Danny Cohen, a limousine liberal building his Social Justice utopia with your TV Licence money extracted on pain of imprisonment

Clarkson's demise was cemented in the wake of disciplinary proceedings after a bust-up with a producer, Oisin Tymon, whom he allegedly punched in the face. Tymon had supposedly failed arrange Clarkson's desired steak. The sacking brought to an end a long-running feud between senior executives at the BBC and Clarkson.

Empty suits like the BBC's Director of TV Danny Cohen are staunch proponents of right-on ideologies like "equality and diversity." These are values to which Clarkson stands in stark opposition. Once the star presenter had placed himself beyond the pale by assaulting an underling, anti-Clarkson sharks smelt blood in the water and circled for the kill.

Danny Cohen was the BBC executive responsible for Clarkson's suspension in the wake of the so-called "fracas." Cohen has been described by food critic and friend of Clarkson, AA Gill, as belonging to a clique operating at the BBC which is using the state broadcaster as an instrument for the promotion of left-wing views.

Gill was reported in the Telegraph saying that Top Gear is the opposite to everything Danny Cohen wants to broadcast: "white, overweight, middle-aged, banterish, polluting, coarse, middle-class and insensitive." Gill is not alone in his this particular criticism of the BBC—in 2011, Peter Oborne wrote, "Rather than representing the nation as a whole, it [the BBC] has become a vital resource—and sometimes attack weapon – for a narrow, arrogant Left-Liberal elite."

Cohen is the walking embodiment of this Left-Liberal rot at the heart of the BBC. On taking up his role as "Director of BBC Television," Cohen's first action was to accuse the BBC's comedy programmes of being "too middle class." Later on, he banned all-male lineups on comedy panel shows.

Licence-fee payers must now be subjected to “feminist comedians” like the odious Kate Smurthwaite, who picketed the funeral of popular London Dandy Sebastian Horsley, because the deceased man had happened to use prostitutes.

Cohen has also voiced support for fading comedian Lenny Henry’s demand for more “diversity” in British TV programmes. Rounding off the quartet of victimologist platitudes, Cohen also complained that he had “never felt so uncomfortable as a Jew in the UK” after the publication of reports on anti-Semitism in the UK.

To sum up, Cohen is an oppressed minority on the oppressive salary of £320,000 a year, who occupies himself with imposing gender and race quotas in British TV while militating against the menace of portly English men who use “unacceptable” language in programmes about motoring.

A storm in an English teacup

A man purporting to be The Stig delivers a petition for Clarkson’s reinstatement to BBC headquarters

Clarkson’s alleged transgressions in the past amount really to nothing more than English pub banter. In 1998 he asserted that staff at South Korean car giant Hyundai had eaten dog. The firm slammed the comments as “bigoted and racist”. At the 2004 Press Awards, Clarkson punched Piers Morgan in the face for publicising his infidelity.

In 2009 he called former Labour PM Gordon Brown a “one-eyed Scottish idiot,” drawing flak from activists for blind people. In 2010, he referred to the Ferrari F430 Speciale as “speciale needs.” The National Autistic Society piped in to complain that the comments perpetuated “prejudice and bullying which people with disabilities have to cope with.”

Showing no sign of abating, Clarkson told The One Show in 2011 that he would have public sector workers “taken outside and shot in front of their families.”

After Clarkson’s first suspension due to a racially insensitive comment, his public popularity gave rise to a petition for his reinstatement. The petition, signed by 1,000,000 people, was delivered to BBC headquarters by tank by Harry Cole, of the right-wing Guido Fawkes.

The sneering reaction of the liberal know-betters was summed up in the statement of the left-wing New Statesman’s Sarah Ditum, who fantasised out loud: “if every signatory to this petition were boiled down for biofuel the world would be a cleaner, smarter place.” As we in the manosphere are well aware, the mildest off-colour remark from a right-wing source is cause for men to be stripped of their livelihoods, while leftists openly fantasising about the deaths of their enemies is par for the course.

The BBC: a hive of Cultural Marxism and political correctness

The purpose of the BBC is to push a politically correct narrative delivered in tightly policed language. The Cultural Marxists at the BBC attack every cultural institution that comes within reach. One example is the adoption of the ridiculous “common era” and “before common era” in place of Annus Domini and Before Christ for denoting historical years.

This was in order not to “offend or alienate” non-Christians. In another instance, a male reporter who had just been thrown to the ground by a female Judo champion made a tame comment about being “beaten by a 19-year old girl.” The word “girl” was censored by the BBC for fear of causing offence, even though the female judoka did not find the remark sexist.

One of the most draconian instances of the BBC’s political correctness “gone mad” was the sacking of a regional radio DJ for inadvertently playing The Sun Has Got Its Hat On, a 1932 song containing the word “nigger.” The offending line in the song, recorded by Ambrose and his Orchestra, is: “He’s been tanning niggers out in Timbuktu, now he’s coming back to do the same to you.”

The wording was apparently obscure, yet a scandal arose after one listener rang to complain. The DJ, David Lowe, at 68 years of age and after a 30 year unblemished career in broad, had to quit his position because the episode aggravated a health condition.

The BBC’s culture of hypocrisy: no “Social Justice” for sexually abused girls Notorious alleged child-rapist and darling of the BBC, Jimmy Savile.

The priorities of “Auntie Beeb” become clear when one compares the ruthless pursuit of anyone who says anything vaguely off-colour with the disastrous handling by the BBC of the Jimmy Savile child abuse allegations. Savile was a renowned Yorkshire DJ who fronted the BBC’s Top Of The Pops.

Similarly to Clarkson, Savile was an indispensable talent with connections in high places. Decked out in trademark tracksuit and chewing on a huge cigar, Savile revelled in his ability to draw crowds and raise large amounts of money for charity. Savile was also allegedly very active in sexually molesting pre-pubescent girls, a vice which he concealed using his public persona as a charitable benefactor and entertainer.

The reaction of the BBC to the surfacing of the Savile allegations after his death was not on you’d expect of a network which makes a great song and dance about fighting for “social justice.” Instead of fighting for justice for Savile’s victims, they forced out or demoted journalists who outed Savile as a child-abuser.

Meirion Jones, on of the BBC’s top investigative producers, had his suspicions about Savile raised after seeing him take girls away in his car from a school run by Savile’s aunt. He handed his findings to the BBC, which promptly suppressed them. Jones faded into obscurity and was let go by the BBC this year.

Jones was accused along with his reporter on the Savile documentary, Liz MacKean, of “shoddy journalism” by the BBC when they tried to challenge the decision to shelve the investigation. Channel 4’s Panorama eventually took up the case and produced their own documentary investigation into Savile’s abuse. Oblivious, Clarkson’s arch-enemy Danny Cohen even considered running a tribute programme to Savile’s “Jim’ll Fix It” show, while Savile’s alleged abuse was known within the BBC.

A relic from another era

Clarkson in the early days.

I make no attempt to defend Clarkson punching a producer. The report into the bust-up ruled he had subjected an innocent party to an assault accompanied by “sustained and prolonged verbal abuse of an extreme nature.” After having given Clarkson a final warning over the “Catch a nigger by the toe” fiasco, the BBC were effectively given no choice but to sack him, irrespective the intentions of the PC manginas chomping at the bit to end his career.

Clarkson’s story is nothing if not a lesson in perseverance. Having started, in his own words, “on the Shropshire Star with little Peugeots and Fiats,” Clarkson eventually penned a magazine piece in Performance Car, which got him the screen test for Top Gear. In his own words:

> I didn’t look good. I didn’t dress well. And I didn’t really know what I was talking about. But there I was, on television, standing by the side of the road in Northamptonshire, waiting for a plane to fly over and for the rain to stop so I could tell eight people who truly loved cars how many suitcases you could get into the back of a Vauxhall Vectra.

Meet your new Liberal overlords

Danny Cohen is a man in stark opposition to Jeremy Clarkson. An Oxford graduate and Primrose Hill intellectual with as much creative energy and originality in his being as there is in one of Clarkson’s stray toenail clippings, Cohen represents arrogant, sneering left-liberal elitism at its most dangerous and despicable.

Married to a high-achieving feminist seven years his senior, Cohen strives to police ideological compliance on every front: class, race, gender and religion. To Cohen, the threat to the feelings of minorities posed by the words of men like Clarkson is of greater importance than the harbouring of an alleged child-rapist by the BBC.

The drive to get rid of Clarkson was successful because Clarkson made it easy for them to sack him, with his hot-headed temper and the devil-may-care philosophy that guided his actions. The dynamic, however, is a microcosm of modern Britain and indeed the West.

Men like Clarkson are workhorses: their talent generates numbers that keep whole enterprises like the BBC afloat. Instead of thanks for their efforts and tolerance of their foibles, the reward comes in the the form of jobsworth dictators like Danny Cohen, who, providing not one iota of value, are drafted in to implement nonsensical schemes for "more diversity" or "more female comedians."

It will be interesting to see what happens when the last of the "talent" walks away, and Danny Cohen is left with a roster of imbeciles like Kate Smurthwaite to keep British audiences entertained.

Read Next: SJWs Pile On Daily Show's Trevor Noah Over "Offensive" Tweets

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

To Pull Hot Girls You Must Make Every Interaction Physical

April 15, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Game, like any other discipline, is all about pushing your boundaries. You must never reach a comfort zone. If you do, then you are not hitting your full potential, and you must deliberately seek to make yourself uncomfortable again in order to keep getting the best results you're capable of.

I'm talking in particular about pushing for the close. Guys, you must always push for the close. If you're not doing so — and you're not experiencing a number of harsh blowouts along the way — then you are doing something wrong and you should look at your strategy and rethink.

One problem for men first getting into the game is that, once they've got over their initial, sometimes crippling fear of approaching and interacting with women, they enter a honeymoon period where the simple fact of getting favourable responses from women feels so awesome that they don't push for the close for fear of messing up.

Psychologically, it makes sense. If you're in a bar talking to a cute girl and she's responding well and giving you positive signals then that feels good. You are getting validation—perhaps for the first time—from a female you have just approached. Your cerebral receptors are rewarded with a warm, fuzzy feeling of achievement. Awesome — why would you want to mess that up?

But here's the thing. Your goal is not to get positive female validation in bars. Your goal is to have sex. Therefore you must always push forward, even if doing so gets you blown out.

Think about it like this. How much value would you place on having sex with a girl? In the context of pick-up, it would have to be 10 out of 10. After all, sex is the endgame. Now, how much value does a nice conversation with a polite female have? On the same scale, maybe 2/10 or 3/10 at most?

Fuck nice conversations. Go for the close. What does that mean in practice? It means escalating, both verbally and physically.

When you're in the bar or club, ensure that when you are interacting with girls, there is no doubt that there is a sexual subtext. I don't mean to say that you should show your hand too early by being overt, or telling her she's beautiful, or anything chodey like that. But what you must ensure is that she knows you're hitting on her. You can accomplish this through the course of a set with the following tools:

- Strong eye contact
- Physical proximity
- Touch (what game geeks call 'kino')
- Flirtatious and suggestive or downright sexual banter
- Leading behaviour
- Making out

Too many guys are content to have safe, friendly conversation with the girls that they meet, take contact details, and assume that what they've done counts as a pull. While I would always encourage anyone to rack up all the phone numbers they can collect for the simple reason that you never know 100% which lead is going to come off, I would also counsel that unless you are loading your sets with sexual spark, and making yourself stand out from the horde of chodes that surround most semi-cute girls, then most likely you are wasting your time.

Let's consider the final two elements on the list—leading, and making out. The two go hand in hand, and they are often at the outer limit of new guys' comfort zones.

Leading

Leading is actually very simple. After you've been chatting for a couple of minutes (or even sooner, if you think you can get away with it), put your hand out for the girl to take. then say "we're going to the bar," or "come on, we're going out for a cigarette," or "come over here — there's something I've got to show you."

Then take the girl to wherever you've indicated. Voila — you've now successfully isolated, and you can continue gaming away from her friends in comparative privacy. If your target resists, or makes an excuse not to come with you, then don't worry—simply carry on chatting and try again a few minutes later.

Making Out

Of course, you should have been building up for the make-out throughout the interaction by initiating kino from when you first met her, pulling her close, pulling her hair playfully, and, assuming all's going well, kissing her neck and ears.

The quicker you can do this stuff the better, as you are raising her buying temperature while simultaneously showing that you are simply “one of those guys” who is sexual and comfortable with it. Once you’ve established this, then the notion of sleeping with you will seem a lot more natural to her and less of a conceptual leap.

Remember: Girls hate to feel awkward and they will disqualify anyone who makes them feel it as “creepy.” A lot of game is about avoiding awkwardness.

So, when you’ve got her alone, the easiest way to initiate a make-out is simply to put out your hand, cup her cheek gently with it and pull her head towards yours, angling her gently so that your lips are level and approaching one another. Then kiss her.

If she turns her head—a fundamental fear that stops many guys even making a move—then don’t sweat it. Just smile, say something like “cool, I was aiming for your cheek anyway,” and just keep talking.

Then try again. Believe me, if she’s still there and she hasn’t walked off yet, then persistence is key and it will pay off.

The Bottom Line

Let’s be clear: just because you have isolated and made out with a girl doesn’t mean that she will sleep with you, or even remember you after a couple of shots when the DJ has dropped that new Avicii cut. But think about it like this—if she won’t even make out with you, then she how can you possibly expect her to sleep with you?

In this sense, a make-out is a decent marker of attraction, and so in a club situation it’s something you should always be aiming for at the very least.

Of course, once you have made out then you should escalate again, by trying to get her back to your place for post-club “drinks.”

Always push to make the interactions you get into physical. Again, to stress the point, even when you are successful in this it doesn’t mean you will get sex. But I speak to too many new guys who get excited about phone numbers from girls with whom they have had no physical interplay at all. The reason? Most likely they were to reticent to push forward for fear of spoiling the nice friendly conversations they’d been having.

Don’t let this be you—remember, it’s always better to get a slap round the face then be friendzoned.

Read More: What To Do On A Date To Maximise Your Chances Of Closing

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at

Troy Francis.

How Foreign Women View Western Men For Relationships

April 15, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following article was originally published on Roosh V.

I hope I have debunked the fantasy that a man can fly into any foreign country and easily find his dream girl within a short amount of time. The reality is that meeting foreign women can be just as laborious as meeting women in your own country, and that's not including the monetary cost of travel. The rewards are far greater, of course, but traveling to an unknown land to develop a sexual and emotional connection with a woman who shares a completely different culture than you is no easy task, and should not be viewed as such.

It doesn't help our cause that foreign women view us as a less worthy long-term partner than a local man. You may be wondering how can that be, with countless stories of mail-order brides and international couples meeting on the internet, but there are several points to consider.

A foreign girl in her prime can get top local guys

There is no need for a hot 21-year-old Russian girl to pursue a long-term relationship with an American man who doesn’t speak Russian, doesn’t have local connections, and doesn’t have any long-term roots instead of dating a high-value Russian man that she can easily get. Even in the poorest countries of the world, the most beautiful women have multiple strong options, and when you get into the 8 and 9 beauty range, you will find it quite challenging to maintain a relationship with her since she has so many high-value local men in her orbit.

Let’s do an example. Say that you studied Spanish in high school and later as an adult met a Colombian girl who moved to your city. She speaks no English. She is quite pretty, but not higher than what you can normally get. You begin dating her and appreciate her feminine qualities and exotic nature, but local girls above her beauty range still give you tons of attention, while the emotional connection with the Colombian is stunted because of not being able to communicate properly with her. How long will you date the Colombian for the novelty factor before easing back into your previous routine?

Purely sexual relationships are easy to create but hard to maintain

It’s not that difficult to have sex with a foreign girl who happens to be interested in foreign men. If she’s never met an American man before, and you approach her with good game, she may put out for you much faster than the local guy. This sexual experience will be very valuable to her, but then the reality of the situation will hit: a relationship with a foreign guy isn’t that great. He’s isolated from the local scene and probably doesn’t have a car or other badges of high value. He doesn’t have a local sense of humor, doesn’t share an interest in local movies and music, and doesn’t have much going on besides having a job, a fact that is less important since her standard of living is ever increasing.

Even worse, speaking in English all the time is tiring. A girl wants a relaxing or exciting relationship, not one where she has to exert her brain, and if the girl is pretty enough, she can get a guy on your level who not only is from her culture, but speaks the language and has more local “perks” that add weight to the relationship. Therefore it’s very rare that relationships in my experience last more than two months with a high-value young girl. She will fuck my brains out for that time and then move on to something more suitable for her needs.

Lower value foreign girls are more willing to pursue relationships

If I’m an 8 out of 10 in a foreign country and date a young girl who is also an 8, the relationship won’t last long. She’ll get tired or bored and move on to easily date a local guy. But the lower value a girl is (e.g. a 6), the more likely she will try to lock me down. The reason for this is simple: she can not get a local guy in the 8 range, so I am the best she’s ever likely to get. The fact that I’m not local is a lower concern than the fact that I’m the highest value she can land based on her lower beauty level.

If you have low or modest standards, establishing a relationship with foreign girls can be quite easy and pleasurable. She will see you as a long-term partner and not get bored after a month or two. She won’t stray or give you bullshit. She may even start to increase her English studies to prepare for a lifelong partnership with you. Let that sink in for a second: she’s ready to throw her own language and culture under the bus to be with a man who is the highest in value she’s been able to get.

Slightly older women have given up on local men

Another potential avenue in your search are women who are 25 and older. If a woman in a place like Eastern Europe or South America is single at this age, she is becoming desperate for a man and wants to secure the highest value she can. Even if she was a 9 in her youth, she will now be accessible to the foreign man for a long-term relationship, simply because she has failed with the local men due to being deficient in some way.

The 8 or 9 who wouldn't want a relationship with you when she was 21 and getting tons of attention from local men will now strongly consider marrying you at 28 when all that attention has dried up and you are her best option (does that strategy sound familiar to you?). Unfortunately for me, I do not enjoy the company of women over 25, so I try to limit my dealings with them, but this would be a target pool to select from especially since they're done fucking around and desperately want to start a family. As long as you don't mind being cock number twenty while having to wait for sex much longer than the sexy Spanish man she met during her last trip to Majorca, she's all yours.

Conclusion

When it comes to my dealings with foreign women, I follow this prescription:

If a girl is high value (young and very beautiful), extract as many instances of sex from her as possible and enjoy the ride.

The reason is because I know I won't be able to hold onto her for more than a couple months before she starts to crave a local guy. If she wants to try to lock me down, she can, and I wouldn't mind a mini-relationship with her, but she has so many options from a respectful local pool that I am satisfied at only having the short-term sexual rewards, especially at my advanced age.

If a girl is merely cute or pretty, I could pursue a relationship knowing that I could definitely fuck better, but possibly not maintain a relationship with better, simply due to the fact that my value as a foreign guy has limitations that aren't an issue in my home country.

In the end, it's important to be realistic. Just like how I've stated that getting foreign women can entail a lot of work, we have to also understand that we won't be able to easily wife up the best of what any country has to offer. I'm not upset at this for two reasons: (1) I'm not willing to put the additional work in raising my local value to keep the highest quality girls, and (2) The quality I'm able to get for medium-term relationships is solid even if it's not the absolute top, and going higher would not bring me a large increase in happiness or satisfaction due to passing the point of diminishing return.

If there's anything I've learned through living abroad for over five years, it's that beautiful women everywhere—even in dirt poor countries—have options. They don't have the immediate need to throw themselves on a sexy Westerner who has a marginal backstory that doesn't include permanent local roots. But thankfully, foreign women are almost always better than American women, so I'm definitely not losing any sleep at the problems that my international pursuits contain.

Read Next: "You Can't Get Laid In The United States"

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

A Short History On The Masculinity Of Fighting

April 15, 2015 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

Ever wonder where the great legal tradition of the West came from? Lots of reasons for it. But one of the main drivers of the use of lawyers and courts and the cause of our over-legislated modern culture was a civic campaign to cut down on urban disturbances, and public brawls.

Back in the day, even noblemen settled their disagreements with fist fights or duels. Get the stereotype of the foppish wig-wearing "gentlemen" out of your head, your ancestors would throw down often and over just about anything. Disagreements were settled in the streets. Here's what wikipedia has to say on the subject:

> In Western society, the formal concept of a duel developed out of the mediaeva ljudicial duel and older pre-Christian practices such as the Viking Ageholmgang. Judicial duels were deprecated by the Lateran Council of 1215. However, in spite of Church disapproval, there were nevertheless seven capital crimes that were still commonly accepted as resolvable by means of a judicial duel. Most societies did not condemn dueling, and the victor of a duel was regarded not as a murderer but as a hero; in fact, his social status often increased. During the early Renaissance, dueling established the status of a respectable gentleman, and was an accepted manner to resolve disputes. Dueling in such societies was seen as an alternative to less regulated conflict.

The process of gentile-ization came hand in hand with attempts to curb excessive blood-letting in European cultures. The war-like tendencies of almost all European peoples however, were also tied up with their understanding of masculinity.

Men were expected to fight to earn their keep, win renown, and of course to secure a mate. The nobility of Europe was founded on the warrior class, unlike in other places such as China, or India, or South America, that all had priest-led societies. Some more history:

> During the reign of Henry IV, over 4,000 French aristocrats were killed in duels "in an eighteen-year period" whilst a twenty-year period of Louis XIII's reign saw some eight thousand pardons for "murders associated with duels". Roth also notes that thousands of men in the Southern United States "died protecting what they believed to be their honour."

There you go. This doesn't even mention the number of your run-of-the-mill fist fights. Governments had to work hard to promote new mores and laws to stop the fighting, working hand in hand with the clergy to promote the central authorities as the sole arbiters of conflict. It took several millenia to stamp out the blood-thirst that our ancestors had, to get rid of that red-blooded craving of Western males to dominate and fight.

Forget your "guns, germs and steel" explanation, the West became what it is at the tip of a bayonet. This was all done of course, with practical considerations in mind as well as religious ones. Losing 4,000 of your nobles to duels is a staggering statistic, and rising nation-states as well as absolute monarchies had a practical reason from the position of strong state-craft to begin reining in this pagan holdover tradition.

Still, I always wonder. Will any of us ever experience something this profoundly masculine ever again? Some will say it was a grotesque tradition. I say that it was a life-affirming one. Others, that all human life is sacred and these acts of killing were wrong. I reply that this thinking stems from a fear of death and a view of death as the absolute terror, when in fact there are far worse things that can befall you.

Warrior based-societies lived closer to death than we ever will, and so had a deeper understanding of it than we ever will, hidden as we are behind the safe veil of secular humanism.

I am not advocating for the wanton death and destruction that characterized so much of our collective human history. All I ask, is that we consider whether getting a black eye from time to time is really such a scary possibility that we had to spend the better part of the last century insulating ourselves from all the harsh realities of the world.

This is dangerous because our children increasingly do not what it means to fight. When they grow up, they will move from one safe white neighborhood to another, go to university with other bubble-wrapped children, and move into safe gated communities after they get that promotion. Their disputes are handled by the courts.

Their security is handled by an increasingly bigger and more heavily armed police force. Their wars are fought for them by legions of underclass contractors, and now by autonomous flying killing robots. The attitude that fighting is wrong, in and of itself has now been wired into the brain of almost every white westerner I've ever met. Like Jack answers in that iconic scene from Fight Club:

> Tyler: Have you ever been in a fight?
>
> Jack: No, but that's a good thing.

It is almost a badge of honor to have never been in a fight. Even though deep down we know this is not true. As men, we crave the feeling of power, of knowing that we can handle ourselves when shit goes down. Often times, we fear that we can't and so with a little mental acrobatics we convince ourselves that our cowardice is in fact a virtue. "Real men don’t have to fight,” or some similar drivel.

Here’s a newsflash: real men don’t wear pink, real men don’t make crying displays of being in touch with their feelings, and real men don’t run from a fight.

By all means, take the advice of literally every person who has ever been in a fight, ever, and be smart about it. Don’t pick bad fights. Don’t get yourself killed over a girl. Don’t talk big and then not back it up. But also, don’t be so fucking afraid of standing up for yourself. Getting in a fight has real-world consequences, everyone knows this, in fact everything is geared to punish you if you do end up in one. You, dear reader, surely realize this as well as I realize it.

And yet, it is a profoundly religious experience. The feelings you feel while in a fight are nauseating, but after the fight, you feel so alive. You want to cry, to shout, to laugh, to eagerly inspect your body for bruises…

Try it at least once in your life.

Read More: Fighting Another Man Could Change Your Life

Vincent Law
Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

Why Women’s Natural Drive For Sexual Risk Is A Losing Proposition For The Nice Guy

April 16, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

> A healthy, well-kept, financially stable and mild-mannered guy wants to find a female companion to care for, spend time and have regular sex with. She doesn’t have to be anything special, as long as she is not horribly disfigured, it will do.

This is the mating call of a generic Nice Guy. It echoes sadly through all his communication attempts with women he likes: his countless Facebook messages that nobody will respond to, his emails that won’t be read, and the likes he dispenses in spades that won’t be appreciated.

Aaaand it’s my aunt wishing me happy birthday and a Candy Crush notification

Despite his apparent qualities, females not only ignore the Nice Guy, but absolutely despise him. They will go to any lengths to avoid giving the Nice Guy any attention whatsoever and actually consider him a completely non-sexual object, like a lamp or a nightstand. On the other hand, a tatted up gangster will be swimming in pussy without investing any effort, and will often have several women fighting over him.

$20 says the top one wins

To understand why this happens, we have to dissect the situation and take a dispassionate look at it. What the Nice Guy offers is his undying loyalty and endless love. In one word—security. And that's the exact opposite of what women want and what turns them on sexually.

What women actually want out of romantic relationships is risk. Trying to be more dangerous when dealing with women and seeing it work is just like flicking a light switch on and finally being able to see the entire room, instead of stumbling around it in dark.

Sexy time [ON]

A recent article published in New Scientist quotes Emily Nagoski, a Massachusetts sexologist, who states that 80% (probably higher) women feel no spontaneous sexual desire at all, compared to around 20% of men (probably lower) in the same situation. This spontaneous sexual desire is defined as an urge that arises on its own and demands to be satisfied, like hunger.

Women can definitely have sexual desire, it just doesn't appear on its own, but always as a consequence of some outside factor. The implication of this is staggering—women literally cannot initiate anything sexual and unless the man does something. This is not just sex, but any kind of intimacy is completely out of the question.

Women get horny too – once in a blue moon

A typical woman is driven by her desire for excitement and spontaneity, which leads her from one asshole to another. Just like a moth is attracted to the candle flame and circles it until finally flying straight into it and burning, so will a woman enter a badly thought out relationship that leaves her broken and defective. And then another and another. She won't be able to explain to herself why she is doing it and she will know it's bad, but she will do it nonetheless.

Of course, constantly taking risks is a strategy that gives diminishing returns and takes a tremendous toll on her body and psyche. Since that's the only strategy a woman has, it can only provide a limited amount of butterflies and feels before her beauty finally deteriorates to the point where nobody desires her anymore. At that moment, she will suddenly remember all those men that she used to reject just a while ago— a.k.a. Nice Guys.

Butterflies Gone Wild – Spring Edition

Nice Guys are actually cultivated by society on purpose. The reasoning behind this is that a woman must never suffer the consequences of her actions. Hence, there will always be a fresh batch of Nice Guys to cushion her fall and provide her with free meals, free housing, and a sperm donation. There is nothing wrong with Nice Guys as long as you are not one of them.

Getting out of the Nice Guy mindset can be quite a painful process, but there are ways to do it. If you've recognized yourself as not taking enough sexual risks, one simple method is to outright kiss every girl that you like. Without any introduction or explanation, just do it. Even if she slaps you or makes a scene, you will at least get her to acknowledge your advances and express her opinion of you publicly.

The end result will involve blowing in some fashion

As you use this method, you will lose the fear of rejection that was holding you back and just start doing with females whatever you desire. This kind of recklessness is exactly what attracts women and drives them insane. Having a woman that wants to submit herself completely to you is an ego booster like no other.

Actually, I could think of a couple exceptions

For men, the pinnacle of sexual development is having sexual security, which means the capability to get sex on demand. It’s not just going out and banging everything with a warm hole between her legs, but being able to target females you particularly like and being able to consistently seduce them with ease and without spending any money.

As with everything else, the secret lies in balance. Having a proper mix of sexual risk and security is the best possible long term strategy and results in a varied and stable sexual life well into the old age. What more could you ask for?

Read More: The Growing Epidemic Of Sexual Dysfunction Among Women

Derek Baroni

Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

6 Things I Learned From An American Terrorist

April 16, 2015 | by Justin Puck | Link | Original Link

Eric Rudolph is a convicted murderer currently serving time for several bombings including the 1996 Olympic Park bombing in Atlanta. Living on the run in the woods of North Carolina for years before being finally caught by a rookie local cop, Rudolph is a prolific self educated author who continues to write essays from his maximum security prison cell in Florence, Colorado.

Just as policy makers can learn from past attackers and criminals, so too can we laymen take away key lessons from one of America's most notorious home-grown terrorists. Beyond security awareness and debates over how to fight terrorism, there are six life lessons worth mentioning from the memoirs of a fugitive turned prisoner.

1. Education can be free

While so many middle class families subscribe to college education at all costs, Rudolph only briefly attended college and went to a couple of different very bad high schools, but never lost his desire to learn. While on the run in the woods, he was first limited to dumpster diving for newspapers and magazines from the trash, eventually discovering discarded books from a local library.

Limiting himself to non-fiction, the continuing big book challenge went on for months, killing boredom through long winter months in hiding while absorbing an education.

> …I connected with these people on a spiritual level, and in the process discovered my true identity: I was an American, and proud of it. All the hate and guilt and lies instilled in me by Mrs. Weaver and a dozen other public school teachers disappeared. In comparing these giants (Washington, Jackson, Patton) to the pygmies (Cesar Chavez, Malcolm X, Betty Friedan) they tried to idolize, I understood where their hatred came from. It was the kind of hate that the weak have for the strong, the mediocre have for the exceptional, and the lazy have for the industrious. In comparing what America looked like in its healthy heyday to the rotten carcass of modernity, I was able to begin my real education.

His literacy level extended far beyond many of his non-fugitive peers who had all the freedom necessary to improve themselves. Anyone could have borrowed the same books for free and learned just as much, and this was before inexpensive online education matured to present opportunities.

Nowadays it’s no wonder we witness the decreasing value (beyond status) of traditional and overpriced higher education.

2. Women haven’t changed much

A true pioneer and role model.

Eric Rudolph came of age when the Internet was still in its infancy and most meetings with the opposite sex still had to happen in real time, in person. He had a love interest at one of the politico-religious groups he briefly belonged to, but as we can all guess, the moment she departed for college, she returned a changed woman.

> …I eagerly awaited the Passover Feast, when Joy would return to the camp. When it finally arrived, her visit was a complete disappointment. Throughout the entire Passover Feast she barely spoke to me. Something had happened since the last time I saw her, but I couldn't put my finger on it. Whatever we had was over. If we had no relationship, then I had no reason to stay at the Church of Israel. I planned my escape.

I bet I can put my finger on it—any woman who has been away to college has no sense of fidelity or loyalty to the high school-aged sweetheart she left behind. It was beta even in the 1980s for Rudolph to wait it out at the camp, expecting Joy to return as a chaste virgin.

That he did not connect the dots to realize the power of the sexual revolution on a young attractive woman is understandable in the pre-Roosh era. Perhaps nowadays someone like him will have a clue before getting a case of oneitis and resolving to begin a violent crusade to rid the culture of corrupt influences.

3. Going it alone is extremely tough

What good is being alpha with no women around?

Before living as a fugitive in the wilderness, Rudolph had hardscrabble life mostly in the American south, along the way picking up survival skills from his time in the US military and living the woods of North Carolina. There wasn't a plant in the forest that he didn't know whether was safe to eat or poisonous, he was a skilled hunter and fisherman, and had the foresight to plan for emergency food and equipment caches.

While his ability to persevere was impressive, in spite of his preparation and skills he was always looking over his shoulder. In life it's prudent to never be too comfortable in your surroundings and always have a goal, a backup plan, and a slight dose of paranoia to keep you on your toes.

Rudolph's experience took that to the extreme. He survived like few can alone in the wilderness, but his capture was inevitable. The lesson here is no matter how great your skills and contingency planning, no matter how much you might think living off the grid gets you away from everything, it's nearly impossible to do for sustained periods of time – you just can't escape civilization, and no man is an island.

4. The world is getting a lot smaller

Rudolph was on the run for years at a time when drones didn't exist, GPS wasn't commonplace, and not everyone had a cell phone. Nowadays, it's doubtful that he would last as long in the wild as he did given the advances in technology.

> The helicopter's rotors grew louder as it flew across the gorge and began searching Tarkiln Ridge. Icicles attached to the bottom of the rock poked my face. In the gloom I noticed my warm foggy breath slowly seeping out of the > shelter into the sunlight. “Oh no, it’s going to detect my breath,” I said. I held my breath for as long as I could stand it. At the point of passing out, I exhaled and then took in another breath. The chopper was right above me now.

Even though he eluded the federal agents in helicopters that particular time, what was next? Were he to somehow slip across the border to Mexico, the advent of facial recognition software, DNA databases, and cameras at every street corner would probably make short work of finding anyone not living in a cave 24 hours a day for the rest of their lives.

5. So long as women vote, elections will be decided by emotions.

Prohibition came along the same year as universal suffrage – coincidence?

In the months preceding the presidential election of 2000, Rudolph became so disgusted with the so-called conservatives at the GOP that he actively sought to derail George W Bush’s campaign in the hopes of a much more conservative candidate down the road, and he almost succeeded.

> My immediate goal was to destroy Bush’s candidacy. Confronted with four to eight more years of leftwing-Al Gore-policies, conservatives would, I hoped, become more radicalized. I believed a bloody attack on an abortion mill just before the election might do the trick.”
>
> …An attack on an abortion mill might be the catalyst to push those moderates into Al Gore’s camp. The Marxist media would pounce on the story, and they would hang the bombing around Bush’s neck. Bush’s moderates would change their votes. Key states would go for Gore, and Bush would go back to Texas to play cowboys and Indians on his big ranch. Eight years of Bill Clinton did more to radicalize the Right than anything in the last 30 years. I was hoping eight more years of such left-wing policies would push them into open revolt. That was the strategy.

Say what you will about his extreme pro-life outlook, Rudolph had a solid understanding of feminism and recognized that the modern, post-women's suffrage electorate could be easily swayed by the right catalyst. All it took to spin the hamster of (mostly female and white knight) voters away from getting Bush elected was to initiate a bombing that would immediately be blamed on him, regardless of how truly committed he was to the pro-life movement.

Had he not been thwarted by a last minute inability to secure a reliable vehicle, Rudolph may have pulled it off. This was an election won by barely four thousand votes and a Supreme Court decision—it's safe to say the plans of one terrorist almost changed the course of history. That said, his hope was no strategy for a conservative grassroots movement, since…

6. You can't directly fight the cultural decline.

Not the way to fight SJWs

Eric Rudolph had tremendous foresight in his predictions as to how far down the toilet Western culture was sinking. He recognized a drastic cultural emergency, but his solution was to become a one man army and fight the fight, literally, as an unconventional warrior in occupied territory.

The only thing more foolish than thinking one man could successfully carry on a bombing campaign against abortion clinics and gay bars and not eventually get caught was the idea that a one-man war would ever make any significant difference in the world view of increasingly solipsistic, self-oriented Americans.

His attempt to influence was instead a brutally ineffective series of gestures that barely touched the symptoms of the underlying moral depravity. Eric Rudolph did nothing to recapture the dignity which continues to permanently slip from the American spirit.

He would surely agree the advent of smartphone ubiquity only accelerated the moral decline, but meanwhile, there is little else he can do about it now, except write. Ironically, had Rudolph stayed away from bombs and guns and instead improved his communication outreach, he would be better able to address and perhaps convince others through written and spoken word.

It doesn't have to amount to "if you can't beat 'em, join 'em," but neither does it do any good to go down with the ship.

Conclusion

Eric Rudolph continues to write, but the pity is a man who could have become a leader, a father, and a husband missed out on the one thing he could have directly influenced the most – a family.

Instead, he deprived himself of that opportunity by failing to recognize the Quixotic nature of the task he attempted. Everyone reading this knows you can't turn a whore into a housewife. Similarly, if America is turning herself into a whore, then Eric Rudolph turned himself into the ultimate white knight by trying to save something that just doesn't want to be saved.

If the spirit from within isn't willing, no amount of effort from the outside can have any permanent effect. The challenge, then, is to change the spirit. It's hard to see how else this could have ended.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Justin Puck
Slickyboy is a lawyer but hates to admit it, a veteran who can't stand yellow ribbon stickers, and a well traveled hack with a reasonably accurate bullshit detector. You can follow his random musings on Twitter.

How To Get Paid What You're Worth

April 16, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by BADNET

Damn man, the job market is hard.

You've got to contend with hordes of losers applying for the same job as you. You've got to wait long weeks just to hear back, "Sorry, we're not interested." You've got to deal with a boss who treats you like a fool even though you're much smarter than him.

What if there were a better way? A way to get paid a real salary and not simply eat dirt for breakfast, lunch, and dinner? You're smart, you already know the answer is, "Yes, a way does exist." It's called building a business, and dumber people than you are doing it every day.

When you work for a boss, you're not going to make good money. That's because unless your labor makes them more money than they pay you they'd be foolish to hire you. This is true of every single position anywhere. From scraping toilets to C-level executives. You'll never get paid what you're worth…

Unless you become an entrepreneur.

When you're an entrepreneur, you know for a fact that three things are true.

1. You can work as much as you want

You want to work more hours to bring in business faster? Go ahead. Try suggesting overtime to your boss at work and it's more likely you'll get turned down. He doesn't want to pay a premium for you.

Or how about if you'd like to work less hours and reserve more time for yourself to go to the gym, prepare meals, or read great books? See how well that goes down. Tell your boss, "I want to work less hours and get paid less."

Most likely you'll see yourself working zero hours in a hurry.

2. You can work as smart as you want

If you are smart, you'll begin to see holes in every business around you.

- Maybe their marketing sucks and nobody's coming in through the door.
- Maybe their product is terrible and you know a way to make it more appealing.
- Maybe their logistics are bad and you can see ways to speed up the supply chain.

A critical eye turned to any business will show thousands of tiny improvements that you can make. But let's say you suggest a few of these ideas to your boss. The business sees a 25% bump in revenue.

Do you see any of that increase? NO. At best, you see a tiny token bonus as a thank you. Not nearly as much as you actually earned for them.

But how about if the result of your efforts to improve and tweak a business directly resulted in more cash in your pocket? That would be nicer, yeah? All you need is to offer something valuable.

3. You can work on exactly what you want

When you own a business, you call all the shots. You're the big kahuna. You're the guy everyone looks up to. And that means that everything is up to you.

- The look, up to you.
- The product, up to you.
- The voice, up to you.

This is a powerful feeling. One of the best feelings about working for yourself is that of being a self-determined man, all day, every day.

In fact, self-determination correlates with overall happiness. When you work for yourself, you aren't being told what to do, you decide what to do, which leads to greater fulfillment.

4. (Optional) You can work wherever you want

Most businesses require inventory. They require your presence managing employees. And they require renting a space to sell from. But my favorite kind of business allows you to make deals from anywhere.

You don't need inventory to start an online business. And you don't need anywhere besides your kitchen table to run it from. Powerful software tools exist that let you manage a team of employees doing all your dirty work for you, wherever you are in the world.

From stocking warehouses, to delivering seminars, to running your customer service, getting things done through your computer has never been easier or cheaper.

But they all require a home base – your website.

The best way to get started is with a powerful website platform such as WordPress. WordPress is free software that makes it easy for anyone to build a website and get it looking exactly how you want.

More than 23% of all the websites on the internet run with a backbone of WordPress, so you know you're in good hands. But you don't need to know the tech to get started. In fact, we'll even install WordPress for you, so you can get started building right away.

Just head over to BADNET, get yourself a free domain, and get started.

You'll get a professionally set up website ready for you to use as your canvas. Make art, start a business, get paid.

And start making what you're really worth.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Taking Your Kids To Church Will Turn Them Into Degenerates

April 16, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

A phenomenon in Christianity in the last hundred years or so is ecumenism, the belief that Christians should be united despite differences in beliefs. This is especially ubiquitous today and is the major driving force behind all those smug non-denominational churches popping up all over town.

Yet churches today—at least within evangelicalism—are in fierce competition for membership, knowing that churches grow more by migration than by conversion. And a major marketing point for the church on your street corner is their children's ministries.

The Story Of Suburban America

You grew up going to church, but you decided that you would rather smoke weed and have sex. So you gradually quit going, giving a reason like how we can't know with absolute certainty whether God exists. But then you got married and grew too old for recreational drug use. Now you've got kids, and you don't want them to grow up into degenerates. Plus it's hard to make friends post-college beyond the idiots at work.

So you decided to start going back to church. You saw a billboard advertising the children's ministry at a church in the area. You've met a few people that go there. From all you've heard, it sounds like an entertaining place.

The church is huge and doesn't feel stuffy and outdated. What can it hurt to take your family to church? Seems like a good thing to do, and you've got nothing to lose but a few hours of sleep.

Fast-forward twenty years, and you've found that of the kids your children grew up with at church, the ones that were the most devout have the worst substance abuse problems and often aren't Christians at all anymore. Your daughter turned into the church slut, and your son is a complete social retard. What the hell happened?

The Hell That Happened

Most pastors in any Christian sect have no marketable skills beyond public speaking. Protestantism in general has more candidates for pastoral ministry than positions available. So the pastor knows he has to be careful about which sermons he feels God leading him to preach or else he could easily find out that God's calling in his life has suddenly changed.

People church hop regularly today, in part because of the competitive nature in evangelicalism. So people join churches like they join golf courses. This one is really nice, but that other one has a tennis court, so we'll pay our dues there instead. You get out of people what you expect out of them, so if churches treat their laity like clientele, then the lay people will act accordingly.

The days of attending the same church your family has attended for generations is gone. This lack of commitment to individual churches correlates with the lack of commitment found in Christian marriages, as divorce is rampant in these nominally pro-family establishments.

Churches also measure their success by quantity of members instead of quality. And to outsiders, a large number of members is a sign of quality, much how people continue to eat at franchise restaurants no matter how awful they taste while ignoring the local restaurants, unless those local restaurants gussy up their atmosphere to look like chain restaurants.

My childhood church, one of the biggest in the area, was famous in high school for having the most back-stabbing youth group. Despite their business mentality, they never thought to judge the product based on its functionality.

What Your Kids Won't Learn

Davis Aurini has said before that Christians raise their daughters like sons and raise their sons like maidens. The boys, believing in an objective morality, delay sex for marriage, and the girls, believing in the unconditional forgiveness promised, fornicate with the non-Christians. And God forbid a girl is ever taught not to pursue a career or to submit to her husband's authority.

Teenagers at church are taught very little about the differences between men and women other than that only men have a sex drive, because the parents—who pay the light bills—are in desperate denial that their daughters experience all seven deadly sins.

And the kids must be taught about human sexuality at church, because parents want to outsource their job to the church. Parents want their kids to have a strong sense of morality, but they don't want to put the effort into instilling that morality themselves.

Kids are never told that women lose their ability to bond in sex some twenty times faster than men. They are never taught what Biblical masculinity and femininity looks like, and the blatant sexism in the Bible is apologized for and argued around. Your kids will be told that sex is something sacred but that they should save it until age 25.

Daniel • 2 years ago

This was excellent. The only true "relationship" I ever enjoyed was with a Christian virgin girl. I remember wondering at the time why a person with such deeply-held convictions would lose it to a guy that who she perceive as not recognizing the intrinsic value of a virgin girl (at least, compared to chaste or at-best undersexed Christian guys who would wax philosophical about what a beautiful sacred treasure a girl's virginity is).

Multiple times, she answered this question for me without even realizing it. I remember us both using her computer, checking out her facebook. A male mutual friend had just posted a profoundly beta, long-winded status about finding a good girl who was worthy of "taking his" virginity. Upon reading this I admit I had a good laugh (and felt guilty, since he was a good friend). My girlfriend scolded me for this, informing me that he was being a good Christian, and that she had a lot of respect for him preserving his virginity. I asked her if she would ever date him, just for fun.

"Oh gosh no. He doesn't seem like that much of a man."

And she's a good girl.

44 ^ | v • Reply • Share ›

From the comments section of Edward Thatch's "Why Christian Men Don't Deserve Virgins"

But that much is obvious. Another thing your kids will never learn is moderation. Instead they will be taught that they are unable to have self-control and must compensate. This is why Christian girls are absolutely terrified of men even when they are ready to marry.

It's also the reason many Christians will say, "I don't think alcohol is a sin, but I would never drink it because I don't want to cause others to stumble. My great uncle was an alcoholic, so it runs in the family, and I wouldn't be able to control myself after just one beer."

Secular music often encourages un-Christian behavior, so churches provide a cheap substitute, assuming that the definition of rock n' roll is distorted guitars. Christians assume that if you encounter a message, then you will come to believe it by mere osmosis. This Puritan misconception is not unlike the contemporary leftist thought policing.

Jesus Has A Plan

What a beautiful fairy tale castle cathedral!

Our society in general doesn't place much stock in the notion of consequences. It's as though people think they have a human right to not have their choices effect the outcome of their life. Churches have bought into this secularism with their preaching of Jesus's forgiveness. He's got a free gift of salvation. It won't require anything from you!

The implication in promising free salvation is that there is nothing required on your end. So your daughter can whore herself around and believe that Jesus will forget all about it just as soon as she's ready for Him to. And she's also convinced that part of Jesus's forgiveness involves still providing the plan for her that He's had in mind from the beginning—namely that grand fairytale wedding.

Likewise, your son will believe that God will provide him with his fun, kind-hearted virgin bride in God's own timing. Maybe that timing is when he's 35, but God knows better than you, so don't be complaining about your blue balls. And maybe that bride that God provides is a bit less than virginal or less than feminine or less than not divorced.

Doesn't matter. God has a plan, and you need to marry that slut with the crushing law school debt. Can't you see the signs? You happened to run into her at the store twice during the week after you first met her. Coincidences are God's astrology.

Some of you may be thinking, "I was never taught any of that growing up in church! We just preached the Word." That's because the most dangerous things in garden-variety Christianity are not the direct teachings but the indirect. Just because nobody ever told you the words "self-esteem is a Biblical virtue" doesn't mean that you didn't internalize it from the attitudes surrounding you at church. And yes, often the lessons actually consumed completely contradict the lessons verbally spoken. It's a broken system, like all things American.

For the rest of you, all that may sound like something from a bad preteen dystopian novel. It's not. And unfortunately, they are a huge voting bloc, although the only real power they have today is keeping America in support of Israel's apartheid.

Cafeteria Bible

Another great disservice your church will do to your kids is that, for all the talk about the importance of knowing the Bible, they are given a very skewed understanding of the Old Testament. Old Testament stories were taught to us as though they are fun children's stories, like a real-life Snow White.

Then I got older and read about Gideon's polygamy and paganism and David's casual genocide when fighting as a mercenary for the Philistines. Apparently the Old Testament, in its attempt to be a detailed history of a time and place where only the fittest survived and human rights was the butt end of a tavern joke, is pretty bloody and hedonistic.

Turns out that the draconian morality in the Old Testament was just trying to make a stable civilization in a corner of the world with casual rape, sodomy, and infanticide being the Monday morning grind.

Most adult Christians are vaguely aware of the rapey morality in the Old Testament, but few of them understand it, and pastors avoid the topic because it doesn't mesh with the upbeat vibe of Sunday morning soft rock. Instead pastors just pretend it doesn't exist, much as they do with the New Testament's teaching about women shutting up in church.

Few Christians have read much of the Bible beyond isolated verses, and they are uninterested in reading any kind of Bible commentary or systematic theology because of the big words inside. Even seminaries have greatly watered down their curricula so that anyone with a call can change lives for the better or worse. I know more scripture blind drunk than most pastors do on a Sunday.

Christians today are panicking because that their kids grow up to dismiss the Bible as mere fairy tales, but they don't realize that they themselves were the ones who taught the Bible like it was Dr. Seuss.

Conclusion

There are very few “good church girls” left, and even most virgin girls are drunk on modern secularist idealism. Meanwhile the boys buy into all the equality and soft feminism from their Sunday school teachers and thus come to believe that a real man is a kind and gentle white knight, someone who will sacrifice all of himself on a dime just like Jesus.

Therefore, if you want your kids to grow up with traditional morality, don’t take them to church.

Read More: Flawed Blue Pill Interpretation Of Religion Covertly Pedestalizes Women

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

11 Ways To Survive A Media Shitstorm

April 17, 2015 | by Roger V Kint | Link | Original Link

In an age not long ago, today's faults of the human condition were destined to become tomorrow's fish and chip wrappings at the local fast food establishment. Unless, of course, you had a nosy neighbor who could be bothered to retrieve your misdeeds from an archived microfiche of government records.

Unfortunately in this decade, anyone's infractions are forever scorched into the Google mainframe. Unless one employs the services of a reputation management firm (a minimum spend of several thousand dollars—annually) or decides to post all comments on social media as LOLZ CATZ instead of one's real name, the chances of failings being relegated to page three of Google are somewhat slim.

Recently I was embroiled in a nasty work scandal. While my indiscretions were relatively minor (a few off-handed emails), because they involved a female coworker AND the police were eventually called in, the situation quickly escalated into a "trial by media." Charges were laid against me but in the end were later dropped once the truth came out and female witnesses recanted their "version" of events (once they had been caught lying).

Unfortunately for me, the details of the case (the woman's indiscretions of adultery and borderline criminal malpractice) never saw the light of day in the MSM and I was labelled a misogynistic bully by the press. It should come as no surprise to ROK readers that in today's click-bait driven churnalism of the 24-hour news cycle, the truth is the first sacrifice at the altar of the press.

Self explanatory……

After experiencing firsthand the impact of being named and shamed by the MSM, I have the following advice in case you ever find yourself in these personally hazardous, tabloid waters. ROK has touched on this topic before in a slightly different manner, but I hope you can learn from my personal experience.

1. Immediately close your social media accounts

If you can foresee that your name will be reported on — shut down your social media accounts indefinitely. The media have lowly paid interns whose sole job is to be some aspiring “cub” reporter who will not even think twice about spending their entire weekend(s) trolling through your online presence.

That off hand joke from 2009 about the difference between a woman and a washing machine, it will be dredged up and used against you.

2. Remember that women are pure as the driven mud

In the initial stages of a news story, the press are out to paint a good vs. evil narrative. The aggrieved woman always has the moral high ground, regardless of any called out behavior. Accept that because a woman is involved—you will be the “bad guy”.

Also be prepared to read false media statements with varying levels of “truth” amongst the paragraphs. The media will always side with a woman—especially with the misogyny agenda thrown in for good measure. If you are a privileged white male, then you are fucked from the beginning.

3. Once your name is out there, expect an avalanche of social media hate

Ring Spiderman…..

Once my name was mentioned in the news, it opened up a floodgate of anonymous bile and vomit. You’d better have a thick skin. I enacted a self-imposed media blackout to avoid being caught up in the mental bullshit.

4. Make preparations to walk from your job or have it taken from you

I was suspended on full pay. However, in the end the situation was untenable. I decided to walk instead of dealing with the crap. Granted I had sent off the (private) email—despite the intent behind it (calling out her bullshit), there was no recourse for career progression within the company after that.

Mentally preparing yourself for an exit will lessen the shock if the decision comes down. Spare me the misplaced rhetoric about being a good employee with years of tireless service—HR simply doesn't give a fuck about you.

Please don't be pathetic and beg for your job . Only sad, beta orbiters carry on like pussies. If HR have raised the issue with you, it's only a matter of time before you go. Better to walk out on your own terms with what dignity you have left.

5. ALWAYS have a back up plan

Whether that be a side business, investment portfolio, or a year's salary in the bank. If you only have your weekly paycheck to fall back on — you're fucked. In the end, no one owes you a job and don't expect a company to be looking out for YOUR needs.

If you don't believe me, swap the word "football player" for "employee" and you'll see what I mean. The best security is your own business that no one can fire you from. Never be beholden to anyone.

6. Expect to be surprised by who will blacklist you and who will support you

One of the nuances of the human condition was that I found that supposed supportive colleagues of many years immediately sided with the “aggrieved” female (typical thirsty beta, white knight orbiter bullshit) while hostile business acquaintances from other firms (who I had been in fierce competition with) gladly sat down to hear my side of the story.

You never know who your supporters are and where they will come from. Remember these people and truly thank them (a business dinner out, a nice corporate gift) after the dust settles.

7. Never explain, never complain to the media—you will only look like a pussy

Remember that the media can manipulate a saint into a sinner (and vice versa), so if you are already offsides with the predetermined MSM narrative, any sulks or cries of injustice will be met by more misreporting and bias.

While you can (foolishly) agree to a media interview and bleat away your side of the story (the SJWs only want to see you cry), be prepared to be muted in the final cut while the reporter shit-cans you. Better to soldier on and not give a flying fuck what the journalists are writing about you. Never give them the satisfaction of seeing you sweat.

The only rebuttal to this is if you have far more damaging, irrefutable evidence to give the MSM. It had better be concrete evidence and far more scandalous. To quote Frank Underwood in the Netflix series House of Cards, “When you’re fresh meat, kill and throw them something fresher.”

8. Dress well for your court date or any encounters with the media

If you know you are going to be filmed by the media (and you can’t avoid them), you may as well look good. This may be the one time you need to wear that expensive suit. Better to have that one immortalized picture on Google looking dapper as opposed to having your left nut hanging out in your favorite shorts and sporting a “Bros before Hoes” t shirt.

Oh and don’t be a wimp and run away from the media cameras or put your hand in front of your face—it only serves to make you look weak and out of control of the situation. Remember that although the camera crews may call you names or prod you for a response, this will be edited out. The only thing that the viewers will see is any emotional reaction you give them—that’s how the game works, so don’t fall for it.

9. Operation YOYO (You’re On Your Own)

Apart from yourself, don't be surprised if no one gives a flying fuck about your situation. People have their own shit to deal with and they definitely don't have time for yours. While close friends and family will be there to listen to your tough times, don't harp on about it. No one likes a victim past the one day of wearing some bullshit, tokenistic "awareness ribbon."

Though the outpouring of rage may seems enormous, it is really only 10% of professional outragers that want to leave some troll comment and get back to Jezebel for their latest, daily dose of being pissed off. Sheeple love to be outraged and the MSM feeds that desire. Also going through life as a victim is no way to live. Victims are simply people who cannot deal with tough times.

10. Don't get into bad habits

Don't ever let it get this far.

Yes, you may be pissed off and hating the world. Remember, feelings are temporary and only you can choose the narrative going on inside your head. Now is not the time to be angry at the traffic cop, your family, or the world in general. Also don't try to self medicate by excessively hitting the alcohol or other unsavory vices.

Too many people that get mired in scandal succumb to the “cobra effect” or law of unintended consequences. In summary it means that the tapestry of their life starts to unravel in ways they never thought could happen. Get a mental grip on yourself and take back your life.

11. Realize that life goes on

After what seemed like an eternity, the event was over and I had arrived somewhere—ten pounds lighter, more educated, and I had landed a new job with a rival firm with great prospects of advancement. There definitely is opportunity in adversity. You just have to see it instead of having a navel-gazing pity party.

The famous psychiatrist Viktor Frankl who survived Auschwitz under the most horrible of conditions, noted that there was dignity in suffering. Whilst I would never compare my first world problems to his, his book “Mans Search for Meaning” put my troubles into perspective. Whatever term you use, remember, the sun eventually shines on all of us.

Summary

The mainstream media’s caravan of shit will eventually move on to newer stories in their relentless thirst for destroying peoples lives. Don’t ever take it personally and don’t ever give them the satisfaction of seeing your life suffer.

Control your attitudes and habits and learn to ride the wave of adversity to opportunity. When I was ambushed by a roving reporter after the charges were dropped, when asked how I was dealing with the scandal, my (only) sound bite was, “My life is better than ever.”

Read More: 26 More Signs She’s A Slut

Roger V Kint

Studies Prove Lesbians Batter Their Partners More Than Straight Men

April 17, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Amidst the constant vitriol against men due to inflated rape and domestic violence statistics, a deafening silence occurs. Study after study argues that lesbian women are equally or more violent than male partners in heterosexual relationships.

The media and authorities nonetheless avoid the issue entirely. Admitting that lesbians, ergo a sub-set of women, seem to commit domestic violence as much as or more than men grossly undermines feminists' obsessions with imaginary patriarchal control and concocted notions of male privilege.

Many of these same studies assert that same-sex male relationships include domestic violence as much as heterosexual relationships. But lesbian domestic violence samples provide a better analogy, as the alleged victims are women, like in most reported accusations involving straight relationships.

How to fake an anti-male argument

If the fists start flying here, don't expect feminists to take up the cause.

The omission of lesbian domestic violence from the equation is ludicrous. It is akin to the hypothetical situation of stopping anti-drunk driving campaigns in Maine because there are far less people living there than in California, or focusing only on Caucasian-American alcoholism because whites form a majority compared to, say, the Native American population.

If domestic violence is such a scourge, as feminists "articulate," anything short of addressing the whole picture is a manipulative political ploy and agenda. And the agenda here is to attack men and describe domestic violence as a sport played only by straight males.

These same domestic violence statistics, which involve self-reporting, are used to hound, vilify, and too easily convict men. In the convoluted playground of rape statistics, the threshold for "sexual assault" has commonly been reduced and caricatured to reported cat-calling and sex after consuming alcohol, even if a girl is entirely lucid or the male is intoxicated as well. Unsurprisingly, lesbians get a free pass when studies involving less amorphous, more strictly defined questions about violence are conducted (i.e. as basic as "Has your female partner hit you?").

Even The Atlantic, all too often a leftist smorgasbord of the most putrid media diarrhea, acknowledged that the same-sex domestic violence situation is an "epidemic". Other figures collected by American government agencies and bodies cite 3.9 million women being physical assaulted by their female partners. Because the proportion of lesbians or functionally bisexual women in the United States is by most estimates about 20 times smaller than the straight female population, these numbers are staggering.

Lesbians' reluctance to report

Feminists pay this concept lip-service only, as all violence towards and between the LGBT community can be conveniently blamed on men and the patriarchy.

One of the hallmarks of feminist Newspeak is to always emphasize the proportion of straight females who never report domestic violence or sexual assault "committed" by men. They then assume, without any evidence, that these "cases" are all proven domestic violence or sexual assault crimes and therefore can be utilized in calling for the watering down of male due process rights.

The problem with this narrative is how it reflects on the reporting of same-sex domestic violence. Studies such as the ones cited in the links above continually reference an underreporting of domestic violence amongst same-sex individuals. So the problem is actually much bigger.

The confirmation bias of feminists allows them to appropriate the most stretched and tenuous methodologies, such as conflating alleged female sexual assault victims with victims as established by court processes (which are themselves being institutionally diluted and relegated to "he said, she said" dramas). But these methodologies are never appropriated where the alleged perpetrators are not straight males, let alone converted into demands in the political and social arenas.

As you might have read in my recent inquiry into women slut-shaming women as much as men, females are stripped of agency when it involves mocking and bullying other women, while men are held to account as autonomous and privileged actors.

The same principle applies to lesbians and domestic violence. Males in straight relationships have choices, but women in straight or same-sex relationships have oppression to explain away their violence.

The feminist fear of loss

Exposing the symmetry in same-sex versus straight domestic violence threatens to strip feminists of their political cash-cow: the fictitious institutionalized oppression of women by men. Ignorance of same-sex partner abuse, especially the lesbian variety, is thus mandatory to keep their agenda well-oiled and moving. Females battered by females highlights the individual choices made when partners abuse in private places, not any entrenched public system encouraging it.

Inasmuch as modern society now ascribes overly special status to gays, lesbians, and particularly transgender people, the domestic violence studies illustrate how feminists have resorted to throwing the LGBT community under the bus in order to preserve their anti-male narrative.

If the heat from that abandonment becomes too much, feminists can simply blame the patriarchy for shaming and stigmatizing lesbians into hitting their partners in the first place. And so the cycle continues.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Be More Honest In 6 Hard Steps

April 17, 2015 | by Andrian Red | Link | Original Link

Honesty is one of the hardest topics to cover. Although there are thousands of books and articles out there teaching you how to be dishonest, very few actually cover how to be honest in a practical way.

People who tend to be more dishonest than others typically don't have concrete personal values and boundaries. Dishonesty comes from seeking to take things from others rather than to give or to genuinely connect with people.

Once you have learned to recognize the dishonesty in yourself and know when to use it constructively, you will start to see the beliefs and intentions within yourself that caused it in the first place.

Don't blame yourself or who raised you. Those beliefs were passed down through the generations subconsciously. However, now that you are consciously aware of it, you can work to undo those beliefs and build new, honest ones.

1. Establish your values concretely

Prioritize and reevaluate them as often as necessary. This will allow you to build strong personal boundaries (such as an honor code) that you won't let others, and most importantly yourself, violate. These values give you a sense of self-worth and achievement at the end of the day. Honoring them will give you something larger to desire rather than petty things that people are typically dishonest for.

2. Live more consciously and responsibly

We tend to become less and less honest as we become exhausted, distracted, or inundated with information. When we learn to live consciously, we are less likely to be swayed by the twists and turns of life. Regularly check your inner and outer congruence. Pay more attention to the present. Meditate. You will find it easier to stay true to your creed.

3. Establish a sense of purpose in as many things you do as possible

A sense of purpose will give a counter-balancing rationale on why you should act honestly. It’s this sense of purpose that you should be true to, rather than random impulsive desires that fill your days. Your personal integrity is tied to how much you are serving your sense of purpose. Conversely, you will recognize how much are you doing a disservice to this purpose when you don’t act honestly.

4. Positively reinforce your personal integrity by self-validating the honest acts you perform

And do this regardless of the results or recognition you derived from it. Negatively disassociate yourself from any dishonest act by vowing to do better next time. Be careful not to shame yourself, which brings on the “What the Hell” effect (once a dishonest act is committed the honest self-image is lowered, other dishonest acts tend to follow). Just simply promise to do better should the situation arises again.

5. Take feedback from others

You take feedback so that you can tweak and fine tune how you communicate your intentions to others. Most of us fail at conveying exactly what we want because we depend too much on words and we don't know how to calibrate our style according to others.

Use people's radar for insincerity as a mirror to judge your actions. Since we are all more adept at sensing dishonesty in others than in ourselves, we must use others' reactions to better effect.

When you take feedback however, you must take care not to stray from your original intention, whatever it may be. Feedback represents an opportunity to improve, not as a reflection of your self-worth. Most people will be projecting and rationalizing just as you are. Take deep feedback from the people you trust, since their intentions align with your attempt to be more honest.

6. Seek and cherish each "moment of truth" that all of us eventually encounter in life

We all must testify in front of others at some point. Testify, a word coming from the Greek origin of holding your own testicles as tokens of truth which can be taken away if you are proven to be lying, has strong implications to your honesty.

We all experience rejection and pain at some point in life. However, these moments shouldn’t be just avoided, but rather sought out. In these moments, we can only experience truth. In these moments, we will learn the most about ourselves down to the core.

Read More: The Wisdom Of Mao Tse Tung

Andrian Red
Andrian is a lifelong learner, devoted skeptic and ethical hedonist. He is the founder of www.thequintessentialman.com, the only online community that offers a holistic approach to masculine self-growth. He is also the creator of "30 Challenges-30 Days-Zero Excuses", a challenging project aimed to help men take back control of their life.

An Introduction To Stoicism With The Enchiridion By Epictetus

April 17, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

One of the main philosophers of Stoic philosophy was Epictetus, a Greek man born in Roman slavery around 55 AD. He eventually won his freedom in Rome and was able to study stoicism full time, but was banished alongside other philosophers by the emperor towards the end of his life. The Enchiridion is a summary version of a larger text by him called The Discourses.

The essence of Stoicism can be found in passage XLVIII:

1. "The condition and characteristic of [an instructed person] is this: he expects all advantage and all harm from [his mind and not from his environment]."

2. "He censures no man, he praises no man, he blames no man, he accuses no man, he says nothing about himself as if he were somebody or knew something;"

3. "…when he is impeded at all or hindered, he blames himself: if a man praises him, he ridicules the praiser to himself: if a man censures him, he makes no defense."

4. "…he removes all desire from himself, and he transfers aversion to those things only of the things within our power which are contrary to nature."

5. "…he employs a moderate movement toward everything."

6. "…whether he is considered foolish or ignorant, he cares not."

His principal teaching is that you choose how to interpret and think about events that happen to you; negative feelings are completely your choice and in the realm of pliable thought. He also teaches not to envy or be jealous of another man, since you have not paid the price that he has in the form of time, effort, work, flattery, and so on. For things that a man can achieve which you cannot, you will possess things that he does not have.

Some of his other important tenets:

You have control over your mind

> Disease is an impediment to the body, but not to the will, unless the will itself chooses. Lameness is an impediment to the leg, but not to the will.
>
> […]
>
> But you yourself will only wish to be a general or senator or consul, but a free man: and there is only one way to this, to despise (care not for) the things which are not in our power.
>
> […]
>
> Remember that it is not he who reviles you or strikes you, who insults you, but it is your opinion about these things as being insulting. When then a man irritates you, you must know that it is your own opinion which has irritated you.

Do not be overly desirous

> Remember that in life you ought to behave as at a banquet. Suppose that something is carried round and is opposite to you. Stretch out your hand and take a portion with decency. Suppose that is passes by you. Do not detain it. Suppose that it is not yet come to you. Do not send your desire forward to it, but wait till it is opposite to you. Do so with respect to children, so with respect to a wife, so with respect to magisterial offices, so with respect to wealth, and you will be some time a worthy partner of the banquets of the gods. But if you take none of the things which are set before you, and even despise them, then you will be not only a fellow-banqueter with the gods, but also a partner with them in power.

Resist lowly company

> Avoid banquets which are given by strangers and by ignorant persons. But if ever there is occasion to join in them, let your attention be carefully fixed, that you slip not into the manners of the vulgar (the uninstructed). For you must know, that if your companion be impure, he also who keeps company with him must be impure, though he should happen to be pure.

If you put yourself before someone who can reject you, bear it

> When you are going to any of those who are in great power, place before yourself that you will not find the man at home, that you will be excluded, that the door will not be opened to you, that the man will not care about you. And if with all this it is your duty to visit him, bear what happens, and never say to yourself that it was not worth the trouble. For this is silly, and marks the character of a man who is offended by externals.

Don’t hide things you’re embarrassed by

> When you have decided that a thing ought to be done and are doing it, never avoid being seen doing it, though the many shall form an unfavorable opinion about it. For if it is not right to do it, avoid doing the thing; but if it is right, why are you afraid of those who shall find fault wrongly?

You are not the sum of positive traits

> These reasonings do not cohere: I am richer than you, therefore I am better than you; I am more eloquent than you, therefore I am better than you. On the contrary these rather cohere, I am richer than you, therefore my possessions are greater than yours: I am more eloquent than you, therefore my speech is superior to yours. But you are neither possession nor speech.

Moderation

> Check (punish) your passions that you may not be punished by them.

Freedom can only exist in the mind

> For he who is loose (free) in the body, but bound in the soul is a slave: but on the contrary he who is bound in the body, but free (unbound) in the soul, is free.

Appreciate what you have instead of asking for more

> When we have been invited to a banquet, we take what is set before us: but if a guest should ask the host to set before him fish or sweet cakes, he would be considered to be an unreasonable fellow. But in the world we ask the Gods for what they do not give; and we do this through the things are many which they have given.
>
> […]
>
> It is not poverty which produces sorrow, but desire; nor does wealth release from fear, but reason (the power of reasoning). If then you acquire this power of reasoning, you will neither desire wealth nor complain of poverty.
>
> […]
>
> He is a wise man who does not grieve for the things which he has not, but > rejoices for those which he has.

>
> […]
>
> He who is dissatisfied with things present and what is given by fortune is an ignorant man in life: but he who bears them nobly and rationally and the things which proceed from them is worthy of being considered a good man.
>
> […]
>
> We should enjoy good fortune while we have it, like the fruits of autumn.

Bodily pleasures are fleeting

> In banquets remember that you entertain two guests, body and soul: and whatever you shall have given to the body you soon eject: but what you shall have given to the soul, you keep always.

Pleasures should come infrequently

> Of pleasures those which occur most rarely give the greatest delight.
>
> […]
>
> If a man should transgress moderation, the thing which give the greatest delight would become the things which give the least.
>
> […]
>
> Is it part of a wise man to resist pleasures, but of a foolish man to be a slave to them.
>
> […]
>
> Choose rather to punish your appetites than to be punished through them.

Don’t listen to the mob

> As a goose is not frightened by cackling nor a sheep by bleating, so let not the clamor of a senseless multitude alarm you.

Don’t listen to flatterers

> Crows devour the eyes of the dead, when the dead have no longer need of them. But flatterers destroy the souls of the living and blind their eyes.
>
> […]
>
> You ought to choose both physician and friend not the most agreeable, but the most useful.

Don’t seek attention or validation

> As the sun does not wait for prayers and incantations to be induced to rise, but immediately shines and is saluted by all: so do you also not wait for clapings of hands, and shouts and praise to be induced to do good, but be a doer of good > voluntarily, and you will be beloved as much as the sun.

Do not be upset by life's happenings

> He is unreasonable who is grieved (troubled) at the things which happen from the necessity of nature.

Stoicism is a formula for being happy as you are, but is that not also a formula, as stated through the above quotes, for not achieving and having low ambition? I believe not: it is more for understanding that achievement in isolation can not give your mind more than what it already has, and you should do things for the reason of doing them alone, guided through the pursuit of virtue and good instead of what worldly benefits you hope to attain.

I've seen this in my own life where raising my monetary income and increasing bodily pleasures provides only short-term happiness as I quickly adapt to the new benefits. Therefore a program of "raising" myself up seems somewhat fruitless in the end if fleeting comforts and pleasures were my only goals. What I must instead value is the knowledge and wisdom gained from the pursuit of those pleasures, not the pleasure themselves.

I've studied both Buddhism and stoicism, and have wondered in the past which I should choose as a sort of manual to life, but I can now see that they can complement each other. Buddhism will teach you about meditation and releasing yourself from desire while stoicism will give you more practical tools on approaching life and dealing with its inevitable problems. A combination of these two philosophies, I believe, seems to provide the most amount of answers for helping the modern man.

The Enchiridion is written in a obtuse style that you would expect from a 2,500 year old philosophical text, but it is short with many helpful quotes. It's well worth a read.

Read More: "Enchiridion" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Relativity Of Happiness

April 18, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> Everything is relative, including relativity. — Chris Matakas, #Human: Learning To Live In Modern Times

In 1905, Albert Einstein in his theory of special relativity determined that the laws of physics are the same for all non-accelerating observers, and he showed that the speed of light within a vacuum is the same no matter the speed at which an observer travels.

Similarly, the nature of human happiness (or the definition of it) is relative (as well as fleeting), as we are all unique individuals. One man's medicine can be another man's poison , even though on surface it may appear as beneficial for all. At the same time, no one would know your internal happiness, for they could only see your external mirth – even if you'd be unhappy within.

More importantly, even though we might share common interests and desires which in turn dictate as to what would make us happy, these things are also time-dependent. Additionally, Harry Browne in his best seller How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World explains well about the psychological nature of happiness as such:

> Happiness isn't a new car, fame, a good marriage, wealth, or a warm blanket.Those are things*. Happiness is what you feel inside of you as a result of the things that happen to you.

But the more you observe life and more importantly try to understand the nature of happiness closely, the equation of happiness affecting all reveals itself roughly as:

Happiness = balance x achievement ^{time}

where the factors of balance and achievement are different for every individual, which will further be explored below.

How balance determines happiness

Happiness can't be experienced without unhappiness, well-being isn't truly valued without discomfort, and pleasure doesn't exist without frustration. Nature itself reveals balance. Similarly, a balanced life is the state where an individual experiences happiness from the things he achieves, relative to his time dependent needs. Thus, "balance" is a primary influencing factor in human happiness. The meaning of this "balance" varies individually.

A man, who lacks sex and wealth in his life would feel their absence in his life at some point or the other – even if he might later psychologically train himself to adapt to that imbalance. On the other hand, a man saturated with earthly or sensual pleasures but no other activities to balance his life might eventually get jaded of these same pleasures which provided him happiness earlier. Familiarity breeds contempt, and so do may things or people over a period of time.

The influence of balance on happiness is seen through many examples in human history itself. People who lived sensual lives suddenly gave it all up to embrace a life of sobriety and spirituality to gain happiness, whereas others who'd had religious upbringing earlier descended into the depths of sensuality for certain periods much later in their lives.

How achievement determines happiness

Continuing from above, achievement (or receiving the things which we want and need) is a crucial factor determining happiness. As long as we don't achieve what we think would bring us happiness, we would still be trying to achieve those things to achieve "balance" (whether they might be power, money, sex, wealth, etc).

How time determines happiness

Change is one of the two certainties in life – and everything is in a state of constant flux due to the influence of time. Time influences everything in our lives – our interaction with others and our circumstances (past, present and future), our thinking and desires, and more importantly our happiness, which I mentioned earlier here:

> Happiness can be described as the feeling of contentment we derive from successfully achieving or doing the things we want—at the right time, that is. But the right thing done or gotten at the wrong time often becomes the wrong thing.
>
> The foodie will find no happiness with food at a time when he desperately wants to crap. The lover of women will find no happiness with women at a time when he is besieged with other problems. The worshipper of wealth will find no happiness in wealth at a time when he cannot spend that very wealth to obtain what he wants.Thus, time is the (often cruel) master of our happiness, working secretly in the background. It can delay our personal successes, while prolonging periods of personal failure beyond our control and in spite of our best efforts.

Since time dictates the state of balance and achievement in our lives, it thus determines the relativity of our happiness directly. What you wanted in the past is not what you'll want tomorrow. Thus it becomes extremely important to project the value of a commodity or a person in the future in order to gauge their real potential in creating long term happiness for us, as everything in life is subject to the flux induced by time.

Conclusion

Since happiness is relative, it becomes extremely important to define it. Every man's definition of happiness is unique—but what must be realized is that it shouldn't come at the expense of a man's identity and freedom, which unfortunately is increasingly common in today's world.

Our societies puts emphasis on wealth, sex, or popularity as the most important factors which would constitute our lasting happiness, but what is forgotten is that though these things might contribute to our "happiness" at a particular phase in our lives, it won't for everyone and forever – due to the relativity of happiness.

As our personalities change over the years with time, so do our tastes and the "things" which would make us happy. The wise man is the one who understands and realizes the illusionary as well as relative nature of happiness, and learns emotional detachment to superficial pleasures—even while enjoying them.

Read Next: The Argument Against Chasing Happiness

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

We Conducted "Operation Rape Payment" Against The Rolling Stone Fabricators

April 18, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When Columbia University issued a report recently confirming that Rolling Stone magazine published a completely false gang rape event at the University Of Virginia, I breathed a sigh of relief that accountability would finally take place and those involved with the story would be punished. That never happened. While there were a few stern words from a handful of media outlets, everyone involved with the story got to keep their jobs. Instead of wallow in anger, I gathered the ROK staff together to publish a series of stories as part of Operation Rape Payment.

Operation Rape Payment was meant to serve a slap of punishment to those involved in pushing the rape hoax, as much pain as we could exert from our humble platform.

Here are the nine articles that we published:

- Why Haven't The People Who Pushed Rolling Stone's UVA Rape Hoax Story Been Fired?
- How UVA President Teresa Sullivan Sold Out The Heritage Of Virginia
- The Guardian Is Enabling Jessica Valenti's Descent Into Clinical Madness
- Elisabeth Garber-Paul Is The Fact Checker Who Green-Lighted The Biggest Media Hoax Of The Decade
- Did AP Writer Geoff Mulvihill Lie By Omission In Defending Philadelphia Colleague Sabrina Erdely?
- Is Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig Single-Handedly Destroying The New Republic?
- 9 People In The Media Who Are Upset Jackie Coakley Wasn't Raped By White Men
- Rolling Stone Editor Sean Woods Allows His Far Left Beliefs To Get In The Way Of Facts
- Rolling Stone Is One Of The Biggest Promoters Of Women As Sex Objects

We covered more individuals involved in the hoax than—as far as I'm aware—any mainstream media organization. In spite of our efforts, our reporting did not get picked up by any large source. Wouldn't that indicate failure of our operation?

As I've written before, there are various ways to punish the media elite. One is to taint their pristine Google results by publicly broadcasting their lack of integrity and radical left agenda. If you measure our efforts based on page views alone, we can't claim success, but let's head to Google and see what comes up when searching for the names of those we wrote about. Our goal was to put the truth on the first page of their Google results.

"Teresa Sullivan"

Result number 25.

"Jessica Valenti Guardian"

Result number 12.

A search for “Jessica Valenti” returns the article at position number 25.

“Elisabeth Garber-Paul”

Result number 4.

“Geoff Mulvihill”

Result number 7.

“Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig”

Result number 10.

“Sean Woods Rolling Stones”

There are other famous “Sean Woods” so I added “Rolling Stone,” an addition that any future employer or Tinder match would also enter.

Result number 7.

Because of our efforts, four individuals who were instrumental in creating or white-washing the hoax now have to permanently account for their misdeeds to the public. While it's very likely that that public does not at all care about the hoax that was sold to them as truth, our operation was the moral thing to do, no matter the impact it would serve.

In the long run, the operation may have been futile, because even if we were to completely destroy the career prospects of the above individuals, there would be hundreds more begging to take their place (and for lesser pay), but every night before I go to bed, along with other ROK writers and commenters, we must do so knowing that we did the best we could to help our family, our friends, our tribe, and our society. If we see fraud, we must yell fraud, even if it will fall on deaf ears, and even if there is a personal cost to us with no guarantee that we'll succeed.

While trying to fight back against the tidal wave of Western immorality and degeneracy seems hopeless at times, we're in this for the long run. Have patience, dear reader, for our victories can only grow in size.

Read Next: Two Powerful Tactics For Winning The Culture War

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Key To Facing Your Fears Confidently

April 19, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

In life there are situations that cause you to “flinch.”

Someone throws a punch at you. A girl “shit-tests” you. Your boss disrespects you in front of your team.

These “flinch” moments are true tests of your character and confidence. Your reaction in these moments is crucial.

Do you give into your underlying fears, flinch, and flee from the conflict or breakdown and lose control? Or do you stay cool, maintain focus, and react calmly in accordance to your own self-interests and personal values.

Over the past few years I’ve been training in Muay Thai, and I’ve come to see the “flinch” reaction people experience when someone throws a punch towards their face as a metaphor to the “flinch” reactions people have to other stressful situations in life.

Whether it’s approaching a girl, entering a job interview, or confronting a friend—uncomfortable moments like these are a necessary evil. If you don’t learn to face the situation head-on, avoid flinching, and carrying out your business life will be a stressful mess. In this article I’ll review the causes of the “flinch” and why it’s so important to master in your own life.

The “flinch” is natural

Oh shit! Hot girl… what do you do?

When someone throws a punch at your face, your natural instinct is to close your eyes, look away, and throw your hands up. This is a mechanism that is working to protect you…

But does it really protect you?

The answer is of course no. When people do this they basically freeze and open themselves up to being repeatedly pummeled in the face. The proper reaction would be to cover up your face, move away from the punch, and then run or attack your opponent.

The same goes for stressful social situations. When you see an attractive girl you want to talk to, your natural reaction is to "flinch" and then freeze, thinking about all the things that could go wrong before just giving in and letting the opportunity pass by. This is also a natural reaction—your nervous system is giving into the fear of rejection and social embarrassment.

Again, this is obviously not the proper reaction, assuming you actually want to meet her of course.

The "flinch" must be un-trained

It takes time and effort to “unlearn” your natural reaction

As I covered above the proper reaction to being punched is not your natural reaction. And so a big part of training to fight, in addition to learning the appropriate reaction, is taking the time to decondition the natural response.

This happens over time through sparring. After enough punches have been thrown your way, and you’ve deliberately pushed to avoid flinching, you’ll eventually reach a point where you can control that instinctive reaction.

The same goes for other stressful situations. Once you’ve forced yourself to approach a large number of women, for example, you’ll no longer flinch when a cutie strolls by you in the supermarket. Sure, you’re going to let a lot of opportunities pass you along the way, because of the flinch reaction—that’s inevitable.

But you’ll slowly un-train your fearful response until you’re able proceed without hesitation, approach her confidently, and ask her out.

Your reaction to these “flinch” moments defines you

Fight or flight? Or neither?

Because these “flinch” reactions are natural, and we must all take the time to desensitize ourselves to their stranglehold, how you react in these situations says a lot about where you are in life.

Just because you “flinch” and get your ass beat in a fight or pussy out of making the approach doesn’t mean you’re a worthless pussy. It simply means you haven’t taken the time to detrain the flinch and face the music.

And when you see a man who’s able to control himself when the shit hits the fan, it’s key to recognize that he’s likely experienced enough similar situations in the past to the point where he can control his reaction and proceed with logic and purpose.

Repetition is the fastest route to confidence. Find a quick way to face any fear that’s holding you back – then do it over and over again. This is a key part of developing as a man. Start sparring in a martial art. Start approaching 5 girls a day. This is the fastest way to become courageous and overcome the “flinch.”

Read More: How To Free Yourself From The Need For Women

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

5 Of The Best Horror Short Stories By Stephen King

April 19, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Stephen King is one of the greatest writers of his generation—not necessarily because of his scintillating prose, but because of his masterful ability to tell a story. While he is primarily known for his novels, Stephen King's best work might be done in the form of the short story. While he has more than a few collections of short stories published, his best horror short stories were in his first few publications released. Here are five of his best:

The Mist

From his collection Skeleton Crew. This counts more as a novella, as it really is too long to be considered a short story, but it is included in this short story collection. The story centers around a man and his son, who live next to a lake in a small town in Maine. After a particularly nasty thunderstorm, the two notice a curious mist hanging over the lake. As they leave for town to collect supplies to repair their home, they find themselves trapped in a grocery store as the mist has spread to the town and seemingly swallowed up those who venture into it.

The story ambles through the conflicts of those trapped in the store, the rapidly depleting food supplies, and the monsters that lurk in the mist. As wonderful and macabre as the story is, the story has an abrupt and dissatisfying ending. Despite the careful balancing of narrative and horror, the ending of the story can leave a bitter taste in the mouth of a reader. King himself admits in the preface that he—despite being a master storyteller—was unable to bring the conflict to a satisfying conclusion.

The ending notwithstanding, the story is an excellent example of what King is best at:

taking a simple idea—a group of people trapped in a grocery store surrounded by monsters—and turning it into a horrifying narrative.

Quitters, Inc.

From his collection Night Shift. This short story is about a man who meets an old friend who has quit smoking and "looks great." The man—a smoker himself—wonders how his friend quit such an aggravating addiction like smoking. His friend credits a company called "Quitters, Inc." and hands him the business card. The man eventually follows up with the company and learns they can help you quit smoking, but at a terrible price.

This short story is effective because unlike many of King's stories, the premise does not rely on any supernatural elements. The company "Quitters, Inc." is a completely plausible company that might exist—although extremely far-fetched. This story relies on our own fear of commonplace addictions like smoking and the toll it takes on our loved ones around us.

Crouch End

From his collection Nightmares & Dreamscapes. This story begins with a distraught woman coming into a police station at 2 AM on a sleepy, quiet side of town. She recounts to the officers her terrifying night, claiming she lost her husband on a street entitled Crouch End. After the woman departs, the officers decide to check the street out for themselves. The story ends after the officers realize too late that the woman was not lying about Crouch End.

This story—told mostly in a flashback—is thoroughly creepy and tense. As to be expected with a short story by King, the story is taut with no extraneous details mucking up the story's arc. The story wraps up nicely, as the officers themselves confront the same terror the woman did in her flashback.

Gray Matter

Another from his collection Night Shift. The story is very brief and involves a group of men drinking at the local bar on a blustery winter night. The young son of a local man bursts in, claiming his father has transformed into something terrible at their house. After listening to the impassioned pleas of the young boy describing his father's slow transformation at the hands of alcohol, the men the travel to the house. The story ends as the men finally confront what the boy's father has become.

This very brief story is simple and highly effective. It takes the simple concept of how alcohol abuse changes a person and puts a horrific spin on it. Like the above mentioned "Crouch End," King demonstrates how flashbacks and the like are effective tools to scare readers, as it allows the reader's imagination to fill the gaps in the characters' retelling of a story.

Chattery Teeth

From his collection Nightmares & Dreamscapes. This story involves a beleaguered man traveling across the desert in Nevada. He chances upon a gas station during a sandstorm and while fueling up, finds a big set of wind-up teeth. He purchases the trinket for his son and makes the ill-fated decision to give a lift to a hitchhiker before resuming his jaunt across the desert.

"Chattery Teeth" is a bit longer than most of his short stories, but extremely well-done and executed flawlessly. The premise of a hitchhiker-cum-bloodthirsty rogue is nothing fresh, but the introduction of the wind-up walking teeth certainly is a new and strangely terrifying spin on the old saw. Unlike some of his other short stories, this one has a clear beginning and end, with the protagonist chancing upon the same gas station a year later at the end.

Read More: 4 Under-appreciated Horror Movies

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

5 Reasons Why Black Men Don’t Study Game

April 19, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

“The Game is to be sold, not told.”

-Iceberg Slim

For roughly the past six years or so, I’ve been heavily studying game, or what some would refer to as pickup—the formatted study of how to “pull” women. Though I never set out to be an authority or expert on the matter, my humble missives on it have appeared in a number of places online. Like Jigga said and Cassidy reiterated, ask about me.

Part of my studies involved being part of a “lair”—a real-world location where men gather to share pickup tips, invite speakers in, and even practice on “Hired Guns”—hot women who can monetize their looks, such as strippers, barmaids, gals working at high-end mens’ shops, Instagram urban models, and the like.

Often I would be among a very few black men in attendance, the vast majority being white or Asian. Even among the small number of brothers in attendance, I was the only one who was interested in black women. It’s been my direct and indirect experience, that those brothers who do study game and pickup diligently tend to go for Beckys, Mai-Lins, and Marisols. I’m just saying.

Along with the existence of a true “Band of Brothers” vibe among the white guys who study game and pickup—they really do care about each other and want each other to succeed in getting women—I just had to ask: why don’t black men do it?

1. Because the game is to be told, not sold

Game, like many other things of great cultural relevance in American society, actually got its start among the lower classes of black American life. Perhaps the earliest accounts of game being dispensed and discussed in written form is Iceberg Slim's "Pimp: The Story of My Life" that came out roughly a half a century ago, and is a memoir from Slim's days as a pimp and hustler in 1930s-era Chicago.

Game was a way to manage a pimp's stable of ladies, and the competition for them among pimps was stiff—hence the term above. As a result of that ethos spilling over into "square" life, black men as a group are reluctant to give actionable intel to other black men about picking up women.

2. Big man culture

Another reason has to do with the cultural practice of Big Manism, something that is very evident in Africa, Dominican Republic, Brazil, and other heavily black locales. What is Big Manism? It's when a brother is, or has become, for lack of a better way of putting it, a "big man on campus type"—and as result, he not only has his run of the ladies available, but he has a surplus of them to boot. Given that this is the case, it's understandable that they have little incentive to spread the wealth.

3. Black men don't feel that game is worth it

If you spend any time in pickup forums, a lot of emphasis is put on the upper-tier white and Asian women. The subtitle to the pickup classic The Mystery Method is "How To Get Beautiful Women In Bed." I've personally witnessed white and Asian guys pay small fortunes to learn from the masters how to get 'er done with chicks that look they jumped off the cover of Maxim or the Victoria's Secret runway.

Let's be frank, gals of that caliber are few and far between in black American life; brothers ain't gonna spend $3K USD (or more) for a weekend "bootcamp" just so they can holla at what's on offer among American black women.

4. Anti-intellectualism and anti-counseling culture

One of the first things you immediately learn by hanging out in predominantly white and Asian pickup circles is that these dudes are generally pretty smart—they don't call them nerds for nothing—and their approach is very IQ-intensive. Flowcharts, grids and graphs, studies, and academic rigor is the order of the day in these subcultures. Brothers simply don't approach life that way.

Part of that has to do with straight up anti-intellectualism that is unfortunately frequently the case in black America, but part of that stems from the fact that being a nerd simply don't have the same cultural pull or force in black American life as it does in white and Asian American cultural life. Sistas ain't into nerds like that, bottom line. Furthermore, game forces a great deal of introspection, and black folks in general don't do the counseling thing; most of us typically consider that something for white folks and uppity "bougie" blacks.

5. Pride and shame

Pride and shame are big motivators in black culture. In order to address a problem, you have to admit that you have one in the first place, and because of the Mandingo Myth, every brother is under incredible pressure to give everyone the impression that they are what Nas' baby mama Carmen Bryan referred to as a "sexual warrior." Simply put, white and Asian guys have the cultural space to come forward and admit that they need help in these areas that black men, on a whole, simply don't.

In summation

You have no idea how many brothers I have talked to "on the down low" who come to me and express a desire to learn more about game. They do not want to be publicly identified. Think about that for a moment.

The reason why I'm passionate about this issue is multifaceted; part of it has to do with the fact that there are a lot of brothers who really do need help in one of the most important areas of their lives, and there is no interest or desire culturally to assist them. This goes on to fuel the current "Where are the good Black men?" trope that so many black women complain about.

There's no silver bullet here, but I am convinced that if more brothers actually knew how to go about being social and getting the ladies, some of the tensions in black American life would be eased. And I'm committed to doing my part to get the word out

Read More: The Pros And Cons Of Game For Black Men In The West

Mumia Ali
Mumia Ali, aka "Obsidian" is a Men's Issues blogger from Philadelphia who focuses on Sexual Politics, Class, and Race, from the male perspective. He is a cofounder of the Men's Issues blog collective known as Just Four Guys, is Editor of Urban American Affairs for A Voice for Men and a contributor to Return of Kings. Connect with him on Twitter @ObsidianFiles, Facebook under Mumia Ali and email:

6 Reasons Why You Shouldn’t Date Teachers

April 20, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

There was a time when being a teacher was considered an ideal profession for a woman who wanted to marry and have children. Teachers got the summers off so that a woman who was a teacher could still take care of her children when they were out of school.

Teaching was also an alternative to the cutthroat corporate world where a woman could have a meaningful job but still remain feminine. The archetype of the wholesome young teacher dominated the American consciousness for decades.

Dating a girl who was a teacher used to be a good bet for a man. Her job didn’t require long hours in the office and teachers didn’t have to go on business travel, which always opens the door for cheating. But thanks to a combination of government interference and changes in the wider culture, this one-time bastion for traditionally-minded women has fallen.

1. Widespread Sluttiness

Sodom and Gomorrah

Modern education is one big Sodom and Gomorrah. I used to date a teacher so I got to attend lots of parties with her coworkers. What surprised me was the number of teachers who had been married two or three times.

The stories were all very similar. A female teacher gets married, but then cheats on her husband with a male teacher. She ends up marrying the man she cheated with, only to later cheat on him with yet another teacher.

I think the reason for the widespread cheating is that there are a lot fewer men in education than there are women, especially in the lower grades. In education, even a low-ranking beta male can be considered the “alpha” simply because he has no rivals.

Women are naturally competitive with each other, and because a male teacher is such a rare commodity, female teachers who would not otherwise be attracted to him find themselves competing for his affections.

2. Teachers Are Unhappy

In 2001, President Bush signed the bipartisan initiative called the No Child Left Behind Act. The goal of the act was to close the academic achievement gap between majority white students and minority black and Hispanic students. The Act required states to test students at various grade levels in order to receive federal funding.

In theory, No Child Left Behind is a great idea, but in a country filled with social justice warriors, it just doesn't work. The problem is that the act requires that all children be proficient at reading and math for their grade level. But this is saying, in effect, that all children must be above average—an unattainable goal.

Soon after it was implemented, it became clear that No Child Left Behind was not closing the achievement gap. In response, schools applied pressure on teachers to focus their efforts on raising the scores of minority students. The pressure has become so great that some educators have even been convicted of conspiracy of cheating to boost students' test scores.

No Child Left Behind changed the way that teachers teach. Teaching has become a lot less fun because teachers have less flexibility in their curriculum. They have to teach to the test so that low-achieving students will score well, but this has the effect of slowing down average students who are capable of learning more than what is on the test.

It also dramatically increased the amount of "cover your ass" paperwork that teachers have to do. Now, instead of being an 8-hour a day job, teaching has become a long hours gig just like any corporate job, but without the monetary rewards.

By focusing on social justice instead of education, meddling politicians have changed teaching from a relaxed, happy profession to a miserable one. This has lead to teachers becoming cynical and unhappy—exactly the type of person you want to avoid when you are considering a long-term relationship.

3. Teachers Are Heavy Drinkers

TEACHFORAMERICA

Maybe it is because their jobs have become more stressful, but a lot of teachers are big drinkers. They really love going to happy hour where they can drink to relax while they complain about their jobs or hook up with that “alpha” male teacher. Or they just go home and finish off a bottle of wine every night.

Recently, it has become more common for educators to not even wait until the school day is over before they start hitting the bottle. Last year, an Oklahoma high school teacher was found pantless, shoeless, and allegedly drunk in an empty classroom on the first day of school.

In March of this year, an Iowa teacher was arrested for being drunk while teaching her sixth grade class. The arrest happened the same day that a police officer was visiting the school to teach students to avoid drugs and alcohol as part of the DARE program.

These are not isolated incidents. If you follow your local newspaper, you’ll see that drunk teachers are a pretty regular occurrence. I am not against drinking, but some of these women are functional alcoholics that you should stay away from.

4. Teachers Are Progressives

Public schools are completely under the sway of progressive philosophy. All teachers are compelled to regularly attend “equity training sessions.” These are seminars where educators are forced to discuss the benefits of diversity and the ever-present dangers of racism.

Teachers are berated for “believing they are color blind,” and they are encouraged to see the richness of other cultures in contrast to our own.

As a result of this indoctrination, teachers really start to believe that Western culture is nothing in comparison to third world cultures. At one of the parties I attended, I had the following conversation with a veteran teacher about a recent “International Day” that the school had hosted:

> Teacher: I saw all these parents from India and Africa, and they have such a rich culture. I feel bad that I don’t have anything to pass on to my kids.
>
> Me: You’re an American. Don’t we have a culture?
>
> Teacher: Not really. I guess we have Thanksgiving.
>
> Me: What part of Europe did your family come from?
>
> Teacher: Germany.
>
> Me: Don’t Germans have a culture?
>
> Teacher: They do. But it’s not the same.

It was pretty much the same with my girlfriend. She could see that the social engineering wasn’t working, but she defended it anyway.

5. Terrible Fashion

Classy and professional. And that is why most teachers do not dress this way.

Teachers are not fashion models, so nobody expects them to come to work in the latest Oscar de la Renta suit, but we would expect them to at least dress in a professional manner.

For example, in this photo from 1960, we see the female faculty members are wearing dignified dresses or skirts. The male teachers are in suit and tie.

Compare this to how modern day teachers dress to go to work. Unfortunately, most teachers continue to wear this kind of bland, frumpy style even when they leave work, making them some of the dowdiest people you will ever run across.

Nothing says “respect me” like these sandals

6. Emotional Issues

Because it is difficult to fire a teacher, they get away with outrageous behavior that would not fly in any other professional environment. Female teachers engage in childish fighting within grade levels—hiding lesson plans and sabotaging equipment at taxpayer expense.

They regularly have breakdowns at work for trifling reasons. One teacher at my former girlfriend’s school spent the better part of a school year crying because her husband was divorcing her after she had cheated on him.

Recently, a darker trend is starting to emerge: female teachers are raping their underage male students.

When I first started researching this article, I thought there were only a handful of examples of female teachers preying on boys. I was wrong. This is a genuine, disturbing cultural phenomenon. I am only providing three examples here. I could find dozens more.

Accused of having sex with six boys between the ages of 14 and 15.

These two teachers were accused of having a threesome with a 16 year old boy.

Gym teacher charged with 30 counts of statutory rape.

I think the blame for this epidemic can be placed on our culture of perpetual adolescence. These women obviously suffer from a stunted emotional development that leaves them thinking that they are forever in high school, or in the case of some of them, middle school.

This can’t bode well for our civilization.

Conclusion

Of course, not all teachers are slutty, progressive, emotionally stunted, frumpy drunks. But enough of them are that you should be careful if you choose to date one.

Read More: 7 Reasons Why You Shouldn’t Date A Model

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Spring Break Is A Slutty American Pastime For All Ages

April 20, 2015 | by Antoine Roquentin | Link | Original Link

Like many other males in their 20s who live in the frigid latitudes of the United States, the long and harsh winter months have many of us often planning well in advance for a sunny escape.

Since my particular line of work happens to coincide with many college spring break schedules, I am privy to witness the debaucherous behavior of the revelers in all of its alcohol-induced glamour. This year, I decided to switch up my usual spot in the Sunshine State for the white sand beaches of Mexico.

While many of you may consider such travel arrangements a golden ticket to loose college girls farther than the eye can see, that was not at all the reality of the situation on the ground. Instead, the town where I had naively conceived as popular enough yet infinitely tamer than Cancun was overrun by high school-aged girls from stateside.

The Good

She definitely is now “well-traveled” and knows how Mexicans really live.

Now, it would be easy to go on via countless anecdotes about the behavior that occurred right in front of me, but I would rather tell you the best display of sluttiness that was the most disconcerting.

On the last evening of the trip, I strolled down the infamous Quinta Avenida (even though it shares the name of Fifth Avenue, rest assured that it’s a tad less classy), which houses most of the nightclubs and late night bars in addition to street vendors hounding you to live up to their high expectations of frivolous, American consumers.

As those of us on ROK know, a girl who claims to be well-traveled actually spends the vast majority of her vacation hooking up with as many dudes as possible. Nevertheless, as the tale goes, the Easter holiday took place that very same day, and I happened to still have a few hundred pesos that I preferred to use instead of being monetarily raped by exchanging them back to dollars.

Strolling down the street around midnight with the humid air of the Caribbean accentuating the party ambiance at every turn, one of the city’s major clubs was swarmed with voluptuous, young partiers waiting in line to enter.

Equipped with mini-skirts and shorts barely below their crotches, I thought that I had the luck of a leprechaun who had found his pot of gold in the forum of sexily bronzed, busty bodies. Sure enough, I told myself, it would only be a matter of time before moseying on my way to getting a college flag.

March Madness paled in comparison to the bounce that was playing out right before my eyes and the eventual slam dunk that seemed all but certain.

“Where did you all get those cards and bracelets? I noticed they’re not charging your group cover,” I inquired to get into a social mood and pry for other information pertaining to their whereabouts.

“Oh! Well, our whole group got them at the hotel in advance!”

My initial reaction: Jesus Christ—whose own celebration was, at best, on the back burner of these girls’ minds—they must be really down to party if they’re that organized.

A mere few minutes later, I joined the caravan on the rooftop terrace and gawked at the spectacle. Scantily clad bodies were fist pumping with one hand and downing a cocktail from a neon plastic cup in the other with others dancing on a platform for all to see.

I began to wonder if this is how a scene from the original Girls Gone Wild from the 90's would have been filmed if it weren't for the simplicity of now finding similar porn on the internet at the click of a button. Alas, into the grinding, ass-romping mosh pit I went to take in the moment.

The Bad

Then, something freaked me out. On the entire outer perimeter of the dance floor was a group of middle-aged adults staring, scowling, and seething with contempt yet standing aimlessly. I kept trying to put two and two together but could not come up with a logical answer to appease my curiosity.

After sitting down next one of the lurkers in his mid 40's or so, the elderly chat came out in full force so I could get to the bottom of this mayhem.

"Beautiful night tonight isn't it?"

"Yeah. Nice change from back home," he said in a soft voice.

"Where's back home at?"

"In Michigan," the responses became short and ripe with discomfort.

"So, you must be with that large group, I take it? It must be a group trip of some sort?"

"It's their school trip."

"Oh…so you…are all teachers?"

"Parents. It's their senior trip"

"Is this how everyone celebrates Easter in Michigan?" I couldn't resist, and what made it even better was just how much he didn't appreciate the comment.

My expectations of Michigan being "pure" did not live up to the commercial.

The Ugly

A whirlwind of thoughts invaded my mind: This is your child's parentally chaperoned senior trip? Not in Rome to visit the former stomping grounds of heroic gladiators at the Coliseum? Not in France to appreciate the immensely talented artists and sculptors of the Louvre?

It all came crashing down in one swoop. These girls, who had rightfully made themselves the objects of all the men's objectifying, were most likely barely 18 years old with some probably even younger. All of their licentious behavior was being casually condoned by their parents, who idly stood there as onlookers to a circus.

What father would be proud of a daughter like this?

Although I am not a father, my paternal instincts emerged in a way never previously experienced. What kind of man would allow his teenage daughter to act that way in public? Where is the responsibility in raising her to be lady-like?

And to top it all off, why would you plan in advance to go to one of the busiest nightclubs in the city as a parent with your kid? Furthermore, why would you even pick such a place as a senior trip destination in the first place?

All I know is that I don't think there were busy taking tours of Mayan ruins or enrolling in Spanish language immersion courses during the day. After bearing witness to this level of decadence—and not to mention the select few who eventually needed help walking out of the place—I'm not really sure, in matters of cultural decline, which way is down from here.

Read More: A Sea Battle For The Ages

Antoine Roquentin
Antoine Roquentin is an absurdist and polyglot who believes that it's a Sisyphean task to attempt to reverse cultural decline. Instead, he indulges in travel abroad, learning foreign languages, and only the company of women that bring meaning to his existence. He is currently planning a new life as a self-made man running his own business.

The Redemption Of Robert Downey Jr.

April 20, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In the 1987 film Less Than Zero (loosely based on the Bret Ellis novel of the same name), Robert Downey Jr. played a character that was alternately pathetic and contemptible: a young drug addict whose life had spiraled out of control, who was forced into extreme acts of degradation, and who was headed nowhere but the city morgue. It was a lurid 1980s melodrama, but one that contained the seeds of prophecy.

The young acting prodigy, mid-1980s.

As the 1980s rolled into the next decade, Downey's own life began to resemble a real life version of Less Than Zero. He had long flirted with drugs (perhaps the product of his bohemian upbringing by his Greenwich Village parents), but his addiction began to consume him. His family had moved from New York to California in the late 1970s, but Downey dropped out of high school and moved back to New York to study acting.

He landed a few roles here and there, sustained by his natural ability, and became a familiar young screen presence by the mid-1980s. By general consent, he was one of the most promising acting talents of the 1980s. He always brought a freshness and likeability to his roles, and even mediocre films (e.g., 1987's True Believer) benefited from his charismatic mix of innocence and mischief.

Without doubt, Downey had immense talent. One has only to see his 1992 film Chaplin to be awed by his incredible gift for improvised mimicry; even a ponderous bore like Two Girls And A Guy (1997) somehow seems to be worth watching just to see Downey chatter away.

But talent is not enough, and by the early 1990s, things started to go seriously downhill. A mix of professional setbacks and addiction problems overwhelmed his fortunes. The commercial failure of his 1990 film Air America was a hard blow, and a fast marriage (after knowing his bride for only 42 days) to Deborah Falconer did little to abate his seething demons.

Rock bottom

By the mid-1990s, Downey was a full-blown drug addict. His stints in and out of LA County Jail became legendary, with a predictable cycle of probation violations, remands to custody, and contrite apologies to judges.

Downey's drug addiction nearly destroyed him

He seemed like a cautionary tale for misspent youth and squandered talent. Nearly everyone, it seemed, expected to see his name the obituary section of the LA Times sooner rather than later.

In 1999, he was sentenced to three years in a state-run addiction facility; released soon after, he became a cast member to the TV show Ally McBeal, where he was nominated for a Golden Globe award. Despite his personal problems, no one doubted his talents.

Yet he relapsed into drug abuse and was fired from the show. By this time, he was considered such a risk that few producers would touch him; his personal finances edged ever closer to bankruptcy.

Redemption?

But despite all of the drama and the antics, there was just something endearing about Downey. He was likeable. Perhaps this is one of the secrets of his redemption. Even in his darkest days in the early 2000s, no one (as far as this writer is aware) ever uttered a word of malice against him, or wished evil on him.

What other actor, for example, could have pulled off a role using blackface, as he did in Tropic Thunder (2008), without a word of criticism from the press?

Slowly, things began to get better for him after 2003. Mel Gibson gave him a chance when few others would, when he cast Downey in his 2003 film The Singing Detective. Gibson had to underwrite Downey's insurance personally for this role, as no agency was willing to touch him at the time.

A marriage to Susan Levin followed in 2005, and in that year he began a serious addiction treatment program. It worked. Perhaps there just comes a time, in the words of Motley Crue bassist Nikki Sixx, when "you just get tired of being sick and tired." He credits his wife's influence with being a major factor in his recovery.

It would also be difficult to overemphasize the role of Downey's martial arts training in speeding his recovery. Around 2004-2005, he discovered Wing Chun kung fu, and found that it offered a form of "high" that he could get naturally; he took to it with a passion that dwarfed nearly all his other interests.

His kung fu workouts are intense and demanding, and are an integral part of his life now. At fifty years old, he looks at least ten years younger than his age.

But further glory was shortly to come. In 2008 he landed the role to the film Iron Man, and the rest, as they say, was history. The film was a smash hit, and the perfect vehicle for Downey's mix of genial humor, physicality, and flawed humanity.

Several Iron Man sequels have cemented his place at the top of Hollywood's A list. He also took on a memorable series of roles in the "Sherlock Holmes" films of British director Guy Ritchie. It was an incredible transformation, nearly miraculous in scope and execution.

He has signed the first $100 million dollar movie contract in history, and his know to be a hard bargainer for his roles. Clearly, Downey knows his worth and is not afraid to stand up for himself.

Lessons for all of us

It is an incredibly inspiring story. How did Downey do it? It was a mixture of natural talent, good fortune (Mel Gibson taking a chance on him, his discovery of kung fu, his decision finally to quit drugs, and his landing the right roles), and his own innate likability.

He has a charismatic intensity that few other actors have. The same inner intensity that enabled his addictions was, paradoxically, the source of his redemption. The Downey story teaches us that it is never too late to change, and that if the will is there, good things will eventually happen.

He has come a long way since his rock-bottom days in LA County Jail, fighting for his survival. "I would never tell you," he told one interviewer, "the worst things that have happened to me [in jail]."

Read More: The Mystery Of Human Destiny

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

What I Learned About Human Nature From One Year Of Gun Dog Training

April 20, 2015 | by Klaus Bitter | Link | Original Link

One year ago I purchased a German Wirehaired Pointer (GWP) puppy with the goal to train him to hunt birds. My family had a Dalmatian when I was kid, but I never trained it (nor did my family for that matter). Essentially, this was to my first dog.

In one year, I have learned a tremendous amount about dog training and a little bit about myself. My pup is now performing heel, whoa, down, and recall with the best of one-year-olds. He has just been introduced to live birds and an e-collar. He is well on his way to being a great hunting companion. I hope the following will help those who have a dog or might be thinking about getting one.

If you have never owned a dog, be prepared for it to take over your life. A dog is an eight to twelve year project. Training never stops. You will be stressed, challenged, and feel like a fool. In return you will feel immense pride and experience unconditional love and loyalty. Also, let’s be honest, using one animal to hunt another animal oozes pure masculinity.

Choosing a dog

A versatile hunting dog. Fear the beard!

The first step in training a hunting dog is choosing a breed. I prefer upland hunting to duck hunting so that required a dog who points as well as retrieves. I chose a GWP primarily due to cost and availability, as there was a breeder within driving distance. I wanted to actually meet the breeder and know what I was getting.

The GWP is a "'versatile hunting dog" as defined by the North American Versatile Hunting Dog Association. A versatile dog is a "dog that is bred and trained to dependably hunt and point game, to retrieve on both land and water, and to track wounded game on both land and water."

You can't discuss choosing a dog without addressing the nature-nurture debate. Is a $3,000 Italian Spinone Italiano from a line of test champions going to hunt better than an $800 dog with no lineage? Having observed other dogs in basic obedience courses and my current group hunting OB class, most of whom have the lineage and price tag, I'd argue it doesn't. A high end dog may have a genetic advantage that may show after the dog is at a high level of training, but basic obedience up to most basic hunting skills, e.g. whoa, heel and fetch, is all about the trainer.

A dog is a major commitment

You must work with your dog every day. No excuses.

A puppy requires a lot of time. The standard rule is that a puppy has to go potty every number of hours as his age in month. So an eight-week puppy (the standard age for taking a pup home) has to be let out every two hours, even at night. Thankfully, I had a job where I could keep him in my truck and let him out every few hours. Still, the first two weeks with my dog I was so stressed and tired that I had lost my appetite.

Four to twelve (some say sixteen) weeks are very important in a puppy's development. This is their "socialization period." Up to eight weeks should be spent with the litter, where they learn play biting and other pack socialization skills. After that, the more time you spend with the dog in this time and introduce him to other dogs the better.

Around the time I got my pup, I got a new job offer and was able to take six weeks of "fun-employment." Thus, in those critical weeks, I was there almost 24/7 playing and working on obedience. I feel that having built that a foundation of trust and obedience has served me well now that I am teaching him more complex commands.

Misbehaved dogs are the result of unpreparedness, laziness, and insecurity. Unpreparedness and laziness is the easiest to solve. Read and watch everything you can. I study training books and DVDs daily. I joined local hunting dog chapters, built a training table and training aids, and started following internet forums.

I have even watched every Cesar Millan episode available on Netflix. All dogs are different and there is no right way to train. It's your duty and responsibility as an owner to analyze your dog and adjust your methods accordingly. Do not expect a dog to magically behave. Any well-trained dog you see is the result of hours upon hours of working with it.

Good trainers raise good dogs, bad trainers raise bad dogs

Your typical dog owner being taken for a walk.

One of the things I have witnessed since I started training my pup is how bad people are with dogs. I basically gained a judgmental sixth sense of dog handling. My spider sense tingles when I see two leads on a dog or muzzle. I recommend doing an OB class of any sort with any new dog, if only to see how other people handle their dogs. The results will shock you. Seeing people with large breeds like Rottweilers who have absolutely no control over their dog is sadly the norm.

Insecurity of the trainer is the other training mistake. Cesar is correct when he says that properly training a dog requires boundaries, rules, and limitations. Sound familiar? Most people lack these in their own lives, so it is no wonder that their dog does not have any.

Because I took training seriously, I have noticed that I am much more disciplined than before. I go to bed earlier so I am awake before work and can get the pup at least 45 minutes of off-leash exercise before work. He gets 20 minutes of training at least once a day, if not both morning and night sessions. I have sit-downs with my girlfriend to explain the latest training step and to ensure we are both using proper commands.

Training a dog quickly teaches you patience and how to hold frame. They will test you physically and mentally. They will push boundaries and try to dominate you. My pup knows that “bed” means go lay on the big circular dog bed in the corner and he will. Then his front paws start creeping further and further off until just his butt is on the bed. It’s undeniably cute and impressively smart, but it’s also directly disobeying my command and cannot be tolerated.

You must have dedication and persistence. You will make mistakes. You will miss corrections. You will correct them at the wrong time. You will let a dog get you upset. You cannot let these mistakes phase you and must continue on. One mistake won’t tank your training for the day or irreparably harm the dog.

Conclusion

Owning and training a hunting dog is the most rewarding task I have ever taken on. It beats graduating law school, my job, and even my mentoring. It has given me a new appreciation for what is really important. When given the choice, I will choose to spend time working with my pup. If you are looking for a rewarding challenge, I cannot recommend dog training enough.

Your future reward.

Read More: Reflections On My Freshman Year Of College

Klaus Bitter
Klaus is just another guy trying to make his way in today's society. Somehow he scammed his way into a position of authority. A Renaissance man, he enjoys art, cooking, science, law, dogs and the outdoors.

How To Become A Professional Trader

April 20, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

A recent article suggested some wise reasons for not trading the financial markets. It's good to know the downside, but there are successful traders AND it can be an incredibly lucrative and interesting profession. The Fortune 500 counts self-made hedge fund managers as its largest single profession.

I've actively traded the markets since 2001. Before that I owned a music studio. I had hot chicks dropping by to record their demos, the "ultra-cool" music biz crowd hanging out at my place, but once the financial markets caught my attention, the superficial world of music production faded into nothing more than a murmur.

I'm not the man to put on a suit and tie or work for a bank, but once broadband internet was good enough, the challenge of the markets had my attention. Within six months I sold the studio to my business partner who went on to write jingles for TV (read: fuck that). Thus I set about attacking the markets full time. To put it in perspective, in 2013 a fund manager David Tepper made $3 billion, donated a quick $57M to Carnegie Mellon (now called The David Tepper School of Economics)—whereas Paul McCartney's entire net-worth is about $600M.

I've made plenty of mistakes, and one year wiped out $200k in a single trade. My only errors were being under-capitalized and over aggressive, which is easy to do. Ultimately the market went my way, but I was already washed out. Which brings me to my first point:

Capitalization

The financial markets are a multi trillion dollar ocean of liquidity. To sit and watch them trade during peak hours is incredible. You can literally see billions of dollars moving about in a few minutes. With that in mind you are going to need a fairly robust vehicle to survive this massive ocean. $100M is a small hedge fund, so if you honestly think you can start with a $10K account and hit the big time, think again.

That's not to say you cannot learn a lot trading a small account, but you are up against seasoned professionals with very deep pockets and decades of experience. One of the best things about the markets is it's an old man's game and never dull, so it's something (unlike music production) I can do until I drop, while only getting wiser, instead of falling out of fashion and being seen as the old fart.

Google for "prop trading companies." If you are up-together there are outfits that will back you with capital where you keep 80% of the profits and they take all the risk, but beware of charlatans offering expensive (and useless) education. Email me (raywolfson – gmail) and I can refer you.

Risk Control

Whilst the markets provide a literally endless creative potential and have few constraints, to the novice this can rapidly become the most brutal psychological wasteland. There is no other human pursuit where you are measured in real-time, absolutely and only on performance, with no recourse whatsoever. To do it professionally you need to segregate your funds. You need money to live on (i.e. no financial pressure: $30-40k).

You need working capital, I'd say minimum $50k, $250k would be better. You need reserve capital so you can recapitalize your account if you take a major tumble, say $50k and you need a strong and fixed idea of how much you will risk, otherwise gamblers syndrome can take over and you will "lose the lot."

As a general rule don't risk more than 1-2% and GTFO if you are taking a 5-10% hit. Just get out. It's easy enough to make money when you are not pissing it into cyberspace.

Uncertainty

Life is uncertain—you might slip and drown in the shower. Financial speculation is fraught with uncertainty and it's only by embracing and understanding the reality that you can become comfortable with it. Much like hitting on girls, you will be wrong, you will lose, and you will need to GTFO.

There is no other profession where you literally have to approach it with the mind to fail. Imagine a restaurant owner, whose primary objective is strategizing for his bankruptcy. It's an inhuman approach, but this is exactly the mindset you need to work the markets.

Magical Predictions

There is no silver bullet for predicting the markets. No one knows what will happen and you can never have all the information. Much like a pro-gambler counting cards at a blackjack table, all you are doing is looking for a statistical edge-that is all.

When you are right you profit, when you are wrong you cut and run. Once you take this attitude you see that the markets are actually relatively easy to predict (far easier than a card game), but how you interface and manage your trades is more important.

There is no code to crack

Losers go on about manipulation or insiders and there is an element of that, but they all have to put trades onto the same exchange and same product. A good tape reader or chartist can spot their activity. The myth and mystery surrounding billionaire traders creates the illusion that they have cracked the code.

If the risk management is correct you could almost put trades on with a coin toss. Look at the charts, watch the tape, think into what the price action is telling you, find support and resistance levels, what is cheap, what is expensive, and where is an intelligent point to exit if it goes south.

That's all it amounts to. Information from every participant is manifest in the price. Don't make it more complex than it needs to be.

News

Forget about Bloomberg, Marketwatch, The Street and other financial gossip. These people couldn't buy a banana from a monkey without getting wiped out. Their vested interest is in creating talking points and earning a living from the noise surrounding the markets.

Journalists write stories about the past—I'd go so far as to say that the current state of economics is about level with 18th century medicine, when doctors used to routinely kill patients while purporting to save them. If you can figure out the basics you can profit tremendously; imagine having anesthetics and antibiotics in 1750.

Tips

Forecasters are apt to change their tune or simply spout doom and gloom until 5 years later they are finally correct. (note the above chart, we are now above 2000 and you would have lost your pants shorting the S&P). They are like broken clocks that eventually tell the right time.

All tips are useless because they focus on being right, rather than what to do if you are wrong. Timing is far more difficult than price direction. To be successful is largely psychological; it's like a giant game of high speed poker. Figure it out, make good calls and take much smaller hits when you are wrong. Mark Douglas says :

> Most traders are closer to the way they need to think when they first begin trading than at any other time in their careers.

Specialize

There are almost unlimited opportunities: stocks, bonds, options, futures, penny stocks, ETFs, Mutual Funds, Emerging Markets, Forex, Commodities etc. Pick one thing and stick to it. For my part I rapidly decided that stocks are a waste of time. You need an army of analysts and millions in working capital. Options are modeled by Ph.D maths—real tough game.

For the little guy, futures and Forex is best. You have leverage, there is less human element, more pure technical action and the macro economic news and politics is easier to keep up to date with than dozens of stocks, their sector, their competitors, and their internal politics.

Forex is a good starting point and has free charting and live news feeds, but it's a little one dimensional without considering Oil, Gold, Treasury Bonds and Stock Index Futures.

Nothing is isolated, so you have to check price action across the board. I'd recommend FXCM and Interactive Brokers. FXCM has a good demo platform.

Equipment

Get a half decent PC, and put 6 x 24" screens on it. They are cheap I bought mine from a liquidator for $100 each. I cabled up my computer with 10m leads, so I am not listening to fan noise all day. You need a calm, clear environment to work in. Live news-feed is worth paying for, it's not that you want to react to live news, but rather see how the market is reacting to it.

Many of the moves are counter intuitive, because pros have been speculating and then take the counter position to close profits once they see they are correct. The novice buys the S&P futures on good jobs data and wonders why it doesn't rally – it already did on speculation, so now it drops—that's how markets work.

Books

Less is more, learn a few technical patters and spend your main efforts on raising capital and mastering your psychology and risk management. I have my own signals, just from looking at the charts and knowing previous patterns.

The truth is it takes a decade or more to learn market behavior. You can do better studying historical charts and major events, tulip bubble, south sea bubble, 1929, 1987, LTCM, 2001, 2008 etc. than reading dozens of books. These are my bibles:

> Edwin Lefevre – Reminisances of A Stock Operator
>
> Jack D. Schwagger – Market Wizards and New Market Wizards
>
> Ian Taylor, Matthew Hilger – The Poker Mindset
>
> Mark Douglas – Trading in the Zone
>
> Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi – Flow, The Psychology of Optimal Experience

You can find free copies of most these on google. Email if you want to ask me a question. I reckon 1000% in a year is possible if you are skilled and committed, and have real risk capital rather than gambling life savings. It's nothing people haven't done before and frankly I am not in it for the money but for the sport.

Hunting leveraged trades is an immaculate mental process and a perfect zen experience. If not then you're doing something wrong. The reason the sore losers out there give up on the markets and spit venom and hate for it, is because they failed—most people do.

Final Advice

> "After spending many years in Wall Street and after making and losing millions of dollars I want to tell you this: it never was my thinking that made the big money for me. It was always my sitting. Got that? My sitting tight!
>
> "It is no trick at all to be right on the market I've known many traders who were right at exactly the right time, and began buying or selling stocks when prices were at the very level that should show the greatest profit. And their experience invariably matched mine; that is, they made no real money out of it. Traders who can both be right and sit tight are uncommon. I found it one of the hardest things to learn. But it is only after a stock operator has firmly grasped this that he can make the big money."
>
> "It is literally true that the millions come easier to a trader after he knows how to trade than the hundreds did in his days of ignorance."
>
> Jesse Livermore

Read More: 5 Signs A Girl Has Daddy Issues

The NFL Continues Its White Knighting By Hiring A Female Referee

April 21, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

The National Football League recently helped women get a firmer grip on the scrotum of masculinity by hiring its first full-time female referee, Sarah Thomas.

Thomas, a married mother of three who hails from Mississippi, started officiating high school games in the mid 90s. She worked her way through the ranks and was eventually given a full schedule of games in the college ranks, which culminated in her being the first woman to officiate a bowl game at the end of the 2011 season.

The NFL announced her hiring on April 8th and the predictable narrative ensued. Sports pundits, male and female, have hailed the decision calling it groundbreaking, social progress, and the like. Thomas has made her rounds across media platforms and insists she doesn't want to be a trailblazer.

Thomas

Her thoughts about what she thinks she is or isn't are inconsequential. What is consequential are the implications of this hire and what it means going forward. From what I've gathered so far men are falling into one of two camps on this: There are the "big deal, they hired a chick" and the "this is social change that is long overdue!" (read: white knights).

Then there's a third section of men who happen to be in the minority on this—at least publicly. The men who know and understand that hiring a female referee is the continuation of the NFL's consistent support of the feminine imperative at the expense of both the athlete and the male spectator.

Let's take a look at the implications and subsequent consequences sure to follow with the hiring of Sarah Thomas.

Giving women power over men

Scenes like this soak the granny panties of feminists everywhere

Let’s face it. One of the main objectives of feminism is giving women power over men. The ability to exercise power over men in a male-dominated sector is something feminists have drooled over for decades. Thomas’s hire is the crack in the door they need to eventually realize this dream.

I recently wrote an article detailing the Chris Paul incident with female NBA referee Lauren Holtkamp. Holtkamp gave Paul a technical foul he disagreed with—something that happens nightly in the NBA with male referees. The difference here is that a woman had the ability and authority to dictate to and penalize a male and this is exactly what feminists want.

Women in the media and female sports fans won’t admit to this, but in an honest moment they’ll readily admit that seeing a woman calling a tech on an NBA player is something they relish. And now that Thomas has cracked the “glass ceiling” and is in the NFL, she and other women (who are sure to follow) will have the capacity to exert dominance over men in the most physically demanding, testosterone-driven sport in the world.

What’s her position?

Thomas's position is a line judge. Though not as influential in terms of penalties called and overall gameplay, a line judge is an important position on the team of officials.

Basically a line judge's responsibility is to monitor the line of scrimmage. Players jumping offsides, whether or not a pass is a backward lateral or forward pass, or various degrees of kicks during any given play are a few of the many responsibilities of an LJ.

One might think that a man or a woman could do this job equally well, but that is far from the truth. Being an official in the NFL is physically demanding. It requires physical speed, attention to detail, physical strength, and cat-like reflexes lest he (or she) be left in the dust.

Sarah Thomas has already addressed this as a possible "challenge" for her when she makes the jump to the next level:

> The speed, yes, is there. These are just phenomenal athletes on both sides of the ball. The game has a tendency to slow down the (more) snaps you get and repetition. So, hopefully, the more snaps I get, things will start slowing down a little bit.

Hopefully??

This issue isn't difficult to unpack. The bottom line is that men are physically superior to women in every way. This is why 99.9% of employees on oil rigs, sewers, warehouses, etc. are men. The same goes in the NFL or any other professional sports league. College is one thing, the NFL is quite another.

If Thomas fucks up on account of her lack of physical tools to be able to keep up with bigger, faster, and stronger players whilst having to make sure she's also on her p's and q's she should be quickly demoted or fired.

But we all know that’s not going to happen because…

She will be above criticism

Blandino

Dean Blandino, the VP of NFL officiating, can talk all he wants about the fact that Thomas will be judged and reprimanded just like her male counterparts but we know that’s not going to happen. The minute a player, coach, or even a colleague of hers so much as suggests that her job performance isn’t up to snuff you can best believe their words will be met with harsh criticism.

Don’t believe me? Ask Chris Paul.

Women want to be equal and do the things men do but they don’t want the responsibility or scrutiny that comes with it. But the PC police will ensure that anyone who points out Thomas’s mistakes or critiques her performance will be met with accusations of misogyny and everybody knows this.

For example, Danica Patrick hasn’t come close to winning a race on NASCAR’s top circuit but she’s managed to avoid criticism despite fucking a fellow driver, getting into an altercation with another over something stupid, and being flat out non-competitive in the 3+ years she’s been on the circuit.

A regular occurrence for the Go Daddy girl

But men won't call her out because they would likely be suspended, fined, fired, or all three. Thomas says she doesn't want her gender to matter but it will. The fact that she's a female will make it nearly impossible to fire her unless there's an egregious violation of some sort on her part, and even then she might remain employed.

Women will always trade on their beauty

What does Thomas have in common with other recent "trailblazers?"

Her looks.

Though the 41-year-old Thomas is well past the wall, it's easy to see that she still retains some of the beauty she no doubt benefited from in her youth. Incidentally enough, her job before she became a full time referee was a pharmaceutical sales rep, which anyone with a pulse knows rewards women who have above average looks.

From Milka Duno and Michelle Wie, to Becky Hammon (who has become the first female coach in NBA history) and yes, Danica Patrick and most other women allowed to "play with the boys," the common denominator is that they are good looking women. This is no accident.

This isn't to say that their aesthetics alone got them to where they are today. Talent and ability definitely plays role in their success. But it would be disingenuous to suggest that their beauty didn't grease the skids on their fast track to recognition.

Better looking girls have always lived better lives. Despite feminists' efforts at social engineering, it will always be this way, and that's perfectly okay. Crying their way into the boys' club is no different because at the end of the day, feminists aren't going to use trolls to infiltrate the almighty patriarchy (Billie Jean King notwithstanding) and neither are men.

Take Away

You can bet your bottom dollar that there are plenty of drivers who don't race in NASCAR's highest circuit who are 10 times the driver Danica Patrick will ever be. In the same vein I'm 100% certain there are scores of men who are more qualified than Thomas to do the job she's been hired to do.

Similar to affirmative action this move by the NFL isn't about meritocracy, it's about political correctness and a poor attempt at establishing an unnecessary balance. Thomas will not the last female referee to be hired, and if this trend continues it won't be long before players are suspended for "hurting the feeeewings" of a menstrual female referee who made a terrible call.

Read Next: The Chris Paul Story Shows That Women Shouldn't Be Allowed To Officiate Male Sports

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

I Attended The 2015 White Nationalist AmRen Conference

April 21, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

I went to the American Renaissance white nationalist conference last weekend. I thought it would be interesting, since I have expressed Southern nationalist sentiments before. Personally I wasn't particularly inspired at the event, and I doubt I'll attend again, but all things considered they are doing a wonderful work. I'm a firm believer that every person has a right to take pride in his own ethnic heritage, and I'm grateful that someone is breaking the echo chamber.

Talking points at this year's conference included immigration, white self-hatred, and rat utopia experiments, among others. RamZPaul was especially entertaining. The over-arching theme of AmRen is that the white race has the same obligation to self-preservation as every other race, whereas our society and government today does everything it can to sell out the country we have built to outsiders and degenerates. Often there are neoreactionary and anti-feminist sentiments expressed, but they were minimal this year and appear to not be essential beliefs of AmRen.

Personalities

There was this one moron in my circle very much fitting Billy Joel's "Angry Young Man." At one point he basically called me a traitor to the race since I watch college football and black people make up half the players. I argued how college football—unlike the NFL—is about a community uniting together to prove that their masculinity is greater than the next region over and that statehood is just as important as nationhood.

After consistently beating his arguments to a pulp, he finishes with a red herring, “You’re not even white,” since I have an olive complexion despite my largely Scottish background. The defeatism in his fallacy was so transparent that Helen Keller could see it. Notice he holds the common leftist misconception that race is merely an aesthetic quality and culture is only an ancillary feature.

The event speakers, however, were excellent, even if my short attention span couldn’t quite hold on. Most of them had a kind of C.S. Lewis vibe, if C.S. Lewis wrote about race instead of religion. They definitely made a greater impression on me than the obnoxious kids who think they have the world figured out in their early twenties.

Diversity

Another thing I appreciate about AmRen is the diversity in opinion, which shows that it is a conversation and not a dogma. One may notice that ROK writers have a variety of slightly different views on the sexes, and it is for this same reason. I don’t agree with some of AmRen’s minor points, but I respect them for saying the things that others are terrified to say.

A great picture of this mild diversity was a public debate they had. They divided four of the speakers into two teams to debate whether the current political system can undo the political correctness hell we live in. Both sides were very articulate, rational, and well-researched. I was actually just a little disappointed in the side I agree with, as the opposing team was a bit better than them.

We in the red pill assume that the leftists have won the culture war, but they have not converted the minds of the people. The left has won the mass’s terror but lost their hearts. And while AmRen sometimes over-simplifies and over-idealizes some isseus, I’m very appreciative that someone is speaking up. Even if they are slightly wrong in the short-term, it may spark a consciousness about race realism in the long-term.

For the record, when I met the famous RamZPaul, he told me he enjoys ROK and later gave us a shout-out in his speech (which will later be posted on YouTube).

Location

Montgomery Bell State Park

The event was held at Montgomery Bell State Park outside Nashville, Tennessee, which was absolutely gorgeous and had plenty of outdoor activities. I tried to get Matt Forney to play me in golf, but apparently he's too young and hip for a contest of masculine self-mastery, dismissing it as "an old man's game." Then again, my friends have always said I was born old and cranky.

The protesters showed up later in the day despite being in the middle of the woods. At first there was just two. One laid on the grass holding his sign, and the other leaned on a handrail with his sign dangling. Pathetic. Later on there were about twenty in all silently instructing us on how black lives matter.

Oddly all but just one of them were white, because liberals think it is the white man's burden to save the "coloreds" from all the dangers in the world. I have enough respect for other races to believe they can handle their own problems without us treating them like defenseless children.

The state troopers amped up security on the off-chance some young gluten-free vegan decided to get violent, which I thanked the troopers for. I realize police hatred is quite vogue right now, occasionally for justifiable though over-simplified reasons, but just because there may or may not be anyone to watch the watchmen does not mean the watchmen are not needed.

The troopers also asked us to go inside and not give the protesters attention, which frankly I had been saying the whole time. If you feed the geese, they're just going to breed and shit everywhere. It's not like there's any third party observers watching them; they just want the validation of being a good person.

And they're aren't terribly interesting either. Most self-described colorblind people live in nice safe white flight parts of town and rarely interact with blacks outside of TV and HuffPo.

Conclusion

Race realism is a common theme in red pill thought, even if only a minor one. Granted, the AmRen people aren't 100% in agreement with us, but there's still a lot of overlap between our camps. At the least, we are fighting against the same enemies. AmRen wants the political correctness fascism to die just as strongly as we do. They are on the right path, even if they aren't as potent as one would hope.

One fear I have is that more angsty idiots like the one above will become involved and give the movement a bad name. Race is by definition a lineage, sure, but the cultural aspect is what makes the social realities so present.

After all, any first year sociology class will teach you that a society will be chaotic without a clear culture. I'm not quite a white separatist, but at the same time I don't want to force either whites or blacks to abandon their heritage in favor of another. The left seems to want to ridicule or marginalize all surface-level white culture while assimilating the coloreds into a white mentality.

Despite a few minor ideological differences, I'm in support of AmRen and its race realism, even though I probably won't return. Never eat the right-wing.

For the record

Some people are telling a story about me getting drunk at AmRen. Personally I don't know why they found a story about a drunk guy acting stupid at a conference so interesting, since it is nothing unusual. Perhaps they have boring lives and are looking for drama. Their fixation on gossip is in stark contrast to the scholarly impression I got of the organizers. But the Kings Media team thought it would be best if I gave my side of the story, even though very few of them are upset at me.

I was hoping we could all leave it behind, since it looks bad on the whole AmRen organization as well as ROK. But since AmRen's own people have decided to tell the world embarrassing stories about the conference, I decided I should do some clarification for my own sake. Matt Parrot and others may not have any sense of shame in keeping a good face on their own movement (which is already controversial by virtue of existing), but I at least care about my own name and the name of Kings Media.

Matt Parrot is greatly distorting the facts, perhaps unintentionally since he seems like a good guy. I don't know whether he was drunk that night or not, but either way memories cloud easily in such events. So here is what happened. And yes, I actually do remember all of it, despite my extreme inebriation.

On the first night, I got very drunk. If I were wise, I would have gone to bed after the speakers, but instead I went to a nearby bar with the other guys. I went around asking girls to dance, because I wanted to use the swing lessons I had taken. All of them rejected me, because no girl likes an obnoxious wasted guy.

A few young girls were being especially snarky. I knew they wouldn't dance with me, but I decided to ruin their night anyway. I go up to them and say, "You're fat, and I'm balding. Let's dance." They kept saying no, and I kept asking them, just to piss them off. One pushed me, and I pushed her back, and then the bouncer literally threw me out of the bar. Someone led me up to sit by the curb.

> We kept him off of the property and got him back to the conference safely, then spent the next hour or so effusively apologizing for him, buying the girls drinks right and left, and promising the locals we would avenge their girl in short order.

That first part I'm very thankful for them doing, but the rest of it is pathetic, and I don't feel guilty for them wasting money. Oh, and each time Heimbach kept half-jokingly threatening to fight me, I invited the fat weasel to indulge, but he always grew silent.

> He was sitting there in the grass explaining how the girl…had no right to reject his advances…Reportedly, Forney privately handled the situation, which I trust he did, and by all accounts from the locals, the ladies, and my fellow attendees, the matter is now resolved.

Every single word of that is a lie. Sitting in the grass, I apologized profusely to the AmRen people around me and continued to repeat, "The is at least half my fault," in an annoying drunken humility. I certainly didn't say the fat girl was entitled to waltz with me, and Parrot's claim of that makes me wonder if he's trying to slander ROK as being everything the feminists claim it is.

And Forney didn't do anything in private except tease me about it, and if it were resolved, then Parrot wouldn't be telling the world the embarrassing qualities of AmRen's attendees, although it appears telling such stories on blogs is weirdly the norm for the many conference attendees. I'm hoping this is just an errant memory of his and not him trying to smear the red pill movement.

The next night the same group of people got drunk and went out to party some more. It didn't end well for some of them, but I won't go into details. However, still upset over what I had done, I had decided to go to bed right after the final speaker around 9pm. Suffice it to say that I was very glad the next morning.

Whether it is ethical to push a girl after she first pushes you is up for debate (it's not that she was actually hurt), but I got drunk and annoyed an entire bar for at least an hour. They were just wanting to have a good time on a Friday night, and I stole that from them. That was the truly shameful thing for me.

That and embarrassing the whole Kings Media team, for which I've apologized to them personally. I wasn't acting like a king. I was acting like a spoiled prince.

Read Next: 7 Reasons Every Man Should Date A Latina At Least Once In His Life

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

How To Financially Protect Yourself From Women

April 21, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Money is what makes the world and, despite what die-hard romantics will tell you, relationships go round. You need to protect yourself financially and be proactive about it at all times. Irrespective of whether she's a cold-hearted bitch, when relationships fail, become stagnant or time simply passes, owed money is usually forgotten or deliberately withheld. Teach her to respect you and your money, and her own commitments, or prepare to be a human doormat.

These comments are obviously aimed at pre-marriage men. Should you be taking the convoluted path of modern matrimony, a pre-nup (and one not made or lived out in a place like London!) is a must. But that's for another article.

Paying for things

Whether three-star or higher hotel stays, long-distance or international flights, or a study course you're taking together, if you're not documenting what you paid for and she has or hasn't paid for, you're asking for trouble. Big fucking trouble. The same goes for the two-way arrangement you and her make, specifically the agreement that you're both contributing and how much that contribution will be.

The glory of the internet is that nowadays you have no excuse for not keeping records of larger payments, especially those involving girls. This can run the whole gamut of Paypal, online banking, email, and other mediums, which allow you to write about what you're spending and involve her. Unless you're a trust fund baby or a millionaire whose spending habits are less than a few thousand dollars a day (how modest of you!), you should already be practicing such financial prudence for your own sake. When transactions involve time with girls, it is even more essential.

If the agreement is that the hotel stay is coming from your credit card, you need to keep the online receipt by not only having it sent to your inbox, but by filing it in a specific folder. Simply having it somewhere is not the same as having it easily accessible. Better yet, send the receipt to her as well.

When you've booked or paid for the item, always shoot her an email or text, or make sure you have done it before. Without me holding your hand too much, you should be more than aware of what such communication should contain. Things like "I booked the Hilton for us for the 27th through 31st" with "Here's the account you can pay me back on" or "Pay me back on my main account."

In defense of girls, too, the human mind is not infallible. Far from it. For both sexes, the biggest fault in broken or avoided promises is usually laziness and ignorance, not maliciousness or conscious indifference. When you effectively manage her memory by having things written down and casually reminding her, you make it easier for her to get her shit together.

Loans

Spotting someone cash at specific times is not prima facie evidence that you're being cuckolded or chosen solely for your (financial) providing abilities. Women, like men, do encounter unforeseen financial trouble, of either the moderate or larger variety. Also, sometimes mutual enjoyment together means taking trips or attending events she can't yet pay for.

Don't make it obvious, but always maintain the habit of keeping written records of the informal arrangements you make.

If you're transferring via a bank, there is often room for describing what the transfer is for. Make such a description detailed enough! Not "Loan" or "Loan to Jane," which are amorphous, rather "Loan for Jane's Graduate Textbooks," "Loan for Jane's Rent," or "Loan for Jane for Music Festival Trip."

Ensure you keep general emails or text messages describing the process through which you expect to be paid back. For example, have a written record of the specific bank account details you sent her so she can pay you back. Such correspondence can be sent offhand and casually, such as when you're on your lunch break and you shoot her an email, or text her as you're on the subway to go and meet a friend.

Managing broken commitments

Things do happen. Sometimes, yes, she's forgetful and ignorant. Other times it's out of her control. If you've paid for or loaned something and she needs more time than expected, be wary but not a lunatic.

If she wants to renegotiate terms, you either need to say no or figure out how she can pay you back reasonably. Again, if you don't have a record of this, which she has consented to in written form, you're risking having no proof that you're owed.

All this, like the previous points, may sound pedantic. But you have a choice frequently between either being “pedantic” or not being paid back. Make your choice. Game does not make you immune to the vagaries or flakiness of life, female or otherwise.

[image]

When things go sour

Many jurisdictions across the world now offer less expensive, less formal but still effective means of recouping debts. Small claims courts or tribunals usually do not require you to get a lawyer and demand an application fee of around a hundred dollars or an equivalent sum in another currency.

Armed with your records of communications and accompanying payments, you stand a much better chance of having your money find its way back to you. In many cases, the respondents in these cases are declared bankrupt through an inability to pay.

The idea, though, is that the documented history will encourage her to pay you back in the first place.

Conclusion

Once internalized, these self-preserving and common sense habits will take you only seconds every time. The biggest problem with learning new skills, even of the mental and financial variety, is that we perceive their long-term difficulty based on learning them in the first moments. Like tying your shoelaces, it will become unconscious when you apply it enough.

Finances are ultimately the fulcrum of a well-lived life. Inasmuch as they should not dominate it, they are indispensable to it. Value your finances or someone else, including women, will value (and take) them for you.

Read More: Men Should Assert Their Dominance Over Women Through Anal Sex

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

UK Feminists Shut Down Sussex Police Efforts To Prevent Rape

April 22, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Feminists and their fellow-travellers in the British media have successfully shut down an initiative by Sussex Police to prevent rape. The poster campaign, intended to educate women about the risk of sexual assault on nights out, was initially defended by police in Sussex, a region of south-east England, but senior officers have since withdrawn the posters and issued a grovelling apology after pressure from a minority of Feminist complainers made known their opposition to the poster campaign, which they slated as “victim-blaming”.

This development signals a worrying new trend, namely that public officials in Britain now kowtow before media commentators with extreme ideological agendas, putting second the interests of taxpayers and members of the general public. The poster, below, was intended for publication in pub and club toilets in Brighton, which has a large student population:

Attack of the Shrikes

It’s sensible advice to any right-thinking individual. However, the usual array of fundamentalists took great issue with it. Premier-league cretin of British feminism Laura Bates told The Independent:

> This kind of messaging (while it can be well-meaning) plays into hugely problematic victim-blaming within our society, which can make victims of sexual offences feel unable to come forward for fear they will be blamed for what happened.

Missing the point entirely that the campain was aimed at the friends of potential vicims, she continued:

> Focusing on victim behaviour prevents us from placing the blame where it belongs- with the perpetrator alone.

Publishing a poster aimed at a victim’s friends also does not constitute “focusing on victim behaviour”. It is one facet of police policy. Other departments will be tasked with dealing with interrogating perps, gathering evidence and looking after real victims. Bates, a feminist hack with an English Literature degree, is lecturing cops about criminal justice policy.

A parasite in its natural habitat.

Another nutter, Glosswitch, who has previously written in the New Statesman rag on "Why farting is a feminist issue," complained:

> Almost 38 years after the first UK Reclaim the Night march made the glaringly obvious point that the threat of male violence must not limit women's freedom of movement, it's still being suggested that women are the ones who should be on their guard

It's being suggested that women are the ones who should be on their guard! Who are these law enforcement professionals to suggest that women getting blind drunk on all sorts of booze might want to have a strategy in place to avoid the predations of men who frequent places full of inebriated women with nefarious purposes in mind? The patriarchal cis-het shitlords!

Glosswitch quotes another feminist hack, Soraya Chemaly, who says "teaching girls to constantly modify their behaviour in order to avoid stranger rape is a form of social control".

British women’s alcohol consumption is a public health issue.

The disingenuousness is palpable. Sussex Police are dealing with the issue of women putting themselves in vulnerable situations. They are not teaching women to modify innate behaviours. They are trying to persuade women to take steps to counteract a risky adopted behaviour (consuming industrial quantities of alcohol).

Feminists expect that women should be able to engage in this behaviour without restraint, as if the world was their own private bouncy castle in the form of a pub. Try as a cop to mitigate the risks of rape happening in such situations and you engage engaging in “social control!”

Just turn for comparison to the debate raging in the UK as to whether drunkards turn up to hospital A&E should be levied with a fine. No shouts of “victim-blaming” there, of course. Women are a category of victims with special dispensation to drink like sailors and ride the cock carousel into oblivion with no personal accountability when the inevitable tears and trauma arise.

Cops giving worldly advice based on endless weekends spent cleaning up blood, shit, piss, and vomit in custody suites are, according to Glosswitch, fettering women’s freedom.

Common sense ain’t so common

David Davies, a former cop who is running for re-election as an MP in Monmouth in Sussex, thought the message of the posters was sound advice.

> I don’t think it’s blaming victims … it’s like telling people to lock car doors
>
> No one’s suggesting the attacker doesn’t bear responsibility, the police are simply trying to make sure people are aware of danger and try to avoid it. It’s > blindingly obvious.

>
> It’s disappointing that some groups don’t realise police are trying to help prevent problems

Stalwart former Tory MP Ann Widdecombe, also added her tuppence, commending Sussex Police for their work.

> With all the silliness that we have come to expect, some women’s rights groups are complaining that such posters blame the victims for rape. Tosh.

She went in her trademark outspoken style:

> So let me give all those feminist harridans apoplexy by saying unapologetically that young girls should stick together, know how they are going to get home, drink moderately and not dress too scantily.

Cowards in high places

Initially, Sussex Police defended the campaign. Chief Inspector Katy Woolford pointed out that the poster was based on research into how to help those in vulnerable situations:

> We would be failing in our response if, as with any other crime, we did not recognise that there are victims and urge them to take steps to minimise risks and help safeguard others from becoming victims…It is vital to be aware of vulnerability so that steps can be taken to guard against it. Friends and bystanders can play a key role in this, learning to recognise where their intervention may prevent a crime taking place.

Ultimately he campaign of outrage managed to browbeat Sussex Police into withdrawing the postes, Det Supt Paul Furnell announcing that the force had decided with its “partners” to pull the campaign, supplicating further: “The posters were well-intentioned with the sole aim of preventing people becoming victims of crime.”

Sussex Police had been made to pull the plug on the campaign by “democratically elected” Police and Crime Commissioner for Sussex, Katy Bourne, a career bureaucrat, who had come demanding answers armed with a file full of cuttings of press coverage about the campaign.

Feminists, a plague on the UK state

Sarah Green, giving credence to Roosh V's claim that "Feminism is self-esteem welfare for women lacking beauty privilege."

The invocation of the feminist mantra of "victim-blaming" in this case is a semantic nonsense. If anything, the poster is blaming the friends of the victim for abandoning her and putting her in a vulnerable position. The problem facing British men is not feminist abuse of language, however, but rather the growing influence of feminist agitators over public institutions.

A minority of gender-political hucksters were able to marshall Twitter and the national press in order to force a police force, funded to the tune of 24% by council tax paid by local people, the rest coming from central government, to backtrack their policy, wasting precious taxpayer money in order to satisfy a feminist whim about what constitutes proper narrative.

Moreover, the opinions of societal parasites like Sarah Green and Laura Bates is being given precedence over the professional judgment of hardened police officers with decades of service on the front line. Green and Bates make a comfortable, cushy living in the tertiary sector lecturing people with real jobs on how to do them, all on the basis of theories and studies biased in favour of a violently extremist ideology (feminism).

In the process, the empirical observations and instincts of front line cops are being marginalised to please a baying mob of Twitter schmucks who, like Green and Bates, wouldn't last four minutes on the front line of British policing. If that doesn't make you angry, you're not paying attention.

Read Next: The Rape Card Now Trumps The Legal System In The UK

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

4 Things In Common Between “Rape Culture” And Roofie Hysteria

April 22, 2015 | by Nomen Nescio | Link | Original Link

Let’s talk roofies. Everyone has heard stories about some poor girl whose drink was spiked with rohypnol and who woke up naked in a room with a guy, without any memory of how she got there or what happened the night before.

Many women are keenly aware of these stories and always keep an eye on their drinks, ever vigilant for unseen predators prowling the bars and clubs, ready to pounce on an unattended drink and spike it with roofies or other drugs so they can take advantage of the girl, once she is incapacitated.

In the UK, the National Health Service dedicated a page full of warnings to spiked drinks, Australia has a similar page, and supermarkets are stocked with devices to test drinks for drugs, including the roofie-detecting straw pictured above.

But how often are drinks spiked? A survey by researchers from the University of Kent among UK students showed that 55% of the participants knew someone who had something slipped into her drink, suggesting this phenomenon is widespread.

However, this assumption is wrong. A 2007 study performed blood tests of people (82% female) who came to the emergency ward of an inner city London hospital, claiming their drinks had been spiked. The vast majority was merely very drunk and, in other cases, medicinal or illicit drugs were detected. Rohypnol was not found.

An Australian study from 2009 came to similar conclusions, where none of the 97 people who visited an emergency ward for drink spiking were found to have been roofied. Most people were blind drunk instead of drugged. Let these results sink in for a moment.

In both studies, dozens of people, mostly women, showed up at an ER, claiming to be victims of drink spiking. Subsequent blood testing did not find supporting evidence in even a single case! Likewise, policing authorities in The UK and Australia found little evidence for so-called drug-facilitated sexual assault, noting that it is:

> improbable as a widespread crime, involving as it does a stranger extracting an individual from her social group unnoticed, precisely controlling drug effects, administering a substance undetected, and reliably erasing memory of the experience

So, the idea that strangers are out and about trying to drug a girl's drink are an urban legend without even a shred of substantial proof. But why do so many women believe that this is an imminent threat, and who do so many women claim that they personally know someone who got roofied?

The usefulness of the narrative to excuse bad behavior

The Kent study offers two interesting explanations, noting that: "the drink spiking narrative has a functional appeal in relation to the contemporary experience of young women's public drinking."

> [the idea of drink spiking] has inspired a female code of conduct and a language that gives license to binge-drinking. Alcohol consumption was very rarely > explicitly framed as a problem, and limiting alcohol intake was very rarely seen as a means of mitigating risks to one's safety and health. Unprompted, respondents nonetheless felt the need to address the alcohol contribution in their accounts, if only to deny its role. There appears to be widespread disbelief, or active denial, that excess alcohol could cause the same incoherence, physical distress and incapacity associated with the date rape drugs.

In other words, the drink-spiking narrative provides hamster rocket fuel to rationalize bad behavior, in this case binge drinking and all the bad decisions that come with it, including deciding who to go home with. Wake up the next day, hung over, and being an innocent girl who got roofied is the more preferable explanation over being a sloppy drunk who makes bad life choices.

It also puts this story by a Vice ~~writer~~ typist who claimed to have been roofied three times in 18 months in a different, harsher light.

> Heightened spiking concern can enhance a sense of group security and act as a substitute for acting upon the problems associated with drinking too much in public. Many UK interviewees invoked a sense of female camaraderie when speaking about going out, drinking, and drink-spiking. Women are frequently held up as people who look out for each other, drink-spiking incidents often involved a thoughtful female friend stepping in and taking someone home 'before it was too late'. [This] opens up the possibility for women to express an ethic of care towards others, and this is made possible by the ready-made discourse and narrative that convey the perils of drink-spiking

In that sense, the "drink-spiking" urban myth is very similar to the "rape culture" urban myth, which offers an identical protection mechanism to rationalize bad behavior away, without being held accountable. Here are four parallels:

1. Rationalizing regrettable decisions

When a girl who comes to regret a sexual encounter she can, at any point and without any evidence, change that encounter into rape. Prominent feminists have proclaimed that we should always believe a rape accuser. A girl accusing a man of sexual assault now calls herself a “survivor,” a term that used to be reserved for people from my grandmother’s generation who survived the Nazi concentration camps during WWII. In doing so, she tries to claim special victim status that automagically shields her from criticism.

2. Not supported by any hard data

Just as there is no hard data underlying the drink-spiking narrative, the data that was supposed to prove the rape culture narrative turned out to be highly unreliable. The canard that 1 in 5 college women are raped keeps rearing its much discredited head, despite more recent studies showing that the real number, according to the Bureau of Justice statistics, is one in 53.

Still too many, but nowhere near the vaunted one in five. Instead of celebrating this much-reduced number, feminists seemed mostly disappointed at this massive blow against rape culture.

3. Allows women to show they care about each other, without tackling a real problem

In both the drink-spiking and the rape culture narrative, danger lurks in every corner. Women can show how much they care about one another by protecting them from men who are keen to take advantage of their vulnerability. Where the drink-spiking myth merely focuses on dangers associated with drinking, the rape culture myth casts its net much wider.

Men everywhere are suspect all the time, so women need protection everywhere, all the time. By fighting this imaginary danger, a woman can show how much she cares. The internet only serves as a platform that magnifies all this empathy flowing outwards in a most attractive way.

4. Everybody knows the narrative

Both urban myths consist of a popular narrative that everyone heard of but no one has seen. Just as everyone heard the story of girls being roofied and raped, everyone has heard rumors about student fraternities are hotbeds of misogyny, populated by rapist white males who are keen to violate the innocent little coeds in drunken, drug-fueled initiation rites.

Rolling Stone's Sabrina Erdely was so convinced that this story was real that she went rape-shopping, traveling from campus to campus interviewing rape accusers, until she found someone who could tell her the story she wanted to hear. We all know how what happened next.

Thankfully, both have been thoroughly discredited by proper research. Even the rape culture myth has been denounced, both in popular media and by the Rape Abuse & Incest National Network, the most prominent US organization fighting sexual violence. In a press release, they stated that:

> Rape is caused not by cultural factors but by the conscious decisions, of a small percentage of the community, to commit a violent crime.

In other words, do not mistake the hamsterizations of a small minority of vocal feminists to be descriptive of Western culture as a whole. After all, it is puzzling that feminists pump so much energy into their cherished but discredited narrative about Western rape culture while simultaneously ignoring the very real rape culture that was uncovered in the UK, where groups of Muslim immigrants were found to have organized abuse of hundreds of girls in both Rotherham and Oxford.

Read More: The Myth of Date Rape Drink Spiking

Nomen Nescio

Nomen Nescio was born naked, screaming and covered in someone else's blood. Eventually he overcame those odds, left his cave and became a mercenary mad scientist, traveling the world and sampling its women. He writes on ROK sporadically. Follow him on Twitter: @The_Dr_Caveman

How To Game A Hot French Girl

April 22, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

It was after eleven at night, and I was heading home. I was tired. I had been out in London with friends since early afternoon, and I'd approached a number of girls that I'd spotted in shops and coffee bars, taking one on an "instant date" to a cafe that had lasted an hour or more but hadn't led to any tangible result.

But it was summertime, when London is fired with a strange energy brought on by the heat that lasts well into the evening. I saw her walking alone down a pedestrian street. She was about twenty years old, with long, slim legs that were more than adequately showcased by the tiny miniskirt she wore.

Now, by this point in the night, a certain seduction fatigue had set in, and I debated internally whether or not I should bother approaching her. After all, as attractive as she was, the law of abundance states that there are millions of others just like her. But as I walked past, she flashed me a quick smile, a positive indicator that I simply couldn't ignore.

I said hi and we started chatting. She was a French student visiting the capital for a couple of days. She had gone to a gay club and was disappointed. The gay friends she had been with had pulled, but there had been no available guys for her. So now she was looking for something to eat before going home to bed. I said we should go and grab a bite together.

There was nothing open in the immediate vicinity, so I suggested we try south of the river Thames, which was coincidentally in the direction of where I live. She agreed, and so we walked to the centre of Waterloo Bridge, which offers some of the most beautiful views of London. Here I pulled her towards me, and we kissed passionately.

“Let’s fuck first and eat later,” she said.

We walked over to the South Bank, and I hailed a cab. As we were being driven to my apartment, she said, “You’re lucky. I’m wearing brand-new Victora’s Secret underwear that I bought today.” As soon as we reached my place, her clothes came off, and I was able to inspect the new purchase for myself before a marathon sex session that lasted well into the night.

Now, granted, this story is somewhat anomalous. I had sex with Anna within thirty minutes of meeting her, which is unusual (although it happens more than you think). But it illustrates the opportunities that are out there if you believe in abundance and are willing to approach. It also shows the changes in fortune that are open to a man. Who cares about the nine girls you get shot down by when you’re fucking the tenth?

Skeptics will say that Anna made it easy for me, and that not a great deal of seduction was required. The truth of the matter is that you will naturally meet girls who, for whatever reason, are up for quick sex. The trick is identifying those girls, leading, and not fucking it up.

I was intuitively aware, given clues such as what she was wearing, the time of day, the location, and her smile that she was potentially open to sex. My job as a man was to leverage masculine-feminine polarity, quickly physically escalate (the kiss on the bridge), and lead her to a private location where sex could take place (my apartment).

It doesn’t take a genius to do these things; in fact, anyone could do it, but you need a degree of confidence, knowledge of female psychology, and social poise to pull it off correctly. Fortunately, anyone can acquire these things if they learn a few simple tools.

This is an excerpt from my new book The Seven Laws of Seduction, available for download on Amazon now. To get your copy click here

Read More: How to get Over That One Special Girl

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How To Create Your Own List Of Precepts

April 22, 2015 | by Rórdán Phobos | Link | Original Link

Ice Cube summed it up best, “You better check yourself before you wreck yourself.” Following my article entitled, “Why You Need To Set Your Precepts For A Productive Life,” many people asked me for my personal list of precepts.

I can’t do that.

The internet is far from an anonymous storehouse of ideas and I have no desire to see others walking around in my head, which brings up a few rules governing the use of precepts, if you want to take advantage of this system of self-regulation.

Keep it private

Your personal set of precepts can be very embarrassing and give someone with ill intent way too much insight into how to manipulate you personally. Don’t give them this leverage.

A common SJW tactic for indoctrinating new students at university is to get a religious person with a strong conventional background intoxicated, or high, and then get them to do something that violates their upbringing. This can include forms of bodily mutilation as well. The SJW then beats their target over their head with their sin until they break. Now they have a new convert as the target is too ashamed to go back to their original way of life.

Avoid this by not letting anyone else know what your red lines are. Stay on task and do not waste your time engaging people looking to undermine you. As one of my teachers once said, “stop with the rubbish talk.”

Be generous with others and ruthless with yourself

Precepts reflect the path of will. This is your life, your journey, and your struggle. Frankly, no one else really cares what you do with your life as long as it doesn’t hurt them. You need to, though. From what I’ve gathered it is really hard to get here in the first place. Make it count. Or as one of my teachers once said,

> There comes a time in your life when you will know what it is you will do. What it is you will be. A tingling in your spine and a wave of power washes through you. Hold to this. Embrace this. Become this. As a human being you have the power of the gods in your veins and they envy you. Make them envy you. When you die, do not pass through the heavenly gates with a whimper. Come screaming through with a vitality that is the culmination of all you are. Tomorrow is always there even in death. Today is the moment you are in right now and you will never have it again.

The “be generous” part comes from the fact that most people live their entire lives in the West in a state of perpetual adolescence. They are not adults and cannot be held to the same standard. Likewise, their advice is generally not worth anything.

Keep it positive, unless you have no choice

Going with a negative precept that prevents you from doing something you really like doing will create conflict in your life. Sometimes, you can only describe something from a negative standpoint. Or as Phil in the Hangover said, “We tend to do dumb shit when we’re fucked up.”

In any event, if holding to a given precept makes you angry, depressed, or upset all the time, you need to do some serious reflection on why that is and figure it out.

This is not bad in and of itself, just be aware you are entering territory that brings trouble with it.

Differentiate between a short-term goal and the life you want to build

Nothing’s wrong with programming in some short-term goals and precepts can change over time as you integrate something into your life completely, just be wise enough to know the difference.

If you are prone to addiction, no longer avoiding intoxicants is probably a formula for trouble and it will need to be a permanent precept. But once you have checked off that MBA you are working on, you can take it off your list.

A sample list of precepts

1. I will engage in one hour of physical activity per day – if you tend to sit on the couch all day, start with this one

2. I will eat low carb six days per week – if you are a fatass the one day off per week will maintain your sanity

3. I will emit one time per week by myself – this is the anti-masturbation clause and will get you to put more energy into game

4. I will avoid intoxicants – no better way to say, “I will avoid the hard stuff,” for smoking “I am a non-smoker” works well

5. I will commit no murder – note the difference between murder and killing

6. I will confront evil and destroy all demons – if you tend to chicken out a lot in the fact of violence use this, however it may cause you to get your ass kicked or worse

7. I will protect innocents – real men do this

8. I will honor God – enough said

9. I will be productive – get out of your mother’s basement and do something

10. I will honor my family – hard to do when they are knuckleheads, not the same thing as giving in to the stupid things they want you to do (i.e. giving your alcoholic dad money for booze)

11. I will aid those in need that follow my lead – if someone wants your help they need to do what you tell them

12. I will sleep eight hours per night when possible – as Charles Atlas said, ”nothing good happens after 10 p.m,” and long-term a lack of sleep is really bad for you

13. I will release on at least one item per day – a reference to a specific meditative technique used to clear out your emotional system

14. I will practice every day for at least five minutes – a reminder to hone your art no matter what

15. I will meditate at least three times per week – a reminder to practice

16. I will avoid pornography and prostitutes – both are a waste of time and destructive to the soul

17. I will always seek to educate myself further – if you are stuck in life it is either a problem with effort or knowledge

18. I will teach those that ask – teaching is a pain, good people do it anyway

19. I will only take what belongs to me – don’t steal

20. I will not covet another man’s wife, house, or possessions – desire can make you its slave in record time, avoid this

21. I will tell the truth or say nothing – if you have a problem with lying

22. I will abide by the laws of divine reward and retribution – the way you live your life tends to attract the same, or “the more I practiced, the luckier I got”

23. I will mentor younger men – good men do this, just make sure the younger man is up to it

24. I will work to be physically strong – the benefit is in the process in terms of what it does for you

25. I will be competent in the bearing of arms – nothing expands your presence like the knowledge that you are not a victim

26. I will fight others with ridicule, shame, the law, and force in that order – if you tend to think with your fists, take this to heart

27. I will earn my MBA/MD/PhD/welder's certificate as soon as possible – school sucks, just get it done

Aside from these, you can get creative regarding what you want your life to look like. Just keep in mind that this is the whole point of precepts in the first place.

Read More: Why You Need To Set Your Precepts For A Productive Life

Rórdán Phobos
Rórdán Phobos is a former airman who has travelled to over 40 countries, lives in a converted barn and once travelled to Srinagar to buy his grandfather a Kashmiri carpet for his 92nd birthday. When he isn't building armies, or police forces, in the third world he can be found in a bar talking to your girl. For training and advice in the yogic arts go to yogicengineering.com

Wellness SJW Belle Gibson Confirms Faking Cancer To Steal Money

April 23, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Again, ROK has been proven right. A feminist "icon", once hailed as a "Fun Fearless Female", has been outed.

Belle Gibson, the "entrepreneur" and "cancer survivor" I introduced you to last month, has admitted she faked multiple cancers and having had heart surgery. Several years ago, she rose to international prominence for claiming she had treated her one-of-a-kind terminal brain cancer by simply eating whole foods and avoiding the normal "processed" diet, indulging in all sorts of super foods and "self-healing" strategies.

She then cultivated a self-help, "cancer-beating" recipe empire, vowing to donate a large chunk of her profits to charity. By this time, thousands of panicking cancer sufferers, other seriously diseased people, or those just wanting to help a good cause had purchased her product. Apple was so enthralled that they intended to feature The Whole Pantry as a default Apple Watch app.

It was too good to be true

However, serious problems later emerged in Gibson's story, such as inflating her age, alleging her cancer had spread to multiple organs, and citing a form of brain cancer medical professionals said they never knew anyone had survived. She was also caught consuming beer, pizza, and all manner of clearly non-healing foods on social media.

Vowing repeatedly to give more information about the "lies" being spread about her, she finally acknowledged this week that she made everything up. Because of her selfishness and sociopathy, she has risked the health of thousands of people who followed her non-medically based approaches to fighting cancer and other diseases.

Now The Australian Women's Weekly, that lovely paper rag which claims to be feminist but makes a living out of objectifying other women and paying for interviews with the mistresses of convicted killers, has courted Belle Gibson. She has been given an outlet to cry that it's her childhood that scarred her.

After all, she had to look after her autistic brother as a girl. She even had no toys as a child! Therefore that justifies a calamitous scam involving around a million dollars, including both the donations and the money she made "legitimately" by saying the rest would go to charity.

I'm certainly convinced by Belle's mea culpa, how about you?

Why aren't police charging Belle Gibson with pervasive fraud?

Aside from scamming, Belle Gibson's biggest skill set is applying make-up and airbrushing to take herself from a 3 to a 5.5.

Rather than just the $300,000 (and whatever else was promised that we don't know of), Belle Gibson's entire sales were built on fraud. When you solicit sales promising a certain high percentage will go to charity, even the proportion you did not offer to organisations has been garnered through outright deception. She has likely made $1.2 million from the scam, based on her prior claim that 25 percent of sales had already been given to charity.

But police won't be going after our darling Belle. Tragically, whilst poor senior citizens are apprehended for shoplifting in Victoria when they're poverty-stricken or have dementia, Gibson can escape scot-free from criminal charges for a calculated cancer fraud over many years. A couple of loaves of bread versus $300,000 in charity donations and $1 million in falsely accrued app sales.

The best we can hope for is civil charges via the Victorian consumer watchdog. And given her knack for fraud, Belle is well capable of concealing any money she still hasn't splurged to avoid paying what should be (but probably won't be) a substantial fine.

Truth be told, we cannot blame the police. They are responding to their own experiences with the judicial system, where judges routinely grant bail to or avoid convicting all manner of people who belong permanently in jail, whilst convicting men for rape and domestic violence based on hearsay.

Denying female agency

I'd be laughing too if I made off with a fraud of about $1.2 million.

The AWW has presented an entirely sympathetic portrait of poor, vilified Belle. She's a victim of either her family or its circumstances and her mother just expected too much of her.

Just like likely pathological liar Jackie Coakley, who is still referred to as a victim, Belle Gibson is, with the help of the media, refocusing attention on her "victimhood." No matter how many lives you affect with false, purely attention-seeking criminal accusations or charity and medical scams, as a previously recognized female SJW, you are still supposedly deserving of support for and mitigation of your "mistakes."

Congratulations, AWW, you have obfuscated the crimes of a fabulist:

> During the interviews, whenever challenged, Belle cried easily and muddled her words.

This is called self-pity, AWW, and it's a superb, effective tactic employed by not only victimized and truly persecuted women, but also manipulative, delusional, and, in this case, outright fraudulent and sociopathic ones. By mentioning this, all the publication is trying to do is to provoke sympathy in readers. Poor Belle, the hard-working mother-of-one now exposed to the media spotlight she first cultivated herself to make ill-gotten riches!

After that comes the attempt by the journalist, Clair Weaver, to ask whether Belle is even guilty of any wrongdoing:

> All of which begs the question: is this young woman really capable of masterminding one of the biggest hoaxes in recent history?

She told millions of people she had the rarest of terminal cancers, built a business around it and pathologically lied for years to make a fortune, but the AWW still doesn't believe or wants to doubt that Belle Gibson is a scammer.

With no similarly remunerating skills bar scamming, Belle Gibson enjoyed a life of outright luxury, including a BMW, $2,000 designer handbags, first-class international travel and living in an expensive beachfront property.

Belle Gibson was happy for cancer victims to die

The sociopathy of Jackie Coakley (pictured) and Belle Gibson presents a cogent argument for simultaneous and multiple reincarnations.

Aside from defrauding thousands of people, Gibson, like a true sociopath, steered sufferers of terminal and other diseases away from proven or more effective treatments. It is impossible to quantify the number of people whose lives she has endangered or outright ended with her pseudo-science. This was all done for her own (substantial) profit and popularity, which she clearly craved more than not threatening the safety of desperately sick and miserable people.

The fact that the AWW has interviewed Belle Gibson, and not a cancer sufferer who abstained from treatment because of her charlatan advice, demonstrates that SJW privilege is alive and well. Forget the real victims. If you claim you want to change the world and be an empowered woman, you can't be that bad. Notice that even after being exposed as a fraud, she continues to court the attention she so desperately seeks.

Expose them and then kick them to the ground

Perfectly brutal but legal methods are needed to prevent woefully narcissistic scams such as Belle Gibson's. From a utilitarian perspective, the need to protect the truly vulnerable, such as cancer sufferers, outweighs any need to respect the vanity and sociopathy of someone who preys on them for profit.

The same goes for the innocent victims of false rape accusations such as at Duke University and the UVA fraternity, or the utterly blameless business maliciously targeted by Ellen Pao.

Belle Gibson should be a well-deserved pariah until the day she leaves this world. But before that, she needs to be charged and imprisoned for her crimes. You know she would if she were a man.

Read More: Is This "Inspiration To Women" Faking Cancer And Stealing Hundreds Of Thousands Of Dollars?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 More Things That Enable Women To Avoid Taking Responsibility For Their Decisions

April 23, 2015 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Women are designed to suck resources out of men, both materially and immaterially. This is all well and good in a traditionalist nuclear family, but in a feminist-saturated society, women turn into absolute beasts. Women have to have the guiding hand of the patriarchy to give them boundaries, so I must agree with them when they complain, “Where have all the good men gone?”

We men have always been the builders of society, and most of the good men have turned into enablers. Women crave the real men of old, but feminism has taught them to be terrified of all that that implies.

I’ve touched on this before, but here are four more things a few select men have built that enable women to suck the immaterial wealth of avoiding personal responsibility for their actions.

1. Girly Drinks

The drink of choice for women and queers ever since James Bond replaced the gin in martinis with vodka.

There's a great line in the movie Crazy. Stupid. Love. Alpha playboy Ryan Gosling sees recently separated father Steve Carrell in an upscale urban night club drinking himself stupid and loudly complaining about his cheating wife. Gosling comes over to give him the red pill treatment, telling him,

> "You're sitting there with a Supercuts hair cut, you're getting drunk on watered Vodka Cranberries like a fourteen year old girl and you're wearing a forty four when you should be wearing a forty two regular. Honestly, I don't know if I should help you or I should euthanize you."

Carrell's character drinks like my father. Women love vodka because by definition it is supposed to be flavorless. While personally I respect a girl who has the earthiness to drink something whiskey-based, vodka is only for the cool girls and the wannabes.

Water down alcohol with tonic and give it a little fruit flavor, and suddenly girls think they can drink like the big boys. Smirnoff's is like potato chips; you cannot have just one. Girlie drinks are so light that you can chug them more easily than most beers. And of course, the more alcohol one drinks, the more one craves.

So women are getting wasted on fruity drinks as though it's just lemonade. Obviously this makes it much easier for a woman to cheat on her man, as women cannot hold their booze at all. To quote the movie The Break-Up,

> "Apple martinis. That normally does the trick. But just two. Three, she'll get sloppy and you'll become a baby-sitter."

But even if her man is watching her the whole time, she can still easily lose all social tact. Men become more warm-hearted and generous when drunk, and women become vicious and horny. Alcohol is the great androgynizer.

That being said, girls with no sense of personal shame are not always a bad thing. Later on in the movie, Gosling goes on to give Carrell such wisdom as,

> "The war between the sexes is over. We won the second women started doing pole dancing for exercise."

2. That Stupid Fucking Carrie Underwood Song

Several years ago on the Naso family cruise, most of my extended family was in the karaoke lounge, since attention whoring runs in the family genes. Sheila decides that out of all the thousands of songs available to sing, she wants to sing "Before He Cheats" by Carrie Underwood, written by men Chris Tompkins and Josh Kear.

It's a less than charming ballad of a woman who destroys her man's car because she has a suspicion that he's cheating. Women sing it together as an anthem of girl empowerment to compensate for the lack of control they have over their own miserable lives.

So already I have a problem with women singing this song. But that night Sheila showed us the true nature of the female rationalization hamster. Sheila had left her first husband to marry my father shortly before asking Jesus to forgive her. The reason? Because her first husband was infertile.

So she's literally the family whore, and she's getting up on stage in front of the whole extended family without any self-awareness or shame and singing about what she would do if my father ever did what she did to her own spouse.

3. Award-Winning Dramas That Are Secretly Horror Films

Namely Forrest Gump and Titanic.

In the movie Forrest Gump, a woman named Jenny just a few steps short of mental retardation has decades-long oneitis for a man named Forrest who was friendly to her when they were children. He spends his youth sleeping with bad girls and taking hard drugs, contracting HIV in the process. Decades later he sleeps with her one night but leaves before she wakes up.

Just kidding. That's what the film would have been had they switched the sexes. The actual film had the woman be the terrible human being to a borderline retarded man, so everyone just thought it was a sweet love story.

During that one night stand, Jenny gets pregnant and doesn't tell Forrest until the child is five years old and she's near death. She marries Forrest so he can take care of her during her last few months of life.

They wouldn't celebrate so hard if they knew what was really going on.

Titanic is little better. A young woman named Rose decides to marry a wealthy man whom she is completely uninterested in and spends all her time pouting so she can passive-aggressively ruin everyone else's mood. While on the cruise ship, street rat Jack comes along and takes her virginity. Then when they are floating in the cold north Atlantic, Jack freezes to death in the water while Rose sits on a door singing to herself.

Eighty years later, treasure hunters invite her onto their ship so she can explain where a diamond necklace is. For the first time in her life, she tells the story of Jack to these complete strangers after hiding it her whole life from her late husband whom the viewer never sees. I'm assuming she was a flapper chick, because she had to have some explanation for why she should get a diamond without a hymen.

So after spending three hours telling her life story, the treasure hunters have a change of heart for no explained reason and decide to give up exploration. Then it turns out that Rose has had the diamond necklace in her pocket this whole time. Instead of selling it to feed all of India, she drops it into the ocean out of memory for this sweaty fucking she got nearly a century ago, perfectly demonstrating that women have no sense of the internal value of things.

I don't know why women find those two films so inspiring. To me, they're horror films. But I suppose "that's just a man's opinion."

4. Credit Cards

Credit cards are like knives and power tools. They can be very useful when needed for things like repairs, but they are deadly when not handled with the highest concern for safety. Do you let your wife use your metal grinder or Sawzall? If the answer is no, then why in hell did you give her the family credit card?

But I'm being too hard on the husbands in this one. A woman doesn't even need a hard-working man to spend herself into crushing debt. The credit card companies are ready and willing to send her colorful letters with percentage rates and abbreviations she doesn't care to understand.

Credit card companies, like nearly everything that makes money, are run by men. You and I didn't create Visa, but some man did. It's easy to slut-shame and fat-shame girls, but credit cards are so private that we cannot easily cast stones at women who piss away money they'll never have.

But then again, can we really feel sorry for these women? They know their own tendencies to spend without concern, and they choose to stay single or find a beta provider who will never challenge them.

Fathers, marry off your daughters when they are young and debt-free. You don't give an alcoholic a drink, and you don't give a woman a credit card.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

How The Welfare State Will Ruin Us All

April 23, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

According to one school of economic thought, each of us is a Homo economicus—a cold, calculated actor seeking to maximize pleasure and avoid discomfort while expending an absolute minimum of effort.

Despite implying that the humans are no better than amoebas, this school of thought took significant hold in the late 19th century and even influenced such economists as Vilfredo Pareto, known for his 80-20 rule.

"Gobble… gobble… more welfare…"

This theory has been largely abandoned today, as it tended to dismiss whatever data didn't neatly fit into its mechanistic model. Simply put, it presumed people were orderly cogs in a machine that could be easily turned and manipulated by the unseen hand, for their own good, of course.

Today, we have behavioral economics, which essentially acknowledges free will by combining psychological and cognitive research with understanding of market dynamics to explain why people make the choices they do.

Welcome to the grinder

However, there is a looming influence that wants to revert the human economic actors back to their most primitive form and remove all agency from them, limiting their free will and providing them with just enough money to survive, but not thrive. This influence is the government with its welfare programs.

Boiled down to its essence, welfare represents undiluted social justice—to equalize wealth among everyone by using appeals to emotion, coercion, or pure violence. Simply naming a program "Aid to Families with Dependent Children" is generally enough to get it widely accepted and enforced unquestioningly. Wait, are you against helping the needy children?

She is holding a sign? Let me get my wallet

Obviously, no matter how we call the welfare program, wealth won't get generated out of thin air—it simply gets redistributed between a larger number of parties. The wealth still needs to be created for the government to control it. This wealth includes material goods, products, and services, all created by actual hard-working people.

The devious way a government controls wealth indirectly is by producing the currency which is used in the market by unwitting buyers and sellers instead of real goods and services. The truth is that money produced by the government has no value, except the one we assume it has. This is exactly why Bitcoin was created and why the governments around the world are wary of it.

Though physical Bitcoins ruin the fun of it

In an ideal world, the producers of goods and services would print their own currencies, in a 1:1 ratio. This means that for each bill printed, there would be a backing of a single unit of goods or services by that producer. However, when the government, which doesn't produce anything substantial, gives itself the exclusive right to print the currency, the result is always inflation and the destruction of purchasing power. There are more and more bills to go around, but they are worth less and less.

Note that only those who belong to the elite layer of the society can actually avoid having their wealth redistributed, by using their connections and knowledge of the system, which leaves the middle class between the hammer and the anvil. The welfare represents taking wealth from the middle class, dragging it down into poverty, and giving it to the poor, while doing very little or nothing to actually improve their lives.

Pictured: searing hot middle class

Welfare programs create an environment in which careless women get supported for their lifestyle choices and absolved of any responsibility by the government, using the wealth of men she will never meet and towards whom she has no obligations whatsoever. The government will make sure that these men continue to be the collective husbands of women, whether they like it or not.

It is easy to justify welfare and other wealth-distributing methods as a noble way to uplift the society, but the problem is that this should be a personal choice of the individual, rather than a mandate. If a person is strong-armed into donating to some purpose, then the very essence of that purpose becomes questionable.

Uncle Sam wants your coin in its treasure chest

It’s in the nature of men to be rebellious, challenge the authorities, break the rules, and play the game of life whichever way they please. This unpredictability scares the government, which aims to create a heavy net of rules and regulations that is supposed to force men into behaving as is expected.

The latest example of this is Obamacare, which was actually created to surreptitiously tax the “unbreakables,” a demographic of young adult males with no health insurance, and redirect their money to the healthcare system, which mostly benefits women.

Instead of taming women, a modern Western government tries to give them all the benefits a man has, without imposing any restrictions on them. This makes women absolutely entitled, obnoxious, and unworthy of any long-term male attention. Men withdraw from the society, working just enough to avoid murderous tax rates, the marriage rate plummets and the happiness of women takes a nosedive.

To keep women happy, the government initiates another program that benefits them at the expense of men, financed by money created out of thin air, and the cycle continues.

The debt avalanche is unstoppable

Eventually, the entire system has to collapse as men wise up to the game and refuse to breed another generation of economic slaves to women in this marriage by proxy. To satisfy its female voters, the government will have to resort to more and more ludicrous methods of forcing the men to create wealth (including children), until there is an outright revolution.

It’s impossible to predict the exact breaking point, but keep an eye on welfare programs and enjoy the decline in the meantime.

Read More: You’re A Monster If You Don’t Support The Welfare State

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Why Body Image Messaging Can Shed Light On The Fragile Female Mind

April 23, 2015 | by Soren Andersen | Link | Original Link

A commonly and vociferously launched feminist argument is that advertisements create an unrealistic expectation of what a woman's body should look like. This is often portrayed as an attack on a woman's psyche, unjustly demanding that they should all look like supermodels.

Ironically, in a world where advertisement manages to sway the masses to just about anything, including deciding who gets elected to public office, this is the one hot button topic where it is absolutely demanded that media control and impact is acknowledged. Feminists and white knights will frequently and enthusiastically proclaim that media influence over a woman's body is excessive, not rooted in reality, and simply used to mislead and devalue them.

They are missing a key issue within their own claim. This is an issue that not physically or superficially devalues women, but rather exposes blatant frailty within their minds.

To accept and defend this stance, and most agree they do, is to openly say that women are actively and effectively being controlled by media. Furthermore, it states that they are not just controlled, but controlled to such a point that they will subject themselves to drastic measures like bulimia, anorexia, abuse of diet pills, and a number of other unhealthy trimming techniques.

To be clear, those disorders can be triggered in a number of psychological ways, but in this article we are focusing on their manifestation solely based on media assault feminists claim women to be under.

The lady will have the water salad.

It goes without saying that a fit look can be achieved by alternative, healthier means, with equal or superior results, but such pesky logic has no place within feminist outrage. The focus is on the woman who is being told, by evil patriarchal media, that she needs to do these things.

This “control” and “forcing” is considered applicable to enough women that it warranted making it a mainstream SJW issue. The focus of the outrage is women who feel they are being manipulated by being subjected to images of women in better shape. The obvious fallacy at hand is the complete dismissal of the existence of women who actually do want to be, and are, healthier.

Perhaps even more perplexing is the dismissal of wanting to pursue a more physically active lifestyle for the sake of simply being healthier for one’s own sake. How many times have you overheard a 200+ lbs woman bashing “toothpick” women who only weigh in the low 100’s? There seems to be a mathematical disconnect in size perception, which has been reflected in choice of news anchors on various TV stations where dolled up “plus sized” personalities are becoming more and more common.

Mens sana in corpore…….sano?

The far bigger point to be made lies within the feminist stance on this itself. If we accept their view one hundred percent and get on board defending these “victims” who subject themselves to all sort of physical malady because of very superficial media influence, then what exactly are we saying about these women? We are saying that not only are they controlled by the media, but also that they are controlled to such a severe degree that they will choose to drastically and negatively impact their own bodies and well-being because said media told them to.

This is not a minor point to consider and acknowledge, and can only exist if one of two scenarios is true. First, normal and healthy women are so easily swayed by media that they will ruin their own bodies and health. This suggests that their “normal” state is incredibly frail and subject to change on a whim. Second, they never possessed stable mental health in the first place, which is why when someone told them to ruin their health for the sake of mimicking a runway model, they eagerly obeyed.

“Jen was a perfectly normal, intelligent, sane young woman, until magazines and TV told her she has to resort to anorexic behavior, and she did.”

Or

“Jen never was a free thinker in the first place, so naturally, when she realized runway models are skinnier than she is, she stopped eating for two weeks.”

The face of the oppressed

Those claiming this media oppression upon a woman’s body image need to be very careful when taking such a stance. What else in the media are women this strongly controlled by? How can one relatively minor example of media control be passionately held up for acknowledgement, without the realization that acknowledging this makes those in question absolute media acolytes or minions?

If you are blindly following orders to destroy your body and health, what other orders will you blindly follow and do follow? What does that say about your state of mind and how much of a voice should you be given in an adult conversation?

Can anyone claim that a group subject to body image messaging to the point of ruining their own health, would not be automatically suspect to exhibiting that same frailty of mind in other circumstances, like voting for one candidate over another, choosing how to spend money, or simply sanely interacting with other people?

Read More: #Freethenipple Is Another Example Of Female Narcissism And Armchair Activism

Soren Andersen
Soren has been a nomad since he was eight. He spends his time between Europe, the US, and the Caribbean while road biking and surviving corporate America.

6 Logical Fallacies You Can Expect From Feminists And SJWs

April 24, 2015 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Logic and reason have never been the strong points of feminists and the social justice crowd. Really, we are truly overwhelmed by how often they slander, sabotage, and twist around our arguments with their childish bickering, profanity-laced tirades, and all-round third rate debating skills.

You can learn about a wide range of logical fallacies right here, but there are six specific fallacies which feminists and social justice warriors are particularly prone to use whenever they land on a manosphere website. Did you write an article about short hair, eating disorders, or ugly tattoos? Chances are you might become acquainted with a few (if not all) of these fallacies in a single counter-argument.

1. The Strawman fallacy

Is this your husband? Because you speak of him all the time…

The Strawman fallacy, or sometimes laughably called the "Straw Person" fallacy by SJWs who get all riled up on gender neutrality issues, is the deliberate exaggeration and misrepresentation of somebody's argument. This is the first fallacy explored in this article precisely because it's also the most commonly used by our opponents. Jesus H. Christ, do the feminists and social justice warriors ever love to strawman.

To showcase a prominent example of this fallacy, Ana Kasparian (the stuck-up talking head of "The Young Turks" fame) presents a lengthy tirade against Roosh's article "No One Would Have Died If PUAHate Killer Elliot Rodger Learned Game" in the upcoming video, which aired back in 2014.

Of particular interest, she attacks a segment of his article which is read between the 2:00 – 2:35 minute marker. At this point, Ana exaggerates and misrepresents Roosh's statement to such an extent, that she thinks (that he thinks) the female victims of Elliot Rodger's rampage "deserved to get shot and deserved to get attacked."

C'mon missy. You and I both damn well know that Roosh did not say, nor imply, anything to that matter.

2. Ad hominem

All of you “Kings” have tiny penises!

“Ad Hominem” is attacking somebody’s character or personality traits in a much more confrontational attempt to undermine their argument. With many feminists and SJW’s being naturally profane, degenerate, and all-around insufferable human beings, using ad hominem attacks against the manosphere comes naturally for them.

Be on the lookout for exclamations that we all have “tiny penises”, that we should all go “jump off a cliff,” that we are “fetid little trolls,” and all other colorful variations of misandry mayhem coming out of their sewer chutes.

3. Anecdotal evidence

Or your short hair and tattoos…

Anecdotes are personal experiences or isolated examples given as testimony from a third party. Their counter-argument generally has the implied purpose of demeaning or giving less credibility to the original argument, while at the same time offering no compelling evidence to back up their claims.

Matt Forney's world famous article "5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken" is absolutely brimming with anecdotes from SJW's as to why (they think) his article is complete rubbish, even though there are a lot of truths within the piece. The hilariously cut-and-paste formula for their rebuttal goes a little something like this…

> As a woman with _____ tattoos and ____ piercings, I will have you know I am not _____ and I am not a _____. I am happily _____ with _____ children and I am a _____, _____, and _____ person. I was educated at the finest _____ where I studied _____. My tattoo is not _____, it is _____ and _____. I got it after a _____-changing experience where I visited _____ and _____ with the _____.
> You are a vicious _____ and a _____, and I hope you _____.

4. Cherry Picking

This is a bad cherry, so all of your cherries must be bad!

Also known as the "Texas sharpshooter fallacy," this is a false cause fallacy in which someone takes a very small cluster of data (usually a single sentence in an otherwise lengthy article or video) to suit their own argument.

In the case of feminists and SJW's when they are attacking the manosphere, this is often with the intention of discrediting the article or video in it's entirety. One particularly "bad" sentence could be all it takes to trigger a full-on doxing witch hunt.

Cherry picking is a kind of fallacy of selective attention, and since paying full attention and listening to reason are major hurdles for our opponents, expect plenty of this fallacious fruit to be harvested from your written and spoken words.

5. Appeal to emotion

but but but……. my feewings!

Appeal to emotion, or more fancifully known as "argumentum ad passiones," is a logical fallacy characterized by the manipulation of the recipient's emotions in order to win an argument, especially in the absence of factual evidence. Everyone (barring sociopaths) has emotions, and are certainly capable of letting those emotions conflict with logic.

However, because women are far more emotionally driven creatures than men, appeals to emotion are a massive problem for them. Go back to a Return of Kings classic like "Girls With Short Hair Are Damaged" and you can observe the flood of butthurt female commentary which is bursting with emotional zeal. And to think it's all over short hair…

6. Tu Quoque

You're a turd sandwich! No, YOU'RE a turd sandwich!!

Pronounced as '"too-kwo-kwee" and also known as the "appeal to hypocrisy," this fallacy literally translates as "you too" or "back to you." It is usually employed as an effective, though incredibly immature, red herring in order to take the heat off of someone having to defend their argument.

By doing so, they not only prevent the debate from proceeding any further, but in their warped minds they will consider themselves the "winner" just as long as they make the final insult.

The "Giant Douche versus Turd Sandwich" presidential debate from a popular 2004 episode of South Park captured a tu quoque standoff flawlessly. Poor Turd Sandwich, he simply cannot accept an irrefutable truth about himself.

Conclusion

Finally, we must we honest with ourselves. Everybody uses logical fallacies when laying out their arguments at some stage. Even among ourselves on Return of Kings. “Cherry picking” a single sentence for scrutiny, at the expense of an otherwise good article, happens on a fairly regular basis. There’s no doubt it’s irksome to the authors who spent many hours composing the piece.

The best we can hope to do is keep our own fallacies to a minimum, both in their frequency and the intensity of their damage. Still, there is no denying that the bastard children of the Frankfurt School, feminists and SJW’s, use fallacious attacks far more often than we could ever fathom.

After all, their ideologies are all based around lies and deceit anyway.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

Farah Brook Films Herself Sexually Harassing And Assaulting Men

April 24, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

An “aspiring comedienne,” Farah Brook, recently filmed herself trying to forcibly kiss multiple men (and a sole woman) in New York City. The reason? She wanted a film role. Even more attempts to kiss were actually made, ones which didn’t make the final cut, including a “f— off” from a clearly annoyed target.

Social and mainstream media responses were mixed, but a large number, including Time and the UK’s Mirror, found the “stunt” highly entertaining. What these outlets did not reveal, however, is that many men have been arrested, convicted, and even jailed for either attempted or completed forced kissing.

The subject in question

Brook is a compulsive, retrograde attention-seeker, having filmed herself propositioning and attempting to forced-kiss multiple people without even the possibility for misconstruing consent. If her name were Frank Brook and “he” had tried to kiss just one woman, an arrest, booking, fingerprinting, DNA sample-taking and conviction by a court for indecency or sexual assault would have followed, potentially involving jail time. But given this “experiment” centered on multiple people being accosted, the implications for a man would have been much worse.

Supporters or minimizers of Brook’s behavior will point out that no film exists of her actually kissing someone against their will. Firstly, we have no idea that this didn’t happen. Brook's poor rationalizations for her harassing actions (see below) indicates that her retelling of the non-included footage should be regarded with extreme caution.

Secondly, just because people are able to avoid her lips in the video doesn't mitigate that what has happened is a thorough attempt at sexual assault and substantiated sexual harassment. In fact, sexual assault, like its physical cousin, need not involve physical contact, as the examples of arrested men prove.

And finally, considering that feminists now regard cat-calling and merely looking at the female form as sexual harassment (or sexual "violence" even!), how do we view someone actively trying to kiss, without warning, multiple people she's asked directions from?

This man had to physically push Brook away by the forehead to prevent her kissing him.

Colleges and feminists define "forced kissing" as sexual assault

You already know that in practice this means when men who do it, not women.

The Campus Sexual Assault (CSA) Study (2007): Forced kissing and attempted forced kissing, along with many verbal comments, are included as sexual assault.

Women's Resource Center of the River Valley: "Sexual assault… is unwanted kissing."

Rochester Institute of Technology (RIT): "In most states the following are considered acts of sexual assault… [f]orced kissing"

I could go on and on. You get the picture. Brook is behaving in ways that would get young men banned from college on a de facto permanent basis, staining their long-term earning potential and social relations in perpetuity. But she gets off because she's a woman and, to boot, a woman trying to get ahead in the supposedly rampantly sexist world of “comedy.”

Brook’s justifications are equally preposterous. “I wanted to do something positive that involved love,” she cooed to The New York Daily News. Picture the incredulous faces if a man made that claim appearing before a college tribunal or outside one after a mistaken kiss or attempted kiss with a fellow female student, let alone with a dozen or so classmates.

The 10 hours in New York hypocrisy

“Men got arrested for the things I did? But I’m just a girl! Hi hi hi hi!”

Remember Shoshanna Roberts, the struggling actress who wanted to spruik herself under the guise of raising so-called “sexual harassment” awareness? When her video was released, feminists and other SJWs frothed at the mouth in order to pillory men, especially lower socio-economic, “ghetto-looking” African-Americans.

There has been no similar reaction to Farah Brook, who physically tried to sexually assault men. She wasn’t making comments or just looking, like the majority of men in Roberts’ contrived video. The silence given this distinction is deafening.

Brook has done the world a huge favor, though, despite her displayed sexual harassment (and assaults), because she filmed the double standard and laid it bare for all of us to see.

Men have been arrested or convicted for TRYING to kiss women

Mohammad Rasooly was convicted in March of sexual assault in southern England for trying to kiss a girl. The court placed him on the sex offenders’ registry for five years. He additionally lost his job, was sentenced to fifty hours of unpaid community work, and is being subjected to a year-long community order, including six months of correctional supervision.

Across the Atlantic, Carlos Chuva was arrested this year in Brook's very own New York City for allegedly caressing the face and thigh of a woman, and trying to kiss her. The charge is first-degree felony sexual assault. Physical contact was purportedly made here, but the attempts to kiss were obviously part of the quantum of the claimed sexual assault.

It extends to sexual assault now, too.

Also in March, an Italian in Japan was arrested for trying to kiss a local Japanese woman on her forehead.

Back in Britain again, a man was detained this year on suspicion of trying to kiss a 16-year-old girl in his vehicle after offering her a lift. Whatever your opinion on grown men picking up 16-year-olds in cars is, the issue here was not to do with her age.

The question remains: why was Brook spared such an arrest? With the exception of the allegations against Chuva, all evidence suggests that Brook's behavior was more rampant, premeditated, and excessive than any of the other three descriptions. Most importantly, it was caught right on camera and disseminated by Brook herself for the purposes of "entertainment."

Her video would lead a reasonable person to label Brook a serial sexual harasser and assaulter

There's a big difference between an attempted kiss on a dance floor with a girl you've flirted with, and going up to a complete stranger and trying to kiss her. Brook's saving grace, having taken up the latter variety of sexual harassment, is her vagina. She should have been, like so many other men, arrested, charged and convicted for public indecency and sexual assault.

If Brook ever speaks out on gender issues, or copies the fraudulent assertion à la Sarah Silverman that women in comedy are discriminated against, we can remind her of the sexism that saved her from a criminal conviction and becoming a social pariah. That criminal conviction is the fate always reserved for anyone possessing a penis in a similar situation.

Read More: 7 Risk-Reducing Tactics For The Sexually Promiscuous Man

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Things I Learned At This Year's American Renaissance Conference

April 24, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As my friend Blair Naso reported on Tuesday, we attended this year's American Renaissance conference, held last weekend at Montgomery Bell State Park near Nashville. I wanted to go because I've never been to one and figured it would be a hell of an adventure; the fact that I'm close friends with William Rome, a long-time AmRen attendee and insider, was also a factor.

While Blair gave a fair and balanced account of what went on that weekend, I've decided to offer my own take on AmRen and what I learned from it.

1. White nationalists are no different than other folks in this part of the Internet

It's easy to fall into the trap of judging an ideological clique based on their worst elements. I know I have a sketchy reputation among the more traditional elements of the alt-right based on my love of Filipino girls and derisive comments I've written about white nationalism in the past. In fact, I deliberately kept the fact that I was going to AmRen under wraps because I was unsure of the reaction I would get. The fact that Taylor himself has criticized ROK and publisher Roosh didn't help either.

As it turns out, judging white nationalists based on the retards commenting on their blogs is like judging Return of Kings based on the human spambot commenters who can't go three syllables without blurting out "hypergamy" or "DON'T GET MARRIED!" like an autistic kindergartner on Red Bull.

Not only was everyone at AmRen civil and polite to me, I met quite a few folks who were fans of my writing. One of the biggest surprises was meeting Henry Wolff, Jared Taylor's assistant, and him telling me that he'd met Roosh at his DC meetup three years ago. In fact, the only people I disliked were a pair of geldings who were polite to my face—one of whom straight-up told me he had put the feud I'd had with them years ago in the past—but trashed me on their blog as soon as they got home.

As Rome pointed out to me over the weekend, the very structure of the conference deters Internet cranks. Beyond the cost-prohibitive registration and hotel reservation ($100 to register, $35 for the banquet, and $176 for the hotel room), the remote location—about 45 minutes from Nashville in the middle of nowhere—also throws a wrench in the works. The logistics of getting a room, getting a plane ride and/or car on top of the conference itself are too much for the average basement dweller to handle.

The reality is that aside from the differences in politics, white nationalists really aren't that different than the guys in the manosphere. At the end of the day, we all like to get drunk, party our asses off and don't take ourselves too seriously. For example, one of the highlights of the weekend was watching Scott Terry and Matt Parrott do a karaoke rendition of Depeche Mode's anti-racist anthem "People Are People" at a honky-tonk bar.

2. There's more diversity at an AmRen conference than among its leftist opponents

Despite being a white nationalist event, AmRen drew several minority attendees, including a cute black girl and a pair of Puerto Rican nationalists. They were welcomed in and treated no differently than the others. Conversely, the sad anti-racist demonstration on Saturday night was almost all white, save for Daryle Jenkins, the pudgy black race-baiter who organized both the protest and an "Anti-Racism Unconference" earlier in the day.

Not only were the anti-racist protesters more deficient in melanin than the attendees, they were visibly demoralized. While I didn't attend last year's AmRen, William Rome produced a mini-documentary about it (currently not online), part of which featured a fired-up gang of freaks admonishing the "Nazis" to "remember Stalingrad" and other inflammatory slogans.

This year, the best they could manage was "No Hate in Our State" and "Racists Are Buttheads," and a couple of the protesters were so lazy they actually laid down in the grass while holding up their signs.

Between the flaccid protest and the record attendance at AmRen (according to Parrott and Taylor, the conference is on the verge of outgrowing the venue), it's clear that the culture is swinging towards the alt-right and manosphere's direction. I mean, "Racists Are Buttheads?" What are you, twelve?

3. The speakers are the least important part of the conference

While AmRen attracts attendees by billing its lineup of speakers, the reality is that the speakers are only really there in order to provide an excuse for people to mingle. The only speakers I saw were Peter Brimelow, RAMZPAUL, and part of Richard Spencer's speech. I also watched "The Great Debate," in which Brimelow and John Derbyshire bantered with Spencer and Sam Dickson on the usefulness of the U.S. government in preserving white America.

The real reason to go to AmRen—or any conference period—is to shake hands and make friends. The antics you can get up to in one weekend in the woods are incredible. For example, I blew off one of the speakers to smoke Cuban cigars outside with William Rome and Scott Terry. I also spent a couple of nights hanging with Blair, Rome, Parrott, Matthew Heimbach and others at a honky-tonk bar, which produced its own memorable moments (which Blair and I have already discussed).

Overall, while there some things I'd rather not have done (or had happen) over the weekend (some of which I'll talk about later), I had a blast at AmRen. In fact, I was so wasted from partying when the conference ended on Sunday that not only did I have the mother of all hangovers, I had a mysterious four-inch gash on the top of my head. The coup de grace was when I threw up in the toilet at a German restaurant where Rome and I were having lunch.

Verdict: AmRen is a ten out of ten, would vomit again.

Read More: I Attended The 2015 White Nationalist AmRen Conference

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Top Highlights From H.L. Mencken’s Writing Career

April 24, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This massive book was compiled by H.L. Mencken himself in his twilight days to highlight the best writing of his career. It’s neatly organized by category, making it easy to jump around to topics that you are most interested in.

In case the H.L. Mencken name is new to you, he was a renowned essayist and cultural commentator in America during the early 20th century, with a biting wit and devastating satire that is hard to find today. The ideas within his chrestomathy reveal that he can and should be considered the great grandfather of red pill thought due to how he excoriated the flaws of the sexes, democracy, and modern culture while wielding his sword at dubious historical beliefs. He bloodied the propaganda and lies of the time and was hated for it. Even to this day as he is commonly denounced as a ‘racist’ even though he attacked all creeds and groups.

Here are my favorite quotes and passages from the book:

Society

> The ideas that conquer the race most rapidly and arouse the wildest enthusiasm and are held most tenaciously are precisely the ideas that are most insane. This has been true since the first “advanced” gorilla put on underwear, cultivated a frown and began his first lecture tour, and it will be so until the high gods, tired of the farce at last, obliterate the race with one great, final blast of fire, mustard gas and streptococci.
>
> […]
>
> Civilization tends to dilute and cheapen all other hazards. Even war has been largely reduced to caution and calculation; already, indeed, it employs almost as many press agents, letter openers and generals as soldiers. But the duel of sex continues to be fought in the Berserker manner. Whoso approaches women still faces the immemorial dangers.

Truth

> He is chronically and unescapably deceived, not only by the other animals and by the delusive face of nature herself, but also and more particularly by himself— by his incomparable talent for searching out and embracing what is false, and for overlooking and denying what is true.
>
> The capacity for discerning the essential truth, in fact, is as rare among men as it is common among crows, bullfrogs and mackerel. The man who shows it is a man of quite extraordinary quality— perhaps even a man downright diseased. Exhibit a new truth of any natural plausibility before the great masses of men, and not one in ten thousand will suspect its existence, and not one in a hundred thousand will embrace it without a ferocious resistance.
>
> All the durable truths that have come into the world within historic times have been opposed as bitterly as if they were so many waves of smallpox, and every individual who has welcomed and advocated them, absolutely without exception, has been denounced and punished as an enemy of the race.
>
> […]
>
> In whole departments of human inquiry it seems to me quite unlikely that the truth ever will be discovered . Nevertheless, the rubber-stamp thinking of the world always makes the assumption that the exposure of an error is identical with the discovery of the truth— that error and truth are simply opposites. They are nothing of the sort. What the world turns to, when it has been cured of one error, is usually simply another error, and maybe one worse than the first one . This is the whole history of the intellect in brief. The average man of today does not believe in precisely the same imbecilities that the Greek of the Fourth Century before Christ believed in, but the things that he does believe in are often quite as idiotic.

> […]
>
> There is, year by year, a gradual accumulation of what may be called, provisionally, truths— there is a slow accretion of ideas that somehow manage to meet all practicable human tests, and so survive. But even so, it is risky to call them absolute truths. All that one may safely say of them is that no one, as yet, has demonstrated that they are errors. Soon or late, if experience teaches us anything, they are likely to succumb too. The profoundest truths of the Middle Ages are now laughed at by schoolboys. The profoundest truths of democracy will be laughed at, a few centuries hence, even by school-teachers.

Confidence

> Perhaps the most valuable asset that any man can have in this world is a naturally superior air, a talent for sniffishness and reserve. The generality of men are always greatly impressed by it, and accept it freely as a proof of genuine merit.

Government

> The most dangerous man, to any government, is the man who is able to think things out for himself, without regard to the prevailing superstitions and taboos. Almost inevitably he comes to the conclusion that the government he lives under is dishonest, insane and intolerable , and so, if he is romantic, he tries to change it . And even if he is not romantic personally he is very apt to spread discontent among those who are.

Democracy

> Civilization, in fact, grows more and more maudlin and hysterical , and especially under democracy it tends to degenerate into a mere combat of crazes. The whole aim of practical politics is to keep the populace alarmed (and hence clamorous to be led to safety) by menacing it with an endless series of hobgoblins, all of them imaginary.
>
> […]
>
> All government, in its essence, is a conspiracy against the superior man: its one permanent object is to oppress him and cripple him. If it be aristocratic in organization , then it seeks to protect the man who is superior only in law against the man who is superior in fact; if it be democratic, then it seeks to protect the man who is inferior in every way against both.
>
> […]
>
> In every age the advocates of the dominant political theory seek to give it dignity by identifying it with whatever contemporaneous desire of man happens to be most powerful. In the days of monarchy, monarchy was depicted as the defender of the faith. In our present era of democracy, democracy is depicted as the only safe guardian of liberty. And the communism or super-communism of tomorrow, I suppose, will be sold to the booboisie as the only true palladium of peace, justice and plenty. All of these attempts to hook up cause and effect are nonsensical. Monarchy was fundamentally not a defender of the faith at all, but a rival and enemy to the faith. Democracy does not promote liberty; it diminishes and destroys liberty. And communism, as the example of Russia already shows, is not a fountain that gushes peace, justice and plenty, but a sewer in which they are drowned.

[…]

To a [believer in democracy,] any attitude based upon a concept of honor, dignity and integrity seems contemptible and offensive.

[…]

The democratic politician, confronted by the dishonesty and stupidity of his master, the mob, tries to convince himself and all the rest of us that it is really full of rectitude and wisdom. This is the origin of the doctrine that, whatever its transient errors, democracy always comes to right decisions in the long run. Perhaps— but on what evidence, by what reasoning, and for what motives! Go examine the long history of the anti-slavery agitation in America: it is a truly magnificent record of buncombe, false pretenses, and imbecility. This notion that the mob is wise, I fear, is not to be taken seriously: it was invented by mob-masters to save their faces.

[…]

The democrat, leaping into the air to flap his wings and praise God, is forever coming down with a thump. The seeds of his disaster lie in his own stupidity: he can never get rid of the naive delusion —so beautifully Christian! – that happiness is something to be got by taking it away from the other fellow.

[…]

One cannot observe [democracy] objectively without being impressed by its curious distrust of itself— its apparently ineradicable tendency to abandon its whole philosophy at the first sign of strain. I need not point to what happens invariably in democratic states when the national safety is menaced. All the great tribunes of democracy, on such occasions, convert themselves, by a process as simple as taking a deep breath, into despots of an almost fabulous ferocity.

[…]

The capital defect in the culture of These States is the lack of a civilized aristocracy, secure in its position, animated by an intelligent curiosity, skeptical of all facile generalizations, superior to the sentimentality of the mob, and delighting in the battle of ideas for its own sake.

[…]

…the worst curse of democracy , as we suffer under it today, is that it makes > public office a monopoly of a palpably inferior and ignoble group of men. They have to abase themselves in order to get it, and they have to keep on abasing themselves in order to hold it. The fact reflects itself in their general character, which is obviously low.

Men

> The ideal husband is surely not a man of active and daring mind; he is the man of placid and conforming mind. Here the good business man obviously beats the artist and adventurer. His rewards are all easily translated into domestic comfort and happiness. He is not wobbled by the admiration of other women, none of whom, however much they may esteem his virtues as a husband, are under any illusion as to his virtues as a lover.
>
> […]
>
> All men who, in any true sense, are sentient strive mightily for distinction and power, i.e., for the respect and envy of their fellowmen, i.e., for the ill-natured admiration of an endless series of miserable and ridiculous bags of rapidly disintegrating amino acids. Why? If I knew, I'd certainly not be writing books in this infernal American climate; I'd be sitting in state in a hall of crystal and gold, and people would be paying $ 10 a head to gape at me through peep-holes.
>
> […]
>
> The notion that any respectable work of art can have a communal origin is wholly nonsensical. The plain people, taking them together, are quite as incapable of a coherent esthetic impulse as they are of courage, honesty or honor. The cathedrals of the Middle Ages were not planned and built by whole communities, but by individual men; all the communities had to do with the business was to do the hard work, reluctantly and often badly.
>
> […]
>
> It is the pressing yearning of nearly every man who has actual ideas in him to empty them upon the world, to hammer them into plausible and ingratiating shapes, to compel the attention and respect of his equals, to lord it over his inferiors.

Women

> Even the most lowly prostitute is better off, in all worldly ways, than the virtuous woman of her own station in life. She has less work to do, it is less monotonous and dispiriting, she meets a far greater variety of men, and they are of classes distinctly beyond her own.
>
> […]
>
> The woman who has not had a child remains incomplete, ill at ease, and more than a little ridiculous. She is in the position of a man who has never stood in > battle; she has missed the most colossal experience of her sex.

>
> […]
>
> A man forbids his wife to drink too much because, deep in his secret archives, he has records of the behavior of other women who drank too much, and is eager to safeguard his wife's connubial rectitude and his own dignity against what he knows to be certain invasion. In brief, it is a commonplace of observation, familiar to all males beyond the age of twenty-one, that once a woman is drunk the rest is a mere matter of time and place: the girl is already there.

Religion

> The most curious social convention of the great age in which we live is the one to the effect that religious opinions should be respected. Its evil effects must be plain enough to everyone. All it accomplishes is (a) to throw a veil of sanctity about ideas that violate every intellectual decency, and (b) to make every theologian a sort of chartered libertine.

Life

> Man cannot sit still, contemplating his destiny in this world, without going frantic. So he invents ways to take his mind off the horror . He works. He plays. He accumulates the preposterous nothing called property. He strives for the coy eyewink called fame. He founds a family, and spreads his curse over others. All the while the thing that moves him is simply the yearning to lose himself, to forget himself, to escape the tragicomedy that is himself. Life, fundamentally, is not worth living. So he confects artificialities to make it so. So he erects a gaudy structure to conceal the fact that it is not so.
>
> […]
>
> The basic fact about human existence is not that it is a tragedy, but that it is a bore. It is not so much a war as an endless standing in line.
>
> […]
>
> Women whom we place upon pedestals worthy of the holy saints come down at last with mastoid abscesses or die obscenely of female weakness. And we ourselves? Let us not have too much hope. The chances are that, if we go to war, eager to leap superbly at the cannon's mouth, we'll be finished on the way by being run over by an army truck driven by a former bus-boy and loaded with imitation Swiss cheeses made in Oneida, N. Y. And that if we die in our beds, it will be of cholelithiasis.
>
> […]
>
> The great majority of us— all, in brief, who are normal— pass through life in constant revolt against our limitations, objective and subjective. Our conscious thought is largely devoted to plans and specifications for cutting a better figure > in human society, and in our unconscious the business goes on much more steadily and powerfully. No healthy man, in his secret heart, is content with his destiny . He is tortured by dreams and images as a child is tortured by the thought of a state of existence in which it would live in a candy-store and have two stomachs.

Happiness

> In the big cities, that need [of happiness] is easily met. Here there is a vast and complex machinery for taking the slave's mind off his desolateness of spirit— movie cathedrals to transport him into a land of opulence and romance, where men (whom he always identifies with himself) are brave, rich and handsome, and women (whom he identifies with his wife— or perchance with her younger sister) are clean, well-dressed and beautiful; newspapers to delight and instruct him with their sports pages, their comic strips and their eloquent appeals to his liberality, public spirit and patriotism; radio to play the latest jazz for him; baseball , races, gambling, harlotry and games in arenas; a thousand devices to make him forget his woes. It is this colossal opportunity to escape from life that brings yokels swarming to the cities, not any mere lust for money. The yokel is actually far more comfortable on his native soil; the city crowds and exploits him, and nine times out of ten he remains desperately poor. But the city at least teaches him how to forget his poverty; it amuses him and thrills him while it is devouring him.
>
> […]
>
> Happiness, like health, is probably also only a passing accident. For a moment or two the organism is irritated so little that it is not conscious of it; for the duration of that moment it is happy. Thus a hog is always happier than a man, and a bacillus is happier than a hog. The laws of the cosmos seem to be as little concerned about human felicity as the laws of the United States are concerned about human decency.

Revolution

> There has never been a successful revolution out of the clear sky. Always the doomed despot has prepared for it by making concessions to his enemies.
>
> […]
>
> Thus the despot who hedges, no matter how exalted his motives may be in his own view, appears to his enemies as one who has lost his grip, and at the first chance they fly at his throat, usually to the tune of loud protestations of altruism.

Ancient Greece

> The Greeks of the palmy days remain the most overestimated people in all history. Ever since the Renaissance it has been a high indecorum to question > their genius, and never a month passes that another book does not come out, praising them in loud, astounding terms.

>
> […]
>
> The plain facts are that Greek science, even at its best, would be hard to distinguish from the science prevailing among Hottentots, Haitians and Mississippi Baptists today, that Greek art was chiefly only derivative and extremely narrow in range, that Greek philosophy was quite as idiotic as any other philosophy, and that the government of the Greeks, even at its best, was worse than the worst of Tammany.
>
> […]
>
> If the history of Greek philosophy were known accurately, it would probably turn out to be no more than an imitation of some earlier philosophy, now forgotten— and maybe abandoned by its inventors as nonsense. In architecture and the other arts, it is certainly absurd to say that the Greeks invented anything. They got the column from the Egyptians , who had perfected it a thousand years before the Parthenon, and they slavishly followed the Egyptians in their neglect of the arch.
>
> […]
>
> As for the Greek genius for politics, it revealed its true measure in the fact that no Greek government ever lasted for more than a century, and that most of them ended in scandal and disaster.
>
> […]
>
> The one genuinely solid contribution of the Greeks to human progress lay in their attempt to synthesize and organize whatever knowledge was afloat in the world of their day.

War

> Of all the arts practised by man, the art of the soldier seems to call for the least intelligence and to develop the least professional competency. Every battle recorded in history appears as a series of almost incredible blunders and imbecilities— always, at least, on one side, and usually, on both. One marvels, reading the chronicles, that any major engagement was ever won. Even the greatest generals— for example, Bonaparte— walk idiotically into palpable traps, and waste thousands of lives getting themselves out.
>
> […]
>
> …in war time, the rights guaranteed by the First Amendment cease to have any substance, and may be set aside summarily by any jury that has been sufficiently inflamed by a district attorney itching for higher office.

Law

> The average American judge, as everyone knows, is a mere rabbinical automaton, with no more give and take in his mind than you will find in the mind of a terrier watching a rathole. He converts the law into a series of rubber-stamps, and brings them down upon the scalped skulls of the just and unjust alike. The alternative to him, as commonly conceived, is quite as bad— an uplifter in a black robe, eagerly gulping every new brand of Peruna that comes out, and converting his pulpit into a sort of soap-box .

Education

> School-days, I believe, are the unhappiest in the whole span of human existence. They are full of dull, unintelligible tasks, new and unpleasant ordinances, brutal violations of common sense and common decency. It doesn't take a reasonably bright boy long to discover that most of what is rammed into him is nonsense, and that no one really cares very much whether he learns it or not. His parents, unless they are infantile in mind, tend to be bored by his lessons and labors, and are unable to conceal the fact from his sharp eyes.
>
> […]
>
> The virtue of a college degree is that it shuts off the asking of certain kinds of questions, some of them embarrassing. It is a certificate of safety, both to the holder and to the nation in general. A graduate is one who has been trained to act according to a pattern that is publicly considered to be normal and trustworthy.
>
> […]
>
> [Education's] sole purpose is to cram the pupils, as rapidly and as painlessly as possible, with the largest conceivable outfit of current axioms, in all departments of human thought— to make the pupil a good citizen, which is to say, a citizen differing as little as possible, in positive knowledge and habits of mind, from all other citizens. In other words, it is the mission of the pedagogue, not to make his pupils think, but to make them think right, and the more nearly his own mind pulsates with the great ebbs and flows of popular delusion and emotion, the more admirably he performs his function.

Progress

> The trouble with human progress is that it tends to go too fast— that is, too fast for the great majority of comfortable and incurious men. Its agents are always in a hurry, and so become unpopular. If Darwin had printed "The Origin of Species" as a serial running twenty or thirty years he might have found himself, at the end of it, a member of the House of Lords or even Archbishop of Canterbury. But he disgorged it in one stupendous and appalling dose, and in consequence he > alarmed millions, including many of his fellow scientists, and got an evil name.

>
> […]
>
> In at least two-thirds of the American States one of the easiest ways to get into public office is to denounce [Darwin] as a scoundrel. But by the year 2030, I daresay , what remains of his doctrine, if anything , will be accepted as complacently as the Copernican cosmography is now accepted. His offense was simply that he was too precipitate.
>
> […]
>
> I began reviewing current American fiction in 1908. The change that I note since then is immense. When I started out a new novel dealing frankly with the physiology and pathology of sex was still something of a novelty. It was, indeed, so rare that I always called attention to it. Today it is a commonplace.
>
> […]
>
> If I open a new novel and find nothing about copulation in it, I suspect at once that it is simply a reprint of some forgotten novel of 1885 , with a new name.

Trolling the masses

> I often think of the noble divertissement that John D. Rockefeller could have got by giving $ 100,000,000 to the Mormons, first to finance a nation-wide campaign in favor of polygamy, then to buy legislation authorizing it from the State Legislatures, and then to pay for a fight to a finish before the Supreme Court of the United States, with all the leading barristers of the nation for the defense. The combat would have been gaudy, thrilling, incomparable . Millions of Americans would have been converted; the newspapers would have fallen one by one; in the end it might have been possible to put through a constitutional amendment not only authorizing polygamy, but even making it obligatory. John got no such fun out of the Rockefeller Institute, nor out of his gifts to Baptist missions in Cochin-China. Carnegie got no such fun out of his libraries. Morgan got no such fun out of his squirrel-like hoarding up of dingy paintings and moth-eaten old sofas.
>
> […]
>
> …the millionaire who imported a shipload of Moslem evangelists from Arabia, schooled them in English by intensive cultivation, and then turned them loose in Georgia— that such a millionaire , at all events, would suffer little from boredom during the ensuing carnage, and that his name would have an assured place in the history of the Confederate States. I am a poor man , but if the hat is passed I shall be glad to contribute to the project $ 1,000,000 in Mississippi bonds of the issue of 1838.

The arts

> Literature always thrives best, in fact, in an atmosphere of hearty strife . Poe, surrounded by admiring professors, never challenged, never aroused to the emotions of revolt, would probably have written poetry indistinguishable from the hollow stuff of, say, George E. Woodberry. It took the persistent (and often grossly unfair and dishonorable) opposition of Griswold et al. to stimulate him to his highest endeavors. He needed friends, true enough, but he also needed enemies.
>
> […]
>
> The life of an artist is a life of frustrations and disasters. Storms rage endlessly within his own soul. His quest is for the perfect beauty that is always elusive, always just beyond the sky-rim. He tries to contrive what the gods themselves have failed to contrive. When, in some moment of great illumination, he comes within reach of his heart's desire, his happiness is of a kind never experienced by ordinary men, nor even suspected , but that happens only seldom . More often he falls short, and in his falling short there is agony almost beyond endurance.
>
> […]
>
> It is almost as safe to assume that an artist of any dignity is against his country, i.e., against the environment in which God hath placed him, as it is to assume that his country is against the artist. The special quality which makes an artist of him might almost be defined, indeed, as an extraordinary capacity for irritation, a pathological sensitiveness to environmental pricks and stings. He differs from the rest of us mainly because he reacts sharply and in an uncommon manner to phenomena which leave the rest of us unmoved, or, at most, merely annoy us vaguely. He is, in brief, a more delicate fellow than we are, and hence less fitted to prosper and enjoy himself under the conditions of life which he and we must face alike. Therefore, he takes to artistic endeavor, which is at once a criticism of life and an attempt to escape from life.

Maxims

> Never let your inferiors do you a favor. It will be extremely costly.
>
> […]
>
> Morality is the theory that every human act must be either right or wrong, and that 99% of them are wrong.
>
> […]
>
> Love is the delusion that one woman differs from another.
>
> […]
>
> Misogynist – A man who hates women as much as women hate one another.
>
> […]

> Adultery is the application of democracy to love.
>
> […]
>
> Bachelors know more about women than married men. If they didn't they'd be married, too.
>
> […]
>
> The war on privilege will never end. Its next great campaign will be against the special privileges of the underprivileged.

If Mencken lived during these times, he would be an unemployable writer resigned to a WordPress blog that would be subject to change.org petitions organized by feminists and social justice warriors. His angry and truthfully bitter writing would have caused too much outrage today, and that is exactly why it's so refreshing, since we have no Mencken that exists at his level of intellectual skill and writing ability. Today's establishment tosses aside any writer who has potential to achieve a comparable level of greatness yet nourishes replaceable idiots with barely a heap of talent who excel solely at writing 600-word turds of unintelligible invective attacking evil men and their supposed desire to rape middle class white women.

My only complaint with the book is that the topics became more obscure and irrelevant as you go on. Mencken wisely stacked the beginning with his best work, so you can get away with only reading the first half and still gain immense value from it. He has achieved the noble goal of teaching you uncommon common sense while giving you mental tools to deconstruct myths that stubbornly persist in spite of whatever scientific advancement we may have achieved in modern times. His chrestomathy should be required reading for any man dissatisfied with the current state of America, for unfortunately not much has improved since his time.

Read More: "A Mencken Chrestomathy" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why I Am Proud To Be Called A Misogynist

April 24, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

A girl called me a misogynist the other day and I thought about it for a minute. It's never happened before. The best way to deal with an insult is to wear it as a badge of honor. So let me explain why I am proud to be called a misogynist.

The difference

Men and women are different from each other. Literally, absolutely, and metaphorically down to the bone they are different. You cannot take two things that are different and then try to make them the same. Different objects have different constitutions, different outlooks, and different purposes.

Water and vodka are both clear liquids but one cannot be substituted for the other without causing all kinds of problems. Vodka might have a component of water within it and vodka can mix with water—but it is not water.

In the battle of the sexes we find ourselves at the same juncture. We're so busy trying to force all human beings to be the same, that we've lost the very nature of the complimentary qualities that made them wonderful in the first place. If feminism's only real goal was to address and validate the very real contribution that women made as mothers, care givers, homemakers, and wives, then few would have any problem with it.

Without those things, without a soft, nurturing family environment, the human realm is reduced to nothing more than a rat race. Of course a man wants to find himself a feminine life partner, not just for fucking and having kids, but because that feminine element can (if it's functioning correctly) provide him with a real and valuable supportive base from which he can step out into the world.

Of course a girl should seek to find herself the best husband she can while she is still young. Not in a materialistic, gold digging sense, or as a sperm donor and child support check, but because her feminine qualities can add to his life, enhance his experience and productivity, and thus he can provide enough for the both of them.

The materialistic and vain pursuit of wealth, status, and celebrity that has overtaken society in the last few decades is a result of the supportive feminine aspect of human existence being completely undermined to the point that it's almost removed. This symbiotic relationship has been discarded and abandoned in favor only of selfish glory. Me, Me, Me. If the human race was a rock band, the drummer and bass player would be wrestling with their band mates to be lead singer and guitarist, whilst no music is produced whatsoever.

In this mindlessly competitive rat race, children are nothing more than an inconvenience, spat out into the world and left to fend for themselves or used as a trophy to establish badges of honor, status and social validation, whilst the bulk of their upbringing is left to strangers. We marvel at our human development and so called technology, but we are descending further and more rapidly into an animal existence governed by fear and powerful animal psyche.

Smart phone, stupid person

We can take the plugged-in mindset as an indication that technology has crippled us rather than liberated us, but it is just one small example. It is a symptom rather than the cause.

The need to be plugged-in, is an antidote to the hollow life that exists in absence of true family and real feminine nurturing. I am not saying we all need mommies running about after us, but when was the last time you sat around a table with more than a few acquaintances and had a real home cooked (unhurried) family meal? A restaurant is a profit-making public venue that is not a home.

Simple substitution

The cashier girl in my local gas station looks ready to join an Amazonian tribe in battle, and clearly this is a desperate attempt on her part to scrimp out whatever fragments of validation she can from a fractured, fearful, and pointless existence in which she is unable to find her way.

The reason she cannot find her way is because she is not going to be famous, have a marvelous career, gain enormous amounts of wealth for herself, or make some technological breakthrough. Rather she was best suited to be a care giver, mother, wife, home maker and provide the very real feminine nurturing that is missing from society.

Sadly at some point or other, it was uploaded into her subconscious and before that into the subconscious of her mother, that simply being a woman was not enough. Recognizing this is what defines me as a misogynist in today's world.

The loss of the feminine

It all goes back to the loss of the feminine. Without a mother figure there cannot be a father figure. Without a family unit there cannot be a soft and well-nurtured upbringing. The focus shifts to basic survival and materialism. Whilst the feminine is secondary and supportive to the masculine, the feminine is our point of origin as organic life forms and thus without a solid feminine, the rest of our existence is a messy, scattered rat race.

This life is reduced only to genetics. There is no room for human knowledge to be handed down, no place for progress. Debate and discussion (if they are allowed) are not designed to discover the best resolution, but rather to further and maintain the hierarchy.

Failing to understand the complimentary nature of male and female humans is like failing to understand the difference between night and day, hot and cold, or up and down. I am proud to see that difference, proud to call myself a man, and proud to see the female sex for what they really are. FEMALE. Not male, not sexless drones, but female, feminine and completely different to a man in mind, body and spirit.

If that is a misogynist then I will wear that label with pride.

Read More: Most Women Don't Deserve A Good Man

Why You Should Vote For Hillary Clinton In 2016

April 25, 2015 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

The local reactions to Hillary Clinton's announcement of her candidacy for President of the United States were sharply polarized and emphatic between the two ends of the political spectrum. Listening to people around me discuss this topic was as predictable as a poorly written episode of "Law and Order".

If there was ever a case to prove the belief in the Calvinist ideal of predestination, it would be this political scenario. While the typical blue pills go over the pros and cons of the candidates' goals and methods, a truly enlightened man would judge each candidate on their ability to further his own goals. That is why I concluded it would be a good idea to vote for Hillary.

I'm sure your initial reaction was to question why such blasphemy was on Return of Kings. Allow me to explain. The current political and social situation in the United States of America is one hostile to the ideals of most ROK readers. Ending the current paradigm is the best way to end this hostility.

Hillary Clinton stands the best chance of destroying the leftist-marxist coalition's various power structures that control and direct American society. Her various policies, procedures, and motivations would be far more destructive and faster than anything else the Democrats or Republicans can do.

Sometimes it is better to flush it all away at once, instead of the detritus slowly circling the drain. I personally believe it's easier to salvage parts of a car that recently crashed than to get parts from cars that were rusting in the woods for twenty years.

How would Hillary Clinton's destructive policies work faster and be more damaging than any other politician? Because she already has a history of influence through her husband and her time as a senator and Secretary of State. If her past did not dissuade her from this crazy train, nothing in the future will.

Who can forget the great idea of the North American Free Trade agreement? Her jingoism and cheerleading for the initial invasion of Iraq in 2003? Or even better, her 3 AM phone call moment with Benghazi. This last example shows her own ruthlessness and shrewdness and that she is willing to sacrifice one of DC's own courtesans instead of some kid signing up for college money.

Cruz, Rubio, O'malley, they don't have a pre-existing system of conspirators and collaborators ready to to hit the ground running from day one. Hillary Clinton does, and so will be able to return to DC politics as usual faster and more effectively than any other candidate.

Business as usual in DC is not conducive to the success of America as we know it. Hillary Clinton's people know what works from their previous occupation of the White House, so they will be quicker to put that boot in your face in a way that would be very hard for CNN and MSNBC to spin away.

Another reason why shrewd man would vote for Hillary Clinton is that she's very predictable. She goes with the political wind, and I'm sure the favored donors of the Clinton foundation and other nonprofits will surely find financial success during her term as president. A lot of these donors are publicly traded companies, if you catch my drift. Also the predictability of her foreign policies supporting Sunni "insurgents" against whoever they may be fighting can be useful when making financial investments.

In conclusion, maybe it's time to start looking out for yourself and give your political and social opponents enough rope to hang themselves. Voting for Hillary Clinton is the best way to do this in 2016. Instead of putting your hopes and in some beta Republican candidate that won't actually deliver on anything, you might as well speed up the downward spiral.

Read More: In Praise Of Alpha Male Bill Clinton

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

The Deeper Implications Of Ben Moynihan's Violent Beta Male Rampage

April 25, 2015 | by Ray Coleman | Link | Original Link

On March 6, 2015, 18 year old Ben Moynihan, a UK native, was found guilty of the attempted murder of three women (after he attempted to stab a 20, 45, and 67-year-old with a kitchen knife) and sentenced to 21 years in prison. His reason for attacking them? He was a 17-year-old virgin who couldn't get laid.

During the trial, various letters Moynihan had written came to light, each one laden with quips such as "when women won't talk to you, it's heartbreaking, why are they fussy with men nowadays," and "I think every girl is a type of slut…they do not give boys like us a chance."

Sound familiar?

Hell, even the profile photos are so similar it's scary. Here you have two young men, divided by thousands of miles of land and sea, who have that same look of hopelessness, despair, and complete and total cluelessness common amongst the herbs and betas modern society' is churning out by the truckloads.

Moynihan's sentencing comes a little over a month or two after Wilkes McDermid, a London-based food blogger, jumped from a building to his death. McDermid, who was Asian, explained the reasons for his untimely demise thusly:

> The reason for my death is simple. I have concluded that in the realm of dating and relationships the primary characteristics required for men are as follows: Height: above 5 ft. 10; Race: huge bias towards Caucasian and black; Wealth: or other manifestation of power.

Feminists would take that statement and say something like, "yeah, Moynihan and McDermid didn't understand that this isn't ancient times…in today's world, nobody's owed a woman just because they're 'nice'." Feminist websites are already trying to declare Moynihan the poster-child of misogyny.

The average red-piller, on the other hand, would say, "yeah, it's a shame that those guys just didn't understand that in today's world, without game, you're just lost…they could've had soft harems in three different cities if they'd just lifted some weights and boned up on their asshole game."

While I definitely reject the feminists' spin on these tragedies, I only partly subscribe to my red-pill brethren's interpretation of these events. I've noticed that while Roosh touched on McDermid's death in his forum, very few people in the manosphere have talked about Moynihan. In a way, that's a good thing, because if all we're going to do is just shake our heads and say, "he should've learned game," all we've successfully done is kick the can down the road.

We've all got the blood of kings coursing through our veins, gentlemen. That means we've got the wherewithal to delve deeper into this issue.

Who Betas Think They're Fighting

The main problem people like McDermid, Moynihan, and even Rodger had was that, in attempting to assign blame for their respective predicaments, they kept missing the target.

McDermid seemed to believe that some abstract, faceless, voiceless force in the cosmos had conspired against him to elevate tall black and white men above him in the sexual marketplace. Moynihan and Rodger seemed to believe that a bunch of slick-haired, Jersey-Shoresque "alphas" decked in white t-shirts and covered in tattoos were somehow robbing them of the prize, and blamed the women who were attracted to them for being thusly attracted.

The true nature of female attraction and women's evolutionary hard-wiring have been covered ad nauseam in previous posts, so I won't go into that here. As for the guys, well, a perfect example of the typical discussions that take place between game denialists and practitioners of game can be seen here.

You see, it's easy to blame pickup artists, women, and the cosmos when you strike out. It takes in-depth thought to stop, do some self-introspection, and realize that maybe you shouldn't be trying to talk to that purple-haired girl with fortune cookie sayings stenciled into her back.

Yep, she's a keeper, all right!

Who Betas Are Really Fighting

I don't think it's a coincidence that we've seen quite a bit of postings about the UK on this site over the last few weeks. First, there's "Yes Means Yes" in London. Then we hear about how churches are advising women to "blue ball English men" until they marry them. These are all articles that address different facets of what men from the early days of the manosphere colloquially called “The Cathedral.”

The guys who coined these phrases were spot-on. The only mistake that a lot of us keep making is failing to see the method behind the madness. To put it bluntly, this issue goes far beyond women just wanting to have their way. What you’ve actually got is an alliance akin to the Axis Powers, composed of feminists, the LGBT, and social anarchists in general.

Just Wait Until the Little Feller Grows up

All of this accomplishes three things. First of all, it shrinks the pool of legitimately dateable women down to about the size of a teacup. Secondly, it puts a helluva price tag on otherwise mediocre pussy. Thirdly, it creates a divide between men and women that a) makes “alternative” lifestyles seem more “normal” based on the illusion that all straight relationships are either doomed to failure or dead on arrival, and b) creates a “window of opportunity” in the minds of LGBTs in which to “convert” these newly spurned casualties of the dating wars.

The first same sex marriage was officiated in the UK in March 2014, and the phenomenon’s been picking up steam ever since; to speak counter to the so-called “marriage equality” (yeckkh) movement anywhere in the world nowadays is verboten. Meanwhile, you’ve got a country full of Lena Dunhams waddling up and down the streets of England shooting guys down as if they’re 9s and 10s, while the few actual 9s and 10s who are left are over in Dubai getting spit-roasted by Arabian oil tycoons.

It’s the perfect storm for an unwary, hapless guy to either settle for the hot girls’ overweight friends, “discover” that he was always unsuccessful with women because he was “gay all along,” or to check out of the sexual marketplace altogether.

Much like the Architect in the Matrix, the architects of this crap have done a cost-benefit analysis, and have concluded that for every Wilkes McDermid who ends it all and for every Elliott Rodger who flips out and kills someone, there are hundreds of thousands of beta lemmings who will unwittingly allow themselves to be herded about in the manner I previously described, all while being the perfect, productive worker-drones, wasting away in cubicles under toxic fluorescent lights for 50 hours a week. That, my friends, is the heart of the Matrix.

So You've Acquired The Right Target. Now What?

Once people know what they're actually fighting against and what the true cause of their ills is, they tend to become productive. They stop basting in self-pity and regret, and start devoting more time to self-improvement in the hopes of striking back at "the system."

You don't tend to do that when your target is "that bitch who didn't give me her phone number" or "that prick who doesn't deserve to date that Victoria's Secret model." That's just a recipe for withdrawal into oneself, seclusion, self-loathing, and, ultimately, self-destruction.

I'd bet my car title that that's what happened to Ben Moynihan. He could've looked around, sized up the world around him, and made a conscious decision to become the boldest, fittest dude he knew how to be in order to not only carve himself out a niche in that world, but to ultimately work towards changing it. That's how empires are built, and how broken systems are repaired.

I've heard people say that betas will never rise up and change the system because they've just become too blinded and too jaded to act. I don't fully agree with that assessment. I think that once they get a dose of the Red Pill and get their sights readjusted on the true target, a change will come. Atlas Shrugged style. With a vengeance.

Read More: The Revolutionary Implications Of GamerGate

Ray Coleman
Ray is just an average Joe who has an interesting way of viewing the world. When he's not pondering the deeper meaning of the human condition, he's fishing off the coast of Florida and trying to figure out which driver can get him over the 180-yard mark.

Protein World Enrages Feminists Who Hate Female Beauty

April 26, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Once again feminists are getting their girdles in a bunch over an ad that features an attractive woman. Protein World recently released an ad featuring a scantily clad and attractive female as the poster child to promote their line of weight loss products in advance of summer. This is, of course, the time when most women, fat or fit, go to great measures to ensure their bodies are in top shape to don bikinis on beaches around the world.

Being the petulant children they are, they responded in their typical fit-throwing fashion…again, taking to social media to voice their feelings on this “injussstyyssss!!”…again.

Troll level…99

While feminists will never give up the easiest and most effortless way to “protest” a social wrong from the comfort of their cat hair-covered couches, they finally seem to be getting the idea that keystrokes and witty sarcasm doesn’t have the same effect it once did.

So, naturally, they've upped the ante on their tactics by vandalizing the ads and posing in bikinis next to them to show what a "real bikini body" should look like.

I'll give credit where credit is due here. This approach is a hell of a lot more ballsy than the typical campaign against the social injustice du jour—namely attention-whoring cowards posting pictures of their tits for the free the nipple campaign. As Ethan Wolfe correctly stated:

> It’s one thing for a young woman to frivolously post topless pictures of her breasts, carefully crafted and sufficiently edited, from within the private, non-threatening environment of her own home; it’s quite another to actively protest perceived oppression by baring her breasts in public.

At least these chicks got out and actually took action of relevance in the public square. That said, these public displays of solidarity against the perceived fat shaming by The Protein World is just another form of attention-whoring under the guise of fighting against body image shaming.

It’s also worth noting that the girl on the right has a half decent body, which you can bet is no accident. If both girls looked like the girl on the left, this little publicity stunt would have fallen flat. Feminists know that beauty sells, whether they publicly admit it or not, which is exactly why this whole shitshow is one giant contradiction in the first place.

So why don’t feminists like attractive women in advertisements? Let’s take a look.

Attractive women represent something they will never be

Even if her face is below average, she’d be attractive

Notice I used the word “attractive” rather than “beautiful” or “gorgeous.” Beautiful women are women who are fit and good looking. These are the females who hit the genetic lottery and didn’t blow all their winnings on junk food and alcohol and have managed to stay in the upper echelon on the sexual market. Basically the 8s, 9s, and 10s of the world.

Attractive women, on the other hand, are girls who weren’t born so lucky. They have average to below average looks but decided to elevate their SMV by hitting the gym, taking care of their bodies, and refraining from gorging pizza and ice cream at 2AM after sucking down girlie drinks all night at the club.

The girl in the ad obviously embodies the best of both worlds, but the issue that really sticks in the craw of feminists and SJWs is her body. They understand that not every girl is born pretty, but they do know that attractiveness is something that can be attained with hard work and discipline.

Feminists are lazy. They have zero interest in doing what it takes to achieve and maintain a bangable body and they know this. They'd rather bitch and moan about not having the time or money to put in the work necessary than get their asses up at 4am to hit the treadmill and do squats.

God forbid they should ever be subjected to this torture

They are acutely aware of this deficiency, so their default setting tells them to resist anything that suggests they might have to actually work to get something they want—like the girl in the ad who shines a bright light on their own sloth.

They are trying to mitigate attraction…

Don’t hate on women who drool over dudes like this …which simply can’t be done. The West has tried to brainwash men into being attracted to slovenly, unfit women. But no matter how much they try to cram this down our throats, our penises aren’t going to stand at attention in the presence of a fattie.

Ask any girl what her idea of her perfect man is and looks will be in the top three every single time if she’s being honest with you. And guess what…that’s okay! It’s okay to be attracted to attractive men. It’s perfectly natural to want to bear the children of a haw-tee.

But the problem feminists have with this biological need to reproduce with an attractive specimen of the opposite sex is that the pendulum swings both ways. Men have that same (if not stronger) desire to bury our seed in the most attractive females and herein lies their problem.

As men, we have no right to tell women who and what they should be attracted to. Most of us seem to have figured this out as we do our level best to raise our own SMV by lifting weights, learning game, and stacking cash.

Feminists got the same memo, but they’ve chosen to ignore it by attempting to dictate to us what we should be attracted to. And for the most part they’ve been successful. Fatties are praised and exalted as beautiful and and desirable. Men everywhere proclaim their love for “curvy” and “full-figured” women from the highest mountain tops. People who fat shame are struck down with a fury and vengeance the moment they express disdain for rotund versions of the fairer sex.

Unfortunately for them, the one and only true judge of female attractiveness will never be convinced—the boner. Sure, a beta will tell a group of plus-sized females that his woman doesn't have to be thin or fit or that "big girls need lovin' too." But when he goes home alone (which he often does) he ain't spankin' that monkey to fat chicks.

In closing

The bottom line here is that not every body is a beach body. Feminists know the score, but they're trying to fix the outcome of the game and it just doesn't work that way.

As far as The Protein World is concerned, they seem to have dug in their heels and against the onslaught of this poor attempt at fit-shaming:

Plus, using attractive people has been a staple in the successful marketing of just about every consumer product out there, from clothes to electronics to automobiles. Even fast food joints use good looking people to build their brand.

It wouldn't make any sense for a company to use land whales to hawk fat burning pills or a male with puny arms to advertise a muscle building compound. Shaming a company for using a proven method to maximize sales is just silly. Expecting them to change it to appease fat girls is flat out idiotic.

Chicks wouldn't go near this pill if these women were on the bottle

This uproar is just another example of feminist entitlement. They expect men to have washboard abs, make six-figure incomes, and have movie star looks to bang them, but they feel like they shouldn't have to make any effort to become attractive to men.

This ad makes them uncomfortable because it exposes an undeniable truth to the world (it takes work to be desirable) that glares them right in the face and exposes their flawed ideology.

Congratulations to one company for standing up for the truth.

Read Next: How Feminists Shame Beautiful Women

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

5 First Date Tips To Help Seal The Deal

April 26, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

The motherfucking first date.

This is where it all goes down. You've already met the girl – whether through approaching her, online dating, or otherwise – and successfully scheduled a date.

Now it's time to capitalize on the opportunity and make the best of it.

It doesn't matter if you're looking for a wife or a one night stand, the same rules apply. You want to have a good time, see if you like the girl, and then escalate the attraction if you do. And I personally think that having a good time is the most important thing here.

Don't put pressure on yourself to have to make it happen. This will only turn you into an awkward, nervous wreck and turn the date into something obligatory rather than a good time and a chance to get laid.

So while I think just enjoying yourself is rule number one, below are five tips to facilitate a good time that also gives you the best chance of taking it to the next level.

1. Get drinks

No need to be creative on the first date – just get drinks

There’s a time and place to get creative when it comes to dates., but that’s not the first date.

Honestly I think it’s just trying too hard to invest more than a quick drink into someone you haven’t really gotten to know yet. But drinks are also low pressure for her (she can walk out at any time), the alcohol helps calm the first date nerves, and it’s always easy to find a convenient location (depending on your goal, you may want to choose somewhere close to your place). Either way, no need to overthink something so simple (this only can only lead to insecurity and doubt), just go with drinks.

2. Sit next to her

Once you’re at the bar, find some bar space or a counter where you guys can sit next to each other. This is key. It allows you to be closer to her than if you’re sitting across a table.

Being next to her will grant you the opportunity to touch her – and her the opportunity to touch you. Capitalize on this and touch her at organic points in the conversation, when you guys are laughing or when you’re telling a story, for example.

3. Lead the interaction

She wants you to take the lead… don't be a pussy

This is crucial. At all points during the date you should be leading the way.

Pick the bar. Pick where you're sitting. Order the drinks. Lead the conversation.

And a big one: after getting one round, make the move to another bar. This keeps things fun and prevents them from getting stale for both of you.

Taking the lead shows that you're a confident and masculine man, and it can help make her feel "secure" in your presence. Above I listed just a few things to focus on, but you should take the lead in all aspects of the date.

4. Ask the right questions

So while the exact content of the conversation isn't important, you can connect with her on a deeper level by asking the right questions. The key here is to avoid the boring "yes" or "no" questions, and stick to more open-ended questions. You can't go wrong with "how's" and "what's" (these are better than asking "why?").

For example, if a girl tells you she grew up on New York City, you could take two different approaches.

The boring approach: "Did you like growing up there?"

Or in the interesting approach: "What did you like about growing up there?"

The latter is open-ended, and requires an expanded response, which leaves more opportunity to dive deep and make a stronger connection. Use this technique to deal with the inevitable first few rounds of getting-to-know-each-other Q and A and the date will be off to a strong start.

5. Hold her hand

Holding her hand on the first date shows confidence and builds attraction

This last one might seem overly aggressive, or like you're trying too hard to be her boyfriend. But I assure you that it's pure gold.

Girls love this. It builds up that "we're on an adventure" together vibe and escalate the physical play and sexual tension like nothing else. I suggest you use this move while changing locations.

I strongly believe that being confident and honest is all it takes to become a dating powerhouse and attract women into your life. Keep your focus on building yourself up and use these tips to help you set up a killer first date.

Read More: How To Free Yourself From The Need For Women

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Student Accused Of Rape By Emma Sulkowicz To Sue Columbia University

April 26, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Paul Nungesser, the Columbia student who has been accused of rape by Emma Sulkowicz as part of her "Carry That Weight" project, is finally striking back. Nungesser is suing Columbia University over Sulkowicz's project, stating that the university did nothing to protect him from her campaign of harassment and defamation against him, and indeed allowed her to do it as part of her coursework.

In a particularly cruel irony, Nungesser's suit is rooted in Title IX, the federal statute that bans gender-based discrimination in universities:

> This is an action for damages, injunctive relief and declaratory relief against Defendants Columbia University, the Trustees of Columbia University, Columbia University's President Lee C. Bollinger and Columbia University's Visual Arts Professor Jon Kessler (hereinafter sometimes collectively referred to as "Defendants"), for their acts and omissions with regard to Paul Nungesser in violation of both federal and state law which have significantly damaged, if not effectively destroyed Paul Nungesser's college experience, his reputation, his emotional well-being and his future career prospects. This case exemplifies the types of student-on-student and teacher-on-student gender based harassment and misconduct that the Supreme Court has held is prohibited by Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, 86 Stat. 373, as amended, 20 U.S.C. § 1681 etseq. ("Title IX").

For those who've forgotten, Emma Sulkowicz is the Columbia student who became notorious last autumn when she announced that she would be carrying her mattress around campus until either she graduated or until her rapist—Nungesser—was expelled, whichever came first. This is despite the fact that Columbia's campus tribunal cleared Nungesser of the rape charges that Sulkowicz leveled against him, under the lowest standard of proof.

While Sulkowicz has been careful not to name Nungesser—likely because doing so would have opened her up to a lawsuit—her campaigning made it easy for other Columbia students to identify him. According to his lawsuit, since Sulkowicz began her project, Nungesser's college experience has been "effectively destroyed," since he can no longer participate in campus life without being jeered at or physically attacked for being a "rapist."

Despite the transparently bogus nature of Sulkowicz's accusations, she became a darling of the feminist media, receiving glowing coverage in major publications such as New York Magazine. Additionally, she was invited to attend President Obama's State of the Union address by Senator Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY). Nungesser's lawsuit—and the additional details he's revealed about his relationship with Sulkowicz—confirms that everyone who supported her was complicit in harassment and fraud.

Sulkowicz To Nungesser: "Fuck Me In The Butt"

Nungesser's suit against Columbia (which can be read in its entirety here) includes transcripts of text conversations he had with Sulkowicz when they were hooking up. Far from the sinister rapist that Sulkowicz has painted him as, their conversations show that she was the aggressor in their relationship. They also show that she had an odd fixation with anal sex:

> Emma: fuck me in the butt
> Paul: eehm

> maybe not?
> jk
> I miss your face tho
> Emma: hahahah
> you don't miss my lopsided ass?
> Paul: ido.
> just not that much > good I am actually too tired to choose a movie
> "god
> also to tired to spell apparently

Additionally, Sulkowicz also complained to Nungesser about another of her boyfriends (referred to as "John Doe" for legal reasons") not using condoms when he slept with other women:

> Emma: John Doe and i are all cool – hahahah – i was excited.
> Paul: oh thanks god good to hear – so wats da nuse > Emma: he and i went to an art opening and tacos tonight – and we > talked it out – like im not gonna force him to be exclusive > but i was like "just use condoms with other girls" – so > yeah – he'll use condoms if he fucks other girls.
> Paul: . . . its just i mean im glad you talked it out and stuff and im > not the one trying to kill the boner here but how are you gonna > have any idea whether he actually uses a condom with other girls > or not
> Emma: yeah i realize that's true – i mean there's a lot of faith involved > i feel like he needs another boy to tell him to use condoms > can you, in like your next bro talk, just be like yo, use condoms > when you luck other girls
> Paul: i have tried to talk to him – thats why i talked to you in the first > place cause i felt i wasn't gettin anywhere
> Emma: oh forrealz? – goddamnit – yeah he's totally not gonna do it then
> Paul: :S
> Emma: why can't he just only love me

Finally, Nungesser's lawsuit also contains other conversations in which Sulkowicz revealed she had slept around with other men and was a heavy drug user:

> Emma further communicated to Paul stories and allegations of sexual abuse that she had experienced from other sexual partners. She stated: "i've officially had sex with all of John Doe' best friends…—did lotsa drugs jk just got very drunk—well anyways—now i have an std i actually hate John Doe like if a girl is about to puke—don't put your unprotected dick into her… I realy don't want to be known as the girl who contracted an std because she was drunk you know? it is > more his fault for fucking me unconscious—i mean i was conscious but clearly not in my right mind… i was literally blackout… like i puked all over the place."

There are even more revelations in the brief, such as the fact that Sulkowicz grew so attached to Nungesser she repeatedly messaged him while he was overseas telling him how much she missed him. For her part, Sulkowicz attempted to defend herself in a now-deleted post on her Facebook page:

> Back in freshman year, I used to say the phrase "Fuck me in the butt" to mean "OMG, that's sooo annoying." We all said stupid shit freshman year. Over time, I worked that kink out of my lexicon, but now and then I still say stupid things. We all say stupid things! For example, I hear people say things like, "That test raped me" or "I raped that test," when they don't actually mean that a rape occurred. I'm not condoning this speech; rather, I'm pointing out that it happens a lot. When I'm stressed, I might say, "OMG kill me!" or when something's awesome, I might say, "Wow, that slayed me." In neither of these situations would anyone think that I'm asking to be murdered or that I'd been slayed.
>
> So, look at the full conversation between me and Paul, which I have posted here. Did Paul, in this situation, actually think I wanted him to fuck me in the butt when all I was doing was complaining about the fact that I had to wake up soon? If he did, then he is terrible at reading signs from women, and takes the things we say as sexual invitations, even when most people would understand that they aren't. If, on the other hand, he understood that I wasn't propositioning him, which is indicated by the fact that he said, "jk," then it is clear that he is now intentionally cropping the phrase from its context in order to mislead people. He doesn't want you to know that I wasn't asking to be fucked in the butt.

Sulkowicz made this argument despite the blatantly sexual nature of her conversation with Nungesser and other segments in the lawsuit that showed her unusual interest in anal sex.

All the evidence in Nungesser's lawsuit blows Sulkowicz's accusations to pieces. Not only that, suing the university and not Sulkowicz herself is a genius move, because it will allow him to restore his reputation (and expose her as a deranged liar) while avoiding accusations that he is "bullying" her.

Why College Rape Tribunals Should Be Abolished

Between the implosion of Sulkowicz's story and the recent Rolling Stone UVA rape hoax, the tide appears to be turning against false rape accusers. But despite the evidence presented in Nungesser's lawsuit, feminists are still defending Sulkowicz's harassment campaign as "free speech," despite the fact that no free speech statute on Earth—including the U.S. Constitution—considers spreading defamatory lies about someone to be a protected form of speech.

Beyond the general rape hysteria gripping American society, where any man accused of rape is immediately presumed guilty and strung up by a virtual lynch mob, Sulkowicz's campaign also exposes the problem with campus rape cases being handled by internal courts. Because college rape tribunals use a lower standard of evidence than actual courts—in part due to the Obama administration's pressure on colleges to increase rape convictions—they are easily abused by jilted lovers like Sulkowicz.

Studies by the Department of Justice have shown that despite the rape hysteria pushed by the media, college students have a much lower chance of being raped than the general population. Knowing this, there is zero reason why tribunals such as the one that cleared Nungesser should exist.

College girls who have been legitimately raped should go to the same place that other rape victims go: the police. As ROK publisher Roosh stated some time ago, any woman who claims to have been raped but won't go to the police is probably lying.

While rape hysterics continue to grip the media and government, the rapid-fire collapse of popular narratives such as Sulkowicz's show that merely crying rape isn't enough anymore. Step by step, women who falsely accuse men of rape are being exposed and their supporters are being humiliated.

Here's hoping that Paul Nungesser takes Columbia for every dime they're worth.

Read More: New Evidence Suggests Mattress Rape Victim Emma Sulkowicz Made It Up

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

5 Reasons Why Black Feminism Is A Failure

April 27, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

Although it's been around for the better part of a half century, black feminism has made something of a resurgence over the past few years. Among it's "brightest" sparks are Feminista Jones, Brittney "Professor Crunk" Cooper, Mikki Kendall, Kimberly Foster and Jamila Lemieux.

Much of what they do is largely a knockoff of what white feminists yammer on about—"rape culture," "street harassment," and of late, taking digs at prominent black men like Bill Cosby. While they don't get anywhere near the shine and attention their white sisters do, they nevertheless have managed to make a consistent nuisance of themselves, especially for those of us in black America who are are in closest spatial proximity to them.

I have long argued that black feminism, as it has been known historically and in the present day, has been a rank and utter failure, because by its own stated goals and it's biggest personalities, it has proven itself unable to deliver the goods.

Let's count the ways, shall we?

1. It Has Not Passed Any Laws That Have Directly Or Indirectly Helped Black Women

ALL of the freedoms, rights and privileges black women enjoy today—affirmative action "twofers" (being minority and being a female), increased public safety (forcible rape and sexual assault in black precincts at all-time lows), access to birth control and abortion (black women get the most abortions among American women in general), lessened social stigma for being baby mamas (more than 70% of all black babies are born out of wedlock), access to college educations, you name it—have come from white feminists.

Roe v. Wade, the pill, the Sexual Revolution, Norma Rae, all of that came about from white feminists. Black feminists haven't had a direct hand in crafting any laws, lobbying for the same, or even raising any important issues that would directly assist black women in their lives.

2. It Has Not Helped To Improve The Lives Of Black Women

Quick, name ONE area where today's average, rank and file back woman has been directly, or even indirectly, improved as a result of black feminism? Black women have the lowest marital rate, the highest divorce rate, the highest obesity rate, the highest rate of STD infection, and, of course, the highest out of wedlock birthrate. How is any of this a boon to today's Black woman? In fact, if anything…

3. It Has Made Black Women's Lives Markedly Worse

Black feminists advocate for antisocial behaviors, like arguing the "merits" of being ratchet, being a ho, slut and so forth, while simultaneously denigrating what they call the "politics of respectability" that made black America successful in the past.

Furthermore, black feminists also openly argue for the dismantling of nuclear families, under some ridiculous rubric of "patriarchy" in the Black community, and is among the leaders of kicking dirt on the black man. As a result, more black women are encouraged to be bottom feeders behaviorally.

4. It Fosters Diva Culture

I've written about this elsewhere, but briefly speaking, black feminism aids and abets the notion among many black women that they are "divas"—basically insufferable human beings who think they are "all that," when in reality they're mediocrities with huge egos.

5. It Is A Haven For Unattractive And Mentally Unstable Black Women

This is something that needs to be shouted from the rafters and put on blast. These people have massive amounts of time on their hands to get their message out, and have done formidable damage to the black precincts across the country, infecting the minds of many black women that it is perfectly OK to let yourself go, attempt to guilt or shame men into dealing with you, and have erratic mood swings that include violence.

They do this all in the name of challenging the so-called "patriarchy." It's a cruel joke that the rejects and defectives of black America have successfully foisted onto the rest of us.

In Summation

Black feminism has shown itself to be divisive and counterproductive, as well as highly ineffective in assisting black women with meeting the very goals it claims to be about. Indeed, its biggest names have shown themselves to be unable to achieve these goals.

Black feminism means nothing good—only more acrimony between black men and women, not to mention pain, illness, disease, violence, and death. And it must stop.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The 9 Ugliest Feminists In America

Mumia Ali
Mumia Ali, aka "Obsidian" is a Men's Issues blogger from Philadelphia who focuses on Sexual Politics, Class, and Race, from the male perspective. He is a cofounder of the Men's Issues blog collective known as Just Four Guys, is Editor of Urban American Affairs for A Voice for Men and a contributor to Return of Kings. Connect with him on Twitter @ObsidianFiles, Facebook under Mumia Ali and email:

Firestone’s Newest Commercial Continues The Anti-Male Media Narrative

April 27, 2015 | by Peter | Link | Original Link

I was sitting at home watching the Cavs against the Celts when I saw something during the commercial break that was so inappropriate I did a double take in disbelief. The video is linked here.

The short of it is this: every single thing with this commercial is utterly evil and wrong.

For those of you who are not yet well versed in the act of male bashing, let me enlighten you as to what is going on in this commercial.

Presumably it is a Sunday afternoon and this man has decided to take it easy, have a nap, play some video games and enjoy his fucking Sunday as his God-given right. The wife comes home with groceries and decides that this simply will not do. Her man-hating instinct overwhelms her and she decides that it is time to mete out feminist justice in all its glory.

And so the miserable cunt decides to toy with him as a cat does with a mouse and actually destroys his console that is potentially worth 400 dollars, then has the gall and audacity to kiss him on the neck and brush him off.

Incidentally, having a cunty controlling bitch of a wife is PRECISELY what might encourage a guy to indulge in escapism through video games. What do we see in this video?

- Zero respect for the man's personal boundaries
- Abuse and torture as fun and games because the target is a man and the perpetrator is a woman
- Narcissism and sociopathy as good things

You might be inclined to think to yourself that this commercial is relatively harmless, but I can tell you with certainty that this woman's behavior is exhibiting a controlling personality disorder, and possibly more. The director told her to wag her tongue out of her mouth as she runs over his beloved gaming console.

What would a normal, nurturing wife do? She would nudge him awake and ask him to help her with the groceries, which he would be more than happy to do because he has been enjoying his day off like a normal person. Normalcy it would seem, is no longer enough to sell a bunch of tires.

Beware the message

Cultural engineering is no new topic, but the speed at which it is being applied has accelerated. I myself don't watch TV that often so I don't usually expose myself to this sort of drivel, but after watching this commercial, I noticed with regularity that each subsequent commercial presented men in the same manner.

Doughy eyed, weak willed pussies with no frame control, no integrity. Basically, a bunch of simps.

Our youth is too stupid to understand that television is cancer. They watch this and develop self-esteem problems and pedestalize the pussy, while women become ever increasingly entitled and narcissistic because society is literally instructing them to behave this way.

Those SJW who want to squelch free speech probably watch commercials like this gleefully. I bet they think to themselves "Good for her for getting her lazy, worthless husband off the couch and showing him who's the boss, and who really makes the rules."

There must be repercussions for bashing men in this manner.

I don't do social media, but perhaps a Twitter campaign crushing Firestone's image is in order. Companies need to know that men will not tolerate this sort of character assassination over and over.

Firestone needs to be hit where it hurts—their wallets. So I challenge all of you to come up with an appropriate hashtag that will make the marketing department at Firestone cower in fear. I want their stomachs to turn, I want the blood to drain from their face.

Or at the very least go out and buy some Goodyears.

Read More: 8 Signs You Should Break Up With A Girl

Peter

Charles said to Elizabeth we like tigole bitties in a little bum cover anal.

The Trial Of Saddam Hussein

April 27, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Joseph E. Persico's excellent history of the Nuremberg trials, Nuremberg: Infamy on Trial (1994), expressed the hope that future generations would use Nuremberg as a benchmark for legal procedure and prosecutorial conduct. He asks, "Does Nuremberg offer lessons, a usable matrix that can be salvaged from the bin of history and put to good service to deal with the war crimes of our era?" If we cast a reflective eye on the trial of deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, then the answer to this question must be a resounding no.

The trial of Saddam Hussein is nevertheless of great historical interest. Not because of the trial's fairness and justice (for it was neither), but for what it revealed about the character of the Iraqi leader, and for what it has to teach us about the response of that character to extreme adversity. These are the trial's real points of interest. It is to these matters that we now turn.

Soon after the capture of Saddam Hussein in 2003, the "Iraqi Special Tribunal" was created by the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) for the purpose of conducting trials of figures of the deposed regime. Heading this list, of course, was Saddam himself.

The CPA was the instrument of the occupying American military. Thus the Iraqi Special Tribunal was an attempt to give an Iraqi face to an American design. It was believed that trying Saddam in Iraq would lend legitimacy to the occupation and enhance the status of the government that had been installed in Baghdad at the points of American bayonets.

Many, if not a majority, of the figures in the new government were people who had been persecuted during the Saddam years: Shia members of the Da'awa Party, Kurds, and exiles of various shades of credibility. These figures were more than happy to conduct a show trial of their hated enemy; most of them would have preferred to escort Saddam straight to the gallows with a minimum of legal fuss.

The taint of victors' justice stained the dossier, and impugned the dignity, of the trial from the beginning, and never was removed. Brief consideration was given to conducting the trial in a proper international forum (such as The Hague), but those in power in Baghdad and Washington would not permit it.

Saddam's first hearing was conducted in early July 2004. He was defiant and accusatory: he claimed that he was still the lawful president of Iraq, that he had been deposed illegally, and that the trial was nothing but political theatre. "The real criminal," he claimed, "is Bush." Judge Rizgar Mohammad Amin was generally tolerant of his famous defendant, permitting him to speak at length.

Saddam's bearing here and in future appearances is worth nothing: his eyes flash with anger; he is intelligent and opportunistic; and his speeches have a crude, but effective, rhetorical power. These were the traits that assisted him on his rise to power; and they would now accompany him in his fall.

Saddam's position was enhanced by reports in 2005 that he had refused an offer of house arrest for life—or possibly even release—if he ordered the Iraqi insurgents to lay down their arms. This he refused to do. By now Saddam was concerned only about his place in history; he had no faith in the promises of the Americans, and believed that, if he could go down with the flag flying, his example would inspire future generations.

Thus the stage was set for a remarkable series of courtroom appearances, in which a doomed man alternated between contemptuous defiance and militant rhetoric.

The first "trial", in October 2005, centered around the 1982 killing of civilians in Dujail (a village in Iraq) following a failed assassination attempt against Saddam. Saddam refused to recognize the authority of the court, and continued with political speeches. Two of his defense lawyers (Saadoun Sughaiyer al-Janabi and Adel al-Zubeidi) were abducted and murdered during the proceedings.

Saddam's main defense attorney, Khamis al-Obeidi, was also murdered in Baghdad soon after. Many suspected that these killings were messages sent by pro-government militias: if you defend Saddam, you risk your life. Saddam later began a hunger strike to protest the lack of international protection for his defense counsel, but no protection was forthcoming.

In another display of interference with the legal process, the provisional government removed Chief Judge Amin (who was seen as too "lenient" to Saddam) and replaced him with an Iraqi Kurd named Rauf Rashid Abd al-Rahman. Al-Rahman was actually from the Kurdish town of Halabja, which had been the scene of a notorious chemical attack by Saddam's security forces in the late 1980s. He did not, of course, recuse himself.

In June 2006, Ramsey Clark (a former US Attorney General and now one of Saddam's attorneys) held a press conference claiming that the trial was a farce; that it was being manipulated by the Americans behind the scenes; and that the lack of security for the defense team was a deliberate tactic of intimidation.

Saddam's court statements and interactions with Judge Rahman are worth watching. They show him at his defiant best. "Why don't you bang your gavel on your head?" he tells Chief Judge Rahman. In one speech, he holds up one of his hands, his palm inscribed with scribbled notes. "The prosecution gets as much paper as they want," he cries, "And yet Saddam Hussein has to write on his hands!"

Those knowledgeable of Ba'ath Party history recognized that Saddam brought with him a long tradition of trial dramatics, inherited from the party's days as an underground opposition movement in the 1950s and 1960s.

Chief Judge Rahman: an Iraqi Kurd from Halabja appointed to replace the first judge. Rahman himself was executed by insurgents near Baghdad in 2014.

But the outcome was never in doubt. On November 6, 2006, he was formally sentenced to death by hanging. He shook his fist and said, "Long live the people. Long live the Arab nation [al watan al-araby]. Down with the traitors." His appeals—automatic under Iraqi law—were rejected, and the death sentence was confirmed by the provisional government.

There now remained on the last act of the drama. A letter written by Saddam and smuggled out of his jail urged the Iraqi people to unite and reject sectarian differences; he did not wish to prolong his death sentence, he stated, but was ready to have it carried out.

The execution was carried out on December 30, 2006 at a joint Iraqi-American military facility on the outskirts of Baghdad. When asked by an observer if he had any regrets or remorse, Saddam responded, “No, I am a militant and I have no fear for myself. I have spent my life in jihad and in fighting aggression. Anyone who takes this route should not be afraid.”

In a now infamous cell phone video of the execution, Saddam mounted the scaffold with dignity and restraint. The observers of the execution, mainly Shiite militiamen, are unable to restrain themselves from taunting Saddam; this, as well as the grainy video footage, gives the proceedings a grotesque and brutal aspect.

As the noose is placed around Saddam’s neck, some observers begin to call out “Muqtada…Muqtada” (a reference to Shiite leader Muqtada Al-Sadr). Saddam gives it right back to them, contemptuously responding, “Muqtada! Is this the bravery of Arabs?” When one spectator tells Saddam to “go to hell”, he responds, “The hell that is Iraq?” And then the drama’s done.

Judge Rahman, the Chief Judge who had sentenced Saddam and his fellow defendants, was himself caught and executed by insurgents in the summer of 2014. And the cycle of violence continues in Iraq today.

He was a violent man, a cruel leader whose ambitions outran his abilities. His long rule saw Iraq make great strides in modernization and infrastructure, but at the cost of turning into a repressive police state where any form of dissent, no matter how minor, could invite retribution. With Saddam there was no sense of restraint, and no attempt at moderation, of his baser instincts; he was a gambler, and gamblers do not stop until they have lost everything.

Defiant and dignified

Any temporary good he may have done his country was outweighed by the condition in which he left it: destitute, broken, and ruined. To find another like him, we would have to return to the days of the ancient kings of Assyria, to men like Tiglath-Pileser I or Ashurnasirpal I, who ruled their domains by fear and sought glory in conquest.

And yet despite all this, we must give him some grudging admiration for his performance at trial and on the gallows. We may favorably contrast his behavior with that of the defendants at Nuremberg (excepting Herman Goering, who cheated the hangman in one last act of defiance): Julius Streicher being dragged kicking and screaming to the scaffold; Albert Speer, whose acts of contrition look less like nobility and more like opportunism; and the condition of the others (e.g., Ribbentrop, Keitel, Frank, and Frick), who died broken and pathetic men.

We may also speculate on how Saddam's contemporary peers on the world stage (i.e., various leaders in Europe and America) would have performed in similar circumstances.

His place in history is as yet uncertain. Whether his stature will increase or diminish with the passage of time cannot be said. He rose from the gutter to become absolute dictator of Iraq, and sought to make it a force on the world stage; but despite all his efforts, he was destroyed by his personal foibles, and brought himself and his nation to ruin.

And yet his conduct at trial and on the scaffold prove, despite all attempts to state otherwise, that he was not without bravery. He exited this world stage leaving us with much to ponder on the impenetrable nature of human character, and on the vagaries of Fortune.

Read More: As We Race Towards The Void

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

3 Essential Cooking Tools For A Man

April 27, 2015 | by Klaus Bitter | Link | Original Link

If my first article on dog training didn't clue you in, I'm not one to write red pill critiques of modern society or takedowns of post 3rd wave feminism. I'm "basic." I live my life trying to squeeze the most fun out of it. Consequently, I have a bunch of hobbies and one of my favorites is cooking. It's a great hobby for those who like entertaining. It's practical and you get to eat healthy and delicious food.

All men should know how to cook. Long gone are the days of Suzie Homemaker having a roast with all the fixings waiting for her man when he gets home from the office. For those of us who don't have nightly meals prepared by a traditional Russian dime-piece, we have to fend for ourselves every now and then.

Speaking of dime-pieces, let's not forget that a delicious meal is and will always be a great panty access tool. Girls and delicious food—what more does a man need in life?

Hopefully this and future articles will help bring your cooking to a new level. To get started, the following are three items that I consider essential to a truly masculine cook.

1. Dutch Oven

Good enough for cowboys, good enough for me.

The Dutch oven is by far my favorite cooking accessory. Life does not get better than sitting around a campfire after a long day of fishing or hiking with the aroma of slow cooked meat and vegetables wafting under your nose.

A Dutch oven is a thick-walled cooking pot with a tight fitting lid. Traditionally, they are made of cast iron, but can be made of other materials like ceramic. You can even find light-weight aluminum models for backpacking. For over-the-fire cooking, you will need cast iron. They are thick, sturdy, and the iron retains heat well. Aluminum gets too hot too fast and unless you are hyper-vigilant, you will burn your food. Dutch ovens come in different sizes which allow for stacked cooking of multiple dishes.

Dutch ovens are highly versatile instruments capable of cooking like a stovetop or, like its namesake, baking and roasting like an oven. Their lids are typically concave on the underside, allowing you to use it on coals as a griddle. Additionally, their large size allows you to cook for a group of people and make you the hit of the campground.

Lodge is the most prominent producer of Dutch ovens and the industry standard. Go to any Dutch oven cooking competition and everybody will be cooking with a stack of Lodges. An 8-quart size, which is a whole lot of oven, costs $80 on Amazon. If you just want to make try recipes at home in your oven consider shelling out for a ceramic Le Creuset oven.

The stacked method of cooking with Dutch ovens.

I was lucky enough to get a custom cast MACA before they went out of business. MACA was a Utah-based foundry that began casting furnace linings. Recognizing the similarities in shape to Dutch ovens, they added feet the linings and began making Dutch ovens. MACAs are thicker than Lodges so heat slower and retain heat longer, therefore reducing burning. If you can find one on eBay or craigslist, they are well worth the investment.

The sky is the limit when it comes to recipes. One of my favorites is a simple and delicious roast. Place the oven over hot coals and sear a piece of seasoned meat, add your favorite vegetables, put the lid on and move the coals (either store bought or from the fire) to a 1/3 underneath-2/3 on the lid combination. A can of cream of mushroom soup added halfway through cooking mixes with the drippings to produce a creamy gravy.

A Dutch oven is meat’s best friend.

After a hard night of drinking whiskey and singing campfire songs, a simple breakfast casserole is sure to make you the most popular man at camp. Cook your favorite breakfast meat over direct heat (I like a mixture of diced bacon and kielbasa). Add onions, peppers and whatever other vegetables you have lying around and cook until tender. Add diced bread, shredded cheese and enough beaten egg to coat. Don’t forget seasoning. Switch the coals to the 1/3 under-2/3 over combination until cooked through.

2. Cast Iron Pan

Your typical lightweight non-stick pans just doesn't cook the same as cast iron.

The key to cast iron is seasoning the metal correctly (and keeping it seasoned). If you are using a new pan or Dutch oven, scrub the factory applied protective wax off with soapy water, dry and coat with a thin layer of oil. I like avocado oil due to its high smoke point, but generic canola oil will work too.

Place upside down in a 450-500 degree oven with foil underneath to catch any drips and bake for 30 minutes. Now that your iron is seasoned, try to wash it with just hot water and a cloth. Use mild soap (not detergent) if you really mess it up. The more fatty foods you cook in it, the more it will get seasoned. Try to avoid acidic foods like tomatoes when breaking in a new pan. If it starts looking dry, rusty, or beat up, re-season as above.

3. Meat Grinder

Keeping it old school with a tin-plated grinder.

Is there a more quintessential American food than the hamburger? I love them. Call me old fashioned, but I like my burger to come from a single animal. I am also not a fan of eating pink slime ammonia or picking up a case of Mad Cow Disease. The solution to these problems is to grind your own meat.

As there is almost always some cut of meat on sale below the price of prepackaged ground beef, it is also a price-conscious meal. Grinding your own meat gives you burgers that taste like beef, not freezer-burned fat scraps. If you are being health conscious, go pick up a turkey breast for $2 less a pound than that pack of Jennie-O with unknown origins and make homemade turkey burgers. Also, if you ever plan on hunting, a meat grinder is essential for processing game.

I never had luck with specialized electric grinders. My recommendations are either an old school hand-grinder or a Kitchenaid tilt head mixer and grinder attachment. Hand-grinders are cheap, durable, compact, and have that certain old school appeal. I have found that my arm can crank harder than a compact electric motor as well. A new grinder runs about $30 new at kitchen stores and supermarkets.

The downsides are a sore arm and the singular purpose. Due to the slow speed, after a few pounds of meat, hand-grinders often get fat wrapped around the blade and have to be cleaned before continuing. Putting cubed meat in the freezer for half an hour before grinding helps reduce this.

On the other hand, I have yet to find a piece of meat my Kitchenaid and grinder attachment can't handle. It's a beast with rpms that just spits out ground meat. I can put five pounds of fatty chuck through it without any build up around the blade. There is also a stuffing and extruding attachment available for sausage making.

The investment is well worth the efficiency.

The downside is the expense, about $300 for the mixer and $50 for the grinder attachment. However, Kitchenaid makes quality machines that will last you many years. They also have the advantage of versatility of being a standing mixer. If you are grinding your own meat, you might as well pick up a dough hook and make your own whole wheat and flax meal buns while you are at it, right?

Read More: How To Cook Four Delicious Entrées

Klaus Bitter

Klaus is just another guy trying to make his way in today's society. Somehow he scammed his way into a position of authority. A Renaissance man, he enjoys art, cooking, science, law, dogs and the outdoors.

12 Reasons Your Woman Will End Up Cheating On You

April 28, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago a girl I'd been fucking for a while dropped this little nugget on me:

"I feel like we need to make this thing of ours official or we're going to have to stop seeing each other."

Having been in the game for a while, my red pill programming kicked into auto-pilot. I carelessly shrugged my shoulders, stood up, matter-of-factly said "cool babe" with a small smile, and left her apartment without another word.

During the half hour drive back to my place I replayed the last few weeks of my interactions with her and realized that she would have been well within her hypergamous bill of rights to drop me like the bad habit I am, and I would have nobody to blame but myself.

Though hitting the dread game button straightened her ass out (she was blowing up my phone not five minutes after I left and hasn't broached the subject since I put her back in the starting lineup), the fact remains that my game had fallen off and I didn't even realize it until she deployed that shit test. I'll bet the farm that plenty of you are on the verge of losing frame with your girl(s) and are as ignorant of it as I was.

If I didn't handle that situation accordingly, given the rules of modern dating I would deserve to have been nexted. Same goes for you. If you don't deal with things like this accordingly, your girl can and should cheat on you, next you etc. without delay. Here are 12 reasons why:

12. You've stopped lifting weights

If you let yourself go like this, you deserve that female shitstorm

Before you met your girl you were always in the gym squatting, deadlifting, and benching until you puked. But now that you're getting regular sex, your drive to keep your physical edge has dwindled and your diet's gone to shit. Keep it up and your girl will be blowing someone who looks like you used to.

11. Your hygiene has slipped

Don't expect any makeout sessions with bad breath

When you approached your woman your breath was minty fresh, your facial hair was neat and trimmed, and your clean masculine scent always prompted compliments from her. Since then, you've gotten lazy and slacked off of your daily hygiene regimen. Girls are flaky by nature so they're always looking for a reason to switch cocks. Chronic bad breath and body odor are, these days, both very good reasons for her to jump ship.

10. You pay less attention to your threads

This was one I was guilty of with my fuck buddy. The more comfortable I got with her, the less care I took in my appearance when I went to see her, which was reflected in my attitude. Dress like a rock star and you'll act like one. This isn't to say you should dress to the nines all the time, but if you stop trying altogether, your girl will notice and start to explore greener pastures.

9. You watch too much porn

Porn has its place, but whacking off to it too much depletes your testosterone and drastically reduces your sex drive. If you're not fucking your woman because you can't keep the chicken-choking in front of a screen to a minimum, she's going to find a cock more willing than yours.

8. You've stopped approaching

Once again, I was guilty of slipping in this department. My FWB had been providing me with sex so frequently that I didn't feel the need to go out and add other chicks to my roster anymore. Chateau's seventh commandment of poon states:

> Always keep two in the kitty

Having a backup chick or three creates that all-important abundance mentality which is paramount to your overall game. Don't let one good pussy keep you from the acquisition of others because the moment you do, your leverage is out the door and the shit tests are sure to follow.

7. Your frame has weakened

On the verge of losing frame

When your woman threw a fit because you didn't remember your "two week anniversary" you laughed at her and treated her like the petulant two-year-old she was acting like. These days you feed into her shenanigans more than you used to, which means she's got her foot in the door to emotionally manipulate you. She may start banging a dude on the side who doesn't give a shit about her tears or caves into her tantrums.

6. You don't dominate her in bed

If you don't, Christian will

As far as sex is concerned, different girls have different preferences at different times.

But one thing they all have in common is that they want to be physically dominated sexually. The need to be taken by a man in this way is firmly encoded in their DNA.

There's a time and place to "make sweet love" to her, but a woman doesn't feel like a woman if she's not being ravaged by a dominant man. This is what she wants and needs. If you're not giving it to her, don't be surprised if she finds someone else who will pull her hair and smack her ass.

5. You spend too much money on her

[image]
Don't give her gifts, give her tingles

This was a big one for me back in the day. I'd meet a girl, we'd start having sex and I'd start buying her shit—a lot of shit. Big fucking mistake. Rewarding women with money or extravagant gifts will place her value above yours and it's all downhill from there.

Nobody's suggesting you shouldn't buy anything for her if she's a good woman, but the best reward you can give a woman is your time and attention. Let the government, white knights, and her orbiters pick up the tab or she'll bounce like a bad check.

4. You talk shit about other men

Nothing says beta like saying "He's an idiot for spending that much on a car" or "All those tatts make him look stupid" or "He's such a douche bag." Hating on other guys in the presence of your woman is a feminine trait and screams lack of confidence. Keep trashing these dudes if you want to, but I can guarantee your girl is fantasizing about blowing him in that fancy car of his—which she should be if you're acting like a female.

3. You never tell her "no"

Your girl has every right to cheat on you if you're not man enough put your foot down and tell her you're not taking her to see the latest rom com or that you will not be going with her to hang out with her girlfriends to squawk about bullshit and drink cosmopolitans all night.

A woman wants and needs a man who keeps her in line by not catering to her every whim. If your spineless ass isn't cutting it, don't be surprised when she fucks a man who puts her in her place but keeps you around to satisfy all of her other non-sexual needs.

2. You fail too many shit tests

When you first hooked up, you'd swat away shit tests like pesky flies. But a little time has passed and you're getting comfortable so you let your guard down a little. Perfectly natural. We're all human.

But little by little she starts shit testing you with increasing frequency, and before you know it you're sniveling mess begging her not to leave and coming up with reasons the two of you don't need to "take a break" like she suggested. She's about to walk right out that door to teach your weak-minded ass a lesson.

1. You're a closet white knight

At least men who openly white knight are keeping it 100

Despite frequenting neomasculine websites and commenting on articles and message boards, you're still secretly holding on to concepts like NAWALT, that your woman "should love me for me," or any other ridiculous notion you claim to have seen the light on.

No matter how well you think you hide it, your girl will eventually sniff it out (females have a supernatural ability to quickly detect incongruity) and when that happens she'll step out on you if she doesn't leave altogether. White knights, closet or public, don't deserve the affections of a woman—period.

Conclusion

While it's important to understand that occasional slip ups in game are inevitable, it is more important to drill this one unshakable truth about today's sexual marketplace:

The game never ever ends…ever.

I understand as well as anybody here that it can be a grind to never let your guard down around your woman. But we were born men, which means we're equipped to deal with it and even thrive in these situations. We can bitch and moan about how easy women have it and how difficult it is for us out here but personally, I wouldn't have it any other way. Hardship, pain, and strife are all things we are built to overcome.

Point blank, if your girl cheats on you it is your fault. It is your responsibility as a man to keep your woman in check because she is ill-equipped, nor can she be trusted to keep herself together.

Stop watching porn and eating junk food, get your ass to the gym, and learn game. From here on out when you see signs of your woman stepping out of line remember that you are a man. Grab your Y-chromosome and handle it, or someone else will.

Read Next: Tag The Sponsor Exposes The Depravity Of Modern Women

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Two Self-Confessed Drug Ringleaders Are Enjoying Mass Public Sympathy

April 28, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In April 2005, nine Australians were arrested for trying to smuggle US $3 million of heroin from Bali, Indonesia to Australia. The two ringleaders, Andrew Chan and Myuran Sukumaran, were amongst those initially sentenced to death in early 2006. Chan and Sukumaran's "final" judicial appeals against the death sentence were dismissed in June and July 2011, respectively. Since late 2014, both men have repeatedly sought clemency from Indonesian President Joko Widodo and then appealed his rejections of mercy via the courts.

Over the weekend, the pair were informed their executions were imminent and would take place a minimum of 72 hours after the announcement. They will probably be executed within days (or hours) of my words being published.

In the meantime, many from all corners of Australia have incessantly rallied behind the two, who admitted to multiple drug smuggling operations before being caught. Supporters, including the Australian Prime Minister Tony Abbott, emphasize Chan and Sukumaran's "rehabilitation" in prison, notably Chan's ordination as a Christian minister, Sukumaran's art abilities and both men's facilitation of education for fellow inmates. Perth's Curtin University fell over itself to confer an Associate Degree in Fine Arts on Sukumaran.

On Monday night, several hundred people turned up for a candlelit vigil for the death row pair, the most recent of many held in cities this year. Seeking to ingratiate themselves with a public still slowly turning away from their message, Catholic bishops and archbishops have been agitating for Chan and Sukumaran for months.

Apparently these clerics forget the more desperate members of their flock who didn't choose to smuggle heroin and live on the streets of Australia, have had their houses foreclosed or daily suffer any other injustice or misery.

But why? Of all the people facing hard times in Australia and Indonesia, hit by cancer, poverty, mental illness, intellectual or physical disability, or injury from violence, why are the Australian political elite and SJWs robbing true victims of attention and channeling it towards two inveterate drug smugglers?

The Sukumaran and Chan debacle uncovers a pernicious trend in Western political and media discourse: people pretending they fight for justice when they instead caricature it. The meaning of victimhood is beaten and bent, and those who really need our support are ignored.

Why focus on these two?

How many blameless cancer victims get the help Chan and his friend Sukumaran have received?

Even if you abhor the death penalty, the amount of collective time and energy we can devote to social causes is finite. For instance, if you properly focus on preventing one or two instances of the death penalty, you naturally ignore a thousand similar cases, especially where guilt for the crime is seemingly not beyond reasonable doubt.

The same goes for "causes" in general. By devoting five hundred recent stories to Andrew Chan and Myuran Sukumaran, the Australian media neglects a litany of other, much more deserving issues. Although homelessness in Australia is on the rise, Alzheimer's has become a cognitive scourge devastating hundreds of thousands of families, and the nation's disabled still live in frequent poverty, we living Down Under are meant to tolerate the domination of our print media and airwaves by two narcissistic criminals who wanted a get-rich-quick scheme involving highly addictive narcotics.

This is not a scenario of innocent people falsely condemned. The evidence against them was incontrovertible, and Sukumaran, like most of the other Bali Nine members, was found with drugs strapped to his body. Plenty of additional Australians and other Westerners languish in Second and Third World jails, incarcerated under dubious processes where the evidence against them is open to wide interpretation. Why not speak up for them, Prime Minister Abbott?

How am I meant to feel sorry for Chan and Sukumaran when I see children like this?

Where were the TV crews when your aunt wasted away before you and horrifically died of cancer? Or when the lonely senior citizen who was your neighbour died quietly and nobody realized for two years? These sorts of cases happen around the world, every day, and governments and elites do not rush to lend a helping hand.

Indonesia is hypocritical – so what?

SJWs have devoted inordinate attention to Indonesia's bipolar behavior in advocating for its own citizens sentenced to death abroad, but generally refusing to reverse death sentences against foreigners within its own legal system. This is exactly the standard practiced by every country in the world in some form or another. Hypocrisy is rife in every country.

What's even more hypocritical, though, is ascribing victim status to two people who orchestrated multiple, massive drug smuggling operations and then had the audacity to cry "proper justice" when Indonesia, a serial death penalty user, sentenced them to the firing squad.

A criminal's rehabilitation is based on a myth

When I was a teenager, I remember Stanley Tookie Williams “rehabilitating” himself after going on death row, too.

Unlike the convoluted, uneducated Corby family, whose wayward daughter Schapelle became the focus of innumerable bizarre conspiracy theories about how she was ever convicted in Bali for marijuana smuggling, the families of the two condemned men come across as decent, genuine and down-to-earth. This begs the question as to how Sukumaran and Chan became involved in the drugs trade to begin with, other than through a clear, thought-out choice for which they are now paying for. So boo-hoo.

Their attempts at “rehabilitation” dovetail nicely, as well, with the firing squad which has awaited them for years. Until the prospect of a death sentence loomed from around the corner, just after their arrest, they were unrepentant peddlers of pain and merchants of death. The buck mattered more than the bite it gave to those dying from the heroin they imported to Australia.

The problem, too, with rehabilitation is that it largely depends on an inmate’s background and levels of socialization. Poorer inmates, perhaps native Balinese or other Indonesians, would have been denied the relative privilege of Sukumaran and Chan, who grew up in run-of-the-mill, secure families in prosperous Australia. This affects the opportunities for condemned inmates to skilfully stage their rehabilitation and argue for clemency under a watchful media eye.

These men, unlike their prison colleagues, have also always had the benefits of mass public support and a Foreign Ministry probably unrivalled in its drive to defend the interests of its incarcerated nationals abroad. These advantages have enabled Sukumaran and Chan to hone their skills in jail and “selflessly” teach them to others. There is nothing altruistic and everything self-preserving about these calculated actions.

Focus on the real victims

We should not shed a tear for Chan and Sukumaran until those more deserving of our sympathy and assistance have it given to them. When they die, these Australians will die of their own volition, having proactively chosen the firing squad.

The distortion of victimhood has now reached its apex with examples such as this. True victims have been hidden behind a curtain for too long, muddied by political correctness and gimmicky social media and “social justice” campaigns.

Start dealing with real issues. Chan and Sukumaran brought their fate on themselves. Let them now eat the cake they baked.

Read More: Dr. Oz Is A Pussy

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

7 Ways To Tell If Your Sports Memorabilia Is Real

April 28, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Steiner Sports

Some have likened the characteristics of the Internet to the lawlessness of the Wild West. If this is true, then the sports memorabilia industry is more so. At least Dodge City had a sheriff. There is no regulating force, no single governing body to defend consumers from fraudulent practices, of unscrupulous sellers, of non-authenticated sports memorabilia. While fraudulent practices have prompted federal authorities to investigate illegal activity, it is generally after consumers have already been burned.

For a year prior to the 2015 Super Bowl, federal investigators working with the National Football League confiscated nineteen and a half million dollars in counterfeit sports collectibles. That translates to 326,147 fake memorabilia items seized and 52 individuals arrested.

Online entities, local stores, flea markets and crooks selling “sports memorabilia” on the street, were included in the federal sting. The sweep kept thousands of collectors from being bilked, but the problem is hardly solved. The fake memorabilia ruse is a serious problem, with real monetary implications.

The sports memorabilia industry garners 1 billion dollars per year and scammers are vying to get in on the action. All too often collectors find themselves on the disappointing end of sports collectible scams.

While it is difficult for consumers to definitively authenticate memorabilia, there are ways to protect yourself from unlawful practices, and to distinguish between what is fake and what is authentic sports memorabilia.

1. Do your homework

Study the market and dealers. Only purchase from reputable industry leaders. Steiner Sports for instance, is the "top distributor of authentic sports collectibles" and as such provides an authenticity guarantee. Also, sports paraphernalia sold through the National Football League and Major League Baseball is sold under strict rules and authentication practices.

2. Do it in person

When at all possible, collectors should obtain signed signatures in person. This is obviously the best way to ensure authenticity—standing in the presence of the athlete as he signs.

3. Stay inquisitive

If a dealer refuses to come clean on information regarding the authentication practice, or if it lacks evidence on how long it has been in existence or fails to disclose the city and state in which it is located, then keep moving. The lack of information surrounding the dealer may indicate that the business is fraudulent.

Why wouldn’t a reputable business supply pertinent information on the company and its practices? Dealers at auctions should at the very least supply working telephone numbers, email, and physical addresses.

4. Beware of 2nd party authentication

Determine who actually supports the authentication, the first or second dealer. Both dealers should support authentication. If the certificate bears only the signature of the 1st dealer, then contact him to determine whether the item really did originate from his authenticated inventory.

5. Deal with reputable companies

Purchase hand-signed collectibles from companies that stand behind their autographed pieces. Steiner Sports guarantees that an authorized Steiner Sports representative was present at the time of signing. Additionally, every autographed collectible is marked by a tamper-proof hologram, before being cataloged and inventoried.

You may not have personal access to the professional athlete that signed your collectible. However, companies that ensure your sports memorabilia is authentic do. These companies will offer proof that the athlete signed the product, through an athlete-signed and notarized affidavit.

6. Don’t let your emotions get the best of you

Don’t allow desire to overwhelm sensibility. Don’t be pressured to purchase an item that you have long coveted if there is no proof of authenticity.

7. Stay realistic

If it seems to good to be true, it more than likely is. There is no such thing as a free lunch, especially in this business. Before purchasing an item that is below market value, ask yourself this question. “How is it possible for a dealer to offer a signed item, by a 5 million dollar contract athlete, for so little?” The answer to the questions is, “he can’t.” The item is fraudulent.

Click here to visit Steiner Sports for your authentic sports memorabilia needs.

Advertise Your Site Or Product On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Diversity Officer At London Uni Bans Whites And Men From “Anti-Racist” Event

April 29, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

An elected diversity officer at London’s liberal-infested Goldsmiths University has caused consternation by banning men and whites from a campus meeting. Bahar Mustafa, 27, properly titled “Welfare and Diversity Officer,” initially advertised the event on her Facebook page as a “BME Women and non-binary event only.”

After being called out on her apparent racism and sexism against whites and men, she doubled down in defiance, posting an anti-male selfie on her Facebook. Coming in the same week as a LibDem activist Sarah Noble was suspended by her (if that is her preferred pronoun) party over tweets calling for the death of all men, the revelations about Bahar Mustafa raise questions whether British Universities has been infected with US-style identity politics of the lunatic fringe.

Politics and the English language

Bahar Mustafa, a textbook thousand-cock stare.

The brou-ha-ha began with a Facebook event which invited followers to “Invite loads of BME Women and non-binary people.” BME, as a sidenote, is an acronym for “Black and Ethnic Minority.” The use of the term provides a clue into the mind-set of Mustafa, who clearly subscribes to an American-style identity politics based on alphabet soup abbreviations and invented buzzwords.

The origin of the term is obscure, and nobody seems to know whether black people and ethnic minorities have been consulted about being filed under a common abbreviation. Even the diversity industry has said that “referring to people with a set of initial letters is basically reductionist, dehumanising and outrageous.”

This has not prevented right-on politicians of all stripes from trotting the phrase out on a regular basis in order to appear sensitive to “the issue of race.” Non-binary is a term better known to the ROK readership, signifying confused degenerates who disassociate from the traditional, healthy gender roles ascribed to men and women in traditional societies that rank low on the DEFCOCK scale.

Racism and bigotry à la mode

In today’s climate of microaggressions and “check your privilege,” weak-minded people associating on and off campus in order to wallow in their own embellished victimhoods is old hat. What is shocking, however, is the stipulation attached by Bahar Mustafa to the invite:

> if you’ve been invited and you’re a man and/or white PLEASE DON’T COME

The meeting organised by Bahar Mustafa, an apparent candidate for a precocious impact with The Wall who has the inane expression of a child that won’t out-earn their parents, was to discuss “diversification of the curriculum.” Heaven forfend some white or male student might dare to question the sort of “student democracy” that pretends to exclude a group of people from discussions of policy that will affect them, and for which they will have to pay.

Bahar reacted to the outrage provoked by her anti-white, anti-male post by posting a selfie in front of a white piece of A4 paper bearing the text “no white cis men.” Accompanying the slogan was an illustrated mug filling with “male tears.”

Comment is nugatory.

Public patience is wearing thin

It seems that unlike our cousins over the pond, the British appetite for racial and gender-based self-flagellation is less pronounced. The Daily Mail reported that the University itself wrote to its Student Union to “express concern.” The Tab, Goldsmiths’ student paper, reported a senior Student Union society president, speaking on condition of anonymity

> For Bahar to have the nerve to write this is patronising beyond belief. She (if that is her preferred gender pronoun) has made it very difficult for white cis males on campus who feel like they can’t say anything for fear of retribution. the irony that she (or they) think that they are diversifying the student community in the name of feminism and multiculturalism is laughable.

The barely disguised irony of the “anonymous dissenter” reveals that not everybody is subscribing to the policy book of what Heartiste calls the Degenerate Freak Mafia. The loons at the Goldsmiths SU, sensing the outrage was coming from more than a few neckbeards they could afford to brush off, backtracked and updated the event page to read “allies now welcome.”

The Holocaust: too “Eurocentric” for Goldsmiths’ Student Union

It’s not the first instance of lunatic left wing policies cropping up at Goldsmiths. Earlier in the year, the Goldsmiths Students Assembly voted down a motion to commemorate the Holocaust, because to commemorate the Holocaust would be “Eurocentric” and “colonialist.” One student nonsensically complained that, “The motion would force people to remember things they may not want to remember.”

Trans dyke, feminist, equality campaigner

Sarah Noble: not even with yours.

The other recent case of Sarah Noble, the LibDem committee bod suspended by the party over her tweets calling on followers to “kill all men,” shows that lunatic fringe might be spilling out of the confines of the campus and into mainstream party politics.

Sarah Noble first popped up at the NUS Women’s conference that gifted “jazz hands” unto the world. She is an author on assorted Liberal talking points, mostly prostitution, which she wants to legalise. She writes on Democrat Voice, a major independent blog of Britain’s coalition minority ruling party. T his character calls herself a “Trans dyke, feminist, LGBTLD executive member, NUS LGBT committee member-elect, sex work and equality campaigner.” Her tweets about #NUSWomen15 included the following gems:

Obviously a virulent man-hater, Sarah Noble is also a busy bee, and sits on the Liberal Democrats' LGBT committee, their Humanist and Secularist committee, her regional committee in Yorkshire and Humber, and the policy committee of Liberal Youth.

Or she did, until she resigned or was suspended from her appointments pending investigations. This is the UK's minority governing party, purporting to offer "Change That Works For You" by "Building a Fairer Britain." You might be forgiven for failing to see the "fairness" in "removing men from society."

Liberal Democrat MP Jo Swinson was happy to try to distance the LibDems from Noble's comments: "Such comments are completely unacceptable and in no way representative of the views of Liberal Democrats. We have taken action and asked the person in question to remove the posts and apologise."

But does anyone really believe this? Sarah Noble is an up-and-coming young Liberal Democrat, with fingers in many pies. She is clearly going places within the party hierarchy. If such a character feels at ease in uttering hate speech against men, that must mean that such sentiments are all too common amongst her ilk, and she inadvertently turned her filter off.

A noble cause

Modernity is spawning hermaphrodites.

The brazen chutzpah of the woman (if it is indeed a woman) is evident in the terse statement about the incident posted on her website. Here it is in full:

> For a significant period of time I have been the subject of misogynistic online trolling and harassment of the most personal and unpleasant kind. In response to that I made a series of tweets that I realise now have caused offence. I have now deleted those tweets and apologise to those I have offended, whether in my own party or members of the public. I am also grateful to those in the party who have handled this fairly and promptly.

The problem, apparently, is not wanting to "kill all men." It's "causing offence." It would be hard to imagine an up and coming politician making a statement calling for the "death of all negroes" only to then get away with making such a tepid apology.

The icing on the cake is the leading mention of "misogynistic online trolling," which canny minds might regard as a fair cop in response to the patently misandrist online trolling that she engaged in. Still, the victimhood runs deep in these hucksters.

What is to be done?

Nutters like Bahar Mustafa and Sarah Noble infect every level of politics from the zany corners of campus to the heights of power. It's tempting to think that they are fringe lunatics operating in small numbers, but the brazenness with which they spew their bile suggests that their views are common coin.

I have previously advocated the placing these sorts hucksters under surveillance. If the United Nations can get itself involve over Katie Hopkins calling migrants "cockroaches," then surely it’s time that genocidal filth like Bahar Mustafa and Sarah Noble are treated as equivalent to ISIS on British University campuses and local political scenes.

For these “liberals,” an illiberal attitude to their genocidal, separatist ramblings is an absolute must.

Read Next: Protein World Enrages Feminists Who Hate Female Beauty

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

5 Ways To Develop Discipline Instead Of Just "Getting Motivated"

April 29, 2015 | by Fabian Funes | Link | Original Link

It is quite easy to find motivation with our access to the internet. We watch videos of people doing things we could not fathom doing with our own bodies, and we feel a fire in the pit of our stomachs as we imagine how we are about to change our lives to reach peak performance. A few days go by and we stick to our strenuous exercises, looking to someday be in a motivational video of our own.

We lose ourselves in the thoughts of being hard bodies that make other people uncomfortable to be around because of sheer envy. Then starts the second week of your new life, and you decide to take a day off because you've earned it. One day turns to two days ,which turns into a week. You are back on your timelines looking for motivation to get back off your couch and lifting weights.

Eh, I'll start again on Monday.

Motivation cannot change your life alone; it is a catalyst for you to sit down, make a plan, and maintain discipline. That fact alone has changed my life. I could tell you about the many attempts I made to get a physique I could be proud of, only to peter out within two weeks of training. There I would be, with Flamin' Hot Funyuns residue on my fingertips, contemplating when I would start my regimen again.

The failure we fall into reaches farther than just our bodies. I would start to make time to read more and become more intellectual; again I would find myself watching TV or wasting massive amounts of time on the internet watching pornography or ridiculous compilation videos.

I began to think that the feeling of being a god for two weeks was not enough for me to make a permanent life change; it was because I hardly ever taught myself to be disciplined. I would be satisfied with whatever minor change I made and I would give myself an unwarranted vacation that would last longer than my new activity. Shamefully, I did this countless times throughout my life.

Start today, right now.

Here are five ways to build a level of discipline that trumps any temporary external motivation:

1. Decide To Consume Fuel For Your Mind And Body

This is what started everything for me. I began to notice how my mood stayed constantly positive when I skipped fast food and instead cooked my own meals. There is a boost to your ego when you start to excel your cooking techniques; you are also more likely to make something that is healthy.

It takes time to cook, so these meals will be small victories on their own, and women like a man who can play with their taste buds in more ways than one.

2. Make Less Time For Things That Keep You In Stasis

There is a reason why many people tell you that a book is better than the movie. Reading lets you learn new words and allows your imagination to stretch, unlike movies and television. At the end of a book, there is a feeling of accomplishment because you have digested somebody’s words and gave them your own interpretation.

This cannot be said for video games and binge watching Netflix. I am not making the claim that it is entirely bad to visually entertain yourself, but you should choose things that will push your brain to consider things you had yet to take in to account.

3. Be Accountable For Yourself

You must be self aware, and know when you deserve a break, and quickly identify the moments you are being lazy. Laziness kills civilizations. If you catch yourself getting out of your new schedule, do not tell yourself you will start over next week. Next week will be too late, and you will definitely regret it. Trust me, you will regret it.

4. Exercise On A Schedule—No Excuses

Start lifting weights; weights that are heavy. Push yourself to failure and live in the beauty that is lactic acid. Run until the moment you feel like you cannot take another pace, and then take another step.

You will be surprised at how much you can actually accomplish and you will scold yourself for not doing this earlier in your life. The only person that is important to impress is yourself. The euphoria will carry on for days and you will go out there and get yourself another fix.

5. You Will Feel Tired; You Will Push Through

You will schedule DESERVED breaks, but you will undoubtedly feel that are not up for being a superhuman on some days. Yet, you will not give in to this urge—instead you will push harder so your body knows that your strong will can punish it for feeling weak. Whenever you feel like you do not want to lift heavy, you will do extra reps in order to kill the weakness that has managed to infiltrate your soul. Success is yours.

Conclusion

Motivation is not all bad; it gives you that fuzzy sensation that tells that you can do whatever you decide to do. This is true, for the most part. Motivation needs to be followed up with discipline. Creating this discipline is how you will become a different being than what you were months ago; you will get the glow everyone is craving for.

If you are not evolving, you are not truly alive.

Read More: Need Motivation? Learn To Meditate

Fabian Funes
Fabian is an aspiring writer who is also a student of languages, medicines and chemicals. He has a strong aversion to 8-hour work days so he is on a journey to live this life on his terms.

New York Has Adopted Yes Means Yes

April 29, 2015 | by Michael Augustus | Link | Original Link

Once is an event. Twice is a coincidence. Thrice is a pattern. Four times is conspiracy.

On October 2, 2014, New York Governor Andrew M. Cuomo, passed a sexual assault "resolution" establishing mandatory adoption of affirmative consent and the Sexual Assault Victims Bill of Rights for all SUNY schools (Public NY Schools). The link to the resolution is, here, if you wish to read it in it's entirety. This was the reasoning behind the move:

> There has been an epidemic of sexual violence in this country that is truly disturbing and it is plaguing our college campuses.

– NY Governor Andrew M. Cuomo (Source)

The almighty, ever-present rape culture lingers in the air. Every breathing female, especially those in university, are at great risk of sexual assault. In fact, 1 in 4 women who draw breath from the patriarchy become infected with rape.

Of course this is ridiculous. If 25% of all female college students were raped (original definition), women would not make up the majority of university enrollments because fathers would forbid their daughters' attendance on their dime.

The Resolution (Screen Shots)

Affirmative Consent Mandatory For Public NY Schools

All SUNY campuses to adopt a system-wide definition of affirmative consent as a clear, unambiguous, and voluntary agreement between the participants to engage in specific sexual activity, and shall widely disseminate this definition to the college/university community;

Sexual Assault Bill Of Rights Mandatory For Public NY Schools

All SUNY campuses to adopt a uniform Sexual Assault Victims' Bill of Rights to notify and assist victims of sexual assault of their right to contact campus, local and/or State law enforcement, and to widely publicize the Bill of Rights to all students and distribute it to victims;

Just in case you didn't read the first reference, the link for, Campus Sexual Assault Victims' Bill of Rights Act of 1991, is here.

New York's Definition Of Affirmative Consent

Consent is clear, knowing and voluntary. Consent is active, not passive. Silence, in and of itself, cannot be interpreted as consent. Consent can be given by words or actions, as long as those words or actions create mutually understandable clear permission regarding willingness to engage in (and the conditions of) sexual activity.

Consent to any one form of sexual activity cannot automatically imply consent to any other forms of sexual activity.

Previous relationships or prior consent cannot imply consent to future sexual acts.

I've said it before, and I'll say it again: affirmative consent is nonsense. How do you believe men and women had sex before the invention of speech? Answer: body language. This law shows a complete lack of understanding about human sexuality. This will dehydrate pussy faster than a hair dryer.

In addition, you can't prove any of this affirmative consent occurred beyond hearsay. This is just feel-good rhetoric to keep the sheep quiet.

Having a relationship does in fact imply future consent because relationships are attention, protection, and resources in exchange for sex. Period. If sex does not take place between a male and female, a relationship does not exist. Any concept of love and other fluff society places upon this foundation is just a euphemistic embellishment.

A relationship is an unspoken contract that the male may initiate intimate touch and sexual activity without prior consent.

No Female Accountability

Resolved that all SUNY campuses shall adopt the uniform sexual assault student reporting amnesty policy granting amnesty for various student code of conduct violations, for example, minor alcohol or drug infractions, for students reporting incidents of sexual assault or other sexual violence; and, be it further

It is official. College females in the state of New York will not ever be held accountable for their actions leading up to the alleged rape or for lying about it's occurrence.

If you were a woman, weaker than all males 16 years and older, what would be the logical approach to preventing this? If you stand no chance against a male aggressor, wouldn't you think that dulling your senses by inebriating yourself with copious amounts of alcohol to the point that you can't keep your composure is a bad idea?

In fact, wouldn't it just be safe to ban all women from consuming alcohol, saving them from themselves like we do with children? No, no, no Michael Augustus. That's victim blaming! Don't teach women how to take precautions, teach men not to rape!

Student Warning

with existing federal laws. SUNY will also release a uniform training for students to be included at each freshman orientation;

Thank God. This is the only good thing they placed in this "resolution," Men are being warned ahead of time. All NY college men will know to cease any current plate spinning, dump their girlfriends, and remain abstinent throughout their attendance. The only thing that they forgot is the video, Feminism for Bros 105. Take note how the girl doesn't ask for consent.

Governor's Goals

New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo said on Saturday he plans to introduce legislation requiring universities to adopt an affirmative consent policy for sexual interactions at college campuses statewide.

The move, which needs to pass through the state Legislature to become law, would broaden a regulation passed on all State University of New York campuses last year, largely in response to student outcries over how schools handle campus sexual offenses.

It would apply at public and private institutions.

Before, the "Yes Means Yes" legislation only applied to public schools. Now, the U.S. government wants this to spread throughout the state, outside the confinements of universities, just like the U.K. (Source)

The New Phenomenon

> Based on the observations on the effects of rape hysteria in multiple societies around the world, a new law has been instated. Unlike Briffault's Law which always was, is, and always will be, this is temporary, and will hopefully be repealed in the near future after the inevitable decline and never be reinstated.
>
> ### Warlock's Law (Source)
>
> The female, not the male, determines all conditions of consent. Where the female can derive no positive emotions from the sexual act, no such consent has taken place.
>
> Corollaries:
>
> 1) All consent provided by the female is contingent on how she currently feels. Any past or present form of agreement whether it be verbal, written, or displayed with body language is merely coincidental.
>
> 2) Past consent provided by the female before the act can be withdrawn during the act without communicating any intelligible sign to the male. The male's ignorance of this is no excuse and he is held responsible for not having recognized the female's thoughts at the time of withdrawal via telepathy.
>
> 3) Any consent provided by the female before and during the act is null and void as soon as the female decides to withdraw consent after the fact for any reason or no reason at all. (See Corollary 1)
>
> 4) The act need not have taken place. The female can withdraw consent from a fabricated event involving herself and any male(s) she chooses.

> 5) The risk of withdrawn consent by the female can never be destroyed, with the odds inversely proportional to the female's perception of the male's SMV and directly proportional to the magnitude by which the female's perceived reputation may decline in the event her sexual indiscretions with the male were to reach the spotlight, the female's desire for commitment from the male before the act, the level of vendetta the female holds after failing to acquire commitment from the male after the act, and the amount of resources or attention that can be derived by the female at the male's expense via libel, slander, and/or litigation without consequence.
>
> 6) Any skepticism regarding the alleged female victim's claims is victim blaming. Any male expectations of agency regarding the female's involvement in the alleged act is a confession of misogyny, to hate all females.

The Plugged-In Support Feminism

> The Matrix is a system, Neo. That system is our enemy. But when you're inside, you look around, what do you see? Businessmen, teachers, lawyers, carpenters. The very minds of the people we are trying to save. But until we do, these people are still a part of that system and that makes them our enemy. You have to understand, most of these people are not ready to be unplugged. And many of them are so inert, so hopelessly dependent on the system, that they will fight to protect it.
>
> – Neo

In the video below, Roosh discusses how a blogger named Ezra says that although Affirmative Consent is a terrible law, he fully supports it because men should live in fear when engaging women.

Men, we are under attack, but misandry is not the big picture. Feminism is just a clown vehicle of useful idiots that the government is using to oppress males on their journey to oppress the rights of everybody. We are being targeted first because we are the main threat and our oppression is within the PC guidelines. Allowing men to exist unharmed is a big no-no, because when left to their own devices they are capable of independent thought.

Read More: "Yes Means Yes" Comes To London

Michael Augustus
AKA dr_warlock My Blog: RedPillDoctor.com My Email: Trp.Red: dr_warlock Youtube Channel: dr_warlockTRP Twitter: @dr_warlockTRP

8 Relationship Lockdown Techniques To Avoid

April 30, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Dating was a lot different before the sexual revolution. Men were highly motivated to get married because it was the only way they could get sex for free. Yes, fornication and adultery have always been around, but there were a lot of social factors in place that prevented it from being as common as it is today.

Because most men wanted to get married, a girl only had to use her youth, beauty, charm, and her family's social status to attract a husband. She didn't have to resort to additional techniques to force a man into a commitment.

But things have changed.

In the modern world, sex is a readily available commodity—virtually every unmarried woman "puts out." This is a great situation if you happen to be a PUA feeding off the bloated, festering carcass that once was western civilization. It is not so great if you happen to be a traditionally minded man.

Today, women need to resort to all sorts of additional stratagems to lock a man down. They start using these lockdown techniques early in a relationship. You need to be able to spot them quickly so that you don't get suckered into a long-term relationship with a girl that you don't want to commit to.

1. Sex

Men seek out sex because it feels good, but women are more likely to use sex to get what they want. Even though poon is easy to come by, women who want an LTR know, or at least hope, that it builds some sort of emotional bond with a man.

They also know that a man will want to keep on returning to poon palace so they will keep the gates to the palace open as long as it takes to get a ring.

How do you know whether she is using sex to snag you? Most likely, she is. The key question to ask yourself is whether you mind being trapped by this particular girl. If you don't mind, then proceed forward. She might be the right girl for you.

Of course, the way to avoid this stratagem is to find a virgin and keep her that way until your wedding night.

2. Leaving Stuff At Your House

Leaving things at a man's house is another stratagem that women use to escalate a relationship. It might be a toothbrush or something more intimate like a bra or panties. It starts out small, but before long she might have significant bits of her wardrobe in your house.

Leaving personal articles does two things. First, it marks your place as her territory. Her stuff serves as a talisman to ward off competing females. If you bring home a rival female, the rival will be turned off if she finds the other girl's personal things.

Second, leaving a personal item behind means that she always has at least one more chance to see you. Even if you decide to end the relationship, you'll still have to meet her one last time to return her favorite pillow. And this means that she will have one more chance to try to keep her claws in you.

Almost all girls use this tactic—even good ones—so if you see it, don't regard it as a deal breaker if you want to continue the relationship. Nonetheless, you still should be aware of what is going on.

3. Buying A Pet Together

You and mommy are breaking up?

A pet is a baby proxy. It forces you into an emotional commitment. How can you deprive Fluffy of her mommy? You monster!

Never buy a pet with a girlfriend you don't want around for a long, long time. It is just a manipulation technique.

4. Getting Knocked Up

Unmarried women frequently get pregnant either to extract child support payments from the baby daddy, or to force the man to marry her. In either case, this is not a girl you want to commit to, and is usually a losing proposition for everyone involved.

Gentleman, the lesson is simple: if you plan to go out in the rain, wear a raincoat!

5. Financial Entanglements

A related stratagem is to somehow merge a portion of your finances. This could be opening a joint checking account or buying some large piece of property together like a car or a motorcycle.

I have a friend who bought a house with his girlfriend almost immediately after he started dating her. It was a tempting offer for him because the girl had the money for the down payment so he was able to move into a bigger house than he would have been able to afford on his own. Not surprisingly, he ended up marrying her.

The problem with entangling your finances with a woman is that it clouds your judgment and adds emotional commitment. When considering an LTR, your mind needs to be clear.

Never allow yourself to become financially entangled with a girlfriend. There already exists an institution that implies merging of financial interests. That institution is marriage.

6. Living Together

Many a man has fallen to this stratagem. The mirage is that living together means unlimited sex with zero commitment. The truth is that it is that it is the ultimate lockdown technique.

If you agree to live with a woman, you are pretty much closing off any opportunities for meeting other women. And if you do choose to break up, it is going to be painful. The woman hopes that it will be so painful, that you will just succumb to staying with her.

I used to live next door to a couple that was living together. They were a good-looking couple, but it was pretty clear that the guy was not terribly happy with the arrangement. Regardless of his feelings, he finally gave in and married the girl. He went to his wedding like a man goes to the gallows.

Avoid moving in with a woman. If you really want to live with her, make it legal by marrying her.

7. Social Media Announcements

It is one thing to go to a party or even a wedding as a couple. It is another when your relationship is recorded in writing on social media—forever. For some reason, writing something down makes it seem more permanent.

By announcing that you are “in a relationship” with someone on social media, women (or low testosterone males) are trying to imply a commitment. Granted, it is a very weak commitment, but you should still be aware of what she is trying to achieve.

8. Stalking

This is not a common technique, but women do use it. I know a woman who became obsessed with the guy she was dating so she decided to follow him wherever he went. She got jobs at the companies where he worked so that she could be close to him. She even followed him when he moved to different cities to escape from her.

It took years, but she finally wore him down and he married her.

Run from any woman that is pulling the stalker strategy. If you really like a girl, you should be the one who pursues her.

Conclusion

Of these techniques, only the first two are acceptable risks. It is natural for a girl who genuinely likes you to want to build a committed relationship with you. And if you share her feelings, you might not mind, but you should always be aware of what is going on so that you don’t end up getting pulled down a path that you don’t want to travel.

Read More: How To Keep Your Baby Momma On Lockdown

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Slavery Practices Throughout History

April 30, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

What do you know about Spartans? Based solely on the movie 300 (2006), one could imagine they were fearless in combat, ridiculously ripped, and dedicated to fighting against tyranny.

But, did you know Spartans owned slaves? Though much closer to being serfs, helots lived in constant fear for their lives and were obligated to farm the land of the native Spartan they were assigned to, though they were officially owned by the Spartan state.

Helots also fought side by side with Spartans

How about ancient Romans? You surely must admire their engineering feats, such as building the magnificent Colosseum that still stands to this day. Yep, built by 100,000 slaves captured in one of many Roman conquests that will eventually lead to the weakening of the Roman republic and its demise. Simply put, territories and slaves captured by Romans were not being integrated into the society fast enough and were generally treated as tools to be discarded when their usefulness expires.

The same thing applies to Egyptians, Chinese, Aztecs and even Native Americans, who used to own whomever they could get their hands on, including blacks. The reason for such widespread acceptance of slavery was quite simple—the tribe or nation that owned more slaves was able to farm more land or mine more ore at almost no added cost.

This also served as a massive ego boost for the members of the host nation, as they now had more free time and could dedicate it to philosophy, poetry, art, and other abstract disciplines.

Slaves were sometimes held under control by the most primitive and efficient form of contraception—castration. The resulting eunuchs could be then safely employed in courts, harems, and other powerful positions without the fear of them wanting to bang princesses or queens and spawn contestants for the throne. These eunuchs were often a source of great drama and complex machinations as they fought for power.

Is he anyone’s favorite character or do we all hate him?

What actually constitutes slavery is a point of heated debate among historians, since even slaves had loosely defined ranks and varying degrees of privileges. Those who were physically fit could become gladiators or bodyguards and earn fame and their keep through sheer brute strength, educated slaves could become teachers, while slaves with cooking skills would be worth their weight in gold and treated with respect.

However, a majority of slaves had no such redeeming features and was destined to do hard physical labor, extracting value from the land to maintain the existing social order. As the host nation grew, so did its appetites, which meant more and more slaves had to be captured and brought back home. Eventually, the rulers would realize that it was much easier and cheaper to simply let the slaves breed at home.

A process for freedom

Sometimes, slaves were even able to individually gain civil rights, as if they were the native occupants of the land. This process varied from era to era, but it generally didn’t bestow the full extent of civil rights on the liberated slave—while the slave was formally free, the rigid social structure forbade him from climbing up the ranks and gaining any significant influence.

Slaves that weren't properly integrated into the host nation would eventually become its greatest enemy, as the demographic structure changed over generations. Slaves would retain their own culture, religions and habits that would gradually squeeze out the native people's. In a great twist of ironic justice, the conqueror would ultimately become the slave to the whims of the conquered, who now made a majority of the population.

Industrial practices and advancements in science have made all slavery practices largely insignificant and unneeded in the Western civilizations. What once took 100 people to do can now be achieved by one man sitting at the controls of a single Ingersoll Rand 700JW ZRA2 jib crane. Today, legislation confirms that slavery is an "immoral and thoroughly evil practice."

Ingersoll Rand ZRA2 jib crane

All successful civilizations employed some form of slavery—those that didn't were quickly subdued by those that did. But they would all inevitably fall apart and leave only the ruins for the historians to study. Perhaps some day it will be possible to live in a world of true freedom. Until then, slavery in its many forms will be the norm, rather than the exception.

Read More: Feminism Comes Full Circle Into Embracing Aristotle's "Natural Slavery"

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

3 Tips To Naturally Boost Your Testosterone

April 30, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by SixPack Shortcuts

Hey man,

Mike Chang here. Being the #1 subscribed trainer on YouTube has it's rewards and responsibilities. And one of the most rewarding things that I do is getting to meet and help awesome people from all around the world get in shape..

You know… by helping them to pack on lean ripped muscle as fast as possible!

And that's actually me getting a chance to show Steve Harvey and his fans my little shortcut for doing just that.

It was an awesome experience to help so many people, and Steve himself. But one thing I didn't get to do on that show was tell the world why I started working out.

We all have our reasons why… yours might be just to drop some weight for an event or get the attention of a girl. Or maybe something you've experienced has caused you to want to make a change within yourself. Well, for me…

I grew up in a pretty rough part of Houston, Texas and I dealt with a lot of bullies growing up. So yeah, I needed to put on muscle and be lean and athletic to survive. Or so I thought when I was young… However, I now know that having a ripped, muscular body is more about me getting the confidence and attention I deserve… not about me protecting myself.

The truth is that I didn't have THIS when I was first starting to build the body I have today. But I guarantee you that if I did, my results would have come way faster. What am I talking about? The fat shedding and muscle building power of high levels of testosterone.

So today I'm going to give you the 3best tips to boosting your testosterone that you can start using today.

1. Eat more of the RIGHT types of fat

To a lot of guys, eating more fat might sound a bit crazy. However these guys don't know that eating more fat, specifically unsaturated fat, actually helps boost your testosterone.

And some types of fats, such as polyunsaturated fat, can actually help your body to carry crucial muscle building nutrients and hormones to your muscles quickly. So these good types of fats will help you maximize your results… especially after a hard workout.

Now this doesn't mean you should start going on a fried chicken diet. Remember, in order to get your testosterone levels up you've got to eat the right fats.

Here are a few delicious foods that are high in good fats that can help you increase your test levels rapidly.

- Fatty fish such as salmon, tuna, sardines, mackerel and trout are full of omega-3 fatty acids, the good fats. It's recommended that you eat at least two servings of fatty fish like these every week to maintain a good level of omega 3s in your system.
- Another great source of fats is olive oil or coconut oil. Whether it's used as a dressing or to cook with, it's a great way to consume more of good fats you need.
- Lastly, foods like nuts, eggs and especially avocado, are very rich in unsaturated fats. These foods make for a great healthy snack, and they also help you fulfill your muscle building protein needs.So make sure to include one of these fat sources in your next meal, and enjoy the test boosting benefits they bring.

2. Cut out cardio!

It’s almost like an infectious disease that’s going around our society that’s affecting a ton of guys looking to get in shape… it’s called “Chronic Cardio Syndrome.” And guys who have it are wasting their workouts by doing long cardio sessions hoping to shed away unwanted fat.

Not only is long, slow cardio the worst way to burn fat, it’s also killing your muscle mass by destroying your body’s testosterone production.

And with your testosterone levels way down, you’ll be at an increased risk for a number of health issues such as depression, muscle loss, erectile dysfunction, heart complications, and fat gain, particularly around the stomach area.

So here’s the bottom line: avoid doing long cardio sessions on the treadmill, elliptical, and the stationary bike because you could be seriously damaging your testosterone. Instead, focus on using compound exercises like squats or deadlifts.

Squats actually boost your testosterone!

3. Avoid common things like BOTTLED WATER that KILL your testosterone

I know this sounds crazy, but even something as simple as bottled waters can be a major testosterone killer. And that's because when you drink them, you could be pumping female hormones right into your body. But it doesn't stop with bottles of water… there are a number of things, just like this, that you are using everyday that are feminizing your body as we speak.

However, here's what's wrong with bottled water. The plastic that it's made from contains chemicals that are putting more estrogen into your body every time you drink it.

And if you didn't know, estrogen is what makes a woman… well, a woman. On top of that, when a man gets too much estrogen, it can cause some unpleasant side effects, such as muscle loss, man boobs and extra fat storage.

I actually just made a new presentation that covers all of the common things you need to avoid if you want to boost your testosterone: naturally boost your testosterone.

And at that link I'll also reveal the newest way that guys are getting ripped, muscular bodies by maximizing their testosterone fast.

Enjoy THIS free presentation.

Mike Chang

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Rethinking Technology And Social Media Can Get You Laid And Paid

May 1, 2015 | by Dr Harry Longabaugh | Link | Original Link

It's a popular opinion around these parts of the internet that technology is ruining our lives. It has turned us into mindless, online status obsessed zombies, our women have become flooded with "thirsty" dudes and became antisocial, and all too often our social media accounts can act as a liability in today's world of "free speech patrols" by our liberal friends.

She decides if you have a job or not

I don't deny any of these things, but to sit around here and fantasize about the "good old days" that most of us are too young to have lived through while ignoring the realities of modern technology is silly and not very "red pill."

We have to accept truth and play the hand that we are dealt, or else we slowly become those old guys that tell the hippies to cut their hair and stop listening to those rock and roll 8-Track tapes.

Grandpa Simpson is not a red pill role model

Technology is not going away. With that said, we need to look at today's technological developments with purely selfish motivations. When you stop and think about it, technology can get you laid and paid. And don't we want that?

Breaking Down technology

When looking at social media, what better place to start than Facebook. Yes, the cool guys among us are hipter enough that they deleted their Facebook accounts, and made sure that we all knew about it in the process. College Humor produced a great video on the topic:

But the reality for most of us is that Facebook is a great way to stay in touch and communicate with our friends. Facebook messenger is a free alternative to texting, and because you get to control who sees what on Facebook, it's pretty easy to avoid the "social media witch hunt" that people say they fear.

I've done it successfully for years, often posting articles from Return Of Kings, as well as several anti-feminist memes directly to my wall, often to many likes and interesting conversations!

I also know that Facebook has directly gotten me laid numerous times. How? By putting me on the guestlist to some great nightclubs and lounges, informing me of events around the city I would have never heard of otherwise, getting invites to parties where I only somewhat knew the hosts, and of course – everyone's favorite – the "I haven't heard from you in years, you seem to be doing great for yourself" girl.

It's easy to make Facebook work for you—all you have to do is examine the possibilities in a rational way.

Not Convinced?

I have recently used tumblr, yes, tumblr, to increase my online presence in a really positive way (Check out my personal account, as well as the tumblr version of Manosphere.com). “BUT TUMBLR IS SJW HEADQUARTERS,” people scream. Correct. And this means that tumblr can be a great source of that delicious “hater traffic” that everyone secretly craves.

And for all of the censorship that social justice warriors are known for, tumblr has not deleted a single GamerGate article. I mean, what else do you expect from a mostly pornographic site?

Maybe this bit of info changed your mind about tumblr, maybe it didn’t. For me it was a no-brainer – especially when I’m familiar with auto-posting and aggregate technology, so manosphr.tumblr.com requires zero maintenance on my part. I made it work for me, can you make it work for you?

Be Like Mike. Really. I’m Serious

Your greatest potential ally, however, is seen by many as an unlikely one, since it is mostly known for thirsty men and women willing to capitalize on it. Yes, I am talking about Instagram, and, believe it or not, it can skyrocket your game, and even make your money. With Instagram, and similar apps – you have the power to become somewhat like Michael Jordan.

Professional athletes are rich, no doubt about it. The minimum salary of an NBA player is over $500,000 a year. This is serious bank for 99.9% of us, but chump change for the real money men of the NBA—the owners. Of the 30 NBA teams, 20 are owned by people whose net worth is in the billions.

But one man stands out from that list: Michael Jordan. We all know him as the greatest basketball player that has ever lived, but his true wealth came from doing something that no other athlete before him has done – he became a brand, an image. And this brand continues to hold strong even today, many years after Jordan has played his last game of basketball. Heck, you know your brand is popular when people fight over it.

In the age of social media, anyone can become their own personal brand. That is how I use my instagtam—I showcase my humor, my travels, the cool, fun parts of my life. it’s essentially a resume for getting laid.

Yes – it is difficult at times to keep up appearances – sometimes even deadly, like in the case of fashion designer L’Wren Scott, who maintained an Instagram illusion of luxury despite being millions of dollars in debt. Don’t fall into this trap. Avoid Instagram altogether if it is not a positive for you, although some of you might use the old adage of “fake it till you make it.”

Adding the Instagram feed to my OKCupid profile has resulted in a much higher conversion rate. A girl once told me that she made the decision to write me back once she saw my Instagram—it made me “real” in her eyes. Yes, Instagram has gotten me laid.

But can it get you paid? For some people it has, and in ways Michael Jordan hasn’t even dreamed of.

Meet Jen Selter. Ass model.

What $50,000 looks like

Most of you have no doubt seen her incredible ass before. But there’s something more impressive about the 21-year-old from Roslyn, New York: her bank account. A sponsored post to her over 6 million Instagram followers reportedly costs $50,000, a sobering statistic considering 80% of the world lives on less than 10 dollars a day. Posting pictures of her ass on Instagram is making her rich and famous.

But Kid – there are better asses out there? Yes there are. Caitlin Rice is arguable one example, but (pun intended) notice her “paltry” 700,000 followers compared to Selter’s 6 million plus. Why is that? Because Caitlin Rice is slacking, and Jen Selter is a professional.

Caitlin Rice has poorly lit pictures, pictures with ugly friends, memes, and generally has a bunch of material there that takes away focus from her amazing body. Jen Selter is all business—every picture is well lit, beautiful, and showing off what the audience wants to see. That’s why she gets the big bucks.

Jen Selter is also a perfect example of another feature of the world of internet brands – success despite a complete lack of “credentials” from the traditional barriers of entry. She completely sidestepped the competitive bodybuilding, Crossfit, and obstacle race world to arguably become a bigger star and higher earner than the top athletes in these respective fields!

This is unheard of! Can you imagine a recreational basketball player getting a more profitable shoe deal than LeBron James? No, it's ludicrous, and yet in the world of social media fame it happens over and over again.

Internet Fame And Money: Not Just For Hot Chicks Anymore

Look at two prominent millionaire gamers – PewDiePie and KSI. Both have achieved worldwide fame and fortune by broadcasting themselves playing video games. PewDiePie is the most subscribed user on youtube, KSI was recently featured on Vice showing off his riches – including a penthouse apartment in London and a Lamborghini.

These two men might be a lot of things – but they are not elite competitive gamers. That honor belongs to people like Danil Ishutin, who, while being the 7th highest earning pro gamer in the word – has not cracked a million dollars in competition earnings, or Daigo Umehara who, despite being the single most famous fighting game player of all time – has a day job at a nursing home.

My theory is that the time that Danil Ishutin and Daigo Umehara spend practicing, PewDiePie and KSI spend on self promotion. And when you're a one man brand with a one man team, promotion can actually trump perfection.

The Next Generation Of Online Dating

Wanna peek into my world?

With all the talk of personal branding we forgot about the best part of technology. Now, you might recognize the old favorites – POF, OKCupid, Tinder, but there is a new movement afoot, spearheaded by Tinder in a move that many called the end of that company.

Tinder, Coffee Meets Bagel, Down, and Hinge limit the amount of users you can interact with on a daily basis and because of this women are not bombarded by a constant supply of attention from unlimited numbers of men, and people in general spend less time on the app, avoid burning themselves out, and in turn come back more often.

Yes, I said it, Tinder actually got better after the notorious "limited likes every 12 hours." Because of the design of these apps, you can go through a wide array of matches in a very short time and avoid spending countless hours searching for and messaging new people on dating sites.

In fact, my favorite of these new type of apps—Coffee Meets Bagel—gives you one match a day. No need for an auto-swiper for this one. But yet this is the online dating platform that I have enjoyed the most success with in the past year.

The Key To Online Dating Success

Diversify, diversify, diversify! And I don't mean it in the way that Social Justice Warriors mean it, so relax. Think of online dating as a sweet, awesome pool, and I'm inside with an innertube and noodle, while others are dipping their toes into the water, declaring it too cold and running away.

Dive in. Experiment. It costs you nothing, and by downloading a new app or signing up for a free service – you are increasing the amount of women you are exposed to every time. Also, being an early adopter is a great way to end up with your own personal brand.

Just ask Pei Ketron – Instagram early adopter and now a suggested user for everyone that just downloaded the app, despite not being an athlete, celebrity, or business mogul. She has over 700,000 followers as a plain old fashioned photographer. She was just at the right place at the right time. Now, I wonder how much money she can make ass modelling?

Read More: A Brazilian Man Talks About Game, Social Media, And How His Country Is Changing

Dr Harry Longabaugh

Dr Harry Longabaugh (aka Kid Strangelove) is a New York City based nerd with an insane passion for the manosphere and the myriad of ways it can help modern men. He runs Manosphere.com - a 24/7 self updating manosphere aggregator with almost 200 blogs sourced. So come check it out - there's almost always something new. Or find him on twitter - @kidstrangelove

Is Bruce Jenner Having A Sex Change Because Females In His Family Get More Attention?

May 1, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Bruce Jenner, a 1976 Olympic gold medalist in the decathlon, has been perpetually upstaged and outshone by his now ex-wife Kris Kardashian, his daughters, and his stepdaughters. Despite his immutable achievements as a sportsman and national hero, Jenner was, as a man, undoubtedly emasculated by the reality that his past talent and glory meant nothing against the vainglory of the women in his family.

It comes as no surprise that Bruce Jenner has taken the path of "gender transitioning." Has Jenner equated being female with the fame, "respect," and adoration he seems to desperately crave? Plastic surgery to capture (or caricature) his long-gone looks failed to generate anything but observers' mirth. His eccentricity on Keeping Up with the Kardashians and in other appearances only gave him 1% of the pulling power of his step-daughter Kim.

So what other choice was there to make?

Jenner's choice has been vindicated, however sickly, as he has reached a level of fame and recognition he never could have as a normal man in the Kardashian-Jenner family. The media are thronging to get a glimpse of him, his daughters and step-daughters, notably Kim, are paying more attention to him than they have in years, and the riches will start to flow more generously than before. For the first time in over two decades, he is the current focus.

A different world from his

I wonder when Kim, Kendall or Kylie, let alone Kris, will do this. But the next 40 years were not kind to Bruce Jenner.

Jenner's youngest daughter Kylie, who turns 18 this August, recently purchased a $2.7 million home in Calabasas. Her meteoric rise, like her slightly older and still wealthier sister Kendall's, has been ensured through their highly advantageous upbringing and proximity to their half-sister Kim.

It would be only natural for Jenner to compare this preposterous "achievement" of hers to his own childhood and early adulthood. Amongst other things, Jenner's constant companions in his younger days were excruciating hard work, even with his athletic talents, twilight early morning rises each and every day, fatigue from never-ending training, the pressure of an entire nation, injury, and inevitable moments of self-doubt under the eyes of the globe.

Kylie, along with her sister and half-sisters, has been beyond privileged. She has suckled from the fame of half-sister Kim to take center stage in a family of overt narcissists. In the meantime, Bruce Jenner, his step-son Rob, and the memory of his step-children's father, Robert Kardashian, have fallen by the wayside.

The curse of the male Kardashian-Jenners

In addition to the horrific esophageal cancer that took his life, one of Robert Kardashian's final embarrassments was being cuckolded by his ever-had-a-real-job? wife Kris.

Rob Jr. has largely avoided the Kardashian family spotlight, not that it would earn him much, and still finds himself being backstabbed by his own flesh and blood. In a very recent interview with Today's Matt Lauer, Kim described her brother as "not comfortable in his own skin".

Even when talking about her absent brother, the most controversial Kardashian is happy to spruik her own brand at the expense of his feelings and, given the context of her explanation, mental health. And so the Kardashian-Jenner emasculation that has plagued Bruce Jenner for years treads on, especially if Rob were to compare his own takings and fame with his much younger half-sisters, Kylie and Kendall.

Family wealth and fame cannot hide Rob from his struggle to understand why life is as unfair as it seems. A relatively good-looking man when not overweight, he could achieve great things in, hypothetically, acting, music, or writing, and still not attract an iota of the praise and cult-like following of his hyper-sexualized sisters and half-sisters. There is no mistake that the two Kardashian-Jenners with the most open appearance of mental illness are Bruce Jenner and Rob Kardashian.

The rot starts with one woman

Rob Kardashian's erratic behavior, fluctuating weight and general absence can be seen as a response to the unwarranted fame and riches being given to his sisters and half-sisters.

Kris Jenner could be considered the progenitor of modern "vertical gold-digging." Rather than the usual "horizontal gold-digging", which Kris used to great effect when she married and then cuckolded Robert Kardashian during her affair with Bruce Jenner, the vertical variety involves sucking the fame and riches from your children when the spouse's wanes.

This is exactly the skill Kris Jenner has exploited. Her control-freakery is so legendary that she's intervening in her now ex-husband's TV dealings, much to the chagrin of her children, who have also often been under her thumb, unwillingly.

Kris' lack of achievements are epitomized in her only "normal" job being as a flight attendant in the 1970s. She became a professional housewife and socialite after her marriage and as she expelled four of Robert's children. Her turn as a failed talk show host included milking the "exclusive first" baby photos of her granddaughter, North, on-air, at a time when son-in-law Kanye West clearly pitied her nose-diving situation enough to appear.

The Kardashian-Jenner matriarch is evidently at home raising and manipulating daughters to make millions from presenting a vacuous veneer covering an equally or more vacuous personality. Like a true parasite, she appears to rely on her daughters to keep her own cellulite-tainted star in orbit.

The Kardashian-Jenners show a society rapidly in decline

Aside from a tiny stint as a flight attendant before marrying-up to Robert Kardashian, what “honest” professions has Kris Jenner had?

Although the average viewer can never emulate the opulence of the Kardashian-Jenner clan, the attention it commands (read: its women command) exemplifies a society gripped by a cancer as degrading as the one that killed Robert Kardashian. Instead of being rewarded for contributing to society, the Kardashian-Jenner women are lauded for objectifying themselves, whoring themselves out, and placing ignorance and constant superficiality on the world’s highest pedestal.

Inasmuch as he has made what most ROK readers will regard as a reckless, bizarre, and mentally ill decision, I do feel sorry for Bruce Jenner. It is hard not to feel sorry for someone who had the world at his feet and then saw it stripped from him. Retirement is hard enough for former sporting champions, particularly those with an Olympic gold medal or NBA Championship MVP award.

When you add the surreal life of being the so-called “patriarch” of the Kardashian-Jenner family, depression, and gender identity issues seemingly come with the territory.

The true terror of the Bruce Jenner saga is that it does nothing to dissuade the countless women who want to copy the lifestyles, asses, or lip-puckerings of Kim, Kylie, or Kendall. It only exacerbates the circus of social destruction and vanity, and glorifies the shallowness viewers are attracted to in the first place.

Read More: Adrift In The Arctic: The Incredible Story Of Bruce Gordon

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The 10 Most Extraordinary Things About The Battle Of Stalingrad

May 1, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Stalingrad by Antony Beevor is a book every man should read. The brutal, five-month struggle between the German Wehrmacht and the Red Army broke new records in human brutality. The Soviet counter-offensive towards the battle's end, trapping and annihilating the Sixth Army, became the high water mark of the German Reich. It is perhaps the closest humanity has ever come to answering the question – what happens when an unstoppable force meets an immovable object?

10. Striving for intoxication

The Russian strategy in a nutshell

In an attempt to forget the living hell they were fighting in, soldiers on both sides went to enormous lengths to dull their senses. After passing it through a gas mask filter, many drank antifreeze, or industrial or surgical alcohol. Many were poisoned, blinded, or even died as a result.

Tobacco, too, was heavily valued, with most soldiers smoking constantly in battle. Finding paper with which to roll up cigarettes sometimes proved difficult. Soldiers risked execution for picking up enemy propaganda leaflets for such a purpose.

9. Being in the 13th Guards Rifle Division

These poor fuckers

You may have heard of these guys if you've ever seen the film "Enemy at the Gates" or played the Russian campaign in Call of Duty. Both start with a scene where a boatload of soldiers crosses the Volga River into the burning inferno of Stalingrad.

Of the 10,000 men who began crossing the Volga on September 14th 1942, over half were dead within a few days and only about 300 survived the "Stalingrad academy of street fighting." This was hardly atypical. The average life expectancy of Russian soldiers fighting in the city often dropped below 24 hours.

One craft was recorded with 436 bullet holes after a single crossing. Many went across with no training or ammunition, or had to wait for the man next to them to die so they could pick up his rifle.

8. Women warriors

Your average woman today has to do very little to be declared a “hero” in the media. A key feature of Soviet Russia however was that everyone was equally oppressed, meaning woman could be sent in to do the dirtiest of work just as men. Many served as pilots, anti-aircraft gunners, snipers and surgeons.

Take Zinaida Gavrielova, an eighteen-year-old medical student. As the head of the Russian 62nd Army’s hundred-strong “sanitary company” her job consisted of crawling forward under fire to rescue wounded soldiers and dragging them back to the Volga bank.

Or Gulya Koroleva, a twenty-year-old who left her baby son home in Moscow to volunteer as a nurse. During the battle she was credited with having “brought over a hundred wounded soldiers back from the front line and killed fifteen fascists herself.” She was awarded the Order of the Red Banner…posthumously.

In the air, several all-women aviation regiments were formed, led by the famous Marina Raskova. Flying outdated biplanes whose top speed was below the stalling speed of Luftwaffe fighters, the Germans soon nicknamed them the “night witches.” They flew more than 24,000 sorties during the war at a time when Western women had barely left the kitchen.

7. The NKVD

How do you convince a million Russian peasants to fight and die in a living hell like Stalingrad?

The military wing of the communist party, the NKVD, was tasked with “maintaining discipline” at Stalingrad. They carried out 13,500 executions during the battle. Some heinous crimes meriting death included –

- Retreating without orders
- Self-inflicted wounds
- Corruption

- Desertion
- Attempting to surrender
- Failing to shoot at any comrades trying to desert or surrender
- Being in command of any troops which had deserted or surrendered

With friends like these…

The list of possible infringements, described as “extraordinary events,” was endless. One lieutenant captured shortly before the battle in August managed to escape his German captors. Upon reporting for duty again he was arrested, treated as a deserter and sent to a penal company.

Even a soldier who discharged himself from a field hospital to return to his unit could be condemned as a deserter. One man was convicted of a self-inflicted wound according to the logic that he had tried to “hide his crime by applying a bandage…”

Paranoia was so great behind the Russian lines that groundcrews at airfields were forbidden to count the number of airplanes on the ground at any one time. It soon became common practice to place a second line of NKVD troops behind the frontlines to prevent desertions and shoot at any who wavered.

6. The feldgendarmerie

Not to be outdone, the Germans had their own equivalents of the NKVD – among them the Feldgendarmerie.

Even out in the steppes of southern Russia, 2,000 km from Berlin, Jews were forced to wear a yellow star on their sleeve and anyone found to be a member of the Communist party was handed over to the SS. Over 60,000 civilians were deported back to Germany as slave labor. Farmers were tortured to find where they had hidden their grain and their homes were torn down for firewood.

Maintaining law and order grew harder as the battle turned against the Germans, particularly among their so-called “allies.” To make up the numbers promised, one Romanian division contained 2,000 convicts previously sentenced for crimes such as rape and murder.

Tens of thousands of Russian defectors soon made up the 6th Army’s ranks as well. Loathing the Soviet regime and fearful of reprisals, they were perhaps the German’s most reliable helpers, though as Slavs, they all had to be re-labelled as “Cossacks” before they were allowed to wear German uniforms.

5. Being a civilian

Nearly a million people lived in Stalingrad on the verge of the battle. While hundreds of thousands fled in last-minute evacuations many remained trapped on the west bank of the Volga. Despite all odds, about ten thousand were still alive upon the German surrender in February 1943.

Civilian dwellings were often buried deep underground. The Tsaritsa Gorge in southern Stalingrad was home to thousands who dug enormous caves into it’s sides. Others survived in cellars or even sewers. During breaks in the fighting women could be seen emerging to cut the meat off dead horses before rats got to them.

Disease, the cold and starvation slowly killed thousands. Civilians who fled from the city and made the arduous trek across the steppe often found little shelter for many days. The remnants of families huddled together at night were found by roadsides, babies died in their mother’s arms because of the cold and bitter winds.

4. Being captured

Despite enticing many Russians to surrender with promises of adequate food and shelter, the Germans offered little sympathy to their prisoners. Prison camps were little more than a barbed wire enclosure out on the open steppe. Food supplies stopped entirely after the German encirclement. Of the 3,500 Russian prisoners trapped with the 6th Army only 20 survived, and that had been by resorting to cannibalism.

The attitude of the Russians was no different. Their treatment of the invaders who had spent the past two years busily murdering, pillaging and raping their homeland was predictable. Of the 290,000 Germans surrounded in November, 90,000 survived to be taken prisoner, of which only 5,000 ever saw their homes again.

3. Surviving the winter

Stalingrad in winter

Once winter hit, temperatures around Stalingrad plunged to as low as -30 Celsius. Meat and food froze into barely edible blocks that had to be sawed open because they were too hard for knives. By October the Volga had begun to freeze over. Many Russian reinforcements were crushed by incoming ice floes while trying to cross.

Within the German encirclement, called the “Kessel” (cauldron), there was eventually no fuel left to melt snow for washing or shaving. A bath and clean underwear were as distant a dream as a proper meal. Soldiers’ minds went blank because the chilling of their blood slowed down mental activity. Walking wounded and sick made their own way to the rear through the snow. Many stopped to rest and never rose again.

> There they sit like hairy savages in stone-age caves, devouring horseflesh in the smoke and gloom, amidst the ruins of a beautiful city that they have destroyed

2. The German surrender

Ever since the Germans had advanced upon Stalingrad in August, Stalin and his generals had been planning a massive counter-offensive. Hitler believed that Russia's armies were finished. However, the three million Axis troops fighting on the Eastern front were still facing five million Russians. Stalingrad had become the bait in one of the largest traps in history. On 19th November 1942 the trap was sprung.

The situation at Stalingrad after the encirclement of the Sixth Army

Every imaginable horror faced the beleaguered German troops. As winter came the ground became too hard to dig trenches, causing thousands to eventually die of exposure. Food supplies were running dangerously low by December. Even when food was delivered, many soldiers quickly died from over-eating, akin to concentration camp survivors.

As clean clothes became as elusive as a hot meal, lice spread to nearly every member of the Sixth Army. Epidemics of typhus, dysentery, and a dozen other diseases swept through the German ranks.

A scene of utter chaos pervaded at Pitomnik airfield, the only major airstrip within the Kessel. Thousands of critically wounded were packed in rows along its edges while the burnt-out husks of destroyed aircraft and piles of stacked corpses lay nearby. So desperate was the need for fuel that the signpost at the airfield's edge was removed and replaced with the gruesome sight of a horse's leg stuck in a mound of snow with the sign re-attached to it's top.

The German's supply situation grew more and more desperate…Actually, you know what? This is just getting depressing…let's move on

The final blow began in January 1943 when the Russians began their assault to crush the Kessel. The remains of the 6th Army retreated east towards the ruins of Stalingrad. The spectacle of defeat grew more terrible the closer retreating soldiers came to the city:

> As far as the eye can see lie soldiers crushed by tanks, hopelessly moaning wounded, frozen corpses, vehicles abandoned through lack of fuel, blown-up guns and miscellaneous equipment…

1. Child "traitors"

Civilians in Stalingrad didn't just have the Germans and the elements to worry about; running afoul of the Soviet side was tragically all too easy.

In their desperation for food many civilians begged the Germans for help, who occasionally obliged. As many simple tasks in Stalingrad were dangerous because of Soviet snipers, German soldiers sometimes promised young Russian boys and girls a crust of bread in return for something as simple as refilling their water bottles down by the Volga.

When the Soviets realized what was happening they shot children on such missions without hesitation. This was not just a local anomaly, but rather an official Soviet policy. Stalin had ordered the previous year that Red Army troops were to kill any civilians obeying German orders, even if under duress.

Stalingrad has far too many anecdotes to mention here about what happens when hell descends to Earth. Both sides showed absolutely no mercy. Every red-blooded man should give it a read.

Read More: Clash Of Steel And Wills: The Story Of The Battle Of Lepanto

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Sexual Assault Prevention Is Coming To An Air Force Base Near You

May 2, 2015 | by Arminius Hermann | Link | Original Link

Yes, this is a Navy poster in an article about Air Force SAPR

It's that time of the year again, in which Airmen are required to submit to anti-sexual assault training, with sexual assault prevention being a top Air Force service priority, on par with combat readiness. Last year's counter-sexual-assault effort in the Air Force was covered by Dr. Φ at his blog Delenda Est Cathargo.

Today's article presents the standardized training materials passed down from the Air Force SAPR office what was executed at the field level this month and will be again later this summer, two of which are mandatory, two of which are optional.

First up is one of the mandatory training handouts, entitled "Flip the Script – How to Talk to a Survivor." The handout is unremarkable, but I include Page 1 and Page 2 for readers should they desire.

Next we find the other mandatory training handout, entitled "Flip the Script – Male Victimization." Highlighted text is mine:

"Flip the Script – Male Victimization" Pg 1

On the blue vertical bar on the left of the first linked "Flip the Script" page, we see listed as a "myth" that men cannot be sexually assaulted by women, followed by the "fact" that women make up only 2-3% of offenders.

This is absolutely correct—men can be sexually assaulted by women, and I credit the AF SAPR office for allowing this truth to surface. However, the "fact" that follows this truth is misleading, and flies in the face of recent scholarship and media reports that suggest near parity in the use of coercive sexual tactics by men and women.

“Flip the Script – Male Victimization” Pg 2

Doubtless some in the manosphere will stridently disagree with the proposition that men can be victims, or worse, adopt a victim mentality. To these brothers, I hear you and I understand you. But weaponized female sexual aggression is today’s reality, and one must acknowledge reality if (a) we men to deal with it, and (b) neutralize the threat.

This brings me to the first of the optional handouts, “Masculinities.” One suspects that any discussion of masculinity derived from equalitarian or feminist scholarship is going to take on a certain tone, and this handout does not disappoint:

“Flip the Script – Masculinities” Pg 1

Attacking the masculinity and masculine identity of the 99% of those who do not offend, in order to more effectively ostracize the less than 1% who do, only serves to alienate those whose buy-in upon which this campaign depends.

Furthermore, I am dubious that undermining those masculine qualities that overlap with the martial virtues (e.g., control of emotions, control of fear, contempt for weakness, aggression, dominance, toughness, strength, courage, decisiveness, etc.) is the path for us as a society, even more so for an institution whose entire purpose is to kill people, break things, and endure the trials and horrors of war.

“Flip the Script – Masculinities” Pg 2

Notably missing from this discussion is how femininity itself may contribute to the problem. Could traits common to the female gender role, such as less personal accountability, a lack of sexual self-restraint, abuse of alcohol, unwillingness to act “like a man,” etc, all contribute to the incidence of military sexual assaults?

This brings me to the last handout [page 1, page 2], which addresses the so-called “rape culture” in the military. I won’t get into debunking rape culture itself, as minds greater than mine have beat me to it (notably, even RAINN has done so as well). I will however, discuss the culture that does exist in the military, mirroring that of high schools and colleges in the society at large, and here it is:

The military harbors within it a substantial high-risk sex subculture.

Society collectively–and the military is in this bucket too–can’t tell anyone, especially women, this simple fact of life: Banging someone who is not your spouse is risky. Doubly so when primed and lubricated by alcohol. If you don’t believe me, read the Air Force’s own roll-up of sexual assault convictions, and count for yourself the overwhelming proportion that are sport sex or alcohol involved.

Perhaps it is time for leaders of male Airmen, officers and non-commissioned officers both, to administer "the talk" to young military men and help them steer them clear of this and other risks associated with a coed military.

As I wrote in my last column at The Spearhead, reference the present legal and social climate for servicemen:

> The default position is to believe the accuser victim. This cannon is pointed at you, not-so-fortunate son. Innocence is no longer presumed. But fear not, there are many steps you may take to minimize your risk and protect yourself, and it's not "blaming the victim" to pass them along to you:
>
> 1) Limit interactions, be they over the phone, via email, and especially face-to-face, with women to official business only. If you must interact with them, do so in a public area with witnesses. Avoid situations where you may be alone behind closed doors with a military woman without a wingman as witness.
>
> 2) Speaking of wingman, have one whenever going out or when you may be faced by mixed-sex situations.
>
> 3) Don't fraternize with lower-ranking military women. Lower-ranking military women are less mature and more likely to be star-struck by your greater maturity and higher socio-sexual status than either her or her peers. You will also be more likely to be seen as the aggressor if they levy an accusation.
>
> 4) Avoid mixed-sex situations and alcohol. The vast, vast majority of military sexual assault cases involve alcohol. When the booze comes out, and there are females about, that's your cue to leave. Male-only company is your friend.
>
> 5) Be upright in your behavior. The vast, vast majority of military sexual assault cases involve extra-marital sex in addition to alcohol. This means don't be a player. The fact of the matter is that one's risk of being hit with a sexual assault allegation is a lot lower if you keep your fly zipped.
>
> 6) Record your encounters. It may initially seem Rob Lowe-level creepy, but it has saved at least one man, and likely untold more, from being convicted of rape on the basis of a malicious FRA. Video is best.
>
> These steps may be small, but will do much to mitigate your risk of being caught on the wrong side of an accusation of sexual misconduct. Remember that the system is looking to isolate and prosecute "offenders", that women who bring sexual assault allegations are to be believed, false accusations will not be prosecuted or punished, and that you will be counting on the justice system to protect your assumed-innocent status. The process is part of the punishment, whether or not a conviction is made.

This isn't the first time Airmen and other servicemen have been subjected to equalitarian swamp-fever re-education of the SAPR vein, and it won't likely be the last.

Instead of communicating hard truths and holding all accountable for their actions and the consequences of their actions, the military would rather manage the consequences of all these besotted couplings by playing federal-rape-conviction-whack-a-mole with men's lives.

Read More: New York Has Adopted Yes Means Yes

Arminius Hermann
Arminius Hermann, elsewhere known by the nom-de-cyber Elusive Wapiti, is a father to four and husband to one. His interests outside of having too many opinions are hunting, motorcycling, and flying.

4 Timeless Lessons From Homer’s Iliad

May 2, 2015 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Like many in the manosphere, I have a certain set of rituals that I conduct to keep my mind sharp. One of these rituals is that I read the Homeric epics every spring. There are many reasons I do this, Homer being a huge influence in my own writing one of the foremost.

Another reason is simply that the story of Troy is such a powerful one that I am compelled to keep coming back to it. The Iliad is so powerful because, despite the poem being 2,700 years old, and the events it is based on (to what extent they occurred) are older still, the story’s tale of human glory and folly is timelessly true, and Homer’s magnifying glass can as easily be fixated on our own time as it was on the Bronze Age.

The following are some lessons from the Iliad that are as relevant now as they were then:

1. Good Leaders Must be Servants

This is the paradox of power and ambition. Those that seek power doubtlessly have a good amount of personal ambition and desire for greatness. However, this desire must never be allowed to run amok where the leader uses his position for his personal aggrandizement at the expense of the rest.

Agamemnon is an example of a poor, or at the very least mediocre, leader. While he is often seen rallying his troops, he is just as often accused, most famously by Achilles, of skulking shamelessly in the back, watching others doing the fighting for him, all the while taking the lion's share of the spoils, revealing in no uncertain terms the purpose of the expedition: his own gain.

Achilles remarks in Book 1:

> Never once did you arm with the troops and go to battle or risk an ambush packed with Achaea's best men – you lack the courage, you can see death coming. Safer by far, you find, to foray all through camp, commandeering the prize of any man who speaks against you. King who devours his people!

It is significant that Agamemnon rallies his subordinates, such as Teucer in Book 8, by making them promises based on the treasures of Troy as if they all belonged to him:

> Teucer, lovely soldier, Telamon's son, pride of the armies – now you're shooting! I tell you this, so help me it's the truth: if Zeus with his storm-shield and Queen Athena ever let me plunder the strong walls of Troy, you are the first, the first after myself – I'll place some gift of honor in your hands, a tripod, or a purebred team with their own car or a fine woman to mount and share your bed.

Finally, Agamemnon refused to recognize he was in the wrong upon seizing Briseis from Achilles, not offering a semblance of apology in his "plea" to bring Achilles back into the action in Book 9, and blaming esoteric instances such as madness in Book 19:

> I am not to blame! Zeus and Fate and the Fury stalking through the night, they are the ones who drove that savage madness in my heart, that day in assembly when I seized Achilles' prize – on my own authority, true, but what could I do? A god impels all things to their fulfillment…

What emerges is the portrait of a greedy, selfish human being who, though he may care for the men around him, is at Troy first and foremost for his personal gain. His destructive quarrel with Achilles was the natural result of this attitude.

2. The Socially Destructive Nature of Narcissism

Achilles is not off the hook. He is in fact the single biggest cause of the horrendous loss of human life that occurs in the Iliad. His response to Agamemnon's (admittedly wrong) seizure of Briseis in Book 1 was to take it as an extremely personal insult, an affront to his honor and his very reason to exist. He then got his mother Thetis to intervene with Zeus on his behalf:

> Persuade him, somehow, to help the Trojan cause, to pin the Achaeans back against their ships, trap them round the bay and mow them down. So all can reap the benefits of their king – so even mighty Atrides can see how mad he was to disgrace Achilles, the best of the Achaeans!

This shows that Achilles cares absolutely nothing for his brothers in arms. Their lives and deaths mean nothing to him. The only thing that truly matters at the end of the day is himself and his glory. He says as much before he sends Patroclus off to battle in Book 16:

> Even if Zeus the thundering lord of Hera lets you seize your glory, you must not burn for war against these Trojans, madmen lusting for battle – not without me – you will only make my glory that much less…
>
> Oh would to god – Father Zeus, Athena, and lord Apollo – not one of these Trojans could flee his death, not one, no Argive either, but we could stride from the slaughter so we could bring Troy's hallowed crown of towers toppling down around us – you and I alone!

And it is Achilles' narcissism that ensures his own friend's death. His reaction is simply to transfer his rage to Hector, displaying a complete lack of empathy for his comrades who are hungry, tired, and wounded, once more showing the audience in Book 19 that they are merely means to his end:

> You talk of food? I have no taste for food – what I really crave is slaughter and blood and the choking groans of men!

Achilles' rage and his narcissistic solipsism are ended only by the surprising and passionate pleas of Priam for the body of his son at the poem's conclusion. It is here, finally, where he can see himself the way that others see him, and the damage that he has caused:

> When Zeus dispenses gifts from the jar of sorrows only, he makes a man an outcast – brutal, ravenous hunger drives him down the face of the shining earth, stalking far and wide, cursed by gods and men. So with my father, Peleus. What glittering gifts the gods rained down from the day that he was born! He excelled all men in wealth and pride of place, he lorded the Myrmidons, and mortal that he was, they gave the man an immortal goddess for a wife. Yes, but even on him the Father piled hardships, no powerful race of princes born in his royal halls, only a single son he fathered, doomed at birth, cut off in the spring of life – and I, I give the man no care as he grows old since here I sit in Troy, far from my fatherland, a grief to you, a grief to all your children…

And it is this realization that is to set the stage for ending the Iliad on such a sad note, leaving the reader with a sense of hopeless despair. Hector is dead and Achilles is soon to die. What good resulted from Achilles' overweening pride?

As our own societal narcissism grows, and as we continue to get unhappier at the same time, the ending of the Iliad is perhaps the most poetic reminder of the consequences of a narcissistic, solipsistic worldview, and the fate of a society that celebrates it and disincentivizes ethical behavior.

3. Evil Often Happens To Those Least Deserving

Although he is no saint, Hector is by far the noblest warrior on the field at Troy. Unlike Achilles and Agamemnon, he is not partaking in combat to advance his own aims. He is instead fighting for his family and his homeland.

He uses his position as the Trojan field commander first and foremost in the service of the cause. Though like his aristocratic peers on both sides, he is not above looting to accumulate wealth or attempting to make a name for himself, his chief aim and guiding motivations are to save Troy, and he is willing to sacrifice his personal interests (and his life) in this duty. H is rewards for his efforts are to be brutally killed, have his corpse disrespected and nearly defiled (were it not for divine intervention, something that is not so forthcoming to most), and to have his labor and his death count for nothing.

Hector utters one of the most famous speeches in the poem, lashing out at Polydamas, in Book 12:

> Bird signs! Fight for your country – that is the best, the only omen! Even if all the rest of us drop and die around you, grappling for the ships, you'd run no risk of death: you lack the heart to last it out in combat – coward!

Hector's reward for his patriotic attitude:

> So he (Achilles) triumphed and now he was bent on outrage, on shaming noble Hector. Piercing the tendons, ankle to heel behind both feet, he knotted straps of rawhide through them both, lashed them to his chariot, left the head to drag and mounting the car, hoisting the famous arms aboard, he whipped his team to a run and breackneck on they flew, holding nothing back. And a thick cloud of dust rose up from the man they dragged, his dark hair swirling round that head so handsome once, all tumbled low in the dust – since Zeus had given him over to his enemies now to be defiled in the land of his own fathers.

As has often been remarked, bad things happen to good people, seemingly more than they do to those that deserve such evil happenstances. Why does this cruel fate seem to so often accompany those that do the right thing? I believe one reason is the theme below:

4. Force Is Man's Master

> Hector, stop! You unforgivable, you…don't talk to me of pacts. There are no binding oaths between men and lions – wolves and lambs can enjoy no meeting of the minds – they are all bent on hating each other to death.

Achilles' chilling words in Book 22 ring as true today as in the Bronze Age that Homer portrayed. Hector proposed a binding pact, a civilized set of rules for his duel with Achilles. Achilles' response was that of a wild beast. He is a powerful, hungry lion, neither knowing nor caring for civilization or its rules. His only goal is self-satisfaction, and he has the power to do all of this because Hector is weak.

So the strong Achilles slew the weak Hector, just as the strong Achaeans would destroy the weak Trojans, and neither victor, individual or collective, showed any mercy. Agamemnon reminds us in Book 6 what the real intentions of the Achaean expedition were:

> So soft, dear brother, why? Why such concern for our enemies? I suppose you got such tender loving care at home from the Trojans. Ah, would to god not one of them could escape his sudden plunging death beneath our hands! No baby boy still in his mother's belly, not even he escape – all Ilium blotted out, no tears for their lives, no markers for their graves!

The Iliad and the story of Troy are stark reminders that for all our civilized pretensions, for all our warmest fantasies of kindness and altruism, we are still at the mercy of force and those that can wield it. It is, in the end, force, if masked by civilized rules and procedures, that keeps those that want to do us harm at bay.

And ultimately, those without power will forever be at the mercy of those that have it. A civilization, people, or nation that is either unwilling or unable to use power to defend itself is not one that can long survive. As always, the strong do what they can, and the weak suffer what they must.

This is something we would do well to remember, as the “Long Peace” after the Second World War in which we live has no doubt diluted this sense of urgency. As Western civilization’s future elites are increasingly brainwashed by their university “educations” into believing that the weak passivity of “thou shalt not offend” (except for their own people and culture, that’s fair game and encouraged) and a nothing-matters narcissism are society’s raisons d’etre, all the while its present leaders willingly and continuously weaken its military and borders under an irrational, religious zeal devoted to abstract and foolish notions of equality, Homer echoes more loudly now than perhaps in quite some time.

When the societal zeitgeist collapses, it does so very rapidly. Troy was the dominant city in Homer’s Asia Minor. It was proud, rich, and full of hope. Its world was shattered by the arrival of a vast Achaean horde from across the sea which came to annihilate it from the face of the Earth.

Those that ignore that force is master of men and nations, who naively think otherwise, will be sorely disappointed at some point. And at that point, their doom is assured, for there are no oaths between men and lions.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

The Lie Of Oneitis And How To Get Over It

May 2, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

When I was a young kid I recall watching a Laurel and Hardy movie where they wind up joining the French legionnaires in North Africa. Prior to France becoming a pathetic socialist mess that would make Napoleon turn in his grave, France had an empire and the legionnaires were considered the finest fighting force.

If I recall correctly, a part of the storyline revolved around one of their fellow soldiers who'd joined up to get away from a woman who'd broken his heart. Every so often the hapless Laurel would find some photo of her and the guy would burst into tears in the middle of a battle. Long story short, it introduced me to the idea of "one-itis" at a very young age.

The realistic effects of oneitis

We all get the idea of oneitis and what it entails, but understanding the theory is vastly different to negotiating the mechanics of the effect it has in real time. Everyone has the one that got away, the girl they dumped and then wished they hadn't, the relationship turned sour that shouldn't have, and so on and so forth. Unless you marry your high school sweetheart at 18 (not recommended)—it's going to happen.

The crippling evil of the situation that gets into the back of your mind is this ideal future that could have been. "If only XYZ had worked out in my favor." This, of course, is a complete illusion. You might as well be punching down opium pipes for the false dream you are feeding yourself.

The future that never was is a complete lie. Sure it's worthwhile to look back on past mistakes, assess the situation, see where there was room for improvement, and analyze where you should avoid making the same mistake twice. Unfortunately this rapidly leads into the idea of perfect future scenarios that were never going to happen even if you were still with the girl.

How To Make The Ideal Future Scenario From Here

All sorts of situations were going to occur in your future with or without her, and those stressful situations are where the relationship was going to be tested, most likely to a breaking point. Maybe you'd lose your job and be short of cash (never good in an LTR). Maybe you'd be sick, sustain an injury, or maybe you'd get bored of having sex with her and go cold on her after a few years.

Of course there are girls that actively cheat, but most will stick around always provided you are keeping them satisfied on all sorts of mysterious feminine emotional and sexual levels, which can be incredibly time consuming to do. I've found that after somewhat of a honeymoon period, I feel like I am wasting my time having endless sex sessions and hanging out with her doing not much and I want to get back to my business and other pursuits.

A girl I dated some time ago, who'd got married very young and divorced a couple of years later, told me that after a few months living with her husband they stopped speaking too much and he'd come home after work and just chill. My question to her was honestly, what did she expect? A man likes to relax, all that kissing and cuddling and yes even fucking gets tedious after a while—like eating sugar straight from the bowl, one tablespoon at a time.

The honest to god truth is that most relationships end because the man wants them to. Maybe he wants to keep her around, but most likely wants to ratchet back the amount of time and energy he's putting in. Where things go really sour and nasty, it's only because he's making her do the dirty work of breaking up and she is working overtime to convince herself to leave, when probably she doesn't really want to.

Women certainly have a tendency to "upgrade" if an opportunity arises, but they also form strong emotional and sexual bonds. Thus, if you are with a solid girlfriend, it's her that wants exclusivity, her that's afraid to lose you, and her that has a hard time breaking all the emotional and sexual bond. The famous rebound relationship is really a chick thing. A guy just needs to get laid a couple of times and she's a distant memory, but her way of moving on is to move onto a new relationship, often making a terrible choice and making matters worse for herself.

Your cheat sheet to combat the lie of oneitis:

- The future that never was is a total lie, and this applies not only to women, but to educational and career choices, the city you chose to live in, the business venture that failed and so forth.

- After a failure there is a natural depressed state that is some kind of protection mechanism. The buck that gets beaten in the mating rut needs to show he's accepted defeat. Embracing the failure, rather than fighting this state, means the beaten state will pass much sooner.
- In all likelihood you probably wanted the relationship to fail, but didn't have the balls (or perhaps lacked the mechanism and social skills) to end it. Any number of poor thought processes can cause a man to hold onto his girl long past her sell-by date. When you dig into the psychology of this fact, you unearth and release yourself from all the guilt, blame, shame and negative thinking.
- You are better off out than in. Once you are unattached whether it be from college, a job, a girl, a city you left, moving out from the family home or whatever it may be – once you are a free agent, the world is your oyster again.
- Feeling sad about a loss is never the correct state of mind. Later you can learn from the mistakes, because similar scenarios will come up in the future, but it's much better to embrace the liberated state that failure brings with it.
- Making mistakes is the best way to move forward. Something our crazed socialist government machinery has forgotten is that making your own mistakes, learning from them, making them again, and gradually improving is the only way to get better.

And so you see it's never necessary to be sad about the past. Most important, never be sad about missed opportunities that would most likely never have turned out how your imagination now paints them. Forget it and move on.

Read More: How Oneitis Almost Wrecked My Life

5 Crucial Beliefs Every Man Should Internalize

May 3, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

Beliefs are extremely powerful.

You don't have to look any further than the existence of placebo effects to recognize this fact.

Placebo treatments that literally offer zero benefits to patients with very real conditions have actually succeeded in curing them. Studies have shown changes in heart rate, blood pressure, and the relief of depressive symptoms – and even some symptoms of Parkinson's Disease – through placebo treatments.

The only explanation here is that these patients' bodies have essentially cured themselves all because they believed that they were being given an effective treatment.

And so when it comes to your personal beliefs—and what they say about who you are as a man and how you respond the world around you—it's absolutely crucial to adopt a set of empowering beliefs that keep you confident, motivated, and happy.

If you ignore this and allow your mind to be crippled by negative beliefs, your life will suffer as a result. Now I'll present you with what I believe to be five of the most important beliefs men can adopt and internalize.

1. Whatever happened was meant to happen

You must accept reality, no matter how grim or bleak it is

If there's one thing that will hold back your growth, confidence, and happiness it's being a pussy who whines and complains about everything.

Drowning in your own sorrow, or wasting your energy being pissed at someone else, will get you NOWHERE. When something goes wrong—your girl leaves you, you get sick, you get fired—you have to accept reality as it is. Damning it and complaining won't change shit.

Accept that "whatever happened was meant to happen" and proceed from a place of calmness and strength. This puts you in the best place to remain tranquil and happy – and also to succeed and progress in spite of any shitty situation.

2. I am complete exactly as I am

Far too many men make decisions and take actions from a place of feeling inadequate and incomplete. You must be careful not to fall for this trap.

Yes you can improve and make progress. And yes you should. But you shouldn't do so out of a need to "fix yourself." This will only put you in a position of weakness and insecurity and undermine your own confidence, and therefore your chance of success at any endeavor.

Learn game and get better with women not because you need to have women to be happy, but because they can add to your life. Start your own business not because you need to be an entrepreneur to be worthy, but rather because you value the added freedom and independence it will bring you.

Remind yourself "I am complete exactly as I am" when you find yourself drowning in self-deprecating thoughts and beliefs.

3. People are usually acting out of insecurity

Chances are he – or she – is acting from a position of weakness

The same way that you and I have a tendency to act from position of weakness and feeling incomplete, so does everyone else… And most people are terribly guilty of doing so.

Realize that when someone insults you or berates, they're probably doing it to compensate for how insecure they feel. When you know that someone's talking trash behind your back it's most likely because they envy you and want to bring you down to their level.

Rise above their bullshit and ignore the haters and their insecurity-driven passive aggressiveness.

4. Failure is inevitable and temporary

Failure cannot be avoided.

Most startups fail… Most approaches will be met with rejection… And any new skill that you learn will be marked with countless failures before you succeed.

If you let failure discourage you from moving in the direction that you want to, then you're doomed to stagnate and never accomplish anything of note. Accept that failure will happen and then use your failures as feedback on your journey forward.

5. Challenges and bullshit are just course-corrections

Obstacles should not be cursed and damned, but recognized and dealt with

Similarly to believing that “whatever happened was meant to happen,” you must use the “bad” shit that happens as ammunition to move forward.

If you got dumped, then take it as a sign to work on yourself and improve your health, career, and masculine relationships. If you got fired, then take it as a sign to work on your skills or change careers. If you got sick or injured, then use it as a sign to focus on things like reading, writing, and meditation that you can continue to do.

Your obstacles will lead you to being a stronger and more confident version of yourself, so don’t damn them or ignore them.

Read More: A Manifesto On Masculine Happiness

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Top 5 Must-Read Articles From April 2015

May 3, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are the top 5 from a total of 112 that we published last month:

1. Why Most Women Didn't Want The Right To Vote

> If you look at history, democracy has rarely worked well. It is not rule by the majority but rule by the loudest. And who is louder than a woman? Who is more passionate? And when women follow others like lemmings, we see that women's suffrage can quickly become destructive.

2. Why Feminists Can't Escape Motherhood

> Feminism itself is an elaborate illusion designed to obscure a woman's natural ends and replace them with momentary and perishing ones, for meaningful reproduction and graceful flourishing cannot be achieved without a man to whom she must lovingly submit and cling to.

3. UK Feminists Ban Clapping At Conference Because It Triggers Anxiety

> At a National Union of Students (NUS) Women's conference in London this week, delegates were asked to refrain from applauding and use "jazz hands" instead. The request, which appeared on the Twitter feed of the Oxford University Student Union's Women's Campaign, was made because clapping was "triggering anxiety" amongst some conference members.

4. 3 Reasons Why Most Female Writers Are Garbage

> The atrociousness of contemporary female writing is in part due to the Gawkerfication of the Internet. Much in the same way that the sit-still-and-shut-up style of schooling privileges girls over boys, the click-driven consensus-seeking nature of modern pop writing advantages females—in their navel-gazing and conformity—over men.

5. Why I Am Proud To Be Called A Misogynist

> The materialistic and vain pursuit of wealth, status, and celebrity that has overtaken society in the last few decades is a result of the supportive feminine aspect of human existence being completely undermined to the point that it's almost removed. This symbiotic relationship has been discarded and abandoned in favor only of selfish glory. Me, Me, Me. If the human race was a rock band, the drummer and bass player would be wrestling with their band mates to be lead singer and guitarist, whilst no music is produced whatsoever.

You can review all articles we published last month on our archives page.

Don't Miss: Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Real Consequences Of Women In The Military

May 4, 2015 | by Simon Wolfe | Link | Original Link

Just like every other bastion of tradition and masculinity, the military is under attack by the forces of progressivism. The military is by its very nature masculine, hierarchical, and undemocratic, as it must be to succeed in its core business of engaging with and killing the enemy. This also makes it a target.

Of all our institutions, the military is the one which has best resisted progressivism, in large part because of the nature of the job. One does not simply turn up and demand equality in the military. Incoming does not discriminate.

However the military is ultimately a servant of the political classes, and this is where the pressure to bow to feminism originates. Everywhere they go women moan, demand special treatment, and undermine hierarchy. This has happened to the military and sadly there is not enough will remaining today to resist it, as we have seen with the recent humiliating sight of soldiers walking in high heels.

Unless there is some change in leadership this can only get worse.

The Obvious Problems

Sensible, sane women take one of the many other options they have in life before they pursue a career in the military. We have to question what sort of women our society is creating that they would seriously consider a career in combat, and what sort of a society we are that allows them to follow through such a bizarre and catastrophic decision.

What would make a woman want a low paid job they cannot physically do, while surrounded twenty-four hours a day by dangerous jerks that treat them like shit? Unsurprisingly, for those who know the nature of women it is exactly that. Most of them have daddy issues, are mentally damaged, or the losers of the sexual market who cannot secure a man and have no other career options to fall back on.

The most obvious problem with women in the military is that they are simply not good enough. Even with the reduced physical requirements for the non-combat roles they are eligible for now, many of them still fail to make the grade. They cannot even meet their own specially lowered standards for a job stacking blankets but still draw the same pay as real soldiers who have to work even harder to pick up the slack.

The Human Cost

Jessica Lynch became famous and scored a book deal after she was captured in Iraq in 2003. Her supply convoy, being driven by another female soldier, got lost and was ambushed in Nasiriyah, a militia stronghold that they were ordered to avoid. Lynch was heralded as a hero at the time by the media, portrayed as fighting to the last bullet.

In reality she had not fired a single round from her weapon. She had only joined the Army to save up money for college. The driver of the lead vehicle, Shoshana Johnson, joined the Army but never intended to go into combat. Like most women she just wanted the fun, fun, fun parts of being in the military, but not the actual, you know, military part of it. The oath they take means nothing to them.

Marines who were supposed to be securing bridges across the Euphrates for the invasion now had to be re-tasked to rescue this clusterfuck. Eleven soldiers died in the ambush. Six more, like Jessica Lynch, were captured. Another eighteen Marines died whilst desperately fighting through entrenched enemy positions in a hostile city to get to them in time.

Men, real men, real soldiers, then had to go in and rescue a scared nineteen-year-old girl from behind enemy lines because of progressives' insistence that we are all the same and that women should be in the military despite all the obvious evidence that they shouldn't.

I can't tell this story without mentioning the real hero of that convoy. Sergeant Donald Walters was the blonde-haired American whose actions were misattributed to Jessica Lynch. Sergeant Walters' vehicle became bogged down in sand. While the rest of his convoy made their escape, evidence suggests that he provided covering fire from his stranded vehicle.

He was abandoned alone, fifteen miles behind enemy lines and surrounded. He never made it out. He fought until he ran out of ammunition, and then he fought hand to hand. Eventually he was overcome, captured and then executed by the Shiite militia. While everybody has heard of Jessica Lynch, you have probably never heard of Sergeant Walters. If anybody deserves to be remembered from that day, it is him.

I don't blame the women. They don't know what they want. I blame the system that lies to women that they can be soldiers when it should be protecting them from themselves and their childish decisions. They should have been told, politely but firmly, no thanks—for their own safety and for that of the men serving alongside them. We do not allow children to serve in the military, so why would we allow women?

Women don't actually want to be in combat. Their silly demands to be included are like a girl wanting to ride your motorcycle. It's dangerous, exciting and looks fun so they want it, but when they get there they find they can't handle it and they drop it. Women just like to push boundaries. The correct response is to pat these girls on the head, tell them to leave this to the grown ups and ride off.

Women In The Military Are Not Patriots

There is a more serious problem than women being too feeble, fat and slow, and generally the worst soldiers known to mankind. It is more serious than them sleeping with senior ranks and subverting hierarchy. It is more serious than them getting pregnant on deployments or spreading diseases on base.

It is even more serious than women fucking up and getting good men killed. Even if we lived in the fantasy world of feminists where women really were just as capable as men, there are more deadly consequences of sending women to war.

We can afford to lose men in war. As long as there are healthy women back home having children the nation will live to fight another day. The presence of women in the military foreshadows a society's downfall.

Look at the Peshmerga in Iraq, or the final days of Nazi Germany. These were not strong, independent women or an exercise in equality, they were the last, desperate gasps of a dying society. The Islamic State are marrying off their women and having as many children as possible. The Kurds are sending their women to the front line. Guess what the long term consequences of this is.

The biggest existential threat to the US and Western countries is not rogue states or Islamic terrorists. It is the loss of our individual identities as nations. Every woman that is lured away from the role of wife, mother and homemaker by the modern world leaves behind her a hole which must be filled. If our people cannot or will not fill those holes then they will be filled for us by immigration. A nation must grow or die. A population that cannot sustain itself will be replaced.

If our women are too busy playing soldiers or “leaning in” then the next generation will come from elsewhere and will not be like us. Men’s sacrifice for society was dying in wars and the dangerous jobs. Women’s sacrifice was bearing the next generation. The tradition of the pedestal arose because women carried within themselves the future of our nation.

With the encouragement of government and media they abdicated their responsibilities and with it, their pedestal. Their talk of patriotism is bullshit. If women truly wanted to serve their nation then they would get married, stay married, and have children.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Simon Wolfe
Soldier. Writer. Standing amid a world of ruins. Commander of the Iron Legion

The Damaging Effects Of Jewish Intellectualism And Activism On Western Culture

May 4, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the past couple of years I began to wonder about the fact that Jews are firmly in the middle of leftist movements centered around socialism, communism, and feminism. The Culture Of Critique by Kevin MacDonald answered why they are so heavily invested in leftist causes and how they have damaged traditional Christian ideals by treating America as a cultural laboratory to further their own group interests above those of gentiles (non-Jews).

(click for larger size)

Up to recently, Jews did not have a homeland, meaning they had—and still have—to live in countries where they're minorities. Therefore they would historically favor societies that were open, multicultural, pro-immigration, and left-leaning so that they would not be persecuted by the host nation or be barred from attaining higher social and economic status.

> Jews benefit from open, individualistic societies in which barriers to upward mobility are removed, in which people are viewed as individuals rather than as members of groups, in which intellectual discourse is not prescribed by institutions like the Catholic Church that are not dominated by Jews, and in which mechanisms of altruistic punishment may be exploited to divide the European majority.

To accomplish such a society, Jewish intellectuals moved mountains to promote human equality and the idea of racial equality (the inventor of the word 'racist' was Russian Jewish communist Leon Trotsky, born Lev Bronshtein). While pushing the notion of equality, Jews were hyper-aware of their own unique race and would exclude themselves from many of the prescriptions they offered to their host cultures. They made sure to help their "tribe" before all others.

Below are the main arguments and highlights of The Culture Of Critique:

"Race is a myth"

Famed Jewish anthropologist Franz Boas was instrumental in pushing the idea of nurture and culture over that of nature. We now speak of "cultural" effects upon nations instead of more genetically determined factors like race.

> An important technique of the Boasian school was to cast doubt on general theories of human evolution , such as those implying developmental sequences, by emphasizing the vast diversity and chaotic minutiae of human behavior, as well as the relativism of standards of cultural evaluation.
>
> […]
>
> By 1926 every major department of anthropology was headed by Boas's students, the majority of whom were Jewish.
>
> […]
>
> Ashley Montagu was another influential student of Boas. Montagu, whose original name was Israel Ehrenberg, was a highly visible crusader in the battle against the idea of racial differences in mental capacities. He was also highly conscious of being Jewish, stating on one occasion that "if you are brought up a Jew, you know that all non-Jews are anti-Semitic. . . . I think it is a good working hypothesis". Montagu asserted that race is a socially constructed myth.

Freudian psychoanalysis as a gentile subversive movement

The book proposes that Sigmund Freud, a Jew, pushed psychoanalysis to break down traditional pair bonding in gentiles.

> Many early proponents viewed psychoanalysis as a redemptive messianic movement that would end anti-Semitism by freeing the world of neuroses produced by sexually repressive Western civilization.
>
> […]
>
> Freud's theory of anti-Semitism in Moses and Monotheism contains several assertions that anti-Semitism is fundamentally a pathological gentile reaction to Jewish ethical superiority.
>
> […]
>
> Freud managed to diagnose Western culture as essentially neurotic while apparently, on the basis of the argument in Moses and Monotheism, holding the view that Judaism represents the epitome of mental health and moral and intellectual superiority.
>
> […]
>
> …when [Western] institutions were subjected to the radical critique presented by psychoanalysis, they came to be seen as engendering neurosis, and Western society itself was viewed as pathogenic. Freud's writings on this issue are replete with assertions on the need for greater sexual freedom to overcome debilitating neurosis. As we shall see, later psychoanalytic critiques of gentile culture pointed to the repression of sexuality as leading to anti-Semitism and a host of other modern ills.

> […]
>
> The psychoanalysts who emigrated from Europe to the United States during the Nazi era expected to make psychoanalysis “into the ultimate weapon against fascism, anti-Semitism, and every other antiliberal bias.”

Frankfurt school

The Frankfurt school was a research institute set up in Germany during the 1920’s. They were instrumental in developing an intellectual base for cultural Marxism under the “critical theory” framework.

> At a deep level the work of the Frankfurt School is addressed to altering Western societies in an attempt to make them resistant to anti-Semitism by pathologizing gentile group affiliations.
>
> […]
>
> …entire thrust of the Frankfurt School’s view of science rejects the idea that science should attempt to understand reality in favor of the ideology that science ought to serve moral (i.e., political) interests.
>
> […]
>
> The end of anti-Semitism is thus viewed as a precondition for the development of a utopian society and the liberation of humanity— perhaps the closest that the Frankfurt School ever came to defining utopia. The envisioned utopian society is one in which Judaism can continue as a cohesive group but in which cohesive, nationalistic, corporate gentile groups based on conformity to group norms have been abolished as manifestations of psychopathology.
>
> […]
>
> In the 1970s, the Frankfurt School intellectuals continued to draw the fire of German conservatives who characterized them as the “intellectual foster-parents of terrorists” and as fomenters of “cultural revolution to destroy the Christian West”
>
> […]
>
> Jewish interests are also served by the Frankfurt School ideology that gentile concerns about losing social status and being eclipsed economically , socially, and demographically by other groups are an indication of psychopathology. As an exceptionally upwardly mobile group, this ideology serves Jewish interests by defusing gentile concerns about their downward mobility.

Jewish intellectual strategies to change culture

> Judaism, because of its position as a minority group strategy committed to its own worldview, has tended to adopt ideologies in which the institutions and ideologies of the surrounding society are viewed negatively.

> […]
>
> …an important goal of Jewish intellectual effort may be understood as attempting to undermine cohesive gentile group strategies while continuing to engage in their own highly cohesive group strategy.
>
> […]
>
> …one of the themes of post-Enlightenment Judaism has been the rapid upward mobility of Jews and attempts by gentile power structures to limit Jewish access to power and social status. Given this rather conspicuous reality, practical reasons of economic and political self-interest would result in Jews being attracted to movements that criticized the gentile power structure or even advocated overthrowing it entirely.
>
> […]
>
> Another practical goal of Jewish political and intellectual movements has been to combat anti-Semitism. For example, Jewish attraction to socialism in many countries in the 1930s was motivated partly by communist opposition to fascism and anti-Semitism. The general association between anti-Semitism and conservative political views has often been advanced as an explanation for Jewish involvement with the left, including the leftist tendencies of many wealthy Jews.
>
> […]
>
> In the absence of a clearly perceived conflict with Jewish interests, it remains possible that different political choices among ethnic Jews are only differences in tactics for how best to achieve Jewish interests.
>
> […]
>
> Silberman notes “American Jews are committed to cultural tolerance because of their belief— one firmly rooted in history— that Jews are safe only in a society acceptant of a wide range of attitudes and behaviors, as well as a diversity of religious and ethnic groups. It is this belief, for example, not approval of homosexuality, that leads an overwhelming majority of American Jews to endorse ‘gay rights’ and to take a liberal stance on most other so-called ‘social’ issues.”
>
> […]
>
> Institutions that promote group ties among gentiles (such as nationalism and traditional gentile religious associations) are actively opposed and subverted, while the structural integrity of Jewish separatism is maintained. A consistent thread of radical theorizing since Marx has been a fear that nationalism could serve as a social cement that would result in a compromise between the social classes and result in a highly unified social order based on hierarchical but harmonious relationships between existing social classes.
>
> […]
>
> When an experiment in ideology and political structure fails, another experiment > is launched. Since the Enlightenment, Judaism has not been a unified, monolithic movement.

>
> […]
>
> In the promised utopian societies of the future, the category of Jew-gentile would be of no theoretical importance , but Jews could continue to identify as Jews and there could be continuation of Jewish group identity while at the same time a principle source of gentile identity— religion and its concomitant supports for high-investment parenting— would be conceptualized as an infantile aberration.

Promotion of cosmopolitanism, individualism, and decadent lifestyles

A race to degeneracy hurts Jews less than gentiles because they still retain guiding ingroup values. Gentiles are left in the cultural winds that Jews help create.

> Research summarized by Triandis on cross-cultural differences in individualism and collectivism indicates that anti-Semitism would be lowest in individualist societies rather than societies that are collectivist and homogeneous apart from Jews.
>
> […]
>
> In the long run, radical individualism among gentiles and the fragmentation of gentile culture offer a superior environment for Judaism as a group evolutionary strategy,
>
> […]
>
> Indeed, “the universities, ‘free’ professions, salons, coffeehouses, concert halls, and art galleries in Berlin, Vienna, and Budapest became so heavily Jewish that liberalism and Jewishness became almost indistinguishable”.
>
> […]
>
> People in individualist cultures, in contrast, show little emotional attachment to ingroups. Personal goals are paramount, and socialization emphasizes the importance of self-reliance, independence, individual responsibility, and “finding yourself”. Individualists have more positive attitudes toward strangers and outgroup members and are more likely to behave in a prosocial, altruistic manner to strangers. Because they are less aware of ingroup-outgroup boundaries, people in individualist cultures are less likely to have negative attitudes toward outgroup members.
>
> […]
>
> Jews, as a highly cohesive group, have an interest in advocating a completely atomistic, individualistic society in which ingroup-outgroup distinctions are not salient to gentiles.
>
> […]
>
> …a fundamental aspect of Jewish intellectual history has been the realization that > there is really no demonstrable difference between truth and consensus.

>
> […]
>
> …the cultural idealization of an essentially Jewish personal ethic of hedonism, anxiety, and intellectuality came at the expense of the older rural ethic of asceticism and sexual restraint.

Crypto-Judaism

Jews went through great efforts to conceal the predominately Jewish nature of their intellectual movements by having token gentiles be controlled spokespersons for their groups.

> …because [their] movements were intended to appeal to gentiles, they were forced to minimize any overt indication that Jewish group identity or Jewish group interests were important to the participants.
>
> […]
>
> …to exert their influence, they were forced to deny the importance of specifically Jewish identity and interests at the heart of the movement.
>
> […]
>
> …after the collapse of the communist regime in Poland, "numerous Jews, some of them children and grandchildren of former communists, came 'out of the closet' ", openly adopting a Jewish identity and reinforcing the idea that many Jewish communists were in fact crypto-Jews.
>
> […]
>
> Lyons (1982, 73) finds that "most Jewish Communists wear their Jewishness very casually but experience it deeply. It is not a religious or even an institutional Jewishness for most; nevertheless, it is rooted in a subculture of identity, style, language, and social network.
>
> […]
>
> Freud took great pains to ensure that a gentile, Jung, would be the head of his psychoanalytic movement— a move that infuriated his Jewish colleagues in Vienna, but one that was clearly intended to deemphasize the very large overrepresentation of Jews in the movement during this period.

The Jewishness of an assimilated Jew tends to come out when Jewry is threatened:

> Jewish identity of even a highly assimilated Jew, and even one who has subjectively rejected a Jewish identity, may surface at times of crisis to the group or when Jewish identification conflicts with any other identity that a Jew might have, including identification as a political radical.

Their disproportionate participation in communism, Marxism, and socialism

> Marxism is an exemplar of a universalist ideology in which ethnic and nationalist barriers within the society and indeed between societies are eventually removed in the interests of social harmony and a sense of communal interest.
>
> […]
>
> Jews perceived communism as good for Jews: It was a movement that did not threaten Jewish group continuity, and it held the promise of power and influence for Jews and the end of state-sponsored anti-Semitism.
>
> […]
>
> …many Eastern European Jews were impoverished at least in part because of czarist anti-Jewish policies that prevented Jewish upward mobility. As a result , a great many Jews were attracted to radical political solutions that would transform the economic and political basis of society and would also be consistent with the continuity of Judaism.
>
> […]
>
> The main weapons Jews used against national cultures were two quintessentially modern ideologies, Marxism and Freudianism, "both [of which] countered nationalism's quaint tribalism with a modern (scientific) path to wholeness"
>
> […]
>
> Communism was good for Jews: It was a movement that never threatened Jewish group continuity, and it held the promise of Jewish power and influence and the end of state-sponsored anti-Semitism. And when this group achieved power in Poland after World War II, they liquidated the Polish nationalist movement, outlawed anti-Semitism , and established Jewish cultural and economic institutions.
>
> […]
>
> 12 of the 20 NKVD directorates were headed by ethnic Jews, including those in charge of state security, police, labor camps, and resettlement (i.e., deportation). The Gulag was headed by ethnic Jews from its beginning in 1930 until the end of 1938, a period that encompasses the worst excesses of the Great Terror. They were, in Slezkine's words, "Stalin's willing executioners"
>
> […]
>
> Jewish dissidents whose parents had run the Gulags, the deportations, and the state-sponsored famines, now led the "urgent call for social justice" [after Stalin's crackdown on Jews].

Jews were originators of the "social justice" movement that we now have to deal with, but they lost control of it after Jews were no longer seen as minorities in need of social justice but as privileged whites who are part of the power structure. Many Jews are confused about how to handle a movement they helped create that is highly sympathetic to Palestinian causes.

Jews in neo-conservatism

Neoconservatism evolved from those on the farthest right of Stalin's communist left, who eventually became anti-communist because of Soviet persecution of Jews after World War 2. They still retain liberal ideals like the denial of race and gender differences. Their most preached position of "Middle East democracy" is a euphemism for "let's hurt Israel's enemies."

Jewish liberals promote domestic issues which help their interests in the USA while neocons promote foreign policies that support Israel under the false guise of conservatism. They don't work together directly but seem to cover all the bases to help Jews both in and out of Israel.

> …origins of neoconservatism as a Jewish movement are thus linked to the fact that the left, including the Soviet Union and leftist radicals in the United States, had become anti-Zionist.
>
> […]
>
> The New Left also tended to have negative attitudes toward Israel, with the result that many Jewish radicals eventually abandoned the left. In the late 1960s, the black Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee described Zionism as "racist colonialism" which massacred and oppressed Arabs.
>
> […]
>
> Part of the attraction neoconservatism held for Jewish intellectuals was its compatibility with support for Israel at a time when Third World countries supported by most American leftists were strongly anti-Zionist.
>
> […]
>
> In alliance with virtually the entire organized American Jewish community, neoconservatism is a vanguard Jewish movement with close ties to the most extreme nationalistic, aggressive, racialist, and religiously fanatical elements within Israel.
>
> […]
>
> …by far the best predictor of neoconservative attitudes, on foreign policy at least, is what the political right in Israel deems in Israel's best interests.
>
> […]
>
> …neoconservatives have been staunch supporters of arguably the most destructive force associated with the left in the twentieth century—massive non-European immigration.

Jewish influence in America

> Jewish groups, particularly the AJCongress, played a leading role in drafting civil rights legislation and pursuing legal challenges related to civil rights issues mainly benefiting blacks. “Jewish support, legal and monetary, afforded the civil rights movement a string of legal victories. . . . There is little exaggeration in an American Jewish Congress lawyer’s claim that ‘many of these laws were actually written in the offices of Jewish agencies by Jewish staff people, introduced by Jewish legislators and pressured into being by Jewish voters’ ”
>
> […]
>
> By 1968, Jews constituted 20 percent of the faculty of elite American colleges and universities and constituted 30 percent of the “most liberal” faculty. At this time, Jews, representing less than 3 percent of the population, constituted 25 percent of the social science faculty at elite universities and 40 percent of liberal faculty who published most.
>
> […]
>
> [Jewish intellectualism] has resulted in a society increasingly split between a disproportionately Jewish “cognitive elite” and a growing mass of individuals who are intellectually incompetent, irresponsible as parents, prone to requiring public assistance, and prone to criminal behavior, psychiatric disorders, and substance abuse.
>
> […]
>
> …neither communism nor fascism was good for Jews in the long run. But democracy cannot be trusted given that Weimar ended with Hitler. A solution is to advocate democracy and the trappings of traditional religious culture, but managed by an elite able to manipulate the masses via control of the media and academic discourse.
>
> […]
>
> Of considerable importance to the history of U.S. immigration policy has been the collaboration between Jewish activists and elite gentile industrialists interested in cheap labor, at least in the period prior to 1924.

Jewish progress in the 20th century

> In the late 19th century the great bulk of the Jewish population lived in Eastern Europe, with many Jews mired in poverty and all surrounded by hostile populations and unsympathetic governments. A century later, Israel is firmly established in the Middle East, and Jews have become the wealthiest and most powerful group in the United States and have achieved elite status in other Western countries. The critical Jewish role in radical leftism has been sanitized, while Jewish victimization by the Nazis has achieved the status of a moral touchstone and is a prime weapon in the push for large-scale non-European > immigration, multi-culturalism and advancing other Jewish causes.

>
> […]
>
> The victory over National Socialism set the stage for the tremendous increase in Jewish power in the post-World War II Western world, in the end more than compensating for the decline of Jews in the Soviet Union. As Slezkine shows, the children of Jewish immigrants assumed an elite position in the United States, just as they had in the Soviet Union and throughout Eastern Europe and Germany prior to World War II. This new-found power facilitated the establishment of Israel, the transformation of the United States and other Western nations in the direction of multiracial, multicultural societies via large-scale non-white immigration, and the consequent decline in European demographic and cultural preeminence.
>
> […]
>
> While constituting approximately 2.4 percent of the population of the United States, Jews represented half of the top one hundred Wall Street executives and about 40 percent of admissions to Ivy League colleges. Lipset and Raab (1995) note that Jews contribute between one-quarter and one-third of all political contributions in the United States, including one-half of Democratic Party contributions and one-fourth of Republican contributions.

Predictions for the future

> One may expect that as ethnic conflict continues to escalate in the United States, increasingly desperate attempts will be made to prop up the ideology of multiculturalism with sophisticated theories of the psychopathology of majority group ethnocentrism, as well as with the erection of police state controls on nonconforming thought and behavior.
>
> […]
>
> History also suggests that anti-Jewish reactions develop as Jews increase their control over other peoples. As always, it will be fascinating to observe the dénouement.
>
> […]
>
> Presently white gentiles are the most underrepresented group at Harvard, accounting for approximately 25 percent of the students, while Asians and Jews constitute at least half of the student body while constituting no more than five percent of the population. The United States is well on the road to being dominated by an Asian technocratic elite and a Jewish business, professional, and media elite.

Jews feel an intimate bond with each other as you may have already noticed by their professional networking circles like I have in Washington DC. Their actions, lives, and ideology are dominated by their race. While I don’t have a problem with that, I do find their subversive movements against gentiles hypocritical in that they would in no way advise or enact those ideas for Israel. Their morality, fairness, and justice is limited to whether they are dealing with fellow Jews or gentiles, and they will not push any idea or notion that may paint Jewish actions in a critical light.

The book makes clear that Jews conducted cultural undertakings that they believed would end anti-Semitism once and for all, but like most utopia builders, they forgot to account for the consequences, particularly how multiculturalism, a Jewish keystone policy, is beginning to cater to additional groups that are hostile to Jewish interests. Also, incubating social justice and then losing control of it has left out Jews as a victimized group and promoted Palestinian interests instead.

Their overshot explains why the American Enterprise Institute (AEI), a neocon organization, has in the past two years begun attacking feminism, an ideology that developed with disproportionate Jewish support. They're doing so because minorities are clamoring for a bigger piece of the victim pie and introducing anti-Semitic and pro-Palestine thought. Some Jews have calculated that at this point it's better to introduce some truth and realtalk in gender issues (but not race) so that non-Jewish groups don't gain too much power. Don't be surprised if Jews throw multiculturalism under the bus at some point and claim that they are the true "white" Americans in need of protection from the anti-Semitic minority hordes.

In turns out there is no "Jewish conspiracy" at all. The Jewish people simply are hyper-nationalistic and ethnocentric and so live and work in a way that their group is benefited first. Their participation in every sociological movement is structured so that Jews are benefited outright, or at least not hurt. This would be no different than if your efforts to increase your income and well-being went to benefit your direct family.

What amazes me is how methodical, patient, and determined Jews are in promoting their group interests. Such efforts should be commended and modeled. Why isn't there such a group of Americans that do the same for Christian interests? The answer lies in the fact that gentiles are less organized, less ethnocentric, more altruistic to outgroups, and more prone to selling out their people if presented with money and power, while Jews would only sell out after their ingroup needs are met.

A lot of red pill truth is concerned with dismantling myths that have been institutionalized by intellectual Jews over the past century. Not being able to highlight race or gender differences matches with the Jewish imperative because doing so will inevitably lead to "anti-Semitism" when differences between Jews and gentiles are pointed out concerning each group's propensity for ambition, intelligence, ethnocentrism, identity, and socioeconomic class status. The Culture Of Critique explains where significant parts of our current cultural problems came from, connecting a lot of dots I had missing about why our culture got to where it is. The bulk of what I criticize about Western culture was in fact ushered in by intellectual Jewish movements.

Before opening this book, I wondered if it would turn me into a neo-Nazi, but instead it served as a historical truth bomb that has made me skeptical of the ideas, behavioral actions, and teachings of prominent Jews and where their true intentions and loyalties lie (i.e. if an American Jew would die for America before Israel). I'm also having trouble getting my head around the fact that such a small group would embark on a massive reconstruction of reality and ideological manipulations on the world's people just to protect their group—and succeed. I feel both outrage and admiration at the same time.

Ironically, my parents were allowed to emigrate to the United States in part because of intense Jewish lobbying to loosen immigration laws. I probably wouldn't be here today if it wasn't for their efforts in creating a multicultural America. The neomasculine ideals that I believe are correct, and the traditions that I would want to bring back, would have likely prevented me from coming into existence and becoming an American citizen.

That said, when I witness the cultural destruction today and how it negatively affects my male peers, I feel not anger for what has transpired in the past but a deep focus on actions I can take in the present to preserve secular masculinity for men who don't want to turn into a effete male who prays at the alter of a matriarchal power structure.

The Culture Of Critique is thoroughly cited, but the author often went on long tangents that veered away from his main arguments. It reads likes a textbook and does repeat itself often, but the author is patient in making sure you understand the gravity of the information he's presenting. If you're interested in how our culture got to this point in time, I highly recommend the book.

Read More: "The Culture Of Critique" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Last Campaign Of Ulysses S. Grant

May 4, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Ulysses S. Grant left his second term of office as president of the United States in 1877 with his reputation somewhat tarnished, but nevertheless intact. He had occupied the office during one of America's fervent periods of expansion and concentration of wealth; and the consequential corruption that this expansion engendered had left a prominent mark on his presidency.

While personally honest himself, Grant was a product of the closed world of the military, where the grasping for money and power was more subdued than in the civilian world. He was a battlefield general without peer, but proved himself to be far too trusting, and unable to cope with the shark-infested waters of Washington and Wall Street.

He and his wife Julia then embarked on a "world tour" that would keep them in the public eye, and deplete their savings, for another two years. It must be remembered that in this era, there were no lavish speaking fees for ex-presidents; there were no think-tank directorships, no plum appointments, no lucrative book deals, and no lecture circuits.

A great general, but not quite suited for business

Presidents had historically always been independently wealthy. Grant had amassed little wealth during his time in office, and in his day there was no pension for departing ex-presidents. Worse still, there existed a rule stating that military officers had to surrender their pensions if they wished to run for political office. So Grant had had to give up that safety net as well.

Thus Grant found himself in the unenviable position, after concluding his world tour, of trying to find ways of making money as a man of fifty-seven with a wife and dependents to feed. His greatest asset was his name: Grant was enormously popular with the public, and his unassuming manner and keen mind made a deep impression on all who met him. Otto von Bismarck, meeting Grant in Germany during his world tour, had been impressed with his American guest's perceptive mind and quiet confidence.

Grant, frankly, lacked an aptitude for business. He had little sense of money and how it operated, and he was far too trusting when dealing with associates and employees. Worse still, there is little evidence that he was aware of this personal limitation; he should have sought out honorary positions in universities (as did his ex-Confederate counterpart Robert E. Lee) where his name and prestige would have been sufficient consideration for any salary received.

Alas, Grant chose to plunge into the worlds of business and high finance, with all of its attendant risks. These were activities to which he was quite ill-suited.

Grant, financier Jay Gould, and a former Mexican government official named Matias Romero pooled their resources in the early 1880s to found the "Mexican Southern Railroad." The railroad might have benefitted from the favorable economic climate of the time, but the failure of Congress to implement a free trade agreement with Mexico doomed the venture. The railroad venture ended in bankruptcy in 1884.

But worse events were still to come. In 1883 Grant had been convinced by his son (Ulysses Jr), and his son's friend, Ferdinand Ward, to start a Wall Street brokerage house.

Ward was considered a financial maverick at the time, and promoted himself as the "Napoleon of finance." He had enough panache and apparent success to seduce the Grant family; on Ward's assurances, Grant invested over $100,000 of his own money in the venture. This was a huge amount for any man in the early 1880s, and represented just about all of Grant's life savings.

Dying of cancer, Grant worked day and night on his writing

Grant himself was not expected to do very much at the offices of Grant & Ward. He had been asked to join because the prestige of his name might attract potential clients. So Grant showed up at his office on Wall Street several times per week, smoking cigars and meeting prominent businessmen. He had long cultivated a serious smoking habit: author Charles B. Flood, in his work Grant's Final Victory, claims that the ex-president consumed twenty-five Cuban cigars per day.

What the Grants did not know was that Ferdinand Ward was running a Ponzi scheme right under their noses. Ward provided his business partners with fraudulent information and "cooked" books so that the nature of his activities might remain undetected. He would entice investors to give him money, and then illegally use that money as "collateral" for multiple loans. "Investment dividends" were paid out regularly to give the impression of successful management, but this money was simply contributions from other investors. Ward, quite simply, was the Bernard Madoff of the 1880s.

Like all Ponzi schemes, Grant & Ward would eventually collapse. When first told of the news that Grant & Ward had imploded, Grant was in disbelief. He was left literally penniless. He discovered that he did not even own his own house: the payment of his mortgage had been entrusted to Ward, who had used it for himself. Grant, in despair, at one point even thought of killing Ward, but later stated he had no desire to be imprisoned for murdering so odious a creature.

Mark Twain helped Grant negotiate a lucrative book contract with an unheard of 75% royalty rate

It would not be long before personal tragedy of another sort would enter the picture. In 1884 Grant had seen his doctor, after complaining of soreness in the throat that would not go away. His physician took a tissue sample from the back of Grant's throat, and had the sample examined; the growth proved to be cancerous. The lab technician informed Grant's doctor that "he [Grant] was doomed."

With his back up against the wall, and with his time on earth rapidly drawing to a close, Grant steeled himself for one last campaign that might provide for his family after his demise. He accepted an offer from the editor of Century Magazine, Robert Johnson, to write a book of personal memoirs.

Similar projects by other Civil War figures had been moderately successful, and with the deaths of Lincoln and Robert E. Lee, Grant himself was the last of the major living figures of the war. Good luck also came from an unexpected source: Grant's canny friend Mark Twain was able to negotiate very favorable royalty terms with the publisher on his behalf.

All through 1884, then, Grant toiled day and night on his book. During this time, cancer rapidly consumed his body. He was unable to eat anything except the most liquid of foods, and the act of drinking water "was pure agony" akin to "drinking molten lead."

He did have several assistants to help him with the acquisition of materials and the checking of facts. Yet this was no ghost-written memoir, but the line-by-line product of Grant himself. He was not naturally a literary man, but his prose has a terse and dignified tone that strikes precisely the right chord for a book of this type.

The end closed in quickly. He died on July 23, 1885, only four days after completing the manuscript. It was an incredible feat of willpower and endurance. The Personal Memoirs of Ulysses S. Grant was an immediate bestseller, and solved forever the financial problems of the Grant family. Its stature as a historical document and as a work of literature has held steady over the years, and is worth reading even today.

It was Grant's last campaign, and the most personal of his victories.

Read More: Origins Of Neomasculinity

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Two Reasons First Impressions Aren't As Important As You Think

May 4, 2015 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

We are told so often that people form initial impression of whoever they meet within the first few seconds. It's been suggested that hiring managers decide whether they will hire a candidate shortly after a handshake, a jury decides who wins the case after the opening statements, and women decide whether they will sleep with a guy within a minute of meeting him—or less.

Indeed, we can't help but assume certain things about the people we meet, but it is very important not let those first impressions mislead you. These first impressions are likely to be wrong all too often for at least two common but compelling reasons:

1. No Matter How Good Your Intuition Is, It's Bound To Fail You Every Now And Then

How many times have you assumed that a person you just met was stuck up, to only later find out that he she was just shy and introverted? How often does your first impression tell you that the person you are dealing with is trustworthy and reliable, to only be disappointed with their lack of follow-through? How many times has someone said out of the blue that they don't care about money, and you only later saw how cheap and petty he was?

When it comes to girls and game, the most frustrating experience that we have to deal with is going out with a girl who seems to really, really like us only to never return our calls and text messages the next day. Who know which one of the many reasons made her change her mind or send false sign of interest in the first place, but the bottom line is the same—we misread her behavior and assumed interest where it turned out simply not to be.

Although your intuition can certainly be helpful in linking certain behaviors to people's qualities and you may be right more often than not, it's far from being 100% reliable, no matter how experienced and perceptive you are.

2. Many Have Mastered How To Make The First Impression They Want You To Have

This is what spies and serial killers have been doing for generations in order to get what they want. It would be easy for anyone who has serious mental or anger issues to act nice and kind for an hour at a party or on a date, and no one will have any idea about how loudly they scream at their family member or partner or how many plates they have broken during domestic arguments?

The people who are aware of their undesirable qualities are often particularly good at overcompensating for them and putting up a social mask that's a complete opposite of who they really are. For instance, a manager who is notoriously mean can be super nice while he is interviewing you for a job, but once you are on board, he will magically go back to being the abusive, micromanaging asshole that he is known to be with everyone else.

A person who struggles financially and who goes to a fancy party might put himself together better than the rest in order to make sure that he makes that first impression of doing as well as other attendees, however false that impression might be.

When getting to know who someone really is, there simply isn't a substitute for letting time show their character. This applies to hiring an employee and meeting women as much as to any other are of life. It takes time and seeing people in action in certain situations in order to really know how trustworthy, generous, and reliable they are, and there is simply not shortcut to finding out the truth.

Read More: 5 Signs A Girl Has Daddy Issues

Seneca Stone
Seneca is an attorney, a tennis fan and an observer of human behavior in Northern California, who enjoys commenting, hating, and admiring what and who he sees around.

The Baltimore Riots: Where The State Is The Insurgency

May 5, 2015 | by Henry Calgues | Link | Original Link

Things are moving pretty fast in Baltimore. Three weeks ago Baltimore was just another American city, bustling beneath the radar of national attention. Freddie Gray died in police custody on April 12, and here we are in the first days of May and we've already witnessed riots, the swift arrest of six Baltimore police officers, and a triumphant victory rally.

There are still so many unanswered questions and conflicting information regarding the death of Freddie Gray that I find this topic very hard to write about. I'm not one who likes to eat crow unless I have to, so I won't be discussing the actual incident. However, there is no shortage of people who apparently have no problem organizing, demanding, rioting, assaulting, and burning buildings without the necessary information.

On rioting

When it comes to rioting, I have to be honest, rioting and violence have their place in society. It shouldn't be hard to admit that violence is sometimes the answer. It just so happens that the climate of injustice is not hot enough yet for me to start breaking windows and setting fires. However, it's getting warmer every year and if things continue as they have, today's rioters will be tomorrow's purveyors of peace.

And that's what it comes down to. It's all relative. I can't stand it when people who simply understand the effectiveness of a riot find camaraderie with rioters only because they riot. Equally frustrating are those who condemn any rioting just because they don't agree with the current riot's cause.

The argument that Baltimore rioters are only hurting their own neighborhood can go either way. On one hand, as a rightist if we were to riot, I can guarantee you that we would take the fight directly to enemy territory because we actually have stakes in our own community. We own property, take pride in our property, and have a sense of preserving it because we built it – it has value to us.

On the other hand, even though the Baltimore rioters destroyed their own neighborhood it was still effective. They inspired fear in the masses who watched it on TV. Other city governments took notice and their imaginations swirled with worse case scenarios were it to happen to them. The riots have also inspired a loss of faith in the police and provided a spark of inspiration for other cities' neighborhoods that are powderkegs ready to explode on command. In the end, when the smoke clears, who do you think will foot the bill for Baltimore's rebuilding? Will they even suffer a loss?

Now as a police officer, my job is to maintain order. It's common sense. We are the first line of defense for protecting life and property, so if we are going to insist that we be the only ones who are in charge of that protection, we better do a damn good job at it. So what the hell gave the Baltimore police the right to stand down? As innocent people were being assaulted and private property was destroyed by mob violence, how moral was it for them to take command – then make a command decision to stand down?

I think citizens and businesses in large cities need to ask their local police departments if they are willing to stop a riot if it breaks out. If the city cannot guarantee protection from mob rule or is unwilling to do so, then the citizens should make the decision to defend themselves. Baltimore won't be the last city to smolder.

The State as insurgent

Events in Baltimore began to get suspicious when Baltimore's own City Councilman Nick Mosby said this about the riots (language all his):

> What it is – is young boys, the young folks in this community showing decades old of anger, frustration for a system that's failed them…These young guys are frustrated; they upset and unfortunately they displaying it in a very destructive manner. When folks are undereducated, unfortunately they don't have the same intellectual voice to express it the way other people doing and that's what we see through the violence today.

He went on to say that the media is the problem for focusing solely on the riots and when the reporter asked him why the police were allowing the violence and looting, Mr. Mosby said:

> We asked them [the police] to back off…we told them we would be able to kind of talk to the young guys out here and we asked them to back up and they did it and it worked out.

It worked out alright. Councilman Mosby also said that rioting is wrong, but I'll let you decide how sincere his statement was or if it was just obligatory. To me, he seemed delighted with the violence and more angry at the reporter for questioning it.

This interview took place on the street during the riot with a Fox News reporter and it is posted below. Notice how Mosby stands in front of what resembles a boxer's entourage before a main event, surrounded by angry associates who restlessly sway back and forth behind him. As Mr. Mosby stood comfortably among the posse, his clean, expensive suit was in contrast to a man concealing his face with a white t-shirt like a terrorist.

I found it interesting that somehow Mosby blamed the riots on a failed system, yet takes no responsibility for being an elected official at the top rung of the system he claims is such a failure. Instead, his own tone is one of anger similar to those of the rioters who stood behind him.

Perhaps someone needs to let Mr. Mosby know that he is no longer sitting in one of his many social justice classes he took in college and that he is actually an elected politician now who does not have access to the victim card. He needs to man up or get out of office because he is the system. Local government is by far the most impactive level of government for people, but only when it's done right and with people who are qualified to be there.

Perhaps it is all a racket. Do black leaders routinely climb to the top rungs of city government to fein helplessness and despair from some greater evil by which they say they have no control over; an evil that they cannot address—even with all the resources and tax dollars that are available to a large American city?

In my opinion, the greater evil is themselves and their obsessive culture that finds no greater joy than the collective of tribal victimhood and anger.

At what point do black people finally see themselves as the system? What world do we live in where a city councilman stands with rioters and rioters stand with a city councilmen? Or when a mayor attends a victory rally because the demands of rioters were answered? When the insurgent and the government stand hand in hand, you must begin to ask who they think the real enemy is?

"Black power" equals more government power?

Clues to the answer were found during the victory rally held Saturday. It appeared that a few hundred to a thousand people showed up for the rally. I was watching CNN and while the news reporters painted a picture of American justice and police reform for everyone as the six Baltimore officers were swiftly charged, the background noise of the speeches and chants during the rally were nothing but echoes of Marxism and black liberation theology.

The tone of the victory rally was clearly black power and injustice narratives that demanded more government programs and spending for black communities as well as federal intervention into local law enforcement. Who lashes out against the government to demand more government? And should we support them?

The archetype of the rioter or revolutionary freedom fighter was made popular through pop-culture and media over the years, securing a place for him in the heart of all Americans. Even some libertarians cherish the image of masked fighters resisting the state. But now it comes into fruition that those who actually resist the state with violence (and not just fantasize about it) are the ones demanding more government control. Oops.

Many fans of the Cop Block collective swear that they are comprised of libertarian-minded lovers of freedom. I have to question that when they appear to champion resistance just because it is resistance. They appear to take no caution in inadvertently supporting enemies of their alleged founding ideals of smaller government.

#BlackSpring?? the PEOPLE?? Sounds like collectivism to me

At another rally Al Sharpton said, “We need the Justice Department to take over policing in this country,” and went on to declare war on states’ rights by saying, “In the 20th century, they had to fight states’ rights to get the right to vote. We’re going to have to fight states’ rights in terms of closing down police cases.”

All this momentum for more government was ushered in on a wave that began as one specific right wing narrative, which no doubt emerged from the fear and anger of Obama’s America: the rise of the alleged police state.

Police state as reform?

It’s kind of funny how the right’s condemnation of a non-existent police state is what is actually leading to a real police state. The answer to what you thought was heavy-handed local law enforcement is now apparently federally operated police agencies. Sounds friendly.

You’ve warned of a police state for years. What does it say of your police state that was allegedly ready to boot stomp your freedom on command, when a major city police department failed to protect life and property from a mob of mostly juveniles? Or perhaps the state decides who gets protection and who does not?

As a police officer with inside knowledge of actual police power and capabilities, I can attest that as long as law enforcement is operated at a local level and law and order is reasonably maintained that there can be no police state. Regardless of what any YouTube video says, local law enforcement resists a police state.

But they are trying. Al Sharpton just demanded it. The rioters in Baltimore are asking for it under the guise of social justice as they exploit the unavoidably ugly nature of policing. Policing is a necessary function in society that can’t help but to appear ugly and unaccountable at times.

The millions of day to day encounters police have with citizens can be dynamic and unpredictable which can lead to questionable incidents like Tamir Rice, Eric Garner, Mike Brown, John Crawford, and Freddie Gray as well as lesser known incidents like Kelly Thomas and other whites who are actually killed by the police more than blacks. There isn’t a single nation in the world that has perfected policing yet, and nobody ever will.

But they want you to think that they can perfect policing and bring justice to the people. Just a little more oversight, a little more control, and a little more government should do the trick, right?

Read More: The Ferguson Riots Show Why Good Cops Will Quit

Henry Calgues
AC is a cop on the brink of resignation. To find out why, check out his new blog at anonymouscop.com or like Anonymous Cop on Facebook Click here to view my Facebook page

Why Floyd Mayweather's Victory Over Manny Pacquiao Is A Victory For The Manosphere

May 5, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Most people in the civilized world were aware of this past weekend's super fight between Floyd Mayweather Jr. and Manny Pacquiao. Much to the dismay of the crowd at the MGM Grand in Las Vegas, Mayweather picked apart the inferior Pacquiao and cruised to an easy victory to push his perfect record to 48-0 (26 KO).

The crowd was overwhelmingly in favor of the underdog Pacquiao and vocalized as much, cheering wildly whenever he made any sort of contact with the elusive Mayweather while booing the pound for pound champ for "showboating."

[image]
This fight was billed as "Good vs. Evil"

The pro-Pacquiao crowd reflected exactly how the public at large feels about Mayweather. They feel like he's a "monster" and a "bad guy." Pacquiao's trainer, Freddie Roach (one of the best in the business) called the bout "a battle between good and evil."

The bottom line is that most of the public, domestic and abroad, loathes Floyd Mayweather, Jr. and here are the reasons why.

He flaunts his wealth

Floyd “Money” Mayweather

> Whoever said money is the root of all evil never had any.
> -Jim Young, The Boiler Room

Most people don’t like cocky men. Most people don’t like rich men. Floyd Mayweather is both. His wealth is well documented because he consistently shows the world the fruits of his half billion dollar net worth.

Take a look at your Facebook and Twitter feeds and I guarantee you’ll see person after person vilifying him for bragging about his two Bugatti’s, two Lamborghinis, and two of whatever other six-figure automobile he’s got parked in his 50 car garage.

[image]
He’s got a similar fleet of all black cars in Miami

This hate is nothing more than envy. It’s one thing when women chastise a male for boasting about his ridiculous riches (which goes against their “flaunt it if you got it” creedo when referring to their own bodies) but it’s quite another to see and hear men talk about how “wrong” it is to show the world how wealthy one is.

Personally, I doubt I would be quite that flamboyant, but I can’t speak to that because I’m not Mayweather. I didn’t come up like him, I’m not the same person as he is, and I haven’t worked my ass off for thousands of hours in a sweaty gym to reach the pinnacle of my profession.

Any man who claims they wouldn’t be “like that” is akin to the beta schlub who tells his oneitis “He’s such a cocky asshole with his expensive car and clothes. I would never do that even if I could!”

Say what you will about Mayweather, but disliking him for the egregious crime of not being shy about the money he has is a pussified cop out. Just say you hate the guy because he has more money than you do and leave it at that. At least then you're being honest with yourself and others around you and will properly motivate you to get your own financial house in order.

The new scarlet letter in the world of sports

[image]
Mayweather booked for domestic violence

The issue of domestic violence is more prevalent on sports landscape than it has ever been in history. If an athlete so much as gets publicly accused of putting his hands on a woman, he is immediately subjected to a media inflected flogging with his name, reputation, and character dragged through the mud.

If he's arrested or (gasp) convicted (in the court of public opinion or a court of law) of such crimes his career is subsequently put on hold until the powers that be have decided he's had his nose in the corner long enough to satisfy the public blood lust to strip him of his financial agency.

ESPN's Sarah Spain dropped next-level hamster rationale on The Dan LeBatard Show last week about how Mayweather shouldn't be allowed to fight anymore:

> He can do whatever he wants to make money. I just don't think he should be fighting anymore.

The narrative amongst women, white knights, and the blue pill media is that they would be boycotting the fight to avoid putting money directly into his pocket because of his five domestic abuse convictions. It's a free country. People can do what they want for whatever reason they want and that's their choice. But this gesture is typical grandstanding.

When Mike Tyson got out of prison for rape back in 1995, everyone rushed to their television sets to watch his first post-incarceration fight against Peter McNeeley and every subsequent fight after that. Where were the protests then?

Tyson made quick work of McNeeley, and everybody watched despite his rape conviction

Professional fighters have been beating their female significant others for decades. That doesn't make it right, but the fact of the matter is that Mayweather's brushes with the law are nothing new. After he was released from prison in 2012, he hasn't caught so much as an accusation of domestic violence.

But that didn't stop ESPN and other media outlets from asking questions about his past transgressions. This tact was another thinly veiled ruse to try to undermine a man at the top of his profession.

Mayweather being taken into custody

I've stated before that these domestic violence freedom fighters don't give a shit about the victims, and they verified as much last week. All they were concerned about was why the Nevada State Athletic commission didn't suspend Mayweather for his convictions and why he's still allowed to fight and make a shitload of cash, rather than asking questions regarding the mental well being of his victims.

Sure, they reached out to these battered women for interviews and comments about the incidents, but their interest had nothing to do with the victims themselves. All they wanted was more dirt on what went down to further smear Mayweather's name and continue to paint him in a negative light, knowing full well all the details were in the police reports.

[image]
Two of his accusers

It's plainly obvious that all the media is really concerned about is making him uncomfortable on camera which is something that hasn't happened to date. They want to break his frame and it's as simple as that. Try as they might, Floyd's red pill conditioning ensures that's not happening any time soon.

All their efforts to lessen the hype fell flat, as the fight broke numerous records as expected. All told, Mayweather and his camp stand to make over $200 million, and Pacquiao will make somewhere in the neighborhood of $120 million.

So much for their little boycott.

He is selfish and unapologetic

[image]
He doesn't apologize for being rich

Selfishness is one of the main tenets we teach here in the 'sphere for many reasons. The world doesn't give a shit about us. If we fall on hard times, it's up to us and us alone to dig ourselves out. We don't have the government to bail us out or white knights or orbiters to lend us a helping hand when our lives spiral out of control.

If a man doesn't take care of his needs and wants first, he makes himself extremely vulnerable to the world which will plunder him for his money, status, and sometimes even his health. For this reason it is imperative that we take care of ourselves first before anyone else.

Mayweather makes no bones about his selfishness. In a Showtime piece about his rise to glory in the boxing ranks, Floyd looks directly into the camera and says:

> It's me first, then everybody else. Ain't no motha fucka gon' look out for me but me. Me first…..then everybody else.

Heaven forbid a man in this country looks out for himself first rather than using his riches to rescue poor, helpless, virtuous women from the perils of first-world squalor.

Something else that seems to rub the masses the wrong way is that he is flat out unapologetic. He hasn't apologized about his domestic abuse convictions, the flaunting of his wealth, or anything else the public has crucified him for. Mayweather just doesn't give a shit about what people think. He gets validation from himself, and himself alone and people hate him for it.

He's cocky for a reason

The "hate" they have for him is obvious projection. People can only wish they had the balls to be as self-centered and remorseless as he is. They would love nothing more than to give zero fucks about what people say or think about them, but their fear holds them back. And they show that fear by attempting to defame someone who fully exudes personality traits they can only imagine having themselves.

Takeaway

Say what you want about Mayweather, but he is the very best at what he does and showed us why on Saturday night.

Pretty much how it went the entire fight

His victory over Pacquiao pisses people off because he represents everything we teach in the manosphere. The media and the public at large would love for him to be a validation-seeking mangina. But like most men here, Mayweather knows a shit test when he sees one and uses a combination of “agree and amplify” (by embracing the villain role), and non-acknowledgement by simply ignoring the gotcha questions asked by female and betafied reporters.

Floyd Mayweather is kicking life’s ass and people hate him for it. That million dollar smile he flashes at those hostile crowds in Vegas after he dominates yet another opponent shows us that he wouldn’t have it any other way.

Read Next: The Shameless Exploitation Of Domestic Violence In The NFL

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

The Top 5 Dangers Of Using Muscle Building Supplements That Actually Work

May 5, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by John Doe Bodybuilding

If you want to know what the best muscle building supplements are you're in luck because I know two of them.

What are they?

Relax, we'll get there. First I want to warn you of the dangers of using these products.

Danger #1: You're going to look a lot better.

That’s going to hurt your relationship with your friends and family.

Everybody’s friends and family look like shit, and they’ll want you to look like shit as well so you don’t make them feel bad.

Danger #2: You’re going to get stronger.

Along with strength increases come ego increases.

That’s just reality. When you get massively stronger your ego gets bigger.

Danger #3: You’re going to realize that you’re spending time with people who are going nowhere.

With a big ego comes the realization that, damn, you might have been wasting your time hanging out with bums.

You'll start to realize that these bums don't even look good and they're not even strong, how could they be in the presence of greatness such as yourself?

Danger #4: You may recognize greatness in yourself that you never saw before.

When you realize you have the ability to get big and strong, you'll eventually realize you have the ability to build a business and make a lot of money.

Building a business and building a body are similar processes. They take a lot of time and effort, and the result is extraordinary. Most people will never do it.

Danger #5: You won't be able to tolerate most people.

Most people have no ambition, for their bodies or for their minds, and they will become unbearable to be around.

If you're man enough to brave those dangers, then here you go….

The top 2 muscle building supplements that actually work and aren't illegal yet are:

Read John Doe's article The Best Legal Alternative to Steroids to find out what the best 2 legal muscle building supplements are.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

29-Year-Old Feminist Demands Government Money For Her Own Sterilization

May 6, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A British feminist has been whining to high heaven because doctors on the NHS are unwilling to sterilise her on the taxpayer's dime. Holly Brockwell, 29 (pictured), is now complaining to every media outlet that will listen that she never wants to have children, and that doctors refusing to seal up her fallopian tubes is discrimination.

Brockwell's case signals a new plateau in the depravity of modern feminism: women demanding state-funded mutilation of their reproductive systems as a human right. This confused character writes as follows:

> Since I've never wanted children and firmly believe I never will, the clear solution to me is sterilisation, which these days is a relatively quick procedure under local anaesthetic.
>
> That recent trip to my GP is not the first time I've asked. In fact, I've made the request to be sterilised every year since I was 26 — I'm now 29 — and have been refused every time.
>
> I can't even get a referral. The response is always: 'You're far too young to take such a drastic decision.'

A woman who "does not want children" is at war with her own biology, and quite likely mentally ill. A woman who wants to have her reproductive system mutilated because less intrusive contraception is too inconvenient, is a danger to herself and ought to be sectioned under the Mental Health Act.

Holly Brockwell, a walking compendium of Red Pill truisms

She goes on:

> The only way I can explain my attitude is that when I imagine all those beautiful moments everyone talks about — holding a new baby in my arms, my child's first day at school, teaching them about the world — I feel nothing but a strong sense of 'no thanks'.

This woman, if she can be called that, is repulsed by prospect of teaching a child about the world and guiding that child through important life experiences. The pendulum now sits squarely between "mentally ill" and simply "evil."

> I don't think it helps that my mum never wanted children, and got talked into having them by my dad.
>
> As a result, she's never had any money or freedom, missed out on a lot of the things she wanted to do with her life, and feels trapped by choices she made decades ago. I don't want that to happen to me.

Blaming men, of course.

> I want my own life. I want a career, money, time and energy. I want to be Holly, not Mummy. I want to be able to travel and say 'yes' to opportunities without worrying about school catchment areas or baby-sitters.

What Brockwell wants is not only to ride the carousel, but to ride the carousel until the rivets pop out. She wants a career in a vapid corporate environment surrounded by square-jawed executives in the Don Draper mould. She wants to travel, she says, so she can say “yes” to opportunities to raw-dog local yardies on holiday in Jamaica.

Holly Brockwell, “finding herself”.

The AMA’s journal has linked promiscuity to an increased risk of cervical cancer, so for Brockwell, repeatedly saying “yes” to the “opportunities” she’s looking for might precipitate an extra bonus she won’t avoid through sterilisation. If the empowered femcunt doublespeak doesn’t convince you this woman is not the full shilling, this should:

> I’ve given impassioned speeches like this to endless parents, but they just look at me sadly, as if I’m dead inside. How could I not want this tiny screaming demon that wakes them at 4am and breaks their favourite possessions? Why wouldn’t I want baby sick on my clothes or years of teenage tantrums?

A child is a “tiny screaming demon.” They are looking at her sadly, like she’s dead inside, because that’s exactly what she is.

Why Holly Brockwell is “working in tech journalism” and not a doctor

Brockwell wastes no time in directing her narrative to “muh patriarchal oppression”:

> I can’t help thinking part of the NHS’s reluctance is down to my gender. There is such a strong belief that all women want to be mothers that both male and female GPs seem to find it hard to believe me when I say ‘never’.

Unfortunately for a loon like Brockwell, who subscribes to a dogmatic and inflexible equality, GP’s will be skeptical of outliers like her because they have wisdom. This wisdom, gained through countless hours of empirical observation of real people, has taught them that the drive to have children is innate to human biology.

> I pay my taxes, and the NHS offers this procedure, so why can’t I have it? Because GPs can’t seem to accept that a young woman might aspire to be more than a baby factory.

Brockwell writes that she first tried to get sterilised on the NHS at 26. The doctor at the time told her he couldn’t “in good conscience” commit her to hospital to have her reproductive system shut down because condoms are too much hassle for her to use. What Brockwell has not mentioned in any of her articles on the subject is the small matter of the Hippocratic Oath, which binds the conscience of all doctors in their medical practice.

The Oath is long and detailed, having undergone many revisions since the time of Hippocrates (460 – 370 BC), the Greek physician who authored it, but the essence is the following:

> I will use treatments for the benefit of the ill in accordance with my ability and my judgment, but from what is to their harm and injustice I will keep them.

Brockwell's demand will not sit well with a medic's conscience, since, firstly, a healthy woman who is able to reproduce can in no way be considered "ill." Secondly, it is easy to see how blocking or sealing a woman's fallopian tubes, preventing a woman's eggs from reaching sperm and becoming fertilised, might be considered a form of harm.

The straitjacket question

Hippocrates, the founding father of medical ethics. A little too "cis scum" for some.

It's not too far fetched to think that a good and conscientious doctor, hearing the demented ramblings of Holly Brockwell, might take it upon himself to consider that Holly is in fact insane, and commit her to an institution for her own benefit. I would have gone with that view, but the following paragraph from Holly made me reconsider:

> People consider me headstrong and driven – the phrase I hear over and over is "she knows what she wants" – yet in this one area, they don't believe I'll carry it through. And in my weaker moments, I worry that they're right. That I'll fall in love and capitulate, like my mother did, and live my life a slave to children I resent, my dreams in pieces beneath their tiny trainers. It terrifies me.

Holly Brockwell is not mentally ill. She is simply a modern, silly little girl who has bought into girl-power garbage a little too readily, and now considers being "child-free" is a valid life choice.

She does, however, worry that the not inconsiderable number of people telling her she's wrong, might actually be right. That flicker of a conscience shows us that Brockwell is not insane. She is simply in the deepest depths of denial.

Read Next: 4 Signs That Show The Degeneracy Of London's Women

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

Why You Must Avoid Flaky “Holly Golightly” Girls At All Costs

May 6, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Guys first getting into game can be forgiven for chasing anything in a skirt. Not only does sexual frustration make this a necessity, but it’s also a pretty good strategy. After all, how frequently do game writers recommend that you get out there and hit on as many girls as possible? The more prospects you have on the go, the more likely it is that one of them will come off, resulting in a lay.

But as you get more used to interacting with women, you will find that there are different identifiable “types” of girls and some you should avoid like the plague. A particularly heinous breed is one I’m calling the “Holly Golightly girl” after Truman Capote’s Breakfast at Tiffany’s (and the Audrey Hepburn movie of the same name).

Holly Golightly girls are frequently hot, but they are also vacuous, annoying, and entitled. More importantly, they are prick teases and rarely put out. As such, you should make it your business to steer clear of them.

Breakfast at Tiffany’s

Those who have read Capote's novella (of which even literary alpha Norman Mailer was a big fan) or seen the movie will recall Holly Golightly, the iconic central character, a small-town girl who moves to New York City. Without a job and living in a small apartment, she nevertheless manages to live the high life through the patronage of rich men.

In the movie version she develops a relationship of sorts with Paul (George Peppard), a struggling writer, before dumping him unceremoniously for Jose, a Brazilian artistocrat. To satisfy the requirements of what was essentially a prototype Hollywood romcom, Holly finally comes back to Paul after he's convinced her, beta-style, that she's afraid of commitment and should settle down with a "good man."

The ending of the novella is darker. Holly continues to drift, squandering her pre-wall years before winding up in Argentina. An interview Capote gave with Playboy in 1968 illuminates her character:

> Playboy: Would you elaborate on your comment that Holly was the prototype of today's liberated female and representative of a whole breed of girls who live off men but are not prostitutes, they're our version of the geisha girl.
>
> Capote: Holly Golightly was not precisely a call girl. She had no job, but accompanied expense-account men to the best restaurants and night clubs, with the understanding that her escort was obligated to give her some sort of gift, perhaps jewelry or a check …if she felt like it, she might take her escort home for the night. So these girls are the authentic American geishas, and they're much more prevalent now than in 1943 or 1944, which was Holly's era.

Fast-forward to 2015 and such girls are even more common than in the 1940s. Of course, we frequently hear stories about women heading to L.A. in the hope of becoming movie stars and singers, but actually I think the phenomenon extends out to a great many international cities, in particular New York and London, where I live.

Girls with a surfeit of physical attractiveness but little in the way of intelligence, professional skills, or talent are drawn to these metropolitan hubs with the rather hazy plan of "making it." Invariably, this either results in marriage to some rich sucker, or crack-whore oblivion. But in the meantime, it involves callously screwing over a great many inexperienced guys, which is why you must be on your guard.

How to spot a Holly Golightly girl

The first thing to note is that Holy Golightly girls are frequently very hot. This makes sense – after all, they have to have some form of sexual capital on which to trade in the first place, otherwise their big city project would be doomed before they started. They tend to be quite bohemian (hipster, rock chick, or high-end glamorous are the most common styles) and slightly dreamy. When you come into contact with one you will always – rightly – feel that her attention is not entirely focused on you, even when you are in deep conversation.

Holly Golightly girls are by definition not indigenous, but have moved from a smaller place to the city. There will be a lot of talk on their Facebook walls about their exciting "journey," "adventure," and the next step in their "story." Holly Golightly girls are convinced that they are living their own movie, and that it is as fascinating to everyone else as it is to them. Unfortunately the advent of social media means that they can share each installment with their (inevitable) band of thirsty followers.

There is likely to be some form of financial backing in place at the time that they move – either from parents or from male "friends" (Holly Golightly girls rarely if ever have boyfriends – after all, that would tie them down to a single option in a city full of them). Cash flow means that they have the luxury of being extremely exacting about the kind of work that they take on.

Whereas many of the immigrants that arrive in London have little choice but to take the first job on offer – if they're lucky as a barista at Pret a Manger or one of the other big coffee chains, and if they're less lucky cleaning toilets or worse – Holly Golightly girls can take their time. They almost always have an unrealistic aspiration to work in an artistic, glamorous industry that pays a few at the top highly and is a closed-shop for almost everyone else – acting, modeling, fashion design or photography and so on.

On daddy's dollar they can afford to relax, attending auditions that lead nowhere, or undertaking internships that don't yield anything permanent. They may also have a fledgling, but ultimately worthless singing career driven by social media likes, or a beauty blog, or other similar vanity project.

While their lackadaisical job search is going on, Holly Golightly girls are to be found most nights at the fanciest clubs, bars, restaurants, fashion shows and gallery openings that the city has to offer. Frequently they will be in the company of some (very good-looking) male friend or other. Everyone in this world is a "friend" – whether actual sex is going down or not is difficult to discern for the outsider, although if it benefits Holly then you can safely bet that it is.

This glittering social life belies a tawdrier domestic situation. If you make it back to Holly's place, you will find that her bedroom is a bombsite, with designer clothes and make-up strewn all over the floor, dirty plates in the sink, and a dustbin creaking beneath the weight of many, many empty wine bottles. There will most likely be used spliffs in the ashtray and reality TV on loop on her MacBook air.

Holly today

Dating Holly Golightly

The best advice is to go out of your way to avoid dating Holly Golightly girls. Even more than regular girls, they have an agenda and the chances are you don't fit in with it.

Holly Golightly girls are uniformly scatty and flaky. They are prone to turning up for dates incredibly late, or "forgetting" them entirely. Worse, they can throw in curveballs. When you meet she might insist that you come along to a party of a friend of hers – that party being held by some buff, rich dude who she then proceeds to monopolize all night at your expense.

To the uninitiated, the Holly Golightly girl may appear scatty: in fact, she is playing a difficult game that requires adaptability and eagle-eyed cunning. Rather like real-time trading on the financial markets, the Holly Golightly girl is constantly eying up her prospects, angling for whomever is going to help her gain a better position in the city's social firmament.

Basically, this is supercharged hypergamy. If she misses your date then she's not forgetful – she's simply found a prospect that in her estimation will get her to her goal faster than you will. Obviously, this is why Holly rejects Paul for Jose in the movie.

All women are hypergamous to some extent, but it is the Holly Golightly girl's raison d'etre. It is telling –and slightly depressing — that Audrey Hepburn remains such an icon for young women today, who have everything from tote bags to mugs to t-shirts bearing her Tiffany's-era image.

For your own sake, if you come across Holly then you are well-advised either to make it a short term engagement, or steer clear altogether and watch the wreckage from a safe distance instead.

Read More: Girls Are Fundamentally Lazy

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The New Royal Baby Proves That Even A Degenerate Society Lusts For Tradition

May 6, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The mass joy surrounding the May 2 birth of the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge's second child reminds us that deep-seated institutions such as monarchies continue to attract the hearts and minds of millions. Regardless of whether you endorse constitutional monarchies, it is nigh on impossible to question their appeal for a public that demands social "progress" whilst simultaneously fearing change and the unknown.

Consequently, members of the British royal family, especially Diana in the past and Kate Middleton currently, have been and are the surrogates for the average person's emotional attachment to the past and traditional values. This includes many SJWs.

Despite never having a proper career, aside from bedding Prince William, and being paid, via taxpayers, to fund the lavish wardrobes she is regularly lauded for, Kate Middleton is presented as a paragon of feminine achievement and an embodiment of every girl's dream: marrying a prince.

People will line up to see her particularly, but also the Queen, William, and others. Relatively few of those same people, however, will volunteer for a charity, turn up to community events not involving their own children, or generally do something similarly constructive.

Questioned for the wrong reasons

The British monarchy's biggest selling point is now Kate Middleton's make-up collection, wardrobe and posture coach.

Ironically, the only serious time the British monarchy found itself questioned was during the tumultuous divorce of Prince Charles and Princess Diana, and then after the latter's death. As the part-time patron saint of stopping land mines (only because she had the spare hours and wealth via her own old-nobility family and marriage), Diana remained untouchable during her lifetime and now after it.

Don't mess with a woman who has "earned" her place as a princess, folks. On the matter of why the monarchy still has a justifiable place in British politics, though, prominent critics have been few and far between.

In Australia, because of the amorphous position of having a Queen who permanently resides in Great Britain but claims to represent 25 million people from Sydney to Perth, opposition to the monarchy is much stronger, albeit only structured as a long-term goal. Pathetically, the appearances of Prince William, Kate and George, along with Prince Harry, on our shores have boosted the monarchy's appeal.

People are not wooed by proper equality. They are wooed by exteriors based on emotions, dress sense paid for by British taxpayers, and ample cute or scandalous photo-ops.

Even Sweden has a monarchy – and loves it

Rather than questioning why Sweden had a non-egalitarian monarchy in the first place, Swedish SJWs were more concerned about making sure the first-born daughter, Victoria, could accede to the throne ahead of her younger brother.

It is remarkable that Sweden, which has earned a name for itself as a radical melting pot of ridiculous feminist, multicultural, and other social experiments, retains a monarchy. Feminists and other crackpots in that nation will propose all manner of common sense positions, such as legislating that all prostitutes are victims of male violence, even the many girls who choose the equivalent of US$200 per hour as a hooker over $10 as a waitress or $15 as a social worker.

But the monarchy, which uses wealth and status to perpetuate the self-fulfilling prophecy of a charismatic royal family deserving of respect and reverence? Well, that's just an expression of Swedish identity and history. Mainstream criticism of the foundations of the monarchy, as opposed to perceptions of particular actions by a member of the royal family, are almost non-existent in Sweden.

Because of the male primogeniture in force before 1980, the Swedish king's second child, a son named Carl Philip, was the Crown Prince when he was born. After an outcry from feminists and others within the left, he was bumped down to second in the line of succession, behind his older sister Victoria.

Instead of questioning why Sweden would have a monarchy in the first place, the SJWs of the late 1970s and 1980s thought the only issue was primogeniture. The overt social discrimination of "royal blood" was ignored and only the gender element emphasized.

Two principal possibilities can help explain this political pass for monarchies. Firstly, mostly unconsciously, political leaders personally support the idea of a constitutional monarchy, however much it contradicts almost every other policy of egalitarianism (or pretend egalitarianism in the case of anti-male initiatives). They are basically, under this view, "victims" of the same longing for stability and tradition as their constituents.

Or, secondly, many political leaders have learned never to question the monarchy, fearing the result and ignoring their own secret preferences. The political capital gained in such an attack on a privileged institution is outweighed by the potential backlash from a public largely supporting it.

Kate Middleton – "one of the world's most influential people"

Royalty breeds a cult-like following. Support for the monarchy is powerful when people don't feel they're actually longing for the past and its values.

Sadly, Time correctly placed Kate in this list in 2012 and 2013. Her reputation, personal following, and media exposure are beyond question. But why is someone with such little merit on the list in the first place? What does it say about society's obsession with promoting those who have, essentially, done nothing to be promoted?

The reason is that Kate, rather than just being a vehicle for traditionalism, gives the specific, romcom-style story of a woman who is pulled from the common classes (although her parents became millionaires after she was born) and raised to the status of royalty.

Amidst the clamoring of SJWs for momentous social changes that advance the interests of women, denigrate men and condemn or criminalize common sense, the monarchies and all the Kate Middletons of the world stand out. Many women, rallying unconsciously against the narrative of "independence," crave for her fantasy of being rescued from the drudgery of normal life.

Beyond the fantasy itself, they salivate over salvaging some of the traditionalism otherwise rapidly ripped apart in the modern age. Many men, monarchical support being somewhat gender-neutral, join the fanfare as a way of emotionalizing their own internal barking for a return to something solid when everything else seems in rapid flux.

The Kennedys were (and still are) America's de facto monarchy

Britons and Europeans are not the only people infatuated with monarchies. The Kennedys have assumed that role since the 1960s. The mere mentioning of John. F. Kennedy and Jackie resurfaces the "Camelot" fantasy transplanted in the United States.

Forget the hypocrisy of a President who preached social justice and wealth redistribution but was worth hundreds of millions of dollars in today's money via his capitalist father. The Kennedys' fortune, prestige, and sense of elegance meant they provided for America what it had lacked since 1776: a family to worship and revere.

Like the Windsors of Buckingham Palace, the Kennedys presented America with the opportunity to distract themselves from their lives and feel dazzled. The world was changing, wars were raging, but John and Jackie were there to show them what could be, even if in a million years and another universe. The worshipper of a Kate Middleton or JFK gets both emotional support in chaotic times and the attendant fairytale.

Watch the monarchy's star rise further after the royal birth

JFK astutely sold the public a fantasy they could believe in, lean on, and dream about for themselves: a political monarchy.

William and Kate could name their new baby girl “Long-Distance Phone Call” and she would still be guaranteed a life of sycophantic praise akin to what William the Conqueror received as absolute monarch of England in the 11th century. I am not advocating for the retention of a monarchy or the establishment of any more. But understanding the allure of monarchies helps to explain how SJWs and many others can internally justify their destruction of the rest of the society.

Monarchies offer both reassurance and distraction. Supporters can ignore the elitism and bigotry of a class guaranteed rule, however symbolic, because it makes them feel good. Like the menagerie of puppy videos on YouTube, monarchies, and those who suck-up to them, are here to stay.

Read More: Twitter Is The Modern Day Royal Court—We Know What Comes Next

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Ways Men Can Try To Fix The System

May 7, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

When it comes to prescribing what individual men can do to improve their lives, there is wide agreement in the manosphere. There is also a consensus that our current society is broken. But when it comes to deciding what to do about it, we disagree on which strategy to adopt.

Broadly speaking, there are three ways that men approach the crisis we are facing:

1. Nihilistic Approach

Enjoy your dinner on the Titanic

Men who take the nihilistic approach believe that nothing can be done to reverse the descent of our civilization into oblivion. Our civilization is the Titanic after it hit the iceberg. It is here for a while longer, but its sinking is now certain. Since no one knows what will follow the present civilization, it is not worthwhile to prepare for it.

These men are resolved to enjoy life as much as possible until the civilizational collapse happens. They might be working on themselves, but their effort is focused solely on improving their own lives—not on the culture as a whole.

In this group you'll find most (but not all) PUAs and MGTOWs. When it comes to changing the system, the nihilistic approach is largely a passive one.

2. Live To Fight Another Day

The Battle of Helm's Deep – rule number one is to survive

The "Live to Fight Another Day" approach is similar to the nihilistic approach in that it also assumes that we are stuck with the current set of progressive governments until they inevitably exhaust themselves.

The underlying assumption is that the current order, as degraded as it is, will successfully resist any attempt to change it. That means that our first job as traditional men is to survive—we can't let the current system destroy us.

Our second task is to prepare ourselves and to wait until some event destabilizes the current order. At that point, we will be able to spring into action to reestablish a more traditional order.

Men who take this approach are working on themselves. They are starting businesses and learning marketable skills. They are lifting weights and learning self-defense. They will find a traditional woman, start a family, and educate their children in traditional values. Their goal is to flourish in the present, but also lay the groundwork for renewing civilization in the future.

Although this approach is more active than the nihilistic approach, it still has passive aspect because it means waiting for some event to happen rather than being a catalyst for change.

3. Active Change

Thomas Jefferson – Time to follow in his footsteps?

Other men believe that we can take action now to change the system for the better. This is a war against the current culture, and there are several fronts in this war.

Supporting Good Candidates

Some men have given up on supporting and voting for good candidates because in practice, things change very little. While it is true that voting for a conservative candidate probably will not make much difference, it is still a good idea. Conservative politicians tend to implement progressive ideas more slowly than progressive politicians do.

And there is always the possibility that every now and then we could elect a true leader who has a spine and who cannot be bought. If that happens, he may even be able to reverse some of the decay that is afflicting us.

I don't think that electing good candidates will result in victory, but it is an effective way of slowing the enemy down long enough to muster our forces.

Attempting To Influence The Culture

A more direct attack on the culture is to try to spread traditional ideas using the same methods that have been used by the SJWs to spread their progressive ideas. ROK is an example of this approach, since it uses entertaining posts to convey a serious message to a lot of men. Even Roosh's appearance on Dr. Oz was ultimately a way to get the message out to more people.

This approach is effective. Once one person sticks their neck out and speaks the truth in public, others feel emboldened to follow. But this is a long-term strategy. Progressives have captured virtually every major institution in our civilization: schools, universities, entertainment, news media, and even a good portion of our churches. It is going to take a long time to recapture these institutions.

Exit

Ultimately, it may be that the culture is too far gone to salvage. We should at least consider the possibility that we need to start over from scratch.

Starting from scratch has lots of benefits. A country like the US has a lot of baggage such as the legacy of slavery, a virtually all-powerful federal government, and a tax code that makes economic mobility difficult. Any group that wants to start a new country could learn a lot just by observing what went wrong in the US.

The idea of a fresh start is not as radical as it sounds. If you happen to be an American, it is part of your tradition. The founding fathers of the United States put their lives on the line to break from England. The Confederacy unsuccessfully tried to do the same thing almost one hundred years later.

How can an exit happen? Not through violence. The American Civil War proved the futility of violent rebellion. Given the technological superiority of modern armies, any sort of violent uprising would be immediately crushed.

However, the recent Scottish independence referendum shows us one possible path. For Americans, this would mean having one or more states seceding from the US using democratic processes.

Currently, there is no legal method for a state to secede from the US, but that should not deter anyone from seeking this option. At this point, progressives hate traditional men and women because we stand in the way of them building their SJW utopia. If we show them a way to get rid of us by allowing us to secede, they just might go for it.

In order for secession to be realized, the first step would be to build a critical mass of people who think that it is a viable idea. The following step would be to push for a constitutional convention or a constitutional amendment that would allow a nonviolent, democratic referendum.

Yes, this is a long shot, but the Scottish referendum was the result of over ten years of dedicated effort. The longest journey always starts with the first step.

Conclusion

While I understand why some men would want to take the nihilistic approach, I view it as a bit unmanly. Men have a responsibility not just to themselves, but also to their families and their community. That has always been the way of men.

The “Live to Fight Another Day” and “Active Change” strategies are not mutually exclusive. I have chosen to do both to the best of my abilities. We have to do our best to change the culture, but we have to do it in such a way that we do not get crushed in the process.

If traditional men are to be effective as a force for change, we are going to have to support each other and work together to a greater degree than we have up until now.

Read More: Why Patriarchy Is The Greatest Social System Ever Created

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How Kratom Can Help With Your Weightlifting Routine

May 7, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Island Lion Herbals

We all know that in 2015, lifting weights is no longer optional. A man of value exhibits discipline in his diet, exercise regimen, and overall appearance. All of us would be smart to take full advantage of any edge that can help us get and stay lean, and maintain consistency in the gym (read: minimize missed workouts). This is especially true for natural lifters who want to maximize their genetic potential before (or perhaps instead of) exploring AAS options. Can kratom help with muscle soreness, water retention, and appetite suppression?

Search the internet and you will find thousands of anecdotal accounts of kratom as a powerful tool for relieving pain, suppressing anxiety, treating insomnia, and as a potent aphrodisiac. Even with its recent explosion in popularity in the United States and other western countries, many naysayers still doubt kratom's medicinal value.

The fact that the FDA has not explicitly approved it for human consumption doesn't help that reputation, and it's still considered by many to be nothing more than a "drug" used for a "legal high." Red pill-aware men know that the FDA's approval (or lack thereof) means nothing in and of itself; chances are, you take at least one weightlifting supplement that isn't FDA-approved, either. GNC is full of them.

What does science say about kratom? Are there any published, peer-reviewed studies that show it DOES have legitimate medical uses, and more importantly—do any of them aid in physical fitness?

The answer is a resounding YES.

Here are a few studies in the past 30 years that show kratom to be quite effective as a treatment for joint pain (e.g. "lifter's shoulder"), muscle soreness, as well as an aid in weight loss and preventing water retention.

1. "Ethnopharmacology of Kratom and the Mitragyna Alkaloids" (1988)

ABSTRACT: An investigation into the pharmacology of kratom.

SOURCE: Journal of Ethnopharmacology, 23 (1988), pages 115-119, Elsevier Scientific Publishers, Ireland

SUMMARY: This study aimed to describe kratom in detail, including its most common alkaloids. It concluded that "published experimental results were positive for use as an analgesic (pain reliever), antitussive (cough suppression), and hypothermic agent in animals." The study also pointed out that kratom may be a natural substitute for methadone in treating opiate addiction.

2. “Evaluation of Analgesia Induced by Mitragynine, Morphine, and Paracetamol on Mice” (1998)

ABSTRACT: An investigation to compare the antinocieptive activity of morphine and paracetamol to that of mitragynine, a major constituent of fresh leaves of Mitragyna speciosa. All substances were administered to mice orally.

SOURCE: Phytochemistry, Volume 25, Issue 12, 1986, Pages 2910-2912

SUMMARY: All three substances produced significant analgesia (pain reliever) when tested. The researchers concluded that mitragynine may be a potential new analgesic that requires further study.

3. “Acute and long-term effects of alkaloid extract of Mitragyna speciosa on food and water intake and body weight in rats” (2004)

ABSTRACT: Acute administration of Mitragyna speciosa extract significantly resulted in dose-dependent decreases in food and water intakes ($P < 0.05$) in rats. Prolonged suppressing effects were observed following administration of the MS extract for 60 consecutive days. Moreover, the long-term administration also significantly suppressed weight gain.

SOURCE: http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/16781828

SUMMARY: The purpose of this study was to find the long-term effects of the isolated Mitragyna speciosa alkaloid in kratom. The study found that water intake and retention of rats was reduced, and there was also a suppression in weight gain. That points to the possibility of kratom being a powerful tool in fighting obesity.

4. “Pharmacological Studies on 7-Hydroxymitragynine, Isolated from the Thai Herbal Medicine Mitragyna speciosa: Discovery of an Orally Active Opioid Analgesic” (2006)

ABSTRACT: Substances derived from natural products have been utilized since the beginning of time for various medical purposes including the treatment of pain. Opium, for example, has been mentioned in the earliest historical records, some 7000 years ago. In fact, research in the area of pain management and drug addiction originally focused on natural products exclusively. Our research group has studied uniquely structured, nitrogen-containing compounds isolated from the traditional Thai herb Mitragyna speciosa. We have been investigating the pharmacological properties of this herb, individual components of its extracts, and structurally related compounds since the 1980s.

SOURCE: http://mitizane.ll.chiba-u.jp/metadb/up/assist1/Y2006-17.pdf

SUMMARY: The purpose of this study was to determine kratom's medical potential as an orally-active pain reliever.

5. "Total Synthesis of (-)-Mitragynine and Analogues" (2012)

ABSTRACT: Besides use as a drug, the plant has found application in medicine in the treatment of coughing, diarrhea, muscle pain and hypertension. Interestingly, mitragynine has a stronger analgesic effect than morphine, so that it has been suggested as a useful compound in the treatment of opiate addiction in replacement therapy. About the biological activity of paynantheine and speciogynine there are very little studies reported.

SOURCE: http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC2526544/

SUMMARY: The purpose of this medical study was to demonstrate the far-reaching possibilities for kratom's medicinal value and properties. This study concluded that there IS medical potential for kratom, including its use as a powerful analgesic as well as an aid in opiate addiction treatment.

Conclusion

If you lift weights (and you should), anything that can help you maintain intensity and focus is worth checking out. Clearly, the research shows the myriad of benefits kratom can provide and that there is much more to it than meets the eye.

Island Lion Herbals is currently having a sale on ALL kratom strains at our online store – $9.99 an ounce, and as usual, ROK readers get an additional discount.

Use coupon code ROK15 for 15% off your entire order today at Island Lion Herbals!

Advertise Your Site Or Product On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Is A Blue Collar Job for You?

May 7, 2015 | by Jay Sixtyten | Link | Original Link

Several ROK writers have offered the trades as an alternative to the debt slavery of a college degree. Instead of sending out sixty resumes a week you can walk into a field with two million unfilled jobs. Being willing to work hard, get dirty, able to follow instructions, like money, and be good at what you do are the only requirements for tradesman.

So all this sounds great and it might be the perfect option for you, but what is it really like making the switch? Has anyone really done it? Well gentlemen, I'm currently in the process and since I've gotten so much good advice over the years from Roosh and ROK I feel it's time to give back.

For the last 10 years I have been the typical contracting office drone with all the trimmings. Car payment, mortgage, the annual short vacation. I am currently making the transition from web designer to pipe welding. It's been one hell of an adjustment, let me tell you.

Weather

If you choose to make the change there are some major factors to consider. First is your tolerance for all weather. If you choose pipefitting or pipeline work, be prepared to freeze or fry. On the coldest day on record in my city I was in an open concrete commercial bay for four and a half hours straight.

The welding leathers and hot steel kept my top half warm but my feet were completely frozen. Next week will be in the 80’s here, so now imagine a rawhide leather jacket plus hot steel plus 85 degrees. Yeah. Part of the money you make is compensation for your discomfort. Or hardiness. Whichever you prefer to call it.

No quiet, air conditioned offices and comfortable chairs in the outside fields, although there are a variety of shop jobs if you can’t stand the weather. The big money is in the field though.

Accidents

Next on the cons list is the constant threat of getting hurt. Accidents do happen, so if you choose this line of work you should know the risks and go into it with your eyes open. You are dealing with sharp objects, heavy machinery, poisonous chemicals, and high temperatures.

A few weeks ago I had my foot in the wrong place and a drop of molten metal burned through my pant leg and rolled into my boot. I couldn't get it off fast enough. The guys are still laughing about it. Even on your most careful day sparks will find a way to get to you. I'll tell you as I was told, "You WILL get burned."

Also be mindful of your co-workers and what is going on around. Don't let all this scare you, though. With proper training, safety gear, and awareness of your area you should be fine.

The Classroom

I bet you've heard lots of jokes about dumb welders. I'm sure that stereotype got started for a reason and some guys just learned to weld on the job or in prison, but a becoming a fully trained welder will require you to hit the books.

Welding basic things is simple, but depending on what your specialty is, the learning curve will soar. You'll spend lots of time learning fractions, measurement, conversions, and calculations you'll need to make things properly. There are special symbols you'll need to know so you can work from blueprints. Different welding rods have different properties such as how deeply they penetrate, how much weight they'll hold, and which types of metal they'll weld.

Certain types of welding require the use of special shielding gases and you need to know their properties. If you don't like to read you'll have a hard time getting licensed. There may be some dumb welders out there, but welding is not for the dumb.

Experience One Of The Last Great Strongholds Of Masculinity

I'm a people person and the trades have no shortage of interesting people. The variety of personalities I've met is amazing. Ex-cons, guys looking to get ahead, artists, and kids just out of school looking for a first opportunity. The instructors all had stories enough to fill several lifetimes.

Every person I've met so far is far and away more interesting, sincere, and real than the average over-caffeinated office drone in the cube next to you. Teamwork means something different when you are connected by a very heavy object you couldn't move by yourself. Even when there is competition between you, you are all on the same team. We are all responsible for each others' safety.

The Money You Make Is Largely Up To You

As I began looking at jobs, I noticed that the salaries were not the spectacular amounts I had heard about. After talking to my teacher I learned that all the big money is made running your own shop. You'll be your own boss, but there's everything that goes with it. Buying the tools and equipment. Learning what to charge. Getting good people. Dealing with whatever your area's laws and regulations for welding shops are.

But hey, if you were afraid of a little hard work you wouldn't be reading this article would you? Also welders are needed all over the world so if you do decide to get a job then why not get one in the Poosy Paradise of your choice?

I'll end this by asking all you tradesmen out there to comment a bit on your experiences and stuff you wish you had known when you started. See you on the jobsite.

Read More: How A Sitcom Shoved The Blue Pill Down Our Throat

Jay Sixtyten
J6010 is a welder starting currently is the process of freeing himself from the corporate prison and getting the hell out of the US's feminist cesspool. He enjoys making art, music, and the not so occasional (recently legalized) 420 experience. He is named after the E6010 welding electrode known for it's ability to penetrate deeply and lay down the perfect root.

Disfiguring A Man’s Face To The Bone Is Not Considered A Serious Crime If You Have A Vagina

May 8, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Sarah McKenzie-Ayres is yet another Western woman to receive the gender passes of all gender passes after maliciously attacking a young man (and permanently disfiguring him) during a night out on the town. She claimed he did not “move away” from her at Venus, a popular Manchester nightclub. So what did she do? She grabbed a bottle of champagne and violently hit him with it twice, “like a club.”

The force was so powerful that it cut the young man to his skull. Whilst describing McKenzie-Ayres’ attack as “extraordinarily extreme,” Judge David Stockdale QC just couldn’t bring himself to jail the poor, poor girl and instead gave her a 16 month suspended sentence, plus 150 hours of community service. Hooray for girl power and oppressed women everywhere!

The victim’s dream of becoming a model has been ruined and his father spoke to the media about the immeasurable impact it has had on his son’s self-esteem, happiness, and overall life.

On the flip side, the guilty McKenzie-Ayres, who was pictured smiling outside court after her lawyer claimed she was “remorseful,” is an aspiring lawyer at university. But one can be sure that the good ol’ patriarchy will come to the rescue and try and at least enable McKenzie-Ayres to get a legal job in the future, where she can pontificate to England and the world about male privilege.

The saddest thing about the McKenzie-Ayres case, other than the victim’s suffering and the pussy pass given to the offender, is that, to my knowledge, this is the third high-profile situation where a woman has been convicted for unjustifiably attacking a young man with some form of glass object and escaped justice more than mildly. I will be exploring these other two cases in articles to come.

The judge's shocking record of double standard sentences

"Guess who beat the patriarchy?"

Judge David Stockdale QC, Manchester's most senior judicial officer, has recently:

Jailed a man for rape for seven years. I am not against and actually for long sentences for rape based on proper evidence (not just "she said, he said") and a valid, solid determination of what actually constitutes the crime. But for Stockdale to jail this man and spare McKenzie-Ayres shows a gut-level determination that a man disfigured for life is not worth the sympathy and punishment to the offender given to a woman who is raped, especially when the offender in the first case is a woman.

Jailed a teenager for three years for having a shotgun in his possession, without committing any robbery or violent shooting offence. The boy had ADHD, the sort of condition that would have awarded Sarah McKenzie-Ayres not only a reprieve from jail but a cash payment for being a victim of the patriarchy. The boy clearly should have been reprimanded by the law but the crime he committed is literally non-violent and at least 50 times less sadistic than what McKenzie-Ayres did for her own wicked gratification.

McKenzie-Ayres resorted to saying that she felt cornered by what she alleged were romantic advances by the victim. As you can see, her response, even if we take her at her word, was clearly not proportional. But is it really surprising? Women can make an excuse, backward rationalize it, and then get a reduced or non-existent sentence on account of “patriarchy,” so why should we expect them to behave in a moderate manner?

Sarah McKenzie-Ayres’ (likely) Twitter information

Aside from the pancake titties, when you compare this photo to the court appearance shot, this is the one best examples of “you looked different on the internet/with make-up on” you will ever see.

Her probable, near certain Twitter account @Miss_McKenziex has been deleted, sometime between the first months of this year and early May. Various caches, such as this one, show activity on the account until a little while before the sentencing.
Plus:

- The first result after Googling “Sarah McKenzie-Ayres Twitter” comes up with the deactivated @Miss_McKenziex Twitter account as the first hit.
- The first line of that result, which features Twitter biographical details, says that “Sarah McKenzie” is located in Leeds/Manchester.
- Sarah McKenzie-Ayres studies law (or let’s hope did) in Leeds.
- One Dean Ayres references the Twitter Sarah McKenzie and refers to her as his cousin. He also, hilariously, warns another man to leave his cousin Sarah alone. Rather than being pseudo-macho posturing grandstanding as a weird joke, this is probably the best advice Dean could give anyone about his violent, psychopathic cousin, if indeed Sarah McKenzie-Ayres is his.
- Many people interacting with the @Miss_McKenziex account are about twenty years old and born around 1995, so in the same general age cohort as McKenzie-Ayres.

The obligatory Anita Sarkeesian reference

> There's no such thing as sexism against men. That's because sexism is prejudice + power. Men are the dominant gender with power in society.

– Anita Sarkeesian, Feminist Frequency

Contrasting with this:

> The study found that men receive sentences that are 63 percent higher, on average, than their female counterparts.
>
> Starr also found that females arrested for a crime are also significantly more likely to avoid charges and convictions entirely, and twice as likely to avoid incarceration if convicted.
>
> – The Huffington Post, reporting on academic Sonja Starr's study into US federal criminal sentencing and the gender of offenders.

Sarah McKenzie-Ayres lives in a world where SJWs and others declaim that men cannot possibly be oppressed or hard down by because of their gender. In a specifically legal context, this is despite the study by a female American academic, Sonja Starr, identifying that men, even when you remove mitigating factors, receive sentences 60% longer than women in the United States. The range of cases we see also spat out from the United Kingdom, Europe, Australia and other places illustrates that this is not just an Uncle Sam phenomenon.

Now, Sarah McKenzie-Ayres has probably never heard of Anita Sarkeesian and lives across the Atlantic from her. But she has inherited the same entitlement and perception of legal and other privilege that Sarkeesian and Co. want, and have largely achieved, for women. Even when they beat a man senselessly with a solid glass object and maim him for life, they just need a leg up, okay, fellow male oppressors?

Take away points

To Sarkeesian, nothing can be against men and for women at the same time. Sexism is about "power structures", all men ganging up on women through secret conspiracies, ranging from homeless men to male CEOs, and presumably unicorns.

Society is going down the proverbial toilet with sentences like this. Our saving grace is the sheer documentary evidence showing these deplorable cases and outing the offenders to the world. The public response to this horrendous crime and the cowardly punishment by the British judiciary should give us cause for hope. People see straight through the veneer of "equal justice" and are loudly declaring "if this had been a man…"

Sarah McKenzie-Ayres is a disgusting excuse for a human being. While we would like to interpret the deletion of Twitter and retreat from social media (as far as we know) as an indication of embarrassment and shame to some degree, her smiling face suggests that she does not realize the gravity of what a biased justice system has enabled her to get away with.

If the trendline is any indication, I'm afraid these incidents are going to get even worse.

Read More: European Union Has Declared That Fat People Can Be Considered "Disabled"

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Women Just Want To Be Pampered — With Foreskin Facials

May 8, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

One of our readers recently sent us a link to an article describing foreskin facials and asked for the official RoK stance. I decided to look into this matter and, through my research, reached several somber realizations about the childlike nature of women and the amazing shrewdness of businessmen who are willing to exploit it. But, let's start from the top.

That wasn't some horrible autocorrect mistake or an Onion article – foreskin facials are an actual thing. HydraFacial is a proprietary non-invasive cosmetic facelift procedure available in New York that is supposed to exfoliate and rejuvenate the skin. At a price of $300 per hour, the customer will receive a four-step cleansing treatment with a glorified aspirator, crowned by a bizarre facial mask containing stem cells extracted from a "donated" baby foreskin.

An admirable hustle

Women are doling this out for chopped up penis remnants

The results of a HydraFacial treatment are noticeable, though not nearly as bombastic as the “foreskin facial” name implies. The mask apparently contains only trace amounts of said stem cells, since one foreskin is supposedly enough to provide for more than a million HydraFacial treatments. Also, stem cells are by definition exactly the same, no matter which body part they come from. That pretty much bursts the outrage bubble right there—this is only a marketing ploy, and a good one at that.

Ashley Weatherford, the resident narcissist at NY Magazine, underwent the HydraFacial treatment and compared her new-found self to Jennifer Lopez and Beyoncé, both of which led the “single woman” assault on our senses during the ’00s (and the “increasingly irrelevant aging cougar” assault in the 2010s). Ashley also compares herself to a Disney villain, gleeing over the fact that she can now brag about absorbing baby foreskins:

> would help even more.) And a part of me feels like a Disney evil queen, draining youth from a newborn for a few weeks of a restored complexion. Is this the future of facials? And if so, is it wrong that I want more?

In reality, the “foreskin facial” mask probably contains just enough stem cells that the customers can’t sue for deception and false advertising, if any at all. Ashley doesn’t know about this nor does she care—she revels in the illusion of power and independence the treatment gave her. Arguably, the attention and care the cosmetic staff gave her during the HydraFacial treatment is the only tangible benefit she got for the money.

Outright savagery

Poll from one of the sites that reported on the treatment

Of course, there is the notion that it is somehow proper to use male body parts for vanity purposes. This very concept is sickening and resembles voodoo practices, whereby all means are allowed as long as they result in a power gain. If the genders were reversed, say a male potency pill made out of ground female clitorises, you could rest assured that even the very idea would cause SJWs to melt Twitter servers with their howls of pain and cause Mrs. Obama to stare her wimpy husband into action.

Unfortunately, this is what it is. We live in such society where males, even babies, are considered disposable and pandering to women and appeasing their vanity has become a necessary part of every political platform. However, the understanding of female egotism can also be incorporated into any business strategy, making it massively successful. Of course, this facial treatment will be publicized widely across Tumblr and similar SJW outlets, based on its name alone, but the treatment also attracts regular women willing to try something exotic.

Women don't care whether a product actually produces results—as long as they feel it does (and they think their friends believe it), they are willing to pay any asking price. This means that women, above everything else, want to be pampered and given the illusion of youth, power, and independence.

On the other hand, SJWs want to hurt men, no matter how petty or childish the action is. The creator of the "foreskin facial" treatment, evidently knowing all of this, found a way to monetize the SJW man-hate, giving them a false feeling of achievement. SJWs fork over their cash thinking how their pathetic life finally has a purpose while the creator of the treatment laughs all the way to the bank. Now that's a way to do business.

Read More: 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

5 Ways To Change Your State Of Consciousness

May 8, 2015 | by Rórdán Phobos | Link | Original Link

I started running at 4:45 in the afternoon. It was about 120 degrees (49 C) outside. First came exhaustion from the heat. The dust from the desert floor covered me like a heat - amplifying insulator. About 40 minutes in I realized that storm front in the distance was rolling back on me and I wouldn't be able to get back in time.

That was when the fear set in. When the storm hit me the lightning was so close I could feel the heat coming off the impacts on the ground. And I just knew that if I stopped I would die. By the time I finished I couldn't remember my name.

Five methods are traditionally used to change a man's perception of his environment: death, drugs, duress, dreams and meditation. The most important part is to make sure you have a well-thought-out question you need answered, and to hold on to it before you cross the threshold of any of these doorways.

1. Death

Stories of people staring down on their own body on the operating table or looking through the front windshield after a bad car wreck are very common. Hell, I even had a Navy SOCOM operator tell me the story of how he was stunned from a nearby explosion and saw two jihadis running toward him from around a corner, from a perspective of two stories about his body.

While this is a one-way trip for the most part, some ritualized methods exist to explore this that mostly use asphyxiation and resuscitation. The most common method involves drowning someone and reviving them. The Navy SEALS even use a version of this to teach BUDS students to recognize the signs of actually drowning.

Generally, I recommend against this approach.

2. Drugs

Drugs represent a far more common approach to the problem of changing how you look at the world.

Traditional societies used a variety of pharmacology from ayahuasca to peyote and more. Hippies drop acid and hipsters use DMT. As a one-time experience prescribed under the guidance of someone who knows what they are doing, it probably doesn't do too much damage over the long term.

That said, just as many people have good trips as bad, and I've seen a disturbing trend over the years of people who essentially burned out their meditative potential by having used this methodology. From that standpoint it is a lot like running a turbo on an unprepped motor. Yeah, it will get you the extra performance for a little while, but it usually costs you something over the long term.

Keep in mind, I recommend against this methodology for a whole variety of reasons too involved to get into here.

If you go this route, do your research and look at it as a singular experience to get some guidance you are missing. Traditionally speaking, men with balls tend to use the next method. The women folk were more prone to use drugs and the Muses of ancient Greece certainly had their followers, but I digress.

3. Duress

Duress is probably the most commonly used methodology of the bunch, and a staple of rites of passage everywhere.

The Egyptians used to have their acolytes swim across the Nile River, which was filled with crocodiles. Some South American tribes utilized cliff diving and the Northern Plains tribes had their Sun Dance. In more modern times, 11Bs have the Crucible. Personally, I had to run 9 miles (15km) through a lightning storm in the open desert for one system of training I went through.

Typically these events use a combination of exhaustion, fear, and pain to change an individual's view of the world.

A good way to do this on your own is to walk between 50-100 miles in one day. Make sure you are fit, well-hydrated and have a plan to get help if things go wrong. By the time you get really dehydrated things get surreal to say the least. Walking on a track tends to induce the state faster, but being alone in the wilderness makes the experience deeper.

Just don't die.

4. Dreams

Dream yoga has a long established history across many cultures, with the Tibetans probably having the most developed system for this. Over the long term these efforts lead to a state closely related to out-of-body projection.

You will need a notebook and pen to start. The first stage is to say before lying down to sleep, “I will remember my dreams.” Then immediately after waking write down what you remember. After the first week you will have a hard time keeping it to one page.

Next, start pre-planning what you want your dreams to be about. After a while, you will essentially “wake up” during your dreams and have the ability to change things at will. It progresses from there. For vets with bad dreams, even if you go no further with this methodology, this is a great course of action.

5. Meditation

Meditation is the most repeatable, and controllable, of the bunch.

Frankly, so many different varieties of this exist that you will need to research what you are most interested in to get a good handle on what you want to do. That said, most of the systems that specialize in changing your frame of reference use one variety of out-of-body projection or another, even if they don’t use this term precisely.

I recommend Transcendental meditation for a short concise practice, or Theravada Buddhism for a more nuanced approach.

Personally, I offer training in this kind of thing from a uniquely Western approach, but it takes a minimum of 3-4 sessions over the course of a year and about 45 min to an hour a day worth of practice.

Figure out the question you need answered in your life, hold on and get ready for an intense ride. The examined life beats the hell out of selling insurance for a living.

Read More: How To Control Your Emotional State

Rórdán Phobos

Rórdán Phobos is a former airman who has travelled to over 40 countries, lives in a converted barn and once travelled to Srinagar to buy his grandfather a Kashmiri carpet for his 92nd birthday. When he isn't building armies, or police forces, in the third world he can be found in a bar talking to your girl. For training and advice in the yogic arts go to yogicengineering.com

Mastering The Mechanics Of Confidence

May 8, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

Confidence can be a very elusive mistress. Both overconfidence and underconfidence can ruin the performance of anyone from the amateur beginner, to the seasoned professional with a string of world-class successes under his belt.

I'm not a big sports fan, but over the weekend I watched a couple of shows on TV that gave me a good insight into the mechanics of confidence and how to maintain it.

Confidence On Display In Sports

Sports can be rather arbitrary—when you have competitors at the peak of their careers, results can be so close that the decision comes down to a technicality or plain dumb luck. Nonetheless, the deciding factor is often found in how well they maintain their confidence, which at the same time is a function of their ability to control stress.

We've all see the favorite World Cup soccer team hang their heads 20 minutes into a 90 minute game, just because they are down 1-0. The team falls to pieces psychologically for no real reason. Sports thus makes a great testing ground for understanding the psychology of how to perform under pressure, even though the pressure is self-created.

In the first example I watched the Mayweather – Pacquiao fight and immediately saw how important confidence is. Although the evil wife-beating Mayweather was two years older at 38, arguably had more to lose with 47 professional victories against zero losses, and although the crowd booed at him as he entered the ring, he maintained absolute composure, the level of which is rare to find even in a professional arena. He never flinched and his unswerving confidence allowed him to completely disable his opponent's strategies.

No matter whom you supported, liked or betted on, you had to admire the way Mayweather performed. Of course we all wanted to see a brutal slugging match with a Rocky Balboa-style bitter battle until the underdog lands that magical knockout punch in the last seconds of the last round, but that kind of action would have played into Pacquiao's strengths, as he takes more of a street fighter, windmill of punches approach.

Watching the two fighters entering the ring, you can clearly see Mayweather is quietly composed, neither over nor under confident, just in that winner's zone. Meanwhile Pacquaio, riding on a wave of popular sentiment is overconfident—seeing himself as the natural underdog winner, not least since his style is far more aggressive.

Alas for him, victory doesn't have to be some glorious battle; it can simply be the man with the best strategy for the circumstances.

The Best Battle Is The One Never Fought

An interesting article on zerohedge explains Putin's clever approach in the Ukraine. While the US military industrial complex needs a huge war, Putin can win just by maintaining peace; the global influence of America slowly wanes without war.

Unable to provoke Putin into invading Ukraine, it seems the US has taken a "plan-B" strategy to simply ruin the country and leave Russia to pick up the pieces, the cost of which might be too much of an economic burden.

Meanwhile the EU is torn between the two sides. It's a committed US ally, and would also benefit from a protracted military conflict and a Ukraine brought into the Eurozone. However, simply destroying the country is not an option for the EU, lest Ukraine become a failed state exporting gangsters, arms, drugs, terrorists, prostitutes, and general refugees into neighboring countries.

Germany cannot sit pretty on the other side of the Atlantic while Kiev burns. Much like Mayweather's technical "battle never fought" approach, slowly Putin's peaceful, confident, patient attitude is beginning to pay off as the French and Germans begin to find the middle ground and the US and CIA game plan loses traction.

Again we see the US is overconfident, while Russia remains quietly confident; and the middleman or referee—the insecure EU—has no choice but to side with the one playing by the rules.

Pushing It To The Limit

The overconfident winner rapidly finds himself failing, while his stress level rockets and he's unable to retake the important psychological "zone" where quiet confidence rules and success is assured. In this state of mind success (and wealth), comes naturally and things fall into place.

When struggling and sweating it out for that ever sought-after success, all kinds of peculiar bad luck and mistakes seem to occur. At the same time, successful people have to push themselves and thus require a certain amount of pressure and stress to get themselves into the zone. It's necessary to look for that fine balance and psychologically embrace defeat without relaxing too much.

A similar thing happened to Nicky Lauda. Locked in a bitter struggle with his rival James Hunt, (and also climbing out from under a family feud – his father cut him off from the family wealth for wanting to become a racing driver) – although he declared the track unsafe and the weather conditions too poor to race, his attempts to get the other drivers to cancel the race ultimately failed due to his lack of composure and confidence.

Had he simply refused to drive, it's guaranteed that other drivers would have dropped out. He could have made up the points on future races. Many options were open, but he ended up racing anyway and injuring himself very badly, exercising a combination of over-determination and lack of confidence.

I recently came across this book which is particularly good. Flow: The Psychology of Optimal Experience by Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi. I am not claiming to be any kind of expert, but I am sure thinking into these techniques and approaches will help any man with his personal and professional life.

All the magic of the “couldn’t give a fuck” and “nothing to lose” attitude is not essentially necessary. Puffing up and psyching up doesn’t really help much either. Success and “the zone” is a state of mind that is created and can be easier when you literally have no other options. But instead of driving yourself over the edge so you can make a comeback, instead maintain options and success by controlling stress levels, gaining skill, and keeping quietly confident.

The endeavor and the accompanying pressure, then becomes enjoyable and balanced and provided you have the correct skill sets, a natural confidence takes over, and much like Mayweather entering the ring.

With this method, the “ego” can’t get off on it in quite the same way, but the calm focused state is so much more productive and enjoyable than the hyped up overconfidence or the inflamed stressed underconfidence.

In my experience, the stressed state can literally create bad luck out of nowhere, while the overconfident state leads straight into the stressed state when failure begins to occur.

Read More: How To Get Laid On Plenty Of Fish

Is The Modern Man Truly Softer Than His Predecessors?

May 9, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> The life of man upon earth is a warfare, and his days are like the days of a hireling. – Job 7:1, DRA

Is the contemporary man more comfortable (and thus less "stronger") than his primitive ancestors? This topic has been the subject of debate among men since the ages.

Well, with the advancement in modern technology, it could be argued that the modern man enjoys a "luxurious" lifestyle which his forefathers could only dream of. And at the same time, it has been argued by some that he could have become "softer" as compared to his predecessors.

But is this really so? A closer look at the life of a modern man actually reveal serious challenges which, even though they might not directly threaten his survival on a basic level as his forefathers had, can threaten his identity and quality of life in the long run as a man.

There will always be a test, even in luxury

There will always be a problem in a man's life – even if he is enjoying a life of relative comfort as compared to others. Man is tested in both luxury and adversity—in fact the tests which luxury bring on a man tend to have more debilitating consequences for a man should he fail them, and more more importantly, fail to identify them to begin with.

And arguably the main reason why most modern men fail to identify the tests of a luxurious modern lifestyle is because they've been raised with blue pill indoctrination which teaches them to believe in these transitory and illusionary "pleasures" and comfort as the real thing.

By the time reality dawns, for some unfortunate souls, the damage done is too great, even if it may be still rectifiable. And in today's environment. the main and evolved challenges modern men face (and not necessarily in that order) are:

1. Women

There is little difference between women throughout history, indeed – and they continue to remain as one of the primal tests men have to face throughout their earthly lives. Primitive man would've probably shuddered at the quality of modern women's behavior (even with the increased "easiness" of them) – but the fact remains that with the increased feminism and unchained hypergamy of modern women, men, along with game has undergone tremendous evolution compared to primitive times.

Men today have to increasingly act as clowns to seduce women – which probably his forefathers would've find as ridiculous. At the same time, men in modern gyno-centric societies have to contend with the ever-increasing whirlpool of trashy women – who are good only for sex, but not for commitment – thus lowering the incentives and options for a modern man to raise a stable family.

Primitive man probably didn't have to worry about his ass getting jacked in divorce courts, nor would he have to worry about missing child support payments for an irresponsible divorce thrust upon him by his mate.

With modern society increasingly favoring his irresponsible mate over him and he reduced to the position of a dispensable tool in this dysfunctional social construct, one would wonder how primitive man would adapt to this scenario, or more importantly – modern women.

2. Society

Much has been already written about the modern war against masculinity; and how men are gradually "evolving" into comical caricatures of pseudo-alphas dictated by the feminist bandwagon of modern societies.

Modern man's forefathers probably would shudder at the life of their male descendants, were they alive to see at the societal beta-indoctrination peddled to psychologically emasculate young men in today's societies.

With state-sponsored feminism increasingly trying to dismantle patriarchy in the modern world, a modern man usually has relatively little support to rebel against the modern feminist herd. With men turning against men to support feminism, the challenges a modern man has to face are overwhelming.

Beta-indoctrinating messages hurled at him since his birth, termagant feminist women who relentlessly cock-tease him to psychologically sexually desensitize him, unnatural societies where he finds where his natural sexuality being increasingly demeaned, challenges at workplaces where he finds it difficult to adapt, marriages where women increasingly abuse their husbands yet courts favor women – the list is too many.

In fact, it could be argued that he is being "tested" even more than his predecessors.

3. Code system

Every individual functions according to a code. A modern man has is often raised to adhere to such codes – whether it may be through religion, or modern dysfunctional social constructs like feminism which teach him against his own nature.

No man is an island; and the whole idea of blue pill indoctrination of men's code systems is to mess up with the tribe – a man who finds that his tribe is blue pill will be forced to follow the herd. Add to that twisted interpretations that the majority is always right (another variation of the Group Trap which Harry Browne mentions) and men will succumb to a flawed code system.

Old habits die hard, and the optimal time for a man's indoctrination begins from his birth. In fact, a man's strong inner code is what defines his life irrespective of the circumstances or his environment he might himself in.

A blue piller who has strong blue pill code would continue to wade in his blue pill ignorance, even if he might be thrust in a society where men are actually rewarded for being true men. Instead, he would wage a war on this society for being oppressive to women—because he was raised to believe so.

This is why it is a great challenge to modern men to fight the code system they are raised in—because it often takes a great amount of time to deprogram from it.

Conclusion

In today's environment, a man's challenges have evolved onto social, political and professional levels – as compared to the physical levels they were usually restricted to in primitive times. It would be immature to expect a man to combat against the blue pill world purely on a physical level.

All credit goes to the man who disengages himself from the blue pill herd and rebels, because his resistance itself is commendable considering the odds stacked against him. One wonders how the men of the future would have to face more challenges considering the civilizational decline we are set in.

However, in spite of all the negatives a modern man might find himself at birth, the responsibility to unplug still resides on his shoulders. And the thing which will undoubtedly help him is the red pill—to unplug himself, and more importantly to help him realize that he is continually in a state of existential warfare for the protection of his own masculine identity in today's world.

The man who fails to take it and falls prey to the supposed comfort of modern life—in spite of knowing the enlightenment that the red pill brings—has nobody to blame but himself.

Read Next: The War Against Men

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

5 Reasons Men Should Limit Their Cardio

May 10, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

When it comes to exercise, almost everything can be grouped into two categories: aerobic and anaerobic exercise.

Aerobic exercise, or cardio, primarily targets strengthening your cardiorespiratory system—your lungs and your heart. Anaerobic exercise, or strength training, primarily targets strengthening your musculoskeletal system—your skeletal muscles and your bones.

Both have their place in everyone's gym routine. But I would make the argument that strength training should be your main focus. Here are the three main reasons I make this case:

- Strength training is primarily responsible for altering your body composition (i.e. building muscle and burning fat)
- Strength training is primarily responsible for fighting our bodies' natural aging process (muscle atrophy and osteoporosis)
- Through the use of circuit style training methods, you can effectively integrate cardio into your strength training routine

In addition to these reasons, there are numerous other reasons that you should prioritize strength training and limit cardio.

1. You’re trying to bulk up

Cardio won’t get you big

When you’re trying to bulk up and build muscle, anything more than a little bit of cardio will make it a lot harder to achieve your goal.

You see – you need to maintain a caloric surplus and gain weight to efficiently build muscle mass. And cardio burns a lot of calories. The more calories you burn, the more you need to eat to maintain this positive caloric balance.

So, unless gaining weight is relatively easy for you, then doing anything more than a little bit of cardio to maintain a healthy heart will make it harder for you to build muscle and bulk up.

2. You’re already quite lean

When you’re skinny, your focus should be on adding muscle to your frame, or at least maintaining the muscle that you do have.

By doing lots of cardio when you’re already quite lean, you risk losing weight and shedding the muscle mass that you do have. This will only make you look smaller, and it’s actually unhealthy because we need a certain level of body fat to maintain healthy hormone levels and a proper libido.

Anything below 10% body fat is unhealthy and should be avoided unless you’re a professional bodybuilder or fitness model. So if you’re already quite lean, then skip the cardio man, it will only hurt your health and your physique.

3. Traditional cardio is boring

Get off the treadmill, bro

The fact is that running on a treadmill or spinning away on a studio bicycle is a very repetitive thing… And it's fucking boring, to be blunt.

If you don't fit into either of the two above categories, and you want to do cardio, then you should find a hobby or activity that allows you to do cardio without spinning your life away at the gym.

Pickup basketball, martial arts, rock climbing, hiking, and even running outside are superior alternative that allow you to develop a skill or explore the world while you get your cardio in.

4. Traditional cardio can lead to overuse injures

As covered above, traditional is very repetitive. And this repetitive nature can be potentially dangerous to your body.

The most common examples of this are runners with bad form fracturing their feet or ruining the ligaments or cartilage in their knees by repeatedly pounding their feet into the ground. By limiting or cardio—or practicing one of the superior forms of cardio mentioned above—you can avoid these types of injuries.

If you are confined to traditional cardio machines, then at least switch it up. By splitting your time in between the treadmill, the rowing machine, the elliptical, and the spinning bike you can avoid these types of repetitive injuries.

5. Traditional cardio can lead to poor posture

Cardio won’t help you stand up straight

Another negative side effect of repetitive cardio is that it can lead to bad posture.

Leaning forward on a spin bike, for example, will tighten your chest muscles and cause you to hunch forward. It will also tighten your hip flexors and strain your neck as you look ahead and crank your head upwards.

By focusing on strength training, you will strengthen key postural muscles in your abdomen and upper back that will cause you to stand up straighter, appear taller, stronger, and more confident. Make sure you incorporate rowing exercises into your strength training routine to ensure you get these benefits.

Read More: The Top 3 Muscle Building Mistakes Men Make

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

How Senator Kirsten Gillibrand Doubled Down On The False Rape Culture Narrative

May 10, 2015 | by S. J. Irving | Link | Original Link

On April 24th, Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, interviewed at the Women In The World summit, sounded off again on the UVA débâcle. In WITW's video of the interview, the relevant question begins at around three minutes and thirty-six seconds (3:36).

The UVA story, commencing with Rolling Stone's retracted "A Rape on Campus" (by disgraced Sabrina Ruben Erdely), still highlights a problem for Gillibrand—not hoaxes, but rapes that never happened. Back in March, she insisted that we not "blame the victim," Jackie Coakley (technically liable to criminal charges under Virginia state law).

What criminals and false accusers look like in Virginia.

Now the Senator hopes that rape hoaxes will shine a spotlight on the problem of rape on campuses. The problem with 'the problem' is that it's nothing more than statistical distortions, lies, and hoaxes exactly like the one debunked. However, feminists never let facts get in the way of a good story—and the Coakley-Erdely hoax is no exception.

Evidence grows daily to suggest that both accuser and journalist were not simply mistaken, but lying. In light of this, it's becoming ever clearer that the campus witch-hunt (kicked into high gear by Erdely's fairytale) was the paradigmatic case of how bad it gets when feminists go unchallenged.

Sen. Gillibrand's opportunistic remarks only underscore the urgency of the problem. Witch-hunts and manufactured mass hysteria (e.g. "rape culture") depend upon this ugly aspect of human hive-minds: reputations are besmirched by virtue of accusation itself, not necessarily by proof. Frankly, we wouldn't have heard this shoddy attempt at journalism otherwise.

Hit-and-run Journalism

The voice of the Social Justice conscience.

Erdely wasn't the only "idiot" playing jump to conclusions. Feminists didn't stop to verify the claims or even notice that Coakley's remarks (even without Erdely's embellishment) were too fishy and forced to be plausible.

Man-hating mujeres and their obedient eunuchs were clambering over one another just to be the first to shout "I told you so." Anyone questioning the outrage, for any reason, was an "idiot," according to Anna Merlan. Without the rush to please institutional feminsts, this travesty wouldn't have happened.

Why must journalists or policymakers, who recognize only the unruly court of popular opinion and fashionable outrage, bother with such boring matters as the presumption of innocence or the due process of law? Leave such unfashionable matters to jurists! On the contrary, guilt is assumed by institutional feminists—not just any guilt, but guilt-by-association. A "fratboy" (real or invented) is accused of a crime, therefore he's guilty. Therefore fraternities are dens of unprosecuted rapists. So goes femilogic.

One white knight commenting on Merlan's half-assed apology is a textbook minimizer, dismissing her wrongdoing and insult-throwing thus: “everyone makes bad calls on the internet now and then.” He calls her apology “abject,” despite its reasoning being as follows: I was wrong about this, because I make these assumptions as a matter of course, but we need to continue making these assumptions which bring us to the wrong conclusions. It’s virtually the definition of deranged thinking, adapted to first-person pronouns.

This same doublethink is at work in the Senate chamber. Gillibrand’s argument is as bad as that of any witch-hunter throughout history. Seventeenth-century Salemites accepted the following: The first witch was acquitted? No matter, we’ll keep going until we find a scapegoat we can put to death!

More recently, a whole country bought this: …But if we keep looking, we’ll definitely find WMD! The former was enabled by Puritan fervor; the latter by the insane logic that no evidence of WMD means there’s even worse WMD and even more of them than we’d feared.

The Lie That Doesn’t Want to Die

Sen. Gillibrand’s attempt to keep the feminist momentum of the Rolling Stone story going is necromantic, seeking to revivify the undead outrage while sending the inconvenient facts of the case down the memory hole. She wants it to eat our brains, as it did to social media feminists the first time around.

Gillibrand’s proposal is beneath debate: it must be mercilessly mocked. Femilogic needs to be exposed to as much thorough ridicule as possible, on a continuous basis, to irreparably harm its credibility.

Luckily, in this case, the goons themselves are making it easier: Gillibrand in particular is a magnet for the absurd. She’s already jumped to the same conclusion in the Columbia rape stunt (“hoax” seems a little bit of an understatement for this scale of attention-whoring), announcing “I believe Emma” via her publicist, before the facts of the case came to light. She brought Sulkowicz—the mattress-carrying feminist (and probable sociopath) at Columbia, who likes it “in the butt”—as her plus-one to the State of the Union address.

Utter this dark incantation and you, too, can attend the State of the Union address.

Crucially, they're both seeking—and getting—publicity. Gillibrand has used the metaphor of a "spotlight" on a number of occasions, which gives us an insight into her psychology. That's the danger in bringing together fantasists like Erdely and Coakley; and spotlight-craving performers like Gillibrand and Sulkowicz. Both "victim" and advocate benefit from the exposure.

So long as Sen. Gillibrand can keep one or more of these plates of deceit spinning, then whatever else the spotlight might be on, it's also on her. She wants these scandals to shine a spotlight on a problem which doesn't exist, so she can pass a law as a "solution" to it, to placate her braindead constituents.

It goes without saying, though, these hoaxes shine a light on just how limited a problem campus rape is at present (statistically, for the record, there are proportionately less incidents of women raped on campus than off). Nowhere is the statistic 1 in 4, 1 in 5 or anything like it. When hoaxes are discovered, we have a chance to put problems in their proper perspective, instead of blowing something out of proportion as news outlets are wont to do.

Context And Consequences

Narcissism? Now it's called social justice and gender equality!

How does "A Rape on Campus" fit into all of this?

It fits seamlessly into the establishment narrative. There might not be a perfect victim, as the fembots say, but there's indubitably a perfect story—and Rolling Stone printed it. We don't have a rape culture, but we have an accusation culture, an (attempted) egalitarian culture, a hotbed for feminist lunacy. Institutionally, feminism is supported in every imaginable way. Socially speaking, overt opposition to feminism is suicidal. Feminists aren't oppressed, they're not fighting the establishment. They are the establishment.

Otherwise, no story of this kind could go viral.

When a prestigious organization like RAINN (concerned with real, not fake, instances of rape) concludes that the 'rape culture' theory confuses the issue, it's time to quit. You have lost the debate, feminists, and you won't win again. (See: Jezebel's damage control.) Your only successes hereafter will come from Reichstag fires, because the facts aren't on your side.

Then again, Roosh's provocative thought-experiment showed that feminists don't really care about anything but scoring points and harming men. The victim card is just another weapon against us.

Sen. Gillibrand can push the Enabling Act all she likes; men will push back. She's not defending victims from backlash, but prompting an even bigger backlash. I'm not a fan of the casually litigious culture in America, but I support Paul Nungesser's legal response to being defamed by Sulkowicz. In any case, this is just the beginning. Take heed, feminists: if you sow the wind, you and your daughters will reap the whirlwind.

Carry that weight.

Read More: Why Haven't The People Who Pushed Rolling Stone's UVA Rape Hoax Story Been Fired?

S. J. Irving
S. J. Irving is a writer from Scotland who dabbles in comedy, sleuthing, science and sorcery. He's also the publisher and editor-in-chief of The Devil's Review.

5 Reasons Why Chicago Is The Best City In America For Men

May 11, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As my readers know, I recently relocated to Chicago after spending the better part of the past year hopping between various points in the Philippines and the U.S. While I'm not dumb enough to claim that the Windy City is paradise—what with its horrific metro system, wacky weather and war zone-level of bloodshed—my experiences over the past year show that Chicago is amazingly underrated among major U.S. cities. Here's why.

1. The people are extremely nice (by city standards)

I don't want to overstate the politeness of Chicagoans: if you want really nice, you'll have to move out to the more rural parts of the Midwest or Mountain West states. But if you're used to big city people being various degrees of asshole—the helpful assholes of New York City, the fake-nice assholes of L.A., or the fuck-you-and-die assholes of Portland—the Windy City might just surprise you.

In contrast to other big American cities, Chicago retains a distinctly blue-collar character. If you strut around like you're better than everyone else, you'll get slapped down hard, but if you act like a normal human being, people will show you the same respect. For example, when I went to the Pitchfork Music Festival last year, I wore my Sonic Youth Goo T-shirt on the first day. All the way down on the L (Chicago's subway/metro system and back), people kept complimenting me on the shirt or asking what it was. That would never happen in New York.

2. Girls are sweeter and more approachable

Going hand-in-hand with the previous point, Chicago girls are more pleasant and feminine than girls in other major cities. Mind you, we're not talking Filipino-level feminine, but if you're inured to big city girls being intolerable twats, Chicago will shatter your expectations.

It's likely because of the relative niceness of the girls here that Chicago is massively underrepresented in the manosphere and neomasculine world. While cities such as Washington, D.C. and Toronto punch way above their weight in terms of manosphere representation (ROK's own Roosh Valizadeh is from D.C.), I'm currently the only major Chicago-based 'sphere writer I can think of.

3. It's inexpensive

Again, this is in comparison to other big cities: there's no doubt a pile of bumfuck villages in flyover country where you can live more cheaply. But on the cost of living index, Chicago blows New York and L.A. out of the water. To give you an example, my friend pays $1,000 a month for a two bedroom apartment in Lincoln Park, one of the city's most yuppified and expensive neighborhoods. Try getting a 2BR in New York that isn't either at least twice that cost or in the ghetto.

On the other metrics of living, Chicago also stacks up better than its similarly-sized counterparts. Everything from groceries to nightlife is either cheaper or similarly priced to other big cities. While the CTA has to be one of the worst major city transit agencies in America, the L, Metra, and buses still allow you to live without a car. Even the tax situation, while not ideal, is better than in New York or California, and Illinois has the added bonus of a Republican governor to gum up the left's works.

4. Concealed carry is legal here

It took years of litigation, but in 2013, Illinois finally joined the vast majority of states that allow citizens to exercise their Second Amendment rights by passing a concealed carry law. Even better, Illinois is a "must-issue" state, meaning that unless you've committed a major felony, the state has no choice but to give you your permit provided you pass all the tests and pay all the fees. That includes Cook County and Chicago.

While the Land of Lincoln's concealed carry law is far from ideal—the fees are high, and Illinois lacks reciprocity agreements with other must-issue states—it's a damn sight better than the arbitrary gun grabber regimes that rule most blue states. Concealed carry has been such a huge success in Illinois that it resulted in "Chiraq's" murder rate dropping for the first time in years.

5. Chicago is somewhat immune to SJW entryism

It’s easy to complain about the systemically corrupt nature of Chicago and Cook County government, but this corruption actually insulates the city from the worst excesses of leftism. Chicago’s antiquated machine politics and “fuck you, pay me” mentality dissuade lunatic moral crusaders such as NYC’s Bill de Blasio from getting into power and imposing all sorts of insane SJW edicts. In fact, the recent Chicago mayoral election featured a de Blasio-esque candidate who was swiftly curb-stomped by the electorate.

As much as Chicago kleptocracy can put a damper on my life, whether it’s the godawful transit system or the ripoff-level parking meters, it’s a price worth paying to keep the SJWs out. In fact, I encourage every trustafarian Midwestern hipster crying about “manspreading” to follow her dream of fronting an “art noise” duo and move to NYC or Portland. Go far, far away from the “boring” Midwest and “scary” Chicago and never come back.

While I don’t plan on living in Chicago for the rest of my life, it’s a pretty good place for men to settle down. As much as I may grumble about the obnoxiousness of the L or the fact that it’s 50 degrees out in May, I’d rather be here than anywhere else in the U.S.

Read More: 15 Reasons Why Toronto Is The Worst City In North America For Men

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

2 Examples Of Why You Should Be Skeptical Of Governmental Promises

May 11, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Governments undoubtedly perform many useful functions, and in general the good that they do outweighs the bad. But this does not mean that their actions should never fall under scrutiny. Centralized power abides by its own logic, and has its own prerogatives; and while an enlightened ruler can work wonders when bringing noble aspirations to tangible reality, mediocre leaders can actively erode the principles of liberty, privacy, and public safety. I was reminded of this fact by reading some recent news stories.

Several days ago, the US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit ruled that the NSA's mass surveillance programs of its citizens, justified on the ever-shifting grounds of "national security," are in fact illegal. The ruling arose out of a lawsuit brought by the ACLU against the NSA in the wake of disclosures by dissident Edward Snowden that Verizon was required to turn over to the NSA (on a daily basis) all of its domestic and international phone records.

The NSA had maintained that Section 215 of the Patriot Act allowed them to sweep up all of this "metadata" whenever it wanted to. The ACLU disagreed, taking the position that the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution could not justify the NSA's broad powers, which essentially amounted to the de facto creation of a vast database on every citizen, regardless whether they were suspects in any criminal activity.

FISA courts: a cruel joke

Readers may recall that the government's rubber-stamp "FISA Court" (Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court) had permitted such data collection provided it was related to "authorized investigation" of suspected terrorist activity. This shadowy "court" (which is not really a court at all, in any meaningful sense of the world) had given carte blanche to the program since 2006. It had never denied any government requests for information. It had been renewed over forty times since 2006. The NSA's position was basically that everything and anything might be relevant to a terrorist investigation, so it was justified in collecting everything and anything on everyone.

And there things stood until last week. The Second Circuit, however, was not persuaded by the government's logic. It noted the obvious: if we were to accept the NSA's position, we would be forced to conclude that the program had no collection limits at all. The collection program was patently illegal under the very section of the Patriot Act that had created it (Section 215).

Disappointingly, however, the court refused to order a halt to the NSA's collection program. It felt that the matter was best handled by having Congress amend the Patriot Act so that such collections abuses would no longer be an issue. In other words, the court tossed the hot potato into the lap of Congress. The predictable result, of course, is that Congress will do nothing. The NSA will continue to collect whatever it wants, whenever it wants, with the useless warm bodies in Congress continuing to collect their salaries without doing anything. They will mouth the right platitudes for the cameras, and then turn to their reelection campaigns.

Other examples of government abuses are not hard to find. I recently wrote about the worst small arm ever designed, the French Army's "Chauchat" light machine gun. The weapon was manufactured without any real oversight by the French government in the years before and during the First World War.

As a result, factory owners pocketed fat profits from lucrative contracts while skimping on manufacturing quality and materials. The final product was a horror, which undoubtedly caused the deaths of many Frenchmen in combat. Postwar investigations into the matter went nowhere, as the parliamentarians charged with investigating it were the same ones who had initiated the calamitous program in the first place.

The Chauchat machine gun: a disaster that took the lives of many of its users

Power nurtures itself, and has its own logic. It can only be prevented from committing abuses by the skeptical vigilance of its citizenry. A further example (to add to the two noted above) of this principle can be seen in a recent news story coming from Brazil about the country's so-called "rubber soldiers." You may not have heard of the "rubber soldiers," but the story is a compelling one.

It begins in 1942. With the United States in the midst of a massive rearmament program, there was a need for all types of strategic raw materials. One of these was rubber, which was used for a thousand military purposes. Synthetic rubber was still a laboratory aspiration; natural rubber from rubber trees was the only reliable source at that time. There were extensive rubber plantations in Southeast Asia, but these had fallen into the hands of the conquering Japanese. Only Brazil—the original home of the rubber tree, hevea brasiliensis–had the potential to meet the wartime demand.

So the American government struck an agreement with its counterpart in Brazil, whereby Washington would help finance a crash program to produce and export massive amounts of rubber. With promises of good pay and new opportunities, Brazil enlisted over 55,000 workers to go to the Amazon region and work on what they were told were rubber plantations. Using an enticing advertising campaign, the government promised to feed, transport, house, and medically care for the workers and their families.

But the promises turned out to be cruel deceptions. It took months to reach the malarial swamps of Amazonia, with workers having to pay for transport themselves. Once there, they quickly realized that there was no infrastructure to support them: no housing, no pay, no education for children, no organization, and no way of getting out. Subsistence was essentially at slavery levels.

Workers were reduced to shooting wild animals for food, and living in handmade huts of the most primitive quality. Tens of thousands died of neglect and disease; the bosses who controlled the labor made workers pay for everything, so that any wages they did receive were consumed by supplies they were required to buy themselves.

Brazil's "rubber soldiers": used and discarded

At the end of the war, government promises of bonuses for the survivors of the program came to nothing. Monies earmarked for the laborers found their way into the pockets of corrupt officials, and stayed there. After nearly seventy years, the Brazilian government finally acknowledged the sacrifices of its "rubber soldiers" and awarded the survivors (now in their eighties and nineties) a bonus. The amount was only US $7,800 for each survivor.

The cruelest irony of all? For all the work and suffering, the actual output of rubber was middling at best. Rubber production limply rose from 16,135 tons in 1940 to only 22,350 four years later. This was not all. In the event, the Americans turned out not to need Brazilian rubber. Making use of its chemical industry, the United States found ways during the war of producing synthetic rubber on such a scale that it became a net exporter of rubber by the end of 1945.

What we conclude from all this is that governmental promises must be viewed with skepticism until proven effective and reliable. Concentrated power must continually be monitored by an educated, informed citizenry, so that the shadow of authoritarianism does not darken the institutions of a free society. The only antidote to governmental abuses is enlightened, vigorous leadership. Unfortunately, this has now become one of the world's rarest commodities.

In analyzing governmental promises and statements, the following rules of thumb are useful:

1. Don't focus on what governments or politicians say. Look at what they do. Even the most odious despotism can call itself a democratic republic.

2. Pay more attention to capabilities, rather than intentions. The stated intentions of governments can change overnight; capabilities often take much longer. Our focus should therefore be on capabilities.

3. Pay attention to a government's "track record." It's the best indicator of how it will behave in the future.

4. Receive information from a variety of sources. Don't rely on your own media for all of your information. The media often operates as the propaganda arm of the government.

Power will always create abuses. This is unavoidable. As with any institution created by man, governments will produce corruption and abuses. But an awareness of how governments operate can enable us to make informed decisions that are based on fact, rather than aspirations.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Not Date Indian Girls

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Why You Should Not Go See “Mad Max: Feminist Road”

May 11, 2015 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Not to get all “Reaxxiony” on you, but the geek inside of me was excited when I saw the previews and marketing material for “1886: The Order.” Great period in Western Civilization history. An environment that one could get lost in. And technology (supported by Nikola Tesla) that promised those new, fun, fantastic weapons you’d need to take on an undead horde.

It flopped worse than Operation Market Garden.

Of course, this just reiterated a lesson that my hope (1886 would be a good video game) made me temporarily forget: Rarely does a game, book, or a movie live up to the hype surrounding it. And sadly the same thing can be said for “Mad Max: Fury Road.”

If you were like me, the explosions, fire tornadoes, even the symphonic score surrounding “Fury Road’s” first trailer made your attendance a foregone conclusion. It looked like a straight-up guy flick. No fucking around. Perhaps even a little, hidden acknowledgement from the director that when the shit hits the fan, it will be men like ~~Jack Donovan~~ Mad Max who will be in charge.

But then my spidey senses started noticing a couple things.

Charlize Theron kept showing up a lot in the trailers, while Tom Hardy (Mad Max) seemed to have cameo appearances. Charlize Theron sure talked a lot during the trailers, while I don’t think I’ve heard one line from Tom Hardy. And finally, Charlize Theron’s character barked orders to Mad Max.

Nobody barks orders to Mad Max.

Sure enough, what I suspected (but desperately wanted NOT to be true) was confirmed with two articles in the past week. One, Eve Ensler, author of "The Vagina Monologues" was consulted by the director to consult the female actresses in Fury Road about what it's like being sex slaves. Her presumed expertise in this area was based on work she claimed to have done in the Congo. Work I investigated and deemed "fishy" in a recent podcast (around the 1hr 6 min mark).

Two, of all the outdated, obsolete, Baby Boomer leftist rags, TIME MAGAZINE just comes outright and says it.

> "Here's a surprise: Tom Hardy, a.k.a. Mad Max, isn't the star of Mad Max: Fury Road. Charlize Theron is. An even bigger surprise? Vagina Monologues author Eve Ensler consulted on what turns out to be a very feminist film….Theron, not Hardy, leads the charge; she also does the majority of the fighting."

Alas, I was forced to accept reality. Fury Road was not going to be a movie made for men. It was going to be a feminist piece of propaganda posing as a guy flick. And like "1886: The Order" I would be let down, and would have to pin my hopes on something else.

The real issue is not whether feminism has infiltrated and co-opted Hollywood, ruining nearly every potentially-good action flick with a forced female character or an unnecessary romance sub-plot to eek out that extra 3 million in female attendees.

It has.

And the real issue is not whether Hollywood has the audacity to remove the name sake of a movie franchise called MAD FREAKING MAX, and replace it with an impossible female character in an effort to kowtow to feminism.

It has.

It's whether men in America and around the world are going to be duped by explosions, fire tornadoes, and desert raiders into seeing what is guaranteed to be nothing more than feminist propaganda, while at the same time being insulted AND tricked into viewing a piece of American culture ruined and rewritten right in front of their very eyes.

The truth is I'm angry about the extents Hollywood and the director of Fury Road went to trick me and other men into seeing this movie. Everything VISUALLY looks amazing. It looks like that action guy flick we've desperately been waiting for where it is one man with principles, standing against many with none.

But let us be clear. This is the vehicle by which they are guaranteed to force a lecture on feminism down your throat. This is the Trojan Horse feminists and Hollywood leftists will use to (vainly) insist on the trope women are equal to men in all things, including physique, strength, and logic. And this is the subterfuge they will use to blur the lines between masculinity and femininity, further ruining women for men, and men for women.

So do yourself and all men across the world a favor. Not only REFUSE to see the movie, but spread the word to as many men as possible. Not all of them have the keen eye we do here at ROK. And most will be taken in by fire tornadoes and explosions. Because if they sheepishly attend and Fury Road is a blockbuster, then you, me, and all the other men (and real women) in the world will never be able to see a real action movie ever again that doesn't contain some damn political lecture or moray about feminism, SJW-ing, and socialism.

That and you can expect Hollywood to further condition young women to be like "Imperator Furiosa" and not Sophia Loren. In the meantime, if you want to watch a real action flick I recommend watching "Kelly's Heroes" instead.

UPDATE: Our Call To Boycott Mad Max Movie Spurs Avalanche Of Mainstream Media Anger
UPDATE 2: See the author's podcast response to the media here

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Aaron Clarey

Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

How To Reverse America's Cultural Decline

May 12, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Many critics have complained that solutions have not been proposed to the cultural problems described in the manosphere. Part of the reason is that we are more like scientists than policy figures, but I will now propose a program that can help the cultural and demographic ills facing the Western world today.

As much as I would like to make proposals that would nip most problems in the bud (e.g. repealing women's suffrage), we must be realistic and work within the confines of Western-style democracy. Here are my recommendations:

1. Repeal Title IX. This policy has masculinized women by increasing their participation in male sports by a factor of 9. It has made them hyper-competitive and has also been used as a legal weapon to persecute male college students through anti-male sexual assault awareness programs (i.e. re-education). Its repeal would allow girls to focus more on useful nesting skills instead of athletic competition while simultaneously reducing rape culture hysteria, allowing men to educate themselves properly and peacefully without fear so that they can be future pillars and leaders of the country.

2. Repeal the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). This law has created grotesque inequalities in the home by giving women the power to imprison men with one call to the police with a false claim of abuse. This act effectively replaces a husband as head of the household with the government, creating family distrust and further enslaving and controlling a man's behavior by requiring him to comply with whims of the state.

3. Enforce equality of the law and due process. If a man and woman both drink during sexual encounters, the law must treat them equally instead of placing the burden of consent solely on the male. Allegations of rape or violence by women should not be automatically believed, and divorce laws should recognize that women are not necessarily more fit and capable of raising children than men, especially if they whore around with bad boys who have a prior criminal record.

4. Repeal or forbid laws that regulate sexuality, sex, or bedroom activity. Birth control, abortion, and sex change operations should not be funded by taxpayers. All behavior relating to the sex instinct should be an individual choice left up to adults, not the state, which has proven its incompetence and unfairness when trying to regulate human pair bonding.

Imagine for a second what the country would be like if these four recommendations were implemented. Would it greatly improve the quality of women, clear their mind of anti-male brainwashing, make them normal weighted, and increase their suitability for marriage? Not as much as we'd like, unfortunately. As long as the culture is dominated by a far-left media establishment that continues to poison the population, and as long as universities continue to serve as socialist zombie factories, I'm afraid that government policy alone will only bring forth marginal improvements. It's better than nothing, and would ensure more men are treated fairly by the law, but most of you would probably not notice the changes in your everyday life.

Even worse, as long as women have the right to vote, these policy changes would probably not last a generation until the newest wave of white knight politicians re-implement progressive policies and we're back to where we started. True change would take more than repealing a few laws—we'd have to greatly influence universities to re-write curriculums to represent a more traditional world outlook and also control the output of the media. This will never happen unless we see a Stalin-esque figure take control over America, and then we'd have a different set of problems to worry about as those who live in dictatorships today can tell you.

The only time we'd get change that lasts generations is if the current degenerate culture no longer benefits the elites in power. When it suits their wallets to embrace a more traditional program, you'll see it implemented in the media, universities, and government within a generation. This would definitely happen in the case of a decreasing population, but as you can see with the latest amnesty order from Obama, the elites are bending the Constitution to make sure this never occurs, and even conservative candidates for the next presidential election like Jeb Bush favor open door immigration. A worldwide shock event like a new World War would still affect the United States far less than other countries due to its geo-strategic location, so sadly there is no way I can conceive that we would ever find ourselves living in a country that doesn't persecute neomasculine ideals.

But what would happen if we convince one man and one woman at a time that our views would serve their lives better than progressive views? What if an ideological revolution occurs where over 50% of both men and women long for tradition and reason, and the power of the ruling elites is threatened unless they give large bread crumbs to the agitating masses? Then lasting change can occur. It's a slower method than a dictator flicking the switch, but winning hearts and minds, as long as you really do have the correct ideology and are persistent about sharing it, may save us yet.

Read Next: What Is Neomasculinity?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

This Is What Feminism Could Look Like In 20 Years

May 12, 2015 | by Dean Shaw | Link | Original Link

February 26, 2035: Santa Monica, CA. United States Population: 189,000,000

I threw the tennis ball in a tall, lobbing arc – 30 years ago my little league coach would've thrown his hat to the ground and rather inappropriately said "By the time the fucking ball hits the ground he's already made it home!" My Greyhound Max took off after it, any higher and he might've beaten the ball to the ground because, unlike an outfielder, he didn't run with his eyes on the ball, he just waited for that first bounce and pounced on it.

All of this took a toll on my shoulder; he got faster and I'd have to throw the ball further. Max caught the ball and started toward a small Pomeranian with a female owner.

"Max!" I whistled, "Max! Come back here!"

I ran across the field as Max curiously sniffed the Pom who circled back and forth like it was tying him into an invisible knot.

"Zoey, stop that, that's disgusting." She pulled the dog away.

I caught my breath, "So sorry. Max, come here." I attached his leash and pulled him away.

"It's ok."

The red beacons hanging from our necklaces lit up and rang with that annoying staccato 'BEEP-BEEP-BEEP' and her phone rang. She answered it with one hand and clutched a can of pepper spray behind her back.

"Hello?" she said.

A rushed voice came over the other end, "This is Fem-Protect, you are within five feet of a male, Kevin Sandoval, is he threatening you at this moment?"

She looked at me and blushed a little bit, cracked a smile, put away her pepper-spray with her right hand, returned her thumb to her belt-loop and pulled her jeans down and away from her hip. I took a step back just incase.

“No, I’m ok, my password is Zoey. What are his priors?”

The voice over the phone responded, “Clean record, no sexual activity in the last 20 months, due to receive his monthly anti-androgen shot today at 2:30pm, frequently visits a Ms. Kendall Mays, sending his contact information to your phone right now.”

“Ok, thank you.” She put her phone away and smiled at me. Zoey and Max pulled their leashes taught as they tried to sniff each other, “Kevin Sandoval…” she scrolled through my event history.

“That’s me, you must be Zoey?”

She laughed, “Very funny, that would be my dog, I’m Madison.”

“Nice to meet you, Madison…and Zoey. Well I’ll get out of your way…”

She scrolled down and look at me, “Wow, Kevin, you’ve seen this Kendall Mays for 32 months and no sexual activity? Isn’t that hard?”

“We’ve been going steady, just waiting for her to pop the question. I’m sorry I need to go, if she sees we’ve been talking longer than 2 minutes I’ll never hear the end of it,”

She tilted her head to the side and smiled, “Really? You think I’d make her jealous? Maybe this will…” she hit a button on her phone and a message popped up on mine:

MADISON SUMMERS INVITES YOU TO HAVE SEXUAL INTERCOURSE. ACCEPT/DECLINE

“My apartment is just down the street,” she said, “I’ll fuck the memory of your girlfriend out of you,”

The blood rushed to my face and for a second it seemed like the greatest, easiest decision I’d ever make in my life. She was certainly more attractive than Kendall, but I knew Madison’s type—they were called “Sluts,” women who preyed on the men who craved a few hours free of their Chastity Belts, but did so with no intent to ever marry the man.

Under this law, once a civil union was established through marriage, the female could grant her husband freedom of this electronic fucking spandex relaying a constant stream of my health’s status to the authorities. When men became aroused without a female’s consent, the fabric of their Chastity Belt stretched the electrodes and our necklace beacons rang an alarm, sending the police who’d – at best – tranquilize you under threat of future sex-crimes.

This is what the sluts used to their advantage, if I didn't accept her offer of sexual intercourse and I became aroused anyway, the alarm would go off and she could charge me with 1st Degree Sexual Intent.

This is why some men "checked out," as they called it. My roommate Steve had checked out—rather than try for marriage to remove the Chastity Belt, if you made it to age 55 with a clean record you were pardoned from it. Steve didn't talk to women and didn't venture too far from the house. He did keep a small stash of porn handy to keep himself busy, which was a punishable offense, but he only had three years to go, and I did notice an increasing pep to his step with each birthday edging him closer.

"No thank you," I took a step back, "I have a girlfriend, I would not like to engage in sexual intercourse,"

She took a quick step forward and grabbed the top of my pants, pulled me in close to her face, just an inch between our noses and our necklace beacons rang again, she answered her phone and stared at me,

"Ms. Summers, this is Fem-Protect again, you are currently in direct contact with another male, please confirm this is consensual."

She moved her lips so close I felt her breath – she looked at my lips and then my eyes. I wanted her, but knew I wouldn't and shouldn't, but still, I felt warm, I imagined us having sex as if the more vividly I did the less I'd tempt myself into the wrong decision.

"Yes, ma'am, this is consensual, password…'fuck'." She enunciated and her bottom lip gently flipped off of her teeth.

She reached her middle and index finger and pulled against the elastic of my Chastity Belt.

"I know you want this off, Kevin. Let me guess, Kendall isn't exactly…small?"

My pulse crashed against my eardrums, "She's curvy, I have a girlfrie.."

"Shut the fuck up, you make one move I'll hit the distress button, either press 'accept' or…" she reached further inside the Belt, placing her fingers against the sensors, "I'll pull right here and start crying just to watch you get shot. Don't be stupid, and don't pretend like you don't want to fuck me."

Max and Zoey wrestled at arms length. My phone rang,

“Is that her?”

I pulled my phone from my pocket and looked, it was Kendall. She must’ve had alerts synched to my activity. Madison took the phone from my hand and tossed it to the side without breaking eye contact. I knew what I had to do:

“Please…please just let me go.”

She smiled, “I don’t want to, and neither do you, I can see it,”

“I do not want to have sexual intercourse, I…have…a girlfriend!” I pulled her hand out of my belt and my necklace rang ‘BEEP-BEEP-BEEP’ I dropped the leash and dove the ball, “MAX! RUN HOME! GO GO GO!” I threw the tennis ball towards our apartment with all I had left in my right shoulder and he took off.

She threw herself to the ground and screamed for help, rolling side to side. I grabbed my phone and typed ‘S-T-E-V-E’, “Steve answer answer come on…”

“Hello?”

“Steve! Listen, I got popped, they’re going to raid our place, you need to stash your stuff,”

“Oh god, what did you do? I don’t have time, Kevin, fuck, fuck…” I heard a door kick in on Steve’s end, “They’re here, oh my God, no…” his phone hit the ground and three cop cars bounced over the curb onto the grass in front of me.

From the car’s PA system: “MR. SANDOVAL, PUT YOUR HANDS IN THE AIR. MISS SUMMERS, RAISE YOUR RIGHT HAND IF YOU’RE BREATHING.”

I rose to my knees with my hands in the air as four troopers jumped out of the cars with guns drawn, “This is a mistake! I did nothing!”

Madison rolled back and forth and batted her arms as if being attacked by a swarm of bees, screaming ‘HELP!’

Out of the corner of my eye I saw Max running back with the ball. He dropped the ball and ran towards the policemen, picking up speed and barking, the troopers turned their guns toward Max, “MAX!” I got up and ran towards him to intercept, hearing a faint ‘Noooo!’ and pop-pop-pop from the other end of my phone, “MAX!” I dove and caught him as he took his last leap towards the officers and POP-POP-POP the metal tore through my ribs and the air left my lungs before I hit the ground.

“HE’S DOWN, SECURE THE DOG!”

They had Max secured with a noose but he was still fighting. I rolled over on my back and tried to reach the bottom of my lungs but could only take small sips of air. Max was snarling with something in his mouth and another pop-pop-pop but the sound muffled. It was the strangest thing, I couldn’t feel much pain – I was just dizzy.

My eyes couldn’t focus. A sense of peace poured through me; forgiving all that had been done. I’d be free soon, I thought. I smiled and hoped at this very moment Steve and Max were smiling with me, feeling more alive now than ever before.

We'd be free soon.

Read More: The 15 Magical Years of Womanhood

Dean Shaw

Dean Shaw is an aspiring novelist who enjoys fictionalizing social constructs with satire and laughing at the ensuing hate mail. He thinks people are becoming bigger pussies by the day but keeps it to himself for the most part.

Orally Raping A Man Won’t Get You Indicted In America

May 12, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Texas, supposedly America’s most patriarchal state, doesn’t believe a woman should be indicted for orally raping a man while he was asleep. She is now a free woman after a grand jury “no billed” the case. Prosecutors had no choice but to dismiss the already weak (relative to the allegations) charges against her.

Megan Rae Davis, who additionally goes by Megan Hoelting and presumably “Walking Pussy Pass,” admitted that she broke into the home of her husband’s friend in the middle of night and wrapped her legs around him in bed. The alleged victim went further, asserting that he felt his penis being put in Davis’ mouth. Considering that Davis gripped her legs around the man, clearly a sexual act, Davis sexually assaulted him from the outset, even if we gave her the benefit of the doubt over the oral rape (which I won’t be doing). When the man came to, he found Davis astride him, only “dressed” in her panties.

Although The Huffington Post carried the original story of Davis’ arrest in October 2014, the situation has been largely or completely ignored by the bigger outlets, especially when the case was thrown out recently. After the feminist and mainstream media outrage which accompanied the thirty day sentence for (male) teacher rapist Stacey Rambold, he was re-sentenced to fifteen years, including five suspended.

It beggars belief, despite the admittedly very serious nature of Rambold’s crime, that Davis’ free ride in the justice system should be incongruently kept out of the major media spotlight. A victim is a victim. Unless you’re a man, I suppose.

But when a man is accused?

Beneath every self-entitled new bride like Megan Rae Davis lies a meth addict-looking woman waiting to jump out from all the make-up.

Men are regularly tried and convicted with no evidence other than the testimony of the woman alleging rape or sexual assault. Many times both parties are agreed that the defendant or pre-trial accused was not trespassing when the alleged crime took place. Contrasting this, Megan Rae Davis has admitted that she illegally forced her way into the home of the man.

By itself, this is more concrete evidence or overall context than the majority of sexual assault cases leveled against male accused, yet Davis still gets her pussy pass. A girl's gotta do what a girl's gotta do, right? I guess that now includes sexually assaulting your husband's friend when you get the "sexual munchies."

Davis is also a living embodiment of criminal dysfunction. In the same month she sexually assaulted the man, she had three other encounters with police. Once again, the justice system enables such women to get away with obvious contraventions of the law. Any time spent "languishing" in the county lock-up is just the "pause button" before they're released and can re-ingrain themselves back to their "normal" life of playing the gender card.

As the evidentiary standards for men accused of sexual crimes in both colleges and courts continue to be watered-down, women like Davis avoid even the specter of actual sexual assault charges. When finally confronted by the law over the break-in, the charges she faced included attempted sexual assault.

What threshold does a woman have to cross to be accused of a sexual assault, rather than its attempt? As you might have read in past weeks, women like braindead "comedienne" Farah Brook are excused for sexual assault and harassment by kissing while men are arrested and convicted for trying it.

Praise be to the Internet

I hope Megan Rae Davis is putting these REAL photos of herself on Tinder, along with the moniker “Texan Sexual Deviant Girl”.

The glory of our technological age is that we can make examples of these women. There are undoubtedly many people, in Davis’ own community to boot, who will make excuses for her, fail to reevaluate any good opinions they previously had of her, and all-round rationalize what she did (“it wasn’t really sexual assault anyway”).

Yet large swathes of others, both nearby and far away from her, will gossip about her, chide her actions, mock and exclude her. This is what we want. Although a far cry from true justice, the exposure of terrible, sociopathic human beings like Davis is creating waves.

Importantly, women like Davis are highly superficial, unintelligent and vacuous. Her booking photos, which make her look like a meth addict, are probably to her the worst things to come out of this case. It certainly isn’t the dignity, wellbeing, and rights of her victim, or the feelings of her cuckolded husband. To the internet, Davis’ actions have announced, “I’m a sexual deviant slut.” And now we know that, sans make-up, she looks like one, too.

Where art thou, Senator Kirsten Gillibrand?

"I'm not normally a praying man, but if you're up there, please save me, Senator Gillibrand."

I will presume professional superheroes like New York Senator Kirsten Gillibrand utilize a pre-1845 map of America which does not include Texas. Once they finally figure out that Texas is indeed a state within the Union, they'll surely arrive on the scene in the interest of fairness to all sexual assault victims. Davis' victim will be invited to the State of the Union address next year as Gillibrand's guest and she'll spend countless hours advocating on his and other men's behalf.

Or not.

The massive let off for Megan Rae Davis underscores that all men within our special community must contribute to the outing, shaming, and misery of women who escape proper legal sanction via the gender card. Every time, era, and epoch has its builders and protectors of justice. We, my friends, are those men, wearing today's clothes.

Read More: Why Black America Must Be Careful

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 College Mistakes You Should Avoid

May 13, 2015 | by Henrick Fir | Link | Original Link

A lot of people seem to be setting themselves up badly for life. The amount of stories I have heard about (usually art history, womens studies, philosophy, etc) grad students having to work in jobs such as flipping burgers, working as gallery assistants, or as janitors, has partially prompted me to write this article.

A disclaimer, of sorts, first. I fully appreciate (firsthand) that it’s never too late to turn things around. A casual search online will show you many people who decide to become a doctor in their late 30s and early 40s. With drive and ambition, these things are possible. But this article is not for those people. This article is for the young people out there who havent really dedicated themselves to any career path yet, and want to make the best decision they can.

1. Don’t rush, and get some experience first

Its easy to feel the pressure to go as soon as you're out of high school. Pressure from your parents, pressure from your friends, pressure from society. But you need to be brighter than that—you need to realize the time to go is when YOU are ready, not when its expected for you to go.

At ages 18-21 you pretty much know jack shit. Some of you will have a bit more life experience, some of you will be more well read, some of you will be a bit wiser. But you all know very little about yourselves. You might have a roundabout idea of your interests and passions, but you simply will not know yet by that stage in life what you want to be doing as a career.

Get a job. Go and work in the Police. Be an EMT. Do a bit of construction work. Try working your way up to becoming a manager at a retail store. Start looking for work in a field that you are curious about, and which will complement your long term ambitions. This has several purposes

a) You prepare yourself for working in this field in the long run

b) You get to find out if you like that line of work at all to begin with

Case in point, I worked as a beat cop for a while when I was 19-20. It was amazing, and helped me develop my character and personality. But it also helped me learn: it doesn't suit me. I don't even like interacting with people all that much. It helped me realize I needed to look for a different line of work. Without that experience, I wouldnt have learned about my weaknesses.

2. Treat college seriously

Dont waste more time watching nonsense on youtube than you absolutely have to

So, you've finally decided to make the decision. You have a good idea of what you want to do in life. Good for you. But you need to now completely dedicate yourself to that path if you want to have a good start, and become the top of your field.

College is a several-year-long job training course. If you pass it well enough, you'll get into your field of choice. Be lazy, procrastinate, lose sight of your goal—and you're not going to make it. All you're doing is wasting time and money that you could have been spending on your first investments or developing yourself in different ways.

People—Americans especially—need to lose this idea that college is a place you go to have fun. If you want entertainment, you go to a circus or a comedy club. College is a place you are accumulating the knowledge and experience to work in your chosen field. So dedicate yourself completely and utterly; anything less than the top grades is unacceptable. Limit your dicking around to one day a week, or save it altogether until you're done.

3. Don't specialize in the wrong thing

When you start thinking about which specialization you want to take in life, don't just look at what draws you. Thats only half the equation. You need to research and fully understand the job opportunities that are out there.

Case in point, physiotherapy. Many people go down this route due to their interest in health science and exercise (hey, both are interesting, what could go wrong?), but end up disappointed by the job prospects. They end up frustrated by the limitations placed upon their practice. If they did their research, they would have realized nursing is in more demand than ever, has a lot of overlap, and has greater long-term career potential.

Its absolutely crucial that you check whether the career path you are studying towards is in demand. Colleges wont care; they get your cash and then you're out the door. They have no interest either way in ensuring you pick a good major, only that you pick SOMETHING. You need to be careful with an institution like this.

Use websites like: http://www.bls.gov/ooh/ To check what the prospects are for any field you choose to go down. Choose wisely, or you might be making a mistake that at best will set you back for years.

4. Don't needlessly pay for your degree

	Class of 2010			Class of 2019
	Percentages		Females per	Percentages		Females per
Degrees	Male	Female	100 Males	Male	Female	100 Males
Associate's	37.7%	62.3%	166	34.9%	65.1%	187
Bachelor's	42.6%	57.4%	135	40.8%	59.2%	145
Master's	39.7%	60.3%	152	37.9%	62.1%	164
Professional	50.6%	49.4%	98	49.0%	51.0%	104
Doctor's	48.4%	51.6%	107	45.1%	54.9%	122
All Degrees	41.2%	58.8%	143	39.1%	60.9%	156

Whilst it may seem as if the choice is strictly either going to work or going to college, there are some opportunities out there that are a lot more attractive than either of these. There are training opportunities out there that will pay you a wage whilst you study, pay the cost of your certification, and guarantee you a job at the end of it. Some even pay for your accommodation whilst you study.

My personal experience has been with the Merchant Navy, an interesting and unusual line of work. Shipping companies are so starved for deck—and ESPECIALLY engineering—officers aboard their ships, they will bend over backwards to help you enter the industry. As long as you can pass an interview and display some cursory knowledge of maritime life, these companies will pay you a wage to study at a Nautical College to obtain a degree in the field.

These opportunities normally obligate you to work a minimum number of years in the field (three being a common number that I have seen) for the company to see a return, so just bear that in mind.

There are similar opportunities in many fields, from accountancy to paramedic science. I shouldn't have to emphasize how attractive they are compared with the average rudderless teenager's chosen college path.

Read More: 10 Things Every College Student Needs To Know

Henrick Fir

Henrick is a busy man. Occasionally he takes a break away to post unsolicited advice.

Conservatives Win UK General Election, Causing Laurie Penny And Other Leftists To Lose Their Minds

May 13, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Britain's Conservative Party won Thursday's UK General Election, taking a majority of 331 out of 650 seats in the House of Commons, the elected lower house of Britain's Parliament. The result is a shock to Labour, who lost 24 seats after a landslide victory for the Scottish National Party (SNP) in Scotland, and a complete holocaust for the Liberal Democrats, who were stripped of a whopping 48 seats, and now have only 8 MP's in the House.

The reactionary United Kingdom Independence party (UKIP) fared more poorly than expected, and have only one MP rather than the expected three. Despite bias against the party in the liberal metropolitan media, UKIP accrued a total of four million votes. Their leader Nigel Farage's abortive resignation signals the arrival of a party on the up which offers a policy alternative to the mindless Equality agenda of the other Three.

The British Left, delighted as they were with UKIP's disappointment, reacted with predictable violence to David Cameron's return to Downing Street, smashing up the streets and desecrating a war memorial. The Left wing commentariat, having prematurely trumpeted a Labour victory and Cameron's demise, either had nothing to say about the violence or, like the execrable Laurie Penny, actively condoned it.

Champagne socialists, frappuccino feminists

Laurie Penny: a smug, screeching, sanctimonious rent-a-gob of the British Left.

Laurie Penny, Socialist gobshite par excellence, was in the mood for grotesque melodrama even before the final result, tweeting:

> Please everyone take care of each other tonight. So many are already close to losing hope. Reach out to that friend. I mean it. #GE0215
>
> — Laurie Penny (@PennyRed) May 7, 2015

Leftists living in comfortably-off Britain on the eve of a Conservative election victory in 2015 are, judging by the tone of Ms Penny, in a predicament not far off that of German Jews on the eve of Kristallnacht. Following the result, Penny Red, as she is known on Twitter, continued Tweeting in the similar, characteristic vein of the overgrown student Marxist, most likely from the comfort of a Heal's armchair, mug of fairtrade cocoa in hand:

> Only a radical coalition of those whose interests are not represented by the neoliberal elite can possibly stand against them now. — Laurie Penny (@PennyRed) May 8, 2015

As responding tweeters rightly pointed out, Laurie Penny belongs to the very self-same liberal elite. She spews her mock-Revolutionary guff from the cushy offices of the Guardian, ensconced in sumptuous modern architecture in trendy Kings Cross.

Democracy is great, as long as the party I like gets in

Not long after the issuance of Laurie Penny's online flatulences, anti-austerity protesters descended on Downing Street. Their campaign was tweeted under the hashtag #ToriesOutNow, signalling open disdain for the democratic process which put the Tories back in office. Presumably no protest would have materialised had Labour won the election and had Marxist intellectual's son and test-tube politician Ed Miliband taken office.

London's police arrested 15, with 14 people released on bail pending a review of CCTV. A 24-year-old was denied bail after being arrested on suspicion of assaulting police. The tolerant, socially just protesters even found it in their tolerant selves to spray garish red graffiti on a Women's War Memorial. Ever the energetic self-publicist, Laurie Penny quickly waded in to offer moral support for the vandals:

Laurie Penny: “I don’t have a problem with this.”

> I don’t have a problem with this. The bravery of past generations does not oblige us to be cowed today. https://t.co/QS6Oq55n5q
>
> — Laurie Penny (@PennyRed) May 9, 2015

@PennyRed further scraped the barrel with a red herring served up with characteristic chutzpah:

> No, what’s disgusting is that some people are more worried about a war memorial than the destruction of the welfare state. — Laurie Penny (@PennyRed) May 9, 2015

Penny’s stance even had the support of another public paragon of moral virtue. Charlie Gilmour, the son of Pink Floyd guitarist David Gilmour, who received a 16-month prison sentence for swinging from the Cenotaph at a protest in 2010. He spoke thusly:

> Can see why people upset by this but the women of WWII – who saw the birth of the welfare state – would probs agree pic.twitter.com/9B4vOQAXwX
>
> — Charlie Gilmour (@charliegilmour) May 9, 2015

Charlie Gilmour: a wealthy and privileged left-wing twit.

People who live in glass houses shouldn't throw stones

The backlash from the right wing press was more subdued than one might have expected.The Daily Mail simply pointed out that Ms. Penny has a very privileged background, having been privately educated before going to Oxford. Her expensive and elitist education, they said, should have instilled in her a little more awareness of the sacrifices of previous generations. Penny's response was more SJW melodrama.

> Hey, thanks to everyone sending messages of support. I'm fine. Just wish the Daily Fail had picked a nicer picture for their troll piece!
>
> — Laurie Penny (@PennyRed) May 11, 2015

Note the Social Justice Warrior hallmark hamstering, referring to any critical opinion as "trolling." The SJW hamster will spin into oblivion to reframe any opposition as a mental pathology in the same way the Soviets would have done. A further hallmark is the melodrama of mental harm that Laurie Penny might have to endure as a result of the Daily Mail writing about her. "I'm fine," she says, as if she were a woman that had narrowly avoided a brutal rape in a back-alley.

Why the Left are right in one respect about this general election

The Left's reaction to the British public returning a Conservative majority to government betrays their lack of integrity. If a Labour had come to power, even backed by a coalition with the SNP or Liberal Democrats, no one would have heard a peep out of Socialist Worker and other assorted miscreants clogging up Whitehall with their placards this week. This is in spite of Shadow Chancellor Ed Balls admitting before the election that Labour would have to make £5bn in budget cuts were they to come to power.

Part of the reason for this is that many left wing militant groups are allied to the Labour party. Nigel Farage has spoken of his harassment at the hands of groups like Unite Against Fascism and Hope Not Hate. The left wing extremist organisations, which masquerade under the guise of legitimate “anti-racist” activism, are patronised by senior Labour figures.

Major public sector unions are also said to exercise a stranglehold over Labour, which depends on trade unions for 80% of its funding. Unite and Unison are ever-present at protests against cuts in public sector funding.

Considering the incestuous links between the so-called centre left of the mainstream Parliamentary Labour Party and the ever-more extreme groups like Socialist Worker towards the fringes, the motivation for this week’s protests are nakedly obvious. Parasites-on-the-state are anxious to send a message to the new government that they shall not be denied their right to a perpetual comfortable living funded by the taxpayer.

There was one picture from the protests, however, that I was utterly in agreeance with:

It is clear that 37%, the Conservative share, of 66%, the turnout for the General Election, is not a majority, and that in effect the tail is wagging the dog as political disengagement and a peculiar voting system is handing power to a numerical minority.

Britain’s First Past The Post electoral system means a parliamentary seat can be won by any majority, be it one or ten thousand. For example, at this Election, UKIP racked up four million votes and got only one MP, while the SNP have 56 seats with just under 1.5 million votes.

To this extent, the Conservative majority is indeed not a majority at all, and the protesters are entitled to reject the authority of the government, even if in law they have no recourse other than to campaign for electoral reform.

But what of UKIP’s four million votes and only one MP? Where are the voices of protest from the left? Four million Brits are left disenfranchised without adequate representation, and not a peep from these people’s champions.

The uncomfortable truth is that for the Left, all votes are equal, but some votes are more equal than others. Nigel Farage has likened UKIP to the Tea Party, standing up for Brits who are “overtaxed, overgoverned, [and] not being listened to.” The emphasis UKIP has placed on the desirability small government, national sovereignty and an unwillingness to be overrun by the latest demands issued by the SJW mob was never going to sit well with collectivist fanatics like Laurie Penny.

Leftists will switch positions at the drop of a hat, as and when it suits them.
British Democracy is perfectly OK as long as it produces a Left-wing government, or as long as it disenfranchises reactionary, traditionalist voters like those that follow UKIP.

Fortunately, a buffoon like Laurie Penny strays into the realm of the comical so often that nobody outside the lunatic fringe of differently-abled otherkins and empowered post-wall womyn buy her schtick.

Read Next: FEMEN’s Silence During The Ukraine Conflict Shows Their Anti-Male Agenda

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

Use The “One Strike” Rule To Improve Your Dating Life

May 13, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

When you are interacting with women, and in particular with a new woman who you’ve just met, you must think carefully, decide how much you are willing to put up with, and ensure that you are not being taken for a ride.

I would like to propose you adopt the “one strike” rule—that is, a rule that states you cut a new woman off immediately as soon as she makes a mistake or does something that pisses you off. Perhaps this seems unduly harsh, but I believe in today’s dating market there are good reasons for guys to adhere to it strictly.

Men should not put up with flakey behaviour. It’s annoying, it can be emotionally bruising, but worst of all it’s time consuming. That thirty minutes you spent waiting for a girl to turn up for your first date would have been better spent reading a book, sending out invoices for your business, or working on other prospects.

The fact is that we are often blinded by women’s beauty to such an extent that we forget what our real priorities are—ourselves, our livelihoods, and our health. Woman should be there primarily as a form of entertainment: the dessert, rather than the main course.

A while ago I met a hot Moldovan girl on the subway in London. We got chatting and I elicited her phone number pretty easily. If you’ve ever met a girl from Moldova then you’ll know how hot they can be, and this one — I’ll call her Veronica — certainly didn’t disappoint. With long dark hair, a round, doll-like face and an intriguingly curvy body beneath her tight grey stretch-dress she was exactly my type, and an eight at least on my scale.

We went out for drinks. Using my now trademarked ‘date’ formula, I got her back to my place and all but naked pretty easily. Unfortunately, for whatever reason, she didn’t want to go the whole way that night and so I was unable to seal the deal. Actually, that was fine with me—I was tired, had work the next day and was more than happy to call it a night.

The other thing is that quite frequently girls of Russian or Moldovan extraction are less than willing to give up the goods so soon. But had I taken my own advice, I should have cut her off there and then. The issue was not so much that she had not slept with me—which was fine—but more that she had given me blue balls all night and kept me up late for no purpose.

The problem is that girls can be a narcotic if you're not careful. Take one hit and you want to smoke the whole pipe, so to speak. Against my better judgement I agreed to meet Veronika for another drink. After hanging around for nearly twenty minutes it became apparent that she wasn't going to turn up.

Sure enough, an hour later when I was back home I received a message from her asking if I was still out. Despite her extreme tardiness, she had actually expected me to still be there waiting for her.

I got taken for a sucker. It happens, even after many years in game. Unfortunately things sometimes don't gel with a particular girl, or logistics don't work out, or she'll turn out to have been a time waster all along. It's just the way things are. Of course, as soon as I received that last text message I deleted her phone number and never spoke to her again. The lesson is that I should have done it sooner after the blue balls incident in my room.

If a woman is difficult and unforthcoming at the beginning, then you can be sure as hell that things will only get worse as your interaction continues, whether it be over days, weeks or months. Save yourself the trouble and employ the one strike rule—ditch her early so you can work on other prospects.

Remember that one of the cornerstones of game is developing a sense of abundance. Ideally you will have other girls on the go who you can use as substitutes, but if you don't, remember how many billions of women there are in the world apart from her.

Life is too short, and time too precious to hold on to a prospect that is clearly bad from the start when there are many other out there just waiting for you to approach them.

Read More: Seven Tips For Building A Harem

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

“Real Housewives” Promote The Rise Of The Sexually Aggressive Aging Woman

May 14, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

You’ve probably seen her at the grocery store, hair dyed to hide the grey, designer sunglasses to disguise the wrinkles around her eyes, boob job, and skin-tight yoga pants worn without underwear. A man can be fooled from afar. But up close you realize she’s just another sexually aggressive aging female.

What is the sexually aggressive aging female? It first rose to the forefront of the public consciousness about ten years ago when Demi Moore shockingly nabbed Ashton Kutcher, who is fifteen years her junior, as her boyfriend and eventually her husband. Feminists touted this as a victory for womankind.

At last, women were free to imitate men and pursue much younger mates. It was the dawn of a glorious new age.

Demi Moore

Of course, the relationship lasted only seven years and ended in an awkward divorce. Kutcher started to date his former That 70s Show co-star Mila Kunis even before his divorce was finalized. He eventually ended up marrying Kunis, who happens to be six years younger than he is.

The phenomenon of older women chasing much younger men was dubbed the cougar effect. Feminists celebrate cougars as being strong, confident, empowered, and enlightened women. The reality, though, is that many of these women are just angry divorcees who are desperately trying to regain their confidence by checking their dignity at the door and whoring it up like drunken strippers on spring break.

“Cougar” is really an inappropriate term to describe these women. Real cougars are beautiful and deadly felines. But these women are aggressive, unattractive, and delusional harpies.

Real harpies of New York City

Carole Radziwill

Recently I sat down to watch television with my wife. Even though she is an otherwise decent and intelligent woman, she happened to be watching the Bravo reality show, Real Housewives of New York City. Interestingly enough, the majority of the cast seemed to embody this aggressive aging female archetype. Even my wife was appalled at the shameless behavior of cast.

After ten minutes of watching the show, here's what I discovered. These aging slags are raunchy. In a conversation between Bethenny Frankel (failed talk show host and Skinny Girl cocktail mogul) and Sonja Morgan (ex-wife of a J.P. Morgan heir), both women boasted about the glories of getting "shit faced and pounded hard," after a bad divorce.

Morgan added that she only swallows for guys with a Black card. Frankel is in her 40s and Morgan is in her 50s, and both are parents to young girls. Way to set a great example, ladies.

Sonja Morgan – A desperate cry for attention

In another vignette, the women went clubbing at a trendy New York hotspot and managed to land some 23-year-old men. While the men seemed to be of dubious sexual orientation, the implication was that women brought these men home and had sex with them.

In a particularly pathetic conversation, NY housewife and princess Carole Radziwill boasted that she used to be the fit model for Jordache Jeans to the befuddled looks of the young men, who had clearly never heard of the brand that was popular before they were born.

It seems the entire cast of this show is nothing but a bunch of sexually aggressive aging females. In February, the New York Post reported that another NY housewife, Countess Luann de Lesseps, went clubbing with two of her co-stars from the show.

Countess Luann and Carole Radziwill partying with some “lucky” young guy

While at the club, de Lesseps allegedly “met a hot, younger guy.” They must have liked each other because “it turned into 40 minutes of making out and groping.” The Countess was “leaning on him, making out like she was a shark devouring her prey. She was a foot taller than he was.” Supposedly, she left with him later and engaged in more making out outside the club.

You may have noticed that some of these women have titles of nobility. Why would an otherwise cultured woman debase herself in this way?

Science-denying progressives

Screeching as usual

The whole sexually aggressive aging female phenomenon exists because feminists refuse to accept a basic fact of human biology: sex is designed for the propagation of the species and a woman’s sexual market value (SMV) is dependent on her fertility.

Feminists want you to believe that women reach their “sexual peak” (whatever that is) at age 36, and that they only get better after that. The truth is that by age 36, a woman’s SMV will start declining quickly as her fertility begins to drop off precipitously.

Women reach their peak fertility in their early twenties. Not surprisingly, the average age of a Playboy playmate is 22 because that is what men find most attractive. As a woman’s looks slowly start to decline in her late twenties, she will gradually become less appealing to men.

The uncomfortable corollary to a woman’s SMV being based on her fertility is that most men will no longer find postmenopausal women sexually appealing. You can think of menopause as “the wall,” although some women hit the wall sooner.

Of course, I am not implying that postmenopausal women have no value whatsoever, only that they will not stir a man's libido as they did while they were in their twenties or thirties. This is true even for women who stay fit and take care of themselves.

The women of the Real Housewives of New York City have been duped into believing the feminist lie that biology is infinitely malleable—we can be whatever we want to be. A 50-year-old woman can be just as sexually attractive to men as a 22-year-old woman if she thinks she is sexy. She just needs to be confident and aggressive!

How a healthy society works

Ozzie and Harriet

The interesting thing about the phenomenon is that nobody except feminist theorists and media liberals really want it. Men don't want to bone old women. Children don't want their mother (or grandmother) talking about how she likes to get shitfaced and pounded hard by random men. And surveys show that even women themselves would prefer to date a man who is a few years older than they are.

By acting like old whores, they are simply trying to conform themselves to the diktats of our SJW masters. If we lived in a healthy society, we would not have the problem of women of a certain age hanging around bars trying to pick up young guys, and the Housewives of New York would not have to engage in degrading behavior.

In a traditional society, women would marry in their early twenties while they were still at the top of their game so that they could attract the best possible man. They wouldn't ride the cock carousel throughout their twenties and early thirties only to find out that they've become unmarriageable due to low SMV.

Marriage would be "till death do us part" except for extreme circumstances. Divorce would be frowned upon by society and difficult to obtain. There would be no such thing as "no fault divorce."

This would solve the problem of wives being dumped by their husbands once they hit the wall. It would also solve the problem of men being divorced and stuck with child support because their aging wives have lost their minds after reading Eat, Pray, Fuck.

I think the current order will eventually collapse, and a healthy society will rise from the rubble. Until that happens, don't be surprised if somebody's grandma hits on you in the grocery store.

Read More: 7 Risk-Reducing Tactics For The Sexually Promiscuous Man

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Females Have To Earn Your Respect

May 14, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

“Mommy, I want to play ball with the boys”, said six-year-old Annie, in a tone of voice that was rapidly approaching the dreaded high-pitched whine. “You will, my dear, I will make them”, said her weight-challenged mom as she turned towards the pair of laughing teenage boys that were throwing a ball back and forth in the nearby cul-de-sac.

“NICKY! DANIEL! Annie wants to play ball with you! You better play with her and behave, otherwise I swear to God, I will tell your mothers!” bellowed the mother hen at the boys.

The feathered police

As soon as Annie joined the game, the boys’ behavior changed dramatically. They were expected to accept Annie as their equal, which she obviously wasn’t. The ball was no longer thrown or punted with any considerable force, lest little Annie trip herself up and kiss the ground.

Instead, the ball was passed along or gently rolled on the ground. Meanwhile, the mother hen perched herself high on the balcony overlooking the neighborhood, seated on what must have been a titanium-reinforced chair, and occasionally shouted orders.

“What did the patriarchy do to you, my dear?”

The first thing Annie did was make sure nobody possessed the ball—everyone had to have exactly equal time with it, and in a specific order. The purpose of this forced sharing was so that nobody had their feelings hurt in any way by being left out. The game was no longer about competition, it was about participation.

Of course, boys grew tired of her rules immediately but still went along with the charade because it seemed like the path of least resistance.

What is going on here?

If you’ve spent any amount of time in a Western country, you must have seen something like this unfold right in front of your eyes. You might have been involved in such occurrences and yielded to women without thinking twice. Besides, it can seem so natural when you’re immersed in a gynocentric culture on a daily basis. Women are people too, right? Why not treat them with the same respect men get?

The problem is that women lack accountability and will always superimpose their inner realities upon the outside world, rather than the other way around. Ignoring objective reality usually comes at a great price, but women offload the cost onto unsuspecting men, dragging them down into the darkness.

If a woman was given free reign over the Garden of Eden, she would ruin it for everyone. Want proof? Allow me to go biblical for just a second and quote Genesis 3:13 :

13 Then the LORD God said to the woman, "What is this you have done?"

The woman said, "The serpent deceived me, and I ate."

Note the deflection of responsibility – the woman hasn't done anything wrong, it's the snake's fault for presenting her with a temptation she couldn't resist. Now, the Bible shouldn't be taken literally, but the fact that a 3,400 year old book talks so frankly about the true nature of women is astounding.

In fact, everything else in the Bible pales in comparison to that one verse and is pretty much tainted by a needless religious subtext. That one sentence is a warning from ages past—anything can be destroyed by putting a woman in charge and letting her have an "oopsie" moment.

So, how does this translate to our times? The root of all problems with women is that they are entitled, which means they want respect and attention they don't deserve. Girls are carefully groomed from the early childhood to believe themselves to be perfect. When left unchallenged, this attitude eventually turns them into a black hole wherein all resources and attention disappear.

A boy who tries to do the same thing as Annie would be rightfully called "spoiled" and quickly humbled by his friends or his brother, if he has them.

It is your duty to call out female entitlement when you see it and spread awareness of this phenomenon, sharing your insights alongside it. Humbling a woman will generally cause a wave of triggering to occur among perennially butthurt SJWs, but it is the only way to stop females from being a liability, not just on you, but on the entire society.

If a woman still refuses to change her ways, don't give her your respect or attention and simply move on.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Not Date Indian Girls

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

3 Ways A Liberal Arts Major Can Start A Badass Business

May 14, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by BADNET

Ok. You got screwed by a bad degree. And you've heard it from everywhere by now.

- "Your degree sucks!"
- "Go back and get a real degree!"
- "You'll never make as much as a doctor!"

You know you're destined for more than flipping burgers or rotating tires. You've got success written all over you. You've got to turn those classroom skills into some real dollars. But how?

The answer, my friend is easy. It's as simple as finding a need, and filling it.

Case 1: The Music Major

Let's take a professionally trained singer. Rather than spend all your life waiting tables, how about taking the skill you've honed over the years and turn it into some cash?

"Oh," you say, "Nobody wants to learn how to sing opera."

That's fine though. Not many people want to sing opera. But opera is not all you can do. In fact, you have a very useful talent that's not only in demand, but well-paid. That is vocal enhancement.

Instead of selling, "learn how to sing opera," which nobody wants, you could instead offer a very targeted service that improves a specific domain. Something that gives a result within one session and creates a tangible change in the buyer. How about something like, "Make your voice low, growly, and manly within minutes."

Plenty of guys out there I know are insecure about their voices and would like to have a more classically manly voice. Or how about something like, "Got an upcoming speech to deliver? Vocal confidence for public speaking within one session." You've just turned your "useless" skill into a business with a functional benefit to thousands of people.

Case 2: The Biology Major

Biology may seem like a pretty strange field to profit from. You've got to have a lab and grant money to do anything real with that knowledge, don't you?

No, you do not.

Better still, biological knowledge meets a fundamental human need (that's often left out of Maslow's hierarchy).

The need to connect with nature.

So who is it that most needs to connect with nature? Maybe city dwellers who work round the clock? So here's an idea: custom-designed plant and flower arrangements for city highrises.

You get contracts with the movers and shakers (who are rarely in their condos,) and design plant arrangements that not only fit their space and personality, but that have functional benefits as well. Ever been in a polluted metropolitan area, and then escaped to the countryside? You know what a difference it makes to your lungs.

So you can not only sell the personalized to your space angle, but also the improve your health angle.

For instance, you might include a few Sansevieria trifasciata, or "mother-in-law's tongue" plants – one of the best plants for small spaces because it rejuvenates the air and cleans it of toxins. You get one of these contracts, and they'll start to talk to their friends about that smart young lad who made their air cleaner, and their apartment look like a real urban jungle.

What's more, you could even sell ongoing contracts and hire out labor to your favorite immigrants to take care of the watering and maintenance while you go sell more.

Case 3: The History Major

By now you're beginning to see that your degree doesn't necessarily give you the direct skills required to build a business, but it can give you an interesting angle. Now we'll go to the last example, a history major.

If this is you, you may think you have no useful skills. But that's far from the truth. In fact you have one very useful skill.

You have the ability to take lots of information (often from conflicting sources) and turn it into something clear and concise.

That's all writing an essay is. So what's a field that's rife with conflicting (and confusing) advice? Well how about nutrition?

Sure, you could start an everyday nutrition blog. That would use your writing skills, but let's say you wanted to put a historical slant on it. You could explore topics like "Recipes Your Great-Grandmother Made (That Were Healthier Than Anything Today)"

Could do very well with certain audiences, (such as most of the women cooking in the world).

They want to respect their heritage. You want to make some dough.

So you start digging up ancient recipe books. There are a ton of these old cookbooks available if you peek around for them, but they often need to be translated for modern times. They might call for huge quantities (designed for feeding an army, or a large family). They might require ingredients that are hard to find nowadays (elk liver). Or they might use cooking methods that would seem crude compared to modern methods (such as fermentation in urine… really).

So you write them up for modern times, explaining the nutritional benefits of using ancient methods and ingredients, while offering them in easy-to-use recipes.

That's easily a 5-figure business right there. Combine the "heritage" angle with your powerful writing skills, and this could be a very profitable business.

Best of all, these are all untapped.

No one has really cornered the market on these niches. In fact, people are just beginning to dig in to some of these more profitable angles. That could be you.

But one thing's for sure, if you don't go ahead and get yourself set up with a domain name and a website soon, it might be too late to make these (or other businesses).

To get started with a free domain name and a website on the world's most powerful open-source software, head over to BADNET.

It's a free service where we set you up with a ready-to-use website within 48 hours. You just pay hosting.

That's less than $5/month to run a real business.

Or do you prefer working for your boss?

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Toronto Man Wrongly Fired From Job After “F Her Right In The Pussy” Incident

May 15, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

While we’re accustomed to people having their lives torn apart by angry Twitter lynch mobs over things they’ve said, sometimes you don’t even have to do that much to lose your job. Witness Shawn Simoes, a Toronto man who was fired from his job at Ontario electricity company Hydro One after he was involved in a “FHRITP” (Fuck Her Right In The Pussy) incident with CityNews reporter Shauna Hunt:

> Shawn Simoes didn’t even have to say the words.
>
> The soccer fan who used vulgar language with CityNews reporter Shauna Hunt in a “FHRITP” video has been fired from his high-paying job at crown corporation Hydro One, Toronto Sun reporter Jenny Yuen tweeted Tuesday.

As the HuffPo report acknowledges, Simoes wasn’t the one who actually yelled “fuck her right in the pussy” at Hunt; his involvement was limited to explaining why he thought it was funny. In the video, Simoes is the man at the end wearing the yellow Fly Emirates shirt:

Additionally, Simoes didn’t volunteer the information himself: Hunt asked him questions and he gave her answers, which is what people who are interviewed by journalists are supposed to do.

Simoes’ termination for simply answering a reporter’s questions honestly—not even engaging in questionable conduct himself, but being asked about questionable conduct—represent a new low for Western society. While online SJW lynch mobs have been enforcing crowdsourced censorship on individuals for a while now, Simoes’ firing shows that if you’re merely in the vicinity of someone they dislike, you’ll get the boot.

A Brief History Of A Dumb Meme

For those unaware, "Fuck Her Right in the Pussy" is an Internet meme that began last year as an Internet hoax. A number of videos surfaced that showed a man named "Fred" purportedly videobombing local news reporters by shouting "fuck her right in the pussy" in an attempt to embarrass them:

Since then, the meme has gone worldwide, with numerous pranksters shouting it at newscasters and TV reporters. Just yesterday, CBC Calgary reported that a man who yelled "fuck her right in the pussy" at a reporter was charged with stunting, a traffic-related offense in Alberta.

While I think yelling obscenities at a reporter trying to do her job is disrespectful and stupid, slapping FHRITP pranksters with bogus traffic tickets or getting them fired from their jobs is by far the greater evil. Trying to steal attention away from a journalist in the middle of a story is a narcissistic and moronic act, but it's ultimately one that doesn't hurt anyone, unless you consider bruised feelings to be some kind of palpable harm.

More importantly, Shawn Simoes was not the man who yelled "fuck her right in the pussy" on camera. His "crime" was trying to explain to Shauna Hunt why he thought it was funny. He's being punished for his honesty and for actually doing what the reporter asked of him. Him losing his job over this is so ludicrous and absurd that it reads like the beginning of a Terry Gilliam movie.

Don't Fear The Penis

A large part of the overreaction to FHRITP is driven by young women's fear of male sexuality. A recent CBC article on the phenomenon of "Fuck Her Right in the Pussy" incidents brims with so much misandry that it could have been published by Jezebel or The Guardian:

> "For people who are aware of the internet phenomenon, it might have seemed like a rude joke. But I hadn't seen the videos online, so I felt shocked and violated by the words. It felt personal. Not just a catchphrase, but more of a taunt suggesting that the men around me, instead of talking to me, should be, you know, raping me," Birkbeck wrote.
>
> "My reaction was visceral. People around me stopped and stared. I felt totally exposed."

As idiotic as yelling "fuck her right in the pussy" is while a reporter is covering a story, at the end of the day, it's just six words. Yet these women are acting as if they were bent over a chair and violently sodomized. It's unsurprising that the reporter who became famous for "fighting back" against these incidents is a fat girl from Toronto, one of the most feminist cities in the world.

This discomfort with and fear of normal, healthy masculinity is what drives Western feminism and female dysfunction in general. For example, the agita against "manspreading" on the New York City Subway is driven by young womens' fear of coming into contact with strange men. Girls in New York are so lacking in social skills that they can't simply ask a guy who's taking up too much space for their liking if they can sit down next to him: they have to bully a government agency into doing it for them.

Western girls' sudden fear of male sexuality is the product of how they are raised. In contrast to more traditional cultures, where boys and girls are raised as part of an integrated family unit, American (and Canadian) children are raised in age- and gender-segregated bubbles. At the same time, girls are fed a constant diet of propaganda teaching them that society is patriarchal and men are evil rapists who are responsible for all their misfortunes.

While it’s unfortunate that girls have to put up with jerks in their day-to-day lives, pinning the blame for their idiocy on men as a whole is unjustified and wrong. More importantly, men whose only crime is being truthful should not be punished for it.

Shawn Simoes should be reinstated to his job and the female reporters losing their minds over “fuck her right in the pussy” need to get some perspective. Words only have as much power as you give them.

Read More: Why You Should Have A “Fuck You” Fund

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Our Call To Boycott Mad Max Movie Spurs Avalanche Of Mainstream Media Anger

May 15, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Men's rights activists call 'Mad Max: Furv Road.' c

On May 11 we published Why You Should Not Go See "Mad Max: Feminist Road" by Aaron Clarey. Since then, dozens of media outlets including CNN, Vice, The Guardian, and Huffington Post have attempted to denounce Clarey's article with snark, feminist logic, and adolescent insults.

Clarey's concerns about Mad Max should be nothing new to ROK readers. Here are two excerpts:

> Fury Road was not going to be a movie made for men. It was going to be a feminist piece of propaganda posing as a guy flick.
>
> […]
>
> So do yourself and all men across the world a favor. Not only REFUSE to see the movie, but spread the word to as many men as possible. Not all of them have the keen eye we do here at ROK. And most will be taken in by fire tornadoes and explosions. Because if they sheepishly attend and Fury Road is a blockbuster, then you, me, and all the other men (and real women) in the world will never be able to see a real action movie ever again that doesn't contain some damn political lecture or moray about feminism, SJW-ing, and socialism.

The article, now with over 3,400 comments, has not blown up organically through social networking, like our previous viral articles, but through deliberate and simultaneous promotion in the Anglosphere media. The articles claim we're wrong to complain about how Hollywood has been co-opted by feminist ideals and is actively using movies and other media as vehicles to program impressionable young people around the world to incorrectly believe that women are physically and mentally equal to men, if not outright superior.

Here's a selection of the more than 25 articles that were written (mostly by women):

Men's rights activists call for boycott of 'Mad Max: Fury Road,' citing feminist agenda (CNN)

> The blog the post is published on is known for trolling feminists. Its "about" page, for example, says, "Women and homosexuals are prohibited from commenting here. They will be immediately banned." The article has received more than 2,000 comments. One commenter wrote, "Women and feminists in general have without a doubt, proven that they are dysfunctional by nature and cannot be trusted with anything. And this movie helps to prove it."

Men's Rights Activists Don't Want You To See 'Mad Max' (Huffington Post)

> Mens rights activists have given you another reason to get excited to see "Mad Max: Fury Road." On a blog called Return of Kings, Aaron Clarey asks men to boycott the film because of all the feminist propaganda. Cool, bro.

Mad men mad at Mad Max for having mad women (AV Club)

> Despite Clarey's warnings about these feminist morays, burrowing in the sands of our action movies and eating all our masculinity and cuttlefish, Fury Road is projected to make around $40 million in its opening weekend. And if that happens, someday, some movies may not even be about men at all.

The 'man-o-sphere' is outraged about Mad Max? Hand me my popcorn! (Guardian)

> Clarey is proposing that the man-o-sphere boycott the film. Which is all the more reason to go, get a large popcorn, satisfied in the knowledge that it's salted with reactionary tears.

Why men's rights activists hate Mad Max: Fury Road (Telegraph)

> Clarey's feelings of betrayal are shared by his commenters. One, who uses the commenting alias of "truth", wrote: "Women and feminists in general have without a doubt, proven that they are dysfunctional by nature and cannot be trusted with anything. And this movie helps to prove it."

'Mad Max: Fury Road' draws the ire of men's rights activists (Daily Dot)

> It must be said that Mad Max isn't without its faults; Clarey rightly pointed out that Ensler isn't exactly the best person to represent sexual enslavement in the Congo. And the film has already come under fire for allegedly having only one non-white actor in the entire movie, despite being filmed on location in Namibia.

This Guy Wants You to Boycott 'Mad Max: Fury Road' Because He Doesn't Like Feminism

(Vice)

> I reached out to Clarey—who also runs a blog called Captain Capitalism—via email with some questions about the boycott, Charlize Theron's mechanical arm, and whether or not explosions were gendered. His initial response was, "You want to get rid of the snark/fake questions and then I'll take you seriously?" Which, fine. Asking if a robot arm is gendered is at least light trolling.

There was a lone favorable article: Why 'Mad Max: Fury Road' is the feminist picture of the year (NY Post).

What should struck you is how similar the articles are to each other. The media we have is one full of "journalists" who essentially plagiarize each other without adding any additional reporting or value. If you read one of the above articles, you've read them all.

> Lost count how many times we've had to say "We're not a men's rights site."
>
> — Return Of Kings (@ReturnOfKings) May 15, 2015

Even though we were incorrectly identified as a men's rights site, the idea that Hollywood is spreading feminist propaganda has for the first time reached the ossified brains of over one million new people this week, perhaps more. Most of these individuals will never allow themselves to accept how unnatural and phony it is to have female heroes who are as strong as men, but a few of them will encounter another movie in the future that portrays women as so comically masculine that they can't help but remember the site with the word Kings in the title that described that very phenomenon. Once these individuals reject the existing narrative, they already know where to go for more answers. (They are encouraged to start here: Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK.)

In the end, I wanted to thank all the talentless media typists for taking the time to spread the word about our message. I have no doubt that many men are relieved to have encountered it.

Read Next: Is The Mainstream Media Pushing Men To Suicide?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Does Jay Z Still Get A Celebrity Pass Compared To Chris Brown?

May 15, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

On December 1, 1999, just shy of his 30th birthday, rapper and mogul Jay Z stabbed music executive Lance Rivera in New York City. The reason? Jay Z believed, probably correctly, that Rivera had been bootlegging copies of his studio album, Vol. 3… Life and Times of S. Carter.

Nearly a decade later, on February 8, 2009, then 19-year-old Chris Brown beat up fellow singer Rihanna. While Jay Z is today celebrated as an "icon," most people see Brown as a pariah.

Working in the same industry, the men's social reputations are about as starkly different as they could possibly be. For hitting a woman, instead of nearly killing a man with a knife blade, Chris Brown's name cannot be mentioned without people thinking of Rihanna's bruises in that photograph. No one, by contrast, remembers what Jay Z did or cares to recall the name of his victim.

The divergent treatment of Jay Z and Chris Brown, especially when you consider the former was a decade older than the latter at the time of their respective deeds, unearths an overt political correctness and ideological bent to the way society shames certain crimes.

The punishments for the men were heavily skewed: Jay Z got a minuscule three years' probation, Brown five. Inasmuch as Brown committed a crime, stabbing a man in the stomach is objectively worse than beating's someone face (provided they don't die or suffer lasting disability).

Crimes against men are deliberately ignored

[image]

Maybe Jay Z has some photos of Lance Rivera's bleeding stomach that he can show us when he's not chastising Chris Brown?

I will not defend Chris Brown's actions because they are indefensible. Despite Rihanna clearly not being the innocent but sexualized angel she wants to be perceived as, Brown overreacted and deserved criminal sanction. Unless she struck him first, what he did was nothing but gratuitous and unwarranted assault.

If she did lash out first, which doesn't seem to have happened, he should have foreseen the personal and legal ramifications of such a response against a woman.

That all said, Jay Z's actions were more calculated, sadistic and brutal than anything Brown did. Carrying a knife around in Times Square, when Jay Z had never cultivated the actual endangered existence of someone like 50 Cent, unless you count his teenage years more than a decade before, was purely moronic. More moronic (and self-entitled) still was Jay Z's autobiographical retelling of what happened:

> When I told him what I suspected [the bootlegging], to my surprise, he got real loud with me right there in the middle of the club. It was strange. We separated and I went over to the bar. I was sitting there like, "No the fuck this nigga did not….." I was talking to people, but I was really talking to myself out loud, just in a state of shock. Before I even realized what I was doing, I headed back over to him, but this time I was blacking out with anger. The next thing I knew, all hell had broken loose in the club. That night the guy went straight to the police and I was indicted.
>
> […]
>
> There was no reason to put my life on the line, and the lives of everyone who depends on me, because of a momentary loss of control….. I vowed to never allow myself to be in a situation like that again.

"Black lives matter," so why does Obama embrace a guy who stabbed someone over bootlegging CDs?

Here we have a man who had the audacity to question Chris Brown's actions and perceived lack of contrition regarding attacking Rihanna, even as he himself, ten years after his own "I stabbed someone" incident, still blamed his violence on "blacking out."

It is laughable that Barack Obama, a preacher of so-called "male responsibility" for absent black fathers, stopping violence against women, and preventing campus "rape," identifies with and calls himself a friend of a man who has never accepted the gravity of a highly serious but woefully under-punished act of sadism.

Lance Rivera's problem in 1999 and after was not so much his lack of fame, like Rihanna's in 2009, but his genitals. Just as Floyd Mayweather is continually (and, in all likelihood, rightfully) taken to task for his abuses of non-famous women, Chris Brown is pilloried for hitting Rihanna. In both of these cases (or sets of cases, as Mayweather is a repeat offender), the victims are female.

Rivera, cursed with a penis, would never receive the same sympathy for himself or anger channelled at his attacker, regardless of if he had died and his intestines had painted 500 cubic feet of the New York City pavement.

"Welcome to the liberal club, here's your free pass"

Chris Brown committed a crime, plain and simple. But Jay Z's received a pass usually reserved for violent women.

Aside from the configuration of Lance Rivera's genitals, there's another reason why his stabber is granted peace from people bringing up memories of the crime. Jay Z is unabashed about his support for Barack Obama and came out for gay marriage, although, conveniently, only after Obama had himself.

Once you come out as a liberal, there's no chance of your violent past coming back to bite you. Just ask Sean Penn, who never faced the same sort of scrutiny in the 2000s, after the rapid rise of feminist anti-domestic violence groups, for beating Madonna with a baseball bat in the 1980s.

When you couple Jay Z's politics with his wife Beyoncé's status as a "feminist icon," whatever that means, he is untouchable. Such is his vanity and arrogance, he himself is distinctly unaware of the rank hypocrisy he engaged in when he wanted to crucify Chris Brown for laying a finger on Rihanna.

Jay Z may be a great musician to many, but there's a strong case to be made that he's a worse human being than the reviled Chris Brown.

Read More: Why The Media Uses The Death Of Michael Brown To Promote Racial Division

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How Modern Societies Are Training Men Not To Marry

May 16, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> A wife of noble character is her husband's crown, but a disgraceful wife is like decay in his bones. – Proverbs, NIV, 12:4

It's often said that a good deed rarely goes unpunished in today's world. The same could be said about the deed of marriage and its punishment by modern women.

As mentioned before, a man's emotional attachment is the prize which women seek – and a lot of men have fallen bait for for a woman's love and beauty to walk down the path of attachment and commitment, with sometimes devastating results.

The man who refuses to ~~submit~~ commit is often subject to social shaming. In fact, a woman's emotional shaming of a man who refuses to commit to her inspite of her love for him, has been aptly described by Chinweizu as such:

> Man, in his sentimentality, may refuse to acknowledge that the love felt for him by the woman who loves him is, at its core, a slaver's love for her slave. – The Anatomy Of Female Power

Familiarity breeds contempt, and marriages are no exception to this. The "harsh" reasons which make most successful marriages work are usually that of wisdom and tolerance. Marriage (not being a destination) is a journey which demands constant work and input from either side, so it would be stupid to expect a man to bear the complete responsibility and burden of the woman too.

Thus the question a modern man needs to ask himself before marrying today is: how well can I presently and possibly tolerate this woman in the future? Will she present a threat to my individuality, freedom, and the family that I would sire with her?

When it comes to marriage, men have traditionally married women for lineage, beauty, wealth, status, sex, or fertility throughout history, but the wisest option was choosing the woman who also had virtue. But with the rise of feminism in modern societies, men's options of finding virtuous women have drastically reduced, even more than in the past.

The blatantly visible social factors which influence men into non-commitment

Men have always had reasons to marry, but today's society presents many reasons to stall marriage unless to an exceptional woman.

1.Unchained female hypergamy

It's no secret how unchained female hypergamy is destroying the nuclear family. Every man who is aware of this usually would do well to adapt himself to learn some game and bang modern women, since women today usually reward sex to alphas first but would later choose to marry the betas waiting in line.

2. Depreciating quality of women

Would a sane modern man want to marry and sire kids with a ball-busting modern feminist woman, who revels in her sluttiness and whoredom? With feminism gradually taking away responsibility from the modern woman's shoulders, it shouldn't surprise to note that the corresponding decline in female virtue. A modern woman's beauty is not immune to this decline as tattoos and fat acceptance rises today.

With her mind, beauty and virtue socially programmed to go down the drain by feminism, it's no surprise if men loathe commitment to a modern woman.

And foreign women are not immune to this, as feminist garbage is increasingly being globalized and peddled in the name of female empowerment. And elsewhere, cunning women usually rip off innocent but stupid men looking for an uncorrupted ideal "one." There are few women a man could choose to invest his trust in, and they are getting more difficult to find.

3. Unchained feminist hypocrisy

True equality between the sexes is impossible not only due to the innate differences in both men's and women's biology and psychology, but more so due to feminist hypocrisy. The resultant harmful (and at times comical) consequences of this is evident everywhere – scarring men, and damaging women's minds into delusional megalomania into committing acts of outright stupidity.

Not only has it destroyed families, but it has also ruined an entire generation that will pass on the deleterious aftereffects to the next generation, in addition to an impending cultural collapse.

4. Irresponsible cheating and unjust divorces

We've discussed before about the rising epidemic of cheating wives who want "freedom." And much has already been said about how modern women cheat more effectively than men (and rarely get found out). With modern societies increasingly outlawing paternity testing, the threat of rising cuckoldry is undeniable—enough to dissuade men from marriage.

We also know how modern women excel in flaking and wasting men's time. But the worst way a woman destroys and wastes precious years and resources from a man's life is when she unleashes her degeneracy in a marriage – not only by irresponsible adultery but also by an unjust divorce.

With more percentage of modern divorces initiated by women, (usually under a pretentious excuse of irreconcilable differences), it's worth wondering what were the real causes behind the divorce – but usually it is when the hapless husband refuses to submit to his bridal slavemaster.

But again, modern women don't lag behind in their financial strategy after divorce—the best way to adapt is to find a new husband (human ATM machine), not to mention her divorced ex who'd be grinding away paying off her an undeserving settlement, or even worse, child support payments if she has kids with him.

5. Spousal abuse

An alarming trend getting more noticeable in modern societies is that of married men suffering spousal abuse. Even combat-trained war veterans are not immune to this. With female-on-male spousal abuse on the rise, it becomes even more complicated since most men usually don't report spousal abuse out of the fear of social ridicule, not to mention lopsided feminist family courts which usually favor the "weaker" sex.

But is only the physical spousal abuse that such men endure terrible? What about the emasculating psychological abuse these men often endure daily, but don't report only until things turn physical? With modern gyno-centric family courts and societies further psychologically emasculating men this equation, the trip to the marriage altar seems more terrifying than diving into a pool of hungry piranhas.

Conclusion

Indeed, a man's castle is his home. But when his home becomes a nightmare for him, he becomes an exiled king—which is increasingly becoming the case in modern societies courtesy of modern women. Indeed, you can't chose whom you're born with or in the family you were – but the choice to select the partner with whom you'd build your own family totally resides with you.

Appearances are increasingly deceptive in today's world, and moreso for modern women. And the way modern marriages and women are headed, marriage seems to be an unnecessary test of a man's patience, enough to make him a medical patient within it, if not by the end of it.

In today's modern dysfunctional societies, the logical solution for a modern man is to stall marriage until he finds a "virtuous" woman (if he ever manages to find one) whose flaws he could tolerate after her beauty fades away.

And even if he ever manages to find her, it’s best he whisks her away from the social degeneracy before it corrupts her—keeping in mind the true nature of women.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Marriage Doesn’t Make Sense

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Why Euthanasia Will Eventually Be The Leading Cause Of Death

May 16, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

There are many fronts in the war against death, and for the past two hundred years humanity has been winning.

The stats are easy enough to find. Before the industrial revolution life expectancy was often below 30 years (though if you survived infancy, you had a decent chance of seeing your fifties). Since 1900 the global figure has soared from 31 years to nearly 70, with Japan currently topping the chart at 87. The decline of infectious diseases sees the biggest single drop. In 1900 the leading causes of death in the US were influenza and tuberculosis. Today it is heart disease and cancer.

Across the board, life is getting safer. Despite a smaller world population, ten times more people died from natural disasters a century ago then today. Murders were 50-100 times more common in Europe in the Middle Ages. Even the US murder rate is at its lowest rate in 100 years while workplace fatalities have declined by 90% over the same period.

Self driving cars will put a huge dent in the roughly 1.2 million people who die in car accidents every year, while we can at least take solace that the ever growing surveillance state will make getting away with murder more difficult. There is no reason why even the nastiest diseases like Ebola or HIV won't be cured someday soon.

So in the 21st century we are much less likely to die from disease, natural disasters, murder or car crashes, and lets assume medical science eventually pushes back all other causes. What remains standing?

Suicides are one of the few exceptions to the above trend. Forty thousand people now kill themselves every year in the US. The UK shows a similar rise. Most western countries are seeing the same and the World Health Organization predicts 1.5 million people will die by their own hand by 2020.

Now there are many possible reasons for this. The breakdown of the family unit has to be a leading culprit. Others blame the GFC or the spread of the internet, but these are all secondary factors.

Savagery below the surface

I've written before about the fundamentally savage nature of human beings. By all accounts, we just aren't the sort of people who can live in perpetual happiness. If anything, we need to be waging some sort of struggle to keep us content. Without an immediate sense of purpose, we begin to question the very meaning of our existence.

For most of history, people were distracted by the concerns of everyday survival. With the possible exception of some hunter-gatherers, there simply wasn't much time to ponder the mysteries of the universe. Today we've just replaced this with digital entertainment and the constant struggle that is fitting in to our politically correct society.

If anything, maintaining a healthy psychology becomes more difficult the more of a material paradise we create around us. The cry of a nearby infant is probably the best bulwark against the urge to put a gun to your head, but we know today's career-driven youth are far too busy for that.

We've done our best to replace an aching belly with an aching need for attention via social media, but eventually, us or our descendants will be left staring into the abyss that is our unimaginably vast universe.

This is why I fully expect euthanasia will soon be legalized. Plenty of works of dystopian fiction have explored the horrors of immortality. I can very well imagine the next generation of social justice warriors demanding the government provide free longevity treatments to all citizens. We can only hope that for once they don't overreach and make these demands compulsory. Who wants to label themselves in favour of "death culture"?

Of course, a world absent unforeseen death can be seen as a fantastic thing, but our psychology will face some jarring changes. Human beings will be more or less forced to choose a time for their own demise.

Perhaps people will even hold "deathday parties" where they gather up all their families and friends for a final goodbye before their appointment with the euthanasist? Old couples may decide to die together after a few centuries of happy but increasingly stale marriage.

Others might choose to freeze themselves with instructions only to be woken every thousand years, or until something interesting happens. Virtual reality is sure to take off. Personally I wouldn't mind spending a few decades in Westeros banging fair maidens and riding dragons. It would certainly kill some time.

In fact lately I've been asking people the blunt question – what would you do if you could live forever? The answers have varied from "I don't know…I'm pretty bored right now" to "well…how many women are there on Earth? Three billion? How long would that take?"

The problem of trying to find meaning in a world without sickness or material want will be an enormous challenge for our society to grapple with. Even if we banish all disease, cure the aging process, and surround ourselves in a giant rubber room, death is not banished unless we find a way to fundamentally change our psychology. As we exist now, it seems a human being is never completely satisfied with their lot.

This is why I predict that, unless the planet blows up, euthanasia and suicide will eventually be the leading causes of death, possibly by the year 2100. With physical well-being as a given, life expectancy statistics will be driven not by how long you can maintain people's physical health, but their mental health, and as far as I can tell, our understanding of the latter has hardly advanced since the middle ages.

There's no way of predicting how long the average person will wish to live once we're freed from our basic biology. A hundred years? A thousand?

Only time will tell.

Read More: Why You Must Confront Your Own Coming Death (And How To Do It)

Thomas Hobbes

Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

10 Mistakes I've Made In My 20s

May 17, 2015 | by David | Link | Original Link

Our 20s are a crucial point in our lives. We're physically in our peak shape. We're able to experiment with countless options in terms of our careers. And we tend to have a maximal degree of freedom, free from both our parents and the needs of supporting a significant other or family.

I'm 25. And in my first five years of my 20s I've grown more than any other five years of my life. I've gone from an insecure college virgin to a relatively successful entrepreneur in this short timeframe. Below are 10 of the biggest mistakes I've made in my 20s that have taught me some of my most important lessons.

1. Attaching my emotions to a relationship

When you're with a girl you really like, the path of least resistance is to always want her to be happy.

And while the intentions behind this desire are good and understandable, it's an unattainable goal in any long term relationship. And chasing it will undoubtedly undermine your happiness and the relationship itself.

Accept that there will be conflicts and tension that won't always disappear right away, just because you want it that way.

2. Getting my validation from getting with girls when single

There's more to life than women

Once you get into the world of "game" the biggest risk, from my experience, is attaching your self-worth to how many girls you're dating or having sex with.

Yes, getting with women is good and fun, but it's not everything. I've allowed my friendships and my business to suffer because I've been so hell-bent on seeing a girl every single weeknight.

Realize that you're complete on your own, and that getting pussy is only a single part of life.

3. Becoming obsessed with building muscle

One of the biggest fitness mistakes I've made is getting obsessed with bulking. Once, you start building muscle, this is a trap that's easy to fall for.

Sure, getting bigger and stronger can be a fun and rewarding journey, but again – it's only one part of life. If you allow yourself to become obsessed, you'll quickly tie your self-esteem to how "big" you are. Realize that fitness is only one part of life, and pursue other hobbies to diversify your time and balance your aspirations of getting big.

4. Getting attached to my smartphone

Smartphones can be great… or god-awful

I used to be the same as any other chump. When I was bored, nervous, or just about anything other than busy – the smartphone would come out.

Watching a movie… smartphone out. In line at store… smartphone out. See a cutie I want to approach… smartphone out.

If you let it happen, looking at your iPhone will become a nervous crutch that will limit your confidence and development. Put it away unless you're doing something specific.

5. Not owning my own values

We all have our own preferences and values. Don't conform just to appease other people or give into peer pressure.

Personally, I only like hitting up the nightlife once a week or so. I just value my sleep and would rather have a productive morning and intense workout. My buddies prefer to hit it up 3-4 nights a week. For a while, I'd grudgingly go out, and not really enjoy myself. Now? I go out once a week, and actually immerse myself in the nighttime experience and really enjoy it.

Do what you like – and don't apologize for it.

6. Spending too much time with one group of friends

Don’t neglect the boys

You should have several groups of man friends and spend time with all of them.

You’re the average of the five people you spend the most time with, so choose your friends wisely. And don’t confine yourself to just seeing one or two of them. You’ll become one dimensional, and adopt their insecurities.

Spend time with different types of people and take on the best traits of all of them.

7. Not reading

Reading is the most crucial habit. It keeps you learning, thinking, and enforces self-discipline.

I still fall off all the time. Taking just 30 minutes sounds easy, but sitting there and reading never seems as pressing as answering emails, writing, seeing friends, girls, or doing other things.

Set aside 30 minutes every single day – for me this is just after waking – and commit to reading during that time.

8. Giving a fuck about what other people think

We're all socially conditioned to give a fuck about way too many things: what girls think about your style, what your friends think about your career choice, whether your parents approve of your lifestyle, what random strangers think about you.

And all these fucks wear down upon us. They cripple us and our abilities to take action and do shit that other people might question.

From approaching girls at the grocery store to quitting my 9-5 to filming YouTube videos in public, I've had to condition myself to give fewer and fewer fucks, or I would never have built my life and business to what they are now.

9. Not listening to my body

Your body is usually right

Whether it's certain foods that bother your stomach, or forcing yourself to go out despite not sleeping the previous night, or spending time with a girl you're no longer attracted to—we often force ourselves to do shit that our bodies are clearly telling us not to.

And these things often lead to physical pain, injury, sickness, or regret.

Sure, there are times when pushing yourself through a grueling workout despite wanting to quit is beneficial, but be smart and listen to your own body and your own intuition. It's far to easy to be led astray by friends and colleagues.

10. Worrying about things I can't control

In life there are three types of things:

- Things you have full control over
- Things you have some control over
- Things you have no control over

You must learn to distinguish between these three types of things. Otherwise you'll spend countless time worrying about shit you can't control… whether she'll reply to your text (after you've sent it)… whether you'll get the job (after you've interviewed)…

Stop bitching about things that have already happened, and instead plan to crush whatever lies in your path.

Read More: How To Free Yourself From The Need For Women

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

4 Of The Best Episodes Of The X-Files

May 17, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The X-Files was a highly popular TV show from the 1990's. The show featured David Duchnovy as the iconic Fox Mulder—an FBI agent whose love of the occult earned him the ire of his fellow agents—and Gillian Anderson as his partner and foil Dana Scully. It was known for its highly intricate mythology and its quirky recurring characters, such as the Lone Gunmen.

With the show coming back for a brief stint on FOX, it would be apropos to review a few of the best episodes of the show.

Jose Chung's 'From Outer Space'

This is a funny, playful episode about an alleged alien abduction. Two teenagers are on a first date when they are "abducted" by aliens. After an investigation by Scully and Mulder yield no hard conclusions, a science fiction author named Jose Chung takes an interest in the case. Chung interviews Scully and she attempts piece together the broken narrative to the best of her ability.

The episode is hilarious and well done. It features many references to other X-Files episodes and guest stars Jesse Ventura, Alec Baldwin and Charles Nelson Reilly as the titular character. From the small—but hilarious—bits like Mulder's falsetto scream and the recurring phrase "How the Hell should I know?," the episode is a home run from start to finish.

The Field Where I Died

The Field Where I Died is a more somber episode about reincarnation and the meaning of life. Agents Mulder and Scully are called in to help investigate a religious cult after receiving a mysterious call from a woman named Sydney. It turns out that Sydney is one personality of many inside the head of the wife of the cult leader. This woman has many personalities, one of whom claims to be Mulder's wife in a life past. Mulder is highly intrigued by this woman's testimony and he learns that the field outside the cult's compound is where he died in a past life as a soldier.

This episode raises intriguing questions about life and free will, as both Scully and Mulder realize that their lives have intermingled in some substantive way in lives past. While the episode certainly could be needlessly maudlin, it doesn't take such a weepy approach to the concept of soul-mates. Instead, it suggests that lives can intersect in a variety of ways, as Mulder and Scully were friends in one life past, and brother and sister in another.

The Field Where I Died certainly is a bit too ambitious at times, but it manages to seam together a beguiling tale about reincarnation and what that might mean for our relationships with others.

Squeeze / Tooms

The episodes Squeeze and Tooms are from the first season and involve a man named Tooms with a horrifying special ability. Mulder and Scully begin to investigate a murder in which a businessman had his liver ripped out of his body inside a locked room. Mulder notes that similar murders involving torn-out livers have taken place once every 30 years.

He realizes that they are searching for a man with the ability to contort his body in ways that allow him to crawl through grates and fit down chimneys—a man that only has the need to feed once every 30 years on human livers.

The two episodes present little in the way of philosophical reflection or comedic value, but they do present one of the creepiest monsters the series has to offer. Tooms' ability to pass through heating ducts and air vents is cringe-inducing enough, but the special effects in the episodes make the ability even creepier. Like in the clip above, the episodes also have hints of Mulder's dry, dead-pan humor that would be accentuated in later seasons.

Post-Modern Prometheus

The Post-Modern Prometheus is an endearing episode shot in black and white about a real-life Frankenstein-type monster. Mulder receives a letter from a woman about her mysterious pregnancy, as she was knocked unconscious and impregnated. Mulder and Scully travel to her town, where they hear about a large monster that some people have claimed to see ambling around in the woods around town. They come to find out that the monster is a real, live human created by mistake by a local scientist.

With a score featuring many Cher songs, the episode manages to craft a tale about a lovable monster. The episode is a bit too cliche at times and might be a tad bit too goofy for some people's tastes, but it is a satisfying episode in the end.

Read More: 4 Underrated Classic Video Games

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Avoid Women Who Support Gay Marriage

May 17, 2015 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

The year was 2008 and Scott Eckern had everything he needed in life. He was the director at a top theater company. He had a lovely family and home. But then social justice warriors discovered a small sum Eckern had donated in opposition to gay marriage. Eckern soon found himself without a job, his family harassed and threatened, and his name smeared all over the news.

This was just the beginning. This kind of social oppression has grown, and it is most commonly seen from another movement: feminism.

A homosexual redefinition of marriage gives feminists ammunition to push their own agenda, using dishonestly, hatred, and indoctrination. Justify a government-takeover of marriage for the sake of sexual equality, and that opens all sorts of doors for how they can dictate your life. A woman who supports gay marriage in popular culture does not respect the value of natural roles, and will end up monopolizing your relationship.

Gay Marriage Encourages Feminism

In 2012, a European feminist group used anti-Christian displays to protest in favor of gay marriage. Most feminists despise the gay movement. So why did these feminists push gay rights? Don't think for a second that feminists actually care about gays. Listen carefully and you will see that it is all just a rapacious attack on religion, and men.

Patriarchy is what distinguishes marriage from civil unions. The original idea behind marriage was that women "multiply and replenish the earth," rear children at home, and that men work to provide a living. This arrangement means men are dominant. But feminists can't handle being subservient, so they tear down the religious basis for marriage and the family any way they can. Soon after her excommunication, feminist Kate Kelly lashed out at "small-minded religious paradigms" about homosexuality. It is no coincidence that feminists pressure us to redefine marriage.

Gay marriage gives women an excuse to avoid personal responsibility. If feminists equate all civil unions under the term "marriage," then a person can't say a mother of seven children is any more successful than the woman who lazes at her boyfriend's apartment all day.

If the government dictates what the word marriage means, it reduces the man's leadership position and elevates the woman's control. It allows government to further control your relationships. This trickles down to society's definition of romantic relationships in general. A woman that accepts a government's definition of marriage does not respect your definition of relationships, nor your rights. She is more concerned with popularity and fitting in.

Gay Marriage Leads To Censorship

In 2009, discussions were often civil. I had some positive, uplifting dialogue with gay activists. But times have changed. Today, if they discover that you have ever uttered a sentiment against gay marriage, don't expect to keep your job. Don't expect to have any kind of job in journalism, on TV, or as a CEO. Expect companies to be shamed by Huffington Post until they proclaim the gay marriage message.

Feminists have taken hold of this censorship power to further their own agenda. This censorship campaign is not just at school or in the media; it seeps into our daily lives. This is why the terms "husband" and "wife" are disappearing from our language. Now all you have is a "partner."

Gay Marriage Destroys Fatherhood

Leftists often say, “it takes a village to raise a child.” I actually agree. Society has a responsibility for the children. But leftists have twisted this to mean that it is society that raises a child, not parents.

Feminists display a weird distaste for raising their children because the center of attention is distracted away from them. Social acceptance for gay parents helps them take the focus away from children. The children of gay couples are necessarily adopted or created with involving a third person, so marriage is no longer about two people having children. Children are an accessory that garnishes their marriage; marriage is not about resulting in children.

Feminists turn the focus onto themselves by inserting themselves into every aspect of the child’s life. They tear down or completely remove the father’s role in the child’s life, and thus more easily dictate the child’s life. It is therefore no surprise when they trumpet “studies” that claim children don’t need a traditional family arrangement. Forbes recently claimed that a study shows it doesn’t matter how much time mothers spend with children. But actually that study proved something very different:

> “Family time appears a more beneficial type of time for adolescents; more accessible family time is associated with better self-concept and decreased drug use and more engaged family time is associated with fewer behavioral problems and better self-concept and math performance….
>
> During adolescence, time may become more important. The mother time analysis shows a strong relationship between engaged mother time and risky behavior (Table 5), and family time, not necessarily just mother time, appears linked to other adolescent outcomes, including better self-concept and academic performance.”

The crusade against motherhood hurts children, ironically resulting in the kind of man who abuses women. Feminism is thus directly to blame for abusive men. Not only that, study after study finds that children need their fathers. A gay marriage arrangement where a father or mother is missing helps feminists achieve their demonic goal. Cases are abundant that show non-traditional families are destructive for children.

We Should Have Stopped Feminists At Gay Marriage

According to polls, acceptance of gay marriage has skyrocketed. Many people seem to think the propaganda that pervades film, music, television, churches, and the education system doesn't affect their lives. They don't understand that the homosexual marriages do affect them, and that it enables the feminists who make this world a nightmare.

If it were just about respecting gay people, they would be satisfied calling them "civil unions." But they want to force you to consider gay unions equal to traditional marriages. That is the problem. A watered-down definition of marriage allows women to assume the role of power.

Delve into the gay marriage movement and you find that most gays themselves don't want what is happening. Sure, they want respect, but they don't need the government, churches, and other organizations to redefine the word marriage. Many recognize that the "village" model of childrearing is destructive, that children need both a man and woman in the home. Once people get past the circular arguments, appeal to emotion, and sheer propaganda, they don't want it.

This is why men must avoid girls who support gay marriage, particularly those who have really thought about it. It indicates they don't want to accept the discipline and hard work that goes into a successful relationship. A woman who accepts gay marriage in society will will reject your role as a father, telling you that fatherhood does not raise a child, and that she is somehow equal or better than you in every way.

Really, she will care more about herself than anyone else in the family.

Read More: Women Should Save Their Virginity For Marriage

Amasa M. Lyman

Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

Brandon Bostian's Amtrak Crash Exposes The Problems With Homosexuals In America

May 18, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last week, Amtrak engineer Brandon Bostian was responsible for a train derailment near Philadelphia, killing eight people and injuring several others. In the aftermath of the crash, mainstream media outlets attempted to hush up the fact that Bostian was a gay activist and likely an affirmative action hire, as his job prior to Amtrak was as a register jockey for Target. Conservative journalist Charles Johnson was the first to uncover not only Bostian's identity, but his penchant for plastering dick pics all over the Internet (link NSFW):

> After a careful study of his social media we conclude that he is an exhibitionist who is interested in odd sex acts.
>
> We've thankfully blocked out the actual dicks because we're a family friendly website (sort of).
>
> We're publishing these photos because we believe the public has a right to know and because we think it's important to always focus on the who of a story rather than whatever policy outcome.
>
> (Of course, nobody would question this material if it came from Gawker or another degenerate site but because its GotNews.com they'll freak out.)

Johnson's detractors tried to argue that Bostian's homosexuality and exhibitionism had nothing to do with the crash, but the reality is that character traits don't exist in a vacuum. How someone acts in their private life sheds light on how they'll behave on the job, a fact that leftists have twisted in order to sic lynch mobs on anyone whom they deem "racist," "sexist" or "homophobic." It's not a stretch to argue that a man obsessed with showing off his private parts to strangers might also be inclined to show off how fast he can drive a runaway train.

For the past twenty years, the left has pushed acceptance for gays and gay marriage on the basis that homosexuals are just like you and me, the only difference being who they're attracted to. While I don't care what people do in their private lives, this reductionist line ignores widespread dysfunction among homosexuals. Indeed, because the left has so effectively hidden the dark side of gay culture from view, homosexuals are becoming a major threat to public health and safety.

The Gays Are Very Different From You And Me

The most obvious problem with homosexual men is that they're walking disease vectors. It's common knowledge that the HIV epidemic is driven by homosexual men; according to the CDC, gay and bisexual men account for 61% of all HIV infections in the U.S. despite comprising only two percent of the population. HIV continues to persist in the West because the sexual habits of gay men make the most degenerate straights look like chaste church-goers in comparison:

> Prior to the AIDS epidemic, a 1978 study found that 75 percent of white, gay males claimed to have had more than 100 lifetime male sex partners: 15 percent claimed 100-249 sex partners; 17 percent claimed 250-499; 15 percent claimed 500- 999; and 28 percent claimed more than 1,000 lifetime male sex partners. Levels of promiscuity subsequently declined, but some observers are > concerned that promiscuity is again approaching the levels of the 1970s. The medical consequence of this promiscuity is that gays have a greatly increased likelihood of contracting HIV/AIDS, syphilis and other STDs.

Despite the fact that their promiscuous lifestyles are literally halving their lifespans, homosexual men are incapable of putting the brakes on their hedonism. For example, according to this New York magazine article from last summer, gay men have reacted to the new anti-HIV drug Truvada by resuming their barebacking ways. That's like a fat chick continuing to shove her face with Twinkies after getting her stomach stapled:

> When Adam and I met up, he'd taken his first dose of Truvada the day before. He felt fatigued, but he'd also underslept, so he wasn't sure it was the drug. The night before, he'd invited over a regular hookup who has told him he's HIV--negative. "I had wanted him to cum in my mouth," Adam says, "but I knew that the PrEP doesn't take full effect for seven days."

To make matters worse, HIV retrovirals are heavily subsidized by Western governments. A 2000 report showed that the Australian government was spending roughly $10,500 AUS per patient for HIV retrovirals, and could possibly be spending over $3 billion AUS ($2.5 billion USD) on Truvada alone now. Effectively, your tax dollars are being spent on allowing gays to have unprotected sex with truckloads of men.

Also note the stunning lack of propriety in the above passage. This guy is so shameless about his sleeping around that he has no problem telling a complete stranger that he wanted another man to "cum in [his] mouth." Lack of propriety and proper boundaries seems to be common among homosexuals, as this news article about the children of gay couples (and why they oppose gay marriage) shows:

> Dawn Stefanowicz said her gay father was so preoccupied with sex that when she was in high school and brought home a male classmate, both her father and his lover propositioned him for sex.

Imagine a straight man hitting on his son's girlfriend. You can't, because even a single father wouldn't think about violating his son's boundaries in that fashion. This is how many homosexuals act: they're narcissists who can't be bothered to integrate into society yet constantly demand that straight people approve of their life choices.

It gets even worse. Gay marriage, typically framed as a matter of "love," can easily be used to enable homosexual child molesters. For example, in 2013, gay couple Mark J. Newton and Peter Truong were convicted of child sexual abuse after they had a son via artificial insemination, then used him as their personal sex toy:

> Police believe the pair had adopted the boy ''for the sole purpose of exploitation''. The abuse began just days after his birth and over six years the couple travelled the world, offering him up for sex with at least eight men, recording the abuse and uploading the footage to an international syndicate known as the Boy Lovers Network.

Before their crimes were discovered, Newton and Truong were the focus of an ABC (Australian Broadcasting Company) puff piece on gay adoption. The article has since been deleted from the ABC website, but a copy of it is archived here. There are likely more gay abusers like Newton adopting children for the sole purpose of raping them, but their stories are being suppressed by the media for obvious reasons.

While not as problematic as gay men, homosexual women have their own set of pathologies. In a recent article for Breitbart, Milo Yiannopoulos revealed that contra to feminist propaganda, the lion's share of domestic violence in Western countries is committed in lesbian relationships:

> The Huffington Post reported in 2014 that 50 percent of lesbian women experience one of these Sapphic skirmishes at some point in their lives. Yet it wasn't until 2002 that researchers bothered to look into the scale and character of lesbian domestics and understanding of the phenomenon has not increased dramatically, even among lesbians themselves.

According to the CDC, a whopping 75 percent of bisexual women claim to be victims of sexual violence, likely because they're exposed to both violent men and women.

Tolerance Of The Intolerable Is Not A Virtue

It's tempting for men who are more clued-in to the nature of the sexes to argue that gay men act the way they do because they're men, not because they're gay. This ignores the fact that homosexuals exhibit behaviors and pathologies that are almost nonexistent in the straight population, from anonymous sex (rare among heterosexuals), to exhibitionist sex (in Brandon Bostian's case), to higher rates of mental illness in general, to freakish paraphilias like this (link not safe for work, or your mental health).

The leftist tactic of smearing critics of homosexual degeneracy as “homophobic” is completely off-base. We aren’t “afraid” of homo misbehavior, we’re disgusted by it, same as if we’d stepped in a dog turd on the sidewalk. There is nothing wrong with being revolted by people who spread disease through reckless sex, who adopt children so they can abuse them sexually, and who think shoving a taser up a mummy’s ass makes for a fun Friday night.

While I have no issue with people doing what they want in the privacy of their homes, homo dysfunction—and the left’s inability to acknowledge it—is hurting society at large. Homosexual men are spreading disease through their wanton barebacking and other paraphilias, while lesbians are disproportionately battering women. If gays truly want straights to tolerate them, they need to rein in their misbehavior and stop acting like we’re the bad guys for pointing it out.

At the end of the day, heterosexuality is the future of mankind. Homosexuality is just a hobby.

Read More: How To Get Laid On Amtrak Trains

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Roosh World Tour Begins In June 2015

May 18, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As recently mentioned on my blog, starting in late June I'm conducting a lecture tour that will take me to Berlin, London, Washington DC, New York City, Montreal, and Toronto. Each city will have a 4-hour event that includes a speech by me, a Q&A, and also a meet & greet. For full details on what's in the speech, the dates, and how to reserve your seat, visit Roosh World Tour.

When I visit the States I usually hold a happy hour, but I wanted to try something different this time. What I didn't realize is how much work doing a tour of this magnitude actually is, and it has somewhat been a full time job for me in the past month. This experience will hopefully be a valuable experiment to see if a bigger manosphere conference is possible in the future.

Here's a short video clip of me introducing the event:

If you’re near one of the cities I mentioned and would like to spend an afternoon in an atmosphere of knowledge and masculinity, check out Roosh World Tour to learn about the event and reserve your ticket. The first 30 tickets for each city is offered at a discounted price.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Mad Max Is The Latest Offense In Hollywood's Long Tradition Of Social Engineering

May 18, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The backlash against Hollywood's latest cauldron of coprolites (Mad Max: Fury Road) seems to have taken the mainstream media by surprise. Expecting the gullible (but reliable) male public to dine from Hollywood's usual trough of trash, they were rocked back on their psychic heels by manosphere calls for a boycott of the movie.

(Personally, I'll admit to a grudge against the movie from the beginning. No one, in my view, has any right to be behind the wheel of the "last of the V-8 Interceptors" except Mel Gibson. And I'll bet you he could still have pulled it off in 2015. Where are ye, Mel? We still love ye.)

Only one man should be driving the V-8 Interceptor, and his name is Mel Gibson

They should have seen the backlash coming. It was inevitable. For years—decades—there has been a coordinated effort by Hollywood to portray women as unrealistically masculine, take-charge, virtuous action heroes, and men as character props, rogues, criminals, knaves, or cowards. Social engineering now emanates from glowing screens, whether they be movie, television, or computer.

Consider 1985's Mad Max: Beyond Thunderdome. An atrociously miscast Tina Turner is injected into the post-apocalyptic wasteland, sculpted legs and all, and cavorts as a cackling crone dictator in a remote desert "Bartertown." For her amusement, pathetic male specimens fight to the death in gladiatorial combats.

She has no evident leadership virtues or qualities. But who cares, right? In Hollywood's world, reality doesn't matter, only ideology. She's a strong, empowered woman, controlling her destiny and that of others. You go, girl!

Beyond Thunderdome. And beyond pathetic.

Mel Gibson, sleepwalking through most of his scenes, is reduced to being little more than a peripheral figure, basically a cab driver with brass knuckles. A weird tribe of feral kids only adds to the general confusion, and reinforces the notion that traditional masculinity has no place in this brave new world.

It feels symbolic, in a way. Max is forced by the screenwriters to surrender his best friends—the dingo dog and the Gyro Captain—in exchange for a mob of annoying little kids. The whole spectacle is one grand embarrassment.

The list of social engineering films spewing the same message of male disenfranchisement is nearly endless. Consider this small sample, out of nearly hundreds I could have picked:

Million Dollar Baby (2004): Heroic female boxer displays incredible virtue against all odds.

The Cell (2000): Evil male serial killer is only stopped when brilliant Jennifer Lopez gets inside his head.

Laura Croft, Tomb Raider (2001): Balloon-breasted, ass-kicking chick takes on the world of evil men and defeats them all. Whatever.

Aliens (1986): Kick-ass heroine fights it out woman-to-woman with an alien mother, with men lurking in the shadows.

Hollywood's warrior woman fantasy, from 1986's "Aliens"

Enough (2002): Helpless, abused Jennifer Lopez turns the tables on her horrible abuser, delivering the message that all men are potential (or incipient) beaters or rapists.

Charlie's Angels (2000): An all-time high of utterly pathetic "you-go-girlism." Giggling SoCal snarkbarkers defeat terrorists, meanies, and bad guys of all stripes with a few karate chops, wire-work, and creative CGI.

Sleeping With The Enemy (1991): The "all men are abusive" theme again. Ridiculously exaggerated abuse and control-freakism is here again, with a predictable finale. The only good male character is a neutered neckbeard beta orbiter who always seems to appear at exactly the right time to save the damsel in distress.

Pretty Woman (1990): Prostitution is just another cool career choice, and it can be truly empowering!

Hunger Games (2012): You-go-girl, kick-ass, empowered heroine overcomes all obstacles despite the evil world holding her back.

These are just a small sampling of the unrelenting message coming out of Hollywood. The message is: (1) men must be portrayed in a negative light; (2) men should be viewed with suspicion and resentment; (3) men should play second fiddle to women in everything; (4) women are superior to men in everything, including virtue.

You might say that such portrayals are harmless, and all in good fun. But you would be wrong. Over time, the constant denigration of male figures seeps into the popular culture and sends the message that men are of no value. This is the message, both overt and subliminal, that is pumped out to the masses. Over time, it has its effects. People begin to act out what they see portrayed all around them.

But every so often, a dose of truth slips past the Hollywood censor. Occasionally, the mask comes off, and we are allowed (accidentally) to see a realistic portrayal of how American women behave in a crisis. One such example is ironic, and instructive.

The scene I will discuss happened to involve Charlize Theron (the irony!). The movie was 2009's The Road. This was a realistic and terrifying vision of what a real apocalypse might look like. This is the face of reality, not the face of Hollywood leather-clad make-believe.

There is a scene near the beginning of the film where the Charlize Theron character and her husband become aware of the calamity that has befallen civilization. She and her husband (Viggo Mortensen) also have a small child.

Charlize Theron in a realistic apocalypse movie, “The Road.” Weak and faithless, she collapses in despair and abandons her family. In other words, the real Western woman.

Theron, unable to handle the collapse of social order, abandons herself to despair. She wants to kill herself. And in an extremely disturbing scene, she simply abandons her family and walks out into the night, hoping to find a place to end her life. Lacking any character or strength, she abandons her family with unforgivable cowardice.

In other words, she is the typical modern American woman: lacking in character, tenacity, and endurance, and ready to sell out her man the minute that the shit hits the fan.

This has the ring of truth. And this is what makes the scene so disturbing. This is why no critic ever commented on it. If a real apocalypse were to happen, the response of nearly all American women would be: (1) curl up into the fetal position and die; or (2) seek out a male figure to protect her.

There would be no altruism. There would be no virtue. But of course, this reality is almost never portrayed. Instead, what we get is the bullshit feminist pipe-dreams of Mad Max: Charlize Theron as a bionic-armed, karate-chopping ass-kicker, able to take down bodybuilders and brutes of all types.

To be fair, it is possible for women to act with great courage. But this courage involves situations where they are protecting either their lovers or their children. Women rarely fight convincing for ideologies, causes, or principles. They care about themselves and their children. Women are specialists at vengeful retribution.

Our ancestors had a more realistic idea of the true nature of female courage. The ancients understood that vengeful retribution was the specialty of female heroics. In Euripides’s Medea, for example, we see the idea of vengeful retribution played out compellingly.

The plot is simple. Jason takes a barbarian wife, and has several children by her. He eventually grows tired of her, and leaves her for a Corinthian woman of noble birth. For this abandonment, Medea extracts a terrible revenge, killing Jason’s new wife and all of her (Medea’s) own children by Jason.

The same idea is on display in the medieval German poem called the Nibelungenlied. The story: the heroic Siegfried is murdered, and his wife Kriemhild plots a blood-soaked revenge. She eventually has an entire group of Burgundian men put to death, including her own brother, after which she herself is slain. It is a shocking drama of a woman driven insane by grief and hatred.

Kriemhild: Wreaks a terrible revenge for the death of her husband. This is the type of role model Hollywood should be celebrating.

Even these two historical examples are far removed from the current reality of female behavior in Western countries. There is no heroic retribution, no fighting for ideas, no altruism. The historical examples to the contrary (e.g., Joan of Arc) are the exceptions that only prove the rule. To be fair, most Western men (like their female counterparts) would also fail to pass muster in a real crisis situation. But far, far more women would fail than would men.

There is nothing inherently wrong with portraying women as strong and empowered: the old Greek and Roman myths did it, as well as the Norse myths, Icelandic sagas, and the classic novels from old China and Japan. But the difference between those stories and modern Hollywood is this: in the old myths, the story complements, and is faithful to, the true nature of women. In modern movies, the stories are utterly fanciful. They are attempts to ram a degenerate, socially pernicious ideology down our throats.

The real truth of Western female behavior is found not Charlize Theron's role in "Mad Max," but in her role as the despairing, cowardly wife in "The Road." This is the reality.

Women are masters at vengeful retribution, but are conspicuously lacking in the virtues that Hollywood so desperately wants us to believe that they have. In real life, they're not going to be joining Mad Max in all-out combat against marauding barbarians as a tanker truck hurtles through the wasteland.

Rather, they're going to be cowering in the backseat, trying to make Max do all the work, and looking to save their own necks.

Don't expect to see honest portrayals from Hollywood of how Western women truly behave under pressure. The truth would be far too uncomfortable for the public to handle.

Read More: How To Reverse America's Cultural Decline

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Did SJWs Sean Powell And Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett Help Get A Vermont State Trooper Fired? (UPDATE 2)

May 19, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last month, Vermont State Police trooper Jonathan Graham was forced to resign from his job after several "offensive" Facebook posts he made were anonymously reported to his superiors. The Facebook posts in question included jokes about male-to-female transsexual Bruce Jenner as well as supposedly "anti-Muslim" statements. In a letter to the Rutland Herald, Graham's daughter criticized his forced resignation as "too harsh a punishment" and also explained that their family will be going through hard financial times as a result:

> If this can happen to my dad, it can happen to anyone. We now live in a country where stalking police officers on the Internet for "damning" political views is the norm, and any bored media outlet turns it into a circus. Is political correctness worth putting a family through this?

Return of Kings has obtained the names of the anonymous cowards who appear to have ratted Graham out: Sean Powell, a homosexual SJW and IT specialist from Randolph, and Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett, an employee of the state court system in the area where Graham was stationed. Our research combined with interviews of acquaintances of theirs show that Powell and Galvano-Pickett are a pair of disturbed trolls seeking to ruin the lives of anyone who isn't as left-wing as they are.

As a public service, Return of Kings is yanking the curtain away to reveal the demented SJWs pulling the levers. Sean Powell and Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett are degenerate, fanatical ideologues who teamed up to agitate for a man's firing because he hurt their feelings. By all accounts, Jonathan Graham was an upstanding member of the Vermont State Police and his forced resignation is an injustice that must be rectified.

How Sean Powell And Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett Ruined A Man's Life

While we don't have a smoking gun proving that Powell and Galvano-Pickett were behind Graham's resignation, we have considerable circumstantial evidence pointing to their involvement. The two of them are top Facebook commenters on all of Vermont's major local news sites, indicating that they troll Facebook looking to cause trouble and enforce their leftist viewpoints on everyone else. This article from The Vermont Political Observer, a left-wing political blog, heavily implies that the author knows who snitched on Graham.

Additionally, several tipsters provided Return of Kings with incriminating screenshots of Powell and Galvano-Pickett's Facebook activity. In this first screencap, taken from a news article about Graham, Galvano-Pickett informed Powell that she sent him a private message, an unusual thing to do on a publically viewable comment thread. The two of them also display their SJW bona fides in agitating for Graham's removal even before his superiors took action:

In this second screenshot, commenter Peabody Kohler Fox's remarks to Sean Powell imply that she has inside knowledge that Powell is the one who ratted Graham out:

This next screenshot shows Galvano-Pickett demanding for Graham's firing while the investigation into his Facebook activities was still undergoing:

Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett · ★ Top Commenter

Saddens me to read the things Jon said, and believes. Yes, no one questions his right to say these things, but I question his ability to police in a fair, equitable, safe way. The cops who shoot unarmed blacks feel the way Jon claims to. Is THAT the type of person Vermont needs and wants policing our state? There is NO room for racist, sexist, abusive haters in Law Enforcement! I'm sad for the VSP, who I truly believe as an organization, are above this behavior. I'm sorry too for the citizens who have been treated unfairly by this misguided State Trooper. I would ask for his resignation.

Reply · Like · 6 · April 25 at 3:43pm

John Anderson · ★ Top Commenter · Web Developer at Vermont Internet Design · 132 followers

I would rather know what they think personally. It proves what kind of people are policing the state. Do you think this is the only officer that thinks like that? Probably not.

Reply · Like · 1 · April 25 at 4:12pm

Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett · ★ Top Commenter

Oh John, I agree that I'd rather know who the haters are, but it makes me sad for us, and the VSP, to know that one of their own is driven by hatred for certain groups of citizens. No, I'm sure he isn't the only one, but I really don't believe the VSP is rampant with this type. The troopers I've known have all been good, caring, decent folks doing the job out of concern for the community.

Reply · Like · 1 · April 25 at 4:33pm

Finally, this last screenshot shows that Galvano-Pickett has no problem with doxing anyone she disagrees with, even if it results in them losing their job:

Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett · ★ Top Commenter

Joseph, try bringing it all to internal affairs now...I'll bet they'd welcome a reminder. I strongly disagree, however, that all cops are the same. There are more good than bad, at least here in Vermont, and the good don't want the Jon Grahams any more than we do!

Reply · Like · April 26 at 7:49am

Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett · ★ Top Commenter

Joseph, do tell! Pete is obviously a hater. What does he do for employment?

Reply · Like · April 26 at 7:51am

Further research into Sean Powell and Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett suggests they are a pair of trolls with nothing better to do than snitch on anyone whom they deem "racist" or "homophobic." Powell maintains a blog called Sean's Vermont Tech Blog, and both it and his linked Google+ profile suggest he is a professional whiner who runs around the Internet creating drama. For example, in this Google+ post, Powell complains about being banned from a discussion group.

In the case of Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett, she appears to have absolutely no life beyond arguing politics online. Virtually every news article from a Vermont-based media outlet has at least one comment from her. She is also an aspiring poet, scribbling doggerel such as this and posting it to poetry sites.

Pay No Attention To The Crybabies Behind The Curtain

It’s an accepted fact that the kinds of Puritans who agitate for people to be fired for their political views are failures with nothing going for them in life. The lives of quiet desperation that Sean Powell and Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett lead are a prime example of this. These two trolls have no accomplishments to speak of, so they spend their free time stalking and ruining those who actually have something to be proud of.

Every bit of public info about Jonathan Graham suggests that he was a hard-working and well-respected member of the Vermont State Police. His only crime was having opinions and making jokes that these self-appointed commissars found “bigoted.” Because of their hurt feelings, Graham is now jobless and his family is looking at grinding poverty, perhaps worse. Both Powell and Galvano-Pickett have committed an unspeakably evil act.

If there is any justice in America, Graham will either be restored to his job as a Vermont state trooper or able to find another position in law enforcement. As for Sean Powell and Jocelyn Galvano-Pickett, they need to be publicly shamed and punished for what they’ve done.

Update (5/21/2015)

A tipster has provided more evidence that Sean Powell was the one who ratted out Jonathan Graham. This screenshot shows that Peabody Kohler Fox had inside information pertaining to Powell’s activities:

Peabody Kohler Fox · Louisville, Kentucky

The "concerned citizen"' Sean Powell, is on a witch hunt. Have you seen the FAGBUG that rolled into town just before this story broke? Read up. This is clearly Sean's agenda, among others, out HIS opinion. He is free to do that. But he is not free to ruin lives over it.

Reply · Like · April 27 at 7:12am

Liz Wadsworth · ★ Top Commenter

Peabody Kohler Fox It doesn't matter who reported it or why it was reported. A state employee should have caught it first.

This is as close to a smoking gun as we are likely going to find. This screenshot suggests that it was not a fellow trooper who reported Graham, but was in fact Sean Powell.

Update (5/22/2015)

The commenter "Brian Ritchason" leaving angry remarks on this article is in fact Sean Powell himself. My evidence for this is that "Ritchason" is commenting with the email sburke05079+facebook [at] gmail [dot] com:

Did SUVs Sean Powell And Jocelyn Schiano Hickett Help Get A Vermont State Trooper Fired?

Brian Ritchason · 2 hours ago sburke05079+facebook@gmail.com ·

As for claiming anyone is on a "witch hunt" based purely on comments on Vermont's local news outlet, I can understand why people in a fucking huge city like Chicago think that seeing the same people on different articles is some kind of suspicious activity. The fact of the matter is, our state has less than 630,000 people in it. There are the people who follow WPTZ, and there are the people who follow WCAX. Hardly anyone, in comparison to our population, actually comments on WCAX because the website is a fucking nightmare loaded with ads. Also, with it being a state with a small population, something that happens in the southernmost part of the state is felt and heard by the people in the northernmost part of the state. This isn't like Chicago, with a population of over 2.7 MILLION people in the city alone — the one city where this pathetic uninformed asshole of an "author" resides is roughly 4.5 times the population of our entire state. Obviously we are going to have people who are known to frequently comment on WCAX. I've done my own research into both of these people, and neither of them are anywhere near as active as this shitty blog would have far people to believe.

Approve · Spam · Delete

"Burke" was Powell's last name before he got married, as evidenced by this post from his blog:

"Ritchason" has repeatedly argued that it was a "fellow trooper" who reported Graham, but the revelation that "Ritchason" is actually Powell is as good an admission of guilt as we're going to get.

Brian Ritchason → Subtle Gestures · 2 days ago

Except for the fact that a condition of his employment is that he would following all of the Vermont State Police's social media policies, a condition he proudly violated by putting his shitty views on display with a 100% public Facebook account. He had pictures of his cruiser, talked shit about people he had pulled over, suggest that certain minorities receive harsher punishment. I KNOW the readers of this pathetic blog don't give half a fuck, but this is not a freedom of speech issue, nor was any form of witch hunt conducted. He was reported by a fellow trooper!

^ | v · Reply · Share ›

Read More: How To Survive A Modern Day Witch-Hunt

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

New Movie “Ex Machina” Confirms That All Women Are Like That

May 19, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A couple weeks ago I saw the movie Ex Machina. Like most movies these days the best sequences were in the previews, so needless to say it wasn’t quite as “thrilling” as it was made out to be, but it was entertaining nonetheless.

The synopsis

The story revolves around 3 main characters:

Caleb: A typical beta schlub who works in a cubicle farm as a coder for a company called Bluebook which is the world’s largest search engine (a “pseudo Google”). He has no girlfriend, and is severely emotionally damaged on account of his parents dying in a car accident (with him in the car) at a young age.

[image]
Not hard to figure out which one is Caleb

Nathan: The billionaire genius alcoholic (who is probably insane) who founded and owns Bluebook. Nathan lives in a mansion in the mountains that doubles as a research laboratory where he is currently working on his android…

Ava: A female android built from the ground up by Nathan. Ava is the latest in a long line of androids built to test Nathan’s artificial intelligence project.

Ava

The long and the short of the plot is that Caleb wins a company-wide “contest” to spend a week with Nathan in his palatial abode. Caleb has no idea why he’s there until Nathan reveals to him that he, Caleb, is there to participate in a Turing test to determine the success of his A.I. project.

Caleb later figures out that it wasn’t his merit that won him the contest, but rather his background and otherwise pathetic social life. He was an extraordinarily needy male who was starving for affection and Nathan, who displays dark triad traits throughout the movie, seized this opportunity to make Caleb his guinea pig for Ava.

Nathan tells Caleb he was hand picked for this project

The plot thickens (spoiler alert)

Caleb eventually meets Ava face to face and is observed from afar by Nathan. In the beginning they make small talk but as the sessions with her progress, Caleb quickly grows emotionally attached to her.

From the onset it looks as though Ava's feelings are mutual. She draws Caleb a portrait of himself, dresses in clothes to make herself look more human and even asks him at one point if he is attracted to her.

[image]
Ava's submissive posture is no accident

Ava would increasingly escalate her stranglehold on Caleb's psyche with various manipulation tactics. She would seductively undress herself when she all but knew Caleb was watching her the monitor in his room, she bad mouths Nathan calling him a liar, and even says at one point "I want to be with you."

Caleb would then attempt to hatch a plan to escape with Ava and leave Nathan trapped in his fortress to rot away and die. Nathan learns of Caleb's plan but he doesn't hold it against him. The billionaire understood how effective the A.I. in his android would be so he cut the underling some slack and decided to bury the hatchet.

[image]
Nathan lets Caleb off the hook but Caleb's mind is made up

But the damage had already been done. Caleb's thirst allowed a robot to infiltrate his mind and turn him against the man who signs his checks. Having already putting the wheels in motion for he and Ava's escape, the plan severely backfires, leaving Nathan dead and Caleb trapped in the research lab.

Mission accomplished

Despite the undoings of Caleb and Nathan, the turing test was an astounding success. The artificial intelligence in Ava's programming did exactly what it was supposed to do and displayed true feminine traits with shocking accuracy. Here are the best examples:

1. She used her sexual allure

Toward the end of the movie Nathan reveals to Caleb that he used a compilation of Caleb's porn searches to construct Ava's face. It probably wouldn't have taken that level of manipulation to accomplish oneitis but billionaires rarely leave anything to chance.

Ava consistently made long eye contact, subtle sexual body language, and flirtation narrative to win the heart and mind of the naive Caleb. This is something women do on a daily basis without even thinking about it.

2. She used the "damsel in distress" technique

Never once did Ava actually ask Caleb to help her escape. But make no mistake about the fact that he was led to this idea by the manipulative android. It was her clear programmed objective as Nathan stated in a conversation with his employee.

Her voice cues and inflections always changed when she discussed her surroundings. She never flat out said she was trapped and wanted out but she made damn sure she elicited pity from Caleb. At one point he asks her "Have you ever been outside of this room?" Ava knew at that point she had him right where she wanted him.

Turning unsuspecting men into a captain save-a-hoe is a technique women have been using forever. They lead males to believe their circumstances are worse than they really are or that their position in life isn't their doing. Men who are none the wiser allow their provider instinct to kick in which leads to their collective demise much more often than not.

3. Once she had what she needed she discarded Caleb

Women don’t give two shits about the state they leave men in after extracting what they need from them

When it became clear to Ava that she was free to leave at her discretion, Caleb immediately became an afterthought. Having killed Nathan she knew the last roadblock to her freedom was out of the way. All she had to do now was escape with Caleb to live happily ever after right? After all, if not for him she’d still be trapped, so she would certainly reward his chivalry with her undying loyalty and devotion, wouldn’t she?

If you frequent sites like this you already know that’s not even close to what happened. After Ava proceeded to pillage parts from previous versions of the other female androids to piece together quite an attractive body, she left the compound without so much as a second glance at Caleb, who was now trapped in a room where he would either die of starvation or suicide.

Women are only as loyal as their objective requires. Once they achieve said objective, they discard all unnecessary parts—namely men. They feel absolutely no remorse about leaving men broken (and broke) and emotionally shattered in their wake. True to form, Ava walked up those stairs and out of that house without a second thought about the man who literally gave his life for her freedom.

Conclusion

All in all Ex Machina was a pretty solid flick. In hindsight I should have waited until the DVD came out but I’m glad I saw it just the same (the girl I saw it with sneaked vodka into the theater which is a whole ‘nother article altogether).

The red pill undertones of this movie were as clear as day, not the least of which was a female android turning a vulnerable beta into a white knight as a means to an end. This proves that even in the land of Hollywood, neomasculine truths, though rare, occasionally make their way onto the big screen.

Though it's not the best movie I've ever seen I'd strongly recommend anyone who doubts the ironclad doctrine of AWALT to check it out.

Read More: Why You Should Not Go See "Mad Max: Feminist Road"

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Another Woman Walks Free After Attacking A Man With Glass

May 19, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Thanks to a customary pussy pass, Lucie Slater's truly savage glassing attack on then boyfriend Scott Aitken went legally unpunished two and a half years ago. It is therefore unsurprising that fellow Englishwoman Sarah McKenzie-Ayres, the subject of my recent article, also walked free from court this year for a similar attack on a man. Slater is just one of many excuses that help give other women their own excuse to maim and disfigure the men who anger them.

Slater had found Aitken exchanging messages with another woman and, in a fit of "understandable" female jealousy, lashed out at him with a glass. As the pictures prove, the results for Aitken were beyond horrific. And, rubbing further salt into his blood-churning facial injuries, the judiciary treated Aitken's communication with the second woman as some sort of provocation you would normally expect in the most extreme self-defense cases.

The message of both the Slater and McKenzie-Ayres cases is obvious: male victims do not matter in criminal sentencing. Hit a woman, without evening leaving a bruise, and expect serious incarceration or GPS tracking. But if you maim a man to the point of him requiring corrective surgery and metal plates, the judge will declare your de facto innocence as a woman by refusing to send you to jail.

“Rehabilitating” her image through charity grandstanding

If Lucie Slater were really the sweet “daddy’s girl” she wants to be perceived as, she wouldn’t have humiliated her father by glassing Scott Aitken.

Soon after the sentencing, desperate to salvage her reputation, Lucie Slater engaged in charity fundraising online for diabetes. In a twist that shocked me about as much as the sun rising each day, her father had died from a serious version of the same disease a month or so after she received her complimentary pussy pass.

Notwithstanding that a 45-year-old man losing his life in such circumstances is tragic, the very convenient dovetailing Slater engaged in with her fundraising raises serious questions about her genuineness. Amidst all the justified vitriol being directed at both her and the shambolic decision not to imprison her, she needed a superficial outlet to show just how “sweet” and “kind” she was. Yet, if she really cared about her father, why not care enough to prevent publicly humiliating him with the glassing of Aitken and the resultant court case?

Any “daddy’s girl” who has a father with diabetes should realize that significant stress, such as having your daughter plastered across the media even if she didn’t get deserved jail time, is a catalyst for sudden and premature death. Serious stress combines with serious diabetes like flying an airplane under the influence of alcohol.

Any considerate daughter would act in accordance with this risk. Lucie Slater did not. The fundraising may have convinced those still stupid enough to associate with her that she was a good person, but the record of her brutality against Aitken proves otherwise. A good daughter does not do to someone what she did to her then boyfriend. Her father dying so soon after the court case was no accident.

Ruthless naming and shaming is required

Apply make-up on your sentencing day, sob in relief when you're spared jail… two of the tricks the Lucie Slaters of the world pull off to escape judicial condemnation for themselves and the fellow pussy pass holders that follow.

It is our obligation to give women like Lucie Slater a lifetime of pariah status. It is not enough for us, like I did with my Sarah McKenzie-Ayres article, to focus only on what happened this week or last month. Although ROK was only commencing as an online presence when Lucie Slater got her official vaginal pardon, we must revisit or address for the first time incidents that we may have missed or glossed over.

As a community, we demonstrate, investigate and prove patterns of behavior that are undermining, destroying, and defecating on society. The repeated pussy passes handed out to violent, unrepentant and purely sadistic women is a front and center issue in this struggle of ours.

In the UK, one female politician, the thankfully now isolated Helen Grant, called for the virtual elimination of women's prisons in Britain and sensationally asserted that it is society that makes women offend. Women like Slater and McKenzie-Ayres evidently have many allies, even if most of them are not as forthcoming and open as Grant. They are invariably more oblique and stealthy in the methods they employ to justify the appalling behavior of women ushered away from their rightful home in a penitentiary.

Systematic and organised anger is the best approach to take in dealing with these cases. Stand up to the behavior and the constant judicial indulgence it receives, connect the dots between countless examples of feminist under-sentencing for criminally-inclined women, and give others the opportunity to participate in the cause.

With elements of the mainstream media already pillorying the passes given to such women, we are simply adding to the fire of retribution.

Read More: Disfiguring A Man's Face To The Bone Is Not Considered A Serious Crime If You Have A Vagina

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 Things You Must Do If You Have A Female Stalker

May 20, 2015 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

I've recently been through a harrowing ordeal with a female stalker that lasted nearly a year, so I feel well-credentialed to write this article. Thankfully, the deranged woman in question is now detained in a private mental institution, via the psych ward of a local hospital.

If you currently have a female stalker, be prepared to dig in for the long haul. They can be harder to shake than a broken hand, and because your adversary is a woman in what has become an extremely misandrous society, chances are authorities won't be at all interested in helping you.

So is there really such thing?

Most people scoff at the notion of a female stalker. "Oh, you poor guy! Some woman wants to have sex with you!" they will say with sarcasm. But let me tell you, these nut jobs can take over your life, and make you feel very unsafe. Your guard will constantly be up, because whilst it is easy for a man to physically defend himself against a woman, this is only true if he sees her coming. At best they are merely an annoyance, but no matter what they absolutely will not take no for an answer.

You should take this warning seriously. It is well documented that a very high percentage of western women have a mental illness, and that number grows every year. Therefore, we can reasonably conclude that the number of female stalkers will also continue to rise, as will the likelihood you may encounter one in the future.

My stalker was a former child actor, who had apparently gone off the rails and developed a drug addiction. Despite not appearing to work she was able to maintain a wealthy lifestyle, thanks to her rich parents who bought her a luxury apartment in my building. She approached me one day and initially I considered her weird, but definitely harmless.

However, she soon began following me everywhere – to and from work on the bus, around town on my lunch break, to the gym, to watch me play tennis, you name it – and she definitely wasn't subtle. A few times I came home late at night and saw her out the front of the building waiting in her car. She would tell me she wanted me to be the father of her kids, leave letters on my car that have to be seen to be believed (see Crazy letter 1 and Crazy letter 2), and after somehow finding my number (I'm guessing online), bombarded me with text messages.

Thankfully, my ordeal now appears to be over. To help other men who are being harassed by female stalkers, I have compiled some tips:

1. Know your enemy

Most female stalkers are intelligent and well-educated, but have serious mental disorders such as bipolar syndrome.

You need to familiarise yourself with the characteristics of female stalkers so you have an idea of what you might be up against. With a lack of support provided from the authorities, I started researching female stalkers online. It was amazing how many boxes my stalker ticked – she really fit the profile! According to this study:

> Female stalkers were predominantly single, heterosexual, educated individuals in their mid-30s who had pursued their victims for more than a year. Major mental disorder and personality disorder were suggested, especially borderline personality disorder. They usually threatened violence, and if they did threaten, were more likely to be violent. Frequency of interpersonal violence was 25 percent, but there was limited use of weapons, and injuries were minor. Stalking victims were most likely to be slightly older male acquaintances; but if the victim was a prior sexual intimate of the female stalker, her risk of being violent toward him exceeded 50 percent. Unlike male stalkers who often pursue their victims to restore intimacy, these female stalkers often pursued their victims to establish intimacy. Common emotions and motivations included anger, obsessional thoughts, rage at abandonment, loneliness, dependency, jealousy, and perceived > betrayal.

Fortunately, I was able to avoid a physical attack by my female stalker, possibly because I was never foolish enough to be sexually intimate with her. Thank God for that, because when the police finally detained her, it emerged that she had a history of assault!

It is definitely true that female stalkers tend to be intelligent and well-educated (which helps them successfully get their creep on). My stalker had a psychology degree, and was 36 years old. She also displayed all the signs of bi-polar syndrome, such as obsession with goals, substance abuse, irritability, restlessness, high sex drive, and racing thoughts.

2. Be persistent

Single White Female with a black bag? Check…

Cases involving female stalkers are unlikely to be resolved quickly. Your patience, resilience, and sanity are going to be tested. I went to the police numerous times over the course of many months and they never even bothered to contact my stalker, let alone reprimand her.

Mental health authorities gave me attitude, as though I was either vexatious or just making the whole thing up. Whatever happens, don't be discouraged. You need to persist, because there is a high probability your female stalker will not just go away. Cast as many nets as possible, and follow up with all of them regularly. Leave no stone unturned.

You will need to contact the police, mental health authorities, security at your workplace, your building manager (if you live in an apartment or unit complex) and if possible, the stalker's relevant professional body. My stalker was a psychologist, but when I complained to the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency, they launched an investigation and swiftly suspended her registration.

3. Keep your cool

We are constantly told by feminists that women are equal to men and free to do whatever they want in their lives. This sounds reasonable, but unfortunately in the Western world only men are regularly held accountable for their actions. Male stalkers are far more likely to be prosecuted than female stalkers, even though there are comparable rates of violence and psychopathy with male and female stalkers.

It is incredibly frustrating to have your legitimate complaints not taken seriously by the authorities. I felt like I was butting my head against a brick wall. You will receive little sympathy, and you will be crucified if you try and handle the situation by yourself. You can't yell at your stalker in public, and definitely don't touch her at all, because you risk being charged with an offence.

If that happens, anything that occurred up to that point will likely be deemed irrelevant, simply because you have a penis and she has a vagina. The police even admitted that if they didn't know details about an altercation, from the beginning of an investigation they would instinctively side with the woman.

4. Document everything

My stalker would follow me into work every day, always taking the closest available seat on the bus. The police wanted evidence, so I started taking photos like this

You should compile all her letters and texts, and record any strange behaviour she exhibits. The more evidence you have, the better. For example, after a friend's suggestion I started taking photos of her on my phone when she was obviously stalking me.

You should document all her weird behaviour by writing it down, dating it, and wherever possible, providing details of any witnesses. Without any evidence, the police and other authorities will completely dismiss you. If you have evidence, they will at least listen to your story – well, hopefully!

Even if you are fobbed off, keep compiling records! In my case, it was only after a mystery person reported my stalker's weird and obsessive behaviour that police and mental health authorities began to give me the time of day. Because I had been diligent, I had plenty of evidence to give them.

Finally, her behaviour was taken seriously, and this led to a "raid" of her apartment by police and mental health authorities where, after threatening suicide, she was restrained, drugged, wheeled on a trolley into the back of a waiting ambulance and taken to a secure mental health ward.

If she is really crazy, she will slip up eventually and other women will complain. Sadly, this is your best shot for some sort of resolution. Understand that whilst the notion of a damsel in distress is timeless, nobody gives a shit if you are being hassled, and especially by a woman. However, if you have a woman on your side things can change, and fast. Suddenly, your evidence will no longer be ignored.

5. Avoid engaging with them

It your female stalker bombards you with freaky text messages like this, make sure you hold on to them as evidence and, if possible, get your cell provider to block them.

You may need to write a firm note telling her to leave you alone or you will go to the police (they advised me to do this as “evidence” I had communicated my unhappiness about being stalked to her). In my case, merely telling them I had written a note was not enough, so I had to write another one and photocopy it for official records.

But apart from that, do not even look at them, let alone speak to them. Mental Health authorities advised me not to engage with her in any way as she would be encouraged by any interaction, no matter how negative. This was definitely true in my case, and admittedly something I was slow to learn from. No matter how many times I told her she was a freak and to leave me the fuck alone, she would always come back for more.

Finally, good luck. You are going to need it!

Read More: The 3 Tools Of The Predatory Female

Mark Webster

Mark Webster is an old school Australian who is dismayed by political correctness, the state of the modern woman and the decline of his once beautiful country. He believes the collapse of the family unit is directly attributable to feminism and cultural Marxism.

Feminists Manufacture Rape Straw Man Against "Game Of Thrones"

May 20, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In the sixth episode of Game of Thrones' fifth season, Sansa Stark is raped by Ramsay Bolton after their nuptials. True to form, feminists and other SJW-inclined critics have lambasted the scene, despite the rape being heard off-camera. Contrasting the litany of gratuitously violent scenes revealed visually throughout Game of Thrones, you never see the actual rape.

This hasn't stopped feminists and other do-gooders from "quitting" the show, attacking the producers, or doing everything but assessing the scene in the context of the overall storyline and society it depicts. Feminist priestess Jessica Valenti is heading this new charge, hoping her grandstanding and dystopian appropriation of expressio unius est exclusion alterius will lead to another paid Guardian article.

> This show is consistently over-the-top with sexual violence and it's just gross. #GoT
>
> — Jessica Valenti (@JessicaValenti) May 18, 2015

Yet, for all the accusations of sexual violence in Game of Thrones, such renderings are deliberately toned down to placate censors who are much more at ease with blood splattering than showing forced sex. The focus was on Theon Greyjoy's face after he is forced to watch Ramsay ravage Sansa. The question is, though, in addition to us not seeing her plight, did Sansa suffer any more than the hundreds of others viewers have watched being massacred, mutilated and degraded on Game of Thrones, sexually or non-sexually?

For a nice juxtaposition, watch the footage of the death of Oberyn Martell last season and compare it to the off-camera Sansa rape. I didn't see Jessica Valenti calling the former "over-the-top" and "gross."

A deliberate distortion of facts

In one of the books on which the show is based, Ramsay Bolton actually rapes Jeyne Poole, who is posing as Arya Stark, on their wedding night. This written account is much more graphic, including the use of bestiality. Poole is made to perform sexual acts on Ramsay's dogs.

The feminist argument this week, that the Sansa rape is an invention designed to shock, is preposterous. All that has happened in the translation to television is that a pretend Arya Stark has been, for the sake of the shorter format, replaced by the real Sansa Stark. I note that no feminists seemed outraged when the show deviated from the books in having female warrior Brienne of Tarth defeat Sandor Clegane, one of the half-dozen best swordsmen on an entire continent.

Democratic Senator Claire McCaskill has joined the recent fray, excoriating the episode. Having observed McCaskill's relish in helping to slowly destroy the presumption of innocence for sexual assault allegations, particularly in the military, I am surprised that she has even had the time to watch the show. She has apparently taken the route of confirmation bias viewing, as she glosses over a multitude of sadistic scenes that are either other forms of violence or sexual violence unleashed on men (for instance, how about the army of enslaved eunuchs for Queen Daenerys?).

Jessica Valenti and Senator Claire McCaskill's "Hypocrisy 101" class

Senator Claire McCaskill is a raging hypocrite for calling out a rape scene that wasn't even shown, only heard. She deliberately ignores the sensationalized violence pictured in full detail across five seasons.

Where were Jessica Valenti and Claire McCaskill when Theon Greyjoy had his penis cut off, only for it to be sent in a box to his father? Once again, Valenti and McCaskill prove that sexual violence (or any violence) only really matters to them if you're female and the perpetrator is male.

Where were Jessica Valenti and Claire McCaskill when Myranda and Ramsay Bolton (then Ramsay Snow) hunted down a young girl Myranda was jealous of? Ironically, it was Myranda, the female in pursuit, who fired the arrow that incapacitated the girl so she could be eaten by Ramsay's dogs. So at least it explains Valenti and McCaskill's lack of anger.

Where were Jessica Valenti and Claire McCaskill when Gregor Clegane gouged out the eyes of Oberyn and then squeezed in his head and brains with his own hands? Unlike the Sansa Stark rape, this was shown, in all its glory, to viewers' eyes.

Where were Jessica Valenti and Claire McCaskill when Oberyn ordered (the male) Olyvar to have sex with him and his paramour while grabbing his genitals? It mustn't be rape when it happens to a man, right?

Where were Jessica Valenti and Claire McCaskill when Mance Raydar and others in a previous season were burned alive for not believing in the right god? Immolation is perhaps the most gratuitously over-the-top form of violence imaginable.

Calling out self-serving stupidity

Some people, thankfully, are calling out McCaskill and others' unabashed opportunism (and attention-seeking for their own personal platforms):

> .@clairecmc Castrations, beheadings, baby death, skulls being crushed but off screen moaning crossed the line.
>
> — Stephen Miller (@redsteeze) May 19, 2015

We must welcome the outbursts of Claire McCaskill, Jessica Valenti and those who don similar political robes. In the absence of any outrage about so many other depictions in Game of Thrones, they reveal themselves as ideological beasts who only care for the kind of suffering they can make a career, celebrityhood, or nice quick buck out of. This week's rabid backlash fundamentally reinforces their callous indifference to so many other forms of sadism portrayed on television and through other mediums.

Proper rectification of our skewed political and social climate nonetheless requires an active counterbalancing of the warped perceptions of McCaskill and Co. We cannot just rely on their foot-in-mouth moments. When you encounter this hypocrisy, raise objections to it. In the case of shows like Game of Thrones, mention an episode or scene where something equally or more "repulsive" occurs, bearing in mind that people will sit through fictional acts of violence 1,000 times more willingly than watching it in real life.

We defeat feminist selectivity by showing the whole picture. And the truth is something they can’t fight.

Read More: How Feminism Is Ruining “Game of Thrones”

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Legal Action Fails To Install Sexual Assault Kangaroo Courts In UK Universities…For Now

May 20, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A former student who sued Oxford University over its sexual assault complaints investigation policy has had her case thrown out by England's High Court. Elizabeth Ramey was refused the right to a full judicial review of Oxford's policy of only conducting internal inquiries into sexual assaults in certain limited circumstances.

Although Ramey has failed in her legal bid on a technicality, the litigation is being supported by progressive groups who will be sniffing around for another test case. The legal campaign is an attempt by British feminists to introduce draconian Title IX-style campus kangaroo courts onto UK campuses.

Ramey reported an alleged rape to police in 2011 while studying for a Masters in African Studies at Oxford. The case was discontinued due to insufficient evidence. She then pursued the University's internal complaints procedure. Oxford failed to investigate the alleged rapist as Ramey had demanded.

She then took her case to the Independent Adjudicator of Higher Education, who partially upheld her complaint and advised Oxford to change their policies. Oxford implemented the changes to standards which, Ramey argued, did not put enough pressure on Oxford to investigate allegations.

In throwing out Ramey's case, Justice Edis ruled that Ramey had never been subject to this policy, and so its application had no impact on her personally, which meant she lacked standing to bring the claim. Ramey had also unsuccessfully tried to bolster her case, in the customary fashion, by throwing in a claim of sex discrimination.

Her solicitor argued that Oxford was engaging in "indirect discrimination" against women by creating a "hostile environment" by not investigating claims of sexual assault.

What really happened to Elizabeth Ramey?

Before considering the story, readers might want to make use of the following advice for Rape Crisis England on "how to help someone who has been raped":

> Listen – To what she has to say and let her take her time. It might not be easy for her to start talking about an event that she has kept silent about for a long time. It may be difficult because she may have been told not to tell by the abuser at the time.
>
> Believe – People rarely lie about rape or sexual abuse. Why would they? It is > important to believe what they are saying.

So what actually happened to Elizabeth Ramey, the alleged victim? Ramey has waived her right to anonymity to bring publicity to the proceedings and the quangos advocating on her behalf. In January, however, she published an anonymized account of her alleged rape in the Telegraph, which she claims. She told then how, as a fresher, she met a man at a party who “pursued her all night”, before she agreed to go to his room.

In ambiguous language she claimed that the alleged attacker “kept pushing me until I said yes,” after which, “I was exhausted and kind of gave in.” She offers no clarification of whether the alleged attacker figuratively or literally “kept pushing” her. She also offers no clarification of what she means by “kind of gave in,” and whether she means to say she passively acquiesced in a way that would have been interpreted as consent by her alleged attacker.

They engaged in consensual kissing, after which the alleged attacker started to toucher her intimately. She claims she asked him to stop but he refused. She claims she was then overcome by “frozen fear.” Her account of the assault is: “I said stop and he didn’t. He was fingering me and he didn’t stop.” Ramey then says she “managed to get away,” giving no detail at all of what words were spoken or whether there was a struggle.

Unusually for a victim of an alleged rape, she eschewed immediately going to the police, and instead “spent the next six months trying to forget what had happened, suppressing all thoughts and feelings.” She finally reported the assault to college welfare officers at the end of the second term, once she’d heard allegations that her purported attacker had been “harassing” other students. The welfare officers failed to pass her concerns on to the college dean as promised, so she went directly to him.

In what amount to serious allegations of misconduct on the part of the dean, Ramey claims he brushed her concerns off. She also claims he said that the alleged rape was what happens when students drink too much. She says in her account that the dean "tried to explain the guy's actions by saying he had a drinking problem."

There are conflicting accounts as to what happened to Ramey's alleged attacker. The anonymised account given in the Telegraph in January by a pseudonymous "Rachel" holds that no disciplinary action was taken against the alleged attacker, but that arrangements were made whereby he would me asked to avoid her.

Last week's report in the Telegraph, however, reports that Ramey was told that the college would not take action against the alleged rapist unless Ramey made police report, which she did.

Last week's pre-action Telegraph article reports that the Crown Prosecution Service dropped the case three months later because there was a low chance of conviction. This also seems to have been the view of the University according to the earlier write-up, which reported that a junior proctor investigating Ramey's case noted "little tangible evidence."

The proctor also raised concerns that if questioned before a panel, the man accused by Ramey would have to answer questions not tested before a criminal court.

It is easy to see why the criminal case against Ramey's purported rapist got nowhere. Ramey is sheepish about admitting how readily she had given consent to her alleged attacker, and how competently she had communicated its withdrawal. She uses ambiguous language to describe what happened, admitting that she "kind of gave in."

She then says she asked her attacker to stop, and claims he ignored her and carried on fingering her, after which she was overcome with fear. She claims to have "gotten away", quite likely into the vicinity of a student halls where there would have been ample witnesses. She makes no mention of telling a friend on the night, and, crucially, eschews making a police report immediately after the event.

Listen and believe

Jackie Coakley, protagonist of the rape hoax perpetrated by feminist journalist Sabrina Rubin Erdely

Faced with the circumstances, the police were right to treat this as an unlikely case to succeed before a jury. Feminists boldly demand that we should “listen and believe” women who claim to have been raped. The accused, on the other hand, would have certainly said that the entire evening was consensual, raising the uncomfortable question that any sensible jury would ask: was this a false rape allegation based on a guilt-based, retroactive revocation of consent?

The University, to its credit, had admitted before the High Court hearing that it would be unlikely to open an investigation into a serious allegation of assault that has already been the subject of an unsuccessful police investigation.

Ramey’s case was disputing precisely this. Case papers outlined her argument that: “[t]he more serious an assault upon a woman, the less likely the university will take action to investigate and potentially take disciplinary action.” And rightly so. University pastoral staff are entirely ill-equipped for handling serious allegations of rape.

This has been amply demonstrated in America with Obama’s Title IX reforms. Academics an inadequate grasp of due process and intellectual loyalty to poisonous ideologies such as radical feminism (all penis in vagina sex is rape) and post-modern epistemology (truth and logic are social constructs, there is no such thing as absolute truth), have been put in charge of campus sexual complaints adjudication on campus.

This has resulted in growing case law generated by male students suing for redress after being subjected to banana-state procedures and having their academic careers ruined.

Title IX-style kangaroo courts, coming to a British campus near you

Elizabeth Ramey's case is the first salvo fired in the campaign to impose the same US-style approach in British universities. Title IX reforms were imposed on a top-down basis by the Obama regime. Compliance was enforced at financial gunpoint, colleges were threatened with defunding unless they implemented reforms to the letter.

This inlcuded expressly requiring that campus investigations not be contingent on a police report and that the standard of proof be lowered to "preponderance of the evidence" from the stricter "beyond reasonable doubt."

The same end is being sought in England by way of litigation. Judicial Review is a means by which aggrieved citizens can challenge state decisions they disagree with. Judges can order any state institution to change a policy which falls afoul of administrative law.

Universities are not public institutions in the UK, but since when they are adjudicating sexual assault complaints they are acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, they fall within reach of the long arm of the High Court, which may in future force them to adopt a more draconian position.

The usual suspects

A look at the profiles of Elizabeth Ramey's legal team reveals who exactly is pushing this attack on the due process rights of male students. Ramey's case was funded by the Equality and Human Rights Commission, a quango set up by the Blair administration, tasked with enforcing equality laws on Britain. Its former chairman, Trevor Philips, is renowned for having kept a bust of Vladimir Lenin on his desk during his tenure.

Ramey is also supported by Sarah Green, acting director of the End Violence Against Women Coalition, a feminist quango given an inordinate amount of column space in British newspapers to push policies like "consent lessons" for schoolchildren and the denial anonymity for rape suspects. "EVAW" also tried to bully the BBC for including a case study of a false rape accusation in one of the reports.

Ramey's counsel in the High Court, Karon Monaghan QC, is a tenant at the radical left-wing Matrix Chambers, where Cherie Blair, wife of Tony, and international feminist plied her trade before leaving to concentrate on the Cherie Blair Women's Foundation.

Monaghan has litigated high-profile progressive legal actions, defending the council that sacked a Christian registrar for asking to abstain from officiating gay civil partnerships, and also suing the Bed and Breakfast owners who refused, on the basis of their Christian beliefs, to let double rooms to homosexuals.

Whether Elizabeth Ramey is a real victim of a bona-fide sexual assault, or simply another woman making a false rape allegation after having a sexual encounter she came to regret is irrelevant. The real relevance of her case is that it is the thin end of the wedge being used by progressive quangos like the EHRC and the End Violence Against Women coalition, and activist lawyers like Karon Monaghan to introduce a Title IX-style campus adjudication policy into British universities and colleges.

This will mean that flimsy cases like that of Ms. Ramey, where no police report has been made and where it is one person's word against another, may soon be adjudicated, Title

IX-style, by academic feminists with a burning hatred of due process and men in general.

Read Next: Student Accused Of Rape By Emma Sulkowicz To Sue Columbia University

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

How To Avoid The Point Of No Return

May 20, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I want to discuss a phenomenon that occurs commonly in game and will be recognisable to guys who meet and date women regularly. In general when dealing with a new girl, textbook advice applies—you must make the interaction sexual early, and escalate rapidly in order to seal the deal, lest you lose her to one of her many orbiters in the Tinderdrome.

The trouble, though, is in knowing how far to push it on the first date. If you go to far and get the girl too turned on without sleeping with her then the chances are you will never see her again.

This is a paradox because in doing precisely the things you need to do to have sex with most girls—being tactile, and escalating from hand-holding and light touching to making out and more sexualised physical expression—you also run the risk of getting her too near the boil and then losing her.

It's counterintuitive because, as men, the more a girl turns us on, the more likely we are to want to sleep with her. Surely it should be the same the other way around? Apparently not.

The Two Types Of Dates

There are basically two types of dates – the “couple of quick drinks as a precursor to a one-night stand” date; and the “date one” date, where there may be another one, two, or three meetings before sex finally occurs, if it does at all. Standard advice is to try to steer your interaction towards the former—so even if the girl didn’t leave the house expecting to get down and dirty, she is swept away by passion in the moment and succumbs anyway.

The problems with this is that it works very, very well until it doesn’t. The fact is that however good looking you are, however dominant your male presence, however skilled at conversation, humor and escalation, even in 2015 there are still many girls who simply won’t put out on the first night.

And that is not taking into account peripheral issues like periods, boyfriends, work issues and so on. And if you get one of these girls all hotted up on a date then the chances are after she’s had time to cool down and assess the situation her so-called “anti-slut defence” will kick in and she will refuse to see you again.

Speaking as a member of the gender that will always rush back to the scene of the crime if sex is on offer, this is hard to understand. But if you have made your sexual desire so apparent to a woman without her having taken the bait, then she knows that there really is no way forward for you two other than for her to sleep with you.

So by agreeing to meet with you again she is basically tacitly stating that she’ll have sex. And remember, girls like to feel like “it just happened.” If there’s one thing they hate it’s being made to feel slutty.

The Point Of No Return

This happened a few years ago. I met a girl outside a cafe who was eyeballing me as I walked down the street. I took her number and we went out a few days later. We went to a bar where, after one drink, she was all over me—literally straddling me as we made out (not a good look, but hey, I was experimenting with PDA at that time).

However, try as I might to pull her back to my place, she wouldn't go for it. Fair enough. I split—and even as I did, I knew I would never see her again. Sure enough, when I pinged her a few days later, there was no response.

Why should this be the case? Anyone seeing us together would have assumed—rightly—that she was really into me. Certainly, there can be no doubt that she was physically attracted and turned on. The mistake I made, though, was taking her to the "point of no return" too early, on a first date when she never intended to have sex. Going home, she probably felt slutty, that I was "only after one thing."

Many game-savvy guys won't be surprised at this, and will probably claim that they always keep it cool and make the girl wait for the make-out until they're back at their place. Fine, but the fact remains that I've used the technique of hard escalation described above many times, and more often than not it's got me laid. What you can't legislate for is the small number of times where you lose the girl.

How To Avoid Over-Escalation

The trick, then, is to know which girls you should escalate hard with and which girls you should hold back on. The Troy Francis surefire way of determining this? I'm sorry guys, but there isn't one. If there was ever a girl with DTF written all over her then it was the one I described above, and over-escalation cost me the lay. Other girls who have looked a lot more innocent have succumbed eagerly.

My advice is this. When meeting a girl on a date for the first time you must sexualise the interaction, you must push the envelope ,and at a minimum I would recommend you always ask her to come back to your place to “watch a movie,” see your prize tomatoes, or whatever. You might as well take the shot, and in most cases you won’t lose points. If anything, she’ll credit you for trying.

If, though, you get any sense that this girl is not up for accompanying you home for a little nocturnal fun tonight, then you must pull back and cool it. By all means make out with her a little at the end of the date, but don’t overdo it. Don’t try to be a pick-up hero.

Accept that many girls are simply not cool with one-night stands and chill. If you don’t push it too hard then the chances are she’ll agree to meet you again and you can game her once more, hopefully with more favourable results this time.

Read More: What To Do on a Date to Maximize Your Chances Of Closing

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The DEFCOCK Alert System

May 21, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

The DEFCON readiness system is used by the United States military to describe the preparedness level of the armed forces in response to ongoing foreign threats. It's time to introduce a system for heterosexual men called DEFCOCK to allow them to judge a city or environment when it comes to threats presented by women.

DEFCON has five stages that allow the US military command to prepare the appropriate state in response to hostile foreign action:

DEFCON 5 — Normal readiness
DEFCON 4 — Above normal readiness with tightened security measures
DEFCON 3 — Air Force ready to mobilize in 15 minutes
DEFCON 2 — Armed Forces ready to deploy and engage in less than 6 hours due to possible nuclear war
DEFCON 1 — Maximum readiness to combat imminent nuclear war

While DEFCON levels are not publicly published by the US military, it is presumed we are currently in DEFCON 3. There have been two previous incidents where we were confirmed to be in DEFCON 2 (Cuban Missile Crisis and the first Gulf War in 1991).

Now that the world is rapidly turning against masculinity, it's time we implement a DEFCOCK alert system to provide objective and standardized information on whether a certain environment is healthy or not for men. Here are the five levels of the DEFCOCK system:

DEFCOCK 5

Completely normal male-female relations in a patriarchal society that believes in a binary gender system of man and woman. Homosexuality is persecuted. Casual sex is difficult (if not impossible). There is no threat of wifing up a former cock carousel rider and then being divorce raped by her. Provider or tribal game is required to land a woman.

Current examples: Iran, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, most Muslim countries
Male safety level: Perfectly safe for men to marry and procreate

DEFCOCK 4

Mostly normal male-female relationships in a fractured patriarchal society that is beginning to accept alternative lifestyles and gender systems, though men are still valued for being masculine and women are valued for being feminine. Casual sex is common but self-limiting. Divorce rates may be high, but there is a low threat of divorce rape. A mixture of provider and clown game is needed.

Current examples: Russia, Ukraine, Turkey, Colombia
Male safety level: Currently safe from an institutional perspective but near-term changes are possible

DEFCOCK 3

Substantial degradation in traditional sex roles where men are beginning to focus on aesthetics, style, and fame seeking. Women have gained masculine traits and delay monogamy to launch a meaningless office career while experimenting with over 25 local and foreign penises to understand how their vaginas respond to various bad boy stimuli. Provider game is beginning to get phased out among women under 30. Some clown game is required in most relationships.

Current examples: Poland, Estonia, Brazil
Male safety level: Great care must be undertaken with female mate selection for marriage; new anti-male legislation is highly likely within 10-year time frame

DEFCOCK 2

Traditional sex roles are actively shamed in major institutions, particularly in the media, academia, and government. Non-heterosexual lifestyles are promoted as superior and major efforts are undertaken to destroy traditional marriage. Campaigns are launched to shame and criminalize consensual sex and masculine behavior such as flirting and bodybuilding. Divorce rape is common, with likelihood of imprisonment for missing alimony payments. Provider game is useless on beautiful women. Clown game is required for all men wanting to get laid.

Current examples: United States, Canada, England, Scandinavia
Male safety level: Unsafe to engage in marriage or reproduction; must screen carefully even for casual sexual encounters; slight danger for normal day-to-day masculine living

DEFCOCK 1

Complete absence of traditional sex roles. Institution of marriage reduced to farce. Severe threat of imprisonment for men displaying heterosexual or masculine behaviors. Roaming witch mobs actively surveil and monitor men who hint at having normal levels of testosterone. Women are elevated to goddess status while straight men appointed as their sexual servants through both legal action and media shaming.

Male safety level: Unsafe to live, fornicate, marry, or procreate; males must immediately vacate area for their own personal safety, both physical and mental

As much as many of you would like to apply DEFCOCK 1 levels to places like London, Washington DC, and Toronto, we are not quite there yet. The next five years will be critical to see if certain DEFCOCK 2 cities slide into DEFCOCK 1, which is absolutely unsuitable for male habitation. If I were to place bets, Toronto will be the first international city to enter DEFCOCK 1. This is likely to happen before 2023.

I left Washington DC, a DEFCOCK 2 location, for my current home in Poland, which recently entered DEFCOCK 3 overall, with a small possibility of entering DEFCOCK 2 in the next ten years. Each man has his own preferential DEFCOCK level that gives him the freedom to pursue sexual relations with women who still look and act like women. It's obvious to me that DEFCOCK 3 and 4 provide a band of pleasure and happiness for the average man to live life on his own terms while pursuing a variety of relationship types.

It would be great if countries remained static when possessing a favorable DEFCOCK level, but as you've seen within your own lifetime, decline is inevitable, and I have not personally witnessed a country improving its DEFCOCK status. The best advice I can give men who don't want to move every three years is to find a city that is either in DEFCOCK 4 or just recently slipped to DEFCOCK 3, because once a decline accelerates, it may happen too quickly for you to leave before you wake up and see a nuclear cloud in the shape of a vagina right outside your window.

Read Next: Cultural Collapse Theory

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Virginia Schoolboard Gives In To SJWs With New "Gender Identity" Policies

May 21, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

This month, progressives initiated the use of a blitzkrieg tactic attack against normal men and women. On May 7th, the school board of Fairfax County, Virginia voted to add "gender identity" to the nondiscrimination policy currently enforced at its schools. The school board voted to approve the measure even though a standing-room only crowd of parents turned up to oppose it.

The most obvious ramification of this new policy is that if a male student decides to identify as a girl, he will be able to use the same bathrooms and locker rooms used by real girls. The change is intended to benefit the tiny minority of students who genuinely believe they belong to a different gender than the one they were born with.

As an aside, I think the biggest beneficiaries of the policy will probably be horny, heterosexual boys who want to see their female peers naked. Practically speaking, it will be impossible for school administrators to tell whether they are dealing with a genuinely confused student, or someone who just wants to see some T&A.

Be that as it may, the other (and perhaps more important) outcome of the change is that parents will no longer be able to request a transfer away from a transgender teacher, ensuring that a mentally ill person will be charged with the formation of their child's studies and character.

“Gender Fluidity”

But the Fairfax County School Board is not stopping there in its transgender jihad. The board recently released a report recommending that changes be made to Fairfax County’s family life curriculum for grades 7 through 12 to include the concept of “gender fluidity.”

The report states that “Emphasis will be placed on an understanding that there is a broader, boundless, and fluid spectrum of sexuality that is developed throughout a lifetime. Sexual orientation and gender identity terms will be discussed with focus on appreciation for individual differences.”

The report adds that “Students will be provided definitions for sexual orientation terms heterosexuality, homosexuality and bisexuality; and the gender identity term transgender.”

Why is this a blitzkrieg tactic?

Blitzkrieg is the German term for “lightning war.” Wikipedia defines it as a “tactic designed to create disorganization among enemy forces through the use of mobile forces and locally concentrated firepower.” The Fairfax County School Board’s introduction of the transgender agenda into the public schools fits the definition of blitzkrieg perfectly.

A previous example of social engineering was the campaign to gain public acceptance of homosexuality. This campaign had two fronts. On one front, gay activists introduced court cases to gain legal protections for gay people. But the primary front was by changing public opinion through featuring charming gay characters on popular movies and TV shows. This campaign to change public opinion literally took decades to achieve.

This time, as the Fairfax County School Board actions show, progressives are not waiting for the court cases or a change in public opinion. They are using "locally concentrated firepower" by forcing their transsexual agenda on children in one of the largest school districts in the country. It is certain that we'll see other school districts soon following suit.

It is important to note that parents are overwhelmingly against the changes that the Fairfax County School Board is introducing. By introducing these changes, the members of the school board are increasing the possibility that they will be voted out of office in the next election. But it doesn't matter because by then it will be too late—the transsexual agenda will already be firmly in place.

But I was born this way!

Bruce Jenner

No doubt, the boldness of forcing the transsexual agenda is encouraged by the success of the gay "I was born this way" message. Heterosexuals have been conditioned to accept anyone at face value who says that he has felt a particular way since he was a child, even if there was no evidence of their preferences.

Recently I forced myself to watch parts of Diane Sawyer's interview with Bruce Jenner on his transgender journey to becoming a "woman," and the "born this way" narrative was front and center during the interview. The majority of the interview was devoted to proving that Jenner had always been a woman, and that he knew it, even when he was a child.

For example, when Jenner was eight years old, he snuck into his mother's closet to try on her clothes. If that is not definitive, scientific proof that he was always a woman trapped in a man's body, I don't know what is.

What are progressives trying to achieve?

Picture from BronyCon. Note that women have even infiltrated this one time bastion of "masculinity"

The real question is why are the SJWs within the school board willing to stake their careers on pushing transgender orthodoxy upon innocent children?

For the SJW masses, the answer is that the policy changes will make gender-confused children more comfortable. They will be able to pee in the bathroom that will give them the most validation. However, I suspect that the elite SJWs have darker reasons for supporting this change.

The first reason is that children are very susceptible to being influenced by authority figures like teachers. If a boy or a girl comes from an unstable home life, as is increasingly common, they are more susceptible to being brainwashed.

If the SJWs can indoctrinate these children early enough, they can ensure that the children will remain confused about their sexuality for their entire life.

Although the SJWs claim that they are just keeping up with the new "scientific truth" of gender fluidity, what they are really doing is using the divide and conquer strategy against the wider society. Someone who identifies as being a "transsexual female brony who is attracted to biracial cisgender male furries" will be more likely to be a ward of the state. He will also be a reliable soldier and voter (i.e. useful idiot) in support of future SJW social engineering campaigns.

I think that this support of these future social engineering campaigns is the second reason that SJWs are ramming the transsexual agenda down our throats so quickly.

What might the next battlefront be? The ultimate prize for some progressives may be the lowering of the age of consent for sex with boys. It is not hard to imagine a future where Diane Sawyer will interview a well-known celebrity with a penchant for boys. No doubt, he will claim that he was “born this way.”

Conclusion

Although Fairfax County has been in the news recently due to its gender identity policy changes, it is not the first school system to have implemented changes to accommodate the needs to transgender students. The New York City Department of Education and other progressive school districts already have policies in place.

If you live in a more conservative district, rest assured that the recognition of gender fluidity is coming soon to a school near you.

Read More: 8 Ways To Spot A Transsexual

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why Emigrating To Toronto Is A Bad Choice For Successful And Ambitious Men

May 21, 2015 | by Rupert Trenton | Link | Original Link

I firmly believe that immigrating to the province of Ontario is a bad choice for men who are considered successful and ambitious in their home countries. My main focus will be on the topic of immigration to major cities in Ontario such as Toronto, because at least 100,000 people move to Toronto on an annual basis searching for a better life.

Feminism in Toronto

Feminism in Toronto creates paranoia.

It is already known that Toronto is a highly feminist society, and using Roosh's DEFCOCK scale, Toronto might be at the DEFCOCK 1.5 level. In his Youtube video response "A message to the people who love Toronto," Roosh claims that the responses he received from Torontonians ranged from name-calling to personal attacks on his character.

What was interesting was that he pointed out that any criticism of Toronto is faced with a risk of getting disproportionately bashed and shamed. This suggests that there is a brainwashing campaign afoot in Toronto, where any form of criticism against Toronto (especially the women) is considered "offensive," despite being rooted in the many subjective experiences of countless men.

Propaganda hides the inconvenient truth about Toronto

It appears that the Toronto residents who disagree with ROK's stance are doing so partly because of the message that the media, government, and academic institutions are constantly feeding them about their home. One must understand that good PR campaigns about Toronto are vital for its immigration industry.

It is known that prospective immigrants have to carry a certain amount of money in savings in order to immigrate to Ontario, roughly $10,000 Canadian dollars. This means that immigrants bring money into the province, which will be used to stimulate the stagnant economy of Ontario, where manufacturing once thrived before the 2008 economic recession.

Toronto is the capital of Ontario. Therefore, articles and newspapers that discuss about the poor state of dating and social life in Toronto are topics that usually get censored. Negative publicity about Canada will affect the immigration industry because if a prospective male immigrant from a foreign country reads the truth about Toronto's women, he will certainly think twice before booking that flight to Canada.

The censorship of politically incorrect statements

There also appears to be a form of censorship going on behind the scenes. One instance of negative publicity occurred when the NotCanada.com website was formed to warn potential immigrants to Canada that skilled people ended up working in low wage jobs because their credentials were not recognized. In addition, the NotCanada website contained testimonies and complaints from immigrants that Canada is not the paradise as it advertises itself on the media.

However, the NotCanada.com website was mysteriously taken down after a news agency made a documentary about the plight of immigrants to Canada. One of its articles can be found here, but the website is not even available on internet archives — it is “excluded” from the Wayback Machine. It can be safely said that any website which criticizes the feminist movement in Toronto will continue to be the target of SJW blowback.

In a healthy democracy, opposing topics such as the poor state of the dating market in Toronto, the rude behaviour of women in Toronto, and the insanity of feminism in Toronto must be allowed for discussion. However, it appears that these types of opposing viewpoints are not tolerated. At many universities in Toronto, criticism of feminism is viewed as hate speech, yet feminists are allowed to assemble and cause disruptions to Men’s Rights meetings as they did back in 2012.

The high cost of living and boring culture

Many Canadian employers do not recognize foreign work experience.

The cost of living is so high in Toronto that it will be very difficult to save money on a minimum wage. There is currently a housing bubble in Toronto which makes housing and accommodation costs very expensive as compared to other cities around the world.

Additionally, Toronto is known by many immigrants as a boring city because of a lack of identity and culture. In other words, a man will have his status degraded, forced to work menial jobs, and live a boring life, all under the watch of man-hating feminists. Where can we sign up?

Closing Remarks

Men really need to avoid Toronto at all costs. This is why I’m planning to get out from Toronto and live somewhere else at the earliest opportunity. There is something very wrong with Toronto, and it will only continue to get worse for men.

Trust me; you don’t want to experience the feminist tyranny in Toronto. You will be glad you avoided moving to this city.

Read More: Why I Moved From Toronto To Montreal

Rupert Trenton
Rupert Trenton was originally from South America, now residing in Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

Playboy Endorses Dating Women Who Have Had Double Mastectomy

May 21, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

When I was just a boy, the Internet was something I only read about in SF novels. My main source of information and entertainment were magazines of all kinds. Thankfully, my grandparents had giant stacks of various magazines from ages long past and allowed me to rummage through them.

I spent hours upon hours dispassionately flipping through their pages, stopping only when I found something that interested me. I was dispassionate, that is, until I stumbled upon a Playboy.

I have no idea how it ended up in the midst of drab technical magazines or how it evaded the piercing eyes of resident females, but there it was. Its pages glossy and glistening, I looked at the front page and instantly knew I've struck gold.

I vividly remember how I waited for everyone to go asleep or get busy before sneaking into this little archive of mine and finding the Playboy in the same place where I left it.

With bated breath and my whole body trembling in excitement, I studied every page to the tiniest detail and absorbed everything: the gorgeous lines and shades of naked women, raunchy jokes and various stories for which I had no context. All of this content opened a whole new world to me, a world of glamor in which a man traveled freely, had loads of sex and enjoyed life with style.

It was uncensored to the point I've never seen before and resembled something that only a man would share with another man. Sadly, this once glorious conduit for inspiring boys to not get married is now just a shadow of its former self and delivers SJW propaganda straight to impressionable boys.

The inevitable equalist infiltration

One of Playboy's online articles, published May 15, talks about dating women who've had both of their breasts removed due to breast cancer or mere threat of it. Written by a standup comedian who also underwent the same treatment, Eden Dranger, this 1,100-word article reads more like a press release of some medical association rather than an article aimed at men.

As much as it pained me to ruin my childhood memories, I dove into the article and here's the gist of it:

> Guys, hot, single women the world over are taking their health into their own hands and getting 100 percent artificial and cancer-free breasts. I'm here to let you in on a little secret: WE WANT TO HAVE SEX!

Nope, doesn't sound desperate at all

This Playboy article is a desperate cry for sexual attention, made even sadder by the attempt of the writer to frame it as coming from a strong, independent woman. She lists her erogenous zones and tries to convince the reader that scratching her back counts as foreplay, but it's all a failed appeal to emotion. She feels it, so it must be true, but it's not.

Without her breasts Eden has lost a part of her femininity, which many men may find to be a dealbreaker (especially if this was done electively rather than due to sickness). Despite the social programming to the contrary, we are here to tell you that you don't have to settle for a fatty, a mentally ill woman, or one who no longer has breasts. Not even if your favorite magazine tells you that you should.

Read More: Do Women Become Irreparably Damaged After Allowing Arab Princes To Defecate On Them?

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Rape Culture Was Invented In 1975

May 22, 2015 | by Michael Augustus | Link | Original Link

Still left wondering how the preposterous "Rape Culture" hysteria began? It's okay, you weren't supposed to know.

On September 9, 1973, two black prisoners of Lorton, Virginia founded the group, Prisoners Against Rape (P.A.R) (Source). Inmate on inmate, guard on inmate, all sorts of rape going on in the prison systems was left unchecked. Out of desperation, this growing group was reaching out to other alleged victims in an attempt to bring more attention to the issue, and possibly get sympathy.

Guess who they sought as an ally? Answer: feminists. After all, they've been crying out about rape and domestic violence for years, shouldn't they be perfect for the cause? They had no idea who they were dealing with.

The Term Was Hijacked

Influenced by P.A.R, the movie producer, Margaret Lazarus, released the Cambridge documentary film, Rape Culture (video below), in 1975, discussing the prison rape issue. Guess what happened the same year of its release? Feminists redefined the term as the ever-present, systematic, patriarchal sexual oppression of women, leaving P.A.R. in the dust.

The black prisoners' plight was just a vehicle used to further the agenda of the female imperative. This was the very first sign that rape hysteria was never about saving people from rape, but about retaining exclusive victimhood status for women. 1975 was the official start of all future feminist laws and political correctness. Just take a look at this timeline. After 1975, the cancer of feminism exploded.

Timing

It is no coincidence that this happened after 1974. Starting from the beginning of WWII in 1942, to the end of the Vietnam War in 1975, there were too many real simultaneous or back-to-back issues at hand: the Civil Rights Movement (~1940-1970), the Cold War (1947-1991), Korean War (1950-1955), and the Vietnam War (1955-1975).

Only after the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and two wars, could women's cries even be considered. Once the dust of battle and unrest settled, betas and white knights in the casual sex market could turn their focus on pleasing and supplicating to women at any cost.

The Mindset Of Our Opposition

Here are some quotes from the 1973 Feminist Alliance Against Rape (FAAR) newsletter, by Larry Cannon and William Fuller…

Men Are Taught to Rape By Society

> RAPE, like all other crimes, arises out of our social environment, from ideas we learn from our relations with institutions and from people as we grow into adults.

> In other words, RAPE is culturally America, that is, RAPE is the product of the racist and repressive ills tied into the American way of life which is ingrained into the masses from the cradle.

When deciphering the statements of SJW's and women, replace their buzzword terms with the definition (e.g. Rape). Translation: Starting from the cradle, America teaches men to force their penis into women's vaginas against their will. Sounds ridiculous right?

Rape Culture Is An Airborne Virus

In my last post, New York Has Adopted Yes Means Yes, I described New York Governor Andrew M. Cuomo's reasoning for passing the Affirmative Consent Resolution as follows…

> The almighty, ever-present rape culture lingers in the air. Every breathing female, especially those in university, are at great risk of sexual assault. In fact, 1 in 4 women who draw breath from the patriarchy become infected with rape.

This is by no means a caricature of the prevalent beliefs of rape culture as proven below…

> Society in general, and individuals in particular, believe that dehumanizing tactics such as castration, prison, and the like would prevent RAPE. This is a total myth. It attacks only the effect. The cause is still at large with the potentiality to strike any woman as would a cold.

Rape Is Profitable

> Why was slavery institutionalized in American society, then rendered extinct? Wasn't it a social custom? We could go on and on in describing extinct social norms from language to child-rearing. Why hasn't this society applied itself to RAPE in a similar vain? Because crime, that is, certain crime has a monopoly on dividends and RAPE is a major source of political and economical revenue or capital. It is a great "law and order" slogan. It's an asset to man's rule and male supremacy as opposed to a liability.

Oh yeah, they went there. Feminists tried to conflate the horrors of black slavery with the conjured concept of Rape Culture.

What if Brad Pitt Did It?

To refute to the Rape Culture narrative, simply conduct a basic thought experiment. Every time a woman or mangina claims a specific situation to be the result of Rape Culture, ask yourself, if the "perpetrator" were Brad Pitt, would a woman mind?

Take the NYC Street "Harassment" video, for example. What if instead of middle and lower class minorities hitting on her, it was Brad Pitt, Tom Brady, Tupac, and Jon Hamm? Do you think any woman in question would cry sexual harassment or Rape Culture?

How about 50 Shades of Grey? Why isn't that considered a source of Rape Culture? Again, let's look at the "perpetrator" to determine why this isn't the case… Oh, what do you know, the "perpetrator" is a handsome billionaire. This is classic a case of "Watch what they do, not what they say."

The Rape Culture narrative only applies to the bottom 80% of men. All anti-male legislation from family law (mandatory) to affirmative consent originate from the woman's need to separate men into two categories: sperm donors (top 20%) and providers (bottom 80%), without being held accountable for their actions.

Conclusion

Rape Culture is a false narrative perpetuated for the purposes of retaining victimhood status, the entitlements that come with it, and optimizing the female imperative in a time where technology and societal structure has virtually removed all needed effort to survive and thrive.

As a matter of fact, the more prosperous a nation is, the stronger its feminist ideals. By what other means besides indoctrination and lies could women convince society that they are helpless victims when they have more rights, privileges, and social leniency (read: pussy pass) than any man, combined with the fact that we live in the most safe and luxurious time in history?

Read More: 4 Things In Common Between "Rape Culture" And Roofie Hysteria

Michael Augustus
AKA dr_warlock My Blog: RedPillDoctor.com My Email: Trp.Red: dr_warlock Youtube Channel: dr_warlockTRP Twitter: @dr_warlockTRP

Why Is Outspoken Feminist Charlize Theron Dating Alleged Woman-Abuser Sean Penn?

May 22, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In 2008, actress Charlize Theron was designated as a UN Goodwill Ambassador, deciding to focus on eradicating violence against women. Theron's upbringing in South Africa included the death of her father after her mother was ruled to have killed him in self-defense.

Some people may be skeptical about the legitimacy of this version of events, but I honestly believe the account proffered by Charlize and her mother: her father was an abusive alcoholic, one amongst a distinct minority of men. What is troubling, however, is Theron's current enthralment with Sean Penn, whose domestic and other violent incidents are legendary within and outside Hollywood.

Most ROK readers will be familiar with Sean Penn's infamous baseball bat explosion at Madonna in the 1980s, which resulted, spectacularly, in a mere misdemeanor on his record. Like a true Hollywood liberal, Penn is exonerated for actions which make Mel Gibson's alleged outbursts look like a kindergarten birthday party.

He also served jail time for a serious assault on a photographer. Madonna had refused to press charges against Penn for his violence at the time, almost certainly because he was already facing incarceration for pummelling that photographer.

“Hey Madonna, wanna watch the Dodgers game with me and my baseball bat?”

Police reports about Penn’s later pugilist antics are in the public domain, including his bizarre scaling of a Malibu mansion to inform Madonna that he owned her like a chattel. One police lieutenant, when he came across Madonna after that same incident, described her as bleeding and unrecognizable.

It is not at all bewildering that she claimed then that Penn had tried to bind her multiple times, and that he only relented when she performed sexual activity on his person.

It may seem incongruous that ROK would pillory a man for behavior against a woman, given the climate of false or poorly “proven” domestic violence cases. Sean Penn, though, wholeheartedly deserves an exemption.

And Charlize Theron, admittedly lacking a comparable violent character, continues to engage in overt hypocrisy for even allowing Penn to court her. Her feminist talking spiels, in retrospect, look more like polished public relations exercises to promote herself and her films than an aspect she takes seriously in her own life.

Can some women ever resist the bad (and violent) boy?

There are a range of incidents, especially against the media, where Sean Penn should have been charged, convicted and jailed, but wasn't. Hollywood privilege at its finest. Enjoy, Charlize.

Penn has fame, money, his own idiosyncratic form of "suave" and, although far from a favorite performer of mine, a fair degree of sophistication and range as an actor. Many or all of you may hate the themes of his films, his politics, his personal behavior or just him in general, but he is not close to "woeful" as a professional thespian. The "qualities" I mentioned have evidently appealed to Theron, who is rather short on potential male suitors with a similar celebrity name and standing as hers.

Even as she unleashes hell on the "sexism" of the world in her role as a celebrity social commentator and UN Goodwill Ambassador, she completely overlooks the relevance of her dating woman-bashing Sean Penn. A small amount of backward rationalization is all it takes for some people to consciously or unconsciously justify personal choices that vehemently contradict their public stances.

Theron might have excused Penn's actions against Madonna, not to mention his violence towards the paparazzi and others, as a product of the inherent stress of being in the public limelight. Or perhaps it was substance abuse. Or just "being young" and now having grown up (in his 50s!).

Compounding the Madonna and other incidents perpetrated by Penn himself, Theron, as I already established, was a witness to and victim of domestic violence as a girl.

It staggers me that someone with that personal experience wouldn't relate her father's actions to the pure luck Sean Penn had in not permanently incapacitating or killing Madonna with that baseball bat, his fists or in some other manner. Or actively contemplate his additional rap sheet, including the items he was not charged for but should have been.

Do as I act and talk, not as I live in real life

Theron has waxed lyrical about the feminist themes in her films, notably her most recent venture, Mad Max: Fury Road. But when you closely examine her personal life, which doesn't actually require much examination at all, she has shacked up with an inveterately violent and self-absorbed man.

Far from beating Madonna with his fists, Sean Penn chose an object many times harder. There are probably a litany of other situations we are not aware of. Maybe insurance companies now offer paparazzi members specialized "Sean Penn Protection Cover" for $2,499 a month.

Since when, under the touted definition, did feminism resort to condoning women cohabiting with and loving abusers of other women? Theron can talk about feminism and "sisterhood" all she wants, but her romantic choice as of this moment undermines any words emitted from her mouth and any credibility she has as a domestic violence advocate.

Talk is cheap, ultimately, and Theron simply does not deserve her status as a UN Goodwill Ambassador when you consider how it enhances her image and subsequent commerciality.

It's high time that part-time, superficial feminists like Charlize Theron, who indirectly earn millions from their so-called "advocacy on the side," start walking the walk they demand of the society around them.

Read More: Rolling Stone Editor Sean Woods Allows His Far Left Beliefs To Get In The Way Of Facts

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Is Waterboarding Torture?

May 22, 2015 | by Tom Arrow | Link | Original Link

The topic of waterboarding is not a hot one right now, but it is a great example of today's rampant emotionalism. Who is not harassed by human rights activists at least once a week?

My Facebook feed just happened to spit out a joke about waterboarding today and I got curious. There's no shortage of fat slobs and so-called experts who attest that waterboarding is torture inhuman beyond imagination. Yet despite the pseudo-intellectual debate, waterboarding is not black magic. You need a can of water, a cloth, and you need to lie down. What the hell keeps me from trying this?

The experiment

People sometimes say that you need to experience something to be able to talk about it. I don't agree, not generally. But it does, on an emotional level, make you more convincing.

Unlike this guy, I didn't prepare a great set up. I laid down on a flat floor, put a shirt over my head, and spilled water over it. Now you may say that it is not representative and I need an inclined platform. You would be right, but it is irrelevant to my point.

Yes, it's nasty. Having been close to death one or two times in my life, I have a sense for the kind of panic that grips you and it is indeed similar. I managed to breathe in some watery air through the wet cloth while I wasn't pouring further water on it, but during the pouring, the discomfort was unmanageable for me.

I didn't go as far, nor am I as trained, as the guy in the linked article, but I can easily imagine how—if you took it to the edge—you would make statements such as:

> "I have never been more panicked in my whole life. Once your lungs are empty and collapsed and they start to draw fluid it is simply all over. You know you are dead and it's too late. Involuntary and total panic.
>
> […]
>
> If I had the choice of being waterboarded by a third party or having my fingers smashed one at a time by a sledgehammer, I'd take the fingers, no question.
>
> […]
>
> It's horrible, terrible, inhuman torture. I can hardly imagine worse. I'd prefer permanent damage and disability to experiencing it again. I'd give up anything, say anything, do anything.
>
> […]
>
> It's torture. No question. Terrible terrible torture. To experience it and understand it and then do it to another human being is to leave the realm of sanity and humanity forever. No question in my mind."

About emotionalism

The author clearly struggles to express the intensity of his emotion. No wonder—immoderate formulations are so overused in this sensitive world that words lose their meaning. When will the first person scream rape for a glance at a woman's butt?

I think the emotion is a natural reaction. Life has shaped the biological body in order to sustain itself. Obviously, this means that the fear of death must be an absolute. At a certain point, the programming takes over and this loss of control may be impossible to reconcile with the belief in an untouchable soul.

In daily life, we overuse strong words to the point that they can't represent really extreme experiences anymore, leading us to believe that these don't exist. We feel offended by sexual proposals and work ourselves up over tweets. These kind of things become the limits of what we deem humane.

Yet nature doesn't know limits. Inhumane, to us, becomes everything that simply can't be, must not be. But that's wishful thinking.

White lies about white torture

Yes, of course it is torture. How the hell do we think it works? The point is not whether it is torture. It is.

If it wasn't too horrible to accept and live with, how would torture be supposed to work? That is the whole point.

Most people actually seem to think that the kind of interrogation imposed upon potential enemies of our civilizations should be humane. If the pain and devastation of a person being tortured was acceptable, well, the victim of such treatment would be able to resist it and defy the point of breaking that person.

Considering the intensity of the experience and the widespread delusion of the categorical imperative, it is not surprising that you often hear the statement "If you had experienced it, you would think otherwise."

Of course you don't want to be tortured. You don't need an expert to tell you that. But despite Kant, doing unto others is not the same as having something done to you. It's part of growing up to learn to distinguish between yourself and others. Between your group and other groups.

So do the words of somebody who was in great distress carry great meaning?

No, they don't. No matter how intense one's emotions, emotions don't become wisdom. A young man will find it intolerable to be left by a girl—a seasoned player will laugh about it.

White-collared sheep have never experienced anything close to certainty of death. They live in a world that seems to run by itself and have daydreams about utopia. They want the state to tell them bullshit about white torture and the state does so.

Not because the state really believes that, but because white-collared sheep could never be expected to have the strength of character to do a terrible thing.

The important question

The question is not whether it is torture. The question is whether it leads to usable results, and whether these results justify the methods used. And the answer can not automatically be no.

Atrocity is not an argument. Strong nations have always gone through war, which is atrocious. To become and stay strong means to fight. And to fight does not mean to respect limits, to be careful. It means to break limits. The notion of humane warfare is laughable and not more than a public relations gag of a government.

Torture is horrible. And that's because life is meant to be precious. It's an absolute in our brains to fear death. Yet, in a time where one is taught to empathize with practically everybody—because everybody is equal—it is more critical than ever to distinguish between your will to live and the will to live of others. There was once a word that described this concept: Enemy.

I leave it open for debate whether torture leads to any results and whether it should be used.

Read More: Give Her Tingles, Not Torture: Erica's Story

Tom Arrow
Tom was an SJW before it came into fashion and stopped being one when he realized he wasn't special anymore. His father was a smart man who knew better than to stay in cold, cold Germany with his mother - thus Tom has to find out a lot of stuff on his own, e.g. how to grow balls. You can follow him on his blog Man Without Father or on Twitter.

5 Reasons To Take Up Classical Music

May 22, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

We live in an age of boredom, lack of fulfillment and wasted time. Modern culture has become so idle that pursuing a hobby intensively is almost considered to be "a bit weird" and a little old-fashioned. On the other hand, loitering around a public square with a Frappuccino in hand gossiping to your "female friends" is seen to be far more appealing.

It is therefore most welcoming when we are encouraged to take up a new hobby. Masculine pursuits, especially barbell training are slowly becoming outdated, yet are essential to cultivating a strong identity.

It is for this reason that classical music should be considered as a viable option for any aspiring man. Undoubtedly, there have been astounding feats in popular music as has been written about here and here. But with the constant supply of bilge we are subjected to, the more traditional form of music may well be a more suitable form of expression.

Let us examine five reasons to take up classical music performance.

1. The Mindset Is Transferable

First of all, we must concede that this hobby is extremely challenging. The amount of skill it takes to perform the most difficult of pieces takes years and sometimes decades of practice.

The mindset required to persevere with classical music is one of great patience, attention to detail, and robust resilience. Mastering the fickle intonation of a stringed instrument for example can be frustrating and many young players give in early, failing to endure the perpetual squeaking and lack of quick progress.

But the rewards for continuing are great: there is no version of a piece of music in the world better than the one which you play correctly yourself. Furthermore, the days of hard labour show themselves clearly in other pursuits, such as work, sport, or game.

2. It Makes You More Interesting

Wilhelm Furtwangler faced an array of accusations of Nazism and criticism throughout his illustrious career

The average millennial is frightfully dull, lacking in personality or depth, square-eyed and pasty-faced. This is largely down to the fact that there is no incentive to put effort into anything: our living standards are high, technology provides us with a pain-free world, and being uptight and determined is simply not favorable any more.

The most interesting people have lived, suffered, and toiled. Soldiers of war, craftsmen and journeymen provide us with the greatest stories and perspectives of life which many cannot fathom. That which links the above examples is experience, and experience requires effort.

The process of learning and working nurtures a personality and a person worth hearing about. Men are inspired by and women attracted to an achievement one has worked at for a long period of time. Becoming a classical musician is a great antidote to the uninspiring norm.

3. Understanding Ideas Of The Past And Present

A key way that one becomes more interesting through classical music is the ability to convey certain ideas and emotions through sound which are less accessible through prose or images.

Classical music still remains to this day one of the most effective ways of truly understanding the atmosphere and emotion of ages lost. Nothing can portray the burning spirit of patriotism like the booming brass section of a marching band, or the subtleties of a country's rural culture like a European folk song.

The modern age is almost devoid of any profound emotion and its people only respond well to clown-like routines or minute-long Youtube gags. Behind this superficiality is real meaning, and to gain access to it is both fulfilling and respectable.

4. It's Traditional

Classical music is traditional in every positive sense of the word. It is not particularly surprising that it has little place in a decaying civilisation. Leftists and Philistines have even threatened on occasion to drag this noble practice down to their level. We saw this recently in 2013 where the distinguished conductor Valery Gergiev was confronted with ludicrous accusations of homophobia by Gay Rights supporters.

Despite this feeble opposition, classical music's long standing traditions soldier stubbornly on. We see this most clearly in opera and dance, which could not have flourished in a SJW-infested world. As has been written before here and here, dancing relies upon strict gender roles to be the best it can be: the man leads, the woman follows in his step.

Opera is very similar: Wagner's operas would be nonsensical without its strong, masculine heroes. Italian Opera buffa would be not be allowed to be written nowadays because of its misogyny humor and the tradition would be cast into the dustbin of history.

5, Escape

Arguably the most important reason of the five to take up Classical Music is to escape the senseless drudgery of life. The stories of Ludwig Van Beethoven wandering across German pasture writing his Pastoral Symphony and Jean Sibelius' long stays in his country cabin still remain well-known today

By taking up classical music, we follow in the footsteps of those who opened their minds to something far beyond the mundane. It has inspired people over the centuries right up until the modern day: the waiting list for the Bayreuth festival, celebrating the music of Richard Wagner, can last up to ten years.

It is an indulgence far greater than drugs or idleness and will continue to be so for many centuries, and perhaps millennia to come (if humanity gets that far).

In Closing

Classical Music is the perfect compliment to a modern man yearning for tradition, depth, and aesthetic beauty. Undertaking it will transform him into something greater and provide him with fulfilment and most importantly, pleasure. Finally, let us end with some class:

Read More: 5 Things Wrong With Modern Music

Anton Hagen

Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

When Women Abuse Authority To Commit Violence

May 23, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Last week, a piece of world news grabbed media attention when, on the streets of the capital in unrest-torn Burundi, officers clashed with dozens of rioters who had taken to the street to demonstrate against President Pierre Nkurunziza's controversial bid for a third term in office.

A female police officer had shot at unarmed protesters at point-blank range with a Kalashnikov during those protests in Burundi.

The video footage showed the female officer looking agitated as she and her fellow officers slowly moved towards the rioters, who stood pressed against a brick wall. Moments later a brief scuffle between one of her colleagues and a rioter led to her inexplicably shooting at the unarmed man from no more than ten feet.

And just seconds after the shots were fired, the policewoman was punched, kicked, and dragged along the streets of Bujumbura by a furious mob who managed to separate her from her colleagues. However, the female officer's colleagues eventually managed to get between her and her attackers, enabling her to flee to safety with only minor injuries.

Considering the size of the mob and their crazed nature (they even stuck a dead owl to a stick to mock the ruling party) one wonders at the logic of the female officer's decision to open fire on the unarmed protester—which only served to further ignite the mob's fury and already volatile situation.

And, at the same time, the thought which came to mind looking at the pictures in which she was dragged away to safety by her male colleagues was that: eggs are precious, sperms are dispensable—even in that part of the world, no matter how unjustified and stupid the actions of those eggs might have been.

Meanwhile, the story was sensationalized for the "harrowing" images of how the policewoman was kicked, punched, and nearly killed. But the looming questions remain: was her attack justified to begin with? What was she thinking when she inexplicably pulled the trigger on the unarmed protester? Do women understand the difference between a protest and a provocation?

What would have been the public reaction if this instead had occurred in the backdrop of our modern societies? Would our societies then be instead apologetically defending the female officer in question, and further demonizing the unarmed protester?

With the increasing globalization of modern social constructs like feminism into underdeveloped parts of the world, the problem intensifies even further when authority is invested into the hands of women who would be unknowingly and blindly following the footsteps of their feminist and deluded sisters of modern societies.

While it could be argued by some that the guilty female officer was probably not so "intellectually or emotionally developed" for her inexplicable decision, as compared to her "intelligent" modernized sisters in developed societies, the real problem remains unaddressed: that the feminist ideology of investing equal authority to women (wherever they may be) is ridiculously erroneous, especially in law enforcement.

It would also be erroneous to accept the hypocritical reasoning that such women who abuse power were only following "orders," and thus were guiltless. True equality cannot exist because of this hypocrisy—and if men are vilified for unprovoked violence, then women should also be judged for unjustified violence (which usually rarely happens). But the hypocrisy extends to others aspects of contemporary life globally.

The modern double standards of gender violence

Men have always been portrayed as more violent than women, and even more so in our modern gyno-centric societies where men have become increasingly demonized by contemporary culture and women are glorified as the better, "kinder" halves of men.

But in today's world, with gender equality and influx of women into positions of both social and law-enforcement authority, it makes no surprise to note that women are today more prone to violence than ever before, committing the same atrocities what they have traditionally vilified men of doing in the past.

This has even permeated marriages with instances of female-on-male domestic violence rising today as an unspoken truth. To add to that, the terrible consequences of lopsided domestic violence laws continue to embolden women onto the path of degeneracy in modern societies, while feminism and its covert forms continue to be peddled globally in the name of female empowerment.

What we are looking at is a worst case scenario where women globally are increasingly irresponsible in restraining their violent impulses not only on in a social context, but in positions of authority as well.

The irony in this picture is of modern men indoctrinated to believe that women are to be saved, and thus they continue to suffer willingly unless being deprogrammed by the red pill.

Power and authority can corrupt, and women are not immune to their corrupting influence in the long run. History has had many examples of women abusing authority to exact violence – and more so in recent times, thanks to feminism taking away female restraint and investing more authority on them.

Conclusion

The incident in Burundi sums up one important truth about female nature: that there is little difference in women—whether throughout history or in their core nature throughout the world. While the actions of the mob may not have been right, neither was the female officer's.

At the same time, this incident, like many such others, poses an important question: would giving authority to women in law enforcement (wherever it may be) be judiciously right when evidence shows that women themselves are becoming more masculinized globally and increasingly violent in today's world?

With the limits and responsibilities on her behavior lifted by feminism and authority being given to her at historically unprecedented levels, a woman's proclivity for violence under the right circumstances cannot be ignored.

Read Next: The Myth Of Never Hitting A Woman

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

3 Men Who Saved The West

May 23, 2015 | by Robert Beckman | Link | Original Link

Western Civilization was not always the military and scientific powerhouse it has been over the past 500 years. It was made so by the actions of an elite cadre on men fighting thoughout many generations. It was made so by the tips of axes, swords, and rifles. I present to you three such men who defined the borders of Western Civilization and carved out a future for the West to prosper.

1. Charles Martel (The Hammer)

Martel Bashing Skulls

The Battle of Tours

732 AD, Europe, much like today was under siege from Islamic invaders. The Moors had pushed through the Iberian Peninsula and had their eyes on the heartlands of Europe. Charles did not have a professional army at his command, but rather farmers, usually only able to fight between planting and harvest.

His rag-tag group of warrior farmers were outnumbered roughly three to one, and were up against battle-hardened professional soldiers. Using defensive tactics, close-knit formations, and the terrain to his advantage, Martel was able to halt the Islamic invasion into Europe.

2. Jean De Valette

Siege of Malta

In 1565 AD, The Ottoman Empire was quickly expanding westward, having already taken much of the North African coastline and the Balkans. All that stood in their way from further conquest was a tiny island in the Mediterranean occupied by small order of 700 knights. If the Ottomans took the island they would gain a stepping stone into Sicily, Italy, and further into Europe.

The Knights Hospitaller were reinforced by the native Maltese people, a small number of Italian, Greek, and Spanish warriors, along with their servants. Even with these reinforcements the Knight’s forces were outnumbered eight to one. In one month’s time a force of 50,000 Ottoman warriors along with 70 siege cannons captured Fort St. Elmo.

The bodies of the knights killed there were decapitated, lashed to make shift crucifixes, and floated toward Fort St. Angelo. De Valette responded to the insult by ordering his men to fire the heads of dead Ottoman soldiers out of cannons targeted at the Ottoman encampments.

The siege carried on; about two months later the Ottomans had breached the walls on the main island and expected victory, but it was not to be. De Valette himself took up his pike charged toward the breach, inspiring his men. The Ottomans pouring in through the breach were cut down and slaughtered, while being pushed forward by the mass of bodies behind them.

De Valette's men held out ferociously for one more month until a relief force of 28 ships carrying 10,000 warriors from all over Christian Europe drove off the Ottomans.

3. John III Sobieski

Polish Hussars

The Siege of Vienna

In 1683 AD, The Ottoman Turks were staging a massive assault on Vienna, a major strategic point which, if taken, would leave the doors of Europe wide open for Islamic domination. Again Western forces were severely outnumbered. A coalition of Germanic nobles, The Holy Roman Empire, and the Polish Lithuanian Commonwealth, were up against 300,000 Islamic invaders.

The fortifications of Vienna were the strongest and most advanced for their time, with hundreds of state-of-the-art cannons placed strategically across the walls. Turkish sappers dug tunnels under the walls and placed kegs of black powder in key areas.

For two months Vienna was cut off and starved. The walls were being blown to pieces and food supplies were non-existent. Just when the city was about to fall, 80,000 of Europe's finest, under the command of King Sobieski, came to Vienna's defense. King Sobieski, a tactical genius, had roughly 60,000 infantry men fight earlier in the day.

Then after hours of fighting, the Turks were worn and tired. King Sobieski then led the largest calvary charge in history. All at once 20,000 horsemen charged downhill at the exhausted Turks. At the front of the charge were 3,000 Polish Hussars; the most well trained, best equipped, badass, heavy calvary ever.

The result was a bloodbath. Not until modern immigration policy has the Islamic world ever tried to invade the West at such a scale.

Lessons

These three heroes of the West demonstrate all of Jack Donovan's 4 traits of masculinity, strength, courage, mastery, and honor. These men did not fight alone, they were leaders. Leading by example, they fought on the front lines alongside their men, putting themselves in eminent danger.

This method of leadership inspired courage within the hearts of their troops. In modern times many think leadership is simply putting on an authoritative face and telling others what to do; these three men prove that vile notion wrong. Together Martel, De Valette, and Sobieski gave the West a tradition of honor and a legacy of valor.

Read More: What The West Can Learn From India's Checkered History

Robert Beckman
Outdoorsmen, handyman, engineer; Interested in the future of the West.

The Paradox Of The Feminine

May 23, 2015 | by Ray Wolfson | Link | Original Link

We've all come to the realization that women are not quite what we thought they were. It is a bitter pill to swallow and it really can't be reiterated enough, so here are some considerations you should be taking into account in all your interactions with the "fairer" sex.

She's More Mature

[image]
A woman can get pregnant at 12-13, and she knows it. I'm not advocating for teenage pregnancy, far from it, rather a man must take into account the psychological factors that come into play. While you were still looking for jerk off material and hunting out the latest lego set, she was consciously considering motherhood, children, fathers, husbands etc.

On the flip side at 35, she's only a few years shy of becoming a senior citizen. She'll still look reasonable for a while, but her sell-by date is approaching, like an exotic fruit in the produce section of a supermarket.

She's Much Less Mature

[image]
Children rely on others to help them out and so do women. Getting people to help by acting dumb, needy, moody, scatty, sexy, cute, bitchy, sweet, helpless, innocent and so forth is a woman's forte. As anyone whose been around children will know, they actively try it on.

A child will appear to be a bawling mess and need comforting, where it's a completely put up job. A child will appear to be incapable or deliberately avoid something they don't want to do, for no particular reason at all. Often this pure manipulation is not even in the child's best interests and achieves nothing whatsoever. All they are doing is building walls for next time, so they can get you dancing to their tune.

She's More Open

[image]
All the talking and "bonding" helps to establish ties and social connections for when help is needed. It also assists to share problems, feel supported, and support others. Problem is it also drags everything down to the lowest common denominator. Being open is all fine and good, but doing it too quickly not only airs a lot of dirty laundry in public but also establishes superficial connections with other people.

She's Much More Closed

[image]

The best way to hide a lie is to keep it in plain sight. All the talking, bonding, connecting and BFFs hide the fact that she's got secrets she will never talk about EVER. If you hang with a man, he will keep himself to himself and show you little of his personal life, but over time you can find out pretty much anything.

There's precious little a man won't share. A woman, on the other hand, has an entire world of experience that is hers and hers alone.

She's More Focused

[image]

The mechanics of mating and child-rearing is a messy business at best and women need resources for this, since they will be out of action for months at a time. That aside they are physically weaker, most are not as aggressively minded or mentally agile and their biological mechanics does not beget risk taking or confidence in quite the way a man's does.

She knows that she needs to gain access to asset and resources – so she's committed to her ~~divorce lawyer~~ career (or maybe she's not).

She's Less Focused

[image]
The very same messy business of mating and child rearing puts a fog in her future that is best not thought about in too much detail. Women are inclined to make decisions spontaneously on instinct and pure intuition, and while that can be a good thing, it can also lead to useless emotional decisions that lead nowhere, consume time and resources, or take a completely wrong direction.

She'll also rely on the random and spontaneous nature of life to create opportunities for herself, much in the way that a pickpocket might. This can make it extremely difficult for a man to make arrangements, lock her down or plan a future long or short term.

She's More Interesting

[image]

With their looks, sexuality, clothing, makeup, hair, shoes and so forth, women are on face value much more interesting. They have to be to compete for male attention. Plenty of wives in their 40s and 50s have found themselves defacto widows to their husband's business or hobby.

Sex is fun and female company is relaxing and invigorating, but she's under no illusion that she has to compete. Most of this however is largely marketing and packaging.

She's Much Less Interesting
[image]

For all the sexuality and female flair, when you get down to business with a woman, there’s a massive amount of resources and time being wasted on frivolous activities and hanging about. This is in her nature because mating and child rearing are long term, low performance, low pressure activities that beget using up time by the bucket load.

It’s a 10-12 year stretch of fairly menial and pointless goings on that would drive the average red blooded male insane.

She’s More Civilized

Yes, same reason again – mating and child raising require a certain amount of organization and civilization. There is, however, a vast difference between efficient and well organized verses clean and tidy. The real world requires a certain amount of shambles and a man has the ability to set that aside and focus single-mindedly on the task. Women on the other hand are inclined to keep the superficial in order, whilst overlooking major (and messy) logistics.

She’s Less Civilized

[image]

The female side of mating is a protracted, bloody, messy, and physically demanding affair. A woman is far closer to the animal world in this regard. When that side comes out, the insecurities and fear can lead to quite savage instinctive behaviors.

She’s More Sexually Depraved

[image]

Being the “bottom” in a sexual relationship involves that perfect bittersweet moment of letting go and allowing the other person total dominion over you, whilst also enjoying the experience at the same time. This is probably why some men enjoy a dominatrix. In a regular male "top" experience, you have the dopamine rush of conquest, but at the same time a certain amount of performance pressure and thought process must continue.

In the female or "bottom" experience, you can let go and let the other person take control completely. This involves the serotonin rush as well as the dopamine rush. While a man's sexual experience is like a hit of coke, a woman's sexual experience is like a hit of coke and heroin at the same time. She is far more addicted to it once you get her going.

She's Less Sexually Depraved
[image]

Here comes the paradox again: Perhaps in part because she knows how easily she loses control and how completely dominated and addicted she will become, women are also rather good at holding back, going cold, backing off and holding out.

She's More Exciting

[image]
Because her flashy marketing attracts the attention of both other men and other women and because she's more superficially socially open and more spontaneous, she will tend to have a larger circle of friends, a wider range of entertainments and activities available and more on her plate at any one time.

She's Less Exciting
[image]

You will probably find that most of what goes on is incredibly tedious, rather conventional, and the people you will meet through her will be as dull and lifeless as the "excitement" that they are involved in. Anyone can "know the DJ's girlfriend" or "have a VIP pass" thrown their way, but in the end these are not accomplishments in any meaningful sense.

Conclusion

There we have the paradox of the female existence. All these photos are of the same up-and-coming Hollywood hottie. She's the flavor of the moment – she's not any more. The only way to deal with a paradox is to understand and accept it exists.

There's nothing you or I can do about it. You cannot have your cake and eat it. The final paradox is that in creating new life and even in a single sexual experience, a part of her pure feminine nature is destroyed.

Read More: 5 Lines That Potential Wives Cannot Cross

Why You Should Avoid Dating Girls Who Claim They Were Raped

May 24, 2015 | by B.R. Crumb | Link | Original Link

The feminists are right. Men must shoulder the responsibility for ending rape culture, and the way we do it is this: Never date a raped chick.

Next time you hear (or hear of) a chick claiming she got raped, what you should do is nothing. Don't confront or antagonize her. Don't question her motives. Certainly don't quibble over the particulars of the raped chick's story; even if you prove she's lying, the world will still insist she's a victim (see: Jackie Coakley, formerly of UVA).

And don't date her. Simple as that.

To be clear, I'm not suggesting you forego banging a raped chick (after getting her written consent, notarized and in triplicate). Outside of a girl who is currently in the process of going ass-to-mouth with you, in many cases a chick who claims to have gotten raped is the closest thing to a guaranteed freak you can find.

But, whatever else you may do to her, do not date her.

Undercutting Rape's Appeal

Girls are fond of falsely crying rape because in the sexually liberated West, being known as a rape victim is all upside, no downside. Raped chicks are praised for heroism and bravery. Other people lavish attention on them, and ask them to speak about themselves at length, which for chicks is like crack cocaine.

In extreme cases, raped chicks have leveraged their purported suffering into international acclaim and seven-figure book deals.

It bears mentioning that raped chicks have always been coddled and comforted (at least in the West), and in that regard, they are not so different today than before. But in times past, that coddling took place behind closed doors, among family. It was private and there was no way to leverage it into unusual status.

Rape was kept private is because it held terrible implications for the raped chick's future. If she were single, she could be judged unfit for marriage. If she were married and gave birth soon after the rape, the child would be regarded with suspicion if not outright labeled a bastard.

Our society came to regard rape with such gravity primarily because of these things, and only secondarily because of the emotional turmoil a raped chick experiences as she orgasms underneath her alluring, bad-boy attacker.

If men once again refuse to date raped chicks, rape will become once more an infrequent source of private and passing pain, and not an indelible merit badge to be trumpeted across all the media outlets in the land.

Why It Works

Bitches and feebleminded manginas who happen across this humble call for sanity will no doubt object that my plan won't work. Already I can see David Futrelle's fourth chin trembling as he stammers his rebuttal in a fit of pique:

> Maybe this would work against a few famous raped chicks, like Lena Dunham and Emma Sulkowicz, because they've gone public with their stories. But what about all the other raped chicks? They won't tell you they've been raped till you've already pair bonded and shared your Netflix password with them.

Eloquently lisped, Mr. Futrelle, and I thank you for raising that point—because therein lies the brilliance of this strategy.

In point of fact, it hardly matters whether you do or don't date (or even marry) a raped chick. I hear it's a bad idea, but then again, I've only knowingly dated one raped chick and she was one of the most pleasant and down to earth young ladies to ever drink of my golden seed.

What matters is that you say you won't date raped chicks, and thus encourage girls to think that crying rape will hurt their romantic prospects.

Realize that we are fighting a war of disinformation, against an unprincipled enemy that is openly contemptuous of the truth. Nothing could be more tediously unproductive than arguing over facts with an opponent who has chosen to forego them. To win this fight, you have to hit the bitches where it hurts.

And for most chicks, that means attacking their romantic prospects—or, more fundamentally, their attractiveness. Even the most manjawed cunt secretly harbors fantasies of locking down a good man, marrying him, and thereby trebling her disposable income. Chicks will cry rape if it means endless, adoring attention with zero associated cost. But they won't if they think getting raped renders them unattractive in the eyes of men.

A Brief Guide To Never Dating Raped Chicks

This is not baseless internet bravado. I have already begun testing these techniques in the wild. The effect is immediate, dramatic, and amusing. But it is important that you implement Not Dating Raped Chicks properly, so I leave you with several suggestions and one short, real-world example.

First, don’t seek opportunities to voice your aversion to dating raped chicks. Wait for someone else to bring it up.

Second, explain your position with sympathy for raped chicks, even expressing regret that you couldn’t date one. Never dating raped chicks isn’t retributive. It’s simply something you, as a man, feel compelled to do.

Last, don’t take individual responsibility for never dating raped chicks. Explain that all males feel this way; the testicular fortitude to own your feelings is all that distinguishes you from the mass of men.

In practice, it looks like this:

Vapid Office Chick: Did you hear about that girl who got raped at Columbia? It’s awful. I read that at the end, her attacker pulled out and jizzed the words “Reify patriarchy” across her chest.

Enlightened RoK Reader (head bowed): So true, so unquestionably true. And the worst part is, now she’ll never get married.

Vapid Office Chick: Right— wait, what?

Enlightened RoK Reader (mournfully): Yeah. Most men won’t even date a raped chick. How would she ever get married?

Thirsty White Knight: Um, wow. You don’t know what you’re talking about, dude. (turns to Vapid Office Chick) I don’t care about a girl’s past. I care about who she is now.

Enlightened RoK Reader: Sure, but almost all of your friends are women. And don’t you own Scandal on Blu-ray?

Thirsty White Knight (with rising anger): So?

Enlightened RoK Reader: I mostly socialize with other men, and they all say the same thing: They would never date a raped chick. I’m not endorsing it, necessarily. It’s just how men are.

(fin)

This is a 10-megaton truth bomb, and your interlocutors will likely be angry and confused in its wake. Don’t expect them to agree with you, but don’t argue the point further. Once you’ve planted the seeds, step away and give them time to grow.

This is admittedly a long-term strategy. But if we band together in this effort, then someday, in the not-so-distant future, a 6.5 will find herself in her dorm room, regretfully recalling the night she got pounded out by the captain of her college’s club soccer team… and she’ll idly contemplate crying rape.

But then she’ll remember how much she likes the captain of the club swim team, and she’ll consider the impact crying rape would have on his opinion of her. And she’ll think better of her little lie.

And when she does, it will be because together, we took a stand against ever dating raped chicks.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Use The "One Strike" Rule To Improve Your Dating Life

B.R. Crumb
B.R. Crumb is a web developer in New York. He's on Twitter.

Is Taylor Swift A Misogynist? Just Look At The Liner Notes

May 24, 2015 | by Steven Moran | Link | Original Link

In a recent interview with Maxim Magazine, Taylor Swift gave a strong endorsement for feminism:

> "Honestly, I didn't have an accurate definition of feminism when I was younger. I didn't quite see all the ways that feminism is vital to growing up in the world we live in*. I think that when I used to say, Oh, feminism's not really on my radar, it was because when I was just seen as a kid, I wasn't as threatening.* I didn't see myself being held back until I was a woman. Or the double standards in headlines, the double standards in the way stories are told, the double standards in the way things are perceived*. A man writing about his feelings from a vulnerable place is brave; a woman writing about her feelings from a vulnerable place is oversharing or whining.* Misogyny is ingrained in people from the time they are born. So to me, feminism is probably the most important movement that you could embrace, because it's just basically another word for equality."

What a strong voice for women! As the most powerful person in pop , the 6th most powerful leader in the world, she is highly respected—many industry leaders have lauded her as a genius. Taylor is really leading the way to empowering, women right? The dirty truth is her feminist rhetoric is hollow and disingenuous because…

Taylor Swift hires almost exclusively men to make her music.

Let’s take a look at the production credits for her latest album 1989.

Executive Producer: Max Martin

Jack Antanoff	Engineer, Producer
Sarah Barlow	Photography
Cory Bice	Assistant Engineer
Mattias Bylund	String Arrangements
Jason Campbell	Production Coordinator
Smith Carlson	Engineer
Peter Carlsson	Pro Tools
Nathan Chapman	Bass, Guitar Producer
Tom Coyne	Mastering
Eric Eylands	Assistant Engineer
Amy Fucci	Design
Serban Ghenea	Mixing
Austin Hale	Design
Shellback	Bass, Producer, Programmer
Ryan Tedder	Composer, Engineer
Matthew Tryba	Assistant Engineer
Noel Zancanella
John Hanes	Mixing
Imogen Heap	Composer, Drums, Vocals
Sam Holland	Engineer
Michael Ilbert	Engineer
Greg Kurstin	Production, Keyboards
Jonas Lindeborg	Trumpet
Max Martin	Executive Producer
Mattman and Robin	Bass, Drums, Programming
Brendan Morawski	Asst. Engineer
Bethany Newman	Art Direction
Josh Newman	Art Direction
Ali Payami	Keyboards, Producer
Stephen Scholfield	Photography
Laura Sisk	Engineer
Jonas Thander	Saxophone
Magnus Wiklund	Trombone

82% of musicians Taylor hired to make 1989 were men. Only 18% women. Her how about her earlier album Speak Now?

Executive Producer: Nathan Chapman

Chuck Ainlay	Engineer	John Gardner	Drums
Joseph Baker	Photography	Jed Hackett	Engineer
Steve Blackmon	Assistant	Rob Hajacos	Fiddle
Drew Bollman	Assistant Engineer	Amos Heller	Bass
Tristan Jones	Assistant Engineer	Liz Huett	Vocal Harmony
David Bryant	Assistant Engineer	Jeremy Hunter	Engineer
Paul Buckmaster	Conductor, Orchestra	Suzie Katayama	Orchestra Contractor
Nick Buda	Drums	Tim Lauer	Hammond B3, Piano
Jason Campbell	Production Coordinator	Steve Marcantonio	Engineer
Chad Carlson	Engineer	Tim Marks	Bass
Chris Carmichael	Strings	Mike Meadows	Guitar
Joseph Cassell	Stylist	Grant Mickelson	Guitar
Nathan Chapman	Banjo, Bass	Seth Morton	Assistant Engineer
Steve Churchyard	Engineer	Emily Mueller	Production Assistant
Smith Curry	Steel Guitar	Jemma Muradian	Hair Stylist
Eric Darken	Percussion	John Netti	Assistant Engineer
Caitlin Evanson	Vocal Harmony	Bethany Newman	Design
Shannon Forrest	Drums	Josh Newman	Design
Justin Niebank	Engineer, Mixing	Mark Petaccia	Asst. Engineer
Matt Rausch	Assistant	Lowell Reynolds	Engineer
Mike Rooney	Asst Engineer	Paul Sidoti	Guitar
Tommy Sims	Bass	Bryan Sutton	Guitar
Austin Swift	Photography	Todd Tidwell	Engineer
Lorrie Turk	Make-up	Hank Williams	Mastering
Brian Willis	Engineer	Al Wilson	Percussion

A staggering 88% of her production staff were men, only 12% were women.

I guess feminism isn't so "vital" in the production of Taylor's records, eh? So long as women buy her records she can let the professionals (men) handle the technical details. This is blatant hypocrisy, as Taylor Swift has voraciously espoused women's rights over the loudspeaker.

"There's a special place in hell for women who don't help other women" –Taylor Swift, 2013.

Maybe I'm just cherry-picking faults. Since Taylor believes women are as smart as men, SURELY some of her other albums featured women in prominent roles… right?

Nope. I looked. It almost seems like Taylor doesn't trust female producers to work on her albums. Every single executive producer has been a man, with four out of five other roles also going to men.

Her actions are very different from what she preaches to her fans. If we look deeper into her music videos, the hypocrisy becomes even more apparent.

Song	Director	Song	Director
"Tim McGraw"	Trey Fanjoy	"Teardrops On My Guitar"	Trey Fanjoy
"Our Song"	Trey Fanjoy	"I'm only me....."	Trey Fanjoy
"Picture To Burn"	Trey Fanjoy	"Beautiful Eyes"	Trey F, Todd Cassetty
"Change"	Shawn Robbins	"Love Story"	Trey Fanjoy
"White Horse"	Trey Fanjoy	"Crazier"	Peter Chelsom
"You Belong With Me"	Roman White	"Fifteen"	Roman White
"Fearless"	Todd Cassetty	"Mine"	Roman White
"Back To December"	Yoann Lemoine	"Mean"	Declan Whitebloom
"The Story of Us"	Noble Jones	"Sparks Fly"	Chrisian Lamb
"Ours"	Declan Whitebloom	"Safe & Sound"	"Philip Andelman"
"We are never getting...."	Declan Whitebloom	"Begin Again"	Philip Andelman
"I Knew You Were Trouble"	Anthony Mandler	"22"	Anthony Mandler
"Highway Don't Care"	Shane Drake	"Everything Has Changed"	Philip Andelman
"Red"	Kenny Jackson	"The Last Time"	Terry Richardson
"Shake It Off"	Mark Romanek	"Blank Space"	Joseph Kahn
"Style"	Kyle Newman	"Bad Blood"	Joseph Kahn

That's 100% male directors for her music videos. 32 for 32. Who is the one holding back women now? If Taylor Swift was a college (or any other organization), there'd be widespread protests of sexism and misogyny.

If a woman worth $200,000,000 won't hire a female director, who will? The fact that she can rationalize this in her mind shows how delusional her thinking is.

You might say “well those men didn’t have to deal with the adversity and sexism normal women have to deal with!” The reality is that the upper echelon of music production talent is mostly men. Only 5% of working music producers are women. Men have dominated innovation and creativity for ages.

Take for example Buddy Bolden, who innovated an entirely new form of music in 1901.

Of course, when Taylor was talking about double standards, she wasn’t talking about the music industry alone, but everyday life as well. So according to Taylor, it’s very important that we hold men and women to the same standard.

When we see what recently occurred between a horrible crime committed by Josh Duggar from TLC’s popular “19 Kids And Counting,” and Lena Dunham gleefully admitting to the same crime in her book about how she abused her sister.

Apparently this double standard in societal perception doesn't seem to bother Taylor at all.

Judging by her actions, I can only conclude Taylor is a misogynist herself and doesn't believe any of the shit she says about women being equal, since she clearly only trusts men to make her albums and music videos. You think she could delay an album release to give a woman producer maternity leave? Fuck no, it's serious business and she knows that reality.

The musical integrity of her albums is too important to be entrusted to a woman, just like her safety is only entrusted to a male bodyguard. Feminist rhetoric carries little weight in the real world when her livelihood and safety are on the line.

I don't really blame her, the music industry is dying and she's under enormous pressure to capitalize on her window of fame as much as she can. One bad album could ruin her career so it's important she works with only the best musicians (men). Like Silicon Valley is filled with men who dropped out of school and innovated amazing companies, the best musicians who can create complex, catchy arrangements are also mostly men.

Therefore I completely agree with her strategy, as ROK recognizes that men and women have very different abilities. It's in her interest to have her cake and eat it too (work with top level men, yet publicly talk about empowering women), it gives her additional publicity and her gullible fans eat it up.

Like other privileged white women, Taylor can live like a princess but gain liberal street credibility by playing the "victim" card to pretend she can relate to her naïve fans. This is why we don't take feminism seriously, and view them like the delusional children that they are. Everything in Taylor's life involves men helping her, or building something for her, yet she complains how men are magically holding her back.

Next time Taylor Swift lectures you on treating women equally in your life, or how vital women are in the world, just ask her why she only trusts men to handle the important functions in her life.

Read More: Why I Am Proud To Be Called A Misogynist

Steven Moran

4 Reasons Why Living Abroad Is Not All It’s Cracked Up To Be

May 25, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Moving overseas is a common ambition for men in this part of the Internet, for various reasons: better women, cheaper cost of living, fewer laws, and so on. And while it’s certainly a good thing to get out of the U.S. (or whatever country you were born in) and experience other cultures, there’s a bleak side to expatriating that gets ignored in all the hype.

Keep in mind that I’m not arguing against living abroad: I plan on returning to the Philippines at some point and visiting some other countries such as Japan, Colombia, or Russia when I get the time. But before you sell your car and buy your plane tickets, you need to know the whole truth about life in other countries. Here’s why expatriation isn’t the dream life everyone thinks it is…

1. Basic infrastructure is lacking

Most second- and third-world countries have power and water systems that are barely functioning, and the slightest error can knock them offline at a moment's notice. In the Philippines, for example, brownouts are extremely common, particularly in smaller cities, which is why most high-end apartment complexes and hotels have backup generators installed.

Even then, that may not be enough: during my stay in Davao City, for example, I had the power shut off on me multiple times for seemingly no reason, killing my AC and Internet and forcing me to sweat it out in the dark.

Basic fundamentals of urban planning and sewage removal are also absent in many countries. Absent zoning laws, cities like Manila are a patchwork of construction, with poorly-designed roads, missing road signs and open sewers that overflow every time it rains. It's not uncommon to find nice high-rise apartment buildings surrounded by blocks of dingy tin shacks, like a game of SimCity being played by a sugar-bombed spazz.

Finally, many third-world countries have ungodly amounts of air pollution, thanks to lax emissions controls on cars and industry. Portions of Manila resemble 60's-era L.A. due to all the smog. Even if you don't have lung problems, breathing in all these airborne toxins will have an impact on your health.

For example, the dusty, dirty air of the Philippines forced my eyes to start producing extra moisture. When I came back to the U.S., I went around for a week looking like I was perpetually crying before my eyes readjusted.

2. Many amenities that you're used to are not available

Since you're in Rome now, you'll have to do as the Romans do, and that includes acclimating to local tastes and peccadilloes. If there are certain types of food you like and your new homeland doesn't have them, you'll just have to suck it up. For example, a simple American staple like peanut butter and jelly is horrendously expensive in the Philippines; a jar of Jiffy is about $7. A carton of orange juice can run you as much as $9, and many supermarkets don't even carry milk (not that you'd want to buy milk when many of those places skimp on the refrigeration).

But assuming you can adjust to the local menu, what about the cultural offerings? Again, depending on your tastes, you'll probably be left out in the cold. If you want coffee shops in the Philippines, for example, you're pretty much limited to big chains like Starbucks or Figaro (though selection is a bit better in Manila). Music? Get used to sappy soft rock or 80's cover bands. Film? It's either Hollywood blockbusters or obscure Asian films. And I really hope you like karaoke parties.

3. Culture shock is real

You might read the previous points and think, "So what? I hate American culture and I can deal with a few brownouts!" But can you? You need to face reality: you're an American (or a Canadian or an Australian or whatever), raised in a culture that has trained you to see the world in a certain way. You have no idea how much your culture defines you until you're placed in one that's almost entirely alien.

For the first couple of days in the Philippines, I had difficulty even leaving my house, and it wasn't because I was having a bad time: every Filipino I'd encountered up to that point had been friendly and gregarious. It was because the Philippine culture of openness, spontaneity and fun completely clashed with my dour, sullen, American attitude. It only took me a few days before I was acclimated and enjoying myself, but it was a transition I was completely unprepared for.

Not only that, even after you've overcome culture shock, there are certain aspects of foreign cultures that will always grate on your nerves. For example, the Filipinos' complete inability to be punctual nearly screwed up a podcast interview I did with my ROK colleague Quintus Curtius.

Additionally, Filipino waitstaff at restaurants almost never check up on you after they bring you your food; you have to practically grab them by the arm if you want your check. When I returned to the U.S. in October, I was so grateful to have a waitress bring me the check without asking at the first restaurant I ate at that I gave her a $10 tip.

4. You will always be just a "foreigner"

This is the kicker: even if you become a long-term resident of another country, you can never fully integrate. In many cases, the barriers are legal ones: for example, many Asian countries do not allow foreign residents to ever become citizens. Many of these nations don't even let foreigners own property; in Thailand and the Philippines, when you hear about foreigners running businesses, the deed is always in their (local) wives' names.

But more importantly, even if you learn the language and adjust to the culture, you'll never fully fit in. People will always identify you as being from somewhere else based on your appearance and treat you accordingly. Even the Philippines, despite their unusually xenophilic culture (to the point where English is an official language and virtually everyone there is fluent in it), maintains a barrier between foreigners and locals. Try as you might, you will never fully assimilate.

I'm not trying to dissuade anyone from living abroad: it's an experience I enjoyed and one I recommend every man try out at least once. But don't think that life in other countries is some kind of permanent vacation with free martinis and blowjobs. There's a price to be paid for everything, and the price of moving overseas is one you may not want to pay.

Read More: If You Can't Get Laid In The West, You Won't Get Laid Abroad

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Application Of Spirituality In A Neomasculine Lifestyle

May 25, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

One of the principles of neomasculinity doctrine is spirituality. We believe that life, in all its richness and fullness, contains more than that which is accorded to us by sense perception alone. The development of our spiritual side proceeds hand-in-hand with the development of our bodies. Body and soul are intimately connected, and one cannot survive without the other.

"But," you may say, "I have no interest in these things. These matters bore me. I don't see any value in this sort of thing, and don't think I need any program of spiritual development. Give me my atheism and you can keep your spirituality." This is a sentiment shared by many.

But I have an answer for this also. Actually, I have two answers in response to this.

My first answer is this: philosophy without a spiritual grounding is a dark and cold thing. To believe that the material world is all there is, and that this eternal dance of atoms, molecules, galaxies, and nebulae is a random buzzing of matter with no meaning, and that man's sufferings and trials are pointless excursions down rabbit holes that lead nowhere: is this not the most depressing of conclusions? Does not the very fact that religions have been with us since the dawn of time speak to their utility to man?

We begin to believe that it is better to think, as did the Latin writer Minucius Felix, in the following way:

> I cannot but feel that those who regard the design of this great universe not as the product of the divine reason, but a conglomeration of odds and ends luckily > brought together, have neither mind, nor sense, nor even eyes. What can be more clear, plain, or obvious as you look up at the sky, and look at all the things beneath you and around you, than that there must be some Divine Mind excelling in wisdom, through which all Nature is moved, imbued, and governed? [Octavius 17.4]

My second answer to your objection is this: you may believe one thing now, but at some point in your life you will believe something else. You will not be the same person in ten years as you are now. There are a great many examples of men who underwent profound shifts in their thinking, and moved from atheism to spirituality with startling speed.

Blaise Pascal

The French mathematician Blaise Pascal was one of the most brilliant men of his era. At the ripe age of nineteen (1642), he had constructed an advanced computing machine. Six years later, he designed an experiment, based on the work of Torricelli on atmospheric weights and measurements, to use tubes of mercury to measure atmospheric pressure at different heights above sea level. He had a founding hand—along with Pierre de Fermat—in the development of the mathematics of probabilities.

And yet, all this worldly brilliance would be eclipsed by a series of profound events that visited him after 1647. He was seized in that year by an attack of paralysis which damaged his nervous system. A patrimony left him financially secure, but he began to be haunted by doubts about the existence and health of his soul; a highly sensitive man, he bore with difficulty the injustices he saw around him in the streets of Paris. He could not find the relief he was looking for in his mathematical tables and scientific instruments.

One day, as he was driving over the Pont de Neuilly, the horses became startled and caused his carriage nearly to be thrown into the Seine. Perched on the very edge of the bridge, his fate literally hung in the balance. He collapsed from the trauma of the incident, but emerged from convalescence a changed man; gone was the rational scientist, and in its place there now appeared a deeply pious man of the Jansenist school. It was an incredible transformation. The energies that had previously been devoted to science now were directed with equal brilliance to theological problems.

A similar type of conversion experience is found in the life of the Islamic mystic Abu Hamid Al-Ghazali (1058-1111). A methodical and brilliant man, he occupied a distinguished professorship in Baghdad, and enjoyed the favor of the political authorities. His teaching career was going well, and his administrative responsibilities were always executed with diligence. But then everything changed after 1095.

Al-Ghazali found himself consumed by doubts about the choices he had made in his life. He underwent some kind of profound spiritual crisis, which he describes in some detail in one of the classics of Islamic mysticism, The Deliverer From Error (Al-munqidh min ad-dalal). He could not concentrate. He could not sleep. Eventually, by entirely changing his residence, his lifestyle, and his worldview, he was able to find answers to his questions and the peace he needed.

We cannot foresee exactly where our lives or our opinions will lead us. What seems certain today, may not appear so certain tomorrow. Is it not better, then, to keep an open mind, and adhere to a view that accepts all things as possible?

Pascal's Wager

But let us look at the matter rationally. Rationalists may find appealing the proposition that has been termed "Pascal's Wager." It is found in diluted form in his great philosophical work, the Pensees. It can almost be seen as a "cost-benefit" argument for the existence of God. The essence of the wager is this: you have nothing to lose by believing in God, and everything to gain.

Pascal's reasoning proceeds in this way. Either God exists, or he does not. Your job is to wager on one of these alternatives. If you decide that he does exist, then you gain the peace of mind that comes from belief. If you decide he does not exist, then you may be denying yourself potential rewards. As he explains it:

> Which will you choose then? Let us see. Since you must choose, let us see which interests you least. You have two things to lose, the true and the good; and two things to stake, your reason and your will, your knowledge and your happiness; and your nature has two things to shun, error and misery. Your reason is no more shocked in choosing one rather than the other, since you must of necessity choose. This is one point settled. But your happiness? Let us weigh the gain and the loss in wagering that God is. Let us estimate these two chances. If you gain, you gain all; if you lose, you lose nothing. Wager, then, without hesitation that He is. [Pensees, 272]

Pascal's Wager may not convince everyone, but it at least has the merit of trying to offer a rational argument for belief. We are given a choice, and the choice is ours. What have you got to lose by believing in a Divine Force? Nothing.

We return to our original point, which is that even highly rational men of science can radically change their views of the world. The conversion experience is an interesting one, and presents many questions for study.

The Stages Of Belief

My own study of these matters leads me to believe that the religious personality goes through several stages. We can think of them as the stages in the development of the soul. The first stage consists in service to humanity. The person devotes himself to enterprises that help others more than himself. “A true believer,” says an Islamic Hadith (Taysir al-Wusul), is “he whom other people trust in regard to their person or property.” This is an admirably practical, and profound, definition.

The second stage consists in the “purification” of the heart. The person busies himself with removing bad thoughts and feelings from himself, and replacing those with good ones. The third and final stage is self-negation. That is, he begins to recognize his own personal insignificance when compared to the infinite vastness of creation. Feelings of wonder and awe overpower him, and these sentiments can find creative outlets in literature, art, or music.

Al Ghazali. (This face looks vaguely familiar…)

In any case, these are deep waters, and worthy of exploration in measured doses. Perhaps the most we can say is that (1) there is a place for spirituality in the life of man; and (2) we should not become too rigid in our beliefs. What you believe today, may not what you believe tomorrow. Keep an open mind. Some men find satisfaction in the expression of their religion, and we should respect this.

Strong men have strong beliefs. Some of these beliefs may not be to our liking, but we should acknowledge their validity. Spirituality can be seen as an outward expression of love. The two things are connected, and find a home in the heart of a strong man. Sir Francis Bacon tells us, in his own unique way:

> I know not how, but martial men are given to love: I think it is but as they are given to wine; for perils commonly ask to be paid in pleasures. There is in man’s nature a secret inclination and motion towards love of others, which, if it be not spent upon some one or a few, doth naturally spread itself towards many, and maketh men become humane and charitable; as it is seen sometime in friars. [cf. On Love]

We should not look for the truth or untruth of spiritual doctrines. That would a debate of absurdities, and one with no end. What matters, rather, is whether spiritual beliefs serve the needs of a strong man.

Read More: 3 Essential Cooking Tools For A Man

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Female-Dominated Publishing Houses Are Censoring Male Authors

May 25, 2015 | by Sam Finlay | Link | Original Link

We live and die by words. The lives of men and empires are shaped and bound by stories. There is a mysterious power in this. Perhaps one of the greatest there is.

In the summer of 2000, I was so mad at the Army—for what it was, and what it wasn't—that I committed myself to putting my experiences on paper and to shout from the rooftops telling the world all about what the military was really like.

However, over the course of serving in an infantry unit, falling for a girl, going downrange, getting wounded, and coming home, that story changed. In the end, I was left with something far more meaningful than what I'd initially envisioned, and with the military as a staple of media ranging from movies to video games, to say nothing of there being an actual war on in which real people were killing and dying, I knew my audience. The hard part would just be writing the thing.

My audience.

I was wrong. In the world of books, there has been a battle for what stories are to be told. There is nothing new in this. As Russell Kirk said, "Culture arises from the cult," and the older I get, the more I find that to be true. The question then becomes, “Who is the cult?”

The modern day publishing cult

One can chase theories all day long. However, something recently happened that allowed me a small glimpse into the world of the gatekeepers, and given the recent dust-ups from #GamerGate to the Hugos, I thought I’d pass it along.

After more than a decade of shopping my book around and receiving probably about 1,000 rejections along the way, I finally received a message from a literary agent I’d approached who really liked my book, agreed with almost everything I said in it, and was interested in representing it.

However, there were some things that he thought needed to be changed to help it get accepted by a publishing house. Some of it was formatting-related, but most pertained to key parts of the plot toward the end and I told him that I couldn’t alter them because that was the way that things had happened. In light of that, I had to decline.

During our conversation, the agent went on to say something that confirmed an observation I’d made early on about the business. He said, “Sam, one thing you’ll need to understand is that the publishing industry is almost entirely run by women who studied things like Creative Writing in college,” and that most would hate what I’ve written.

He then told me about how an Afghanistan and Iraq vet had written a book, made it through the slush pile, and was in the process of review by a publishing house. Made it through almost all the hoops. Then, at the very end, the senior editor was offended by something in the book and said, “Eh, fuck it, he’s an asshole. Who cares?” And with her words the project died.

The men I served with did stuff like juggle grenades for fun. They have “problematic” ways of “triggering” people that SJW’s ain’t ever heard of.

We continued talking about why the industry seems to be so focused on just playing to the tastes of upper-middle class women in New York City, and I then told him some things that Sci-Fi author Larry Correia had said recently in a podcast concerning the Sad Puppies-Rabid Puppies controversy, and how it struck me that by pursuing their current strategy the publishing houses are ignoring huge markets of people willing to buy books and are cutting their own throats.

He broke in saying, “I know, I know…But look, Sam…you gotta stop thinking. Just stop thinking! Thinking about all this will drive you crazy! Don't go to bookstores, if they even still have any where you live. Don't look at other books. You'll just wonder how in the world this thing even got published," and then told me some more anecdotes about how the sausage is made. He then quoted Otto Priminger, saying "Nobody knows anything."

It was sad. He's a good man, and was just as frustrated about it all as anybody, but he's stuck fighting a literati who only look for books that support the current narrative, and is left trying to sneak in what stories he can, however he can.

All of this no doubt confirms something you already know: few in any significant cultural institutions give a damn about you. Notice the scattered inquiries into why men are "dropping out" and bolting from family formation, university study, and civic responsibilities in general. They ask why men aren't shouldering burdens, rather than what do men want.

Consider the attacks leveled at sites like this one. How dare men have preferences, desires, and concerns that deviate from the Ministry of Culture! They clearly haven't educated themselves enough about privilege, insecurity, outdated masculinity, and Authoritarian Personality Disorder!

There is truth to this. What's odd, though, is that my biggest sales to date came from a write-up by Ann Sterzinger and several of my best reviews have been from women. It may be that this is less an issue of the battle of the sexes, but more of a battle of ideas, and if that's the case, we may have more allies than we know.

There is a solution

Make no mistake, the publishing industry, like the rest of the media, is captive to the decaying zombie gestalt of modernity's isms. Most people will drink whatever flavor of Kool-Aid is poured. And this ain't gonna change anytime soon.

However, there is reason for hope. As military theorist Dr. Martin van Creveld has argued, "the guerilla way is soon to overtake the conventional way." Much like the majority of 21st Century conflicts featuring non-state actors, Davids are beginning to take the fight to the Goliaths on their terms and make their enemies fight the battles they want them to fight on the ground of their choosing.

Blogs, games, podcasts, books (even David Mamet is self-publishing now), cartoons, movies (I swear, there's even a group of veterans working to make a "tactical comedy"); frontiers are opening up. We now have more avenues to network, learn, and create; more ways to explore opportunities and forge new loyalties, as well as the potential to rediscover a patrimony taken from us in the name of setting us free. The results may not be as big (not yet, anyway) but they'll be ours.

Y'all keep your heads up.

Read More: 9 Old School Ways For A Woman To Become More Attractive To Men

Sam Finlay

Samuel Finlay served as an infantryman in Bosnia and Afghanistan. He is the author of Breakfast With The Dirt Cult, which can be bought here. He enjoys reading good books, listening to old music, traveling, and sitting on porches. He was born and raised in Oklahoma.

5 Ways To Get Laid More And Have Better Sex Using Kratom

May 25, 2015 | by Sponsored Post | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Herbal Samurai

The men reading Return of Kings are go-getters that are always looking for an edge in their game. For the readers that have not yet discovered kratom it could very well be the perfect new tool in your arsenal for completely eliminating your anxiety around women, becoming more sexually dominant with them, and providing the kind of sex that makes them chase after you and blow up your phone for more.

What is Kratom?

Kratom (mitragyna speciosa) is a natural plant indigenous to Southeast Asia. A quick internet search will show that it is used to drastically reduce anxiety, increase motivation, and uplift mood. It’s cheap, it’s natural, and it’s completely legal in most places. It’s also effective in small amounts: the recommended dosage is about 2-4 grams. With Kratom, less is usually more and you don’t need to overdo it.

The different types of kratom are known as strains, and they’re differentiated by colour and by the region they were grown in, as well as slightly different effects. Users have reported minimal downsides. It doesn’t produce the numerous side effects of alcohol, and it is not nearly as habit forming as a cup of coffee.

Here’s how it can be a game changer for your sex life:

1. Kratom Can Kill Your Approach Anxiety

For many guys, the thought of engaging an attractive girl in a sexually charged conversion can be daunting. This makes it tough to play the numbers game and can really put a ceiling on your sex life.

In both night-time and day-time environments, Kratom can make it so much easier to approach women as it obliterates approach anxiety. Kratom provides a better reduction in anxiety than alcohol without any of the negatives, such as impaired motor skills and performance in bed.

During the day, kratom can be even more of beneficial since it makes approaching women feel natural, even though you are completely sober

Best strains for anxiety: Red Bali, Red Indo, Green Indo

2. Kratom Can Make You More Confident Around Women

Kratom doesn’t just make it easier to approach women; it also makes your interactions with them much more natural and relaxed. Girls can usually tell when you’re anxious around them because you tend to outwardly look incongruent and awkward. We’ve all been there, and it is definitely frustrating.

By vastly lowering both mental and physical anxiety, kratom can enable you to appear much more naturally confident and in control even around the hottest girls. This allows you to be more aggressive and sexual, rather than timid and nervous, vastly increasing the chance of getting laid on any given day or night.

Best strains for talking to girls: Green Maeng Da, Green Indo, Red Maeng Da

3. Kratom Makes Going Out Alone Way Easier

By now a lot of guys know that going out alone at night is a fantastic way to get laid. However so few guys do it because they (falsely) fear that everyone will know they're out alone and label them as "creepy." Kratom is the best wingman for going out alone because it kills that make-believe fear and lets you focus completely on getting laid that night.

Kratom, especially the faster strains, can also keep you in a talkative mood despite not actually having your buddies to get socially warmed up with. It can be especially beneficial for the more introverted guys as it makes pro-social behaviour require much less energy.

Best Strains for Flying Solo: White Maeng Da, Red Thai, White Indo

4. Kratom Can Eliminate Sexual Anxiety

For guys that are not as sexually experienced yet, sexual anxiety can sometimes become an issue the first time you’re with a new girl, stimulating the body’s fight-or-flight response and making it hard to maintain solid erection.

Kratom does not just have psychoactive effects; it has also been known to physically relax the central nervous system. Many guys have noted that kratom has been an absolute game-changer in bed. With calm nerves and a rock-hard erection, you can be confident that you’ll give girls a great experience in the bedroom.

Best strains for Great Sex: Gold Indo, White Maeng Da, Red Indo

5. Kratom Can Allow You To Last Way Longer In Bed

Most guys finish quickly in bed and leave their women wanting more in the wrong way.

Having sex with a girl for thirty or forty minutes and hearing her tell you how much better you are than other guys is a wonderful feeling.

Men around the world have noticed that kratom straight up lets them last much longer in bed. For the guys that hit the finish line extra early, kratom has been nothing short of a god-send. The best advice is to use kratom at least 2-3 hours before sex. You will last longer without sacrificing any pleasure.

Best strains for lasting forever: Gold Indo, Red Bali, Red Maeng Da

Where To Get Kratom?

To get the full benefits outlined above, you need to purchase only high quality kratom. There are just too many vendors with mediocre quality kratom.

Herbal Samurai (www.herbalsamurai.com) has the best quality you can find anywhere, with clean and natural kratom that will arrive at your door in 2-3 days. Check them out at www.herbalsamurai.com.

Give kratom a try. It will probably be a complete game-changer for you. At the very least, you'll get laid more and it will be a lot more fun.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Legal disclaimer:

> All statements made within this article have not been evaluated by the Food and Drug Administration. This product is not intended to diagnose, treat, cure, or > prevent any disease.

>
> Nothing contained in this article is medical advice. This article is written explicitly for entertainment purposes and everything written is an account of personal experience and not instructions. Kratom is not sold for human consumption.

5 Reasons Why You Should Never Date A Girl With Dyed Hair

May 26, 2015 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Always in search of the next way to destroy their nature-given beauty, Western females have begun to dye their hair at alarming rates. This is a growing phenomenon in major coastal cities, where I've even begun to see it from the late-20s white collar crowd who should know better. The rebellious office types usually adopt something slightly more toned down, such as bright red or jet black, but for those who have to wear nametags and get paid by the hour, anything goes.

Tuthmosis has touched on dyed hair as a major slut tell and Matt Forney has dropped serious wisdom on short hair, but I've seen this particular trend becoming more and more socially acceptable. It has to be stopped.

In short, based on my extensive experience, a girl having hair dyed with a non-traditional color is a leading indicator of instability, mental illness, and an inability to function within a healthy relationship. Here are the five reasons you should steer clear of these damaged individuals:

1. They're attention whores

I’m sure they’re all highly dateable

Nothing says “Look at me!” more effectively than flowing purple locks. These girls know that they’re cheaply drawing attention to themselves and revel in every drop, whether it’s a compliment from a limp-wristed orbiter or disgust from a man of value who spurns their Troll Doll aesthetic. Would you want to tie your fortunes to a woman who will mutilate herself just so strangers will look at her more often?

2. They’re impulsive

Is this the 10,000 cock stare?

Nobody sits down to their desk, opens up a couple Microsoft Excel spreadsheets, takes a sip of their Americano, and decides to turn their hair neon green.

The girl who makes the split-second decision to destroy her beauty is the same one who will suck multiple cocks in the Cancum foam party, or will give her anal virginity to swarthy European while her loyal boyfriend waits patiently at home; in other words, not the kind of person you want in your life for anything other than a casual (and well-documented) fling.

3. They're ugly

Who thinks this looks good?

As much as equalists bleat to the contrary, humans have hard-wired attraction preferences for the physical appearance of their mates. In the same way that we are uncontrollably disgusted with the sight of an obese person, our lizard hindbrains make a split-second judgment against women with dyed hair because unnatural looking hair (whether it's short, falling out, or unnaturally colored) was a symptom of disease and infirmity in our ancestral habitat.

Everyone knows this on some level, yet many still choose to defile their bodies. Why settle for a girl who willingly makes herself uglier just to court attention or make some tired "statement"? After all, a potential partner's highest priority should be making herself more pleasing to you — one who eschews this for shock value is best left to her Hitachi Magic Wand.

4. They're useless

Get a real job.

How many investment bankers, entrepreneurs, engineers, and physicians do you know who look like Zoe Quinn in the above photo? Zero.

The fact is, girls with unnaturally dyed hair are overwhelmingly more likely to be leeches on society, with unpaid student loans, credit card debt, and bastard children. They're also likely to be found slinging lattes at your local hipster coffee dive, posing as starving artists on welfare, or working in some bloated non-profit that syphons government money to contribute pennies on the taxpayer dollar to the "socially meaningful" SJW cause du jour.

Which brings me to the worst trait of all…

5. They're degenerate leftists

Ready for your daily lecture?

I have never met a girl with dyed hair who falls on the conservative side of the political spectrum. They can usually be found complaining about misogyny or decrying the evil that white heterosexual men have done to society.

Here's one example. I go to a gym near the nightlife district of a major city. While I see tons of dyed hair freaks walking around the street outside the gym (both male and female), I almost never see people with falsely colored hair actually inside the gym and working hard to improve themselves. It's almost as if they're repelled by the thought of making themselves better.

As Roosh presciently wrote, appearance reflects ideology. If you're dating a girl with dyed hair, get ready to witness some of the laziest, most self-serving, mediocrity-embracing behavior you can imagine. Even worse, enjoy being called a cis-centric homophobic dudebro shitlord when you express any opinion that deviates from those handed down by her corporate or ideological Cultural Marxist overlords.

I didn’t even mention how girls with dyed hair are significantly more likely to have borderline personality disorder or become irresponsible mothers, since I believe the point is clear: women with dyed hair represent the dregs of the dating market.

If you are a high-value man, you will do your part to leave them rotting in the dustbin of the sexual marketplace.

Read More: 26 More Signs She’s A Slut

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

Academic Advisor Accuses Male College Student Of Harassment For Sitting In A Waiting Room

May 26, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

If you believed getting academic advice at college was hard, spare a thought for Kevin Bruce of Georgia's Kennesaw State University. His routine academic advisor was unavailable and the receptionist asked him to come back in an hour.

With nothing else to do but kill time, he chose to wait in that humble room known as… ¡voila!… the waiting room. As he did this, another advisor, Abbey Dawson, came out and accused him of "harassment" for waiting for the first advisor, threatening to call the campus police. Knowing she was coming (and her prickly reputation), the clued-in Bruce filmed both her arrival and baseless, misandrist accusations.

Let's go to the tape

The video of the incident has gone, unsurprisingly, viral. Most critical commentators have pinpointed the racial differences: Dawson is white, Bruce black. But this ignores the gender-loadedness of the word "harassment," a buzzword for women who accuse men of something amorphous, often sexual or otherwise gender-based.

The atmosphere of American and other Western colleges is so pernicious nowadays, and so antithetical to the due process rights of male students, that sexual assault, or in this case "regular" harassment, can be anything a particular woman defines it as. And it's her word against his, with her testimony alone enough to get him found "guilty" in a kangaroo court.

The only reason why this has created a scandal is that Dawson has been caught out peddling falsehoods and lies.

What would have happened if the campus police had arrived? Even if charges or an arrest had not followed, Bruce's name would have been tarnished, to the pleasure of Dawson, and his future would arguably have been in heavy doubt. There would have been no consequences whatsoever for Dawson, who could play the card of the female victimized by the male, especially an athletic-looking black male.

It's not just because of her reputation

Kevin Bruce was alert enough to record his encounter with Dawson and her false accusations. But what about those not able to? They're the next people (read: males) in the misandrist academic firing line.

Twitter erupted with similar stories of Dawson's apparently legendary rudeness after her deplorable reaction against Kevin Bruce. In many ways, though, this was Bruce's saving grace. Knowing her antecedence, he was able to preempt and record the altercation (really just a one-way diatribe from her).

Focusing on Dawson's misanthropy creates a quagmire when we try to expose the "guilty by someone else's testimony" climate against male students. The emphasis shifts from a female actually proving that a man is harassing her (with objective evidence or proof) to anecdotal details of extreme irritability or other character flaws about a particular accusing woman.

Of course, outing Dawson's previous antics is very important. But it should only add butter to the bread of innocence before guilt. And "guilt," including in non-court situations, can only be established where there is proof. Or should be, not that should counts for much nowadays.

Too much of a reliance on an accuser's reputation only obfuscates the central issue when females allege harassment, sexual assault or rape: there needs to be objective evidence.

In the Brian Banks debacle, for example, the vitriol was largely leveled at Wanetta Gibson, his false accuser, rather than the system that allowed him to be incarcerated in the first place, solely on her testimony.

Like with the Brian Banks injustice, too much attention is paid towards the false accuser of rape or harassment, rather than the flawed system, lack of evidence or a failure to uphold a fair standard of proof.

Dawson placed on "administrative leave"

Thankfully, the histrionic Abbey Dawson has been stood down pending an investigation. As the Washington Post reports, she is the director of advising and internships for one of Kennesaw's academic departments. The university, given her professional responsibility and the clear evidence against her, could have taken a much firmer stand, such as condemning the behavior verbally and much more strongly.

Obviously, considering our own manosphere-inspired interest in due process for men, she should be afforded some review, appeal or follow-up by the university authorities. But if this were an errant college fraternity yelling the word "slut" at passers-by, we all know events would be cancelled, a dean would threaten suspension or expulsion on TV, and proverbial heads would roll.

That a paid university staff member is treated more favorably than students, such as those falsely accused students at the University of Virginia, whose plight lacked evidence against them from the start, demonstrates the overall retrograde culture shared by American tertiary education institutions. Due process and caution is only followed when the allegations and improprieties fall into certain "acceptable" categories.

Rape or harassment allegation with no evidence or just testimony leads to suspensions or expulsions, with the confidentiality of already kangaroo court proceedings being breached (e.g. by Emma Sulkowicz).

Incontrovertibly false accusations of rape or harassment lead to no honor code violations, support from the university, feminist “celebrities” and others (again, Emma Sulkowicz and Jackie Coakley), and “administrative leave” for the likes of Abbey Dawson.

Defame him and we shame you

[image]
Dr. Daniel S. Papp, President of Kennesaw State University, and the university itself must take a zero tolerance approach towards staff (or students) making false or unsupported allegations of harassment or sexual assault.

Every woman who defames a man by falsely alleging sexual assault or harassment of any kind must be shamed and outed. Multiple news outlets have covered the Abbey Dawson story and Kevin Bruce should be commended for taking a stand. Fight fire with fire, boys, except, because these men are innocent, the truth is on their side.

Proponents for due process for male students (and, by extension, all men) are perennially ridiculed for not believing women. But we are accosted all the time with examples of women who have flagrantly lied about their initial accusations. In addition, what about the thousands of men in America and elsewhere either sent to jail or kicked out of college based on testimony alone?

Facts matter and facts go beyond someone’s words against another. Society and the legal system meant to support it, plus the processes of non-legal institutions, have regressed to the stage where visually recording an encounter is sometimes a man’s only means of proving his innocence. Short of that, the best thing we can do is to support the falsely accused by spreading their stories and highlighting the institutional unfairness they constantly face.

In the meantime, Abbey Dawson must have her employment at Kennesaw terminated immediately.

Read More: 10 Things Every College Student Needs To Know

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

My Personal Experience With Nootropics In The Gym And In The Bedroom

May 27, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: This article is not, nor is intended to serve as medical advice. Always consult with a licensed physician before starting a regimen of any kind.

A few months ago I decided to start experimenting with various performance enhancing drugs. I'm in my best physical shape since my mid-twenties but the older I get the more difficult it becomes to maintain an elite physique. Plus, I'm always looking to gain an edge and improve myself physically and mentally as every man should anyway.

After extensive research, consultation with my doctor, and self-experimentation, I've dialed in my regimen to the point where I'm operating at peak physical efficiency much more often than not.

Below are my personal anecdotes on the four performance enhancing substances I've decided to make a part of my bi-weekly regimen. I'll discuss how they affect me socially, in the gym, at the desk, in the bedroom, and other areas of my daily life.

Kratom

[image]

I've stated in previous articles that I learn just as much on this site as any of our readers, so when I saw a couple of sponsored posts about the benefits of Kratom, I decided to give it a try and so far I've been pleased with the results.

In the gym: On days I lift (Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays) I take faster strains to give me a burst of energy. About a half hour after I burn 2 or 3 ounces, there is a rush of strong, clean energy and razor sharp focus and motivation that makes me feel like I can squat 700 lbs.

Kratom doesn't increase my strength under the bar but I can certainly feel a difference in the way I perform each rep. The concentration and focus I get from Kratom improves my form (which is absolutely critical when lifting heavy) and allows me to get through my workout a little quicker saving me time, which is an increasingly dwindling commodity for me these days.

Socially: Regardless of the strain I take, Kratom improves my mood exponentially. I'm happier, have an increased sense of well being, and have an insatiable desire to talk to people and approach women like crazy.

The bottom line, socially, is that Kratom makes me very happy. Not a loopy, "I'm drunk as fuck dude!" type happy but a genuine elevated contentment that puts me in an awesome mood. As stated above, the strain never matters. Fast, slow, and everything in between puts me in a good mood.

Negatives: It's easy to build a tolerance on Kratom if you don't rotate strains properly. The higher your tolerance the more you have to take which can result in nausea. I made this mistake when I first started but have since corrected it.

Overall, I only take Kratom when I wake up and I'm not feeling my best or not quite as motivated to lift. It tends to work best for me in a fasted state (when I haven't eaten in 8 hours or more). Every so often I take it when I feel crappy or just need a short burst of energy to complete a task.

Modafinil

[image]

Modafinil is mainly used for concentration and mental stamina. I mainly use it when I have a project (or an article) that needs to be completed in 24 hours or less.

In the gym: I experimented with it in the gym and to my surprise it didn't help much. It actually had the opposite as my mind was all over the place during my workout, which extended it by about a half an hour. Needless to say that was the first and last time I took it before lifting.

Socially: When I take Modafinil, and I'm around people or other distractions, I can rarely focus on one thing at a time. Because of this, I have zero interest in socializing, approaching, etc. If you're thinking about trying Modafinil to get over approach anxiety I would strongly advise against it.

Productivity: This is where Modafinil shines. It doesn't take long after I take it that I get that tunnel vision and can mow through the task at hand. This drug allows me to crank out just about anything with minimal distractions, breaks, or anything that diverts my attention from my objective.

Most articles I write for ROK take anywhere between three and five days to complete. But sometimes my week is busy and I fall behind schedule. That's where Modafinil helps out. I've cranked out a few posts from start to finish in just a couple of short hours to make my weekly deadline including this one.

All in all, Modafinil is a one-trick pony, but that trick makes it well worth a try at least once. The focus is there so long as you're isolated. If you're in a social setting or around people when trying to get something done, your mind will be all over the place.

Winston experienced a few minor side effects when he tried it but I have yet to see any of these myself. Everyone's different.

If you've got a long day ahead of you or a project(s) that need be completed, Modafinil will definitely help you git 'er done.

Viagra & Cialis

During the steroid inquiries of the mid 2000s, some of the suppliers revealed that their clients were also using Viagra (referred to as "vitamin V") as a part of the supplemental regimen to improve their performances on the diamond, so I decided to experiment with this myself to see if it yielded any results in my own training.

In the gym: Like the Kratom, Viagra didn't necessarily increase my strength or flexibility. I did, however, notice a decrease in soreness the next day. I tried this on three separate occasions, alternating Mondays for six weeks and found that I was always a little more sore on the Tuesdays I didn't take the little blue pill the day before.

Cialis didn't make a difference at all, and it's likely because it's a slow release drug as opposed to the much more immediate effect Viagra has. These days, however, I stack it with L-argenine to increase blood circulation which helps a variety of bodily functions.

In the bedroom: No need to elaborate on this too much as must of us here are well aware of the effects these drugs have on our pussy pounding conquests. In short, they both work, and work well. End of story.

Viagra and Cialis have a few different uses, and like I said before it will affect different men in different ways. Some men report that it does increase one's strength in the weight room, some state that it helps recovery, and others men report different but minor effects.

Testosterone

The benefits of Testosterone Replacement Therapy are well documented. Here and here are two good places to start your research if you're thinking of starting TRT.

Like I said before I'm already in great physical shape, but at 37 years of age, the ol' motor isn't what it used to be. Between my bad left knee and nagging shoulder injury from about a decade ago, my injuries sometimes hamper my progress and sideline me for a day or two.

Before I started TRT 3 months ago I was 220 lbs and about 15% body fat. Pretty solid physique for a guy who stands at 6′ 1″. Since then I've dropped 7 lbs and I'm down to around 12% body fat. I'm as close to being "shredded" as I've ever been in my life and there's no doubt in my mind that in 3 months I will be.

In the gym: This is the area I've noticed the biggest difference. While testosterone doesn't personally make me stronger, it helps me to recover much more quickly and has drastically reduced the pain in my left knee and my shoulder, which has allowed me to increase the weight in my compound lifts.

Two other huge benefits I've noticed is 1) it helps me to keep the muscle I build through lifting without cutting back on my cardio (I bike mountain trails three to four times a week) and 2) it gives me a little more leeway in my diet, allowing me to consume a few more (healthy) carbs on my biking days and still keep my hard-earned muscle on my frame where it belongs.

TRT has quite literally turned back the clock for me. Not only do I look better, but I also feel better, which is the main reason I decided to do it in the first place. In my mind a great physique is only worth it if it serves a practical purpose other than picking up chicks. What good is an athletic looking body if you can't physically do anything with it if you're sore or hurting all the time?

Testosterone is definitely as advertised, and I would highly recommend that every man talk to their doctor about drinking from the fountain of youth. I'm a cash customer and aside from the initial blood tests (which cost around $350) I paid $77 for a four month supply of testosterone, syringes, and alcohol pads. If you have medical insurance it will be even less expensive.

My personal schedule

Though each of these substances are beneficial, I also realize this is a lot of substances to be putting into my body on a regular basis. Because of this I'm very careful with my dosing and use a chart in order to keep my tolerance low and to avoid a dependence or addiction to them.

The schedule below accomplishes this and allows me to benefit from each of these drugs:

Testosterone: I give myself a 160 mg shot every other Sunday.

Kratom: I take fast strains on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays (my lifting days) one week, then take an ECA stack on alternating weeks. Again, this helps to decrease tolerance and dependence on either of these substances.

Modafinil: I take this once a week on either a Saturday or Sunday. I tried Saturday and Sunday and noticed a sharp decrease in effectiveness on Sunday (read: the second of consecutive days). I build a tolerance to this quite easily so I'm extremely wary of my dosages.

Viagra/Cialis: I take 2.5 mg of Cialis every day along with L-Arginine to increase and improve my blood circulation. The ability to bang the brains out of chicks with a rock hard boner for an extended period of time is also a welcome "side effect" to this daily procedure.

Conclusion

I used to be in the "age gracefully and naturally" camp until I took it upon myself to become educated in the use of performance enhancing substances. Father time is undefeated, but that doesn't mean we can't delay his inevitable victory and extend our physical primes by a few years.

Every man wants to be more productive, mentally sharper, fuck better, feel better, and reach his genetic potential and I'm certainly no different. I've found the combination that has accomplished all of these things for me. If you're looking to improve your life in these ways, take action, start doing research, and talk to your doctor.

You're welcome.

Read Next: How To Obtain And Use Testosterone For Male Birth Control

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

A Scientific Review Of ROK's Community Beliefs

May 27, 2015 | by Moshe Kelstein | Link | Original Link

I discovered Return of Kings on Facebook when an acquaintance shared the community beliefs on her profile. She was mocking them, as if these beliefs had no value. I commented that these beliefs were empirically supported or derived from empirically supported principles.

An army of offended females and betas was unleashed upon me. I wasn't hoping for much from the girls, but I could only feel sad to see that many guys were naively supporting them.

Going to the research

I realized that most people have no first-hand contact with scientific knowledge. Literature on our community beliefs is not only existent, but extensive. I decided to use my academic knowledge to give support to the ROK community.

Many of the authors you will read about here are some of the most famous academics in behavioral sciences (Google scholar citations: Baron-Cohen: 96 020, Buss: 39 524, Baumeister: 87 528). I do not claim that these summaries and articles will help you in arguments. We live in some sort of ochlocracy where we risk intimidation by hordes of angry women or betas if we hold beliefs congruent with scientific evidence. I remember a feminist saying something along the lines of: ”Nothing like good old scientific facts to justify your sexism.”

This research is usually not spread too much, especially in undergraduate programs, but really informative. Let us now examine what science has to say about each point in our community beliefs list.

1. Men and women are genetically different, both physically and mentally

> Sex roles evolved in all mammals. Humans are not exempt. Psychological differences between sexes have been extensively documented in biology and psychology. Many will claim that sex roles are socially constructed, but scientific evidence says that there is more about it than culture.

Testosterone exposure in the womb determines the masculinization of behavior. Some girls suffer from congenital adrenal hyperplasia (CAH). It is a condition that alters the appearance of the genitalia of affected women, making it partially or totally masculinized due to an exposure to excessive amounts of testosterone in the womb.

Interestingly, girls affected by CAH exhibit masculinized behavior as well, showing a preference for male-stereotypical toys, play fighting more often than normal females, a preference for playing with boys and have less chances of being heterosexual later in life. It shows that androgens masculinize the brain in the womb, and as we all know boys are exposed to more androgens than normal girls.

Testosterone levels have been manipulated in rodents and in non-human primates, showing the same results: increased masculinized behavior. Prenatal testosterone correlates with athletic performance, mental toughness, optimism, less emotion-focused coping, determination, confidence, aggression and low empathy.

Here’s something funny. Many people claim that sex-stereotypical toys are preferred by boys and girls due to socialization and parental pressure. Research says that even rhesus monkeys prefer sex-stereotypical human toys. For example, male monkeys prefer toy trucks than plush toys.

2. Men will opt out of monogamy and reproduction if there are no incentives to engage in them

The psychological literature refers to this concept as Sexual Economics, when referring to the investment that a male is ready to make in order to ”buy” a woman’s sexuality. Women sell sex, and men buy it. This investment varies between cultures and periods.

There was a time when years of courtship and long term financial investment were necessary to obtain sex from a woman. Not anymore. The invention of contraception multiplied the offer of sex tenfold. Women together manage the worth of sexual acts, and it might explain why women despise prostitution and pornography, and slut-shame each other. An average girl who asks a price that is too high for the sexual economy will not find a buyer.

If a woman’s sexuality has been offered a lot, the value of the offer will decrease. This means that a woman’s sexuality is non-renewable. Women will try to protect their sexual reputation and to make others believe that their sexuality is exclusive.

Paternity uncertainty has been one of our most important sexual challenges. The attraction that men feel for virgins is explainable by the fact that paternal uncertainty is the equivalent of rape for men; being denied the ability to invest in one’s chosen offspring.

Everyone benefits from paternity certainty. For example, maternal grandparents invest more in children, possibly because unlike the father’s parents, they are certain of being related to the child.

Another poor victim of the evolutionary game.

3. Past traditions and rituals that evolved alongside humanity served a clear benefit to the family unit

Until the latest decades, culture was a tool for the genes to be passed on. The maturation of humans is extremely long compared to many other species, which shows the importance of upbringing and learning the norms of a social group. Most traditional sex roles can be seen as a way to assess the best mates among men and women.

Men would benefit the gene pool by passing genes with agentic traits to lead the group to higher goals, whereas women displayed feminine qualities to display nurturing qualities to attractive males. The opposite was inconceivable because men outperform females in literally any sort of competition, and women are better at nurturing children and showing empathy. Naturally, the most successful male picked the most attractive female and both offered the finances and care a child needed. It was beneficial to the family unit, which was in turn beneficial to the continuity of the society.

Now, people are mysteriously invested in the mission of destroying gender roles, cheer on parents who crossdress their children and encourage companies to advertise toy trucks with girls. Everyone wants to eliminate gender roles but no one really knows why.

Meanwhile, masculine men are still more desirable and successful and feminine women more attractive (although this relationship is a little more complicated). Women's self-rated attractiveness is strongly linked to attraction to masculine faces, and prefer vocal masculinity. Denying these preferences will only prevent you from getting laid. Even though we are waging war against gender roles, women still apply them when choosing mates. (Interestingly, there is a negative relationship between physical self-evaluation and the number of sexual partners in women.)

While men cannot escape their contribution to society because of a permanent motivation to compete, perform and achieve before being rewarded with sexual opportunities, women are undergoing social engineering that aims to suppress their desire for children. Through contraception and social engineering, women have neglected their end of the bargain.

4. Testosterone is the biological cause for masculinity. Environmental changes that reduce the hormone's concentration in men causes them to be weaker and more feminine.

Testosterone masculinizes both behavior and physical appearance, as stated above, and lack thereof feminizes them. However these environmental forces obviously refer to something of which I have no awareness of. Didn't they fix the problems with plastic feeding bottles already? Or do you call "environmental change" the emasculation of teenage boys in cathedral choirs until about a hundred years?

5. A woman's value significantly depends on her fertility and beauty. A man's value significantly depends on his resources, intellect, and character.

Beauty & youth vs social status

David Buss gathered data from 37 cultures with a total sample size of over 10,000 to find out about mate preferences and concluded that men preferred youth and physical attractiveness because it displays fertility and reproductive capacity, and women prefer men with a great earning potential that can provide for them in the long term.

It was the first study to assess mating preferences on such a large scale, exceeding previous studies in terms of ethnic, geographic, religious and racial diversity. To this day, the article has 3,000 Google scholar citations and is a pillar of evolutionary theory. These findings about preferences have been replicated many times, notably on dating websites.

Many progressivists believe that women's attractiveness should also be dependent on her intellect. That is a great utopia, but unrealistic. In the end, it pretty much comes down to this: those who are not needed will go extraordinary lengths to feel accepted, and this is why men take all the biggest risks, resulting in the greatest achievements. Women take few risks (even visible in their inability to be funny, resulting in their absence in stand-up comedy) and contribute little to art or science and as a result we are making them a favor by judging them by their looks. You cannot simply opt out of your evolved preferences and characteristics.

Sex differences in risk taking. Why is this guy risking breaking his neck for no apparent reason while these girls are fulfilled simply licking ice cream?

6. Elimination of traditional sex roles and the promotion of unlimited mating choice in women unleashes their promiscuity and other negative behaviors that block family formation.

The chances of fertilization are higher in one-night stands, and men's sperm count is higher when they are away from their long-term partner for a while. The human penis might have been shaped to remove competitor's sperm out of the vagina. Women experience more orgasms with masculine and attractive men, who have qualities sought for short term mating. Many benefits exist to short-term matings for women, such as resources, mate switching or manipulation.

All of these examples suggest that women did not evolve a preference for monogamous, long-term relationships. Click here for evidence that women are designed for short-term mating.

It seems, however, that all this evidence is inconclusive. The general ambiguity that surrounds female sexuality and the discrepancies between sexual preferences in females across the world seem to indicate that their sexual preference might not be solidly entrenched, whereas men's sexuality is widely understood and consistent across time, species and cultures.

Females' sexual attitudes are mostly shaped by culture: females' sexual preferences are more responsive to socialization than males'. In other words, women will like what they are told to like.

7. Socialism, feminism, cultural Marxism, and social justice warriorism aim to destroy the family unit, decrease the fertility rate, and impoverish the state through large welfare entitlements.

Welfare entitlements.

Complying with feminist demands is as close as a society can get to cultural and ethnic suicide. Historically, intrasexual (male) competition always benefited the group. The feminist sentiment rose to power when outcomes were not shared with the the whole group, and rich people would get rich at the expense of others without paying taxes.

Women, depending on a single provider, began experiencing the variable outcomes that men have gone through for thousands of generations. That is why they support financial entitlement measures. The benefits they could get out of their sexuality became as variable as men's outcomes. Now, they can have the best genes by engaging in short-term mating, and their basic needs paid for by millions of anonymous working men.

Later they will fight for their right not to be judged on their sexual past, and when they will realize the hardships of a working life or just get bored and have children, they will get support from the state. Men are backing them up in every step of the way.

Cultural marxism is the greatest ideological battle of the Western world at the moment. We are paying people to fight against manspreading, or funding university research that operationalizes sexism with agreement to items like "Women, compared to men, tend to have a superior moral sensibility."

Few academic researchers would support prescriptive conclusions based on their research, even though we can use their results to justify our beliefs. Even David Buss, who studies sex differences and evolutionary psychology, calls himself a feminist and does not see sex differences and feminism as incompatible.

I don't think anyone who believes in any form of biological determinism is compatible with the blank-slate perspective of SJWism. We don't have popular support, but we have plenty of scientific evidence backing us up.

Read More: 5 Crucial Beliefs Every Man Should Internalize

Moshe Kelstein

Moshe is a man on a mission. A mission to defeat degeneracy once and for all!

Women Age Worse Than Men

May 27, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

I visited a club I hadn't stepped foot in for three long years. I ordered a drink and settled into my favorite spot where I had full view of the bar and dance floor. And then I saw them—the sisters. They were in their favorite spot as well, the same one they'd camp at every weekend night, always dancing with new men. I remembered them clearly because they went to this club just as much as I did.

From a distance I could see their hair was still long, nearly waist-length, and that their clothes were still fashionable, but I couldn't believe what I saw when I got closer—their faces and figures had degraded much more than the three years of time that had passed should've suggested. Crackles were developing around their eyes and mouths and their once-curvy body was turning clumpy and misshapen like a bowl of yogurt. Back then, they were the hottest girls in the club with no shortage of men approaching them, but now they were dancing next to each other with forced smiles on their faces, far uglier than in the past. They were no longer the center of attention.

All I could think of was "what a waste." What a waste that these girls didn't use their peak beauty to find the most valuable man that could to be their life partner. What a waste they didn't leverage their youth to secure something that could lead to a more meaningful life. What a waste that they are still wasting their time to sate their bottomless need for attention. Whatever man they can get today will be a lesser one than what they could have received three years before, because younger girls in the club were now getting much more male attention than they were.

I stopped and thought about my own behavior. By looking at them, aren't I staring into a mirror? If women valued men on youth and looks, like men value them, then yes. If women shied away from men with gray hair and furrows in his brow, then yes. But this doesn't happen, because even younger women prefer men older than themselves. As long as a man has a good combination of status, money, looks, and game, he would experience absolutely no degradation in success with women over a 3-year time span, as I surely haven't, and in all likelihood he would see an increase.

But for the sisters, every day the tick tock sound of the clock gets louder. Every day past their peak beauty and fertility, the main qualities men desire, the worser man they'll end up with. Three years is nothing for a man, but it is an eternity for a young woman—an eternity that the culture is training them to waste by having fun hopping from one cock to the other with no benefit to their future happiness or stability.

I also ran into another girl I had gone on a date with. In three years the skin around her bright blue eyes were turning into a leathery shoe. I ran into a shop girl I hit on once. Her faced stayed fit but her body was halfway into becoming a stout pear. Before and after pictures of the same girl spaced three years apart can be a depressing sight indeed. How can nature be so cruel to one of its creations? How can it destroy something so beautiful? And then I look at pictures of myself and can hardly tell the difference. I have more gray hair for sure, but women continue to guess my 35-year-old age as being in the late 20's. The twisted mother of nature gave women the incredible beauty of a flower, but only for a limited amount of time, while letting men exist as if they were bonsai trees.

There is a somber truth to the expression that women age like milk and men like wine, and I haven't even spoken of the fact that these aged women have higher standards, higher expectations, and the burden of disappointment from being pumped and dumped so many times, factors that surely make them less pleasing. Once they are past the peak of their beauty, and once they have taken their spins on the carousel, they are not fit to serve as anything more than a fuck buddy, a mere container for male sexual pleasure.

If there is anything I've learned from this three-year observation, besides the cruelty of nature, it's that a woman's physical degradation accelerates rapidly starting at 25. While a girl will hardly age from 20-25, you are liable to see a precipitous fall every year after 25, until around 35 when she completes the transformation of looking like her mother.

While aging is no fault of women, I have zero sympathy for single women over 25. They wasted their best years to ride the cock carousel for attention, validation, or entertainment, and now expect you to be their handsome knight to give them a dream life and family. Fuck that and fuck them. They will get no more effort from me than the last man they had a one-night stand with. When it's time for me to decide which girl to devote the bulk of my energy to, only a young girl in the peak of her beauty will suffice.

Read Next: Women Are Abusive When Not Socially Constrained

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Josh Duggar Incident Reveals The Tactics And Hypocrisy of SJWs

May 28, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Last week, In Touch Weekly broke the news that Josh Duggar, eldest son of Jim Bob and Michelle Duggar from TLC's 19 Kids and Counting, had molested five under-aged girls in 2002 and 2003. Josh, who was 14 at the time, was accused of fondling his victims, touching their breasts and genitals while they slept.

A police report was released shortly after the In Touch article, and indicated that four of the five girls may have been his siblings, while the last victim was a family friend who had spent the night at the Duggar home.

The story unleashed a firestorm of criticism against the way the Duggars' handled the situation. Jim Bob allegedly waited a year before contacting authorities and instead sought help from church elders who also did not contact the police. Josh was sent to the Basic Life Principles Training Center, a faith-based healing center and then had to live with a close family friend for period of time. Josh was never charged with a crime as the statute of limitations had run out before the police learned of the events.

People from the left not only called for Josh Duggar to be punished, but for the entire family to suffer by calling for the cancellation of the Duggars' TV show the because of the incident.

> "don't kiss before marriage" "homosexuality is a sin" molests sisters and other girls #CancelTheDuggars#JoshDuggar

> — hanna (@dixandchix) May 22, 2015

In response to the criticism, Josh Duggar resigned from his position as executive director at the Family Research Council in Washington DC. A day later TLC pulled 19 Kids and Counting off of their lineup. While the show has not officially been cancelled, its future seems to be in limbo.

The release of this story and the SJWs' consequent reaction to the story gives us a great opportunity to see how SJWs work.

For SJWs, it's personal

The first interesting thing about the release of the Josh Duggar story is that the molestation occurred a long time ago. In Touch had to issue a Freedom of Information Act request to obtain the police report. Obviously, someone deliberately tipped off In Touch about the existence of the report.

But why would someone want to expose the Duggars' dirty laundry?

The Duggar family is a well-known opponent of the LGBT agenda. In 2014, they sparked outrage when they asked married couples to post pictures of themselves kissing on the Duggar Facebook page and then deleted pictures of gay couples kissing. Jim Bob and Michelle are also active in supporting conservative politicians who may oppose same sex marriage.

Josh Duggar was an even worse offender against LGBT sensibilities. Up until he was forced to resign due to the molestation report being released, he worked for the Family Research Council (FRC). The FRC is a conservative Christian lobbying organization that was founded by James Dobson.

One of the main activities of the FRC is lobbying, very ineffectively, against LGBT issues including same sex marriage.

By publicly setting themselves against the LGBT agenda, the Duggars made themselves a lightning rod for SJWs.

Pick the target, freeze it, personalize it, and polarize it

By digging up dirt on Josh Duggar, the SJWs are executing a strategy from Saul Alinsky's Rules for Radicals.

> RULE 12:Pick the target, freeze it, personalize it, and polarize it.

You can see this rule in action with almost every time you try to engage an SJW in an argument. While men traditionally would argue about ideas using logic, the SJW doesn't bother with this. Rather, they almost always argue ad hominem by pointing out some personal failing of the person (as there is with Josh Duggar). If no personal failing is apparent, they resort to trying to categorize the person as a racist, homophobe, misogynist, or as a science denier.

SJWs are hypocrites

Ms. Dunham

Contrast the criticism of the Duggars with the way that SJWs react to molestation claim that concerns one of their own—the star of the HBO series Girls, Lena Dunham.

Kevin Williamson, writing in an article for National Review, summarized the questionable incidents that Dunham related in her memoir, Not That Kind of Girl.

> Dunham writes of casually masturbating while in bed next to her younger sister, of bribing her with "three pieces of candy if I could kiss her on the lips for five seconds . . . anything a sexual predator might do to woo a small suburban girl I was trying." At one point, when her sister is a toddler, Lena Dunham pries open her vagina — "my curiosity got the best of me," she offers, as though that were an explanation. "This was within the spectrum of things I did."

As Williams relates, "there is no non-horrific interpretation of this episode."

Double Standard

Yes, I admit to stealing this from Anthony's Taylor Swift article, but it was too good to pass up.

Unlike Josh Duggar who immediately apologized and resigned from his job, Lena Dunham took to Twitter to condemn the “rage spiral” against her. She wrote, “The right-wing news story that I molested my little sister isn’t just LOL – it’s really fucking upsetting and disgusting. And by the way, if you were a little kid and never looked at another little kid’s vagina, well, congrats to you.”

Apart from the dust up around the incidents she recounted in her book, she has suffered no ill effects. She is still the star of Girls and her popularity is just as high as it ever was.

Conservatives also condemn Josh Duggar’s action

While a handful of conservatives, such as presidential candidate Mike Huckabee came to the defense of Josh Duggar, most conservatives were quick to condemn him. But they also pointed out the hypocrisy of people condemning Duggar but refusing to condemn Dunham.

> That Duggar guy…pedophile. Lena Dunham…pedophile. It’s not that hard. You can call out pedophila all the time!
>
> — Mike Cernovich (@Cernovich) May 23, 2015

Don’t hold your breath waiting for SJWs to start calling for Girls to be cancelled due to Dunham’s past actions.

Conclusion

Orestes being pursued by the Furies

For the record, while I believe in forgiveness and redemption, I think it was appropriate that Josh Duggar resigned from his position at the FRC. His actions as a juvenile render him an ineffective spokesman for an organization whose mission is to further policies that favor the traditional family.

But I think it is vindictive to go after the livelihood of his parents and his siblings. If anything, they were the victims of his actions. It is clear that the SJW outrage over Josh Duggar was not caused by a sudden concern for the emotional and physical well-being of the Duggar girls so much as glee over the misfortune of an enemy of the LGBT agenda. Otherwise, why are they trying to get the Duggars’ TV show canceled?

The fury with which the SJWs pursue revenge on their enemies is even more disturbing as it is obvious that the LGBT agenda is on a roll and is destined to prevail. The SJWs are not gracious winners. When their victory is complete, they will crush any dissent.

To be fair, the indignation that people on the right over Dunham's touching of her sister is also probably driven, in part, by Dunham's position as a leader in the social justice wars. Our mutual hatred for each other is just another sad indicator that our current culture is unraveling.

Unfortunately, I don't foresee an end to this polarized atmosphere. In the meantime, we need to be aware of the tactics that SJWs will continue to use to hurt people that they disagree with while turning a blind eye to their similarly tainted allies.

Read More: Another Whiny Feminist Reveals The Hypocrisy Of Feminism And Social Justice Warriors

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why Is The United States Still Using The Prussian Education System?

May 28, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Have you ever wondered why pupils are expected to rise when the teacher enters the classroom? I have, and the strangest part to me was that I couldn't recall anybody giving us clear orders to behave in that way, yet we all did.

I vividly remember trying to answer this conundrum as a kid by asking adults around me. The most common reply was that the purpose of standing up in front of a teacher is showing respect. But, I asked, why aren't we then rising when our mothers, fathers, and spouses enter the room? Or do only teachers deserve our respect? To this, nobody could reply with anything other than a blank stare.

It was only later, when I grew up and started digging through massive quantities of online articles, that I found out about the true origin of the education system I had been influenced by. At that point, everything became clear, and all the little idiotic things my teachers used to demand from us and that seemed so random back then suddenly started to make sense.

And I also found out the answer to my question: the purpose of rising when the teacher enters the room is to show obedience.

Crushing the child's soul

The Prussian education system (not a Wikipedia link), still used to this day in most countries worldwide, originated in the early 18th century as a way to instill absolute obedience and uniformity in the students under the guise of education. What the students wanted and thought was irrelevant—the Prussian education system was there to teach them minimal literacy and indoctrinate them into believing in the infallibility of the supreme authority (Prussian King Fredrick William I at the time). The end result was a useful generic worker, readily replaceable and dispensable.

Teachers acted as surrogate parents that had no mercy for the child and punished all mistakes ruthlessly for the purposes of destroying trust and instilling fear. The curriculum consisted of rote reading, writing, and memorization assignments that were meant to destroy the creativity and spontaneity.

The grades themselves also weren't used to measure the child's knowledge, but rather the level of its obedience—the worst grade implied the child was rebellious and refused to follow given methods rather than that it was stupid or inattentive.

Means of conditioning

The highly structured layout of the classroom meant pupils were disconnected from one another and easily monitored, which again emphasized the atmosphere of distrust. Even the school bell, used to mark the end and the beginning of each period, can be easily recognized as a conditioning method, later described as such by Pavlov in the late 19th century.

Everything is absolutely dedicated to turning a person into a robot: homework, dress codes, school uniforms and so on. Perhaps the most accurate description of the kind of retardation this education produces is in Kafka's "The Trial."

This same system was eventually transplanted into the US in 1843 and became the basis of its education system today. There were some minor changes—instead of the King, the students were taught to obey the State, but everything else is left the same. As an added bonus, there is a solid layer of SJW indoctrination that formed on top of that system in the last 150 years, to ensure children are not only intellectually but sexually crippled as well.

Perhaps the only exception to this is STEM due to its male dominance and reliance on hard facts, but of course, SJWs wouldn't be SJWs if they didn't want gender equality in computer sciences.

The tragedy of the Prussian education system is that it continues to churn out uniform, creatively stunted workers that are ideal for an 18th century Prussian labor market which no longer exists. A nation's economy relies on having a steady supply of creative people who take risks, which means we must take chances, try silly things, and generally not be afraid of failing to thrive, both personally and as a species. Otherwise, we're all going to be royally screwed.

Thanks, ~~Obama~~ Fredrick William I.

Read More: 5 Signs The American Education System Is Doomed

Derek Baroni

Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

5 Fat Burning Tips From A Professional Physique Competitor

May 28, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Sixpack Shortcuts

Hey man,

It's Mike Chang and today I'm going over the 5 most advanced fat loss tactics for getting six pack abs. Now, even though many people know me as one of the top fat loss trainers out there for six pack abs… there are a lot of guys out there who are looking to get even more ripped… like, as ripped as a physique competitor.

[photo credit https://www.reactionnutrition.com/team-reaction/jonny-catanzano/]

And to be honest, I could get you there. But wouldn't it be better to hear it from someone who's been there and is actually that ripped right now?

Well, that's why I asked my trusted trainer and Six Pack Shortcuts fat loss expert, Jonny, to personally tell you what he does to get into that ultra ripped condition for his competitions. By the way, that's him the the photo above!

Jonny really knows his stuff… in fact, he's my personal go-to guy when I need advice to get ready for photo shoots or TV appearances. Because sometimes I need to look a little bit more ripped or lose some belly fat as fast as possible to look my best.

Now I know you're probably dying to know exactly what Jonny does to get ripped for each competition, so here are his top 5 advanced fat burning tricks to get ultra shredded when time matters.

So let me hand it off to Jonny and let him break it all down for you. Take it away Jonny:

What's up y'all,

Jonny here, and first I'd like to thank Mike for having me share some of my inside fat loss info with you today!
Let's not waste any time and jump right into these fat shedding tricks:

1. Pack On That Muscle

The truth is that muscle is a major fat burner. You see, muscles are active cells that burn calories even when you're just relaxing or sleeping. So the more muscle you pack on, the more fat you will burn off of your body. And that's due to the fact that the calories that would normally turn into fat will be burned off or used as fuel by your muscles. This means that every single extra pound of muscle you put on will increase the amount of fat you burn off every single day.

2. Do High Intensity Workouts At The Optimal Fat Burning Time

[image]

What is the optimal fat burning time? Right before breakfast first thing in the morning… And if you work out the right way (which I'll explain more about in tactic #5), you will keep burn calories for hours long after you stop working out.

You see, when you work out right before breakfast, your body is burning pure fat because your body is depleted, or out of, sugar/energy from "fasting" while you were sleeping. However, if you were to eat first and then workout in the morning, you would have refueled your body and prevented the most amount of fat from being burned during your morning workout.

3. Eat Slow Releasing Protein Before Bed

I know the "popular belief" is that you should NEVER eat before bed if you want to get ripped. However, if you want to build muscle and keep that muscle to burn more fat, a slow releasing protein source or a supplement can help to feed your body's muscle growth. On top of that, because this protein digests slowly, it will not turn into fat or stop your body from burning fat why you're asleep. Actually, doing this can help you burn more fat as well because your body's digestion process burns calories too.

4. Eat More Throughout The Day

Your goal should be to eat about every three hours if you want to burn the most amount of fat. Why? Well because this will keep your digestive system, and thus your metabolism, working all day to digest that food. And, as I mentioned in tactic #3, will keep burning those calories. Now, when you starting eating every three hours you will activate what I call your body's "fat burning furnace," which triggers your body to keep shedding fat.

Picture a fireplace burning wood… what if that fire was your fat burning metabolism and it was burning all day? Don't you need enough logs to keep that fire going all day? Well of course you do, so picture food as your "logs." All you have to do is feed your fat burning furnace a reasonable amount of food throughout the day and it will continue to burn fat because your digestion is constantly going.

5. Activate The Afterburn Effect (Burns Fat For Up To 48 Hours)

Here's what is happening when you activate the Afterburn Effect with Afterburn Training:

- Your body uses oxygen from your muscles.
- Your body then replenishes your muscle's oxygen.

 This process of replenishing your muscle's oxygen can take up to 48 hours, so you are burning fat that entire time

Now I broke this down for you to sound as simple as possible, however don't underestimate how effective the Afterburn Effect is… You see, this is the exact technique that men from all around the world have used to get rid of their belly fat and get six pack abs fast. And it's the same training I use before I step on stage to compete with the top fitness competitors in the world.

So if you want to get rid of all your unwanted fat, or even if you're trying to get as ripped as a fitness competitor… check this out to learn exactly how you can Burn Fat For 48 Hours after every workout.

Enjoy!

Jonny

Well man, I hope you enjoyed these killer tips from Jonny, they’re proven to get you the ripped body you want fast!

So make sure you learn How To Activate The Afterburn Effect today.

Mike Chang

Advertise Your Site Or Product With Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

ROK Is Looking To Hire Two Writers

May 28, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We would like to plug in some gaps in our coverage, and so we're looking for two men:

1. Scandinavia correspondent, with a primary focus on Sweden.

Events in Sweden show that it is rapidly progressing along the cultural collapse model. We would like to report on various events and self-inflicted harm that the Swedes are doing to their nation and culture. The correspondent is also free to write about Norway, Iceland, Finland, and Denmark. This position will mostly offer reporting and commentary on news events, meaning the candidate should ideally be living in Sweden.

2. Masculine theologian.

We're also looking for a man who can put past religious ideals, writings, and traditions into modern context to help men better understand the modern world and attain virtue within it. This position isn't to preach the gospel or word of god, but to extract the best religious ideas of the past that can still serve men today. The writer will have free reign to pick his weekly topics to discuss.

Both writers are asked to submit an article each week that is at least 700 words. If you are interested, contact ROK's editor, Winston Smith, with details of your background and any writing samples. If he believes you are a good match, you'll be asked to submit two test articles to observe how the readership responds to your work. If those work out, we'll bring you aboard to the team. You will compensated if hired (Winston will give you details).

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

10 Reasons Why San Francisco’s Women Are Worse Than Toronto’s

May 29, 2015 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

For a while I have been wondering why ROK hasn’t written much about San Francisco and its women. Here are several major reasons why you can safely skip gaming in San Francisco from a nearly 17-year resident of this city:

1. It Is The Epicenter Of Careerist Feminism

You won’t find a place where women sacrifice more time and energy trying to prove that they can do whatever a man can, and that they can achieve the same corporate ranks, make the same amount of money, and have the same lifestyle as men – from sex life to the intensity of work outs. No personal cost is too high.

There is a price to be paid for eighteen-hour work days at the Silicon Valley start-ups, and that price is developing a scarier man-jaw than you would find anywhere else.
The highest cost of living in the nation creates a swim-or-sink economy and mentality, where women become as aggressive about their jobs, finances and survival as guys are.

You will see both attractive and extremely unattractive women act like they are God’s gift, because they went to a top school and have good jobs, and they have been brainwashed into believing that being overconfident and acting like a man is the right way to be in order to make it here.

2. Herd Mentality is Rampant

Every girl does the same thing for a living (recruiting or marketing) and wears exactly the same clothes—yoga pants, bright Nike shoes, sunglasses, iPhone in one hand and a bottle of water in the other. Lulu Lemon is not fashion here; it's a clan.

The hobbies among women are also remarkable similar: most girls do yoga, spin classes, run marathons, and go to baseball games not because that's what they really like to do, but because everyone else is doing it. Standing an hour in line to get a seat at the latest trendy, overrated restaurant, won't deter anyone, despite how many restaurant options there might be around with no lines.

3. The Land Of Smartphone Drones

The women here are more glued to their smartphones than anywhere else. They literally never look up, even though this is the city where you have all the reasons to look around, due to its pedestrian friendly environment, natural beauty, and plenty of opportunities for people watching.

I am sure that if I sat next to a girl on a bus or metro for a 30 minute ride, she would not be able to identify me in a line-up a minute after I get off. This isn't that different in coffee shops or restaurants. The girls here have no situational awareness whatsoever.

4. Unprecedented Female Arrogance Driven By Extremely Thirsty, Passive Men

Sometimes I hear conversations between two girls about how they sort through the guys who are interested in them, as if they were models. The moment I look at them, I cringe and wonder if the guys they are talking about are legally blind. But then again—who can blame those women, if they continue receiving attention from handsome, desperate Ivy League grads with seven figure incomes.

5. The Capital of Manly Women

There has to be extra testosterone in the water, or else would there be so many women in the San Francisco area with low, manly voices who are interested in weight lifting, marathon running, and long hikes. Their eagerness to “prove” themselves and to “challenge” themselves defies the very notion of femininity.

6. Game Is Dead

No one approaches anyone anymore. Period. Everyone is on OkCupid, Tinder, etc. Guys are out of practice and no longer have what it takes to make a move, and the girls are extremely unfriendly because they are also out of practice of dealing with guys who used to approach.

7. Women Are Too Busy

Local women have been thoroughly brainwashed into believing that being overbooked and being a “challenge” makes them more attractive and desirable. Between very long work and school days, yoga, pilates, hiking, and texting, they simply have no time or energy left for any love or romance, however casual or serious it might be. And, if there is one place, where women follow “The Rules” of playing hard to get, that would be San Francisco.

8. The Land Of Butterflies

Because of the huge selection of single men, so many women never stop going on dates with random ones they meet online. They don't really like or dislike anyone, so they end up going on a million 20 minute coffee dates expecting to be swept off their feet.

This of course almost never happens, and this arduous process makes those women extremely jaded and unexcited about dating or meeting someone new.

9. You Don't Know What Flaking Is Until You Come to SF

The combination of #1, #7, #8 – working too hard, meeting too many guys and overbooking leads to fatigue, confusion, and the highest rates of flaking in the Western hemisphere

10. It's Nothing Like New York City

People like comparing San Francisco to New York. There are some similarities in the way two cities look and feel, but when it comes to women and game, they couldn't be more different. New York is the land of far friendlier, more approachable, less flaky, and waaaay more attractive women. Between Wall Street and a notorious fast-paced lifestyle, you would expect NY women to be worse, but they aren't, as has been confirmed by Roosh and many comments.

San Francisco is a great city for many reasons. Dating, women, and game isn't one of them. But then again—can any city be truly great if it's lacking in those departments?

Read More: 15 Reasons Why Toronto Is The Worst City In North America For Men

Seneca Stone

Seneca is an attorney, a tennis fan and an observer of human behavior in Northern California, who enjoys commenting, hating, and admiring what and who he sees around.

Did SJWs Cost Russia Victory In The Eurovision Song Contest?

May 29, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In a sign of our biased times, Russia's 2015 Eurovision entry, Polina Gagarina, was "protected" by "anti-booing technology" during the recent song contest in Vienna. Rather than basing their reactions on the quality of the singing, and avoiding conflating one performer with her government, many in the crowd instead chose to voice their displeasure with the Kremlin.

The hosts had to request, without naming the country, that those present in the Wiener Stadthalle refrain from such rude demonstrations. Even last year's winner, Conchita Wurst, received a sub-lukewarm reaction after asking onstage for people to cheer for Russia.

At the conclusion, despite leading halfway through the count, Russia came second, placing second and third in the viewers' and jury voting respectively. To argue that there was a backlash against Russia only in the Wiener Stadthalle is beyond moronic. Gagarina's performance may have placed well in popular voting across Europe, but the indication is clear that many held Russia's anti-gay legislation and alleged sponsorship of separatists in Eastern Ukraine against her.

Whatever your position on these issues, it is undoubtedly unfair that a song contest devolves into retribution for which country did what when and how they did it.

I am reluctant to believe as well that many amongst the much more selective jury members, whose votes counted for half of the combined voting method, were not internally and externally swayed to also vote Russia lower, if at all. Just as The Guardian reflects the views and stereotypes of its readers, so too do Eurovision and its organizers and employees represent a certain branch of the "diversity at all costs" mentality.

It is a political and social association on par with many European political parties. If this is out in the open, fine, but the public overly trusts such bodies to be impartial. Eurovision performances with LGBT themes routinely place highly in the annual contest. The focus should be on the singing.

Eurovision is only encouraging such behavior

[image]
Is this meant to be "modern" Austria? Austria's 2014 Eurovision winner, Conchita Wurst, flanked by the all-female, two-thirds minority hosting trio. Social reengineering through media at its best.

The Eurovision hosts and organizers may genuinely have wanted every country's participants to be respected, but even the chosen hosts constituted an attempt to shove diversity down viewers' throats. Despite the paucity of African and biracial people in Austria, whose biggest immigrant groups tend to be former Yugoslavians and Turks, two of the three hosts had a black parent and are noticeably "ethnic."

All three of the hosts, to boot, were female, for the first time in Eurovision history. Because their bearded drag queen Conchita had won last year's contest in Copenhagen, the new organizers in Austria apparently wanted to go above and beyond in hiring hosts based on diversity first and merit last.

When Conchita Wurst "triumphed" in 2014, I had to admit that his/her (I'm so confused right now) voice was good. Yet the "camp-ness" invariably associated with Eurovision left me in no doubt that many were supporting Conchita not based on singing ability, however decent he/she was, but the image of a bearded drag queen defying her "many critics."

I do not pretend that a singer's attractiveness (Gagarina, albeit with heavy make-up), political position (LGBT advocate or not etc) or pure novelty (e.g. Conchita) don't factor into viewers choices for both Eurovision and wider Western music. For example, if Taylor Swift weighed 200 pounds and didn't use cosmetics to eliminate inevitable bags under her eyes, would her net worth be $1 or 10 million+, let alone $100 million+?

The shortsighted people who booed Gagarina failed to anticipate the criticism she herself faced at home. Vitaly Milonov, a key designer of the Kremlin's anti-gay laws, lambasted her for embracing Conchita Wurst backstage. The head of the Russian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Cyrill, added that he hoped Russia would lose because of what he said were sodomy-inspired themes within its performance.

Once again, condensing Gagarina's appearance and Moscow itself is fraught with hypocrisy. This is mirth-worthy, though, as SJWs incessantly bash their enemies for making stereotypes and generalized statements about feminism, leftist politics and other issues. Supposedly these SJWs have the supreme wisdom to treat a singer and an administration governing 150 million people as one and the same.

Rename it “The Eurovision Leftist Popularity Contest”

[image]
Undermining the crowd’s reasons for booing Gagarina, Vitaly Milonov attacked her for her positive reactions to Conchita Wurst.

It’s nigh on impossible to have a song contest based on rewarding voice performances alone. But Eurovision no longer approaches, if it ever did, the notion of a legitimate contest. All entrants can clearly sing, but almost every winner over the last decade has umped the ante in jostling to demonstrate their non-singing idiosyncrasies.

Most people live in the dark times, thinking that there is a positive correlation between demonstrated, objective ability and pecuniary rewards, accolades and other “achievements.” Like Hollywood, where you would struggle to find more than several self-declared (moderate) conservatives who have won some of the last 100 acting awards (which span 25 years), Eurovision has become the domain of those either espousing acceptable SJW views or distinctly failing to challenge those same views.

My rendering of Eurovision can be taken on even by those who support gay marriage and other causes. The measurement of a winner should not be which political stances they take for or against, but rather (largely) what they do on-stage. This is nonetheless very difficult for leftists to admit, as the more attention such political performers get, the more weight it adds to the causes leftists themselves support. It is self-interest at its most potent, reducible to “I support those who support what I support.”

Next time Eurovision comes round, I suggest you either wait for an ROK article about it, or just sleep. Any nightmares you have will be far less grim than what you see in Sweden next year.

Read More: Why Floyd Mayweather’s Victory Over Manny Pacquiao Is A Victory For The Manosphere

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Truths From The Best Mother's Day Show You Probably Missed: TLC's "Submissive Wives"

May 29, 2015 | by Arminius Hermann | Link | Original Link

When I stumbled across TLC's Submissive Wives' Guide to Marriage while channel surfing over Mother's Day weekend, I almost didn't stop to investigate. After all, reality television shows tend to be zoological in nature: find strange or exotic people, preferably naive if at all possible, film them in their natural habitat, and televise it for the amusement of your viewing demographic.

In the American context, this means finding some rubes in flyover territory whose personal habits, religious practices, accent, social circle, or means of employment can serve as ready pablum to boost the flagging self-esteem of the urbanized, sophisticated, left-leaning cable TV viewer (e.g. A&E's Duck Dynasty, or History's Axe Men or Swamp People).

Fearing more of the same, I was initially reluctant to tune to the channel, but nevertheless, I did. I'm glad I watched the episode, because truth was being ladled out by the bucketful for those with eyes to see, truths that RoK readers will readily recognize and likely appreciate.

Truth #1: The optimal marriage structure features husband as leader and wife as deputy

Whether it is the dreaded “s” word (submission) or the slightly more palatable Captain and First Officer (FO) model, the hierarchy is clear: the husband is the captain of SS Family. This is not to say that the wife is a doormat—if she were, she would be a poor FO. The captain needs a capable FO who can be trusted to independently run the ship while he’s away, and a passive FO simply cannot fulfill this role.

Instead, the FO consults and advises while recognizing that the Captain has the final say. Much social science data supports this hierarchical ordering, finding that when men and women fill the traditional roles of male leader, provider, and coverer, with woman filling the roles of follower and homemaker, both men and women are happier and are more likely to report greater emotional fulfillment in their marriage and enjoy more frequent and more satisfying sex.

The concept of submission encompasses much more than just who gets the final say in decisions, and extends instead to a broader attitude of mate-centered service, care, and meeting of whatever needs one’s spouse has. The FO’s objective, her job description as it were, is the mission, and helping and supporting the captain in guiding the SS Family to that destination.

Truth #2: The job description of “wife” entails meeting your husband’s sexual needs, as well as any others he may have

One would think this would be a no-brainer, in that why would men and women marry if not to fill some otherwise unmet need? For most men, one of their primary needs is sexual fulfillment, and for some reason, the idea of having sex with their man when he wants it seems to be either a complete surprise, or worse, borderline repulsive to many wives or would-be wives.

This is a significant yet completely avoidable error, for not only does scripture inveigh against regularly denying yourself sexually to your spouse, but the evidence suggests that women who do so interfere with getting their own relational needs met as well. In other words, not only should she “give it up” because it is best for her husband, but she should do so because it is in her own interests as well, even if she doesn’t feel like at the time.

Truth #3: Male self-improvement efforts to become better leaders are value-added

In the episode, one husband advises another that a man must "give his wife something to submit to," as an enabler, if not exactly a precondition of her submission. This counsel, while quite contra-Biblical from a theological standpoint, is beneficial nonetheless.

A man who is focused on improving himself harnesses the forces of hypergamy in his favor, and by extension, becomes someone to whom a woman would more willingly submit. Thus advice such as "get a job," "get in and stay in shape," "acquire hobbies," "dress better," and "clean up a little" take on greater utility.

Since men are the gatekeepers of commitment and, if fathers, the parent capable of granting to their wives and children the gift of civilization, you, my male readers, are the prize. So develop yourself to the utmost as the captain of your ship so that you respect yourself and (as a nice side effect) your crew finds it easier and more "natural" to respect and follow you.

Truth #4: Wives should be shovelling the gravel too

Let us return to the wife who shared the marital bed more often with the labrador than with the husband. As the stay-at-home-spouse with school-age children attending public school, there was no apparent excuse for the family home to be in the disarray shown in the episode. Yet it was.

Soiled clothes were everywhere and family meals a rarity, despite (or perhaps caused by) the fact that the wife slept long hours as a general rule, ruminated frequently on the couch for hours on end, was unconcerned about her appearance and fitness, and frequently enjoyed midday naps. For whatever reason, she was failing to discharge her share of the division of marital labor, and seemed to have little concern about the negative effects her neglect was having on the family and her husband.

Ironically, her sloth was both a symptom and a cause of her steep marital dissatisfaction, causing her to complain on air in her own zaftig ennui that her and her husband were on the road to divorce if nothing changed. Happily, based on what was shown in the episode, it appeared that her experimentation with "submission" as a wife was bearing positive fruit–the laundry was being done, and the house was being made a home.

She was becoming more equally yoked to the domestic plow, her efforts to support SS Family becoming incrementally more on par with that of her husband. He was "shoveling his gravel" without complaint, as men are wont to do; she needed to do so as well.

Conclusion

Although clunky in places–I think this show was the first time I'd ever heard the phrase "dress like a "hoochie mama" not uttered perjoratively–every once in a while the Cathedral's media stream inadvertently subverts the culture it aims to propagate.

Thus, while this show was intended to be ready-made red meat for the liberalist-feminist majority, and had some success in this regard judging by the comments at various lefty message boards, it also served as an evangelizing platform for those who hew to objective Truth.

Read More: Housewives Are The New Battered Wives

Arminius Hermann
Arminius Hermann, elsewhere known by the nom-de-cyber Elusive Wapiti, is a father to four and husband to one. His interests outside of having too many opinions are hunting, motorcycling, and flying.

The Eroding Virtue Of Fortitude

May 30, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> Greatness is best measured by how well an individual responds to the happenings in life that appear to be totally unfair, unreasonable, and undeserved. – Marvin J.Ashton

One of the greatest realizations that the red pill teaches us is that life is unfair. This becomes even more evident in today's heavily beta indoctrinating, pleasure-driven gyno-centric societies—where modern men are subject to challenges which they might not even realize, on another dimension different from their forefathers.

But in this scenario, if there is one virtue which would help men withstand the various vicissitudes modern life would throw at them, it is that of fortitude.

> Fortitude is the guard and support of the other virtues – John Locke

Fortitude is the strength of mind that allows us to withstand the adversities in life with courage. It is what separates the achievers, the heroes and the survivors from the average – because just as genius may strengthen their ability to outwit and outsmart others, it is fortitude which grants them the resilience to resist and overcome opposition, and outlast others.

Yet with today's degeneracy, what we see is the increasing and gradual erosion of fortitude from men's personalities, rendering them pussified, and even worse trained to function as compliant and dutiful slaves to dysfunctional social constructs which demean their own masculine identities, and train them to undermine that of fellow men.

The pussified modern Ahab

With modern men becoming increasingly indoctrinated towards dependency, it's common to see men being brainwashed into aping copying comical caricatures of pseudo-alphadom.

A modern man is raised to comply to society, his women and more important be afraid and confused of his own masculinity; which he compensates to discover by tyrannizing other men – aka the Modern Ahab.

Yet like a ferocious Rottweiler on leash, he meekly submits to his societal puppet masters and more importantly, his woman.

Heavily socially indoctrinated towards feminism since birth, he's raised to strangle his resistance to the lies taught by modern society. And because he simply lacks the necessary fortitude to rebel, he ends up living in subservience to a society and women which view him as an expendable tool.

His inability to stand up for his own ideals and masculinity cripples his masculinity—worsened by his own fear of losing out on illusionary comfort from women and material pleasures that society trains to believe as the real thing.

He chooses comfort—stagnating and crippling his metamorphosis into an evolved man—because he lacks the fortitude to endure a difficult but more rewarding one out of his fear of struggle. A modern man should ask: what kind of man am I heading to become?

The necessity of developing fortitude

In today's world, it's common to see the strong tyrannize the weak, while simultaneously weakening themselves by submitting themselves to societal pleasures and pressures which corrupt their own personalities.

At the same time, we see men end up living lives of wasted potential and frustrated ambitions simply because they lacked the fortitude to stand up for themselves, or take charge of their own lives.

Thus it becomes extremely important for a man (moreso a redpiller) to develop fortitude to withstand the onslaught of challenges that modern life would thrust on him – whether physically, emotionally and morally. This is best summarized in the following excerpts from The Book Of Pook:

> Endure. All your exes will have one thing in common: they want you to fail.The last thing they want is to run into you later and see you successful. No! They want to see you remain the same or sink lower.
> Endure. All the girls that shot you down: they want you to fail. A big fear in woman is missing The Great Catch. Give substance to their fear.
> Endure. At your high school reunion, the ones you knew will come back with secret desires of seeing failures everywhere, even at you. Defy them.
> Endure. For it is the same for 99% of the people, they get grounded up into conformity and become bewildered as their lives become more and more joyless. They will feel threatened by you.
> …The more successful you become in life,the more and more people will despise you. No one despises the innocent Nice Guy who happily takes orders. But everyone envies the one who knows what he wants and takes it, the guy who won't be played,and the guy who manages to unite dream and day.
> …People do not want you to succeed, especially people you've known your entire life. They want you to stay the same or fail. Their lives can only succeed by seeing you fail.

> ….Endurance alone is power ultimate.
> …So endure. We are the sum of our endurance.

There are many simple ways to develop fortitude. For example, embrace spirituality and meditate regularly to develop mental toughness and clarity.

Take care of your body, for it houses your all important mind. Purge the martyr complex (if existent) from your psychology, and cut off negative and draining connections to people and things in life who'd be dragging you down and preventing you from the realization of your true potential.

Prevent emotions from getting the best of you. Embrace self reliance, do not jeopardize your financial freedom and nurture your unique individuality. Do not fear failure, solitude or struggle and realize that we are all Sisyphus; and sometimes in life,we have to persistently fight a battle more than once to actually win it.

Conclusion

In today's world of deceptive illusionist pleasures, it becomes extremely important for a man not to get lost and waste himself by submitting to these—and there is no substitute for fortitude to endure the vagaries of modern life.

Life is a test, and only the ones who endure it with fortitude are the true masters of their own destinies. In the end, it doesn't always matter where you start in life, but what does matter is how you endure it and where you finish at. Fortitude is an indispensable companion to have on that journey.

Read Next: Growth Vs. Comfort

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

17 Previous Assault Convictions But No Jail Time For This Woman

May 30, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

What is it with British women and glassing men over the last several years? In arguably the worst example of these deplorable crimes, late in 2014 Yasmin Thomas had her female criminal privilege card stamped for the 18th time. Even with 17 previous convictions for assault and battery, Judge John Harrow just couldn't bring himself to incarcerate delicate little Yasmin for glassing Ronnie Lee.

Ronnie's "crime"? He didn't say thank you when her friend stole Lee's business partner's e-cigarette and threw it to the ground, and Thomas rudely insisted that Lee praise her for picking it up. When his words weren't quick enough, Thomas lashed out at his face with, you guessed it, glass.

A nurse informed Lee that he would have been blinded had the glass struck him mere millimetres away. Rightfully, this victim has pointed out that if the roles were reversed and he, a man, had glassed Yasmin Thomas, a woman, he would have been sent "straight to jail." Judge Harrow completely vacated his responsibility to the public and to the law when, describing her record as "breathtaking, one of the worst I have ever seen from anyone your age," he still let Thomas completely off the hook.

Yasmin Thomas has thus joined Lucie Slater and Sarah McKenzie-Ayres in the pantheon of the Pussy Pass Hall of Fame (Glassing Men Division).

But wait, it gets worse…

Yasmin Thomas breached her 12 month suspended jail term by failing to follow, three times in two months, the terms of her "compliance sessions." Despite promising earlier in the year to imprison her if she returned to the courts, white knight Judge Harrow freed her again:

> However Judge John Harrow, who sentenced her four months ago, said he was prepared to give Thomas 'a chance' and allow her to walk free from court.

A chance? I wish I could condense all my household chores or work assignments in the same way Judge Harrow has condensed a violent criminal record, which reads as long as Tolstoy's War and Peace, so that Yasmin Thomas gets her desperately needed "chance."

Male victim of violent crime? You don't matter

A man can be glassed in the United Kingdom without repercussions for a female perpetrator (Community service? Please!). But if he defends himself? Probably jail.

Ronnie Lee is discovering the hard way that his physical injuries and feelings in the aftermath of the attack fundamentally do not matter to the legal system or the other powers that be. The anxiety he has described, and the likelihood from the outset that he would experience it, as most victims of violent crime do, has been flagrantly ignored.

Yasmin Thomas mattered more to the court, as she would have in most other courts, than the dignity of Ronnie Lee and the rights of the community to be both protected and to have proven serial offenders removed from society.

Aside from her appalling record, the other discombobulating aspect of this case was Judge Harrow's extreme indulgence of Thomas:

> He also said he would not reveal details about Thomas's past in open court in case she found them embarrassing.

I find this more than amusing. Somehow the privacy allocated to Thomas' past outweighs the obligation for justice to the victim, who has nothing to do with any unfortunate happenings in the same past. Welcome to 21st century Western justice. This same "past" has evidently allowed Thomas to get away with 18 separate assaults and presumably a trove of others that were not prosecuted or not even investigated.

I do not know what sort of world we are living in, one where suddenly someone's past can explain away 18 convictions for physically threatening and harming someone. Not one, two, three, four or five, but 18. Under this standard, Roman Polanski should never be jailed for statutorily raping a 13-year-old girl because he's a Holocaust survivor. Is this really the standard of justice we want? Permitting gratuitously selfish crimes involving third-party victims because some people had hard experiences in life?

It’s out of control

Yasmin Thomas after her most recent pussy pass was issued, probably contemplating suing the patriarchy for photographing her outside a court.

Those of you familiar with my other articles will remember that I cited US (female) academic Sonja Starr. Starr, from the University of Michigan Law School, found in 2012 that men sentenced federally in the United States received 60% longer sentences than women. Women were also twice as likely to avoid jail entirely, or not even have charges laid against them after an investigation.

These figures would hold true for the United Kingdom and other Western jurisdictions as well. Both male and female judges are excusing horrendously violent behavior from females under the pretext that their backgrounds “forced” them to do it or because we live in a “patriarchy” in which “systemic oppression” makes women criminal automatons.

Ronnie Lee is just one of many victims. Their plights are underreported to begin with, as many of the female cretins assaulting them are never pursued, let alone convicted in open court. The harrowing reality is that Lee and others like him face a choice between two potentially ruined futures: being permanently maimed by being attacked without provocation, or facing a lifetime of stigma and criminal association if they seek to legitimately defend themselves against women. The excuses being delivered to female offenders absolve them of close to all responsibility.

Things must change.

Read More: Jail For Sending A Girl’s Naked Photos, No Jail For Fracturing A Man’s Skull

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

You Are What You Feed Your Soul

May 31, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

A commonly held misconception about alcoholism is that people who are given to drink do so out of depression, anxiety, or general unhappiness. While some people might drink because of the misfortunes in life, the reverse is usually true: that depression and unhappiness stem from excessive indulgence of drink.

When a person regularly floods their body with toxins like alcohol, it degrades the mind and soul, producing great unease, a twisted outlook on life and extraordinary unhappiness. Thus, what seems like a person driven to the bottle is usually somebody whose problems in life appear so because of the effect of alcohol abuse on the their mind and soul.

This simple rule that what you put into your body is what your mind and soul radiate outward. This lesson is on display in much more gruesome fashion in The Twilight Zone episode "The Masks." The episode opens up with an ailing old man named Jason meeting with his family doctor. Jason is at home, in bed and nearing the end of his life. They are in New Orleans, surrounded by the pomp and revelry of Mardi Gras. Jason's doctor tells him he doesn't have much time and seeing as his family is coming to visit later that day, the doctor suggests that he get his affairs in order as soon as possible.

As the doctor goes to slip out of the house, Jason's family shows up. They are a warped menagerie of individuals: Emily, the craven, histrionic wife; Wilfred, the callous, greedy businessman and husband; Paula, the self-absorbed, vainglorious daughter and Wilfred Jr, the mean-spirited, brutish son.

They have all shown up with one design in mind: to get their respective cuts from Jason's fortune. He views the bunch with great disdain and open hostility. He insults them and lets them know he knows they haven't shown up to pay their respects or comfort the dying, but simply to ensure they get their due from his soon-to-be executed will.

After dinner that evening, Jason draws his relatives into his study. He has a number of garish-looking masks spread out across his bureau—they are Cajun masks created for a specific purpose. He informs his relatives that in the spirit of Mardi Gras, they should don a mask that reflects the antithesis of who they are.

He asks each of his relatives how they see themselves, knowing full well they individually have no sense of their true selves. As such, he furnishes them a mask that is an outward reflection of who they truly are. His relatives simply have to wear the masks till the stroke of midnight.

As the night draws to a close, Emily, Wilfred, Paula and Wilfred, Jr. are all growing cantankerous. They complain that their masks are incredibly uncomfortable and unbearable to see on each other's faces. Tired of their self-absorbed whinging, Jason berates them for being caricatures, beings utterly incapable of responding to love and kindness. He laments that none of them have a shred of self-awareness and not a spot of care for their fellow human beings.

After this, the clock strikes midnight. A sense of calmness and serenity passes over Jason as he finally dies. Completely unconcerned with his well-being after his death, his family celebrates his death as they can know take off their terrible masks and enjoy their newly found millions.

Wilfred is the first to take off his mask, much to his family's horror. He turns to the mirror and sees that his mask was no illusion—his face has permanently been transformed into the caricature of an ugly, greedy man. The rest of his family take off their masks and approach the mirror, all finding out that they too are now just caricatures. Unusually wealthy, yes, but caricatures of who they truly are.

As Jason is quietly taken away by the servants and the family doctor, Serling narrates:

> Mardi Gras incident, the dramatis personae being four people who came to celebrate and in a sense let themselves go. This they did with a vengeance. They now wear the faces of all that was inside them – and they'll wear them for the rest of their lives, said lives now to be spent in the shadow. Tonight's tale of men, the macabre and masks – on the Twilight Zone.

One of the only true measures that gauges what anybody becomes over time is what they do. We all have positive thoughts and give in to negative feelings from time to time, but what is defining for somebody is what patterns of thought they give license to. Certain dispositions—positive or negative—are a product of these recurrent thought patterns. If a man allows certain thoughts and feelings to build up and gain steam over time, he can either build a positive force inside himself or construct a negative web.

As such, it is a curious thing, perhaps, to notice what happens to a man over time. What was once a bright, vibrant young man could—many years down the road—become a battered old man, consumed with anger and resentment. As noted above, he could easily become a stunted alcoholic teetering on the edge of sanity, living in fear of his hobbling addiction. A dismal, bitter young man could just as easily become a confident and wise old man, his soul rich with the experience of a life well lived.

The only difference between the two divergent paths is what the men fed their souls. If a man's soul is persistently tortured with anger, resentment and jealousy, that man's soul can only remain small and craven. If a man's soul is consistently nurtured with positivity, grace and magnanimity, then his soul can grow and climb out of the limiting mucks of outrage and petty jealousy. It might be a bit too flowery of language, but the soul is a garden—and gardens can only grow and thrive when they are well taken care of.

This isn't simply limited to the spirit. A man simply cannot crowd his mind with the tawdry and insignificant and expect to maintain his mental acuity. He cannot stuff fast food down his gullet and expect to maintain his health. A man gets what he gives—and if gives his mind, body and soul nothing but garbage and filth, he cannot reasonably expect himself to become anything else.

In “The Masks,” Serling is right to note that the foursome did, indeed, let themselves go, but they didn’t do it the night they traveled to New Orleans. We saw only the end product of a lifetime of indolence and neglect—they let themselves go with a vengeance over time. Wilfred gave into his rapacious, greedy appetite over time, just as Emily must have let her sniveling cowardice slowly command her life. By letting negative thoughts and feelings take over and rule their souls over time, they let themselves go.

When presented with Jason’s imminent death, they could do nothing but give into their irrepressible greed. Having never worried about what they fed their souls in their lives, they couldn’t muster any sense of decency in the face of another’s death. The cruel twist for the family was they would be forced to carry the scars of their inner devastation on their faces for the rest of their lives.

The lesson here is a quiet and profoundly important one: always and forever be mindful of what you put into your body and soul. You may never trick yourself into donning a mask that hideously disfigures you, as you hopefully don’t live in the Twilight Zone, but what you decide to let into your soul will become you.

Read More: A Passage For Trumpet Shows The Elusive Nature Of Happiness

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Why Anglo-American Women Are Terrible Financial Investments

May 31, 2015 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

By now, we all know that in most cases Anglo-American women do not make very good wives, mothers, or responsible members of society. That's, of course, according to the opinions of millions of men that live in this part of the world.

My intent with this article is to illuminate you on another aspect of your life you will be throwing away if you get entangled with one or produce progeny with her, and that is perhaps the most important one: your financial life.

Sure, money doesn't buy happiness – but try to live without money and you'll quickly see what true misery is like. Money buys freedom and it's hard to have either if you have a predatory Anglo-American female in your life.

According to scientific studies of happiness, there is a big difference in happiness between those who have no money and those who have enough to get by. However, contrary to all the cultural messages we receive, there is no appreciable difference in happiness between someone who has enough to get by and a billionaire. Hard to believe, but true.

So, let's begin on the risks to your financial well-being and independence that women present in our society. Our goal here is for a man to be able to comfortably take care of his own needs rather than sacrificing his entire existence to an ungrateful woman.

Child Support

Merely siring a child with the wrong Anglo female is a one-way ticket to a life of court-enforced indentured servitude. The court does not care if you can't find a job, if you become disabled, or if you rightfully protest a system in which there is no accountability on the "mother's" part (I use the term "mother" loosely) to show the money is being spent on her offspring. The court system only cares that you hand the money over to her. It does not care how the money is spent.

Resources must flow from you to her no matter what for 18 years. Seeing as how the average child support obligation is around $500 a month, and men who do not bow down and kiss the State's ring are thrown into the gulag by an ever-metastasizing police atate, merely fulfilling your 4.5 billion year old genetic imperative could now cost you jail time.

Not to mention, just look at what that kind of money turns in to, assuming a reasonable 10% return rate on a good growth stock mutual fund over 18 years. Right away, we have $300,000 at stake for one broken condom or lie about her birth control status.

Child support costs more than you think.

Lavish Spending

Assume, if you will, as female-driven spending makes up a good two-thirds of the economy, that your expenses from dating her, or even more frighteningly from being married to her, take up two-thirds of your take-home pay.

No, a simple studio apartment, simple used car or motorcycle, and meals prepared at home won't be good enough for her. If you tie your fortunes to the wrong girl, she will fully expect to use your resources to keep up with the Jonesettes in your neighborhood.

Assuming you are a good little beta male slave and do whatever your boss tells you no matter how ridiculous it is, and that working 50-60 hour weeks in the "new economy" sounds appealing to you for some reason, and you somehow find a way to navigate the landmine-ridden HR department that wants to destroy you for the crime of being a male, you might be lucky enough pull down an average salary of around $40,000 year.

The average Anglo girl will not be satisfied with that salary, even though it affords her a better quality of life than 90% or more of the rest of the world. You must also realize that the hedonic treadmill she spends her life on may cause her to look someday look for a more affluent meal ticket.

Invest in Yourself, Not Her

Just as her looks start to go and her ass thickens from all that trash she eats…you could have had this instead.

Instead of wisely investing two-thirds of your take-home salary after the government mafia finishes robbing you to pay for other, more irresponsible members of society like single moms and the deadbeats they fuck, having the wrong woman in your life will almost certainly cause you to instead increase your spending.

Supposed that you missed out on investing $1,000 a month. In only five years, you will have missed out on $82,000 of freedom. Around year five, if you've picked the wrong woman, she becomes impossible to live with, complains constantly, denigrates you for not being a better provider, and swings you around by the balls with a legal system that heavily favors her.

Moving ahead, after 10 years you could have had over $200,000 in the bank and still afforded multiple trips to sunnier, more libertine countries and enjoyed the company of younger and prettier women. Your relationship with her has now cost you enough money to retire on, if you invested wisely and moved to a country where the cost of living is lower than the U.S.

If you go full boat and have a kid with her, that relationship will have cost you over $1 million dollars in 20 years. Now, don't get me wrong, I'm not saying never reproduce, but the stakes are high if you choose to do it in the West with an Anglo woman. For those who desire a family, such as myself, it is much cheaper and safer to build your family in another country.

Wrapping Up

Wise words that have survived the test of time.

I'd like to wrap up this little lesson in Female Economics 101 by telling you to wrap it up. Be wary of considering any long-term obligation with an Anglo-American female without extensive vetting. If you choose unwisely, your wallet may never recover.

Read More: Dating American And Non-American Women: A Comparison

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

4 Reasons Why Child Circumcision Should Be Banned

May 31, 2015 | by Tobias Thorpe | Link | Original Link

For most of Western history, circumcision was seen as a barbaric practice. However, in the 19th century it found new popularity because physicians believed it “cured” a variety of ailments including masturbatory “self abuse.” Of course, as any circumcised male knows it doesn’t stop you from masturbating.

Regardless, this medical “advice” became a cultural hit and is still widely practiced for non-religious reasons, especially in the United States.

1. Circumcision is genital mutilation. Period.

Circumcision is a human rights violation. Cutting or burning off part of a child’s genitalia (male or female) is barbaric, regardless of how common or socially acceptable the practice may be to the host culture. That said, circumcision should be permitted to those old enough to consent by law, but not forced upon any child. Children are not old enough to understand or consent to irreversible bodily mutilation.

In the West, if parents performed female circumcision, or if they mutilated any other part of their child's body, they'd rightly be thrown into prison for child abuse. Those acts are rightly considered evil, so why isn't circumcision? Simple: cultural and religious biases. Western law does not permit the physical disfigurement of a child for any other reason, but circumcision has maintained a sacred cow status.

But what about the right of the parents to follow their religion? I ask, do these parents have the right to drag adulterers into the street and stone them to death? Are Muslims allowed to literally flog those who engage in premarital sex? Religious rights do not usurp another's human rights, including those of a child.

2. Claims of HIV protection are exaggerated

A common counter-argument is that circumcision helps protect against HIV. What circumcision advocates fail to acknowledge is that circumcised men still do, in fact, contract HIV. Promoting circumcision as an alternative to condoms is disingenuous and gives a false sense of security.

Proper condom use better prevents against HIV, and does not require unconsented bodily mutilation of a child. Put simply, you are not safe simply because you are circumcised. You must still use safe sex practices to avoid infection, circumcised or not.

The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) relies heavily on the HIV argument, and they have data that suggest circumcision helps prevent the spread of HIV during normal, heterosexual intercourse. However, they've come under increased scrutiny from international physicians who claim the AAP has a cultural bias.

Two major critiques were published in leading international journals, one in the Journal of Medical Ethics, and a second in the AAP's very own Pediatrics. The World Health Organization recommended voluntary circumcision to poverty-stricken African countries with prevalence of HIV. Of course, an HIV epidemic in a remote and poverty stricken part of Africa has little bearing in Everytown, USA, where HIV is "overwhelmingly the province of homosexual men, injectable drug users, and the people who sleep with them." They're basically using an HIV problem a world away to rationalize genital mutilation in the United States.

Looking at world maps of circumcision prevalence and HIV prevalence by country, we can clearly see there is no correlation between countries that do not circumcise and HIV prevalence. HIV prevalence is dependent on culture, not circumcision. Europe, South America, and Asia rarely practice circumcision and do not suffer from an HIV epidemic.

Conversely, there are several African countries that have both a high proportion of circumcised males, and still suffer from high HIV prevalence. Circumcision advocates will rarely point these discrepancies out. The AAP should stop using a poverty and cultural problem in Africa to justify a barbaric and evil practice in the United States.

Circumcision prevalence by country. Data source: World Health Organization (2007)

Adult HIV prevalence by country. Data source: UNAIDS (2007)

3. Unnecessary and catastrophic injuries

According to American Academy of Pediatrics Task Force on Circumcision, catastrophic injuries are “infrequent,” but do occur. Complications have included “glans or penile amputation, transmission of herpes simplex after mouth-to-penis contact by a mohel (Jewish ritual circumcisers) after circumcision, methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus infection, urethral cutaneous fistula, glans ischemia, and death.”

One notable story is that of David Reimer, whose penis was accidentally destroyed during a routine circumcision. Dr. John Money, a physician who theorized that gender roles are mutable early in a child’s life, reassigned David as a female. However, his theory failed spectacularly, and David later committed suicide.

4. Circumcision takes away a person’s religious rights

A child should not be forced to permanently bear religious or cult symbols, especially when they may not identify with it as an adult. Many will not follow their parent’s religion into adulthood, and thus should not be forced to bear their guardian’s religious symbols on the most private areas of their bodies. However, once of consensual age a man should be allowed to do with his body as he pleases.

Does circumcision reduce sexual pleasure?

Some might be wondering why I did not include this as a fifth point. There are numerous studies that contradict each other regarding circumcision and male sexual satisfaction. Because of this, it is difficult to conclude one way or another. This point is still hotly debated. We know the foreskin contains millions of nerve endings, so it seems probable that removing those nerves would have some sort of effect.

In any case, it is a barbaric practice that should be eliminated in civilized society.

Read More: The Benefits Of Not Masturbating

Tobias Thorpe
Tobias is a defender of men and masculinity. His interests are self improvement, individualism, and culture.

9 Benefits Of Having Female Friends

June 1, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

It’s common knowledge in these parts that western females are flaky, disloyal, and rarely bring anything of value to a man’s life outside of sex. This makes being friends with them an even less attractive proposition because spending time with a woman without the prospect of fucking her usually isn’t worth the headache.

There are, however, a few things females can bring to the table that can be quite useful if you understand their true nature and how to mitigate their hard-wired deficiencies.

Keep in mind that certain conditions apply here. You have to have game (as is the case with every female you interact with whether sex is involved or not), a bit of social currency, and attractive female accomplices to reap these benefits.

Let’s get to it.

9. They will screen women for you

Don’t let that smile fool you. She’s watching everything.

We all know women hate each other because they know each other. When you bring your flavor of the week around your female acquaintances, they won’t hesitate to alert you of any red flags you may not see. Chicks see things we don’t as a matter of survival so their supernatural ability to pick up on subtle nuances in human behavior comes in handy in these situations.

Granted, they do tend to embellish or hamster things into existence out of thin air on account of their innate disdain for one another. But game will allow you to filter out that particular brand of bullshit and hear what needs to be heard so that you can take the appropriate action(s).

8. They give you instant social proof

When girls see attractive women with or around you it instantly gives you social proof. Good looking girls are much more selective about the people they spend their time with and other women know this. If attractive women trust you enough to be around you, then it's assumed by other females that you must be trust worthy (read: not a creep, axe murderer, etc.)

Women generally don't want to be around a man who is labeled a creep or a recluse lest he be a serial rapist! This is why having a chick or two in your physical orbit when hitting on that hot cashier or striking up conversation with the pretty barista works in your favor.

Another advantage to having good looking girls in your midst is…

7. Pre-selection

The following is a text conversation with a girl I approached at the supermarket a while back. I had my on again off again FWB with me, which made arranging a meet up almost too easy, as I used standard text game to close the deal:

10:44
Lol I'm just trying it out. Do you not like red or something?
10:12AM
i get bored easy
10:13AM
like to change it up sometimes.
10:14AM
im going to tonight. come with me
10:19AM
A little bossy are we?
10:20AM
Type message

10:44
A little bossy are we?
10:20AM
my 9 yr old niece is bossy I'm direct. meet me there at 7
10:22AM
What about the girl you were with last night. She looked pretty attached to you.
10:23AM
she's s close friend. she's working tonight
10:25AM
Are you a player?
Type message

A standard tenet of game is that women don’t want a man that other women don’t want. You could be as ugly as homemade sin but if you’ve got an attractive female with you, your SMV always spikes. This will send their hamsters into overdrive wondering if you’re rich, great in the sack, or if you have high social status.

Whether you have these assets or not is irrelevant. The hamster always assumes a man has favorable traits when he’s accompanied by an attractive woman.

Once again, this is why game is necessary as stated in the intro. Fuck buddies can be acquaintances too if your game is on point. Whether I was fucking the girl I was with or not didn't matter to Trini. All that mattered is that she thought I might be (and verbalized as much) and that's what made her ripe for the picking.

6. Transference of their pussy pass

[image]
Pussy pass? Yeah we take those!

Personally, this one has paid huge dividends for me. I've zoomed to the front of countless night club lines, been given preferential treatment in bars and various other venues, and even been "let off with a warning" on more than one occasion involving traffic violations—all because, and only because, I had a good looking girl with me.

95% of men in this part of the world are pathetic, thirsty white knights. Any time they get a chance to impress even a half decent looking woman they jump at it. Bouncers, cops, butchers, waiters, cashiers, bartenders, or any other male inhabited profession or post all gladly accept the all powerful pussy pass as a form of currency.

Their desire to score "brownie points" with her means that each and every one of them will transfer it's membership privileges to you simply because she's with you.

5. They'll hook you up with their friends

Another huge benefit of being acquainted with good looking females are their friends. Hot girls have hot friends. Period. Women, of all SMVs also take tremendous pride in being a "matchmaker."

The combination of your game and social currency turns your female friends into your own personal mouth pieces as they won't hesitate to tell their girlfriends "what an amazing guy" you are.

In these instances pre-selection, social proof, and screening are all taken care of in one fell swoop. Plus, if things go sideways with your acquaintance's friend(s), she'll take your side most of the time because a) your game is tight b) she doesn't want to lose the added social status she gains by being around you and c) girls are always looking for a reason to show their dislike for one another, which further feeds their insatiable need for drama.

4. You can sharpen your teasing skills

Teasing a woman and calling her out on her bullshit are both sure-fire ways to moisten the panties of any given target. Having female friends you can practice on will hone these skills to the point where they become second nature to you.

Because you're not trying to fuck her (at least not yet), you can tease away without worrying about "offending" her or fucking up the pickup. What's really happening here is that you're inadvertently gaming her and she may eventually make a play to fuck you which, of course, leads to the fact that…

3. You can turn them into FWBs

This isn't to suggest that you turn every one of your attractive female acquaintances into a fuck friend, but it's an great option to have during dry spells.

Similar to #5, all of the pre-selection, social proof, and screening boxes are checked. Add to the fact that she's comfortable with you, knows you see through her b.s. and will call her out on it, and that you add social value to her life, it's only a matter of time before she wants you between her legs.

The obvious drawback to this is that you'll likely lose her as an acquaintance. Your abundance mentality knows this isn't a big deal because females really are a dime a dozen in any capacity. However, depending upon how much value she brings to your life you may need to think long and hard about whether letting her go as an asset is worth a few romps in the sack with her.

2. They'll help you tighten up your thread game

[image]

Good looking girls don't want to be seen with a man who is dressed poorly and if you hang out with them on the regular, they will make damn sure you're always looking your best—especially if you're in a social setting (clubs, bars, etc.). And because women know what looks good on a man, this will raise your vestment game.

Take initiative and ask her to go shopping with you and help you pick outfits (she'll agree 100% of the time). Her solipsism will compel her to ensure that your perceived value is as high as possible because it directly affects her value. This is one of the few instances when you can actually trust a woman not to lead you astray.

1. Consistent neomasculine confirmation

Try as they might, women are unable hide their vapid, slutty, westernized ways. I've overheard and been involved in many a conversation with this girl or that about how she's looking for Mr. Right, then in the same breath talk about the guy who fucked her senseless that weekend.

One good friend of mine has admitted to me that she's fucked more than 60 guys (which means her count probably exceeds triple digits) but feels she "deserves" a man who has a good job, will take care of her and her son, has a six pack, and fucks her like her baby daddy—her words verbatim.

Another female acquaintance of mine is married to a man who has his own business, has the house, the kid, the white picket fence (yes, their picket fence is white), and even the dog. So far so good right? Well she recently told me about a torrid affair she had with a regular customer (she's a cocktail waitress at a local casino) who "swept her off her feet" who she actually contemplated leaving her "American dream" life to be with.

All women are like that, gents, and the more you hang around them, the further your red pill conditioning is drilled into your skull. Female friends will all but ensure that you will never slip back into the beta boy ways that landed you here in the first place.

Conclusion

Most females in our culture are increasingly unable to add much to a man's life, but these nine benefits have the potential to keep your game and crimson capsule mindset sharp—so long as you stay on your p's and q's.

As is the case with all female interactions, keep your wits about you and proceed with caution. Females can and will turn on you at the drop of a hat for no good reason. But if you're running solid game, trouble and drama shouldn't be much of a problem.

Read More: Why You Need More Female Friends

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Is Utilitarianism A Good Way To Judge Right And Wrong?

June 1, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The late eighteenth century saw notable rationalist figures in English philosophy. Tom Paine attacked the theology of Christianity as a collection of absurdities in his his book The Age of Reason. The philosopher William Godwin (1756-1836) argued for the reform of society based on utilitarian principles. Thomas Malthus (1766-1834) terrified everyone with his predictions that poverty and war were the unavoidable consequence of the laws of population. Erasmus Darwin anticipated his famous grandson by suggesting some aspects of natural selection in his surveys of biology. It was a fruitful and disquieting age.

One man decided to apply Enlightenment principles to law and morals. The jurist Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832) asked himself why the cobwebbed laws of England—most of them dating back to medieval times—should not be viewed with the same skepticism that scientists were then applying to the inherited wisdom about the natural world. Laws, he believed, should be judged solely on one criteria: whether they function as a net benefit to society. If they do, they are good; if not, they should be discarded.

Bentham was, as we might expect, a brilliant student as a youth; he mastered several languages by his teenage years and consumed books with an insatiable appetite. His reformatory zeal was fired at the age of fifteen, when he heard a lecture on British law by the great Sir William Blackstone. He was outraged by what he perceived to be the undue veneration that Blackstone gave to tradition and authority. Such a perspective, Bentham believed, could only block progress.

Is this true? Or is it nonsense?

Bentham was obsessed with finding a proper way of evaluating right and wrong. How should it be done? In his later writings, Bentham was careful to reject abstract concepts such as duty, equality, honor, right, power, and similar categories. They were nothing but "nonsense on stilts" that impeded understanding, rather than enhanced it. Traditional religion, he also believed, did nothing to advance our understanding of economics, science, or government; he was not quite an atheist, but contented himself with a deism that left no room for divine inspirations.

At the ripe age of twenty three (1776), he wrote A Fragment on Government, a treatise that gave expression to his "utilitarian" philosophy. Bentham argued that a properly formed government should have its powers sanely distributed among various branches, to avoid the temptations of despotism; legislators should be concerned with "the greatest happiness of the greatest number" rather than the will of the chief executive.

His major work, published in 1789, was The Principles of Morals and Legislation. It was a revolutionary work that sought to evaluate human conduct on a purely utilitarian basis, without regard to theology or the dead hand of history. In other words, a law was either "good" or "bad" depending only on whether it advanced the needs of the community. Bentham distrusted both ideologies and theologies.

Organisms, argued Bentham, structure their lives around pain avoidance. Happiness for the group is thus a situation where pleasure is maximized, and pain minimized. Laws and public morality, therefore, should seek to provide the greatest happiness to the greatest number of people. Utilitarianism alone should be the ultimate arbiter of taste, morals, and law. The argument sounds simple, but was there ever a job so difficult as trying to provide the greatest happiness to the greatest number?

Yet Bentham was undeterred, and turned his analytical powers to English law. Usury should be permitted, he argued in his work The Defense of Usury, as it was a necessary incentive for free trade. Laws, whether they be commercial, administrative, or criminal, should be composed with one object in mind: how do they contribute to the good of the citizens? Punishments should be humane and rational; trade and commerce should be encouraged without regard to idiotic restrictions imposed by custom and tradition; and all citizens (men and women) should be equal before the law.

In a move that was radical for its day, Bentham argued strenuously for individual liberties. The individual person was the best judge of what was good or bad for himself; he should, therefore, be left alone to do what he wanted, without the hectoring of clerics or legislators. The genders should be equal in all respects; even homosexuality, which was then criminalized in England, should be seen as matter of personal preference (Bentham's opinions on this subject were not published in his lifetime, being rightly seen as too radical).

The weaknesses of utilitarianism are readily apparent. Bentham, while claiming to despise ideologies, simply substitutes his own for the ones that preceded him. And how are we, in our limited perspective, to know what is to the greatest advantage to the group? Who judges? Is not history and tradition—for which Bentham had such little regard—the primary determiners of what works for the group and what does not?

And is it even proper to evaluate everything from a utilitarian perspective? "Usefulness" itself may be more often in the eye of the beholder than we care to admit. Bentham's knowledge of history and human nature shows surprising shortcomings: "utilitarianism" in practice can often degenerate into a cover for our own prejudices and preferences. He was vigorously attacked in his lifetime by conservative Tories for being an atheist, a materialist, and an impractical idealist.

Yet much reformatory good came from his pen. His philosophy, warts and all, was like a cleansing wind in the body politic. Advocates and reformers inspired by his writings undertook desperately needed reforms in public sanitation, housing, health, legislation, and judicial process. In the never-ending debate between conservatism and reform, there is a need for both: reform is the gas pedal that moves the vehicle forward, and conservatism is the brake that prevents it from speeding out of control and crashing.

He died in 1832 at the age of eighty-four. Believing that his body, like his philosophy, should act in the greater good, his will instructed that he be dissected in the presence of family. His skeleton and head were then preserved and dressed, and made for public display at University College London as an "auto-icon." At the very least, Bentham practiced what he preached.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Black Feminism Is A Failure

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

4 Types Of Women Every Man Will Encounter

June 1, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by The Mode One Approach

It is my strong assertion that any woman of interest that a single heterosexual man approaches in today's dating scene is going to ultimately fall into one of four categories:

1. Reciprocators

A woman who is a genuine Reciprocator is never going to attempt to mislead a man or engage in any sort of "manipulative head games." She is going to be upfront and straightforward about whether she is interested in sharing that man's company in a romantic or sexual manner. May every man be so lucky as to meet and converse with a woman who is a genuine Reciprocator type.

2. Rejecters

Alan Roger Currie's first audiobook is designed to help men overcome their fears and egotistical insecurities so that they can begin to approach women of interest

Similar to a Reciprocator, a woman who is a genuine Rejecter is never going to attempt to mislead a man. Once a man is bold and confident enough to express his desire to share her company, this type of woman is going to be upfront about not feeling the same way.

If she is married, engaged, or currently has a long-term male companion that she has no interest in cheating on, she will let a man know this quickly, straightforwardly, and without unnecessary theatrics.

Abrupt rejection may be hard for some men to swallow, and it may leave a man's ego a wee bit bruised in the short run, but in the long run, all men will learn to appreciate the non-manipulative ways of the genuine Rejecter types. If nothing else, these type of women will never waste your precious time.

3. Manipulative Timewasters

Alan Roger Currie's second audiobook is designed to help men quickly and effectively identify women who have intentions of misleading them and manipulating them in order to achieve and accomplish their own self-serving objectives

Women who operate as Manipulative Timewasters are those women who will initially, temporarily, or even indefinitely seek to give a man the misleading impression that she is a genuine Reciprocator. However, deep-down that woman is nothing more than a Rejecter displaying the disingenuous façade of an enthusiastic Reciprocator.

Women who are Manipulative Timewaster types love to socially interact with men in order to be flattered, entertained, and "wined and dined." They will maintain a number of platonic male friends who will empathetically listen to their problems, disappointments, and frustrations.

Unlike a woman who is a genuine Rejecter, these women will never be forthright with men about their lack of sexual interest in them, sine this would ruin their "game." They want men to always believe in the possibility of sex so that they can continue to mine the time and attention of their "friends."

4. Wholesome Pretenders

The woman who is arguably the most challenging for men to figure out is the woman who operates as a Wholesome Pretender. If a Reciprocator is a “Definite Yes” woman, a Rejecter is a “Quick No” woman, and a Manipulative Timewaster is a “Slow No” woman, then a Wholesome Pretender type is the closest thing to a “Maybe Yes, Maybe No” woman.

Depending on how powerful and effective a man’s interpersonal communication skills are (i.e., his level of “verbal game”), women who are Wholesome Pretender types can either transition into becoming a Reciprocator, a Rejecter, or a Manipulative Timewaster over a period of minutes, hours, days, or weeks.

Initially, all women who operate as Wholesome Pretender types want to publicly give men the impression that they are innocent, wholesome, prudish (or at least, semi-prudish), and very much monogamy-oriented.

Alan Roger Currie's most recent audiobook helps men learn to use the power of their voice and their conversation skills to create an almost instantaneous degree of sexual chemistry with women of interest

During their first conversation with a man, the Wholesome Pretender types always want men to believe that they will only engage in sexual relations within the context of marriage, or at minimum, only within the context of a long-term, emotionally profound, monogamous relationship.

If a man's verbal game is strong, seductive, and pleasantly persistent – and he has mastered the fine art of "erotic dirty talk" – then this man will be able to provoke the woman who is operating as a Wholesome Pretender to eventually reveal that she actually has a more open-minded, free-spirited, and erotically uninhibited side to her personality

Even more importantly, the man will unlock the secret that that she is highly willing to engage in one or more episodes of short-term or non-monogamous "casual" sex with a man of interest. Nothing exposes and excites a woman who is a Wholesome Pretender more than a man with exceptional verbal seduction skills.

If you have never registered for a membership with Audible.com, Audible.co.uk, Audible.de, or Audible.fr, you can download a FREE COPY of one of my three audiobooks by signing up for a no-obligation 30-Day Trial with Audible (which is the audio book division of Amazon.com).

Never approach a woman or converse with a woman with a demeanor that is full of fear, egotistical insecurities, and a severe lack of confidence. Learn how to approach women in a highly self-assured manner using Mode One type interpersonal communication skills.

I offer Email consultations, Skype (U.S. and international clients) and Telephone (U.S. clients only) consultations, and One-on-One / Face-to-Face Coaching Sessions.

For more information, write me at ****

Alan

Advertise Your Product Or Site With Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Principal Tenets Of Stoicism By Seneca

June 1, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Seneca was a Roman highborn who studied law before launching a successful career as a statesman. He escaped execution twice by order of Roman emperors, but did have to endure an exile to Corsica. He was recalled back to tutor Nero and was said to be responsible for his most temperate side before the emperor went fully mad. A plot to kill Nero was uncovered and Seneca was wrongly included in the ensuing purge. He was ordered to commit suicide, which he did by cutting his wrists.

The amount of wealth he accumulated made him one of the richest men of his times, leading some of his modern-day critics to wonder how stoic he really was. They argue that he did not practice what he preached and lived in ravishing opulence that was a direct contradiction to the philosophy he taught. Should we place more weight to his teachings above that of other stoics such as Epictetus, who did practice what he preached? That's a hard question to answer, but one does pick up on him expounding on all the lessons he learned after living in vice. When thinking of Seneca, the following quote comes to my mind: "The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom." Whether he lived ideally or not, Seneca's wisdom can help us greatly today.

The philosophy of Stoicism can be summed up in the Serenity prayer, devised by American theologian Reinhold Niebuhr, who must've been familiar with stoicism.

> God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change,
> The courage to change the things I can,
> And the wisdom to know the difference.

I'll let Seneca explain stoicism further through his own words below.

What is stoicism?

> Only the wise man is content with what is his. All foolishness suffers the burden of dissatisfaction with itself.
>
> […]
>
> It is man's duty to live in conformity with the divine will, and this means, firstly, bringing his life into line with 'nature's laws', and secondly, resigning himself completely and uncomplainingly to whatever fate may send him. Only by living thus, and not setting too high a value on things which can at any moment be taken away from him, can he discover that true, unshakeable peace and contentment to which ambition, luxury and above all avarice are among the greatest obstacles.
>
> […]
>
> The place one's in, though, doesn't make any contribution to peace of mind: it's the spirit that makes everything agreeable to oneself. I've seen for myself people sunk in gloom in cheerful and delightful country houses, and people in completely secluded surroundings who looked as if they were run off their feet.
>
> […]
>
> …cling tooth and nail to the following rule: not to give in to adversity, never to trust prosperity, and always take full note of fortune's habit of behaving just as she pleases, treating her as if she were actually going to do everything it is in her power to do.
>
> […]
>
> It is essential to make oneself used to putting up with a little. Even the wealthy and the well provided are continually met and frustrated by difficult times and situations. It is in no man's power to have whatever he wants; but he has it in his power not to wish for what he hasn't got, and cheerfully make the most of the things that do come his way. And a stomach firmly under control, one that will put up with hard usage, marks a considerable step towards independence.

Travel

> To be everywhere is to be nowhere. People who spend their whole life travelling abroad end up having plenty of places where they can find hospitality but no real friendships. The same must be the case with people who never set about acquiring an intimate acquaintanceship with any one great writer, but skip from one to another, paying flying visits to them all. Food that is vomited up as soon as it is eaten is not assimilated into the body and does not do one any good; nothing hinders a cure so much as frequent changes of treatment; a wound will not heal over if it is being made the subject of experiments with different ointments; a plant which is frequently moved never grows strong.

[…]

When a person is following a track, there is an eventual end to it somewhere, but with wandering at large there is no limit. So give up pointless, empty journeys, and whenever you want to know whether the desire aroused in you by something you are pursuing is natural or quite unseeing, ask yourself whether it is capable of coming to rest at any point; if after going a long way there is always something remaining farther away, be sure it is not something natural.

[…]

How can novelty of surroundings abroad and becoming acquainted with foreign scenes or cities be of any help? All that dashing about turns out to be quite futile. And if you want to know why all this running away cannot help you, the answer is simply this: you are running away in your own company. You have to lay aside the load on your spirit. Until you do that, nowhere will satisfy you.

[…]

What good has travel of itself ever been able to do anyone? It has never acted as a check on pleasure or a restraining influence on desires; it has never controlled the temper of an angry man or quelled the reckless impulses of a lover; never in fact has it rid the personality of a fault. It has not granted us the gift of judgement, it has not put an end to mistaken attitudes. All it has ever done is distract us for a little while, through the novelty of our surroundings, like children fascinated by something they haven’t come across before.

[…]

…travel won’t make a better or saner man of you. For this we must spend time in study and in the writings of wise men, to learn the truths that have emerged from their researches, and carry on the search ourselves for the answers that have not yet been discovered. This is the way to liberate the spirit that still needs to be rescued from its miserable state of slavery.

[…]

All this hurrying from place to place won’t bring you any relief, for you’re traveling in the company of your own emotions, followed by your troubles all the way. If only they were really following you! They’d be farther away from you: as it is they’re not at your back, but on it! That’s why they weigh you down with just the same uncomfortable chafing wherever you are. It’s medicine, not a particular part of the world, that a person needs if he’s ill. Suppose someone has broken his leg or dislocated a joint; he doesn’t get into a carriage or board a ship: he calls in a doctor to have the fracture set or the dislocation reduced. Well then, when a > person’s spirit is wrenched or broken at so many points, do you imagine that it can be put right by a change of scenery, that that sort of trouble isn’t so serious that it can’t be cured by an outing?

Anxiety

> Fear keeps pace with hope. Nor does their so moving together surprise me; both belong to a mind in suspense, to a mind in a state of anxiety through looking into the future. Both are mainly due to projecting our thoughts far ahead of us instead of adapting ourselves to the present. Thus it is that foresight, the great blessing humanity has been given, is transformed into a curse.
>
> […]
>
> Think how often towns in Asia or in Greece have fallen at a single earth tremor, how many villages in Syria or Macedonia have been engulfed, how often this form of disaster has wrought devastation in Cyprus, how often Paphos has tumbled about itself! Time and again we hear the news of the annihilation of a whole city, and how small a fraction of mankind are we who hear such news thus often! So let us face up to the blows of circumstance and be aware that whatever happens is never as serious as [worry] makes it out to be.
>
> […]
>
> For the only safe harbour in this life’s tossing, troubled sea is to refuse to be bothered about what the future will bring and to stand ready and confident, squaring the breast to take without skulking or flinching whatever fortune hurls at us.

The crowd

> Associating with people in large numbers is actually harmful: there is not one of them that will not make some vice or other attractive to us, or leave us carrying the imprint of it or bedaubed all unawares with it. And inevitably enough, the larger the size of the crowd we mingle with, the greater the danger. But nothing is as ruinous to the character as sitting away one’s time at a show—for it is then, through the medium of entertainment, that vices creep into one with more than usual ease. What do you take me to mean? That I go home more selfish, more self-seeking and more self-indulgent? Yes, and what is more, a person crueler and less humane through having been in contact with human beings.
>
> […]
>
> When a mind is impressionable and has none too firm a hold on what is right, it must be rescued from the crowd: it is so easy for it to go over to the majority. A Socrates, a Cato or a Laelius might have been shaken in his principles by a multitude of any of us, even as we perfect our personality’s adjustment, to withstand the onset of vices when they come with such a mighty following. A single example of extravagance or greed does a lot of harm—an intimate who > leads a pampered life gradually makes one soft and flabby; a wealthy neighbour provokes cravings in one; a companion with a malicious nature tends to rub off some of his rust even on someone of an innocent and open-hearted nature—what then do you imagine the effect on a person's character is when the assault comes from the world at large.

>
> […]
>
> The many speak highly of you, but have you really any grounds for satisfaction with yourself if you are the kind of person the many understand? Your merits should not be outward facing.

Friendship

> …a person who starts being friends with you because it pays him will similarly cease to be friends because it pays him to do so. If there is anything in a particular friendship that attracts a man other than the friendship itself, the attraction of some reward or other will counterbalance that of the friendship. What is my object in making a friend? To have someone to be able to die for, someone I may follow into exile, someone for whose life I may put myself up as security and pay the price as well. The thing you describe is not friendship but a business deal, looking to the likely consequences, with advantage as its goal.
>
> […]
>
> Self-contented as [a man] is, then, he does need friends—and wants as many of them as possible—but not to enable him to lead a happy life; this he will have even without friends. The supreme ideal does not call for any external aids. It is home-grown, wholly self-developed. Once it starts looking outside itself for any part of itself it is on the way to be dominated by fortune.

Misfortune

> It is in times of security that the spirit should be preparing itself to deal with difficult times; while fortune is bestowing favours on it then is the time for it to be strengthened against her rebuffs. In the midst of peace the soldier carries out manoeuvres, throws up earthworks against a non-existent enemy and tires himself out with unnecessary toil in order to be equal to it when it is necessary. If you want a man to keep his head when the crisis comes you must give him some training before it comes. This was the aim of the men who once every month pretended they were poor, bringing themselves face to face with want, to prevent their ever being terrified by a situation which they had frequently rehearsed.
>
> […]
>
> Sickness assails those leading the most sensible lives, tuberculosis those with the strongest constitutions, retribution the utterly guiltless, violence the most secluded. Misfortune has a way of choosing some unprecedented means or other > of impressing its power on those who might be said to have forgotten it. A single day strews in ruins all that was raised by a train of construction extending over a long span of time and involving a great number of separate works and a great deal of favour on the part of heaven. To say a 'day', indeed, is to put too much of a brake on the calamities that hasten down upon us: an hour, an instant of time, suffices for the overthrow of empires.

>
> […]
>
> Nothing is durable, whether for an individual or for a society; the destinies of men and cities alike sweep onwards. Terror strikes amid the most tranquil surroundings, and without any disturbance in the background to give rise to them calamities spring from the least expected quarter. States which stood firm through civil war as well as wars external collapse without a hand being raised against them. How few nations have made of their prosperity a lasting thing! This is why we need to envisage every possibility and to strengthen the spirit to deal with the things which may conceivable come about. Rehearse them in your mind: exile, torture, war, shipwreck. Misfortune may snatch you away from your country, or your country away from you, may banish you into some wilderness—these very surroundings in which the masses suffocate may become a wilderness.
>
> […]
>
> It must come to see that there is nothing fortune will shrink from, that she wields the same authority over emperor and empire alike and the same power over cities as over men. There's no ground for resentment in all this. We've entered into a world in which these are the terms life is lived on—if you're satisfied with that, submit to them, if you're not, get out, whatever way you please. Resent a thing by all means if it represents an injustice decreed against yourself personally; but if this same constraint is binding on the lowest and the highest alike, then make your peace again with destiny, the destiny that unravels all ties.

Death

> 'Rehearse death.' To say this is to tell a person to rehearse his freedom. A person who has learned how to die has unlearned how to be a slave. He is above, or at any rate beyond the reach of, all political powers. What are prisons, warders, bars to him? He has an open door. There is but one chain holding us in fetters, and that is our love of life. There is no need to cast this love out altogether, but it does need to be lessened somewhat so that, in the event of circumstances ever demanding this, nothing may stand in the way of our being prepared to do at once what we must do at some time or other.
>
> […]
>
> An ordinary journey will be incomplete if you come to a stop in the middle of it, or anywhere short of your destination, but life is never incomplete if it is an > honourable one. At whatever point your leave life, if you leave it in the right way, it is a whole.

>
> […]
>
> You want to live—but do you know how to live? You are scared of dying—and, tell me, is the kind of life you lead really any different from being dead. Caligula was once passing a column of captives on the Latin Road when one of them, with a hoary old beard reaching down his breast, begged to be put to death. 'So,' replied Caligula, 'you are alive, then, as you are?' That is the answer to give to people to whom death would actually come as a release.
>
> […]
>
> 'But I want to live because of all the worthy activities I'm engaged in. I'm performing life's duties conscientiously and energetically and I'm reluctant to leave them undone.' Come now, surely you know that dying is also one of life's duties? You're leaving no duty undone, for there's no fixed number of duties laid down which you're supposed to complete. Every life without exception is a short one.
>
> […]
>
> To lose someone you love is something you'll regard as the hardest of all blows to bear, while all the time this will be as silly as crying because the leaves fall from the beautiful trees that add to the charm of your home. Preserve a sense of proportion in your attitude to everything that pleases you, and make the most of them while they are at their best.
>
> […]
>
> As it is with a play, so it is with life—what matters is not how long the acting lasts, but how good it is. It is not important at what point you stop. Stop wherever you will—only make sure that you round it off with a good ending.
>
> […]
>
> One thing I know: all the works of mortal man lie under sentence of mortality; we live among things that are destined to perish.
>
> […]
>
> We're born unequal, we die equal. And my words apply as much to cities as to those who live in them.
>
> […]
>
> …no one has power over us when death is within our own power.

Treatment of others

> …treat your inferiors in the way in which you would like to be treated by your own superiors. And whenever it strikes you how much power you have over your slave, let it also strike you that your own master has just as much power over > you. ‘I haven’t got a master,’ you say. You’re young yet; there’s always the chance that you’ll have one.

>
> […]
>
> …no one has been able to strike terror into others and at the same time enjoy peace of mind himself.

Slavery

> ‘He’s a slave.’ But he may have the spirit of a free man. ‘He’s a slave.” But is that really to count against him. Show me a man who isn’t a slave; one is a slave to sex, another to money, another to ambition; all are slaves to hope or fear. I could show you a man who has been a Consul who is a slave to his ‘little old woman’, a millionaire who is the slave of a little girl in domestic service. I could show you some highly aristocratic young men who are utter slaves to stage artistes. And there’s no state of slavery more disgraceful than one which is self-imposed.
>
> […]
>
> For men in a state of freedom had thatch for their shelter, while slavery dwells beneath marble and gold.

Failure

> Why does no one admit his failings? Because he’s still deep in them. It’s the person who’s awakened who recounts his dream, and acknowledging one’s failings is a sign of health. So let us rouse ourselves, so that we may be able to demonstrate our errors.

Body

> I am too great, was born to too great a destiny to be my body’s slave. So far as I am concerned that body is nothing more or less than a fetter on my freedom. I place it squarely in the path of fortune, letting her expend her onslaught on it, not allowing any blow to get through it to my actual self. For that body is all that is vulnerable about me: within this dwelling so liable to injury there lives a spirit that is free.

Pleasure seeking

> We are attracted by wealth, pleasures, good looks, political advancement and various other welcoming and enticing prospects: we are repelled by exertion, death, pain, disgrace and limited means. It follows that we need to train ourselves not to crave for the former and not to be afraid of the latter. Let us fight the battle the other way round—retreat from the things that attract us and rouse ourselves to meet the things that actually attack us.
>
> […]

> The path that leads to pleasures is the downward one: the upward climb is the one that takes us to rugged and difficult ground. Here let us throw our bodies forward, in the other direction rein them back.
>
> […]
>
> …any life must seem short to people who measure it in terms of pleasures which through their empty nature are incapable of completeness.
>
> […]
>
> The things that are essential are acquired with little bother; it is the luxuries that call for toil and effort.
>
> […]
>
> How nice it is to have outworn one's desires and left them behind!

Virtue

> …virtue only comes to a character which has been thoroughly schooled and trained and brought to a pitch of perfection by unremitting practice. We are born for it, but not with it. And even in the best of people, until you cultivate it there is only the material for virtue, not virtue itself.
>
> […]
>
> Virtue has to be learnt. Pleasure is a poor and petty thing. No value should be set on it: it's something we share with dumb animals—the minutest, most insignificant creatures scutter after it.

Happiness and suffering

> A man is as unhappy as he has convinced himself he is. And complaining away about one's sufferings after they are over (you know the kind of language: 'No one had ever been in such a bad state. The torments and hardships I endured! No one thought I would recover. The number of times I was given up for lost by the family! The number of times I was despaired of by the doctors! A man on the rack isn't torn with pain the way I was' is something I think should be banned. Even if all this is true, it is past history. What's the good of dragging up sufferings which are over, of being unhappy now just because you were then? What is more, doesn't everyone add a good deal to his tale of hardships and deceive himself as well in the matter?
>
> […]
>
> Things will get thrown at you and things will hit you. Life's no soft affair. It's a long road you've started on: you can't but expect to have slips and knocks and falls, and get tired, and openly wish—a lie—for death. At one place you will part from a companion, at another bury one, and be afraid of one at another. These are the kind of things you'll come up against all this rugged journey.

> […]
> One can do nothing better than endure what cannot be cured and attend uncomplainingly the God at whose instance all things come about. It is a poor soldier that follows his commander grumbling. So let us receive our orders readily and cheerfully, and not desert the ranks along the march—the march of this glorious fabric of creation in which everything we shall suffer is a strand.

Life's path

> We therefore should keep to the path which nature has mapped out for us and never diverge from it. For those who follow nature everything is easy and straightforward, whereas for those who fight against her life is just like rowing against the stream.

Seneca's philosophy not only prepares you for the hardships you will receive in life, but also death itself. When misfortune happens to you, instead of being angry or upset, you should ask yourself the following: "Is there anything about this outcome that is within my control to change?" If there is nothing, you must take the result with equanimity. Otherwise you must get to work.

Stoicism removes the fear (and hope) of your anxious thoughts about the future and allows you to accept the inevitable hardships and final end that all humans face. It does this by building up your mental fortitude to accept the present moment and the randomness of the next hour, whether it is one of pleasure or pain. Therefore it is a philosophy of acceptance, no matter who you are and where you are in life. At the same time, it gives you space to desire the finer things in life and work towards getting them, with the understanding that those things are part of a journey of a virtuous life instead of the final destination.

Whether you accept stoicism or not will depend on your individual character. It matches mine quite well, as I have come to a handful of stoic conclusions through my pursuit of hedonistic excess, and so it is the principal philosophy that I choose to live life by. It should be no surprise that this book is one of the most valuable in my library. Highly recommended.

Read More: "Letters From A Stoic" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

8 Things We Can Learn From Patrick Bateman

June 2, 2015 | by Vincent Stone | Link | Original Link

For those who are unfamiliar, American Psycho is a late 1980s satire that tells the story of successful Wall Street executive and serial killer, Patrick Bateman. Released by author Bret Easton Ellis in 1991, the novel was met with extreme controversy by feminists and women's rights groups alike, mainly due to its graphic violence and strong misogynistic undertones.

The novel was adapted into a film in 2000 (directed, ironically, by a feminist) in which Christian Bale played the main character. Despite much of the negative criticism both the book and film received, many viewers were able to see the obvious humor in the story, and many men in particular found themselves identifying with its neurotic, image-obsessed protagonist.

The film and novel have developed a cult following in the couple of decades since their release, and it shows. There's no denying that all popular blogs in the manosphere contain hints of "Bateman-esque" characteristics. Bateman really was manosphere before there was a manosphere. Let's take a look at some of the things we've learned from Patrick Bateman in terms of living a better, more productive life.

1. Appearance Matters

Image was everything for Bateman. His face, his body, his clothes, his apartment, his business cards, it all had to be held to the highest degree of perfection. He knew that amongst the yuppie Manhattan crowd in which he thrived, appearance was the first thing he was judged on.

And the trend seems to have caught on in real life as well. Male grooming has seen a huge explosion in popularity in the past 15-20 years. Although I wouldn't advise you to take it to Bateman-levels of extremity, a basic level of grooming and self-care is a must for any man looking to maximize his sex appeal. Take care of your skin, take care of your teeth, take care of your hair, get somewhat of a tan, remove excess body hair, and you're already ahead of most men in the game.

2. Nutrition And Physical Fitness Matter

Although a lot of mainstream nutritional advice has changed since the low-fat crazed 1980s that American Psycho is set in, the basic principal hasn't; Eat healthy and exercise. Bateman was a total fitness junkie, oftentimes working out for two hours at a time and stressing the importance of healthy eating. He knew that a well-fueled, fit body was important not only for aesthetic purposes, but for optimal performance in any endeavour.

3. The Clothes Make The Man

In one particularly memorable scene of the film, Bateman lures a drunken co-worker back to his apartment to murder him. Before dismembering the man, Bateman puts on a raincoat to avoid any of the man's blood splattering on his suit (as well as strategically covering his floor with newspapers to avoid any blood spilling onto his pristine, oak wood floor).

Readers of the novel will recall having to painfully trudge through Bateman's meticulous descriptions of what every character he encountered was wearing, right down to their brand of socks. While you don't need to don a $3,000 Armani suit to look presentable, every man should own a wardrobe consisting of at least some high quality, well-fitted clothing.

4. The Importance Of Your Social Circle

When Bateman wasn't out raping, torturing, and murdering his victims, he usually wasn't to be found without some sort of entourage. He knew the importance of running with those that had similar values, interests, and status as he did.

It's been said time and time again, the company you keep is a direct reflection of the person you are, and those words couldn't be truer. Although Bateman was guilty of trying a little too hard to emulate those that he ran with, it was essentially the only way he knew how to "get by."

In fact, when he encounters someone not amongst his elite, Wall Street crowd, Bateman finds himself in a very uncomfortable, volatile situation ("I don't have anything in common with you," he declares to a homeless man before stabbing him to death). Choose your friends carefully. Surround yourself with positive, like-minded, people that inspire you and drive you to be productive.

5. Never Supplicate To Women

Throughout the vast majority of American Psycho's non-linear storyline, Bateman is engaged to his vacuous, spoiled, entitled bitch of a girlfriend. In the world of American Psycho, everybody is cheating and sleeping around with one another, and the only reason it seems any of the characters are in relationships is to maintain appearances. Bateman is no exception.

Despite his overwhelming need to maintain appearances and put on a good show, Bateman is never one to cave to a woman's needs. At any given moment, he puts not only his fiancée in her place when necessary, but also the women with whom his relationships are purely sexual.

6. The Importance Of Having Your Own Hobbies And Interests

Although it's important for all men to maintain healthy relationships in their life, both with men and women, I think we can all agree that a self-reliant man never should never rely 100% on the company of others in order to keep occupied. Bateman was no stranger to this rule.

When not spending time with his friends or feeding his sick addiction, he had other hobbies and interests which included skiing, boxing, watching sports, watching movies, and in particular, listening to music.

With the advent of social media and overall advances in technology, I think the general nature of having hobbies has declined over the past decade or so. Having a hobby is not only important for a man, I feel it's crucial. Not only does it ensure you won't be a needy pest every time you're feeling "bored," it builds character and gives you something interesting to share about yourself when you are socializing.

7. It's Always Good To Have Some Competition

Despite the fact that Bateman was a homicidal maniac, by and large he had limits when it came to his victims. Generally speaking, he wouldn't murder anybody that had ties to his social circle, as this could implicate him in their murder. he exception to this is when one of his co-workers upstages him in every possible way, and the only solution is to murder him in the ultimate act of rage (the aforementioned axe murder).

Bateman and his crew are constantly trying to one-up each other with who has the biggest condo, the best suit, the best business card, the best tan, the hottest girlfriend, the best restaurant reservations… the list is endless. Again, this behaviour borders on extreme, but I do think some competition is healthy, and when approached with a positive mindset, can help inspire young men to achieve their goals.

8. “Just Say No”

The ability to simply say “No” to people without feeling the need to follow it up with a justified reason is one of the most powerful weapons a man can have in his arsenal. Easier said than done, but once mastered, you’ll be shocked at how effective it is to getting more of what you want out of life. A lot of people will think you’re an asshole, but you’ll be a respected asshole.

While anyone familiar with the story knows that much of Bateman’s behaviour stemmed more from the need to fit and be accepted by his peers, that doesn’t excuse the fact that a lot of his mannerisms were in fact traits of a confident, self-assured man.

Mimicking Bateman’s level of obsession will only result in insecurity and a constant feeling of inadequacy, but taking the advice above applying it within reasonable, appropriate amounts can and will result in improvements on all fronts.

Read More: 5 Things We Can Learn From The Movie Gran Torino

Vincent Stone
Vincent is a freelance writer hailing from what Roosh has named the world's shittiest pickup capital, Toronto, Canada.

Why You Should Never See A Therapist

June 2, 2015 | by Daniel Otzmatron | Link | Original Link

Human psychology is undoubtedly a real aspect of our existence. People respond to certain stimuli which can be observed, documented and perhaps even predicted to some extent.

However, I'm pleased to denounce seeing a shrink in the hope that it will expedite improvement in your life or alleviation of depression and anxiety. It is particularly useless to young men because chattering one on one with a person who analyzes you does nothing to improve your life. It does not urge you to act, only to sit and dwell on your thoughts. Every encounter or problem you have, will receive a designated label, it is as though someone is diagnosing you without a single solution being dished out.

When I was a teenager, I went through several futile months talking to a simpering beta shrink. It was very expensive, and was a complete waste of money. Baby boomer parents or relatives often think the best solution for a troubled young man is to instantaneously whisk him off to the nearest emo clinic. This is because in the modern age we are trained that everything has a consumerist solution. Here, take this pill, talk to the man (or usually the woman, even worse) pay them thousands of dollars for chatting you up.

When I told my psychologist that I felt nauseated by a fat, ugly young girl with zits, eating a stinky bowl of fatty food, he said to me “no, it is a kind of a diet people use,” obviously referencing Atkins, which was big at the time. After more appeasement, which is basically all they do, he said that everybody is different and unique in their own way. At the time, without reading up on the follies of modernity, it reeked of bullshit, and I instinctively knew it was an excuse for mediocrity.

Find a real solution

I use to hit the gym everyday as a teenager, to which my shrink referred to as “my safe space,” and said that “people who experience anxiety take up sports to deal with it.” Be that as it may, ask anyone here what they think about lifting weights and they’ll encourage you to continue and maybe even spot you when you bench press, which is the correct response.

There’s a Kleenex box on the table for blubbering women who were dumped by their husbands and boyfriends, or weren’t cared for properly by their fathers. The psychologist frames everything in his own academic language alongside constant comforting distractions from serious issues you must face as a man. It is no wonder many young men are dysfunctional nowadays, when this morbid, feminized charade, is what is offered to them as a solution.

In modern times, the shrink is the sought after high priest or the oracle that will cast someone to the pit of hell if he can summon an academic label, like an ancient incantation.

If you're a young man and a family member or a friend ever advises you to see one of these emotional sponges, refuse assertively and laugh it off. Tell them with zero apology that your environment is toxic and you're surrounded by neurotic zombies. Find masculine friends who will alter your mood, give you the right advice and provide genuine help. Take up writing and document your thoughts and encounters.

Know that there are ways of dealing with hard times, and that you should pursue them as soon as you can. Whenever you fix a problem in your personal life, whether it's relationships with women, existential angst, problem with family or good friends, you can always fix it or at least give it your best shot.

Psychologists, and even worse, psychiatrists and their magic potions and crazy drugs offer you zero chance to improve as a man, to learn the mind of a woman and to seduce her, and most importantly, naught chance of happiness.

Psychoanalysis as preventive medicine or a solution to emotional problems for men is moronic, period. Unless one is in the habit of analyzing himself and others, and will use his therapist's pitch to gain knowledge—as he tries to deconstruct his personality—it has zero benefits. It didn't help Tony Soprano who only tried to bone Jennifer ~~MILFy~~ Melfi.

What are the causes?

An empty existence devoid of spirituality, not being able to navigate through our modern age successfully with relative ease, lack of fulfillment at work or so called friends who only make you feel lonelier—these are the real causes that make one feel deflated.

Meditation is a documented method throughout history of dealing with angst and the burden of acute egotitis. Letting go of the ego is an important tenet in many ancient philosophies, will help your game and life in general, and will allow you to learn more about yourself.

Places like ROK offer readers a chance to discover themselves, understand that they do not have "mommy issues" or any other detritus feminists and ugly women shove down their throats. They don't need therapy and their money stolen from them. Au contraire, they are sane to the core.

All psychologists should be abandoned en masse, at least by men. That includes marriage counseling. If you have problems with your wife, game is the cure you are looking for.

Read More: The Role Of Modern Entertainment In Beta Indoctrination

Daniel Otzmatron
Otzmatron is a reactionary who loves womanizing, good beer and tobacco. He started deconstructing modern social conventions and falsehoods when he was a wee boy.

Masculine Wisdom From Homer’s Odyssey

June 2, 2015 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

In continuing with the theme in my previous article, I want to highlight some lessons from Homer’s Odyssey that I thought were important. The Odyssey is a subtler poem than the Iliad. It is perhaps not as high on raw brilliance and directness of narrative technique, but it is a poem that is more relatable to our everyday lives as human beings.

Whereas the warfare portrayed in the Iliad takes the human condition to the extreme, the Odyssey has more lessons on how to navigate peaceful life, which is still wrought with underlying difficulties. Most of us probably won’t adventure past Scylla and Charybdis (or sleep with goddesses), but the psychology and social relationships portrayed in the Odyssey have much to teach us.

A Man Must Go Through Misfortune Before Being Fortunate

> The winds rushed out and bore them far out to sea, weeping as their native land faded on the horizon. When I woke up and saw what had happened I thought long and hard about whether I should just go over the side and end it all in the sea or endure in silence and remain among the living. In the end I decided to bear it and live. (10.53-59)

Throughout the Odyssey, Odysseus displays a mental fortitude that is absolutely crucial for his ability to be fortunate in the end. Although he suffers reverse after reverse after reverse, he still manages to stay in the game and not let these losses get to his head. The way he manages his emotions showcases what is necessary for a man to get ahead through his misfortunes. Most people do not have this fortitude.

His mental fortitude is perhaps best put on display in the lines above, where he was so close to reaching Ithaca after an already-hard journey, only to have his homecoming snatched away by the cruel, fickle winds of fortune, in this case in the form of his men.

We've all probably suffered similar reverses – with women, with money, with the very arc of our well-being.

It is often said in the sphere that the price of success is failure. You must not let these failures damage you and instead learn from the facts of said failures while discarding the emotional baggage that comes from them.

Some people will have a natural advantage in these things, but this is a fortitude that everyone, regardless of their starting position, must consciously cultivate. If you do not, your storm clouds may not disappear because you will give up and sink into Poseidon's sea before the sun shines on your face.

You Must Maintain A Healthy Skepticism Of The Women Close to You

The murder of Agamemnon

The Odyssey is the more classically "red pill" of the two Homeric epics in that the poem is entirely premised on the nature of women and the caution men must take when navigating their relations with the opposite sex, even their own wives. The most enduring lesson is that you must think first and foremost with your big head and be ever on the lookout for a woman potentially manipulating you.

Agamemnon, whose example is used as a stark warning to Odysseus, failed to do this. Flush with his life's greatest triumph in the successful conclusion of the Trojan War, the most powerful Achaean king was one of the few to make it home without much trouble.

His glory was cut terribly short however, as he did not realize that in his absence, his wife Clytemnestra betrayed him, sleeping with Aegisthus, who took power in Mycenae in Agamemnon's absence. Not suspecting this at all, Agamemnon rushed home, only to be murdered.

He warns Odysseus in the underworld to avoid the same fate:

> Son of Laertes in the line of Zeus, – no, Poseidon did not sink my fleet at sea after hitting us hard with hurricane winds, nor was I killed by enemy forces on land. Aegisthus was the cause of my death. He killed me with the help of my cursed wife after inviting me to a feast in his house, slaughtered me like a bull at a manger. So I died a most pitiable death, and all around me my men were killed relentlessly, like white-tusked swine for a wedding banquet or dinner party in the house of a rich and powerful man. You have seen many men cut down, both in single combat and in the crush of battle, but your heart would have grieved as never before at the sight of us lying around the wine-bowl and the laden tables in that great hall. The floor steamed with blood. But the most piteous cry I ever heard came from Cassandra, Priam's daughter. She had her arms around me down on the floor when Clytemnestra ran her through from behind. I lifted my hands and beat the ground as I lay dying with a sword in my chest, but that bitch, my wife, turned her back on me and would not shut my eyes or close my lips as I was going down to death. Nothing is more grim or more shameless than a woman who sets her mind on such an unspeakable act as killing her own > husband. I was sure I would be welcomed home by my children and all my household, but she, with her mind set on stark horror, has shamed not only herself but all women to come, even the rare good one.

>
> …
>
> So don't go easy on your own wife either, or tell her everything you know. Tell her some things, but keep some hidden. (11.415-460)

It is Odysseus' caution in this area that wins him praise from Athena:

> Ah, that mind of yours! That's why I can't leave you when you're down and out because you're so intelligent and self-possessed. Any other man come home from hard travels would rush to his house to see his children and wife. But you don't want to hear how they are until you test your wife, who as a matter of fact, just sits in the house, weeping away the lonely days and nights. (13.341-349)

Odysseus, with the help of Athena, concocts a disguise to carefully test his wife, making sure that she is up to no shenanigans with any of her suitors. It is only when Penelope carefully passes this test that Odysseus can truly put his mind at ease and retake his home.

Women Will Always be Attracted to Superiority

> Daughter of Icarius, wise Penelope, of course it's preposterous that this man would marry you. That's not what we're worried about. But we are embarrassed at what men – and women – will say: 'A bunch of weaklings were wooing the wife of a man they couldn't touch – they couldn't even string his polished bow. Then along came a vagrant who strung it easily and shot through the iron.' That's what they'll say, to our lasting shame. (21.339-347)

A very real reason why Penelope was likely not attracted to the suitors is because they were simply inferior to her husband. Whereas Clytemnestra had some motivation for revenge against Agamemnon from the start due to the sacrifice of Iphigenia, Penelope had no such motivations. Odysseus was to her a man like a god, and it is painfully obvious that none of her suitors in the Odyssey can match him. This is made crystal clear by Antinous' pathetic whimpering above – the suitors were so inferior to Odysseus that they could not even string his bow.

The suitors' uncivilized nature and violation of the laws of hospitality are simply outward manifestations by Homer signaling their innate inferiority, despite the fact that these men were all wealthy nobles. It should not be surprising to many here that Penelope, an even higher status woman as a queen, was not exactly enamored with them in a primal way, devoted to her husband as she was.

She was devoted to Odysseus because he was a great man, and rendered greater by the inferiority of the suitors.

The Importance Of Fatherhood And Male Mentorship

Telamachus, with whom the poem begins, is a character that is quite relatable to many modern men. He, like so many today, grew up without a father. Through those critical childhood and adolescent years, Odysseus has been at war or wandering the seas.

Growing up only in the presence of women, Telemachus begins the poem as a timid, confused 20-year-old that nevertheless has potential for greatness. It is at this point – vulnerable, constantly at the mercy of the suitors, that Telemachus receives the first aid on his path to realize his masculinity and assume manhood from the goddess Athena, who is a force representing female support for male greatness.

Nevertheless, it is not Athena who Telemachus learns from. In the absence of his father (and in a quest to find information on him), Telemachus sees two of his father's peers – other great men and veterans of the Trojan War, Nestor and Menelaus. They tell him stories of his father, and Menelaus provides information on Odysseus' possible whereabouts which he gained from his own adventures.

Telemachus not only learns more of his father and the legacy that he should attempt to live up to, equally crucially, he observes how other great men behave – how they conduct their affairs, maintain their homes and give and receive hospitality. Thus far, the only consistent male examples in Telemachus' life (that are actually his peers as opposed to slaves) have been the suitors and they, despite their noble lineage, do not behave as men ought to behave.

Telemachus is a fast learner, and his brief time with Nestor and Menelaus is very well-spent. He also makes an important friend in Nestor's son, Peisistratus, which displays the importance of male brotherhood that Telemachus has also lacked in his life.

Telemachus, returning to Ithaca with a newfound confidence, is then fully initiated into the world of manhood by at last meeting with his father. The two subsequently plot the destruction of the suitors, thus assuring that Telemachus will someday assume his father's place, symbolized by Telemachus' ability to string his father's bow (it was only Odysseus that silently nodded him off from doing so).

In a world of increasing single motherhood, the need for a boy to learn how to become a man from other men and only from other men is increasingly shunned or explained away.

We can see the change in Telemachus from the start of the Odyssey:

> Suitors have latched on to my mother, against her will, and they are the sons of the noblest men here. They shrink from going to her father Icarius' house so that he could arrange his daughter's dowry and give her away to the man he likes best. Instead, they gather at our house day after day, slaughtering our oxen and sheep and fat goats, living high and drinking wine recklessly. We've lost almost everything, because we don't have Odysseus to protect our house. We can't defend ourselves. If it came to a fight we would only show how pathetic we are. Not that I wouldn't defend myself if I had the power. (2.54-67)

Telemachus after the end of his journey is a vastly different man:

> You'll soon see what I'm made of, father, and I don't think you'll find me lacking. (16.328-9)

This simple beginning of his reply to his father signifies that he has a newfound confidence, is unafraid to confront his enemies when the time is right, and is planning accordingly with his father to bring about their destruction. Although he does make one tactical error in the battle itself (by leaving the door to the storeroom for the weapons open, allowing the suitors to arm), this error is unimportant in comparison to his wider development. All men make mistakes. This mistake turned out not to be so costly. Athena was there, after all.

The very last thing Telemachus says in the Odyssey is:

> The way I feel now, I don't think you'll see me shaming my ancestors, as you put it, father. (24.531-2)

Telemachus' implicit ascension to manhood is acknowledged by his grandfather, Laertes:

> What a day, dear gods! My son and grandson going head to head to see who is best. (24.534-5)

Telemachus, through his inclusion in male-only spaces (comprised of the right men), has learned how to be a man, and his future is bright. In this regard, Telamchus is to me an icon for the modern man growing up in a feminist, politically correct society. His growth is at once indicative of the way forward personally, and what we should be aiming for socially.

Read More: Ice Odyssey: Douglas Mawson's Race Against Death

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

5 Ways We Must Enforce Equality Between The Sexes

June 3, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

In 2003 Norway became the first country mandating that women must make up at least 40% of board members on major companies. This trend has swept around the world, with countries including Belgium, Italy, Spain and Malaysia following suit.

Even in parliaments, nearly half of all countries now have some form of legal or voluntary gender quota. In Ireland parties stand to lose state funding unless 40% of their candidates are of either gender, while France has upped this to 50%.

For decades we've been hearing of the need to eliminate inequalities between the sexes. As we have seen, many have tried to carry out this crusade against sexism by legislating these differences away. We in the manosphere think this movement is fundamentally unfair, however. Why should one privileged gender receive equal reward, mandated by law, without enduring equal risks or responsibilities?

1. Workplace & Road Accidents

Every year, over 5,000 deaths occur in workplaces in America, 92% of which are suffered by men.

To make right this imbalance, every year another 4,900 women must experience a terminal workplace injury of some kind. A lottery will assign various forms of death, including being burned, poisoned, suffocated, impaled, sliced in half, falling from a great height or being crushed by a heavy object. Hundreds of thousands more will suffer minor injuries, from a blood nose up to and including amputations and permanent brain damage.

The federal government will implement this program each year on the taxpayer dime, ensuring that by every December 31st, equality of workplace risk has been reached, regardless of the occupations of the two genders.

As for the road toll, 23,000 men died on America's roads in 2013, compared to only 9,000 women. Thus, before the year is out, we should have a national lottery in which another 14,000 women are randomly selected and lain down on major interstates before peak hour traffic. Any driver who refuses to run over such chosen women will be deemed sexist, anti-equality, and be stripped of their driving license and shamed on national television.

2. Suicides

40,000 individuals die by suicide in the US every year, and approximately 78% of these are men. There is a deficit between the genders of about 22,400. As such, congress must immediately pass legislation to create a “Department of Women’s Misery.”

The purpose of the DWM is to ruin the lives of as many women as possible so as to address this imbalance. Women should be in turn bullied, shunned, undervalued, disenfranchised, and otherwise psychologically destroyed as far as possible. Women who complain about this behavior should be sent to talk to ineffectual councilors who will diagnose them with six-syllable mental illnesses which have remained undiscovered before the last decade.

Pamphlets advising on the best ways for one to slit one’s wrists, asphyxiate oneself with a car exhaust, or where on the body to shoot oneself in order to cause instant death should be handed out to female high school students.

In the event that, come the end of the year, an insufficient number of women have taken their own lives to meet the quota, the remaining difference must again be selected by lottery and the winners forcefully pushed off the nearest bridge.

3. Military Casualties

At least 1.3 million Americans have died in wars since 1776, the vast majority of them men, while women have been forced to remain at home cooking, knitting, cleaning, and undertaking various other “oppressive” peacetime activities.

For the most part, men themselves cannot be entirely to blame for this tragic statistic. Since 1920 at least, women have had equal right to vote, making them equally culpable in the actions of elected government.

To right this imbalance, women should not only be allowed to enter the military, but must become casualties in equal numbers. Averaging the historical total over the 239 year history of the union, this translates into approximately 5,500 combat deaths per year.

As such, a number of women at least that great must be parachuted deep into North Korea or Islamic State territory each year, with no weapons or supplies, in order to bravely sacrifice themselves for their country, until the discrepancy is met.

In the event America enters another major war, all units from frontline platoons to army headquarters must be made up of a 50:50 ratio of men and women. Special commissars will operate behind the lines to ensure an even casualty ratio by promptly executing those whose unit is experiencing a gender disparity in their favour.

4. Jail Time

Men make up 91% of the prison population. It is true that about 76% of all offenders are male, but clearly a bias exists here. By comparison, women commit 24% of all crimes and make up just 9% of the prison population. Furthermore, women on average will receive a sentence approximately 40% less than a man for the same crime. It is time the law began treating women as responsible adults.

Through simple arithmetic, we can conclude that roughly 1,960,000 female criminals have never been caught and are currently at large. Any women caught littering, shoplifting, speeding, jaywalking or otherwise infringing the law in any way will receive an automatic life sentence until we have eliminated this gap.

Government agents will then ensure that whenever a man is sentenced to a term of imprisonment, the next woman to appear before the judge is given an equal punishment, regardless of her crime. Let us also not forget that of the 20,000-odd people executed in the US (or the American colonies) since the 1600s, only 3% have been women.

5. Homelessness

Figures vary, but surveys put the percentage of the chronically homeless who are male at about 75%. Furthermore, in England, the number of men dying whilst homeless is nine times higher than the number of women.

As there are more than 600,000 homeless people, we must immediately kick some 400,000 women out of their homes onto the streets. These women will be forbidden from sleeping under a roof until an equal number of men have been so housed.

Even all this is just the beginning. Why does no one comment on how the “oppressive” sex in our society lives five years less than the “oppressed one” and that this difference holds true all the way back to the late middle ages? Why is it that by age forty 85% of women have had a child compared to just 76% of men despite an even number of both genders wanting to have kids? To close this ten point procreation gap, why not draft 200,000 wives every year and force them to bear and raise their husband’s children?

Why should we only have a “Minister for Women” given the vastly greater sacrifices made for our society by men? Why should my local gym have a women’s section, into which I dare not stray, without a male-only section in the next room? And finally, why is it that by merely asking these questions, people in the “civilized” world will look at you like you’ve gone mad? How can we be living in a “patriarchy” when the matriarchy immediately silences any opposing thought?

But all is not lost. If all of this is implemented at once, then by the year 2020 little girls growing up in America should have achieved total equality with boys. They will be as statistically likely to not only earn as much money, become a corporate board member, and serve in parliament, but also to die on America’s roads or in the workplace, to kill themselves, go to jail, be executed, have children, end up homeless or die bravely for their country.

We can therefore move forwards in our glorious androgynous society, where men are no longer automatically the disposable sex, while the rest of the world applauds our efforts and surely rushes to follow suit.

Read More: What Real Equality Looks Like

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

British Rotherham Investigator Gets Obscence Payoff For Doing Nothing, Then Plays The Victim Card

June 3, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Sue Berelowitz, glorified pen-pusher employed by the UK Government to construct a report on widespread child sexual abuse in Rotherham and other English boroughs, has recently received an obscene amount of money for having achieved nothing to help the plight of young children raped and trafficked by Pakistani muslim gangs.

The bureaucrat, who will walk away with £134,000 in and continue in her old job as a "consultant" for £960 a day on a part-time basis, has also pleaded for sympathy after receiving anti-Semitic abuse on the internet. The price of a bit of a racist trolling seems a cheap one to pay for a figure that represents the archetype of the high-ranking British government employee: insular, out of touch with reality, and more concerned with enforcing a politically correct, cultural Marxist view of reality than with carrying out the functions they are paid to do.

Introduction

Any apparent pattern you have noticed is entirely the product of your own racism.

Rotherham, a former industrial town in the north of England, was the site of a national scandal concerning the widespread sexual abuse of children. The perpetrators of the abuse, which included abduction, rape and trafficking, were lumped under the general term of “Asian,” a politically correct British euphemism mainly used to denote Pakistani Muslims. Pakistani Muslim men, in other words, abused white English females on a widespread scale, with conservative estimates putting the number of victims at 1,400 between 1997 and 2003.

The abject failure of local government and police led to handle the problem of abuse in Rotherham led to an inquiry, which accused authorities of effectively ignoring the goings-on. Home Secretary Theresa May condemned the “institutionalised political correctness” of Rotherham’s local government, who turned a blind eye to the curious coincidence that every abuser was a Pakistani muslim in order not to be perceived as “racist.”

Rotherham Metropolitan Borough Council was effectively taken over by central government early this year, after its entire leadership resigned following another expert report which declared it ‘not fit for purpose’.

The National Crime Agency was also called in after the same report said the council “goes to some lengths to cover up information.” The report, by Whitehall mandarin Louise Casey, sets out how council top brass bullied staff who dared to point out that the abusers were ‘predominantly’ Pakistani.

Met the new boss, same as the old boss

Nationalists have capitalised on the discontent in Rotherham, to the consternation of the Left.

Although the old council at Rotherham was supposedly flushed of Cultural Marxists, the new regime continues in the same vein of arrogance. Police and council leaders are to apply to the Home Office to apply for permission to ban protests against child abuse.

The pretext of the application to the Home Secretary to grant powers to ban the marches under provisions of the Public Order Act are clothed in a convenient fig leaf: the protests are organised by “right-wing groups” like the EDL, Britain First, and Yorkshire Infidels.

The attack on freedom of association in Rotherham, however, is an expression of panic by an elite which has been caught with its pants down, wallowing in Cultural Marxist reverie as they sit in glass cubicle offices masturbating over piecharts proclaiming the success of “multiculturalism” and “diversity,” as across the road gangs of so-called Asian men, unrestrained by the reactionary notion of absolute morality, molest underage girls.

Having given the hoo polloi a scrap from the table in the form of two inquiries and a spate of resignations, the expectation was that the plebiscite shut up and wind its neck in. Since that was not the case, and nationalists in Rotherham are taking advantage of public discontent with a Labour party apparatus, local bureaucrats are reaching for the ban-hammer.

Justice must be seen to be done

The Diana Inquest: some say a stitch-up on behalf of the Royal Family

Inquests like that into the death of Diana or the dead Tottenham gangster Mark Duggan are designed to explain away a death at the hands of the state in suspicious circumstances. Great pomp and circumstance attends them, and families call all manner of wacky experts to engage in conspiracy theory to prove an alleged conspiracy by the state.

Inquiries like the two Rotherham inquiries, one carried out by Professor Alexis Jay, an expert into social work, into the Rotherham abuse, and one by Louise Casey, a Whitehall mandarin, into the specific failings of the Council itself, are effective insofar as they may precipitate a raft of other government reactions, like sackings, prosecutions, and structural reforms.

Inquiries can, unfortunately, be made subject to endless delays by special interests who seek to keep uncomfortable truths covered up. The Hutton Inquiry into the death of Dr. David Kelly is at the most more egregious example. The weapons expert who put in doubt Tony Blair's "dodgy dossier" (which was the foundation for the pretext to invading Iraq in 2003) predicted his own murder and ended up dead in the woods in a highly dubious "suicide." Lord Hutton, the judge presiding over the inquiry, sealed its report for 70 years!

Committees are usually toothless, noise-making affairs where attention-seekers such as Keith Vaz and Margaret Hodge head their own respective committees which variously excoriate public figures and companies accused of misconduct or other immorality. The impotence of the charade was exposed when a convoy of international corporations passed through Hodge's Public Accounts Committee to tell her, matter-of-factly, how little tax they'd paid on bumper UK profits. Amazon UK revealed it paid £2.4m tax in 2014, despite £4bn sales.

A lot of bluster from Hodge and a limp stirring from the Guardian has so far resulted in sweet Fanny Adams in the way of tax takings from Amazon.

A nest-feathering bureaucrat with a burning with concern for abused children

It is against this background of theatric impotence in the conduct of so-called public inquiries before the Great British public that one should understand the appearance of pompous characters like Sue Berelowitz. It is not only for this reason of perception-management that Berelowitz, was brought in as England's Deputy Children's Commissioner who headed a broader inquiry into child abuse by the Office of the Children's Commissioner in 2011.

Berelowitz' activities serve an ideological purpose in promoting and upholding the integrity of the holy, Cultural Marxist narrative. In her organisation's report, Berelowitz put her name to a churn of bombastic, aspirational left-wing sound-bites, including firm demands for that keynote Cultural Marxist policy, that of sex education for children, put in the following terms:

> Relationships and sex education must be provided by trained practitioners in every educational setting for all children and young people. This must be part of a holistic/whole-school approach to child protection that includes internet safety and all forms of bullying and harassment and the getting and giving of consent.

Berelowitz also made sure the right feminist talking points were thrown in: it was men, rather than men from certain cultures, as in Rotherham, who were to blame:

> We live in a highly sexualised world in which for the most part it is considered quite acceptable [for men] to do as they want with females, and too many females think that is something they must comply with because they think it is a part of growing up

The report was also at pains to scold the police for "worrying prejudices" they had displayed when in narrowing their inquiries to "Asian men." Those "worrying prejudices," according to the analysis of Berelowitz and her fellow experts, were more worrying than the phenomenon of "Asian" gangs of child rapists. Berelowitz effectively precluded any attempt to investigate the possibility that “Asian” Muslim men were involved in large scale sexual abuse, which historian David Starkey had described as “entrenched in foothills of the Punjab,” by issuing an injunction to the effect that there was “nothing to see here.”

All aboard the gravy train

Berelowitz made headlines this year when she took voluntary redundancy from her £99,333-a-year post and was handed a lump sump pay-off of £134,000.

The beleaguered Commissioner was soon hired again as a consultant to her old employer, giving there the same role—leading an inquiry into child abuse—only now earning £960 a day to work up to nine days a month, effectively the same job as before with hugely reduced work hours.

Good work if you can get it.

Acceptable in all major stores

To top it all off, Berelowitz has complained in the Jewish press that she has begun receiving anti-Semitic abuse, claiming that the police is now having to patrol to protect her since she has started receiving “vile” insults on social media.

Attending the Hay Festival, a yearly retreat for assorted left wing intellectuals, far from the tense, deserted streets of Rotherham, Berelowitz complained:

> I am a Jew who is doing work that’s very difficult right now because I’m inquiring into the sexual abuse of children and I’m facing the most vile anti-Semitic attacks > on social media – ‘filthy Jewish bitch’.

Not only has Berelowitz bagged a shedload of cash for achieving nothing in places like Rotherham (besides keeping the spotlight off the real perpetrators of abuse), but she also has got off lightly if the backlash is limited to a few abusive texts on the internet.

Conclusion

Sue Berelowitz is a personality not far from the rotten core of a British intellectual elite, so beholden to an abstract idea of right and reason that they will actively close their eyes to the truth. Berelowitz helped, as did the entire establishment left, to poo-poo the idea that perhaps there was a problem with so-called Asian men in Rotherham and other places, and that the solution should be tailored accordingly.

Instead she waxed lyrical about action having to be taken, whilst taking no action herself beyond penning some fuzzy words in a useless report which did nothing more than provide fodder for the next echelon of suits-on-the-make wanting to look competent at a press conference.

After gaining massive reward for her rank incompetence, she engaged wrangled a cosy sinecure as “consultant” to the same useless inquiry she had just left. And, as a cherry on the icing, she complains to the national media that anti-Semitic elements of the British right are fingering her as a malevolent element in one of the greatest institutional failures of child protection in the modern era.

The solipsistic conceit is so thick you could cut it with a knife. Every word of every report on Rotherham and its aftermath, as far as solutions are concerned, could have been condensed down to a sentence: “Get rid of all factions that subscribe to political correctness and let the police do their job unfettered by considerations of Cultural Marxist values.”

Read More: We Are Nothing More Than Distracted Sheep In The Real Game Of Power

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

How I Got Ripped In 29 Days

June 3, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Fitness Under Oath

In just 29 days I dropped 13 pounds, tightened up my waist and finally got six-pack abs.

Day 1: 183.2lbs.

Day 29: 170.2 lbs

Here are the three strategies I used to make this transformation happen.

1. Calorie Shifting

If you're like me, you've probably tried low-carb diets in the past.

And maybe you saw some "ok" results, but you could never get truly lean.

That's because the standard low-carb diet SUCKS when it comes to losing maximum fat in minimum time. Instead, scientifically cycle (or "shift") your calories and your carbohydrate intake. This means consuming a high level of carbohydrates on certain days and a low level of of carbohydrates on other days.

Research shows by scientifically cycling/shifting your calories and your carbs, you can actually burn 2.6X more fat as compared to standard dieting(1). In other words, you could be done with your diet in 30 days instead of 90 days!

2. Zero Cardio

I spent ZERO minutes on the treadmill during my incredible 29 day transformation. ZERO minutes on the elliptical machine or exercise bike. ZERO minutes jogging, walking, running or swimming.

In case I'm not making myself clear, I did absolutely ZERO cardio. None. Nada. Because when it comes to burning fat, cardio is an absolute waste of time.

Did you know that running a full-marathon — 26.2 miles –burns just 2,600 calories?(2) That's roughly 1/2 pound of fat. Think about that for a second: If you went out a ran a full marathon — 26.2 miles — every single Saturday you would lose LESS than 2 pounds of fat after a month!

I don't know about you, but running for 6 hours straight on the weekends isn't my idea of a good time. For this reason, I skipped the cardio and instead focused on using brief but intense resistance-training sessions to build muscle mass and maintain my metabolism while the diet stripped away the fat.

3. Pre-planned Cheat Meals

To keep my metabolism running high, I enjoyed 3 cheat meals per week. But I didn't just randomly binge out on pizza and ice cream. I scientifically pre-planned my cheat meals for maximum fat burning results.

I allowed myself three cheat meals per week. Cheat meals always happened on days where I did resistance training. This was so the high level of carbohydrates and calories would be used to repair and rebuild my muscles after an intense training session.

By utilizing these 3 strategies for aggressive fat loss, I was able to get ripped in just 29 days.

If you want to read more about how I pulled off this incredible transformation in just 29 days, check out my book, "The Aggressive Fat Loss Bible." I'm offering an exclusive discount for ROK readers. (limited time.)

The Aggressive Fat Loss Bible

References:

1: Davoodi, Sayed Hossein, et al. "Calorie Shifting Diet Versus Calorie Restriction Diet: A Comparative Clinical Trial Study." International journal of preventive medicine 5.4 (2014b): 447.
2: http://www.theactivetimes.com/how-many-calories-does-running-marathon-burn

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Social Justice Warriors' Updated Version Of The Seven Deadly Sins

June 4, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Earlier this week I was walking through JFK airport when I found this curious, handwritten document, obviously dropped by another passenger. The document had no names on it, but I can only assume that a high-ranking general in social justice army was the author. I reproduce it below without modification except for the pictures, which I added as I felt they helped illustrate the concepts in the document.

***

Back in the day before there were iPhones, there used to be this list of seven deadly "sins" of things that people were supposed to avoid. Of course, people who lived before us were stupid so their list of the seven deadly sins is almost completely wrong.

While the old list of sins is wrong, I do like the easy-to-remember format, so I created a new list of sins that you should avoid. I'll share those later, but first, let's review the outdated list.

The Old, Outdated Seven Deadly Sins

Here is the old list. As you can see, most of these are not sins at all. In fact, most of these "sins" are things that people should be strongly encouraged to do.

Pride

Pride, or hubris, was what the ancients thought was the greatest sin as it was the sin of the devil.

Today, we call this “self-esteem” and you can never have too much of it. Even if a person is indolent and has no achievements to his name, he is still a special snowflake who should hold his head up high with great self-esteem!

Lust

Why was this ever a sin? Now, everything is permitted.

Everyone should be encouraged to be as promiscuous as a chimpanzee, especially women. Men should be encouraged to use porn. It keeps them occupied so that they don’t recognize that their rights are being eroded.

Gluttony

Healthy at any size

The old meaning of gluttony was overindulgence. It was usually associated with food, but it could really be taking anything to an unhealthy extreme.

Gluttony is still somewhat applicable depending on who you are. Women are incapable of being gluttons, because they are healthy at any weight. However, men who eat butter or bacon are gluttons. Encourage them to eat more tofu because it kills their testosterone. The less masculine they are, the easier they are to control.

Avarice

Avarice, or greed, is a rapacious desire for riches. This sin is still in effect. People who want to pay lower taxes are guilty of the sin of avarice.

Sloth

Sloth from The Goonies.

Sloth is a physical or spiritual laziness.

This is a difficult topic to summarize, but in general, we want to continue the policy of working the male undesirables until they drop dead. For more details, consult The Theory and Practice of Oligarchical Collectivism.

Wrath

Wrath is an uncontrollable anger. Wrath can be good or bad. An example of a good, wholesome wrath is opprobrium poured out upon the Duggar family after the molestation scandal.

Envy

Economists with Asperger's Syndrome have figured out that envy is actually a good thing because it drives our wonderful consumerist society. Kim Kardashian has a Porsche, so you should have one too. We want to encourage the proles to keep buying products that they don't need so that we continue to get richer.

The New List of Seven Deadly Sins

Here is new list of Seven Deadly Sins. We won't call it that of course, but it serves as a good mnemonic device. This is a work in progress, but I think you'll get the general gist from what follows:

Racism

Harry Reid, who said that Obama, could be successful because of his “light-skinned” appearance and his ability to speak “with no Negro dialect, unless he wanted to have one,” is not a racist because he is a progressive.

If you judge a man by his character and not the color of his skin, you are a racist.

Only whites can be racist. Just as type-O blood is the universal donor, whites are the universal oppressor.

However, whites can be cleansed of their inherent racist nature by reading Slate, Rolling Stone, and the New York Times, and by regularly watching the Daily Show and MSNBC. Also, they should be sure to vote for the correct political candidates.

Misogyny

Healthy at any size feminist Andrea Dworkin: “Only when manhood is dead — and it will perish when ravaged femininity no longer sustains it — only then will we know what it is to be free.”

A misogynist is a person who believes in antiquated, traditional sex roles.

As enlightened, modern individuals, we know that all heterosexual sex in our patriarchal society is coercive and degrading to women, and sexual intercourse, by its very nature, makes women inferior and forces them into submission. In other words, all heterosexual sex is rape.

Misogynists reject this obvious truth, and consequently, they must be eradicated.

Homophobia

A homophobe is a person who doesn’t care what two consenting adults do in the privacy of their home, but who feels that marriage should be between one man and one woman.

Science Denial

Science consists of two great, unquestionable dogmas. If you deny either of these dogmas, or even question them, you are a science denier. The first great dogma is that there is no God. Believing in a sky god is a form of retrograde behavior that can lead to other sins such as misogyny or homophobia.

But the god of the Muslims is real because we are scared of those guys and hope they don’t hurt us.

The second great dogma is anthropogenic global warming (AGW). The correct solution to AGW is to only permit elites such as ourselves and Al Gore to fly in private jets. Some insolent people have the audacity to ask how AGW will be affected by the earth’s natural climactic cycles. These people are science deniers and should be attacked as enemies of the people.

Hurting Someone’s Feelings

People should always feel good about themselves unless they are retrograde persons who violate one of the new deadly sins.

Ugly people should be told that they are beautiful. Mentally slow people should be praised for their sharp intellect. If a man says he is a woman, call him Caitlyn. If Instagram girls fly to Dubai to have sex with Arab sheiks, men should be encouraged to play Captain Save-a-hoe and marry them after they hit the wall. [Editor's Note: I was shocked by the author's political incorrectness in the preceding paragraph.]

This deadly sin is one of the most powerful tactics we have in our arsenal to compel society to accept our social engineering changes.

Masculinity

A small number of men have started to try to roll back the glorious progress of feminism in order to try to reestablish antiquated patriarchal forms. If these men are permitted to reproduce and raise traditionally-minded children, it could result in a demographic nightmare for our social justice project. Science forbid!

However, if we can convince men that masculinity consists solely of growing a handle bar mustache, drinking bourbon, and smoking a pipe, then this movement might serve as another distraction to keep men from the next deadly sin—thinking.

Thinking

For decades now, we have done an outstanding job of persuading the public that they were daring free-thinkers all the while they were completely conforming to our indoctrination.

But now, a dangerous new trend has emerged where men are starting to question the very foundations upon which our society is built. These thought criminals are reading the old books and questioning things such as equality. They are even debating which form of government is best.

We are starting to see the glimmerings of independent thinking. This trend must be stopped at all costs. Fortunately, this is only a tiny group of men and we will soon figure out a way to divide them so that they do not gain critical mass.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

***

Post Script

The document abruptly ends there. While it might be a ruse, I thought it would be prudent to share with you as it does contain a few valid insights into the mind of a rank-and-file social justice warrior.

Read More: How Social Justice Warriors Miss The Mark

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Jessica Valenti Insists That “Patriarchal Superstructures” Make Women Commit Suicide

June 4, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In a bizarre diatribe, Jessica Valenti, The Guardian‘s favorite click-bait columnist, claims that vaguely described “misogyny” is behind young women killing themselves. Stretching the truth and the statistics behind it to the fifth dimension, Valenti ignores the fact that male suicide is higher than female suicide in every country in the world, baring China and a few others.

In the United States, the hegemonic superpower and “patriarchy capital,” men kill themselves 3-10 times more than women [1] [2]. None of this features in Valenti’s poor excuse for an article. Money must be tight in her household at the moment.

Valenti utilizes a deliberately misleading juxtaposition of statistics to make her “point” that women are purportedly under sustained male attack, such as this gem:

> The report found that suicides are responsible for half of all violent deaths in men and 71% of violent deaths in women.

Because men in the US are thrice as likely to be murdered as women, and more likely to die in automobile accidents or on the job, the percentage of women who die via suicide as represented against all other “unnatural” female deaths is, of course, going to be higher. But these are irrelevant tidbits to Valenti, which distract from her major premise: women, women, women. It is manifest that Valenti has never taken higher mathematics, let alone basic statistics, at either a high school or college level, or at least she flunked it.

The use of “violent” is employed by Valenti to underscore something else: the “patriarchy” that she wants to attack is committed to violence against women, including suicide. So when a woman kills herself, Valenti is adamant that this is somehow male violence in action against women.

In poorer countries, where most people live in abject poverty, men still kill themselves in higher rates than women. The gender gap is narrower than in the West but Valenti is reticent to admit that maybe, just maybe, never having food on the table, or the otherwise bleak material prospects for life, might be a reason for a woman (or man) to tragically kill themselves in the Third World. But no, it just has to be sexism for Valenti.

Every statistic disproves Valenti's self-serving and cruel focus

How appropriate considering the topic

The top ten countries in terms of suicide rates, including both genders, are Lithuania, South Korea, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Russia, Japan, Hungary, Latvia, Ukraine and Finland [1] [2]. In every single one of those, the male suicide rate is markedly higher. Amongst this list, Lithuania, the tragic "gold medalist," also has the highest male-to-female suicide ratio: 13:2. Japan, placed sixth overall, has the lowest gender ratio, which still means men kill themselves at nearly twice the rate of women.

If women are so institutionally oppressed, why do men kill themselves more in every country aside from China and perhaps a handful of others? Even in China, the gender ratio is balanced enough that sizeable numbers of men are still killing themselves relative to women. With 40% more women killing themselves in the world's most populous nation, this ratio is still much smaller than male-dominated ratios in the vast majority of the world's nations.

And having around 40% of suicides coming from Chinese men remains a very high watermark, given the so-called patriarchy existing there. Life mustn't be so great for many Chinese males if they chose to end their lives in close to equal numbers as women.

Why do more men in the “Patriarchy” kill themselves?

Because, in a nutshell, the patriarchy as described by Valenti and her contemporaries simply does not exist. It is a fairytale construct, under which homeless men (men experience homelessness more than women), male suicide victims, male victims of violence and other down-and-out cases band together with the 1% of Wall Street CEOs, politicians, and other elites, and all men in between these classes, to systematically oppress women. It seems that the proverbial garbage collector, raised in a food stamp-using trailer park in the Everglades, has infinitely more privilege than Jessica Valenti.

What’s more is that Valenti is just playing a feminist version of a frame game. If you assume these “superstructures” of patriarchal oppression permeate every aspect of society and that they resist and attempt to sabotage your every move, you can claim misogyny about female suicide, even if men end their own lives, on average, many times more often.

Any unhelpful (read: full-picture) statistics you come across, such as those proving higher rates of male suicide in a system feminists falsely believe is designed to elevate male interests above all others, can be swatted away with a combination of confirmation bias and political dyslexia.

Welcome her unrestrained mouth

Young guys like Everybody Loves Raymond’s Sawyer Sweeten commit suicide in far greater numbers than young women

Just as the one-in-five college “rape” statistic has been blown out of the water, and been avoided since by Barack Obama and Senator Kirsten Gillibrand, among others, this female suicide rant by Valenti comes across as what it is: pseudo-sociological posturing. Guardian readers, not known for their red pill or close to common sense outlook, nonetheless pilloried Valenti’s laughable attempts to pass off suicide as a patriarchal conspiracy theory.

The internet allows the Jessica Valentis of the world to both stir up hate and drivel en masse, but additionally enables them to be held accountable. The more words she writes online, the harder and faster her ideology comes undone. We should – and must – welcome the free rein afforded to her writing. As unpleasant as this article was, and the total disrespect and pathological lack of empathy it showed to men who have lost all hope, it provides yet another reference to use against her and those of her persuasion.

Read More: The Guardian Is Enabling Jessica Valenti's Descent Into Clinical Madness

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Power Of Laser Eye Contact

June 4, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

With the worthy exception of touch (kino), eye contact is without doubt the dedicated poon-plunderer's weapon of choice in his quest for vaginal Valhalla. It turns out that all that dating advice of yore – from magazines, problems pages, and so on – was correct in this particular way: strong, confident eye contact is exceptionally potent in producing pantie tsunamis in public places. Just not for the reasons that earlier proponents thought.

Eye contact, we were always told, demonstrates confidence. Chicks like confident men, therefore strong eye contact will get you laid (or at least a date) right? Partly. But the devil is in the detail, and and it is really the quality of your eye contact that makes all the difference. This isn't about staring random girls down like a loon – your gaze must have attitude.

The important thing about steady, sustained eye-contact is that communicates male-female polarity. To put it crudely, when you look at a woman, your eyes must tell her that you are thinking about fucking her and that you are not afraid to do so. Your eyes, in other words, must be a man's eyes, not a pussified wimp's.

Laser Eye Contact Works In the Day

The great thing about laser eye contact is that it works in all contexts—during so-called day game or night game.

In the daytime, you can use it on girls you encounter naturally, such as shop assistants and baristas. When she serves you, simply take care to ensure that you are consciously looking her directly in the eye for a little longer than is usual. Deliberateness is important—after all, you are trying to communicate, just non-verbally. If you can, you should smile lightly as well.

This can be harder than it sounds. If you're unpracticed you'll be spending so much energy concentrating on your eyes that there's a danger you'll end up looking like a grinning madman, but persevere. What you'll find when you hit a sweet spot with this is that your gaze will genuinely communicate something that she picks up on—your desire for her—in a secret and therefore sexy way.

I used this technique once over several weeks with a girl in my local coffee shop. When I eventually got her number and took her out for a drink, we slept together quickly and easily. It was as if all the communication necessary had taken place already, and so the leap to sex was far less steep than it could have been.

…Or At Night

Laser eye contact works equally well at night too. Here, though, the technique is slightly different. Rather than concentrate on one individual girl you should aim to “get into the zone” so that you are hitting every girl you see with laser eyes.

Here’s how to go about this. If you are in a club, or busy bar, then you should walk around the venue a few times deliberately aiming your eyes at those of passing girls. Again, try to smile a little as you do so, but in a cocky, slightly dismissive way.

After a while you will start to get a few smiles back, and a little sustained eye contact, and your confidence will rise. This will mean that your eye contact will then become more bold, more invasive – and much more effective.

Basically the aim of this is to banish all timidity so that you end up looking at girls like the dashing high-value man that you are (or that you need to demonstrate that you are, anyway). Once you’ve warmed up you’ll find that eye contact becomes a devastatingly effective part of your game arsenal, akin to touch in its ability to sexualise a situation and create erotic tension between you and the girls you meet.

How To Practice Laser Eye Contact

A way to practice this is to go out and maintain eye contact with as many people as you can (men and women) without relinquishing it first. Very quickly you will become more confident, and you will find women gazing at you for longer, blushing, dropping their shopping bags and walking into walls and bus-stops.

A useful tip is to think sexual thoughts as you appraise each girl. Doing so will help to get you in the zone, focus your intent and help you communicate just the right degree of slightly outlaw sexuality.

If it takes time then don’t despair, just keep going. Some guys—myself included at the beginning—find eye contact difficult, but in reality it’s one of the easiest ways to start interacting with girls with very little chance of rejection. OK, she may look away, but trust me, no one’s going to come up to you in the street and complain because you looked at them for half a second too long.

It Makes Game And Closing Much Easier

When you become good with laser eye contact, you will find that in many cases it pretty much shorts out the need for tight verbal game. Why? because the sub-communication is already down. “I am a man and I want to fuck you.” Once this is established the chit-chat on top is secondary, an exercise in comfort-building. If you have this kind of vibe with a girl, then ask for her number or take her on an instant date, and chances are she’ll be amenable: eye-contact alone has done the heavy lifting for you.

Read More: How To Avoid The Point Of No Return

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Top 5 Articles From May 2015

June 4, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK published 92 articles last month. Here are the top 5:

1. Why You Should Not Go See "Mad Max: Feminist Road"

> The real issue is not whether feminism has infiltrated and co-opted Hollywood, ruining nearly every potentially-good action flick with a forced female character or an unnecessary romance sub-plot to eek out that extra 3 million in female attendees.
>
> It has.

2. 5 Reasons Why You Should Never Date A Girl With Dyed Hair

> Nothing says "Look at me!" more effectively than flowing purple locks. These girls know that they're cheaply drawing attention to themselves and revel in every drop, whether it's a compliment from a limp-wristed orbiter or disgust from a man of value who spurns their Troll Doll aesthetic.

3. The Real Consequences Of Women In The Military

> What would make a woman want a low paid job they cannot physically do, while surrounded twenty-four hours a day by dangerous jerks that treat them like shit? Unsurprisingly, for those who know the nature of women it is exactly that. Most of them have daddy issues, are mentally damaged, or the losers of the sexual market who cannot secure a man and have no other career options to fall back > on.

4. Why You Should Avoid Dating Girls Who Claim They Were Raped

> If men once again refuse to date raped chicks, rape will become once more an infrequent source of private and passing pain, and not an indelible merit badge to be trumpeted across all the media outlets in the land.

5. How Modern Societies Are Training Men Not To Marry

> The question a modern man needs to ask himself before marrying today is: how well can I presently and possibly tolerate this woman in the future? Will she present a threat to my individuality, freedom, and the family that I would sire with her?

And here was my controversial book review for the month, which got me denounced by the Anti Defamation League:

- The Damaging Effects Of Jewish Intellectualism And Activism On Western Culture

You can review all articles we published last month on our archives page.

Don't Miss: Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Modern Day Social Justice Warriors Who Would Have Been Institutionalized In The Past

June 5, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Social justice warriors are known for their angry, morally righteous proclamations on the evils of modern society. Prominent SJWs such as Anita Sarkeesian, Laurie Penny and John Scalzi rail against the injustices that our supposedly patriarchal, racist, homophobic world inflicts on women and people of color. However, given how ludicrous and out of touch their ideas are, has anyone wondered if SJWs simply aren't right in the head?

In the past, anyone who made the kinds of statements spat forth by prominent SJWs would have been condemned to an insane asylum. Here are five prominent SJWs and how they compare to famous institutionalized writers and ideologues of the past.

1. Jessica Valenti

Best known as the founder of the once-prominent feminist blog Feministing, Jessica Valenti currently works as a staff columnist for The Guardian. Valenti has argued that virginity is a social construct in her book The Purity Myth, declared that women who claim to be rape victims should be automatically believed despite the evidence, and has advocated for rape trials returning to standards of proof that were abandoned in the Middle Ages.

Similar To: Virginia Woolf

A prominent feminist of the early 20th century, Virginia Woolf's meandering, onanistic fiction was a considerable influence on modernist and postmodernist writers. Her most famous feminist work is the essay "A Room of One's Own," which was satirized by the South African poet Roy Campbell in his poem "On the Same":

> Far from the Vulgar haunts of men,
> Each sits in her successful room.
> Housekeeping with her fountain pen, > and writing novels with her broom.

Woolf suffered from bipolar disorder and was repeatedly institutionalized due to the nervous breakdowns she suffered over the course of her life. Starting with the death of her mother when she was 15, she underwent periodic mental breakdowns that were preceded by violent migraines and insomnia, which left their mark on her writing. Woolf eventually committed suicide by drowning in 1941.

2. Jian Ghomeshi

The former host of CBC Radio's arts program Q, Jian Ghomeshi is an outspoken feminist who once said that he "believe[d] that the world would be a better place if it were run by women." Last year, Ghomeshi was fired by CBC Radio after several women came forward with allegations that he beat and raped them. While Ghomeshi attempted to defend himself by claiming that his abuse was actually consensual BDSM, 15 separate women have since claimed that he never once obtained consent from them.

Similar To: The Marquis de Sade

The Marquis de Sade was one of the most prominent writers of the French Revolution; his books on sexual perversion and degeneracy are so legendary that the term "sadism," the tendency to derive pleasure from inflicting pain on others, takes its name from him. He was also one of the most vehement feminists of his era, seeking to liberate women from patriarchal mores so they could better serve his depraved lusts. Sade spent over 30 years of his life in insane asylums and eventually died in prison after Napoleon ordered his arrest.

3. Elizabeth Stoker Bruenig

A soi-disant Christian socialist and contributor to The New Republic, Stoker Bruenig has a long history of bizarre outbursts. Following the implosion of Rolling Stone's discredited article "A Rape on Campus," about a violent gang rape that occurred at the University of Virginia, Stoker Bruenig argued that the reason the piece failed was because "it used rightwing tactics to make a leftist point." She also accused ROK publisher Roosh Valizadeh of making rape threats against her after he asked his Twitter followers to gauge her attractiveness.

Similar To: Sylvia Plath

A darling of English professors and anthology editors, Sylvia Plath was a mentally unstable poet who penned doggerel about how her daddy didn't give her enough hugs when she was growing up. She spent much of her life in mental institutions due to chronic depression; after receiving electroshock therapy in 1953, she attempted suicide by overdosing on sleeping pills. Plath would finally succeed in taking her own life in 1963, leaving her husband and children behind.

4. Hugo Schwyzer

For over a decade, Hugo Schwyzer was one of feminism's most prominent male voices, writing for major publications such as The Atlantic and Jezebel, teaching community college courses on the subject, and even leading L.A.'s SlutWalk in 2011. Schwyzer took extremist stances even by the standards of male feminists, including advocating that men allow their girlfriends to penetrate them with strap-ons, getting circumcised in his mid-30's as a gift to his then-wife, and claiming that men should not date women younger than themselves.

In 2013, following revelations that he had been cheating on his wife with a porn star, Schwyzer had a widely-publicized mental breakdown and suicide attempt. In a manic, narcissistic Twitter rant, he revealed that he had falsified his credentials as a feminist professor, engaged in affairs with his female students, and more.

This was especially shocking considering that Schwyzer had built his reputation on being a "reformed bad boy," who used to sleep with his students, abuse drugs and alcohol, and attempted to murder his ex-girlfriend.

Similar To: Bill Wilson

Bill Wilson, aka Bill W., co-founded Alcoholics Anonymous in 1935 after being repeatedly institutionalized due to his drinking. His inspiration for founding AA came from a "vision" of God he had while on belladonna, an extremely powerful hallucinogen that was used as a quack cure for alcoholism up until a few decades ago. While never formerly diagnosed, Wilson's grandiose personality and self-aggrandizing behavior fits the definition of Narcissistic Personality Disorder.

Despite being a Christian and a vocal advocate for temperance, Wilson was a serial adulterer known for coercing young women who joined AA into sexual relationships, a practice now known as "13th stepping." Yet, while he was busy taking advantage of attractive girls who were recovering from alcoholism, Wilson remained unemployed throughout his life and depended on his wife Lois to pay the bills with her day job.

Additionally, despite the purported success of AA in helping drunks sober up, Wilson repeatedly relapsed throughout his life and even begged for whiskey on his deathbed. The inability of the Twelve Steps to cure even the man who thought them up is borne out in AA's horrifically high failure rates. According to scientific studies, 90 to 95 percent of alcoholics who join AA end up relapsing within six months, and AA may in fact be worse for alcoholics then doing nothing at all.

5. David Futrelle

David Futrelle is a freelance writer from Chicago who has achieved minor notoriety for his anti-anti-feminist blog Manboobz, renamed We Hunted the Mammoth after male feminist Elliot Rodger went on a shooting spree last year. On his blog, Futrelle frequently cherry-picks quotes from trolls in an attempt to smear anti-feminists and MRAs, citing them as examples of what sites like ROK actually advocate.

While Futrelle's site is frequently mined for reference material by larger publications, he has yet to achieve the big breakthrough he's been hoping for.

Despite his current advocacy for feminism, Futrelle has a hidden history as a men's rights sympathizer. A decade ago, he wrote a letter to the Chicago Reader in which he supported the opening of a Borders bookstore in his neighborhood of Andersonville because the only other bookstore was a womens' one. He also described himself as a "lapsed feminist."

Similar To: Matt Cvetic

Matt Cvetic was an FBI informant who achieved minor notoriety in the 1940's after he infiltrated the Communist Party of the USA and wrote about his experiences in the Saturday Evening Post, later testifying before the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). His tales of life in the party were dramatized in the radio serial I Was a Communist for the FBI, which was later adapted for film in 1951.

Despite his fame, Cvetic's testimony was eventually discredited after it was revealed that he was an alcoholic who frequently falsified stories. After being institutionalized due to a nervous breakdown in the late 1950's, Cvetic died of a drinking-induced heart attack in 1962.

As you can see, the loudest and most prominent SJWs of today exhibit obvious signs of mental illness and substance abuse. While suffering nervous breakdowns or becoming addicted to alcohol don't inherently make someone evil, those who lack the capacity to manage their own lives have no business telling anyone else how to live theirs. Social justice warriors' moral crusades are the byproducts of their defective minds.

Read More: Modern Social Justice Warriors Use The Same Subversion Strategies As The USSR

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Why Tribal Patriarchy Is The Best Model For Society

June 5, 2015 | by Will Outenphraghen | Link | Original Link

Feminists like to claim that men forced women to adopt a subservient role at the dawn of civilization, but it is more likely that men lured women into civilized life by bribing them. After all, when chimps are given treats in a lab, the first thing the males do is offer them to the females in return for sex.

This practice, in essence, is what patriarchy is all about. Men in settled towns or villages offering women shelter, a reliable food supply, and protection in exchange for monogamous pair bonding. This practice of monetary capitalism and sexual socialism has kept human societies together for thousands of years. Mating may be a little boring, and you may grow to despise your spouse, but you get a shot at having a family and raising offspring, which is the primary motivation that drives men to do the difficult and dangerous work that civilization requires.

Fast-forward to 1960 and this system of motivating men may have worked too well. They had invented machines that made housework so easy that for the first time in history housewives grew bored. Bored women become rebellious; rebellious women stir up trouble; and bam—we have second-wave feminists who view homemaking as so tedious that it isn't even necessary.

Society falls apart as the crucial role of mothering gets outsourced to daycares, women enter the workforce where they stir up more trouble, wages plummet, costs rise, homemaking becomes financially improbable, and society turns into a nuthouse with feral children running around spouting Cultural Marxism because they don't know any better.

What's the solution? We can't send women back to the kitchen. They don't like it there. They're bored. The obvious solution is to let women figure it out for themselves. Problem is, women aren't very good problem solvers. They place themselves first and leave their families to suffer – if they have one. They try to be men, but they're not very good at it, and we men don't like them anymore.

So, as always, it is men that must find the solution. We must lure women back into the home by making it more attractive than the work environment. Society depends on us doing exactly that. Problem is, how do we do it?

Indian Island

There used to be a ramp between the dock and the pier. In the 1920’s there was a mansion and a vineyard on the island. Now only the water tower remains.

When I was a kid, my family would go camping on Indian Island in Clear Lake, California with several other families. Each mom would bring one pre-cooked dinner. There would be several coolers of drinks that were fair game and tons of snacks. The boys would set up camp on the far side of the island, while the girls took the nearest, flattest, best camping spot because the eldest girl’s father owned the island (female privilege).

On the way in and out, the boys would carry all the heavy stuff, and the girls would strut around and do almost nothing. The dads would launch the boats and take us water skiing, knee-boarding, wakeboarding, tubing, and an occasional trip to the hot springs, while the wives lounged around between meals and read romance novels.

It was a magical place for a young boy. We were free to do whatever we wanted, and we could stare at the bikini-clad bodies of the older girls to our hearts’ content. I have many stories to tell about that place that are not relevant to this article. Suffice it to say that it was a lesson in stress-free living when multiple families work together.

The reason I bring this up is because it shows that (1) gender roles magically pop back into place when people go camping, because there is nothing that can compel women to find firewood when there are young men around, (2) that cooking for 30 people isn’t that much harder than cooking for four when you plan ahead, and (3) both men and women are happier when they have other men and women to spend time with so they aren’t stuck with only their significant other for company.

Enter Tribal Patriarchy

Happy marriages are the bedrock of civilization.

Which brings me to the idea of Tribal Patriarchy. Suburbs suck. There's nowhere to go, nothing to do, and nobody's home because everyone is commuting. Family dinners are extinct. Living in the city is no better. It's no place for children. Living in the countryside can be lonely, too, if you don't have company.

What social arrangement did humans have for most of their time on Earth? That's right, tribes. Tribes give people a community, an identity, a culture, an "us" to juxtapose to a world of "them." Multiple families working together increases efficiency in all the tasks that life requires. It gives children multiple role models to emulate. It gives parents the opportunity to either get involved and oversee everyone's kids, or let someone else do it so they can relax.

Imagine a home designed for four families instead of one. The children have friends to play with. The moms can coordinate their efforts and have one pair of women cook and look after their kids for a day, while the other two work or have the day off. Dads can coordinate their schedules so at least one has time to coach the soccer team. The moms can drive the kids to school, sports, and social events in large vans, reducing the number of vehicles needed.

Dads can carpool to work if their jobs are near enough. And when they're not working they can hang out in the garage and do projects together, man-bonding while retaining their masculinity. Moms are never bored or alone because they have a friend to share their chores with. Ironing alone is a lonely, boring task. Ironing while gossiping with friends may actually be fun.

Everyone has a community to belong to. And when the interaction gets too much to handle, couples can go on vacation, secure in the knowledge that their children are being looked after by their best friends. Someone is always on hand to take sick kids to the doctor, go to parent-teacher conferences, and make sure the boys don't poke each other's eyes out. Everyone gets to socialize with their peers. Maybe everything is done so efficiently that parents actually have a chance to relax — something that is missing in our modern, fast-paced world.

Conclusion

A win for everyone.

A common theme on ROK is that we want women to be homemakers again because children and society need someone to fill that role. But if we wish to prove to women that we love them, and have their best interests at heart, we cannot send them back to a lonely home that bores them. Instead, we must lure them back into the home with the carrot and not the stick. One way to do that is by making the home a greater social center than the workplace, and voila – most of our societal problems are solved.

Multiple families working together increases efficiency. Having multiple sets of parents around decreases the workload of each individual parent. Letting your best friends co-parent your kids reduces your anxiety that the babysitter isn't giving them the attention and guidance they deserve. Tribal Patriarchy meets all of these needs and more.

It takes a village to raise a child, and we know that public schools are not an adequate substitute for a village. If we want to protect our children from government indoctrination, we parents need help. What better way to address that need than to form a coalition with our closest friends and invite them into our homes, form a tribe, and give our wives and children the support they need and deserve?

Read More: Why Patriarchy Is The Greatest Social System Ever Created

Will Outenphraghen
Weevinbachen is a teacher in Thailand. He wants nothing more than a healthy, loving relationship between the sexes to be restored.

Mattress Girl Emma Sulkowicz Makes A Rape Sex Tape

June 5, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Fresh from her grandstanding during this year's Columbia University graduation ceremony, Emma Sulkowicz has released a gratuitous "rape sex tape" (nsfw). But hold your horses, guys, because the video portrays consensual sex just acted out as if it were a rape. In the manner of attention-seeking we have all grown used to, the eight minute video features Sulkowicz and a man whose face is blurred out staging the same "trauma", for the whole internet, that she refused to go to the police about for months.

The "acting" (it deserves a Razzie Award) starts out as consensual and then becomes rougher as it edges towards the imagined "rape" Sulkowicz really wants us to see. She says it isn't meant to be a reenactment of her (false) rape claim against Paul Nungesser, despite it matching in almost every detail the story she has been aggrandizing, to her economic and social profit, for an eternity.

When the facts don't support you, make art

Emma Sulkowicz refused to assume the "burden" of going to the police for months, but happily carried around the weight of a massive mattress which everyone could see her trudging along with. Go figure.

At the risk of giving Sulkowicz the page views she desperately craves to shore up her borderline personality disorder-fueled self-esteem gap, I urge you to view the video in its entirety. The website Ceci n'est pas un viol ("This is not a rape") includes a convoluted and circular "artist's statement". Apparently Sulkowicz, the woman who chose to video herself having sex (and carried a mattress around ad nauseam before that), is a victim of our objectification when we watch the footage:

> You might be wondering why I've made myself this vulnerable. Look—I want to change the world, and that begins with you, seeing yourself. If you watch this video without my consent, then I hope you reflect on your reasons for objectifying me and participating in my rape, for, in that case, you were the one who couldn't resist the urge to make Ceci N'est Pas Un Viol about what you wanted to make it about: rape.

Our esteemed "friends" at Jezebel are evidently gobsmacked by the video and labeled it "disturbing". They're not criticizing the bizarre video (of course they wouldn't!) but the brief article they released is bereft of the usual fanfare with which feminists have greeted Sulkowicz's "art piece" harassment of the exonerated Paul Nungesser. It is becoming increasingly hard for the likes of Anna Merlan and Jessica Valenti to defend a woman presenting no evidence of rape but unashamedly capitalizing on every opportunity to advance her own material interests.

Show her the money and recognition

Even more so than before, Sulkowicz is appropriating the mantle of a "rape victim" to try and make a highly profitable, eye-catching art career and celebrity profile. She has been a keynote speaker at numerous events, made the covers of magazines and become an “icon” for feminists fighting for poorly-supported rape claims with no evidence, only “he said, she said”. Senator Kirsten Gillibrand, the best friend of those undermining the court system and subverting due process for men on college campuses, took her as a guest of honor to the State of the Union.

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) (left) invited Emma Sulkowicz to the State of the Union in an effort to highlight a bipartisan bill that would force colleges to step up collection of information on sexual assaults and adopt tougher, standardized processes for dealing with sexual assault.

With the seemingly non-artistic Jackie Coakley now eliminated as serious competition for the False Rape Beauty Pageant, Sulkowicz is nonetheless forging ahead, seeking to have her name and appearance carved into the public domain beyond their already mass exposure. This rape sex tape is the second of what is likely to be many “performance pieces” designed to distract attention from the great paucity/non-existence of evidence against Paul Nungesser.

But one big question remains: how can someone who originally didn’t want the “trauma” of a police investigation testing her claims be taken seriously after making glorified rape porn capable of being seen by millions?

What evidence does Emma Sulkowicz actually have against Paul Nungesser?

None. Art is not evidence, even when a mattress-carrying performance is replaced by and morphs into a rape sex tape. The countless feminists and political figures supporting Sulkowicz's false claims, including Senator Gillibrand, are yet to proffer any details that prove Paul Nungesser is guilty of anything other than the non-crime of having sex with an irretrievably unbalanced young woman. An eight minute crime against filmmaking and ode to narcissism will hinder, not improve their ability to diligently argue on her behalf.

[image]
Emma Sulkowicz has become the false rape world's answer to Sydney Leathers and the second scandal involving ex-Congressman and former NYC mayoral candidate Anthony Weiner.

Moreover, a woman claiming she was raped and then getting unwarranted national media coverage through her art does not constitute proof beyond reasonable doubt. This is especially when you consider the slew of suspicious social media exchanges Sulkowicz had with Paul Nungesser in the months after the night she falsely claims she was raped, messages which demonstrate the effusive praise which she lavished on him and the complete lack of any fissure in their relationship. Or, again, her own stated unwillingness to go through the "ordeal" of a speedy police investigation that would have objectively evaluated her claims.

We should not forget, in addition, that Nungesser was exonerated by even the kangaroo court at Columbia University, which used a preponderance of evidence standard. This standard is actually well below the words used to describe it, as the accuser is excused the cross-examination found in (most) courts and there is almost no non-admissibility restrictions for any factors which favor their story.

SJWs need to own their girl Emma

SJWs gave the Emma Sulkowicz false rape story the oxygen it needed to remove any semblance of fact and evidence as objective criteria, like with most modern-day rape allegations. Rather than recognizing the holes in her story, the social media messages which demonstrated she lusted after Nungesser for months following that night, her refusal to pursue an initial police investigation, or the academic and career opportunism that otherwise accompanied her every move, Emma just had to be true. Like Crystal Mangum's assertions about the Duke lacrosse players, or Wanetta Gibson's spiel about Brian Banks, or Jackie Coakley's "pain" at a frat party that never happened.

As Emma continues to fall on her evidence-less sword with this feminist-personality-cult rape sex tape, and jumps further into the abyss of narcissism and borderline personality disorder, the SJWs who have propped her up incessantly must meet their fate, too. And that is the scorn and ridicule of everyone in this world who believes that serious criminal allegations can only be proven through substantive fact and reasoning.

Art is no substitute for the proper and impartial application of the criminal law. This is a lesson Emma Sulkowicz and her supporters are yet to learn.

Read More: Student Accused Of Rape By Emma Sulkowicz To Sue Columbia University

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Timeless Female Abuse Of Love

June 6, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> Love is the triumph of imagination over intelligence. – H. L. Mencken

Mencken's words from "In Defense Of Women" strikes a chord for every awakened man who has understood female nature, and more so about possibly the most overrated (and abused) emotion known to mankind.

Throughout history, women have always been portrayed as the more nurturing, self-sacrificing, idealist and loving gender — while men have been vilified to be on the short end of the stick. Call it social engineering or covert female manipulation, this age old guilt tripping indoctrination has led men to idealizing both love and women to unhealthy heights—to forsake their own intelligence and become victims of an imaginary illusion.

But failure in love shouldn't mean automatic bitterness, for it can lead to realizing that romantic love (even more so today) is transitory and illusionary in nature. But what is that which renders "love" as simply an imaginary illusion?

A man could've tried his best to be the best partner for his woman but to no avail, simply because of the unpredictability and hypocrisy of female nature reveals itself sooner or later in either a relationship or marriage.

This itself has been explored before where we've seen how the Madonna and the whore can be the same woman – and like love, there is no ideal woman. There are no certainties in life except change and the grim reaper, and women are not immune to them. In the end, you cannot control people forever—but you can control how you deal with them and your reactions to the harsh realities of love.

Deconstructing Love

The allure of love has held a powerful pull for humanity for ages (Napoleon Hill even includes it as one of the primary ten stimuli to which the mind responds most freely in "Think And Grow Rich"). Such is its allure that men have often risked everything for the sake of the romantic ideal, the love of a woman.

But in spite of all the relentless blue pill romanticism and social indoctrination throughout ages which paints love as an ideal worth risking life for – while simultaneously pedestalizing women – how it actually affects both men and women in the amoral power game of real life dating, is best expressed by Chinweizu:

> Not only does love act differently"on man and woman; the word itself means quite different things to each. When a woman tells a man "I love you", she means "I want you to feed me, house me, clothe me, fuck me, get me great with child, and take me as your burden until I catch a better slave". .
>
> …In contrast, when a man tells a woman "I love you", he means "I am eager to be your slave, and ready to do everything I can to make you satisfied and happy".
>
> Which is why, when a woman hears a man say to her "I love you", her joy is great, for she understands him to mean that he has been knocked out by her chloroform of romance, and she can safely tie him up with social ropes, tether > him to her nest with legal chains and, while he is still sprawled out in love's delirium, begin to make a toiling jackass out of him. The Kiswahili poets are among the few male pundits who have gotten things right: they specify that it is men who are made lame and tame by love.

Tame and lame, history is testament to this with numerous examples: some men have achieved great heights to please their women, whilst others have actually squandered their identities for the love of a woman which was illusionary to begin with.

How women transform love into an illusion

Ideally, romantic love was primarily composed of lust, loyalty and tolerant understanding. Without lust, love became compassion, the kind you'd feel for others in a non-sexual way. And because lust bore an important influence on love, loyalty became integral to secure sexual fidelity.

But in today's convoluted and permissive societies, this loyalty itself has become meaningless in modern love relationships, hell even marriages. A modern woman can claim to "love" her partner yet still fuck around casually while retaining a prudish social image.

And unsurprisingly some men have actually realized this (either through observational experience or accident) to actually seduce such a woman by dropping the "L" word – for that serves as the exonerating password she wants to hear to casually indulge her own inner slut or relationship whore. One would've encountered women hypocritically justifying "love" as a reason for their selective promiscuity and infidelities/

In this scenario, love—that supposedly "pure" ideal thing—has now become a modern woman's get out of jail free card to be ruthlessly abused to often justify her irresponsibility, stupidity, cheating, sluttiness, or even to have anal! There is no limit to female hypocrisy, and love isn't spared from it too.

Twisted "love" and its power games

The timeless story of Samson highlights how women haven't changed much throughout history and abused love themselves to manipulate men for their own selfish motives, which they often accused men of. Numerous examples like these shatter the blue pill idea that women are the more idealist and morally upright of the two sexes, especially when it comes to love.

While Mencken mentions women are the strategizing realists in the game of love, Chinweizu rather highlights the simpleton ignorant sentimentality of a man in love:

> Man, in his sentimentality, may refuse to acknowledge that the love felt for him by the woman who loves him is, at its core, a slaver's love for her slave.
>
> Those who doubt that should consider a woman's proverbial reaction to her spurned love, or to a mate who deserts her nest. When she cries "seduced and abandoned", her rage is that of a lioness whose intended dinner has run away. When she cries that her husband has deserted her, her fury is that of a slaveholder whose slave has run away.
>
> If he has run off with another woman, her rage at the other woman is I hat of one slaveholder at another slaveholder who has kidnapped' her property. Were men fully conscious of the predatory nature and exploitative purpose of a nesting woman's love for her man, they might be found each day praying: "God save man from the love of woman! " That men do not is a measure of how sentimentality thoroughly beclouds their eyes. – The Anatomy Of Female Power

If love is blind, it is more so for men due to their sentimentality which Chinweizu points out. A man's emotional attachment is the prize what women seek – for that is what secures his slavery. And even if love is an illusion for women too, women are usually much faster to snap out of it due to their realism, and as when it suits them conveniently.

This also highlights the psychological advantage women have over men, ironically given to them by men: keeping in mind the traditional belief that men are the gatekeepers of commitment and love, while women are the gatekeepers of sex. A woman needs to qualify herself first to earn a man's love, so the man who hands his marbles on a platter to her casually is himself to blame.

In this power game, the man who forfeits his advantage of peddling love stands to lose if he instead seeks both love and sex from women, for women will always try to acquire total control.

Conclusion

The truth about love's illusionary nature is bitter and hard to digest for the unitiated man—but for the awakened man this reality is itself liberating, helping him to sidestep one of life's common pitfalls.

Love actually is not a bad thing; but because today it increasingly has become a tool for female manipulation and deception than ever before, its virtues itself have been eroded to render it to nothing but an idealistic illusion for the modern man, even more than for his forefathers.

Read Next: How Women Use Love As An Excuse To Extract A Man's Resources And Deplete His Life Energy

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Why You Need To Become Cary Grant

June 6, 2015 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

It is a guarantee that if you do not espouse the views deemed appropriate by society, government, academia, and the media you will be attacked. Unfortunately, their "politically-approved" views they want you to believe are not based in reality, and exist to advance a narrative or agenda that benefits these select groups of people at the expense of all others.

Naturally, being independent-minded, most people here refuse to believe the lies and instead insist on living a life based in reality, giving said thought-lords the proverbial finger. However, just because you decided to take the moral and correct route, it doesn't change the fact that you will be in for a life-long uphill battle, full of insults, slander, mockery, accusations, and outright lies. For in refusing to conform to what the aforementioned powers-that-be said, you are a threat to them. And so they will do whatever is necessary to silence you.

While their assault will be a wide one, assailing everything from your political beliefs, your religion, your beliefs on family and culture, the most ferocious and focused attacks will be on your beliefs and relations with women. This is only to be expected because no matter how much we may not like it, both men's and women's primary focus in life is the opposite sex. That's the way we've been programmed.

The point is that the majority of flak you're going to catch for daring to adhere to reality, traditionalism, and truth is going to come from your beliefs, thoughts and principles on women. And not only is it going to be the majority of flak, it's going to be the most visceral and ferocious, as you are speaking directly to what has been the primary motivator in all of humankind's existence. You are addressing women at their psychological core.

Sadly, despite the supreme importance of this topic, the attacks you are going to receive are not going to be cogent, logical, reasoned, or empirical. They're going to be quite irrational, unreasonable, and simplistic as they are coming from emotion and a fear one's precious ego might get shattered. And these attacks, pathetically, can be summarized in six simple groups or categories:

1. You Live With Your Mother (Basement Dweller)
2. You're a Loser (Employment)
3. You're Ignorant (Education / intelligence)
4. You're Lonely (Social)
5. You Can't Get Laid (Sexual)
6. Name Calling (Jerk, Nazi, "Ist," etc.)

The problem with these attacks is that they disproportionately affect and are pertinent to younger men. When you are just starting out in life you aren't rich, you haven't fully developed your personality or mental facilities, you are saddled with college and the debt that comes with it, which is all further burdened with the worst economy for young people since the Great Depression.

So what's a man to do?

Enter Cary Grant.

Who is Cary Grant?

Cary Grant was the George Clooney of the 1930's-1960's. Starting as a pretty boy when film was in its infancy days, he aged like the finest of scotches, easily being the most handsome and charming man in Hollywood well into his 60's.

He was so incredibly debonair and polished that when paired with the latest 20-something starlet as his love interest in a film, it wasn't unrealistic to imagine the 62 year old Grant couldn't hit that (and probably was). You, me, and nearly every other reader in the primest of our primes couldn't hold a candle to an aging, gray haired Cary Grant.

And even Cary Grant admitted saying, "Everybody wants to be Cary Grant. Even I want to be Cary Grant" as the actor himself knew he could never live up to his Hollywood persona. In short, it was impossible for anybody to be Cary Grant….and that's precisely what every man has to do – the impossible. We all need to become the Hollywood incarnation of Cary Grant.

"Achieving Grant"

Now, many people will complain that this task is impossible. And certainly the VirginTOW's will claim we're all "pussy-pedestalers" for daring to "waste our lives" improving ourselves for women. However, in becoming the Hollywood version of Cary Grant a great and many benefits come with it, making this arduous task worth it in the end.

The first benefit of "Achieving Grant" is that it immediately repudiates the six standard accusations made against men who insist on traditional values and being men.

You Live With Your Mother – No you don't. You have your own job, spend within your means, and are a truly independent man.

You're A Loser – No you're not, you have a career and purpose in life. You work hard, and you may not be your own boss yet, but you are actively working to achieve that goal. You may not be there at 28, but you will be at 38.

You're Ignorant Or Uneducated – No you're not. = You're actually quite well-read, with a much-better-than-average understanding of economics, politics, history, philosophy and morality. You also actively work to remain so, and never stop your education in these fields.

You're Lonely Or Have No Friends – Again, no you're not. You're not only well-read, but actively pursue interesting hobbies and interests making you a genuinely interesting person. You also hone your skills at being charming, charismatic, and entertaining. People like you, perhaps even gravitate around you—not because you're the "life of the party," but because you have put the effort into being a more interesting person and living a more interesting life than those around you.

You Can't Get Laid Or Have A Small Penis – Well, your penis size is outside of your control. But barring that anomaly that affects less than 1% of men, you hit the gym regularly. You run, you eat right, you diet. You commit to that mandatory life-long part time job of staying in physical shape. You then combine that physique with the courage to approach women and get your ass shot down to the point you nail at least nine women. Why nine? Because that is the average number of sexual partners a man has. You hit 9+ you are in the top 50% of men and therefore can "indeed get laid."

Name Calling – If you commit the effort to live a life that refutes the above five accusations, then being called a "misogynist" or a "loser" or "jerk" or what have you doesn't matter. You won the debate and now your assailant has to resort to name calling because they're 100% wrong about you. You are empirical proof, standing right in front of them that they, their ideology, and their belief system is wrong.

Naturally, turning yourself into the man where the above accusations are just not true takes time. You're not going to be running a business the day after you graduate from college with $50,000 in student loans and a shitty job offer on the table while bench pressing 150% your weight, while also having a detailed knowledge of Austrian economics, while actively pursuing your new-found passion of sky diving.

But if you put your mind to it and eschew day time TV, getting hammered at the bar, and can avoid knocking up a girl, this is all attainable by your mid thirties. And then you can refute these guaranteed, standard accusations with the simplest and most effective argument,

"It's not true."

Finding the confidence

The second advantage that comes with "Achieving Grant" is sanity and confidence.

When I was a bit younger I walked into what was then "The Times Cafe" in Minneapolis. This was my favorite haunt to hang out at because they served good martinis, had a nice dance floor, and 6 out of 7 nights had jazz or salsa.

After a long day at work I went to The Times to get myself a martini and read The Economist. Thankfully, Vic Volare and His Volare Lounge Orchestra was playing which was one of the more danceable and fun bands in the Twin Cities. Coming straight from the office, I was in one of my "power-banker suits" and thought I'd get a little dancing in to supplement my booze and economics.

The first girl said no.

The second said she was "tired."

The third girl participated in a dancing phenomenon where she giggled and pointed to her friend across the table and said, "no you dance with him." Which then resulted in an insulting ping-pong version where the other girls said, "no you" "no you" "tee hee" "no you!" I walked away and I don't think they realized I removed the offer from the table.

The fourth said no, as well as the fifth, to the point that I then decided I would ask every obviously un-spoken-for female at The Times to dance.

After 31 rejections, not one said yes.

To most normal men, they would have taken this personally. Did they stink? Were they ugly? Were their flies open? And they would likely never approach women again (certainly abandon ballroom dancing altogether).

Not me. And I didn't take it personally because I knew better. I "Achieved Grant." I was successfully employed. I made more money than any girl I asked to dance did. I was dressed in a sharp looking suit. I was in shape. Oh, and there was that whole minor thing about being an accomplished ballroom dancer.

But the irony is, despite all the rejection, those 31 girls all turned down what was likely the best offer in terms of a man that they had received all year. And I say that not out of arrogance, but supreme and total confidence. I left not one stone unturned in terms of my own self-improvement and I was hand's down an outstanding catch.

In other words, if you "Achieve Grant" you know for a fact you're the prize to be won. And if you're shot down you have the sanity and knowledge knowing there was nothing wrong with you, but something wrong with them.

The third and final benefit of becoming Cary Grant is you're just going to be a better man. I can certainly appreciate staying in doors, vegging on Grand Theft Auto V, getting hammered, and maybe gaining seven pounds over a gluttonous weekend. And I can certainly understand ignoring women and doing your own thing.

But you become Cary Grant not just because of the sanity and confidence that comes with it, nor the ability to conveniently dismiss criticism from your haters as simply "false." You do it because being an interesting man, pursuing intellectual and interesting things, disciplining yourself through diet and working out, and increasing your wisdom through study and thought makes for a better life, a better mind, and a better man.

You enjoy your life more, you enjoy more important things, and you have life-experiences that the average (and genuine) basement ~~VirginTOW~~ dweller will never have. So while the path to "Cary Grant" is a difficult one, realize you are going to die. You can live a life aiming to be Cary Grant, or one that will be wasted like nearly 98% of most people's lives.

Read More: Mattress Girl Emma Sulkowicz Makes A Rape Sex Tape

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Four Of The Best Episodes Of “The Office”

June 7, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The Office was an American TV show that ran from 2005 to 2013. It was a spin-off of a popular British TV show, also called The Office. The show was centered around the happenings of a mid-range paper company called Dunder Mifflin. It featured an ensemble cast, lead by the iconic character of Michael Scott—the clueless general manager of the company.

While famous for its engaging characters and snappy dialogue, it was also famous for its unique “confessional” style of narrative, with characters giving asides to the cameras. Without further ado, let’s revisit a few of the best episodes:

Diversity Day

“Diversity Day” was an episode from the first season. The first season got mixed reviews—and deservedly so. While it was a very short season, it was fairly uneven and still trying to find its footing. This episode was the best of the bunch.

The episode opens with Michael Scott in hot water with corporate because of a racist joke he told that was very poorly received by his employees. Unwilling to toe the corporate line on race relations in the workplace, Michael schedules his own diversity seminar that goes awry very quickly. The episode ends with the diversity and tolerance seminar going as planned.

This was a very funny episode, showcasing the interesting characters that make up the ensemble cast while keeping the focus on the blunders of Michael Scott. The general annoyances that the characters have with one another—as typical co-workers in a small business—are inflamed by the petulant and tone-deaf behavior of Michael. Like most seminars and consciousness-raising events in corporate life, the diversity day was about dollars and cents—ones that Michael costs the company when he disrupts the workplace.

The Injury

“The Injury” was an episode from the second season, which was by far the best season of the series. Every episode was crisp, fresh and highly entertaining. “The Injury,” in particular, was one of the best episodes.

The episode begins with Michael calling Pam, informing her that he needs a ride to work because he accidentally grilled his foot on a George Foreman grill. In a rush to go pick up Michael, Dwight inadvertently has a collision in the parking lot, giving himself a concussion. The rest of the episode features an aggrieved Michael, childishly nursing his superficial injury, while Dwight eventually has to go to the hospital to get treated for his concussion.

“The Injury” is a hilarious bit of comedy and while not particularly clever, it works because it plays on the extraordinarily immature mentality of Michael, as he expects to be waited on hand and foot because of his injury. Michael’s inability to appreciate his own conduct and Dwight’s injury drives a good bit of the comedy, as does his employees’ amusing treatment of him.

Phyllis’ Wedding

The episode took a slightly different arc than other episodes, as it showed a softer and more sympathetic side of Michael Scott at the end.

The episode is—obviously—about Michael’s salespeople, Phyllis Lapin. In order to get six weeks for her honeymoon, Phyllis decides to include Michael in the wedding party. As expected, it goes disastrously, with Michael eventually getting bounced by Dwight from the party. By the end, Michael inadvertently redeems himself by finding a senile relative of Phyllis’ that had gone missing from the party.

While the episode was certainly funny, it showcases how lonely the lives of men like Michael Scott truly are. For all of his crass showboating and shallow ignorance, Michael is a sympathetic character because of how lonely his existence is. His aborted attempts at connecting with others has left him quite alone, as even the unlikable character of Dwight has a “date” at the wedding, while Michael does not.

Gay Witch Hunt

“Gay Witch Hunt” is the first episode of the third season. It involves Michael accidentally outing one of his employees, an accountant named Oscar. The episode involves Michael’s bumbling attempts deal with this faux pas. The climax of the episode is reached when Michael calls one of his infamous meetings and Michael backs himself into a preposterous situation with Oscar.

One could certainly advance the argument that the episode amounts to little more than the celebration of sexual degeneracy, but the episode is more about Michael’s inability to keep his nose out of the business of others.

When faced with Oscar's homosexuality, Michael takes it upon himself to "help" Oscar, instead of simply moving on. This episode displays the show's sharp acting and hilarious dialogue, without taking a preachy tone to its politically incendiary content.

Read More: What Happened To Coming Of Age Movies For Boys?

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

4 Things I Observed From My Trip To New York City

June 7, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

I went to New York recently for a two night "business" trip. As short as it was, I kept my eyes open to digest as much as I could about the city and its people. Here are a few observations I made:

1. You see the grind in people's eyes

Unlike in Washington DC, you can clearly feel the harsh effects of the city on the people. Based on how expensive it is to live in New York, to have a good life you have to work like a dog with little in the way of breaks for reflection or relaxation. I suspect that a lot of people are living paycheck to paycheck without much in savings, and so are committed to this grind whether they like it or not. The allure of living in New York has essentially captured their body and turned them into a human mule that must never stop laboring and hustling. I observed the same with people in Moscow.

If a New Yorker's income goes up, they invariably increase the standard at which they live to keep up with the Joneses, so it seems that even if you "win" in New York by getting a job that pays at least $150,000 a year, you still lose in the sense that you won't accumulate much in the way of wealth, and will be two or three months away from destitution if you happen to lose your job and have trouble finding a new one.

A lot of people have asked me, "Roosh, how you can play the game for so many years without getting tired of it?" Because my job is not a grind, and chasing pussy will never approach the level of grind of labor. I can stay in the game because my life is mostly free of stress in other areas, meaning I can tolerate the high amounts of nonsense I get from pursuing women for the length of time I have. If you're getting worn down by your job, you will have little leftover for the other grinds that come with a man's ambitious desires.

2. Smartphones are now a integral part of people's lives

While walking around New York, I was paranoid of getting hit by a car, so I looked both ways before crossing streets and generally followed the "Don't Walk" signals. I was shocked to see so many people walking while texting in such an environment. I don't know how often pedestrians get hit in New York, but it seemed like they were putting their lives in danger.

In the cafes I went to, it was a rule that everyone was staring at their iphone or tablet screen, and even in meetings between friends, a person would keep one eye on their friend and one eye on their phone. The smartphone is now a conversational aid, crutch, and prop that must be nearby to show a picture, news article, status update, or map. Conversations with friends have become multimedia presentations. I've railed against smartphones in the past, but they are now too intertwined in the social fiber of America that nothing much can be done about the problem.

A lot of guys are capitalizing on smartphones by mastering dick pic game or using high-tech bots on popular dating apps, but there is no joy for me to use such a device beyond a basic business or communication need, so I accept I will miss out on some sexual benefits from its widespread use.

3. Made men have it best

If you want to live in this city and enjoy it to the fullest, you should already come as a made man with over $300,000 a year in income or a couple million in the bank. Of course you can live in New York for a fraction of that, and find a niche that does give you happiness, but New York allows you to live a regal lifestyle if you have the bankroll.

In the Polish city I'm in, doubling my income would not change my lifestyle one bit, because the city does not have the amenities, Dubai whores, or luxury accommodations that the money could obviously be spent on. The most expensive club cover charge I've found is $13 and a cocktail drink price never passes $10.

If you decide to live in New York, there are two options that await you:

a) Become a part of the grind for a short period. Get a humble apartment, work for the man, count your quarters, and squeeze in some easy bangs. After a year or two, when you realize you've saved no money and have few—if any—deep relationships, go somewhere else to achieve more financial independence and a higher level of social meaning that takes you away from more shallow pursuits.

b) Accumulate further wealth on top of your already high wealth. Let New York live for you instead of you living for New York. Live like a modern king with a lifestyle that your ancestors couldn't even dream of.

While my income is high enough to live in New York on favorable terms, my financial cushion would be shrunk to such a degree that I wouldn't be entirely comfortable.

4. The girls are way better than in Washington DC

My sample size is tiny due to the shortness of my trip (about 10 approaches), but the positive reactions I got from those 10 in an eight-hour period surpass near all the approaches I did in Washington DC for an entire month when I visited last year.

The girls I approached were insanely receptive and genuinely wanted to talk to me. We say in these parts that girls have a lot of options thanks to internet dating while losing the ability to have a conversation if we approach them, but it seems that in New York the dating market is exceptional in some ways due to local demographic conditions and the fact that straight man act effeminate. The girls seem to be craving a confident guy who doesn't put them on the pedestal and has internationally renowned clown banter.

Not a single girl blew me out, insulted me, or hit me with a feminist talking point. Only one girl looked at her iphone during the conversation. They asked me plenty of personal questions. They did way more talking and helped move the communication forward. One 22-year-old girl approached me in the bar and let me escort her away from her friends for a sloppy make-out session (to be young again!). Another girl gave me her number and then sent me a text asking for a date the next night. The interactions stalled, sadly, when girls found out I was a tourist and staying in a hotel, especially since a couple of those girls would have needed a date to take the intimacy further.

Again, the sample size is small, so no grand conclusions can be made, but if I can duplicate this reception just once in a while, that means girls in New York like me more than girls in Poland. In Poland, a huge number of girls are already in a serious relationship and aren't as eager to upgrade, so most of my approaches stall for that reason alone. In New York, it seemed that every girl I talked to was sexually available from not being in a serious relationship.

This may be my ego talking, but I'm confident I can get both higher quality and quantity in New York than in my current city in Poland. This isn't due to just me but the local conditions where New York girls are ready for sex with a mature man who doesn't act like a fag. It was also interesting to note that girls give quite a bit of eye contact, possibly just as much as in Poland.

Upon returning to Poland, I did a batch of ten approaches and had lower results than the ten in New York. One girl in Poland even rolled her eyes at me, a harsh response that a New York girl did not once give. Poland was amazing for me in 2011, but it's clear that the tide has turned, and the benefit it offers for me has become mostly financial.

Is Repatriation Now On The Table?

It's interesting to note that one of the reasons I left the USA is to get a better standard of woman, but it seems that I may have passed a point where I can now do better in New York than abroad. My years of international experience has possibly made me a more attractive catch back in the States. I would have to stay much longer to be sure, but the idea of living in a Western city like New York wouldn't be a nightmare scenario like in the past.

I calculated that I would need at least $6,000 a month cash to transfer my current lifestyle from Poland to New York, which is four times what I'm currently spending now. Even with that amount, I'd still have to watch my budget and be careful about buying too many rounds of drinks for my friends when I'm in a nice bar and having fun, unlike in Poland where I can make it rain all night without any concern. I would receive two main immediate benefits if I lived in New York: (1) unlimited options for entertainment and easy fornication, and (2) a large social circle of male peers.

The second reason appeals the most to me, but such friendships will invariably entail late nights out, excessive alcohol use, and chasing women. I wonder if it's a good idea to slip back into that lifestyle, one that I already did before. At nearly 36 years of age, will pursuing more notches and going out to bars three times a week really give me more in life than focusing on my work and being alone in a tame Polish city? As you know, sequels are never better than the original, so I wonder how quickly I'd get tired of it.

I believe New York would cause me to regress into a pursuit of hedonistic delights of the flesh and drink without furthering my development as a man. While my current Polish city is not a village by any means (the metro area has a population of 1 million), it's harder to lose focus here than in New York, and I'm afraid that my horny constitution is not yet strong enough to resist the unlimited pleasures that New York would offer me.

I know more than anyone that a city or country can change rapidly. As I've shared recently, Polish culture is currently on the decline along with most other parts of Eastern Europe. It may happen within 2-5 years where Poland degrades to such a point that I must move to another area of the world. Eastern Europe may merely be a way station for a destination I do not yet know. I'm not sure what the future will hold, but this is the first year since I left the States over five years ago that the idea of moving back wouldn't fill me with reluctance and dread.

If I ever do move to New York, and it's not a temporary plan, you can interpret that as me giving up on all notion of ever having a family of my own. It means I must have decided that during the period of humanity I happen to exist in, a life of expensive pleasure is the best outcome to pursue.

Read Next: 16 Things I Realized About Washington DC In 2014

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Don’t Feminists Call Kate Upton A Misogynist?

June 7, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

According to Forbes‘ 2014 figures, Kate Upton made a hefty $7 million for selling and objectifying her body as one of the world’s most famous models. She is just one more high-profile representative of the literally tens of thousands of women around the world who engage in similar work for substantial remuneration.

Yet feminists blame male desire and the overall “patriarchy” for the “sexism” of the modelling industry. Upton and her colleagues are never excoriated for why they happily pose for a camera and make such a “misogynist” enterprise possible.

I am not against fashion modeling, bikini modeling, or pornography. There is also nothing inherently wrong with a woman making serious money from her sexual appeal, provided we all realize that such an appearance is artificially enhanced through cosmetics and technology. But serious, cutting questions need to be asked here.

Feminism has a massive problem with letting women off for their deliberate engagement with an industry it describes as inveterately sexist and demeaning. This is not because feminists like these women; deep down, they hate them profusely. Changing the focus to the models, however, forces feminism to concede that women, far from being patriarchally oppressed automatons, willingly engage in putting a price on their bodies. They enjoy the attention, adoration and lifestyle, not to mention the money it brings them.

Fundamentally, as a feminist, you can’t blame an invisible patriarchy or men in general for the “woes” of the world when women have a choice and then make that choice, like with modelling in skimpy or no attire, or selling themselves on the street instead of taking a waitressing job. This is not Fantine in Les Misérables. These women in the fashion and prostitution "professions" are not going to starve, or have their children starve, if they don't take these jobs.

The only natural conclusion

Like Upton's character in The Three Stooges, feminists want to portray women selling or objectifying their bodies as victims of patriarchal conditioning or force. When they can't argue it the way they want, they just ignore the significant choice these women have.

If we take feminist "logic" to its proper end, Kate Upton is one of the biggest disseminators of institutionalized misogyny in the world. More people see Upton's top-heavy but otherwise slim body splashed upon paper or online than know Roosh's neomasculinity philosophy, let alone peruse my less well-known words in a particular week on ROK. So where are the attacks on her? Or on Gisele Bündchen, Heidi Klum, and Adriana Lima?

Blaming anorexia on the patriarchy's obsession with female weight control, feminists? Well, what about Kate Upton? She parades her body incessantly and is the beneficiary of constant digital alteration to make her appear "perfect." She also wears prodigious amounts of make-up, which gives other women an additional reason to believe the illusion and that they can never meet her standards of beauty.

So who's subtly encouraging these girls to pray in front of the porcelain goddess in a bid to lose an extra pound or two in vomit? The average man who buys the $8 magazine or the woman, like Kate Upton, who makes the image on the front cover possible?

Let's be clear here, Kate Upton is merely a surrogate, albeit perhaps the most famous one at the moment, for the wider body of women who are even more culpable for what feminists hate than the men purchasing print media or watching a TV program. It takes hundreds of thousands of men to admire what just one Kate Upton does, remember.

If they blame women, the smokescreen disappears

[image]
The free ride Upton and others get from feminism is unsurprising. The multimillionaire woman who takes her clothes off is always less at fault than the average man earning $35,000 who masturbates over a picture.

We need to dispel the notion that feminists are not aware of their profound internal contradictions. They are. But the decision to blame normal male sexual desire and forget the female collaborators, like swimsuit models and pornographic actresses, is a political one. Leaving the women out allows feminists to spin the overarching narrative that whatever they do not like is either solely because of men or helped by women who couldn't possibly know better and are therefore spectacularly blameless.

The best way to clear a room filled with a putrid stench is to open the window (and door). Ironically, by abrogating all female responsibility for the selling of the female body, feminists are infantilizing women one hundred times more than what the manosphere has ever been accused of.

Whereas neomasculine men acknowledge a woman's responsibility for showing her cleavage or spreading her legs, those opposing us seek to deny that women have the capacity in their cerebral cortexes to take such simple actions.

Just another day on ROK

Next time you see Kate Upton's breasts accosting you from a newsstand or Sports Illustrated (let's just hope you're reading it for the athletes), reflect on what I've written here. Apply it to the rest of your life, your experiences, actions and those of others. You will always find not just a kernel of truth but a whole field filled with it.

Men and women are all consensual participants in the sexual marketplace, including where it spills over into the work of multibillion-dollar industries. This is especially so for the only ones (modelling and pornography) where women routinely earn more than men.

There is a limit to what obfuscation and tangential paths can achieve for feminists. If you pick up one end of the stick, you're picking up the other end, too. The only fair way for SJWs to attack male sexual desire is to vilify the females who choose to satisfy it. And since the birth of time, women like Kate Upton have been fulfilling that role with their eyes completely open to what they are doing.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How To Become A Better Misogynist

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

North Korean Refugees Are A Study In Female (Dis)loyalty

June 8, 2015 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

It’s a pretty common theme around ROK that when the going gets tough: the women start quitting. Many of the writers here—perhaps myself more than others—try to hammer home the point that doing your due diligence means everything when considering any sort of romantic relationships with the opposite sex.

You are not allowed to feel excitement, you are not allowed to feel comfortable, and you’re certainly not allowed to feel love. The second you start to feel those things for a woman—or even worse, express those emotions to her at the wrong time—then it’s going to be over before you know it.

A man’s approach to dating in the present-day climate must be very logical and clinical. Any sort of emotions that one can drum up for a woman must be kept at bay, and only released in small measured doses once certain benchmarks have been met by the woman in question.

Searching for loyalty

If you do happen to stumble upon one that deserves a little more attention beyond a good hard dicking, then one of the benchmarks you're going to be looking for is loyalty. Loyalty is tough—trust me, I know. I did it for five years with a woman throughout my late teens and early twenties, and I had plenty of opportunities to throw down some pecker on a few willing broads. However, when it was all said and done, it wasn't me that checked out of the relationship and went astray.

I was cheated on while working the first flying job that routinely kept me away from home. My ex made the assumption that I was cheating on her all the time while I was off working, which couldn't have been further from the truth. She also strongly discouraged me from pursuing a career as a pilot in the first place.

I, of course, was of the opinion that she could go fuck herself if she thought that she was going to crush my dreams and aspirations—dreams and aspirations that, had she not screwed up, would have paid off for her in a major way in the long run. I also wouldn't bend to her demands that I "put a ring on it," considering how broke and unready we were for that at the time.

The takeaway from that relationship and the consequent suffering I endured was that I wasn't discerning with my choice in a partner. I was more of an idealist than a realist. I've always had natural charisma, wit, humor and game—those are the only reasons I managed to keep her around for so long.

It wasn't her fault that she cheated on me—it was my fault for getting wrapped up with a low-life piece of shit in the first place. I thought I was special: I'm not, and neither are you.

Now, the question is: Where are the loyal women? Where can a decent man find a woman that can meet the reasonable standard of playing with his cock, and his cock alone? Are they abroad? Are there pockets of them hiding somewhere in America? Perhaps the answer lies in a country where none of us can visit to find out.

The Democratic People's Republic Of Korea

When the majority of us think of North Korea, we probably think of shitty haircuts, famines, nuclear weapons programs, and parades showcasing antiquated military equipment being filmed on 30-year-old camcorders. But there's a whole culture there that extends beyond just the typical stuff that our media wants us to see. So, if we dig a little bit, we can learn quite a bit about the place.

As I'm sure most readers are aware, the North Korean government structure is communist and ruled in a totalitarian fashion by the Kim Dynasty. If there's one place on earth that most closely reflects the premise of Orwell's 1984—it's North Korea. It wouldn't be the least bit surprising to learn that Kim Il-Sung read the book at some point in his life, and did not consume it as the stroll down dystopia lane it was intended to be, but more as a manual or handbook on how to rule and build a nation.

Religion is strictly outlawed throughout the country, with Christians being at the top of the Kim's shit-list. However, Confucianism is very important to the culture of North Korea, and to the entire region in general. Kim Il-Sung's Juche Ideology, which is taught to all school children and reinforced throughout one's entire life, derives many of its tenets from Confucianism and is a fundamental part of North Korea's brainwashing propaganda.

What is of primary importance for the purposes of this article are the Confucian principles circling around the family structure. Here's an excerpt from the Wikipedia article on the subject, just to give the unitiated a little background:

> Social harmony results in part from every individual knowing his or her place in the natural order, and playing his or her part well. When Duke Jing of Qi asked about government, by which he meant proper administration so as to bring social harmony, Confucius replied:
>
> There is government, when the prince is prince, and the minister is minister; when the father is father, and the son is son. (Analects XII, 11, trans. Legge)
>
> Particular duties arise from one's particular situation in relation to others. The individual stands simultaneously in several different relationships with different people: as a junior in relation to parents and elders, and as a senior in relation to younger siblings, students, and others. While juniors are considered in Confucianism to owe their seniors reverence, seniors also have duties of benevolence and concern toward juniors. The same is true with the husband and wife relationship where the husband needs to show benevolence towards his wife and the wife needs to respect the husband in return. This theme of mutuality still exists in East Asian cultures even to this day.

Unlike the Cultural Marxists of the West, the true Marxists of North Korea hold firm to traditional values. It's simply embedded into the culture, and it's not going anywhere—regardless of who's in charge.

It’s illegal in North Korea for men and women to co-habitate prior to marriage, and there is little to no concept of dating there. Many marriages are set up through agencies—this is to help single men and women find mates in their respective social class (there are three primary songbun classes, and roughly 50 subsets of those classes).

If a woman marries a man of lesser social standing than herself, then she will have to assume his lower status in the hierarchy—and we all know women ain’t gonna to let that shit happen.

Divorces are difficult to obtain. “I’m not happy” is not an acceptable reason for divorce in the DPRK. Valid reasons include infertility and adultery, and even under those circumstances, one’s reputation could be tarnished and their advancement opportunities hindered in other aspects of life should they choose to divorce.

The divorce process is also very time consuming (often lasting for years), with the desired result not always coming to fruition—even with legitimate reasons like those listed above.

Military conscription, which is compulsory for all men and selective women, lasts for a period of 10 years in the Korean People’s Army and up to five years in the other branches. Romantic relationships are forbidden for soldiers during their military service—including marriage.

Most guys don’t even get laid for the first time until they’re in their mid-twenties, and that’s with their wives.The government controls all aspects of its citizens’ lives. Family values are not something that is just glossed over in North Korea—it’s shoved down their throats from the time they’re old enough to comprehend it. This makes the next data point all the more interesting.

The Defectors

South Korea provides asylum to any and all DPRK defectors. It’s impossible for a defector to cross the Korean Demilitarized Zone at the north-south border, so defectors cross over the Yalu river and into China. The normal route is to travel southwest through China, down through Laos, and into Thailand where defectors then seek asylum at the South Korean embassy in Bangkok. Another route is to go through Mongolia, though this is less common.

The South Korean government provides its new citizens with training on how to succeed and adapt to their new lives. They provide them with any necessary medical care and fix their teeth. They then train them on the basics of living in a capitalist society—teaching them how to open bank accounts, how to drive a car, and how to run errands etc.

Newcomers are then provided with an apartment and spending cash to get their new lives started. From start to finish the process that lasts for roughly six months, and an investment in the mid five-figures is expended by the South Korean government.

South Korea keeps records of all defectors from the North, and, as it stands now, of the roughly 30,000 that have made the journey, seventy percent of them are women. There are estimates that North Koreans numbering in the hundreds of thousands are living illegally in China as well. What’s the sex of the overwhelming majority of those illegals, with estimates ranging between seventy-five to ninety percent? You guessed it: women.

Why is this important? Well, this where things get a bit ugly.

Punishment By Lineage

The DPRK has a system known as yeonjwaje, or three generations of punishment. This means that when a crime is committed, especially one political in nature, the perpetrator isn't the only one to be punished—the family must atone for the sins of the wrongdoer as well.

For example, if I was to commit what is classified as a political crime in North Korea—such as owning a Bible, possessing DVDs of American films, or even tuning into a South Korean radio station—then my grandparents, parents, and siblings would also be punished for my conduct.

And what does that punishment consist of? Well, like any good Stalinist regime, North Korea has a system of kyohwaso (re-education camps) and kwaliso (political prisons). The kyohwaso system for re-education focuses on reforming recidivists that the state deems remediable. Prisoners sent through the kyohwaso system are generally released after a few years of thorough re-education through labor, showing some love to the Supreme Leader, and taking a few good ass-kickings along the way just for good measure.

The kwaliso concentration camps for political prisoners are a different animal. These camps fall into one of two categories: total control zones for the actual offenders, and revolutionary zones for the families of the offenders. Camps like kwaliso No. 14 Internment Camp at Kaechon, or No. 22 at Hoeryong, are examples of total control zones. Kwaliso No. 18 at Pukchang would be an example of a revolutionary zone camp. The difference between the two styles of kwaliso boils down to who controls the camps and the eligibility of release.

The typical prison system of North Korea operates the revolutionary zone camps, and they tend to be a little more lenient (that's not saying much), prisoners may also be released from the revolutionary zones after time served (or not, depending on circumstances). The total control zone camps, however, are ran by the regimes secret police force: the Bowibu.

These camps are completely isolated from the outside world, and the Bowibu guards of the total control zone camps are trained that inmates are enemies of the state, and, therefore, no longer human beings. The guards are given full authority to beat, torture, and execute inmates for any reason they see fit. The typical life of a prisoner in one these camps consists of periodic torture, routine beatings, systematic starvation, and seven day workweeks lasting 16 hours a day in one of the camps' factories, mines, or agriculture fields.

Sketches from inmates who were able to escape.

Prisoners are never released from total control zone camps: they are worked to death, starved to death, or die from a myriad of diseases. Political prisoners also make up the majority of the workforce used to build the regime's underground nuclear research and development facilities—they're the perfect candidates, seeing that dead people can't share secrets.

When one defects from North Korea: they are considered a traitor and their crime is political in nature. So guess who gets to carry the burden for those who choose to leave the country? The remaining family members is the answer.

Life in North Korea is not easy: it's a total shithole, and no one would ever dispute that fact. But one can't help but notice that—by an overwhelming amount—it's women who make the decision to jump ship and leave the country. It's women, at a rate of three or four to one, who are leaving their families vulnerable to perish in the world's shittiest of circumstances.

These women cannot claim ignorance either: everyone in North Korea is at least aware of the existence of the internment camps, and they are certainly aware of yeonjwaje. Citizens refer to those sent to the camps as, "The people who are sent to the mountains," so these women know what lies in store for their families when they make the decision to cross the Yalu and into China.

A Man's Domain

This is where the loyalty of men shines through and shows that we are the true vanguards of virtue. I love my father. I'm very close to him and our relationship has transcended past that of a father son-relationship and into one of deep friendship. During a recent conversation I even joked with him, “Pop, couldn’t you have at least gotten drunk and beat the shit out of me a couple times when I was a kid, or at least told me that I would never amount to anything?”

We both laughed, but in a strange way, I was being somewhat serious. He’s always been there for me. He’s been so good to me, to my mother, and to our entire family that I almost wish he was a worse father, because it’s going to completely devastate me when he dies.

If I knew that my actions would somehow result in my father being beaten, tortured, and worked to death like a fucking rented mule; that he and my mother would be buried in a mass, unmarked grave on the side of a mountain along with all of the other “unpersons”; that their lives would be less valuable than that of a farm animal—then I would never be able live with myself.

Being hungry and on the precipice of death due to starvation would be terrible, and that is a harsh reality for many North Korean citizens outside of Pyongyang. However, would eating a hot bowl of kimchi in a perfectly air conditioned Seoul restaurant taste very good knowing that your relatives were taking beatings and eating raw rats to stave off pellagra just a few hundred miles north?

And worse yet, they’re in that situation all because of you? Would a full stomach be worth it? Would you leave all of your loved ones behind to rot just to save your own fucking skin? Regardless of how close you are to your family, could you, as a man, live with yourself?

It would seem that women are be able to answer “yes” to those question with much more ease. Not through words, of course. Women say shit that sounds good all the time—they can talk a good game with the best of them. However, if it really came down to it and the chips were down; when words meant nothing and actions meant everything, would a woman really be there in the end?

Could you count on a woman to fall on her sword for honor, for family, and for love? Could you count on a woman to be there for you, and only you? I certainly wouldn’t bet my life on it. Hell, I can’t even find a woman who knows how to fucking cook, never mind all of that other shit like honor.

It probably comes as little surprise that the male defectors suffer from depression in greater numbers and have a much more difficult time adjusting to their new lives in the South when compared to their female counterparts. It makes sense: they carry guilt, shame, and worry. Women are able to cope with their decisions much better than men.

In other words, women have the ability convince themselves that their own selfish decisions were the right move to make. A man cannot hide from the truth, it’s always there and he's always aware of its presence. A man's conscience can and will eat him alive—there can be no solace for the man who betrays his own.

In Closing

One can't help but notice that the percentage of female North Korean defectors and the percentage of divorces being filed by women in America is roughly the same number: seventy percent. Granted, some women in both situations will have legitimate reasons for doing what they do (the Koreans more so, certainly).

Some of these North Korean women have no families, perhaps they were orphaned or lost their loved ones to famine; or they were even encouraged by the men in their families to pursue a better life, even if that meant certain death for those men. They had nothing to lose and everything to gain by defecting. Some women in America undoubtedly get divorced for legitimate reasons as well, and no one would ever fault them for that.

But the vast majority of these women are just quitters who are thinking of no one but themselves: everyone else be damned, "I gotta get mine," and whoever is standing in my way is little more than collateral damage; merely a drop in the old bucket. This is the prevailing attitude, in a nutshell.

When we take into account how conservative North Korean society is; when we take into account that Confucianism is a fundamental part of life there; and when we take into account that loyalty to the system, to the state, and to the family is drilled into the minds of these women perpetually from birth—yet they are the overwhelming majority who say fuck it and hit the road, then I think that's something we have to consider quite heavily. We are observing female nature in its purest form.

Now, take that female nature and remove all of the traditionalism and replace it with consumerism, selfishness, and girl power—then team that up with the female tendency to always follow the crowd, and it really goes without saying that things around the U.S. start to look pretty fucking scary.

So, are there loyal women out there? Certainly—my mother is a loyal woman, she has been with my father for well over 30 years, and she's not going anywhere. But the fact of the matter is that finding loyalty in a woman is going to be a very arduous task—especially in this day in age. You're going to have to search through a thousand spoons to find a knife, there is no other option.

The American woman I dedicated five years of my life to wouldn't have made it past a brief fuck-buddy arrangement nowadays. But I was forced to learn things the hard way, and I'm a much better man for it. I was a dumbass at the time, and I don't want other guys to make the same mistake I did.

Many years have passed since that relationship ended, and dozens of women have come and gone since my ex was permanently kicked out of my life. And these other women—save two from abroad—have done nothing more than to reinforce everything I know.

As far as the ones beyond our borders are concerned—they're better, but only just. You definitely need to be on your toes and know exactly what you're looking for when you're out there searching. The lesson to be learned is this: you can only trust the average woman about as far as you can throw her, and considering how fucking fat the average woman is nowadays—that's not very God damn far.

Gentlemen, we can always count on women to be women—we must accept that and live with it. However, while women will always be women: men can always be men, too. In his memoir, The Aquariums of Pyongyang, DPRK defector Kang Chol-hwon—who, thanks to his grandmother, spent 10 years in revolutionary zone camp No. 15 at Yodok, and was imprisoned there starting from the age of nine—made the following observation about a particular inmate at the camp:

> Yet love endured, in spite of everything. It even had its heroes, like the thirty-year-old fellow who arrived at the camp in 1986. He was a good-looking man, and well built, too. According to numbers floating around camp, he had been intimate with at least twenty-eight different women. Success came in spite of, or maybe because of, his reputation as a Don Juan. His pleasure did come at a price, however, for his conquests cost him three trips to the sweatbox, each lasting three months. No prisoner had ever survived so many repeated stints, but he got out safe and sound every time, on his feet and able to walk without help, as though nothing much had happened. We called him the man of steel. His hardiness and sexual prowess made him one of Yodok's most celebrated and honored prisoners. Even the security agents were impressed and treated him with a certain deference.

Be the man of steel.

Read More: Never Fully Give A Woman Your Loyalty

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

The Ethical Principles Of Neomasculinity

June 8, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Ethics is a distinct branch of philosophy. It proposes to address the questions that trouble all of us as we go about our lives: what is the best life, and how can it be lived? What is wisdom? What is virtue? What is the best way to find happiness and fulfillment in life?

The discussions that Roosh and I have had on these matters have illuminated us both, and perhaps left us more perplexed than ever. Every question prompts a hundred answers, and every answer branches off into a labyrinth of yet more interconnected lines of inquiry.

Is there any way to make sense of this chaos of conflicting and complementary principles? I have tried to narrow our list of ethical candidates down to those which seem to have had the most longevity in the life of man. Durability in history counts for much. The river of ideas consigns some to the shoreline, and others to the main current.

We claim here no original system—since there is nothing new except arrangement—but instead wish to extract the best of the existing systems. The originality lies here not in the ideas themselves, but in the packaging, exposition, and presentation of those ideas to a new generation as an antidote to the ills of the present age.

We believe the inclusion of a principle on our list here is supported by a careful study of the world's major religions and philosophical systems. And yet we wish to prune the tree's branches, while trying to avoid doing violence to the tree itself. The specialist will find this list to be woefully short and deficient, and the casual reader will find it to be tiresomely long. Yet every journey must begin with some steps forward.

In this spirit, and with these preliminary cautions in mind, we hazard the following list of neomasculine ethical principles:

1. Virtue is to be found in the balanced operation of the bodily faculties, governed by rational thought.

2. Starting a family is a positive good if it serves as a net benefit to man, rather than a burden. For as Francis Bacon says, “Wives are young men’s mistresses, companions for middle age, and old men’s nurses.” Healthy societies are grounded on a stable family unit; and the decay of the latter invites the collapse of the former.

3. Change is the essence of the operation of the universe: things grow, mature, decay, and die. We must make use of the limited time we have here.

4. A soul exists in every man, and is man’s intangible essence of character. Soul does not exist without the body; their mutual health must be a primary concern. Both body and soul must be cultivated and nurtured as part of our program of development.

5. The gaining of wisdom does not consist only in reading books about wisdom; it lies in the training of the body and mind as a harmonious unit towards virtuous goals. It also lies in the pursuit of direct experience with hardships. Struggle is the mother of wisdom. Struggle brings the lessons of wisdom to fruition. The pursuit of wisdom is a continual process that lasts a lifetime, and will end only in death.

6. The pursuit of solitude for its own sake is to be avoided. Man is a social animal, and must avoid the timid extreme of retreating into a protected enclave. Wisdom consists not in avoiding the responsibilities and challenges of the world, but in confronting and overcoming them.

7. A man should treat his brother has he himself should wish to be treated. A man must cultivate the bonds of fraternal affection with his fellows. The modern ethic of individualism and selfishness is socially destructive, and must give way to a more communitarian ethic. No man is an island unto himself; he is part of a group and must consider the good of his fellows along with that of himself.

8. The good man will accept as part of life all of the vicissitudes of fate: loss, failure, defeat, pain, and even death. He accepts all this, yet strives to transcend the pain of his earthly existence by aspiring to higher spiritual truths. Endurance of hardship must be a cornerstone of our belief system.

9. We cannot know all things in Nature. There is hidden wisdom in our earthly suffering that we must try to turn to our advantage.

10. We should examine our consciences regularly to see if we are advancing our ideals, and living up to them.

11. We must cultivate our spiritual side. Philosophy without some form of spirituality is a dark and empty thing.

12. Knowledge of the world comes from two sources: from the senses, and from divine illumination (i.e., an intuitive perception of the Divine Essence). Training in bodily health will improve our sense perceptions, and our knowledge of the physical world. Training in spiritual exercises (contemplative or meditative thought) will advance our spiritual development.

13. All of life, and all of physical reality, is the dynamic movement of matter. Creation and destruction are around us constantly. We are an essential part of this process. The universe, and apparently we ourselves, are likely to live through numerous cycles of birth, destruction, and rebirth. We find, for example, this idea in the Hindu concept of the atman (individual soul) being re-absorbed into the world soul (brahman) on death; and the poet Virgil, in his Fourth Eclogue, prophesized that history would repeat itself continuously.

14. Social morality must be based on moral codes that have stood the test of time. Moral codes, whether they come from religion or philosophy, are essential to social cohesion. Moral codes keep the baser instincts of man in check, and codify biologic and social principles that have proven valid for thousands of years of history.

15. We reject fatalism and the idea that things are preordained. Every man must make his own choices, and live by those choices. Free will is an essential part of our philosophy. Positive action, rather than passivity born of fatalism, is our preference. Man's actions, or inactions, can be decisive in historical events. The individual personality is a determining factor in history. Men make and shape history, more than unseen, nameless forces.

16. The definition of "goodness" for man lies in this: the cooperation with Nature, rather than the vain pursuit of sensual pleasure. We must, therefore, avoid a surfeit of vice. At the same time, we should also avoid the danger of slipping into asceticism, or a withdrawal from the vigorous responsibilities of life.

We encourage readers to make their own modifications and adjustments to these naturally flexible principles, while keeping faith with their general spirit. Our purpose is to arrive at those principles that have stood the test of time, and that complement the principles of neomasculinity as described in our earlier articles.

Read More: Importance Of Cultivating A Killer Instinct

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

4 Tips To Make Moving To A New City A Lot Easier

June 8, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

I've spent the better part of the past year on the road in some form or another. Almost a year ago, I relocated to the Philippines, and upon returning to the States, I spent most of the next few months shuttling between New York City, Chicago, Cleveland, upstate New York and a few other places. As of right now, I'm living in Chicago, spending my free time shoving furniture up the four flights of stairs to my shiny new apartment.

This move has been by far the most stressful, since I'm relocating here semi-permanently (unlike with the Philippines) and I don't have a car or know anyone within the city who has a car. While I have a few good friends in Chicago, I don't have a well-developed network, unlike the places I've moved to before. I'm also too old for the hipster ruin lifestyle. I like being able to shower every day and sleep indoors.

While traveling is romanticized by both idiot college dilettantes and cubicle drones in this part of the Internet, the reality is that moving around a lot takes a toll in just about every fashion: mentally, emotionally, financially, socially. I'm not against traveling, but I also don't want men reading my articles and thinking that the life of a "digital nomad" is all sunshine and blowjobs. Here are some tips that will help you weather the storm of moving.

1. Pack light

What do you need to bring when you move to a third-world country? I assume half of you are thinking I brought an entire house worth of crap with me to the Philippines. In fact, I only brought one little suitcase that was small enough to stash in the plane's overhead compartment and a computer bag. That's it. If I couldn't fit it in either bag, I left it home.

As trite as it sounds, the things you own will end up owning you. The more stuff you have, the bigger a pain it'll be to move from place to place. From having to keep track of it when you hit the road to having to pay to transport it (either in gas for your car, moving vans, or checked baggage on planes) to freaking out over forgetting something, all having a lot of stuff does is create headaches.

Take my advice and just dump most of your crap. You don't need appliances, towels, wine glasses or any of that junk; you can buy new necessities when you get to where you're going. For example, when I moved to Davao last July, I ended up having to furnish my apartment with towels, silverware and other necessities that I had to throw out when I left for Manila. With this Chicago move, I only added one bag to the two above: a checked suitcase that contained my book collection. And even that was probably too much to bring.

Travel light, take only what you need, and watch your worries fade away.

2. Have a good friend (or two)

While lacking a strong network is definitely a problem when you move, sometimes you don't need a network so much as you need one or two solid guys who have your back. For example, when I relocated to Chicago, I was almost immediately able to rent a room from one of my friends, saving me from the ignominy of sublets and Airbnb rentals. From there, I was able to find my own place unburdened by having to talk to realtors from a whole time zone away.

While you don't need to have a million friends in a city in order to make it there, you need to have somebody. When I lived in Davao and Manila, I had a few readers living in both cities who were able to help me adjust to the local culture. Even if you can handle basic living issues (finding an apartment, moving furniture etc.) on your own, you need friends in order to fulfill your basic need for social interaction.

3. It's better to go without than to overpay (in some cases)

As I write this, I've just moved into my new apartment and the only furniture I have is a bed, a nightstand and a dresser… and the only reason I have the dresser is because someone else in the building threw it out. I'm picking up a desk and a couch tomorrow, and I'm currently in the market for a coffee table and dining table, but I haven't found any good Craigslist deals yet.

I could go to the store, buy a bunch of furniture and have it delivered, but I'd also be spending three times as much as I would if I just waited. Additionally, if I have to move out, I won't even come close to recouping my investment when I sell my old stuff on Craigslist. Ultimately, I can go without a coffee table for a few days or whenever I find a good deal.

While you obviously don't want to cut corners on necessities, blowing money on new furniture is completely unnecessary and a waste of your funds. If you pay attention to Craigslist and keep on the lookout for deals, you can get the necessities of life at a fraction of the cost. For example, I paid just $10 for my couch.

4. Don't rush it

The very act of moving is stressful for obvious reasons. Human beings were not meant to spend their entire lives going from point A to point B in a short period of time; indeed, keeping that lifestyle up requires a degree of psychological isolation that most people can't manage. If you're going abroad, you also have to deal with culture shock, which will take an additional toll on your psyche.

My advice is to just slow down and don't try to overwork yourself. Don't rush anything, whether it's buying furniture or signing a lease, and throttle back on other stressful activities to keep yourself from going insane. For example, my writing output both here and at my blog has gone down in the past month, because if I tried to keep writing while juggling all these balls, I'd probably have a nervous breakdown.

Ultimately, moving or traveling abroad is going to tax you mentally, physically and emotionally. It's not a decision you should make lightly, but if you approach traveling with the right mindset, you can minimize the negative effects and maximize the positive ones.

Read More: Is It Easier To Get Laid In Poor Countries?

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Timeless Truths About Game From My Weekend In Vegas

June 9, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Last weekend I took a much needed trip to Las Vegas to blow off some steam with a couple of buddies I've known for the better part of two decades. It was a weekend to remember for sure, but I'd be remiss if I didn't share the crimson capsule crusades that ensued the minute I landed in Sin City.

The 2015 version of the Vegas Swat Team was as follows:

"Paul" is a tall, good looking dude I've known since my college days. I mentioned him near the end of this article. He's a stone cold assassin and red pill to the core.

"Doug" is a good friend of Paul's whom I'd never met before this trip. Paul told me about some of the red pill knowledge Doug had inadvertently dropped in the past so I knew he'd be a solid guy to roll with. Upon meeting him it didn't take long to discern that he was as advertised.

"Norm" is a good friend of mine who resides in Las Vegas. I've known him as long as Paul. He was a slut slayer back in the day but unfortunately, he's failed to evolve with the changing landscape of the sexual marketplace and holds onto many of the Disney-esque fallacies of the present.

So now that we have our players, let's get to it.

Most men are white knights…even your friends

I landed in the 702 on Thursday afternoon, where I was scooped up at the airport by Norm. Paul and Doug weren't due in until later that night so we decided to grab a burger and a beer on the strip and shoot the shit until the rest of the crew arrived.

It didn't take long for the conversation to steer in the direction of women when Norm revealed to me he hadn't gotten laid since February. When I asked him why he told me he couldn't find a girl who stimulated him mentally. In other words, he wanted an "intelligent girl."

I chuckled and explained to him that all a man needs from a woman is her body and her compliance and that they're not good for much more than that these days (Paul, Doug, and I would later bust his balls about being concerned with a girl's SAT scores). To my surprise he looked at me like I had insulted his mother.

Over the next hour and about a half a pack of cigarettes, I explained certain aspects of the red pill without actually identifying them by name. I took care to tread carefully because Norm was obviously new to these concepts, but I could tell they made sense to him. He is a man, after all.

He did his level best to refute these truths but I swatted them away like low-level shit tests. When he finally realized he didn't have any more ammo (read: he knew I was right) he said:

"Look dude, you make some good points, I'll give you that much. But all girls aren't like that."

Right then and there I realized I had a bona fide white knight on my hands.

Club game is difficult

[image]

Okay enough about Norm and his beta-fied ass. Friday night the crew (sans Norm) hit a club a few blocks from where we were staying on the strip. We threw on our best threads, pre-gamed with a few shots of cheap liquor, grabbed a few beers and headed to the night spot.

To that point we'd seen very little talent in the way of good looking girls in and around the strip but upon entering the club, we saw a market uptick. Hot girls were everywhere, including in the elevator we took to get the the roof. It looked like it was going to be a great night.

Unfortunately we were dead wrong. Like most clubs, it was loud and extremely crowded. Nothing out of the ordinary there. But the one factor that stopped us all in our tracks was that it was a sausage fest of epic proportions. We didn't do an exact headcount but I estimate it had to be at least a 5-to-1 dude to chick ratio that night.

Most of the girls worth spitting game at were either in the VIP section surrounded by oil sheikhs or they were there with other dudes. The girls who weren't attached to men already didn't give any of us much play, as I was personally blown out twice in about a one hour period.

It wasn't all bad, however, as Paul was hit on by a land whale and an anorexic, nerdy looking black girl, so of course I had to egg him on to arrange a threesome (a skill he's recently acquired) with the two of them.

What that night showed me was that my club game had atrophied badly. Sure, the abundance of sausage, my lack of female accompaniment (which I usually have when I hit the club), and the crazy loud music (which completely eliminated the one of my strongest game elements…my gift of gab) certainly played factors in my lack of success.

However, men like Troy Francis have showed us the ins and outs of club game. It's difficult to be sure, but it can be done consistently and effectively.

The bottom line is that I'm man enough to admit that my game was straight up weak sauce that night so I definitely need to brush up on my night game and maybe hit the Francis chronicles for a refresher course.

Batman vs. Superman

Paul and I have had our fair share of conversations about girls, game, and pickup over the years. An analogy we apply to ourselves is Batman and Superman. Me being Batman, him Superman.

I'm a good looking guy but I'm not the text book Anglo-ideal women are looking for. As a result, I rely heavily on my wit and game-relevant banter skills to snag poon.

Paul, on the other hand, turns heads everywhere he goes. He's got underwear model looks (no homo) and utilizes this to his full advantage. This isn't to say he doesn't have game, but in a lot of cases next-level game isn't as necessary for him to get laid.

The juxtaposition is that Batman can't go after the bad guys the way Superman does, lest he be quickly disposed of. So he relies on his intelligence, keenness, and razor sharp instincts whereas Superman's immortality allows him to fly right in with a reckless abandon and start tearing shit up.

So the night after the club Norm dragged Paul and I to some ridiculous POF mingle at a bar not far from the MGM Grand. As expected it was slim pickings, as most women who show up to these shit shows are at the bottom of the barrel—which is why they're there in the first place.

There was, however, a solid 8 who grabbed the attention of both of our boners. Since there were no other prospects worth pursuing (we didn't have our beer goggles on yet) we clinked our drinks together and declared: "May the best cock win!"

I was up first (me being a "mere mortal" and all). I sat next to her and struck up conversation with her and her friends. As soon as the subject of age came up I knew it was time to access my utility belt and throw out my go-to escalation line.

"How old are you?" I asked her knowing exactly what her response would be.

"How old do I look?" She predictably replied. I faux-surveyed her for a second, shrugged my shoulders and said:

"I dunno….38?"

"Ohhhhhh my Gaaaawd!" she squawked as her jaw hit the floor. Her eyes twinkled with intrigue as she hit me no less than three times calling me an asshole. "I can't believe you just said that!" she said delivering every word with a smile.

Her friends had similar reactions with their hands over their mouths in disbelief confirming their hot friend had never encountered such boldness. I leaned back and smirked at Paul who raised his drink at me with a facial expression that read "touché."

Asshole game was this chick's drug and the more I threw at her, the more she liked it. She said to me on multiple occasions (and I'm paraphrasing here) "You're such a dick but that's why I like you!"

To which I replied : "And you fucking love it."

Later in the set, I upped the ante and got my phone out and started scrolling through a text thread from a girl who was sending me naked pics every few minutes. My target couldn't help but lean over and have a look.

"Is that your next conquest?" she asked.

"Maybe," I said. "If she plays her cards right."

Her arousal was palpable. A blonde sitting on my other side allowed me to utilize the push-pull technique to perfection. I'd make conversation with the blonde for a while and completely ignore her, then turn back to her and neg her into submission. Standard asshole game.

I channeled my inner Kanye and she ate it up

It wasn't long before Paul had his phone out taking pictures of me with both girls kissing my cheeks (never miss an opportunity for photographic evidence of pre-selection, gents).

I had this girl eating out of my hands. I'd drink out of her drink without asking (she was "shocked" the first time but offered zero resistance the next few times I did it), told her to hold my drink while I used the bathroom, and every time I told her to grab her phone to take a picture she never hesitated to comply. I never asked her to do anything, I instructed her and she loved it.

I ran to the corner of the ring and tagged Paul in. He eagerly ducked under the turn buckle and took his place next to her while I sat across from them to observe him in action.

Paul immediately went to his strong suit: physical escalation. He wasted no time establishing comfort with her through touching and playful flirting. He freely touched her pretty much wherever he wanted to and she couldn't help but follow his lead.

The score was tied at after the first inning but as the night drew on Paul began to increase his lead. She bounced back and forth between us as we walked down the strip, telling me "we need to get you drunk and back to your room" (at which point I number closed her) then going back to Paul to continue their touchy-feely evening but eventually it became clear her preference that night was The Man Of Steel.

Recognizing my imminent defeat, I went from PUA to wingman. I took Paul aside and told him that Norm and I would run interference on her two friends to clear the way for him to work his magic. The plan would have worked to perfection…except for the fact that a trilby hat wearing, neck beard sporting, annoying ass beta schlub managed to weasel his way into our group and effectively cockblock Paul faster than a speeding bullet.

Yup….that’s him.

All was not lost, however, as Paul managed to not only successfully arrange a meet up with her the next day, the sly bastard gamed her into buying a plane ticket to fly out to the ATL at the end of this month where he will most assuredly turn her into a slutty Lois Lane.

Well played, Mr. Kent.

Straight from the horse’s mouth

Rewind back to around 11 PM that night at the singles mingle on the rooftop bar. I was in the middle of my second or third at bat with Lois when I spotted Norm chatting up a couple of decent looking (maybe 6s) blondes at a nearby table.

Knowing Norm like I did, he was probably boring them to death with philosophy talk and books he’d read. Mind you, these certainly aren’t bad topics of discussion. I enjoy talking philosophy as much as any man out there and I really enjoy reading.

Today’s women, on the other hand, have neither the interest, nor the capacity to take up reading or philosophy as a hobby much less have an intelligent discussion about them……on a roof top bar…..on the Vegas strip. They’re simply not going to fuck a guy who yammers on about the philosophical irony of the works of Tolstoy.

Great conversation starter with men. Girls?….no so much.

Norm's a sharp guy but he just doesn't understand this. Seeing the boredom on the faces of his targets was the last straw for me but rather than trying to spit some truth to him (which had fallen on deaf ears to that point), I instructed Lois to go over talk some sense into him, and she happily and promptly obliged.

I gave Paul a quick, sharp nod to grab his phone to get this on video. Lois walked right up to Norm and pulled him away from his lecture to which he answered "What the fuck?!"

"What the fuck are you doing?" Lois asked laughing.

"I'm talking to some girls, what's it look like I'm doing?" Norm replied laughing as well. (Though this quasi-intervention wasn't a joke, the whole exchange was fun and light-hearted)

"You're fucking boring them to death with your book talk."

"What? No. They're totally interested. One of them's an exchange student from the UK. She's totally digging me."

We all laughed because we all knew that was far from the truth. Lois then delivered the most potent dose of red pill truth Norm had received all weekend:

"Listen, when girls come to Vegas they don't want a fucking history lesson. They come here because they wanna get drunk and get laid. So pull out your dick, stick it in her ass and shut the fuck up about books and shit!"

Her words verbatim…and I didn't tell her or coach her on what to say or how to say it. She knew exactly what to tell him without my input.

Most of the time it takes a woman to deliver red pill truth through her actions or her words for a man to wake up and realize he's been bamboozled by his own culture. Even then there's a better than average chance he'll stay in his slumber holding out hope for his Disney fantasy.

I can only hope Miss Lane's shiv drew blood in Norm's flawed ideology because he is my friend and I wish him the best. But I'm not holding my breath…

Where was Doug during all this?

At this point you're probably wondering how Doug factored into all this because his name is noticeably absent in each of these misadventures. The truth is, with the exception of the singles meet on Saturday night (he spent five hours at the poker tables at Planet Hollywood), he was with us every step of the way. However, he wasn't on the prowl because he's got a quality girl back home so he decided to pass on the shenanigans the rest of us partook in.

Yeah he was at the club with us, walked the strip with us, drank the entire time, and took in all the sporting events with us from various high end casinos. But it was clear he had no intention of violating the trust of his woman.

You see, gentlemen, that's the other side of neomasculine awareness. Pussy plundering is a great. But if a man knows he's got a good woman at home he doesn't have the need or desire to seek female companionship.

Game 7 of the NHL Eastern Conference Finals between the Rangers and Lightning at Caesar's Palace

Girls would do well to emulate Doug's girl. She locked him down the right way, continues to prove herself as a quality woman and doesn't rest on her laurels or take for granted that he could skate at any time. He solidified this by coming to Vegas with us and you can bet your bottom dollar she sucked the life out of him when he touched down in the ATL.

And for those of you thinking Doug may be on his way to contracting oneitis, think again. He made no bones about the fact that being single when we go back next year “wouldn’t be the worst thing in the world.” He smirked when he said it.

Conclusion

From the smoking hot poolside cocktail waitress at the hotel pool who said she would date a nice guy over an asshole (her boob job, tattoos, and profession betrayed her attempt at snowflaking), to the young beautiful women we saw with old rich guys, to the story of Norm’s sister, a stripper, who married a man who ignored her for days at a time and cheated on her all the time (probably still does), the red pill was all around us.

Viewing Sin City through this prism only further confirmed the doctrines I abide by. I’m very much looking forward to next year’s visit.

Read Next: 4 Observations On The Las Vegas Hookup Culture

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Finland Warns 900,000 Men About War Conscription; Feminists Remain Silent

June 9, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Finnish feminists yet again have no answer. For years questioned on why they fail to speak out about only men being conscripted to serve in the military, they have continued their silence after 900,000 Finnish men (from a total population of just 5.5 million) were sent correspondence in May warning them about their patriotic obligations in the event of war.

As a former territorial possession of the tsarist Russian Empire and target of serious and bloody Soviet aggression in the 1930s and 40s, Finland is acutely sensitive to Russian actions, perceived and otherwise, in relation to Ukraine now and flashpoints such as Georgia in the past.

Finland is one of those wonderful “equal” Nordic societies that either only conscripts men (Finland and Denmark) or for decades only conscripted men (Sweden and Norway). Sweden, to its eternal shame, simply abolished male-only conscription and moved to a professional army, bypassing any explanation as to why Swedish women, who had insisted on a radical form of equality since the 1970s, were never made to serve their country in any capacity, military or otherwise.

Norway has adopted measures for female conscription, but in the sense that women deserve some kind of national praise for finally pulling even part of their weight on this matter.

Let's be fair here: I recognize the imperative of a small country having the best means of national defense. Finnish feminists, pig-headed but not completely bereft of brain cells associated with common sense, know that the comparison between having a "battle-ready" force of 285,000 mostly male professional soldiers and reservists or the same amount with a 50/50 gender split is laughable.

It's a different story, though, to incessantly conjure up the specter of the so-called patriarchy when females have the privilege of not having their studies, work or general life interrupted by compulsory military service.

When do females sacrifice or put themselves on the line for men?

Danish Prime Minister Helle Horning-Schmidt constantly references "sexism" to create political capital, but ignores the obvious elephant in the room: male-only conscription in Denmark. In typical Orwellian Newspeak, women in Denmark can paradoxically "volunteer" for conscription.

Think beyond just conscription. When James Holmes killed 12 people and injured dozens more in the 2012 "Batman Dark Knight" cinema shootings in Aurora, Colorado, three men died protecting their female partners. I assume that many more men literally put themselves in the way of multiple bullets to protect a woman.

I do not question and vehemently affirm the bravery of these men. But, aside from maternal cases and a few others, women simply do not put themselves in harm's way to protect men, at least not anywhere near the rate of men trying to save women.

Whether war comes or not, Finnish men are expected, without reward or bare acknowledgment and appreciation, to underwrite the tranquility, safety, prosperity and peace of mind of Finnish women. Fundamentally, female political and academic elites in Finland have clawed every advantage they can for women, whilst dispensing with any notion of addressing the plethora of issues that hit men exclusively or at a minimum much harder than women. Male-only conscription? Pass. Male suicide? Nah. Child custody? Next decade (or century), please.

Finland's aging population would make compulsory female civilian service a perfect opportunity for Finnish feminists to show their equality credentials. If men must serve 9-12 months, why not make women perform duties for the elderly over a similar timeframe?

We avoid the deep quagmire of the biological differences between men and women, and allow both genders to perform tasks necessary for the nation. Perhaps when hell freezes over such a common sense approach would not only take precedence but be enforced. Men in Finland today risk incarceration and a lifetime of criminal stigma for refusing to do what women their age are always spared.

Finland's Ombudsman for Minorities is deliberately advocating for female privilege

[image]
She didn't even have the university degree required to get her position as Ombudsman for Minorities, but that hasn't stopped Eva Biaudet from helping to spread her pernicious brand of female privilege.

Meet Eva Biaudet, Finland's First SJW, and a microcosm for why 900,000 men can get conscription warnings without the slightest peep from the "equality-loving" feminist community. The recipient of massive privilege for getting the coveted job of Ombudsman for Minorities without the requisite tertiary qualifications, she has applied herself to politically hunting police after vague accusations of racial profiling against them.

Trying to apply the law equally to groups such as gypsies risks the ire of professional nuisances like Biaudet. Her most ridiculous antics have considered men, specifically her radical feminist approach to men corralled into joining the military.

This exchange about Eva Biaudet's response to a question on male-only conscription by a new recruit is by far my favorite one across all of Reddit. It encapsulates perfectly the logical contradictions and self-entitlement of the women of Biaudet's repulsive ilk. The direct link to the video can be found here, and the Reddit discussion provides, to my knowledge, a very good translation of the encounter on a Finnish political Q&A show.

Basically, in her own words, conscription is fine to Biaudet because only half of the population must serve. And, jackpot, it's not her half, the vagina-possessing one. Yippee!

Also, there's that massive obstacle of the sub-€100 cost for women to take a military medical exam (which could be just waived, you moron, if you applied yourself a scant 2% to its repeal). Already cognitively lacking, Biaudet completely ignoring the young man's astute question is par for the course.

Die for us women, men

So true, but I have no other words.

At the crux of the matter, men are disposable to women. You have heard it before and we all need to hear it again. Finland's men found that out once more when they got letters meant only for them, not their sisters, girlfriends, wives, daughters or friends. If Russia were to ever cross the border in the most harmless, piecemeal or trolling fashion, the shrieks of hysteria for men to defend them from Finnish feminists would be shriller than the sky is blue.

It is easy to score political and social hit points in challenging these sorts of feminists from time to time. But that is not nearly enough. The arguments we craft must be delivered again and again. Because if the shit hits the fan in far-flung Northern Europe, it is Finnish men, like the men in the Aurora, Colorado cinema, who will be expected to take the fall and die.

Read More: 9 Things Every Guy Should Know About Finland (And Its Girls)

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Ways To Pimp Your Pad

June 9, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Oomi Smart Home

Having a bare-bones apartment or house might save you money, but it won't impress the girls or make you feel truly at home. If you want to change your home into a sleek pad that will save time, be more aesthetically pleasing, and make your life easier, here are a few steps that you can follow:

1. Install energy-monitoring plugs

How much money are you spending on electricity every month, and how much of it is pure waste? There's zero reason to blow your cash on power for appliances or devices you aren't using that much. But how do you find out where you're wasting money on power?

The answer is to install smart outlets in your house. Smart outlets such as the ones offered by Oomi allow you to monitor energy without any extra work. These outlets feature light bands that change color to indicate how much power is being sucked out of them, allowing you to pinpoint where your money is being burned. Additionally, smart outlets come in a number of different designs, allowing you to choose ones that are tailored to your needs.

2. Get a universal controller

Having different controllers for every bit of multimedia you own, from your stereo system to your big-screen TV, is an incredible hassle. The solution is to combine them with a universal controller. Oomi Touch, for example, enables you to automate your home theater entertainment and the like with a sexy, flexible touchscreen and tactile buttons.

Not only is a universal controller convenient, but it also looks cool. It's annoying to host a friend or a girl and have to fumble with a million controllers on your coffee table just to turn on some mood music. A universal controller will remove this headache from your life and allow you to simplify your living space.

3. Automate unnecessary chores

You're a busy man, with stuff to do, people to see and girls to talk to. You can't afford to waste your time on menial tasks that can be easily handled by a computer. Fortunately, smart home systems enable you to cut unnecessary tasks out of your life.

Oomi IQ is the most powerful, flexible control system available for making your home as smooth and efficient as possible. Oomi actually studies how you are using it, enabling it to come up with suggestions on how to automate tasks around your house. For example, Oomi will watch over your house when you're out and about as well as turn off lights and the thermostat to save energy. It doesn't even require internet access to function.

Even better, Oomi doesn't require any work on your behalf in order to install. While most smart home systems are do it yourself, all Oomi requires you to do is tap products together without having to read through a dense installation manual or spending hours deciphering anything.

4. Design your home the way you want

Everyone has different needs, and smart home systems such as Oomi are designed so that anyone can customize them to fit what they want. Whether you're interested in making your home safe from predators, greasing the wheels of your home entertainment systems, or just automating a whole bunch of dull tasks, Oomi can help you.

In the 21st century, there's no need to waste precious time toiling away at basic home tasks. With the power of smart home systems, you can transform your pad into the futuristic, no-stress living space you've always wanted. If you want to make your daily life that much less annoying, smart home systems are the way to go.

Click here to check out Oomi's crowdfunding campaign and to get your hands on the latest technology for customizing your home.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Special Snowflake Lashes Out At Oxford University For Not Accommodating Her Made-Up Disabilities

June 10, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A student at Oxford University quit her Politics, Philosophy and Economics degree after administrators at the elite British university dismissed her pleas for special treatment at exam time on account of her purported disabilities.

Sophie Spector, who is 22 and claims she has Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder and Obsessive Compulsive Disorder, made a series of demands for accommodations to the college administrators. In a spectacular display of black knighting that will bring an amber glow to the heart of anyone who gets off on that sort of thing (and don't we all?), Douglas Dupree, chaplain and dean of Balliol College, gave short shrift to Spector's special pleadings. He mused in an e-mail to a University doctor, "Yes, why did we admit her?"

Dupree then went on to request that the problem student be referred to a doctor "who can be straight and firm with histrionics and panic."

And what exactly did she demand of this ancient institution, which has honed the intellects of three former British Prime Ministers and the economist Adam Smith?

> The key thing I wanted was extended time for essays because I am a really slow reader.

Sounds sweeter than the taste of tears.

A candidate for one of the toughest degrees at Oxford, one of the toughest universities in the Western world, is a “really slow reader.” It is equally nonsensical as, say, a quadriplegic expecting special arrangements so he can fulfill his dream of being a cage fighter.

Bailliol College did, however, make accommodations, as Spector relates:

> I was given more exams with higher pass marks than everyone else. I had to get 55 to pass while my friend was allowed to continue with a pass mark in the 40s. I asked for extended deadlines for course work.

Spector says her request for extended deadlines was dismissed and that she “started to struggle and fall behind.” She reveals how she was again vehemently black-knighted by a (female) course tutor, who told her to just get on with it:

> She suggested my disability was in my head and due to the Facebook and social media culture.

Frothing at the mouth at the university basically telling her to grow up, Spector rage-quit her course and lashed out at the College, calling their treatment of her “callous.” She then went to seek out the nearest firm of grievance-mongering human rights lawyers to launch a legal case against the university.

Playing the victim card is the sole preserve of the mediocre

In her media attack on the hallowed institution, Spector haughtily opined that “Oxford needs to be dragged into the 21st century, but it is doing it kicking and screaming.”

But does it? Oxford University is 752 years old, and has consistently hammered into competence the most brilliant of minds from across the spectrum of human endeavour. It suffices to say that forty-seven Nobel Laureates are amongst its alumni.

An alternative view might be that it is Sophie Spector who needs to be dragged kicking and screaming up to the standards of this elite institution, irrespective of how outdated she thinks its values are.

Mastery is blind to fashionable modern concepts such as the legal notion of discrimination, and concocted medical conditions like ADHD and OCD, both of which help all manner of mental subnormals to circumvent its rigours.

The proof of mastery is in the pudding. A truly exceptional work of the human mind stands apart from the author, from the process of production. No artist or scientist, other than the millennial saps masquerading under these titles in our modern time, has ever expected the world to accept their work at a lesser standard on the grounds that the author themselves were subject to some handicap.

An example to cosseted chancers like Sophie Spector, is Dawn Faizey-Websterm. Faizey-Webster suffers from “locked-in syndrome” a condition which leaves the sufferer aware but unable to move or communicate verbally due to paralysis of all voluntary muscles in the body except the eyes. In spite of this, she earned a degree in Ancient History from the Open University, using a computer that translates her eye movements into text. At the rate of 50 words per hour.

Can you compare that to Specter, the self-reported “really slow reader,” and not spill your coffee?

Millennials need made-up diseases to explain their inadequacies

On his death bed, psychiatrist and autism pioneer Leon Eisenberg admitted that ADHD is essentially a “fictitious disease.” Dr. Edward C. Hamlyn, a founding member of the Royal College of General Practitioners, said “ADHD is fraud intended to justify starting children on a life of drug addiction.” Leading psychiatrists have likened ADHD more to a social construct than a real disorder.

ADHD is said to be a scam because there are no laboratory or radiological tests or specific physical features attributed to the “disease.” There is also no known cure, so conveniently for the profit-making pharmaceutical industry, long-term therapies are required.

The smoking gun of ADHD's bogusness is perhaps the differing rates of diagnosis and treatment across countries. French child psychiatrists view ADHD as having psycho-social and situational causes. Instead of of prescribing drugs, French doctors look for the underlying issue that is causing the child distress in the child's social context rather than the child's mind.

They then treat the problem with "talking cures" like psychotherapy or family counseling. American doctors on the other hand, tend to attribute all symptoms to a biological dysfunction such as a chemical imbalance in the child's brain, and then prescribe psycho-stimulant medications such as Ritalin and Adderall.

Could it be that French doctors have come to the conclusion that so-called ADHD, in children at least, is simply a natural reaction to environmental factors like diet, schooling and family relations, which are best managed with practical changes rather than drugs? Could it be that Sophie Spector is an attention-seeking spoilt millennial brat who has found herself in the middle of a pitilessly rigorous institution of learning that simply refuses to put up with her tantrums?

Making a spectacle of one's own victimhood is now a serious career choice

Sophie Spector is a victimhood huckster in a similar mold to Emma Sulkowicz, the eponymous Mattress Girl of late rape culture hysteria. Both are students who wallow in the abject mediocrity of their academic endeavours. Spector purports to study PPE at Oxford, whilst being unable to keep up with the pace of study. Sulkowicz, rape hoax aside, pretends to be an artist while producing only a cheap and gaudy stunt, the carrying around of a foam mattress, whatever the significance of it may be.

Both of them also streetwise opportunists, hip to an opening for a bit of cheap publicity off which to launch some sort of public profile as a martyr. Spector will no doubt go on to be a prominent (and well paid) campaigner for “disabled rights,” huckstering for extra government cash and more discrimination law to assist every self-acclaimed sufferer of one of the ever-growing compendium of made-up psychiatric diseases.

Sulkowicz is already playing the publicity game like a fiddle, having attended Obama’s State of the Union address at the invitation of Democratic senator Kirsten Gillibrand. She also recently released a film “reenactment” (read: low-budget porn movie) of her imagined rape.

To characters like Spector and Sulkowicz, the world, and the university campus in particular, is a virgin canvas to be defiled with the gaudy smears of one’s own embellished grievances. Little is thought nowadays of modesty, restraint and the idea of a reputation as something to be conceived of, much less preserved.

Mediocrity and faux-victimhood are now seen as a cause for celebration. In academic instituions, which are responsible for shaping the minds of tomorrow, this nonsense should not be tolerated even one bit. It is cause for celebration that in the case of Sophie Spector, the administrators of Oxford University have told the grown up cry-baby where to go with her insane demands for accommodation.

It’s not the end of social justice warrioring on campus, but it’s a start.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Never Date A Girl With Dyed Hair

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

5 Reasons Why The Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need To Learn Game Now

June 10, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I am always curious why, in 2015, there are still game-skeptics out there—guys for whom the idea of learning a few basic principles in order to get better with women is an anathema. In part this is no doubt due to the extremely bad PR "game" has had over the years. But in the current climate, for most men game is not only desirable—it is essential.

Roosh, in his essay on neomasulinity, posits game as an essential tool guys need to learn in order to navigate a world that appears increasingly hostile to the average man. This is absolutely the case. Without game, men are adrift, at the mercy of the vicissitudes of women and the vagaries of chance. With a solid grasp of game, and the discipline to implement it however, a man has the chance to take control of his destiny and to shape his life in a way that suits him.

One of the problems is that game has for too long been tarred with a brush dipped in black eyeliner and wrapped up in a feather boa by Mystery. But in 2015, game does not mean wearing a fuzzy hat, doing card tricks, or regurgitating scripted lines and "routines." Rather, "game" is an umbrella term that refers to a holistic set of skills running the gamut of self-improvement from lifting weights to reading books to developing eye contact to becoming a great conversationalist. These skills will not only help you become better with women, but to become a better man in general.

Below are five reasons why learning game today is not merely optional, but a requirement for men.

1. The Sexual Marketplace Is Getting Tougher

Social media and dating apps like the ubiquitous Tinder mean that women are deluged with sexual options on a minute-by-minute basis in a manner unequaled in all history. Whereas, say, in the eighteenth century, it would have been hard to pull the prettiest girl in the village because the local landowner had his eye on her, today the same girl only has to post a bikini shot on Instagram to get hundreds of “likes” from thirsty guys in seconds.

Make no mistake, cock is in good supply for women and you are competing in a practically limitless marketplace. If you want a regular sex life then you must acquire the necessary skills to ensure that you stand out and demonstrate enough value to be a contender.

2. Other Guys Around You Are Acquiring Mad Game Skills

Self-improvement—for which “game” is to a large degree a synonym—is no longer a niche pastime. Look around you and you will see plenty of guys who take care of their bodies, who have great style, and who have the confidence and charisma acquired through a great social or business network.

These men are maximizing themselves and, trust me, while doing so they are also getting laid. And these are guys who haven’t even necessarily learned techniques for getting women. Not only are you competing with them for a piece of the sexual pie, but you are also pitting your wits against the many, many others who have spent years studying and refining ways to attract girls. Not learning game puts you at a serious disadvantage in a field that is becoming more, not less skilled.

3. Legislation Means That Men Without Game Are Increasingly Penalised

The Alpha Male—or the guy perceived as alpha, at least—tends to get away with a lot more and be forgiven by women because “that’s just the kind of guy he is.” Of course, I’m not advocating that you ever overstep the line, and no always means no, but Western societies are becoming ever more legislative over interactions that were once deemed purely personal.

In such a climate, the guy who is deemed socially inadequate or “creepy” will be censured, and may find himself on the wrong side of the law, either in a divorce court, or dealing with a harassment charge or worse. Failure to learn game, a large part of which is about developing social poise and calibration, could prove to be detrimental to your freedom and your life in very fundamental ways.

4. Game Will Make You More Effective In Other Areas Of Your Life

Game, when applied properly, requires discipline – and once you’ve gained discipline you will apply it in other areas of your life. For example, if you work in business, you will see that the rigour of consistently approaching girls is analogous to following up leads for your company. The more effective you become as a player, the more effective you will start to get in your work life as you will begin to utilize the same tools.

The other thing is, when you are approaching attractive women on a regular basis you will find it necessary and desirable to improve yourself in a myriad of ways, from getting a better body through lifting weights, to becoming better dressed and generally more interesting through acquiring opinions on the world and things to say. In this sense, an immersion in game will naturally help to lift your performance in other areas of your life.

5. Whatever You Are Looking For From Women, Game Will Help You Achieve It

Not everyone is looking to board the notch carousel by bedding hundreds of women, and endless sex for the sake of it is not to be advised if it comes at the detriment of other, more important areas of your life. But if you do want to gain experience with a range of women before deciding what you want, or if you simply want to get a girlfriend, the principles you need to learn are the same. That is, to say, game is not merely for those who want to waste their time immersed in hedonic, decadent pleasure – it is for anyone who wants to have some control over the course of his sex life and his relations with women, whatever character they may take.

Fortunately, Learning Game is Easy – Here's Where To Start

Fortunately, game is not difficult to acquire if you are adaptable, have an open mind and are willing to apply a little discipline in instituting certain behaviours. If you are a beginner, or if you wish to brush up your skills, I have written a quick and easy guide to the rudiments of game called The Seven Laws of Seduction. The books breaks down everything you need to know into seven basic principles, or laws, which are easy to incorporate into your everyday life. To get hold of your copy, click here.

Read More: Use The "One Strike" Rule To Help Improve Your Dating Life

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

5 Tricky Disguises Of Fear Every Man Must Destroy

June 10, 2015 | by Daniel Ndukwu | Link | Original Link

In our individual quests to become better men and remain unwilling to conform to the standards of a warped society, fear is a companion that is always by our side. It hugs us in the morning and kisses us goodnight before we fall asleep.

Most of the time, it wears the disguise of rationality. It does this because it knows that if we were to identify it, we would kill it like a rabid dog. No man should fall into the trap of dining with the enemy, so here are five disguises of fear that you need to crush today.

1. Fear through Indecision

Are you having trouble deciding on the next course of action to take, on what to where to that work event, or even whether or not to talk to that beautiful woman down the hall?

Many of you will just pass it off as a normal case of jitters or nervousness, but these things are hallmarks of fear. An alpha male makes a decision and acts, damn the consequences. Anything that stems from his actions will be taken care of in the same way the original action was carried out: decisively.

Don’t allow yourself to be lulled into a false sense of security that when the time comes to act you will be able to. If you want to know how a man will act in stressful situations, take stock of him in times of relaxation. Stand up and decide to be great, and inspire those behind you to do the same.

2. Fear through responsibility

The typical man that indulges in this form of fear is not difficult to spot. He usually sounds something like this.

“I have too much on my plate to start something else right now.”

Or

“I have to take care of a family, I can’t start a new business.”

Or

“I still have so many bills to pay right now, I’m not sure that would be a good option for me.”

I understand that life is not easy and it does not always turn out the way you wanted it to. That being said, sometimes you have to say fuck the fear disguised as responsibility and sink or swim with your obsession. When I first struck out on my own and tried to start my first company, I had a two-year-old son to take care of. I had a decent savings from my job and I just dove right in.

I have to admit that in the beginning stages, about the first eight months, I regretted my decision about 45% of the time. After those eight months and a lot of sacrifice things started to look up. In hindsight, I am happy that I abandoned my “responsibilities” and attempted to achieve greatness.

When you are old and decrepit, and your grandchild asks you why you never followed your dream, will you tell them that it was because of responsibility?

3. Fear through being a victim

Victimhood may be the easiest form of fear to indulge in because nobody will blame you for the way you are acting. You tried and failed but refused to try again. People will look at you and say that you gave it your best shot, but deep down inside, you know better.

I pity no man that allows himself to accept being a victim. Through millennia of evolution we have been crafted to achieve the sublime. What separates you as a victim from the man who has been able to achieve some success in his life? He failed and stood up again.

4. Fear through worry

As a child, my grandfather used to tell me that when you are faced with something that you feel may be able to conquer you, there are two choices: pray or worry. I like this nugget of wisdom because it highlights the fact that worry will only paralyze you.

Worry is a very powerful emotion and it is simply exhausting, it is intimately connected to fear. Worrying about something, besides killing you slowly, serves absolutely no purpose. Instead of using all of that time and energy to worry, it would be infinitely more productive to search for a solution to the problem. If the situation is truly out of your control, then you will gain nothing by worrying about it.

5. Fear through perfectionism

"I'm waiting for all my stars to align right"

"I'm waiting for the timing to be right."

"If I could just get a little bit more money then I'll start."

"If I could just find the right team members I'll give it a go."

Do any of these sound familiar? Waiting for just the right moment, in just the right place, with just the right people is a stupid notion. Your stars will never align perfectly. I consider fear through perfectionism a womanly trait because it is so thinly veiled.

As a man, you should be well aware that everything won't go your way before you get the ball rolling. You should know that there are some things you need to do all wrong before you get it right. Finally, as a man you should know that perfection is an impossible ideal and you should be aiming for excellence instead.

Conclusion

Fear can take thousands of forms and present itself in varying degrees. Your only job as a man is to be ever vigilant. Your job is to make sure it does not intertwine itself into your daily life. Your job is to cut it away, root and stem, wherever you find it growing.

If you are able to do that and stay true to those ideals, you will attempt fearlessly and accomplish masterfully.

> "To conquer fear is this beginning of wisdom" – Bertrand Russell

Read More: Can Spirituality Or Metaphysics Help Us Become Free From Fear?

Daniel Ndukwu

Daniel Ndukwu is the proprietor of Indomitable Audacity Is there anything else to say?

8 Lessons On Managing Women From The Bored Wives Club

June 11, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Regular ROK readers are no doubt familiar with how the popular media pushes the message to women about how boring marriage and motherhood are, and how exciting it is to be slutting it up as a divorced single mom. Up until now, my circle of friends has remaind mostly unaffected by this corrosive message, but I can see the first signs of this plague spreading to people I know well.

My wife recently spent an afternoon with three of her girlfriends from college. When men get together, it is usually around a sports event. It rarely gets down to a personal level. But for women, an afternoon with the girls can mean that deep secrets come out, and in this case they did. My wife was shocked by what she learned and she shared the play by play with me when she arrived home.

Tale of the tape

Here's the background story: My wife's three friends are Hester Prynne, Gwyneth, and Sister Christian (names have been changed to protect the not-so-innocent). All the women have been married for a few years, and all of them have children. Everyone got married pretty early by today's standards—all of them were hitched before they reached age 25. They live close by so I have met all of them and their spouses at the various kid parties and backyard barbeques that go along with matrimonial domesticity.

While my wife and Sister Christian still retain their girlish figures, the other women have completely let themselves go. I've seen both women take the "eat for two" adage literally, and balloon to Jabba the Hutt proportions during their pregnancies. Unfortunately, they were never able to lose the baby weight.

Don't let this happen

Hester, one of the high BMI gals, monopolized the girly conversation by announcing she had a "secret boyfriend." In between bites of strawberry cheesecake, she told the sordid tale of her intense attraction to what can only be described as a balding, overweight, married coworker who "shares her passions," "understands her," and is "completely attracted to her – cellulite and all." As everyone knows, "real men" love curves.

Hester revealed that her gravitationally challenged knight is trapped in a loveless marriage (of course) to a woman who spends all his hard earned money. While the two have supposedly never engaged in sexual intercourse, they have on occasion shared a kiss and a grope on an empty elevator and had a brief but passionate make-out session in the supply closet.

Artist's rendition of chubby knight

As Hester gleefully shared her adulterous encounters, the other "more to love" wife, Gwyneth, enthusiastically joined in on the husband bashing, confessing that she would never marry again knowing what she knew, and wished that she had spent more time dating different men and focusing more on her career.

Sister Christian was the most normal of the three women. Ironically, she is the only one whose husband is actually defective. He is a hypochondriac, a chronic complainer, and touchy prig. In other words, he is a massive pussy. He can't handle any stress so he depends on his wife to do everything.

Because I know all the parties involved, I can draw a few lessons from these sad situations:

1. Being Fit Is Not Enough

The husband of the woman who is cheating is a professional CrossFit trainer. He is handsome and keeps a low body fat percentage. He could be on the cover of Men's Health. He should be able to run dread game on his wife. Of the two of them, the husband has a much higher sexual market value (SMV). She should be the one doing her best to keep him.

But the husband's excellent fitness and good looks are not enough. The man she is cheating with is soft, overweight, and balding. In short, she is willing to trade her high SMV husband for the chance at a pounding (and that is the best she can expect) with a lower SMV male.

2. Being Interesting Is Not Enough

The husband of the other “healthy at any size” wife who regrets getting married too early is one of the most interesting people I’ve met. He’s an IT guy at a software company and a voracious reader. He can talk expertly about any number of subjects: literature, sports, movies, games, technology, business, and current events. He is also one of the strongest men I have ever met. I worked out with him and I’ve seen the incredible weight he can move at the gym. I’ve trained in martial arts since I was a kid and I still would not pick a fight with him.

Despite her husband being a renaissance man, his wife is bored with him. She wishes that she had the opportunity to ride the cock carousel for a while longer. It defies all reason.

3. Being A Good Father Is Not Enough

With the exception of the whiney complainer guy, both men whose wives are unhappy with them are model fathers. I guess these women care more about possibility of excitement than they do about their children.

If their marriages break up, these women will be reduced to single mommery. It will make the lives of their children infinitely more difficult. The girls will start having sex sooner and will be more likely to choose poorly when it comes to a mate. The boys will be more likely to fall in with the wrong crowd and engage in crime. They will spend years seeking the father that they lost.

These women don’t seem to see the potential consequences of their actions.

4. Bang Your Wife

How do I put this delicately? Gentlemen, you need to fuck your wives. If you are not having regular sex with your wife, you need to figure out what is going wrong and solve the problem, because there is definitely a problem there. The Hester situation is partially related to the fact that she is not seeing much action on the home front.

You can’t let your wife gain so much weight that she is sexually unappealing to you. If a woman regulates herself, pregnancy should not be a body-destroying activity. And don’t assume that a fat wife can’t find a suitor. There will always be some bottom feeder who is willing to hit it if you are not doing so.

If, on the other hand, the problem is that you have lost your libido, you need to take urgent measures to ensure that you get it back. This can usually be done through proper exercise and nutrition. The devil finds work for idle beavers.

5. Christianity Works—If Your Wife Actually Believes It

Although all the women in the group are nominally Christian, Sister Christian is a hardcore, bible-reading, mega church-going believer. While the other women have exemplary husbands, Sister Christian's husband is a weak man.

Even though her husband is a gamma male loser, Sister Christian believes in honoring her marriage vows because of her strong faith. She asked the other women to pray for her husband to start acting like a man. Sometimes life is not fair.

How long she can hold to her principles, I cannot say. Perhaps if Hester succeeds in destroying her marriage, the CrossFit trainer will end up with Sister Christian in the end.

6. Keep Tabs On Your Wife

I know I will be unpopular for saying this, but you can't give your partner a long leash without courting trouble. Hester is constantly texting with her chubby paramour right under her husband's nose. If he paid just a little bit of attention, he would catch it before he gets the full cuckold.

There needs to be accountability on both sides.

7. Avoid The Divorcée

Divorced women spread the gospel of divorce to other women because misery loves company. Both Hester and Gwyneth have divorced coworkers who are trying to encourage them to leave their husbands in favor of the Sex and the City lifestyle.

If you find out that your wife is getting too close to a bitter divorcée hag, intervene before your wife's mind is completely poisoned.

8. Constantly Up Your Game

Despite this, I am still a big advocate of marriage—how else can we raise decent offspring? But in our degenerate age, the natural cultural protections that a husband could rely on are gone. The media openly encourages cuckoldry, promiscuity, single mommery, and divorce.

I am beginning to think that the only way to stay married now is want to constantly strive to be more alpha in every aspect of life. There is no rest for the man who is trying to swim against the current in the age of Mattress Girl and Caitlyn Jenner.

Read More: Housewives Are The New Battered Wives

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Gaia Democratic School Takes Children On Field Trip To Porn Shop

June 11, 2015 | by Will Outenphraghen | Link | Original Link

In the latest episode in an ever-expanding string of brave liberal firsts, Gaia Democratic School took 11-13 year olds on a field trip to the sex shop “Smitten Kitten” – without informing the parents beforehand.

Director Starri Hedges says, “What I saw happening on our trip, I thought it was beautiful because kids could talk to these sex educators without any shame, without any fear.”

Just imagine what the parents must have thought upon hearing that they had paid their taxes to send someone else’s child to public school, and had paid Gaia Democratic School thousands on top of that so that their 11-year-old daughter could come home with a fistful of condoms and a cellphone picture of a two-foot strap-on dildo.

And while parent Lynn Floyd called the field trip a “major breach of trust,” and said, “You just can’t erase those memories,” there are probably a handful of parents who thought it was a great educational experience. After all, they did send their children to the first “Democratic School” in the nation.

Starri Hedges says her school encourages freedom and freethinking, and that “Even our kindergartners are leaders.” As in grooming the children to be the next generation of thought police? Did not Lenin say:

God forbid this becomes a trend and all the well-to-do liberals send their children to schools of this sort to learn how to “think freely.” If four years of college can turn kids into Marxists, what will happen if they start their indoctrination in kindergarten?

Above the law

Minneapolis city code prevents children under 18 from being exposed to:

> “sexually provocative written, photographic, printed, sound, or published materials deemed harmful to minors.”

So technically this field trip was illegal in addition to being unethical. Good luck getting the Cathedral to crack down one of it’s own, so the most the director will have to pay is a feeble apology to the parents. But an apology must be meant sincerely for it to mean anything, and Starri Hedges said this was the “first time we have taken that kind of field trip and it will probably be our last,” which she felt bad about, “because the kids had so much fun.”

Of course they did. They’re at the age where they’re starting to rebel against society and this woman showed them all the freaky stuff they just began thinking about while masturbating in the shower for the first time.

In case you are wondering what the school was thinking, they provide their philosophy on their website:

> “Gaia is a private school that provides holistic educational services to students

> K-12 with emphasis on democratic process, individualized instruction, academic freedom, self-motivation, cooperative learning, youth empowerment, and environmental stewardship. We are part of an education movement that has a long, fascinating history and a vibrant, viable future."

The educational movement Gaia Democratic School belongs to does have a "fascinating history," namely failure, cost overrun, indoctrination, revised history, school shootings, drugging boys, and turning girls into monsters. I'm also sure that most of these kids will go out and practice "environmental stewardship" with their own hands by driving a Prius to work.

Notice that the philosophy mentions that students will be there K-12. It's been said that many a liberal spends their entire life without encountering a conservative. If kids can now go straight from mommy's lap to their college graduation without ever stepping outside the bubble, just imagine what sort of people they will be—probably ones so sensitive that they report their workmates to HR for the most minor of infractions. What other outcome could there be when the most violent game they ever played was Tug of Peace?

Just look at all the winners these kids have to learn from:

Drumsticks on the chest, a UFO for a ring, and sunglasses she can't wear. Classic.

Is that monkey taking a dump? Poor monkey.

If, on the other hand, you would like your child to receive this kind of education, you can contact Starri Hedges yourself or visit the school's Facebook page. After all, given their track record of novel educational experiences, what could go wrong?

Read more: Virginia Schoolboard Gives In To SJWs With New "Gender Identity" Policies

Will Outenphraghen
Weevinbachen is a teacher in Thailand. He wants nothing more than a healthy, loving relationship between the sexes to be restored.

Why You Should Consider Adding Kratom To Your Daily Regimen

June 11, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Good Looking Loser and written by Donovan Sharpe.

If you read ROK on the regular, you've probably noticed there's been some discussion about a compound called Kratom. Chances are, you probably haven't heard of it until recently or immediately dismissed it because it's a natural compound that promises to do a lot of things. This is perfectly understandable.

Personally, I hadn't heard of the compound until I read Eric Crowley's post on it back in March, which piqued my interest. I'm always pretty skeptical of "au naturale" plants because there are so few that actually deliver what they promise to.

To my surprise, Kratom not only delivered, it surpassed my expectations. I currently use it regularly in my weekly regimen and it greatly enhances my performance in many different areas.

I'm going to tell you a little bit about the compound, what you can expect, and how it fits into my life.

What exactly is Kratom?

In a nutshell Kratom is plant that originates from Southeast Asia and is a distant cousin of the coffee bean. It stimulates your opioid receptors and gives you feelings of elation and energy (intensity depends on the strain) without the less than desirable side effects you get from drugs like marijuana or other opiates.

My first experience with Kratom

The first Kratom strain I tried was a Bali/Indo fusion—a good strain for beginners. I took 3 grams (about 1 teaspoon) using the “toss & wash method” which is scooping the Kratom directly into your mouth and simply washing it down with water (you might prefer to mix it with juice or Gatorade however).

[image]

About 15 minutes later I felt my mood and energy starting to improve. A few minutes later I felt a sharp increase in my overall contentment and began to think of things I was thankful for and how great my life was. That may sound a bit cheesy but that’s really what happened and was pretty cool.

Before I knew it I was thinking about how much I was looking forward to the process of improving my finances, my body, and my life. This all happened within the first half hour of ingesting Kratom and the feeling and energy stayed with me for a solid four hours.

How Kratom fits into my daily life

I’m the type of person who monitors his daily intake of any substance so as to not build a tolerance or addiction. That said, I use Kratom 3 to 5 times a week.

Most of the time I use it on days I lift. My go to strains are Hyper Hippo, Red Hot Hippo, and Rock Star Hippo on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays respectively. These are all faster strains which give me an insane energy burst. Each of these takes between 5 and 10 minutes to take effect as opposed to the standard 20 to 30 minutes that slower strains take to start working.

I tend to use moderate to slower strains when I need a kick in the pants mood-wise. Some days I'm just in a crappy mood for no good reason. Hell, we all have those days. Kratom is extremely effective in getting me out of a funk on any given day. Happy Hippo I and White Hippo are the strains I typically burn when I need an attitude adjustment. Slow strains are more for mood or well-being, while the faster strains are more for productivity and energy.

What to expect your first time

Everyone's body chemistry is different so one's first experience with Kratom may vary from person to person. However, I would recommend burning Happy Hippo I the first time you try it. More importantly do it in a fasted state (not having eaten anything for at least 8 hours) to get the best effect possible.

Upon consuming Kratom you'll start to notice the effects around the 15 to 20 minute mark. Depending the length of your fast, the feeling will intensify at the 30 to 35 minute mark and remain there until it wears off.

Do not burn more than 3 grams your first time! Taking too much Kratom in the beginning will make you nauseous and/or drowsy and will increase your tolerance. I made this mistake the 3rd time I took it and had a very bad and unproductive day. Unlocking Kratom's potential will require some trial and error and will vary from person to person.

Less is more

Take it slow, rotate strains daily, and dose it between between 2 and 3 grams and you'll experience that same first time feeling just about every time you take Kratom. You may have to increase the dose, but it's better to start on the low end and work your way up.

Conclusion

Natural compounds I've tried in the past have had little to no affect on me on account of my past experience with recreational drugs. Hippo Kratom, however, worked and worked well the first time I tried it and is still as effective as it was on day one.

Hippo Kratom is definitely as advertised and can be life changing in many ways. I personally recommend anyone looking to gain a physical or mental edge to give Kratom a try because it will be well worth it if it works for you as well as it has worked for me.

If you are totally new to Kratom, check out Hippo's Newbie Pack that contains a variety of strains to try.

–Donovan Sharpe, Return of Kings

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Why Does Anita Sarkeesian Wear So Much Makeup?

June 12, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

After years of attacking those who generate and enjoy the make-believe games of their choice, Anita Sarkeesian has developed quite the celebrity profile (and cash-flow to go with it). What hasn't been answered, however, is why a woman supposedly obsessed with unrealistic portrayals of women in fictional mediums unrealistically portrays herself every day to the world.

Through the use of copious amounts of cosmetics, Sarkeesian is supporting a standard of beauty (not that I find her attractive in any sense) that is entirely unreachable for many women without substantial artificial assistance.

Does anyone know what the real Anita Sarkeesian looks like, day-in, day-out? No. So why is she so enamored with fiction when, like most women, she presents her own fundamentally fictionalized physical self every day?

As we are used to with other SJWs, Anita Sarkeesian preaches and shrilly demands a standard in one arena (again, might I add, a series of fictional ones) that she has no intention of holding herself to in the domain of real life. Feminist Frequency's founder is, in fact, an active, willing participant in and progenitor of the dissemination of unrealistic portrayals of women. Pretty much the only time she does not further this fantasy is after she showers or when she lounges about at home, makeup-less and in her track pants, away from the camera lenses.

Contradicting her own mission

Anita Sarkeesian in no sense looks like this sans make-up. She wants women of “normal body types” featured in games, without all the glamorous make-up and sexualization, but what exactly is she doing here other than participating in a similar portrayal?

Yes, Sarkeesian’s mission is to foist feminist standards of compliance upon the world of video games. More than this, though, her stated goal is to enforce these standards so that it somehow all reflects back into the real world, where a lack of these standards in fictional mediums is allegedly so pernicious for actually breathing, non-digital females.

“Empowering women” with reality, diversity and representation doesn’t seem to extend to Sarkeesian’s own presentation of herself. It additionally goes beyond the fakery of video games, as at least people know video games and their characters are existentially largely confined to consoles.

The illusion of makeup and other related means of altering your appearance are harder to distinguish and easier to forget, given their ubiquity in modern society. This is a distinction Sarkeesian is deliberately and pigheadedly ignoring. Her war cry is basically, “Let’s rage against the patriarchy’s video game industrial complex and physical expectations of women while I paint myself with another five layers on my face before I appear on camera or in public!”

Do as I say, not as I do

Sarkeesian lambasts the pressures on women to look “perfect”, either through video games or general society and celebrities (like Mila Kunis!), but she reinforces and gives weight to these pressures with her own behavior.

It should not come as a shock that SJWs and many women in general can get away with doing things that they expressly claim to be against. It’s why intransigently hypocritical ESPN presenter Britt McHenry could cloak herself as an advocate for female body image and respect online, but later be filmed unleashing verbal abuse on a woman for her weight, perceived level of attractiveness, teeth, job, minimum wage earnings, scarce educational qualifications, purported intelligence and personality. All because McHenry, the great genius she is, was dumb enough to do something that got her vehicle towed.

Sarkeesian’s great escape, admittedly bereft of McHenry’s overt yelling, has been channeling misappropriated and concocted anger over “falsified” video game “stereotypes” whilst simultaneously worshiping at the altar of make-up and other means for enhancing her appearance beyond nature’s own reality.

What exactly is Sarkeesian’s retort to this? Because make-up is already so entrenched, and immersive, visually-realistic video games (as opposed to more linear varieties) are only two or so decades old, caking herself in product is somehow acceptable and internally consistent of her?

Sarkeesian’s physical presentation of herself confirms the “competing female” theory

A more accurate rendering of what Sarkeesian looks like day-to-day, but still not the original picture.

The way women physically present themselves in real life, especially to one another, does have an impact on female psychology. Studies argue that women cover themselves in cosmetics and generally dress up for the purpose of impressing other women. Obviously, this needs to be construed within the overall framework of the sexual marketplace, where (heterosexual) men and women compete with members of their own gender of the same sexual orientation.

Sarkeesian is not immune to being enraptured by this phenomenon. It explains why she can pontificate against video games on the one hand, but be a mindless slave to the stereotype of artificially enhanced female beauty, which she would otherwise call sexist and demeaning, on the other.

It goes even further. The problems associated with a hyper-focus on personal looks—anorexia, bulimia, body dysmorphic disorder (BDD) and less clinically diagnosed predilections such as low self-esteem—are only exaggerated by women themselves.

Forget “patriarchy”; when tens or hundreds of millions of women follow each other in constant bids to project appearances they don’t fundamentally have, they are all legitimizing and participating in the stereotypes feminists blame on men and male desire, not to mention exacerbating the misery of women unhappy with their visages relative to those of the women they see on the street or on billboards.

With hundreds of thousands of dedicated (read: hapless) followers, Sarkeesian and her fictionalized appearance reinforce this more than 99.99% of the population, male or female.

Ego, ego, ego

Right… because digitized, highly filtered and made-up representations of yourself with blue-screen backgrounds are realistic, unlike video games?

Either Sarkeesian wants a realistic portrayal of women across society and culture or she doesn't. Cherry-picking the areas in which you live your declared ethos, as Sarkeesian has for years, simply isn't good enough. It is becoming increasingly evident that one of Time's reigning "100 most influential people" is using Feminist Frequency and its associated campaign as a vehicle for her own self-aggrandizement and narcissism. Otherwise, why is she clamoring against one set of "stereotypes" in the media while slavishly adhering to others in her own life?

The praise which has accompanied Sarkeesian's "work," even if we forget its underlying falseness, depends on continual de-compartmentalization. Supporters of her have to disengage the logical parts of their brain, which attack unseen "patriarchal" elements for insisting on high standards of female beauty and behavior (the unseen part itself illogical) but avoid admitting female agency for complicity in upholding those same standards.

Maybe you should feel sorry for Sarkeesian next time you hear about or see her. It's awfully hard being a hypocrite.

Read More: Did Anita Sarkeesian Commit Felony Wire Fraud? (UPDATE)

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How Jerry Seinfeld’s Position On Political Correctness Is Critical For Comedy’s Future

June 12, 2015 | by Gardner Ford | Link | Original Link

Jerry Seinfeld has been active and successful in comedy on both stage and television for over 30 years now. I’m sure those of you who follow social media have seen his recent interview about his position on stand-up comedy, which is critical for the future of free speech and comedy for several reasons.

First, he has had a relevant and strong position in an industry he helped to bring into the mainstream through the 80s with his stand-up and TV role, as well as with Comedians in Cars Getting Coffee. It is important to note that he hasn’t just followed suit in societal trends—he finds something funny and goes with it, and that is all that matters.

The Seinfeld decree

Jerry does not care. In 2014 when asked about the lack of "diversity in comedy" he responded with:

> "Who cares? … You're funny, I'm interested. You're not funny, I'm not."

For anyone who is working their way through the industry, those were probably heartening words. More recently, the toxic elements are complaining about what he said this month:

> "Don't go near colleges, they're so PC.' I have no interest in gender or race or anything like that," Seinfeld said. "But everyone else is kind of, with their calculating—is this the exact right mix? I think that's—to me it's anti-comedy. It's more about PC-nonsense."

It's the same refrain of past comedians when social justice began to bleed into everything in entertainment. The old Opie and Anthony Show (and now both separately), and the late and great Patrice O'Neal were outspoken proponents of free speech in comedy.

Patrice's stance on comedy and fake outrage at non-PC joke material's most well known incident probably stems from his 2007 appearance on Fox News when he called out a shill (and subsequently was never invited to Fox News again).

The difference today is we have one of the most famous comedians of all time stating as such, with no sugar coating. When #1 says you are wrong, have been wrong, and what you're doing is also destructive to the craft—you're done. In stand-up comedy especially, which is truly an American form of art, you are down and out for good.

Jerry has FU money and he is still one of the most influential comedians of his generation, if not the most influential according to many people in the industry. He does not care about your feelings, and comedy shouldn't either. Comedy will let comedy decide what is funny or not. It is a self-critiquing process.

The new generation of PC

I am far removed from my undergraduate days, but from what I have seen today, I would not survive. Stifling conversation and debate because it hurts someone's feelings, or the shocking non-satirical suggestion that instead of clapping people 'wave jazz hands' to prevent triggering people?

I also remember that when I was in school, big name people would stop by and tour our auditoriums regularly. We had greats such as Lewis Black and George Carlin come through, and it's a sad state that it's such a hostile environment that Jerry Seinfeld—or anyone of his caliber—won't tour colleges. When you make an echo chamber you end up with the terrible Western women colleges have been pumping out for a while now, and the emasculated beta males that follow them.

Jerry's remark to the matter is stark naked truth, something public discourse needs these days, and it is important that he said it. Seinfeld's criticism may mark the beginning of people getting up and walking away from the bullshit and echo chamber of PC nothingness. This is vital, because there is a real fear these days among comedians that what they say will be used against them to destroy them because it hurt some obscure demographic or someone's idiotic sensibility.

Fear stifles creativity, but maybe with Jerry's comment it's time to stop being afraid, and just ignore this incredibly small, yet shrill and blustering minority. Maybe if we begin to say it in other fields, people will stop being afraid and we can have an honest discourse about the issues of today again—instead of just categorizing the 50 different ways you can offend someone pretending to be a victim.

Read More: Critical Race Theory Is Repackaged Narcissism

Gardner Ford
Man of unpopular opinions. Unpopular, correct opinions

Western Men Are Becoming Evolutionary Dead-Ends

June 12, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

A lot of you are coming to the realization, like myself, that there are not many options for men who want to pursue something deeper besides stacking cash and sleeping with promiscuous women, even if you made all the right moves with your life through focusing on self improvement and making sound decisions with your education and money. That raises the question of what is the next stop on our life journey.

The progression of man was clear a few generations ago:

- school
- work
- marry virgin (or girl with less than 5 previous partners)
- babies
- worship god
- death

There was no confusion about what a man should do because the path was laid out and urged onto him by his tribe, family, and a culture built on traditional or religious ideals. But something happened in the years since where the progression became this:

- school
- work
- consume corporate products
- marry aging slut with 20+ notch count
- babies (if wife wasn't made infertile by repeated gonorrhea infections)

- worship blimposaurus wife
- death

One of the reasons you're reading me right now is because you have realized the folly of this progression.

We have taken a road that is grossly unacceptable to the mainstream hivemind. Instead of blindly consuming and wifing up a former carousel rider, we have decided to keep ourselves free from the financial bondage of excessive consumption and also state bondage of not marrying a woman who could easily destroy us in a her-fault divorce. So we hit the gym, we learn game, we travel, and we start our own side businesses. I've met countless men who have done well for themselves by saying no to what has been pushed upon them. Their behavior has been called creepy, sexist, and rapey, in urgent need of manning up, but they have manned up for themselves by beating the system.

But what comes next? If you are to believe the biological imperative encoded within your DNA, it is to reproduce. Based on who our ancestors were—men who successfully reproduced from the first man without fail—I'd say that it would be atypical for you not to want to create life, especially if you're over 30 and have accumulated sufficient resources. I'm not making an argument to reproduce based on passing your genes on for posterity, since all that will be moot once the sun swallows the earth in a few billion years, but one based on where your genes came from and how they are supposed to code for an intense, illogical, and irrational desire to reproduce that may put your own self-preservation in danger.

If you are to believe that modern culture is headed towards full-blown degeneracy, and that women are affected by the environment they're in, you would naturally come to the conclusion that the women of today make for inferior wives and mothers than the women of yesterday. They are narcissistic, masculine, lacking in homemaking and nurturing skills, holders of outrageous sexual histories, addicted to electronic devices and entertainment, absent in family values, uglier, and less capable of familial loyalty. Western values from America are spreading so rapidly that a 22-year-old Brazilian, Polish, or Thai girl is worse at being a wife than her sister only five years older.

That leaves a Western man who wants to reproduce with three options:

1. Marry a Western woman who has had at least 10 sexual partners and hope that he won't be financially destroyed or imprisoned by the state for not paying child support or being falsely accused of domestic violence or rape.

2. Find a young traditional foreign wife from a little village, bring her back to America, and hope that in 10 years she doesn't learn the way of the land and morph into the Western woman he avoided marrying in the first place.

3. Leave your friends and family to expatriate to a strange land, find a young traditional foreign wife, and live on her home turf while hoping and praying that laws in your new country don't eventually make you a pre-criminal, like has recently happened in Poland when they passed their own version of the Violence Against Women Act.

If you truly want to reproduce, option three has the least amount of risk though it contains the most amount of effort and personal sacrifice, and it's still no guarantee of success, especially if you pick a country that has pretty women who are prone to divorce. Here are divorce rates per 1,000 inhabitants for a selection of countries (lower numbers are better):

Russia: 4.8
USA: 3.6
Lithuania: 3.0
Czech Republic: 2.9
Ukraine: 2.8
Denmark: 2.6
Hungary: 2.4
Estonia: 2.2
Spain: 2.2
Canada: 2.1
UK: 2.0
Turkey: 1.6
Poland: 1.6
Saudi Arabia: 1.1
Serbia: 1.1
Mexico: 0.8
Colombia: 0.2

Option three will be wholly off the table for the bulk of men who are average and not capable of the intellect, work ethic, and touch of mental derangement that is required to expatriate, especially if they don't possess adventurer or thrill-seeker personality traits. For the majority of men, it's not even an option that can be considered, which means that we have now entered an age where a Western man can no longer pursue his biological desire to reproduce without exposing his life to severe risk that would likely greatly reduce his quality of life by legally attaching himself to a woman who can hold him hostage in his home.

Marriage and kids were always a marginal deal for men to secure weekly sex and pass on their genes, but now we can advise for the lot of man that he must avoid it at all costs unless he has guaranteed legal protections from his wife and the state or he is beyond certain to have found a "unicorn" who will love him and only him until the end of her life.

There will be a point, after you gain significant resources and become fatigued from banging a variety of sluts, that you will be ready to move on to the next step. That next step was available to you in the past, and while not a necessarily net positive decision, it wasn't automatically one filled with immense risk. But now I'm afraid to say that there is no next step that would involve leaving a legacy without opening yourself up to being ruined unless you manage not only to find a traditional woman in an increasingly nontraditional world but do so in the right country that doesn't flip the switch against its male residents by treating them as undercover wife beaters.

The pinnacle of your father's life was being a reliable provider, but that it not turning out to be the case for us. The pinnacle of our lives is making internet money, scooping up some easy sex, and minimizing our legal exposures. I fear there is not much in the way of deeper meaning to be found. There are no loftier heights to climb than your own independence and individual pursuits. Unless we see drastic world changes in the next 15 years, merely having a pleasant lifestyle and individual freedom is where the trip ends for us, without being able to create our own family.

Read Next: The Manipulated Man

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Undeniable Importance Of Sexual Self-Regulation

June 13, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> If you do not conquer self, you will be conquered by the self. – Napoleon Hill, Think And Grow Rich Balance is one of the core defining factors of all life in the universe. Without it, probably life would simply not exist to begin with. Since balance remains one of the greatest and defining secrets of a fulfilling life, its influence also extends to other aspects of life as well, and human sexuality is no exception.

There is a balance for everything around us, which when tampered with will produce problems. In today's degenerate societies where unlimited sex is increasingly touted as a "self value" and happiness-validating ideal worth striving for, we've already seen how unrestrained sexual degeneracy and imbalanced modern sexual roles are destroying both modern women and men.

But even if men are endowed with comparatively longer sexual lives and drives compared to women, it becomes very important to acquire mastery over and regulate this incredible but finite power at our disposal—so that we don't end up being slaves to our passions or dissipating it recklessly to invite unnecessary hassles which could threaten us in the long run.

When the pursuit of pleasure becomes an ensnaring shackle

The desire for sexual expression is possibly the most powerful need of man, due to its unparalleled creative potential, and thus has fascinated humanity since antiquity. However, unregulated use of it can undoubtedly threaten – if not destroy – a man's health, mind, status, resources and even existence in the long run.

It's undoubtedly easier to subdue others, but what can be said when one's own lust becomes one's own greatest enemy in personal self- development? Only a few lucky ones can escape unregulated sexuality's limiting after-effects post-pleasure, but for the rest, there is no substitute for sexual self control.

But because men lack self control and wisdom in harnessing the incredibly powerful natural gift of sexuality, what we commonly find is the servitude of men to those who would provide the gratification of that need, which is aptly expressed by Chinweizu:

> There are five conditions which enable women to get what they want from men: women's control of the womb; women's control of the kitchen; women's control of the cradle; the psychological immaturity of man relative to woman; and man's tendency to be deranged by his own excited penis. These conditions are the five pillars of female power; they are decisive for its dominance over male power. Though each is recognized in popular jokes and sayings, their collective significance is rarely noted.
>
> There is a joke which goes thus:
> 1st woman: The way to a man's heart is through his belly.
> 2nd woman: Aren't you aiming a few inches too high?
>
> This joke pays tribute to how the womb and the kitchen control the feelings of men. A man can be controlled by the hunger in his belly, and by the other hunger which flares up just below his belly. Consequently, he can be manipulated by whoever controls the kitchen which feeds him, or by whoever carries the womb through which he craves to procreate. – The Anatomy Of Female Power

The message is simple and clear: barrage a man sexually enough to soften and enslave him. However, these conditions can still be effectively dealt with by taking the red pill and learning game.

Modern dating, just like life's unfairness, constantly throws amoral power games which test a modern man's mettle; thus to acquire mastery of over his destiny and freedom in that context, sexual regulation thus acquires paramount importance for him.

To release or not to? The tricky challenge of sexual regulation

Undoubtedly, one of the greatest battles a man wages in his own life is the one to seek control over his own lust. But sexual self-regulation need not mean unnaturally strangulating it completely, for there is no unnatural perversion worse than sexual self-repression. When pushed too far, this practice itself can be as unhealthy as unchained promiscuity.

At the same time, with the increasing failure of modern marriages – the erstwhile socially legal and traditional "channels" for sexual regulation – are itself eroding away, it then becomes increasingly important for modern men to learn game to create viable sexual options for their own sexual expressions.

Additionally, there are many factors which affect a man's sexuality and its expression: age, health, intelligence, personal tastes, the quantity and quality of his sexual options, the societal environment and culture he finds himself in and how it indoctrinates him, and the personal evolution of his own masculinity through time.

Out of these factors, modern over-sexualized societies (and women) often excel in indoctrinating and baiting him to lose his sexual self control and wisdom.

For e.g. "Use it or lose it" – modern men are constantly barraged to this common societal shaming ploy which seeks to dwarf men to the state of human dildos who are programmed to foolishly yield to their own desires and submit themselves to sub-standard women, throwing both caution and personal sanity to the wind. But what are conveniently ignored is "when to use it", and that the more a man foolishly yields to societal indoctrination to lose his sexual self-control, the easier it becomes for the modern societal matrix to control him.

Additionally, a lot of men shuttle between two extremes: either they dissipate their sexual power uncontrollably, or they simply keep frustrating their sexual expression by over thinking and over-analysis. This is again due to the lack of game knowledge and social intelligence, and again both these extreme approaches often contribute significantly to the growing modern phenomenon of male sexual desensitization.

The true secret of sexual regulation is that of detached wisdom, sexual timing, willpower and proper discretion. It is extremely important to acquire and imbibe these virtues, more so for the neomasculine man, since sexual self regulation is an important tool in his arsenal to outlast the evanescent self-destructing society which he often confronts.

Conclusion

A man who isn't a slave to his own lust cannot be controlled effectively by women. And sexual gratification should ideally not come at the cost of one's own freedom in the long run. Game helps men to determine which women hold the best prospects with the least threat to his freedom, and also how to sidestep the associated pitfalls, both prior to and post-sex.

Moderation in every aspect of life need not always be praiseworthy, but when it comes to a powerful, influential, dynamic yet finite source like sexuality, it becomes extremely important to understand as to why mastering sexual self regulation is so necessary, and how to master it—for failure to do so has been the cause of many failures of promising men throughout history.

Acquiring the art of sexual self regulation thus remains an undeniable asset for the man on the road of personal development, and his subsequent harnessing of his own personal power.

Read Next: Notch Paradise vs Dream Girl Paradise

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

How America’s Navy Has Become A Global Force For Feminists

June 13, 2015 | by Johnny O'Coughlin | Link | Original Link

Thinking about joining the Navy? Think again.

Are you looking for adventure? Do you want to travel the world? Bang a different girl in every port? Join the proud tradition of tough as nails sailors who drank ‘til dawn, fucked all night, and routinely engaged in bar brawls? Unfortunately, you won’t find any of that in today’s Navy.

Unless you’re doing this, steer clear

As proud as I am of my military service, when my enlistment contract was up, I ran for the hills. The reason is simple: feminists and social justice warriors have completely hijacked a once proud tradition. To illustrate, allow me to take you on a tour of my five years as a sailor.

The beginning

A primer in rape allegations and pencil pushing

The beginning: boot camp. When I enlisted, I was 6’1” and 150 lbs. I wish that I could say the trials of boot camp prepared me for combat, instilled discipline, or at the very least transformed my pathetic physique. Unfortunately, the most difficult part of boot camp was stenciling all my clothes with my division number and last name. Oh, the tedium!

As for PT, it happened, but more often than not it was just lip service. The one bit of boot camp I was looking forward to was the obstacle course, but to my surprise I never encountered it, which I later discovered was because someone got hurt and they saw it as an unnecessary risk. I guess no one ever told the brass that war itself is a risk, but hey, if you make things too tough only the strongest of recruits would make it through, and god forbid any females wash out.

And here’s the best part. Should things ever actually become too difficult for you, you’re now given a “training time out” card you can show to your Chief so that he (or as is more often the case these days, she) will know that your feelings are in danger of being hurt. How’s that for an experience you can be proud of surviving?

Despite the formidable odds against me, I somehow made it through boot camp, where I was immediately shipped off to train for my job code, an avionics technician on F/A-18’s. I would find out that the site of my training, Lemoore California, would be my permanent duty station.

Sound glamorous? I’d never heard of this desolate wasteland either. The thing about Naval Aviation is that since planes fly, you aren’t guaranteed of being anywhere near the water, so for many, San Diego was a paradise only experienced a night before deployment. Still, aviation was one of the more desirable positions, as squadron life was generally an easier draw than what the “boat chucks” had to endure.

By easier, I mean an average of 12-hour days, five days a week. On deployment, that becomes seven days a week. It isn’t difficult to understand why sailors love to blow off steam on their rare down time. The problem is that where once the exploits of testosterone addled young men were largely ignored, now the most minor of infractions results in demotion.

A great way for brass to string up sailors on trumped-up charges in a mockery of a trial is known as Captain's Mast, a term I became all too familiar with (or Article 15 for other branches). Rather than risk a full court martial where one is subject to the full extent of the law, Commanders take it into their own hands, and the rules of evidence don't apply.

Sailors are brainwashed into thinking the truth will set them free, and even if in the right are subject to the whims of very fallible CO's who operate under the direction of superiors who may or may not have a vendetta against you. Your life turns into walking on eggshells.

Now there are plenty of articles on ROK dealing with false rape accusations, so I won't go into too much detail, as my stories are anecdotal in nature. But the fact that I personally know of three friends that went through the rigmarole of getting their names cleared after alleged sexual misconduct is chilling. All three were later cleared of any and all wrongdoing, which in today's women-can-do-no-wrong atmosphere speaks volumes of the legitimacy of the accusations.

The armed forces are a microcosm of larger society, almost like a testing ground at times for social experiments. Affirmative action, gay rights, PC bullshit, communal living areas, women on submarines, and—we can only hope, because the spectacular, inevitable failure would be hilarious—females as part of special warfare are all part of the modern Navy. Save yourself the headache.

I hear the Marine Corps still has pockets of toughness left.

Read More: Sexual Assault Prevention Is Coming To An Air Force Base Near You

Johnny O'Coughlin
Johnny is an amateur bodybuilder, avid basketball player, and freelance writer who takes a perverse pleasure in voicing unpopular opinions.

NAACP President Rachel Dolezal Outed As White Woman

June 13, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Some days, I crawl out of bed and wonder if I'm still living in reality. Reading the news makes me wonder if I'm not lying half-dead in a hospital like in Jacob's Ladder and the whole world around me isn't some twisted hallucination. For example, learning that Spokane NAACP President Rachel Dolezal is actually a white woman who's been pretending to be black makes me want to pinch myself so I can wake up from this nightmare:

> A recent investigation into racially charged threats made toward the president of the NAACP chapter in Spokane have raised questions beyond who made the threats.
>
> On Thursday, the chapter president's parents claimed she had been deceiving people.
>
> Ruthanne and Larry Dolezal said Thursday that they want people to know the truth, including that their daughter Rachel Dolezal is Caucasian. The Dolezals said their daughter is specifically German and Czech.
>
> Ruthanne and Larry Dolezal said their daughter has always identified with the African-American culture and had black siblings who were adopted. They said she went to school in Mississippi and was part of a primarily African-American community.

Dolezal apparently achieved her reverse-Michael Jackson appearance through Snooki-esque tanning techniques and a really good hairdresser. After evading press scrutiny for several days, Dolezal came out defiantly attacking her critics:

> Rachel Dolezal, the white NAACP leader who misrepresented herself as black for years, was pictured for the first time since the scandal surrounding her race erupted as she left her home on Friday.
>
> She also gave an interview about the controversy, saying of her detractors; "I don't give two shi*s what you guys think." You are so far done, and out, of my life'
>
> When pressed further about her race, she told KREM; 'I actually don't like the term African-American. I prefer black, and I would say that if I was asked I would definitely say that yes I do consider myself to be black.'

In addition to her status as Spokane NAACP president, Dolezal also teaches Africana Studies at Eastern Washington University and has falsely claimed to have been the victim of "hate crimes" in the past.

A year ago, I wrote a satirical article about "transracialism" with the intent of making fun of transsexuals, but even then, I had no idea that "transracialism" would actually become a thing. While there's been a small movement of soi-disant "transniggers" on Tumblr, that well-known repository of mental illness and special snowflaking, Rachel Dolezal is the first example of this phenomenon in the real world.

How Transsexuality Paved The Way For Rachel Dolezal

The revelation of Dolezal's true racial heritage has triggered a flurry of condemnations from left-wing thought organs such as Salon, the same ones that have normalized transsexuality and a host of other mental disorders. What they don't realize is that by their own logic, the left has no right to criticize Dolezal for lying about being black.

For decades now, leftists have argued that race and gender are social constructs with no biological basis. This ludicrous line of reasoning allows the left to deny basic, observable physical differences between men and women (such as physical strength) as well as scientific data showing cognitive and behavioral differences between different ethnic groups. It has also been used to justify transsexuality: since there's no biological basis for gender, a man who takes estrogen and gets his rocket flayed into a pocket is just as female as women who were born that way.

By this logic, on what basis can the left condemn Rachel Dolezal? If race is a social construct, then it doesn't matter that Dolezal is a homely white girl from Montana; if she feels black on the inside, she is perfectly justified in changing her appearance and acting black. If we're supposed to celebrate Bruce Jenner for embracing his "true" femininity through surgery and hormones, then we should also celebrate Dolezal for embracing her "true" race.

The Myth Of White Privilege

Rachel Dolezal's decade-long deception also explodes a popular left-wing myth: the idea of "white privilege."

According to leftists, American society is deeply racist, advantaging whites over all other races. Yet despite being white, Dolezal chose to reinvent herself as black, a member of a race that is supposedly discriminated against at all levels of society. If white privilege actually existed, Dolezal would never have chosen to deliberately cripple herself by pretending to be a member of an oppressed class.

The truth of "white privilege" is that it not only doesn't exist, but the reality is the opposite: American society is afflicted with "black privilege," "minority privilege," and "female privilege." As an ordinary white girl, Rachel Dolezal would have never gone anywhere in life. By reinventing herself as black, she not only secured a job teaching at a major university, but she became the president of the local chapter of a powerful political organization.

It remains to be seen whether Dolezal's exposure will lead to any serious repercussions for her or any changes in the downward trajectory of American culture. All I know is that from here on out, the world is just going to get even more absurd.

Read More: Why Modern Feminism Is White Woman's Privilege

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

On The Disappearance Of Male Initiation Rituals

June 14, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

I'll shoot it to you straight and look you in the eye.
So gimme just a minute and I'll tell you why:
I'm a rough boy. I'm a rough boy.

Rough Boy, ZZ Top

There is an old African tale about a hunter who takes his son out with him hunting one day. Early on, the man finds a small rat, kills it and tells his son to keep the rat. The day goes by, with both the father and son unsuccessful in finding any more prey. The father turns to the son and asks him for the rat he killed earlier the day. The son shrugs, and tells his father that he threw the carcass away in a bush because he didn't think they would need a rat. The story ends with the father raising up his ax, smashing his son with it and leaving his son unconscious.

In his many seminars in the 1970's and 1980's, Roberty Bly would relate these kinds of short tales to men, eliciting their opinions in an effort to understand the malaise of the modern man. In response to this particular story, men would instantaneously respond to the story, recalling exactly where their own father struck them or hit them—or when they wanted their father to strike or hit them as a youth. The point wasn't about physical violence, but about how our fathers will eventually wound us—for better or for ill—as we grow from wayward, immature boys and into confident, self-assured men.

Bly's interest in the ritual passage from boyhood to adulthood grew over the years as he participated in these workshops. A child himself of the radical politics of the '60's, he was in tune with the feminist and left-wing politics of the time. In spite of that, he noticed that the men of the modern, "liberated" era were listless, low-energy shells of their father's generation, filled to the brim with anxiety and crippling emotional conflict.

Despite the strident pronouncements of social progress by the Left, Bly couldn't help but notice that the American psyche had been in tailspin since at least the 1950s, and the modern man was a key example of this.

Over the course of these decades—which lead to the publication of Iron John in 1990—Bly immersed himself fully in this fledgling men's movement. He encountered men from all walks of life—accountants, coal miners, doctors—and he noticed that they all seemed to have a universal ennui that stemmed from their childhood.

These men never really knew their fathers all that well—who he was, what he did everyday outside the home and why he seemed to just "rustle the papers in the kitchen" after supper. This mythical father was either entirely absent or was a distant figure of a sort, either dominated by "mother" or was a domineering figure in his own right.

They knew their mothers well—too well, perhaps—-and while they were in touch with the maternal side of parenting, they were impoverished by this paternal deficit. Unable to shake this general malaise, they found themselves wasting away at jobs they hated, dissatisfied with their marital relationships and had difficulty truly connecting with their children. Contrary to the grand narratives spun by feminists about patriarchy and male domination, these men were simply trying to love and be loved in return and have found themselves lost.

Iron John is the exploration of this lack of male initiation in America and its profoundly negative affects on boys as they mature into men. The books draws heavily on Jungian psychology, tales and anecdotes from varied cultures, and snips of wisdom from poets. Bly attempts—successfully, for the most part—to fuse a cultural critique of our shared values about raising boys with a discussion of a particular Grimm's fairy tale—The Story of Iron John—in order to illuminate the steps that a boy must take in order to become a man.

The parable of Iron John is a simple one: a young prince learns to grow and become a man through the tutelage of the "wild man" Iron John. According to Bly, this "wild man"—covered from head to toe in tangled hair—represents a connection to the "deep masculine," a sort-of wellspring of eternal masculine truth. Iron John helps guide the young prince into adulthood, learning to fight, learning to love a woman and learning to deal with humility and pride.

Throughout the book, Bly builds on the parable, providing illuminating tales from other cultures on how they shepherd their boys into adulthood. Through the use of poetry and anecdote, he breaks the parable apart into eight easily digestible parts and explains how modern men can get caught in various stages of personal growth. The disappearance of male initiation rituals at various stages in life prevents modern men from growing up in certain ways, leaving them much poorer in spirit and mind.

The book is at its best when he focuses in on the various stages of growth a boy must go through in order to become a man. Consider a couple quotes.

On the disservice American schools do to their pupils:

> Father Ong notes that combative debates survive in some European universities but have almost ceased in American universities. Men who have no family tradition of lively argument may feel themselves overwhelmed in such debates. Moreover, some men and women found that they did not enjoy this way of learning the competitive mood, the aggression, the fierceness of phrase, did not please them, and some pity of the loser affected the joy of the combat.

On importance of older males in the initiation process:

> In ordinary life, a mentor can guide a young man through various disciplines, helping to bring him out of boyhood into manhood; and that in turn is associated not with body building, but with building an emotional body capable of containing more than one sort of esctasy.
>
> We know, moreover, that such initiation does not take place at any one moment or only once. It happens over and over. An Australian aborigine said something to > this effect: “I’ve been doing this initiatory work with young men for over forty years now, and I think I’m beginning to get it myself.”

As one might already expect, the greatest failing of the book is the liberal sympathies of Bly. For all of his brilliant insight into male initiation and cultural practices of other countries, the book is cluttered with clumsy shots at Republicans and right-wingers. While that is distracting enough, his attempts to balance feminism with male interests makes the book tough to take seriously at times.

Feminism, by definition, is about placing power relations between men and women on a different footing without any regard as to its affect on boys or girls. Trying to balance the spiritual development of boys into men with a craven, soulless movement like feminism is a fool’s errand.

In sum, the book is excellent at what it set out to do: analyze the current malaise of modern men, understand its roots and attempt to retrieve some guidance from the past on how to move forward as men.

While the prose is certainly too flowery at times, Bly does a great job of breaking various parts of male growth down into understandable parts. The use of “The Story of Iron John” was brilliant, as is his masterful command of literary and cultural anecdotes to help shed light on the unfortunately mysterious process of becoming a man.

Read More: We Must Not Deny The Importance Of Fatherhood

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

A Brief Introduction To The Country Formally Known As Sweden

June 14, 2015 | by Prince Prospero | Link | Original Link

I ask for your patience, dear reader. English is not my native tongue, and words that should flow like water might sometimes freeze to ice. However, my story is both important, and requested, so please hear my tale.

It is a daunting task to in a short article describe Sweden of today. To digest this tale, you must first change your outlook on reality. Think of President Obama as a conservative, think of Huffington Post as moderate, and think of the BBC as a newsagent known for its fearless pursuit of truth no matter what.

Imagine the laws of California as reactionary right wing and the immigration policy of the United States as racist and criminal. Your average Tumblr feminist is a mainstream Swedish politician, your Guantanamo Bay inmate is a Swedish diversity official. This is how far the rabbit hole goes.

The infestation of feminist politics

Sweden has officially adopted feminism as a core value for her policies. This is not a matter of opinion, but rather the clearly expressed politics of the current government. The green party does not have a leader or a representative, but rather two Mouthpieces. Yes, Mouthpiece is their official title.

One of them, Åsa Romson, now also the vice Prime Minister of Sweden, made a speech in 2014 where she opened with the words Ramadan Karim and continued to explain that:

> It is still the case in Sweden in 2014 that all major positions of power and money are led by men. If we have a norm that it is white heterosexual men in power you also build a society that is best for white, heterosexual males. But it is so wrong, for most of us here are not white, heterosexual, middle-aged men.
>
> …
>
> We in the Green Party question what says that the Swedish man's right to eat meat will go before the Sudanese woman's right not to have their crop destroyed by climate change. We must dare to question the norms.

Vice Prime Minister Åsa Romson, agitating for a Brave New World

Although the new government has adopted feminism as the guiding ideology for policy making, it has long been present in many decisions. An old and still ongoing debate about how to deal with Swedish men that pay for sex illustrated this clearly.

Beatrice Ask, member of Moderaterna, the "conservative" party, and former Minister of Justice, wanted to send purple envelopes to all men suspected of buying sex. The expressed purpose was demonizing all men suspected of being a John. Her suggestion was stopped on the basis that it was against Swedish law to stigmatize men that hadn't been found guilty in a court of law.

Finally, I would like to highlight a recent suggestion that the state should be able to fine or dissolve companies that didn't have at least 40% women on the board of directors. The direct quote from minister of Justice Morgan Johansson was to "dissolve companies that don't use gender quotas." He later backed off from this statement in a Twitter comment, and the official line is now that "heavy fines" should be used instead. The law may be passed as early as next year.

Peaceful feminism?

Contrary to its stated aims, feminism does not limit violence. The recent legal suggestion from feminist Sweden clearly indicate the opposite, as returning fighters from the Islamic State will get extra benefits from the Swedish state.

These benefits include being offered employment before others, free gender education, and rental apartments in Stockholm, paid by tax funds. Raping a child after you killed her parents and then selling her off as a sex slave is apparently a lesser crime then not employing women based only on the fact that they are women. In a feminist society, it pays to be a thug.

Rape statistics also show that Sweden is one of the most unsafe countries in the Western world for women. Although these stats can be debated, an increase in gang rapes does coincide with the creation of the liberal, multicultural feminist state.

Female genital mutilation is a fairly new occurrence in Sweden. School nurses reported last year that all 30 girls in a class in Norrköping had been genitally mutilated. Although this has not led to a debate on women's rights, Sara Johnsdotter, a social anthropologist from the university of Malmö, argues that the word itself is stigmatizes women and should be exchanged to the more including "circumcision".

Sara Johnsdotter also claims that removing the clitoris does not have a negative effect for the sexual pleasures of women, since she has discovered something she calls "phantom orgasms." I am not familiar with what studies Johnsdotter used to come to this conclusion, but it is proven that she has not herself undergone any form of circumcision.

Sara Johnsdotter, possibly having a phantom orgasm.

“The good hate”

Violence is rising as a whole in Sweden, and recent statements from law enforcement agencies indicate 55 no-go zones. This means areas where the police say that they no longer control the situation. Police patrols, fire brigade, and ambulances are routinely attacked in these areas with stones and fire bombs.

“Fascists” are routinely targeted with violence. The Swedish Democrats that according to the latest polls have between 15 and 20% of the votes are one example. Issa Issa was an active member of that party but left politics after being attacked in his home by a mob that stabbed him 18 times and left him to die. Despite the fact that Issa Issa is of Assyrian origin, this was not labeled a hate crime and despite the fact that the attackers yelled “fucking Christian,” it was not considered religiously motivated.

Organized violence against “fascists” includes being targeted by the organized lefties. A research group that calls itself “the Swedish Stasi” have created lists of people with “fascist views” and recently hacked Disqus, giving them access to anonymous commentators on sites deemed as “hate sites.”

Research Gruppen, “The Swedish Stasi”, lined up against a wall.

If you look for parasites you tend to find a corpse

I could keep listing incidents ad nauseam, but this should give you a general idea of Swedish mainstream policies. The image I hope to paint is not that of a changing, or even failing state, but that of an already dead society. If you get the image of a struggling people making a last stand against an oppressive elite, I have failed as a writer. Study it, observe it, for it is your future should you choose the same path as Sweden.

The decay has reached too deep and the vast majority of Swedes live from pay-check to pay-check, killing time in between with Netflix and Facebook. Few dare to tear down the veil and see the world for what it is.

I know, because for many years I was one of them. The corruption and degeneration on a personal level is worthy its own article, but it is of course the failing of men that doom society, and not the other way around.

Read More: Freedom Of Speech Is Dying In Sweden

Prince Prospero
Prince Prospero is a white cis gender Swedish male and responsible for all suffering throughout history. When not oppressing minorities, women or purposefully destroying the environment, he enjoys reading, writing and exploring his new home, far, far away from Sweden.

Nobel Laureate Sir Tim Hunt Says Female Scientists Cry When Criticized

June 14, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> "Let me tell you about my trouble with girls. Three things happen when they are in the lab: you fall in love with them, they fall in love with you, and when you criticise them they cry."

The 2001 winner of the Nobel Prize for Medicine, Sir Tim Hunt, is onto something, regardless of him being forced to apologize for it later. Although I believe him when he said his comments at a conference in South Korea were a joke, he was clearly telling it because it reflected an amalgamation of certain real-life experiences he'd had.

The backlash against Sir Tim has been vitriolic to say the least and, like in many similar circumstances, the fury stems in large part from an unconscious realization by his critics that he's right. Not only is he right, substantial numbers of women agree with him: women are generally worse at regulating their emotions in the workplace.

If a scientist, male or female, had declared at a conference that the majority of men in the workplace bullied women, imposed themselves on them unfairly, or were involved in some kind of mass rape culture, without any evidence, the response would have been one of head-nodding or huge mirth at the "truth" being reiterated.

But when frank, non-politically correct gentlemen like Sir Tim say what they have experienced, whether in the form of a joke or not, batten down the hatches and prepare for the nuclear holocaust, folks. Because that's what's coming your way when you have the audacity to speak your mind on taboo topics, especially as a world-renowned expert in your field, let alone a Nobel Prize winner.

Women themselves say women are more emotional in the workplace

[image]
Studies HAVE determined women are more emotional and cry more often in the workplace. Even surveyed women agree.

Take this study as an example, although, of course, one of those working for the company making the survey, Kathryn Fagg, tried to refute their own results:

> It found 41 per cent of women thought men were better at managing their emotions, while 14 per cent thought women were better. Forty-five per cent remained neutral.

I don't know about you, but this certainly replicates my own experiences in the workplace, from the time I first secured part-time employment when a 14-year-old junior high school student. In the retail environment, well before I entered university, girls my age or thereabouts were routinely afforded the cushier jobs, from permanent cashier to change-room attendant.

They would gag if they had to clean up when produce went stale or leaks of stored soft drinks remained unnoticed until the smell became unbearable for customers and staff alike. The idea of a girl or woman taking the garbage out, like the boys and men were expected to, never ever materialized as well.

During stocktake, assuming a girl of the same size had half the upper-body strength, female employees were "lucky" to carry 15% of the combined weight across the day as a male of any age and comparable weight. When managers yelled at girls, half of the time they would cry and our superiors would let them off without punishment.

If a girl established a particularly significant reputation as a teary-eyed soul, subsequent expectations of them would slip 20,000 leagues beneath the word "mediocre." Boys, on the other hand, had to endure the whole diatribe and then some, all whilst having their demanded work performance stay unchanged or rise higher.

Fact: Women generally find it harder to suppress their emotions

It’s unsurprising that women crying is linked with a drop in male testosterone. An uncontrollable crying response is for a purpose after all: getting what one wants.

This goes further than the workplace, though. Scientists revealed this year that women are more affected by emotional imagery. I am by no means extending this line of argument too far in asserting that these kinds of gender asymmetries flow into women’s careers as well. There’s a biological reason why women cry more in the workplace.

Feminists have no trouble in demanding that we put more women on corporate boards and in government because they’re more “sympathetic” and “caring.” Yet they refuse to acknowledge the other end of the stick they’re picking up. Only the allegedly positive aspects of femininity or womanhood are ever emphasized, never the drawbacks that those like Sir Tim Hunt are alluding to.

We should forgive Sir Tim for his apology. I have some inkling of the tsunami of rage he faced, but have no method myself of imagining what it felt like in its entirety for him. Instead, we should be thanking him as one of the brave few. More often than not, the most successful men (and women) in society are forced to keep their mouths shut and politick their way to the top, leaving them understandably reticent to express heartfelt opinions that would jeopardize extremely fulfilling and profitable careers.

It’s a comparable dilemma to the politician who cannot criticize the voting masses for the stupidity which frequently engulfs their electoral choices every half-decade.

The irony of women demanding that Sir Tim back up his comments with science

I prefer the hot leftist Ann Perkins on Parks and Recreations to this crazy leftist Anne Perkins.

Anne Perkins, writing for (yep, you guessed it!) The Guardian, attacked Sir Tim for making his comments without supporting, scientific evidence. But look what happens when anything close to scientific challenges the raison d'être of feminists. Despite it being long established and recently reaffirmed that women are more likely and even programmed to cheat during ovulation and have less self-control during their period, feminists rage-spiralled when unpublished research suggested that the menstrual cycle can affect female political choices.

CNN was forced to pull the whole article. It seems it's possible for the menstrual cycle to help you cheat on your new husband or partner of twenty years, but impossible for it to affect your voting choice, which influences the overall election as much as the weight of a strand of hair determines if you're slim or obese.

The irony increases further still when we relate the bombastic anger of Perkins and her cronies with the gross oversimplifications made about men, without evidence, every day. "All men participate in rape culture" (When was the last rape you saw that you didn't stop, if you've ever seen one?), "Because you have male privilege" (said the female college classmate with the $200,000 trust fund and $20,000-a-year private high school education) and "I believe women" (so the IRS needs a criminal court with beyond reasonable doubt to nab a tax cheat, but college men accused of rape can be convicted by a university with a woefully lower standard of proof?) are all variations on the same theme.

When Sir Tim passes on, hopefully after some decades, I won't just be remembering his Nobel Prize for Medicine. I'll be saluting his gargantuan balls for challenging, albeit fleetingly, the politically correct status quo.

Read More: The Hunt For Brazilian Love

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How Much Money Will Lena Dunham Make From Her Rape Accusation?

June 15, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> I'm an unreliable narrator.
>
> – Lena Dunham in the chapter "Barry" from Not That Kind of Girl

Now that the dust has settled (or has it?) on Lena Dunham's putrid 2014 "memoir," Not That Kind of Girl, it's time to ask the literally million-dollar question: how much money will she make from her unsubstantiated rape accusation? And how much has she made already from the heightened interest surrounding her celebrity profile?

The Girls creator's allegations, and the factual controversies that followed, spawned hundreds of mainstream media articles and lured in potentially millions of curious ears and eyes. Despite the deserved criticism she faced, all these articles, positive and negative, must be construed in an overall context: attention means money for celebrities.

As you may be aware, Dunham claimed she was raped by moustachioed, Republican "Barry" whilst attending Oberlin College. The problem is, "Barry" wasn't actually a Barry. And, surprise, surprise, there was an innocent Barry who matched the description of the "Barry" Dunham said raped her. And this real Barry went through a figurative but still extremely painful hell, his reputation tarnished via Dunham's catastrophically described, poorly thought-out and pathetically "fact-checked" narcissistic "literary" indulgence.

Early on, with these scarce details, we can safely divine that the story was more about capturing the eye of the public than any allegiance to facts, responsibility and preventing collateral damage to third parties. And, sensing her acute vulnerability if even the purported rapist "Barry" refuted the accusation and its lack of evidence, Dunham opted for internally contradictory statements about what exactly she was asserting:

> I describe a sexual encounter with a mustachioed campus Republican as the upsetting but educational choice of a girl who was new to sex when, in fact, it didn't feel like a choice at all.
>
> – Lena Dunham's confusing doublespeak (is she claiming or not claiming to have been raped?), in a part of her memoir prior to the chapter "Barry"

Attention equals money for all celebrities

Looks completely sincere and not done for the cameras, right, Sean?

Anytime a celebrity garners attention, money flows to them, both at that moment and in the opportunities that come afterwards. Lena Dunham is no different. It also explains why you find celebrities such as Angelina Jolie doing charity or rape advocacy work where their own person is front and center of the particular campaign. Or Sean Penn "rescuing" people in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina (with a camera crew in tow) and distributing blankets and relief packages to flood victims in Pakistan.

Sometimes the exact level of attention expected or wanted by a celebrity doesn't eventuate. And perhaps when the attention directed back to them is sufficient, the financial windfall may not be as lucrative as desired. But frequently it exceeds what was anticipated.

Lena Dunham may soon see that happen with her rape accusation. Girls won't go on forever (thank you, Jesus) and there's only so much feminist horse-flogging that can take place in serial dramas. Enter the memoir format of Not That Kind of Girl, where Dunham was granted much more scope to politicize and brand herself in an economically extravagant fashion. The original book deal, struck in 2012, was worth north of $3.5 million.

Throwing the innocent Barry under the bus for her own fame

Shocking with dresses or rape accusations that back-pedal within the same book achieves the same end: gaining attention.

It took Lena Dunham an eternity to address whether the Oberlin Barry identified by many was, in fact, the man she accused (or didn't accuse?) of rape in her memoir. The apology that she finally gave Barry was self-serving, disingenuous and beyond woefully late. Simultaneously, it fits in with the general picture of someone who made the accusation in the book to stack up the sort of attention-grabbing headlines that translate to more riches and admiration from others. Book sales only increased due to the "sauciness" of the "Barry" scandal.

It would have been clear to an individual with the awareness and moral conscience of a Pol Pot that once someone had been confused for "Barry", the unjustified embarrassment, scrutiny and panic for that person would have bordered on heart attack-producing. Not that that mattered terribly much to Dunham, as was shown by her untenable delay in issuing a response. To add insult to injury for the blameless Barry, her mea culpa to him came through the wonderfully serious and reputable medium of a Buzzfeed essay. Go figure.

Always count the dollars and other benefits for celebrity rape accusers

Janice Dickinson had experienced massive financial problems prior to her allegations against Bill Cosby.

In trying to “resolve” the “Barry” debacle, Dunham said she changed the name of her “attacker” to “protect him.” Aside from this being an immediate, additional red flag about the veracity of her underlying account, it underscores, again, the opportunistic nature of the situation as a vehicle for her own self-promotion, wealth, and fame. By positioning herself, as she has voraciously tried to, as a “sexual assault on campus advocate,” Dunham will generate even more income than before. The “1-in-5” myth and its attendant hysteria sells, that’s for sure.

Like Emma Sulkowicz, whose catatonic “rape sex tape” I covered recently, “the voice of her generation” has been able to weave a hazy, unproven story into a personal narrative amenable to great career and social advancement, all without a court of law to properly validate it. Consciously or unconsciously, other women, including the historic coke-head, washed up supermodel and discarded TV presenter Janice Dickinson, have realized the power and attention that comes with “coming forward” well after their star power has faded.

SJWs will grant the makers of unverifiable rape accusations all the secular sainthood in the world. This must be challenged. Rape accusations are not only too easily believed in our dogmatically anti-due process societies, they come with a host of privileges, no matter how far-fetched they are or how long it takes for them to be made.

As the real, innocent Barry learned, badly written fiction is usually the better story for feminists.

Read More: Lena Dunham And The Hollowness Of Millennial Girls

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Who Is Special, And Who Is Not: The Fluid Concepts Of Race, Gender, And Privilege

June 15, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Recent news stories compel us to reflect on the interconnected themes of identity and privileged classes. The American media informs us that gender is a "fluid concept," and that we should celebrate Bruce Jenner's freakish transformation from man to something other than man. In another story, almost amusing in the confusion that it has sown into the ranks of the far left, there is the revelation that a local NAACP president was actually masquerading as a person of black ancestry.

Where does the "fluid concept" of identity become pure fraud? Who decides what a person is, or is not? The individual, or society? Or is it a bit of both? And, more to the point, why are some people and classes subjected to rigorous scrutiny in these matters, while others get a free pass? These are some of the questions that agitate the mind of the reflective follower of current events. The answers have much to tell us about the nexus between ideas and power.

Who Decides Who Is What?

Bruce Jenner seems to have been a person of conflicted identity for quite some time. Photographs of him from the 1970s, seen in retrospect, now make it clear that something has not been quite right for many decades. To his credit, at least Jenner revealed himself openly in his transformation; everyone knew what was going on. The same cannot be said for Rachel Dolezal, who apparently costumed herself as a black person, and sought societal benefits for an identity that she fraudulently appropriated.

Was Dolezal deluded and unstable, or was she cunningly milking the system for her own benefit? You decide.

Bruce Jenner in the 1970s. No straight man would ever wear a t-shirt like that.

Yet these two individuals, who both ostensibly suffer in varying degrees from mental illnesses, have done us the service of causing us to think about the concept of identity. Can identity be manufactured? If so, is it any less real than one that is inherited from birth? The answers are not entirely clear.

And who decides who gets the benefits? If gender and ethnic identity are whatever a person says they are, how can anyone uphold the concept of racial quotas in hiring or admissions, affirmative action, or preferential treatment for certain minorities or genders? Have such concepts now been rendered out of date? With its embrace of “fluidity” the left has cannibalized itself: in one stroke it has rendered key points in its ideology (privileged treatment for certain classes) irrelevant.

One can only see imagine where all this will lead. If I can assert that I am an American Indian, or a Pacific Islander, or any other protected class on a government application, who can stop me? Can I claim to be a combat veteran by virtue of having seen a lot of Rambo movies, and claim a pension? And how about disabilities? Will the definition of “disability” now be expanded to include those “triggered” by upsetting things they see on the internet?

In the end, these paradoxes will be resolved just as they always have been in the past: by the decrees of power and the interests of the powerful. They will shape the definitions as they see fit, to accomplish the goals they desire. Ideology and definitions will serve the expediency of the moment, and the interests of the privileged classes.

Spain’s Parliament Passes A New Law

Another recent news story that highlights these issues was Spain’s recent enacting of a law that would allow Sephardic Jews, whose ancestors had been expelled from Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492, to apply for Spanish citizenship. Spanish lawmakers are tripping over themselves to show the world how wonderful they are, in attempting to rectify this ancient wrong.

Historians tell us that on March 30, 1492, the joint monarchs ordered the expulsion of all unbaptized Jews from Spain within 120 days. It was a fanatical decree, and one that impoverished tens of thousands of Spanish Jews who were forced to sell their holdings at rock-bottom prices.

Jewish communities which had been in Spain for generations since the coming of the Arabs (and through the caliphates of the Almohads and Almoravids) were suddenly dispossessed and ruined. It is estimated that about 50,000 accepted conversion, and over 100,000 went into exile in Portugal, North Africa, the Balkans, and other parts of the Ottoman Empire.

The story is tragic enough, and Spain's efforts to right this wrong are commendable. But how, after the passage of five centuries, will anyone be able to decide who is descended from a Sephardic Jew expelled from Spain? And what percentage of lineage qualifies: being one percent Sephardic Jew, or ten percent, or twenty? Who decides who is and who is not a Sephardic Jew? How is Spain going to decide who is, and who is not, eligible?

The closer one looks at these matters, the more complicated they become. It would appear that the new Spanish law leaves the field wide open for ethnic fraudsters who want to acquire a European Union passport.

What About Spain's Expulsion Of Muslims?

The Changer - Rudolph Ernst (1854-1932)

Yet there are darker implications that have not been covered by the mainstream press.

While the media has dwelt on the historical plight of Spain's Jews, it has not uttered a whisper of outrage against the even more brutal treatment of Spain's Muslims just seven years after 1492. Their expulsion and tragic diaspora merits no sympathy at all, apparently.

Spanish Muslims arguably contributed far more to Spanish culture and language than did the Sephardic Jews. The Spanish language is imbued with Arabic words and expressions; Andalusian architecture is totally Arabic in form and conception; southern Spanish city names and geographical names are mostly Hispanized Arabic names; classical Spanish music, instruments, and poetry can be traced directly back to Syria and Egypt; and the blood of the Spaniard inherited the passion and zeal of his Arabic ancestors. Without the Moors, Spain is not Spain.

In 1499, the Moors (Spanish Muslims) were ordered out of Spain. In the same way that the Jews were given a choice between conversion and expulsion, so were the Moors. The Islamic population of Granada, which had been specifically guaranteed religious liberty by treaty, was now totally dispossessed. Isabella ordered them out. Spain broke its treaty guaranteeing them residence and religious freedom, and treacherously expelled them.

Francisco Jimenez de Cisneros, a Christian fanatic with the ear of the queen, destroyed all Arabic books he could lay his hands on, and took steps to remove all Moors by force from Castile and Leon. The wealth of Muslim merchants and scholars was confiscated or destroyed. Precious manuscripts of works of science and philosophy, most dating back to the Middle Ages, were lost or destroyed. Thousands died during the deportations.

Muslim merchants were ruined overnight, their families forced to flee for their lives. The persecution took final shape in 1502: a regal edict of February, 1502 gave the Moors the same choice as the Jews a few years before. That is, they had 120 days to choose between exile or conversion.

Moorish leaders pleaded in vain that, when they had governed Spain for hundreds of years, they had given religious liberty to Christians and Jews. It was to no avail. Cardinal Richelieu, himself no stranger to brutal edicts, called the Spanish expulsion order of 1502 "the most barbarous in history." During the decades that followed, over 3,000,000 penniless Muslims went into exile as a result of the edict; it was thirty times the number of expelled Sephardic Jews.

With these cruel edicts, it may be argued that Spain cut its own throat. Its Jews and Muslims were among its most productive citizens. They were merchants, craftsmen, bankers, doctors, book publishers, and scholars. From this point on, an intolerant shadow was cast over Spanish cultural life, enforced by the directives of the Inquisition. It would take centuries for the nation to recover.

Why The Different Treatment?

Yet we did not see the Spanish Parliament this month offer free European Union passports to descendants of the Moors kicked out of Spain. Why not? Why are not the sufferings of the Moors not acknowledged, while the sufferings of the Sephardic Jews are? There were over thirty times more Moors expelled from Spain than were Jews expelled.

The Moors have contributed more to Spanish history and culture. Why is this fact not acknowledged? What is Spain afraid of?

Are some people more special than others? We will see if the Spanish Parliament will dare to offer the same rights to its Moorish victims as it has offered to its Jewish victims. I, for one, am not holding my breath.

Viewing all of this with a dispassionate eye, it is hard to escape the conclusion that the forces of power anoint some groups, and some individuals, as more special than others. Identity, gender, race, and religion are indeed “fluid” concepts: and it is centralized power who will tell us who is who, and what is what.

In an age when anyone can instantly claim they are anything, only one arbiter of identity is left: the prerogatives of the centralized state. And the definition of identity will change when expediency says it must change.

Read More: Why Social Justice Warriors Will Never Be Happy

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Fat People Are A Threat To The Planet

June 15, 2015 | by Tobias Thorpe | Link | Original Link

I've often wondered how social activists can defend obesity while also promoting environmental sustainability. The fact is, fat people aren't just putting a strain on their waistbands, but also on our ecosystem. Fat Acceptance simply is not reconcilable with environmental sustainability.

It's no secret that obesity causes a myriad of health problems, including higher risk of high blood pressure, diabetes, heart disease, and stroke to name only a few. There are plenty of good reasons to lose weight, but few think about the environmental impact.

According to findings based on eleven studies in the Yale Journal of Industrial Ecology, 70% to 80% of environmental degradation comes from three major categories.

- Transportation, especially cars and planes.
- Food production, meat and dairy in particular.
- Energy production for heating, cooling and running household appliances.

Transportation

Have you ever carried a fat girl on your shoulders? I hope not. It requires substantially more energy than carrying a thin one. It’s simple physics. Over time, the energy required to haul all that extra blubber quickly adds up. Automobiles and airplanes are no exception.

A 2004 study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found that for every ten pounds gained by the average American, airlines had to burn 350 million more gallons of fuel to carry the extra weight. That fuel introduced an estimated 3.8 million extra tons of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

In automobiles, fuel efficiency drops dramatically as the engine has to pull more weight. The lighter you are, the less gas you will burn, the less pollution you’ll emit, and the more money you’ll ultimately save. Further, consuming more calories requires extra fossil fuels to create and transport those foods. Obese persons also wear much larger clothing, which requires more energy and resources to both make and transport.

Food Production

Do I really need to explain this one? According to a 2010 report on environmental impact, agriculture, and meat and dairy production in particular, accounts for 70% of global freshwater consumption, 38% of the total land use and 19% of the world's greenhouse gas emissions.

In the United States, two-thirds of adults are overweight or obese. By some estimates, the average American consumes about 4,000 calories per day, twice what is needed. Many of these calories come from meat and dairy. Even more come from government-subsidized corn, which is used to sweeten nearly every processed food.

Energy Production

Social activists are correct, fat people are hot. In the summer, body fat has a thermal effect similar to wearing a blanket over the body. Obesity gives the sensation of feeling warmer when exposed to summer temperatures. Because of this, fat people are less likely to spend time active outdoors, preferring air conditioning to keep them cool. In the winter they are warmer, but this can be compensated for by wearing warm clothing.

Research suggests there's a clear link between obesity and watching television, at least for children. Surprisingly, watching television isn't necessarily making children fat. Rather, fat kids just watch more television. This translates into heavier energy use at home.

Conclusion

Fat people simply require more energy, which translates into a much larger carbon footprint. Many social activists promote obesity as an acceptable alternative lifestyle. However, for the sake of our planet's future, we can only hope they see the error of their ~~ways~~ weighs.

Read More: Monsanto Ruins American Bodies

Tobias Thorpe

Tobias is a defender of men and masculinity. His interests are self improvement, individualism, and culture.

How To Restore Civilization By Following St. Benedict’s Example

June 15, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

Civilization is dying. Denizens of the manosphere attribute society’s terminal illness to numerous causes, and there are as many prescriptions as there are men, but the fact of Western cvilization’s rapidly approaching demise is acknowledged by all.

Progressive propaganda to the contrary, history is not a straight line culminating in the glorious present, but rather a cycle of various cultures rising and declining. If complete systemic collapse is inevitable, we can take lessons from another time when men saw their world crashing down around them.

The Western Roman Empire

The fall of the Western Roman Empire was the end of the world as our ancestors knew it. One man isolated himself from the corruption and decadence of Western Europe to pursue his goals above all else. Benedict of Nursia’s name is now circulating among the Christian blogosphere as they discuss the so-called “Benedict Option.”

Who was Saint Benedict? And what lessons can we take from his life and work?

The Man

The earliest record of St. Benedict’s life (480 AD-547) comes from the pen of Pope St. Gregory the Great (540-604). Tradition holds that he was born into a noble Roman family at a time when all bonds of laws, customs, and civil order were dissolving. Christianity, the official religion of the empire, was rife with heresy and schism. Benedict’s parents hoped their son would study the fine arts and live the comfortable life of a Roman noble.

Benedict, however, was disgusted by the hedonistic excess he saw in his contemporaries. At the age of 14, he fled to Subiaco, about 40 miles distant from Rome. For the sake of God, Benedict vowed to live by the work of his hands.

Most of us are not going to live in a cave and practice subsistence farming like Benedict, but there are still lessons to be learnt from his early life. The first step is to wean ourselves from the influence of pop culture as much as practicable. Turn off the TV and pick up the books that have withstood the test of time. For Benedict, his one book was the Bible, as we will see later in his life.

The Mentor

Neither earthquakes nor World Wars can keep Monte Cassino down

Benedict lived in the wilderness for three years and, Pope Gregory tells us, he grew to know himself and the ways of his fellow man. During that time, he was given a monastic habit by another monk living a similar life of solitude named Romanus. Romanus taught Benedict all he knew of pursuing a life of holiness and discipline. Benedict proved an able student, for upon the death of a local monastery’s abbot, the monks approached Benedict, knowing of his great reputation, and requested that he become the new abbot.

It proved a disaster. The monks grew tired of the discipline Benedict sought to impose upon their unruly lives and they attempted to poison him. Benedict returned to the wilderness but eventually other laymen approached and asked to learn of the monastic life.

Benedict was mentored by Romanus who had spent many years acquiring the experience of labor, discipline, and holiness. Benedict in turn mentored the hundreds of men who asked for his wisdom, which led to the establishment of monasteries that remain standing to this day such as Monte Cassino and Saint Scholastica at Subiaco.

Normal men enjoy being mentored and mentoring to others. Humility in the 21st century is often associated with being a passive doormat for others. Traditionally, humility simply means seeing ourselves as we truly are. Nobody knows it all and we can always learn something from others (if only what not to do). Benedict wrote down what he knew in his famous Rule, one of the seminal documents of Western civilization.

The Rule

The Rule of St. Benedict was written as a guide for monasteries. While many of its contents do not apply to those of us outside the monastic life, the Rule has endured for so long because of its keen insights into human nature and its flexibility. For example, Benedict has this to say about alcohol:

> The superior will determine when local conditions, work or the summer heat indicates the need for a greater amount [of wine]. He must take great care lest excess or drunkenness creep in. We read that monks should not drink wine at all, but since the monks of our day cannot be convinced of this, let us at least agree to drink moderately, and not to the point of excess, for wine makes even wise men go astray (Sir 19:2).

Whether it's wine or food or any number of indulgences, some men should abstain all together while some are strong enough to enjoy in moderation. The abbot's responsibility is to know his charges and the monk's responsibility is to know himself. Benedict knew that he couldn't be everywhere at once, nor could he know all of the details of every monastery's unique character and needs. The Rule offers broad guidelines but trusts the reader to make any necessary adjustments on their own.

The Rule divides the monk's day between work and prayer. Monks meet in the chapel seven times per day to pray the Psalms and listen to readings from the Old or New Testaments. The rest of the time, they would perform manual labor because "When they live by the labor of their hands, as our fathers and the Apostles did, then they are really monks."

The Lessons

Benedict believed that idleness was the enemy of the soul. For the 21 st century layman, there have never been more opportunities for idleness. How many men do we know who constantly read articles on sites like Return of Kings but never actually do anything with what they've learned? How many of our brothers spend their free time drinking to excess, eating Doritos, playing video games, and generally wasting their lives away?

Aristotle, and later Saint Thomas Aquinas, described virtue as good habits. The virtuous man becomes that way by repeatedly doing good things. Those of us who have no plans to be monks can still derive much benefit from following a similar rule. Develop a set time for going to the gym, or reading good books, or engaging in prayer or meditation.

The idea behind monastic life is it is easier to live a disciplined life when we have friends who share the same goals and avoid those who do not. We can offer support to one another when we inevitably experience setbacks and failures. That is one of the great lessons offered by the Rule: be patient with yourself and others as you work toward your goals. Rome wasn't built or destroyed in a day.

It's worth noting that Benedict had no intention of saving Western civilization from itself. His goal was to work out his salvation and he pursued that goal to the exclusion of all else, subjecting his body to rigorous disciplines that would make any of us wince.

Through his example he attracted followers who wanted what he had. What is it what we want out of life? Do we have the fortitude to pursue it in the single-minded fashion of Saint Benedict?

Read More: Is Civilization Just Another Name For Slavery?

Andrew Levinson

Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

30 Facebook Pictures That Confirm Red Pill Truths

June 16, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Though the use of social media is at an all time high, there's no shortage of detractors who get on their high horses and preach about how it's leading the demise of our culture (and then, of course, posting a selfie). While there is a lot of truth in what they point out, social media does have its uses.

Advertising, promotion, and a host of other uses have made their respective founders extremely wealthy. There is, however, another use for sites like Instagram, Twitter, and Facebook not related to making money that can help a man improve his life:

Red pill truth.

Once a man becomes unplugged and scrolls though his social media feeds, it's as though the world has been decoded to finally show him what's lurking between the lines. As a result he sees the world, more specifically the sexual marketplace, for what it really is.

Remember this scene?

I use Twitter mainly to stay up to date on the goings on in the ‘sphere and posting the occasional crimson capsule thought or observation. I use Facebook to occasionally keep up with friends and family but mostly to demonstrate high value and establishing preselection, as most of my pictures are of me engaging in outdoor activities with my buddies, my adventures through travel, and of course, countless pictures with girls.

Over the past few months I’ve collected a series of memes, someecards, and the like to spur ideas for future articles. But instead I’ve decided to put them all in one place to show that similar to the eyes being the window into one’s soul, social media is the window into our degenerate culture.

Each one of these was posted by a Facebook “friend” of mine. You’ll see a mix of confirmations, contradictions, and feminist-inspired wet dreams. The captions will be my own red pill translation (more or less):

Women can’t pair bond after sport fucking her way through her 20s and is admitting she can’t erase the memories of the cock buffet she gorged herself on

No it’s not…and she knows it

She’ll continue to choose the bad boy until she hits the wall

And that, Junior, is where single moms come from

Funny….the illustrated chick is skinny

Women absolving themselves of their bad behavior, present and future, and blaming it on men

A classic example of women not understanding their limitations and the importance of fathers

This man may at least be starting to break through the matrix

Dread game works

Posted by one of my hard core crimson capsule comrades. The hilarity that ensued in the comments section was quite amusing

And when the asshole calls her back, she'll answer on the first ring

The only females who bail betas out of jail are their mothers

I've touched on this truth before: http://goo.gl/OWZOwu

Nice guys finish last

Sluttiness is glorified.

This one was posted by a woman confirming her insatiable need for bad boys between her legs

A telltale sign of rom com overdose

A woman projecting to the world what she wants and needs in a man

False: Every woman wants a man who has it all.

A rare occasion where a woman lets slip what she thinks marriage is really all about

Women want it both ways

Tell us something we don’t already know

We see this all the time

Good question Mr. Wonka

Posted by a friend of mine. I was encouraged that he may be starting to see the light….

…until he posted this

This question (and subsequent answer) crosses all races

Translation: I'm about to hit the wall and I need to lock a man down quick

"No man wants a woman who's everywhere, doing everything with everybody. Turn down for what? A wedding ring you hoodrat."

Another example of a man who seems to be on the brink of a realization

If this were true, she'd be cheating on him. And where's her spotter?

Bonus

That's fucking scary….

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 20 Signs That We're Not Living In A Patriarchy

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Is Kacee Boswell Lying About Being Raped By Ronnie Radke?

June 16, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Falling in Reverse vocalist Ronnie Radke has become the latest celebrity embroiled in a spurious rape case. Two weeks ago, Radke was accused of raping Salt Lake City resident Kacee Boswell following Falling in Reverse's performance at the Murray Theater on June 3. Radke is being accused by both Boswell herself as well as her friend Levi Rounds, who alleged that Radke "gang raped" Boswell "with [his] bodyguard as backup" and declared that he was going to "ruin" Radke's "shit career."

In response to the accusations, Radke is suing Boswell for defamation. Last week, Boswell gave a lengthy interview with Alternative Press in which she doubled down on her story:

> Yeah. He gave me two backstage passes. I still have the other one. He texted me [inviting me to the show] and I was like, "Oh, yeah, just send me some passes." I have no shortage of girlfriends who are huge fans of his, but I ended up going by myself.

As ROK publisher Roosh stated in a video several months back, any rape victim who makes a public spectacle of being raped is likely lying. Despite the feminist claims that America is a "rape culture," women who claim to have been raped are given uncritical, fawning treatment by the media, their stories never questioned or investigated.

Society's obsequious treatment of women who cry rape has helped fuel obvious hoaxes such as the UVA rape case, Emma Sulkowicz's "Mattress Performance," the Duke lacrosse rape hoax, and more.

While Boswell's willingness to go to the police gives her a little more credibility than Sulkowicz, Jackie Coakley and other false rape accusers, her attention-seeking behavior calls her integrity into question. By blabbing to the media, Boswell and Rounds are attempting to crucify Radke in the court of public opinion, and by refusing to criticize her claims, journalists are aiding in the potential defaming of an innocent man.

NOTE: Return of Kings attempted to contact both Radke and Falling in Reverse manager John Youngman prior to publishing this article, but neither responded to our requests for comment.

The Lynching Of Ronnie Radke

Kacee Boswell's interview, in addition to amplifying her accusations against Radke, is focused on stirring up social media anger against Radke based solely on her word. For example, throughout the interview, Boswell alleges that she's been on the receiving end of online "harassment" from Falling in Reverse fans:

> I didn't say that. I don't want to get into explicit detail about what happened with Ronnie and I. My lawyers have told me not to. I've been completely barraged by text messages and phone calls saying I should kill myself, saying that I'm too ugly to be raped. I've been accused of extorting him for money and all sorts of things. My statement to those people is: "Wait until the rape kit comes back" and the police report gets sorted out with the witness. The witness did say that he was going to talk to the police and tell the truth, which completely contradicts Ronnie's statement [to AP]. [The witness tells AP he is cooperating with police, but refused to speculate as to whether a crime was committed. He indicated he > will decline any future press requests. – Ed.]

Note the misdirection here. Boswell is unwilling to discuss the details of her rape and insists that her detractors wait for the police to investigate, yet she's continuing to cry rape to the media.

By gallivanting about the Internet accusing Radke of rape, Boswell is fueling both lynch mob anger at Radke as well as any supposed "harassment" she is receiving. Additionally, it's incredibly unusual for a rape victim to be more concerned with her image online then with the actual rape she suffered.

Additionally, while Boswell is purporting to claim that people shouldn't rush to judgment, she is also clearly attempting to rally opposition to Radke despite the ongoing police investigation:

> They wanted to head to a bar and I was telling them The Woodshed was too far to go to. Where they dropped me off was close to where I was staying, but they literally just pushed me out of the car. All of this is will come out with the police report, but that's not going to come out for a few days. One in three women have been sexually assaulted and only two percent of rapes get convicted here. So the numbers are definitely not in my favor. Utah is completely [backlogged] with rape kits. I've had a rape kit done in Utah before. The last time I was sexually assaulted, the guy was on the sex offender registry [for] having assaulted people twice before. I'm getting so much harassment online. I've been getting phone calls from people saying they're going to find me and kill me. I've been harassed to the point where I'm depressed as hell and I'm scared as fuck.

Note also Boswell's cold, clinical parroting of dubious feminist rape statistics. This would imply that she has an ulterior agenda in accusing Radke.

Finally, Boswell's story is full of obvious holes. For example, as pointed out by commenters on the article, Boswell's claims about being pushed out of an Uber car by Radke and his bodyguard are inconsistent. While this in and of itself is not enough to completely discredit her story, it casts doubt on her honesty and integrity.

All Public Rape Accusations Are False

Kacee Boswell's grandstanding in the media is easily contrasted with the reaction of an actual, verified rape victim: porn star Cytherea. After she was the victim of a home invasion and violent gang rape, Cytherea didn't take to the media to draw attention to herself, and her few media appearances in the wake of the rape showed her clearly distraught and emotionally shattered.

In comparison, Boswell's calm, collected recitation is reminiscent of notorious Columbia rape liar Emma Sulkowicz.

While we can't say for certain whether Boswell's accusations against Ronnie Radke are false, all signs point to her being a jilted groupie out for revenge. If this story turns out to be yet another false rape hoax, no one should be surprised.

Read More: 9 People In The Media Who Are Upset Jackie Coakley Wasn't Raped By White Men

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Ignore This Key Tenet Of Game At Your Own Peril

June 16, 2015 | by Ray Coleman | Link | Original Link

You know, there was a time—circa 1980 to 2002—when all you had to worry about when approaching women with sloppy, half-baked game was getting laughed at or, at the very worst, getting a drink thrown in your face. I'm here to tell you that them good ol' days are gone.

We now live in a world where fumbling, bumbling guys who try to approach anything other than 300 pound land whales, 40-year-old spinsters, or women with three kids by five different dudes run a good chance of getting accused of "street harassment," charged with rape, or as the male model who ran into Sarah McKenzie-Ayres found out, getting their skulls cracked open with a champagne bottle.

Sex, Lies, And Kayaks

Sometimes the real problem starts when you approach, pick up, and then start dating the wrong woman, as the late Vincent Viafore found out a few weeks ago. For those who haven't been keeping up with the story, on April 19, Vincent Viafore a 46-year old gainfully employed project manager, was kayaking with his 35-year-old fiancée, Angelika Graswald in the Hudson River when Mr. Viafore's kayak suddenly capsized.

Ms. Graswald stated that she'd done everything she could to save her fiancé (whose body has not yet been recovered), but it didn't take long for her story to crumble under the weight of several inconsistent statements she made to police. Eventually, she cracked and not only admitted to tampering with her late fiancé's kayak and deliberately capsizing her own to make it look like she was trying to save him, but also admitted that she “felt happiness and relief” watching him drown.

Of course, she gave the usual reasons women give for committing cold-blooded murder: her fiancé loved rough sex, he wanted threesomes, etc. (but it’s funny how nobody’s killed James Deen or Nacho Vidal yet, so there goes that excuse). Turns out that, as Bruce Willis tried to tell us on the last few Die Hard sequels, it was about the money all along: Graswald was the beneficiary on two life insurance policies belonging to Viafore, and stood to gain $250,000.00 after his death.

Reclaiming What Was Lost: The Art Of Discernment

I guess that’s her “come hither” look.

While the incidents I’ve just recapped are horrific, our focus must go beyond what these women did and why they did it. The question we really need to be asking ourselves is how these two men could have avoided the fates that befell them.

I think the key to that is dusting off a basic cornerstone of game that few people talk about nowadays: the art of objectively and rigorously scrutinizing one’s sexual prospects. Unfortunately, this art has been largely ignored in the current climate of thirsty betas and sexual scavengers.

Desperation will make a man blind to subtle hints as to what kind of woman he’s dealing with, and will even cause him to miss more obvious signs. So how do you work this into your game repertoire?

Let’s start with Sarah McKenzie-Ayres (pictured above). I could be overreaching, but just her demeanor alone (not just her looks, though those are a factor, too) would’ve prompted me to steer clear of her if I saw her at the club. The first thing I wouldn’t have been able to get over is the fact that she looks too much like Mindy-friggin’ Kaling:

The second thing I would've noticed is that her energy is just all wrong. Look closely at her eyes, her hands, how she's standing, everything. She looks miserable. The fact that she's actually a law student accounts for some of that. But she just looks like someone who was an unhappy, insecure soul even before she entered law school.

Problem is, now that she's on the cusp of attaining something akin to power and influence for the first time in her life, she's gone from super-insecure to super-egotistic, overcompensating for her past social, mental, and emotional hangups. I didn't see anyone go into full detail about how things went down with the recipient of her champagne bottle, but I'm sure it started with him making a half-assed attempt to hit on her.

Little Miss Law Degree wasn't having any of that (because as an educated, empowered woman, only millionaires should be stepping to her), and probably gave some indication to that effect. Zoolander misses the hint, and keeps going, rolling through his mental Rolodex of canned pickup lines. The next thing he knows, he's waking up in the ER.

It would behoove novices to pay close attention to solid practitioners of game in the club. Ever notice how they all have that thousand-yard "hunter mode" stare? That's the "sight beyond sight" stare. They're walking and looking around, scoping out the scene, spotting who the rape accusers and tire-slashers are, spotting the chick who's banging the club owner who likely has a loaded .45 stuck in his belt.

Truth be told, you should be more focused on your environment and the people in it than on what you're going to say anyway, because in the end analysis, correctly assessing the former helps you tailor the latter for maximum effect.

The Cautionary Tale Of Vincent Viafore

We've covered how being game savvy can keep you out of trouble in the dating world, but what about the long haul? As posters have said in the past, game never ends, even when you're married. A key component of LTR-game is knowing about your significant other's background. Vincent Viafore's tragic mistake was not looking close enough into his fiancée's past. If he had done his homework, he would have found out what the New York Times reporters discovered:

> Ms. Graswald, a native of Latvia, kept her married name despite divorcing Mr. Graswald's son in 2009. But online and with Mr. Viafore, she used a > different last name, Lipska…

That would've been Red Flag Number One. What was Red Flag Number Two?

> Mr. Viafore, who held a well-paying job as a project manager, had been supporting [Ms. Graswald] since she quit her job as a bartender.

Red Flag Number Three comes by way of CBS News:

> Mike Colvin, a disc jockey in Poughkeepsie whom [Graswald] lived with from November 2008 to June 2010, described Graswald as a person who could walk into a room full of strangers and know everyone's name by the time she left. But he said she also had authority issues and could make unwise snap decisions when angry. According to Colvin, she had been through two marriages and a string of jobs by her mid-30s, and her impulsiveness apparently contributed to a checkered job history at restaurants and other businesses.

Then, there's Red Flag Number Four:

You can practically hear a whole battalion of banshees, hamsters and hobgoblins marching around in there.

The signs were there, and yet Mr. Viafore missed every single one of them. For most students of neomasculine thought, the fact that Griswald couldn't hold a job would have revealed her as the scatter-brained type of broad you relegate to the role of occasional bang buddy.

The multiple marriages should have definitely been deal-breakers. All of this pointed to a woman who cared about nothing that didn't revolve around whatever wants and perceived "needs" she had at the moment.

In Conclusion

It used to be that a guy would only suffer minor consequences from dumpster diving for bargain bin chicks or stepping to the plate with substandard game. Now, that shit can get you arrested, maimed or killed. A lot of women are running on high-octane hypergamy and entitlement, and if they think you're using up even one millisecond of time they could be devoting to chasing an Alpha, they will make you pay.

The only guys who can pull off dealing with women like this for any appreciable period of time are the one or two guys who operate on the extreme end of the "Dark Triad" spectrum. But for the other 98% of men in America, the best thing to do is add awareness and discernment to your game toolbox to sniff out and avoid these types of women altogether. You have been warned.

Read More: 7 Basic Life Hacks Men Shouldn't Ignore

Ray Coleman
Ray is just an average Joe who has an interesting way of viewing the world. When he's not pondering the deeper meaning of the human condition, he's fishing off the coast of Florida and trying to figure out which driver can get him over the 180-yard mark.

Pride Parades Are A Pathetic And Detrimental Attempt At Promoting Gay Rights

June 17, 2015 | by Seth Rose | Link | Original Link

Historically, marches have served as a means for oppressed people to get their voices heard. For example, the marches Martin Luther King Jr. and his followers engaged in lead to drastic changes in civil rights.

Gay Pride parades take a different approach. It is not people walking throughout the city, dressed in pressed pants and dresses, marching silently side by side in solidarity. Rather, it is comprised of people wearing revealing clothes (if any at all), dancing, yelling, and engaging in utter debauchery.

In fact, if you or I did what many people do during gay pride parades we'd probably be sent to jail and registered as a sex offender. Yet, the gay community wonders why their culture is still not completely accepted by society.

Gay Pride: Coming To A City Near You

We're tired of being oppressed!

An ironic aspect of Pride events is that they take place in the most docile and "progressive" enclaves in a city. The DC Pride event took place in Dupont Circle—an affluent neighborhood in Northwest DC known for its large gay community.

If the goal of this group is to create awareness and tolerance in the community at large, then why do they choose the locations that are already accepting of gays? Wouldn't it make sense to host these events in parts of DC where people in the LGBT community have been stabbed and murdered?

Logically, yes. But these events are not governed by logic, but rather by excess and pleasure. They want to choose the trendy spots with all the best bars and restaurants. A place where people can congregate, drink, smoke, and party without having to deal with the realities gay and trans people actually face just a few miles down the road.

Gay people do have it tough around the world, however. ISIS, which is building its caliphate as we speak, is throwing gays off rooftops and beheading them. The LGBT community's collective response?

"More Jello shots!"

Okay, that's not completely fair. The LGBT community is busy bugging the Pentagon to change its policies—just not towards ISIS. Rather, they are lecturing the US government on how they can promote gays in the military.

[image]
I'm sure Russia and China are shaking in their boots…

They Ignore The Real Issues

Another fact check for the yuppy, white LGBT crowds is that the majority of gay and trans people who genuinely do suffer (and not from micro-aggressions) in America are mostly minority. If you look at the list of those who suffered significant beatings or murders because of their sexual identity, they are disproportionately black and Hispanic—the same goes for the perpetrators of these crimes.

But that's an inconvenient truth for most white liberals, who prefer to reside in wealthy, gentrified neighborhoods and not mingle with people who can't buy designer jeans and afford $50 brunches. In fact, gay pride parades are virtually exclusive to white people. Gay white men complain about suffering from prejudice, yet gay black men are marginalized at these events—so much for discrimination.

Just as liberals have let homicides skyrocket and cities burn at the expense of promoting their delusional ideologies, they will continue to let fellow gay minorities and trans people suffer.

The Efficacy Of Pride Parades

In whatever events and activities you engage in, you should always be monitoring the results. When it comes to Pride parades they need to ask: Are they accomplishing their goals?

The answer is a resounding no.

Why would any culture embrace this?

What sane society would tolerate people prancing through the streets in their underwear performing mock BDSM acts in broad daylight?

None, but if you remotely question their behavior like I am, you are immediately labeled a homophobe. That is why the gay-lobby in America has to be ruthless in shoving their agenda down the throats of Americans.

They have gone so far as to drive a small pizza shop out of business for saying they would not supply pizza to an imaginary gay wedding (and who the hell orders pizza for a wedding?).

If gays really wanted to assimilate into societies around the world, they wouldn't have pride parades, or at least they would be exponentially more civil about it.

The only reason gay people garner attention is because they choose to embrace their own "culture," which consists of engaging in socially deviant behavior. But to hell with social norms, right? That's just a product of white patriarchy trying to keep people down. Social norms have never accomplished anything, or so the refrain goes.

We know that multiculturalism doesn't work, and has been an abysmal failure in every country it has been promoted. So why do we continue to promote LGBT culture, one that is in stark contrast to the Judeo-Christian culture upon which American and Western civilization has been built?

The Future Of Gay Pride And Activism

Any culture that goes out of its way to promulgate excessive sexuality and hedonism in any form (including heterosexuality), is setting itself up for disaster. Nonetheless, pride parades will continue to grow.

These events are going more mainstream every year. They now have corporate sponsors like Marriott vying to show how much they love the LGBT community. In reality, these companies are just trying to make a quick buck off wealthy gays. They're also being touted as "family events."

Many LGBT rights groups have failed to show maturity and respect towards existing cultures. Instead, they adopt the "We're here. We're queer. Get Used to it!" mentality.

I, for one, will not get used to it. I will not sit idly by and say that such debauchery should be accepted, let alone encouraged in our society. And nor should gay people themselves.

Most cultural events feature music, dance, history and more featuring the best aspects of their culture, but gay cultural events feature irresponsible and deviant behavior. It is the duty of gays to make the changes they want to see. The LGBT community should come together to put an end to these parades, which only tarnish their reputation.

Unfortunately, this is highly unlikely. Politicians, professors, college students, Tumblr "bloggers" and crew will continue to cheer such nonsense on, enabling them to continue their self-destructive behavior.

Someone has to put their foot down. The question is, who will and when?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Brandon Bostian's Amtrak Crash Exposes The Problems With Homosexuals In America

Seth Rose
Seth Rose is a modern day Renaissance Man who has an insatiable appetite for adventure, knowledge and women. You can check out his sites Seth Rose Life and Masculine Books, and follow him on Twitter.

Why Adelaide Has The Best Women In Australia

June 17, 2015 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

Australia is a beautiful country that unfortunately houses some of the most entitled, masculine, and feminist women on the planet. Many grew up with the economy firing on all cylinders courtesy of a sustained mining boom, and as a result have been able to enjoy a very high standard of living their entire lives. Men in industries such as mining and agriculture are the pillar of the Australian economy, and work long hours in tough conditions in remote areas.

You would think Australian women would at least have a grudging respect for the hard masculine labour that built a strong economy enabling them to enjoy cushy government, HR, and marketing jobs. Strangely, it is trendy for the left-wing "elite" (feminists and manginas) to hate on these industries, especially mining. A culture of envy (known locally as "tall poppy syndrome") and a rabid insistence on biting the hand that feeds you are definitely two of the most puzzling things about contemporary Australian life.

A masculine culture lost

Up until recently, Australia had a very masculine culture. Men were rugged and hardy, called a spade a spade, and enjoyed nothing more than a beer and a laugh with their mates. Unfortunately, in somewhat of a mass censorship campaign, feminists, social justice warriors, and left-leaning media and education spheres have been stunningly successful in creating a stifling atmosphere of political correctness.

Whilst this paints a bleak picture for Australian men, things have to change. After six years of the most incompetent, left-wing government in the nation's history and with the mining boom over, Australia has run out of money. This reality is strongly denied by the lefties, but the rubber has to hit the road at some point.

Former Prime Minister Julia Gillard: a truly charming lady

In the meantime, whether you are a local or visiting Australia, you need to make the most of the situation. Overall the environment is pretty poor if you are a man with standards, but as you will see, there are diamonds in the rough if you know where to look.

If all you are interested in is a meaningless pump and dump, Australia has no shortage of sluts to cater to your depraved desires. However, this article is intended to be advice for the more discerning man.

Australian Girls 101

Most women you meet out on the town will be loud, drunk, and annoying. Anything that requires them to think should be avoided at all costs. Australian game is all about being fun and spontaneous. And always, always involve alcohol.

Aussie girls are generally very slutty, but only with a certain kind of guy. If you are over 6 foot, good-looking, and well-built, you definitely have a very big advantage and should have no trouble pulling women. They absolutely love European and South American cock, but American guys, who are perceived as arrogant, are absolutely nothing special. Of course, if you are a well-known celebrity or sportsman, that doesn't apply.

If you are looking for a woman with lower mileage, decent values, and a thin figure, I strongly recommend somebody of relatively recent immigrant background, especially Brazilian, Italian, Polish, or Ukrainian. They are nowhere near as easy and their families will be deeply suspicious of you until you earn their trust and respect, but like most things in life, if you want to reap the rewards, you have to put in the work. Unsurprisingly, they also tend to be far more beautiful than the local "sheilas."

Normally Australians hate immigrants, but funnily enough no man is complaining about this one

Regional guide

Australia is a huge place, with each city having its own distinct characteristics:

Sydney

Sydney girls have been well-documented. They are obsessed with money, career, and status, but have average looks at best. You'll get plenty of models hanging out on Bondi Beach, but if you aren't rich you won't get a look in. Lara Bingle represents the typical Sydney "hot chick." Looks pretty good in a bikini, nice set of tits, but the intelligence of a garden gnome and an absolutely insufferable human being—the fact she deliberately flushed her $200,000 engagement ring down the toilet should tell you all you need to know.

If you are lucky you might meet a hot tourist, but if not, you will discover that like most things in Sydney, the women are massively overpriced. Whilst Sydney has the highest gross number of hot models in Australia, the average woman is absolutely nothing special – but will refuse to settle for anything less than a tall, rich, handsome man.

Brisbane / Gold Coast

In case you were wondering, this is what a bogan looks like

The "Sunshine State" has a fantastic climate, and some claim the Gold Coast is a poosy paradise. However, if you are like me and prefer women with a modicum of class and respectability, this region will bring a tear to your eye. The Gold Coast is the undisputed home of the rough as guts "bogan." The girls are ultra slutty, so if you like your women rude, crude, and heavily tattooed, you will be in heaven. Just remember to bag it up!

Brisbane is slightly more tolerable, but if you enjoy pleasant, feminine ladies your best option is a hot tourist. However, for every one of them is about 50 extremely thirsty guys—the trick is to get to them quickly before interacting with a local loses its novelty.

Melbourne

My hometown. Australia's second largest city has terrible weather in winter and is no gaming wonderland, but the women are definitely better than in Sydney. A significant portion of young, good looking women are "footy chicks," notorious for chasing AFL players. However, there are strong music, art, film, and dining scenes, and many desirable Italian girls if that is your thing. Try the Albert Park Hotel or The Emerson at South Yarra.

Canberra

This is Australia's Washington DC. It isn't called "The People's Republic of Canberra" for nothing – it is left-wing groupthink central. This place is all about mind-numbing conformity. With freezing cold weather, a plague of politically-correct government workers who think their lame job makes them important, and generally mediocre women, it is best avoided.

Perth

Cottesloe: my pick for attractive girls, but the ratio can be tough

Perth is clearly home to Australia's most masculine culture. Here you will find "real men": tall, fit, strong, into football, surfing, and drinking. This may be due to its location in the middle of nowhere. Far away from the limp-wristed culture of the inner-city pansies of the east coast, the locals seem somewhat insulated from feminist rubbish.

For many years, Western Australia has had by far the strongest economy of any state. Many local men cut their teeth in the mines, hard work with high pay. The weather is fantastic, and there are some seriously hot women—check out the Cottesloe Beach Hotel on a warm summer weekend for evidence. The only problem is the numbers don't stack up too favourably – most places are serious sausage fests. You are going to need some serious game to stand out with the hotties. You can still get relatively easy sex, but the quality will have you wondering whether it was worth it.

The Outback

The Outback: no sign of any feminists, but unfortunately no sign of any women period!

A true proving ground. If you can pull a hot chick here, you can pull a hot chick anywhere. In my early 20s, I briefly lived in a country town after taking a job as an engineer. Quality was a serious problem, and the ratio had to be seen to be believed – in most country towns, girls move away when they turn 18, but many men stay to work on farms or in fishing.

Expect a hostile reception from local men, who are in no mood to share their precious few resources. If you go to a pub, wearing a mouthguard is recommended. If you really are determined to pick up, you will be forced to lower your standards and be prepared to fight. That said, the men from the bush represent the last vestiges of true Australian masculinity. They couldn't give a fuck about political correctness, and are rough around the edges, but tend to be genuine.

Adelaide

Adelaide: stuck in the 1980s and the highest unemployment rate in Australia, but for hot, accessible women look no further

"The Cemetery with Traffic Lights" is laughed at by everyone else in Australia for being a hick backwater. It is true Adelaide seems stuck in the 1980s, and is the epicenter of "can't do" culture – where else would prime commercial land lie vacant for more than 20 years? There is a weird juxtaposition between a stubborn insistence on living in the past and a strong political leaning to the left.

Sounds like an absolute shithole, right? Wrong. I'm going to let you in on a little secret. Pound for pound, Adelaide has by far the most attractive and down to earth women in the country. Unlike other states, South Australia wasn't settled by convicts, and this superior gene pool is evident in the beauty of the local women. Their speech is also far more pleasant. Unlike the ugly "bogan" twang of girls from other states, many of them sound

British.

Not only that, but Adelaide is one of the only places Down Under that isn't a sausage fest. Many places will have just as many girls as guys, and if you have a bit of presence, attractive girls will approach you and try and pick you up. I say with complete truth that it is far easier to get an Adelaide 8 than a Sydney 5. Honestly, I have never been to Adelaide for a weekend and failed to pick up an attractive woman. Sound like a wheelbarrow full of horseshit? Get over there and see for yourself!

Hit up places on the East side, as the north and south are downright feral. For university girls, hit up the General Havelock on a Thursday or the Edinburgh on a Tuesday in summer. If you are lucky enough to be in town on Christmas Eve, head to the Robin Hood – you will not believe the talent on offer! In such a favorable environment for men, there is certainly no need for you to dumpster dive and wade through the dregs of online dating, but nevertheless that is what the local betas seem to do.

This is another thing in your favor, because if you have the balls to approach in person you will definitely stand out. For the average guy, there is no better place in Australia to pull a hot babe. You don't need to be rich and you don't need to be famous. You don't even need to trick them with elaborate game tactics. Just be cheeky and confident without teetering over into arrogance. Unlike other places in Australia, most women here are genuinely nice. I think it's because nobody in Adelaide is that big a deal. This, along with the favorable gender ratio, seems to keep a lid on female expectations and maintain their worth for purposes other than short-term fun.

I was so impressed by Adelaide women I looked into moving there. Unfortunately, there are virtually zero options besides mind-numbing government jobs, and its high taxes make starting a business there out of the question. But what do you care about that if you are only there for a holiday?

Conclusion

In summary, if you simply want an easy root, to use the local parlance, and you are prepared to lower your standards, chances are Australian cities will meet your needs. But for the more discerning man, I would seriously consider an Adelaide woman aged 25-30, especially one of recent immigrant background.

Pay no attention to the fact that notorious misandrist Julia Gillard was born overseas and grew up in Adelaide—that is simply an anomaly. For the average man, it will be his best chance to meet a woman he can be pleased with and perhaps even be proud to introduce to his friends and family. Down Under these days, that's no easy feat.

Read More: Why The Native Peoples In Australia Were Doomed

Mark Webster

Mark Webster is an old school Australian who is dismayed by political correctness, the state of the modern woman and the decline of his once beautiful country. He believes the collapse of the family unit is directly attributable to feminism and cultural Marxism.

3 Keys To Unlock Her Wild Side And Avoid The Friend Zone

June 17, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Drexel Scott

If you can't bang the women you bring home, then you won't get your goals met. You won't get laid, you won't approach with confidence, and you definitely won't get into relationships from a beneficial frame.

Given a postfeminist society which encourages hypergamy at every possible opportunity, even if your goal is to find a woman with whom to start a family and establish your name, then you will still need to know how to close fast—or risk losing the girl forever.

On the other hand, if you have the right mindsets and techniques to consistently close the women you bring home, then a whole world of sexual possibility will open up to you: one night stands, casual or serious relationships, and a sense of confidence and power that will carry you through your days on point and feeling great.

It's the difference between spending three hours with a girl just for it all to go to waste, or spending those same hours and taking her as your newest lover. The time commitment is the same–only the results are different.

Since sleeping with attractive girls and potentially having children with them are the primary (some would say "only") purposes of your genetic potential, it's tempting to assume that you would already know how to do this.

So why don't you?

Fed a steady diet of misinformation from a young age, many young men grow up completely unable to understand women. Whether it's your parents, your teachers or Disney movies….society has been lying to you. You already know this, because you've been trying what you're told "should" work….and it doesn't.

In fact, it can sometimes even seem like the harder you try, the further away the girl gets pushed, while she throws herself at a guy who "gets it."

It's a lonely, confusing, painful way to live, and so I will share with you the top three things that men absolutely MUST know about women if they hope to stay afloat and alive in today's dating arena.

1. Women Slot Men Into One Of Three Categories

When a woman meets a new man, within a short amount of time, she will have categorized him into one of three "romance potential" categories: either a Loser, a Provider, or a Lover.

A Loser is someone who neither has the potential to provide for her, nor the potential to be a great lover.

A Provider is someone who has more Provider potential than Lover potential—i.e., he is more likely to provide for and protect her with marriage and a house, than he is to seduce her and sweep her off her feet.

A Lover is someone who has more Lover potential than Provider potential—i.e., he is more likely to make her feel charmed and seduce her than he is likely to marry her and give her a family.

She will base her decision on which category to put you in, based on your behavioral cues like the walk you talk, walk, and carry yourself.

2. Women Have Three Distinct "Sexual Personalities"

Due to the shaming nature of society's attitude towards sex, women end up with "fractured" sexual personalities. There is who she REALLY is, who she PRETENDS to be when she wants something, and who she PRETENDS to be when she wants nothing. I will clarify.

The first personality is "The Prude." When she is playing this character, a woman will behave and speak as if she has never or rarely had sex, thinks it is very special, and is possibly saving it for marriage.

The second personality is "The Hypocrite." When she is playing this character, she is trying to convince you she is a Prude while acting like a Free Lover.

The third is "the Free Lover," a woman who loves and enjoys sex for the inherent pleasure it brings. When in this character, she is acting out her wildest and most secret sexual fantasies.

3. Women Base Which Personality They Show You On Which Category You're In

This is the real revelation for many of the men who have benefited from my teachings: that the woman will predictably and repeatedly show different sides of herself depending on her interpretation of what type of man she is dealing with.

Since she bases her decision on his behavioral cues, men can deliberately put themselves into specific categories in her MIND–which, again, determines which personality he sees.

She will generally show her Prude side to a Loser, her Hypocrite side to a Provider, and her Free Lover side to a Lover. Logically, if you want to start getting laid faster and drawing out the wild and animalistic side of a woman–which is to say, unleashing her Free Lover–then you need to know how to stop acting like a Loser or a Provider and how to become a Lover instead.

Even if you wish to eventually be her Provider, you will still need to know how to initially engage in Lover behavior in order to sleep with her and build the bond necessary to take the relationship further.

And that's exactly what I teach in my book, Straight To Sex.

I named it Straight To Sex because, armed with the mindsets and techniques I will teach you, that is exactly what your seduction will look like.

No begging.

No dates.

No extreme financial investment of any kind (that's for the kind of guy who has to earn each and every scrap of her sexuality).

All it takes is getting your behavioral cues dialed down to trigger the proper emotions and behavior from her. Once she's yours, you can develop the relationship in whichever direction you choose.

Learn the skills today and buy the book right here.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

In Defence Of The London Ultra-Orthodox Jews Who Banned Women From Driving

June 17, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

The scandal emerged a fortnight ago that the Belz Hasidim, an Ultra-Orthodox Jewish sect with heavy numbers in London's Stamford Hill, had banned all female members of the community from driving motor vehicles. The group belong to the wider movement and practice of Hasidism, a stream of Ultra-Orthodox Judaism with mystical and messianic overtones.

Hasidim, and especially the Belz, so named after the Ukrainian town they originate from, are known for their kaftans, curly sidelocks and utter restraint and conservatism in their social practices. Coming from such an eccentric quarter, the edict issued by community leaders banning Belz women from driving was sure to stir the pot of the "tolerance" lobby in Britain.

"Not the done thing for a lady to drive"

The essence of the diktat was that women should not drive, for fear of compromising "rules of modesty" as enforced by Belzer rabbis. Kids dropped of by mothers in their cars would not be allowed to come to school for the day, as an enforcement mechanism.

Rabbis provided justification for this in terms of "It's always been regarded as not the done thing for a lady to drive." They also did, however provide for a special process by which mothers who had no other choice but to drive could appeal to a committee to do so. Sounds eminently reasonable when you consider that the Belz are a private group of people organising relations between themselves

Roadside poster in Stamford Hill prohibiting women from walking.

The lobby of the Perpetually Aggrieved awakens

The first reaction of rank feminist disapproval came within the fortress. Dina Brawer, the UK ambassador of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance, said: “What this is really about is the curtailing of women’s freedom of movement rendering them dependent on men. It’s an issue of power and control not one of religious sensibility.

Or, translated from sociology-speak:

> Muh patriarchy

Another Jewish critic, Ella Marks of the “League of Jewish Women” said “I can see no question of it being immodest and I would not want a repeat of the situation in Saudi Arabia which is certainly a patriarchal society.”

Saudi Arabia. Because the degradation of not being allowed to drive is concomitant with the degradation of having an Sheikh use you as a personal shitter for $10,000 a night.

After this, as if like clockwork, the government piled in. Nicky Morgan, one of David Cameron’s government appointments on the basis that the appointee has a vagina, the cabinet’s Education Secretary, raised her quota-hire head above the parapet to say that such a ban was “unacceptable.”

Nicky Morgan is a Tory lickspittle keen to be seen to look good before the Feminist lobby

Gloria De Piero MP, perennial bag of useless and Labour Party politician, even wrote to the chief Quango in charge of Human Rights, the Equalities and Human Rights Commission, to ask them to investigate the Belzers. A private group arranging their own affairs! Her complaints were based on Labour's freedom-destroying Equality Act legislation.

The complaint precipitated more pompous letter-writing between the nonentities at the EHRC and the nonentities in the Labour Party, until the following statement was issued by a "spokesperson" at the EHRC:

> This sort of discrimination has no place in our society and we will be writing to leaders of Hasidic Belz educational institutions to underline their legal obligations.

"Our society" by which the mean of course the society of humourless, lawbook-waving turds in suits who profess to build the progressive utopia that Lenin and Stalin didn't quite manage to.

By nannying and mollycoddling everyone from cradle to grave.

For the greater good.

What the Ultra Orthodox Jews had to say for themselves

A reactionary writing in the Jewish press and defending the ban posed the requisite question: "is there nothing else [apart from the ban] to talk about right now? Are England's schools filled to the brim with stable, well-adjusted thriving children?"

As if to vindicate the rhetoric of the complainant, an adherent of Hasidism himself, two weeks later in a separate case, a 14-year old in Bradford stabbed his teacher. He was remanded in custody at Bradford Magistrates' Court for attempted murder.

Stamford Hill Jews celebrating the Jewish holiday of Purim

Moreover, these terribly oppressed Belz women, who are so incapable of articulating a thought that they need a raft of self-appointed moral protectors to speak on their behalf through the intermediary of the British Quangocracy, even issued a statement. They said they felt "extremely privileged and valued to be part of a community where the highest standards of refinement, morality and dignity are respected."

"We believe that driving a vehicle is a high pressured activity where our values may be compromised by exposure to selfishness, road-rage, bad language and other inappropriate behaviour," they went on

"We do, however, understand that there are many who conduct lifestyles that are different to ours, and we do not, in any way, disrespect them or the decisions they make."

So, in other words, very good reasons for not allowing women to drive, and utter acceptance on their part. With a sprinkling of "leave us be if you claim yourself so 'tolerant'."

Perhaps these Belzer folk are onto something. The mainstream British majority, a morass of iPhone-addicted worshipers at the altar of Jade Goody, have little to offer as far "refinement, morality and dignity" are concerned. Just look at this 14 year old girl, who recently appeared in court charged with beating up the boy in the picture. Not many similar cases in the "Belzer" community, I bet.

The state should stay out of regulating the affairs of private individuals

Bar the occasional murmurs of concealed paedophilia, the Hasidic Jewish community appear to be a model of morality in the sea of East London's degeneracy. Just down the road in Hoxton and Shoreditch, every Friday night the town becomes a sea of degeneracy as mandied-up sluts cavort, covered in tattoos and smoking cigarettes and pot, with name-dropping hipster retards from the fashion and entertainment industry and other assorted decadent filth.

Every one of them, to a man, will be readers of the Guardian, and every one will hold the same cookie cutter progressive political positions, and will find themselves disgusted, nay, physically repulsed by the thought that somewhere on their progressive earth, a group of people dares to divide and organise themselves on lines of gender.

Further out into central and north London, we find the leftist intelligentsia who pour their intellectual dross into the vapid empty brains of the hip and fashionable. Sitting in their leafy Islington townhouses, or in their air-conditioned NGOs, these ministers of Secular Good live a life of militant opposition to the very notion of self-determination.

Everybody must subscribe to the same bland, generic list of "human rights." Deviation is impermissible, even when harmless. Cases like the present, as well as cases like the cake shop which was fined for refusing to bake a cake for a gay wedding, are treated as if they were the most abject transgressions against common morality, akin to murder or torture.

Analysts predict the “ironic anti-Semitism” bubble will burst this year.

And in any case, Hasidic Belzers are doing their women a favour by banning them from driving. In the banana state of UK, driving is a liability, and carries a large chance of death under the wheels of some Khat-chewing migrant with no insurance, or slag on her way to a hair appointment who thinks her empowered multitasking capabilities extend to pursuing text message conversations at the wheel of a motor vehicle.

A close look at the Hasidim will reveal that, while the community has its own problems, they have been admirably resistant for the modern malaise of change for the sake of change, and have maintained a harmonious division of the community on gender lines, as well as sky-high birthrates.

Their women are, it should be noted, utterly lacking in shit tattoos, Skrillex haircuts, and sociology degrees. Moreover, much like our own community, they have come and continue to come under sustained assault from the degenerate liberal intelligentsia. For that they deserve a hat-tip, even from the Jew-baiters.

Read More: Is Kacee Boswell Lying About Being Raped By Ronnie Radke?

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

5 Ways Kratom Will Help You Make More Money

June 17, 2015 | by Sponsored Post | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Herbal Samurai

A few weeks ago Return of Kings featured a sponsored article that outlined how kratom can improve your sex life. The readers of ROK took advantage of what they read and gave kratom a shot. The vast majority were extremely pleased with how much it benefited their results with women almost immediately.

This article is the sequel to that article, and it is going to focus on another very important concern to the ambitious men who read Return of Kings. Specifically, this article will show you exactly how kratom can enable you to make more money by making it easier to accomplish your financial goals; regardless of whether that involves building your own business or rising to the top of a powerful organization.

A super quick recap about kratom for the guys who don't yet know what it's all about Kratom is an Asian herbal plant that has been traditionally used to uplift mood, increase productivity, and increase motivation. It's cheap, it's natural, and the recommended dosage is relatively low at only 2-4 grams.

The different types of kratom are known as strains, and they're differentiated by colour and by the region they were grown in, as well as slightly different effects. Users have reported minimal downsides.

So how is it going to help me become more productive and achieve financial success?

1. Kratom Can Make It Easier To Focus Longer Without Getting Distracted

Most guys know that in order to accomplish virtually anything significant in life, you need to put the hours in. For a lot of men, it can sometimes be tough to focus on one task for an extended period of time. Those with an attention span on the shorter side have reported that Kratom is exceptionally helpful for staying on track with an important activity. For a lot of guys, Kratom keeps them calm and relaxed and prevents them from jumping around from one distraction to another.

Best Strains For Intense Uninterrupted Focus: White Maeng Da, Green Maeng Da, White Indo

2. Kratom Can Increase Energy And Make You More Productive

Kratom has been used for centuries in Southeast Asia in order to increase productivity of workers far beyond their regular labour capacity. Plenty of anecdotes of users have shown that Kratom, especially used in smaller doses, provides a strong stimulating effect. They have reported that it makes them more alert, and makes their thought process much clearer. This in turn has lead to greater productivity & efficiency on all areas of their businesses & careers.

Best Strains for Energy & Productivity: White Maeng Da, White Indo, Red Horned Thai

3. Kratom Could Directly Increase Your Motivation

Powerful internal motivation is the fuel needed for accomplishing one's financial goals. Scientific research has shown that Kratom acts upon what's called the 'delta' receptor. The delta receptor, when acted upon, has been shown to increase motivation and drive. Guys have claimed that the science carries over to real life; they feel much more internally motivated to accomplish their goals with Kratom.

Best Strains For Motivation: Green Indo, Green Maeng Da, Red Maeng Da

4. Kratom Can Make You Better At Networking And Handling People

Whether you run you're own business and you're forging relationships with new business partners or you're aggressively rising the ranks in a powerful corporation, being able to handle people is important for success. This can be difficult; especially when you're not in a social mood. Kratom has been known to increase pro-social behaviour, making one much more comfortable in networking and organizational situations and as a result, more likeable and influential over others.

Best Strains For Dealing With People: Red Indo, Gold Indo, Red Maeng Da

5. Kratom Could Delay Stress And Mental Fatigue

A lot of the guys at ROK already know that when you're working around the clock on an important objective it can sometimes stress you out. Increased stress has been known to sharply reduce energy and cause mental fatigue. Users of Kratom have noted much less fatigue due to the plant's reported ability to keep stress levels low. With significantly lower stress levels, many find they can avoid fatigue and remain productive even during the stressful journey of achieving goals and acquiring wealth.

Best Strains For Avoiding Stress: Red Bali, Gold Indo, Red or Green Indo

Where Can I Get Kratom?

To really take advantage of Kratom, you need to purchase only the highest quality available. This makes all the difference.

Herbal Samurai (www.herbalsamurai.com) has the best quality you can find anywhere, with clean and natural kratom that will arrive at your door in 2-3 days. Check them out at www.herbalsamurai.com. They've got an awesome starter pack that is perfect for newbies.

Give kratom a shot. It just may be the source of motivation, energy, and productivity you're looking for to take your business and financial goals to the next level.

Legal Disclaimer:

All statements made within this article have not been evaluated by the Food and Drug Administration. This product is not intended to diagnose, treat, cure, or prevent any disease. Nothing contained in this article is medical advice. This article is written explicitly for entertainment purposes and everything written is an account of personal experience and not instructions. Kratom is not sold for human consumption.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

5 Things That Have Ruined American Women

June 18, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Pretty much everyone is aware that American women are messed up, but the real question is “how did they get that way?” While this is not a complete list, here are five things that have contributed to the degeneration of American women.

1. Popularity of the Disney princesses

Most American girls grow up watching Disney princess movies. The wildly popular franchise spans the decades from the classics like Snow White, Cinderella, Sleeping Beauty, and The Little Mermaid to more recent movies like Tangled, Brave, and Frozen.

So what’s wrong with Disney princesses? Well, Disney has done a fantastic job of editing all the unpleasant aspects that colored the original fairy tales—things like consequences and failure. For instance, Hans Christian Andersen’s version of The Little Mermaid doesn’t end in a catchy song and dance number. The mermaid dies by throwing herself into the ocean and turning into sea foam. There is no happy ending or romantic rescue by the prince. He actually marries someone else.

Additionally, Andersen's little mermaid faced harsh consequences for her decision to become human and pursue a mortal man. The sea witch in the story cuts out her tongue in exchange for giving her human legs, and these new legs bring the mermaid great pain as she feels like she is walking on sharp shards of glass every time she takes a step. In the Disney version, the only penalty in the story is that Ariel will become a mermaid once more if she fails to land herself a prince.

The bottom line is girls are indoctrinated at a very young age that even the most harebrained of schemes will always work out in the end as long as you believe. All loves, even when they involve the poorest of choices, are meant to be. Who cares if your parents disapprove? Is it any wonder that American women can't handle the smallest of failures or that they are terrible at picking a suitable partner?

2. Girl power and self esteem culture lead to a delusional view of life

Our culture has gradually been replacing real sins with imaginary ones. In place of lying and stealing, we have transphobia and not recycling. Another one of these imaginary sins is hurting someone's self-esteem, especially the self-esteem of a girl. Whether it is in school, Girl Scouts, magazines, or sports, girls are taught that they are super awesome no matter what they do.

Are you obese? No problem, real men love curves. Can't do math? It's because the evil patriarchy didn't do enough to encourage you to take STEM classes. Are you dim-witted? Dye your hair blue (or pink), support left wing causes, and you can consider yourself smarter than everyone else.

Western culture, especially American culture, is unique in promoting self-esteem above real accomplishment. In many Asian countries, classrooms are organized so that the top students sit in the front row and the worst students sit in the back. Every student always knows exactly how he stacks up against other students.

It might seem cruel to us, but at least their children don’t grow up with the delusion that they are special snowflakes and that everything should be handed to them on a silver platter.

3. Unrealistic expectations

Most men don’t measure up

One result of the combination of Disney princess syndrome and self-esteem culture is that American women have completely unrealistic expectations. Every American woman expects that her future husband will be a handsome, wealthy, urbane aristocrat who speaks four languages, plays in the NBA, and sings lead vocals in a rock band. In other words, he will be Prince Charming.

Of course, it doesn’t matter that the woman herself is fat, lazy, ignorant, and slutty. She will still think that she deserves Prince Charming because she has been told her entire life that she is super awesome just the way she is.

The problem is that in the real world very few men fit the requirements for being Prince Charming. This means that most American women have to “settle” for less than they feel they deserve when they decide to get married. The modern American woman will start out her life disappointed with her husband even though he would be considered an astounding catch by any rational standard.

The inevitable result is that after a few years of marriage, lots of women start looking for more exciting pastures. These women will think nothing of destroying their families and leaving their perfectly loving husbands for broke DJ’s with hot tattoos and a drug problem.

4. Feminist-influenced media gives women a deformed understanding of what men want

Women's magazines spend a lot of time talking about relationships, but all of the information they provide is wrong. Here are some typical headlines from Cosmopolitan magazine:

> 21 Mind Blowing Sex Moves You've Never Tried Before (Introducing the Brazilian "Sweet Treat")
>
> How To Touch A Naked Man: 16 Naughty Strokes That Will Send Him Over The Edge

The same message is conveyed in television shows that are popular with women like Sex in the City and Girls: men like sluts.

Now, its true that men want a woman who knows "16 naughty strokes," but only if they are looking for a one night stand or a friendship with benefits. In other words, men only want the well-worn, highly skilled slut for a pump and dump.

But when it comes to marriage, men are looking for innocence. No man wants his bride to beg him to give her a Dirty Sanchez on their wedding night.

These magazines and TV shows are not trying to provide accurate information—they are primarily trying to make money. Any information that they do provide is tainted by a feminist philosophy: Cosmopolitan was founded by feminist Helen Gurley Brown and Girls is a Lena Dunham vehicle. However, the girls who devour this tripe take it be the gospel truth and do their best to live their lives accordingly.

But you may be asking, why are women learning about what men want through magazines, movies, and television shows? It's because parents have abdicated their parenting duties.

5. Lack of parenting

Hello Mr. Filthy Kuffar. We are here to date your daughter.

At some point after the sexual revolution in the 1960s, parents stopped giving their children any guidance on anything related to love, sex, and marriage. They will parent their children in other ways, such as encouraging them to get good grades, but not with regard to anything involving sex. With sex, there is always “no judgment.”

Lack of parental guidance is harmful to boys, but it is devastating to girls. Boys naturally know what they want. They are attracted to wholesome looking girls, who usually turn out to be wholesome in fact—ROK readers know that unwholesome girls usually provide “tells” about their defective character. Girls, on the other hand, seem to make the worst choices when they lack parental guidance.

I recently saw a young couple on a date. The girl was a wholesome-looking redhead with a too-short dress. The man was a little older. He was dressed like he was part of ISIS. He was in full Islamic garb, including a hat and a long beard that was dyed red in imitation of the Prophet Mohammed—an indicator that he was a hardcore Muslim.

Now, on what planet would anyone think that this pairing was a good idea? The “no judgment” parent might have reservations, but he would never give them voice for fear of treading on his daughter’s free rein when it comes to dating.

Where does this come from?

All is proceeding according to plan

I don’t think there is a single group conspiring for the destruction of Western civilization, but at least some of what has happened to women is the result of Marxist philosophy, which is still popular among the American elite. They don’t want it for themselves, but they do want to confer it as a gift upon the unwashed masses.

Both Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels felt that the family was the origin of inequality and slavery. In The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State, Engels predicted that the family would be destroyed to give rise to “the gradual growth of unconstrained sexual intercourse.” Feminism ultimately has its roots in Marxism, so it is not hard to discern the common goals.

Conclusion

The sad part of this process has been the human toll. Many men will not be able to find suitable wives in the current climate, but it is not just men. Women, too, have been sold a bunch of lies, which will prevent them from ever enjoying a normal life.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The American Woman Has Hit An All-Time Low

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Can You Just Think And Grow Rich?

June 18, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Mercilessly spammed all over the Internet, the gibberish ads beckon suckers into clicking them with the promise of easy money for a negligible amount of work done from the comfort of your own room. Internet veterans have acquired a certain blind spot for them, but newbies might follow the given hyperlink, landing on a homepage with outrageously fake testimonials: “Jessica was homeless and now she makes millions of dollars every week!”.

At this point, even the newbies start to get suspicious, since the website goes to great lengths to avoid mentioning any specifics and uses the vaguest terms possible. Naturally, the answer to what this job actually entails is hidden behind a paywall, so if you would please input your credit card information in this form right here…

Lesson learned

You’ve certainly encountered these infamous advertisements and understand they are based on the idea of multi-level marketing. While there is some minute amount of cash to be gained by clicking ads or liking articles or whatever the case might be, the fastest way to make money is to entice others into joining the club through you, in which case you'll get the percentage of their earnings.

The problem is that the person on top of the MLM pyramid gets something along the lines of 90% of all profits, while the remaining pitiful share is distributed between all other members within the organization. Though mathematically untenable in the long run, MLM schemes do however utilize a valid business principle, which is extraction of value.

MLM is based upon the fact that people generally trust what their friends recommend. An advertisement blaring from your TV even at triple the volume is easily ignored, but the same idea coming from your third cousin, twice removed, is actually worth considering. In this way, an MLM pyramid extracts value from the social connections its new members have.

Saturating the market

If we examine someone who buys and sells actual physical goods, it again comes down to extraction of value from the market. Let's say a merchant realizes that people in one city have an unusual craving for strawberries, but the local soil isn't favorable for their growth. So, he buys strawberries in another city for $1 a piece and sells them for as much as he wants, let's say $1000 a piece, since he's the only one satisfying the demand. That is, until others realize there is money to be made in doing the same thing and bring the price down.

Every attempt at extracting value from the market carries with it significant risk – strawberries tend to spoil quickly, the demand may suddenly disappear, crops can be lost to bad weather or pest infestations, the government can introduce a strawberry tax and so on.

On the other hand, MLM schemes are illegal and the most successful MLM organizers tend to eventually end up in jail for committing fraud. In other words, all entrepreneurial attempts require money and effort to be invested before you can even get a shot at earning your investment back, let alone make a profit.

To sum it up, the secret to becoming rich (acquiring wealth) comes down to two principles – minimizing risk and maximizing value extracted. Ironically, this means the secret to becoming rich cannot ever be given or sold to you, because somebody else is already using it and the market is tapped.

You must get an idea nobody thought of before or satisfy a market demand that nobody realizes exists without going into massive financial debt. Also, you should turn a profit before you start investing money into your idea. Is that even possible?

Strategies for thinking

Allow me to introduce you to a book titled “Think and Grow Rich.” Written by Napoleon Hill in 1937 and available for free as part of the public domain in PDF format here, the book asserts that you can become rich by thinking. Napoleon Hill describes this process as actually a bit more complex than the mere process of cognitive association we call “thinking” and says it consists of finding a group of open-minded individuals and freely discussing your ideas with them.

And that’s it – verbalizing your thoughts leads you to realizations of previously untapped sources of opportunity and ways to extract value out of them.

If we examine this process in the context of wealth principles I outlined above, we see that there is absolutely no risk in discussing your ideas with people who are receptive to them and there is no upper limit to the amount of value that can be extracted from your ideas. This process already exists under the label of brainstorming.

In fact, it is exactly what Napoleon Hill describes – a group of open-minded individuals sits at a table and freely verbalizes their ideas in search of a solution to any problem. The ideas are written down and read after the session ends, thus producing a completely novel solution.

The implication behind this book is that we are all under constant self-censorship and don’t dare speak about what we truly think for fear of ridicule. By finding a group of people who do not judge, but instead offer constructive criticism, we arrive at infinite personal wealth.

Does it really work? I can tell you that my greatest periods of personal growth came directly from independently arriving at the same conclusion Napoleon Hill mentions. Whether you want to try it is completely up to you.

Read More: I Will Teach You To Be Rich

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Is Propecia (Finasteride) A Poison Disguised As A Miracle Hair Loss Drug?

June 19, 2015 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

You may have heard about Propecia (active ingredient: Finasteride) as the wonder pill that slows or even stops hair loss in men. According to Wikipedia:

> Finasteride is used to treat male pattern hair loss (androgenetic alopecia) in men only.[4] Treatment provides about 30% improvement in hair loss after six months of treatment, and effectiveness only persists as long as the drug is taken.

The way it works:

> It is a type II 5α-reductase inhibitor; 5α-reductase, an enzyme, converts testosterone to dihydrotestosterone (DHT).

That 5a-reductase enzyme, which does seem to cause hair follicle death, turns out to be extremely important for the health of any man. How do I know this?

My Story

I've been taking a generic form of Finasteride for the past year, and let me share with you my journey in androgenous hell. I started with 1-mg a day, but after about 6 months I reduced the amount of .5-mg by cutting the pills in half. Despite taking a reduced amount, the effects were absolutely crippling on my life as a man. It's been roughly one month since I've stopped using it, now my life is slowly returning back to normal.

The first six months were uneventful, and I was even happy with the results: hairs were falling out of my head much slower than normal. My hair loss was not anything extreme – I used to have long bangs covering my forehead and it was receding. I was not losing much hair on the back of my head.

My reasons for taking the pill were for maximum vanity. I wanted to preserve every last hair on my head if at all possible. The price I ended up paying has made me realize my hubris, although in my defense there was no way to know how bad shit could get.

At the end of these first six months, I things ended with a girl was I was banging back in last November after she told me she was going back to Kazakhstan. This would be the last time I would have sex until I got off the pill.

What started the downward spiral was that one day, at the gym, after doing some routine squats, I felt a sharp joint pain in my hip where the femur is connected. I figured I pulled a tendon and I needed to stay out of the gym for a few weeks while it recovered.

A month later, the pain was still there, and I had lost 5 pounds of muscle mass. I was down to 155 pounds at 5'8". I hated going to doctors so I figured I would just take the month of January to rest some more. I read online that tendons can take a long time to heal.

Three months later, the joint pain was still there. I was down to 150 pounds. I was becoming depressed because I couldn't lift at the gym and I was starting to walk with a limp. I also noticed that for the past three months, I had absolutely no desire to find women or have sex. I forced myself to go out dancing to pick up some chicks, but when I was dancing with them I never felt like asking them out nor did I feel any desire to have sex. I thought at first since it was deep in winter I was just being lazy, but even looking at porn did little to stimulate me. I wondered if I was just getting old and weak?

6 months later, the pain in my femur at the hip was still there. I weighed 135 pounds. 25 pounds of muscle mass gone. I could see my ribs when I sucked in my stomach. My strength and energy had disappeared. I was constantly in need of sleep. At my step-mother's 60th birthday party, I fell asleep on a couch in spite of not having a single drink and it only being 9pm. At this point, my father came over to me and asked me to see a doctor, and told me he was worried sick for my health. I looked in the mirror and saw this:

Discovering the truth

At this point, I wasn't sure what the hell was wrong with me. So I googled, "Propecia weight loss" and I found this forum:

http://www.propeciahelp.com/forum/

The stories were horrifying, and most of them far worse than mine – men who not only had lost all functionality of testosterone, but many had quit for years and still never recovered! At this point, I felt like a total fool. I threw my pills in the trash but saved a few for the doctor to look at.

The stories on this forum range from guys who took the pill for 6 years before noticing their health was deteriorating, all the way to extreme cases of men who took the pill for one month and their dick shut off, permanently, forever.

Additionally, it turns out that the major studies used to justify the drug's safety may have large flaws.

Study #1:

> BACKGROUND: Finasteride 1 mg (Propecia) is indicated for the treatment of men with androgenetic alopecia (male pattern hair loss, MPHL). However, the long-> term (> 2 years) efficacy and safety of finasteride in this population has not been previously reported.

>
> Objectives. To assess the efficacy and safety of finasteride in men with MPHL compared to treatment with placebo over five years.
> METHODS: In two 1-year, Phase III trials, 1,553 men with MPHL were randomized to receive finasteride 1 mg/day or placebo, and 1,215 men continued in up to four 1-year, placebo-controlled extension studies. Efficacy was evaluated by hair counts, patient and investigator assessments, and panel review of clinical photographs.

They used 1-year studies to assign a drug to men who would take it indefinitely. Some of the men on the forum above took the drug for up to six years. Imagine if someone released a study saying cigarettes were safe because nothing happened to the users after 1-year.

Study #2:

> The Prostate Cancer Prevention Trial (PCPT) was a randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled study of the efficacy of finasteride in preventing prostate cancer in 18,882 men aged 55 years or older. The PCPT offered an opportunity to prospectively study the effects of finasteride and other covariates on sexual dysfunction.

Concluding a drug tested on men older than 55 is safe for men under 30? Gee, what could go wrong?

Study #3:

> BACKGROUND: The Prostate Cancer Prevention Trial (PCPT)-a randomized placebo-controlled study of the efficacy of finasteride in preventing prostate cancer-offered the opportunity to prospectively study effects of finasteride and other covariates on the health-related quality of life of participants in a multiyear trial.
>
> METHODS: We assessed three health-related quality-of-life domains (measured with the Health Survey Short Form-36: Physical Functioning, Mental Health, and Vitality scales) via questionnaires completed by PCPT participants at enrollment (3 months before randomization), at 6 months after randomization, and annually for 7 years. Covariate data obtained at enrollment from patient-completed questionnaires were included in our model. Mixed-effects model analyses and a cross-sectional presentation at three time points began at 6 months after randomization. All statistical tests were two-sided.

Not once do they state the age of the participants, or how long the users took the drug, and yet this study concludes finasteride is safe for men.

From more reading on this forum, I discovered another disturbing fact: most doctors are unable to detect what is wrong with men who are taking Propecia. Blood tests do not reveal any lowered amount of testosterone, or any other anomalies. Thus the men on the forum came up with a different hypothesis.

5α-reductase is similar to the spark plug in a car engine. Without a spark plug in an engine, gasoline will pump into the cylinders but no ignition will happen. Likewise Propecia shuts off this enzyme, which would likely make the testosterone functionally useless. When you take blood samples, most medical professionals will fail to detect anything wrong with you.

Furthermore, the joint pain was caused by the shrinkage of muscles – they squeeze around the joint causing it grind together. I fear I may have caused permanent damage to my femur and hip joint as a result, but as I am writing this the pain has lessened considerably as my muscle grows back. I am currently back at 143 pounds. Still another 17 pounds of muscle to go. I went out dancing last week and I felt the rush of dancing with pretty girls once again. My manhood will survive this.

Heed my warning

Don’t let this happen to you, though. If you are currently taking Propecia or any other alternative, I would advise you to stop right now. Some men’s bodies handle this medication better than others, but the longer you take it, the more likely bad shit is going to happen to you.

Your testosterone is way more valuable than your hair. Trust me. I learned the hard way. Most guys don’t realize just how essential this gift from God is until you don’t have it. Without testosterone functioning properly, you cannot grow muscles, fuck women, or even think straight. It’s essential to every function as a man.

There are currently class action lawsuits against the company, although as usual because it only affects men most people do not give a damn. Based on my research, I think that Propecia is engaged in false advertising on two counts:

1. They say negative side effects only happen to 2%, when it’s clear from the forum I linked above that it’s way higher than that.

2. They say negative side effects are only temporary, when in fact the accounts suggests many men suffer from permanent damage, either in loss of sex function, muscle function, or joint function.

This pill is yet another example of big pharma selling bullshit in order to make profits. Better hair replacement technology is coming in the next ten years anyways. Hair cloning will be ready before we’re dead. Don’t risk your health on this scam foisted upon men.

Read Next: 10 Tragic Examples Of Pretty Girls Ruining Themselves With Bad Hair

Sam Seau
Samseau is a player philosopher psychologist who enjoys a good discussion. You can follow him on Twitter.

“Serial Litigant” And Race Fantasist Rachel Dolezal Has A History Of Opportunistic Rape Accusations

June 19, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Provided you haven’t been living under a proverbial rock, you would know that the farce surrounding compulsive fraud Rachel Dolezal is getting bigger still. News has emerged that she previously accused her now ex-husband of forcing her to participate in a sex tape, a clear euphemism for rape. Far from shockingly, given what we already know about her, Dolezal made the accusation when a court was attempting to determine residency arrangements for their young son Franklin after the couple parted ways.

The judge, perhaps sensing the inherent looseness of her “factual” disposition, found Joshua Moore was a competent father and awarded joint custody. After all, Dolezal makes Native American-channeling Senator Elizabeth Warren look like Honest Abe Lincoln.

This is not the end of the story (and how could it be?). Dolezal’s son (it is ambiguous as to whether this means Franklin or the adoptive brother Isaiah she seems to be raising) made a flagrantly false hate crime allegation to obfuscate his purported involvement in broken wine bottles at a grocery store. Without mitigating what could be significant responsibility on his part, the young relative has clearly learned from a pro, either his biological mother or adoptive sister or mother (don’t worry, I’m confused, too).

The cases may not seem linked, minus the grossly unsubstantiated (and likely contextually false) rape accusations against Moore, but Dolezal joins a menagerie of other female fantasists, Emma Sulkowicz and Jackie Coakley et al, who milk attention for career advancement or social validation and popularity. Their wishes are granted like Aladdin's Genie, receiving laudatory praise or sympathy along the way from both the media and others allergic to impartial factual analysis and due process.

Dolezal's bizarre hate crime allegations

"Rapunzel, Rapunzel… for facts I don't care!"

Thankfully, investigations into "racial" hate crimes alleged by Rachel Dolezal have been suspended as of this week. The most bizarre one that she made herself (presuming the son made his own via her atrocious example and not explicit coaching) involved Dolezal claiming she received threatening hate mail in the Spokane NAACP's post office box.

The USPS, even after its local employees were grilled by police, maintained that the letter could only really have been placed there by someone with a key to the box. Strangely, there was no date stamp or bar code on the correspondence, a dead giveaway of something profoundly fishy.

Although we can expect SJWs and other do-gooders to call critics "racists" and "victim-blamers" for questioning her accounts of so many "disparate" events, Dolezal has already been outed as a fantasist with her life-in-blackface deception. Moreover, this should be relieving news for the innocent Joshua Moore.

It's still tragic for him overall, though. Yes, his ex-wife has so many frauds and other deceptions going on which undermine her credibility. But to have his name dragged through the mud, again, is something he deserves substantial compensation for, not that Dolezal will be getting (hopefully) much in the way of a steady job going forward.

She previously sued Howard University for anti-white, gender, and pregnancy bias

Martin Luther King just barfed in his grave because of this woman.

Prior to her Academy Award-worthy turn as Rachel Dolezal: Black Woman, Spokane's favorite storyteller, then a "non-African-American," believed her artwork was being taken down to make way for students… because they were black and she was white. It seems that pretty much the only thing Dolezal hasn't sued for in terms of discrimination or somehow cried an "-ism" about is on the basis of disability (stay tuned on that front!).

Despite the continued, fanatical defense of her by many elements both within the NAACP and followers of the new pseudo-science of "transracialism," the import of adding the Howard University debacle is evident. Dolezal is putting yet another nail in the coffin for believing women who vacuously advertise themselves front and center when fighting "injustice" they can't prove.

Dolezal's conflicting history nevertheless has a common theme: an obsession with imagined victimization and a narcissistic craving for attention and the "admiration" of others. Her being exposed as a white woman didn't fundamentally alter her belief that she is indeed black.

The "logic" she breathes life into is simple: facts only exist as enunciated and supported by her. White parents equals black girl if Dolezal says it does. When enough people seek to make excuses for these delusions, it only encourages more Rachel Dolezals both publicly and privately.

SJWs are in spectacular crisis

Because of Dolezal's magical powers for assuming new races, she and Sulkowicz are actually sisters.

Sulkowicz, Coakley, Dolezal, Belle Gibson… in the last twelve months, more has transpired to back up the desperate need for due process around rape accusations, or basic incredulity about fanciful stories (Gibson's fake cancer), than ever before. And it's largely because of these fabulists and women like them.

Yet we shouldn't depend on these preeminent cases. The investigation of allegations, especially amorphous ones that coincide with a woman's self-promotion, should be stringent and not predicated on a popularity contest, neo-Court of the Star Chamber or political lucky door prize.

In other purposely inflamed events involving crowd behavior, such as during the Ferguson and Baltimore riots, SJWs have been forced to selectively focus on details. And they have had to distinctly and dogmatically ignore others.

Autopsy reports that didn't contradict and probably supported Officer Darren Wilson's account were ignored in the social bloodbath that followed the shooting of violent shoplifter Michael Brown. After Freddie Gray died, race-baiters like Al Sharpton deliberately turned the narrative into a white-sponsored anti-black program of hate and persecution, forgetting that three of the six officers, including the police driver allegedly most responsible for Gray's death in the back of a vehicle, were black.

Joshua Moore doesn't deserve the lies and other untruths of his vindictive, psychopathic ex-wife. But unlike Emma Sulkowicz's victim Paul Nungesser, at least far less people are going to ever believe Rachel Dolezal's kooky defamation of him.

Read More: NAACP President Rachel Dolezal Outed As White Woman

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Women In Their Prime Prefer Sex With Damaged Men

June 19, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

For the sake of your sex life, I hope that your mother didn't love you when you were a child. I hope your father abused you. I hope you had several dark periods while going through puberty which lead to ideations of hurting animals or other people. I hope that you currently suffer from depression and rage. I hope all these things because you'll have a far easier time meeting women and getting laid than a man who is emotionally balanced with a clear head on his shoulders. Your natural game, a result of legitimate abuse you may have faced, will be perfectly suited to attract the modern woman.

If you've been studying game, you would have noticed that a big chunk of it is learning to be apathetic, uncaring, and aloof. You're taught not to put pussy on the pedestal, not to be overly affectionate and complimentary, and not to give clear signs that you like a girl more than she likes you. The reason you're taught this is because it's the most reliable way to attract and keep a Westernized woman who seeks exciting men instead of providers. Even a married man who got a woman to legally agree to be with him for life must remain ever so emotionally distant from his bride so that she doesn't get bored and fuck a guy much hotter than him after only a 15 minute session on Tinder.

I had to learn all this training from scratch when diving into game at 22 years of age. Before that, I had a mother who would incessantly say she loved me and that I was her special boy. I had a father who, while much less affectionate than her, made sure all my needs were attended to. Even though they divorced when I was 8 years old, I spent every weekend with my father and was never short of parental love. Neither of them abused me or left me with any damage I can identify, and when I compare my upbringing to that of my peers, I'm downright lucky to have my parents. Any flaw you see in me is undoubtedly due to my peculiar genetic construction instead of purposeful harm levied by them.

I came out on the other side educated, personable, empathetic, and strongly wanting a loving relationship with an attractive girl. It took a year of game training in order to land her, but because I was too nice, and because she was too pretty, I lost her before I had her. I learned quickly that being nice was not a quality that women wanted, so I began to play the clown just to secure intimacy with desirable women. I definitely overshot the mark with my quest to accumulate sex without meaning, but my subconscious made that decision because it was more logical to pump and dump for fun than to try to get into a relationship with a woman who didn't value family or monogamy.

I want you to now feel sympathy for me that my parents helped raise a man with low marks on the dark triad scale. I want you to feel sorry for me that I have to pretend I'm not interested in a girl even if I actually am, that I must take my time responding to a girl's text message when I'm eager to talk to her, and that I'm forbidden to compliment her during the most intimate moments we experience in bed. All of that goes against my natural instinct.

If you want to be sexually successful, you have to simulate the behavior of men who were emotionally abused as a child, who have stunted development and who fail to properly connect and relate to human beings compared to those with normal upbringings. You have to take on sociopathic traits, put girls on an emotional roller coaster of abuse, and ensure that you view females with great disdain. It's no secret that they prefer the dark triad man over a nice guy who would fail to get even a second glance from a psychiatrist.

If you are a nice guy who refuses to learn game or put on the clown mask, I have some great news for you: once a girl is done fucking a dozen or two bad boys in her prime, once her vagina is properly stretched out and primed to secrete maximum lubrication to only bad boy cock, and once the container of her eggs becomes nearly empty, she will gladly accept you into her life for biological reproduction, not because you were her first choice, but because those bad boys could not see her as anything more than a wet gash. Your best option is to be Plan Z after twenty five other men. During your happy marriage she'll often be "tired" to have sex with you when not a few years prior she eagerly begged men who saw her as disposable to gape her anus.

I've been on both sides of the coin. I've been the nice guy who couldn't secure the attention of girls and I've been the bad boy actor for over a decade, securing sex for as long as I can wear the mask. The problem with pretending to be the bad boy when you're nice at heart is that it's impossible to respect the girl as someone you could have a relationship with since you know she has spread her legs for so many guys before who play-acted just like you. You lament that she has lost her reproductive imperative and sees men as nothing more than sources of entertainment to improve her soulless existence of having to attain a meaningless education to labor in an insignificant office job, and that because of her rejection of the feminine nature given to her at birth, you are even more qualified to take care of children than she is. Her mind and body has been utterly ruined for anything but a fuck buddy relationship.

How I pity the normal man. He’s either doomed to a life of no sex or sex with women who are not suitable for more than a few lively pumps. Some men may get lucky and find the unicorn who wants to have a family before the age of 25, but for the most of you, your best option is to tattoo the bad boy mask on your face to at least have some semblance of a normal sex life. The toxicity of the West is spreading at such a rate around the world that being the emotionally damaged man, or at least simulating his behavior, is the best option for having any intimacy with women at all, no matter how deficient they are as compared to the days of our grandfathers. I guess you can say that this is not a good time for normal men to be living in.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Anger Is An Aphrodisiac To Women

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Shimshon’s Tale Sets An Example For Masculinity

June 19, 2015 | by Wladislaw Bertram | Link | Original Link

The Biblical story of the Hebrew Judge Shimshon (his name meaning a man of the Sun, shemesh in most ancient Middle Eastern languages) is one to hail and follow by all men today. Indeed, the tale is one of glorious victories, subservient loyalty to a higher cause, leadership and modesty – on the one hand. The rise and fall of Shimshon on the other hand is also a warning sign, a broad red flag placed there thousands of years ago by men wiser than us today.

In an era when suffering, death, and hard work were not unknown terms from mouldy history books but rather everyday realities, people still knew the value of educational guides on being a man of virtue, a leader, a prophet and a warrior.

Shimshon was certainly all of them: and the reasons he failed in the end are written on the wall with grim letters, staring at us today and cautioning us on all the vices that might take hold of a brave man, even one as brave and wise as Shimshon. In this article we will examine the positive side of Shimshon’s life and deeds.

Shimshon’s Character

Shimshon was exceptionally strong and tall. Added to his earthly strength was the strength of God: Hebrew tradition holds that he could lift two mountains and break them into little pieces with his bare hands. His shoulders were supposedly so broad, that even later religious authorities had to point out that this part of the tale was probably fiction.

Scholars hold that Shimshon was probably a mixture of other traditional Eastern demigods, like Enkidu and the Shumer Guta. This question is one for theological and historical debate; what interests us is what virtues and vices the men of old might have wanted to explain with Shimshon.

Shimshon definitely was strong and humble, a man of few words who preferred to follow his own path and who rarely called for the help of others. In fact, tradition holds that never in his entire lifetime did he ask for the help or assistance of another Israelite. He could handle problems alone and had all the capability and willingness to do so.

One of the chapters of Shimshon's tale that the Bible shares with us is of exceptional importance. Shimshon had seen a beautiful Philistine woman in the village of Timnah, and went back to "pick her up." And

> "as he approached the vineyards of Timnah, suddenly a young lion came roaring toward him. The Spirit of the Lord came powerfully upon him so that he tore the lion apart with his bare hands as he might have torn a young goat. But he told neither his father nor his mother what he had done."

Presenting your dad’s condo as yours ain’t manly. This however, is.

Biblical-Era Neomasculinity

This, gentlemen, is a passage of Scripture that should be engraved upon seats of height for all men to see. Which one of us could handle a healthy young lion, in its prime of strength and agility, charging at us from an ambush, with nothing to protect ourselves with? Shimshon had slain the beast without a sword or shield; for sure, not many Biblical characters could claim to have achieved a feat such as this. And this is the part where all men should take notes: he said nothing of the whole affair.

Let us analyze the story a little further. Shimshon went on a “date,” so to say – he definitely did have the intention of approaching a young and attractive female with the aim of making her his lover. In a similar situation most emasculated Western men would arrive with a list of their “deeds” to recite in vain hopes a quick shag. Shimshon did not do so: in fact, he did not even utter a single word about his heroic act.

Demigods Don’t Brag

Make no mistake, she was just as much of a game player as modern chicks.

Did he have a reason to brag? Although he sure was a man of splendid physical attributes, he could still have expected the Philistine woman to put him through a series of tests. If he did have such expectations, he had certainly been proven correct. Only a few lines later the Bible says, as Shimshon did not share the solution of a secret riddle with the woman in question, she "threw herself on him, sobbing, 'You hate me! You don't really love me. You've given my people a riddle, but you haven't told me the answer.'"

In case you don't realize what this means, here is the answer: this, gentlemen, is the proof that women have been giving men shit tests to solve for thousands of years. Yes, even if you are a Judge of the Lord Almighty himself, bitches will still hurdle tests and riddles at you.

Yet Shimshon said nothing. He kept the story for himself, just like he didn't brag about his other accomplishment, slaying a thousand enemies with a jawbone of a dead donkey – a story which the Scripture shares with us later on.

Alpha Males Don't Brag Either

Keeping your positive secrets, your great deeds and your truly remarkable achievements can be a vast source of inner strength and pride. It gives you the option of merely smiling when people ask you about your exploits and silently saying: "I don't get around much."

Women will instantly feel that it isn't true, and they will feel a deep urge to find out what you are hiding. While they do, they will cling at you for the rest of your – fleeting or more serious – relationship.

Nothing says "high value male" more clearly than achieving much and sharing little. Shimshon knew this, and it unquestionably is a lesson that men today should internalize. Shimshon, then, was in possession of a number of alpha male qualities – but also a number of weaknesses of character, which evidently led to his downfall, as we may see in another article.

Read More: A Tale Of Two Men

Wladislaw Bertram

Wladislaw Bertram is a disciple of the divine and a master of masculine might.

Our Decaying Society Has Created The Age Of Unreason

June 20, 2015 | by Will Outenphraghen | Link | Original Link

I discovered ROK while working in Thailand and, upon returning to the San Francisco Bay Area during the semester break, I discovered that changes in my way of thinking had rendered my hometown an alien abyss.

My mother is a feminist but can't explain why. My brother is marrying a feminist teacher who takes public transportation and gets home later than him, so he does all the cooking in addition to paying the mortgage. Now I have a brother-in-law who is a Women's Rights lawyer, and my uncle told me, "Some things are better left unsaid," when I brought up the problems with feminism.

One friend is living with a single mother with three kids from three different dads, of which he is the second. Another friend got a DUI and a DV charge a week before when his girlfriend called the cops during a spat in the car.

Yet, even after spending a night in jail, he all but covered his ears while shouting, "I don't care!" when I mentioned that taking the red pill would give him knowledge about the nature of women so he could prevent this situation from happening again.

Sounds like I'm ghetto trash, right? No, that's just it. I'm an upper-middle class, private-schooled kid who enjoyed ski boats, dirt bikes, horseback riding, and European vacations. I say this not to brag, but rather to let you know how deep the rot really is.

We are truly living in the Age Of Unreason.

How did this come to be?

Traditionally, men and women inhabited different spheres with different specializations and realms of influence. Men did business primarily with other men, went to men's clubs where they spoke freely with other men, and women let them do it because they had their own sphere and enough sense to know that this practice was necessary for a healthy society.

The core principle at work here is that when men have a conversation with other men, all topics are fair game, logic and reason take precedence over feelings, and anyone too soft to handle the conversation needs to get lost.

The industrial revolution happened because men were:

1. Open to hearing information that clashed with their current beliefs.
2. Willing to change their beliefs based on that information.
3. Able to create and implement solutions with that new knowledge.

How about now? Be honest. How many men do you know who operate at this level?

The slave effect

One of the key practices of slavery was to torture or kill the alpha males in front of the women to scare the heck out of them and show them who's boss. Then you tell the women that they are the moral enforcers, and if they don't maintain order, there will be more killings, possibly even them and their children.

Once this pattern is established, you give the women a few perks to establish them as the privileged class, ensuring that the cycle perpetuates itself.

This is what is happening in our current social order. Men are emasculated and bossed around by women, who act as moral enforcers for the state because they get perks like assets and children after divorce, preferential treatment at schools, affirmative action, constant pats on the back by the media, etc.

Women will work against their own interests out of self-preservation if men are not around to guide them. Imagine three concentric circles; children in the center, women in the second circle, and men on the outside. In a healthy society, this is how the layers of security are ordered. Helpless children are protected by women, who in turn are protected and guided by men.

In a slave society, the outer two circles are reversed and misery ensues. Which begs the question, why do women need men's guidance?

It's a man's world

As mentioned above, the innovations that created almost all of our technology were created by men who were open to hearing new ideas, could change their beliefs based on new information, and implement that information in their line of work.

We may call this the scientific method, logic, or not being beholden to feelings, but the result is the same. By and large, men are more capable of talking about and resolving problems than women. After all, how many women understand how things work? Public policy is being dictated by sensitive creatures who do not understand the system they are trying to fix.

Many of the problems in our new social order arise from women insisting on taking part in every aspect of society, and that men must cater to their feelings. This is what flips the outer two circles and turns society into a slave fest. Feelings trump reason instead of the other way around.

It's a sad conclusion to make, but it seems that our ancestors were right: tough decisions that affect the whole of society must be made without the presence of women. After all, if a conversation about solving black crime gets stopped two sentences in with cries of racism, that problem can never be adequately addressed.

It is commonly understood that free speech was created to protect us from government tyranny. But we are now experiencing a secondary intention of our founding fathers: free speech protects us from women. The first amendment gives men the ability to say, “Sorry, honey. I can say that, actually. It’s right there in the constitution.”

In all my travels, I have never seen a culture where women do not try to act as the gatekeepers of what is acceptable to do or say. In a healthy society, women do this in moderation, and men are still able to have the difficult but necessary conversations without their presence. Without this ability, we are sitting ducks in front of a firing squad of government totalitarianism.

Weaklings

We on ROK commonly make lists of people such as feminists, white knights, and manginas as deluded groups who attack our civil liberties. I propose a word to label them all as one category: Weaklings.

After all, it perfectly describes what they are: people too weak to comprehend reality or make wise decisions. These are the people who would be dead if not for modern medicine and low infant mortality. And they know it.

That’s why they run to the government like schoolyard tattletales. They can’t defend themselves or their ideas on their own, so they seek the protection of their beloved father figure, not realizing that he is the slave master who is keeping them down.

Conclusion

In this day and age, finding a fellow man who can discuss ideas without letting his emotions get in the way is worth his weight in gold. Learn from my mistake so you don't make it yourself. Don't waste your time trying to convert anyone to the red pill who is not:

1. Open to hearing information that clashes with their current beliefs.
2. Willing to change their beliefs based on that information.
3. Able to create and implement solutions with that new knowledge.

This way you can separate the weak from the strong. In the Age of Unreason, there are many ways to waste your time. Don't waste it dealing with Weaklings.

Read More: Feminism Comes Full Circle Into Embracing Aristotle's "Natural Slavery"

Will Outenphraghen
Weevinbachen is a teacher in Thailand. He wants nothing more than a healthy, loving relationship between the sexes to be restored.

5 Reasons Why Classical Opera Should Be Your New Masculine Hobby

June 20, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

I recently saw the opera “Carmen” by Bizet, with my old man. I’d seen it before but it never gets old. Some prime father-son bonding, unfortunately clouded by the darkness of my hangover.

Something struck me as I found myself deconstructing the themes evoked in the masterpiece. I was seeing it for the first time since my eyes have been opened by neomasculine and red pill concepts. I dissected it under a radically different light.

Meet Carmen, the gipsy slag and original tattooed hipster. We follow that train wreck and her drunken, attention-whoring antics, sleeping around in a way that would make her strong, independent female colleagues proud. She revels in the beta Don Jose’s thirst and exploits it in every possible way, while giving her arsehole to Escamillo, the alpha toreador that does not give a hoot. Very contemporary.

Throw him a life jacket. The man’s about to drown in a sea of pussav’.

Ended as expected. Escamillo becomes the 254th dude to glaze Carmen’s face with his seed, then he folds his fishing rods and goes back to kicking some local bull’s arse. And after white-knighting ad nauseam, beta stabs Carmen in a fit of rage because he did not get any. Standing ovation. Bizet knew what was going on.

Sounds like a familiar chain of events, does it not? Believe it or not, the greatest opera works are red pill to the core. Here is why you should give it a go, if you have not already:

1. The values and the historical periods it celebrates

Male characters that exude masculine fortitude through their actions and body language. Revenge, dealing with adversity, duels mano a mano, war, peace. It is all there.

Ah, Wagner and its Germanic and Norse heroes, fearlessly defying dragons and supernatural beings. The vengeful deities and the Valkyries, carrying the worthy warriors to the domain of the gods after they fell in battle or the corruptible, treacherous, and polygamous nature of women in Bizet and Puccini's operas.

History takes form before your eyes. Pharaohs, emperors of the Far East, army commanders, bull fighters, revolutionaries of old. It is people that make shit happen and overcome challenges that make an epic musical and aesthetic performance worth watching.

I doubt that there will be any operas about neck-bearded Bronies or Anita Sarkeesian in the future. Although no one knows what can come out of an SJW's wet dream when triggered.

2. The pure musical genius

Every element was crafted by the masters after days, months of reflection, sometimes leading to madness in the search for perfection.

Minaj, Rihanna and the degenerate soup of lambda pop bands. This acoustic pollution has no element of originality. That’s no news. What’s the background? “I was popping some E’s and snorting coke on that sheik’s cock when inspiration struck.”

Opera has a story behind every musical element. The roaring horn of Siegfried the valiant, luring the dragon Fafnir out of his lair (Siegfried) or the triumphant strings when victorious bullfighter Escamillo comes unscratched from the arena once again (Carmen). The blaring trumpets of Aida (Verdi). The list could go endlessly.

3. The notion of classicism and aesthetic excellence

The beautiful decor, the marble and the gold. Although majestic, the vibe is surprisingly relaxed and friendly. After all, it remains a form of entertainment.

With their amazing dancing, you will see athletes at the top of their art. Beautiful, slender girls doing pirouettes while scantily clad. Winning. Disadvantage: boat loads of male dancers are as gay as a three-pound note. But at least they keep it backstage.

There is a micro-phenomenon of new wave, special snowflake directors that try to revolution the canons of classical opera. I saw Carmen being banged behind a burning car next to what looked like a flamenco-infused Thunderdome. That was in Paris opera, stronghold of modernist SJW nonsense. When you touch the sacred, the assembly throws shit (not literally) and boos. And it did that day.

When something is bad, people voice it. That is the way it goes. No star ballerina or tenor is safe. Come with your top game or go home. Roberto Alagna, the world's number one tenor, once got booed and whistled. Answered right back by flipping the bird to the audience and storming off the stage. Hatred and love always go hand in hand in the opera.

4. The crowd you mingle with

Cheerful people all around. Old ones full of knowledge and young ones full of class. Stunning girls strolling around in their dresses and high heels. Men in tuxedos and dressed to the nines.

You won't see the fat leftist knobjockey with electric blue hair and cheek piercings. Perhaps because of the patriarchal rules of the audience and the venue. Silence has to be respected, no phones on or Mountain Dew allowed. Unthinkable.

From experience, many successful business partnerships, personal or not, started from a common passion about opera. Businessmen and entrepreneurs are quite often classical music enthusiasts. People that invest money to see three hours of an epic performance that requires focus know what they want.

But it remains affordable as a treat. The uneducated (by choice) rabble does not get in and if they could afford it, would still not go. Winning.

Not as popular in the West as it used to be, opera is still one of Eastern Europe's refined hobbies. The girls you meet there are some of the most beautiful beings you can come across.

5. The essential part it holds in human culture

Massenet, Mozart, Tchaikovsky. That's culture, bloody hell. And a top subject of conversation. Try to ask people about their taste in opera next time you go out. You'll soon know who's who.

It's everywhere. Films, series. It has always been used for the universality and power of its melodies. You'll be able to tell which piece is which and instead of seeing that ad about the new soon-to-be-outdated car, you will be filled with memories of that night with Natasha on your arm, admiring the ballerinas on stage and later peeling off her cocktail dress on your apartment's balcony.

Before you go…

While Verdi has my preference on the musical point of view, here are my favourite five hardcore red pill operas:

Any part of "der Ring des Nibelungen" by Richard Wagner

“Carmen” by Georges Bizet

“Les Vêpres Siciliennes” by Giuseppe Verdi

Rebels of Sicily fighting against the brutal Napoleonic rule. Revenge for the death of a brother and preparation of a bloody uprising. “Freedom or death” is the motto.

“Madama Butterfly” by Giacomo Puccini

Enter the alpha (when he kept his frame) American officer Pinkerton and his geisha lover, who got such a level of pubis tingles provoked by his dark triad elements and exotic persona that she slit her throat as soon as she sees that he has poached some fresher poon than hers.

“Prince Igor” by Alexander Borodin

Thou shall defend the Holy Orthodox Church and the land of the Rus’ against the raids of the Polovtsian tatars. A tale of honour, betrayal and sense of duty for one’s family and motherland. “All the slave girls praise the khan,” boys.

So go ahead, check the schedule of your local opera and have fun. Just try to avoid “Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg” as your introduction to opera. The bastard is 5.25 hours long when it’s uncut.

Read More: 5 Reasons To Take Up Classical Music

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Feminist Typist Posts Naked Photo: Demands Absolute State Monopoly On Violence

June 21, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

For those who don't live in Australia, you have probably not had the misfortune of hearing the name "Clementine Ford". If I may start this article with the closest thing we're going to get to a compliment, she could be called Australia's Jessica Valenti. She's the same sort of rabid feminist who spends most of her time proudly seeking to harvest and bathe in male tears.

In her latest bit of activist attention whoring, she posted the above photo of her naked face and chest. It was in response to a middling Facebook post by Sunrise – an Australian morning show, warning women of the dangers of taking nude photographs and the risk of them getting stolen or shared without permission.

Now Sunrise usually doesn't cover any stories more serious than a cat getting stuck up a tree, but it seems our dear Clementine was unable to sit idly by amid this outrage. Instead she had to launch a tirade against the show for its less-than-perfect devotion to feminist ideology. You can find the original post here, but for some of the highlights –

> I have taken nude photos of myself and sent them to lovers. I've taken nude photos of myself when I'm bored. I've taken nude photos just because I have a smart phone and it's fun.

> None of that means I have asked for my privacy to be violated, my photos stolen and my very self made available for public humiliation and judgment. Consent is everything.
>
> When Channel 7's Sunrise asks 'when will women learn' instead of 'why do men continue to view women as objects they can defile and violate while the world watches and tut-tuts', they are victim blaming. They are saying it's the responsibility of victims of crime and assault to prevent it and not the responsibility of society to make such crimes intolerable and unacceptable. Fuck your bullshit, Sunrise.

> You're an antiquated, pedestrian piece of rubbish and you truck in misogyny and everyday sexism. Consent is what happens when you give permission. Theft and assault is what happens when people take it from you despite you saying no. I'm not normally into using nudity as a form of protest.

> I've kept my actual breasts out of this shot so it can be shared on FB without attracting the censorship of an organisation that's afraid of women loving their own bodies but comfortable with men ridiculing and shaming them.

And so on, and so forth…

First of all honey, Facebook doesn't "censor" your photos because you're a woman. I can't get my dick out either.

Second, I wonder at the nature of this protest, as taking a nude photo of yourself to protest photos being stolen is a bit like flinging your phone into a sewer so no one will steal it from you.

Third, you seem to be under the assumption your private parts are meant to remain so because men won't be able to control their animal urges and will start humping you without warning.

This isn't really true. Much the same way I can't pull down my pants and take a dump on the sidewalk, most people find the sight of a pair of floppy old lady bits the weather bureau could hire as windsocks to be slightly unpleasant, and have decreed they should be kept tucked away in a civilized society.

Back to the original point, we see these arguments come up all the time, and they are as batshit insane as ever. It is the sort of worldview that, as I have written here before, only someone who grew up in the sterile confines of modern suburbia could believe.

At any other time in your life, I'm sure even feminists realize this. I'm positive they look both ways when crossing the street, even at a pedestrian crossing. I'm sure they lock their front doors at night, and if asked, would recommend others do so as well, blissfully free of accusations of supporting "theft culture."

Yet when it comes to the issue of women's safety, the sacred cow of the feminist movement, all logic is thrown out the window, and instead divine intervention is demanded whenever a women risks being taken out of her comfort zone. Lets look at the particular wording of Clementine's post –

> They are saying it's the responsibility of victims of crime and assault to prevent it and not the responsibility of society to make such crimes intolerable and unacceptable.

The wording used here is quite innocuous, but there are sinister implications. So it is the responsibility of "society" to prevent crimes? Well sure, but what do we mean by "society?"

Violence has been growing much rarer in recent centuries. Despite all the headlines about domestic violence and the Islamic State, instances of war, murder, rape, assault and nearly every other sort of crime are steadily declining.

Steven Pinker, is his seminal book "The Better Angels of Our Nature" has documented this in rigorous detail. Living on the savannah ten thousand years ago (or in Australia until 200 years ago) as many as one in six people died at the hands of other humans. By comparison, today's murder rate is roughly one in a thousand, which is itself ten to fifty times lower than during the Middle Ages.

The overwhelming cause of this decline comes down to one reason: the concentration of violence with one authority, namely the state. After all, this is the very definition of a state – an entity which, over a given area, claims a monopoly on legitimate violence.

The past doesn't look like some hidden elf village from Lord of the Rings. Game of Thrones is much more accurate. It is only now that we have predator drones and night vision goggles and automatic weapons that the king's men have never been more efficient at enforcing law and order.

Now overwhelmingly, this process is a good thing, of course it is. The very fact you're complaining about stolen photos proves it. Five hundred years ago you wouldn't have been able to worry about it. You'd be too busy fleeing from Vikings or Mongols as they burned down your village and massacred all the male members of your family.

But the unfortunate implication lies in just how far we take this. The problem remains, the only reason you can ever dodge your responsibility for your own safety – is if someone else takes it over. You are not eliminating violence – you are monopolizing it.

You are saying to the state, waiting there patiently with its armies and police force – "I can't be fucked looking after myself! Its all too hard! The big bad men are being mean!" to which the state replies, "Well, if you insist my dear…"

This is where radical feminists take things too far. Of course its reasonable to demand the state bear most of the burden for protecting you from attack. I'm glad of the same protections. All I'm saying is, don't go full out. Never go full retard.

I want to maintain a decree of agency in my life, no matter how great the coverage of the surveillance state, no matter how heavily armed the police force, no matter how benevolent the psychologists pumping a generation of kids full of Ritalin and Prozac. Further in Clem's post, we see this –

> When will women learn? Learn what? That our bodies do not belong to us? That we have no right to determine who sees those bodies, touches those bodies, fucks those bodies, and shares in those bodies?

I'm just going to come out and say it.

No – no you don't.

Not unless you have a mobile with triple-O (or 911 for Americans) on speed dial or a gun on your hip. Otherwise, you are very much on your own.

If we're ever going to have a perfect peaceful paradise, it is only going to be with an enormous gun pointed at all our heads, like the MAD doctrine nuclear weapons have given us. So we know what the real end story is here. In fact, allow me to translate the true meaning of Ms. Clementine's post. I'll use fewer words –

> I can't do whatever I want whenever I please! I demand to be under the protective thumb of the state at all times! Us puny women are so hopeless against the big bag menzzz, we need a police escort in order to function! Or maybe just castrate them all, that could work too. At least hack all their emails in case they're even thinking about hitting on me! – Clementine Ford

I firmly believe this is the sort of attitude that corrupts societies, when people get so used to the good life they can't comprehend that there's a real world beyond it. In their blind rage, feminists and white knights are demanding the thin blue line be thickened to the point it may strangle us all, and our leaders are quietly letting them.

Read More: Human Resources Have Absolute Power Over Male Workers

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

The Women’s Soccer World Cup Is A Celebration Of Mediocrity

June 21, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A number of media outlets and pressure groups, especially the British taxpayer-funded BBC, have for years insisted on “equality” between men’s and women’s soccer (known as football in Britain and continental Europe). They either raise the demand explicitly or give incessant airtime to those demanding it.

This histrionic call has only grown with the start of the Women’s Soccer World Cup in Canada this month. The LA Times and others are now joining the fray. Despite incontrovertible evidence that most international female players, those representing their countries, would struggle to make a fourth or fifth-string men’s domestic league team, the political powers that be have attacked the “sexism” of soccer and screamed for equal attention for each set of gendered fields.

Presumably, if equal attention, or something close, is achieved, feminists will rally for female soccer players, inferior to the more skilful and athletic men, to be given the same multimillion-dollar, pound, and Euro salaries. All without ever actually playing or competing with the better men. All hail the “equality” New World Order of the BBC and Co.

If it’s about equality, feminism and girl power, have the women play the men!

If advocates for women’s soccer want equality, they can play the men. As I pointed out in an article at the start of this year about the pure lunacy of equal pay in tennis, where men and women compete separately, we don’t start separate basketball leagues for those under six feet tall with similar salaries as the normal NBA.

We also don’t see two different, equally supported Super Bowls staged every year, one for mesomorphs and endomorphs, and another for ectomorphs, where super lean linebackers might be half the weight of regular NFL quarterbacks.

Of course, given the biological differences between men and women, women should be able to have their own sporting tournaments and leagues. We do the same thing for juniors, masters (those typically 40 and above) and the disabled. But they, like women, should not expect to be lauded to anywhere near the same degree as the regular male players and men’s teams, pretending they’re equal in ability, competitiveness or the overall spectacle they provide.

Admire female athletes, but they’re simply not as good as men

[image]
Give me the name of one female player who should be allowed to even carry Lionel Messi’s shoes, if 99.99999% of men would never deserve the honor.

When I’ve included “celebration of mediocrity” in the title of this piece, it’s important to add a caveat. These women are good. They train day-in, day-out and have for years. Take most women (and men) off the street and they would be beaten by these women, hands-down. So, on the one hand, they have a skill that few, male or female, possess.

But on the other hand, to try and compare them to male professional or semi-professional players, even those men who never make world-class national or club sides, makes a mockery of the term “equality” and “professional.” This is the point at which celebrating women’s soccer as “equal” becomes unadulterated mediocrity.

Should we encourage women’s sport? Of course! And as ROK has proven time and time again, women’s health and counteracting the deliberate, self-chosen plague of obesity are concepts that feminism and many aspects of the modern world have worked tirelessly against.

If a women works hard to perfect herself, to the extent of her physical ability, in her sport, all power to her. Irrespective of the field in which someone toils, we can all draw inspiration from the person who pursues their dream or follows their career or hobby in a way that supremely challenges their perceived limits.

This is not a matter of saying men will beat women at sport each and every time. It is about a realistic assessment of the general abilities of male versus female athletes. And those abilities directly relate to what they should be praised for and paid.

The US Women’s National Soccer Team lost to the Under 17’s US Boys’ Team 2-8

> @Sam_Osorio we won 8-2 :O lol I scored 2 goals
> — Junior Flores (@Floresjr_) April 23, 2012

I kid you not. They did lose 2-8 in a scrimmage. Admittedly an unofficial match, it shows you that even pre-adult males will typically whip females in the prime of their soccer-playing life.

The interesting part about the Under 17’s Boys’ Team is that many of those players never make the jump to their senior national men’s team. Junior Flores, the U17’s US international player who reported the 8-2 win over the senior women’s national team, currently plays for Borussia Dortmund II, the reserve side for Borussia Dortmund, for example.

Although still very young, his chances of ever making the national side proper seem precarious at best. Yet he was still part of a team that demolished a playing group that supposedly deserves equal status with the US Men’s National Team.

If this story had been proven, dramatically, to be false, the general reality would remain the same. Women and men are pooled into separate fields and leagues to allow women to have a chance to compete at the highest level, albeit a “level” manipulated so that they can be there in the first place, without being upstaged almost universally by the professional male players.

If you want equality, feminists, stop butchering the term

Tell us again, why does it deserve equality?

The world will never be full of people with equal ability. And there should be, nevertheless, a benchmark of reward and support for those whom nature, upbringing or the general environment have not endowed with the physical, cognitive, or additional blessings of others. This is why we have the minimum wage, assistance for the disabled, elderly and sick, and the aspiration of what should be a moderate welfare state and social safety net.

To argue that women deserve equal standing in the world of sport, and in terms of remuneration in particular, makes a comedic spectacle when compared to the many other disparate fields in which we have no problem rewarding those with greater ability more. Men deserve significantly higher salaries and greater attention in soccer simply because they're significantly better than women. End of story.

Much of the support for women's soccer at the moment depends on the erroneous belief that they are somehow showcasing skill equal to men. If that's the case, I deserve an Oscar for telling my parents or grandparents that I'm on a business trip overseas instead of sleeping around in Paris or Berlin. Move over, Daniel Day-Lewis.

If you want equality, my feminist inclined friends, how about not flaying the concept until it's nothing but bones and a rancid smell?

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Americans Will Never Fully Embrace Soccer

---

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why “Men Going Their Own Way” Is No Way For Men To Go

June 22, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In the past few months, Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) has completed its devolution from a sensible philosophy of masculinity into a cult for lonely virgins. While I never identified as MGTOW myself, the old-guard MGTOW blog NO MA’AM (whose owner, Rob Fedders, has become so embarrassed by what MGTOW has become that he’s wiped almost all mention of it from his site) was a huge influence on my thinking; indeed, it was my introduction to anti-feminist thought in general.

The men who created the MGTOW philosophy a decade ago—zed, Ragnar, Rob Fedders etc.—were learned men, who’d seen the horrors of second- and third-wave feminism first-hand. They rode motorcycles, banged girls and read books, sharing their findings via blogs and forums. MGTOW was deliberately conceived as an “anti-movement,” in response to the impotence of men’s rights’ activists, and the “marriage strike“—the most recognizable part of modern “migtow” bleating—wasn’t even mentioned in the original MGTOW manifesto.

As it exists now, MGTOW has become a lonely hearts’ club for the refuse of the male species. Not only are most Virgins Going Their Own Way personally repellent losers, their “philosophy” is completely wrongheaded. Men Going Their Own Way will never appeal to anything more than the rejects of American society because it’s a philosophy that denies the fundamental nature of human beings.

“Lack Of Sex Can Drive A Man Crazy”

One common talking point of “migtows” is that their beliefs represent a completely new take on masculinity: the rejection of male subservience to women, or “pussy worship” as the permavirgins call it. This shows how historically illiterate—and arrogant—they are.

Spiritual and philosophical movements focused on celibacy and the denial of base urges have a long pedigree in human history, from early Buddhism and Jainism in India to the Catholic priesthood, monastic orders such as the Trappists, and quasi-Christian off-shoots such as the Shakers.

While it might inflate the bloated ego of the average “migtow” to be compared to great religious movements of the past and present, MGTOW fails even on that front. Monks and nuns don’t take the vows because they’re angry at not being able to get a date, they choose their lifestyles because they want to become closer to God.

Aside from avoiding women (in actuality being rejected by them), VGTOWs indulge in every vice available to them, from Cheetos to video games to masturbation. Their lifestyles are the very opposite of self-control.

The “migtow” aversion to interacting with women also has a less pleasant parallel to radical feminism. In the 1970’s, extremist feminists such as Andrea Dworkin argued for “political lesbianism,” where feminists only had relationships with other women, regardless of their sexual orientation. Dworkin’s logic was that since men were oppressing women, feminists who dated men were literally fraternizing with the enemy.

I wouldn’t be surprised if some “migtows” start advocating “political homosexuality” in the future. After all, since women are evil, ball-cutting, divorce-raping succubi, the only safe relationships are to be had with other men.

If you bang a dude, he won’t jam you for child support or falsely accuse you of rape, and you certainly won’t be “worshipping pussy” if you pack fudge (You’ll just be exposing yourself to HIV and drug-resistant gonorrhea, but hey, you gotta take the good with the bad).

The Masculine And The Feminine

More to the point, MGTOW will never catch on for the same reason that political lesbianism never became popular: they both deny the fact that men and women want to be with each other.

"Migtows" redefine all male-female relationships into male servitude of women, much in the same way that radical feminists recast relationships as men oppressing women. The problem with this is that the relationship between men and women is one of the most fundamental aspects of human existence. As Jack Donovan stated in his book No Man's Land, masculinity and femininity are defined in opposition to each other; without one, the other cannot exist.

The idea that men can go it alone or that any form of relationship with women is "pussy worship" is a perversion of the flawed libertarian belief that the smallest unit of society is the individual. Both libertarians and VGTOWs ignore that humans are fundamentally interdependent, with countless relationships—laws, customs, family connections etc.—binding us. A society of atomized, disconnected individuals is no society at all. The smallest unit of society is not the individual, but the relationship between two individuals.

The reality is that as frayed as relations between the sexes are, men and women still fundamentally want to be together. Even the most Instagram-obsessed, passive-aggressive, narcissistic Millennial girl desires a man to take her. And despite their whinnying, the average Doritos-munching "migtow" would go "pussy worshipper" in a flash if a cute, agreeable girl was dropped in his lap.

MGTOW, Will You Please Go Now!

In the end, Men Going Their Own Way is a passing fad, limited to a few bottom-feeders who would have been shipped off to die on the battlefield in epochs less squeamish than our own. The de facto Marxism of most major "migtow" YouTube personalities—as evidenced by their pathological obsession with bashing "TradCons," their autistic term for anyone who acknowledges the natural place of men and women—also renders them useless.

Despite their claims that "there's no difference between the left and the right," "migtows" almost never attack the misandrist, feminist left, even though it's the left who holds all the power in the West.

Their impotent rage against anything deemed "TradCon"—even though "TradCons" have virtually no influence in society—indicates that "migtows" are just as opposed to the natural order of humanity as the average pierced-lipped, easily "triggered" Tumblrina.

"Migtows" are the social justice warriors of the manosphere: hysterical, intolerant of criticism, and driven entirely by emotion. Their vision of masculinity is one in which men turn inward, refusing to accomplish anything of value or engage with the world beyond crying on the Internet. MGTOW is no place for men who are proud of being men.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Classical Opera Should Be Your New Masculine Hobby

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Mind Of The Fanatic

June 22, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The French philosopher Joseph de Maistre once perceptively commented: “I do not know what the heart of a rascal may be; I know what is in the heart of an honest man; it is horrible.” Even the most kind-hearted of us would hesitate to expose his innermost thoughts to public scrutiny. Barbarous thoughts and inclinations are always bubbling just beneath the surface, and this is why it is so important for man’s baser instincts to be kept firmly in check by a moral code that carries with it the authority of experience, and the lineage of antiquity.

More and more, we are becoming unwelcomingly acquainted with the mentality of the fanatic. Whether modern society–with its corrosive influence on ancient moral codes and its titillating stimulus of man’s baser instincts—is breeding more and more of these people, or whether modern information technology simply unmasks them easier than in the past, is not entirely clear. In either case, an understanding of the mentality of the fanatic is important. We will discuss a few of his salient features here.

The fanatic sees the world in absolutes. For him, there are no mixed tones of grey. It is all one thing, or all the other. The world is a battleground between the forces of good and evil, and only he himself is fully aware of the dimensions of this conflict. He is blind to the nuances in things, because he can only see the world through the lens of his own monomania.

al-Baghdadi: a messianic belief in his own vision. The lives of others are irrelevant.

The fanatic sees himself as under constant attack. His projection of the all the world's evils onto the demonic "other" creates this Zoroastrian conception of the universe, where all of creation is held hostage to this battle between the forces of Good and Evil. If he lets his guard down for an instant, the evil Other will overwhelm him.

This is why the fanatic often takes on the appearance of the hunted animal: furtive, opportunistic, and ready to sacrifice himself. It is this aspect of his thinking that makes him so dangerous. A good measure of self-hatred is also thrown into the mold of personality. The fixation on the evil Other makes the fanatic obsessed with purging traces of the evil Other that may be hidden in himself.

The fanatic's certainty can make him seem persuasive. Most people, lacking firm convictions of their own about almost everything, are attracted to the prospect of someone who announces his dogmas with absolute certitude. It is this certitude that aggrandizes his standing.

People with weak wills, and those unable or unwilling to think for themselves, can surrender the responsibility of thought to someone else. The messianic zeal with which the fanatic announces his plans makes him, in his early stages, an attractive and fascinating figure with women, simpletons, and persons of bad character; and it is only when it is too late do these hangers-on realize the folly of their trust.

The fanatic lacks empathy for the sufferings of others. Because he is consumed by the burning responsibility of his mission, he is blind and deaf to the cries of those whom he persecutes or violates. For him, they do not matter. It is this ability to disconnect his moral programming that gives the fanatic the power to commit frightening atrocities. The fanatic is frequently the product of some abusive environment himself, and becomes conditioned to the necessity of violence and brutality as a means of implementing his plans.

Baruch Goldstein, the Zionist fanatic who slaughtered 29 people at prayer in Hebron

Some historical examples bring these points into focus. The Roman emperor Julian (A.D. 331-363) experienced the murder of his father and immediate family by his cousin Constantius. He was brought up in isolation, under the watchful eye of the emperor's spies.

These experiences made him identify the religion of his oppressor Constantius (i.e., Christianity) with evil. When Julian finally came to wear the imperial purple himself, he became a fanatical persecutor of the Christian religion. It was, for him, synonymous with illogic and malignancy.

Another example is provided by the fanatical career of the Dominican friar Girolamo Savonarola (1452-1498). Florentines were initially attracted by is powerful sermons about the prevalence of vice and the imminent Kingdom of Heaven; his eloquence convinced many of his prophetic powers. He condemned art and scholarship as the products of vice, and sought to destroy these things, as well as regulate the sexual behavior of the fun-loving Florentines.

For a time, he was humored. But moralistic preachers tire everyone after a while, especially when they begin to attack the rich and powerful. Pope Alexander VI excommunicated him, and eventually had him executed.

The emperor Julian, a fanatical follower of paganism

In our time, religious and ideological fanaticism has seen something of a resurgence. Examples are depressingly plentiful. Extremists are found in every religion and every ethnic category. Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, the self-proclaimed leader of ISIS, is addicted to the slaughter of his sectarian enemies, believing himself to be ordained by God for this task. Of a similar mentality was the Zionist fanatic Baruch Goldstein, who believed it his holy mission to enter a place of worship (the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron) in 1994 and gun down twenty-nine innocent people.

To such people, human lives are not important: what matters are their monomanias. By kindling bonfires and butcheries, they seek to burn out the malevolence that flames within their own hearts. This was what Savonrola sought in his so-called “Bonfires of the Vanities” in Florence. When this proves impossible, they destroy themselves, as Baruch Goldstein was consumed by a lust for murder. It is this self-destructive impulse that makes the fanatic so recklessly “brave.”

We must cultivate our powers of rational thought, and sympathy for others, so that we may keep our more intolerant instincts under control. The fanatical “reformer” often turns out to be just as intolerant as the tyranny he proposes to replace. “Whenever the spirit of fanaticism,” wrote historian Edward Gibbon, “at once so credulous and crafty, has insinuated itself into a noble mind, it insensibly corrodes the vital principles of virtue and veracity.”

The first lesson of philosophy, it has been said, is that perspective matters. We must try to see the world through the perspective of others, if we wish to understand their behavior. Certainty, under whatever guise it takes, is murderous.

Read More: You Have To Learn To Love Rejection

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Raise A Red Pill Revolutionary

June 22, 2015 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

I recently received the fantastic news that my first child, to be born this September, is going to be a boy.

While I would have loved the child no matter it's gender, the knowledge that it is a boy got me thinking a lot more about what kind of an example I should be to my boy and what I should teach him in life. You see, I want to raise a red pill son, strong and true, so that he can go out into the world and take it on prepared.

I've boiled it down to these essential lessons. I believe if I can instill these values in him, he'll be equipped to deal with life as a successful, strong and decent man. It won't all be within my control, but I have the responsibility to at least try to mold him into the kind of man society desperately needs more of.

Life Is Hard, Nobody Owes You Shit

[image]

I want my boy to know that life is no walk in the park. He'll learn it eventually, so I might as well give him a head start by teaching him early on. He won't be lifted and laid, he'll learn to do things for himself, and he'll learn that his actions have irreversible consequences.

He'll be taught that when you screw up you fix it, and when you want something you work to get it, no exceptions.

That being said, I'll also let him know that when he hits the hard times in life his family will be there for him. No matter what, he should never give up and when going through hell, all he has to do is keep walking. As a man, he will have the responsibility to be a strong leader in tough times.

The Importance Of Physical Strength

Life is physical, pure and simple.

The next time you get ridiculous notions that you might be living in a hologram or that the physical world is some sort of physical manifestation of your spiritual vibration, I suggest you rack up 300lbs on the squat bar and do a set of ten. This will return the objectivity to your life, fast.

Life is physical. A physically strong, well built, and athletic man will have both self respect and the respect of others. I plan to have my boy doing 10 reps of handstand pushups before he enters high school and working the heavy bag from a young age.

This will keep the bullies, predators, and big mouths at bay. It will also teach him the discipline needed to succeed in life.

What Is His, Is His, And He Has The Right To Take It

I'm sick and tired of listening to socialist morons and SJWs talk about the redistribution of wealth and entitlements and social reparations. As if they have the right to re-distribute anything that belongs to someone else.

As far as I'm concerned the world doesn't owe me, you or anyone else a dime. You get paid when you deliver a useful product or service to other people, and those who deliver the most value get paid the most. If your people or your ancestors failed to secure themselves financially, build a decent society or a lineage of wealth for their descendants, tough titty son. Get to work and make something better for the future instead of whining like a bitch.

I've met a lot of people over the years here in Asia who have told me that because I'm white, male, and from Europe I have an unfair advantage in life and that I should give back to those less fortunate.

I'll be teaching my boy from day one not to feel white guilt, not to feel ashamed of having more than others if he has earned it, not to feel guilty about the shots he has in life because someone cared about him enough to give them to him.

To Get A Practical Education

Be somebody by knowing something useful

While we're on the topic of delivering value and getting paid, I'll be teaching him to get himself a practical education.

That means becoming a doctor, lawyer, engineer, mechanic, sparky or entrepreneur. I won't be encouraging nor bankrolling him to study sociology, gender studies, or philosophy. When it's time to go to school, it's time to learn something that's going to get you paid, son.

He'll also be learning practical survival skills and how to live in nature in case he ever needs to. This hunting, fishing, camping, and other practical skills is something this generation badly needs. What if the system was to go down? Half the men on this earth would be unable and ill-equipped to feed their own families.

Women Are Not The Same As Men, And He Doesn't Have To Pretend Otherwise

Let’s tell the truth – women are no the same as men in any way, shape or form.

True, there are lots of reasonably intelligent women out there, but physically and in practically every other way, men rule the roost, plain and simple. If you want to expose this much told lie very quickly, put us all back in the jungle and take away the safety of the society men built, and we will soon see who is relying on who and which gender is taking the lead.

I’ll be teaching him that women are to be treated with decency and not harmed or abused, but that at no time of his life should he give control to, explain himself to, take crucial life advice from, or place a woman above himself.

His Word And His Guts Are All He Has

A man comes into the world with nothing and leaves it the same way, but what he does have in between no matter what are his word and his courage.

A man’s honesty and word is worth its weight in gold. If you say you are going to do something and you do it every single time, you will always be trusted in life and have the respect of those around you.

As for his guts, what I mean by that is his courage. The guts to try new things, take risks and go on adventures will lead him to many opportunities in life. That can never be taken away from him and will lead him to the top, eventually.

The Value Of Family

In case you haven't noticed, there's a war against family raging throughout the world.

You see, governments dislike families because they are a threat to their power and control over the population. The further left you go, the deeper the dislike of family becomes.

I'll be teaching my boy from day one that family comes first and everybody else comes second. His blood is the most important thing and it is in fact the only thing on this earth that actually matters. When everyone else abandons him, betrays him, shuns him and turns on him, his blood will be there for him, and he should be there for his blood.

I'll teach him that it's OK to distance himself from some family members if they are trying to use him or have gone rogue, but that when they come back to the fold and show that they have changed, he should always give them another chance.

Money Is The Key To Almost Everything, But Money Is Not God

Money is damned important, but don't sell your soul for it

It's no secret that money makes the world go round.

Money is extremely important and can buy you pretty much anything you want on this earth. A house, clothes, a car, influence, and many other things can be bought with money. It's extremely important to have your cash right and to be a free man, you need to get money.

However, I will also let him know that the pursuit of money is no excuse for selling his soul and being an immoral, evil bastard. There are lines that a man must never cross in pursuit of cash – killing, con artistry, doing things which prey on the weak and innocent – these are out of bounds in pursuit of profit.

It is possible to make lots of money in legal, respectable ways which benefit both oneself and the society he lives in. Knowing this, and deciding to draw a line in the sand and say "here and no further" in pursuit of wealth is one of the keys to keeping your integrity in life.

Death Is An Illusion And Is Not To Be Feared

Too many hardcore materialists dismiss good evidence of the afterlife out of hand

If you look around you every day you will see that death holds immense power over all creatures. They scream, cry, kick, resist and fear death with all their might.

The only creature powerful enough to meet death with equanimity is a human being. I want to teach my boy early on that he has nothing to fear when the grim reaper comes knocking, and that as long as he has lived a decent life according to his principles he can go in peace when the time comes.

This is something I wish I had been taught as a kid. I was taught heaps of nonsense about hell, the devil, demons and ghosts, and as such I had a deep fear of death for most of my young life.

Later on I was able to overcome that mental fear by reflecting on the writings of some great philosophers like Plato who said:

"Death is either a dreamless sleep or transition to a better world, either way it is nothing to fear."

and Marcus Aurelius who said:

"Death smiles at all men, all a man can do is smile back."

We have lost something in Western Culture – the ability to meet death with equanimity and a Stoic calm. We need to get that back, and I'll be doing my best to teach my boy that while life is for the living and he should respect the gift he has been given, he doesn't have to be afraid of anything when it's over.

The Art Of Critical Thinking

You've probably already noticed, but most people simply consume content without giving it a second thought.

The news, magazines, even history books are all produced, written and distributed by people with a perspective and an agenda. It is crucial to ask both who the people are and what they want you to believe while reading a text or listening to an argument.

It is also essential to know how to think about what they are saying in a logical, precise way and criticize it. Thinking of any counter examples is a great start, but there's more to it than that.

We need to teach our boys how to read a newspaper and understand that it was likely written by a communist sympathizer or edited by an ultra-feminist and therefore he is not hearing the true and total story of what happened.

This skill alone can shield a growing boy from the brainwashing that destroyed this generation of men. It is crucial that we both learn it and pass it on.

A Closing Word

An entire generation of men has been laid to waste due to fathers, brothers, and leaders that failed them. I was one of the lucky ones who had a father who I'd say was 80% red pill, so I got a glimpse of what a real man looks like (he didn't exercise or know much about women, but he was a badass winner wolf and took zero shit).

I for one am not allowing this to stand any longer. I can't influence every single boy to be born in this generation, but I can influence my own, who will in turn influence his own, and so on.

I hope there are other men out there like me in their late twenties, thirties, and even older who have woken up to the bullshit we were peddled in our youths and who have decided that while we can’t go back, we can make sure our own boys are not fed the same line of lies and false wisdom.

This is the true revolution. This is how we truly turn the tide. We as fathers have the ultimate responsibility to make sure that the travesty that is the millennial generation never takes place again, and that we can, and will, make sure of it.

There is no need for riots, picketing, demonstrations and armed overthrow. All that is required is to be there, at home, raising men.

Read More: Why The Ukraine Crisis Is A Red Pill Vs Blue Pill Superpower Clash

Greg Freeman
G-Freedom is an oilfield technician, writer and explorer. When not off somewhere new he's thinking, in the gym, or writing on www.artofselfhood.com

5 Reasons Not To Have A Breadwinner Wife

June 23, 2015 | by Parham Otho | Link | Original Link

In my recent youth (five years ago), I made the mistake of blindly walking into circumstances that ultimately led to having a breadwinner wife. There is plenty of discussion about the social phenomenon that 40% of wives are now the breadwinner. However, the story is never told from a perspective that will help us men make the best decision for ourselves.

My story is one example. I wasn't some chump—I had a MBA from a good school. My fiancée was an awesome girl. Loving, nurturing, domesticated, and hot. And I had choices to pick from. Oh yeah, and she was in Law School during our first two years of marriage-basically it was like her having a part time job.

I come before you today to dispute all of the reasons people have for why it is good to have a breadwinner wife:

1. "It is good to have a breadwinner wife you sap! More money for you!"

There isn’t more money for you. It is her money. Traditional men look at women as sacred possessions and take pride in providing for their women and children. Women, even good women, just don’t have this characteristic. Money she earns is her money and she isn’t going to be smart with it.

When we were living on my decent but smaller income, we actually had a savings. When she started making twice the money, I bowed out and let her deal with the finances. It was a complete mess for two years. No savings, spending $200 at the grocery store and coming home with nothing for dinner, leased car, and purchased but unworn clothes and more.

She had more respect for my money in the beginning then she did for our combined money later on. Go figure that out.

2. “You now have time to pursue more masculine past times such as hunting, fishing, or extreme body building.”

Unless you quit your job, there isn’t more time or money (see above) for masculine interests. It is actually the same amount of time you had before, except now you get to be the beta when you go home. If she has a career that requires lots of hours, you will find that you have to construct your life according to your wife’s job schedule—whether that’s planning the vacation, weekend trip, or what time the family is going to eat dinner.

3. “The challenges of being married to a ‘strong’ woman will push you to reach your untapped potential”

A woman who works 8-10 hours a day is a tired, worn out, and cranky woman every day of the week. Expect very few breaks from this reality. She just doesn't have the stamina that you do as a man. When it is 7 p.m. and she hasn't had time to cook, clean, work out, or anything, she is going to be in a bitchy, nagging mood. Not the best environment for self-improvement.

On one hand, you can just do all the housework. It only takes about an hour anyway. But then, she will lose respect for you faster than she already was from being the breadwinner. She doesn't want the guy at home washing her panties, so kiss your sex life goodbye. Additionally, due to her likely Type-A personality, she will become threatened if you try to improve yourself any higher than your status as designated laundry bitch.

4. "Your wife will love you even more for supporting her Career Ambitions!"

While she was breadwinner, I went through a period where I did the cooking and cleaning when I got home from work just to make the evenings more pleasant. My firsthand experience is she actually won't love you more or appreciate your support. She will lose respect for you.

We all know what happens when your woman doesn't respect you. It sucks for all involved. Do a quick search and read the blogs and comments where breadwinner wives discuss their "husbands." If men talked about their housewives like that, they would be thrown in jail.

5. “You just feel emasculated because of outdated societal constructs- it is all in your head! Quit complaining!”

The truth is you lose a large part of your masculinity by not being the breadwinner. Once you see how your in-laws have no respect for your authority (because you have none) or how your wife talks down to you constantly (because she doesn’t respect you), you will understand.

So you feel emasculated that your wife makes more? That means there is hope for you! Your balls can still drop back down to their original dangling position they were in before! Go hug your old man – he probably did right by you if you feel this way.

I survived and so can you. With diligent effort towards self-improvement, this too shall pass. Tips to help specifically navigate yourself out of this situation is a another conversation for another day.

I believe that knowledge is power. I only know three men whose wives are the breadwinner that seem content. One of them coaches baseball and two of them are Green Berets. The guy who coaches baseball just wants to coach baseball. Green Berets say they need independent women that can manage through their long and frequent deployments.

Most men I know whose wives are the breadwinner, however, are either dissatisfied with their personal life or are very meek in nature. So be careful, be knowledgeable, be particular, and plan accordingly.

Read More: Ex-Wife Wins Right To Sue For Alimony Twenty Years Later

Parham Otho

Otho Anderson is a younger man with an old family name. Born and raised in the deep South his interests are boating, hunting, traveling to Europe, and more recently gardening. He is absolutely flabbergasted by the social decline he has witnessed already in his short years. In the manosphere he is probably considered a moderate as he still fights to maintain a traditional family structure. It may be worth noting that he thinks he is winning.

Backlash Against The Boycott Of Sci-Fi Publisher Tor Books Shows The Hypocrisy Of SJWs

June 23, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

For the past few days, social justice warriors have been browning their panties over a boycott of science fiction publisher Tor Books launched by independent sci-fi author Peter Grant and supported by several prominent Sad and Rabid Puppies figures, including Castalia House founder Vox Day. The impetus for Grant's boycott was a series of angry, lie-filled claims that Tor editor Irene Gallo made about Sad and Rabid Puppies, as well as Tor owner Tom Doherty's failure to take action against her:

> There are two extreme right-wing to neo-nazi groups, called the Sad Puppies and Rabid Puppies respectively, that are calling for the end of social justice in science fiction and fantasy. They are unrepentantly racist, misogynist, and homophobic. A noisy few but they've been able to gather some Gamergate folks around them and elect a slate of bad-to-reprehensible works on this year's Hugo ballot.

SJWs insulting the people they expect to buy their products is nothing new, but this time, their targets have decided that they aren't going to take it anymore:

> Finally, there are some who fear that we can't succeed in the face of what they consider overwhelming support for liberal/progressive/left-wing ideologies in our society. To them I can only say, never take counsel of your fears. Stand tall. Turn Alinsky's own tactics against his followers. Boycotts are a part of his script. Use them. You'll be surprised at what hard work and dedication can achieve. I've seen that in a country and a continent ripped apart by war (where I learned such > tactics by watching the disciples of those who taught Alinsky and his mentors in the first place). It's a whole lot easier to succeed in a society like ours.

Since Grant launched his boycott of Tor on Friday, it's picked up steam among Sad and Rabid Puppies supporters and drawn the opprobrium of SJWs, who've launched a "buy-cott" in response (complete with fake Twitter accounts in support). Vox Day has been one of the most vocal supporters of the boycott, pointing to libelous comments made by another Tor editor, Patrick Nielsen Hayden, and how both his and Gallo's remarks violate Macmillan's (Tor's corporate parent) code of conduct.

SJWs' panicked response to the Tor boycott is yet more evidence of how hypocritical and lacking in honesty they are. Leftists are happy to launch boycotts against companies whenever their employees make "racist," "misogynist" or "homophobic" comments: indeed, instigating witch hunts against those they deem "bigots" is practically a sport among the left. But when one of their own is targeted, these fearless moral crusaders suddenly cry foul.

More importantly, the frenzied fear that SJWs have of the Sad and Rabid Puppies is indicative that Tor Books—and mainstream publishing in general—are in trouble. For the past few years, self-publishing and independent presses such as Castalia House, Nine-Banded Books and Counter-Currents Publishing have been eating away at major publishers, who no longer enjoy the privilege of determining what books see the light of day. If this boycott is successful, it may spell the death knell for not just Tor Books, but for traditional publishing in general.

A Brief History Of SJW Entryism

In the past couple of decades, publishing in general—and sci-fi and fantasy publishing especially—has become increasingly dominated by leftists, who have jettisoned the genres' focus on adventure and exploration in favor of heavy-handed social justice narratives blaming cishetwhitemales for all the world's ills.

Any writer who dissented from the SJW line was effectively blacklisted from Tor and other major publishing houses, as well as denied nominations in the industry's prestigious Hugo and Nebula Awards.

As you would expect, sales of newer sci-fi and fantasy books have flatlined as SJWs such as Nielsen Hayden and N.K. Jemisin have become dominant voices. As it turns out, nobody wants to read "socially aware" dreck like If You Were a Dinosaur, My Love and other works that cast straight white men as the devil incarnate.

Sales figures show this: of the top ten best-selling sci-fi books in 2012, all but two of them were either Star Wars/Halo tie-ins or published decades ago. The number one best-selling book was Orson Scott Card's Ender's Game, published in 1985.

Last April, SJWs threw conniption fits when the Sad and Rabid Puppies, two campaigns spearheaded by sci-fi authors Larry Correia and Vox Day, respectively, successfully nominated several non-SJW works for this year's Hugo Awards. Beyond showing how petty SJWs are, the Sad and Rabid Puppies' campaign showed that SJWs are a vocal-but-tiny minority, since it only took a handful of votes to swing the nomination results.

The inability of SJW science fiction to turn a profit is likely the primary motivator behind both the anger at the Sad and Rabid Puppies and the panicked response to the Tor boycott. At present, the closest thing Tor has to a big star is John Scalzi, a middling blogger whose most notable novel is glorified Star Trek fan fiction.

Scalzi recently inked a multi-million dollar deal with Tor, a questionable move for them considering that Redshirts—as well as Scalzi's other books—have never cracked the top ten in sci-fi sales for any year.

The SJW Cries Out In Pain As He Strikes You

SJWs' slavish defense of Tor Books is also more evidence that, contrary to their belief that they're fighting for oppressed minorities, they are in fact tools of corporate power.

The authors represented by Sad and Rabid Puppies were denied a voice by the SJW-dominated publishing industry, but they've chosen to persevere anyway. They've chosen to either take their chances with self-publishing—which gives you maximum freedom, but also requires you to market your own work—or band together to create independent publishing houses such as Castalia House. They are, by anyone's definition, the underdogs in this war.

In contrast, Tor Books is a mainstream house owned by a major publisher, Macmillan. They are precisely the faceless, uncaring, capitalist behemoth that SJWs purport to oppose, yet SJWs feverishly defend them. They also have conjured up fantasies of the Sad and Rabid Puppies "silencing" them (as Irene Gallo's comments show), when in fact they are simply fighting for a place for non-SJW sci-fi. No matter how powerful they become, SJWs live in perpetual fear that evil right-wing "shitlords" are coming to oppress them.

While I can't join in the boycott of Tor Books (since I've never owned any of their books and wasn't planning to buy any anyway), I wholeheartedly support Peter Grant and Vox Day's campaign against them. With luck, we will see the destruction of traditional publishing and a renaissance in not just science fiction, but in American literature in general.

Read More: The Josh Duggar Incident Reveals The Tactics And Hypocrisy Of SJWs

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Best Legal Alternative To Steroids

June 23, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by John Doe Bodybuilding

As you may have picked up from reading a few of my past articles, I'm very skeptical about a lot of supplements. The ones I do write about are supplements that I feel work and supplements I have personally used and felt like I achieved results.

A lot of reviews you read from people you have to take with a grain of salt, because they are from people who have no reference to compare things to. I however, have that reference. I'm not here to bullshit anyone, I use steroids and I have a prescription for testosterone through my Doctor. My body does not make its own testosterone and I need it to live like a normal human being.

I was sent a couple supplements from these 2 labs to try out.

One was called "OSTA-SHRED" by Hard Rock supplements, and the other was called "Anafuse" by Vital Labs. To my knowledge these products need to be ordered online and cannot be purchased in stores yet.

Without getting too scientific on you, the "Osta-Shred" is a new type of muscle building supplement called a SARM (selective androgen receptor module). What a SARM does is it acts on different pathways than a testosterone derivative or a typical androgenic steroid, and it gives you all of the benefits without the side effects.

Unlike most prohormones out there (of which most are banned now) a SARM does not knock your normal testosterone production in the dirt. You have no issues with recovery at all when you discontinue use!

SARMS are most commonly sold as a research liquid and they are extremely expensive to buy, and having known little about them I had never used them, up until a supplement pill form was sent to me to try 8 weeks ago.

Of course I was extremely skeptical and having been a veteran gear user myself…

I didn't put a lot of faith into the 2 supplements I was sent to try out.

After being on the Osta-Shred and Anafuse for that first week, my preconceived notion that they wouldn't do shit quickly changed.

Most prohormones make me feel like shit, these did not! I felt incredible on them and noticed an increase in sex drive and well being just in one short week!

The only other thing I was using was 150mg/week of testosterone per my doctor, nothing else. I will put that on my son's life that I was using nothing else besides 150mg/week of test.

On the stack I noticed a slight increase in strength but nothing crazy until week #2. The biggest thing that was happening is I was getting dryer.

The Osta has a built in anti-aromatase/water cutter in it called Arimastane which works like a fucking champ. I was noticeably dryer in that first week.

The built-in AI works.

I had to drop my 1/2 mg 3x/week dosage of arimadex while using Osta-shred because I had a bad reaction and broke out in hives one day, and that can commonly happen when estrogen levels get TOO LOW.

The 1/2mg 3x/week of prescription arimadex topped with the Arimastane that is included in “Osta-Shred” was too much and knocked my estrogen down too low. You do need a little estrogen to complete a healthy balance of hormones, you just don’t want too much.

So I know the product sheds water weight and reduces E1 and E2 levels FOR A FACT. I would compare the Osta-shred to a moderate dosage of Winstrol, I’d say it’s comparable to about 30mg/day of winny in terms of solid results.

Week 2 marked much more noticeable strength increases on the stack.

I’m going to be honest and tell you the strength increases weren’t huge, but I was dieting along with them.

HOWEVER, I was much stronger in caloric deficit than I have been most commonly in the past. I typically never use things like 125 lb. dumbbells or 10-12 plates/side on leg presses while dieting, especially after I get a few weeks into the diet, but this time I was able to maintain that strength.

Now, on the Anafuse; my original plan was to take 2 pills per day for 8 weeks along with 2 pills per day of Osta-Shred. 2 pills/day Osta-shred is what the bottle says to use, but with Anafuse it’s recommended to take up to 4 pills per day.

I tried both ways and when it went to 4 pills/day I saw a huge difference in strength. I went to 4/day after about 2-3 wks on the stack, and kept it at 4 pills per day.

I don’t really know the science behind this product, but I know the shit worked for me.

[image]

Ok, so far the products you sent me kick ass!! The built in anti estrogen works like a charm. Im already looking dryer and not even a week into it. Here is a quick pic from today @ 226 lbs, I'd like to get around 205-210.
Will keep you updated periodically. Also, I feel really good on this shit, unlike other ph in the past.
My libido is through the roof too. Only other thing im doing is 150/wk test replacement dose

From what I was told the Anafuse was geared more towards growing and the Osta was for cutting. I was just told to stack them both and give an honest review.

The Anafuse ran out first, since I only had 1 bottle and I eventually went to 4 pills/day. I noticed a drop in strength shortly after I got off the Anafuse, but I didn’t feel like shit or like I was crashing which is what makes this product so great.

Is your bench press going to go up 100 lbs while taking this stuff? Probably not. But everything you get is smooth and steady and the products don’t effect your mood or give you that brain fog that a lot of prohormones can do.

Honestly I used to feel worse on most prohormones than real steroids! These products don’t do that.

I would say it’s more like a smooth-and-steady-wins-the-race type deal with these supplements. But the best part was I didn’t put on water weight or look blurry. I looked sharp and healthy.

I’m not going to come here and lie to you guys, so I honestly cannot tell you how they would do if one was to “bulk up” or eat 5,000 calories a day on them. Maybe strength gains WOULD BE through the roof. My goal was to cut though, and try to retain as much muscle mass as possible. And the 2 supplements helped get the job done nicely I think.

John Doe Training Video While on Anafuse and Osta Shred

This is a training video of myself. The video was shot at the end of my cycle of Osta-Shred and Anafuse. I weighed 214 lbs the morning of that video shoot, I had started my 8 wk diet around 225 lbs. I only came down 11 lbs…

…but I totally recompositioned my body in that 8 wks.

Now remember, I DID HAVE 150mg/wk of test in the mix from my hormone replacement, but what you need to understand is this is nothing “extra” for someone who doesn’t make their own testosterone. You can’t even really count that, because it’s really no different than a normal guy who makes good testosterone on his own, and then throws in these supplements.

Anafuse and Osta Shred Breakdown

Keep in mind I was stacking them both together when using them.

I used 2 pills per day of Osta-shred for 8 weeks, and 2 pills per day of Anafuse the first 2-3 weeks, but then I kicked it to 4 pills/day and ran the bottle out. When I use it again I'm just going to start at 4/day. 1 bottle of each is all you'd need, but if you were trying to use 4 pills/day of Anafuse the entire 8 wks then I think you'd need 2 of those in that case.

Compared to most liquid SARMS these 2 products are much easier on your wallet, as well as your body and recovery. I kept a pretty good diet along with them, since after all that is really 90% of the process. But after using Osta-shred and anafuse alongside my diet, I can say they definitely work!! The strength retention from the Anafuse combined with the cutting and water shedding properties of Osta-Shred made for a great combination.

If you had to ask me at this point in time what the best legal alternative to taking steroids is, these 2 products are my answer.

Take it from someone who HAS USED STEROIDS before and can actually compare results!!

BENEFITS OF OSTA-SHRED

- noticeable mild diuretic effect similar to Winstrol
- noticeable definition
- doesn't bother stomach or liver or effect appetite
- works pretty fast without any bloating
- doesn't bother your sleep
- increased sense of well being
- increased sex drive
- increased energy
- increased recovery

BENEFITS OF ANAFUSE

- better muscle retention in a caloric deficit
- increased drive and recovery between sets (shorter rest periods)
- increase in muscle volume
- smooth and steady strength increases (This isn't a quick gain of fluid and fat, it's more similar to primobolan type gains)
- no problems with skin (my skin did not get oily or acne covered while using this)
- Benefits similar to steroids at a fraction of the price
- increase in sex drive
- increase in sense of well-being
- better recovery between workouts
- no crashing when you stop using it
- does not require an anti-estrogen to be ran alongside it

Conclusion

So there you have it, my honest review of 2 legitimate supplements to help with your quest in building muscles and getting leaner. If you're looking for something effective that isn’t marketed to sell more products to be ran with it (or products for recovery) then these 2 supplements are solid!!

If you’re looking for a legal alternative to steroids then this stack is very comparable, and best of all is you won’t mess with your normal hormone levels when you stop using these products! It’s like adding nitro to your car, but not inhibiting the car’s performance when you aren’t pushing the NOS.

For those who follow me, you know I’d never steer you wrong. The truth comes first, and in this world of bodybuilding there are lies everywhere.

Just remember, your diet and training regimen ALWAYS come first, and are the prime determining factor in results.

Over and out!!

-John

You can buy Osta Shred here.

You can buy Anafuse here.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

British Gender Huckster Receives Top Royal Honour For Complaining About Inequality

June 24, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

The abasement of standards in British public life has reached a new low, after Caroline Criado-Perez, a shrill, feminist tubthumper of no discerning talent other than screeching and wailing online, was awarded the Order of The British Empire.

The decision to award Criado-Perez the honour is a strange one, since the pinnacle of Criado-Perez's achievement was to successfully campaign for the author Jane Austen to feature on a British banknote, the sort of token gesture which institutions like the Bank of England are keen to be seen making anyway.

What has Criado-Perez achieved that warrants putting her in the same box as established entrepreneurs, actors and inventors?

Caroline who?

Privately educated Criado-Perez, for overseas readers, is a Gawker-calibre churnalist who makes a living writing about asinine topics of interest to feminists: what hashtags have been used on Twitter, what nomenclature should apply to male feminists (are they feminists or are they “feminist allies”?), referring to the patriarchy as if it were an actual thing, and so on.

She is also a fervent supporter of the decidedly dodgy prosecution for rape of Julian Assange. Assange is being sought for extradition from the UK by the authorities in the Scandinavian territory of Sweden, a feminist banana state where the application of law and reason is known to have collapsed.

Criado-Perez, who has a Masters Degree in Gender from the London School of Economics, accepts the absurd regret-rape allegations against Assange uncritically.

Pictures of Charles Darwin damage the aspirations of women and young girls

But Criado-Perez’s crowning glory was to convince the Bank of England to print a picture of Jane Austen, the English novelist, on the English £10 note. The drive to have the Bank make the token gesture is set out in her own, man-hating words:

> I spent much of my time rehearsing arguments about the damage a public culture saturated with white male faces does to the aspirations and achievements of women and young girls.

Criado-Perez’s gripe was with the “all-male line-up on banknotes.” Even ignoring the patent inanity of the campaign (all British banknotes bear the face of a very powerful woman, Queen Elizabeth II of the United Kingdom), the harpy-in-chief came in for an unusual level of sustained attack. One man even sent her a letter at home to show her he knew where she lived!

Bank of England governor Mark Carney, earning himself mad Hampstead dinner-party kudos points.

After the Bank of England capitulated to requests, putting Jane Austen on banknotes and offering a stream of mealy-mouthed platitudes about representing the "diversity" of society and complying with the "Public Sector Equality Duty", our Caroline was subjected to a further "deluge of threats of sexual violence".

Trolls started tweeting under various hashtags, like #rapecrew and #hopeyougetraped, offering such gems as:

> You need a good smashing up the arse

and

> So looking forward to titty-fucking you later tonight – I've got an invitation to your anus

The various internet abuse continued until Caroline, ever the strong, independent womyn, had a break-down. In her own words, she "broke down completely, utterly overwhelmed, starting to think that it was never going to end."

The effect of these words on a screen upon her, was, in her words "dramatic." "When it was at its height I struggled to eat, to sleep, to work," she complained at the time.

Melody Hensley was attacked after saying her PTSD is on par with war veterans

Just like Melody Hensley, the SJW who claims the internet gave her PTSD, Criado-Perez is a embodiment of the soppy, weak-willed millennial. For all her education at Oxford and the London School of Economics, she is unable to grasp the simple logical proposition that turning off a computer prevents other people being nasty to you on the internet.

Your rights end where my feelings begin

What Criado-Perez has managed to do, and will perhaps be a greater "achievement" than her lunatic scheme to put Jane Austen on the £10, was to promote the notion that having your feelings hurt on the internet is a matter for the police.

The common sense sense advice offered when she was under a barrage of puerile, locker-room abuse was pooh-pooed by Criado Perez. She was indignant at being told "don't feed the trolls." The advice, she kvetched, "doesn't magically scrub out the image in your head of being told you'll be gang-raped till you die."

No, the only way of dealing with the weak-mindedness of Criado Perez and her like, is for the long arm of the law to get involved and police online communication!

Furthermore, in a Britain where the police is under stringent cost-cutting measures that is putting strain on the front line, special snowflake Criado-Perez indignantly demands that "if the police don't have the resources to deal with these crimes, they need to be given them".

When privileged white women manipulate the legal system, simple people go to jail.

Our Caroline got her wish. On 24 January 2014, Isabella Sorley, 23, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, was sentenced to 12 weeks in prison and John Nimmo, 25, of South Shields, was jailed for eight weeks after pleading guilty at Westminster Magistrates' Court to the Orwellian-sounding offence of "improper use of a communications network".

Victim impact statements are a classical ploy used by British prosecutors to shoe-horn "evidence" into court that would not stand the light of day under the proper rules concerning witness statements. It is worth reading this extract from the victim impact statement of Caroline Criado-Perez, the strong, empowered, independent, go-grrl feminist. The melodrama alone is enough to make one weep for Jesus.

> It's hard to get my thoughts together at the moment as my stomach is churning – hearing the outcome has made me realise how tense and anxious I have been feeling. But here goes.
>
> I did not attend the sentencing as I didn't feel I could cope with being in court with them – and I didn't feel sure that the judge would understand how terrifying and scarring the whole experience has been for me, which again is not something I could face.
>
> I feel immensely relieved that the judge clearly has understood the severity of the impact this abuse has had on me.

The real legacy of Caroline Criado-Perez

Appointment as Officer of the Order of the British Empire (OBE) is awarded for “having a major local role in any activity, including people whose work has made them known nationally in their chosen area.”

This is a convenient vessel for the Conservative government to kow-tow to the haute-chattering classes by awarding a gender huckster du jour, Caroline Criado-Perez, a trinket to hang on her mantlepiece. It makes David Cameron trendy and hip, and it makes the British Establishment look full of empathy.

Criado-Perez is the walking archetype of shameless privilege. Her father is the former boss of UK supermarket chain Safeway. Like flotsam, she has drifted from half-baked pursuit to half-baked pursuit, dabbling in opera singing and digital marketing before studying at Oxford as a mature student, all done at a leisurely pace and probably with lots of cash injections from mummy and daddy.

Her lasting legacy will not be the banknote with Jane Austen on it. Rather it will be the day that she invoked the power of the state to make a court imprison two simple, working class folk for hurting her feelings on the internet.

She did this in the same cowardly manner she conducts her entire life, that is, remotely—over the internet, over the phone, from the comfort of her armchair. Criado-Perez did not even have the stomach to come to court, as two people whose lives were the diametric opposite of her own pampered upbringing, were taken down to gaol.

Beyond this, she added to the precedent in the UK courts whereby an agent of the state, a judge, will deprive men of their liberty for putting words on a screen that hurt the feelings of a “celebrity.” Words that anyone with any common sense knows can be banished to the ether by switching off or pressing the block button.

For hammering another final, fateful nail into the coffin of the free speech and common sense in Britain, we salute you, Caroline Criado-Perez, Officer of the British Empire.

Read More: Special Snowflake Lashes Out At Oxford University For Not Accommodating Her Made-Up Disabilities

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

6 Tips For Making Speed Dating Work For You

June 24, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Of all the ways in which culturally brainwashed beta males are encouraged to meet with women who may deign to glance at them momentarily before opting for the dude with ripped jeans and gleaming pecs, speed dating must surely be among the worst.

Any set-up where men are forced to sit meekly at desks while overly-entitled, overly carb-fed women clump up and down expecting to be entertained and making their dead-eyed acolytes jump accordingly doesn't sound like my kind of deal.

However, last week I went to my first ever speed-dating event for a magazine article I was writing and I was surprised to find that – despite many drawbacks – it wasn't all bad. While I would never recommend speed dating as any man's sole sexual strategy—it has nothing on good, old-fashioned cold approaching—as an occasional supplement to ones main diet it has its advantages.

For one thing, from what I observed, the pool of men that you are competing with for the choicest women would appear to be dismal at best. At the event I attended, an aging punk in a pork pie hat and a friendly but clueless building supervisor in a shiny, ill-fitting suit were my main opponents. Compared to Vegas or Ibiza, this is a walk in the park.

Not that the women were anything to write home about – apparently speed dating is a pastime largely favoured by post-wall divorcees anxious to wield a little power again. But amongst the trash there were a few cute girls who I was able to vibe with and obtain contact details from with relative ease.

The other advantage of speed dating – perhaps its principle one – is that there's no need to approach. You just sit there and the women come to you. This frees you up to concentrate on verbal sparring, eye contact and light touch, and could actually provide the game newbie with a useful opportunity to practice these.

If you decide that speed dating is for you, or the opportunity comes up for you to try it, here are six handy tips for how best to maximise your chances.

1. Get Physical Immediately

No, don’t touch her breasts. When she comes over stand up, shake her hand firmly then pull her in and kiss her on both cheeks. Doing so will demonstrate that you are a confident guy who is not afraid to touch her. It will also begin to break down the invisible “touch-barrier” that exists between men and women who haven’t yet been introduced, putting you in a good position for later.

2. Maintain Strong, Flirtatious Eye Contact

I’ve written about this in detail before so I won’t labour on the point, but just remember that eye contact is absolutely key, and it can lift a workaday getting-to-know you conversation into the realms of a sexy one-on-one liaison.

Don’t stare at her like a loon – allow your eyes to shift to the side from time to time, or better, gaze around the room every now and then – but do imagine giving her the rough and tumble while you’re looking at her.

3. Talk Loudly

Fuck the people around you – you're never going to see them again and if you do, so what? They're sad sacks who go speed dating. Talk loudly and confidently and command the environment. You've got five minutes to show her you're a boss so don't wimp out – use it.

4. Demand Her Contact Details Before Your Time Is Up

The rules will vary depending on the nature of the event you're at, but if you're allowed to swap contact details at the end of your session then simply put your phone on the table, slide it across to her and say "I've heard enough. Digits."

If you are compelled to wait until later then be similarly up-front and unapologetic. Brazenness wins you points, and after all, why not be brazen? These women have put themselves forward to be picked up so you may as well deliver.

5. Don't Bother With Meta Gags About The Odd Nature Of The Situation

Yes, the situation is weird and artificial and all the rest. But don't bother to appraise your date of this stunning insight. Rest assured that every other guy she's spoken to will already have done so. Instead, go for off the wall conversational gambits and flirty teasing with a few well-timed sexualised double-entendres to spice things up. Whatever you do, you must ensure you stand out from the crowd. Fortunately this won't be difficult.

6. Realise That Even With Minimal Game Knowledge You Are Streets Ahead of Every Other Guy There

It's true – most men present will be eunuchs, cajoled by society into thinking that kowtowing to blubbery land whales is the best they can expect for their love lives. You, with your reading of ROK and other sources and your interest in game, are streets ahead and will be able to pick off the cream with ease, so be confident.

While I cannot wholeheartedly endorse speed-dating, I now recognise that it has certain advantages – namely available single women, no approach anxiety and lacklustre competition – and can therefore say that it is worth a go for fun on an off-night.

And who knows, if you follow the guidelines I've set out here, you may even benefit from a low-investment bang. But remember – there’s no such thing as a free lunch, and no seemingly “easy option” for meeting women is a substitute for learning game.

Read More: Five Reasons Why The Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need to Learn Game

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

One Man In State Of Five Million Kills Nine People; Governor Removes Confederate Flag

June 24, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In the most contrived act of symbolism in the history of the Southern United States, Governor Nikki Haley has called for the Confederate flag to be removed from the South Carolina State Capitol. Despite being Governor for four and a half years (and seemingly able to pick up a history of slavery book), it took the alleged killing of nine black bible study attendees by white supremacist Dylann Roof for Haley to act.

Our narcissism culture has reached yet another apex, the old record receding into oblivion. The Governor's cry reeks of opportunism and "my time in history." Should we now expect a 2020 run for the White House?

South Carolina is a state of nearly five million people, but the purported actions of one man has led to the flag being removed. Not only is this sensationalist, given the ample reasons and popular excuses for taking down the flag previously, it reflects other unsettling, jump-the-gun trends in society.

For example, the near-universal description of Dylann Roof has been that of a recluse and probably mentally ill loner. Yet the events in Charleston are now being used to portray a huge chunk of America's 200-million-plus Caucasians as unabashed, inveterate racists upholding an all-powerful anti-black social system.

Why not get rid of the American flag?

Governor Haley's decision is a contextual non-sequitur. Of course, it fits perfectly the preponderant narrative of the United States, where a flag initially supportive of slavery (the Stars and Stripes) is upheld and revered, while another, subsequent one is vilified. But it should cause us all to ponder the selective nature of how history is invoked, especially in times where those like Governor Haley can generate immense political capital. Renderings of and judgments about past times require a very hazy memory in the modern age.

America's flag epitomizes the ad hoc remembering of US history. Its thirteen stripes represent the thirteen colonies and founding states which, by and large, Northern or Southern, allowed forms of slavery to persist until decades after independence. Slavery in the North was only really extinguished 20 years before the Civil War started.

Moreover, the various Northern economies were far from comparable to the cotton-producing South. It is highly contestable that Yankee states would still have steadily abolished the practice of slavery if their cash crops and non-agricultural output had been different.

Although feminists and others deliberately obfuscate the story of female suffrage (most non-landholding men were denied the vote until only some decades or even mere years before women), there's no doubt that women did not have the vote when the American flag was adopted. So why not tear it down as well? You see, SJW-led rage spirals against the Confederate flag depend on rampant tunnel vision.

In addition, how about we rename Washington D.C. as Martin Luther King D.C. because of George Washington's undeniable racism? Or have some college professor-legislators posthumously declare Thomas Jefferson a rapist for having sex with the slave Sally Hemings? The list of things we should, logically, be doing or revising in light of the juxtaposition of American history with SJW ideology is limitless.

The Confederate flag itself isn't the main point

If Nikki Haley had any conviction, rather than political radar, she would have lowered the Confederate flag years ago.

The central issue, aside from elites' ignorance of other similar historical symbols, is instead the chosen reasons for removing the flag. Other ones have, as I have said, existed prior to the events in Charleston. Political decisions such as lowering this flag have been made to maximize public fallout, not when the time is (or was) actually right.

As the first minority Governor of South Carolina, surely Nikki Haley, albeit a Subcontinental Indian-American, would have already grasped African-American feelings about the Confederate flag when she originally entered the South Carolina legislature ten years ago, before her first gubernatorial campaign.

White supremacists have appropriated the American flag before, too. This is a fact lost on the Governor and others, especially those in the race-baiting "civil rights community." In her statement, Haley referred to two widely-held views of the Confederate flag in South Carolina, positive and negative, saying they could coexist. A greater lie will probably never pass her lips.

By removing the Confederate flag in the immediate aftermath of the church shooting, Haley is forever equating Dylann Roof's use of it with the use by countless non-accused murderers throughout her state and the entire South.

Walmart is now banning Confederate merchandise… and getting advertising worth millions

Even more than Haley, Walmart could have done its own "lowering" of the Confederate flag and stopped selling it and related merchandise years ago. But it's only done it now. From a PR standpoint, Walmart is behaving in the most economically rationalist sense possible, jumping on the bandwagon before other retailers can.

Excuse my eye rolling, and presumably yours, however. I have no reason to believe that Walmart's customer base doesn't mirror US demographics, so a similar proportion of African-Americans would shop there as there are blacks in the United States' population. So why now, Walmart? If you wanted to do the right thing by history, why not do it 130 or 140 years after slavery was fully ended, not 150?

We'll never get these answers, frankly, because politicians and corporations will be too enamored with profiting from this propitious moment. In the meantime, regular, everyday people will be hiding a flag they previously cherished, not as a sign of bigotry, but of their heritage. And Walmart will save millions of dollars in planned advertising.

SJWs and other political opportunists are shameless in their timing

[image]
Two gay marriage opportunists.

Look at Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama's flip-flopping on gay marriage. Both reversed their opinions after a majority or near-majority of Americans were shown to support it in certain polls. Most importantly, they were on the cusp of momentous political runs: Hillary had just quit her post as Secretary of State and was eyeing a presidential run; Obama was only months away from his reelection bid.

Governor Haley's call regarding the Confederate flag, and the seconding of those supporting it, is similarly timed and unapologetically hypocritical.

It's true that patience is a virtue. But there's a gargantuan difference between patience about removing a perceived symbol of racism (according to many) and waiting to remove that symbol until a time that guarantees you and others your laudatory day in the sun. Nikki Haley knows all about this.

Read More: Finland's Welfare State Model Holds The Interests Of Terrorists Above Its Own People

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why Studying World Religions For Masculine Advice Is No Blasphemy

June 24, 2015 | by Wladislaw Bertram | Link | Original Link

In an age of neo-Liberal decadence and rootlessness, men will search for wisdom in traditional sources of masculine conservativism to gain a better understanding of our times. Traditionalism, or reactionary thinking , is only so because the world is actually moving towards one wrong direction. When brought up, it generally meets a great number of critics on every forum, who tend to attack it from different sides.

This article does not seek to refute the lies and fake charges of neo-liberals, feminists and white knights: many articles of counterattack have been written for that cause, and I'm sure that many more shall be published on Return of Kings.

An Intelligent Critique

In an age of crumbling values and desecrated traditions, faith remains one of the last strongholds of conservativism.

This piece is aimed at a more intellectual and insightful critique, which therefore deserves more attention and should not be disregarded. Among all the screeching rape-cries of feminists and sobbing wails of self-sacrifice omitted by white knights, one rational voice of true conservativism rings clear.

Oftentimes it will be stated that no scholar of intellectual merit should mix up the divine ideals of various world religions, or else one might end up with a bizarre concoction of castrated convictions, chosen by inexpertly hands (read: neo-liberal mixture of spiritual New Age rubbish).

Religions have a carefully constructed and delicately fashioned set of beliefs which have developed over hundreds or – more likely – thousands of years. The very tradition of age-long scholarly debates, theological dismantlement, and intellectual evolution which, together, make religious ideals a good subject to study in the first place, cannot be ignored or put aside. This is especially true today, when all principles and ethics are gleefully shit upon by shallow free-thinkers and fakers of intelligence worldwide.

How dare we compare the credos of Judaism, Christianity, or Islam, without coming up with superficial conclusions that have little to no more worth than neo-liberal free-thinking? How dare we dabble in affairs of the divine without having gone through the difficult and exhausting processes of theological training that rabbis, priests, preachers and imams all pass?

How do we differ then from the self-titled experts on gender, ideologies and morals who seem to grow in numbers as fast as some sort of musty blight under a damp rock?

An Answer Based On Historical Tradition

Examining religious texts for masculine growth is no sacrilege.

The answer is, as it could be expected, multifaceted.

First of all, the belief that religions, out of some heavenly inspiration, had come to this word in one intact form and have remained the same for the past thousands of years – as noble and naïve as it is – is utterly mistaken. Take the Judeo-Christian culture which – to a certain extent – still serves as the foundation of Western civilization.

The very belief that the Eucharist actually does become the body and blood of Christ is an outcome of hundreds of years of theological debate. The passages of Scripture that seemingly leave no doubt about Jesus' intentions regarding the Holy Communion have actually been altered in later translations to look that way. The earliest Greek versions could be interpreted in another way.

Then think of Arianism, a nontrinitarian movement which denied Jesus' being of one substance with the Lord: the very concept of the Holy Trinity had sprung from the debate with, and fight against this sect.

Or let us take a look at Judaism: rabbinical Judaism was a 2nd century invention, aimed at maintaining Jewish religious ideals after Hadrian crushed the Bar Kochba revolt and the Roman military camp of Aelia Capitolina had been erected upon the ruins of the once magnificent city of Jerusalem.

Contemporary religious thinkers, whom we now consider to be thinkers of great scholarly capacity, had also been charged with mingling diverse religious standards. Saint Augustine and Saint Bernard of Clairvaux, two great Christian thinkers who had much influence over the development of Catholic tradition were originally considered dangerous reformers who could bring ruin upon the Church by mixing secular thoughts with their faith.

Baruch Spinoza and Moses Mendelssohn were frowned upon by the Jewish community for introducing a seemingly secular approach towards Jewish faith.

The Right Reasons

Historical preachers and writers have also been accused of undermining tradition.

An intermingling of worldly and divine, or one religion and another for the right reasons does not necessarily lead to the deterioration of tradition and heavenly concepts. Seeking pick up advice from Paul the Apostle, martial arts tips from ha'Ba'al Shem Tov, or guidance on political organization from the Sufi Mystic Yunus Emre is no sacrilege.

In fact, the faithful have been doing it for hundreds and thousands of years: religions had the dual purpose of granting a glimpse into the glorious galleries of God and providing practical advice on the daily grind. Analyzing various religious traditions for the sake of a masculine growth of character constitutes no profanity.

Read More: 8 Films With Masculine Virtue

Wladislaw Bertram
Wladislaw Bertram is a disciple of the divine and a master of masculine might.

Why Is Modern Christianity So Wimpy?

June 25, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Modern Christianity has proven itself ineffective against combatting virtually every point of the leftist agenda. Whether the issue is defending the family against divorce, opposing same-sex marriage, fighting feminism, or protecting religious liberty, the Christian churches are always on the losing side. Why is modern Christianity so weak?

But Isn't All Religion Irrelevant?

Before I begin, let me anticipate one objection. If you are an atheist or an agnostic, you may be asking, "why should I care about Christianity? Isn't all religion irrelevant?"

It's a fair question. The answer is that religion is always part of the human experience. If a society loses its faith in its predominant religion, something else replaces it. In ancient Rome, a loss of faith in the Roman gods led to the spread of various cults.

In modern civilization, a loss of faith in Christianity has not resulted in a society where people have adopted pure logic as the sole rule of their lives. Instead, after they lose their faith most people adopt leftist causes with a religious fervor that makes a snake-handling Christian Pentecostal seem like a paragon of reason.

If you don't believe me, try gently suggesting to the average SJW that global warming does not have an anthropogenic cause or that Caitlyn Jenner is really a man, and see what their reaction is.

Regardless of whether we like it or not, Christianity is the religion of the West. If it were healthy, our culture would never have reached this degenerate state of affairs. To make any headway against the current decline, we'll need to understand how Christianity arrived at this point.

The Age Of Aquarius

The 1960s represent a watershed for Christianity. At the time, communism was spreading throughout the world, and it appeared to be impregnable. There were many voices predicting that it would be communism, not the capitalist West, that would own the future. Christian leaders were not unaffected by the idea that communism would be triumphant. Many of them came to see communism, with its focus on equality, economic fairness, and solidarity, as the fulfillment of Christianity.

It is difficult for us to grasp how anyone could have held such a wrongheaded view. We know that Soviet and Chinese-style communism was a brutal, godless, ineffective system that crushed both the body and soul of its people. But these misguided Christian leaders strongly believed that the success of communism was an indictment of traditional Christianity's emphasis on salvation and holiness.

To correct what they saw as a defect in Christianity, they reoriented the Christian message away from teaching personal morality and instead focused on teaching social justice—things like eradicating racism, oppression of women, economic redistribution, and the equality of all religions. In other words, they shifted the goal of Christianity from being a heavenly kingdom to striving for a utopia in this world. Does any of this sound familiar?

Of course, not all Christian groups were affected by this nonsense. The biggest effect was on the large, mainstream denominations. Some mainline Protestant churches were almost completely taken over. The Catholic Church suffered major incursions of this philosophy resulting in a rift between the old guard traditional Catholics and the new social justice wing that persists to this day.

Softness

The Rapture

It is easy to blame Christian leaders for the wimpiness of modern Christianity, but the fact is that rank and file believers also share the blame. Frequently, Christians do not demonstrate any changes in their lives that flow from their belief. They've become soft Christians: they are Christian up to the point where they are asked to sacrifice something because of their belief. At that point, they simply capitulate.

This softness manifests in lots of different ways. There is the example of the conservative Christian mommy blogger Jenny Erikson who appears to have divorced her husband for no good reason. But it also shows up in theology. For example, the embrace of doctrine of "the rapture" seems to be nothing more than a way for Christians to lull themselves into thinking that they can never be victims of persecution. I'm afraid these Christians might be in for a rude shock in the next decade or two.

Ignorance

Christian pastors, like Joel Osteen, find it more lucrative to leave out the more difficult parts of the Christian message.

Most Christians are woefully ignorant of the reasons for their beliefs. Most of the blame can be laid at the feet of the clergymen who fail to teach anything during their sermons, but lay people are guilty too. After all, how hard is it to pick up a book to understand what you believe and why you believe it?

This means that most believers are getting their theology from the New York Times and the Daily Show. They are getting caricatures of Christian doctrine instead of the real thing. Is it any wonder that they are suckers for the SJW point of view?

But the ignorance of Christian doctrine also presents a big opportunity. I was recently at a party where a woman was attacking some point of Catholic doctrine, but her understanding was completely wrong. Because I happen to know a bit of Catholic theology I felt obligated to correct her misunderstanding.

I did it rather sharply (shame on me) because I thought she was deliberately distorting things. She surprised me because she actually reversed herself when she learned what the Catholic Church really taught. We chatted for a long time and at the end of the conversation, she thanked me and said that this was the first time anyone had explained things to her.

Real Christianity

Godfrey of Bouillon

In our day, Christianity has a reputation for being wimpy and liberal. There are even men who think that it is intrinsically weak, and that it is Christianity that is the actual cause of the decline of Western civilization. They propose that Christianity be replaced by some other religion. The usual suggestion is a religion that involves Odin, Thor, and runes.

But modern Christianity is an aberration. In most epochs, Christians were cut from a stronger cloth. For example, St. Nicholas (we know him as Santa Claus) was so opposed to false teaching that he punched the heretical bishop Arius in the face during the council of Nicea.

Knights, such as the crusader Godfrey of Bouillon, and the great military orders of the Knights Templar and the Knights Hospitaller demonstrate that there is no opposition between being a Christian and being a warrior. And a whole host of martyrs from St. Stephen to Jim Eliot and the Copts beheaded by ISIS prove that weakness is not Christianity's default condition.

Conclusion

Ultimately, it is up to individual Christians to choose whether they will swim against the current or become increasingly irrelevant. Despite abundant evidence to the contrary, I am optimistic that a significant number of believers will choose the former option.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: College Showed Me The Cultish Nature Of Feminized Christianity

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Traditional Marriage Is How Past Societies Prevented Drama

June 25, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Recently, I was visited by my cousin, his wife and their two-year-old son. Let's call them Bob, Jane, and Damien. To the outside world, their family looks idyllic and like something out of a generic child's drawing. Bob seems to be an especially involved father and constantly posts selfies with Damien that generate massive outbursts of feels, emoticons, and stickers from bored housewives. However, to the discerning eye, not all is well in Bob's and Jane's household.

Cracks in the armor

Bob is the least fit security guard I've seen in my life, lugging around a bulging gut, and unsurprisingly, he is struggling to find any employment in that industry. Not just that, but he seems completely resigned to his fate of never advancing his career in any way.

On the other hand, Jane works in a local furniture manufacturing plant and easily earns three times the amount Bob does, when he finally does bring home a paycheck. This setup causes Jane to exhibit massive amounts of thinly veiled bitterness and resentment towards Bob, regardless of the company they are in. I was privy to one such occasion, but I wish I hadn't been.

The first thing Jane said when she entered my home with Bob and Damien was: "I want a divorce." To my surprise, Bob didn't even bat an eye to this, which means he is hearing it on a daily basis. Indeed, during their two-hour stay at my place, Jane kept saying the same threat over and over again, though worded differently.

And frankly, why should she tolerate Bob? She has a healthy son, can earn enough money for both of them, and has the government fully on her side if any altercations happen. Her behavior clearly showed that she considers Bob just a feeble leech that's done its part of donating sperm. This is, in a nutshell, everything that's wrong with the modern state of marriage.

Turn back the clock

Originally, marriage was a convergence point of male and female natural urges. Women wanted to satisfy their maternal instincts, today also known as "biological clock," while men wanted regular sexual access to a (relatively) undefiled woman. Both parties got what they wanted with minimal fuss and drama through marriage.

This was exactly the most valuable benefit marriage contributed to the society – removing drama. Today, with the entire institution of marriage turned into a horrible parody of itself that no sane men is willing to submit himself to, you should logically expect an upsurge in the amount of drama relating to the natural biological urges of men and women. And this is exactly what we're witnessing.

According to the mainstream media, rape is everywhere, in fact, all women are being raped all day long. To get instant recognition, a modern empowered woman simply has to whisper the magical words: "I was raped" and all doors swing open right away. The more renowned and richer man she was raped by, the better.

Conversely, paternity fraud is rampant to the point of France outlawing paternity tests "to preserve the peace in society," while in Germany a paternity test requires consent of the mother.

Note how I mentioned traditional marriage, where the man is clearly in charge. Today, even if you do end up married, you will suffer Bob's fate if your wife happens to be in any way superior to you. Seeing how the modern liberal society promotes women, with the EU going so far as to mandate gender quotas in boardrooms (PDF), it's no wonder their entitlement is running at historically unprecedented levels.

This all began once women were let out of the kitchen. Sadly, at this point there is no turning back and, no matter whether you decide to marry or stay single, you're bound to come under the assault of this widespread hysteria sooner or later. Your every word and action will be examined with a microscope and you will be found guilty one way or another.

The drama is consuming us all and there is no escape from it. The best thing you can do is develop a thick skin to endure the spotlight and react to all outrageous accusations with an air of slight amusement.

Read More: Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Why Crunches Make You Fat

June 25, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Six Pack Shortcuts

Hey man,

It's Mike Chang from Six Pack Shortcuts. And in this short article I want to show you something that most attractive women would find disgusting… In fact, you might be stuck with it right now. And not only is it holding you back from having the ripped abs that you want and that women love… it could also be doing some major damage to your body.

So this is a replica of what 5 pounds of fat looks like… Crazy right? But did you know that the average guy is about 17 pounds over his ideal body weight? THIS is what you're carrying around on your belly all day!

Most guys just accept that they have belly fat because they don't know what it looks like inside their bodies. However, once you can see what it looks like, you'll immediately realize how excess belly fat is slowly destroying you from the inside out!

Here is one way to think about it… Carrying around an extra 17 pounds of belly fat is equivalent to holding onto 60 sticks of butter! I mean, you're carrying this on your stomach… and I know that you're smart enough to know that this just can't be healthy.

Now, most guys out there are trying to burn off their belly fat with crunches and situps… and perhaps you are trying to do the same thing.

But did you know how many crunches you would need to do just to burn off one pound of that fat?

100? 200? A thousand… Nope!

Men's Health magazine reported that it actually takes 22,000 crunches to burn off one single pound of belly fat!

Twenty two THOUSAND! Whoa!… What a waste of time and energy!

That means that if you did 30 crunches a day, it would take you exactly 2 years just to burn off 1 pound of fat. And since the average guy has about 17 lbs. of fat to lose… at 30 crunches a day, it would take about 34 years!

Screw that… you'll be an old dude by then!

The Bottom Line is, you can do as many crunches as you want, but it'll never help you get the body you want. The truth is, the only way to get Ripped Six Pack Abs is to get rid of the layer of belly fat that's covering them up.

So what do we need to do to get rid of belly fat as soon as possible? Well it basically comes down to three things. The first two you probably already know about… it's working out and eating right.

However, what you probably didn't know is that you also need to… Control your hormones. In fact, doing this is even more important than the first two combined.

Here's why…

You see, the reason why we workout and eat right is to get our body to do one simple thing… which is produce the fat burning hormones we need.

With that said, if you were able to take a shortcut and control your hormones… the fat burning results you want would happen way faster!

Now there are a few different hormones for different functions, but when it comes to fat loss there is one specific hormone that you will need to focus on — Leptin.

Leptin is considered by many medical researchers as the king of all fat burning hormones. It literally controls and commands all your other fat burning hormones to do their jobs and optimizes fat burning.

However if your body doesn't have enough Leptin, not only will burning even one ounce of fat seem impossible… it could actually cause your body to store additional belly fat – making you look even fatter.

And you definitely don't want that. However this is actually what's happening to most guys who have belly fat right now, and maybe you can relate to gaining fat in this way.

Now, the reason why guys just like you have belly fat caused by low leptin levels is because they unintentionally damaged their body's hormone production…

You see, low calorie diets and doing the wrong types of workouts… such as long sessions of cardio and crunches, can shut down the production of your body's leptin.

So what do you need to do to fix this? Well here are three instant tips you can do today to start increasing your leptin levels.

1. Avoid dieting.

Low calorie diets or starving yourself can cause long term damage to your body's leptin production. This means your leptin levels will be forced to stay low even when you go back to eating normally. The most shocking part about this is that leptin damage may start happening after just one day of dieting.

2. Eat foods that increase your leptin production.

Now, by regularly eating high amounts of the specific foods I've listed below, you'll quickly be able to get your leptin levels back up and finally get the ripped body you want.

- Fatty fish
- Spinach
- Beef liver

Now my final tip is actually what me and my team personally do to boost our leptin levels. First off, following tip 1 is fine… I hate dieting anyways. However tip 2 is a bit more difficult for me. The truth is I'm not the biggest fan of fatty fish, spinach, or the suggested – raw beef liver. Now eating pounds of fish and raw liver is definitely out of the question for me. But if you like them… go for it.

However, for those who are like me and would rather eat something else… I suggest using ingredients that contain the same type of leptin boosting nutrients that you'd find in those 3 leptin boosting food.

Now, to get those specific ingredients can be difficult and expensive. And most importantly it could be dangerous getting these ingredients from unregulated clinics in foreign countries.

So before you look up the leptin boosting ingredients for beef liver or fish head soup… I've actually had a regulated supplement factory in the United States put together a small batch of these ingredients for me and my team to take.

This way I can keep my leptin levels high, stay ripped year round, and not worry about eating foods I don't like.

Now don't worry I'm willing to share…

So if you're looking to get ripped six pack abs, simply try these Leptin Boosting Ingredients I've put together.

Now I'm not sure how much is left because I've only made a very limited supply for me, my team, and a select few clients.

So go get the body you want by increasing your leptin levels right now.

Train Hard,

Mike Chang

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

4 Reasons Why Leftists Are Clinically Insane

June 26, 2015 | by Will Outenphraghen | Link | Original Link

Leftists are insane. You know that already. But what exact mechanisms are at play here? If you know what makes them tick, you are one step closer to prescribing them a dose of sanity… or at the very least not falling for these tricks yourself.

All quotes are taken from David Mamet's book, The Secret Knowledge: On the Dismantling of American Culture, unless otherwise noted.

1. Nazi salute syndrome

> As we have seen, all under the sway of the Nazi regime had to greet each other with the Nazi Salute. Many found this, as it was an avowal of subjugation, intolerable. The id said, "I will not give this retched salute." The Ego replied, "What does it mean? You don't actually have to believe in the Nazis; it's just a simple gesture, and performing it will save your life."

> But this interchange, unfortunately, caused the individual to enter into a painful negotiation scores of times a day. To wit: “I do it, but I don’t believe it.”
>
> How can one eliminate the pain of the continual repetition of a distressing and seemingly insoluble negotiation?
>
> Here comes the Superego with a brilliant solution: let the gesture be consigned to the realm of the unconscious – it turns the continual nature of the repetition from a reiterated pain to a selling point. “Look here,” says the Superego, “there is just not enough time in the day to worry about it – we will let the dialogue lapse from consciousness, and replace it with unthinking habit.
>
> What was the effect… of the now unconscious habitual repetition of a gesture of subjugation? The individual became a Nazi. How could he not? Was he not now pledging, unthinkingly, his loyalty scores of times a day?

Leftists do the same thing through the repetition of herd-like speech and behavior. Patriarchy, cisgender, toxic masculinity, womanpower, you go girl. Their salutes are continuous and require the superego to bury the notion that these words are nonsense deep down into the depths of the psyche. Thus they become unthinking soldiers of a culturally destructive regime.

2. The confidence man

> (T)he individual is appealed to as one of noted repute and standing in the community, as someone who can be trusted with the confidence man’s improbable claim.
>
> The mark is flattered. He understands why he has been chosen. He has been chosen because of his excellence. How could one (the confidence man) who was that perceptive then be other than honorable? The question does not arise.
>
> …The Liberal is flattered that he, in contradistinction to his benighted countrymates, has been chosen to advance the policies and doctrines of > liberalism. He, in endorsing them, is part of the Elite, one of those empowered to eradicate those historical evils entailed upon humanity because of the unfortunate delay of his advent. ("We are the people we have been waiting for," Obama campaign, 2008.)

>
> …His problem resides in this: that the doctrines, policies, and programs presented for his endorsement are senseless and destructive, and can be so-proved by any slight referral of them to the impartial verdicts of history.
>
> What will the Superego do? It will ensure that the referral will never occur. How will it do this? By ensuring that the referral would occur only at the cost of relinquishing membership of the herd.
>
> The Superego cannot increase the benefit of compliance… but will increase the cost of noncompliance. Questioning = excommunication.

The leftist, knowing he is wrong, creates a feedback loop that forces himself and others to remain in the herd at proverbial gunpoint. It explains why they scream racist, sexist, misogynist, needle-dick, neckbeard, etc. They know their ideas are nonsense. So it must be your fault for pointing it out.

You are destroying their carefully cultivated Stockholm Syndrome by making them uncomfortable. They can't handle it. The programming is too strong. They'll be kicked out of the herd if anything sinks too deep. You are literally threatening their existence, so you must be evil.

3. Creating a new culture

These idiots are so far gone that they need to create a new culture to house their madness. It's the only way to protect the herd from outside ideological threats.

> The Left has abandoned the country, come out against capitalism, exploitation of resources, the free market, and work, and announces its refusal to defend our borders. All this as a matter of principle.
>
> …President Obama announces every day… that the West is finished: with capitalism, with Democracy, with self-defense, and anyone who wants it can have it.

> …Deviations from the Law, which is to say the Constitution, to accommodate specifically alleged identity-group injustices will all inevitably be expanded, universalized, and exploited until there remains no law, but only constant petition of Government.
>
> …It is not the absence of government, but the rejection of culture which leads to anarchy.

So the left's new culture will be a government-controlled culture without any culture, just endless petitions by victim groups, no means of production, with everyone as poor as the other. The party line will be enforced by repeating nonsense, pushing all conscious doubts deep into the subconscious mind, not out an expectation of reward, but out of fear of rejection from the herd. And we will be at peace with it because there is no thinking going on, just adherence to The Party.

4. But wait, it gets weirder

In her new introduction to The Manipulated Man, Esther Vilar says:

> The more sovereignty [men] are losing in their professional lives… the more that increasing unemployment forces them to adopt obsequious behavior towards customers and superiors – then the more they have to be afraid of a recognition of their predicament. And the more essential it becomes to maintain their illusion that it is not they who are the slaves, but those on whose behalf they subject themselves to such an existence.
>
> As absurd as it may sound: today's men need feminists more than their wives do. Feminists are the last ones who still describe men the way they like to see themselves: as egocentric, power-obsessed, ruthless, and without inhibitions when it comes to satisfying their animalistic instincts. Therefore… Women's Libbers find themselves in the strange predicament of doing more to maintain the status quo than anyone else. Without their arrogant accusations the macho man would no longer exist, except perhaps in the movies. If the press didn't stylize men as rapacious wolves, the actual sacrificial lambs of this 'men's society', men themselves, would no longer flock to the factories so obediently.

Leftists, men especially, can’t question their predicament because to do so would be to recognize themselves as slaves, and risk being ejected from the herd. So they push their doubts into their subconscious minds, even as they salute the cause with gibberish, to avoid the pain of constant subjugation.

They see themselves as the salvation of mankind, ignoring the nonsense of an agenda that seeks to create a new culture of uniformity in the name of diversity. And feminists are stuck in the odd position of maintaining a veil of masculinity because there is no masculinity left.

I rest my case. Leftists are clinically insane.

Read More: Sweden’s Fall To Leftism Is A Cautionary Tale For The Western World

Will Outenphraghen
Weevinbachen is a teacher in Thailand. He wants nothing more than a healthy, loving relationship between the sexes to be restored.

Ariana Grande Sexualizes Her Entire Image For Years Then Demands People “Focus On The Music”

June 26, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Singer Ariana Grande recently released an “essay” claiming that she is being objectified and oppressed by the all-encompassing patriarchy. She said was irate about the supposedly constant references to her as Big Sean’s ex, amidst her general opining about “misogyny,” “sexism,” and “double standards,” and a reference to feminist Gloria Steinem.

“Focus on my music!” is what her piece screamed, all while she continues to cloak herself in female caricatures and stereotypes labeled as sexist when men enjoy them: cat’s ears, corsets, prancing around in her underpants, and generally selling her body to sell albums. Nothing in the piece mentioned the excessive photoshopping of her on magazine and album covers, either, or an obsession with cosmetics that body image experts blame for rampantly low female self-esteem amongst the general population.

It has never been about Grande’s music because a) men typically write her songs entirely or contribute most of the lyrics and composition and b) many people can sing as well as or better than Grande. What Grande sells instead to the public is her body, perceived looks (but I’ll pass, thanks) and youth.

If you want the best singer, or at least one better than Grande, you would end up, probably, with an overweight opera singer or another girl, a rather “homely” one, who switched to pop.

If a man ogles this sort of image on a magazine cover, it's considered sexist. When a woman creates this image of herself on the way to earning tens of millions of dollars, it's considered "independent."

Grande's diatribe has nothing to do with double standards or "misogyny" and everything to do with celebrity culture. Celebrities are paid truly exorbitant amounts to plaster themselves across our collective social consciousness, without usually contributing anything that isn't superficial or which doesn't endorse narcissism.

One of the drawbacks of this massive remuneration and adoration for a person with a net worth well beyond $10 or $100 million is a menagerie of press representatives wanting a piece of their private life all the time.

I have no problem with Grande, like Kate Upton, using sexualization as a tool in her career. But the rest of us need to call a spade a spade. It becomes tedious when Grande robotically describes herself as a sexualized object and alleged "property" of a man when her entire public persona is predicated on her overt and inveterate sexualization. Her success as a performer is attributable to this fact alone.

Grande is not so special a celebrity

Take George Clooney, a much more high-brow celebrity despite his politics, as a case in point. Between 2005 and 2012, he starred in, co-wrote, directed or produced films which garnered him eight different Academy Award nominations across six different categories. Two of these nominations resulted in wins, one for Best Supporting Actor in Syriana and another for Argo being Best Picture.

He additionally received critical acclaim for other performances outside his recognition by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. One is hard pressed to name another film icon with a similar critically prolific and versatile track record over the past decade, with the exception of Clint Eastwood.

Most of the time, though, attention has been lavished much more on George Clooney's love life and other female entanglements. Grande might argue that she's the victim of double standards because of her genitals, but it doesn't explain how men like Clooney are routinely invoked only to describe romantic partners and their "work" outside work.

Intrusion into one's private life is part and parcel of the celebrity tradeoff for both men and women. Look at the litany of male stars who have legally detrimental encounters with paparazzi. They're not accosted when they're on-set and security could efficiently dispose of the photographers. It happens on their downtime, when they're hand-in-hand with their latest sweetheart or frolicking shirtless at the beach.

Claiming feminism earns you big bucks

Classy Beyoncé in her empowered woman pose

The appropriation of feminism or other ideologies by already multimillionaire female (or male) celebrities continues to generate financial windfalls for them. Lady Gaga, for example, has established herself as the preeminent campaigner for gay marriage and other LGBT causes.

I do not doubt that she legitimately believes in what she says, but you still can't ignore the phenomenal remunerative benefits it has brought her. Being a "gay icon," a largely straight one who says she's bisexual and is engaged to a man, equals a gay and leftist following that fills her bank accounts even more.

It's also rooted in an intrinsic mythology, as it allows these people to present the veneer of suffering the same slights and misfortunes of the common person. This is because celebrity status relies on a complex fusion of being both "above" the masses but "like" them. The ultimate victory of the celebrity is being idolized like a modern-day religious figure but being lauded as "down-to-earth".

Although more implicit than other songs, Beyoncé's Single Ladies (Put a Ring on It) (ironically written with three men) is meant to channel the "girl power" of independent women. This presupposes that the situation of, say, lower middle-class women could be in any sense like Beyoncé's. It's akin to me comparing my next pangs of hunger to a child in the economically and politically failed state of Somalia.

Finally, and related to the second point, it enables those who are fundamentally privileged to fend off accusations that they are part of any elite that should give back more. Because of “patriarchal superstructures,” women with a phenomenal net worth like Beyoncé can lump themselves in amongst the traditional stereotypes of oppressed women. The male gas station attendant has male privilege; Beyoncé is “objectified” and asserting her girl power to fight it.

Basically, if a female celebrity doesn’t like a form of attention or criticism, she can call it sexism. Male celebrities lack such a jack-of-all-trades, please-get-away-from-me card.

It isn’t even Ariana Grande’s music most of the time

[image]
Male musicians and songwriters like Malcolm McCormick, known as the rapper Mac Miller, have written most of Grande’s songs.

It’s suitably quaint that Ariana Grande portrays herself as a victim of sexists not focusing on her music when much of that music she doesn’t write herself. A half dozen others, including men, wrote “her” number one hit from Yours Truly, called The Way. Only five of the 13 songs were co-written by her for this debut album.

Break Free, another number one from the follow-up album My Everything, was written by three men and Problem was written by Grande (finally!), Iggy Azalea and three men.

Fact Alert: Pop and many other genres are about the external appearance and persona of the singer or group, not the music. Female pop itself is invariably the marriage of soft pornography via a trim body and a voice that’s hopefully at least semi-decent.

Independent women who objectify themselves and rely on men

Get the men to write your songs for you and then they’re yours. Dress up in a way seen as misogynistic when men want women to look like that. This is all in a day’s work for Ariana Grande. Her hypocrisy knows no bounds. The command to “Look at me! Look at me!” combines very elegantly with the shrill politicking and opportunism of Grande claiming she is a victim.

The solution to this excremental situation is simple, unrelenting juxtaposition. Compare what feminists and others describe as the objectification of women by men and “society” with the identical self-presentation of unfathomably wealthy celebrities like Grande and the desperate regular girls emulating them.

Challenge the primitive assumption that “male privilege” allows any woman, no matter how elite, wealthy or advantaged in other ways, to claim the mantle of universal victimhood.

In the end, the Ariana Grandes of the world always expose themselves for the discerning and intelligently skeptical to see.

Read More: Woman From MTV Demands Free Stuff From Us

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Opposite Of Masculinity Is Stagnancy

June 26, 2015 | by JD McGuigan | Link | Original Link

A common dogma of the red pill is the idea that indifference, not hate, is the opposite of love. In a similar way, it is important to understand that the opposite of masculinity is not femininity, but stagnancy.

Masculinity and femininity are different sides of the same coin, complementing each other and existing harmoniously in nature to keep our species and countless others alive. Comparing them is apples and oranges, and thus doesn't advance the discussion on masculinity in any substantive way. There are hordes of men who do not possess feminine features or qualities, but who are the antithesis of masculinity.

A man who dislikes his current relationship, job, or city should take heed and consider this, and double down on his reflections if his discontent is so severe that it's interfering with his everyday life.

Recall the story of Sisyphus, the ancient Greek King who was punished for chronic deceitfulness by being forced to roll a large boulder up a hill, only to have it roll back down. He was cursed to repeat this action forever. In essence, he was banished to an existence of brutal purgatory. This fairytale has very troubling implications in the context of 21st century contemporary masculinity.

A story of stagnation

Three or four times a year I visit some family in a small town in the Midwest, not far from where I went to college. While I largely enjoy the visits, (as family should be paramount in every man's life) something makes me progressively more uncomfortable each time I take the trip.

Throughout my casual daytime and evening walks, I recognize people not seen in months or years, but whom I remember distinctly. They are usually people I didn't care to see ever again, for their overt stagnancy both troubled and repulsed me. By definition, stagnancy means showing little or no sign of activity or advancement.

I see the same individuals working at the same gas station jobs they'd worked at eight years prior, long before I had learned game, quit multiple jobs, and traveled the world with a backpack. It was distressing that while my landscapes had changed a hundred times over, they had not expanded their horizons at all, and were still mired in such meaningless work deep within the confines of their comfort zone.

Not only were the full time, tenured employees still there, but I often saw familiar customers I'd run into during my own stops as a local years prior. They hobbled into the establishment in their fleece pajamas, still paying for their soda and chips with their food stamp handouts—the exact same thing they were doing seemingly centuries ago. Experiencing a real life déjà vu like this was a surreal experience, but for all the wrong reasons.

Even worse was visiting the department store where I worked my first job as teenager in 2005, to buy a pair of sneakers. Within ten minutes I saw multiple "lifers" who I knew were already on anti-depressants a decade ago, presumably for their emotional discontent with their lives even back then.Who can blame them, after all? A long term career in retail is a fate worse than death.

I tried my best to avoid talking to these people, and I was relieved they didn't notice me. Another universal red pill truth maintains that you are the average of the five people you spend the most amount of time with. It should come as no surprise that seeing this stagnancy on such a consistent scale among the local population prompted a sense of severe small town blues in a matter of a few days, having been surrounded by people who literally hadn't moved an inch since I went through puberty.

The effect it has if you allow it to consume you

Hypothetically, someone might ask why I care at all. In the same way we don't care about feminists on a personal level, there was an interesting social observation at hand. The expressions on those faces had also not changed. It was a look of dread, struggle, and resignation to their mediocre fate, most of all.

In Stephen King's classic "Under the Dome," residents of a small town in Maine are shut off completely from the rest of the world by a transparent barrier trapping them where they stand. Unfortunately, we now live in a culture where people do this to themselves willingly. One family member makes her home in a small town of 35,000 people, many of whom by the midpoint of their sheltered lives have never been on an airplane, or branched out and attempted to learn one of the other 6,500 active languages in the world today. This total absence of self improvement is the opposite of masculinity.

To be clear, the 45-year-old gas station clerk might very well be a good or hard working person, but does his restocking of soda coolers and cleaning of slushy machines with a toothbrush 260 days a year not make him a modern day Sisyphus?

We all know it can be lonely on the dark side. A little sense of camaraderie while we resist societal traps is the reason we all flock to these sites and forums, but I'm afraid we're largely in this for ourselves. Most people you're forced to interact with quit on their mission years ago.

As we continue to fight feminism and its dangerous sister afflictions, we ourselves cannot remain stagnant in the world of video games, pornography, or pointless weekends at overrated clubs. Defining our own personalized "great struggle" as a man is hard enough, but one undisputed fact is that stagnancy is one of the things thing that can stop us in our tracks.

Read More: The Opposite Of Manliness

JD McGuigan
JD is a 27 year old travel bum who jumps from job to job recklessly usually just before getting fired. He is also the author of a short e-book called The Pink Doughnut Phenomenon, which is a thesis on masculinity in the 9-5 workforce.

How The Analogy Of Potiphar’s Wife Applies To Modern Society

June 27, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Today, men live in societies where abundance (or lack) of sex depends a lot on the factors of game, available talent pool, etc. and so on. But one reality associated with sex is that it could hold unexpected negative consequences – particularly more without prior knowledge of game, and the true nature of women – as history has numerous examples of men who’ve been unfairly victimized because of that.

When it comes highlighting this scenario (more importantly, false rape accusations) and further illustrate how women have changed little throughout history, one striking parallel is that of the biblical story of Potiphar’s wife and her destructive obsession with Joseph.

The story of Potiphar’s wife

Joseph is an important biblical Hebrew prophet and patriarch—connected to the stories of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and that of the subsequent liberation of the Israelites from Egyptian slavery. His early life tells about a plot by his jealous brothers – who sold him to merchants from a camel caravan traveling to Egypt.

Ultimately, he was sold to Potiphar, the captain of Pharaoh's guard; where he later became Potiphar's personal servant, and subsequently his household's superintendent. Joseph's intelligence, work ethics and handsome looks eventually attracted the attention of Potiphar's rich and bored wife (who was used to getting her own way), but later she was furious at him for resisting her attempts to seduce him, and then falsely accused him of attempted rape.

> She called out to her servants. Soon all the men came running. "Look!" she said. "My husband has brought this Hebrew slave here to make fools of us! He came into my room to rape me, but I screamed. When he heard me scream, he ran outside and got away, but he left his cloak behind with me." – Genesis 39:14-15, NLT

Upon hearing this, Potiphar then cast Joseph into prison – from where he later came (luckily) to the Pharaoh's notice for his ability to interpret the dreams of other prisoners, which saved Egypt during a subsequent famine.

But this story touches upon important parallels and some red pill truths:

- Female (sexual) misery loves company: unrequited female lust and female inability to handle sexual rejection can lead to destructive caprice to destroy a man's reputation
- The use of pseudo-feminine weakness, pseudo-victim complex and existing social clout by women to lend credibility to a false rape accusation
- The potential risks of working under women (or working for men puppeteered by their women) – unless you have prior game knowledge

- The potential risks of refusing sex, especially to a socially powerful, predatory woman
- The mind of a rich and bored housewife can be a devil's workshop

And whether Potiphar's wife may have had psychological or personality problems, they do not excuse or exonerate her from ruining an innocent man's reputation, and possibly being the instrument of his death, if that could have been the sentence.

But in today's feminist societies, her behavior is increasingly paralleled by modern women when it comes to male sexual harassment, and unrequited female ~~lust~~ "love" turning to "revenge" through false rape accusations.

When unrequited female sexual overtures could trigger a false rape accusation

In gyno-centric societies, women can increasingly be predatory and men can be easily victimized. In 2009 there were almost 12,700 sexual harassment complaints filed with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Sixteen percent came from men. Even though the total amount of sexual harassment is consistently on the decline, the number of complaints from men have increased over the years.

And though male sexual harassment is no joke, this alarming trend is now seen globally. Even law-enforcement or celebrity circles are not immune to this: power can (sexually) corrupt; and women are no exception.

Rejection usually has the same "hardening" effect on both men and women. And in societies which inflate women's egos and sense of entitlement when it comes to both dishing out or denying sex, the message is clear as seen in the example of Potiphar's wife: potential woe to the man who rejects a woman's sexual advances or jilts her – for that could very well serve as a trigger for a false rape accusation (a nsfw cinematic example even perfectly illustrates that).
But even if women are indeed the gatekeepers of sex, does it mean that a man should willingly accept whatever sex he might be pro-offered (even if it may be from females he isn't attracted to)—overriding his personal tastes, standards and dignity? At least that's what feminist societies would want: ~~suffocate~~ "regulate" men's sexual options, by giving total control to women.

Fat acceptance and slut exoneration are just other examples of this dysfunctional modern social engineering construct to sexually enslave men to undesirable women.

So whether she might be an aging slut, or just beginning to begin her ride on the cock carousel, the men she desires or tries to seduce must yield to her: men shouldn't judge her, have no say in their personal sexual choices, and willingly function as dildos on demand as per her wishes.

Meanwhile in this modern societal minefield – ironically or comically – rape sex tapes are now made by "victims" which are itself viewed as "disturbing art" (thus mocking rape itself). It could then be also said that making a false rape accusation itself has increasingly become a modern "art", perfected by socially empowered women today.

Thus, game becomes indispensable for men's personal safety to identify the types and traits of (predatory) women, and the sexual situations which could potentially lead to false rape accusations. Game denialism, puritanical virtue, and blue pill beta ~~ignorance~~ "innocence" are no excuses to disregard the red pill and game, for these excuses won't save men from misery in such potentially tricky situations.

Conclusion

…more so in today's times.

As in Joseph's story, countless men have lost their reputations (or sometimes had their lives destroyed) over false rape accusations throughout history. And in today's modern societies, this threat is greater than ever before.

Thus, failure to acquire game knowledge would only increase the chances of modern men becoming sitting ducks for the wiles of modern predatory females—not only in relationships, but also in sexual situations which require strategic foresight and tactical finesse.

Game protects men in these increasingly common circumstances. Thus, there is no valid excuse not to acquire it.

Read Next: How To Avoid A False Rape Accusation

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Modern Entertainment Has Transformed How Women Choose Men

June 27, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

We've all seen girls responding ecstatically to the aloof, mysterious man with his hand-reading routines, negging, and general masculine allure. We've also seen them having no qualms in hopping from man to man, and flaking mercilessly on nice guys simply out of boredom and an insatiable lust for excitement.

From where did this frenzied attitude come from exactly? As stated in the ROK community beliefs: the elimination of traditional sex roles and unlimited mating choice unleashes promiscuity and other negative behaviors. This certainly gives girls the liberty to recklessly ride the carousel, but the sheer extent of their fickleness, impulsiveness and selective hypergamy makes one wonder how this mindset flourished so extensively.

We have indeed seen this erratic behavior somewhere else: namely, in front of the rectangular screen. There are hoards of bored, unsatisfied girls out there, changing channels mindlessly, swiping left and right, and clicking link after link after link. If you've read this far, you're already doing better than a lot of them out there.

It is so striking to see the similarities between modern girls' attitudes to men and to 21st Century entertainment that it deserves to be looked at in greater detail. Let us look at some modern technological developments which have had a great effect on the modern girls' psyche over the last twenty to thirty or so years.

Digital, Cable, And Satellite TV

The days of having only one or two channels are long over, at least for the First World. We no longer have to compromise our tastes in order to put up with one particular channel; we can change them, sometimes hundreds of times over until we are satisfied.

This process of "zapping" has become so entertaining in itself, that it has become more fun to hop around different TV networks than to watch a full program. Long documentaries and films are now reserved for the old and the tired; TV companies have had to adapt, incorporating short, cheap gags into their programming in order to hold the short attention spans of the people.

The girls who grew up flicking back between Cartoon Network, Nickelodeon, and Boomerang use this exact same mindset when choosing men. Being offended at a girl flaking is like being angry at them for changing the channel on a TV; it's a shame but it's inevitable.

If it's boring, there's always Rugrats on the other channel.

Talent Contests

Over the last decade, we have seen the rise of the deeply vulgar, televised Talent Contest. Essentially, if the schmucks that enter these things do not satisfy the audience's unquenchable need for excitement, they are humiliated and booed off the stage.

The contestants therefore have to cater to the debased needs of the viewers, becoming repulsive freaks or choreographing elaborate, yet highly inane dance-routines. Girls incorporate the Talent Contest mentality into their choices of men: anything which does not provide them with an instant thrill is disposable, useless and meaningless.

Youtube

Further down the spiral, we encounter Youtube, currently celebrating its tenth anniversary. Youtube has a multitude of brilliant content: full-length documentaries, operas, and historical speeches. However, the most successful videos are those which continue the trend started by cable TV and Talent Contests: short, anodyne jokes without meaning.

The quantity of videos on the website has now made it fully possible to ditch anything which does not give you 100% instant gratification. The near-infinite choice on Youtube allows you to change videos many times a minute if they do not satisfy immediately. This was simply not possible until very recently.

Smartphones

Finally, we come to a piece of machinery, universally despised by the manosphere, and rightly so. Smartphones are the ultimatum of instant gratification. Any app, article, Tinder profile or arrangement of pixels can be cast away in an instant if it fails to provide the instant boost of serotonin in the brain.

Entertainment has been a catalyst in the modern flaking epidemic, starting with Cable TV and culminating in Tinder and the smartphone. We no longer have to work for our gratification; listening to an old man tell stories or playing a long board game is now considered tedious by most. It is therefore foolish to act like the wise man or the chessboard on a date or in the club, (as we have observed recently) for the smartphone app or the thirty-second Youtube clip will get more attention.

In Closing

In our post-Lady Chatterley society, sex is treated as entertainment and not a means to monogamous commitment. We can therefore draw parallels between the sexual market and modern entertainment, since they now function in the same way and have the same purpose, satisfying the same urges.

The common denominator of modern entertainment forms is the removal of persistence and compromise. Girls have adapted to being able to swipe away anything that doesn't give them spontaneous gratification. If you are shy, polite and quiet, you will get zapped.

It has also removed empathy from the choice: just as an out of tune singer is booed off the stage on America's Got Talent, you will be shown no more sympathy if you don't give them the tingles straight away. Girls have grown up not needing to compromise at all, so they will not do so with you.

God, he’s talking about Tauldstoy again!

They don’t have to invest any time into hearing about your views on Russian Literature or the Economic crisis. As girls have adapted to zapping around their forms of entertainment, why on earth would they take a different attitude towards dating and bonding?

Read More: The Role Of Modern Entertainment In Beta Indoctrination

Anton Hagen

Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

Why Are Men Becoming Less Interested In Marriage?

June 28, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Back in the early ’60’s, the TV show The Twilight Zone ran an episode entitled, “A Stop At Willoughby.” In the episode, we witness a career-man in distress. Bullied on one hand by a bellicose boss at work, he comes home to a cold, emotionless wife.

Caught in a world that degrades both the workplace and the home, he fantasizes about a world past: one in which people are valued as individuals, surrounded by supportive familial relations and a healthy respect for the work a man does.

As working class women begin to assert their rights, or at least least to listen to feminist ideas, their husbands see in this turn of events another blow to their own self-respect, the crowning indignity heaped on the workingman by a middle-class liberalism that has already destroyed his savings, bused his children to distant schools, undermined his authority over them, and now threatens to turn his wife against him.
The Culture Of Narcissism, Christopher Lasch

While the episode ends on a tragic note—with the main character plunging to his death off a moving train—the episode speaks volumes about modern society, even back in the ’60’s. Women had already begun to ratchet up their demands of men, while also refusing to acknowledge or address male emotional or sexual needs.

Furthermore, the workplace had already become a game of sorts, where the promoted and lauded are not done so much for their actual workplace contributions, but rather for their appearance of competence, personal magnetism, and their ability to project a socially-acceptable level of ambition.

Many things haven’t changed

This episode aired almost a half-century ago. Things must have gotten better, no? We have had multiple presidents who considered themselves feminists; we have had serious legislation passed to ameliorate the social ill of sexual inequality. Further, we have had sweeping changes to the workplace. Issues of work-life balance are important public debates, as are issues of discrimination, sexual harassment and mental health. It gets better, right?

No. The average American is more disaffected then ever, men included. The workplace continues to under-employ people while overworking them and providing them less satisfaction for their work. Most importantly, however, is the fact that relations between men and women is more precarious than ever. As expected, this has a supremely negative influence on the most important institution in society: marriage.

This shift in marital trends hasn’t gone unnoticed by mainstream outlets. The Washington Examiner last winter ran an article on a study done by some German social scientists. The authors of the study concluded that an association exists between use of pornography on the Internet and the erosion of marriage.

They didn’t assert that pornography is certainly a significant factor in declining marriage rates and the dissolution of marriage. They asserted the data they collated suggests that it is likely that access to pornography is a significant factor in the erosion of marital relations.

What is most striking is the ignorance of the true source of marital discord: women’s lack of desire for true commitment and loving marriages. The researchers make the all-too-common assumption that issues of commitment between men and women necessarily stem from men’s decisions.

[image]
Sylvia Plath

It wasn’t men that first regarded marriage as the ultimate trap: it was women, goaded on by second-wave feminism. It wasn’t men that treated women as class oppressors, it was women, goaded on by second-wave feminism. It wasn’t men who regarded women with boundless rage, it was women, goaded on by second-wave feminism.
The marital issues faced by America today were spurred on by women, utilizing feminism at the political level. American women came to see marriage, family life, and domesticity as the ultimate form of oppression. The mindset is best summed up by Sylvia Plath in The Bell Jar:

It would mean getting up at seven and cooking him eggs and bacon and toast and coffee and dawdling about in my nightgown and curlers after he'd left for work to wash up the dirty plates and make the bed, and then when he came home after a lively, fascinating day he'd expect a big dinner, and I'd spend the even washing up, even more dirty plates till I fell into bed, utterly exhausted.

Christopher Lasch offers a critical bit of commentary on this passage:

If the man protests that he is exhausted too, and that his "fascinating day" consists of drudgery and humiliation, his wife suspects that he wishes to merely give her domestic prison the appearance of a rose-covered cottage.

The changes in social considerations of divorce, child custody and the formation of marriage and it's maintenance revolve completely around this deeply-embedded feminine fear of commitment. This radical adjustment to considerations of marriage has greatly helped keep women interested in marriage.

Since women know that marriage revolves completely around them and their desires, marriage is a seen as a positive endeavor by them—most especially because they know they can indulge their fear of commitment and dissolve the "union" with a snap of their finger.

What this has resulted in for men, however, is men declining to lift a finger in the market of commitment. The aforementioned article mentions the access to sex as a primary driver of marriage, but that ignores that men have primarily valued a woman's love and devotion over access to sex. Further, it ignores the plainly obvious fact that men are sons of their parents and many of them watched as their mothers behaved like petty tyrants in the home.

By turning marriage from a union based on love and mutually exclusive obligations into an institution that revolves around what women want to demand from men, it has caused many men not to withdraw from the institution, but to refuse outright to participate in any substantive sense.

That Washington Examiner article presupposes that without pornography, men would start dating and thinking about marriage. If you are watching it, it is for you. Nobody views media just to pass the time, but because whatever they are reading or watching is propping up their identity or fulfilling a need or desire. Regular consumption of the pornographic arts is about a desire to think about sex, but not actually pursue it in real life.

Male indifference to or outright avoidance of marriage has one—but not only one, of course—clear cause and that is the lack of interest they feel from the women around them. From their mothers and the women in their social circles, men pick up on this feminine fear of binding commitment.

While regular usage of pornography certainly isn't healthy, it's usage by so many men is merely a symptom of the larger problem of the decline of the family and loving marriages.

Read More:The Psychological Devolution Of The Modern Man

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Spoiled Girls And White Knights Demand Men Shield Women From Traffic

June 28, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In a sign that the “massive discrimination” supposedly “ravaging” women now extends to sidewalk “objectification,” Twitter exploded in unbridled rage when a photo surfaced of a woman walking closer to a road than her male companion. Even weak notions of politically correct “equality” were thrown out the window after an Atlanta woman’s tweet quickly saw the photo go viral.

And, once again, perennially confused non-red pill men across the globe were exposed to an additional indication that they’re damned if they behave “chivalrously” (and called patronizing sexists) and identically damned if they don’t behave chivalrously (and have their romantic desirability and manhood called into question).

What was most remarkable to my eyes was the huge number of young women, especially black women, fuming at the perceived ungentlemanly slight of the man towards the woman. Atlanta has a perpetual socio-economic underclass, and there are much more important aspirations for its African-American component in particular than having men “protect” women from the infinitesimally small chance of being hit by a motor vehicle.

If these are the sorts of social media stories putting Atlanta “on the map,” it will be a very long time until this city’s most pressing problems (and they’re major, major ones) are ever solved.

> I'm sure half of you guys don't even know what's wrong with this picture. Smh pic.twitter.com/RU1jUxWqAI
>
> — ibi. (@itsibi_a) May 19, 2015

Atlanta still has a massive crime problem, not a sidewalk "etiquette" problem

Unless we take sidewalk etiquette as not shooting people in drive-bys or violently robbing them, Atlanta's rotten core is not its "unchivalrous" men failing to walk directly adjacent to traffic. Statistics change from year to year, but the general situation is the same: Atlanta's rate of crime is much higher than the national average, especially for violent crime.

This is despite an acknowledged trend of homicides and other felonies declining in recent decades. The statistics I unearthed, and these are only some of them, are compelling. Though the state of Georgia's rate of violent crime is fractionally lower than the US average (3.66 incidents per 1,000 inhabitants versus 3.8 across the US), Atlanta's rate is a comparably massive 13.03 incidents per 1,000. There's an argument for asserting that many non-fatal shootings or other incidents are never even reported.

A lot has been made about Atlanta now being, by some measures, safer than stereotypically "clean" and "wholesome" urban areas like Salt Lake City. But, like with Chicago, Atlanta's criminal woes are centered on particular districts. It is both a prosperous and considerably indigent city at the same time.

For majority black suburbs (and the city itself is minority-majority overall), the impact of crime is pernicious and soul-destroying. Comments like the tweet of "Ibi" serve as a microcosm of the underlying virus of denial and false focus afflicting modern urban communities. In a metropolis which features hundreds, maybe thousands of real tragedies every year, fatal or not, this will probably be the most "newsworthy" story to come out of it this year.

This is what feminism has brought us

[image]
As you can see by her Twitter profile and tweet topics, "Ibi" is very highbrow and "with it." Not. Atlanta is let down by airheads such as her.

If feminism were defined as a base level of respect for both men and women, feminism itself would be fine. But this is not how things have worked out. Whilst I don't exclude the possibility that women can (and non-politically correct ones often do) identify themselves as "feminists" in a way that is sensible and doesn't appropriate the regularly radical, supremacist form, the default setting for feminism is now a complex mix of keeping historical social norms that serve women and making new ones that also advance women.

The interaction between the two halves of this highly selective past and present is fluid and capable of many interpretations, fundamentally depending on how the woman sees it. The most salient aspect of the feminism I am questioning is located in its inherent flexibility: individual women define what is and isn't feminism for them and, correspondingly, what is "patriarchy."

For the SJW type, a man opening a door for her is considered not only threshold sexism, but fully-fledged patriarchal misogyny. And for the self-entitled type, which includes gold-diggers of any degree but also your average self-entitled bitch, a man not shielding her from traffic is a savage indictment of his masculinity and expected ultra-attentiveness to her.

This is still the case when, like in this viral tweet scenario, we are not sure if the male and female companions are romantically linked to begin with.

A sign of the end times… but it can be salvaged

> Not many guys know how to hold a conversation anymore.
>
> — ibi. (@itsibi_a) May 19, 2015

The best thing you can do for your own social circles is to gradually inculcate your friends, colleagues, and others with red pill and neomasculine ideology. There are many perils associated with going too hard and too fast with this re-education, including negative repercussions for yourself, but we all have obligations to reclaim and fumigate the degraded societies we find ourselves in.

In some ways, it is arbitrary to be picking on girls like "Ibi," namely because they are mere cogs in a wider machine of socially-reinforced entitlement and the "me, me, me, me" culture. It must be done, however.

Now, not tomorrow, is the time to reflect on your intended contribution to the red pill cause and to act accordingly. You can start today, implicitly, with your own behavior, especially towards women. You can be decent and affable, but not in the way women use the bastardization of these traits to exploit and milk men.

You can be attentive to the needs and idiosyncrasies of a girl, but only when it is done within the context of her having reaffirmed your specialness to her. And she must be doing that constantly, or she's simply not worth your time.

Read More: Why White Knights Voluntarily Enslave Themselves To Women

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Pursuit Of Truth, Goodness, And Beauty

June 28, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

Clive Staples Lewis (1898 – 1963) is best known for his Chronicles of Narnia series, but he was also one of the great Christian apologists of the early 20th century. His book The Abolition of Man began as a criticism of rationalist pedagogy but became a profound defense of the Natural Law (what Lewis called "the Tao") and analysis of progressivism in its embryonic stage.

Lewis proved prophetic, as the enlightened educators of his day gave birth to the Social Justice Warriors of ours.

Beauty Is Objective

Lewis begins by analyzing a textbook written for elementary English students. The textbook's authors said that when a man sees something beautiful and says, "This is sublime," the man is merely making a statement about his own feelings and projecting them upon reality.

In contrast, consider St. Augustine's definition of virtue: "the ordinate condition of the affections in which every object is accorded that degree of love which is appropriate to it." Plato argued that young people must be trained to feel pleasure, liking, disgust, and hatred toward things that objectively were pleasurable, likeable, disgusting, and hateful.

All religions and the ancient philosophies believed that truth, goodness, and beauty were discovered and not manufactured by man. Emotional responses are not logical, but they can be reasonable or unreasonable as they conform to objective reality or not.

The poet Samuel Taylor Coleridge could agree with the man who called the waterfall sublime and disagree with the woman who called it pretty because the waterfall objectively merited veneration.

The Natural Law

The Tao varies in the details in different times and places, but there are commonalities that have endured everywhere: duty, honor, commitment, honesty, magnanimity, filial piety, and raising our children right. Even if we ourselves fail to live up to those standards, normal people recognize their existence and that their lack of virtue is a defect in themselves such as being color blind or tone deaf.

Lewis compared the old pedagogy to how birds teach their young how to fly. Boys were trained to conform themselves to a standard of manhood that existed outside of their base desires. Either they would succeed and fly, or they would fail and fall to the ground. Today, however, boys are treated like chickens on the farm: the farmer fattens them up and uses them for purposes the bird knows not what.

The Acid Of Progressivism

The beatings will continue until she's hot

SJWs say that race, gender, standards of beauty, and other objective realities are nothing but social constructs. When we recoil in disgust at a fat woman, we are told that this is merely a result of the conditioning instilled by the old reactionary patriarchal order. If it's only conditioning, it follows that with the proper conditioning we can overcome all of the oppressive shackles that bound our stupid benighted ancestors.

Lewis argues that the Tao is inescapable. If we were to press SJWs on why they do what they do, they will eventually concede it's because they envision a world they believe is good for its own sake. Their vision is warped, twisted, and incoherent, but they still have a vision and bad men like us must be brought to heel if their vision is to be realized. As John Wayne would say, "That'll be the day."

If we wage a direct frontal assault upon the Tao – "Why? What good is it? Who says so?" – then we are sawing off the branch on which we are sitting. If reality is nothing but atoms and the void to be shaped by those with the will to do so, then it all comes down to storytelling and whoever has the most guns gets to decide what reality is.

The Abolition Of Manhood

The progressive may try to justify things like honesty, fidelity, and magnanimity on purely rational or biological or modern grounds. He will twist himself into pretzels to avoid conceding that virtues are grounded in objective value. Without trained emotions, however, the intellect is no match for the animal appetites. Crude sentimental appeals to God and country will keep the soldier going in battle far longer than the neatest syllogisms.

Reason rules the appetites through the spirited elements of man or, as Lewis puts it, the head rules the belly through the chest. The chest, or heart, is where emotions are organized by trained habits into stable sentiments. In the most famous passage of the book, he writes:

> You can hardly open a periodical without coming across the statement that what our civilization needs is more 'drive,' or dynamism, or self-sacrifice, or 'creativity.' In a sort of ghastly simplicity we remove the organ and demand the function. We make men without chests and expect of them virtue and enterprise. We laugh at honor and are shocked to find traitors in our midst. We castrate and bid the geldings be fruitful.

This is the abolition of man. It won't make sense to speak of our social conditioners as being good or bad men because they won't be men at all. Having conquered nature through science, they will at last conquer human nature. In the void where human nature once existed will be only animal instinct and the nature our masters want us to have.

Liberal democracies do not employ the brutal methods of the communists and fascists (yet) but their goal is the creation of the glorious new man who will be properly malleable in the hands of his progressive rulers.

The Solution

For the wise men of old, Lewis writes, the problem was how to conform the soul to reality. Their solution was knowledge, virtue, and discipline. For the modern, the problem is how to make nature conform to man's desires. The heyday of occultism and sorcery wasn't the Dark Ages but the early Modern Age, between the 16th and 17th centuries. The scientist and the magician had different methods but the same goals.

Lewis was an Anglican Christian. In case my previous column didn't make it clear, I am a Roman Catholic. For my fellow Christians and I, God is the source of the Natural Law. God is truth, goodness, and beauty.

You may not believe in God but I'm certain that you believe in those three things. All men, whether they know it or not, desire truth, goodness, and beauty. They are not merely words that describe our emotional states but objective realities by which we judge everything else.

Read More: Is The Pursuit of Truth A Mask For Negativity?

Andrew Levinson
Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

How To Deal With People Who Hate On Your Lifestyle

June 29, 2015 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

When it comes to being a bachelor, the best benefit—without question—is that one hundred percent of your free time is one-hundred percent yours. Outside of your professional obligations, not a single moment of your existence has to be spent doing anything you don't want to do, nor does it have to be spent with people you deem unworthy.

A close second is that after all the bills are paid and your essentials are handled, then one hundred percent of the money remaining goes directly into your pocket. It's all yours, and no one can ever take it away provided you make good decisions and act responsibly.

Lastly, everything is one hundred percent exactly the way you want it—all the time, every time. The fridge is stocked with the food you like to eat, the home bar has the liquor you like to drink, and everything in your home is there because you want it there—all details are at your discretion. You are the judge, jury, and executioner for any and all decisions that come your way; you are the sovereign of your own little empire.

It's Good To Be King

For me, personally, I'm extremely fortunate that my chosen profession provides me with a comfortable income while giving me ample time off—with a minimum of two weeks off per month being typical. If I feel like working more and stacking some extra cash by picking up open time or extra trips—then I can do that too. However, I tend to treasure my leisure time over chasing money in most cases.

So, what does a guy do when his business is handled, his bank account is in the black, and he has adequate free time on his hands? Anything he fucking feels like doing is the answer. Aside from handling the basic necessities of life—shopping, the gym (yes, exercising is a necessity), and maintaining my assets—I'm free to do whatever I please.

My actions can't be judged by anyone because I'm not beholden to anyone. I set the standards and expectations for my life. The responsibility of getting the job done—and carving out my own path to happiness—rests solely on my shoulders, and I welcome this responsibility with open arms.

But There's Always A Catch

Unfortunately, as with all things in life, with the good comes the bad. And the bad with this situation is that people are going to fucking hate you, and they're going to hate you a lot.

You know that buddy of yours who overlooked the fact that he married and impregnated some gutter slut who buried more bones than the Third Reich during her college years, and who is now, somehow, on a steady 10 pounds a year straight-to-the-thighs weight gainer diet despite the fact that her cooking skills are such shit that she almost burns their fucking house down anytime she toasts an English muffin? Yeah, he hates you.

And as for that couch-mammoth who possesses no redeeming qualities whatsoever? Now, she really hates your ass. When George W. Bush said: "They hate us for our freedom," he wasn't referring to Al-Qaeda or the Taliban. He was actually talking about obese women, and how they feel about the bachelors their boyfriends and husbands hang out with.

These women know that you have a very good thing going on, and they don't want their bitch-boy husbands catching wind of this little fact. They will sit around saying things like: "Oh I feel so sorry for him, he's going to die alone with no one to love him; he must be so lonely," or, "He's so immature, it's no wonder why he hasn't found a good woman." They say this to their husbands, boyfriends, and fiances in order to brainwash these men into thinking they're somehow getting a pretty sweet deal in life.

None of this, however, would stop most of these broads from sleeping with you if they thought they had half a chance. But lucky for you—and for your friends—they don't have a chance, because as a guy who puts in the effort to succeed in life, you don't have to resort to nailing fat married chicks with bad attitudes and back-titties who can't even make an ice cream cone without fucking it up.

That's work for an employee at Husband Enterprises right there, and I don't work for that shitty dead-end company.

So your married friends hate you, their wives hate you, and your unmotivated single friends hate you; hell, even people you don't know hate you. But what about the women you date? Yep, they hate you too, but not as much as they hate themselves for caring so much about some selfish asshole who doesn't appreciate them.

The women who come in and out of my life quickly learn that what I say goes. If a woman wants to hang out with me, but I'm not in the mood to have her around, then she can fuck right off—plain and simple. I, quite obviously, have better things to do than spend time with her. And what are these better things, you may be wondering?

Doesn't matter: if I decide it's something better—no matter what it is—then it's something better. End of discussion. If I want to stretch out on the couch and scratch my balls while blasting some ear-raping heavy metal; if I want hang out at my local general aviation airport, shoot the shit with the old timers, and go burn some holes in the sky for fun; hell, if want sit in total silence, drink some bourbon, and read all day—then that's exactly what I'm going to do.

Dealing With A Female Example

Have you ever had a woman visiting your place for the first time and watched her as she looked around and examined everything? Did you pay close attention to her words and body language? And did you take note of her facial expressions while she was checking everything out?

If you were paying attention, then you probably noticed that she was plotting and scheming about how she's going to completely destroy your life. Within 15 minutes of stepping into your place, she has already started making mental notes of all the shit she's going to change if she traps you in a relationship.

She's planning on replacing your blinds with pastel colored curtains, moving your drum set into the garage, putting pink fluffy floor mats in your bathroom, and deciding on a good spot to put "Baxter's" cat litter pan—fuck her, and fuck "Baxter" too.

A girl I was seeing on and off fit this description perfectly. She was always hitting me up to hang out and sending me “whatcha doin?” or “when do you get back in town?” text messages. She was the typical self-serving, mid-twenties, strong and independent ladder climbing career chick that I always find myself dating for some reason.

To put it bluntly: I couldn’t fucking stand her, but she liked me a lot and made the majority of the effort in our so-called relationship—including giving me sex without too much of a headache.

Now, generally speaking, having sex with a standard issue strong-and-independent white woman is like visiting a cemetery in Alaska: it’s cold, depressing, and every hole is four feet wide, six feet deep, and smells like death. But this girl was a little bit better than average, so when she hinted at wanting to hang out with me one evening—I invited her over, and even agreed to her request to stay the night.

So she comes over and we go through all the normal motions. We exchanged pleasantries, I pretended to care about whatever she was talking about, we had a couple of stiff drinks, and then I gave her some stiff dick—all quite painless.

After the deed was done, we were laying in bed together and she had her head comfortably nestled on my shoulder. Believe it or not, I was actually quite content to have her there and was enjoying her company; our post-coital cuddling was very pleasant and I had no complaints… but then she started fucking talking again, and things started going downhill real fast from there.

Earlier in the day, I had started a James Bond marathon on Blu-ray. I had made my way through Dr. No and From Russia With Love, and was now due to watch my favorite film of the entire series: Goldfinger.

The main reason I agreed to let this girl come over in the first place was because I really wanted some pussy after watching the famous Ursula Andress scene from Dr. No.

So I'm laying there trying to chill and act somewhat gentlemanly, but this girl just wouldn't shut the hell up. I tried listening to her—I really did. But then I zoned out and began fantasizing about making myself a Manhattan, plugging Goldfinger into the Blu-ray player, and then stretching out on my bed without anyone there hogging my space or annoying me with their nonsensical horseshit.

It also didn't help matters that she didn't look like Ursula Andress.

My feelings for this girl—someone who I was just intimate with a few minutes prior, mind you—had now turned into the same feelings I have towards a raccoon who has tipped over my trash cans and started rummaging through my garbage. In short: I wanted this fucking thing off my property…

> Me: "Well, it's about that time…" (while pushing her head off me and climbing out of bed)
>
> Girl: "Time for what, babe?"
>
> Me: "For you to get going, of course."
>
> Girl: "What? Why? Do you have something to do in the morning?"
>
> Me: "Nope, I have absolutely nothing to do tomorrow."
>
> Girl: (perplexed)… "Then why do I have to go? You said I could spend the night, why don't you want me here?!"
>
> Me: "Because I want to watch Goldfinger."
>
> Girl: "Huh? Is that a show on Netflix or something? What's Goldfinger?"
>
> Me: "It's a James Bond movie with Sean Connery—its from the 1960s. I've seen it like 50 times, it's one of my favorites."
>
> Girl: "You're fucking kidding, right? It's past midnight! You're seriously kicking me out of here so you can watch some stupid fucking James Bond movie that you've already seen a bunch of times?!"
>
> Me: "Pretty much.
>
> "Girl: (cue the charm and bargaining tactics)… "Well, why don't we cuddle up and watch it together? I'd love to watch James Bond with you."
>
> Me: "Shit ain't happening."
>
> Girl: (with tears of frustration starting to form)… "Oh my God, why do you have to be such a fucking asshole! You said it was no problem for me to stay over! You never keep your word! I have no idea why I keep seeing you: You lie to me all the time, show me no respect, and treat me like I'm a piece of shit!
>
> "Me: Rips a hellacious fart while buck naked and bending over to pick her clothes up off the floor
>
> Girl: (shocked and now full-on crying)… "Oh! Real fucking nice, A.V. Yader! And thanks for pointing your hairy ass at me when you did that!"
>
> Me: Tosses the pile of clothes to her while trying desperately not to laugh

> Girl: “It’s not fucking funny, A.V. Yader!”
>
> Me: Completely loses it and laughs like a lunatic for about two minutes
>
> Girl: *Jumps out of bed, throws temper tantrum (which makes me laugh even harder), calls me every name in the book (nothing new there), gets dressed and leaves (thank you)…

So, was that kind of dick move on my part? Sure, but do you think my actions ruined things with this girl? During the course of her tantrum, she said that she never wanted to see me again—do you think that actually happened?

Did she keep her word and follow through on her threat to sever ties and cut all contact with me? Did she go off and find herself a ‘nice guy’ who would treat her right and show her the “respect she deserves”?

Of course she fucking didn’t. She texted me the very next day to resume her “I can’t believe you” blah blah blah bullshit. I was watching On Her Majesty’s Secret Service at the time, and still had 17 more Bond films to watch—so I was pretty busy and wasn’t able to text her back for a few days. But after about a week we’d slept together again.

That’s right: I fucked her, directed an ass-splitting fart at her, kicked her out my place, and apologized for none of it—yet nothing bad resulted from my behavior. In fact, when you do this type of crap to women, it just makes them try harder.

The sex will be more passionate and occur with greater frequency; they’ll be sweeter to you and show you more respect; they’ll even try to be decent people and attempt to impress you. And it’s so easy to make it all happen: all you have to do is disregard their feelings and do whatever the hell you want!

Outside Opinions Are Not Welcome

There's always going to be pressure coming at you from all sides to do the "right thing." It will come at you from acquaintances, coworkers, friends, family, and the women you date—all of whom think they have it all figured out and want nothing more than to bring you down to their level. This raises a question: What is the "right thing" in this day and age?

Did a guy who's on the brink of getting divorce-raped by his unappreciative wife do the "right thing" when he put a ring on it without doing his due diligence first? When a woman destroys herself from a steady diet of loser cock and settles for a man she isn't all that attracted to and doesn't respect—is she doing the "right thing"?

Is it the "right thing" to bring children into the world only for them to be raised in a split household by a selfish and conniving single mother, and by a father who's nothing more than a demoralized wallet stuck on the wrong side of the looking glass?

Is it the "right thing" to treat a self-absorbed career woman like pure gold, when in reality she's just a step above pure shit? As all women descend further and further into moral turpitude, is it the "right thing" to show them respect just because they demand it, yet posses no qualities that actually command it?

Society says: "Yes sir, these are all the right things!" Funny, isn't it? How everything that is supposedly the "right thing" for a man seems to be nothing more than a one-way ticket to shattered self-respect at best, or complete annihilation at worst. I f a man is willing to tow the line and allow society to dictate his behavior, his decisions, and his values—then that man is on the fast-track to failure and ruin. The bottom line is this: being a crowd-pleaser will get you nowhere, and if people hate on you and think you're an asshole for marching to the beat of your own drum—then fuck'em.

There is no "right thing" anymore.

In Closing

I've done a lot of talking about winners and losers in my work here on Return of Kings, but the fact of the matter is there are no winners in the modern dating game; and yes, this applies to women just as much as it applies to men. Women have never been more used and abused, more miserable, and more broken than they are right now.

From a surface observation, we think that women have it made: they have unlimited dating options, zero responsibility, and an army of ass-kissers who think they walk on water; yet the majority of these women are lonely, irresponsible, and dreadfully insecure. The modern woman is fully aware, deep down, that she isn't worthy of being loved. Do you think the girl I kicked out of my place with a nose full of fart actually has it good?

Can you imagine going through life with such little dignity that you would not only tolerate being treated like shit, but actually crave it and require it? Do you know how fucked in the head you would have to be in order for that to seem like a sweet deal? Suffice it to say: that's no way to live, and it's certainly no way to procure respect. I wouldn't trade places with her ass for anything.

She is in good company, though: there are millions upon millions of women just like her. If it weren't for their noxious personalities and over-inflated egos, one might find it within himself to feel pity for these women, but that's not in the cards at this stage in the game: the damage is done.

What one can do, however, is take solace in the fact that this poor behavior is simply a defense mechanism to sooth the festering rot and self-hatred trapped within—they're compensating, plain and simple. Women and reality have a long history of not getting along with one another.

As for the women who aren't compensating and actually believe in their own bullshit: they are either completely delusional, mentally ill, or both; and there's certainly plenty of these types running around out there as well.

Granted, this information does nothing to make their behavior more tolerable. But it does help to reinforce that these women are, without a doubt, total fucking losers—they wouldn't keep returning like boomerangs to be treated poorly if this wasn't the case. They're nothing to envy, and giving up the bachelor lifestyle for one is completely out of the question.

It's not about winning anymore with women—you can't win. At this stage, it's all about not losing. There are a thousand ways to lose, but there's only one way to not lose: become an unapologetic asshole (if you're not one already). This is not some seduction strategy or game advice—it's a life requirement.

It's a survival tactic that will help you succeed during these turbulent times. I'm not suggesting you behave like I do, I can't define your morals and I don't want to—it's on you to figure that out for yourself. What I am saying, though, is that you should never put your dignity and self-respect on the negotiating table. In other words: don't be a spineless pussy.

People, especially women, will try to steamroller you if they think they can get away with it—don’t fucking let them, ever. You should only do what’s best for you and for the people you love, and, most importantly, who love you too and will always have your back. Everyone else be damned.

Lastly, don’t you ever worry about those people who decide to play the game and do the “right thing.” They won’t have any trouble finding you once their little dream world turns to shit and they need some guidance or moral support. All they’ll need to do is look down the road less traveled, and once they spot the guy that’s holding a bag full of money, doing whatever the fuck he wants with a smile on his face…

Then they’ll know when they’ve found you.

Read More: How To Deal With A Bitch

A.V. Yader
A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

Why Shaming Men (And Women) Is Important And Necessary

June 29, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

One of the most unfortunate similarities the manosphere—or at least certain portions of it—has in common with social justice warriors is a fanatical opposition to "shaming." Feminists hate it when women are "fat-shamed" or "slut-shamed," and MRAs and "migtows" dismiss any and all criticism of their beliefs as "shaming language." For example, a gang of angry virgins denounced my MGTOW article last week by claiming I was trying to "shame" men into getting married.

The "anti-shaming" current in the manosphere has reached the point where r/TheRedPill recently ordered participants to "keep [their] damn morals to [themselves]" after a slew of posters objected to men asking for advice on seducing married women. In doing this, r/TheRedPill has become the manosphere's equivalent of Tumblr: a gang of special little snowflakes screeching "YOU CAN'T JUDGE ME FOR CUCKING OTHER MEN, YOU TRADCON SHITLORD!"

Shaming of immoral, unmanly, or unfeminine behavior is a necessary component of a stable society. A world that says you can't judge people for behaving like losers or failures is one that will inevitably regress to the lowest common denominator. It's the world we happen to live in, where kids are given participation trophies no matter how badly they suck at the game and where an old fart deep in his dotage is called "courageous" for cross-dressing and calling himself "Caitlyn."

Shame Is Personal

The most important thing you have to understand about shame is that at the end of the day, the only person who can make you feel shame is you. While you may be insulted by someone else's words or comments, if you feel shamed, it's because those comments cut deep and reveal an inadequacy within you. If there isn't some truth to the shaming attempt, all the put-downs in the world won't affect you at all.

For example, feminists could try to shame me by saying that I live in my parents' basement, but it wouldn't affect me because it's not true (my rental lease and credit report being evidence that it's not true). Conversely, the reason why so many "migtows" became angry at my cracks about them being basement-dwelling virgins is because a great many of them are basement-dwelling virgins, and all I did was point out the truth.

Additionally, if you feel shamed over something, it's an indicator that whatever you're being shamed for is something you hate about yourself and want to change. For example, while a devout Christian may retain his virginity until he gets married, because he's choosing to save himself for a higher cause, attempting to shame him for not having sex wouldn't work. On the other hand, shaming "migtows" for being virgins is incredibly effective, because despite their claims, their inability to attract women makes them feel inferior to men who can.

Stop Acting Shamefully

Just because feminists abuse shaming in their attempts to manipulate men doesn't mean that shaming itself is bad. Not all life choices are equal. For example, being fat is not the same as being skinny—contra the belching of "fat acceptance" activists—because not only is being fat unhealthy, fat women are physically repulsive.

No amount of agita against "fat shaming" will change this fundamental reality. The same goes for slut-shaming: girls who sleep around make worse wives and mothers than those who remain chaste.

Your worth as a man is determined by what accomplishments you've made and what skills you have. If you've accomplished nothing—indeed, try to act as if you're proud of accomplishing nothing—you will be mocked, jeered at and disrespected by men (and women) who matter. When you try and retaliate by claiming they're "shaming" you, you're basically saying, "Yeah, I'm a loser, but you need to ACCEPT that I'm a loser."

While nobody can force you to live your life a certain way, you can't sit in your basement all day twiddling your fleshy bits to hentai and expect the same measure of respect as a man who actually accomplishes something real. Yet much in the same way that fat girls demand to be given the same deference as skinny ones, loser men in the manosphere—and moral degenerates who steal other men's wives—demand to be treated the same as men of virtue.

The reality is that if you're being shamed, you probably deserve it. If you're unwilling to own the consequences of your behavior, you need to change the way you act. In other words, if you're sick of being shamed, you should stop acting shamefully. Demanding that the rest of the world change to accommodate your failures makes you no different than a spiky-haired Tumblrina crying about how she was born with the soul of a naked mole rat and why won't you accept her for who she is, you cishetwhitemale asshole?

At the end of the day, choices have consequences. You're free to carve out whatever life you see fit, but I'm also free to mock you for it if your life choices are stupid. "Shaming language” is just an attempt to de-legitimize any criticism of anyone who chooses mediocrity over greatness, failure over success.

Read More: A New Study Claims That Fat Shaming Doesn’t Work

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Ruthless: A Memoir By Jerry Heller

June 29, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I still remember the time I first listened to N.W.A.'s Straight Outta Compton. I was in college, and a friend of mine had dubbed a tape for me and said, "Man, you need to check this out." So I brought it back to my dorm room and let it rip. I couldn't believe they were saying the things they were saying; no one had ever cursed like that on a record before, or spun such violent fantasies.

The attraction of the music for white kids like me with no experiences in the inner city was this: it was angry, rebellious, and somehow bizarrely life-affirming in its exuberance. In 2015, this type of music is no big deal any more. But in 1988, it was incendiary.

When I heard last month that a movie was being made about the formation of N.W.A., I decided to read Jerry Heller's 2006 book Ruthless: A Memoir. Heller was the co-founder and producer of Ruthless Records (N.W.A.'s label), and I had been dimly aware of the various back-and-forth accusations that had been tied to the drama of N.W.A.'s breakup.

What were the roles of Dr. Dre and Ice Cube? Who had screwed over whom? Where did the blame properly lie?

Eric "Easy-E" Wright: the big conceptualizer behind N.W.A.

Heller's book pulls no punches. He cuts through all the posturing, all the bullshit, and all the lies that have been circulating in the entertainment world for the past twenty years regarding who did what to whom. The effect is like that of a cleansing wind.

In the mid-1980s, Heller was a worn-out Los Angeles band manager in need of a second wind. He had been a big player in the rock world of the 1960s and 1970s, managing many famous acts. But changing public tastes and a nasty divorce had left him feeling empty and in need of a new path. Heller clearly has a talent for sniffing out good music, and he sensed that rap music was on the ascent.

So he started to frequent underground rap shows in various locales in the city. He must have cut quite an unusual figure: a tall, educated, middle-aged white Jewish guy trying to get established in a black cultural niche definitely attracted attention.

But Heller was at his core an anti-establishment type of guy, he had had a lot of experience in the music game, and he never tried to be something he wasn't. And that "realness" was what gave him credibility in the rap world.

One day, he was approached by a persistent, sunglasses-wearing kid named Eric Wright. Wright, who went by the nickname Easy-E, had been trying to meet him for weeks, finally paying a friend $750 to arrange an introduction with Heller. As Heller relates it:

> I was trying to imagine how this runt-of-the-litter twenty-three-year-old tenth-grade dropout saw me. Tall European-American, already gone a shade gray, educated, open-eyed, twice Easy's age and outweighing him by a good eight or ten stone…"You were the first white guy I ever really talked to who wasn't trying to collect rent or arrest me."

Easy-E played a demo tape for Heller which contained the song "Boyz N the Hood," and he was blown away. Out of this first meeting, the idea of N.W.A. and Ruthless Records was born. Heller knew musical genius when he saw it, and acting on blind faith, he took the biggest plunge of his life.

He contributed huge sums of his own money to start Ruthless Records, and Easy provided the talent in the form of the other members of the group (Dr. Dre, MC Ren, Yella, and eventually Ice Cube, who was only 17 at the time).

Jerry Heller: putting it all out there

But the unlikely pairing of Heller and Easy-E worked because each provided something that the other didn't have. Heller actually worked for Easy-E, but was paid on a percentage basis of the label's gross revenues. Heller knew what he was worth and wasn't afraid to say so.

After a few successful albums, N.W.A. dropped a nuclear bomb with Straight Outta Compton. And as the money began to pour in, so did the inevitable personality conflicts, business disputes, and simmering grievances. As Heller sees it, the problems began with Ice Cube's constant complaining and unwillingness to be a team player.

Apparently he believed he should have been paid more than the other group members, and had a legion of attendants who were willing to feed his ego. He says:

> Even in those early days, Cube was always difficult. At first I thought he had a chip on his shoulder just because he was younger than everybody else in the crew. Of all the attitudes, adolescent attitude—harnessed, as it is, to hormones—is the most unsophisticated. I had to laugh at Cube's angry gangsta posturing. He still lived with his mother. But shitty human beings sometimes make great art.

But Cube's imagined grievances (completely baseless, in Heller's view) would cause him to leave the group and start a solo career. This would prompt a string of back-and-forth insults between him and his former bandmates. Things would eventually get even worse once a shadowy figure named Suge Knight appeared on the scene.

As Heller relates it, Knight basically held Easy-E hostage and forced him to sign away his top producer, Dr. Dre. This part of the story is painful to read, as Dre and Easy had been close friends. Heller makes it abundantly clear that Dre set up and totally betrayed his friend Easy.

Heller is aware that Cube and Dre have accused him of financial wrongdoing. To Heller, that is complete bullshit:

> It's a time-honored maneuver for African-American musicians to cry "racism" whenever they wish to leave a music contract. Not that such claims are always baseless—just that they are pretty much automatic.

In describing Ice Cube, Heller's prose seethes with real anger. Even after all these years, the wounds caused by Cube's words in his song "No Vaseline" and in interviews still cut deep. One can almost feel the satisfaction Heller has in relating this little story:

> Ice Cube, the apostate ex-member of N.W.A., was quoted in a newspaper interview running his mouth off with an indirect dis at Above the Law [another rap group signed to Ruthless Records]…The beef came to a head at an Above the Law show in Anaheim at Circle Star Theater. Hutch [a member of Above the Law] invited Cube to their dressing room backstage, where he gave him a savage beating. "[Cube] was crying like a little girl," crowed Easy. No love lost there. Ice Cube was terrified.

But it perhaps in putting to rest the allegations of financial wrongdoing that Heller has his finest moment in the book. In this passage, Heller rises to red-hot eloquence:

> All these years I've never answered the allegations of financial impropriety leveled against me, first by Cube and then by Dre. Now that I'm writing this book, I feel compelled to answer those allegations on behalf of my longtime partner, Easy-E…And I say to you, Cube, that the amount of money you earned at > Ruthless Records didn't have anything to do with anyone's hand in the cookie jar. It was pure mathematics, baby—not your strong suit, from what I hear about the producers and writers you utilized at your own record label. They were screaming about not getting paid just like you used to scream…

>
> Here are the numbers spelled out: For every record and merchandising dollar N.W.A. brought in, Ruthless Records took twenty-five cents off the top. The label deserved it. That's a fairly conservative percentage. Ruthless sponsored your time in the studio, your tours. The label bought you your fucking pencils. That leaves seventy-five cents to split five ways, between the five members of N.W.A., which means everyone gets fifteen cents out of every dollar.

Heller then goes on to break down the financials in a methodical and devastating way, and points out that neither Cube nor Dre have ever sued him for anything. The reader will form his own conclusions from all this. The book is not without flaws. Heller feels compelled to spend pages talking about his experiences managing rock acts in the sixties and seventies like Van Morrison and Creedence Clearwater Revival, but these musings detract from the focus of the book, and held no interest for me.

The takeaway

I like Jerry Heller's attitude about life. His philosophy is simple: if you don't like me, I'm not going to like you. He mentions how rapper The D.O.C. disliked him for some unstated reason. Heller gave it right back to him: if you don't like me, go fuck yourself. Life is too short.

I've read that the new movie Straight Outta Compton was made without any consultation with Jerry Heller. Easy-E's son apparently wasn't even given the chance to read for the part. But Ice Cube's son is playing in the film. The fact that the movie was produced by Dre and Ice Cube suggests the reasons why one version of history is being promoted over another.

"Only two guys were present at the formation of Ruthless Records," Heller said in a recent interview, "And they were me and Easy. And one of them is now dead." Heller went on to say that he'd be watching the opening of the film on its first day, with his lawyers. "And if I'm not portrayed accurately, then that's going to be addressed. I owe that much to Easy."

Even if you have no interest in rap music or the entertainment industry, Ruthless: A Memoir is worth reading for what it teaches us about the Shakespearean themes of power, riches, and friends betraying friends. These themes are timeless for a good reason.

Heller had wanted to call his book Niggaz 4 Life. At first, I thought the title sounded ridiculous. But after reading the book, I think it sounds just right (Easy would have loved that title). He survived in a rough world with rough characters, and gave as good as he got.

He’s got no regrets, and no apologies. He helped make history, and he knows it. That alone makes the book a great read. If anyone can claim the title of being a Nigga 4 Life, it’s Jerry Heller.

Ya did good, Jerry. Thanks for the 1990s memories. Much respect.

Read More: Shimson’s Tale Sets An Example For Masculinity

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Can A Man Ever Have Too Much Game?

June 30, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

You’re out a with sexy girl you’ve gamed into meeting up with you and so far everything is going according to plan. You’ve masterfully side-stepped her shit tests, gotten her comfortable with being touched by you, and your tongue has been in her mouth on more than one occasion. All signs are pointing to adding another trophy to your mantle.

But suddenly she goes completely cold on you. Even though she agreed to come back to your place earlier in the night, she starts back tracking. She’s become less touchy feely, she’s now playing with her phone, and before you know it she’s managed to weasel her way out of your clutches leaving you with nothing but blue balls and disappointment.

“What the fuck just happened?” You ask yourself. “Did I fail a covert shit test? Did she have a boyfriend and just needed me for validation?” Or worse…“Did my game fall off???”

…the fuck you mean you gotta go console your friend after a breakup?

The raw truth is that when a woman goes from being hot for you one minute, and cold the next, it's because she's lost the urge to fuck you for some reason or another. She'll tell you, her friends, and herself "I just didn't feel a connection" but men who possess a working knowledge of the true nature of women know better.

Her hamster, which is designed to absolve her from any and all slutty behavior with elaborate explanations and far-fetched rationalizations, will never allow her to say "I don't want to fuck you anymore so I want to leave now."

There is, however, a possible explanation you may not be aware of: You over gamed her.

Now you may be thinking: "There's no such thing, Donovan. You can never have too much game."

And you would be dead wrong.

Over gaming happens more than you think and I've been through it enough to know it can be a serious issue. Hell, sometimes it even happens before the meet up (more on that later).

A personal anecdote of over gaming: A girl a few weeks ago straight up told me "Okay, you're hella fine but you are way too smooth" just a few minutes into the conversation after I opened her. I ended up fucking her a few days later but I should have been able to close the deal that night because I could see her arousal coming out of her pores.

But the fact that my game was razor sharp during that set actually prolonged the time it took me to get her between the sheets. Below are the most prevalent circumstances of over gaming, how they could cost you the poonani, and how to avoid them.

Overusing Asshole Game

Those in the know are well aware of the many benefits of asshole game. This is a go to strategy of many-a-pussy plunderer the world over because of its well documented effectiveness and overall success rate.

However, there are a few instances where ball busting, teasing, or negging too much can and will cost you the lay and it's happened to me several times—especially in the fledgling stages of my slut slayer training.

Case in point: A few years back I was out with a pretty good looking 32-year-old mother of 2 (I know, I know…but we all gotta start somewhere, right?). It was obvious she was physically attracted to me (she actually approached me) but I teased and negged her so much during our date that by the end of the night she told me she didn't want to see me again because I was "being a complete douche bag the whole time."

She'd called me an asshole several times during the night but because I hadn't quite mastered the art of reading context, verbal tone, and non verbal cues within the context of game I thought she was digging me so I kept pouring it on.

Sometimes less is more

My current level of game awareness makes me chuckle aloud at how clueless I was when I replay that night in my head. I had no idea that she wasn't calling me an asshole in the way girls do when their vaginas are buzzing.

What that experience (and a few others) taught me was that asshole game is to be deployed under certain circumstances, at varying degrees, at certain times, with certain girls. A general rule of thumb is that the younger and hotter your target, the more asshole game is required to fuck her.

It’s also very important to know when to turn it off and on. Don’t get me wrong, a 21-year-old hottie will punish you if you don’t tease the shit out of her and put her in her place consistently throughout the set. But knowing when to transition from asshole to charmer and back again is paramount to closing the deal.

Hot girls want to know you’re not intimidated by their beauty, which is why asshole game is necessary in the first place. But they also need to be shown that you can charm their collective panties off and more importantly, that you’re adult enough to know when to turn the jerkboy faucet off. Hot young fillies are more attracted to older and more mature men than frat boys more often than not.

Learn when to turn on the charm

Knowing when, where, how, and to what degree to use asshole game is essential if you want to pull young, hot ass on the regular. Reading up on PUA manuals and sites like this will help to some extent. But no two girls are alike, which means they will all require different doses at different times.

The bottom line is that only real way to perfect your instincts in terms of asshole game application is trial and error. Always remember that too much of anything can yield bad results…especially this approach.

Taking Too Much

One night stands notwithstanding, another pillar of game that isn’t oft discussed is the concept of give and take. That is, how much you give your woman in the way of your time and attention, (and in very rare instances, your monetary resources), relative to what she gives to you.

Neomasculine men understand that in today’s sexual relationships, we must give markedly less to our women than they give to us lest we come off as looking needy:

> V. Adhere to the golden ratio
>
> Give your woman 2/3 of everything she gives you. For every three calls or texts, give her two back. Three declarations of love earn two in return. Three gifts; two nights out. Give her two displays of affection and stop until she has answered with three more. When she speaks, you reply with fewer words. When she emotes, you emote less. The idea behind the golden ratio is twofold — it establishes your greater value by making her chase you, and it demonstrates that you have the self-restraint to avoid getting swept up in her personal dramas. Refraining from reciprocating everything she does for you in equal measure instills in her the proper attitude of belief in your higher status. In her deepest loins it is what she truly wants.
>
> -Chateau Heartiste's 16 Commandments Of Poon

Similar to asshole game, taking too much with little to no reciprocation at all can backfire. This isn't to say you should run out and start buying shit for your main chick. Shit, I don't adhere to the "golden ratio" myself as I probably skew closer to a 3:1 and sometimes even a 4:1 ratio depending on the girl.

But women with options need a little more than just great sex to keep them around for a while. Hot girls need three things to keep them in line and interested: a) a carrot to chase, b) sparse rewards, and c) to not feel like a slut.

If your girl comes over and cleans up your place and cooks you a meal, show her a little more affection. If later on she gives you a toe-curling blowjob before you bang her brains out, cuddle with her for a little bit when you're done.

Then after that, let her stick around for a while and maybe even allow her to spend the night and give her a little more of your time and attention.

[image]
Most high value girls won't keep this up for long without anything in return

All of these small rewards motivate her to continue the behavior and, more importantly, reduces her chances of feeling like a slut. And because you're not buying her flowers, jewelry, or spending every waking hour with her, she'll be over the moon when you actually throw her a cookie every once in a while.

Wannabe PUAs who buy into the "all these bitches get is my dick" notion are kidding themselves and everyone around them. They think scoring one night stands with 5s and 6s is the pinnacle of playerdom and like to brag about "this bitch I fucked then I just got up and left" or "I don't give a fuck what she does I kick her the fuck out right after I nut."

Don’t take advice from clowns like him

Any man who regularly sleeps with beautiful women knows that unless she’s a hooker, it doesn’t work this way—especially if you want to keep fucking her.

Girls in the upper aesthetic echelon are keenly aware of their value. They know they can get more for their looks so they rarely engage in one night stands or random hookups, at least not knowingly.

The occasional hottie may get duped into fucking a loser who happened to be in the right place at the right time with the stars aligned in his favor that night. But keeping pretty girls coming back for more is what separates the keyboard casanovas from the true players.

Neomasculine men know that all take and no give is as much a recipe for disaster as the opposite. I’ll reiterate that I am in no way suggesting you start doing more shit for your girl for no reason at all. She’s got to earn it first.

What I am saying is that your time and attention are your two most valuable currencies within the context of a sexual relationship. Withholding them from good looking girls who treat you well is over gaming and isn’t a realistic approach regardless of how many times you make her squirt.

You’re Unattainable

Believe it or not, there will be times when your sexual market value is actually ::gasp:: too high for some women…even good looking ones.

10 times out of 10 after you number close a girl, she’s going to jump on Facebook or Instagram to vet you. She’s checking your social media pages to make sure you are who you presented yourself to be (read: congruent). When she sees pictures of you with pretty girls, in various travel destinations, and your tricked out Jeep, she'll know she's dealing with a man in demand.

Now before you tell me I'm off my rocker, understand that your game must be rock solid, you must be in above average physical condition, and have a substantial amount female social proof for this to occur. High value women do not chase men who do not check off at least two of those three boxes.

That said, the last 5+ years have shown me that some women won't respond to game because they think you're too good for them—even if they're interested in you. The past year alone girls I set up dates with are saying things like "I was afraid you were going to flake on me" or "I was surprised that you asked for my number" at an increasing rate.

Despite what they say, girls are intimidated by men like this…even 10s

Most of the time this is awesome. When a sexy chick places your value well above hers, getting her naked is like taking candy from a baby. There are a few times, however, this could slow or even impede your progress with her.

The fact of the matter is that 95% (maybe more) of females know they don't bring much value to a man's life outside of sex and arm candy—this includes 8s ,9s, and 10s.

Sure, they'll go on and on about how they're a "great catch," post memes on their Facebook and Instagram feeds about how strong and multi-faceted they are, but deep down, they know the score. They know full well they don't have much raison d'etre other than their sexual allure.

So when a high-value male shows interest in her and isn't the least bit fazed by her looks, she is the one who is intimidated because her trump card has been trumped. This obviously works in your favor most of the time but every so often it can work against you.

"How the hell can having too much value work against you?"

Simple. When a girl has it in her mind that you're out of her league she'll think long and hard about flaking on you. Not because she doesn't want to sleep with you, but because she doesn't expect you to stick around after a few rolls in the hay, which makes her look and feel like a slut.

One girl I was fucking made sure she woke up before me to fix her makeup and hair so "I can be pretty for you all the time." She knew that as long as I allowed her to stick around she had a puncher's chance at getting a commitment from me. Regardless of SMV this is the way most women are when sleeping with a highvalue male.

"OMG I can't believe he actually likes ME!!!"

Every so often you'll find yourself confused as to why a pretty girl who makes herself available to you all time, makes you a priority, flirts with you hard, and rattles off rapid fire IOIs isn't sleeping with you. She knows that while you'd fuck her in a New York minute, she also knows that you're just too good for her and doesn't want her her fragile ego ruptured.

The way to get around this is not to DLV. The solution is to make her feel comfortable around you. Isolate her and make personal conversation with her to loosen her up. Make her feel like you're genuinely interested in her while giving her the impression that you won't stop calling her after you discover her true vapidity and lack of domestic agency.

Of course, if she's as useless as most American women you'll end up kicking her to the curb after a few bangs anyway but your game never tips your hand until you break the news to her that she's been benched or taken out of the starting lineup.

Take Away

Most women in this part of the world will reward you with sex for being a taker without giving much in return, being a complete dick most of the time, and being an extraordinarily high value male. I'd even go as far as to say that most of them prefer it that way.

There are also girls who won't give you the time of day unless you're an asshole through and through, don't give them anything but your dick and kick them out after the dirty deed is done, and will throw themselves at you knowing full well you'd never entertain thoughts of committing to her. These women are out there but they are the exceptions.

To sum things up, use asshole game accordingly but don't be a frat boy, take more than you give but maintain a ratio that keeps her motivated, and dial back your power level every so often when you sense a hottie knows she's in over her skis with you.

Until next time, gents.

Read Next: Girls Are Fundamentally Lazy

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Terrible Mother Who Took Her Kids To Syria Now Wants To Leave Islamic State

June 30, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> "They want to come home," she said. "My daughter made the mistake of a lifetime. Today she is a parent alone in a foreign and vicious land looking after a widowed 14-year-old and four other young children."
>
> – Karen Nettleton, the mother of Tara Nettleton, quoted in The Sydney Morning Herald

Tara Nettleton is an Australian currently living in the self-proclaimed Islamic State. Last year, she took her five children, via Malaysia, to Syria. Her husband, the now possibly dead Khaled Sharrouf, was already there as an Islamic State fighter.

Sharrouf became infamous for beheading Syrian soldiers, even getting one of his sons, a mere 7-year-old, to hold up a severed head on social media for all the world to see. Recent reports claim that the avowed jihadist survived a drone attack.

Nettleton's family members, her Sydney-based mother Karen in particular, have been seeking media outlets of late, desperately calling for the Australian government to allow Tara and the children to return. Australian Prime Minister Tony Abbott, sensibly, is insisting that Tara Nettleton will be charged (and almost certainly convicted) for both supporting terrorism and taking part in an illegal foreign conflict.

Wanting to avoid this, the family has engaged the services of a prominent Sydney barrister and is resorting to treating Tara as if she were a victim.

This is the life Tara Nettleton has knowingly and passionately brought her children to.

This self-pitying narrative is based on nothing but a pack of lies. Tara Nettleton's husband had been convicted and jailed years ago for plotting terrorist attacks intended to kill scores in Australia. To argue that she made a "mistake" in taking herself and the five children to Syria after her husband had shown strong desires to kill people in Australia is nothing but a pathetic insult to any half-conscious human being aware of the news cycle.

Importantly, Nettleton was aware of the deplorable situation already existing in Syria, where the forces of Bashar al-Assad and often secular rebels had been engaged in bloody battles for three years.

Sadly, defending Tara Nettleton's shocking and purely criminal abuse of her vulnerable children represents yet another attempt to invoke femininity and motherhood so a woman avoids any responsibility for her actions. This is a theme I have already explored in the case of mothers killing their children, notably after the breakdown of a marriage.

Truly heinous acts towards children, including exposing them to the risk of death and inevitable psychological horror within a mass-murdering terrorist caliphate, are still perceived by many in society as only the domain of fathers, not mothers.

How is Tara's use and endangerment of her children not child abuse?

Tara Nettleton loved posting about her glorious life with fellow jihadi wives. Then it got hard and her gender became a most useful tool to try and stoke sympathy.

Thanks to a conscious, flagrantly premeditated and ideological decision, Tara Nettleton's children are irrevocably scarred. The sons of hers involved in the handling of severed human heads will be adversely impacted until their final breaths, if they are lucky enough to live beyond their childhoods.

More than aware of the brand of Islam she and her husband were following, Nettleton would have additionally realized that her daughters would be married off to much older men while still minors. In the case of one, a 14-year-old, she was betrothed to her husband's best friend, who was killed in the same attack that may or may not have killed Sharrouf.

Only the smallest glimpses of the children's lives have been captured on social media, so we have no way of knowing what other innumerable mental and psychiatric tortures they have been exposed to.

And this is where Tara Nettleton's mother Karen and the rest of her family enter the picture. Of course, Ms. Nettleton wants the safe return of her daughter and five grandchildren. But she veers into pure nonsense when she equates the children's plight with Tara's:

> I don't want my daughter and grandchildren to be collateral damage in this shameful and tragic war.

If Tara Nettleton dies, she is not "collateral damage." She has been an active supporter of Islamic State. Her belief in this self-proclaimed caliphate was so strong that she abandoned the comparatively secure anchoring of her children in Australia and took them to a land plagued by civil war, where even the privileged children of Syrian government elites and other functionaries have died in the resulting carnage.

It is also poignant to remember that we would not engage in any such discourse about adult victimhood if a father had taken his children to a bloodied land like Syria to purposefully live in a terrorist state.

The constant, unequivocal denial of female agency

You know you've done horrendous things when your mother has to post your childhood pictures in the media to gain sympathy.

Thankfully, the desperate PR campaign of Tara's family is failing to cast her in a better light. No major, remotely reputable public figures have come out in support of her, nor should they. Although one would hope that the children are removed to safety, Tara's choices have ensured that this will probably not be the case.

So what can we glean from this situation?

Firstly, the compulsive drive to defend the indefensible when it comes to selfish and criminal female behavior is yet to die. Like Karla Faye Tucker, the opportunist murderer executed in Texas, gender is used and abused to try and spare women from either culpability or the fate they bring upon themselves. What is troubling is that families and other supporters know that this strategy, however far removed from reality it is, usually has a good chance of succeeding.

Secondly, it is possible to make out some rough contours of where this defense is rejected by modern society. As a grouping, we must define and utilize these boundaries more effectively. And then we must redraw them according to what should be their proper limits.

Whether it's the perennially excused female sexual abuse of teenage minors and other underage children, female-perpetrated homicide, or mothers taking their kids to a terrorist hotspot and then supporting terrorism within it, the pussy passes afforded to blatantly criminal women must end.

Read More: Understanding The Ideology Behind The Islamic State

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Ways To Optimize Your Return On Investment

June 30, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by FDT ForexMaster

Let's rewind back to the fall of 2011. In public spaces (especially left-leaning cities like New York and Vancouver) a motley crew of professional protesters gathered to outcry against the "evils" of capitalism and the resulting perceived inequality that it causes.

But there was one vital thing that was missing from this group: financial literacy. While it's tough to disagree that banks were engaging in some risky behaviour pre-2008, from an educated perspective it would be intellectually irresponsible to see this as an indictment of capitalism entirely.

The beauty of financial literacy is being able to understand the complexities of capitalism and finance. At its core, capitalism works. It allows for success without discrimination, whether your name is Bruce or Caitlyn, Darnell or Xiao Wang. The deeper your understanding of finance, the more doors open for different avenues of success.

Here are three tips to keep in mind when investing:

1. Look where others aren't

Ironically, the largest and most liquid financial market is also the least well-known. Most Occupiers wouldn't be able to tell you about the foreign exchange market, which involves the trading of currencies shifting in value against one another. The forex market dwarfs the stock market in size and speed, as it trades $4 trillion a day and is open 24 hours a day during the workweek.

The forex market is how currencies derive their value. Investors buy and sell currencies based on technical data, or their assessment of a country's political and economic well-being. It's capitalism in its purest form and for the most part it's a market free of manipulation.

2. Educate yourself

Understanding the forex market is key to understanding finance and capitalism as a whole. After all, money is everything — it forms the basis for every other market out there. Without money — or currencies, which form the entire foundation of the forex market — there would be no international trade, no stocks, and no markets at all.

But trading forex is fast and furious. The market moves quickly and there are no breaks. Professional traders say that those looking to get into trading forex should do so slowly, as the possibility of losing your entire principle is very real. You simply can't afford to be a risky or foolish trader.

3. Jump in

A great way to learn how to trade forex is through an app called "ForexMaster."

ForexMaster, which costs nothing to use and is risk-free, allows users to practice trading forex and compete against others from around the world for real cash in real time.

Anyone that proves themselves to be a consistently profitable trader has the chance to participate in FDT's incubator program, where they will have the opportunity to receive seed capital to manage a real, funded trading account. As users progress through the incubator program they will have more and more responsibility as a trader—and take home a bigger and bigger cut of their earnings. It's the light at the end of the tunnel for those that prove themselves as traders.

FDT Incubator gives you one of the most red pill opportunities of all: financial self-reliance. Some of ForexMaster's top users don't come from traditional finance backgrounds, but still have thrived in the trading space.

Or maybe you'd prefer to hold hands and sing songs in the park. Your choice.

Download FDT ForexMaster and start your forex trading career today.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

British Woman Allegedly Consents To Rough Sex, Calls Cops When It Gets Too Rough

July 1, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A British woman has had a man convicted of assault after engaging in what appears to be consensually rough sex with him, after it got allegedly too rough for her tastes. Elizabeth Sandlin, 20, of Chester, had been having an 'on-off' relationship with Samuel John Price, 24, also of Chester.

For his trouble, Price was brought before the courts and sentenced to a 12-month community order with unpaid work for the assault.

If you can’t stand the heat, get out of the kitchen

Sandlin met Price and they ended up in bed together on Valentine’s Day after an exchange of text messages. The especially rough sex they had that night included sinking his teeth into her body and pulling her hair. She called the police after leaving his apartment in a taxi cab.

Price told police that Sandlin had been “moaning” and enjoying herself, and that he bit her on the bottom to turn her on.

The white knights of the Magistrates’ bench in Mold, North Wales sided with Sandlin, and convicted Price of common assault on the after being shown pictures of the bruising on Sandlin’s body. He was slapped with a £200 compensation order, court costs of £850 and 40 hours of unpaid work, or “community service.”

Western women have no honour

There would have been a time when a woman would, even had she felt, in a position like Sandlin's, aggrieved at a bit of rough hanky-panky gone awry, never have entertained the notion of airing such laundry in public. Now, snowflakes like Sandlin, who attended a £11,700 a year private school, are ready to have the graphic detail of their sex lives on the court record and in a national newspaper.

Price's lawyer told the magistrates that, "Rough and playful sex was part of their relationship." Sandlin knew what she had signed up for. On the night in question, Price being extremely drunk, things got out of hand.

Price was getting into it and even choked his cohort, after which she ran off to the bathroom coughing. But, surprisingly, she still went back to bed. What better way to send mixed signals about sex that is supposedly "too rough"?

Sandlin, had she even a dram of that commodity so rare in our present times—honour—would, before calling the police, have taken stock of the situation. Yes, Price might have gone over the top. But what had been the result? A couple of bruises. No more than she might have incurred in any of their other rough sessions.

She might have decided to write the incident off, perhaps never see Price again, but opt not to call the police on the basis of some remote empathy and willingness to see the big picture, that dictates that to leave a young man with a criminal record for life is something of a drastic and irreversible step.

But no, Sandlin had to invoke the get the police involved. Roosh Valizadeh has written that men are nothing more than clowns to the modern woman. It looks like Elizabeth Sandlin had the clown she wanted. Regular, casual sex on tap, and rough into the bargain. Just how much of a replaceable clown-for-hire Price was to her is given away by one small detail revealed—she stopped seeing him for six months when he broke his leg.

The evolving role of the state in policing sexual relations

In the end, the police in Elizabeth Sandlin's case ended up as a surrogate for the customer service department of the fuck-clown factory.

Western women are drip fed on the idea of empowerment through casual, hypergamous sex with no personal, ethical, or medical consequences, or what we in the manosphere like to term the "Cock Carousel." Different forms of Western female excess have informed many recent scandals.

At the milder end of the scale, washed out Tinder sluts are airing their dirty laundry and becoming indignant at the slightest criticism:

At the more acute end of things, women are flying to Dubai and letting rich Arabs shit on them for money.

Although women are reassured time and time again that they should do what they fancy, that any attempt to rein in their sexuality is “slut shaming” and that notch count doesn’t matter, it all too often and too inevitably ends in tears. See Alana Massey’s early and brutal impact with the wall above, for instance.

It seems that most mechanisms intended to absolve women of responsibility for their actions, such affirmative consent, have heretofore only tended to hurt feelings in the wake of even the most unassuming of sexual encounters.

The case of Elizabeth Sandlin is quite different, and constitutes a worrying precedent. It now seems that women can follow 50 Shades of Grey to the letter, as they have been readily encouraged to do, but once it all goes tits-up, rather than manning up and moving on, they now have the capacity to invoke the long arm of the law to come and clear up the mess afterwards.

Pretty soon, we may even have British police smashing down doors and arresting a British man for failing to sufficiently satisfy his partner in the sack, with magistrates happily handing out prison time as punishment for the hapless sap’s deficiency in the line of duty.

Read More: British Gender Huckster Receives Top Royal Honour For Complaining About Gender Inequality

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

Game And The Problem Of Changing One's Personality

July 1, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the elements of game that is little discussed but which has been an issue for me and other players that I know is the dissociating psychological effect that adopting a "game persona" can cause.

If not properly handled, this is something that can stymie a man's success with women, or at least put a glass ceiling on it. Fortunately, awareness of the problem and a couple of simple precautions can help matters considerably.

Dissociation

What do I mean by dissociation? Broadly, this is the feeling of inadequacy, or not-being-good-enough that guys can experience when they adopt the cocky-funny persona of the jerk or hot guy that gets girls.

Now, before you rush to the comments section to deride me for suggesting that people be something they’re not, I should point out that the essence of game is accentuating one’s more attractive qualities while turning the volume down on those that will yield a vaginal Sahara in your wake.

The field experience of thousands of men over the last decade reveals that women are most attracted to men who over-index on disparaging humour, entitlement, and arrogance. It is my belief that all guys have these attributes somewhere deep within in them even if they’ve been subdued by years of social conditioning.

The job of a good game instructor or pick-up coach is to help his student access and emphasize these characteristics while dealing with girls. But this doesn’t come without a price.

The former beta male, when required to project the alpha vibes of a school jock who’s enjoyed female attention for years, is a naturally going to feel a little unusual to say the least. The problem, though, is that these strategies work. But the man who utilises them and see his results leap may well continue to feel uncomfortable even as he experiences female approval and validation in the form of sex.

The Field Frequently Reveals Uncomfortable Truths

As a former ‘nice guy’ (albeit one who had occasionally pulled girls before on an inconsistent basis) most of the behaviours that made me successful at meeting women were learned rather than intuitive. It was reading books, websites, and internet forums that taught me that being assumptive, ”flipping the script” and making out that a hot girl is chasing you rather than the other way around actually amps up her attraction rather than earning you a slap round the face.

Faking it to make it is more likely to get you laid than see her questioning your sanity. I am someone who has pretty much always learned to do things through books, and pick-up was no different. But however much I read, nothing could have prepared me for the positive reactions of girls when I accused them of checking me out (even when they weren’t) or of trying to turn the conversation towards sex, or of fantasising about having sex with me (even when they weren’t).

At first the benefits were obvious and enjoyable. But I couldn’t – and sometimes still can’t – help feeling conscious of that gap between how the girls I sleep with view me and how I view myself (or used to, at least). I read an article recently (I think it was by the British PUA Krauser) that said that women’s solipsism benefits the player by creating social proof, because once you’ve slept with her she will naturally imagine that all other girls want to sleep with you as well.

The reality, of course, is that you might easily get blown out by the next woman you speak to. It doesn’t matter – perception is king. But that female solipsism, and the kind of hero-worship that it raises in a girl you’ve banged can feel incongruous to the man who has spent a lot of his life suffering from low self-esteem or even disliking himself.

There have been many times when I've hung out with girls who've kept asking me if I'm "always like this," or "how many other girls I've done this with," no doubt imagining that I was some kind of Don Juan from birth. While going along with it my mind has often cried out, unable to understand how she can have read me so wrong and not realised that the devil-may-care seducer getting her pussy wet is so different to the person that I am underneath – or that I was before game, at least.

The net effect of all this is a feeling of artificiality, even loneliness. At times it can seem odd that the women I let into my life, even for a short time, don't really know the first thing about me, about my life, my struggle to become what I am today – a socially adept guy who can meet women like the naturals I went to school with.

But here's the thing – girls don't care about my life, about my struggle. They care only for the tingles that an alpha gives them. Because I enjoy having sex – which I think is a fundamental pillar of any human being's life – I have had to accentuate the right characteristics in order to get by.

What to Do About Dissociation

If you find yourself experiencing these feeling of disassociation then my best advice to you is to seek out male friends with whom you can discuss them. Close guy friends won't judge you – in fact they will more than likely admire you for making positive changes. They will support you, and give you the strength that you need as you become accustomed to your new persona.

And don't get down about putting on a false front – you're not, you're simply presenting the best sales case for your product (you) in the manner that the current market demands.

And whatever you do don't decide to drop game and "just be yourself." Women won't thank you for it and you will quickly find yourself as lonely as a MGTOW with a fresh tube of lube and an expired X-Art subscription.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why The Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need To Learn Game

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Battle Over Public Libraries Shows How Sweden Continues To Push A Cultural Marxist Narrative

July 1, 2015 | by Prince Prospero | Link | Original Link

Any ROK reader is painfully aware of the degenerated hypocrisy the average Tumblr feminist or Twitter SJW share to the world. If you live in the Western world today, you do not have to go through the pains of looking at Sweden to find examples of this.

However, a glimpse at Sweden will show you how these people will behave once they come into a position of power and what policies they will implement. A recent debate in Sweden illustrates this perfectly, and should serve as a looking glass into the future.

The Story

The debacle started when Paula Neuding wrote an article on the many reports of disturbances, theft, vandalism, sexual harassment and violence in Swedish libraries. Since I have not been able to read the report myself, I will have to take her word that the situation is deteriorating fast. Many libraries now need to have security guards, something unheard of a few decades ago, and some have chosen to close down complete during nighttime.

The response to this article surprised even a cynic like me. Paula Neuding was accused of being a racist! Apparently the words she used; gangs, beating his cousin for being a "whore," and youths spreading sunflower seeds did indicate that the majority of the troublemakers were MENA (Middle East or North Africa) immigrants.

Although the debate itself is completely pointless, since as society falls apart, libraries might not be the first priority to save, it does serve a purpose in exposing the progressives for what they are and how their corrupt behavior hurt the very same people they claim to protect.

Silence To Those Who Would Criticize Any Group

The pets of the lefties are always "vulnerable groups." Society should give extra care for women, immigrants, children and the poor, so the narrative goes. So who are targeted when the libraries collapse in anarchy? Well, the people not rich enough for owning their own library, the kids that need the tranquility of a library to handle school, the immigrants that want to learn Swedish to name a few.

This female refugee from Iran gives testimony that the library was her refuge from both an oppressive home and sexual harassment at school. A good friend of mine, also a refugee, learned Swedish by frequenting his local library as a kid. I myself remember the silent space between the shelves as an oasis of learning and exploration.

Many others that didn't really fit the clothes of a sport jock or bad boy chose to engage in reading instead. These are the people that are robbed of their sanctuary, and the thieves are the very same leftists that proclaim to be on their saviors. Pimp or SJW, can anyone remind me of the difference now again?

Let's take a closer look at the people that actually rally to the cause of shaming and silencing anyone addressing the growing chaos in the libraries. I will only include the croaking voices from those in power—the legions of no-name cultural dregs that holler on Twitter and girrrrl power blogs are not included.

The Opponents Of The Silence Norm

Niclas Lindberg, General Secretary of the Library Association, led the first hysterical attack on the racist whistleblower. This is the man that coined the term Silence Norm. In a tweet that reads "Should those that do not fit your norm adapt or stand outside?" he declared that asking visitors to keep the peace in a public library was a forcing them to adopt to a norm.

And as we all know, as soon as something is labeled a norm, it is a bad thing. As the crybaby he is, he later complained that he "had been painted a fool because he objects to the Silence Norm." So the very man in charge of the organization that proclaims that their mission is to "promote a library system of a high standard, to promote and develop the Swedish Library Act, and to promote libraries as a stronghold for democracy and freedom of expression” is objecting to the “norm” of not vandalizing the premises? Apparently yes.

Niclas Lindberg like his tie and shirt norm.

Gustav Almestad, librarian and columnist on the far left site Politism was the first to cry racist. He claims that with only more resources – read: “taxpayer money” – the libraries would be better places. However, his article in had little impact in any debate to increase the funds, but a lot more so to smear the racist stamp on anyone daring to talk about the troubles.

Preventing an Iranian immigrant from reading is apparently breaking a norm (something we can never have too much of) while telling an Iranian to stop bothering another Iranian is racist.

Gustav Almestad, who uses the handle “rough initiative” shares his tattoo to his friends.

Next up is Sebastian Lönnlöv, librarian, HBTQ activist and author of HBTQ – Books beyond the norm. According to his blog he has recently been though a gender identity investigation and after that something called a gender correction. As a blogger he prefers the name Tekoppen (the Teacup).

Sebastian Lönnlöv claims that the library no longer is a place for only reading, but an important meeting place in society, that also serves a purpose as a place for drunken people to sleep off the booze and homeless to find shelter. He ends his piece by proclaiming that the visitors are allowed to smell bad and be young and wild, since libraries are not for “a fine literary middleclass that want a space for themselves.”

Sebastian Lönnlov, before, after or possibly during his “gender correction.”

I believe that the final stroke that forever will silence any voices that dare to whisper of vandalism or violence in public libraries was dealt by Danjel Nam. Danjel writes for the State Radio and the feminist culture magazine Bang. His fame comes from a series of programs that focus on male Swedish sex tourists in Thailand and an ongoing struggle to stop the norm of racism against East Asian people in Sweden.

Danjel Nam sees racist people.

He released an “alarm” that rightwing extremists disturb the peace in the libraries. In his article he interviews the boy Wasam Jawad, a tender youth of 24. Wasam Jawad explains that he sometimes cause problems because he is too old for the recreation center.

Since he is unemployed and has “nothing to do” he comes to the library. If someone tells him to be quiet, he will do so if they show him enough respect, otherwise he feels like he is “being judged.” Finally Wasam Jawad tells us that he waits for someone to give him support so he can create a football team.

The article ends with a short description of the right wing extremists that threaten the peaceful libraries. Karin Linder, chair of the DIK Association (a union for culture workers) who gives the testimony, is herself very critical of the Swedish Democrats, the nationalist party that in recent polls have garnering 20% of the votes.

Following their suggestion for immigration policy is apparently right wing extremism. Please note that with that standard, all other European nations are right wing extremists, since their policy on immigration is similar to that suggested by the Swedish Democrats.

This is not mentioned in the article, but easily found on her own site, where she urges the Liberals, the Conservatives, the Social Democrats, the Communist Party and the Green party to ally against the Swedish democrats.

Karin Linder strikes a power-pose.

Apparently debates have been held at libraries, and sometimes, someone ask questions that are “hostile towards immigrants.” She describes the situation as threatening. The policy when “racist” questions are asked is to shut down the seminar. Dialogue police are routinely called in to support the staff after a seminar where participants asked the wrong questions.

My Reflections

I am happy that my immigrant friends came to Sweden in more right wing extremist times, when racist librarians told people of any creed or color to shut up while in the library. I am happy that the “norm” of human decency was inflicted upon them and I am happy that people back then was “hostile towards immigrants” if these immigrants kicked their own cousins on the library floor.

If they had arrived here today, the pimps posing as politicians, journalists, and union leaders would have thrown them to the wolves to stroke their own perverted egos and further their careers.

Note: Trigger warning! Google translate usually does a good job of decoding Swedish sites into English. However, most of the authors does not use the masculine Han (him) or the feminine Hon (she) in their texts but uses the new Swedish word Hen. It means him or her, but without offending anyone.

Read More: How “Trigger Warnings” Silence Dissent And Protect Fragile Egos

Prince Prospero

Prince Prospero is a white cis gender Swedish male and responsible for all suffering throughout history. When not oppressing minorities, women or purposefully destroying the environment, he enjoys reading, writing and exploring his new home, far, far away from Sweden.

5 Things I Learned From Becoming A Father

July 2, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

There are a lot of articles in the manosphere that discuss what it means to be a man. Some think that it means learning game. Others think that it means making gobs of money, developing a muscular body, becoming a martial arts badass, or hunting.

All of these are very good—and they are things we should all be working on. But what really made a difference for me was becoming a father with the birth of my son two years ago. Here are some of the things that being a father to a boy has taught me.

1. Newborns are exhausting

My son was born a few weeks early, just after I had started a new job that had an hour and half commute. The timing couldn't have been worse. I didn't have any vacation or sick time so I went back to work a day after he was born. I was exhausted.

Newborns wake up every two or three hours to be fed. Even if your wife is breast-feeding, you are going to end up waking up too. My wife and I are both rational people but the sleep deprivation really had a bad effect on us. We started to overreact and have arguments over the silliest things.

Things only calmed down once we figured out a schedule where we took turns and allowed opportunities for naps. If you are not a parent yet, this is golden advice. Learn to sleep whenever you can. It will save your marriage.

2. Boys need to be outside

First, I need to tell you a little bit about my son. The picture above shows boys faces based on the amount of testosterone that the baby received in the womb. The picture on the left depicts the more feminine face of a boy who received less testosterone while the picture on the right is of a boy who received a lot.

About a year ago I sent this picture to my wife and we had a good laugh because our son most resembles the picture on the far right. We've nicknamed our son "Brawny" because he is a stereotypical boy. He likes tools, cars, trucks, chainsaws, swords, and guns.

We have not consciously encouraged any of this behavior. It just happened. The whole male-female binary thing is real. It is not a cultural construct.

Probably the biggest thing I've noticed is that my kid could stay outside all day. It doesn't matter how cold or hot it is. He'll even stay out in the pouring rain if we let him. While he is outside, he can amuse himself for hours by throwing things, digging, jumping, and climbing.

When he is inside, though, he is less likely to play by himself even though he has plenty of toys. When he is inside, he needs more one-on-one attention.

My son's love of the outdoors made me realize why so many boys end up being diagnosed with attention deficit disorder. Our feminized public school system, where even recess and PE are frequently eliminated, is not conducive to the education of boys. If we don't end up homeschooling, we'll probably put our son in an all-boys school.

3. Raising a boy is more difficult now

When I was growing up, the path was pretty clear. Get into a good college, get good grades, and find a job. We could take the security and stability of the country for granted.

Times have changed. We live in a feminized society that treats boys as if they were defective girls. Anything masculine is frowned upon. There is even evidence that men are less masculine than they have been in the past. Studies have shown that men's testosterone levels are down 20% since the 1980s.

Now, the future of the United States is no longer so clear. The US has never recovered the jobs that it lost after the 2007 financial meltdown. The jobs that were created are either lower paying or they are part of the fracking boom.

Unchecked immigration has made it difficult assimilate new arrivals. This has weakened the commonalities that bind us together as a people. Meanwhile, racial tensions have been fanned to a fever pitch to benefit certain political groups. It's not hard to imagine that the US might begin to break apart in the coming decades.

It is no better in Europe. Large-scale immigration from Islamic countries combined with the Europeans unwillingness to be bothered with reproducing cannot have a happy ending.

For these reasons, I have to prepare my son for a variety of possible futures:

The Mad Max Scenario

#LoveWins

If society breaks down, the skills that our sons will need will include survival skills and proficiency at self-defense and firearms. They'll also need to know how to rebuild civilization so leadership, farming, military tactics, and engineering will all come in handy.

The SJW Police State Scenario

The more likely future is a complete takeover of society by the SJWs. This will result in a police state where the necessary skills will be proficiency at the Common Core and the ability to not let on that you are guilty of thought crime.

My current plans are to try to give my son a classical education. That is, I want him to read the Greek and Roman classics as well as their Christian successors. I want him to have at least one foreign language as well as Latin. I will train him to appreciate literature and poetry and not just parse New York Times articles.

Following the Latin phrase, mens sana in corpore sano, I will try to balance his intellectual development with physical activity such as fencing, martial arts, swimming, hunting and fishing, and any team sports that he may show interest in.

4. Fatherhood cramps your lifestyle

Before I got married, I worked hard, trained martial arts, dated women, read a lot, and traveled. Getting married didn't change my life too much (apart from the dating women part), but having a kid did.

Since the birth of our son, I no longer do martial arts, I read a whole lot less, and my television watching is nearly non-existent. When I get home, I spend all my time with my son. I don't regret it though because it has allowed me to witness so many "firsts" like his first steps. I've also developed a tight bond with my son that I would not be able to have otherwise.

I think the trend in our culture is for parents to try to "get back to normal" after having a child. What this means is getting back to doing what they did before they were parents. There is nothing wrong with enjoying yourself, but if it is taken to an extreme, the children become accessories.

I am not a big fan of Pope Francis, but he once told parents to "waste time with your children." I think it is excellent advice.

5. Fatherhood has focused my career

I wish I had had children sooner because having a child has really given me incredible focus. Before having my son, I would go in cycles. Sometimes I would work really hard and make great strides, but there were also periods of coasting where I made no progress.

Since becoming a father, I have really started to focus on career in a good way. Now, oddly, I have become less risk averse and more entrepreneurial. I even notice that I have more concentration. There is some evidence that becoming a father actually makes men more intelligent, at least temporarily, so maybe that is the reason. Whatever the cause, I like my new business drive and focus.

Conclusion

Overall, becoming a father is the best thing I have ever done and I highly recommend it to every man. Don't wait until you are "ready" as conditions will never be perfect to have a kid.

Read More: Two Movies That Showcase The Invisible Caring Father

Michael Sebastian

Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Feminists Rage Spiral When Teenager Shows What Young Women Will Do For $120

July 2, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Grisha Mamurin, the grandson of one of Russia's richest oligarchs, Igor Nekludov, has been the subject of online rage for posting videos of women kissing him and showing their breasts for money. Various outlets, decidedly or implicitly feminist, or just covering the regular news cycle, have described the different scenarios as "degrading" or "humiliating".

Virtually no mainstream commentators, unless you count members of the public in discussion sections, have sought to hold the girls accountable for their conscious choice to strip naked for or kiss Mamurin in view of perhaps hundreds of fellow Russians.

Because Mamurin's asking price was only the equivalent of $120 (a larger sum in Russia but by no means massive), the scenes raise alarming questions about the extent to which many women will perform certain sexual acts for money. In addition, there has been a subsequent and all-encompassing infantilization of these girls by feminists.

These compulsive SJWs, unsurprisingly, solely blame the male offering the financial incentive for the perceived degradation and humiliation. The logically pervasive theme of their explanations, though they would deny it, is that large numbers of women cannot control themselves when asked to perform for only a moderate sum of money. So imagine the lack of self-control and self-determination if that figure were $12,000 or $120,000, not $120.

Filming naked people without consent is wrong, but why are these women excused for exposing themselves in public?

I have previously made it clear that I vehemently oppose the naked or otherwise sexual filming of people without their consent. Not only is it stupid, considering the consequences of prosecution and conviction for a man, I believe it should be illegal to begin with.

But critics of Mamurin have ignored the biggest question: why are they dismissing the women exposing themselves in public? In Russia, like most countries, that's a legally-punishable offense. These women could have had no idea how many people nearby could see what, unless they possessed 360-degree panoramic vision capable of keeping perfect track of every detail.

Moreover, at least dozens and probably hundreds of people are walking around when these women begin stripping down and baring their breasts. The example of this girl stripping for money is especially illuminating. Mothers are pushing strollers with infants and toddlers in them; boys aged ten or younger are skipping past; pensioners are seen ambling along.

Any feminist who claims that these videos are degrading and humiliating can only make such claims safely when they concede the girls are fundamentally degrading and humiliating themselves. If they don't know there's a camera rolling (which may not even be true), they do know throngs of people around them are able to see their mammaries and scant underwear.

The wider context of denying female agency

The hypocritical rage against Mamurin needs to be construed in the context of feminism more broadly. Multitudinous narratives and legal fictions have been progressively employed by modern societies to deny females any responsibility for their own sexualization.

Jurisdictions such as Iceland have banned strip clubs on the basis that these establishments involve the unequivocal infliction of “male violence” upon women. Despite many women at these bars earning better salaries than computer programmers and engineers, these laws treat these girls as if they’re Somalian sex slaves begging for bread crusts at the feet of AK-47-wielding ISIS or al-Qaeda-affiliated Islamic militants.

In reality, they bring home significantly more than many or most of their male patrons.

The infamous and poorly justified Nordic model of prostitution is also spreading rapidly, having started in Sweden. Norway and other nations have joined the enthusiasm for it, even going so far as to criminalize men using prostitutes abroad, one of the rare uses of extraterritorial legal provisions.

With no evidence that even close to a plurality of prostitutes are trafficked or otherwise forced into the industry, women offering sexual services are never prosecuted. This is anomalous, as a number of Swedish surveys have indicated that support for the Nordic model is tempered by a desire for prostitutes themselves to be prosecuted for selling sex.

Women need to take responsibility for their own sexualization

If we accept the feminist narrative, this wealthy prostitute, who had sex with New York Governor Eliot Spitzer, is a victim of male violence. She earns more than the vast majority of Americans for selling her vaginal cavity.

The feminist and associated vitriol over Grisha Mamurin’s filming of financially-savvy girls is really just a cry of desperation. Most strands of feminism only breathe through the systematic suffocation and hiding of evidence, or the violent censoring of reasonable discourse.

True to their love of confirmation bias, they start with their presuppositions and then use 2% of the available information, this snippet itself grossly distorted and sucked dry, to construct an artificial ethos with which they can terrorize masculinity and eternally resuscitate female victimhood.

Reality is hard, particularly for feminists. Women have choices when they choose to enrich themselves via the medium of showing their breasts, tongue-tying with men, or dating and marrying into higher stations to seize the lifestyle they crave.

The perennially dreamed about magnum opus of feminists is the extinction of any sexual responsibility for women, and an attendant demonization of any sexual impulse expressed by men.

Read More: "Manspreading" Shows The Social Retardation Of Young Women

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Develop Your Presence

July 2, 2015 | by Rórdán Phobos | Link | Original Link

Everyone remembers that moment they walked into the foyer, maybe in a hotel or a board room, and saw him.

Boom.

A man that had power.

He exuded confidence and that intangible something else that rocks stars, politicians, warlords and the truly successful all have. It didn't matter if he was wearing a $5,000 suit or blue jeans. People instinctively formed a half circle around him and hinged on his words.

Now fast forward to you. You learned game, became a master of your trade, started lifting weights and lost that extra 20 pounds you picked up in college. But despite all of that something just keeps missing when you walk into the boardroom or get up in front of a crowd.

Welcome to the art of poise.

Poise is typically defined as "graceful and elegant bearing in a person." In more archaic terms it means "balance or equilibrium."

The gifted few are born with this. The rest of us have to develop it.

Two Kinds Of Poise

Two forms of this typically exist. We have all met the guy who exudes power like it is pulsing out of his pores. Likewise good performers are often described as magnetic. Literally, you can't keep your eyes off of them.

Both of these are trained through a similar mechanism with different goals. For purposes of providing some definition to what we are discussing, people who exude power can be referred to as electric. People who you cannot keep your eyes off of can be referred to as magnetic. Even Charles Atlas mentioned a method for "developing a magnetic personality" in his book on dynamic tension.

Going electric tends to make people defer to you and trigger their awareness when you walk into the room. If you need people to view you as the guy in charge this is the way to go. Animals, when you really have this down, will view you as a potential threat and can have some interesting reactions to this. If you decide to practice at a zoo, make sure the beasts can't get through the guard rails.

On the other hand, going magnetic is what you want to do when you are performing in front of a crowd and need to draw an audience in. Good actors and public speakers do this instinctively.

Get Into Posture

Now to the nuts and bolts of how to generate this effect.

For electric, stand up and balance on the balls of your feet. Curl your tailbone under just a hair and stand perfectly upright as if you are pulling the spine erect from the top of the crown.

Next, while holding your feet in place, apply tension so they want to turn outwards without actually moving.

Finally, hold your arms just below shoulder level straight ahead and push from the end of the fingertips outwards. You should feel all of your joints open.

Now hold this position while breathing softly. After 20-30 seconds you should begin to feel a kind of electric sensation pulsing out of your fingertips. That is the electric sensation.

The magnetic sensation works similarly with a reversal of a few key details.

Stand up and balance on the heels of your feet. Stick your tailbone out just a hair and stand perfectly upright as if you are spreading the spine erect from the base of the head and the sacrum at the same time.

Next, while holding your feet in place, apply tension so they want to turn inwards without actually moving.

Finally, hold your arms just below shoulder level straight ahead and open the joints in your arms as if someone were pulling on your wrists.

Now hold this position while breathing softly. After 20-30 seconds you should begin to feel a kind of magnetic sensation drawing across your skin into your core. That is the magnetic sensation.

Work with these sensations a few times until you can generate them at will. As subtle phenomena, this will take a few tries.

Start Your Power Walk

The most efficient way to work on this is to practice while walking. On a physiological level, this targets the fasciae tissue in the body and when properly performed over time you will begin to feel the fasciae twist around your core as you move.

Get up about an hour early and before showering go outside. It is best to do this when few people are about as the presence of others can easily break your attention and focus.

Working with the electric phenomena is easiest while moving for most people.

This time enter your electric posture with your hand pointed straight into the ground. Now walk with your right hand coming forward and your left foot coming forward. When doing this you are walking left hand-right foot and right hand-left foot.

Other people watching you will simply see someone that is walking with a very straight and focused posture.

Spend 30 minutes a day doing this. Overtime, this tends to creep into how you carry yourself in general. If your back starts to bother you in the meantime, go see a chiropractor.

Your mental state when you practice this is important and tends to influence how people perceive you over time as well. So, if you are always angry when you practice this, people will begin to view you as an angry guy. I have no idea how this works, but I've seen this manifest often enough to be aware of it. So when you practice, try to maintain a good, or at least neutral, mood.

Walking while generating the magnetic phenomena takes a little more practice, but given time you will figure it out.

On the plus side doing either method does a good job of properly adjusting the spine and tends to reduce both back pain and the need to have manipulative therapy/chiropractic performed.

After about a week you should notice a difference in how people look at you. You still need to have the rest of your life together to get things done, but people will now give you that first look that gets things started.

Read More: 3 Easy Hacks To Develop A Dominant Presence

Rórdán Phobos
Rórdán Phobos is a former airman who has travelled to over 40 countries, lives in a converted barn and once travelled to Srinagar to buy his grandfather a Kashmiri carpet for his 92nd birthday. When he isn't building armies, or police forces, in the third world he can be found in a bar talking to your girl. For training and advice in the yogic arts go to yogicengineering.com

Female Intern Awarded $18 Million Because Her Boss Asked For Sex And Wrote Mean Things On The Internet

July 3, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Hanna Bouveng, a mere former intern of Wall Street CEO Benjamin Wey, has been awarded $18 million in compensatory and punitive damages for both defamation and sexual harassment. One of the key findings of the court in relation to the claimed sexual harassment is that Wey "panted over" Bouveng and requested sex repeatedly.

Keen to dig her ex-boss' social grave further, Bouveng made a point of mentioning that Wey lasted a grand total of two minutes during coitus. Interestingly, the gargantuan $18 million figure is much more than the standard or even above-average settlement given to those contracting terminal cancer due to negligence or other malfeasance, those permanently paralyzed by the actions or omissions of others, or those who lose a limb and thus have their whole life and mobility turned upside down.

The defamation aspect of the case is the most surprising part, as most people usually predict that the sexual harassment component would provide the bulk of the judicially-sanctioned award. In this climate of "lose $5 million just for touching a woman," that's what would make sense in a nonsensical sort of way.

Nevertheless, $16 million was awarded for punitive damages concerning the defamation, the worst of which was Wey smearing Bouveng in his webzine publication and sending her father correspondence about finding her in bed with another man. The CEO of New York Global Group told Bouveng's father that the second man was homeless, drunk and potentially on drugs.

If the harassment went on for so long, why didn't Bouveng just leave? Harassment is wrong, but women are pathetically not expected to have any responsibility for extracting themselves from these difficult situations. Are they automatons or human beings?

Let's be clear: Benjamin Wey grossly crossed the line here. Although I'm not convinced that everything he said about her wasn't true (after all, how can you prove or disprove anything that's he-said-she-said?), him resorting to attacking her in his webzine was spectacularly stupid. It plays right into the hands of any half-aware and remotely savvy woman who wants to take a former male lover and employer to the proverbial cleaners in a courtroom.

The different avenues for jaded or otherwise revenge-seeking women to seek redress nowadays are beyond numerous. In addition, female plaintiffs, or complainants to the police in the case of alleged crimes, are held accountable for vexatious and unfounded (or blatantly false) assertions so rarely that their numbers should be considered insignificant.

If a man miraculously "proves" his innocence (at least a third and typically more than half of society always regards him as guilty), his name is indelibly tarred with the original allegations. In civil cases across a range of jurisdictions, many legal costs are not awardable to the defendant a judge rules in favor of.

Moreover, most plaintiffs usually have far less money than the defendants they are going after, and so in a great deal of instances the latter group have no real chance of recovering any of the substantial fees they spend trying to defend themselves, let alone counter-suing for defamation or via some other method.

Screw the boss and then get a massive fortune that people who are maimed for life never get

This woman lost her legs due to medical negligence. Would she get $18 million, even if it were a private hospital? Of course not.

If anything, Hanna Bouveng's massive financial windfall demonstrates the hypergamy, both romantic and socio-judicial, that woman can freely seek nowadays. You can screw your multimillionaire boss and it's largely impossible for a court to find that any subsequent suit pertaining to sexual harassment is either frivolous and savagely opportunistic or mendacious.

And that same court is apt to come to your rescue, presenting you with millions, while the lazy bludgers and battlers (the amputees, the war veterans, those struck by incurable tumors and cancers because of someone else's oversight or greed) are endowed with a pittance of Bouveng's $18 million despite the lifetime of suffering or imminent death that awaits them.

You would be foolish to think that this happens only in America. In Australia, Kristy Fraser-Kirk tried to sue mammoth Australian retailer David Jones for AU$37 million over alleged sexual harassment by one of the company's male executives. She eventually found her way into a AU$850,000 settlement based on claims not fully tested in court, including the executive supposedly pulling her bra strap.

I don't condone such behavior, when it is fairly and vigorously proven, but $850,000 is more than many Australian workers got after contracting mesothelioma (a devastatingly brutal form of cancer) from the brazen negligence of the corporation James Hardie.

A famous politician falsely accused of being a pedophile on NATIONAL television was awarded just $300,000

[image]

Lord McAlpine was falsely accused of being a long-term pedophile. $300,000 is all he got from the woefully culpable BBC. Why? Courts and society need more sex crime convictions, so McAlpine was just collateral damage and not worth the sort of money doled out to a precious Hanna Bouveng.

Disgustingly, men falsely accused of pedophilia, the most socially reviled crime in our society, never receive anywhere near the sum that has landed in Hanna Bouveng's lap. Similar injustices greet men wrongly labeled as "regular" rapists. The best contemporary example of this farce was that of Lord McAlpine, the late respected British Conservative politician. He was given a paltry £185,000 (less than US$300,000 today) over a BBC program that referred to him as an historical pedophile.

Unlike the Bouveng-Wey debacle, this was across national television in the United Kingdom, stoked by the flurry of child sex allegations that had been recently thrown around about the dead British comedian Jimmy Saville. Given Lord McAlpine's prominent profile over many decades as a leading politician and member of the nobility, people knew who he was and his reputation suffered disastrously as a result.

His plight may not have been the subject of litigation, but it is beyond safe to assert that this represented the maximum amount he could expect to extract from the BBC via the legal system.

It's worth noting that, irrespective of whether Benjamin Wey's statements about her were defamatory, Bouveng was not accused of a truly deplored felony, let alone one that frequently results in entire communities hunting down and shaming purported perpetrators in a manner like with allegations of pedophilia.

Where is the balance?

Kristy Fraser-Kirk wanted AU$37 million and her final settlement of AU$850,000 was still ludicrous.

Sexual harassment does exist, but the threshold for proving it is so painfully substandard nowadays that the flimsiest of accusations amounts to a verifiable conviction in the eyes of public and judicial opinion. Consistently as well, sexual harassment, which is often just a variety of bullying, is considered so heinous a “crime” that it outranks the suffering of those who are deprived of their literal lives or limbs. If this is not the case, why do the court settlements perpetually reflect this?

Balance must be restored. Hanna Bouveng deserved something closer to $18, not $18 million.

Read More: Billionaire Leaves Greedy Daughter $3 Million, Judge Orders She Get $25 Million

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Bridge The Gap Between Thai And Western Dating Culture

July 3, 2015 | by Steve Bain | Link | Original Link

In a previous article about Thai girls and their dating potential for us westerners, I set out why I believe that the ladies from the land of smiles are a viable option for a serious romance now that economic development in Thailand had introduced a more mainstream sort of visitor to the country for work and business purposes.

It occurs to me that I left my first article with a bit of a cliff-hanger ending. Having argued that regular Thai girls are showing interest in finding Western boyfriends these days, I then continued with the bad news that the culture-gap is so large between Thailand and the west that most of us are not particularly well suited to serious romantic attachment to a Thai lady at all.

Here are a few things you should know so that this generalization may not apply to you:

The Culture Gap

The first thing to note about the culture gap is that life in Thailand feels much more conservative and traditional. It makes you think of a time before we all started locking our front-doors and shutting ourselves off from our neighborhoods and communities. There's less pressure to fall inline with the daily grind of work, pay the mortgage, watch TV, sleep and repeat.

With regard to Thai girls, the first and last thought of the day for many of them is focused on "sanuk" i.e. having fun. This is an important point; life in Thailand is much more about enjoying the moment, there's no concern for political correctness and not much thought given to the future consequences of actions taken today.

Another overriding divide between Thai culture and Western culture is the way in which Thais enjoy doing things as a group. With the exception of bedroom activities there's not much in life that your average Thai doesn't prefer to do in the company of friends and family.

The downside to this, from a Western point of view, is the loss of independence that you have to accept if you want to become a part of the group. Don't underestimate how much you value your independence—most of us in the west have been weaned on it, and it isn't an easy thing to give up.

Before continuing, I'd let to set your minds at ease with regard to an issue that cropped up in the comments after my previous article; you do NOT need to worry about mistakenly ending up dating a Thai ladyboy. The whole ladyboy issue is massively over-hyped; if you want to avoid the ladyboys then you will not struggle to do so.

Back to the culture gap… to give an idea of what it would be like for you in a relationship with a Thai girl, I'll describe a few of the main components of daily life in Thailand.

Thai Girls And Cultural Norms

Family Hierarchy

I already mentioned that life in Thailand is a bit like a bygone age in the west. One respect that fits with that assessment is the respect Thais have for their elders. If you want romance with Thai girls, you're going to need to be very respectful towards her parents and you're going to need to accept a great deal of involvement by them in everyday decision making.

Every family has a hierarchy and even if you are dating a girl that is significantly younger than you are, you are still going to need to fit in with your "in-laws" wishes about lots of things. If you have become too accustomed to going your own way then you are going to struggle with the deference that is required.

Saving Face

The big issue here relates to the way that Thai avoid confrontation with one another. If you feel like having a good debate on any given topic then you're in trouble. The problem with debating something is that one side or another might win the debate and the losing party will "lose face" over being wrong. Losing face is a big deal in Thailand, much more so than in the west, and everyone avoids it.

Telling little white lies in order to help someone save face is also commonplace; in fact the length and breadth of situations where a little white lie is deemed acceptable is so extensive that you'll sometimes wonder if you've ever heard the truth.

Public Behaviour

Any sort of public display of affection is going to be frowned upon in most areas of Thailand. One of the big concerns that Thai girls have about getting involved with Western men is the fear that we'll be a little over-familiar. Even holding hands is looked down upon in some situations.

Ga Tan Yoo

This relates to an overwhelming feeling of debt and gratitude that Thais feel towards their parents. I already mentioned that Thai girls are deferential towards their parents, but the ga tan yoo concept goes much further than that.

Thai children are raised to understand all of the sacrifices that their parents have made for them throughout their lives. In Thai society the children assume the responsibility of taking care of the parents once the children are old enough to work. If you marry a Thai girl then you are going to assume a great deal of financial responsibility for the parents whilst still being deferential towards their views!

Nam Jai

This translates as "generous heart." Anyone that fails to show nam jai is looked down upon in Thai society. When you read on Thai girls' dating profiles that they are looking for a generous man, they mean a man that has nam jai. It is not just about handing out all your cash to all and sundry, and it's also nothing to do with taking advantage of your good nature either, although there are opportunists out there.

In rural communities in particular, most people don't have many worldly goods, but most people no matter how poor will happily share what they have with you as it is a way of expressing their nam jai. Since you are likely to have more money, you'll be given lots of opportunities to spread the wealth. This might be exactly what a Thai person would want to do, but it might not be your idea of a good time!

In Summary

Thai girls are an option, but being with one long-term does come with some serious life-changing customs. You can try to get your girl to drop those customs if you like, but I can more or less guarantee that you'll end up with an unhappy lady on your hands. Better to understand the changes necessary and go into your relationship knowledgeable and prepared for compromise.

Read More: Is Modern Thai Dating Finally A Mainstream Option?

Steve Bain
Steve Bain is an Englishman who has traveled to Thailand many times and has lived there, on and off, since 2010. He is a graduate in Economics and is fascinated by the developing economies and cultures of South East Asia. His websites AsiaLibertine.com and Pattaya-Adventures.com are devoted to providing the very best advice for western men.

Sexual Harassment “Expert” Claims She Was Harassed By Military Cadets During A Conference On Harassment

July 3, 2015 | by Alexandre d'Aragon | Link | Original Link

While this story came out recently, it was late 2014 when Julie Lalonde, a self-proclaimed sexual harassment expert, gave a presentation to cadets at the Royal Military College of Canada (RMCC) in Kingston, Ontario. RMCC is the Canadian version of West Point.

RRMC Cadets on parade

It was hard to find what Ms. Lalonde’s credentials actually are, but they can be found on this website. As expected, her expertise doesn’t come from psychology, sociology, or anything that could be called a scientific field.

You guessed it—she has an undergrad degree in Women Studies. In any case, her Twitter account indicates quite clearly what she really is all about: a hysterical and narcissistic social justice warrior. She even has a “Zorro” like mask on her Twitter photo – that explains a lot.

And she likes to tweet. So much so that she probably wrote two tweets since you started reading these lines. With a score of 29,800 tweets (as of today) since she joined the popular site in February of 2011, she averages 20 tweets per diem. One wonders where she finds the time to write and read peer-reviewed literature which is the burden of all those “experts” out there.

Ms. Lalonde’s twitter photo. Where is Sergeant Garcia?

She claims she was harassed during and after the presentation she gave at RMCC – perfect proof of the very bad culture within RMCC and the Canadian military in general, she says. It seems people in the crowd started to object when she said that “men” are the problem.

Hell seems to have particularly broken loose when she added that when a woman is intoxicated she cannot give consent (similar to teenagers under 16 years-old in Canada; whether they give consent or not is irrelevant, the law says they can’t) claiming that this was Canadian law – which of course it is not.

While it is true that being completely drunk could render you incapable of consenting under the law, intoxication, per se, is completely irrelevant unless you are loaded to the point of passing out. Even more insulting, she added that in such a case, even if the male counterpart is as drunk as his partner, he remains responsible for his actions and could be prosecuted.

Reality Check

Now, imagine yourself in front of a group of young, intelligent, resilient, and energetic cadets whose institution maxim is: ”Truth, Duty, Valour.” What is the audience’s reaction to such stupid and wrong comments? As one cadet put it: “At this point, all respect for the presenter was lost and she struggled to carry on with the presentation in the face of people ignoring her.”

Don’t get me wrong, it is very possible that some cadets were impolite with her and they should learn to behave, even when presented with idiocies. This is, however, certainly not harassment and it should instead be considered as a reality check for those ideologues who repeat their stupid mantras left and right and claim any opposition to their views equals harassment. She even started tweeting about how bad the audience was during the presentation breaks! And guess what, cadets were reading her Twitter feed.

She complained to the RMCC. Initially the Commandant wished to meet with her. She refused. Presumably because he is a male, hence, he is a potential rapist. She finally agreed to meet with him, but in the presence of many specific people.

When these people were all made available after a few weeks, RMCC reached out to Ms. Lalonde to book an appointment. Surprise. She wanted Brigadier-General Meinzinger, the Commandant, and the specially assembled entourage to come to her and not the other way around.

When a victim, make sure it is known. It is good for business.

Needless to say, there was no meeting and a simple letter was sent. A letter that Ms. Lalonde now uses as proof of her horrible experience and to self-victimize in a perfect publicity stunt (see her tweet).

The response from RRMC Commandant

I imagine she will become a miniature version of Anita Sarkeesian and will use this victimhood to promote herself and earn more money. Should the self-perceived harassment cease at one point, she will find other sources of oppression to keep the business going.

Read More: 5 Things That Have Ruined American Women

Alexandre d'Aragon
Alexandre is a French-Canadian attorney, former army officer and woodworker. He enjoys 19th century Russian literature and cannot stand the current irrational hysteria.

11 Ways To Avoid Being Blindsided At Work

July 4, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

It is difficult for men to survive the gyno-centric workplace environments of today's societies, complete with fem-centric workplace laws. Plus, this problem gets compounded in offices where a mangina is at the helm, further shifting the power equation in female favor.

Patriarchal modern men have to increasingly choose from between either switching to male-dominated blue collar jobs or pursuing entrepreneurship, or adapt by gaming their workplace environments.

The defusing gameplan to a potential blindside

One TV show which accurately portrays the nature of a blindside is Survivor – a social game where castaways are left to survive on an island, and outwit, outplay, and outlast each other to win the million dollar prize for the sole survivor.

The contestants' gameplay often exemplify laws from works like The 48 Laws Of Power, mirroring the manipulative and fickle nature of real life politicking, and the necessity of acquiring dark triad social game (with some nsfw examples) – traits which some of the past winners have actually embodied while playing.

But many "deserving" contestants had been voted out or blindsided on the show simply because they underestimated or lacked the social intelligence to read the superior manipulative game of their physically weaker competition (usually women), or blend "effectively" with their tribe.

The scenarios on the show often present fitting analogies to real life situations one may increasingly face, offering valuable info so as to know how to overcome manipulation and betrayal by others – both in private or professional life. Here are a few of the lessons:

1. Be dynamic

> By taking a shape, by having a visible plan, you open yourself to attack. Instead of taking a form for your enemy to grasp, keep yourself adaptable and on the move. Accept the fact that nothing is certain and no law is fixed. The best way to protect yourself is to be as fluid and formless as water; never bet on stability or lasting order. Everything changes. – Law 48

In today's office environments where unscrupulous power games often abound, being predictable and "rigid" would only present visible chinks in your personality which unethical workplace competitors will exploit.

Understand that your ethics could become exploited as a weakness by them, so try to emulate Odysseus's craftiness and dynamism instead when dealing with such competition.

2. Always put your interests first: don’t let comfort or pity deter you from your goal

Lots of men get blindsided professionally by their rivals because they let their personal humanity and chivalry, or the “comfort” of their office environment, distract them from their own personal interests. T his not only results in professional failure, but also waste of precious time which can never be replaced. Thus, never lose focus of your goal through times of professional comfort or adversity, and crush your rivals totally when opportunity presents it.

3. Do your groundwork and document everything

Failure to do your “research” and document information on your workplace rivals will not only give them leeway, but also make your case weak when soliciting allies or support to crush them. So understand the utility and power of a damning piece of “evidence” which can be used against them.

4. Keep your eyes and ears open: don’t let blind trust and favoritism blind you to the reality around you

The blindsided man is usually the gullible one who gets too comfortable and overconfident, blindly trusts people, and fails to properly read the reality around him. This risk is greater in today's multinational work environments, where it's natural to be automatically drawn to some more than others based on common interests, similar ethnic and religious backgrounds, etc.

But don't let these superficial commonalities eventually blind you to their true character. Instead, use Law 14 – Pose as a friend and work as a spy – to know the real nature of your office colleagues before choosing the right ones to form an office "tribe" with.

5. Make "strategic" but temporary alliances

> "..isolation exposes you to more dangers than it protects you from-it cuts you off from valuable information, it makes you conspicuous and an easy target. Better to circulate among people, find allies, mingle." – Law 18

Isolation is dangerous, and avoid becoming an "island" at work . This becomes important to avoid the radar of the professional higher-ups for the wrong reasons, and get the target off your back. So combine this with:

- Law 3 – Conceal your true intentions
- Law 4 – Always say less than necessary
- Law 38 – Think as you like but behave like others

But realize that "alliances" can be transitory – so don't commit forever, unless to exceptionally trustworthy people.

6. Test your colleagues before you think of trusting them

To ascertain people's trustworthiness, try testing them first with trivial bits of pseudo "confidential information " to see whether they guard it or circulate it. Never invest trust in office gossip mongers, rabblerousers, or backbiters—for as they do to others, they can do likewise to you.

8. Master the art of timing

It's not only important how to deal with your professional rivals, but also when to deal with them. The right move at the wrong time becomes the wrong move. So plan accordingly, and know when to attack or retreat.

9. Try to become "indispensable"

Average never got anyone anywhere – even more so at work. Indeed, being a performer will attract the envy of competitors, but try to achieve professional indispensability by keeping people dependent on you for your work expertise, and never teach others enough so that they can do without you.

Your "indispensability" could likely then ingratiate you to those in power possibly giving you (temporary) professional immunity, and buy you time to prepare for your own blindside on your rivals.

10. Always have a backup plan(s)

Just like how women cannot hurt men with sexual options, similarly companies cannot hurt men who have backup options in case of unexpected layoffs. Failing to plan is planning to fail – so plan all the way to the end, with preferably multiple backup plans.

11. Listen to your gut instinct

While it's wise to plan ahead, it's equally important not to disregard your gut instinct, which might warn you ahead of a potential plot against you at work. Your gut instinct may not be always right (since most usually disregard it for conventional thinking) – but relying on it frequently will gradually optimize it for future use.

At work, a little paranoia will not harm you, but rather keep you based in reality to avoid becoming slack, and not take things casually for granted – but this usually happens when men deal with women professionally, which needs to be addressed separately.

Conclusion

The ruthless and unscrupulous nature of modern social life makes it increasingly important for modern men to acquire Machiavellian game (or dark triad traits) to adapt to it.

Let not blind trust or comfort intoxicate men into peaceful apathy and becoming sitting ducks for blindsides, both in their personal and professional lives. Your trust is something to be earned; not to be dispensed randomly and blindly to others.

Read Next: Modern Men Are Becoming Lotus Eaters

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Why Feminism Is To Blame For Revenge Porn

July 4, 2015 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

Sometimes you can't help but think there must have been divine intervention. The same day I pen my article about why Adelaide women are the best in Australia, I pick up the front page of the paper to see outrage that 500 young Adelaide women have had naked photos of themselves plastered all over an American website.

You may have noticed I didn't sing the praises of Adelaide women aged 18-25 in my article. I truly believe western millennial girls are nightmares, even in sleepy little Adelaide. What we are seeing with so called "revenge porn" is an example of the disturbing but inevitable consequences of the first generation of women who, brainwashed by feminist propaganda, truly believe they can do no wrong, and that there are no consequences for their actions.

Throw in their smart phone addictions and toxic need for constant social media validation and you have a recipe for disaster. At this rate, we are not too far from a world where every second man's girlfriend's or wife's tits will be plastered all over the net, her slutiness on display for the whole world to see. This is supposed to be your loving life partner, the mother of your children? How can any man these girls meet in the future possibly take them seriously?

A tech-savvy generation? Millennial girls' behaviour indicates otherwise

Young women are so addicted to social media they can't see the negative effects it has on their lives

The millennial girl's smartphone obsession is of course the root of their misery, but it's their lack of intelligence and social awareness that is truly astounding. How can they not get it? Once a photo is put on the internet, it is there forever. Media reporting on this story was incredibly irresponsible. These photos certainly were not "stolen," as journalists claimed. Whoever got these photos didn't break into these girls houses, nor were they peeping Toms who had secretly photographed them without their knowledge or consent.

In fact, they had been willingly uploaded to social media or sent directly to the latest bad boy to make their vaginas tingle. From that point onwards, they were totally at the mercy of that bad boy as to what happened next. Some empowerment! Now admittedly putting them on the web for the whole world to see is a pretty low act, but they don't call them bad boys for nothing. You can bet your bottom dollar these are the guys who are far more likely to receive and distribute "sexts" than the nice guys forever languishing in the friend zone.

Despite all this, I feel sorry for these girls. They have grown up in age where being a slut is glorified and where their peers give as little thought to posting revealing selfies online or sending "sexts" as they do to taking a piss. Unlike women from previous generations, at no point in their lives have they been pulled aside and told in no uncertain terms that being easy reflects poorly on them and is likely to be a one way ticket to disaster.

It's not politically correct, you see, and many have been denied a strong father figure by their money-hungry mom who wanted freedom, a divorce and custody. This is why millennial girls are not only narcissistic and slutty, but completely oblivious to how broken they have become, and why they are hopelessly addicted to the crack pipe of Instagram,

Facebook and Twitter. All they need to do to break free of this toxic cycle is log off, but unplugging from the vortex would be unthinkable.

Millennial girls are trapped in a social media vortex

Young women love selfies more than life itself

"Revenge porn" wouldn't exist if young women weren't so obsessed with selfies. Sadly, millennial girls are so infatuated with internet "fame" everything else is merely background music. To demonstrate how warped their perspectives are, consider this. What did this girl do when she found out she was on the site? She re-uploaded a photo from the site of her in the shower to her Facebook!

Out of curiosity I looked up her Facebook page, and sure enough, it is selfie after selfie. She is quite hot, but obviously so desperate for fame I can't help but wonder if she is secretly thrilled she now has a chance to step out of the shadows of her well-known football playing brothers.

Women have been betrayed by feminism

Feminist woofer Clementine Ford.. all for female empowerment, but for God's sake don't expect women to exercise self-responsibility

Predictably, critics have directed all their energy into attacking the faceless American creators of this site and furiously denouncing "victim blaming", rather than spreading the word to young women everywhere that uploading raunchy photos to social media and sexting guys is risky behaviour with potentially very serious consequences.

Bottom line: If girls don't send these pics out, they can't end up on a site like this. That would put these "shady creeps" out of business permanently. But in the twisted minds of feminists, prevention is never better than cure: don't teach women to do X, teach men not to do Y. They have always played the victim.

Is there any hope for young women?

Scenes like this will be familiar to us all… what does it take for young women to put down their phones?

The prospect of having a daughter one day seriously scares the hell out of me. What chance do you have of raising a decent human being, when you are fighting a reckless pro-slut cultural tsunami?

There was a time when the family unit provided the guidance young women needed to develop important values. Unfortunately, with The Decline accelerating this is often impossible. For most girls, any semblance of fatherhood authority has long gone. If they really care for the welfare of girls, mothers and genuinely concerned women need to fill this void and educate them that acting like a slut must be avoided, for this behaviour places them at risk of ending up on sites like this, forever. I

Conclusion

Like so many other modern social problems, feminism is definitely to blame for "revenge porn." This warped ideology has always irresponsibly promoted the delusional idea that women have all the same rights as men, but without responsibilities or consequences for their actions.

They were the ones who encouraged a life of reckless hedonism and narcissism for young women, with no thought for their futures. They were the ones who spun the gross lie that being pumped and dumped by men who couldn't care less about them is "empowering." These 500 Adelaide women are just a drop in the ocean of the many girls who are being sacrificed daily at the altar of "female empowerment."

This is what happens when it is politically incorrect to state the obvious: that acting like a slut is dangerous for a woman's honour, credibility, and future happiness.

Read More: Feminist Writer Posts Naked Photo: Demands Absolute State Monopoly On Violence

Mark Webster

Mark Webster is an old school Australian who is dismayed by political correctness, the state of the modern woman and the decline of his once beautiful country. He believes the collapse of the family unit is directly attributable to feminism and cultural Marxism.

What I Learned About Women From The Worst Book Ever Written

July 5, 2015 | by Alan Scott | Link | Original Link

I have a confession: I've read Fifty Shades of Grey. I've carried that embarrassing secret around inside of me for far too long now. It's time to clear my conscience.

I was embarrassed not so much because the book is hardcore chick lit and I'm a man, but because it is arguably the worst novel ever written in the English language and I wasted some precious hours of my life reading it.

I'm not alone among men who have admitted to having read the novel and been dismayed by how poorly written it was. Salman Rushdie read it (or at least part of it) and gave this review: “I’ve never read anything so badly written that got published. It made Twilight look like War and Peace.”

Lesser-known novelist David Llewellyn tried to read it but couldn’t get past page four. He did, however, write a brilliant criticism of the novel’s opening paragraph. “I’m not judging the type of novel 50 Shades sets out to be,” wrote Llewellyn, “What I object to is bad writing.”

Bad indeed. Each time I sat down to slog through another chapter, I would wince at the poor grammar, overtly contrived plot, and the predictable, trite dialog.

The pain caused by reading Fifty Shades of Grey was far beyond anything I’d ever experienced in the reading of a book, even when I made the long march through War and Peace during my college days.

Llewellyn’s criticism went right to the heart of the matter: “The problem with 50 Shades is one of mechanics, of the basic engineering of almost each and every sentence. The reason I haven’t read past page 4 is because it hurt my eyes.”

Accepting the Fifty Shades Challenge

Why on earth did I waste my time reading such rubbish?

The only plausible answer I have is that I’m surrounded by predominantly women at work who talk a lot. One week, all conversations were focused on Fifty Shades of Grey. All the ladies in the office were reading it at the same time as though it had mysteriously attached itself to their already synchronized menstrual cycles.

“You should read it,” one of them suggested.

“Sounds like it should be titled Fifty Shades of Gay,” I said.

“It’s sooo good,” another countered.

“Alright, I’ll read it,” I said for shock value, not fully comprehending the horror I was committing myself to. “But you’ll have to bring me one of your copies. No way am I spending money on crap like that.”

They were all a bit too giddy about my accepting the Fifty Shades Challenge and a copy was delivered to my desk the next morning in a nondescript manilla envelope.

That evening, I slid the worn copy from the envelope and began reading:

> I scowl with frustration at myself in the mirror. Damn my hair—it just won’t behave, and damn Katherine Kavanagh for being ill and subjecting me to this > ordeal. I should be studying for my final exams, which are next week, yet here I am trying to brush my hair into submission. I must not sleep with it wet. I must not sleep with it wet. Reciting this mantra several times, I attempt, once more, to bring it under control with the brush. I roll my eyes in exasperation and gaze at the pale, brown-haired girl with blue eyes too big for her face staring back at me, and give up. My only option is to restrain my wayward hair in a ponytail and hope that I look semi-presentable.

Yeah, that's it. Do you feel it yet? It begins as a tremor deep inside the vitreous humor that builds into a tsunami that eventually erupts from your eyeballs in tears of blood.

The entire book reads like that—well, except for the dialog, which is worse. I found myself speed-reading to try and outrun the bad writing and mitigate its ocular torture.

"Well, what do you think?" the ladies asked me at work the next morning.

"It's the worst novel I've ever read," I told them. "Each word is like a tiny dagger stabbing into me. It's going to be a slow and agonizing death-by-a-thousand-cuts."

"Oh it's not that bad," one of them said. "You must not be to any of the juicy sex scenes yet. That's when it gets real good," she said and bit down gently on her lower lip.

She was right. I hadn't made it to any of the "juicy sex scenes." (I'd barely made it past Llewellyn's record.) In all truthfulness, I was dreading those parts. Don't get me wrong though; I love sex just as much as the next guy.

What I feared was that the horrific writing contained within Fifty Shades of Grey would destroy that which I loved, that the next time I was making love to my wife the act would begin to be uncontrollably narrated inside my head in a *Fifty Shades*esque monologue: "Pulling off his boxer briefs, his erection springs free. Holy cow!" (Yes, that's an actual quote from the novel.)

And when I finally did get to the sex scenes they were all totally lame like that. They struck me as 2-dimensional caricatures of what sex—even kinky sex—was actually like.

Fifty Shades of Grey v. The Holy Bible

This got me wondering what all the hubbub was about. Why did my female co-workers think the book was "so good" when it was clearly so bad? How did such a poorly written, untitillating novel outsell the entire Harry Potter series?

To date, Fifty Shades of Grey has sold more than 100 million copies worldwide and has been translated into 52 languages. The only book that has outsold and been translated into more languages than 50 Shades of Grey is the The Holy Bible, which has had a considerable head start in the marketplace.

This past Valentine's Day was the release of the movie adaptation of Fifty Shades of Grey, which, according to Variety magazine, grossed $81.7 million on day one. Interestingly, the only February-released movie to out-gross Fifty Shades of Grey was Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ (2004).

Were the sex-lives of the women I worked with really that bad? Were their husbands failing at more than not being able to pick the kids up from school and rinse off their plates before putting them in the dishwasher? I didn't ask, but imagined that probably wasn't the case. Their husbands were regular guys like me and regular guys like to fuck regularly.

While these women probably didn't have a BDSM-themed "Red Room of Pain" in their homes like the one depicted in Fifty Shades of Grey, they probably didn't have sexless "dead bedrooms" either—or if they did, it probably wasn't of their husbands' choosing.

"What Women [truly] Want"

As I made the painful slog through Fifty Shades of Grey, I began to understand that it wasn't the salacious particulars of the story that these women were drawn to, but the broader narrative of what women truly want in their lives.

Women want a strong and dominant man. Not necessarily dominant in a BDSM sort of way, but dominant in knowing who he is and where he is going in life. Women want a man with direction, which is more important to them than a big erection (though that's an added bonus).

Women want a man who will provide for them, who will hold them when they need to be held and bend them over when they want to be bent over. Women want a man who will respect them but discipline them when they get out of line. Women want to be submissive but not totally enslaved to a man.

In short, women want real men, the kind of men who are dependable and take care of shit, the kind of men who are insanely confident and take risks, the kind of men who tame the jungle and build civilization.

These are the kinds of men women truly want, and by want I mean the type of men they truly desire. Even the staunchest feminist steeped in decades of gender studies' dogma knows this fundamental truth deep down. The female mind can perform all sorts of mental acrobatics, but vaginas never lie.

Women know what kind of men they really want and the popularity of Fifty Shades of Grey is a cultural indictment that those kind of men are becoming extinct. Women have become so desperate for real men that they've embraced a perversion of them as embodied in the fictional character of Christian Grey.

The Greatest Perversion

The word perversion has two meanings. The first, and perhaps most common, is "human behavior that deviates from that which is considered normal." Most often this definition is applied to human sexual behavior. In its broader meaning, a perversion is "the alteration of something from its original course, meaning, or state to a distortion or corruption of what was first intended."

Amidst all of its overt sexual perversion, Fifty Shades of Grey brings to light a deeper, covert perversion that's been slowly eroding the cultural and social fabric of modern Western civilization.

In our quest for gender equality, we've distorted and corrupted male-female roles and relationship dynamics from their original course, meaning, and state. We've become so focused on gender equality that we've ceased encouraging women to be women and men to be men.

It's become taboo to talk about such matters openly and honestly. The last time I brought up this cultural phenomenon of reversing gender roles in conversation, I was labeled a "misogynist." For the record, a misogynist is "a person who dislikes, despises, or is strongly prejudiced against women."

While I'm not a misogynist, I do dislike, despise, and am strongly prejudiced against people who misappropriate the English language. A man who loves, appreciates, and judges women fairly based on their character and their actions cannot be a misogynist. To label such a man a "misogynist" is prejudice and leads to its evil twin, misandry.

The Fifty Shades phenomenon addresses this general cultural perversion in a specific and sexually perverted way. Its popularity among women comes not from a modern need to be tied up and probed by technologically advanced sex toys, but rather from an ancient need to be paired with a real man.

The fictional character of Christian Grey is a perverted caricature of the real men that women desire and need in order to fill that otherwise unfillable hole in their lives (figuratively and literally). This is why Fifty Shades of Grey is the most widely read novel in all of human history.

Conclusion

Women have been conditioned to believe in the popular and self-propagating cultural myth of gender equality and to do the mental gymnastics it takes in order for them to believe that they don't need men to be happy, that they are not only equal to men but better than men, that they can "have it all" (career, marriage, motherhood, Christian Grey) by the sheer will and resolve of their feminine powers.

But they've been sold a fiction and there is nothing sadder than a woman who has allowed that perverted narrative to drive her life decisions and actions in a fantasy-fueled Eat, Pray, Love manner until she eventually slams head-on into a wall of unforgiving truth. She becomes broken in the same way that a man who lives in a blue-pill fantasy world is broken.

Men and women are not equal—they are complementary forces of Nature who, together, have survived and thrived in a hostile world where they could just have easily perished and the human race become extinct.

There is no grey area here. Any other interpretation is a perversion of reality just like Fifty Shades of Grey, which I'm still somewhat embarrassed to admit I read cover-to-cover, but am glad I did.

Read More: Fifty Shades Of Grey Proves Women Want Male Dominance

Alan Scott
Alan Scott (a.k.a., "The Old Morpheus") is a red pill disciple who's been unplugged long enough to have learned that there is a difference between knowing the path and walking the path. You can follow him on Twitter @theoldmorpheus

Reddit Melts Down Due To Incompetent Feminist CEO Ellen Pao

July 5, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Barely eight months into her tenure as Reddit's interim CEO, Ellen Pao has driven the site to the brink of extinction. Last week, a number of popular subreddits such as r/movies, r/history, and r/art shut down in response to the site's sudden firing of director of talent Victoria Taylor, who was responsible for organizing Q&A sessions with celebrities and politicians on Reddit's r/AMA (Ask Me Anything) page. With thousands of subreddits now offline, Reddit's traffic as a whole has been severely crippled:

https://twitter.com/atlasnodded/status/616770170799980544

A Running Joke

With Reddit facing extinction, Pao and her lackeys have gone into damage control mode, issuing a series of half-hearted apologies and pledging to improve communication with the unpaid moderators responsible for managing the site's subreddits. Despite her attempts to save her skin, Reddit users have had it with "Chairman Pao," with a petition demanding that she resign as CEO nearing 100,000 signatures as of this writing.

Ellen Pao's spectacular immolation of Reddit is the capstone to her joke of a career. Pao first exploded into the public eye when she sued her previous employer, Kleiner, Perkins, Caufield and Byers, for gender discrimination. Despite the fact that her suit was dismissed—and despite evidence that she sued her employer to cover up her poor job performance—Pao received accolades from the mainstream media and feminists for taking a stand against "sexism" in tech.

Taking over as CEO of Reddit was an opportunity for Pao to prove her naysayers wrong. Instead, she's confirmed everything that Kleiner Perkins said about her and more. Ellen Pao is a prime example of "failing upwards" in the corporate world and an exemplar of how women can get ahead in life by simply crying oppression and claiming to be victims of misogyny.

Ellen Pao's Sad, Strange Career

From day one of her hiring as Reddit's CEO, Ellen Pao has been implementing bizarre policies based on her radical feminist beliefs. For example, several months ago, she banned prospective employees from negotiating their salaries based on spurious studies that women interviewees are disadvantaged in salary negotiations. Effectively, Pao was hurting men in order to help women, bringing everyone down to the lowest common denominator.

Pao followed up this act with a massive purge of subreddits that offended her SJW sensibilities. Last month, a new rule change banned "harassing" subreddits such as r/FatPeopleHate and other anti-SJW sections of the site. Curiously, pro-SJW subreddits such as r/ShitRedditSays (which has a long history of harassing people, including doxing GamerGate supporters) and r/TheBluePill (which basically exists to troll r/TheRedPill) were ignored. "Chairman Pao" justified her new thought control regime with this creepily Orwellian line: "We're banning behavior, not ideas."

Additionally, there's an obvious undercurrent of money-grubbing to Pao's leftist policies. Banning new hires from negotiating their salaries will obviously allow Reddit to underpay their employees under the guise of gender equality, but a contributor to the pro-GamerGate subreddit r/KotakuInAction gave a breakdown of why Pao has been so militant in cleansing non-SJWs from the site (click to expand):

| | subreddit_llama 75 points 5 hours ago*

I used to do some work for an agency that specifically targetted SJWs. They were basically liberal, middle-class, university educated white women and their low status male admirers. It is profitable. They do spend lots of money. Most of the famous SJWs are trust-fund babies. The working SJWs (and there are plenty) aren't as loud and don't spend as much time begging for you to supplement their trust fund so to fund their cutting edge game, made in game-maker, about being cat-called (games are art and therefore don't have to be fun, shitlord).

They are the types of people who buy "male tears" mugs or t-shirts with "smash the patriarchy" written on them or a quilt with "the six scum" embroidered on it and then post photos of themselves on tumblr (with a referral link to where they bought that item).

One of the things about the agency's target demographic was the amount they would spend on worthless shit. Not only would they buy it, they would then tweet about it and write about it on their tumblr and facebook. They would post pictures of themselves with the item they'd been sold (by an entirely male-owned company), which led to more sales of these high profit margin items. These people are prolific consumers. They click ads, they fall for fake marketeer profiles because they hear what they want to hear. They are a money maker. They're the left's equivalent of people who'd buy anything with an American flag on for the years following 9/11. They're people who you could market an item to by putting the prefix "Freedom" in front of a product name. They're just like the people who'd buy any old shit with a bald eagle on it. They are just like the people who buy "from my cold dead hands" pro-gun bumper stickers. They're a demographic that want people to know their opinions and wear it on their sleeve and on their car.

They are a demographic that reddit wants. Reddit exists to make money (which it has failed to do so far). They are a demographic that 4chan wants. Moot wants to make more money and he isn't going to do it through bunch of tech savvy geeks who love piracy. Reddit and 4chan don't want people who know what Adblock is. They want people who will buy a t-shirt made in a Taiwanese sweatshop with a pro-feminist message on it (and 500% mark up). How do you attract these people? You pander to them. You make spaces safe so that they'll come in. You cleanse your site of the "undesirables" that are there so that they will come and spend.

What we're seeing here is a kind of gentrification of high-traffic parts of the internet. These sites want to make money and they're not going to do it through some ad block, VPN, piratebay, google fu expert who posts things that makes the ladies want to faint.

You see this sort of thing in music festivals. The festivals are made good by members of the counter-culture, but when the festivals start attracting big names, suddenly ticket prices climb, drugs are banned completely, nakedness, impromptu performances, and general anarchy are stopped and it becomes some homogenized, middle-class-mother-friendly pop concert with hummus everywhere and excellent baby changing facilities. Why? Because dirty hippies don't spend as much money as middle class moms and university-educated white girls.

Effectively, social justice warriors, who imagine themselves to be crusading against the Man, are in fact the Man's most craven, mindless supporters. They're brainless consumers, eagerly blowing money they don't have on knickknacks they don't need. Ellen Pao's jihad against Reddit's non-leftist userbase is a carefully calculated move to exploit the gullibility of the average SJW.

Going Too Far

Unfortunately for Chairman Pao and her supporters, her latest move was too much for Reddit's users. With a large section of Reddit effectively shut down, the site is headed for Digg-style collapse and irrelevance. Pao's attempts to placate her angry customers are too little too late, as the movement to oust her from her position has only grown in the days since Taylor's dismissal.

It's evidently clear that Ellen Pao must resign as Reddit's CEO. Her tenure running the site has been a complete disaster: between her sexist crippling of male employees and her dictatorial anti-free speech policies, Pao has proven herself unfit to run any company.

However, given the overwhelming support she received from the mainstream media for her frivolous gender discrimination lawsuit, it will take concerted effort to force Pao from her perch of privilege.

Read More: Ellen Pao's Anti-Male Hiring Policy Shows The Destructiveness Of Egalitarianism

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

3 Areas Where You Must Train Women

July 6, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Training women, especially indirectly and without them ever suspecting it, should become the cornerstone of how you interact with the opposite sex. Like a missile homing in on its target, your mind must constantly reorient itself to the task of bending a particular woman to your indomitable will.

I don't pretend that strategies and tactics like these will ameliorate the excesses of every girl or every female-related situation. The silver bullet does not exist. But game is about mindset and framing. So start to view and frame it in the way that serves you, and translate that to the girl or girls you spend your time with sexually or romantically.

1. Make her respect your time

This is the most important “external” resource you will ever have at your disposal. How you spend it will be the source of either unimaginable horror or supreme satisfaction when you inevitably die. Make her value your time or you’re nothing but dust.

Make use of your “dead time” to contact her

You’re waiting for a taxi, bus, or walking through your city. This is the time to call her. You’re going somewhere. You’re doing something. You’re communicating to her that you’re busy and have priorities. You’re contacting her when it suits you, in the time you have available.

True enough, you will need to carve out some space in your days to speak to her more one-on-one, tied to the passing moment. But you have the sort of life that requires you to choose people and activities wisely. Communicate that to her, albeit implicitly.

Make her wait when she’s late for a date or meeting

If it’s more than five minutes and she hasn’t shown up, turn around and take a stroll somewhere else where she won’t find you. Whip out your phone and call someone else.

She’ll arrive, realize you’re not there and then start to search for or text you. You can respond back while you’re on the phone, saying you left to make a call when you noticed she wasn’t there. Or you can leave her not knowing. Your choice. If she bails entirely, you can always say you waited and she didn’t show up.

2. Force her to take responsibility for her emotional blow-ups

She'll have them. No one, man or woman, is perfect. But there are, as you must now know, some fundamental differences between how men and women generally react under strain. You need to be prepared for them with your girl(s).

Respond to her tantrums by doing your own thing

Not all the time (if only that were possible!), but often enough for her to get the picture: you're not a doormat and if she wants to behave in that fashion, you'll go somewhere else. You can't walk away from every problem in life. Yet you'd be surprised how rewarding it can be, in the initial stages of a relationship or FWB arrangement (or when things get a tad stale), to blow off a girl and head to the gym for a weights session. Or go for a walk. Or call a friend and get a bite to eat. Instead of doing it vindictively, do it calmly or make it seem pre-planned. Unconsciously, she'll get the picture.

Give her a perfectly selfish reason to stop it

People are, after all, selfish. Make your statement here oblique but undeniable: blow-ups cost her. The language and non-verbal responses I use with girls go along this line, a combination of both guilt and a call for her to preserve her own happiness.

Many men seeking answers with girls have presumed that being unaffected means casually ignoring everything negative a girl does. Far from it. It's about how you do it, preferably matter-of-factly, without the typical smugness. "We were having such a great time this weekend, is this how you want to end it? With tears and red eyes?" "We were going to go the movies tonight, I guess you're not in the mood now."

Save retaliation for when you really need it and use this kind of positive manipulation for the majority of times.

3. Give her cues to support you and your goals

Tell her about your positive interactions with other people, especially those that got you something

I tell girls about the positive things other people do or have done for me. Firstly, its part of who I am. I like being the raconteur with the stories of opportunity and serendipitous events. On the other hand, it redirects her mind to what she can do for you and unleashes the slightest tinge of jealousy. Focus is reality.

Just as you imagine a series of seemingly unrelated positive memories when you think of the first rosy one, she thinks of ways to support and do things for you when you mention what others have done or simply remind her of what she has done for you previously.

Reward good behavior, but not every time

Easier said than done. A girl shouldn't do something for you with the expectation of an immediate or constant reward. Ideally, she needs to be also doing these things for you even when, for example, she's pissed off at you or as tired as a fat person treading water.

Rewarding her each and every time ruins the prospect of that. Make it a mystery as to when, where and with what you will give her an experiential or material trinket of approval.

Emotionalize both the rewards and the signaling of your expectations

When you kiss her during that glorious Tuscan sunset, on the harbour cruise in Vancouver or after you've moved in together, make your expectations known, directly or otherwise. "I would love to see you cooking breakfast in your underwear tomorrow at our apartment."

It doesn't even need to be about what you really want in the long-term. The point is that you're priming her to behave in ways that please you. Likewise, give her a veritable bank of mental happiness by providing rewards she can remember for a lifetime. It will make her more pliable in the future.

Female training is about outlook and flexibility

You need to be capable of making new side-paths and tangents from what I have shared here. Adapt to your own circumstances. So long as you're coding her brain for good, in the same sense that "attraction is not a choice," you're installing emotional and mental programs that she feels compelled to follow.

To a degree, it will always be a matter of trial and error. But mere consistency is a feat most men never achieve with their women, so you'll be in esteemed company by getting even this far.

Tally-ho, gentlemen. It's time to put her leash on.

Read More: How Women Train Men To Rape

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

W Motors And Ralph Debbas: An Entrepreneur's Success Story

July 6, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Our understanding of history and current events tends to emphasize the unusual, the extraordinary, or the extreme. This reflects the prejudice of the historian or newsman more than anything else. It is easy to forget that, in every age, the average person has gone about his business the best he can, trying to make his way in the world, and putting one foot in front of the other in that great marathon called Life.

The artisan patiently tinkers with his handicrafts; the cultivator of the field moves forward with the regularity of the seasons; and the businessman frets over his accounts and ledgers. None of them—these anonymous men–receives much attention from the historian, since their activities are not glamorous: but without them, the amusements of kings, and the frivolous diversions of presidents and prime ministers, would hardly be possible. Let us, for once, celebrate the achievements of someone who has not been in the news very much.

The incredible Lykan Hpersport, the car used by Vin Diesel in “Fast and Furious 7”

Our story here comes from the Middle East, a region that in recent years has been in dire need of some good news. Yet despite the rumblings of war, the spread of chaos, and the ecstasies of destruction that have been visited on the region, the patient majority go about their way, and continue the forward movement of economy and society.

The Fast and Furious movie franchise’s seventh film features the first luxury car manufactured by an Arab company. W Motors was founded in 2012 in Beirut by a visionary designer named Ralph Debbas, who now works as the company’s CEO. The company’s first luxury car is the $3.4 million Lykan Hypersport, which can go from 0 to 60 mph. in less than 3 seconds. Its top speed is around 395 kph.

The vehicle is produced in Italy by Magna Steyr, and only seven of them have been made thus far. Actor Vin Diesel drives the Hypersport in the seventh installment of the Fast and Furious series.

Ralph Debbas, founder and CEO of W Motors

W Motors is the Arab world’s first luxury car manufacturer, and operates out of Dubai. Auto companies tend to go where the money is; historically, auto manufacturers face a bleak future unless they can find access to large amounts of funding.

Although the price tag of the Lykan Hypersport is so high mainly because of the installation of some precious gems in its frame (presumably optional), there is a market for these vehicles, especially in the Gulf countries. The buyer of such a car is more interested in “lifestyle” than anything else, and wants a high-performance piece of machinery at his control.

For those who are interested in such things, the Hypersport has a 3.7 liter 780 bhp, twin-turbo flat-six engine. We are told that it is faster than the Lamborghini Aventador. The car also features a so-called “global servicing system” which gives the owner the ability to have access to technical support at all times. Debbas also explains that the car features “flying doctors” who will actually fly to the owner—anywhere in the world—to perform maintenance. Other complimentary “extras” are a concierge service that owners are entitled to.

Debbas is not worried about his competitors. In fact, he has a healthy attitude of abundance when it comes to such things. When asked about the presence of other luxury manufacturers, he says, “I respect all of them. We work with all of them.” In this, he shares the healthy attitude of the successful entrepreneur: the ability not to be worried about what other people are doing.

W Motors’s police model. The Arabic word on the door reads “police” or “security.”

Debbas started his company at the ripe age of 22 in Beirut. He called it “W Motors” because as a child he had been given the nickname “wolf” and liked the sound of it. When he began his dream, there were no predecessors that he could base his business plan on; everything had to be done from scratch, and maybe this was a good thing.

The company now has a managerial staff of about fifteen in Dubai, about seventy engineers and builders in Italy, and some in Germany. He understands that, in order to get his company off the ground, he will need to work with those European companies that have the generations of experience to draw on.

The first step is to use the tools that are out there; after that, he plans to build an entire Arab automotive industry. “We are not only building a car. We are building an industry, we are building a name, we are building something historical. Every step of the way, we’re getting the support of the Arab nations that are helping us to be proud, and raising the heritage.”

But Debbas does not want to cater only to the super-rich. One model has been designed for the Dubai police force, and there are plans for a moderately priced SUV. An actual manufacturing plant will be opened in Dubai very soon.

No one can predict the future, but at this point, Debbas seems to be doing all the right things. He has secured the patronage of the wealthy and powerful in the Gulf, his product has been featured in a US film franchise, and he has boundless energy and optimism.

The rest, as has been said, is in the hands of Fate.

Read More: How To Develop Your Presence

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

An Infographic Showing What Male Privilege Really Looks Like

July 6, 2015 | by B.M. West | Link | Original Link

When one is on the unpopular side of an argument, as we here at ROK usually find ourselves, it is incredibly important to have the facts straight. Most of us have been through the red pill required reading, and we're all guilty of internalizing what we read and re-quoting it in our own way. However when you cross the bridge from reader to writer, or from student to teacher, it is important to continually check yourself to make sure you are teaching correctly.

Getting The Facts Right

In an effort to make sure I myself had my facts straight, I started a project to verify a few statistics that were important to my understanding of the manosphere. One of the most impactful books I've read is "The Myth of Male Power" by Dr. Warren Ferrell. It outlines several issues with the "Women as Victim, Male as Oppressor" argument, and has very specific data to back up its claims.

If you haven't read it, do so immediately. The problem is that the book, and the data backing it, is over 20 years old. It is often quoted, but how does that narrative hold up today? I took a shot at updating the research, and compiling my findings in to an easy to understand infograph. I made sure my sources are listed (clickable at the bottom), and are based on legitimate studies by government organizations—not simply re-quoted from someone else's opinion. Most of my data comes from 2013, since it takes organizations at least a year or two to compile, analyze, and publish their findings.

Important to note is that this data does not aim to disprove any feminist arguments.

There is data supporting their narratives that rape, domestic violence, and sexism do exist in some capacity (that capacity being the main point of argument). However their narrative is that it must be great to be male, and not have these problems associated with one's gender.

Therein lies the issue. In reality, there are pros and cons to being either gender, and the cons of being a male are consistently downplayed. Here is what it's really like to be a male in the US…

Commentary

These statistics represent dead men. The fact is that there is no equality in suicide, workplace fatalities, combat fatalities, and murder. In each of those cases, it is men that lose. Men are losing their families, men are populating the prisons, and men are sleeping alone on the streets. Men are losing.

In a truly equal society, these percentages would be closer to the gender population split—nearly 50/50. Until these topics are being discussed in the mainstream media, men are going to have little interest or sympathy in discussing the "pay gap" or "body-shaming." There is no time to worry about hurt feelings when men are being killed at an alarming rate.

Men are working dangerous jobs (construction, transportation, military) in order to provide for their families. They are still the backbone of America, and our greatness is built upon their shoulders. But then something happens. Maybe they lose their job. They still need to provide for their families, so they turn to crime, and end up in prison. Or perhaps their efforts go unappreciated by their wives, who file for divorce, claim half their future income, and take their children.

Many of these men end up homeless, not able to make ends meet owing the government and their ex-wives substantial portions of their income. In the end, they decide it's best to end it—put a gun in their mouth and pull the trigger. No cry for help here, just an end to a miserable existence. That male privilege is pretty awesome, isn't it?

Review

I encourage you to check out the references, check my facts, and add your own links and statistics in the comments. I will continue to update my infograph and this article with any additional findings. Help me make sure that we are putting quality information in the hands of our readers.

Update:

Here is an easier link to share just the image of the chart: https://magic.piktochart.com/embed/6673366-male-privilege-statistics

Read More: The Myth Of Male Privilege

B.M. West

B.M. West is a musician and army vet. Married, and disappointed that red pill information wasn't readily available in his single days, he uses it to better his marriage and open the eyes of the younger generation.

Why Wrestling Is The Most Masculine Sport

July 6, 2015 | by Tyrone Kingston | Link | Original Link

I moved to Vermont in the middle of my seventh grade year from New Jersey. Up until that point I had been hanging out with gangbanger and drug dealers from Newark. For anyone who doesn't know that part of the US, I'll summarize: it isn't very nice. You could walk down the street and have someone mug you and take your shoes. Although I learned a lot of good things in New Jersey such as resourcefulness, it left me with a permanent watchfulness and sense of aggression.

As middle school progressed into high school I moved on from being the shy new kid who looked a little hood, to being a kid well liked by his grade. However, I wasn't doing any sports and had no outlet to vent out my pre-teenage frustrations. That is what lead me to the wrestling team.

In my school, the wrestlers were the most badass group of kids in the school. They worked hard daily, they were respected yet feared at the same time, and they were well liked by the teachers and faculty. I wanted to be one of those people, so I joined the team.

At the time I could not predict what was going to occur over those next few weeks. The first day the coach told me that I had to cut thirty pounds if I wanted to start on the team. Since I was an overweight 190-pound freshman I figured I should take his word for it and lose the weight.

The next few weeks were agony. I sprinted down the hallways morning and night until I puked. The coaches would have me and all of the other fat kids run outside in the snow and flip tires until our fingers froze. We would work out in the 105-degree wrestling room conditioning until half of the team quit. Somehow, I endured the training and I began to understand what kind of dedication this sport was going to take. The coaches had weeded out the weak and made a small group of elite warriors.

Wrestlers Conditioning

As my body began to change over the course of the season, so did my outlook on life and other people. At the time I was friends with a lot of girls that would disrespect my friends and me. We would ask them out and they would say yes, only go have sex with their senior friends after class.

Mid-season during a cut (losing weight before a meet) a girl that was “dating” my friend dumped him and I saw her making out with a senior in the hall. The younger more immature version of myself called her a few unkind words and never talked to her again. Although it wasn’t very manly for me to stoop to her level, I had taken the first step to not take abuse from people who don’t care about me. My friend, not a wrestler, decided to take the other path become a white knight, and he still is to this day.

One of the last things that wrestling team taught me was that there was a hierarchy to everything in life. On the team the coaches were the most respected, then the captains, then the seniors, and last the freshman (my friends and me). However, I saw that if you worked hard and respected your elders, you could move up the ladder and become one of the more respected people.

Many of the other freshman ended up quitting because they couldn’t handle this fact. They got mad because the seniors didn’t respect them for being them. I saw why the seniors did not respect these people, though—they had no reason to. As a senior who had put himself through four years of extreme exercise and pain, why would he listen to a little freshman who had not gone through any of that?

As those people left the team, I was given more opportunities to prove myself and take their spots.

Wrestling coach coaching his wrestlers.

Wrestling has made me a stronger and more self assured version of myself. Not only have I become stronger and better looking, but now when I say I’m going to do something, I mean it. The work, the hierarchies, and the self improvement all closely mirror the foundations of neomasculinity.

If you want to push yourself mentally and get in the best shape of your life, join a wrestling team or club and try wrestling in a few matches. When you do, you'll understand what I mean.

Read More: 10 Masculine Virtues That Went To The Grave With Our Grandfathers

Do Good Girls Exist? A Tale Of Two Unicorns

July 7, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Those of us who regularly consume neomasculine content are familiar with the notion that there's no such thing as a quality woman in this part of the world. Any reasonable person knows this isn't the really the case. Even the darkest of crimson capsule males understand there are exceptions to the rule, however rare they may be.

The truth is, hyperbole is a tool that myself and other ROK contributors use to drive home the AWALT doctrine. While every single solitary woman in the western hemisphere isn't "like that" men, being the logical sex, know it's better to be prepared for the type of woman you'll encounter 99% of the time than to wait for your 1 percenter—at least if you want to get your dick wet on the regular.

Don’t hold your breath

There are, however, a precious few females a man comes across during his life that passes the smell test in terms what we in the ‘sphere consider to be a “snowflake.” As stated above, encounters with these rare birds are sparse indeed but they do happen.

Here are the stories of the only two women I’ve met in my 37+ years who I consider to be quality women who were born and raised in America.

“Heather”

As a 21-year-old junior in college I had a few friends that attended a church in town. It was the typical non-denominational, new age organization that wanted to appeal to a younger audience with all sorts of cool technology, casual dress, and what looked like a laid back approach to religion. They kept inviting me so eventually I decided “what the hell, it’s not football season may as well go check it out.”

As a college guy in his early twenties, I naturally gravitated toward the youth group. There were other college guys there who were preparing to be pastors or missionaries or whatever other religious profession that God had “spoken” to them about.

Like most youth church youth groups, this one was rife with scandal, rumors, sex, and just about everything they sing, talk and pray about not doing…no surprise there. Other than that it was good way to occupy my time on my otherwise boring Sunday evenings and get a youth group trip or three out of the deal so it wasn’t all bad.

During my time at this church, I met large family that was nicknamed “The Partridge Family” because of the sheer size of it. At the head of the family was an alpha provider in every sense of the word who was assisted by a dutiful wife who seemed to enjoy just about every aspect of raising their 7 (or 8) children.

One of their children was 16-year-old Heather who had to be one of the most beautiful girls I’d ever seen in my life. Her long brown hair, large brown eyes, and perfect nubile body made her the object of every male’s desire at that church…young and old.

She was a pleasant young woman but had a bitchy side to her that came out in certain situations. I didn't quite understand it at first until one of my friends summed it up to me in two sentences:

"She's a bitch when she needs to be. Her parents taught her to be that way to keep the assholes away."

Now one might think "Meh….that's just a shit-test mechanism she was honing for when she arrives on campus to screen the frat boys she'll let run a train on her in a couple years" and most of the time you'd be right. But Heather was an exception. Her parents (most notably her father) had drilled it into her mind that dating, boys, sex, etc. was not an option until marriage and she followed their teachings to the letter.

Most every guy in this youth group tried to get at her at some point in time or another and none of them even came close. She was friendly with everyone so long as they didn't make a play to get intimate, but when they did they were stonewalled immediately. Heather was the very definition of the Holy Grail.

I remember one instance when I had gone to the Partridge Family home to pick up a few of her brothers to go and play (American) football one afternoon. Their parents were good-natured people and were very nice to me. But when I entered the room where three of their daughters were (one of which included Heather), they politely asked me to wait in the other room because they did not allow males who were not their brothers to be in the same room with them.

"Jeez! I'm not going to try to fuck her right in front of you guys!" I thought to myself as I obliged and walked into the den to wait on the boys. As crazy and ridiculous as I thought it was at the time, I now realize how necessary that mindset was to preserve the chastity of their daughters.

I stopped attending the church when the NFL season started but I still hung out with the youth group crew from time to time. The Partridge Parents and the draconian style edicts they imposed on their children were often the subject of conversation. We used to sit around and make fun of how they didn't have freedom to do much of anything or enjoy their teen years.

The Partridge children were homeschooled

A couple years later I decided to drop in on the youth group to see how everyone had been. Heather was now 18 and even more stunning than I had remembered. To my surprise she now had a boyfriend…someone we knew.

"Adam" was a division 1 football player at a state university studying for his business degree who was three years Heather's senior. He was a year away from graduating and had somehow managed to gain Mr. Partridge's approval and subsequent blessing to date his oldest daughter. To this day we have no idea how this happened but we all knew he was one lucky son of a bitch if he could marry her.

From what I understand Adam dated Heather for three years before they finally tied the knot and you can bet your ass he didn't so much as attempt to pierce that hymen of hers. Mr. and Mrs. Partridge made damn sure that Heather was going to be a virgin bride at all costs.

Today, Heather is a happy stay at home mother of five and has been married to Adam for 12 years. Her Facebook feeds include pictures of her kids (which are the vast majority of what she posts), her husband, coupons for deals at the local supermarket, alerts for this yard sale or that, and recipes galore.

Heather is living the dream

A few things that are noticeably absent from her posts are cleavage-laden selfies and memes talking about who she wants the world to think she is or how she thinks. Her feed is devoid of attention whoring…completely.

Another thing her parents prevented her from doing is going to college which would have most-assuredly turned her into a raging slut and effectively undid all of the work they had put in raising their daughter to be a quality woman.

Like I said before, Heather was indeed the Holy Grail and she continues to prove it each and every day. Adam is a very lucky man to have snagged a girl like her.

“Leigh”

Not long after I arrived on the west coast I started a job at a new company in the area. My second week I was offered cupcakes by good looking woman in her late forties. I playfully shooed her away because of my low-carb diet but we became fast friends soon after.

Over the course of the next six months or so I learned a lot about her, and found that she definitely didn’t fit the mold of today’s “empowered woman.” Though she’d been divorced for quite a while, I never heard her talk about or brag about romps in the sack with random men. It was quite the opposite actually.

As a young preacher’s wife she had everything a woman could ask for: status and security. Hell, she even had a young son to boot. But we all know that preachers aren’t exactly the most moral gentlemen out there and Leigh’s husband was no exception.

We all remember this fiasco……

His indiscretions eventually led to their divorce and at that point Leigh had a choice to make: Either take the typical selfish route divorcées take and whore herself out for self-gratification and reassurance, or she could put male validation on the back burner and be the best mother to her son that she could be.

She chose the latter.

“Oh please Donovan. How do you know she wasn’t the one who cheated? How do you know she didn’t sleep around after her divorce? How do you know she’s not lying to you about this stuff?”

I don’t. She may very well be leaving out details about herself to make herself look better. Wouldn’t be the first time a female has lowered her notch count by 30 because “they didn’t count” for some reason or another.

Didn’t hear any of these stories

But I fashion myself a pretty accurate judge of female character. The fact that she’s absolutely clueless about dating in 2015, offers refreshments to house guests upon arrival, doesn’t have a bad word to say about her ex-husband, and has what seems to be a well-adjusted son who loves her and positively loathes his father says to me the odds are pretty good that Leigh’s the genuine article.

Leigh often complains about how overbearing her parents were. They didn’t allow her to date, monitored her every move, and kept her away from anything that could potentially derail her life or end up a spinster like a lot of women seemed to be doing in her day. They kept a close eye on her and ensured that she and her twin sister weren’t lead astray.

Even now when they call to check up on her to see how she’s been, they still seem to want to tell her what to and what not to do. Sure, that may sound like a hassle and it probably is. But it’s because of them she’s not embracing the gross fallacy of “cougardom” and she’s much better for it whether she knows it or not.

The man she is dating now recognized these qualities in her and wasted absolutely no time locking her down. He’s a good looking, financially stable, high-value male who treats her like solid gold. He’s always taking her to dinner or other places, buys her things, spoils her rotten, and is always expressing how much he cares about her.

He exhibits just about every beta behavior under the sun but does she take it for granted or punish him because he isn’t negging her or running asshole game to keep her interested?

Not a chance.

[image]
Unlike most western women, she doesn’t punish him for gestures like these

She cooks for him, takes care of his every need, and does it all without reservation or hesitation. She doesn't shit test him, she doesn't play stupid mind games, she doesn't disrespect him, and she doesn't engage in the ridiculous power struggles or complain about his idiosyncracies to preempt any hamstering for when she cheats on him like most women do. She rewards him for being a gentlemen who treats her well and that's how I know she's a quality female.

Conclusion

While I'll be the first to acknowledge that these women aren't perfect, they're the only two females I've ever met who were born and raised U.S. soil who have a good understanding of the true definition of womanhood. Both women are all about making their men and children happy rather than adopting the "what's in it for me" mindset of today's American female.

Sure, Leigh has her issues with her boyfriend from time to time—who doesn't? And I'm sure Heather and Adam don't live in marital bliss 24 hours a day on account of their 5 children and making ends meet on a single income.

Yes, they have both have siblings who didn't quite turn out like they did. Heather's younger sister was rumored to have slept with a few dudes in the youth group. She ended up marrying a bad boy, had a couple of kids with him and, surprise surprise, she's now divorced from him and every other week she either loves him or hates him. And Leigh's twin sister has all but embraced spinsterhood by all accounts.

In the end, I'm sure there are details about Leigh and Heather's situations I'm not aware of. But as a man with game, I'm adept at recognizing when a woman warrants being recognized as a quality female. Even though most women in the West aren't worth committing to long term, these two certainly are and it should come as no surprise they are both spoken for by men with options.

Read Next: In Defense Of American Women

