, so should men like Ed Miliband be free to marry a careerist who decides to sacrifice their femininity in pursuit of a transient career that nobody will want to remember.

Ed Miliband probably is who he is—a left wing politician hell-bent on pleasing everybody and offending nobody—as a result of some innate biological feature or an overbearing Jewish mother. It's not for us to fix that.

The question British men should consider is "What would happen in Britain if a 55-year old politician was had a 23-year old Ukrainian model girlfriend?" Or conversely, "What is different about Russian society that makes it acceptable for a 55-year old politician to have a 23-year old Ukrainian model girlfriend?"

The answers are: to the first, he would be hounded out of public life forever, or consigned to the dustbin of bizarre, tolerated weirdo politicians like Lembit Opik or other sexual miscreants from the UK Liberal Democrat party.

To the second: Russia is a society where traditional values have not been utterly usurped by Cultural Marxism. In Russia, pressure yet exists for men and women alike to conform to traditional gender roles. How many Russian women have you seen lately with the side of their heads shaved?

A man of any age pursuing the romantic and sexual love of a young woman in her sexual prime is natural, positive thing, and only a sick, demented society overtaken by the cult of equalism will rule otherwise.

I only found the mention of Nemtsov's girlfriend's age shocking because I, too, have been slightly indoctrinated into the mores of such a society—Britain. This weekend, I'll try to reverse some of this brainwashing with a shot or two of Russian vodka—in memory of Boris Nemtsov.

Top 5 ROK Articles From February 2015

March 4, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are the top 5 articles from February:

1. 20 Signs That We're Not Living In A Patriarchy

> According to the Bureau of Justice, there are more than ten times the number of men in prison than women, many of them jailed for drug possession and other nonviolent offenses. So many men are imprisoned in the U.S. that the "land of the free" now has the largest prison population in the world, larger than communist China (a country with four times our population) and other repressive dictatorships.

2. If There's A Mess On Her Floor, Then She's Probably A Whore

> Women who maintain disorderly residences generally maintain disorderly lives across the board: they're slobs at home, they're slobs with their finances, and they're slobs with their vaginas. I've heard some people say that the more neat and fastidious women are the really slutty ones—it's complete bullshit. I suspect this little theory was cooked up by ugly women who are too lazy to clean their fucking houses.

3. 11 Signs You're Being A Wuss

> Wusses love excuses. They have them for every occasion. Just ask any fucking wuss you know, and he'll rattle off a whole laundry list of why he can't go to the > gym, why he can't get laid, why he can't travel, why he can't get his business off the ground, why he can't learn his favorite foreign language. And you know what? It doesn't add up to dry shit. Because the problem is him: he's a fucking wuss.

4. DePaul University Has Been Ruined By Cultural Marxism

> DePaul University is renowned for having one of the strongest if not the strongest LGBTQ community of any university in the United States of America. Now, not that I personally have anything against gay people, but the power of the groups at a PRIVATE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY has gotten completely out of control.

5. 12 Signs She's Not Who You Think She Is

> "She's educated" probably means she went to a typical four year college and got a useless degree which she likely earned by cheating or fucking (or both) her way to a passing grade. She did, however, pass Sex Ed 101 with flying colors, which was taught nightly at the Alpha Chi Alpha house (classes at the Beta Phi Omega house were cancelled due to continuous false rape claims).

This Is Why Every Man Needs A Mentor

March 5, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Being a man is truly awesome, especially in this day and age. You get to play with awesome new gadgets that our ancestors couldn't even dream of. In fact, you can build your very own gadgets if you so desire. For example, just get a 3D printer and unleash your creativity. You liked LEGOs? Why not make your own LEGO?

You get to bang as many women as you want, carefree and without any obligations. You can choose as much adventure and excitement in your life as you wish and travel all around the world. You can fix every problem you have by using just your two hands and your brain. The result is personal satisfaction and enjoying your life to the fullest

Meanwhile, women choose to waste their years living a life of mediocrity and utter boredom. Women are afraid of straying too far from the accepted norms of behavior and offending anyone. They did so a century ago and they still do so today. When this philosophy fails to bring any spectacular results is when the depression sets in.

An average woman will then spend her days comparing herself to her peers on social networks and obsessively inspecting her selfies to find the tiniest wrinkle. This will cause her to lament that "her youth is gone." If she is extrovert, she will then probably go outside half naked, hold a sign and start shouting random things in the air.

Social Jealousy Weaklings

Every slut walk or SJW protest is a testament to how awesome men are. Not even the shrillest man-hating she-beast can deny that men change things while women bitch and complain about them.

The instinctual reaction of a SJW is to go on a social media website and start whining about some perceived injustice until somebody does something. In fact, every SJW protest is an appeal for men to use their magical “privilege” and improve the lives of women.

“Men, buy us some proper clothes!”

This mythical “privilege” is actually just the potential every man contains in himself. Developing this potential means reaching greatness in all areas of your life. Not just having a great body, or banging a lot of women, or raking in the dough. It means all of those and much more. It includes having an attitude of a winner and having an unbreakable spirit that can endure everything.

Covering up her mistakes

Women have a similar amount of potential as well, but it is inner rather than outer. It is their fertility and is best spent bringing new life into this world as soon as possible. A woman’s fertility only declines as the years go by, making her even less attractive as a mate to any sane man. We naturally connect a woman’s fertility with her beauty, which is why the cosmetic industry is a multi-billion dollar business.

Making it the proverbial fountain of youth

Despite all the sexual education, girls are never told that their most fertile years are between 16 and 20 years of age. After that it slowly but surely declines, making the baby of an older women susceptible to a range of mutations and disorders.

The decline is even steeper if the woman uses alcohol, drugs, or other powerful medicaions. Again, this explains the SJW obsession with stopping "ableism." It's not impossible that SJWs succeed in making something like the Down Syndrome widely accepted as completely normal 30 years from now, if they haven't done so already.

In fact, SJWs in academia encourage women to waste their potential and unabashedly spend their most fertile years going to college and earning their underwater basketweaving degrees. Of course, this intense studying includes spreading their legs to whomever they desire at the moment, aka. "have fun" while using government-sponsored birth control and safety nets in case they do end up pregnant.

Clinging on to her man

The implication behind this leftist line of thinking is that men have more than enough potential to carry at least two people and can compensate for a woman's lack of it when she finally decides she is ready to settle in her 30s.

But, when she finds out the average man is just average and hasn't really achieved anything special, she becomes truly pissed and feels betrayed by the SJW movement. This prompts the "where have all the good men gone?" speech in its various forms and a lot of undeserved rage outpoured on the poor schlub.

Explaining why SJWs absolutely loathe the average man

Meanwhile, men have no such age limit and as they grow older they simply become more awesome. The wrinkles and gray hairs that come with age and cause panic attacks when a woman discovers them on her face add much more charm and authority when found on a man's face.

Per aspera ad astra

Developing your potential is always optional and it's never too late to start with it. In fact, you can begin right this instant by doing whatever inspires you, draws you, and motivates you. Otherwise, you can live a perfectly normal life with minimum effort and be happy with it. But only when you start to develop your potential will your life become interesting and challenging.

Your best companion on the road to greatness is your mentor. You will find your mentor when you embark on the journey of developing your infinite potential. He is the man who has been through it already, knows the obstacles you will have to face and is willing to share that knowledge with you. He speaks wisely, calmly and with confidence.

Though every man has the potential to achieve greatness, this is not easy to do nor is it meant to be easy. In fact, the greater the challenges a man has to go through, the sweeter is his success afterwards. Remember that every day is another chance to make your life become great and never stop trying to develop yourself with the encouragement and guidance of your mentor, whoever he is.

The Newfound Alliance Between Feminism, Marxism, And Radical Islam

March 5, 2015 | by Hannibal Menwell Creed | Link | Original Link

After my previous article, I received a lot of hate mail from social justice warriors, white knights, and feminists who threw a plethora of ad hominem attacks at me, calling me names such as “bigot,” “homophobe,” “fascist,” and the list goes on; however, I personally enjoy reading hate mail from enemies, so I want to add to my “notch count” of insults hurled at me via hate mail, and this time I am guessing it will be Islamaphobe.

The DePaul Feminist Front, the Apex of Feminism and Marxism. I would like to put in a facetious comment if I wasn’t at such a loss of words.

After watching a recent youtube video created by the DePaul Feminist Front showing their open support for DePaul Divest (which unfortunately has been taken down), I became intrigued with the dynamics of the liberal and feminist alliances.

One of these alliances that has been formed on all college campuses across the country is between feminists, Marxists, and radical Islamists on the issue of Boycotts Divestment and Sanctions (BDS), which is a movement where these radical islamist groups such as

Students for Justice in Palestine (SJP) try and get their respective universities to boycott companies that do business with or in the state of Israel, based off Israel's human rights abuses towards the Palestinian people.

Its completely hypocritical

Now let's disregard the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and focus on the issue of this video to start off. In the video that has been recently taken down, the DePaul Feminist Front claims that Israeli "methods of occupation historically target women, through violence, kidnapping, and rape" and that "Israeli forces target queer folks with blackmail."

Now I want ROK readers of this article to soak in the fact this is coming from feminists in conjunction with Muslims speaking about Israel's human rights violations. Let us get one thing straight—you may be able to argue that Israel abuses human rights, but you really cannot argue that Israel is the worst human rights abusers against women and homosexuals.

So if the goal is to divest from human rights abusers, shouldn't feminists and Marxists want to start with countries that have committed the worst human rights atrocities against women and homosexuals? If so, we would have to start with the plethora of Muslim countries such as Saudi Arabia and Iran, that stone homosexuals to death, do not allow women to drive, do not allow women to wear anything else but a burka, and have incredibly perverse legal systems when it comes to violence against women.

However, this would not be liked by their newfound friends who are pushing the divest agenda, because their idiotic sense of prioritization comes from one of two things. Either Students for Justice in Palestine is completely oblivious to the rest of the world, or they are sympathetic to these theocracies that subscribe to their religion, and through that religion engender some of the worst human rights abuses ever to occur on this earth. I would put my money on the latter.

As long as you can make the case that you are a victim, you will be loved by feminists and liberals.

Why do these Marxists and feminists even bother?

I believe feminists do intrinsically understand this notion that I just laid out, but they act the way they do for a purpose. The reason why these idiotic feminists have joined up with radical Islamists is because it has been a tactic of Marxists for a very long time. The idea is to rally every possible fringe element to distort your numbers as much as possible so that your agendas look more to be more serious and have more manpower than they actually are.

This is why in Occupy Wall Street you saw a slew of Communists sitting side by side with Anarchists, two political philosophies diametrically opposed to each other, but happy as can be to join a mutual cause. They go by the tactic "the enemy of my enemy is my friend," and whoever is fighting the "man" (whether it's Jews, Christians, whites, males, heterosexuals, etc), these groups become best buddies.

This is why these groups have moved to join the Divest movement, because these fringe groups look at mutual support as "scratch my back I will scratch yours, while helping a good cause." Furthermore, it helps that Muslims in this day and age have learned to attract these groups by playing the victim card so well, which help feminists and Marxists become entranced with this "struggle of Muslims and the Palestinian people."

However, the have made a grave miscalculation: radical Islamists will never scratch the back of groups that has members that support homosexuality, atheism, and nihilism (alcohol, drugs,etc), much less members with neon green eyebrows.

The long game

What these feminists and Marxists haven't done is think about the long game their behavior causes. This is typical because many of these acolytes of Marxism have only one concern: "taking down 'the man." They really do not care what the hell comes after, and this has terrible repercussions for the rest of society.

When these radical Islamists have gotten more power in the past, they have started to flex their muscles in other aspects of culture. One example is in the aftermath of any mass killing in the name of defending Muhammed, these cultural slime turn the tables on a pathetically weak west, trying to say we are intolerant and ignorant because of increases in anti-Islamic violence and rhetoric increases after.

If only this were a funny depiction of fantasy, and not the cold hard truth.

I do know one thing—Islam has a long history of having a very strong cultural dominance through forceful suppression of other cultures, which is why they will never move back. The Muslim crowd comes from a culture that has the archaic mindset of conquering distant lands to create a caliphate, and they are well on their way to doing so with their astronomically large birth rates that will eventually tip the scales in their favor.

Christianity had become this way for a while, but we outgrew it, and have become a relatively passive religion that can handle being insulted by liberals, without having the urge to commit mass beheadings. Islam still has no signs of widespread maturity in the Middle East or anywhere else at that, and I would not count on it happening any time soon.

If feminists think the neophytes of this very strong, inexorably manifesting culture will yield to political correctness and tolerance, the radical islamists will laugh as they cut your head off for being a homosexual if they could. Just like feminists have been trying to defeat the status quo culture for the past 50 years, the radical islamists have recently started their long game in western America, and we are already seeing the consequences.

When the feminists win their long game over the last vestiges of our dying culture, the process for Islamic cultural domination will come that much faster, and when it does come, I don not want to be around to see what happens.

Hannibal's personal advice

Now, I have a soft spot for the androgynous wildabeasts DePaul Feminist Front, and would like to personally offer them some advice, because I heard they read my last article. Here is my advice to all feminists and Marxists at DePaul and around the world: you can ally with people you disagree with, but make sure that you fit somewhere into their endgame, because unless you don't, when you do take total control of our vapid culture you will have previously empowered your current enemies, which is never a good idea. Please learn how to factor in what happens after you win because if you don't things will get drastically worse for everyone when you do not.

If your groups are so concerned about dealing with human rights, I would suggest along with promoting the ban on Israel, include Saudi Arabia, Yemen, and other Muslim nations that have some of the worst human rights records in the world, demonstrably worse than Israel. But it will never happen because any person with common sense knows what these groups truly are.

These groups are invaders from a distant land looking to destroy us from within. You can truly tell the moral fiber of a group by the way they act and who they affiliate with. The radical Islamist groups I have encountered cause havoc by shutting down parts of campus, by intimidating other students, and by associating with convicted terrorists,

Murphy's law states that anything that has a possibility of happening will happen, which means that if we tolerate these groups in our own homeland, ourselves or our posterity will live to see the day when radical islamists will not tolerate us.

Kratom: The Productivity Booster And Anxiety Killer That You've Never Heard Of

The following article was sponsored by Good Looking Loser and written by Eric Crowley

You might not have heard of it, but I'm going to tell you about a little-known, legal, amazing compound called "Kratom" that I've been using for months now, that could be a huge help for you guys.

When I first read Good Looking Loser's Guide to Kratom, I thought he must be joking when he said Kratom was the number one recommendation of anything on this site and the natural remedy for everything from anxiety/depression to productivity and motivation.

With a recommendation that strong, I decided to find out for myself and ordered a small sample. After trying Kratom for the first time, I understood why Chris at Good Looking Loser had made such a strong recommendation, and went to my computer to order more.

I now believe Kratom is one of the most underrated substances on the face of the earth.

What is Kratom?

Kratom, or Mitragyna Speciosa, is a plant found in Southeast Asia that is part of the coffee family. Although not related to morphine or prescription drugs, when taken, Kratom stimulates your opioid receptors.

The effect of Kratom could be described as weed meets coffee. While Kratom gives you the pleasure buzz a bowl of marijuana might, it gives you none of the unpleasant side effects – no spaciness, no paranonia, no munchies, no sloth. Just the sense of well-being and the signature drop in anxiety. It makes you focused and energized, the way you might feel after a cup of green tea.

Plus, it's not habit forming unless you're use it several times a day for weeks at a time. I was easily able to drop it cold turkey, for several weeks for some recent training that required me to. Oh, and Kratom is completely legal in all but three states (WI, TN, VT), meaning you can buy it on the internet and have it shipped right to your door. It's also totally legal in Canada and the UK (but not Australia, however).

I've heard little discussion of this plant elsewhere, I suspect because Kratom involves talking about pleasure. Men are eager to talk about productivity drugs like modafinil that are strictly for getting things done, but the moment you stay "I want to get more done, and feel awesome doing it" you sound like some sort of degenerate stoner. Work is supposed to be, well, work. You're telling me I can get a bunch done, because I feel so good that I don't even notice time passing? Isn't that cheating?

Pleasure is a productivity hack in itself. If you feel good doing what you're doing, you're more likely to do more of it. Most of what we do as men is for pleasure. If you're reading about how to attract women, and you're not planning on using this skill strictly for the purpose of reproduction, you're already dedicating significant amounts of time for a pleasurable activity that doesn't help you get anything done.

It's okay to want to feel as good as you'd feel during a night of partying, when you sit down to crank out some code, or head out the door for work in the morning.

What is Kratom good for?

Kratom transcends many categories.

It's a naturally growing plant, but it's considered a legal compound. It's a nootroopic and productivity hack, but it's also an anti-depressant, a pain reliever, and great for parties. I've used Kratom with most of those intentions at one point or another.

It worked for all of them.

Keep in mind, I'm not a doctor, and I don't even play one on the internet. This is just me speaking from my personal experience, for entertainment purposes only.

Eliminating social anxiety: I'm a naturally introverted, and some might say "brooding" person. I find a little Kratom makes me feel energetic, positive, and able to easily start conversations. I talk to people I otherwise wouldn't have the energy to. "What to say" seems to come naturally. That is no exaggeration, I feel noticeably different than as usual.

Productivity/Nootropic: Often the challenge of getting projects done is maintaining focus. In the morning (or anytime), try substituting Kratom for coffee if you've got some work you're dreading, and you might find you're actually smiling the whole time you're doing it.

Pre-workout: On intimidating heavy lifting days, Kratom melts through that fear, gives me energy, and makes me feel like I can do anything when I get into the gym. Make sure you use a "fast" Kratom strain however.

Anti-depressant: In periods of depression, I've found Kratom to be able to give me the kick I needed to get out of negative thinking. While I've never had clinical depression, I have heard of people using Kratom to avoid or replace SSRIs.

Pain-killer: When I got a flu that would normally have required enough Advil to destroy my liver, I tried substituting Kratom. It worked far better, and I was able work right through the sickness. Shortly after I saw this short documentary, interviewing people who managed to substituted Kratom for prescription drugs to handle chronic pain. Vice recently did a piece on it for pain relief among MMA fighters.

I'm not joking about the focus aspect of Kratom.

Historically, Kratom has been used in Indonesia and Thailand by farmers and workers. It's still used in parts of Southeast Asia in place of coffee by factory workers. Whereas most pleasure compounds would impair your ability to operate heavy machinery, Kratom is used to operate heavy machinery better.

How Should You Use Kratom?

There are multiple strains of the Kratom plant. They each have different uses. Some are more energetic and "caffeinated." Those are referred to as "fast" strains. Others are more mellow and euphoric. Those are referred to as "slow" strains. Then there's a whole bunch in the middle.

Which one you choose will depend on your mood and what you need that day and it will take some trial and error.

You'll also want to measure out the exact amount you're taking on a scale. If you're a typical adult male, 3-4 grams is a good starting point. Take Kratom on an empty stomach, and don't mix it with alcohol. You should feel it around 20-45 minutes after. Mixing Kratom with protein powder, juice, or sweetener works just fine.

Avoid Kratom extracts. Extracts are created when people take the naturally growing plant, extract the active ingredients, and then create an unnaturally strong version of the plant. This will give your system the kind of dose where you could start to build up a tolerance to Kratom, and experience problems. Stick to what nature intended, it's more than enough. Stay away from these.

Because Kratom comes in multiple strains, if you cycle (or "rotate" as Good Looking Loser describes) them you can avoid building up a tolerance. For example, if you have seven strains, and take a different one each day, you could actually use Kratom every day while putting a week between each individual strains use. While I personally don't need Kratom everyday, Good Looking Loser has been using this strategy for over five years without issue.

Be sure to get quality Kratom – this is very important. Check reviews before you buy. Because Kratom is largely unregulated, the quality varies considerably from vendor to vendor. There is a lot of dirty and stale Kratom out there that will actually heighten your anxiety. The Kratom at the local headshop in your town is likely going to be awful. Don't buy it at a smokeshop.

Where To Try Kratom?

Good Looking Loser has a Kratom source that I use and recommend.

Check it out if you're looking for one. It's high-quality and better than anything you can find locally. As I said, quality really varies from vendor to vendor.

If you're already a fan of nootropics, biohacking, or productivity supplements, you'll definitely want to try Kratom. You will be beyond pleasantly surprised.

Author's disclaimer: This entire post was written while on Kratom, and it was fun.

Why You Should Be Morally Apathetic In Your Dealings With Women

March 5, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

When I broke up with my college girlfriend back in my Baptist days, she was completely distraught. Let's call her Petunia. Petunia was wanting to save her first kiss for her future husband, but I had her so co-dependent on me that she initiated our first kiss. [Admittedly I was a very late bloomer, but I made up for it in natural charisma.]

I assured her that I knew I was in love with her and that we would get married, but after we had dated for almost three months, I changed my mind, claiming that it was in both of our best interests.

Love Story

Heartiste lays out two possible ways women will react to a major break-up. Most girls cry, eat chocolate, and try to convince themselves they are better without him. Petunia was in the the second category, the "lashes out bitterly with rage and spite" category with "attempt to poison the well of whatever friendships or associations you shared" and "make it difficult for you to get her out of your life," and it was difficult to avoid her since we went to the same church.

I have a small scar from about a month after the break-up when she dug her nails into my wrist. A few months later, she would still break into tears over me at the college Bible studies. All of that, and I never even gave her the dick. If I were a modernist under the delusion that women had all the capabilities I have, then I would have turned into a misogynist. Fortunately, I was able to write her behavior off as "just being a girl."

Finally after almost a year, Petunia started teaching an ESL class at church and began dating a student. He was an off-the-boat Mexican who could barely speak English, and like most volunteer Christian ESL teachers, she didn't know any Spanish. I told her, "I find it funny that we used to practice our German together, and now you practice your English together!" She didn't laugh.

After dating him for six months, they got engaged and then married a year later in a wedding attended by several incel former friends I had introduced her to.

Petunia and I were a perfect example of what happens when two people have great chemistry and the emotional maturity of 15-year-olds. I doubt it's a coincidence that he—much like I—was the only person willing to show her affection. But it's not that she was ugly or androgynous. Petunia was a basket case and drained anyone who talked to her.

It took me three months after meeting her before I was willing to let her out of the friendzone, and it wasn't until after she got with the new guy that I realized I shouldn't have broken up with her so impulsively. [There's a catharsis somewhere in writing this piece.]

I like to think that Petunia and the Mexican were actually in love, found things in common, and won't get divorced within three years, but realistically she is probably bored out of her mind. I may have ruined her life. Most human beings would feel guilty upon realizing this.

Perhaps I'm a stone-hearted bastard, but I don't let myself feel intimidated by such ever-changing notions of morality or "past mistake." Petunia is an autonomous human being with free will to make choices. Or perhaps we all act as billiard balls, but either way I can't be held responsible for her misery. Or won't be held responsible. Either or, but who cares?

She is out of my life and with a different person. Now Pachico is responsible for making sure she's happy. Or maybe they're divorced with a baby and she'll wind up alone like my mother. All her choices. She chose to date me, she chose to let down her emotional guard, and afterwards she chose to marry the first man who showed interest.
Petunia chose to pursue Hollywood notions of infatuation.

Morality The Chameleon

Consider my friend Frederick. His high school girlfriend Ethel was absolutely in love with him, but he just thought she was a convenient person to have sex with. He never cheated on her, but he never really liked her either. After they broke up for the last time, she became very empowered, got knocked up, and bragged on Facebook about how she didn't have a man in her life. The sexually liberated woman at her finest.

Frederick felt bad about Ethel for a long time. Like most westerners, Frederick sadly has fallen to emotivist ethics. Emotivism is an ethical theory that sees morality in terms of aesthetic judgments. Perhaps it is not "true morality," but it is the common worldview of today. Killing innocents is ugly, while building hospitals is beautiful.Chemically-induced euthanasia is ugly, but pulling a feeding tube is beautiful. Calling your wife "the boss" is beautiful, but calling your husband “the boss” is ugly. Banging an 18-year-old is beautiful, but banging a 17-year-old is ugly—unless the 17-year-old is male.

Emotivism summarizes why a man would white-knight or call himself a feminist. Surely he has realized his lack of sex. Surely he has watched men ridicule him. Even though he sees that women always go for the assholes, he still maintains his position out of a sense of morality.

What good is truth if it has no function? Men have absolutely nothing to gain by being sympathetic towards women’s liberation, yet they keep running headfirst in the wall.

Celebrity Pseudo-Alphas

The sole exception to this voluntary celibacy is if the white knight is incidentally a celebrity. Well, sort of. Women love to champion Kurt Cobain as a male feminist, but before he struck gold, he was a loser who dropped out of high school to work as a janitor at that same school. He was talented, but he was never cool. He was pretentious and bitchy.

Kurt Cobain was such a big supporter of feminism, LGBT, and racial equality because he himself felt like he had no power over his life. Yet all of his misery was derived from his own choices. He quit school to clean toilets. He treated his wedding like a joke and then wondered why his marriage didn’t make him happy. Everything was a joke to him because he didn’t know how to live.

He had enough money to quit music and retire in a cabin tucked away in the woods or any number of things to make himself satisfied, but instead he decided to commit suicide. His stole from his daughter the ability to know her father. Finally, he insulted the girl by writing “I love you” and that his death would be in her best interest on the suicide note.

Cobain’s white knighting did not do him any good at all. He died alone and miserable despite having many people in his life who cared about him. I’ve never understood why feminists hold him so high as an example of what a man should be.

Love Thyself, And Do As Thou Wilt

“Why does she like jerks when I’m such a nice guy who listens to her and is always accommodating?” You’ve already answered your own question. If girls like jerks, then be one. If women didn’t respond so well to being abused, negged, and subjugated, then feminists wouldn’t have anything to complain about.

If girls view you the same as their gay friends, then you’re doing something wrong. She doesn’t want a sensitive romantic to eat cookie dough with, nor does she believe that such a thing as a nice guy even exists. Destroy your woman’s sense of independence by making her addicted to you, and then let someone else lose sleep answering the question of morality.

One time I sent Petunia a joke text, “Hey I’m breaking up with you,” and then a few seconds later, “Just kidding.” She responded, “Don’t do that! I can’t handle the anxiety!” She was absolutely correct, and I’ve laughed about it to this day.

Help Wanted: WordPress Developer

March 5, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK currently needs a WordPress coding expert to help us improve the site. Here are the skills I'm looking for:

- Ability to customize themes and plugins
- Good troubleshooting skill to solve problems such as malfunctioning widgets, plugins, etc
- Deep knowledge of the WordPress system including its newest upgrades
- Strong skill of html/css to incrementally improve design and fix css bugs/problems
- Open availability to implement requested changes within a 2-5 day timeframe
- Maintenance of parallel development sites to test changes before pushing them to main site

I'm looking for someone with more of a strong coding and technical background instead of design. This is a freelance position meaning you'd be paid by the hour. It's hard to predict exactly how much work I'll have, but I figure it will come in random spurts and grow over time since you would help maintain Reaxxion as well. This position could lead to a "product management" lead role if the network grows further.

If you're interested, please email with your resume, portfolio, and/or qualifications. Also include your hourly rate.

Do Women Become Irreparably Damaged After Allowing Arab Princes To Defecate On Them?

March 6, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Matt Forney recently reported on a website called Tag The Sponsor. This is a site that pulls back the veil on the real exploits of instagram "models." In short, good looking women are propositioned by rich Middle Eastern men (the "sponsors") to finance their all-expense paid trips to Dubai and other exotic locations in exchange for their company.

Their company, however, is an extremely tame description. These girls are paid to be slutty trophies in public. Okay so that's big deal right? We see this all the time all over the world. Men have been paying beautiful women to be their ornaments for ages so no harm no foul……right?

I'm afraid not. The real debauchery happens behind closed doors and it is outright nauseating to be sure. These girls are fucked by foreign objects, pissed on, shit on, violently and bloodily gang banged or whatever other nasty shit that comes to the twisted minds of these oil tycoons.

The obvious question here is why? Why would these young, pretty girls put themselves through these disgusting fuck-a-thons? I may be naive here but I'd like to think that maybe 25 years ago girls wouldn't even consider these propositions. So a deeper question is what exactly is it that's changed their mindset?

Understanding this phenomenon is important for men because this completely wrecks women physically, mentally, emotionally, and even spiritually. Carousel riders are damaged beyond repair but we still game them because they're still good for the occasional nail ‘n bail. We know how to get in and out of their panties with minimal investment and keep it moving.

Tag The Sponsor sluts, however, are ruined for life. The physical and emotional toll it takes on them is a cross they are ill equipped to bear. This makes them radioactive to friends, family, boyfriends, and hookups. Even the man unlucky enough to have a one night stand with her will be impacted by the mind fuck inflicted on her while abroad.

This article will take a look at the where this behavior originates as it relates to the sexual marketplace, what their motivations are, their real status-quo, how it truly damages them, and most importantly what this means for men.

Let’s get started.

Don’t hate…it’s just survival

In the city I reside it’s not uncommon to see a hot young female driving an expensive car with plenty of bags and boxes from a day of shopping at designer stores stuffed in the back seat. On it’s face we all might think “pssh…that bitch is livin’ off a man,” and we’d be right most of the time.

We have to understand, however, that women have precious few assets they can monetize—their youth and beauty being the two most valuable. We can hate on them all we want to, but this is the way it’s been since the dawn of time. Housewives, strippers, sex workers, sluts, and all pretty women in between have always had to use their looks to get by as a matter of survival.

Dubai sluts have been properly nicknamed “porta potties” because of their willingness to be used as human toilets. Anything goes if the price is right and so long as the girls are paid, they happily bathe in the bodily fluids of foreign men. This is a flat out stomach-churning way to make a living.

Nothing's off limits so long as there's money involved

"But you just said not to hate on them for shaking their money makers right?"

Being a stripper, prostitute, or a trophy wife is one thing. Lying in a pool of blood, shit, and urine after getting ass fucked by half a dozen condomless men just to get a picture standing next to a Lamborghini wearing designer heels is quite another.

The clear difference between the two is the incredibly steep physical and psychological price they pay compared to their gold-digging or sex working sisters, and that's where this lifestyle ruins these girls forever.

> She would pull out a few photos that they would take as proof so they could recover the damages to the room. In quite a few photos, there were bedsheets stained with blood and feces, and quite often there was drug paraphernalia in the room.
> -Veloce, Roosh V Forum

The price they pay

Strippers

As far as strippers go, both parties know the transaction is strictly business. You pay the money, she takes her clothes off, rubs her tits in your face, grinds on your junk, shows you a little cooch and that's that. The physical and psychological price she pays, though tangible, is comparatively low.

Sex workers

Escorts and prostitutes operate the same way in terms of the transactional exchange. Their psyches pay a higher price because sex is involved, but unlike party sluts who give it up for free, they're getting cash out of the deal for giving it up.

Trophy wives

The trophy wife comes out the best, having exchanged her most valuable assets for long-term security and a lifestyle befitting a young, pretty woman. Her mental and physical portfolio is in the black due to her sustainable lifestyle which puts her mind at ease. Plus, the fact that her uterus isn't a petri dish filled to the brim with semen from multiple donors (at least not lately) means that she doesn't suffer the physical drawbacks that women in the sex trade are subject to.

Porta potty girls

Dubai sluts, however, pay the highest price of all and get the lowest return on investment. They participate in abominable acts for a few thousand dollars, a picture on a private jet, and expensive clothes—are of which are temporary and depreciating assets.

#pottymouth

Whoring themselves out in the worst ways possible for frivolous, temporary, material items that will be all but worthless in a few months will use up their reserves (youth and beauty) quicker than they can imagine, meaning they'll likely hit the wall a hell of a lot sooner than they would otherwise. This is what happens when they exchange their only valuable currency for useless material possessions.

Sure they make a little cash, but they blow it within months and before they know it they're looking for another offer. But how many times can a girl physically and mentally handle these gross, abusive, Arabian-style fuckfests?

Why do girls do this?

Simple Math: Females — Slut shaming x (brand worship + attention and validation addiction) = a ride on a cock carousel that costs a hell of a lot more than the tokens she's used to paying stateside. It really is as simple as that, gents.

Every Anglo-slut's dream

The entire culture tells them it's okay to whore themselves out for designer sunglasses and shopping sprees rather than finding and locking down a man who can provide them with a solid lifestyle for years to come.

This mentality is the direct result of sluts no longer being shamed. The sad part is that although the traditional housewife is becoming an endangered species and often frowned upon by today's modern woman, they all know it's the pinnacle of true womanhood. Anyone who doubts this need only take a stroll through any social media site and see that attention whores take almost as much pride as declaring how great a mother they are as they do getting 100+ likes for their duck face selfies showing cleavage.

Women will always have the notion of settling down and having a family in the back of their minds because it's what they desire regardless of what their Instagram or Facebook accounts say. Fighting this biology only tamps down these desires, but mother nature always wins out in the end.

The sad thing is that girls that engage in this porta-potty depravity think they can have their ~~shit~~ cake and eat it too. They believe they can live this adrenaline-fueled lifestyle then settle down and expect to live happy and fulfilling lives. Unfortunately for them it doesn't work that way…not even close.

Girls like this are like recovering meth addicts who have fried their dopamine receptors to the point they can't enjoy anything anymore. The exotic trips, expensive hotels, posh surroundings, and everything else they've grown accustomed to will make living a normal life all but impossible when their looks fade and they stop getting offers from pervs overseas.

Celebre-sluts like Miley Cyrus and Ke$ha who sing about "poppin' bottles" and "gettin' fucked up” don’t warn these girls about what awaits them when the high-priced party’s over. They crave the bright lights, the high-priced drinks, and the private jets they see on TV, so when they get the opportunity to actually live out what they see in the music videos they brainwash themselves with it’s no wonder they jump at the chance regardless of what they have to do to get it, long term consequences be damned.

[image]
It’s all fun and games ’till they hit the wall

Are they fooling anyone?

Not a chance. It’s amusing to see these girls with the typical self-serving hashtags underneath a photo of them sitting on a yacht or in a pool when they know damn well that everyone who “liked” or commented on their photo knows she doing ass to mouth later that night.

[image]
#poop

Everybody, men and women alike, know this isn’t the lifestyle these chicks lead on a daily basis. Their social media “friends” know these girls can’t afford this life. Yet these girls tout and talk about how their latest photo op is just “another day in the life” and delusionally think the fake praise they get is genuine.

A quick Google search or a visit here shows you how quick girls are to shame each other for this behavior. They all know the debauchery in Dubai is fundamentally wrong, even if they put on a good show by telling the world a girl can do anything she wants with anyone she wants for whatever reason she wants.

THE DIRTY ARMY: Nik, Hollywood’s next slut has made it to Dubai! Likely getting poopoo and pood on as we speak. Her Instagram and Tumblr and Facebook are all about Dubai, where oddly enough all the pictures are of her, taken by someone else. No one else in the pics, so all money has paid for her trip.

No need to speculate….we all know what’s really going on

The shaming is also hypocritical and that isn't fooling anyone either. Most of the girls calling out these human waste dumpsters would gladly take a steamy shit to the face for a chance to drink expensive champagne in a G5 bound for a foreign land, and they know it. If they had the looks they'd be entertaining offers as frequently as the scat porn stars they berate.

Most girls think this way

The real damage they suffer

There's no doubt that the superficial effects these escapades has on girls is substantial. But they pale in comparison to the real damage that is done to her sexuality on a psychological level.

This article offers a front row seat to the pathological damage that genuine rape has on a woman and what it turns her into. Among the slew of mental hurdles she has to jump in order to feel normal, regular sex doesn't excite victims of rape. Violent, abusive sex is what she wants because it arouses her the most. This leads her into relationships with dangerous, mentally unstable men which only accelerates her descent into cerebral torture.

In short, she is damaged well beyond repair.

Girls who take part in these feces-slathered gang bangs will be similarly damaged. Participating in sex acts such as this even once will render a female utterly incapable of having a normal sexual relationship.

The reason for this is that her body is not the only thing being defiled. Her mind and soul are also being violated by the filth she participates in. Girls with high notch counts have a shitload of mental issues as it is. But subjecting themselves to this level of depravity is psychological suicide. There is no coming back from this degree of degradation no matter how much they try to forget what they've done.

> …the memories of the sick acts they've committed will haunt them for the rest of their lives.
> -Matt Forney

They also become sexually numb. Like genuine victims of rape, the prospect of conventional sex won't turn them on like it used to. This isn't to say that the prospect of a diarrhea bath or getting a fish stuffed into their vaginas is what's necessary to moisten their panties. But rough sex, which the vast majority of women with a healthy (ish) sexual appetite love, will leave a lot to be desired as far as a Dubai slut is concerned. As a result, she'll have to engage in increasingly vile acts just to get off.

The bottom line is that these girls sell their souls to the devil and no amount of time, introspection, or contrition will ever buy it back.

What does this mean for men?

Not much as far as betas are concerned. As long as their blue pill upbringings continue to blind them, they'll thank their lucky stars they're able to wife up these shit stained sluts.

White knights will always be around to defend these women and make excuses for their behavior using words like "victim" and "exploitation." Regardless of how many golden showers she's taken, these idiots will turn a blind eye to her deplorable past and continue to be safety nets for these toilet whores.

What this means for red pill men, however, is much different. Granted, we're not surprised by this at all. We've lifted the veil on the greatest con job in history (feminism) so the lengths women go to for useless name brand knick knacks isn't going to change anyone's perspective. If anything, it cements what we already knew to be true in the first place.

But now that we're cognizant of what these "Instagram models" do for these luxuries it would behoove us to be even more selective than we already are…especially the really hot ones who are "well traveled."

While it's common knowledge that high SMV women are much more discriminatory when deciding who to let penetrate them, at the end of the day every girl's pussy is for sale whether she admits it or not. So is her mouth, anus, dignity, or anything else that can get her money, gifts, or security. There is and always will be a price.

Whatever helps you sleep at night

If you've read a few articles or perused a few sites on this subject matter it's easy to see that most of these porta potty girls are quite beautiful which is not surprising in the least. These rich oil princes aren't going to throw $40,000 at women who aren't in the upper aesthetic echelon. I think it's fair to say that no matter how good a girl looks, men who have been unplugged will think long and hard before pursuing a woman who's known to have been on one of these luxurious trips to Dubai.

I'm pretty sure I'm not the only man who doesn't want to swap spit with a woman who's been served a shit sundae. Proceed with extreme caution and do your due diligence by asking her what countries she's traveled to. If Dubai is on that list, vanish like a fart in the wind.

If you see this on her page, make like a bad check and bounce

In the grand scheme of things this trend means that more and more young, beautiful women are opting out of the long-term investment strategies of old. These girls used to marry young and bear the offspring of high status men to ensure they were taken care of well into the future.

The hard truth is that the instant glitz, glitter, and social media attention the Tag The Sponsor lifestyle offers is more enticing to today's females than marriage and motherhood…at least in the short term (no shock there). In their minds there's no need to tie themselves to one man in holy matrimony to live a fulfilling life when they can get what they believe is something better without having to commit to anyone long term.

As far as they're concerned this is a no-brainer and unfortunately for men this further shrinks the pool of viable (ish) options. Eventually the only option for a man who wants to pass on his legacy or have a meaningful relationship with a beautiful woman is to leave the country. And even that resource is beginning to erode.

In the end…

…this is an extreme case of the female id run amok. We know girls do anything and everything for status and material possessions but that doesn't make the stories of their licentiousness any less stupefying.

The craziest part about all of this is that when girls accept these offers they are well aware of despicable deeds expected of them the minute they check into those five-star hotels but they do it anyway. This, if nothing else, shows the absolute degeneracy of today's females. The fact that they do this of their own volition for short-lived status and attention hits on social media exposes them for the nefarious creates they are when left to their own devices.

Shit, no wonder Muslim men cover their women from head to toe in 120+ degree heat. They seem to know better than most men that women will run wild if given any measure of control over the sexual market.

What these women and their admirers fail to realize is that they are further confirming to the world what's already proven to be true even though they deny it in public: that most women who live lives of luxury (real or otherwise) do so because of men. Every man, red or blue pill, knows the only real currency a woman has is her appearance.

She totally bought that jet and Ferrari

That's not an indictment on women. It's biology. Some women do the smart thing and consolidate on a man to ensure security, some women enter the sex trade to liquidate their assets for a faster ROI, and most use their femininity to gain minor favor and minimal status (or as much as their SMV will get them), tangible or otherwise.

> Some women are literally dedicating their lives to looking as good as they possibly can — you can find them on Instagram, Tumblr, etc. but you shouldn't. But those looks are all they have. Most of them still have to suck a dick to get by, and outside of being fuck toys, they have nothing to offer which is why most of them are constantly in and out of relationships.
> It doesn't take "Tag to Sponsor" to know that when women are on their "good look as hell" grind, that they're about some money, and if they're going to get money from men who have it, they're going to have to suck and fuck for it"
> -Jariel, Roosh V Forum

It's a travesty that the best looking girls in this country are being used up like cheap gasoline. It wouldn't be quite so bad if the majority of our women weren't land whales. If most American women were in good shape the ruining of a few of them wouldn't put any substantial dent in our meat market.

But the scarcity of beautiful women in the U.S. makes this trend all the more painful and further depletes our already limited options. Our highest value (not to be confused with quality) women are being grossly polluted by this lifestyle. Nobody wins in this situation…

…except, of course, for the men squatting over these girls and emptying their bowels. All it's costing them in these transactions is a few bucks and maybe some linens.

5 Things Every Man Under 30 Needs To Know

March 6, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen,

Today is my 30th birthday. Rather than feel morbid and depressed on this day as many in our culture do, I'm celebrating the gift of life, reflecting on times gone by, evaluating what I have learned, achieved and experienced, and spending my time with loved ones.

In reminiscing I had an idea for this article. I want to share with the younger guys reading the five things I have learned by age 30 I wish I had learned a hell of a lot sooner. Let's cut the foreplay and dive right in.

1. Time goes by quicker than you can ever imagine

If you can't replace it, don't waste it.

If there's one thing I would do differently with my life up to this point, I would be more careful about how I chose to spend my time. Time is literally the single most precious commodity on earth, a non-renewable resource which once spent can never be regained.

I gave far too much time to people who didn't deserve it and in situations I shouldn't have been in during my late teens and early twenties. It was only when I decided that my time was valuable and when I started to be more careful how I spent it, or rather when I started to look at it as investing it, that my life started to change for the better.

Learn early on to respect your time. If you don't, others won't either. Before you know it you will be getting older and your time to do great things when you're young and free and lay the foundations for a successful life will be up.

I found it helpful to develop what's known as a deathbed mentality. This is not some morbid fixation on your inevitable demise, but rather looking deeply into the abyss and coming to terms with the fact that you are walking wormfood.

What this does is scare the shit out of you and causes you to realize that the hour you are going to spend watching Simon Cowell judge the singing ability of people who you will never meet and wouldn't bat an eyelid if you died of rectal cancer would be better spent watching the sunset, sipping a nice bottle of red wine with someone you care for, working toward a legacy project that will outlive you, or doing something that helps other human beings and gets you paid.

2. Money matters, a lot!

A lot of people say money can't buy happiness, and I agree.

However, money matters a hell of a lot and it is basically the key to everything in this world. It can buy you the best healthcare, allow you to travel to the best places, give you access to the best people in their respective fields, and most importantly give you some power and control over your own destiny.

Money is the difference between a free man and a slave. Money is the thing which gives you choices and opens doors to new experiences and thus richer learning. Money has God-like power on this earth, like the fact or hate it.

Focus your energy when you're young on getting as much money as you can, and the rest will follow.

Too many people wake up at thirty with nothing to show for the "blast" that was their twenties and then end up playing catch-up all through their thirties and forties.

If they ever do manage to get out of the toxic wasteland of consumer debt they racked up while partying like tomorrow would never come, they will be the lucky minority. A lot of people spend the rest of their lives paying for the mistakes they made before the age of thirty. Don't be one of them.

As many a wise hip hop artist has said, "Get money money, get money money moonneeeyyy!"

3. Physical strength is the key to the confidence you desire

Build the foundations before you start on the superstructure.

A lot of guys under thirty suffer from serious confidence problems.

You're too young to be a true expert at something and aren't really sure of what you're capable of in the various areas of your life. Other, more experienced men with some successes behind them can beat you at most things, and so you aren't really sure where you stand in the great hierarchy of life.

What you lack, and therefore what you need, is confidence. The one thing that will give you an insane confidence boost that will transfer into other areas of your life is being a physical beast.

Physical strength and the ability to handle yourself in an altercation will cause you to carry yourself in a very different way than most men in the world, and therefore put you at a huge advantage over them.

This confidence transfers into how you carry yourself in all areas. People at work will notice when you become more assertive and sure. Women will notice when you walk into a bar with your head held high and look people in the eye rather than looking at your feet like a beta-boy.

Other men will know just by looking at the lean, shredded muscle causing your t-shirt to stretch at the seams that you might not be the kind of guy they want to test. People will move out of your way as you walk along the street, and you will experience what Arnold called "the respect of size."

A strong body leads to a strong mind and mental frame. You can't have one without the other. They enhance each other and lead to a positive feedback loop If you want confidence, build your body and your strength. The rest will follow.

4. Chasing women is a waste of time. Focus your attention elsewhere.

Let me say at the outset that I'm not a misogynist. I have no problem with decent, respectful women.

However, I often wish the Prada-wearing whinebags at home would come down here to Asia where I live and spend a few weeks and see what real women's issues are like. A man spreading his legs on a subway to air condition his nut sack after a day's work is not an issue. Being beaten by several males in your family, being denied a basic education, and having a high possibility of being sold into sex slavery unless you get a decent education are real issues to be concerned about.

That being said, it is obvious to any man of experience that the majority of women on offer these days in western countries suck and they will eat up your time, money, and energy and leave you with nothing to show for it.

Classy ladies, the kind most idiots spend their days chasing!

This is the inevitable result of an entitlement mentality that pervades our generation and has particularly affected women, causing them to believe that they are entitled to behave as they please just because they have a vagina, all the while claiming they are independent and liberated, never realizing that rights come with responsibilities or that to get the respect you desire you have to actually behave in ways that are worthy of it.

As a young man under thirty, the other sex is likely relatively new and mysterious to you. You haven't been laid a hell of a lot yet and you have most probably been subjected to a relentless campaign of brainwashing since birth, telling you that women are they key to happiness. You are Prince Charming, and you need to find Snow White to achieve happiness, so they tell you.

What you will learn, and I wish I had learned sooner, is that this is utter bullshit.

There are good women out there in the world who actually want to be an alpha provider's wife and build a family, but you won't have access to them until you become the kind of man they are looking for. You can pretty much rule that out until you hit your late twenties to early thirties and get out of the cock-carousel scene that is bars and nightclubs.

You will also have a greater chance of finding a decent, traditional woman outside the west where traditional values such as family, gender roles, and chastity still mean something.

What is required is that you become successful, you become a man of integrity and worth, then you become powerful. You will then have your pick of women who desire you, rather than the other way around. Remember, you are the king of your own domain, and the king does not chase common street urchins, he selects from the most virtuous women in his kingdom.

Be the best man you can be, focus on your career, your strength and your own developing your mind, and wait until you reach thirty or so before you even think about getting into a serious relationship with any female. When you do, go in with your eyes open and take all necessary measures to protect yourself.

Side Note: If every man implemented the above mindset, the "war of the sexes" would be over in exactly one generation. The power would be back squarely in the hands of men, where it belongs.

5. People aren't nice. They are selfish and almost entirely focused on what will benefit them.

The sooner you realize this hard truth, the better – people are selfish.

In my experience, people will always do what is right for them and their own survival, and this is right according to the laws of nature. They should do, and so should you.

I for one spent a lot of my late teens and early twenties trying to be a good, decent human being and thinking this strategy would get me ahead in life. Needless to say, it did not. I was used like a doormat by a series of satan-spawned, psychotic cum guzzlers and basically robbed blind (I had not yet developed the red pill mindset). I also earned the equivalent of Scooby snacks. We've all been there.

Do you know what happened when I became a little bit of a dick? When I started saying "no," ruthlessly nexting neurotic, game playing women, and started seeing work as something to benefit me and me alone rather than being a good, loyal little slave boy?

Shit changed fast! I got 15x the income, women started grabbing at me as I walked past in the street, I actually found a high value woman of the caliber I desired who had values I respected and who was suitable for providing me with a child. To top it off, she didn't have a problem making me a home-cooked steak sandwich when I came home from a ball-busting day at work. She appreciates my efforts on behalf of our family, and shows her appreciation in her own way.

Sure, I pissed a lot of people off and lost a few friends, but it was worth it. I became the kind of man I wanted to be. I became assertive, dominant and a little more selfish. As a result, I finally got everything I wanted from my life.

Before you start waxing lyrical about Mother Teresa types and the unselfish saints of the world, remember this: Mother T did what she did because she wanted to go to heaven. It was still a form of selfishness, but it was a positive form of selfishness which helped other people too. That’s exactly what I’m advocating here.

Do not bend over backwards to please people. Please yourself, and ironically people will love and respect you more for it.

I close by asking you a question. What do you wish you had learned earlier? What advice would you older men reading give the young guys coming up? What do guys who have even more life experience, in their forties, fifties and beyond have to say?

FEMEN’s Silence During The Ukraine Conflict Shows Their Anti-Male Agenda

I know many Eastern European women, a considerable number of them Ukrainian. Thankfully, none of these Ukrainian girls have ever complained to me about the status of women in their country. If they did, I would give them an earful, telling them to join the front line in the Eastern Ukraine and see how they felt then.

Why? Because Ukrainian men are being conscripted en masse to fight the separatists in the East [1] [2] [3]. Protests against these measures have been raging for months across the country. To minimize any loss of headline-grabbing anti-Russian momentum, Kiev, western governments, and the media are avoiding large-scale commentary on either Ukrainian conscription or the protests accompanying it.

Here come the hypocrites!

But… where… is… FEMEN? That excellent marching band of equality must have had internet problems the last nine months? Where can we send them their sign-up papers to join their male comrades?

As I write these words, a ceasefire has been orchestrated, again in neutral Minsk, the Belarussian capital. In Eastern Ukrainian terms, “ceasefire” is really a friendly word for people still dying. By the time you read this, dozens or hundreds of people will be falling dead again every day. Ukrainian government and Russian militia spokesmen will be exchanging the verbal versions of artillery salvos over which side is responsible for the deal's collapse.

Here's that male privilege FEMEN talks about

Like Russians condemning over the alleged return of coffins containing their sons, husbands, boyfriends and brothers, Ukrainians are taking a stand to thwart forced military service in the Eastern Ukraine. It's worth pointing out here that I make no judgment in this piece on either the general efficacy of conscription or which side is the "right one" in the Ukrainian conflict.

What I am confronting, and excoriating, is the ignoring of male-only conscription by a group committed to the notion that modern society only foists gender injustice or discrimination on women. Whether male-only conscription is correct or incorrect, vital or unnecessary, it is clearly a case of gender discrimination towards men.

And FEMEN is silent about it, which is rather telling as this is not "easy" peacetime conscription but conscription during a violent civil war. Hundreds of Ukrainian servicemen, many or most of them conscripts, are killed every couple of months.

A "wonderful" antecedence

FEMEN has made a living off of incendiary and narcissistic stunts. Like destroying monuments to a deliberate Stalinist famine that killed as many people as the Jewish Holocaust. Or seeking to assault catwalk models for "objectifying women" when, ironically, they wear far more clothing than FEMEN cuntivists.

The ethnic Russian separatists emerged with their violent struggle after their favored leader, Moscow-backed Viktor Yanukovych, was forced from office. Surely then, FEMEN would be diametrically opposed to the separatists? And not only support military intervention against them but back dual-gender conscription?

Starved to death by Stalin in the ’30s? You must be a misogynist!

A very occasional fallback position for feminists is that “patriarchy punishes men, too.” Yet this maxim receives little meat on its bones from SJW’s, most notably in everyday practice. The feminist solution to the matter of conscription is to simply ignore it. By treating the “oppression of women” in a vacuum, FEMEN and those like them can avoid uncomfortable truths, especially those where men are forced to serve and often die for their country.

Throughout the Euro 2012 football (soccer) tournament, held jointly by Poland and the Ukraine, FEMEN cuntivists staged numerous protests attacking prostitution. Though women are certainly trafficked against their will some of the time in the Ukraine, they’re not forcibly made to fight, or exposed to gunfire, artillery, and airstrikes as a job for slave wages.

And, even so, the vast majority of prostitutes are not 2015 equivalents of early 1860s Confederate slavery. This is a reality casually brushed aside by FEMEN as it pillories prostitution but remains tight-lipped over conscription.

Just like the career shelf-stacker at Walmart, prostitutes are often where they are due to poor life choices: they skipped school, had a poor work ethic, or chose to indulge in drugs. Or maybe they just like the money and don’t want a normal waitressing job getting tips from men in their 50s.

Open wide for the separatist bullet!

Men forced to fight must have male privilege?

In addition to the risk of death and permanent, debilitating disability, the rigors of military life, even in “downtime,” are just plain shit. This isn’t the life of Felix Baumgartner, where you risk death and then party it up as a playboy from there on in. You don’t need to be serving outside or god forbid inside Donetsk or Mariupol to realize that you’ll be dirty only an hour after you showered when on the move in the military, if you even got the chance to get clean.

You’ll be taking a shit in a ravine, keeping your eyes alert for any enemy wanting to add you to his kill count. By comparison, the biggest hygiene inconvenience for a FEMEN protester will be skid-marks on her panties.

Most importantly, as a Ukrainian conscript, your friends and comrades will return to base in body bags, or their innards will be all over your uniform. And, you ask, is today going to be your last as well? This psychological horror is something FEMEN will never have any cognizance of.

They claim to be fighters of oppression, of Putin, of Yanukovych, and of patriarchy, but the shutters to their magnificent Mall of Equality have been closed since the so-called Euromaidan.

Praise be to FEMEN. We always know it’s your gospel when we hear it.

Want Better Women? Stop Feeding The Beast Of Online Dating

March 6, 2015 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

I realize the irony of what I'm about to say, given I wrote this article for a website, but it's no secret that men spend far too much time online these days. Sadly, the average man seems blissfully unaware of the negative impacts this has on his motivation, testosterone, and social skills.

How many of the hours spent gazing at a screen is simply wasted time a man could dedicate to improving himself and enjoying life? Sadly, more often than not, many of us take the easy option – the online option – rather than taking the more challenging, meaningful and fulfilling path.

Along with social media, internet dating is one of the prime time wasters in the world today. Both are downright unmasculine things that quite frankly you can do without. Who wants to meet somebody by checking off a shopping list of requirements, all in the safety of your own home? A man should be out in the big bad world pushing his limits and living life, not trawling through profiles of fat, washed up carousel riders who already have a smorgasbord of cock to choose from.

We men are by nature visual creatures, and so to really drive home this point, you are about to get photographic evidence to convey this message more powerfully than words alone ever could.

Recently, there was an article in an Australian newspaper that highlighted the absolute folly of men wasting their time on internet dating. Titled "Meet South Australia's most wanted online singles," it featured the most "hit on" women from a number of different websites. As you will see, not one of them was even moderately attractive.

And remember, these women are supposedly the cream of the crop. Consider also that South Australia not only has the most attractive women in the nation, but is an exception to the sausage fest which is the norm Down Under.

This was the most "hit on" woman on dating site RSVP. Nicole is a "37-year-old mother of one" who gets "hundreds of profile views and dozens of messages every week"…. and she is completely unattractive. With her tuckshop lady arms, tired face, and mediocre features, I would give her a 5 out of 10 on the Roosh scale.

An unattractive, over the hill single mother being the recipient of this award should dispel the manosphere myth that once women hit the wall in their 30s, they are starved of male attention. Sure, they might not be able to secure the alpha commitment they believe they are entitled to, but there will be no shortage of thirsty betas with no pride willing to mop up the mess, and even still the odd alpha pump-and-dump.

Even a website that is meant to be the sole domain of "beautiful people" spectacularly fails to deliver anything likely to give you a boner. The most popular South Australian woman on Beautiful People? Yvette, a 45 year old single mother and political scientist:

Ok, she might have been a teen model, but that would have been 30 years ago, and as you can see, she is way past her prime – yet she still has an ego the size of Ayers Rock. Just read some of her comments and see if you'd be able to spend longer than five minutes with her without wanting to stick your dick in a blender:

"A lot of men are threatened by women of my calibre, to be honest."

"When I walk, I walk. I have presence. I have an excellent figure for my age. I'm a good catch, eh?"

"So often men that I date say 'I'm so proud to walk next to you because everybody looks, you've got that presence'. Well, I want the same thing. Hello! I don't want some ugly bastard, sorry!"

If I could buy this woman for what she is worth and sell her for what she thinks she is worth, I'd be a billionaire. To be honest though, I can't blame her for her rampant narcissism. Wouldn't you think your shit didn't stink too if you got dozens of messages and virtual smiles every day, and all of your photos were "rated the full five out of five for attractiveness?"

Nevertheless, this is typical of the arrogance and sense of entitlement you see from women in online dating, who, despite not bringing much to the table, feel entitled to nothing less than a handsome CEO with a six pack.

But if I still haven't convinced you online dating is a waste of time, check this out. Yvette admits that she has yet to go on a single date with anyone she's met online. In other words, she thinks her suitors are pathetic, and regularly looks at her online dating page for no other reason than to feed her rampant narcissism.

Any remotely attractive woman can get laid with little or no effort. In a world of absolutely rampant female narcissism, where female arrogance and entitlement go hand-in-hand with the skyrocketing obesity rate, we need to raise our standards and stop feeding the beast. All internet dating does is raise the egos of unattractive women, who become lazier and lazier as they get swamped with more and more attention. The inevitable consequence? A glut of old, fat women who think they are as hot as Kate Upton.

But what about women already in relationships?

Nicole was married for 10 years before becoming addicted to the endless line of online suitors. This is a very real dilemma the modern man faces. If his wife hears of her recently divorced friend being swamped by offers for cock, she can't help but feel like she's missing out on something.

Encouraged by the YOLO mindset, she becomes bored, and jealous, and she too seeks out online dating and hookup websites. She too gets divorced and rejoins the ride on the cock carousel in earnest, and more often than not she's getting financed by the poor beta husband who had no idea this was coming.

It's still staggering how delusional these women are. The female author of this article gushes that "If Nicole's everyday life mirrored her online one, she'd be mobbed in the street daily by hordes of single men wanting to kiss her."

However, the reason unattractive women are swamped with attention online is because men who are too lazy to approach her properly in person don't feel like it is too much effort to send her a "wink" on an online dating site. A real alpha male would approach them in person, but they don't, because the brutal reality is they just aren't much of a catch. This should be deflating to these women's egos, but it isn't.

Men need to quit online dating altogether. If we all do this, we really are killing two birds with one stone. Being part of a mass exodus reduces the inflated egos of undesirable women, forces them to lift their game, and also benefits your growth and development as a man. Why subject yourself to the degradation of getting screened by an undesirable woman like you are an applicant for a minimum wage job, knowing full well that she is conducting similar assessments on 1,000 other fawning men?

Yes, quitting online dating includes Tinder. Right swiping on Tinder or sending a woman a wink on OkCupid will never come close to the rush of masculinity you get from approaching a beautiful woman in person. For God's sake, stop your undignified online worship of subpar women in between jacking off to internet porn and muster the balls to approach an attractive woman in real life.

It doesn't even matter if you are rejected – by showing the balls to back yourself to sleep with a sexy woman, you have proven your manhood. And you might just pull a hot babe you had been brainwashed into believing was "out of your league." The market for today's woman is massively overpriced, and it's up to men as consumers to demand a better product.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

What You Can Learn About Being A Man From The Vikings

March 6, 2015 | by Peter Burns | Link | Original Link

In 982, Erik the Red took a boat and set sail for the west. He had been recently sentenced to three years of exile from Iceland for a series of killings that he committed. A wild temper was inherent in his family, evidenced by the fact that his father had also been sentenced for manslaughter in Norway. He was banished to Iceland and took little Erik with him.

Erik grew up to be a huge man, one of short temper, but also curious and thirsty for adventure. Unlike most people, who would have probably sailed for some other known lands, he decided to put trust into chance and decided to sail for unknown lands in the west.

He was not the first Norseman to go to these lands, as there were several others who had gone to explore them before him, but he was the first man to actually try to settle them.

He spent his three years of exile exploring the vast new lands. After his period of banishment was over, he went back to Iceland to recruit people to help him settle the land. In order to entice them, he named the land Greenland.

The Vikings Were Fierce Warriors

From the 9th to the 12th centuries, the Vikings were some of the fiercest people in Europe. The sight of the Viking longship would always strike fear in the hearts of all the people living in lands bordering the sea.

The Vikings participated in many raids of coastal areas ranging from Russia to England and France, sometimes sailing to places as far away as the Mediterranean. However, they were not only known as fearless warriors, but also as merchants and most importantly, explorers. They plied the northern seas and settled many inhospitable lands.

All these events would later be retold in stories that were passed from one generation to the next. The heroic deeds of the ancestors would be preserved for the posterity in order to teach them about the past and help them better prepare for the future. These stories were known as the sagas.

Ancient Norse Wisdom Literature

The sagas however were not the only type of literature that has survived from that period. One series of poems that has been preserved is called the Havamal, which can be classified as wisdom literature.

The Havamal is a collection of old Norse poems that deals with giving advice on how to live your life and conduct yourself in different situations. It was meant as a guide for the Viking man, with much actionable advice. It serves as a good source of the ethics of that culture. Its wisdom however is often transcendent and can be applied even today.

Reading the work can also make you reflect on your place in the world and your life as a man. The most powerful passage is probably this one:

> "Cattle die,
> Kindred die,
> You yourself die,
> But I know one thing that never dies;
> The glory of a dead man's life."

You are a sum of your actions. Your life is what you make of it. The way you face challenges and overcome them will come to reflect on you long after you are dead. You will die one day, just like everyone and everything does, but you can leave a legacy. A legacy is immortal.

The Havamal extols the virtue of hard work:

> "Wake up early if you want another man's life or land.
> No lamb for the lazy wolf.

> No battle is won in bed.“

If you want something, then you need to work for it. If you spend your entire day lying in bed dreaming about it, you will never get it. Only the people who work for something will get it.

You also always have to come prepared. Never assume anything. Danger might be lurking just around the corner:

> “Never walk away from home > ahead of your axe and sword.
> You can’t feel a battle > in your bones or foresee a fight.“

There are many haters in the world who will try to bring you down. The Havamal also gives advice on how to deal with them:

> “The wise guest has his way of dealing
> With those who taunt him at the table.
> He smiles through the meal,
> Not seeming to hear
> The twaddle talked by his foes.“

The Havamal deals with different aspects of a man’s life, and includes a part on how to deal with women and on their nature. There is a small theory part, followed by what today someone might call field reports. It talks about how Odin, the supreme Norse God, tried to pick up the daughter of a man named Billing (he failed) and also how he picked up a girl named Gunnlod (he succeeded).

All in all, any man can find a lot of practical wisdom in the collection. This wisdom has helped guide many a Viking to lead a life of glory and to not falter when the going got tough.

The Last Viking In Greenland

The colony that Erik the Red founded survived for over 500 years, but eventually it faltered. Here too we can learn some practical lessons.

In 1540, a German merchant ship, blown off course, sailed into the coastal waters of Greenland. The skipper of the ship sailed past some of the islands and decided to land on one of them. The island seemed desolate, but in the distance he could see buildings that were familiar to him. He had seen very similar ones in Iceland.

The crew of the ship disembarked and decided to check out the houses. In front of one of them, they found a man lying on the ground. He was covered in sealskin and woollen clothes, but he was dead. Beside him lay a knife. Apparently he had died recently, the last of the Vikings of Greenland.

This man struggled on, even as the rest of his countrymen died off or abandoned him. He continued on living his life, surviving and making the best of it in the harsh conditions of the Arctic. The seamen from the merchant ship took his knife as a memento of this remarkable and brave man, who continued to tackle all challenges until the final end.

What was the reason for the demise of the colony? There have been many reasons proposed: environmental, economic, nutritional, climatic, mismanagement, destruction by attack and many others, but we can safely say that one reason was not among them: the human spirit.

For the Vikings were able to survive for hundreds of years in harsh conditions, even thrive. Their lives were a testament to the tenacity and perseverance of the human will. Courage was the preeminent characteristic of the Vikings and they displayed it whenever they could. This characteristic is something that is often missing in the modern man.

A little bit of courage can go a long way. Take example from the brave men of yesteryear, have their spirit guide your own actions. Never give up and continue to work hard until the very end. You will end up leaving a powerful legacy behind you, one that will live on and serve as an example for countless generations to come.

How You Can Tell We Are Being Ripped Off By The Movie Industry

March 6, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

Many actors were seen this year holding Lego Oscars. This might prove to be rather more prophetic than they hoped, leaving the joke on them in years to come. If you were planning on becoming an actor I have bad news for you. Their wages (read: exorbitant fees) for movie roles are about to take a major hit.

It's doubtful that cinema as we know it today will last much more than another decade—if that. Like the typewriter, video rental, and the CD player, ever-improving technology is about to dismantle another 20th century industry.

Let's have a look at a little history

The big screen was the ONLY place to show a good movie.

Television was not ubiquitous until the late 1960s and even then was a paltry black and white 12" box. Color didn't take off until the mid 1970s.

1990s, big screen TVs were terrible quality and television stations were considered separate from movie companies. The two mediums were not at all the same. TV actors (eg. Jennifer Aniston) were constantly angling for movie roles and a movie actor going back to TV was considered a step down. Not anymore.

The video player started the rot in the late 80s, but public screenings of movies still relied on reel to reel film projectors (requiring copies of the original movie rolls and a technician).

It wasn't until a few years ago that the LCD and LED flat panel 1080HD, became so cheap that the cinema experience was mirrored in the comfort of your own home. Add in a cheap 5.1 surround sound system and you're done.

Most cinemas sell overpriced junk food, don't serve alcohol and most certainly won't let you hit the bong while enjoying your favorite actress peeling off, so the draw of the cinema in 2015 is suddenly rather limited. Viewers gobble up the latest movies only because they are bored.

All that remains is a mafia stranglehold on the production budgets and releases, but to some extent that has been torn down by hackers releasing Blue Ray quality, before the flick hits the cinema. It is also threatened by ever-cheaper digital cameras and computer equipment.

About the most expensive part of shooting a movie today is lighting and costumes. The media derides the torrents and piracy, but it's simply market forces. Movies are much cheaper than we are led to believe.

What is their real value?

When you look at the recent Hunger Games MockingJay Pt1 and see it had a budget of $125M, you shrug and think that's actually quite low compared to $200-$250M budgets that are increasingly common. None the less it seems like a hell of a lot of money, especially for a 3rd part of a movie that's been shot in quick succession and should have special effects, costumes, sets and scenery that can be recycled. There must be an awful lot of pork in there, or someone's motoring through coke and hookers.

A "modest" $70M was spent on Dracula Untold (a kind of medieval dark version of Star Wars), that arguably has far better acting, special effects, locations, and script writing than Hunger Games, which looks like a cheap TV sci-fi drama. So where on earth does all that money go? $55M is a hell of a lot of difference, even if it included a marketing budget.

Prima donnas

It's then you realize that the main expense is on the actors themselves, and of course if Jennifer Slutlet is charging $20M, the director and producer most certainly want the same. The supporting actors are also expecting seven figures and the whole thing suddenly mushrooms.

Milk the studio you might say, but who pays for all this at the end of the day is the man in the street, spending his $10-15 bucks to get into a theater to watch what amounts to nothing more than a DVD being played on a larger-than-average screen. Cinemas are not the big impressive theaters they used to be, so they can cram more releases into one complex.

There is nothing sociable about the cinema and a large portion of their profits is made selling the nastiest fast food known to man. They are not offering much more than a sweaty seat someone's ass has been parked on for the last three hours. Most cinemas remind me of public transport.

If you want a dark and quiet room to watch a movie in, draw the shades, switch off the lights and put some headphones on. If you are really stuck, bring a six pack and you can sit in the closet under my staircase, no problem!

Tarantino puts it more romantically; he's right but he's missing market forces and technology:

> "Why would an established film-maker shoot on digital? I have no fucking idea at all," he said. "Digital projection is death of cinema as I know it. It's television in public. The fact that most films aren't presented in 35mm means the war is already lost.
> "I'm hopeful that we're going through a woozy, romantic period for the ease of digital. I'm hoping the next generation will have more sense and realise what they've lost."

Of course none of this has much to do with being a masculine man, but the point of the article is to draw your attention to the importance of being able to run "back of the envelope" mental business calculations. Don't be fooled by the marketing hype and con of consumerism, see it for what it is, peer behind the curtains and disassemble it. You can do the same with any product. A large part of the red pill is taking responsibility for your own decisions. What does that gallon of milk or gasoline really cost?

Game of Thrones had a budget of about $10M per one-hour episode, which included shooting in Malta, Croatia, Iceland and Ireland. You also come out at the end with some 12 hours of finished footage which would give you Hunger Games parts one through six. Cut the movie business a little slack, because they do go further on special effects and dramatic scenes in their two hours, perhaps Hunger Games one through four could be done for under $100M, where they actually spent nearly $500M. Jennifer's wages experience an 80% cut and rightly so.

Rip off

The HD 1080 cameras cost next to nothing, plenty of movies have been shot on the Cannon 7D, the guts of which is only $1000. Pro lenses are expensive, but not $100M. There is no film or developing costs anymore and editing in a PC is a joy compared to the nightmare of cutting rolls of film and splicing it back together.

Computer animations are getting so advanced you can do the preparations in a laptop, although the rendering is still rather processor-hungry. Move it all to a pro animation studio who already have dragons, beasts, spaceships, back drops, etc. ready to go and it's not much more than Photoshop for dummies.

When the CD burner, flatbed scanner, and 1-gig hard drive first came out, I had some spare cash and bought myself an Apple rig. With this system that cost about $20,000 at the time I had an instant graphic design business, purely because no one else could afford the gear.

Within a few years, everyone had Photoshop on a laptop and I sold my rig for a few hundred bucks, although it had earned twenty times what I paid for it in the meantime. Music production, DJ producers, remixes, and even recording a rock band has all become a cost-negative business and the exact same thing is about to happen to the movie business.

What is the real value of going to the cinema?

$1-2 cover charge and a buck for the movie. That's about where the market rate should be. In the last 2-3 years, the glamor of the big screen has gone. Television stations, and even Netflix are creating productions that rival any Hollywood studio, while coming in at a fraction of the cost, in large part because the technology is so good.

Where TV was once the third class citizen, now it's bank rolled by advertising and instant download dollars, while offering more variety, able to explore themes over entire seasons and screen a wider array of acting talent not seen in the movies.

These low cost productions are able to leverage the fact that there are plenty of talented (and starving) actors out there and where stars in the past were "bankable" – a large part of that was pure luck, based only on having a profitable movie and then being offered parts again and again, until the public only wanted to see Clint Eastwood or John Wayne.

This unfair monopoly was understandable when shooting to 35mm film that's probably costing you $100 per second in 1960… ouch! A director yelled “CUT!”, because an actor flubbing lines was literally burning money onto Kodak.

Tarts like Jennifer Lawrence and Emma Watson, who like to think of themselves as something special, are really only a notch above disposable porn stars. Real actors belong on a live stage, where very few of today’s breed of stars would last a second. In fact actors like Hugo Weaving (Agent Smith), Patrick Stewart (Star Trek and X-men) and Ian McKellen (Gandalf) were all Shakespearean actors who worked for the love of it, not for the limelight and big bucks. Stewart admits he struggled with the changeover to tedious movie-sets and nearly quit.

We are rapidly getting to the point, much as we did with the music business, where productions costs are so low and technology so high that the stranglehold and inflated prices will no longer be tolerated by the public at large who are being swamped with ever increasing quality and variety. I am sure there are a dozen other business models set to follow Hollywood into the dusty pages of history. Pay attention and be wise. It’s good to be aware of the world we live in and see things for what they really are.

The sooner students are shooting full length feature films in their spare time, the better. When the market is flooded, only the quality material will rise to the top. Trust in market forces to restore balance in the end. There’s an awful lot of good music coming out lately and it’s not via corporate record companies. Give the movies a couple of years and kids will be knocking out productions and uploading them. I, for one, can’t wait.

The Essence Of True Leadership

March 7, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> People ask the difference between a leader and a boss. The leader leads, and the boss drives. – Theodore Roosevelt

A lot of red pill men today face frustratingly tough situations when it comes to their social, private, and more so professional lives – especially when women are gradually taking over the job market, and dominate workplaces, apart from the social scene.

To compound this problem, what is often seen are men who are either posturing betas, white knights, or manginas in positions of power in societies and more so at the workplace, who further promote modern feminist ideologies at offices (or even blue collar industries) by psychologically emasculating the male staff with their own warped interpretation of leadership. The fate is often worse for those working under a feminist female boss.

A lot of men today blindly follow leaders (sometimes in the quest of a role model) because we live in feminist societies where men are increasingly indoctrinated to follow the herd mentality. But in today's times of convoluted masculinity, the best option remains the same: to lead than to follow. Thus it becomes imperative to understand the essence of true leadership to begin with.

The virtues of leadership

The topic of leadership is indeed vast; it can be expounded upon at length. But some essential core values of leadership remain unchanged for becoming a good leader

(references to certain laws from Robert Greene's The 48 laws Of Power are used to elaborate them below). They are as follows (and not necessarily in that order):

1. Judgement

One essential quality of a good leader is the power of proper discernment. A leader with poor judging skills will eventually make mistakes and errors not only leading to his own downfall, but that of his followers as well. His poor judgement makes him a victim of his own favoritism, often choosing sycophants or undeserving allies – which often contributes to the alienation and loss of valuable followers and aides, leading to his failure.

On the flip side, the good leader is the one who values meritocracy and loyalty in the selection of his followers, and his subsequent treatment of them. He critically examines the problems he is faced with; and also the motives and value of his followers, and the necessities of the environment he finds himself in. He doesn't led favoritism blind him – rather he knows what should be done, how it should be done, and whom to appropriately delegate responsibility and tasks to.

2. Responsibility

> Leadership – leadership is about taking responsibility, not making excuses. – Mitt Romney

Leadership is all about taking responsibility – not only for self, but also for the entire tribe. The ability of a leader to assume responsibility for consequences – either for good or bad – is what inspires confidence and loyalty towards him in those around him.

3. Trustworthiness

The leader who isn't loyal to his followers or to the ideologies he expounds isn't going to inspire loyalty from others in the long run, for his hypocrisy itself will turn even the best of those who might have his best interests in their hearts. Trust indeed is like paper; once it's crumpled, it can't be perfect again. The good leader understands this, and thus safeguards his credibility ferociously by avoiding hypocrisy and false promises, by wisely choosing his words – free of brevity.

> ALWAYS SAY LESS THAN NECESSARY
> When you are trying to impress people with words, the more you say, the more common you appear; and the less in control. Even if you are saying something banal, it will seem original if you make it vague, open-ended, and sphinx like. Powerful people impress and intimidate by saying less. The more you say, the more likely you are to say something foolish. – Law 4

4. Reputability

> SO MUCH DEPENDS ON REPUTATION-GUARD IT WITH YOUR LIFE
> Reputation is the cornerstone of power. Through reputation alone you can intimidate and win; once it slips, however; you are vulnerable, and will be attacked on all sides. Make your reputation unassailable. Always be alert to potential attacks and thwart them before they happen. Meanwhile, learn to destroy your enemies by opening holes in their own reputations. Then stand aside and let public opinion hang them. – Law 5

No one likes to follow a "leader" with an ambiguous reputation. The real reason why people look upto leaders is partly because of humanity's predilection of man worship, and partly because of a leader's reputation, which precedes and follows him wherever he goes. In today's times with the rise of degeneracy, it's often seen that "leaders" today have lower reputations than that of their "disciples" – something which leaders of the past wouldn't even think of having of.

5. Fear

A good leader understands the power of fear, and harnesses it effectively to mold and direct his followers (and his adversaries) into the direction of his goal. He doesn't abuse the power of fear, for he realizes that this abuse could very well breed resentment, discontent or worse, chronic rebellion or opposition to his plans from both friends and foes.

On the flip side, when the situation demands stern measures, he doesn't vacillate in exacting retribution swiftly. No leader was ever taken seriously who failed to do so, for such failure resulted in loss of respect, confidence and morale of his followers. No one likes to be led by a sheep; for every one wants to be led by a lion.

6. Love

> WORK ON THE HEARTS AND MINDS OF OTHERS
> Coercion creates a reaction that will eventually work against you. You must seduce others into wanting to > move in your direction. A person you have seduced becomes your loyal pawn. And the way to seduce others is to operate on their individual psychologies and weaknesses. Soften up the resistant by working on their emotions, playing on what they hold dear and what they feel: Ignore the hearts and mind of others and they will grow to hate you. – Law 43

Just like fear, the power of love has a great influence on human behavior. The wise leader knows how to work on the hearts of the members of his tribe (through his behavior and deeds), for he knows when fear would fail in securing him the loyalty of his supporters, it would be their love for him that would turn the tide in his favor.

7. Self reliance

In a modern world where mutual dependency is often peddled to people, self reliance often helps the leader to rise above from the rest of the herd. His self-sufficiency is what makes others seek him out, for he becomes the pillar others lean onto, the one whom others seek to emulate.

8. Courage and the will to act

No one wants to follow a coward, and more so a non-doer. A good leader inspires others with his courage, and by his deeds – his deeds speak louder than his words. Besides, he knows the difference between raw courage and plain recklessness through his heightened social intelligence.

9. Forbearance

Leadership without forbearance has the danger to degenerate into tyranny. Since the empowerment of the tribe is one of the important aims of true leadership, a leader cannot inspire loyalty unless he embodies mercy when situations demand it. Love remains one of the greatest influencing factors of human behavior, and one effective way to secure it is through the apt use of forbearance.

10. Vision and foresight

> The very essence of leadership is that you have to have a vision. It’s got to be a > vision you articulate clearly and forcefully on every occasion. You can't blow an uncertain trumpet. — Reverend Theodore Hesburgh

In today's blue pill societies, it's common to see self-styled "leaders" leading people with short-sighted plans and goals which accomplish nothing much in the end. But the defining quality of a real leader – which separates him from the herd – is his ability to perceive things differently, his conviction to create a reality based on that vision, and his ability to project himself into the future regardless of the times he might be presently in.

12. Dignity

> BE ROYAL IN YOUR OWN FASHION: ACT LIKE A KING TO BE TREATED LIKE ONE
> The way you carry yourself will often determine how you are treated: In the long run, appearing vulgar or common will make people disrespect you. For a king respects himself and inspires the same sentiment in others. By acting regally and confident of your powers, you make yourself seem destined to wear a crown. – Law 34

A leader with no dignity will inspire the same degeneracy among his followers. It's common to see power thrust upon the shoulders of effeminate betas today who lack dignity yet pose as pseudo-leaders, setting horrendous examples of convoluted masculinity to other blue pill men in modern societies today.

It's often said that familiarity breeds contempt in the long run. Not only does this affect commoners, but leaders as well.

> USE ABSENCE TO INCREASE RESPECT AND HONOR
> Too much circulation makes the price go down: The more you are seen and heard, the more common you > appear: If you are already established in a group, temporary withdrawal from it will make you more talked about, even more admired. You must learn when to leave. Create value through scarcity. – Law 16

13. Accessibility

At the same time, a leader who is cut off from his tribe would neither be aware of his environment, nor would he be able to inspire confidence and loyalty from his followers due to his isolation, thus putting himself at risk in the future.

> DO NOT BUILD FORTRESSES TO PROTECT YOURSELF-ISOLATION IS DANGEROUS
> The world is dangerous and enemies are everywhere-everyone has to protect themselves. A fortress seems the safest. But isolation exposes you to more dangers than it protects you from-it cuts you off from valuable information, it makes you conspicuous and an easy target. Better to circulate among people,find allies, mingle. You are shielded from your enemies by the crowd. – Law 18

Another common mistake of leaders is to rely completely on subordinates to deal with the masses. This often results in the unnecessary transfer of power to these subordinates dealing with the masses, for they would then be having the power to influence others, either for good or the worse. The wise leader however keeps channels open between him and his followers.

14. Originality

The leader is the pioneering trailblazer, while others follow him. He sees what others cannot, and he fearlessly plunges into carving his own unique path, for others to follow.

15. Planning

> PLAN ALL THE WAY TO THE END
> The ending is everything. Plan all the way to it, taking into account all the possible consequences, obstacles,and twists of fortune that might reverse your hard work and give the glory to others. By planning to the end you will not be overwhelmed by circumstances and you will know when to stop. Gently guide fortune and help determine the future by thinking far ahead. – Law 29

It’s often said that “failing to plan is planning to fail,” or “better to have a bad plan than no plan at all." One of the abilities of a leader is to transform his vision into reality, and to do that he must have a plan (or several plans to deal with the eventualities he might face on the path to success).

No one likes to be led by someone without a plan. Unfortunately with the lack of vision in today's blue pill world, it's common to see people led by those who themselves are drifting aimlessly without a vision.

16. Adaptability

> ASSUME FORMLESSNESS
> By taking a shape, by having a visible plan, you open yourself to attack. Instead of taking a form for your > enemy to grasp, keep yourself adaptable and on the move. Accept the fact that nothing is certain and no law is fixed. The best way to protect yourself is to be as fluid and formless as water; never bet on stability or lasting order. Everything changes. – Law 48

One of the certainties of life is that of change. A leader who fails to adapt himself to changing times puts not only himself at risk, but also his followers. Part of this failure could also be attributed particularly to a lack of planning, judgement, and foresight on his part. Nevertheless, adaptability to changing circumstances is crucial for good leadership.

17. Humility

Even the best of leaders have lost it all due to megalomania. Pride which comes with power and achievement (not to be confused with self respect) can destroy entire civilizations. Wise leaders have thus sought to control it, by practicing a healthy dose of humility for obvious reasons.

18. Competence

> Management is doing things right; leadership is doing the right things. – Peter Drucker

The leader separates himself from the rest also because of his skill. He doesn't moan and complain unnecessarily; he acts and solves the issues he faces boldly. It's common to see modern men however find themselves led by incompetent "leaders" – in society and their professional lives – who don't have any skill nor expertise.This lack of competence is another reason for the lack of faith in modern leadership.

Yet, what we often see today is "leaders" defensively arguing their way out of the cynosure on their shortcomings, shirking responsibility – further adding to the lack of belief in their leadership.

> WIN THROUGH YOUR ACTIONS, NEVER THROUGH ARGUMENT
> Any momentary triumph you think you have gained through argument is really a Pyrrhic victory: The resentment and ill will you stir up is stronger and lasts longer than any momentary change of opinion. It is much more powerful to get others to agree with you through your actions, without saying a word. Demonstrate, do not explicate. – Law 9

19. Self control

In a modern world today which stresses more upon excess in everything, one of the defining qualities of the leader is that he not only knows when to act, but more so when to stop.

> DO NOT GO PAST THE MARK YOU AIMED FOR; IN VICTORY, LEARN WHEN TO STOP
> The moment of victory is often the moment of greatest peril. In the heat of victory, arrogance and overconfidence can push you past the goal you had aimed fol; and by going too far, you make more enemies than you defeat. Do not allow success to go to your head. There is no substitute for strategy and careful planning. Set a goal, and when you reach it, stop. – Law 47

It's easy to get lost in the trap of sensory and worldly gratification, as Napoleon Hill illustrates with the example of sensual excess in his best seller Think and Grow Rich; but the true leader understands the dangers of this, and rises above others with his self regulation and ability to put things in perspective.

20. Quality

> The quality of a leader is reflected in the standards they set for themselves. – Ray Kroc

What makes a leader truly stand out? It's the qualities and standards he embodies, which sets him apart from the rest. Being average has gotten no one anywhere, and more so a leader. Would you follow someone who is average? This is why self-development becomes very important for men on their journey on the path of leadership.

21. Gratitude

One of the most effective ways to inspire goodwill in others is the attitude of gratitude – and good leaders have always known it, and more importantly, when to practice it. There is a marked difference in the attitude of the followers of the leader who considers them as those under him, and in that of the followers of the leader who considers them as those working for him.

In the end where results matter, the leader is as good as his team, and the team is as good as its leader. Failure on the part of leaders to show gratitude to their followers has often resulted in the premature downfall of many promising personalities who could've risen to greater heights had they understood and practiced this seemingly innocuous virtue.

22. Belief

The leader has conviction in his own beliefs which serves as the dynamo for his focus and drive, and he also projects his beliefs effectively to influence the belief patterns of the tribe. It's this ability to influence mankind's beliefs is what grants him the power to lead, even in his absence.

Not only does he firmly believe in himself, he also empowers the people around him through the power of faith.

> Outstanding leaders go out of their way to boost the self-esteem of their personnel. If people believe in themselves, it's amazing what they can accomplish. – Sam Walton

Conclusion

In today's feminist societies, it's undeniably common to see the loss (or even absence) of these essential qualities which constitute the essence of true leadership in modern men. It's no surprise then to see the essence of true male leadership take a beating to undergo gradual erosion today.

The solution remains unchanged: to take the red pill, and either eject to a social and workplace environment where masculinity is still valued and practiced effectively, or create your own tribe like a leader.

In modern times where masculinity remains a confusing minefield to step into for the modern man, we need real leaders who would embody the true essence of leadership in deed and word, to protect these values from further decline in cultures which promote the death of male authenticity more than ever before.

Indian Lynch Mob Kills Two Men, Shows The Same Disturbing Mentality Seen In The United States

Two men in India have been killed by a lynch mob due to accusations (not convictions) of rape. Though mob mentality in the United States has not yet reached this point, recent events suggest it may be moving in that direction. Both of these men have extraordinary relevance in the context of due process and rape accusations, irrespective of whether the suspect did or did not rape someone. We will never know what truly happened.

Syed Farid Khan is now dead, having been forcibly removed from a well-protected detention facility in the north-eastern city of Dimapur in Nagaland. He was stripped naked, hit with fists, stones, and whatever other objects people could find, and then dragged, still nude, for seven kilometers (between four and five miles) from a motorcycle. He was then strung up in a city square like some 2015 Benito Mussolini.

In the northern city of Varanasi, another man was publicly executed after allegations of sexual molestation by girls.

[image]

Khan, a Bangladeshi in India, deserved his fate no more than these two men.

Critics of sites such as Return of Kings will point out that this horrendous murder took place in India, not the United States or Europe. Feminists will wash their hands of the situation and attribute it to a pack of people almost exclusively male, ignoring reports that dozens, perhaps hundreds of girls in school uniforms helped lead the angry mob.

Yet aside from the outcome, how is the mentality of this mob any different from the mobs laced throughout American colleges? And given the superior education and wealth of the average American, shouldn't those in the US be held to a higher social and moral standard?

Both breeds of mob are dedicated to vilifying people accused of a crime and dispensing with established legal principles. In the case of college mobs or those supporting them, much of the time the “accused” has not even been charged by police, let alone convicted of an actual crime.

Paul Nungesser was (and still is) the victim of a mob

Paul Nungesser, the man accused in the Columbia mattress girl false rape fiasco, still has his physical life. But the ex-boyfriend and sexual partner of Emma Sulkowicz continues to face a social lynching. When, if ever, this lynching stops, his reputation is permanently sullied, not from any proven misdeed, but through others’ harassment, defamation, and innuendo.

I have mulled over for weeks, even before this Indian news came to light, about whether I should identify Nungesser in an article. On balance, because his name is already out in the open, usually to pillory him or atavistically juxtapose him with the word “rape,” however tendentious the use, I decided to be one of those rallying for his disregarded moral and legal rights.

“Anti-rape” protests are now typically conflated with calls for an absence of due process, hence a social lynch mob.

We all need further reminding that Nungesser was neither charged by the police nor found “responsible” by the woefully biased college tribunal system. Despite many colleges using a “preponderance of evidence” model, rather than the higher “beyond reasonable doubt”, the standard is in practice much lower. Accused and their representatives (if they’re even allowed one) are usually unable to test the accuser’s allegations through any form of cross-examination. “Attorneys” are often forced to be silent and are simply observers of the “process” in specific instances or generally.

At the head of the anti-Paul Nungesser mob were public figures such as Jessica Valenti and New York Senator Kirsten Gillibrand, who grotesquely defamed Nungesser by calling him a rapist. Their cowardly method was to not mention Nungesser by name, though it was either public knowledge or readily accessible that he was the only person Sulkowicz had claimed raped her.

In February, Valenti mustered the audacity to refute claims that Nungesser had been hard done by, all whilst not mentioning her own public statements calling him a rapist.

Feminists want the right to call someone a rapist without due process

Just as this mob in India condemned a man without even a modicum of due process, feminists demand the right to call someone a rapist without ever resorting to modern inconveniences such as the rule of law. Somehow, just somehow, they think, a "rapist" found "responsible" by a college tribunal is equally culpable as someone convicted of rape by a court.

And when even the self-serving college tribunal fails to "convict," SJW's such as Valenti and Gillibrand will be waiting, still happy to claim rape where absolutely zilch has been proven. To them, you're a rapist whether convicted, found responsible or nothing at all. Non-court procedures, no matter how much they resemble a kangaroo court, are window-dressing to create an acrylic veneer of due process.

[image]
Her Guardian overlords force her to occasionally use the word "alleged," but otherwise Jessica Valenti was happy to refer to Sulkowicz's ex-boyfriend as "her rapist."

In the meantime, the social lynching creates terrible processional effects. Despite not being found criminally responsible, the socially accused rapist is often kicked out of college. Modern sharing of information, including of "disciplinary" matters, means many or all colleges will reject them if they seek to transfer.

Without a college degree and having lost years of their life (years of both potential income and wasted college tuition), their lifetime earnings are grossly depleted. Their friends abandon them and the strain on their families is immense and intense.

When academics and others defend the concept of due process, and highlight the gross unsuitability of colleges to determine "rape" cases, these brave, principle-driven individuals are called "rape apologists" infected with a rabies-like sexism.

What's right is not always popular

In the time of John Locke, the separation of powers and due process were alien concepts to not just average citizens but also the elites. Over recent years, due process in particular has fallen out of fashion, all while its proponents are slandered as encouraging and supporting rape.

Sometimes the most graphic outcomes of anti-due process hysteria have to be unearthed and presented to start restoring balance. Syed Farid Khan and his fellow victim in Varanasi, sadly, are two of those examples.

7 Tips For Happiness And Success After College

March 8, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

Things change after college – no one will debate that.

It's a big mish-mash of more freedom, less homework, more bills, less drinking, more alone time, less social drama, more decisions, less free time, etc, etc, etc.

And while moving away from home and going to college is a huge transition for most, the transition of graduating from college is arguably a more significant one because it sets the foundation for how you will live the rest of your "grown-up" life.

For me, the transition has been glorious, albeit a bit rocky…

My indecision of choosing a college major continued as I hopped between careers before settling into a profitable entrepreneurial lifestyle. My one night stands, well they kind of continued—but there have been a couple great long-term relationships mixed in. And most importantly, my confidence, sense of self, and overall happiness has built steady momentum over the last four years since graduating.

While this doesn't make me an expert, I do think I have quite a bit to share with my fellow postgrads—and any soon-to-be graduates.

1. Take lots of risks

Now is the time my friends. You don't have a family or aging parents to look after. You're only responsible for yourself. So take risks and try things that you may not be able to do in the future.

I quit a job as a software engineer to be a personal trainer. It didn't end up being my calling either, but it did lead me to starting my own website and self-publishing several Amazon bestselling books—and this eventually did become my calling.

Taking risks early and often will desensitize you to the fear of failure that holds so many of us back. Approach that cute girl, quit your job, move abroad, do whatever it is that you're itching to do. Even if you fail you will learn valuable life lessons.

Don't fall victim to the analysis paralysis that prevents the majority of people from taking risks. There will never be a "perfect" time, so do it now.

2. Don't let dating rule your life

This is something I've personally struggled with since graduation

After graduating I jumped headfirst into the dating and "pickup" scene.

Looking back, I was clearly trying to compensate for my relative lack of success with girls in college. I went out every weekend night, going on countless dates, and consciously trying to improve my dating "skills."

And it worked. My success skyrocketed. But I began to tie my happiness and self-confidence to the number of dates I was going on and the amount of sex I was having. I've since had a couple of great girlfriends who I really enjoyed dating. But ultimately I realized that no girl or number of girls can make me happy if I'm not happy alone.

Realizing that wanting a girlfriend – or a hook-up buddy – or whatever it is that you want – is fundamentally different than needing one. You can be perfectly happy and confident without one. You might want it, but you don't need it.

3. Handpick your closest friends

"You are the average of the five people you spend the most time with."

This quote, by entrepreneur and author Jim Rohn is simply true. Right now think about how the five people that you spend the most time with shape your life. What traits and interests do you share with them? What bad habits or limiting beliefs might you share with them?

This is a tough one, but you should strive to spend time with people who inspire you and motivate you to improve, not people you just bitch and moan about life with, or waste away time watching TV and playing video games with.

I'm not saying to cut off old friends and family members who don't fit this mold, but certainly recognize that spending less time with them may be beneficial for your overall success and happiness.

4. Refine your daily habits

"You are the average of the five things you spend the most time doing."

See what I did there?

If you spend all your free time drinking beers and watching TV, then you're unlikely to accomplish much, if anything. But if you fill your free time with habits like reading, writing, meditating, and working out, you're likely to carry the strength, knowledge, and discipline you develop into your career and relationships – and dominate life all the more because of it.

5. Save money

I won't go into tremendous detail here. But saving your money goes a long way. It allows you to live off of smaller paychecks, and ultimately gives you more freedom to travel and try new things.

Don't get caught up in buying a home, getting a fancy car, or any of that BS – the time for that will come – but now is the time for more experiments and new experiences.

6. Stay fit

Pushing your limits physically is key to a solid body and a strong work ethic

This is another brief point. But it’s hard to feel good about yourself and crush life if you don’t physically feel good.

Getting fit is actually quite simple, but it does take discipline in your diet and exercise. And this discipline will transfer to other areas of your life and further propel your success.

7. Put yourself first

Be more selfish…

I cannot stress this enough. I don’t advise doing it at the expense of others, but I do strongly advise keeping your best interests in mind.

Don’t choose a place to live, a career, a girlfriend, or make any other major decision just to please anyone else. You’re the only person who has to live with your decisions for the rest of your life, so make them FOR YOU, not your family, friends, or work colleagues.

Giving into the pressure of others, whether that pressure is explicit or implied, will only lead to regretting your choice and resenting those who influenced it in the long run.

10 Signs Of Passive Aggressiveness And How To Stop Displaying Them

March 8, 2015 | by Netanderthal Man | Link | Original Link

Passive aggressiveness is a distasteful trait that no self-respecting man should possess. Although to many it seems like mocking, it is a completely different animal. Mocking comes from a place of power and it's stemming from entitlement.

Passive aggressiveness, on the other hand, comes from the resentful weakness of the schmuck, in spite of the fact that white knights think it comes from being strong and well-articulated.

Ask yourself this: would a strong man start acting in a passive-aggressive manner? Of course not—a strong man won't have any trouble displaying his beliefs and core values, no matter who gets pissed in the process.

In the meantime what a passive aggressive person conveys is "I would like to kick the shit out of you, but I'm too much of a pussy to try it so I'll keep on bitching at you. God, I hate YOU because I'M NOT able to express my anger." Did you spot the blame shifting? Typical beta move. A beta will usually blame external factors for his own shortcomings.

Here are 13 types of passive aggressive behavior:

1. Intentional avoiding responsibilities, or purposefully performing incompetently to display anger

2. Procrastinating

3. Resentfulness towards others

4. Complaining about being feeling under-appreciated or cheated

5. Sulky, pouty, and argumentative behavior towards authority figures

6. Laying the blame on others

7. Contradictory behavior (enthusiastically agreeing on a job but performing poorly on purpose)

8. Displays of unexpressed anger or hostile attitude

9. Intentional forgetfulness

10. Inability to take constructive criticism

Assuming you have a decent grasp over yourself, there are viable options to cut out the foul trait that is passive aggressiveness. Above anything else, you are the product of your own mindset, which means you can be what you want if you concentrate long enough to produce consistent results

It is not a hard task accomplish if your will is strong. All you have to do it catch yourself (mid sentence if you have to) and switch to being more aggressive and express yourself, or switch to being aloof when increasing your aggressive stance might not be your safest option.

Granted, you might find yourself in the middle of a fight at times, but if you want to exorcise the inner wuss, you can't go half way. One must be willing to fight in order to win a fight.

If this approach is not an option for you (apply your judgement to the situation), go with a "I've seen it all" attitude. Amused mastery if you will. Don't be impressed and don't get rattled by anyone.

At the end of the day, passive aggressiveness is a bitch move that doesn't serve you at all. Truth being told, such behavior is a sign of the profound weakness of one's ego.

Are We Living In A Dark Age?

March 8, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

When we think of the Dark Ages, we automatically think of the period after the collapse of the Roman Empire when the West was thrown into chaos. It took several centuries, but Europe was able to rebuild. The result was the civilization of the Middle Ages.

The prevailing narrative that most of us learned in school is that the civilization of the Middle Ages was hopelessly backward. The only way that European civilization was able to emerge from the darkness of medieval superstition was through the Enlightenment with its principles of rationalism, egalitarianism, and democracy.

But in his book The Crisis of the Modern World, French metaphysician René Guénon stated that it was not the Middle Ages that were intellectually dark, but our own modern age.

René Guénon in 1925

Guénon studied the mythologies of all the world civilizations. He found that almost all civilizations had a concept of cyclical development. Each human cycle is divided into four periods that move from a stage of high spiritual development to degradation: the Golden, Silver, Bronze, and Iron Ages.

Guénon came to the conclusion that we are currently living in the fourth age, which he dubbed the Kali-Yuga, or the Dark Age. This is because modern civilization has discarded the traditional wisdom that guided prior civilizations.

The order of a traditional society is hierarchical consisting of priests, warriors, and workers. Everyone within such a society knows their place, and there is very little movement between classes. These societies are also monarchical and patriarchal.

Most moderns bristle at the thought of being born into a certain class. Modern civilization is built upon the concept of self-determination. We believe that a person's social standing should be the result of his efforts, not his birth.

But the promise of self-determination comes at a price. Guénon identified the following items as troubles that afflict our civilization.

The Relentless Pursuit of Wealth

Quo vadis?

Unlike a traditional culture, we do not have a hereditary aristocracy. Instead, it is the amount of one's wealth that determines a person's social standing. That puts everyone into a rat race to make as much money as possible so that they can become one of the "elite."

This relentless pursuit of wealth has caused the rise of the corporate employer-employee culture. The chance at high incomes is there for the corporate officers, but the other employees find themselves working harder and harder in the hopes they will be chosen to become part of the inner circle.

Technology Over Science

A logical consequence of the pursuit of wealth is that science has been brought into the service of corporations. The result is that the emphasis is not on the gathering of knowledge, but on the production of technology in the form of gadgets that can be sold to consumers.

These gadgets keep us from recognizing that innovation appears to be slowing down. Peter Thiel, the co-founder of PayPal, writes: "The smartphones that distract us from our surroundings also distract us from the fact that our surroundings are strangely old: only computers and communications have improved dramatically since midcentury."

Democracy

Obama takes a selfie

Guénon states that the elected leaders of a democracy are likely to be incompetent. According to the principle that, "the higher cannot emanate from the lower," it is not possible to elect leaders who will be consistently better than the society they come from.

While democracy has produced some leaders of the caliber of Winston Churchill, the norm for Western leaders does seem be mediocrity. As society continues to decline, so does the quality of our leaders.

The Disintegration of the Family

Charming

While the Enlightenment started by overturning traditional forms of government, in our day we see the destruction of the primary building block of a traditional society—the family.

This makes sense, because from a revolutionary Enlightenment perspective, the family is just one more oppressive traditional institution that needs to be transcended.

The decline of the family has come about from many factors including feminism, easy divorce, and economic necessity. One result is that is that all the countries of the West are now experiencing birthrates that are below replacement levels.

Another result of the decline of the family is that the number of births out of wedlock has skyrocketed. In 1980, 18% of births were out of wedlock but by 2010 the figure rose to 41%. For women under the age 30, at least half of births are now out of wedlock. As bad as that is, the number for some communities is staggering. The rate of out of wedlock births in the African-American community is 72%.

Guénon's Predictions

Guénon didn't think that the current state of Western civilization was sustainable. In his book, Introduction to the Study of Hindu Doctrines, he suggests that one of three possibilities will occur:

1. Barbarism

If the Western society refuses to restore a traditional civilization, it might gradually fall into a primitive state. Unfortunately, Guénon doesn't provide an example of how this could happen to a highly developed civilization such as ours.

2. Assimilation or Subjugation

Welcome Islamic Overlords!

The second possibility is that Western society will be either conquered or assimilated by a more traditional civilization, which for Guénon meant some Eastern culture.

At the time Guénon was writing, it was difficult to imagine a way for this to happen. But today, with the rise of the Islamic State and the increasingly large Muslim population in Europe, an Islamic subjugation of the West has become conceivable.

Although subjugation would be terrible for the West, Guénon felt that it was preferable to a descent into barbarism.

3. Return to a Traditional Society

Sainte-Chapelle in Paris

Guénon's third possibility is that Western society would see the bankruptcy of its present course and re-adopt a traditional form.

Guénon suggests that the best way of doing this would be to follow the example of a prior Western society. Although we could use Roman civilization as a model, Guénon suggested that we use the civilization of the Middle Ages because it is more recent and therefore more easily studied. We should not copy medieval civilization, but draw "inspiration from it in order to bring about an adaptation to suit the actual circumstances."

For Guénon, the third option represented the ideal path for the restoration of Western civilization. If the West chooses this path, it would exit the Dark Age and enter a new Golden Age.

Conclusion

There are some aspects of Guénon's thought that are open to criticism. He overlooked many of the good things that have been brought about by the Enlightenment. But considering that he wrote these books in the 1920s, he was remarkably prescient in his diagnosis of the ills that beset modern civilization. Only time will tell if his predictions will prove to be accurate.

Planet Fitness Kicks A Woman Out For Refusing To Get Naked In Front Of A Man

March 8, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

The march to give transgendered individuals preferential treatment and special privileges in western society continues to grow. Most recently, a Planet Fitness in Midland, Michigan canceled a female's membership because she complained about the facility allowing a transgendered male to use the female locker room.

48-year-old Yvette Cormier, the woman who voiced her concern about the situation, freaked out about seeing a man in the woman's locker room, as any woman would. When she alerted the front desk about what she'd seen, she was told that the person identified as a woman and was, thus, allowed to use the female locker room.

Cormier was anything but satisfied with the response (or lack thereof) so she took it one step further and took her grievance to the fitness center's corporate office .and was told the Planet fitness was a "no judgement zone." They confirmed that the company would allow the cross-sexual individual to continue using the locker room.

Planet Fitness in Midland, MI

Undeterred, Cormier began warning other female members of the transgender's presence in their locker room, and as a result her membership was cancelled. The powers that be dug their heels in and released a statement that explained their decision to kick out a female member who was uncomfortable with having to undress in front of a person who was born as a male:

> Planet Fitness is committed to creating a non-intimidating, welcoming environment for our members. Our gender identity non-discrimination policy states that members and guests may use all gym facilities based on their sincere self-reported gender identity. The manner in which this member expressed her concerns about the policy exhibited behavior that management at the Midland club deemed inappropriate and disruptive to other members, which is a violation of the membership agreement and as a result her membership was cancelled.

Predictably, Planet Fitness's decision was met with overwhelming approval. Cormier has been labeled as "ignorant" and "transgenderphobic" while the wannabe tranny, who identifies himself as "Carlotta Sklodowski" has been praised for his "bravery" in the face of this failed attempt at injustice.

A Lindy West lookalike and a brony in training…par for the course

What does this mean?

The advancement of the LGBT agenda

This sets a dangerous precedent for gyms nationwide. The daily androgyny being forced down our collective throats is harmful enough. But the public being exposed to this level of tolerance will undoubtedly lead to similar incidents, and will increase in frequency and publicity. Before long we'll become desensitized when we hear stories like this.

Let's leave aside the fact that forcing women to undress in front of men would be blatant sexual harassment in any other case. What if a woman identifies as a man and wants to use the men's locker room? Will she "take it like a man" when she is subject to the ball-busting culture of that environment? Or will she run to the front desk and scream about sexual harassment when men make the offhand dick joke or walk around without wearing a towel? Will the men who "sexually harass" her be kicked out?

This fiasco will most assuredly push the epicene agenda into warp drive. Allowing women to compete with men in sports is one thing, but giving them access to one another's bathrooms or locker rooms will all but completely eliminate the concept of males and females. America is determined to fuse the sexes together even if it means forcing men and women to change in front of one another in public.

It won’t be long before this is the norm

The business side

Speaking strictly from a business standpoint, this action could potentially drum up business for Planet Fitness, as a commenter on RVF pointed out:

> From a business perspective, they did the right thing. Business and corporations cannot have politically incorrect opinions.
> -The Reaction Tree

The Reaction Tree has a valid point. After all, there’s no such thing as bad publicity in most cases. But this will serve as a litmus test for SJWs. We’ll find out in the coming months if this declaration by Planet Fitness leads in an increase in new memberships.

A major blow to detractors

The biggest consequence of these events is that it further discourages those who stand against the normalization of transgendered privilege from speaking out. Cormier found out firsthand that not toeing the politically correct, pre-approved cisgender line leads to swift, negative consequences:

> I feel like it’s kind of one sided. I feel like I am the one who is being punished.

We are at the point where anyone who steps out of line by voicing an opinion opposing what this country has been brainwashed to believe is the “right side” is vilified. Regardless of what major companies think, they are almost always forced to side with what they perceive to be public opinion, lest they see a drop in profits.

Cormier learned this the hard way and, unfortunately, anyone else who has thoughts about voicing their discontent about similar circumstances will think twice about speaking out, if not silence themselves altogether.

Takeaway

This event could may be a major event in discovering where we are in the timeline of acceptance and normalization of transgenders in society. People can opine all they want to about gender equality and eliminating stereotypes, but their actions in real life, as opposed to what they say on social media or in the public square, will tell the tale of what they really think.

Individuals can talk all they want about eliminating stereotypes, but their actions show their true feelings. I know and fully accept that strangers are more cautious around me, a 6’2″, 225 pound black man with sleeve tattoos, than they would be around one of my best friends who is the blonde-haired, blue eyed, all-American type. Fair or unfair, this is how it is and the sooner we accept these truths the better off we’ll all be.

In this case, a woman had a visceral aversion to undressing in public in front of a person with a penis, and her life is now worse off for having acted on that completely defensible response. This suggests that political correctness crusaders and SJWs will attempt to stamp out any opposition, even animal and instinctual, that normal society has about those who follow their agenda. Don’t want to expose your privates to a member of the opposite sex? Congratulations, you’re a thought criminal shitlord.

Would women really be comfortable undressing in front of him?

Chalk this up as another victory for the SJWs. If Cormier’s dismissal yields more profits for Planet Fitness you can bet your bottom dollar that other national gym chains will follow suit and announce their own versions of “judgment free zones.” If that happens it’s only a matter of time before gender neutral locker rooms start to make their way into the national consciousness.

That will lead to yet more land mines for men to tip-toe through, on top of what we already have to deal with in our everyday lives. Personally, I’m hoping biology will eventually win out. But I’m not holding my breath.

How To Get Women To Pay For Stuff And Buy You Presents

March 9, 2015 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

Gentleman, today is going to be a glorious and exciting day. We're going to be discussing a topic that is very near and dear to my stone-cold heart. I've mentioned how much I enjoy this particular subject in a few of my other articles, and I think the time has finally come to get down to business and talk about how to make it happen. Yes, indeed, today we're going to talk about…

Getting women to pay for our shit.

Oh how I love it when women pay for shit. God damn, I love it so much. Watching a woman open up her purse, grab her wallet, and then spend her not-so-hard-earned money on me is sweet enough to cause a spike in my blood sugar. I especially enjoy it when they put everything on their credit cards and then only make the minimum monthly payments.

What's that? A 17.99% APR interest rate, you say? No fucking problem, replies the impetuous slut.

After all, what do they really have to worry about when it's all said and done? The dumb bastards who end up marrying these hoes are the ones that get stuck paying off all the stuff they've bought for me. And since I'm a nice guy and I don't want to seem ungrateful, I would just like to say to all of you mules out there who end up marrying these women—thank you. You're all such great guys; heroes even. Monuments should be erected in your honor.

Okay, enough lambasting the dumbasses who marry broken-down clunker sluts—let's get started with the good stuff. In a previous article, I said the following: "Women love winners, and women love losers—it's the guys in the middle they can't fucking stand." I believe those words are universal to women across the board; however, I think they especially ring true when it comes to getting women to pay for stuff.

I will be using that fundamental tenet as the foundation of this article, because at the end of the day, there are only two types of men that women will spend their money on—winners and losers.

How Losers Win

Women will gladly squander their money on losers all damn day, and do so with a smile. It's happening right now as I type this: some guy out there is charging $1,300 in car modifications on his woman's Visa card, another is at Best Buy purchasing a new $800 flat-screen TV with his girlfriend's savings, and yet another man is hearing his fuckbuddy say, "Don't worry, babe, I got this," as she grabs the check for their $25 breakfast.

Whether the amount of money being spent is big or small is irrelevant. The only thing that matters is if the woman in question is opening her wallet right along with her legs.

The loser accomplishes this by creating an aura that lets women know that their pussies aren't anything worth getting too excited about. A woman is accustomed to her pussy being more than sufficient to keep a man eating out of the palm of her hand, but a loser isn't pliable to that bullshit. He doesn't care about a particular woman's pussy all that much because, well, it's just another pussy.

The loser understands that 3.5 billion out of every 3.5 billion women have a vagina. Not only is the woman he's involved with replaceable—she's extremely replaceable. The loser may even vocalize this from time to time if he feels a woman needs to be reminded of just how fucking disposable she truly is. Pussy, to a loser, is like a golf ball to Tiger Woods—he'll just grab another one if he needs to.

A woman will pick up on this attitude, and even though the man she's involved with is a loser—she will step up her game to keep him nonetheless. Stepping up her game can encompass several different things, and opening up her wallet and trying to win over the loser through buying his affection is one of them.

Guys in the middle will sit back and observe this with bewilderment and say to themselves, "Man, I would treat her so good, I would do anything for her, yet she's with this piece of shit who barely works and treats her poorly, she should be with me instead!"

Those men are right. In an ideal world, these women would be with them instead, but the problem lies with the fact that women are fucking morons—that's the most accurate description I can think of for them. Any decent looking woman knows that she can have a good man at the drop of a hat if she desires; she's fully aware that she could have a guy that would treat her well and go to the ends of the earth to make her happy.

And you know what? She fucking hates that guy. She hates the good man because he's nothing more than a man in the middle, and being a man in the middle will never suffice for the average vagina-bearing shit-for-brains airhead running around America, I'm sorry to report.

The Virtue Of Selfishness

If there's one thing the loser has going for him that the man in the middle doesn't—it's that he is selfish. The loser doesn't care if a woman ends up living in a cardboard box because she spent all of her money on him, and he doesn't care if she has to work countless hours of overtime to make ends meet.

The loser just thinks to himself, "Well, she's a dumb bitch and it's her fault for getting herself into these situations—ain't my problem," and you know what? He's completely right—it is her fault and it ain't his problem.

Losers, despite their countless faults, understand that a woman's fucked-up decisions are one-hundred percent her responsibility—not his. Any man with two functioning eyeballs connected to an operable brain can sit back and spectate as women do stupid shit and waste their lives away, and the loser is more than happy to lend a helping hand in that process in an attempt to procure all he can get.

However, what the loser is not interested in is providing windfall protection for these women as they make their rapid descents—ensuring soft landings for dumbass women and their choices is beyond the scope of both the losers desires and his talents. The loser, for as stupid as he may be, isn't stupid in this respect.

In my own experience, some of the women I've had the most difficulty getting rid of have been the ones that have received the worst treatment from me. For whatever reason, I just didn't like them all that much and didn't treat them very well. In many instances, it was usually because I found out something unsavory about their pasts and subsequently lost the little bit of respect I may have had for them to begin with.

As a result, I never went above and beyond to please them. I never complimented them or said nice things to them. I didn't respond to their text messages or phone calls for hours, and that's if I bothered responding at all. I flirted with other women right in front of them. I didn't care if I gave them a good fucking, and I certainly didn't care if they had an orgasm—I just didn't give a damn about any of it. I treated these women like they were lower than shark shit at the bottom of Marianna's Trench, and they completely adored me for it.

I can hear the collective moans coming from both the men and women reading this: "Bullshit, A.V. Yader! There's no way a woman would be crazy about you and buy you stuff if you're not fucking her good and giving her multiple squirting orgasms!" Well, I hate to break it to you, but y'all are dead wrong.

Being good in bed helps, there's certainly no denying that, but it's far from the most important thing in the world. It all boils back down to emotions with women, and what you do outside the bedroom is much more important in the grand scheme of things.

We tend to look at sex as a recreational activity nowadays as opposed to what it really is—the means of procreation. It's important to keep this fact in mind. Obviously, none of us here want to have a child with some random broad that we're casually dating, but we do want to simulate the process of making a baby with her (i.e. fucking her).

When dealing with women, most guys will ask themselves, “What can I do to get this woman to sleep with me?” When what they really should be asking themselves is: “What can I do to make this woman want to have my babies?” There is a difference between the two, and it’s important to understand that difference.

Give Her The Baby Rabies

A woman who is willing to buy you stuff and show up at your place on command is a woman that you’ve emotionally attracted to the point that she wants to bear your children. This isn’t something that she’s going to verbalize to you, or even understand it herself—it’s instinctual. She craves your seed because you’re hitting all of the correct emotional buttons. You’ve succeeded in making her so crazy about you that she wants to have a miniature version of you running around—she wants to fucking duplicate you.

And in order for that to happen, she doesn’t have to have a single orgasm. She needs you to cum, for you to be the one that feels good. What you want always comes first because in order for her to get what she desires—your offspring—you are the one that ultimately must be sexually satisfied.

A man in the middle can get on his knees and eat pussy until his tongue falls off, or he can fuck with the ferocity of a two-peckered jack rabbit on a meth binge—but it doesn’t matter. He can give a woman all the orgasms in the world, but it doesn’t mean shit because he’s just a fucking man in the middle. She doesn’t crave that man’s seed—she doesn’t want to produce his progeny. The man in the middle simply doesn’t create the emotions needed to elicit such a primitive and visceral response in most women.

A major reason why single mothers have no problems settling with a man in the middle is because they already have what they truly want: the offspring of a loser. They will always have a piece of their loser with them for the rest of their lives and, for many women, that is more than enough to make them content—even with a man in the middle. It’s also a major reason why single mothers emasculate their sons so much—they’re trying to tame their sons in the way they could never tame their losers.

The fact of the matter is that many women want losers, and only losers will do. If you can be the loser that a woman pines for, then she'll make sure that you're happy—this includes paying for stuff and buying you gifts, regardless if you make more money than her or not.

If you're thinking something along the lines of the following: "Well, how can you evoke such emotions in a woman when you treat her so poorly? Surely no woman would tolerate such shitty treatment, not to mention want to bear your children!" The answer is simple, and was covered earlier in the article: women are fucking morons. Moving on.

How Winners Keep On Winning

The winner that has women spending money on him can be best described as a "carrot dangler." The winner has shit going on—he's not a loser. He has his house in order and his finances are solid (or have the potential of becoming solid). He's a catch, and the women around him know that he's a catch. But most importantly: he knows that he's a catch, and he will use this to his advantage to the greatest extent possible.

The winner takes a good hard look at the women in his life and assesses their reasons and motives for wanting to be with him. These women may want quick access to his resources or long-term perpetual access—it all depends on the particular woman and what stage she's at in her life.

The winner then takes inventory on what he has to offer—it could be money, businesses, access to events, social status, travel etc. It all depends on the winner and what he, as an individual, brings to the table. The winner understands perfectly well that while women will gladly fuck losers—and even prefer to fuck them in many cases—they want a winner when it comes time to settle down and enter a committed relationship.

The younger women are most likely after him for maximum short-term gains. They want to get in and get out with as much as they can in the shortest amount of time possible—they're the "robbers." The older ones in their mid to late twenties or early thirties are looking to lock down the winner for good—they're the "executioners."

I'm speaking in generalities here—young women can be executioners, and old women can be robbers too, obviously. But it's not all that common. With that out of the way, let's look at these two types of women in more detail.

The Robbers

Robbers are, by far, the most difficult women to get to pay their own way. Robbers are young, they're pretty, and they know it. To get these women to spend their cash requires you to incorporate being a winner and being a loser into one unit—there's no other way to do it in my experience. If you don't incorporate some loser into your methodology, then you'll be used like an ATM machine and taken for a ride. You have to set the tone early on that you—as a winner—are better than them.

The fact that a woman is young and attractive doesn't mean shit to you because you're a winner, and she's not. She's just another typical loser female—she's beneath you, and you're not impressed by her simply because she exists. The winner's prevailing attitude is always, "Okay, you're pretty, but so are many of the other women out there who want me, so you'd better step up your fucking game if you want to be in my presence."

Young good looking women aren't used to men having this kind of attitude towards them, so it intrigues them when they come across a guy who doesn't worship the ground they walk on.

If a robber wants to date a winner, then she needs to prove that she's worthy of his company. And she will prove her worth by paying her fair share from time to time, but make no mistake about it—you're never going to come out on top or break even with a robber. This is completely acceptable because they're young, hot, and generally fun to be around—they're supposed to win.

The goal is to only give a robber the bare minimum while extracting as much as possible. Once they realize that you're not going to bend to their whims and give them everything they want—they'll bail out and pursue men that will. In the end, you'll get very little out of the deal (unless she's truly crazy about you), but at least you won't get taken for a ride like the typical chumps who dates them.

The Executioners

Executioners are the easiest group of women to get to buy you stuff—especially if they're the "strong and independent" type. These women are the ones that are weighed down with debt, emotional baggage, and monster egos. They're searching for a winner, and only a winner will do for a long-term relationship.

Executioners are also "checklisters:" height matters, looks matter, job titles matter, and money—or the potential of it—really fucking matters. If you're saying to yourself, "I don't have any of those things," then you needn't worry. Most of these women get fucked by losers all the time, and they will continue to get fucked by them while they prowl for a winner.

These women can generally be divided into two categories: they've slept with tons of losers and now they want a winner, or they have low notch counts and only dated winners, but ended up ruining their relationships with those men because of their shitty attitudes or other intolerable defects. Both types are completely unacceptable and should be rode hard and put away wet as a result.

With the robbers—you just let them fade away on their own volition. However, the trick with the executioners is to quit while you're still ahead, and you do this by dangling the carrot. The carrot is you and what you have to offer long-term. If a woman wants to travel the world and you have the ability to make that happen—then dangle the travel carrot in her face. Let her think that the possibility exists that you'll take her on trips at some point down the road. You can do this without outright lying to her, just be vague with your words.

Perhaps you're the kind of winner that could support a woman financially and she could stay at home and raise kids. If that's the case, then dangle the financial security carrot in front of her. Give her the impression that you're looking for a strong woman to settle down with, and that you have the resources to single-handedly provide for a family. Once again, you don't outright say any of this stuff, and you certainly don't tell a woman how much money you make. She'll be able to draw reasonable conclusions on her own after she has spent some time with you.

Executioners with decent jobs will spend money on you to prove that they're "team players" while simultaneously hammering home the point that they "don't need a man"—feminism and "you go girlism" has these broads completely confused on how to properly behave.

They're trying to demonstrate that they're good women, but since they can't cook, won't clean, and would make terrible mothers—they take a more masculine approach and demonstrate their value through their careers and earning power. The more "strong and independent" they are, the more they will pay their fair share and beyond in many instances—they're very egalitarian in this sense, but they're far from altruistic.

Get The Investment

These women are making an investment in the winner. They're trying to make the winner think, "Wow, she really likes me for who I am." And they do this by picking up the bar tab, treating you to nice meals, or bringing you bottles of your favorite liquors from time to time.

They're doing these small things because they think it will ultimately get them a McMansion with a pool, a German SUV, and a couple of annual vacations to the Caribbean down the road—they're playing the penny stocks and hoping you're Microsoft circa 1986. So all you have to do is dangle your carrot, kick back, and enjoy all of the goodies these women throw your way—then abruptly drop their asses before giving them any kind of significant return on their investments.

These types of women are dickheads, so I feel absolutely no guilt about leading them on and using them for all they're worth—I've dealt with enough of them to know their game and how they operate. You stand much better chances of breaking even with these types of women than you do with a robber—you can even post the rare profit from time to time.

But the problem is executioners tend to become unhinged and lose their fucking minds when you end things with them. Just be smart in how you make your exit and take any necessary "cover your ass" precautions. I've been pretty lucky over the past couple of years and have never had any major problems, which is pretty astonishing, considering how big of a prick I can be.

In Closing

Being a loser is a younger man's game, being a winner is for the older fellows, and being a combination of both is the mark of a man who truly gets it—a true player. But being a man in the middle? A man trapped in purgatory? That's no place to be. It's unfortunate because being a man in the middle used to be more than enough to get a decent woman.

Those times are well behind us. Adapt, escape, or perish—those are your choices.

If you're a man in the middle and you're reading this, then it's time to make some changes. The only way a man in the middle can exist is due to a lack of experience with women. The men I've known who have had the most success with women were the ones that were the most contemptuous of them—myself included. Guys that respect, revere, and even love women for "who they are" always seem to be the ones who are never able to fuck them.

The way to develop a loser attitude towards women is very easy: simply date them. Seriously, that's all it takes. It's literally impossible to go out with a few women and come away from those experiences with a positive outlook.

Sure, you'll get laid, and pussy is nice and all. But the human beings those pussies are attached to will be a different story. Once you're exposed to the deceit, the flaking, the sluttiness and the vapidity—then you'll truly come to understand what this is all about. You'll come away knowing that 99 percent of women are all the same, and they're not the same in a good way.

You'll immediately wonder why you were ever a man in the middle in the first place, and you'll never turn back for anything less than a one percenter.

5 Reasons Why Girls With Mental Disorders Should Be Shunned

March 9, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With mental disorders skyrocketing among American females, it's inevitable that men will have to deal with girls who are not playing with a full deck. Just under a quarter of women suffer from mental illness, with rates as high as 50 percent among girls aged 18 to 25, and girls overall are 40 percent more likely to develop mental disorders. Despite this, all too many guys are willing to play Captain Save-a-Ho to these damaged goods.

Girls with mental disorders, no matter how minor, are defective creatures. While they might be good in the sack, their craziness will render any attempt to form a lasting relationship with them futile. Here is why you should shun girls who have any form of mental illness.

1. They're whiny

This applies mainly to girls with "anxiety." Like anorexia, anxiety is almost exclusively a white girl problem: mysteriously, girls in poorer countries such as Thailand or the Philippines almost never suffer from this ailment. Girls typically cope with anxiety by popping Prozac, the heroin of the middle class, and they're abusing antidepressants at such a high rate that they're poisoning the water supplies of major cities.

A girl who needs the crutch of prescription drugs so she can get out of bed in the morning will be nothing but trouble for you. If she needs therapist visits just to deal with her comfortable office job, she won't be able to handle having children, cleaning up the house, or performing any of her womanly duties.

2. They're slutty

It should go without saying that girls who sleep around are cuckoo for Cocoa Puffs, but in case you need scientific evidence, females with higher numbers of sexual partners are more likely to have anxiety, depression, or other mental disorders. Girls who hop into bed with any stiff prick are compensating for serious mental deficiencies, and if you expect them to stay faithful to you, you've got another thing coming.

3. They're self-absorbed

Virtually all girls are full of themselves to a certain degree, but modern technology and our you-go-grrl culture of artificially inflating girls' self-esteem has pushed female narcissism into the stratosphere. A girl who can't go 24 hours without posting selfies on Instagram is basically saying, "I'm so empty inside that I need constant affirmation to keep from overdosing on Klonopin." "Confident" girls are incapable of seeing men as human beings, only as tools in their never-ending quest for validation.

To those who think that religion or conservative values can redeem a narcissistic girl, think again. My last long-term American girlfriend was a devout Christian from a flyover state, but she was just as hooked on social media attention whoring as the coastal degenerates.

Her Twitter and Instagram accounts were a nonstop barrage of pouty selfies and polite humblebrags, each Like from her male orbiters inflating her ego like a water balloon. I also later found out that she'd been hiding a second "boyfriend" (in quotes because they didn't have sex) from me.

4. They're gross

If you've ever thought about slumming it with a fat girl because you think they're nicer than thin ones, think again: fatties are more likely to be mentally ill. And regardless of her weight, mentally disturbed girls are smellier than their well-adjusted counterparts.

One of the symptoms of depression is a lack of interest in cleanliness, meaning that girls who are down in the dumps will have messy bedrooms, grimy skin, and loins that reek of the halibut apocalypse.

Mental illness is so pervasive among girls these days that female typists are writing articles justifying it. For example, the Telegraph's Daisy Buchanan recently wrote that "[w]omen reserve the right to be smelly," because taking a daily shower is just too much effort. That's how sick these girls are: they can spend all day on their iPhones playing Candy Crush, but they can't take five minutes to wash their filthy asses.

5. They're manipulative and violent

But these are all child's play compared to the primary reason you should avoid mentally ill girls: they will drive you insane. At one end of the scale, anxious and depressed girls will make you miserable by submerging you in their manufactured emotional torment. On the other, you can actually end up in jail due to the manipulations of girls with borderline personality disorder or similar problems. Trying to fix borderlines is a fruitless enterprise; they deserve only pity and scorn.

For example, when I was in college, I dated a borderline who constantly started fights with me because she felt I was "neglecting" her. Her modus operandi was to make mountains out of molehills, haranguing me for not putting the dishes away in the "right" order or wanting to spend time with my friends.

I didn't know this at the time, but she was trying to provoke me into hitting or slapping her, because getting me angry was the easiest way to get the attention she wanted.

The only thing that girls with mental disorders are good for is a quick lay, particularly if you know how to yank their levers. But you're wasting your time if you try and wife them up. The ideal girlfriend is emotionally stable, naturally happy, and lives to please you. A nervous, Zoloft-popping wreck will do nothing but ruin your life.

The Origins Of Neomasculinity

Last week, Roosh V published a short piece introducing the new term "neomasculinity." The article described how the term "red pill" had its limitations. It had become shopworn, and vague from overuse. He explained why a new, more precise word was needed to describe our guiding ethic. The article provided a list of the salient features of what we call neomasculinity.

We will now build on that foundation, and describe some of the origins of neomasculinity in the popular culture from the 1980s to the present. It is a task that is long overdue. Previous attempts by the mainstream press to describe the manosphere have been so intellectually dishonest, so polemical, and so shot-through with errors, that anyone sincerely writing on the topic can hardly fail to do better.

Origins in the 1980s and before

The 1980s in America were generally an optimistic decade. The country was beginning to recover from the effects of the lost war in Vietnam, Watergate, inflation, and the Carter presidency, and the deep cynicism that came in the wake of those unsettling historical events.

The seventies had reveled in nihilism and apathy, and the popular culture reflected this; films like 3 Days of the Condor, Apocalypse Now, Taxi Driver, and Vanishing Point are examples of this pervasive feeling. But the dawn of the Reagan era seemed to promise a new beginning, however illusory this proved ultimately to be.

Reagan-era political rhetoric seemed to reflect a new feeling of breezy optimism, of can-do pragmatism, and a comforting faith in traditional institutions. Films like Back to the Future, the many fantasy-laden epics of Steven Spielberg, and the thriving music culture of the 1980s, all seemed to indicate that the ghosts of the 1960s and 1970s had been banished for good. We were great again, because Sylvester Stallone and Bruce Springsteen said we were. And who could argue with Rambo or The Boss?

Enter generation X and the millennials

And yet the promises of the 1980s seemed to evaporate faster than Reagan's popularity after the Iran-Contra affair. The 1990s ushered in a new era of cynicism, apathy, and bitter alienation. Nothing could be more telling, in the popular culture, than the replacement of the glitzy hair-metal bands of the 1980s with the despairing agonies of bands like Nirvana and Alice In Chains. A changing of the guard had come, and with a vengeance.

Alan Bloom's seminal The Closing of the American Mind (1987) seemed to set the tone for the new decade. Its thesis was that cultural relativism and radical liberalism had effectively destroyed American education (and looking back on Bloom's book now, it is clear that he was absolutely correct). Gen Xers were also pervaded with the feeling that there were few things in their world worth fighting about: the great struggles of the past (foreign wars, civil rights, etc.) all seemed to have been won.

Author Francis Fukuyama had even gone so far as to claim the "end of history." Everything worth doing had already been done; all that Gen X kids had left to do was just coast. Or so it seemed. This zeitgeist was a recipe for cynicism, a prescription for disaffection. But it would get worse.

As the 1990s came to a close, and the new millennia dawned, this cynicism and disaffection turned into outright despair. The 9/11 terror attacks, the invasion of Iraq, and the establishment of the all-powerful surveillance state eroded what little faith remained in political institutions; and the economic collapses of 1999 and 2008 brought the fake prosperity of the 1990s to a shuddering halt.

It was clear that the Gen X cynics had every reason to be cynical, and that they knew they had been living on borrowed time. The general feelings of alienation in the air are on display in such films as The Matrix, Fight Club, and Being John Malkovich. Something was indeed brewing.

So the 2000s reaped the foul harvest of the 1990s. The economic collapse brought home the fact that the US was indeed a place of tremendous income disparity, where college graduates could barely expect to find a decent job upon graduation. The old men at the top, the “Baby Boomer” plunderers who pushed their own agendas for their own benefits, couldn’t have cared less about the young men whose nurturing was supposed to be their sacred duty.

The 2000s brought home the devastating reality that the 1980s and 1990s had been eras of irresponsibility, delusion, selfishness, greed, and unrelenting cowardice on the part of the government. Men could no longer ignore the fact that the jobs had dried up, the economy had hollowed out, their spoiled women had no sense of responsibility, and the popular culture derided them as beasts.

At the top, the super-rich classes could have cared less. They pushed socially destructive ideologies in order to line their pockets and fatten their purses. And the public interest be damned. They profited from cultural Marxism, feminism, marginalization of masculinity, and the destruction of gender roles. The goal was to turn the country into a compliant horde of consumer slaves. Values were jettisoned like used newspapers. Gen X-ers and millennials had been totally sold out by their forefathers, betrayed on the most basic level. It was a bitter reality, and one difficult to accept.

Meanwhile, in the popular culture, idealistic young men saw the growing domination of feminism, cultural relativism, and gay acceptance; as these forces advanced, traditional notions of masculinity became more and more marginalized. Never before had a generation of young men felt so marginalized and degraded.

And they had every reason to feel so. They were told by the popular culture that they were worthless, suspect, and defective. Their identity was not valued. And they sensed it.

All the conditions were in place for a furious backlash against the prevailing cultural conditions. And this backlash came with a vengeance. No one saw it coming. It came from the margins, and it came from the underground. But it is here now, and it is growing.

Faced with such adverse conditions, and with so many avenues now closed off to them, many men began to delve into self-improvement, seduction, physical fitness, and the forming of smaller "tribes" for mutual support. Gradually, these tribes began to adopt the list of themes identified in Roosh's article.

It became clear that the way forward involved a blending of the old and the new. The traditional notions and values of "old school" masculinity needed to be renovated, or updated, by the new conditions of the 2000s.

The birth of a new movement

Thus was born the neomasculist ethic. It is a hybrid of old and new elements. The old elements are the traditional masculine virtues of the past: stoicism, the acceptance of brutal struggle, the solving of complex problems, the breaking through of barriers, the overcoming or conquering obstacles, the code of ethics of the good father and good brother, the rejection of degenerate or effeminate behavior, and the submerging of the personal identity in the pursuit of some altruistic goal. The new elements are simply the flexible, tactical means used to implement the older, traditional goals.

Neomasculinity employs new methods to achieve old aims. At its heart, neomasculinity is a corrective movement: it seeks to right the wrongs of our forefathers.

It is the masculinity of the new age, adapted to the current hostile environment that men now find themselves in. Neomasculinity is deeply conservative. It is a profound rejection of the false promises of the "liberalism" of the 1960s and 1970s. Men now recognize that the excessive license of the 1960s, 70s, and 80s set the stage for massive cultural decline, cultural bankruptcy, the erosion of masculine virtue, and economic collapse.

This selfish liberalism brought only the tyranny of cultural Marxism, feminism, and a general ethic of hedonistic depravity that counts every indulgence a positive good. It has proven to be deeply destructive to masculine (and even feminine) virtue.

But while neomasculinity rejects the “counter culture” nonsense of the 1960s and 70s, it also rejects the nihilism and despair of the 1990s and 2000s. Neomasculinity is action and hope, not resignation or despair. It is a deeply positive worldview. It accepts the fact that the way forward will be a hard one. It is a profoundly revolutionary ideal, and it seeks nothing less than the redefining of men’s role in Western society.

We will not shrink from our responsibility of promoting this ideal. We take up the torch that has been dropped by our forefathers. We will not apologize for our beliefs. We will not back down one inch. We will not prevaricate, and we will not hesitate. We welcome struggle and conflict, knowing our cause is a sacred one. Young men today accept the fact that, having been profoundly betrayed by their forefathers, they must shoulder the burden of restoring the ethic of masculinity to its rightful place.

They did not ask for this job. They did not want this job. But decades of cowardice, depravity, enervating cultural relativism, and overaggressive feminism have created a situation where men now see that their backs are up against a wall. If the masculine ethic is to survive, it will need to be defended. Blood has been spilled, and daggers are drawn.

Neomasculinity will fight, and will not stop fighting until the fight is done. And it will reclaim its rightful position as a force for social good.

Is The Mainstream Media Pushing Men To Suicide?

March 9, 2015 | by Dylan Frost | Link | Original Link

In March 2014, NFL athlete Ray Rice was indicted for aggravated assault against his fiancée (now wife), sparking mass media and social network coverage. Most of the controversy that ensued came after TMZ released video footage of the assault taking place, but it wasn't what you would expect.

In a world where all one needs to hear is "man hit woman" to lock him in jail and throw away the key regardless of any sort of context, this was the first time that I could ever remember where many men and women alike were coming out to publicly defend a man assaulting a woman.

Maybe it was the brief opening of the video showcasing Rice's fiancée striking him first (which many news outlets cut out for obvious reasons). Maybe it was because the league had already known what he had done and had penalized him with suspension, but only after the story caught media attention was he officially expelled, fueling a debate about double jeopardy.

Rice's wife forgave him for the incident. The public, however, did not.

But on February 28th, 2015, Ray Rice has confirmed the real effect of what happens when you drag a man's name through the mud; thoughts of, or following through, with suicide. In a statement made during an interview with the Baltimore Sun, Rice made the comment, "Honestly, I almost felt like at one point that it wasn't worth living. I see why people commit suicide."

I want to make it clear; I don't advocate for domestic violence in any sense. But like many have said before me, had the person he hit been a man, this would not even be a news article. This is just a symptom of the larger issue of men being driven to the point of suicidal thoughts or going through with the action—not because they can't live with the guilt of hitting someone, but because the person they hit happened to be of a particular gender, which automatically means being stripped of everything you have ever worked for in your life.

And of course this doesn't just extend to controversial domestic violence cases. In the modern era of trial by public opinion, it is impossible to come back from any sort of accusations towards men at the hands of women. In the countless rape accusations that have turned up false, many have turned towards the gun because one can never recover from the stigma of a false accusation, no matter how much evidence is on their side. If a woman accuses him, he'll go down in history as a woman abuser in the eyes of the people.

This is the fate of the modern man who does not turn towards the red pill. Tow the gynocentric line of "guilty until proven innocent," or face ostracism to the fullest extent until you're pushed to the brink of suicide.

And of course in typical corporate fashion, general manager of the Baltimore Ravens Ozzie Newsome also told the Baltimore Sun, “If [Rice] gets another opportunity to play with another club, I’d be happy for him.”

Sever a man like a cancerous tumor when angry women are watching, and when the dust has settled a year later and most people aren’t paying attention anymore, slip in that you’d had his back all along.

Sugar Baby Culture In The U.S. Is Creating An Open Marketplace For Prostitution

March 10, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Everyone but those living under a rock in the deepest hamlets of the Amazon rainforest knows about sugar babies. These girls, who are disproportionally students, typically get "allowances" of thousands of dollars every month from their sex-desiring male benefactors, plus jewelry, electronics, expensive trips and other goodies in exchange for their "company."

But before we really get into things, why aren't you already a member of Seeking Arrangement and other sugar baby websites?

An experiment in reality

You should have an account, and you should be logging in at least once a month to remind yourself of the blunt, never-something-for-nothing world we live in. Never underestimate the need to condition your red pill outlook. The world you live in, despite constant evidence refuting the blue pill, is all about making you swallow small doses of cultural and personal arsenic.

Create a fake profile, with or without a photo (not your own), and make yourself out to be a relatively wealthy middle-aged man who wants a sugar baby (or five). For better effect, pictorially represent or describe yourself as an out-of-shape mid-life crisis type. Triple points for the best balding, pudgy-faced mugshot you can find and put up.

Can you guess why he’s so popular?

Our brains love to play tricks on us, remember. You may have taken the red pill, but don’t tell me that you always see things through the prism of reality and not fantasy. We all have hours and days where blue pill I-wish-it-was-like-this functioning motivates or controls us. Seeing the sexual marketplace in action can snap you back to reality.

Most of the girls on these websites will play the poor student card. I’m not trying to pretend that studying is cheap, or doesn’t require sacrifices—Unless you’re the spawn of an upper middle-class or wealthy family or have an especially marketable set of talents in your youth, studying is not a free meal. But it’s nowhere near as hard as people make it out to be. In what workplace do only half of employees show up every day, as is the case with most non-compulsory classes at university?

John Boehner didn’t need a sugar daddy

Whether or not you admire or loathe his politics and personality, John Boehner is a paragon of scholastic self-sacrifice. He hails from a quintessentially blue-collar Ohio family of twelve, yes, twelve, children. Many of Boehner’s siblings have been or are still unemployed. The family of fourteen made do with two bedrooms and all twelve siblings shared one bathroom.

Far from being a silver-spooned scion, the current Speaker of the House knows more about middle (and lower) America than most Democratic legislators ever could. And also infinitely more than the lazy, hypocritical sugar babies populating Seeking Arrangement and similar websites.

It took Boehner SEVEN years to complete his degree at Xavier University in Ohio whilst he balanced a multitude of occupations to fund his studies. That is commitment, instead of sucking at the resources-providing teat of a sugar daddy. Despite this much later start in life, he is now the highest-ranked Republican and one of the half dozen most powerful political figures in the country.

This man talks the talk and walks the walk when it comes to personal responsibility. He didn't need to slut himself around to get through college.

Because of where he began and his work ethic, the achievements of Boehner, intellectual, political and life-wise, far outstrip the comfortable middle-class trajectory of an Obama, the undeserved opulence and head-start of a Ted Kennedy, or the shameless sluttiness of every sugar baby.

Working in order to study doesn't stop at John Boehner. There are hundreds of examples of people we know in the news cycle who gained degrees through sweat and hard hours. Gary Johnson, the 2012 Libertarian Presidential candidate, was a door-to-door tradesman during college.

Former Italian Prime Minister and billionaire Silvio Berlusconi, whose family was by no means rich, funded his tertiary studies by performing as a singer on cruise ships. Comedian Ed McMahon of Tonight Show fame was known on Atlantic City boardwalks as a hawker of vegetable slicers, not a future funnyman. Outside formal studies, Brad Pitt, Megan Fox, Rod Stewart and a litany of others had downright bizarre but honorable jobs to keep themselves afloat before hitting the big time.

Poor excuses

In Europe, Canada, and Australia, the need to become a sugar baby is even more non-existent and unjustifiable. In many EU countries, higher education is either free or intensely subsidized. In fact, much of the blame for European debt crises can be laid squarely at the feet of over-generous study endowments and other support schemes.

Obsessed with projects such as the Erasmus program, which are highly beneficial to students but often a waste of taxpayer dollars, EU member states have devalued the self-earned component of education to the point of triviality.

Sugar babies are sluts. They could get a normal job like this but pretend they can't find one.

In Australia, students are given a net interest-free loan to fund their studies. Only the costs of inflation, linked to the Consumer Price Index, are added to the bill. Even then, students need to be earning around $50,000 either before or after their studies before they even have to start paying this sum back.

Undergraduate students in the United States, Canada, Europe and Australia are invariably lazy. Don't try to pretend otherwise. I was one of those inveterate student slackers and was still on the honor roll. I never handed in a serious assessment piece until the day it was due. There is absolutely no comparison in almost every instance between an undergraduate student and that same student when they have graduated and find themselves in the private sector.

Sugar babies are prostitutes who decide to be prostitutes

Plausible deniability. You've heard the word before. And now you're hearing it again. Sugar babies are not only sluts, they're prostitutes who cannot admit it. Being paid by older men to be fucked (this is exactly what the industry is about) is nothing but prostitution. However much you romanticize the idea of a woman having her "education" paid for by an older man, or picture the value of an education, it's a choice made to avoid harder work.

In addition, why aren't these girls paying taxes? Given that in the United States you pay taxes even on lottery wins, these girls are also, at least ethically, cheating the system.

We should not make sugar babies illegal. But just as a slut is a slut, a lazy prostitute is a lazy prostitute. And let's refer to them correctly.

How Forgetting My Game Because Of A Woman Almost Ruined My Life

March 10, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

The manosphere at large is rife with success stories. This is a good thing because it shows men that what we preach here works and works well. But relative to the stories of pussy plundering, anecdotes of failure are few and far between. As great as it is to read about the shagging shenanigans of our favorite authors, it is equally, if not more, beneficial to hear more stories our not so great moments.

My previous article gave a brief glimpse into a few of the relationships that had the most impact on my eventual neomasculine renaissance. Being the stubborn bastard that I am it took more failures than it should have for me to see women for what they really are. Ironically, as stated in the article, the most insignificant relationship was the one that led me out of the beta abyss.

But the relationship that did the most damage out wasn't my marriage or that brief fling with that low-quality Latina. It was a tumultuous relationship with one of the most beautiful disasters I'd ever laid eyes on, and boy did she ever take me for a ride. To this day I still get a slight pang in my stomach when I so much as hear her name anywhere and it's been over five years since we split up.

I hope this real world account shows men that the dangers of letting a damaged woman into your life are very real.

The "Magic Pencil"

I started paralegal school at a small community college in North Carolina in the fall of 2008. My wife and I had just separated and I was looking for some direction in my life. The law had always intrigued me, but because I didn't have the money (or the discipline) to go to law school, I did what I thought was the next best thing.

One of the advantages of the paralegal curriculum is that of the 60+ students enrolled in the program that year only four of us were men. This meant a better than 12-to-1 female to male ratio, which rocked the party all night long.

Like every pack of four knuckleheads with a common bond we dubbed outselves “The Four Horsemen.” We were good looking men in our 30s and the fact that vast majority of our classmates were in their early twenties (even a few 18 and 19-year-olds) gave us supreme confidence. We felt like we were in high school again except this time, we were the cool kids.

[image]
We kept it gangsta

When we weren’t slogging through case law or grinding through endless court opinions, we flirted and teased our classmates and playfully joked with our female instructors. Between hooking up with our hot, young classmates on the regular and the off-campus parties (that facilitated most of those hook ups), that first semester was one to remember.

On the second day of the second semester we were given a pop quiz…old school SAT style which meant filling in those bubbles with a #2 pencil. I didn’t have a pencil on me so I tapped the shoulder of the dirty blonde haired girl (we’ll call her Amy) in front of me to ask her if she had an extra pencil. When she turned around I wondered how I hadn’t noticed this chick around campus because she was hot…nasty hot. A solid 9.

Amy gave me a mechanical pencil which I used to ace the quiz. When I returned it to her I told her that pencil belonged to me and that she’d have to keep it for me until the next quiz. She smiled and said “definitely.” We’d dubbed that pencil “The Magic Pencil” and she had no qualms with announcing to other classmates that pencil was reserved for me.

Back then I didn’t have the game level I do today but I had enough to know at that point that it was only a matter of time before I was knee deep in her apricot-shaped ass.

Blissful Ignorance

Over the next few months our relationship blossomed very quickly and neither of us had any intention of slowing it down. We spent just about every night together. We’d study for quizzes, do homework and cook together, and all the sappy shit that comes with being stupidly in love.

There was also a certain pride that came with having the hottest girl on campus on my arm. I wasn’t one to broadcast things but she was anything but shy about letting anyone and everyone know that we were an item and I’d stand there with a goofy-ass grin lapping up the praise and attention.

What really set her apart from other women I’d dated was that Amy took great care of me and made me feel like a man. She would do things like restocking my bathroom when she saw I was low on toilet paper, toothpaste etc. without me asking. She also made sure I always had my morning coffee whether we were at my place, her place, or otherwise, always making sure it was at my desk at the start of class.

I remember one particular day I was starving because I had forgotten to pack my lunch. I'd decided I was going to go to Burger King between classes and grab a bite to eat and had offhandedly mentioned that in a text to Amy. Not 20 minutes later I get a text from her to come downstairs and when I got there she had a Whopper and a coke waiting for me and wouldn't let me go back to class until I'd eaten.

Hunger slayed

I had never experienced this type of treatment from any woman, so I fell hard for this girl. Coupled with the great sex we were having, I never stood a chance. Amy had me hook, line and sinker, there wasn't a damn thing I could do about it, and I wouldn't have had it any other way.

But things took a steep nose dive when we returned from our beach getaway to celebrate her 20th birthday (which was exactly one week before mine). The things I internally characterized as "nothing to worry about" were boiling beneath the surface had been dormant for long enough. My blissful ignorance was about to cost me dearly in many ways.

The Best, Worst Birthday

On the morning of my 32nd birthday, I opened my laptop to drink up all the validation that came with being the birthday boy. When I opened Facebook, her account was the one on the screen…she'd forgotten to log out. Like any red-blooded male I had to have a look.

My stomach churned as I read message threads from guy after guy asking her if she was free that night or if she was mad at them or if her boyfriend knew about them. I was sick with hurt and pain and didn't want to believe what I was seeing. I took screen grabs of the conversations and headed to her apartment hoping against all hope she would deny everything and give me logical explanations about the conversations.

When I walked in her front door she was sitting on her couch nervously waiting for whatever it was I was there for. I went into the kitchen, grabbed a chair so I could look her right in the eye during the exchange. I sat in the chair and said the following:

"Amy, we've been together for a while and one thing I like about you is your honesty. I'm going to ask you a question and I need you to tell me the truth." I said as steadily as I could.

"…okay," she said nervously.

"Have you cheated on me?" I asked. The three seconds she paused were the longest of my life. All she could do was look at me like a deer in the headlights wondering how the hell I could have known. When that three-second eternity had ended she said:

"Honestly…..yes."

Gentlemen, I cannot begin to describe the gravity of the shock and pain that pierced my soul the moment those words escaped her lips. Those words haunt me to this day and is still by far and away the worst emotional pain I have ever experienced in my life. I broke down and cried like a girl. I was absolutely destroyed.

Call me a cry baby, call me a drama queen, accuse me of embellishment. I don't care. That pain was as real and raw as it gets and I felt every bit of that sting from spine to sternum. I don't know how long I was there but I remember throwing up in her toilet at least twice. She cried as well with her hands on her head with a "what have I done" look on her face which made it worse.

It was much worse than this…trust me

After I finally composed myself I yanked off the necklace with the letter "A" charm on it and threw it on the couch next to her and left for work. She called and texted me all day long leaving message after message about how sorry she was how much she loved me and how much she wanted me back. I still loved her very much and eventually I finally cracked and called her.

Amy tearfully apologized profusely and said it was a mistake that happened because she was high. She vowed to spend the rest of her life making it up to me as my wife. She said she wanted to have my children and grow old with me and never leave my side. She told me she'd give me a birthday night I would never forget and begged me to take her back.

I took the bait.

When she came to my place that night she was in full-blown slut mode. She showed up in a mini skirt that barely covered her thong covered private parts, a midriff her tits were all but falling out of, heels so high she could barely walk in them, salon quality curls, and a professional French mani-pedi. Her smell nearly paralyzed me as I was sure she had bathed in pheromones before she came over. I was powerless.

She dutifully prepared her famous pork chops for me (which I loved almost as much as her), gave me a birthday cupcake and the watch I had expressed interest in. As the coup de grâce, she unveiled my name on the small of her back emblazoned in fresh black and red ink against her reddened skin.

We had the hottest, angriest sex of our lives that night and I was back in her clutches. But the relationship had already been damaged well beyond repair and it would never be the same.

Slow, painful death

The next few months were some of the worst of my life. Yes, I'm saying this a lot and it may seem like hyperbole but I can assure you, this is no exaggeration. The constant calling and checking up on her, going through her phone, and outright jealousy deteriorated our relationship in a hurry. Our romance suffered a slow painful death and I hung on with everything I had to keep her.

During the fall and winter of 2009 I became completely unraveled. I'd developed a cocaine and oxycodone habit, and started shooting morphine. Hell, I was even contemplating doing heroin to numb the pain.

[image]
I didn't go down this road, but I was dangerously close

I lost my job, my car, and my apartment, and had dropped out of school. All over a fucking girl. Having no place to go, I ended up living with a couple of Amy's drug addict friends who were a couple and both on felony probation for possession with intent to distribute.

During my stay I found out that Amy had been cheating on me the entire time we were together. I'll never know how many guys there were but I'm sure there were plenty. Her perfect body, deep southern twang, and flirtatious disposition ensured an endless supply of cock willing to make her acquaintance. I later found out that she'd even been fucking the boyfriend drug addict and had messed around with the girlfriend some. My snowflake had turned out to be 100% bona fide slut.

On Thanksgiving Day of 2009 she finally put the nail in the coffin and told me she was engaged to the father of her daughter who'd recently been released from prison (more on this in a bit). They were married a few months later. It was a mercy killing of sorts. Though I knew this was coming it still hurt just the same.

On New Year's Day of 2010 I was in a drug-fueled haze watching the Rose Bowl when I heard a banging at the door. The drug addict girlfriend and I looked at each other in horror because we thought it was the cops. It wouldn't have been surprising because there were drug addicts and drug dealers in and out of that small apartment on the regular. What's more is that her boyfriend had been taken to jail a few weeks prior because of a failed drug test (he's in prison to this day).

She opened the door and the landlord walked in, pointed to me and said: "You don't live here. You need to be out of this apartment by 9 am tomorrow morning or the Sheriff will come and remove you." I called my brother and explained the situation. He bought me a bus ticket to Atlanta, where my mother, brother, and sister were living and three hours later I was on a Greyhound headed for the ATL.

I managed to find a great paying job a week after I got there and was able to financially recover rather quickly. But Atlanta wasn't for me and I knew it having lived there a short time years before. So six months after showing up with literally nothing but the clothes on my back and $20 my brother sent me to eat on for the trip down, I was on a plane to the west coast and haven't looked back since.

In retrospect…

…there were scores of red flags about Amy that I flat-out ignored on account of my betafied male rationalization hamster and her stunning beauty. The girl was hot, the sex was better, she kept my balls drained, and my belly full so I mentally explained everything away.

The following red flags were so obvious, even manginas would have stayed away:

1. She had a 5 year old daughter when I met her

Nothing alarming right? She was 19*.* This meant she got knocked up at 14, which likely meant she had been fucking since she was 13 or younger. Oh and the father of her daughter? My age*.* He went to prison for statutory rape. The only reason he didn't get the book thrown at him was because Amy testified that she'd seduced him and the jury bought it. His impending release didn't become a cloud over our relationship until after my birthday.

2. The day she gave me a vicodin in class when I had a migraine

I was a little taken aback that someone her age had a zip lock bag full of pills, but I was enthralled at the fact that she was, once again, taking care of me. The druggies that came in and out the pseudo-crack house I was living in often regaled me with stories of her meth-fueled fuck fests with this guy or that while I was in class.

She was addicted to heroin the summer after our beach trip and lost a lot of weight. I didn't notice her drastic weight loss because I was with her all the time but the track marks on her arms were swept under the proverbial rug.

These should have clued me in

3. Her father was in prison for most of her childhood

This was why she had an affinity for older men at such a young age. She had major daddy issues which was evident in her taste in men. No need to elaborate on this phenomenon as must of us are familiar with the fact that girls like this are often looking for a father figure to fill that void.

4. She seemed to know every guy everywhere we went

Whether we were at Burger King, the mall, pumping gas, buying cigarettes, at the movies, at the park, or anywhere else if there was a male present, young or old, she knew them and knew them well. Each one of them greeted her with a long affectionate hug which she gleefully returned. They'd exchange pleasantries and even lightly flirt in front of me, but I just brushed it off as friendly cheeky banter between two old friends. Chances are she'd been under most of them at one point or another.

5. She had a terrible homemade tattoo on her forearm

Post-renaissance I understand the significance of this, but I was obviously blind as a bat back then. She told me she did some of it herself when she was 15 and knowing what I know now I've little reason to doubt her.

There were a few other minor red flags but those were the five that should have set off my alarm bells and told me to stay the fuck away. But my lack of game knowledge made it easy for her to suck me in.

I probably violated all of Heartiste's 16 Commandments of Poon at some point or another with Amy, but the one I should have adhered to the most was probably the one that could have spared me:

> X. Ignore her beauty
> The man who trains his mind to subdue the reward centers of his brain when reflecting upon a beautiful female face will magically transform his interactions with women. His apprehension and self-consciousness will melt away, paving the path for more honest and self-possessed interactions with the objects of his desire. This is one reason why the greatest lotharios drown in more love than they can handle — through positive experiences with so many beautiful women they lose their awe of beauty and, in turn, their powerlessness under its spell. It will help you acquire the right frame of mind to stop using the words hot, cute, gorgeous, or beautiful to describe girls who turn you on. Instead, say to yourself "she's interesting" or "she might be worth getting to know". Never compliment a girl on her looks, especially not a girl you aren't fucking. Turn off that part of your brain that wants to put them on pedestals. Further advanced training to reach this state of unawed Zen transcendence is to sleep with many MANY attractive women (try to avoid sleeping with a lot of ugly women if you don't want to regress). Soon, a Jedi lover you will be.

Ain't that the truth…

You can't make this stuff up

As crazy as this story has been, believe it or not it gets better. I spoke to the druggie girlfriend the other day (we still talk from time to time) and she told me that Amy was being fitted with an ankle bracelet because she was suspected in the murder of her husband (baby daddy) and the state wanted to keep tabs on her to make sure she didn't abscond.

The story goes that Amy had been cheating on him (surprise, surprise) and the man she was shacking up with shot him in the chest at point blank rage with a shotgun when he, the husband, kicked in the door trying to retrieve his daughter. The ensuing investigation has apparently uncovered evidence that may implicate Amy as the shooter, hence, the ankle bracelet.

I didn't include the story of how I had borrowed $1,300 to bond her out of jail after getting popped for drugs (her bond was so high she had to put up her car title as collateral in addition to the $1,300 I borrowed) and the craziness that followed because this story is already stretching the parameters of ROK articles as it is. But trust me, I was an idiot in this instance as well and we'll leave it at that.

Learn from my mistakes

This situation could have ruined my life permanently. I could have gotten Amy pregnant (though the kid's paternity would have been in question from the jump), I could have gotten arrested while living in that drug house, and I could have developed a heroin habit. I was ripe for the picking but I managed to come out the other side with my freedom and my health.

Looking back, even if I had the mythical crystal ball I used to wish for I know I still would have taken the plunge, proving that this was a lesson I had to learn rather than be taught. That's how pathetic and thirsty I was.

The wisdom I gained from the experience with Amy paid immediate dividends. My new found degree from the neomasculine preschool of hard knocks made it almost too easy to diagnose the low quality Latina I hooked up with shortly after coming west. Took me a week to solve that puzzle and eventually I ended up here in the 'sphere.

I never take for granted that I was very fortunate not to have been swallowed up by that armpit of a county in rural North Carolina. The fact that I was chewed up and spit out of there may very well have saved my life.

I hope my story helps men to understand the common mistakes we make as well as the red flags that even the best looking women have. Like I said, I was lucky to get the hell out of those circumstances. But if you're not careful and apply the knowledge sites like this provide you might not have the good fortune I was afforded to put your life back together.

5 Cases Where You'll Need A Professional To File Your Taxes

March 10, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Windigo Incorporated

Income tax in America is a relatively simple process when your life is relatively simple. If you work the same job in the same state for the entire year, you will likely have just one W2 form that you can enter into a tax software program. Click the button and you are done.

If your life is not "normal" or "simple," which is often the end result of those who would label themselves as red pill, then navigating the set of tax implications and options available becomes challenging. The following circumstances contain a number of pitfalls and signify when you should look for tax help.

1. You operate an online business

Those that operate online businesses have been able to avoid tax pitfalls for some time, as they are on the edge of a “new economy” and the IRS has had to take time to figure out how to deal with them. That couldn’t last forever, though, and now third-party payment providers like Paypal, Stripe, and American Express report payments to business owners directly to the IRS.

States are also clamoring for their share of sales tax revenue from online retailers by assigning a “nexus of business,” forcing online businesses to pay income tax where they are deemed to reside. If an online business is making more than $30,000 in gross revenue per year, they are on the radar and should consult a tax professional for potential pitfalls, especially one who understands e-commerce and online tools.

What this means: If you own a corporation or a partnership (or LLC sometimes) you need to at least file an extension by March 15, report your gross income, before Paypal or credit card fees, and have those line up with at least the 1099-K. Failure to file a return or extension by March 15 can result in a 25% tax penalty when you do file.

2. You live or have financial interests in another country

Another new law taking effect expands the look of the treasury department to those living abroad. Going by the acronym FATCA, the short story is that foreign countries will be reporting information related to US citizens to the IRS. Foreign earned income exclusion solves most tax issues as long as it is reported properly.

This is also related to FATCA under another acronym: FBAR. FBAR requires those with foreign bank accounts holding an aggregate of more than $10,000 US at any time in another country to report these accounts…to the financial crimes enforcement unit. This one is somewhat tricky as there aren’t any additional taxes due, but there are terrible penalties for not reporting. $10,000 per bank account as a civil penalty for non-willful omission.

What this means: If you have foreign accounts there is a second deadline in June to file the FinCen Report 114, which discloses the foreign bank and property information. This is not the same as your income tax. You must report this every year.

3. You have no health insurance, pay for your own, or have foreign health insurance

New for 2015 is a tax penalty for those who don't have, or don't have the right kind, of health insurance. There is no need to worry about this if you have employer health coverage. The penalty for not having health insurance doubles every year from here on out, with this tax filing year being $325. As an added twist, those who are out of the country also must have qualified health insurance or pay the penalty. "Out of the country" in this case means for more than 330 days in a year.

What this means: If you are facing a $325 health care penalty this year, ask or research exemptions that you may qualify for before filing. There are close to 20 specific ways to qualify for them.

4. You have a child

Having a child, if your income is $45,000 or less, or you are self employed, opens up all sorts of doors for tax relief. The holy grail is earned income tax credit, but there are multiple other choices. If you have a child with a "baby mama" she will likely scoop up all of these benefits and you should get advice or an estimate of what these tax benefits may be, in case you have to enter a legal battle. Any tax professional should be able to advise on this.

What this means: If there is a dispute you and the baby's mother as to who can claim, know this: File your return first! The person who files first will have their return accepted while the second parent has their return rejected and must file a claim with the IRS…which is not fast to resolve.

5. You get divorced

Unforeseen tax impacts of divorce are like salt in the wound of the financial devastation that can come along with it. Your pocketbook can take severe tax penalty hits if you have to split a retirement fund, sell or buy a house, or otherwise exchange property with a spouse after divorce. Furthermore, he who was the children also gets the tax breaks.

Not scary enough? The IRS gets many of their leads for audits and fraud investigations from disgruntled divorcées, where the wife will report the husband for tax fraud for leverage, innocent spouse protection, and even a share of the tax collected as an informant reward.

You should be armed with the tax numbers before you agree to anything in a divorce.

What this means: If you are getting divorced, consult a tax expert in addition to a lawyer before signing anything. Otherwise, you may have to pay a 20% tax penalty on split items like retirement funds, or could get penalized for back taxes if your ex informs on you.

A Convenient Solution

If you think you need tax help but are wary of the costs, it's less expensive than you think. A consultation to get advice on your specific situation can be had for less than $100, and paying to have someone else file your taxes can be done for between $600 and $1800 dollars depending on the complexity of the situation. Our prices are 1/3 the average tax penalty for a late or inaccurately filed tax return.

When seeking tax assistance it's important to find someone that you can trust, that understands your situation and has credentials to help you. At Windigo Incorporated you work with the principal of the business, who is enrolled to practice before the IRS and has personal experience with online businesses, foreign income, and divorce. Click here to browse our services and get your low-cost estimate today.

Why You Should Quit Playing Fantasy Sports

March 10, 2015 | by Brian Drums | Link | Original Link

Donovan Sharpe recently wrote a great article about why it's time to stop hating professional athletes. I have felt the same way for quite a while now, and was thrilled to see the article show up on ROK. I smiled as I finished reading, proudly complimenting myself on never being one of the individuals who projected his envy onto pro athletes.

But then something hit me: as a man who used to dedicate a massive amount of time to fantasy sports (particularly fantasy football), I was no better than the people who spend their days vilifying athletes to combat their own shortcomings.

Fantasy can take over your life

I started playing fantasy football in college and was hooked right away. At first I only played in one league, but soon joined a second, then a third, etc. Before I knew it I was doing seven or eight leagues a year; the entire fall season was centered on my fantasy teams.

I would spend my entire week reading a million articles on who to start, complaining about performances from the previous week, and when Sunday finally came I'd be flipping between every single game and screaming every time a second-string running back got the ball instead of "my" starter. Can you think of anything more pathetic than a grown man screaming at a television because "his player" isn't the one scoring a touchdown or catching a long pass?

Playing fantasy sports are a complete waste of your time. If you're a typical fantasy football "player" than you're probably spending 10-20 hours a week staring at your lineup, reading articles and watching videos, pregame shows and Fantasy Football Live (and none of this includes the entire day you spend watching football games you wouldn't normally give a shit about).

Think of what you could accomplish with an extra 20 hours a week; you could learn a language, polish off one or two novels, or start working out more and improving your body.

Fantasy sports are a crutch; the same way some people cover their bodies with tattoos in order to have a sense of accomplishment without actually having to do anything, fantasy sports are an escape for men who want to feel like they've accomplished something with their lives.

I have seen men spend the entire year openly bragging about the fantasy sports title they won. The way these guys talk would make your head explode: "I managed my team very well this year. That trade I pulled off in week eight was the key to my title victory." "As a Dez Bryant owner I'm concerned that Dallas fired their offensive coordinator."

Sounds about right

Will you fucking listen to yourselves? If you put this much care and effort into your professional life you could very well be running your own business instead of sitting in an office fifty hours a week, being miserable and having to listen to the fat, ugly broads in the cubicle next to you squawk about how many "likes" their cat's Facebook page received while they pound donuts and slurp frappuccino's. Believe me, I know all this from experience.

The case for quitting

Another benefit to quitting fantasy sports is you'll find yourself spending far less time on ESPN, Grantland, SI and all the other social justice blogs masquerading as sports websites. Visit any of these sites on any given day and you're more likely to find articles on feminism, gun control, and domestic violence than actual sports.

If you want sports insight, talk with some like-minded friends; if you want podcasts with Lena Dunham and rants against masculinity, then these sites are for you.

The manosphere gets bashed as being sexist, hateful, etc. but we all know the truth: it is about self-improvement and being the best man you can be. Discovery is the first step, but theory without practice is useless. Well, here's a great step towards bettering yourself: quit playing fantasy sports.

Don't wean off of it, don't "just do one league" this year and don't give into any pressure you receive to play, just quit cold turkey. When you get that email to join your leagues hit the decline button. When your friends ask you why you're not playing tell them you have better things to do with your time. Be specific: “I’m no longer wasting my time with fantasy sports.” They don’t like it? Fuck ‘em, get some new friends.

Stop trying to fit in with today’s herd of bitch-made men. When they give you a hard time you need to understand that they are lashing out at you because you’re bettering yourself, and that scares other people. It forces them to confront their own shortcomings and most people can’t handle that.

Don’t be this guy

There are 168 hours in a week. Most people spend 100 of them sleeping or working (including commute). Throw in the intangibles (traffic, housework, grocery shopping, etc) and you probably lose another 10 hours a week.

The point is we only have so much time in a week to actually do something that matters. Don’t waste your time living vicariously through professional athletes and stop pretending that winning a fantasy game is an accomplishment. Quit now and thank me later.

4 Signs That Show The Degeneracy Of London’s Women

March 11, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

London is the eye of the degenerative cultural storm enveloping Western nations at an alarming pace. Its large and youthful population, and especially Anglosphere females, are craven followers of any new trend presented to them them as beneficial or beautiful. This demographic picks up habits on cue as directed by peer pressure and the culture creation industry.

The fallout from this rampant social engineering is evident to the keen observer of London women and their degenerate behaviours. A radioactive soup of dire prophecies like the Androgynous Agenda, Kurzweil’s singularity and post-modern gender-bending are starting to take shape in the following behavioural trends.

1. Women with smashed iPhones

London is full of iPhones with broken screens, the majority of them owned by women. These are usually thoroughly smashed all over, consistent with repeated dropping, which itself indicates chronic use. British women are notorious for being addicted to the constant stream of validation provided by smartphones.

This leads them to stay constantly plugged into these devices. There is not a single public place where a British girl isn't to be seen transfixed by an iPhone screen. Such patterns of use inevitably lead to the dropping and smashing of these fragile devices, and girls frantically texting on smashed iPhones are a common sight in London.

The smartphone obsession of British women is so prevalent, it has even become a matter of public safety. Zoe Sugg, a professional narcissist who feeds her grotesque ego under the pretext of running a fashion blog, was chided for filming a video blog poast at the wheel of her car. In a case of more dire consquences, a 21-year old girl was so busy sending text messages that she crashed into another car, killing its driver. She was given a mild sentence of 21 months in prison. At her trial, she told the judge "I just feel awful that I was involved."

British women's craven thirst for constant online validation doesn't only result in collisions on roads. Matt Forney has reported on "manslamming," which he describes as "the idea that men don't move out of the way of women on the sidewalk fast enough."

Even in busy areas of London, British women are walking around intently staring into their iPhones, earphones in, oblivious to all around them as they bathe in Facebook likes and Tinder swipes from thirsty male supplicants online. A girl doing this walked into me on Tottenham Court Road a few weeks ago. I was chastised with an indignant yelp of protestation. It is, of course, men's duty to move out of the way promptly when this happens.

Feminism, in its relentless drive for global equality, has brought civilization to the point where Chinese women are throwing themselves from fourth-floor windows in desperation at working in factories that make the devices that narcissistic Western women use to fill the gaping hole in their spirits with external validation. Then, as if in gratitude, Western women treat these delicate and carefully crafted devices like a child's toy, with resulting breakage.

2. Corporate women wearing sneakers with business attire

Nothing betrays a Sheryl Sandberg-clone femcunt like sports shoes with business attire. In London, this is the exclusive preserve of Anglo women who have brought into the myth of office-cubicle empowerment. I have yet to see this ghastly mismatch of styles in women from Eastern Europe or Russia.

More traditional cultures instil in their women a sense of deep shame at the prospect of appearing in public looking less than their best. British women have no such reservations, walking around in ghastly, foam-soled running shoes anywhere but on the running track. The colours—usually neon pink—show that not only are these women happy to look like off-duty circus clowns, but they are deeply proud of it as well.

A closely related trend is that of middle class British women wearing Air Max 90 trainers. Formerly the preserve of rappers and hood rats, this masculine footwear has been culturally appropriated by a demographic of women terribly keen to show off how "down" they are. It is an unflattering, unfeminine look and a trend that would die a horrible death in a healthy society with any semblance of values.

3. Women wearing leggings as trousers

Although some may think othewise, this fashion trend is a Chernobyl-level disaster in the field of female attire, and an egregious affront to all decency. For a woman to leave the house and deliberately aim to be seen in public in nothing more than a thick pair of tights, she has to be narcissistic enough to have exhausted all other avenues for obtaining attention, of which there are many.

British women used to afford the public gaze the dignity of a denim skirt over leggings. Lately, however, as shamelessness enters the vogue, all modesty has been dispensed with, and women are walking around with flabby, wobbly arses hanging out and muffin tops on show.

Of course, there are exceptions to the rule.

4. Androgynous women

Women of the Anglosphere are known for their distinct and often brash lack of femininity. In the streets of London, subtle evidence of this can be observed. East European and Russian women walk with a graceful bounce, hips moving with an elliptical figure 8 pendulation which mesmerises the male gaze. British women display a rigid hip movement akin to an AT-AT from Star Wars.

Two English 8's on Carnaby Street, yesterday.

British women, especially those of a progressive political persuasion, have started to adopt boyish androgyny in both fashion sense and demeanour. Over the weekend, I had an unpleasant experience opening an Audrey Hepburn lookalike. What struck me about this distasteful set, aside from the the snarky disdain and aggressive, relentless shit testing, was the fashion—high cut bangs, a formless cream coat, boy trousers, and boy shoes.

The style is an instant erection killer, and (unfortunately) increasingly common. British women, especially middle class liberals who read The Guardian, are now dressing like Richard E. Grant in Withnail and I. If it wasn't for East European and Russian women who are still careful and diligent with maintaining their femininity, London men would have nothing to pick from but an amorphous mass of women who from afar look like Pete Doherty.

Conclusion

Cultural Marxism is the expression employed by reactionary factions, of which the manosphere is but one, to describe the project for change promoted by elites under the guise of equality and social justice. Because women are the more impressionable sex, elites expend disproportionate resources in aiming to change women.

Similar to the Soviets' New Socialist Man, the New Feminist Woman is a grotesque pastiche of anti-femininity, Kurzweilian automation, and repugnant narcissism taken to depraved extremes. The men who have to come to terms with these women must deal with androgynous, unfeminine women who are addicted to their iPhones and who live at the centre a CERN-like attention vortex driven by real life and social media validation.

Men who reject this new paradigm must avoid apathy towards these trends and practices, lest they become "the New Normal."

8 Traits That Every Successful Man Has

March 11, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Over the years I have had the opportunity to hang out with and become friends with a number of very successful men. They include writers and other artists, people who've made a fortune in finance and property, the CEOs of various global companies, and a very famous British recording artist who has had a number of transatlantic hit records.

I have spent a long time thinking about what they have in common and I've observed that there are eight traits that they all share. While this list is by no means exhaustive, the characteristics below are positive and worth emulating in your own field, be it meeting women, starting a business, or creating art.

1. The Ability To Self-Publicize Without Annoying People

Let's face it—we are in the golden age of self-promotion, with global stars as diverse as Ed Sheeran, Calvin Harris, and Kim Kardashian all owing their initial success in a large part to their social media profiles. While I'm not suggesting you should become a digital braggart who puts everyone off by making every Tweet about your latest project, you will do well to find less obtrusive ways of letting people know about your successes.

Success doesn't happen in a vacuum, and the truth is that unless you let people know what you've done they very likely won't be aware of it, or will pay little attention.

Success is contagious. Once people know that things you are doing are working then they are more likely to approach you with ideas to augment yours.

2. …But Avoid Talking Too Much About Current Projects In Casual Conversations

This doesn't contradict the point about self-promotion. Once a project is finished, then you should be talking about it. Before it's ready, you should be working on it. Save the chatter for when you're finished.

3. An Almost Pathological Obsession With What They Do

People who are very successful are by definition obsessed with whatever field they work in. This is essential. If you aren't in love with what you do to the exclusion of (almost) everything else, then you should find something else to focus on and make your current hustle a hobby – if that. It is only through the razor-sharp focus brought about by immersion in a subject that success is born.

This obsession should not be limited to your own work, by the way. It must also includes being a "fan" of others. So, if you want to be a concert pianist, then you should have listened to every recording you can get your hands on of the best (and the worst) other concert pianists out there. You need to understand what it is other people are doing, not to copy them, but to learn from them as you develop your own style.

4. The Ability To Make Quick Decisions

Decision-making is hard, but procrastinating doesn't help anyone. Sun Szu in The Art of War says that a long, protracted war has never done anyone any good. Make your decision quickly on the basis of the information at hand and act immediately.

In many cases it is less the decision you've made that is important – as frequently each of two approaches can have merit – as simply taking action and enjoying forward momentum.

5… And Not Be Swayed

Once you've made a decision, don't look back. Stick with it. Understand that you took what you believed to be the right action in the moment and trust your instincts. You chose that route for a reason. Don't beat yourself up about what could have happened if you'd gone the other way. Move on and don't look back.

6. A Strong Sense of Self

The successful guys I know have a very strong sense of their own identity, likes, dislikes, and beliefs. In game terms this translates roughly as having strong frame, and it means that you will be harder to push around, less prone to navel-gazing and uncertainty, and more steadfast. Take time to understand yourself, work out where you stand in relation to the world, and live accordingly.

7. And An Invincible Work Ethic

No getting around this one, I'm afraid. Real success requires hard work. The English novelist Anthony Trollope used to get up at 5am to write before his day job. As soon as he finished one novel he would move on to the next – sometimes on the same day.

Whether you want to get good at meeting girls, or start making money online, you need to stop making excuses and get to work. Once you begin putting in the hours it will become addictive, and you'll establish a virtuous circle, finding it hard to tolerate your old, less driven lifestyle.

8. The Ability To Maintain Consistency Of Output In The Face Of Success Or Failure

Successful people don't dwell on great failures or great successes – they're too busy working on the next big thing. Once you've put something out into the world, be it a blog post, an approach to a hot girl, or a new product, then how it is received is largely out of your hands.

Of course you should tweak and refine as much as you can, and learn from any errors, but undue angst or celebration won't help. Consistency of effort is the mother of success, not analysis.

One Way To Defeat Your Social Anxiety

March 11, 2015 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

There is an all-to-common condition (affecting 20-25% of people) that is a thorn on the side of any man who wants to conquer his destiny, and achieve greatness in life as an alpha male. Social anxiety.

It is the fear of interaction with other people that brings on self-consciousness, feelings of being negatively judged and evaluated, and, as a result, leads to avoidance from all these perceived negative stimuli.

Social anxiety is essentially another term for "covert avoidance." An example of covert avoidance is when you happen to be at a large party, and you choose to hang out on the balcony, lost in your own thoughts, rather than mingling with the main cluster of guests. You proceed with this action not out of personal preference, but because being around those people with their watchful eyes and behaviors brought you somatic discomfort.

Basically, if you have social anxiety you probably want to make yourself as inconspicuous as possible in social settings. This advantages nobody in the game of life, but it's far more destructive for the type of people that Return of Kings is intended to draw.

It's Far Worse For Heterosexual Men

Of course, every government sponsored anxiety "awareness" campaign would like to pretend that it's an all-encompassing human problem. One that equally affects people of all races, sexual orientations, and genders (because remember there are a lot more than just two genders these days).

But come on, we know the red pill truths about gender and social dynamics here. Social anxiety is a far more debilitating condition for straight males than it is for gay men, or for females of whatever social justice initiative they choose to identify with.

Women and gays can get a pass on some of the hypothetical problems of social anxiety, because all they have to do is wait for a more assertive and dominant straight or gay male to approach them and let a new relationship naturally run its course. It sucks, I know. But as "cisgender" heterosexuals, this is the deck of cards we were handed at birth.

By contrast, straight men are saddled with the obligation of having to navigate the incoherent social field of women's expectations, whether it's for prospective sexual partners or for a lucrative job interview. Because remember, you have to be an entertaining clown 24/7 in order to land a "7" or above these days, and 24-year-old HR girls hold your entire career and financial prospects in the palm of their hands.

A male interviewer will hire you based upon a more practical set of criteria, such as your qualifications, experience, and work ethic. Women on the other hand, will hire you based upon how they "feel" about you, rather than any of those important skills and productivity assessments.

An anxious or jittery man will be metaphorically presented a one-way ticket back to his mother's basement by the flick of her pen, because he committed the crime of not getting her hamster wheel spinning properly.

The Best Way For Men To Overcome

Men, or more specifically straight men, do not have the luxury of various anxieties working in their favor in any shape or form. It will obliterate your dreams, desires, employment opportunities, and success in bedding women. A social anxiety that is holding you back simply must be addressed, identified, and murdered from your whole being.

My best advice? Practice public speaking. What better way to confront your fears than to jump right off the deep end of the swimming pool with a group of people who may be suffering from the same curable condition?

Check and see if there are any Meetup.com groups in your city (New York is linked just for an example) which are geared towards public speaking. The nature of such groups can be geared towards anything from presenting business ideas, to simply reading out a pre-written essay on a specific topic. It doesn't matter because all manner of public speaking scenarios are designed to build your confidence, and your poise, with getting up in front of a sizable crowd and being the center of attention for at least a few minutes.

Everyone in the group will be there for the same thing, and will be very non-judgmental and supportive of your efforts. Just the fact that you are already there is putting you on the right track. Also bear in mind, there might be some worthy talent there too.

Final Statements

I hope this article can be a wake-up call for any ROK readers who want to do a little soul-searching and identify a social anxiety issue of theirs which is limiting their potential in life. Particularly in regards to improving their employment, financial, or sexual prospects in the long term.

Just remember, the actions you take towards confronting your inner demons in the real world, will speak louder than any amount of uplifting words I can formulate on a keyboard.

Since you have now become (re)acquainted with some of your anxieties, let’s reiterate the opening video’s last statement. “W*hat are you going to do about it*?”

How Limiting Vocabulary Reduces Our Ability To Dissent From The PC Narrative

March 11, 2015 | by Mark Thrice | Link | Original Link

A frequent topic of conversation here is criticism of SJWs and their insistence on using a specific form of English, often peppered with pseudo-academic jargon. These words are sometimes called “neologisms”—for example: cis-gendered, heteronormative, and “the performativity of gender.”

In his famous work 1984 George Orwell describes the creation of a new language, Newspeak, removing all nuance from English. The strategy involved replacing enjoyable, fantastic, and marvelous with good, plusgood, and doubleplusgood as a means of thought control.

Orwell was red pill.

Language and our understanding of reality

One may look to the real world for a similar example, namely modern Turkish. While originally intended as a Westernizing and modernizing political move, the introduction of the Latin alphabet during the early twentieth century unintentionally lead to a less nuanced and less descriptive language.

The Turkish government removed many words of Persian and Arabic origin. Eliminating words, intentionally or otherwise, is a dangerous path, as one's worldview is created and articulated by one's language.

First, however, let us discuss how language imparts our perception of reality. Our ability to distinguish colour is largely based on having a word for it. As such, ancient societies did not make the colour distinctions we do today. Most surprisingly perhaps, they did not have a word for "blue," perceiving it as a shade of green, the latter being more common; there are few blue plants or animals.

The poet Homer described Aegean Sea as "wine-dark." A language historian named Lazarus Geiger analyzed the Bible, the Koran, Icelandic sagas, and ancient Hindu texts, none of which contained descriptions of the sky or sea using equivalents of "blue." Therefore, language is an extremely important tool for comprehending the world around us. The more limited one's language, the more limited one's worldview.

The origin of modern Turkish

This brings us to modern Turkish. Under the leadership of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk the nation of Turkey went through sweeping changes: the Ottoman Caliphate was abolished, wearing of the fez was outlawed, and most importantly, Turkey switched from using a form of Arabic script to the Latin alphabet; used by English, German, and French.

However, many words with Arabic or Persian origin were eliminated from the language. As such, the language lost much of its descriptive ability.

Portrait of Ataturk.

For instance, in modern Turkish a handsome man is “çok güzel” (chock guezel phonetically), as is a beautiful woman, an adorable baby, a stunning building, a well-displayed meal, a striking painting, and even a nice cold glass of beer. English has numerous “quantifiers,” many, much, very, few, a few, little, a little, whereas Turkish only has “çok”, roughly equivalent of “very.”

Most disturbingly perhaps, the Turkish language’s words for emotions are essentially limited to versions of happy, sad, angry, bored, and so-so. English has more synonyms and near-synonyms for individual emotions than Turkish has for emotions in total.

Having lived in Turkey, Turks who are fluent in English frequently complain about the childish nature of their countrymen, which I believe is a direct result of the inability to express their emotions in a complicated and nuanced manner. For reference, estimates of the total vocabulary of Modern Turkish is about 100,000 words, whereas English has approximately 1.2 million.

Ireland, a nation of five million people, has 4 Nobel Prize winners for literature. Turkey, a nation of 70 million, has one, their only Nobel Prize laureate. Nevertheless, what does this have to do with political correctness?

My only feminist friend

The elimination of vocabulary is a dangerous game. By intentionally whittling down the English language we narrow the field of discussion and remove ideas that may be articulated. A friend of mine is a self-identifying “feminist,” albeit not of the Tumblr variety.

Given the relatively friendly terms on which we can discuss and debate, I believe she makes an interesting example. Being of Sri Lankan birth and parentage, English is a learned language for her, albeit her Tamil is now very weak. Thus, most of her vocabulary expansion came from her degree in “Women’s Studies” at University.

Obviously, I’m using the term “degree” very loosely.

She and I were once discussing so-called “cultural appropriation.” I cited examples where powerful groups accurately and respectfully used cultural motifs from a foreign society, such as Mozart’s “Turkish March” or Brahms’ “Hungarian” works (Brahms being an Austrian during the period Hapsburg rule in Hungary), and furthermore, cited examples where a subservient group adopted the dances and music of the dominant group due to unforced assimilation

I contended that “cultural appropriation” was not necessarily bad; the poor girl did not know what “necessarily” meant. Without the word “necessarily” how could one understand the notion that an act may be positive, neutral, or negative depending on the context?

Conclusion

The concept of the “euphemism treadmill” is an interesting one. Take for example the word “cretin,” meaning someone with mental retardation. The term is bastardized from the French word chretien, meaning “Christian.” The term originated in the Middle Ages and was a plea to treat such people gently, reminding the speaker those people were still Christians.

“Retarded” was originally considered less offensive than the previously used “idiot” or “moron”; “retarded” meant held back or delayed, e.g. “My morning routine was retarded by heavy traffic.”

Eliminating words from a language is incredibly dangerous, as it limits the mental processes that one may comprehend or articulate. Our vision of reality is defined by our language. This is important to realize when debating with SJWs or feminists—their vocabulary, while seemingly academic, is often limited to the concepts which their twisted ideology permits them to comprehend.

5 Things That Enable Women To Avoid Personal Responsibility In Their Relationships

March 12, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

First time users of the red pill are shocked to learn that feminism has saturated everything. It's not merely a fringe movement. Feminism is a primary color of 20th century Eurocentric liberalism.

Even non-feminist women want to absolve themselves of guilt when a relationship tanks. It's a natural human reaction to failure. And society is ready and willing to help them with it. Here are five things that enable women to avoid their share of blame for a failed relationship.

1. Movies

Women are the big market share in the movie industry. Romantic movies are almost exclusively marketed towards them, and even most man movies about action heroes have a romantic subplot. Did you ever think it was weird that Christian Bale's Bruce Wayne had a perfectly shaved chest?

Even near-homeless in the mountains of China, Bruce Wayne keeps himself groomed.

Women today are extra picky about what stimuli they receive, so movies are usually careful to tell women what they want to hear.

If a marriage is falling apart because the husband is working too much, the husband isn't portrayed as a hard-working man making personal sacrifices to provide for his family. Instead, he just isn't loving them enough. He's too distant. The problem isn't her ungratefulness. It's that she doesn't feel love.

Love is never defined in these films. When the couple fights, they never have a philosophical discussion about the nature of love, marriage, or paternalism. Instead they just spit words, and the husband gets extra angry, showing him to be the bad guy. Women are almost never blamed for the failure of the relationship in movies.

That being said, Don Jon's subplot about romantic comedies destroying women's ability to love was a major reason I loved that movie.

2. Friends

Women always want their friends to have the same relationship status (and same sexual experience) as they themselves have. This can be a very good thing, for example, in a society where everyone marries fairly young and women naturally find themselves doing the matchmaking.

But today we live in a society of whores and narcissists. Did you divorce your husband over something stupid? Well, instead of admitting fault for it, just remember that half your friends already have, and the other half should as well.

I'm not sure women are able to understand their motivations for their actions. Granted, I'm not sure anybody truly can, but women especially run on autopilot. At least I assume so, but even Freud drew a blank when trying to figure out the female mind.

3. Daytime Talk Shows

When I was a child, my grandparents told me that TV was mostly filth. I scoffed at this idea. Now I understand.

That video is so awful, even Jezebel wrote against it. An audience member asks Wendy Williams if she should trick her husband into giving her another child as promised years ago, and Wendy gives her the usual "my body, my business" lack of reproachability. Wendy ignores that a part of the man's body (his sperm) will make a major impact on his life without his foreknowledge or consent.

Notice the audience looked really uncomfortable with the question and then broke into applause as soon as Wendy gave the approval. All women are sheep. The video above is hard evidence that women have no internal sense of absolute morality, no matter how much I personally try to disbelieve it.

Although the above is an extreme example, daytime talk shows are full of terrible messages. The enlightened woman only wants to experience something if the experience is on her terms. Women who watch these shows want some weird cocktail of being a domestic goddess with a sense of independent agency.

Women's media today is a sorority of misandry. Or if not hatred of men, then at least a depreciatory view of them. Or if not a depreciatory view of men, then at least an inflated view of women.

These shows often focus on relationships, because that's something women have learned to become retarded at. The dogma of the day is to "find someone who won't try to change you." I don't know what that means. I've never met a man who tried to change a woman's personality. Maybe it happens, but I don't know what it looks like. Nor do I understand why a man would want to, since there's no shortage of pretty young girls.

Nevertheless, women assume that if a relationship doesn't work out, they must just not be right for each other. "He leaves the cap off the toothpaste. Clearly we can't get along." She just picked the wrong guy. Or maybe he changed. Or maybe he lied about who he was. This ignores that arranged or semi-arranged marriages often yield very positive results in satisfaction and happiness.

Marriage is hard work. You have two people with very different brain wiring trying to live as one. Love is not a feeling but a commitment. It is a choice to persevere every day especially when it is difficult. And I would argue that you cannot truly love someone until they have hurt you deeply.

4. Bullshit Activism On Their Facebook Feed

It's never a woman's fault in any amount if she's beaten by her husband or raped in a frathouse. It must be the man's fault and only his fault. Women bare no responsibility for the consequences of their choices. Otherwise, if we assign some kind of cautionary warning to women about safety, then, well, I'm not sure what will happen. Feminists never got that far in their explanation.

I guess women wouldn't be as likely to bring accusations, except pursuing justice is a separate thing from giving advice about being safe. And it doesn't make men think it's okay to beat or rape women, because most of the blame is still applied to the perpetrators. And if a man does beat or rape a woman, the other men in his life will likely kick his teeth in for it.

Jane Housewife isn't quietly knitting when her husband barges into the room and slaps her silly. Usually if a man hits a woman, she's been provoking him for an extended period of time. It doesn't make it right for the man to hit her, but what is worse is telling a woman to be unconcerned with real danger. Men are naturally violent, which can be a very good thing. We're naturally fixers, and we're hands-on people.

But like women above trying to make their friends have the same relationship status, men's violent propensities turn ugly in the wrong contexts. As a society, we should be doing everything to avoid these situations, no matter who feels uncomfortable or scared.

5. Men Who Aren't Invested In The Situation

We all want to feel like a good person. We want to help the helpless. And who is more helpless than women?

Being a white knight is one of the supreme virtues today right behind being anti-racist. Defending women from bad men or telling them when men are being manipulative is what the good people do. The good people empower others.

The road to hell is paved with good intentions. If women are always saved from the consequences of their actions, how will they ever grow? And that's not just a woman thing; that's a people thing.

Unless a woman is truly in a dangerous situation and has no escape, then let her deal with her own problems. Ray Rice's wife doesn't need or want you to stick up for her.

This especially comes from modern church. Pastors like Mark Driscoll and Tim Keller coddling single mothers and bored housewives aren't helping anything except their own wallets.

But I'm not so calloused to think that all these people are merely trying to make a living at whatever ideological cost. I think most of progressivism is people trying to feel like a good person, especially when deep down they feel like failures. It's a fixation we as society need to get past. Be moral, sure, but don't do it so you can feel smug about it.

What Lack Of Testosterone Does To The Male Brain, And How To Fix It

Have you seen the movie Limitless (2011)? In it, a failed writer takes a dose of an illegal drug that enhances brain function. The rollercoaster plot takes him into a lot of trouble, but he simply pops another NZT pill and comes out on top every time. I won't spoil anything for you, but let's just say that the climax of the movie involves chainsaws. So yeah, go watch Limitless.

A more recent example of the same trope is Lucy (2014). Again, the movie revolves around a magic pill that enables Scarlett Johansson to kick ass with over 9000% brain capacity. This time around, the pill is supposedly made from baby placentas or some such nonsense.

Though critics ripped Lucy apart, there are some good scenes in the movie. But for me the most fascinating was the idea that this awesome chemical that gives godlike powers occurs naturally within the body.

gulp I am become God

Even The Matrix had the turning point that involved swallowing a pill. Morpheus offers Neo a choice between two pills – blue and red. Neo takes the red pill and wakes up in the real world. Still, we have no idea what the red pill contained, but if I had to choose one naturally occurring substance, it would be the ballsack juice—AKA testosterone.

This humble molecule defines men

Testosteron is the alpha male among all male hormones. It gives unflinching confidence, the desire to dominate, aggressiveness, and the feeling of invincibility. Testosterone sharpens the mind and gives it focus. The goal is only one—be better than any other man. It’s not necessarily the desire to be the best, but rather the urge to not be the worst.

The awesome juice

When found in the bloodstream, testosterone helps sweat glands produce androstenedione, which signals masculinity to females. Think about what deodorant brands are trying to do: advertise the smell of an alpha male to all females, at which point they should form a line to wax the guy’s pole.

Best deodorant ever, 10/10

But testosterone isn’t just about the superficial. It enhances the man and prepares him for fighting. Testosterone burns body fat, keeps the weight down, builds muscle mass, strengthens the bones, promotes hair growth, and gives abundant energy. You become a lean, mean, fighting machine once you have enough testosterone coursing through your veins.

Womb is the first battlefield

Not even the most hardcore feminist neuropsychiatrist (it's a real thing) can deny that testosterone shapes the man's brain to be fundamentally different than a woman's brain. While in the womb, baby boys grows tiny nuts that make daddy proud and which immediately start pumping testosterone into the boy's brain. This makes the boy enter the world kicking and screaming and keeps him going through it in the same manner.

Until he eventually gets to kick his boss like this

Testosterone will slowly increase until the age of nine, at which point it will skyrocket to about 20 times its previous level. It peaks somewhere around 30 and then begins a graceful descent into the ripe old age. No amount of sensitivity training or nagging can change this trajectory or the man's brain to the point of being identical to female brain.

Crash landing into depression

With the decline of testosterone in the bloodstream comes the weight gain and increase in body fat, brittle bones, loss of hair, and a general sensation of fatigue. In short, you stop being awesome and start to suck.

These symptoms are usually taken as normal signs of aging. But what if they aren't? What if these are just symptoms of low testosterone production? Let's look at the options for increasing the testosterone levels.

Nah, I don’t feel like going out tonight

Normal levels of testosterone in the bloodstream are considered anywhere between 270 to 1070 ng/dL. Nowhere else is there such an absurd range of values that defines “normal levels.” This is another way that the establishment wants to dilute what being a man means.

Also, because of this range, doctors will generally refuse to prescribe testosterone to you. Testosterone and its derivatives are considered a controlled substance and placed in the same class of drugs as heroin, so good luck in trying to acquire them legally.

Hacking the matrix

One simple thing you can do to increase your testosterone levels is lifting weights. As it turns out, the body has built-in feedback mechanisms. Since testosterone increases muscle mass, muscle mass also increases testosterone. By doing simple resistance training, you become much more awesome with each new set of repetitions.

Who needs these when you've got IRON?

You will feel the effects of this almost instantly. The body and the mind become one when you lift weights. It sounds poetic, but I'm completely serious. Weightlifting should be a standard practice in all elementary schools, but it isn't and it's never going to be since physically weak boys are more easily controlled by females in authority positions with superiority complexes.

Power posing

Besides lifting weights, there is also another way which sounds completely ridiculous but is actually backed by science. Remember when I mentioned the feedback mechanism? It turns out that, since testosterone gives the feeling of domination, if you can produce that same feeling through some other means, you get a small testosterone boost.

How do you appear dominating? By taking up as much space as possible.

Until now I've only seen Dexter smile like that

This means spreading out your arms and legs. Basically you extend your personal bubble of private space as far as you can. Though this would probably make for some really awkward subway experiences, the science behind this is solid and has been proven over and over again.

Once you get used to taking up as much space as you can, you will start liking it and people will positively respond to your confidence. At this point, direct them to the Return of Kings website, where men learn to develop their hidden potential. It's a win-win for everyone.

3 Reasons A Man Needs A Good Pair Of Boots

March 12, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Botas Locas

A long-standing tradition in many circles, boots have experienced a comeback in both fashion and work applications. Here are three situations where the right pair of boots can make or break your comfort and style:

1. Maximum convenience, both in health and style

As you get older, you begin to realize that keeping your feet comfortable is a serious priority. Whether trying to keep your feet warm in cold climates, let them breathe in warmer weather, or or simply fitting in with others in a style-conscious environment, sometimes tennis shoes just won't cut it.

Even if you don't aspire to be a master of the sartorial arts, having a pair of boots to either accentuate your style or keep yourself comfortable can never be a bad thing. There are boots to fit every occasion, and having a pair or two can expand your clothing possibilities exponentially.

2. Comfort and safety when working

Footwear is more than just a comfort issue in some businesses— it's a matter of safety. With a construction or other outdoor job, a pair of boots can offer protection for your foot and support so that long days on the feet don't take a toll on your health, and you can work at maximum productivity.

In certain types of professional or office jobs, boots can also be an appropriate and often preferable choice.

3. Peacocking

You didn't think we'd forget the effects on women, did you? It is often said that the first thing a woman notices are your shoes, and if you're clomping around in a scuffed-up pair of sneakers, she's going to pick up on it immediately.

While the days of the Mystery Method's pink furry hats are thankfully well in the past, you can still use your clothing choices to signal individuality and a devil-may-care attitude. Science still shows us that women respond to these visible cues of "value," and use it as a proxy to determine your degree of "dark triad"-ness:

http://www.scientificamerican.com/article/psychology-uncovers-sex-appeal-dark-personalities/

> By comparing the attractiveness ratings of the dressed-down and dressed-up students, the researchers were able to determine how much each student was able to make themselves more appealing through flashy clothes, makeup, accessories, etc.
> The dark triad score was positively correlated with their "dressed-up" attractiveness – a finding that mirrors previous findings. However, the dark triad score was not related to ratings of physical attractiveness in the dressed-down photos. In other words, people with dark personality traits are not seen as more physically attractive than others when you take away their freedom to wear their own clothes and makeup.

In other words, sharp clothing choices are associated with the "dark triad" traits that push the attraction buttons in women. Instead of becoming Patrick Bateman, you can just have the right footwear.

This brings a scientific perspective to the idea that a special pair of boots with a bit of flair can be the perfect way to draw the eyes of women without coming off like you are insecure or trying overly hard.

Bonus peacocking accessory: the cowboy hat

If you’re going out in the American south, you may want to add a sharp-looking cowboy hat to your boots, since “Cowboy chic” is a common style seen at the bars and honkytonks. Your hat can also be used in non-southern cities to attract girls to you and add to your individual vibe.

Where to get them?

One of the best options out there is my store, Botas Locas. There you can browse many sizes and styles of boots for all occasions, as well as cowboy hats at low prices. We offer free returns and free shipping. Click here to visit us and set yourself up with the perfect accessory for work or leisure.

The Wisdom Of Mao Tse Tung

On Guerrilla Warfare is a collection of essays, speeches, and communiques by Mao Tse Tung, who ushered in communism in China after decades of fighting as a heavy underdog starting in the early 20th century. He is arguably the most important man in China's recent history.

What drew me to this book is to learn exactly how he did it. How did he go from being a member of the rag-tag Chinese communist party with a small membership to eventually overthrowing the Western-backed Chiang Kai-shek after World War 2? The answer lies in time, extraordinary persistence, and genius. The below excerpts highlight the best components of his strategy.

His goal

> According to the directives of the Communist International and the Central Committee of our Party, the content of China's democratic revolution consists in overthrowing the rule of imperialism and its warlord tools in China so as to > complete the national revolution, and in carrying out the agrarian revolution so as to eliminate the feudal exploitation of the peasants by the landlord class.

Overall strategy

> …strategy must be one of gradual advance. In such a period, the worst thing in military affairs is to divide our forces for an adventurous advance, and the worst thing in local work (distributing land, establishing political power, expanding the Party and organizing local armed forces) is to scatter our personnel and neglect to lay a solid foundation in the central districts.
> …[the communist party's] survival and growth require the following conditions: (1) a sound mass base, (2) a sound Party organization, (3) a fairly strong Red Army, (4) terrain favourable to military operations, and (5) economic resources sufficient for sustenance.
> After receiving political education, the Red Army soldiers have become class-conscious, learned the essentials of distributing land, setting up political power, arming the workers and peasants, etc., and they know they are fighting for themselves, for the working class and the peasantry. Hence they can endure the hardships of the bitter struggle without complaint.
> Any passivity, however, is a disadvantage, and one must strive hard to shake it off. Militarily, the way to do so is resolutely to wage quick-decision offensive warfare on exterior lines, to launch guerrilla warfare in the rear of the enemy and so secure overwhelming local superiority and initiative in many campaigns of mobile and guerrilla warfare.
> In ancient warfare, the spear and the shield were used, the spear to attack and destroy the enemy, and the shield to defend and preserve oneself. To the present day, all weapons are still an extension of the spear and the shield. The bomber, the machine-gun, the long-range gun and poison gas are developments of the spear, while the air-raid shelter, the steel helmet, the concrete fortification and the gas mask are developments of the shield.
> …the basic principle of guerrilla warfare must be the offensive, and guerrilla warfare is more offensive in its character than regular warfare. The offensive, moreover, must take the form of surprise attacks, and to expose ourselves by ostentatiously parading our forces is even less permissible in guerrilla warfare than in regular warfare. From the fact that the enemy is strong and we are weak it necessarily follows that, in guerrilla operations in general even more than in > regular warfare, battles must be decided quickly, though on some occasions guerrilla fighting may be kept up for several days, as in an assault on a small and isolated enemy force cut off from help.

> In real life, we cannot ask for “ever-victorious generals”, who are few and far between in history. What we can ask for is generals who are brave and sagacious and who normally win their battles in the course of a war, generals who combine wisdom with courage. To become both wise and courageous one must acquire a method, a method to be employed in learning as well as in applying what has been learned.
> Weapons are an important factor in war, but not the decisive factor; it is people, not things, that are decisive. The contest of strength is not only a contest of military and economic power, but also a contest of human power and morale.
> …politics is war without bloodshed while war is politics with bloodshed.

Winning hearts and minds

> Apart from the role played by the Party, the reason why the Red Army has been able to carry on in spite of such poor material conditions and such frequent engagements is its practice of democracy. The officers do not beat the men; officers and men receive equal treatment, soldiers are free to hold meetings and to speak out; trivial formalities have been done away with; and the accounts are open for all to inspect. The soldiers handle the mess arrangements and, out of the daily five cents for cooking oil, salt, firewood and vegetables, they can even save a little for pocket money, amounting to roughly six or seven coppers per person per day, which is called “mess savings”. All this gives great satisfaction to the soldiers.
> The most effective method in propaganda directed at the enemy forces is to release captured soldiers and give the wounded medical treatment.

Military tactics

> …the concentration of forces to fight a numerically inferior, equal or slightly superior enemy force has often led to victory.
> The enemy advances, we retreat; the enemy camps, we harass; the enemy tires, we attack; the enemy retreats, we pursue. To extend stable base areas, employ the policy of advancing in waves; when pursued by a powerful enemy, employ the policy of circling around. Arouse the largest numbers of the masses in the > shortest possible time and by the best possible methods.

> […]
> …oppose adventurism when on the offensive, oppose conservatism when on the defensive,
> A battle of annihilation, on the other hand, produces a great and immediate impact on any enemy. Injuring all of a man's ten fingers is not as effective as chopping off one, and routing ten enemy divisions is not as effective as annihilating one of them.
> Oppose fighting merely to rout the enemy, and uphold fighting to annihilate the enemy.
> If the attacking enemy is far more numerous and much stronger than we are, we can accomplish a change in the balance of forces only when the enemy has penetrated deeply into our base area and tasted all the bitterness it holds for him.
> Whether in counter-offensives or offensives, we should always concentrate a big force to strike at one part of the enemy forces. We suffered every time we did not concentrate our troops…
> …creating misconceptions among the enemy and springing surprise attacks on him– mean transferring the uncertainties of war to the enemy while securing the greatest possible certainty for ourselves and thereby gaining superiority, the initiative and victory. Excellent organization of the masses is the prerequisite for attaining all this.

Calculated retreat

> …the object of retreat is to induce the enemy to make mistakes or to detect his mistakes. One must realize that an enemy commander, however wise, cannot avoid making some mistakes over a relatively long period of time, and hence it is always possible for us to exploit the openings he leaves us.
> A well-timed retreat, which enables us to keep all the initiative, is of great assistance to us in switching to the counter-offensive when, having reached the terminal point for our retreat, we have regrouped our forces and are waiting at our ease for the fatigued enemy.

> “Fight when you can win, move away when you can’t win”—this is the popular way of describing our mobile warfare today.
> …it is inadvisable to continue an engagement in which there is no prospect of victory.
> …to destroy the enemy means to disarm him or “deprive him of the power to resist”.

Flexible warfare

> In studying the laws for directing wars that occur at different historical stages, that differ in nature and that are waged in different places and by different nations, we must fix our attention on the characteristics and development of each, and must oppose a mechanical approach to the problem of war.
> To learn is no easy matter and to apply what one has learned is even harder. Many people appear impressive when discoursing on military science in classrooms or in books, but when it comes to actual fighting, some win battles and others lose them.
> …failure is indeed the mother of success. But it is also necessary to learn with an open mind from other people’s experience, and it is sheer “narrow empiricism” to insist on one’s own personal experience in all matters and, in its absence, to adhere stubbornly to one’s own opinions and reject other people’s experience.
> In war as well as in politics, planning only one step at a time as one goes along is a harmful way of directing matters. After each step, it is necessary to examine the ensuing concrete changes and to modify or develop one’s strategic and operational plans accordingly, or otherwise one is liable to make the mistake of rushing straight ahead regardless of danger.
> …although we must cherish the earlier experience thus acquired, we must also cherish experience acquired at the cost of our own blood.

Mao was a military historian who deeply studied past warfare, but knew that completely new tactics would have to be developed for China’s unique situation in geography and time.

Frequent smaller losses are better than big catrostrophes

> The same holds true on the question of bringing damage on the people. If you > refuse to let the pots and pans of some households be smashed over a short period of time, you will cause the smashing of the pots and pans of all the people to go on over a long period of time. If you are afraid of unfavourable short-term political repercussions, you will have to pay the price in unfavourable long-term political repercussions. After the October Revolution, if the Russian Bolsheviks had acted on the opinions of the "Left Communists" and refused to sign the peace treaty with Germany, the new-born Soviets would have been in danger of early death.

Counter-offensives

> To prepare for a counter-offensive, we must select or create conditions favourable to ourselves but unfavourable to the enemy, so as to bring about a change in the balance of forces, before we go on to the stage of the counter-offensive. In the light of our past experience, during the stage of retreat we should in general secure at least two of the following conditions before we can consider the situation as being favourable to us and unfavourable to the enemy and before we can go over to the counter-offensive. These conditions are:
> (1) The population actively supports the Red Army.
> (2) The terrain is favourable for operations.
> (3) All the main forces of the Red Army are concentrated.
> (4) The enemy's weak spots have been discovered.
> (5) The enemy has been reduced to a tired and demoralized state).
> (6) The enemy has been induced to make mistakes.

Politics

> Historically, all reactionary forces on the verge of extinction invariably conduct a last desperate struggle against the revolutionary forces, and some revolutionaries are apt to be deluded for a time by this phenomenon of outward strength but inner weakness, failing to grasp the essential fact that the enemy is nearing extinction while they themselves are approaching victory.
> This army is powerful because all its members have a discipline based on political consciousness; they have come together and they fight not for the private interests of a few individuals or a narrow clique, but for the interests of the broad masses and of the whole nation. The sole purpose of this army is to stand firmly with the Chinese people and to serve them whole-heartedly.
> We should point out that, before the abolition of capitalism, absolute equalitarianism is a mere illusion of peasants and small proprietors, and that even under socialism there can be no absolute equality, for material things will then be distributed on the principle of "from each according to his ability, to each > according to his work" as well as on that of meeting the needs of the work. The distribution of material things in the Red Army must be more or less equal, as in the case of equal pay for officers and men, because this is required by the present circumstances of the struggle. But absolute equalitarianism beyond reason must be opposed because it is not required by the struggle; on the contrary, it hinders the struggle.

The leader of Chinese communism believes in equality less than modern-day progressives.

Graduating from guerilla warfare to regular warfare

As you grow in strength and numbers, you must transition from guerilla warfare to regular warfare, where you finally have a superiority over your enemy. Your guerilla units now become infantry.

> To transform guerrilla units waging guerrilla warfare into regular forces waging mobile warfare, two conditions are necessary–an increase in numbers, and an improvement in quality. Apart from directly mobilizing the people to join the forces, increased numbers can be attained by amalgamating small units, while better quality depends on steeling the fighters and improving their weapons in the course of the war.

War with Japan

> Will China be subjugated? The answer is, No, she will not be subjugated, but will win final victory. Can China win quickly? The answer is, No, she cannot win quickly, and the war must be a protracted one. Are these conclusions correct? I think they are.
> Thus it can be seen that the protracted and far-flung War of Resistance Against Japan is a war of a jig-saw pattern militarily, politically, economically and culturally. It is a marvellous spectacle in the annals of war, a heroic undertaking by the Chinese nation, a magnificent and earth-shaking feat. This war will not only affect China and Japan, strongly impelling both to advance, but will also affect the whole world, impelling all nations, especially the oppressed nations such as India, to march forward.

Mao provides an effective strategy for underdogs to defeat a better trained, better organized, and more numerous opponent. His own victory is proof of his tactics' effectiveness, and I would be surprised to find that this text is not required reading in advanced military academies. His blow-by-blow account of revolutionary progress and setbacks even includes direct criticisms against his comrades. He honesty reveals not a bit of ego or aims for personal glory.

The book, however, was a difficult read. Though his writing improved over the years (the essays included span from 1928-1949), you'll encounter dense information that lists Chinese names and places. If you're not at all knowledgeable of Chinese history, like I was, you'll miss most of the references and be lacking in context, meaning there will be long drags of information dumps until you get to the strategy. On the bright side, you'll encounter hardly any communist propaganda. This work seemed to be intended to his fellow party members who already bought into the political program instead of the masses.

Mao was a great military and political strategist, but less skilled as a nation builder. Once in power, his policies resulted in untold suffering and death, but that shouldn't take away from the fact that he won a revolution against improbable odds. Mao's lessons should be studied today as we face our own war against a far stronger enemy.

Ex-Wife Wins Right To Sue For Alimony Twenty Years Later

Kathleen Wyatt may soon receive a lottery win. Eking out an existence through menial jobs and welfare for decades, she now has a potential ticket out: her ex-husband. They were approaching destitution when they were married, but following the divorce her ex-husband Dale Vince has become a renewable energy multimillionaire. Britain's Supreme Court has now reversed a Court of Appeal decision and allowed Wyatt to make a claim for a slice of Vince's fortune. She wants a staggering £1.9 million.

The history behind this case, when you compare it to Wyatt's current lust for Vince's money, is nothing short of astounding. Two decades ago, when the marriage had already crumbled, it was established that Vince lacked any financial means for alimony or a settlement.

The couple had actually ceased co-habiting and separated years before the divorce. After leaving her, Vince travelled incessantly in a refitted ambulance and fire engine for close to a decade, literally living the existence of a hippie.

Vince created his now £57 million wind energy company in 1996, four years after the 1992 divorce and a decade after the separation. It then took some twenty years for the firm to reach its present prosperity, which makes it thirty years since the original parting.

Less ugly, less made-up versions of Kathleen Wyatt.

Pure madness

Many legal analysts are playing down the impact of the Kathleen Wyatt decision. But the implications are clear: the law gives legitimacy to claims that women require financial rescuing years after separation and regardless of whether the man had assets during the marriage.

Imagine a couple, aged in their early thirties, who decide to divorce. The man is a recently graduated physician, working in a major hospital as a junior registrar. The wife earns less, as a paralegal, teacher, nurse, interior designer or minor administration official or clerk.

At the time of the divorce, no formal division of assets occurs. The couple may just be overjoyed to see the back of each other, or both feel there are no substantial joint assets to partition. On the happier and more reasonable side, the woman may concur that the man, as a result of his career choices relative to hers, deserves to keep the bulk of the marital treasure trove he earned.

This new development in the UK demonstrates, however, that a woman is either free to change her mind or can sit on her hands for decades. She may even strategically avoid making a claim in her youth or early middle-age to maximize a subsequent payout.

[image]
Now you can wait twenty to thirty years to financially stab your ex-husband.

But it gets worse…

The ex-husband's earning capacity, while well above average now, will only increase over time. After sufficient years honing his practical, as opposed to university, credentials, he may branch out into specialist medicine or join a surgery as an owner-partner.

Our hypothetical man could be 53, married to his second wife and have four children (some going through college), and along comes the first wife wanting a free ride. The successful doctor has a thriving practice, $1.5 million in the bank and other high liquidity assets, and another $4 million in property and other assets. He then loses what it takes the first wife to earn in fifteen years, plus lawyering costs.

Inasmuch as I sympathize with Mr. Vince's predicament, clearly he will not be (financially) devastated by even a £1.9 million payout. Thankfully but not completely reassuringly, one of the Supreme Court judges described that sum as a ludicrous amount. The real risk is for those in the middle and upper-middle classes, for whom a mere $100,000 payout would represent a proportionally calamitous outcome. The legal fight to ward off such a payout might double the total financial losses of an historical ex-husband.

What if Dale Vince had gone bankrupt?

Dale Vince could have founded his company, built it up to £100 million in two years and then saw his dreams go bust before his very eyes. He might have ended up £15 million in debt. Could Vince have claimed financial support from his ex-wife at that point, let alone two decades later? Of course not.

It would have been a similar story for billionaire Donald Trump. His first wife Ivana took him to the cleaners in the early 1990s but could Donald have claimed from her when he was in business bankruptcy and close to personal bankruptcy around the same time? Nope, nada, not in a billion years.

The asymmetry of court systems, both in their basic discrimination against men and the selectivity with which they develop legal doctrine (interpretation does change law, especially in the Commonwealth nations), would never allow such a pro-male scenario to take place.

An artist's rendition of a modern family court.

Women still insist on a free feminist lunch

The modern court system is replete with morally frivolous claims by underachieving ex-wives wanting an “income.” It is bad enough that socialite or simply less hardworking women immediately put their foot on a chunk or the majority of a man’s wealth at the time of a divorce. The supreme indulgence (pun intended) bestowed on Kathleen Wyatt this week only shifts the divorce court parameters from delusional to intensely hallucinogenic.

Men have been third-rate inhabitants of family courtrooms for more than an era. “Fathers” such as Carnell Alexander, whom I discussed late last month, are penalized for not meeting legal deadlines and forced to pay for another man’s baby after the mother and court official have blatantly lied or essentially disappeared. But deadbeat ex-wives are now being given the opportunity to legally scam an ex-partner out of newly acquired riches years after the couple parted ways.

We’ll know from online British newspapers if Kathleen Wyatt is ultimately successful in both her £1.9 million bid or in getting any money at all. Whatever the case, she deserves nothing but our collective contempt.

How Political Correctness Killed 1,200 People

March 13, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Hi, my name's Hobbes, and I'm a recovering social justice warrior.

Yes yes, I admit it. I used to be a big leftie. When I was growing up, John Howard and George Bush were monsters. Conservatives were racist pricks, and evil corporations were destroying the world's environment. I could show you pictures of me at a slutwalk as a teenager.

They say a conservative is a liberal who's been mugged. My disillusionment with the world, however, perhaps began with the growing disaster that was Australia's refugee policy post-2007.

The Inmates Take Over The Asylum

Under the conservative Howard government (1996-2007) asylum seekers arriving by boat were compulsorily locked up in offshore camps on islands such as Nauru in what was known as the "Pacific Solution."

For years the Labor Party kept hammering the Liberals on the issue – "Oh, won't somebody please think of the children!" By the time the Rudd–Gillard government came to power in 2007, public opinion was firmly against the policy.

To me, it seemed simple. What inhumanity could compel us to indefinitely lock up thousands of innocent people whose only crime was fleeing persecution to seek a better life? One could see it as the ultimate test of compassion against prejudice, of emotional thinking against cool reason.

Looking back, I can only express embarrassment at how stupid we were, and how obvious the resulting disaster was.

Opening up our borders had two main effects. Firstly, the number of boat people – which had all but stopped for the last six years of the Howard government, skyrocketed to record levels. Fifty thousand entered the country in the next six years.

Secondly, and most tragically, deaths at sea resumed, and quickly grew worse than ever.

This had happened earlier on in the Howard government, when leftist politicians and journalists had screamed daily about the inhumanity of policing our borders. Now that it was happening under a Labor government however, they were suspiciously silent.

In Australia, as in America, the left likes to think they have a monopoly over the media, but Australia's most widely read columnist is actually Herald Sun writer Andrew Bolt. As early as 2010, he was giving blunt descriptions of the tragedy –

> WHERE are they now, those hypocrites who once noisily wept over John Howard's "cruelty" to boat people?
> In January last year, at least nine people drowned off the Indonesian island of Rote as they tried to sail to Ashmore Reef. Indonesian police said the dead included a nine-year-old boy.
> In April that year, another nine died, this time in the South China Sea. The lone > survivor was 14-year-old Aqeel Qirkeel, who'd tried to save his mother by tying her to him with his shirt.

> Also that month, five Afghans died when they blew up their boat at Ashmore Reef to stop our navy from turning them back.
> In May, 19 more died when an Indonesian boat taking them to Australia sank off Halang Island.
> On October 2, a ship carrying 100 asylum seekers left an Indonesian port, bound for Australia, and has not been seen since.
> Last November, 12 Sri Lankans drowned off Cocos Island when their boat sank.
> Last month, another five died off the Cocos Islands when their boat broke down, also en route to Australia.

Six months later, in what was perhaps the most visible incident, another boat smashed up against the rocks on Christmas Island.

Thirty bodies were recovered from the water, twenty others were missing. A year later, another boat capsized off East Java, more than 200 drowned.

By 2012, almost one boat was sinking or going missing a month, with more than 400 believed dead. In the last six months of the Labor government, plus the immediate aftermath, seven more boats sunk.

On this goes, page after page – men, women and children, drowned at sea on rickety, barely seaworthy boats. Of course, Rudd and Gillard weren't personally responsible for each sinking, but they were warned, repeatedly, of what would happen. They chose politics over human life, in a manner far more soulless than the conservative politicians they love to laud their moral credentials over.

For years, we tried to rationalize these deaths. There were more conflicts overseas, civil wars in Sri Lanka and Syria – maybe that was driving the rise? Maybe it was just the fault of evil people smugglers, who Labor so demonized? How could we return to the Pacific Solution, against which we had staked all moral capital?

The House Comes Crashing Down

It took five years, but the electorate eventually woke up to this slow motion catastrophe, booting the Labor government out of office in 2013. Yet the grand total, over six years of "compassion" was at least 1,200 people, drowned or smashed up against one reef or another. In the last six years of the Howard government, this figure was zero. It was entirely preventable.

The new Abbott government, under the wanky-sounding but effective "Operation Sovereign Borders" re-implented the strategies of the Howard government. Three hundred boats carrying over 20,000 people had arrived in 2013. In 2014, the same figure was just one boat. Deaths at sea again went to zero, with total deaths in custody at five.

Not only did 1,200 die from the ending of the Pacific Solution, but 50,000 other people – those trapped in more dire need in refugee camps overseas, and perhaps more willing to integrate, were skipped over.

Australia maintains a set refugee intake, regardless of the source. Instead of hand-picking refugees overseas, assessing those who needed help the most and would assimilate into our society best, then safely flying them here for resettlement, we lured tens of thousands to jump the queue and pay people smugglers to transport them here on rickety boats.

The cost of processing them all also blew out into the billions of dollars. It was a double, triple, quadruple-whammy of stupidity, driven entirely by "feelings" rather than reason. For years I refused to believe it, but with a growing horror of realization, the true nature of the Labor Party now sits there, staring us in the face.

These people don't give a shit about refugees.

They don't give a shit about helping people, or making the world a better place.

They are interested in their own power, and that alone. They are perfectly happy to use the hysterical, hamster-brained left in Australia to further their own agenda. They are fully aware that what they are doing is disastrous, but they just don't care.

But the worst part of this entire fiasco?

Return Of The Hamster?

To their credit, since the last election Labor has quietly backpeddled on asylum seekers, admitting that they screwed up royally and will probably keep the current policies when they return to government.

But amazingly, there are still people calling for an end to offshore detention. At 10-15% of the vote, the Greens are Australia's third largest party. Senator Sarah Hanson-Young – Australia's answer to Wendy Davis, recently called the Abbott government "morally bankrupt" and its life-saving policies a "politically motivated cruelty campaign."

Yes—because preventing the deaths of hundreds more people at sea rather than giving in to your hurt feelings is moral bankruptcy.

The hamster is strong in this one

We all know political tides shift, that parties are elected in cycles. Give it another five or ten years, they'll be another Labor government in power, perhaps once more piggybacking on the Greens.

We can only hope by then the current generation of totally soulless politicians has moved on, and that they don't get another opportunity to open up our borders and play with human life in the name of "compassion."

Never again, Australia.

5 Reasons She Is That Type Of Girl

March 13, 2015 | by Dave Perrotta | Link | Original Link

Every guy wants to meet their definition of success with women, whether that be sleeping with a ton of girls, finding a high-quality girlfriend, or just feeling like and overall BOSS around the opposite sex.

But all too often, guys don't reach their definition of success. Why? One of the biggest reasons has to do with their limiting beliefs about women.

Here's the tough part, though—most times, guys don't even recognize these limiting beliefs. They float under the surface, and become underlying assumptions that affect the majority of their interactions.

Limiting beliefs like:

- "She won't sleep with me on the first date or same night."
- "She's not the type of girl to just give out her number."
- "She probably has a boyfriend, she won't be interested."
- "She's too innocent. She wouldn't want to grab a drink with a random guy at a bar."

The list goes on and on. They're harmful, because they prevent guys from taking action and pushing the interaction further.Most of these limiting beliefs can be narrowed down to one thing:

"She's not 'that type' of girl."

If you've ever caught yourself in the midst of a limiting thought, you might know what I'm talking about. You realize that you've created a story about the girl in your head based on lofty assumptions, and you're allowing this "story" to direct the interaction.

But here's the thing: odds are, she probably IS "that type" of girl. If you do the right things and exude the qualities of an attractive man, there's no reason why she won't give you her phone number, sleep with you the first night, grab a drink with you, or go home with you.

However, if you're stuck believing that she's not "that type" of girl, you probably won't even go for it. So, let's crush those limiting beliefs with sound logic, so you can start pushing interactions, and reach your definition of success with women. Here are five reasons why she probably is that type of girl:

1. She's probably had a one-night stand

A study by The Daily Mail found that nearly half of all women in their 20s have had a one-night stand, and the figure for those in their 30s and 40s was nearly as high. Furthering this point, a study by MissTravel.com of over 30,000 women showed that over 40% of women admitted to having a one-night stand on vacation (and think of how short those 1-2 week vacations usually last).

So, no matter how innocent she might seem, there's at least a 50/50 shot she's slept with a guy the first night of meeting him…and honestly, since these are self-report surveys, it's probably even a bit higher than that.

And even if she hasn't had a one-night stand yet, that doesn't necessarily mean she's opposed to the idea—she just hasn't met a dude with the boldness to go for it and the social intelligence to not screw it up.

2. She likes sex as much as (or more than) you

Women enjoy sex, watch porn, and have a high sex drive. The idea that men crave sex more than women is a myth.

In a study of over 1500 women, 88.4% said they are easily sexually aroused, nearly 75% said they like to have sex once a day, over 80% said they enjoy masturbating to orgasm, and over 90% don't feel guilty about it afterward.

Add to that the recent popularity of 50 Shades of Grey, and it's clear—women enjoy sex (and think about it) A LOT.

And there's nothing wrong with that. Sex is awesome. You enjoy it, and even if you convince yourself she "seems too innocent," she definitely enjoys it just as much.

3. She just got out of a relationship (or she's not looking for one)

While this doesn't include all women, there is a chance she's on the rebound, or she's just not looking for a relationship in the first place. She's in the "have fun and be free" phase of her life, and is very open to meeting a cool new guy if he comes along.

There are many women like this, especially in their 20s, especially very intelligent women who are focused on their careers. Some of the most promiscuous women I've met are Ivy League students and those in high-paying and demanding jobs.

You might think these types of women would not be "that type" of girl, but you'd be sorely mistaken. These types of women feel like they don't have the time to commit to an exclusive relationship, but they do need that "release" and to have a little fun. You just need to step up and bring them into your awesome night.

4. She wants to prove to herself that she's worthy of men

At some point in your process of "getting good" with women, you'll probably get quite a bit of validation from sleeping around (maybe you're in this stage now, and that's okay). I know for me, this lasted for a few years in my early twenties. Sleeping with women gave me a sense of false wholeness, like "Okay, I can do this. Now, I'm a man. Now I'm cool."

Eventually, you get past that point and realize that external validation is fleeting and unfulfilling, and internal validation is key (accepting and loving yourself). But it lurks its ugly head once in awhile, even if you feel like you're "past it"—it's a part of human nature.

Women experience the same need for validation from men, especially those on the more insecure end of the spectrum.

5. Because you assume it

This one is more based on what you do than anything she does. Instead of assuming she's "not that type of girl" when asking for her phone number, trying to bring her home, etc., assume the opposite. Assume she is exactly the type of girl to do that, and she's just waiting on (and hoping for) you to make the move.

There's some truth to the idea that "what you focus on expands." You'll have a much better chance at reaching success with women when you assume the best, instead of vice versa.

“Yes Means Yes” Comes To London

March 13, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

“Hard cases make bad law.”
-US Surpeme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes

When California’s “Yes Means Yes” law was passed last fall, much speculation took place throughout the manophere and beyond; the general consensus seemed to be that it was only the beginning in what would be a society-wide change in relations between men and women.

From the looks of things over the past week, it looks like the speculators were right.

Appearing in the London Telegraph, Director of Public Prosecutions Ms. Alison Saunders said that it was time that the British legal system moved beyond “no means no” in order to curtail rape and sexual assault:

> “Alison Saunders said rape victims should no longer be “blamed” by society if they are too drunk to consent to sex, or if they simply freeze and say nothing because they are terrified of their attacker.
> Instead, police and prosecutors must now put a greater onus on rape suspects to demonstrate how the complainant had consented “with full capacity and freedom to do so”.
> Campaigners described the move as “a huge step forward” in ensuring fewer rapists escape justice.”

Ms. Saunders continues:

> "For too long society has blamed rape victims for confusing the issue of consent – by drinking or dressing provocatively for example – but it is not they who are confused, it is society itself and we must challenge that.
> "Consent to sexual activity is not a grey area – in law it is clearly defined and must be given fully and freely.
> "It is not a crime to drink, but it is a crime for a rapist to target someone who is no longer capable of consenting to sex though drink.
> "These tools take us well beyond the old saying 'no means no' – it is now well established that many rape victims freeze rather than fight as a protective and coping mechanism.
> "We want police and prosecutors to make sure they ask in every case where consent is the issue – how did the suspect know the complainant was saying yes and doing so freely and knowingly?"

Ms. Saunders goes on to point out that these new laws will also target teachers, employers, doctors, even gangbangers – again, giving credence to speculations about YMY going well beyond the American college campus, and even well beyond America's borders itself.

I'm no expert in British common law, but here in the states the age-old standard of innocent until proven guilty is being horribly changed with YMY – a standard that has protected the rights of the individual against the predations of the state, or in the case of the UK I suppose, the sovereign.

As RooshV himself noted in his excellent article "What is a Social Justice Warrior?", people like Saunders and their many allies in academia, law, media and entertainment – what we in the manosphere recognize as the Cathedral – want to erode if not outright destroy time-honored Western traditions such as the rule of law, due process rights, and the protection of the individual and the minority against the state and mob rule.

Writing for the men's issues blog collective Just Four Guys, Mr. Deti lays out the following scenarios we are all likely to see as a direct result of YMY going viral, even global:

> "The Long Range Effects of Yes Means Yes
> 1. This law is clearly intended to have a chilling effect on all sexual activity. This law will discourage the formation and development of relationships leading to marriage. It is intended to deter and discourage less attractive men from attempting sexual conduct with any women, and it will have that effect. Marriages will decrease, as men who might have made good matches with certain women will withdraw even further into porn, video games and minimum wage jobs. Men who might have tried before will give up trying. Lesser alphas, betas and deltas cannot run the risk of an attempted encounter going bad. They can't run the risk of job loss, university expulsion, lawyer fees and social stigma.
> 4. Men who do engage in sex will increasingly video record every sexual > encounter. They'll save every sext, every text, every selfie, every nudie — because they're all evidence of a relationship and help establish "affirmative consent". Men will get increasingly aggressive in gathering and saving evidence of consent, and will not hesitate to deploy their evidence in response to threats of "sexual assault" claims.

> 6. Marriage? Forget about it. That will increasingly become the province of the Upper Middle Class and Upper Classes. None of the top 15% of men (the only ones willing to participate) will offer marriage to any woman, no matter how attractive or valuable. They won't have to. For every extremely attractive HB 9 or 10, there'll be an ever-increasingly deep backbench of HB 7s and 8s who will go from "hi" to "sexy time" in a couple of hours, for far less effort. The top men will continue to clean up, and they'll never marry. The bottom 85% of men won't even be in the marketplace."

Indeed, for the black community in particular here in the states, nd dare I say over in the UK, YMY will be the coup de grace to a state of affairs that have been at their lowest point since Reconstruction.

There has been a long-running debate—some might even call a "war"— between the MGTOW and PUA factions of the manosphere. Both sides make legitimate points in my view, and their bickering is, again in my opinion, more counterproductive than not.

What these latest developments coming out of the UK shows all of us is that no matter where you fall on the manospherian spectrum, if you're a guy, you're in the crosshairs—a suspected rapist, guilty until proven innocent, the standards of which are exceedingly difficult to meet and can be changed on a whim, at any time. Whether you choose to engage women at all, or whether you choose to drop out, it's all the same in the final accounting – just by merely being a man, you're suspect, if not guilty.

Flawed Blue Pill Interpretation Of Religion Covertly Pedestalizes Women

What is life? I'm sure most of you would have different answers when it comes to defining life, based on your personal experiences and the lessons that you've learned through your respective lives so far.

As to how I would define it: Life is a test, a continuous struggle which every man – either poor or rich, successful or loser – has to endure. That's also how one would understand it in the context of most religions. We have been created to be tested – and we have been tested, are being tested, and will continue to be tested—for no man can escape the tests that life continually throws at us during the duration of our earthly existence.

But one of the most important and fundamental tests we face in our earthly existence is with regards to our faith, and the veracity of our beliefs. I'm sure at some point of our lives, we all go through periods of intense self reflection—either voluntary or forced on us by circumstances—which leads us to ask some of the following questions to ourselves:

- What is the purpose of our lives?
- Why are we here? Who put us here?
- Where are we going to go after we die?
- Nature reveals structure and balance, but who designed it?
- Our bodies reveal structure and balance, but who designed it?
- What is the wisdom behind the creation of the universe, and our existence?

Usually, in the search for these answers, we usually encounter the entry of religion or organized faith in our lives. Religion can liberate us, or it can shackle us indefinitely. And at the same time, as compared to other forms of beta indoctrination of men, its power is far more vast and long lasting.

The power of religious indoctrination

If there is one type of ideology which continues to hold supreme in human history, it is that of religious ideology. The power of religion is a prime example of the undeniable power of belief or faith when it comes to influencing human behavior. Robert Greene effectively postulates how the power of belief can be exploited to attain power in The 48 Laws Of Power with Law 27:

> PLAY ON PEOPLE'S NEED TO BELIEVE TO CREATE A CULT-LIKE FOLLOWING
> People have an overwhelming desire to believe in something. Become the focal point of such desire by offering them a cause, a new faith to follow. Keep your words vague but full of mist; emphasize enthusiasm over rationality and clear thinking. Give your new disciples rituals to perform, ask them to make sacrifices on your behalf In the absence of organized religion and grand causes, your new belief system will bring you untold power.

It's equally undeniable to see the effect of the above law in its influence of humanity right from antiquity—either for good or worse—as flawed human nature encompasses those who practice religion, to those who don't practice it, to those who preach it, and to those who interpret it. Everyone is thus exposed to the great danger of religious misinterpretation of scriptures, which primarily affects the "believers."

Sometimes, these religious misinterpretations results in disillusionment and disappointment to men who've been misguided by it. But at the same time, a vast number continue to remain unaware, because they remain unplugged to their personal blue pill religious matrix.

Religion thus often gets a bad rap from both the insincere practicing of it by some followers, and at the same time from the overzealous blind fanaticism of its other followers. The irony might be that the scripture itself may not be flawed to begin with, as compared to its interpretation.

This problem of flawed scriptural interpretation leads to another problem for men: how the scripture pertains to dealing with, and correctly perceiving women.

The deification of women and the gradual feminization of modern patriarchal religions

The red pill has saved many men, and continues to save many others especially when it comes to their interactions with women. Not only has it made us aware of the true nature of women, it has also exposed us to the frailties and flaws of women, rendering them more human than ever before in our eyes, stripping them of the unnecessary deification and pedestalization what modern feminist societies accords them with.

In fact, in today's world more than ever before, red pill knowledge effectively teaches an often important realization to men in exercising power over the hordes of others: if a man learns to control the women he's dealing with, he could possibly and effectively control the men who are linked to these women.

Moving to the topic of religion, one finds that the deification of women existed since antiquity. While we might surmise that calling women "goddesses" is stupidity to begin with, primitive pagan religions deified women to a surreal form, which possibly entailed beta indoctrination for the men.

Pussy worship has thus existed both literally and metaphorically throughout human history, and in such cultures it was not uncommon to see a multitude of beta males worshiping the female form. Call a woman as Athena, Aphrodite, or whatever other fancy name—logically speaking why would (or should) a man worship a form his body has been designed to sexually penetrate to begin with?

Yet, even when venturing in the domain of organized patriarchal religions, sometimes I've experienced tremendous confusion and glaring contradictions in scriptural interpretation about the purpose of creation of women and their utility, even though the actual meaning of the scriptures might be actually red pill in reality. But the flawed interpretation radically distorts the actual meaning.

Much of the blame for this goes on to the blue pill leaders of modern organized religion, who seek to beta indoctrinate modern men through it. As flawed medical knowledge may destroy a person's body, similarly flawed religious knowledge might destroy a person's faith.

Examining scriptures of most patriarchal religions, the more I've read and understood them, the more I come to one realization: women are created solely for the reasons of procreation, and that of testing men. Every happiness that a man may obtain from women – whether it may be sex, children, companionship, or support – are all transitory, and subject to change.

Man's true happiness and contentment comes from a loyal spiritual connection to a divine source which is omnipotent, and more importantly, infinite. This lends psychological stability and satisfaction to a human nature designed to constantly seek gratification in an equally ever-changing earthly world.

At the same time, if God hadn't created and programmed the all-powerful sexual impulse in man, the purpose of creating women would itself be useless and worthless. Would a man be willing to sacrifice his resources, ideals, reputation, and dignity for something he wouldn't want to fuck? Probably not. Human history is testament to that – men have usually sacrificed themselves for the sake of women as Napoleon Hill points out in Think and Grow Rich:

> So strong and impelling is the desire for sexual contact that men freely run the risk of life and reputation to indulge it. – Napoleon Hill

Thus, women should be actually grateful for the fact that men are inherently programmed to have sex with them to begin with. If men weren't, a woman's vagina would not be the most overpriced commodity in the world, and would not serve as well to manipulate men today. It has always been the one thing for which men pay for with their resources, time, efforts, reputation, and sometimes even lives.

Always testing

Right from the time of Adam, women have been testing men – the Bible itself has so many examples of women who've led men astray from spiritual evolution, and sometimes to their literal doom. This usually occurs when men choose unconsciously women as their deities who would reward sex and companionship in return for male submission.

But at the same time, the most difficult "blue pill" concepts of even a supposedly red pill patriarchal religion to accept are when men are divinely commanded to be "patient" with women. If women are indeed a blessing for men, the questions which kept harassing my mind were:

- Does God want man to be a scapegoat for a woman's wiles and stupidity, in spite of her numerous flaws in character and behavior?

- Why does man have to be “patient” with a fellow creature which could possibly hurt his spiritual, intellectual and moral evolution in the long run? Simply because it bears a vagina?
- Is woman really a blessing, or is a woman in reality an aesthetically appealing test (or worse, curse and source of punishment) for men – considering the innate selfishness and ingratitude of women, unchained by in modern times by the ‘religion’ of feminism?

The more I see it, the more I realize that God’s purpose of creating women was solely to test man with them, in the earthly evolution of human masculinity, and of male belief towards Him in spite of the illusionary distractions women might subject men to.

But how many realize this throughout their lives, and struggle to pass these tests? Some men don’t even manage to realize this due to the misleading interpretations of the scriptures, leading men to perceive women in an unreal, blue pill way.

Conclusion

Religion remains an undeniable force in influencing human psychology and behavior. But should we follow religion blindly even when it entails blue pill ignorance at the end? This is a question every believer and non-believer should ask themselves, when it comes to examining faith, or lack of it.

And in today’s world of lies and illusions, it becomes even more important for a “believing” man to examine his beliefs towards life, his relationships, and more so the doctrines which deal with his interaction and perception of women—for even religious misinterpretation of red pill religious doctrines is enough to lead a life of servitude to women, especially when female deification is increasingly promoted both religiously and socially in modern feminist societies.

Even supposedly red pill religions which accept the superiority of men over women are not immune to the gross misinterpretations of religious scriptures to covertly promote feminist ideology. So red pillers need to particularly beware and judge these interpretations closely and correctly, to avoid falling prey to this. This is where religion could fail the modern man: not because of the scripture itself, but more so because of its interpretation.

In the end, the question remains: if a religion teaches men dependency by seeking personal fulfillment—more so spiritual and emotional—through women, is it a red pill religion to begin with?

Material Success In Modern Times Measures Nothing

March 14, 2015 | by Elrit Frisia | Link | Original Link

Many of us have lived our lives under the impressionable belief that success must always be at the hanging end of our every endeavor. Like a child that scurries back home to his mother after a frightful scold by the neighborhood grump, every time we are plunged into the occasionally forced social interaction, our guiding principle of self-worth becomes irreversibly tied into how successful we perceive we are in relation to everyone else around us. And scarcely do we pause to wonder the damned meaning of it all.

In the noted absence of traditional societal norms, it is to no surprise that, where once great meaning and purpose proudly stood at the height of a man's shoulders, now miserly and exaggerated displays of material and social excess reign supreme: empty valuations for an equally empty people.

Under modernity, collective priorities have completely shifted from the community to the individual. This leaves the question of larger-scale morality abandoned in a marketplace of free ideas, one in which we cannot reasonably expect to overtake the monumental giants of human avarice, selfishness, narcissism, and egotistical idealism.

In the market of morals, money and self-interest will always be the highest royalty.

Faith, we decided, was nothing more than the folly of men for delusion; tradition we concluded, an offender to all that we now call justice. And history? History, a burden on our backs, a guilt to be never forgotten, and a wound to be continuously sprinkled with the salt of our slobbery tongues.

No longer can a man's silence be taken for wisdom, nor his serenity for prudence; all must dance on this wheeling globe of pretend, spinning endlessly into nowhere, or risk rapidly falling out of relevance and living unremarkably by the standards of our day.

But should we be concerned with the standards that now seem to burden our every aspiration? Should we sweat and worry and toil to meet a manner of living that, prior to the late 20th century, would have been considered decadent by any sufficiently civilized European society? Is it not enough to live comfortably and within our current means and slowly but surely strive for more, but with an air of good sense and grace?

Freedom Without Responsibility Creates A Moral Vacuum

A civil contract is not the only thing torn in a divorce.

The thing about modernity is that with every freedom to man granted, he remains stripped away of his usual duties, many of his roles, and consequently much of his purpose. Suddenly much of what man knew for the entirety of his evolutionary process is simply a “construct,” he is informed. All of the urges he feels, the thoughts he endures, and the way that comes natural to him is alien to what is now “right” and “proper” to civilized society.

Masculinity becomes unsightly, a ghastly little wisp to be quietly tucked in under the sensible man’s buttoned-up dress shirt and brightly-colored khakis, only to be brought out by the wife on command when she tires of the usual, unexciting sexual fare and fantasizes about being ravaged by an eccentric, domineering billionaire with an unapologetic sense of self and an untamed character.

Now with no greater moral north to cling to, success is measured by what you can obtain on the Earth, and who has the most of it. There is little space for abstract virtue and boring modesty, because that’s all relative anyways! And thus we are thrust upon the middle-class olympics, in which we watch (and are encouraged to follow) the overworked suburbanites enslave themselves into perpetual debt to live a lifestyle they can’t afford, with money they can’t pay back, with time they don’t have, and relationships they can’t keep alive.

Not even for the sake of their children, who grow up lacking the most fundamental human affection and approval despite not missing one single plate of food or the latest iPhone device on the market—the very definition of excess for the sake of excess, but in all else: poverty.

We took the simplicity out of living and turned it into a mass-produced, micro-transactional, sugar-saddled machine, complete with all the ills that come accompanied by a meaningless existence based on desperately outcompeting one another: widespread depression, constant high-stress, and an increasingly superficial personality centered on an almost child-like narcissism that could rival the gravitational pull of our great star, the Sun.

All of this further amplified by the constant rush and isolating comfort of technology and infinite media-on-demand that seems to work more to keep us from thinking than helping us think at all. Contemplation has become strange, introspection unglamorous, and all forms of sensible planning have been thrown to the wind in favor of any light gust of emotion that might suggest we need obtain yet another thing to achieve completeness.

And then we let these people define success for us, and we are left at a loss as to why our lives aren't as successful as we hoped them to be. What's worse, their success isn't real, we find out. It is a farce designed to fool everyone but themselves, a curtain they put on when the audience comes to watch but when one peeks behind, the stage is in shambles, the actors are out of character, and the water cooler is full of hot air.

Do not be deceived by the theatrics of these impostors, and seek rather the meaningful and the virtuous, to the extent that you can define your own authentic metric of success that makes headway for the goals you have set for yourself as a man, that is what it means to succeed.

Success Cannot Be Bought At The Store, Nor Can It Be Shipped Off In Lofty White Boxes, It Must Be Endured

All other available measures of success offered to us today are empty, and racing against the limp for a shot at passing human envy and pathetic vainglory is not worth the caloric expenditure or your finite allowance of time on this planet.

Alas, without faith, community, or country to pledge your life to, what remains is what should always have come first for a fully realized individual: yourself. And it is this self, that once cultivated, will make you (with most certainty) the most truly successful person in the modern room.

Is This “Inspiration To Women” Faking Cancer And Stealing Hundreds Of Thousands Of Dollars?

March 15, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Belle Gibson has been outed as a likely charity scammer and cancer faker, failing to pass on at least $300,000 in promised donations from her nutrition business. The non-medically qualified Gibson previously “developed” The Whole Pantry food recipe app, which exhorts cancer sufferers and others to dispense with conventional medicine such as chemotherapy and follow only a rigorous whole foods diet.

The Australian woman claims that this approach saved her from terminal brain cancer, cancer she has blamed on “the government.” Medical professionals and the media are now finding countless holes in her cancer story and uncovering a purported life of luxury. Other secrets include her fanatical opposition to any form of vaccination, including ones she argues made her ill in the first place.

Gibson has received almost daily plaudits for her efforts since 2013, including Cosmopolitan‘s “Fun Fearless Female Award”. A female-oriented “Healing Belle” social media fiefdom is now firmly established, centered on The Whole Pantry app, which promised to give away “nearly all” profits to various charities. Apple enthusiastically chose the app as one of the precious few to be featured on the new Apple Watch. Belle has subsequently been exposed as a pathological liar, to the extent of even lying about her age.

Always believe the campaigning woman, no matter what

Belle Gibson’s alleged frauds, including those of the medical, financial and social variety, highlight a pernicious theme in viral or “coming from nowhere” stories. Like the absurd

Emma Sulkowicz and "Jackie" UVA rape hoaxes, a pitchfork-carrying (or, in this case, app-using) public and investigating professionals and corporate bodies are emotionalized into believing a story without question.

Why? Because women need to share their stories to encourage other women and therefore they must be true. Anyone who superficially appears to want to inspire is, ergo, inspirational. The lack of oversight and negligence of those propping up Belle was so egregious that she was on the cusp of internationally releasing her The Whole Pantry book tie-in of the app.

Unsurprisingly, the vast, vast majority of Belle's devotees have been fellow women. They worshipped her like the Whole Foods version of Baal on Mount Sinai. Without mitigating the responsibility of Belle for her own probable scamming, questions need to be asked about the beyond herd-like mentality of women following social media gurus, especially those without any proper qualifications.

Belle Gibson "found" herself followed by 200,000 people on Instagram. She released a hundred times more self-promoting photos than details about her condition and past.

If they're willing to follow a a likely scam artist, is it really surprising that they follow invented "one in five" rape statistics (later surreptitiously removed from the websites of people like US Senator Kirsten Gillibrand)? Or the menagerie of other fabricated claims and dubious stories and "statistical" information?

Who dropped the ball?

Multiple media outlets, which only saw the words "cancer," "survival," "charity," and "social media" absolved themselves of any responsibility to investigate or substantially fact-check Gibson's background. The obsession with finding "inspirational women" and “role models for girls” is so all-encompassing that such proper practices are dismissed as moral roadblocks to disseminating a wonder-story like Belle’s.

When this woman sensationally claimed in 2014 that her previously beaten cancer had returned and was ravaging her brain, spleen, uterus and liver in tandem, what media follow-up happened? Well, no one working for the same outlets seemed to bat an eyelid when she suddenly, in the aftermath of her four-cancer revelations, flew to the US to help Apple develop her app.

And no one then unearthed, or decided to publish, the innumerable indications she was driving a BMW luxury 4WD (suspicious at her faked age of 26, let alone her purported age of 23), enjoying a slew of international vacations and plastic-bingeing on $2,000 designer handbags.

Cosmopolitan was warned that Belle was a fake but, presumably like other magazines and papers, opted to continue supporting her, even generating more positive social media press for her.

Gibson alleged she had major heart surgery in 2009. Where are the scars?

A mentally unstable, anti-vaccination schoolgirl

School peers of Belle Gibson have described her as a compulsive attention-seeker who inveterately sought to “reinvent” herself as an emo, surfer girl, preppy type and God knows what else. Moreover, she endorsed a form of anti-vaccination extremism from those earliest days, which explains a late 2014 interview where she blamed her cancer on a cervical cancer vaccine. This anti-cervical cancer measure was rolled out en masse and given to young Australian women from the first decade of the 2000s.

In a shocking indictment of the diligence of Apple, Cosmopolitan, Vogue and Simon & Schuster books in supporting (and enriching) her, Gibson previously described herself as a “distinguished psychopath”. Sunday Style has been another unquestioning spruiker of Gibson, describing her as “inspirational” in an article that also reiterated her “the government gave me cancer” claims. It’s clear they, too, failed to do any homework and blatantly disregarded serious logical fallacies in her story and overall reasoning.

Her claims about the time she was originally given to live (four months) flies in the face of medical professionals solicited by The Australian newspaper, who claim they know of no one surviving the form of brain cancer capable of killing so rapidly. She has also repeatedly used incorrect terminology in describing the severity of the initial brain cancer, as if she had watched a low-brow medical drama.

For the sake of brevity, I’ve had to omit another two dozen snippets about Belle’s outlandish claims, fabrications and all-round head-turning behavior. The plethora of articles out there is almost like nothing I have seen.

This image shows “Healing Belle” but a range of photos are now surfacing showing “Beer-Drinking Belle,” “Party Belle” and “Vacation Belle”.

Is “Healing Belle” helping to kill people?

Belle Gibson is no doctor and certainly no expert. Whilst the popularity of “new age” methods reflects a widespread distrust of conventional medicine and particularly a powerful pharmaceutical industry, the idea that the typical hospital system is dangerous remains catastrophically moronic and reminiscent of Illuminati conspiracy theories.

Whatever failures in service delivery sometimes occur, chemotherapy and related cancer treatments have saved, conclusively, tens of millions of lives since their inception.

Ironically, this same ignorance is what potentially cost Steve Jobs, the founder of the company that has chosen to headline Gibson’s app, his own life. Diagnosed with pancreatic cancer, Jobs frittered away many months indulging in gimmicky Eastern medical practices at the expense of conventional treatment. By the time he took the more common (and effective) path, it was already too late.

Belle Gibson, unlike Jobs, is actively proselytizing and seeking to have people extract themselves from the conventional system. It will only lead to deaths and Gibson has in all likelihood harmed and helped shorten the lives of highly gullible people.

Is anyone actually surprised?

The quest for continual “female role models” is so retrograde in 2015 that the mantra is “believe now, don’t prove later.” Even the former dishonest method of taking a half-truth to concoct a full truth has fallen by the wayside because it doesn’t make a compelling enough story for women’s magazines and the readers of “inspirational woman” newspaper pieces.

Don’t worry, though, there’ll be another mentally ill “inspirational woman” coming in a couple of months. They always do.

How Being Fit Affects Your Social Value

March 15, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

The number one reason guys work out is to get laid. There—I said it.

Even if it's not what fuels you to hit the gym every day, don't lie—it's almost definitely the reason you got started.

The benefits of getting fit range from general health benefits like a reduced risk of contracting numerous diseases and lowered blood pressure, to aesthetic benefits like increased muscle mass and decreased body fat.

And – let's be honest – unless you're an old man you're only worried about the latter. You want to look good naked, primarily for vanity's sake. And there's nothing wrong with that.

When it comes to men, being fit means two things: having a solid amount of muscle mass and being relatively lean. It doesn't mean you're as big as a bodybuilder… And it also doesn't mean you're a skinny marathon runner. Below I'll argue that being fit is the easiest way to put yourself one step ahead of the competition when it comes to your perceived social value by both men and women.

People don't take fat people seriously

Being noticeably overweight is an easy way to limit your potential

When you see a fat man what do you think?

While you might not consciously tear him apart, the undeniable truth is that you don't take him seriously. His lack of self-control in regards to his diet and exercise have crippled him.

And you can only assume this lack of discipline affects other areas of his life. He looks like shit and he probably doesn't have his shit together, either. If you're a man, you're likely to look down upon him. If you're a woman you're likely to immediately disqualify him as a sexual partner.

In short, his social value is severely limited, even if he's an all-around boss when it comes to his career, confidence, and sense of humor. If you've let yourself go, don't get depressed by these facts, but rather use them as fuel to take back control of your body and shed that weight.

Having noticeable muscle mass is associated with confidence

At the opposite end of the spectrum of our fat friend, is the guy who you can tell clearly holds a lot of muscle, even when fully clothed. His presence demands respect from other men… And attention from women.

Building muscle takes time, but it's not that complicated – all you need to do is put on some weight and lift heavy.

When you've built a solid amount of muscle mass, you embody the principle of strength. And strength is attractive to men and women alike. It's associated with confidence and leadership. However, having muscle mass alone doesn't ensure your confidence or your social success. I think we all know a guy or two who are absolute beasts, yet are still extremely insecure.

But it does give you a step up on the competition, and this can't be ignored.

Strong posture will affect how people perceive your self-esteem

It’s relatively easy to build strong posture with a proper lifting routine

Possibly the easiest way to look stronger and more confident is to stand up straight. And while this can be done by simply being more mindful and consciously doing so, the most effective way to ensure you do this by default is to get fit.

When you incorporate the correct exercises – that strengthen your upper back and rear deltoids – into your routine, you’ll quickly stand up straighter by default.

And doing so makes you look taller, your shoulders appear wider, and your overall image that much more powerful.

It gives you a mental edge

Being fit will give you a mental edge for two key reasons:

- You know that people treat fit people with more respect – and this allows you to assume that much more confident of a mindset because of your altered expectations
- The process of working out literally improves how your body functions – for example, it lowers your heart rate and blood pressure – and these changes will make you feel more calm and in control

So, on top of the fact that other people will perceive you as more confident, you actually will be more confident. The combination of these two factors will skyrocket your social value.

…When the clothes do come off, it will turn her on

While game and confidence are needed to attract women, having a solid body helps

If and when you find yourself naked with a girl—and you have solid muscular definition—it will undoubtedly add to her sexual excitement.

It won't get her in your bed, no, but it will help once she's there. And this knowledge will similarly boost your sexual confidence when you're dealing with a girl you like with whom you want to escalate the interaction.

A Beginner’s Guide To The Pussification Of American Men

March 15, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

If you are a male who was born any time after 1960, you have been subjected to continuous efforts to make you into a big pussy. Here is how it happened.

Pussy Cartoons

Caring is important!

In the old days before the pussification campaign, cartoons for kids were pure, mindless entertainment, like Bugs Bunny. In a typical episode, Elmer Fudd would hunt Bugs in order to turn him into rabbit soup. Bugs would continuously escape Elmer by outsmarting him. There was tons of violence, but somehow we knew that we weren’t really supposed to give people exploding cigars.

If there was a “lesson” in these old-school cartoons, it was that there were bad people in the world and that you couldn’t reason with them. You could only use your wits to stay one step ahead of them.

At some point in the 1980s, people became horrified at the violence in these old-school cartoons, and they set to work creating cartoons with a more wholesome message.

A great example was the Care Bears. These chubby, multi-colored bears solved problems by getting together and "caring a lot." You might not have watched the Care Bears cartoon, but pretty much every children's cartoon that came after followed the same model. It eschewed cartoon violence and it tried to impart some valuable message.

Unlike the old-school cartoons, the newer cartoons have a definite lesson—everyone is basically good, and if you care enough, you can work through your differences.

Some pussified men think that this actually works in the real world. If you just try to understand what you did wrong that made your girlfriend cheat on you, you can make it all better. If the U.S. just talks to Iran and cares a lot, we'll have a peaceful agreement. Good luck with that.

Everybody Wins

Non-competitive musical chairs

Younger men may have grown up in the era when it became common to no longer recognize winners and losers. This happened both in elementary schools and childhood sporting events. Everybody gets a trophy or a certificate regardless of performance.

Parents nowadays are no better. They praise their special snowflake no matter what he does. I've always had the intuition that praising children for doing nothing damages them and makes them ill-equipped to handle life. Now, there is actually a study that proves it.

The Washington Post reports that parents who overvalue their children run the risk of turning them into narcissists. Narcissists "tend to be more aggressive and even violent than other people, and are at higher risk for depression, anxiety and drug addiction."

MTV

No grenades

Does MTV still exist? Seriously, if you are reading this, you probably wasted at least some of your formative years watching MTV. It turns out that MTV was one of the most powerful vehicles for pussifying the American man.

MTV achieved this by pushing the cult of permanent adolescence. It encouraged both men and women to avoid responsibility and behave like junior high school kids.

Real men achieve. Real men build. But MTV shows such as Spring Break, the Real World, and Jersey Shore taught us that the being a man meant having "experiences." In the MTV world, this means going to exotic places, drinking to excess, hooking up with slags, and generally acting like a perpetual horny thirteen-year-old.

A few MTV reality stars, like Jamie Chung, became successful. But for the majority, following the MTV lifestyle turned out to be a recipe for failure. Some of the "stars" of MTV reality shows ended up in rehab, broke, or even dead. The rest of them spent their early adulthood going from one low budget reality show to the next before sinking into obscurity.

Political Parties

You should pay for her birth control

Women vote more than men do so both political parties bend over backwards to reach women voters. They do this by focusing on issues that are supposed to be of interest to women. The Democratic Party in particular has been especially good at creating “women’s issues” that they hype in an effort to divide the electorate. The strategy has worked because women have decisively supported Democratic candidates for decades.

The result is that there is an inordinate focus on “women’s issues” in every election. Both parties celebrate the female members of their party. If you watch the conventions, women dominate the speaker rosters. Most of the campaign commercials are targeted at women.

Men who follow politics are likely to be sucked into this fake gyno-vortex and thus become pussified. If you think that the Lilly Ledbetter Act is an important piece of legislation that helps anybody except trial lawyers, you have succumbed.

Absent Fathers

Absent father who later overcame his wimpy qualities to become a productive citizen

Traditionally, young men learn about manhood from their fathers. A boy without a father figure in his life will embark on his own search for what manhood means. Without some guidance, he is likely to go down the wrong path.

In our day, the traditional family is on the decline. While the divorce rate has remained stable at about 50%, the number of children born out of wedlock has been skyrocketing. This means more boys are growing up without male role models.

This had an effect on my own life as I came from a broken family. My real father was virtually out of the picture, and my stepfather, while being a very good man, was not a strong father figure. Unlike many boys who seek out gangs or criminal activity to make up for the lack of a strong father figure, I plunged into constant overachievement, accumulating academic degrees and certifications. It wasn’t until I had my son that I was finally able to start coming to terms with what it means to be a man.

Internet Porn

The ubiquity of internet porn has also contributed to the pussification of men. At first glance, this seems counter intuitive. Doesn't seeing thousands of vaginas make you more manly?

Unfortunately, it has the opposite effect. Men are supposed to be out in the big world trying to find a woman. Internet porn tricks our minds and bodies into thinking that we are already wildly successful in the sex department. It saps the vital energy that should be used to track down a real woman.

Internet porn has already had a devastating effect in Japan where it has contributed to the rise of "herbivore men" who find it much easier to sit in their rooms and beat off instead of pursuing a relationship with an actual female.

Also, internet dating, while not as bad as the use of internet porn, has a similar effect of robbing men of their natural face to face game and replacing it with snarky texts on a smartphone.

Conclusion

These are only some examples of factors that contributed to the pussification of men. It would take a whole book to describe the phenomenon in detail, but the exercise would not really shed much additional light.

The good news is that none of the effects of pussification are permanent. All it takes to escape the programming is to swallow the red pill (or to use the new term suggested by Roosh, embrace neomasculinity). Don't let your life revolve around women. Stop waiting for the government to fix all your problems. Have kids and give them actual guidance. Get to work as the craftsman of your own life.

15 Reasons Why Toronto Is The Worst City In North America For Men

This was article was originally published on Roosh V.

For most of my adult life, I was pretty confident that Washington DC was the worst possible city for a man to live in, but I have found a place that is worse: Toronto, Canada. Here are the reasons why…

1. Girls are more excited about getting late night food than having sex

Do you remember how excited you were as a kid on Christmas when opening up the hot toy of the season? Well that's how groups of Toronto girls act at last call when they realize it's time to stuff their face with hot dogs, poutine, or diner fare. I thought women in DC were a little weird about getting pizza after the bars close, but the women of Toronto take it to another level—they have a plan to eat junk food before they even start drinking.

2. Girls cockblock more than anywhere else in the world

Good luck trying to have a ten minute non-interrupted conversation in a bar or club if her friends are nearby. If they don’t physically pull her away from you then what happens is that a rotating gaggle of women will come to “check up” on her, as if you’re on the verge of beating or raping her in full view of everyone. I’ve never seen such baby-like behavior in the Western world. I even experienced a case where the fat friend of a girl I was talking to said that I could “proceed” with the conversation. Fuck that.

3. Girls think they are cooler than they actually are

In DC you have a bunch of lame people who think they are important because of their government job. In Toronto you have a bunch of lame people who think they are cool because… I don't know why. This is even worse because instead of trying to impress you with the work they're doing, they try to impress you with slang, name-dropping, or commenting on how "busy" they are. I remember when a girl tried to insult me by calling me a "fucktard" and another white bread girl said to "get at" her. Just because you know the words to a Drake song and go to expensive restaurants doesn't make you cool.

4. Girls are OBESE

I’m afraid that America has to take some blame for this because it seems that the our lifestyle has corrupted Canadian girls. It’s a shame because a lot of them have cute faces (they’re more attractive overall than DC chicks), but once you catch sight of her fat arms and the muffin top she’s trying to hide by wearing black, you start thinking of the porn clip you’ll soon be masturbating to.

5. Girls don’t give eye contact

I know some girls are reading right now and thinking, “They don’t give you eye contact because you are ugly!” This very well may be the case, but in Montreal I got daily eye contact from women who were much better looking than the Toronto specimens I had to deal with. Not only that, but Montreal women would smile at me. Yes, you read that right: attractive women would look at me and smile. In Toronto I might as well have been invisible.

6. You have to be approved by the “mother hen”

Every social circle in Toronto has an overweight woman who acts as a leader of the pack. She is the one who tells girls where to go and who to talk to. Apparently this is how she gets power in life since she’s unable to exert the upper hand over men due to her unattractive and portly appearance. If the mother hen doesn’t approve of you then you will not get laid. She can snap her fingers and her minions jump to attention so that they are not excluded from the tribe. Therefore not only do you have to build attraction with the girl you like, but you also have to charm a fat and ugly girl to give you permission to just continue the interaction.

7. Too many Asian and Indian girls

If you like white girls, a place like Toronto just won't do, because there is too much immigration from non-white countries. At any bar at least 30% of the female clientele will be filled with minority races that don't appeal to discriminating men like myself. While the Asian girls weren't that bad since they adopted a white manner of appearance, the Indian girls were absolutely not attractive.

8. Ugly girls are desperate while attractive girls are inaccessible

It shouldn't be much of a challenge if you want to bang a Toronto girl who is a 5 or below. She will approach you, smile at you, and be generally easy (though of course you'll still need game to seal the deal). In the accidental conversations I had with these unattractive women, I wished I had lower standards so that I could have mostly carefree sex that happens a million times a day in most parts of the world. In Toronto, however, once you encounter a girl who rises up into the 6 range, the difficulty of banging increases in shocking fashion. The 6's and 7's give you attitude or are encased in huge social groups. The 8's and above, if you happen to see them, already have dudes.

9. The entrenched PUA culture is raising the egos of all women

I thought that Washington DC had a strong pickup culture, but I hadn't been to Toronto. PUAs are like rats in Toronto, infecting many venues with their fake high energy, puffed-out chests, loud fashion accessories, and total sobriety. On Thursday night I went to Madison Avenue Pub where I got to see at least 50 of them approach every woman in the bar. As much as I want to hate on them for increasing the girls' bitch shields, I now understand why they do it: they have to. The best game in Toronto is not being an interesting man but just approaching a million girls with your freezeouts and spin moves and negs until you find the horny girl who wants to fuck.

10. Last call is at 2am

It wouldn’t be so bad if venues didn’t get hopping until midnight, but two hours is simply not enough time to find a good venue, mingle, and meet an attractive woman who you want to take home. By the time you get warmed up, it’s time to go. In Toronto you won’t have enough time for a real seduction, so what you see at the end of the night is a bunch of phone numbers being exchanged before girls rush off to a diner to stuff their face.

11. If you make just one mistake with a Toronto girl, you will be rejected

Your conversation has to be 100% perfect and 100% politically correct. You can't say anything that can be remotely construed as offensive, weird, or needy. Once I told a girl that I like "feminine women" and she immediately ditched me as if I farted. In Toronto the best game is to speak like you're a White House spokesperson. And god help you if you utter a lame joke! In one case I was talking to a girl for 30 minutes and had kept the conversation tight enough that we were getting to the kissing stage. Then I made a mediocre joke and she said, "Wow that was corny. I should leave now." This came from a woman who didn't say one interesting or funny thing to me all night and thought I would be impressed with her "marketing" job. Toronto women would absolutely never get laid if they were men.

12. It's very expensive

Food, drinks, taxis, and lodging are all more expensive than DC. Do you get any additional value for paying more? Nope, you only get crappier women and intolerable weather.

13. It’s a suburban city

Most of the people who party within the center on weekends actually live in boring cul-de-sacs. Friday and Saturday nights in Toronto is like how Washington DC is on New Year’s Eve: amateur hour. You get a bunch of office drones with no character or class crowding venues and acting like they’ve never seen alcohol or the opposite sex before. My best night out was Monday because there was a total lack of 905’ers.

14. It takes a lot of work to date up

I never saw an average-looking guy with a hot girl, but I saw many attractive guys with average girls. Toronto is a penis paradise where a woman can date a man much more attractive than she is pretty. If you're not a good looking guy, you either have to own a nightclub or approach 100 girls a week.

15. It beats men down

I saw too many men who looked like corpses. They had no color, no energy, and seemingly no will to live. Spending too much time in Toronto will reduce your ambition, your horniness, and your happiness. Many guys I talked to said that when they traveled abroad, they couldn't believe that hotter women made regular eye contact with them and responded with gentle smiles and warm vibes. Toronto is one of those cities that can make men hate life. Staying out of here becomes essential for your mental health.

Both Toronto and DC suck, but I wouldn't hesitate to pick DC first. The nightlife gets going earlier and lasts longer. More girls live in the city. There is much less cockblocking. It's not a deal breaker if you say a bad joke. Girls actually want to get laid, and it's simply easier to get one-night stands. While Toronto had prettier women overall, it's not enough to make it a better city. You know you're in a crappy place when it's midnight and you are more concerned about spending less money than having a good time with a cool chick. For the nights I spent going out in Toronto, I wished I stayed in and read a couple good books instead.

Cassandra Lynn’s Death Shows Why You Should Never Wife Up Broken Girls

Every so often, I run across a story that makes me facepalm so hard that I fracture the bones in my hands. The spectacular self-destruction of former Playboy Playmate Cassandra Lynn—and her Captain Save-a-Ho hubby Gary Hensley—is one of those stories.

The gist of it is that Hensley married Lynn, a past-her-prime party girl with two kids from some deadbeat who never paid a penny in child support. He supported her and her children while struggling to build his own company and pay the bills. Then one day, she took off on him and the floodgates opened:

> He learned that Cassandra, 34, had been with another man the previous night. She’d consumed cocaine and alcohol and had been found dead in a bathtub.

To make matters worse, the author of the story (Ellen McCarthy of The Washington Post) spins Hensley’s tale to make Lynn into the victim. McCarthy gives absolutely no thought to the well-meaning man who is now stuck raising someone else’s kids after his loving wife ran off to cheat on him and OD on drugs.

The tale of Gary Hensley and Cassandra Lynn is illustrative on so many levels, but the most important point is this: never, ever try to rescue a broken woman. Trying to save a girl from self-destructive behavior is a fool’s errand, no matter how nice she may be to you or what other qualities she may have. Girls like Lynn are on the discount shelf for a reason: they’re damaged goods and no one with a choice wants them.

The Futility Of Being Captain Save-a-Ho

Wifing up slutty girls is a common mistake that chumps make. Most men have no clue how to attract women and spend their twenties in a sexual wasteland, taking what little they can get. When the tides start turning in their thirties—they become established in their careers while their same-aged lady peers see their looks start to fade—they retain the same desperate attitude when they were younger and loveless.

Gary Hensley was no doubt a complete chump in his younger years. He may be a talented businessman and a nice guy, but he had no idea how to deal with girls. When a former Playmate came on to him, he must have thought he was the luckiest guy in the world. Because he didn't have any game, he was wide open to the predations of a mentally ill, narcissistic and self-immolating whore.

Men need to realize that there's no reason for them to settle for girls like Cassandra Lynn. While not every man is going to end up with a big-titted, chaste supermodel for a wife, any man can learn game and raise his standards. There are so many girls in the sea that no man should bother with the emaciated, asphyxiated flounders who wash up on shore.

Last Rites To The Dying

Cassandra Lynn's death by misadventure also illustrates that trying to "fix" women is a bad idea.

Many men find it tempting to try to turn girls around, whether it's as simple as making a fat girl skinnier or in Hensley's case, trying to make a ho into a housewife. Some girls like to do the same thing with men: many girls will fall in love with "bad boys" or other dangerous men because they want a "project" and they think they can somehow make him a better person. When girls try to "fix" men, it's stupid; when men try to "fix" girls, it's a tragedy.

In order to help someone, they have to want to be helped. All the advice and guidance in the world is useless so long as the girl it's aimed at keeps slapping it away. It's not unlike sin: in order for a person to repent, they must want to repent and seek forgiveness. You can try and convince someone that they should mend their ways, but it's ultimately up to them to make that final step.

This was the point I was making with last week's column on girls with mental illnesses. While it's certainly possible for a girl with a mental disorder to turn her life around, it's not your responsibility to make her do it. Avoiding girls who are not right in the head isn't simply for your own safety, it's the only way that they can possibly be helped. It's not until a girl makes the choice to divert from her self-destructive path that she's worth anything, and the majority of them will never pull it off.

Cassandra Lynn is a prime example of this. In trying to make her into a virtuous woman, Gary Hensley no doubt thought he was doing something great. But girls like Lynn are missing something inside them: the crucial ingredient for happy, healthy humanity. In trying to rescue a ho from her wanton ways, he's condemned himself to both heartbreak and the hell of having to raise another man's children.

Don’t ever waste your time on women like Cassandra Lynn. They can’t be helped. Trying to save girls like them is like trying to rescue the eggs that fall from the nest and never become birds.

Lawyer Hate Is Of Old Date

March 16, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We are wise to be cautious when men too strongly denounce their peers or benefactors; it is often an unconscious way of concealing an unsatisfied obligation. The bonds of affection are strained by the tension of an indebtedness long in arrears. The debt grinds on the bearer, aggravating pains which then find a negative outward expression. The origin of all castigation is some torment awaiting alleviation.

I was reminded of this psychological dynamic in a passage from Ammianus Marcellinus's history, which is known to us as Res Gestae. It is a detailed and very competent work, covering in its surviving form a period of the late Roman Empire from A.D. 353 to 378.

Ammianus was a Greek or Syrian from Antioch who enjoyed a military career, serving as a staff officer to the emperors Constanius II and very likely Julian. He was also attached to the command of a general named Ursicinus, the governor of Nisibis in Mesopotamia. His duties took him across the Roman world from Gaul to edges of Persia; he was an acute student of human affairs, generally reliable and free from vituperation.

But, alas, not entirely free. Many of his superiors were ousted in the power struggles that marred the history of the Empire in its later stages; and Ammianus found his fortunes rise and fall with those of his sovereigns. He took up residence in Rome sometime around 380, and was likely among those directly affected by the expulsion of foreigners decreed in 383 as food shortages necessitated public rationing (cf. XIV.6.19). He also had a strong dislike for the Anicii, a powerful family in Rome at the time (XIV.8.13). We do not know the circumstances that brought him into collision with this group.

We may note, with amusement, the spectacle of a plain-speaking Syrian general from the wilder provinces trying, and failing, to ingratiate himself with the moneyed political classes in Rome. They would not accept him, and he knew it. He had the military man's distaste for demagoguery, law-courts, and orators, and revenged himself on them in certain passages of his history, to which we will now turn. The best histories are the products of carefully ground axes.

Ammianus denounces the profession of "forensic oratory" (hanc professionem oratorum forensium) in a remarkable digression in a later book of his history (XXX.4). Forensic oratory was a euphemism for the profession of law. He believes that the profession had declined greatly from the august days in which lawyers were "devoted to learned studies" (attenti studiis doctrinarum) and judges gained office through ability and refinement. He continues:

> This trade of forensic oratory…the cunning of certain Orientals raised it to a degree hateful to men of principle…with which I became acquainted while living in those parts… [XXX.4.4]

A courts building in modern Rome

Bad lawyers come in four categories, Ammianus tells us. They are the following:

1. The Scammers

The first class are those who "sow the seeds of all sorts of quarrels" and "wear out the doors and thresholds of widows and single men" with inducements to lawsuits. Failing in this, they invent quarrels. They lead men astray by "crafty speeches" and similar legerdemain with the goal of emptying their victims' purses.

2. The Fake Experts

The second class of unscrupulous lawyers are those who "profess to a knowledge of law" (qui iuris professi scientiam) but who have never actually practiced law. The claim to reveal destinies and interpret fortunes by a reliance on speculation that masquerades as authority. In a brilliant turn of phrase, Ammianus that these men "assume a serious expression and try to make even their yawning marketable." (vultus gravitate ad habitum composita tristiorem, ipsum quoque venditant, quod oscitantur).

3. The Attack Dogs

These are those lawyers who try to make a name for themselves by using their "venal tongues" to attack everyone and anything, in the hope of achieving notoriety. They set traps for the unwary, and hope for them to be so ensnared. The victim of such chicanery will be entangled for years, and will have the marrow sucked from his bones (non nisi per multa exsiliet lustra, ad usque ipsas medullas exsuctus).

4. The Clueless Or Ignorant

These are the "shameless and ignorant" lawyers who know nothing, yet urge all types of unsuspecting people to engage in frivolous litigation. "And when they are allowed to defend lawsuits, which rarely happens," Ammianus growls, "they only learn the name of their client at key points in the dispute."

And when the find themselves unable to perform, they bury their incompetence in "unbridled license and abuse" (ad effrenatam deflectunt conviciandi licentiam). They are so stupid that "they cannot even remember if they ever possessed a legal textbook."

In spite of these four classes in the legal rogues' gallery, there still remain good lawyers practicing before the tribunals. There are some who subscribe to the old Ciceronian ethic, which held that "One may honorably refuse, without criticism, to defend a man; but one may never agree to defend a man, and then deliberately do so negligently."

It is refreshing and droll to note that lawyer-hatred has been with us for thousands of years. Presumably we could even go back further, and find inscribed on the sacred monuments of Egypt or Babylon some curse hurled against the profession of advocacy. Everyone hates lawyers. Until they need one, of course.

Ammianus lived out the remainder of his years quietly in Rome. No doubt the lawyers who had tried to deport him, or the sharp-tongued legal advisors of the Anicii family, had soured him permanently on the profession.

But perhaps it is just as well. It is just these little angry digressions that make his history so fascinating. History is best written by the disgruntled. Reading through Ammianus's diatribe against the lawyers of his day makes one suspect that he might have been on the wrong end of a divorce settlement, and left with a pile of unpaid legal bills. All in neatly arranged papyrus rolls.

Once A Woman’s Body Is Ruined, There’s No Getting It Back

March 16, 2015 | by John Bodi | Link | Original Link

When a muffin-topped, beer-bellied, small-assed, late twenties English woman says she’s going to “get in shape,” my heart sinks. When a pencil-armed, pot-bellied thirty-five-year-old man says similar, well, I’m skeptical, but I know this for sure: he may possibly succeed but she never will.

Here is the shocking truth: the women I’ve met with the best bodies have never stepped foot in a gym, nor gone on a diet in their lives. The men with the best bodies have spreadsheets to track their diets and work like Spartans in the weights room.

Men and women’s bodies are as different as their minds.

Women are piglets

Say you wish to produce a prize pig. What you cannot do is take a fully grown sub-standard adult pig and then make changes to its diet and lifestyle, increase its feed quality, let it run about outside more, etc, then expect it to win the next year's Cumberland Swine Festival gold medal.

No, what you must do is start your work with a piglet. You must feed it very high quality food, being careful to give it plenty of good fats and vitamins and ensure it does not under nor over eat. You must keep it free of toxins and pollutants and let it run around a lot in the fresh air. With careful rearing over the years the piglet's body forms correctly: the balance of fat to muscle resulting in a supreme, prize-winning specimen.

Women are effectively the same. You cannot feed a woman crap and let the years pass then suddenly reverse this process: the damage is already done. The quality and disposition of the fat on her body has already been determined. No diet in the world will move fat from a belly into a buttock, or from a muffin-top into a breast.

Fat levels and fat disposition (location) is set during the rearing phase of her life. Gaining a low body fat does not necessarily result in a good figure. Check out these pictures. I know which ones I prefer:

Kelly Brook: fat but still do-able.

Female bodybuilder: gross.

Most definitely fat: most definitely hot.

As we all know, a good female body is an exercise in subtlety. Thin here, curvy there, firm and powerful there, soft and smooth there.

Luckily for us mother nature has made it remarkably easy for the majority (say two thirds) of women to crack this puzzle and have a body which grown men would climb mountains just to penetrate. They just have to be raised right, like a piglet, and not fuck it up.

We have seen the proof

Curious players traveling in Eastern Europe, Russia, and Asia bear witness to this on a daily basis. The streets are thronged with beauties. I've met few of these girls that actually go to the gym or "diet" in any specific way, but they have physiques that modern English women can only weep at. Why? Because Piglet Theory has been applied to them correctly.

They have been raised with good, wholesome food, not under or over-fed and not been allowed to indulge in silly diets. Importantly, they've been brought up to take care of themselves, have self respect as a woman and not engage in the squalor of their urges – meaning the regular fetishising of junk food and alcohol and the gluttonous pig-outs that their Anglo sisters debase their femininity and genetic gift from nature with on a weekly basis.

Additionally, a high amount of low intensity activity features in these girl's lives. They like to walk everywhere, understanding that it "helps their figures" and you'll find a lot of them did some form of dance in their formative years. Most importantly, virtually all of them barely drink and consume probably less than 10% of the alcohol their debauched Western sisters do.

On the other hand, let us consider Anglo piglets: by and large badly reared. Drive around an average British town and take a look at the girls under sixteen. Quite a lot of slim, pretty ones aren't there? Now repeat this exercise for twenty year olds. WHERE DID THEY ALL GO?

The sad truth is that most British people shovel poor quality slop into their mouths from the day they develop the motor-control neccessary to do so. When parental control is diminished at age sixteen this process escalates quickly. Girls start guzzling booze and eating junk food and within a few years their precious, fragile gift from nature is ruined. Add three years of college onto this: living off cheap, poor quality food and regular tri-weekly binge drinking and their free gift from nature is gone forever.

Men Are Pit Ponies

Post-workout nutrition.

Men have it slightly easier. Assuming a guy has reasonable proportions then what gives him a good body is very simple: having less body fat and more muscle. A man does not have to concern himself with where on his body the fat is located, he just needs to remove it. He doesn't have to concern himself with looking "too buff" or "too skinny," he just needs to get jacked and ripped.

Men are just like pit ponies. You can take the laziest, most overfed pony and stick it down a mine pulling carts on a daily basis. In a few months it'll be ripped and jacked: all it needs is hard toil and a strict diet.

Alcohol, whilst certainly bad for men, doesn't have the devastating effect on them that it does for women. Similarly, with their higher metabolic rates and far higher activity levels (don't believe the surveys) men deal with caloric excess better than women.

Young Anglo women are living the lie that they are not only mentally male, but physically as well, and nobody seems to be telling them that their bodies simply cannot process this level of abuse. Men's bodies are Toyota pickups: women's are Ferraris.

The Arms Race

It's not all great for men. Answer me this: many men do you think that without dieting or exercising in any intense fashion could grace the cover of Men's Health? The answer is probably far, far lower than 1%. Why? Because men are now caught in a figurative and literal arms race in terms of physique.

Taking steroids makes a man more ripped and jacked, and thus in a few short years unless you're taking gear you simply do not have the look that these publications require. Go to an average bar in an average city in the UK. The average guy now dedicatedly lifts weights three times a week and monitors his diet closely.

Regular walking, salsa, fresh air and home-cooked food. Easy.

As feminism causes women's SMV to plummet en-masse and men must resign themselves to dating down, women can buy a lot more in the marketplace for their money. Men, trapped into vicious competition for the ever-dwindling supply of women who are not fatter and more bossy than their mothers were (post childbirth) now look for any edge over each other. Pecs have to be pumped, hair has to be perfect.

It's also to do with the feminization of men. Classic, society-building male attributes, such as intelligence, wisdom, and character are now valued less by society and men are valued more and more solely on their physicality.

In ten years the average twenty-year old male will take steroids.

And for women?

There is no chemical arms race for women. Steroids and drugs do not make a woman's body more feminine.

The truth that will have most bloated UK fem-whales screaming in denial is that in countries that understand Piglet Theory, the average girl could, with a little bit of makeup and fake tan, grace the cover of a fitness magazine.

In Russia and Prague the average girl has a flat stomach, no love-handles, a round backside and slender, toned limbs. Oh… and no tattoos. Incidentally, I like to consider tattoos equivalent to swine-markings: identifying the lower quality porkers destined for the pet food factory.

Dogfood

Conclusion

Men and women's bodies have a direct parallel to male and female SMV: they are an illustration of inherent versus earned value. Women have evolved to have inherent value: they have a belly-full of ripe eggs and in their twenties men relentlessly compete to fertilize them. A twenty-something girl knows attention and dating options equivalent to a male rock star.

All a woman has to do to be successful is not fuck it up, don't waste too much time and ensure that well before her best-before date of thirty she's picked a man. Their bodies are the same: they are born with the raw material, most of them, to be wildly attractive to men: they just have to not fuck it up and if they do, there's nothing that can be done to salvage the situation.

And for men? Relentless competition with other men, but mitigated by the fact that their value for the most part can be built and worked for, rather than given by mother nature as a fixed sum. For now, the best thing a man can do is to go somewhere where piglets are reared well.

7 Reasons Every Man Should Date A Latina At Least Once In His Life

March 17, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

In the opinion of your humble correspondent, Latinas are far and away the superior breed of woman within the context of any sexual relationship, and it's not even close. From wives to fuck buddies and everything in between, these chicas blow away (literally and figuratively) all other females in just about every way imaginable.

Though I haven't traveled abroad as much as some of my fellow writers I have still been able to have relationships of varying degrees with many different nationalities of women. I have found that the feminine qualities of Latinas seem to hold up the longest in the American cesspool and this, among other reasons, makes them the undisputed queens of arm candy.

Whatever the reason may be for their longer feminine shelf life, I strongly recommend that every man game, date, or fuck a Latina at least once in their lives because they will change your preference and taste in women. Here's why:

7. They consistently embrace their femininity

They ooze femininity now but it’s a different story on Tuesday

Girls of all races embrace their femininity when shaking their asses at the club. They know that men like feminine women regardless of their public advocacy of the “strong and independent woman.”

Latinas, on the other hand, tend to carry their ladylike auras everywhere because it is who they are. They love being sexy and take tremendous pride in their femininity.

High heels and long beautiful hair are mainstays for these girls because it is embraced by their culture. Even when popping over to the store around the corner they make sure they’re looking good. They enjoy being feminine women and it shows.

“Well what about their loud bitchy temperaments? That’s not very feminine at all!”

You’re absolutely right, it’s not. However, the intoxicating girlishness that exudes from their appearances comes at a price. That price is raw masculinity which leads to the fact that…

6. They completely submit to boldness and dominance

Girls like this only submit to dominant men

Chicas are a fucking handful—trust me. If you're not equipped to handle their spirit, passion, or their hair-trigger jealously (which escalates quickly and loudly regardless of game, frame, or venue), they will chew you up and spit you out.

Latin women can be very intimidating. Their fiery personalities are another part of their culture they embrace. Incidentally, this acts as a highly effective beta repellent. Step to a mami with weak game and she will blow you out like a bad tire. I speak from personal experience.

Tight game, rock solid frame, and demonstrating high value gets you in the door. But when you establish true dominance she'll go from Tiger to kitten right before your very eyes. Her expression and voice will soften, she'll relax, and will completely and wholly surrender herself to you. It is a beautiful thing when this happens.

Now this is far from easy. Latinas are some of the wildest fillies out there and it is very, very difficult to break them. They want to make sure they're dealing a man and will often vocalize this in no uncertain terms. They test your mettle with intensity from the jump…count on it.

A personal anecdote

A couple years back when visiting my brother in Atlanta we decided to hit a Latin club one night. We were chatting up a couple mamacitas at the bar and having a great time. I was making what I thought was pretty good progress with one of them when without warning she ordered a drink and told the bartender to put it on my tab.

I quickly told the bartender I wasn't paying for it and to charge her for it. The girl looked at me incredulously and said "You don't buy drinks for ladies? Your mother didn't raise you correctly did she?" Her heavy Mexican accent didn't hide the bitchiness and disbelief in her voice.

I responded, "No, but my father did," and turned to face to bar, away from her. She turned her back to me and started talking in rapid Spanish to her girlfriends. The little Spanish I did know at the time allowed me to pick up "Can you believe him?" and something else about another club in town.

Solid club if you're ever in the ATL

A few seconds later I feel her hair whip across my face. I ignored it so she did it again. I smirked at her and recited one of the few Spanish phrases I'd rehearsed ad nauseam: "Cuidadosa. Soy un extractor de pelo." ("Careful. I'm a hair puller.") to which she responded in English "Is that right?" This time there was intrigue and mischief in her voice and it was was on from there.

Long story short, she went out of her way to be kind to me the rest of the night. She even bought me a drink and joked "my father raised me correctly too." She was very touchy-feely, which allowed me to escalate very quickly. Needless to say it was a great night.

When you establish yourself as a dominant male who is unafraid of their feisty temperaments, the rewards are well worth it. The bottom line is that a tamed mujer will treat you like a king. And one of the benefits that comes with that royal treatment is that…

5. They will cook for you

Cooking crosses all generations of Latinas

This is another cultural element that Hispanic women take pride in. The ability to cook for their men is something they outwardly brag about to their amigas and familia. The old adage “the way to a man’s heart is through his stomach” is drilled into their skulls from a very young age.

This characteristic crosses all generations. I’ve dated Latinas of all ages and just about all of them had above average culinary faculty. Hell, even the slut buckets I messed with could throw down in the kitchen. Pleasing their men with food they prepare is something they all have in common and neither age or notch count seems to make much of a difference.

I would, however, say that one drawback to this is that most of their cooking skills are usually limited to their native country. I dated a Dominican girl when I lived in down SoCal and the girl could burn, but I’ll admit that after a while I got a little tired of tostones, black beans, and rice as a side to every single meal. However, it was still a welcome alternative to the TV dinners white girls slaved over the microwave to prepare.

4. The way they dance and move

Salsa is an easy way to get close to Latinas

Ever watch a Latin girl dance? Ever seen anything hotter? Me neither. Watching these hot blooded honeys move with the passion and spirit they do on the dance floor will take your breath away.

Their seductive, provocative movements and the utter disregard for their or their partner's sweat is something akin to soft core porn as far as I'm concerned. Then add the facial expressions they make as they get lost in the music—hypnotic, my friends.

This quality also sticks around outside of the discoteca. The feminine movements they exhibit on those weekend nights influence their movements during the day. I've rarely seen a Latina who didn't move like a woman. Their natural femininity and sexual aura displayed even in their most subtle movements is enough to drive any man crazy.

Watching Latin girls dance has motivated me to start taking salsa classes myself to step up my game. Though things are coming along slowly (very slowly), it will be well worth it when I can join their sexy asses on the dance floor and swap sweat with 'em in close quarters all night long.

3. They are very passionate in bed

Most men can attest to the terrible attempts Ameri-cunts make to mimic porn stars. All the over the top yelling and screaming and rehearsed lines from bad porn is both hilarious and pathetic.

Having sex with a Latin girl, however, will change your life. The passion they exhibit is real, raw, and authentic. They live to please you between the sheets and have an insatiable desire to be dominated.

The moans that emit from them are as genuine as it gets so long as you are passionate and dominant. Similar to approaching them, this takes a little practice. Learning to balance the delicate blend of the rough but romantic sex they crave is important.

Once you master this she will pursue you for some Latin style lovin'.

Making love to a Latina is like nothing else you will experience with any other woman. Especially when they call you "papi." This alone is enough to take one for a test drive.

2. Latin girls are fiercely loyal

Maybe not this loyal but damn close

So long as you're maintaining frame and dominance in an LTR, any girl will stand by your side. Latinas, on the other hand, take it to a whole other level. They're not just loyal to you—they will ride or die for you.

If you're in jail they'll drop what they're doing, contact your bail bondsman, and accompany him to the jail where she will sign her name to get you out. If you're in a verbal or physical confrontation, she's got your back and will (loudly) convey this to your assailant(s). She will also dutifully assist you, often unsolicited, with whatever it is you're doing—legal or otherwise.

These girls understand that you are the leader and that they are your first mate and will jump into that role without reservation or hesitation. In my experience, the allegiance of a Latina is unparalleled.

Yes, I've had other girls assume that role here and there but it's rare on account of their outright selfishness (thanks feminists!). But Latin girls take to it with a fervor and enthusiasm the others don't match, and they do it at a much higher clip. I've been in all kinds of situations with many different kinds of women including the examples above, and the mamis consistently out perform their female competition.

As great as this is, it can be a bit of a nuisance at times. When you leave them out of something you're doing they often take it personally and start to question your trust in them as your woman. It can also be embarrassing when some drunk knucklehead says "Your girl looks like she'd put up a better fight than you would."

But at the end of the day it's nice to know you have a woman who will ride for you no matter what the circumstances and that more than makes up for the few times their loyalty can cause minor inconveniences.

1. They will quickly tighten your game

Puerto Rican girls have THE lowest beta tolerance

Put simply, Latin girls will make a man out of you.

I mentioned earlier that it can be very difficult to bend these chicas to your will. But after some experience with them you'll find that your game improves and at a much faster pace than with other girls.

The reason for this is that their fire cracker personalities combined with their low tolerance for beta bullshit forces men to adapt if they want to be successful with them. After a few months (or years) of regularly gaming them you'll find that your player power level has raised quite substantially.

Now this isn't evident at first. Especially when your nookie nourishment is exclusively Latinas for any extended period of time. But when you jump off the beaten path and approach other nationalities of women you'll find it much easier to slither into their panties. Why else do you think Latinos bed white girls so easily?

If you put in the work necessary and baptize yourself by fire by approaching, failing, and interacting with them on the regular, you will quickly discover that the benefits are well worth the effort. And even if you decide they're not your cup of tea, your dick will be appreciative of your new and improved game.

Will Protests Against Brazil's Female President Dilma Rousseff Force Her From Office?

March 17, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Anti-government protests are growing in Brazil. Why should you care? Because Brazil has the biggest economy in South America, the second largest in the Western hemisphere, and has the seventh largest economy (by GDP) in the world. What happens there can send out wider shockwaves.

In recent days, there has been massive turnout by people in nearly every Brazilian state to demand the resignation, or impeachment, of the country's first female president, Dilma Rousseff.

Hundreds of thousands of people have been gathering in protest, and this seems likely to continue. Protests have taken place in 22 Brazilian states, with more to happen in the weeks ahead. How did this come about? How did things get to this point? We will provide some answers here.

A history of failure

Deny everything, and keep denying it

Let's provide some background first. In 2011, after winning a close election, Ms. Rousseff became the first female president. Hailed by the international media as a rags-to-riches story of female empowerment, she sailed into office on the coattails of her predecessor, the now conspicuously-invisible Luiz Inacio Lula Da Silva.

She continued the policies of Mr. Da Silva, which primarily revolved around giving economic handouts to poor people and—in rhetoric at least—improving the economy. The economy grew at extremely fast rates under Da Silva, and it looked like it would last for a long time.

Things began to unravel soon after Rousseff took office. Inflation began to grow, and rates of economic growth did as well. On a leadership level, there was a perception that the usual rules of South American cronyism were still in effect, but with a female face, rather than the gold braid of an army general.

Brazilians have lived with corruption for decades, if not centuries, so that can hardly be called new news. What triggered the explosion of anger is a very specific scandal that Rousseff is unavoidably at the center of.

The scandal that may bring down a country's ruling elite

The protests continue: but where are the foreign feminists and SJWs?

The scandal involves the government and the nation's major oil company, Petrobras. The company is one of the largest and most respected in the world. Before taking office in 2011, Rousseff had been the chairman of the board for Petrobras. During her tenure as chairman of Petrobras, bribes were paid to Brazilian politicians and to Petrobras officers as a way of securing cooperation or contracts. This is already in the record.

We should point out here that Brazil has a very bureaucratic and "top-down" corporate culture. A few big companies control everything, and nothing happens unless a boss signs off on it. Anyone who has ever tried to navigate the maze of Brazilian bureaucracy knows this.

At the beginning of this month, the courts permitted an investigation into roughly fifty politicians from Rousseff's far left-wing Workers' Party, among them the speakers of the Brazilian House and Senate. So, this is not your ordinary investigation. The allegations go all the way to the top. Although Rousseff has not (yet) been formally accused, most intelligent Brazilians find it incredible that all of this admitted corruption could swirl around her without her knowing about it.

Nevertheless, the president for now is keeping her lips sealed. Her acolytes have pointed out that most of the protests have been organized by her right-wing opponents. They have claimed that most of the people marching in the protests have been people who didn't vote for her. But bad things continue to happen.

A country in turmoil

Inflation is currently at 7.5%, the economy has stalled, and Rousseff's ability to govern seems to be heading toward paralysis. Rousseff points to the fact that her own attorney general has "exonerated" her of any wrongdoing. Her strategy at this point seems to be to try to placate the demonstrators. Her Justice Minister Jose Eduardo Cardozo said the government considered the demonstrations an "expression of democracy."

Cardozo and his colleague Miguel Rossetto have promised the usual "package of measures" to address concerns about corruption, hoping to buy time for a breathing space. The problem is that no one's buying it. Inflation is growing, jobs are hard to come by, and there is a perception that Rousseff is not up to the job. Not only that, but Brazilians have heard it all before. There was a huge wave of anti-government protests in 2013, and Rousseff just managed to survive that tidal wave by promising a "package of reforms."

And then it was back to business as usual. Part of the problem is that Rousseff lacks the wily charisma of her strangely-silent predecessor, Lula. Where is Lula? Hiding somewhere, no doubt. He was able to coast during his tenure in office, but now that things have gone south, he's nowhere to be found. This is the sentiment I get when I talk to many Brazilian friends of mine.

Her finance minister, Joaquim Levy, has proposed an "austerity plan" which may have to cut back some of the handouts that were made to the lower classes under Lula's presidency. But the biggest problem for her may prove to be the continuing investigation. No politician likes ongoing investigations. They have a way of becoming festering wounds, or tornadoes unable to be controlled. Meanwhile, the economy continues to stall, inflation grows, water shortages in the southern states continue, and a general feeling of aimlessness persists.

A return to dictatorship?

This writer happens to have a close friend, now retired, in Brazil who was a career employee of Petrobras. This friend, whom I will call Paulo, has often openly mused that things were actually better in the 1970s and 80s when the military dictatorship ran the show.

Of course, they persecuted communists and leftists, but on balance they were far less corrupt than the oligarchs who are now running the show. I found this opinion to be more common than you might imagine.

Were things better off under the military rule? Many say yes.

Also conspicuously absent from the media are the feminist commentators who were gushing in ecstasy at the election of two women as presidents in Brazil and in Argentina. We were told that this was some sort of new age in gender equality, where women would show everyone how to run a large country. That little fantasy evaporated rather quickly.

Argentina's president, Christina Fernandez de Kirchner, has a consuming political scandal of her own. One of her prosecutors, Alberto Nisman, was found dead, after having accused her of conspiring to conceal details of an investigation into a terrorist bombing. Ms. Kirchner denies any involvement in the prosecutor's death.

Are the feminist websites in the US covering these stories as dutifully as they should be? Why are we not hearing talk from the social justice warrior multiverse? Could it be that women are just as—if not more—corrupt than men in office? Readers will have to decide for themselves.

Fat Girls Who Have Sex With Drunk Guys Are Rapists

SJW's have insisted for years that men are responsible for rape when a girl consumes alcohol and has sex with them. Even when both parties are drunk, or the guy is more drunk, or the girl had just one or two drinks, alcohol means automatic rape to feminists and those of their ilk.

We're not talking incapacitation here, which is true rape, but rather a woman voluntarily consuming alcohol and still being able to walk, engage in conversation, and do all the things her male drinking and sex partner is doing at the same time.

I'd wager that 25-40% of ROK readers, especially those born out of wedlock, were conceived when their mothers had as much alcohol in their system as modern-day SJW's are using as a pathetically low benchmark for "rape." So, guess what? Nearly half of you are rape babies.

What's seriously next? If a girl hasn't had breakfast, she doesn't have the necessary calories to help her make informed decisions? You and those indomitable vehicles of institutional patriarchy, the Vogue and Cosmopolitan health sections, must have orchestrated her fasting-induced rape.

The fact is, skipping meals and (excessive) dieting are linked to depression and impulsive decisions. Yet before SJW's take that logical step in the direction of again abrogating female personal responsibility and defecating further on due process, let's consider the rape culture of active or normal young men being preyed upon by opportunistic fat female sex predators.

Surely our feminist brethren will help us destroy the culture of fat women raping young drunk men?

The rape epidemic you won't hear about

America and the Western world face a continuing epidemic of male victims who, after consuming too many a brew, stumble their way into bed with mammals of the same size Greenpeace tries to protect. Where are the good-doers when this happens, tens of thousands of times every week alone in California, the crucible of rape hysteria?

If a girl has sex with an equally or more inebriated male, she can wake up the next day, decide she hadn't built the requisite trust with and knowledge of her partner, and then efficiently and conveniently accuse him of rape. There is absolutely no comparable choice or legal protection for men whose guts start to wrench when they realize in the morning that they slept with a cholesterol-ridden human blimp.

Science has conclusively proven that "beer goggles" exist [1] [2]. Given the greater emphasis men place on female looks, particularly according to feminists, men are the most susceptible to being taken advantage of by a psychopathic obese female rapist.

Under yes means yes, chunky or just plain obese girls are committing rape nightly on every Californian campus, and at every American university where feminist student groups are trying to force women not to take responsibility for their own frat behavior and alcohol consumption (short of them being out cold).

I will assume that California Governor Jerry Brown merely forgot this inconsistency and will address it in a subsequent bill he signs.

Not even vocal European opposition could save Obama from Putin's secret weapon, the Russian woolly mammoth.

Barring some sort of serious genetic flaw or some testicular disappearance, reasonable-looking, relatively fit young men will not gravitate towards a fat chick, despite her ability to seemingly manipulate gravity and displace large objects with ease. It is entirely the presence of alcohol that destroys these men's otherwise ironclad inhibitions against such fortification.

Feminists like their cake and want to eat it

On the one hand, feminists lambast men for their focus on women's looks and alleged insistence on feminine physical perfection. But they have no way of explaining (or ever raise) why a cohort of vulnerable young men have much more sex with fat, obese, and unattractive women when they're drunk.

Men are taught to avoid the discussion or admission of having slept with bovine-sized women. And in many ways that's the wise option. The only thing worse than fucking a fat chick would be fucking a fat chick and making her pregnant. Thankfully, though, (most) frat and other guys manage to avoid this copulation of doom.

The point, however, is that men in these circumstances are making choices they would never make in any other context (besides when they have a gun pointed at their heads). With the addition of alcohol, they are therefore not able to consent. Without consent, it's rape.

I'm sure I had an excellent, excellent way to close this piece off. Then I remember it was this picture:

And remember, boys, friends don’t let friends get raped by fat chicks.

Men Are Nothing More Than Clowns To The Modern Woman

March 17, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

I have a bank of rotating stock questions I ask women that let me know how I should proceed with my game. One of the questions I used to ask was "Do you need a man?" Out of the dozens of times I asked it, not a single girl answered yes. Even in Eastern Europe, a woman needs a man as much as a cat needs milk. They would prefer the best man or the best milk, but they can surely live without.

There is definitely not a single woman alive in the Western world who needs a man. While in the past a woman had to put forth effort to obtain a husband who would help her survive, today she is protected by a welfare state that ensures she will never go hungry or spend one night on the street. Even a child she has out of wedlock from a drunken night out will not have to suffer from her mistake, and that's in spite of the fact that many nations already provide her with free contraception to compensate for her lack of judgement in selecting worthy mates.

Anything required for a woman's survival or pleasure can be easily achieved without her having to put forth commitment, sacrifice, or labor. She can shave her head, gain 50 pounds, and disfigure herself with tattoos yet still have many suitors to—at the minimum—have sex on demand. Her food and shelter will be provided by a state which has embarked on an extraordinary effort to compete with men for her devotion and loyalty.

I started asking a different question to women: “Do you want a man?” I began receiving “I don’t know” answers (the more they hesitated to respond, the more I considered their true answer to be a yes). Only in a few instances did a woman outright say yes, and these usually happened in Ukraine. It’s no surprise that I eased into mini-relationships with these yes girls without the standard flaking or game-playing you would normally receive from girls who see men as milk instead of water. The girls who said yes weren’t exactly hurting for food or shelter, and they didn’t try to reach into my pockets for resources, but through their attitude and demeanor it was clear that they did want a man in their life who could provide it with a measure of happiness that could not be gained from their environment or government.

You’re a lucky man if you can find this type of girl in the West. From a young age, girls are brainwashed to believe that they don’t need men and that the key to their happiness is self-empowerment by sleeping around and becoming a corporate wage slave. It’s hard to dispute the notion that a woman who believes she doesn’t need a man won’t make as good of a relationship partner as one who does. She will treat you as a distraction to her more important job, girls’ nights out, and social networking validation happy time. Men have become an utterly replaceable and expendable commodity in a girl’s life. Her interest in a man is not unlike her interest in a new television show or Apple product, and your only hope is to have sex with her as many times as possible until her attraction diminishes and she moves on to the next guy in line.

Women don’t seek out comfort or stability in men anymore—they seek entertainment. They seek distraction. They seek hedonistic pleasure. This is why provider men (beta males) are so hopelessly failing today to secure the commitment of beautiful women in their prime, and this is why even lesser alpha males fail to enter relationships with women beyond a few bangs. Once the entertainment or novelty you provide her declines—and it inevitably will—she moves on to something or someone else. In essence, the only way you can keep a girl is if you adopt the mentality of a soap opera writer, adding a cliffhanger to the end of each episode that keeps a woman interested when being a good man no longer does.

When I look at myself in the mirror, I don’t see a man who has improved himself over the years to be the best that his genes allow—I see a glittery skirt that a girl encounters in the mall. Is the skirt too expensive or is it on sale? Is there only one left of her size or is the rack full of them? Does she already have something similar or is it totally novel? Does her friends think it’s cute or just alright? After trying it on, does it flatter her body or make her look fat? Either she makes the impulsive decision to buy the skirt or not, because odds are she won’t come back for it. There are so many stores with so many skirts that she will soon forget it, forever. We are like glittery pieces of fashion to women—items that she truly doesn’t need. Not only has she already collected so many of them, but she can easily obtain more within walking distance from where she lives. She can even browse online from home while in her pajamas through a nearly unlimited selection.

We are not men in the traditional sense—we are clowns. With our tight game we have to be entertainers who create drama and excitement in a girl’s life, just long enough so that she spreads her legs and makes sexy noises, and even though she did commit such an intimate act with us, she will soon lose interest or simply get bored, and then move on to the next shiny cock that catches her eye. The other side of this coin is that we no longer need women. We don't need them to maintain our home or cook good meals for us. We don't need them in an age where having children is no longer important or valued. Whatever natural connection that once existed between the sexes has now been severed. Neither sex needs each other so we dedicate ourselves to corporations, entertainment, and base pleasures instead, and this is a great tragedy that most people believe is a sign of progress, a cause for celebration.

For the next girl I meet, I'm not going to ask her if she needs a man, because I know she doesn't. Instead I will simply ask her if she wants a man, and if the answer leans yes, I will perform like the good clown I am so that she is entertained enough to have sex with me. Either she or I will eventually get bored and the relationship will end. Then I will simply repeat my performance on a someone new, because I'm a skilled clown, and that's exactly what women today want.

UCKG Church Affiliate Tells Women “Blue-Ball English Men Until They Marry You”

March 18, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

The UK chapter of the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (“UCKG”), a controversial Christian sect based on Prosperity Theology, is using its house organ, Universal, to encourage women to shun players only interested in one night stands in favour of provider betas who are willing to postpone sex until marriage.

The advice page warns women to the “behaviour and tricks” of “Casanovas” who use them for sex, before encouraging them to choose ”men of integrity” willing to commit to marriage. UCKG is a worldwide evangelical church based in Brazil, and is known for sharp financial practices. In the UK it is known for its aggressive promotion in impoverished black areas and its connection to the Victoria Climbie child abuse case.

Who is the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God?

Bishop Renato Cardoso and his wife Cristiane, daughter of CKG's billionaire founder Edir Macedo, at a Love School event.

The Universal Church of the Kingdom of God is an international Pentecostal church with headquarters in São Paulo, Brazil. The "Church" has been accused of money laundering, charlatanism, and witchcraft. It is banned in several African countries.

The church applies Prosperity Theology, a doctrine which states that financial success is the will of God, and that donations will increase one's material wealth. The founder of UCKG, Edir Macedo, is worth an estimated $950 million. The UCKG considers that the first 10% of congregants' income "belongs to God" as a tithe payable to the Church as soon as possible in order to guarantee salvation.

In London the UCKG are active in areas like Brixton, Stratford and Kilburn. Congregants are drawn from black communities in deprived areas. In 2000, Marie Therese Kouao and her boyfriend Carl Manning were sentenced to life for the murder of Kouao's great niece Victoria Climbie, who was burnt with cigarettes, tied up, and beaten with bike chains and hammers.

The case precipitated an overhaul of UK Social Services. At the inquest it was revealed that Climbie had been taken to the Finsbury Park branch of the UCKG in the days before her death. The UCKG pastor who saw her allegedly said that he suspected she was being abused, but he thought Victoria was possessed by the devil, and she could be "healed" with prayers so he didn't call social services or the police.

Precautionary measures for born-again sluts

So what is this dodgy corporate church telling its women congregants on the subject of dating strategy? The piece starts by warning them to the well known player archetype—the game-conversant cad:

> Casanova-A smooth-talking charmer who has mastered the art of finding, meeting, attracting and seducing beautiful women into the bedroom. Once he accomplishes his goal, he leaves the woman in fear of having a relationship and proceeds to find his next conquest.

An archetype we all recognise, then. The author continues:

> There are many men all over the world who have made a point in life of targeting women who are insecure, disappointed in love, or that are just easily swayed by comments of flattery, These men prey on women to boost their own egos and to just add to their tally of female conquests.

Men who seek no strings attached sex are simply notch count hyenas in search of validation and women who accept their advances are insecure. Only sex had within the institution of marriage is legitimate.

> But just like these men with no integrity have learnt to take advantage of certain women, it’s important for women also to spot these kind of men and their behaviour and tricks.

Because only “certain women” are susceptible to game.

A man of no integrity, yesterday

> Here are a few pointers: If it sounds too good to be true, it probably is: If he is saying a world of nice things to hear, and he doesn't even know you yet, then something is up.

In other words, if it appears he is running good game, it's likely he is not the pliant beta schlub you are waiting for. He might even be a Recovering Average Frustrated Chump getting ideas above his station and gunning for that R-selected quick lay.

> If he is really serious, he will tread carefully so as not to get involved too quickly before he finds out who you are. It is better that the guy is taking his time, than him wanting to speed things along at the speed of sound.

Women are encouraged to bottleneck men into a Blue Pill dating strategy—k-selected attraction and endless coffee dates "getting to know each other," presumably all paid for by a beta who is "playing by the rules" of traditional courtship.

> Closed for business until marriage: if he says he wants to "share his love with you physically" so that he can commit to you through marriage, then something is wrong. That part of the relationship is so special that it should wait until marriage. Actually, if he realty wants to prove his love for you, he can marry you, What better way to prove his love than to marry you?

Thought this advice might be good if applied on a society-wide scale form an early age, there is conveniently no mention of whether the bride to be is a 21-year-old virgin or a born-again slut who has ridden the cock carousel into oblivion and is now looking for a two-legged life insurance policy willing to foot her pedicure bills into old age.

The "Casanovas" are degenerates who should be treated with contempt for trying to sleep with women without marrying them, but born-again sluts making prospective husbands wait for months (if not years) before they have what alphas got on the first night are, of course, perfectly honourable. The advice continues:

> Beware of physiological games : Some of these men are great at making women feel guilty if they do not give in to their advances. Remember that you are not obligated to do anything that you don't want to do. Those who love respect other people's boundaries. If he makes you feel uncomfortable or pressured, end things immediately.

Women love a good con

My first reaction was to think that since UCKG is a business concern dedicated to extracting cash from worshippers, banging the marriage drum is a way of widening the contributor base. How better to do this than by brainwashing women into the need to tie up a beta schlub for the long term?

On a closer reading, and notwithstanding that marriage is a central plank of the Church's programme at its sell-out Love School events, this is simply classic empowerment snake oil for women, and has precedent.

In his illuminating "The Road To Whoredom Is Paved With Abstinence," Emmanuel Goldstein reviews a similar ruse, The 30-Day Love Detox by Dr. Wendy Walsh, a television quack from Canada. The good doctor (of psychology) advises women to hold out, because "you've got a 90 percent chance of being broken up within one year."

Goldstein points out that the advice is based on a fallacy, since Walsh conflates correlation with causation (women who are able to hold out for 30 days are more likely to have longer relationships anyway). The mere act of waiting is not a guarantee means of ensuring a long lasting relationship, but sounds convincing as a cure-all, quick fix because it is conceptually simple.

This is similar to the way in which NoFap is presented to gamma incels as a shortcut to alpha status and a bottomless pool of pum-pum. The message is "avoid masturbation, and all else will follow." Substitute gamma incels for fickle women looking for a fast track to the stable relationship they crave after a prime spent on the Carousel, and you have a good, profitable Abstinence con similar to the Secret. Yet as Goldstein points out, refusing men sex (if women can manage it) is not enough:

> When a woman isn't rewarding the man with sex, she must find other ways to keep a high value man waiting. First and foremost, she must show that she won't change her mind halfway through the 'waiting period,' lest she bail and waste the man's time. Secondly, she should make the wait as pleasant as possible for him, to ensure he will stick around. That means looking superb, being a great conversationalist and offering him tasty, home-made meals. … Don't expect Walsh to tell any of that to her audience – that would mean doing something for a man.

Similarly, the UCKG's inevitably female advice columnist gives no advice to her readers as to what exactly is going to keep men waiting around for a lot longer than the 30 days advocated by Walsh. The scenario envisaged is one of the potential suitor subjecting himself self denial and financial expenditure in return for a chance to marry a woman who is supposedly so worthy that she is required to make no sacrifice in return.

The irony of UCKG telling women congregants that "If it sounds too good to be true, it probably is" is that the very same applies to the advice it's giving them. It's a "money for nothing" scheme which asks nothing of women other than that they hold off the fanny for an instant, free SMV boost.

Betafied men who are foolish enough to have been bamboozled by UCKG's glossy corporate identity and been lassoed into a blue-ball waiting game by one of its women followers would be well advised to remind himself to Iron Rule of Tomassi #3:

> Any woman who makes you wait for sex, or by her actions implies she is making you wait for sex; the sex is NEVER worth the wait.

And if the sex is not worth the wait, then neither is the marriage. Sexuality, says Rollo, is a spontaneous chemical reaction between two parties, not a process of negotiation. You grievously are wasting time and opportunities to meet better prospective women in waiting for marriage to shag any woman, let alone one that belongs to a dodgy, cultish church led by a billionaire.

What To Do On A Date To Maximize Your Chances Of Closing

March 18, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In an age of Tinder hook-ups, fast sex, and general slutty behavior, the notion of a date may appear old-fashioned, almost quaint. Perhaps that's to do with the word itself, which conjures up images of 1950s teens drinking milkshake at the diner before going to the drive-in.

But whatever you choose to call it, make no mistake, you're going to need to know how to interact with a girl you've only just met in a one-one-one situation. However archaic dating may seem, even in today's world it's pretty much unavoidable.

Why you need to know

Put it this way: in very few circumstances are you likely to meet a girl who will have sex with you without any preliminary conversation at all. Even if you meet her in a club and end up banging in the bathroom, you will almost certainly have to take her to a quiet corner of the venue to chat her up out of earshot of her friends first. This is effectively a mini-date.

When you meet a girl on the street, you will likely need to take her somewhere – perhaps for a coffee or a drink – before bringing her back to your place. But on many occasions the decision will be taken out of your hands, as the girl will demand some sort of meet-up to "get to know you better" after your initial approach before she will even countenance the thought of sleeping with you.

A lot of guys get sore about this and go on a tirade against girls, accusing them of leaching on male resources. While there are undoubtedly a great many goldiggers out there – who you should avoid at all costs – it's not unreasonable that girls should have the opportunity to find out whether or not you are a serial killer or a fat-assed beta chump before offering up the punani prize to you.

Make no mistake, though – when you go on a date you are on trial. What you must not do is fall into her frame – the one where you are positioned as the seller before her buyer. Instead you must seize the impetus and direct the date according to your best interests.

What men and women generally want from dates is not so much opposed as temporally mismatched. Generally speaking, she wants to find out if you are a "good match," and whether or not you "connect." Generally speaking, you want to bang. But she won't necessarily be in a hurry to get naked, so you need to develop a strategy.

Most important is that you adopt the right mindset. You should go on every date with the intention of closing the deal – that is, having sex with the girl – that night. Why? Girls have multiple options, and only after you've fucked her will you be anything less than a speck on her radar. If you don't make it happen that night, then there's a good chance she'll be lining up her next Tinder bang on the way home, and you'll never see her again.

You should therefore be absolutely prepared for sex, carrying condoms, and cleaning your apartment and your nutsack prior to the meeting. It has been said that each time a woman agrees to go on a date with you she is contemplating having sex with you.

Broadly speaking this is true. It is therefore your job not to do anything to fuck it up, and the push the interaction forward through verbal and physical escalation, and via male dominance, all the way to the bedroom.

The following tips are most applicable to the conventional evening date – one that takes place on a separate occasion to your first meeting with the girl –although they also apply in other situations, like daygame "insta-dates."

Drinks

The first date with a new girl should always be for drinks – alcoholic drinks, that is. Never take her out for dinner (not until you've slept with her, at least) and try to avoid coffee dates. While these can work for building comfort they are anti-seductive and therefore opposed to our purpose of getting laid quickly.

The purpose of taking a girl for drinks is not to get her blind drunk, by the way. Paul Janka recommends you have two or three drinks maximum – partly to keep costs down and partly because on or after the third drink you should be making your move. So intoxication is not the aim here.

But let's face it, alcohol has smoothed the path for sexual encounters forever. It will relax her and you too (assuming you drink, of course. I don't, so I just take a sparkling mineral water. A tip to the barman will ensure they're discreet about the fact you're on soft drinks.)

A lot of guys get worked up about whether or not you should buy drinks. Ancient game advice states that to do so is supplicatory and therefore beta. While this might be the case in a club when you first meet, I would suggest that on a date scenario it's slightly different.

For one thing, if you make a big deal about refusing to pay or making her go halves you risk looking socially inept and therefore lacking in value. This is a supreme passion-killer. So don't sweat it. Put your hand in your pocket.

If she indicates that she's cool with going halves then great. If not, don't make a big deal out of it. I'm not suggesting you should lavish her with vintage Dom Perignon, just don't make an issue out of something that needn't be.

The date venue

Find a nice lounge to take your girl to – not a noisy pub or frat house. Somewhere that serves cocktails, has booths, and offers waitress service is ideal.

What you need to do is find a couch, or similar, in a relatively secluded part of the venue. At all costs you should sit next to her. Never sit across a table – this is crucial. To do so feels formal, like a job interview, and sucks the erotic tension out of the scenario. What you are aiming for is to be close enough so that you can initiate touching and kissing easily and without having to lean in awkwardly.

What to talk about

The female-centric conception of the date is that its purpose is “getting to know one another,” hence “classic” date topics of conversation are your job, your family, hobbies, etc. What you must do is jettison all of this bullshit and talk about sex instead.

As I said, the purpose of the date is to end up having sex with her that night. Therefore you should make every effort to eroticise the conversation from the outset. This can be a lot of fun for both of you, and it will position you as “one of those guys” – an r-selected alpha male who isn’t looking for anything serious, but whom she can bang without fear of your subsequent neediness or other negative consequences.

When I say talk about sex, what I don’t mean is that your opening gambit should be asking her what her favourite position is. That’s creepy. What you should do instead is use double entendres, and deliberate misunderstanding of what she says to plant jokey references to sex that become more overt over the evening. This is a skill that you will develop, and it will become easier as you do so.

I interpret almost anything a girl says as sexual. It doesn’t matter how lame it seems – if you do it with confidence she will giggle and start to view you as a viable sexual prospect.

An example might be as follows. Say she says she needs more ice in her drink. I would raise my eyebrows, shoot her a naughty look, and say “I bet you like ice, don’t you?” When she says yes, I’ll then wink and say “where?” Or if she comes in from the rain and complains about being wet (an open goal, of course), I’d shoot her that same wink and say “oh really?”

There are countless examples of this. You just need to adopt a dirty mind. It’s very simple – essentially schoolboy humour – but if done with panache it raises the conversation from the banal, lending it an erotic fizz, and positioning you as a sexual guy who knows what he wants and is probably good in the sack.

Touching

Anyone who’s read The Game will know about kino – the art of touching to sexualise an interaction. This is absolutely essential on a date, and you should begin doing it as soon as she arrives.

Without hyperbole, the use of touch was the single most important revelation that accelerated my game beyond anything I’d thought possible.

Don’t touch in a sexual way – not at first, anyway. Instead, touch her on the lower arm, embrace her, grab her shoulders to make a point. After you’ve been with her for a while you can start resting your hand on her thigh and touching her hips.

One thing that is very effective is handholding. You’ll be amazed how quickly you can take a girls hand on a date. I’ve done it literally in the first five minutes. Once you’ve done that – and before you’ve even kissed – you’ve made the romantic status of your interaction overt. This is key – there’s no way she’s going to friendzone you now. If she pulls her hand away then don’t worry – just carry on talking and try again a few minutes later.

Kissing

As with handholding, you'll be amazed how quickly you can kiss a new girl on a date. Don't wait for ages and make it awkward – go in as soon as there's a small pause in the conversation and you're just looking at one another. Put your hand gently on her cheek and pull her towards you as you bring your lips to hers.

Many guys get scared about what to do if she turns her head away. The answer? Don't worry about it, just carry on talking and try again in a few minutes. I've had girls turn their heads on me four or five times during a date before they've finally kissed me passionately. You will always encounter resistance. Remember, confidence is attractive. The alpha male is charming but persistent, and temporary rejection (which weeds out the betas) doesn't phase him.

If a girl turns her head I normally say something like, "Sorry, my mouth slipped." Then I leave it for a while and try again. In the majority of cases she will admire my persistence and accede eventually.

Passing Shit Tests

Head-turning is a form of shit test, as are statements like "You're a player, aren't you?," "Does this normally work?," "You're not as smooth as you think you are," "I bet you do this with all the girls," and so on.

When hit with any of these, the advice is always the same – smile, ignore, and persist. If a girl tells me I'm not smooth, I'll say something like "Yeah, It's great isn't it?" and then just carry on. The same goes if she says "It's not going to happen tonight." Just ignore it and proceed with what you're doing anyway. Chances are she'll change her mind later on.

Closing

After two or three drinks, some sexy banter, touching and kissing, you're ready to take her home. The best way to do this is simply to grab her hand, say "let's get out of here" and lead her to a cab. If she asks where you're going, say "on an adventure." If you really need to explain, just say you have a great DVD to show her. "Going home to watch a DVD" is universal code for sex, so she'll get what's up and in most cases will be happy to go along with it.

If she does resist at this point then that's fine – arrange to meet her another time. Just realise that if she doesn't come back with you that night then you may have done something wrong earlier on, and your chances of seeing her again are severely reduced.

The Deadlift And Me

March 18, 2015 | by Michael Augustus | Link | Original Link

Second only to the squat in the most fundamental movements of humans, is the almighty deadlift: AKA picking heavy shit off the ground and putting it down. This lift is animal and definitely a measure of manliness.

The Ritual

Shoes off, earphones in. Last week was rack lifts and sub-max explosion sets, today is max-day, so I throw on the weight belt. After adding the last of the weights to the barbell, I step back to take it all in. The idea is to get my mind ready for what's to come, to make the weight seem larger than life so I don't hold back a single Joule of energy when it's go-time.

Yes, brain, you will lift this shit off the floor, the weights are set, and there's no turning back. Sometimes I sit on it, sometimes I rock it with my foot, either way it helps me prepare for the state of mind transition that's about to take place. When I feel I've recovered from my warmups, I put my favorite lifting song on standby…

… This song is reserved only for my max. It is the catalyst necessary to cross the threshold between civilized human being to savage brute. I do some stationary hopping and take some quick, shallow breaths because I'm about to unleash the animal from within. Once I hit the play button, the transformation begins. As I rock my head to the rhythm, all thinking starts to vanish as I attempt to breach the recesses of my lizard brain.

Adrenaline courses through my veins as it transfers all mental energy into the physical. I attempt to activate every possible neuro-muscular motor unit through numerous forms of flexing at variant intervals. Transformation finished.

I rush over to the bar and set my rags over the site of my hand placement as I always do with weight over 365lbs. Although they don't assist in the lift, they're thick enough to prevent my callouses from tearing, but thin enough to allow me to remain intimate with the weight. I hike my shorts up for maximum range of motion, and plant my feet in their approximate positions under the bar.

To reach my final foot placement, I grind my feet against the padding of the floor, feeling each micro crevice in the material through my socks until I'm satisfied. I hover my hands just above the bar where the rags are, carefully centering my hands in the proper position and clench my fists. I'm still expending resources to stay in my savage state. My hands grind the rags against the bar; I can feel the grooves in the carvings of the barbell, the intimacy I referred to earlier. Then I shake the bar, propagating waves of madness across the Earth.

Earthquake

With this I can get a better sense for the weight, feeling the individual parts vibrate. Each component is separate, yet they are one, it and I are one. My favorite part of the song approaches…

Go Time

This is it; this is what I train for. I pinch my shoulder blades together, look myself in the mirror across the room, and tuck my chin in…blast off.

NASA

The bar bends, the weights point outward, but there's a pause. Like a space shuttle launch, a tremendous amount of power is being pumped into the system for an extended period of time just to accelerate from the takeoff pad. Once the weights finally leave the ground, a lot of my energy is sapped, yet I drive on.

I see people turning their heads in my peripheral as I'm leaving the floor, so I must be groaning but can't tell; I can't even hear the music blasted in my ears or see directly in front of me. Failure is never an option, especially with the audience now present; I've worked too hard for this moment.

I press on, but now my vision returns. According to the mirror across the room, my face is flexed and red and my teeth are displayed like an ape. Finally I lockout, and look down at the plates with great pride. I'm better than I was yesterday. Fuck yeah. Lightweight.

Why You Need To Boycott The NBA

March 18, 2015 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

Sheryl Sandberg is one bossy woman.

Instead of pitching her feminist ideologies to a target audience, like Jezebel or Buzzfeed, she has decided to infiltrate the NBA. The intrusiveness will appear on a television near you, via the "Lean-in" campaign. Sandberg has partnered with the NBA to fight for women's rights at home and at work, and she has even managed to enlist the services of Lebron James and Stephen Curry. For the next two months, the NBA will be delivering public announcements on major TV networks.

A few days ago, Sandberg went on ESPN to promote the plan. There is enough bullshit in the accompanying article to fertilize an Iowa corn field. Let me just critique the major points:

1. Sandberg is hoping to persuade men that they will be better off financially and emotionally if they take more responsibility for housework and child care, while also backing equal rights for women at work.

Immediately, we see that she is an expert at conflating the issues.

The "Lean-in" program is good because:

- Men will be better off financially if they take more responsibility for housework and childcare
- Men will be better off emotionally if they take more responsibility for housework and childcare
- Men should also back equal rights for women at work

Each of these points need to be examined on their own merit. Then, after a careful review of the evidence, a conclusion can be drawn. Let me save you the time of researching the points. Her goal is to confuse the listener; that way, they'll be more likely to support her primary claim (that the NBA needs the "Lean-in" Program).

In a sales pitch, this is calling "spinning the client." You confuse them right away, which breaks down their wall of defense–this then allows you to sell them a used car, or a Florida time share.

Sandberg also employs the "argument by assertion" fallacy—if you say something enough times, it eventually becomes true and you win the argument. People have heard the "women are oppressed" argument so many times, that they now accept the claims at face value.

2. "Gender equality doesn't just benefit women, it benefits men in lots of ways," Sandberg said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Is gender equality good for men? Let's take a look at statistics regarding gender "equality" in the Western world:

- – The 2016 US budget will eliminate all funding for prostate cancer; meanwhile, breast cancer will retain its funding (Note that more men in the US die of prostate cancer, than women of breast cancer).
- Men are sentenced to longer prison terms than women for the same crime.
- 97% of the alimony received in the US goes to women.
- In France, men are prohibited from conducting a paternity test (even if they know the child is not theirs).

The statistics show that the feminist version of "equality" has not been favorable for men. A lot of guys are afraid of gender equality, and for good reason. It's merely a talking point, divorced from reality. A growing number of men are affected by misandry, not misogyny.

3. Among other things, she believes most women are likely to have sex with their husbands or partners more frequently when they get more help at home — a phenomenon she has branded as "choreplay."

"Choreplay" is one of those terms that feminists love–a clever play on words, which momentarily validates their existence. They can use these terms to publish dissertations that nobody will read, or to fund non-profit organizations.

But on to the point at hand. Are women turned on when men do the dishes, or iron shirts? Team feminism has done a good job at trying to convince us so. However, recent research is now proving otherwise:

- In 2013, a study showed that people in more traditional marriages have better sex lives (American Sociological Review)
- A study in New Zealand from 2014 found the same results.

And let's not forget the recent success of Fifty Shades of Grey. Women across the Western world went into a tizzy over Christian Grey. And what kind of character was he? Was he a male feminist, busy ironing shirts before his wife got home from work? Hell no. He was an Alpha male with an edge, who liked tying up girls and then treating them like dirty little whores.

Conclusion and recommendation

Sheryl Sandberg is another social justice warrior, trying to force her ideologies on the American public. Sport lovers need to be concerned. Gone are the days when, after a long day at work, you could tune out the world by watching the ballgame. Now, thanks to people life Sheryl Sandberg, you'll be drilled with political talking points.

But of course, it takes two to tango. Today's athletes are also to blame. Men like Lebron James and Stephen Curry have, essentially, sold out the American male. They have enough money, so why are they doing this? We can only assume that they, like Sandberg, believe in political feminism. They need to learn from the stars of yesterday–men like Magic Johnson, Larry Bird, and Michael Jordan; none of these stars would preach feminism to their fans.

I'm calling for a 2015 boycott of the NBA. These industries need to be reminded that their viewership is predominantly male (70%). We no longer accept the SJW agenda, and we will vote with our dollars. This means the following:

- No paying for NBA tickets
- No buying NBA merchandise

Women Only Want To Attach Themselves To Your Status

March 19, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

“Like millions of people across the globe, my husband and I are outraged and heartbroken over the kidnapping of more than 200 Nigerian girls from their school dormitory in the middle of the night,” Michelle Obama began her address to the public in May 2014. “This unconscionable act was committed by a terrorist group determined to keep these girls from getting an education. Grown men attempting to snuff out the aspirations of young girls.”

Michelle then keeps blathering on for solid four minutes with a constipated look on her face. She mentions faith, female potential, strength, how educated women power economic growth, the importance of courage women must have to pursue a better life for themselves, and so on.

Michelle was, and arguably still is, the most powerful woman on the planet. She can take action! She can show us how a woman handles business just as good as a man does, or even better! Come on, Michelle, show us what you’ve come up with!

The hashtag is mightier than the sword?

She hijacked the spotlight Mr. Obama generally uses to deliver important political and economic news and directed it onto herself. And what did she teach us? That social media activism can stop terrorists?

Taking the blinds off

Never mind, these fuckers are actually having fun

Though laughable, Michelle's address regarding Boko Haram's kidnapping of over 200 Nigerian girls in 2014 reveals many secrets hidden in plain sight. You can find out everything about how the world functions, if you can read between the lines. Be warned, as once you see things in this light, you will never be able to go back to being naive and mistakenly believing women are inherently altruistic.

Michelle was on the verge of tears when talking about those Nigerian girls. But why would she give two shits about them? She lives halfway across the world and has all the amenities she could ever ask for. Besides, there are millions of other men, women, and children living in utter poverty, filth, and sickness on a daily basis.

Instead of doing some concrete action, a woman will rather emphatically urge others to do something, also known as nagging. This is because women are inherently solipsistic and first and foremost care about their own sanity. Nagging others into action gives a woman the good feels that come from solving a problem while at the same time making her immune to any and all possible criticism if something goes wrong.

Women also cannot empathize with men, but can with other women. This is why Michelle didn't bother to make the same plea when Boko Haram kidnapped 40 boys and men. Why would she? They're just boys, after all. Hence, men are perfect targets for nagging.

Chronic backstabbing disorder

Round one – FIGHT!

All women possess an in-group preference towards other women and this is their default worldview. This means that a woman you thought you knew and loved can and will instantly turn against you and side with an inconsequential unknown woman. It doesn't matter what happened, it's your fault and the woman is the victim.

One sole exception to this rule is a mother and her son, which is why even the hardcore feminists start to rethink their beliefs once the baby boy gets charged with sexual assault when he smacks the girl that took his toys.

The horrifying implication of this is that no woman is truly capable of loyalty. Not towards man, not towards any ideal, nothing. A woman answers only to her biological imperatives and knows no honor. She will attach herself to a man and use his resources and status to cruise through life on easy mode.

When she's done with him, she will simply switch to another man and keep on draining. The old patriarchal society harshly punished such nonchalant behavior towards men, but today's SJW societies will support and assist women in doing so all the way up to "crazy cat lady" category and beyond.

Rising through the ranks

There is nothing you can change about this situation except yourself. You will do so by adapting and using this knowledge to your benefit. Understanding the motives of women around you is all you need to achieve romantic success or, at the very least, avoid a catastrophe. It’s important to note that you ought not resent women for being like this. It’s simply their nature gone wild.

Your status is everything you have. Everything you do on a daily basis contributes to who you are as a man. Therefore you must always stay vigilant and allow nobody to ruin your status under any circumstances. Don’t associate yourself with those who willfully stay infirm.

Rather, always seek the smartest, the strongest, and the most able and learn from them. As you progress through life, you will accumulate status and this will give you more options in all aspects of life—work, health, sex, friends. And that, my friends, is the very definition of freedom.

5 Things Wrong With Modern Music

March 19, 2015 | by G.W. Rees | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: The author is fully aware modern music is in fact very diverse, is not constituted solely by what can be found on the various pop-charts, and that not every characteristic decried in the following post can be observed all the time in the realm of popular modern music. NAMILT.

He is also cognizant of the fact that numerous unfortunate attributes of contemporary music can be found in the music of yesteryear. The point is that so many destructive traits have become characteristics whose subversive effects, outright ridiculousness, and lack of appeal would have been understood only a couple of generations ago.

For many people in the present-day, these things barely register in their minds:

1. Everything Is Perfect

In today's world of music, when it comes to the recording process, there is no room for error. The engineer or producer is the music industry's equivalent of a helicopter parent; an individual who micromanages the entire bulk of sonic content in a song. Editing recordings with near surgical precision, they remove the types of idiosyncrasies, nuances, and inexactitudes which often made music of the past interesting.

Like the Ritalin-munching, screen-addicted, over-supervised kid who has been robbed of a genuine childhood, the songs we hear today have been purged of many once celebrated qualities by being forced to adhere to so many rigid parameters, which ultimately stifles the potential for any genuine life in a musical composition.

As an example of this divide I present these two specimens:

The Kingsmen – “Louie Louie”

Iggy Azalea (feat. Charli XCX) – “Fancy”

“Louie Louie” was recorded in one take. I can guarantee you “Fancy” was most certainly not. In “Louie Louie,” if you listen carefully at the 0:54 second mark, you can actually hear the drummer yell “fk” because he fumbled one of his drumsticks. In “Fancy”, at 2:02, Ms. Azalea intentionally raps the word “fk”, because that’s just what “edgy” feral broads like her do.

In The Kingsmen song, after the guitar solo the singer comes back in too early, realizes his mistake, and stops abruptly. The drummer then, having observed this blunder, acts instinctually by filling the void with an impromptu drum fill. Brilliant. No such magic happened in the making of “Fancy.”

These particular incidents aside, just sit back and listen to the sheer sonic difference between the two songs. “Louie Louie” is loose, noisy, and amateurish, bordering on outright sloppiness. Iggy Azalea’s song is stiff and pristine to the point of being clinical. In short, The Kingsmen’s sound is that of a group of beer guzzling chick-chasing mischievous fratboys, while Iggy and her ilk have the kind of sound reserved for only the best professional wannabe trouble-makers.

2. Female Exhibitionism

Whores, whores, and more whores. It seems like every other contemporary popstar parades herself with more zeal than a common street hussy.

Any fellow who has “taken the red pill” should know by now that women are naturally prone to exhibitionism. The world of pop music invigorates these tendencies to levels previously unseen, making it the ideal forum for cultivating unrestrained grossly immodest behaviour.

This piece of trailer trash royalty and her musical mating call need no introduction:

Miley Cyrus – “We Can’t Stop”

Ms. Cyrus is the kind of gal who, even if she didn’t have a singing career solely because of her father, would likely still be on a stage somewhere tatted up and twerking. Her birth name is “Destiny Hope Cyrus” after all.

If such perverted exhibitionism was a self-contained phenomenon (like strip clubs) it might not be so bad. However, the broadcasting of such content via mass media in conjunction with the female proclivity towards herd mentality spawns a toxic synergy. Such a combination ultimately results in debased sexual moral standards for young women and the normalization of slatternly behaviour, in turn sowing the seeds of cultural rot and the decline of our once mighty civilization.

In short, music like this is a vector for the virus of degeneracy. The proper treatment for the ensuing disease is ridicule and shame.

3. Men Don't Sound Masculine

In the Manosphere there is often talk of "High T" women, but what about "High E" men? Listen to this pansy:

Maroon 5 – "She Will Be Loved"

Every time I hear Adam Levine's voice an image of a singing ant donned in silver armour with LED lights for eyes comes to mind. Worse yet, he is crooning over a 40+ woman while the twenty-something more attractive daughter takes a backseat in his thoughts—yikes! What a weird guy.

Here's another shining example:

The Weeknd – "Wicked Games"

Mötley Crüe once said they dressed up like chicks to get chicks; I guess The Weeknd sings like a chick to get chicks (and this is definite chick music btw).

If you suffered through those two examples and feel as if you need an antidote, I recommend this musical pill (be sure to consciously compare and contrast with the above):

Johnny Cash – "Ring of Fire"

For some of you, Johnny Cash may sound too dated, or hokey, or perhaps you disdain country music entirely. That's fine, we all have our preferences, but one thing which cannot be disputed is the sheer masculinity of this man's voice, especially in contrast to the present day weasels featured above. Long live testosterone.

4. Everything Is Going To The Beat

Blue jeans, fast food, Walmart, Hollywood, suburbs, and…"sick beats." These are all emblematic of the colossally hideous Jabba The Hut-like behemoth—known as globalization—currently devouring tradition and genuine cultures.

Aurally probe these three songs, which although stylistically different, utilize the same rhythmic tool (and it is a tool) inherited from disco:

The Black Keys – "Fever"

Luke Bryan – "That's My Kind of Night"

Pitbull (feat. Ke$ha) – "Timber"

How can genres, which target such differing demographics and also have identifiably distinct idiomatic origins, all be underpinned by, more-or-less, the same rhythm? Music, like everything else, is clearly undergoing rapid convergence culminating in a homogenized mass music culture.

When the fundamental components between songs are so alike, the differences become trivial. The destruction of differences—many of which are rooted in longstanding musical traditions—ultimately generates a world of banality.

5. Overtly Sexual

Modern music is saturated with sex, and a great deal of it tends to be overtly sexual.

Take this charming little ditty for example (NSFW):

Khia – "My Neck, My Back (Lick It)"

Have you ever seen a room full of women in their twenties singing along to filth this shameless, while grandmothers stare catatonically on in horror, parents guffaw and smirk in direction of the floor, and the more "enlightened" boomers laugh delightfully as if the behaviour their daughters are displaying is of no significance at all? I have, and let me tell you, it is weird.

Weird like we're living in some futuristic sexual dystopia. A dystopia where all things sexual have been reduced to an amoral form of childish amusement, and the segment of the population who have historically been the nurturers and caregivers of a society have decided to shirk the honourable traditions of their forebears and turn feral.

It should be obvious to any discerning observer the deterioration popular music has undergone in recent decades. This phenomenon parallels the decline elsewhere and also feeds it; there is a reciprocal relationship with music and society-at-large.

Music is an immensely powerful force in this world—bearing this in mind, one should always be cognizant of the particular qualities of a given song, and what their potential effects may be.

6 Things You Need To Know About Burning Fat

March 19, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by IgnoreLimits

Uncovering The Truth

Fat loss does not have to be expensive, confusing, or only attainable by those with "great genetics" or those with countless hours on their hands to commit to mind-numbing cardio.

When I started out five years ago I bought into all the hype, blowing easily a couple of thousand dollars on supplements, while simultaneously chaining myself to the treadmill and ensuring I was eating small meals every couple of hours to "keep my metabolism firing along"…

There comes a point in time where you realize the effort you are expending does not equal the results you are getting.

I was working my ass off but I was struggling to get results. Why? Because I was doing what everyone else was – broscience workouts, dieting principles and just general fuckarounditis jumping from one diet, training regime etc. to the next in what I'd essentially call "shiny object syndrome."

After much trial and error, along with reading, testing, recording, and the like I discovered what works.

Don’t waste your time jumping from one approach to the next like I did, nor fall victim to paralysis by analysis…

1. You Don’t Have To Count Calories To Get Lean

To look good you don’t have to count calories at all. To burn fat you simply need to consume FEWER calories than your body is burning on a 24-hour basis. There is no such thing as a fat burning food, period.

Acai berries? Nope. Celery? Nope. Grapefruit? Nope.

Consume a high protein diet with a moderate amount of dietary fiber and drink two glasses of water prior to every meal.
A high protein meal will leave you feeling fuller than carbohydrates or fats ever will, fiber and water will leave you feeling fuller quicker too, this is a simple approach to decrease your chances of overeating.

If you want to look the best, however, you’re going to need to calculate your calories. Don’t worry, I’ve got you covered.

2. Weights Are Your Friend

When it comes to fat loss cardio seems to be the go-to thing to do in the gym. Lifting weights is far more beneficial however because:

1. Performing heavy compound movements such as the squat and deadlift burns a ton of calories, not only while you’re performing your lifts… but afterwards during the muscular recovery phase too.

2. By lifting weights you’ll be building muscle, an increase in an muscle will result in an increase in your metabolic rate (the rate at which your body burns calories) as lean muscle mass takes an additional amount of energy to move and maintain.

3. When It Comes To Cardio More Is Not Necessarily Better

HIIT (High Intensity Interval Training) is king. There's no need to spend 40 minutes to an hour mindlessly grinding away on the treadmill or elliptical when you can burn the same amount of calories in 10-15 minutes of interval training.

Interval training is known to be far more muscle-sparing than the traditional LISS (low intensity sustained state) as well as assisting in increasing speed and explosive power.

4. Meal Timing? Forget It

Want to eat every two hours? Want to eat every 12 hours?

Go for it.

Fat loss (and muscle gain for that matter) is a game of calories in vs. calories out. This is where most guys get caught up and suffer paralysis by analysis. Plan your meals around your schedule and lifestyle – don't get paranoid if you eat earlier or later than normal.

This may be a controversial point, but from my experience (following styles of dieting eating every three hours vs. fasting with one or two large meals per day within a specified eating window) I noticed no difference in terms of the rate of fat loss, and have seen no studies indicating a significant enough increase in the metabolism to promote accelerated fat loss.

5. Over The Counter Fat Loss Supplements Are Highway Robbery

Most “fat burner” supplements are a complete joke. Here’s why:

- -The majority of these supplements have had the formula ‘padded out’ with filler ingredients
- Run of the mill ingredients are referred to by their scientific name to attempt to trick you into thinking you’re getting something new and groundbreaking
- Proprietary blends are used on formulas to prevent the disclosure of the supplement dosages within
- The effective ingredients in these products are generally just caffeine and green tea, which can be purchased separately for a fraction of the cost of the fat burner itself

6. Diets, Supplementation, and Cardio All Lead To The Same End

A calorie deficit.

Fat loss is impossible without a calorie deficit, period.

Different diets, supplementation and workout regimes are all utilized and manipulated to create a calorie deficit.

My Comprehensive Solution

For the past five years I have walked the walk—my results speak for themselves. If I wasn’t confident I could get you the same results I wouldn’t have written the book.

F.U. Fat is the final product, there’s no upsells. Everything you need to know and all actionable advice is contained within this one book – I don’t try to sell you a course, coaching, or any ridiculous supplement line in the book.

The techniques I share with you are from my own personal experience (i.e. I do/have done all methods discussed) as well as a plethora of referenced studies to back up claims and recommendations.

There is no filler. The book is 140~ pages long on Amazon Kindle. I had no intended length in mind—I said and discussed everything that needed to be said and eliminated any repetitive or unnecessary information. I did not attempt to reach a certain word count or page number, when a book is intentionally dragged out it's easy to tell.

Prior to hitting the "publish" button I issued just shy of 50 copies of this book to friends, family, training partners, other fitness bloggers etc. and clarified and ironed out any unclear areas.

Why “Docility” Is The Best Word To Describe Femininity

March 19, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

We red-pillers all know that androgyny is a vice often confused as a virtue. People from all ideological sects have written at length about what masculinity is, but what is femininity?

It’s worth mentioning what femininity is not. When looking for a wife or girlfriend (or just a bang-buddy you won’t hate to be around), some tomboyishness isn’t a disqualifier. That’s on a spectrum, and a girl who enjoys playing basketball isn’t necessarily androgynous. Nor do we want a complete ditz valley girl or a codependent basket case. After all, addiction to the iPhone is certainly a womanly trait, and none of us want that in a partner.

If we are to grant a little over-simplification, masculinity is about power and femininity is about beauty in the broadest sense of those descriptions. Ultimately, to be feminine, a woman must be in touch with her femininity (If that is not too much of a tautology to say). She must be willing to embrace it. And that femininity must involve docility.

Real Men, Real Women

I like the word “docility” to describe femininity. It’s laden with much more meaning than “submission.” On the surface it has the same meaning, but it’s missing the negative connotation the modernists have given it. “Docile” is from the Latin word for “to teach,” which frames it even better within proper relationships between the sexes.

A feminine woman is a woman who is teachable. And what woman is not attracted to a man who can do everything she can better, a man who is greater than her? She wants someone to admire and aspire to. She wants someone to teach her things. In short, she wants to be docile.

You’ll notice in our society, everybody has a different definition of a “real man.” People claim being a real man involves hunting, growing a beard, chivalry, or expressing your emotions. Everyone may disagree over what the exact definition of a “real man” is, but most males strive for some ideal. Note the phenomenon among millennials who play dress-up masculinity by bringing back old trends like the straight razor or fedora.

However, people do not have a notion of a “real woman,” at least in today’s society. So if masculinity looks like [x], what does femininity look like? We’ve eradicated that notion. If a woman can cook well, we believe it is merely a useful skill, not an expression of her sexuality. And even then, what good is a woman who maintains a home if she is unbearable to be around? Domesticity is worthless without docility.

Not masculine. Now with bonus mason jar.

Why is there an ever-present war between the sexes? That doesn’t seem healthy for anyone. Men and women should strive for symphony, instead of always one-upping each other for the mere bragging rights of it all. Men continue to try offering an olive branch, but women gloat incessantly at every slight way they excel beyond men, such as how they graduate more often from the baby-sitting service known as American universities. In one breath, they’ll claim that taking care of small children isn’t part of being a woman, and in the next they’ll claim men are all dunces about it.

Nor can you have two people agreeing on every decision. That just sounds miserable. Eventually the man will give a compromise just to appease the woman, and he will resent her for it. Meanwhile, she'll resent him for his half-heartedness.

Compound that on a regular basis over several years, and suddenly everyone is terrified of marriage. Nobody is ever truly happy in a compromise. You need one to make the decisions, a man the woman trusts to look out for her best interests. And it must be the man, because no woman respects a man who never gets his way.

Taking Accountability

I'll preface that I'm about to quote the Bible at length to tell a story. I think I've ragged on Christianity enough that the regular reader will understand I'm not trying to convince him to become a Christian. However, remember that part of the purpose of religion is to keep people from coloring outside the lines. If one can view the Biblical narrative as a myth in the classical sense, then passages like below will fit in well with our purposes.

1 Peter 3:1-6 has a very effective picture of femininity. It's good general advice regardless of one's worldview.

> 1 Likewise, wives, be subject to your own husbands, so that even if some do not obey the word, they may be won without a word by the conduct of their wives, 2 when they see your respectful and pure conduct. 3 Do not let your adorning be external—the braiding of hair and the putting on of gold jewelry, or the clothing you wear— 4 but let your adorning be the hidden person of the heart with the imperishable beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which in God's sight is very precious. 5 For this is how the holy women who hoped in God used to adorn themselves, by submitting to their own husbands, 6 as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord. And you are her children, if you do good and do not fear anything that is frightening. [ESV]

A few months back, I showed it over Facebook chat to a friend of mine who was unhappy with her new marriage to an alcoholic video game addict. (Women suck at choosing partners, amiright? Unarranged marriages…) She is non-religious but vaguely spiritual. We'll call her Florence.

I explained to Florence in brief about what female submission looks like, in that it's not a coercion but a desire to seek the best for those around her. I told her that if he's being less than all he should be, she should focus even more on being all she can be, and that will pull him up in a roundabout way. But if she is constantly criticizing him, then he'll just become resentful and withdrawn.

Did Florence get angry at my suggestion that she should hold herself accountable to the success of her marriage or that she should make an effort to bring others happiness? That seems to be the common pattern one finds on those awful feminist websites.

No, the exact opposite happened. She thanked me enthusiastically and said it was a beautiful passage. A week later she messaged me again to express her gratitude.

Apparently Florence doesn't want the modern empowerment that society has fed her, and she is not alone.

Wired For Submission

So we see that—especially evidenced by the steamroller success of 50 Shades of Grey—that women want to be dominated. And this makes sense. Docility wouldn't be expected of women in every human society ever if women did not have an innate desire for it. Men would not brag about their ability to control a woman, to conquer her will, if women did not naturally settle into submission.

Women are like Pokemon—they are designed to flourish most when taking orders from the ones they love. And like with Pokemon, the order-giver must prove his worthiness to the order-taker before wholehearted obedience is yielded.

Women show love through their femininity, and men show it through their masculinity. No man wants a slave for a wife, because a slave does not love. Love is a choice. It takes all your will to give up your will. And by giving up your "want" and focusing on your "should" (i.e. your role as a man or woman), it shows that you are willing to be selfless for another person. Marriage is about interdependence, not independence.

Recall The Taming Of The Shrew, in which both the metric of men's marital success and the metric of women's marital happiness is determined by the woman's willingness to submit herself to her husband's will. Even though I may not agree with them, it's worth here defending Petruchio's extreme measures, as Katharina would have been miserable on her wedding day no matter what he did and that Petruchio did not actually harm her through the brief starvation.

Katharina's closing monologue is absolutely beautiful both in its aesthetics and its moralism. 20th century critics have tried to write the whole play off as satire, and both the the 1929 and 1967 movies made it appear in the final scene as though Katharina was merely faking adoration to appease the powers that be.

But the speech is clearly the thesis of the whole work, and if it were satire or posturing, there is never any shadow of it anywhere within the play. To abruptly shoehorn a modern moral into the end disrupts the natural flow of the play. Ethnocentrism is the hallmark of the liberal. The University of Alaska at Anchorage, however, has a fantastic red pill rendering of the play on Youtube that is one of the most endearing Shakespeare performances I have ever seen, far better than any Hollywood Shakespeare.

Perhaps ironically, the monologue fits perfectly in today's society, even better than in Shakespeare's society. One would think Katharina was directly talking to 21st century women. Let the below be a lesson to all women in miserable marriages.

> Fie, fie! unknit that threatening unkind brow,
> And dart not scornful glances from those eyes,
> To wound thy lord, thy king, thy governor:
> It blots thy beauty as frosts do bite the meads,
> Confounds thy fame as whirlwinds shake fair buds,
> And in no sense is meet or amiable.
> A woman moved is like a fountain troubled,
> Muddy, ill-seeming, thick, bereft of beauty;
> And while it is so, none so dry or thirsty
> Will deign to sip or touch one drop of it.
> Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
> Thy head, thy sovereign; one that cares for thee,
> And for thy maintenance commits his body
> To painful labour both by sea and land,
> To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,
> Whilst thou liest warm at home, secure and safe;
> And craves no other tribute at thy hands
> But love, fair looks and true obedience;
> Too little payment for so great a debt.
> Such duty as the subject owes the prince
> Even such a woman oweth to her husband;
> And when she is froward, peevish, sullen, sour,
> And not obedient to his honest will,
> What is she but a foul contending rebel
> And graceless traitor to her loving lord?
> I am ashamed that women are so simple
> To offer war where they should kneel for peace;
> Or seek for rule, supremacy and sway,
> When they are bound to serve, love and obey.
> Why are our bodies soft and weak and smooth,
> Unapt to toil and trouble in the world,
> But that our soft conditions and our hearts
> Should well agree with our external parts?
> Come, come, you froward and unable worms!
> My mind hath been as big as one of yours,

> My heart as great, my reason haply more,
> To bandy word for word and frown for frown;
> But now I see our lances are but straws,
> Our strength as weak, our weakness past compare,
> That seeming to be most which we indeed least are.
> Then vail your stomachs, for it is no boot,
> And place your hands below your husband’s foot:
> In token of which duty, if he please,
> My hand is ready; may it do him ease.

Be Here Now, And Don’t Give A Damn

March 19, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

What are we really here for?

To achieve success, wealth, fame, pussy, and accolades? Or is there something more?

Could it be that how we handle difficulties is the real test?

> A man arrives at heaven’s gates.
> The angel says, “here is the film-reel of your life, edit it into a 2 hour movie and we’ll judge if you get into heaven.”
> The man spends weeks preparing his show-reel and hands it to the angel, who nonchalantly tosses it into a trash can, over-flowing with other movies.
> “What are you doing,” said the man?
> “We don’t watch your edit, we look at all the bits you cut out,” replied the Angel smiling.

At one point or another everyone reaches a moment where they don’t give a damn. If that point comes just before you take your last breath it will essentially mean a life wasted. It’s only when you don’t attach your identity to the outcome that you are liberated. The road a person takes to “not giving a damn” (or what some PUA’s call “outcome independence”), defines who they become.

Most people never reach this lofty goal and many of those who do are mired in psychological damage they incurred along the way. Inventing terminology almost makes it harder to accomplish. You believe you might know and understand what “outcome independence” is and yet without actually experiencing it AND seeing success come from it, mastering that inner state can be very difficult.

What use would it be owning a private Caribbean island if you were constantly stressed out?

I was watching a documentary the other night about Richard Branson’s Neckar Island and there he is, hanging out with paying guests visiting his paradise – and yet strangely with all that wealth and accomplishment, the underlying attitude you sense is a guy that really doesn’t give a damn.

[image]

He almost looked like he was on heroin, which is not surprising; research shows alpha monkeys have a higher serotonin level. After achieving a superior position in which they can’t easily be challenged, the reward triggers in the brain, go into overdrive; stress becomes something of the past.

Look past the personality, gossip, history, whether you like or dislike him—and find the psychology. That’s the important part. Being able to handle whatever may come is not about money, girls, fame or any of that, it is almost entirely a state of mind.

[image]

Then Lightening Burned His House Down

[image] [image]

The trick is obviously in the psychology used to arrive at the end goal, where you are detached and inert to the happenings of life. If a person is constantly running on adrenaline and dopamine, all hyped up, caffeinated and stressed out, they are incredibly attached to the outcome and this is why stockbrokers literally jump off buildings when their investments go bust.

On the other hand if you cruise in life, (or totally bum out) opportunities can so easily pass you by. Striking a balance between being stimulated and active, whilst not attaching your identity and mental state to the outcome is entirely psychological and yet incredibly difficult.

You want to approach a girl, start a business, move countries, get up on stage—and yet you are held back by doubts, lack of experience, lack of accomplishment etc. You step forward and freeze in your shoes. The inner you is already there, the best player in town, the richest guy on the block, the top of his game but the actual you is nowhere close.

All it takes is a few bits of bad luck and suddenly there's an emotional baggage to deal with and often that's enough to bury a person. On the flip side if you are successful the euphoria often sets up disappointment to follow.

Not everyone winds up homeless, but many end up drifting in the middle ground, pretending not to give a fuck, whilst underachieving and attaching their success to highly superficial and material goals. This is why you can find so many miserable rich people. They create a certain amount of success they are desperately trying hold on to.

They never mastered the psychological process and are scared they can't repeat it. The classic case is the young insecure rockstars pumping themselves full of heroin and coke – they got too much too soon (great book btw.)

[image]

In other cases, having reached a level of financial independence and recognition, very talented people sometimes back right off and coast along for the rest of their lives, forever dining out on accomplishments of yesteryear. In the middle ground are many people who live mundane and superficial lives, while pretending they have all they wanted—or are "too good" for anything better.

None of these states are the real outcome independence

Think back to times when you had nothing left to lose. The hot girlfriend's sleeping with another guy, boss fired you, money ran out, just moved into a complete shit-hole apartment, because it was all you could afford. In that moment you are actually at your strongest, for the simple reason that you have nothing left to lose.

The real trick is not identifying with the situation or allowing it to goad you into reacting.

Even better, embrace it and love it. When you really hit your wit's end, you are forced to adopt that attitude because it's all you have left.

That doesn't mean you have to plough yourself into an impoverished state, but life will take you in that direction until you learn the necessary lessons. The best businessmen, investors, professional gamblers, players etc., what they do is approach every situation with this attitude. They are almost playing to lose.

For them it's all statistics. There is nothing attached to them, nothing that defines them. The faker puffs up his ego and pretends not to give a fuck, but on the inside he's a mess. We all are to some degree, but no amount of success will reduce that inner fear.

> If you're going through hell, keep going.
> Winston Churchill

What kills the inner fear is loss and suffering. You only build muscle by lifting weight (and experiencing pain) and in the same way you only build mental stamina and charisma by trying and failing until failure is no longer an option. When you don't give a damn, successful strategies naturally fall into place and minor downfalls are nothing but potholes along the path.

At this point (most people give up) the winner begins to crave failure (which represents a challenge) because it's the only way to learn and improve. Meanwhile success becomes endless and unlimited.

Life is completely psychological and yet we have so much difficulty coming to terms with this concept, in part because it involves a great deal of inner pain. We crave success but it alludes us. Why can't I just walk down the street, hit on that gorgeous girl and be having sex with her a half hour later?

Well you can but only when you no longer care about it. This is the irony. By the time you get what you wanted, you see it's all just a mind game and not even an interesting one. The fun part lies in controlling your own inner state, your conscious experience.

The target is to be empty of any designs or ambition

When I'm "in the zone" it's all happening and it's only about the conscious experience. Doesn't matter if it's picking up women, making money, playing a sport, or programming a computer – the goal is not the why or the what – the goal is "the how." Create your own luck by staying cool. Are you in the moment and loving it, with nothing to lose, or are you still struggling with a lot of mental chatter and unnecessary stress?

It's very easy to say the rich guy is all relaxed and confident from his success, but I guarantee you he carried that inner state before he ever made a penny or got laid. A part of the entrepreneurial mindset is finding people to do things for you and you cannot do that when you are all wound up. The man who has nothing to lose often comes out the victor.

Is Danica Patrick The Most Overrated Sports Figure In History?

March 20, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In 144 NASCAR Sprint Cup and Xfinity races, Danica Patrick has never been on top of the podium. So for years now, the sporting community and wider world have been fed a pernicious lie. Patrick has been paraded around as a champion of NASCAR, a metaphor for victory against sexism and a role model. Nothing could be further from the truth.

At every stage of her professional career, Patrick has benefited from, rather than been disadvantaged by, her gender. Her paucity of non-existence of any achievements at the highest level has not stopped her from obscuring a litany of more talented and deserving drivers.

Endorsements continue to rain in for her, notwithstanding that there's no evidence she had to work any harder than her male counterparts. Literally dozens of male drivers have repeatedly out-achieved her during her time racing. Where is this sexism that's always implied wherever Danica walks or whenever she farts in the wind?

Patrick is far more homely without make-up, photoshopping, and a fake CV of racing achievements.

Danica’s story has never been about sexism

Few people understand that machines and racing are in Danica Patrick’s blood. Her entire existence came about because her parents met each other on a blind date when her mother was a mechanic. Her father was also an avid racer of a variety of vehicles. This is no story of a girl reaching the heights of NASCAR without any advantage or previous connection to machines and racing.

Danica’s exposure to racing, mostly via her family upbringing, was so encompassing that she moved to the United Kingdom at the age of 16 to pursue her career. Media exposés mythologize Danica’s story as if she came out of nowhere, or from Planet Talent and Totally Deserving.

When she progressed into the IndyCar Series, before either NASCAR division, she proved to be a grossly underwhelming driver, winning only a single race in seven years and 115 starts.

Her boyfriend is better but a hundred times less well-known

Both Danica and her boyfriend, Ricky Stenhouse Jr., are mediocre NASCAR drivers at best. The pair placed 28th and 27th in the 2014 Sprint Cup respectively. Sure, they could race the pants off every ROK reader. But we are not professional drivers. And both Patrick and Stenhouse are professional drivers with subpar results compared to many of those above them. Again, though, Patrick’s skid-marked record still doesn’t impinge on her exponentially higher national exposure.

Stenhouse's achievements far outstrip Patrick's, to say the least. He is also five years younger. In the Xfinity Series, NASCAR's second tier competition, Stenhouse was the overall champion in 2011 and 2012. He boasted eight individual wins from 107 races (7.5%).

Patrick, you guessed it, won zero races during her stint in the Xfinity Series (0% for our math-loathing SJW friends). In 58% (62) of his Xfinity races, Stenhouse placed in the top ten; Patrick was in the top ten a mere 11% of the time (seven from 61 races). Stenhouse had eight Xfinity pole positions, Patrick had a measly one.

Ridiculously, after Patrick had her best Xfinity Series season result (10th) in 2012, the same year Stenhouse won the championship, she debuted as a full-time driver in the Sprint Cup before him.

Even in the Sprint Cup, Stenhouse has outdone Patrick. Neither has won a race, but Stenhouse has twice as many top tens (8) as Patrick, who has raced on four more occasions.

Patrick makes German tennis player Julia Görges look non-overrated, a truly stellar achievement.

Other drivers are justifiably annoyed

Ex-driver Richard Petty, who won 200 individual Sprint Cup races and seven Sprint Cup championships, said that Danica Patrick would win a Sprint Cup race "[only] if everybody else stayed home." His son Kyle, another former driver, was similarly and accurately dismissive of the preposterous myths surrounding Danica Patrick.

Pressured by the pack of wolves known as the misandry media, other drivers would be financially and socially eviscerated for drawing attention to Patrick's actual racing antecedence, rather than endorsing and promulgating the ultra-hype. So they keep quiet and grind their teeth as she takes center stage, countless places below them.

Feminists want attention for female sports "stars" because they're women, not because of their "talent"

Though NASCAR is now a non-gendered field, feminists are obsessed with putting Patrick on a pedestal, despite her never being on top of the NASCAR pedestal known as the winner's podium. This is an extension of their approach in other gender-divided sports, where tennis players such as Maria Sharapova and Serena Williams are given equal standing with the far superior Roger Federer and Novak Djokovic.

These sycophantic feminists successfully pin their hopes on an ignorant sporting and particularly broader public who are shepherded into thinking Patrick is a legitimate champion. It need not matter that the evidence is there to prove that NASCAR's token woman is a fraud in light of how she is incessantly presented. The story sticks if you repeat it ad nauseam.

Kevin Harvick, a NASCAR champion in reality, not fantasy. Note the absence of milking one's gender.

The "truth" skeptics are out there

The Bleacher Report, that veritable bastion of (a kind of) red pill sporting wisdom, has been questioning Patrick's missing credentials for several years. CBS joined the criticism in a more nuanced fashion, naming Patrick in their list of the top five most overrated athletes (although spare a thought and a tissue for Chamberlain, Sanders, Rodman, and Rodriguez for being bunched in with her!).

Facts are facts. But even facts don’t guarantee the truth will win out in the world of sports and money. Danica Patrick knows this better than anyone. All she needs to do is look at her bank balance and turn on her TV.

How To Keep Things Casual When She Wants To Be Exclusive

March 20, 2015 | by Dave Perrotta | Link | Original Link

You've hit it off with a girl. Things are going well—you see her once or twice a week (maybe more) and have some fun hook-ups.

But you're still going out and meeting other women, and at this point, you're not ready to give up your freedom for something exclusive. You'd much rather keep things casual, and continue having a fun time with no strings attached. And it seems like all is going according to plan.

That is, until she brings up the topic of "us". It's the dreaded conversation that is usually bound to happen at some point.

Granted, it doesn't always happen—sometimes you can hook up with a girl for months and months and still avoid it. But other times, a girl will want to know the answer before you even hook up with her. She wants to know: Are the two of you dating? Exclusive? Are you looking for a girlfriend? Where is this going? How do you define "us?"

This conversation can go one of three ways:

- Exclusive relationship. You don't want to lose the sex, so you cave in and start dating her.
- Friends with benefits. You handle the conversation the right way, and she basically agrees to continue on and keep things casual.
- End of the "fling." You handle the conversation the wrong way, she gets offended or angry, and decides to stop seeing you altogether, or to just be friends.

Assuming you want to keep things casual, you're aiming for the second outcome (friends with benefits).

So, you need to know the right way to handle the conversation to achieve this outcome.

That way, when the conversation does inevitably come up, you're well prepared and handle it with composure and poise…instead of fumbling around like the average guy.

I used to have A LOT of trouble with this conversation. I didn't know how to explain that I wanted to keep things casual, without upsetting the girl. I'd end up either caving in and dating her (which was always a mistake because I didn't really want it), or just ending things with the girl altogether (which usually sucked because I liked hooking up).

But that all changed a few years ago. When I started going out every weekend, I made it a point to hang with guys who were more experienced and understood women better than me at the time.

And I started learning a TON.

But one of the best, most actionable things I picked up was a simple routine for converting girls into "friends with benefits" relationships (AKA fuck buddies).

As soon as I learned about it, I knew it was gold. And it hasn't let me down. In fact, it's worked for me almost every time I've used it—and my friends have had the same results.

Sometimes, I even bring up the "us" conversation before she does, so I can use this technique to lay out the expectations from the outset.

It's called the "Grey Area Routine". Read it, learn it, use it. It'll make those conversations SO much easier.

Not only is this routine great for forming fuck buddy relationships—it can also be the difference between whether you sleep with a girl the first night (if you use it correctly).

Here's how it works:

"The Grey Area Routine"

You: "You seem like a very 'all or nothing' kind of girl."

Her: "Yeah I guess you could say that."

You: "I used to be like that. I dated a girl for a long time, but since we broke up, I've just been living in the "grey-area."

Her: "What's that?"

(This next part is KEY.)

You: Raise your hand at about neck level "If you think about relationships, and you say up here is a long-term relationship, with full commitment."

Put other hand a foot below the top hand* "…and down here is just a one-night stand, where there is no emotional involvement at all. Well, this area between the two…"

Point to the area between your hands* "…is a grey area full of all sorts of interactions and relationships that two people can have. This can be just as fun or fulfilling as the other two extremes—both people just have to be honest about their expectations."

Her: (They almost always say something like this) "Wow, I've never thought of it that way."

You: "Yeah, and you can move back and forth in this area as the relationship evolves."

Her: "I like it."

You: "Me too. I think it's perfect for people our age, and in our position."

That's the basic outline of the routine.

It works so well because:

- It sets expectations. It lets her know that you care about her, even if you're not fully committed to her and it also clarifies your expectations of the relationship.
- It's clever. There's no chance she's ever gotten a response like this before, so it makes you stand out and look more intelligent and mature.
- It makes her comfortable. She doesn't feel like a "slut" for continuing to hook up with you without the commitment of a label.

Get this routine down, and the next time the "us" conversation comes up, you'll be able to handle it like a champ. The result will be an awesome casual relationship with a cool girl.

5 Ways To Avoid The Bottom Of The Social Hierarchy

March 20, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Many will never admit it, but the forming of hierarchies is a natural and inevitable result of any social grouping. The moment you join a new group of people (a class, workplace, sports team) individuals will begin undertaking subtle tests of each other's mettle. These will decide who they will listen to and who they will ignore, who they will befriend and who they will ostracize, who they want to fuck, and who they don't.

Passing these tests is a vital part of attaining social success. For those who have trouble socializing, your goals may not be all that high. At a bare minimum, you may simply want to avoid being "that guy." You know who I mean:

There’s one in every group of more than two people. It’s that awkward kid in class who people always avoid sitting next to. The insecure work colleague who is never invited to anything. The clueless guy who is bullied for the slightest social mishap, made even more frequent by the maddening double standards people have.

You see, not only is “that guy” socially inept, he can never be socially adept. Even when he acts just like everyone else, trying hard to fit in, there seems to be some kind of unspoken agreement not to let the socially retarded kid gain an inch of popularity. He’s the one everyone’s making fun of, and that’s the way things are going to stay.

Few people will offer you genuine, useful advice on how this works. After all, why give the plebs the tools to revolt? But lets take an honest stab.

1. Never show signs of weakness

You stubbed your toe? Tough. A ball hit you in the face? Ignore it. A guy called you an idiot? Give him the finger and keep going.

Alphas males never show weakness. Betas are the ones who prick their finger then run around showing it to everyone. An alpha walks into a room with his leg in a cast and doesn't mention it unless someone asks. Let others come to you, and remain as casual about your misfortune as possible.

This goes for how you organize your life as well. Don't be the guy always losing things, or who is always asking to borrow a pencil or for a lift home, or who always turns up late (unless it is…fashionably late). Appearing not to give a shit can be an important social tool, but being simply disorganized is the opposite.

I noticed a curious example when driving to school camps—it would always be one of the unpopular kids who'd put up their hand first and ask if we could stop for a bathroom break. The cooler kids would remain silent, never breaking frame. Yet once we did stop, they'd pile off the bus and head to the bathroom just as much as everyone else.

2. Come Prepared

There’s a saying here in Australia – you’re not a true Aussie unless you’re friends with at least one person just because they have a pool, a caravan, or a boat. Take advantage of this principle.

This overlaps with the above, but concerns your preparations before any kind of social gathering. Always turn up at parties carrying a slab of beer, a bottle of Smirnoff, or whatever your social group drinks, though be careful what kind you bring. Alcohol choice is perhaps the closest men come to fashion choices – we will notice it. People are typically assholes about this. Vodka cruisers are out – but vodka and soft drink may be fine.

On anything outdoorsy, bring packets of lollies, nuts or whatever sounds appropriate. Bring your phone or laptop with a killer music playlist. The last camp I went on, where we were in cabins, two guys bought an X-Box and stayed up till after midnight playing it.

Basically, make sure you bring props to help your interactions with others. This can work either for meeting girls or just talking to guys in general. Of course, don’t let people take advantage of you, but that should be obvious.

3. Look as attractive as possible

Fat kids are routinely ostracized. The tall muscled footballer less so. This doesn't mean getting your nails done, but be sure to spray on deodorant, gel your hair, and dress fashionably. Roosh has mentioned that one of the downsides of being a modern man is that we must pay much more attention to grooming than previous generations.

Good grooming should become part of your daily routine. Any particular weakness in your appearance, do your best to address it. In 2015 there is no shame in going down to the chemist to buy pimple cream, or to take a pair of scissors and trim your ass hair. Nobody else is going to do these things for you.

4. Practice, practice, practice

Since I started uni, I decided that you only live once, and it was best to try new things while I was young. In the past year, I have gone out and done:

- Open mic comedy
- Community radio
- Footy training
- Submitting short stories and articles
- Charity work
- Raging against the machine here at ROK

Seriously, just go talk to people. A lot of young guys give up too easily. I had a weird conversation a few months ago waiting for a train late at night. A guy came up to me and said "hi." I asked if I knew him. He said no, sat down, introduced himself as "Stewie" and said he just felt like talking. We chatted for over an hour.

It turns out he does this all the time. He likes to go up to random strangers and say something to them like – “Hey mate, I’d just like to say, you’re looking good. Have a nice day!” and walk off.

Stewie (artist’s impression)

In most environments (public transport, uni, workplaces) people seal themselves off behind a phone, earphones, a book, or something else. Once you break that ice, however, conversation tends to flow easily.

Something I’ve realized is that “nerdy” people are not necessarily smarter than the general population. They may be great in certain specialized fields, but the real difference is that while they’ve spent years learning about cellular biology, the history of ancient Greece or memorizing every Star Trek episode ever broadcast, others were immersed in honing their day-to-day social skills.

It all tends to even out in the end. Just watch the Big Bang Theory. The guys are A-grade physicists and engineers – but Penny knows how to actually talk to people. I’ve come to regret a lot of wasted time in high school where I was often the nerdy kid who’d go to the library to read a book rather than have mates to chill with outside. Things did improve over time, but once you fall a few years behind its very hard to catch up.

5. When in doubt, remain silent

Learning the language of any new social group is key. Otherwise, you'll stick out like you've entered a foreign country. Sometimes, it is just better to be silent. This is the most important single thing I have learned about socializing.

I'll admit I was a bit Hermione-ish in my youth, being the kid who'd always put up his hand to answer a teacher's question. I eventually realized this was social poison.

Stay silent, remain mysterious, sit at the back of the class and rarely raise your hand. Don't be too cheap with your time or your attention or it will quickly become valueless. This is probably the origin of the stereotype of the "strong, silent type" – a good kind of person to be.

I don't mean never initiate conversations (of course you should) but always have a purpose in mind. Keep inane chatter to a minimum. Give people something worth listening to. Cultivate passions and skills of value so that others find themselves coming to you. This is true on social media as well.

We all know that ideally in a conversation you want to be using fewer words than the other person. Your aim is that others should be contacting you first most of the time.

Now I don't know if all this comes naturally to others and I'm just struggling along in the distance. Then again, perhaps taking the long way up has gained me insights others take for granted. If somebody had told me all this when I was 14 or so, I think I'd have had a much better time in high school.

If you're currently stuck there, I would like to give the advice that your life doesn't really begin until you turn 18. So many movies obsess over it, but in hindsight, school is a very small pond. If you're already the omega in an established social group – sorry, but chances are you're stuck there.

Whenever you enter a new one however, the above can help you fit right in, or even rise to the top, rather than sink to the murky depths of social isolation.

6 Warning Signs A Girl Isn't Worth A Relationship

March 20, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

In the past I've shared warning signs when a girl will "disappoint" you in some way. I've discovered some other more serious infractions based on the way she interacts with you.

In the movie A Bronx's Tale, a mafia don teaches a young man that after a girl gets in his car, she should lean over and unlock his door to be considered a keeper. Here's the scene:

While my warning signs aren't tests, they say a lot about the worthiness of a girl for long-term relationships. If a girl does any of these, dump her.

1. Changing your music without first asking for permission.

The first thing I do when get a girl over to my shack is put on some music. Depending on the mood I'm trying to set, I'll go with something like The Weeknd, Vanessa da Mata, or Michael Jackson. As I'm making drinks, if she goes to the laptop, cuts off my music, then pulls up her own music on YouTube, she's only getting fucked that night and never again. Even though she wants to play "this one song," I cut her crap off and put mine back on. I say, "If you wanted to listen to your music you should've invited me to your place."

2. Giving you unsolicited advice.

I don't care if I have the most obvious problem in the world that can be solved with baking soda, but if I don't ask you for help or at least show I'm open to receiving help, then shut your mouth. You're not my mom and you're not someone who has more life experience than me, so spare me your harebrained ideas for solving a man's real problems.

3. Saying "you should."

There is absolutely no reason for a girl to ever tell a man "you should…" It insinuates that not only are you currently doing something wrong, but that she knows more than you, which is extremely unlikely. She is free to say, "Have you thought of…" or "What do you think about…" but the moment she brings out the word "should," a synonym of "must," I know she's an arrogant harp who thinks she knows more than she really does. The only things I should or must do are pay my taxes and die.

4. Not apologizing when she texts or takes a call in your presence.

If I'm on a first or second date with a girl, and she starts reading texts, sending texts, or actually taking a call without excusing herself first, she will never see me again. Even the most conceited attention whores will let off an "Excuse me I have to take this real quick." Otherwise she doesn't deserve another meeting with you, even if she puts out and turns out to be okay in bed. You let a girl disrespect you like this and you might as well hand her your balls.

5. Asking you to postpone your orgasm so she can gain more pleasure.

If you're about to bust your nut and a girl does tells you "No" or "Wait," she's an inconsiderate slut who is now causing you direct harm. A man's nut is sacred, and for her to impede that should be criminal. I'm serious. One time a girl postponed my nut and then I lost it completely. I couldn't get it back and I was left with minor groin pain. I never contacted her again.

6. Not urging you to continue pumping even if it's starting to cause her discomfort.

I'll tell you what love is: when a girl begs you to keep going even though you know she already came, even though she's drying up, and even though you know it's causing her pain. If she tells you to stop the millisecond after she gets her nut, without you getting yours, I want you to tell her that the point of having sex with women is so a man doesn't have to use his hand, and that she has performed below the hand. That's why we do all this shit to bang women—to get our nut. If she can't do that for us, then she's useless as a living being.

Let go of girls who show arrogance, disrespect, or selfishness. Depending on the severity of her offense she may still be worth one fuck, but other than that you're a fool if continue seeing girls who display these anti-feminine traits. The sad truth is that most of this list was developed when I lived in Scandinavia, where my hand was much more enjoyable than most of the girls I ended up in bed with.

The Mystery Of Human Destiny

March 21, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

The mystery of destiny remains one which every man faces during his earthly existence. Life holds a spiritual meaning, apart from the sensual and material pleasures it provides man. The journey of our life keeps throwing challenges which raise questions as to what actually controls our lives. Sometimes life throws shit at us when we least expect it to happen.

We can't control everything in our lives, even if our control itself might be great to begin with. Sometimes, we have to make the best in what circumstances we find ourselves in—even if we may not want to be in those to begin with.

What controls destiny: predestination or free will?

> Man was destined to have free will. – Hal Lee Luyah

Philosophers and great thinkers have always tried to unravel the secrets of human destiny since antiquity. Whether freedom or predestination controls human destiny is one of the most frequently asked questions among humanity— more so because of man's innate and great concern for freedom.

The questions which one asks when faced with the concept of predestination are:

- Are all our actions and fates really predestined?
- If every thing we do is predestined, then where does that put the concept of good and evil – when we don't seem to have the power to change our intentions and actions? Should we held accountable for our deeds and morality, then?

The arguments for the existence of predestination often threaten the notion of human freedom in life, which itself seems distasteful for the rational mind. But at the same time, disregarding the presence of predestination in human destiny altogether also seems a flawed approach, if we take human history in regard. Free will thus seems to provide the way out.

Reading through the scriptures of most religions, one would indeed find a lot of prophecies, sometimes about the appearance of important men and events during various time periods. Now these prophecies would've been fulfilled (or may be fulfilled in the future)—but the fact remains as many of these prophecies have been fulfilled, life does seem reveal the phenomena of predestination.

It does baffle the mind when one thinks about how some of these prophecies came true – sometimes across centuries. If mankind's destiny was totally undecided and unknown – totally subject to free will—then how did these prophecies come true?

The war between what influences destiny is a debate which remains baffling to humanity as ever. Arguments like the argument from free will and the dilemma of determinism are just a few examples of the numerous theories expounded to highlight the superiority of free will over predestination, or vice versa. Nevertheless, the logical approach seems to be adopting a middle ground between both, for both beliefs hold caveats.

A simple example to show how belief in either philosophy pushed too far can muddle a man's mindset

Both theories will hold caveats, especially when pushed too far, for they can easily lead men into a blue pill world of illusionary thinking which holds nothing but disappointment in the end. There could be numerous examples to illustrate how both can affect men's lives.

Belief: "Women can't be changed, and can't go against their nature. Thus it's better to be with a woman (no matter how low-life she might be), than to be without a woman at all."

I've heard a lot of men say this to justify their choice to sexually scavenge or choose sub standard women in their lives. This statement, reeking of defeatist fatalism, usually leads to the defeatist acceptance that women might not be able to control themselves at all, which might lead men to lower their expectations, standards and demands from women – because women are supposedly 'predestined' to fail men.

Indeed, women are not perfect—and they have lowered their value even more by sub-standard behavior in today's feminist societies. But accepting that should not mean at the same time that men are disposable. Is a woman's life, her needs and expectations, more valuable than a man's? Definitely not.

But this defeatist "acceptance" —stemming from a convoluted self interpretation of predestination—affects a lot of men, not only when it comes to women, but also to other aspects of their lives, whether it may be in their careers, friendships, or other relationships. Acceptance should in no way mean lowering your expectations or the bar for others in your life. It's important to be qualified in your life, but at the same time see that others also qualify themselves to be a part of your life.

At the same time, pushing the concept of free will too far can distort a man's thinking to push him into a blue pill world, without even him realizing it. Every a supposedly "rational" theory like that of free will could become limiting when it is practiced without moderation. One such example is below:

Belief: "NAWALT – Every woman is different"

This is an example of free will driven thinking when pushed too far – even though it might not appear at first. This belief basically exonerates every woman by assuming she would totally function to logic and proper use of her free will, basically ignoring the true nature of women.

The refusal to understand women with the known frailties of female nature usually ends up in disappointment for men when women exercise their free will negatively, because sometimes we are socially programmed to believe that free will is more "rational" than predestination itself. Even if that might be logically true, can a leopard change its spots?

Either ways, the end result seems to be that both free will and predestination cannot single handedly provide answers for the questions of the human mind and the problems of human life.

Conclusion

As one penetrates deeper into the worlds of predestination and free will, one realizes that human destiny seems to be affected equally by both of them. Our deeds and thoughts are indeed indirectly influenced by them.

The solution remains to take the red pill to evaluate both theories critically, adopting an unbiased approach, But even if both might affect our destinies, it makes sense to maintain a mindset unaffected completely. Moderation in every aspect of life is praiseworthy; and the same applies to the intellectual mindset how we utilize to unravel the mysteries of life—for that is one of the hallmarks of self mastery.

How To Know If You Should Take Out Student Loans

March 21, 2015 | by Paul Enname | Link | Original Link

Last week, President Barak Obama announced a bill of rights for students who borrow for college, and promised that clarifications and increased repayment options were soon to follow. Reading between the lines, many see this is another step toward increased student loan forgiveness, a burden that will then be borne by the rest of us.

I find this deeply disturbing, as I have lived simply and avoided debt to make my own way life, first in the military, and later in the working world. I'll be damned if I paid for my education with 5 years of enlistment while a student with an interdisciplinary degree in religious and gender studies sees any part of her $100k student loan bill forgiven.

The difficulty of escaping student loan debt

As some of you readers know, currently it is nearly impossible to discharge college debt. It will follow you for a lifetime, and the servicers of that debt can garnish all forms of income to see it serviced. Many of those would like to see those policies change, including the 12% of student debt holders that are currently delinquent and the 44% of those loans that are currently being deferred; More than half of the trillion dollar plus college bill is not being paid back, making it one of the most epic bubbles of all time if the government begins charging those loans off.

Student loan debt is one of my deal breakers when dating. It's a hell of a thing to meet a woman you like, see her for a few months, and then find out she has $100k (unemployed with a master's degree in screenwriting) or even $140k (barista with a master's degree in economics).

I'm not saying that debt is always bad. There is nothing wrong with a surgeon carrying a quarter million dollars in student loans or a school teacher with a debt load of $25k, but it is all about the proportions; excess debt in many ways could be thought of as economic obesity.

How to avoid it

So how do you stay financially fit at determine whether you should enter the arena of student debt? Know the value of your degree. Value in this case is nothing more than the worth minus cost.

1. What is your degree worth?—What is the median wage of the profession this degree will qualify you for? What are the post-graduation placement rates? How safe is it from outsourcing and automation?

2. What is the cost?—How much will it take to get to get the skill set you want, including interest and all other associated costs? Can you cut costs by going to another school or living in a different situation? What are the opportunity costs?

After you take these two things into account, the choice becomes a simple cost benefit analysis. Either your goals make sense and you should proceed, or they don't and it might be time to re-evaluate.

This simple choice can still be too complicated for some. Last weekend I was chatting with someone at my local hobby store about the vocational degree he was pursuing when a young woman joined our conversation. She made it known that she was also pursuing a vocational degree – in costume design.

A few simple questions made it clear she was absolutely oblivious to these sorts of factors: she was going to pay $80k for a degree that would lead to a job with a median wage of $12 per hour. It is worth nothing that is less than she is getting paid for her current job. Assuming optimal conditions, if she lands a good job in her field upon graduation, and pays 10% of her income each year to her loans, she can expect to pay off this life choice in a little over 30 years.

That's a long time to spend paying off a dream.

6 Common Fitness Mistakes Men Make

March 22, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

Most people who regularly go to the gym don't make quality progress.

They don't burn much fat. They barely build any muscle. And they lift the same amount of weight they've been lifting for the past three years.

And the worst part is, it's almost always due to the same few mistakes. Let's cut through the bullshit and cover six of the most common errors guys make in the gym—and how they can be corrected.

1. Your diet is shit

Go easy on the Shake Shack

The number one reason guys aren't making progress is because their diet sucks.

Scrawny guys aren't bulking up because they're too big of pussies to eat the amount of food it takes to gain weight and build muscle. And fat guys aren't losing weight because they lack the self-control necessary to restrict the amount of food they're shoveling down their throats.

If you're small and you're trying to get big, then you need to eat more. And if you're chubby and you're trying to shed some fat, then you need to eat less. PERIOD.

2. You're not lifting

Yes, there's a time and a place for cardio. But it comes FAR after lifting weights… for general health purposes, yes, but especially for changing your body composition.

Resistance training and lifting weights applies a very important stimulus to your body that triggers improved nutrient partitioning – this means that when you're lifting weights any weight that you gain is likely to be muscle instead of fat and any weight that you lose is likely to be fat instead of muscle.

Cardio simply doesn't do this.

3. Your lifting routine sucks

Don't be like this fool

Way too many gym bros just do bench press and curls… they overwork their chest and arms and neglect the rest of their body.

For one, this won't lead to a physique that looks good. Moreover, it's fucking terrible for your posture and your long term health. Neglecting your legs and back is a quick way to develop back pain, knee pain, and other chronic joint issues.

Get on a proper, balanced routine and you'll see far quicker results and build a body that will age well.

4. Your form sucks

Bad form is a quick way to get hurt. It also tends to alter the exercise that you're doing in a way that prevents it from properly working the correct muscles.

For example, if you bounce the bar off your chest during a bench press, your chest ain't growing, bro—but you are likely to tear a rotator cuff or even your pec by going overboard on the weight. Also, if you don't squat deep enough or you let your heels come off the ground then you're not really working your legs and you're likely to ruin your knees and your lower back.

Take the time to do the exercises with correct posture, stop trying to lift more than you can, and you'll start to see better, more sustainable results in the process. You'll also feel better.

5. You compare yourself to other guys

Acknowledge guys who are ahead of you without having to compare

Constantly comparing your body to the biggest or most shredded guys at your gym is an easy way to lose motivation and feel shitty about yourself. Yes, it can be motivating in small doses, but it can also be frustrating and eat away at your self-esteem.

Every great body you see took time to be built. You have to go to the gym, eat well, and lift heavy as a regular habit for an extended period of time before your body will really start to show noticeable changes. Unless you want to compromise your health and take steroids, then adjust your sights to the long term and give yourself at least one year to make solid progress.

6. You rely on supplements

Pretty much all supplements that make a big impact are illegal – because they're liable to fuck up your hormone levels.

Protein powder, a pre-workout supplement, and some amino acids aren't going to magically “fix” your shitty diet and your lack of work ethic in the gym. It doesn’t matter how many post workout shakes you drink if the workout itself isn’t on point.

Solution: Eat well and lift heavy

Stay focused on making steady progress

The easiest way to avoid all of the above mistakes to simply eat well and lift heavy.

Depending on your goal your diet will vary. Scrawny guys should eat more in order to bulk up. Fatties should eat less in order to slim down. But everyone should be lifting heavy. And they should be lifting heavy for every major muscle group.

Adhere to these two simple principles and your progress will begin to skyrocket. It’s not complicated, it just takes time and effort.

How Will Smith’s New Movie “Focus” Falls Flat

March 22, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The hallmark of a good movie is seamlessly fusing an engaging story with a number of interesting characters, all the while providing the right amount of details and backstory to drive the movie towards an engaging climax and a gratifying ending. Whether the genre is comedy or horror, a good movie has these elements sewn together in a winsome and satisfying way.

Will Smith’s Focus has none of these elements and, as such, is a terrible movie.

Focus is about a veteran conman named Nicky Spurgeon (Will Smith) and his relationship with an amateur pickpocket, Jess Barrett (Margo Robbie). The movie opens with Jess attempting to con Nicky, with Nicky quickly exposing her amateurish attempt.

She wins him over and convinces him to take her under his wing and educate her in the arts of grift and deception. The pair develop a sexual relationship and after a particularly lucrative con, Nicky gives her a sizable cut and boots her to the curb.

Flash forward

Years later, the two cross paths in Buenos Aires. Nicky is working for a wealthy race car driver and in the course of his employ, he comes to find out that Jess happens to be the man's girlfriend. After a couple failed attempts at restarting their relationship, Nicky succeeds and the two begin their tryst anew. Nicky and Jess aim to complete the con Nicky started, but they fail and are saved by Nicky's long-lost father at the last moment.

The movie wraps up with the two in arms, heading to a hospital—poor and broken, but full of that sort of blind hope that only a corny romantic comedy can muster.

While the movie fails on many fronts, there are two primary failings of the movie: the lack of interesting and contextualized main characters and a broken, lifeless story line. Each shall be considered in turn.

The two-dimensional characters

First, the movie's two main characters are entirely uninteresting and stale. The character of Nicky is somewhat engaging—at this might be due to Smith's acting chops and natural charisma—but the character is still uninspired. The seasoned conman with a checkered past and a fractured relationship with his cold, distant father is incredibly trite.

No discernibly new spin is put on this common trope of the talented but troubled criminal. While this drab character is acted with Smith's usual chops, his efforts are completely hamstrung by the limitations inherent in his humdrum character.

Jess is completely flat and void of substance. While Margo Robbie is capable enough as an actress, she has neither the presence or personal magnetism of Smith that would allow her to transcend the serious limitations of her character. Jess' character is a typical 20-something blond who is ambitious but apparently troubled with psychic conflict about her life—basically every Western woman. As such, her character is lifeless, superficial and utterly uninspired.

Given that the two main characters are uninteresting, the relationship between the two is void of interest. It is painfully obvious from the outset that the two are going to knock boots and eventually fall in love. Despite this obvious story arc, the movie has no real push-pull between the two, no real sexual frustration or tension.

They come together with seemingly no difficulty or real spark and somehow fall in love, sort of. Sexual attraction can't exist without sexual tension and there can be no love without mystery. Sex and romance just happen in this movie and this seriously debilitating problem bleeds into the rest of the movie.

The lousy story

The main story arc—if it can be referred to as such—has no continuity and feels like two separate shorts with the same two main characters cobbled together in one film. Just like with the romantic relationship between Nicky and Jess, the main story is bland and contrived. The first part of the movie feels like an incredibly long introduction so the second part of the movie has context and makes sense.

The cons pulled off are either rather boring (the race car con) or incredibly fortuitous (the Superdome con). They seem to be secondary to the evolution of Nicky and Jess's relationship, but since neither character is particularly engaging, the plot is little more than a lifeless, meandering mess.

For a movie purported to revolve around the exhortation that one not lose focus, Focus has no focus to speak of. Despite Will Smith's charisma and the alleged chemistry between him and Margo Robbie, Focus simply is a lackluster, boring film. The characters are not original or engaging and the story arc would be more pleasing if it wasn't so mundane and broken.

Charles's Verdict: 2/10, would not watch again.

5 Ways To Reduce Your Risk Of Getting A DUI

March 22, 2015 | by Justin Puck | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: This is not legal advice. If you are charged with a DUI, contact your attorney

If you are a young man in America in the habit of practicing night game, you may find yourself driving to and from bars and clubs if no other alternative is available. Unfortunately, driving at night in modern America entails a much higher likelihood of a traffic stop by law enforcement regardless of whether or not you've actually been drinking.

The short answer is if you can avoid night driving nowadays, don't do it—take a cab, Lyft, Uber, or better yet, move to a large city where the transportation options as well as girl/guy ratio are more in your favor.

If you are not living in a big city, taxis, subways, buses and shared ride services are unfortunately rarely available. Many people therefore take the risk and drive at statistically the worst possible time in terms of risk of a vehicle stop. Do not underestimate chances of a DUI arrest, as they can still happen even when you are stone cold sober – yours truly experienced this firsthand many years ago.

It's happened to plenty of others also. So what's a guy to do if he's got no other choice, wants to have one maybe two beers at a night venue and still be able to survive a DUI stop? I will not advocate breaking the law, but here are some possible courses of action if you get pulled over:

1. Booze stinks

The flavor is what smells, not the alcohol itself.

The police officer will more than likely smell the beverage, especially beer, the minute you roll down the window. It doesn't do you any favors to admit that you've been drinking even one sip, in case you were wondering—you are not required to provide evidence for your own prosecution.

Regardless, if he's been working nights, you are not his first DUI stop and he's probably got a lot of pressure from his supervisor to make X number of DUI arrests per month. Police departments do not call these targets quotas, but "performance standards" which they will get an ass chewing if they do not meet. Cities and towns make a lot of money off of traffic stops, particularly DUI arrests, either directly or through matching federal funds.

On the monetary side, a first offense can cost you at least $3,000 not including attorneys fees. Much of that money goes to fines, court costs (a fancy way of saying a tax), diversion programs, Mothers Against Drunk Driving-affiliated organizations, and other eager hands in the till. Don't be their piggy bank.

Oh – why did he stop you? Look for things like "unsafe movement," "defective equipment," and other convenient lines of nonsense on the docket sheet if you are charged. And yes, if it gets to court your lawyer should subpoena the dash-cam footage. In fact, I firmly believe it wouldn't be a bad idea to install a dash-cam in your car and I eagerly await the day when they are at least available as options on new cars, but that's a story for another article.

2. Don't do the roadside circus act for him

Even Baryshnikov could fail this one sober.

Since the police officer smells booze (and sometimes even if he does not), he will order you out of your car sooner or later. Yes, you are required to get out when he tells you to. He will then likely ask you to perform a series of roadside sobriety tests. But notice the language here – he is ASKING you to do these exercises.

Remember, if it's reached this point, the police officer is already planning to arrest you. His mind is made up; for the moment he just wants to gather more evidence and his requesting your assistance in doing so. Since you never actually "pass" these tests anyway, you should politely decline.

The next step will be the breathalyzer, either roadside or at the station. It is up to whether to take the breathalyzer, as a refusal usually involves an immediate administrative suspension of your license and perhaps other penalties, depending upon your state. Check yours, but I'd say not driving for a year or more beats a DUI conviction any day. You only had a couple? You can probably pass, right? Read on.

3. The breathalyzer is a Ouija board

An oldie but a goodie – still in use many places.

If you decide to take the breathalyzer test, keep in mind the police officer is trained to use the machine in ways which will not benefit you as a defendant. One popular breathalyzer still in use at many police stations is an older model which literally has the CPU of a mid-1980s Radio Shack computer.

The manufacturer is very tight-lipped about the manual for this machine, but a good attorney should know how to exploit holes in the training and testing regimen, maintenance procedures, calibration data, and possible errors and any omissions by the officer.

4. Can you pass?

There is no make up exam.

While taking the breathalyzer, you may notice the police officer is always saying “blow, blow, blow….” during the test. This isn’t because you’re so drunk you’ve forgotten how to exhale, but because the police officer has been trained to have you keep blowing well beyond what is necessary to obtain an accurate blood alcohol reading.

Remember, whether you are truly drunk depends upon your BLOOD alcohol level. The breathalyzer actually measures alcohol on your BREATH. Provided you really only had two or three drinks and enough time has passed, you could actually have a situation where your blood alcohol level is below the legal limit of .08 but the stale air in the deepest darkest passages of your lungs still has residual alcohol left in it.

Police officers know this and other little secrets and will exploit it beyond what the machine requires for a reading. For example, they are required to observe you for 15 minutes (sometimes longer) before administering the test, but they won’t tell you that the 15 minute clock must be reset to zero every time the suspect coughs or burps in order to eliminate a false positive.

Similarly, hyperventilating right before you give a breath sample and pushing every last bit of breath out of your lungs right before you take the test may help clear your lungs of any residual alcohol and provide a more accurate reading. If they protest your exhaling strenuously right before you give a breath sample, kindly inform them that you are doing your level best to provide an accurate reading for their case – who wouldn’t want that?

Just a few thoughts, should you decide to roll the dice and take the breathalyzer test. If you fail the breathalyzer, as soon as possible find the BEST lawyer in the jurisdiction who handles DUIs and actually goes to trial and knows the subject, not just some solo hack loser who wants to cut a deal and take your money.

5. You just got branded

Arrest records are forever

If you pass the breathalyzer, congratulations. You now have a baseless drunk driving arrest record that you will have to explain to future employers even though you were not drunk at the time of arrest. As a bonus, when you drive down the road and a cop scans your plate in the future, yep – that arrest will still show up on your record.

The arrest is just that – an arrest, nothing more. Even if you were not convicted, it does not change the fact you were arrested for the charge specified. Unfortunately people, especially cops, rarely care about the difference between what you were arrested for and the actual outcome of the case. Hell, it might even show up with your picture on some scumbag's web site where you have to pay him to take it down.

It sucks, but good luck ever getting rid of that permanent tattoo on your record. Might want to think about that move to the Ukraine. What about the reason for the initial stop? They'll probably let that go unless it was speeding or something more serious – the stop was just to get you out of the car. You're supposed to be happy at not getting a ticket and passing the DUI, but if you passed the breathalyzer, the whole thing was an obvious scam – the cop was fishing.

Conclusion

DUI arrests, speeding tickets and motor vehicle infractions generally are coveted sources of revenue for governments big and small which never seem to get enough money. Given this, one has to wonder where we might be headed when self-driving cars are perfected.

Contrary to fears about living in a police state, self driving cars could actually increase liberty and privacy, as they take away the temptation for a police officer to abuse discretion in order to make an arrest. This advancement will revolutionize night time entertainment at bars, clubs and restaurants once people are no longer afraid to consume even one beer before heading out for the night.

Couple this with already popular dash-cams becoming ubiquitous and there won't be a lot of wiggle room for a cop to bend the rules to meet an arbitrary “performance standard” set by their dickhead boss in response to local political and fiscal pressures. Governments, MADD, AA and all other beneficiaries of the current racket should be happy to see DUIs go away, but I suspect a different reaction to come when their collection plate runs dry.

Robin Rinaldi's Wild Oats Project Shows Why Women Should Not Sleep Around

March 23, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Recently, author Robin Rinaldi made waves with the publication of her memoir The Wild Oats Project, about how she spent a year sleeping with men and women with the permission of her husband after badgering him into entering an open marriage. Her reason for cracking up a nearly two decade-long marriage? Boredom. I kid you not:

> I broke the news to Scott that I wanted an open marriage in early 2008, a few months after his vasectomy. "I won't go to my grave with no children and four lovers," I told him repeatedly. "I refuse."

I haven't read The Wild Oats Project, mainly because if I need to induce vomiting, ipecac is both less expensive and less painful. But Rinaldi's press blitz about the book gives away its crucial (and entirely expected) twist: after concluding the "project," Rinaldi divorced her loving husband and ran off with one of the men she'd slept with. Turns out that lotsa cocka is as conducive to a woman's happiness as a Glock in the mouth is to brain function.

The enthusiastic response to Rinaldi's masturbatory memoir—notwithstanding this amusing negative review from the Washington Post—is a prime example of the double standard in sex writing. Men like Roosh and myself who write about our experiences sleeping with girls abroad are libeled as "sex tourists" and "rapists." Meanwhile, female typists like Rinaldi and Lena Dunham can brag about committing disgusting acts—from molesting their little sisters to divorcing their husbands out of boredom—and not only get published by major companies, but get movie deals.

More importantly, The Wild Oats Project puts the lie to a popular myth in society: that women need to slut it up in order to be fulfilled. "Sowing her wild oats" was supposed to be a fun experiment for Rinaldi, one that would strengthen her relationship with her husband. Instead, it ended her marriage. She'd be happier if she'd just behaved like an adult and stayed with her man.

How Sluttiness Corrupts Women And Ruins Relationships

It's an established fact that girls who whore it up are less suitable as wives and mothers. No, I'm not making that up: studies show that the greater the number of sexual partners a girl has when she gets married, the greater the likelihood that she'll end up divorcing her husband. Even having just one partner before tying the knot causes a girl's chance of divorce to skyrocket. Men, marry virgins if you want to be as safe as possible from the family courts.

The reason why sluts are more likely to divorce is because they're incapable of committing to anything. As a species, females are inclined to flakiness and indecisiveness, and promiscuity kicks these defects into overdrive. It takes time to develop a relationship or marriage: time to get to know the other person, appreciate their qualities and flaws, and ultimately reap the rewards. Sluts sleep around because they're addicted to instant gratification, which is why promiscuity in women is also correlated with obesity, drug/alcohol abuse and other undesirable traits.

The elephant in the room

Robin Rinaldi's book is a prime example of this. According to the excerpt I posted above, she had slept with only four men (including her then-husband) when she began her "project." One year and ten men later, her personality had become so warped that she could no longer sustain a marriage that had lasted for nearly two decades. She tries to spin her story as a necessary journey of self-fulfillment instead of what it is: the sad story of a sad woman who detonated her relationship out of selfishness.

Additionally, the idea that women have to sleep around to gain "experience" is completely bogus. Cocks aren't tampons; you don't have to toss them in the trash after the first use. Every bit of sexual experience a girl "needs" can be earned from a committed relationship. For example, when I was in college, my longest relationship was with a girl who was a virgin when I first met her. A month after we started having sex, I had trained her up to be my own personal freak in the sheets.

While I don't care if women sleep around—people should be free to do whatever they want—choices have consequences. If you spend every day smoking meth, you'll eventually grind your teeth into a fine dust and develop the physique of a starving Ethiopian. If you sleep around, you become less desirable to men who want a committed relationship. You can stomp your feet and cry about how unfair it is, but there's nothing you can do about it.

Why Open Relationships Are A Stupid Idea

The Wild Oats Project also throws acid on another popular leftist idea: that monogamous relationships are “uncool” or a social construct.

For the past decade or so, the left has been claiming that marriage and lifelong fidelity is an aberration brought about by the Agricultural Revolution, and that humans would be better off if they were more promiscuous. Hack pop science books such as Sex at Dawn push this idea by speciously arguing that hunter-gatherers of old were more sexually liberated than the humans who came after.

As Robin Rinaldi’s experience shows, making a relationship “open” in order to strengthen it is like destroying the village in order to save it. In the New York Post interview, Rinaldi describes how she became livid when she discovered that her husband had been having a relationship with a younger woman, despite her own sleeping around. Turns out that all the pretty platitudes in the world couldn’t help her overcome her feelings of jealousy.

Sexual exclusivity is one of the cornerstones of a romantic relationship. If a man and a woman aren’t committed to each other—whether it’s because of cheating or because one of them doesn’t want to have sex anymore—their relationship will eventually fall apart. There are exceptions, but for most people, “lame,” “conservative” sexual mores are the best path to personal contentment.

The Wild Oats Project is a spectacular example of the idiocy of “empowered” women. What little Rinaldi has shared with the public shows her to be a deeply selfish and clueless woman, who thinks that writing a story about how she cheated on her husband and left him makes her look good. Her imbecility should serve as a warning sign to both women and men.

6 Reasons Why Asia May Be The Best Place For A Western Male

March 23, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

Almost a decade ago I looked in the mirror and decided I was done.

I decided right there and then that having a 9-5 job, getting a mortgage and paying for it until I was too old to wipe my own ass, then marrying some fucktard who may leave me and destroy my life at age 40 because she picked up a copy of Eat, Pray, Love was not the life for me.

I booked a one way ticket to Thailand and never went back. I've been living in Asia now for eight years solid, with just a few trips home. I decided on Indonesia.

So what's it really like? Why should a young man contemplating an alternative path in life consider South East Asia? Walk with me and I'll talk you through the good reasons to sling your hook, pack your bags, and head East…

Why I will never leave Asia

There are almost too many good sides of living here to count, but I've narrowed it down to a few important things which I think will be of some sort of consideration to men reading this.

1. Liveliness

My friend Rheta Aretha, rockin’ a night club in Jakarta…

The first thing that you will notice when you visit and or move here is how alive it is.

Southeast Asia is teeming with people, the economies here are booming and growing, and a massive middle class is forming. You could compare it to what America must have been like in the roaring twenties and thirties. Nations are forming, finding their identity and starting to taste power. It’s pretty exciting to be a part of all this and gives you great insights into how society works.

I live in Jakarta, which is a huge city of some 30 million people. At any time of the day or night there is something to do and somewhere to go. Malls, bars, clubs, and entertainment are abundant, and there are always people around. The city never sleeps and so no matter what time of day it is there’s always something to do.

For some this may be a bad thing, but for the young and hungry man, it’s great! There’s never a boring moment unless you allow it to be so.

2. Cheap cost of living

The cost of living in Asia does vary from country to country, for example Indonesia is about twice as expensive as The Philippines, but compared with Western nations things are insanely cheap.

A nice four-bedroom family home in a gated community could be rented for about $500 USD per month, and a studio apartment like the one I currently live in with a pool and a gym costs roughly $250-$300 per month.

Eating out is so cheap you can almost not afford to eat in. I recently took Mrs. Freedom out for an Italian meal in which we had starters, main courses and deserts in a top class restaurant, and the bill came to $25. Add taxis on top and that's around $35 all in.

Things are beginning to get a little more expensive in Asia, but it's still a bargain for everyday things. Consumer goods cost the same as back home, but then I'm not interested in them so it doesn't concern me.

In Jakarta I can take a taxi to the other side of the city for less than a one way bus ticket back home. With a decent salary, it's easy to save and build wealth here.

As a friend of mine recently said "It's easy to enjoy more for less out here." I think that's about a perfect way to sum it up. You can pretty much get an idea of how things are by taking the current salary you earn and imagining you earned three or four times more. If you earn 100k in Asia, it would be like earning 300-400k in Europe or America.

3. Increased Status

I don't generally give a flying shit what other people think of me, but everyone to some degree craves status.

In Asia as an expat you will automatically be given status. This does not count for the wave of human trash that descend upon Thailand for two week benders from around the globe who locals despise, but to the expatriate worker involved in business, teaching English or working at a corporation.

You will be looked up to as a Westerner and given respect. Of course there are always bad apples who will hate you wherever you go, but in general Asian people are awesome and will both welcome and respect you as long as you treat them with respect in turn.

We all know for a fact that with status comes many benefits – respect, authority, and an increased dating life. All of these things will come to you when you move to Asia, and that is a personal guarantee.

4. Better quality of women

Asian women are feminine, traditional, and overall beautiful…

I've already spoken about the increased dating life, but now I want to talk about relationships in general.

Women in Asia are better than women in the West in several ways – they are more feminine, more traditional and less aggressive.

90% of them actually want to get married and be stay at home moms. There are a few who have bought into the feminist BS, but most still want to play that traditional role. They've been raised to believe it is a good thing, and it is! Divorce, broken family, and abortion rates here are much lower than back in Babylon.

Now don't get me wrong here. Women the world over are bat shit crazy and Asia is no exception. You've got to be careful and beware of the gold diggers. Many of the girls you will meet here in bars and clubs are working girls in disguise, so you need to go in with your eyes open. When an Asian woman goes wrong, it can be a messy, messy sight. But then again that's no different than back home.

That being said, if you meet a nice, educated girl with her own job, you're in for a treat. It's not uncommon for my lady to cook me a meal and watch me intently as I eat it to see if I'm satisfied, then snuggle up to me without complaint. In the past, I've had girls I was dating give me full body massages, cook, clean, and physically bathe me when I was injured, and pretty much be the feminine ideal most men nowadays crave.

Their expectations are much more realistic too, if you're a decent bloke and a good provider, you won't have any drama with an Asian lady. The fact that other females will constantly be competing against her for you also works to your advantage. It's like running game 24-7, but you don't even have to try.

Bonus – If you do marry here, it is as simple as A, B, C to keep all of your financial assets outside of the country and therefore if shit goes south, she has no legal way of laying claim to them.

5. Lifestyle enhancement

You can hang out places like here on a regular basis…

Living in Asia will change your lifestyle quite a bit.

Since it's such a beautiful place people spend a lot of time outside. The weather is almost always good, so going to the beach, lying by the pool, snorkeling, scuba diving and the rest of the fun stuff is much more frequent than back home. Take note that if you live in a big city it can be insanely difficult to get out of the traffic, so pick a location closer to nature.

Having access to some of the most beautiful tropical islands in the world, as well as the means to enjoy these things because you aren't worrying about how to pay the rent, leads to a much better lifestyle for a young man.

In the last few years I have been on vacation 10+ times. I've been snorkeling in Bali, quad biking and jet skiing in The Philippines, and generally having a ball!

All of this was just not possible for me back in the rainy UK. I don't know about where you live, but the lifestyle here in Asia is a big jump up for me.

6. Greater opportunity

Head East and make your fortune…

This is perhaps the biggest factor of all.

If you're an ivy league-educated middle class Westerner there probably isn't much of a shortage of opportunity for you back home. For men who like to live by their wits and their balls, however, Asia is paradise.

For a young guy with ambition and an entrepreneurial spirit, there are plenty of opportunities in Asia. Many start out teaching TEFL and then move into other fields. I work in oil and gas, a good friend of mine works in marketing, and a guy I have just recently met who is a champion power lifter started his own business delivering paleo meals to offices and is making bank. None of us have a college degree, but we are able to make a good living and enjoy life without too much stress or worry.

Don't get me wrong, this can all be done at home, but it is much more difficult in my view. In Asia, the opportunities are there and a lot of people will assume that because you are a Westerner, you know something worth paying for. It's not always true, but I sure as hell wouldn't complain about having an advantage like that.

Conclusion

Asia won't do it for everyone. Some come here and crumble and go back home, while some stay for a lifetime. Like everything else, no two people will feel the exact same way about it.

However if you love adventure, have a bold spirit and an open mind, and are looking for a way out of the brain grinder back West, Asia may be the very place for you.

I can't make you any promises, but as a wise man once said "If you never try, you never know."

What I Learned From “The Maltese Falcon”

March 23, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I am not generally a fan of old movies. The acting styles, set designs, plot artifices, and production values usually do not attract me. But there are some exceptions. One of these is the 1941 film The Maltese Falcon; its ethic and philosophy of life is directly relevant to men today, and is worth repeated viewing. We will discuss some of the reasons here.

In the 1940s, a new genre of film began quietly to make an appearance in Hollywood. It was a hard-bitten type of film, born of the cynicism and dislocation of the Second World War and its aftermath. This genre—which later came to be called film noir—came to be defined by its embrace of the following themes, in one form or another:

1. Men are prisoners of their nature. No matter how hard you try, you can’t escape your past or your character.
2. Crime sometimes does pay. Even when it doesn’t, the temporary thrills are worth something.
3. Women are unstable and inherently untrustworthy.

4. Most people lie or are treacherous.
5. A man must live by a code of honor, despite all the crookedness swirling around him.
6. Alienation from society is the inevitable consequence of living by a code of honor.

Recognize these themes? I thought so. You might call the film noir ethos the original “red pill” ethos. Film historians tell us that the “classic” period of noir spanned the 1940s and 1950s; after that, the genre fell out of favor, but never entirely died. It saw a major revival in the 1990s under the term “neo-noir” which continues to this day. I certainly have my own list of noir favorites, which I think every man interested in movies should see.

A jaded but deeply moral man: Sam Spade

Film scholars also tell us that first of the genre was The Maltese Falcon (1941). Adapted from the Dashiell Hammet’s unrelenting grim crime novel, this John Huston production set a standard that few of its descendants have matched. It is a remarkable film: a misanthropic, dark meditation on human greed, the futility of effort, and the consequences of betrayal. In many ways, it is more of a stage play than a film.

Euripides would have liked The Maltese Falcon.

It is claustrophobic and oppressive, with all of the action taking place in hotel rooms and offices. Every character is either corrupt, an opportunist, or a liar, and their scheming machinations add to the oppressive atmosphere. Everyone is trying to screw everyone else; only Sam Spade, played wonderfully by Humphrey Bogart, is able to convey some sort of stoic honor.

The plot: an apparent damsel in distress (Mary Astor) visits private detective Sam Spade (Humphrey Bogart) to ask for his protection. Spade’s partner Miles Archer gets shot in the back while working on the case. The cops, apparently aware that Spade had had an affair with Miles’s wife, finger Spade as a murder suspect.

Spade is visited by a series of strange characters: Joel Cairo (masterfully played by Peter Lorre), the sinister Gutman (Sydney Greenstreet), and even his apparent client Mary Astor, who proves to be a master of deceit. Everyone is lying, everyone is concealing something, and everyone is trying to screw everyone else.

What gives? Peter Lorre had better come clean, brother

Slowly, the connections between all the characters are revealed. They are all engaged on a joint quest to find a precious artifact, a jewel-encrusted statute of a falcon, once in the possession of the Knights of Malta. Spade is skeptical, and apparently is motivated only by money. Or so he wishes everyone to believe. Feelings between him and Mary Astor begin to develop. Or do they?

The conclusion of the film is what enables it to rise above the cheap conventions of the standard crime drama. The quest for the precious statue turns out to be an illusion, a fools' errand that brings its seekers only misery. It is the essence of the futility of effort, which would become a pervasive noir theme.

The cops turn out to be deluded, corrupt fools. The male supporting characters are scheming sociopaths. The only female character turns out to be a lying, manipulative murderess.

When Spade discovers that his partner had been gunned down by the woman he loves, he must put his allegiance to his moral code above his amorous impulses. "When your partner is killed," Spade growls, "You're supposed to do something about it. It doesn't matter whether you liked him or not. You're supposed to do something about it."

Your comrades and your code are more important than your physical gratification. It is a lesson that many of us, in this age of simps, manginas, and white knights, have forgotten.

Spade spots a cheap gunsel

"You're supposed to do something about it." And he does. Despite all the rottenness of the world, despite all of its corruption and evil (or maybe because of it) a man of honor must be true to his own code. He must do the right thing in the midst of all the iniquity, in spite of all the swirling malevolence around him. Only this stoic courage is able to give life meaning.

The original book was chosen recently as a selection for the Wall Street Journal Book Club. Some readers were disturbed. According to its critics, the book is misogynistic, homophobic (in its portrayal of Joel Cairo), and amoral. In short, the same criticisms that are heaped on every work of art (yes, I consider The Maltese Falcon to be art) that makes certain people uncomfortable.

Ignore these namby-pamby voices. The Maltese Falcon has much to teach about life and human nature. As we go through life, we quickly find out that peoples' motivations are usually not altruistic; that many women do rely on cunning and guile to manipulate men; and that most other men are craven and corrupt.

The only safe refuge, apparently, is to adopt a patina of detached irony. Spade shields himself from the evil of the world by his tough-guy exterior, but beneath that, we could say that he is a profoundly moral man. He sets things right with the case, avenges his fallen comrade Miles, and exposes the statute of the bird for the phony it is. Sam Spade is indeed a man of honor, if a flawed one.

This is a film that bears frequent viewings. Its message resonates just as loudly today as it did in 1941, surely one of the most fateful years in recent world history. Be skeptical of the world, and on your guard with strangers.

But never abandon yourself to despair, or your soul to amorality.

Bad Things Happen When Women Lead And Men Follow

March 23, 2015 | by Elrit Frisia | Link | Original Link

For the largest part of known human history, it has been men who have been the riders of civilization. The luminaries of the torch, the undying flame of kin, brotherhood, leadership, and order. It has been because of their innumerable sacrifice as men; men of their family, men of their country, and men of their culture, that we can now enjoy and afford the luxuries of what modest living affords us.

But as I've written before, something seems amiss in our modern world.

The blame rests on men

Men are responsible for this. It is not women. Men are responsible for their household, responsible for their affairs, and responsible for the state of their nation. And they are responsible for the absolutely unacceptable state of their women. In the haunting words of sermonist R.G. Lee,

> Search the pages of the Bible all you will; study history all you please. And you will find one truth that stands out above some other truths. What is that truth? The truth that the spiritual life of a nation, city, town, school, church, or home never rises any higher than the spiritual life of women. When women sag morally and spiritually, men sag morally and spiritually. When women take the downward road, men travel with them. When women are lame morally and spiritually, men limp morally and spiritually. The degeneracy of womanhood helps the decay of > manhood.

How thus, did we allow this to come to be?

She hears whispers

Walk with me to the Garden. The Garden of the East. About six thousand years ago. One fine noon, under the auspices of cold river air and soft patches of brightly-colored leaves, there lie two: one man and one woman. We are covered in leaves and balk, we soon discover, and cannot move, nor talk, nor divert our eyes to what is about to happen.

A serpent creases by, sneering and seductive, making jests toward the woman, or so we are led to believe. The woman seems frightened at first glance, but slowly eases into the serpent, laughing at what the serpent whispers into her ear and paying amusement to its performance.

Some time passes by. We see the woman fade into the thick forest trees. A while later, we observe, the woman walks along the man, both with a strange fruit in hand, the serpent now seen nowhere, and the skies clouded with darkness and thunder. In a fit of lunacy, the man and the woman both shower themselves in leaves and balk, and take to rummaging across the Garden like utter mad fools.

Man takes to her call

What we have witnessed is the timeless, bleeding edge of human naïveté. It is a fact of nature that man is at odds not only with himself, but with others: both those above him and those below him, for there are in truth no equals. And for order to triumph, not only must man triumph over himself, but everyone must also triumph for the good of something beyond themselves.

This arrangement can only be sufficiently well-maintained if we obey the wishes of our zealous god: tradition.

It is no accident that the institutions most central to Western tradition have been found in virtually all civilizations worth writing a tome about. They have been dictated to us by the lips of our most highest himself: whether that be evolution or a single, conscious power in charge of designing the universe. It is an optimal ideology that accounts for the nature and sexual strategies of both men and women, and incentivizes them to care after a garden of their own.

Men hold a very special place as protectors and enforcers of this tradition. So that folly may not rule in those who dare not triumph. But, we see, that the serpent so loves to play with our wit, and to that end he knows women are the most apt at play, and the easiest to lead far from the narrow gate. And when man trusts more in the warmth of hand of her woman than the path she leads him to, that is when thunder falls from the heavens and the paleness of sky becomes overturned.

Walking on arid soil

And after a long walk through history, it is clear that we have been lulled by the serpent's song. Spoke once the woman, and the man bent over his knees in order to please. We failed to be discriminating in the company of poor ideals, and gave the woman her promiscuous zest with which she later robbed us (and in a fit of divine irony, herself) of our dignity, hoping we would gain power, acceptance, and a serviced libido in return.

We gave them a voice in the state, a voice in our churches, a voice in our halls of learning, and what has really been heard? We've heard cries of foolishness, of bad apples and false burglars in the night, but the matter is that men have compromised everything they knew to be certain in order to gain nothing of lasting import.

The path that leads to brighter fields is thinning by the age.

Certainly, we have known the pleasures of what women have to offer, and perhaps more now so than anytime else, when they fall off by the numbers into our nimble hands, but yet we hesitate to take more than a few, singly bites.

When in times past we would have snatched an agreeable one and faithfully planted the seed of our future castle. Even our own veteran maverick, despite his notable experience with the fairer sex, seems unable to see women as anything else but "a form of entertainment and distraction instead of significantly adding to my life."

There is not much to be done, once we have sowed the seeds of our garden into the rocks.

But let it serve, as a painful reminder, that women are meant to be enjoyed and to be cherished as any other pleasantry, but be careful of where she might stray you along because in the end you'll share more than the blame and wish you had not followed her deep into the thicket.

Society Needs A Good Dose Of White Knight Shaming

March 24, 2015 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

As we begin to formulate a manifesto around the reinvigoration of masculinity, I believe that we, and society as a whole, need to devote a solid plank in our platform to white knight shaming. Simply put, I have come to believe that white knighting is the single biggest problem with modern men. If we are to revive masculinity as a major contributor to fixing the degenerate Western world, white knight shaming must have a significant place in it.

The Problem:

As I have mentioned once on the forum, white knighting is the primary currency that enables entitled attitudes and attention whoring amongst all too many of today's women. While smartphones and social media greatly enhance attention whoring capabilities, white knights are the buyers of what attention whores sell.

Put simply, white knights are the primary reason that the sexual market is so heavily distorted in favor of women in today's environment. Let's take a very recent example to illustrate this point further.

We all know that this winter was particularly brutal for the Boston area, which received several feet of snow in very short order. Economic activity shrunk drastically in the city and getting around was a massive inconvenience to everyone. But life isn't all sunshine and rainbows, and one should expect this by choosing to live in such an area. It's 2015, and we know the seasonal weather report.

Enter Susan Zalkind, a 27-year-old Tinder user who came up with a brilliant idea – find some chump to shovel out her car from the snow.

Notice how she doesn't offer an inkling of anything in return, not even a cup of hot chocolate as one acquaintance of mine suggested. The arrogance of her request is clearly present in her tagline, and the entitlement apparent on her face.

You would think that no man would possibly respond to such an arrogant, entitled request. You'd be wrong. At least 11 white knights gleefully offered their shoveling services, no doubt in the utterly naïve hope that they'd get some pussy.

It is chumps like these that allow women to continue to behave in this manner. It is only natural for women like this to attempt to get something for nothing since there are so many thirsty guys out there that will throw themselves at her. Why would anyone not take such freebies when they know they're easily available?

What is a white knight?

It doesn't actually work this way.

Now that we've gone over the backbone of the problem with a recent example, we must define what a white knight is. Regulars around these parts will certainly know. This portion is mainly for the benefit of newbies to Return of Kings and to our corner of the internet in general.

A white knight can be most easily defined as a man who does things for women with no clear indication that his labors will be rewarded. The white knight is the servient party in a one-sided interaction, often at the expense of his own interests. This labor is usually done with the hope by the white knight that he will receive female approval and ultimately sexual favors in return for his efforts, but the opposite is true.

To make a clarification, doing a favor for your girlfriend or a female friend is not white knighting, as these things generally take place within the context of a pre-existing relationship with some commitment to each other by both parties. White knighting is more specifically willingly taking up a subservient role on a woman's behalf with the expectation of some kind of future (usually sexual) reward based solely on the actions performed within that role. It is, putting it even more simply, a man willingly submitting himself to a woman's will in the hopes that she will like him for doing things for her.

Why white knighting doesn't work

Does the above description sound like you? If it does, you are not alone. We've probably all had bouts of white knight behavior at some point in our lives. The most important thing is to recognize and fix this behavior immediately. If you do not, you are part of the problem and deserve all the public shaming you can get.

Women are, to put it simply, attracted to superior men. Men that are bigger, taller, stronger, higher in status, wealthier, more powerful than they are, are the men that women are attracted to. A woman will not be attracted to an inferior man.

White knights, by definition, willingly put themselves in positions of inferiority to the women they desire. What "men" like Zalkind's suitors need to realize is that by blindly acquiescing to her wish and shoveling out her car, they are willingly lowering their own status and rendering themselves inferior. This is repulsive behavior, and no woman will give any sexual favors to the chumps that so willingly do things for them with hopes of their approval.

In other words, it would have been more attractive for these guys to say they would shovel Zalkind's car out and then not show up. This would have at least shown some dignity and self-respect. Alas, this did not happen. The white knights are simply, to quote a female friend: “too stupid to realize” why white knighting is not attractive.

It’s not just about the game

The true face of the white knight.

White knighting is a social problem that goes far beyond the world of dating. By men refusing l to hold women responsible for their actions, they as a class are getting a free ride. By wifing up unstable women, women that are unquestionably beneath them in looks or personality, single mothers (with their accompanying bastards), and all other sorts of degenerates, men are encouraging shitty behavior in women and ultimately working against their own interests.

These are the same men that also support the politicization of women’s entitlement, namely feminism. Although I fully know to expect it by now, the pictures of white knights usually do not betray attractive men. Their only sexual strategy is to white knight by supporting any demand, no matter how obscene, made by women. Predictably, it fails, but their failure to get laid has serious social consequences.

In the social and political realm, the white knight willingly sacrifices his own political and economic interests, and more importantly, those of other men, to be seen as a kind of “good man,” a “progressive” man that is “a good ally” of the right causes, all so he can assuage his ridiculous feelings of guilt and get female attention.

This is all an extension of a very checkered history. It was white knighting that was the primary impetus for some of the most disgusting episodes in our nation’s history, like Jim Crow and segregation. For all the proof you need of this, see D.W. Griffith’s Birth of a Nation.

The White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, the terrorist group that stood in stark opposition to the ending of segregation in the 1960's, is a name all too telling. In their ridiculous desire to "save" women (of a particular kind not altogether different from the kind we see white knights trying to "save" today), white knights in the South were the chief oppressors of their fellow men. The same is true now.

Conclusion

It has long been an established social custom among women to slut shame, even to this day. For all our sexual openness, players know all too well that if a girl is made to feel like a slut, or more importantly, thinks her friends will think she's a slut, all sexual activity on her end will be shut down.

Women self-regulate to keep their market power strong. This is the primary reason why women slut shame, whether they admit it or not. It is long overdue that men self-regulate in the same way by shaming and ostracizing white knights.

Why Lithuania Should Ban Female Leaders

March 24, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Irony is an abundant 21st century commodity. Lithuania's first female President, Dalia Grybauskaitė, claims that Lithuania, a tiny Baltic nation close to Russia, needs to "protect itself" and reintroduce conscription. What she means by this is males need to forcibly protect Lithuania. And she now has what she wanted, as the Lithuanian parliament "overwhelmingly" voted to reintroduce conscription, which was only scrapped less than a decade ago.

Dalia Grybauskaitė is joined by a swathe of other professional female hypocrites, including the Speaker of the national parliament, Loreta Graužinienė, in calling for this "vital" addition to the country's defensive posturing. So women have the opportunity to ascend to Lithuania's highest political positions, but are not expected to serve the country like thousands of Lithuanian men will now have to every year.

[image]
Women will have the "option" to join their conscripted male counterparts. Feminist Newspeak at its best.

Baltic hypocrisy

I know enough Lithuanians and Estonians, and to a lesser degree Latvians, to have read or been told about how female Baltic politicians regularly exploit the sexism card to advance their careers or stave off justified criticism. But when it comes to the security of the nation, Grybauskaitė and others clearly do not believe that equality is what they otherwise say it is.

Lithuania has already adopted Nordic models of prostitution in recent months, treating every prostitute as a victim of “male violence,” even $500-$2,000 per hour local call-girls or those flown in from elsewhere in Europe. There’s no word yet on whether twenty-something women marrying wealthy men in their forties, fifties, or sixties will be included (sigh). I suppose we’ll wait with bated breath for Dalia Grybauskaitė’s expert leadership on this issue!

National security and unity is the first priority of any leader, head of state or head of government. Whilst no one expects, or wants, a national leader to be 25, one should be able to safely expect that a national leader will be of a gender subject to conscription, if conscription is even practiced.

Grybauskaitė as Commander-in-Chief of Lithuania’s male-only conscripts is akin to making a man the Women’s Minister in the national cabinet. Even worse, actually, if you acknowledge that conscription is, whatever its benefits to state defense, a form of indentured servitude.

Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, “liberated” by the Soviets towards the end of the Second World War and then promptly incorporated into the Soviet Union, are extraordinarily wary of Russia and perceived Russian aggression. In some ways, therefore, support for reintroducing conscription by Grybauskaitė and others is not all that surprising.

Unlike then-fellow communist states such as Poland and Bulgaria, which served as puppet states, Soviet proxies, or buffer zones, the Baltic states were directly under Moscow’s heel and lacked the size of the more “independent” Warsaw Pact countries to rebel. Moreover, hundreds of thousands of ethnic Russian settlers, many of whom remained after the USSR’s break-up, were offloaded there to quell and offset any indigenous dissent.

The problem is not with the legitimacy of conscription as an idea, it’s with the gall of women who want a large slice of post-Soviet Lithuania’s power, but expect men to underpin the entirety of the nation’s security.

Loreta Graužinienė, Lithuanian parliamentary speaker and a feminist who demanded male-only conscription.

Conversation about Putin, Russia, and reminders of the unhappier, Soviet-dominated years are forgivably at an all-time high in the Baltics. Yet precious little emphasis is on the asymmetry of the conscription question and who fundamentally must bear the direct costs of defending the country. It is untenable that Lithuania's female leaders would call themselves feminists but throw the rusty end of the spanner to the country's men.

European law explicitly allows for this anti-male discrimination. Various human rights charters and domestic laws make a deliberate exception for male-only conscription as a form of sexism. In fact, all these exceptions are those that advantage women.

A telling comparison

Picture for a moment a hypothetical country that required thousands of women every year to attend child-rearing and homemaking camps, away from the rest of society. The women "drafted" would be determined by lot, yet the only people compelled to "join" would be female. The women would be forced to learn home economics, cooking, sewing, household mending, how to teach young children rudimentary reading and arithmetic, and, by virtue of their biology, breast-feeding and infant care.

In the modern world, in which children are either left to their own devices or "raised" by technology, such camps would reap untold benefits for both society and families, producing more well-rounded, mentally and emotionally stable children. Would Dalia Grybauskaitė support such a measure?

Grybauskaitė has a black belt in karate, declares herself a feminist but only wants men to be conscripted. What does that tell you about feminism?

Or how about, if women are not required to join the military as conscripts, making them perform unpaid or poorly paid work in hospitals, schools and nursing homes? Although not yet a "first world" economy, Lithuania's population is aging considerably and its children are in dire need of a competitive educational edge in a stagnant European economy. Women could perform these tasks on a weekend basis for four or five years to match the time men spend being conscripted full-time.

The moral of the story is…

…women are always special cases, deserving of extra privileges; advantages are for women, disadvantages are for men. Girls are being exhorted to reach for the sky but will never be expected to take the dirty jobs society foists only on men, from the 95% male share of workplace deaths to conscription in the military.

Feminism is about "equality" exclusively where women can advance their own interests.

4 Ways A Good International Matchmaking Service Can Help You Find A Wife

March 24, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Brides Made In Ukraine

Return Of Kings readers are well-acquainted with the difficult predicament of wanting to settle down in western society. Though many men opt out of the marriage market, there are still a large number who desire a traditional marriage but do not know how to find it.

As has been written about extensively, dating foreign women who have not been exposed to our culture is one method of maximizing the chances of a more lasting partnership.

If you think it won't happen to you, consider this: I too was a swinging bachelor for 12 years in Eastern Europe, and as I approached 40, I began to want just one good woman. I knew that if I waited too long, the quality of girls I could pull would slowly start to decline. Just ask the 50 and 60-year-olds trying unsuccessfully to find a 20-something Ukrainian wife.

To that end, here are four ways the right matchmaking service can help you to find a suitable partner if you desire to get married:

1. By preparing you for the reality of dating a beautiful woman from a different culture

Too many men think finding an Eastern European bride is nothing more than look, choose, point, click. It doesn't work that way. A lot of men also believe their consistent lack of success with American or Western women will disappear when meeting ladies of the East.

The reality is that meeting, dating, and courting a beautiful Ukrainian or Russian lady can be even more challenging. If she speaks English, she's probably successful in her career, has a high degree of intelligence (having two university degrees is common), and she is a truly feminine sexual creature.

She'll expect you to act like a man, take the lead in all situations, be extremely confident (both in and out of the bedroom) and never display indecisiveness. Can you handle all that? If you can, then you will be truly rewarded.

2. By offering a personal touch

One problem with large dating agencies is that they don't care about verifying the ladies using their site. For them, more available female profiles equals more product on the shelves they can sell to masses of men. No one knows if the photos they post are truly them or not.

These women are never interviewed in person, as with a personal matchmaker, nor do they sign a contact, or show proof of identification and proof of having single marital status. The bottom line is that professional scammers, who have a significant presence on the big box agencies, will have a very difficult time ever registering with a reputable matchmaking agency. Most will not even bother to try.

Good matchmakers know their girl's background, personal story, and romantic dreams inside and out. For the man it's so much easier to ask this "friend" the really hard or potentially serious questions and get the honest answers.

3. By giving you good value for your dollar spent

A serious problem with big agencies, besides not producing results, is that they nickel and dime men to death. Some agencies charge for every single email or chat sent and received, some charge translation fees on top of that, and some push men to buy expensive “gifts” for the ladies like perfume, flowers, chocolate, or even English lessons, which we know is a bad precedent to set.

A good matchmaking agency will do one thing and one thing only, and that is connect a man with the most compatible women specific to him.

4. By wearing many hats and doing more than just matching https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ha_gArfhdwI&feature=youtu.be

Perhaps the absolute biggest advantage to using a matchmaker over the free social networks and dating sites is the mindset of the women you find. You see, the women who have joined a matchmaking agency have made a conscious and definitive life decision that they are READY for marriage.

This, as compared to the mindset of the others which is “hmm, I’ll put myself where everyone else is and just see what happens.”

A true matchmaker will get to know a whole lot about you first before helping select the women to contact. He or she is able to sit in on your video Skype dates, translate if necessary, and evaluate the progress being made. They’ll make suggestions along the way to steer things in the right direction.

Even if you opt to make calls or send emails in private, your matchmaker can do follow-up interviews with man and woman and read between the lines to understand if things are working. They can even quickly perform damage control if you inadvertently screw something small up that would otherwise end the relationship.

If things are not meant to be with a particular individual, the matchmaker will save you time and money by suggesting some changes in your conversations or to just move on to the next candidate.

Conclusion

Professional matchmaking agencies offer the kind of one to one service that those big online dating sites will never be able to offer. Many thousands of high achievers and professionals still prefer them over the on-line solution.

So if you consider yourself a high achieving man, or at least believe you deserve the same results in life as one, then bringing a beautiful foreign bride to your doorstep is certainly within reach in approximately a year or less. Click here to find out more about our service and begin the process today.

How To Be Masculine Like The Zaporozhian Cossacks

March 24, 2015 | by Peter Burns | Link | Original Link

In 1615, a fleet of 80 Zaporozhian Cossack boats, called chaiky, slipped into the harbor of Constantinople and razed the entire area around the harbor to the ground. This was the culmination of a hundred years of naval raids that the Cossacks were conducting against various ports of the Ottoman Empire.

At that time, the Ottoman Empire was the most powerful state in Europe and was on the offensive on all fronts. That did not deter the Cossacks. They were fearless and in subsequent years conducted a few more raids on Ottoman ports. The bigger the challenge, the more likely they were to attempt it. The Zaporozhians were not afraid to take risks, even doing things that seemed impossible.

The year following that raid on Constantinople, they raided the port of Trebizond. The Ottoman Sultan sent a fleet to the mouth of the Dnieper River in order to try to destroy their fleet. However in a show of the ultimate “f*%k you,” the Cossacks who were returning from their successful raid decided to turn around and once again attacked Constantinople. They caused a lot of havoc, even rampaging through the official palace of the Sultan himself.

Brave warriors who cherished their freedom

The Cossacks were brave warriors who cherished their freedom. They had a strict code of honor and valued courage above all else. A Venetian envoy once compared them to the Spartans, only more drunk: "This republic (the Zaporozhian Sich) could be compared to the Spartan, if the Cossacks respected sobriety as highly as did the Spartans."

The Cossacks learned how to endure many hardships from early on. Their code of honor preached that they always needed to help a friend in trouble. They would often sacrifice themselves in order to save others. Their skills and abilities in horsemanship and with different arms (swords, guns) were legendary.

They could crawl up on an enemy undetected, as well as charge on horseback gun in hand, being able to hit a far-away target with exact precision. They could ride a horse, go on long marches, but also take an oar in hands and battle on the sea. The Cossacks were masters of multiple ways of warfare.

History of the Zaporozhian Cossacks

There were various types of Cossacks. This essay will focus on the Ukrainian Cossacks, particularly the Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Sich. These were probably the most freedom loving and the fiercest of all the Cossack groups.

The first Cossack communities began forming on the wild Ukrainian steppes around the Dnieper River. Many Ukrainian peasants, outlaws, clergy, even nobles began trying to escape from the harsh rule of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and joined people already inhabiting the area called the Wild Fields. This was a virtual no-man's land stuck between the lands controlled by the Poles, Russians and the Crimean Tatars.

There they could live free. In order to protect themselves, they began to form fortified camps, one of which was founded on the island of Khortytsia in an area called "beyond the rapids," Zaporozhie. This was the start of the Zaporozhian Cossacks.

The Zaporozhian society was one based on freedom. Anyone from any walk of life could come in and join the Cossacks. Every Cossack was considered a free man. Their system also relied on elections. All officers were elected for a one year term. This was quite a difference from other systems in Europe at that time, where power was based on feudal relationships. For a Zaporozhian, his freedom was sacred.

Soon after their foundation, the Zaporozhian Cossacks began making raids on the territories of the Crimean Tatars, capturing booty and freeing the slaves. The Cossack way of life also began spreading into the lands controlled by the Polish.

The Poles saw this development and quickly adapted to it, setting up an institution known as the Registered Cossacks. They noticed the advantages of having these types of formations in their armies, especially when guarding their frontier. The Registered Cossacks formed several units in the armies of the Commonwealth. However thousands more unregistered Cossacks continued to exist as well.

What is very important to note about the Cossacks is the fluidity of their identity. Different people floated between the different Cossack groups and it was very easy to join them. While the Ukrainian ethnic predominated among them, the Cossacks were also sometimes joined by Poles, Jews, Moldovans, Tatars, Russians, and Germans from all walks of life, from escaped serfs to nobles.

More and more, the Zaporozhian Cossacks began allying themselves with the Eastern Orthodox clergy and the Ukrainian peasantry, forming a sort of proto-national movement of the Ukrainians.

The Khmelnitsky uprising

All these class, national, and religious conflicts culminated in the figure of Bohdan Khmelnitsky and his uprising. In 1648, Khmelnitsky rose up against the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Quickly thereafter, he was elected as the Hetman of the Cossacks and led their armies in the fight. The battles were quite bloody and led to heavy losses on both sides.

In 1654, Khmelnitsky made the fateful decision to ally himself with the Russian tsar and signed the Treaty of Peryaslav. This led to the creation of the Cossack Hetmanate, an independent Cossack state, allied with Russia.

This was not to last long however. Ten years after the death of Khmelnitsky, the Hetmanate as an entity spanning both sides of the Dnieper was no more. In 1667, Russia and Poland signed the Treaty of Andrusovo, which divided up the Hetmanate between themselves, forming a Right-Bank Ukraine (for Poland) and a Left-Bank Ukraine (for Russia), each country taking the Cossacks who inhabited those territories for themselves.

The Left-Bank Hetmanate joined the Sloboda Ukraine territory as Cossack territories falling under the Russian tsar. Cossack Hetmans continued to be elected, however now they had to fall under the authority of the Russian tsar.

To the south of those lands, the territories of the Zaporozhian Sich continued to exist, stretching from central Ukraine, through the territories of today's Dnipropetrovsk, Zaporozhia and Donetsk oblasts all the way to areas above the Sea of Azov. These territories, while in Russian orbit, retained a lot of their independence and served as a beacon of hope for all oppressed Ukrainian peasants.

The Ruin

The period after the death of Khmelnitsky is known by the Ukrainians as the "Ruin." The entire territory descended into chaos, as the Poles, the Russians and the Ottoman Turks (and their allies the Crimean Tatars), were all vying for supremacy. The Cossacks fought on all sides of the conflict, sometimes switching sides, but oftentimes different Cossack groups standing against each other on the opposite fields of battle.

While the other Cossack lands became more and more repressed, the Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Sich still continued to retain a lot of their freedoms. They were fierce warriors who would never back down from a challenge and continued to guard their territories with a huge ferocity, knowing that they were not fighting just for themselves, but for their comrades as well.

How to be a bad-ass

The Zaporozhian Cossacks were also bad-asses who took no shit from anybody. In 1676, the Zaporozhian Sich was led by Ivan Sirko, who had been elected as their kosh otaman. In that year, they won a battle against the Ottoman armies, however the Sultan decided to bring more troops into the Ukraine and subjugate the entire country.

He sent the Zaporozhian Cossacks this letter:

> "Sultan Mehmed IV to the Zaporozhian Cossacks:
> As the Sultan; son of Muhammad; brother of the sun and moon; grandson and viceroy of God; ruler of the kingdoms of Macedonia, Babylon, Jerusalem, Upper and Lower Egypt; emperor of emperors; sovereign of sovereigns; extraordinary knight, never defeated; steadfast guardian of the tomb of Jesus Christ; trustee chosen by God Himself; the hope and comfort of Muslims; confounder and great defender of Christians – I command you, the Zaporozhian Cossacks, to submit to me voluntarily and without any resistance, and to desist from troubling me with your attacks.
> –Turkish Sultan Mehmed IV"

The Cossacks sat down and wrote a reply:

> "Zaporozhian Cossacks to the Turkish Sultan!
> O sultan, Turkish devil and damned devil's kith and kin, secretary to Lucifer himself. What the devil kind of knight are you, that can't slay a hedgehog with your naked ass? The devil excretes, and your army eats. You will not, you son of a bitch, make subjects of Christian sons; we've no fear of your army, by land and by sea we will battle with thee, fuck your mother.
> You Babylonian scullion, Macedonian wheelwright, brewer of Jerusalem, goat-fucker of Alexandria, swineherd of Greater and Lesser Egypt, pig of Armenia, Podolian thief, catamite of Tartary, hangman of Kamyanets, and fool of all the world and underworld, an idiot before God, grandson of the Serpent, and the crick in our dick. Pig's snout, mare's ass, slaughterhouse cur, unchristened brow, screw your own mother!
> So the Zaporozhians declare, you lowlife. You won't even be herding pigs for the Christians. Now we'll conclude, for we don't know the date and don't own a calendar; the moon is in the sky, the year with the Lord, the day is the same over here as it is over there; for this kiss our ass!
> – Koshovyi Otaman Ivan Sirko, with the whole Zaporozhian Host"

The Zaporozhian Cossacks were not afraid of anyone and were willing to fight to the death to defend their freedom. More than 200 years later, Ilya Repin, a Russian painter, would immortalize this moment in a painting.

The Mazepa Uprising and the Bendery Constitution

Life under the Russian tsar was harsh, as little by little the traditional rights of the Ukrainian Cossacks were taken away. In 1709, the Russian tsar was locked in a war with Sweden. The Cossack Hetman of Left-Bank Ukraine Ivan Mazepa, who until now had been very pro-Russian, however decided to take one last gamble on the independence of the Ukraine and the Cossacks and rebelled against the Russian Empire.

He allied himself with the Swedish King who was campaigning in the Ukraine. The Zaporozhian Cossacks immediately joined the forces of Mazepa.

The rebellion was short-lived, as the combined Swedish and Cossack forces were defeated by the Russian army at the Battle of Poltava. The Swedish King, Mazepa and a few thousand Cossacks (some from the Hetmanate, but most being Zaporozhians) escaped to the town of Bendery in today's Moldova, then controlled by the Ottomans.

Shortly thereafter, Ivan Mazepa died in exile. After his death, the Cossacks did not give up, but continued to struggle to keep their freedom. The Bendery exile period resulted in one piece of very remarkable history. In 1710, the newly elected Hetman, Pylyp Orlyk, wrote the Constitution of the Zaporozhian Host.

It was one of the oldest democratic constitutions in Europe and established the separation of powers between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government, many years before Montesquieu and way before the American Constitution.

End of the Zaporozhian Host

From then on, the Ukrainian Cossacks remained under Russian rule. The Zaporozhian Host managed to survive until 1775, when Russian Empress Catherine II ordered a sneak attack on their fort, razing the Sich to the ground. The Cossack Hetmanate was dissolved a few years later.

This ended the free privileges of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, but did not spell the end of the Cossacks. The Cossacks themselves survived and most importantly their legacy lived on. Their courage and love of freedom served as examples to be emulated and their stories continue to be retold from generation to generation.

Why I Objectify Women

March 24, 2015 | by Ashlar Ben David | Link | Original Link

To be clear, I believe women objectify men far more than men objectify women, and for more uses. For example, while men objectify women sexually, women objectify men financially, as a sympathetic listening post, and sexually. That is not the point of today's sermon.

The point is that feminists are correct: most men objectify women.

However, the feminist narrative takes this further, expanding down two particular paths which we must examine if we are to unpack the full meaning of this fact of nature. These two things are assumed to be true by feminists when they use "objectifying women" as a shaming tactic, so we must see how many degrees of truth they contain.

Is objectification directed at women?

The first false feminist assumption is that "objectifying women" is something directed at women. In their crazy heads, they have concocted a fantasy land of oppression, where men are going out of their way to treat women like objects out of some sense of personal hatred or vendetta towards them.

Why men would intentionally be cold towards women is a question they have never asked, as doing so might lead them towards truths that shake the foundation of their baseless, house-of-cards ideology. Further, it assumes that we do not "objectify" other things in life, such as our business tools or gym equipment, and then a take a break from not-objectifying things to sexualize women out of hatred.

So, let's do the intellectually courageous thing as explore why exactly men view women as sexual objects. I will speak only for myself. However, I am beyond sure that many men share this viewpoint with me. But first, a little background is necessary.

In my free time, I go to the gym, I think, I write, I read, I study topics like geometry and astronomy, I reflect, and examine different political and philosophical systems and how they work. Sometimes I don't talk for an entire day because I am so busy doing my own stuff that I don't socialize at all.

To be blunt, there is absolutely nothing that most modern American women can offer to my life besides their vaginas. They show up, we have sex, then sometimes they demand a relationship afterwards. It literally never occurs to most women that they need to bring anything to the table besides sex, and if you suggest to them that perhaps they'll have better relationships if they're actually contributing in some real way, they turn their fangs on you.

Since women have decided not to offer anything of value–since any attempt to discuss most of my hobby subjects with them just causes their eyes to glaze over—there is no need for me to have her around for anything except sex.

Don't even get me started on trying to discuss politics with most women. Instead of having any sense of civic duty or concern for anything that doesn't directly affect them, most women actually get angry if you try to discuss politics under the guise of "not caring about that stuff" or "it's annoying."

The real truth, of course, is just that they don't understand it and discussing politics isn't emotionally stimulating for most of them, so they have no reason to pay attention to it (or so they mistakenly believe).

I know this is an experience shared by many men–we try to discuss real-life topics with women, in the hope for any kind of stimulating or interesting conversation, and instead have to listen to the same whining about exes, bosses, and that one bitch at work that literally every other girl is also saying. Sometimes I could swear they're reading from the same script.

Can you blame me for not caring? If a woman brings no value to the conversation, can add nothing to my life that I don't already have except a wet hole between her legs, then it is not out of some sense of malice that I objectify her—but rather out of a sense of her otherwise uselessness. It is more of a measure of her character than mine.

Is it bad to objectify women?

The second false feminist assumption is that objectifying women is a bad thing. The assumption that it must be a bad, terrible thing underlies all their slinging of the accusation (again, ignoring the fact that women regularly objectify themselves, men and each other, since feminism is a tool by which dysfunctional females absolve themselves of the need or desire for personal introspection or growth as human beings).

They make it sound like the worst crime on Earth, and often use it to lead to and justify their false narrative about domestic violence. All, again, while ignoring an entire half of the equation in the name of equality. However, we have to consider what is it that men do with objects.

Generally, we love and appreciate our tools for helping us to build better things in our grand designs in life. A woman's role in a man's life is to provide her sexuality, femininity and childcare duties so that the man's work in the external world will be supplemented and it brings them both to new heights of happiness and satisfaction.

There is a reason it was done this way for nearly 6,000 years. Again, relating back to point one, if a woman has taken her exclusive sexuality, feminine charm and wifely duties off the table, then she is offering nothing but her vagina.

So, given that this is how women act today, their role in the Hierarchy Of Man Tools is to play the part of "fun way to let off steam." It is absolutely a vital and necessary part of a man's life, especially if he is the more industrious kind of man, and having this outlet for sexual energy will allow a man to continue the projects that feed, house, inform, and keep safe the entire rest of the world.

Needless to say, if men were not properly building and maintaining the infrastructure of this planet, it would completely fall apart. Women will never do it, and no amount of either feminism or mens' rights activism will change the laws of nature. Since women are no longer helping the world the way women are supposed to, they have made themselves into tools of my pleasure that play no less an important role in my life than eating or sleep.

And for that, ladies, I thank you most sincerely.

Male Spaces Are Under Attack (Again) At London's Garrick Club

March 25, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

The battle over the status of London's Garrick Club as a men-only establishment is flaring up again, as a new motion to admit women is tabled for a July vote. Opened in 1831, the Garrick is a gentlemen's club located in Covent Garden, known for its select membership which has included Laurence Olivier and Charles Dickens.

Candidates have to be proposed by an existing member before election by secret ballot. The intake process is rigourous and exclusive, on the basis "that it would be better that ten unobjectionable men should be excluded than one terrible bore should be admitted." The Club has a "gentlemen only" membership policy, but women are allowed into most parts as guests. Dismantling this very select male space has been a long-running project for UK Feminists.

The shaming campaign aimed at forcing the Garrick to take women members has emanated mainly from women in law and their less capable cohorts in the media. The Garrick is popular with British judges, and there have been grumblings about the detriment to diversity resulting from powerful members of the judiciary fraternising behind closed doors.

Twice-divorced, male-hating activist judge of the UK Supreme Court, Lady Brenda Hale, sporting trademark Feminist smirk.

In 2011, Baroness Hale, first female member of UK's Supreme Court (formerly the House of Lords) blamed a lack of female judges in top jobs on the existence of the Garrick Club. Speaking at a "Diversity Forum" hosted by the law firm Norton Rose, twice-divorced militant Feminist Hale complained about "systemic barriers" based on "personal network relationships" holding women back.

If It's New Then It Must Be Good

Joy Lo Dico: dismantle male spaces, build female spaces.

In 1992 a motion to admit women to the Garrick was defeated by 363 votes to 94. Now, twenty-three years on, another motion asking "women may be admitted to the Club as full members" as of 2017 has been tabled by ex-Labour MP Bob Marshall-Andrews. It's due to be voted on at the Garrick's next AGM on the 6th of July.

The news was gleefully reported in the Evening Standard this week by feminist hack-in-residence Joy Lo Dico, who pens the Londoner's Diary column. She foams with jubilation at the prospect of the Garrick "dragging itself into the 21st century," but is none too happy at the "counter-crusade to keep it locked in the 19th" by reactionaries opposing the motion.

In her hit piece, Lo Dico refers to supporters of the motion as the "progressive wing" who want to give "gals the same rights as guys." Opponents of the motion are "old boys" who are "muttering" that diversity should allow for the existence of a male-only club.

It's clear on which side Lo Dico, typical as she is of the thousands of mediocre Oxford University graduates stuffing the offices of British newspapers, has her bread buttered: all-male spaces must be dismantled.

Do As We Say, Not As We Do

Since Joy Lo Dico is a Feminist who appears on panels with names like "Women and Equality," it is safe to assume that she wants all gender-based spaces dismantled.

Wrong.

Joy Lo Dico is in fact intimately involved with opening and running female spaces that marginalise men. 2013, another feminist dross-merchant, Rhadika Sanghani, reported from the opening of Lo Dico's "pop-up" women's establishment—The Other Club—which she was happy to report contained none of the "pretentious ideals, elitism, mahogany (and men) typically associated with members' clubs." Lo Dico explained her motivation for opening the club:

> There's so many professional women working in London now, we wanted to socialise with them

Promulgating, in other words, the very same "personal network relationships" fostered between members of the Garrick Club that Lady Hale was railing against back in 2011. Sanghani also warned readers of thinking the The Other Club was just a space for socialising:

> Don't be fooled by the fun names though – the events are set to explore the hard hitting topics of slut-shaming, the page 3 ban and "the F word" again.

In other words, a club for professional women to discuss hardline feminist policies, including soft and hard censorship. The formula was again put to work by Le Dico a year ago when she opened The Trouble Club, an establishment for "talented, witty and cheeky women of today to challenge presumptions that women cannot talk politics, tech, philosophy."

Rhadika Sanghani

It’s far from clear how oppressed and marginalised the (largely white, privileged) women who frequent Lo Dico’s establishment actually are. The new place has had influential guest speakers such as politician’s ex-wife and professional victim, Vicky Pryce, who has been spearheading a major Liberal Democrat campaign for fewer women to be sent to prison. By the way, the male prison population in the UK is 81,709, while the female prison population is 3,867.

To be fair, Lo Dico’s clubs don’t exclude men. She was at pains to point out, in relation to the Trouble Club, that “Men can join – so long as they follow the rules of bringing a female plus one. It keeps women in the majority in this space.”

No need to imagine what prospect any man would have exerting influence in such an environment, and what species of tame, supplicating manginas and white knights would gravitate there. The hypocrisy of Joy Lo Dico on the Garrick Club gives away her crude Feminist power play: complain about the detrimental nature of male practices while appropriating those practices in a female context, wherein they are no longer detrimental, but “empowering.”

The Importance Of Male Spaces

We have written before on ROK that “men and women have different social and cultural needs, some of which can only be fulfilled in gender-specific safe spaces.”

Garrick Club members are among the most prominent minds in academia, law, politics and business. If so many of them are against the changing of the all-male rule, then there might be something more to it than what asinine hacks like Joy Lo Dico characterise as a refusal to “get with the times.”

They are probably well aware of the consequences of allowing women to infiltrate this formerly male space. As the Daily Telegraph's unabashedly Neo-Masculinist Martin Daubney has written:

> …it's a fact that if you put a woman in a group of men, it profoundly and irreversibly changes the dynamic as we posture for attention, or say what we think women want to hear

What better way to flush the quality of bonhomie and banter down the toilet?

The New, Elite Mangina

Benedict Cumberbatch, the prototype Elite Mangina

If any Garrick members need convincing that the proposed rule change is a bad idea, they need only consider the most prominent proponent of the motion, Garrick Club member Benedict Cumberbatch. The actor recently went to great pains to show his progressive credentials by crawling on his belly to appease a baying mob of SJWs over his use of the term "coloured" in an interview about diversity in UK acting. Cumberbatch grovels like a Soviet functionary engaging in self criticism:

> I can only hope this incident will highlight the need for correct usage of terminology that is accurate and inoffensive.

It seems that after almost two centuries, the Garrick Club's admissions policy has proved itself insufficiently conservative to keep out the "terrible bores" it was designed to. It now harbours men like Benedict Cumberbatch, willing to self-flagellate over his failure of "correct usage of terminology" and willing to change the Garrick's men-only membership policy to appease feminist consensus.

With "terrible bores" like Cumberbatch on its roster, it won't be long before the Garrick

Club invites women, and mediocrity, into its ancient, wood-paneled lounges.

Girls Are Fundamentally Lazy

March 25, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I have been thinking a lot recently about what it takes to “live the life” – the life, that is, of a guy committed to meeting and seducing a succession of new women. There’s a lot to consider: what proportion of one’s time should be spent on the hunt; how sustainable it is long term; at what point should one cash in and try a relationship (if at all).

The problem that I face – and I suspect that this may apply to other guys too – is that due to time constraints I frequently have one foot in and one foot out of the game.

The duality of game

On the one hand, nothing appeals to me more than the idea of a succession of hook-ups with hot young women. I am a libertarian at heart, and I find convention stifling. I’m not saying there’s anything wrong with long-term relationships but I find them difficult for a number of reasons. I’ve had three so far – each with cool girls, with whom I shared great times. But temperamentally the set-up is not for me. My focus is on my work and on writing (both for this and other blogs, as well as my novels, which are my main project).

Hook-ups require work. In my book I recommend that guys approach 100 women in a month. This is something I still do myself from time to time: it gets the motor running, sharpens up your social skills, gives you incredible momentum and will hopefully yield some good prospects for sex. But let's be honest — interacting with a hundred strangers takes time and emotional energy. And that's before you get into the funnel of dating and seducing.

Meeting up with the girl, if only for a maximum of two drinks (recommended), prepping her for sex, dealing with her bullshit, getting her into a cab and back to your apartment, handling last-minute resistance then finally fucking her: all of this takes a lot of time, tenacity and energy. On top of my full-time job, my side projects, exercising, and socialising the process takes its toll.

There is a lot of information out there on how to meet girls and get them into bed. Less discussed is what to do when you've got past that point and you're attempting to juggle the women you meet with your work-life — which, as we often emphasise on sites for men, should be your primary focus. I scratch the surface in an article I wrote for Return of Kings about how to run a harem, but I think there's a lot more to be said and it's something I intend to come back to in the future.

All of this came to a head for me at the weekend when B stayed over at my flat. I've been seeing B since the beginning of the year, and she has become my primary girl almost by default, although she is hot, scoring well against all my personal requirements: twenty-three, very slim, long legs, long hair, great facial bone structure, Polish.

B stayed with me on Saturday night. B woke up feeling lazy on Sunday morning. B called up her waitress job and told them she had a temperature. I want to stay here with you. Fine, baby, but I need to work*. That's OK — I won't disturb you.*

I sat down at the computer. I am editing a novel at the moment — a process which requires concentration and, ideally, solitude. B lay in bed and ate toast. B painted her toenails. B called a friend and had an animated ten minute conversation in Polish. B watched an episode of Gossip Girl. Finally, B had a crying jag and told me she couldn't trust me.

The "alpha" response to this: you should have kicked that bitch out the house. Money over bitches, bro — never let a girl come before your work. Etc. True. But life is rarely that simple. There are two issues here. First — the majority of the women that I come into contact with actually do very little with their lives. Second — unless you're a complete psychopath (and yeah, I know hot chicks dig "dark triad" shit, but let's be real here) there is in every scenario a calculation to be made about how much you tolerate and how much you push back on without being a dick.

Most people are aimless. As Will Self says in a recent essay, a vast majority of [their] time is spent undertaking work that has little human or spiritual value. They are consumers, not producers. They watch sports. They watch box sets. They discuss the box sets on social media. They update Instagram. They obsess over celebrities. They drink. They take drugs. They have a good time, superficially, but their lives have little substance. Put simply, they have nothing to do.

I meet girls in shopping malls and in discos and in man-made pleasure resorts like Ibiza — twenty-first century locales of superficiality. They are filled with people — women and men — who have nothing to do*.

The problem is that I do have things to do — I am merely visiting, dipping in, following the demands of my biological imperative. The girls I meet, who I become intimate with (they spend the night with me; we wake together in my bedroom, a room where I also like to work), plucked from a landscape of banality are themselves banal. There is a conflict when they expect me to be too.

Meet women in art galleries. Meet women in book shops. Done that. The problem persists. A woman who can discuss Almodovar films rather than Pitbull's music is still a consumer. She doesn't necessarily do anything either.

If you are someone who does something — that is, gets up every day and chips away at project that might change your life, be it writing, blogging, fitness, or business — then you are rare, because most other people — and most women — aren't. Worse, there is a tendency, I think, for aimless people to try to slow you down, to bring you down to their level. Perhaps this is because they are aware, and ashamed, of their own inactivity.

For me, this makes even short-term intimacies with women problematic. Novels don’t write themselves. As appealing as a lazy weekend may be for many, for me it is an anathema. I have to work.

8 Bits Of Manosphere Wisdom From Homer Simpson

March 25, 2015 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

One of televisions all-time greatest dumbasses has some things to teach us? Who would have thought! Here are eight scenarios from throughout The Simpsons' lengthy lifespan (but mainly the 1990's) which showcase that, on occasion, Homer is a wiser individual than we would like to give him credit for. Get ready to laugh and learn.

Women Are Like Beer

Women are indeed a lot like a beer. Even though the intoxicating effects of a beer lasts nearly an hour, while an orgasm is less than 10 seconds, indulgence in both brings among the most pleasurable somatic scenarios that an adult male will likely ever experience. Much like the traditional slogan for White Castle hamburgers, women and beer are "what you crave."

Also like beer, it's silly to just try one type of female and stick with it forever. You need to figure out what "brand" you like best, and it's wired in our DNA to be the alpha male and get all the women we can. Especially while our sexual potency is in it's prime.

So throughout your late teen's and 20's, go out there and give at least 15 or 20 different flavors a try (of beer and women) before you even consider locking down your favorite.

But whatever you do, don't ever completely stop or call it "game over" at one. For there is no "special snowflake" type of beer or woman in the whole wide world. Always have another one on tap or in the pipeline.

Understand The Friend Zone

Homer, being a total oaf his entire life, has undoubtedly been rejected or friend-zoned numerous times by other females prior to meeting Marge. He knows all the tricks up a woman's sleeve when they want to make a point they are not interested in another man.

Compliment Women In A Strategic Manner

> "When it comes to compliments, women are ravenous blood-sucking monsters always wanting more…MORE….MORE!! – Homer Simpson

Homer is spot on with this one. Women crave compliments and social validation like heroin, and this has been thrust into overdrive in the 2010's with the vast array of social media applications which young women gobble up for breakfast, brunch, lunch, afternoon snack, dinner, midnight snack, and really just about anywhere in between.

However, you should always refrain from shitblasting women with compliments of "goddess!" or "marry me!" on social media. It is very beta behavior, and adding to women's already over-inflated sense of self-worth should not be our mission objective.

Instead, use compliments strategically during real-life situations which get a woman's hamster wheel churning like a locomotive. Women can do all sorts of things for you (like getting them to pay for stuff and buy you presents) if you tickle their fancy just right.

Value Your Own Company

Friends, lovers, and girlfriends are wonderful things to have in your life. However, you should also be comfortable in your own skin and find value and enjoyment in your alone time as well. If it's a Friday or Saturday night, and it seems like everybody is getting some action but you, a man who can be ecstatic in the company of "me, myself, and I" is a very admirable personal quality. (Just don't take it to excess or be weird about it.)

Play It Cool

Confidence is pivotal to the all-round success of a man. You need it in order to laid, which of course should be pretty obvious to most heterosexual men. But with female-dominated human resource departments in the 21st century, you need it to simply have a hope of getting one of the dwindling numbers of jobs these days.

So forget all that blue pill "just be yourself" crap. You have to tweek your personality a bit and play it cool in order to get what you want.

Marriage Is A Lot Like An Orange

A truly classic piece of (inadvertent) relationship wisdom. In the 1994 episode "Secrets Of A Successful Marriage," Homer manages to land a second job as a marriage counselor. At one point, he accurately demonstrates to his class that marriage is a lot like an orange, though not quite in the manner he intended.

The point is, marriage can be nourishing and sweet, for a little while. But at some point the juice will run out, and you realize to you're disappointment and horror that all you're left with is biodegradable skin.

Disregard Females, Acquire Currency

Face it gentlemen, money is freedom. And just what is freedom exactly? It's peoples ability to "follow their own will in all things that the law has not prohibited and (2) not be subject to the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, and arbitrary wills of others." Freedom is what we're all about here in the Manosphere.

When you have money in abundance, you can quit your meaningless job, permanently live abroad, eat healthier foods, live in more desirable locations, hit the highway on your motorcycle, or reside in a more pimp bachelor pad. By proxy, your material success will also attract women (who are obviously good for nothing more than a pump-n-dump).

Tune Out Disgusting Man-Hating Feminists

Ughh, "feminists." The mainstream media likes to pretend that these women (and their mangina enablers) are doing society a favor, but they are more akin to being a medical leech. You see, back when civilization was superstitious and backward, leeches were assumed to suck out "bad blood" during a bout of illness. But now we realize they just made things even worse, by sucking out more of your own vital fluids.

That's what feminists do. They pretend that there is much "injustice" in society, and only their "progressive" liberal policies will cure the ills of civilization. But all they do is act against logic, lie profusely, and make our already sick society even more degenerate.

And who in the hell thought that Sarah Silverman's brand of man-hating and dog-humping humor was actually funny? Homer certainly doesn't.

Conclusion

Understandably, some people are irritated with the portrayal of the Simpson family because it follows the "buffoonish father" formula which has been the mainstay of western TV media for decades.

However, the show has been airing for so long now (25+ years), that Homer has inevitably been featured in numerous vignettes and set pieces which are laced with red pill philosophy.

And let's face it, the show was such a dominant and enjoyable piece of popular culture in the 1990's, which contributed heavily towards making that decade so damn good overall (compared to now). Amen to that.

5 Reasons It’s Better To Be A Divorced Parent, According To Huffington Post

March 26, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

The Huffington Post recently put out an article titled “5 Reasons It’s Better To Be A Single Parent,” although it’s clear that it’s really about being an unwed mother. It’s written by Kerri Zane, who is described as a “single mom lifestyle expert.” How you become an expert in something that subjective is a mystery to me. Does she have a master’s degree in divorce?

I’ve seen a hundred articles by men glorifying free sex or avoiding marriage, but I’ve never read an article by a man glorifying divorce or bastardy. Well, okay, aside from that one Art of Manliness had, but I think that’s more trying to make the best of what you’re dealt with than an actual preference.

Also, this article is under the divorce subsection of HuffPo. Why would such a large publication have a section on this topic if it were not trying to glorify it?

March 24, 2015

HUFF POST DIVORCE

For Zane, divorce court is an opportunity to make lemons out of lemonade.

> Eleven years ago, when my former husband and I split, I saw my divorce as a glorious opportunity to parent solo. In fact, based on the latest Census Bureau statistics, there are over 14 million single parent households with children > under the age of 18. That is a lot of people and a good reason to celebrate.

So someone decided to make March 21 Single Parent Day (or more realistically, Unwed Mother Day). The article doesn't state who decided it to be so, so I'm assuming Hallmark. I have no doubt the Catholic Church will adopt it in a few years. Kick off some fifth century saint to make room for a good two-thirds of their congregation.

> As a single mom advisor and author of It Takes All 5, I would like to honor the day and offer you five solid reasons why it's better to be a single mom or dad then half of a parenting pair.

This philosophy is actually what the HuffPo article is about. We have reached full moral sewer. All that Clarey and Aurini said about the Left actively trying to destroy the family that made them sound like paranoid conspiracy theorists? It's all true.

Here are Zane's five excuses she uses to justify her terrible life choices and convince you to do the same:

1. You always get your way

Zane enjoys that she's cut the balls of her children's father and relegated him to their "weekend guardian," to quote a scene from Thank You For Smoking.

> Rather than navigating the treacherous territory of constant parental compromise, you can independently make choices for your children that you feel is best. […]
> While your married counterparts continue to disagree on the state of their children's welfare, you get to make unilateral choices, which in the long run is better for your offspring's well-being. A child's behavior can be negatively affected by adult arguing.

Because having your family severed into two isn't a form of arguing, apparently. And what is it she’s free to decide?

> No more discussing the finer points of gymnastics vs. volleyball. I didn’t have to debate dessert after dinner vs. never ever letting sugar touch lips. And there was no longer a lengthy discussion over the reason my daughters needed braces.

Those are hardly important decisions. Who wants to place bets that she’s the hippie that wanted her kids to never eat sugar and her husband was the one who was all like, “Eh, let them be kids”?

Furthermore, her point that two parents shouldn’t argue over everything further supports the ROK ideology that women should let their husbands have the final say on important matters. If you have to choose between being a submissive wife or destroying your family, go for the one that best benefits the people in your life you are responsible for. Empower someone else other than your ego.

> Payment plans were designed for the single parent!

Or something like that

Forget the donation drive. ROK needs to start a credit card company.

After my father left my mother, she decided to never date again, regularly stayed at work until ten at night, grew obese, developed a hoarding complex, and become confused when all three of her children cultivated substance abuse problems. But hey, she got full custody, so having the primary burden of not screwing up her children certainly makes hers a full life well-lived.

2. You Can Encourage Your Daughters To Pursue An Inflated Ego

Zane wants her daughters to believe that they don't need anyone else in their life. They can do anything on their own, which I'm hoping includes avoiding government financial assistance.

You can't make it through life without relying on other people. Eventually you will need the help of someone else. Better to learn humility now than humiliation later. And there's a unique kind of obnoxiousness in someone who refuses assistance or a gift out of some self-martyric "I'm a giving tree" onanism.

> You embody the the idea that it's better to "want" to be in a relationship because there is a loving bond rather than you "need" to be in a relationship because there is stuff to be done or procured.

Except she got divorced. Which means that the "want" wasn't enough of a loving bond.

My very own unwed mother took great pride in never once using government assistance and rarely using childcare. There's no telling how much money she indefinitely borrowed from her parents, though, and my grandfather watched us three or four days out of the week during the school year, since my mother was a kindergarten teacher.

3. Teach Your Children To Die Alone

Zane wants to pass her heartbreak and isolation onto her children.

> Children will be enlightened and possibly relieved that they are no longer tied to that traditional lifestyle.

Relieved that they only see Daddy on every other weekend and every Tuesday night? Children need to be tied to that traditional lifestyle, because children need stability. Otherwise they end up an alcoholic law school dropout who writes hate speech on the internet.

> These lessons are particularly important for girls, who were raised on the fictitious belief that Prince Charming would sweep them of their feet to live happily ever after, only to become enormously disappointed when their fairytale ending turns into a hardcore courtroom reality.

Yeah, I'm sure it was Zane who was the most disappointed in that courtroom. Conservative estimates place women as initiating two-thirds of divorces. And since she already said above, "I saw my divorce as a glorious opportunity to parent solo," I'm assuming that she is the one who decided to dismiss the father in favor of more exciting men.

I like how she admits she wanted the fairy tale narrative. Remember kids, a girl's marital market value [MMV?] skyrockets if she keeps her legs closed until the wedding night. Ladies get treated like ladies. Hoes get treated like hoes. Speaking of which…

4. You Get To Be A Slut!

Zane then brags about how much fun it is getting fucked and forgotten.

> While [married couples] constantly have to "spice it up" in the bedroom, the nature of being single and switching partners does all the cooking for us. We tease, experiment and explore the bawdy awareness of every new lover.

When not confusing her children with a string of month-long father figures, Zane also enjoys sleeping in her bed alone, which in some way is the most depressing part of the article.

> The National Sleep Foundation reported that sleeping two to a bed could cause you to lose 49 minutes of sleep per night. That's a lot! On the nights when no one is next to me to snuggle with, I lay diagonally across the mattress, relishing the cool crisp sheets on "his side."

Lifeless bedsheets instead of a man who loves you? Empowerment. Notice that this section doesn't have anything to do with parenthood.

5. It Motivates You To Lose 30 Pounds

Are you a fatass? Can't get motivated enough to hit the gym past the second week of January? Kerri Zane has the answer for you.

> Most of us have an overriding desire to want to be attractive to prospective mates of the opposite sex. The result of a divorce? A slimmer, trimmer you — aka the Divorce Diet. Take a look at Tom Cruise who reportedly lost 15 pounds after splitting with Katie. Jennie Garth lost 20 and Demi Moore has been stick thin since the departure of her sweetheart, Ashton Kutcher.

Apparently Zane is so self-focused that attracting new dick is more motivating than pleasing the man she promised forever and ever. Maybe she's losing so much weight because now she has to work an actual job instead of watching Lifetime tv movies all day.

> The best way to handle the inevitable life shifts is to stay positive, reach out for support from your friends and family, relish the time you spend with your children and most importantly*, create a daily space for some much deserved me-time.

If this doesn't summarize the narcissistic entitlement of the author, I don't know what does.

Why You Should Think Twice Before Attempting Day Trading As A Career

March 26, 2015 | by Justin Puck | Link | Original Link

Most American guys reading sites like this long ago realized the best women are no longer found at home. Therefore, living overseas and supporting oneself via a remote work gig is understandably the next thing on a young man's mind.

However, more important than deciding where is deciding what the best way to support a lifestyle in an ideal location. While some bloggers and writers earn a decent living via their skills, not everyone is handy with the written word. Even if you are, unless you have thousands of social media followers, blogging probably won't pay you what think it can, and nowadays your first e-book usually won't generate a lot of money.

Hell, they often don't generate anything even for established authors. So what other internet-based options are out there for the would-be remote worker with a serious independence streak?

This will not be you.

In terms of working remotely, day trading seems appealing. There's no boss, no commute, no office, tons of information about how to trade and if you're already a news junkie and into the markets, it fits right in with what you pay attention to—so why not do it?

Not so fast.

Is it possible?

The short answer is yes, it's possible to make a living day trading. The big picture is that it takes time to get there. Imagine having no experience playing a musical instrument, going to the music store, buying a guitar with all the right equipment, and then tomorrow trying to start earning a living as a musician.

Likewise, if you have zero experience day trading and think all you need is a brokerage account with some seed capital, a laptop, and an Internet connection, you are essentially walking on stage with a Stratocaster and expecting to play like Jimi Hendrix with zero preparation. Day trading isn't a casino, you shouldn't be in it for the excitement and it takes a serious commitment of time and study to develop a winning strategy. Ignore this warning at your financial peril.

How much money do I need?

Gurus with plans to sell will tell you that anyone can be a trader with a couple of thousand dollars. Realistically, your $2,000 eTrade account may be a fun distraction, but for serious day trading, you need the right brokers. If you plan to short sell penny stocks, only a couple of brokers will allow you to do this, the cheapest of which requires a $10k account to start.

The best broker out there that all the top individual traders use requires $50k to start. Still ready to do this? Bring along your discipline and learn before placing trades. Yes, you can practice with simulated trades too, but just as in poker, when the chips actually mean something, you WILL trade much differently—or at least you should.

Are there good teachers?

I’m not here to plug products or gurus, but I will say that most of them are full of hot air. That said, there are about three or four well known ones which, although their styles differ, can back up all of their trades. Those guys have all busted their ass to get where they are and actually walk the walk.

But keep a few things in mind if you’re shopping around for a course. First, if they can’t back up their trades, they’re not worth the oxygen they’re stealing from you as they speak. Plenty of bozos are out there selling books, videos, plans, and programs about how big a millionaire their system will make you, but unless they’ve got verifiable trades (and the good ones will) forget them.

Even if they can back up their trades, you still need to be skeptical. If someone has a success record of more than 75% winning trades, walk away—any “proof” provided will be bullshit. The best day traders out there do not go through life winning all their trades, and anybody who shows you stats with near-perfect records is a delusional liar.

That said, don’t be automatically dismissive of people with a low win rate either. Plenty of profitable traders have closer to a 30-40% win rate, but because their wins are so much greater than their losses they still make money. Great traders learn to cut losses quickly the minute the trade goes against their plan. When it comes to any guru, do your homework, read reviews, try to find people who followed them and actually made money.

Who should do it?

The best candidates for day trading are those with the time to devote to learning the craft. If you have a regular job, transitioning to a full time trader lifestyle will be very difficult since you're probably at work when the market is open. It's no surprise most of the guys getting into trading are young, often in college or out for summer break and have both the time and lack of obligations enabling them to study and practice their trading.

The last thing you need is pressure to perform as a brand new trader. If you're unemployed with a mortgage and have a family to feed, for heavens sake, do not take out a HELOC to finance your "career change" as there will be far too much pressure, causing you to force trades and lose. The fewer burdens on your mind when you get into it, the better your chances of success.

Why not do it?

Forget the laptop – most good day traders need something like this.

There are a gazillion reasons not to do it. I'll also add that part-time trading more than likely won't support you even if you are good at it. Forget the idea of laptop trading on a beach with an umbrella drink in your hand; this is solitary, difficult, intense and anti-social work. The best traders are full-time, full-system, full-focus.

If you aren't prepared to put in the time to learn, fail repeatedly and get back up again, then stick to mutual funds and investing (which is not trading!).

Finally, don't forget your whole motivation for trying to get into day trading—to work remotely and independently. Assuming you'll be trading the US markets, where you decide to locate will influence how convenient the lifestyle is for you. If you like the women of South East Asia, not only may you have a difficult time finding a solid and reliable Internet connection, but you'll also be up in the middle of the night trying to participate in the New York markets when you'd rather be gaming the women you moved there to pursue.

Europe is much better time zone-wise, but even then your early evenings may be taken up with late day trades instead of dates. Also bear in mind that successful traders don't stop working when the closing bell rings, they're researching and running scans and trade setups for the next day. As for connectivity and time zones anywhere else on the planet, it's too often a crapshoot—your broadband connection and availability during market hours are vital to your ability to execute trades.

Not really the best choice for independent men

In the end I do not recommend day trading as a profession for someone looking to start an internet-based business. The chances are far too great it will end in disaster for the novice trader. Unless you are already a consistently successful trader with an edge and a working system you've developed, pulling up stakes and expecting to master a craft in a matter of weeks or months in a foreign land will only make you go broke even faster.

Most men looking to step out with a location-independent business are better served spending their time and money learning some other occupationally mobile skill. And for Pete's sake, save your eyesight for looking at beautiful women rather than green and red dots on a screen all day.

How Science Shows That Leptin Is The Most Important Fat Burning Hormone

March 26, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by SixPack Shortcuts

Want to know the best kept secret about fat loss? It's leptin… that's the bottom line.

So what is leptin and why should you care about it if you want to burn fat, get ripped six pack abs, and not have to worry about shedding the MAX amount of stubborn fat?

Well, first of all this powerful hormone is the #1 most important fat burning hormone.

And you may have heard of another hormone named insulin that is responsible for fat gain – or as the "flab king" that packs on extra pounds. But how are the two related? Well, they are actually complete opposites.

You see, insulin is released in your body when you eat food, particularly ones that are high in sugar… and insulin turns that food into fat.

On the other hand, leptin allows your body to actually use energy from the fat you already have on your body. Here are three things you need to know about leptin that have been proven by science:

1. The more fat you have on your body, the more leptin that will be available so you can burn off that fat

> “Plasma leptin was found to be highly correlated with body mass index (BMI) in rodents and in 87 lean and obese humans. In humans, there was variability in plasma leptin at each BMI suggesting that there are differences in its secretion rate from fat. Weight loss due to food restriction was associated with a decrease in plasma leptin in samples from mice and obese humans.”

This research also suggests that, when you get skinnier, lower leptin levels make it harder to keep losing weight

As you begin to burn off fat, your leptin decreases… so it becomes harder to burn off unwanted body fat and you start storing more fat as your leptin levels decrease.

Bottom line: as you lose more fat, your leptin goes down and makes it more difficult for you to shed the fat. On top of that, lower leptin levels also make you feel sluggish and unmotivated – or lazy.

2. When you overeat, you reduce the effectiveness of leptin

Chowing down on your meals? You may be hurting yourself more than you realize.

> In common forms of obesity, hyperphagia, hyperinsulinemia, and hyperleptinemia coexist. Here, we demonstrate rapid induction of insulin and leptin resistance by short-term overfeeding. After 3 and 7 days on the assigned diet regimen, rats were tested for their biological responses to acute elevations in plasma insulin and leptin concentrations. Severe resistance to the metabolic effects of both leptin and insulin ensued after just 3 days of overfeeding. During the insulin clamp studies, glucose production was decreased by approximately 70% in control rats and 28-53% in overfed rats. Similarly, leptin infusion doubled the contribution of gluconeogenesis to glucose output in control rats but failed to modify gluconeogenesis in overfed animals. These findings demonstrate a paradoxical and rapid collapse of the leptin system in response to nutrient excess. This partial failure is tightly coupled with the onset of insulin resistance

This research means that both diet and exercise will be huge components of you controlling your leptin levels and getting them to work for you. However, you can boost your LEPTIN levels today with this: Do THIS 2x Daily For Accelerated Fat Loss.

3. Sugar may be especially bad for keeping your leptin effective

> Subsequent exposure of the fructose-mediated, leptin-resistant rats to a high-fat diet led to exacerbated weight gain (50.2 ± 2 g) compared with correspondingly fed leptin-responsive animals that were pretreated with the fructose-free diet (30.4 ± 5.8 g, $P = 0.012$). Our data indicate that chronic fructose consumption induces leptin resistance prior to body weight, adiposity, serum leptin, insulin, or glucose increases, and this fructose-induced leptin resistance accelerates high-fat induced obesity. [PUBMED]

We all know that rats and humans are not the same, but this is pretty convincing evidence that if you're suffering from a bad diet already, you're hurting yourself even more by consuming extra sugar.

Now, I say suffering from a bad diet, because it's very, very hard to maintain a perfect diet. And dieting is hard… even if you have been dieting but not seeing results fast enough – it could simply be because your leptin levels are too low.

However, this 2x Daily For Accelerated Fat Loss technique can reignite your leptin and kick your body back into fat burning mode in no time.

So if you have hit a wall and you're ready to kick your fat loss into high gear, THIS could put you back on track to getting the body you want.

Shed the fat,

Mike Chang

New Ontario Sex-Ed Curriculum Shamelessly Pushes SJW Propaganda Onto Kids

March 26, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Canada's Ontario province already had a bad reputation as hosting the worst city in North America for men. Obesity, entitlement, and bitchiness coupled with extreme political correctness makes it difficult to have any success with talking to girls or finding partners worthy of more than just a pump-and-dump.

However, you thought this generation of men had it tough? You haven't seen anything yet. Get ready for a whole new level of "social justice."

The new Ontario sex-ed curriculum, aimed at grades 1-12, comprises approximately 500 pages of seemingly innocent material. How to do physical exercise, interact with each other respectfully, care about safety and so on. Oh, and among these useful tips we have casual discussions of what anal and oral sex are, fat acceptance, that only females can be victims of gender violence, how to fight hetero-normative sexism and to stir up trouble via social media if we want change.

All of this and much more, taught to kids in elementary school.

“All your kids are belong to us” – Kathleen Wynne

So how did Ontario actually end up in this sad state of affairs, where its sex-ed curriculum sounds like something from a dystopian science fiction movie? It all started in 2010, with then-Premier Dalton McGinty and his gay sidekick Kathleen Wynne, who was his education minister.

They promised an update to the sex-ed curriculum which was last modified in 1998. But when parents realized what was actually in the curriculum, they scuttled it and forced McGinty to put it on the backburner indefinitely. SJW media lamented this turn of events and labelled the dissenting parents as a “minority group of religious parents.”

As soon as Kathleen Wynne was elected Premier, she started working on the new sex-ed curriculum with her minister of education, Liz Sandals. And oh boy, did the two of them deliver. The curriculum is the SJW gender studies professor’s wet dream.

Liz Sandals, about to lunge at a straight white male

Colleges in the US have already started pushing for the “yes means yes” consent law on campuses, which essentially means that you ought to ask the female for every sexual action you want to do to her and wait for her to say “yes” before you carry on, effectively outing yourself as a total imbecile who can’t read body language.

In the Ontario sex-ed curriculum, children are taught “yes means yes,” showing that SJWs have a unified agenda that stretches across the entire North American continent:

Teacher prompt: “As their bodies continue to grow and change and their understanding of themselves and their bodies continues to develop, some teenagers are thinking about becoming sexually active. What should you keep in mind when making decisions about sexual activity?”

Students: “There are a lot of different things to think about. You can start with considering how having sex fits in with the values that you and your family respect.” “As a Métis woman, I was taught by my aunties about my ability to create life and how important it is to respect that gift. The decisions I make about sex depend greatly on how much I respect myself and respect being a woman. It’s important to take the time to find a partner who respects me as well, and my body.” “Having a clear understanding of consent is important. When making decisions about sexual activity, both people need to say yes. Silence does not mean yes; only yes means yes. Consent needs to be ongoing throughout the sexual activity.” “For some teens the most important question is whether they feel comfortable, ready, and mature enough to have sex. It helps to know yourself well, to know your body, and to know what makes you feel good – and safe – and what doesn’t. You also need to think about your health and whether you are in a relationship where both partners trust and care for each other. If you are not ready to take responsibility to protect yourself and your partner from STIs or an unintended pregnancy, you’re not ready to have sex.” “People should remember that everyone needs information, and different people may need different information. As a teen with a physical disability, I

Without men and women having sex, there is no next generation. But according to Ontario SJWs, this is heterosexist and an actual sign of discrimination. One lesson contains the definition of “heterosexism,” how it affects the language and to always challenge such assumptions in others, thus turning the children into unwitting LGBT rights advocates:

Teacher prompt: "Heterosexism is the assumption that if someone is in a romantic or sexual relationship, it is with someone of the opposite sex. Think about the effect this might have on a person who is questioning his or her gender identity or sexual orientation. Heterosexism is often seen in our use of language. By using more inclusive language ourselves, and supporting its use in literature and the media, we can create an environment that is comfortable for all and where all feel they are a part. What are some other ways in which we can reduce homophobia, increase understanding, and support those who are questioning their gender identity or sexual orientation?"

Students: "We can contribute to a positive school climate in which everyone feels safe, comfortable, and accepted by showing respect for others." "We can object when we see people being harassed or treated unequally and report the incident to trusted adults." "We can participate in gay-straight alliances and other student-led activities that promote understanding and the development of healthy relationships."

To change the social environment and challenge the heterosexist norms, kids are encouraged to use social media. This is unbelievably insidious, as it makes children into the generators of outrage on social media onto which actual SJWs can latch on as proof that their claims are legitimate:

Teacher: "How could you persuade media producers to change the way they portray relationships?"

Student: "I could use my influence as a consumer, by choosing not to buy, read, or listen to material that presents unrealistic and harmful messages. I could also write to the companies that produce such material to express my opinion. I could raise awareness within the school by having discussions, putting up posters, or giving presentations about media stereotyping and its harmful effects. To reach even more people, I could use blogs and social media to get my message online. We need to stand up for the equality of all. As society becomes more informed and more accepting of all types of relationships, stereotyping will become less and less common, and discrimination and violence against those who are represented as different will not be accepted."

To hammer the point about the sexual consent home, it is repeated a few times more in the curriculum. This time around, there is an added bonus of "enthusiastic consent" and how drunk women cannot consent to sex. Of course, this only applies to women.

Teacher prompt: "Staying safe in relationships and preventing and avoiding violence is a two-way street. It is critical to learn how to say no, but it is also critical to understand that no emphatically means no, that no response means no, and that anything other than enthusiastic consent means no. Tell me more about what consent means and how you recognize it."

Students: "It's not just that neither partner has said no. It's about both partners saying yes. Lack of protest or resistance does not mean consent, nor does silence. A person cannot give consent if they are intoxicated or unconscious." "When we're talking about sexual activity – or anything, really, including situations that involve drinking and driving or other behaviour where there might be risk of harm – you need to remember to pay attention to body language and behaviour as well as words."

Challenging stereotypes is how SJWs shame others into accepting their insane ideas until they become the norm. In this lesson, children are taught fat acceptance. Note the wording – it's not fair to label fat people as lazy:

Teacher prompt: "Can you give examples of some stereotypes that might have a negative effect on a person's self-concept and social inclusion? What can we do to change stereotypes and discrimination?"

Student: "People who are overweight are sometimes labelled as lazy. That's not fair. And it's not fair to make assumptions about what people with disabilities are able to do. We need to base our opinions of people on who they are and what they do and not judge them by their appearance or make assumptions about them. There are also negative stereotypes about people who receive extra help or people who receive good marks in class. These can be hurtful and cause people to avoid getting help when they need it or, sometimes, to hide their abilities. Someone who has a mental illness like depression or an anxiety disorder may be seen as being different. We need to remember that mental illness can affect anyone, and it can be treated. Cultural stereotypes are also common. Sometimes people make assumptions that people from a certain cultural background all like the same things or are all good at the same things. That makes us misjudge them. To change stereotypes, we need to get to know people and respond to them as individuals. We need to challenge stereotypes when we hear them."

Violence against boys does not exist. Only females are the victims. Presumably, boys are protected by their white straight privilege:

Teacher prompt: "Gender-based violence includes any form of behaviour – psychological, physical, and sexual – that is based on an individual's gender and is intended to control, humiliate, or harm the individual. When we say 'gender-based violence', we are often referring to violence against women and girls. Can you give me some examples?"

Student: "It can include physical assault in a relationship, sexual assault, or rape. It can also include things like having your rear end pinched in the hallway, having your top pulled down or lifted up, or being held down and touched."

If a man wants to retain even a degree of independence in his relationship with a woman, this is seen as "uneven balance of power" and is a potential sign of danger. Let's face it, SJWs see all men as rapists, it's just that the following lesson doesn't label them as such:

Student: "Thinking about what makes a relationship healthier is a good start. Things that could lead to danger in relationships include an uneven balance of power in the relationship and situations that involve alcohol or drugs. I can stay safer by defining my own limits, listening to my gut feelings, and letting others know what I am doing and where I am going. If something does not feel good or right, I need to have the confidence to tell the other person to stop immediately. And if someone tells me – verbally or non-verbally – to stop, I need to stop immediately."

Have you had enough consent lessons drilled into your head at this point? Here is another one, just to reinforce your role of being a total wimp and never taking initiative with sex:

Teacher: "Being intimate with someone includes having a good understanding of the concept of consent. What are some of the important things that we need to understand about consent?"

Student: "Consent to one activity doesn't imply consent to all sexual activity. It is important to ask for consent at every stage. Consent is communicated, not assumed. You can ask your partner simple questions to be sure that they want to continue: 'Do you want to do this?' or 'Do you want to stop?' A 'no' at any stage does not need any further explanation."

And finally, we have perhaps the sole legitimate lesson regarding sexual education, though aimed at first graders. When I was in first grade, I learned to how to tie my shoelaces. Ontario kids will learn what a clitoris and penis are:

Human Development and Sexual Health

C1.3 identify body parts, including genitalia (e.g., penis, testicles, vagina, vulva), using correct terminology [PS]

> Teacher prompt: "We talk about all body parts with respect. Why is it important to know about your own body, and use correct names for the parts of your body?"
> Student: "All parts of my body are a part of me, and I need to know how to take care of and talk about my own body. If I'm hurt or need help, and I know the right words, other people will know what I'm talking about."

Besides these apparently obvious SJW lessons, there is a thin layer of 1984 throughout the curriculum. Namely, teachers are encouraged to create and maintain an atmosphere of trust and safety with pupils. Doesn't sound so bad, right? However, at the same time children are encouraged to talk about their problems, including their parents' intimate problems, with the person they trust (a.k.a. the teacher). Then, of course, the teacher can call the police or whichever authority is deemed necessary.

One example in the curriculum is how kids should constantly be challenging the stereotypes, such as that mental illness is bad. In the example, an adult (parent) says that someone is "nuts" and the child is supposed to silence the parent and then report this event to the trusted adult (teacher). This nightmarish scenario effectively turns children into spies of the state and rips the family unit to shreds, as nobody can trust anyone else.

Kathleen Wynne promised that this curriculum will be in Ontario classrooms in September 2015. Happy studying.

If She Doesn’t Do These 5 Things Regularly, Dump Her Immediately

March 27, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Your living or logistical arrangements with your girlfriend will vary. But these five things are not for negotiation. If she’s not living them out, mostly unconsciously, why are you even putting your spicy dick sauce in her oven?

If you’ve been dating a girl for more than three months and she hasn’t started doing these five things, you’re pissing on an electrical fire. If it’s been six months and she’s not doing all of these things when the opportunity arises, you’re an obsequious, undead eunuch who should never breed.

1. She feels guilty about owing you something

Maybe you spotted her a hundred bucks because her roommate bailed and the lease was in her name. Her appreciation at the time was vociferous, even if she couldn't pay you back yet. The down payment she made was an extra five blowjobs that week.

When she paid you back, it was either $100 and date tickets to the game, or $150 and a striptease in new lingerie that she bought. Then she presented her ass for you again.

Guilt shows that she feels compelled to make it up to you. She doesn't take value without returning it in even greater amounts. And for the act of borrowing from you, monetarily or otherwise, she begs to give back more than you gave initially.

And if you helped her in an emergency or otherwise urgent situation, she reciprocates the favor five-fold. Ten, if it's the second time in half a year.

2. She anticipates and supports your deadlines and commitments

[image]

You have a final exam or big job interview. Without asking, she fixes your breakfast that morning, polishes your shoes, or rearranges the living room so you can study in peace.

A close relative dies? She cancels her conflicting appointments, shoos away any pestering friends and makes sure that it's 100% about you and whoever else is affected.

She doesn't need to be asked to do something to help you; she thinks ahead, organizes it and then throws in bonus serendipitous acts for good measure. Should you be unable to count five clear, powerful examples of this automatic sacrificing every two months, you're wasting your time with her.

3. She lashes out at a rude comment or gesture towards you

Normally placid and sweet, she gets feisty for you in the right circumstances, before she realizes what she’s doing.

She’s not fighting your battles for you, far from it. But she’ll back you up because you’re valuable invaluable to her. Her creepy, half-drunk uncle gives you the stare at a family dinner? She starts an argument if he doesn’t stop.

Her parents, especially the conservative type, don’t approve of you or something you did? She risks tears, cursing at daddy for the first time or swearing off family for a month in order to take your side.

She should be doing this. After all, she’s left the dirty, atavistic old country for the pleasures and prosperity of the New World.

4. She apologizes profusely for her outbursts

It may not be “big” in the grand scheme of things. But she fucked up and she sure as hell better make up for it. And that’s what she tells herself. No nudging from you is necessary.

If the incident was in front of other people, she apologizes to you a second or third time, in front of them. She puts herself on the line because she has standards.

Over the coming weeks, depending on the severity of the mishap, she makes conscious attempts to positively overindulge in her normal, supportive behavior. She always goes the extra mile for her man after she loses the plot.

If her initial apology included a justification about hormones or something akin to them, she backtracks, and makes the apology ten times more effusive.

5. She does things for you for no reason

She doesn't need Hallmark, Santa Claus, or the anniversary of your expulsion from the womb to remind her to lavish you with something.

Common sense dictates that normality can't always be like a birthday, but she makes every reasonable (and unreasonable) effort to make your day seamless, happy, supported and free of her shit. You get more gifts from her than you give to her. Moreover, she loves surprising you with something she's gotten you. She relishes it.

She consciously rebels against the propaganda that a woman is entitled to everything from her boyfriend. When Kaley Cuoco at first said she wasn't a feminist, your girlfriend insisted she isn't either. But, unlike Kaley, she didn't contradict herself later.

Earning her keep isn't a phrase she hears in a sitcom about a foster child who's adopted by a rich family. She lives the mantra and whenever she doesn't, she kicks herself into gear and gets back into your program and paradigm.

Conclusion

What you settle for twice a week for six months is what you'll accept for the next twenty years, regardless of whether new girls come along. So grow some balls and pull the plug when the microwave isn't cooking your oatmeal.

Everything you read on ROK or on any other website or in any other book is utterly worthless if you don't follow the golden rule: make her treat you better than she expects you to treat her.

The Basics Of Sex Economy And Self-Regulation

March 27, 2015 | by Logan Logout | Link | Original Link

The 20th century psychiatrist Wilhelm Reich used the term “sex economy” to refer to the accumulation, storage, and dissipation of a person’s sexual energy within their body. For him, sexual discharge for a man took place within the vagina of a woman, and sexual discharge for a woman happened with the receiving of a man’s penis. Anything else was considered a form of “fetish” or neuroses, which he argued would not appear in a sexually healthy individual.

Wilhelm Reich; student of Freud, later a radical psychiatrist

But that is not what I’m using the term “sex economy” to refer to. In this sense I am using it to refer to the dysregulation of the sexual marketplace.

Sex Economy 101

Too many choices causes buyer's remorse and no satisfaction, coulda-shoulda-woulda

Early civilizations realized the very powerful nature of female sexuality (see the Law of Moses), and hence sought to control and regulate it, using the community-driven and sanctified form of a patriarchal and "bound" community. Anything holy or sanctified was called The Law, or God's Law, to be precise.

What happened with the female liberation movement, as well as other fear-driven political movements was the breaking up of the glue that were these ancient standards.

Within Christianity, divorce (for any other reason than unfaithfulness), was considered adultery. There was no notion of trading up, or seeking a better deal. When the sexual marketplace becomes deregulated, what occurs is a free-for-all.

Ancient civilizations married their young men and women at an early age, they bound them by marriage, in holy matrimony. Because of this their souls and bodies gravitated towards each other, there was an equilibrium, a balancing, a settling.

Once this boundedness is given up, men and women are presented with the illusions of a sexual marketplace, and consequently people get eaten up, raped (literally or figuratively), beaten down, left behind or whatever. Essentially: everyone eats each other.

Once a person's sexuality is not gravitated towards another person when their sexuality is awakened (read: heat, mating, or adolescence), then they are essentially thrust into the sexual marketplace to fend for themselves, and consequently presented with the illusion of there being infinite choices.

The effect on women

This presents the problem of hypergamy in women, because women are not bound (the settling, or gravitation of marriage does not occur), doubt is awakened in them. Have they "found the right one?" Could they "do better?"

Essentially women always trade up—they always look for a better deal. Men do not settle either because they want to have as much sex as possible (to make up for the sex they were denied, or could have had, or could be having), without being bound to a woman.

What is the definition of a deregulated sexual marketplace?

Thank you, 'Rent Is Too Damn High Guy'

A deregulated sexual marketplace is caused by the absence of a binding ingredient, a glue that strikes at the right time to bind two people together. This is usually at age 16 or perhaps a little later, and satisfies both the man's and the woman's sexual lust. This consummation, which is sexual intercourse, if it occurs, would satisfy and remove the "neuroses" present in all men and women.

Instead this is not the case, most young men and women, find that they cannot get their sexual needs met, they then have a new burden to worry about, the women find out they need to become sluts to get laid, and the men find out they need to become bad boys to get laid.

As such psychological maturation stalls, if the problem is not resolved. The other downside is that young men and women begin to blame themselves for these occurrences: "I cannot get laid," or "nobody wants to settle with me." The reality is that most people who have lived on this planet have gotten laid within a regulated marketplace.

Heat

In natural selection, fitness is defined as an organism's ability to reproduce

When the heat strikes, which is usually around adolescence for men and women, but it can occur later. This is considered the prime mating time of both the man and the woman. The man wants to spread his genes at the ripe time, the woman wishes to spread her genes at the ripe time.

If this peak period passes, wherein the unresolved sexual angsts of both genders is not fully consummated, then any sex happening afterwards is like a “sorry about that” from society. Society does its members a disservice, if it cannot get its member’s sexual needs met.

Any sex happening after the peak period is mostly a pleasurable recreational activity. It does not resolve the unwanted sexual frustration and angst that appears within late adolescence, for the sake of finding love and reproducing.

Consequently, neurotic forms of sexuality appear within men and women who “miss this phase.” The confusion spawned by the pain of the unmet needs during this phase, may in fact spawn more problems. The young man or woman may seek to: ignore sexuality (doesn’t work), get laid (doesn’t work or finds it unsatisfying) etc.

Etiology

An inability to get laid on the part of a man may have to do with the man’s upbringing. Perhaps the father was not around, did not discipline the boy and instill “automatic, habitual action” in him. Discipline is essentially the absence of thought, and consequently, choice. Discipline is action, that is undertaken automatically, without thought.

The role of a father is to discipline his sons and daughters. If he is unable to instill this toolset in his child, through a temporary phase of pain, then his child will not have the tools required to succeed in life.

Whoever spares the rod hates their children, but the one who loves their children is careful to discipline them. —Proverbs 13:24

The child will not have the ability to delay gratification, and without faith in consistent gratification, the child will unable to obtain self-regulation (life without deliberation and thinking).

In short, children who lack faith in the “other end of the stick” will not be able to get laid. This is because getting laid is an act that requires delaying gratification. In the absence of discipline, the child must make choices, is forced to do things willfully (not automatically), and thus is burdened.

Eventually, due to the inability to find satisfaction, and the inherent problem of will-based living, the child will burn out, and find themselves blamed by their parents or their peers, while ironically entertaining notions of their own helplessness.

Conclusion

We live in interesting times, but they seem to bring pain to most of the participants in the modern sexual marketplace. Ironically, future civilizations or societies may look back on this time period as one the are ashamed of, and will be careful not to repeat.

5 Movies To Watch With Your Sons

March 27, 2015 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

A friend of mine recently told me that his father used to say “my job is to teach you how to think, not what to think.” This struck me as simple and fundamentally correct, but the nuance got me thinking more about a father’s role in his son’s upbringing. Passing knowledge and certain truths down to the next generation is the key to maintaining your legacy and to setting your children up for success.

This is easier said than done. The education system consumes eight hours of a child’s day for twelve years, all the while undermining parental authority, prolonging immaturity, and pushing them to go to college. Popular culture, social media, and old media bombard their minds with harmful illusions during the few moments of free time they have.

Nowadays, it’s critical to share wisdom with your children, especially your sons, to prevent them from learning every lesson the hard way; to show them the ways of the world before they have to venture out into it. One way to accomplish this is to use one of the “enemy’s” tools against him: watch certain movies with your sons, using the plot as an opportunity to expose their minds to red pill truths.

An example from my life was seeing the original Robocop as a kid: at the time it taught me about armaments, but decades later I realized that a crime fighting machine, lacking human weaknesses, would probably enforce the law better. In general, I recommend using movies that are gritty and realistic. Here are my top five choices.

1. Batman Begins

In this Christopher Nolan reboot of the Batman franchise, the typical Hollywood fluff is virtually absent, and the narrative explores the better aspects of the Batman universe. The concept of hard work and discipline is prominent, which is refreshing. Good and evil are never simple matters in Gotham City. The “heroes” sometimes hide secrets and delusions, and the “villains” sometimes see things more clearly.

Pay close attention to the competing ideologies and worldviews in the film, and the consequences for the characters who hold them. You can discuss with your son the merits of each worldview, and this will get him wondering which is correct. Young Bruce Wayne doesn’t live in a world where everyone’s a winner – even the son of a wealthy philanthropist has to get grimy. But Bruce Wayne inherits more than his father’s wealth: he inherits his altruism and idealism. Sure, he’s noble, but is it worth the price he has to pay?

Is fighting to save Gotham city as Batman worth depriving Bruce Wayne of enjoying his wealth or starting a family? The fact that he has to work outside of the judicial system to accomplish any true effect on criminal activity is another point you should point out to your son.

On the flipside of that she should also educate us on that not all poor people are good people that deserve saving. The dialogue is sophisticated and the actors deliver it with precision, which is refreshing in a world where articulate speech is going by the wayside. Ask yourself what themes you find in the movie and how you’d explain them to your son.

2. Platoon

First off this movie would introduce history that most likely will never be covered in public education, because teachers never seem to make it to the later chapters in the textbook. While the movie doesn't illustrate that Vietnam was actually a Democratic problem or what happens when you have ivory tower elitists running American foreign-policy, it does show the futility of a war where one side doesn't try their hardest to win.

The vulgar language and mostly realistic depiction of combat should inoculate your son from falling for some Marine recruiter's jingoism in the future. The gruesomeness of interpersonal violence presented might actually prevent him from latching on the first person shooting games.

3. Clear And Present Danger

This movie will mainline American government straight into Junior's veins. No social studies or American civics class can truly illustrate the scene that is the DC Beltway. From starting a war over a personal vendetta, to lying to Congress to fund it, this movie covers the how and why presidents do things far better than any McGraw-Hill textbook.

Make sure you point out to your son that the schemers in DC had no problem cutting off the satellite communications when their special forces team in the Colombian jungles became a liability. Also the concept of “whatever it takes to get a second term” is something your son should learn at a young age.

Even some aspects of game are presented in this movie. When the cartel intelligence officer seduces the secretary of a Washington bureaucrat in order to get the intelligence needed to stage an ambush, you can use as example to your son that women can be used for far more than just “playing doctor.”

4. Street Kings

This Keanu Reeves sleeper film is a pretty good un-sugarcoated look at how the police operate. I’m sure the D.A.R.E. officer at his school might have a problem with this, but then again he’s probably making $40 an hour to tell your son that marijuana is evil and asking him if his daddy has any cool guns at home.

In this movie a corrupt squad of cops does what they do in Los Angeles. Apparently one of these cops doesn’t actually have his eyes open to what is going on and is in itself is a learning point for your son. The fact that this corrupt squad has a leader with an actual grand strategy to attain political power is a very good teaching point, because if you’re doing something that doesn’t lead to anything there’s no point doing it. Not to give the movie away, but to counter this corruption the only method the LAPD can use is more corruption.

5. Harsh Times

This movie is another law enforcement-related drama set in Los Angeles. This time it's an Afghan war veteran seeking employment as a police officer while he still kicks it in the hood during the hiring process. The Various examples of social agility and critical thinking are too numerous to mention here, but should give you many talking points to discuss with your son after watching it. This movie highlights what true friendship really is, and should give you the opportunity to explain that Johnny by the sandbox probably will not ride and die with him.

Conclusion

These five movies are a great example of how to use modern media to teach children the ways the world. Instead of bitching about the negative influence the TV or the movie screen has on your children, you could actually co-opt it for your own purposes. A picture really is worth 1,000 words, and by giving an audiovisual example of things it is far easier to explain concepts to young mind.

What are your top five movies? What subtle red pills can you find in them? And how would you go about using them to educate your sons?

Why Modern Leftists Are Fascists

March 27, 2015 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

> Fascist movements are implicitly utopian because they—like communist and heretical Christian movements—assume that with just the right arrangement of policies, all contradictions can be rectified. This is a political siren song; life can never be made perfect, because man is imperfect. (Goldberg 130)

Far too often socialism and communism are compared to what is currently the political embodiment of the modern leftist ideology in the U.S. These leftist and communist ideas include anti-capitalism, total destruction of the individual in favor of the state, and big government takeover. We have all heard this stereotype.

However, I think there is a far more accurate political ideology floating in the minds of modern leftists, thirsty for revolution to take down "the man" and change the "bourgeois system." I am speaking of fascism.

"What!!" you say as you spit out your soy latte.

"Fascism is reserved only for evil white conservative men who spout evil fascist rhetoric like small government, individualism, self-reliance, capitalism, less dependency on government, traditionalism, and self-responsibility with strong ties to self-sustaining autonomous Christian family units!!!"

Slow down, Che, put down the vegan burger and let me explain…

Anti-American Nazi propaganda poster

After peeling back some layers and layers of Orwellian leftist language and indoctrination that fascism is of the evil American Right, closer examination reveals startling comparisons to the modern American leftist.

Fascism could not be any further from the American conservative (Classical Liberalism at it's heart). Very few realize that fascism by its very nature was an extremely leftist populist movement taking root in Mussolini's Italy and spreading like wild fire throughout Europe.

History of fascism

Fascism was born out of socialism (the prized ideology among the left) and was an evolved state-centric version of socialism which became popular around the early to mid 1900s. It was "new" and full of revolutionary change. Benito Amilcare Andrea Mussolini (a name consisting almost entirely of Socialist revolutionaries) was raised a charismatic Italian Socialist (his Socialist father being a huge influence on him) (Goldberg 31).

After Mussolini incorporated socialism and nationalism within Italy, fascism spread quickly (without much pretense to race that would come later with German Nazism). Fascism would eventually compete with International Socialism for the young revolutionary, the working man, the poor, and the masses in places such as Germany, France, and Italy.

State conformity reigns supreme under fascism

To many individuals, fascism state-centric ideology seemed far more of a “working system” rather than that delusional idea of “uniting the workers of the world”, which was the motto of the International Socialist. With fascism, as with all large bloated governments that leftists think can cure all our qualms, the utopian lie is propagated by the state which supposedly aims to build a communal National Socialism state-sponsored family.

Fascism was to transcend class differences exactly like socialism preached. Below are first-hand accounts according to working class Germans and their views on Hitler’s Nationalist Socialist ideas:

> …Though I was interested in the betterment of the workingman’s plight, I rejected Marxism unconditionally. I often asked myself why socialism had to be tied up with internationalism- why it could not work as well or better in conjunction with nationalism’. Another German states ‘I shuddered at the thought of Germany in the grip of Bolshevism. The slogan ‘Workers of the World Unite!’ made no sense to me. At the same time, however, National Socialism with its promise of community…barring all class struggle, attracted me profoundly’. Another German stated they embraced Nazism because of the ‘uncompromising will to stamp out the class struggle, snobberies of caste and party hatreds. The movement bore the true message of socialism to the German workingman. (Goldberg 74)

Below are key points from Mussolini and the Fasci di Combattimento (a Fascist organization created by Mussolini) circa 1919 (Goldberg 46):

- The abolition of the senate and the creation of a national technical council on intellectual and manual labor, industry, commerce and culture
- The creation of various government bodies run by worker’s representatives
- The obligation of the state to build “rigidly secular” schools for the raising of “the proletariat’s moral and cultural condition”

All of this seems like the modern American leftist’s wet dream. Modern American leftist rhetoric is far closer to fascism than the American right’s strong stress on individualism, capitalism, and reduced government intervention.

Fig. 5.2. "Hail Göring!" The lab animals of Germany salluting Hermann Göring for his order barring vivisection. The Reichsmarschall in August of 1933 announced an end to the "unbearable torture and suffering in animal experiments" and threatened to commit to concentration camps "those who still think they can treat animals as inanimate property." Source: Kladderadatsch, September 3, 1933, with thanks to Phil Jenkins.

Nazis were huge proponents of animal welfare and a vegetarian lifestyle, did someone say PETA?

Fascism stressed huge state governments. This huge fascist government included expanding health services, enforcing anti-elitism, wealth-confiscation, and secularism (Goldberg 46) all in the name of the state and the common good. Fascism offered "anti-bourgeois, anti-capitalistic, and anti-individualist nationalism" (Sternhell 214-220).

The state was always before the individual under fascism; taking from some and redistributing to the many. This is the core of modern American leftist ideology. Many parallels of fascism are closely similar to Obamacare (expanding health services), higher taxes among the elite and wealthy (wealth confiscation), and the most recent; the fascist power grab, by the FCC "Net Neutrality" rules (anti-capitalist).

To illustrate this comparison further, let's look at just a few of the Nazi Party's key points (Goldberg 411):

- We demand the nationalization of all (previous) associated industries (trusts).
- We demand a division of profits of all heavy industries.
- The first obligation of every citizen must be to work both spiritually and physically. The activity of individuals is not to counteract the interests of the universality, but must have its result within the framework of the whole for the benefit of all.

I can't tell the difference when the Nazi points end and the American leftist points begin. Not to mention, affirmative action (prized among the left) is just race privilege enforced by government intervention. Affirmative action is similar to the notorious government enforced Aryan privilege in Nazi Germany regardless of skill.

Historic dangers of the left

In all leftist extremes, be it communism, Nazism, socialism, or Fascism; murder, violence, and censorship are sure to be the eventual outcome of huge government. It is a historic pattern and if history is cyclical, which I believe it is, we are at the beginning of what will be the eventual violence found among extreme Leftist purity tactics dating back to the French Revolution (Jacboins), up through Soviet Russia (Bolsheviks), Ukraine, and Communist China.

Nothing has been more devastating and dangerous politically in the 20th century than leftist thought. If we look at 20th century communism alone we come to a whopping 85-100 million worldwide that perished under such leftist regimes, not to mention the censorship, labor camps, violation of civil liberties, and imprisonment.

One should think of fascism not as the complete opposite of socialism and communism, but yet another kindred spirit in extreme leftist political ideologies that were competing for the hearts and minds of the populous. Not much has changed with fascist ideology of collectivism (another prized belief of the left) were individual twigs bundle together to make a strong piece of collective wood.

Allow this article to be a possible warning sign of modern day ideology, as their quest will devolve into a loss of civility and violence as we move farther and farther left. As the left ideologies become more and more resembling a preacher preaching piety from the pulpit, “action” will be the next conclusive step. Peel back the leftist Orwellian language with nice sounding words like “Obamacare” and “Net Neutrality” to expose it for what it really is; fascist policies and huge government takeover in a pretty wrapper.

The beginning of the end

Whatever the case, one should keep in mind that socialism, communism, fascism, and Nazism all are of the left; they were just different factions of the left. What is occurring in the U.S. today is not that different from what occurred in Europe some years ago. Though it may be much slower and softer, “American” Fascism echoes European Fascism and is rooted in this very ideology.

Keep this in mind when you are sitting in your cube at the Ministry of Truth, hunched over your keyboard, editing and bowdlerizing Wikipedia pages for “the party”; just remember this article and the quintessential fascist party ideology:

> ...(the) quest to create an all-caring, all-powerful, all-encompassing state, a state that assumes responsibility for every desirable outcome and takes the blame for every setback on the road to utopia, a state that finally replaces God (Goldberg 20)

“But it was all right, everything was all right, the struggle was finished. He had won the victory over himself. He loved Big Brother.”

Do not become the protagonist of 1984. Let’s keep fiction for the books and reality for us here in America. The philosophical and political fate of the country depends on it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

The Under-Appreciated Benefits Of Solitude

March 28, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> Down to Gehenna or up to the Throne, He travels the fastest who travels alone.
> — Rudyard Kipling

Our society (or the matrix of modern feminist societies) often puts enough social pressure on men to seek "relationships" or "alliances"—more so if these men are high-value to begin with. We are often told to lose ourselves in the arms of women and others, trying to seek an elusive "support"; whereas the reality remains that real strength often lies within ourselves.

Unless a man learns to trust his own body and mind and pursues self reliance—whether it may be psychological, physical and financial—his slavery remains indefinite to the society which seeks to enslave him.

Indeed, man is a social being. But realistically speaking, does the "social" expectation of seeking relationships make sense in the long run? In the end, the truth always reveals itself :the real test for a man is how he lives with himself, alone.

This is test which every man must face at some point of his life, even if he might presently be in a relationship.

Some of the men I've met who've been married or in relationships have admitted that the loneliest years of their lives were those when they were committed to those relationships. Some of them had in fact committed to these relationships because they had to fit in society – excluding the common reason of sexual thirst.

The failure to stand alone to decide for themselves has led to many men becoming victims of the herd mentality in modern feminist societies, especially when it comes to relationships with modern (substandard) women. But the end result was not up to their expectations. What good was "companionship" when it did nothing to drive away loneliness in their lives, to begin with?

The power of solitude

One common thing in the modern world is seeing people socially indoctrinated to strangle their own individuality into becoming "people pleasers" (mainly because of their inability to say "No") which creates a self-created vicious downward spiral of servitude to others. This could also be due to self-loathing as well as an unregulated need of acceptance by others (social validation, or at worst, simply attention whoring), as commonly seen among modern women.

But with the feminization of modern men in modern feminist societies, it is common to see modern men often behaving likewise too. Sometimes the fear of loneliness can also stem from a convoluted belief that "herd membership" is powerful than being alone, which Harry Browne in his best seller How I found Freedom In An Unfree World explains as The Group Trap:

> The Group Trap is the belief that you can accomplish more by sharing responsibilities, efforts, and rewards with others than you can by acting on your own. It's an easy trap to fall into. It's a common expression that "in union there is strength." Just the opposite is true, however. You achieve more for yourself when your rewards are dependent upon your own efforts rather than upon the efforts > of other people.

> When you join a group effort to achieve freedom, you usually waste precious resources on an endeavor that has very little chance of success. In the same way, group efforts are common in businesses, marriages, and even friendships, and there too the Group Trap can cause subtle problems.

Innocuous as it may seem, the Group Trap continues to garner victims every day in today's bluepill modern societies. The only way out is non-compliance to this trap, and solitude offers an option out.

We all have a threshold limit for everything—and that too includes human contact. A lot of men even experience it in their interactions with women.

> Eady: You travel a lot?
> Neil McCauley: Yeah.
> Eady: Traveling makes you lonely?
> Neil McCauley: I'm alone, I am not lonely.
> – Heat (1995)

Solitude and loneliness are separate, with a thin dividing line between them. You can be single, yet not lonely. And it's commonly see in self-actualized individuals who understand what solitude actually is, and what benefits it holds for self-discovery.

Withdraw within to discover the giant

The concept of solitude has fascinated humanity from antiquity – mainly because of the potential and opportunity it offers to tap within the hidden, infinite and mysterious source of power which resides in the depths of our souls.

In fact, solitude is one of the defining traits of many successful people – whether they might be great thinkers, scientists, and leaders—because they are able to distinguish themselves from the herd of common people.

In fact solitude is one of the core characteristics of the self actualized individual, as mentioned of Abraham Maslow's Self Actualizer:

> Self-actualizing individuals "positively like solitude and privacy to a definitely greater degree than the average person.

In today's world, most men don't know how to utilize solitude, because they've never truly discovered who they are. The thought of self-actualization and self-discovery is itself a scary thought for many, but what is forgotten is that the master often begins his quest for self-mastery through solitude.

Conclusion

Solitude is a wonderful example of self-commitment—a commitment we can renew periodically or regularly. In today's world which programs men to bind themselves to unhealthy attachments, the empowerment that regulated solitude offers is often grossly underrated, or worse, sometimes even shamed.

As often, it is necessary to become qualified in our lives, but it is also important that others too qualify themselves to be a part of ours. In the end, the greatest companion we retain throughout our lives is the self, for it never leaves us during all of our days.

Why Able Men Should Cheer Every Job Eliminated By Technology

March 28, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

It is common to hear in the media or in casual conversation stories about jobs being eliminated or destroyed by technology. This process is almost always seen in a negative light, as a destructive or tragic thing to happen to the country and its people.

Instead the sensible response is to cheer every such announcement. Every time this happens, it is a sign of growing prosperity and economic advancement. To understand why we need to start by considering the source of our prosperity.

Luddites wearing ties

How do we achieve higher living standards?

Same cars, less workers, higher living standards

Basic economic reality is very simple. Our living standards are determined by how much we produce. At the individual level government can interfere with this process to some degree using taxes, welfare, spending, and borrowing. The taxation part is sad for the man who was robbed of his own product. Meanwhile the spending allows someone to have a living standard higher than her production indicates.

At the national level government action doesn't change the reality that the total consumption of the people in a country cannot be different from the total output of the people of the country. All government can do is shift the output around a bit.

Money is just a medium to ease the process of exchanging our production with others. It is fantastically beneficial because it makes the trading so much easier, but one downside is that it makes the simplicity of this law obscure.

People produce things. They trade their product with others to acquire what they want for themselves, in the quantity their output allows. The more people produce, the more they can consume. This is true for individuals and it is true for countries.

What does it mean when jobs are eliminated by technology?

One day soon human drivers will seem as silly as human rock breakers

When an employer lays off workers because of technological change, it merely means that they were no longer needed to meet whatever need that production met. If an enterprise reduces output or closes because of technological change, it is because somewhere else the needs those products satisfied are being met in a cheaper or better manner.

Either way, it is because somewhere, someone is producing more output with fewer people. That is a good thing for living standards and we should all celebrate. The consequence is that some or all of the workers are no longer adding enough to production to make it profitable to employ them. So the enterprise decides to end the employment relationship for those workers.

Why don’t workers just agree to work for less?

Low tech, low production, low wages, but who would choose that?

The most obvious alternative to job losses would be for workers to simply agree to work for less pay or lesser conditions. Once the pay was less than the amount those people added to output, the enterprise would happily agree to continue the employment relationship. In situations where workers are getting more than their labor is worth this sometimes happens, mostly though workers will not agree to reduced wages.

The reason for this is very simple. Those workers refuse because they know their alternative use of time to be more valuable than the new rate of pay they could command. That’s right, people who are capable of producing don’t need to worry much about losing employment because they can simply find another place or way to produce.

Who does need to fear the elimination of jobs by technology?

Those who produce the least protest the most

Bargaining for wages is not a completely perfect process even in a free market. Some always manage to get a little more than they produce and some have to settle for a little less. In real life there are other, mostly government, processes which seek to take from a person who did produce and give it to someone who did not. Affirmative action, employment quotas, unionism, most government jobs, corruption, nepotism. These are all examples of situations where someone is seeking to enjoy someone else's product.

The workers who are simply getting what is their due will just wander off and find somewhere else to produce, someone else will be happy to employ them. People who are managing to drain away more than they produce are the ones who are hurt when their cozy deal is ruined by job losses.

Those people know that they will struggle to find another such situation. They are the ones who squeal like pigs at job losses. Learn to enjoy that sound. It is the undeserving lamenting that they can't live at your expense.

What should a man do about the situation?

Innovation, technology, and change are often seen as destructive and unwelcome disruptions of an otherwise comfortable stability. Don't believe it, they are what drives a man and his society forwards. The man who has the able body, the skills and the knowledge to participate fully in this process has little to fear and everything to gain.

Men should waste no time worrying and just make sure to have the able body, the skills, and knowledge seize new opportunities.

Why Money And Sex Will Never Make You Happy

March 29, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

What motivates you?

Why do you go to work every day? Why do you go to school? Why do you go to the gym? Why do you go out at night?

For most guys the answer to all of these questions boils down to money, sex, or a combination of the two.

If we're being honest, we all work for money and the freedom and security that it brings us. We all go to the gym and the bar in order to get laid.

And while there's nothing inherently wrong with wanting more money and more sex, there is something wrong with getting hyper-focused on these outcomes. And this is a trap that all too many of us fall into, at one time or another in our lives.

It's easy to catch ourselves thinking, "I'll be so happy if I get that raise," or "I'll be so happy if I can have sex with that girl tonight." THIS line of thinking is a problem. An extra $10,000 per year or one night of amazing sex won't make any noticeable change to your happiness levels. If you're not already happy, then good luck finding happiness in money and sex.

Money is only as good as what it brings you

Everyone knows that “money doesn’t buy happiness”

Why do you want money? If your reason is to buy a house, a certain car, a new computer, or some cool clothes then, quite honestly, you’re fucked.

Think about it—why do you want these things? When you really get down to it, what’s the reason you want a big house? Maybe it’s because that’s what you think it takes to be “successful.”.

Why do you really want an expensive car? Is it because you really like the features of the car, and how it feels to drive it? Or is it because you think it will give you the status you need to pull more tail? Be honest with yourself.

I can’t tell you what’s “right”—I can’t tell you what a “good” reason to want money is. Personally I’m building a business because I need money to pay rent, eat, go to the gym, enjoy things like going to see a movie, travel a bit, and yes—to buy some new cool shit like clothes and electronics every once in a while.

I can tell you that studies have shown that people who spend money on experiences instead of “things” tend to be happier afterwards. And I can also tell you that from my experience the freedom I get from knowing I make enough to pay rent, buy my necessities, and still have enough left to travel and buy a few cool things here and there is worth more to me than any car or house ever will be.

Sex is the definition of a fleeting pleasure

Good sex is definitely pretty awesome… but it’s only temporary

Can you remember the best sex you’ve ever had?

I can certainly remember a few amazing sessions. And while they were pretty fucking amazing times, they definitely were not worth all of the stress, pressure, and bullshit I put myself through back in my days of being obsessed with “game” and “pickup.”.

You see, if you’re someone who’s convinced himself that you’ll be that much happier if you have a harem of hot women you can hit up for sex as you please, then you’ve got it all backwards. First of all, you’re putting yourself in a place of lacking where you’re not enough by yourself – and that alone will make achieving your goal that much harder.

And second – even if you do succeed in banging loads of hot women – you’ll quickly realize that sex, even with hot women, is not some magic elixir that will cure your problems and insecurities. It lasts for a bit – and then it’s over. The same as any good movie, comedy show, date, or conversation – it’s here and then it’s gone.

So what will bring you happiness?

Happiness is actually quite easy to achieve

As you can see I truly believe pursuing money and sex for their own sake is not a battle worth fighting. So what is a battle worth fighting? What pursuits will bring you happiness?

Well, honestly, this is different for every man. We all have distinct values. But, in general, doing things that are in line with these values is a good place to start.

If you value your personal freedom, then working towards building a business that will support you in living a life that you control would be a solid option. If you value physical activity, then working out, getting fit, and pursuing hobbies like playing sports or martial arts are probably good ways to spend your time.

And, above all, becoming supremely comfortable in your own skin and learning to love yourself is crucial to developing a happiness that will last. And I find the quickest way to do this is through meditation and being able to sit there, alone, and in silence without needing to be distracted by external sources like other people, your smartphone, or music.

So should I forget sex and money completely?

No one thing is going to make you happy… or three things, even

Now the pursuit of sex and money shouldn't be written off completely. In fact the actual pursuit of any goal is where the real value lies.

You see, when you push yourself to get more money, date hotter women, or accomplish anything else, you have to work your ass off, learn new things, persist past countless failures, and all-around test your grit, time and time again. And it's through these various hardships where the real growth will occur.

You will really get to know yourself, your strengths, and your weaknesses as you go… well, if you keep pushing, at least.

And once you've arrived at your destination… As you're admiring your hefty bank account… Or as you're lying in bed with a beautiful women by your side… This is when you will smile, not only because you made it, but because you'll look back at all the bullshit that you endured to get there.

You'll realize that the best part of it all was the struggle. And as you move forward in new pursuits you'll learn to love the process. The outcome comes and goes… but the process sticks with you forever.

But remember: it's best to ground yourself and fill your days with activities that make you happy – and meditation – in order to stay sane and happy as you go.

Need Motivation? Learn To Meditate

March 29, 2015 | by Rórdán Phobos | Link | Original Link

So you squat 355 for sets of five, have flags in over a dozen countries and have your alpha vibe down pat. Yet, something is missing. You missed closing your last couple of business deals, or the rejection letters for your writing keep piling up with ego-crushing "it's almost there" notes.

Learn to meditate.

Meditation is not some New Age hippy trip where everyone sits around doing drugs and complaining about the man. My significant teachers included two ex-Marines, a street fighting Jewish tough guy from a bad neighborhood in Chicago, and a female Taoist adept who burned through four husbands because "they couldn't keep up."

What is meditation? It is a part of yogic practice whose purpose is one of two things: theurgy or thaumaturgy.

Theurgy is unification with the divine. This involves mind shattering things like experiencing states of being beyond space and time. The process of getting there will give you an iron like will and then some.

Thaumaturgy is often referred to as miracle working, or in a more modern parlance the art of getting shit done. Learning to shatter bricks with your hands, staying up for three days straight without getting tired, and generating enough body heat to melt snow while everyone around you is going hypothermic are all doable.

Granted, the expanded bubble of awareness generated by the process of getting there can save your life and is largely responsible for my having survived four wars without being shot or blown up.

Of course, the initiation rituals from the more traditional systems can be less than fun. Running for nine miles through a lightning storm in the open desert, or having one of my martial arts teachers teach me the golden bell techniques by locking me in a room and beating me senseless are things I will remember forever.

Okay, so what do real systems of meditation look like?

Kundalini awakening—this is the connection of the latent energy of the genitals to the brain, the safer systems do this in a kind of loop. This greatly enhances the durability of the physical body and endocrine system response.

Most forms of traditional martial arts use this as their power source. Training in this method allowed me to survive a 30 foot drop from a parachute canopy collapse on final. I can recommend the Kundalini Awakening Process system run by Santiago Dobles and Tao Semko.

Heart centric awakening—this uses the point in the center of the chest between the nipples and is the foundation of esoteric Mahayana Buddhism, Christianity, some schools of Hermetic practice, Judaism, and some Sufi schools. If you want to discover what universal love really feels like, this is the route to go. Linhai at Sacredjourneys.org has the most developed system for this in the United States.

Void awakening—this focuses on the throat and is the most uncommon of the four. Void based systems are primarily seen in some Taoist schools and as a subset of Vajrayana Buddhist practice.

These originated from a series of cave meditations and get very trippy very fast. I once ran into a monk who had been driven insane by this and was chained to the front door step of a temple in western China by his abbot as a warning to others. I can't recommend a teacher at this time, but if you look hard enough you will find someone.

Out of body projection—schools too numerous to name, although it is the center piece of Theravada Buddhism, Transcendental Meditation and most of the more academic systems.

Famous practitioners of Transcendental Meditation include Clint Eastwood, Joe Namath, and Howard Stern. Transcendental Meditation reinforces the will through a process too involved to discuss here, but is good for people who are time constrained.

All of these systems take time, effort, and money to learn. Once you've added one of these to your skill set, learning anything else will be much easier in comparison. And the discipline you pick up along the way will take you anywhere you want go.

How We Arrived At The State Of Total Globalization

March 29, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

We live in a time like no other in history. A time of both great opportunity and great peril.

Today, a man can board an airplane for less than a month's salary and arrive on the other side of the planet within 24 hours. He can use a device which gives him information and access the sum total of human knowledge and wisdom. He can connect with people from around the world from diverse backgrounds, of different opinions and values, whom he can talk with, do business with, and even in some cases find a woman to marry and build a family with.

We are seeing the biggest change in human history, with people from all nations and ethnicities mixing together, living together, doing business together, and building lives together.

This is globalization, the era where the entire world becomes one. There are pros and cons to this like anything else in life, but rather than judge it or fight it I set out to understand it and come to terms with how it came to be this way.

This is what I found.

The beginning of globalization and world trade

Way way back in time, long before America was a twinkle in the founding fathers' eyes, the ancient kings and rich merchants of Europe ruled the world.

Naturally, being greedy parasitic despots, ruling their own nations and wielding untold power over their populations was not enough and so they set off to find new lands to exploit and pillage.

Now to begin with they did not set up colonies, but rather they funded massive merchant trading companies with ships (like the East India Company in England and the VOC in Holland) to sail around the world to lands unknown and trade commodities with whichever populations they found there.

Different nations had varying degrees of success. The Dutch held a monopoly on the spice islands and trade in Japan, the Portuguese defended their trading posts in India with vicious fervor, and the British struggled to get a foothold anywhere to start, but would eventually come to rule the world and control 50% of global trade.

Naturally, exploring lands afar led to huge commercial opportunities with merchants finding peppers, spices, and garments selling for up to 800 times what they had purchased them for. A feeding frenzy began, and very soon ships were sailing East and West, far and wide, trying to cash in on the biggest greed fest the world had ever seen (2000-2007 and derivatives trading hadn't happened yet).

Also naturally, this led to fierce competition. As with the cocaine trade today, anything offering these kinds of returns attracted the most ruthless, base bastards walking the face of this earth. These people were prepared to do murder, kidnapping, and extortion to get what they wanted. This in turn led to the need for merchant ships to seek military support, which led to kings and governments establishing actual colonies where before they had only trading posts.

This led to a whole host of interesting and often tragic developments in world history, such as the colonies that would later become the good ole' USA, the formation of India as a political entity, and the rape, destruction, and pillage of both Africa and South America as continents.

Once the era of globalization had begun, there was no stopping it. Human migration began, goods and services were traded far and wide, and nobody wanted to go backwards. So nobody did.

The world we live in today

China vs U.S.

Ever since this occurred in the 17th century, things have expanded and remained largely on the same course. Globalization was briefly set back by the formation of the Soviet Union and the Iron Curtain in the East, which stopped trade between East and West for a few decades, but it really is a blip on the radar in the grand scheme of things.

Today, global trade is easier than ever thanks to technology. You, sitting in your studio apartment in Manhattan or your farmhouse in Iowa, can go on the internet and buy Turkish government bonds, Iraqi oil futures contracts, or shares in silver mining companies in Africa at the click of a button.

All of this has led to huge, massive, disruptive change.

Governments for the first time in history are at the mercy of investors who have the power to punish and destroy them by withdrawing vast amounts of capital through the digital wire if they see any deviation from the principles that investors love.

Populations are exposed to new ideas and can connect via internet forums and chatrooms, leading to political revolutions in the Middle East and North Africa which simply could not have happened twenty years ago.

Trade is also changing. While globalization brings huge opportunities to buy and sell globally, it also decimates and destroys local markets and squeezes out those who do not have the means do battle with the huge corporations who can undercut them, buy in massive quantity and sell at lower prices.

Thus we see the chaos in the world today. China is rising and the USA is losing power and influence in much of the world, BRICS and the Asian Development Bank are posing a threat to Western financial interests, and there is a general feeling worldwide that the old order is dying and the new is rising.

Just like the Portuguese did when the British and Dutch came to the East, the U.S. is fighting tooth and nail in the Middle East and beyond to retain control of the lucrative oil markets.

Just like the first English settlers were disgusted when they met the tribesmen of Papua and the Congo with their vastly different customs and manners, so too do our vastly different cultures meet for the first time and inevitably clash.

Conclusion

We live in an era of great opportunity and great peril. It is different in many ways from the days of the East India Company and the VOC, but it is also the same.

It is a world were men of bravery, honour, and guts can make vast fortunes and adventure far and wide if they have the nerves. But it is also a world of pirates, barbarians, and uncivilized brutes who threaten the very fabric of Western civilization itself.

How will all of this end? I don’t pretend to know. I am simply a single drop of water riding a vast wave in an ocean of human history much bigger than I can fathom. I just plan to make the best of it.

The world today is what it is and there is very little any one man can do to change it. My philosophy is simple – saddle up and ride towards opportunity in this brave new world we live in. I myself have taken advantage of the world I find myself in by no choice of my own, travelling and relocating to Asia and taking advantage of global opportunities where I can.

It won't change whether you like it or not, so you might as well take advantage of all the benefits it has to offer – travel, trade, the chance to meet exotic women, and learning about the vast world we live in.

That's my take anyway. I'd like to hear yours.

Did Ellen Pao File A Baseless Lawsuit To Hide Her Own Poor Job Performance?

March 30, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Powerful Silicon Valley venture capitalist firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers—famous for backing Google and Amazon—won a gender discrimination lawsuit Friday filed against them by former junior partner Ellen Pao, who is currently interim CEO of Reddit.

Pao claims that she was passed over for promotions based on her sex and was fired for complaining about the discrimination in 2012. The suit was filed that year and asked for $16 million in compensatory and punitive damages.

Supposedly there had been many sexist remarks made by the defendants during Pao's employment. She also claimed she had been retaliated against for complaining by not being invited to certain events and being poorly evaluated in a performance review.

Jurors And Judgments

The jurors themselves were divided over how to rule on this case, but came to the conclusion that she was fired for substandard performance. There were twelve jurors, and each of the four claims required a 9-3 decision.

Pao and the mainstream media are claiming that even though she lost the case, it is still a landmark since it is raising a conversation about women in STEM. And of course, by "raising a conversation," they always mean "giving a lecture."

The Huffington Post writes,

> Despite days of courtroom drama about affairs, books of erotic poetry and office flirting, juror Steve Sammut, who mostly voted for Kleiner, said the decision came down to Pao's effectiveness at her job.
> "We were focused on the performance," he said.

That seems to be the proper course of action. People should be promoted based on their performance, not their sex. Just because there were several inappropriate gestures made in the workplace—apparently by both Pao and her co-workers—does not mean she was discriminated against.

Women At Work

Former Kleiner partner John Denniston, partner John Doerr, and former partner Ellen Pao.

But even if she was fired for more than her substandard performance, the facts in the case suggest Pao was a troublemaker with little concern for professional ethics. If it were merely a matter of being denied a promotion, we could be more sympathetic to Pao as a person. But all the inappropriate behavior she allegedly engaged in—including an extramarital affair with partner Ajit Nazre—shows her to be more of a distraction than an addition.

Pao received a Valentine's Day gift of erotic poetry from a senior partner Randy Komisar, which supposedly made her uncomfortable, except that she continued to seek him out for relationship advice and remained on good terms with him. The book is by Leonard Cohen, a Buddhist, and was supposedly selected by Komisar's wife since Pao gave Komisar a statue of the Buddha for Christmas. Komisar himself is a Buddhist, as is the fashion in Southern California.

Komisar was also excluded from the dinner with Al Gore and the skiing trip Pao claims she was excluded from, merely for being a woman.

One point of conflict between Pao and Komisar was the legal startup RPX.

> Another flashpoint in the case is a board seat at legal startup RPX that Pao said she was denied because of her maternity leave. The seat was instead given to Komisar because he "needed a win" in senior partner John Doerr's words.
> But emails revealed during Pao's testimony last week showed that Pao was supportive of the move to give Komisar the seat. On Tuesday, Hermle displayed an email where Pao hesitated about being part of the board because Doerr had said that she might be busy with her maternity leave. Until that point, Komisar said, he never mentioned her pregnancy.

But Pao soon grew jealous of Komisar, telling him that the RPX board members "hated him" and that he should step down. Believing this was an act to take his position, Komisar asked Pao to cut off contact with the board.

> "I felt it was a betrayal of confidence to talk to my partners about how to remove me and politick behind my back," Komisar said. "I thought that was unforgivable."

Equality

The way real equality works is that women get treated the same way as men. Most workplaces have policies against sleeping with co-workers. Most workplaces will fire you for trying to sabotage a superior. Most workplaces do not give the most coveted vacations and dinners to junior partners.

Which of the two parties is in the wrong here? It appears to me that both of them are. Although I think that Pao deserved to be fired sooner than she was, my gut reaction is, to quote Shakespeare, "A plague on both your houses."

It appears that Kleiner Perkins may have been retaliating against her, although I also have little doubt that Pao is exaggerating the claims. Both appear to be amoral at best. A married man having a workplace tryst with a married woman. A senior partner giving an erotic book of poems and drawings to female coworker on Valentine's Day and then lying that he didn't realize it was erotic.

But it takes two to tango. Pao allegedy chose to have sex with Nazre on multiple occasions. Pao allegedly chose to betray Komisar after setting him up with the position with RPX.

Where was her husband Buddy Fletcher during all of this? On the east coast pursuing his own inflated career dreams. At the time of the lawsuit, Fletcher was filing his own against the famous Dakota apartment in New York for racial discrimination since they denied him an additional apartment after living there for 17 years.

I was weirdly unable to find a picture with the two of them together.

Pao and her husband didn't even live in the same timezones so they could pursue their inane desires. Is that even a marriage? It's American idealism at its worst. Birds of a feather flock together, as the saying is, and it appears both Fletcher and Pao are bloated on vanity.

Hypocrisy Of The Public Reaction

Of course, the mainstream media is enabling Pao to play the discrimination card to her own advantage. She claims that she's discriminated against for being a minority, and the young white liberals believe her regardless of the evidence.

If a man had been fired for substandard performance after sleeping with a coworker, he'd be crucified as an extortionist. But when a woman supposedly offers her pussy for advancement, suddenly it must be rape culture. And why wouldn't she invoke her female minority privilege if she knew it would get her off the hook with the masses? She's got a career to build, and the more innocent and victimized she looks, the more likely tech companies will be to white knight for her by giving her a job.

Still, that doesn't make Pao any less of a snake. She is likely slandering people for things they didn't do wrong. Perhaps cosmic karma will catch up to her, and tech companies will be scared to hire her because of the trail of destruction she left at Kleiner Perkins. As seems to be the pattern in her life, she is planning for the short-term and not the long-term.

Perhaps the feminists are correct that Silicon Valley has a culture of amorality, but they are wrong that the women are victims of that culture instead of integral proponents of it.

March 30, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Having declared war on gamers, comic book fans and metalheads, SJWs have now turned their guns on the world of indie rock. In the past couple of months, indie news site Pitchfork has been running increasingly venomous articles castigating indie rock and other alternative music scenes for being too white or male.

For example, last week Pitchfork ran an article titled "EDM Has a Problem with Women, and It's Getting Worse," which lambasted Skrillex as "fucking creepy" for Tweeting pictures of a scantily-clad woman, among other complaints.

Now, some of the magazine's targets are fighting back. Belle & Sebastian frontman Stuart Murdoch recently told Pitchfork to "fuck off" in response to an article by Indian Race Troll Sarah Sahim attacking his film God Help the Girl for its "unbearable whiteness":

> As a lover of Belle and Sebastian, I was disappointed, though certainly not surprised. Belle and Sebastian's work is steeped in Whiteness; God Help the Girl merely underscores this. The film itself is an egregious mess that romanticizes a woman's struggles with an eating disorder for the sake of Murdoch's self-promotion. The optimistic, happy-go-lucky and painstakingly adorable aesthetic evidenced in every character he created is founded in Whiteness. Whiteness is beauty; Whiteness is what gives the character the ability to dream of fostering a career in music; Whiteness is what enables the audience to empathize with Eve's character. A recurring filler in the film was a fictitious radio show where two men > try to decipher what "real" indie is and every band mentioned is white, enforcing the film's aspirational Whiteness. While Belle and Sebastian aren't the only examples of perpetuating Whiteness through indie rock, this movie serves as a microcosmic view of what is wrought by racial exclusivity that is omnipresent in indie rock.

In his response, Murdoch made the eminently reasonable point that a band from Glasgow would be white because of demographics alone. He also pointed out that contrary to Sahim's assertions of a racist conspiracy in indie rock, he's "just a guy in a band" with no special powers or influence. Sahim's own Twitter account is private, meaning the likelihood of a response from her is slim.

The irony of Pitchfork's jihad against white men is that the indie scene is already pretty amenable to social justice nonsense. As an indie kid myself, I know that the average hipster is a caviar communist who thinks testosterone poisoning is a thing and stresses out over pronoun usage. Following any indie musician on Twitter will guarantee a constant stream of Tumblrina bilge clogging up your feed, whether it's St. Vincent bloviating about "gender fluidity" or the National stumping for President Obama.

The transformation of Pitchfork into a left-wing, anti-male propaganda vehicle illustrates why it's imperative for men to defend their spaces against SJW subversion. Merely being neutral or apolitical is not enough, because cultural Marxists use neutrality as a weapon to infiltrate and take over institutions. It's precisely because most people are apolitical that cultural Marxism has seeped into every aspect of American life.

O'Sullivan's First Law And You

O'Sullivan's First Law, coined by British conservative writer John O'Sullivan, states that all organizations that are not explicitly right-wing will eventually become left-wing. This is because leftists rarely if ever publically identify as leftists, but work behind the scenes to sway moderates to their side. It's akin to the old proverb about boiling a frog: if you toss a frog in lukewarm water then slowly crank up the heat, the frog will get cooked before it realizes it should jump out.

O'Sullivan's First Law also exists in part because leftists are more intolerant of dissenting views than conservatives. Most conservative outlets have a wide diversity of opinion: for example, Christina Hoff Sommers, well-known for debunking feminist myths and supporting GamerGate, is a registered Democrat who works for the conservative American Enterprise Institute.

In contrast, leftists will gladly defenestrate anyone they deem to be insufficiently leftist, such as how Paula Deen was publically ruined for having used the n-word once, despite being a registered Democrat and Obama supporter.

O'Sullivan's law explains why the ostensibly unbiased mainstream media functions as a mouthpiece for the left. As an example, take the recent smear piece GQ did on A Voice for Men (in which Return of Kings was name-checked). Because GQ was not established as an explicitly conservative magazine, it is now dominated by feminists such as Lindy West and Jeff Sharlet, the Marxist professor who authored the piece. The mere act of declaring an organization right-wing deters Marxist entryism in and of itself.

Also, as Pitchfork's anti-male, anti-white campaign shows, SJWs always focus their attacks on moderates or people who are not as left-wing as they are. For example, when I was interviewed by Australian radio host Jonathan Safran for his program Sunday Night Safran last year, co-host Ronny Chiang mentioned how he was constantly berated by SJWs for incorrect pronoun usage in his stand-up shows. Meanwhile, those same agitators ignore conservative figures such as Ann Coulter.

As Murray Rothbard wrote in his 1970 essay "The Great Women's Liberation Issue: Setting it Straight," the left has been playing this game for decades:

> In the meanwhile, the male "oppressors" are acting, in the manner of Liberals everywhere, like scared, or guilt-ridden, rabbits. When the one hundred viragos of Women's Lib bullied their way into the head offices of the Ladies' Home Journal, did the harried editor-in-chief, John Mack Carter, throw these aggressors out on their collective ear, as he should have done? Did he, at the very least, abandon his office for the day and go home? No, instead he sat patiently for eleven hours while these harridans heaped abuse upon him and his magazine and his gender, and then meekly agreed to donate to them a special section of the Journal, along with $10,000 ransom. In this way, spineless male Liberalism meekly feeds the appetite of the aggressors and paves the way for the next set of outrageous "demands." Rat magazine, an underground tabloid, caved in even more spectacularly, and simply allowed itself to be taken over permanently by a "women's liberation collective."

When you make statements such as "there's no difference between the left and the right," you're opening yourself up to Marxist subversion. MRAs and MGTOWs who whine about "TradCons" are missing the point entirely. While many sectors of the right may be critical of the manosphere and the "red pill," they don't attack them in the vitriolic, defamatory fashion that the left does. Indeed, right-wing outlets such as Breitbart are starting to warm up to the manosphere.

The greatest trick the Devil ever pulled was convincing the world he didn't exist, and leftists prey on the willful ignorance of the apolitical in order to advance their agenda. By failing to recognize them as your enemy, you are making yourself vulnerable to their predations.

This Machine Kills Marxists

The only truly effective way to protect an organization, institution or culture from SJW entryism is to declare it to be right-wing. Only by recognizing that your enemy is the left—because they've defined you as their enemy—can you maintain the integrity of your culture.

For example, GamerGate's failure to define its enemy—cultural Marxism—will ultimately hurt it in the long run. While GamerGate supporters assert that it's just a "consumer revolt," the reality is that it is a de facto right-wing reaction to left-wing infiltration of the video game industry.

While many GamerGate supporters are themselves liberal, they're not as left-wing as the Anita Sarkeesians and Zoe Quinns of the world, which makes them right-wing in the SJWs' eyes.

Many of Return of Kings' detractors are upset by our traditionalist community beliefs, and our sister site Reaxxion (of which I am the editor) has gotten a lot of heat for only hiring men as writers. But it's these lines in the sand that ensure both ROK's and Reaxxion's integrity. By defining our sites as repositories of masculine, conservative thought, we deter SJW entryism and make it clear what we're about.

As the cliche goes, if you don't stand for something, you'll fall for anything. Cultural Marxism is a virus that is fueled by the apathy of those who don't fight against it. There may not be a winning move in this culture war, but not playing the game at all will guarantee that you lose.

The Radical Ideology Of Female ISIS Members

March 30, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Readers are no doubt generally aware of the activities of the Islamist extremist group ISIS (or ISIL, or IS). Since the advent of armed conflict in Syria and Iraq, it has grown in ambition and reach, and has been able to attract some disaffected volunteers from around the world. Studies indicate that of the estimated 3,000 fighters migrating to the region to volunteer, as many as 550 of these are women. These numbers are not large by military standards, but they do raise unsettling questions.

While much attention has been lavished on male ISIS fighters, very little attention has been paid to the female fighters. Why this is so, readers may themselves speculate. The mainstream media devotes almost no time or space to discussing the origins, ideology, and recruitment strategies of ISIS; we are instead treated to an endless litany of disconnected attacks, counterattacks, and atrocities.

The mainstream media does nothing to explain the historical and social underpinnings of these events. Understanding the enemy and his thinking is the first step in self-defense. I have to confess, though, that writing this article tested my powers of objectivity. I despise this group and everything its stands for. Yet I believe it is important to convey information to our readers that assists in understanding current international events.

The most comprehensive study to date of female ISIS terrorists (Hoyle, C. et. al., Becoming Mulan?: Female Western Migrants to ISIS, published by the Institute for Strategic Dialogue), indicates that "there is a large online ecosystem of female ISIS supporters" that works strenuously for the group. While most of these women emphasize their domestic role, they fulfill a needed function as recruiters and "cheerleaders" for ISIS in various online capacities. The authors of the study cited above further elaborate:

> Perhaps the most important risk is that the female migrants can inspire others, both men and women, to carry out attacks in Western countries or to travel to Syria and Iraq. The women within our sample actively encourage others to leave their homes and families and travel to ISIS-held territory, often chastising those who use family or other obligations as an excuse not to travel. In addition to encouragement they provide practical advice to those wishing to travel and, as such, are key to ensuring that ever more women travel to join ISIS. This can include advice on how to overcome the objections and roadblocks raised by family, what clothes to bring, where to attempt a crossing and what to expect on arrival. Although the more general pieces of advice are often contained in blog posts or on public responses on sites such as ask.fm, many of the muhajirat [female fighters] encourage those thinking of travelling to get in touch with them directly through closed messaging apps and direct message.

The threat posed by female radicals, according to the authors, is thus three-fold: (1) giving support and encouragement to their fighting husbands, and (2) acting as potential "sleeper agents" in the West, and (3) recruiting other women to their radical ideology.

Perhaps the most fascinating document to emerge recently on this topic was the "manifesto" published in Arabic by the female ISIS group "Al-Khanssaa Brigade." This document, which has recently been translated into English by Charlie Winter for the Quilliam Foundation, paints a very vivid picture of the ideology and goals of ISIS's female members. (Unfortunately, the publisher does not provide the original Arabic text, so I have to rely on the fidelity of Mr. Winter's translation).

We should emphasize here that this manifesto was written by women, for women. It provides visible proof that extremism, narrow-mindedness, and bigotry can be found in abundance in both genders. Let us examine some of the main points of this strange document. Despite its obligatory clichéd phrases and distracting religious cant, there is a coherent philosophy here that deserves our close scrutiny.

1. The manifesto is directed primarily at Arab women. It is not an "official" ISIS state document, but was put out by female members of ISIS for the benefit of other females in the region. The name “Al-Khanssaa Brigades” takes its name from a woman fighter in early Islamic history. The manual was circulated only in Arabic, a fact which indicates its intended audience. One of its stated purposes is to expose the alleged hypocrisy of Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States in protecting the rights of women.

2. Each gender has a role to fill. Men have their role, and women their role. “Pursuing these desired goals, above all else, is enlightened, cultured and developed. We say regarding each gender’s role, that to have a job is a task reserved only for men–he has been given the body and brain and he must tend to his women, wives, daughters and sisters according to his circumstances.”

3. There is a difference between studying and earning a living. The primary function of women should be the domestic function. However, this does not equate to ignorance and illiteracy:

> Yes, we say “stay in your houses”, but this does not mean, in any way, that we support illiteracy, backwardness or ignorance. Rather, we just support the distinction between working – that which involves a woman leaving the house – and studying, as it was ordained she should do.

4. Equality with men is a sham:

> Women gain nothing from the idea of their equality with men apart from thorns. Under “equality” they have to work and rest on the same days as men even though they have “monthly complications” and pregnancies and so on, in spite of the nature of her life and responsibilities to their husband, sons and religion. If a woman is forced to work outside the house, we must reward her for this service and look after her household and children in her long absence.

5. The manifesto is quite explicit on what conditions a woman should seek work outside the household, and what limits should be put on it:

> 1) The work must be appropriate for her and her abilities and not involve more than what she is able to endure, or what is difficult for her to achieve.
> 2) It should not exceed more than three days a week or should not last long in the day so she does not have to leave her house for a long time.
> 3) It must take into account necessities – for the illness of a child, travel of her husband. She must have holidays.

> 4) She must be given two years maternity leave, at least, to rear and feed the child, and only resume if the child has started to be able to rely on himself for the most important things.
> 5) There must be a place to put the children at work until they reach school age, where they can be checked upon from time to time to stop the problems that arise from small children being by themselves in the house or someone to care for them.

All in all, the document provides a rarely-seen glimpse into the mind of the female religious extremist. In tone and content, it seeks to motivate women of the region by its invocation of the possibility of a better life under fundamentalist principles. Its denunciation of current Saudi gender integrationist practices, and against the Shia politicians of Iraq, make it likely that the female authors are of Iraqi and Saudi descent.

Western feminist media outlets have mostly failed to address or respond to the challenge posed by female ISIS members. What, precisely, does ISIS believe in? How is it that this sort of a group can attract women? Its militant agenda, its subversive ideology, and its extreme violence should have prompted closer examination. Media coverage has been superficial at best, negligent at worst.

How You Can Fly Anywhere In The USA For Less Than $50

March 30, 2015 | by Bryce Conway | Link | Original Link

Traveling is arguably the most effective way on the planet to develop as a person, learn about yourself, and discover what it means to be human. This idea has been written about dozens of times throughout the manosphere for one simple reason. It's an undeniable truth.

Traveling offers the modern-man a chance to get out of his comfort zone, eliminate the distractions of day-to-day life, and learn how to be self-reliant. However, there is one major catch. Traveling is really fucking expensive.

Which means that the vast majority of men have to prioritize travel with other financial goals such as saving for retirement, starting a business, or putting money aside to purchase a home.

Enter travel hacking

Travel hacking is the process of earning tons of frequent flyer miles through things like credit card sign-ups and other promotions and using those miles to book tons of really cheap travel.

Think of it like extreme couponing, only its 10x more lucrative (literally), requires a fraction of the time, and it doesn't have the social stigma associated with clipping coupons and storing a bunch of junk in your basement.

The concept of travel hacking is hard to grasp at first but it really is quite simple. In fact, the basic travel hacking process can be broken down in to 5 simple steps.

1. Apply for a rewards credit card that gives you some sort of sign-up bonus (2 free flights, 50,000 points, free hotel nights, etc.)
2. Complete the required steps to earn the bonus (usually just a minimum spending requirement)
3. Use your sign-up bonus points/miles to book cheap travel
4. Cancel the credit card before the annual fee comes due
5. Repeat as needed

It's that easy.

The most extreme travel hackers repeat this process ~15-20 times per year and end up taking multiple international trips annually for pennies on the dollar. (I just did a weekend trip to Amsterdam for less than $200.)

Why does this work?

Put simply, travel hacking works because it allows you to beat the credit card companies at their own game.

Credit card companies make a large portion of their profits by exploiting people who are financially irresponsible. They provide a product that allows you to live above your means, use marketing tactics to make you believe that you can afford anything (pay attention to their commercials, you'll see what I mean), then make you their slave by charging outrageous interest rates on the debt that you inevitably accrue.

And it works, and works incredibly well. So well that the average American household has $15,611 of credit card debt. With typical interest rates on this debt hovering around 15%, this is an incredibly profitable business for these companies.

Knowing this, credit card companies offer large sign-up bonuses in the form of frequent flyer miles, cash back, etc. on their cards to encourage people to sign up.

These bonuses are essentially a form of bait to lure you in to the trap of credit card debt.

Travel hacking works by systematically mining these bonuses while avoiding the trap of falling into debt.

Won't this destroy your credit score?

No, and anyone who tells you otherwise has no idea how credit scores work.

Here is a quick rundown on how applying for a large number of credit cards can affect your credit score.

Every time you apply for a credit card (or any form of credit) your credit score will dip by ~2-5 points according to FICO. There is a long and somewhat complicated answer for why this happens, but let's be honest, you couldn't care less. This is the way that credit scoring works and neither you nor I can change that.

(If you are actually curious, google "travel hacking effect on credit". You'll find a ton of articles that support my claim.)

This ~2-5 point dip is short-lived and is easily offset by the positive effects of having another credit account on your credit report. Mainly the increased amount of available credit (which reduces your credit utilization) and the increased number of on-time payments that you will be making.

I have personally seen my credit score rise more than 80 points since I have started travel hacking.

So what's the catch?

The catch is that this only works when you use your new credit cards responsibly.

If you end up spending beyond your means then you have fallen in to their trap.

So you need to take a long, hard look in the mirror and be brutally honest with yourself before getting started. If you're the type of person that can't control your spending then travel hacking is definitely not for you.

Here is an actionable plan to help you fly for cheap

As we discussed above, the first step of travel hacking is to apply for a rewards credit card that gives you some sort of sign-up bonus. There are dozens of these cards out there so let's start with perhaps the most basic one on the market. The Barclays Arrival Plus.

The Barclays Arrival Plus offers 40,000 miles as a sign-up bonus after you spend $3,000 in the first 3 months. These miles can be redeemed at a rate of 1 penny a piece to erase travel expenses made within 120 days.

So you can erase a $300 airline ticket purchase with 30,000 points, a $55 taxi fare with 5,500 points, etc. You get the point. You also get a 10% bonus on any points redeemed, meaning that the 40,000 sign-up bonus points give you $440 in travel statement credits.

These statement credits can be used to erase just about any travel expense. Airline tickets, hotel rooms, taxis, Uber fares, you name it.

Another major advantage of this card is that you can take advantage of the signup bonus before you meet the $3,000 minimum spending requirement. Simply use the card to pay for your trip and erase the charges after you have earned the bonus points.

The Barclays Arrival Plus has no fee for the first year, meaning you could cancel the card 11 months after opening it and end up paying nothing out of pocket. So in some cases you might actually be able to get your US flight literally for free.

Again, a concept that defies traditional logic but is really quite simple. That's a lot to digest at once, so let's boil it down to the basics.

The Spark Notes version

1. Open a Barclays Arrival Plus credit card
2. Use the Barclays Arrival Plus to pay for your next flight
3. After meeting the $3,000 minimum spending requirement, use your bonus miles to erase $440+ of your airfare charge
4. Cancel the card 11 months after applying to avoid paying any sort of fees

Simple, effective, and literally free. You won't pay a dime to use this strategy.

And as I mentioned before, you can continually repeat this process to earn an endless amount of points and miles and start traveling the world for next to nothing.

Start your journey to becoming a better man today.

Are Black People More Racist Than White People?

March 31, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

When I moved to the South as a teenager I got a glimpse of race relations up close for the first time in my life, and one thing that quickly became surprisingly evident was the disdain black people had for white people. This wasn't the case with everyone but the undercurrent of their resentment was noticeable.

Then I went to college where diversity, love, togetherness, and every other feel good cause were front and center and that seemed to change my hunch for a while. But when I left and went back to the real world it was right back in my face.

Diversity! Feeeelzzz! Justice!

Living in more than a dozen states over the last 20 years was enough of a sample size for me to draw the conclusion that blacks might very well be more racist than whites. My second stint in a certain city put the nail in the coffin.

The ATL

Those who have read my columns know and understand that I don't exactly hold Atlanta in the highest regard. It's not a terrible city because it does have its perks (such as the abundance of Latinas in and around the city) but by and large I'm not the biggest fan of The Big Peach.

The main reason I left after just 6 months my second time around was because of the black people. The victim mentality, ghettos, criticism of anything not related to black culture, and a shitload of other things got old quick.

What set the tone for my short stay was when a coworker of mine was on his usual soapbox about how black people were "oppressed" and that racism was at an all time high—the usual bullshit that people like him talked about 'round the clock.

I grew increasingly tired of his preaching so rather than trying to have a conversation with him about it (which I knew wouldn't do any good), I showed him a video to let him know that we may not have it as bad as people in other countries:

His response? "Well we have it worse here because racism is covert. At least they keep it real over there and say it to your face."

Un. Fucking. Believable.

These conversations were a regular occurrence with this idiot and unfortunately his mentality was prevalent in this city.

Another huge problem in Atlanta is that black people purposely separate themselves from other races. It seemed that they only associated with blacks whether it be socially, in their business dealings, religiously, or anything else they could think of. Even the shows they watch are predominantly black.

Sure, the black population down there is higher than most major cities which factors in. But how the hell can these people complain about segregation and the importance of diversity if they're the ones actively separating themselves?

Black women DESPISE white women

Best believe she hates white girls

Years ago my ex wife and I were at mass, and in front of us sat a black woman and her two daughters. It was still early so people were still filing into their seats and awaiting the priest to make his appearance and start the proceedings.

Just before things got started a white family took their seats next to the black family. Nothing out of the ordinary there…except for the fact that the two young black girls looked at the blonde white girl with a disgust that was so pronounced my wife and I exchanged uncomfortable glances.

The sad part about this is that those two black girls were too young to dislike the white girl simply because of her pale skin. The hard truth is they're being indirectly (and probably also directly) taught to hate white people by their mother, their culture, and everything they consume.

Those two little girls will grow up to shoot dirty looks at white girls and complain to each other that they are stealing "their men." This mindset will permeate all of their thoughts and actions. Before they know it they'll start to blame white people for all of their "struggles," especially their lack of romantic options.

They can say whatever they want but this is the real reason black women hate on Kim K

Even my own mother would turn up her nose at my white high school girlfriends. These days she's much more laid back about my choice in female companionship (age, introspection, and perspective will do that) but she never passed up the opportunity to ask "Why can't you find a nice African-American girl, Donovan?" I never answered because I knew I'd earn a swift hand to the face.

This article is but a sliver of the pie that is the prevailing attitude about black men like myself who date outside our race. The title alone is all you need to know about where they stand on this issue.

> Fatally obsessed with women of a lighter persuasion, Tiger Woods might be the only one on this list who actually has a medical condition. Woods has had more blonde prostitutes than a season's worth of "Game Of Thrones." Still, after losing a hefty $100 million in his divorce settlement, he swiftly scooped up another one to share the rest of his riches.

The sooner black women accept and understand that their lack of dating options isn't because of white girls (or any other race for that matter) the better off they'll be.

Legally speaking

Remember the O.J. Verdict? Remember the outright glee black people reacted with when the verdict was read? Remember how uncomfortable we were watching people celebrate that someone had gotten away with murder just because he was black?

The Simpson trial was not only the trial of the century, it shined a spotlight on how black people in this country really felt about whites. The fact that this occurred only a few short years after the Rodney King incident and in the same geographical area only heightened the blood lust for “one of ours” to get over on “one of theirs.”

Let’s face it. They had O.J. dead to rights. All the evidence pointed to his guilt (except for these) but because of the exploits of Mark Fuhrman, an obviously tainted jury pool trying to “make up” for what happened to King, and the best criminal defense lawyer money could buy, Simpson walked.

[image]
The most infamous mug shot of the 20th century

In an honest moment any reasonable person, black or white, would tell you he should have been convicted. Yet, to this day blacks still declare that he didn’t do it (including the wannabe Malcolm X I showed the above video to) knowing damn well they wouldn’t bet dollars to death on his innocence.

The cases of Trayvon Martin and Michael Brown are also prime examples where the fact that both of them being black clouded the common sense and judgement of black people. Race baiters like Al Sharpton and Jesse Jackson didn’t waste any time stoking the flames of racism to line their pockets and increase their prominence in the public eye.

Is it a tragedy that both of these young men were killed as teenagers? Of course it is. Nobody’s disputing that. But similar to the feminist agenda, the problem is in the narrative and this ROK article could not have stated it any better:

> Janay Rice wasn’t sitting on the couch minding her own business when Ray walked up and punched her in the face. Rihanna wasn’t making pancakes when Chris Brown walked in the kitchen and slapped the shit out of her.

Brown and Martin weren’t sitting under trees studying for midterms when accosted by their would-be assassins. This isn’t to say they deserved to die, but they most certainly were not innocent little snowflakes minding their own business.

And thanks to people like Louis Farrakhan, black people have a blind rage without knowing all of the facts which only further deepens the racial divide.

All they have to hear is “white man shoots black man” and they instantly jump to outrage because of the dangerous precedents set by the chronicling of comparable events of the past.

The gross exploitation of a double standard

Black people publicly talk shit about white people (and other races) on the regular and most people don’t say anything about it. Whether it’s out of fear or social pressure, anything that remotely resembles racism towards blacks is avoided like the plague.

Fellow columnist and friend Blair Naso is my go-to guy for anecdotes on race issues. Having lived in the South a combined 40+ years we often swap stores and have great conversations. Naso’s right in the thick of things down there so he’s able to offer accurate, detailed accounts of race related events.

One such conversation was the genesis of this column and when I asked Naso's opinion on this he didn't pull any punches:

> Which of the two is more racist in actuality? I'm not sure. But most white racism is benign, whereas black racism often hurts people. They'll gun you down for being white and walking on their side of town and then justify it because of slavery.

Well said.

Blacks, on the other hand, are given a free pass to use all sorts of racial slurs but the moment someone of a different race even broaches the subject of a possible pitfall of the black race, we get up in arms.

[image]
Good question, Captain…

Political correctness is the shield blacks hide behind—that's "pussy pass" in neomasculine-ese. They know that if a caucasian insinuates a racial element in any given situation they'll be attacked and sometimes eviscerated. Whereas if black people do the same thing, they're often defended by the hamster wheel of the culture and media and exonerated of any wrong doing.

Case in point: The Donald Sterling scandal. For those unfamiliar with this story, the long and short of it is Los Angeles Clippers owner Donald Sterling was recorded by his mistress during a racial tirade. This set off a media firestorm which ultimately led to the team being taken from Sterling and subsequently sold to former Microsoft CEO Steve Balmer.

I can say with near 100% certainty that if Sterling was black and made these comments about white people he'd still have his team.

While I don't agree with Sterling's world view, I strongly disagreed with him being stripped of his team because of his views. I'm willing to bet he's not the only owner who shares his perspective (on some level at least). But the only difference between them and Sterling is that Sterling voiced his politically incorrect opinion on front of a woman who violated his privacy and made it public.

Sterling with the woman who would eventually betray him

A spin-off of this saga was a statement made by Dallas Mavericks owner Mark Cuban in the midst of the Sterling story gaining traction:

> If I see a black kid in a hoodie and it's late at night, I'm walking to the other side of the street. And if on that side of the street, there's a guy that has tattoos all over his face–white guy, bald head, tattoos everywhere–I'm walking back to the other side of the street.

Once again the PC Police reared its ugly head and Cuban was predictably crucified for his remarks. There were a few that publicly defended him but by and large his comment was not taken very well. Nevermind the fact that he used a white person in one of his examples. All blacks heard was "black kid," "hoodie," and "other side of the street" and we lost our minds.

Black people in this country know and exploit this double standard ad nauseam, and black comedians and actors are no different. They literally trade on this double standard and use it to make quite a nice living for themselves while similar acts would all but end the careers of whites in this field. Remember this little gaffe?

Muslims and Panthers and colored people OH MY!

Two groups in particular have made it crystal clear they have no intention of improving relations with whites: The New Black Panther Party and Black American-born Muslims. We'll get to the NBP in a minute but let me be clear here about Muslims in this country: I'm not talking about the ones that are born and raised in Muslim nations. I'm talking about blacks in this country that convert to Islam.

Funny thing is, most black American Muslims I've talked to seem to have one thing in common: the utter hatred of white people.

My first stint in Atlanta showed me how crazy these "converts" were when one knucklehead had the gall to say "Osama bin Ladin is a great man!" in the wake of the 9/11 attacks. I immediately knew what he was playing at so I coolly shrugged my shoulders and asked "Well why is that? What great things has he done?"

Silence. He didn't have an answer because I was supposed to fly off the handle and start spewing the red white and blue blues and scream at him for betraying 'Murica. All his statement was designed to do was illicit a reaction. It wasn't to educate or inform me. The guy just wanted to piss me off because I poked holes in his "philosophies" and he threw a Hail Mary to try and win the argument…just like a woman.

[image]
These people are unbearable

Believe it or not, the New Black Panther Party is worse. Formerly led by the outwardly racist crackpot Malik Zulu Shabazz (who felt the need to shed his "slave name" Paris S. Lewis), the NBP has a well earned reputation for the ridiculous notions they abide by.

How crazy are they you ask? These loons backed Crystal Mangum when she accused three Duke LaCrosse players of gang raping her. That's pretty fucking crazy in my book.

Note: (Dis) honorable mention goes to the NAACP who is as guilty as any group out there for fanning the flames of racism.

Conclusion

Racism is real and it exists. I get it. I certainly don't blame older Black Americans who lived through the Civil Rights Movement and still bear the scars of past racism. That shit was tough to get through (thank God for Martin Luther King, Jr.) so I can understand if blacks of generations past still carry that resentment with them.

However, any black person who didn't live in that era and have the audacity to squawk about reparations, "the man," equality, or anything related to race as it pertains to black people are as bad, if not worse, than feminists as far as I'm concerned. Feminists ask "where have all the good men gone" but do nothing to improve themselves as women. That mentality is no different than blacks who "fight the power" on a daily basis.

[image]
Blacks act like we're living in this age

Hell, we even shame our own when one of us doesn't toe the proverbial company line. Charles Barkley has been the target of harsh criticism for calling out the looters in Ferguson (to which he responded in kind).

Similarly, Dr. Ben Carson is also looked at as something of a villain in the black community simply because he is unafraid to publicly criticize President Obama and doesn't buy into the bullshit ideals of cooks like Shabazz or "Dr." Jeremiah Wright and makes no bones about it.

Improving race relations in America is going to take a seismic shift of epic proportions in American culture. White people have been reigned in (mostly) on racist action and speech. It is high time blacks are held to the same standard. If more of us took the Barkley or Carson approach to life we'd be a lot better off as a people.

Billionaire Leaves Greedy Daughter $3 Million, Judge Orders She Get $25 Million

Olivia Mead can now buy her crystal-covered grand piano and diamond-encrusted guitar. Having previously asked for 77 years of income until she's 96, the teenaged Mead has been granted AU$25 million (just under US$20 million), to be paid within a couple of months, from her late father's estate.

Master Sanderson of the Western Australian Supreme Court ruled that billionaire Michael Wright had "provided little" to his fourth and secret child, despite him paying $535,000 for 16 years of her life ($33,437.50 per annum) until he died. The judicial officer thus threw out the explicit provisions of Wright's actual will, which had earmarked a generous allowance for her until she was 30, when she would be granted access to a $3 million trust fund.

What this case encapsulates is the erosion of "adequate provision," "reasonable," and other legal concepts and their replacement by grotesque caricatures which stroke the egos of self-entitled children, vengeful exes and other unfortunate classes of individual.

Toto, we're not in Kansas anymore…

What exactly is so inadequate about Wright granting his daughter a $3 million trust fund at 30 and a generous allowance until then?

Michael Wright's intentions were abundantly clear. He obviously wanted his daughter to make her own way in the world. It is entirely foreseeable, given the purely gratuitous wish-list of hers initially presented to the court system after his death, that he sensed in advance that she had poor impulse control, little in the way of realistic ambition and not only a dependence on but also an expectation of others providing for her.

This only compounds the original problem of giving millions of dollars to any teenager, let alone one who demands to be spoiled (PER YEAR) with $40,000 for holidays, $20,000 for pet care, five pairs of $5,000 shoes, 20 pairs of $300 shoes, a $2.5 million house and $10,000 for fashion accessories.

Although an heir himself, Wright made a good fist of his family fortune and was a well-known and respected business figure in Perth, the state of Western Australia, and nationally. Also, describing the $535,000 Wright gave for the upkeep and needs of Olivia as "little" is ludicrous. Nearly $35,000 per year is a huge figure by most parenting standards and more than enough for a very comfortable childhood, not to mention that $535,000 across 16 years is worth much more in real terms due to inflation.

He additionally paid her school fees and gave her an allowance on top of the child support he had to furnish her mother with. The idea that a child should be given support commensurate to someone's overall fortune is both fanciful and bizarrely self-entitled.

It is one thing for a child or probably self-interested mother, incensed she was dispensed with as a potential billionaire wife, to argue that they deserve more. But for a judicial body, no less the Supreme Court of Western Australia, which is only provincially "outranked" by the Full Bench of that same Court, to entertain such folly and largely accede to the girl's gargantuan demands speaks volumes about the degradation of family and inheritance law.

You can now write your final testament in three foot letters and have it trampled on by a do-gooder, reality-bending, judicial officer.

Olivia Mead and her maybe jilted mother.

How much is that diamond-encrusted guitar in the window?

Wright's provisioning for his bastard daughter was nothing short of extraordinary. Without stipulating a new law officially, Master Sanderson has effectively, like other revisionists of his ilk, equated "adequate provisioning" with a certain slice of a billionaire's fortune, rather than evaluating if the funds furnished in the will reflect the means for a proper, not fanciful existence.

Moreover, why can't a father or mother simply decide to not include a child in their will or restrict or delay entitlements from the same will?

As unfair as it may seem to Mead, it is likely Wright never expected to father a daughter via an extramarital affair and did not devote equal time and effort to his different kinds of children. It is not uncommon or really surprising that a tycoon's children born within wedlock would see their father much more or reap more from the family piggybank, even if we discount that illegitimate children are often produced when a millionaire or billionaire is older.

Nor is it shocking that some children are naturally preferred to others. Human beings are human beings, after all, and the negative impact of favoritism is almost certainly more acute when families have less finances to go around.

Having child favourites, either by choice or more benignly by social circumstance, should nonetheless not be a moral basis for receiving $25 million. It is believed that the Wright-Mead case is the highest court-ordered estate ruling in Australian history.

Closing thoughts and collective head-shaking

Pity she didn't have a wad of $100 bills to push her hair back. Hair grease is plain annoying.

This situation conjures up all sorts of possibilities and other hypothetical horror cases. What if Mead and Wright had had a strained relationship? And although the Gates family resides in the US, if billionaire Bill died today, should his children be happy with $100,000 each if that's all that he leaves them? Or do they have any recourse to claim more?

Even those who inherited, such as Donald Trump, fundamentally own the wealth they are bequeathed by their affluent parents. They have a choice to give such wealth when they pass. It's already a problematic field when the will is hazy, but when the words are as bright as Lena Dunham is tactless, what sort of legal sadism is it to reverse or discard their meaning?

If you want to know why the world we live in is seemingly falling apart at breakneck speed, take this Olivia Mead case, assemble a few others preposterously like it, and then use a form of simple induction to work out that nothing should surprise you anymore.

Coming Home From The War On Terror

March 31, 2015 | by Simon Wolfe | Link | Original Link

I'm a former soldier and veteran of two foreign wars. After my military service I became a private military contractor. I've spent more than half of my adult life in third world shitholes having third world shitbags trying to shoot me and blow me up.

I loved being a soldier and I was proud to defend my country and its people. There were some dark, arduous times of course, but the adventures, lifelong friends, and my love for my people made it a pleasure to serve.

A look back

The memory of my service has since been tainted as I realized that I was less defending my nation and its people than serving the interests of a government that not only did not care about me, but has increasingly showed itself to hate me. I came back to a country that I did not recognize as the one that I had set out to defend all those years ago. It more closely resembles the war zones I fought in than the country in which I grew up.

To the present day. Our sons and daughters are growing up without the guidance and protection of their fathers. In the absence of the traditional nuclear family, the modern progressive leviathan has stepped into the role of father. Boys growing up with only the progressive state as a father figure have no real masculine role model and are clueless as to what it is to be a man. They either become mewling simps or violent thugs, neither of which are good for society.

The public school system wishes to sexualize our children at as young an age as possible.

Our children are being bullied and raped by gangs of immigrants on a scale one would normally only see following a catastrophic defeat in war. There is an ethnic component to crime which everybody sees but is not allowed to talk about.

Instead of fixing the problems in our own society our warmongering politicians and journalists are trying to sell us wars with Russia (the last great traditional Christian nation left on Earth), Iran, and an enemy in the Middle East that they themselves created.

If we get dragged into a war with Russia it will be unlike anything we have seen. It won't be like the money-spinning wars in Iraq and Afghanistan where civilians can sit down in front of the television for their evening briefing, replete with columns of burning enemy tanks and talking heads reporting on how fucking great the war is going. There will be no "mission accomplished" for this war.

Should it escalate sufficiently, the combined nuclear arsenals of the combatants involved would be enough to extinguish all human life on earth. Even if it does not get to that stage, it would still be a war that will touch the people back home. Europe is not at a stage where it can defend itself from a concerted strategic bombing campaign from Russia.

The West greatly underestimates the huge material and logistic arsenal of the Russians. A draft would be very likely. Despite my exemplary previous military service, I regret to inform you all I shall not be turning up for this one.

The government and media are pressing for these wars but they have not given much thought as to who it will be that will actually do the fighting on their behalf. It won't be me, and it won't be a lot of other right-thinking soldiers, veterans, and draft-eligible men. The men who represent the manifestation of government foreign policy, the armed forces, are beginning to realize the same things as you and I.

They are committing the crime of noticing. They are noticing that the men who do the hard work of holding civilization together are not afforded the same privileges as those who would destroy it. They are noticing that degenerate morals are being promoted at the expense of a healthy society. They are noticing that a disproportionate amount of crime is committed by an imported ethnic underclass. They are noticing that the social justice emperor has no clothes.

Why I will not fight

I will not fight for a government that wants to sexualize our children at as young an age as possible, forcing upon them the dogma of gay marriage and equality, indoctrinating them into unnatural sexual practices without informing them of the very real and frightening rate of HIV infections in the gay community.

And this government would demand I fight against Russia, which moves to protect its children from this sort of degeneracy and preserve the traditional family structure? No chance. Send the gays and trannies to fight because I'm not fighting for them anymore.

I won't fight for a government which has commodified the women of this nation and convinced them to give up having children so they can burden themselves with debt and become anonymous, minimum wage cogs in a huge multicultural machine that is obsessed with only a person's financial value and not their social worth.

I won't fight for a government which has spent years importing filth from every recess of the third world to replace the children we never had because our women were too busy serving two buck coffees to pay off their six-figure student debts. The government sees low maintenance immigrants as the future of this country. Send them to fight for it.

I will not fight for the freedom of speech of people who use it to bully, belittle, and demonize Christians. I will not be lectured on the importance of the right to free speech and then in the next breath criticized for my disapproval of the proliferation of gay marriage and the false idols of equality. If freedom of speech is such a fundamental right to these people then they can take up arms and defend it. But we all know they won't.

It turned out I was fighting for a government that hated me, and everybody like me. This government liked to show me off as an instrument used to protect free speech, but now that I'm home it doesn't want to hear my opinion. The government found value in my use as a tool but my opinions are labelled as hatred.

I desire to see people succeed, to love, to grow up in a family, to be valued for more than just their income tax payments and to have their homeland and traditions preserved. And I'm telling you, I am not alone. The government is asking more and more of a military from which they are becoming increasingly ideologically and spiritually divorced.

For some men the red pill makes them eject and go their own way. For others it makes them want to recover what we have lost. I am of the latter. As men our votes are meaningless. However, our influence over a nation which relies on us to serve it is much stronger.

We work the oil rigs and power plants which keep our nation running. We work the farm that keep everybody fed. We drive the trucks and build the roads. We police the streets and protect our borders. The real power of a nation resides within us.

I will not be beholden to people who rely on the rights and privileges that my service provides but who detest me. As a man who took an oath to defend his nation with his life sacrifice I can bear, cuckoldry I cannot.

Can The Ways Of Eastern European Men Inspire Us To Revitalize Western Masculinity?

March 31, 2015 | by Kyle Rogers | Link | Original Link

I am a 28-year old male living in Eastern Europe in the Moldova province of Romania. I wrote this article because I have noticed that during this masculinity crisis of the West, many Western males tend to perceive the Eastern European male model as a source of inspiration for revitalizing their lost sense of masculinity.

This is because, to some extent, Eastern Europe and Slavic states still cling to conventional gender models more strongly, and their societies encourage a more raw approach to masculinity, alongside a more traditional view on femininity also.

To begin, I would like to offer my own characterization of Eastern European and Slavic manhood. To an extent, the men of Eastern Europe might be called barbaric, backwards, and uncivilized at worst, and cold and unemotional at best. But Eastern European men, despite their low level of sophistication, do provide an example of an environment that fosters hardy, reliable men.

If we are to take the best traits in them, I suppose that these are courage (they are not easily frightened and do not lose their nerve), respect towards women who deserve it, an inclination towards cultivating physical endurance and strength (many people still perform manual labor here), and a strong attachment to their barbaric, warrior ways.

The sense of tribalism

By tribalism, I mean a mindset focused on making a living in a small society, namely a village, or, depending on the case, a neighborhood, block, street and so on. In broad lines, the tribal mindset prevents people from looking at the big picture, turning instead to satisfying the needs of the village or neighborhood and establishing a reputation there.

This is one of the reasons why there are violent urban (and especially rural) areas throughout Eastern Europe, where you might get your ass kicked just for wandering there, because the local macho men deem fit to thrash outsiders just to make sure they maintain their alpha position in the “tribe”:

On the positive side, though, the sense of tribalism fosters the desire to impress and help the extended family, or in some cases, the neighbors in the area one lives in. In the 90s, the sense of tribalism was rampant: even in the university neighbourhoods of my country, college students used to brawl in gangs for the sole reason to prove their toughness – fighting for the sake of fighting, not about territory, gang turfs or whatever.

Why is this so-called tribalism good for fostering strong male values? Because it cultivates a sense of loyalty towards your peers, it makes you streetwise, and often hones your fighting skills, which are all factors that prevent guys from becoming pussies.

Why is tribalism bad? Because it hinders progress in society, by clinging to archaic values and mindsets (some sort of medieval barbarism), instead of embracing more enlightened views towards the improvement of society as a whole.

The religious component

Despite his legendary cruelty, Vlad Tepes is considered by Romanians to be a hero and protector of Christendom. This is a scene from a Romanian historical movie about him, 'Vlad Tepes' (1979).

Most Eastern European countries, such as Romania, Russia, Bulgaria, Moldova, or Ukraine, are members of the Eastern Orthodox Church, which, as you probably know, is pretty backwards and likes to cling to its archaic past as much as possible.

What does the Orthodox Church have to do with the male mindset? To answer this, I need to recount just how religion fits into the psyche of the people of Eastern Europe. First of all, allegiance to the church strongly resembles the medieval allegiance to the local warlord, boyar, or voivod. In Eastern Europe, people are quite ignorant of dogma, but still hold the church in high esteem and are ready to defend their Orthodox identity, often by adopting strong homophobic views and a staunch reluctance to adopt Western elements.

Religion encourages an "us-versus-them" mindset, as many people in these parts are ignorant and see the West and its influences as attacks to their national and ethnic identity, aimed at destroying Orthodoxy and establishing some sort of immoral gay tyranny.

In brief, religion fosters a type the archaic medieval mindset of allegiance to the leader and provides a strong hierarchical framework. Because men have the instinct to form hierarchies (being primates after all), religion in Eastern Europe does foster among its members a sense of belonging to a large pack, with its principles being backed up by the irrational fear of embracing Western ideals.

The political environment, both old and new

Grocery store queue from the early 90s. Poverty was rampant and even your basic needs were a luxury back then.

The perceived brutality of Eastern European peoples is perhaps best explained by their long-lasting history of abuse and violence at the hand of their rulers. Throughout history, most rulers, voivods, kings, czars, and whatever rulers might have been in charge sought to drain the most out of the common folk, with wars, genocide and rebellions being always around the corner.

The most recent large-scale violent event in Romania was the 1989 revolution, when the army was running tanks into protesters, and gunned them down from building tops, everything culminating with the execution of Ceausescu, the Romanian dictator, in an act of brutality that ended a 45-year reign of terror, poverty and corruption.

After the fall of communism, things were only apparently better, as massive job loss, poverty and corruption ran rampant. Violence was more frequent than ever, as the sudden change from Ceausescu's Orwellian society towards a new, freer one triggered enormous confusion and chaos in the minds of the people.

Hardship breeds toughness and this is why it is rather difficult to frighten Eastern Europeans, but it is also difficult to make them revolt against unfairness and ill-treatment. It might be justly stated that most Eastern Europeans are pessimistic and weary, and refrain from smiling in public. However, they do this because they often expect hardship, due to this lack of trust towards leaders.

Comparison to the west

What conclusion can be drawn from this analysis? To answer this question, I would like to describe the recent changes in the males of my country. At 28 years old, I was a witness to the metamorphosis of the Romanian male population. I grew up in the poverty of the ‘90s, where people were tough, uncivilized, and violence was pretty frequent, but during the 2000s things began to change, as the economy grew and we became a part of the European Union.

At that moment the more important shifts occurred in the population of my country. More specifically, as living conditions improved, a surge of wussy, low-testosterone males became prevalent in many urban centers, and I suspect that better living conditions and the Internet have played the main role in this.

Thus emerged the new urban male, effeminate, confused about women, often turning into either some sort of mangina, or some deplorable creep. From what I read, the downfall of men in Western countries took place over several decades, but in my country, this downfall was sudden and confusing.

Concluding remarks

Without a harsh environment, and I mean genuinely harsh, it’s unsurprising that today’s male has become feeble. However, I do not wish such a situation on any country—I’ve lived through it and know how it is like. The key to the question is that every man ought to, every now and then, do something that really forces his limits.

Do whatever, cycling, martial arts, weightlifting, but add a touch of creativity to the mix: for instance, spend two days alone in the woods without a phone, working out. Attend a martial arts school that focuses on insane workouts, even for beginners.

Don’t get involved in tiresome office jobs that involve paperwork. Try living for a couple of days on the streets, eating from dumpsters, or trying to cultivate your food in the countryside. In other words, find your inner barbarian, and try to keep him as an advisor at all times.

Therefore, with regards to the question in the title of this article, I suppose the answer is “Yes,” but only to a certain extent. What many Eastern European men fail to comprehend is that Western values do not mean a total rejection of their beliefs. What many Western men have been led to believe is that being nice, sensitive, and polite is the key to a successful life.

Both are wrong, and both can learn from each other. I hope this article serves well as an item of cultural contact between these two worlds, and helps spread different ideas that would help them improve their views on society and on themselves.

Join The Kings Battalion Today To Fight Against Western Imperialism

April 1, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For ROK readers who consider themselves masculine, strong, and brave, it's time to put your money where your mouth is by joining the Kings Battalion, a new military force that will be based in Eastern Ukraine to engage in warfare against degenerate Western proxy forces. Today is day one for recruiting 300 English-speaking men to be soldiers on the side of Russia, tradition, and honor.

America is ruining the world

In November 2013, the President of Ukraine was ousted from power in a coup that was successful thanks to American money. That coup installed an oligarch puppet subservient to American and German interests that aim not only to enrich their institutions with high-interest loans through the IMF and World Bank, but also to corrupt thin and feminine Ukrainian women with a Western lifestyle that converts them into fat feminist zombies instead of loyal wives and mothers.

I have access to secret intelligence reports on the ground in pro-American Western Ukraine that reveal an explosion in women getting tattoos, body piercings, and Skrillex haircuts. Almost overnight, thanks to a lack of traditional cultural restraints, women are racing to appeal to their most impulsive and base urgings. In addition, over thirty new Pizza Huts and McDonalds have since opened in Western controlled areas while Monsanto and Conagra engage in shameless dumping of their GMO foodstuffs, fattening the female population at a rate not seen in human history since the founding of Chipotle in America. It is predicted that Ukrainian women will be as fat as American women in only four years time.

I left the degenerate West in 2007 to pursue a more traditional lifestyle with women who are not addicted to Facebook and bad boys. My search has ultimately not yielded me with happiness because the Western culture I left is supplanting the traditional cultures faster than the speed of commercial flight. Soon there will be nowhere else for us to run, which is why we must put a stop to Western encroachment through the creation of the Kings Battalion. Either we risk our lives today to create a better world for ourselves, or get ready for weekly Slutwalks and gay pride events to be held in Kiev, Novosibirsk, and Ulan Bator.

The Kings Battalion

I am now accepting applications for the Kings Battalion. It will be a cohesive and elite unit of 300 Western men who are ready to destroy agents of the West in order to stop the frightening advance of Instagram port-a-potty whores and selfie sticks. While it is free to join, you must bring at least $2,500 US in small bills to purchase weapons, gear, and a supply of food to last a one-year tour of duty.

Your initial training will be composed of throwing pineapple grenades, firing automatic weapons, and washing yourself with buckets of ice cold water. Afterwards, you'll be assigned to defensive positions so that you may learn fighting techniques from English-speaking military instructors in the Donetsk People's Republic. If you are a soft blob of useless mass today, rest assured that you will be turned into a slab of rock in short time.

After your one-year service, you will be eligible to receive a small plot of land near Donetsk. You will also be assigned an attractive Ukrainian woman who needs a strong man to provide for her in exchange for bearing your heirs and taking care of the home. You may be called back into service to defend your family from further Western aggression in the form of a NGO funded by George Soros.

Sign up to fight today

For the longest time, I've sensed a hopelessness among Western men as cultural locusts destroy all that is masculine, good, and true. It's time for us to put up or shut up. I have made my choice, and will be putting my life on the line by leading the Kings Battalion instead of continuing to complain on the internet through blog articles, Youtube videos, and 140-character fatalistic musings on Twitter. I hope you choose to do the same and join me on the front lines. If you're interested, email See you in the Donbass.

UK Feminists Ban Clapping At Conference Because It Triggers Anxiety

April 1, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

At a National Union of Students (NUS) Women's conference in London this week, delegates were asked to refrain from applauding and use "jazz hands" instead. The request, which appeared on the Twitter feed of the Oxford University Student Union's Women's Campaign, was made because clapping was "triggering anxiety" amongst some conference members.

The same conference also passed a motion condemning drag and cross dressing, while another motion attacked gay men who speak like black women. Are these manifestations just self-indulgences of affluent human detritus, or do they represent a wider trend of censorious authoritarianism in people who will one day be ruling over Britain's town halls and corporate offices?

There is a growing problem of gay white men appropriating black women

The whole cretinous spectacle was precipitated by a couple of tweets by the NUS Women's Campaign. First:

> 'Whooping is fun for some, but can be super inaccessible for others, so please try not to whoop! Jazz hands work just as well.

Then:

> Some delegates are requesting that we move to jazz hands rather than clapping, as it's triggering anxiety. Please be mindful! #nuswomen15′.

Following a reaction of general ridicule, student-political apparatchicks piled in to defend the policy. Nona Buckley-Irvine, General secretary (no less) of the London School of Economics Students' Union, unloaded both barrels:

> Jazz hands are used throughout NUS in place of clapping as a way to show appreciation of someone's point without interrupting or causing disturbance, as it can create anxiety.

Presumably a room-full of feminists spacking out like Al Jolson is not something that can cause anxiety. Another important point made by blogger Gareth Soye, who suffers from a real anxiety disorder, is that indulging sufferers of anxiety in their wish to avoid the anxiety trigger does harm by allowing them to avoid confronting their condition and learning to live with it.

LSE SU women's officer Gee Linford-Grayson (notice the theme of double-barreled surnames?) added:

> As someone who is new to the NUS conference culture it surprised me at first, but actually within a few rounds of jazz hands applause it began to make a lot of sense, as loud clapping and whooping can be intimidating and distracting when you're speaking on stage.

That's right, loud clapping and whooping can be intimidating and distracting to public speakers. People who have presumably put themselves forward on campus and then been elected as student representatives are intimidated by the sound of clapping and whooping of public meetings. As Richard Littlejohn would put it, you couldn't make it up.

Fancy dress is "Transphobic"

MMA fighter Alex Reid would presumably be denied the right to dress in drag.

To add to the lunacy, the NUS conference was also host to equally absurd motions condemning dressing in drag and telling gay white men to stop "appropriating" black women. The motion against drag was passed, the reasoning behind it being that "Transphobic fancy dress should be met with the same disdain with which we meet other prejudiced or appropriative costumes".

It requires NUS events to ban crossdressing, but only for "cisgender" participants. Drag will be tolerated, however, as an "expression or exploration of queer identity." Deviant Privilege, you might call it.

Here is part of second motion, which was also passed:

> The appropriation of Black women by white gay men is prevalent within the LGBT scene and community. This may be manifested in the emulation of the mannerisms, language (particularly AAVE- African American Vernacular English) > and phrases that can be attributed to Black women. White gay men may often assert that they are 'strong black women" or have an "inner black woman'.

It turns out not all oppressed minorities are equal, as:

> White gay men are the dominant demographic within the LGBT community, and they benefit from both white privilege and male privilege.

It's always fun to watch the Oppression Olympics unfold and the oppressed cannibalise each other. One thing that is unclear, however, is how exactly the "appropriation of black women" will be "eradicated" from the behaviour of white gays at NUS conferences. Presumably some burly enforcers will walk around looking for gay white men assuming the mannerisms of black women and then eject them in the name of "equality."

Oxford University: viper's nest

The revelation that the original complaint that clapping was "causing anxiety" originated from the Twitter feed of the Oxford University Student Union's Women's Campaign, which will come to no surprise to those familiar with the cabaret of attention-seeking that is UK student politics.

The august institution has just been given a "red\" ranking in a study into freedom of speech by Spiked Magazine. This means that Oxford is "hostile to free speech and free expression." The University's resident Equality and Diversity seat-warmer, Trudy Coe, defended their "harassment" policy:

> ...the University does not tolerate any form of harassment or victimisation. ... It is committed to fostering an inclusive culture which promotes equality, values diversity and maintains a working, learning and social environment in which the rights and dignity of all members of the University community are respected."

"Ms" Coe was at pains to point out that academic debate was OK as long as it was done: "without violating the dignity of others or creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment.”

My uterus is not up for debate

Niamh Mcintyre.

One example of just how low the bar stands for judging an environment “intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive” at Oxford is the abortion debate debacle at Christ Church college. Two male speakers were due to have a debate about abortion from either side of the pro-life and pro-choice debate.

Feminists started agitating against the event, accusing the organisers and participants of using “really sh*tty anti-choice rhetoric and probs some cissexism.” There was outrage at the prospect of two people who “do not have uteruses” debating the subject of abortion, which local rabble-rousers claimed would “threaten the mental safety” of attendees. Threaten the mental safety!

With typical British institutional gutlessness, Christ Church called off the debate, citing “security and welfare issues.” The ringleader behind the banning of the debate penned an obnoxious, rambling screed in the Independent celebrating the silencing of two speakers whose “words and views might hurt women.”

The nonsensical Orwellianisms flowed thick and fast, with Niamh McIntyre in the same breath boasting “I helped shut down an abortion debate between two men because my uterus isn’t up for their discussion” and in another, pleading she “did not stifle free speech.”

What is to be done?

There is nothing that a good, firm paddling would not sort out in this horde of piss-stained little Hitlers. However, since we still live under the rule of law, the only option is to fight fire with fire. Organise against these creeps. Set up national databases of all student functionaries who peddle their brand of ideological terrorism (let's call it what it is) on British campuses.

Keep them under surveillance and restrict their freedom to spout their poison. Muslims can have their liberties restricted for preaching that might be considered as giving succour to ISIS and the like. Why should the peddlers of identity politics in the NUS not be treated in the same way?

Dossiers of such subversion should be circulated to employers, especially state employers. Once these mentally defective individuals are let loose unto the world, they will more often than not, through unemployability in the private sector, end up in state employment.

There, they are able to impose their mental deficiencies on the rest of the populations from a position of power, doing it with as little oversight as they do in the ivory tower campuses of academia. For that reason it's time to stop seeing the funny side to "jazz hands" and start treating the people who foist this stuff on the rest of us as what they are—cultural terrorists.

The Biggest Mistake Ted Cruz Ever Made

April 1, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by BADNET

Ted Cruz, Hispanic-American and United States Senator, is one hell of a guy.

Known for his fierce resistance to the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, (also known as Obamacare), he has decided to run for President in the 2016 election.

Only one problem.

He doesn't own his name.

Let's take a step back in time. Way back in 2008 there was a lowly real estate agent who decided to take his destiny into his own hands. He bought www.tedcruz.com and built this website:

Well, "real estate Ted Cruz" must have gone out of business, because after a few years his domain went dark. Then, sometime around the end of 2014 something interesting happened.

Some joker caught wind of Ted Cruz the Senator's upcoming bid for President. And this joker did a very smart thing. He bought up www.tedcruz.com and planted a pro-Obama message on it.

What can the real Ted Cruz do? Nothing. He is now helpless to control the conversation around him. You might think that page doesn't get much traffic, but from where I'm looking, it's firmly on the 2nd page of Google.

Plenty of voters tend to be older people. They didn't grow up with the internet. And like it or not, they tend to add a .com automatically to whatever they're looking for.

Say, something like "Ted Cruz .com."

Nowadays politicians know that much of their fundraising and campaigning is done online. So what is Ted Cruz going to do? He's going to ignore this problem as long as he can, and then he's going to settle with the domain owner. For a hefty payout.

All because he made the mistake of not owning his name online.

This is not a dumb man either. Cruz graduated as valedictorian of his high school in Houston. He graduated cum laude from Princeton. He won the US National Speaker of the Year award and went on to compete in the 1995 World Universities Debating Championship.

He graduated magna cum laude from Harvard Law School and his professor claimed him to be, "off-the-charts brilliant." But he was very obviously un-brilliant about managing his professional reputation online.

Now what's the lesson in here for you?

You might not decide to be famous today. But what about tomorrow?

- Maybe you'll want to own a brick-and-mortar business.
- Maybe you'll want your friends and family to easily get in touch with you.
- Maybe you just want to safeguard yourself from bullies and domain squatters who can harm your reputation.

A smart man should own his name. If your domain's still available (and nobody's decided to take it yet), you can grab it for free from BADNET.

If your domain's not available, you might have to pay for it out of pocket, but do what you can to get ahold of it. You never know how important it may be.

Ted Cruz can still buy this domain name if the website owner agrees. He certainly has the cash to do so. But can you afford that mistake?

Owning a domain name is cheap. You can grab one for free if you sign up for web hosting at BADNET.

But not owning one? That can do some damage.

Do you own your name?

5 Ways Porn Might Not Be Bad For Your Game

April 1, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There is a tendency in manosphere and game circles to regard pornography as a uniformly bad thing. Watching it saps time, energy, and the motivation to go and hit on girls in real life. This thinking is not mere conjecture. In the past, scientific studies have backed up the view that fap movies are linked to faltering physical desire, with psychiatrist Norman Doidge, author of The Brain That Changes Itself, noting that fans suffer "increasing difficulty in being turned on by their actual sexual partners, though they still consider them attractive" and have to fantasize about porn scenes while having sex.

But a new study of 280 men by the University of California suggests that porn might actually have a beneficial effect on its viewers, with a positive correlation indicated between time spent watching it and the desire to have sex. According to a report in The Daily Telegraph, men who watch porn are shown to score more highly for arousal than men who don't, and, contrary to popular belief, erectile dysfunction is not linked to the number of hours viewed.

Of course, it's possible to pick holes in a survey of this kind. 280 isn't the largest sample size (although it's statistically rigorous), and most of the respondents were in their twenties – let's face it, guys of that age are likely to be horny most of the time regardless. Also, it would seem likely that a guy who watches a lot of porn is going to be more sexual in general than one who doesn't. Still, the survey throws up some interesting questions that challenge received thinking in this area.

I am aware that I risk a backlash from the no-fap brigade here. Personally, my feelings about eschewing masturbation are mixed. I've tried no-fap periods and I haven't noticed any particular increase in focus and productivity at work, or indeed success with girls. In fact, the only tangible effect has been to give me a painful set of blue balls.

That said, I do recognize the value of limiting masturbation, and certainly refrain from it during times of the day when I'm working on projects (as it tends to sap my energy temporarily) and prior to a night out. Roosh has an interesting post on this here.

Of course, I have gone through long periods of avoiding porn altogether (it is possible to fap without it!), uncertain of its effects and nervous of going down the rabbit hole of addiction. But having also had phases when my usage has been relatively high, I am able to compare, and I can definitely state that it was during the latter that my sex drive has been at its height.

By the way, I don't intend to give wholesale endorsement to a survey that suggests that men should be casual about indulging in what for a minority can be a damaging habit. It's a little like those news articles that tell us that a glass of red wine a day is good for you – perhaps, but not if you're an alcoholic.

Therefore I would caution you to know your limits. If you find yourself watching porn to the exclusion of everything else then you are developing a compulsion and you should stop. But let's be honest – we now live in a world where well-produced, high-definition hard-core pornography is freely available in a volume that that has never been seen before.

It is naïve to assume that most guys who read ROK don't use it to a greater or lesser degree. Therefore, counter-intuitive as it may seem, it is worth considering those reasons why its judicious use might actually help your game.

1. It Puts You In A Permanently Horny Mood

Whatever your view of fap-matter might be, the fact is that it gets you horny. A YouPorn session is almost like a wake-up call, reminding you that sex is happening out there right now, and making you eager for a slice of the pie.

2. It Makes You See Girls As Sex Objects

The reason feminists complain about porn is because, in their view, it objectifies women. This is precisely why the committed swordsman can benefit from watching it. In order to truly cut a swath through the Elysium fields of top notch punani, it is necessary to objectify girls.

Seeing them as delicate individuals with complex thoughts and feelings leads to “nice guy” behavior, which, as we all know, dries snatch quicker than sand. Watching a succession of cute young things banging on camera will soon desensitize you to their individual quirks, and encourage you to pursue them for sex with single-minded intensity.

3. It Teaches You How to Be Good at Sex

Let’s face it, porn has done a far better job at teaching the mechanics of sex than generations’ worth of sex ed classes at high school ever have. Feminine-primary sources claim that porn creates unrealistic expectations of sex, and they might be right. But they also give young men (and women) a better drilling in the art of drilling than almost any other medium.

4. It Stops You From Thinking In Terms Of Good Girls vs. Bad Girls

Belle Knox – good girl from Duke gone bad

This excellent article illuminates an obvious truth. It’s very difficult to maintain the illusion that there are “good girls” and “bad girls” and that these groups are distinct from one another when one sees the sweetest, most angelic looking ladies taking part in the most debauched sexual acts imaginable on-screen.

The sheer volume of porn available in 2015 means that it is inevitable that a girl who looks and behaves almost exactly like the one up on that pedestal you’ve created for her is doing all sorts of outrageous things on a laptop near you now. There are no good girls – merely girls who have (so far) proved resistant to your own particular brand of game.

5. It Focuses Your Desire And Gives You Something to Aim For

Watching attractive women getting down on-screen demonstrates to your subconscious that sex is real and tangible, and somehow makes it seem more attainable, even if you're in the midst of a dry spell. It can also put the fire in your belly to pursue it.

In Sperm Wars, Robin Baker speculates that the reason that men are aroused by porn is that the sight of other guys sexing girls raises their desire to impregnate them with their own sperm, so there is at least the chance that they can genetically replicate. This competitive desire is retained after your porn session has ended and you are in the club, and you can harness it to your advantage.

As with everything, moderation is key. But don't be too quick to assume that porn, along with any other resource scorned by feminists and left-leaning media, is entirely without utility.

One Of The Most Inspirational Men On Earth

April 1, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

This will probably be quite a short article, since Alex Honnold essentially leaves me speechless. If you are not impressed with this 29-year-old, you should be; the drive and focus he shows is beyond human.

To get an idea of what he's devoted the last 10+ years of his life to, it's best to watch the 60 Minutes documentary, which details his ascent of a 3000-foot rock face "Sentinel" in Yosemite, completely free solo, WITH NO SAFETY ROPE.

The thing to understand here, is that he's not doing this to be some show-off badass, or to make money, he's doing it because it's what he's dedicated himself to. He lives in the back of a modest van and spends his time going between climbing venues.

The largest part of what he does is psychological, with perfect mastery and execution of climbing techniques that's taken hours of practice.

The 60 Minutes clip also contains some quite cool parts about base jumping and swimming with great white sharks, but Alex is the most inspirational as far as I am concerned. His section is at 15:30.

The armchair critics out there would probably deride him as selfish or egoistical,https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Fuu5JYwPIbg and yet what he does requires such a high level of focus, with any error causing certain death, that the level of mental control he must have developed to do what he does, gives us some hope that the human race may be able to wean itself off constant smart phone abuse and mindless trivia.

There really isn't any room for ego or pride in a sport like this. There isn't even room for the slightest error. Let's see some of these puffed-up NBA stars and rappers take on a real death-defying challenge.

This is another clip worth watching, a interview with Alex, although the interviewer is a bit of a douchebag asking stupid questions and waffling on, you see Alex's mindset.

He dropped out of college to do what he loves and has lived on next to nothing, although I expect media and book offers are coming his way now. There are always rewards of success for those who do not seek instant material gain AND have the tenacity to see it through.

Some of the peaks that Alex has climbed free solo with no safety rope were thought in the 1950s to be impossible to climb AT ALL, while the first mountaineers who attempted them took weeks, working in teams and commuting up and down each day to eke out a few hundred feet per day.

When he did decide to use a rope and work with a climbing partner, they hammered out seven peaks at Yosemite in seven days, breaking speed records on four of the faces.

> Climbing just one route on El Capitan — the biggest and best cliff in North America — in a single day is a lifetime achievement for most people, an achievement that is usually followed by a day or two of rest. But Alex Honnold and David Allfrey aren't most people: They are two of the best speed climbers alive today. So it's no surprise that when David and Alex set out to climb seven El Cap routes in seven days, they did more than simply complete the climbs — they smoked them!

- New Jersey Turnpike (12 hours 24 minutes — new speed record)
- Tangerine Trip (9:28 — new speed record)
- Eagle's Way (7:56 — new speed record)
- Nose (5:16)
- Lurking Fear (5:05)
- Zodiac (5:05)
- Triple Direct (5:15 — new speed record)

I am not suggesting that anyone runs out and becomes a mountaineer, much less free soloing with no safety rope – each to his own. What I am doing is showing you one man's determination and drive under the most extraordinary circumstances.

When Alex starts up a 2000-foot face, there is no turning back whatsoever. It is literally impossible to go down unless he slips and is in free fall. Random risks such as bird or ants nests can take his life and still up he goes; preparing himself mentally for his ascent, that might take several hours.

Essentially what Alex shows us is a 21st Century version of Zen mind control. Doing something in its most pure form, purely for the sake of doing it, perfecting it and being absolutely in the moment, while testing the skill (and mind control) against a back drop of certain death. This is a challenge that most men have never taken on.

So the next time you are having some difficulty and feeling frustrated with something or someone, just imagine what it's like halfway up a 3000-foot rock face with only your fingers to rely on—and re-focus yourself.

The pea brain will probably have all kinds of ideas about extreme sports being lame replacements for real masculine pursuits or run some mindless debate, to try to excuse its own lack of focus, discipline, and drive. The fact remains that YOU and the other 6,999,999,998 people on Earth CANNOT DO THIS, in large part because they lack the mental skill.

And that is truly inspiring.

How To Use Different Kratom Strains To Accomplish Your Goals

April 1, 2015 | by Sponsored Post | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Island Lion Herbals

Return Of Kings readers are probably already aware of Kratom and all of the amazing benefits this magical plant provides. With all of the different types and strains of Kratom available on the market, it's important to know which ones to purchase in order to treat specific symptoms, or to achieve specific goals.

What's most confusing about finding the correct strains for your needs is the fact that there are no established or standardized naming conventions for the different strains. To further complicate matters, many vendors give their own Kratom products and blends branded names, so there are sometimes dozens of different names for the same products.

The easiest and most common way to differentiate strains is using the naming system the farmers and plantations in southeast Asia typically use: color of vein + area of origin.

All kratom can be broken down into three types, based on the color of the vein on the leaves: red, white, and green. There are also horn varieties, yellows, and golds, but these are hybrids.

- Red vein strains are effective for relieving pain, anxiety, and insomnia.
- White vein strains are great for treating depression, increasing productivity, and increased energy and focus. Many use white vein strains first thing in the morning as a healthy substitute for coffee.
- Green vein strains are the mid-range, providing a milder boost in energy, focus and mood. Much like you wouldn't take espresso shots late in the day, green strains are better than white strains for daily use in the afternoon and evening.

Though there are now myriad hybrid and exotic strains of kratom and it is now grown in many different countries, all Kratom plant genetics trace back to three countries: Malaysia (aka Malay), Thailand (aka Thai), and Indonesia (aka Indo).

- Malay strains are good for focus
- Thai strains are good for energy
- Indonesian strains are sometimes labeled as Indo, or sometimes further broken down by the area of Indonesia where they originated. Their unique regional genetics come with different relative levels of different alkaloids, and thus they have different properties. Examples include Sumatra and Riau strains from western Indonesia, and Borneo/Bali and Kalimantan strains from eastern Indonesia.

Maeng Da strains are said to originate from a specific plantation in Indonesia that marketed their product as “genetically grown,” manipulating plant DNA to create the perfect Thai strain. The strain itself was lost, but through hybrid crossbreeding, the higher potency genes have survived and are frequently crossed with local varieties to create a “Maeng Da” (literally, “pimp grade”) potency. These days, Maeng Da isn’t a strain so much as a marker of a very powerful kratom strain.

Best strains for specific symptoms

Pain relief (strongest to weakest)

1. Red Vein Bali/Red Vein Borneo (Bali strains are actually from Borneo)
2. Red Vein Indo
3. Red Maeng Da Malaysian

Dosage – moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Relaxation (most sedative to least). These are useful for unwinding after a long day of work, or for helping you sleep.

1. Red Maeng Da Thai
2. Red Vein Bali/Red Vein Borneo
3. Red Vein Indo

Dosage: moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Anxiety Relief

1. Red Vein Bali/ Red Vein Borneo
2. Red Vein Indo

Dosage: moderate (2-4.5 grams)

Energy (most stimulation to least):

1. White Vein Maeng Da
2. White Vein Borneo
3. Green Vein Thai
4. Green Vein Malaysian

Dosage: moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Mood (most mood-boosting to least)

1. Green Vein Thai
2. Green Vein Borneo

3. Maeng Da Malaysian

Dosage: moderate (2-4.5 grams)

Depression (most euphoric to least)

1. Green Vein Thai
2. White Vein Maeng Da
3. White Vein Malaysian

Dosage – moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Immune System Stimulation – for the flu or a cold, many take Kratom at the first sign of symptoms to dramatically reduce their downtime.

1. Green Vein Malaysian
2. Green Vein Borneo

Dosage – low (1-2 grams) to moderate (2-4.5 grams)

If you want to crush your obstacles and achieve your goals, make sure you enhance your body and mind in equal amounts, and as naturally as possible. Kratom is one of those hidden jewels that make the difference between a good man and a great one.

Much like anything else, it's a tool not a toy, and should be treated with respect. That's why it's important to make sure you have the right tool for the job, and the right kratom for the symptoms you're hoping to overcome. With the right strains, the sky really is the limit.

Island Lion Herbals offers sophisticated relaxation for upscale clientele. All of our premium Kratom powder is imported directly from the source in southeast Asia and is organic, lab-tested, and contaminant-free.

The Many Ways Education Delays Adulthood

April 2, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Education keeps people in a constant state of childhood by virtue of its very nature. Just think of your stereotypical frat or sorority, partying and living for the now. Going to classes you hate, doing assigned work without pay, and hearing moral lectures about character development. Does that sound like third grade or college?

Add in how people now take six years for a four-year degree and then go back for graduate degrees, and we have a society of 30-year-olds who have never functioned as full adults.

Almost everything I learned in college I could have learned on the internet. Nor did I even do much studying or socializing. I just wanted to get my degree and be done while hating every person who asked me, “What are you going to do with that?” It was a waste of a liberal arts education, something to check off of life’s list. I had (and somewhat still have) no idea what adults do for money and wasn’t very interested in finding out.

But this doesn’t begin with college. It starts much earlier. For most of human history, when you hit adolescence, you were an adult and were expected to act like one. Today when you hit puberty, you have at least another ten years left of childhood, and you find yourself in this weird mix of adult maturity and idealistic juvenility.

The Value Of An Education

The worst part of it all is that there is little actually learned from all the education. I had maybe three outstanding teachers in all of primary and secondary school who made a difference in the way my mind works. The social studies teachers were the worst, since they all seemed to only be there so they could coach sports. It takes a special kind of imbecile to make something as interesting as history into a rote chore.

The math teachers taught to memorize the formulae, but they never taught why the formulae work, which is the whole purpose of learning advanced math. You will likely never use most of your high school math, but it's important because of the way it rewires your brain to think logically.

But they robbed that from us, not just at the high school level but also at the elementary. So we have a whole generation of people who think "I'm just an English person" and take pride in their ability to not be able to move numbers around in their head.

Yet my school—like most public and private schools—strangely did not offer any logic or philosophy classes while having a plethora of science, fine arts, and leadership electives. The most important classes that taught you analytical thinking were never offered, but you could get credit for computer typing class.

In fairness, my state had the third worst public schools in the country. But I get a strong impression that most of this is present everywhere in public schools.

Shoehorning Teenagers Into The Liberal Arts

Just up until my freshman year, the school offered two paths to graduation—the vocational path and the university path. But they got rid of the vocation path, and now the kids who wanted to study a trade despite the incessant shaming and lack of support had to go to a magnet school. The magnet school of course didn't have many staples of high school like athletics, because society has decided to limit funding on programs that teach kids the possibility of failure.

By some miracle my high school offered Latin, but most schools have cast it aside because "You'll never speak it," as though your two years of spoon-fed Spanish made you anything close to proficient. Again, the administrators and teachers misunderstand why a subject is taught. Foreign language is important not so that you can speak it but so that you can better understand how the English language fits together.

The English classes were rudimentary and heavily politicized. We read all sorts of boring poetry about carpe diem, which was the teachers' way of telling us to go to college. We read Shakespeare three of the four years, but I never understood how to appreciate him until George Orwell taught me. And despite a childhood full of college prep and English classes, ask any freshman-level college adjunct professor how bad the students' grammar, spelling, and general rhetoric is at their own native language.

A Better Solution

It's clear that high school has become a babysitting service for biological adults. Wouldn't it be better to skip the whole thing and transition 14-year-olds into being productive members of society? Or if you insist they must go to school, have them learn a money-making trade?

If kids learned a trade at that age, then at least they could financially support the babies they keep making. Despite the propaganda and pleading to delay, most teenagers will have sex because that is what teenagers do. Teenage girls are especially fertile compared to women just five years older. It would be better to channel that energy into something useful for society instead of repressing it.

Instead they spend four years being coddled and entertained while draining tax dollars instead of generating them. Think of how much money the government could save if we cut all public secondary schools. And if only the very few rich kids had high school diplomas, then employers would no longer expect them out of applicants. So someone explain to me why we insist on perpetuating this money hole, because it's clearly making young people dysfunctional.

Shooting For The Bottom

Part of the issue is that people insist all education must be equal, at least within an individual school system. But there are many demographics spread over a single county. Completely equal education must meet the lowest common denominator, or else those from a lesser socio-economic background will either flunk out of high school or make too poor of scores to go to a good college where they can flunk out.

Another issue is that kids are taught to always every time defer to the authorities instead of solving their own problems. I get that kids shouldn't beat the absolute shit out of each other on the school playground, but today any amount of mild violence has severe penalties, often even when in self-defense.

And this does not merely cover physical violence, but also responding to insults with other insults. This teaches children that they cannot and should not try their best to work through whatever difficulties life brings them. Instead, just file a complaint and wait for it to work.

An Alternative Family

They tell you that you go to school to learn, but the parents also expect the schools to teach a moral agenda. I had abstinence week three times, two of which were school-wide. Not abstinence day, but abstinence week. They never technically lied to us, but they heavily implied that condoms and pills were worthless.

And my Christian mother thought it was wonderful. What, you thought this was just a leftist thing? It's the Christians who think their kids will grow up to be atheists if they don't waste two minutes of every morning teaching prayer in schools.

But whereas the Christians make a desperate grab at what little influence they still have, it is the left that dominates the narrative. Remember in the 90s constantly hearing about the rain forests? I suppose they figured a group of eight-year-olds could save the world by donating their allowance.

Whatever happened to the rain forest? You never hear about it anymore. I'm assuming they either finally finished cutting it all down, or the left found a new pet cause like global warming or breast cancer. I'm just glad that I was born after the AIDS fad.

Not that any of the propaganda worked. We had more anti-smoking education than anyone else, but my generation has kept the tobacco industry alive and flourishing now that their old consumers are dying off. Frankly, it's the best anti-depressant on the market.

Most generations in human history had a mother and father to parent them, but instead we had television and public schools. Notice how excessively motherly elementary school teachers are, which I find totally inappropriate. They build a close relationship with the (female) students for a year and then suddenly disappear.

There are less professional ethics in the school system than in what young white liberals assume is the average police force. And nobody calls them out on it because, remember, the parents want to outsource their own job.

Hmm…I wonder why homeschooling has become so popular lately?

Game Could Have Saved 150 Lives In The Germanwings Disaster

April 2, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Last Tuesday Germanwings Flight 9525 crashed in the French Alps, killing all 150 people aboard, which included 144 passengers and 6 crew members. The usual questions and investigations ensued in the wake of the tragedy and as the answers came swarming in, it became evident that the Airbus A320 was likely crashed intentionally by 27-year-old Andreas Lubitz.

Since 9/11 our first reflex in any plane crash is to suspect terrorism. But an unexpected twist emerged as details of Lubitz's mental health and broken relationship came to the forefront. Since then it's become obvious that the event that caused his mental break and drove him to fly a plan into a mountain was being dumped by his long-time girlfriend, Kathrin Goldbach, who is pregnant with his child.

Goldbach

Roissy showed a bit of clairvoyance before any of Lubitz's personal life came to light and accurately speculated that his suicide could have been because of a recent breakup, and cited the picture below to back up his suspicions:

He then hits the bullseye with his second of ten possible explanations for this catastrophe:

> 2. Beta male rage. He suffered a recent breakup and took it out on himself and 150 strangers.

While it isn't surprising this was predicted by an unplugged member of the 'sphere, it's worth noting that this event has much of the same stench as the Elliot Rodger mass murder and suicide last May and maybe even a dash of the Andrew Stern calamity.

There are differences to be sure, but the commonality these three events share is that lives were lost because a man lost his shit over his dealings with the opposite sex. The Germanwings crash only further confirms one of the many unshakable truths we teach in the 'sphere: Game saves lives.

Lubitz's beta tells

How do I look?

When a man lashes out and kills people over a woman, he's got beta blood running through his veins. It's reported that Lubitz was banging a stewardess on the side, but given his personality and behavior leading up to the crash, that can hardly be described as "alpha."

In the wake of his death, his alleged side chick dropped this gem that all but confirmed his beta status:

> He was always seeking assurances about the way he looked and the way he was viewed by others.

The matrix-engulfed public seems to be dismissing this statement and treating it as a throw-away element, but men here know that validation-seeking tendencies are detrimental to both men and women alike for obvious reasons.

Control freak

Another clear indication of Lubitz's lack of game were his attempts to micromanage his girlfriend's actions. Goldbach's friends regaled the media with stories of his insecurity and jealous rants. He even forbid her to speak to anyone with a penis without his approval:

> He tried to order her what to wear, what men she could speak to, even the length of her skirts. He was a control freak of the highest order.

There are many ways to effectively control your woman's behavior—this isn't one of them. Attention withdrawal and dread game are two of many ways a man can nip his girlfriend's natural proclivities to self-destruct via cock in the bud.

Not the right way to do it

I'm certain that more details from his tumultuous relationship with Goldbach will undoubtedly make its way into the news cycle as her friends will continue to attention whore their way into stardom at their pregnant friend's expense.

Lubitz had Alpha potential

Although Lubitz went out like a sniveling beta, believe it or not he actually had the tools to be an alpha. Yes, he was a control freak and yes, he sought validation from persons other than the man in the mirror.

But if we put on our neomasculine spectacles and read between the lines of these accounts, it's quite easy to see that he had all the makings of a man who could tickle the loins of hot young females.

1. He was a pilot

Chicks dig dudes with a skill or a status most men don't have. Flying a plane is one that embodies both. The responsibility of manning an aircraft hurling through the air at over 500+ mph at 30,000+ feet is a trade that precious few men on this earth are lucky enough to attain and there's no doubt in my mind that played a major role in Goldbach's attraction to her suicidal fiancée.

ROK columnist A. V. Yader can attest to the pussy-pulling effects of a pilot's license. This explains why pilots find themselves in the panties of stewardesses on the regular, which leads to the next alpha move Lubitz didn't recognize and channel correctly…

2. He had an affair with a flight attendant

Pre-selection is a standard game tenet because girls don't want a man that other women don't want. Infidelity, though initially detrimental to relationships upon discovery, brings out strong emotions in girls namely love, hate, passion, and dread (read: chick crack).

I mentioned earlier that Lubitz was said to have been romantically involved with a stewardess named Maria. Goldbach wasn't exactly over the moon about this, but that didn't stop her from trying to work things out:

> She was optimistic that they could together get his problems under control. It is understood the couple took a holiday together shortly before the crash.

Those of us in the know understand the psychological elements involved in Goldbach's motivations. If Lubitz were armed with this knowledge he might still be enjoying the undying loyalty of a female willing to bring his child into the world despite his cheating ways.

3. Bad boy potential

Lubitz's erratic behavior and mental health issues have predictably served as the de facto answer(s) for his murder and suicide. It would be foolish to dismiss his history of depression and steady diet of antipsychotics as one of the factors that led to his sticky end.

His unpredictable exploits, however, show us that he had the bad boy tendencies women love and maybe even the potential for shades of a Dark Triad trait or two.

Described as both manipulative and volatile by the people who knew him best, Lubitz unknowingly had natural game he didn't know he had or how to use. Put those together with his tryst with the stewardess and this pilot turned murderer could have been a jerkboy extraordinaire armed with the antidote to stave off the oneitis that eventually drove him to take his own life.

What's this all mean?

Both the media and the public at large wants to characterize this tragedy as the typical case of a demented male who went off his meds and killed a bunch of people. They are consistently highlighting Lubitz's history of mental illnesses, his anxiety over losing his job, and the stash of pills they found at his place as the main causes for his psychotic break.

There's no doubt those ingredients certainly played a role in his coming unglued, but red pillers know that being dumped by his fiancée is what pushed him over the edge. The world seems to be playing catch up and is starting to give a little more credence to what we already know to be true which, incidentally, only serves to further increase the perceived high value of females.

The raw truth to all of this is that had Lubitz had game this would not have happened. Game improves a man in every way imaginable but more importantly it also acts as a natural cure for mental illness. It's very difficult for a man to slip into depression when his mind and body are strong.

[image]
No way this guy flies off the handle

A man who has a solid sense of self and overall satisfaction with both life and who he is as a person is a man who is all but immune to conditions like oneitis and homicidal or suicidal ideation. If Lubitz, Rodger, and Stern had even an ounce of neomasculine wisdom they and their victims might still be alive today.

Andreas Lubitz had all the makings of someone who could live a dominant and fulfilling life. He had a pretty young girl pregnant with his child and hopelessly committed to him, regular action with a flight attendant on the side, and an exciting profession which would have provided him with a enough money to live a comfortable life.

All he needed was a bit of game to solidify himself as a man. Unfortunately for him, 149 other people, and his unborn child, Lubitz never took the red pill.

Game saves lives, gentlemen, and you can bet your ass incidents like this will increase in frequency in the coming years.

SJWs Pile On Daily Show’s Trevor Noah Over “Offensive” Tweets

April 2, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

South African comedian Trevor Noah recently found himself on the receiving end of a social justice warrior witch hunt thanks to “offensive” comments he made. The 31-year-old comic, recently tapped to replace Jon Stewart as host of Comedy Central’s The Daily Show, was the target of left-wing hysterics due to several “anti-Semitic” and “misogynistic” Tweets he’d made over the years:

> Almost bumped a Jewish kid crossing the road. He didn't look b4 crossing but I still would hav felt so bad in my german car!
> — Trevor Noah (@Trevornoah) September 18, 2009

> Behind every successful Rap Billionaire is a double as rich Jewish man. #BeatsByDreidel
> — Trevor Noah (@Trevornoah) May 12, 2014

> South Africans know how to recycle like israel knows how to be peaceful.
> — Trevor Noah (@Trevornoah) June 2, 2010

> "Oh yeah the weekend. People are gonna get drunk & think that I'm sexy!" – fat chicks everywhere.

> — Trevor Noah (@Trevornoah) October 14, 2011

The irony of accusing Noah—a soi-disant progressive who is part Jewish and whose mother was imprisoned for breaking South Africa's apartheid-era anti-miscegenation laws because of her relationship with his white father—of being anti-Semitic was lost on the screeching baboons calling for his head:

> Jews, "untermenschen", "fat chicks" & "girls with big asses" – subjects of @Trevornoah's low-brow humour. Jon Stewart's replacement, folks!
> — Ariana Gic (@GicAriana) March 31, 2015

> Hey @ComedyCentral your new hire @Trevornoah = racist Jew hater
> — Ari David (@AriDavidUSA) March 31, 2015

To Comedy Central's credit, they've refused to bow to these Cotton Mathers of Twitter and will retain Noah as Stewart's successor. Noah has also fired back at his critics, declaring that "to reduce my views to a handful of jokes that didn't land is not a true reflection of my character, nor my evolution as a comedian." Unfortunately, the fact that the fracas even happened to begin with is indicative of a worrying trend in American society.

What If They Held An Open Mic And No One Laughed?

Lost in the pearl-clutching comments over Noah's "offensiveness" is the fact that the highlighted jokes weren't funny, a fact which he himself acknowledged. As my friend, comedian Yale Cohn, put it:

> Trevor Noah's Jew jokes don't offend me as a Jew, they offend me as a comedian. #DailyShow reporting from #Hackistan http://t.co/2ohmbSSNwK
> — Yale Cohn (@YaleCohn) March 31, 2015

Comedy by its very nature is going to offend some people, because the entire nature of stand-up is about using humor to examine taboo subjects. To paraphrase the late Patrice O'Neal, in comedy, somebody has to get hurt. The legends of stand-up—George Carlin, Lenny Bruce, Richard Pryor et al.—were beloved precisely because they took uncomfortable topics and made them into side-splitting comedy acts. In a Time article defending Noah, comedian Jim Norton made this point in scathing fashion:

> The image people have of comedians staring defiantly over a stationary line of good taste is simply inaccurate. We don't approach this line, put our toes over it arrogantly and then scamper back to safety. The line doesn't exist. The correct image for people to have is one of a circle, with a comedian standing in the middle of it, surrounded by a myriad of races, religions, social beliefs, sacred cows and political ideologies. And in these groups are endless numbers of sub groups and personal boundaries. There is simply no way to consistently do the type of comedy that addresses these things without upsetting somebody. No matter which direction you turn to aim the joke, someone is getting hit. And while the person who has been hit jumps up and down and exaggerates their injuries, everyone else in the circle is telling them to shut up and learn to take a joke. Until they themselves get hit.

The SJW ninnies raking Noah over the coals for comments he made years ago are the spiritual successors of the censors who hounded beloved comedy icons like Lenny Bruce and tried to get them blacklisted and ruined. It's impossible to espouse a brand of comedy that is completely inoffensive and acceptable to everyone watching, because everyone has different tastes and things that upset them. If SJWs get their way, all comedy will be as bland and neutered as Clean Comedians.

The SJW Bigotry Time Machine

The other, more disturbing facet of the SJW witch hunt against Noah is the fact that most of the comments they were having conniption fits over were made years ago. For example, his Tweet about nearly running over a Jewish kid in his German car was dated September 18, 2009.

The manufactured outrage against Noah has echoes of the victimization of former Business Insider CTO Pax Dickinson. In 2013, Dickinson was the target of a Valleywag article castigating him for satirical Tweets he'd made over the years, many from when he was almost unknown and his Twitter account was only followed by family and friends. Despite the fact that Dickinson was well-liked by his colleagues and had received no complaints about his conduct at work, he was fired after Gawker hatchet-men Nitasha Tiku and Sam Biddle whipped up a Twitter frenzy against him.

The fact that SJWs are so eager to defenestrate public figures—even fellow travelers like Trevor Noah—over comments made in the past is absolutely chilling. Because it's impossible to predict what the Twitter twits of tomorrow will be offended by, this means that anyone could potentially be a target of their wrath. As Return of Kings publisher Roosh satirized in his short story "The Denouncer," even seemingly innocuous remarks could draw the ire of professional Puritans and the loss of employment and income that comes with it.

As noted above, the fact that Comedy Central is standing by Noah despite the attacks against him is commendable. However, the existence of a vocal minority of self-appointed cultural commissars with the power to ruin lives is worrying for the future of America. A group of people who form a lynch mob over a couple of bad jokes are effectively foot soldiers for a new form of tyranny.

Science Proves Women Use The Word “Slut” As Much As Men

April 3, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In news that flew under the radar last year for obvious reasons, UK think tank Demos found that women slut-shame and use the word “rape” to offend as much as men. Thus, science confirms what you already knew: women use the word “slut” pejoratively and embrace additional epithets against other women without ever being held accountable for it.

Far from a tiny sample, the study analyzed many tens of thousands of tweets containing the words “rape”, “slut,” and “whore.” The findings motivate us to ask why, even if we accept the farcically low modern threshold for being called a misogynist, men are called out for “woman-hating” many times more than women.

This study, others like it, and our anecdotal experiences confirm that women fit the bill of “misogyny” in as many cases as men.

What does this say about SlutWalk?

SlutWalk, aimed at vilifying men, is therefore a sham because it blames men for “misogynistic” attitudes expressed just as much by women. If feminists acknowledged this, which they never will openly, they’d be forced to concede that just as many women as men are misogynists under their very own definitions. But that would be bad.

After all, only disgusting, sexist men are ever guilty of working intuitively against the interests of women. Women are inveterate victims.

A big kudos must go to Time, and others, for publishing the findings last year. Whilst there are still significant and persisting coverage gaps, the publication has drastically improved its impartiality in recent years, airing several contrarian, red pill-like views on campus rape myths, the gender wage "gap" and in this situation slut-shaming.

I will not pretend that the Time piece did not meander towards political correctness and backtrack to avoid being attacked by SJW's, but it's a start.

This is the most common context in which a woman will be called a slut. So why aren't there specific High School or Sorority SlutWalks?

As red-pillers, we are used to pillorying the media. It is important to recognize those elements where some truth comes out, and then seize that truth. We won't get many opportunities for this.

Out of interest, did Jezebel cover this gender symmetry in slut-shaming story? Or Jessica Valenti? Or anyone from the isolated-from-reality tribe of feminist pharisees? "Slut" has historically been such an amorphous concept, unexplored by scientific inquiry. And now that we have more proof of how it is actually used on a gender-to-gender basis, feminists are silent. I wonder why.

That poor police officer

For those of you not in the loop (completely understandable), SlutWalk claims its origins from comments made by a Toronto police officer, Michael Sanguinetti. His name is already in the public domain, invariably to attack him, so mentioning him here is to counter that highly selective and unjustified criticism—unjustified in the sense that he verbalized opinions held and uttered by a substantial number of women.

Sanguinetti advised college students not to dress as "sluts" to avoid being victimized. Rare words from a public or municipal official, granted, but absolutely on the low end of the spectrum compared to what you and I hear on the streets.

The most likely bullying a woman will receive, including slut-shaming, is from other women.

When I go to clubs, fully 80% of the instances where “slut” is said come from women, usually to slag a fellow female rival. Girls will have drunken sex with a guy and tell us about their regret, only for other women to say, “Well, she brought it on herself.”

When a woman claims to have been sexually assaulted, again, other women are the first to use the s-word behind her back if they don’t believe her. Sometimes they even do believe her, or don’t dispute the principal facts. But the s-word is again flopped out.

How can women “reclaim” a word they already use incessantly?

The biggest existential and logical threat to feminism is the ignorance of equivalent female behavior. Only men are held accountable. When men use the s-word, it’s obviously, according to feminists, male privilege, patriarchy, and the affirmation of sexual violence against women.

Female use of “slut,” on the other hand, is dismissed as the result of patriarchal brainwashing, if it’s conceded at all. Women are conditioned to behave that way. Remember, they’re victims. That’s why they use the word, we swear! Because of this, most of the time the paradox is never even mentioned. Never even mentioned.

If approximately 50% of people using the word are female, it’s even worse. Surely women are best placed to understand. Because a man is rarely called a slut, he has much more of an “ignorance excuse” to use it. He doesn’t know the “pain” of the word first-hand, as feminists would put it.

I don’t see this creature confronting women using the word “slut.”

When 50% of people using this female-oriented word are women, it’s equivalent to 95% being women if the term were gender-neutral. Women know the import of the word more than men, repeat our feminist friends ad nauseam… yet they use it just as much. Get your misogynistic, ROK-reading minds around that one.

Women own the term “slut.” You hear it from female lips at every high school, in every nightclub corner, and daily on the open street. And when you use it, you must take responsibility for it.

That’s a far cry from the inverted SlutWalk world where “slut” is only heard from men’s mouths.

Do You Want To Save The World?

April 3, 2015 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

What do starving children in Africa and polar bears losing their ice have in common? They are both devices used to appeal to emotion in order to take your money. Their survival or lack thereof has no impact whatsoever on your life, but people harp on them to get you to care, for their benefit, not yours.

Why do they do it?

They do it because it works. It works because people do not realize that not caring is the better option. By not caring about these and other activist causes, they will cease to have power. Also, telling some telemarketer you don't care instead of some lame "I don't have money this month” excuse gets you blacklisted from charities real quick.

Remember, it was “i got my mind on my money and my money on my mind” not “I got my mind on the polar bears.” Do you want to retain resources for yourself and things you actually care about? If so, stop caring about things that do not impact you.

If a man had the discipline not to be wasteful, these parasites that want your money for their pet causes would disappear quickly. They continue to exist, though, because not enough people tell them no.

You might think giving $5 to the girl extolling the necessity to save orphans in Darfur is a quick and easy way to keep things moving on the subway, but it merely feeds this beast of suicidal altruism. Having the discipline to leave these social justice types hanging is key to getting them to stop.

Third party observers that are not zombies will see that you are not bending to the will of a dipshit, meaning that you actually have a backbone. If they see you as selfish and miserly, then you probably don’t want to enjoy their company anyways.

The characteristics of charity looters

One of the first things I have noticed about those who solicit me is they appear weak and meek. Whether its some skinny hipster asking me to donate to xyz at the coffee shop, or some big organization that wants to deprive me of money, time, or legal freedom by utilizing the subterfuge of emotional appeal or social conformity, they cannot be direct. This lack of candor is close enough to dishonesty for me to dismiss them immediately.

Speaking of social conformity, it is a powerful weapon to get people to do things that are not in their best interest. It is visible everywhere, from Apple earphones to women wearing the same leggings and boots as each other. The use of social conformity is imprecise, though—it is not agile enough to react to the smart non-conformist.

When one stops caring, those who wish to persuade you cannot change the direction of the herd fast enough to rope you in. To counter this weakness in getting people to behave a certain way outside of their own interests, other options are examined. Remember, if they cannot get you to care, they cannot get your money. Do you really want to be that guy that goes along to get along?

One of the best indicators that not caring is effective is what these activists do when their cause peters out. They appeal to government. If you don't want to donate, they will just get it through tax dollars. What they do not realize at the "grassroots" level is that co-opting government power turns people away from their cause—well, at least the productive citizens.

No one likes paying higher taxes. This trumps the well-being of sand fleas on NoOneCares Island. It also exposes the true intentions of the higher-ups of these various activist organizations. Everyone sees Al Gore as the greedy hypocrite he is after his advocacy for clean energy.

The merits of not caring about things unrelated to you are simple. You get to keep your money, there are fewer restrictions on you, and it exposes these do-gooders for the control freaks they really are. If they cannot control you through the soft power of emotional appeal and social conformity, they have to switch to the hard power of laws and regulations.

Whenever an organization or movement makes this switch, the truth comes out. In conclusion, I will only care about nonsense when they make me care about nonsense.

3 Fundamental Truths About The Universe You Learn From Lifting Weights

April 3, 2015 | by Aaron Simon | Link | Original Link

A man's experience in weight lifting, strength training, and bodybuilding reveal to him certain fundamental truths about the nature of the universe and the reality we live in. Here are three of them.

1. You get out what you put in Progress and achievement in anything is always directly proportional to the effort one puts in.

Life is like a farmer's field, where seeds can be planted to later yield a crop. If you plant rotten seeds, or don't plant any at all, the yield will reflect this.

By contrast, if you plant many seeds and in fertile ground, then your future will be rich with the rewards of your previous efforts.

This concept of "you reap what you sow" is as clear in the gym as anywhere else. Physical changes in your body are directly proportional to the effort you put into your workouts, diet, and overall lifestyle.

If you try to "cheat" by skipping a workout or eating garbage food, you may get short-term pleasure but in the end you are only cheating yourself.

In the gym you will always see bad action reflected in your results, likewise with good action. Everything counts and there is no escaping it.

So it is with everything in life, from making money in a business to being successful with girls and getting laid. It's an immutable law of the universe that you get out what you put in, and it's obvious in the gym.

2. There is inherent duality in everything

Everything in the universe is characterized by an underlying duality.

Light and dark, up and down, masculine and feminine, duality is everywhere you look. You can't have one without the other.

Likewise with building muscle and progress in the gym. In order to make any gains, you need to lift hard and break down your muscles. But equally you need rest, proper nutrition, and recovery. You can't have one without the other.

If you only lift (biceps everyday YOLO), you'll end up injuring yourself and won't make any progress. And if you only rest, you'll become a sedentary average person with no muscle mass and a poor physique.

An equal balance of aggressive action (forcing things to happen) and passive resting (allowing things to grow on their own) is necessary to build muscle.

You need both elements, and this is where the underlying principle of duality is clear. This is the constant cycle of “back and forth” that is always present; the polarity that characterizes the universe.

3. A valuable result comes only after a difficult, lengthy, and time consuming process

Unless you take steroids right from the start, it takes a long time in the gym to actually start looking “good.”

This can be discouraging for beginners, and it doesn’t help that expectations are often heavily skewed by

- Misinformation from the mainstream media
- Ignorance of the general public about fitness and nutrition
- The fact that most fitness models and celebrities take steroids
- Internet marketers selling fanciful “30 day transformations”
- Outrageous claims of progress from the (unregulated) supplement industry

It can be hard to accept that your initial goal for lifting (not too big, I just want to look like Greg Plitt!) may not even be possible without steroids.

But the reality is that it will take many months or even years for your body to (naturally) start to look the way you want it to.

However, a lengthy process preceding the result is the case with everything in life.

If you want to be better than 90-95% of people at anything, you will have to take consistent action, on a daily basis, for at least several years.

Results are nothing but the product of many small efforts over time and all together this is what amounts to (way) more than the average person ever puts in.

Anything worth achieving in life will take a long time and a lot of hard work, and this fundamental truth becomes clear when you strive for success in the gym.

3 Problems Where We Must Treat The Source And Not The Symptom

April 4, 2015 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

It’s easy to look at the surface of the major issues we see around us and deal with personally. However, it’s much harder, yet so much more effective, to look at the actual, deeper source of the problems in order to find truly effective, long lasting solutions.

Here are just three random, but universally important issues that we see come up over and over either in our lives or in our culture:

1. A Deeper Approach To Racism Among Cops

It’s easy to accuse the cops who shoot Blacks of being racist, but it takes a deeper and more candid look to recognize that their behavior is a natural, albeit inexcusable, response to a specific experience. If cops weren’t put in an environment where they see the worst of the worst of one single race day in and day out, they might not be in such a hurry to pull a gun on them.

Perhaps the first step to addressing racist incidents is making sure that police are moved around and get to see the good and the bad of every race.

2. A Deeper Approach To Losing Weight

You can’t tell yourself or anyone else who wants to lose weight to simply stop overeating. It’s way easier said than done, and it’s just not going to work. A far more fundamental question that they need to address in order to start eating less is discovering the true reason they are compelled to overeat is in the first place.

Are you overeating because you stuck in suburbia and bored to death, having your life hobbies reduced to pot, Facebook, and junk food? Or are you overeating because you think that you have to finish every huge pile of food you’re served at a restaurant?

Maybe, you are struggling with losing weight because you underestimate the effort and the time it takes to shed those pounds, and it’s time to stop expecting to lose a pound every time you run on a treadmill for 15 minutes. Losing weight and building a more attractive body requires exploring the reasons behind poor nutrition and lack of exercise.

3. A Deeper Approach To Game

Meeting girls and game in general is no different. We all know how ineffective that "just be yourself" and "fake it till you make it" advice is when it comes to confidence in general, and confidence with women specifically. It's almost like saying "don't do anything at all, and things will just fall in their place on their own" is if that kind of miracle ever happens. This kind of generic, superficial advice has never actually helped any guy approach a girl, talk to her, ask her out, or otherwise make a move when the time and place are right.

A longer but far more effective road toward real confidence with girls is asking yourself what it is that's missing from your life—that is, your personality and your accomplishments that would make you proud of who you are. It's true – making tons of money, getting a good degree, getting ripped, and buying new clothes are not going to turn a true beta into a true alpha, but it surely will put you way ahead in the right direction.

Making excuses for why you don't have that degree, or that good job, or a fitter body, however valid your excuses might be, is not going to change the bottom line of what what you see in the mirror and others see when they look at you.

There is plenty of advice out there in just about every men's magazine about how to dress to attract women. However, that nice watch and those matching shoes are going to do little if you don't feel like you have the personality and lifestyle to back that up with.

Superficial pick-up and dating advice is tempting to follow because it's seems to be so specific and easy to follow. "Just say this or do that and she will be yours." However, there are no quick fixes to real life problems and challenges—in you and in anyone or anything else around you. It takes courage to get to the source of the problem, but that's an essential part of every effective solution.

Therefore, it’s a good idea to always ask yourself when you confront any real life problem—what is the other deeper reason for the issue that you see or are dealing with that no one else is talking about?

Top 5 ROK Articles From March 2015

April 4, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are the top 5 from a total of 118 that we published last month:

1. Fat Girls Who Have Sex With Drunk Guys Are Rapists

> If a girl has sex with an equally or more inebriated male, she can wake up the next day, decide she hadn't built the requisite trust with and knowledge of her partner, and then efficiently and conveniently accuse him of rape. There is absolutely no comparable choice or legal protection for men whose guts start to wrench when they realize in the morning that they slept with a cholesterol-ridden human blimp.

2. Society Needs A Good Dose Of White Knight Shaming

> A white knight can be most easily defined as a man who does things for women with no clear indication that his labors will be rewarded. The white knight is the servient party in a one-sided interaction, often at the expense of his own interests. This labor is usually done with the hope by the white knight that he will receive female approval and ultimately sexual favors in return for his efforts, but the opposite is true.

3. Robin Rinaldi's Wild Oats Project Shows Why Women Should Not Sleep Around

> It's an established fact that girls who whore it up are less suitable as wives and > mothers. No, I'm not making that up: studies show that the greater the number of sexual partners a girl has when she gets married, the greater the likelihood that she'll end up divorcing her husband. Even having just one partner before tying the knot causes a girl's chance of divorce to skyrocket. Men, marry virgins if you want to be as safe as possible from the family courts.

4. 6 Warning Signs A Girl Isn't Worth A Relationship

> While my warning signs aren't tests, they say a lot about the worthiness of a girl for long-term relationships. If a girl does any of these, dump her.

5. Coming Home From The War On Terror

> The memory of my service has since been tainted as I realized that I was less defending my nation and its people than serving the interests of a government that not only did not care about me, but has increasingly showed itself to hate me. I came back to a country that I did not recognize as the one that I had set out to defend all those years ago.

The Anti-Feminism Wisdom Of The Bible

April 4, 2015 | by JD Unwin | Link | Original Link

A few articles on ROK have touched upon basic biblical wisdoms and how they can apply to us here in the manosphere. What they haven't elaborated upon is just how useful God's biblical advice is regarding the leadership role of men and what His vision is for the interactions of men and women.

It goes without saying that God views (through his representatives) the phenomena of females controlling males aka feminism as utterly revolting. To that effect, I'm going to list just three verses for your perusal. These are from the Old Testament, so a proper temporal context is recommended.

1. Gen 3:16 Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.

"…thy desire shall be to thy husband…rule over thee" is key. Here in the Old Testament, God himself is essentially saying that a woman's natural state is to long for a husband, and a man's natural role is to be a ruler over his wife. She can thank her actions in the Garden of Eden for this little fact (as well as the punishment suffering) which most of us are already familiar with. Paul later adapted this to mean "head" for the New Testament Christian but a leadership role is apparent in either case.

How many examples have we seen in society where females have claimed that they don't need men, yet in magazines and even within their own bizarre behaviors the truth has shown much to the contrary?

With regard to marriage, the feminist movement (along with homosexuals and the pro-abortion supporters) has long tried to wage war on this religious institution for the purpose of marginalizing the role that heterosexual husbands and fathers have played. This is because when you divorce the natural leadership role of the husband from the relationship, you allow for the female to interpret the roles in marriage, parenting, and sexuality as she sees fit, or more appropriately, as she is told it should fit.

Most females are natural copycats, and possess conformist thinking rather than critical thinking. If this was not the case, Oprah and Dr. Oz would not hold the kind of hypnotic power over females that they financially enjoy today. Today's elitist feminists (female and male) have learned to tap into that group-think power by indoctrinating other females into their ranks in order to get them to support this SJW cause or that one.

2. Pro 31:3 Give not thy strength unto women, nor thy ways to that which destroyeth kings.

Eve rhymes with deceive…coincidence?

What the bible (King Lemuel specifically) is saying here is pretty simple: don't waste all your energies on the pursuit of females because they will bring about your ruin. Don't become a beta man who orbits a female like a satellite does a planet.

How many modern day kings have had their downfall financially and otherwise, because they chose to spend too much effort on chasing tail? Gary Hart could be considered an example. His presidential candidacy was torpedoed because of his infidelities. While Bill Clinton proved that venery doesn't necessarily prevent one from obtaining the presidency, he nonetheless endured much deserved humiliation for his philandering endeavors and he is still considered a joke even today. You are more than the sum of your reproductive parts, brother.

3. Isa 3:12 As for my people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them. O my people, they which lead thee cause thee to err, and destroy the way of thy paths.

The most misunderstood man on earth

This one from Isaiah is pretty profound, and speaks volumes about how things were even back then. It seems that females have been in the business of trying to control men (through themselves and betas) for years. In addition, the modern day interpretation of “children are their oppressors” can easily apply to millennials and how they are led astray by feminist indoctrination in media and of course in social justice schools of so called higher thought.

Regrettably, these millennials end up furthering SJW causes as they advance in age and take up positions of power and influence, perpetuating the cycle of culture rot more and more. Furthermore, allowing a woman or beta male to hold a position of influence within society allows for anti-masculine teachings to become commonplace to the detriment of society as a whole.

“Destroying the way of thy paths” is therefore prophetic with regard to academic institutions, custody cases, and gender-based affirmative action initiatives which all have the common denominator of transforming females into the ersatz dominant sex.

The patron skank of modern feminists

The modern day feminist movement recognizes the red pill wisdom of the Bible as an unacceptable threat, which is why they've tried their best to discredit it as misogynistic, dismiss it as irrelevant, and sabotage it through the phenomena of feminized churches. Too many beta Christian males have been molded into religious feminists as a result of that last one.

Regardless of all these circumstances, the Bible is still considered the world's most popular book and it will withstand social justice fads until the inevitable book burnings that come with a full-scale tyrannical takeover. Even an atheist red piller who frequents ROK or other sites on the manosphere can appreciate what the Bible is talking about here.

How Get A Better Night Of Sleep

April 5, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

I used to suffer from long stretches of restless sleep and borderline insomnia. My issues were pretty common: inability to fall and stay asleep, night sweats, a seemingly instinctual worry about waking up on time and—all the while—a mind that simply would not stop churning even when I was completely exhausted. The easy and restful sleep that I would fall into naturally as a child and adolescent had given way into fitful bouts of transient slumber.

While issues with a person's ability to regularly get restful sleep are often multifold, consider a few points that a person can address immediately to improve their sleep.

Address The Physical Environment

Quite possibly the easiest and most effective way to correct restless sleep habits is to address the direct physical environment around sleeping.

A quality mattress can go a long way in curing issues with sleep. However, what a person would consider a pleasant mattress to slumber upon is a matter that is purely of taste. Some prefer a rock-solid mattress that provides stiff back support and others like myself greatly prefer a softer mattress that makes sleeping on your side much more comfortable. This is entirely a personal inquiry: a person simply needs to lie on mattress of differing sizes and softness to ascertain what fits best for themselves.

Besides a mattress, pillows, comforters, and blankets also play a significant factor in a person's ability to enjoy restful sleep. Just like mattresses, pillows come in varying shapes, sizes and thicknesses. One simply needs test out differing pillows to find what fits best for their head and neck.

People sometimes forget that by simply trying out a softer mattress or a stiffer pillow, they can help themselves fall and stay asleep. Personally, I recently purchased a thick, velvet blanket and sleep on it, rather than under it. This is incredibly soft and comfortable and has helped improved my quality of sleep.

Outside of the actual bedding, maintaining a peaceful and quiet bedroom is important. Televisions, computers, and other electronic devices can aggravate a person's ability to fall and stay asleep. Ideally, a person's bedroom should be void of those electronic hassles and keep their bedroom as spartan as possible. By dedicating a space that is reserved for primarily for sleeping, it can train the body to feel a certain space is devoted to sleep.

Develop Relaxing Habits Before Sleeping

What goes a bit in hand with the aforementioned advice is developing relaxing habits that one partakes in before bedtime. Personally, I usually play a bit of a video game (not more than an hour) before picking up a fiction book and reading for a spell before bed. I sometimes check sports scores on ESPN or general sporting news to ensure that my mind is free and clear of distracting or mind-consuming thoughts before I retire for the night.

Like I mentioned earlier about not being able to wind your mind down before bed, developing relaxing habits before bed helps ward off anxious or bothersome thoughts before bed. If you read firebrand opinion pieces before bed or watch Stephen King's Carrie before lying down for sleep, you are not helping yourself enjoy a comfortable night of sleep. Leave that sort of stuff for the waking hours and reserve calming activities like fiction reading or meditation before trying to sleep.

Consider Sleep Aids

Sleeps aids can either be over-the-counter or prescribed by a doctor. The average individual should try various over-the-counter methods first before any prescription medication and any serious questions about medicinal sleep aids should be directed at a medical professional, ideally a doctor. I will only be considering non-prescription aids for sleep.

As far as over-the-counter remedies, there are far too many to consider in this piece. I will consider the few I have experience with: melatonin, chamomile tea, and Benadryl.

Hot beverages at or near the time you plan to draw up the sheets can be an effective method of helping induce slumber. Hot chocolate, a hot drink with a spot of liquor, or simply a warm glass of milk can calm your nerves, relax the body, or give you a pleasant sense of fullness before lying down for sleep.

However, the most relaxing drink to consume before sleep in my experience is chamomile tea. Apparently, there is some dispute as to its actual ability to induce sleep, but I do believe that it helps calm nerves, relax the body and, as such, help somebody fall asleep.

Benadryl is the brand name for a class of antihistamines. While it is primarily used as drug to fight off allergic reactions, Benadryl can also cause drowsiness. This drug is found in NyQuil, TylenolPM and a host of other over the counter drugs that target common colds and occasional sleeplessness.

It should only be used for short term issues with sleep, but it certainly works in causing drowsiness. I have found these drugs to help greatly with falling asleep, but I have only used them when I was sick with some sort of cold or flu.

The over the counter aid I have the most experience with is melatonin. Melatonin is a hormone that is secreted at higher levels during nighttime hours. It is available over the counter in low doses at 1 mg and doses all the way up to 10 mg. It is quite powerful at the higher doses and most certainly helps induce sleep. It isn’t habit forming and isn’t hard on the liver and kidneys like medicines like Benadryl.

However, I would counsel that melatonin should be used as sparingly as possible. Medicinal sleep aids should necessarily used as little as is and it can become all too easy to get used to popping a 5 mg tablet at night before sleep. Melatonin can aid a person greatly in falling asleep, but it does little to help the body and mind stay asleep and it can get a bit costly if you get used to ingesting a couple 10 mg tablets a night.

So Are We All Going To Lose Our Jobs?

April 5, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

It is one of the most enduring debates on the internet – will technology destroy our jobs?

Along with outsourcing, technology has thrown many occupations into flux over the last few centuries. We've said goodbye to ice cutters, lamplighters, log drivers, switchboard operators, pinsetters, milkman, and Blockbuster clerks. But how many more average Joes will find themselves penniless and directionless upon being replaced with a machine?

The components of our economy

Starting with economics 101, there are three key sectors to be aware of in an economy – "agriculture," "industry," and "services." Up until industrialization, the agricultural sector dominated in every country on Earth. 95-99% of the population were rural subsistence farmers. Even in the best of times only a modest surplus could be produced, allowing a small portion of the population to devote their energies to other activities like forging metals, writing poetry, stargazing, and waging wars.

From the 18th century onward the industrial sector began to take off. Millions of rural peasants lost their livelihoods and went to work in factories instead. Over time however, new inventions started to displace even factory workers, pushing them into the services sector.

"Services" basically means "everything else" that isn't actually farming or manufacturing something—secretaries, police officers, hairdressers, doctors, teachers, lawyers, Joe the plumber…these sorts of jobs now predominate.

This process is far from over. The next big shift will be in self-driving vehicles.

Maybe 10% of all jobs today are based around driving a vehicle of some kind—truck drivers, bus drivers, taxi drivers, street sweepers, pizza delivery boys, and so on. This is not to mention those that work in car insurance offices or repair shops, which will also see major cutbacks. Then there's train drivers, pilots, construction workers, farmers, checkout chicks and laborers of all kinds. We can expect most of these jobs to vanish within the next fifty years.

So yes – most of us will ultimately lose our jobs, the flag-waving socialists do have a point.

There is one big argument against this however, which is that this same process does lead to the creation of at least some new jobs – How? You may ask. Because those profits have to go somewhere.

The rich man's economy

Lets say you're the head of a major corporation, and you've just replaced a thousand employees with machines. Your operating costs go down and your profits go up. That money will then be divided between the CEO, the board of directors, shareholders and other connected individuals. It becomes concentrated among a tiny minority, yes, but it doesn't just vanish.

So the question then is simple – what do all these newly rich muthafuckers spend that money on?

The answer isn't too hard to find, you just need to look at those industries which have been booming in recent years. Picking one out at random, lets look at say…prostitution.

The sex industry is said to be growing at 5% a year here in Australia (where, because of legalization, some statistics are available). This covers everything from a quick handjob on the street to those Arab oil sheikhs who spend tens of thousands of dollars to import slutty Instagram models and shit on their faces.

Welcome to life in the rich man's economy.

Gambling is another booming industry. Macao recently overtook Las Vegas as the world's largest city in gaming revenues. Again Australia is ahead of the curve. Over the last fifty years a large slice of the Australian population has gotten addicted to throwing away their hard-earned wages at pubs and casinos, with the better part of a million people playing the Pokies weekly.

Hell, the global drug trade has been steadily booming for decades, and is now worth an estimated $435 billion annually. Organised crime accounts for 1.5% of global GDP. Legal issues aside, being a drug dealer has probably never been a more viable career.

Aged care is another one – as the Baby Boomers retire and the birth rate continues to drop, there's going to be millions of asses out there that need wiping and fewer and fewer young people to do it.

Tourism worldwide has been growing steadily at 4% a year. Rich people love travelling halfway across the world to visit ancient monuments…mostly so they can take tasteless selfies and peacock themselves out on social media.

Taking things up a notch, there have been some truly spectacular examples of extravagant spending from the world's rich lately. Hell, in Dubai today, there are people who will spend more than $14 million on a license plate. There's a guy in India who built a $1 billion, 27-story house that requires 600 staff to run it. Then there's compulsive hoarders like former Philippines first lady Imelda Marcos who, upon fleeing a revolution in her country, had to leave behind her vast wardrobe, complete with 15 mink coats, 508 gowns, 1,000 handbags and 3,000 pairs of shoes.

S*omebody* has to be selling them this crap.

In short – if you have lost your livelihood to the globalization machine, this is option #1 on how you get it back. You need to find a rich prick with more money than common sense to whom you can sell $14 million license plates, 27-story houses or their three thousandth pair of shoes.

Of course I don't literally mean we should all become con-artists – you just need to be the sort of salesman who can convince people that, despite a hundred thousand years of functioning perfectly well without them, it is absolutely vital we all now get iPads.

Looking for the "next big thing"

Twenty years ago, nobody owned household computers or mobile phones – now they're pretty much mandatory. Thirty years ago, laser eye surgery was unheard of, but now more than a million procedures are conducted every year. At a few grand a pop, that's a lot of dough.

Hell, genetic engineering is soon going to end up creating a whole new industry, just as information technology has taken off over the past fifty years. How many people would pay for a geneticist to give them a pill which makes their dick bigger? For real? Or prevents their boobs from sagging? Or gives them the physique of Arnold Schwarzenegger?

There's billions of vain people out there just waiting for someone to come along and offer such a deal. Of course, the holy grail here is longevity treatments. If you invented a reliable means of biological immortality tomorrow, you'd be the world's first trillionaire by the end of the year.

It is unlikely that most of us will profit from breakthroughs like these however. This brings us to option #2 for avoiding destitution in our modern economy.

Are the rest of us doomed to welfare?

So we know there is a feedback loop that fuels new job growth. But will it last forever?

Despite a never-ending barrage of complaints, the average westerner works considerably fewer hours than preceding generations. The average working week was as high as 60 hours in industrialized countries in the late 19th century, but declined to about 40 hours in the aftermath of WW2. Today it averages 33 hours, and is under 30 in some European countries.

In response, countries have been gradually decreasing their working weeks and increasing their minimum wages as the jobs market dries up. Some 30% of people in western countries now have college degrees, meaning they are well into their 20s before they properly enter the workforce. Many were skeptical, but the fabled 20-30 hour work week last century's futurists promised us may finally be on the horizon.

And lets face it, many of us will never see any real benefit from trickle-down economics. There are inherent limits on how flexible workers can be, creating problems with the neoliberal narrative. It seems they would have you believe if you're a fifty-four year old brickie who's just been laid off, all you need to do is put on a bit of lipstick, smarten yourself up, and head down to the local whorehouse to hand in your resume.

Obviously, this is not for everyone. This is seen in the statistic that more than 30% of people are now on some form of welfare.

Of course working class jobs tend to be replaced by machines more easily. The middle class meanwhile remains employed for longer. Doctors and lawyers can't be replaced with a machine just yet.

We all know poverty naturally drives people to violence. Why else have governments been gradually spooning out more and more welfare to satiate the newly unemployed? Such bribery is necessary to maintain stability. Globalization throws a huge spanner in the works however, preventing any one country from finding an equilibrium between the disenfranchised poor and the increasingly affluent rich.

When threatened with higher taxes, businesses can easily move overseas, starving the welfare state of resources. This process is the reason every major western country is starting to drown in debt.

As this is the manosphere, I suppose we should take a moment to relate all this to the breakdown of gender relations. In short, no woman wants to marry a bum living on welfare, no matter how generous the weekly cheques. Financial inequality leads to sexual inequality. With women not as financially dependent on men (at least directly) and having never been as demanding of sex, they are much less inclined to marriage and are instead attempting to raise children on their own. This shift is at the root of today's dysfunctional gender relations, though it probably won't be sustainable for long.

So yes, through outsourcing and new gadgets the top 1% of our society has stolen our livelihoods from us, and will continue to do so. The only way to get them back is to find some niche new service and sell it back to the billionaires. If you fail in this attempt, then your best option is to picket your local congressman, vote Democrat and demand higher wages or enough welfare to get by.

In the long run, I think your average human is going to be made completely obsolete by technology, and unless we change dramatically we will all get sucked down into the growing event horizon of the welfare state. In the meantime, lets hope these tensions do not blow out into actual violence.

The elites are playing a dangerous game, and we all know how the last Red October turned out.

5 Invaluable Red Pill Lessons I've Learned

April 5, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

My introduction to the "manosphere" and the various "red pill" principles was probably quite similar to yours.

I was frustrated with the lack of sex and women in my life so I read some "pick-up" books. Then after a bunch of shitty nights out, I finally made some progress.

After that point, I think, we all start to take our own paths. Some men get obsessed with their newfound validation and dive deeper and deeper into the art of seduction. Others give up and revert back to "beta bitch" mode. And some embrace a lifestyle of total self-improvement.

I've had many friends and comrades on this path that have filtered into each of these three paths. Personally I got obsessed with the "pick up" culture for a bit, before refocusing and integrating women as just one component of a new self-improvement driven lifestyle.

I don't mean to preach, but I firmly believe that this is the "middle path" that all men must find for themselves. And it's far from a narrow, well-defined path. In fact, I think this progression of "over-exposure" to a particular thing before retracting and applying it in moderation is an inevitable part of success.

I did it with women. I did it with fitness, too – developing a borderline eating and body image disorder in the process. And while that's clearly not a good thing, it supports my theory that I personally need to go all in at something to get a good feel for it before I can integrate into my life in a healthy fashion.

Not to get off topic but I've done it with various habits like meditation and career jobs as well. But the lessons that I learned from my immersion into the manosphere are some of the most valuable I've ever learned. Here are the top five…

1. Most people are extremely insecure

The majority of men and women crave validation

This is probably the biggest realization I had while going out and trying to get better with women.

On one hand you start to see that the confidence of most women is extremely fragile. Why do they take so many goddamn selfies? To get "likes" that reinforce their longing to look good. And when you're trying to attract more women into your life this realization alone will bring you success.

When you know that the girl you're talking to is longing for your validation, despite any bullshit she might be saying, it gives you all the confidence you need to drive the interaction wherever you like.

On the other hand, when you swallow the red pill you're faced with the brutal truth that your own confidence is also extremely fragile. After all, why are you going out so much and putting so much effort into trying to get laid? Because it brings you validation, of course.

On some level you don't feel validated or manly if you're not getting any ass. And it's not until you're able to take a step back, recognize this, and stop worrying so much about getting laid or having a girlfriend that this insecurity diminishes.

2. People only change when they want to

This is true for yourself and your friends.

You don't get better with women until you admit you suck, learn what you need to do to get better, and then go do it. And this takes a lot of time and effort. You have to want it badly. The same goes for changing careers, starting your own business, or building muscle.

It can be very frustrating when your friends are content with their mediocre lives – working a shitty job, getting laid once a year, or remaining overweight – and this can wear down on you. It doesn't matter how much you try to make them "see the light." It doesn't matter how easy it is to build muscle or get laid… They won't even begin to change until they genuinely want to.

3. Women like sex too

The question is "will it be with you?"

Society grooms us to think that men are the ones that want to have sex. And it conditions us to feel guilty about this and "tiptoe" around the issue when dealing with women. But it's all bullshit.

It wasn't until I hooked up with and dated a handful of women until I was able to internalize this belief. But after you've hooked up with girls that are legitimate freaks, there's no denying that women fucking love sex…

Probably more than you do.

Between the popularization of 50 Shades of Grey, the fact women can have multiple orgasims, and our shared desire for validation by the opposite sex – there's no question that she probably is "that type of girl".

4. Haters gonna hate

You can't be friends with everyone. But it's an undeniable trait of the "nice guy" to try to avoid hurting feelings, and then doing everything he can to make things right or convince other people to like him when he does.

Since I've branched out from the norm, publically published a lot of material on my views, and started to live my own life, I've had to deal with a lot of criticism and bullshit. Whether it's from an uninitiated friend who questions my morals, angry commenters below this article, bad reviews on my books, or a butthurt blogger—“haters gonna hate.”

It’s part of life. People aren’t going to agree with you. People aren’t going to like you. It may be based on a fundamental difference in their beliefs, or it might be because of an underlying insecurity of theirs that you’re bringing to the surface. Or they might just be jealous.

Whatever the reason, you got to be comfortable living with the hate and not trying to make everyone your friend. Sacrificing your principles to appease others will only create incongruencies in your character – and make you seem weak to everyone else.

5. There’s no “right” way to live

There’s no proper way to build relationships or careers

When it comes to dating, you have guys who swear that you MUST NOT enter a LTR until you’re X years old in order to have a successful life…

When it comes to career, you have guys who swear that you MUST quit the corporate world in order to live a fulfilling life…

When it comes to fitness, you have guys who swear that you MUST get as big as you can in order to be a real man…

It’s all bullshit.

I’ve done the LTR. I’ve also done the dating many women at once. I’ve done the 9-5 job. I’ve also done the location-independent lifestyle. I’ve bulked up to near my genetic potential. I’ve also gotten in “fighter” lean shape.

There’s no right answer. You can be happy and successful doing any of them. Do whatever the fuck you feel like doing. Don’t follow some “guru” approach just because. Try out different things and see what works best for you.

3 Reasons Why Most Female Writers Are Garbage

April 6, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Nothing makes the vein in my forehead rise like being forced to read the gurglings of a female writer. With few exceptions, the vast majority of writing put out by girls these days is worthless. I'd rather wipe my ass with sixty-grit sandpaper than digest the literary vomit that comprises the corpus of the average "mainstream" woman writer.

The atrociousness of contemporary female writing is in part due to the Gawkerfication of the Internet. Much in the same way that the sit-still-and-shut-up style of schooling privileges girls over boys, the click-driven consensus-seeking nature of modern pop writing advantages females—in their navel-gazing and conformity—over men.

The Roosh V Forum even has a colloquial name for these girls: "female typists," because their "writing" is so formulaic and anodyne that it barely qualifies as such.

Here is why most female writers are horrible, and how they can improve (not that any of them will pay attention).

1. Their sex lets them get a pass for bad writing

I've devised a simple test for determining whether a female writer is worth the telomeres I'm wasting on her: if she were a man writing about the same subject, would I still be reading? For example, would you read an article by a man crying about he's sick of being shamed for farting in public? Of course not: you'd go "Ewww, what a weirdo!", close the tab and go back to laughing at Grumpy Cat.

Female typists are allowed to spew so much garbage into our browsers precisely because no one will tell them that their writing sucks. They've been told all their lives that the axe wound between their legs makes them shpecial, that their opinions have merit just because of the shape of their loins, and that anyone who criticizes them is a meanie muh-sausage-nist. The end result is that we have an entire class of clickbait princesses who earnestly write about how they should be able to pick their noses in public without grossing out onlookers.

At present, I can count the number of women writers I read on one hand, and I'd still have a couple of fingers to spare. The reason I still read these women—and occasionally pimp their work—is because they're actually good. They have empathy for other people, live interesting lives, and don't believe that attention whoring can compensate for weak prose and lame subjects.

2. They won't shut up about themselves

Every female typist on the planet thinks she's the most fascinating subject in the world. The problem is that most girls are incredibly boring. They don't lead exciting lives, they don't have interesting opinions, and they don't pay attention to what's happening around them. It's because of this that even "real" female writing rarely advances beyond the level of a diary entry.

For example, several months ago, I started talking to a college girl who became interested in my work. She showed me some samples from her Tumblr page asking for my opinion on her prose. Everything she wrote was a navel-gazing dirge about how badly she wanted to be a writer, about how nervous she was about graduating college, nothing but nonstop bloviating about ME ME ME! This was the response I gave her (personal details modified to protect the innocent):

> Stop talking about yourself. You're a 21-year old from Vermont. You're not that interesting.

The most important aspect of being a good writer is having something worth writing about. If your own life is not that exciting, then you make it interesting. As a writer, you also have to empathize with people who are not like you, to step outside of your narrow existence and put yourself in others' shoes. As a species, girls would rather sit in self-imposed bubbles and get high off their own fanny fumes.

3. They don't take risks

Female writing is defined by conformity and fear. While it's not impossible for women to take risks, few of them do; they would rather wallow in what is safe and nonthreatening. The reason why most female typists are so bland is because they prefer to cater to the tastes of the average imbecile rather than take a chance on something different.

For example, the "manosphere" and "red pill" subcultures were created by men who didn't want to geld themselves so they could fit into our milquetoast culture. Roosh didn't run around begging Gawker or Playboy to print his work: he published his own books and created Return of Kings, a site that espouses the viewpoints that he believes in.

There are countless bloggers in this part of the Internet that, for better or for worse, decided to be proactive instead of waiting for someone to come along and hand them an opportunity.

Where is the female equivalent of Return of Kings? Where are the women who are blazing a path of independence against the mediocrity of the Crowd? There are a few, but they're absolutely dwarfed by the legions of female typists who aspire to do nothing more than compile Buzzfeed listicles. Rather than excel on their own merits, they'd rather scrape and grovel at the altar of "real" institutions, with all the literary bootlicking that it entails.

While it's not impossible for individual women to become good writers, most girls are held down by their inherent deficiencies. While I'm hoping that this post will inspire some girls to improve their skills, I'm not holding my breath. As our dysfunctional world shows, there's more money in selling lies than truth.

Pantheon: Adventures In History, Biography, And The Mind

April 6, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Last week, I released a new book entitled Pantheon: Adventures In History, Biography, And The Mind. Here I hope to explain what the book is about, and what things readers can expect to gain from it.

Broadly speaking, this collection of essays concerns moral philosophy. Our goal is to answer these questions: (1) What traits of character promote right conduct, action, and thinking? (2) What systems of thought enable us to achieve our full potential? We use examples from history and biography to illuminate our answers.

Entertainment and instruction go hand-in-hand. In Pantheon, the reader is thrown into the thick of the action right from the beginning. We are not narrowly confined to time and place: I leap across the centuries, and across man's varied intellectual traditions, to find the best answers to the important questions affecting us.

The book begins with this quote by the Italian humanist Bartolomeo Fonzio from 1511, which sets the tone for the whole:

> So advance, fight unflinchingly with steel, and bring to bear standard against standard, weapon against weapon, and chest against chest. And I, the spectator of your fortitude…will be there, and will honor each of you according to his merits.

We begin with a series of "extracts," then follow with a historical fiction prologue. The tale is one of perseverance and triumph. We then launch into the essays proper. A final "afterword" aims to tie together the varied strands of meaning explored in the text. The book is about 275 pages in its printed version.

Howard Carter, the discoverer of Tutankhamun's tomb

The extended prologue plunges us into the incredible story of the hunt for the lost tomb of Tutankhamen:

> ...The morning light began to beat heavier on the sepia-toned walls of the valley. It was strange, he thought, how a location can impart such a spirit of place. Despite all the bustle of activity that went on here, one had the feeling of an oppressive mortality that permeated every stone of the valley. It was as if the place had served host for so many tombs, for so many thousands of years, that it was geologically incapable of performing any other purpose. No matter how many living souls paraded through here, the place still felt like a mausoleum. I've been here too long, he whispered to himself. All of these kings in this quiet, dusty valley once believed themselves to be immune from the grip of mortality and the advances of time's march. And yet look at them now...

I have always believed that the best way to make a point, and to entertain at the same time, is through the use of historical or biographical example. By keeping company with great men, we cannot help but become greater.

In nearly every case, I have made a point of turning to the original sources, in their original languages, to extract the best and most timely lessons. The result is something that can generate new lessons and new discussion, even after repeated readings.

So in one essay we find ourselves in Egypt's Valley of the Kings on the eve of the greatest archaeological discovery in history; in another, we stumble across the frozen polar wastes with Douglas Mawson's doomed expedition; in another, we explore the foundation of conflict and how to manage it; in another, we joust with the ghost of Christopher Hitchens in an extended dialogue; and in yet another we share the quiet study of physicist Max

Planck as he rewrites the rules of modern physics.

Man is our subject, and his perfectibility is our goal.

The essays in Pantheon come from different sources. Some of them are enlarged, reworked, and expanded pieces that originally appeared in Return of Kings. Others appear here for the first time. The essays may be grouped into the following categories:

1. Historical anecdote. We discuss a specific historical incident to find out what life's lesson may be found. (e.g., "Churchill's Command Decision").

2. Biographical summary. We highlight the life or career of a famous man to discern what traits of character made him great, or what personal foibles caused his undoing. (e.g., "The Limits Of Power," "The Consolation Of The Natural World").

Physicist Max Planck

3. Philosophical essay. Some important topic in the world of thought is explored, and its applicability to modern life is discussed (e.g., "The Fortress Of The Mind," "On Detractors," "On Conflict," "On Love And Fate"). In one essay ("The Ghost of Christopher Hitchens"), this comes in the form of a philosophical dialogue.

For example, in one essay, "On Detractors," we note:

> Reading some masterpiece of invective against someone else may bring amusement, but there is something not quite great about it. No one ever called the insults in great speeches great. They may be amusing, but they are not the stuff of greatness. Insults always carry some sort of embedded taint. Of course, this is not to say that one should abandon the obligation of self-defense. If one's vital position in work or life is threatened, then he must respond to those threats. The art of sound judgment lies in this, then: distinguishing the real threat from the buzzing of annoying flies. Not responding to the true obloquy is a moral failing just as egregious as responding to the inconsequential one.

In another one, we make this observation:

> I like most the analogy of the public market or the “fair.” Life, says Epictetus, can be likened to a large trade fair. Some go to the fair to sell their goods and wares, such as cattle, oil, cloth, or food. Others go as spectators. This game of life is similar. Some people, who are like cattle, are interested in nothing beyond their food and bedding. Others are content to observe passively, and are interested only in being amused by the spectacle of the “fair” of life. A small minority seek to ask what is behind the workings of the fair. Who has set it up? Who has constructed it, and what sustains it? These few are focused only on studying the intricate workings of the fair of life before they depart it forever. This small minority, says Epictetus, can expect to be laughed at by the fair’s spectators and the cattle. Spectators want only amusement, and cattle want only fodder. The true seekers want something more, and need something more. It cannot be any other way. We must persist in our questions, and press forward in our studies of this Great Fair of life, and follow the pathways that our answers illuminate.

Finally, there is one section of the book that does not fall into any of these categories, but forms a mini-book within itself. This section is a detailed summary and exegesis of Plotinus’s entire Enneads (all fifty-four treatises). This is the seminal text of Neoplatonist philosophy, and it is important for me to present it to an audience that may not be familiar with it. I provide a logical, step-by-step method of mastering this difficult and yet important intellectual tradition.

I strongly believe that the inward journey—the mystical quest for the union with the Divine—deserves some discussion. All men have this hidden potential for great things. And by tapping into our latent powers, we can literally move mountains.

Explorer Douglas Mawson

Neoplatonism is a mystical philosophy that has had tremendous influence in the Western philosophical and religious tradition. In many ways, it can be seen as a “religion” without the cumbersome theological baggage that has soured many idealistic young men on speculative thought.

I hope to remedy this, or at least expose readers to a side of the world of thought that they may never have considered before. This subject has never been presented before in this way, and I expect readers will find the experience challenging and rewarding.

We all wish to become better men. We all wish to fortify ourselves against the difficulties of life. I hope I have helped in this effort. So let us together take these steps forward, linked arm in arm across the centuries with these great figures, imbued with that adventurous and inquisitive spirit that Nature in its wisdom has granted us.

I have forged the sword. It is now for you to grasp the pommel.

Women Are Experts At Wasting Men’s Time

April 6, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following article was originally published on Roosh V.

When you have a lot going on in your life, you don’t waste time on pointless activities. If you’re a single guy with plenty of dating options, you won’t spend a minute of your day talking to a fat girl. If you’re looking to make your first $1 million, you won’t go searching the ground for pennies. Women, on the other hand, are not like men. Every day and night, millions of women waste the time of men they aren’t attracted to, simply to be entertained and to pass the time.

I was recently the victim of such a woman in a club. She was quite pretty and petite so I approached her with a standard opener. I moved her to a quieter room so I could entertain her like the professional clown that I am. To rule out her being a “shy” girl, I did my jig for a little longer than necessary, but after getting strong red lights to further escalation steps, I had to withdraw.

I spent 30 minutes on a girl who had no sexual interest in me, but who didn’t mind having an ultimately meaningless conversation because at that moment I was more exciting than her smartphone or friends. In other words, I was just another TV channel, another app, another web site, another radio station, another dancing cock that made her life slightly more interesting and tolerable than what she is capable of doing herself. She used me to temporarily forget about her boring existence.

When was the last time you used a girl for entertainment? Unless you're Julien Blanc, a broken clown who trolls women to provide cheap laughs for his paying customers, you view women in intimate or purposeful terms. You want from them a specific role that only a female can provide, meaning you plan on either extracting intimacy from her or from one of her friends, and if not then you're a damn fool because there is nothing more a girl not related to you by blood can provide.

Men have their existing forms of entertainment that provide far more value than a conversation with a typical modern woman, but women view us not just sexually but also as a chimp performing sign language, which means that a trillion hours are wasted every year with men trying to start a sexual relationship with a woman who has no intention of doing so, or who is so confused about want she wants that she can change her mind halfway through the seduction with no shame of leaving you in the lurch.

I've done things to minimize this wasted time component, especially when it comes to going on dates, which can be huge time sinks. I analyzed my past successes and compared the behavior of girls I've banged to girls I didn't, but in spite of that, I still manage to waste unacceptable amounts of time on bad prospects. As long as you want to get laid with women, as long as you don't want to have sex with your hand or with a hooker, your time will be wasted, and girls who you think will not do that to you will surely prove themselves to be another poor investment you made.

While it wouldn't hurt for you to understand the profile of a flake, that can only minimize the problem of wasting time, not eliminate it completely, because with our strong desire for sex, we have to grind it out and spend hours to entertain many women in order to experience 30 minutes of sexual pleasure with one. My advice to you is to not have such a busy lifestyle where you can't occasionally spend a couple hours a day hunting for women. Don't be so tired at the end of the day that you can't do a handful of approaches or go on a long date. This is what's necessary these days for men just to get laid every once in a while.

7 Tips On How To Get In The Best Shape Of Your Life

April 6, 2015 | by Peter Burns | Link | Original Link

In order to become the man you want to be, you need to first face the cold, hard facts of reality. Have you done enough to be successful? Only by being honest to yourself, can you start on the journey to really achieving the things that you want to accomplish.

Many guys like to complain. They lounge around all day, being underwhelming, sitting on their ass, not doing anything productive. Some of them are fat, their beer bellies disgustingly protruding over their pants. Some of them are skinny, and could use an intensive session in their local burger joint in order to gain some weight.

We often talk about women having a sense of entitlement, but many guys have it too. Think hard about your life? Why do you deserve a million dollars? Why do you deserve hot girls? Many guys believe that they deserve these things, just because of the fact that they exist, yet they don't do anything in order to get it.

Now that I have torn you down, I will try to build you back up. This is the first part of character building. In order to change, you need to develop a realistic vision of yourself first. You are not going to do that without facing the facts.

Let's start with working on your body, since your body is the first thing that people will see. A healthy, good looking body is the basis of your own well-being and overall success.

1. Create clear goals

Do you have clear achievable goals? If you are like most people, you probably don't. You might have something vague like "I want to have muscles" or "I don't want to be fat", but nothing else. This type of stuff ain't gonna cut it.

If you want to change, you have to have clear goals. These goals should be set according to the SMART criteria. They have to be specific, sustainable, attainable, relevant and time-related. They also need to support the vision that you have set out for yourself.

Use the present tense when writing your goal. This means something like: "I have added five kilograms of lean muscle by December 2015." Once you have the goal, it's time to execute!

2. Train your willpower

If you have been a lazy slob until now, you need to start working on your willpower. Your willpower is at the center of you being able to achieve your goals.

It's probably pretty weak right now. Willpower is like a muscle and you need to exercise it. In order to make it grow, you need to focus on expanding it. Start off slowly and focus on just a few things at a time. Once you have trained your willpower, it will be much easier to achieve things.

3. Create habits

Using your willpower can be quite energy-depleting. You will need it initially, but in order not to expend too much energy, you will need to automatize processes, create routines and turn those routines into habits.

A habit is something that you do automatically. With a habit you expend a lot less energy than through forcing yourself to do things with willpower. In that way, you save your willpower for more important things.

In order to sustain habits, you need to create an environment that fosters good habits. For example if you want to eat healthier, you need to stock up your fridge with healthy foods, so that whenever you get the hunger pangs and open your fridge, the only option you have is to pick something healthy to eat.

You also need to create habit triggers, something that triggers the execution of your habit. For example, on the days I go to the gym, I bring my gym stuff with me to work. The times I leave my bag at home and get back home, I rarely end up going to go the gym.

4. Progressive overload is king, so you need to lift heavy

So now you have worked on your willpower, created some healthy, gym-going habits and you go to the gym regularly. That's a good start. However many people just BS around in the gym and don't do the right things in order to maximize their gains.

You need to remember that the way to grow is to keep on lifting heavier and heavier weights. You need to give your body challenging resistance in order to force it to grow. There is no other way.

When lifting, remember to keep correct form. If you don't, you are at a high risk of injuries. If you are a newbie, start off by lifting light weights and learning to lift correctly. Once you have the form down, then start on progressively adding more weight.

5. Nutrition is key, so remember to fuel up your body

If you want to be big, then you need to eat properly. Nutrition is one of the biggest factors of your gains. You need to provide your body with the fuel and the building blocks to force it to grow. The three main types of micronutrients are proteins, carbohydrates, and fats.

Proteins are the building blocks that make up your muscles. You need to include a lot of protein-rich foods in your diet, which include chicken breasts, steak, and fish.

What are carbohydrates? They are not the bogeyman that some new fad diets are making them out to be. In fact, they are the fuel for your body. Glucose is the basic building block of most carbohydrates and the main fuel of your body. It is especially important to eat some carb-rich foods around 1.5 or 2 hours before your workout, in order to have the energy to hit the weights hard.

Fats have been the devil-incarnate in the 90s and early 2000s, but now they are making a comeback as the healthy choice. Remember that there are different types of fats (saturated, unsaturated…etc.) and one of the building blocks of these are fatty acids. Some of them are considered essential.

The modern diet is deficient in omega-3 fatty acids and that's why you need to take extra care to include them in your diet. They can be found in seafood, salmon, and grass-fed beef.

6. Take into account the fact that setbacks will happen

In your journey to get big and muscular, you will face challenges and setbacks. You need to take this into account and deal with it when it happens. For example, about a year and a half ago, I had an ACL operation and was out of the game for a long time. I worked hard on rehabilitating after the injury and once the knee got stronger, I got back in the game.

Unfortunately, the knee still isn't 100%, but I try to make with what I got. You need to have the same type of mindset in order to power through challenges and overcome setbacks.

7. Don't do someone else's routine

Pro bodybuilder – if you are a newbie, don't do his routine

You have probably flipped through one of those glossy bodybuilding magazines and tried one of the routines that they say the Mr. Olympias do. However you saw no gains.

You need to keep in mind that what works for one person, doesn't always work for another one. We all have different body types, different ratios of fast-twitch and slow-twitch muscles, different preferred ways of doing things, different personalities and there are also all kinds of other factors. That means that you will need to experiment a bit in order to find out what works for you.

When setting up your routine, you only need to remember the basic principles of lifting: progressive overload, correct form, good nutrition, a stable routine, and the willingness to work hard. That's all you need to get big and muscular.

Once you have these basic things down and start working hard on self-improvement, other things will start coming naturally. The money will start trickling in, the girls will start knocking on your door and, best of all, you will have the natural self-confidence that you need in order to get even better and to become more successful.

Research Shows That Equipment Isn’t A Priority For Most Women

April 7, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

At some point in most of our lives, there is one thought that invades our minds, just before we release the kraken on a female we’ve gamed into coming back to our place to “check out our vintage record collection.”

“Am I big enough?!?”

Back in the day this topic wasn’t oft discussed by men or women. Given the sexual climate of yesteryear, when most women didn’t slut around, a man’s penis size was of little consequence if at all.

But the combination of a sex obsessed culture, unprecedented access to pornography, and the sheer abundance of sluts walking around has pushed this subject front and center. These days it’s not uncommon to witness a conversation between women young and old about a man’s most popular organ with little effort to lower their voices.

So how much does it matter? Let’s break this down and see if we can get some answers.

Straight from the horse’s mouth

It’s common knowledge in these parts that taking relationship advice from women is a bad idea. When it comes to dick dimensions, however, the female perspective is the most valuable because they’re the ones being penetrated.

Another important reason for their point of view is that cock preference doesn’t leave much room for subjective analysis (read: hamster). They either like certain dicks or they don’t.

There are other elements that factor into good sex versus bad sex for women. But the simple fact is that no amount of game, money, frame, status, physical fitness etc. will make a roll of quarters feel like a cucumber.

So let’s take a look at a few thoughts from the ladies shall we?

> It doesn’t matter to me as long as it isn’t too big or too small.
> -Jennifer, 28

> I don’t want to be scared of it. Average is your friend
> -Ali, 22

> I honestly can't really tell if it's bigger or smaller than the last guy or what's "average." I mean I would notice if it was huge or tiny, but that's never happened to me. They all look pretty much the same and I think the difference is if a guy knows how to fuck.
> -Tiffany, 27

The article these three comments are from is a survey asking 50 women ages 18 to 35 about penis size. Of those 50 women, 21 indicated that it didn't matter as long as it wasn't too big or too small, 23 said it didn't matter at all, and only six took a liking to the well-endowed.

One would think that 50 women is hardly a large enough sample size to draw any definitive conclusions. Under normal circumstances I'd agree with that assessment. But given that most girls in this part of the world are pretty much the same it does lend a little more credence than most other 50 person sample sizes.

[image]

According to these accounts it would seem that most women don't want to be mercilessly plowed by oversized schlongs for three straight hours like porn would lead you to believe (more on this later).

Take a look at what this female porn star says when asked about her preference in penis size. I'm willing to bet she's not the only porn actress who feels this way:

> If there is anything I've learned from my job, it's that a person's physical anatomy has very little to do with how much fun you can have in bed together…
> First, the majority of those giant penises that you seen in porn are not fun to have sex with. When I get on set with a guy with a thirteen-inch cock, I'm like "oh Jesus, how is this going to work?" It usually takes a lot of patience and deep breathing."
> Second, while I sometimes enjoy the feeling of a lot of penetration (a feeling that can be achieved just as easily with toys or hands), penetration in itself is not what makes me orgasm. This is true, I think, for most women. I get the most turned on by sex that is creative and dynamic—I like the dirty talk, attentive touching, oral sex, and finger penetration much more than than simply being pounded by a large appendage. I mean, I like penises, but I think there is this myth that heterosexual sex is supposed to begin and end with the cock. There is just so much more to it. I think the whole big-cock mythology is pretty silly.
> -Lorelei Lee, Adult film actress

Though we can't assume anything it's probably a safe bet that the vast majority of women from your average sexually active female to porn stars who get fucked by large cocks on the regular don't put too much stock in a man's size, unless that man is in the top or bottom 1%.

Yes, there are female porn stars out there who like to feel the D in their stomachs…

> …I wanna feel that shit so deep in my vag…I wanna feel it come out my throat through my asshole.
> -Kristina Rose, Adult film actress

…and everyday girls (read: non-porn stars) who like ’em large…

> I prefer them to be on the big side.
> -Megan, 25

…but cervix-crushing sex seems to be preferred by the minority…porn stars or otherwise. So when it comes to penetration, it looks like most females prefer pleasure over pain.

The “super slut” effect

We all know that most women in the Anglosphere are raging sluts, but there are a fair share of girls who have triple-digit notch counts. Girls who’ve slept with exorbitant amounts of men have no doubt been reamed by more above average phalluses than the average female. It’s simple probability.

Physiologically speaking, this kind of action wears out a vagina by stretching it to the point it feels looser upon entry. Kegels may help delay the onset of a condition my crew and I affectionately refer to as “triple S” (super slut snatch). But taking 100+ cocks a collective 1000+ times eventually takes its toll, and before she knows it she needs close to a top one-percenter to feel anything down there.

Girls can (and do) refute this all they want to, but this is simple physics. The more cocks a girl takes the looser she’ll get. Further, if this were a myth like they proclaim, then vaginal rejuvenation procedures like the “love knot” wouldn’t exist.

The effects on the sexual market from a neomasculine point of view are obvious. No man wants to feel like he's fucking an open window, as it's a pretty accurate slut tell and men with options don't commit to sluts.

As for girls with triple-digit notch counts, it's a catch-22: she can't advertise that she needs bigger penises to stimulate her overtaxed vagina lest she look and sound like a slut. On the flip side she can't be physically satisfied by average-sized men forcing her to "try before she buys." And given that most men have average-sized dicks, she ends up "shopping" quite a bit more, which only further increases her notch count.

Sometimes, however, girls like to brag about how big their boyfriends are or how they need super large dicks to please them. My guess is that this is another projection play in that a woman who brags about this stuff makes them look more experienced and selective, which is exactly what they want in a man.

This article is a conversation between four women about penis size. Of the four women, one in particular unabashedly brags about how she needs foot long dongs to please her. She even acknowledges that admitting as much makes girls look slutty, but she brags away about how she just can't deal with a man who is less than 8″:

> Well, I think size is very important. A man has to have a big package to please me. It has to be long, let's say 8 inches or more, and the girth should be thick as well.

"Giovanna" goes on to brag about her blowjob skills (referring to it as a skill called "Project Deep Throat") and about how she'd dump a guy in a heartbeat for not being hung like a horse. It should come as no surprise that she's 30 years old and never married validating her parking at the Circus du Carousel.

I also take AskMen articles with a grain of salt anyway, as most of their advice is laced with blue pill excrement. But even in this article you'll notice that three out of four women don't put much importance in the size of a man's penis.

The super slut effect, among other things, explains why virgin brides stay with their husbands at a much higher rate. They only know one penis (as they should) so there's nothing else to compare it to psychologically or physically.

The bottom line here is that if a woman needs extra large penises to get off, she's more than likely taken cocks-a-plenty for a good long while. Most penises are more than large enough to satisfy most women, even sluts. The only exceptions seem to be girls who have excessively high notch counts.

The role of pornography

Quitting porn is a message consistently preached in the ‘sphere for a number of reasons. One of the most important reasons is that watching it enough will eventually warp your mind into thinking you have to have a two-foot ding-a-ling to please a woman and this is where most (if not all) penis size anxiety starts.

The simple truth is that male porn stars are the top 1% in terms of penis size. This means that they have bigger dicks than most of the male population. The reason porn directors use these guys is that it looks better on screen. That’s it. Average doesn’t cut it when trying to generate clicks, so they err on the side of aesthetic superiority.

Most men are conscious of their dick size as a matter of biology. This isn’t necessarily a bad thing because in ancient times a large penis represented fertility (and still does to a much lower extent). A man’s ability to impregnate women and pass on his genes symbolized true masculinity so the larger his organ, the more children he is perceived to be able to father.

That mentality has sustained itself through centuries of generations, but the very concept has been twisted and perverted. With more and more women getting in line to ride the carousel as opposed to marrying young and bearing children, a man’s ability to make her squirt is all she cares about.

As men we want to please women sexually to keep them coming back for more. And when we watch men with huge dongs banging pretty girls who are moaning and groaning as though they’re having the best sex of their lives, we internalize this, thus, planting the seeds of insecurity about our own sizes.

Porn has it’s place, but like Troy Francis said in his latest post, moderation is key. Show me a man who is overly concerned with his cock size and I’ll show you a man who watches way too much porn.

It’s all about you

At the end of the day this is more about your psyche than your size. If you’re confident in the bedroom it doesn’t matter how big or small you are. Confidence is the most attractive trait a man can possess and this naturally carries over into the dirty deed:

> I think a guy with a big dick is more confident, so he’s better in bed.
> -Jamie, 24

Walk around like you’ve got a 13″ cock and it will reflect in all of your actions—especially sex.

And if a girl mentions anything to you about size or performance, treat it like a shit-test. This conversation happened in my car just this past weekend:

Her: The sex used to be great but I got tired of him being a one minute man with his small thing.

Me: Well I’ve totally got him beat because I’m going to give you 90 seconds of pleasure with my three inch destroyer…just you wait.

She laughed her ass off and we ended up having a great night together. More importantly her statement is further proof that the “size of the boat-motion in the ocean” cliche is true. She acknowledged her ex had a small dick but the sex was great anyway. She only got bored when his performance tanked.

Now of course you’ll find articles like these that attempt to further marginalize men and sap our confidence. But the fact of the matter is that most women don’t place nearly the emphasis on cock size as we do because they know that skill trumps size every time:

> No. Prime example: Joe used magnum condoms and Mathias didn’t, but Mathias was a better lover.
> -Marissa, 26

As long as you time your entry when she’s warmed up (all girls love foreplay, gentlemen…learn it, hone it, use it) and you passionately dominate her, she’ll squeal like that porn starlet. The only difference is that your girl’s noises will be authentic.

So does size really matter? With most girls, probably not.

Why Haven't The People Who Pushed Rolling Stone's UVA Rape Hoax Story Been Fired?

April 7, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

This past weekend, Rolling Stone announced that the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism had completed their review of Sabrina Rubin Erdely's article "A Rape on Campus," her long-discredited report on a purported gang rape that happened at the Phi Kappa Psi frat house at the University of Virginia. To no one's surprise, the review ruled that the story was completely false:

> This report was painful reading, to me personally and to all of us at Rolling Stone. It is also, in its own way, a fascinating document — a piece of journalism, as Coll describes it, about a failure of journalism. With its publication, we are officially retracting 'A Rape on Campus.' We are also committing ourselves to a series of recommendations about journalistic practices that are spelled out in the report. We would like to apologize to our readers and to all of those who were damaged by our story and the ensuing fallout, including members of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity and UVA administrators and students. Sexual assault is a serious problem on college campuses, and it is important that rape victims feel comfortable stepping forward. It saddens us to think that their willingness to do so might be diminished by our failings.

While getting Rolling Stone to retract the story is a major victory, it's absolutely insulting that Rubin Erdely, Will Dana and the other figures who pushed "A Rape on Campus" will get to keep their jobs. Fabulists of the past such as Stephen Glass, Jayson Blair, and Janet Cooke were blackballed out of the media over phony articles that did far less damage than Rubin Erdely's.

Additionally, Jackie Coakley, the presumably mentally disturbed UVA student who made the false rape allegations, has yet to face any repercussions for her lies. Outside of a few reporters, such as the Daily Caller's Chuck Ross, no one has even acknowledged that the UVA rape hoax originated in a bizarre catfishing plot Coakley cooked up in order to get the attention of a boy she'd been crushing on. Conservative journalist Charles Johnson was widely lambasted by SJWs for "outing" Coakley and investigating her last December.

With that in mind, here are some of the most significant names who pushed Rolling Stone's rape hoax, and why they should be fired for whipping up fear, defaming innocent young men, and using the story to advance their political agendas.

1. Sabrina Rubin Erdely

The author of the Rolling Stone piece itself, Sabrina Rubin Erdely is a feminist with a documented hatred of masculinity, fraternity culture and "bros." She admitted in interviews that she had been specifically shopping around for campus rape stories that fit her narrative, showing that she had a clear ideological motive in fabricating "A Rape on Campus."

2. Emily Renda

Emily Renda is a feminist activist who serves as the subcommittee chair of the Virginia Governor's Task Force on Combating Sexual Violence, giving her significant influence over government policy. Renda introduced Sabrina Rubin Erdely to Jackie Coakley so she could use the resulting hoax as a Reichstag fire incident to push for more extreme anti-male legislation. GotNews' Charles Johnson recently revealed that Renda has a history of making up stories about being raped herself.

3. Teresa Sullivan

The president of UVA, Sullivan's response to "A Rape on Campus" was to throw her own students under the bus. Even after Rolling Stone's story was proven to be false, Sullivan forced UVA fraternities to agree to more restrictive rules on their activities. To this day, UVA frats are still on probation. Sullivan also had nothing to say when feminist vandals attacked the Phi Kappa Psi house, smashing windows with bricks and spray-painting obscenities on the walls.

4. Jessica Valenti

The founder of the once-influential feminist blog Feministing, Jessica Valenti has since graduated to penning columns for the left-wing British broadsheet The Guardian. Valenti had a nervous breakdown when the UVA rape story imploded in December, declaring "I BELIEVE WOMEN."

When Rolling Stone finally retracted the article last weekend, she wrote a particularly delusional column claiming that the magazine was "blaming the victim [Coakley]," even though all every shred of available evidence suggests there was no rape and no victim.

5. Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig

A soi-disant Christian socialist, Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig is a staff columnist for The New Republic, the same magazine that employed notorious fabricator Stephen Glass. Stoker Bruenig falsely accused Return of Kings publisher Roosh Valizadeh of making a "rape threat" two months ago, and following Rolling Stone's retraction, she posted a nearly illiterate article arguing that even though Rubin Erdely's story was false, the supposed narrative of "rape culture" it was pushing was still true.

This list is hardly exhaustive: there are countless other figures in the media and government who seized upon the UVA rape hoax to push an anti-male agenda. It is absolutely astounding that not one of them has been blackballed, fired or even censured for their heinous actions. Only by documenting their lies and treachery can we ensure that these figures are discredited and shunned.

How UVA President Teresa Sullivan Sold Out The Heritage Of Virginia

April 7, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

UVA president Teresa A. Sullivan has recently said of the Rolling Stone hoax, “Irresponsible journalism unjustly damaged the reputations of many innocent individuals and the University of Virginia.” Her statement is dripping with irony and hypocrisy.

Sullivan’s Own Irresponsibility

Sullivan has yet to apologize for punishing the entire fraternity system for a false story that could have easily been verified had she, for example, checked to see if the fraternity in question even had a party that night. Nor has she apologized for the vandalism caused to that fraternity by militant leftists under the belief that it is the patriarchy that is violent and unjust.

Victimhood

Even today, there are still harsher rules on the UVA entire fraternity system because of the story, despite Sullivan herself admitting that there was no basis for the allegations.

The South Gets Shafted Again

Why did Rolling Stone and Erdely choose the University of Virginia instead of more famous in-crowd schools like Harvard or more famous party schools like Ohio State? Because Charlottesville, Virginia is in the South. And not just in the South, but only an hour drive from Richmond, the capitol of the old Confederacy.

Northerners have always hated the South ever since there's been a South. We have always had a more defined social order and hence a deeper sense of culture. Furthermore, calling us racist for two hundred years makes it easier for the yankees to turn a blind eye to their own abuses of the other races. Same reason critics love to hate all over country music—both new and old—yet fawn over hip-hop retards like Kanye and Beyonce.

Uncle Tom's University Admin Office

Sullivan sold out—and continues to sell out—her own fellow Virginians in the name of popular activism, not uncommon today in the world of academia. But now that the heat is against said activism, she's suddenly pretending to switch sides.

Yet she still isn't changing anything that she's put into place. She'll do whatever it takes to preserve her name and rise in the ranks, so there is no way she will apologize or loosen the restrictions on the fraternities unless she's cornered into it. What she wants more than anything is to appear like a competent administrator so that the the media and her colleagues will pat her on the head.

This is not unlike the novel To Kill A Mockingbird still being force-fed down Southern children's throats in high school English class. It was written by a Southerner hoping to win the favor of the Ivy League powers-that-be.

Granted, Sullivan's actually from Illinois and went to school in Michigan, so perhaps the better criticism is that she's an outsider herself infiltrating a Southern establishment to uproot its identity. Still, in moving here—putting aside any arguments over whether north Virginia is still part of the South—she has taken a certain implicit moral responsibility to assimilate, which is true for any region in the world. No one likes an angsty immigrant.

Of course I'm not suggesting that Southerners should never criticize our own, but neither should they go out of their way to crucify the South merely to appease their white guilt or to gain social points with establishments like the Pulitzer Prize that are prestigious just because we are told they are important without any kind of citation to why these prizes and accolades are so valuable.

What traitors to the nation like Harper Lee or the authorities today in Oxford, Mississippi never realize is that the Yankees will never truly accept them. The only way for a Southerner to be accepted by the outsiders is to move away to somewhere like Manhattan and contrive a victim status. Today that involves becoming a homosexual and telling blatant lies like, "I would have never had survived if I had stayed in the South."

The North and West will always hate us. I've quit caring about outsiders' opinions. Southerners going their own way.

Conclusion

But fighting against the legacy she has been entrusted with isn't the main reason Sullivan should be fired. Sullivan should be fired because she is completely incompetent at her job. She punished innocent men without evidence or trial and refused to remove the punishment once they were shown to be innocent. If that's what leftists mean by human rights, then I don't want my rights.

Sullivan allowed these innocent men to be terrorized by activists who are literally fascists in their actions. Bricks through a window could have easily killed someone. As far as I have been able to discern, there has been little to no investigation by the university into who committed this highly illegal action. The cops have been equally worthless. HotAir wrote,

> Oddly enough, cops haven't made any arrests for the window-breaking even though a Times reporter apparently had no trouble tracking down the ringleader, who admitted his role in it on the condition that the paper not reveal his name. […] Asked whether he felt at all bad about attacking the wrong fraternity, he showed no remorse and justified the attack on the broader woes of "social injustice."

Had there been any other issue at hand other than college rape, or had this been any other work environment than a university, Sullivan would have been fired months ago. I'm going to give my vote for equality and say Sullivan should be making french fries and living on food stamps. That's true social justice.

The Guardian Is Enabling Jessica Valenti's Descent Into Clinical Madness

April 7, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Jessica Valenti, a regular contributor to The Guardian with fine articles such as "Feminists don't hate men but it wouldn't matter if we did" and "Finally dealing with campus rape means that some men will have it tougher," simply refuses to give up now that her narrative has lost all relation with objective reality. After the UVA rape case was first reported by the Rolling Stone, Jessica latched onto it with her entire being and exhorted that she believes Jackie:

> I choose to believe Jackie. I lose nothing by doing so, even if I'm later proven wrong - but at least I will still be able to sleep at night for having stood by a young woman who may have been through an awful trauma.

Real misery inflicted upon real men doesn't matter as long as feelings of "Jackie", the supposed victim and a woman we are not sure even exists as described, are protected. SJWs such as Jessica Valenti are hard at work to propagate their beliefs and change the society according to their dystopian vision where men are second-class citizens at best and their sexuality is controlled by women to the tiniest detail. Their plan is to focus on the college culture and make it as politically correct as possible and then slowly spread the chill effect into the entire education system, down to grade school. Yes, toddlers will be taught what rape culture is.

To do this, Jessica used the soft spot of most men and women—sympathy towards vulnerable women. The very notion of a young, modest, doe-eyed "Jackie" who expected romantic walks on the beach and guitar serenades from a fellow college lifeguard but instead got brutally gang-raped inside the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity house is gut wrenching and despicable to everyone with even a modicum of decency. This is exactly why SJWs gleefully accepted the Rolling Stone article, as it generated enough outrage to advance their cause by at least 20 years. But now, the entire tapestry of lies is being unraveled.

Police investigation into the supposed UVA fraternity rape has shown insufficient evidence to support the story presented in Rolling Stone. This didn't stop Jessica Valenti from saying that this is because "trauma victims often misremember details of their attack". The editors at Rolling Stone saw where this was going long ago and asked Steve Coll from the Columbia School of Journalism to launch an independent investigation of the case and help them save face. This report is now published on the Rolling Stone website, completely replacing the original UVA rape article. In other words, the lack of facts behind the infamous UVA rape case and the realization that it might all be just a work of fiction has finally started to sink in. And now, the epic backpedaling has begun.

Jessica Valenti's Twitter feed is chock full of recent tweets in which she swings from trying to indirectly defend Rolling Stone for the greater cause of fighting the "rape culture":

…to shifting the blame for the scandal onto their shoulders without explicitly denouncing them:

Judging by Jessica's tweets, Rolling Stone was somehow guilted or shamed into covering the UVA rape case the way they did and now they are victims as well. At the same time, she admonishes the Rolling Stone for being the victimizer and enabler of the "rape culture", since its staff is not admitting to their sins fully and are thus harming the SJW cause. Those two statements seem to contradict one another and it seems impossible that Rolling Stone can be both the victim and the victimizer at once, but that's not the case at all. To fully understand what Jessica Valenti is telling us, one must first grasp the fine art of doublethink.

The culmination of Jessica's defense of the UVA case comes in the form of her most recent article titled "It wasn't Jackie's job to get the details of her rape correct. It was Rolling Stone's", which is a masterful display of doublethink and shows the true intentions of SJWs and how they deal with allies that fail them.

In the article, Jessica Valenti criticizes Rolling Stone for harming the credibility of future rape victims by not prostrating themselves enough. Rolling Stone is an ally because it fights the "rape culture" but it is also an enemy because it doesn't do so with enough zeal and self-sacrifice to overcome the readers' critical thought. Whether Rolling Stone is more of an ally or an enemy depends solely on how Jessica Valenti deems their efficiency at converting the readers into SJWs (i.e. her mood).

Feelings trumping facts and the notion of changing principles and allies on a daily basis in order to squash the mythical "rape culture" and convincing oneself of that not being the case is how Jessica Valenti operates. The truth is whatever Jessica Valenti wishes truth to be. And that, ladies and gentlemen, is Jessica Valenti and her politically correct journalism in a nutshell.

Elisabeth Garber-Paul Is The Fact Checker Who Green-Lighted The Biggest Media Hoax Of The Decade

April 7, 2015 | by Gus Haynes | Link | Original Link

Rolling Stone writer Sabrina Rubin Erdely didn't manufacture the massive rape hoax on her own—she had a full-fledged media organization to aid her, including editors, fact-checkers, and sympathetic journalists in the establishment. One of the fact-checkers of the story was Elizabeth Garber-Paul, a salaried worker with an impressive resume listing The Nation and numerous other publications. Sabrina Erdely was the main swindler in this hoax, but Elizabeth Garber-Paul was the enigmatic collaborator who allowed this massive fraud to become reality.

Fact-checking requires actual work

A fact-checker for a media organization like the Rolling Stone has multiple tasks to achieve besides seeing that "X" really is "X". These professionals are meant to protect their employers by limiting their liability to libel lawsuits. Garber-Paul didn't just act incompetently with the rape hoax story, she was also a co-conspirator. Her lack of journalistic integrity has damaged the Rolling Stone and UVA, and added to the rape hysteria stigma that all male college students wrongly face today.

According to the Federalist, Garber-Paul tried to set up an appointment with UVA about two weeks before the article was published on November 19, 2014. Those emails for the appointment only talk about UVA's sexual assault procedures. None of the questions Garber-Paul had sent was to verify the identity of Jackie, the "victim" whose "story" was being written about by Erdely as main theme for proving that rape culture exists.

> Elisabeth Garber-Paul reached out to U-Va. on Nov. 7 to set up an appointment to fact check the story. Her questions were limited to procedures regarding sexual assault complaints. Nowhere in the correspondence did Garber-Paul ask for any type of verification of the story about "Jackie" and her claim of horrific gang-rape by a particular fraternity.

Garber-Paul spent the time to ask about the sexual assault policy of the campus, perhaps attempting to poke holes in it, instead of doing her job of fact-checking. The only concern she showed to UVA was asking an administrator if the Rolling Stone article will impact people coming forward with reporting additional sexual assault.

Good morning, Liz-

One additional note. As I mentioned to you, we have expressed our concern to Sabrina regarding what we believe to be her mischaracterization of facts about a case that occurred in Spring 2014. I recall I mentioned this to you on the phone.

It has been brought to our attention by a few students that Sabrina has spoken to that she is referencing an incident where a male student raped three different women and received a one-year suspension. This is in fact objectively false.

As I told Sabrina at the time, federal privacy laws prohibit us from disclosing details of any sexual assault report, so we can't say more.

Credit to Federalist

Art school doesn’t teach ethics

Garber-Paul used her position to amplify the rape culture propaganda instead of fact check. If she was a professional, she would have forced Erdely to completely nix the “Jacky” story and focus solely on college universities sexual assault response. Garber-Paul either didn’t want to do her job or wanted Erdely to follow in the footsteps of Stephen Glass, Jayson Blair, or Janet Cooke. All of those journalists were media fabricators like Erdely, who gained fame from writing lies before losing their jobs for it.

Here are Garber-Paul’s own words about fact checking that she seems to have forgotten when reviewing the entirely fictional story that Rolling Stone published:

> What is your industry pet peeve? Writers who think it’s in their best interest to battle fact checkers. We’re all on the same team; we all want the story to be as accurate as possible while still being fresh and exciting. I am not looking for an incorrect fact just for the sake of being right. We’re all in this together. So just send me your transcripts and ease up, man.
> Do you have an industry confession? Chances areI am not covering your show for the website. I just wanted free tickets to your show. And yes, I will take that free LP. (See: Favorite Job Perks)
> What is a must-have on the job? Overpriced mechanical pencils, colored pens, phone tapper and tape recorder, post-its (multiple sizes and colors, but of course a big stack of classic yellow squares), headphones, GChat. Oh, and an e-cigarette for when I don’t have time to make it downstairs.
> What is your favorite perk? Advance albums, free concerts, finding weird promotional crap around the office and bringing it home as presents for friends.

Garber-Paul wanted the story “to be as accurate as possible” only after it conformed to her agenda as strongly as possible. If Garber-Paul let the UVA rape hoax through, what other stories has she not properly fact-checked and which still remain on various media sites? Why is it that her agenda was allowed to interfere with the “facts”? These questions must be asked before she eagerly brags about the perks from not doing her job. Expectantly, she’s getting criticized on Twitter for her prominent role in the hoax.

She has opened up Rolling Stone to civil lawsuits through her incompetence or negligence (or both) to further her far-left agenda. The UVA rape hoax story will forever be imprinted on Garber-Paul's legacy, and it's our advice that she look for a new line of work that doesn't deal in uncomfortable facts that she is blind to noticing.

Did AP Writer Geoff Mulvihill Lie By Omission In Defending Philadelphia Colleague Sabrina Erdely?

April 8, 2015 | by Samuel Roberts | Link | Original Link

As the UVA rape story falls apart, and Rolling Stone's disregard for journalistic ethics has become a topic of national conversation, some journalists are still desperately clinging to the idea that the reporter behind the hoax, Sabrina Erdely, did nothing wrong and was the hapless victim of a massive con job. One of these journalists is Geoff Mulvihill, an Associated Press writer for the New Jersey area.

This week, he wrote "Retracted Rolling Stone story is rare demerit for its writer." The article, which borders on the hagiographic, is an attempt to rehabilitate Erdley in the eyes of the public after her disastrous journalistic failure. Mulvihill says, "Some of those who have worked with her see her as diligent and sensitive." He quotes an additional source:

> (The revelation of the hoax) was very painful for (Erdely), and I think more painful than all of the things written about her was the feeling that she had been betrayed by a source that she trusted and invested a lot of time and emotional energy on.

And another source:

> As an editor, if I had to pick a reporter to nail a story based on their reporting chops, Sabrina would have been right up there. She's just dogged.

The message of the article is perfectly clear: Erdely isn't to be blamed for publishing a story she certainly knew was false, and that she knew would have tremendous consequences for the falsely accused. This was a temporary lapse by an otherwise shining star of a reporter. Mulvihill wants the reader to know that she was duped by her source, “Jackie,” whom the article describes as “a really expert fabulist storyteller” who “manipulated the magazine’s journalism process.”

Lying by omission?

Mulvihill’s piece is not an editorial, but rather an Associated Press news article, and as such it is seemingly carefully written to avoid giving the direct opinion of its author. Associated Press guidelines call for its articles to be strictly written to be as free of bias as possible, so that they can be used by any newspaper regardless of its position. It’s clear, however, that Mulvihill is being very picky as to what facts he decides to present to the public.

For example, while he quotes a former co-worker of hers as saying, “Except for this — and that’s a big exception — her work is solid,” he does not tell the reader that Erdely has previously been accused of falsifying stories and undisclosed conflicts of interest. These accusations were not made by a fringe, unreliable source either—they came from a former writer for the Los Angeles Times and Philidelphia Inquirer (the same paper Mr. Mulvihill used to work at), and appeared in major national magazine Newsweek.

There are additional charges from other reputable sources as well, none of which Mulvihill sees fit to share with the public. All these charges have been in the media since late last year, and were well-known to anyone who’s been following the case closely. It is unlikely, to say the least, that Mulvihill was not aware of them, which makes his decision not to include any reference to them in his story puzzling.

Why did he write the article at all?

The most puzzling question, however, is why Mulvihill, a reporter for the New Jersey area, is writing about this story at all. Rolling Stone is headquartered in New York, not New Jersey. Nor, obviously, is the University of Virginia located in New Jersey. Mulvihill has not written on the UVA rape case before, nor does he have any special expertise on the matter.

A list of his columns can be found here, with titles like “Developer who didn’t repay loans gets New Jersey tax credits” and “Late winter snowstorm blankets South, Northeast.” So why is he suddenly writing about events that occurred far outside of his usual territory?

Mr. Mulvihill's last several columns. Note that all but his most recent concern local New Jersey politics.

A look at his LinkedIn biography provides a possible answer: both Mulvihill and Erdely are long-time residents of Philadelphia, and his writing career began in that city more or less contemporaneously with hers. While they never worked for the same magazine or paper, they've traveled in the same journalistic social circles for almost 20 years.

The odds that after almost 20 years Mulvihill is not personally acquainted with Erdely are slim to none. He may very well be a friend of hers. If this is the case, it makes his motive in writing the article quite obvious—it's an attempt to rehabilitate the image of a longtime friend, whose failures and biases are now the talk of the nation.

Sabrina Erdely's Linked-In Profile at left. Geoff Mulvihill's Linked-In at right. Both began writing in Philadelphia in the late 90s, and have lived there ever since.

He is, of course, free to say whatever he likes about his friend or close colleague. If he wants everyone to know he thinks she's a good person, or a good reporter, he may tell whoever he likes. Problems arise, however, when he conceals his own relationship with the subject of the piece, and attempts to use the reputation of the Associated Press for unbiased reporting to help someone he knows. While it does not rise to the level of Erdely's libel, if this is true, it is still a serious ethical breach.

Many of Erdely's failures were lies by omission. For example, she didn't tell the reader that she'd never verified that the rape took place with anyone but her source. It is ironic that, in defending her, Mulvihill may have lied by omission himself.

(I've reached out to Mulvihill by Twitter for his response to these accusations, and have heard nothing as of the time this article was filed.)

Is Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig Single-Handedly Destroying The New Republic?

April 8, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig is a staff columnist for The New Republic and a contributor to numerous magazines, including The Atlantic, The Nation and Salon. In the wake of Rolling Stone retracting Sabrina Rubin Erdely's phony article on rape at the University of Virginia, Stoker Bruenig penned an incomprehensible response claiming that the problem with Rubin Erdely's article was that "it used rightwing tactics to make a leftist point":

> The left tends to view oppression as something that operates within systems, sometimes in clearly identifiable structural biases, and other times in subtle but persistent ways. Mortgage discrimination against black families over the last century is an example of a structural, on-the-books bias that had an extraordinarily damaging impact on African Americans; but the fact that black children are read as older and less innocent than their white peers, while neither a law nor a regulation, is of a piece with the overall oppression of black folks in America, resulting in subtle treatment by teachers and authority figures that alienates black children from wider society starting at a very tender age. These disparate forms of discrimination come together, in the left imagination, to form a tightly composed set of prejudices and policies that are difficult to disentangle. Making sense of oppression, therefore, requires looking at entire systems of oppression, not just specific instances or behaviors.

Stoker Bruenig has already been raked over the coals for her muddled prose and malapropisms, but her hypocrisy and bigotry has received little mention. Her views on the UVA rape hoax are part of a broader pattern of anti-male hatred. The fact that The New Republic continues to employ this female typist is a huge strike against their credibility.

Stoker Bruenig's History Of Hatred And Hypocrisy

Long before Rolling Stone published "A Rape on Campus," Stoker Bruenig had a history of making bigoted comments about men. For example, she has repeatedly (and falsely) claimed that fraternities have a "gang rape" problem and are no different than prisons. Both she and her husband Matt Bruenig support banning fraternities from colleges based on faulty sociology, and her hatred of them runs so deep that she chose her alma mater, Brandeis, in part to avoid them:

Stoker Bruenig is no stranger to making false accusations against men herself. Two months ago, she claimed that Return of Kings publisher Roosh Valizadeh had made a "rape threat" against her. Her "evidence" was a tongue-in-cheek Tweet Roosh made asking his followers to gauge how attractive she was:

So I mentioned a pickup artist's forum in a piece, now he is threatening to have sex with me, b/c sex with him is some kind of punishment

The irony of Stoker Bruenig's false accusation against Roosh (and her references to "pick-up artists" as "garbage") is that she's a fan of a real (statutory) rapist: Mark Ames. In a recent New Republic article on the Germanwings crash, Stoker Bruenig approvingly referenced Ames' writings:

> Theories of Lubitz's motives proliferated in the aftermath of the crash. Though Lubitz left no manifesto and made no statement at any time as to the meaning of his actions, some are still convinced his was an act of terrorism. An ex-girlfriend of Lubitz's has come forward to claim that the co-pilot fantasized about fame and notoriety, and must have become distraught when he realized his dreams of a job at Lufthansa, the largest airline in Europe, were unlikely to come true. Author Mark Ames, who has written a book on rage killings in the United States, has raised the possibility that Lubitz's actions were those of a disgruntled employee, not unlike the postal shootings of the '80s and '90s.

In his 2000 memoir The Exile: Sex, Drugs, and Libel in the New Russia, Ames bragged about sleeping with a 15-year-old girl and also wrote about how he threatened to murder his girlfriend if she didn't get an abortion:

> Right then, I stared at Katya with a look—I'm not sure how it appeared to her, but in my mind, I was starting to contemplate two courses of action: murder, or AWOL.
> "What will you do, kill me?" she said, laughing nervously.
> "Maybe, yeah," I replied. "I'll throw you off my balcony. I'll make it look like an accident."
> She started to cry, but I was relentless. I told her that if she had the child, she > would be killing me, so it was an act of self-defense. And if I didn't kill her, then I would flee Moscow and she'd never find me… I was relentless. I attacked her the Russian way: I wore her down for hours during the night, KGB interrogation-style.

> At 5:30 the next morning, Katya, acting the martyr, quietly slipped out of my apartment, made a beeline to the abortion clinic, and sucked the little fucker out.

If it seems odd that a self-professed Christian socialist and feminist would praise a soi-disant misogynist like Mark Ames, consider that Stoker Bruenig thinks that right-wing female politicians such as Joni Ernst and Sarah Palin should endure vicious, sexist attacks that she would label "harassment" if they were directed at women of the left.

Also consider that despite being a socialist calling for wealth redistribution, Stoker Bruenig and her husband are quite wealthy themselves, as shown by her education at Brandeis and this selfie:

It's clear that Stoker Bruenig is a firm believer in "do as I say, not as I do," so it's not shocking that she's latched onto Rolling Stone's rape hoax.

Why Stoker Bruenig Should Be Fired

The New Republic is a magazine that is unusually susceptible to hiring frauds and liars: they were the home of infamous fabulist Stephen Glass. While they survived Glass' fabrications, they may not be able to survive Stoker Bruenig's foolishness. Her incoherent, freshman-level prose and nonsensical beliefs are enough to disqualify her from writing for any serious publication, but it's Stoker Bruenig's bigotry and hatefulness that truly make her repulsive.

In order to retain their credibility, The New Republic needs to fire Stoker Bruenig immediately. Through her writings and actions, she has shown herself to be a craven hypocrite with no morals or maturity. Only by removing Stoker Bruenig from their masthead can The New Republic avoid having their reputation destroyed.

Why Most Women Didn’t Want The Right To Vote

April 8, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

The popular narrative today is that women demanded the right to vote and the menfolk just told them no until they got tired of their whining. After all, why wouldn’t a woman want more rights?

Turns out there are plenty of reasons why most women would want their own rights restricted, and they all have to do with women knowing the true nature of women. As the saying goes, “A misogynist is a man who hates women as much as women hate each other.” Women know exactly how terrible they can be. A feminist friend of mine once told me, “I envy men, because you can put two random guys in a college dorm together and they’ll get along, but that never happens with two random girls.”

The anti-suffragist organizations had the same numbers among women in America and the United Kingdom as the suffragist organizations, often even excluding men from joining. More women than men were opposed to women’s suffrage. In fairness, some of these groups supported women’s suffrage in local elections.

A bit misandrist of the anti-suffragists if you ask me…

But all of them feared the hell that would be spawned from complete women's suffrage, namely the soft socialism we live in today. Ever notice how everything Obama says is pro-woman but that he's dialed-down his pro-black agenda? It's because women are the only fans he still has left. Even the blacks don't want him anymore.

Here's a few reasons why women themselves did not want to involve themselves in politics.

Less Than Feminine

It's unbecoming for a woman to be caught up in the affairs of politics. It just isn't sexy. Nobody likes an activist. A woman doped up on Fox News or HuffPo is as disturbing as your stepmother screaming at the referee at a high school basketball game.

Women get passionate about things, often that whichever her man is passionate about. This can be a very good thing in the right contexts. In the wrong contexts, it's terrifying. A friend of mine used to be big into Rush Limbaugh, and he decided to involve his wife in his passion. But she was a psychopath in general, and he became horrified at this terrifying right-wing beast he had created. He saw her general hatred and cruelty magnified in her political views.

Mental Floss writes [emphasis mine],

> Another Massachusetts woman, writing in 1916, expressed concerns on the effect of the suffrage movement on women's character. Suffragism appeared overtly aggressive to many critics. "It is surely not making them any more lovely, or pleasant in their lives. They grow bitter, aggressive, and antagonistic, liking the excitement of campaigning and finding their natural, proper > duties 'flat, stale, and unprofitable.'"

Be as offended as you want, but how many women have you met who were bitter, aggressive, and antagonistic over their political views? Why would a woman want to turn into that? And how many more women than men have you met with that demeanor? Being married to a woman invested in politics or social theory is like being married to that one passive-aggressive co-worker who is best friends with the manager.

Today more women than men vote, especially single women, although married women vote more often than single women. Single women are more likely to vote Democrat than married women, and men are more likely to vote Republican than either of them. Whether it's the financial support or the moral guidance of a husband, women tend to be right-wing when influenced by a man (hence why the left keeps trying to destroy the nuclear family).

And if you are a man who votes Democrat, then yes, you vote like a girl. And probably the kind of ugly girl no man wants to commit to instead of the young hot Presbyterian Sunday school teacher.

Part of the reason women tend to vote Democrat is because women are terrible with money and math. This is the same reason kids are taught in school to pursue their dream job instead of learning a trade that will provide a secure income.

Bad For The Family

Ultimate History Project writes,

> One year later, on April 3, 1914, [Theodore Roosevelt's cousin-in-law Kate] Roosevelt's diary mentions Mrs. Martin speaking at the home of Mrs. Henry Seligman, wife of the millionaire banker…According to the Times, Mrs. Martin proceeded to tear to tatters the great new cause. The audience listened to her demolition of the suffrage movement "We are not merely against feminism, > but for the family. We cannot reconcile feminism and the family. We hope to hear the sound of women's feet, walking away from the factory and back to the home."

Notice the idea of suffrage is connected to women in careers. Ideas do not exist in isolation. The barefoot and pregnant Catholic housewife with five children is a far happier person than the sulky feminist writer who retires to squeeze out a retarded child in her late 30s conceived through in vitro.

Women often don't transition well from the office to the home, becoming bored and listless after being used to the high energy (and germophobic) environment of work. Furthermore, the reason feminist writers think careers are fulfilling is because writing feminist literature is fun. Most women (and men) don't have careers—they have jobs where they work at the grocery store and hate life.

This claim that women's entrance into politics and the workforce would destroy the family was not merely the anti-suffrage position. The suffragists themselves admitted that a war between the sexes was a major reason they wanted the right to vote.

> Dr. Anna Shaw, President of the National American Women's Suffrage Association called anti-suffragists the "home, hearth and mother crowd." Obviously, she was not interested in any of these identities. When asked why there was no marriage in heaven, Dr. Shaw brazenly responded, "Because there are no men in heaven." Like many suffragettes, she felt that men were not necessary and women, banding together could take care of themselves and live happily ever-after in a female-dominated world and after-life.

A declining population rate is not relevant to her ideology, because feminism is all about the desires of the individual. Feminism is an ideology that glorifies selfishness. Don't try to look attractive for the man in your life. Don't stay at home investing in your children during their developmental years. Don't bother learning skills to make a home run efficiently. Don't be concerned whether your future husband is uncomfortable about the previous men in your life you've slept with. Don't go out of your way to do nice things to serve your husband.

Miserable Ideas

Women were the main supporters of prohibition in America. Once alcohol was outlawed, not only was social life boring, but organized crime flourished.

You can tell a lot about a society by its attitudes towards alcohol. Notice the religious groups that have a strict ban on alcohol—Mormons, Muslims, and most protestant Christians—have the most socially awkward people. They also do some of the most obnoxious moral crusading.

Women are the bulwark of the modern Democratic party. They are the ones who push so hard for our welfare state. Women are also the ones who control the education industry. They are the ones who want to ruin safe schools by bussing in ghetto kids from across town. They are the ones who pushed all that rain forest crap down our throats in the 90s.

Ideological Idolatry

Anarchist and radical feminist Emma Goldman wrote an essay against women's suffrage. She refers to the suffrage movement as fetish worship, as though it's something that's in style but isn't normal. Her comments on suffragettes' fascist attitudes sound like they are written against general liberalism today.

> Those who have not yet achieved that goal fight bloody revolutions to obtain it, and those who have enjoyed its reign bring heavy sacrifice to the altar of this omnipotent diety. Woe to the heretic who dare question that divinity!

This short essay is actually fairly red pill and goes beyond suffrage. I realize that women are usually bad at philosophy, but once in a while one comes a long that really makes an impression on you (I had a female philosophy professor in college who was absolutely fantastic). I'll be frank and say that I really enjoyed this essay despite our differences in ideology and the essay's internal contradictions. There's several quotable passages I'll have to skip over.

Daytime Television

Goldman talks about how women are followers, whether in a religion or in a social ideology. She makes an interesting argument that most women who want suffrage do so so that they may become more deeply enslaved by the church and state. That sounds crazy until you think about how much today is either illegal, borderline illegal, or such strict social taboo that it might as well be illegal.

> Woman's demand for equal suffrage is based largely on the contention that woman must have the equal right in all affairs of society. No one could, possibly, refute that, if suffrage were a right. Alas, for the ignorance of the human mind, which can see a right in an imposition. Or is it not the most brutal imposition for one set of people to make laws that another set is coerced by force to obey? Yet woman clamors for that "golden opportunity" that has wrought so much misery in the world, and robbed man of his integrity and self-reliance; an imposition which has thoroughly corrupted the people, and made them absolute prey in the hands of unscrupulous politicians.

If you look at history, democracy has rarely worked well. It is not rule by the majority but rule by the loudest. And who is louder than a woman? Who is more passionate? And when women follow others like lemmings, we see that women's suffrage can quickly become destructive.

True, the monarch could be oppressive, take away your rights, censor speech, enact things that the most people are opposed to, and often make the common people miserable and impoverished. But how is that any different than modern western democracies? At least the monarch could accomplish things. Our government can't get anything done except throw away money.

Furthermore, the monarch has the all-seeing God, his family legacy, and anxious nobles with small armies breathing down his neck to help make sure he does what's best for the country. In the democracy, it's greedy corporations and small minorities of activists who control the political narrative. Which is the lesser evil?

> The poor, stupid, free American citizen! Free to starve, free to tramp the highways of this great country, he enjoys universal suffrage, and, by that right, he has forged chains about his limbs. The reward that he receives is stringent labor laws prohibiting the right of boycott, of picketing, in fact, of everything, except the right to be robbed of the fruits of his labor.

Goldman continues by comparing countries and states that already have suffrage to those without. She mentions Australia's new complex labor laws that make "strikes without the sanction of an arbitration committee a crime equal to treason." In fairness, she says that this is not necessarily the fault of women's suffrage but that at least women's suffrage was not able to help the workers despite claims that women are more compassionate.

Would not bang

After elaborating on a few other examples of how women's suffrage has not made those societies better, Goldman continues on about the nature of women's moral philosophy.

> Woman, essentially a purist, is naturally bigoted and relentless in her effort to make others as good as she thinks they ought to be…In this regard the law must needs be of feminine gender: it always prohibits…Prostitution and gambling have never done a more flourishing business than since the law has been set against them. […]
> I wonder if they understand that it is the very thing which, instead of elevating woman, has made her a political spy, a contemptible pry into the private affairs of people, not so much for the good of the cause, but because, as a Colorado woman said, "they like to get into houses they have never been in, and find out all they can, politically and otherwise."…For nothing satisfies the craving of most women so much as scandal.

It's like a prophecy. Which of anything has she said that has not come true? And it is not merely women in politics, but women in journalism in vile gossip publications like Gawker.

For clarification, in Latin and its descendent languages, the word for law is feminine in gender, which I think the line "In this regard the law must needs be of feminine gender" is referring to.

Progress

We have this idea as a society that we are constantly getting smarter with each generation. Yet if you read old books, you find that man has gradually become stupider over the centuries. Even just 100 years ago, people—both men and women—still had the common sense to not shoot themselves in the foot over women's issues.

Today we have this sense of rights in general, like we are entitled by God at best and by Nothing at worst to have certain laws in place. Where God or Nothing promised this to us is beyond me.

The liberal atheist believes in these human rights more than anyone, even though he doesn't believe in a god and therefore has no basis for his natural law philosophy. At the least it would make sense for him to believe in whatever is either the oldest or the most universal morality, but instead most atheists jump ahead to whatever new moral fad will fill the emptiness. Just because religion is the opium of the masses doesn't mean mankind doesn't need an opium.

The religious person isn't any more off the hook. Nowhere in the Bible is tolerance, equality, or democracy mentioned, and I doubt they are very prevalent in other religions. The Bible doesn't say much about politics, but one could make the best guess that while a king may or may not be appointed by God, a senator or president is clearly appointed by man, and therefore democracy isn't Biblical.

Conclusion

But that is just food for thought. The point in all of the above is that women conventionally were not in favor of women's rights even when offered them. Feminism did not come like the awaited messiah it's portrayed as. Instead the feminists just bitched loud enough, took control of academia, and were encourage by sexless men.

Women always take the beliefs of those around them. Better a man who loves her to have the strongest influence over her beliefs and actions than her catty girlfriends who despise her for being more attractive.

How To Spot Pop Culture Indoctrination

April 8, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The popular media (Hollywood movies, television, music, commercials, comics, etc.) has always been aware of its ability to influence public opinion. As early as 1960, television shows such as the Twilight Zone were conveying messages to the public.

In the Twilight Zone episode The Monsters are Due on Maple Street, aliens rely on the inherent prejudice of middle class suburbanites to induce them to paranoia. The residents of Maple Street end up killing each other out of suspicion so that the aliens can take over without firing a shot.

In case the viewers were too dense to get the message, the show explicitly clobbers them over the head at the end of the episode:

> The tools of conquest do not necessarily come with bombs and explosions and fallout. There are weapons that are simply thoughts, attitudes, prejudices — to be found only in the minds of men. For the record, prejudices can kill — and suspicion can destroy — and a thoughtless frightened search for a scapegoat has a fallout all of its own — for the children — and the children yet unborn. And the pity of it is — that these things cannot be confined — to the Twilight Zone.

The media is effective because it presents its message under the guise of entertainment. People who would resent hearing a moralistic sermon at church have no problem getting browbeaten for two hours while watching a preachy film like the 2004 movie Crash.

Same Sex Marriage

But usually, the messages are presented in a less heavy-handed way. The NBC sitcom Will & Grace, which ran from 1998 until 2006, adroitly made use of comedy and charming characters to introduce the wider public to gay culture.

Vice President Biden stated that Will & Grace "probably did more to educate the American public on LGBT issues more than almost anything anybody has ever done so far." It is not an overstatement to say that the sitcom paved the way for the success of the same-sex marriage movement.

Girl Power!

Another familiar trope in the media is that women can do anything that men can do. It is based on the idea that men have systematically oppressed women since the beginning of the human race. Because of this oppression, women no longer have the confidence to try to achieve great things.

If women could only be convinced of their inherent greatness, they would design buildings, make scientific discoveries, engineer bridges, and conquer empires at exactly the same rate as men—except that they would be better at it.

Any deviation from the idea that men and women are equal in every way is met with immediate outrage. When Harvard President Lawrence Summers suggested that the shortage of women in the sciences was partially due to innate differences in mathematical ability, there was an uproar. Summers was forced to apologize and resign. The Church of Progressivism brooks no heresy—not even from one of its own.

The Girl Power message crops up in the most unlikely places. If you are a fan of the work of J.R.R. Tolkien, you may have noticed that the movie, The Hobbit: The Desolation of Smaug, introduced a new character that was not in the original book—a female warrior elf.

While director Peter Jackson had remained scrupulously faithful to Tolkien's original vision with The Lord of the Rings movies, he must have felt pressure to include a Girl Power character in The Hobbit series. Evangeline Lily, the actress who played the female warrior elf, put it this way: "In this day and age, to put nine hours of cinema in the theaters for young girls to go and watch and not have one female character is subliminally telling them you don't count, you're not important and you're not pivotal to story."

It is not just movies of course. In 2014, Marvel Comics launched a new Thor, who just happens to now be a woman.

Doing something like this is a win-win for Marvel. It attracts lots of free publicity for the company. People who are upset with Thor becoming a woman will be labeled as troglodytes who need to stop hating and keep up with the times. Progressive outlets will praise Marvel for its courage. But if it turns out that the new female Thor does not sell very well, the old Thor will quietly return.

Transgender

Laverne Cox

Even though the media was victorious in its campaigns to mainstream same-sex relationships and to push Girl Power, don't think that the march of progress will stop there. The media is now pushing the next phase of correct thinking and behavior.

One of these new messages is the mainstream acceptance of transgender individuals. Vice President Biden has called transgender discrimination "the civil rights issue of our time," and President Obama even mentioned transgender people in his State of the Union speech.

We are already starting to see more transgender individuals on television. Of course there was the famous appearance of Chaz Bono on Dancing With The Stars back in 2011. Bono was also the subject of a documentary film called Becoming Chaz that detailed his experiences in transitioning from female to male.

Actress Laverne Cox is a transgender woman who stars on the Netflix series Orange Is The New Black. In 2014, Cox became the first transgender person to appear on the cover of Time magazine. Lauren Levinson, an editor at Popsugar, described Cox as having "doll eyes, glowing skin, and voluminous curls."

Reality TV is getting into the act as well. The E! Television network was developing a show to document the transition from male to female of former Olympian Bruce Jenner. Plans for the show have been temporarily shelved due to Jenner's involvement in an auto accident that left one person dead, but I would not be surprised to see it restart once the legal issues are settled.

Bruce Jenner – Making the transition

Finally, we are probably going to see more transgender individuals in commercials. Some edgy companies, like American Apparel, have already started this with their use of transgender models and their controversial use of a 15-year-old boy named Brendan in one of their most recent ads.

Conclusion

What is next on the agenda? I'd be interested to hear your thoughts in the comments. My guess is that we will see campaigns for the mainstream acceptance of more alternative lifestyles such as polygamy and polyamory.

The one thing we can be sure of, though, is that our elites will continue to use the media to teach us the right path—or at least the one that lines their wallets and fortifies their power.

9 People In The Media Who Are Upset Jackie Coakley Wasn't Raped By White Men

An entire fraternity was persecuted by the Rolling Stone for a crime that wasn't committed, but the following prominent individuals care more about future rape "victims" instead of actual male victims of the establishment whose lives suffered due to the efforts of their media colleagues. Gretchen's take: Greatest tragedy in Rolling Stone story

5 Ways To Escape The 9-to-5 Grind

April 9, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

A quick look around the manosphere will reveal mass amounts of young men who are sick to the back teeth with the prospect of the “go to college, get a career, get married, have kids and die” paradigm of the previous generation.

And who can blame them?

In today’s world of technology, travel, and seemingly unlimited options – we don’t have to follow this paradigm laid out for us by the previous generation.

I left home at 17 and began searching for an alternative to this system and way of life. After a decade of searching and looking, eventually finding what was right for me and living life on my own terms, I’ve come up with a list of five ways you can have an alternative lifestyle and live free.

1. Teach English overseas

Teaching is one option for escaping the 9-5 by going abroad.

Yes it's cliché and yes it has been said a million times before, but that's because this is possibly the easiest and most popular way to get away from home and make some money.

There is an absolutely HUGE demand for English teachers all over Asia, South America, and the Middle East. If the job market sucks at home and you need a way out, this would be your best bet.

After my article on why Asia may be the best place for a young western man a some people asked HOW to get started in teaching English. I've written this article and provided links at the bottom to accredited courses for those who are seriously interested. There are a lot of useless, scam TEFL courses out there so it is important to pick one that you will actually get a job with.

There are 1.3 billion people in China and approximately another 600 million in the ASEAN nations of South East Asia, and they all want or need to learn English to get ahead in their careers and lives.

If you have the adventurous spirit and are willing to live within humble means for a year or two until you get experience and the more lucrative jobs become available, all those people means a lot of opportunity for you. You'll generally be expected to work about 20-30 hours a week and be paid decent cash.

Heck, living in the tropics isn't half bad either.

2. Day trade

Day trading can lucrative, but also risky.

Day trading is not something you should take lightly. It is a fact that the majority of people who do it lose money over the long run. However, that's because most people have no clue what they are doing and trade too often.

I personally would never choose this as my one and only source of income, but for those with less responsibility and a little capital to get started it can be a lucrative way to live with location independence and not have the man breathing down your neck.

Thankfully due to the function of short selling and spread betting you can make money even when the market in general or a specific share price is falling.

Again, this is not for the faint at heart or those who value a steady pay check and security. For those with the gonads to live by their wits and the patience to study properly and learn how things work, however, this could be the Willy Wonka ticket to wealth and freedom.

Tread carefully if you choose this option.

3. Work in offshore oil and gas

This is one of the most lucrative fields on the planet, as I outlined on Return of Kings before.

However, this option is virtually closed to those without either connections or some in-demand trade or skill. It's also worth mentioning that now is not the best time to approach this industry, as times are tight and it could be a couple of years before things bounce back and jobs become widely available again.

That being said, if you are willing to retrain and skill up it could be the perfect time to do so and prepare for when things do kick back into action.

Offshore work is hard, dirty, and you work long hours. If you are willing to do that you will be rewarded with a fat pay check, six months off per year, and the ability to work in some of the most remote, adventurous places on Earth.

So far I've been doing it for three years and have worked in West Papua, Indonesia, and Australia. The check comes in at a little under 15k per month on the rig.

Tradesmen and workin' horses – this is your ticket to the big leagues if you are willing to take it. All that time off can be used to start a business, travel or just spend quality time with your family if you have one.

4. Freelance

It probably won’t look quite like this, but close enough!

If you have a skill that is in demand these days and are good at what you do, there is absolutely no need to be tied down to a cubicle in some mind-numbing, soul-destroying corporate office.

Web designers, graphic artists, writers, and computer programmers are all examples of those who can make a living in the ever-growing freelance industry found online at sites like Odesk and ifreelance.

When I was traveling in Thailand I met a Swedish guy who worked as a freelance computer programmer writing code for a big company. He literally did about six hours work per day and spent the rest of the day catching waves and having full body massages on the beach in Koh Samui.

It may not provide you with the security of the office job, but then if you really wanted that you probably wouldn’t have read this article to begin with. Freelancing is a growing sector, and my guess is there will be a trend towards this kind of work arrangement in the future.

Why not get ahead of the game and start now?

5. Become an entrepreneur

There's really no way to quantify this category because it covers such a wide range of possible occupations and ventures.

Let's just say this – there are plenty of people doing things their own way, answering to no boss and living life on their own terms by embracing their inner entrepreneur and running their own businesses.

I've met a few from all different walks of life during my eight years in Asia. One guy flew all over the world setting up blimps at concerts and fairs, one ran a bar on Bali and seemingly was having the time of his life doing shots out of tourists' titties on a nightly basis for a living, a few exported furniture and crafts from Indonesia, while many more ran blogs and websites selling goods and services.

If you relocate somewhere in South America or Asia for a year or two, the money you have saved should multiply by a factor of two or three compared to the cost of living at home, buying you a lot more time to get your venture off the ground.

If that isn't your thing you can stay right where you are and do it there. There are thousands of successful entrepreneurs in America and Europe, with more popping up every day.

Summary

It's a world full of opportunity and change. We are not trapped the way our grandfathers were – working for the same shitty company for fifty years and getting a gold watch and a pat on the back on the way out the door to retirement.

Opportunity to live an alternative way of life is available like never before. If that's what you want to do and you dread the idea of working in a traditional career and way of life, I'm here to tell you that YOU DON'T HAVE TO.

Rolling Stone Editor Sean Woods Allows His Far Left Beliefs To Get In The Way Of Facts

April 9, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Rolling Stone writer Sabrina Rubin Erdely is in the midst of a controversy on account of her gross negligence in fact-checking her incendiary article A Rape On Campus. Sean Woods, the man tasked with keeping her on a leash, however, doesn't seem to be catching as much heat as he should be. Woods is more at fault than even Erdely for this debacle because he was the editor and made the executive decision to publish it, even though the facts had not been 100% verified.

Who is Sean Woods?

Sean Woods has an editor for Rolling Stone since 2004 (he is now the Deputy Editor). He's also been a contributing editor for Men's Journal. Woods has done a number of notable interviews including a Q&A with Breaking Bad's Jonathan Banks, and an interview with show's creator Vince Gilligan. He has also had sit downs with the likes of comic book legend Stan Lee and the godfather of skateboarding, Tony Hawk.

Woods is also a bona fide social justice warrior. He's predictably jumped on the PC bandwagon to oust embattled Indiana Governor Mike Pence over the recent RFRA law he attempted to push through recently.

Woods has also commented on climate change, wrongful imprisonment, and the ongoing devastation in Syria—all of the "causes" typical SJWs bitch and moan about but do little to actually help other than squawking.

Given Woods's background it should come as no surprise that he was the linchpin in the unleashing of the biggest media hoax in the last 10 years. Erdely's fact checking was suspect to begin with, but Woods failed miserably as an editor by allowing the story to be published anyway, and admitted as much:

> I've learned that even the most trusted and experienced people — including, and maybe especially, myself — can make grave errors in judgment.
> -Sean Woods

It's clear he's trying to distribute the blame whilst making it look like he's falling on the sword and taking responsibility for his actions (or lack thereof).

Where did Woods fail?

Woods' abject failure as an editor started when the accuser, "Jackie," began to flake on producing the three friends she supposedly called the night of the false rape for interviews to corroborate her story. Alex Stock, Ryan Duffin, and Kathryn Hendley were mysteriously unavailable to chat with Erdely, but the accuser had no problem putting words in their mouths that seemed to paint them in a bad light:

> No! … I'm in a fraternity here, Jackie, I don't want the Greek system to go down, and it seems like that's what you want to happen. … I don't want to be a part of whatever little shit show you're running.
> -"Jackie" quoting Duffin to Erdely

It was never verified that Duffin actually spoke these words to Jackie but Erdely irresponsibly took her at her word. Based on that statement Erdely assumed that Duffin probably wasn't going to come forward at that point, so she decided to focus on Hendley and Stock, but had her reservations about pursuing them for statements, fearing Jackie might go AWOL and grind the story to a halt.

Erdely stated that Hendley and Stock were "always on her list of people to track down" but she never followed through because she "grew busy" working the case. So rather than tracking down the three people who could authenticate the story, she decided to get Woods' blessing to print a story that didn't have a factual leg to stand on.

Woods, of course, took the bait. Despite the lack of concrete factual accounts of what happened that night, unconfirmed statements made by Jackie's (now former) friends, and a story rife with inconsistencies such as Jackie's date that night having magically changed from a lifeguard to a chemistry student named "Haven Monahan" (whom neither the Charlottesville PD nor the University could identify as a student), Woods gave his blessing and let the story go to print.

To add insult to (legal) injury, he even allowed the "shit show" quote into the article even though it was never verified by Duffin that he had actually said it.

The bottom line here is that if they continued to dig at all, their precious rape story would have fallen apart and they knew it. But instead of maintaining journalistic integrity, Woods decided to put his and Erdley's careers, and the lives of countless people, at risk over a story that only serves to fuel the false "rape culture" narrative.

Too little too late

More than two weeks after the story ran, Erdely finally decided to voice her concerns to Woods about the validity of the story after a conversation with Jackie:

> We proceeded to have a conversation that led me to have serious doubts

Woods, of course, was already well aware of these discrepancies, so in order to save face in the light of this "shocking revelation," "raced into the office" to decide what to do next. At this point Rolling Stone had no choice but to retract the story altogether and Woods predictably showed faux regret.

> It was the worst day of my professional life.

Woods tendered his resignation but Rolling Stone opted to allow him to remain employed there. This stunt has PR campaign written all over it, but whatever the case may be, the damage has been already been done.

What makes matters worse is that Woods appears to still be treating "Jackie" as a rape victim even though the story has long since been outed as a hoax. Two days ago he dropped this gem:

> Ultimately, we were too deferential to our rape victim; we honored too many of her requests in our reporting. We should have been much tougher, and in not doing that, we maybe did her a disservice.

Commenter MidJack on RVF echoed the sentiments of men everywhere:

> Did her a disservice? What about those she slandered?

In conclusion

Sean Woods needs to be fired. Allowing a fabricated story of this magnitude to be published is the cardinal sin of journalism. Regardless of how stretched thin his colleagues claim he is, journalistic integrity is the most important aspect of being a writer or editor.

Woods' fake resignation and the subsequent rejection of said resignation isn't fooling anyone. Rolling Stone needs to honor his wishes and get rid of him.

10 Steps To Stop Being A Fatass

April 9, 2015 | by Brian Drums | Link | Original Link

One of the primary tenets of the neomasculine movement is keeping your body in good condition, or to put it more bluntly: don't be a typical pot-bellied neckbeard who gets winded opening a can of Pringles. Like anything else in life, your physical stature can be traced back to your habits; good habits will get you the body you want, bad habits will turn you into a miserable fatass.

It’s a glandular problem

Some of you reading this have ripped chests, shredded abs and look like a million bucks. Well done and keep up the good work. But it is a statistical guarantee that many of you are obese and cannot seem to right the ship. You’ve tried fad diets and gym memberships but still you’re struggling to find your dick when you look down. The following are simple tips, tricks and realizations that will help you drop the weight.

This is not an article about how to get ripped. This is guide on how to fix a situation that has gotten completely out of control, written by a man who was once 300lbs+ and has lost 100lbs+ (and counting).

1. Realize That You Didn’t Gain 100 Pounds Overnight

None of us were born fat; we got there by making some really bad choices, like eating fast food or buttering up our morning coffee.

Maybe we were athletes in high school, got to college, and stopped playing sports, discovered beer and the 24-hour drive-thru. Here’s the point: it took years to get to this level and you need to understand that it will likely take years to get back to where you want to be.

It’s hard to have this attitude in a world where everyone wants everything done on the spot, but as soon you can accept the reality of the situation the improvement process can begin.

2. Set Reasonable Goals

So you want to lose 50 pounds? Great! You want to lose it in a month? Unless you adopt a steady diet of Marlboro reds and blow, it’s not happening. Trying to lose that much weight in such a short amount of time is not good for you (there’s a reason contestants on The Biggest Loser have serious health issues after leaving the show).

Here is a much better weight loss goal: lose one pound a week. Yeah, it’s slow, but it’s also reasonable, healthy, and attainable. At a pound a week you would hit your goal in one year with gradual changes you can stick to, which segues nicely into…

3. Don’t Try Drastic Dietary Changes

[image]

So right now you’re eating fast food, drinking soda daily and freebasing cookie dough.

You decide enough is enough and come up with a plan: plain oatmeal for breakfast, a salad for lunch, a chicken breast with a side of broccoli for dinner and no more soda, just six glasses of water a day.

You will not last a week. You'll do great on Monday and go to bed at night feeling good about your new lifestyle. Tuesday comes and you forget to grab the salad from the refrigerator in the morning, so you grab a burger because you have to eat something or you'll be "starving" all day. Wednesday you remember the salad but forgot that it was Janet in accounting's birthday and you all chipped in for a cake.

Thursday night you are making your chicken and dreading the thought of more veggies after that lunch salad so you decide to cook up some fries. Friday is happy hour and you can't skip that, so you go out for some wings and mozzarella sticks while washing it down with four beers or sugary mixed drinks. Sound familiar?

Look, most people cannot live one way for years and do a complete 180 overnight. Instead, try to make simple, gradual changes. Do you drink a 20oz Pepsi with lunch and have dessert three nights a week? Start here: replace the soda with a glass of water and make dessert one night a week. It will be much easier to sustain.

4. Don't Make The Same Mistake With Exercise

You sign up at your local gym, promise yourself that you will go every day before work, and it goes down the same way as your new food plan: you start off well but fade after a few days. A couple weeks go by and you realize the problem is how early you have to get up so you decide to go after work, but you're too tired and end up going home instead. A month goes by and you have nothing to show except twenty bucks being debited from your account.

It's the same principle with exercise as it is with food: you'll likely fail trying to go from 0 to 60. If your current exercise routine consists of walking four blocks to McDonalds then you're probably not going to start hitting the gym five days a week. Instead, try doing 20-30 minutes of basic exercises a day.

Once this becomes too easy for you add some extra cardio, a few more reps to the exercises and then consider a local gym for weight training or better yet just buy some free weights if you have the space.

5. Stop Picking At Food

Anyone who has struggled with weight has made this mistake. You're making dinner and apparently cannot wait fifteen more minutes, so you open a bag of chips and decide to just have a few. Of course, a few becomes twenty and when dinner is finally ready you've already eaten a few hundred calories.

Practice small acts of self-control every day. When you find yourself reaching into that bag just stop, wrap it up (or better yet throw them out) and wait the ten minutes. You'll be proud you did and have a lot to show for it over a long period of time.

6. Learn How To Say No

Let's use that Janet in accounting example again. You're trying your best to lose weight; making small cuts to your normal diet, doing the room exercises and not food picking anymore. So when your co-worker walks over to you and shoves a piece of cake in your face you politely decline and are immediately barraged with a flurry of comments about how you have to have cake for Janet, it's just one piece, it won't kill you, etc. When you keep declining people start taking sarcastic jabs at you and finally you eat the damn cake just to shut everyone up.

Don't give into peer pressure. You don't have to do anything you don't want to and that includes stuffing your face with a piece of cake at 10:30 in the morning. Make it a matter of pride; when someone persists tell them you value your health too much but if they want to have your piece they can go right ahead. Stop worrying about hurting everyone's feelings.

7. Surround Yourself With The Right People

Accept this sad truth: some people want you to fail at bettering yourself. Not all of them, but enough. On your quest to lose weight you are going to encounter people who flat out want you to fail so that they can feel better about themselves. My mother can personally attest to this: she was morbidly obese through most of my childhood and finally decided to do something about it. She dropped close to 200 pounds over the course of several years and looks great today.

At first family and friends were supportive of her efforts, encouraging her to keep walking and making good eating choices. But then something started to happen as she kept losing weight: the supporters gradually became detractors. Suddenly they were telling her to slow down, that she was losing too much weight and starting to look unhealthy.

The reality was a lot of insecure people hated the fact that they couldn't improve their physical well-being the way she was doing. She actually lost several friends and her sister doesn't talk to her to this day all because of her weight loss.

Take inventory of the people in your life: do they have your back, offer constructive criticism and congratulate you on your achievements? Or do they belittle your efforts, offer nothing but sarcastic comments and ignore your goals?

Don't be afraid to drop your so-called friends because you'll be surprised how many of them won’t be around after you get in shape.

8. Stop Eating When You’re Actually Just Dehydrated

This is a simple one that most of us know by now. When you feel hungry even though you just ate recently, chances are you’re simply dehydrated. Most people do not drink enough water and it can confuse our bodies. This is one of the easiest strategies on the list: if you feel hungry have a big glass of water and wait 20 minutes. If you’re still hungry then go for it, but you’ll be surprised how often it works.

9. You Have Too Much Food In Your House

Why do you have three bags of chips, four two liters of soda, brownie mix, two loaves of bread, a sleeve of cookies, six boxes of mac and cheese and a bag of candy in your house? You are far more likely to satisfy a junk food craving if that shit is already in your house than if you’d have to drive to the store to buy it.

Clear out your cabinets and the refrigerator then try stopping at the store every few days and just buying enough for your next four to six meals. Shop after you’ve just eaten as it will deter you from making poor buying decisions.

10. You think Every Time You’re Hungry You Need to Eat Immediately

I'm not advocating starving yourself (although there are benefits to intermittent fasting). I'm saying you should try to experience hunger on occasion rather than sprinting to the deli every time you get a pang in your stomach.

So much of weight loss is mental and we have to learn to overcome. The first time you decide to go hungry it will be a surreal feeling. You'll build character, burn more fat, gain some pride and build some mental strength.

Like everything else discussed above, start slow and work your way up. As an added bonus the food will taste better and be far more satisfying. You can start to actually enjoy meals instead of blindly stuffing your face.

The above are ways to remedy bad habits that can be encountered on the way to obesity. Recognizing and overcoming these will put you on a path to getting healthy. If you're currently 50lbs or more overweight start here, lose the fat, then move on to the next level.

A Newbie’s Guide To Gun Ownership

April 9, 2015 | by Timothy Sterling | Link | Original Link

Disclaimers: Some of the information in this article may be specific to the U.S. I am not a lawyer. You are responsible for knowing your national, state, and local laws.

I’ve been reading Return of Kings for a while now and have thoroughly enjoyed it. However, there aren’t many articles on shooting. It’s one of my favorite hobbies, and just a manly thing in general, so I’ve decided to put the basics of what I know into an article.

This article is meant to help men who are new to the gun world to gain a better understanding of firearms and ammunition. There’s a lot of misinformation and just plain ignorance that can be confusing to someone who’s new to guns. Let’s start with some commonly used (and misused) terms.

Terms

This is a whole cartridge, not just a bullet.

Bore: The inside of the barrel; the part which the bullet passes through.
Bullet: The projectile component of a cartridge (not to be confused with the whole cartridge.)
Cartridge: A complete unit of ammunition consisting of a primer, powder, casing, and bullet.
Casing (or case): The outer shell of a cartridge, typically made out of brass.
Chamber: Where the cartridge is seated before firing.
Clip: A small, bent piece of sheet metal designed to hold cartridges together.
FMJ: (Full Metal Jacket) refers to a type of bullet whose core is completely jacketed, typically by copper, and is not designed to expand.
Powder: Propellant component of a cartridge, modern ammo using smokeless powder.
Primer: Small component on the bottom of the cartridge. When struck by the gun's firing pin, it ignites the powder.
Magazine: The part of a gun that holds ammunition. Many weapons today have detachable magazines. These are not to be confused with clips. A good rule of thumb to remember is that magazines, or "mags," have springs, while clips do not.
Assault rifle: A select-fire rifle using an intermediate rifle cartridge and detachable magazine. Contrary to what the media tells you, 99.9% of AR-15's and AK-47's in the U.S. are semi-auto only and therefore NOT assault rifles.
Receiver: The body of a gun. In the U.S. it legally is the gun. Usually called a frame when applied to handguns.

Now that we have that out of the way, let's get to the good stuff.

Buying

When it comes to buying a gun, the first thing you need to consider is what you are using it for. Everyone needs guns for different things. Hunting, concealed carry, plinking, home defense, and even defending from a tyrannical government all tend to use very different weapons. Some of these however, can be used in more than one setting.

For example, if you buy a pump-action shotgun, be sure to get a short barrel for home defense, and longer barrel for bird hunting. Additionally, some handguns, like the Glock 19, are viable for both home defense and concealed carry. So know of what type of gun and caliber you want, read up on the different guns of that type, and make your choice.

Where to buy is another matter. You can buy online, at a brick-and-mortar business, or buy from another person directly. Buying at a store is probably the most common, and if you buy from a gun range, you may get to try before you buy. Buying online (like on Gunbroker) gives you an incredibly wide selection, but the transfer must be completed through a Federal Firearms License (FFL) holder.

This is more complicated – you must send payment, call and ask an FFL-holding business to handle the transfer, send their info to the buyer, and then wait for the firearm to be shipped to the FFL holder. Buying from an individual gives you a pretty limited selection, but is very simple and in many states does not require any paperwork.

Shooting

You can bet that most of Simo Hayha's guns were not safe-queens.

When the great Finnish sniper Simo Hayha was asked how he got to be such a fine shot with his rifle he said only one word: "Practice." There's not much point in having a gun if you're no good with it. I'm sure some of us know a guy who has two safes with 27 different guns, but has no training, very little practice, and three boxes of dusty ammo.

Don't be that guy. After you get your gun, don't forget to practice with it. And then practice some more. Don't be afraid to take some shooting classes, too. These can help you a lot with your form and technique, and therefore accuracy. They are most commonly offered for pistols, but may also be available for rifles and shotguns.

When it comes to ammo, pick a good round for hunting or home defense. Shoot a box or two of that, but then choose an inexpensive FMJ round with similar bullet weight and muzzle velocity that you can practice with. This will allow you to get good and stay good without breaking the bank.

You can go even cheaper with steel-cased ammunition, but I would only recommend that for guns designed for it – namely AK-type rifles and some other Russian- designed guns. Another way to save money over the long term (if you shoot a lot) is to reload the brass casings using new components and a reloading press. This is a bit complicated for beginners, but I may write a separate article on it in the future.

Storing and Owning

Having plenty of ammo is a must.

Be sure to store your gun in a good environment. If you haven't shot a gun in a long time, check up on it every few months to make sure it's free of corrosion, and maybe put a thin layer of oil on the bore. Make sure that it's in a cool, dry place, and stored where someone can't easily get to it when you're not around. Store your ammo in a similar environment.

Next, have some emergency ammo stored away, separate from whatever cases of ammo you're currently shooting through. You never know if there will be a long-term situation where you can't just drive five minutes to a store and pick up a case of ammo – some new draconian law may get passed, a natural disaster may occur, or there may be massive civil unrest.

You don't need 10,000 rounds of ammo per gun, but having enough to reload your main defensive weapon 25 times, and any others 15 times, is probably a good idea. Also, assuming your gun uses detachable mags, have an ample supply of these as well.

Conclusion

Owning guns and shooting guns are two of the most fun things I can think of doing. Knowing the right way to go about them can make them even more fun. Know your laws and do your homework on the best guns for your situation. Then pick out a gun and have some fun.

Did Sarah Silverman Lie About Getting Paid Less Than A Man?

April 10, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Recently, stand-up comedienne Sarah Silverman was caught in a huge lie about her past. In a video for the feminist group Levo League, Silverman claimed that during a stand-up show she did with Todd Barry, she was paid $50 less than him because she was a woman:

In response, Al Martin, the owner of the Broadway Comedy Club, where Silverman and Barry performed, called Silverman out for straight-up lying about him:

> Are you kidding? You come in to my club 15 years ago and ask me for a guest spot, I did not ask you to perform and you were not booked, and Then you ask me for pay? You asked to work out some material… Then you make this a gender pay thing? Sarah great cause I am with it, but I did not pay you less cause of gender… I paid you less because Todd Barry was booked and you weren't… It was a GUEST SPOT, so I gave you some car fare, which actually is more than almost any club would have given for a GUEST Spot… Funny how in your attempt to become a super hero with a noble cause, you forgot that little fact… GUEST SPOT… GUEST SPOT

He also responded with a video.

As of this writing, Silverman has not responded to Martin's comments about her; indeed, she hasn't Tweeted at all since Wednesday. Her dishonesty on this issue is shameful but not surprising, as the "wage gap" has been one of the most persistent and damaging myths of modern feminism.

There Is No Wage Gap

For the better part of a decade, feminists have been fallaciously claiming that women earn less than men on average for the same work: the most common claim is that women only earn 77 cents for every dollar a man works. Despite the sheer economic illiteracy of this claim—if employers could get away with paying women less for the same work, then they would only employ women—this myth continues to persist, zombie-like, in American public discourse.

As Christina Hoff Sommers reported in Time last September, the wage gap myth persists in large part due to faulty math on the part of feminists. The claim that women earn 77 cents to every dollar that men earn fails to take into account differences in occupations, education level, experience, hours worked per week or anything else. Once these factors are added in, the "wage gap" mysteriously vanishes:

> Wage gap activists say women with identical backgrounds and jobs as men still earn less. But they always fail to take into account critical variables. Activist groups like the National Organization for Women have a fallback position: that women's education and career choices are not truly free—they are driven by powerful sexist stereotypes. In this view, women's tendency to retreat from the workplace to raise children or to enter fields like early childhood education and psychology, rather than better paying professions like petroleum engineering, is evidence of continued social coercion. Here is the problem: American women are among the best informed and most self-determining human beings in the world. To say that they are manipulated into their life choices by forces beyond their control is divorced from reality and demeaning, to boot.

The fact that Sarah Silverman, a wealthy and popular comedienne, felt the need to make up a story in order to prove the wage gap exists shows that even feminists are slowly becoming aware of the myth's untenability.

Narrative Uber Alles

Sarah Silverman's fibbing also displays another reality of feminists and the left: they believe it’s acceptable to make up stories to fit their agenda.

Leftists believe that the truth of individual experiences is irrelevant: so long as a story helps propel a greater narrative, it’s still valuable in their eyes. We saw this when leftists tripped over themselves to defend Sabrina Rubin Erdely’s fraudulent Rolling Stone story on gang rape at the University of Virginia. The line from leftists everywhere from Jessica Valenti to Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig was that it didn’t matter that this particular rape never happened, because there are countless women getting raped on college campuses every day.

This line of thinking is so divorced from logic and reality that it’s a shock that it’s become so prevalent among the chattering classes. In order for a social trend to be true, there has to be actual evidence that it exists. If there’s no statistical or even anecdotal evidence for a trend, whether the issue is college rape or the pay gap, then it doesn’t exist. Fabricating scenarios in service of a political agenda is the height of chicanery.

If the MSM’s attempt to cover up the UVA rape hoax is any indication, it’s unlikely that Sarah Silverman will face any repercussions for lying about being paid less for being a woman. Nonetheless, the mendacity of shysters like her and her ilk need to be catalogued and remembered for posterity.

How To Commit Statutory Rape On A Boy And Get Rewarded For It

April 10, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Mary Kay Letourneau, who statutorily raped a 12-year-old boy and later married him, will be appearing in an interview with Barbara Walters tonight. Once again we are accosted with an example of society rewarding and mitigating overt female criminality, most tragically of the sexual variety against a child.

Men who commit sexual crimes are typically harassed, abused, and physically assaulted. Female sex offenders, by contrast, are afforded all the privileges of celebrities. The Barbara Walters interview (also, is it paid?) only adds to Letourneau's undeserved and stomach-churning fame. She should receive attention only to be condemned and vilified.

Thankfully, Letourneau served serious jail time for raping Vili Fualaau, a rarity where the norm for female sex offenders is usually probation or less than a year incarcerated. Despite her time behind bars, society owes Letourneau no favors, and certainly no celebrity status, such as the $750,000 E! allegedly paid to her and Fualaau to cover their wedding a decade ago. How this was even allowed, considering law generally prohibits profiting from a crime, flummoxes me to no end.

Should we be surprised?

A palm-reader told Barbara Walters she'd win a Pulitzer if she interviewed and humanized a female sex offender.

Barbara Walters would not interview a male student "convicted" in a college kangaroo court, but she'll interview a woman who pled guilty to raping a 12-year-old when she was in a position of authority over him. You go girl, feminist journalist trailblazer!

There are Catholic priests who commit statutory rape where the boy or girl in question does not "resist." Would Barbara Walters interview such a priest and their victim-turned-spouse? Not in a million years, let alone smile for the camera with them.

A child abuser in more ways than one

Forgotten amongst Letourneau's own antics, during her sexual crimes and after them, is the family she abandoned. To subject four children, the ones she had with her husband at the time, to such familial shame and notoriety is nothing short of sociopathic child abuse. In addition, she selfishly deprived them of the emotional stability that their early lives should have had in abundance.

If the measure of true love is having an elementary school boy impregnate you when you're his teacher, then I just gave up (for the second time) on it. The Barbara Walters interview is merely further impetus to make people believe that only men are genuine child sexual abusers and that there is something admirable ("true love!") when women engage in it.

I am sure Letourneau rationalized in her mind that her husband had let her down and didn't deserve her (as he earned to support the four kids her teacher's salary couldn't). Once again, women are stripped of their agency and their repulsive actions allowed to regress into "I-couldn't-defy-my-feelings" automation.

Is Vili Fualaau suffering from Stockholm Syndrome?

This was 20 years ago. What would she look like now, sans make-up?

He may claim to love Letourneau, but I still regard him as a victim, not just historically but in 2015. At the age of 12, he learned he was to become a father. At that point his childhood ended. It would not surprise me in the slightest (in fact, I think this is the case) if Fualaau had no choice but to "love" or accept Letourneau. After all, his name was indelibly linked to her in every news story around the world.

Nothing could ever erase his association with Letourneau, even if she had not been pregnant. Socializing would only reinforce the stain; Fualaau's friends and classmates would think of Letourneau and the media packs in their neighborhood every time they saw him.

Also, consider the way that society treats male victims of statutory rape. Though victims of a crime, according to one Arizona decision they are still required to pay child support to their sexual abuser. There would be a multitude of other, more implicit ways in which male victims of female sexual abuse are made or encouraged to deal with their situation as is.

Whose kids will she teach next?

Reports are making it clear that Letourneau will broach the subject of wanting to be removed from the sex offender registry and teach again. Given that she has already earned a fortune from her media-covered wedding, been lauded in a "Hot for Teacher" nightclub theme night, had a sympathetic film made about her, and is now shootin' the shit with Barbara Walters, this could indeed transpire.

The fact that we would even have this discussion play out on American national television highlights the special privileges and protections afforded to women who prey on children for sexual gratification. Boys exploited in these situations are seen as markedly less deserving of victim status, too.

The case of statutory rapist and ex-teacher Debra Lafave exemplifies this dual perception and double standard. While she served no jail-time, a male teacher from a nearby Florida county, Dang Van Dinh, was sentenced to five years for the same crime. Mary Kay Letourneau only received a long prison sentence because it was the first truly infamous national case of female teacher statutory rape.

[image]
Warning: Debra Lafave doesn't look so great without make-up.

Concluding sighs

Mary Kay Letourneau is a sex offender now, was a sex offender in the past, and will be a sex offender in the future. Glossing over her horrendous crime with the veneer of celebrity only encourages further vile and deplorable acts from other would-be female sex offenders.

America is suffering an epidemic of predatory females raping young male students. The only responsible and reasonable approach is to stop glorifying what would be vehemently attacked if the teacher were male.

Liberal Collectivist Academics At Vanderbilt Complain About Collectivism

April 10, 2015 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Apparently there is an unsigned letter to the Chancellor of Vanderbilt University, Nicholas Zeppos, that not only shows a lack of confidence in Vanderbilt University's "Dear Leader," but also goes against the core beliefs of current Western liberalism.

This letter is so far out there, that some might actually think it is some type of /pol/ troll. After examining this letter, I have concluded that it most likely is genuine. The first thing that indicates this is the sense of entitlement that these employees of a business have when making demands.

The second indicator is the theme that academics should have priority on a modern american campus. This liberal doublespeak literally got me to choke on my coffee and is most likely the reason that no one has attached a name to it. I might be wrong in my conclusion on its authenticity (there are some typos), so you can be the judge for yourself.

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY

URGENT FACULTY CONCERNS March 2015

Fellow Faculty Members:

Out of great concern for Vanderbilt University and our desire to defend the standing of its Faculty, we are writing to address the increasing misalignment between our academic needs and the support they receive at this University. We believe that Chancellor's strategic priorities – including building increasing numbers of new undergraduate dormitories; supporting large-scale university athletics; committing to a massively expensive undergraduate financial aid model; and centralizing administrative functions that have served only to increase our bureaucratic burden – are entirely out of line with the academic priorities of many faculty.

We – representing the combined interests of faculty from each of Vanderbilt's Schools - seek to have the following specific issues addressed by the Faculty Senate and various faculty governance entities across the University. We also urge the Vanderbilt Board of Trust to exercise their fiduciary responsibility and investigate these issues for the purpose of understanding the deteriorating condition of faculty experiences at Vanderbilt.

- The Chancellor has created a toxic organizational environment marked by fear and retribution for faculty and administrators who challenge the decision making of his Central Administration. Vanderbilt Faculty widely perceive that their work and professional status will be threatened if they are less than fully supportive of the Chancellor's and Central Administration's policies and directives.
- Massive budget cuts to academic programs have occurred at every School without the consent or advise of faculty governance bodies. To be sure, a significant amount of our Schools' financial resources are being drained by the Central Administration to fund the Chancellor's priorities.
- Millions of dollars of faculty funds have been taken by the Central Administration against the will of faculty members and to the detriment of their academic pursuits. In many cases these faculty have been forced to surrender their accounts largely for administrative and operating expenses.
- The extreme centralization of administrative functions has become unbearable to many Vanderbilt faculty members. Rather than reducing the bureaucratic burden, most of Central Administration's policy changes have actually increased that burden, placing even more administrative responsibilities on faculty members while also undermining our autonomy.
- The University's financial aid program for undergraduate education - including extraordinary levels of merit, need and athletic aid that the University awards - has forced upon us one of the most costly undergraduate financial aid programs in the nation. The Chancellor has failed to adequately fund this overwhelming financial burden through gifts and designated endowed funds, and our Colleges and Schools are being forced to surrender increasing amounts of academic program funds to fill the gap.

- The financial authority of the Academic Deans has been eviscerated, leaving only minimal discretion for them to prioritize the core academic functions of their schools, departments and faculty. This has eroded our Deans' abilities to support faculty research, teaching, advising and service in ways that have direct and specific connections to our academic disciplines.
- The overzealous management of Vanderbilt's compliance programs is suffocating the creative efforts of our faculty, particularly our colleagues in the Medical School and School of Engineering. Faculty members feel that they have unnecessarily become the primary subjects of exponential regulation, compliance and accountability procedures. The University has continued to increase this burden on faculty, failing to find more effective, less onerous and less costly compliance processes.
- The Vanderbilt Faculty Senate, after years of its leadership being undermined, has largely become a bureaucratic instrument of the Central Administration, rather than the intentional, representative body that our faculty so desperately need. Senate priorities have shifted away from giving faculty an instrumental voice in advising the Central Administration toward the provision of banal presentations by University officials that obfuscate the critical institutional issues we are facing.
- The increasing unilateral decision making of Central Administration stifles our ability to effectively manage our grants, schedule professional travel, create new academic initiatives, recruit new faculty members, collaborate with colleagues at other institutions, attract better graduate students to our academic programs and engage in more entrepreneurial academic activities.

Through a series of drastic policy shifts over the past seven years, we believe that academic affairs and faculty autonomy are now under serious threat at Vanderbilt. Vanderbilt continues to hemorrhage money for priorities with dubious academic returns and with no end in sight. Many faculty are loosing confidence in the Chancellor and his Central Administration to advance the academic mission of the University or to ensure the long-term viability of the academic profession at Vanderbilt. Accordingly:

I. We call upon all faculty who share these concerns to contact the Vanderbilt Faculty Senate Chair (Professor Paul Lim <paul.lim@vanderbilt.edu>), Chair-elect (Professor Richard Willis, <richard.b.willis@Vanderbilt.Edu>), and their elected Senators (https://www4.vanderbilt.edu/facultysenate/members/byschool14.php) to address these issues in the University Senate to whatever extent possible.

II. We urge the Vanderbilt Board of Trust to investigate the status of faculty life at Vanderbilt and to take definitive measures to address faculty concerns.

III. We encourage academic departments and faculty governance bodies in each of the Schools to thoroughly deliberate about how these issues are affecting faculty work and to share their findings with their Deans and colleagues across the University.

Very respectfully,
Your concerned faculty colleagues

How does this letter show the inconsistencies and incongruities in modern American academia?

I will show you, piece by piece:

> Out of great concern for Vanderbilt University and our desire to defend the standing of its Faculty, we are writing to address the increasing misalignment between our academic needs and the support they receive at this University. We believe that Chancellor's strategic priorities -including building increasing numbers of new undergraduate dormitories; supporting large-scale university > athletics; committing to a massively expensive undergraduate financial aid model; and centralizing administrative functions that have served only to increase our bureaucratic burden

These “faculty” immediately oppose the very business model colleges use to build the monopoly on higher education through “mass production.” Without this, it would be very difficult to indoctrinate the masses that attend without distracting them with shiny things and football. Also, the portent to the further cognitive dissonance of finances is presented.

> The Chancellor has created a toxic organizational environment marked by fear and retribution

I wonder how “toxic” the classroom environment might be in any of the soft science departments at Vanderbilt. I am sure any sociology or women’s studies class would be far more toxic to students of a certain sex and race than any environment the chancellor can create for the faculty.

> To be sure, a significant amount of our Schools’ financial resources are being drained by the Central Administration to fund the Chancellor’s priorities.

How dare they criticize the emulation of the Supreme Soviet Central Committee. This is where the letter starts to sound like a Tea Party rant if one replaced “Vanderbilt” with “US Government.”

> The University’s financial aid program for undergraduate education – including extraordinary levels of merit, need and athletic aid that the University awards – has forced upon us one of the most costly undergraduate financial aid programs in the nation.

It appears these academics do not want to right past wrongs by giving a helping hand to those that are not “privileged.”

> The overzealous management of Vanderbilt’s compliance programs is suffocating the creative efforts of our faculty

It seems they have a problem with complying with regulations when it applies to them. I wonder how many provisions of the United States Education Amendments of 1972 these academics have used against their ideological enemies.

This letter goes on about the dis-empowerment of the academic faculty in the financial control of the University. Their screed against centralization, bureaucracy, and non-academic pursuits is totally at odds with the propaganda they push.

I only wish some had signed this letter with their real names so I could research them and give examples of their stark hypocrisy. Alas, they did not, so the message of the letter can be looked at as a new trend: ivory tower infighting on display for the world to see.

The two main messages presented are the apparent money problems in this university and the open shift of priorities and power away from academics. The money trouble indicates the gravy train of higher education is slowing down and is causing the cogs in the machine to turn on each other for resources.

The shift of power further away from academics could indicate a threat to their control on the social narrative. Stay tuned.

The True Return On Investment Of A College Education

April 10, 2015 | by Mark Roy | Link | Original Link

A couple of weeks ago, a student at my high school stated a rather interesting thing that stuck with me for days. We were in economics class discussing "how worthy a college degree is," with our teacher saying it is very useful and a great way to make money, especially due to its high return on investment.

To make things even more interesting, a student stated that just a few days ago he read that if you invest now in your college degree, that in timeframe of 10 years, you would have a ROI of one million dollars. I kept silent throughout the whole class.

The cost of a bachelor's degree

The sad reality of today's youth

The average cost of Bachelor's Degree is $31,374. I added up all three values, those of in and out-of-state colleges, as well as private colleges, and divided them by three. This excludes costs of living (socializing, eating out, buying commodities and so on). So, after four years, your total debt is $125,500. You then go on to look for a job to pay off that debt.

Average bachelor's degree salary

Next up, let's consider the income you will be having after attaining that shiny bachelor's degree. But first, we must take into account that already four years have passed out of the 10 years my classmate was talking about, so we have six years more to net that $1,000,000.

In that spirit, I went online and searched for an average salary with a bachelor's degree and found out that the average starter salary is $39,000, but let's assume you have climbed the corporate ladder and take an average salary of $45,000. So, $45,000 x 6 = $270,000. You must be saying, not bad! Just kidding.

Paying off that debt

Definition of a JOB – Just Over Broke

Well, we have earned $270,000 in those 6 years, but we must also deduct all that student debt we have. Where does that leave us? Well, if we deduct $125,500 from $270,000$, we get $144,500. After paying off all the student debt with zero interest rate (good luck with that), you are left with $144,500 for six years of a hard nine-to-five job you probably hate. Annually, that is a mere $24,000 bump, which is $2,000 monthly. Hmm, but where does the cost of living come into all of this?

More costs please

"Pay yourself first." – Robert Kiyosaki

Since we live on planet Earth, there are a few costs associated with living as a college-educated corporate goon. Things such as rent, utilities, car payments, credit card debts, food, clothes, and luxuries such as iPhones must be taken into account as well.

If you were to live with a minimalistic lifestyle in the US in a second-tier city, $2,000 monthly only for yourself would be sufficient. Well, that would leave you with zero ROI at the end of those ten years. In fact, you still need $1 million more to have $1 million.

And suddenly, the reality strikes

According to good old Wikipedia, the average household debt has been over 110% in 2011. We can imagine that four years later, there will have been an increase. But, we must also remember that we are taking about you and your ROI as an individual. So, similar numbers can be applied, but let's say that it is around 130%, which sums up to be around $2,600 of spending a month.

So, what just happened? You are actually spending more than you earn? With your debt being 130%, that means you have spent $187,850 in those six years, but have only earned $144,500. This doesn't even take into account the opportunity cost of the four years where you were't making any money and could have been learning a valuable skill while getting paid for it.

Fortunately, there's always a way out

Conclusion

So, what are the options? You can choose to listen to my classmate and pretty much 99% of people in your slavish environment and hope for a million bucks to fall from the sky after finishing four years at a soul draining, hyper-feminist institution, or you can choose to live a life of choice.

Think outside the box, do not get into college debt, and take The Road Not Taken. There's plenty of options to choose from, but the main decision will be the one you take, and it will make all the difference.

Why You Need To Set Your Precepts For A Productive Life

April 10, 2015 | by Rórdán Phobos | Link | Original Link

So you got fired, or maybe you landed a new job, and you went out for a drink. Three days later you come to in the Café Du Monde with a beignet in your left hand and a café au lait in your right.

Your right hand hurts like hell, but your anus doesn't, so you figure everything worked out okay. Now after your hangover wears off, you start asking yourself, "Why did I do this to myself again, and how the hell do I stop this from happening?"

One of the most damaging things to come out of the SJWs' playbook is the idea that it is okay to do whatever you want, anytime you want, with anyone you want.

Simply put, no it isn't.

Your grandfather wasn't a saint, but both he and grandma recognized that some things aren't in anyone's interest. Because they had a grounding in traditional culture and religion that you don't, they had a leg up on spotting these things in advance and staying away from them. Also, the world they lived in had very specific methods for dealing with young men, and women, who decided to act like a horse's ass.

But a solution does exist to solve your problem today: welcome to the world of precepts. A precept (prē,sept) is defined as a general rule intended to regulate behavior or thought.

If you are religious, get into your religion, quit being a knucklehead, and start following the damn rules. If you are not, you need to come up with a playlist of those things that guide your life. The Ten Commandments, the Five Precepts of Buddhism, and the 13 Principles of Faith all provide an excellent guidelines for determining your own personal set of precepts. Or, as Franz Bardon would say, “bind yourself and be free.”

A type of protection

Simply put, precepts exist to protect you from yourself when you are weak. The real issue is that most people cannot recognize when they are weak and what this means. Specifically, people are prone to doing the wrong thing when their will is weak. From personal experience this is not when you are suffering from an untreatable disease and dying in a bed. At that point in time most people have a very focused will on one issue: staying alive.

A weakness in will usually exhibits itself when you feel like a demi-god. And if the old Norse and Grecco-Roman stories provide any kind of guide, this is when that part of you that you spend most of your waking hours ignoring says, “That guy was really disrespectful, you should kick his ass.” And you do…or it says, “Go to the tea house and have unprotected sex with a dozen women.” And you do…or it says, “It’s only a little cocaine.” And you do.

Precepts prevent this from happening by using the wisdom of Dave Chappelle and saying instead, “Hey brother, I wouldn’t do that if I were you. That will get you 5 to 10.”

Using positivity

As a practical matter, a precept should be a positive command. Anything that denies you something shouldn’t come from a position of conflict, as that will have some interesting, and uncomfortable, psychological effects over the long term. A good example is, ”I will do something productive for one hour every day,” if you are the kind of guy that tends to sit on the couch watching too much TV.

A bad example of this kind of thing is, “I won’t sit on the couch watching TV all day.” One encourages a positive behavior and the other penalizes you for a negative behavior.

Once you have your list of personal precepts, and I have about 26 as a point of reference, you need to put these into effect. The easiest way to do this is using the power of autosuggestion. This will take you five to ten minutes upon waking and another five to ten minutes right before you go to bed. Get a rosary, a mala, or any set of prayer beads.

Immediately before bed repeat each of your personal precepts, one after another, for five to ten minutes. As you say a given precept aloud, imagine the words coming out of your mouth and sinking down into your bones where they rest. Once you have completed a precept, grab ahold of the next bead of the chain of beads and go into the following precept.

Repeat this exercise upon waking.

This is one of those little tricks monks in a monastery use to fix bad behavior, and it is pretty effective over the long run. In the beginning, you will continue to violate your self-determined precepts and don't worry about this initially. With time, you will begin notice that you are about to violate a precept and it will catch in your mind as you decide not engage in whatever that behavior is. Finally, you will lose the desire to violate your precepts altogether.

In essence, your daily practice will become a self-fulfilling prophecy.

And your life will be better because of it.

The Necessity Of Meritocracy

April 11, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

We find ourselves living in an age and culture of entitlement which has significantly contributed to modern degeneracy: the undeserving are given responsibilities and positions which they don't merit, leading to yet even lower productivity and standards. People are made to believe that they can do things which they actually might not be able to perform, because the collectivist liberal herd believes that they can.

The (often voluntary) failure to correctly determine a person's ability in the name of social equality—and sometimes conscious disregard of a person's potential and nature before handing over responsibility and authority—has often resulted in scenarios where the leaders of a people were the worst individuals from among them.

Feminism similarly trains women to believe and to do roles what they are not naturally suited for, and later makes them appear stupid when they can't perform them. But at the same time, feminism expects men to stupidly avoid judging women in the name of gender equality. The same scenario can be seen in other walks of life. What we are actually witnessing today is the modern war on meritocracy.

A twisted war in the name of equality and justice

Humanity is indeed imperfect. True and absolute equality is technically impossible and rarely believed in, because of the uniqueness of every individual in both strength and weaknesses.

Thus the concept of meritocracy does threaten those who feel that they might not be qualified to receive its benefits. These individuals might then try to undermine and destroy the meritocracy, as well as the meritorious. This war has existed since antiquity itself.

An example can be found in religious scripture, the Biblical story of Cain and Abel being one – God chose Abel because of his moral merit, which led to Cain slaying him out of jealousy.

It could be interpreted that the first human murder recorded in religious history was actually borne out of an inability of the undeserving to accept spiritual meritocracy.

But keeping religious examples aside, meritocracy has always threatened the degenerate, for it often represents unemotional and cold-blooded qualitative justice which modern liberals might label as “cruel.” The desire to be equalized with the meritorious is commonly seen today: the undeserving (without producing effort or evidence of their merit) are vociferous in their demands for equality with those who are deserving.

But sprinkling gold dust on shit doesn’t make it gold, even if liberals might try to equalize both.

Furthermore, the common criticisms of meritocracy by its liberal opponents are: what and who defines merit (thus raising the question which standard is the best standard), the reliability of those who measure merit (free from favoritism), and the supposedly sluggish growth of people in a meritocratic society—supposedly exemplified by the Peter Principle.

Without meritocracy, degeneracy will eventually rule in the name of equality

Opponents of meritocracy often deliberately overlook the real goal of meritocracy, which is to inspire and propel humanity to strive against the natural flaws of human nature .

At the same time, meritocracy's prime focus is the creation of quality and discovery of meritorious potential in a human society, leading to higher productivity. The quantitative creation of a "perfect" society of "elite individuals" due to it comes much later but only when every individual seriously undertakes the responsibility that meritocracy demands from everyone – that is of self improvement.

Human history has many examples of the rise of civilizations, military, and political powers due to the application of meritocracy. Meritocracy not only means a system which rewards talent and hard work, but also signifies a system that awards responsibilities on virtue of their potential and merit.

But what modern collectivists and liberals actually fail to understand is that civilization suffers more from the glaring hypocrisies and degeneracy created by modern liberal collectivism, than the the supposed "elitism" created by meritocracy.

When the meritorious are treated like idiots (as seen in this story), what incentives are left for a modern man to strive to evolve into the highest ideals of masculinity, when he would be subsequently treated like trash by a society which lacks gratitude to quality?

How would quality be created in a society, where the the meritorious are lumped together with the degenerate in the same herd in the name of social equality? Equality promoted by collectivism and feminism is a hypocritical sham, and is in fact a greater dysfunctional myth.

Since collectivism and social equality is gradually supplanting meritocracy, it's no surprise to note the corresponding fall of moral standards. The one who disengages and breaks free from the collectivist liberal herd is shamed. As commonly seen, the modern man is taught to develop himself to the highest levels of masculinity, to invest it in sub-standard modern women today – more often due to a lack of quality options created by the slutty herd mentality of modern women.

When quality is shamed and shunned in favor of quantity, how could one expect to retain and create quality in such a degenerate collectivist civilization?

Conclusion

The truth remains that in today's social decline, meritocracy still remains important—for it can and should be best employed as a necessary counterweight to the dysfunctional rise of socialist and collectivist entitlement.

Every noble system or ideal, even that of meritocracy, would fail as long as flawed human nature stands in the way of its implementation. Human nature is indeed imperfect, but to to strive for perfection and self-improvement is praiseworthy. Meritocracy often provides the necessary platform and impetus for that.

SPECIAL DOUBLE ISSUE
Rolling Stone

A Generous Analysis

Is this misogyny of Rolling Stone? No, I'd call it love (or something similar). Rolling Stone is just appreciating fine artwork the way God made it. Why, they've even created a new career for aged-out actress Jennifer Aniston.

Wait, my bad. That issue was in 1996. Even Rolling Stone understands the beauty is always a product of youth. I guess we'll never get to see Valenti on a cover then. The world mourns its loss. Maybe Rolling Stone will give us UVA's "Jackie" borderline topless on a cover.

I don't know about you, but my boner was certainly feeling the rape culture Rolling Stone has encouraged, at least until I got to this issue:

Rolling Stone has also fought against the harmful stereotype that black women are bargain bin pussy:

Funny, that's the most Rolling Stone I have ever read. I guess they have to stay relevant somehow instead of writing content people would want to read. Well, I mean, sure, they tried that in November with the UVA story, but we all saw that go completely tits up.

Suck at life a little more, baby boomers. The dozen or so musical highlights of the 60s unfortunately blind us to how pretentious everything else you've ever done is.

Conclusion

Rolling Stone has always been a liberal magazine, but with such images on its covers, they've gradually found their way over to the wrong side of history. Rolling Stone used the UVA story to regain credit with the liberals, but unfortunately for them, the internet makes all things immortal.

Tits and left wing yellow journalism. Rolling Stone has bought into the lie that a liberal publication can have it all. Bring the impressionable teenage conservatives over with the images (since no one above the age of 15 thinks Rolling Stone is cool) and instruct them in the correct narrative.

#RollingStoneOrStrokeMag?

Kudos to RooshV Forum member AnonymousBosch for pointing out Rolling Stone's double standard. If anyone else has a noteworthy story, please email .

Wilkes McDermid Was Yet Another Victim Of A Society That Doesn’t Care About Fulfilling Men’s Basic Needs

April 11, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

“Don’t cry because it’s over, smile because it happened.”

-Dr. Seuss

On Feb 8, 2015, shortly after enjoying a gourmet steak dinner, Wilkes McDermid, a 39 year-old food blogger and to some a minor celebrity in London, lept to his death from the the upscale restaurant Coq D’Argent. It wasn’t the first time someone had committed suicide from leaping from the some 80-foot tall building. But what is different in McDermid’s case, is the reason for why he decided to take his own life.

In His Own (And Last) Words

In what has to be the most lucidly written suicide note I've ever seen, McDermid makes clear his reasons for leaving this world, summing it up in this way:

> The reason for my death is simple. I have concluded that in the realm of dating and relationships the primary characteristics required for men are as follows.
> -Height: above 5ft10
> -Race: huge bias towards caucasian and black
> -Wealth: or other manifestation of power
> From my observations and research it appears that you need two of the three criteria for success with very few exceptions. What does this mean it means that it's "game over" for me. By choosing to depart early, all I am doing is to accelerate the process of natural selection whilst saving myself a great deal of long term pain in the process.

McDermid goes on to calmly and rationally make his case, in a manner that, on rational and logical grounds, is hard to refute—after all, many studies have validated the fact that women the world over have a marked preference for male height; that White or failing that Black men do indeed fare well on the mating market ceteris paribus; and that Asian men, in the Western world at least, come dead last in terms of desirability.

Another Elliot Rodger?

When I first found out about McDermid's situation, I couldn't help but think back to manosphere critics' favorite whipping boy Elliot Rodger, the American spree shooter whose bizarre manifesto and final YouTube message sparked an international conversation about a range of issues.

Rodger was held out as the result of the sector of the Internet that concerns itself with the interests, needs, and yes, challenges of men—a result that is by its very nature, a warped, twisted, and perverted one, that is obsessed with equal parts entitlement to women's bodies and simultaneous hatred of women, too.

But, while the world reacted to the Rodger tragedy, McDermid's untimely demise barely registered a blip on the UK press' radar screen, and didn't even break the American media markets.

The question has to be why?

Perhaps it's because unlike Rodger, McDermid only took his own life? Perhaps because unlike Rodger, McDermid's manifesto didn't have harsh sounding words reserved for the ladies who rebuffed him? Or perhaps it was because unlike Rodger, who professed to have attempted game and pickup and failed, McDermid's last communication to humanity contained no such references?

Maybe it was all of the above. But what definitely leapt out at me about the McDermid tragedy, was the utter indifference of it all on the part of the wider public. It was as if we were perfectly cool with a man offing himself. So long it's only himself, and not anyone else—especially women.

After all, it's a well known fact that men kill themselves at an astonishing rate, and even suicides of Oscar-winning national treasures like the late Robin Williams can't spark the kind of outpouring of humanity that Rodger's rampage could with regard to women (even when it was proven that he killed more men than anyone else).

Of course, for those of us inside the manosphere, the solution to McDermid's woes was easy: get game, right? And for those on the outside looking in, the answer is just as easy: get therapy, right?

Well, here's the problem with both sides of the divide: neither are keeping it brutally 100.

The Problem With Both "Schools" Of Thought

Game and pickup boosters are correct to point out that guys like McDermid must work to increase their chances of success in the sexual marketplace. However, the harsh reality is that race, appearance, height, and many other basic characteristics do matter, and all the game in the world can't change certain aspects of one's humanity.

And as for the folks who swear by stuff like Cognitive Behavorial Therapy and the like—CBT hasn't proven itself effective in assisting men with meeting their mating goals. If they were, there would be no need for game in the first place, because therapy-based models would be getting the job done.

Most of the game and pickup critics—especially women themselves—don't understand a fundamental aspect of the male mind: that we do what works, not what "ought" to work, or what "should" work, because it comports to what we think the world should be.

The simple truth of the matter is that CBT and the like simply doesn't work, as McDermid himself has made clear:

> For those of you who don't know, I did end up in The Priory Hospital in Roehampton where I met some awesome people (yes, some were famous). However I found that they were low on facts and relied heavily on emotional 'one-liners', not logic. It also seems to address the 'symptoms' of the issue, not the problem itself.
> I was repeatedly told to "trust the process", but no-one was willing to outline this mystical process. To me it was one step removed from a cult with pseudo science used to 'persuade' rather than educate. For one session at The Priory I was told to stare at an orange for an hour… Make your own conclusions on how effective that technique was…

Obviously, mainstream psychological counseling services are ill-equipped to contend with the male mating mind, how and why it works, and how to put a guy on the right track toward meeting his mating goals. As many of us know all too well, (straight) male sexual desire is at the very least looked on with a side eye, if not outright vilified and excoriated.

In Summation

Somehow people – in our time today, straight men – are supposed to treat their attraction triggers like a light switch that they can turn on or off, or perhaps more like a dimmer light dial, where it can be adjusted at whatever setting is desired.

They are also forced to endure a “trust the process” party line from mainstream therapists who have no idea how to help them achieve their goals, as well as a manosphere counterculture that cannot give them the cure-all they are looking for to “solve” their race, height, or whatever other characteristic they view as their problem.

Regretfully, McDermid won’t be the last victim of today’s harsh sexual marketplace.

Is Irish Transsexual Eve Jeffrey A Fascist For His Attacks On Professor Mark Gilfillan?

April 11, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Dr. Mark Gilfillan, professor of Jewish History in Northern Ireland's Ulster University, has raised the ire of local liberals and is being investigated by the university, even though his contract with the university has already expired. This investigation arose because he has recently criticized homosexuality on Facebook.

Lesbian Rachel Kane was arguing with a Christian friend of his about a Christian baker refusing to make a wedding cake for a gay wedding, which turned into a debate on homoeroticism in general, and when Gilfillan brought in statistics and hard evidence, Kane took screencaps and sent them to various homosexual activist groups and Ulster University officials.

Transsexual activist Dr. Eve Jeffrey, a lecturer in Theater Studies at Queen's University Belfast, and journalist Deborah McAleese, who has previous been called "Northern Ireland's worst journalist" have further sought to amplify the scandal.

Dr. Gilfillan criticized the rate of diseases caused by homoerotic behavior. He also criticized gay pride parades, which are marketed as community-building events but in actuality glorify perversion and hedonism in a way that society would not tolerate in any other context. He also referenced a Regent Univesity Law Review article linking homosexuality with child molestation. Like a trained academic, Dr. Gilfillan filled his argument was citations, including when he quoted that 47% of practicing male homosexuals suffered child abuse.

Narratives

Jeffrey did not respond to our request for information, but Gilfillan and I have written to each other at length.

The mainstream media usually has a filter for the narrative they give. You only hear the details and emphases they want you to hear. Gilfillan himself experienced this.

> The story in the Belfast Telegraph was written by Leftist Feminist journalist Deborah McAleese, who contacted me about my comments, but refused to print any of my lengthy statement on disease in the homosexual 'community,' and my very scholarly and evidence-backed analysis of their behavioral norms. Instead she gave priority to queer complaints that they are "deeply offended" and "disturbed" that someone could say those things. McAleese has been described as "Northern Ireland's Worst Journalist." (http://www.atangledweb.org/?p=7014) […]

Gilfillan began his story by telling me about the comments he wrote on Facebook, which seems to match what the mainstream media has claimed despite the shift in emphasis.

He then told me about Kane's response,

> Rather than get a reasoned response, the troglodyte went ape-shit, told me to "fuck off," wrongly attributed to me the statement that all queers are child molesters, and took screenshots of my comments before sending them to dozens of homosexual organizations and officials throughout the university. This she-beast was only one of a pair of demented freaks however.

The other major crusader against him is Jeffrey.

> This monstrosity emailed me via my university email address to ask me to confirm I made the comments. I confirmed and said I stood by them. The freak then informed me she was going to tell the university, the police, and then went on Facebook to share my comments to "every university in Europe and America." This creature then e-mailed me to say "Congratulations: You are now unemployable." My contract with the university had been wound up days earlier so I was unconcerned about her actions in this respect. I've grown greatly disillusioned with academia, and despite my tremendous success in my academic career (I've lectured widely, published articles, and have a book deal with a top academic publisher for my PhD thesis and I'm still only 28), I couldn't carry on living and participating in the role of universities as bastions of the Left…I informed the monstrosity about this, but the creature then began spouting bizarre nonsense about how I must be a self-hating gay (I have two children). The police are obviously uninterested in the comments because they are factual and don't amount to any kind of incitement.

A “female” formerly known as Ewan Jeffrey

Dr. Gilfillan become something of a local celebrity, for better or worse.

> I’ve received lots of messages of support from ordinary people, and a number of perverted e-mails from…well….perverts. The university is under the thumb of the queers and political correctness and is strangely ‘investigating’ the incident even though I am no longer an employee anyway.

The Cancer Of Progressivism

Dr. Gilfillan gave an excellent analysis of the situation.

> Cowards and degenerates all. The whole exercise has been a prime example of the cultural marxist left working extremely hard to stifle criticism of their view of sexuality, and to continue to destroy gender and the traditional family life.

Traditionally academia—not unlike the news media—was once focused on the discernment of truth. Today it has become merely a filter for truth. I think within the next few decades, we will see academia lose its general credibility with the common man.

The situation Dr. Gilfillan has found himself in is a microcosm for the greater social sickness. The left has always been fascist ever since unions began using bully tactics to extort workers into joining. Today things are no different, except that instead of focusing on raising wages for workers, they are concerned about keeping perverts beyond reproach.

The standard SJW argument

Notice that Kane merely argued with the Christian friend but sought to crucify Gilfillan. That is because Gilfillan brought statistics and research into the debate. The left fears nothing more than losing. The greater one's ability to defeat them, the harder—and the dirtier—the liberals fight back. Furthermore, since Gilfillan had a career in public view, it would be easier to punish him and make an example. The casual Christian quoting Bible verses is largely ignored because he is impotent.

Verbal Violence

As he told me,

> The freak then informed me she was going to tell the university, the police, and then went on Facebook to share my comments to "every university in Europe and America." This creature then e-mailed me to say "Congratulations: You are now unemployable."

Such is the fate for those who break away from the narrative when they have the kind of employment that does not allow it, although fortunately for Jeffrey, he was already transitioning out of academia of his own volition. Even when he told Jeffrey that he was leaving, she still sought to destroy his reputation. If the Left cannot win, then they must at least pretend they won to keep up appearances.

The activists know that most people agree with Gilfillan, but their aim is to silence all dissent in the hope that the next generation will be malleable. Which has worked, by the way, as we see how encouraging the millennial generation is of homosexuality and transexuality.

Gilfillan did not make these comments from the context of a university, although a true university would welcome every argument possible. He made them on Facebook, and from there the social justice fascists ran wild.

The first university was founded at Bologna in 1088. It was not a fixed campus but an association of scholars, more like a trade guild than a degree mill. In time universities developed into a free-exchange of ideas to cultivate society. The focus was on having as many ideas to draw from as possible to develop the best civilization, but today universities do not even allow for dissent in one's private life.

Northern Ireland was split from the rest of Ireland over religious differences between protestants and Catholics. Today that seems irrelevant. Irish society has become so liberal-secular that the few devout protestants and Catholics have more in common with each other than with most of Irish society.

6 Tips To Build More Muscle During Your Workouts

April 12, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

There’s a lot of factors that go into your progress at the gym.

When it comes to getting stronger, everything from you diet to your routine to your sleeping habits come into play.

Yes, getting stronger and building muscle are inherently linked together. Once you’ve maximized your neural gains—the progress you can make as a result of your nervous system becoming more adept at performing a particular exercise—the only way to get stronger is by building more muscle.

And, vice versa, getting stronger is the primary stimulus your body needs to synthesize new muscle tissue.

While eating a proper diet and getting quality rest are both absolutely crucial for bulking up and getting stronger, in this article I’ll talk about specific training techniques you should be using.

1. Squeeze the shit out of the bar

The strength of your grip is more important than you may think

For just about every exercise I can think of, it pays to grip the bar as firmly as possible.

When it comes to improving your bench press, this will help keep the wrists straight, protecting them from injury, and it will help you fully contract your triceps, chest, and lats for a stronger and more stable press. When it comes to improving your squat, this will help you keep your chest open and contract your lats for a more stable and safe squat. If you're curling it will keep your from curling our wrists instead of our arms and keep your wrists safer as a result.

One exception I can think of for this is if you're doing an olympic lift or front squat and holding the bar in the rack position. In this case your grip is loose to allow your elbows to be held high in front of you.

2. Take huge breaths

Taking huge breaths that fill up your stomach and chest with air is doubly important:

- It will expand your chest and allow you to hold your shoulder blades back in a neutral position so that you can keep an strong, straight back
- It will make contracting your abdominal muscles easier, as breathing into your stomach forces you to utilize the full length of your diaphragm

By taking advantage of these two factors you'll maintain better posture and a tighter core – adding more stability and strength to your exercises.

Note: It's also important to time your breaths correctly. Inhaling at the beginning of a repetition and holding it in to maintain tension until you near the completion of the repetition.

3. Focus on compound movements

Compound movements like the overhead press are best for building muscle

Compound movements are movements that recruit more than one major muscle group to complete. Some common examples are squats, deadlifts, presses, and pull-ups.

These are best because they allow you to move the most weight – you simply can't curl as much as you can row, for example. And using more weight is what allows you to get stronger… and as we talked about in the intro, getting stronger is what allows you to build muscle.

Around 75% of your time in the gym should be spend doing these types of movements. The other 25% can be used for isolation movements that work your arms and abs. And this is why I advocate full-body routines that focus on the compound lifts.

4. Track your progress

This point is simple yet often ignored. Keeping track of how much weight you lifted and for how many reps is extremely simple. Yet without doing it you have no way of knowing if you're making progress. And you have no idea what you should be aiming to lift each time you're in the gym.

In short, this is probably the biggest mistake you can on your muscle building journey, especially make given how easy it is.

5. Keep your back straight

Keeping your back straight is crucial, and not just when deadlifting

Keeping a straight back is a key part of nearly every exercise.

Allow your back to round (as seen above on the right) is a quick way to herniate a disc and get hurt. Not to mention it also will prevent you from aligning your body in an optimal position to move the most weight. By breathing correctly (as mentioned above) and training yourself to keep your shoulder blades back and your stomach tight you should be able to maintain an erect back as you execute most movements.

6. Use an explosive repetition tempo

When it comes to repetition tempo, I recommend lifting the weight as fast as possible… on the way up at least (during the concentric portion of the lift). On the way down you should lower the weight (if you're doing an exercise like the bench press or deadlift) or your body (if you're doing an exercise like a squat or pull-up) in a slow, controlled manner.

Using this tempo (fast on the way up, slow on the way down) accomplishes two things:

- By lowering the weight slowly, you ensure that you're using a weight that's not too heavy for you
- By lifting the weight explosively, you activate a maximum number of motor units and muscle fibers, and this leads to optimal muscle growth and strength increase

Why Feminists Can’t Escape Motherhood

April 12, 2015 | by Elrit Frisia | Link | Original Link

Of all the secrets and mysteries of the world, the roles of the two sexes in the act and upkeep of reproduction is remarkably simple by comparison to larger questions in the field of evolution. Males gather resources, attain status, exert dominance, display fitness, and the women come flooring into his arms.

Women… well women are born and… well they, they just stand there and men come bearing what they have to offer. Or, occasionally, a man will tire of the courtship process and just take a woman and do what he will with her.

Stockholm syndrome exists for a reason, but I digress. Both the two sexes are wired exclusively towards two natural, existential ends, reproduction and flourishing, and all the factors that these come accompanied with.

Which is to say, a woman’s nature is fit to bring up children and raise them well and provide a comfortable domestic life, which partly explains why women are better suited to a more passive role and low-stress, air-conditioned, indoor jobs in the many sectors of industry.

Women at her best: loving, caring, joyful, and graceful. Things feminists are not.

Whenever these two ends cannot be met or sustained in any of the two sexes, a formidable substitute must be employed in order to delude the human psyche into believing it is fulfilling its own natural ends.

Whether it be promiscuity to replace reproduction, social policing to replace child-rearing, or an intricate virtual reality replete with false achievements, meek challenges, and short-lived victories to replace real triumph.

Feminism merely trades one brand of motherhood for another

The new outlet for 21st century motherhood, everyone else. And you can bet they're as rabid as a bear whose cubs have been snatched away.

The contemporary presence of these substitutes or illusions in our society has led directly to the resurgence of weak men and disagreeable, wretched women.

Feminism itself is an elaborate illusion designed to obscure a woman's natural ends and replace them with momentary and perishing ones, for meaningful reproduction and graceful flourishing cannot be achieved without a man to whom she must lovingly submit and cling to.

But women cannot escape instinct, and the more they put off motherhood the more they struggle to find an outlet to express their inborn disposition for concern, care, and intrusiveness; an opportunity to actually be motherly, as terrifying as it may be for them to admit it.

Instead, they move on ahead and simply cast an appropriate illusion to fill out the large shadow emitted by their rebelliousness and disdain for femininity.

As weaker men display their pathetic attempts of modern chivalry and bravery to the world by attempting to rescue hoes, enabling absurd feminist narratives, and inflating women's egos to the point of narcissistic obesity with their gratuitous validation, so we have that feminists involve themselves in public policy as if they were exercising their motherly role over all of society.

When the whole world becomes their child

Feminists have made their endgame clear: the destruction of the family and traditional values.

Their obsessive attempts to treat civilization like it was a child of their own, protecting the pale, meek, and freckled, "oppressed" little boy from those bigger meanies with so-called privilege and a "background" of being the playground racial and sexist bullies, have turned the realm of politics from a matter of providing sound governance and economic prosperity to being an overpaid nanny looking to punish the boys for playing rough.

This has directly led to the erosion of male spaces, the destruction of free-speech (because if it's not nice you shouldn't say it at all!), the quackery that the soft sciences have become in the halls of universities ruled by upper-class white women (women's studies and feminist biology, anyone?), the dissolution of marriage and the traditional family (got to sow those wild oats, right?), and the huge government budget deficits wrought by the woman-voting demographic who favor excessive spending instead of due austerity.

Social justice is their twisted version of motherhood

Only women now have the right to speak aggressively, limit the speech and thought of others, and get away with it: all in the name of justice.

In short, the haggard witches known as feminists have waved their wands, stuck a broom stick up their skirts, and their spawn has since appeared: social fucking justice. And no men confident in his masculinity would dare give one of these shrews a proper child so that they can mind their own business.

Why would he? What child could endure such obnoxious zealotry and overreaching pedantry? What husband could have the frame to handle one of these rambunctious, delusional, and licentious libertines?

Not only would they make for unfit mothers, but they already make for terrible step-mothers and sisters to their friends, family, and to men everywhere who have to suffer through a lecture every time they want to spread their legs on a bus or go shoot the shit with their male companions for a good while, or deal in the realm of hard, cold facts.

And as more women choose to put off or opt-out of motherhood completely, expect matters to get worse for all of us, as they go on ahead to make everyone's private business their own little maternity project.

7 Reasons To Date A Muslim Girl

April 12, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

A while ago I wrote an article entitled 8 Thing To Expect When Dating A Muslim Girl. The article received a considerable number of comments which can mostly be summed up as, “Why would anyone want to do that?” This article is meant partly a response to those comments.

All points are generalizations only, based on the personal experiences of the author, who is not a Muslim. As with any other religious group there is a high level of variation between individuals within that group. These points should only be seen as tendencies, not as certainties.

1. Slut behavior is rare

It’s OK, you can choose the pretty one

Either through choice or from compulsion Muslim girls mostly don’t suffer from the slut disease. Two excellent articles are 24 Signs She’s A Slut and 26 More Signs She’s A Slut. A quick look through both lists will show that most of the points do not apply to most Muslim girls.

2. The alternative is Western girls

Face covered, character exposed

The quality of girls on offer in Western countries has been dropping badly in recent decades. The future is always hard to predict, but all signs suggest this trend is going to continue. Read The Decimation Of Western Women Is Complete for the horrific truth. Sure there are still exceptions, it's just that the probability of ending up with one is much lower than it was.

3. Polygamy is awesome

Interns are just so 1996

Men who can honestly say they like monogamy are in the same position as men who can honestly say they like their day jobs. What they mean is that after considering the full situation, they have concluded that going for more would ultimately lead to getting less. They might be right. Muslim girls offer a realistic chance of pulling off polygamy over the long term.

4. Stable family life and children are desired outcomes

A common theme in the manosphere is that family life is now just too difficult and dangerous for a man to manage successfully. Western girls of sufficient quality often don't want to enter a permanent relationship while they are young and fresh enough to be worth taking on.

Meanwhile, there is a substantial risk of either refusal to have children, neverending demands to delay having children, or of her simply wandering off because of a lack of real commitment. It's not clear how often this is a genuinely held view and how often it is just a convenient rationalization for men to endlessly sample the delights that are out there, but it is certainly stated.

While no family is immune to the risk of being split up, Muslim girls are considerably less likely to take that path. As a rule they genuinely desire family and children and will make a serious effort to build and maintain the family unit.

5. Male leadership is welcomed

Male leadership is expected, respected, and even demanded by Muslim girls. Enough said.

6. It’s a great way to roll back Islam

Now consider a more pleasurable way

Islam presents a direct threat to a free, open, prosperous, and advancing human civilization with justice and equal rights for all. A good summary of the issues is Islamophobia Is Perfectly Natural.

Of people who actually admit that there is a problem many demand that someone else, usually the government, take some kind of action to meet that threat. That is not going to happen.

Meanwhile romantic, sexual, and reproductive activity with Muslim girls, while making it clear that Islam has no place in the picture, is effective, realistic, and violates no worthwhile moral principles. Every man should do his bit to make the world a better place. Why not do it in a way which offers to personal pleasure too?

7. Sex is not withheld without valid reason

Withholding or losing interest in sex is a modern epidemic among Western girls as they get older and especially in marriage. Many men, particularly older married men, report being reduced to occasional sex doled out “Like meaty bites to a dog.” Muslim girls do not typically suffer from this problem. They happily have sex any time a man would like, with pleasure.

So take the road less traveled

More generally there is a perception that dating a Muslim girl is a one way trip to a starring role in some kind of unpleasant snuff movie. This kind of thing has certainly happened, but it is a bit like plane crashes and shark attacks: they are very rare events, at least for men from Western countries, and nothing to keep a rational man awake at night.

Meanwhile, back in the real world Muslim girls are a great for the kinds of social intercourse men crave. This is especially true for men who want a more lasting or permanent relationship.

Ellen Pao’s Anti-Male Hiring Policy Shows The Destructiveness Of Egalitarianism

April 13, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Fresh off of attempting to rip off her former employer with a frivolous sexual discrimination lawsuit, Reddit CEO Ellen Pao has done it again. Pao made waves last week when she announced that Reddit would no longer allow potential hires to negotiate their salaries, because salary negotiations unfairly privilege men over women:

> ‘If you want more equity, we’ll let you swap a little bit of your cash salary for equity, but we aren’t going to reward people who are better negotiators with more compensation,’ Pao said. ‘We ask people what they think about diversity, and we did weed people out because of that.’

You read that correctly: Pao is deliberately handicapping men in order to give women a boost. Because men are better at negotiating their salaries than women—and because studies purportedly show that women who attempt to haggle over their salaries are perceived more negatively—she’s taken the option off the table entirely. If one side can’t play the game as well, no one gets to play at all.

Ellen Pao’s lunatic policy will not only hurt Reddit in the long run by driving away highly-skilled job applicants, but it also shows how corrosive egalitarianism is to American society. A culture that denies basic differences in ability and skill will inevitably fall to the lowest common denominator. In particular, a society that forces men and women to deny their own inherent differences is one that will punish masculine creativity and success.

Life Imitates Art

Reddit's new hiring policy is so cuckoo that it reads like something out of a dystopian novel. Indeed, there is a work of fiction that takes the thinking of people like Ellen Pao to its logical conclusion: Kurt Vonnegut's 1961 short story "Harrison Bergeron."

Vonnegut's story is set in a 1984-esque future in which the Constitution has been amended to ensure that Americans are equal in every way possible. To enforce this, the Handicapper General metes out punishments to those who stand above the pack in some fashion. For example, intelligent people are forced to wear radios inside their ears to keep them from being able to think properly, while beautiful people are required to wear masks:

> The year was 2081, and everybody was finally equal. They weren't only equal before God and the law. They were equal every which way. Nobody was smarter than anybody else. Nobody was better looking than anybody else. Nobody was stronger or quicker than anybody else. All this equality was due to the 211th, 212th, and 213th Amendments to the Constitution, and to the unceasing vigilance of agents of the United States Handicapper General.

The story concerns its titular protagonist, an exceptionally strong, intelligent, and handsome young man who is snatched away from his parents and forced to undergo extreme handicapping. Bergeron escapes from prison and attempts to overthrow the government, but is stopped when the Handicapper General, Diana Moon Glampers, kills him with a shotgun.

While not Vonnegut's original intention, "Harrison Bergeron" serves as a cautionary tale about the endpoint of feminist and leftist thinking. Human beings are inherently unequal: some of us are better-looking, some smarter, some stronger. No amount of legislation or social engineering can overcome the basic differences that are part of our genetic makeup.

May The Better He, She, Or It Win

Ellen Pao's hiring policy—and the ecstatic response it's gotten from female typists—also lays waste to a popular feminist claim: that "equality" for women won't hurt men in any way.

For years, feminists have attempted to swat down opposition to their ideas by claiming that "gender equality" (read: special privileges for women) is not a zero-sum game. In other words, implementing policies designed to level the playing field between men and women will benefit everyone. But as Reddit's new policy shows, modern feminism is explicitly about kneecapping men so that women can take a larger share of the pie.

The same patterns can be seen in every other sphere that is embracing radical gender equality. For example, in the military, women have to be held to less rigorous physical fitness standards than men just to even qualify. The only way to get two inherently unequal groups on the same footing is to either cripple the superior group (as Reddit is doing) or to enforce a separate, laxer set of standards on the inferior group (as the military is doing).

Enforcing equality to this extreme will lead to dropping standards across the board. As mentioned above, Reddit's insane hiring policy will result in qualified job applicants avoiding the company because they know that they won't be able to get paid what they're worth. While banning salary negotiation may make Reddit's women employees feel better about themselves, it will encourage mediocre hires and hurt the company's performance in the long haul.

Ultimately, the only fair way for a society to function—contra the claims of the left—is to oppose egalitarianism. While all people should have equality of opportunity, enforcing perfect equality will simply lead to decay and mediocrity.

For all the praise she’s getting from the left, Ellen Pao’s idiocy could very well drive Reddit into the ground.

The Denouncer

April 13, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following fictional short story was originally published on Roosh V.

It took longer than he thought, but Brad finally was approved by the Phoenix police department to purchase a glock 9mm pistol. Excited at being a gun owner, the first thing he did when he brought the weapon home was take selfies holding it in front of his bedroom mirror. It took a few tries to get his pose just right where he appeared imposing but not a potential murderer.

He uploaded the best photo to his Facebook page and added the following caption: “I’d like to see some dirty Mexicans try and take my country.” A large American flag was strategically placed in the background. The photo got several likes from his mostly patriotic friends along with one comment that stated the following: “I think I need to buy a new piece of freedom myself.”

Brad worked in the mail room of a real estate company, in charge of the interoffice mail system. His main duty was hand delivering brown manila envelopes to one of the forty or so offices and cubicles located within two floors of an eight-story office building. It was a simple job that took little brain power for him to do.

The company he worked for was big enough to have doughnut days every Friday but small enough where he was on a first name basis with everyone. The job didn’t exactly pay well, but it was enough for him to afford a small room in the city while maintaining an old truck that his dad gave him for his eighteenth birthday five years prior. The only annoying part was having to wear a collared shirt to cover a small neck tattoo he got done to celebrate graduating from high school.

Besides talking about the occasional sports match with his male co-workers, who he didn’t have much in common with, Brad spent his free time at work trying to chat with girls on POF and Tinder. His gun photo had led to a slight increase in replies and matches, but he wasn’t sure if it was from that or because spring arrived and girls were pining for more action. Either way, he struggled to grab the attention of attractive women and get them on dates in the face of tough competition from all the other men in the city doing the exact same thing as him.

Three weeks after posing for the selfie with his new gun, Brad pulled up into work. He swiped his card at the lobby of the office building but it didn’t make a clink sound like usual, a sign that the turnstile mechanism unlocked. He tried again only to receive the same result. He approached the desk and gave the security guard on duty his card, asking to check if there was some type of mistake. The guard made a call and told him to wait. After six minutes, his boss, a young HR representative, and another guard came into the lobby and escorted him into a meeting room.

“What’s going on?” Brad asked.

“Yesterday afternoon,” his boss said, “we began receiving many emails and phone calls complaining about your behavior outside of the office.”

“What behavior?”

“On Facebook you uploaded a photo of yourself with a gun. While the photo is not inherently offensive, your caption insinuated that you would resort to violence under a certain type of situation.”

“Murderous violence,” the HR girl added while scrolling through her phone.

“You are getting a lot of calls because of that photo? I don’t understand… I only have a few dozen friends on Facebook.”

His boss, whose wife just had his second child, squeezed his lips and thought carefully about how much information to give to Brad. “It appears that your profile was public. It was shared with a reporter for a blog called…”

“The Denouncer,” interjected the HR girl, suggesting her familiarity with the site.

“Yes, The Denouncer. They posted this image yesterday morning alongside the company name and number. So that’s why we are receiving complaints.”

“Well so what? I legally own that gun and I’ve never committed a crime or been arrested in my life. Who cares what people who don’t even live here or use the company say? Let them call.”

“Unfortunately it matters because our reputation will continue to be tarnished online for as long as we employ you. We can’t have that hurting business.”

“And also,” the HR girl said, “other female associates are concerned for their safety. You are creating a tense and potentially unsafe work environment.”

“So what does this all mean?” Brad asked, even though he already knew the answer.

“I have to let you go,” his boss replied. We’re giving you a generous one month severance, but we can’t keep you employed here. We wish you the best of luck.”

Katie Easterly wasn't too happy with where her career was going. After graduating from Columbia University with a degree in journalism, she half expected to get an internship at a prestigious newspaper like the New York Times to start changing the world with investigative pieces that would challenge the elite power structure and expose all the injustices that were still happening daily to groups that lacked white male privilege. Instead, she worked for nearly minimum wage at low-budget blogging outfits that all had the identical business model: get page views at any cost. Even mild defamation was encouraged since an "update" could be issued mere hours after an article goes viral but well before the offending party could hire a lawyer.

After working for NYC Fabulous for one year, Katie applied for a position at a new blog called The Denouncer that aimed to take advantage of the growing social justice trend that helped empower women and minorities to confront all the problems in society that were impinging on their pursuit of happiness. This is exactly what Katie wanted—a job that could make a difference in the world instead of simply blogging about boring NYC socialites and hip new cupcake bakeshops. In her job interview with The Denouncer's founder, a gay man named Ted who was from South Africa and had a fiery Filipino ladyboy lover, Katie asked what was the overall mission of the new venture.

"To make society better," Ted replied. "We want to shame, humiliate, and embarrass all the racist, sexist, misogynist, homophobic, transphobic, fatphobic, and cisgender jerks to forever stop all that is offensive. America has no place for such backwards beliefs and thinking."

"So I would be blogging about these bad characters?"

"Yes, not only them but their employers. We will engage our readers not just with comments, but also activist action in hurting the individuals who try to hurt us."

"This sounds like a social justice blog."

"This is social justice on steroids." Ted spoke with a lisp so the phrase 'social justice' was a tongue twister for him. "We won't be afraid to dox people and go after their bread. My dream is that in a year or two, people will be so scared of us that it will change not only what they say publicly, but also how they think."

Katie was impressed with Ted's vision and signed on. She quickly became the star blogger at The Denouncer with a specialty for uncovering racists. By the time she encountered Brad's gun photo after seven months on the job, she had successfully gotten six racist men fired from their jobs after inciting readers of The Denouncer to take action against them when an offensive photo or status update of theirs was revealed. Not only was she making a difference, but she was getting paid in the form of page view bonuses and an industry innovation called the firing bonus. Whenever Katie got someone fired, she received $500 (this only applied to the firing of men).

Her article on Brad practically wrote itself. After being sent his Facebook photo from an anonymous reader, she darkened it a bit in photoshop to make him appear more sinister. She called him a "racist asshat" and then showed photos of sad Mexican children with dirt on their faces attempting to cross into America for a better life. She also added that Brad is “not what America stands for” and “will probably commit murder if he’s not stopped.” To end her article, she pleaded with her readers to put a stop to men like Brad by contacting his employer and letting them know what they think of his racism and pre-violence.

The calls, tweets, and emails commenced almost immediately. Brad had no chance. Not only did Katie receive a $500 firing bonus, but also a $250 page view bonus since her article on Brad received the most views all week. Proud of her work, and secretly intoxicated by the power her bullhorn yielded, she upgraded her iPhone to the newest model and got an unlimited data plan so she could easily stay on top of the outrages that never seemed to end.

Brad had trouble finding a new job. A dozen other blogs picked up Katie’s story and now the first page of Google was bombed with accusations that he was a racist and a future murderer. Brad couldn’t even get a job as a waiter because local restaurants were now googling their applicants like the big corporations were. No one wanted to take a chance on hiring someone that could potentially hurt their business, especially with so many gossip blogs breathing down their neck for the latest controversy.

Brad did some odd construction jobs here and there, ironically working alongside the very Mexicans he didn’t care for, but the gigs didn’t pay the bills. Six months after being written about in The Denouncer, Brad had to move back in with his parents. His truck broke down but he couldn’t afford to fix it. He couldn’t even go target shooting with his gun because bullets were too expensive. He considered changing his name but employers would still be able to find his original name after doing a standard background check.

Many other men in Brad’s position would start their own company, but Brad was not an entrepreneur. He was a simple man who could execute simple tasks that were told to him and not much more. With one article, Katie effectively ruined his life. He wasn’t smart or skilled enough to overcome it.

“Hey Dad, can I borrow $100?” Brad asked his father, his head slightly lowered.

“Borrow or have? You’re not working right now.”

“I have a friend in New York who said he can line up a job for me, so I just need the bus fare. I’ll be able to pay it back.”

“Bus fare? It’s going to take four days to get there by bus.”

“I know, but it’s the cheapest option. I’ll pay it back, Dad, I promise.”

His dad bought the story and gave him the money. Three days later he began his journey to the big city with only a small duffel bag.

Brad wasn’t quite a country boy but he was nonetheless amazed at the size and noise of New York. He could see how other people would be drawn to it, like mosquitos to warm skin, but it was too much stimulation for him. It didn't seem like a city made for humans, and maybe it was this type of environment that caused a person like Katie Easterly to be so quick to judge him as non-human, worthy of financial violence. Of course he lied to his dad—there was no friend who was setting him up for a job. He was here for revenge.

Brad already knew where The Denouncer office was in SoHo because it was profiled on another site as being the hippest in the city with foosball tables, motorized scooters, and a hot yoga room. He also knew how Katie looked like because of the many photos available on her Twitter and even knew what time she usually left work because of her habit for oversharing the smallest details of her life. On the first day he camped outside of her office, he didn't see her. He started to have doubts that his plan would work and if he could really go through with it.

He spent the night outside, barely able to sleep, and returned back to the office in the afternoon. To draw attention away from his stalking, he pretended to panhandle, making enough money to buy an underwhelming $14 sandwich. Finally, at exactly 5:35pm, Katie walked out of the office. The first thought that struck Brad's mind was how much fatter she was in person than in her carefully managed online photos, but it was definitely her—he recognized the same strong jaw and broad nose.

He followed her into the subway all the way to the brownstone she lived in Brooklyn. He considered abandoning his plan but then he remembered the nothingness he would go back to in his dad's Phoenix suburb, the complete lack of hope that the next day might be better. He stood across the street from her building, thinking, waiting, and not ten minutes later Katie came out with a little dog. He followed her to a nearby park. She was oblivious to his presence as she listened to music and caught up on text messages and new dating matches.

With one hand in his bag, he walked up to her in the park.

"Why did you ruin my life?" he asked.

Katie frowned and looked him up and down. "Umm, I don't know you."

"No, you do. You posted a picture of me holding a gun and told people to get me fired. Now I can't get a job anywhere. Why did you do that?"

It took Katie a few seconds for her to remember the article. Her attack was abstract, a piece of content for the blog that was seemingly unconnected to real life. "It's just a blog," she replied, annoyed that this man was intruding on her afternoon. She started to feel creeped out, and wondered why his hand was inside a bag.

"YOU RUINED MY LIFE," Brad yelled. People started looking.

"Okay now you're scaring me," Katie said. She yanked on the leash and started walking away while simultaneously making a call on her phone. Brad followed her.

Brad's only fault in life was that he was an average man. He was destined not to greatness, but to having a mediocre job in a mediocre town with mediocre entertainments to fill his time. Getting out of the hole that Katie put him in was too great a task. Someone more capable would have thought of other options beyond what he was about to do, but Brad believed this was the only way to end his pain.

He pulled out his gun from the duffel bag. He ran up to Katie and grabbed her shoulder, spinning her around as she yelled out “Get off of me!” The last thing she saw was a shaking gun pointed at her chest. Her phone fell first onto the pavement, then the leash, and then gravity finally brought her body down to earth. The dog started barking at Brad, whose only thought was how little blood there was. He put the gun to his temple, closed his eyes, inhaled deeply, and squeezed the trigger. The dog went silent, laying next to its master, waiting for her to wake up.

The Denouncer did a series of commemoration articles on Katie, using her murder as evidence that more work must be done against heterosexual white men who hate women and minorities. During the news cycle of the murder-suicide, a policeman in Chicago put out a tweet. He wrote: “If you ruin a man’s life, don’t be shocked when he tries to ruin yours.” The tweet made it to the desk of Jessica Ryan, an up-and-coming intern on The Denouncer’s team.

In Katie’s honor, someone who she considered a friend, Jessica did an article on the policeman stating how he was blatantly encouraging murder against women. “How can he serve and protect when it’s soooo obvious he agrees with the actions of Katie’s horribly misogynistic killer?” She got him fired within 81 minutes, a new record. The next day she arrived at work to applause from her co-workers—it was her very first firing bonus.

The Simmering War In Yemen: Background And Future

April 13, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Followers of Middle East news are likely aware of the simmering conflict in Yemen. It is now appearing to burst its narrow confines, and draw in a number of regional players. As with most conflicts that involve overlapping sectarian, regional, and internal power dynamics, the Yemen conflict is aggravated by the shifting motivations of the players. We will attempt here to describe the basics of the current war (and it is a war) in a way that imparts a general understanding without bogging us down in minutiae.

As a preliminary matter, we must first identify the Houthis. Originally a theological movement allied with the Zaydi sect of Shia Islam, it has now taken on the character of an armed militia fighting group. In the early 1990s the group's primary focus was the fraternal aspects of religious devotion. It had two opposing internal currents: one part of the group called for more openness, and other voices called for more traditional interpretations of Shia doctrine.

The founder of the group, Hussein Bader Addian al-Houthi, was an advocate of the "openness" faction. The movement became militarized around 2004 in response to a crackdown by the former Yemeni president Ali Abdullah Saleh. When Saleh sent security forces into Houthi territory (Saada province) to arrest Hussein Houthi, armed revolt against the government followed. Hussein Houthi himself was killed in 2004.

Broadly speaking, the political demands of the Houthis now are these: greater autonomy for their northern Yemeni region (Saada province), and a greater role in the federal government in Yemen's capital, Sanaa.

The Houthis are also strongly opposed to Sunni fundamentalist types. They have not hesitated to use force to stop Salafis and other more unsavory types of the Sunni extremist gallery.

Chaos and disorder are also fueled by widespread dissatisfaction with the government, which is rightly seen as either ineffective or as a puppet of the West. The Houthis political rivals, the Islah Party, accuse the group of being tools of their co-religionists in Iran, and of trying to restore the Shia government that ruled Yemen until 1962.

The former Yemeni president, Saleh, was deposed several years ago. His sudden departure after decades of rule left a power vacuum that has contributed to the epidemic of violence. The new president, Abd Rabbu Mansour Hadi, has been unable to assert control over anything more than the presidential palace.

The Yemen conflict in the 1960s was a quagmire for Egypt

Complicating matters even more is that fact that former president Saleh has not just departed quietly. He is actively colluding with the Houthis to undermine the current president; without doubt he harbors delusions of returning to power.

What appeared likely to remain a localized conflict has now recently become internationalized. Saudi Arabi has begun conducting airstrikes inside Yemen in an attempt to degrade Houthi military effectiveness. This intervention was prompted by Houthi power demands that were seen as excessive; rather than settle on being part of a coalition government, the Houthis now seem to think that they can impose their will on their opponents by force. Saudi military actions also took place in 2009, but were on a much smaller scale.

Saudi military strikes (which are called Operation Decisive Storm) have destroyed the Yemeni air force and a considerable portion of its missile capability. The Saudis are concerned with casting the Yemen problem in terms of its own "Shia-Sunni" obsession; in Riyadh's view, the hand of Iran is everywhere, and all Shias are Iranian proxies.

This line has had some resonance in the West. The Saudis are receiving American backing for their invasion, and this support is joined by Turkey, France, and Britain. Other countries are providing more direct military support: Egypt, Jordan, Sudan, and the Gulf States. Opposing military action (rhetorically) are Iran, China, and Russia.

Taking advantage of the chaos are some of the more unpleasant groups in the region: Al Qaeda is there of course, as well as various more obscure Sunni and Wahabi extremist groups.

Although the current president claims to be the “legitimate” president of Yemen, he was the sole candidate for the office in 2012, and was “running” at a time when his term in office had expired. It was the current president who invited in foreign powers to bomb his country.

None of this is likely to end well. Completely absent from the media coverage of the crisis is any mention of Yemen’s long history of being a quagmire for foreign powers. The Egyptian army in the 1960s sent over 70,000 men to Yemen for roughly the same reasons as it now supports actions against the northern Yemenis today. In that conflict, often called “Egypt’s Vietnam,” nothing of any substance was achieved, despite a high death toll and the use of chemical weapons.

Yemen is now perched on the edge of civil war, with much the same depressing sectarian overtones that have characterized the warfare in Syria and Iraq. It is difficult not to conclude that the entire Middle East is entering a new period of chaos and violence, which I predict will not end in our lifetime.

#Freethenipple Is Another Example Of Female Narcissism And Armchair Activism

April 13, 2015 | by Ethan Wolfe | Link | Original Link

Last week a blessedly defunct and thoroughly ill-conceived social media campaign, #freethenipple, was resurrected by 17-year old-Icelandic student, Þóreyjardóttir Smáradóttir, after she posted a photo of her breasts online to promote “Free the Nipple” day; a local feminist initiative at her school.

Social media exploded with hoards of women posting nipple-baring selfies in a show of solidarity with the young student, after she removed a post of her breast from Twitter due to alleged backlash from other users.

#freethenipple, like many feminist social media campaigns, is ill-formed and nonsensical, blending ineffectual activism with vaguely defined messages of self empowerment. Among such an incoherent mixture, two primary campaign messages stand out: participating women believe they ought to be allowed to show breast nudity on social media, and they demand equality in the capacity to bare their nipples in public spaces.

There’s a glistening plethora of inane bullshit spread across this entire premise so allow me to carefully unpack for you the staggering nonsensical nature of this campaign.

Social Media Is Privately Owned

Þóreyjardóttir Smáradóttir decided to remove a picture of her nipple she had posted online, after receiving criticism from a follower.

First, let us address the social media issue. In my experience, women, wholly irrationally, often view social media as something which they personally own. They wrongly interpret the tools they use as extensions of themselves; something over which they are entitled to a degree of agency. This is incorrect. This entire perception of injustice stems from an inability to appreciate the rights of a private business entity.

Unless a woman is a majority shareholder in Facebook, Twitter, or Instagram, she has no right to dictate the policies of such companies. These are profit-driven entities with a large and diverse user base. Their policies are inextricably influenced by the tastes of the consumers that use them.

If Facebook deems that allowing what is legally considered nudity on its user-created ads would be detrimental to its public image and ultimately its bottom line; then it is perfectly within its rights to restrict such content.

This fundamentally reflects the entitlement of young, particularly female social media users. They suggest that they ought to have absolute control over a service and tool, one which they use free of charge and almost without any other restrictions. The catalyst for this campaign was a woman receiving criticism online! I can guarantee it wasn't a thoughtful dissertation on the merits of public modesty, but rather a simple declaration resembling; "Your boobs are gross and I don't want to see this shit," which drove Þóreyjardóttir Smáradóttir to remove her nipple-baring photo. Shaming works.

The inability of young women to cope with immutable aesthetic criticism is a driving tenet of many modern feminist initiatives, and is the reason the second mandate of the #freethenipple will ultimately fail to produce tangible change.

Public Nudity Is Created Equal

You’re free to swim shirtless. I’m free to call you a disgusting fatass.

It’s considered appropriate for men to bare their chests in a number of public environments such as sites of physical labour, in public parks, and in places of recreation where water is present. Beyond such venues, society is generally self-regulating and public nudity is not tolerated. For example, a shirtless man will not be permitted into most businesses, places of worship, or public venues of education.

Within the confines of such appropriate venues, social pressures regulate the behavior of men. A grossly overweight pale male, exercising in a public space such as a park, must fundamentally understand the social nature of such a space and accept the possibility that other patrons may, and often will, make derisive comments regarding his appearance.

Where, then, does a woman require the freedom to expose herself that she currently lacks: in jobs of manual labor? I challenge any feminist to find me one female construction worker who would enjoy exposing herself in front of her predominately male coworkers. In spaces of public activity such as parks? I encourage women everywhere to start attending such venues topless if they understand they will be equally subjected to the same aesthetic criticisms as males.

Therefore, a potential activist need only recognize that such nude restrictions are the policies of a private business. If a woman’s local pool or beachhead doesn’t allow topless swimming, I encourage her to get off of her cell phone and publicly demonstrate her commitment to such practices by actively protesting the policies of the pertinent establishments.

Furthermore, I’d like to address the profoundly backward grumbling in the #freethenipple camp, which maintains that a woman publicly exposing her body somehow empowers her to prevent her own objectification. Nudity is not regular public attire for men or women. By exposing herself, a woman will inevitably draw attention to her own nakedness, fundamentally affecting the way in which she is perceived. Nudity, by virtue of being uncommon, necessitates that any casual observer define a naked individual by such a trait. Being defined as naked, and by extension, as a sexual object, is the definition of objectification.

Wrapping Up

Chanting a slogan is easy. Winning the war takes effort.

I don't disagree with the right to protest; I think groups ought to have the right to lobby to change something they feel is affecting their quality of life. "Activists" of #freethenipple tend to point out that prior to the early 20th century, men were subject to similar laws prohibiting upper body nudity in public (including public beaches). Omitted, of course, is the fact that those men actively protested such laws by continuing to demonstrate topless in public. Activists were often arrested and prosecuted, until 1936 when the US amended its laws to allow men to be bare-chested in public.

It's one thing for a young woman to frivolously post topless pictures of her breasts, carefully crafted and sufficiently edited, from within the private, non-threatening environment of her own home; it's quite another to actively protest perceived oppression by baring her breasts in public.

I challenge the women supporting #freethenipple, a fundamentally frivolous campaign of baseless self-congratulation, to actively engage their communities and demonstrate their commitment to equality by publicly exposing themselves in protest. I encourage them to seek arrest and prosecution as means to achieving their purported goals because, somehow, posting lazy boob selfies and demanding equality from the living room sofa just isn't working.

7 Myths You Need To Know About Cougars

April 14, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A couple years after a devastating breakup I had a six month fling with a sexy divorcée who happened to be 10 years my senior. This was the first time I had ever dated, gamed, or fucked a woman in her 40s. Though she was in great shape and provided me with great sex, she was markedly different from what I expected her to be.

During my escapade with “Marsha” I learned a lot about what good looking older women are really like. Similar to rom coms and porn, the way they’re depicted in television and movies is a far cry from who and what they are in real life.

Marsha was my introduction to the inner workings of the fabled and fantasized “cougar,” and after her I expanded my age range a bit and decided to game them almost exclusively for a while to see if these vixens could offer me anything more than what I had been getting in the past. My time around these women was both educational and eye-opening.

Here are seven myths that were emphatically debunked during my time with the older female on the prowl:

1. All cougars are hot!

Negative. The truth is, most American women over 40 don't come close to passing the boner test. All the years of drinking, overeating, and riding the carousel eventually takes its toll. Marsha had an awesome body to be sure, but even that didn't push her or any of the other cougars I messed with past a 7.

There are plenty of great looking post-wall women but they are the outliers. I witnessed this firsthand when hanging out with Marsha as most of her "hot friends" were 6s at best. She did have a couple of friends who looked better than her, but they were both married which didn't surprise me at all.

2. Cougars want sex all the time

Far from reality

This is 100% false. Anyone with a basic working knowledge of the biological differences between men and women understand that the average female libido drops like a rock after 35. Marsha was 43 when I dated her and even though we were together all the time I fucked her twice a week at the very most. Another woman I had a fling with was 41 and she didn't have much of a sex drive either.

No matter how many "MILFs" in porn, movies, or sitcoms talk about how much they want young cock in them 24/7, it's just not true. Remember, cougars are women too. They crave attention validation every bit as much as the hot 22-year-old but the older they get, the less they put out for it. Which leads me to my next myth which is…

3. Older women don't play games

The games never end

Ever heard this before?

"Older women make better mates because they don't have time for games."

Pssh! Cougars play mind games just like other girls. These chicks have decades of experience fucking with men's minds and it's a skill that rarely atrophies with age. I've overheard countless conversations between older women bragging about how badly they mind fucked this guy or that.

So if the main reason you're wanting to enter the jungle and hunt cougars because you want a woman who's going to be "straight up" with you, think again. They're still overgrown children who can't help but toy with males purely for sport. Cougars are every bit as flakey and hypergamous as any woman and will continue to be so until their head-turning assets shrivel up.

4. Cougars are easy to game

It ain’t this easy

Anyone who speaks or believes this falsehood has never fucked a good looking older woman, and probably never will.

You think a 42-year-old who’s been eye-fucked by every man since the age of 16 (or younger) is going to just lift up her skirt if you just say hello? Quite the opposite, my friend. Years of men fawning over her inflates her already oversized ego to the point where her entitlement monkey requires a lot more than a few bananas and cheap parlor tricks to fuck her.

5. Cougars never want relationships, just sex

Once again Western culture and media rears its ugly head. Women grow old but they never grow up. The games and attention whoring aren't going anywhere and neither is the desire for a relationship, no matter how strong and empowered they think they are. It's in their blood.

Don't get me wrong here. A couple of older ladies I fooled around with were in it purely for the sex. But most cougars I spent time with either directly or indirectly angled for exclusivity at one point or another.

Regardless of what a woman tells you, her end game is always a relationship. Even if she doesn't go into a tryst with that intention and vocalizes this to you, her biological desires will always win out in the end.

6. Dating sites are a great place to find hot and horny cougars!

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aAmZwtSFHB8

Personally, I've never been on or signed up for online dating, but I know plenty of people who regularly engage in this nonsense. One friend in particular said he wanted an "experienced" woman and signed up for the above site.

It was one abject disaster after another. If the women he went out with weren't bat shit crazy, Cruella DeVille type bitchy, or butt ass ugly, they were grossly egotistical and almost never failed to demand that he buy them drinks, dinner, gifts, or whatever they felt like asking for at the time.

The kicker? Just about all of them were below average looking. Overweight, sallow skin, too much makeup, etc. were the norm with these old maids. He may have been out with a couple who were decent looking women (a rating which was likely skewed by all the grenades he'd taken out) but they were ones that demanded he pony up for the $17 appletinis the moment they stepped foot in whatever expensive restaurant she insisted on going to.

It should come as no surprise that the commercial for the above website features a porn star. Using a post-wall slut bucket to pitch the “cougar lifestyle” is yet another way to artificially inflate the value of women with high notch counts who are a few short years away from getting their AARP card in the mail.

7. Sex with cougars is always great!

Totally bangable……20 years ago

To be fair, this isn’t completely false. Women with experience are usually pretty good in the sack. Years on the carousel have honed her ball-draining skills to near perfection and they aren’t shy about showcasing their skill (especially blowjobs) when the time arrives

However, one huge drawback is that an older woman’s body just isn’t the same as a young woman’s body. This may seem obvious to the unplugged, but the way cougars are exalted and pedestalized to the masses undoubtedly leads to a lot of disappointment when she actually takes her clothes off.

The fact is, their vaginas don’t feel the same (yes, looser), their skin isn’t as tight or supple, and you are seldom able to pound the piss out of them like you would a tight young filly. There are genetic exceptions to the rule (as well as fitness chicks who are on testosterone or steroids) but by and large, the body of an older woman isn’t going to illicit the same erectile response as younger woman.

There are a few advantages to gaming older women but not enough to make them the main source of your coitus cuisine—something I had to learn on my own.

They’re not completely off my radar. I’ll spit game at ’em every now and then if and when the opportunity presents itself, but having been with my share of them I've come to realize that real life "cougars" only exist in movies and porn flicks.

While women need to understand that John Cusak or Bradley Cooper ain't walkin' through that door, we need to quit fantasizing about the imaginary land of smoking hot 40+ year old 9s and 10s with breast implants begging us to raw dog them into submission. Like porn and rom com stars, these women just don't exist.

Most Female Leaders Are Only Successful Because Of Their Male Relatives

April 14, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Hillary Clinton announced her candidacy for President on Sunday. Should she win, which is more than possible and according to many experts likely, she will join a coterie of other female leaders who have exploited their family connections to reach the top. Despite portraying herself as a driven, hard-working woman, and being described as a modern, electrifying force by her supporters, Hillary reflects the importance of who you're related to even more than George H. W. and George W. Bush (and perhaps Jeb before too long).

The "feminists" who used male connections

Look at the following list of current, recent, or historical female heads of government or state. It is a list that Hillary Clinton may join come Election Day 2016.

Cristina Fernández de Kirchner, President of Argentina (2007-): She succeeded her late husband, Néstor Kirchner.

Park Geun-hye, President of South Korea (2013-): Her father, Park Chung-hee, ruling from 1961 until his assassination in 1979, was the infamous general and President who revitalized the South Korean economy using authoritarian methods and political repression.

Benazir Bhutto, Prime Minister of Pakistan (1988-90 and 1993-96): Her father, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, served as Prime Minister until a decade before she first assumed the role herself.

Indira Gandhi, Prime Minister of India (1980-84): Her father, Jawaharlal Nehru, was India's inaugural Prime Minister.

Megawati Sukarnoputri, President of Indonesia (2001-04): Her father was the notorious Sukarno, Indonesia's first President.

Argentina's Crisina Kirchner… "Merit had this much to do with me becoming President… divided by a hundred."

Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo, President of the Philippines (2001-2010): Daughter of former President Diosdado Macapagal.

Corazon Aquino, President of the Philippines (1986-92): Described herself as a "plain housewife" and was the spouse of Benigno Aquino, Jr., a senator and the most virulent critic of the infamous autocrat Marcos. Benigno was assassinated and Corazon assumed the role of opposition leader, then head of state.

Soong Ching-ling, Vice President of the People's Republic of China (1959-75) and Honorary President of the People's Republic of China (1981): Wife of Sun-Yat Sen, who led the 1911 Revolution establishing the Republic of China and is still revered by Chinese in both mainland China and Chinese Taipei (Taiwan).

María Estela Martínez Cartas de Perón, President of Argentina (1974-76): Succeeded her husband, Juan, and gave Cristina Kirchner a precedent to follow.

This is a significant list of some of the world's most famous female heads of state or government. If 99% of men in a particular country had run for or been appointed to these positions at the same time, it would have been a greater victory for egalitarianism and the common people than any of these women assuming the title.

In fact, the only "game-changing" 20th and 21st century female leaders not on this list are probably Golda Meir of Israel and Margaret Thatcher of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. What I have related to you above only exemplifies the victory of privileged, usually wealthy women who were able to seize their family name or male relatives' fame and keep the facade of "feminism" and "merit" cloaked around them.

Hillary’s background

Since when does being First Lady qualify you to represent a state as its Senator? I guess if you’re in the limelight with no political responsibility for eight years.

Hillary, whatever your opinions on her political beliefs, is clearly intelligent. She didn’t get the highest SAT score or get the most college offers, but she graduated in the top twentieth of her high school class, did very well at Wellesley College, and completed her Juris Doctor degree at Yale. She was described as one of America’s 100 most promising lawyers as well.

After her marriage and during her time as Arkansas’s First Lady, she was a director on the board of Walmart and other commercial entities, even if directorships are more casual than the much more draining roles of CEO or other executive positions.

There are certainly other noteworthy things I can add here. But her resumé is no more impressive than hundreds or even thousands of others who were and still are churned out of America’s good or great colleges and who find levels of commercial or professional success in their chosen field.

What Hillary needed, however, was a man named Bill Clinton.

Senator, Secretary of State and maybe President… all because of Bill

The best part of Hillary’s resumé.

Irrespective of the achievements you can piece together from her early life, her trajectory after becoming Arkansas’ First Lady depended on her husband’s fame and clout. Because of Bill’s two terms in the White House, Hillary was constantly in the public eye. Her “sponsoring” of the Clinton healthcare plan came without risks, as she was the White House’s official hostess and not a politician. The job revolved around free networking for eight years and any decision made wasn’t hers to be accountable for.

Hillary also received, contrary to what some say, considerable sympathy after revelations about her husband’s soiling of the Oval Office with Monica Lewinsky. And as she ran for the post of New York Senator, she capitalized on the departing President’s very favorable and greatly rehabilitated approval ratings.

When she announced her Democratic Presidential nomination, which she later lost to Obama, she again shamelessly milked her husband’s name and prestige. The personal brand she brought to the table, her stint as First Lady of a state, then a nation, and her time in the Senate, all stemmed from Bill in one way or another. And this same Bill was with her at every stage of the journey, ensuring that his wife only lost to Obama by a respectable margin.

One thing led to another and Hillary became Obama’s first Secretary of State. Largely through her gender, her supporters were able to “misogynize” anyone who questioned her woeful handling of the Benghazi incident in which American lives were lost. Her appearance without makeup, obviously deliberate, allowed her lapdogs to further emphasize how poor Hillary was being objectified and therefore assessments about her job performance were sexist.

Feminism uses even more Newspeak

The forces behind Hillary, which see her as an empowering choice rather than a privileged, connected one, is the same force which persuaded Republican Colin Powell to vote for Obama because a black President would be “good for America.” It substitutes political correctness and undeserved advantage for proper context and actual ability.

Hillary Clinton is not a self-made woman and has gloriously ridden the coattails of Bill. She does not deserve to be President of the United States, whether or not she is voted into the Oval Office.

The Most Important Way You Can Fight The “Social Justice” Collective

April 14, 2015 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

As the fallout from Rolling Stone’s irresponsible and socially destructive “journalism” continues, it unfortunately appears that nothing good will come out of it.

No procedural reforms in Rolling Stone’s “journalistic” practices will result from Columbia’s slap on the wrist, nor will anyone be fired. This was not a surprise to any on this corner of the internet, because this hack job was meant to further the cause of “social justice.” Had a breach of journalistic integrity of this magnitude been related to another topic outside of the prevailing orthodoxy, we know what the outcome would have been.

This, in a few words, is “social justice” privilege. This is because the “social justice” proselytizers are the new priestly class. All civilizations have had a priestly class that was elevated in power – the First Estate. Often, these priestly classes rivaled monarchs in power (such as the priesthood in Ancient Egypt). They maintained the narrative over the paupers, enriching themselves in the process. So it remains.

There'd probably be skrillex hair if this took place today.

Why did this new priestly class emerge in such a seemingly short amount of time? Ten years ago, this would not have occurred. The story would not have been written, and certainly, those involved would have been punished. I could go on, but the most important reason is that the "social justice" borg dominates a lot of space at the present time.

They dominate a lot of space because sensible, normal people keep caving. The demands, insane ramblings, Twitter mobs, and hack pieces by typists (male and female) usually cause their targets to apologize, retract, and kowtow to the Cultural Inquisition, pleading for forgiveness for their sins.

And so the borg becomes more powerful. But what if they didn't retract? What if they didn't kowtow? What if they stood?

A few months ago, I wrote a post on my blog about Richard Sharpe, a pauper that rose through the ranks of the British army fighting the hegemon of the day, Napoleonic France. This was an unusual happenstance at the time – most officers were born aristocrats that had their commissions purchased for them, where Sharpe earns his through merit. He earns his rank through speeches and actions such as these:

> This place is called Talavera. There's gonna be a battle here tomorrow. You'll fight in it, maybe even die in it. But you won't see it. There's a lot of smoke in a battle. Our cannon, their cannon. Our shot, their shell. Our volleys, their volleys. You don't see a battle, you hear it! Black powder blasting by the ton on all sides. Black smoke blinding you and choking you and making you vomit! And the French come out of the smoke – not in a line, but in a column. And they march towards our thin line. Kettle drums hammering like hell and a golden eagle blazing overhead. They march slowly, it takes them a long time to reach you, and you can't see them in smoke, but you can hear the drums, and they march out of the smoke and you fire a volley, and the front rank of the column falls, and the next rank steps over them with drums hammering, and the column smashes your line like a hammer breaking glass, and Napoleon has won another battle. But if > you don't run, if you stand until you can smell the garlic, and fire volley after volley, three rounds a minute, then they slow down. They stop. And then they run away. All you've got to do is stand and fire three rounds a minute! Now you and I know you can fire three rounds a minute, but can you stand?

By apologizing or backtracking to the SJW's, you are surrendering space and making them more powerful. Those people that kowtow tend to think of the magnifying effect – that one voice represents many others that did not speak. Yet, as Chris Bechtloff's interview with Erik Larsen on Reaxxion reveals, this isn't necessarily true.

Most people are actually pretty sick of the endless "social justice" cries. Most women are not feminists. This is because in fact, most people are…normal. It is only the freaks, their white knight orbiters, and enablers in the media that push this nonsense (and even then only because it makes the latter money at the end of the day due to the clickbait).

This is why there is no need to apologize, backtrack, or kowtow. As some of us here at Return of Kings have proven on a number of occasions: "all you need to do is stand and fire three rounds a minute. Then they stop and run away."

The SJW's are invariably losers that have no business dictating anything to anybody. By simply pointing this out, by discrediting or mocking them (and it isn't hard), you will not only shift momentum and expose their own shortcomings; you will be standing and not backing down. You will take space rather than surrender it. It also helps that time is on our side; because it won't be long until the column full of losers stops its charge because some new outrage on their iPhone feeds told them to march elsewhere.

Normal society is strong. They are weak. Behind their façade of hegemony there is nothing. Unlike Napoleon and his Grande Armee (who I am sad to compare to the manifest loser that is the modern Social Justice Warrior), the SJW's are weak and are only perceived to be dominant.

By "standing" and seeing them off, this perception – and reality, will be shattered quickly – and I mean very quickly. It is very conceivable that the social justice industrial complex could collapse in less than a year if no one would cooperate with them and rightfully told them to fuck off.

I'll end this post with perhaps my favorite masculine anthem, Frank Sinatra's "My Way:"

> For what is a man, what has he got?
> If not himself, then he has naught
> To say the things he truly feels and not the words of one who kneels
> The record shows I took the blows and did it my way!

The song's lyrics, and especially its curtain call, are very pertinent for today's social environment. Too many men out there are "ones that kneel." It's time instead to fire three rounds a minute – and stand.

People Have Always Thought The World Was Ending

April 14, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Now that the 2012 phenomenon is behind us, perhaps its time to pause, take a breath, and ask the question—why were so many people so willingly duped? What is the cause of this mass hysteria? If the (relatively) educated people of 2012 can take such nonsense seriously, then has this happened before?

A quick reading of history will tell you that people have always thought, nay – hoped! The world was ending. Wikipedia has a list of more than a hundred examples. Some of the more notable ones include –

> 70AD – A Jewish sect sees their revolt against the Romans as the Battle of Armageddon

> 375-400AD – The Bishop of Tours declares that “there is no doubt the anti-christ has already been born” and that the rapture would occur by century’s end
> January 1st 1000AD – Various christian leaders, including the Pope, pin their hopes on this nice round number. Riots ensue across Europe
> 1348 – The Black Plague is seen as a sure sign of the apocalypse
> Feburary 1st 1524 – Astrologers predict the world will end from a flood starting in London. 20,000 people leave their homes for higher ground in anticipation
> April 5th 1534 – An Anabaptist preacher predicts that only the city of Münster would be spared
> 1600 – Martin Luther has a wild stab

> February 1st 1624 – The London astrologers try again. Presumably, they give up after this point
> May 19th 1780 – A combination of fog and forest fires panics the Connecticut General Assembly into thinking the day of judgement is occurring. Members debate whether or not there should be an adjournment
> 1806 – A hen in England begins laying eggs on which the phrase “Christ is Coming” is written. Eventually revealed as a hoax
> December 25th 1814 – A woman claims to be pregnant with the “Christ child”. After her death, an autopsy finds she was not pregnant
> October 22nd 1844 – The “Great Disappointment”. Hundreds of thousands of Americans eagerly await the second coming of Christ. Afterwards most begin rebuilding their lives. The remainder become Jehovah’s Witnesses
> 1850s – Some consider the Crimean War to be the Battle of Armageddon

> 1910 – An astronomer predicts gases from Halley's Comet would "snuff out all life on the planet". Peddlers start selling "comet pills"
> 1941 – The Jehovah's Witnesses have their own "great disappointment"
> December 21st 1954 – UFOs are supposed to destroy the world
> 1975 – The Jehovah's Witnesses have another crack
> 1988 – The book "88 Reasons Why the Rapture Will Be in 1988" sells five million copies
> 1991 – Leaders of the "Nation of Islam" declare the Gulf War to be the Battle of Armageddon

> December 17th 1996 – A California psychic predicts the world will end with the arrival of “sixteen million spaceships”
> March 26th 1997 – 39 members of the Heaven’s Gate cult commit suicide upon the approach of comet Hale-Bopp
> January 1st 2000 – The Y2K bug
> May 21st 2011 – Evangelical radio broadcaster Harold Camping predicts the rapture will occur. Shortly afterwards, he suffers a stroke instead
> December 21st 2012 – End of the Mayan Calendar

So why is this? Why are people apparently so terrified of the world ending?

I don’t think people truly do fear the world ending. In fact they fear the opposite—that it won’t end in their lifetimes.

They fear that, when all is said and done, there was nothing to really distinguish their generation. They will be just another anonymous chapter in human history, rather than host to the grand finale. They would literally prefer that the world end rather than let their children take it over and forget them.

Human beings are selfish bastards.

So are there any real threats?

Most of the conventional ways you’ve heard of the world ending are mostly or entirely bullshit.

Even the original apocalypse, nuclear weapons, falls far short of what was promised. There are simply not enough nuclear warheads to destroy every major city on Earth. Even in the 1980s, when the global arsenal reached its height, estimates were that 400-500 million might die in a first strike and perhaps double this number in total from famines, plagues, and radiation. However, the vast majority of humanity would survive.

The same goes with any other method. Pandemics? We have them all the time, but not once in four billion years has a disease mutated to the point it could wipe out every living creature on Earth. Solar Flare? Perfectly possible, but even by knocking out every electrical device on the planet the worst thing you'd do is set the economy back a few decades.

Asteroid strike? We only get a dinosaur killer about every ten million years, and are probably at the point by now we could spot and deflect it far enough in advance. Supernova explosion? There are no massive stars close enough to harm us, and even the foreboding "gamma ray burst" doesn't effect us more than once about every five million years.

Sucked into a black hole? The nearest observed one is nearly eight thousand light years away. Alien invasion? Well sure, but again, the Earth has been sitting here, apparently unmolested, for at least four billion years. The remaining possibility is if we somehow trigger it, like in 2001 or The Day the Earth Stood Still.

As far as I can figure it, there are only two possible, imminent, existential threats to humanity: runaway nanotechnology and a technological singularity. Both are related.

Runaway nanotechnology

While we know a naturally evolved virus wouldn't be virulent enough to kill us, engineering such a virus may be possible. Already, someone had the brilliant idea of posting the ebola genome online, though the average person doesn't yet own a 3-D printer capable of replicating it.

Indeed, with a well-designed virus, you could probably crash the whole ecosystem, as has often been depicted in science fiction. This threat remains until humanity has a permanent, sustainable presence in space, i.e. a self-sufficient base on Mars housing a few hundred people. While the space program has been stalled for decades, I think we will have such a backup by 2100.

Concerning nanotechnology, what we're really talking about is the dreaded "grey goo" scenario. Nanobots have often been depicted in fiction as this unstoppable, all-consuming force against which resistance is useless. There are reasons why this may not be the case however.

Maintaining a swarm of nanobots poses enormous challenges. Where do they get their power source? How do they communicate with each other? How do they sense the world around them? How do they store the design plans to make more copies of themselves? The word "nanobot" might as well be "pixie dust" these days. In fact to correct it, we ought to rename them.

Combating nanobots would be much like fighting any regular kind of plague. Your primary weapons are heat and isolation. By definition nanobots would be tiny. They would have a very large surface area to volume ratio. Even the most extreme heat resistant bacteria can only withstand temperatures up to 122 degrees Celsius. We might be able to increase this somewhat, but every element has a melting point.

Basically, if you heat something enough, or deprive it of energy, it will die. If you're facing a plague of nanobots – get out the glass beakers and flamethrowers.

A technological singularity

This is the real big one. It is the only threat to our existence I would take completely seriously.

The idea of the singularity comes from the observation that computers have doubled in power roughly every 18 months since the 1950s. If this trend continues, we will eventually reach an “escape velocity” where computers grow exponentially, surpassing all human comprehension. Proponents like Ray Kurzweil say this could occur before 2050.

Even then, there are arguments for why a singularity may not occur. Moore’s law is not a “law” after all, but just an observation. Someday soon we’re going to run up against the molecular barrier, and what indication is there that our CPUs will attain “sentience” before then?

The desktop computers of today are thousands of times more powerful than they were twenty years ago and we’re still using them to type word documents and watch porn. Our machines are still so primitive there’s little risk of a “robot revolt” just yet.

You can also make a decent argument that technology is not accelerating, but in fact slowing. I’d argue the world changed more between 1900 and 1950 than 1950 and 2000. We’re still flying the same planes we were forty years ago, and we have only discovered one new type of antibiotic in the last thirty years.

Cars, ships, trains, household appliances, weapons of war…the key breakthroughs were all fifty or a hundred years ago. Aside from computers, we’ve made few real leaps since the 70s.

So don’t panic

I think if you were to jump forward in time a hundred years, you’d see a world much as it is today. Yes, incredibly advanced computers and nanotechnology may be around, but just as there are still Amish communities today, I don’t think they’ll be any shortage of regular people. We’ll still be eating and shitting and jerking off as our species has been doing for the past one hundred thousand years. The Pyramids will still be standing, and there will still be beaches and rivers and other nice things to enjoy.

So relax, take a drink, and enjoy the likelihood that there will still be a relatively normal world for your grandchildren and great-grandchildren to inhabit in a hundred years.

Was Jeremy Clarkson A Casualty Of The Cultural Marxist Coup At The BBC?

April 15, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Until recently, Jeremy Clarkson was the chain-smoking, hard-drinking presenter of Top Gear, the BBC motoring show with a global cult following. Clarkson has made his name as a boorish, outspoken alpha male with scant respect for the edicts of political correctness that govern the conduct of media personalities in Britain.

The ability of the Top Gear franchise to shift books and DVDs and maintain buoyant domestic TV ratings made it worth £50 million a year to BBC Worldwide, the British state broadcaster's commercial arm. This was largely due to Clarkson's on-screen presence.

Clarkson's sacking is a further nail in the coffin for free speech and alternative ideas in a climate of stifling political correctness foisted on Britain through institutions like the BBC.
