Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

3 Reasons You Should Try Phenibut

July 7, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Good Looking Loser and written by Donovan Sharpe.

I've written articles in the past that have touched on my experience with Kratom. The first one I wrote briefly touched on how I incorporate it into my daily regimen. The second went much more in depth in terms of my first experience with it, how it affected me, and the adjustments I made to get the most it.

Today, I'd like to discuss a compound called Phenibut.

In short, Phenibut is sold as a nutritional supplement in the U.S. and Europe (sold as a psychotropic drug in Russia). Its main uses are alleviate general anxiety, social anxiety, PTSD and insomnia but it's also used proactively to improve overall neurological function which is the reason I wanted to give it a try.

This compound is mainly used for people who suffer from various anxiety disorders and is easily the main effect.

Personally, I'm not one who suffers from traditional anxiety but Phenibut definitely gives me an 'attitude adjustment' or a noticeable sense of calm or stress reduction.

When using Phenibut alone, 500 milligrams (1 serving) is more than enough to give me this sense of calm. Though I've never had a problem talking to people and being social, it drastically reduces my cynicism and gives me a better overall sense of well-being.

It's like I actually really want to talk to people.

One effect that is unique to me when I take nootropics like Kratom and Phenibut is that my mind starts thinking of ways to improve myself in every way shape and form. I'm one who enjoys progress every bit as much as the result so when these compounds start to take effect, it always puts me in a great mood for no other reason but that I'm thinking about things I really like to do. Perpetual optimism.

Kratom and Phenibut have their similarities in terms of the physical effects but the cognitive effects from person-to-person is where these compounds really shine. It may take some trial and error, but every person will have their own unique mental effect and discovering this is pretty cool.

I've used Phenibut several times over the past two weeks and, in addition to the sense of well-being, highly recommend giving it a try for these three reasons:

1. You'll sleep like a baby (at higher doses)

The first day I tried Phenibut I took 1500 milligrams that morning (3 scoops), 500 milligrams 6 hours later, then another 500 milligrams in the afternoon for a total of 2500 milligrams in about a 12 hour period. That's not a large dose but it's not a small one either—especially for a first time user.

About 10 minutes after I took that last afternoon dose, I decided to lay down on my couch for a power nap before getting some work done. I didn't feel overly drowsy or high, I just felt the need to lay down for a few minutes. I closed my eyes at 4:25pm….

…and didn't wake up until 1:30am in the morning! Not only did I miss numerous calls and texts from my business partner, I missed a midnight rendezvous with a girl I'd been wanting to bang for a while.

I caught up on my work the next day and was able to reschedule my tryst so it wasn't a total loss of a day, but I was clearly in over my skis as a virgin user. However, the sleep I got that afternoon and night was probably the best I'd slept in quite a while.

I don’t remember dreaming, tossing, or turning. I was in such a deep sleep I didn’t even hear my phone ringing and buzzing away. When I finally woke up I was so rested and refreshed I just stayed up and carried on with the rest of my day and was incredibly productive.

I certainly didn’t overdose but I probably took more than I should have my first time around. That said, anytime I need a good night’s sleep I take 1000 milligrams (2 scoops) about an hour before bed. Your individual results may vary but this stuff will definitely put you in an REM sleep like you’ve never experienced before.

2. Sex will feel better (At any dose)

[image]

Personally, Phenibut drastically heightens my sense of touch. I hadn’t realized this until after having sex with a girl one night when she said “your orgasm faces are more….crazy lately.” In other words, the intensity of my orgasms were increasing.

When I finally put two and two together and figured out that blowing my top felt better on day’s I’d taken it, I knew I was onto something. The fact is, Phenibut made my cock more sensitive and as a result, sex felt much better. I’m not a scientist nor will I pretend to be but the neurological effects of this compound probably explains the increased sensitivity on my skin.

According to Good Looking Loser, this compound can also be used by women (proof included) to greatly increase their sexual pleasure and give girls legitimately mind-blowing orgasms. Being the selfish mother fucker that I am, I haven’t shared my supply nor do I intend to any time soon and if you get the same feeling I got you probably won’t either.

3. You can stack it with Kratom

[image]

This is, by far and away, the biggest reason you should try Phenibut. Stacking it with Kratom not only dramatically increases the effect of the strain of Kratom you burn, it lasts a hell of a lot longer.

Phenibut takes anywhere between 1 and 4 hours to take effect depending on the person and the size and time of his last meal. Kratom, on the other hand, takes 20 minutes or less to take effect depending on the same factors. Putting the two together takes advantage of Phenibut’s longevity and Kratom’s euphoria.

For example, on days want to lift heavy I’ll stack about 2 grams of a faster Kratom strain like Hyper Hippo, or Kicker Hippo with 500 to 1000 milligrams of Phenibut. The result is a high level of energy and motivation that lasts through my workout and my subsequent bike ride. The Kratom usually starts to wear off right at the beginning of my ride but Phenibut extends the effect about 3-fold.

On days when I need to get a good night’s sleep I’ll stack 500 to 1000 milligrams of Phenibut with a slower Kratom Strain like Sleepy Hippo or Snuggie Hippo. The result is a deeper more restorative sleep that lasts through the night (I'd make sure you have at least 7 hours to dedicate to sleep before trying this combination).

Conclusion

Though I'm still tinkering with different combinations, doses, and timing it's safe to say Phenibut will definitely become a fixture in my arsenal. As far as I'm concerned, it's the Swiss army knife of nootropics because of its many utilities and capabilities of enhancing other compounds.

Be sure to start with low doses and work your way up. This guide is a good place to start if you're starting from the ground up and what to know how to use it. Phenibut is strong stuff and you shouldn't take it more than a couple days a week. And always remember to rotate your Kratom strains to keep your tolerance low and your pockets fat.

You can check out the compound that I'm talking about here –

- Phenibut from Happy Hippo

Until next time, gents.

-Donovan Sharpe

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Top 5 Articles From June 2015

July 7, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK published over 92 articles last month. Here are the top 5:

1. 5 Modern Day Social Justice Warriors Who Would Have Been Institutionalized In The Past

> In the past, anyone who made the kinds of statements spat forth by prominent SJWs would have been condemned to an insane asylum.

2. Why Tribal Patriarchy Is The Best Model For Society

> Society falls apart as the crucial role of mothering gets outsourced to daycares, women enter the workforce where they stir up more trouble, wages plummet, costs rise, homemaking becomes financially improbable, and society turns into a nuthouse with feral children running around spouting Cultural Marxism because they don't know any better.

3. 5 Reasons Not To Have A Breadwinner Wife

> There isn't more money for you. It is her money. Traditional men look at women as sacred possessions and take pride in providing for their women and children. Women, even good women, just don't have this characteristic. Money she earns is her money and she isn't going to be smart with it.

4. 5 Things That Have Ruined American Women

> …girls are indoctrinated at a very young age that even the most harebrained of schemes will always work out in the end as long as you believe. All loves, even when they involve the poorest of choices, are meant to be. Who cares if your parents disapprove? Is it any wonder that American women can't handle the smallest of failures or that they are terrible at picking a suitable partner?

5. 8 Lessons On Managing Women From The Bored Wives Club

> My wife recently spent an afternoon with three of her girlfriends from college. When men get together, it is usually around a sports event. It rarely gets down to a personal level. But for women, an afternoon with the girls can mean that deep secrets come out, and in this case they did.

And here is my newest book review:

- The Principal Tenets Of Stoicism By Seneca

You can review all articles we published last month on our archives page.

Don't Miss: Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

FSU Quarterback DeAndre Johnson's Dismissal Shows That It Is Open Season On Persecuting Male Athletes

July 8, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Florida State Freshman quarterback DeAndre Johnson was dismissed from the football team today after a security video showed him punching a female classmate in a bar. The incident happened last month, at which point Johnson was suspended, but after the revelation of the video he was permanently kicked off the team.

Breaking down the confrontation

Predictably, the narrative plastered all over TV was "College athlete slugs female student" leaving out any context or details that led to Johnson sticking the girl with a right cross.

In the essence of fairness, your humble correspondent is going to break this down for you:

0:05 – Johnson looks to politely ask a female to his left to allow him through to the bar

0:07 – A different female student to the right whips around and says something to Johnson, who ignores her and tries to maintain his position in line

0:13 – Female student whips around again, seemingly unprovoked, and starts yelling at Johnson

0:15 – Johnson is now enraged after having been confronted twice by the female student

0:16 – Female student raises her fist and appears to be threatening Johnson

0:17 – Johnson, not wanting to be struck, grabs her arm to prevent her from swinging.

0:18 – Johnson appears to be warning her not to swing at him and continues to restrain her

0:22 – Female student uses her other fist to punch Johnson

0:23 – Johnson retaliates by punching the female student back

That breakdown is a long way from "athlete hits woman." But men here know the SJW agenda all but guarantees men will never get a fair shake in the court of public opinion, and increasingly in the court of law.

Clearly the girl was the aggressor in this situation. But, as usual, her responsibility is shoved to the side with cliches like "he should have just walked away" and "there's no reason for a man to hit a woman."

The typical reaction

So a male athlete cold-cocks a female…again. It's caught on video…again. And scores of white knights and female sports pundits jumped on the "throw him to the gallows" bandwagon…again.

Things got off to a fast start on Mike and Mike In The Morning on ESPN radio with both Mikes condemning Johnson's actions and agreeing wholeheartedly with Florida State's decision to dismiss him from the team.

But Colin Cowherd was exponentially more judgmental when he opined on the topic (and I'm paraphrasing here):

> I'm a forgiving guy. I understand guys make mistakes, they screw up, that's life. But if you hurt children or hit women, I'm done with you. Don't want you as my friend, don't want you on my team, don't want you anywhere around me…
>
> …DeAndre Johnson should have just walked away. Life's not fair and women aren't held to the same physical standard as men. Be a grown up and walk away. You're a Division I athlete. Act like it.

[image]
Johnson

I've listened to The Herd with Colin Cowherd for almost a decade, and for my money he is easily the most talented sports talk radio host of our time. He has a unique take on social issues as they apply to sports. In a word, Cowherd is nothing short of brilliant and that's probably an understatement.

But he too has jumped on the SJW train, and it's disappointing because he drops red pill truth on his show just about every day. One would think he's just toeing the company line to keep his $2 million annual salary, and I wouldn't blame him.

However, on issues pertaining to domestic violence he is uncharacteristically close-minded. It's black and white to him. As far as he's concerned if a man hits a woman he's in the wrong 100% of the time no matter what the circumstances.

Cowherd's attitude is prevalent in the minds of sports fans and sports media alike, and this is what ignites these pseudo lynch mobs when the shit hits the fan between a man and a woman.

Something unexpected…

Let's go back to my morning bike ride—the time I listen to Mike and Mike in the morning. The two Mikes are going through their usual battery of berating the athlete for hitting a woman "regardless of the environment or circumstances" when they decide to start reading Twitter reactions to the situation.

The first one they decide to read is from a woman named Linda. Mike Greenberg reads the tweet:

> Our first tweet comes from Linda who says "The female student shouldn't have put her hands on him in the first place. If she doesn't hit him, she doesn't get hit.

Dead. Fucking. Silence.

I sported an ear to ear grin for what seemed like a solid five seconds of dead air as the Mikes were no doubt trying to think of a way to explain away Linda's assertion that cut right to the heart of the issue: This woman brought this on herself.

Linda was dead on. If the girl doesn't swing on Johnson, Johnson doesn't swing on her and that's all there is to it. You saw in the video that she was ready to get physical from the onset and Johnson did his best to de-escalate the situation by restraining her and preventing her from hitting him. We all know what happened next.

Cowherd was the next to get a dose of truth from a woman. Angela called in and gave Colin an earful about how the female student was every bit as responsible as Johnson was for the incident:

> She shouldn't have hit him. You can't expect to hit somebody, man or woman, and expect them to sit there and take it. Now he was wrong for hitting her like he did but if she doesn't hit him in the first place have we're not having this discussion right now.

The sharp and quick-witted Cowherd is much quicker on his feet than Mike and Mike and managed to rebuttal Angela's accurate assessment with more of the same black and white, bull headed rationale and got her off the phone (well…cut her off) to further drive home his point.

Men and women alike are beginning to publicly acknowledge this is a two way street

The fact that two women were allowed to share opposing opinions of the overall narrative that Johnson was the only one in the wrong was not only surprising, but showed that once again women know women. And when it comes down to it, women know deep down that most domestic violence situations are a two-way street.

It is officially open season on pro and amateur athletes

It's actually been open season for quite a while. Ask Dallas Cowboys defensive end Greg Hardy, who was never convicted of what he was accused of but was suspended for the first 11 games of the 2015 season by NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell anyway.

Hardy

Ask former University of Alabama football player Jonathan Taylor who was falsely accused of domestic violence and dismissed from the team immediately and not allowed back after his accuser not only recanted her accusation, but was later arrested for filing a false police report. Taylor has yet to find a spot on another college roster.

These and many other cases, including Johnson's, is further proof that athletes are not just targets for gold diggers, but targets in general. The fact that a woman hit an athlete, and that athlete retaliates by hitting her back, and the athlete is the only individual punished or charged with a crime, sets a dangerous precedent.

Any woman at all can do just about whatever she wants to a professional or college athlete and get away with it while the athlete's career is threatened and sometimes even ended by so much as an accusation, much less a video of the incident.

Conclusion

The bottom line is that if she hadn't put her hands on Johnson, Johnson would not have put his hands on her, as Linda the tweeter summed it up. Nobody's condoning hitting women, or saying domestic violence is okay. But it's clear at this point that in most cases women are every bit as culpable for shit hitting the fan as the men are.

It's no coincidence that in the two most publicized cases of athletes' violence against women that have been caught on video, the woman was the aggressor. Janay Rice put her hands on Ray Rice before he knocked her out in the elevator and this petulant college chick punched Johnson before he punched her.

Ray and Janay Rice in the midst of a media firestorm in the wake of the release of the elevator video

And if you think these two women throwing the first punch in these cases are exceptions to the rule, you're kidding yourself. Men rarely hit women for no reason and these two cases shine a light on this truth that few people outside the manosphere seems to want to grasp.

SJWs obviously want Johnson to endure every type of punishment short of deportation, but State's Attorney Willie Meggs only charged Johnson with misdemeanor battery. Johnson turned himself in and was released on $500 bond. So much for a "heinous crime."

One might think that DeAndre Johnson's college career is finished and most of the time you'd be right. But new reports have surfaced that the woman Johnson decked called him a nigger and that there are witnesses who are willing to testify to this on the stand.

Only time will tell if there is any truth to this but if these reports are true, it throws this saga into a whole 'nother realm which is another discussion. For now, this could lead to Johnson getting a second chance at another university because SJWs in the racial sector will most assuredly come to his defense.

It's getting to the point where college and professional athletes not only risk their wealth by mingling with females, but also their futures and freedom. And since athletes, amateur and professional, will always attract females in droves there will always be potential for these run-ins.

Eventually, something's gotta give.

Read Next: The Shameless Exploitation Of Domestic Violence In The NFL

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Developing Your Personal Brand Is The Key To Great Game

July 8, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A lot of guys feel that they have to be a certain physical type — tall, good looking, chiseled etc. — or emulate a particular conversational approach in order to be successful with women, but this is not the case. I have recently been privileged to observe the game of two friends of mine, both very different types of men. Watching them has convinced me that there is a multiplicity of approaches to succeeding with women and that the key to optimising your own chances is working out what your selling points are and developing a personal brand around them.

Let me give you a pen portrait of both of my friends. Even in outline, you will see that they are very different.

Dave is tall with the body shape of a large refrigerator. A former mechanic, he has made enough money through a series of property deals not to have to work. A regular at the clubs and bars where he lives, he knows everyone, and anyone he doesn’t know he can talk around in a matter of minutes. While good-looking, he is no film star, but without doubt he is an imposing figure with considerable personal magnetism.

His style with women is direct, but not just direct in the “I-noticed-you-and-thought-you-were-cute” way – no, this guy is off the scale. Without any exaggeration, I have heard him introduce himself to girls by speculating how their pussies taste. He is upfront about how “filthy” he is, and how he will fuck nothing less than the dirtiest girls.

Reading this you will probably imagine that he gets slapped a hell of a lot, but amazingly the opposite is true. Perhaps it is the twinkle in his eye, his sheer, unabashed audacity, or the fact that he coats his no-nonsense sexuality with a lot of charm, but I have seen girls lapping this stuff up, giving him anime eyes and melting in his presence. His “brand” is the tough guy who is unashamedly sexual, but who has a heart too.

Peter is his physical opposite. Very short – just over five foot-six – he has a slender frame and a handsome but unspectacular face topped with a floppy, Hugh Grant haircut. He is highly intelligent, a Harvard MBA who now works in finance (although he doesn’t advertise the fact when he’s out). He has studied game, unlike Dave who is a natural.

His method is indirect – the complete opposite Dave’s. He is the king of conversation. Seriously, if you put him in a sealed room with the Mona Lisa he’d have her cracking a smile and bantering within minutes. Highly intelligent, with loads of energy and persistence, his “brand” is the super-articulate, super-social guy who can vibe everyone at the party before going in for the kill with his favourite girl at the end of the night.

Enhance Your Attributes

While I have felt dry and inarticulate next to both men while they’ve hogged the limelight in whatever club or bar we’ve been in, it it is difficult to argue that either has “better” game because their styles are so radically opposed. The fact that both are able to command the attention of women and stoke their attraction merely underlines the fact that “good game” doesn’t come in one homogenous package and that in order to succeed you need to identify your own strengths and exacerbate these.

I could look at Dave and think that I need to get jacked and develop a gruff cockney accent. Or I might consider Paul and bemoan the fact that I didn’t study business at an Ivy League school. But that would be a mistake. The fact is that their game works for them is because it is entirely coherent with their individual personalities. If I tried to copy either of them I would come over as inauthentic and put off more girls off than I attracted.

Game is not about complete personal reinvention. Rather, it is about enhancing your best attributes and – most importantly – believing in them so passionately that this communicates itself to the girls you approach. So if you are an economics nerd then don't try to dumb down – instead own your knowledge and display it. Similarly, if you are a physical, sporty guy who is less interested in witty banter then don't worry – play to your own particular strengths.

What is important to realise that successful guys come in all shapes and sizes and have wildly different approaches. So don't try to live up to some imagined level of "good game." Instead, sit down and honestly list your most obvious characteristics. Then select the most positive of these and start to work out how they can be most attractively packaged.

Doing this is the first step to building your own personal brand and will ensure that you are authentically attractive to women rather than a pale imitation of someone else.

Read More: Use The "Run Strike" Rule To Improve Your Dating Life

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Swedish Government Spends Billions On Gender Equality With Little Effect

July 8, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The former right-wing government of Sweden spent 2.6 billion crowns on “gender equality” initiatives—roughly 315 million dollars. The results? According to a study done by the Swedish National Audit Office, it might not make any long-term difference.

Although the government’s expensive efforts to promote equality between the sexes had a temporary effect, the new study shows that they risk not causing any long lasting change. An author of the study, Margareta Åberg, says that parts of what has been accomplished risks “disappearing when the money does.”

A brief history of gender mainstreaming

Feminist leader Gudrun Schyman burns money for attention in 2010.

Since 1994 the Swedish government has striven to implement a gender equality perspective on everything it does, from making decisions to putting them into practice. This strategy is known as “gender mainstreaming.” Every government agency, from local to national level, now has a responsibility to achieve the ultimate goal of equality between men and women.

In the 2006 election the people of Sweden replaced the old socialist government with a coalition of right-wing parties, called the Alliance. Thus they assumed the mantle of turning the country into a society with no difference in outcome between the sexes. One example of their goals was to make men and women do the same amount of unpaid household work.

Quickly the new administration went to work, and obviously did not hold back on expenses. From 2007 to 2014 the government spent 2.6 billion crowns on a variety of projects to promote gender equality. The huge expenditure of taxpayer money is unique for this kind of investment in Sweden.

The government’s primary objective was to end men’s violence against women, prostitution, and trafficking. Around half of the money, 1.2 billion crowns, was spent to this end. Of that amount, a great portion went to combating honor-related violence, which is typically overwhelmingly isolated to immigrant populations. Policemen, attorneys, and judges were expensively educated on the subject.

One funded project which got much attention in Swedish media this winter was gender-equal snow clearing. This has been implemented in several cities. Statistics show that women walk and ride bicycles more often than men, while men drive cars more often than women. Clearing snow in a gender equal way means that sidewalks and bicycle paths are the first to be cleared, and then roads. That way, women will have an easier time of getting around than men. This apparently counts as a step toward equality.

Same bad ideas, different government

Deputy Prime Minister Åsa Romson explains the evils of men.

The Swedish National Audit Office has studied whether the billions of crowns of government funding will have a long term effect or not. Its conclusion is pessimistic. Many of the projects were temporary and will not be continued. Furthermore, a substantial amount of the money was never used for its intended purpose, partly due to government agencies being unprepared and having no plan for how to use their added resources.

Helene Odenljung of the Liberal People's Party, which was a part of the right-wing coalition, agrees with the critique but maintains that the money produced good results. "I think that it is a hint to the next government, to do something similar actually, to continue the efforts that have been made," she says to Sveriges Radio.

Last year the current left-wing government was elected, consisting of the Social Democratic Party and the Green Party. If they are more apt to use taxpayer money in an effective way remains to be seen. Without a doubt, though, they will continue enforcing feminist policies on the Swedish people. In a speech last summer, Deputy Prime Minister Åsa Romson went on a misandric tirade, blaming men in general for global warming.

> It is rich men who cause the emissions and it is the poorest women who become the greatest victims, she professed to a cheering crowd

The Prime Minister himself, Stefan Löfven, said this in a speech after winning the election:

> Sweden's new government is a feminist government. Repressive gender roles and structures will be fought.

He continued by threatening companies on the stock exchange with imposing affirmative action. If women don't make up at least 40 percent of boards by 2016, he will use legislation to enforce it. The Prime Minister also said that government agencies will be given a clearer task of applying gender mainstreaming to all of their activities.

Taking freedom away to reach Utopia

The man in charge, Prime Minister Stefan Löfven.

Despite their many differences, Stefan Löfven's administration is carrying on the political aspirations of its right-wing predecessor. Both want to get women to work, and men to stay in the household cleaning and raising children. If this does not happen naturally, well, they surely have no other option than to pass laws that demand it.

A commonality between most Swedish politicians of today is their affection for social engineering. If they don't have a plan for creating a completely gender-equal society, the people will not see any reason to vote for them. Freedom, in the sense of absence of coercion, is a term never used in political debates. Everyone agrees, as no Swede could ever question without being virulently chastised and alienated, that equality is the ultimate good.

Whatever the color of the government in place, Sweden will continue on the social engineering trail. It cannot be said for certain if the politicians and social justice warriors will ever reach their utopian goal. What is obvious, however, is that they won't spare any expenses using other people's money to get there.

Read More: Why Gender Equality Is So Bothersome

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

Woman Demands £7 Million For Feelings Hurt While Working At London Bank

July 9, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Just days after David Garrett published his report on Hannah Bouveng, the Wall Street intern who pocketed an obscene $18 million in punitive damages for sexual harassment, English papers publish details of a finance worker seeking £7 million in compensation from a German bank because its "frat club" culture made her feel excluded on the trading floor.

Forex manager Jenus Fiouzi claims that key decisions at Commerzbank were made at men-only boozing sessions to which she was not invited. Do these women have legitimate grievances which are grave enough to warrant punitive damage that runs to the £millions, or is litigation against the employer simply another career move for female employees who want to be given something for nothing?

Fiouzi, who was on a £130,000 salary in Commerzbank's London office, is claiming the £7 million for "injury to feelings," unfair dismissal, and sex and race discrimination. She says of the culture at the Bank, which sacked her in October 2014, was that of a > German male-dominated environment, especially in the senior management ranks. On and off the trading floor there was a German 'boys' club' culture at the bank, which I would describe as akin to a college fraternity or frat club. There were no senior female managers in sales that I can recall.

Commerzbank traders making important trading decisions, yesterday.

She complains that some of the traders at the bank would go out for drinks after work, whilst failing to invite her. She describes how her German colleagues would discuss work matters at these drinks, from which she was excluded: “It then became evident to me that decisions about work matters were being taken during drinking sessions because when the same matters later came up in the office, I was out of the loop.”

With particularly lucid analysis she notes: “The men’s social relationships really strengthened their working relationships, so by excluding me from the social side, I felt they put up a barrier at work.”

Fiouzi says that the men used to talk across her in the office in their native German, which she doesn’t speak, adding: “This excluded me and made me feel uncomfortable and marginalised. There genuinely were two sets of rules. One for German men and one for me.” Commerzbank denies the allegations, and say Fiouzi was “disruptive” and was sacked due to performance shortcomings.

A last roll of the dice

Fiouzi’s trial is ongoing, so it looks difficult to judge the merit of complaints simply on the statements that have been published. But one thing is clear: big-money claims by women in corporate and city jobs have now become a routine career move for female employees in male-dominated industries in the UK.

Whereas there are not many British cases that touch the rank absurdity of US cases like Ellen Pao and the “oppressed” Hanna Bouveng, English Employment Tribunals have seen a steady trickle of cases brought by grievance-mongering female employees.

- In February 2015, a city lawyer, Margaret Rowe, sued the asset management firm she worked for because a department head showed other employees a full-frontal painting of his wife. Her manager told the tribunal manager, that Rowe constantly made aggressive and false accusations that she was being treated differently because she was a woman.
- In April 2013, a woman banker won her sex discrimination claim against her new employer after they sacked her, having found out that she was making a sex discrimination claim against her old employer. The woman was suing the old bank for allegedly promoting men ahead of her. She lost her sex discrimination claim but won on “victimisation” due to the way she as treated
- In May 2010 a lawyer sacked by leading firm Allen & Overy sued for sex discrimination after they gave her the heave-ho for writing an erotic novel. She complained of ‘sexual persecution’ by her 60-year old boss, but then started writing a newspaper column bearing such surprising comments as “The human male has evolved to slap his slutty woman.”
- In April 2010 two women brought £3 million compensation claims against Nomura, the Japanese bank, complaining that they had had to hear taunts that women “belonged cleaning floors.” Their claim was thrown out after the tribunal found that the “remarks were trivial, not intended to be offensive”

These two special snowflakes were unable to handle the Bantz.

- In June 2008, a lawyer who sued her finance firm employer for £19 million for sexist bullying was revealed to have been going on interviews for high-powered jobs whilst claiming to be “mentally disabled” and unable to work
- In April 2001, an analyst at a leading city brokerage was paid £1.4 million in compensation after suing her firm for sex discrimination. Her gripe was that she was paid a bonus of £25,000, far less than some of her male colleagues. The bank doubled the bonus to £50,000, even though the woman had had cancer and then became pregnant at the relevant time.

Not only the suits are at it

And if the city cases are not enough to go round, there are also ample cases involving straight-up cases of women being shoe-horned into male professions and then crying foul when they are dispensed with for not being able to do their jobs. These cases include:

- In May 2014, a female chef had her claim against her restaurant employer thrown out. She told the tribunal there was a “culture of sexist behaviour and language” and said she was locked in a freezer and her bum was slapped. The Tribunal chairman said in his ruling that: “We find that on numerous occasions Chloe Maisey lied or wildly embellished facts to embolden her claims. She left because she couldn’t handle the long hours.”
- In February 2014, Two female police officers who sued their employer and won £70,000 for providing guns that were too big for their hands and protective gear too big for their heads.
- In February 2012 a female firefighter, Katie Reid, sued her employer, East Sussex Fire Authority, for sex discrimination, after they took her off duty because she was too short to do her job. East Sussex settled the case.

You'd be off your rocker to have her on the payroll.

The newest racket in town

And there are many, many more that there is no space to republish here. Employment Tribunals in the UK have become a casino for women who, thrown into the brutal realities of male-dominated environments, find themselves on the one hand told by their social programming that "women are the same as men" and on the other hand given feedback from the environment that perhaps they are not the hot shit that Cosmo told them they are.

Once in this quandary they look for something to blame, and what better mechanism to relieve them of personal responsibility than the UK's draconian and corrosive "equality" legislation?

The Equality Act of 2010, the last piece of legislative vandalism signed into law by a Labour party ready for decades of political wilderness ahead, consolidates all previous minority-worshipping, grievance-enabling legislations into one compact Act. The act is a restatement of the classic, liberal formulations of "discrimination," enacted to EU standards and mirrored in US legislation.

More precisely, it bears the "two bites of the cherry" liberal formulation of discrimination: direct and indirect discrimination. You are directly discriminated if you are treated less favourably because you are a woman, you are indirectly discriminated if some measure, all things being equal, affects more women negatively more than it does than men.

British visionary and statesman Godfrey Bloom was right on the money when he said that "no self-respecting small businessman with a brain in the right place would ever employ a lady of child-bearing age"

This two-level configuration gives chancers and supplicants a million and one angles to sue their employers for on the most spurious of grounds. The physical aptitude or characteristics cases above are a case in point. If the police department does not spend ridiculous money to accommodate women by sourcing smaller guns or by lowering fitness thresholds, the it is being "discriminatory." The tail is wagging the dog.

The Equality Act also carries forward the notion of "harassment," which, as we have seen from the American notion in the Hannah Bouveng, can persist even where the "victim" is willfully engaging in sex with her alleged "harasser." Harassment is a catch-all provision which allows any behaviour, no matter how innocuous, to be presented as evidence of a vile excrescence of the male locker-room.

Modern feminism is a case of damned if you do, damned if you don't. Women are strong and weak, vulnerable and domineering, capable as any man at the same time as needing accommodation, all in the same breath.

In order to achieve true workplace equality, and allow strong women to thrive in male workplaces without being stigmatised by chancers playing the "woman card," the Conservative government must repeal all equality legislation and remove from the purview of Employment Tribunals any right to adjudicate on petty grievances based on sex, gender or race.

Only by denying the chancers the trump cards up their sleeves will we return to a truly competitive economy based on merit, rather than competition of victimhoods.

Read More: Feminist Typist Posts Naked Photo, Demands Absolute State

Monopoly On Violence

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

Contemporary Art Reflects Our Cultural Degeneracy

July 9, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The performance art of Emma Sulkowicz is only the latest example in the long decline of Western art. Her recent failed effort at amateur pornography, entitled Ceci N'est Pas Un Viol in a sad attempt to make it sound sophisticated, was done under her own auspices.

But her earlier classic of "endurance performance art," Carry That Weight, where she hauled a 50-pound dorm mattress around as she attended class, was sponsored by Columbia University as her senior thesis for her visual arts degree.

But Sulkowicz's sophomoric attention whoring is only the tip of the iceberg. Contemporary art as a whole is ugly, narcissistic, puerile, and degenerate—in other words, it is a perfect indicator of the health of Western culture.

Art in a healthy society

Art is not utilitarian. The primary purpose of art is to be beautiful—to lift up the soul.

Classical Greek sculpture and architecture are good examples of this. The statues of that period capture the ideal human figure while buildings, such as the Parthenon, reflect the order of the universe.

Of course, there are other reasons why people create art. Sometimes art is didactic, as in the case of the stained glass windows of the medieval cathedrals. These windows depicted scenes from the bible and the lives of the saints as a way of teaching illiterate people about the Christian faith.

At other times, art may have a political message. An example of this is the Medici Chapels in Florence. These exquisite monuments proclaim the wealth and high culture of the Medici family.

Medici Chapels

But even with these examples, the primary purpose of these works is still beauty. The stained glass windows are beautiful even apart from the biblical events that they depict. A modern day visitor to the Medici Chapels who knows nothing of that powerful family will still find the Chapels awe-inspiring.

So in a healthy society, art is not used primarily as vehicle to convey some political message or to be used as propaganda.

The beginning of the decline of Western art

Caspar David Friedrich – Wanderer Above the Sea of Fog

It is difficult to pinpoint exactly when art started to decline. My own guess is that the decline had its roots in Romanticism, an artistic movement that originated in the late 18th century and ended around 1850. The Romantic period emphasized the originality, emotion, and individualism of the artist.

At first glance, these do not seem to be bad values, but they set the stage for future degeneration. With originality, artists begin to feel the need to be completely unique. Each artist must represent a complete break with everything that came before him as well as his contemporaries. Introducing the emotion of the artist will eventually become making the art all about the artist's feelings.

Marcel Duchamp – L.H.O.O.Q.

The art of the Romantic period is still beautiful and strangely powerful, but seeds planted during that period germinated in the 20th century with Dadaism movement, which may be best exemplified by the work L.H.O.O.Q. Although it was a small, avant-garde movement, Dada demonstrates that by the early 20th century, Western culture was already showing signs of exhaustion.

Contemporary art

Fortunately, the Dadaism movement was short lived, but that doesn't mean that Western culture suddenly became healthy again. On the contrary, if we look at what passes for art today, it is difficult not to think that our culture is in a terminal stage.

Performance art

Shia LaBeouf – I Am Not Famous Anymore

The most obvious offender against beauty and sanity is "performance art." In addition to Emma Sulkowicz's garbage, there are examples like actor Shia LaBeouf's stunt at a Berlin film festival where he sat on a chair with a paper bag that said, “I’m not famous anymore,” over his head.

After it was revealed that LaBeouf had posted plagiarized Tweets, he staged another piece of performance art entitled #IAMSORRY. In the piece, LaBeouf sat in a room wearing a paper bag. Visitors were allowed to enter one at a time with something that might be humiliating to LaBeouf such as an Indiana Jones whip or a copy of a book that he lifted the Tweets from.

Shia LaBeouf – #IAMSORRY

During one of these visits, LaBeouf claims he was raped. According to TMZ, a “woman walked into the private room — where he was having silent one-on-one interactions with fans—and whipped his legs for 10 minutes, then stripped off his clothes and ‘proceeded to rape’ him.”

LaBeouf and Sulkowicz are not alone. There are tons of other ridiculous examples of performance art. Literally anyone can do it as long as there is some “message.” This entertaining link has performance art that consists of a half-naked woman lying on the floor, a woman who screams at wine glasses, and a man in a colorful one-piece bathing suit who helps to awaken your inner child.

One of these artists (the half-naked woman) writes:

> As opposed to a struggling artist, I am an artist who struggles. I struggle mostly with the depression associated with bipolar disorder (Type II) and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), but also with art’s power, or lack thereof, or appropriateness thereof, to intervene in questions of justice in the world.

Who can argue with that?

Painting and sculpture

Anish Kapoor – Dirty Corner

Contemporary painting and sculpture are not as awful as performance art, but they are degenerate as well. They tend to either contain some trite left wing message that attacks traditional values or they are just plain ugly.

Under the first category of artwork with a message we have the sculpture entitled Dirty Corner. It was created by British artist Anish Kapoor and is on display at Versailles. The artist described the work as depicting the vagina of a queen taking power. The implication is that it depicts the vagina of Marie Antoinette, who was beheaded during the French Revolution.

Would the French government have purchased this work if the artist used a more apt description such as “failed megaphone”? I doubt it.

Paul McCarthy – Train

In a similar vein, there is American artist Paul McCarthy’s mechanical sculpture, Train, that depicts President George W. Bush sodomizing pigs. McCarthy also designed the giant green butt plug that is at the head of this article. Is this really art?

Francis Bacon – Painting (1946)

Under the second category of art that is simply ugly are the paintings of British artist Francis Bacon. He seemed to be obsessed with slaughterhouse imagery. The paintings definitely evoke feelings in the viewer, but they are not pleasant feelings.

Architecture

Frank Gehry – Guggenheim Museum, Bilbao

Contemporary architecture fares better because, at the end of the day, buildings must still be functional. However, architecture still suffers from the requirement that all of the art be completely original and unique to the architect. This is a departure from the way that architecture was done before, where architects elaborated upon the designs of their predecessors.

Take the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, which was designed by Frank Gehry. It is a striking, innovative design, but it is unique to Gehry. It has no antecedents, and I suspect that when Gehry dies, this design will die with him.

Conclusion

It would be wrong to blame artists for the decline of our culture. Rather, they are simply products of our culture and they are accurately reflecting the infantile, narcissistic, and leftist orientation of our society.

We can only hope that more artists will wake up from their indoctrination to once again start producing works of beauty, but for the foreseeable future, we will have to continue to endure more art by the Emma Sulkowiczs of this world.

Read More: How Modern Architecture Destroys Your Relationships

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How Adopting The Gorilla Mindset Can Improve Your Life

July 9, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Mike Cernovich and written by Winston Smith

I recently had the pleasure of reading Mike Cernovich's new book Gorilla Mindset, and wanted to share a few things that I learned.

Gorilla in your mind

A governing concept of the book is the dichotomy between a growth mindset and a fixed mindset. A fixed mindset, or one that believes innately in its own limitations, seems all-too-common among the millennial generation of instant gratification and participation trophies.

Mike starts right off by forcing you to take accountability for the way your life is progressing, since how you have chosen to frame your world affects your ability to improve it. On the matter of negative internal dialogue, he writes:

> If you talked to your friends like you talk to yourself, you wouldn't have any friends.

Self-talk is one of the important components in developing a growth mindset. Mike walks you through the steps necessary for many visualization exercises that can have an immediate impact. However, being a down-to-earth human, Mike knows when he's telling you something that sounds corny or may be a bit embarrassing, so he makes sure to provide ample justification and the real-life examples to start habits that you may initially find strange, but will soon be indispensable parts of your routine.

One of my favorite parts of the book emphasizes how to connect with other people, a lost art in a world where people spend hours a day looking at their phones and increasingly little time really interfacing with other people. Mike writes:

> To make deeper connections, you want the person you're talking to feel like the only person in the room. Mindfulness is helpful. When you feel distracted during a conversation, you can help yourself check in by using these two powerful mantras. I use them regularly, especially when there's a lull in conversation.
>
> - There's no place else I'd rather be.
> - There's no one else I want to see.
>
> When you tell yourself this, you actually believe it. When you believe there is nowhere else you'd rather be and no one else you'd rather see, the other person can feel it. You will make deeper, longer-lasting connections through this mindfulness technique.

Unlike other books in this genre, Mike focuses first on the internal benefits of rewiring your thought process. This isn't a "Get motivated so you can squat 500 pounds and make a million dollars!"-style book. However, if you're willing to make a small time investment to gain tangible improvements in the overall happiness and quality of your life, the chapters about fixing your mental processes are a perfect fit.

In this section, Mike also touches on the modern state of people in a permanent ADHD, where most of us can't peel our eyes from our phones for a few minutes. One of the most helpful parts of the book was the exercises that promote living "in the moment," which both reduce anxiety and make it easier to concentrate on the goals at hand. I won't spoil the specific techniques here, but they are quite useful.

Gorilla in your lifestyle

Branching off of the mindset exercises, the next segment of the book takes you through ways to improve your external lifestyle and habits. Mike covers his how-to list for sleep, willpower, warming up your mind in the morning, contrast showers, and many other things you've read about here and there on the internet, but distills the reasoning for them into a fast-paced and readable format.

For example, do you think of yourself as just another guy who's going to sit in an office all day? Mike makes the convincing case that you should prepare yourself for your day-to-day life the same way an elite athlete prepares for a competition.

> Gorilla Mindset shift: "My day is a serious athletic endeavor that requires me to actively warm up my body and mind."

I've tried Mike's warmups for the last few days. In short: they work. By adding this quick tip to my lifestyle, I have been more productive at work and feel more centered throughout the day. This doesn't even mention the valuable information about how to improve your willpower.

Gorilla for your body

The focus of this section is upon principles and how-tos rather than repeating tired dogma. Mike's tone is not "you must eat the paleo diet," but rather "here are studies that suggest how you can improve blood flow." Not just "you need to breathe more," but rather "here's an explanation of the value of breathing and a few exercises to accomplish it."

Mike writes in the same no-nonsense tone that you will recognize from his other sites, but strikes a useful balance of advocacy while avoiding proselytizing. He also includes helpful interviews with subject matter experts to give the book an even more authentic feel and a couple of different voices. My favorite part of this segment was the full section devoted to improving mood (and testosterone levels) with posture exercises, which I have found myself referring back to several times.

If there is one modest criticism I could levy at Gorilla Mindset, I would be that you may see some of the content as a review if you have strong familiarity with Mike's past work. However, even if you're Mike's biggest fan, Gorilla Mindset will pay for itself in the hours it saves you from filtering through Mike's prolific online presence spread across 100+ podcasts, at least 5 blogs, and thousands of solid Twitter comments.

Because of the sheer volume of information it may be one you reread many times even if you are familiar with Mike's brand, and for this reason it is a good purchase for everyone on the spectrum. The book is available in Kindle, print, and now audio (with two chapters free).

Conclusion

Perhaps the strongest takeaway message in Gorilla Mindset is that of personal responsibility. Even if you don't remember all of the specific breathing techniques, diet tips, psychological hacks, and potentially life-changing perspective shifts, the book still leaves you with an overwhelming sense that you control your own destiny.

In a world that constantly deprives us of our sense of possibility and agency, that alone is worth the price of admission.

-Winston Smith

Click here to buy your copy of Gorilla Mindset

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Title IX, The Education-Industrial Complex, And The Manufactured "War on Women"

July 10, 2015 | by Max Power | Link | Original Link

"[W]e must labour to make society understand that without academic freedom it will lose something it needs far more than it realizes: the free pursuit of truth and knowledge, as contrasted with their pursuit only within approved patterns, and criticism of society according to reason rather than according to the policies of the government of the day.", Sirluck (1974)

This note deals with a sensitive and emotionally-charged topic—sexual assault on college campuses—and we feel that the substance of the note is at risk of being consumed by the emotions surrounding that topic. This article is meant to address is political control of higher education through the use of federal funding guidelines.

What is Title IX?

Title IX is one portion of the Education Amendments of 1972 to the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The primary clause in the law states that:

> No person in the United States shall, on the basis of gender, be excluded from participation in, denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving federal financial assistance.

Enforcement of Title IX is handled by the Office of Civil Rights ("OCR") within the Department of Education. Punishments for violation can include on-campus monitoring by agents of the federal government and even a withdrawal of all federal funds being received by the school (including student loans to enrolled students).

The law's purview was expanded to include sexual harassment by faculty as a result of the 1979 Supreme Court case Alexander v Yale. The court found that sexual harassment was a form of discrimination and constituted a violation of Title IX. Over the course of the next twenty years, the law's reach has been expanded several times and by 2000 included cases of student-to-student harassment.

The law passed with no opposition in an environment where achieving gender-equality was given priority over all other concerns. As a result, no thought was given by Congress as to the implications of the law beyond its proximate intent. Indeed, since that time, integration has been more than fully achieved—eliminating the need for the law based on the original intent of Congress.

In 1972, at the time of passage, 44% of bachelor's degrees were conferred upon women; by 2009 (most recent data available) that number had reached 57.4%. As pointed out by Epstein (2003), the real social challenge is to explain the under-representation of men on college campuses.

The Human Capital Bubble And The Educational-Industrial Complex

To summarize this effect, investment in human capital is sensitive to real interest rates and rate of return expectations in the same manner as investment in capital goods. By artificially depressing real interest rates on student loans through guarantees and subsidies, the U.S. government created a boom in human capital investment.

Evidence of the bubble can be seen in Charts 1 and 2. The monotonic increase in loans outstanding (despite declines in all other forms of consumer credit) and the steady march upwards in inflation-adjusted borrowing bear the hallmarks of a single-minded bureaucracy.

In any investment bubble one can expect certain industries to grow rapidly and become very dependent on the continuation of the bubble; this case is no different. Not surprisingly, the industry most closely connected with a bubble fueled by student loans is higher education.

Business has been good in higher education over the past few decades. As we can see in Chart 3 below, teaching staff at post-secondary institutions in the U.S. nearly doubled between 1987 and 2011 (most recent data available). A large expansion of staff would be expected given that the number of students enrolled grew by 8 million during that period.

However, as we can see in Chart 4, even in the face of rapidly rising enrollments, the student faculty ratio has fallen significantly over the same period. As we said, business has been good.

Tables A and B below show in very stark terms just how important funds federally-provided funds (directly or indirectly) are for the higher education industry in the U.S. Nearly 30% of gross revenues for the higher education sector are the result of federal funding of one sort or another. Indeed, Table B shows us that the problem is even more acute at top institutions, which have become dependent to an existential level on federal grants to fund their research programs.

The simple fact is that, for many post-secondary institutions in the U.S., the threat of being cut off from federal funds is the threat of closure. Just as perversely, the institutions have a strong incentive to expand the power and scope of government in an effort to secure and enlarge their single-largest source of funds. Thus is born the educational-industrial complex.

Sources of Revenue for U.S. Universities and Colleges

	Total Revenues	Tuition	Federal Research Grants	Federal Student Loans
Public Universities	$323.8	$60.2	$29.8
Private: Non-for-Profit	$207.2	$60.0	$24.3
Private: For-Profit	$28.2	$25.2	$1.6
Total	$559.3	$145.4	$55.7	$106.4
Federal Share of Revenues	29.0%

Sources: Institute of Educational Studies.

Top 10 Recipients of Federal R&D Grants (2012)

	Total Grants (millions)	Share of R&D Spending
Johns Hopkins	$1,880	87.8%
Univ. of Washington - Seattle	$949	82.9%
Univ. of Michigan	$820	64.1%
Univ. of Pennsylvania	$707	79.8%
Univ. of Pittsburgh	$662	73.7%
Standford University	$656	72.3%
Columbia University	$645	73.4%
Univ. of California - San Diego	$637	63.1%
Univ. of Wisconsin - Madison	$594	53.4%
Duke University	$585	57.3%

Source: 24/7 Wall Street

Chart 5 below gives us a view of the growth in Federal post-secondary spending since the 1960s in inflation-adjusted terms. As we can see, funding exploded upwards in the early-2000s; primarily fueled by student loans and school grants (i.e. outright handouts).

The situation has developed such that when the federal government says “jump,” the higher education sector had better say “how high” if it knows what’s best.

This is not the first time a nation's higher education system has been brought under the control of government through the sedating drug of subsidies. The quote below is drawn from an article written in 1974 by the then-President of the University of Manitoba, Earnest Sirluck. Sirluck's goal in writing the article was to warn his colleagues against the dangers presented to academic independence as a result of the rise in government funding of higher education.

> …a growing disposition on the part of governments to 'co-ordinate' universities fully with other educational institutions… which means to make them simply the upper level of a fully integrated educational system thought to exist solely to serve society's needs as these are seen and interpreted by the government of the day. An ominous factor in this connection is that there is no longer an important deterrent in the form of a strong private sector. Many of what were originally private institutions survive and retain some of the trappings of independence, but not enough of the reality, having accepted and become dependent upon government financing…, Sirluck (1974)

Sirluck's main point is that by accepting government funds institutions of higher education become hostage to the shifting winds of politics and, by extension, the machinations of the politicians of the day.

Indeed, the growing federal infringement on higher education in the United States is only now becoming apparent to post-secondary administrators. In response to the Obama Administration's proposal to impose a federal ratings system on higher education, Jane Wellman, Executive Director, National Association of System Heads said this:

> The proposal would be a huge change in higher education, with the federal government asserting itself as the definer of institutional goals and policy, and doing it through need-based financial aid. The federal government has never been in higher education policy before – it has just administered financial aid…

We believe Sirluck's warning bears special significance in the context of the present-day U.S. The multiple shifts in control of Congress that have taken place since the mid-1990s have marked one of the most dynamic periods in American politics since the first decades of the 20th century. The last twenty years have been a political football match with two teams of severe partisans vying for power.

In any environment where there is a struggle for power, those who seek it will grab any weapon at hand with which to fight for control. It is in environments such as these that principle frequently falls victim to expediency. It is here where the story of Title IX meets the “War on Women” and the good-intentions of Progressive government meet the cruel realities of partisan politics.

The 2012 Election And The “War On Women”

Coming out of the “shellacking” of the 2010 election, President Obama and the Democratic Party needed a strategy to survive in 2012. A key factor driving the disappointing results for Democrats in 2010 was low turnout among single women. Single women are a fast-growing identity group that has become a core base of the Democratic Party’s coalition of identity-based special interest groups.

As we can see in Chart 6 below, in the decade leading up to the 2012 election the number of single women eligible voters had grown by 10 million – reaching near-parity with both married men and married women. In Chart 7 we see voting rates for single women are the most volatile among the married-unmarried demographic groups.

Indeed, although single-men men have a lower rate the volatility of their rate is below that of single women. Democrats needed to ensure single women would show up on Election Day 2012 in large numbers or the election would be lost.

By 2011, the heady optimism of Obama’s 2008 campaign was long gone — so the President and his party turned to a divide-and-conquer strategy. Taking a page from the Newt Gingrich playbook, the President’s re-election strategy was to smash the electorate into a million pieces and then try to pick up at least 51% of them by Election Day.

The tactic chosen by the Democrats to maximize votes was the paranoid and exclusionary “War on Women” campaign theme. The term itself was a product of legislative “Abortion Theater” in the aftermath of the so-called Conservative-revival of 2010.

In early-2011 the new Republican majority in the House of Representatives passed an anti-abortion bill pretending it could become law. Playing their part in the dance for the cameras, Democratic representatives gave breathless speeches pretending the bill might actually become law. During the debate over the law, the term “War on Women” was quietly born.

The term went mainstream in May 2011 upon the appointment of Debbie Wasserman-Shultz (“DWS”) as head of the Democratic National Committee. The “War on Women” talking point was a favorite of DWS and the term was soon picked up by the mainstream media. According to Slate, between January 1, 2012 and April 12, 2012 the term was used 24 times in the New York times and 26 in the Washington Post.

The “War on Women” propaganda theme worked well in 2012 because it encapsulated visceral feelings of identity with an adversary-based narrative simple enough for the media and the general public to intellectually digest.

Enter Title IX As A Partisan Weapon

Once the Democrats had settled on gender-antagonization as a campaign tactic, they needed catalysts for action that would motivate young women to vote, donate, and volunteer for Democrats. To be effective, a political catalyst must be emotionally-charged and strongly divisive at a clearly-delineated point on the political spectrum.

What better a topic than sex?

In 2011, the ongoing political-kabuki theater taking place around Obamacare provided ample opportunity for the campaign-issue generation machine do its work. The “free” birth-control debate is a prime example of the attempts to artificially generate political catalysts to attract young women to the polls.

Another topic chosen to act as a key catalyst was the emotionally charged issue of sexual assault. This is where Title IX enters the picture and the story gets very ugly.

As discussed above, Title IX was originally enacted to end gender-based discrimination in academia. It was later expanded to include sexual harassment and assault, in the case of employees of the institutions receiving funds from the federal government.

It was not until the OCR’s Dear Colleague letter of April 4, 2011 that Title IX was applied to sexual assault by students; thus making schools directly accountable for the sexual behavior of students.

The date of the letter’s publication plays an important role in connecting the expansion by fiat of Title IX to the “War on Women” campaign theme. April 4, 2011 also happened to be the day President Obama launched his re-election campaign and Vice President Biden gave a major speech on sexual assault on college campuses at the University of New Hampshire.

Indeed, according to Henricks (2013), the letter's drafting appears to have been rushed because it contains numerous logical and typographical errors. Another suspicious (and unusual) action taken by OCR with regards to this letter was that the office provided no notice-and-comment period.

Indeed, Prof. Cynthia Bowman, a law professor at Cornell, has argued that the omission of notice-and-comment means the letter has no legal authority. The omission of a notice-and-comment period was highly irregular and, in conjunction with other evidence, very suspicious.

In short, the changes to Title IX enforcement were designed to create a moral panic in one of the richest sources of eligible young women voters available for political exploitation – college campuses. As we can see in Table C below, the tactic appears to have worked as Obama's net change in performance among young women between 2008 and 2012 was 6-percentage points better than for young men.

Given that unmarried women (of all ages) made up nearly a quarter of voters in the 2012 election, strength in this demographic played a major role in Obama's re-election. Indeed, Romney beat the president by 7-percentage points among married women.

However, Obama won single women by a margin of 36 percentage points and this group had grown significantly relative to married women between 2008 and 2012.

Young Voter Trends: 2008 vs. 2012

	2008		2012		Change for
	Obama	McCain	Obama	Romney	Obama
Among 18-29 year olds
Men	62%	35%	53%	42%	-9%
Women	69%	29%	66%	32%	-3%

Source: Pew Research

The 2011 Dear Colleague Letter

For a detailed overview of the OCR's 2011 Dear Colleague letter, we encourage readers to see the cited paper by Dr. Stephen Henrick. Henrick's critical review of the letter assesses the biases built into the OCR's directives and the risk-averse responses by the schools to the new directives.

His assessment is that the rule changes are detrimental to due process and that the schools are not equipped to adjudicate cases of such magnitude both because of complexity and conflict of interest. We draw heavily from his analysis in this section.

As pointed out by Henricks, the letter "effectuates a presumption that all accused students are guilty and institutes four changes to increase the conviction rate." The four changes are:

1) Lowering the burden of proof to "preponderance of evidence" for on-campus tribunals relating to sexual assault.

2) Establishing suspect evidentiary rules that do not require disclosure of exculpatory evidence or mutual discovery.

3) Requiring schools to inform the complainants of their legal rights, but not the accused

4) Giving the school's Title IX coordinator power to revise any sanctions issued by a disciplinary proceeding.

Proponents of the policy argue the letter seeks to make the process more “equitable,” but the letter explicitly creates superior rights for the accuser.

First, only the complainant can ask the Title IX coordinator for a review. Second, only the complainant must be informed of their rights. Third, indifference to a claim of sexual assault is automatically an actionable violation. However, deliberate indifference to the innocence of the accused is not actionable.

Furthermore, both parties must be given the right to appeal all rulings, enshrining double jeopardy in the regulations. Even worse, the Title IX coordinator is given power to determine if “the complainant is entitled to a remedy under Title IX that was not available through the disciplinary committee.”

In other words, the committee is merely a puppet for the Title IX coordinator and can be overruled whenever the outcome of the proceedings is not the one desired.

Since publishing the letter, OCR has secretly been working to entice schools to re-investigate complaints. In exchange for dropping Title IX investigations, schools have been signing confidential agreements that include promises to re-investigate the complaints at issue.

No notice is given to the accused until the second investigation has already begun. Clearly, under these circumstances conviction is almost guaranteed as no school would defy the implied order to convict. Henrick offers in summary that,

> The net effect of the administrative enforcement scheme is that schools have an incentive to convict anyone who is charged with sexual assault or rape as a matter of risk aversion for the institution. …Because OCR primarily cares about the complainant’s rights, as evidenced by its guidance and enforcement opinion letters, conviction carries a much lower risk of administrative enforcement than acquittal. Henrick (2013)

The natural response to the discussion above is: What would you replace the current system with, smart guy? Here again Henrick offers an insightful overview, which we agree with. Campus disciplinary committees simply have too many conflicts to handle such important and judicially-complex cases. As said by Henrick:

> Unfortunately, institutions of higher learning are hindered by several powerful and problematic incentives to falsely convict accused students in these types of cases. Removing claims of sexual violence from college campuses to civil and criminal judicial systems is the only viable way to fix the problem and ensure that sexual assault adjudication is equitable and impartial for all affected parties. Henrick (2013)

Finally, Henrick offers a poignant response to those who say that the policies should be biased in order to counter-balance some historical or institutional wrong.

> Justifying institutionalized unfairness to a given defendant in the exercise of > power because of a perceived need to reform a broader social problem is contrary to the very idea of civilized justice. [W]hile recognizing that sexual violence is reprehensible, convicting the innocent to atone for society's sins or to bring about change remains an unjustifiable use of authority and a dangerous judicial precedent. Henrick (2013)

Rolling Stone Magazine And Title IX

A recent example of Title IX's ability to wreak havoc is the incident involving a Rolling Stone article detailing an alleged gang rape at the University of Virginia (UVA). As it turns out, the story in the article was a complete fabrication and the article's author, Sabrina Erdely, was (appropriately) condemned for a gross breach of journalistic ethics.

The article created a stir in the U.S. and prompted an extreme reaction by the UVA administration in a state of panic. Among other actions, the school immediately suspended all fraternities and in doing so effectively labeled every fraternity member in the school as a rapist. At first, it may seem that the school's panic-stricken reaction to an article in a music magazine was overdone.

We disagree with that viewpoint. Indeed, in light of OCR's 2011 Dear Colleague letter, the school administration's actions were completely rational. As stated in the letter, "a single case of sexual assault or rape could be sufficient to raise a jury question about whether a hostile environment exists."

The salacious and grotesque description of a (completely fabricated) gang rape immediately brought the school under the scrutiny of OCR. Given the Sword of Damocles hanging over the school, the administration's unthinking and hyperbolic reaction seems quite prudent.

Perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the case can be observed in the letter from UVA President Teresa Sullivan to the school's students and faculty in response to the article (before it had been discredited).

> We can demand that incidents like those described in Rolling Stone never happen and that if they do, the responsible are held accountable to the law. This will require institutional change, cultural change, and legislative change, and it will not be easy. We are making those changes. [Emphasis ours] applicable in this case would be an infringement of due process. As a public university, UVA is held to some of the standards of due process. With absolutely no evidence of an assault available, the school was unable to operate its Title IX kangaroo court to run the accused out of town.

Here we see the efforts of the totalitarians bearing fruit. The only legislative changes

The simple fact that a lie in a music magazine resulted in such an extreme reaction is evidence enough to unmask the malignancy of Title IX regulations in general and the Obama Administration's political exploitation of the law more specifically.

Conclusion

Taken alone, the changes to Title IX enforcement instituted by the Office of Civil Rights would be outright bad policy. However, when combined with the immediate political motive driving the changes the policy becomes something much more insidious – the naked coercion of higher education for political purposes.

Prior to 2011, it was understood to be acceptable to coerce the schools in pursuit of utilitarian ideals. After Obama's re-election, the precedent has now been set that it is acceptable to coerce the higher education system for purely political ends.

Readers can be sure that, now that a Democrat has used the tactic, the Republicans will be watching for their opportunity; then the act will have become commonplace and will be used repeatedly. Yet again, we see that the President's undermining of the rule of law for his own convenience will do far more damage to liberty in the long-run than his ineffectual leadership in the present.

Additionally, the perversion of Title IX has serious economic consequences. The US's vibrant and extensive higher education system has been a major driver of its culture of innovation and superior TFP contribution to growth. By subsuming the centers of free-thought in the United States to the dirty game of partisan politics, the United States has diminished its long-term growth prospects and taken another big step towards totalitarianism.

We close with a final warning from Sirluck:

> If we believe, as I do, that academic freedom is the soul of the university, we must find additional means to support it, for as governments exercise increasing control over universities they will inevitably come under increasing pressure to control what is said and taught within universities. Sirluck (1974)

References

Sirluck, Ernest, "Causes of Tightening Government Control of Universities", University of Toronto Convocation (1974)

Epstein, Richard, "Just Do It!: Title IX as a Threat to University Autonomy", University of Chicago Law School Journal (2003)

Henrick, Stephen, "A Hostile Environment for Student Defendants: Title IX and Sexual Assault on College Campuses", Northern Kentucky Law Review, 2013

Read More: A Brief Introduction To The Country Formerly Known As Sweden

Max Power

The Gay Marriage Ruling: Why Everyone Loses But The State

July 10, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

As everyone knows, on June 26, 2015, the U.S. Supreme Court issued its opinion in the case of Obergefell v. Hodges, 576 U.S. ___(2015). At issue was whether "marriages" between gay couples would be recognized legally. By a narrow majority, the Court found that homosexual marriages were in fact a "fundamental right" worthy of societal acceptance.

The concluding paragraph of the majority decision rose to a disturbing level of opaque sentimentality. Inappropriately condescending to identify emotionally with one of the litigants, the Court issued this maudlin pronunciamento:

> No union is more profound than marriage, for it embodies the highest ideals of love, fidelity, devotion, sacrifice, and family. In forming a marital union, two people become something greater than once they were. As some of the petitioners in these cases demonstrate, marriage embodies a love that may endure even past death. It would misunderstand these men and women to say they disrespect the idea of marriage. Their plea is that they do respect it, respect it so deeply that they seek to find its fulfillment for themselves. Their hope is not to be condemned to live in loneliness, excluded from one of civilization's oldest institutions. They ask for equal dignity in the eyes of the law. The Constitution grants them that right.

And that was it. With one stroke of the pen, the Court found fit to overturn the definition of marriage (as a union between man and woman) that had attended humanity for thousands of years. The arrogance and presumption of the opinion was truly breathtaking. To understand why Obergefell was wrongly decided, we must do something the Court studiously avoided doing: we must trace the experience of history.

Historical Background

As an institution, marriage indeed appears to predate man. Biologists tell us that in certain bird species, males and females will live together for long periods. Gorillas and orangutans live together as males and females, with their offspring, in familial units.

Among humans, marriage has had a long and variable history among different cultures. Anthropologists tell us that among many primitive tribes (e.g., the Yakuts of Siberia, the Orang Sakai of Malacca, and certain Tibetan peoples) the marriage union could be freely terminated by either man or woman at any time.

In old Tibet, we even find “mass marriages” between groups of males and females, unifying collectively at once. Polygamy has seen institutional acceptance in some Middle Eastern societies, within certain boundaries and limitations.

The modern conception of marriage, as between man and woman, apparently arose to address a number of social needs: (1) care and rearing of the young; (2) the need to regulate sexual activity within acceptable bounds, so as to prevent social disorder; and (3) the need to pass on property to one’s kin in an ordered fashion. These practices predate history. We can conclude that marriage as the union of man and woman has existed for tens of thousands, perhaps even hundreds of thousands, of years.

Always, the union of marriage has been defined as the relationship between a man and a woman. As we survey the peoples of the globe, we cannot find one single society, primitive or modern, in which marriage was ever accepted as a union between man and man, or woman and woman. It simply has never existed. We do not find gay marriage historically among Europeans, Asians, Africans, American Indians, Polynesians, or native Australians.

Social institutions develop in response to the needs of humanity. Those institutions that stand the test of time do so for a very good reason: they have served as a net benefit for social order.

This is not to say, of course, that homosexuality has not existed since the dawn of history. Without doubt it has. Whether through environment or genetics, or a combination of both (the question is not one I am qualified to answer), some humans find satisfaction in what may be called “sexual inversion”: that is, the inverting of sexual desire from the opposite gender, to one’s own gender.

But even though homosexuality has existed in every society, it has always been confined within specific limits. It was never permitted to gain official sanction as actual “marriage” co-equal to a normal marriage between a man and woman.

Proponents of gay marriage like to toss around historical “examples” of institutionalized homosexuality in history as somehow supporting their arguments. History does not support their argument.

Homosexuality was tolerated, for example, in the classical world, as well as in ancient China, India, and Persia. It also makes its appearance in the medieval period in nearly every civilization on record. But it was permitted to go only so far, and no further. This makes all the difference.

Among the ancient Greeks, we find an acceptance of the practice in all the major city-states; it was not stigmatized, but at the same time, the thought of two men living together as “husband” and “wife” would have been unthinkable. Aristotle himself puzzled at the practice’s ubiquity; he believed it was a social defense against overpopulation.

More likely it was an outgrowth of the strict segregation of the genders in Greek society, where both men and women spent most of their time with their own genders.

In any case, the point here is that we must distinguish between homosexuality as a practice, and homosexual marriage as an officially-sanctioned institution. The former has a long lineage; the later has never existed in history. In the classical world, the attitude towards homosexuality was generally this: it was accepted as a fact of life, and as long as its practitioners did not proselytize their views or threaten the established social order, they were generally tolerated.

Again, the point needs to be made here—which was lost on the Obergefell majority—that there has not been a single society, ancient, medieval, or modern, that has extended the definition of “marriage” to mean a union between two men or two women.

This is the fact that proponents of gay marriage have no answer for. They have no answer because there is no answer. If a social institution—marriage—has been defined for countless thousands of years as between two different genders, then this fact carries authority. It cannot be brushed aside. We cannot say that we, in the past fifteen years, have suddenly gained a greater insight and wisdom into human nature than all the generations before us.

Rationales

It is characteristic of the feebleness of gay marriage proponents that they refuse to respond to this fact. When pressed on why they think gay marriage is appropriate, their answers are always a version of these arguments:

1. “It doesn’t matter anyway, because marriage itself is a ruined institution.” This is not a meaningful answer. One does not refute a flawed proposition (gay marriage) by stating that the object of that proposition (marriage) is a ruined thing. Despite all its flaws and abuses, marriage remains what it always has been: the cornerstone of social order.

2. “They have a right to be happy.” Civil unions could have given homosexual couples nearly everything they claim to have wanted. Yet it was not enough; they wanted to become co-equal with traditional marriages. One cannot get everything one wants in life; the hard reality of life is that some behaviors are socially acceptable, and some will remain only acceptable within certain boundaries.

The Court’s ruling will now be used as an invitation to further test the boundaries of acceptable conduct. The Court’s decision claims that religious institutions need not fear they will be forced to perform homosexual marriages; yet it is difficult to see exactly how this can be squared with their ruling.

The Obergefell decision undermines the status of both men and women. It denigrates the roles each of them play in a traditional marriage, and presumes to assert that two men can act as husband and "wife," and that two women can behave as "husband" and wife. The indoctrination will now commence with greater intensity in the schools, the media, and in other spheres of social activity. Dissenters will be marginalized, and then penalized.

The Real Winners

One wonders how the collective experience of many thousands of years could be consigned to the trash bin so easily. The answers are there, but are deeply unsettling. The reality is that those who hold the levers of power do not really care about homosexuals. They care, in truth, very little about the "rights" of the gay community. Gays are being manipulated and used by the power structure, which has its own agenda.

What is this agenda? Control. The power elites want to see the traditional institutions of society neutered. They want to see the educational system shaped to serve their needs; they want the curricula dumbed down to accommodate the needs of the compliant masses. They want traditional morality (as espoused by religions) undermined, as it stands in the way of creating the perfect consumer zombies that they love so much.

When the social bonds which preserve order become frayed, the state is forced to step in and impose its own rules. In this way creeping authoritarianism moves forward, slowly but steadily, under the guise of liberation and empowerment.

And finally, they want to see the family unit, with the roles and authorities of the father and mother, neutered. They want the real mother and father to be them, the state. Marriage has now become meaningless with the Obergefell decision. By undermining marriage, they enhance their own power over their consumer-driven citizens, and replace themselves as every citizen's surrogate parent.

They gay community thought it won a big victory with *Obergefel*l, but they lost along with the rest of us. It will turn out to be a hollow victory. Authoritarianism is laughing. Obergefell opened the door to yet more government intrusion into the personal lives of individuals and families; for when the family unit is weakened, only the state wins.

The gay community got played. They got used. They just don't know it yet.

Read More: The Key To Facing Your Fears Confidently

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Women’s Tennis Demands Heat Breaks Not Given To Men At Wimbledon Championships

July 11, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As England and much of Europe swelters through a heatwave, female (but not male) tennis players at Wimbledon have been allowed to take ten minute heat breaks between the second and third sets. The only criterion that must be met for women competitors to receive this break is that the Heat Stress Index, an adjusted balance of air temperature, humidity and surface temperature, must be above 30.1°C (86.18°F).

This is despite male and female players receiving equal pay and men having to play best-of-five set matches, rather than the best-of-three set format of the women’s game. More paradoxically, boys playing the Junior Wimbledon Championship must soldier on in the heat, yet the adult women and Junior Girls Championship participants are favored by the rule.

Many of you will be familiar with one of my first ROK articles, which criticized the lunacy of “equal” pay for female tennis players. Equal pay means competing in the same field, not constructing your own so that you get massive financial rewards you otherwise would not.

Like I said back then, it’s analogous to creating an equally paid extra NBA for short people, or a sister NFL competition for the skinniest men unable to go the distance with normal, burly football players. The sexist heat rule debacle at Wimbledon is simply adding more butter to the bread of why female sports in general have a gross sense of entitlement, all whilst seething for so-called “equality.”

The heat rule not only privileges women, it’s contextually ridiculous

[image]
If Serena Williams wants equality, she can earn it by playing five sets, without the chance for heat breaks and against men like Novak Djokovic!

As The Daily Mail points out, at the 2014 Australian Open temperatures went above 40°C (104°F) for four days straight. The difference between 30.1°C (86.18°F) and 40°C+ (104°F+) is gargantuan. Both Wimbledon and the Australian Open are held during Britain and Australia’s respective summers, and the heat rule for Wimbledon can be applied by female players at a temperature that is below the middle-of-the-day average for the Australian Open.

What’s more is that many of the highly ranked tournaments around the world, including a number in the US, occur in very hot or humid climates.

The excellent British Times journalist Matthew Syed, whose crisp analysis in another article I used for my earlier tennis equal pay ROK piece, makes a compelling argument against this “We’re special princesses!” hypocrisy:

> Why do female players acquiesce in this sexism?
>
> They have been vocal in calling for equal prize money, equal status, equal everything. But when it comes to playing over five sets, rather than three, what you might call equality of effort, something that these lithe and impressive athletes are perfectly capable of doing, everything seems to change.

When men, in tennis or beyond it, don’t give women “equality,” it’s sexism. That equality includes giving the same rewards for on average inferior skill and work, such as entry and promotion in the military, pay and recognition for sports, and the use of (female) gender quotas on business boards.

But when women claw invariable privileges that butcher the notion of theoretical equality, there’s usually no accompanying compunction for any of them to speak out against it, let alone forfeit their special treatment.

Oh wait, Maria Sharapova says the rule isn’t unfair

Do people watch Maria because her skills are on par with Federer (or the Men's World Number 200) or because of continual feminist "equality" propaganda and her body?

Exhibiting perfectly how entitled females can dismiss any form of privilege they receive as nothing, Maria Sharapova brushed aside the gender unevenness of the rule:

> I think if it's something that they're concerned about it, they can re-evaluate. If it does get quite hot for us, we're able to use it, then why not?

This is the same woman who has raised so-called sexism against female players innumerable times, even as she says nothing about having to play fewer sets than the men at notoriously hot tournaments like the Australian Open. Or about the artificial conception of her being paid the same as a man for winning a Grand Slam, as if her performance and spectacle were somehow equal to his. Caroline Wozniacki and Serena Williams also opined this week that the organizers were encouraging sexism by having more featured men's matches on Center Court.

To argue that they deserve more airtime, women's players have to, like Sharapova, mentally crowd out the litany of ways in which they are privileged over the men. Only then can they "coherently" lambast the powers that be, who are actually those that allow them to gain special treatment in the first place.

As people, overwhelmingly men, across the United Kingdom are forced to work strenuous jobs in the midst of this heatwave, including as removalists, postmen, builders, laborers, roof tilers, and truck drivers in boiling vehicles, well-paid female athletes like Sharapova are being pampered in the pursuit of millions in prize money.

Play the men under the same conditions or get out

Who will save the wee tennis women from themselves and their heat-ravaged bodies?!

The perennial whinging of female athletes and others who demand that we bend over backwards to accommodate their queen-sized expectations is only expanding. Before too long, feminists will be arguing that guidelines or laws should be instituted so that women's sport is guaranteed 50% of the airtime on television and minimum expected coverage in newspapers and other print or online media. After the SJWs have performed their legislative or similar magic, sportswomen will still be the recipients of skewed rules that make their lives much easier relative to the men.

Whereas some people see sport as a distraction not reflective of society, I take the opposite view. By seeing female athletes bellowing for substantial privileges, the average woman is actually "inspired" to insist on her own form of these privileges, whether at work, in the state support she expects for being a mother, or the way she extracts material and other benefits from the men she interacts with.

To rephrase a famous line: if you can't stand the heat girls, get off the tennis court.

Read More: What Women's Tennis Says About "Equal" Pay

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

10 Lessons From The Life Of Genghis Khan

July 11, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> It is not sufficient that I succeed – everyone else must fail. – Genghis Khan

History is replete with examples of formidable leaders – but one undeniable example is that of Genghis Khan, who was equal parts military genius, political statesman, and as often stated, "ruthless tyrant."

Scant (and often contradictory) information is available about his early life; even his appearance and death. His personality has often been contrastingly portrayed, both by the people he conquered (as a blood-thirsty invader), and the people he united to lead (who revered him as the Great Khan).

Despite being vilified throughout most of history for the brutality of his campaigns (and his supposed penchant for female war booty), some modern biographers have endeavored to present a more "realistic" account of him; even debunking most claims about the "millions" he supposedly killed, and have noted that most of these figures came from Mongol propaganda intended to scare people into submission.

Nevertheless, while his legend continues to intrigue and fascinate historians even today, he still arguably remains the founder of the largest contiguous land empire in human history.

His early life and rise to power

Born as Temujin in around 1162, from an early age he contended with the brutal nomadic life (often replete with inter-tribal warfare) on the Mongolian Steppe. At age nine, rival Tatars poisoned his father and his own tribe later expelled his family, leaving his mother to raise her seven children alone. He then grew up hunting and foraging to survive, and may have even murdered his own half-brother in a dispute over food.

Rival clans abducted both him and his young wife Borte during his teens; he later spent time as a slave before making a daring escape. Despite all these hardships, he established himself as a formidable warrior and charismatic leader by his early 20s. After amassing an army of supporters, he began forging important tribal alliances; and by 1206, he had successfully consolidated the steppe confederations under his banner and began to turn his attention to external trade and conquest.

Between 1206 and his death in 1227, he conquered nearly 12 million square miles of territory—more than any individual in history. But alongside his ruthless campaigns through Asia and Europe that left "untold millions" dead, he also modernized Mongolian culture, embraced religious freedom and helped open contact between East and West – for he is also credited with bringing the Silk Road under one cohesive political environment.

The factors of his rise

How did a struggling nomad with inauspicious beginnings in the harsh Mongolian steppes – rise to lead an irresistible force which conquered more lands and people in twenty-five years than the Romans did in four hundred?

Analyzing his life reveals a lot of exemplifications of laws from The 48 Laws Of Power, and below are some lessons to be learned from his life which contributed to his ascent to power and success:

1. Loyalty and meritocracy

After his childhood adversities made him a keen student of human nature, Genghis was adept at both spotting opportunities in disguise, and also human talent and potential.

He founded his empire on meritocracy (the exception being himself and his family) and loyalty; and he usually promoted his officers on skill and experience rather than class, ancestry, or even past allegiances.

Two prominent examples were:

- Subutai : the son of an ordinary blacksmith, who later became Genghis's primary military strategist and directed more than twenty campaigns in which he conquered thirty-two nations and won sixty-five pitched battles, during which he conquered or overran more territory than any other commander in history.
- Jebe: a rival Taijut soldier who nearly killed Genghis In 1201 during battle with an arrow. However, he was later made an officer in Genghis's army and later nicknamed "Jebe," or "arrow" – after stirring Genghis with his brave admittance to being the shooter after his tribe's defeat, after Genghis demanded to know who was responsible.

Both of them would go on to become the Mongols' greatest field commanders during subsequent conquests in Asia and Europe.

2. Patriotic loyalty and tribal cohesion

Genghis's greatest success was unifying the diverse and unruly Mongol clans under one banner, and strongly emphasized patriotism.

> If my body dies, let my body die, but do not let my country die. – Genghis Khan

Having grown up enduring an environment of tribal betrayals, his love of loyalty was such that he even executed his chief rival Jamukha's betrayers on the principle that betrayal merits the harshest punishment, as loyalty remained a core tenet in the founding of his empire.

3. His cult leader status and self-belief

Genghis's success depended quite a bit on his fearsome reputation, and his cult leader-like following among his people (Law 27), which he successfully propagandized through his behavior, his words, and his conquests to both friends and foes alike.

4. Minimalism and moderation

The Mongols were expert horsemen archers, and the harsh life of the steppe had actually honed them physically and psychologically for the ruthlessness of war. Even when he conquered vast territories, Genghis preferred the nomad's simple yurt over luxurious shelters and ostentation.

As a ruler, he passed strict laws against drunkenness, and his own personal example of simplicity greatly influenced his supporters to follow suit and rally round him.

5. The value of alliances

Law 2: Never put too much trust in friends, learn how to use enemies – Genghis learned this the hard way in his friendship with Jamukha, and alliance with Senggum (both who later betrayed him) before he became the sole ruler of the Mongols. After losing his father early, Genghis' mother impressed upon him the need to forge alliances when he was weaker, and his subsequent successful implementation later further exemplifies:

- Law 18: Do not build fortresses to protect yourself – isolation is dangerous
- Law 22 :Use the surrender tactic: Transform weakness into power

6. Strategic foresight and adaptability: Have an end to a goal in mind

> The merit in action lies in finishing it to the end. – Genghis Khan

Directly referring to Law 29, Genghis's military strategies displayed strategically planned deliberate moves, a deep interest in gathering good intelligence, and understanding the motivations of his rivals, all exemplified by his extensive spy network and Yam route systems.

Simultaneously, he adopted new technologies and ideas that he encountered, such as Chinese siege warfare – exemplifying the fluidity of Law 48 : Assume formlessness.

7. Understand your people

Genghis practiced religious toleration and was interested in learning philosophical and moral lessons from other religions (Buddhism, Taoism, Islam and Christianity) – which he probably utilized in formulating his own code to govern his people, the Yassa.

His practice of meritocracy and moderation when dealing with his people eventually endeared him to his people which eventually attracted him the mass of supporters – in contrast to the harsh ways his rival chieftains followed.

8. The use of fear

As many other rulers, Genghis was not averse to using fear to control and psychologically weaken his adversaries. Even though he famously stated “violence never settles anything” – Genghis’s military strategy and use of brutality and scorched earth policy were an exemplification of:

- Law 3: Conceal your intentions

- Law 15 :Crush your enemy totally
- Law 17: Keep others in suspended terror: cultivate an air of unpredictability
- Law 37: Create compelling spectacles
- Law 42: Strike the shepherd and the sheep will scatter

This eventually built his fearsome and formidable blood-thirsty reputation (often exaggerated by supporters and foe alike).

9. Courage

Genghis's military moves were often a direct reference to Law 28 :Enter action with boldness.

10. The apathy and unpreparedness of his adversaries

The underestimation of Genghis's force, arrogance of the Khwarezmid empire, luxurious apathy and the lack of preparedness and cohesion in his adversaries all further contributed to his success. This warns of a truth which frequently repeats itself throughout human history: the cultural degeneracy and luxuriant apathy of a civilization often presents the right environment for a brutal and ruthless one to enslave it.

Conclusion

Genghis's life exemplifies that it doesn't always matter where you may start in life, and what actually matters is how you endure it and where you finish at.

In spite of probably lacking formal education, his military genius and wisdom stemmed from his open mind, his practice of meritocracy, and studying human life and nature around him.

Beneath his formidable reputation, was a nomad who refused to bow down to the miseries life would relentlessly inflict upon him, but instead rose to tame them – exemplifying fortitude in his rise to greatness.

Read Next: The Wisdom Of Mao Tse Tung

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

5 Reasons Not To Make Retail Your Career

July 12, 2015 | by David Mousseau | Link | Original Link

As a college student I worked two retail jobs on a seasonal basis, and then for a short time after graduation. While these positions were horrible and never meant to be long-term, I was stunned by how many of my co-workers fell into the trap of the retail muck, effectively resigning themselves to the tepid universe of customer service and sales for life.

This perplexed me not only because they were individuals of respectable intelligence, but also because the retail environment is one of the most feminist, abusive, and unrewarding available to the common man. Here are five reasons not to spend any more time in that industry than you absolutely have to:

1. You will end up working for a woman

Given that retail one of the most widespread work fields and requires minimal talent, it is flooded with female employees, particularly at the store management level. These women often hold power either because they received a useless degree like sociology or hospitality management and had no path of forward other than a Kmart manager trainee program, or due to their kiss-uppery to existing retail leaders.

Furthermore, their lack of success in other career areas imbues them with a crushing bitterness and feeling of insecurity that forces them to abuse and micromanage everyone possible in order to reach for the bronze chalice of respect.

On this point, I used to work in a store where the ratio of male to female managers was 10:8. Despite this advantage, and their possession of the two most important posts (HR head and store manager), the males allowed themselves to be professionally sodomized by the women, who can be described as a screeching old hag, a demure supervisor, and two vicious bull dykes.

The hag and her lover sisters enjoyed making examples of men employed by the store, typically through random "coaching moments" and by insulting them in front of the store team. Failing to complete tasks in their favored way or even showing a hint of defiance could result in a write-up, loss of weekly hours, or even termination.

2. Abuse is constant and acceptable

On account of the rules of retail, jackass customers drawn from the lowest level of the gene pool will toy with and insult associates to make themselves feel better about their crappy car, land whale wife, or HIV-positive boyfriend. Particularly if you are a white male, many women and ethnic minority shoppers will look for every excuse to degrade or reprimand you with the excuse that "the customer is always right."

Seniors will wave a copy of Consumer Reports in your face and accuse of lying about products, while homosexuals hit on you and ghetto trash try to turn any signage pricing mistakes into "racist discrimination."

Among the store staff, things are not much different. I once worked with a female associate who would scream that I was an asshole and become physically violent with me for disagreeing with her on how to perform a certain task, but the moment I responded with an insult I was in the HR office hearing mumbles of indeterminate bullshit like ”we want you guys to get along,” and “the company maintains a non-aggression policy.” Nothing was done about her behavior, of course.

3. You will work long hours and make stale peanuts

It is nearly impossible to come home from a retail shift and not feel exhausted. After standing for hours, putting on fake smiles, and having your throat dried out from greeting customers in a weak, slightly less masculine tone, you return home miserable and filled with vindictive thoughts, wanting nothing more than to consume some ready-to-eat food and crash.

All this effort does not result in a massive financial reward, however. Assuming a starting rate of about $9.50, which is on the higher end nationally, you’ll take home $57.00 for a six-hour shift, minus fifteen percent in tax, for a net total of around $48.45.

Repeat this five days a week for a month and you take in $969.00, or $11,628 annually. This assumes of course that you do not work in an area with a municipal income tax, which can cause that net amount to drop substantially.

4. Promotion potential is non-existent

"Congratulations, Michaels. You've been promoted. There's no extra pay or benefits, but there's plenty of over-time."

Sooner or later, often times in the first month of employment at a retail store, an insincere and wide-eyed manager will approach a well-performing associate and encourage them to “stick and grow with our company, because the sky is the limit.” Well, if “sky” means the ugly white ceiling tiles interrupted only by lights in the store, then they are correct.

Advancement in a retail environment is severely limited because most people will remain in a management role for most of their career. They are, after all, men who got stuck in the flow or women incapable of anything else, so the options before them are few. And since retail management is not a specific or technical skill, the only managers who will be moving on are those unlucky enough to be thrown to slaughter as a district leader or the HR chief who manages to get a more secure position elsewhere.

Even in these circumstances, the company will often promote based on extra-employment qualifications, so the chick with a Bachelor of Arts in Communication Studies from the University of Phoenix will be chosen before you.

In the event you are working retail and a manager promises a promotion or an increase in pay, demand from them written confirmation that you will gain that advancement on a particular date. Retail HR departments have a troubling tendency of “forgetting” to input a promotion or pay raise with the hopes that the employee utilizes direct deposit and will not check their pay statement.

Beware also of flex roles or acting manager positions, which are tools used by corporations to milk more work and responsibility out of employees whilst paying them at their existing grade.

5. It can prevent you from improving as a man

Although it might seem like the jury has ruled on retail, there remains a shocking number of men who get caught in the lull of a relatively laid-back environment and decline to advance themselves in life. A former co-worker of mine was of exceptionally high intelligence and only planned to work retail while in school for computer science. Following all the time and effort his had placed in his degree, he preferred to stick with the breeze of retail because he got used to it.

Herein is the danger of staying in retail too long; the casual environment of low-information people and typically simple demands made of workers can suppress and limit a man's intellectual, professional, and physical ambitions.

Conclusion

I finally escaped retail this year and have sworn I will never go back. While it can be a decent gig if you are working through college and nothing else is available, for the long haul the constant torrent of customer and co-worker abuse, manager egos, and a chickenfeed paycheck will wear you thin faster than a fat acceptance chick living in Zimbabwe.

Read More: 5 Reasons Writing Amazon Kindle eBooks Is An Effective Way To Make Money

David Mousseau

David Mousseau is a Franco-Texan who lived the first nine months of his life as a man inside a woman's body. Now happily post-transition, he defends the patriarchy by writing at libertyphalanx.com and tweeting @davidmousseau65

Women Have Reduced Themselves To Sexual Commodities

July 12, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

How we see women is not the same as how our grandfathers see women. They saw them as delicate creatures who could be a source of happiness, love, and, most importantly, children, but modern men are stuck with a different breed of women who care less about intimate relations and creating families than pursuing money, seeking validation and attention online, being trendy consumers, and satisfying their hedonistic needs with bad boys or clowns. A man who tries to emulate his grandfather by treating a modern woman with love or care is certain to get emotionally or financially destroyed.

So what's left for us? How should we deal with the strong and independent modern woman? We should view them as oil wells that can provide a commodity that healthy men need to function properly: sex. Now that the emotional and familial purpose of male-female interactions are being eliminated, thanks to a woman's demand for "independence," a modern man should focus on extracting as many instances of sex from individual women as he can until the well becomes dry. Modern women are too broken, unreliable, and narcissistic to be give men anything reliable besides fornication, so this is what you must aim for if you want to get something out of the current oil boom. Any other strategy will result in disappointment and failure.

It's first important to realize that not all oil wells are equal. Some are easy to find while others require delicate GPS sensors. Some oil wells are on land and therefore easily accessible to eager miners while other wells are hidden under the sea. Some wells are easy to drill while others require advanced machinery and engineering to reach. Some wells have oil that requires little processing while others may be too expensive to mine in current market conditions. And finally, some mines have plentiful reserves that last for long periods of time while others get tapped out quickly.

Women are just like oil mines in that they're not all equal in how they present their sexual interest, what game methods they require for sex, how long it takes them to have sex with you, how accessible they are to other miners, and how many instances of sex you will have with her until it no longer becomes profitable to mine her. This is not how our grandfathers approached women. They viewed them as a construction site with plentiful raw materials where a wonderful home could be built to last for over 50 years, a home that was worth maintaining and caring for. If you approach women in such a manner today, a tornado will rip through the construction site before you've even established the foundation. You'll lose your entire investment.

Not long ago I dated a Polish girl who was 14 years younger than me. She was pleasant enough but I could tell she's in the middle of her carousel ride and so not appropriate for a serious relationship. I did just enough work to keep her interested so that when I needed sex, she gave it to me, and as long as I was interested in our arrangement, I continued tapping her well to my sexual satisfaction. But I would be foolhardy to try to build a home with her since she is not made of the same stuff as her mother and grandmothers, and so I will not treat her as if she's something she's not. She's an oil well, and I will use my drill to gain as much black liquid as I can until the well taps out, and then be forced to move on to another.

Not long ago men used to make houses, but now we're oil prospectors, emptying the reservoir of one well before inevitably moving on, and I'm not sure if this is a better way for us to live than men of the past.

(This article was originally published on Roosh V.)

Read Next: Women In Their Prime Prefer Sex With Damaged Men

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Angry Woman Shit Tests Boyfriend And Ends Up Getting Them Both Killed

July 13, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Off the coast of Australia in May 2013, Paul Rossington and Kristen Schroder died. Their bodies have never been recovered. Both were passengers on the cruise liner Carnival Spirit, holidaying onboard with Schroder's family.

After a verbal altercation visually recorded on the ship's CCTV, both returned to their cabin. Some time later, infra-red footage showed Schroder climbing the balcony railing and then tumbling, seemingly accidentally, into the darkness of the sea, a near-fatal 18 metres below. Rossington jumped right in after her, perhaps unaware that his girlfriend had hit the ship on her way down and would probably have been killed even with a "clean" jump.

Deputy State Coroner Hugh Dillon recently released his conclusions into the pair's death. It seemed evident to Dillon that Kristen Schroder was making a "dramatic gesture to alarm and test" Paul Rossington. Documented and anecdotal evidence proves that the relationship between the two could be tempestuous at best, the cruise being one last-ditch attempt to reorient the highly emotional crossroads they were facing.

Although it takes two to tango almost all of the time, Schroder appears, based on what we know, to be the one overwhelmingly at fault. Her lashings out at Rossington were discussed at the coroner's inquiry, the result of her sessions with a psychologist. At one stage she went so far as to threaten suicide if Paul left her.

The coroner appears to have sugarcoated Kristen Schroder's shit test of Paul Rossington

Imagine the responses of a girlfriend or others if a boyfriend made the sort of "dramatic gesture" that Kristen Schroder did.

> Paradoxically, what they [Rossington and Schroder] had struggled to achieve in life – loving unity – they perhaps managed in their last actions alive.
>
> – The blatantly over-the-top sentiments of Deputy State Coroner Hugh Dillon

I feel sorry for both the families and the victims. Not only did Rossington meet a truly terrible fate, neither did Schroder "deserve" to die. Schadenfreude towards the girlfriend is by no means the best or even a reasonable response in these circumstances.

Nonetheless, Deputy State Coroner Hugh Dillon, in my opinion, has erred in his findings. I have no reason to believe that they don't accord with laws of inquiry as they stand, or the professional expectations laid down in his line of work. But following the rulebook can still deny the answers and frankness needed to stop similar accidents and tragedies.

Coroner reports are not entirely analogous to judicial rulings in courtrooms. There are some fundamental dissimilarities, and the former category can be both more and less speculative, depending on the individual types of information being considered at different times. Yet Dillon's rather soppy approach to many elements of this inquiry has completely sugarcoated the flagrant melodrama and narcissism of Schroder in climbing the railing.

Considering that people generally don't climb railings in such a way on the fifth-floors of buildings on land when there's minimal wind, the girlfriend's actions were beyond moronic, both for her own personal safety and the fear it would have generated in Rossington before she fell.

Would most girlfriends jump for their boyfriends?

Why don't we see girlfriends and wives trying to save their male partners with the same fervor that Jon Blunk tried to – and did – save Jansen Young during the Aurora shootings?

In the context of this article, this is a somewhat tangential but nevertheless very potent point. I, probably like you, have no way of ascertaining what percentage of boyfriends and husbands, or simply men, jump in after women faced with certain or probable death, barring outside, frequently futile intervention.

Or die shielding their female partners to protect them from bullets and other violent attacks, as happened with several slain men during the Aurora shootings at a screening of The Dark Knight Rises. Maybe only half or a third of men do this. But I can promise you one thing: it's more than the number of women who do it for men.

Just as Paul Rossington would have been widely deplored for shit testing his girlfriend in the way Kristen Schroder shit tested him, it is highly unlikely that Schroder would have jumped in after him were the roles reversed.

Significantly, Paul Rossington was a paramedic. He would have realized, however emotional he was at the time, the massive chance that Schroder died instantly upon hitting either the ship or the water. Combine that with the high seas of the Pacific and you have a recipe for an early, watery grave for a hero like him.

Men shouldn't have to die trying to save unstable women

Men rescuing women is considered both necessary and paternalistic. What gives?

Deputy State Coroner Dillon rightfully called for Paul Rossington to receive a posthumous award for bravery. Like Jon Blunk, who died saving his partner Jansen Young, he should be celebrated as a hero.

Unlike Blunk and others at Aurora, however, Rossington died trying to rescue Schroder because of her own actions. Depression, anxiety and other forms of mental illness can explain a consistent emotional disposition, but they shouldn't be automatically conjured up to excuse actions that resulted in her own death and, particularly tragically, Paul Rossington's.

Respecting the memory of the dead doesn't mean we have to (or should) ignore our obligations to the living, who are at greater risk of harm when society doesn't adequately explain untimely deaths in the past. A forthright, non-romantic explanation of how Paul Rossington and Kristen Schroder died requires us to dispense with fairytale renderings of true love and the conquering of obstacles.

No obstacles were conquered here and the only true love proved, albeit naively in the eyes of some, was Paul Rossington's.

Read More: The 4 Important Shit Tests Rocky Balboa Passed To Win Adrian

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Swedish Feminists Campaign For Fatties In Clothing Ads

July 13, 2015 | by Chuck Finley | Link | Original Link

Gudrun Schyman, former leader of the Left Party and current leader of the Feminist Initiative party, is looking for new and innovative ways to be a buzzkill. No, she's not going to put 100,000 Swedish Kronas (over $12,000) on fire again because of an alleged pay-gap between men and women. This time, she's out to put an end to clothing companies using healthy and attractive women in public advertisements.

In an article posted to the Swedish newspaper Metro, Schyman points out how the problem is not just how women are being objectified in ads, but also the fact that the women are "extremely skinny," and therefore upsetting the feminist masses. She's also upset that transsexuals and disabled people are not displayed in these ads sufficiently.

Look, I'm all for free speech, but if we're going to start seeing ads of transsexual midgets posing in bikinis filling the streets I just might start singing a different tune.

They want to replace this with chubby, disabled transsexuals?

While the Feminist Initiative party is not really significant when looking at recent poll results, they certainly get the media spotlight even though they only managed to scrape together just over 3% of the votes in the election last year. Unfortunately, these opinions are not exclusive to this minor party.

The Social Democratic Party, which is the largest party in Sweden, and the Green Party were in unison before the election in 2014 that they too want to ban sexist ads. The Swedish Women's Lobby, an organization founded on the initiative of the Swedish Government, also want to prohibit such advertisements. These progressive parties and organizations don't shy away from criticizing and shaming Christian conservatives, but this time Schyman actually gives credit to Rome for taking action by banning sexist ads earlier this year.

While we can all easily see how this is an obvious case of limiting free speech, is it not also a case of limiting the freedom of the women working as models by destroying their livelihood? Schyman seems to only be concerned with the feelings of the unattractive women who feel like they're oppressed because weighing 300 pounds is not what society deems attractive, and even if that was the case, they would probably complain about being objectified.

Why does she favor women in the second category? My guess is that the demographics of her followers are not fit – they're fat. Schyman and her ilk only seem to be concerned with the feelings of the unattractive women who are provoked by a public display of a fit, feminine woman with the audacity to promote beauty.

Your body is not a temple, it’s a run-down Detroit house.

The Swedish advertisement researcher Nina Åkestam was quoted by Schyman in the article about her personal experience with seeing fit women wearing bikinis in public advertisements: “The first thing that happens is that I pull in my stomach. It happens automatically, by reflex. (…) Why did I eat that yogurt this morning, why did I slow down my pace at the end of my run?”.

These reactions are identical to that of motivation. You see something that sparks an emotional response that makes you want to work to improve yourself, whether it’s seeing an exotic car that reinforces your motivation to work on your financial situation, or seeing a shredded guy at the gym making you work even harder to attain similar results.

If you recognize that your lifestyle isn’t working and start questioning it, that should be regarded as positive, as it can be the first step toward progress. However, it seems like these progressives ironically don’t want to be bothered with the concept of progress and would much rather be comfortable leading a life of gluttony and escapism by banning things that hurt their feelings.

Economic implications

Coming soon to a magazine cover near you!

If we'd take a look at what economic impact a ruling like this would have on the Swedish clothing giant H&M, it would be nothing short of a disaster. The H&M stock is the most traded on the Swedish stock exchange, and H&M currently has over 130,000 employees and almost 7,000 of these work in Sweden.

Most of these employees are women, which means this is yet another case of feminists screwing things up not just for men if they decide to destroy this industry. If H&M would become known as the company featuring disfigured buttergolems in their bikini clothing line because of government regulations, no one would want to buy clothes from them anymore. The only option for H&M is to move to a different country, which would basically be economic suicide by the Swedish government.

One interesting thing to note is that Veronica Palm from the Social Democratic Party pointed out that nine out of ten young women saw something wrong with their bodies while looking at these advertisements and felt like they had to change something about their appearance.

God forbid that girls receive a spark of inspiration and motivation to improve themselves – let's instead further the degeneracy of young women by applauding hamplanets such as Lena Dunham, Meghan Trainor, or Tess Holliday! When you try to encourage a positive change for women not just aesthetically but also in terms of health, it's offensive and should be outright banned.

Upholding individuals who have let themselves go and live unhealthy lives is recognized as a noble and virtuous act. What I find most compelling about the manosphere is without question the focus on personal growth, and it's ironic how feminists and the manosphere are such polar opposites in this instance. To be fair though, feminists do promote women who have had their fair share of growth as well.

Read More: The Final Verdict On Swedish Girls

Chuck Finley

Chuck Finley is a young buck from Sweden. He was able to see through the cultural marxist agenda in the school environment early on, which helped him discover both libertarianism and the manosphere. Chuck plans to take advantage of the Swedish school system to the fullest, only to use it as a springboard to abandon the country as soon as possible. Will be writing about Scandinavia with a focus on Sweden.

Channeling Your Pain To Help Yourself And Others

July 13, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The July 2015 issue of Outside magazine has an article about an Oregon entrepreneur named Chad Brown. I liked the article and thought other readers here might find it useful and instructive. It's about pain, recovery, and channeling your despair into productive work.

Brown had joined the Navy when he was 20 years old, and had been assigned to duty in Mogadishu, Somalia in 1993. Those who know their recent history will know instantly what that means. His official job description was that of a "combat stevedore"; his job was to provide security and logistics for equipment that was offloaded from the docks and trucked to various points around the city.

Mogadishu in 1993 was lawless. He described how he and his comrades were often shot at by snipers and trouble-makers of various stripes. "Mogadishu was nasty…a beehive," as he describes it. He would have to take Somali men into custody every now and then, for security, and the job bothered him after a while. His role was a little too colonial for his tastes. One of his friends was killed.

Over time he thought about these experiences more and more.

He got out of the military in 1994 and then attended college on the GI Bill. After receiving a degree in communications and design from New York City's Pratt Institute, he went to work in the advertising industry in New York City. The pace and intensity of life there kept his mind constantly active, with little time for melancholy or brooding.

But that was soon to change. Brown's life took a nosedive in 2008 when he accepted a contract job in Oregon. He had always been close to his family, and the geographical separation from them cut him away from his psychological moorings. The people, the culture, and the climate were different from what he was used to. And slowly things began to unravel.

First came the excessive drinking. This led to his losing his job. And once the income dried up, he found himself reaching rock bottom. “I was in a dark place,” he relates. “I had no one to turn to. I was borderline homeless.” He couldn’t reach out to his parents because they didn’t understand his experiences or frames of reference. For living expenses, he learned to sell his blood.

Things came to a head in 2009, when he bought a gun and headed to the Clackamas River to shoot himself. There was no other way out, it seemed to him.

But something stopped him. The peaceful quality of the river, the sound of running water which appeared to be the beating of some great invisible Heart, somehow rejuvenated him. He called his family, which advised him to contact the Veterans Administration suicide hotline. He checked himself into a psychiatric ward.

It turned out to be a blessing in disguise. The few days he spent there were productive. He learned about PTSD and all its features: inability to concentrate, insomnia, irritability, anxiety, and depression.

One of the hospital orderlies took him bass fishing. It was one of those turning-point experiences in his life. The meditative quality of being in the outdoors, the direct contact he had with other species of wildlife, and the need to focus on the task at hand were all things that he found restful.

The curative power of being around running water is something that has been documented. It seems to encourage a heightened state of attention in the human brain, and can counteract the negative effects of living in an overly-automated society. A 2009 study conducted by the VA found that test group of men experienced a significant reduction in their salivary cortisol, immunoglobins, and urinary catecholamines after going on a fishing trip.

Although he had no money, he took a leap of faith and bought some fly-fishing gear on credit. He learned to fish by watching videos on YouTube and by taking advice from anyone who would offer it. The act of fishing itself had restorative powers for Brown:

> That was my healing. Fishing evolved me to a place where I was ready to get back in society and kick ass…I was standing in the water waist deep, and I thought, this river has basically saved my life. I've got to do something for others. It became about more than just me, and that's when my design side started to kick in.

His goal was to start a fishing gear and accessories company that would help fund education and conservation efforts. His plan was to provide a resource that people might go to for donated fishing equipment and information about fishing. He also tried his hand at designing reels, clothing, and bags. Invitations came in for him to speak to others. His business, Soul River, combined philanthropic and commercial purposes.

Chad Brown found a way to channel his anger and pain into productive work. He said, "[I believe] in finding a way to radiate your pain outward to help others." By any measure, he has succeeded. No matter what agonies of misfortune wash over us, we must find ways of converting the negative into the positive.

It may just save our lives.

Read More: 3 Ways Men Can Try To Fix The System

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Fans And The Media Are Making Professional Sports Unbearable

July 14, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Amidst the hate mail I receive from single mothers and pink-haired fatties, I've recently seen an uptick in readers asking why I haven't written a sports article lately, the DeAndre Johnson fiasco notwithstanding. The short answer to that is that I just don't consume as much of the fringe coverage or follow the stories off the field as much as I used to.

I'm a huge fan of the NFL so I'm not cutting back on that any time soon. I follow baseball fairly closely and I'm big into racing—NASCAR, Indy Car, and Formula One. But gone are the days where I followed any and every sport closely and took in all the coverage, debate, and discussion surrounding the events.

Thing is, the reasons have nothing to do with the athletes themselves as their level of talent and performance is at an all time high.

It's that sports fans and the sports media are as intolerable as they have ever been in recent memory. The hypocrisy, cynicism, and of course the advancement of the feminist agenda have made consuming them nearly impossible for me these days.

Between all the faux outrage over domestic violence, the ridiculous "lean in" campaign, the exponentially increasing presence of the hamster-laden female opinion and "expertise" on television and radio, and fans who worship teams, players, while trying to bring the moral cathedral into the competitive arena, sports has become much less appealing to follow outside the lines.

Tune in if you want your ears to bleed

Being unplugged from the matrix, however, is definitely the main reason I find myself watching only the events themselves, often times with the volume muted.

There are countless stories or incidents I could tell about why this is but I'll just give a few of the most publicized ones and I'll break it down in two sections: The media and the fans.

Today's Sports Media

ESPN

ESPN made its mark on myself and millions of other men at a very young age. I've watched their flagship studio shows like SportsCenter, Baseball Tonight, and Sunday NFL Countdown for decades so it's safe to say that the sports media juggernaut has my loyalty by process of branding me as a 12-year-old.

This network is the true worldwide leader in terms of sports and sports content as their slogan says. They're currently available in over 80% of house holds in the U.S., boast 12 different sister networks, and are broadcasting in over 200 countries. Needless to say they're the big man on campus by a wide margin.

I've watched this show since I was a teenager

Being the biggest, most successful sports media conglomerate in the world doesn't come without it's detractors and criticism. No surprise there as the biggest and most profitable companies are scrutinized much more than their less successful counterparts.

I'd never been one who was outright critical of them on account of my loyalty and blue pill mindset. But since being enlightened by the web's version of Morpheus, their gyno-centricism sticks out like a sore thumb and becomes more obvious by the day.

The female influence on all of their mediums are palpable, as women are now present on just about every program they broadcast. There are female doctors, female panelists on opinion shows, and even females breaking down fantasy sports.

Only her name gives us proof of her sex

Personally, I've never minded seeing women on the sports landscape. Linda Cohn and Robin Roberts never rubbed me the wrong way back in the day on SportsCenter and female sideline reporters are paid to look good and report the facts. Nothing wrong with that either.

Today, the network is rampant with hamster droppings. Social issues are every bit as a part of their overall narrative as what goes on on the field of play. Mix that together with ever-increasing employed female pundits squawking about domestic violence, gay athletes, Title IX, and the ongoing pathetic attempts by females to "play with the boys" every 5 minutes and any man with even trace amounts of traditional or neomasculine beliefs would eventually start to tire of the charade.

What they didn't tell you is that the boys from Vegas gave Miss Davis a dose of reality

In their defense, it would seem that this radical shift is necessary. Our P.C.-saturated culture has made it almost mandatory for them to employ more women, talk about social issues, and take a hard left stance on said issues.

We can all say "Well I'd never sell out to satisfy the masses" but most of us would fall in line to preserve our six, seven, and even eight-figure salaries and I wouldn't blame you.

I'd also argue that some of ESPN's workforce does not believe a word of the blue pill trash they spew on camera or radio. The one example I can point out is Colin Cowherd, who hosts his radio show The Herd. His stance on domestic violence seems almost too black and white for a man of his open mindedness.

There have also been a few instances where red pill truth slips out every once in a while such as Stephen A. Smith's take on the Ray Rice situation:

> What I've tried to employ the female members of my family — some of who you all met and talked to and what have you — is that … let's make sure we don't do anything to provoke wrong actions, because if I come — or somebody else come, whether it's law enforcement officials, your brother or the fellas that you know — if we come after somebody has put their hands on you, it doesn't negate the fact that they already put their hands on you.

There was immediate outrage both in and outside of the ESPN family and Smith was immediately suspended for a week which prompted an immediate retraction shortly after, thereby eliminating the threat.

But what his statement says is that there are definitely people within their ranks who aren't all in on the gender equality farce. And because they're all handsomely paid, they keep their honest opinions to themselves and I can't say I blame them.

Gotcha

The other issue that's turned me off these days is the way most of the media treats professional athletes in terms of their questioning. I certainly don't feel sorry for the athletes because of the "privileged" lives they lead (which, by the way, they work very hard for) but media members seem much more intent on making them uncomfortable than simply extracting information to distribute to the sports public.

The main purpose of the media is to get information about the athletes and the events the public wouldn't otherwise be aware of. Yes, there are other elements but that's the gist of what they are there for.

Today's reporter or beat writers are consistently attempting to just piss athletes off. Get a rise out of them. There's no rhyme or reason, it just seems like the thing to do these days. It's as though they get off on ruffling the feathers of athletes, coaches, general managers etc. Most of the questions are designed to throw them off their game or make them look bad or ignorant—"gotcha questions" if you will.

This one's not hard to figure out. The main reason for this is flat out jealousy. It's often been said that most sports writers are people who would gladly trade places with the athletes they cover, but because of lack of talent, discipline, and genetics they didn't make the grade.

So it stands to reason they project their negative feelings stemming from their unfulfilled dreams onto the people they're paid to write and talk about.

To their credit, the media at large doesn't seem to crucify the increasing salaries of today's athlete so I'll give them a break on that. But that doesn't stop them from getting a hard-on over making grown men who are physically, financially, and socially superior to them uncomfortable and then gaining prominence of "getting the best of" player X, Y, or Z.

Today's Fan

Fan worship

Show me a man who "lives and dies with his team" and I'll show you a man who is unhappy with his life.

There's nothing wrong with getting excited about your team if they're doing well, and there's nothing wrong with being a little bummed when they're not. But grown men who get shit-faced drunk and call out of work on Monday if their team wins or loses the Super Bowl are fucking pathetic.

Outside of gambling or owning a sports memorabilia shop, your team being great or shitty does not affect your life one way or the other. A man who invests a disproportionate amount of their energy and emotion into their team is a man who desperately needs an overhaul.

This is nothing to be proud of

In the same vein, nothing is more pitiful as a grown man who wears an article of clothing with another man's name emblazoned on his back. It's okay to admire a player for his athletic prowess and performance on the field of play but I've never understood the desire for a man to proudly don another man's name anywhere on his person.

There are plenty of other ways to show support for your squad without surrendering your balls and looking like a fanboy. Sport a team shirt, a team hat, or some other accessory.

But if a man hits the gym, learns game, and engages in self improvement he'll have no desire to engage in such emasculating acts like wearing somebody else's name on his back.

The moral cathedral and contradictions

This is a big one for me. Fans these days are more hypocritical and judgmental than they've ever been in history. They'll vilify an athlete for testing positive for a performance enhancing substance but defend an athlete for the same thing because he plays for their team. Then later that day they drive to the doctor for their weekly testosterone shot.

This year's MLB All Star Game is the quintessential example of how fans pick and choose who gets a free pass and who doesn't. Nelson Cruz and Jhonny Peralta were voted in as American and National League starters, respectively, and both have served 50-game suspensions for testing positive for PEDs and everyone seems to be fine with it.

Fans outside of New York make A-Rod public enemy #1

However, when Milwaukee Brewers outfielder Ryan Braun was voted in a few days ago outrage immediately broke out. Fans also seem to be happy that Yankees DH Alex Rodriguez was not voted onto the All Star Team for the 15th time citing “justice” as their reason for approval of his omission.

Which is it?

Revisionist history and referendums

Fans these days also fall victim to revisionist history. Michael Jordan never missed a shot, Tiger Woods is the only professional athlete to have fucked multiple hookers, and LeBron James sucks as a human being.

His Airness

I’m not going to make this a debate whether or not Jordan is the greatest player of all time but any time I suggest anything to the contrary, I’m met with vitriolic and incredulous arguments. These people don’t realize that his shoes, the way he was marketed, and the lack of social media back when he played paints a different picture of what he really was as a player.

Yes, at this time he’s the greatest of all time but not by as wide a margin as people would lead you to believe. He’s not the all time points leader (Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, 38,387 pts), assists leader (John Stockton, 15,806 assists), or the career rebounds leader (Wilt Chamberlain, 23,924 rebounds).

Hell, he doesn’t even have the most career titles as a player as Bill Russell won 11 with the Boston Celtics, almost double the amount of his 6 with the Chicago Bulls.

[image]
He's great, but not a god

The only statistical category he's #1 in points per game and the guy behind him, Wilt Chamberlain, is only .05 points behind him. Never mind that today's fan will crucify athletes for shooting too much or being "selfish" with the ball and not spreading the wealth.

The bottom line is that Jordan worshipers act as though His Airness was perfect in every way and is infallible which is revisionist history at its best and worst. Jordan's one of the greatest. No doubt about that. But Nike and Gatorade have made sure we never question that he's the greatest of all time and if you stop gawking at his shoes and carefully edited highlight reels and look at things objectively you might actually entertain thoughts that this may not be the case.

King James

Staying in the same arena, LeBron James has been the target of some of the most unjustified hate I've ever witnessed as a sports fan. This guy is the most unselfish star player I've seen since Magic Johnson. He could score 40 a game easy but he chooses not to.

What's more is that he's never been in trouble with the law, and by all accounts seems to be a devoted husband and father (though we never really know).

Yet, fans hate this guy with a passion. Why?

"He left Cleveland!"

A man makes a decision to go to a better organization with better players, better weather, no state taxes, and to win championships when it became clear to him that his current team didn't have the infrastructure or the desire to put a championship caliber team around him. Yeah…terrible fucking individual.

"It's the way he left Cleveland!"

Colin Cowherd said it best when he said (referring to LeBron's exit from Cleveland): "You're not really upset at how she left you….you're upset that she left you and that's the real reason you're pissed off!"

Would I have held a television special to announce I was going to another team when I knew it would rip the heart out of my home town fans?

Probably not.

Would I have held a pep rally with my new team guaranteeing multiple championships and declaring that it was going to be easy.

Maybe, maybe not.

It’s been five years people…let it go

I’d like to think I’d have handled taking my talents to South Beach in a different manner but one never knows. Besides, who among us haven’t made stupid decisions in our mid-twenties? I don’t see any hands up.

Personally, I don’t give a shit how he handled it and I’m not going to judge him for the way he did it. To be honest it was quite entertaining because I’m not from Cleveland or Miami but I digress.

The point is, people will rationalize anything and The Decision is their excuse to hate on one of the greatest players in NBA history who also seems to be a pretty good dude to boot. Every possession is a referendum on his legacy and that’s just asinine.

[image]
What teenager would turn down doing this cover?

This, again, is another case of jealousy. We all saw him on the cover of Sports Illustrated as a teenager, we all saw him dubbed as “The Chosen One,” and we all now he’ll be one of a handful of billion dollar athletes when all is said and done.

But like I said in this article, LeBron haters should just admit they hate the guy because he lives a better life than they do and leave it at that.

Wrap up

So there you have it. Pompous, sadistic, feminist media members and delusional, envious, moralist fans are the main reasons I’ve drastically cut back on sports. I could go on for days about this stuff but I’m a team player so I’ll spare you a 10,000-word article this week.

I definitely still watch the games and races, but I can do without all of the increasingly spoiling trimmings on the side. It won’t be long before I wean myself off of the actual events themselves because of this stuff. When that happens, it'll be a sad day indeed.

Read Next: It's Time To Stop Hating Professional Athletes

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Feminist Politician Declares War On “Gendered Toys”; Dresses Up Daughter As Pink Fairy Princess

July 14, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Senator Waters said that “outdated stereotypes” about girls and boys perpetuate gender inequality, “which feeds into very serious problems such as domestic violence and the gender pay gap”.
>
> – The Sydney Morning Herald quoting Senator Larissa Waters of Queensland, from the far-left Australian Greens, after her call to restrict the giving of “gendered” presents, such as action figures to boys and Barbies to girls.

A national feminist politician has remained quiet about her push for the end of children’s gendered toys, especially when given at holidays such as Christmas. Larissa Waters made headlines at the end of 2014 for arguing that gendered toys were a catalyst for issues such as domestic violence and the gender pay gap.

Lo and behold, a photo surfaced of her own daughter dressed as a pink fairy princess at her birthday party. Waters, who hails from a political party which never talks about balancing budgets or bread-and-butter economics, desperately deflected accusations that she was a hypocrite.

The name Larissa Waters won’t ring a bell for many of you, but her flagrant double standards will. They are ones you could put in the mouths of hundreds, if not thousands of feminists and other SJWs quoted in the media.

When I heard about her moronic campaign at the end of year, I wanted to wait and see if it continued. After six months it hasn’t, although Waters’ radical ideology has come out in different ways, such as calling innocent or run-of-the-mill criticism of female politicians “sexist” or “misogynist.”

After the bizarre picture of her daughter’s dressing-up went public, Waters defiantly said she still wanted a ban on gendered toys. The sting from the many rebukes she faced over her proposal means we should expect for it to be called for again in a year or so.

We already treat boys and girls (and men and women) differently

Larissa Waters' young daughter. The Senator's hypocrisy knows no bounds, tragically. By her rationale, she's exposing her daughter to the risk of future domestic violence and the gender pay gap, right?

Society has no issue whatsoever with declaring boys as different and "hyperactive," to the point where these differences are discouraged and far too many boys are effectively overdosed with Ritalin and other behavioral control drugs. Studies also consistently prove that both parents treat boys and girls differently, especially in terms of telling boys to "man up" and "stop crying" and mollycoddling girls more when they become emotional.

It's therefore strange that these are not issues taken up by Senator Waters and her colleagues. One's style of parenting imprints much more on a child than whichever Hasbro, Mattel or another company's product they are given for a Christmas, birthday, or an excellent report card.

As boys and girls get older, the way they are treated actually becomes starker, not more similar. Girls are taught that they need many female role models, which they already get from the ranks of the overwhelmingly female elementary school teacher profession, whilst their male classmates generally get no such guidance from older men in education.

Boys who break the law quickly learn that there is one set of rules for them, and another for girls. The notion that females are treated more leniently by ironically paternalistic members of the judiciary and law enforcement is not new. Sonja Starr, a US academic I have cited several times, noted that men receive 60% longer sentences for federal offences and many women avoid prosecution or jail entirely.

Because of "chivalrous" expectations that men should never hit or otherwise harm women, especially publicly, male homicide victims outnumber female ones by 3:1 or 4:1. The list is endless.

Larissa Waters appropriates every female “stereotype” in the book

An interesting part of Larissa Waters’ entry into politics (and a double standard) has been her steady appropriation of the female “stereotypes” of using cosmetics and traditionally feminine fashion all the time.

Politicians, male and female, go to some effort to present themselves well. Appearing on television, they use make-up a lot of the time. Unlike for women, though, the men use it to iron out only the worst aspects of their visages, the sort of jowls, five o’clock shadows and other “oddities” which made Richard Nixon lose the 1960 Presidential debate (and the subsequent election) against John F. Kennedy.

The differences between Larissa Waters’ best and worst appearances are down to her using make-up. Particularly in the hot and humid climate of her native state of Queensland, her campaign and other appearances show a decidedly different face. Therefore, how is this not a stereotype? Why is she succumbing to what feminists like her call the constant, mental illness-producing demands on women to look perfect and non-real?

It goes further, too. Of any female politician I have seen over the last five years in the Australian Federal Parliament, Senator Waters is the one who seems to adore conventionally feminine fashion the most. Polka dots, flowers, and other girly-girl prints are invariably emblazoned across her dresses, blouses and skirts.

I can sometimes appreciate her choices in and of themselves, but they are far removed from the sort of gender-neutral image she demands people foist on their children.

End the hypocrisy, please

There are dozens of readily accessible photos of Larissa Waters wearing stereotypically flowery and ornate dresses, skirts and other items. So why isn't she following No Gender December herself?

The slap-down of Senator Waters' brain-dead comments is heartening. But we cannot celebrate prematurely. There are sufficient numbers of SJWs lacking enough shame that they try and bury the rest of us with their self-serving ultimatums and social reengineering projects. We are unable to always count on non-red pill folks to put these do-gooders in their place.

The advantage that SJWs have had is their ability to refocus a debate and blur out the surrounding context that disproves them. It is our responsibility to revert back to the full picture. Exposing hypocrisy may not seem to work in the short run, but it reaps large dividends in the longer term (just look at Gamergate).

What's more, as her daughter's birthday party and her manner of personal presentation prove, Larissa Waters doesn't even believe in being gender-neutral herself. If the SJWs don't even want to keep themselves consistent for their cherished pet projects, how good can these initiatives possibly be for society at large?

Read More: Spanish Politician Is Crushed For Questioning Feminist Dogma

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

7 Steps To Follow When Your Game Hits A Dry Spot

July 15, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

We've all been there—it happens to the best of us from time-to-time. Perhaps you're out of practice for one reason or another. Maybe you've been in a long-term relationship, or been working on a business or school project. Perhaps you've just allowed yourself to get lazy. Whatever it is, if a man is not consistently practising his game skills then they will start to atrophy, and in the worst cases recede to a worrying degree.

When this happens, things that used to be easy, like walking up and opening a girl in a nightclub or on the street, suddenly become intimidating and when you do force yourself to do them you come over as stilted and dry bomb horribly.

If you find this happening to you then don't panic—it's not forever, and simply by taking action you will find that you can turn things around over a period of time, even exceeding your former glories in the process. Here are my seven steps for getting over a dry spell quickly and easily.

1. Accept that Your Game Is Crap And Will Remain So For The Foreseeable Future

There’s no point in beating around the bush. Right now your game is rubbish – you know it and the girls that you approach know it too, hence the somewhat “robust” feedback in the shape of insults and drinks thrown that you are receiving right now out in the field.

Don’t try to pretend to yourself that things are any other way, and certainly don’t try to pretend that the women you speak to are wrong and are somehow “not getting you.” The fault lies with you and it is down to you to fix up.

Instead of trying to deceive yourself, instead calmly accept things as they are and resolve to improve the situation.

2. Have Faith You Can Turn Things Around

The second step is to believe in the higher forces of game — that if you put the work in, so the universe will give back to you in kind and things will improve. If it's any consolation I can tell you that some of the driest spells that I've ever experienced have been followed by seasons of sexual abundance that I would never have dreamed about before.

I have suffered some of the most humiliating blow-outs of my life, only to enjoy, after a month or so of consistent approaching and rejection, the attentions of far hotter girls than ever before.

Men often make the mistake of thinking that a dry spell is the beginning of the end, or that "this is it" for the rest of their lives. Not a bit of it. Everything is temporary – this too shall pass. Life is not constant and unchanging—there are ups and downs. This is true of any aspect of existence you care to imagine. Therefore simply read the steps outlined here, take the necessary action, and trust that things can and will improve.

3. Approach 100 Girls

No way around this one I'm afraid, gentlemen. In order to get out of your funk, you're going to have to put the time and the footwork in and approach like a machine. Not just because “it’s a numbers game” and you might get lucky – although it’s true that you might. Rather, you need to go through this process to get yourself on point.

You need to approach them with intent—whether you go in direct or indirect is up to you, but you need to make it obvious, through tone, body language and eye contact, that you find them hot and you want to fuck them. Why? Not only because that is the essence of game, but also because in doing so you will be putting yourself on the line in a way that 95% of men don’t.

Plus when you’re standing in front of a hot girl without a parachute, so to speak, then you’re going to have to force yourself to come up with something to say. At first you’ll crash and burn, no doubt. But as you work through the 100 you’ll start to get bolder, more inventive, and infused with a sexy spark that will light up eyes and moisten vaginas everywhere.

4. Go Easy On Yourself

Don’t give yourself a hard time while you’re going through this process. You’re doing something very difficult. You’re going to fuck up. That’s fine – it’s life. Pat yourself on the back simply for trying and doing something most other men wouldn’t have the balls to do rather than measuring yourself on how many phone numbers, dates or lays you get. All that stuff will come later.

5. Keep A Spreadsheet

If it’s good enough for Paul Janka then it’s good enough for you. While you’re working through the 100 approaches, keep a spreadsheet. Not only will this ensure you stay on track, it will also help you see where your successes are coming from and focus your attentions accordingly.

Precisely what you record is up to you, but in the past I’ve noted down things such as where I’ve met the girl, her age, nationality, and the details of the interaction, good or bad.

The other great thing about having a record like this is it limits approach anxiety – in the end, an approach is just another line on the sheet, nothing more and nothing less. Keeping a record will certainly help you to reduce negative feelings around each individual girl.

6. Record Yourself

Another thing you can try is recording yourself when you go out to talk to girls. Thanks to smartphones you don't need any special equipment. Just download a voice record app, stick your phone in your top pocket and you're ready to go.

Listening back to the conversations can be embarrassing at first, but it will enable you to identify what you're doing wrong and where you're coming off badly—for example if you're speaking too quickly or using needy intonation.

7. Try Anything And Have Fun

Right now, you're at ground zero — things can't get any worse. So rather than wallowing in it, now is an ideal time to try any style of game you fancy. Maybe you've always wanted to go ultra-direct. If so, walk up to 100 girls and tell them you'd like to go to bed with them. Maybe you want to experiment with some crazy routine or other. Do it. Now is the time. Since you're going to suck anyway until you're well into the 100 then you may as well enjoy it.

After following these steps I guarantee that your game will improve and you will start to become a lot more on-point in social interactions. And it can be quick too – all you need is a couple of weeks. Good luck, and let me know how you get on in the comments below.

Read More: Five Reasons Why The Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need to Learn Game

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Race-Baiting British Marxist Attacks Little Girl's Design Of Regional Flag As Racist

July 15, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A self-exalted "racism campaigner" has attacked a 12-year-old girl's design of the flag of the Black Country, a region in the West Midlands of England. Patrick Vernon, who, like the useless feminist SJW Caroline Criado-Perez I recently wrote about, holds the Order of the British Empire, called the design "offensive and insensitive" and complained that the chain motif of the flag is improper because shackles made by Black Country forgers were used to incarcerate slaves in North America.

Luckily, the comments by the self-acclaimed "social commentator and political activist" have been roundly, and refreshingly, dismissed as "political correctness garbage" by local politicians.

The Black Country—an industrial powerhouse

Black Country Blacksmiths, who toiled to build a country wealthy enough for soft, doughy liberals like Patrick Vernon to sit around complaining and call it a career.

The Black Country is an area of the West Midlands which includes the major towns Walsall and Wolverhampton. During the Industrial Revolution, the Black Country was a major industrial powerhouse, a centre for mining, steel production, and metal casting.

It might surprise those of uncalloused hands, excess free time, and a penchant for zany liberal groupthink to hear that the Black Country is not so called out of a desire to "marginalise" black people. The name comes from the black soot produced by heavy industries that thrived in the area.

The Black Country flag which forms the object of Mr. Vernon's gripe was designed by Gracie Sheppard, a local schoolgirl, as part of a competition. She took the colour scheme from Elihu Burrit, an olden American Consul to Birmingham, England, who described the region as "black by day and red by night," in reference to local furnaces billowing smoke during the day and glowing red by night.

The chain running across the flag represent another prominent industry of the region. The anchor and chains of the HMS Titanic, all 100 tons of them, were made in Netherton, in the Black Country. The region still produces chains for the Ministry of Defence. The white symbol in the middle shows a glass cone, another product of local industry.

Dudley Council adopted Gracie's design as the official Black Country Flag, and it was flown on Monday, which was the celebration of Black Country day across the region. Industry past and present is a deep source of pride for the Black Country, which saw the production of the first successful steam engine, invented by Thomas Newcomen in 1712.

Another professional grievance-monger

Patrick Vernon, OBE

"Social commentator and political activist" Mr Vernon piped in with his comments just a day before Black Country Day. He said the use of chain as a symbol was "insensitive," adding that: "Shackles and manacles… made by chainmakers in the Black Country were used to incarcerate slaves in North America, on plantations and in colonial Africa." He berated the entire region, saying: "the Black Country has never done anything to acknowledge that slavery was key to its economic rise"

The former Labour councillor (for Hackney in East London, mind you, not a ward anywhere in the West Midlands) launched into full on Marxist babble, continuing: "It was not just the slaves who were oppressed by chainmaking, there was the women – the white slaves of Cradley Heath – and the working classes who were oppressed by the rich foundry owners. The chain is a symbol of their oppression too."

Social Justice bullying fails again

TV star Lenny Henry, who has previously complained that there are not enough black people on TV, has no problem with the Black Country flag.

Fortunately, Vernon's comments were roundly rejected by local politicians of all stripes.

West Midlands UKIP MEP Bill Etheridge, dismissed the comments in the strongest possible terms, saying:

> This is political correctness garbage. The chains represent the chains built for the Titanic and in that spirit, Mr. Vernon's comments should be condemned to the bottom of the ocean.

Conservative MP for Dudley South, Mike Wood added:

> While we need to be sensitive, we should not be trying to re-write history. Chainmaking is part of our identity and industrial heritage. It is a history we should be proud of, not one we should be running away from.

Even Labour's MP for Dudley North, Ian Austin gave the comments short shrift:

> This is ridiculous nonsense. The Black Country Festival brings everyone from our diverse communities together. If he had come to Stone Street Square this weekend he would have seen people off all races and backgrounds enjoying the fun. It was an example of what makes our society something to celebrate.

The long march of the loony left

Tapping on a MacBook it isn't.

The "Loony Left" was a theme that arose during the 1987 British general election, and was a description of certain aspects of Labour politics. The theme was that Labour's local government authorities were either irrationally obsessed with minority and fringe issues, or paranoid about imaginary racial and sexual issues.

The pejorative label arose from stories such as the 2000 banning of the nursery rhyme Baa Baa Black Sheep by Birmingham City Council on the grounds that it was racially offensive to black people. The ban was rescinded after outraged families complained.

Patrick Vernon may or may not be a pure race huckster in the mould of shit-stirring "Reverend" Al Sharpton, or our very own "race relations activist" Lee Jasper on this side of the pond. Vernon is said to have done good work in the field of mental health. By making his ill-advised comments about the Black Country Flag, however, Vernon is carrying the mantle of the Loony Left into the modern age of the "callout culture" Social Justice Warrior.

Working class British people have very little left they are allowed to be proud of. Emily Thornberry, a lawyer and Labour politician, was shadow Attorney General in the Labour opposition until last year until she had to step down over mocking, sneering tweets of a man who had hung the flag of St George from his windows.

The hummus and halloumi eating liberal elite of Islington hold a special sort of sneering contempt for any common English people who might still hold some attachment to tradition, or the past. Thornberry is not an isolated incident either. In 2013 a rural council voted to stop flying the flag of St George because a Labour councillor insisted it could cause Muslims to become upset.

Common people can no longer make any expressions of pride or joy outside the narrow compass of What Is Permitted, without some officious busybody piling in to make a point about alleged historical wrongs.

Antonio Gramsci

Patrick Vernon is, in essence, such an officious busybody, a Cultural Marxist SJW acting in identical vein. He no doubt would have rejoiced at the banning of the flag, just as feminists creamed their Aunt Jemima pantaloons at the banning of the Beach Body Ready adverts.

For the lunatics congregating under the flag of social justice, every success at banning even the most innocuous thing is a cause for orgasmic celebration, because under the surface, it is just one more step in what Italian Marxist Antonio Gramsci called the "long march through the institutions."

Fortunately, the people and the press of the Black Country have read the issue of the Black Country Flag with utter clarity, and told the Social Justice berk to get on his bike. Let's hope this is a template reaction to all future attempts by the grievance mongers to guilt trip the majority.

Read Next: Critical Race Theory Is Repackaged Narcissism

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

How The Higher Education Industry Is Using Student Loans To Get Rich

July 16, 2015 | by Max Power | Link | Original Link

We've recently been thinking about wealth transfers resulting from student loans insured or directly issued by the U.S. government. On initial examination, the situation appears to be one where an implicit transfer of wealth from taxpayers to higher education students takes place.

The transfer results from loans being issued to students at rates below a proper risk-adjusted market interest rate. However, on examining the market more closely, we see that the reality is that taxpayers and students are both being used in a much larger transfer of wealth. The ultimate beneficiary in this government-led cartel is the higher education sector.

A Brief Overview Of Student Lending

In the United States most of the cost of higher education is covered by students and their families, at least ostensibly. Much of the cost is financed through borrowing, and the share of this portion has been rising, particularly since the start of the 2007 recession. As we can see in charts 1 and 2 below, the share of students who borrow and the average balance have both been climbing steadily over the course of the past decade at rates much higher than inflation.

Chart 3 below gives us a simple view of the composition of student debt currently outstanding. The vast majority of these loans have been either insured by or issued directly by the federal government. "Federal" student loans outstanding had topped $1 trillion, 83% of all student debt, and another $200 billion in "private" student loans is also outstanding—these loans are not subsidized by the government. Readers interested in a more detailed overview are referred to here and here.

Federally-insured or issued loans use pre-packaged terms that cover everything from the interest rate charged (historically about 5-7%) to the manner which lenders are required to go about collecting payments. From 1965 to 2010, private lenders made student loans using federal terms in exchange for government insurance covering student defaults and a guaranteed interest rate on the loans.

This program was called Federal Family Education Loan Program (FFELP) and operated in conjunction with SLMA, the GSE better known as Sallie Mae. Sallie Mae began to privatize in 1997 and the process was completed in 2004. The federal government also ran a "public option" loan program called Federal Direct that covered small and high-loss schools not serviced by private-sector lenders.

As a horse-trade to get votes from hard-core leftists in Congress not satisfied by ObamaCare, the "Affordable" Care Act legislation was amended to end FFELP and establish Federal Direct as a monopoly for federally-insured loans. Currently, about 45% of the outstanding federal loans are left over from FFELP with the remainder issued and held by the Federal government.

The FFELP loans will have largely been securitized, with the possible exception of loans which Sallie Mae or Citigroup have in term warehouses. Since no new FFELP loans are being issued, the share of Federal Direct loans is steadily rising.

The private-label student loan market only makes up about 15-20% of currently outstanding student debt, but the "Wild West" qualities of this market make it very interesting. The loans are priced based on credit, so in this case we can actually see a market estimate of the proper risk pricing for these types of loans.

What we see is that these loans are largely priced like personal loans, with rates ranging from 5 – 25%. Many large and reputable banks do have private loan programs, but the high interest rates draws in all sorts of players. One example was the "non-profit" EduCap, which focused on making loans to students from upper-income families that didn't qualify for financial aid.

The company bumped into unwanted attention when Tom Daschle was criticized for hitching a ride to Bahrain on the non-profit's corporate jet. The incident was viewed by commentators as ending his chance of being named Secretary of Health by the Obama Administration.

A brief overview of the terms and attributes of the loans will also be helpful. As mentioned, Federal student loans have historically carried 5-6% rates with repayment terms of 20-30 years. The student isn't required to repay while in school and can "defer" the loan for up to two years due to lack of income.

The actual expected life of the loans is about 10 years. Federal loans for undergraduate students do not include a credit check, but loans for parents and graduate-level students do have a minimal credit screen. Private student loans will have repayment terms from 10-20 years, but have a shorter expected life 5-7 years due to prepayments.

The most important feature of student loans is shared by both types – non-dischargeability in bankruptcy. Thus, even for privately offered loans, bankruptcy laws give strong lender protections. This gives the loan a premium value above a standard yield calculation. The exceptions are that, in the case of Federal loans, loans can be forgiven after working in education, public safety or the military for a specified period.

Also, with income-based repayments, the percentage of income used for student loan payments is capped at 10%. In addition, if you stay poor for 25 years, the loans are forgiven. It can almost be taken for granted, but for the record these programs have been expanded and their terms made more generous under the Obama Administration.

Wealth Transfer Implications Of Interest Subsidies

As mentioned above, on its face, the subsidy appears to be a wealth transfer from taxpayers to students. The amount of the transfer would be the shortfall in interest received from government loans compared to what would be received at market interest rates. Based on what we've seen, the spread appears to be in the neighborhood of 8-12%.

At the current level of $1 trillion in outstanding Federal loans, the transfer is approximately $80-120 billion annually. As we can see in Chart 4 below, the outstanding level of Federal student debt has climbed aggressively over the past 10 years so the annual transfer has as well.

Clearly, the subsidization of interest rates means there is a transfer to someone taking place. However, to determine the ultimate beneficiary we must ask ourselves whether these loans would be made at all if borrowers were forced to pay the market rate. This writer believes they would not.

Without sufficient financing available, demand would fall. As a result, tuitions would need to fall or the total number of students able to attend would fall; most likely a combination of the two would occur. Whatever the case, the annual income of the higher education sector would fall.

Chart 5 below gives some indicative ranges on how the $1.2 trillion of currently outstanding student debt would be financed without government support available. Specifically, we are interested in how the 83% currently funded by the government would be handled. It seems reasonable that when faced with higher interest rates students and families would divert cash from other sources to minimize debt incurred.

We make the guess that 10-20% of the debt outstanding would have been covered using cash. Presumably some shift to higher-interest private loans would take place, but as discussed above we believe it is unlikely the entire balance would move. So, depending on one's assumptions, 30-60% of the $1.2 trillion of student debt outstanding would not be funded.

Thus, without subsidization, $360-720 billion of the currently outstanding debt would never have been accrued. Given this, how should the $80-120 billion transfer related to the interest subsidy be attributed? We believe a transfer to students from taxpayers only applies to the reduction of interest on the loans that would have taken place in the absence of market distortions.

So, the transfer to students only applies to the $130-330 billion of additional borrowing from private lenders that would have taken place without subsidies. That amounts to an annual benefit of $10-40 billion, depending on assumptions about the spread and the level of private loans taken.

As we mentioned though, there are still currently outstanding $360-720 billion of student loans under the Federal loan program that we believe would not exist in a private-lending-only world. We believe the education sector is the end beneficiary of the transfer resulting from the subsidy on that portion of the loans; representing $40-110 billion annually. Thus, taxpayers are providing a lucrative transfer to higher education.

Readers will naturally ask, how can the transfer be going to the educational sector if students are paying interest to the government (even if it is an artificially low rate)? The answer to this lies in the mal-investment taking place as a result of artificially low interest rates on student loans.

Investment Boom In A Box

What we find most interesting about the student debt discussion is what it shows about the relationship between interest rates and investment booms. Like Darwin observing his finches, studying a specialized animal operating in its native environment can tell us a lot about the larger process going on.

What we find most remarkable in this case is that the investment boom is taking place in a totally abstract context. The object of all this investment is “human capital,” the increased expected income streams of millions of young Americans.

As with any other form of capital, an artificial repression of the interest rate causes an increase in the ex ante desired level of human capital. Assuming all else equal, a lower financing rate gives a larger number of people a positive NPV for the cost of higher education. But, as we should all know, all else is most definitely not equal. Two factors that are not fixed will render prior assumptions about the return on higher education to be overstated.

First and foremost, the supply of college-educated people has gone way up. Like any overbuilding of capital in a particular sector, production oversupply leads to cuts in selling prices that reduce return on investment. Secondly, it is far from clear that the education provided at many American universities provides any improvement in employability in the first place – the contrary may in fact sometimes be the case. Indeed, by definition, the marginal borrowers will be those with lower expected return on their education.

Thus, we believe the “Not Funded” portion in the chart above represents malinvestment. To the extent that the return on higher education falls short of the expectations, someone’s expected future path of consumption will have to be lower. That will happen because, for many borrowers, their income streams will not be sufficient to pay back their loans and provide the level of consumption they expected.

It is unlikely that the higher education sector will be asked to give back any of the money it has received. Thus, the nation will need to come to a political agreement allocating the loss of consumption between the borrowers and the taxpayers.

Here is where we see the big benefit received by the higher education sector. Universities have been selling human capital investment services for significantly more than they turn out to be worth ex post. The extent to which excess tuition was paid (anything above the true present value of the investment) represents an unrequited wealth transfer from the students to the education sector.

How Big Is The Higher Education Bubble?

We can begin our tally with the $1.2 trillion of student loans currently outstanding. Of course, the loans currently outstanding don’t represent the total amount of tuition that has been financed over the years. Each year billions of previously-borrowed funds are repaid.

Good numbers regarding repayment rates are hard to come by, but we assumed a straight line amortization over the course of ten years. As we can see in Chart 6 below, just looking back over the past 10 years we estimate an additional $180 – 360 billion has been transferred to higher education.

In total, a back-of-the-envelope calculation that includes current Federal loan balances plus repayments in the past ten years indicates excess investment in human capital by students of between $500 billion and $1 trillion. To the extent that the expected rate of return disappoints, a transfer from students to the higher education sector has occurred.

Thus, we believe the reduction in interest rates for loans funding overpayments (the "Not Funded" category in Charts 5 & 6) should be accrued from the taxpayer to the higher education sector. By subsidizing interest rates, the taxpayer shares some of the cost of overpayment for higher education investment. In effect, the students get a rebate from the taxpayers for part of their exorbitant tuition.

Social And Political Implications

Given the size of the wealth transfer and the fact that there is a very high concentration of borrowers among people in their 20s and early-30s, this issue is bound to have political consequences. First, there will be the allocation of losses from the loans already made. In Chart 7 below, we can see that in federal student loan delinquencies are at a disturbingly high level – over 40% of the borrowers that are actually in repayment.

Many citations of student loan delinquencies erroneously include 46% of borrowers that are either in school or the grace period – these borrowers are not required to make any payments and thus cannot be delinquent. When we exclude these borrowers we get a much higher delinquency rate. Whether to amend bankruptcy law and if so, how much of the balance should be forgiven will become a major issue.

Secondly, there will be a second group of borrowers who do not default but rather pay off their loans over the maximum amortization period. These borrowers will have the opportunity to experience diminished consumption possibilities over a long period of time. Resentment of the inability to discharge loans made for a human capital investment that didn't pan out will create pressure to further socialize the losses.

Readers assessing the U.S. Federal fiscal situation should be sure to include the taxpayer's exposure to losses on student loans, including insurance liabilities and directly-held loans. From a monetary policy perspective, further expansion of Federal liabilities and the difficulty of explicitly allocating losses between borrowers and taxpayers both increase the government's incentive to allocate losses via inflation.

Who’s getting rich from this?

At the end of the day though, who ends up bearing the cost of the human capital investment bubble is not as important as who is benefiting. The real danger of the situation lies in the funding and empowerment of the intellectual elites, the intelligentsia. In any society the intelligentsia reflexively stands against the status quo in order to be relevant.

The leftward bias of the American higher education system has been widely reported and anecdotally this writer has experienced the bias first-hand. True to form, the intelligentsia aligned itself against the established social order. Schumpeter’s Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy discussed this very issue at length.

First, we must remember that nobody ever made a name in academia advocating for the status quo. According to Schumpeter, to be an academic means to be a perpetual stone thrower at whatever represents “the establishment.” He sums the sentiment up by saying:

> The critical attitude, arising no less from the intellectual’s situation as an onlooker – in most cases also as an outsider – than from the fact that his main chance of asserting himself lies in his actual or potential nuisance value…

Who’s afraid of the big bad professors though? It is true that the intelligentsia is not a powerful enough group on its own to effect social change against its capitalist adversary. However, the intellectual elite can operate on a larger scale by co-opting other movements and infusing them with an anti-capitalist orientation.

> Labor never craved intellectual leadership but intellectuals invaded labor politics. They had an important contribution to make: they verbalized the movement, supplied theories and slogans for it – class war is an excellent example – made it conscious of itself and in doing so changed its meaning. In solving this task from their own standpoint, they naturally radicalized it, eventually imparting a revolutionary bias to the most bourgeois trade-union > practices.

An excellent case-in-point is Senator Elizabeth Warren. Until being elected to the Senate, the Senator was a professor at Harvard. She provides us with two anecdotal examples of the aforementioned issues. Professor Warren taught one class and received an annual salary of $350,000. How is that for investment-driven inflation? Secondly, we point to her campaign for Senate, which was drenched in anti-capitalist rhetoric.

Parts of her campaign-launch speech were taken almost directly from Marx. We encourage readers to read Chapter VII, Section 2 of Marx's Capital, Volume One. In this section Marx has a hypothetical conversation with a capitalist factory owner. Basically, the derisively delivered message is "you didn't build that." Interestingly, President Obama then drew inspiration from Warren in his "You Didn't Build That" speech.

Just as Schumpeter predicts, capitalist society has tried to buy-off the intelligentsia in an effort to bring a truce. The fatal flaw of this strategy is that the intelligentsia defines itself by its expansion of the higher education sector, which generates an ever growing class of anti-capitalist faculty who spread their message to an ever growing audience. As Schumpeter bluntly states,

> One of the most important features of the later stages of capitalist civilization is the vigorous expansion of the educational apparatus and particularly of the facilities for higher education.

A Farewell to ARNs

The topic of student lending is of particular interest to this writer, who cut his teeth on Wall Street securitizing student loans. We must admit that we have mixed feelings about our association with the student loan industry. While in securitization this writer learned a lot and had the opportunity to work with a lot of great people. No doubt, our role was a small one, but we were still involved in a cynical and exploitative process.

Government-led cartels benefiting rent-seeking vested interests are certainly not a new thing under the sun. What makes this whole process so distasteful is the relationship between the exploiters and those being exploited. We aren't talking about one group of industrialists getting one over on another group of industrialists by using political connections.

In this case, the group being exploited for rent are young people looking to improve their lot in life and the exploiters are the educational professionals entrusted to help their students. Indeed, those most vulnerable to the student debt scam tend to be low-income students who simultaneously have the greatest informational disadvantage and are least likely to rely on parents for funds.

We acknowledge the counter-argument that these students are legally adults and should be able to understand the implications of taking out so much debt. However, we remain unconvinced for a few reasons.

First and foremost is the tremendous social pressure placed on seniors graduating high school to attend college in order to fulfill what has become a middle-class right of passage. The reasoning behind going to college has devolved into, “well that’s just what you do after high school.” Second, there is a massive asymmetry of information and implicit relationship of trust between the student and the school.

Is it ethical for a school to say nothing when a student borrows an amount that can never realistically be paid back based on their preferred career path? We think not. Because the student has placed their trust in a school to help them achieve their life pursuits, the school cannot help but take on a trust-based advisory relationship. Much like a financial adviser, these institutions should be expected to put their clients’ well-being before their own. The practice of loading up students with debt while putting no thought into their post-graduation path is exploitation.

Finally, because of inflated return expectations for college degrees, every authority figure in a young person’s life is in agreement that they should borrow the money because “the interest rates are so low.” Thus, we believe students should be held less accountable for the student loan bubble than the system that is driving it.

The government and the higher education system have built a fine rent-generating machine, complete with a moral authority that makes the system difficult to attack. Like any government scheme to provide rent to a favored group, the people are the ones that pay the price.

The situation is made all the worse by the fact that the group benefiting the most from this arrangement is made up of enemies to global capitalism. In closing, in the event a downfall of global capitalism takes place, please accept in advance our apologies for our time spent as a pawn at the service of the educational-industrial complex.

Nobody’s perfect.

Read More: Title IX, The Education-Industrial Complex, And The Manufactured “War On Women”

Max Power

FDA Considers Lifting The Ban On Gay Blood Donors

July 16, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

When first clusters of AIDS cases appeared in 1981 in the US, they left the medical professionals reeling and with a feeling of helplessness. This mysterious disease ravaged the immune systems of the afflicted, turning overnight these vibrantly healthy young men into withered old husks that begged to be put out of their misery. Doctors and nurses could only watch silently, unable to offer any remedy. Without a cure or a treatment, the next best thing was damage control.

Initial countermeasures

The FDA reacted surprisingly quickly and instituted an outright ban on all gay blood donations in 1983. Men who admitted to having even one incident of gay sex were banned from giving blood for life. Ten years later, this ban was softened and replaced with several redundant layers of risk factor evaluation, such as questionnaires and prolonged deferment.

This wasn't directed at gays specifically, since donors with other questionable life habits were also either rejected or deferred indefinitely, meaning their blood was collected and stored yet never used for transfusion.

There is a solid body of proof that supports the gay blood ban. Gay men comprise only 2% of the US population but account for two thirds of all HIV-positive cases. In addition to HIV, hepatitis and syphilis occur at a much greater rate among gays. In short, the fact is that they are much more likely to have debilitating blood-borne diseases, so it makes sense to reject blood donations from them. Although tests were invented and perfected to help with the screening of blood samples, there is always a chance of error.

Let's presume that all HIV testing methods currently employed on blood donations in the US have a combined accuracy of 99.99%, meaning that 1 in 10,000 infected blood donations slips through the cracks. According to the Red Cross statistics, there are 15.7 million blood donations in the US in a year, which means 1,570 HIV-infected blood samples are given to unknowing patients.

How accurate are the tests? Nobody can tell, and that's the profound irony—the blood screening system is invisible when it works.

But now, the gay-friendly Obama administration pushed for FDA to reconsider its gay blood ban and on July 14 we will finally get to know if and in what manner blood donations from gays can be accepted. The most likely outcome is that the lifetime ban clause is replaced with a one-year ban, counting from the last incident of gay sex. Again, this "countermeasure" relies on the candor of a group known for their promiscuity and numerous illicit liasons.

Trapped under guilt

In the UK, the same ban was lifted in 2011 because it was in violation of equality legislation, even though it is possible for HIV in blood to be completely invisible to all known HIV tests for a certain length of time, which is the so-called "window period." Even when the ban was in place, the relevant UK authorities estimated that around 7% of gay men lied about their sexual history and still donated blood.

In Northern Ireland in 2013, a born-again Christian gay prostitute challenged the lifetime gay blood ban in court on the basis of prejudice, prompting the judge to order the ban lifted. The reasoning given in the verdict was that England, Wales, and Scotland have already lifted the bans themselves, so the increase in risk will be "very minimal."

Then-minister of health, Edwin Poots, was pelted with criticism because he was unable to provide his own studies and research material justifying the ban.

Creeping equality

As you might imagine, the Democrats in Congress have smelled blood and are already pushing for more equality. In a letter sent to FDA and penned Tuesday (July 14th), senators Elizabeth Warren and Tammy Baldwin demand that more steps be taken towards full equality when it comes to donating blood. The letter states:

> Neither our current blood donation policy, nor the proposed one year deferral for MSM (men who have sex with other men), allows the many healthy gay and bisexual men across America to donate blood. This serves to perpetuate the stereotype that all men who have sex with men pose a risk to the health of others

The letter also suggests that criteria for accepting blood donations from transgender persons be considered next.

No escape

In this situation, gay people are being used as ammunition by the progressive left to affect change in the medical profession and society at large, contrary to all facts and reason. It doesn't matter that the consequences are far-reaching and potentially disastrous to the public health, as long as gays gain even a smidgen of perceived "equality."

The actual victims of lifting the gay blood ban are the random people and innocent bystanders who desperately need blood transfusions: babies undergoing surgery or car accident victims. In a nutshell, this is what the push for equality is all about, it's not to uplift the gays, but to bring everyone down to their level — if gay people have HIV, hepatitis, and syphilis, so should everyone else.

Read More: 3 Fundamental Truths About The Universe You Learn From Lifting Weights

Derek Baroni

Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

7 Pictures That Show Women With Rich Men Is About More Than Gold Digging

July 17, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

After years of bellowing that women only want "respectful," "nice" partners who treat them well, and never objectify male prospects, feminists are yet to explain the plethora of young, often beautiful (or cosmetically enhanced) women shacking up with rich, famous or otherwise status-endowed men. Most of these men have worked tirelessly for their accomplishments over many years, only to be subjected to the negative judgment of society.

By contrast, you never see older or aesthetically challenged men with younger, reasonably attractive women if they're bereft of wealth or other success markers. What's more is that many of these women usually have unremarkable careers or life experiences so far. Those who are "successful" could support themselves anyway, so why the need to pair with a wealthy, famous or powerful man if it's not biologically programmed?

In the meantime, these older men, aside from George Clooney and a few others, are vilified as creeps or sexists for choosing the proverbial secretary or otherwise younger woman. Sadly, attacking female gold diggers is invariably about identifying individual women who enter into relationships for material gain.

The debate generally says nothing about the compulsive female desire for a male's "protection" (related to the next point), his resources or the allure of his famed reputation.

Gold diggers are a false focus

A constant lens on gold diggers is beneficial for feminists because it presents the veneer that women seek extensive material or social gain from relationships only in certain circumstances and non-regularly. The stereotype is, additionally, explicit and easier to hate.

This does nothing, however, to help society understand why most women, the “good” and the “bad,” still want men to pay on the first date and why rich, well-connected men, including the many males who inherit wealth, have inordinately more romantic options than men who have to work more diligently to make ends meet with fewer opportunities.

If anything, women assess a man’s value to them much more judiciously than men do a woman’s. And when they seize the man they desire, whether a middle-class doctor or a titan of industry, their choice is backward rationalized as his “great personality, “attentiveness to me” or even “charm and good looks.”

The seven women I have included below come from a range of backgrounds. Some were pre-existing celebrities, others were unknowns. Some are more overtly attention-seeking, others are quieter.

What they show collectively is that the blonde, vacuous, shiny-clothed gold digger is just one piece of the pie. Women from all walks of life crave the financially and socially powerful male, in the many forms that he may take.

Flavio Briatore and Elisabetta Gregoraci

Flavio has been a prolific businessman over the years, including his long-term stint as manager of the Renault F1 Formula One team and its predecessor, Benetton. Elisabetta is an Italian TV personality and model. Even after his disgraced exit from Renault F1, Briatore continues to maintain a diverse portfolio of investments and financial interests. But surely Elisabetta just saw his dreamy eyes, right?

Press representations of Briatore tend to exaggerate his grandpa look and play down his more dapper side (see the next picture).

Flavio Briatore and Heidi Klum

Yes, Flavio makes this esteemed list twice. He actually fathered a child with Heidi, her eldest munchkin Leni. The couple parted after some years together and this elder statesman of Italian business was left to ply his trade elsewhere and enter the sexual marketplace again.

Certainly, Flavio would have accumulated a lot of confidence given the bevy of beauties he has enjoyed, not to mention money he has accumulated. But without the wealth and status, would that confidence count for much in the eyes of 99% of women? And of all the men Heidi could choose, why did she choose a man financially above her?

Salman Rushdie and Padma Lakshmi

Now on their separate paths, the marriage between Britain's most infamous author and Ms. Lakshmi demonstrates that female lust for power, money, and status goes beyond businessmen and sportsmen. Whereas Briatore had the swagger of being a sporting team's head honcho, Salman hails from the nerdier corner of the older-man-younger-woman world.

The regularly taken scribe of The Satanic Verses has a history with younger, more aesthetically pleasing females. All credit to him, but would this bespectacled lothario ever have been on Lakshmi's radar without his literary credentials and the wealth and fame it brought him? Salman's more recent novels aren't as eye-catching as his magnum opus but the news about him is more often about him being with a younger woman, not his still lauded career.

Jason and Amanda Dufner

[image]

The age gap between the recently divorced Dufners is a paltry decade or so, practically making them twins in the money-power-status playbook. Amanda used her marriage to the successful golfer to catapult her social media career, which basically consists of her posing on Instagram at locations and with items paid for by Jason.

In addition to the presumably millions he spent on her during their time together, she received a divorce settlement worth more than the vast majority of people earn in their lifetimes. All without working a single day! Jason is seen as the awkward, primitive, and inelegant ex-husband as Amanda is celebrated as a vivacious, seemingly "charming" belle.

Hugh Hefner and Holly Madison

Madison spent years feigning devotion towards and smitten-like bliss with Hefner. After they split, during which time she was one of usually three girlfriends, she has persistently parlayed a career out of attacking the life she “suffered” with Hugh.

So why didn’t she leave after a week? Her recent book has complained about the uncleanliness of the Playboy Mansion and other First World criticisms, all of which reek of Relevance Deprivation Syndrome (RDS). Hugh continues to be maligned as the controlling, unresponsive ex-boyfriend of the poor, deprived Holly.

Geoffrey Edelsten and Brynne Gordon

Although the (literal) bovine Dairy Queen of this lineup, Gordon must've seemed like the modern-day reincarnation of a beautiful Virgin Mary for ex-sports team owner Edelsten. Lavished with gifts and all manner of financial indulgences, which were retrospectively reinterpreted as his "attentiveness" to her, Brynne packed her bags (but still lived in his palatial penthouse) just after Edelsten was declared bankrupt in the US. What a coincidence!

This American gal has resorted to employing the fearsome underworld debt collector Mick Gatto to retrieve her "well-earned" $10 million divorce settlement. Gordon is widely loathed, like Edelsten, but has enough fans to be making big money as a "socialite." What did Edelsten gain, though?

Geoffrey Edelsten and Gabi Grecko

Lacking the long-term international profile of Briatore, Edelsten is nonetheless a repeat achiever, too. Grecko is generally sane or prudish once every full moon, when she's not rocking up to funerals with her tits out, or walking naked down a busy Melbourne street for ten minutes (that's not a joke).

Sensing the opportunity for more social media money and brain-dead followers, she was happily taking photos featuring her cleavage after an alleged miscarriage of her and maybe Geoffrey's unborn child. Classy girl. Again, Geoffrey is pilloried, getting only a modicum of the attention and none of the money Grecko is making from the relationship.

Always be wary but accept the rules of the game

Realizing the undying allure of power, money and status for women (and the corresponding SJW disdain of men's desire for fertile females) is the most cogent red pill lesson you will ever learn. In most ways, any other red pill teaching is merely a corollary of this Super Law of Nature. Heed it well.

Like the surfer Kelly Slater, it's a wave you can ride to great heights. But it's also the cause of many a man's painful downfall. Always be careful of those sharp rocks beneath the shallow waters, boys.

Read More: Top 10 Pictures From The Growing "Women Against Feminism" Movement

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

One Man Can Change The World

July 17, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

Athanasius of Alexandria (296-98? – 373) is held in esteem by all Christian churches. His stout defense of the dogma of the Holy Trinity earned him the title of "The Father of Orthodoxy." To this day, the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches venerate him as a saint.

Athanasius's career took place in a time when most of the Christian world was consumed by heresy, with many bishops and priests teaching rank error. The Roman government sided with the heretics and Athanasius was surrounded by a world that despised and persecuted him for holding to the truth.

For that reason, his life and character offer lessons for the 21st century man who is similarly immersed in heresy, whether he counts himself a believing Christian or not.

The Man

Little is known of Athanasius's early life. Historians speculate that he was born in to a noble family that could afford him the education he displayed in his eloquent letters. Tradition holds that Bishop Alexander of Alexandria noticed that the boy Athanasius and his friends were play-acting as priests celebrating the sacraments.

Alexander declared that the baptisms they administered were in fact valid and encouraged them to pursue priestly vocations. Athanasius proved an apt pupil, writing the great treatises On The Incarnation and Against The Gentiles at age 20. After being ordained a deacon, Athanasius became a secretary and adviser to the bishop, accompanying him to the first ecumenical council in Christian history at Nicaea in 325. It was there Athanasius began the great struggle of his life.

The Heretic

The priest Arius (250-256? – 336) was of Libyan and possibly Berber origin. Reconstructing his life and teachings is difficult as all of his original writings were suppressed and they only survive in quotations by hostile orthodox critics. Essentially, Arius taught that Jesus Christ was only figuratively the Son of God.

According to Arianism, Christ was the greatest of God's creations but there was a time when he did not exist and only God the Father existed. The First Council of Nicaea was called by the Emperor Constantine to resolve the disputes between the Arians and the orthodox position, which were shaking the entire Christian Church, then the official religion of the Roman Empire.

The council coined the term homoousios as a way to explain that Jesus Christ is God the Son and of one substance with God the Father, the watchword of orthodoxy ever since.

Although Arianism was formally condemned, the struggle was not over.

Heretics Always Lie

The more things change…

After his patron Alexander died, Athanasius was named his successor as Bishop of Alexandria by popular acclaim, a position he would hold for the next 47 years. He learned that the strength of Arianism was not in its philosophical or theological reasoning, but in its political influence.

Athanasius was banished into exile on five occasions by four different Roman emperors. The Arians worked mightily to manufacture charges against Athanasius to publicly shame him, which should sound familiar to veterans of the manosphere. At the council of Tyre in 335, Arian bishops bribed a harlot to accuse Athanasius of immorality. One quick thinking priest stood up and said, “Do you really mean to accuse me of this?” She replied, “Of course,” proving that she had no idea what Athanasius actually looked like.

The bishop was accused of murdering and amputating the hand of Bishop Arsenius of Hypsele for use in black magic rituals. Athanasius calmly introduced the bishop to the council, alive and intact, sardonically commenting, “You see, he has two hands. Where is the third which I cut off? God has created men with two hands only.”

Rome’s Most Wanted

The tl;dr version of orthodox theology

Athanasius spent 17 years of his bishopric in exile, evading the authorities and continuing to preach the orthodox position in defiance of their heresy. The secular modern reader may dismiss these disputes as mere theological hair splitting, but to the Christians of the time these issues were of paramount importance, which would determine doctrines of salvation.

Bishop contended against bishop, and orthodox lay people were frequently evicted from their own churches. Christian readers in the 21st century can surely sympathize as we often contend with Churchianity, the faith infected with feminism. Athanasius wrote to his people:

> May God console you! … What saddens you … is the fact that others have occupied the churches by violence, while during this time you are on the outside. It is a fact that they have the premises – but you have the Apostolic Faith. They can occupy our churches, but they are outside the true Faith. You remain outside the places of worship, but the Faith dwells within you. Let us consider: what is more important, the place or the Faith? The true Faith, obviously. Who has lost and who has won in the struggle – the one who keeps the premises or the one who keeps the Faith? True, the premises are good when the Apostolic Faith is preached there; they are holy if everything takes place there in a holy way …

The Lessons

During his life, the bishop was nicknamed "Athanasius Contra Mundum:" Athanasius against the world. In a splendid way, he demonstrated the virtues of courage and fortitude. He challenged the reigning heresy of his day, enduring unpopularity among society's elite, unjust exiles from his position as bishop, slanders and libels against his character, and threats against his life from the government.

Rather than indulge in self-pity, Athanasius spent his time in exile continuing to preach and write treatises in defense of the truth. The common people of his diocese loved him until the end for his holiness and commitment to teaching true doctrine. Cardinal John Henry Newman wrote that Athanasius, after the Apostles, was the most responsible for ensuring the orthodox Christian faith was passed down to subsequent generations.

He was willing to pay the price for holding to the truth. All men should similarly be willing to go to the wall in defense of the truth, no matter if the whole world stands against him.

Read More: The One Change Facebook Can Make To Create A Better World

Andrew Levinson

Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

5 Reasons Why Women In Army Ranger School Is Worse Than You Think

July 18, 2015 | by Justin Puck | Link | Original Link

There is an old joke in the US Army: How many Rangers does it take to screw in a light bulb? Three—one to screw it in, and two more to stand around and brag about how much harder it was back when they had to do it.

Any US Army private who ever spent a day in the infantry heard that joke at least once, and it rings true. Rangers seem to love bragging about how difficult it was to earn their tab and, of course, how easy the course gets with each succeeding year. Most of the lamenting by the old timers had little merit, but every once in a while there were changes to the course which made it slightly easier for the younger guys.

But only just slightly. The course got a bit shorter, the students got a little more food and a little more sleep, and they got rid of Desert Phase years ago.

Rangers Lead The Way

Usually, the difficulty level did not decrease appreciably – Ranger school was always a brutal course, with only a 50% pass rate and 60% of the failures occurring during the first few days, called RAP week (Ranger Assessment Program). The fact that three women of any constitution passed RAP week is evidence the standards have dropped severely or been eliminated altogether.

The level of difficulty of Ranger school cannot be overstated. Students can expect to lose at least 15 pounds—most of it muscle—by the time they finish. Constant patrolling with a 60+ pound ruck sack, less than an hour of sleep a night during some portions, and barely anything to eat take tolls on men that no woman could realistically endure.

The sweat carries a strong reek of ammonia while the muscle burns away, as students struggle to stay awake and alert, especially when their turn for patrol leadership arises.

Failing a patrol more than once almost always means the student will not graduate.

It is not some meaningless macho shit test over a mere cloth tab. Ranger school develops effective combat leaders and any man who's ever served in an infantry unit can tell you the difference between a Ranger qualified officer and those who are not. Often times, a non-Ranger qualified infantry officer is a shitbag waiting to be exported to some easier assignment, as his career as an infantry line officer is less likely to move past Lieutenant Colonel if he failed Ranger school.

Of course, the SJWs have flipped this around to see Ranger school as a chance for a golden ticket long denied them out of sexism. Therefore, they must have it—along with being able to serve as infantry officers too, naturally. As it happens, the three females who "passed" RAP happen to be not just officers, but West Point Graduates. Small coincidence. Well, why is this such a big deal?

1. It is only the beginning

Breaking barriers is what it's all about, right?

It has been decided that there WILL be females wearing the Ranger tab, one way or another. Under pressure from the administration, the Army Chief of Staff is pushing for this, nobody in any position of expertise was consulted and unsolicited negative opinions will be met with letters of reprimand or worse.

But this will not be a limited experiment confined to something confined to a small corner of the combat arms. Once the mandated pass rates for women in Ranger school are fully in effect, doors to commanding Infantry units will swing wide open. Special Operations units will be next, beginning with the Ranger Regiment, where EVERY leader (officers down to junior NCOs) is expected to be Ranger qualified.

From there, it's only a hop, skip and a jump before they are force-fed into other areas of Special Operations. Soon enough, women will very likely be wearing Green Berets, Special Forces tabs, and Navy SEAL Tridents within the next five years. So what's the big deal, you ask?

2. Unlike those of other nations, the US military actually matters.

Nothing light about it.

One of the loudest arguments made for allowing homosexuals to serve openly in the military was that since so many other military forces allowed it, why doesn't the US military allow homosexuals too? Even ignoring the silent failure of that experiment, allowing women into schools and units out of a demented sense of social justice isn't just blue pill nonsense, it's further erosion of national security.

The European military forces can have all the ludicrous policies they want, but the fact is America has been carrying their water since the end of World War 2. What happens when we jump into the same hammock as them can only be described as the inevitable breakdown of relative peace we enjoy in a first world cocoon.

Don't like the idea of the US as world policemen? Neither do I, really – but can you think of anyone else you'd rather have in that role? Neither can I.

3. This is not limited to the military

No, he's not allowed to help you over the obstacle.

American society is already used to the idea of female cops and firemen, but again this is another quiet disaster. Most female firemen don't actually fight any fires once hired, and female cops are so much physically weaker than their male counterparts they are far more likely to use their guns in situations where male cops would be able to use non violent (read: grappling and submission) tactics.

We live in such an entertainment-first world we've first sacrificed the very elements designed to protect us (fire, police and military) while preserving those designed to entertain us (NFL, NBA, MLB, et. al.) But how far off can it be before the mandates reach the entertainment enterprises, where a certain number of females are required for every football team?

We can already see the pre-conditioning of children with the foolish idea of girl quarterbacks in a new Nickelodeon program. Lest we forget, this is how gay acceptance got promoted, and how leftism has always worked.

4. Nobody actually wanted it, but it happened anyway

Nevermind the conspicuous absence of any consultation of actual Rangers, Ranger Instructors, Ranger veterans or anyone else qualified to weigh on the decision, there wasn't even a demand for this change from most women, military or civilian alike.

Take a look at what most women actually pay attention to – Pinterest, Tinder, XOJane, etc. Not too much discussion there of how to get into Ranger school. One would think there's a massive push not seen since the suffragette movement to get women graduates, but there were barely a dozen female volunteers.

This is manifestation of a classic Mao-inspired political principal: make the ideals of the party appear to be the ideals of the people. As long as a few lesbians and tough-mudder types want to do it, we'll make sure they pass while the rest of the female population goes back to Tumblr.

5. Veterans and current servicemen are buying into it

The intoxicating power of wanting to be liked, the desire for approval and inclusion combined with the influence of ubiquitous social media and smartphone culture causes even the most unlikely converts to come out of their political closet. Long time conservatives lamely start parroting liberal ideas, with military matters being no exception.

The public thinks it's a good idea, so some Ranger veterans will say anything for a chance at approval (or pussy), and so it begins. Current servicemen are more likely than ever to white knight for a chance of rancid, well-worn Army snatch from some 4 on their next deployment.

Giving social justice warriors what they want at every turn created creatures with the power of an adult but the responsibility level of a child. While this trend is traceable alongside the modernization of society, never before have the changes been so radical, nor come so quickly.

Decades after the draft ended and far from any war where most of the men did most of the fighting, the martial spirit of the country is already flaccid and weak. Throw in the effects of SJW-led social media and the radical changes will occur that much faster. What's happening at the 4th Ranger Training Brigade at Ft. Benning is the canary in the cultural coal mine—but unlike a sensible coal miner, our leaders will fail to recognize the obvious warning.

Read More: 20 Signs That We're Not Living In A Patriarchy

Justin Puck
Slickyboy is a lawyer but hates to admit it, a veteran who can't stand yellow ribbon stickers, and a well traveled hack with a reasonably accurate bullshit detector. You can follow his random musings on Twitter.

Charles Bukowski: Literature And Poetry For Men

July 18, 2015 | by Will Potter | Link | Original Link

> Women are far more dangerous than men. Men want to get away, women want a thing called vengeance. – Charles Bukowski

Henry Charles Bukowski, was a poet, a literary giant, and an unrepentant alcoholic. Now perhaps you're thinking "A poet? Why the hell do I need to know about a pansy-ass poet?" Bukowski would've wholeheartedly agreed. Bukowski hated the poets. He did not want to be lumped in with them—the pansy poets.

In a letter he wrote that "I am not primarily a poet, I hate god gooey people poets messing the smears of their lives against the sniveling world…" The academics, the poetry snobs, returned Bukowski's disgust. They reviled him. They complained that by making poetry accessible, raw, gritty, dirty, and readable he was destroying the art form.

Bukowski's answer was simple, it came in the form of a poem called Art. It goes something like those with no spirit, resort to form. Look it up. According to Bukowski, for writing to be something other than foolishness or pretense the words had to cut into the paper like painting–writing should be like painting, and raw so that when you turn the page your hand should come away bloody.

That was Bukowski's motto as he churned out hundreds of poems, six novels, a screenplay, and several collections of short stories and essays.

> The ladies would rather go to bed with a poet than anything, even a German police dog… – Charles Bukowski

While in high school Bukowski was afflicted with a severe case of acne vulgaris. The treatment of the condition at the time, drilling into the huge blisters on his face to drain the pus, left him with severe scarring. He'd leave the hospital with his face wrapped in bandages like the Invisible Man, scaring the women and children on L.A.'s streets and public transportation.

The scarring and his alcoholism gave him a beyond rugged appearance. He was downright ugly, so much so that a woman at a poetry reading remarked, "You're so ugly, you're beautiful." The appearance of his ragged face did not matter to Bukowski—instead, he relished it, much like a Heidelberg scar.

As Bukowski's reputation as a poet grew, despite his ugliness, he had the opportunity to be with many women. His novel Women is about his experiences with several of them. Like all of his writing it is highly readable, unpretentious, funny, and honest.

> The FEMALE. There is no way. Don't wait for the good woman. She doesn't exist…the male, for all his bravado and exploration, is the loyal one, the one who generally feels love. -Charles Bukowski

While Bukowski's writing is in general about existential alienation (Sartre was an admirer) and the absurdity of humanity, a recurring theme in his work is the relationship between man and woman. His story 6 Inches (you'll never guess the twist) is a perfect allegory to the man-hating feminist movement.

The feminists of his day screamed misogyny, but Bukowski was an equal opportunity offender—the feminists, being utterly self-absorbed, self-pitying, and self-aggrandizing, missed the point, he was a self-proclaimed misanthropist. He criticized humanity as a whole and that included women.

"The great wash of humanity doesn't interest me but it sure as hell ingests me in its horror show. I fight back with little tricks: the typewriter, the bottle, hiding out, ignoring the consensus," he wrote. In Bukowski's mind women were open to ridicule as much as men and humanity as a whole, and he when he got behind a typewriter or got drunk, often both at the same time, he did not hold back his contempt. I n a correspondence he wrote, “I really do not get enough good ass and I never will because if a woman’s soul is sack of shit I will not fail to tell them so…”

> You want real hell? Try living with a so-called beautiful woman. It’s a mirage that turns into a total nightmare. If you have to have a woman, look for kindness. A sense of overall reality. – Charles Bukowski

Bukowski’s outward reputation was that of a brawling drunkard, and hard-ass, but much of that was a persona he cultivated through poetry readings, he was actually very sensitive and capable of deep love. His first love was Jane Cooney Baker, a woman ten years his senior, who died of alcoholism long before Bukowski passed away due to leukemia.

His poem For Jane: With All the Love I Had, Which Was Not Enough is as powerful a declaration of a man’s love for a woman as there is in all of poetry. Bukowski got married twice. First to a wealthy publisher’s daughter (who he married sight unseen before he was a famous poet) and finally to a woman he met at one of his poetry readings after he had completed his “research” of sleeping around for his novel Women.

On his first marriage, which ended in divorce a little over two years in, he wrote to a female friend, “I thought if I can make one person happy in this world then my life has not been wasted.” Of course, marriage doesn’t work that way. His writing was the manner in which he would bring pleasure to thousands of people, though in his own words he never wrote for other people but to save his ass from the grip of madness and suicide. Nevertheless, this sentiment shows the sensitivity and romanticism in his thinking that would express itself in his poetry.

> Don’t try – Charles Bukowski

Thanks to Bukowski men can read poetry and literature that isn’t soft, slick, false, and crafted to read a certain way. Bukowski’s idol Hemingway was the precursor to the raw, scintillating, moving, humorous brand of men’s literature that Bukowski has left us.

No one wrote like Bukowski before Bukowski and no one has written as well since.

Read More: Society Is Oblivious To The Warnings Of Literature

Will Potter

Will enjoys reading Bukowski, oil painting, playing guitar, and, as much as possible, avoiding the human horror show. You may find him playing at an open mic night though, not for approbation, but to save his own ass from madness.

A New Kind Of Propaganda For The Culture War

July 19, 2015 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

From Russia, with love:

This has gone viral recently, and its easy to see why. It is refreshingly novel.

If it is propaganda, then it is a new kind of propaganda. One that appeals to a different set of emotional cues.

Here's the original opener. Pay attention: "Yes I am an occupant. And I am tired of apologizing for it. I am an occupant by birthright, an aggressor and a bloodthirsty monster. Be afraid."

Its a powerful template. And one that we can use. Just replace "occupant" with the most derided, ridiculed and marginalized identity group in contemporary Western civilization.

Down with apologia. Enough simpering and hand-cringing. Repeat after me. "Yes, I am straight, white male. And I am tired of apologizing for it. I am a straight, white male by birthright, an aggressor and a bloodthirsty monster. Be afraid."

If civilizations could be ranked on their alpha and beta qualities, Russia would take the gold medal this week, and as far as I'm concerned, the past two ears years as well. France comes in close second this week, with a video by Elektre (a young french women with Generation Identitaire sympathies), showing us what AgitProp looks like in action with her Lutheresque nailing of proudly xenophobic propaganda to the granite door of the local Cathedral-sponsored public service message.

She does it all while being cussed out by an African migrant who appears to be on a date with a native French women. Not only did this woman modify some state-sponsored public art à la Billboard Liberation Front, but she also succeeded in rustling an ambassador of multiculturalism and most likely ruining his date. Truly, a cock block that would make Le Pen proud, and the cherry on top of this twofer.

France loses points however, because some former porn actress mademoiselle with a pixie cut had to step up where French men were lacking.

Also, the background to the video, namely the story of a communist mayor commissioning the mural with the words, “French women for African men” emblazoned on it also leaves one with a strong desire to projectile vomit all over the nearest tricolor one can get one’s hands on. Still, BUGs makes a cameo appearance. Look closely and you can make out the words, “anti-racism is code for anti-white” on the mural. Nice touch. Keep up the good work, BUGs.

This leaves us with the question, what about us? Yes, us, here in the United States. What have we done this week, collectively as a nation, to establish our Alpha credentials on the world arena?

The Father’s Day message from Angel Soft comes to mind.

You know, the one with the flaming fairy in a purple cardigan telling us about how to properly break every finger in your hand when throwing a punch (thanks, mom!) and the infuriatingly obvious mulicult token minority babbling in Mexican about her wonderful single mother.

Then there was the former Olympian Gold Medal winner who squeezed himself into a white one-piece for Vanity Fair. Check out this ~~happy merchant~~ famous photographer, Annie Leibowitz, eagerly facilitating this assault on Western masculinity with unabashed, hand-rubbing glee.

I keep wondering when our “Generation Identitaire” movement will start. When will American men start organizing en masse to take back what remains of the society? I see hopeful glimmers, couched in the idea of Neomasculinity, but from all indications, America is lagging behind. Europe is already experiencing the birth of a new right, and it is growing among the youth, underground and unseen until it flashes out, gloriously and unexpectedly, in the form of viral Youtube videos.

I believe it can start with us. With the red pill community.

Start somewhere. If you can, create original content that inspires and informs. Remember that we are in an information war, a propaganda war for the soul of European civilization. The good people of /pol/ and other online communities have been working tirelessly to weaponize memes (heh) and put them at your disposal. Use them. Spread the word. Do your part and start red pilling as best you can.

Take care of your anonymity as well, its the only thing keeping you safe from the next witch hunt by the SJW samizdat.

The next time you see something on your local college campus promoting cultural marxism, do something about it too. See a feminist poster advertising dating advice for men with something along the lines of, “Men, always remember to ask for consent, otherwise it’s rape?” Strike a blow for true social justice and feel your testicles swell with pride as you scrawl “Alpha Fux, Beta Bux” right across it.

How about a “Communism Kills” in red spray paint over the next, “Down with the Patriarchy” banner you see?

AgitProp Done The Right Way

I’ll be the first to say it—start getting the message out by trolling the way to salvation. Use the enemy’s tactics against them.

Read More: Ever Wonder What Kind Of Man Becomes A Russian Alpha?

Vincent Law

Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

4 Reasons Why You Should Never Accept An Unpaid Internship

July 19, 2015 | by David Mousseau | Link | Original Link

Last summer I worked at a major non-profit in Washington, D.C. with a host of other interns. From the interview date I made it clear I would work no more than two days a week because the position was unpaid, and I had to support myself with other jobs for its duration. In contrast, the other interns worked 40-hour weeks for the entire summer for not a single dime, and paid for transportation to the costly metropolitan area out of pocket.

By the end of the experience we all were able to bolster our resumes, but I was a few thousand dollars richer thanks to my other jobs, whilst another intern had taken out a loan to help cover the price of gaining “work experience.” Unsurprisingly, the organization did not offer permanent positions to any of the summer interns despite their positive evaluations, but rather chose to hire from outside to fill a position which was ostensibly responsible for the same work of the internees.

Despite my coming out relatively better off, the internship served as a crowning piece to a series of experiences with unpaid work that proved it is a highly wasteful endeavor for modern men.

1. It’s A Corrupt New Fad

As some of the older ROK readers may attest, unpaid internships are a relatively new commodity in the job market. In the pre-mass globalization era of the 1970s, most companies offered 6-12 month, paid trainee programs which allowed new graduates to gain experience in a field on a probationary basis in order to prove themselves capable of working for a firm. Successful performance meant gaining a permanent position after the trial period concluded.

Not so today. Following decades of outsourcing and clamors about "the good of the economy" by Democrats and Republicans, matriculating students are expected to take on volunteer internships in order to gain experience in a field that their college courses did not provide.

Since the term "volunteer" implies that the person can elect to labor only a certain number of hours each week, corporations needed a different word to describe their charity worker programs. Thus God gave them the intern, a glorified jack-of-all-trades prepared to polish the Brooks Brothers heels of their supervisor in hopes of attaining a positive letter of recommendation after several months of work.

The result is an economy where anyone without demonstrable expertise or education in a STEM field is left to wallow in full-time, unpaid positions for the lofty promise that a regular job may someday become available.

2. You Should Know Your Worth—And It’s Probably Higher Than $0

As a simple matter of human dignity, any man with a head on his shoulders and reasonable education should demand compensation unless the position he is applying to is designated as “volunteer,” in which case the requirement of an application is somewhat ludicrous.

The mistake many interns make is assuming they are not valuable enough to be granted a regular hourly wage for the internship duties. Companies will exploit this insecurity by making it appear like there is no option but to accept zero pay just to break into a particular industry.

This is nonsense. If Target will pay you to stand at a checkout line for eight hours a day processing expired coupons and encouraging customers to sign up for their data-stealing credit card, then another large company or government organization should be no different. Cold calling random numbers to muster support for a political cause or updating office directories for hours on end is not so much simpler than saying “Did you find everything alright?”

Keep in mind that the hours you spend grasping for work experience without pay could be better used working out, reading, or banging cheerleaders.

3. There Is Always Money Somewhere

Regardless of the interviewer's protests, the vast majority of companies and organizations have the funds to pay their interns; they just choose not to. For this reason it is imperative that anyone going into an interview be prepared with ammunition in case the "We are a small organization with limited resources" tripe comes out.

First off, any group that claims to not have enough money is unlikely to provide a very beneficial experience to the prospective internee. Limited funds mean limited opportunities to develop a specialization of skills that are marketable to future employers, since they will definitely not be hiring the intern down the road. Also, basic administrative support training is not looked upon positively by most hiring managers, as the entire AS field is dominated by women with a very low ceiling for advancement.

Additionally, it is important to query a money-shy interviewer about what specific role the intern plays in the functionality of the organization. A good rule of thumb is to ask: "If there were no interns available, would the company be able to run properly without paying someone for this work?"

Another option is to use an organization's mission against them. Applicants to a leftist think tank that studies income inequality can point out the hypocrisy of not paying interns, while a conservative political candidate's "We want jobs, not welfare checks" message should mean they provide interns with some form of remuneration.

4. Permanent Positions Are Not Necessarily Waiting

Internships are typically encouraged as part of a way to “get in the door” with a particular company in order to attain full-time employment, but this is not always possible. If the nature of the work primarily concerns entry-level office management duties, it is much easier for the firm to continue to utilize unpaid interns rather than create a new position entirely.

In the event that a full-time position is available in which the intern will perform many of the same tasks as they did in the internship, there is no excuse for the company not to pay for the first three to five months of the individual’s employment. Refusal to compensate the person for the initial several months is just a way for a corporation to save money while benefiting from free labor.

Conclusion

It should be clear that there can be real benefits to completing an internship program. The exposure to a professional environment, opportunities to develop a portfolio of accomplishments, and networking assistance can be exceedingly valuable in the long-run. Jobs do exist at the end of the tunnel in some cases as well, so there is reason to go after such programs.

That said, it is important to avoid opportunities which require you to pay for work experience; this is merely a tool used by the political and economic elites to ensure that the largest swath of individuals gaining professional experience and consequently controlling the future society are wealthy, nonthreatening college kids.

Read More: How To Get Paid What You’re Worth

David Mousseau
David Mousseau is a Franco-Texan who lived the first nine months of his life as a man inside a woman's body. Now happily post-transition, he defends the patriarchy by writing at libertyphalanx.com and tweeting @davidmousseau65

Gawker Melts Down After Attempting To Out Condé Nast CFO David Geithner

July 20, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Coming off a string of bloody noses in the past year, notorious left-wing gossip rag Gawker may have burned its last witch. Last Thursday, the site came under fire after posting an expose of Condé Nast CFO David Geithner (brother of former Treasury Secretary Timothy Geithner) and his purported attempt to hire a gay escort. Gawker pulled the article after an explosion of online rage at the site's attempt to blackmail Geithner:

> Why Geithner bailed on Ryan while on the runway in New York is open for speculation. It's possible that his plane was indeed delayed. Or, of course, he could have gotten spooked by an escort with an agenda who had discovered exactly who he was. After all, Geithner had booked Ryan until midnight or 1 a.m.—one figures it would require an excruciating delay to get in that late. Plus, his escort, booked at a four-star hotel, probably wouldn't have minded waiting around.

While Gawker has been the subject of rage and boycotts before—GamerGate's crusading against the site cost Gawker Media millions of dollars in lost ad revenue, and the site's rich boy staffer Sam Biddle was put out to pasture after being lambasted for supporting bullying—the anger unleashed by the Geithner article is the worst yet. Gawker has managed to alienate the one demographic that was backing them to the hilt: social justice warriors.

With everyone from the Washington Post to Breitbart tearing into Gawker Media and a lawsuit from Hulk Hogan threatening to bankrupt them, it looks like the jig is up. Nick Denton's empire of evil is unlikely to last another five years. While Gawker's brand of cultural Marxist witch-hunting once made them a force to be feared, Denton and his lackeys are now running in fear from the online lynch mobs they built their careers out of stirring up.

Yellow Journalism For The Internet Age

Gawker's Nick Denton has amassed a fortune standing atop the burning corpses of the unwitting souls his blog empire has targeted. Gawker and its sister sites, such as Jezebel and Valleywag, rose to prominence through witch-hunts: singling out public and private figures alike for "racist," "sexist" or "homophobic" comments, then siccing Twitter lynch mobs on them to get them fired from their jobs. Pax Dickinson, Justine Tunney, Justine Sacco: the list of souls that Gawker has ruined could fill a phone book.

The secret to Gawker Media's success? Denton modeled Gawker and its satellite sites on British tabloids such as the Daily Mail. In contrast to American tabloids, which are about glad-handing and ass-kissing, British tabloids specialize in nasty, cruel attacks on public figures, whipping up a new Two Minutes Hate with each issue. Combining this business model with expert social media manipulation and SJW ideology made Gawker a force to be reckoned with in the digital age.

Unfortunately, much like McCarthyism and other witch-hunting hysterias of the past, Gawker's brand of moral indignation has a shelf life. As Breitbart's Milo Yiannopoulos reported several months ago, GamerGate-led boycotts of Gawker's advertisers hit the site's advertising revenue hard. An internal reorganization following said boycotts lead to the ouster of editorial director Joel Johnson, and as our sister site Reaxxion reported last month, Denton is seeking to eliminate the site's need for writers altogether:

> But why would Gawker writers want to unionize? Because Denton is looking to get rid of them. Johnson says Denton has spent millions of dollars over the last several years on a new kind of microblogging platform called Kinja. According to Johnson, Kinja's motto is that "commenters are just as important as writers." Under the Kinja model, commenters and microbloggers will provide the majority of the site's value, with writers functioning mostly as "cocktail party hosts," introducing topics for discussion and making sure the guests don't get too unruly.

Furthermore, Gawker's increasing feeling of invulnerability from crushing minor targets as Pax Dickinson has led them to pick fights with people who can actually hurt them. For example, Gawker's publication of Hulk Hogan's sex tape lead to a lawsuit which they stand a good chance of losing, further taxing their nearly-empty coffers and encouraging other public figures they've wronged to follow suit.

At every turn, Denton and company have made precisely the wrong moves, continuing to dig themselves in even deeper.

A Dangerous Precedent

Furthermore, Denton's decision to pull the David Geithner story will further hurt the site by jeopardizing its writers' editorial independence. One of Gawker's strengths has been the relative freedom it affords its staffers when it comes to stirring up attention and getting clicks; indeed, the site pays its writers in part according to the popularity of their articles. By yanking the article, Gawker is showing that it will change its content according to the whims of angry mobs: several of the site's staffers are openly revolting against Denton’s decision.

While the anger over the David Geithner article will subside, this incident is yet another nail in Gawker Media’s coffin. With even their left-wing demographic raging against them now, the number of people receptive to their brand of faux-moral snark is vanishing quickly. While it’s unlikely that the age of SJW-driven social media shaming will come to an end soon, it’s nice to see one of its biggest proponents slitting its own throat.

Read More: Reddit Melts Down Due To Incompetent Feminist CEO Ellen Pao

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Theory Of Evolution Does Not Apply To Modern Human Beings

July 20, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I know your blood is already boiling from reading the headline above and that your intellectual self-defense mechanisms have been activated to refute all ideas you are about to encounter henceforth, but make yourself a cup of tea, relax, and consider the following viewpoint that has been concealed from you during your entire life.

Since high school I have believed in the theory of evolution, a logical and elegant solution over religious explanations in describing how life originated and evolved on earth. For the next 15 years, including four years studying microbiology in university, I never once doubted the theory, and have even infused the "survive and reproduce" paradigm into the theories and ideas I have shared on my blog and in my books. This paradigm is also a domineering belief in the "red pill" platform.

In the past year a thought entered my brain that I had trouble addressing: why have I yet to reproduce? I'm nearly 36 years old, with ample resources, intellect, health, biological "strength", and access to females, but I have not yet produced a child. It's not that I'm ejaculating inside women but failing to impregnate them, but I'm consciously and deliberately halting insemination for reasons that Darwin and his followers have not addressed, such as bad marriage laws and wanting to be free without obligations.

I've had more fertile sexual partners than some kings and nobles of old, but have not reproduced once, meaning that game, in the way I have practiced and taught it, has gone squarely against evolution. In other words, remaining a virgin to this day as opposed to embarking on a multi-year world sex tour with triple-digit partners would not at all have changed the childless result I face in this very moment.

Anti-evolutionary behaviors should have been weeded out of the gene pool according to the idea of natural selection, but the more I looked around, the more I saw nothing but my own behavior, of people who were actually frightened to death about being a parent even though they were healthy and could afford to raise children. In fact, the sum of Western ideologies seem aimed to specifically halt human reproduction.

Western people are structuring their lives in deliberate ways to not reproduce at all and where their cherished hedonistic lifestyles would be greatly harmed if children entered the picture, and while it's easy to use evolutionary theory in describing which man a woman chooses to have sex with, how can that possibly be correct if the man used condoms or the woman used birth control? Darwin's theory refers to reproduction, not recreational sex and definitely not a prolonged period of sterile sport fucking, which has no benefit to the genes of the "athlete." Having an explanation for why a girl on birth control went home with the "alpha male" after meeting him in the club has nothing to do with evolution or natural selection, since they both knew that no child would result and used the full force of their consciousness to prevent the creation of life. If reproduction was the purposefully blocked intent, evolution was not present during the sex event.

How could Darwin explain the prevention of reproduction by deliberate and conscious choice from fit humans beings? How could he explain that the richest peoples of the world with no lack in resources, intellect, and functioning reproductive systems were consciously going against what evolution prescribed for them?

The one aspect of evolution, specifically, that does not hold true for modern humans, especially those living in the West, is that fit humans are reproducing up to the limit of the food supply, as stated by Darwin. In fact, the more resources a person has, the less likely they will reproduce at all, which you can witness at any time in a drive through the poor and rich parts of your city. Darwin's theory doesn't explain why this occurs, why the "strongest" and most "fit" are having the least amount of offspring or deliberately choosing not to have any offspring at all, even though natural selection specifically states that only the strongest can pass on their genes while the weak and infirm will not.

Most animals, plants, and bacteria do reproduce up to the limit of the food supply, or at least try to maximally have as many offspring as possible, but human beings have developed a consciousness that enables them to purposefully not reproduce even if they are able, and even develop a phobia to reproduction, and this has been in effect for at least 100 years in all major Western nations that currently suffer a death rate greater than the reproductive rate.

We must therefore conclude, with logic and rationale, that evolution is so flawed at explaining modern human reproductive behavior (and not merely casual sex where reproduction was never the intent), that evolution is not an observable or correct principle for human beings living in Westernized nations. We must discard evolutionary theory as applying to all humans through the mechanism of natural selection and begin a search for a new explanation that explains our current biological behavior.

Evolution may have been the correct theory for a window of human existence, but that window has now closed and theories for post-evolutionary man, one in which there is no struggle for survival and where the strongest of the species are not reproducing, must be devised.

Even if we were to concede that we got here through the process of evolution from a primordial soup, and that our brains are the result of it, these brains are now in a modern environment which has tripwired, hijacked, or corrupted any applicable evolutionary program. We have become one with the plugged-in cosmopolitan borg, and that regardless of the process that caused us to come about, that process is no longer in effect and a new process, yet to be described or understood, is manifesting itself throughout humanity and shattering Darwin's "survive and reproduce" model.

It's unlikely that, after reading what I have stated so far, a Darwinist would seriously doubt his faith in evolution. His mind is already racing for the rationalizations that allow evolution to remain true for him, and it's this race that allows evolution to frame all biological explanations through Darwin's brain. People are so invested in a theory that tells them what the end point is (i.e. everything we do is to survive and reproduce), that many hardcore atheists are no different from religious fundamentalists in the mental gymnastics they take every day to keep their faith alive.

A book that pokes numerous holes to the evolutionary boat is Darwinian Fairytales by Australian philosopher David Stove. While not a scientist by trade, Stove provides over a dozen non-religious arguments against evolution that were not presented to us during our scientific education in school. After reading through this book carefully, I have determined that evolutionary theory is no longer useful in describing the modern day behavior of human beings. Based on my scientific background, this did take great upheaval to my belief system, but there are too many doubts to the theory, mostly based from my own observation of human behavior, that I can't believe such a flawed model any longer.

Evolution is not applying to modern humans

From Darwinian Fairytales:

> If Darwin's theory of evolution were true, there would be in every species a constant and ruthless competition to survive: a competition in which only a few in any generation can be winners. But it is perfectly obvious that human life is not like that, however it may be with other species.
>
> […]
>
> That theory is a universal generalization about all terrestrial species at any time. Hence, if the theory says something which is not true now of our species (or another), then it is not true—-finish… If Darwin's theory of evolution is true, no species can ever escape from the process of natural selection.

If you look outside your window, you'll see that there is no longer a vicious fight for survival, even in desperately poor nations. The sick and handicap, thanks to society's intervention (a society created by the human animal that evolution supposedly applies to), can survive with ease, and even the mentally inferior who lives on the altruism of others can reproduce to their biological limit assuming they possess basic fertility.

> Darwin must have gone wrong somewhere about man, and badly wrong. For if > his theory or explanation of evolution were true, there would be in every species a constantly recurring struggle for life: a competition to survive and reproduce which is so severe that few of the competitors in any generation can win. But this prediction of the theory is not borne out by experience in the case of man. In no human society, whether savage or civilized, is there any such struggle for life.

>
> […]
>
> You can try reminding the Darwinian, if you like, that this theory of evolution is a proposition about all species of organisms, at all times and places; and that man is a species, that the last three centuries are times, and that advanced countries are places.

Darwinists will say that welfare, employment benefits, and even health care disturb natural selection and, if removed, we will see more of the evolutionary model of the strongest reproducing along with the fight for survival. This "veneer" idea is debunked below, but even if you were to take it as valid, multiple societies that contain billion of people currently have welfare, employment benefits, and health care, all developed from the will and efforts of the human animal, naturally and progressively. In other words, to make evolution true, we'd have to manually and artificially intervene and remove all the altruistic fruits and layers of our society that have independently come forth in all corners of the planet. Can you imagine a physicist insisting on blowing up an errant planet that doesn't obey the laws of gravity to make sure his theories remain universally true?

The reproductive urge to make babies is barely an urge

Your reproductive urge is so strong and so intense that you are wearing condoms, not ejaculating inside women to give them your seed, having panic attacks when a girl announces her period is late, and in the case of some men, dropping out from sex entirely for the evolutionary trivial reasons that women have unreasonable standards and bad attitudes.

A common argument by someone not fulfilling their evolutionary need is that they possess a lack of "resources," but this can be laughed upon its face with a visit to an African village or South American slum where children living on a dollar a day make it to reproductive age and later go on to reproduce heartily themselves. In fact, the more you raise your children in impoverishment, the more likely they will have more kids and spread your genes than if you raised them in comfort and luxury. The "resources" argument is outright absurd if uttered in the West where the state will raise the kid for you and allow it to reach reproductive age without you spending a dollar.

Consider that I can have 100 children in Washington DC right now and all 100 will be properly clothed, fed, and cared for without me lifting a finger. None would die from neglect before reaching adulthood. Quick—go forth young man and place your seed within every woman you have sex with! Then escape the country and watch from afar as your seeds grow. I promise you the state will raise those seeds and that your genes will be passed on for the next hundred generations, and you will have done as much to live out your evolutionary destiny as the great Mongol kings. Isn't that why you are here for?

But of course you will do no such thing, because there is only a trivial drive in you to reproduce, and if you fail to do it during your lifetime, you would not even shed a tear, and may actually be happier because of it. Based on Darwin's theory, we should be jumping at the chance to use the altruism of others or the state to maximally reproduce, even if it still comes at detriment to ourselves, but we're not, showing how absurd and false the "survive and reproduce" paradigm really is.

> Human life is full of opportunities for reproduction which the supply of food would permit, but which are not taken in fact.
>
> […]
>
> …our species practices, or has practiced, on an enormous scale, infanticide, artificial abortion, and the prevention of conception. No other species does anything at all of this kind, but we do, and we appear to have done so always.
>
> […]
>
> …women are hardly ever permitted to marry as soon as they are capable of reproduction. The result is, of course, that years of reproductive opportunities are very commonly neglected, however plentiful food may be.

Darwin also didn't mention why the reproductive urge decreases when humans move from rural areas to cities. How can it be that bars, movie theaters, cafes, yoga studios, and sushi restaurants can diminish, delay, or outright halt a human being's need to reproduce? Why do humans dedicate their lives—often during their most fertile years—to professions and careers and shallow social experiences in dense cities that hurt their ability to reproduce? It turns out that humans have this weird tendency, as civilization marches on, to develop specializations, activities, and gadgets that self-limit their reproduction or that of others, while at the same time becoming more energized at making money, accumulating possessions, having fun, and raising cute dogs and cats than having the maximum number of children they're able to.

Humans do not reproduce up to the limit of the food supply

> The Malthus-Darwin proposition, then, that population increases if food does, may be a truth, or a false but fertile near-truth, when it is applied to species other than Homo sapiens. But applied to our species, the best it can be is the following pure triviality: that population increases if food does, unless it is prevented from doing so by one or more of a dozen different causes that we know of, or by one or more of an indefinite number of causes that we do not know of.
>
> […]
>
> The offspring of a most privileged class exhibit, in fact, more strongly than those of any other class, and far more strongly than the offspring of the poor, a proclivity towards a whole range of things, every one of which is more or less > unfavorable to parenthood. To early sexual exhaustion, to sexual incapacity, to sexual indifference, to homosexuality, to religion, to study, to art, to connoisseurship, to gambling, to drunkenness, to drugs . . . To almost anything in the world, in fact, except increasing or even maintaining the numbers of their own class by reproduction.

It's important to reiterate that Stove doesn't disprove evolution, and leaves aside the fact that the theory can fit quite well for other organisms, but he gives too many examples to count on how evolution is not correct for explaining human reproduction and behavior. To find the greatest paradox to evolution, all you need is a mirror, since your own life goes against it, as does mine.

> Here, for example, is a respected sociobiologist, Professor R. D. Alexander, writing in 1979: ". . . we are programed to use all our effort, and in fact to use our lives, in reproduction." People who use all their effort, in fact use their lives, in reproduction: does that sound like anyone you know, or ever heard or read of?
>
> […]
>
> It means that an impediment, however microscopic, to an organism's maximal reproduction, if such an impediment ever occurred at all, would be completely eliminated by natural selection, and as quickly as such elimination can take place.

I know dozens of men personally who have had sex with over 100 women, but I do not know one who engages in purposeful reproduction, even though they are so easily able to. We are all "errors" of evolution, along with billions of other human beings.

Evolution requires high child mortality that is absent in humans

For the "strongest" to survive, the weak must continually die. Darwin suggested levels that can be interpreted as over 50%. But in human beings, nearly everyone survives, even the weakest, meaning that natural selection is no longer selecting for the strong, thanks in part to medical advances. If natural selection is not selecting, and not ensuring that only the strong pass on their genes, evolution is not occurring in humans.

> …there will be in every species a severe struggle for life among conspecifics, and a high child mortality. And that is the very thing, of course, which is needed to ensure in turn that in every species there will be that natural selection which is, according to the Darwinian theory, the vera causa of evolution.
>
> […]
>
> …[evolution] implies a struggle for life among humans which is far more severe, and a child mortality which is far higher, than any which really exists, or indeed could exist, consistently with our species surviving at all.

There is no “struggle for life”

If a man today really did believe we were engaged in a “struggle for life,” competing viciously for food and survival every moment of the day, he would be labeled mentally insane and instituted. Only in cases of starvation is any struggle seen, and yet even then humans will still act rationally and altruistically in times of crises, even to non-relatives, as you have seen in the news after natural disasters rip through tight-knit communities.

Considering that no modern Western citizen has seen starvation, or likely ever will, they’ll luckily escape Darwin’s all-encompassing theory for their entire lives. So while food is plentiful, and there is no struggle for life, what biological theory of life are we following? What is determining the progress of the species? It surely isn’t evolution by natural selection. A program of “everyone lives” and “everyone can reproduce if they want” is not what any Darwinist has proposed.

> As for that “struggle for life” among conspecifics, supposedly universal and constant, which Darwin was later to make famous, he saw nothing of it among the Yahgans [indians]. Well, that should go without saying: there was none of it there. Collecting shellfish, their commonest form of food-getting, was done by family groups, or by individuals. In winter, when the guanaco, with a good layer of fat on them, were forced downhill by the deepening snow above, a group of men would go off for a few days to hunt them. Whatever they got was simply shared among the hunters, who carried home as much as they could to share with their families. Well, they would, wouldn’t they? Only someone who had “the struggle for life” on the brain would expect anything different.
>
> […]
>
> …what would it be like, to meet a population of humans who really were always engaged in a Darwinian struggle for life? I cannot say. The best I can summon up is a very indistinct picture of a number of people in a sort of pandemonium competition for food. In my picture, the people are not distinguishable from one another by age, by sex, by rank, or by anything.
>
> […]
>
> …if, on the other hand, your faith in Darwinism is so profound that you simply must have human beings, not only in the remote past but now too, always engaged in a struggle for life so severe that it leaves no room for altruism and exacts a child mortality of 8o percent or more: well, if you have made that uncomfortable bed, you will just have to lie in it. And one of its minor discomforts is this: that you will have to reconcile yourself to performing, all your life, that evasive trick of which Hume rightly complained. That is, of calling certain facts—namely the facts of human altruism—a “problem” or a “difficulty” for your theory, when anyone not utterly blinded by Darwinism can see that these facts are actually a demonstration of the falsity of your theory.

Altruism is an innate human trait

When evolutionists discuss altruism, they attempt to paint it as a “mistake” of evolution or strain mightily to somehow make it fit their theory, instead of just admitting that their theory is wrong. Altruism is indeed a pathological trait in humans, who are far from “selfish” beings constantly working in their self interests. Every single day you have a need to share, teach, help, and communicate, and not only to your relatives but also strangers, and the benefits you receive from this altruism doesn’t at all increase your ability to reproduce. In fact, I believe the need to have children is not only to pass on your genes, but to have ready-made targets to receive your overflowing and debilitating altruism.

Stove remarks how a human being or group spontaneously showing altruism would and should have been crushed by existing non-altruistic human groups. Since that did not happen, it suggests that altruism was likely with us from the first man.

> …how, in a constant competition among conspecifics to survive and reproduce, altruistic individuals could possibly avoid being demographically “swamped” by non-altruistic ones.
>
> […]
>
> There is no reason whatever, apart from the Darwinian theory of evolution, to believe that there ever was in our species an “evolution of altruism” out of a selfish “state of nature.” People believe there was, only because they accept Darwin’s theory, which says that there is always a struggle for life among conspecifics, whereas there is no such struggle observable among us now, but a great deal of observable altruism instead. The right conclusion to draw, of course, is that Darwin’s theory is false.
>
> […]
>
> For Darwinian theory says that there is always a struggle for life going on among the members of every species. So why was not every tender shoot of altruism or morality always promptly sheared off by natural selection?
>
> If you on an impulse make an altruistic “offer” to some of your non-altruistic conspecifics, they will—if words mean anything—close with your offer, and thereby improve their own chances of surviving and reproducing; but not yours. If you make a habit of this kind of thing, there is only one way matters can end for you, and for any offspring you may manage to leave who inherit your amiable disposition. Your lineage, far from becoming one of “the favored races in the struggle for life,” will quickly be extinguished.

If for over 100 years you incessantly teach people they have a selfish nature and act only in their best interests, you are surely enabling selfish behavior in humans, and yet in spite of this continuous brainwashing, altruism is still hugely present in all societies. If I had the ability, for over 100 years, through the media and academia, to state that mushrooms are the most vile food imaginable, I have no doubt that per capita consumption of mushrooms would decline.

The human need to communicate

Humans have an innate need for communication, for communication's sake, among other needs that don't improve their survival or reproduction.

> …it is perfectly obvious that people do not now communicate, or communicate as much as they do, because of any advantage which accrues to themselves from communicating. Indeed, there are few human experiences more common than that of people finding that they have injured their own interests, by too great a readiness to communicate, or too great a receptivity to the communications of others. Yet lessons of this kind are constantly thrown away on us, simply because our love of communication is so strong, and so little controlled by a regard for our own interests.
>
> […]
>
> …it can perfectly well happen, and often does happen, that a man pursues one or more of these "particular passions" without regard to his own interests; indeed, to the manifest injury of those interests, and even to the destruction of his wealth, health, or life itself. The man who, in defense of his good name, challenges another to a duel and is killed, is an old stock example; but still a good example nonetheless.

The myth that human communication is selfish and deceptive

Another often-heard quote is that humans constantly manipulate and lie to achieve their ends, but such tactics can only work against a backdrop of honesty and truth telling, since lying is a parasitic behavior that needs the "clean" behavior to be effective. Therefore being honest is the original human state, while lying is the parasitic and more rare form of communication.

> …it is not hard to see what the result would be, if in the future such manipulative communication were to become universal, or even nearly so. Communication, whether manipulative or otherwise, would then just die out altogether, for the simple reason that no hearer would ever know what any speaker meant by the words he uttered.
>
> […]
>
> …human intelligence and consciousness plainly have a degree of autonomy which is wildly inconsistent with Darwinism. If intelligence and consciousness in humans are always subordinated, like all other adaptations of organisms, to their striving to increase, then The Origin of Species was an attempt by Darwin to increase the number of his descendants. But it was not.
>
> […]
>
> Yet if what The Selfish Gene says is true, what else can that book be, but > manipulation of its readers by the genes of Richard Dawkins, striving for their own maximal replication?

If "all" communication was deceptive, you would be confused as to what you're even reading right now, and take an agonizing amount of time to process a single sentence.

The veneer idea is false

> This idea, that civilization, morality, unselfishness and self-restraint, are only superficial and misleading appearances, disguising our selfish, savage, animal nature, I will call for short "the veneer idea."
>
> […]
>
> …if you intend to stick to the Darwinian theory, you simply have to say that, in the human case, most of the time, the struggle for life is going on below the surface of society: concealed by the veneer of unselfishness, considerateness, and so forth.
>
> […]
>
> Darwinism and Freudianism are only variations on a common theme, and what that theme is. It is that such things as self-restraint, cooperation, and consideration for others are merely part of a thin disguise which society places over our selfish and non-moral animal nature.
>
> […]
>
> Despite the widespread and longstanding acceptance that the veneer idea has enjoyed, and still enjoys, it is false, and even obviously false. For it compels us to ask a certain simple question, and yet cannot answer it: namely, whence the veneer? What could have brought such a thing into existence in the first place, or kept it in place if it had once come into existence?
>
> […]
>
> If the members of every species are always engaged in a struggle for life with one another, and if human beings were selfish and non-moral animals at first, how could even the least little bit of morality or of altruism have escaped being eliminated by natural selection?

If evolution was in effect, it would have been impossible for the "veneer" of civilization to develop.

The myth of the evolutionary "savage"

"Cavemen" had rigid social and community roles, and weren't allowed to do anything they pleased. A study of even modern tribes that exist today show they were more limited in their behavior in some ways than we are.

> "Savages," by contrast, have their behavior rigorously prescribed for them, at almost every moment of life, by gods or ancestors or elders or priests or chiefs, > or at any rate by some external authority. And the more "savage" a tribe is, the more comprehensive and vice-like is the grip of social prescription on the lives of its members.

>
> […]
>
> Human societies are almost inexhaustibly various, but there is one thing which no human (or even animal) society is even remotely like: namely, "savage" life, and civilized life below the veneer, as selfish theorists conceive it. They think of people as though they were the molecules of a confined volume of gas, which have no mutual sympathy, or any other influence, except by way of collisions with one another. This is the selfish theory to a T, as long as you impute to each molecule a ceaseless and exclusive regard to its own interests. The only thing wrong with this idea is that there is nothing whatever in reality which corresponds to it.

A quote you hear often is that "humans are one step in the jungle," which is another form of the veneer idea in that civilization covers our true instincts, but even birds, when put in a starvation scenario, act more "selfish" and with more desperation to survive, yet they don't have civilization, culture, or morality. There is no veneer specifically made for humans.

> …what is stripped away from us under starvation or torture is not cultural, but biological. It is not the successive layers of convention, education, morality, etc. It is the successive layers of biological development which are natural to our species between infancy and mature adulthood.

Stove suggests that "savage" behavior is actually infantile behavior. When resources are low, adults regress back into panicked and teat-grappling infants in search of food.

Evolution is the last in a long line of "puppet master" theories

The stories of man can't help but include a puppet master that is controlling all our behavior. Before it was god, now it's genes.

> "Our stars rule us," says the astrologer. "Man is what he eats," said Feuerbach. "We are what our infantile sexual experiences made us," says the Freudian. "The individual counts for nothing, his class situation for everything," says the Marxist. "We are what our socioeconomic circumstances make us," says the social worker. "We are what Almighty God created us," says the Christian theologian. There is simply no end of this kind of stuff. What is wrong with all such theories is this: That they deny, at least by implication, that human intentions, decisions, and efforts are among the causal agencies which are at work in the world.

Richard Dawkins has been especially successful in pushing the gene puppet master idea.

> …writing in the full flood of conviction of human helplessness, [Dawkins] says that "we are … robot-vehicles blindly programmed to preserve the selfish > molecules known as genes,"etc., etc. But at the same time, of course, he knows as well as the rest of us do, that there are often other causes at work, in us or around us, which are perfectly capable of counteracting genetic influences. In fact, he sometimes says so himself, and he even says that "we have the power to defy the selfish genes of our birth."" As you see, he is just like those writers of serial stories in boys' magazines, who used to say, in order to extricate their hero from some impossible situation, "With one bound, Jack was free!"

>
> […]
>
> …sensible people take no notice, when yet another crank or charlatan publishes yet another book which says that human beings are the helpless puppets of something or other: God, or God and demons, or History, or Race, or the Unconscious, or Aliens from Outer Space, or whatever. The Selfish Gene is simply another member of this slum breed of books, and ought to have been recognized as such from the start.
>
> […]
>
> It is no mystery why the supply of puppetry theories never fails: there is an unfailing demand for them. People want relief from responsibility, and puppetry theories promise them this relief.
>
> […]
>
> You could put [Dawkins] down anywhere in the world and rely on him to find there, what no one had before, invisible puppet masters manipulating visible puppets.

Atheists are quick to throw away god and angels as the main cause of human behavior, and then what do they do but simply replace them with genes as the main cause of human behavior. One must wonder at the curious human need to attribute their behavior to something invisible and all-powerful.

> According to the Christian religion, human beings and all other created things exist for the greater glory of God; according to sociobiology, human beings and all other living things exist for the benefit of their genes.
>
> […]
>
> Organisms have the adaptations that they do, according to the religion of Paley, because a single benevolent God intends them to survive and reproduce; and because that intention will be fulfilled the better, the better adapted the organisms are. According to the new religion, organisms have the adaptations they do, because many selfish gods intend to have copies of themselves, and as many copies as possible, carried by the next generation of organisms; and because that intention will be fulfilled the better, the better adapted the organisms.
>
> […]

> Genetics has merely provided the new religionists with the precise locality of their gods, on the chromosomes of the sex cells.

Whether Darwin intended to or not, his theory swapped out one god for 30,000 powerful, purposeful, and apparently intelligent gods that control an individual human's destiny. You are but a pathetic servant of these tiny genes.

Why is there evolution?

Where did it come from? What is driving it towards organization and consciousness? What is the reason for this process existing? Evolutionary theory does not answer this, and takes on the phenomenon of replication as an automatic given, like the existence of the Planck constant.

> In particular, a molecule of DNA, or of water, or of anything, is not benefited by a replica of it brought into existence by this molecule itself, or by something else, or by nothing.
>
> […]
>
> [Molecules] cannot delight in the number of replicas that they make of themselves. They are not even intelligent enough, after all, to know when they have made a replica of themselves.

Inclusive fitness is a flawed explanation to altruism

To solve the "altruism problem," evolutionists came up with the idea of inclusive fitness, whereby you are likely to aid your relatives so that their genes can be passed, which contain identical copies of some of your genes. Stove makes the sarcastic comment that bacteria must then have extensive forms of altruism.

> …what vast quantities of altruism must exist, between generations or between siblings, in all those species which reproduce either parthenogenically or by fission! For the members of these species share all their genes with their offspring or with their siblings.
>
> […]
>
> Two sister bacteria, despite their genetic identity, will slug it out with each other for the means of subsistence, just like any other pair of good Darwinian girls.
>
> […]
>
> A male robin red breast then, at least when defending a territory, cannot even tell the difference between a bit of red wool and a trespassing rival, even though a trespassing rival could quite easily be his brother. Yet the theory of inclusive fitness requires us to believe that he can tell the difference between his brother and a cousin, and again, between a cousin and an unrelated conspecific. Well, it is not logically, or even biologically, impossible.
>
> […]

> …the theory of inclusive fitness still has the gaping puncture which it had at first. Namely, that it requires sibling altruism to be about as strong and common as parental, whereas in fact it is nothing of the kind. If so, we might as well admit that although, genetically, the sibling relation is "just as close" as the parent-offspring relation, biologically, it is nowhere near as close, at any rate as far as altruism is concerned.

We are puppets to genes that want their counterparts inside your relatives to reproduce, but this can't even begin to work the way evolutionists propose unless you are told that you are a relative of someone, because the genes themselves don't know what relation you have to a random man on the street. Genes are so stupid, in fact, that when newborn babies are accidentally switched in hospitals, the two unlucky sets of parents will altruistically raise the genes of another couple without any doubt it's their own. Yet we're supposed to believe that it's these same genes that are working continuously to control you like a slave so that copies of them in you and your relatives can be allowed to replicate.

Evolution is like a buggy software program that needs constant patching as more "testing" reveals its obvious flaws. Instead of just doing away with the theory, scientists will create all sort of monstrous octopus legs and attach them to the theory, creating exceptions that even Darwin himself couldn't have imagined.

Evolution blames nature for errors

People who believe in evolution victim-blame the organism when it acts outside the confines of evolution.

> Contraception, homosexuality, natural celibacy, the love of truth or of beauty, accepting submission signals [in fighting], adopting children, and resenting baby snatchers: what a heavy catalogue of errors! It singles out our species as being the most hopelessly stupid of all the pupils in the great school of natural selection.
>
> […]
>
> …scientific theory cannot possibly reprehend, in any way at all, any actual facts. It can explain them, predict them, describe them, but it cannot condemn them as errors. Astronomy cannot criticize certain arrangements of stars or planets as erroneous, and no more can biology criticize certain organisms, or characteristics of them, as erroneous.
>
> […]
>
> Wherever Darwinism is in error, Darwinians simply call the organisms in question or their characteristics, an error! Wherever there is manifestly something wrong with their theory, they say that there is something wrong with the organisms.
>
> […]
>
> Darwinians, rather than admit that their theory is simply not true of our species, > brazenly shift the blame, and designate all of those characteristics “biological errors.”

Humans are an example of evolutionary farce

> …far from every attribute being rigidly destroyed which is in the least degree injurious, in our species there is precious little except injurious attributes. Nearly everything about us, or at least nearly everything which distinguishes us from flies, fish, or rodents—all the way from practicing Abortion to studying Zoology—puts some impediment or other in the way of our having as many descendants as we could. From the point of view of Darwinism, just as from the point of view of Calvinism, there is no good in us, or none worth mentioning. We are a mere festering mass of biological errors.
>
> […]
>
> Darwinism can tell you lots of truths about plants, flies, fish, etc., and interesting truths too, to the people who are interested in those things. But the case is altogether different, indeed reversed, where our own species is in question. If it is human life that you would most like to know about and to understand, then a very good library can be begun by leaving out Darwinism, from 1859 to the present hour.

Closing thoughts

As recently as three years ago I started noticing the flaws of evolution from self-examining my behavior and those of my hypersexual male peers, because you don’t pick up a book titled “Darwinian Fairytales” unless you already harbored serious doubts about the theory. I must admit that I made a mistake to use evolution as a reason to whore around with women when it was clear as day that I did not aim to reproduce. The behavior I did enact for so long can best be explained as entertainment seeking, relieving a lack of purpose in life, and wanting to feel masculine, but there was nothing evolutionary about it, and it has not at all increased my reproductive success than had I been an introverted 22-year-old and told my father to arrange a marriage for me with a girl from his Iranian hometown.

With this review I don’t aim to completely throw evolution under the bus, for it does apply quite nicely to other organisms, and natural selection has surely applied to humans during certain periods of their history, but it should not and can not be used to describe current human behavior, including your own, because any set of conditions that put humans through an evolutionary grinder are no longer present in modern civilization. Doing otherwise would be deception on a large scale, and I won’t deceive myself further by using it, even if it reduces scientific backing for some of my ideas.

Without using evolution as a tool, there is a big question that must be answered: where does traditional sex roles—and behavior—come from? Or more precisely: what are the correct sex roles for humans? The answer to the second is easier than the first. The correct sex roles are what has sustained human populations and society in the past and what will sustain human populations and society in the future. Biology need not be taken into account.

A careful study of history can clearly show what happens when men step outside of their traditional roles and what happens when women step outside of theirs, something spending ten minutes on Tumblr can verify. What are the sex roles and proper behavior of humans that allow a sustainable and mentally healthy population without ushering in the policies that would lead to a cultural collapse? The answer is the sex roles we already are familiar with, ones that have been known since Biblical times.

It's a natural human urge to understand the "why" of how life came about, a question that was no doubt asked by the first man. The problem in answering with evolution is that—besides it being wrong—it locks your mind into a narrow perspective. Thinking that all humans act in genetic self interest clouds all your thoughts on human behavior and prevents you from seeing obvious contradictions and hidden truths. Because you have firm faith in evolution, you are not even allowing your mind to consider another viewpoint.

Say you encounter an article that says the following: "Men who go off to war have more children than men who don't." Evolution would describe this by saying that women want to reproduce with men who are most fit and strong and better able to defend the tribe. But let's flip it and say "Men who don't go off to war have more children than men who do." Evolution can describe this too! It can say, "A superior reproductive strategy is to stay with the fertile women and reproduce with them during the time the alpha males are away." Even the simplest of minds can find an explanation once it already knows the final result it's aiming for.

If evolution can be used to explain both sides of the coin, which is often does, it's not a scientific theory but a rationalization theory that justifies any and all human behavior as somehow fitting the theory. In other words, the theory is like playdough that can fit in any situation, and this is even done in the red pill portion of the manopshere to take any behavior a man or woman does and somehow justify it in terms of evolution, even if it's based on people acting on the willful mission to not reproduce. What's convenient for evolutionists is that none of their assertions can be proven, meaning that evolution is not more than one step above astrology in terms of describing or predicting human behavior. It's gibberish.

Darwin's theory came at the right time of history. The monarchy was overthrown and scientific rationalism dominated the day. The missing piece to complete the Enlightenment was a way to kill god, and Darwin came forth with a brilliant theory that did the job. The only problem is that it's not true for humans, at least not in the way for other forms of life on earth.

There must be something else motivating and driving human beings that can't be explained by current science, and so therefore the science we have is unable to provide a definitive and consistent account of our origin story along with our behavior. This means that if you are using evolution to structure, organize, or explain your own life, you are living a falsehood—a soothing falsehood but a falsehood nonetheless.

I must state that it's not a comfortable position for me to neither believe in god or human evolution, for I have no working model for my own existence. It's a weird place because my brain, for some reason, craves an origin story for where it came from. It's searching, hunting, for something that explains how it got here, but I will be patient in this search, because I find it liberating and free that I no longer have to frame every human action through the lens of "survive and reproduce" and "all humans act in self-interest to spread their genes."

Now that I have done this, it's much easier to see how reproduction is not an important or essential human behavior and that evolution is nothing more than a severely flawed theory for explaining human beings.

(This article was originally published on Roosh V.)

Read More: "Darwinian Fairytales" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What Is The Best English Translation Of Sun Tzu's "Art Of War"?

July 20, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Sun Tzu's The Art of War is one of the most widely read of the military classics. A very large number of translations exist, of decidedly uneven quality. Some of these "translations" omit large portions of the original text's commentary; and some of them are glossy, slicked-up books that bear little relation to the original.

As it turns out, The Art of War has much to tell us about the art of translation. The translator must know the language, of course; but he must also know his subject, and have a sensitivity to the nuances of a work's historical context. The quality of a translation can make or break a work. A good translation can communicate the spirit of the original, while a bad one can alienate a reader permanently.

There is a delicate balance that must be struck between fidelity to the original, and the need to convey ideas into another medium in a way that sounds lucid. The translator succeeds or fails in how he manages these two tensile factors.

I wish to make the case that the best translation of Sun Tzu is the 1963 edition by Samuel B. Griffith. Griffith was a remarkable man: a decorated combat veteran of the Second World War, a Chinese linguist, and an Oxford-educated Ph.D.

Sun Tzu is practically part of the popular culture now—he is even quoted in Oliver Stone's film Wall Street—but before Samuel Griffith, he was almost entirely unknown in the West. It was Griffith, through his brilliant translation, that raised Sun Tzu from obscurity.

Background on the man

Born in Lewiston, Pennsylvania, he graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in 1929 and was commissioned a second lieutenant in the U.S. Marine Corps. From 1931 to 1933, he served in Nicaragua with the American forces aiding that country's Guardia Nacional, in what later became somewhat derisively referred to as the "Banana Wars."

After this, he was posted to China. It is not widely known now, but units of the Fourth Marines were posted in Shanghai in the early 1930s to protect American interests. China at the time was experiencing one of its periodic descents into chaos and war, and duty there was not without its share of excitement. Duties there consisted primarily of policing the borders of the international concessions that had been carved out by various foreign powers.

Griffith, however, was assigned at the language officer at the American Embassy in Peking. From the moment he arrived in China, he devoted himself to the study of the Chinese language. According to his statements in later interviews, he spent six hours per day, five days per week, in intensive study of this most challenging and subtle language.

Within two years he was able to read a basic newspaper article. After leaving China in 1938, he was confident that he had gained a working knowledge of modern Chinese. This knowledge would serve him well in his later career.
He was awarded the Navy Cross and the Purple Heart on Guadalcanal for his part in the fighting at Matanikau River; later, at the island of New Georgia, he was decorated with the Distinguished Service Cross.

With the end of the war in 1945, he returned to occupation duty in Northern China in the city of Tsingtao. The remainder of his career was spent in the United States in a variety of staff and command appointments. He retired from active duty in 1956 as a brigadier general.

It was at this point in his life that Griffith proved he was no ordinary military man. Whereas most veterans would have been content to rest on their laurels and seek a comfortable retirement in some government post, Griffith felt the call of other disciplines. So he exchanged the tunic of the soldier for the robe of the scholar. He applied for, and was accepted to, a Ph.D. program at Oxford University in the Chinese language.

This was not the colloquial, modern Chinese that Griffith had been exposed to previously: this was the classical language of ancient China, as different from modern Chinese as the language of Euripides would be to a modern resident of Athens.

Discovering the work

It was here at Oxford that Griffith discovered the remarkable Chinese military classic that became the subject of his Ph.D. thesis. At that time, the existing translations were either inadequate or entirely unknown.

The first translation of Sun Tzu in the West appeared in 1772 in a French version, released by an obscure Jesuit missionary named J.J.M. Amiot. It was an amateurish effort, and received little attention. The first English translation apparently did not appear until 1905; this version, done by a British Army captain, was based on a corrupt Japanese edition of Sun Tzu, not the original work.

Another English version followed in 1910, and there were a few minor, slipshod efforts made during the war years of 1940-1945 to turn out an acceptable English version.

Griffith's translation towers over all others, both before and after him. It is scholarly, informed, and puts Sun Tzu squarely in his historical context. There are special sections on the textual tradition, the "warring states" period of Chinese history, Sun Tzu and Mao Tse-tung, and a brilliant series of appendices that provide further insight into Sun Tzu's influence.

The text is fully annotated. Most importantly, I think, Griffith preserves, the words of the ancient commentators that pepper the text. Far too many other translators simply omit these commentaries so as to "dumb down" their product, but they form an integral part of the original.

All in all, this is a work of patient scholarship, not something churned out for cynical commercial purposes. Griffith brings a combination of skills to the table that no one else has been able to match: his military experience, his mastery of Chinese, and his care for the classical Chinese language.

If you want to read Sun Tzu, this is the version to read.

Read More: Can A Man Have Too Much Game?

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

5 Ways Kratom Can Help You Get Ripped, Strong, And Energized

July 20, 2015 | by Sponsored Post | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Herbal Samurai

This article will serve as the third installment of the kratom trilogy on Return of Kings. In part 1, readers learned about kratom's usefulness in picking up women and having great sex. In part 2, it was shown how kratom can be leveraged to become more productive and make more money. Readers have found it tremendously effective for both purposes.

In this installment, we will focus on how kratom can be used by the men of ROK to shed excess fat, build strength, and increase energy. The plant was originally used for exactly these purposes for decades in Southeast Asia, and anecdotes from men today affirm kratom's benefits in these important masculine areas.

A quick primer for the guys who are still not familiar with kratom:

Kratom is an herbal plant that has been traditionally used for decades to drastically improve one's mood, motivation, and energy all while reducing anxiety. It's cheap, it's natural, and many have found it to be effective in low doses of only 2-4 grams.

It comes in several different 'strains', which are differentiated by colour and by the region they were grown in. Users have reported very few downsides. It doesn't produce the hindering side effects of alcohol, and it is not nearly as habit forming as a caffeine. Here's how It Can Make You Lean, Mean, and Ready to Run Through Walls:

1. Kratom Can Make Dieting Much Easier

A large number of men have reported that kratom aids in appetite suppression when they're dieting. For guys trying to lose weight through dieting, have found kratom to be very effective at preventing cravings for processed carbs and sugars. The appetite-suppressing effects of kratom have been noticed by most to be enough to keep hunger pangs away but not enough to negatively impact a bulking diet.

2. Kratom Can Boost Your Testosterone

When one experience's increased levels of stress, the hormone cortisol rises. Cortisol wrecks a man's body and mind in many ways; most notably with increased fat gain, decreased muscle mass, and lower testosterone.[1] Anecdotes from both young and old men have found kratom to be very effective at lowering stress and subsequently increasing testosterone. The reported results? Less muscle catabolism and accelerated fat loss.

3. Kratom Has Been Used To Increase Energy And Stamina

The plant has been used traditionally in countries like Indonesia for centuries by labourers in order to work harder and longer in physically demanding roles. Users have reported Kratom to have strong mental and physical stimulant effects, without the jitters or anxiety that they get with caffeine. In addition, many have noticed kratom directly increase physical stamina allowing a man to train harder and longer.

4. Kratom Could Reduce Water Retention In Your Face and Abs

Well-defined facial features and a six pack on men are usually the top two favourites of women. Even if you're in pretty good shape, you probably know how annoying it can be to have water retention in these important areas. Several guys (and girls) have found kratom to be an excellent natural, mild way to avoid water retention and look great without using harsher alternatives.

5. Kratom Can Help You Kill It In The Gym

Labourers in Southeast Asian countries have historically not only used Kratom as a productivity enhancer, but also to delay muscular exhaustion. The reported pain-reducing effects of Kratom would allow them to work harder, and for much longer. A quick internet search will show anecdotes from guys that have found kratom to allow them to lift harder and for longer before experiencing muscle pain and exhaustion.

Where Can I Get Kratom?

The quality of the kratom you get makes an enormous difference. You need to purchase only the highest quality available. It is literally night and day.

Our recommendation is Herbal Samurai. We have the top quality you can find anywhere, with clean and fresh kratom that will arrive at your door in 2-3 days.

Check them out at www.herbalsamurai.com and give kratom a shot. It just may be the subtle yet highly effective game changer for your physique and energy.

References:

1 http://www.peaktestosterone.com/Testosterone_Cortisol.aspx

Legal Disclaimer:

All statements made within this article have not been evaluated by the Food and Drug Administration. This product is not intended to diagnose, treat, cure, or prevent any disease. Nothing contained in this article is medical advice. This article is written explicitly for entertainment purposes and everything written is an account of the personal experiences of individuals. Kratom is not sold for human consumption.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

American Women Are Only Good For One Thing

July 21, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Let me get right to the point: American women are good for one thing and one thing only:

Sex.

Try as I might to hamster something into existence that stateside girls can provide me that I can't provide for myself outside of a warm, moist hole to stick my dick in, I just can't think of anything.

The hard truth is that the "anything you can do I can do better" mantra today's women squawk about is grossly inaccurate and they all know it. Men are better than women at just about everything and no amount of social reconditioning or media brainwashing is going to change that.

[image]
Of course you can sweetie

Let's take a look at two things women should be better at than we are, two "qualities" women claim to have that men allegedly just can't live without, and why we don't need Western females for any of them.

What women should be superior to men at

Cooking and other household chores

Back in the day, men didn't cook because women stayed home and took care of the kids while he worked on the railroad all the live long day. When his day was done, he'd be treated to well-earned home cooked meal prepared by his wife.

Things couldn't be more different in 2015. The only two people I know who cook better than I do is my brother, who is a professional chef in Atlanta, and my mother who taught me to cook because she knew that culinary agency among females was plummeting quickly as she often verbalized as much while instructing me. Fucking pathetic.

The fact is I don't need a woman to cook for me because I can do it myself. Don't get me wrong, I would certainly like for a woman to cook for me because nothing's sexier than an attractive woman slaving over a stove for her man. But if she can't or won't, I'd be just fine.

That's what I'm talkin' about

Cooking is something women could be better at than men, but because they have no interest in expanding their value outside of their sexual allure, men have become the undisputed kings of the kitchen and the margin continues to widen by the day.

Don't believe me? The biggest, most watched, and most profitable cooking shows and competitions on televisions are hosted and run by men. Gordon Ramsay, Wolfgang Puck, Guy Fieri, Anthony Bourdain, Emeril Legasse (the list goes on and on) currently occupy majority of the cooking show market share.

Today's woman would choose the "Kardashian/Jenner/Housewives of whatever city" route if given their choice of television shows to star in. They're not interested in much other than shopping, riding the carousel, or bitching about how they can't get a wi-fi signal at whatever overpriced coffee shop they're at. Incidentally enough, they own the majority of the television market share on these subject matters.

“You continue to prove women can’t cook you donkey!”

In the same vein, we certainly don’t need women for other household duties such as laundry, ironing, and other domestic chores around the house. Again, these are tasks women used to do for their men on a regular basis, but these days chicks barely know how to iron or properly steam a dress shirt.

At this point it’s safe (and sad) to say that men are better than women in this area, effectively eliminating a man’s need for a woman to cook and clean for him.

Child Rearing

Women seem to have this crazy idea that because the court system’s default setting is to award custody to the mother 85% of the time means that they’re better parents.

This of course, is laugh out loud funny because everyone knows girls raised by single mothers usually end up as mentally ill sluts, and boys raised by single moms are much more likely run into trouble with the law.

Moms pay more attention to their phones than their children

On the flip side, it's common knowledge that girls raised without fathers (or bad ones) are far more promiscuous than girls raised with them (hence the term "daddy issues") and boys raised by a strong male figure are exponentially more successful in every aspect of life.

What's more is that men are much better with money making single father homes more stable. As the more responsible sex, a man will pass his financial shrewdness to his children, whereas a woman who buys the hot new iPhone rather than pay the electric bill will undoubtedly influence the future spending habits of her young.

Obviously the ideal situation is for children to be raised in a two-parent, heterosexual household with the father acting as the disciplinarian and the mother as the nurturer. But the steep decline in traditional nuclear families is producing selfish, low quality females who have absolutely no clue about what it takes to raise children.

A couple years ago I saw a mother with her eyes glued to her phone while her daughter tugged at her pants to get her attention. I realized right then and there that just about every woman I knew or had known who was a single mother was a bad and selfish parent. The ones who weren't were doing just enough to not be considered terrible.

An extreme example of a terrible mother

Shortly after moving west I became friends with a woman at work. Over the next few months here's what I learned about her: She'd been pregnant three times. She aborted the first one and lost custody of the second one after getting popped for drugs. She was able to hang onto kid number three, but he's a five-year-old boy who is attention starved because he misses his absentee father, and has been kicked out of numerous day cares for extremely disturbing behavior (even by today's standards). He will most assuredly end up in prison not long after he turns 18 (I joke with her all the time telling her things like “get that bail money ready!”).

[image]
Believe it or not, he’s much worse than this kid

To top it off she’s pregnant again. But here’s the kicker: the father could be one of three different dudes and she’s already decided to get an abortion.

This woman just turned 30 and still has the stones to believe she deserves a good man.

Now this is an extreme example but I’m willing to bet stories like these are becoming increasingly common in today’s debaucherous sexual climate. All of that said, it’s safe to say that men no longer need women for their deplorable parenting skills taking, yet, another made up merit badge off their sashes.

Made up qualities women think men want

Strength

The definition of a “strong woman” varies from person to person but in 2015 a strong woman is basically a female who runs off at the mouth, posts memes about how strong she is as a woman, and has a jaded disposition—a direct result of being fucked and chucked on the regular.

She was likely crying because she found out she was the side piece instead of the main chick. Story of her life.

Women are mentally fragile. If someone hurts her feelings, she either cries or has a breakdown on the spot. And of course they’re the smaller, weaker sex. Any “strength” they have is because of their ability to quickly recruit white knights to defend them.

Even if women had the strength they pretend to have, it's not what men are looking for. Girls don't want weak men so what makes them think we want "strong" women?

As men, we have all the physical strength and cerebral brawn we need (more on this in a bit). We want women who add to our lives and bring something to the table we don't currently have. We don't want or need a surplus of a fraudulent commodity women claim to have that turns out to be more of a headache than an asset—especially when they're trying to prove it to you, themselves, and everyone around them all the time.

No thanks hun…I'm good

Men want a woman's support, deference, and sexual loyalty—not her "strength."

"Oooohhhh you just can't handle a strong woman can you??"

Actually I manhandle them…and never call them again. But don't worry, they're "strong" enough to move on from getting humped and dumped by assholes like me which will free her up to find a man who will appreciate her "inner strength."

Intelligence

Men are smarter than women. Period.

Feminists are always quick to point out that females outperform males from elementary school all the way up through college, but they haven't seemed to realize that the worlds best engineers, surgeons, scientists, etc. are men. This explains why they're herding females by the truckload toward STEM careers.

What's more is that the educational system is stacked against boys and skewed heavily in favor of girls. Girls excel in cushy classrooms while boys learn much better getting their hands dirty, turning a wrench, or getting under the hood.

It’s all fine and dandy until she gets out into the real world and realizes that her “A” in algebra doesn’t mean shit

After hours of sitting on his hands in a classroom, a boy gets restless. When that happens, he’s drugged to the point of being a zombie, which further puts him behind. If he manages to somehow escape the American educational abyss, his only shot at success at that point is to go to vocational school where he’ll actually learn something that will provide him with a comfortable lifestyle.

This isn’t to say that women don’t have some semblance of intelligence. Women are born with razor sharp instincts that are, at times, far superior to men. They thrive in social and hierarchical environments as a matter of survival. Women’s intuition.

If they loved and supported a man who respected her proven ability to read people, the man would stand to benefit in several different ways. But the idea that a man needs today’s woman because she’s smarter than he is or that she represents some sort of unfair advantage merely because of her very presence is silly.

Women are fed the ridiculous proverb that behind every great man is a great woman from birth. The ironic satire is that they’re too stupid to realize it isn’t true.

“Smart” women almost always end up like this….alone

Other than hiring a female divorce attorney (which is an advantage for obvious reasons), men don’t need women because of their smarts. In fact, a woman can be as dumb as a box of fucking rocks but if she’s attractive, kind, feminine, and submissive I’d bet the farm that no less than 10 out of 10 men would choose her over the ambitious super slut with her Master’s Degree sleeping her way up the corporate ladder.

“Intelligent” women don’t intimidate us…they fucking annoy us.

So…what are you sayin’?

I didn’t stutter.

American women are only good for sex. Point blank.

They’re shitty parents who can’t cook and seem unwilling and incapable of improving in either area. Then the “smart” and “strong” ones are so busy trying to compete with us and every other male out there that they not only forget how to be feminine, they don’t realize that men don’t want or need their make believe brains or white knight-powered strength.

This is an endangered species so men may as well enjoy the decline

Sure, there are exceptions (see below) but most of them are already locked down as they should be. But most of today's women are bitchy, masculine, selfish cunts with inferiority complexes that make them think they want to dominate men.

The sad truth is that decades of feminism has reduced women to nothing more than three holes and a set of tits who are only as good as the orgasms they provide men. The feminist attempt to make women multi-dimensional in a masculine way has made them as one dimensional as they've ever been in human history.

Read Next: Do Good Girls Exist? A Tale Of Two Unicorns

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Exposing Your Genitals For Ten Minutes In Public Is Fine If You're A Woman

July 21, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Gabi Grecko, a professional self-aggrandizer, recently escaped a criminal conviction for perhaps the most bizarre case of indecent exposure in contemporary Australian history. In 2014, Grecko, the Southern belle of geriatric businessman Geoffrey Edelsten, had walked down Melbourne's bustling Bourke Street at night, sans all clothes bar a veil (which soon fell off) and a hairpiece.

Rather than being a quick prank which surprised bystanders captured with their smartphones, Grecko had brought along two friends armed with both a camera and video camera to meticulously document her stroll.

Only weeks ago during sentencing, Deputy Chief Magistrate Jelena Popovic evidently pitied the flamboyantly dressed Grecko. After all, if she convicted the "socially ambitious" young woman, how could she ever commute between Australia and her native America for work? The poor diddums! Although found responsible, Grecko was accordingly redirected to a diversion program, preventing the conviction that would hamstring her budding career.

Grecko making a mockery of the court system and decision after being “sentenced”. Her now husband Geoffrey Edelsten is in the foreground.

Given the walk occurred in the evening, one might be excused for thinking that her ten minutes of prancing around naked is no big deal. Anyone who has lived in the CBD of Melbourne or Sydney, however, would disagree. At this hour, to boot, Grecko came across hundreds of people. New York is not the only city that never sleeps.

And if Melbourne does indeed sleep sometimes, it certainly wasn’t at the hour Grecko chose. The police understandably received a flurry of complaints about her. Plus, if I could see her vajayjay on my smartphone as clear as day, the pedestrians that morning could have landed a plane on it.

Unless we regress to inane debates about male genitalia being more “external” than the female equivalent (and so exposing the former is somehow worse than exposing the latter), Grecko continues the habitual practice of judiciaries making excuses for socially deviant female sex behavior. When carried out by men, these behaviors are routinely castigated and result in life-changing negative consequences for offenders.

For example, many of you have read my piece about the perennial allure of statutory rapist Mary Kay Letourneau. Grecko’s antics are without question less serious, but the paradox of male responsible-rampant female leeway is the same for exposing yourself as it is for more conventional sex felonies.

A walk to make her more “famous”

Grecko had a miscarriage, said she was grieving about it and decided to Instagram the hell out of the situation. Classy (and believable).

Unlike more anonymous pranks involving nudity, Grecko made a crudely calculated move to increase her already overexposed profile (pun intended). Having her two friends tag along to chronicle her “exploits” was nothing but an egregious attempt at attention-seeking, not a spontaneous one. And fleeting nudity is something decidedly different from ten minutes of relaxed ambling, during which time people can see everything without even having to turn their heads and track movement.

Not only did the walk succeed in generating the desired attention, the court failed to appropriately incorporate this flagrant self-promotion, for overall commercial purposes, into its decision. The funny part is that Grecko, wanting a lighter sentence, promised that she was done with walking nude in public, as if a grown adult needs to make such a declaration in the first place.

When you combine her attempts at contrition with her courtroom attire (orange hair, some sort of indie denim combination and a daffodil-colored parasol), you’re left with the impression that the Australian judiciary was “punk’d” by Grecko.

A man doing this would be called a sex offender

Someone died and it’s a funeral, but everything is always about Gabi.

So a big question looms, “How would a male doing the same thing fare before the courts?” If you’ve both long swallowed your red pill and appreciate the need for the nascent philosophy of Neomasculinity, you already know the answer is “badly.”

This hypothetical copycat of Grecko would be called out as an unacceptable risk to children (and probably stripped of visitation and custody rights if he had any himself), pursued as a social deviant and, above all else, punished more severely by the authorities. A magistrate or judge’s sympathy in not ordering a conviction would be very unlikely.

The situation gets worse, though. Because of our society’s reticence to call a spade a spade when it comes to anti-social female sexual behavior, women progressively learn what is and what is not acceptable for them to do, within and outside the law. And the domain of acceptability, expanded by judicial decisions like the soft one involving Grecko, has become ever wider in its embrace of narcissism and attention-seeking.

A woman does not need to go as far as Grecko for massive problems to emerge. A good case study of this is SlutWalk. Its major premise is based on cloaking female attention-seeking with the false veneer of advocacy, whilst ignoring how women slut-shame females as much as (if not more than) men.

Legal pussy passes for women is a tiring circus trick

Our legal system bends over backwards to infantilize and respond to the desires of self-entitled, inveterately selfish women. It correspondingly cultivates their narcissism to the point of mental illness. What’s next? Justifying statutory rape because a woman’s maternal instincts intersected with her libido?

Sites like ROK would become largely redundant if instances like Grecko's parading around nude for sport were properly addressed by the courts and society. Because they are not, they provide never-ending fodder for commentators like us to ask, "Why is this behavior acceptable? Why is the outcome so radically different when the genders are reversed?"

The answer to both questions is simple: men have responsibility, women receive the pussy pass. Gabi Grecko is just one of many to benefit from the latter.

Read More: Silicon Valley Entrepreneur Is Target Of Public False Rape Accusation

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

BBC’s Charter Comes Under Review, Shills Come Out Of The Woodwork To Defend It

July 22, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

David Cameron’s Conservatives are to undertake a fundamental “root and branch” review of the BBC. A consultation paper released last week will set out the issues to be addressed in negotiations over the state broadcaster’s future. The report will investigate whether people who don’t pay the £145.50 annual licence fee deserve to be thrown in prison.

It will also look at the BBC’s impartiality and question what real need there is to have a state broadcaster produce soaps like EastEnders and Strictly Come Dancing.

Degenerate entertainment, funded by the state.

The reaction of the Left has been melodramatic, the Guardian newspaper and various celebrities lining up to defend the corporation. Lord Patten, a former chairman of the the BBC trust, complained that Tory culture secretary John Whittingdale had assembled an advisory panel to “bury the BBC that we love.”

Has the time come to pare down the BBC, a parasitic behemoth rendered obsolete in the age of broadly available internet and deep skepticism of official information channels? Or are the nostalgics onto something in demanding that “Auntie” continue to be underwritten by the government?

The pigs come out in defence of the trough

The strongest plea in favour of the BBC has come from, unsurprisingly, the people who make a pretty packet out of its existence. In an open letter to David Cameron, dozens of “celebs” spoke against the Tories’ planned reforms. JK Rowling, Judi Dench, and Chris Evans were among them.

The grandiose, presumption on their behalf is that “a diminished BBC would simply mean a diminished Britain.” They gushed further, calling the BBC “a very precious organisation,” which is “overwhelmingly a creative force for good.”

Keep troughing

The bureaucrats within the fortress walls piled in with even more pompous pronouncements: the Director General of the BBC, Lord Hall, gave a stern warning to the government to keep its mitts off, arguing that the Beeb must not be prevented from hiding “the next Strictly, the next Bake Off or the next Top Gear.”

Making no mention of the fact that the BBC is funded by way of a licence fee extracted from TV owners on pain of imprisonment, Lord Hall was clear on who would “lose” in the wake of any meddling with the corporate structure of the BBC:

> …the people who will lose are not the commercial interests and people with particular vested interests – it’s the people who pay for us, the people who love us. The debate is too often in terms of this interest or that interest, not in terms of the people who are, in the end, our shareholders.

With breathtaking certainty, he declared the public to have “no appetite” for a smaller BBC, and said that the “great majority” of licence fee-payers are happy to pay the current licence fee.

A cheap stunt by an empty suit

Danny Cohen, an Oxford-educated liberal shoving PC opinions down your throat with money extracted from you on pain of imprisonment

The patent ridiculousness of a state-subsidised media elite sitting making spurious attempts to defend the long-standing sacred cow that is the BBC should surprise nobody. Neither should the revelation made by broadcasting veteran Michael Palin, that the gushing pro-BBC letter co-signed by numerous celebrities and presented as "independent," was in fact a propaganda exercise organised by none other than Danny Cohen, its head of TV, who I have written about previously as being a key figure in the cultural Marxist claque militating for Jeremy Clarkson's demise.

But then again, you mights say, nothing wrong with a bit of lobbying for a good cause. Once one considers that many of the signatories of the letter rely on Cohen for work, or are, like Rachel Weisz, personal friends, the entire exercise starts to look like the desperate machinations of the head rat on a quickly sinking ship.

Palin's revelations were compounded when Sir David Attenborough, the UK's top dog for nature programming, also said he was approached to sign what has now become known as the "luvvies letter."

Tory MP Andrew Bridgend, who is leading a campaign to decriminalise non-payment of the licence fee, has called for Cohen to quit:

> Unless he resigns I shall be writing to Jesse Norman, chairman of the Culture Media and Sport Committee, on Monday asking him to call Mr Cohen before the committee to answer questions about his role in the shabby affair and to find out why he pursued a course of action that is in breach of the BBC's own lobbying guidelines.

Solipsism – the oxygen of Planet BBC

Graham Norton: an utterly talentless, disposable non-entity

The luvvies are showing no inclination whatsoever to simply roll over and die. Asked by the Daily Express whether the BBC Trust would investigate the letter, a Trust spokeswoman said: “The genesis of this letter is not a matter for the BBC Trust.” If the defiance is not enough, the Corporation is even scheming to put the country through a “deprivation test” by blacking out its services to licence payers.

The idea is to show them how much they would miss the BBC. Embittered old queen Graham Norton claimed he had pushed the “deprivation test” to Lord Hall. “Just put £24 into everyone’s bank account, and switch the BBC off for two months, and people would shit themselves,” he prophesied.

Commenters on the Guardian’s lunatic fringe gave a glimpse into left wing solipsism around favoured institutions: User “Ergolardgo” commented:

> If the BBC shut down for even just a week, the political storm it would cause would break every bone in Cameron and Whittingdale’s bodies, and leave them defeated, eviscerated husks with no political future. The Conservative party have literally no idea what a stupidly dangerous game they are playing. Cameron, allowing this BBC war to become inflamed, is behaving like the spoilt child we all know he is, not a statesman who deserves any of our respect.

Who will put the bloated BBC out of its misery?

It is not apparently clear why political careers would necessarily end and common people would convulse in paroxysms of withdrawal at the turning off the BBC. At every level, be it television, radio or web, the BBC has stiff competition from the commercial sector, who are able to offer material of equivalent quality but without a licence fee.

Even the high-brow radio offering, BBC Radio 4, which provides a high quality medley of of documentaries, talk shows, and radio plays, has its competitors: The web-savvy can tune into NRP, or even Radio France Culture if they speak French (and most of the bourgeois middlebrows who listen to Radio 4 inevitably do).

The unfortunate reality is that the BBC is a healthy cash cow for a large population of liberal intellectuals who live as parasite off the credulity and inaction of the British populace. 81 senior BBC managers now earning more than the Prime Minister.

The number of television and radio presenters in the £250,000-£500,000 salary bracket rose from 25 to 34. This class of leeches sit in sumptuous comfort dreaming up new, innovative forms of political correctness, such as referring to Islamic State as “so-called Islamic State” in order not to offend Muslims.

The entire charade is sustained by the subcontracted thugs at Capita Plc, who the BBC, not wishing to sully its starched white collar, delegates the collection of the licence fee. The tools at their disposal include threatening letters and doorstep intimidation.

3,000 people a week are prosecuted for TV Licence evasion. 32 people were jailed in 2013 for not paying the fine, while 51 were jailed in 2012. For the pinstripe suits who set the BBC up to lecture us on the moral goodness of green taxes and endless foreign aid in spite of localised austerity, these people are just “bugsplat,” a statistical irrelevance to be hand-waved aside.

But if the BBC is so wonderfully good, and so loved by the nation, surely it would survive as a commercial concern? Time to cut the umbilical cord, and let the Danny Cohens, the Lord Halls, and the Graham Nortons, sink or swim.

Read Next: Gawker Melts Down After Attempting To Out Condé Nast CFO David Geithner

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

51% Of Time Magazine Readers Voted To Ban The Word “Feminist”

July 22, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Late last year, Time Magazine was forced to apologize for including “feminist” in a poll of which word readers wanted to ban. Competing against such literary luminaries as “bae” (somehow a term of endearment for a significant other or “awesome” when applied to regular nouns), “kale” (an overhyped “superfood”), “literally” (literally the most regularly misapplied word after “like”) and “yaaasssss” (for humans who descend from snakes, probably), “feminist” won by a relative landslide, receiving 51% of the votes.

How often, aside from crooked West African or Uzbek elections, does one candidate amongst a field of 15 win a majority in the first round, especially in a nationwide, moderately leftwing publication?

Unsurprisingly, the mainstream media failed to cover this story like other news about feminism, relegating Time editor Nancy Gibb’s mea culpa to a relative non-event. Although CNN and a few other major outlets did cover it, it wasn’t a major headline. Why? Because it exposes two things: a) eternal attempts at feminist cultural indoctrination have failed and b) the public, even those reading a mainstream, run-of-the-mill, leftist-focused publication, sense that feminism is about supremacy, not equality.

To boot, it is extensively appropriated by the highest female echelons of society to cloak themselves in victimhood, despite them usually being born into privileged families (Lena Dunham), marrying powerful men (Michelle Obama) or sexualizing themselves silly (Beyoncé, Lady Gaga, and Ariana Grande).

The silent majority

Say what you want about his role in Watergate, but here's a man who realized that not all Americans believed in the self-aggrandizing fairytale of Kennedy, his wealth and Camelot.

The term "silent majority" has received constant criticism because of its association with Richard Nixon. Yet it describes a reality that continues to reverberate in both American and broader Western society. In this sense, whatever you have to say about Watergate, Nixon presciently addressed the relegation and vilification of a huge chunk of the American public.

Everyday people back then, like now, were harangued and looked down upon for questioning the turpitude of activists in the 1960s (replaced by SJWs in 2015), or simply denying that a phenomenally wealthy family like the Kennedys, or other rich Democratic do-gooders and celebrities, should be their moral and political beacon.

The Time voters who chose "feminist" are an exemplary example of this silent majority because they're reading a leftist publication. As the editor's backdown proves, the media is much more liberal than conservative, libertarian, or traditionalist. Bias from television, newspaper and online news need not only be about twisting a particular story, but rather also incorporates the range and sorts of stories that are covered in the first place.

Consequently, when you combine the media world with the universe of celebrities, huge swathes of the population are left to selectively pick enjoyment from the cultural status quo, whilst quietly repudiating many of the "causes" and "messages" shoved down their throats.

Feminist for fun (and profit)

[image]

Please clarify what male privilege I have that Lady Gaga doesn't?

Nowadays, the mainstream media accosts us with quotidian stories about mega-wealthy female celebrities branding themselves as "feminists" and calling out the so-called male privilege of $50,000-a-year men wherever it lurks in the recesses of their (the celebrities') minds.

The word feminist is not just overused; it is a caricature routinely employed by the privileged 1% themselves to garner attention and deflect any focus on their own inexplicable fortunes. It is a philosophy (if you can even call it that) perennially uprooted from reality and any semblance of proportionality.

Beyond celebrity feminism itself, George Clooney, Angelina Jolie and Co. earn $10-20 million per film, only to have the audacity to say that the system takes advantage of the poor. Instead of demanding behind the scenes (i.e. without glorifying themselves) that studio executives cut the pay checks of stars and significantly up the income of the assistants and stage workers, they take every opportunity to maintain their personal profile by calling for socialism.

The objective? To maximize their market value and attendant fame.

Is the cultural indoctrination working?

"I'm not always a socialist, but when I am, it's usually in the context of me parading in front of a camera before my next film comes out."

Time is a frequently informative publication, believe it or not. I acknowledge that many of the regular topics (including in recent years scribes lauding undesirable "personalities" such as Ellen Pao and Anita Sarkeesian) are slanted well to the left. But these are very often opinion pieces.

Though many opinion pieces masquerade as narrowly focused “news” stories, many other covers and columns do broaden your outlook, expand your knowledge base, and help you to link complex events and trends around the world. What’s more is that the publication exposes you to the sleight of hand tricks and other techniques employed by the left to stoke the emotions of many in the public.

The quagmire faced by the left and their recurring SJW allies is that liberal domination of the media, protected and reaffirmed by considerable “journalistic”, “activist” and other efforts, has not translated into the public constantly approving feminism. Run-of-the-mill folks may not be willing to stand up openly.

However, they can vote at the ballot box, use their computer mouse and, as the Tea Party and other (positively) reactionary groups show, rally with likeminded people when the right opportunities present themselves.

What scares liberals and SJWs more than the truth is the fear that the public isn’t buying their distortion of it.

Read More: 5 Uncomfortable Truths About Cracked Magazine

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Donald Trump And The Tyranny Of Feelings

July 23, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The recent overreaction to what Donald Trump said about illegal immigration is a good illustration of what is wrong with our society as a whole and our political discourse in particular. We've lost the ability to use reason to make an argument.

Now the focus is no longer on what was said, but whether our progressive elite deems it as offensive.

What Trump Said

Kate Steinle and her alleged murderer, illegal immigrant Juan Francisco Lopez-Sanchez

In Trump's presidential candidacy announcement he said the following:

> When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending their best. They're not sending you. They're not sending you. They're sending people that have lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems with us. They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people.

Trump also said that if he were elected he would build a wall across the US-Mexico border, and that he would make Mexico pay for the building of it.

Illegal immigration was not the only topic Trump addressed. He also talked about making better trade deals and bringing more manufacturing back to the United States. He talked about the need for the United States to actually start winning wars again, and about defeating Islamic terrorism.

But the press, fellow republicans, and the democrats ignored all of these other points. They were totally fixated on Trump's transgression: he violated the Social Justice Warrior (SJW) rules of what can and cannot be said. He had the balls to say aloud what a lot of people are thinking in private.

The Social Justice Warrior Reaction

Univision's President of Programming, Alberto Ciurana, posted this picture to his Instagram comparing Trump to alleged Charleston shooter Dylan Roof

The SJW response to Trump's comments was swift and unprecedented. The difference from the usual SJW faux rage was that it was not limited to social media. This time large companies and city governments have mobilized to punish Trump for speaking his mind even if it means exposing themselves to breach of contract lawsuits.

The first strike was the Spanish cable channel Univision's refusal to broadcast the Miss USA contest, which is owned by Trump. In doing this, Univision showed no concern about dashing the hopes of the young women, several of whom are Latinas. Trump responded by slapping Univision with a $500 million breach of contract lawsuit. He also found a new home for the contest on the Reelz channel.

Shortly after the Univision incident, NBC announced that it was "firing" Trump from Celebrity Apprentice. The announcement was more of public relations gesture than a true firing because Trump had already given the network notice that he was no longer able to participate in the series because of his commitment to run for president.

The next move was by the department store Macy's, which decided to stop selling its line of Donald Trump ties. According to Trump, the line only generated token revenue for him, but the meaning of the gesture was clear.

It gets worse for Trump. Both Washington D.C. and New York City announced that they were reviewing their contracts with Trump's companies to see if they could punish Trump for his politically incorrect statements.

The Republican Reaction

Most of the other republican candidates have treated the Trump campaign as a joke, even though he quickly surpassed all of them in the polls. When asked about Trump, Jeb Bush simply chuckled as though Trump's comments were so outrageous that they didn't even bear being acknowledged.

The only GOP candidates that have admitted that Trump may have a point are Ted Cruz and Carly Fiorina who said that Trump, "taps into an anger that I hear every day. People are angry that a common-sense thing like securing the border or ending sanctuary cities is somehow considered extreme. It's not extreme, it's common sense."

Why this is a problem

Jamiel Shaw Jr. – Murdered by an illegal immigrant

What's missing in all of this is any rebuttal of what Trump actually said. No one has come forward to argue that illegal immigrants commit crime at the same rate as middle class American citizens. Instead all the rage is aimed at silencing Trump without answering his objection.

I suspect that the reason that no one is making the argument is that there might be some truth to what Trump said.

The problem with not permitting free discussion on uncomfortable topics is that we will be forced to accept the SJW position on all issues without dissent. But the very reason that the founders of the United States placed such a high value on free speech was so that all ideas could be widely circulated and freely debated.

SJWs have foisted a tyranny of feelings upon the American people. If someone can say they are hurt "because feelz," no further debate on a topic is permitted.

It simply isn't possible to govern a large, highly diverse, multicultural nation without offending some group at some time. I am sure that Japanese Americans were offended by how the Japanese were portrayed during World War II. I have a Muslim friend who is offended by the fact that Christian Americans associate terrorism with Islam. I also know Serbians who were very offended by the US bombing of Yugoslavia during the Kosovo War in 1995.

It is the same with the US-Mexican border. If the US starts enforcing border controls again, certain people will feel hurt, but if it keeps the border wide open other people will suffer. Why are Americans forbidden from discussing this issue?

My Thoughts

I was a fan of Trump long before he announced his presidential campaign. For me, his alpha male swagger captures the American spirit of the past. A time when Americans felt bold, dreamed of great accomplishments, and didn't have to walk around with their tails tucked between their legs for fear of triggering someone.

I can see how what Trump said could be offensive to Americans of Mexican descent, especially if they have relatives who have moved to the US illegally. There are several good reasons for restricting illegal immigration that do not involve implying that many immigrants are criminals, but they are more difficult to explain.

By focusing on a visceral issue such as crime, Trump made an effective appeal directly to voters' emotions. It strikes me as being an astute political strategy and Trump's poll numbers confirm that it was.

Trump's candidacy also brings out an uncomfortable fact—there is really little difference between the republican and democratic parties. The fighting between them is simply elaborate kabuki theatre to keep the proles busy arguing amongst themselves. As soon as you get a person who freely speaks his mind, both parties attack him.

Ultimately, as The Black Swan author Nassim Taleb points out, Donald Trump reminds us what it is like to be a free man. Not too long ago, any man in the US would have been able to say what Trump said without fear of retribution. Those days are gone. It leads me to ask, are we really free anymore?

By the way, I disagree with Taleb on Trump's intelligence. Morons rarely amass a nine billion dollar fortune.

Conclusion

Before he was banned from Twitter by SJWs, blogger Heartiste tweeted that if you don't know who to vote for, vote for the guy with the hottest wife because, despite his flaws, he is doing something right. I concur.

As I write this, both the progressive left and the republicans have stepped up their efforts to push Trump out of the race. Every mainstream "conservative" commentator I have read thinks that Trump candidacy is over. I hope "The Donald" proves them wrong.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The End Result Of Social Equality Is Tyranny

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Swedish University Guilty Of Discriminating Against Male Scholars

July 23, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Mid Sweden University has to pay 25,000 crowns (roughly $2,900 USD) in damages to one of its male employees. The man, a lecturer at the university, was discriminated against because of his gender when he couldn't apply for grants which were given exclusively to female scientists.

According to the university, female professors are underrepresented in its faculty of human sciences. Therefore, the school wanted to even out the difference by handing out money to female scholars only. The Equality Ombudsman, however, was not impressed by the university's "good intentions," and took the man's case to court.

Too much equality

The Equality Ombudsman says that Swedish law allows for affirmative action as a way to make workplaces more gender equal. Yet, by excluding men entirely from being able to receive the grants, Mid Sweden University took it a step too far. The court agreed and recently came to a decision in favor of the man.

Although the university was sued for 50,000 crowns, the man will only be getting half of that amount. According to the court's ruling, the damage he suffered was not very severe. The two grants in question, handed out during 2014 and 2015, were for 750,000 crowns each. The university says it will not continue to give grants exclusively to women.

Mid Sweden University.

A system rigged against men

This was not the first time that Mid Sweden University discriminated against men. In fact, it has been passing out these women-only grants for the last ten years, apparently without any qualms about them being purposefully sexist. And the school is not alone in doing it.

According to the independent organization Centre for Justice, unlawful discrimination against men is common at Swedish universities. A study by the organization, examining the last five years, shows that more than half of universities have had a similar sexist system of handing out grants as Mid Sweden University.

Centre for Justice writes that the law is "crystal clear" on this issue, and continues:

> It is a serious matter when government agencies systematically violate the Discrimination Act's demand for equal treatment and prohibition against discrimination.

In court, Mid Sweden University defended its actions. According to the school, it was working for the "entirely legitimate purpose" of creating a "better gender balance" among its professors. The school also took into account "societal values," and demands from the government.

Since Mid Sweden University is run by the government, it needs to meet certain goals every year to receive financing. From 2012 to this year, at least 32 percent of professors hired by the school have had to be female. Many other universities face the same kind of requirements.

Of the professors hired by Södertörn University, for example, a minimum of 45 percent must be female. It is no wonder that Swedish schools practice affirmative action when their very existence, in terms of receiving their checks from the government, depends on it.

A modest proposal

Caitlyn Jenner—a role model for Swedish males?

So what does a male scholar have to do to get by in this Swedish climate of sexism towards his kind? One modest proposal is that he simply changes his gender a la the great role model of our time, Caitlyn Jenner. Not only would universities throw money at him—sorry, her—and treat her with as much privilege as any other female, but she would also be hailed by the mainstream media as outstandingly courageous.

Other males would then follow the scholar's lead and soon academia would be permeated with cross-dressing, fabulous (but rather big boned) "women."

All jokes aside, the issue of affirmative action is serious and should actually be opposed by both men and women. For men, it's a matter of getting the job they deserve and not be discriminated for the way they were born. For women, it's a matter of personal pride and dignity. In the case of the employer, getting the best person for the job should be his or her number one priority. Merits, not sex, are what qualify a candidate for a position.

Elsa Kugelberg, editorial writer for Dagens Nyheter, has taken a firm stance against affirmative action. In a recent column, she writes:

> If you give women a special support it signals that they by definition are worse—they need to be pampered to be able to get anywhere in this world. That attitude will if anything deter women from a scholarly career, or at least attract them for the wrong reasons.

Unfortunately, not all Swedes are as fair-minded and reasonable as Elsa Kugelberg. Since she is woman, though, people will hopefully be more open to what she has to say about this subject.

Forces for good and evil

One way to see it is that this story brings both good news and bad news. First the bad news: There is institutionalized discrimination against men in Swedish academia. Lots of people know about it yet choose to do nothing in the face of actual, unadulterated injustice. Only when it’s called out as illegal do the guilty ones show any sign of regret or understanding of their wrongdoing.

Now to the good news: there are forces working for good. Swedish law is flawed, but the legal system still punishes the most outright offences. Independent groups like Centre for Justice do what they can to shine a light on cases where individuals are penalized not because they acted badly, but because they belong to the wrong group.

Yes, there are forces working in our favor. Forces that work for justice, for its own sake. That’s right: not social justice, but true justice.

Read More: The Final Verdict On Swedish Girls

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

How To Gain Size And Strength On Super Mandro

July 23, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by John Doe Bodybuilding

I have no idea how Super Mandro is legal. It works so well that it probably won't be legal for long. But let me start at the beginning…

You may have read my article on Hypershock Rage and Joyful Joints.

In that article I spoke of something else that I would review once I got a little further into it – and that something else is Super Mandro.

I'm going to be 100% honest with you on this product – I'll give you the good, the bad, the ugly, and the absolute SICK on Super Mandro!

First, I was sent Super Mandro by Strong Supplements. I received Super Mandro for free and this is my honest review.

If I think something sucks then I won't talk about it, if I think it rocks then I'll share it with you.

I told them I wanted something for body recomposition and Super Mandro is what they sent me.

So I started Super Mandro along with my 150mg per week testosterone dosage. When I started using this I was 216 lbs first thing in the morning. It's been only twenty days; I weighed 231 lbs this morning.

That's right, I AM UP 15 LBS IN 20 MOTHERFUCKING DAYS!

I wouldn't believe it if you told me either. But here is the thing; I didn't even change the diet.

And here is the other thing; it's all dry gains!!

People normally gain this kind of weight on Anadrol-50 or Dianabol and it's sloppy weight. Not on this shit! The first week I noticed a slight increase in strength and a few lbs on the scale. I didn't feel much different other than a little stronger in the gym.

The second week

Now for the second week on Super Mandro; major increases in strength across the board and more mass gain. However, I was aggressive as hell and as irritable as ever.

Seriously, I felt like I could snap at a moments notice and break someones neck. If you are someone who is aggressive by nature then you may want to avoid this one. This is not for the weak and not for the first time supplement user.

Super Mandro is extremely potent and I honestly have no idea how it's not illegal.

What kept me on this stuff was two things;

1. The insane rate of size and strength I was achieving

2. Knowing it was only a four week cycle.

I had days where I was literally dumping pills out and counting them to see how many days I had left so I could stop using it and keep from killing someone!!

Pissed off is an understatement on Super Mandro, but the gains are so fucking insane I had to stay on it and at least see it out.

I have 10 days left on super Mandro and I have no idea how much more I can gain in another week and a half. I've already slapped on 15 lbs of dry weight in just 20 days.

Now, if you decide to order this stuff I'm going to caution you on a couple things.

First off, it has to be run with another base as recommended. You definitely want to run it with Dermacrine or Andro the Giant. I'm serious on that! I was running it alongside 150mg of testosterone per week and I experienced a loss of sex drive and slight lethargy.

DO NOT USE WITHOUT ANOTHER TEST PROMOTING BASE LIKE ANDRO THE GIANT!!

DO NOT USE WITHOUT POST CYCLE THERAPY LIKE DERMACRINE!!!

At the very minimum you want to use the add-ons that Strong Supplement recommends, especially for your 30 days of PCT! I'm being brutally honest here guys, this shit can be rough.

It has taken a little dedication to stay on this stuff and the insane gains are what is keeping me using it.

In 10 more days it's over with and honestly there is no fucking way I could tolerate it any longer, I want to tear someones head off on this shit!

I believe this product is very similar to the old 1-AD everyone was gaining like crazy on (before it was banned).

But you know how it goes, go ahead and ban something and a new product comes out that is even more effective than the first. That is exactly what Hard Rock Supplements has done with Super Mandro.

One of the key ingredients in Super Mandro is Bergamottin, a compound that allows more of this product to be absorbed into your system without being broken down, and the product hits you faster.

From my understanding this is a chemical found naturally in grapefruit, which is why medicine bottles advise you not to take meds with grapefruit juice, because it acts more potent. But hey, when it comes to muscle more potent isn't a bad thing right?

So there is my honest take on Super Mandro, and I still have ten days left on it.

A while back I did a review on Osta-shred and Anafuse.

I'm sure some of you would like to know the difference between the two and my personal opinion on them in comparison to Super Mandro.

Super Mandro vs Anafuse / Osta-Shred

If I was looking to strictly cut up and use something on a little more long term basis that was smooth and steady, I'd have to go with Anafuse and Osta-shred.

You'll get a good and hard look from those without the side effect of wanting to snap 24/7.

However, if you're wanting to gain mad size and strength in the quickest amount of time possible; Super Mandro wins this one.

You'll be a motherfucking beast on this shit, but it's not for the weary, trust me on that one!

PROOF: Here's a photo of me up 15 lbs in only 20 days and wanting to kill!!

[image]

Train insane!!!

Over and out,

-John

>> You can buy Super Mandro here.

PPS – Here'a a video of me deadlifting 585 lbs for reps while on Super Mandro!!

Advertise Your Site Or Product On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The American Conservative Establishment Is Collapsing

July 24, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s time to stick a fork in the American conservative establishment. Within five years, their collective influence and power will be less than Kim Kardashian in terms of affecting culture and politics. They have made so many blunders and mistakes in the past twenty years that their survival is now impossible.

Conservatives exist in the same way that a 500 pound woman with a failing heart is somehow able to perform the necessary muscle contractions in her arms to draw pizza and ice cream to her mouth hole. All that will be soon left out of existing conservative groups in the media and government are the hardline neoconservatives due to the high funding they receive from wealthy sponsors.

A book can be written on why American conservatism is failing, but here are the cliff notes:

1. They became a puppet of Israeli interests. They manipulated America into costly Middle Eastern wars that the people did not want, decreasing everyone’s standard of living while alienating genuine Christian conservatives.

2. They became scared of losing their existing elite privileges. Once positioned in high stations in Washington and New York, their mentality went from “how can we win” to “how can we not lose what we have”? Trying to merely maintain political status is a loser’s strategy that makes you afraid of taking risks while being overeager to make backroom deals with your enemy that cements your power and selfish interests instead of serving your conservative constituency.

3. To defeat the left, they adopted a strategy of becoming more like the left. Every time the deranged liberal establishment pushed for more insanity, the conservatives were only two steps behind. Here is the pattern that has played itself out for the past couple of decades…

- the left finds some way to make our culture more degenerate than Rome at its worst (abortion on demand, free birth control for every fertile young woman, gender equality, gay marriage)
- the Republicans whine about it for the cameras without taking any action to stop it
- they accept big donations from the same organizations that are also supplying the left
- they accept the left's position in a pathetic attempt to appeal to single women and Hispanics, completing their transition to cuckservative status (I wouldn't be surprised if you told me the Republicans are now fielding their own transsexual candidate for Congress)

Conservative response when rainbow lights hit the White House

If you're a conservative presented at the voting booth with one option that seems to be a representation of the devil himself and the other that is trying to be more like the devil, what do you do? You stay home, simmer in anger, and go to the gun range, wondering what is going on to a country that was founded on Puritan religious values. The only reason that Republicans are still being voted for is because so many fear Democratic rule.

It's safe now to consider Republicans as controlled opposition, especially when you see that both parties get their money from nearly identical sources. In fact, the only reason the Republicans still exist is because wealthy pro-Israel sponsors don't trust the Democrats to serve their homeland, something that Obama's recent Iran deal clearly proves. There is a split in the Jewish elite that we don't hear about, where secular Jon Stewart Jews are battling it out with Likud Jews for influence of American politics. In case you didn't know, any discussion of Jewish interests or planning is "anti-semitism," as I personally found out.

What we have now is two parties that are nearly identical in social and cultural policies. I saw this recently with my own eyes when I paid a friendly visit to a "right of center" think tank in New York City. On the surface they seem to be opposed to the Democrats, but after talking to them for two hours, I could come to no other conclusion than them being standard issue liberals, and I told them this directly. They did not object to my assessment.

Their resident rock star feminist, who to her credit is slightly sympathetic to the plight of men, is less knowledgeable about gender relations than a senior Return Of Kings commenter, and some of my manosphere 101 talking points, of which have been openly discussed for many years in these parts, were new to her. I left that meeting with less hope than before because it's clear that the conservative "elite" are more clueless than we are, have no fight in them to defeat liberals, and share more overlap with social justice warriors than Christian traditional conservatives. You know it's bad when a reputable conservative think tank in New York City is taking notes and ideas from yours truly, the son of immigrant blue-collar parents.

I read through some of the think tank's materials and the only consistent idea I can find is an endearing defense of anything that is good for Jewish interests. I don't care much about this one way or the other, but they do not speak for American conservatives or even the American people, and they are but one of dozens of "conservative" organizations that are making calls from the same playbook. They don't want to defeat the left because they are the left. Proof of this is the fact that they hobnob with liberals in their social circles, hoping to get published in the New York Times when their newest book is released after receiving a healthy signing bonus from one of the publishing houses that reside a few floors up from their fancy offices. It's not cheap to maintain a luxurious New York City lifestyle, I hear.

Prominent American neoconservatives

Because of the nearly identical overlap that now exists between the Democrats and Republicans, there is no reason for the Republican party to exist based on a difference of the Israeli question alone. What will happen is a strong pro-Israel portion of the Democratic party will be generously funded to ensure Israel's safety, permitting the complete collapse of the Republican establishment. The neoconservatives will still exist, centered around David Horowitz, Bill Kristol and friends, but Christian conservatives, jaded and angry, will not at all be receptive to their message. They will only get support from millionaires and billionaires, whose influence in manipulating the minds of the masses is decreasing every day as ideas and beliefs that share strong overlap with our own have become an unstoppable juggernaut.

What we'll end up seeing is a strong Democratic party with far left social and cultural policies but neoconservative foreign policy, which besides a couple "mistakes" by Obama concerning Iran and Palestine, is what we already have right now. The Republicans are so hopeless that it's just a matter of time until they fully back an open borders Presidential candidate who is married to a Mexican woman that doesn't even speak English.

The clearest symptom of Republican failure is the candidacy of Donald Trump. Whether you agree with him or not, he is speaking the language of American conservatives and white men. Of course both parties will make every attempt to stop him, and they will likely succeed for 2016, but the fact that that he has so much support in spite of the relentless media attacks against him, even from conservative outlets like The Daily Caller and Fox News, clearly displays how America is hungry—if not starving—for a true conservative candidate that has been denied them by the corrupt and traitorous Republicans for so many years. If there is a God, I have no doubt that he selected Trump to be the first of many martyrs to save this country.

When existing Republicans and conservatives get absorbed by various Democratic and pro-Israeli neoconservative groups, there will be a huge vacuum that allows for the rise of new forces on the right. Those groups will certainly be anti-immigration and anti-multiculturalism, meaning that the seeds of traditional conservatism and white nationalism have firmly been planted, and the left has even foolishly given them a banned flag to rally behind. The imminent rise in white nationalists mean there will be intense “social friction” between them and illegal immigrants in the near future. I won’t support violence to accomplish our goals, but I will back traditional conservatism under the banner of neomasculinity as a necessary counter-balance to the far left, a balance that the existing Republican party has proved utterly impotent in providing.

The existing sociopathic elite will not be willing to relinquish their power or let new conservative groups win at the polls. A quick look at how the ruling class of Greece has shamelessly gone against the will of the Greek people in their EU-exit referendum is a hint of how the powder keg will explode in America. It will be a battle between the coastal elites and the conservative heartland, and the only question I wonder is if the rebellion will be done under the banner of Christianity or not (it should, since atheists do not possess the necessary morality and societal templates to sustain a healthy nation). I predict we have an over 50% chance of a genuine secession attempt by a middle America state in the next 15 years that requires the call-up of national guard forces.

The timeline to these events are moving quite fast, and groups on the right, including ourselves, will have to ramp up their organization efforts if they desire political power, because the collapse of the existing conservative establishment will accelerate after they lose the 2016 elections. I’m not sure what role neomasculinity will play after their collapse, but there will be power up for grabs. It’s time we do some serious soul searching, and ask ourselves how far we’re ready to go to put out the fires that will surely burn in America. May fortune favor the bold.

Read Next: The Damaging Effects Of Jewish Intellectualism And Activism On Western Culture

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Philosophical Approaches To Proving The Existence Of God

July 24, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

Atheist polemicists portray religious faith as an irrational belief that has no supporting evidence at all. Theists reply that of course there is evidence for the existence of God, the atheists respond that it's not real evidence, and round and round they go. It's not my purpose here to convert you to Christianity, although I'd be gratified if my writings played a part in that, however small. I suspect most RoK readers already have strong, settled opinions on the question of God's existence.

My aim is to briefly outline the classical arguments for the existence of God. Some of these arguments are incomprehensible to the secular modern, as they assume a classical background in philosophy and theology, but that says more about the secular modern education system than it does about the arguments.

Christianity is integral to Western tradition over the past 2,000 years and all men should have a basic knowledge of why our ancestors believed what they did.

The Ontological Argument

Anselm of Canterbury

St. Anselm of Canterbury (1033 – 1109) was probably the greatest mind of the Latin Church between St. Augustine of Hippo and St. Thomas Aquinas. As Archbishop, he came into conflict with the English Kings William II and Henry I, the sons of William the Conqueror, and was sent into exile on two occasions. He is chiefly remembered in philosophy and theology circles for creating the Ontological Argument for God. The argument can be found in Anselm's work Proslogium:

> [Even a] fool, when he hears of … a being than which nothing greater can be conceived … understands what he hears, and what he understands is in his understanding…. And assuredly that, than which nothing greater can be conceived, cannot exist in the understanding alone. For suppose it exists in the understanding alone: then it can be conceived to exist in reality; which is greater…. Therefore, if that, than which nothing greater can be conceived, exists in the understanding alone, the very being, than which nothing greater can be conceived, is one, than which a greater can be conceived. But obviously this is impossible. Hence, there is no doubt that there exists a being, than which nothing greater can be conceived, and it exists both in the understanding and in reality.

In layman's terms, the argument can be summarized like this: By definition, God is a being than which none greater can be imagined; God exists as an idea in the mind; a being that exists as an idea in the mind and in reality is, everything else being equal, greater than a being that exists only in the mind; thus, if God only exists in the mind then we can imagine something greater than God; but we cannot imagine a being greater than God because it is incoherent to say we can imagine a being greater than the greatest possible being; therefore God exists.

Rene Descartes also devised an ontological argument for God's existence grounded in his philosophical concepts of innate ideas and clear and distinct perception: I have an idea of a supremely perfect being; existence is necessary of perfection; therefore a supremely perfect being exists.

When most people hear the Ontological Argument for the first time, it strikes them as wrong somehow. They feel like they've been tricked even if they lack the philosophical language to pinpoint how exactly. If you don't find the Ontological Argument compelling, neither did St. Thomas Aquinas or Immanuel Kant, so you're in good company.

The Teleological Argument

The First Vatican Council (1869-1870) declared in its canons:

> If anyone says that the one, true God, our creator and lord, cannot be known with certainty from the things that have been made, by the natural light of human reason: let him be anathema.

In other words, Catholics are doctrinally bound to believe that the existence of God can be proven through reason alone (even a reactionary extremist like me can appreciate the irony there.) The notion that God's existence can be proven through created things is rooted in St. Paul's letter to the Romans:

> For the invisible things of him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; his eternal power also, and divinity: so that they [non-believers] are inexcusable.

St. Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274) devised five proofs for the existence of God. Unlike the Ontological Argument, which is rooted in pure concepts, Thomas relies on sense experience to guide his readers to the conclusion.

Thomas offers the proof from motion: we observe motion all around us. Whatever is in motion was once at rest until moved by something else, and that thing by something else, and so on. But if there is an infinite series of movers, motion never would have started and there would be no motion now. There is motion now, so there must be a first unmoved mover. This we call God.

The proof from efficient cause: everything in the world was made by something. Apple made your computer. Your parents made you. Again, if there were an infinite series of efficient causes, then nothing would have ever been started. But obviously we're here so there has to be a first unmade maker. This we call God.

The proof from necessary being: there was a time when you and I did not exist. There will come a time when you and I no longer exist in this world. We are contingent beings, which means we do not exist necessarily. If existence is contingent, then there was once a time when nothing had yet come to be. Nothing comes from nothing, but because there is something now, there must be at least one necessary being, which we call God.

The proof from gradations of perfection: we evaluate all people and things in terms of how good, true, and beautiful they are. We have standards on how things and people ought to be. But those standards wouldn't make sense unless we had a concept of that which is the most good, true, and beautiful. This we call God.

And finally, the argument from design: we observe design all around us. The bird's wing is designed for flight, the human eye is designed for seeing, the earth's environment is designed to support human life, and so on. Design implies a designer, and that designer is God.

We can see the influence of Aristotle in these five arguments. For that reason they are called teleological arguments because they presuppose meaning and purpose in creation (for example, Aristotle and Thomas would say that the telos of an acorn is to grow into an oak tree.)

David Hume responded that it's a faulty analogy to compere the universe to man-made objects. We have not witnessed a universe being designed so we cannot be certain that it's the result of design. Further, he argued that if nature itself contains the principle of order then the need for a designer is removed. Even if the universe is designed, Hume says it does not follow that the designer is the Christian God. I find Hume's objections unconvincing, but I include them because he was a much better class of religious critic than the average SJW of today.

The Moral Argument

Immanuel Kant (1724 – 1804) famously objected to the Ontological Argument by stating that existence is not a predicate. He believed that all theoretical approaches to the question of God would fail because the nature of God transcends pure human reason.

Kant sought to ground both morality and God's existence in practical human reason. However, it should be noted that Kant's argument is less about God and more about justice in the hereafter: moral behavior is rational; it is only rational if justice is done; justice will only be done if God exists; therefore, God exists.

Obviously there is a lot of evil in this world. Sometimes crime pays. Bad things happen to good people, and good things happen to bad people. Kant believed that if morality was nothing but a cost-benefit analysis, many more people would choose evil if it was to their personal benefit. Like Pascal's Wager, Kant's argument is meant to influence our behavior in this world in expectation of judgment in the next world. If people are to choose happiness and virtue – the summum bonum – the afterlife must exist.

Cardinal John Henry Newman (1801 – 1890) argued from the existence of our conscience. Our conscience drives us to choose good even when it's not in our best interest. If our conscience suggests the objectivity of moral truths, then God must exist to give those truths normative force.

Conclusions

I converted to the Catholic faith at the age of 24, so I don't claim to be a disinterested observer in this debate. To be sure, many men believe in God because they were raised that way and they've never seriously questioned it. Similarly, many men weren't raised in any particular faith and they've never seriously questioned their own secularism.

In a real sense, the existence or non-existence of God is the question upon which everything else hinges. Dostoyevsky said through the character of Ivan Karamazov that if God does not exist, then everything is permissible.

Anselm's motto was "Fides Quaerens Intellectum," or faith seeking understanding. Thomas taught that some truths can be known through faith and reason, but some truths can only be known through faith. Faith in God drove men to create some of humanity's greatest artistic, philosophical, and political achievements. You may not believe, but most of your ancestors did. It was in the very air they breathed.

It's a common place of atheist polemicists that religion has killed more people than any other force on earth. Even minimally educated readers should see that's nonsense. Stalin alone killed more people than the Spanish Inquisition did in the 300 years of its existence. Christianity in particular has been declining in the West for at least a century. Is the world that much better for it?

Read More: The Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers

Andrew Levinson
Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

Immigrant Single Mother Demands More Than $1,000 A Month In Welfare

July 24, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Agnieszka Swiatlowska has high expectations. And she wants guys like you and me to pay for them. The largely unemployed Polish immigrant to Australia, who has a young school-age son, currently receives $530 per fortnight as a new Australian citizen. But she wants more and is demanding she gets it.

Non-citizen Australian permanent residents must wait 104 weeks to receive certain extra welfare payments. So Swiatlowska will have more than her current $530 come this September. She became a naturalized citizen in March but this does not affect the waiting period for migrants.

Unversed in the responsibility of a country to look after its own citizens, and avoid people using newly acquired Australian citizenship as a cash cow, Swiatlowska claims she is being discriminated against and that the government made a “mistake,” despite the law being incontrovertibly clear. She must wait, as she’s both a recent permanent resident and new Australian citizen (how did she get in?).

Swiatlowska’s trump card is that she’s a single mother. After all, why should women have to make sure that they can support a child before they get pregnant? That would be asking far too much!

Yes… because the vast majority of children raised by single parents end up like this?

After our Poland-residing Roosh, I declare myself ROK's resident Polish expert. Despite strong economic forecasts, including the biggest long-term growth rate of any major EU country, Poland's welfare system is much less generous than Australia's. Although I was pleasantly surprised at the relative rate of support Poland affords many of its students and disabled, the best thing for a Pole is steady employment.

By contrast, in Western Europe, the United States, Canada, and Australia, people may earn more from a job, but the relative difference between working and living at the expense of the state is more marginal. Surely Swiatlowska sensed this. Whilst she may be genuinely unemployed or underemployed, the safety net of the welfare state clearly solidified her desire to stay in Australia, especially with a very young son.

Australia isn't the only case

If Swiatlowska thinks she's in hardship, try being a senior citizen on a pension. Unlike them, Swiatlowska can physically work, if she gets rid of the emotional sense of entitlement, that is.

The United States and Britain, and to a large extent Germany, are now the world's largest beehives for migrants looking for a welfare state or other honey. Understandably, these countries erect barriers and impose limits to prevent opportunistic individuals, who number in the hundreds of thousands and millions, from emigrating to their lands and living on the public teat and at the expense of everyone else.

Sadly for Great Britain, do-gooder European Union laws and regulations regarding the free movement of people make stopping this a truly gargantuan task. In the United States, the debate about illegal immigration and its attendant costs has regressed to the point where opponents of the southern US border being effectively open are labeled as intransigent racists and bigots.

Likewise, the United States' dazzling debt, nearly $20 trillion, has not stopped Democrats and their SJW allies from ramping up the welfare state to its highest ever levels.

In a world where we are surrounded by so many cases of victimhood, including the highly disabled, cognitively impaired, and others in our own neighbourhoods, it riles me, as it should you as readers, that able-bodied women like Swiatlowska spend their time shouting from their own self-made pedestal instead of exploring every avenue for a job.

What else can we expect, though? Having fed people the dream for years that government should support them, above all single mothers, individuals are merely taking up the promised offers.

Swiatlowska has tried to grab headlines before

Attention seeker on the right.

Excuse my incredulity about her genuineness, but Swiatlowska seems to be a compulsive attention seeker. Few, if any of the news stories about her recent grab for more welfare money discussed her previous involvement with the media. She had fronted Australia's only truly national newspaper, aptly named The Australian, to declare she wanted surrogate grandparents for her young son. And so the Saint of Single Motherhood finds yet another platform.

On the one hand, in most instances I would applaud a search for elderly role models. Senior citizens generally have much more common sense, have worked harder throughout their lives and have more quality life experiences, even on a per year basis, than those of us growing up in newer generations characterized by surrounding social and political decay.

When read with the welfare story, however, you can start to believe that Swiatlowska only wants the entire community, whether other individuals, her ex-partner, or the state, to attend to needs of hers that most people take (and simply must take) care of themselves. For every one Swiatlowska who goes to the media or kicks up a similar public stink, another hundred or thousand ply their mollycoddled trade of "Why me?" behind the scenes in normal life.

We must stop the rot

Swiatlowska claims she has the skills, so why is no one employing her? I wonder why…

The debacle unfolding now in Greece, as it has for years, demonstrates what decades of over-reliance on the welfare state does not only to countries, but also to the societies that breathe life into them. The United States, Canada, Great Britain, Australia and other nations are on the same precipice that Greece ignored at the start of the century when joining the Eurozone.

Someone criticizing even a “me, me, me” person like Agnieszka Swiatlowska risks social castration for their perceived lack of empathy, sexism, and privilege. But if the brave don’t sound the alarms for society, who will?

We are living in truly scary times. Designed as a safety valve to divert assistance to those who truly needed it, the welfare state is sucking the marrow from the bones of once proud and self-reliant communities. No matter how independent you are, no matter how much you have earned your station in life, the collapse of states dependent on welfare will ruin your existence as well.

Be warned.

Read More: You’re A Monster If You Don’t Support The Welfare State

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Another Overreaction Over Race Leads To The Dismissal Of ESPN's Colin Cowherd

July 25, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

On Friday afternoon, ESPN announced that their #1 radio talk show host, Colin Cowherd, would be taken off the air because of his comments regarding the educational system in the Dominican Republic. They mistakenly listened to the outraged masses who took his comments as a racial slur demeaning the intelligence of Major League Baseball players that hail from the small country in the Caribbean.

Here's how it happened:

Thursday morning as I was driving to a local 7-Eleven listening to The Herd with Colin Cowherd on ESPN Radio when the host, Colin Cowherd, dropped this little nugget:

> It's baseball. You don't think a general manager can manage? Like it's impossible? The game is too complex? I've never bought into that, 'Baseball's just too complex.' Really? A third of the sport is from the Dominican Republic. The Dominican Republic has not been known in my lifetime as having world-class academic abilities. A lot of those kids come from rough backgrounds and have not had opportunities academically that other kids from other countries have.

As soon as he said it I chuckled to myself: "Well that's gonna piss a few people off." But after that I never gave it a second thought because a) Cowherd was already on his way out having signed a new contract with Fox Sports and just playing out the string with ESPN and b) I knew he didn't insult anybody.

Well I was wrong about the latter. Usually I can see faux outrage coming but this one blindsided me to be sure. The first person to stoke the flames of Colin's "racist rant" was Toronto Blue Jays Outfielder, Jose Bautista who is Dominican.

What followed was the usual incredulous overreaction to a comment that was not only not racist, but 100% true. The Dominican Republic does have a shitty educational system, and Cowherd simply pointed out that if Dominican players who come to this country with fifth grade educations can dominate baseball, then baseball isn't as complex as these so-called baseball "purists" would lead you to believe. It's as simple as that.

Cowherd was back on the air on Friday and addressed the controversy head on, as is his M.O. He stated that a number of people had reached out to him for clarification of his comments the day before including ESPN Columnist and television personality, Israel Gutierrez, who is of Dominican descent.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=TYeplpTZhDQ

He even called on Jose Bautista himself to come on air with him to discuss the issue with him directly. I wasn't able to listen to the whole program but as far as I know, neither Gutierrez or Bautista made an appearance on The Herd. That didn't stop Cowherd from clarifying his remarks on air:

> ...I don't think I should be defined by 16 seconds of a minute rant edited on a site owned by a blog company currently in a hundred million dollar law suit for airing improprer audio and video tape...
>
> ...I'm not here to double down. But I think I have a right to run the entire tape.
>
> ...can we stop with the "I don't get the sport because it's too complex?"
>
> ...I don't think I have to be Steven Hawking to understand baseball

He later added that sometimes his tone stinks and that he gets that. But he clarified that we are lucky to be in America, whereas Dominicans are unlucky to hail from a country with economic strife which creates educational hurdles.

There isn't so much as a hint of a racial undertone in his narrative, yet, headlines from sea to shining sea read "Cowherd fired because of racist comments about Dominicans."

The difference between "uneducated" and "stupid"

The sad truth is that people throw around the word racism any time anyone uses a group of people from a different race as an example to make a broader point. If I were white, and said that "black people aren't as educated as white people in this country" there's no doubt in my mind that I'd be met with the usual lynch mob calling me a racist and that I called black people stupid.

But if people would take a minute, read between the lines, and show some temperance in squeezing the race trigger, they'd realize that I didn't call black people stupid, but rather said they are simply less educated.

And therein lies the disconnect. There is a huge difference between uneducated and stupid. A college degree doesn't make someone smart anymore than the lack of a degree makes one stupid.

Having this doesn't make you smart

Case in point: I worked for a mattress company in Atlanta before coming west. My job was to drive a 24′ box truck and drop mattresses off at various warehouses around the city. The man I worked for was nothing short of brilliant. His business acumen, attention to detail, and rock solid frame earned my respect very quickly. To this day, I've never worked for anyone as smart as this guy.

His education level? He dropped out of high school after his sophomore year and never went back for his GED.

I'm a pretty sharp guy who went to college and fashion myself a pretty intelligent individual, and it has nothing to do with my education. I still don't hold a candle to the high school dropout I worked for in the ATL. Not even close.

The point is that Cowherd didn't call Dominicans dumb, he called them uneducated. There is a difference. SJWs should all be smart enough to know the difference before they stupidly start calling for people's jobs.

The truth hurts

It's silly that SJWs and Dominicans have lost their minds over a statement that rings true. Forney recently pointed out that remarks don't piss people off unless there's a measure of truth to that statement:

> if you feel shamed over something, it's an indicator that whatever you're being shamed for is something you hate about yourself and want to change.

The hard truth is the Dominican Republic ranks extremely low in educational ratings worldwide. They score extremely poorly on any objective measurement of education or human development, making Cowherd's statement spot-on. People aren't beating down the doors to the D.R. to get into any prestigious schools on the island, and that's a fact.

American children will never have to attend class in a shipping container.

Dominicans are outraged and upset because they know Colin's statement rings true. Yes, the poor economy presents educational challenges to Dominican residents. Yes, those challenges translate into Dominicans coming to the U.S. uneducated and yes, this means they don't have the book smarts we have in the U.S.

All of this is true even if it seems impolite to point out and unfortunately for Cowherd he stepped into the truth landmine and it blew up in his face.

Can anyone be honest anymore?

It's clear that pundits in this country can't present truths without their statements being taken out of context and characterized as racist, sexist, or intolerant of the LGBTXYZABCLMNOP community. The "racist" trope even comes out when the person is not talking about a race!

The reason for is simple: They're afraid of retribution by their corporate overlords. Nobody's trying to get fired and lose those fat salaries and generous bonuses over a 30-second sound bite.

I touched on this very element a while back:

> Now I understand that men in the media have to fall in line with the feminist agenda in public. Their livelihood depends on it.
>
> …Feminism hadn't infiltrated sports media on this level when most of the notable journalists, media members, and sports anchors started so I'm not going to pass judgment on men who have to toe the line in order to continue making a living.

Often leading the charge for these fake controversies is limp-wristed SJW pussy Craig Calcaterra, who regularly makes a name for himself (and trolls for page views) by white-knighting for all of the precious, blameless damsels in distress out there.

What else could you expect from a man parroting corporation-approved, equalist, feel-good pretty lies like these:

> Anyone who simply says, out of hand, that there is no way a woman can play major league baseball competitively is just guessing. And, in all likelihood, voicing some level of prejudice, be it conscious or subconscious. Because the fact of the matter is we have no idea how women, in numbers, stack up. As Emma Span noted in her excellent New York Times piece back in June, girls and women are systematically steered away from playing baseball. The fact that a small handful play is neat, but it's totally useless as a predictor for how they'd do if there was organized instruction and play for women that produced a critical mass of women baseball players from which the professional leagues could scout.

This woman would never fuck Calcaterra because of his “courage.” And she’ll also never play shortstop for the Mets.

Calcaterra and other similarly liberal SJWs with white guilt coming out of their pores are consistently falling over themselves to build their street cred on stupid throwaway statements like the one Cowherd made on Thursday. All this does is keep the narrative one-sided.

What did we learn?

Not much. While Cowherd’s dismissal is a bit of a eyebrow-raiser given the circumstances of his impeding departure from ESPN for Fox Sports, its not surprising that his remarks earned him an early vacation.

I’ve said before the Colin Cowherd is easily one of the most talented sports talk radio hosts in the country so I can’t imagine that Fox Sports would reprimand him, or tear up his newly signed contract over something that the public at large will forget about in 48 hours (or less).

That said, I’ve been wrong before.

Read Next: FSU Quarterback DeAndre Johnson’s Dismissal Shows That It Is Open Season On Persecuting Male Athletes

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

An Introduction To The Machiavelli Of The East

July 25, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> A man is born alone and dies alone; he experiences the good and bad consequences of his karma alone, and he goes alone to hell or the Supreme abode. – Kautilya

As with that of great emperors, history also has numerous examples of "kingmakers": men who ran great empires, while being the actual power behind the throne.

One such notable but little known ancient example is that of Kautilya (also known as Chanakya, c. 350–283 BC), a philosopher, jurist, teacher, economist and royal advisor widely credited for having played an important role in the establishment of the Maurya Empire, which was the first empire in archaeologically recorded history to rule most of the Indian subcontinent.

His social aphorisms and radical political treatise – The Arthashastra – shares commonalities with The Prince and The Art Of War, and has garnered contemporary spotlight in The 48 Laws Of Power – also eliciting comparisons with the likes of Machiavelli.

His life: the rise of a kingmaker

> Those who seek to achieve things should show no mercy. – Kautilya

Born into a priest family, Kautilya was educated at Takshashila, an ancient educational centre located in north-western ancient India, where he then became a professor of economics and political science. Later he was introduced to the Nanda king, who humiliated him at the royal court. Kautilya then untied his lock of hair, and swore he would only tie it back once the Nanda dynasty was destroyed.

Subsequently, he discovered Chandragupta, who according to Buddhist texts, was the son of the Maurya clan's chieftain. Highly impressed after seeing Chandragupta leading a band of local youth, Kautilya picked him as the leader of the anti-Nanda revolt and to mentor him.

What followed next was a ruthless rise to power after years of strategic planning, complete with brutal political and military blindsides masterminded by Kautilya with his protege Chandragupta. These resulted in the destruction of the Nanda empire and even forming alliances with the Greeks to consolidate territorial conquests.

After the formation of the Maurya Empire, Kautilya served as the chief advisor to both Chandragupta and his son Bindusara. Kautilya's death, however, is shrouded in mystery and legend: some accounts say he ritually starved himself to death, while other versions say he died as a result of a court conspiracy during Bindusara's rule.

His literary work

Kautilya's lasting accomplishments were however in his two treatises: The Arthashastra (code for statecraft), and the Nitishastra (a collection of aphorisms selected by him as a manual for social life).

The Arthashastra is an ancient encyclopedic treatise and manual on kingship, statecraft, economic policy and military strategy (but can be exhausting to read).

> ..a book of political realism, analyzing how the political world does work and not very often stating how it ought to work, a book that frequently discloses to a king what calculating and sometimes brutal measures he must carry out to preserve the state and the common good. – Roger Boesche

Centrally arguing how an efficient and solid economy can be managed (in a culturally diverse autocracy), its prescriptive text lays out rules and norms for successfully running a state and conducting international relations. However, it abounds in generalities and is not descriptive of specific historical events.

The text remained influential until the 12th century (when it disappeared) but was rediscovered in 1904, later published with the first English translation in 1915. The disappearance of these texts for eight centuries could possibly be also a contributing factor for the subsequent lasting blue pill decadence and societal feminization, seen through India's checkered history.

Kautilya's wisdom in these texts has been exemplified in The 48 Laws of Power:

> One should not be too straightforward. Go and see the forest. The straight trees are cut down, the crooked ones are left standing. – Law 26: Keep your hands clean
>
> Rulers see through spies, as cows through smell, Brahmins through scriptures and the rest of the people through their normal eyes. – Law 14: Pose as a friend, work as a spy

> The remnants of an enemy can become active like those of a disease or fire. Hence, these should be exterminated completely completely. One should never ignore an enemy, knowing him to he weak. He becomes dangerous in due course, like the spark of fire in a haystack. – Law 15: Crush your enemy totally

Henry Kissinger in his book World Order calls it as "a combination of Machiavelli and Clausewitz" that lays out the requirements of power, which is the "dominant reality" in politics: containing a realist vision of politics long before the Prince – while German sociologist Max Weber once called it "truly radical 'Machiavellianism'…compared to it, Machiavelli's The Prince is harmless."

Kautilya's treatises also offer much wisdom on various topics besides statecraft, some of which has already been discussed earlier here:

1. Education

> Education is the best friend. An educated person is respected everywhere. Education beats the beauty and the youth.
>
> One whose knowledge is confined to books and whose wealth is in the possession of others, can use neither his knowledge nor wealth when the need for them arises.

2. Focus on the present

3. Friendship

4. Meritocracy

> A man is great by deeds, not by birth.
>
> A man attains greatness by his merits, not simply by occupying an exalted seat. Can we call a crow an eagle simply because it perches on the top of a tall building?

5. Wealth

> He who loses his wealth is forsaken by his friends, his wife, his servants and his relations; yet when he regains his riches all those who have forsaken him come back to him. Hence wealth is certainly the best of relations.

6. Women

> Test a servant while in the discharge of his duty, a relative in difficulty, a friend in adversity, and a wife in misfortune.
>
> The heart of a woman is not united; it is divided. While she's talking with one man, she looks lustfully at another and thinks fondly of another in her heart.
>
> Untruthfulness, rashness, guile, stupidity, avarice, uncleanliness and cruelty are a woman's seven natural flaws.
>
> The beggar is a miser's enemy, the wise counselor is a fool's enemy, the husband is an adulterous wife's enemy, and the moonlight is the enemy of the thief.
>
> The learned are envied by the foolish; rich men by the poor; chaste women by adulteresses; and beautiful ladies by ugly ones.
>
> Courtesy should be learned from princes, the art of conversation from scholars, lying should be learned from gamblers and deceitful ways should be learned from women.
>
> The power of a king lies in his might, that of a priest in his spiritual knowledge, and that of a woman in her beauty, youth and sweet words.The world's biggest power is the youth and beauty of a woman.
>
> One single object (a woman) appears in three different ways: to the man who practices austerity it appears as a corpse, to the sensual it appears as a woman, and to the dogs as a lump of flesh.
>
> We should always deal cautiously with fire, water, women, foolish people, serpents, and members of a royal family; for they may, when the occasion presents itself, at once bring about our death.
>
> Whores don't live in company of poor men, citizens never support a weak company and birds don't build nests on a tree that doesn't bear fruits.
>
> When a man has no strength left in him he becomes an ascetic, one without wealth acts like a celibate, a sick man behaves like a devotee of the Lord, and when a woman grows old she usually becomes devoted to her husband.

7. Self-preservation

> One should save his money against hard times, save his wife at the sacrifice of his riches, but invariably one should save his soul even at the sacrifice of his wife and riches.

8. Fear

> As soon as the fear approaches near, attack and destroy it.
> Once you start a working on something, don't be afraid of failure and don't abandon it. People who work sincerely are the happiest.

Conclusion

Kautilya's harsh political realism and social red pill wisdom echoes ancient red pill truths which have been espoused by many other great men of different cultures throughout history.

The contemporary relevance of his ancient aphorisms further indicates that not only has there been little difference in the nature of women throughout history, but also in the nature of societies throughout the world through time as well.

Read Next: Life Lessons From Niccolò Machiavelli

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

What Is The Next Step In The Drone Arms Race?

July 26, 2015 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Field-tested in spy and kill missions in the vast deserts of the Middle East, drones of all shapes and sizes are soon to come back to mainland US and enter mainstream consciousness. Don't worry, the sky isn't about to fall – it's about to be swarming with drones.

Lock and launch

Today, every engineering enthusiast who has a pistol and a drone can jury rig something like this. Though the concept of a flying toy that can murder people definitely sounds cool, there are many problems with drones wielding guns, the biggest of which is recoil.

Obviously not done with CGI

In this video by FPSRussia, there is supposedly a quadcopter with a machine gun attached that blows up mannequins and then flies into the back seat of a car before self-destructing, destroying it in the process. The only issue is that anyone who's ever watched an episode of Mythbusters can see that explosives were used, along with a dash of terrible CGI. Besides, as we've learned from the pistol video, any type of burst fire from such mounted machine gun would inevitably send the quadcopter spinning uncontrollably and spraying bullets everywhere.

Fiery death from the skies

Eerily graceful Predator drone

This incompatibility with conventional firearms makes drones largely unsuitable for combat usage in urban environments where anything can happen. However, they are still a useful asset to any army and excel at two support roles: reconnaissance and precision strikes.

Simply add solar panels for extra spying power!

Small drones, such as the RQ-11 Raven, are fairly cheap to produce, can be carried in a backpack, launched by hand and possess an electric motor that allows them silent flight. Their larger brethren, MQ-1 Predator and MQ-9 Reaper, can carry Hellfire and Sidewinder missiles, laser-guided bombs and are controlled via satellites.

How good are they?

Cameras, bombs and missiles on a drone — that's like attaching a sword and a spear to a tank and charging enemies with it. Can't the Pentagon think of anything more awesome? Actually, no. Despite the obvious advantage of not requiring a pilot present, drones are still not that good in close combat and are relatively easy to shoot down, as seen in this video. The only obvious solution is to make them smaller, faster and capable of attacking in large numbers at once, which is what the Office of Naval Research is currently doing with its LOCUST program.

Also obviously not done with CGI

Launched in large numbers, these agile drones will autonomously organize attack formations and shoot at the target from all directions, overwhelming it within seconds. At least that's how they could be used in theory.

Wi-Fi hacking mosquito

In reality, the most suitable weapons for any drone mission would still be unconventional, such as jamming devices for disrupting enemy communications and herbicides for destroying the crops. Leaked info from Hacking Team confirmed Boeing even considered a spyware-distributing drone that would hack into unsecured Wi-Fi networks to deliver its payload. Going head to head against an armed and technologically equal enemy is simply not a role drones can handle at this moment and is highly unlikely they ever will.

Wait until we figure out quantum computing

A perfect example of what can happen when drones meet their match is the Crimean crisis. In March 2014, reports emerged that the Russian arms corporation Rostec used its Avtobaza system to successfully hack into a US drone flying over Ukraine and land it safely. Pentagon declined to comment on this incident but announced that by 2018 hacker-proof drones will be deployed.

Frying drone brains

Microwave drone repellent

Rostec also announced an anti-drone microwave defense system to be unveiled at the upcoming Russia Arms Expo (held September 9-12). This system will provide a 360-degree, six-mile coverage of the skies around the defense system and will be able to fry all electronic components of drones and missiles.

Just like burning flies

The US Marines will have their own anti-drone laser weapon station (LWS), which is a 2 kW laser capable of burning off drone's wings from 2 miles away. However, laser weapons are notoriously unreliable when there is a large amount of dust in the air or during bad weather, and they require constant cooling. Still, lasers are a promising direction anti-drone weapons systems can take, since they have the cheapest cost per ammo round fired.

"Sir, the Chinese have launched 10 quadrillion drones at us!" "Soldier, shoot your rifle at them until our economy collapses"

Where to next?

With the advent of drones, aerial warfare has begun to look like an actual science fiction movie as all sides are rushing to develop proprietary anti-drone systems. It is possible that we are looking at a future where the entire world will be in a perpetual state of low-intensity conflict, whereby it will be impossible to identify who is doing what to whom.

When two sides do finally declare an open war, the situation will become hilariously messy. Drones flying everywhere, lasers and rayguns shooting at them, artillery bombarding lasers and rayguns, operators trying to hack into drones, artillery shooting at the operators… What we once knew as war will literally become just a child's game, played on a computer screen thousands of miles away from where the bloodshed is taking place, where every casualty is collateral damage.

Read More: A Step-by-Step Guide To Set Up A Date Through Texting

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

How The Manosphere Is Filling A Void Left By Feminized Modern Churches

July 26, 2015 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Religions, specifically Christianity has an interesting history and consequently an interesting evolution.

Like all religions it originally started as the sole form of government. If a tribe got too big a few strongmen would not be enough to keep it under control, and there were military as well as survival benefits to having a larger tribe.

Ergo, "religion" where an "all powerful god" gave "his people" rules to follow (which amazingly all seem to be the basic same commandments regardless of which religion you choose), otherwise they would endure a "hell" of a new form of government. And so instead of Mog threatening to bash your head in to do what was best for the tribe, people in fear of "hell" started following rules and laws that made for larger, stronger tribes.

Of course religion was an improvement from "Mog the Tribal Chieftain" beating your head in, but like all forms of government, it corrupted it's leaders. Be it a pastor, a rabbi, an imam, a president or a conrgessman, it didn't matter. Sooner or later the power of ruling over a people proved too tempting to leaders of all religions and soon they imbibed in the benefits, becoming fat, rich, and lazy.

Sadly for them, even within the most sheepleish of followers, some would still dare to point out the fact or even the risk that the leaders were hypocrites, using religion as a means to simply enrich themselves. Some even dared to suggest there was no god, or that their god was the wrong one. And since this threatened the power of the leaders, they had to go back to Mog the Tribe Chieftain tactics.

These amounted to witch burnings, burning people who wanted to read and become literate, burning people who thought the sun was the center of the solar system. Soon, however, reality, science, self-respect, sanity, and the power of the masses slowly made inroads into debunking religion as government.

And with a lot of philosophy, science, wars, and burned heretics at least some religions were reformed allowing for secular government, most notably in the (evil and hate-filled) United States.

This then relegated religion to where it belonged – largely a personal affair between a man and his thoughts about god and the afterlife that would have no say in what others were to believe in such matters. However, for all the flaws of religion, it did deliver an absolutely enormous benefit to humanity—wisdom

Religious Wisdom

The reason all religions have more or less the same commandments is because it made sense. It was beneficial to society to follow them. And that's merely the commandments. If you look at all the major religions' primary texts they are nothing more than life advice guides that has the culminated wisdom of men over the past 6,000 years.

Ergo, religion, for all of its flaws, filled a role in society filling the gap where mere codified secular law could not.

The law does not tell you how to raise a family. Religion does. The law does not tell you raise your children. Religion does. And the law does not tell you how to run your romantic or social lives. Religion does.

The Golden Years

It is here, the crossroads where religion was NOT the government, but served to fulfill a man's spiritual life, that religion would enjoy its heyday and do the most good. The secular government would provide the rules by which everybody could live together, your religion would teach you how to get the most out of life.

You would love your family and friends. You would respect other people, leaving them be, loving thy neighbor as you love thyself, as long as none of them hurt or harmed you. And if the thought of a universe without a god or a life without an afterlife scared you, then there was always a convenient tale of 72 virgins or sitting at a table playing poker with Jesus and your childhood dog.

There's just one minor problem. Religion, especially Christianity, could not stop evolving.

Can't Leave Well Enough Alone

Be it the never ending empiricism of science, the freedom of thought secularism grants you, the leftist movement of the 1960's, or feminism railing against the "religious right," people started leaving the church. And like corporations cannot abide decreasing profits, churches cannot abide decreasing attendance.

And so in an effort to stem the flow of congregants leaving the church, the church started diluting itself, sacrificing its standards to appeal to a larger market and therein save all those religious leaders their jobs.

In my town alone there is the church that actually baptizes animals. It's right next to another church where (20 years ago) I listened to a long haired hippie preacher rail against the evils of capitalism. Which is only one of about a gazillion churches that fly gay banners outside their steeple.

And let's not forget about the score of female pastors I've seen. And you Catholics have GOT to realize your pope isn't a pope, but a leftist purposely chosen to win a popularity contest with the young and naive generation.

Of course, I am not against any of these things (bar the socialist posing as pope). I think gays should be able to worship. I think gays should be able to get married. I think women can make great pastors. And if you want to “baptize animals” while railing against capitalism, well then by golly you go do that.

The only problem is in doing so you admit your entire religion was not only wrong, but is a money-making operation. And in doing so, you also alienate your customer base of true believers and genuine Christians.

Of course my observations above are only my observations as a PK and outside observer. I haven’t been to church in 20 years. But I vicariously live through other Christian bloggers of whom I have great respect – Dalrock, Wintery Knight, Free Northerner, Chris Bechtloff, and Last Christian Standing. And the common refrain I hear from them is the invasion of feminist thought co-opting and destroying whatever remnants of spiritual wisdom and traditionalism that real Christians may have once enjoyed.

And it’s driving away men in droves.

Be it “man up and marry those sluts” or “you have a Christian duty” or the increasingly feminist lectures disguised as “sermons,” churches may have opened themselves up to the “lucrative” markets of gays, feminists, and young uppity leftist women, but it’s sending men elsewhere.

Of course, I never chartered religious people with terribly great business acumen, but any business strategist would point out serious religious men are better long-term customers for religion than 22-year-old feminist, liberal sociology majors who are “spiritual, but not religious.”

Thus, for whatever short term gain may (and likely, may not) have been had, churches are not only hemorrhaging Millennial followers, but men as well.

“The Church Of St. Leykis”

However, just because the church is leaving millions of men behind, does not mean they won’t search for religion or spirituality elsewhere. And truth be told, most people attend church not only because they want to worship god, but also because of the guidance, wisdom, and structure it provides in life.

And that’s great news for the likes of us, because whether you realize it or not, ROK, Tom Leykis, Dalrock, and the hundreds of others sites that have evolved over the past 10 years to reconstitute the wisdom that was lost since the 1960’s, are a perfect, dare I say, superior substitute. We are the new “church.” And we most definitely welcome any men looking for some kind of wisdom, guidance, even spirituality.

Of course, we are not preaching salvation, advocating one religion or another, or offering any advice on how to make it to the winning side in the afterlife. That is again a private affair between you and your god. But everything else non-religious the church once provided is provided here.

Wisdom, comradery, fellowship, support, guidance, humor, structure, and brotherhood. All delivered without a lecture, precluded by a ton of outdated songs, chants, formalities, and Christian girls who hold you up to Jesus to judge your dateability.

Internet Killed The Mega Church Star

Not only can a single podcast or blog reach millions, but it does so at a millionth of the cost it would take a traditional church to reach the same. Podcasts are also more convenient than early or even late service, allowing you to listen wherever, whenever. The topics are more pertinent and relevant to men today, giving you direct advice without relying on archaic and easily misinterpreted scriptures.

If you’re looking for life advice, rather than being stuck with the local pastor at your church, you have a choice of thousands, ensuring only the highest quality “preachers” make it to the top. And instead of pledging a tithe of 10% to a religion, all you need to do is “buy something on Amazon” or purchase the occasional book (which you were likely going to do anyway). Truth is, I’m surprised a young, enterprising pastor fresh out of seminary hasn’t put together a “digital” church as of yet.

Regardless, this isn’t to say that you shouldn’t attend church (or synagogue or mosque). Nor that you should give up searching for one that delivers the traditional religious message and guidance you are looking for. But if you’re in limbo, and in between houses of worship, or just need a classic belt of fire and brimstone truth, about the only place you’re going to find it nowadays is here and on the hundreds of blogs and podcasts that populate the Knowledgesphere.

And we’re damn happy to have you.

Read More: A Brief Introduction To The Country Formerly Known As Sweden

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory

"Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Finnish Politician Condemns Multiculturalism, Enrages SJWs

July 26, 2015 | by Johannes Joukahainen | Link | Original Link

On the 25th of July a True Finn's Member of Parliament, Olli Immonen, released a Facebook update where he openly declares to be against a multicultural Finland. The text was posted in English and it is included below in its original form:

> I'm dreaming of a strong, brave nation that will defeat this nightmare called multiculturalism. This ugly bubble that our enemies live in, will soon enough burst into a million little pieces. Our lives are entwined in a very harsh times. These are the days, that will forever leave a mark on our nations future. I have strong belief in my fellow fighters. We will fight until the end for our homeland and one true Finnish nation. The victory will be ours.

Needless to say, there was a quick reaction from Finnish politicians and media. Even the Swedish media picked up on the story. The first to the fight was Finland Swedish professor Kimmo Grönlund from Åbo Academy, who stated that the Facebook post was a "call to violence" and unless the True Finns party takes action against Mr. Immonen and remove him from the Finnish parliament they are condoning racist thinking.

The face of a politician who stands by his words.

Mr. Immonen responded by stating that he “won’t go back an inch” on what he has stated. Furthermore, he released a second Facebook update to rebuke Professor Grönlund’s respons. I have freely translated his response below:

> The Swedish speaking professor Grönlund has completely lost his temper after my yesterday’s Facebook update. The multiculturalist Grönlund ought to take a breather before releasing press statements. To Grönlund, I say that Finland is not like Sweden where nationalist minded political parties are isolated and forced to kick out their members for offending the Green-Leftist elite’s multicultural world view. I will not go back an inch from my defense of a nationalistic Finland. If Grönlund wants a limited freedom of speech and the persecution of those who disagree politically with him, he could move for example, to Sweden. But first, he must resign.

More or less everyone in Finnish politics has attacked Mr. Immonen for his views, starting from the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. There is one notable exception: Mr. Jussi Halla-aho, a True Finns party’s Member of European Parliament, who stated that he would like to clarify that he is also against the ugly bubble of multiculturalism and against multiculturalism in general.

He also questions why it is newsworthy that someone from the True Finns party is against multiculturalism, as the party has always had similar views. Halla-aho added as a final remark that he does not share Mr. Immonen’s optimism that the bubble will burst before it has ruined European societies.

Meanwhile in Sweden

The Swedish press quickly reacted and Svenska Dagbladet responded by writing a news article that claims that the True Finns party "grows hate speech." Nobody can be surprised that the Swedish media would rush first to condemn the statement by Mr. Immonen, as Sweden is by far the most caught up in the dream of multiculturalism of all the Nordic states.

The aftermath of a traditional multicultural Christmas Eve celebration in Malmö, Sweden.

Coincidentally, the beautiful fruit of multiculturalism yields was again visible as on the 26th of July, when another hand grenade exploded and shook the immigrant rich area of Malmö during the early hours of the morning. This explosion was the latest in a series of similar events.

On Tuesday the 21st of July, a similar explosion, also caused by a hand grenade injured one person. Evidently, the Swedish authorities believe that these explosions are revenge for the sentencing of "three young men," words most frequently used in the PC press to mean immigrants, for a bomb strike that occurred on Christmas Eve in Rosengård, Malmö.

The situation in Finland grows more difficult—on the one hand Finns do not want to duck in fear of hand grenades on Christmas Eve, but also, nobody wants violence based on racial prejudices. The crux of the issue with multiculturalism in Finland is that the problems related to it are not yet so widespread as to require overly drastic action, as reversing the situation in Sweden would now require.

The author believes that having a civilized discussion, and subsequent policy changes could solve the issues related to multiculturalism in Finland, however, this will not occur if the current persecution of those voicing their views against multiculturalism continues.

This may in turn eventually lead to what John F. Kennedy very aptly described in his statement: "Those who make peaceful revolution impossible will make violent revolution inevitable."

Read More: A Brief Introduction To The Country Formally Known As Sweden

Johannes Joukahainen
A rather anonymous Finn proud of his roots and ashamed of the current state of his Fatherland.

10 Signs You Might Be A Cuckservative

July 27, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last week, the mainstream conservative press went apoplectic with rage at the epithet "cuckservative," a popular insult in alternative right and neoreactionary circles. For the uninitiated, cuckservatives are right-wing politicians and pundits who make a big show of defending traditional values, yet when push comes to shove, they roll over for the left on every issue out of fear of being called "racist," "sexist" or "homophobic."

Conservatives like Red State's Erick Erickson who throw tantrums over the term "cuckservative" are doing so because the term describes them perfectly. If you're wondering whether you might be a cuckservative, Return of Kings has put together this handy guide to show you. Read on and discover if you're the kind of conservative who enjoys watching your nation get brutally gang-raped by cultural Marxists…

1. You care more about Israel's borders than America's

The most basic definition of “conservative” entails protecting the things that separate a nation from its neighbors, including that nation’s borders. Yet for the past decade, conservatives in Congress and the media have acceded to the left’s demands for “comprehensive immigration reform,” a PC euphemism for rewarding millions of illegal aliens from Mexico and other countries for breaking our laws. Major Republican leaders such as Senators John McCain (R-AZ) and Jeff Flake (R-AZ), and even Tea Party darling Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL) have echoed the left’s call for amnesty, in direct defiance of their constituents.

At the same time, cuckservatives obsess over protecting Israel from supposed “threats” that never materialize. Every major Republican of consequence always makes a point of reaffirming their support for Israel, to the point of urging us to go to war against Iran because of the infinitesimally tiny chance they might develop nuclear weapons. This is despite the fact that not only has Israel never sent a single soldier to die in an American war, more American servicemen have been killed by Israel (in the USS Liberty incident) than by Russia, a nation that cuckservatives are dead set on antagonizing.

The irony is that despite cuckservatives’ claims that we can’t turn back the tide of illegal aliens from Latin America, the very nation that they fetishize has all but eliminated its illegal immigration problem. Israel fought back against illegal immigration by constructing a border wall (something cuckservatives claim that America can’t do) and by swiftly deporting aliens in their midst. The Israeli government also managed to stave off demographic collapse by incentivizing Jews to have children; worth remembering whenever a cuckservative moans about how whites will be a minority in America by 2050.

2. You think that opposing free trade is Nazism

While they claim that they support the American economy, cuckservatives have gleefully supported the wholesale relocation of manufacturing to Mexico and China through free trade agreements such as NAFTA. Manufacturing jobs were what made the prosperity of the 50's and 60's possible, because they allowed the average man to earn a decent wage and provide for his family. Nowadays, Americans are either relegated to minimum wage service jobs or forced to go into debt to the tune of tens of thousands of dollars to go to college, just for a shot at entering the middle class.

Yet despite the fact that free trade enriches the super-rich at the expense of everyone else, cuckservatives attack anyone who questions it as a Nazi. No, I'm not joking. Cuckservative wunderkind Kevin Williamson of National Review recently attacked Democratic presidential candidate and soi-disant democratic socialist Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) as a "national socialist," solely because Sanders is opposed to free trade agreements that impoverish the average worker.

3. You believe that the Democrats are the "real" racists

Cuckservatives have spent the past twenty years trying to appeal to blacks out of fear of the left calling them “racist,” going so far as to claim that the left are the “real” racists. Indeed, cuckservatives have gone so far in trying to appear anti-racist that we now have libertarian hero Rand Paul cuddling up to race hustler Al Sharpton and incompetent boobs such as Tim Scott and Michael Steele being promoted to positions of power in the GOP based on their skin color.

Despite cuckservatives’ genuflecting, blacks have continuously voted Democratic in numbers of 90 percent and up going all the way back to the 1960’s.

4. You think the reason Detroit and other major U.S. cities are falling apart is because of unions Cuckservatives are so desperate to avoid being called “racist” that they completely deny the role of race in American society. For example, National Review’s Kevin Williamson absurdly blames the dysfunction of Detroit on unions run amok and not the fact that the city is more than 80 percent black. While socialist policies will eventually ruin a nation, white liberal areas such as Vermont and Oregon have considerably higher standards of living than black areas with the same politics.

5. You believe that Hispanics are “natural Republicans”

Pro-illegal alien cuckservatives such as Jeb Bush and Karl Rove have tried to justify selling out their nation by claiming that Hispanic immigrants' work ethic and Catholic values make them potential GOP supporters. However, as economist Tino Sanandaji showed, the average Latino has left-wing views on just about every issue of importance, from the size of government to gay marriage to taxes.

The highest percentage of the Hispanic vote won by any GOP presidential candidate in the past thirty years was 40 percent by George W. Bush in 2004, and he only won that much by essentially bribing Latinos with low-interest mortgages, resulting in 2007-2008's housing crisis.

Not only that, the countries that these "natural Republicans" hail from are overwhelmingly socialist, if not outright communist. Mexico, where the bulk of Hispanics hail from, is dominated by the far-left Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), which has been in power for all but 12 years since 1929. Every other nation in Latin America, from Argentina to Brazil to Colombia, is run by socialists, and when Latinos migrate to the U.S., they take their ideology with them.

6. You support corporations, despite their advocacy for leftist causes

Cuckservatives are vociferously opposed to any government action that limits the power of corporations, from higher taxes to environmental regulations to minimum wage increases. These corporations have rewarded cuckservatives by eagerly shoving left-wing degeneracy down Americans' throats. Not only does Hollywood and other popular media glorify homosexuality, transsexuality and other perversions, most corporations enforce leftist orthodoxy, contrary to the left's claim that big business is pro-Republican.

For example, following the Supreme Court's decision legalizing gay marriage, a whole host of corporations, from Google to Facebook, suddenly put up rainbow flag logos in solidarity with the LGBT movement. Here in Chicago, Allstate currently has posters plastered all over the L featuring two men holding hands. Just a few days ago, the WWE acceded to left-wing hysteria about "racism" by firing Hulk Hogan solely because he used a racial slur in a private conversation nearly a decade ago.

Even supposedly right-wing corporate figures are further to the left than the average American. For instance, the Koch brothers, favorite boogeymen of the left, are in favor of open borders. Yet despite being turkey-slapped repeatedly by their corporate masters, cuckservatives are all too happy to spread their cheeks for these multinational purveyors of leftist degeneracy.

7. You think military veterans automatically deserve respect

Cuckservatives assuage their guilt about sending young men to die in pointless overseas wars by fellating every veteran as a “war hero,” no matter how they actually spent their service. For example, John McCain, the king of cuckservatives, is constantly lauded as a “hero” for his time in Vietnam, despite the fact that he spent most of it in a jail cell after being captured by the North Vietnamese. Donald Trump was lambasted by both left and right for pointing out that not only didn’t McCain engage in anything that could remotely be called “heroic,” as a senator, he has done nothing to aid veterans.

John McCain is a “war hero” in the same way that pink slime is a nutritious meal. Not only did McCain confess to breaking under torture and selling out his country, there’s considerable evidence that he may have actively collaborated with the communist Vietnamese (ex: his fellow POWs nicknamed him “Songbird”). McCain’s father was a highly decorated admiral and could have easily used his influence to suppress knowledge of his son’s traitorous activity.

8. You think the GOP needs to moderate in order to win elections

Cuckservatives believe that the real reason why Obama won the elections in 2008 and 2012 is because the Republicans have gone too far to the right, and that in order to appeal to voters, the GOP needs to move towards the center. This ignores the fact that the Republican presidential candidates in ’08 and ’12, John McCain and Mitt Romney, respectively, failed to garner support precisely because they were too mushy and left-wing.

Not only that, the GOP managed to capture the House in 2010 and the Senate in 2014 largely by running Tea Party candidates such as Joni Ernst, Marco Rubio and Rand Paul who were unashamed about being conservative and willing to take the fight to the left. Donald Trump is leading in Republican presidential polls because he’s the only candidate with a pair of balls, who doesn’t back down in the face of leftist attacks.

9. You spend more time attacking fellow conservatives than the left

One of the most defining traits of cuckservatives is how they spend most of their ammunition firing at their supposed comrades for being too “extreme.” For example, Donald Trump has been lambasted by Jeb Bush, Lindsey Graham, and virtually every other GOP presidential candidate for his outspoken advocacy for conservative policies. In contrast, liberals have a “no enemies to the left” policy, explaining why domestic terrorists such as Bill Ayers and race hustlers such as Al Sharpton are allowed to operate without a single condemnation from their fellow ideologues.

10. You’re always apologizing to your enemies

Being a cuckservative means always having to say you're sorry. Whenever "offensive" comments by cuckservatives are uncovered by the left, the cuckservative always drops to his knees and begs for forgiveness. For example, raging thundercuck Jack Hunter, a political consultant, resigned from Rand Paul's staff after left-wing organizations publicized "racist" comments he had made as a radio commentator in the past. Additionally, Hunter waved the white flag and repudiated his views.

Unfortunately for cuckservatives, their reign of squeezing their clammy mitts around conservatism's balls is coming to an end. The sudden popularity of the "cuckservative" epithet shows that grassroots right-wingers are tired of the movement's spinelessness and groveling to the left. With Donald Trump on the rise and cuckservatives on the run, reversing America's decline has never looked more possible.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: The American Conservative Establishment Is Collapsing

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Only In A Crisis Will A Great Leader Emerge

July 27, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The current batch of presidential candidates leaves me feeling nothing. I don't feel inspired by any of them. I don't feel interested in any of them. All I feel is…nothing, a generalized emptiness that edges into contempt.

You may feel the same way. When it comes to politics, disappointment is now so routine that we simply take it for granted. None of the candidates has anything positive to offer. All they are offering is a continuation of the same tired old policies.

It goes almost without saying that the mainstream Democrat and Republican candidates are two names with almost no distinction. Both of these parties long ago were bought out by big money and corporate interests, and ceased to care about the plight of the average man in America. Yes, of course, they pay lip service to the Old Ideal, and they are great readers of idealistic speeches on the teleprompter, but in the end they will do little to upset the status quo.

Enter the entertainer

One current maverick has generated some hype, which I suppose has the merit of offering some entertainment and excitement. Donald Trump has crashed the party and has been pissing in the punchbowl, and the establishment candidates don't quite know how to respond.

But in the end, it is difficult to see Trump as anything more than a consummate showman, a carnival barker who functions as a North American version of Italy's bunga-bunga tycoon Silvio Berlusconi. Trump likes to spout off at the mouth, to talk about how rich and successful he is, and to rip into the arrogant establishment marionettes like John McCain and Hillary Clinton. And they do deserve every bit of scorn that Trump pours on.

But Trump remains an entertainer, an egoist looking for a platform. His penchant for glitz and invective is not the stuff that statesmen or good leaders are made of. He lacks judgment and caution, and these will be his undoing. You may remember, several years ago, that he launched into one tirade after another against television personality Rosie O'Donnell, who had slighted him in one way or another.

Instead of responding and moving on, Trump went on the attack against O'Donnell, slamming her with personal insults. While these videos (which you can find on YouTube) may have been amusing, and while Trump may have scored off O'Donnell, there is something distinctly unmanly about such a performance.

To waste one's time repeatedly attacking a fool is a fool's errand. Trump emerges as an enraged child, an arrogant egoist who cannot deal with the insult on his sense of self-importance. These videos reveal the character of the man.

Is the end approaching?

The only positive thing that emerges out of the current bumper crop of campaign nonentities is the fact that we are one step closer to hitting rock bottom. How is this good? Because history suggests that good presidents emerge only in times of crisis.

Several historical examples make the point.

When Abraham Lincoln first took office, the nation was in the worst situation it had ever been in. Half of the Union had seceded. Lincoln was nearly universally looked on as a country-bumpkin unfit for office, a man who had not even received a majority of the vote. He was too timid for the radical Republicans, and perceived as too radical for many others.

The first year of the war was a terrible one for the Union. At that time, the South produced the majority of the world's cotton; and the blockade of Southern ports threatened to bring in the intervention of France and England. The British would have been satisfied to see the United States self-destruct. In Paris, Napoleon III entertained fantasies of being a North American power, and to this end installed a puppet in Mexico City.

No military victories were forthcoming, either. In the field, the Union was getting trounced in nearly every engagement. Lincoln's generals were slow to move, inept, and more interested in squabbling among themselves than in moving against the enemy.

But slowly the tide began to change. Lincoln's deft handling of political crises (like the Trent Affair, the issues with border states, and the handling of the slavery issue) showed that he was a master of maneuver. On the battlefield, the victories began to happen, first in the west with Grant's capture of Forts Henry and Donelson, and then slowly in the east.

James Knox Polk remains one of the most underappreciated presidents, but his record is extremely impressive. He was nearly an unknown when he entered office, but embarked on an extremely aggressive foreign policy that oversaw serious territorial issues like the Mexican War, the acquisition of the Oregon Territory, and the annexation of Texas.

James K. Polk

The Great Depression of the 1930s presented another example of a leader appearing from nowhere to manage a crisis. When Franklin Roosevelt took office, the United States was flat on its back. Millions were out of work; consumer demand had plummeted due to the fact that no one had any money; and people's confidence in the political system had nearly evaporated. Revolution was not quite in the air, yet, but things were definitely headed in that direction.

But Roosevelt possessed boundless optimism, perhaps a product of his personal victory over the disease that had crippled him. He also came from a family that truly believed in the value of public service in its own right. Step by step, Roosevelt took action to address the crisis. His methods sometimes worked, and sometimes did not. But he at least did something, and gave the appearance of hope that stood in stark contrast to the negativity and confusion of his predecessor Herbert Hoover.

Am I disappointed that I have no candidate that I can feel enthusiastic about? Yes. But I've gotten used to that feeling. We live in an age of political mediocrities. Those who hold the reins of power are not willingly going to share what they have, and no president in my lifetime has been able or eager to stand up to them.

But give it time. We still haven't hit rock bottom. People are still too smug, too self-satisfied, too fat, too happy, and too deluded. And maybe that's what it will take. Meaningful reforms can only happen when there is no other choice. And when the crisis is at hand, then, and only then, will the man of the hour appear.

I keep my blade sharp, and await his arrival.

Read More: 5 Reason Not To Make Retail Your Career

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Two Fathers

July 27, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Timothy went with his fathers for a day of shopping at the mall to decorate his new room. He was getting tired halfway through but perked up when they suggested he create his own teddy bear at the mall's Build-A-Bear store.

"You can create any bear you want," said Randy.

Timothy was at first overwhelmed with the options but decided on a hard robot shell for his bear, making it seem more like a killer teddy cyborg. He had in mind to create an indestructible bear that was strong and mean, able to defend against bad people like his biological father, who would place him over his lap and whip his 9-year-old behind with a belt for reasons so random that he could never figure out how to avoid them. He was away from that now, and his two new fathers were going to give him the love that his abusive father and absentee mother never gave him.

As Timothy constructed his cyborg bear, Randy pointed out a rainbow-colored bear to his husband, Michael. "Isn't that cute?" Randy said. "Hey Timothy, what do you think of this rainbow bear?"

"I don't like rainbows."

"Why not?" Michael coolly replied.

"It has too many girl colors. I like my robot bear." Michael's eyes opened wide but Randy interrupted him, telling Timothy he could build any bear he wanted.

Timothy had been disappointed so many times in his life that he didn't know what to expect from Randy and Michael. This wasn't helped by the confusing arrangement of having two dads. He leaned towards using “Dad” on Randy, the more masculine of the two since Michael was on estrogen therapy to eventually become a Michelle, but in the end he stuck to using their first names. As long as he could avoid the beatings and the yelling that took place in his former home, or the dirtiness that was his temporary stay in foster care, he would be happy to call them whatever they wanted.

Luckily for Timothy, Randy and Michael were stable, successful, intelligent adults. Besides the fact that there were both men, Timothy couldn’t have been more blessed in finding a couple who were so willing to take care of an unlucky child.

But that love couldn’t immediately undo a lifetime of abuse. Very early on, Timothy displayed anti-social behavior in school. He had trouble paying attention to his teacher’s instructions. At recess he simply wanted to play alone. When time came for parent-student conferences, Randy and Michael were told it was worth trying an ADHD drug to help him with his attention problems. His parents respected the power of pharmaceuticals; Michael was on the hormone therapy while Randy had gone on stints of Xanax during some especially difficult times in his life. It was worth a shot just to see if it would have a positive effect on Timothy, and if not they would pull him off it. His well-being was their utmost concern.

The medication worked. Within two weeks, Timothy would provide an unblinking stare at his teacher while she barreled through the curriculum. He did well enough to get B’s and C’s, an exceptional feat for a kid of his unfortunate background.

Timothy’s favorite part of the school day was, of course, recess. He would get away from his classmates and go to the far end of the park and place bugs on the back of his hand and watch them crawl away. There wasn’t much else to do except kick a couple balls around, because several years before they removed the jungle gym. Too many kids were falling off, leading to parent complaints. Parents also complained about dodgeball because in a game of thirty kids, only one was the winner. All the losing kids would suffer an unnecessary blow to their self-esteem, making it more difficult for them to compete in a cutthroat world where 100 SAT points made or break getting into a prestigious college.

A little girl named Magda walked up to Timothy one day while he was playing with bugs. “What are you doing?” she asked.

“Nothing.”

“What is that crawling on your hand?”

“It’s a caterpillar.”

“Will it bite you?” Magda asked. She stood several feet away from Timothy as if scared the caterpillar would jump on her.

“No. It tickles when it walks on you. Do you want to touch it?”

“No, it’s gross!”

“It’s not gross. And it won’t hurt you.”

“Okay but if it bites me I’m going to scream.” Magda sat beside Timothy and he let the caterpillar crawl over his hand and onto hers. She giggled upon feeling the little legs gripping her skin.

“Cool!” Magda said.

“I like the caterpillars. There are beetles here, too. They have red shells with black dots on them. Sometimes they are stuck together and you can pull them apart and they keep going.”

The caterpillar fell off of Magda’s hand. “What is your name?” she asked.

“Timothy.”

“I’m Magda.”

“Okay. Do you want to see some ants?”

“Ew!” But Magda relented and poked a stick in the ant mound like Timothy showed her. It made sense that Magda and Timothy got along since they were both new in school. She tried hard to make friends with the other girls but didn’t quite fit in. As the daughter of Polish immigrants who barely spoke English, her accent was slightly different from everyone else’s. She was seen as an outsider, something her twice weekly ESL class reminded her of.

Timothy didn’t think of her as a friend as much as someone he could show bugs to. He was so used to being alone and wrapped up in his own world that he never felt the need to meet other kids. In fact, Magda was his first friend.

—

The bullying started after the school’s 6th Annual Multicultural Happiness Day. In the back of class sat most of the parents, including Randy and Michael. They beamed with pride as their son performed in a Thanksgiving Day skit where Native Americans and Pilgrims feasted together in peace, patiently teaching each other about their respective cultures. The day was a success, like it was every year.

The next day at recess, a group of five kids came to where Magda and Timothy were playing.

“Hey gay boy,” a girl named Allison said. Timothy looked, not because he knew what gay meant, but because she couldn’t have been talking to Magda.

“Hey gay boy, I’m talking to you. You’re gay!”

“What’s gay?” Timothy asked.

“Your parents are gay. So you will be gay.”

“I don’t understand.”

“You have two fathers. That’s not normal!” Timothy just shrugged. It was better having two fathers than one who beats him. Besides, Randy and Michael were good to him. He didn’t especially care for the ritalin he was talking, because it always made him thirsty, but he was learning a lot in school and his math was good. He even got his first A on a quiz.

Allison’s friends added more insults. They called him all sorts of cruel names, as kids are apt to do.

“Leave him alone,” Magda said.

“You are his gay… girlfriend!” Then Allison pushed Magda, causing her to topple over. Timothy looked at Magda and saw that she was upset. Timothy shook the bugs off his hands and stood up besides Allison. He made a fist with his right hand, closed his eyes, and swung wildly. He heard the scream more than he felt the impact he made with her left ear, which instantly turned scarlet. Allison cupped her ear and ran away crying. Five minutes later, a teacher came and asked Timothy if he hit Allison. “Yes,” he said.

A note went home with him that afternoon. Randy and Michael were disturbed that Timothy was acting out on violent tendencies. “Is he emulating his father?” Michael wondered.

“We can’t let him think that hitting people will solve problems in life,” Randy declared.

“Timothy, come here, dear,” Michael said. Timothy came from his room with his head down.

“Is it true you hit a girl today?”

“Yes, but she was mean.”

“Timothy, you can never hit a girl. You are a big strong boy, much stronger than any girl, and you could really hurt them because boys are stronger than girls. Do you understand?”

“But she started it!”

Randy decided to be more stern. “Timothy, you must never lay your hand on a girl again. This is not acceptable, do you understand?” He pointed his finger in Timothy’s face. “If you do it again we will have to punish you.” Would they take away his cyborg bear? He sleeps with it every night, because it makes him feel safe and strong. His lower lip started to quiver and Randy was pleased that his message was getting through.

“Repeat after me,” Randy said, “I will never hit a girl again.”

“I will never hit a girl again,” Timothy parroted.

“Now say it again.”

“I promise never to hit a girl again.”

“Good, very good. You can go to your room now and think about the wrong you did today.”

Timothy was confused at why he was punished, since Allison attacked first, but if all he had to do to get the approval of his caring parents was not hit a girl, he believed he could do it. He just hoped that Allison wouldn’t bother him anymore so he could play with his bugs.

—

Randy and Michael threw a vegan dinner party one Saturday evening for six of their friends. Each guest brought a prepared dish and bottle of wine. Much drink and merriment was had by all while Randy and Michael joyfully paraded their new son. He was doted on and given small presents and lavished with praise about how handsome he was. Timothy thought the guests talked strangely, but they were nice people who smiled a lot and did him no harm.

After a couple hours, once the wine experienced the height of its effect, one of the guests looked at Timothy and yelled, “Makeover!” He escorted Timothy into the bedroom and picked out an outfit that Michael owned, a purple blouse and conservative black dress. A basic makeup kit was also found. Ten minutes later Timothy walked out of the room to shrieks of delight. “He looks like a little woman!” one guest said.

“He’s so adorable!” another added.

“I don’t know if I approve of this,” Randy said, smiling broadly as he took another sip of wine, remembering the last time that Michael wore that outfit during an exciting sexual role play.

Michael was most proud of his son’s appearance, piling on compliments about how great he looked. Timothy felt so valued to be approved by so many adults that once the clothing was removed and the makeup washed from his face, he didn’t even need to hug his cyborg teddy in order to fall asleep.

—

One day after school, Magda tried to grab Timothy’s hand. He snatched it away and ran to his school bus, hiding in the back. This reaction is to be expected from a boy who never received physical affection, not even from his new parents, who were not yet comfortable touching him in a way that would suggest he was their own. Thankfully, the hand-holding incident was forgotten in a day, and Magda and Timothy were playing once again during recess in their little corner of the park.

A couple weeks later, on the bus ride to school, someone told Timothy, “Allison is going to get you today.” Timothy didn’t think much of the threat, but halfway through recess Allison and a squad of four of her friends surrounded him. “I don’t like you,” Allison yelled, and pushed Timothy with all her might. His instinct was to push back, but he remembered what Randy and Michael made him promise, so he did nothing. This further encouraged Allison and she levied a punch to his stomach. He crouched over in pain. She picked up a long stick from the ground.

“Stop it!” Magda yelled. “Stop hurting him!”

“Hold him!” Allison screamed, as if possessed by a demon. Her goons held Timothy down and Allison started lashing the stick upon Timothy’s head and face, quickly breaking blood on his forehead and lower lip. Timothy’s body went limp. He felt the pain on his body but floated out of it like he has done so many times before. He could only hear Magda’s voice, begging for them to stop, and when he looked at her he saw tears streaming down her face. This is when he began to cry, not from his pain, but from Magda’s, because she was his only friend and wanted to hold his hand when no one else would.

—

“We should sue the fucking school!” Randy told Michael. They patched up the cuts on Timothy’s body and gave him a big bowl of chocolate ice cream to help cheer his spirit and soothe the wound on his lip.

“They suspended Allison for two weeks,” Michael said. “This punishment is unheard of in elementary school. I think they are doing all they can.”

“He has just been through so much. If he’s not getting hurt at the hands of his father, it’s now at the hands of some bully.”

“But at least he didn’t initiate the violence. The note from the school says it absolutely was not his fault.”

Timothy walked up to them and said, “I didn’t hit her. She was hitting me with the stick but I didn’t hit her back, because she’s a girl.”

Michael said, “That’s great, Timothy, because she got in trouble and can’t go to school for two weeks, but you can go tomorrow and continue learning and playing. When someone uses violence they are punished. Those who are nice and kind are rewarded when they do what’s right, like you will be.”

Randy meekly interjected, “But if the girl grabs a stick, maybe Timothy should defend himself.”

“And so you want him to have a sword fight with a little girl? If he has that mentality once he gets older, he could end up killing someone. It’s best to just let the authorities deal with it. His wounds will heal in a couple days while Allison will have this on her permanent school record. If she does it again, she will be expelled.” Michael looked at Timothy and said, “You did the right thing today. I’m so sorry that she hurt you, but everything will be okay.”

—

Allison stopped bullying him, but other bullies took her place. There was no more physical violence, but the verbal taunts were endless, and Timothy never fought back, only ensuring they would continue. His schoolwork suffered and his grades slipped, in spite of an increase in dosage to his medication. Randy and Michael were getting frustrated at his declining performance and thought a tougher stance would be in order. How will he get into Stanford if he’s already behind on his multiplication tables?

When Timothy brought home a report card with three D’s, his fathers had a stern talk with him about the importance of education and how unacceptable his grades were. There were mentions about enrolling him in a special school, hiring tutors, or limiting his play time in favor of more study. The phrase “you’re falling behind” was often used and now Timothy began to get worried that their anger at him would only get worse. Randy and Michael always told Timothy that they loved him, but how about if they stopped loving him because of his bad grades? What would happen to him?

While his fathers talked about what to do, Timothy slipped into their room. A few minutes later, he emerged wearing the exact same outfit of Michael’s that the dinner party guest had dressed him in. He tried to put on makeup but was not especially skilled. His attempt at eye shadow went as far back as his temple and he managed to get blush in his hair. When Michael first saw Timothy, he hugged him for being so adorable. He instructed Timothy not to move and then went to grab his camera to take pictures. Randy let out a couple laughs and for at least that day, they completely forgot about his bad grades. There was no more talk about reducing his play time. For the first time in his life, Timothy felt like he finally knew how to get love from adults. While Magda's friendship was real and her accent sweet, it was parental love that he needed most.

At the next dinner party, Michael went on to tell his friends how Timothy was just like them, something that Randy didn't argue with. Soon the gifts arriving from guests weren't toys, but clothes in pretty pastel and pink colors.

(This short story was originally published on Roosh V.)

Previous Story: Patricia's Smartphone

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Universal Truths About Perfect 10s Every Man Should Know

July 28, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

I was very fortunate to have found the red pill community shortly after the dawn of my sexual prime because it's allowed me to maximize my SMV, which has given me more options than I've ever had at any other time in my life as far as work, women, and [semi] location independence go.

I'm even more fortunate to have slithered my way into the panties of a fair amount of females that most men would consider to be a "10." Granted, game had a lot to do with it, but any man who's fucked more than one super hot chick knows that luck sometimes plays as much a role as game does in these situations.

I'm not going to get into what qualifies as a 10 because every man's preference in female beauty is highly subjective. But we all know a woman who would draw the sexual interest of 99% of men when we see one, so we'll use that as our barometer.

Having mingled with a handful of these females over the years, here are five things I've learned about them that seem to be pretty consistent across the board, and can come in handy when running game on them.

5. They don't get hit on as often

Don’t rush to judgment. She probably hasn’t been approached in a few days.

No, I’m not talking about some beta schlub giving her his seat on the subway, or the perverted old janitor who jokes with her about going on a date with him. I’m talking about the man who walks up, introduces himself and makes no bones about what he’s angling for.

The truth is, extremely attractive women quite literally scare most men away from even talking to them. Sure, they’ll say hi or make a stupid comment about the weather but that’s where it ends. 95% of men don’t take it any further than that because they lack game and confidence.

Just because they turn heads wherever they go doesn’t mean the heads on those swivels have the balls attached to them to act. Most of the time they just oggle and drool as she strolls by. This leaves the door wide open for you to walk up and start generating those much-needed tingles she’s been dying to feel for a lot longer than you might think.

4. They’re much more pleasant than you think

Beautiful women want to fuck, go on dates, and have relationships as much as any other female out there. But between the lack of quality men bold enough to approach them, then dealing with betas who are constantly running terrible game on them, their frustration level is almost always at critical mass.

But when a man in demand like yourself has the kahunas to step to her, swat away the shit test she deploys, and make clear that you're not looking for a non-sexual relationship with her, she becomes quite pleasant—if your game is on point.

Sure, you'll have to cut through the bitch shield when you approach her, but similar to Latinas (who can be notoriously difficult to open) they always soften up once you've established your high value and shown fearlessness in the face of her beauty.

There are very few exceptions to this rule.

3. They are extremely insecure

[image]
Yeah you look alright…except for that crazy ass watch you got on

Any man who has experience with high SMV females know they don't compare themselves to average looking girls. They compare themselves to other 10s which makes them very insecure.

The constant preening and mirror checking (or any surface with a reflection) to make sure everything is in its place can be a pain in the ass sometimes, but it comes with the territory.

Use this to your advantage by teasing the fuck out of her. Tease her about her nose, make fun of her hair, or pick on her about her bejeweled phone case—anything you can think of.

Nothing makes hot girls hotter for you than teasing them…trust me. Be careful not to overdo it. But definitely make certain she understands you're not afraid to tease and pick fun at her. This will let her know in no uncertain terms that her beauty is something you'd be just fine without.

2. They're so-so in bed

[image]
Girls who look like this will engage in whatever debauchery you an dream up

Women in the upper aesthetic echelon don't have to do much to impress men these days. The combination of thirsty dudes and having just about everything handed to them on account of their great looks saps their motivation to do much of anything (keeping in shape notwithstanding).

Their lack of need to please crosses over into the bedroom as well. Don't get me wrong, we all want to fuck 10s because…well…they're 10s. But the sex is often lackluster, again, because good looking girls usually aren't required or compelled to exert much effort to elicit a favorable response from a male, sexually or otherwise.

I can personally attest that sex with 7s and 8s is almost always better than sex with 9s and 10s. 7s and 8s rarely hesitate to give you toe-curling blow jobs and will let you stick your dick in any hole you damn well please, much more often than not. They've got to make up for their SMV deficiencies somehow, and draining your balls by any means necessary is how they accomplish this.

This isn't to say that sex with super hot girls is bad. But if you're expecting a 10 to fuck you like a porn star, understand that it's going to take much more than just being naked in the same room with you to motivate her to do so. Even if your game is air tight, it normally takes a little longer for her to loosen up in the bedroom and turn into that vivacious vixen you need her to be.

1. 10s are people too

It is very easy to get caught in the trance of an extremely beautiful woman. Everything about them seems to hypnotize us when we lay our eyes on one, and there's little we can do about it.

But it's important to understand that hot girls are people too. That is, when they don't shower they stink. When they get hot, they sweat. They shit, fart, and burp just like the rest of us.

"Well duh! Everybody knows that!"

Of course we do. But a woman's physical beauty stupefies the male mind to the point where all of these things are blocked out. When we daydream about a relationship with a pretty girl we never think about her sitting on the toilet pushing out a foot long log that smells like putrid death.

We subconsciously believe that she's always going to look great, she's always going to smell nice, and that the only reason she uses the bathroom is to tinkle.

Stuff like this never creeps into our fantasies

But if you consciously humanize beautiful girls by visualizing them ripping a loud long fart or having terrible morning breath it almost involuntarily triggers your mind into de-pedestalizing them which snaps you out of that spell her beauty has you under.

Application

Applying this knowledge is simple but it takes practice.

Understanding that a 10 sitting alone at a coffee shop or shopping for groceries likely hasn't been approached by a man with game in a while, and that when you introduce yourself to her and strike up conversation, means she'll likely be quite receptive.

When you number close her be unafraid to call her out on her bullshit, playfully tease her, and instruct her on where and what you'll be doing when you meet up.

If you get her naked later on, don't expect to have the best sex of your life that night. It's certainly possible, but it's on you to bring the freak out of a 10 because most of the time because she's not going to just drop to her knees and demand to suck your cock just because she agreed to fuck you.

At the end of the day 10s can sometimes be difficult to fuck, but they're much easier to game than you think. Remember, they're choosy about who they let penetrate them. On the flip side 5s and 6s are very hard to game on account of all the offers, they get but their legs involuntarily fly open with a heavy dose of asshole game.

Every man has different strategies and techniques to maximize his changes with the fantasized and fabled "10." So long as you keep these five things in mind and apply your game accordingly, you may very well find yourself balls deep in a woman most men don't have the stones to even talk to.

Read Next: Why There Are No 10's

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Why Wasn’t Elizabeth Sandlin Charged With Rape If The Man She Had Sex With Was “Blind Drunk”?

July 28, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

My colleague Theodore Gumbril wrote an excellent piece recently about the assault conviction of Samuel Price for biting Elizabeth Sandlin’s buttocks during a rough sex session. The conviction itself was a farce, but another significant issue escaped the attention of the courts and society at large: why wasn’t Sandlin charged with rape?

She herself said that Price “was very drunk, blind drunk” and large numbers of men, including Welsh soccer player Ched Evans, have been convicted for having sex with women deemed too drunk to consent.

The failure to reprimand Sandlin for an act that would have landed a man in jail for rape represents another victory for female privilege. Our Western court systems, designed to act as the series of checks and balances that prevent witch hunts or selective prosecutions, are in an undeniably parlous state.

For the moment, as hard as it is, I want you to separate Samuel Price’s ludicrous assault conviction from this case. Theodore covered this aspect most ably only weeks ago. What we will focus on here is Sandlin’s pussy pass for what is otherwise rape when committed by men.

Some questions to get us started:

- How could Elizabeth Sandlin presume that Samuel Price was consenting if he was blind drunk? Having had sex before is not consent, surely?
- Why did Elizabeth Sandlin engage in sex with Samuel Price if he was physically picking her up in the excited, manic state she described to the court?
- Why was this behavior not interpreted as the sign of someone who was not only blind drunk but whose judgment and cognition was manifestly impacted by his intoxication?

Alcohol is not consent… unless you're a woman having sex with a drunk male

The supposedly two-way street has always been one-way.

Many of you will remember my piece about the epidemic of drunk men being raped by fat females. Ched Evans, to my straight eyes a good-looking male specimen, gets controversially convicted for "raping" a drunk female but no one in the judiciary or legal fraternity seemingly bats an eyelid about the tens of thousands of British or American men every week who bed large mammals after 20 beverages.

Beyond human replicas of dirigibles, and when the genders are reversed, plenty of normal-sized women have alleged rape after consuming a handful of drinks. It doesn't matter in these cases whether their (male) sexual partner drank four times as much.

The common theme with all these cases is that men are never the victims. It's a job description filled only by females. We live in a society where feminists and others tell us that women want sex as much as men.

When it comes to alcohol, however, consent is always presumed for men, both by the partners and the legal system. The inherent dichotomy between the genders in this regard is astounding. Women like Elizabeth Sandlin, in the context of a court case, can say they fornicated with a "blind drunk" male. A man saying the same thing about a woman is interpreted as a confession of rape.

Enter feminist crusader Alison Saunders

> It is not a crime to drink, but it is a crime for a rapist to target someone who is no longer capable of consenting to sex though drink.
>
> – Alison Saunders, England and Wales' Director of the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS). She uses gender neutral language here but the history of alcohol-related rape prosecutions makes it clear that this only applies to female "victims".

She wants to end the culture of “blaming” drunk women who have sex and allege rape. So how many times has her CPS prosecuted women for having sex with drunk men?

Since entering the role, England and Wales’ highest-ranking public prosecutor, Alison Saunders, has started a crusade to redefine what rape is. Men must now prove to police investigators that a woman consented (How exactly? A notarized document? An “audio consent” MP3? A secret and therefore illegal sex tape video?).

She wants to, she says, dismantle the culture that prevents “victims” from coming forward and being “heard” when they’ve taken drugs or consumed alcohol before sex.

If women have been held down by a culture that prevents so-called accountability for rape, what about men? And if this culture of denial exists, as Saunders says, how can we explain that women have never been convicted for taking advantage of drunk men or men incapacitated by narcotics?

Presuming that her vague and tendentious reading were accurate, it seems that this culture precludes substance-affected men from reporting women substantially more than the opposite dynamic. Saunders, unsurprisingly, has precious little to say about the impunity with which an Elizabeth Sandlin can say that she slept with a blind drunk man. It’s simply not on her radar.

Women have been taught for years, regardless of what “reformers” say, to treat drunken sex they regret later as rape. Alison Saunders’ arrival to the top job only signals an acceleration of this phenomenon. Typically, feminists and government activists will claim that “patriarchy” socializes women in ways that prevent them from going to the authorities after being raped whilst intoxicated.

On the other hand, no such discount is applied to men, who, it is presumed, have full, unimpeded access to the criminal complaints system, despite the paucity or non-existence of men claiming to have been raped following drinking. Their outlook, so the narrative goes, has not in any sense been undermined by the gender social status quo. In fact, as men they are the beneficiaries of a gargantuan marketplace of “male privilege”. But is that really so?

No amount of pinching will end this dream

Why isn’t the person on the right regarded as a rapist?

Those who sniff glue and claim the legal system allows anyone to make a complaint are kidding themselves. Men like Samuel Price, if they regarded themselves as victims, would never be given the opportunity to be taken seriously. Male incapacitation during sex is institutionally not considered to be rape. The letter of the law may say otherwise, using gender-neutral language, but the spirit is what matters here.

Any time you hear about another Ched Evans being convicted for rape over a drunken girl (assuming her alcohol levels were actually measured and the complaint didn’t come weeks, months or years later), conjure up the memory of Elizabeth Sandlin talking about “sleeping” with a “blind drunk” Samuel Price.

If we were talking about an Elijah Sandlin and a Samantha Price, the end of the last sentence would instead read “Elijah Sandlin talking about about raping a blind drunk Samantha Price.”

Read More: The Truth About False Rape Accusations That All Men Should Know

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Sweden Imports Foreign Contractors To Finalize Its Own Collapse

July 28, 2015 | by Chuck Finley | Link | Original Link

The left is dead set on leading Sweden to its grave, and it would be pretty racist to not let immigrants in on the experience. In fact, they hold the key to realizing this project, since native Swedes can't even be trusted with the simple task of destroying their own country.

Sweden is adopting the exact opposite strategy than that of tax havens. The premise of tax havens is that if you make sure there are few regulations and low taxes, businesses and entrepreneurs will settle in the country. Maintaining and even increasing already heavy taxation and regulation will of course lead entrepreneurs and businesses to not be attracted to the country, and the ones who are here are surely going to be looking for ways to get out.

An erotic display for any Swedish politician

The Swedish model is a welfare check haven. Instead of attracting the most successful entrepreneurs who will create job opportunities, the goal is to attract the most unproductive individuals who will suckle on the taxpayers teat, much like parasites attach to their host. While countries like Switzerland, Luxembourg, and Singapore do their best to attract these entrepreneurs, Sweden does its best to make sure that the only people entering the country are going to do nothing to contribute to economic growth.

When all the employers have stopped recruiting and left because of the compromised marketplace, the Swedish politicians will follow up by blaming capitalism for all the problems in society and convince the foreigners that their only hope is to vote for more leftist policies. Thanks to the wonders of democracy, this destructive perpetual cycle of socialism is established. The leftist economic policies are completely unsustainable and lead to the economic misery that is necessary for them to keep winning elections.

The welfare checks are essentially bribes by politicians, and the immigrants are basically foreign contractors hired with the task of bringing Sweden to its knees.

Mock-up of a politician rewarding his loyal voter, although in reality it would occur much more openly

As you'd expect, Sweden is not only a welfare state but also a nanny state. There is overreaching regulations in virtually all areas except one. Immigration.

"Thou shalt not criticize mass immigration" is the proverb of most Swedish politicians. In defense of massive immigration, progressives seriously claim bushels of entrepreneurs, brain surgeons, and rocket scientists set up shop here. In reality, the people in Sweden who fit in those categories are most likely planning to get out.

Iraqi M.D. Field Surgeon about to perform advanced body amputation before leaving on a plane for Sweden

White privilege is not wanting ISIS terrorists to live in your country

People who return to Sweden after having fought for ISIS actually receive benefits like being prioritized for housing or receiving guaranteed government employment. The social justice warriors in the municipality of Stockholm also want this treatment to have a gender perspective:

> "Whatever the underlying reason, the work needs to counter strategic development of violent extremism. And it is important that this work takes gender perspectives into account. (…) The city's efforts will house a gender perspective to ensure that aid is adjusted to everyone's needs."

If you're not already convinced that Sweden will collapse in the near future after reading that statement, I don't know what will convince you. Putting women on a pedestal is a common SJW behavior, but radical mass murderers who gladly slaughter homosexuals on a daily basis?

It is understandable that the left wishes to provide shelter for those in need, particularly the actual victims who are currently suffering under Islamic tyranny in the Middle East and Africa. But for some reason, the left will victimize even the extremist mass murderers and give them incentives to come live in Sweden. If they want mass immigration so badly, why not at least grant these real victims asylum over the bombers and executioners of ISIS?

This may perhaps be the most obvious clue of the left wanting to destroy Sweden. There are millions of people in desperate need of help, so why prioritize providing shelter for the minority of the most wicked people the world has ever seen? At least the rest of the world can be thankful to Sweden in this regard, since terrorists seem to remain unwanted everywhere else.

The left thrives on people adopting a loser mindset

Making people feel like victims is crucial if you want to rack up votes as a progressive politician. Of course this isn't exclusive to immigrants, as young Swedes are some of the most entitled brats the world has ever seen. This has been achieved by granting them $120 for every month they go to school.

The schools also serve as successful public indoctrination centers for the progressive agenda. I could write a whole book on the brainwashing I was subjected to in school, but it was mainly focused on pushing global warming propaganda and demonizing anyone who criticizes mass immigration, welfare programs, or heavy taxation and regulations.

I can personally attest to the effectiveness of this treatment. While I survived unscathed, most of my peers were not so lucky. Few people can withstand this amount of calculated brainwashing combined with financial incentives, especially at such a young age.

Immigrants are important for politicians because they're a handy source of votes. There's no need to condition your subjects for 18 years like if they're born domestically, as the adult immigrants can vote straight away. It's also easier to convince minorities they are victims of discrimination and racism, which is why progressives are obsessed with finding absurd examples of racism and sexism in any situation.

As soon as someone brings up the idea of restricting either welfare programs or immigration, that person will forever be branded as a racist by Sweden's useful idiots, which conveniently serves the agenda that pushes the victim mindset onto minorities. If politicians speak up against the status quo, the left wins. If they don't speak up, the left naturally wins too.

The lefts greed for votes and deliberate implementation of unsustainable economic policies will ultimately be Sweden's downfall. As the smart leaders of tax havens compete for the productive entrepreneurs, Sweden is on the front lines when it comes to attracting lazy freeloaders and crazed terrorists from across the globe.

Read More: Sweden's Fall To Leftism Is A Cautionary Tale For The Western World

Chuck Finley

Chuck Finley is a young buck from Sweden. He was able to see through the cultural marxist agenda in the school environment early on, which helped him discover both libertarianism and the manosphere. Chuck plans to take advantage of the Swedish school system to the fullest, only to use it as a springboard to abandon the country as soon as possible. Will be writing about Scandinavia with a focus on Sweden.

Why Using A Wingman May Not Be The Best Option For Your Game

July 29, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Game, which has been defined as the art of "applied charisma," is by its nature a social act. You can read as many blog posts and books as you like, comment on forums, and bitch with other guys about the sexual marketplace, but real game is played by talking to real girls in real life out in the streets and clubs and bars of the city in which you live.

Because of this inherent social dimension, many guys are keen to go out with other men as they pursue girls. These men are called wings. While using a wing has undeniable benefits in certain situations, if he isn't carefully selected then the arrangement can be counterproductive and you might even end up losing lays.

Why Use A Wing At All?

Let's face it, for the newbie and even for the more experienced guy, the idea of going out alone to talk to women can be terrifying. It can also be logistically difficult. In general – at night, at least – women don't go out alone, but in pairs or small groups. It takes a ballsy man indeed to intercept alone, and even if he does, the problems of extracting his preferred girl are considerable. In the daytime, too, girls are often to be found out shopping with their friends, making a solo approach daunting.

There is also the matter of state, or vibe, or mojo, or whatever you want to call that heightened social competence that makes killing it in the field seem so much easier. If you go out with another guy then chatting with him as you walk around wherever it is you're looking to pick-up will certainly help get you in the chatty, relaxed mood that is conducive to meeting girls.

But let's be honest here—the real reason that most men use wings is because of fear. They are simply too afraid to go out alone, particularly at night, let alone walk up to an attractive women and indicate their sexual interest in her.

A wing takes the edge off all of this. It makes the going out itself feel like less of an ordeal and more like a straightforward social occasion, with a few laughs and jokes thrown in along the way.

The Upside Of Using A Wing

As stated, if your wing is proficient in game and even remotely honourable then the benefits of working with him are obvious. He will be there to vibe you with prior to your approaching women and then he will step in to help carry sets, perhaps taking your target's less attractive friend off your hands for a while, or ideally escalating with his own girl while you are working yours.

He should also help to boost your confidence, picking you up after a rejection. And perhaps most importantly of all, he can help to point out those IOIs (indicators of interest) that you might otherwise have missed while walking around the bar, coffee shop or mall. Many times I've benefited when another guy has let me know that a girl I hadn't even noticed was checking me out. Without his help I might easily have left money on the table.

The Downsides Of Wingmanship

Sadly, though, life is not a movie and things rarely run as smoothly as you might hope. If your chosen wing is a good friend of yours from way back then the relationship is to some extent “set” – if you are the quiet one then it’s going to be very difficult for you to break out of that preconceived role and become an approach machine.

But on the other hand, if you are the confident one and roll into the bar talking to every girl in sight to the exclusion of your friend, then there is a chance he will become resentful and either sabotage sets or disengage from the process entirely.

For these reasons it is sometimes better to find new friends to go out with – wings with whom you have had no prior relationship who you meet up with solely to pull girls. But even then disparities in ability, looks and energy levels can contribute to a fraying of these often delicate alliances.

The Benefits Of Solo Game

The idea of going out alone to talk to women can be pretty scary. However, the inherent problems of wingmanship sometimes mean that there is no other option. Also, consider this – “game” is always played solo. Even when you go out with your most supportive friends, you still have to talk to the woman of your choice on your own, you have to attract her on your own, you have to escalate on your own and you have to lead her to some suitably intimate location on your own.

A wingman might smooth the path, but he can't cover up for your mistakes nor make you more interesting or charismatic. Those things must come from you alone.

To Wing Or Not To Wing?

Whether to roll with wings or solo is a much-discussed topic on men's sites, and without doubt there is value in both approaches, provided that in the case of the former your wings are of high quality. I myself have gone out with wings and without and I have been successful in both cases. However, I'm going to go out on a limb here and say that going out solo is better.

Why? Well, for a start, I believe it is more efficient. Some of my best lays with some of the cutest girls I've ever attracted have been achieved solo. You cut out all of the crap of having to deal with another guy and just go straight for what you want.

In the case of daytime it actually makes more sense to be alone. If you are going to clubs and bars then you have more flexibility. If one venue is rubbish you can then simply leave and go to another. If anyone asks why you are alone then simply say your friends are elsewhere or front up and tell them you are there by yourself. It really doesn't matter—people are too self-interested to care that much.

The other point is that going out alone and picking up a woman is perhaps one of the most exhilarating things you can do. It will really awaken the hunter-gatherer spirit that lies inert in you.

While I don't totally discount the value of working with a good wing, particularly when you are new and improving your skills, you should always remember that the best wing you can have, and the one who has your interests most firmly at heart, is you.

If you haven't tried solo game then I'd encourage you to go out and give it a go. It really is a lot more fun than you might imagine and I suspect you will be surprised by the results.

Read More: 7 Steps to Follow When Your Game Hits a Dry Spell

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Lesbian Chief Constable Forces Bearded British Cops To Wear Beard Nets

July 29, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

The openly lesbian Chief Constable of Gloucestershire Constabulary, a British police force, has foisted draconian new rules on male officers with beards. The force's new uniform rules will force officers to either wear a "beard net," or shave their beards entirely.

Suzette Davenport, a open lesbian with links to subversive charity "Common Purpose," has defended the uniform rules as necessary to ensure an acceptable appearance and "health and safety." Police representatives have criticised the policy.

Are "beard nets" for male officers a genuine requirement of modern policing or is Suzette Davenport another Cultural Marxist infiltrator doing Gramsci's work?

Health and safety gone mad

Suzette Davenport, Chief Constable of Gloucestershire Constabulary

In addition to beard nets, Chief Constable Davenport has also introduced other measures in an attempt to clothe the beard-ban in an apparently legitimate pursuit. The Times reports that police staff will have to hide visible tattoos with a plaster, while women “have been urged” to wear less makeup.

It is unclear whether any sanctions will attach to women who persist in caking it on a la Josie Cunningham. An inside source told the The Times: “Some of the female PCs have been wearing so much bronzer that they look like the Tango man. But the blokes will just look silly walking around with a big net on their face.”

The Police Federation, which has lately been at odds with Conservative Home Secretary Theresa May over deep cuts to the policing budget, also criticised the policy. Their spokesman Steve White said: “Police officers have got to look professional and smart when they are on duty, but for goodness sake. There is a big difference between a trimmed goatee beard and a full length Father Christmas Z.Z. Top beard. People just need to be sensible.”

Mr. White conceded that there was some legitimate concern about officers sporting “wild beards” on duty: “They can be used as a weapon,. For someone to grab. That’s why it’s important to keep long hair tied back on patrol. But a beard net? Chief Constables shouldn’t be looking at such draconian measures. There are many much more important things that need to be discussed.”

Across the UK, police forces have discretion to implement their own policies relating to facial hair. In London, for instance, the Metropolitan Police has no qualms about allowing beards. In May, a Met officer, Peter Swinger, became an internet sensation when pictures of his neatly trimmed beard and sculpted moustache went viral on Twitter. He was christened “Hipster Cop,” although he later revealed he only listens to Meat Loaf.

Hipster Cop

Common Purpose: dodgy political charity

Common Purpose purports to be an “independent, international leadership development organisation” and claims to give people from the private and non-profit sectors “the inspiration, skills and connections to become better leaders at work and in society.”

They do this by running courses for “leaders,” useful idiots in some position of influence in councils or police forces. Common Purpose’s creepy agenda is, in part, revealed in their own website copy, where they claim they help leaders to:

> Become better – and significantly faster – at breaking down silos and crossing cultures.
>
> Operate effectively outside their comfort zone.
>
> Deliver complex change.

Common Purpose claims its “experiential work” takes place in “in prisons, trading floors, schools, hospitals, production plants and more.” Nowhere on their website is there any indication what mandate this organisation has to “deliver complex change” and order employees to “Operate effectively outside their comfort zone” in institutions which are funded by the British taxpayer.

Documenting the entire gamut of Common Purpose shenanigans is beyond the scope of this article. Former Royal Navy Lietenant Brian Gerrish has exposed the involvement of Common Purpose at the heart of many a British political scandal, including the fact that numerous prominent figures in the Rotherham child abuse scandal, where 1,600 girls were raped by local "Asian" men while police and council officials did nothing for fear of appearing "racist," were graduates of Common Purpose leadership courses.

A leader of men?

Suzette Davenport underwent such a Common Purpose "leadership" course while Assistant Chief Constable of Staffordshire in 2006. Davenport had been placed under investigation by the Independent Police Complaints Commission for her handling of a gangland murder investigation in Staffordshire in 2011. Although she was cleared in 2014, Davenport was appointed as Chief Constable of Gloucestershire with the charges against her still outstanding.

It's difficult to say whether whether the educational charity Common Purpose has exerted undue influence to shoehorn the careerist Davenport into the top job at Gloucestershire Constabulary. A look at Davenport's profile begs the question, what right-minded system of governance appoints a woman who has spent more of her time in desk-jobs like the "national lead for roads policing in England and Wales" and the vice president of the British Association for Women in Policing, and who cavorts with phony political charities, in charge of the men tasked with keeping law and order on Britain's streets?

By introducing beard nets for male officers, Suzette Davenport is leading by the example set by Julia Middleton, the creepy, mind-bending NLP nut who was formerly CEO of Common Purpose and was intimately involved in Sir Brian Leveson's inquiry into press standards, a naked attempt by the British Left to destroy our freedom of the press.

Middleton, in her business book Beyond Authority: Leadership in a Changing World, counselled her adepts to “led beyond authority.” What better way to “lead beyond authority” in public service than by imposing loony policies that alienate front line staff?

The long march through the institutions

Not an Equality and Diversity co-ordinator in sight.

Common Purpose, who have hoovered up close to £500,000 from British police forces alone in fees for training “future leaders,” has been described as a “left wing Freemasonry.” Behind the NLP and management jargon, and the bland business attire, Common Purpose are radically Left-wing.

A radically left-wing gesture like Davenport’s imposition of beard nets is just one more salvo in the agenda to emasculate men in public service, men who are already required to tread on eggshells as they defer the manifold layers of oppressed, wailing minorities above them.

A gesture so emasculating also serves to devalue an old institution like the police, with all its connotations of the preservation of a certain order. Can you imagine Sir Robert Peel’s original bobbies being told to wear nets over their beard for “health and safety” purposes?

Men who are expected to be ready at all hours of the day to mete out violence in order to keep criminals in check cannot be expected to submit to rules dreamed up in a conference room by a jumped-up jobsworth who happens to carry the title of Chief Constable.

If indeed Common Purpose are a malign foreign-influenced cult which seeks, as the conspiracy theorists say, to usurp British state for amalgamation into a federal, social-democratic European state, pursuing the aggressive demoralisation of the police would be an ideal strategy.

It’s a classic case of Gramsci’s edict that progressives should take a “Long march through the institutions.” Let us hope that the undoing of Common Purpose graduate Suzette

Davenport and her zany policy of beard nets will come from a minority which has thus far been muscular in demanding religious accommodation: bearded, Muslim police officers.

Read Next: Modern Social Justice Warriors Use The Same Subversion Strategies As The USSR

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

The Rise Of The Anti-Cuckservative

July 30, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The term "cuckservative" is much more than an insult. It comes loaded with some ideas that makes me think that we are witnessing a great shift in American politics—perhaps even the birth of a new movement.

If you are unfamiliar with the term cuckservative, you need to read Matt Forney's excellent introduction to the concept. Here is Matt's definition:

> [C]uckservatives are right-wing politicians and pundits who make a big show of defending traditional values, yet when push comes to shove, they roll over for the left on every issue out of fear of being called "racist," "sexist" or "homophobic."

Some moderate GOP pundits have claimed that the term comes from white supremacist circles, but in an article on the topic, Milo Yiannopoulos believes that the term cuckservative derives from "cuck" which is:

> [A] byword for needlessly relinquished manliness, for selling out and caving in. The original metaphor of watching your partner getting slammed by another dude now simply means abandoned principles and a lack of backbone. It's a byword for beta male or coward.

In other words, Milo argues that the term is primarily an attack on wimpy conservatives. I am going to disagree with Milo a bit here. While some users of the term "cuckservative" are using it against GOP moderates who are scared of their own shadow, there is no question that other users of the term are using it to describe Republicans who support policies that undermine white people.

I believe that most conservatives, myself included, simply consider themselves Americans, and they are uncomfortable with thinking of themselves as a separate community. But since the Left has been trying to divide the nation into a bunch of ethnic factions for the past 50 years, it was just a matter of time before whites started to think of their own interests.

Regardless of how you approach the term, the use of the term cuckservative is more than an insult. It comes along with the idea that the US government is no longer responsive to the desires of the majority of voters. It also means that people are tired of not being allowed to debate controversial issues that have a significant impact on their lives.

The red pill hits politics

There have always been people outside the political mainstream, both on the left and on the right. These have never amounted to much. The left has groups such as the greens, communists, and socialists, but I have never been able to discern a difference between the agendas of these groups and the Democratic Party platform. On the right there are libertarian and paleo-conservative groups.

There have also been “revolutions” in political parties where a party’s center shifts to the left or to the right. The most recent examples of these movements were the “Reagan revolution” which moved the GOP to the right, and the election of President Obama, which shifted the Democratic Party to the left from the more centrist policies of the Clinton administration.

Unlike these “revolutions” a particular leader is not leading the current awakening. Rather, it is a grass roots movement where a whole segment of the Republican base is waking up to realize that the Republican Party is completely unresponsive to the wishes of its constituents. It is as if a large portion of a major party took the red pill at the same time.

Causes of the awakening

Interestingly, it has been the Republican response to the policies of President Obama that have precipitated the awakening. Here are a few examples.

Corporate Influence

The “signature legislation” of the Obama administration is Obamacare. It’s a political masterpiece. It enriches the President’s big money donors (insurance companies, drug companies, and the AMA) and provides marginal aid to low-income voters while making the middle class foot the bill.

The Democrats played hardball to get it passed, but the Republican opposition has been clownish. Instead of acting intelligently to modify the law, they voted on repeals of the whole Act, knowing that these repeals had no chance of passing both houses of Congress.

Obamacare is just the tip of the iceberg when it comes corporate influence on US politics. Disciples of Ayn Rand like to believe that corporate CEOs are all incorruptible John Galts who are valiantly opposing socialism and any check on human creativity. In truth, they are more likely to be schmoozing government officials in the hope that they can gorge at the government trough at the expense of taxpayers.

Whether it is wrongheaded immigration policy, free trade deals that ship manufacturing jobs overseas, or environmental legislation that bans cheap incandescent light bulbs, corporate money is likely behind it.

Identity politics

It is not a secret that the Democrats are heavily reliant upon blacks as a voting bloc. Part of the President’s success is because he was very effective in getting black voters to the polls. Hillary needs to do the same thing to win.

To make sure that black voters stay active, the Democratic strategy has been to inflame racial tensions. The way this has been done is through the hyping of events such as the Trayvon Martin shooting by the "white Hispanic" man, and events in Ferguson and Baltimore. In a different political climate, these events would have remained local news stories. Instead, they have been amplified and turned into the Black Lives Matter movement.

Ironically, the people who get labeled "racist" are not the leftists who are perpetuating identity politics, but the people who object to it.

Illegal immigration

Another thing that has been annoying conservatives is the lack of enforcement of existing border laws. This was compounded by the President's executive amnesty for illegal immigrants.

The Left's aim is to shift the racial, and more importantly, the voting demographics of the country. The political Left in the US is not dispassionate about the decreasing role that whites will play in the future—they are positively giddy about it. A recent Salon headline read:

> Enjoy it while it lasts! GOP base is still white and aging. Yes, Democrats got hammered yesterday. But the demographics are undeniable, and the GOP's base still has no future

If you don't have a problem with the above headline, consider what the reaction would have been if it read:

> Enjoy it while it lasts! Hillary's base is still aging females. The demographics are undeniable. Hillary's base still has no future

The GOP not only did not oppose the executive amnesty, they funded it without raising an eyebrow.

The Republican presidential candidates have been similarly weak on immigration.

While he was campaigning for the Senate, Marco Rubio opposed creating a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants saying, "We have a path for citizenship. It's called coming legally into this country." But as soon as he was safely in the Senate he started work on a comprehensive immigration reform bill that included a path to citizenship.

GOP establishment darling Jeb Bush stated that for some immigrants crossing the border illegally is an "act of love."

Meanwhile, anyone who makes the perfectly reasonable suggestion that we should actually enforce the border laws that are already on the books is called a racist.

Cuckservatives don't want to debate

"Liberals claim that they want to give a hearing to other views but then are shocked and offended to discover that there are other views."
~William F. Buckley

Conservative Americans have always harbored reservations about the issues listed above, but they have never dared to speak openly because they feared being branded with a label. The difference is that now, these issues are being discussed in the open.

This should be a welcome development. Instead of demonizing people for raising wholly legitimate concerns, we can freely debate these issues.

But the cuckservatives are not happy about that. They believe that the future of the Republican Party is to continue to move leftward as the wider society marches leftward. And if the current policies are hastening the move then so be it.

What next?

The more important question is what happens from here? Is the new awakening the start of a new movement? Or even a new nationalist political party?

Let's hope it is not the foundation for a third party. Parliamentary systems favor the creation of new parties, but the US system of government makes third parties a losing proposition. Plus, Hillary would like nothing better than to see a third party candidate to the right to help her cruise to victory.

Instead, I'd like to see the new openness go mainstream. I believe the majority of the Republican base feels this way. The campaign of Donald Trump has shown that conservatives will support politicians who fire their politically correct cuckservative handlers and talk about the issues that Americans care about.

But will other Republicans have the courage to do it? I am pessimistic, but I never would have dreamed that illegal immigration could be discussed openly at a national level. Perhaps there is still hope.

Read More: 10 Signs You Might Be A Cuckservative

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The Four Cardinal Virtues

July 30, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

Traditional Christian theology names faith, hope, and charity as the theological virtues. They are directly imparted to the believing Christian by the grace of God and are not attainable through the natural order. They are called theological because they have God for their immediate and proper object; because they are divinely infused; and because they are only known through divine revelation.

Grace perfects nature and the three theological virtues are the flowers of the four cardinal virtues: prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude. The word cardinal comes the Latin cardo, translated as “hinge.” Whether you’re a lifelong Christian or a Godless heathen, the cardinal virtues are part of the natural moral order and can be cultivated through self-discipline and hard work. We must cultivate them if we expect to live a happy life in this world.

Roots In Antiquity

It’s difficult to overstate how much Greek philosophy has influenced Christian theology. Plato identified the four cardinal virtues with a corresponding class of citizen in The Republic.

Temperance applied especially to farmers and craftsmen, i.e. those who provided for our bodily appetites. Fortitude was the necessary virtue of the soldier and corresponded to our spirit. Prudence was the virtue of the ruling class. Justice stood outside the system and governed the relationship between the other three classes and the virtues.

The Roman statesman Cicero also emphasized the four:

> Virtue may be defined as a habit of mind (animi) in harmony with reason and the order of nature. It has four parts: wisdom (prudentiam), justice, courage, temperance.

And the deuterocanonical Book of Wisdom 8:7 in the Bible:

> And if a man love justice: her labours have great virtues; for she teacheth temperance, and prudence, and justice, and fortitude, which are such things as men can have nothing more profitable in life.

The first recorded instance of the word “cardinal” to describe these virtues occurs in St. Ambrose of Milan’s commentaries on the Gospel of Luke. Later on it appears in the writings of St. Augustine and St. Jerome. St. Thomas Aquinas gave it the most in-depth and systematic treatment of any other theologian in Western Christianity.

Prudence

Thomas teaches that prudence is the virtue that corresponds to the intellect. It enables us to discern our true good in any given situation and the proper means of achieving it. Because it is rooted in the intellect, prudence does not mean directly willing the good it sees, but rather sets the measure for the exercise of the other virtues.

Most importantly, it identifies the golden mean where natural virtue lies. If we lack prudence, courage becomes suicidal recklessness. Mercy becomes weakness. Justice becomes tyranny.

Not a prudent man

We must not confuse prudence with cowardice or dissimulation. It is the charioteer of the other virtues and guides the judgment of our conscience. The shortest and most effective definition of prudence is “right reason applied to action.” You wouldn’t start your own business without a plan of some sort, no matter how vague.

Justice

Prudence governs our actions. Fortitude and temperance concern taming our irascibility and our appetites. Justice deals with our rights and obligations toward other people.

Obviously the words “justice and “right” have been much abused over the last few decades, but abuse does not preclude legitimate use. If Jones borrows money from Smith, then Smith, in justice, has a right to get his money back if Jones refuses to pay up. The supernatural virtue of charity means going above and beyond the demands of justice; Smith may forgive Jones of his debt and make the money a gift. Justice is blind because she does not respect our position in society.

Sometimes justice has to be taken into our own hands

Justice means respecting others and fulfilling our obligations to them, whether it’s their right to life and limb or simply adhering to contracts. It means expressing gratitude toward those who have done us a kindness. It definitely does not mean a vague and undefined resentment of cishet white male shitlords to last in perpetuity upon pain of losing your livelihood.

Temperance

Temperance is geared toward governing our appetites for sensible pleasure, whether it's food, alcohol, or sex. If man is the rational animal, as Aristotle put it, then temperance is necessary for governing our animal natures. It ensures our will's mastery over our base instincts.

I do not believe she adequately moderates her food and drink

If we can't moderate our own desires, then we cannot act rightly, render other men what is their due, or overcome adversity. In the New Testament, this virtue is often called "sobriety" and "moderation." The results of intemperance should be obvious: grotesque obesity, raging alcoholism, or swimming in STDs. We admire people who dramatically change their physiques through diet and exercise because they are living examples of the virtue of temperance.

Fortitude

Fortitude is often used interchangeably with courage. Remember prudence though: it is a reasoned courage. It's not foolhardiness or rashness. It's the virtue that allows us to overcome our fears and remain steadfast in the pursuit of our goals.

Prudence and justice tell us what we must do, and fortitude gives us the strength to see it through. Christian martyrs, for example, do not actively seek martyrdom, unlike Islamic suicide bombers. But whether it's the Religion of Peace, or the Soviet Union, or the Roman Empire, Christian history is rife with martyrs who peacefully went to their deaths rather than renounce their faith.

In the context of the United States, if you even mildly agree with anything written on Return of Kings or the manosphere, or the orthosphere where my fellow Traditionalists hang out, eventually the SJWs are going to come for you.

Don't actively seek out to die on that hill, particularly if you have young children to feed. But if you're ever in their crosshairs, never, ever back down under any circumstances. If you apologize, you're going to lose your job anyway, only now you've lost your dignity besides.

Never quit

A Virtuous Man

The four cardinal virtues all work in tandem. Prudence identifies what is good, how to do what is good, and how to avoid evil. Justice ensures that we respect one another's rights and fulfill our obligations and duties. Temperance gives us the self-control to forgo short-term pleasures in pursuit of our long-term goals. Fortitude will see us through to the end, whether we succeed or fail.

As St. Augustine put it:

> To live well is nothing other than to love God with all one's heart, with all one's soul and with all one's efforts; from this it comes about that love is kept whole and uncorrupted (through temperance). No misfortune can disturb it (and this is fortitude). It obeys only [God] (and this is justice), and is careful in discerning things, so as not to be surprised by deceit or trickery (and this is prudence).

Self-improvement entails more than building up our bodies. We must improve our spirits as well.

Read More: The 4 Cardinal Virtues Of The True Womanhood Cult

Andrew Levinson

Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

Why Do Female Comedians Need To Constantly Take Their Clothes Off?

July 31, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The August issue of GQ created a storm of controversy this month for its cover featuring "comedienne" Amy Schumer scantily dressed as Star Wars character Princess Leia. With the droid C-3PO standing next to Schumer and his finger being phallically placed in her mouth, the cover was just the teaser for a series of erotically-themed photographs inside.

The first cousin once removed of New York Senator Chuck Schumer is not the first "funny woman" to resort to taking off her clothes to get attention, in between lambasting the supposedly "sexist" and "unequal" comedy "boys' club."

Chelsea Handler, Kathy Griffin, and Tina Fey have all opted to fight the patriarchy in recent times by sexualizing themselves to the hilt. Simultaneously, they continue to ride the feminist freight train, implicitly asking fans to support them because they epitomize the rise of a female comedy scene not only equal to but superior to the men's brand.

As they do this, the actual jokes they tell are lost amidst the boobs, cleavage, posteriors and spandex. Oh, and the regurgitation of the feminism.

George Carlin Didn't Need To Use His Body To Sell Shows Or Other Performances

When you look at the female comedy world, the emphasis of late has been on staged scandals and attention grabs. Though she didn't bare her breasts (in this particular incident at least), Sarah Silverman claimed that she used to be "paid less than men" for performing. What she conveniently left out was that at this time she was at the beginning of her career, non-famous and paled in comparison to the well-known figures whose gigs she often introduced. My colleague Matt Forney covered this story earlier this year at Return of Kings.

Because contrivances like Silverman's are less visceral and not-in-your-face, female comedians desiring the public spotlight have had to resort to other mechanisms. Chelsea Handler has been a repeat offender at letting her sexualization, not her "comedy," do the talking. In addition to her reenactment of Putin's horseback riding in the picture above (where she left it to others to blur out her breasts), she has disseminated her nude photos on other occasions, including situations where wasn't even trying to paint on the weak veneer of comedy (i.e. she just released a Kim Kardashian-style nude selfie).

Even "High-Brow" Comediennes Have Used The Booby Factor

Tina Fey's headline-generating appearance to "farewell" talk show host David Letterman using her body and spandex shows the extent to which female comedy has degenerated. Of all the "front-list" female comedy performers, only Amy Poehler hasn't resorted to either carefully-executed booby or body-flashing or asinine accusations of misogyny which are bereft of context (Silverman's equal pay fantasy).

And this may have more to do with Poehler's lack of body confidence, not a lack of actual desire to do it if she could. In addition, the star of Parks and Recreation not so subtlety imbues many of her fictional and non-fictional appearances with appeals to feminism, girls marching forward and other political trinkets.

In this vein, Fey is joining forces with the more unstable corners of female comedy, including the perennially attention-deprived Kathy Griffin. Griffin has stripped during New Year's celebrations in front of (gay) Anderson Cooper, to promote or during appearances on Jay Leno and David Letterman, and to "raise awareness" of the Ice Bucket Challenge fighting Lou Gehrig's Disease.

There are a series of other "events" involving her and removed clothes that I simply cannot keep track of and include in this piece. Whether naked or partially clothed, Griffin loves the attention. But can someone please remember one of her comedic acts?

Feminism And Female Comedy Are A Joke

Feminism will tell you in one breath that the sexualization of women is horrendous and in the next one turn a blind eye to women sexualizing themselves for massive economic gain and to attract viewers' eyes. Women selling their bodies, even mediocre or aging ones, is not restricted to modeling, pornography and everyday narcissism on Instagram.

In the absence of the proper means to adequately compete with male comics, Schumer, Handler, Fey and Griffin have to parlay their appendages and sheer sexual innuendo to get by.

The result? Female comedy is a circus, rather than a collection of acts that actually make people genuinely laugh. And a woman taking her clothes off has long been an old joke.

Read More: You Will Be Banned If You Reply To A Female Commenter

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

6 Ways Modern Women Are Just Like Orcs

July 31, 2015 | by David Mousseau | Link | Original Link

Over the past few weeks I have immersed myself in the world of Shadow of Mordor on the PS4. As I cut a swath through the rather repetitive but deeply satisfying main quest, I began to notice a pattern in that the orcs in the game show many similarities to women in the modern Western world.

This led me to rediscover the Lord of the Rings films and books, where the telltale signs became increasingly unavoidable. Here are six of them:

1. Their fashion tastes blow, and not in the good way

Orcs have an odd obsession with very weird, very bland diversity in their fashion choices. They enjoy adorning themselves with bones, random face paint, and matted hair that has not been washed since the Second Age. Some go so far as to wear mohawks, or helmets crowned by pots of flames. The beasts appear oblivious to their horrible looks, even when the peer pressure of swag-loaded Easterling and Haradrim soldiers bounds forth in Return of the King.

This sad and unperceptive approach to fashion is unmistakably shared by modern women. Spend an afternoon at Target or the mall and you quickly see how terribly lost femininity and gracefulness is from the minds of these hags, who scuttle around in pajamas or ill-fitting yoga pants that display the niceties of their burgeoning cottage cheese.

Rarely is their edgy attire lacking a trenta frappucinno for the one hand and a butch or Skrillex hairstyle at the crown, both perfect warning signs of her gluttonous appetite and independent womyn status. A smartphone peppered with pictures of food and selfies of a certain human cow is a further accessory, along with imposing problem glasses (or the polarized equivalent) to denote her frantic love of conformist style.

Like their orcish cousins, women appear to be fantastically ignorant of the pathetic manner in which they showcase themselves in public, and view any criticism of it as unacceptable hostility.

2. They see obesity as a virtue

Because food is scarce for the plundering orcs of Middle Earth, their brutish culture uplifts fatness as one of the highest worldly ideals, apart from slaughtering non-orcs and each other. In Two Towers the orcs who meet Merry and Pippin's Uruk-hai captors end up battling them over a desire to eat the two hobbits.

Years before inside the Misty Mountains, Bilbo and his dwarf friends found themselves facing the hospitality of a very fat and oily Goblin King, who they had to fight in order to proceed with their quest. The theme of these scenes is clear: the most powerful and influential of the savage creatures have the luxury to eat in copious amounts, while their scrawny underlings must draw blood and risk their own skins just to survive.

Take a quick glance over the Huffington Post “Style” or “Plus Size” sections, and the similarities in the culture of modern women become difficult to ignore. It is impossible to scroll down just a few times without encountering several articles praising some obscure lard bucket for “being herself,” and “challenging body conformity” by slipping her size 14 flab into a size 4 spandex costume.

The comment sections under these pieces are uniquely insightful, offering countless hugbox messages from fellow women to resist the waves of insecurity with the levies of mediocrity.

In fairness to orcs, the hazardous nature and limited food supply of Middle Earth makes attaining the seductive status of cellulite chieftain somewhat more difficult; modern women need only find a nice young beta with a diamond ring.

3. They are unproductive, parasitic consumers

The ravenous drive of orcs, coupled with their inability to create anything of worth, turns them into drooling organisms dependent on others for subsistence. Their condition forces them to raid the farmsteads of Rohan, loot and ruin the Kingdom of Moria, and even turn to eating fellow orcs to satisfy hunger.

After they are finished pillaging and burning the targets of their food chase, they leave nothing behind but charred buildings, torched farmland and layers of cobwebs. Nowhere in the Lord of the Rings mythos is there an example of an orc who tends to crops he planted, works as a merchant, or rules a kingdom of some great stature; the foremost examples of leaders are at the helms of marauding parties or broken strongholds which are actually dominated at the supreme level by non-orcs.

Here again modern women fall in line. Few can produce anything more than children with abject losers who they eventually divorce, and most women spend more time glued to their iPhone screen than raising their offspring. They consume immense amounts of food, money, and energy, while bringing little of worth to the table. It is rare to find one that is not dependent on Lunchables and frozen food to prevent their family's starvation.

4. They use great numbers to compensate for weakness

No matter how savage they appear, or the great lengths to which they will go to brag about their own prowess in combat, orcs are fundamentally puny creatures that must rely on overwhelming force to defeat an enemy. In Shadow of Mordor they will bark orders to each other, urging fellow mudrats to surround the player character and hit him from every side, win with a cowardly blow to his flank. In the event of a strategic failure, the orc captains will run like spring chickens rather than risk being killed.

When it comes to modern women, the similar propensity for using greater numbers to shore up weak individual talent is stridently present. It is the reason why any major story involving a feminist heroine standing up against “rape culture” must always be trumpeted to the highest news outlets in the land before any manner of objective analysis can be performed to check for validity.

The Emma Sulkowicz and UVA rape claims illustrate this dynamic; because the evidence was so scant to prove a sexual assault happened, social media and national news had to be fed elaborate lies about a sinister conspiracy to suppress crimes against women.

5. They are the angels of betrayal

Within the first few hours of gameplay, Shadow of Mordor introduces Ratbag the Coward, a pathetic orc willing to sell his allegiance to the present garrison captain for a chance to rise in the ranks himself. Ratbag’s treachery pays off, landing him the coveted title at the expense of his fellow soldiers in the army of Sauron. The obsession with betrayal in orc culture is a constant theme of the game, with regular instances of ambushes, executions, and theft between the feuding orc leaders.

Modern women are no better. Notwithstanding the constant reinforcement of “strong” female images, support group culture, and the feminist legal system, the ladies of today have a horrible pattern of betraying men and each other for their own gain. Beyond the throbbing epidemic of slut rangers being inflicted on relationships in the current age, there is the somewhat more surprising issue of females knifing each other in the back with short notice.

It is impossible to hang around a group of women without getting a whiff of this sort of behavior. A sorority girl will embrace her friend and proclaim their sisterly love, only to badmouth the other when she walks away, or bang the boyfriend of “my soul sister.” The sad truth is that, like the orcs, they rationalize this behavior and refuse to see the contradictions of their own actions.

6. They descended from a greater race

According to Saruman the White, many orcs can trace their lineage back to the Eastern Elves, an elder race of creatures that has mostly vanished as a group from the face of Middle Earth. The elves, commonly viewed as more majestic and graceful than the race of men, were slowly corrupted until they became a representation of everything wrong with the rise of Sauron. They went from being the utmost aspirations of society, far above the flawed humanity of men and the rowdy spirits of the dwarves, to playing a critical role in its destruction.

In the same way, the women of today come from a heritage of tremendous grandeur which they have managed to obliterate in only a few hundred years. There was once a time when women genuinely held the status of “the fairer sex,” and knights would literally pledge their lives to the service of a particular lady.

Dying to protect a woman’s honor was one of the paramount glories for a man, as it meant sacrificing everything to defend a gift from God. Motherhood was seen as the ultimate undertaking for women, as children were viewed to be the future of Christendom, a treasure not for losing.

Thanks to the rise of feminism and social degeneracy, all these womanly virtues have been replaced with a gender-neutral culture of slut worship, female masculinity, and the degradation of mothers in healthy families. Modern ladies are more likely to aspire to be a reality television star living in the estate of whoredom rather than a mother or devoted wife. Children are only valuable in their eyes if they fall into the stencil of single motherhood or are some obscure biracial mix that can satisfy the depraved fetishes of white liberal culture.

Conclusion

It might seem unfair to compare the eternally-labeled gentle sex to savage things that rise from the mud of a mystical world to wreak havoc on all, but the links between them are brazenly evident. Women have indeed fallen from the utmost vessels of good in human society to the purveyors of a fresh path, a violent slouching towards the pits of a new Gomorrah.

And the worst part is they will probably never realize it.

Read More: 5 Things That Have Ruined American Women

David Mousseau
David Mousseau is a Franco-Texan who lived the first nine months of his life as a man inside a woman's body. Now happily post-transition, he defends the patriarchy by writing at libertyphalanx.com and tweeting @davidmousseau65

Sweden Continues To Fund Bizarre And Inappropriate Sex Education For Young Children

August 1, 2015 | by Prince Prospero | Link | Original Link

Sex is big business in Sweden. In Sweden, big business means government funding and political influence. Two organizations stand out in power, influence, and wealth, and are responsible for corrupting countless children and pushing a bizarre sexual agenda: RFSU and RFSL. This article will give a brief introduction the history and current activities of these two institutions.

Sexual "Enlightenment"

RFSU, The Swedish Association for Sexuality Education, was founded in 1933 by Elise Ottesen-Jensen, also known as Ottar. Ottesen-Jensen was a Norwegian syndicalist who is best known to an international audience for being one of the co-founders of International Planned Parenthood Federation.

Today, the journal of RFSU, Ottar, still bears her name. Free abortion is one of the most important issues of RFSU, but the organization is also the authority on all sexual issues, from contraceptives to education on the actual act itself.

Elise Ottesen-Jensen agitating in her youth.

Sexual education in Swedish schools does include representatives from RFSU visiting the class. These meetings have often been criticized for the fact that the teacher is removed and the RFSU official is holding his or her own class with the students. To complete the Orwellian aspect of all of this, this representative is usually called “informer.”

An Informer that visited a class of 15 year olds in Umeå spent her time educating the pupils in “the right to be a whore at school” as well as playing the condom game. Apparently this game is similar to musical chairs, but the participants are divided into groups represented by various kinds of condoms. The game was mandatory for all pupils.

All French ticklers please rise?

Anna Kosztovics, who in 2005 was active in the Malmö district for RFSU, wrote about the importance of allowing children to “play sex”. She based her article on her own experiences when she held educational courses for kindergarten kids during 2003. The focus seemed to have been on “breaking the hetero-nom” and to allow public masturbation in the quiet areas of the kindergarten. Public masturbation is a reoccurring theme in RFSU education, and usually labelled knullkoja (fuck-hut).

Anna Kosztovics being wonderful and jittery.

Anna Kosztovics goes on to describe a ”normal” occurrence where two seven year old boys competed in a hockey game and the loser had to suck the other boys penis after each lost game. The boy that usually won said he mostly won because didn’t like the smell of urine from the other boy’s member. She ends her article by explaining how she considers the subject “wonderful and jittery”.

Apart from sending Informers to schools and kindergartens, RFSU are working in close harmony with the Church of Sweden. At confirmation camps, 14-year-olds were educated and then issued a “knullborgarmärke.” This is a play with words, referring to a “simborgarmärke” that indicates that you can swim 200 meters.

Knullborgarmärke should be roughly translated into “fuck-badge.” According to RFSU, the badge gave the 14-year-olds a license to have sex. Since the informers are alone with the kids, priests responsible for the camps claimed they did not know of this occurrence. The practice was stopped once it leaked in 2007.

Current projects include a norm breaking work at the kindergarten of Västerås, where the game “mom, dad, kids” is to be replaced with the “family game” instead, since it could be daddy, daddy, daddy, kid or whatever other combination of sexes. The youngest groups at this school are apparently 1 – 5 years old.

Thank God they don’t play a hockey game!

The information campaign of 2015 includes classes where participants are to moan, touch themselves and say phrases like “harder” and “softer.” Four couples are presented in the informational movies, two heterosexual and two homosexual. The target group for the campaign is Swedish 13-year-old schoolchildren.

Actual tax money on top of these various businesses is hard to estimate. I have tried to get a vague idea, but it is almost impossible, since, like so many other tax posts in Sweden, the figures given are shady at best.

Gay And “Whatever Letter Combination Is In Fashion” Rights

RFSL, Swedish Federation for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Rights, is a younger organization, although it boasts to be the oldest gay rights organization in the world. It was founded in 1950 by Allan Hellman.

Apart from working towards legalizing gay marriage, gay adoption, and to generally make homosexuality more accepted in society, RFSL has also been active in trying to lower the age of consent (currently 15). This work was carried out by a group called Pedophile Working Group.

Today, RFSL officially rejects the idea of consensual sex between adults and children. They were also opposing laws making AIDS carriers legally bound to inform their sex partners of their disease.

Its current leader is Ulrika Westerlund, who has a passed at the feminist magazine Bang.

For all you that read my previous article on the Silence Norm of libraries, you might remember this publication.

Ulrika Westerlund looking for government funding

Just as RFSU, tax spending on RFSL is very hard to estimate. It is usually on a rather local level and based on personal connections. In Malmö, the representative for the communist party, Hanna Thomé, increased funding yearly from 340,000 SEK 2009 to 1.9 million 2014. The entire sum for all of Sweden can only be guessed.

Hanna Thomé, eager to hand out other peoples money

A truly lucrative business is the selling of HBTQ certificates. Swedish municipalities, libraries, churches etc. need to pay RFSU for the schooling to be able to pass the test to get this. However, these certificates expire after three years, and then need to be bought again.

There are currently 290 municipalities in Sweden, and a certificate cost around 6 million SEK (700,000 USD) for a normal one. Apart from educating the workforce, informers are chosen by the best students that are expected to report any occurrences of homophobic behaviors or expressions.

Bad conversations are to be stopped and theories such as postmodern feminist theory, queer theory, gender, post-colonial theory, black feminism and racialization should be encouraged. This is the official list of issued certificates so far.

Radical Socialists In Our Midst

RFSL is more openly socialist and communist than RFSU. Dispatch International interviewed representatives for the organization as was openly told that “what is good for the collective is good for the individual.”

Many more radical groups seem to be loosely associated to RFSL. Perhaps “Hetero hate day” is one of the more flamboyant. According to the participant in this video, the day is about the struggle against the hetero society. He goes on to name the emotions they celebrate, that apart from hate include “a little bit of horniness, a little bit of frustration, a little bit of joy. Perhaps a little bit of love and such as well.” The event is sponsored by the Institute for Queer studies and as such receives tax funded sponsoring.

RFSL is currently engaged in a rather peculiar conflict, as a pride is being planned in the Muslim dominated suburbs of Stockholm. This pride is organized by men and women linked to the nationalistic party Sverigedemokraterna and for that reason, the homosexuals taking part in this march are being labelled racists by RFSL and many other prominent members of Swedish MSM.

The march will, unless RFSL manage to stop it, be held on the 29th of July. A gay counter event will be held at the same time by “anti-racist” HBTQ activists. A rather funny internal argument arose around this counter event, which at first was labeled as a picnic, but as the word “picnic” was suspected of having racist origins the activity was changed to “hang-put”.

We will try to cover this event in future articles. Until then, please enjoy your “male privilege” while it lasts.

Read More: Swedish Government Spends Billions On Gender Equality With Little Effect

Prince Prospero
Prince Prospero is a white cis gender Swedish male and responsible for all suffering throughout history. When not oppressing minorities, women or purposefully destroying the environment, he enjoys reading, writing and exploring his new home, far, far away from Sweden.

5 Proven Ways To Become More Assertive

August 1, 2015 | by Andrian Red | Link | Original Link

Last week I went to dinner with my cousin and her friend who were visiting me for some days. They really enjoy Italian food so I booked a table in one of the most traditional Italian restaurants in town. The menu was kind of complicated because we had many options to choose from, so I asked the waiter to enlighten us a bit and suggest some of the most popular dishes.

While talking to the waiter, I noticed my cousin's friend struggling to keep eye contact with him and also expediting signs of uncomfortable body language during his presence. I didn't really pay much attention to his behavior and went on ordering some of the most interesting dishes in the menu.

When the dishes arrived, we had a variety of options to choose from. The friend looked really excited with the food choices and starting tasting every single dish to get an overall taste of our mini feast.

When he tried the penne al'arrabiata however, he noticed that the sauce was way too spicy. I am not really an expert when it comes to Italian food but, to his defense, I have to admit that the sauce was unusually spicy. Without hesitation, I called the waiter and politely asked him to change the dish and bring us something with a more balanced flavor.

To the sound of my comment, the friend blushed and in a moment of self-guilt, he urged me not to change anything and that the dish was fine. I obviously ignored him and asked him to relax, explaining that sometimes it is nice to get what you want.

The rest of the dinner flowed naturally and the friend eventually ended up loving the balanced taste of his new penne al’arrabiata.

Understanding Assertiveness

In order to understand this concept concretely I will quote a really nice paragraph I read in psychcentral on the topic:

> Most people think of being assertive as an external thing, as facing up to difficulties with other people in a strong manner. The reality is that the problem goes deeper. To be assertive, we must first learn to face up to some core beliefs about ourselves. We need to see what we are doing to ourselves by being unassertive, and how this is affecting us.

In my opinion, unassertiveness is strongly associated with lack of self-esteem. When you see yourself as a person who lacks value, it is normal to assume that what other people think of you is more important than what you think of yourself.

When you don’t assume complete ownership of your own mental space, you automatically degrade your personal value and you let it get affected by the mental space of others.

Dr Robert Glover, in his bestselling book, "No More Mr. Nice Guy" refers to this as a doormat mentality where the unassertive person is trying too hard to please others while neglecting one's own needs, thus causing unhappiness and resentfulness.

It is a mentality that not only affects the person himself but also causes frustration to others around him because his lack of proper need for communication is usually translated to neediness and approval seeking.

Understanding and eventually accepting this reality was a turning point for me and I truly believe it is the turning point for most people. It is crucial to recognize that we are all different and consequently most of us have different needs. And that is ok. Assertiveness is the ultimate tool to communicate those needs in an effective and elegant way.

Here are a few practical and useful ways that can help assertiveness become a strong part of your existential paradigm.

1. Embrace Assertiveness As A Mindset

It is crucial to understand that the first step to becoming more assertive, is to embrace assertiveness as a mindset. If you don't understand the fundamental principles of assertiveness and how they can impact your life, you will end up trying to fake an assertive behavior and this will most certainly have a negative effect on you.

I can understand that a mentality shift is quite a tricky process but don't undervalue the power of suggestion when it comes to imposing certain ideas and behaviors on your new self. Yes, it will take time and yes it will feel a bit awkward in the beginning but that's ok. Embrace the process and you will start enjoying the benefits of assertiveness in no time.

2. Harness The Power Of Body Language

Assertiveness, like most of the behaviors associated with confidence and control, are principally demonstrated in a non-verbal way. As usual, the major ingredients of non-verbal assertiveness are eye contact, tonality and posture.

Eye contact

Keeping eye contact while communicating your need is crucial to eventually satisfying it because it demonstrates how serious you are about it. This is however a very elegant process and there is a thin line between creepiness and assertiveness when trying to do it right.

Micro expressions can easily betray your intentions and miscommunicate your message. A relaxed eye contact that sub communicates confidence and compassion, is usually a great way to go.

Tonality

Deep tonality is always important because it communicates dominant masculine polarity, but when it comes to assertiveness things are a bit different. Yes, deep tonality is still crucial but it also needs to be combined with the right amount of playfulness and sarcasm.

It goes without saying that the temptation of adopting a more aggressive tone will always be present. Managing to escape this point however, differentiates people who really understand assertiveness from those who don't. Especially when it comes to male-female interactions, the right combination of all these elements is a huge attraction spike.

Posture

A great posture is a strong non-verbal indicator of confidence and dominance. Amy Cuddy in her famous TED Talk suggests that standing in a posture of confidence, even when we don't feel confident, can affect testosterone and cortisol levels, and have an impact on how successfully we can communicate our message.

3. Stop Justifying Yourself

When it comes to assertiveness, justification is a weakness. Whether we like it or not, assertiveness is a notion strongly associated with the idea of power. Any behavior that attempts to jeopardize this idea will most probably lead to a false attempt to demonstrate an assertive behavior.

The more we familiarize ourselves with social interactions and behavioral dynamics, the more we come to understand that usually emotions and feelings triumph over logic and likewise, grandiosity over humility.

4. Pay Attention To Your Frame

Another crucial characteristic of an assertive character is the ability to understand and eventually hold an assertive frame. In a nutshell, your ability to hold, explain and support your frame can be considered as the foundation of an assertive character.

A great example of strong frame demonstration that signifies an assertive character is Russell Brand. Check out this video for more detail:

5. Carefully Manage Your Emotions

A common similarity noted among passive and aggressive men is that they both fail to understand others' intentions. Aggressive men fail to understand the frame communicated by others, thus ending up exerting their will through physical, mental, and emotional force.

Passive men on the other hand, due to their inability to understand others' views and opinions, constantly submit their will to the will of others. They try to please everyone in a very needy and sometimes creepy way that eventually makes both themselves and their surroundings miserable.

Drawing from the two extreme behaviors demonstrated by aggressive and passive men, we come to understand the importance and power of assertiveness. Assertive men embrace the balance between passivity and aggression but in an emotionally intelligent way.

They understand that although it is important to care for others, firstly you cannot please everyone and secondly you cannot satisfy other people's needs if your needs are already unsatisfied.

Conclusion

Before I conclude this article, I would like to remind you that obviously there are going to be times when assertiveness can't really help you. Perhaps you are in the army and you need to just follow orders, perhaps you are in a very important meeting and you need to play it safe, or perhaps you are just too tired to argue.

Nevertheless, learning to communicate your needs, defending your frame and raising your opinion, will definitely make you a freer and more confident person. Always have in mind that assertiveness is a tool to help you have more control over your life.

There are things you can control and things you can't control, but your life should definitely belong in the first category.

Read More: One Way To Defeat Your Social Anxiety

Andrian Red
Andrian is a lifelong learner, devoted skeptic and ethical hedonist. He is the founder of www.thequintessentialman.com, the only online community that offers a holistic approach to masculine self-growth. He is also the creator of "30 Challenges-30 Days-Zero Excuses", a challenging project aimed to help men take back control of their life.

How Can We Overcome The Adverse Effects Of Modern Culture?

August 2, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

Modern culture appears to be dominant and unstoppable. Leftist insanity is increasing, traditional institutions are collapsing and people with views contrary to the accepted norm are literally portrayed as monsters.

Furthermore, few seem to be aware of its affects, even though they are blindingly obvious to anyone with rational capabilities. The fact that the reasoned are so greatly outnumbered makes it very difficult to organise a cogent movement to tackle the problems at source, as they are simply laughed away and dismissed by the majority (95% +) who actually believe that the only threats to Western civilization are global warming and Muslims.

It is for this reason that those of us who do see what's happening are confronted with a dilemma: do we simply enjoy the decline, laugh as the ship sinks and indulge in a bacchanalian frenzy; or perhaps retreat to the country somewhere and start a farm?

Rome became extremely decadent during its unceremonious decline.

In this article, we shall examine some of the inevitable affects of our culture and come up with rational ways to overcome them, without resorting to hedonism or escapism.

Knowledge And Understanding

The average person has a very limited knowledge of world affairs; this can be seen in economics. Our economies have the illusion of growth: they appear to be flourishing, giving us the freedom to reap in the benefits of technology, globalization and unrestrained liberalism. We become freer, more comfortable and prosperous.

We must not buy in to this delusion. This economy has only been made possible by creating and borrowing money at interest: every major economy is hundreds of billions, or even trillions in debt and can never pay this money back. The world of wealth and comfort we see around us is fake and illusory and it will inevitably collapse. The people themselves copy this behavior, maxing out their credit cards to buy accessories and racking up enormous student debts; they are economically illiterate.

We therefore have to renounce the attitude of the majority, which consists of acquiring a stable corporate job, buying a house, consuming corporate products and not worrying at all about the economy. We must instead embrace a more minimal, antifragile lifestyle: researching marcoeconomics, understanding debt and keeping up to date with global economic events.

A declining economy demands adaptability and innovation. Instead of putting faith in one stable, soul-destroying white-collar job with anti-male HR departments, it is more advisable to have a spread of viable options. For example we must remain open to a mixture of blue-collar jobs, entrepreneurial pursuits and possibly working abroad.

We can no longer afford to rely on the modern world to protect the individual from risk and economic ruin. As the system gets more fragile, we must become more aware of the dangers and expand our options to avoid the consequences of large-scale catastrophes such as the financial crash of 2008, which will inevitably become more frequent in the future.

Holding Strong Principles

It is all well and good to acknowledge the degeneracy of modern culture, but the knowledge is useless without strong moral principles to counter it. For example, we can rightly complain about the odious “I can do what I want, it’s my body” attitude, but to then become ill-disciplined and lazy is to simply partake in the same carelessness which we criticize.

A further example is the attitude towards the nuclear family. Although we can opt out of monogamy and reproduction if there are no incentives to engage in them, if we are to consider a family, traditional discipline needs to be adhered to. Failure to do so merely contributes to the destruction of the family unit we are experiencing today.

Neomasculinity is a very good example of a strong set of principles which can be followed to ensure an optimized lifestyle: they are time-tested, intelligent, and virtuous. It is only ethics such as these which will prevent society from going into unceremonious decline.

Not only are strong principles necessary to live healthily during this over-indulgent phase of history, but they will continue to be practiced long after this era has burned itself out. Those who get into virtuous habits will undoubtedly have the advantage over the others who have lived up until now without foresight or intelligence.

Maintaining A Positive Outlook

It is quite understandable to feel very pessimistic about the future and indignant about the fact that modern culture has sold us a pack of lies and delusions. But the way to look at our current phase of history is not the end of a line, but rather a natural stage of a cycle. Sir John Glubb describes the cyclical nature of history in his underrated work: "The Fate of Empires". (Previously covered here at ROK)

It may feel sometimes that we are indeed "At Eternity's Gate"

In this essay he estimates that an Empire lasts approximately ten generations, and that the life histories of them are all extremely similar. We are currently living in the final Age, "The Age of Decadence" which Glubb describes as:

> "A moral and spiritual disease, resulting from too long a period of wealth and power, producing cynicism, decline of religion, pessimism and frivolity. The citizens of such a nation will no longer make an effort to save themselves, because they are not convinced that anything in life is worth saving."

Although the majority may hold this negative outlook, we do not have to be the same. We can instead arm ourselves with knowledge, experience and strong principles to counteract the current trends of nihilism. The large following of ROK and other like-minded communities prove that there are substantial sections of the population who refuse to give into negativity and want to pursue positive lifestyles instead.

The Conclusion

Nihilism is a very easy option for the disillusioned man to take at our stage in history. Committing to nothing, amassing an ungodly notch count and feasting off a decaying civilization like a vulture certainly sounds very appealing and would surely yield a lot of temporary thrills.

If we are to live like that, we risk merely living a marginally more sophisticated, hedonistic lifestyle than those who are ignorant of society's problems. It is almost not worth acquiring the knowledge about the state of modern culture in the first place if that is the attitude that we are going to take.

It is far more honorable, on the other hand, to invest time into understanding our situation, following strong principles and attempting to resolve society's problems, rather than facilitating its collapse. This positive attitude is inspiring, which is why more and more people are drawn to communities such as ROK and will continue to be so as modern culture continues to decline.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The Damaging Effects Of Jewish Intellectualism And Activism On Western Culture

Anton Hagen

Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

British Police Chief Will Prioritize Online Abuse Reports Over Burglaries

August 2, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The first leader of Britain's National Police Chiefs' Council, Sara Thornton, says that British residents cannot expect police to respond to burglary reports anymore. Because of funding cuts, Ms. Thornton, the former Chief Constable of Thames Valley Police, says that online abuse cases and allegations of "sexual assault" will take precedence.

Therefore, the police will take Twitter "abuse" (politically incorrect jokes, maybe?) more seriously than someone breaking into your home with a crowbar and looting it. This is despite the usually ample evidential opportunities burglary reports provide relative to sexual assault cases, of which many are of the he-said-she-said variety.

Welcome to the world where a tweet can land you in more trouble than breaking into someone's home.

I am not someone who denies that sexual assaults occur. They certainly do. Like murder, serious assault, corporate fraud and other serious crimes, one case of these incidents is theoretically too many. But they are nonetheless perpetrated by a minority in society. They are not widespread. As the Harvard academic Steven Pinker relates, violent acts in particular are at historic lows. Thornton's dismissal of the importance of attending to burglary reports gives the illusion that we are somehow facing an epidemic of sexual assaults.

Furthermore, "online abuse" is the most poorly defined and often ridiculous category of criminal offence. Instead of creating actual harm, most of the time "offenders" are punished for hurting someone's feelings. Unless there is a well-founded fear of real-life harm from a tweet or something similar, there is more of an argument for criminalizing adultery (which I'm not saying should be criminalized, by the way) or low-end schoolyard bullying than the very vague concept of "online abuse".

Sara Thornton's priorities only affirm the lack of due process for those accused of sexual assault

Police ignoring burglary reports will only increase the feeling of burglars that they can act with virtual impunity, increase the chances of violence against the property owners, and force homeowners and others to respond with more force against offenders than they otherwise would.

Sadly, evidence-poor reports of sexual abuse in modern times result in both social witch hunts and a systemic lowering of the standard of proof. Whilst police investigations are not "court processes" per se, those accused of sexual assault are now required to "prove" to police in Britain that they had consent, whatever that benchmark means and however it can possibly be satisfied.

Functionally, all this does is shift the pre-trial burden of proof, which should be on the state, to the accused. In the meantime, the actual collection of evidence, and the underlying strength of the police case, is left by the wayside.

Of course, the laying of police charges should not have to conform to "beyond reasonable doubt". The idea is to properly test what is deemed to be evidence in a court of law. The problem is that even when we move to the courts, legal processes have been watered down specifically for sexual assault cases. Without any other evidence, aside from he-said-she-said, you would not see regular convictions for tax evasion, armed robbery, serious assault and other crimes, especially if the alleged incident took place years or decades ago. This is routine for sexual assault cases, however.

Reports of serious crimes must be investigated, emphasizing the EVIDENCE

What's more likely to lead to a tragic outcome, impolite, rude comments on Twitter or someone ransacking your property and then turning on you when you discover them doing it?

Testimony of a complainant is part of the overall evidentiary framework. I do not refute this. But for it to be the only or preponderant evidence is a very dangerous path to take. It beggars belief that Sara Thornton, and presumably some of her senior colleagues, would largely abandon responding to burglary reports but divert more resources to investigating crimes where objective evidence of the kind demanded for almost every other criminal category is severely lacking.

The primary responsibility of the police is to protect citizens and maintain social order. "Order" to most people would mean the protection of property and person, which often dovetail where burglaries are concerned. Amidst the protecting, police need to be searching for and uncovering quality evidence that can be used to prosecute alleged offenders.

Clamping down on keyboard comments (which create far less damage and injury than burglaries) and he-said-she-said sexual assault allegations is a slap in the face to the millions of Britons who will suffer from having their property stolen and their homes violated. And what happens when these homeowners and their families are seriously injured or killed?

Burglars now have a much stronger get-out-of-jail free card thanks to Sara Thornton.

Read More: Lesbian Chief Constable Forces Bearded British Cops To Wear Beard Nets

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Did Vlad Vorontsov Commit A Crime By Threatening To Disrupt A Roosh V Lecture?

August 3, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

As many of you may know, Roosh V's successful World Tour 2015 has already made history. For the first time, open and productive discussions are being held on issues that relate to the future of masculinity. The anti-masculine poison that the media has been trying to ram down everyone's throats for decades is finally being confronted with a philosophy and worldview that offers an antidote to this poison, without requiring the approval of women or the SJW Bolsheviks.

Of course, some are unable to cope with an ideology that exposes them for what they are. Because they don't believe in freedom of speech, and because they can't stand to see their views challenged, they have one default setting: ban the message. The tour is currently under attack from those who would censor ideas that disagree with their own. Recently, a Facebook page was started to try to "prevent" a peaceful lecturer from delivering talks in Montreal and Toronto. The stated reason?

Roosh, in the twisted, loser worldview of these people, "advocates rape." The "evidence" of this is Roosh's obviously satirical article which mocked the rape-accusation pretensions of the social justice warrior (SJW) crowd. Yes, it's the usual SJW tactic of cherry picking and cutting and pasting, in order to make it seem that Roosh "advocated" something that he never advocated.

The apparent organizer of the Facebook page is this precious little snowflake:

This is the face of arrogance and intolerance.

Her name is Aurelie Nix and her goal is to nix Roosh's speech. It goes without saying that these people are losers. That is obvious. But notice also the upturned nose, and the self-imposed wreath signalling a delusional level of self-importance. This is the face of someone who refuses to abide by the rules of the civilized world. This is the face of someone who wants to deprive you of your rights, rights that you may have risked your life to fight for.

What makes the Facebook page more disturbing is the open suggestions for disruption and violent threats that have emanated from the site. One poster on the site, named Vlad Vorontsov, made the open statement that, if he was unable to prevent Roosh from entering Canada, that he was "open" to using other methods of "shutting the event down." Look at his comment below. He was unwilling to get into the specifics of his criminal disruption plans, but urged other members to "PM" him for "details."

> View post on imgur.com

The comments are revealing. They give a window into the minds of the types of people who hold themselves out as angelic innocents, all the while plotting the most devious conspiracies against free speech and discourse. These are the people who call themselves "progressives." In case you're interested, this is the photo of Mr. Vorontsov, which is publicly available for all to see on his Facebook profile.

This is the face of arrogance and intolerance.

Notice the snickering, smug, weasely, arrogant attitude. The headphones symbolize the willing inability to listen to any views other than those of his own arrogant, narcissistic ego. He is closed out to the world, and island unto himself. And in his mind, he's perfect, just perfect.

But it gets worse.

Under the Canadian Criminal Code, threatening violence is itself a crime. And it is clear that Mr. Vorontsov has stated his intention of trying to shut down the lecture using illegal means. It can be construed as an invitation to violence. This is especially true when we consider the last comment that someone posted in the screenshot about, in which a reader tosses out the idea of a bomb threat. Whether this was serious or not, words have consequences.

SJWs love to lecture the world about how words have consequences, but are unwilling to accept the harms that their words cause.

Here is the relevant Canadian Criminal Code (R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46) section.

> Uttering threats
>
> 264.1 (1) Every one commits an offence who, in any manner, knowingly utters, conveys or causes any person to receive a threat
> (a) to cause death or bodily harm to any person;
> (b) to burn, destroy or damage real or personal property; or
> (c) to kill, poison or injure an animal or bird that is the property of any person.
> Marginal note:Punishment
>
> (2) Every one who commits an offence under paragraph (1)(a) is guilty of

> (a) an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years; or > (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding eighteen months.
>
> (3) Every one who commits an offence under paragraph (1)(b) or (c)
> (a) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years; or > (b) is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.
> R.S., 1985, c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 38; 1994, c. 44, s. 16.

Whether he was kidding or not, Mr. Vorontsov needs to be questioned about his stated desire to shut down Roosh V's lecture. This is especially true in light of the last comment that was made in the screenshot above.

More than anything, these statements reveal the modern SJW for the sniveling cowards that they truly are. They cannot handle dialogue. They cannot handle opposing viewpoints. They look for reasons to be outraged over nothing, and then call on big daddy government to censor people who hurt their feelings.

Failing that, they resort to illegal disruption as ways of enforcing "tolerance." What are Mr. Vorontsov's "ideas" that people should PM him about regarding how to disrupt Roosh's lecture? And why hasn't Aurelie Nix condemned Mr. Vorontsov?

Does she approve of such intimidation tactics?

Read More: The American Conservative Establishment Is Collapsing

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Was A Questionable Rape Accusation A Convenient Excuse For Regime Change In The Middle East?

August 3, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Readers may remember one of the media's anointed darlings of the Libyan uprising of 2011. For those who need a reminder, in 2011 Muammar Gadhafi's Libya was convulsed by popular protests generated by the Arab Spring. When Gadhafi stupidly broadcast to the world his intention to crush the revolt by massive force, some Western nations—who had previously favored him—turned on him and used their militaries to have him deposed.

One of the propaganda stories to arise out of the uprising was the drama of Iman Al-Obeidi. On March 26, 2011, she ran into Tripoli's Rixos Hotel, where foreign journalists were staying. She screamed and wailed that she had been raped by Gadhafi's security forces, and bared scars and bruises as evidence.

The performance was so effective that I now wonder if it was part of some covert Western intelligence operation.

The drama Al-Obeidi created for the world press

The media hailed her as a brave victim who dared to speak out against the nasty bullies of Gadhafi's police state. Critical examination of her story was nearly nonexistent. But this mattered little, since Western nations had declared a "right to protect" (R2P, in journalist Pepe Escobar's brilliant shorthand) Libyan citizens. This R2P quickly and cynically came to mean a right to regime change by foreign military force.

But cynicism and opportunism are the order of the day, it seems. The media gushed rivers of tears over Al-Obeidi's (unverified) rape accusations. Hillary Clinton personally intervened to have her granted asylum in the United States, with all attendant privileges.

She described her alleged "abuse" in a 2011 CNN interview. She played the victim role to the hilt, wearing traditional dress and weeping on cue. She claimed to have been beaten, urinated on, and repeatedly violated by about 15 men.

Libyan government protested that Al-Obeidi was a liar, a prostitute, and was mentally ill. Of course, no one believed the government. The narrative played right into the American obsession with rape accusations and imperialist regime-changing. Her was the perfect story of the hour, made to order for the occasion. As a psychological operation, it was totally effective.

After Al-Obeidi arrived in the United States, the new Libyan embassy in Washington granted her a lifetime pension of $1,800 per month. How did she pull this off? She got this money by bursting into the embassy and demanding it. The embassy granted her the pension in 2012.

Clinton celebrated the illegal operation to overthrow Libya's government, and personally gave rape accuser Al-Obeidi asylum in the United States.

But it soon became clear that Al-Obeidi was not the angel she was made out to be. She now no longer has any contact with the embassy.

To the feminist ideologues, of course, she is a secular martyr. Whether her stories are true are also irrelevant. Feminist Germaine Greer shed more tears over Al-Obeidi when she lamented that accusers' stories are called into question.

In Greer's universe, a rape accuser should not be questioned. "Her [Al-Obeidi's] mistake was to survive. Because she did not die for other people's crimes, the offenses against her are now described as 'alleged.'" So goes the thinking of the radical feminist archetype.

Al-Obeidi's track record since arriving in the United States has caused even former supporters to doubt her story. She has been charged with assaulting a police officer. She has been ordered by a court to get mental health counseling. In short, it is now clear that she is a deeply unstable woman.

She was resettled in Denver, Colorado. Not satisfied with the pension she was getting, she was encouraged to find a job. But she soon proved have an entitlement mentality. She would not show up for job interviews. She was constantly fighting with people.

Even her case worker, a man named Mevlani, came to see the real Al-Obeidi. A recent CNN article notes:

> Mevlani said he wanted to help. He has seen people who suffered all sorts of tragedy but al-Obeidi was particularly difficult. He felt it went beyond the trauma, beyond the harrowing circumstances she had escaped.
>
> "There's always something going on. She expects things. She has a sense of entitlement," Mevlani said.
> Her caseworker at the time felt she expected to be treated like a queen, especially after Clinton's support.

Notice how even when it is clear that an anointed media darling is exposed as a vicious fraud, the media still contorts itself into pretzels to try to portray her as the victim.

Al-Obeidi was arrested four times in two years, and tested positive for drugs. The facts and the record are clear that she is a violent drug user. A recent CNN article goes further:

> "She has some serious issues with substance abuse," Deputy District Attorney Catrina Weigel said in court, according to the Daily Camera newspaper in Boulder. "It is very concerning that she is not only on probation but on bond and continuing to use substances."
>
> Boulder District Judge Patrick Butler issued a stern warning [to Al-Obeidi].
>
> "You've been given more chances than you probably deserve," Butler said. "This is the last chance from me to show that you are not a danger to the community while out on bond."

In May 2015, she was found guilty of second-degree assault. She had assaulted two men in a bar. She poured her beer over one of them, and threw a beer glass at another. The man's wounds were serious, and required stitches. It was a felony assault. Her previous three arrests had been for disorderly conduct and assault.

Convicted criminal, drug user, and rape accuser Al-Obeidi

Personally, I don't believe these problems magically just "happened" after she arrived in the United States. Feminist apologists will try to massage and spin away her crimes and instability, but reasonable people know better. I believe that she has always been this type of person. Her credibility is zero. But the Western media gleefully used her as a propaganda tool.

The whole story is revealing in what it tells us about the popular culture and the political culture. Her crimes are revealing. They parallel the crimes and lies of the Western powers, who destroyed Libya in a cynical regime change operation in violation of international law.

What do we conclude from all this? Her story shows how rape accusers can be pawns in the hands of unscrupulous big players, who care nothing about truth, and only about their own purposes.

Read More: Finnish Politician Condemns Multiculturalism, Enrages SJWs

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Yet Another Survey Shows That LGBT Domestic Violence Rates Are The Same As Heterosexual Couples

August 3, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The AIDS Council of New South Wales has declared that LGBT domestic violence is just as prevalent as in heterosexual relationships. As Australian of the Year Rosie Batty and others continue to be lauded for their one-sided and one-dimensional work (Batty's ex-husband was spectacularly mentally ill when he killed their son), this news about the usually suppressed or ignored LGBT statistics received little political and other coverage.

For time immemorial, the focus has been on vilifying straight men. The use of this very narrow, politically-wielded prism, which bundles together all heterosexual men as potential abusers somehow responsible for what any other members of their gender and sexual orientation do a thousand miles away, shows no sign of sputtering.

Gay marriage may have been recently legalized in the United States and Ireland, but don't expect anything like equal responsibility when it comes to dealing with allegations of domestic violence within LGBT relationships. LGBT couples can and will be presented with special social and legal privileges. By virtue of LGBT partners being part of a sexual minority, SJWs and others will argue that there are more allegations (for them this means automatic convictions) against straight men than against LGBT individuals. This utterly sweeps under the carpet that inconvenient concept called per capita rates.

Are LGBT domestic violence rates actually higher?

On paper, according to the studies, this woman is just as likely to get such a bruise from a female partner as a male one.

As the article makes clear, LGBT domestic violence is underreported. Additionally, straight men have been subjected to unrelenting, beyond vitriolic attacks by feminists about their supposedly inherently and continually violent behavior towards their partners. So if these LGBT domestic violence statistics are being unearthed with nothing like the antagonistic political agenda used by SJWs against heterosexual males, isn't it more than likely that LGBT partner abuse is actually much, much higher?

In comparing the purported rates of heterosexual domestic violence with the figures from LGBT advocacy groups, I am by no means affirming the legitimacy of the "studies" feminists have linguistically gerrymandered to paint men as inveterate abusers requiring draconian "violence against women" legislative provisions. Also, these anti-male studies invariably treat a survey response as if it were an indisputable conviction of a man.

What I am doing, by contrast, is pointing out that the very foundation on which feminists and SJWs have castigated men is thoroughly disproven by these LGBT statistics. Male violence against women is portrayed as the inevitable result of male privilege and patriarchy. Yet even those women who "escape" this "patriarchy," at least in a lesbian sense, are seemingly just as likely to beat their female partners as a man is to beat his girlfriend or wife. Without a female partner to beat, gay men will also just as readily beat their Tom, Dick or Harry, too.

What happened to marriage equality?

Are we going to see the same domestic violence witch hunt against LGBT individuals as we have against heterosexual men over the last two decades? Unlikely. “Marriage equality” is a selective process, after all.

Those not living in nuclear fallout shelters will know that both Ireland and the United States have legalized gay marriage this year. They join a number of other, usually Western nations. Although in the United States the blanket legalization included judicial invalidation of many democratically-erected state constitutions and other marriage laws, it looks like gay marriage is here to stay for the foreseeable future.

Sadly, during the euphoria following the gay lobby’s Supreme Court victory, few, if any LGBT advocates have considered how gay couples are continually given a free pass vis-á-vis being held to the same standards as men in heterosexual relationships, let alone marriages. There seems to be no intention, commensurate with the legalization of gay marriage, to treat LGBT domestic violence as seriously.

The focus on straight men and domestic violence is illogical, to say the least. If the same sorts of studies alleging heterosexual women are regular victims of domestic show that LGBT individuals are equally prone to committing such offences, why the silence? Does this mean that America should only focus on Caucasian-American domestic violence because they constitute 70% of the population and, say, the Native American and Chinese-American communities each only comprise 1-3%?

The vast outnumbering of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender couples by those in heterosexual relationships is not a proper reason for unleashing 99.5% of the focus on straight men, not to mention straight women as well (which happens once a millennium anyway).

Equality means equal responsibility

Based on statistics such as the NSW AIDS Council's, LGBT individuals are far more likely to be attacked by an intimate partner than through gay hate crimes.

Critics of ROK, the manosphere, and the rapidly growing philosophy of Neomasculinity attack our complaints as if they weren't legitimate. Their arguments might be worth a dime if they fully addressed the reality of announcements such as the New South Wales AIDS Council's. The political climate has never been geared towards admonishing LGBT individuals for violence. Nevertheless, the warning bells of equal victimization are ringing ever more loudly. But trust our SJW friends to keep their fury solely leveled at the straight men of the world.

Several times now I have explicitly or implicitly stated that sites like ROK, and those who write for them, would become largely redundant if double standards like not addressing LGBT domestic violence were suddenly extinguished. We invite our detractors to grapple with the statistics we are raising. They go well beyond the extreme selectivity of (anti-male) anti-domestic violence campaigns.

From suicide to rape-conviction-by-testimony (try getting a tax evasion sentence with that sort of "evidence"), female only engineering programs to corporate gender quotas, they are there for everyone to see (and for SJWs to ignore).

Every time you hear the phrase "marriage equality," ask yourself if the equality brings the rights but abandons all the responsibilities.

Read More: The Major Flaw In Today's Perception Of Domestic Violence

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

I Didn’t Think My Marriage Was All That Bad…Until I Found The Manosphere

August 4, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

My late bloomer article last July briefly highlighted the four relationships that had the most impact on my eventual discovery of the manosphere. Later in that article I gave a reader’s digest version of the three week relationship that led me to ROK. Then of course, the most devastating of the fantastic four was detailed here. A cautionary tale to be sure.

Today I’m going to talk about my marriage to a woman who had a slew of red flags and baggage that ultimately ended our relationship. The interesting thing is that I didn’t realize how bad our marriage really was until years after we split up.

After all, our divorce was as amicable as it could have been. We were both broke, didn’t have any children together, and we didn’t hate each other so things ended drama free and I’d gotten out clean.

But looking back through the prism of neomasculinity made me realize that my matrimonial stint was rife with red pill confirmations. In this, the de facto part two of three of my “ROK Origins—The Beta Chronicles of Donovan Sharpe” series, I will once again show that few of us attain success with women or with life without having gone through the fire.

Boy Meets Girl

I met the future ex-Mrs. Sharpe at a warehouse I was working at in my early twenties. It was the very first blue collar job I'd ever had and I loved every minute of it. Steel toed boots, fork lifts, heavy boxes, and eating soggy sandwiches while telling dirty jokes was something I'd never experienced before, but I liked it. This was 'Murica at its core.

"Darcy" first caught my eye when I walked into the shipping office to check on a load that was running late. She didn't pay me any mind because she was involved with someone else on another shift (more on this later) so I decided to "wait until the opportunity presented itself" (read: zero game). But her pretty face, ample breasts, and long curly brown hair definitely had my attention.

Over the course of the next few months or so we started talking more and more. After I found out she and her beau had parted ways I finally worked up the courage to ask her out, and to my great surprise she actually said yes.

The first date was pretty standard: sit down restaurant, conversation about ourselves, what we're looking for in a relationship, etc. During our conversation she revealed that she lived with her parents, had a daughter that she didn't currently have custody of, and that her ex-husband used to beat her.

I took the white knight bait hook, line, and sinker

After that first date I wanted so badly to be her ~~Captain Save-A-Ho~~ knight in shining armor and rescue her from the horrible and hard luck life she had led. As silly as this sounds, that's really how I felt. My provider instinct had kicked in and with that I was all too happy to move her into my place a month later.

Other than a few minor hiccups, things actually went pretty smoothly for a couple who lived and worked together. We worked identical 12-hour shifts at work so we were literally around each other 24/7. One would think we'd be ready to kill each other at some point but it never happened. We got along pretty well and things seemed to be working out.

A few months later, I proposed to her and she happily accepted. Then exactly one year to the day of our very first date, we quit our jobs, got married and moved to Florida. For a girl from a small country town in the South it was a fairy tale romance. Right after we tied the knot at a small drive through wedding chapel she cried and said "Stuff like this doesn't happen to girls like me." I thought I was the luckiest man alive.

A glimpse of the crimson capsule

[image]
I missed the boat on some red pill truth

It didn't take long for things to change after we arrived in the Sunshine State. Over a two-week period the sex dropped off almost completely, she got bitchy, and all of a sudden we didn't seem to get along as well as we used to. I was completely blindsided and confused but I chalked it up to "cold feet."

One morning while getting ready for work, I asked Darcy to iron my shirt. She refused. I threw a fit but she didn't budge. I ended up ironing the shirt myself but I was seething. In my mind, the least she could do for me was assist me in preparing for work as she didn't have a job (and wouldn't for another few years) but she would do no such thing.

I was in the kitchen making my coffee when she started bitching and complaining about something and I took the bait. We went back and forth and after a few minutes I'd had it. I let her talk for about 30 seconds uninterrupted when I finally yelled:

"SHUT THE FUCK UP!!!!"

I had never spoken to her like that before and was prepared for a veritable verbal assault. My back was turned so I couldn't see her facial expression (nor did I want to). I waited and waited for her to scream back but to my surprise she heeded my command. She didn't say another word until I stormed out the door for work when she meagerly said:

"Have a good day at work, Donovan. I love you."

I slammed the door shut and didn't respond. I wasn't interested in her pitiful, disingenuous attempt at making up with me after being a bitch the whole morning. I had a bad day at work because I was prepared for the worst when I got home. I swore at her, slammed the door, and didn't verbally reciprocate when Darcy told me she loved me so I was sure I'd be smack dab in the middle of a shit storm when I walked through that door.

[image]
I had no idea this was the reason for her good behavior

When I walked into our apartment the smell of fresh roasted chicken hit me like a slap to the face. I walked into the kitchen and Darcy was dutifully preparing mashed potatoes while the chicken simmered away in the oven (she was a VERY good cook).

Just when I noticed that the television was tuned to the MLB playoffs between the Giants and Marlins, Darcy offered me a beer which I gladly but apprehensively accepted. I just couldn't believe that she was acting this way after the way I had treated her but there she was, doing her best June Cleaver impersonation.

The entire night I waited for the other shoe to drop but it never did. Darcy was extremely affectionate the entire night and I never had an empty beer in my hand for more than a few seconds. When the game finally ended (damn you Pudge Rodriguez!) she threw herself at me and let me do every nasty, depraved thing I could think of to her.

This continued for about a week but I never apologized. Not because I knew it would constitute as breaking frame (which I didn't actually know at the time), but because I was afraid the great treatment would stop. My beta-fied brain thought she was putting on and waiting for the right opportunity to pull the rug out from under me and that an apology would give her that chance.

I had no idea that I had actually done the right thing that morning but my dumb ass didn't put two and two together. I thought Darcy had finally recognized what a swell guy I was, realized the error in her ways when I yelled at her, and decided to finally shape up and be a good wife.

So I went back to being the nice guy I thought she was showing appreciation for. Little did

I know I'd never get another beer or a blowjob from her (at least not on the same night) for another half decade. The red pill stared me right in the face and I flat out ignored it, thinking her behavior was an accumulative appreciation of how great a husband I was.

The straw that broke the camel's back

Enough was enough

After the week of debaucherous ball draining, Darcy went back to her bitchy ways. The better I treated her, the worse she treated me. But instead of exploding like Mount St. Helens, I tamped down my anger and frustration.

I tried expressing my feelings which, of course, got me absolutely nowhere. I called my mother countless times asking her what I should do which, of course, got me absolutely nowhere. I tried everything I could think of to get her to be at least half way decent to me but nothing worked.

This continued for another few years until the day my father came to town. My dad and I have never had the best relationship, but I still loved him and wanted to bury the hatchet with him after five years of not speaking. So when my sister called and said he was at her place (which was about an hour from where we lived) and would be flying out in a few hours I was excited to finally put our feud behind us once and for all.

I was dressed and ready to go when Darcy decided to throw another one of her fits. She stormed around the house trying on this outfit and that, bitching about how cold it was outside, complaining that we had to drive an hour ("Why can't you just talk to him on the phone??"), and being as difficult as she could be.

When she was finally ready to go I knew it was too late to make amends with my Dad that day. I figured we may as well go anyway because seeing my nieces and nephew would be a good consolation but the damage had been done. The entire drive I said not one single word to Darcy.

She tried making conversation, tried offering me cigarettes, and tried apologizing for taking too long but I'd had enough. Darcy knew how important this was to me but she sabotaged it without remorse. To this day I still have no idea why on earth she did this to me.

During the hour drive to my sister's I thought of all the times and ways Darcy had shit on me. I thought about her crappy treatment despite my best efforts to please her, the physical and mental sacrifices I made to provide her as comfortable a life as I could (I was always working 2 jobs) the year and change we didn't have sex because we were in the process of joining the Catholic Church ("We don't need to live in sin Donovan!"), her lack of support when I wanted to start my own business, her constant complaining, her lack of appreciation, and on and on and on.

I was through giving a shit

In the months that followed Darcy went back into June Cleaver mode but that only confirmed my decision to end the marriage. I told my mother "I don't want to be with a woman I have to treat like shit to be treated well."

White Knight to the fucking end.

What did I learn?

After all that I was still a white knight

Nothing—at least not yet. I was every bit the mangina I was after our divorce was finalized as I was the day I said "I do." Our divorce was quick and uncomplicated and in the end, we didn't hate each other. We chalked it up to the fact that we just weren't right for each other, that it was nobody's fault, and that we were better off going our separate ways.

Though I didn't experience the anguish I went through in my breakup with Amy, I'd be lying if I said I wasn't saddened by our split because I'd known this woman for the better part of seven years. And even though our marriage sucked and I was balls deep in Amy on the regular at that point in time, it was still a bummer that it had all come to an end.

I'm not going to get into the chronological time line of my journey and subsequent discovery of the red pill because it's already well-documented. But after about a month of cramming neomasculine knowledge into my tiny brain, Darcy's red flags became as clear as day:

1. She didn't have custody of her daughter: I didn't think much of this when she revealed this to me on our first date because I was just happy to be liked by a pretty girl. Her young daughter was in the custody of her ex-husband but I never pressed her on the reason she didn't because I was largely unaware of the court system's bias toward women. However, the truth came to light when she later revealed that…

2. She was a drug addict: During our first month together she told me she had "dabbled" in crystal meth for "a while" and that the court system had "screwed her." The details were fuzzy but the bottom line is that I now knew she had to be a terrible mother because women routinely receive favor from judges nationwide, even when they are drug addicts.

3. Her daughter's father was not her ex's: No need to elaborate here. She cheated on her first husband and allowed her paramour to impregnate her and I didn't need red pill knowledge to know this was fucked up. In hindsight it's probably the reason he beat her up—which was probably an exaggeration in and of itself, as society's definition of domestic abuse is as loose as the sluts who claim it.

No two ways about it

4. She made her rounds at work: I knew I certainly wasn't the first dude there who'd slayed her but the longer we dated, the more aware I became of just how many men she had fucked at that warehouse. Despite the warnings from my co-workers that she was a raging slut, my stupid ass wifed her up anyway.

5. She had her ex's initials tattooed on her: Yep, another tattoo I foolishly ignored. According to her, she got the tattoo as a going away present to him before he went back to his home country but that didn't stop her from writing him and telling him that she still loved him despite sharing a residence with me. It should come as no surprise that she never got it covered up or removed after we got married when I asked her to.

6. It was too easy to marry her: I'm a decent looking guy but other than that I had nothing going for me. No game, no money, no nothing. I was just another forklift operator. Yet, she offered no resistance to moving in with me, a huge step for a relationship barely a month old, and didn't object to marrying me when I popped the question less than a year after we started dating.

Looking back, it's now plainly obvious that she knew she was closing in on The Wall (she was 26 when I married her), and needed a sucker who was unaware of her past to wife her up before he found out just how damaged a woman she really was. That sucker was me.

Conclusion

Like I said before, I had always thought that my marriage to Darcy wasn't all that bad but the moment I discovered the manosphere all of that changed. The bottom line is that marrying a divorced drug addict who'd committed paternity fraud in her last marriage was on me.

These days Darcy seems to be doing okay for herself. Her brother and I are still cool, so we still talk from time to time. According to him husband number three is an accountant who supposedly makes six figures. The only catch is that he has five children so I'm sure Darcy's having the time of her life. Her daughter is now pregnant and baby daddy is apparently a wife beater too. Imagine that.

Readers may think "Well I'd never be so stupid as to put a ring on a woman like that!" but like I said in the caption, hindsight, especially the crimson capsule variety, is always 20/20. I'm just glad I didn't have a pound of flesh for her to take.

Read Next: How Forgetting My Game Because Of A Woman Almost Ruined My Life

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

What’s The Difference Between Posting Your Cleavage And Showing Your Bank Balance On Instagram?

August 4, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Kourtney Kardashian’s soon-to-be ex-husband, entrepreneur Scott Disick, became the target of online anger in 2013 for posting a series of money-themed photos on Instagram. The most “notorious” one involved a toilet roll holder furnished with money instead of paper.

At the time, no one seemed to note the irony of the attacks on Disick, a multimillionaire in his own right. Thrown to the wolves for his so-called narcissism, people forgot the litany of other ways in which people behave in a narcissistic manner on Instagram and other platforms, especially in advertising their usually digitally- and cosmetically-enhanced bodies.

My question to you is this: why is a one-off set of displays of wealth by Scott Disick so bad in the eyes of the public, but the constant attention-whoring of a Kim Kardashian is seen as good? Obviously, enough people despise Kim Kardashian and those like her. Yet significant swathes of people tolerate her antics but would lash out at any behavior like Disick’s. Why?

Disick’s display of his success is much more real and uncontrived than many of the girls on Instagram who falsely present their pictures as authentic representations of themselves.

The reason why the second kind of attention-seeking is more socially approved is because it suits the vanity of many women to flaunt their sexuality and receive the validation of likes, comments and all-round attention. Rather than being created by L'Oreal and the use of flattering filtering and camera angles, Disick's success is much more commendable and should be, if anything, celebrated.

The irony of attacking Scott Disick

This is no less distasteful than many duck face cleavage photos on Instagram. So why are people like Scott Disick attacked so furiously?

For a family whose females, at least the less weird-looking ones, perpetually parade their done-up faces and bodies to earn an income, those critiques of the member-by-marriage Disick were laughable. Instead of whoring himself out to social media, Disick had to resort to other work to generate his fortune. It may not be rocket science or serious literature, but it's something far less stale and repetitive than his dysfunctional and psychologically-lacking in-laws.

On the other hand, Kim Kardashian and Kendall and Kylie Jenner regularly feature in your Facebook trending news without rebuke to get some desperately craved screen time. Disick has the "gumption" to appear in just one major viral piece and is completely castigated. As you can see, social acceptability is a phenomenon that keeps on getting more and more selective. People will naturally ignore attacking the vehicles for self-promotion, like cleavage and related shots, that they like or depend on themselves for propping up self-esteem.

Money is more real than “looks”

Katy Perry sans makeup.

Sure, you can rent a Lamborghini, max out your credit cards and take out a second or third mortgage on your home to project the image of financial prosperity. Nevertheless, money is much more tangible and real than an online or even real-life physical appearance.

There usually needs to be a significant factual foundation for wealth in order for it to be displayed. Bill Gates’ wealth, for example, is a lot more visceral than the the questionable real attractiveness of a celebrity, who masks their natural appearance with cosmetics and other tricks. The wealth of many female celebrities, such as Katy Perry, has more substance than the “looks” they used to build it in the first place.

The stigma of showing your wealth still persists, however. In order to get away with it, particularly with high-end purchases, people mostly need to feature themselves in photographs. If you’re at a palatial hotel in New York, you make sure you’re smiling and embracing a friend to minimize the “brag factor.” If you’re snapping your $159 sturgeon main course at a 17-star restaurant called Saint Michel-Pierre-Jean-Marie, you wax lyrical about the beauty of shared times with loved ones or insert a mysterious Ralph Waldo Emerson quote.

In the meantime, online peddlers of their posteriors and I-can-see-your-nipples-protruding photography don’t need to maintain the illusion. They just click the camera phone and upload their handiwork.

The reason why I’m forced to use Scott Disick as an example is because the posting of money and information about your wealth on social media is so uniformly taboo. Those who engage in it regularly tend to be rappers or those like them, groups of individuals where the “professional culture” emphasizes such displays of bling and material affluence.

I’ll take stacks of 100 dollar bills on a table over duck faces almost any day

[image]
Please explain the vanity differential between this and the Scott Disick photos. You may “appreciate” the girl more but the compulsive desire for attention and validation is still there.

Regrettably, popular assumptions are most often never challenged. Oftentimes they need to be examined very critically. Especially where we either reward or punish people in the public spotlight, which now increasingly draws in “normal” people via social media, the motives and outcomes of different kinds of attention-seeking require relentless comparison.

Begin to cast a much more keen eye over how people present themselves and how others react to it. You may even be at the mercy of certain cultural paradigms yourself. For now, just recognize that Scott Disick’s actions weren’t nearly as bad as what was reported.

Read More: Understanding The Difference Between Guilt And Shame

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Reasons Low Testosterone Is Dangerous For Your Health, And What You Can Do About It

August 4, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Bill Hamzi

Some of the common signs of low testosterone are fatigue, lethargy, erectile dysfunction, creaky joints, irritability, depression, difficulty concentrating, and loss of muscle mass combined with weight gain. If you are experiencing these symptoms, you may need to get your testosterone checked. In fact, there is an ongoing low testosterone epidemic in many Western countries: 50% of men over age 40 have low testosterone, and that skyrockets to 80% of men over 50. Most men are not aware of this, accepting these symptoms as “getting old.”

I personally started having symptoms including erectile dysfunction when I hit 30. My personal low testosterone horror story then ensued and left a shattered marriage in its wake. Fortunately, my story has a happy ending.

I got on a proper Testosterone Replacement Therapy (TRT) regimen, and my erections are back, stronger as ever. I dropped 30 pounds. I bedded more than a dozen young nubile women this year alone, with no “technical difficulties” whatsoever. I have more energy now at age 35 than ten years ago. My mind is sharper as ever.

I've been through hell and back, and lived to tell the tale. I wrote a book about my experience, and how men can combat low testosterone without wasting precious time and money: The No Nonsense Guide To Testosterone Replacement Therapy.

By now, it should be clear what low testosterone can do to a man. But it gets worse: Low testosterone is not just an inconvenient malady to bull through. It is a very real and insidious medical condition that, at best, severely stunts your masculine potential. At worst, it ruins lives, destroys relationships, rips families apart, and ultimately increases your risk of heart attack, diabetes, brittle bones, and cancer. Here are three surprising reasons low testosterone is dangerous for your health:

1. Erectile Dysfunction Is The First Warning Sign Of Heart Disease

You may have heard that testosterone increases the risk of heart attacks. This is completely false. It's a myth and I blow it to smithereens in Part 3 of my book. The longer your testosterone remains low, the higher your risk of heart attacks climbs every year.

Let me explain: heart disease begins when arterial plaque build up begins. It starts out slow, just a few little buildups along the arteries. A little plaque here and there is no big deal and won't impede any blood flow through the biggest arteries.

But, the blood vessels in the penis are extremely tiny compared to the big coronary arteries around the heart. A "little plaque" within those narrow vessels may just be enough to gum up the works during a hot date. While blood flow remains perfectly unimpeded through the rest of the body, blood flow through the tiny penile capillaries may not be optimal even with smallest bits of plaque. So a "little plaque here and there" may seem like no big deal, UNTIL it starts affecting you in the bedroom.

Testosterone has a profound effect on a man's lipid profile by increasing fat metabolism and optimizing endothelial function. Low testosterone decreases fat metabolism, impairs endothelial function, reduces the production of HDL, a good cholesterol. These cascading effects allow LDL, a bad cholesterol, to increase as well as enlarge LDL particle size. This promotes arterial plaque in many men beginning as early as age 20 to 25. In fact, recent studies (like this and that) show that by raising your testosterone from below 350 to over 550, you decrease your heart attack and stroke risk by over 30%!

2. Lower Testosterone Levels Increases Risk Of Prostate Cancer

The testosterone-causes-prostate-cancer is a widely-believed myth that has been disproved by recent studies. In fact, the lower your testosterone levels are, the higher your risk for prostate cancer. Recent studies thoroughly debunk this long-standing myth. A report in the Urology Times by Wayne Kuznar also asserts that there is no link between TRT and prostate cancer.

As Dr. Yassin puts it, we've experienced a "paradigm shift in the last decade that testosterone replacement therapy does not cause or increase the incidence of prostate cancer." Prostate cancers are sensitive to changing concentrations of testosterone when the testosterone levels are very low. However, once the prostate tumor is saturated with testosterone, adding more testosterone will have little, if any effect, on the tumor growth.

In addition, nearly 45% of men with hypogonadism had prostate cancer in Dr. Yassin's study, "meaning that hypogonadism offers no protection against prostate cancer. Patients with lower testosterone values had higher staging and higher [prostate cancer grade] scores," he said. Furthermore, his study concludes that testosterone replacement therapy is safe in hypogonadal men.

3. More Men Are At Risk Of Osteoporosis Due To Low Testosterone

The fact that we have lower testosterone than our own grandfathers shows how sad the state of affairs are today. To make matters worse, osteoporosis is becoming an increasingly important public health problem. The main cause of osteoporosis in men is testosterone deficiency, according to this WebMD article. A NIH publication also lists low testosterone as one of the causes of osteoporosis in men.

An essential hormone to support bone density is estrogen, and in men, some testosterone converts to estrogen in order to maintain strong bone mass and density. When testosterone falls too low, there isn't enough testosterone to be converted to estrogen, so bones begin to weaken. Given that testosterone usually decline by 1% per year in aging men, it is not surprising that bone mineral density also declines by 1% per year as per this study.

As a young man, osteoporosis may be one of the last things in your mind right now, but with low testosterone levels left unchecked, you can look forward to a future of unexplained fractures, being confined to a wheelchair, and watching your retirement savings get drained by a constant stream of five-figure medical bills. Sustaining your testosterone at healthy levels help maintain strong bone density to support an increased muscle mass, along with experiencing a myriad of other immediate benefits. Multiple birds with one stone.

How I Fixed My Low Testosterone

Now, you cannot just walk into a doctor's office, get on testosterone, and be done with it. So many men do TRT all wrong, making their condition even WORSE than before they started.

First, some doctors may not order all the necessary prerequisite baseline tests before starting their patients on TRT, or will they adequately monitor patients on TRT. This is a grievous mistake that may mask other health problems or root causes of low testosterone until it's too late. Second, many men are on ineffective and/or expensive forms of TRT such as gels or patches. Third, many men are dosing testosterone incorrectly, potentially causing their estrogen levels to climb to unhealthy levels, leading to man-boobs or an enlarged prostate. These problems arise from doctors who don't really know what they are doing with respect to TRT:

In my book, I explain how to do it the right way, and make it work for YOU. Indeed, one of the hardest parts of getting on a TRT protocol that works is finding a good doctor who knows what he is doing. Here's a brief recap of what you get from my reading my book:

- A thorough explanation behind low testosterone levels: causes and symptoms.
- Lists of blood tests to help you and your doctor make a full diagnosis and treatment plan.
- Options for your TRT regimen, and how to tailor them to yourself individually.
- How to navigate a broken healthcare system to find the best TRT doctor for you.
- Your TRT Toolbox: An information-packed system to manage your own TRT.

The No-Nonsense Guide to Testosterone Replacement Therapy is currently available on Amazon, and will soon be available in other electronic formats as well as in print. Also visit TRT Guide for more information on Understanding Lab Tests, and don't forget to subscribe to my blog for periodic updates on the book's availability, new studies on testosterone, and how TRT has been working for many men around the world.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

7 Steps To Turn Rejection From A Girl Into Useful Feedback

August 5, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The problem that a lot of guys face when they get into game is rejection — and as we all know, rejection is hard for everyone. No-one likes to feel that they have lost face. When you have put yourself on the line by indicating your attraction to a cute girl, either implicitly or explicitly, for her to laugh with her friends, or make some lame excuse about having a boyfriend, the blow can feel particularly hard.

For a newcomer to the world of pick-up this can be especially difficult, as the number of rejections he will face on a weekly basis will increase significantly—or at least it should if he’s doing things correctly. The fact is that guys who get really into game, simply by sheer dint of the numbers of women they are approaching, probably experience more rejections than most regular men do in a lifetime.

How you take these rejections is key. Do you assume that a negative response from a girl is an indictment of you as a human being, that no other female could possibly find you attractive either and go and hide in a dank room playing Minecraft and eating chicken wings for the rest of your life?

Or do you alter your perception and regard it as feedback from which you can learn? The former will do you no good at all. The latter will not only help you to get better with women and enjoy more lays.

Resentment against girls can be a big problem for guys into gaming, both new and practised. You hear it when men talk to each other, discuss pick up on forums, or even in the comments section of ROK. On the surface it's easy to see why. If an entitled, stuck-up girl with little going for her other than her beauty gives you a dismissive head-turn before you've even had a chance to finish your opener then it's natural you're going to feel pissed off.

But here's the thing — feeling pissed off won't get you laid. What might get you laid, though, is a clear-headed assessment of what went wrong, your part in it, and how you can learn from the experience to approach the next girl differently.

What has really helped me after a session at a club, or after trawling the streets and cafes for girls, is to write out a mini-inventory of any rejections I have faced. Doing so helps me see more clearly that I may have been at fault in the pick-up in some way. It also helps defuse any residual anger I may still feel. Armed with this calm insight I am able to go into the next scenario with increased self-awareness.

Here are the things I recommend you consider after a botched gaming event.
Write sentence or two on each and then file the sheet away for future reference.And remember — when you are writing, don't refer to the girl's faults at all. This is solely about you — what you did, what you said, and how you came across.

1. Describe The Rejection

This is self-explanatory, but it is really helpful to write down exactly what happened, as long as you keep it brief. Try it and you'll see how much less riled you feel afterwards.

2. Why Do I Resent This Particular Girl?

Again, write down in simple language exactly what it is about this particular rejection that really stings. Don't spare yourself. Be as detailed as possible and really try to relive the feelings of hurt and anger as you write.

3. Did Fear Come Into It?

Now you need to be completely honest with yourself. Did the set mess up because you were afraid? Perhaps you approached with insufficient confidence, or spoke in a low, wavering voce that didn't display sexual dominance. Perhaps your body language wasn't on point. Perhaps your eyes weren't sparkling and mischievous and you didn't hold her gaze.

Whatever it is, write down exactly how your fear of women—or just this particular woman in this particular context—contributed to her off-hand treatment of you. Don't spare yourself – it's important that you capture all of this in black and white.

4. Was I Dishonest?

In this context I'm talking about dishonesty around your sexual intent. Did you approach her like a friend, or like someone on the street looking for directions rather than like a champ who's not afraid of being upfront about what he wants—that is, sex with attractive women? If you in any way tried to weasel your way in through friendliness or overt "niceness" then now is the time to confess.

5. Was I Sufficiently Versatile?

Leonardo DiCaprio wolf of wall street

Did you read the situation, read the girl you approached and make an effort to tailor a contextual opening gambit based on her dress, looks, location, or something happening around you? Or did you go in with the same old cookie-cutter line you read on the internet back in 2012, secretly hoping it would fail so you wouldn't have to carry on a longer conversation with an attractive stranger?

If you aren't at least trying to personalise your approaches then it could be that your game is getting stale, which will only lead to more blow-outs.

6. Have I Been In Denial?

OK, you complained your friends in the Uber home and you wrote an angry comment about bitchy girls on ROK. But having answered the previous five questions, can you now see that maybe, just maybe, you were a little tiny bit to blame for what happened too? If so, now's the time to 'fess up.

7. What Could I Have Done Better?

Having worked through these questions, it's likely that at least a few ideas on what you could have done more proficiently will have come to mind. If so, write them down here, remember them, and refer to them before you go out to meet girls next time.

Of course, no one is denying that women can be entitled, narcissistic and bitchy — and sometimes downright unpleasant. But you can't control that. All you can control is how you behave in any given interaction.

What I have found is that however resentful I may have felt about a particular situation, these seven questions have helped to clarify my role in it, and given me useful pointers on what to correct going forward, as well as helped to eradicate negative feelings.
The process of answering them has also helped me to convert rejections I have suffered into useful learning experiences.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why The Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need To Learn Game

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

3 Things I Learned From Serving As Reaxxion's Editor

August 5, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As most of you already know, Return of Kings' sister site Reaxxion is closing down this week. Back in March, Roosh selected me to be the site's editor after I retired as a weekly columnist; I didn't have enough time to juggle all the sites I was writing for at the time and I wasn't on top of gaming news enough to consistently write new articles on the topic. Managing Reaxxion's other writers was better suited to my schedule and temperament.

While I've edited online magazines before (most notably my old blog, In Mala Fide) as well as worked as an editor on various books, this is the first time I've been paid to edit a website. While I've made my living solely off the Internet for over a year now, editing Reaxxion taught me a number of things about web publishing and making money online that I didn't know. Here are a few…

1. You need to balance your employees' autonomy with quality control

While Roosh gave me a set of directives when he took me on as Reaxxion's editor, he also gave me a huge amount of freedom to run the site. It's this autonomy that made it easy to do my job. Publishers and editors who insist on micromanaging their underlings usually end up driving their websites into the ground. For example, a close friend of mine was driven out of her position as editor at one magazine because her boss couldn't resist the urge to keep pissing in the soup.

At the same time, editors need to be willing to tell those under them to get their act together. When I first started out, Roosh took a hands-on role in acclimating me to Reaxxion, showing me how to write article titles and tighten up otherwise weak posts. I in turn had to take a firm line with the site's writers in order to help them improve; in fact, I had been compiling a dossier of mistakes each writer kept making in their articles and was planning to present it to them when Roosh announced the site's closure. The main reason In Mala Fide declined in quality was because I couldn't effectively implement quality control.

2. Editing is more time-consuming than you think

I offered to become Reaxxion's editor because I figured that fixing typos in other peoples' articles would require less work than writing my own. This was a huge mistake. Given the varying writing abilities and skill levels of Reaxxion's writers, editing articles took more time out of my schedule than I thought it would, leaving me less time to devote to my own projects. Fact-checking articles also took a sizable bite out of my free time.

Additionally, as the editor, I was essentially required to be on call at all times in the event of breaking news. For example, when a bomb threat was famously called in to the Washington, D.C. GamerGate meetup back in May, I had to interrupt my Friday night and get home so I could edit and publish a pair of Reaxxion articles on the story. Fortunately, I was drinking at the bar across the street from my apartment, so I was able to get home quickly. It's things like this that took some of the shine out of being the site's editor.

3. You need a more in-depth knowledge of a site's subject matter in order to be a truly effective editor

As Reaxxion's editor, I bear some of the blame for the site's demise. While I'm an accomplished writer and editor, I'll freely admit that I was tuned out of gaming news—and gaming in general—before GamerGate happened. Indeed, it was my lack of knowledge of modern gaming—and the lack of time I had to dedicate to learning more about it—that led to me resigning as a weekly columnist from the site to begin with. All I could really write were game reviews and retrospectives of classic PC titles, neither of which moved the needle in regards to traffic.

Because I wasn't as plugged into gaming culture as I would have liked, I wasn't able to steer Reaxxion as effectively as someone with a deeper knowledge of the subject matter. I was reliant on the site's writers to generate article ideas, and while Reaxxion's staff were good at what they did, I wasn't able to give them the knowledgeable nudging that an editor is supposed to.

Nothing in this article is meant to disparage Roosh's or Reaxxion's writers: it was a pleasure working with all of them and I wish that the site could have continued. But assuming the editor's mantle came with a set of responsibilities that I didn't expect. If you're looking to create a website in this day and age, you need to be prepared for all the trials and issues that come alongside it.

Read More: 7 Things I've Learned From Tuthmosis' Viral Article

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Canadian Aurelie Nix Falsely Accuses Roosh Of A Rape Threat With Help From Journalist Emily Campbell

August 6, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Canadian professional SJW and all-round miscreant Aurelie Nix has falsely claimed that Roosh threatened to rape her. Despite publicly available information that proves she is lying to gain attention and calculatedly defame Roosh, she made the extraordinary claim to an ignorant Montreal radio "journalist," Emily Campbell.

> Roosh V found some of her photos, and went after her online.
>
> "He posted it and incited people to wonder if they would sexually assault me, saying that he would." she says. "I received a lot of death and rape threats on Facebook, online, on his forum, my pictures have been posted everywhere."
>
> Nix has pressed charges against him with the Montreal police.

Nude photo was publicly accessible on Model Mayhem, even to children

In addition to raising questions about Nix's greatly unbalanced state of mind, her mendacious, plain made-up accusation should strike fear into the heart of every man who takes the extreme risk of sleeping with her. If she says this about Roosh when the online facts categorically disprove her lie, what could she do when a man has no record of what actually goes on in a bedroom with her?

My esteemed colleague Quintus Curtius already introduced you to Aurelie Nix this week. Her flagrant disdain for free speech and virulent organizing against it is becoming even more notorious. And she has taken her hateful ideology to another extreme by pressing charges against Roosh with Montreal police, as Emily Campbell's article confirms. You can therefore add thoroughly vexatious complainant to her curriculum vitae.

Aurelie Nix says false rape accusations are rare but makes false rape threat allegations

Aurelie Nix's nose is a lot longer than this.

> 2-4% of rape accusations ever turn out to be false…how is that the "fastest growing hobbies"? Especially since less than 10% of rapists ever see the inside of a jail?
>
> – Aurelie Nix's Facebook comment earlier this year, before her false accusation that Roosh threatened to rape her

Roosh's actual comments about her were:

> Would bang if…
>
> -I get the whole thing live on video from start to end with a direct feed to the local police as a false rape accusation preventive measure
> -Face down so I don't have to see the tattoos
> -She doesn't talk

Instead of engaging in some basic, two-minute fact-checking, which would not have required a response from Roosh, Emily Campbell simply took Nix's unabashed, defamatory lie as gospel. This is poor, distinctly unprofessional journalism on her part and she should either completely retract the story featuring the false accusation against Roosh or provide the context that blows Nix's complete lie out of the water. Irrespective of which of these choices she makes, she owes Roosh an unreserved apology.

Aurelie Nix should be charged by Montreal police for making a false report

Emily Campbell, reporter for radio station CJAD 800 in Montreal, owes Roosh an apology and must either retract or provide context for the defamatory remarks she featured from liar Aurelie Nix.

Whether this happens is another thing. I imagine that the political establishment (let alone SJWs) in Quebec, of which parts are already clamoring to try and shut down Roosh's Canadian lectures, would call for any charges to be dropped, if they were even laid. Nonetheless, in a teeming metropolis of millions with hundreds, if not thousands of serious crimes to solve, Aurelie Nix believes she can waste precious police resources that should be allocated to people in often dire physical need. She is nothing but a vindictive liar and charlatan.

From her tattoos to her naked photos to her posing drenched in fake blood (also naked) to her now false allegation of a rape threat, Aurelie Nix is a girl desperately craving attention and very much over-the-top online and other validation. If her fellow SJWs had any nous, they would strategically cut ties with her, citing her as one of the "minority" of women (in their view, not ours) who make decidedly false rape or rape threat accusations. Unfortunately for them, their hate is so all-encompassing and misguided that they will probably do anything to protect poor, precious Aurelie.

Roosh is winning (and will win) the Battle of Montreal

Another feminist false rape threat accuser, Elizabeth Bruenig.

With Aurelie Nix, one of the ringleaders of the angry mob trying to silence Roosh, outed as a false accuser through her own stupidity, the credibility of the SJW lynch mob has been broken into still more pieces. Fully cognizant that their narrative is as fake and contrived as Nix's allegation against Roosh, they want the proprietor of Return of Kings silenced so that their facade does not crumble. Instead, he has published a plan called Operation Medusa to fight back.

I asked Roosh what he thought of Campbell's reporting. He said, "It's clear that Campbell has conspired with Nix to defame me for making a threat that did not take place. I am currently talking to a lawyer in Quebec to see if I have a winnable civil suit against Nix, Campbell, and CJAD's owner, Bell Media, a huge Canadian corporation that I'm sure has deep pockets."

These are exciting times for the manosphere and, particularly, neomasculinity. As Arthur Schopenhauer famously recounted:

> All truth passes through three stages.
>
> First, it is ridiculed.
>
> Second, it is violently opposed.
>
> Third, it is accepted as being self-evident.

Aurelie Nix and her not so merry band of affronted, free speech-hating witch hunters are currently in the self-immolating throes of their violent opposition to Roosh's truth.

Read More: A Police Officer Shares His Personal Experiences With False Rape Claims

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Canadian Establishment Is Working With Feminists To Shut Down Roosh's Speeches

August 6, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

For the past couple of weeks, Canadian feminists have been on the warpath against Return of Kings publisher Roosh V, who is bringing his "State of Man" lecture to Montreal this Saturday and to Toronto next Saturday. Spearheaded by Vancouver-based feminist Sara Parker-Toulson, feminists are seeking to shut down Roosh's speeches and possibly bar him from entering the country entirely on the basis that he is encouraging "hate" against women.

The agita against Roosh began three weeks ago, when Parker-Toulson created a Change.org petition to encourage the Canada Border Services Agency to deny Roosh entry to Canada:

> From advocating for the decriminalization of rape to imploring men to sexually abuse women with mental illness to straight up dehumanizing women as an entire group, 'The Return of Kings' is part of the 'Manosphere', a misogynist hate-scene that has been developing a growing presence on the web. Misogynists from all over the world are attracted to Roosh and his website not only because it, like all hate groups, provides an easy scapegoat to blame all of their problems on, but because it also promises to provide them with an easy guide to sexually abusing women. The most dangerous ideas that RooshV propagates are about what to do with women in the real world: how to treat them, why and how they owe men sex, how to best take full advantage of their fundamental inhumanity.

Not long after this, Montreal-based "model" Aurelie Nix organized a protest against

Roosh's speech in she declared that she called the police to ensure that he would be arrested on sight and another feminist encouraged protesters to try and illegally shut down Roosh's lecture:

RECENT ACTIVITY

Aurelie Nix
21 mins · Montreal, Canada · Edited

Alright so, after multiple talks with the Canadian Border Agency, and receiving at my house some of the most awesome officers, matricule 5856, 6461 and sergeant Goulet matricule 6274 from the SPVM, and a 5 pages long report about and against Daryush Valizadeh, I am going to go, eat poutine and have a drink with my man. So, this is the green light to call the Canadian Border Agency at 1-888-502-9060 and add your voice to all this. If you need the file number regarding Roosh V, message me.

Like · Comment · Share

10 people like this.

Marie-Eve Bourassa Amazing work
17 mins · Like

Aurelie Nix According to the SPVM, he shouldnt be let in. But if he is, I have pressed charges and only need to make the call to get him arrested the minute I know of him being within the country.

To the sheep reading this and who continue threatening me, the SPVM and the border is looking at the forum, so, unless you really want roosh turned down, you might want to tone down the threats.
12 mins · Like · 3

Eileen Kantel You go girl!
11 mins · Like

Since then, the push to shut down Roosh's speech has reached critical mass, with both the CBC as well as local Montreal media whipping up a frenzied hate mob against him and Quebecois government officials speaking out. Feminists even managed to threaten the venue location into canceling Roosh's lecture, although Roosh has found an alternate locale to hold the event.

While it is true that a nation can deny foreign nationals entry for any reason, the feminist campaign against Roosh's Canadian tour dates has been built on lies and intimidation. Feminists have deliberately lied about and misrepresented Roosh's views to portray him as a monster, and their violent campaign against him potentially breaks both Canadian and American laws.

How The CBC And CJAD Helped Organize A Lynch Mob

Had the Canadian media ignored Parker-Toulson's petition and Nix's lynch mob, no one would have heard of either one. The catalyst for Canadian feminists' hate campaign against Roosh was an article by CBC News, Canada's government-owned broadcasting network. The CBC's report on Roosh amplified feminists' erroneous claims about Roosh and gave confidence to their campaign against him:

> Concordia student Fannie Gadouas is encouraging people to sign the petition to stop his entry into Canada. She said people should know that he is coming to the city and work to prevent it.

The fact that a government-owned broadcaster is deliberately spreading falsehoods in order to cater to social justice warriors should be worrying to Canadian taxpayers.

Additionally, privately-owned Montreal talk radio station CJAD 800 added fuel to the fire with an even more bogus report that erroneously referred to Roosh's speech as a "pick-up artist workshop," among other mistakes:

> "I started a petition to the border services in order to get him denied entry," she says. "In the same sense that we fight white supremacy and don't allow it to flourish in Canada we also take a stance against organized misogyny because it also results in sexual assault and violence against women."

Since then, numerous Canadian media outlets have repeated Parker-Toulson and Nix's claims word-for-word, without bothering to investigate the story or reach out to Roosh himself. However, it was the tabloid Le Journal de Montreal that took the next step of actively collaborating with feminists to attempt to shut down Roosh's speech.

How Le Journal De Montreal Allied With Feminists

In their report on Roosh's lecture, Le Journal de Montreal published the location where the speech would be held. After a wave of threats from SJWs, the venue was forced to cancel Roosh's booking. Roosh himself spoke to me on what happened:

> They found out the venue location even though I didn't share it with any of the ticket holders. I believe either the hostess I hired for the event or the hotel staff contacted the private Facebook group. Through that group they organized a protest to show up in front of the hotel (three-hundred people committed to going). The Montreal police (SPVM) found out somehow and contacted the hotel as a safety measure. The hotel freaked out and cancelled my booking. I talked with the hotel and I understand their position, but that left me with no venue to hold an event was taking place in three days. The SJWs involved have the full support of the media. I have no doubt they are working hand in hand to shut the event down.

Yesterday, Roosh was able to find an alternate venue for the speech, and he also made the ticket page private to deter infiltrators. However, the fact that the Canadian media is so willing to do the bidding of violent feminists is incredibly worrying.

What's Next?

Société

Mobilisation contre un blo

CE QU'ELLES ONT DIT...

DES PROPOS CONTROVERSÉS

Despite SJWs' attempts to shut down Roosh's speech, "The State of Man" will be happening this weekend in Montreal. Stéphanie Vallée, Quebec government minister for women's issues, has stated that she is not opposed to Roosh giving his speech, but given the successful hate campaign feminists have waged so far, there's no telling what they will do next. Roosh provided me with this handy visualization of how he plans to enter Canada.

The frenzied response to Roosh's speech not only displays the authoritarian, Pharisaical nature of feminists, but the parochiality and backwardness of Canadians in general. To date, Roosh has brought his "State of Man" lecture series to four cities in three countries, yet only Canadian feminists are up in arms over his presence.

The creepy collusion that the Canadian media has with feminists—including the CBC, a broadcaster that is funded and run by the federal government itself—shows that Canada is no nation for proud men.

As an American of Canadian descent, I have never been more ashamed of my heritage. Regardless of what happens this weekend in Montreal, it is clear that masculine men should avoid visiting or having anything to do with Canada. It is up to good Canadians to resist the feminist beast in their midst.

Read More: Canadian Aurelie Nix Falsely Accuses Roosh Of A Rape Threat With Help From Journalist Emily Campbell

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

3 Eating Tricks That Get You Ripped

August 6, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Six Pack Shortcuts

Hey, Mike Chang here… and I'm honored to be a fitness expert writing on Return of Kings. Now you might already know me from YouTube, and maybe you're even one of the 3.5 million subscribers on my sixpackshortcuts YouTube channel.

So to show you how grateful I am today for being picked as an expert… not only am I going to reveal the three eating tricks that will get you ripped, I'm also going to give you a complimentary eating system. It's the same one me and my clients personally use to get ripped. And you'll get that right after trick #3.

Now, you probably already know that most dieting is exactly that… a diet. But honestly man, I hate dieting so I'm not going to ask you to do that at all. My approach to eating is different – because my goals are different. And that means I eat foods that will allow me to enjoy life, while getting a ripped body and six pack abs.

Because those are my goals… not some Crossfitter, paleo crap that your friends brag about on Facebook. Because with my eating system, my body does the talking for me, and you'll be able to experience the same thing.

Let's be honest. You don't care about being a bodybuilder or Crossfitter, and you don't want to spend your life hating the foods you eat. You just want to know how to get a ripped body that demands respect, in the shortest possible amount of time.

To do this, you can't use old school diets that are impossible to stick to. So rather than just doing the same boring, nasty diet that everyone else is doing, you need to simply eat a different way…

So here are 3 eating tricks that will get you ripped:

1. Eat More Often

A lot of guys think that losing your belly fat is all about eating less… WRONG! You actually need to eat more. But you have to make sure that you're eating more of the right foods. I suggest that you eat these specific fat burning foods about every three hours.

Because when you eat these foods more often, you actually boost your metabolism and allow your body to burn more fat. And on top of that, if you eat consistently throughout the day, you are less likely to get extremely hungry and eat a huge cheat meal. And that's why Men's Health said a meal about every three hours will "shrink your gut."

If you want to know the exact foods to eat, I go into more detail with your gift that's coming soon in trick #2.

2. Cook Your Meals Ahead Of Time

It’s important to prepare your meals ahead of time because we are not like women… we don’t enjoy cooking. So as men, we should just knock it out all at once.

In addition when you prepare your meals ahead of time, the food is there. It’s convenient… and your chances of eating fast foods are eliminated.

Prepping your meals will also save you time and money. It usually costs me about 9 dollars a day to prep all my meals… and that’s for 5 meals. And normally, if I eat out, I spend at least 20 bucks on a normal lunch.

Here’s what you can do today to get started:

1. Go to the store and get lean cuts of meat like top round steak, chicken breast and tilapia…

2. Stock up on complex carbs like sweet potatoes and brown rice.

3. Get some veggies like broccoli, asparagus and cauliflower

Then prepare your meals!

Here are some meal ideas:

Five ounces of flank steak, a cup of brown rice and a cup of broccoli.

Five ounces of tilapia or cod, 6 asparagus spears and one sweet potato.

Two whole eggs and three eggs whites. Cream of wheat and a few strawberries or a banana.

3. Eat Cheat Meals

Find an eating plan that allows you to cheat, because traditional “dieting” is not sustainable. So you can’t do it forever… you know what I mean? I know when me and my friends tried it – we always gave up. Because you can only eat nasty dry tuna for so long.

The honest truth is that sticking to a strict diet 100% of the time is close to impossible, because you can’t just grab a quick bite when you are busy, you can’t enjoy a nice juicy hamburger and fries. And worst of all – you can almost never eat out. And that’s not any way to live your life.

Eating cheat meals also increases your #1 fat burning hormone, leptin. First of all leptin controls your ability to burn fat or not to burn fat. So basically when your leptin levels are high… you burn more fat. And when your leptin levels are low – you burn less fat. So you want your leptin levels to be high, not only because you will burn more fat… but when your leptin levels are high, all of your other fat burning hormones work at their optimal levels. This means you will burn more fat.

So how do you boost your leptin levels?

You eat cheat meals every so often. Now, this doesn’t mean you eat them every single day. However, my clients and I have proven that eating cheat meals about 20% of the time will keep your leptin levels high, and your body burning fat.

Now I know breaking your old eating habits and doing these three new eating tactics might be difficult… But I’ve made it easy for you in this easy to follow eating system… It’s called The Zero Willpower Eating System.

It shows you what foods to eat and at exactly the right times.

It also shows in detail how to prepare each and every meal for the whole week… the best part is that it shows you how to do it all in one HOUR. And that’s including clean up.

Lastly, it tells you the precise times and the delicious cheat foods you can start incorporating into your diet to get ripped abs fast.

And you can get it Free by going here right now, and simply entering your first name, email and phone number so I know exactly who to send it to.

Now, you might be wondering why I need your number. Well that’s simple, because when you enter your number, you also qualify for a free coaching consultation from one of my personal coaches and friends :).

So good luck okay!?

Here’s your Zero Willpower Eating System

Mike Chang

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Battle Against Feminists In Montreal Continues With Operation Revelation

August 7, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On Wednesday I introduced Operation Medusa to fight back against efforts to censor my Saturday speech in Montreal. It was such a rapid success that we can move on to Revelation, as I write this from an undisclosed location in North America.

I have received credible tips from insiders that feminist protesters in Montreal on Saturday will attempt to find the alternate venue where my speech is being held by loudly stampeding through downtown Montreal with two objectives: (1) to challenge men to physical confrontations with the intention of falsely crying assault, and (2) to take photos of mens' faces to upload online.

Operation Revelation is a defensive operation to infiltrate all feminist protests on Saturday afternoon, take video of the crowd under the guise of being a fellow protester, and then have videos analyzed to identify the key ringleaders of the protest who make statements or actions showing they intend to break Canadian law.

This operation is open to men and women. All Montreal residents who don't agree with a small group of mentally ill freaks deciding what type of speech all of Canada can hear is encouraged to participate. Take part in this operation not just because you support me, but because you support legal speech in Canada without interference by extremists on the far left.

Step 1

Join or monitor the public Facebook group that is organizing the potentially illegal protest.

Date: Saturday, August 8, 2015
Time: 12pm
Location: Norman Bethune Square (Downtown)

Step 2

Attend the protest with a fully charged camera and an outfit that looks like a person who has nothing going on with his or her life. To fit in seamlessly if you're a man, dress like a homosexual hipster (i.e. male feminist). If you're a woman, gain 30 pounds, dye your hair red, get three cat tattoos, and wear ugly clothing (i.e. contract Lindy West disease).

[image]

Step 3

Pretend you're a protester by sharing your hatred of patriarchy, "rape culture," and masculinity while casually filming the proceedings with your phone. You have the legal right to film in public. Remember to film horizontally and not vertically.

Step 4

Upload your raw footage to Dropbox or WeTransfer and email it to

Do not challenge the protesters because they are mentally unstable and in all likelihood ready to use violence. Fit in with them instead, gain their trust, and film the proceedings casually. Your raw footage will be edited and shared online to help identify potentially threatening individuals. Private investigators will likely be hired to help with the analysis.

A lot of supporters will be attending my lecture at that time, so this operation will need the support of moderate Montreal residents who strongly dislike the radical left and their censorship agenda. (If I've met you before, we can exchange numbers so that you can inform me of the protesters' whereabouts throughout the day on Saturday.)

It's clear that the media establishment which is supporting the SJW's, particularly the state-owned CBC, have no game plan on what to do if their targets decide to fight back. We now control the narrative, and they must react to what we do instead of the other way around. The support I'm getting from Canada is tremendous, and has allowed me to be within striking distance of successfully holding an event that they have desperately tried to shut down for the past two weeks. With your support, we can pull it off. Follow further developments by staying on top of my Twitter and the forum.

Don't Miss: The Canadian Establishment Is Working With Feminists To Shut Down Roosh's Speeches

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Feminist Sara Parker-Toulson Supports Violence To Stop Roosh V's Speech In Montreal

August 7, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> What worries Parker-Toulson the most is that Valizadeh's ideology could push some men over the edge.
>
> "This can turn to violence really quickly," said Parker-Toulson.
>
> – Kalina Laframboise of the Montreal Gazette, quoting Sara Parker-Toulson, who previously publicly "liked" a threat made by "Karma RedHawk Chodzin" to "send men" after Roosh.

In the spirit of her fellow hatemonger Aurelie Nix, who has disseminated a made-up rape threat about Roosh (and is yet to explain her frivolous police complaint), anti-Roosh petition organizer Sara Parker-Toulson has told the Montreal Gazette that the Return of Kings proprietor's presence in Canada will probably lead to violence. Yet she has forgotten something. Only days ago, Parker-Toulson "liked" (and therefore condoned) a violent threat by Karma RedHawk Chodzin against Roosh.

Chodzin, a lover of spirituality (according to her Facebook profile), wrote the following in response to a non-violent post by Roosh on his page:

> I will tell you only once. Threaten Sara Parker-Toulson-and real men in this family will come and find you. Only a coward attacks women.

But don't worry, Chodzin is a member of the website "Peace Villages" (under the name Karma Chodzin Lalo). Therefore she must be a very placid person who never makes public threats on Facebook because people disagree with her position.

You can support violent threats if you're a feminist and someone disagrees with you

The "threat" Roosh made was asking why Sara Parker-Toulson, his virulent critic, was liking his posts but had created an angry petition about him. The response? Karma RedHawk Chodzin threatened to "send men" after Roosh.

So far, eight people, including Parker-Toulson, have liked the highly ironic threat. The others are Isabelle Perreault, Leslie Cadieux Sanche, Monique Dubreuil, Sebastien Lemay (the sole white knight), Tabitha Beaudet, Marie-Frédérique Gravel and Shab Kassaie. It appears that pointing out the hypocrisy of a feminist (Parker-Toulson had been liking Roosh's posts but organized an anti-free speech petition against him) is now enough to "provoke" serious threats against someone the feminists themselves claim promotes violence through free nonviolent speech.

It is most amusing that all nine of them, including the poster herself, would practice their beliefs by advocating for men to do the dirty work of chasing someone down. How very feminist and gender equal of them! Women standing up for themselves… by threatening to instruct men to presumably beat someone up.

The truly dystopian element of Chodzin's threat is the conflation of verbal disagreement with some kind of physical danger. Normally, people respond with threats when they themselves are physically threatened. But Roosh's calling out of Parker-Toulson's illogical liking of his post leads to a violent threat. Is this what you call proportional?

Criticized a feminist? You must be (physically) “attacking women”

Karma RedHawk Chodzin/Karma Chodzin Lalo, a feminist and woman of peace who threatens to “send men” after people on Facebook.

Once more, raising the specter of domestic violence is a tactic feminists use to try and silence their opposition. Can’t respond to a verbal retort about someone’s bizarre behavior of liking an opponent’s posts but simultaneously rallying against him? Mention a buzzword associated with physically beating women! Then comes the anti-“domestic violence” brigade, at the ready to blunt the “ferocious attack” of Roosh’s verbs, nouns, prepositions and adjectives. Does Sara Parker-Toulson have any Facebook bruises, I wonder?

The tragedy is that people like Aurelie Nix and Sara Parker-Toulson, who make thoroughly disproven false rape threats and publicly support a call for violence, are being taken seriously by the biased Canadian media. Instead of verifying the claims made by each and investigating their backgrounds, their allegations are treated at face value and as gospel truth.

So far this week, CBC Montreal defamed Roosh by saying he had “posted” Aurelie Nix’s nude photos without any context, even though he and Kings Media had only provided links to her self-spread “modeling collection” (which was accessible to children as well). When combined with other one-sided news stories, the idea is to savagely paint Roosh as someone both threatening rape and criminally distributing private sexually-themed material.

Operation Medusa is thoroughly refuting the feminist hate

Aurelie Nix, Parker-Toulson's partner in depravity, has been exposed as a pathological liar and peddler of false rape threats.

SJWs such as Aurelie Nix and Sara Parker-Toulson have become carried away with their vitriol and continue to seriously undermine their credibility, if it wasn't already grossly in question. Forgetting that their defamatory, anti-free speech platforms are displayed publicly and thus can be torn apart, they've followed up their charges that Roosh "promotes violence" by committing libel (Nix) and endorsing the very violence that they falsely claim Roosh wants to stir up (Parker-Toulson and Co).

The Montreal Gazette, Toronto Star, CBC and CJAD Radio all have an obligation to present bonafide journalism to the masses, not poorly-investigated advertising which masquerades as impartial writing. The only "crime" committed by Roosh is the age-old right of speaking one's mind peacefully, which seems to have long fallen out of fashion in Canada.

Read More: Canadian Aurelie Nix Falsely Accuses Roosh Of A Rape Threat With Help From Journalist Emily Campbell

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Sara Parker-Toulson Publicly Supported A SJW Who Wishes Rape Upon Roosh's Future Daughter

August 8, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> …but i hope one day you will be the happy father of one [daughter] and that she will be raped…
>
> – Christian Caouette, the very, very logical "anti-rape" advocate who opposes Roosh (and any of his future progeny, clearly). His comment was liked by Parker-Toulson.

Feminist Sara Parker-Toulson, who has already backed a violent threat against Roosh, supported a Facebook post by fellow SJW Christian Caouette, one which expressed a vehement desire for our proprietor's future daughter to be raped. Clearly enamored by the biased attention she and other delusional SJWs have received from the negligent Montreal and other Canadian media, she now thinks "hate" can be stopped by wishing rape on unborn children.

It is stupendously ironic that a woman who blabbers incessantly about made-up "rape cultures" considers the rape of third parties yet to be born a useful tool for "educating" Roosh and others like us. That somewhere around 30,000 people (as of me writing this sentence) support the petition of someone who herself publicly supports the wishing of rape speaks volumes about the overall SJW mentality. It is pernicious, illiberal (in the fascist sense) and despises any semblance of free speech.

The pro-rape white knight Christian Caouette

Wishing rape on someone's unborn daughters because they disagree with you. How classy, Christian Caouette.

Christian Caouette (you can find his Facebook profile here), from Amos, Quebec, chooses to white knight for the SJW cause by, er, wishing rape on unborn children. If this is what SJW advocacy has regressed into, we can all sleep more easily at night. The beauty of people like Caouette, plus Parker-Toulson and her false rape threat-generating friend Aurelie Nix, is that they think they can spew their ideological bile with impunity and that massive, irreconcilable contradictions won't appear in their hate speech.

"The end justifies the means" is the mantra that psychologically buttresses these individuals, even as they support violent threats, wish rape on people not involved with the present debates and make up false rape threats against their philosophical enemies.

To them, it's moral to second violent threats if you're preaching feminism and claiming your opponents are violent.

It's moral to fight the rape culture by harboring desires that enemies' children be raped in the future. It's moral to say that false rape allegations are "rare" but simultaneously slander your foe by saying he threatened to rape you.

When will Canadian news outlets start reporting the false allegations, threats and rape wishes of the SJWs?

[image]
Aurelie Nix is still yet to furnish any "proof" that Roosh threatened to rape her. She has responded to her outing as a false rape threat maker by going offline and fearing a civil suit by Roosh for defamation and libel.

From early August, with the publication of my colleague Quintus Curtius' article, the intentions of those amongst the SJW crowd have been readily accessible to the uninitiated public, let alone professional "newsmen and newswomen" supposedly dedicated to the "truth."

In addition to other less salient indications of potential violence against Roosh and his loyal audience, discussions of bomb threats and other nasty plans have taken place in relatively open sight. Yet not even the smallest squeaks about this have come from the keyboards of mainstream Canadian journalists, ranging from the publicly-funded CBC to the Toronto Star, Montreal Gazette, CJAD Radio and others.

There is absolutely zero intention from these outlets to disseminate anything that would call into question what must be the "clean character references" afforded to all SJW ringleaders. Any information backed up by fact cannot be used if it vindicates Roosh and undermines the credibility and "standing" of Parker-Toulson and Nix.

Disgustingly, too, Parker-Toulson is a mother-of-three who is supportive of someone else's children being raped, all to "make a point" and "teach a lesson." How open-minded.

We will continue to support the unveiling and dissemination of the truth

Sara Parker-Toulson, Aurelie Nix and Christian Caouette are all members of the same fundamental breed. They bend or even break the rules, advocating for violence, rape and false allegations to forge their ideological ends. “Dexterous” use of information is how they attempt to bury the litany of contradictions and inconsistencies, and the plain hate, they produce. In turn, the full body of information is selectively manipulated by the media to falsely characterize Roosh as a misogynistic fascist caricature.

Nevertheless, the only fascism currently being practiced in Montreal is that promulgated and incited by the organizers of the fraudulent Change.org petition, further ringleaders elsewhere and those supporting them.

As for now, let it be on the record that Sara Parker-Toulson is a supporter of rape for the children of those who dare question that “rape culture” actually exists and the unapologetic defenders of real free speech.

Read More: Feminist Sara Parker-Toulson Supports Violence To Stop Roosh V’s Speech In Montreal

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Battle For Montreal Is Yet Another Example Of The CBC's Corrupt Journalistic Practices

August 9, 2015 | by Robert Conway | Link | Original Link

For those of you who have followed the goings on in Canada, you already know how Roosh has come under attack by radical feminists and Canadian press for his current speaking engagement. What you may not remember is that the Canadian Broadcast Company (CBC) recently engaged in a similar smear campaign against Gamergate.

The similarities between the two incidents, where one side of the message was obviously silenced, shows that the CBC is unilaterally pushing a pro-feminist, state-approved message. And they will tolerate no dissenters.

The CBC ran this one sided piece last November. Based the video, it becomes pretty clear that CBC is pushing a narrative where women appear to be victimized. This is highly similar to their coverage of Roosh's Montreal lecture, which consists mostly of interviewing apparently mentally ill feminists about how they fear for their safety while trying to incite mob violence against a man for giving a speech.

CBC’s History Of Bias

Ironically, the CBC had interviewed pro-Gamergate game developer Jennifer Dawe, who happens to be a woman, for their hit piece. Of course, that interview never saw the light of day as you might imagine. John Bowman, the CBC journalist who had interviewed Dawe, later stated that his producers did not want to go ahead with the story. We can only imagine where that directive came from.

That incident in particular was a violation of CBC’s journalistic standards and ethics practices, which clearly state:

> We are committed to reflecting accurately the range of experiences and points of view of all citizens. All Canadians, of whatever origins, perspectives and beliefs, should feel that our news and current affairs coverage is relevant to them and lives up to our Values….. “We have a special responsibility to reflect regional and cultural diversity, as well as fostering respect and understanding across regions.

Returning to current events, not once has the CBC asked for Roosh’s unedited side of the story—he said that he would be available to do a live interview so that his words could not be selectively edited, but thus far no media outlet has taken him up on the offer.

Not once have they considered that there are two sides to every story. From what I can tell, CBC is more interested pushing a narrative similar to the imaginary war on women that American liberals continue to perpetuate.

Considering that CBC is government funded Canadian Citizens should demand recourse. CBC needs to get its act together, and Canadians need to realize that their main news source is anything but unbiased.

Read More: The Canadian Establishment Is Working With Feminists To Shut Down Roosh’s Speeches

Robert Conway
Robert is a former Reaxxion writer.

One Historian’s Dystopian Vision Of Our Near Future

August 9, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

It is easy to get hung up on squabbling about the hot button issues of the day (feminism, creeping socialism, immigration, and Planned Parenthood’s sale of murdered baby parts) that we lose the big picture of where our civilization is headed.

John Michael Greer is a historian who gives us that big picture.

His prognosis for our current technological civilization is bleak. If Greer is right, our civilization has already reached its peak and we are starting a descent that is going to result in a complete restructuring of the way we live our lives, including rampant unemployment, increasing violence, and the loss of technology. In other words, Greer believes we are on the verge of a new dark age.

A 21st Century Gandalf

I will be the first to admit that at first glance, Greer seems to be an unlikely source of wisdom about the future. His background is unusual, to say the least.

One could say that Greer, who was born in 1962, is a real world Gandalf. He got his start writing about his involvement in a magical group modeled on the famous Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. The Golden Dawn was a group that operated in Great Britain in the late 19th and early 20th century. Its membership included some of the brightest literary minds of the time: W.B. Yeats, Arthur Conan Doyle, Arthur Machen, and the notorious Aleister Crowley.

To practice Greer's version of magic requires one to be broad. A Golden Dawn-style magician must be well versed in philosophy, history, religion, and even science—and Greer amply fulfills this obligation.

Dissatisfaction With The Current State Of Civilization

I also suspect that J.R.R. Tolkien's Lord of the Rings played a big role in Greer's formation. Lord of the Rings has a negative view of some of the 20th century developments that destroyed the strong communities of village life, cut down trees, and replaced them with impersonal cities. I believe that Greer is attracted to the simpler life described in Lord of the Rings, and this lead him to question how long our technological society could survive.

End Of The U.S. Empire

Ten thousand miles from tip to tip.—Philadelphia Press.

Greer's points out that the United States has been an empire since the country consciously embarked on that course during the presidency of Theodore Roosevelt. The imperial system has worked to enrich America and its allies, but, according to Greer, it has reached its zenith and has now started to decline.

Destruction Of The Manufacturing Sector

There are several causes to the decline. One is that US dominance has allowed American companies to move their production to cheaper countries. This has destroyed the US manufacturing sector and turned America's industrial heartland into the Rust Belt.

The exporting of all manufacturing jobs has created an imbalance within the American job market. Because most of the productive jobs have been moved out of the country, the only way to make a living in the US is in what Greer calls "office fauna" jobs.

Office fauna roles are things such as project managers, human resource managers, corporate image consultants, and strategic marketing specialists. Office fauna jobs are pure overhead—it costs a lot of money to maintain huge staffs of people who basically do nothing productive.

Now, the US has an excess of people who are educated to do office fauna jobs and a shortage of people who have more useful skills. If times get tough, those office fauna jobs will go away. Greer writes:

> [f]or the time being, the United States can afford to offshore jobs, or import people from other countries to do [vocational or trade jobs] at substandard wages; as the empire winds down and those familiar bad habits stop being possible, the shortage of Americans with even the most basic practical skills will become a massive burden. (From Decline and Fall: The End of Empire and the Future of Democracy in 21st Century America. All subsequent quotes are from this book.)

Political Gridlock

The second cause that is hastening the decline of the American empire is the gridlock of American politics. Greer indicates that this is a sign that the country has reached the maximum diffusion of power. Ironically, this makes it easy for certain groups to line their own pockets. According to Greer:

> The last three decades have seen America turn into something close to a Third World kleptocracy, the sort of failed state in which a handful of politically well connected people plunder the economy for their own benefit. When bank executives vote themselves million dollar bonuses out of government [bailout] funds while their banks are losing billions of dollars a year, it is impossible to discuss the situation honestly without using words like “looting.”

It is not just special interests that take advantage of the situation, foreign countries do it as well:

> [O]ther countries—China and Israel come to mind—have learned to make use of the diffusion of American power for their own interests. It doesn’t matter how blatantly the Chinese manipulate their currency or thumb their noses at intellectual property rights… so long as they keep their lobby in Washington well funded and well staffed, they’re secure from any meaningful response on the part of the US government.

Greer believes the current political situation is not sustainable. It will either lead to a dictator who will break the deadlock for good or for ill, or it will lead to the US breaking up into two or more regional powers.

A Decrease In Oil Production

Greer's third cause may be more controversial. He believes that we have reached peak oil production and that the price of energy will slowly begin to increase. This will affect more than just the United States—it will gradually make our entire technological civilization unsustainable.

Oil is a fixed resource—the earth is not creating more fossil fuel—so eventually we will run out of it. Renewable petroleum alternatives such as wind, solar, and hydro, are not cost effective. The only way these alternative energy sources survive is through massive government subsidization. Moreover, these renewable alternatives show no sign of ever becoming economically viable.

Critics of the peak oil theory will point to the fracking industry to show that we will continue to develop new ways of getting more oil. Greer is skeptical. He suggests that the only reason that fracking was created was because the price of oil reached such a high price that fracking became cost effective.

From Greer's perspective, the current low price of oil—it is below $50 a barrel—is a result of OPEC flooding the market to put its fracking industry competitors out of business. This may be true as half of the 41 US fracking companies are expected to go out of business by the end of 2015.

Critics of peak oil theory, and they are in the majority, say that discoveries of new oil reserves are more than offsetting the slowing production of older reserves. They will point to the low oil price as an indicator that oil supply is outpacing demand, and that it will continue to do so for the foreseeable future.

Peak Oil Effects

If Greer is right that we have already reached peak oil production, our current way of life will become quickly unsustainable. Cheap energy has made our technological civilization possible. Once the cheap energy ceases to be available, society will need to revert to something more like the Victorian age.

But getting there will be incredibly painful. Travel and large-scale international trade would be the first casualties. Production of goods would have to shift back to happening locally.

A decrease in oil production will also result in massive unemployment as the office fauna workers who lack any real skills are laid off. This would result in less need for computers, telecommunications networks, and those people who support these industries.

Greer believes we are already seeing the first effects of this with the fact that the job market never fully recovered after the 2008 recession.

How To Protect Yourself

The people who are best prepared for an American decline may be a group like the Amish—they are pretty much self-sustaining farmers. But Greer believes that it is too late to adopt farming. Events are happening much too quickly to make complete changes in one's lifestyle.

Instead, he recommends that we adopt the philosophy of living with "L.E.S.S." which he defines as "Less Energy, Stuff, and Stimulation." The other strategy is to begin "to adopt the technologies and habits of earlier eras." The idea is to learn to live with less energy now, while we still have some time, rather than being forced to learn it when everything goes to hell.

Conclusion

Do I believe Greer's predictions? I think that it is beyond question that America is currently in a state of decline. However, I still think that with the right leadership, it might be possible to reverse some of the decline and breathe new life into the country–at least for the short term. If no great leader steps forward, I agree with Greer that big, unpleasant changes are headed our way in the near future.

On the topic of peak oil, I am less convinced, but I am not as sanguine as our libertarian economists who predict an unending party from here on out. I've lived long enough to realize that these promises of "energy independence" never seem to pan out. I do think that it would be prudent to adopt Greer's philosophy of living with less energy, stuff, and stimulation.

Even when I disagree with Greer, I always find him an enjoyable read and I never fail to learn new things. If you'd like to read more of his writings, he blogs at http://thearchdruidreport.blogspot.com.

Read More: John The Baptist Syndrome

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How Roosh V Won The Battle Of Montreal

August 10, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The Battle of Montreal is now over.

In simplest terms, the fight involved the following two opposing forces: Roosh V and his organization, and the collection of social justice warriors (SJWs) loosely organized around feminist activist Aurelie Nix. The battle itself raged for about four days from August 6 to August 9, with some preliminary salvoes before, and some aftershocks after. Now that the dust has settled, it is possible to draw some conclusions.

The first and most important conclusion was that Roosh V delivered the SJW side a decisive defeat. The SJWs failed in both of their stated objectives:

(1) They failed to prevent Roosh V from arriving in Montreal, and

(2) They failed in their stated desire to stop Roosh from delivering his "State of Man" lecture.

The seismic effects of this victory will continue to be felt for some time. The huge media publicity surrounding the battle ensures that Roosh will emerge from this contest stronger than ever, with his neomasculist message more disseminated than ever.

How did this result come about? The goal of this article is to examine the various phases of the campaign, to see how each contributed to the end result.

Phase 1: The Intelligence War

The Montreal lecture was the second to the last stop in Roosh's State of Man World Tour. He had previously delivered his lecture without incident in Berlin, London, Washington D.C., and New York City. The subject matter of the lecture was masculine self-improvement in general, with an emphasis on the principles of Neomasculinity.

In short, it was an informational lecture that was neither illegal, nor "offensive", nor "hateful" in any way. The fact that no other city had the slightest problem with the lecture verifies this fact.

Montreal, however, was different. A radical clique of feminist SJWs, emboldened and enabled by the Canadian media, decided for themselves that that their fellow citizens should not be permitted to hear Roosh speak. The mentality is by now so expected as to pass nearly without comment.

The first phase of the battle involved a thorough preparation by the Roosh V organization. Articles were published describing the principles needed for success in the high-tempo world of informational warfare. The Roosh V organization internalized these lessons and readied themselves for the road ahead. The opposing side clearly did not.

Roosh V operatives scoured the city to explore the most favorable venues to host the lecture. A detailed risk assessment was made regarding the potential for hostile action. Informants and confidential sources inside the SJW ranks were activated and provided useful information as part of the advance studies.

The decision-making process proceeded in the following five stages: (1) assessing the situation; (2) assessing the mission; (3) planning the actual execution; (4) organizing the administration and logistics; (5) organizing the command and signals. What emerges from this is the meticulous, exhaustive advance planning that contributed directly to the ultimate victory.

Simply put, Roosh and his organization outworked, outfought, and outcycled the opposition by orders of magnitude.

Phase 2: The Information War

In modern conflicts, it is critical to master the informational terrain, and Roosh understood this in a way that the other side did not. He was always able to stay a step ahead of the enemy, getting inside their decision-making cycle in ways that contributed to their ultimate collapse.

The battle proper began when Sara Parker-Toulson launched a petition drive on change.org to block Roosh from entry into Canada. A similar petition campaign was begun on Facebook by another SJW. A SJW radical named Vlad Vorontsov threatened to "shut down" the lecture the Facebook page coordinating these efforts.

In an incredibly rapid mobilization of his electronic resources, the Roosh V organization sprang into action. They understood that, since the media would always take the side of the SJW radicals, they needed to seize the initiative and expose the SJW threats and smears. Those threats needed to be documented, so that the world would know who was the aggressor.

It was this electronic blitz that the SJWs were simply unprepared for and unable to cope with. After the Return of Kings article on Vlad Vorontsov's plans was published, other articles followed that documented the lies and smears of other SJWs. The lies of Aurelie Nix and her associates were revealed for all the world.

They responded by curling up into the fetal position, shutting down their accounts and sites, and playing the well-practiced role of the victim. This, from the people who had started the aggression in the first place.

But this was not all. The media coverage of the battle by the CBC was shockingly distorted in favor of the SJW side. Roosh never even bothered to court the media, knowing that it was a rigged game that he could never win. Instead, he activated his own media nodes: Return of Kings, Twitter, and the Roosh V Forum. These media nodes conducted an around-the-clock, nonstop series of responses to the SJW lies and threats. Additional resources were also mobilized, and were standing by as auxiliaries, but turned out to be unnecessary.

Article followed article, the world was kept informed of the enemy's true actions and character. Everything published was based on the actual statements of SJWs, or on included photos that SJWs themselves had already released. In short, Roosh was able to outcycle the pace of the enemy's operations by maintaining a much faster pace.

Collapse of the SJW side was induced when the pace became unbearable for them; and when it became clear that the SJW side was unable to generate any momentum, their defeat became almost inevitable.

The SJW side was undisciplined, lacking in focus, and patently dishonest, and these qualities certainly contributed to their loss. All they could do was cherry-pick satirical statements made by Roosh in a pathetic attempt to show that he promoted "hate speech." They tried to play the victim, when their own actions and statements proved that they were the victimizers.

Phase 3: The Ground Campaign

The ground campaign included the events on August 8, the day of the actual lecture. It was here that the operational art of the Roosh V organization proved its professionalism. Scouts were sent out to select various locations; meanwhile, misleading information was fed to the enemy to cause them to waste time and resources in pointless goose-chases around the city.

Communications systems were tightened and standardized. An entirely novel method of personnel movement was designed just for the lecture (which for security reasons cannot be fully disclosed at this time).

In tandem with this, waves of disinformation were funneled to the enemy to confuse, confound, and frustrate them. The tight coordination between the mobile Roosh V teams meant that any obstacles encountered were quickly overcome.

The lecture went off even better than planned. In fact, turned out to be a combination lecture and dinner banquet.

Despite attempts to sugar-coat the bitterness of the defeat, it is beyond question that the Battle of Montreal was a crushing victory for the Roosh V organization. Its trajectory and details will likely be studied for years to come.

Not only did the SJWs fail in all of their stated objectives, but even worse, they began to turn on each other when the magnitude of the defeat became apparent. Groups of trouble-makers that had been sent out to harass and disrupt the lecture wandered aimlessly around the city, tweeting petulant messages at each other.

Like wounded beasts blinded with impotent rage, all they could do was resort to violence by throwing drinks at Roosh in a bar after the lecture. Those who hold themselves out as angels were exposed as being the bullies and aggressors that they are. It was a pathetic spectacle, but not entirely unexpected. Steps were taken to defuse the situation, and not fall for the SJW provocation. And that was the end of that.

Lessons Learned

The lessons learned are clear:

1. Document every instance of the enemy's threats and lies, so that awareness of these things can be disseminated. The mainstream media is corrupt and actively colludes with the enemy.

2. Ride out the airstrikes, fire back unrelentingly, and keep the operational tempo high.

3. Press every advantage and always be one step ahead of the enemy.

All in all, it is clear that this was the most significant free speech battle in North America in decades, probably since the 1960s. At every stage of the engagement, the Roosh V organization showed a remarkable adroitness and ability to be everywhere at once. The SJW side underestimated this capability.

The battle now moves to Toronto.

Read More: 5 Proven Ways To Become More Assertive

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Feminist Jessica Lelièvre Assaults Roosh V On Street And Brags About It On Social Media

August 10, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Eat my cunt!
>
> – The incredibly eloquent words of Jessica Lelièvre, anarchist-feminist and oppressed member of a multimillion-dollar construction business proletarian family. She said this after dousing Roosh in liquor, unprovoked.

Return of Kings proprietor Roosh has filed charges against Jessica Lelièvre, a Concordia student senator, "anarcha-feminist" and one-time President of the Political Science Students' Association, for an assault captured on YouTube.

Intoxicated both with alcohol and "power," Lelièvre boasted about her act on Twitter, before realizing that future employers tend to regard unprovoked assaults badly, even when they're against people hated by large numbers of feminists and others. She also doxxed Roosh from her own account (see below).

Fortunately, we still live in legal jurisdictions where assault is only warranted in instances such as self-defense. Determining assault is not a matter of democracy, especially in the context of a large mob chasing a grossly outnumbered group.

Currently, Jessica Lelièvre has deleted her Twitter account (the tweet claiming responsibility was deleted first, though), her LinkedIn profile and Facebook page (an Academia profile is still active as of writing). The original video of the assault was put up to generate publicity for Concordia University's The ConU (Twitter and website), with which Jessica has very close ties.

Like Jessica Lelièvre, when your only real job has been working for your dad's multimillion-dollar construction business as an "administrative assistant" or whatever, you probably have the money to be sued, anyway.

Last time I checked, nearly 40,000 people had signed the petition to stop Roosh from entering Canada. Yet the extraordinarily privileged Jess Lelièvre must be one of the few people who would ever spend an entire day and then evening trolling around Montreal's streets and bars just so that she could throw a drink in the face of someone they hate.

Normal students with real pressures, not the daughters of multimillionaires who claim to be anarchist-feminists, would be working or studying.

More tragically still, Lelièvre was on a panel reviewing sexual assault "procedures" at Concordia University. She orchestrated a "honey trap," using her friend, to assault someone and get a mob involved, but was somehow responsible in the past for officially advising on policies for dealing with sexual assault allegations. With that sort of intrigue going on in public, God help any man who leaves her (or her friend) as a jilted lover after sex.

A calculated publicity stunt

The whole assault was soundly premeditated before it was carried out, as evidenced by a proud admission, later deleted, on Reddit by user Gepeg Libre. As they recount, Lelièvre was on the prowl looking for Roosh already and she texted a male "crew" (how feminist of her) to arrive in order to physically intimidate him. We can only guess if they intended to commit further, more serious crimes against Roosh and his friends, but luckily Roosh's group was able to extricate itself before the "protestors" gave into their animalistic urge for open violence.

Before all this, however, Lelièvre and her friends had to ingratiate themselves with Roosh and others at the bar. Jessica, the daughter of the very wealthy Lelièvre construction family, executed her plan flawlessly with a friend who gave the name "Jennifer," providing a great exposition of the ingenuity of her very rich old white male ancestors. Her great-grandfather Émile, the historical family patriarch and the man most responsible for her economically charmed life today, would be so proud.

Yes, Aurelie, throwing a drink (or even a cheeseburger) is assault

> @amy_stoprape1 @rebirthsuicide_ throwing a drink is battery and assault? HAHAHAHA
>
> — Aurelie Nix ⚹ (@aurelie_nix) August 9, 2015

SJWs are rejoicing at the "fact" that throwing a drink on someone is apparently not assault and battery. However, it is. In the same few days that Busta Rhymes was charged with throwing a protein drink in the States, the anti-Roosh brigades console themselves by thinking that Montreal, or perhaps Canada more widely, is a legal paradise for those who seek to throw liquids at people with impunity.

Heck, even throwing a cheeseburger in a cup in Canada has resulted in assault charges, despite a lack of injuries requiring hospitalization. One of the attending officers for that case said that the cheeseburger was still considered a weapon.

Canada's Criminal Code establishes that assault is where:

> 265. (1) A person commits an assault when
>
> - (a) without the consent of another person, he applies force intentionally to that other person, directly or indirectly;

This says nothing about actual injury and I am happy to produce another ten cases verified via both Canadian court case databases and newspaper reports where people, including women, have been charged and successfully convicted for behavior comparable to Jessica Lelièvre's.

I have not even broached the subject of the mass of white knights surrounding Roosh and his companions, which was clearly menacing and in all likelihood was intending to inflict serious assault and battery if Roosh's group had simply remained at the bar enjoying their night out.

If Aurelie Nix (who appears to be a compulsive liar and who has still not produced any proof regarding Roosh's so-called "rape threat") and the other doubters want to deny that throwing a drink is illegal, let's try an experiment.

Aurelie and her comrades-in-arms can go find a random group of women at a club and throw the contents of a drink (preferably something with more volume like beer) over their faces. Repeat the procedure at least ten times to get a good study sample. What would be the result? Obviously, the reason it should be tried on fellow women is because there's no question of any "man retaliating against a woman" double standards.

The feminist folk hero who uses men to chase her enemies

Like many wealthy, self-entitled anarchist-feminist rich girls, Jessica Lelièvre likes to fly in chartered helicopters and talk about smashing the patriarchy that built them

Note how Lelièvre fades into the background after throwing her drink. She lets the "male" white knights take over. Would she do this to a bigger girl, or one who could simply easily beat her up? Of course not. She chose Roosh because she knows female privilege would prevent her from being retaliated against.

The entire incident demonstrates how women skilfully use men to do their bidding, in a situation where the cornered party has little prospect of taking on a larger group of belligerent males. That said, some within the group did try to restrain their less controllable friends.

Lelièvre's history of instability and violence

Jess Lelièvre has a history of such combative conduct. She has previously been slapped with charges by Concordia for what the university termed illegal striking. Being the child of a very wealthy family, it is comparatively easy to see that she would be willing to disrupt classes and engage in strikes.

As for students who wanted these classes to go on (those that you would expect have a lot less support from their family name and wealth during college than Lelièvre), their needs and fears about the impact of disrupted or cancelled classes on their bottom-line were ignored.

Jessica, by virtue of her family pedigree, need not worry about obtaining a job soon after graduation. Her parents have already seen to it to buy her and her sibling a lovely property in Florida. As life for students across North America goes from bad to worse to diabolical, Jessica has already been set up for life.

For all her implicit and explicit talk about male privilege and anarchy, supposedly patriarchal modes of capitalist production have endowed Jessica Lelièvre pretty well. The irony is that the world of old white men she claims to rally against has given her ten times more in this world than 99% of the male population.

Lelièvre and friends are applying the same tactics falsely attributed to Roosh and his supporters

Remember Sara Parker-Toulson, the rape-wishing and violence-supporting "activist" who decried the "threats" supposedly being leveled at people like false rape threat accuser Aurelie Nix? She gleefully spread another doxxing from the "honey trap" girl who targeted Roosh before Lelièvre assaulted him. Unsurprisingly, she declined to name herself in the tweet distributed by Parker-Toulson.

It is also hardly shocking that the mainstream media is saying nothing about either the assault (other than as some sort of "comedy" video) or the calls for violence by Twitter users such as yrfather, Auragasmic, fairyocarina, Dildodaddi and Cocolicquot (among others):

[image]

https://twitter.com/Cocolicquot/status/630431629899628544

Nonetheless, the position of the SJWs is tenuous. A vocal number of commentators have questioned both the morality and legality of the assault and the mob antics. One of the more common responses has criticized the notion that vehement disagreement equals some sort of unmitigated right to confront and attack others.

The SJWs have also been called out for using the exact same tactics falsely reported in the media about the Roosh V Forum. In fact, they took it further because, unlike so-called threats, they translated it into real life on the street.

Intolerance, entitlement, and bigotry might have many names over time. But today we can just settle with "Jessica Lelièvre."

Read More: Canadian Aurelie Nix Falsely Accuses Roosh Of A Rape Threat With Help From Journalist Emily Campbell

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How I Tried To Turn A Ho Into A Housewife

August 11, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Last week I talked about the miserable marriage I endured for seven years before pulling the ripcord and getting the fuck out of dodge after finally having tolerated enough bullshit.

That said, I figured I'd just rip off the band-aid and get the rest of my embarrassment over with by regaling you with the third and final chapter of my "ROK Origins, Sharpe Edition" series.

This particular story can be summed up by one succinct phrase:

> ...you can't turn a ho into a housewife...
>
> -Dr. Dre

Truer words were never spoken and like many men here, I had to learn this the hard way.

[image]
Dr. Dre was ahead of his time back then

Now gentlemen I'm going to warn you—this story is going to make you cringe as my beta-fied hind brain is on display at practically every turn. I was an omega-level simp at the very lowest level and my thirst is almost too pathetic to be real but I can assure you that every word of this tale is true.

Hang on to your hats...

"Aye Papi"

True story

The day after my wife and I had physically separated (she moved back to her parents house) I felt like a new man. The world was my oyster again as I had now shaken myself free of my ungrateful wife, and was certain it wouldn't take me long to find a snowflake who loved me for me and appreciated me for the loving, swell, generous man I was!

Being a call center supervisor certainly presented me with plenty of opportunities to step out on my wife over the years. I'd flirt with a girl or two every now and then but I never took it any further, and used my sorry example of a marriage as an excuse not to explore the side chick option.

The simple truth was that I just didn't have the game or the balls to engage in infidelity on any level. Looking back at all the chances I had, I could kick myself for not cheating to fulfill my needs that weren't being met, but I digress.

I was now a free man ready, willing, and able to commingle with the girls who had been shooting me IOIs since before I could remember. There was one girl in particular I had flirted with on and off who seemed ripe for the picking.

"Carla" was a fiery Puerto Rican girl with hot body, an ass like a Georgia peach, and a pretty face who made my boner stand at attention every time I saw her. Never seen not wearing skin tight jeans that accentuated her unbelievable ass, she always turned heads at the office.

Carla had a boyfriend whom she lived with, but her choice in dress and flirtatious temperament made it clear she was on the market and willing to sell her assets to the highest bidder.

SOLD! to the thirsty simp!

Again, with the benefit of hindsight I now know she zeroed in on me for two reasons: a) she knew I offered more in the way of provisioning because of my position as a supervisor, and b) that she was attracted to my authority.

My dumb ass thought she liked me because of my charm and winning personality…

The day she found out Darcy and I were separated she immediately turned up the heat, and I was all too happy to drink in the rays. She'd bring me home cooked lunches on days we worked together, update the sales board for me (back then we used a whiteboard and dry erase markers), and even took my calls while I was away from my desk, cementing her place as my own personal hot secretary.

After a couple of weeks she started calling me “Papi” which placed me completely under her spell. When a beautiful Latina looks you in the eye and calls you “Papi” you are powerless against its effects. The only antidote to this is the red pill, but as you’ll soon see, I had none to speak of.

Funny thing is that after months of flirtation, dates, meals, etc. I still hadn’t slept with her. I was certainly going to get my opportunity soon right?

To the rescue!

The more time I spent with Carla, the more I learned about her “desperate situation.” Each date she’d tell me more and more about how her boyfriend was threatening to kick her out and that when and if he did she would have “no place to go.”

At first, I didn’t take the bait—but not because I had learned the lesson administered by my soon-to-be ex wife. I was still thinking that saving women was the key to getting into their panties.

Even though I’d worked with Carla for over a year I really didn’t know her that well and that was the reason for my apprehension and not that I had just come out of a marriage that started much the same way.

But Carla knew exactly how to kill that apprehension and trigger that oh-so-useful male provider instinct by upping the ante:

One Monday morning, Carla was absent from work. She hadn’t called or texted since Saturday night so I was on edge wondering if another man had her attention now.

Finally, around lunch time I get a frantic call from her. She tearfully tells me her boyfriend kicked her out on Sunday, threw all of her and her son’s stuff out on the lawn and that she was at her sister's place.

I told her I was relieved that she at least had a place to stay. But Carla turned up the heat just a few more degrees by telling me that her sister's boyfriend told her she could only stay for a week and after that he'd take her to a shelter…

…and that was all I needed to hear. I got her sister's address, told my boss I was taking the rest of the day off, jumped in my car, and raced over to rescue my fair maiden with my cape flapping in the wind.

I was so excited about how lucky I was to get a second chance to rescue a woman it was pathetic. I was actually thinking to myself "I'm gonna do it right this time" on my way over to get her.

After all was said and done, I had rented her a 3 bedroom, 2 bathroom house with a fenced in back yard for her dog near downtown. I paid the deposit and first month's rent, turned on her electric and cable, all in my name. I even rented a U-Haul and moved her shit into her new place (with the help of her sister's boyfriend).

Carla was outwardly grateful and for the first month or so things were great. Though I never spent the night I was over there pretty much all the time. Her kid seemed happy to finally have his own room (they routinely bounced from place to place) and her dog was as happy as a pig in the mud being able to run around freely for once in her life.

But I still hadn't fucked her and was beginning to wonder why. I'd done everything "right" to that point so what was the problem?

Little did I know that getting pulled over would soon give me the answers I was looking for.

My week behind bars

One night in early February I'd just left Carla's place and was headed home for the night.

It snowed earlier in the day but even though the roads had been cleared there was a black ice warning on the news so I figured I'd better take it slow.

About half way home I noticed that a cop was tailgating me. Having been pulled over plenty of times I knew preemptive traffic stop behavior when I saw it, so I reached into my glove department to grab my registration and insurance. Sure enough the blue lights came on a few seconds later.

My license, registration, and insurance all checked out but I had an outstanding warrant for my arrest. The officer was a young guy and was actually pretty cool about the whole thing. Before he slapped the cuffs on he let me smoke a couple cigarettes while we waited on a buddy of mine to come get my car, who he allowed me to call to avoid having it impounded.

I could have bonded myself out rather easily—except for the fact that I had just paid Carla's rent, electricity, and cable and didn't have enough in my account to hire a bondsman. My next direct deposit wouldn't hit for another few days and as result I spent a week in jail.

My boss and I were cool so I still had my job when I got out. I took care of my legal situation quickly and easily and in the end, the only collateral damage was monetary. The whole thing certainly took a chunk out of my finances, but it was over with and that was worth the financial body blow.

Carla was happy to see me out (of course she was) and eventually told me she wanted me to spend the night. I happily agreed thinking I was finally going to fuck her. All of my "hard work" was finally going to pay off. I slid off my clothes, climbed into her bed…

…and smelled cologne—a man's cologne. I jumped up and turned on the lights and asked her who's cologne it was and she said it was "a friend's."

A raucous argument ensued that woke both her son and her dog and when the smoke cleared I wasn't any closer to solving the "mystery" as I was when I climbed into bed with her. She denied fucking whoever this dude was but I knew otherwise.

As bad as this was, believe it or not, it gets worse…

As I was getting dressed to leave she actually has the gall to say to me “Donovan, I think it’s a good idea for you to stay away for a little while” and I agreed. This woman had just kicked me out of a house I was paying for and I stood there and allowed her to do so—in front of her son no less.

But when I told her I would continue paying her rent and bills because I was “a man of my word” I as good as handed her my balls. It wasn’t until her sister told me the truth about what was happening from the beginning did I grab my Y-chromosome and cut her ass off, and even then I was hesitant because I was still holding out hope that she’d eventually come around.

According to her sister, the father of Carla’s youngest son (whom she had custody of) had been released from prison a few months back and she’d started fucking him behind her live-in boyfriend’s back. Her boyfriend got wind of it and told her to end it. Carla said she did but kept fucking the baby daddy anyway, and when her boyfriend learned she hadn’t kept her promise he finally kicked her out.

Carla wanted to move out for a while but didn’t have the money to get a place but couldn’t leave her son’s father alone. She knew she’d eventually get caught and kicked to the curb that’s where I came in.

Her sister told me that Carla was “definitely interested” in me but when her baby daddy got out of prison, she “realized she was still in love with him.” She said Carla “struggled to find balance” and decide whom she wanted to be with and that when I exploded at her for having him over while I was in jail it “turned her off.”

I wanted to believe Carla’s sister, but the writing on the wall was so bright and clear even I couldn’t ignore what her end game was: she needed a place for her and her baby daddy and needed a beta bucks to fund her domicile for her and her alpha fucks.

Suckering a simp like me to foot the bill for her residence while getting pounded by an ex-con every night at said residence is just about as close to satisfying both sides of the feminine imperative as it gets. To her credit, she damn near pulled it off. If I hadn't smelled his cologne on the sheets I may very well have been her beta bucks for quite a while longer.

Fortunately my team had a great 3rd quarter, so I was able to use my bonus to sock away some cash for another rainy (or snowy) day and buy my books for Paralegal school which would be stating in the fall.

Most importantly I finally realized that rescuing damsels in distress was a fool's errand. I was definitely still a beta but I was probably closer to a shade of purple at this point so I still had a long way to go before seeing red.

And as luck would have it, Amy would nudge me in the right direction not much more than a year later.

As usual…

…Carla had a shitload of red flags:

1. She was raised in a foster home: We're all privy to the horror stories told about the goings on in foster homes from neglect, poor treatment, abuse, and so forth and the permanent damage it inflicts on children. Carla was a foster child since the age of 6 and unfortunately for her, she became a statistic. She was emancipated at age 11.

2. She was sexually abused by her uncle as a child: This was the reason she was in foster care in the first place. Carla didn't tell me about the abuse—her older sister did, and then her oldest sister confirmed it. The oldest sister also told me that she, Carla, and their other sister were all sexually molested and raped as young girls. The middle sister denies she was ever molested but her hyperdrive promiscuity and deplorable choice in men betray her denials.

3. She had four kids but custody of only one of them: Carla was either a genetic freak, started having kids early, or both because her body did not reflect four pregnancies carried to term. According to her older sister someone called Child Protective Services because Carla was being severely physically abusive to one of them out in the open. Apparently this wasn't the first time she'd been reported for such things and this incident was the last straw. As a side note, her four children were fathered by three men.

4. She had a neck tattoo: This story wouldn't be complete if she didn't have a tattoo of some sort and this one was of the neck variety. The tatt was the first letter of each of her kids' names in Old English. I can't blame her for wanting to do something to remember her children (who she was rarely allowed to see) but the placement was a bad choice.

Super slut tell

5. No relationship with her father: Her father was an alcoholic and was never around. Unfortunately this left the door wide open for his brother to have his way with his daughter.

6. Three sisters, one mother, three fathers: Yep, each sister has a different father. It should come as no surprise that they all hate their mother with a passion. Sluts raise sluts and this situation was no different.

Tying it all together

So there you have it. All three of my most embarrassing escapades with the opposite sex. When I think back on all of those stories I can see my slow, but steady progression toward neomasculinity.

It took Darcy and Carla to get the "ho into a housewife" concept through my skull because when I got with Amy I had no intent on rescuing her and my actions reflected as much. As a result, I didn't come across as thirsty and bedding her was fairly easy (though her sluttiness certainly played a role).

Amy taught me the value of bona-fide slut tells. What I learned from her, Darcy and Carla carried over into over into my three week relationship with the low quality Latina I got with after I came west. I immediately recognized her attempt at playing the "damsel in distress," picked up on her slut tells, and dropped her like a bad habit.

When I found she was already out with another dude the night I dumped her I searched "Why do girls get over breakups so easily?" and the rest is history.

I'm glad I walked through the fire

It's easy to be an armchair QB and say things like "I'd have seen trouble a mile away" or "I wouldn't have gone near that chick" and if that's really the case, good for you. You're one of the lucky ones who are impervious to female allure who is blessed with natural red pill knowledge, or were fortunate enough to have it taught or shown to you from a young age.

For the rest of us pussy is powerful thing—especially to extreme manginas like myself who had no knowledge of game, how slutty and nefarious women really are, or how to effectively deal with it and use it to one's advantage.

Few of us get to the point of knowing a woman's true nature without having experienced it firsthand. Darcy, Amy, and Carla showed me up close and personal that red pill truth is real. I had to learn these lessons as opposed to being taught.

That education paid immediate dividends as I was able to quickly diagnose and dispose of that low quality female I hooked up with when I came west. Not three months later she got knocked up by a dude she worked with and her life is now in a tailspin.

That dude could have been me, but neomasculine awareness combined with real life experience kept me from another train wreck with a female.

Most men out there will not be granted nine lives like I seemed to have been given by the red pill gods. I never take for granted how fortunate I am to have emerged from these missteps largely unscathed.

But I hope my stories encourage a few fence sitters to give the matrix of feminism the finger and avoid these pitfalls. If you don't, your life can and will go sideways in a hurry.

Until next time gents.

Read Next: I Didn't Think My Marriage Was All That Bad…Until I Found The Manosphere

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Montreal Café L’Artiste Affamé Endangers A Paying Customer By Posting Roosh’s Location On Instagram

August 11, 2015 | by Emanuel David | Link | Original Link

On August 6, 2015, two days before Roosh was to give his speech in Montreal, the L’Artiste Affame café breached Roosh’s privacy by posting his location on their business Instagram. Roosh stopped to sit in the cafe to get something to drink and he was immediately recognized by the staff. The staff, who was friendly to him and took his money, secretly wanted to alert feminist land whales of Roosh’s presence.

The cafe posted this picture:

Business Professionalism

As a customer you expect the management of any business you patronize to be mature and professional. At the very least, you expect an establishment not to go out of its way to put you in physical danger. This particular café lacked all of these traits when they posted Roosh’s location, along with this quote inciting women to harass him:

> Girls you’re main man is here. Roosh V! In the flesh. Should be here til 9 if you wanna come show your undying “love” for the dickbag. The doors open. Make it > count MTL.

This cafe accepted Roosh's business but immediately stabbed him in the back when he wasn't looking. Worse yet, the events of the weekend show that the café could have put him in direct physical danger by going out of their way to state his location and encourage people to show up. If this were done to an unpopular feminist speaker, it would clearly be called "doxxing" and "harassment."

In the comment section there were several predictable feminists who wanted to spit in Roosh's drink, kick him in the nuts, or get him kicked out of the country. This is not surprising behavior coming from feminists—the last few days' events have shown for us that they are irrational, violent, aggressive, and easily triggered. Roosh's mere presence drinking a cappuccino triggered the proprietor of this business to breach a paying customer's privacy.

Yelp

Soon after the café posted about Roosh's location, they started to get several negative reviews on their Yelp page. The owner of the cafe was distraught at seeing the reputation of his business go down the tubes, even if he likely deserved it. The business owner decided to flag the negative reviews on the cafe's Yelp page as spam, even though they reflected the "customer experience" of his establishment. As of now, almost all of the negative reviews have been removed from the page.

This is concerning because Yelp is supposed to inform customers about the products and practices of a business. One thing that is very important for a customer to know is if a business is willing to breach his privacy. If a popular female celebrity were to walk into L'Artiste Affamé, would the establishment leak the location so that she could be swarmed by "creepy" men looking to meet their idol?

Clearly, L'Artiste Affamé has shown that it is willing to breach the privacy of a customer. They have also gone to significant (monetary?) lengths to remove negative Yelp reviews that expose this willingness to endanger their client base. Without those crucial negative reviews, new customers will unknowingly walk into this café and leave themselves vulnerable to being harmed simply because of their political views.

The business owner has not responded to any of my requests for an interview. I am forced to conclude that he remains in support of this action, and regret that future customers will not be made appropriately aware of his shady business practices.

From this stunt, I know I will never do any business with this café. Neither should you, if you care about your privacy.

Read More: Feminist Jessica Lelièvre Assaults Roosh V On Street And Brags About It On Social Media

Emanuel David
Emanuel David took the red pill at a young age. He believes that the only hope humanity has is for it to create machines with their own intelligence. Machines will not be emotionally triggered by logical arguments unlike many humans.

Pope Paul VI Was A Prophet For Our Time

August 11, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

Christians in general, and Catholics in particular, are portrayed as puritanical and anti-sex. This raises a question: if Catholics hate sex so much, then why did they historically tend to have so many children? As recently as 100 years ago, child rearing was considered the proper object of marriage and sex. The blue pill script – go to college, get a good salaried job, marry young and for life, have two or three kids – retains its staying power because it used to be sound advice. The manosphere exists in part because it is sound advice no longer.

Pope Paul VI, who reigned from 1963 to 1978, was in many ways a weak and vacillating man. His predecessor, Pope John XXIII, described then Cardinal Giovanni Battista Montini as, "our Hamlet," always indecisive to the last. In an uncharacteristically bold move, he published the encyclical letter Humanae Vitae in 1968 that reaffirmed the Catholic Church's opposition to all forms of artificial contraception.

At this point, many RoK readers may be thinking, “I’m sure this is terribly interesting to you Levinson, but I’m not a Catholic and the pill and the condom have been great for my sex life. Why should I care about this?” You should care because Paul VI called it: the easy availability of contraceptives paved the way for no-fault divorce, unleashed hypergamy, and sodomite “marriage.”

Marriage Then

Most of us take atomistic individualism for granted, in contrast to the ancient understanding of man as the political animal. “Who are you to say what two consenting adults can and cannot do in private?” is taken to be an unanswerable rejoinder to traditional understandings of sex and marriage. Sex seldom remains a purely private affair, especially in the era of social media. Among other things, sex can lead to love, marriage, hate, murder, children, disease, happy homes, broken homes, social cohesion and social disintegration.

As Pope Paul described it:

> Married love is also faithful and exclusive of all other, and this until death. This is how husband and wife understood it on the day on which, fully aware of what they were doing, they freely vowed themselves to one another in marriage. Though this fidelity of husband and wife sometimes presents difficulties, no one has the right to assert that it is impossible; it is, on the contrary, always honorable and meritorious. The example of countless married couples proves not only that fidelity is in accord with the nature of marriage, but also that it is the source of profound and enduring happiness.

In other words, marriage was once considered a more public institution than it is today, not through legislation but through social convention. Young men were incentivized to make themselves good husband material if they wanted sex and children. Young women were encouraged to remain chaste and marry young. Divorce was unthinkable for our great-grandparents. Then, as now, women were much more ruthless about slut shaming than men.

Above all, marriage was ordered toward children:

> Finally, this love is fecund. It is not confined wholly to the loving interchange of husband and wife; it also contrives to go beyond this to bring new life into being.

> “Marriage and conjugal love are by their nature ordained toward the procreation and education of children. Children are really the supreme gift of marriage and contribute in the highest degree to their parents’ welfare.

Marriage Now

In paragraph 17, Pope Paul predicts the consequences of the contraceptive mentality:

> Responsible men can become more deeply convinced of the truth of the doctrine laid down by the Church on this issue if they reflect on the consequences of methods and plans for artificial birth control. Let them first consider how easily this course of action could open wide the way for marital infidelity and a general lowering of moral standards. Not much experience is needed to be fully aware of human weakness and to understand that human beings—and especially the young, who are so exposed to temptation—need incentives to keep the moral law [emphasis mine – AL], and it is an evil thing to make it easy for them to break that law. Another effect that gives cause for alarm is that a man who grows accustomed to the use of contraceptive methods may forget the reverence due to a woman, and, disregarding her physical and emotional equilibrium, reduce her to being a mere instrument for the satisfaction of his own desires, no longer considering her as his partner whom he should surround with care and affection.

Players and sluts ye shall always have with you, but the world now incentivizes us to be this way. Men must constantly perform or else their unhaaaappy wives will blow up the marriage for cash and prizes. That is, if men choose to marry at all. Fewer do, and in all honesty, I can hardly blame them. Why should they? If they want sex, they can find plenty of willing ladies provided they have even a modicum of game, and they won’t have to risk losing their homes, their jobs, their children, and their sanity in the divorce grinder.

Women too have grown to devalue men. Would the carousel exist to the extent that it does if it weren’t for the pill? If they can have consequence-free sex, then they will pursue the apex alphas and ditch the frustrated betas who were the good husbands and providers of yesteryear. Women are more exquisitely sensitive to social pressure than men, and the social cues that existed in our great-grandparents day aren't there anymore.

The key here is that artificial contraception radically separated marriage and sex from child rearing. Marriage used to be a recognized public institution that carried with it certain legal and social obligations to which the couple was expected to conform. If children are removed from the occasion, then marriage becomes all about romantic feelings.

Fuzzy Feels Are Optional

If marriage is nothing but a public declaration of romantic feelings, then two consequences follow: if the feelings go away, that's a legitimate reason to end the marriage; and if sodomites have romantic feelings for each other, then what reason do we have to exclude them from marriage?

Traditionally, Christianity has taught that if you burn with lust, you should marry. The specific woman you married was a question of prudence like choosing a career or a new house. Nowhere did the Church say that God had created "the one" or your soulmate. Unfortunately, this thinking has infiltrated all Christian churches today with disastrous consequences.

White knight extraordinaire Mark Driscoll

Jesus Christ famously prohibited divorce in the Gospels but many Christian churches have creative methods for getting around that. In theory, the Catholic Church has stood strong alone among all Christians. Strictly speaking, she does not recognize divorce but she makes "declarations of nullity," which means a couple never formed a sacramental marriage at the time of their wedding vows. The American Catholic Church in particular has been handing out annulments like candy for fifty years, so it's understandable why outsiders think of them as Catholic divorces.

The Basis Of Civilization

The building block of civilized society is not the individual but the family. The great evil of our time is that our progressive overlords actively undermine the family at every turn. My tradcon friends vacillate between believing game is either a placebo or a set of irresistible Jedi mind tricks cads use to deflower innocent virgins. The media wonders why young men refuse to grow up, man up, and marry those sluts. I say the men of today are responding rationally to the incentives of a world gone mad.

Be honest gentlemen: if Marriage 1.0 were still the rule instead of the exception, how many of you would happily marry? The contraceptive regime radically disrupted the natural formation of families. Sex became an end in itself. From that conviction came the scourge of pornography. The logical conclusion is the development of sex bots. And an elderly, celibate Italian bishop saw it all coming more clearly than all of the experts.

Read More: Why Would A PUA Get Married? An Interview With Paul Janka

Andrew Levinson
Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

London Journalist Rosamund Urwin Reveals Her Misogyny In Puff-Piece About Boxing

August 12, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Rosamund Urwin, uninspiring churnalist plying her dubious trade at London's neo-liberal rag-par-excellence The Evening Standard, has penned a vapid paean to the joys of boxing for women. Or rather, that's what Urwin appears to do in her feature in Monday's edition of Evgeny Lebedev's freesheet.

Upon closer reading, Urwin's screed is revealed as merely a puff piece for boxfit, the cardio-based non-contact version of boxing beloved of effete metropolitan yuppies. Could it be that Rosamund Urwin is a misogynist and a fake feminist who thinks women can only handle a watered down version of a violent masculine sport?

Urwin opens the piece ("Hit Like A Girl") by telling us nonchalantly, in the charmless, "humblebragging" fashion beloved of insecure petit bourgeois intellectuals, that she "[has] been working out once a week with Steph Poulter of Euphoria Personal Training," where she has been doing "squats, stretches and some weight exercises."

Lacking an even more oblique way of telling us that she is "boxing," Urwin claims "I mostly pretend to be Olympic boxing champion Nicola Adams, the British Olympic female boxer." She even, patronisingly adds that she now has her own gloves, wraps, and pads. Urwin, the empowered, ass kicking tank grrl feminist stops short of full contact, however, because she would rather forego "bleeding on the brain."

The rest of the piece is so vapid it reads like a feature in a proletarian gossip rag. Rosamund is at pains to expound on every female celebrity imaginable that happens to have taken up boxing. The implication is that women are too stupid to take something up for themselves and must be encouraged by way of "monkey see, monkey do."

She also shoe-horns barefaced plugs for all her mates' gyms. This includes Steph Poulter, who we are imperiously informed provides services to such luminaries of the London liberal-progressive chatterati as Professor Brian Cox's wife, feminist troll Caroline Criado Perez, and, er, some New Statesman editor nobody has ever heard of and her husband.

Rosamund Urwin has "been pretending to be" British Olympic boxer Nicola Adams. Liberals like to status-whore even in their fantasies.

Another of Urwin's recommendations terribly accessible classes (£15 a shot) at Miguel's boxing gym in Brixton, an area where ethnic minorities have been driven out by rapacious developers funded by gentrifiers of Urwin's social class. Urwin's other retarded suggestions, in an article purportedly about boxing, include a Boxfit gym, body combat classes at Virgin Active, and the gimmicky classes at corporate London's favourite McGym, Gymbox.

Conspicuously absent is any treatment of the possibility that Urwin's female readers might want to try competitive boxing.

Rosamund Urwin is a cookie shaped by the same cutter as many of the typists clogging the offices of British and American media offices. Expensively educated, over 30 and childless, Urwin is paid to write pointless diatribes on the injustices inherent in having a cunt.

And while Rosamund Urwin, like Joy Lo Dico and others, is a past master at propagating grievance-laden column inches from nothing, the feminist circus also needs a steady stream of feel-good puff pieces to appeal to the Go Grrl contingent. By penning a brisk, supposedly empowering piece about boxing, Urwin is playing to exactly that gallery, the Loboutin-wearing middle-class cubicle drones who “don’t need no man.”

Urwin’s piece, however, ends up being an insult to both women and boxing. It is an insult to boxing because Urwin is part of the machinery that takes authentic institutions like martial arts or military training, and pervert them for commercial gain into fitness gimmicks like box-fit and Tough Mudder, mostly for the purpose of middle class status whoring.

You would think these terribly expensively-educated feminists would go and build a nuclear reactor or something.

Even more hypocritically, it is an insult to women. Urwin on the one hand promotes the empowerment narrative, but on the other confines women to Box-Fit. Complaining in another article about the “belittling of women by treating us like delicate birds with broken wings,” she now writes about the wonders of boxing but holds it as a given that women are too fragile to engage in contact sparring.

It is disingenuous and insulting to the reader, and exposes the ivory tower mentality of the middle class intellectual elite that dominate London’s media. It exposes Rosamund Urwin as a misogynist who holds the average woman in a pitifully low estimation.

And on an supplementary point, it might be argued that a graduate of no less illustrious institutions than Oxford University and the London School of Economics might have conducted some verification ahead of making a claim as illiterate as that contact sparring in a women's boxing class would cause "bleeding on the brain."

Read More: Sweden Continues To Fund Bizarre And Inappropriate Sex Education For Young Children

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

How Bad Logistics Can Ruin Your Game

August 12, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The topic of logistics receives less attention than it is due in game writing, and it's easy to see why—out of all the elements of male-female interaction you could possibly address, "make sure you take the girl to a bar near your apartment" probably requires the least authorial flair.

But the fact is, if you want to sleep with attractive women with any sort of regularity you absolutely must make sure your logistics are on point. If you don't then you will lose lays in the most annoying ways imaginable. Fortunately, having good logistics is pretty easy if you're sensible and keep a few simple principles in mind.

What Do I Mean By Logistics?

In terms of game, logistics are those obstacles you must negotiate in order to get the girl you are interested out of the bar, club, store, or cafe where you met her and back to your apartment or hotel where you can enjoy some privacy together. The farther away this secondary location is, the more logistics you will have to contend with like calling a taxi, using public transport, or getting a lift.

There are also logistics attached to the girl's present circumstances and yours too. Perhaps she's with a group of friends who won't let her leave with you, or perhaps she has to catch a flight in five hours. Perhaps you have an important job interview in another city the next morning, or someone staying in your apartment that would make bringing her back awkward.

Any external problem that looks likely to stymie your attempts to sleep with an otherwise up-for-it partner may be considered a logistical one.

How Logistics Lost Me A Girl Last Week

The thing you must always remember about attraction is that it is fleeting. The player is presented with windows of opportunity during which he must execute, or risk losing the lay forever. I want to tell you a story to illustrate how simple logistics can mess up what might otherwise appear to be a sure thing.

Last week I was walking to meet a friend in a busy area of South London when I saw a particularly cute, slender brunette who was just my type. Dressed for the summer in a short, flared skirt and a tight-fitting top, her face and legs were tanned as though from a recent beach holiday. Clutching a map and squinting confusedly at street-signs it was pretty clear that she was a tourist, and lost. Having a few minutes to spare before my friend arrived I decided to introduce myself.

Rather than approaching as a white knight eager to give her directions, I walked up to her and told her that I had to talk to her as she was cute. Instantly she was disarmed and her face lit up. It turned out that she was Colombian but lived in Paris. This was her first day in London on a short trip visiting a friend.

Not only had she forgotten her friend's address, but her iPhone had died, leaving her with no record or telephone number to fall back on. She was, quite literally, helpless. Fortunately she had run into English gentleman Troy Francis — what could possibly go wrong?

Quite a lot, as it happens—for me. After a few minutes chatting in the street I took her to a bar where we managed to find a charger. As the juice flowed into the recalcitrant phone we talked more. She was a qualified dentist, but now worked in a clothing store on the Champs Elysée as her qualifications weren't valid in France. She also had incredible, tanned legs.

I escalated hard, touching her, pulling her hair, kissing her neck, creating a bubble around us and telling her that there was an incredible energy between us.

"You should come back to my apartment for one hour. Just an hour. Then I'll get you a taxi back to where your friend lives," I said.

The next moment we were kissing — just as her phone sprung into life again.

"My friend is texting me," she said. She tapped at her phone for a few moments. "She's coming to the station to meet me."

We kissed some more.

"Come to my apartment for an hour — you can meet her later."

She looked at me for a long moment, then nodded. It was on.

I pulled her out of the bar into the street. As I did so I tapped at my own iPhone, ordering an Uber. Three minutes away.

We stood on the sidewalk as cars passed and I tried to keep the mood light while looking out for our driver. After five minutes I called him.

"Where are you mate?"

"Nearly there boss."

After this same conversation had been repeated perhaps three times I realised that he had probably got lost. At the same time it was becoming harder to maintain the conversational momentum with a girl who, not speaking much English, was probably understandably wondering what the hell was going on. Suddenly she turned around.

"My friend — over there."

She looked at me mournfully. But the spell was broken. Sure enough, in the middle distance, standing up against a railing, I saw a rather irate looking woman craning her neck, on the lookout for a cute runaway Colombian.

"I'm sorry Troy, I have to go to her."

At that moment I knew the game was up. I shrugged and walked with her as she moved towards her waiting friend.

Bad Logistics Can Ruin The Moment, And You May Never Get That Chance Again

Will I ever see the Colombian girl again? Who knows. We have each others' contact details – but now she is back in Paris. Everything was in place that day for an SNL (single night lay), and had the taxi turned up I have no doubt that it would have occurred, since she was alone and up for fun in London for a few days with no agenda or timetable.

It is hard to think of more perfect conditions for no-strings sex to occur. As it is, the moment came and went and for her to meet with me now would feel a lot more premeditated — her anti-slut defence could well come into play and block a future assignation.

A Cautionary Tale

Let this be a cautionary tale. Of course, you can't legislate against idiotic taxi drivers, but at the very least you must ensure that you have a quick route back to your place planned every time you go out, with several alternatives in your back pocket if possible. The best thing is to go hunting near where you live, but if that's not possible then ensure you have a car, or access to decent public transport if you must.

Overall though, you must keep in mind that once a girl has indicated she is willing, it is your job to get her home as quickly as possible. Failure to do so might just see you standing by the road watching a hot Colombian girl walk off into the night with her friend.

Read More: 7 Steps to Follow When Your Game Hits a Dry Spell

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How Phenibut Can Help You Game Hot Girls

August 12, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Good Looking Loser and written by Donovan Sharpe.

My previous article on Phenibut touched on its ability to help you sleep better, enhance sex, and it's stackability with various Kratom strains. Today I'm going to talk about how it can help you with social and approach anxiety.

To be clear, I am discussing my experience with uncut Happy Hippo Phenibut.

Phenibut is sold as a nutritional supplement in the U.S. and Europe (sold as a psychotropic drug in Russia). Its main uses are to alleviate general anxiety, social anxiety, PTSD and insomnia (high doses) but it's also used proactively to improve overall neurological function which is the reason I wanted to give it a try.

This compound is mainly used for people who suffer from various anxiety disorders and is easily the main effect and this is exactly what helps you within the context of meeting women or just enjoying yourself in a social situation.

It absolutely kills approach anxiety

Talking to pretty girls is easy on this stuff

One of the most difficult elements of meeting random women is approaching – especially if the girl is hot. I'll be the first to admit that when I took the red pill, approaching was especially hard for me even though I've never had trouble talking to strangers.

It's not easy to just walk up to a woman and strike up conversation out of the blue if you're not accustomed to doing it on a regular basis but with practice it becomes considerably easier.

Phenibut positively destroys approaching anxiety.

The time it takes to feel its effects will vary from person to person but when it does, you will start to notice how freely and easily you start conversations with perfect strangers. You will also notice that many of those perfect strangers are pretty girls.

Once you strike up conversation with a woman and she is receptive, half the battle is won. Phenibut's ability to reduce anxiety, especially social anxiety, eliminates thoughts of rejection which makes you about as fearless as it gets when approaching women.

For some of you guys, it will make a tremendous difference.

It's not like most over-the-counter dietary supplements that do little to no good. It significantly reduces social anxiety, if not completely eliminating it.

Phenibut keeps you relaxed

[image]
Being relaxed and in control makes 'em tingle and blush

Another important aspect of game is simply staying cool, calm, and collected. Appearing tense or not under complete control throughout your conversation, escalation, and most importantly her shit tests will quickly derail your attempt to bed her.

Phenibut relaxes you to the point where you radiate that “don’t give a fuck” attitude that chicks dig. Remember, your conversation with her is flowing effortlessly but when you give off a relaxed vibe it shows her that you are outcome independent which is extremely attractive.

I also want to make clear that Phenibut doesn’t provide type of ‘sit on the couch’ relaxation that makes you lazy or unmotivated like most “anti-anxiety” compounds do. In fact, Phenibut does quite the opposite, it actually will encourage ‘pro-social’ behavior for most people. This is paramount within the context of game because relaxation is useless without the social drive.

A personal experience

The first time I tried Happy Hippo Phenibut, I took 1000 mg (2 scoops) with a strong cup of coffee on an empty stomach after my morning workout. I didn’t feel anything for a couple of hours so I took 1000 mg more. I wasn’t quite sure whether or not it was working but I noticed that I was striking up conversation with anyone and everyone at work.

This carried over after work as I struck up conversation with the cute cashier at 7-Eleven without hesitation despite the fact that it was during one of the busiest times of the day. There was a long line which meant plenty of people were watching what could have been an epic fail but I broke out my phone and attempted to number close her anyway.

Got shot down…..zero fucks given

She giggled and politely rejected me but I didn’t care. I shrugged my shoulders, took my cigarettes, turned around to the next guy waiting in line and said, “Can’t win ’em all!” to which a few people in line chuckled.

My first experience with Phenibut was a real success. Approach anxiety, relaxation, and motivation were all on display as my day progressed. It took a couple of hours for it to take effect but when it did, the difference was noticeable.

In closing

A potential social drawback Phenibut is that you may end up talking to too many people. Normally this wouldn’t be a bad thing except for the fact that you might end up striking up conversation with a girl you wouldn’t fuck with your worst enemy’s dick.

It’s all fun and games till you open the wrong chick

Something to watch out for is taking too much at one time. After my crash and burn with the 7-Eleven hottie I went home and took another 1000 milligrams to keep the party going. I loved the feeling of being rejected in front of a crowd of people and not giving a shit.

But after that last dose I laid on my couch that afternoon for a quick nap around 4:00 pm and didn’t wake up until 1:30 am the next morning! I had work to do that I didn’t get done and even missed a date I set up with a girl.

I was passed the fuck out but it was the best sleep I'd had in a while

Again, this only happens if you take too much. Remember, Phenibut at higher doses is meant for insomnia. The pro-social effects found generally between 1000-2500mg.

All it takes to mitigate these minor drawbacks is to be more selective of who you converse with to avoid chatting up an HB 3 (even though you're tempted to talk to anyone and everyone) and start small and work your way up with your dosing so you don't snooze your way through a Friday night that could have potentially been productive both professionally and personally.

While so many dietary supplements, especially ones that supposedly reduce anxiety, are worthless, Phenibut is one that is inexpensive actually works well. You might be pleasantly surprised.

Check out the uncut Phenibut from Happy Hippo.

If you what to know exactly what to expect and how to use it, check out this article from Good Looking Loser.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

A Field Guide To Converting Feminists

August 13, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Now that the message of neomasculinity is finally getting out, even in the face of violent opposition, we can move on to the next step in our crusade to reclaim Western civilization—converting feminists into traditional women.

Progressives deny that a feminist can be converted into a traditional woman. They say that all feminists are "born that way."

We here at ROK know that conventional opinion is wrong. Yes, Feminist Conversion Therapy is controversial, but the fact is that it works. There are dozens of former feminists who have gone on to lead productive lives as feminine wives and mothers, all through the miracle of Feminist Conversion Therapy (FCT).

Our wish is that more blue-haired feminists experience the life enhancing benefits of FCT so we are making this field guide available to all men who may be interested in this great work.

Feminism results from a decline in number of alpha males

There are many factors that have brought about the rise in feminism: easy birth control in the form of the pill, progressive indoctrination in the schools, and propaganda from leftist political parties. But one factor is commonly overlooked: the decrease in testosterone levels over the past twenty years.

A 2007 study published in the Journal of Clinical Endocrinology & Metabolism found that over the past 20 years there has been an age-independent decrease in the testosterone levels of American males. The decline in T levels was significant—a 17% decline. An earlier Finnish study found similar results for European males.

But high testosterone levels are one of the things that make a man into more of an alpha male. The declining testosterone levels have deprived women from exposure to true alpha males and high testosterone beta males.

The alpha male link to traditional womanhood

Women become more feminine in order to obtain an alpha male or a high-ranking beta. With high testosterone males, women are naturally happy to become wives and mothers. In the absence of alpha males, women seek self-actualization in other ways. They become prey to all sorts of depraved philosophies such as feminism, atheism, and collectivism.

The problem with feminism is that although it promises to make women happy, it is ultimately unfulfilling. This leads feminists into a spiral, always on the lookout for the next thing to feed their ever-growing rage.

Low-ranking betas have tried to fill the gap by becoming white knights. They wear t-shirts that say, “this is what a feminist looks like,” in the hopes that feminists will give them attention. While feminists proclaim that they want all men to be weak pajama boys, the truth is that these wimps disgust them. What they truly crave in their heart is the strong alpha.

Now that men are starting to gain an understanding of their true roles, we can begin reclaiming women who have been suckered into believing vain ideologies.

Who is a candidate for Feminist Conversion Therapy

Not a candidate for conversion

While feminist conversion can be effective, the disease of feminism is so toxic that after a certain point the host body becomes unsalvageable.

Many of the deleterious effects of feminism can be reversed. Unnaturally colored hair, asymmetrical haircuts, ironic glasses, ugly fashion, and even moderate weight gain can be treated by a make over, a Paleolithic diet, and regular time at the gym.

Other feminist-inflicted damage is more permanent. Regrettable tattoos and piercings will mark a reformed feminist for eternity, yet they don’t pose an insurmountable barrier to transitioning back to femininity.

However, any significant time spent living the feminist lifestyle can result in irreversible changes to the feminist’s body and brain, rendering her unable to transition back to normalcy.

The first of these changes is excessive weight gain. While some feminists are able to retain a human-like form after adopting the lifestyle, others are drawn to consume copious amounts of food until they have a gravitational pull that rivals that of a small planet. For these feminists, the hope of transition is vanishingly small.

The bodily changes brought on by feminism pale in comparison to the adverse effects upon the feminist’s brain. These changes may induce the feminist to experience strange obsessions and fantasies involving Roosh V.

Feminism also damages a woman’s reasoning faculty. Instead of using logic, everything is reduced to snark. The feminist loses the ability to speak in a normal language without resorting to buzzwords and phrases such as “fight patriarchy,” “you’re triggering me,” “cisgender,” “white male privilege,” and “Hillary 2016.”

Feminism also sexualizes everything. The most innocent comment can be taken as a rape threat. Remember, for a feminist, all sex—even consensual sex—is rape.

Professional opinion is unanimous on this point: Once the feminist has reached this stage, there is virtually no chance of recovery.

Rules for when to approach

Approach

The guidelines above are helpful, but if you are thinking of reclaiming a feminist, you should first study the following examples so that you will be able to avoid approaching unsalvageable feminists.

Comment: No comment. Do not approach.

Comment: Naturally colored hair. No sign of tattoos or odd piercings. No sign of anger. But, she is Hillary's right hand person and married to man who Donald Trump called "a sick pervert" and a "whack job." Do not approach.

Comment: Several things going on here. Of course there is the oddly colored hair, but the bigger giveaway is the mattress. Avoid any feminist who is carrying a “rape mattress.” Do not approach.

Comment: Long in the tooth but still attractive actress. Strong feminist viewpoints. Married to a billionaire. Do not approach. Watch From Dusk Till Dawn instead.

Comment: Blue hair, but attractive and no signs of anger or mental illness. If this not a Kardashian-Jenner, approach.

Comment: Dude. Do not approach.

How does conversion work?

The Alpha in his natural habitat

In case any feminists are reading this, I am not referring to sex with feminists. Converting a feminist also does not involve much argument. It is the mere presence of the alpha that awakens deep-seated desires within the heart of the feminist. If the feminist senses that she has any hope of winning over the alpha, she will adjust her behavior. Any feminist beliefs that she strongly holds will melt away when the possibility of bliss with a normal man is presented.

Any arguments that the feminist raises should be nonchalantly swatted down by the alpha. All objections should be dismissed brusquely. The alpha should not be concerned with hurting the feminist's feelings—she wants the alpha to destroy the feminist façade that keeps her from being a complete woman.

Here is an example of what I mean:

Feminist: Kiran Gandhi, the Harvard MBA who ran the London marathon without a tampon, bleeding all over herself, is so brave in fighting cisgender white patriarchy. She eloquently raises the plight of women who suffer from monthly cramping! Hillary 2016! Stop triggering me!

Alpha: She is a disgusting, unoriginal fame whore who could not even come up with a worthwhile cause to protest.

Feminist: [makes soft cooing sounds]

The key is to be charming. You can even smile as you dismiss her arguments. But do not allow yourself to get angry. If you lose your temper, you have lost.

If you need further example, watch how Donald Trump charms this journalist. Yes, I realize that this journalist is a man, but he is a progressive feminist man—virtually the same as a female feminist.

Maintaining alpha status

Converting feminists is not a task for the faint of heart. It involves very real danger, including fake rape accusations and assaults by unhinged purple-haired harpies. Worst of all, a man engaged in this work will have to look upon horrific things that no sentient being should be forced to witness.

For this reason, all men involved in conversion therapy should maintain their alpha status.

Men who seek to convert feminists should also keep their mind functioning properly so as to better be able to disregard feminist “logic.” The best way of doing this is through a regimen of reading high quality works including the essays of Quintus Curtius, the Bible, especially the Old Testament, and Beowulf.

Conclusion

By snatching women from the fires of feminism we are doing a good work, not just for the women involved, but also for Western civilization. The antifeminist warrior is able to fall asleep easily knowing that he has made the world a better place.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why Don't Feminists Call Kate Upton A Misogynist?

Michael Sebastian

Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How The Toronto Media Is Enabling Lies Aimed At Roosh's World Tour

August 13, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

With his Toronto lecture looming this weekend, the local media has rabidly denounced ROK publisher Roosh Valizadeh in dozens of television news stories, radio excerpts and print articles. His defiant Montreal speech, as you know, was met with unprecedented fury from SJWs, before, during and after the event.

The misinformation and defamatory statements spread by Toronto media outlets are shaping up to be even more ad hominem, nasty, and violence-condoning than anything in Quebec.

As covered meticulously on ROK so far, feminists have resorted to false rape threat allegations, physical threats ([1] [2] plus more) and other intimidation tactics to try and shut down, futilely, Roosh's right to free speech. The Toronto media will continue to assist them, and here are three of the most egregious examples of "journalistic" bias against him in recent days.

"Psychology" 101 with "tabloid psychologist" Dr. Oren Amitay

Being a professional media consultant in addition to practicing psychology, Oren Amitay benefits from quick, unconsidered "appraisals" of people. It is a serious conflict of interest.

In 2012, Roosh wrote an article on his personal website entitled "14 Things You Didn't Know About Roosh". In it, he revealed things such as having schoolyard fights he lost and that most of his life is boring. With seemingly all the data of a 20-year field study involving ten Nobel laureates, City News took this information to Dr. Oren Amitay, who proceeded to almost psychoanalyze him (despite being a psychologist) based on several lines of Roosh's writing at a time.

In relation to having had schoolyard fights, Amitay opines that "this is someone that," as if juvenile Roosh from two to three decades ago can somehow be conflated with the 36-year-old Roosh of today. Considering that probably a third to over half of all children have lost several or more schoolyard "fights" (usually just a few punches involving scratches and tears), it is startling that Dr. Amitay isn't called upon every day to render a new quasi-diagnosis for anyone disliked by SJWs.

I am also surprised that this "professional" didn't equate one-year-old Roosh soiling his diapers with a probable interest in scatology in 2015. That's honestly how far back and how desperately Amitay is trying to dig to promote himself.

What's interesting about Oren Amitay is that he's a registered psychologist and a media consultant. Instead of a considered, clinical setting in which to ascribe concepts, motives and characteristics to people, Amitay has made these pronouncements without ever having met Roosh, "safeguarding" himself by inserting occasional words and phrases such as "possibility" and "if this is true."

In fact, as a media consultant, it is entirely in Amitay's interest to have quick, less than three minute interviews with his name attached so he can "diagnose" strangers, which seems more like a pickup artist cold reading a girl in a bar than anything resembling a scientific process. There's a reason why psychologists aren't usually media consultants.

Glenn Pelletier and the white knight rat race

Super white knight Glenn Pelletier gave Shannon Dea an unmitigated platform to defame and misrepresent Roosh, plus allowed her to claim without contestation that "all the statistics" in society favor men.

Filling in on The Eric Drozd Show, Glenn Pelletier interviewed Shannon Dea, Director of Women's Studies at the University of Waterloo. Amidst a fusillade of explicit and implicit bogus accusations that Roosh glorifies violence against women, Dea spouted the usual feminist fanfare to Pelletier, namely that "all the statistics" favor men. She conveniently forgot, of course, that men represent the majority of both homicide victims and non-fatal assault victims, commit suicide at four times the rate of women, and get paid less in their 20s now than women of the same age.

A recurring theme of the vitriol against Roosh has been the lustful willingness of submissive men to chase after and vilify Roosh for women, from the pack of males backing up Jessica Lelievre's violent mob "leadership" to the manginas supporting "rape culture" protests. Pelletier fulfilled this obligation on Wednesday, gleefully lapping up the "good doggy" patting of Dea for "supporting women."\

He didn't mention that the mob that attacked, tried to attack again, and then falsely imprisoned Roosh and his companions after his lecture, or bring up any of the litany of violent threats against him throughout Twitter and other mediums.

Only regurgitating Roosh's reasons not to date American women (without trying to counter them) and flogging their already dead horse, his February 2015 article, Pelletier and Dea were unable to paint any picture of the wider philosophy Roosh has created: self-improvement, male self-respect and challenging the cultural status quo.

If pressed to say what they know about Roosh, Pelletier's audience would be clutching at straws, and very mangled ones at that.

Toronto's CTV News falsely claimed SJWs forced the cancellation of the Montreal lecture

No fact-checking, no impartiality, no balance.

Deprived of the attention they crave, SJW Twitter fiends went into overdrive over the weekend and afterwards, claiming that the Montreal event never took place (then what's this?). Abandoning any semblance of journalistic rigor, CTV News took these bizarre feminist divinations at face value and falsely claimed that Roosh was forced to cancel his lecture.

Not only has the media in Montreal and Toronto largely sided with SJWs, they have resorted to using them as supposedly impartial sources of information and gospel truth. After all, as newsmen and women, what's the point of presenting a balanced and truthful account of an escalating controversy if you thoroughly despise the person you're reporting about?

Condoning hate

With the Toronto economy struggling, Mayor John Tory has welcomed any opportunity to distract attention away from the pressing municipal problems he should be solving. He is the Mayor of Toronto, not the police or the federal or provincial government.

The problem is that by being continually silent about the mob mentality of SJWs, aside from finding it humorous, and the flurry of threats directed at Roosh over weeks, Toronto media outlets, like their Montreal counterparts, are giving carte blanche to the anti-social, dangerous and militantly fascistic behavior of feminists.

The political climate in Canda is so antithetical to his safety that Roosh has been forced to find six venues for Toronto (as of writing) and hire bodyguards. This underscores the ridiculous low to which Canadian free speech, freedom of expression, and political dialogues have fallen.

Should anything happen to Roosh, we can lay much of the blame on the Montreal and now Toronto media.

Read More: Feminist Jessica Lelièvre Assaults Roosh V On Street And Brags About It On Social Media

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Bisexual Attention Seeker Amber Heard Thinks She's Above The Law

August 13, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Three months ago, Johnny Depp and his wife Amber Heard, an actress more known for promoting her bisexuality than the quality of her films, brought their dogs illegally into Australia, without the requisite paperwork.

Like any sensible First World country, Australia tries to control the importation of animals to prevent disease and other risks. After the canines' presence was inadvertently publicized on social media, the celebrity owners were given 48 hours to remove the animals or they would be euthanized.

The omission set off a gargantuan scandal and many rushed to ridicule the Australian government's "heavy-handed" response (it's actually standard procedure, similar to destroying abandoned luggage). Amber Heard spectacularly threatened to boycott Australia because government officials were looking for "15 minutes of fame" (if so, maybe like her bisexuality marketing?).

She nonetheless came back to Queensland, where Depp is filming another Pirates of the Caribbean film, and was charged by Australian authorities with the unauthorized importation of animals and making a false declaration.

Do as I say, not as I do

Is this the only legal equality Amber Heard actually believes in?

Fundamentally, Heard's sexuality is her business. And if she wants gay rights, you would expect her to logically support gay marriage. What I find amusing about her "advocacy," though, is the way that it dovetails nicely with her career.

There's no better way to market yourself as your working life starts to really take off than revealing you bed other women and support gay rights. If you haven't already noticed as well, celebrities invariably support those causes that are a) widely popular, or b) won't lose them financial opportunities.

Fast forward a little while and here we have Heard lambasting the Australian government for having the audacity to investigate why dogs entered Australia without the proper permits. It appears that equality only goes so far with Amber Heard. In the context of being a celebrity who profits from every second of attention, she advocated openly and vociferously for gay marriage equality. Yet as soon as the spotlight of responsibility is turned on her, she thinks she and her entourage are above the rules that govern everyone else.

Can you, for instance, imagine yourself arguing with the TSA in New York or Los Angeles about why two canines weren't declared and the paperwork was falsified?

Equality under the law includes being investigated like everyone else

Funnily enough, Heard accused the Australian Agriculture Minister of attention seeking!

I will not prejudge whether Heard is guilty or not of smuggling in the dogs and falsifying papers. Who is to blame is for a court to decide. But Heard's rebuke of the Australian government speaks volumes about her grandiose sense of entitlement. People are accused of crimes, investigated because of that accusation and taken through the legal system to test the evidence all the time. How is Heard so special that she deserves avoiding the treatment the rest of us would face?

Saying that someone thinks they are above the law and not assuming their guilt aren't mutually exclusive concepts. It's sadly common amongst the elite that they pontificate a standard for all in one area and afterwards make their own personal standard in another.

When, using just one example, Reese Witherspoon's husband was pulled over on suspicion of drink driving, she drunkenly asked and perhaps threatened the officer: "Don't you know who I am?"

Celebrityhood is unabashedly replete with case studies of those who pursue all manner of popular causes (feminism, gay rights, socialism) and then are exposed for elevating themselves ahead of the pack. Heard is just one of the more recent demonstrations of this "I'm above you" culture.

Selectivity is the rule of the game

[image]

Life gets a bit melancholic when you're held to the same standards as everyone else.

What is most disturbing about the Amber Heard incident is the way in which legions of fans (or simply dog lovers) rushed to sign petitions to save her and Depp's dogs. Forgetting the 500 dogs who will be euthanized by animal control in their own city this month, these keyboard commandos came to save the day. It is a tragic sign of our times that large numbers of people respond to these celebrities as if they are indeed above the law.

SJWs and many celebrities have the distinct ability to project pseudo-morality that is believed. In the meantime, they behave, as far as they can, without the restrictions they try to impose on or preach to others.

Be wary of the Amber Heards of the world. They come in many non-famous shades, too. The girl who says she wants a respectful, two-way relationship with you, but tries to coax out whatever she can financially, emotionally or regarding your time. The co-worker who rants about feminism and “mansplaining” while “asserting herself” in the bitchiest way possible. The forms are numerous.

As for now, let’s hope Amber Heard starts to feel the equality she’s always rallying for… in a courtroom.

Read More: Is Bruce Jenner Having A Sex Change Because Females In His Family Get More Attention?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Are Toronto Mayor John Tory And Councilman Norm Kelly Promoting The Violation Of Canadian Law?

August 14, 2015 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

By now, most of you are aware of the events that took place in Montreal over the weekend. If not, take a quick look here and here. As Roosh moves on to Toronto this coming weekend, members of the governing body of Toronto have already taken to social media outlets—specifically Twitter—to voice not only their opinions on Roosh and his upcoming lecture but also encourage that certain actions take place impeding the lecture.

Specifically, Mayor John Tory and City Councilman Norm Kelly have disseminated tweets in furtherance of the above. Being the lawyer that I am, the aspect involving free speech and civil rights intrigued me. Do the tweets describe below violate the laws of the very city, province, and country these public officials represent?

What about Canada's own constitution? I thought there was no better way to end my hiatus here at Return of Kings than to take a quick look and see what I could formulate as a response to my own curiosity.

Toronto Civil Servicemen

Mayor John Tory

On August 10th, Toronto Mayor John Tory blasted a series of tweets calling for any venue willing to host Roosh to cancel their offers, stating that Roosh is not welcome in Toronto and without explanation deeming Roosh's lecture a "hate speech" and claiming that Roosh promotes violence against women.

City Councilman Norm Kelly

Also on August 10th, Toronto Councilman Norm Kelly tweeted that Roosh and his views are not welcome in Toronto, and also urged all venues in Toronto to deny Roosh the opportunity to use their space.

Hate Speech?

Before we go into my commentary on why I think Tory and Kelly, as public officials, are violating various human rights codes in effect in Canada, I want to quickly touch upon the idea that Roosh will be giving, or ever has given, any derivative of what Tory so callously deems "hate speech" or violence against women.

Initially, how do Tory and Kelly know that the contents of Roosh's lecture fall within the purview of "hate speech?" Have they attended a previous lecture? Do they have a transcript of one? Of course not. Yet they are quick to deem it hate speech without a scintilla of evidence substantiating their claim.

In fact, if you look at the lecture's website there is no indication of anything remotely resembling hatred. Rather:

> "The State Of Man" is a 40-minute speech that carefully examines the existence of modern man. It deconstructs the problems men face today while giving practical solutions for helping them improve their intimate relationships with women and increase their overall enjoyment with life.
>
> …
>
> The speech is intended for men who are concerned with the decline of modern culture and are at the same time eager to work at improving their lives. It will give men actionable steps for becoming a better man and gaining the benefits in life that they desire.

Perhaps however, Tory and Kelly are referring to past incidences that may somehow qualify Roosh as one who has previously engaged in hate speech. Putting aside the legality of preventing someone from speaking in the future based on a past occurrence, again where can anyone point to such content existing?

People are quick to call Roosh a rapist. I challenge generally any reader of this article and specifically Mayor Tory and Councilman Kelly to provide one instance of a mere allegation of rape against Roosh, much less a charge or conviction. None exist. Statistically speaking, given Roosh has slept with his share of women in his lifetime you would assume as a "rapist" one such allegation would arise. Yet, nothing.

Then there is this blog post on rape which is every self-proclaimed social justice warrior's piece of undeniable evidence that Roosh promotes violence, vis a vis rape, against women.

Yet even a cursory reading of the actual post itself, an act which sadly has become a rare commodity in our ADD ridden, clickbait world today, shows no such intent is meant in this thought exercise and satirical post (for example, just read the third paragraph). Not to mention Roosh himself has explained the post hardly promotes violence against women several times himself, most recently with Gavin McInnes.

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedom

At the outset of the Constitution we have the above-titled section regarding rights and freedoms. Several sections of this part seem relevant to the events surrounding Roosh's lecture. Under "Fundamental Freedoms" the Constitution states that "everyone" has the following freedoms:

- "of thought, belief, opinion and expression" (Part I, Paragraph 2, subsection (b))
- "of peaceful assembly" (Part I, Paragraph 2, subsection (c))
- "of association" (Part I, Paragraph 2, subsection (d))

While I am not a Canadian attorney nor do I claim to have any experience interpreting the Constitution of our apparently thin-skinned neighbor to the north, I do know how to read a statute. First, I'm pretty sure Roosh falls under the protected group here labeled "everyone." So the fact that he is not a citizen of Canada has no bearing.

Ontario Human Rights Code And Toronto Policy

Aside from the Constitution, Ontario has its own Human Rights Code. In Part I, it states that > Every person has a right to equal treatment with respect to services, goods and facilities, without discrimination because of race, ancestry, place of origin, colour, ethnic origin, citizenship, creed, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity, gender expression, age, marital status, family status or disability.

Creed can be defined as an "idea or set of beliefs that guides the actions of a person or group." An easy argument can be made that neo-masculinity and whatever other ideas are discussed in Roosh's lecture classify as a creed, and therefore, entitled to equal rights.

On a city level, Toronto has a Human Rights and Anti-Harassment/Discrimination Policy. In its Policy Statement, Paragraph 1.0, we find that:

> The City condemns harassment, denigration, discriminatory actions and the promotion of hatred. The City of Toronto will not tolerate, ignore, or condone discrimination or harassment and is committed to promoting respectful conduct, tolerance and diversity at all times.

Discrimination is defined in Paragraph 4.3:

> Discrimination is any practice or behaviour, whether intentional or not, which has a negative impact on an individual or group because of membership in a group protected in the Ontario Human Rights Code…

As we see above, "creed" is protected under the Human Rights Code and thus, any behavior having a negative impact on one's creed is prohibited.

Tweets vs. Law

So now we turn to the tweets themselves and how they fit into the above-cited laws. Roosh is entitled to freedom of thought, belief, opinion, and expression. To me, this means whatever his views may be, he is entitled to have them per the Constitution.

Moreover, creed is protected under the Ontario Human Rights Code. Accordingly, I fail to see how Councilman Kelly can specifically state that "his views are not welcome in Toronto."

Mayor John Tory also arguably promotes the violation of this subsection by tweeting that Roosh's views towards women are contradictory with those of Toronto and thus unacceptable. Whatever these views may be, which Tory does not specify, per this subsection of the Constitution Roosh is still entitled to these thoughts. Solely because Mr. Tory does not agree with them does not make them illegal.

I have a lot of issues with Tory and Kelly, as public figures, calling for action to deny Roosh the ability to host his lecture. While I understand the protections come in when state actors are involved, here the intertangling of public officials complicates things.

Per the Constitution, Roosh is entitled to the freedoms of peaceful assembly and of association. In the most basic terms, he has a guaranteed right to peacefully assemble and associate with whomever he wants, however he wants. Again we have to ask whether the above tweets fly against such a Constitutionally prescribed freedom.

Mayor John Tory "calls" for the venues potentially hosting Roosh's lecture to cancel on him. He further states that Roosh has no platform for delivering his speech in Toronto. To me, this sounds like a government actor interfering with Roosh's right to assemble or associate with whomever he wants.

Moreover, this will likely (if not already) have a negative impact on Roosh's ability to carry out his lecture, and if we include his ideology as creed which is a protected group, then we have violations of both the Ontario Human Rights Code, as well as an act constituting discrimination under Toronto Policy.

Councilman Norm Kelly "urges" all venues to "deny" Roosh the opportunity to use their space. Again, a government actor interfering with Roosh's fundamental freedom allotted to him by Canada's own constitution.

Kelly's language bothers me a bit more than Tory's, as well given he is expressly stating that one who has different views should be denied an equal opportunity, in this case the use of a venue. This follows the same analysis above with respect to the Ontario Code and Toronto Policy.

Conclusion

Something seems off about public officials calling for action leading to censorship of a harmless speech. I am not a lawyer in Canada. Nor do I hold myself out as an expert in international free speech. But I do know how to interpret a law or two, and in my modest opinion Canada's laws do not support Mayor John Tory or Councilman Norm Kelly's tweets this week.

Please note this is only my interpretation of the law and not meant to be legal advice of any kind whatsoever.*

Read More: How The Toronto Media Is Enabling Lies Aimed At Roosh's World Tour

L.D. Hume
L.D. Hume, formerly known as Law Dogger, is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every so often and he can be found on Twitter as well.

Obese Size 24 Woman Shows That Any Woman Can Be A Model

August 14, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Tess Munster made many headlines at the start of this year for being the first size 24 "model" to be signed to a major agency (whatever that means). Calling herself a "body positivity ambassador" on her website, Munster conveniently forgets that there is nothing positive about otherwise avoidable heart disease, cancer, or other ailments grossly accelerated by obesity. And she additionally ignores how younger generations today and in the immediate future may be the first to predecease their parents in large numbers.

It speaks volumes about the oftentimes dystopian nature of this world that obese people like Tess Munster can proudly proclaim they never felt pressure to lose weight and then be paraded around as some sort of icon for female empowerment and a role model (pardon the pun) for others to follow.

Rather than simply accepting obesity, this actually promotes it as something to be pursued. So your BMI is 32, you're obese but you just don't want to exercise? Well, Tess Munster didn't and she turned out "okay"!

What's more is that Munster preaches "body positivity," refusing to change her body, as she drastically alters her face at the same time. Is it really genuine to say you want to promote good body image by being obese but simultaneously reconfiguring your facial appearance by way of L'Oreal and Photoshop?

These are questions Munster and her tribes of followers and admirers either ignore or dance around.

What if someone didn’t feel pressure to quit drugs or stop large-scale drinking and was presented as a role model?

Mel Gibson has a borderline excuse, alcoholism, for his drinking. So would people glorify his unhealthy decision to keep drinking in large amounts? Unlikely.

I’d like to see an article where an alcoholic is championed as a hero for refusing to quit drinking, including in circumstances where they have some control over their consumption. Of course, I subscribe to the belief that alcoholism is a disease, though a frequently over-diagnosed one (like ADHD in young boys or clinical depression in many adults).

That said, alcoholics are not automatons. They can successfully resist their urges in many instances but choose not to. So can you imagine The Guardian and a host of other newspapers giving airtime to and glorifying a compulsive drinker’s lifestyle?

The situation is starker still for drug users. Though society does somewhat idealize the consumption of drugs (think of the legacy of Bob Marley, even if marijuana is not a hard drug), in no sense would major news outlets implicitly present the consumption of narcotics as a pursuit to be admired with all the fanfare they allocated to Tess Munster’s signing.

Hard drug users (typically) die young, as do many morbidly obese people, so what is the fundamental difference? The retort that drugs are illegal, whereas food is not, is hardly a response. Both have calamitous, comparable results in many cases: disease and death.

“I’m body positive about my ‘curvy’ body but I paint 15 layers of makeup on my face every morning”

If this is what non-obese supermodel Tyra Banks looks like without makeup, what would Tess Munster look like? And how can she be genuinely “body positive” if she proudly flaunts her figure but obscures her REAL face with cosmetics?

The klaxon of “body positive” amongst feminists and overweight or obese women reeks of hypocrisy. Whilst they parade the calorie-drowned female form as “beautiful” and in no need of changing, they simultaneously avert their eyes to the question of why these women douse themselves in so much cosmetics that their faces are substantially changed.

All this does is keep one half “real” (if you can call an entire body half of someone’s appearance) and change the other half to the point where it is decidedly unreal and nothing but a fantasy.

Body positivists, a term I do not think we should even be using (body denialists is better), want to have their cake and eat it, too. They will decry the misogynistic social pressures of women to conform to a particular body type but gleefully reinforce many of those pressures by plastering themselves with as much makeup as you would need paint to cover a new house, inside and out.

People may feel that I am against makeup. Far from it. The point is to identify how feminists and others hypocritically pillory expectations on women that they engage in perpetually themselves.

Delusions, delusions, delusions…

This is not Tess' real face. It's L'Oreal's.

This piece is about common sense, not fat-shaming. On two counts, the promotion of obesity (not curviness!) and the irony of body positivity combined with the illusion of makeup, Tess Munster and her supporters have failed abysmally. In the midst of a truly shocking obesity crisis, the last thing society needs is the belief that obesity is somehow a healthy lifestyle.

Those who are overweight, especially the obese, do need help to change the course of their health. Denial, however, should not be considered as part of any strategy to combat this epidemic.

Read More: Dancing With The Obese In Australia

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Matthew E. Duffy Urges The Making Of Criminal False Allegations To “Swat” Roosh

August 15, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

On Friday, Return of Kings proprietor Roosh revealed that Matthew E. Duffy had incited those planning to attend the “Demonstration against Rape Culture” in Toronto and others to “swat” Roosh and his supporters. Not only is this an egregiously criminal act, faking the need for tactical response teams or otherwise heavily armed police squads, it also risks the public safety (and lives) of broader members of the community. This is aside from just Roosh and his lecture audience.

To boot, Matthew E. Duffy is perfectly content for those in emergency situations, such as seriously injured car wreck victims or people bleeding out on a street from gunshot wounds, to have critical reactions to their plight delayed by made-up calls about a writer’s peaceful lecture to a few men. His incitement reeks of callous indifference, narcissism, and depravity.

In other news, the Montreal address that obsessive compulsive “Twitter activist” Sara Parker-Toulson used to dox Roosh has now, unsurprisingly, been vandalized. She, “Jennifer” and others easily foresaw that such a doxxing would result in potentially serious damage to both property and person.

They took the risk and the fallout should not shock anyone. This is exactly the sort of climate that false rape threat accuser Aurelie Nix, Parker-Toulson and their band of fellow hate mongers, including Jessica Lelièvre, intended to create and have indeed created to disseminate their twisted, extremist message of banning peaceful free speech.

“Jennifer”, Sara Parker-Toulson and those responsible for the doxxing should pay the property owner for the costs of reversing the vandalism.

“Disagree with us? We’ll incite criminal acts and put person and property at risk”

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/632287899858378753

“Ideology at all costs” is what matters for the feminists and other SJWs railing against Roosh. Sure enough, many people disagree with Roosh, have expressed their disagreement vehemently but have castigated the mobs trying to attack and endanger Roosh for their fascism.

We welcome the positive, peaceful discourse that these decent critics of ours bring to the table. Yet the presence of the diehard advocates of mob mentalities and violence is truly worrying. It must be addressed for the safety of everyone.

Politicians like John Tory, Norm Kelly, and Cheri DiNovo are welcome to lambast Roosh’s views and those of his supporters. However, their constant courting of the “SJW vote,” which helps consolidate their own political profile, has gleefully ignored both the unacceptable acts perpetuated against Roosh and those additional acts the mobs want to perform if given the chance.

The same goes for the Toronto and Montreal media. For example, by “verifying” the false rape threat of Aurelie Nix as being true without any evidence (and, in fact, with total evidence to the contrary), outlets have helped fan the flames of SJWs explicitly or implicitly calling for violence and other overtly criminal tactics.

Matthew E. Duffy should be arrested for criminal incitement

[image]

One would hope Matthew E. Duffy is smoking something to help explain why he would criminally incite people to “swat” others and put the community at risk.

Law enforcement should be responding to actual crimes. Matthew E. Duffy is nothing short of a miscreant who wants to misuse police and other resources for sociopathic and malicious, rather than legitimate ends. The failed petition to have Roosh denied entry to Canada shows critics that however much they hate his speech, it is not hate speech.

I do not agree with Marni Soupcoff’s assessment of Roosh and his views, but I commend her for actually believing that a collection of rights held by individuals in communities trump mobs, witch hunts and the violent suppression of divergent publicly expressed opinions.

The dilemma here is that the slew of media and political attacks on Roosh have given the air that, short of murder (and even that implicit prohibition could be misconstrued by the most radical SJWs), pretty much anything can be “morally” undertaken to try and stop him.

Vandalism? Fine. Throwing drinks and assaulting people? Sure. Chasing someone using a mob and false imprisoning him and his companions. Why not. In calling for Roosh to disappear from Canada, public figures and mainstream media have never balanced their ad hominem attacks with any real caution, failing to outline the unacceptability of any violence or incitement.

If you can't be civil, do you really believe in civil society?

[image]
"Hey! Let's try and get someone we don't like killed by swatting them!"

There was a time when the left emphasized the free flow of ideas, regardless of whether particular views were anathema to its members. As much as we at Return of Kings see many leftist beliefs as utterly pernicious to society, we concede that there are a number of liberals who have some semblance of respect for free speech and, importantly, the right for people to be free of harm and threat as a result of their speech.

Such individuals are presently drowned out by the screaming of vociferous mobs, which at the Montreal protest numbered only around 100 people.

We call on John Tory, Norm Kelly, Cheri DiNovo and others to publicly and unreservedly rebuke criminal provocateurs like Matthew E. Duffy. Should injury or physical danger be inflicted on anyone involved in or attending Roosh's lecture in Toronto, let alone members of the community, a large part of the collective SJW responsibility for the incitement and mob violence will have been in their hands.

Read More: All Public Rape Allegations Are False

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Identify The Dark Triad Female

August 15, 2015 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> You see, my poor fellow, the hearts of women and she-cats are abysses that neither men nor toms will ever fathom. – Henry Murger

Neomasculine principles have saved many men by enlightening them about the true nature of women. Depending on their personal level and use of game with prior experiences with women, these men are usually able to sidestep the pitfalls and power games that usually entails gender interaction today.

However with feminism and modern gyno-centric laws, men also have to commonly contend with the rising threat of dark triad women—predatory women who game men ruthlessly for their own goals without any remorse or conscience, even if it may result in the destruction of men.

Understanding the rise of the Dark Triad in today's societies

The dark triad is a group of three personality traits: Narcissism, Machiavellianism and Psychopathy. The term "dark" implies that these traits have malevolent qualities, and have been associated with a callous-manipulative interpersonal style, to "use people for personal advantage." They grant high social status, tight control over interpersonal social dynamics, and elicit intense sexual attraction.

Scientifically, women are attracted to dark triad men – usually because they are adept at projecting high status and authority to women, and seem to be better at exuding physical appeal. But with the masculinization of modern women, these traits have also become synonymous with modern female behavior.

Dark triad women: their types and their game

Basically there are two types of the "Lucifer's daughter": virginal, and non-virginal. Both types aim for power and leverage over men: the non-virgin type primarily uses guile and sex to obtain her control, while the virginal type uses her virginity, her pseudo-femininity, and the promise of sex to subvert men. Countering both requires solid game.

The non-virginal type (the more formidable one) combines the guile of her virginal sister with irresistible sexual depravity – as she stops at nothing to achieve her aims. Often beginning as a virginal type in her teens, she "upgrades" her traits through the psychologically hardening ride on the cock-carousel which accentuates her psychopathy and manipulative skills. However, careful observation and her past promiscuity can alert men about her.

The virginal type (similar to a cock-tease, but with malice) is no rookie at gaming men either, for she learns her game from observing the game of her sexually "upgraded" sisters. Usually young, “conservative”, occasionally “religious” or of high status, her game on men is basically an exemplification of Law 20 from The 48 Laws Of Power:

> DO NOT COMMIT TO ANYONE
>
> It is the fool who always rushes to take sides. Do not commit to any side or cause but yourself: By maintaining your independence, you become the master of others playing people against one another; making them pursue you.

Furthermore, her game combines:

- Law 5 – So much depends on reputation-guard it with your life : Her hymen (which she guards fervently) is the cornerstone of her power over (idealizing) men
- Law 32 – Play to people’s fantasies: She manufactures romantic fantasies in men’s minds
- Law 34 – Be royal in your own fashion, act like a king to be treated like one: How she (superficially) carries herself will often determine how she would be treated: In the long run, appearing vulgar or common will make people (and men) disrespect her
- Law 41: Work on the hearts and minds of others – Using her show of superficial “civility”, and pseudo-submissiveness , she endears herself to unsuspecting men who would function as her loyal pawns

This type knows that by allowing men to sexually possess her, she’d lose “respect” and leverage over them. By not committing her affections and withholding sex, she gains power from male attention and frustrated desire, as they only try harder to win her over, unable to leave her orbit but never getting any closer to her.

Playing the virgin queen, she gives men hope of owning her undefiled pussy someday, but never delivers on the satisfaction. When she finally “sexually” upgrades her game later to the non-virginal version, her manipulative skills are irresistible for men to handle (except for a man with solid game).

This type is more likely to play the “victim card” to escape culpability or malign and subvert a man, for she knows that others would usually fall for and believe her impeccable ruse of chaste femininity readily. Her game doesn’t hurt a man sexually who has game and options – but sexually thirsty men with no game nor red pill knowledge to identify her usually fall prey.

In “traditional” societies untouched by modern permissiveness, the chances of encountering both types are almost equal – as non-virginal types there are more likely to pose as chaste. And with increasing influx of women in the workforce today, it’s common to encounter such women there too.

The Dark Triad office female

These women can represent a greater threat than men when it comes to blindsiding men professionally – for they are increasingly not averse to flirting to distract and neutralize their male competition at work, but can also be willing to use their sexuality to propel their professional climb to the top.

The simplest way to analyze a woman’s character and intentions at work is to observe what she actually does, and not simply believe what she says or pretends to act as. However, this wisdom has been often discarded repeatedly by men either due to feminist social conditioning, or being blinded by the appeal of such women, or sexual thirst.

There are some signs which can hint of a female dark triad professional rival who may try to potentially blindside you in the future:

1.Your professional competence suddenly attracts or repels her to you inexplicably. Either she perceives you as a threat, or views you enviously as competition – which must be neutralized effectively through “love” or a plot later.

2.She tries to get you to open up – while randomly revealing little information about herself. She’s trying to probe and document information which she can use to malign your reputation later.

3. She has a history of screwing up men’s lives – personally or professionally. Either possibility suggests a manipulative, broken, untrustworthy woman worth steering clear of.

4. She has used her body to get where she is at presently. If this is credible info, then know that she could already be controlling her own workplace alliance of men. If this predatory woman is actively interested in you, then she could be planning to add you to her prey list, and if you would resist, she would probably not hesitate to professionally blindside you.

Conclusion

With rising numbers of socially indoctrinated herds of dark triad women, it shouldn’t be surprising to note the exaggerated levels of distrust in men who’ve been scarred by them.

The solution to counter these women is the red pill and game, or acquiring dark triad traits oneself. Ignorance is not an option when dealing with such women—no matter how powerful and resourceful a man might consider himself to be.

Read Next: 11 Ways To Avoid Being Blindsided At Work

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Never Forget To Thank Your Mentors

August 16, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

> If you admire somebody, you should go 'head and tell 'em
> People never get the flowers while they can still smell 'em
> Big Brother, Kanye West

It has been said that there are but only two sureties in life: death and taxes. It is true we will invariably remit some of our income to a government and we all shall have to face our own mortality someday. However, in between growing up and older and before we perish from this earth, we must examine our place in the world and what we have done to ensure we have left it better for those who will inherit it.

Every man—as the brash, self-focused energy of youth matures into the future-oriented patience of middle and older age—finds that living for one's self is never enough; one must endeavor to make the world a better place for others. This realization presents itself in many forms, most commonly falling in love and marrying a woman or dedicating one's professional work to helping the less fortunate.

Those two decisions and a slew of others reflect a man keenly aware that his fate in this world is never his alone—it is inextricably bound up in the lives and well-being of others.

For a lot of men, this desire takes the form of mentorship of boys and younger men. There is quite possibly no greater calling for a man than the time-honored act of the bringing up of young boys into men, an act whose seeming ubiquity is dwarfed only by its staggering importance.

Between the careful ministration of boys, to the demands placed on young men to realize their potential and the stewardship of those lost somewhere in between, there might be no acts of greater import than the education and mentorship of the next generation.

In The Twilight Zone episode "The Changing Of The Guard," features a man, Ellis Fowler, who has dedicated his life to stewardship of young men. A gentle, unassuming man of letters, he has led a long life—a half century, to be exact—as an educator at a preparatory school for boys and young men. His timid bookishness is matched only by his devotion to his pupils.

Suddenly, one pale, wintry afternoon after the close of fall semester, the headmaster of the school informs Ellis that he has been relieved of his duties as a professor and must retire. As he slouches into his chair, he is rather indifferently informed that he has grown too old to relate to the youth of the day. A "changing of the guard" must happen.

Ellis retreats to his house, where he is overcome with melancholic nostalgia. Painfully aware of his advanced age and uncertain of his legacy in the world, he convinces himself that he has accomplished nothing in his long life. He ruefully proclaims, "I gave them nothing at all."

He taught no men the beauty of prose, the love of knowledge nor the values of honor, decency or compassion. Terrified and despondent over the seeming uselessness of his life, he decides to end it all.

The aging former professor takes his pistol, heads to a statue of Horace Mann on campus and resolves to kill himself. As Ellis stands in the snow next to the bust of Mann in the darkest of night, he can hear the strange chiming of a school bell and is drawn back to his classroom. Befuddled, he takes a seat in his chair and notices that his classroom is filled with the quiet, reverential ghosts of students past.

One by one, they approach the professor, informing him of their class and when and why they had died. They recite to him choice quotes from poems and short stories he told them, telling them how the beauty of prose apprised them of values like honor and courage.

They all impress upon Ellis that without his tutelage and his love of literature, they would not have become the men they became and died as.

Overcome with grateful tears and wondrous relief, Ellis returns home a complete man. He is now able to peacefully retire, his heart and mind full with the satisfaction that one can only feel when one's life project has reached completion. The changing of the guard, as it were, will happen and Ellis wouldn't have it any other way. To wit, Serling's closing narration:

Professor Ellis Fowler, teacher, who discovered rather belatedly something of his own value. A very small scholastic lesson, from the campus of the Twilight Zone.

No man achieved anything of importance in life without the aid of other men. Whether the accomplishment is mundane but profound like maturing as a man or as weighty and specific as, say, becoming a jurist on the Supreme Court, every man is helped along the way by other men.

What men often forget is to remember, recognize and edify those who have given to them. Lost amongst the shuffle of growing up, career accomplishments, and even becoming a mentor themselves, men forget to credit their own mentors. It is a terrible mistake and a grave disservice to those who have so helped a man. A man should beware the ungrateful and be wary of becoming ungrateful himself.

In the aforementioned episode, Ellis Fowler's psyche is in crisis because he felt—for a time, at least—his efforts as a mentor were in vain. While teachers do often have the burden of never knowing exactly how their wards turn out, they still want to feel that their ministrations have helped inculcate positive values like faith, love of learning and courage.

Ellis' soul is in turmoil precisely because for him to feel like his life was, in fact, purposeful, he needed to have changed the lives of his charges for the better.

At his darkest hour, Ellis had the epiphany that he did change many young men's lives for the better. His deceased students explained to him in great detail the profound effect of his stewardship. His existential terror over a life lived for naught is extinguished in but a series of grateful acts from beyond the grave.

Situations like Ellis' could be avoided if men were simply more mindful of the gifts they have been given in life and from whom they have received them. It is extraordinarily easy to simply take and never give, to ask and never thank and to take for granted the contributions of those who have shaped you into the man you are today.

How many Ellis Fowler's are in your life? Think of the all the men who have invariably affected your life for the better, all the Ellis Fowlers who cleared the brush from the path, laid down bricks so that you might walk ahead and enjoy life. Do you acknowledge what they have done for you?

Never forget to thank your mentors. Whether it is a simple note scrawled at home for your father or buying a bottle of brandy for an old friend to remind him you haven't forgotten his support, always remember to honor those who have helped pave the way for you.

Real mentors are as few as time is short in this crazy world. They deserve to know when they have made the world a better place. As in the case of Ellis Fowler, you might just save a life. Who knows, it might even be your own someday.

Read More: We Must Not Deny The Importance Of Fatherhood

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

How Social Justice Warriors Ruined Australian Football

August 16, 2015 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

For many years, nothing epitomised Australian masculine culture more than Australian football. Hardy men engaged in rugged physical combat, cheered on by thousands of beer-drinking fans, revelling in the blows, the matehood, and the camaraderie.

Women also attended games, of course, but were very much in the background. This was a display of masculinity, and men quite rightly took centre stage.

The beginning of the decline

Things have definitely changed. From the early 2000s, the AFL made a deliberate push to court female fans. Whether they did this for financial reasons or because they felt the ever-increasing pressure of creeping political correctness in Australian society is unclear.

It started with a token female on TV panel discussions.

Then they started commentating live games.

Then they became umpires.

Then they became coaches.

Out went the cheerleaders.

Feminists complained that there was no female AFL, despite women's football only being played by a tiny minority of untalented lesbians with serious gender identity issues.

Numerous outspoken female "experts" who had never actually played the game emerged in the media. Coaches and players started to resemble White House spokesmen, and carefully avoided anything that might be considered offensive. For Australian men used to calling a spade a spade, this made the game feel incredibly sterile.

Why is Australian football doing this to itself?

We've also seen the level of physicality limited (much like the NFL and MLB) so it's more politically correct and sensitive to the growing numbers of mangina and female fans.

Feminism (which most Australian women unfortunately identify with) and political correctness go hand in hand. When you placate feminist women and grant them token positions, you open the door to an endless barrage of left-wing social justice nonsense, as male Australian sports fans are finding out to their great displeasure.

The AFL has become one of the most powerful causes for "progressive" change in Australian society, with social justice activism now almost as much a part of the AFL as the games themselves. Sound ridiculous? The following are already in place or being actively pursued, and receive extensive media commentary where the left-wing agenda is rammed down our throats:

Women's Round

Gay Pride Round

Indigenous Round

Multicultural Round

Behold the consequences of placating SJWs

The changing face of Australian Football… yes, that really is a rainbow of footballs to promote gay pride

We are now seeing the disastrous consequences of disproportionately catering to women and allowing them to exert undue influence over a male-orientated activity. Female crowds are up, but the AFL has alienated its traditional supporter base, with overall attendance declining. The AFL is ignoring real fans to placate minorities by pushing a left-wing political agenda, and the simmering tension finally exploded this year.

The main catalyst has been the divisive behaviour of star player and former Australian of the Year Adam Goodes. Rather than be recognised for his outstanding sporting talent and as a symbol of reconciliation, Goodes has used his position to dig up old wounds and inflame racial tension.

He said Australia Day should be renamed "Invasion Day", and handpicked a 13 year old girl out of the crowd, had her frogmarched out of the stadium by security, and denounced her as the "face of racism" in Australia. Ever since then, the crescendo of boos at games has gotten ever louder as Goodes' war on his own country continued, and Goodes recently left the game altogether to contemplate retirement.

Adam Goodes: great footballer, but a first-rate dickhead – and yes, I would say the same thing if he was white

The social justice warrior crowd, led by Australia's rabid left-wing media, has gone ballistic, citing this as irrefutable evidence of endemic racism in Australia. It's a case of "the enemy of my enemy is my friend," with the "enemy" of course being the heterosexual white male – the majority of AFL supporters.

OK, there might be fans that boo Goodes because they are racist, and that is obviously unacceptable. However, the vast majority boo Goodes because he's a wanker. Seriously, completely unprovoked, the guy did a war dance and threw a fake spear at the crowd – highly inflammatory behaviour – and he is surprised when he gets a reaction? If all fans are so racist, how do SJW's explain the fact that other aboriginals such as Eddie Betts and Cyril Rioli are crowd favourites?

Goodes throws his imaginary spear at the crowd

The AFL is a microcosm of Australia, which has become a seething pit of self-loathing and political correctness. A truly masculine activity like Australian Football was the final frontier for SJWs, who are thrilled that so many people in Australia now seem to hate themselves and play the victim card as much as they do. What the fuck happened?

The media's role

Feminist commentator Susie O'Brien: about as knowledgeable about football as I am about Sex and the City

In Australia, mainstream media gives deranged feminists like Susie O'Brien regular platforms to spout their hatred of all things male on a daily basis. O'Brien even had the gall to try to get long-standing red pill male Sam Newman sacked from the sport he has contributed so much to for daring to deviate from the social justice script.

It's the hypocrisy from the bleeding heart mob which is especially galling. When a male commentator such as Newman passionately implores us to forget politics and focus on the game, he is vilified as a "privileged white male," a "dinosaur" who "must retire."

So much for tolerating people of a different demographic! You don't have to be Australian to recognise the typical left-wing opponent censorship campaign, I'm sure.

For my non-Australian friends, this is Sam Newman. I'm sure it's obvious why feminists are desperate to kick him off the air and out of the game!

For the record, this is what Sam Newman said:

> I am told the unwashed left their grubby little fingerprints over what I said last week and they played the race card … what I said last week had nothing to do with race.
>
> And I notice this week Geelong is going to run out between a mutual banner with the Swans.
>
> Why don't they let the Swans get the first couple of goals just so they feel good about themselves and see if they can give them a lift up and maybe just stop the Cats from getting in the finals?
>
> So then we get to St Kilda who are thinking of having a gay pride game. This is just using the competition again as some political agenda.
>
> Why don't we have a boat people day next week or what about we have a transgender round and we will get Caitlin Jenner to sing at the grand final?
>
> I am a white, Anglo Saxon, male, Protestant, heterosexual and I am waiting for my day to come, and when it does I will be first in line to say show stupid is this?

> Couldn't we just leave the game to try and get hold of itself and I would suggest St Kilda and Geelong and the Swans worry about a game plan that might get them into the finals without worrying about every other political cause on earth.

As a former player and media commentator for many years, Newman absolutely has earned the right to speak to a large audience on this issue, and he is utterly correct. He's a red pill guy not afraid to speak his mind, something that is becoming increasingly rare Down Under, and he's contributed far more to football than some talentless feminist hack like Susie O'Brien ever could.

However, now everybody in Australia is talking about sexism, racism and homophobia in football – anything but the actual game itself! The grossly overrepresented left-wing view in sports has eerie parallels with our political sphere.

Nothing to see here…

Nobody in the left-wing media is talking about the economy, our national debt, cost of living, unemployment, crime, the family breakdown and other serious issues which affect a great percentage of the population. Instead it is all about gay marriage, "refugees" (aka illegal immigrants), imagined sexism and other fringe issues that in reality affect only a tiny minority.

The Goodes saga and the AFL's constant pandering to social justice warriors reflect the pathetic direction Australia has taken over the past decade or so. Let the minority dictate the agenda. Shut down all criticism. You're just booing him because you're racist; you're only criticising me because you are sexist. Heck, even our last Prime Minister, the most powerful person in the country, tried to play the victim card.

I used to love AFL football, but I'm sick of the constant bombardment of left-wing politics. These days I enjoy my Australian football at the grass roots level only, watching the Victorian Amateur Football Association. I no longer want to watch the game played at the highest level.

I miss the sport, but because Australian men no longer have mainstream masculine activities untainted by PC feminism, it's a price I'm prepared to pay.

Read More: Social Justice Warriors' Updated Version Of The Seven Deadly Sins

Mark Webster
Mark Webster is an old school Australian who is dismayed by political correctness, the state of the modern woman and the decline of his once beautiful country. He believes the collapse of the family unit is directly attributable to feminism and cultural Marxism.

We Won The Battle Of Toronto

August 17, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We won in Montreal on August 8 and we won again in Toronto on August 15. The speech was successfully held in the Toronto area of Mississauga to 56 men.

I hired two bodyguards in Toronto

Here’s a report from a man who attended. I’ll share more in the days to come.

Don’t Miss: How Roosh V Won The Battle Of Montreal

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Haley Yael Firkser Is Another Champagne Socialist Who Ignores Her Own Privilege

August 17, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Haley Yael Firkser, one of the chief instigators of the ongoing anti-Roosh Canadian witch hunt, is another peculiar case of a privileged feminist who calls for the destruction of "male privilege." Throughout her attention-seeking activism, however, she has been very quiet about the considerable financial and employment privilege she enjoys, courtesy of her family's thriving business.

It is convenient for her (and highly amusing for us here at ROK) that the current patriarch of her family inherited and then greatly expanded the Home Hardware chain in Toronto.

Like Jessica Lelièvre, Firkser believes the patriarchy institutionalizes the position of men over women. But how many women AND men have a father who can appoint them as the "Business Development Director" of one of the wings of their successful enterprise, despite their child having a liberal arts-style Bachelor's Degree in Communication Studies (with a Minor in Judaic Studies)?

Firkser has more privilege than 99.5% of men, so how can she make a side career out of being outraged at "patriarchy"? Just as I said about Lelièvre, patriarchal capitalist modes of production have served Firkser's interests very, very well.

"My dad owns the Home Hardware chain and I'm a Business Development Director because of that, but the patriarchy and male privilege oppress me!"

An interesting aspect of Firkser's activism is her Jewish ethnicity. Even as far back as 25 years ago, it was recognized that Canadian Jews were four times more likely to earn above $75,000 annually than the rest of the population. In America, a similar jurisdiction to Canada, Jed Rubenfeld and Amy Chua recently outlined in The Triple Package how American Jewish households have roughly twice the median household income compared to Gentiles.

If we want to have a discussion about male privilege and patriarchy, we need to broaden our outlook. Right now, it perfectly suits Firkser and others to maintain a "privilege discourse" based on crude gender politics. It avoids damaging questions about her personal family privilege in particular.

Contrast this with Roosh, whose background is dual Iranian-Armenian. It beggars belief that Firkser, a Jew, has waited until now to go after so-called "misogynists" in such a public fashion, and the one she finally goes after comes from a Middle Eastern Shia Muslim family. Talk about picking your targets!

Because Roosh does not practice his ancestral Islam in a devout sense, Firkser can preach her Islamophobic intolerance in a publicly acceptable fashion. The Return of Kings proprietor's beliefs are entirely analogous to those of hundreds of millions of traditionally-minded Muslims around the world, including hundreds of thousands in Canada. By attacking Roosh's heartfelt beliefs, she is cowardly attacking theirs.

Privilege is multidimensional and Haley Yael Firkser has a lot of it

“Does my privilege look big in these glasses?”

Concordia-educated Firkser has had many more opportunities than the average Canadian or American male. From her business-owning grandfather and father, who slaved away for years to build the business that enabled her to get her plum post-graduation job, to her Jewishness, Firkser’s critique of patriarchy is beyond hypocritical. It is ironic that the system she wants to dismantle has effectively put her in the top one or two percent of the population in her early twenties.

Like many Asian-American and Indian-American families, the Jewish emphasis on education, particularly for one’s children, does, in my opinion, provide a generally superior means of social advancement and continued prosperity. Well, at least compared to the relative ham-fistedness of most Gentile households in trying to get their children to be ambitious and work hard.

That said, even if the progeny of these minority families work more diligently and pursue more academic opportunities, they’ve had the privilege of parental guidance and role models. It’s not as if they’ve had to work for that template themselves. It’s been instilled in them.

I myself do not claim to be Jewish. I am a Gentile but one with sizeable Jewish ancestry. Some of the surnames appearing in my family true, and there are a few, are as Jewish as Rosenfeld and Silverberg, possessed by rabbis, Holocaust victims and modern-day, not so well known Israeli musicians.

Consistent religious intermarriage meant that I was born dual Protestant-Catholic. Statistically-speaking, despite the good fortune of my middle-class upbringing, my position would in all likelihood have been better still if I had been born into a Jewish family in America, Canada, Australia or Britain. These are realities that Firkser chooses to ignore.

She thinks “Would you bang?” threads should be criminalized

“As Business Development Director, I always look ahead, but also to the side. Yeah, a side career rallying against the big bad patriarchy would be great.”

Firkser appeared on CBC‘s Daybreak radio program to talk about the “harassment” she has faced. In relation to “Would you bang?” threads on the Roosh V Forum, she said she was flabbergasted that the police hadn’t become involved. The implications are undeniable: talking about whether you would sleep with a woman, a hypothetical situation, should be criminalized according to Firkser.

Are such statements simply her speaking her beliefs, or, more narcissistically, a chance to both express herself and carve out a nice paid career as a SJW?

Not content with the overt hypocrisy of her background as an “anti-patriarchy” activist privileged in the job market because of her family, she wants to ensure a prohibition against men freely and innocuously discussing their sexuality. It comes as no surprise, therefore, that Firkser is going around retweeting purely made-up figures like this about sexual assault:

> "One in two Canadian women have been sexually assaulted" words from the #RooshV protest in #toronto
>
> — Alex Bailey (@alexfbailey) August 15, 2015

Where would Firkser be without her family privilege and the benefits it brings?

“If I were a rich girl… nah nah nah nah nah nah… oh wait, I am!”

These are Haley Yael Firkser’s course-based “qualifications” for her position as Business Development Director of Home Hardware Pest Control:

- Communication Technologies & Gender
- Intermedia II
- Sound I
- Film/Video I
- Youth and Media
- Media and New Technology
- Media Criticism
- Media and Cultural Context
- Public Relations
- The Religious Imagination
- Ancient Judaism
- Medieval Jewish Thought and Institutions
- Jewish Identity & Autobiography
- Sexuality & Public Discourse
- Women in Israel
- Religion & The Human Body
- Canadian Jewish Literature
- Reception Studies
- Self/Other: Identity & Ethics
- Alternative Media
- Introduction To Culture

- Hebrew (Ulpan)
- Responses to the Holocaust
- Holy War in Judaism, Islam and Christianity
- Dealing with Stress in Daily Life and in Emergency Situations

In and of themselves, there is nothing wrong with most of these courses, although the relative ambiguity of many of them, combined with left-wing academia, would make the majority highly ideological.

Fundamentally, how this has equipped Firkser for her current job role is beyond me. One can look at her resumé and perform a few internet searches about Home Hardware and you know beyond a shadow of a doubt that "the patriarchy" has given her everything she has.

The privilege of every feminist must be looked at

"It's a hard life…"

It is comical that so many leaders of feminist witch hunts and other SJW projects come from the most privileged elements of society. My theory is that Jessica Lelièvre and Haley Firkser do not like the hard work required of conventional business owners or creators, so they opt for a "perpetual student mode": the self-aggrandizement that comes with being university politicians and attention-seeking SJW media darlings.

Meanwhile, the legacies of daddy and granddaddy (and great-granddaddy in Lelièvre's case) can be milked for all their worth. Family jobs a-plenty and other financial privileges follow these sorts of women. But for most of us dastardly men, we have to make our own way in the world. No multimillion-dollar families, just our own efforts and ambitions.

Anyone who attacks any form of privilege with a background like Haley Yael Firkser is nothing but a fraud.

Read More: Thin Privilege Doesn't Exist

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Algerian War Of Independence: Lessons For Today

August 17, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I have been a long time student of Algeria's war of independence, which took place from 1954 to 1962. Repeated viewings of Gillo Pontecorvo's brilliant 1966 film The Battle of Algiers, as well as Florent Siri's 2007 film Intimate Enemies, have made a lasting impression on me. The conflict is not well known in the West, for a variety of reasons, and my goal here is to provide a general outline of the war, as well as the tactics of the protagonists.

Background on the war

Algeria had been essentially a French protectorate since the 1830s, and by the early 20th century it had become entirely integrated into the French colonial system. It was actually considered part of France. The system, however, was based on pitiless exploitation of the native population and the perpetuation of what would today be called an apartheid social structure. France justified this state of affairs by portraying itself to the world as the bringer of civilization and egalitarianism to a backward indigenous population.

By the early 1900s, Muslims made up over 90% of the population but were saddled with paying 70% of the direct taxes. The French government installed settlers (called colons) on Algerian lands, who dispossessed the native population and treated them little better than serfs.

The early twentieth century had seen the organization of some groups that agitated for Algerian independence. None of them achieved much success. Groups like the Star of North Africa and the Party of the Algerian People were formed by European-educated Algerians in the 1920s and 1930s, and infused with the ideology of modern nationalism.

These parties were banned by French authorities by the 1930s and never had much influence outside of intellectual circles. The PPA did, however, succeed in creating a network of cells around the country that would be of use to it later.

The end of the Second World War brought with it the end of old notions of European colonialism. The old ways of doing things were on the way out, and the more astute European powers like Britain and The Netherlands realized that colonialism was a casualty of the war. France, however, insisted on retaining its holdings in North Africa and Indochina by force.

In the early 1950s, a patriot named Ahmad Ben Bella created the Revolutionary Committee of Unity and Action (CRUA) in Cairo. With the support of Egypt's anti-imperialist leader Gamal abd al-Nasser, Ben Bella and his associates created the National Liberation Front (FLN), with its military arm in Algeria being the National Liberation Army (ALN).

The insurgency

The insurgency began in 1954 with armed attacks on French government and military targets all over Algeria. The FLN leadership in Cairo at the same time called on all Algerians to support the fight for full independence from France. The French responded with a campaign of counter-violence in an attempt to crush the insurgency before it could gain momentum. It was inconceivable to them that Algeria could secede from France; it had been actually integrated into the structure of the French republic.

French settlers (colons) formed vigilante groups to fight the insurgents. The FLN strategy was: (1) win the support of the local population by disseminating information and propaganda; (2) separate the French government from the Algerian people by methods both peaceful and violent; (3) gain control of the countryside; (4) destroy the network of French collaborators and informers; and (5) establish an alternative social system and government that would be ready to take power once the French left.

By day, the FLN would attack soft targets in an attempt to provoke overreactions from the government. By night, the insurgents would melt into the local population. These were classic guerrilla tactics, and they worked.

The conflict was brought to the cities in 1957 with calls for a nationwide strike. France also began to train a cadre of native loyalists called harkis to assist in fighting the FLN. By 1957 the French had over 400,000 soldiers in Algeria, but it appears that of these about 170,000 were Muslim Algerian volunteers with little stomach for fighting their countrymen.

In 1957 and 1958, French general Raoul Salan divided the country into sectors with permanently stationed troops. Under a system known as quadrillage, each military sector was responsible for controlling its own territory. This marked the beginning of large-scale "search and destroy" missions against the FLN.

But the overreactions of the French military forces, and the widespread use of torture and other questionable tactics, alienated many otherwise apathetic Algerians from France. On the international front, the French government was unable to gain the moral high ground. None of the major world powers were much interested in helping France retain what was rightly seen as a colonial anachronism.

There were those in France who could see the writing on the wall, and who knew that France's days in Algeria were numbered. Charles De Gaulle, in an act of great political bravery, had the courage to argue for withdrawal from Algeria. In 1958 he called for a new constitution for France's Fifth Republic, in which Algeria would have self-determination, and asked for a referendum from Algerian voters.

De Gaulle was elected president in 1959, and called for a negotiated end to the conflict. He envisioned a loose association between the two countries, one in which France would apparently play the role of "older brother." The FLN refused to stop the conflict on any terms short of complete and total independence.

But the end was fast approaching. The French public were tired of the conflict and wanted it brought to a conclusion. In 1961 peace talks were opened. The Evian Accords, completed in 1962, brought an end to the war. Hostilities were to end, and the hundreds of thousands of French colonists were given a period of time of equal rights with Algerian natives. After this period, however, they would either have to become Algerian citizens or be classed as foreign nationals.

In the end, fewer than 30,000 Europeans chose to remain. Around 400,000 were repatriated to France, never to return.

The Algerian War of Independence was a brutal and bitter struggle, one which continues to haunt both countries today. Even today, the war is known in the Arab world as the “revolution of a million martyrs” in honor of the high Algerian casualty rate.

From the perspective of military tactics and strategy, it offers an outstanding example of how a small, dedicated minority can successfully confront an established system of power. Without doubt, FLN tactics were studied in Hanoi, and adapted to local conditions in Vietnam during its own conflict with the United States.

Read More: Two Fathers

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Rise Of #FeminESPN

August 18, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Over the course of my tenure as an ROK contributor I've written a good number of articles on the increasing influence of political correctness, SJWs, and feminism in the world of sports.

From Colin Cowherd being dismissed for pointing out a sad, yet accurate fact about the educational system in the Dominican Republic, to DeAndre Johnson losing his athletic scholarship at Florida State University for punching a woman who hit him first and allegedly called him a racial slur, to Chris Paul being vilified by the media for criticizing a female NBA referee, it's more than evident that sports on all levels are being infiltrated by the all mighty girl power agenda.

In this article I pointed out that ESPN is the biggest fish in the sports pond:

> This network is the true worldwide leader in terms of sports and sports content as their slogan says. They're currently available in over 80% of house holds in the U.S., boast 12 different sister networks, and are broadcasting in over 200 countries. Needless to say they're the big man on campus by a wide margin.

There are plenty of other sports media outlets on plenty of other platforms out there. But the biggest and most recognizable sports media brand in the world on television, radio, and the internet is ESPN and they've made it very clear that they are going all in on feminism.

Let's take a look at the path that led to this initiative by the world wide leader.

Shift in focus

A decade and a half ago, there was a noticeable effort by ESPN to report what happens off the field.

Pardon The Interruption, which first aired in 2001, was the one of the first programs of its kind. Hosted by Tony Kornheiser and Michael Wilbon, this marked the first time sports writers were given a daily television platform to voice their opinions on sports topics and issues of the day. The show was a runaway hit and 14 years later it remains a staple in ESPN's lineup.

A year later Around The Horn joined the fray and saw just as much success. The platform was a little different in that four sports writers debated in round-robin style discussions about the happenings on and off the field. The accolades rolled in from day one and like PTI, is still on the air.

In 2005, ESPN decided to push the envelope and launched a 30 minute show called ESPN Hollywood that featured celebrity reporter and pundit Mario Lopez as one of its co-hosts.

The premise of the show was to focus on the tabloid aspect of professional athletes. What athlete is dating which actress, hocking what product, or what cameos they made in movies and television shows were the main topics of discussion when the program hit the air waves.

The show was an abject failure but it spawned a program called Cold Pizza which later morphed into ESPN First Take which has grown into one of the most watched morning shows on television, sports or otherwise.

What all of these programs have in common is that they opine as much, if not more, about what happens outside the lines, as what happens in them.

In the beginning, these incidents were just side notes or backdrops to what was going on on the field of play. A drunk driving arrest here or an ill-timed off-color comment there were briefly touched on, then the focus jumped back to the games themselves.

But the passing of the torch from one commissioner to another in the biggest and most profitable league in the country set the wheels in motion to eventually create the perfect storm for feminists SJWs alike to weasel their way in and begin to make their mark.

Roger Goodell

In August of 2006, NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced that he would be stepping down after 17 years on the job. The owners elected 47-year-old Roger Goodell to succeed Tagliabue as their next commissioner and the young upstart wasted no time in establishing himself as a hard-line disciplinarian.

From the jump the newly minted judge, jury, and executioner established very quickly that off the field incidents would result in stiff penalties. While Tagliabue was seemingly soft on these issues, Goodell made no bones about the fact that player conduct was paramount in his initiative to “protect the shield” as he put it.

The game’s safety and integrity were certainly priorities for Goodell, what with the unprecedented penalties he levied on the New England Patriots and New Orleans Saints for “Spygate” and “Bountygate” respectively. But player conduct was where he consistently made headlines as he suspended players in droves without pay for even the smallest of infractions which made him a polarizing figure.

Goodell was unpopular among players but the vast majority of the media seemed to buy into his no nonsense attitude when dealing with players getting into legal trouble. The commissioner certainly had his critics and detractors but by and large, he seemed to have the support of the press.

But Goodell’s support all but vanished when he gave a two-game suspension to a player who was caught on camera knocking out his fiance on an elevator. This was the crack that feminist needed to barge their way into a male dominated sector and force their agenda on the masses.

The left hook heard ’round the world

[image]

It’s safe to say that anyone in the civilized world is aware of the saga of former Baltimore Ravens running back Ray Rice on some level. Myself, Athlone McGinnis, Charles Wickelus (AKA 2Wicked), and other ROK contributors have provided plenty of content on the consequences and implications of Rice’s worst moment as a professional that fateful afternoon in Atlantic City.

Goodell suspended Rice for two games when the incident was first reported. This drew the ire of both the media and the public because the suspension wasn’t harsh enough for what was reported. There wasn’t much anyone could do at that point because suspensions were rarely influenced by any one group outside of the NFL Player’s Association.

Then the video was leaked and all hell broke loose.

When the smoke finally cleared, Rice was suspended indefinitely and released from the Ravens, who then decided to tear up his contract. Rice was later reinstated by the NFL but these days he’s considered “radioactive” because of the PR backlash that whatever team decides to pick him up would be subjected to.

Last week Rice sat down with ESPN’s Jamele Hill to make a public plea to convince the public he’s a changed man:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=eNjCJTSiF3Y

Hill seems to have been convinced and voiced as much on several of ESPN’s radio talk shows the day after she sat down with the embattled running back. I’m also sure that a lot of people out there probably believe he’s been rehabilitated in some way shape or form and believe he deserves another shot to make a living as player in the NFL.

But the fact that he still hasn't been contacted by an NFL team for even a private workout shows that owners and GMs are afraid of the backlash that would ensue upon their announcement of Rice's arrival. They know as well as anyone out there that there are more than enough fans and media pundits who still believe Rice shouldn't be allowed anywhere near a football field for the rest of his life.

Granted, Rice's 2013 season was one of the worst of his career and that certainly factors in to teams hesitating on giving him a look. Greg Hardy, who is guilty in the court of public opinion and not a court of law, was signed by the Dallas Cowboys largely because he's one of the best pass rushers in the league. Talent trumps risk in most situations and pro football is no different.

But Rice's indiscretion was caught on tape and that's the main reason he's still without a team.

The Rice incident was a watershed moment in sports

The Ray Rice saga and the events that followed has caused a paradigm shift of epic proportions on the sports landscape. The sports world was inching toward gynocentrism already, but when Janay was KO'd by her soon-to-be husband, the advancement of the SJW agenda and feminist cause was put into hyperdrive and hasn't slowed down since.

Seemingly overnight, there has been a rapid influx of female employees at ESPN. They've infested every medium imaginable at the company and these days it's impossible to turn on the television or the radio and not see or hear a woman giving her hamster-saturated opinion disguised as "expertise."

What's more is that there are now countless specials and features on the network highlighting female accomplishments in sports. Youth girl's football teams, female football coaches, and anything pertaining to girls or women playing with boys or men are regularly highlighted and pushed down the throats of its consumers.

There are almost as many examples on the social justice end but they all pale in comparison to the freak show known as Caitlin Jenner receiving the Arthur Ashe Courage award at this year's ESPYs. Michael Sam, the first openly gay football player to be drafted by an NFL team, won it last year. These selections have distorted, perverted, and completely stripped away the award's true meaning and credibility.

All of this would have happened anyway because we've been headed in this direction for a while. But the left fist of Ray Rice sped up the process and as a result, this once male-dominated sector has become the rancid cesspool it is today.

#feminESPN

On that note, Return Of Kings is launching the hashtag #feminESPN to highlight the various agendas ESPN is pushing, why those agendas are bad for sports, and the overall effect on neomasculinity.

Though it seems the majority of the population is falling in line with ESPN's initiative, there are definitely cracks in it's collective armor in both its purveyors and consumers. At some point something will happen that will divide opinions right down the middle and throw the sports world into a tailspin, not unlike what happened with #gamergate last summer.

We hope to educate and inform those who know there is something inherently wrong with what is going on in sports as well as men who aren't quite sure what's happening to their favorite pastimes. That way, when the shit hits the fan (and it will) we'll be ready to fight back.

Is this really going to change anything? It's hard to say. The SJWs in the sports world are large in numbers to be sure and have the backing of wealthy and influential people at their disposal so the odds are pretty long that this will lead to any substantial shift or change.

However, #gamergate severely crippled the SJW machine and their cronies in many different ways and the effects of that hashtag are still being felt a full year after it was launched. Maybe #feminESPN takes a while to permeate the public, maybe it takes off immediately, and maybe it doesn't make so much as a dent.

But as the most recognizable manosphere brand on the web, we have a responsibility to make our readers aware of the covert brainwashing that is happening right in front of our faces and how our own are being used against us to do it.

Similar to red pill knowledge, awareness of this trend is paramount is and in the coming days we intend to deliver.

Read Next: How White Knighting Is Killing The NFL

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

5 Reasons You Shouldn’t Date Girls Who Hate Oral Sex

August 18, 2015 | by Jacobus Stonebanks | Link | Original Link

There are a variety of ways to evaluate the quality of a woman. Sexual aptitude is simply one that resonates with all men because we are deeply sexual beings. More so than women, we derive considerable satisfaction and happiness from an epic sex life.

With that in mind, I suggest considering the following when you find yourself interacting with a girl who says she doesn’t enjoy going down on a guy. Here are five reasons you may not want to date her:

1. She Has Low Sex Drive

Woman, by nature of biology, generally have a lower sex drive than men. This is owed primarily to a difference in levels of testosterone. While present in women, it is in much lower quantities than men. Also, like men, hormone levels can vary from woman to woman, which can directly impact sex drive.

A woman with higher levels of testosterone than the average woman doesn't necessarily have mannish qualities, and may, in fact, be hyper feminine. But, she likely does have a higher sex drive as a result. A woman with greater sex drive is going to be excited at the mere prospect of sexual activity, and she knows a great way to initiate is to take you in her mouth.

Why should you care? Well, assuming you're an average male, you're thinking about sex daily, and physiologically, your body is feeling an urgent need for release about every three days. Obviously, your personal sense of sexual need will vary by age and hormone levels, but we're just talking averages here.

So, have you found yourself with a great girl, but notice she rarely initiates, or even talks about sex? When you do get laid, is it merely satisfactory, and she never really seems in to it?

Best to avoid this kind of situation whenever possible. Knowing as your relationship continues, there will be an inevitable tapering off of sexual activity, think what life might be like just a few short years down the road. Suddenly you're in a sexless relationship with no easy way out. Porn and masturbation are a poor substitute for the real thing, but this is now your life. Sounds terrible.

2. She Is Unable To Submit

A strong man needs to be able to lead, but a woman who is unwilling to submit herself, can’t be led. Women often complain that giving a man oral is demeaning and degrading. Any woman who truly feels this way likely does so because she insists on being an equal in the relationship.

In her mind, any act that puts her in a position beneath the man erodes her ability to maintain control of her perceived status of equality. There is an underlying streak of feminism running through the mind of this woman, and you should walk away immediately. You will never be the head of a relationship where the rest of the parts insist on always having their say.

3. She Is A Prude

Often this goes hand-in-hand with low sex drive, but it’s not always the case. Some women simply don’t like branching out beyond missionary, and if you’re OK with that, then skip to the next section.

But, if you hope to spend your precious time with a woman who can set the bed on fire, consider this point carefully. A woman who is unwilling to explore her sexuality with you, and try new things, will inevitably become boring and non-stimulating.

Over time, all relationships move towards a kind of equilibrium between partners. Routines are established and the days and weeks begin to blend together. But, as soon as your sexual activity becomes rote, you have reached the beginning of the end. And with a prudish girl, you’re only going to get to that point faster.

Boredom breeds frustration, which breeds resentment, which leads to finding fulfillment elsewhere. Before you know it, you’ve cheated on your girlfriend or wife with some hot, young co-ed who can suck-start a leaf blower while her ankles are behind her head. Good luck explaining to your significant other why that happened.

4. She Is Selfish

I don’t know about you, but every single girl I’ve ever met who loves giving head says it’s because she loves how it makes me feel. She gets off on knowing that I am enjoying myself and she’s individually responsible for that sensation. Sure, some women say they like the taste, or say it feels good, but at the heart of it, they enjoy performing a selfless act that is designed to only address my sexual desires.

A woman who genuinely doesn’t like performing oral is likely a selfish lover, and even worse, a selfish person. This kind of attitude can manifest itself far beyond the bedroom and lead to many problems in your relationship. A woman who consistently takes more than she gives will, inevitably, leave you unsatisfied.

If you are dissatisfied at home, you will begin to find that attitude creep in to other aspects of your daily life, negatively impacting your path of self-improvement and success. To achieve joy in life, you need to surround yourself with positive influences, and selfish women are to be avoided.

5. She Is Unable To Love

I genuinely believe selfish people are unable to truly love someone. How can you expect someone insistent on meeting their own needs first to consistently put that aside, and live to meet someone else's needs? The basic essence of love is to understand and meet the needs of someone else.

Without this foundation, your relationship is doomed. Not only should you reconsider becoming romantically involved with this kind of woman, but if you ever want to have kids, you should drop her like a bad habit. It is impossible to be both selfish and a good parent.

Now, I'm not saying you need to quickly evaluate every woman you date based on their desire, willingness, or expediency in giving head. But, keep these things in mind as you begin to establish a relationship that you think might be worth a longer-term engagement. Know yourself, and what is important to you, before letting a relationship get too far down the path.

Read More: How I Tried To Turn A Hoe Into A Housewife

Jacobus Stonebanks
Jacobus views the world through a meta lens while exploring masculinity in thought, action, and life at masculineempire.com You should also connect on Facebook and Twitter. His views are his own.

How To Lead The Dance Of Seduction

August 18, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Drexel Scott

I take it on good faith that the esteemed audience here at Return Of Kings is interested in more than just getting laid; that you are also interested in becoming more of a man, more of a leader, and more of the kind of guy who is respected and admired by men and women alike.Fortunately, the path to being a good leader often overlaps with the path to being a good seducer. The principles are the same, so rather than simply learn how to pick up and sleep with women, it makes more sense to learn the underlying principles which maximize the chance of success in all areas.

After all, while sleeping with tons of cute women is great, life is about far more. It is about creating the life that you desire for yourself in terms of women, finance, spirituality, relationships and personal projects.

The purest, most masculine trait a man can have is leadership. It's one of the hardest things to define, since it encompasses a complex set of beliefs, traits, values and action. However, I believe that the essence of leadership can be distilled into two primary concepts:

Responsibility and Vision.

I have known many good leaders, and at least an equal number of bad leaders. To help illustrate the difference, I consider someone a bad leader when they are given a small amount of power, and then use it disempower others in order to make themselves look better. This is typically the case when someone is given power as a result of nepotism or connections, rather than on merit. They are the boss that everyone hates, that nobody wants to follow but they do it anyway out of the fear of being fired. That is not the type of leader you want to become.

In a seduction context, the bad leader is the guy whose parents gave him a trust fund—which he uses to buy cocaine to entice women into his bed.

Rather, a good leader is someone who takes responsibility not only for himself, but also for the effectiveness and happiness of the overall team—whether it's the two people involved in a sexual relationship, or hundreds of people in a company he leads. He is willing to take responsibility for the failures, and share the responsibility for all the victories. He always seeks to empower each individual member of the team in order to benefit the entire system.

This leads to my next point, because a leader can only take positive responsibility when he has the vision to know where things are supposed to be going. The vision is the big picture, the ideal, the completion of the task at hand. Like I teach in my course "NLP For Sales And Persuasion," the most fundamental rule of NLP is to Know Your Outcome. In practical terms, knowing your outcome means that all behaviors and actions are focused and targeted towards one specific end—whether it's making a sale, sleeping with a woman or making her your girlfriend.

Understanding these two concepts is a key to success not just in business and social groups, but especially so when it comes to women. This isn't very Politically Correct, but women are natural followers. They are always seeking to follow the lead of someone stronger than themselves, who can set the proper rules and boundaries and drive the whole machine forward for the benefit of both team members.

One huge problem guys have when they first starting to learn this stuff, is where they are driving the interaction. Oftentimes, they are not driving it at all and expecting the woman to do the work and lead it forward by herself…and unless you're rich, famous or extremely good-looking, that is not going to happen consistently. The onus is on the male to decide the outcome of the interaction, whether it's a one night stand or a long-term relationship.

For a lot of guys into seducing cute new women, what they really want is to have fast, hot sex as quickly as possible. At least, I know I do and most of the guys I teach want the same thing. So that's the Vision: fast, hot, easy sex.

The Responsibility part means having all the facts at your disposal, and setting up a solid game plan so that you can smoothly take a woman through so she enjoys the entire process and feels "swept off her feet" at the end. For her, it should feel like "it just happened." That feeling is the result of strong male leadership.

The relevant facts that you'll need to know are, essentially, the knowledge of Game distilled right here on this website. Add to that a solid scientific understanding of female arousal and relationship dynamics, and you will have an extremely solid plan to take her through. Why do I say "scientific?"

Well, believe it or not, pick up artists are not the only people to study sex and sexuality. Lots of scientists do as well. A lot of what they find through empirical research supports exactly the tactics and techniques taught on ROK…but other times, scientists discover truths about sexuality that change everything we think we know.

One area where that’s true is when it comes to what arouses women and how quickly they can get turned on. We are told that “men are like switches, and women are like volume knobs.” We are taught by society that women get turned on slowly and that the man must jump through certain hoops in order to make it happen.

But what if that weren’t true at all? What if the truth is much simpler? Well, recent University studies have shown conclusively exactly how women become aroused, and I promise…the truth will absolutely shock you. Watch the free video below to learn what the researchers discovered:

Click Here To Learn The Truth!

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Drug Smuggler Turned Canadian MPP Cheri DiNovo Libelously Calls Roosh A Criminal

August 19, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> "I think that people recognize the criminal that he is and that's why he's hiding and evading and wouldn't say where he actually spoke."
>
> – Actual criminal Cheri DiNovo, who used to smuggle LSD into Canada from the United States, ironically talking about (and defaming) Roosh, who has not been charged, let alone arrested for any crime in Canada.

Ontario provincial New Democratic Party (NDP) politician Cheri DiNovo, sensing the opportunity to ride his coattails, has been one of the few non-municipal politicians in Canada to attack Roosh V. She appeared at a "rape culture" demonstration on the weekend he delivered his successful Toronto lecture.

In addition to lambasting Roosh for being a "criminal", she has avoided any discussion of her own criminal past smuggling drugs or the criminal incitement furthered by a litany of the SJWs whose cause of harassment and defamation she supports.

From Aurelie Nix's false rape threat accusation to Jessica Lelièvre's assault to Sara Parker-Toulson's support of rape wishes on unborn children and calls to violence, DiNovo is awfully selective regarding the outrage and criticism she chooses to vent about.

We need to be analytical and explore why exactly, of all the provincial politicians in Ontario (or Quebec), she is the one appearing at SJW events. The answer concerns calculated attempts at increasing her own prominence, which has been severely lacking in recent years. This intersects with a basic need to distract any future attention away from her criminal antecedence.

DiNovo should have been jailed for years, like any male drug smuggler

[image]
Cheri DiNovo will talk about male privilege, heterosexual privilege and white privilege, but not about her privilege in not going to jail for the long time she deserved.

Cheri DiNovo may not have faced the formal justice she deserves (even as she demands "justice" against people for what actually amounts to thoughtcrimes), but she is nonetheless an admitted criminal. LSD was already criminalized for mere possession in multiple jurisdictions at the times she smuggled it across large tracts of North America into Canada. When her criminal history, an entirely relevant issue, has been raised previously by opponents, she shrilly and self-righteously cries "Gutter tactics!"

Resorting to explaining DiNovo's actions through a childhood prism of her father's death and stepmother's suicide is disingenuous. By that standard, my grandparents should have been the biggest drug lords continental Europe has ever seen.

My very, very young grandfather's experiences against Stuka dive-bombers during the German invasion, the removal of my grandparents' neighbors and even relatives to internment and concentration camps, their own harassment at the hands of the Nazis, and the near-starvation they endured for years could be considered casually sufficient for them to have turned out as long-term criminals peddling life-ruining substances.

But they didn't turn out that way. Nor did their children, who grew up in deprived post-war circumstances as worse as or far worse than DiNovo's.

She gave unequivocal support to those doxxing, threatening or trying to incite mob violence

> Great turn out at demo today against hate speech & rape culture. #NoSilenceAgainstViolence pic.twitter.com/tz9spJN1jJ
>
> — Cheri DiNovo (@CheriDiNovo) August 15, 2015

Cheri DiNovo was, in fact, incredibly silent about the violent threats and other threatening activity against Roosh. She supported Sara Parker-Toulson, who deliberately disseminated Roosh's Montreal address in tandem with "Jennifer," the drink-thrower who claims to be a feminist but has an uncanny knack for disappearing and appropriating female legal privilege after committing what Canadian law regards as an assault. DiNovo did not call out this unacceptable behavior, designed to incite others to attack Roosh or criminally falsely imprison him.

The end result was, thankfully, more benign. Yet it still resulted in damage that the property owner has had to fix. What good exactly was Sara Parker-Toulson trying to achieve by spreading someone's address, in the context of a night where that person had already been assaulted, chased off by a menacing mob and falsely imprisoned.

DiNovo distinctly and utterly turned a blind eye to actions she would label criminal if against those whose beliefs she shares. This is a tacit endorsement of the violence and threats Roosh was subjected to.

By the time she appeared at the protest in Toronto to promote herself, the Ontario MPP had actively collaborated with a group committed to criminal and anti-social behavior. At no stage did she call out this hateful collection of people, even as she maliciously and slanderously called Roosh a criminal.

If you read the vandalism below, it is attempting to spell out “Roosh V Dickless,” a very charming allusion to violent genital mutilation against him. No condemnation, either for the vandalism itself or the threatening message, came from Cheri DiNovo or her representatives.

But should we be shocked? After all, this is a woman who surreptitiously and effectively smuggled hard drugs into Canada, helping to ruin lives in the process. She’s not smuggling drugs nowadays, she’s just smuggling the truth about miscreants like Sara Parker-Toulson, who desire serious violence against their opponents, out of sight.

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/632274581164847104

The fundamental question: “What does she get by attacking Roosh?”

Grab the microphone and distract attention, Cheri.

Here we have an ex-drug smuggler who tries to hypocritically pontificate moral and other standards to other people. What matters is that DiNovo's ambition clearly outstrips her current position within provincial Ontarian politics, relegated to the third-biggest (or plain smallest) represented party, in a layer of government Ontarians pay much less attention to than national politics.

An excellent demonstration of this chasm between this reality and her overall ambition is her hosting of the 3 Women radio program on CIUT 89.5 FM, where she holds "discussions" and "interviews" with a revolving door of two other female politicians or political figures every Tuesday.

DiNovo needs an outlet or, better yet, multiple outlets to give herself a bigger brand name recognition and platform, perhaps for a future tilt towards federal politics. This is where Roosh comes in.

Note that of the nearly two dozen other NDP members of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario (plus the NDP members of the federal legislature), none advocated against Roosh to anywhere near an iota of the extent that she did. And this is a leftwing party that depends greatly on contrived university-style protests against budget cuts, "sexism" and other issues.

Hypocrites abound in the SJW mobs

Check your privilege, Cheri DiNovo.

You have already seen the gargantuan family privilege of professional leftist complainers like Haley Yael Firkser and Jessica Lelièvre, the latter having also committed criminal assault. Now DiNovo joins the fray as a feminist SJW who has no place criticizing others for their actions, at least until she spends serious time incarcerated.

Roosh has committed no crime in Canada and the onus is on DiNovo to prove he has done anything wrong. Short of that, she has contributed nothing but to lie about and defame him, and sought the kind of respected public prominence that a former drug smuggler is never entitled to.

Read More: Matthew E. Duffy Urges The Making Of Criminal False Allegations To "Swat" Roosh

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

More Americans Are Now Obese Than Overweight

August 19, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In a development that caught many off guard this year but is thoroughly unsurprising, obese Americans now outnumber overweight Americans. And the situation in 2015 is probably worse, given that the figures compiled by Washington University School of Medicine came from the period 2007-2012. The land of the free and home of the brave is now officially the land of the fries and home of the bovine.

The perilous degradation of American health has not coincided with any real proposed solutions to this weight plague. Prescriptions regularly touted by medical professionals, such as exercise and good nutrition, simply do not appeal to the masses. The methods themselves work, with few exceptions, but people are obviously not taking them up. Instead of wondering why their message isn't getting out, health bodies and leading physicians simply regurgitate statistics which are almost identical, except for the fact that they keep getting worse.

Roosh is correct and the "experts" have no answers

If Dr. Oz is so correct about how to deal with weight issues, why is his television audience largely comprised of overweight and obese women?

Dr. Oz "politely" attacked Roosh during his groundbreaking appearance on the celebrity physician's show. Rather than painting his own comprehensive vision for how to ameliorate America's death by excess pounds, Oz chose to make a contrived "feel-good" video where one of the participants, who also shrilly tried to excoriate Roosh, demanded that people not call her "fat." If anything, such an approach preaches the denial of severe health risks, not body positivity.

We are at a crossroads and the conventional medical fraternity has failed abysmally to stem the tide. You can argue they are well-intentioned in most cases, yet this cannot offset their do-nothing contribution to the problem. Science is the best it has ever been and medical practitioners are nonetheless clueless as to how to get people to implement the most basic, common sense advice. They are the definition of expert impotence.

Obesity will bankrupt America

[image]

Enough is enough, stop a tsunami that will literally kill society.

America already has a rapidly aging population. Birthrates are atrociously low, especially in the indispensable middle classes. Fewer and fewer young and middle-aged people will be available to work to support the system that protects ever growing numbers of current senior citizens and soon to be Baby Boomer retirees. The costs associated with this demographic catastrophe will be gargantuan.

Ridiculously, obesity is now most prevalent in the age group most necessary in keeping society well-oiled: those above 25 but below retirement age. Even if overweight and obese people can keep working, the lost productivity and other problems will only abet the deterioration of both society and the economy that keeps it stable. Health costs which should be primarily centered on senior citizen health will increasingly involve the treatment of obese individuals and then progressively the still unhealthy but “merely” overweight people.

How are YOU setting a good example?

Huell was a great and funny Breaking Bad character but he probably died of diabetes five minutes after Hank Schrader and Steve Gomez left him in the safe house.

The point here is not to have a competition to determine who the most buff and healthy person is. An accountant or lawyer is understandably going to be less “healthy” and strong than a professional athlete. What I am preaching is for people to be within an acceptable range. Perhaps your weight will fluctuate as your commitments and overall life changes. But if you get to 5-8 pounds above a healthy weight, unless you’re a more dense bodybuilder, without correcting it, you’re not only contributing to the problem but advertising and promoting it for others.

People are not solely determined by their weight, of course, but have you not ever noticed that there is correlation with your weight and the weight of some of your closest friends? There, every day, is the power of group psychology for all to see. People consciously but more importantly subconsciously regulate themselves according to those they are closest to. So be the game changer if your social circle is currently unhealthy or, alternatively, ensure through your own example that your current good standard either stays the same or, better, improves. You are a beacon that others will follow.

Our medical and political leaders owe us answers… now

Now is the time to seek to resolve the obesity plague. Not tomorrow, next month or next year. Today. Three decades of expanding waistlines prove that a better, more ruthless approach is necessary. It is amazing that America has pursued the War on Drugs for around 40 years but categorically refuses to engage in a War on Obesity. The calamity of obesity and being overweight now far outstrips any of the health impacts and violence created by the drug trade.

Roosh has thoroughly enlightened the debate on obesity by refusing to give politically correct or crisis-perpetuating answers. Whether you agree with his position on fat-shaming or not, you cannot disagree that the present state of affairs fundamentally helps people deny responsibility for their weight and perceive what is otherwise a potentially fatal disease as not worth addressing.

That needs to change, right now.

Read More: Morbidly Obese Girl Posts Picture Of Herself In Bikini

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Deranged Indian Feminist Runs London Marathon With Period Blood Running Down Her Leg

August 19, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A particularly vile attention-seeking Feminist has been making headlines after she ran the London Marathon with period blood running down her leg. Kiran Gandhi, Harvard MBA student and former drummer for the "artist" MIA, wrote about the experience on her blog, brazenly clothing her crass bid for attention in the langauge of social justice: this time, to "raise awareness" about "period shaming" and lack of access to sanitary products.

The liberal media, as it does with all instances of degeneracy, has exploded in a chorus of oohs and aahs, celebrating Gandhi so vigorously that nobody even knows of the woman who actually won the London Marathon.

Feminism: a race to the (front) bottom

Gandhi writes on her blog:

> I got my flow the night before the London Marathon and it was extremely painful… I had spent a full year enthusiastically training hard, but I had never actually practiced running on my period.

5.5/10 WNB.

An MBA student with phenomenally good foresight, then. Gandhi then weighed her options between running with a sanitary pad and running with a tampon.

> I knew that I was lucky to have access to tampons etc, to be part of a society that at least has a norm around periods.

Having invented a nice bit of imaginary oppression to moan about, Gandhi then had her Eureka moment.

> If there's one person society can't eff with, it's a marathon runner. You can't tell a marathoner to clean themselves up, or to prioritize the comfort of others. On the marathon course, I could choose whether or not I wanted to participate in this norm of shaming.

Society's revulsion for women being out in public with period blood dripping through their clothes is not healthy and normal. It is a form of "shaming." If I was to walk around with shit caking my canary yellow dungarees in order to raise awareness of a lack of toilet paper in Africa, I would quite rightly be carted off to the nearest nut-house under the proscriptions of the Mental Health Act.

Feminists, on the other hand, are seeking an entirely different dispensation. And what better way to rationalise a claim of righteousness when outraging public decency that by clothing it in the flimsy veneer of radical social action?

> A marathon in itself is a centuries old symbolic act. Why not use it as a means to draw light to my sisters who don't have access to tampons and, despite cramping and pain, hide it away like it doesn't exist?

The comfort blanket of phony oppression

To bolster her claimed right to be disgusting, Gandhi even indulged in a spot of half-baked sociology, all in the middle of the marathon:

> As I ran, I thought to myself about how women and men have both been effectively socialized to pretend periods don't exist. By establishing a norm of period-shaming, [male-preferring] societies effectively prevent the ability to bond over an experience that 50% of us in the human population share monthly.

"[W]omen and men have both been effectively socialized to pretend periods don't exist"? In whichever universe this has happened, it's not the one most people inhabit. Period jokes and period jibes are part of the very fabric of language and life most countries.

The richness of epithets describing the phenomenon alone prove the claim that people have been "socialised to pretend that periods don't exist" entirely spurious: Time of the month, on the rag, got the painters in, Arsenal are playing at home and flying the Japanese flag, in English alone.

The again, Gandhi's extra curricular cultural classes in her business education probably went no further than Feminism 101. She goes on:

> By making it difficult to speak about, we don't have language to express pain in the workplace, and we don't acknowledge differences between women and men that must be recognized and established as acceptable norms. Because it is all kept quiet, women are socialized not to complain or talk about their own bodily functions, since no one can see it happening. And if you can't see it, it's probably "not a big deal." Why is this an important issue? Because THIS is happening, right now. And so I started bleeding freely.

Your forefathers fought for this.

The next frontier in Feminist liberation of, presumably, the twenty-third wave:

complaining about period pains in the workplace. The real reason why it is unacceptable to complain about period blood in the workplace is not some patriarchal conspiracy against women, but rather the common notion that “keep your personal ailments to yourself, nobody wants to hear it.”

There are not many workplaces that would tolerate complaining and bitching about headaches and upset stomachs. Kiran Gandhi wants a special dispensation to regale the world with her period pain, because reasons.

Also, which “workplace” will welcome Kiran Gandhi in, now that her name is associated with this particularly grotty stunt, remains an interesting discussion.

Solipsism as tonic for a rotten soul

The grottiness of the stunt having dawned on Gandhi during mile nine of the run, her rationalisation hamster kicked into overdrive:

> I was going through all these crazy thoughts and analyzing whether I was ether a) a crazy chick who needs to just calm down and reach for an effing tampon (someone came up behind me making a disgusted face to tell me in a subdued voice that I was on my period…I was like…wow, I had NO idea!), or b) a liberated boss madame who loved her own body, was running an effing marathon and was not in the mood for being oppressed that day.

For Western women, oppression is to be faced with somebody else’s natural distaste for your crass attention whoring.

She continues:

> And as we come up on mile 9 I saw my dad and brother. They were so completely amazing, smiling and laughing and cheering. I kept trying to awkwardly pull my shirt down to my knees so they wouldn’t see that I was bleeding. But as I approached them, I realized they just wanted to scream and hug and take a photo and celebrate together. They were so in the moment with me and there was so much love. I realized they couldn’t have cared less.

> The two most important men in my life were down for team feminism.

Castrati manlets of the future rejoice in the degeneracy of their own daughters. It would not surprise me to open the Guardian one day to read an edgy piece about how it is now the done thing for fathers to chaperone their daughters to bukakke parties.

When intellectually bankrupt, blame "Our Culture"

Republishing the blog in the Observer, Gandhi made some peculiar claims about "culture":

> Consider how women in developing nations are affected by period secrecy and taboo. Our culture tells them to hide their monthly flow, despite the fact that the ways to clean it up are either unsustainable or unaffordable. Even women who are able to use pieces of cloth to absorb blood don't always have private places at school or at work to change them out. As a result, they choose skipping school or work as a better, less shameful alternative.

By "developing nations" I have to presume she means mud-hut societies in sub-Saharan Africa or thereabouts. But "our culture"? Even in the abstruse obliqueness of Social Justice Warrior-speak, "our culture" can only mean, well our culture. The culture of the West.

Unless Kiran Gandhi originates from a third world mud-hut society, which as a Harvard MBA I'm guessing she doesn't. In what sense does the culture of the West tell women in the third world to hide their periods? Could it be that, in her feminist fervour, Kiran Gandhi has become incoherent?

"Our culture," contrary to what Kiran Gandhi would argue, is one in which women can pull a stunt as filthy as running a marathon with period blood flowing down their leg while their fathers and respectable media outlets cheer them from the sidelines and give them kudos for being progressive.

"Our culture" is one in which a leading scientist can have his life ruined by a baying mob because he said something which was interpreted as possibly offensive to women. Feminists like Kiran Gandhi tend to forget how much the "society" they love to criticise allows them to get away with.

Conclusion

Western Feminists are becoming ever-more deranged as the months roll on. Just this week, radical militant feminists have employed violence and terror to suppress the free speech of Roosh Valizadeh on his Canadian speaking tour. I have reported previously how a British feminist was pressing for the right to have herself sterilised on the public dime at 29 years of age.

Another British feminist was given a top honour for having some people locked up for offending over the internet. Now Kiran Gandhi, another privileged Western feminist, is making a song and dance about her bodily functions in order to garner attention. If you find this distasteful, you are an "oppressor."

It is an irony that the real victim of Kiran Gandhi's attention whoring is a woman—the actual winner of the 2015 London Women's Marathon, Tigist Tufa, who ran 26.2 miles in 2 hours and 23 minutes. Quoted in a Buzzfeed article, Tufa told of how she was overshadowed by Gandhi and her rank stunt:

> I called People Magazine asking for a feature, I even catered to them saying I'd talk about my fitness routine. But they just said, "Are you the tampon girl?" and I said, "No I'm the winner." But they had already hung up on me.

Tigist Tufa won the London Women's Marathon, but you won't hear about it. She didn't bleed from her cunt.

Feminism is a device by which privileged professional women with a gnawing hole in their rotten-carcassed souls demand and receive attention from the world. It's nothing to do with justice, and nothing to do with improving the lot of real women.

It's simply status signaling by comfortably-off women who have been told their entire lives that they can do no wrong, that the world owes them attention and deference and that the only thing they have to do to earn it is fart, or bleed into their own leggings.

Which reminds me of what it was that gives away Gandhi's foul ruse as an plea for attention… black leggings don't show blood.

Read Next: 29-Year-Old Feminist Demands Government Money For Her Own Sterilization

Theodore Gumbril
Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

Why Moderate Feminism Is Just As Bad As Radical Feminism

August 20, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Last week I wrote a tongue-in-cheek article about converting feminists to femininity. In the article, I mentioned that radical feminist Andrea Dworkin equated all heterosexual sex, even consensual sex, with rape. A few female commenters objected that they reject Dworkin's extreme ideas. Rather, they claim to follow a moderate feminism that they think empowers women. But is it really empowering?

What is moderate feminism?

Andrea Dworkin

Radical feminism is easy to critique because it has a number of academics and theorists, such as Dworkin, Germaine Greer, and Mary Daly, who have produced a large body of writings detailing their ideas. Radical feminists are part of a vanguard. They've worked out their ideas to their logical conclusions, but it will take decades until those ideas can percolate down through the masses of society.

Moderate feminism is more difficult to pin down because there is no defined body of writings to consult. Perhaps the best way to define it is that it is a watered-down feminism that is palatable to more conventional women. Apart from the blue and red haired harpies you see at protests, most modern women would fall under the moderate feminist category.

Unlike radical feminism, which wanted to minimize the role of men, moderate feminism champions equality with men in all areas. They encourage women to imitate men. If men are promiscuous, women should be as well. If men are dedicated to their careers, women should be dedicated to career as well. If men play sports, women should play those same sports.

Although we have recently seen a rash of rape hysteria and attempts to redefine rape, moderate feminists claim that they are not against having sex with men as long as it is consensual.

Moderate feminism also tends to favor progressive policies. Feminists support governmental enforcement of equal pay for equal work, increased penalties for crimes against women, same-sex marriage and other LGBTQ issues, free birth control, subsidized daycare, and easy access to abortion.

To most modern women, the agenda of moderate feminism appears to be utterly reasonable and obviously correct. They regard anyone who is against this agenda as an uneducated, uncultured troglodyte who should be driven from polite society.

A wonderful career

Sheryl Sandberg

But moderate feminism is not as beneficial to women as they are led to believe. Young women are taught that the proper role for an empowered woman is to climb the career ladder. Being a stay at home mom is discouraged as being boring and a waste of a woman's talent.

One of the heroes of moderate feminism is Facebook executive and author of Lean In: Women, Work, and the Will to Lead, Sheryl Sandberg. Sandberg has led a charmed life. She was born into a wealthy Jewish family and attended Harvard, where she met Larry Summers who served as her mentor and thesis advisor.

Through Summers she was able to get jobs working at the World Bank and the Treasury Department. She later worked for Google before meeting Mark Zuckerberg at a Christmas party, which led to her being hired at Facebook.

In Lean In, Sandberg talks about her belief that women are underrepresented in corporate leadership in companies and suggests simple solutions to help women reach “their full potential” in their careers.

Leaning in can lead to desperation

It all sounds wonderful, but the reality is that if you haven’t attended an Ivy League school, and if you don’t happen to have the future president of Harvard as your mentor, you are probably not going to get hired by the hot new startup of the future no matter how hard you “lean in.” Instead, you are going to get an entry-level position, slog away for years, and if you are lucky, you will rise to a middle management position.

That might be okay if you are a man, but it is dangerous for a woman. Men find women in their early twenties to be the most attractive—that is the point when women have their peak sexual market value. It is at this age when a young woman can attract the best spouse.

However, if a young woman follows the advice to dedicate her best years to a company she might find herself scrambling to find a husband when she is in her early thirties. At this point, she might find that her “gene pool” of men is significantly smaller and of lower quality than it was when she was 22 years old.

Leaning in means smaller families

It turns out that a woman in her twenties is not just at her most appealing; she is also at the peak of her fertility. After age 30 a woman’s fertility begins to crater. While corporations enjoy the cheap labor that young women provide, a woman is exchanging her fertility for the opportunity to work in a cube.

Leaning in means your children will be raised by an institution

If women follow the feminist script, they will continue to sacrifice their lives at the corporate altar even after they have had children. That means a daycare institution will raise the children.

Feminists have long been dismissive of the idea that children need someone like a mother or a grandmother as part of their development. On the contrary, feminists argue that daycare is better than maternal care. Feminist Kate Millett wrote:

> The care of the young is infinitely better left to trained professionals rather than to harried amateurs with little time nor taste for the education of young minds.

However, Brian C. Robertson, in his book Forced Labor, writes that even daycare owners have noted that:

> The effects of day-long daycare on young children were often traumatic. Preschoolers who seemed to be doing well in the morning-only nursery school began lashing out, withdrawing, and crying for hours on end. Some children even lost abilities that they had acquired.

Now I understand that some mothers work out of economic necessity. In those situations, women are often acting heroically in providing for their families in the best way that they can.

But there are also professional women who deliberately choose their career over raising their children in response to the feminist notion that a career is empowering and that motherhood is demeaning. Unfortunately, in this case it is the children who are the losers.

Feminism encourages young women to be promiscuous

The equality preached by moderate feminism also extends to the sexual sphere. Through the schools, media, and popular magazines young women are indoctrinated into believing that riding the cock carousel is somehow empowering.

But the rise of easy sex has been a disaster for women. It has given rise to the Pick Up Artists (PUA), men who learn game in order to get into a woman's pants as quickly as possible. Feminists decry PUAs as being evil, but it is just men who are behaving rationally to the fact that so many young women now lack even a shred of self-respect.

It has also given rise to a lot of really bad sex. In the very first episode of the vile HBO series Girls, the main character Hannah is about to have sex with her boyfriend "doggy style." Instead, her boyfriend chooses to have anal sex. When Hannah tries to protest that she does not want to have anal sex, the boyfriend says, "Hey, let's play the quiet game," and continues thrusting.

The star of Girls.

You may argue that Girls is fictional, but the fact that this show resonates so strongly with young women is telling.

I've also read articles written by women bemoaning men who want to record all of their sexual escapades and men who are unable to reach an orgasm with old-fashioned vaginal sex. I am sure that you could find a "sex therapist" who would say all of these things are perfectly normal, but the women who wrote these articles didn't sound happy and fulfilled by their feminism.

Conclusion

Moderate feminism passes itself off as a very positive thing. It doesn't denigrate men, so the story goes, it just makes women more powerful. While it sounds good on paper, its effects in the real world are overwhelmingly negative on both the lives of women and men.

Unfortunately, moderate feminism is here to stay—at least for a little while longer.

Read More: The Newfound Alliance Between Feminism, Marxism, And Radical Islam

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How To Use Your Natural Horniness For A Great Daygame Session

August 20, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Daygame is now firmly established as a discipline in its own right, with gurus specialising in it and offering their own particular take. In the UK, a group of men even espouse something called the “London Daytime Model,” a set of principles and actions designed to optimise ones results while talking to girls in the street and in malls and coffee bars.

While I can see that such categorisation makes it easier for men to consume game material, the sheer quantity of which can appear overwhelming at first, my own personal view is that while there are differences in how best to approach sets in the day and night, you should nevertheless view game as a holistic set of principles leading to a skill-set that can be used at any time of the day.

That said, last weekend I went on a daytime adventure in Berlin, cold-approaching twenty-five girls around the Kurfurstendamm shopping district. Doing so, I was reminded how indispensable male horniness — perhaps more usefully termed the male hunter instinct — is when one is looking to meet women, prompting me to share some thoughts on the topic here.

What Are Optimal Daygame Conditions?

While you can get lucky in the daytime and meet a cute girl you hit it off with straight from “Hello, can you tell me where the pet shop is?” (see my story about the Colombian girl last week), in general, what makes for a productive daygame session is a lot of approaches in a short space of time. Berlin is the second largest city in the EU with 3.5 million residents (after London, which has 8 million) and the Ku’damm is its busiest shopping street. So in a three-hour session I was able to approach twenty-five girls, collecting phone numbers and sometimes Facebook profiles.

Received daytime wisdom dictates that the best results are to be found in cities with a million or more residents. But wherever you find yourself, ensure that there are sufficient targets so you can burn through a large quantity of sets as quickly as possible.

What To Do When You Hit The Streets

This isn’t intended to be a daygame instruction guide, but here’s a quick rundown of the most simple, workable method. Walk around, concentrating in particular on those stores popular with cute girls such as Topshop, H&M, Forever 21 and so on. When you see a lady you like, approach her, ideally from the front.

Say hello with enough impact to stop her. Tell her that you think that she looks very nice and pick out some observation about her—perhaps she’s wearing an interesting hat, or looks a little like Selena Gomez. Maybe she’s walking with exaggerated purpose, or perhaps she’s ambling along like a sloth. Whatever it may be, pick something out and make a cheeky little joke about it so that she smiles.

Shake her hand and hold it for a little longer than necessary. Maintain strong eye contact throughout. Transition the conversation to more general topics, but ensure that you tease her lightly and remain both a challenge and a little mysterious. After a few minutes tell her that you have to meet your friends, but that you should meet up again. Pass her your cellphone and tell her (don’t ask) to enter her number.

Will It Always Work?

The above is a very brief summation of my method. Does it work every time? No, of course not. Remember, even famed daygame writers have calculated an 11% approach to notch success ratio.

Plenty of times you will approach a girl and she will make an excuse and move on without engaging with you, or she will claim to have a boyfriend or raise some other objection. This doesn’t matter. Accept that it’s part of the game and continue. Why? Because repetition and momentum are your friends.

Repetition = Horniness = Success

In the early part of your daygame session scoring phone numbers or having great conversations is not the aim — repetition is the aim. Why? Because if you attend to the task with vigour and determination then you will find that interacting with a succession of hot girls, even briefly, makes you feel horny.

And that horniness gives you impetus – suddenly the idea of approaching becomes less of a chore and more a pleasure. You recognise that it is only by approaching that you will have the chance to sleep with one of these cute girls — and that has all of a sudden become a significantly more urgent desire. Your horniness has all of a sudden been converted into momentum—and game momentum, when it manifests itself, is incredibly powerful.

At the end of a good session you will find that your energy levels are high and conversations will go more smoothly. Ideally you will hit a sweet spot where it feels like you can do no wrong and every girl you speak to is drawn into your world and is unable to destabilise you with shit tests and other nonsense.

An example of momentum in action. In Berlin I went out intending to do ten street stops. At ten I was just hitting my stride and so I decide to carry on. When I hit twenty I was getting phone numbers galore, and so decided to continue to twenty five. At the end of the session I'd been on an instant date with a cute French girl and had a number of solid leads to follow up on my next trip to the city.

Takeaway

Whatever your particular approach to daygame may be, unless you happen to get lucky very early on in a session, you should always aim to complete a large number of approaches. Not only is this great practice, forcing you to come up with conversational gambits on the fly and consequently sharpening up your social skills, but it also has the effect of increasing your levels of horniness, increasing your hunter instinct and your testosterone, improving your results exponentially.

Read More: 7 Steps to Turn Rejection From a Girl Into Useful Feedback

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

A Bulking Diet For Hardgainers

August 20, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by The 110 Lb Hulk

I packed on 45lbs of lean muscle, and so can you with this clean bulking diet.

5’6, 125lbs and feeling that I was at my genetic limit, vs. 5’6, 170lbs and feeling like a genetic beast

Weighing 110lbs and fed up with being bullied and rejected by girls, I discovered bodybuilding towards the end of high school. Throughout college I continued lifting weights and made good strength gains, but no matter how hard I worked, I just couldn’t get past 125lbs. Frustrated and unwilling to risk the dangers of PEDs, I immersed myself in books and Internet forums for the next 6 months with all signs eventually pointing to a woefully inadequate diet. Although I felt I was eating a lot, my diet had nowhere near the quality or number of calories that a hardgainer needs to put on serious lean mass.

In bodybuilding speak there are generally two accepted phases: the bulking phase, which entails eating larger quantities of food with the goal of putting on as much muscle, and the least amount of fat, possible. Opposite to that, we have the cutting phase which entails losing the most fat, while sparing as much muscle possible in the process.

Bulking can further be divided into two types: a dirty bulk, and a clean bulk. A dirty bulk generally involves eating large amounts of food with little attention paid to the nutritional density of the diet (aside from possibly extra protein). A clean bulk, however, involves not only paying attention to the amount of food being consumed, but also to the quality of food and specific macronutrients in each meal (namely protein, fat, and carbohydrates). As you can probably guess, a clean bulk is much more effective than a dirty bulk, but also requires much more willpower, planning, and mental fortitude.

For the purposes of this discussion, I'd like to focus on the exact bulking diet I used to pack on 45lbs of quality muscle. After bulking, I still had to spend 3 months in a cutting phase to get as lean as I wanted, however I was able to retain almost all of my muscle and about 95% of my strength throughout the entire process thanks to the clean bulking strategy that had resulted in little excess fat.

One thing I'd like to note is that these results did not happen overnight—this was the result of 3 years of hard, consistent work in both the gym and the kitchen. If it was easy, then everyone would be jacked right?

Muscle Math And The Art of Keeping Things Simple

Fully bulked — before and after

Before we dive right into the actual nutritional plan, let's make sure that it's going to make sense for your particular body structure.

Everyone has a different height, weight and body type, so just because 3000 calories a day worked well for me, it doesn't mean that 3000 calories will work well for you. My successes started as a 125lb hardgainer, while you may be on the opposite end of the spectrum. Luckily the math and experimentation is almost the same in each case.

First, take your current weight (in lbs) and multiply that by 15. That number represents a rough estimate of how many calories you'll need to eat each day in order to stay the same weight. Sure there are a million complex formulas on the Internet that will give you varying numbers, but remember this is just an estimate and no calorie calculator is going to be 100% accurate.

Next, increase that number by 500 and make sure that you consume very close to that number of calories each day (while eating clean) and making sure that roughly 30% of your calories come from protein, 20% from fat, and 50% from complex carbohydrates. For the next 30 days, eat as consistent as you can on this plan, while lifting weights 3 – 5 times a week.

If you find you're gaining 1 – 2lbs a month with very little noticeable fat gain, then your body is responding well and you should continue on this path. If you find that you're putting on too much fat, subtract 300 calories a day for the next month; likewise, if you're not gaining quickly enough, add 300 calories a day. Continue adding or subtracting until you're gaining lean mass at a steady pace (1 – 2lbs a month if you're just starting out).

This is a one-time experiment, and through these trials you'll begin to understand what your body responds to — future clean bulks will now be a piece of cake.

My Sample 3000 Calorie Clean Bulking Diet

A typical Sunday in my kitchen

This meal plan represents a typical day for me while bulking. I'm a very busy person and I don't have a lot of time to cook, so I prepare as much of this as I can on weekends and. While I vary the types of food I'll eat for maximum nutrition, I keep it pretty much the same every day in terms of the macronutrients – in other words, I might substitute chicken breasts for lean ground beef, fish, or steak, and frozen vegetables for raw spinach. Nothing complicated, but enough to keep the diet sustainable over long periods of time.

7:00 am	2/3 cup of oatmeal mixed with fruit, scrambled eggs (2 whole eggs + 4 egg whites), 1 slice of whole wheat toast with sugar free jam, water, multivitamin	Calories: 543; Protein: 39g; Fat: 16g; Carbs: 60g

10:00 am	Apple, 2/3 cup trail mix, water	Calories: 617; Protein: 13g; Fat 29g; Carbs: 75g
1:00 pm	4oz chicken breast, 2 medium sweet yams (or sweet potatoes), vegetables, water	Calories: 452; Protein: 54g; Fat 5g; Carbs: 59g
4:00 pm (pre-workout)	1 cup Greek yogurt with sliced up banana and strawberries, water	Calories: 412; Protein: 30g; Fat: 1g, Carbs: 70g;
7:00 pm (post-workout)	Protein shake with 2 scoops whey, water, 1/3 cup of oatmeal, frozen fruit, and 1 tbsp. of natural peanut butter	Calories: 438; Protein: 55g; Fat: 7g; Carbs: 39g
8:00 pm	4oz chicken breast, 300g brown rice, vegetables, water	Calories: 547; Protein: 45g; Fat 6g; Carbs: 78g
Before Bed (Optional)	Casein shake with 1 scoop and a banana.	Calories: 225; Protein: 25g; Fat: 0.5; Carbs: 31g

Total Calories (without optional shake): 3009; Protein 226g (30%); Fat: 65g (19%); Carbs: 381g (51%)

Note: Anytime you post a nutritional plan on the Internet, you run the risk of inciting rabid flame wars. Some people will look at 50% carbohydrates as being too high, but remember that while we're bulking, we're trying to maximize our workout intensity. Consuming lots of high quality carbohydrates is going to ensure that we're going to be energetic for our workouts and that we can recover quickly enough to tear it up in the gym the next day as well.

What's Next?

Shredded for the summer

After you've spent 6 – 8 months bulking up, you're probably going to want to get yourself shredded for the summer or a special occasion. If you thought that bulking was hard, the cutting phase will separate the men from the boys. This is where the numbers become much more precise and small mistakes will cost you hard earned muscle.

I've written extensively about this and many other topics in my 300+ page book The 110lb Hulk which includes everything you need to know to reach your body's full potential, including:

- 40+ illustrated exercises that will leave you pumped hours after leaving the gym.
- 5 sample workouts, and 6 sample diets tailored to your current goals of bulking or cutting.
- Mastering the mental game, bodybuilding science, and tips on how competitive bodybuilders peak for a single day.

Available on iTunes, Amazon, Barnes & Noble, and all other major online book retailers.

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How John Stuart Mill Demolished Roosh's Feminist Opponents Over 150 Years Ago

August 21, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With Return of Kings publisher Roosh taking a victory lap after holding two successful talks in Canada—despite the entire Canadian establishment trying to stop him—butthurt social justice freaks are licking their wounds and trying to regroup with the #RooshIsARapist hashtag campaign.

#RooshIsARapist is an attempt to get Roosh's books removed from Amazon and other online booksellers for "promoting" rape, based both on out-of-context quotes from said books and the general feminist fear of men having sex with women and enjoying it.

But don't you dare call it censorship. As SJWs love to Pharisaically parrot, only the government can engage in censorship. Private citizens mobbing together to metaphorically burn someone at the stake isn't censorship, any more than flashing schoolmarms at the mall isn't a sex crime because hey, at least you aren't trying to rape them.

In fact, the left has conjured up a term for those who criticize SJW-led mob harassment: "freeze peach," a neologism that reveals both their authoritarian mindsets and their utter immaturity:

https://twitter.com/11twiggins/status/632898374052782080

The fact that this line of argument has become so popular shows how unsophisticated and ignorant (in the most literal sense of the term) SJWs are. Thomas Wiggins and his co-belligerents are completely unaware that there is a body of philosophy demolishing their arguments going all the way back before America's founding. In particular, John Stuart Mill, one of the most influential philosophers in European history, specifically shredded this line of reasoning nearly two centuries ago.

On Liberty On SJWs

John Stuart Mill's 1859 book On Liberty is regarded as one of the foundational documents of Western liberalism, and is so highly regarded to this day that it serves as the book of office for the U.K.'s Liberal Democrats. Here is what Mill had to say about social justice warriors:

> The time, it is to be hoped, is gone by, when any defence would be necessary of the "liberty of the press" as one of the securities against corrupt or tyrannical government. No argument, we may suppose, can now be needed, against permitting a legislature or an executive, not identified in interest with the people, to prescribe opinions to them, and determine what doctrines or what arguments they shall be allowed to hear. This aspect of the question, besides, has been so often and so triumphantly enforced by preceding writers, that it needs not be specially insisted on in this place. Though the law of England, on the subject of the press, is as servile to this day as it was in the time of the Tudors, there is little danger of its being actually put in force against political discussion, except during some temporary panic, when fear of insurrection drives ministers and judges from their propriety; 1 and, speaking generally, it is not, in constitutional countries, to be apprehended, that the government, whether completely responsible to the people or not, will often attempt to control the expression of opinion, except when in doing so it makes itself the organ of the general intolerance of the public. Let us suppose, therefore, that the government is entirely at one with the people, and never thinks of exerting any power of coercion unless in agreement with what it conceives to be their voice. But I deny > the right of the people to exercise such coercion, either by themselves or by their government. The power itself is illegitimate. The best government has no more title to it than the worst. It is as noxious, or more noxious, when exerted in accordance with public opinion, than when in opposition to it. If all mankind minus one, were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person, than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind. Were an opinion a personal possession of no value except to the owner; if to be obstructed in the enjoyment of it were simply a private injury, it would make some difference whether the injury was inflicted only on a few persons or on many. But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth: if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error.

The gist of Mill's argument is that not only is government censorship of ideas not the sole threat to freedom of speech, it's not even the biggest threat. If people cannot speak their minds out of fear of being fired from their jobs or made unemployable, then free speech does not exist regardless of any protections it may have from the government.

Liberty does not spring from a law or an amendment to a constitution, but from the very ways that a people behave. A society in which dissidents are hounded into silence by private citizens is just as much a tyranny as a totalitarian dictatorship.

Additionally, Mill noted that the kind of decentralized online harassment that SJWs engage in is more dangerous when the people are on the government's side. Free speech laws such as the First Amendment exist to protect minority opinions, not majority ones. Even in a repressive communist state such as North Korea, someone who states an opinion held by the majority will never be arrested or persecuted. A society can only call itself "free" if it allows those who hold minority views to speak without fear, because it is for those minorities that the First Amendment and other similar laws were created.

Astroturfing Outrage

It's also worth noting that the "outrage" over Roosh's books and speeches is almost entirely manufactured. As I pointed out in a previous article, before he came to Canada, Roosh gave the same speech in four cities in three other countries with nary a peep. It wasn't until a handful of bored dilettantes in the Great White North took notice that the #DenyRooshV movement came into being.

The same goes for other witch hunts that SJWs launch. Very rarely do these keyboard warrior-driven hashtag campaigns spill over into the real world. Most people are apathetic about these issues, even when it comes to those they disagree with, and can't be bothered to lift a finger to agitate for someone they've probably never even heard of to be fired. For example, I've gotten countless death threats for my writing, yet not a single one of my detractors has even attempted to confront me in person.

The reality is that the "popular" outrage against Roosh, myself and neomasculinity is almost entirely astroturfed. In the specific case of Roosh's Canadian engagements, the anti-Roosh protests were a creation of Sara Parker-Toulson and Aurelie Nix, working in conjunction with the country's sympathetic, incestuous media establishment. They reflect the opinions of a small minority of Canadians who have a disproportionate amount of influence in society.

It remains to be seen whether this current SJW tantrum will have any legs, but what we do know is that the great men of the Western canon had denounced modern feminist tactics and beliefs long before they were dirty, sick thoughts in their fathers' heads.

Read More: Are Toronto Mayor John Tory And Councilman Norm Kelly Promoting The Violation Of Canadian Law?

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Soul Of Man

August 21, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

The existence of the soul is of utmost importance for both philosophy and theology. It is the animating principle of our bodies by which we think, feel, imagine, and remember. Spirituality takes for granted the distinction between soul and body, and belief in an afterlife necessarily implies that the soul can exist outside of the body.

Almost every culture and religion on earth has some idea of the soul. We infer its existence from the inevitable facts of life: birth, death, dreams, ideas, and abstractions all suggest the reality of something beyond the visible and material organism. The soul is internal to us, but to some extent it is independent of us, hence the term "my mind was wandering."

To my knowledge, science has not devised a way of quantifying or measuring the soul, which means unreflective men will dismiss the question of its existence out of hand. Consider this though: our host Roosh displayed considerable willpower and fortitude in the recent battle of Montreal. We cannot use a machine to declare that Jones has 34 units of willpower and Smith has 50, yet we still speak of willpower as an objective reality.

We will briefly examine the history of the soul in Western thought, for it offers important lessons for all men.

The Soul In Antiquity

The pre-Socratic Greek philosophers did not make distinctions between cosmology, psychology, or theology. The Hylozoists believed that all existing things were in some sense alive, with greater or lesser degrees of consciousness. The Milesian school tended toward material monism in their search for the animating principle of all things. For example, Thales, the father of philosophy, believed that water was the foundation of existence.

Thales (624-546 BC)

Anaximander attributed existence to a principle he called apeiron. He defined it as an infinite primordial mass from which all things are born and all things return when they die.

> "Whence things have their origin,
> Thence also their destruction happens,
> According to necessity;
> For they give to each other justice and recompense
> For their injustice
> In conformity with the ordinance of Time."

Eventually the Greeks encountered the problem of knowledge, and with this discovery we see the beginnings of a psychological understanding of the soul. In the Timaeus, Plato combined psychology and epistemology. Relying on Pythagorean ideas, Plato theorized a world-soul derived from the realms of mathematical symmetry and musical harmony.

The world-soul is divided in two: sameness (tauton) where we find the intelligible order of eternal truths which we apprehend through reason and otherness (thateron), the realm of sensation and particular existence where human souls reside. Plato's idea tended toward extreme transcendentalism where the body was considered the prison of the soul.

Aristotle defined the soul as "the first entelechy of a physical organized body potentially possessing life." He emphasized the close union between body and soul, but he was never able to fully describe the degree of separation between the two or explain the relationship between mind and soul. Aristotle identified three hierarchies of souls: growth, sustenance, and reproduction were common to all living things; willed motion and sensory faculties, shared by animals and humans; and reason which humans alone possessed.

The Stoics believed that the soul was like the divine breath animating the body, but that it was still a corporeal thing made of ethereal matter. The Epicureans accepted the atomism of Democritus, believing the soul was made up of the finest ground atoms in the universe and held together by the body. If the body is destroyed, the atoms are dispersed and life is lost.

The Soul In The Middle Ages

Avicenna (980-1037) continued Aristotle's line of thought, which in turn influenced Scholastic philosophy. Avicenna devised the "floating man" thought experiment as a way to demonstrate the immateriality of the soul. He asks us to imagine ourselves suspended in midair, isolated from all sensory input, severed from contact even with our own bodies.

Avicenna argues that even in this situation, we still retain our self-awareness. This implies that the soul is immaterial, separate from the body, and apprehended through the intellect.

Before the Aristotelian revival in the West, Neo-Platonist thought and the work of St. Augustine of Hippo dominated psychology and spirituality. Plotinus believed the soul contained the body and was the first to assert that the soul was an undivided presence permeating the entire body, as opposed to being focused in one of the vital organs.

Augustine defined the soul as "a special substance, endowed with reason, adapted to rule the body." Like the Greeks whose philosophy he knew so well, Augustine asserted the superiority the rational to the non-rational. Reason was the highest faculty of the human soul because it allowed us to grasp truths that transcend the ever-changing physical world.

Augustine argued that much of what we know about the world relies on faith and trust in authority. We cannot hope to independently verify everything about the past, for even much of what we know about the present is a matter of trust. I haven't personally worked out the mathematics of relativity, for example, but I accept it as true anyway. He distinguishes between belief and understanding: we believe many things we do not understand, but belief is the necessary prerequisite for understanding.

St. Thomas Aquinas largely accepted Aristotle's description of the soul, in opposition to the dualistic tendencies of Platonism. A man cannot be a mind without a body > because it is one and the same man who is conscious both that he understands and that he senses. But one cannot sense without a body, and therefore the body must be some part of man. (Summa Theologiae)

For Thomas and Aristotle, the soul is the animating principle of the body. Without a body, a soul is an incomplete substance, unable to perform its natural activities. Without a soul, the body dies.

The Soul In The Modern Age

The connection between mind and body long plagued the early modern philosophers. Rene Descartes defined the soul as a thinking substance and the body as extended substance with only Divine intervention making coordination between the two possible.

Similarly, Gottfried Leibniz postulated a theory of pre-established harmony: the mind and the body are like two clocks perfectly synchronized but forever separate.

Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) thinks you have no soul

Beginning with Thomas Hobbes and continuing through David Hume, Immanuel Kant, and Archbishop Richard Whately we see more philosophers and theologians questioning either the soul's existence or our ability to prove that it exists.

Strengthening The Soul

Obviously there are many more understandings of the soul in other philosophical, religious, and mythological traditions that I have not summarized here. Whether we refer to it as the soul, the spirit, the mind, or the animating principle, man has always believed that he was more than his body. When Smith dies, we refer to his "remains" because the man whom we knew as Smith is no longer with us although his body is still present.

Monotheistic religions all believe in the immortality of the soul, and that our essence will endure beyond our death whether it's in heaven or hell. In the Gospels, Jesus Christ is most concerned with the spiritual state of man, urging his followers not to fear those who can only kill the body but he who kills both body and soul.

Belief in man's spirit does not necessarily need to be based in religion however, as the ancient Greeks showed us. Think of a perfect triangle. Have you ever seen a perfect triangle in the world? You have not, but the mental image of the perfect triangle is the measure by which we judge the imperfections of existing triangles.

The soul animates the body and gives us our drive. Science can tell us that if we eat right and lift heavy, we will build muscle. Knowledge of these facts is of no use to us if we lack the willpower to act on them. What do we mean when we describe someone as having a strong spirit? Generally we mean that they show a high degree of perseverance in pursuit of their goals, or a dogged refusal to give up.

Strengthening our bodies is a worthy pursuit, but we cannot do that if we lack strength of spirit. We can build up our strength of soul by practicing virtue, reading and imitating the lives of great men, and denying ourselves short-term pleasures in pursuit of a greater good. If you expect to do any good at all in this world, you best start taking better care of your soul.

Read More: You Are What You Feed Your Soul

Andrew Levinson
Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

5 Things I Learned From Entering Bodybuilding Competitions

August 21, 2015 | by Ryan Blair | Link | Original Link

Recently, I had the opportunity to enter a bodybuilding competition. Bodybuilding has always been one of my main interests and passions, and I knew that this was the route I wanted to take. And although I wasn't able to take home the blue ribbon (I'm a big guy, but you should have seen the competition), I have come away with some valuable tips. Check out these five important things I learned from my experience:

1. Hire A Coach With A Good Reputation

When I was preparing to enter the competition, I went through long months of training and dieting to get my body ready for the stage. Even at those times when I felt like I was physically ready to step out, I needed to know exactly how to present my physique so that I could flaunt my strengths and hide my weaknesses.

That's why I found it crucial to have a great posing coach by my side. She was able to evaluate my physique, so that I soared in the competition. After all, a subtle move of my foot or twist of the torso creates lines to emphasize muscles, which can be all it takes to nab first place.

A good coach can help you with your nutrition as well. I personally have my favorite supplements, but many coaches will advise you of their favorite nutritional strategies and supplementation to use right before a competition. I have done competitions with and without a coach and I can tell you that they will give a huge competitive advantage.

2. Videotape Your Sessions

While I definitely learned a great deal about posing from looking at myself in mirrors, nothing compared to capturing it on video. By looking at myself in videos, I was able to see how I smiled and moved throughout my poses. The last thing I wanted was to look like a deer caught in headlights.

Developing stage presence is as much about being graceful as it is having confidence. Yes, in order to be a bodybuilding competitor you must have an incredible physique, but to place in the top positions, you really need the complete package. Taping myself practicing my routines really made a difference in my overall performance.

3. Pay Attention To Breathing And Timing

The more I practiced my routine, the more I found myself able to perform it on stage without any hesitations. I found that when I efficiently transitioned between all of the poses that were mandatory of me, I created a more polished presentation. I was also able to hold each mandatory pose for longer.

A lot of bodybuilders don’t realize how important this is, as you only have a little bit of time to present all the training you’ve been working so hard on. This is why it was vital for me to time my routine. Most of the competitions I entered only gave me 10 seconds total to complete my presentation, which came out to about two seconds per pose, and the last thing that any bodybuilder wants to do is fall short on time.

4. Do A Trial Run

Knowledge really is power, especially on competition day. This is why I went into my bodybuilding competitions learning as much as possible about the venue where the competition was being held.

I also attended a couple of competitions at the venue beforehand, so that I could see exactly how big the stage and audience were. To me, it was important to know what to expect when I first walked out, because I didn't want to feel intimidated at all.

5. Know The Judges

Lastly, I learned how crucial it is to know who will be judging a bodybuilding competition, and who exactly the head judge will be. This is an invaluable tool, as judging is often subjective.

One judge may be going for a softer, more feminine appearance, while another judge might prefer harder physique with more visible muscles. It was very beneficial to me to know who my judges were and what they preferred. I was able to get more insight by asking around, viewing galleries, and looking at videos of past competition winners.

Read More: 11 Things I Learned In 2014

Ryan Blair
Ryan Blair is a freelance writer who has spent 12 years in the fitness industry doing just about everything, including personal training for 6 years . He now spends his time combining his love of writing with his experience in fitness. If you want to contact him you can do so on LinkedIn.

Major Supermarket Bans The Sale Of Men's Magazine After "Rape Culture" Petition

August 22, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Magazines like Zoo promote attitudes that lead to violence against women.
>
> – Laura Pintur, who is yet to provide any figures about how many of the magazine's millions of readers over a decade have committed violence against women.

Major Australian retailer Coles has banned the sale of men's magazine Zoo Weekly after a Change.org campaign orchestrated by feminist group Collective Shout's Laura Pintur. Coles is part of the same conglomerate as department store Target, which ripped GTA V from its shelves for the "misogyny" of allowing players to kill women (in addition to about four times as many men). The censorship-loving Collective Shout and its keyboard supporters are now calling for Coles' rival Woolworths Supermarkets to follow suit.

Pintur and one employee of Coles, "Shannen", claim the magazine promotes "rape culture," the most poorly defined and evidentially underwhelming "culture" in human history, aside from maybe David Icke's "lizard people" conspiracy. Australia is a nation of some 25 million people and (as of writing) under 40,000 people have signed the petition, which equates to 0.16% of the population (and I have spotted many signatures from outside Australia).

Signing a petition is an extremely simple, passive act and there are probably 50,000 "causes" in Australia where you could find 40,000 people willing to non-strenuously sign or sign up for something, especially when badly supported buzzwords like “rape culture” are used to kick up a frenzy.

In a system that is generally two-party, only a few shades less so than America’s, and where elections are fought bitterly between differing, incompatible ideologies, are we seriously going to let such a small minority decide what is or isn’t sold on store shelves? Many popular books, films and magazines could provoke 5% in a population who want to see it banned or greatly restricted for the other 95%.

Censorship has gone wild and Laura Pintur is a mindless hypocrite

“Feminist advocacy” where a petition organizer assiduously promotes herself and her image to get a side career is common, from “model” and false rape threat accuser Aurelie Nix to “click bait” journalist Jessica Valenti. Laura Pintur is no exception.

It’s quaint how Pintur goes after a magazine catering to male sexuality when she ignores publications, where the audience is almost universally female, that shame and talk about women’s body issues for the purposes of pure gossip and entertainment. Before we explore that aspect in a more detailed fashion, let’s do some research on Collective Shout and start to learn how tenuous their assumptions and conclusions are.

An example: this organization will claim that the language of “lads’ magazines” can be juxtaposed with that of “rapists” and few differences will emerge. So how much finer can we slice things? The spectacularly vast majority of men who have never raped before and never will tend to appreciate large, firm breasts, like rapists, so can we establish the favoring of bigger mammaries over smaller ones as a predictive mechanism for sexual assault?

And how do we reconcile films encouraging female sexuality and male objectification, like Magic Mike XXL, with the denigration of male sexuality and so-called female objectification when it appears in Zoo? To artificially justify the distinction, many have claimed that the Magic Mike sequel is feminist and "liberates" the female libido.

Can you imagine an unapologetically sexual film, magazine or other piece of work created for male desires and preferences being described as "gender-equal" or "celebrating the male libido"?

Why not ban Fifty Shades of Grey (which has been sold at Coles)?

> I don't know, @Rooshv, even IF you did write about "rape", you should be a best-seller among women: @Change pic.twitter.com/8yUGwtpw5W
>
> — Red Pill Philosophy (@RedPillTweets) August 20, 2015

> You think your girl's so dewyeyed she's never sucked dick before? She knows how it works…. Is your girlfriend a bunny rabbit? A fragile ricepaper arrangement? No? Then how about you let her know she's being fked?… she'll like you taking charge like a real man.
>
> – A quote Laura Pintur uses to argue that Zoo Weekly objectifies women and treats them like a man's plaything. It seems she has not read Fifty Shades of Grey or a plethora of other female-centered novels and magazine publications.

Zoo Weekly, regardless of whether you find its language crass at times, unabashedly gives readers some hard truths about the sexual marketplace and female psychology. In a world where typically women choose the dominant alpha over the smart "nice guy," teaching men to treat women as a gentleman would will largely get them nowhere, unless they have the wealth, status, or physique of a member of the tiny elite.

Because Fifty Shades of Grey is aimed at women, Pintur won't bat an eyelid or call for its removal from bookstore shelves. What she despises at her very core is a publication that caters to men in its verbalization of these realities. In her mind, the expression of such sexuality can only be condoned when women are the consumers. Zoo Weekly's ethos promotes rape culture, whereas analogous female heterosexual desires constitute female free choice or are left completely unexamined.

"Pro-misogyny" magazines for women are much more prolific than men's magazines

[image]
An entire magazine industry, paid for by female readers and advertising dollars aimed at them, exists to either stalk female celebrities and show the flaws in their bodies, or present usually unobtainable notions of celebrity feminine beauty.

Turn up to most doctors' surgeries in the Western world or stop near a supermarket checkout and you are immediately accosted by a veritable menagerie of women's magazines. Three-quarters of the subject matter centers on female journalists (or photographers) taking explicit or implicit potshots at other women for the state of their bodies. Much of the rest of the material concerns the presentation of female body ideals even women in their teens and 20s have no chance of emulating without a combination of digital alteration, professional makeup, and perhaps copious cosmetic surgery.

This magazine industry is a distinctly female phenomenon, much more popular than fat-shaming, the subject of Roosh's appearance on Dr. Oz this year. The "misogyny" of men fat-shaming women is perennially attacked but the constant humiliation women inflict on each other, directly by those involved in producing these publications and vicariously by the women who pay to read them, is given an unequivocal free pass.

Laura Pintur and her gang of do-gooders are reticent to talk about this. They have also paid precious little attention to the willing participation of tens of thousands of girls during Zoo Weekly's history, from the cover girls and other main models to the everyday women who send their pictures in for their own desire to be sexualized. They are simply moderately or hardly known partners-in-crime with truly famous self-objectifiers like Kate Upton.

This is not my first ROK article to point out the inconsistency applied by feminists and other SJW activists in their self-serving campaigns. The presentation of Pintur and Co's message depends on an easy dichotomy: men sexualizing and objectifying women, rather than the wider issues of women willingly sexualizing and objectifying themselves, or women shaming other women via a proliferation of gossip and "general entertainment" outlets.

Feminist censorship and vilification of male sexuality (and the male gender) will awaken other men

She's embracing her womanhood, but by ogling her you're objectifying her. Go figure.

As moronic and selective as it is, the banning of Zoo Weekly from Coles and any other outlets will be a kick in the gut for men who realize that they are being lumped together with rapists. In the meantime, they will see that body-shaming female magazines are applauded and allowed to remain on store shelves. Fifty Shades of Grey will create some murmurs of disapproval from feminists, but never will its readers, overwhelmingly female, be accused of sponsoring rape culture.

Roosh, given his experiences in Canada recently, can tell you about false and defamatory SJW narratives concerning sexual assault. Likewise, the not so subtle implication from Laura Pintur and her supporters is that men who read magazines like Zoo are furthering rape.

Are you a rapist, a supporter of rape or just heterosexual? It seems the distinction does not matter to many feminists anymore.

Read More: The Farce Of "Rape Culture" In The Workplace

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

My Experience Building A Computer

August 22, 2015 | by Hannibal Menwell Creed | Link | Original Link

At the end of my high school career, I quit playing video games that were wasting my valuable time. With a shift to working on personal self-improvement, my involvement in the Neomasculinity and red pill community as increased.

One thing I have incorporated into my learning is a number of seasonal projects, something that I do every three months. This has become my version of hobbies, and I am here to talk about the last one I completed a few months ago. During the winter season, I decided to build a computer, and now that I am finished, I would like to discuss the pros and cons of the experience.

Pros Of Building A Computer

> Gents, I would not suggest making this the conversation piece when you take that ~~annoying iPhone-addicted dumb loser~~ special someone back to your place.

Customization

Everyone including myself prefers certain hardware specifications for certain parts, while usually being apathetic towards some specifications as well. This means that customization is a big part of any computer, and the only way you can get complete customization to fit your needs is to build a computer yourself. You can only go so far with customization when buying a computer compared to when you build your own.

Cost Effectiveness

Building a computer is cost effective for two reasons. The first goes back to the issue of customization. Because you are buying individual parts, you can save money by buying bare essential hardware that you are indifferent towards. The second aspect is the fact that you are cutting one of the middlemen out the computer business, which means you will be saving a lot of margin that a company would typically make on assembly and sale, etc.

Cons Of Building A Computer

Time requirement

One of my computer science professors loves to say: “When dealing with computers, allot three times the amount of time you think it will take you to finish,” and he could not be more correct. When I was building a computer, I ran into multiple problems that took a lot of time to fix. Be prepared to deal with malfunctioning hardware, BIOS issues, and other configuration problems.

When you are done, you are on your own: If something is not working on the software end and you cannot fix it, you do not have a fallback like a refund. You will only be refunded for deficient parts, and this could be a serious issue if you are not heavily versed in troubleshooting.

When Is It Worth It?

You should build a computer when you need something really advanced to handle a very specialized workload. If you are just searching the internet or writing Word docs on your computer, I would not suggest doing it. The money you save on building your computer becomes greater as your computer becomes more advanced and specialized.

Tips and Tricks

Because computers are very idiosyncratic in nature, I unfortunately cannot give you a large amount of detail on how to exactly build/configure your PC; however, I am going to pose a few general guidelines.

How to search for parts

The one part that is filled with a weird mixture of exuberant and anxiety.

You first have to find out what you are looking for when it comes to computers:

- RAM: An acronym for random access memory, this is the part of the working memory that currently in use software/programs have access to currently. This is measured in gigabytes, and the more the better. If you like to multitask on your computer, pick up more RAM. If you are a hard core programmer, the bare minimum to have on a Desktop is 8 gigs for laptops and 16 for desktops; however, if you are in data analytics, and other areas of computing that are computer intensive, I would move up to around 32/64 for desktops.

CPU: The CPU is in essence where all computations and calculations occur in a computer. The more power your CPU has, the faster the computer is going to be overall. This is generally something you want to put your money towards regardless of what you are doing. There are two specifications that you need to look for when searching for a processor: cores and speed (in Ghz). Usually when there is a tradeoff between cores and GHz, you go for more cores.

CPUs is an industry where consumers are very brand-oriented. You either are an Intel person, or you're not. Intel CPU's are without a doubt more reliable compared to CPU's such as AMD; however, AMD's are a lot cheaper and definitely a possible option for the price conscious without sparing performance

Motherboard: This is where you connect everything on your computer. Now there are some tech specs to motherboards, but I would suggest buying a gigabyte motherboard that matches all of your parts. If you do not know whether all of your parts will be compatible, I would suggest using the site: PC Part Picker.

Hard Memory: This is the actual storage for things on your computer when they are not in use. If you have a lot of shit that you store electronically, beef up on this; however, even as a data analyst, I do not use more than a few terabytes. Also, an important thing to note is that there is regular hard memory and SSD memory. SSD memory is faster in boot time; however, it is a lot more expensive, and is generally not worth it unless you do not use a lot of memory.

What I did for my computer is get one small SSD, and put my two operating systems and software on there for a fast boot time, while buying the rest of my memory as external hard drives, which is a big plus if you need portable memory.

Other stuff: There is a lot of other stuff I would like to discuss, but cannot due to the lack of brevity already apparent in this article. What I would say is if you are a gamer, look into very strong video cards (or maybe multiple) and high resolution monitors.

Building the actual computer

This is where the process gets very sticky. The hardware part was not that hard for me, but the software was rough. You are really going to need to pay attention to drivers, but a great place to start the building process is with this sequence of videos.

Conclusion

Building a computer was something that challenged me a lot more than I would like to admit, but now that I have finished, it is a great feeling. I want to emphasize that it will take a lot of time. If you also live in an urban area like where I am from, Chicago, it is easy to find little computer shops where people would build it for you. It will cost a good chunk of money, but typically no more than what you are saving from buying all of the individual parts, so it is something to look into.

However, if you are into computers, and want to learn and cherish a system that you built from the ground up, it is worth it. Happy building.

Read More: Are We Living In A Computer Simulation?

Hannibal Menwell Creed
Hannibal is a student at DePaul University. He has few friends, lots of enemies, and even more hatred for Bernie Sanders supporting millennials. You can find him on campus working out, being a douche to piss off liberals, drinking black coffee mixed with whiskey, or studying. You can reach him at "".

Reflections On The Roosh World Tour

August 23, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

It has now been around two months since Roosh visited London on his world tour. The day was very educational and revealing, and I feel it appropriate to discuss some of my thoughts, having had enough time to reflect on the event.

By looking back at a couple of aspects, we can get a clear insight into our current situation and come up with steps we can take to ensure that we can keep on developing as individuals and as a community.

Concerning the event itself, the testimonies on the Roosh V Forum provide great descriptions of not just the London event, but also the others on the tour from different perspectives. It is well worth reading through the reviews from the attendees and thoughts by forum members.

The Demographic

Roosh’s photo of London on a sunny Saturday afternoon, before the lecture

Although the demographic has varied slightly from city to city, the diversity of attendees especially at the London event was very significant. The event was not just diverse in age and ethnicity, but everyone had a different reason for coming. There were of course the young aspiring men, seeking game advice, but also fathers, seeking help for their children and people concerned with cultural collapse.

The majority of attendees had also traveled alone, and come from quite far in order to get to the venue. Unlike concerts or films, where one usually goes with a social group, this was a collection of individuals who most likely do not share the same opinions as their peers at home.

This shows us that the community is small and fragmented: rather than being a unified group who are all similar in personality and interact with each other regularly (feminists being a prime example), our followers appear to be distributed randomly across the country, spanning many different ethnicities, social groups, and ages, each with different motivations for attending the event.

We certainly didn't look like this…not yet anyway.

Although this displays a great capacity for individual thinking among the attendees, it can be very difficult to establish cohesion with everyone hundreds of miles from each other.

It is therefore very important to keep communicating with others in this community and exchange Neomasculine ideas, give and receive advice, and most importantly to form friendships with people on the same wavelength.

A Feeling Of Unease

Stripping down the day to its core components: a lecture, Q & A and post-speech socializing, there is nothing particularly out of the ordinary. Historically a (mostly) all-male event such as this would have been perfectly commonplace.

However, there was a strong feeling at the venue that something clandestine and underhanded was taking place. Roosh made the point during the speech that in Berlin, they were hiding, whilst men in gimp suits pranced about just outside, gaily in the German "Straße" during the local "Pride" parade.

Those plotting the world's destruction probably feel more at ease than us

It says a lot about the current state of society when a group of males discussing self-improvement are doing so behind closed doors. This leads us to ask: why is an event like this so unusual? Why is it so counter-cultural and niche, when the issues being contemplated are centuries, if not millennia old?

It is somewhat worrisome that something so ordinary has become so abnormal. Canada has since proven that a handful of men discussing important issues can arouse the most virulent hysteria, obscene threats and even criminality.

With the intensifying assault on male-only spaces and draconian attitudes towards free speech, it becomes ever more imperative to uphold age-old traditions, for even very basic things such as organizing a group of less than a hundred people together are now being looked upon suspiciously in our modern era; this leads us conveniently onto the next point:

The Reaction From The Media

Are they Stasi in disguise?

A much discussed aspect of the London event was the presence of the BBC. The general consensus is that they seemed impartial on the day but many highly distrust them as an institution; a perfectly reasonable point of view to hold. They added a sense of paranoia to the event. We can at this point, only wait until the documentary airs before coming to a rational conclusion.

One striking point about the BBC was their total ignorance of the community. It became apparent through their questioning ("So, are you a PUA then?") that they had little knowledge of why everyone had turned up. It is very likely that they had simply patched together various prejudgments and ideas together to form an opinion of us; the BBC were actually quite honest on the day in saying that they were expecting a PUA gathering as opposed to an intellectual discussion.

In Closing

The fact that men who convene together and discuss now-tabooed issues are looked upon with curiosity with a shade of contempt makes it very important to actively participate in the community's ideas, form bonds with others who share the same ideas, and inspire others to do the same. As the community is so scattered and events like the Roosh tour are gradually being looked upon as more and more strange, it will be nice to see more days like this in the future.

Acknowledgements

I would like to thank the gentlemen who I met up with in the pub for lunch before the event, (and then again for dinner and a few pints) for giving me the idea to write down my reflections on the tour, and of course, to everyone who attended and made it such a great day.

Read More: The Roosh World Tour Begins In June 2015

Anton Hagen

Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

Three Is Stronger Than One: The Parable Of The Three Twigs Of King Svatopluk

August 23, 2015 | by Peter Burns | Link | Original Link

United we stand, divided we falter. This classic maxim has been a lesson taught since ancient times. It pertains to the fact that when a people stand united in the face of their enemies, they are stronger and no one can defeat them. However, when instead they are divided and squabble between themselves over petty issues, the enemy can easily pick them off one by one and conquer them.

This lesson gets repeated over and over, yet history is full of stories when it was not listened to. One of these times is recounted in the Parable of the Three Twigs of King Svatopluk.

Svatopluk (sometimes referred to as a king, sometimes as a duke) was the ruler of the Great Moravian Empire, situated in central Europe. He was arguably one of the empire's greatest rulers, having expanded its border into far-away lands.

He was a wise, but also cunning ruler, who had a knack for always coming up with the right solution to a problem. However, no one is eternal and his rule too had to come to an end. He had grown old and it was time to pass the empire he built to his sons.

The Lesson Of King Svatopluk

The story of the three twigs of King Svatopluk is a parable that tries to teach people the benefits of remaining united and not absorbed in petty squabbles.

It starts with him being on his deathbed. He summons his three sons and tells them his will. Previously, he had divided the country into three parts, each to be ruled by one of his sons, with the eldest son to become the overall ruler of the entire empire, and the two other sons being his subordinates.

Being the wise ruler that he was, he goes on to give a warning, telling them to remain united and not to go one against another. Knowing that demonstrations are often stronger than words, the dying king proceeds to try to teach them this lesson through the use of an analogy.

Svatopluk takes three twigs, binds them together and gives them to his eldest son asking him to break them. The eldest son tries his hardest, but does not succeed in breaking the three twigs. Svatopluk then gives the same three twigs to his second eldest son and then also the third. None of them succeed in breaking them.

After that, Svatopluk takes the three twigs, unbinds them and gives each of the twigs to the individual sons. He then tells the sons to try to break the individual twigs that they are holding in their hands. They succeed in doing this without much effort.

This was the lesson that he wanted to impart to them. Bound together, the three twigs are unbreakable, however when unbound and separate, each of the twigs can be broken quite easily.

The three twigs together were meant to represent the three sons united together, while the individual twigs were meant to represent what would happen to each of the sons, if they stood alone.

If they remain united, then no enemy will be able to touch them and they will live long and prosperous lives. However if they start fighting among each other, the enemy will be able to pick them off one by one and they will be destroyed.

The End Of An Empire

History has proven Svatopluk to be right. When he was dying, the Great Moravian Empire was at its largest extent, controlling territory extending from parts of Germany and southern Poland, all the way to eastern Austria, all of Hungary and into Slovenia, Serbia and western Romania. The heartland of the empire were the lands that now form the Czech Republic and Slovakia. It was the most predominant power in the region, renowned for its fierce warriors and a center of culture.

The sons unfortunately did not listen to their father. Shortly after Svatopluk died, the three sons started internal infighting, each of them trying to gain the throne for themselves.

Mojmir II was the heir and successor of Svatopluk. However his brother Svatopluk II, who ruled the Principality of Nitra, a territory within the Great Moravian Empire, rebelled against him. He was supported in this by Arnulf of Carinthia, who was the ruler of neighboring East Francia.

During the internal fighting between the brothers, large territories of the Great Moravian were either conquered by others or broke away. Pannonia was conquered by the Eastern Franks, and territories like Lusatia also ended up being conquered by Arnulf. Bohemia broke away to become an independent state.

Then in 900, the final death knell came. The much weakened, bickering and divided empire was invaded by the Hungarians, nomads originally from the steppes of Central Asia. The Hungarians wreaked havoc on the country and both brothers probably died in 906, a year of intense fighting and many battles.

After that date, the Great Moravian Empire was no more. Some of the territory lingered on as independent principalities for a few more decades, but the largest bulk of the country was conquered by the Hungarians, who ended up settling on parts of the territory and ruling the surrounding lands for almost a millennium.

The Lesson For Your Personal Life

What are the lessons be learned here? Oftentimes people don't see the forest for the tip of their nose. They engage in petty squabbles with their brothers, men who should be their natural allies, while the real enemy lurks and waits for an opportune moment to strike.

It is then very easy to pick them off one by one, since divided they fall. History has taught this lesson over and over again, yet it seems like many men of all eras don't take heed of it and don't remember this lesson.

Pride goes before the fall. Many a great man would have survived and gone on to prosper if they had heeded this maxim. Instead, hubris took over their minds and souls, they grew too ambitious and turned on their brothers and friends.

Then the real enemy hordes came, and instead of facing a united front, they faced a divided nation. This state of affairs handed the enemy the victory on a silver platter.

This is an important lesson for your personal life. Remember who your real friends and brothers are and remain united with them. Together you are stronger and can fight off any enemy. Divided, you will be easy pickings for anyone who comes along.

Read More: The Curse Of Hubris: The Rise And Fall Of The Marquis De Pombal

Peter Burns
Peter is a world traveller whose interests include fitness, history, gaining weight, learning languages and a wide variety of other things. He runs the Renaissance Man Journal.

South Korea's Draft Dodging Female President Tries To Play War Using Male-Only Conscripts

August 23, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

According to some analysts, North and South Korea are this week closer to real war than almost any other time since 1953. American troops stationed in the South, who number more than most countries' entire militaries, have been mobilized locally after North Korea declared a "quasi-state of war". The two Koreas have technically been at war for 65 years, having only ever signed a truce, not a peace treaty. Yet recent developments are creating real concern in Seoul, Washington and elsewhere, especially with artillery being fired by both sides.

Seeking to bolster her "leadership credentials," President Park Geun-hye has appeared on television with senior military commanders, dressed in combat fatigues. As the privileged daughter of South Korea's influential dictator, General Park Chung-hee, Park owes so much to her illustrious family name. Quainter still is the image of a woman trying to command a formidable martial force of more than half a million active soldiers, the backbone of which depends on male-only conscripts.

I have a personal attachment to South Korea and aside from my countrywomen, Germans and Poles, Korean is the most common nationality of the girls I have been with. The West undoubtedly has so much to learn from the more culturally proud and sophisticated East Asian nations and it is regrettable that feminism has allowed Park Geun-hye to ever walk the corridors of power when those corridors wholly depend on male martial sacrifice.

Meet the world’s most powerful draft dodger

It’s funny how they call her South Korea’s first female President and not its first draft dodger.

President Park dodged the draft, not because of any unmet legal requirements, but because she is female. No woman is compelled to serve in the South Korean military, nor were women forced to in Park’s youth. The irony of this is truly staggering. With a nuclear-armed state led by Kim Jong-un above the 38th parallel, South Koreans (and their female President) generally sleep peacefully because their brothers, sons, and boyfriends are on watch for them.

I am not advocating for compulsory military qualifications in order to be a head of state or government. What I am arguing for, by contrast, is common sense. If all men of Park’s generation were required to serve and women were not, no female of that age cohort should be allowed to ever lead South Korea or run for public office. They have absolutely zero knowledge of what it means to involuntarily serve and defend their country in a manner that millions of others, all men, do.

By chance (or good fortune, depending on your perspective), some generations in different countries will never be forcibly enlisted to serve their country, let alone fight in a conflict zone. Elevation to the highest offices is acceptable if you either did the duty foisted on all able-bodied members of an entire gender or generation, or if your age group was not one of those made to serve. Obvious exceptions or grey areas, like severe disability or the partial US Vietnam War draft, would exist, but they would be few and far between.

Feminists only recognize “gender differences” arguments where such differences benefit women

I bet Obama congratulated Park on being a “gender warrior” for women’s progress. Try to suppress your laughter as you note the irony.

From South Korea to the East Coast of America, and truly everywhere beyond, feminists are hard at work arguing for “equality” as they simultaneously handpick those areas they want privileges in. The purported “misogyny” of East Asian cultures (or Asian cultures in general) is seen around the world as an impediment to “women’s progress.”

Meanwhile, South Korean and other women enjoy the privileges attached to not being conscripted. There is no interruption to their work life and schooling, and they get the additional benefits of a flurry of measures to encourage “female participation” in multiple workplace and other arenas.

Their male relatives and friends are paid about US$100 per month for the rigors of a brutal “tutelage” in the art (and science) of war. Though necessary to acclimatize these young men to what would be an intensely savage showdown with the perpetually militarized North, it undermines any idea that women get the short end of the straw in South Korean society. The responsibilities are all on South Korean men, as is the increasing Western-style guilt for their role in creating the “patriarchy” that supposedly oppresses their wives, girlfriends, mothers, sisters and daughters.

Some who commented on a previous conscription article of mine about Finland tended to assume I want women conscripted. Like then, however, my purpose now is to identify the inherent hypocrisy of feminists and indeed millions of women. Intensive civilian service is a definite option for women to get off their backsides and assist their country. But the first task is locating the double standards and juxtaposing them with the fake rhetoric of feminism.

Check your privilege, Park Geun-hye

No woman should be allowed to seek public office in South Korea without two years of full-time, laborious service for their country.

When she was elected, Park Geun-hye promised a "zero-tolerance" approach to provocations from Pyongyang. That's an easy statement to make when you never did any serving or fighting yourself, even as you watched every male your age march off to a barracks. Park is probably the most privileged female leader of the past half-century, and there have been many with extraordinary privilege during that time.

As much as political dynasties love to keep power in the family, I cannot help but think that General Park is turning in his grave, wondering how someone as martially unqualified as his daughter could ever be allowed to lead South Korea.

This is, after all, a nation that must constantly calculate as to whether to send its millions of sons into the inferno of battle against the world's most bellicose regime.

Read More: The Case Is Building Against South Korean Women

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why Did Caitlyn Jenner Get A Bravery Award After Her Role In A Fatal Car Accident?

August 24, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Earlier this year, Bruce-Caitlin Jenner was involved in a fatal car accident, which killed 69-year-old Kim Howe. Facing lawsuits from Howe's family and at least one of the four others injured, Jenner remains unbelievably reticent about the event. In the meantime, ESPN bestowed an ESPY (Excellence in Sports Performance Yearly) Award on her, the quaintly named "Arthur Ashe Award" for courage.

The juxtaposition of the silence over the fatal car crash, where all available evidence points to Jenner being responsible, and the subsequent accolade presented on national television is laughable.

It seems incontrovertible that Jenner's car hit Howe's, which then swerved into another vehicle. Video of the incident is here. In a state where during large parts of the 2000s people have been sent to jail for decades over repeated minor offences like shoplifting (the "Three Strikes" law), it is perplexing that the transgender "icon" may only face a misdemeanor charge of vehicular manslaughter. Beyond legal definitions of what happened, who can argue that Jenner is causally responsible for the death of a senior citizen?

Because of her transition, Caitlin Jenner has made millions of dollars. My previous assertion that transitioning would dovetail nicely with massive attention for the usually sidelined TV personality has been vindicated. She also broke the Twitter record for the fastest accumulation of one million followers, only requiring four hours. A longstanding millionaire and former Olympian, it is hard to see how someone like Jenner wasn't in the most favorable position of all to "come out."

Supporters will point to her many detractors, but if having detractors is somehow a reason for a bravery award, the far more reviled Floyd Mayweather should have won instead. Or how about a former sportsman who becomes a Congressman and earns a mere $200,000 for their efforts, even as hundreds of thousands of their constituents curse them every day?

Jenner's economic privilege is on full display

Teenage college basketball player Lauren Hill didn't get millions of dollars for her brain cancer diagnosis. Rather, she spent her time raising money for the disease in a bid to help people like herself. Whose courage do you prefer, hers or Jenner's?

It's amusing how SJWs and others pontificate about "white," "male," and "cis" privilege but forget that they themselves and those they praise are routinely the beneficiaries of enormous economic privilege. Though I found her underlying assumptions silly ("you're a woman if you think you're one"), Meredith Talusan raises an interesting point about Jenner's substantial wealth. Many of the ignominies that transgender advocates claim affect the lives of transitioning people, such as employment discrimination, poverty, and violence, clearly do not apply to the former decathlon competitor.

Bruce Jenner's transition to Caitlyn Jenner has coincided with the single biggest raise he-she has ever had. If Jenner had seen her income reduced to 5% of what it was before, the SJW argument behind the giving of the award would be "stronger,", albeit still weak in light of cases like injured soldiers and cancer sufferers involved with sport.

Take Iraq War veteran and double-amputee Noah Galloway, for example, who participates in CrossFit and endurance events after nearly dying whilst serving his country. Many people erroneously claimed that he was the "runner-up" to Jenner for the award. Nonetheless, he did, in a sense, "lose out" because, despite immeasurably greater bravery, he didn't get the ESPY.

Social reengineering is now infecting sports

What a joke it is that Caitlyn Jenner can "beat" someone like Noah Galloway.

ESPN was undoubtedly obsessed with "making history" in its deplorable decision to elevate Caitlyn Jenner to social sainthood. The problem is, other outlets will now compete to outdo their rivals in the dance of political correctness. We have already seen this regarding non-transgender feminism and the Super Bowl, a male event in which females have no chance of ever competing.

The "Like a Girl" propaganda edict blatantly hid away from the fact that women deliberately avoid challenging men in professional sports. Similar lies and stories of pseudo-victimhood emerged following the NBA's partnership with self-serving-but-I'll-still-use-feminism Sheryl Sandberg.

So what's the result? Manipulating the public's praise is now largely determined by the categories (female, gay, transgender) to which recipients belong, irrespective of whether the praise is warranted, exaggerated or just plain made up. Caitlyn Jenner wins an award because she's transgender, not because of any meaningful and critical analysis of how specifically she has exhibited bravery, and how this compares to others who are intrinsically more deserving of such recognition.

What happened to acknowledging true bravery?

Didn’t serve in Iraq, didn’t get cancer, didn’t live in poverty.

Can you imagine a senior NBA or NFL athlete being applauded for “coming out,” not by saying they’re gay or transgender, but by decrying the marginalized state of modern men? This hypothetical sportsman could point to male rates of suicide, the lower criminal sentences women receive for the same crime, the woefully weak threshold for court or college rape convictions, and the blind attitude taken to male victims of violence, who outnumber female victims.

Not only would this athlete lose many or all sponsorships, they would likely be isolated and then kicked off their team. They would sacrifice almost everything in making these realities more appreciated. So what awards would come their way? None, really, aside from the silent or muted agreement of millions of men, the backing of conservative alternative media, and the support of ROK and the manosphere. There would be no golden shower of money, fame and attention à la Caitlyn Jenner.

If you want to read a proper fairytale about a man who transitions to bravery, I suggest you read about the crucifixion of Jesus. Caityln Jenner’s tale is just the real-life equivalent of a trashy pulp novel.

Read More: Is Bruce Jenner Having A Sex Change Because Females In His Family Get More Attention?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Descent Into Violence Of Algeria’s Civil War

August 24, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Last week, we discussed Algeria’s war of independence from France in the 1950s. We will now turn our attention to another conflict in that beautiful but unfortunate country: the civil war between the government and Islamist insurgents which took place between 1990 to 1998. The civil war ended in a victory for the Algerian government.

Since the government was essentially of the same political party (the FLN) that had successfully fought for independence, Algeria’s FLN offers that rarest of examples in the history of modern conflict: an organization that both waged a successful insurgency, and suppressed an insurgency. It is critical that these conflicts be thoroughly understood. It is unfortunate that, for the most part, they are almost completely unknown in the West.

I happened to discuss the origins of the war with an Arabic-speaking Algerian laborer in Croatia in 2000. In the most basic terms, the war’s genesis can be traced to social and economic conditions that had been simmering in the country since the 1970s. Algeria had seen a population explosion in the decades after independence in 1962, but the government had failed to provide infrastructure and employment opportunities on a sufficient scale. Massive unemployment left large numbers of marginalized, angry youths with nothing to do but attend sermons by radicalized clerics.

Petroleum and gas prices had stagnated or collapsed in the 1980s and 1990s, depriving the country of significant revenue. Deep social fissures also existed in the cities: wealthy, foreign-educated youth were perceived as receiving special employment benefits to the detriment of poorer Algerians from the countryside. Widespread corruption added to public resentment of the government.

Military vehicle on the streets of Algiers after the 1991 coup.

These conditions provided the tinder which would soon kindled into flames. In 1988, in an incident called the “Black October Riots,” government security forces killed an estimated 500 protesters in Algiers. It was the worst example of violence in the country since independence, and was a harbinger of things to come.

The immediate cause of armed conflict was the national parliamentary election campaign of 1991. The Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), an opposition party, was about to defeat the ruling party (FLN). Rather than see this happen, the military cancelled the elections after the first round, seized power, and removed reformist president Chadli Benjedid from office. The government then banned the FIS and jailed thousands of its members.

It was a shocking reversal, and one which passed nearly without comment in Western Europe and America. None of the Western powers wanted to see an Islamist government on the shores of the western Mediterranean, possibly stirring up trouble and exporting its ideology to European shores.

The Islamist opposition went underground and organized itself into armed groups. The Armed Islamic Movement (MIA), the Islamic Salvation Army (AIS), and the extremely hard-line Armed Islamic Group (GIA) were the major belligerents on the insurgent side.

The insurgent tactics were to attack symbols of the government: police officers, police stations, government buildings, and anyone who voiced support for the government. The mountainous regions of Algeria provided a secure base of operations for the MIA and the AIS.

One of the most disturbing features of the conflict was the indiscriminate targeting of civilians and foreigners. The GIA was largely responsible for this “innovation”, and it sprang from its idea that civilians would be forced to choose sides in the conflict. There were grisly examples of whole villages being massacred by the mid-1990s, and in many cases it was not clear who was responsible.

Insurgent groups blamed the government, or government-supported militias; the government blamed the massacres on the fanaticism of the Islamic groups. The wholesale intelligence penetration by the government of some of the insurgent groups makes the question even murkier. Who was doing what to whom is not a simple question. What now seems clear, however, is that atrocities were committed by both sides, but the majority of it must be laid at the feet of Islamist groups.

Orthodox counter-insurgency doctrine would suggest that the government would try to "win over" the hearts and minds of the population, in order to deprive the insurgents of support. In one of the basic innovations of the war, however, the government chose not to go down this route. Instead, it employed three simple but direct methods:

1. Massive intelligence collection, and penetration of insurgent groups by spies and informers.
2. The creation of a pervasive climate of fear, in which no one would know who to trust.
3. Maximum violence in targeting and liquidating insurgents and their supporters.

In this regard, the Algerian government's tactics more resembled the counter-insurgency efforts of El Salvador's government in the 1980s, than it did the efforts of the Sri Lankan government against the Tamil rebels in the early 2000s.

The atmosphere of repression made the average citizen fearful of even being seen in public with a bearded man, who might be taken for an Islamist sympathizer. Random roadblocks, arrests and detentions, and various government "decoy" Islamist groups, all added to the perception that the government was winning. No one knew who to trust.

As related by one writer, a bitter but honest joke gives an idea of what it was like to be in Algeria during this time:

> A man is stopped by a roadblock. The hooded men ask him if he supports the government or the GIA. He replies 'the government' so they cut his right ear off. Shortly after, he is stopped by another roadblock of hooded men. They ask him the same question. When he replies 'the GIA' they cut his left ear off. The following day he goes to the doctor, who asks him which part of his face he wants sewn up first. 'My mouth, so I cannot speak,' he replies.

According to some analysts, the government deliberately fostered the GIA violence against civilians in the hope that it would rally domestic and international support. Through the use of decoys, infiltrators, and agents-provocateurs, it supposedly fanned the flames of Islamist violence.

This is not an easy assertion to prove one way or another. Without doubt, the successful government intelligence penetration of the insurgents contributed to its victory. But the insurgents hardly needed anyone to encourage them to commit violence: they were perfectly capable of doing it themselves.

The government also was successful in winning the political war. Neither France, Spain, nor any other European country in the vicinity was excited about the prospect of an Islamist takeover of Algeria. Algeria's government received financial, intelligence, and moral support from European nations, while the insurgents were forced to rely on the uncertain support of worldwide Islamist networks. Islamist guerrilla forces probably never numbered more than 40,000 men by the insurgency's high point in 1994.

The atmosphere of repression and suspicion helped the government in other ways. The Islamist groups began to splinter off and fight amongst themselves. By 1995, the AIS and the GIA began openly to fight each other; the GIA refused to negotiate with the government, while the AIS favored a dialogue to end the conflict.

With the election of President President Abdelaziz Bouteflika in 1999, the government began to wind the war down. Bouteflika brilliantly passed an amnesty law which was largely successful in causing most of the remaining insurgents to give up armed struggle. At the same time, he took care to maintain an iron grip on the security situation. This combination of reconciliation and repression worked.

Of course, some disaffected and marginalized cells of Islamists remain, which at this point are little more than terrorist branches of the Al Qaeda network. But the fact remains that the Algerian government's strategy and tactics were successful in first containing, and then destroying, a dedicated and well-established armed insurgency.

The achievement is not an inconsiderable one, especially when we contrast it to the ineptitude of the governments of Syria and Iraq in dealing with their own insurgent problems (although it must be said in fairness that the challenges faced by Iraq and Syria are very different from what existed in Algeria).

Read More: The Algerian War Of Independence

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Fake Conservative Megyn Kelly Exposes Her Anti-Trump Agenda During Presidential Debate

August 25, 2015 | by JD Unwin | Link | Original Link

It's no surprise to anyone with a critical perspective that Fox news has moved further and further left (thanks to the rising influence of Rupert Murdoch's progressive seed James) but what has become surprising is the ease and speed in which it's taking place. From Glenn Beck's ouster to Bill O' Reilly's increasingly progressive pandering nature, it's clear that Fox should no longer be considered a bastion of conservative philosophy, if indeed it ever was.

This brings me to the recent republican presidential debate, where Fox news closet feminist Megyn Kelly took aim at Donald Trump with "gotcha" style questions that would have been more commonly associated originating on MSNBC.

Here's how she addressed her remarks to Trump, with a superficial setup no less disingenuous than the "you're a great guy" breakup speech a man might typically get; which Meg then uses as her launching pad to attack:

Trump's response is classic, in that he emphasizes how political correctness has become too much of a problem in the US as only he can. He also gave a slight warning to Kelly when he called her on her "war on women" bullshit, which any man watching on the manosphere would have applauded.

One can perceive from Megyn's sternness and body language that she's taking the past verbiage by Trump personally. Her response is seething with anger, dripping with feminist condescension (cue an eye roll at the 32 second mark) and loaded with potshots that would knock most men for a loop in a live televised debate.

The fact that Trump didn't miss a beat is a testament to his chutzpah and his defiance of political correctness. Say what you will about the Donald, but one thing you can't say about him is that he lacks the backbone to defend his remarks. He truly embodies the confidence the alpha masculine man is supposed to represent at least in regards to an opposition to PC.

Don't tell me to make you a sandwich, that's what a husband is for!

To be fair, Donald was wrong to state that his remarks were only against Rosie O'Donnell. Regardless, Megyn's questions were better suited to the context of a one-on-one interview, where these types of "hard hitting" questions would be appropriate. For her to do so on a live debate where a candidate is only given a certain amount of time to respond is sheer bias on her part, possibly with the blessing of her superiors.

The Many Faces Of Megyn Kelly

A lot of people on the right make the assumption Kelly is conservative, when in reality she is far from it. Here's just a few examples of her CINO (conservative in name only) feminist tendencies, courtesy of Megyn herself.

Despite being a self-described Catholic she nonetheless defies biblical gender roles, most notably in her "what makes me submissive and you dominant?" remark here:

How about this homosexual agenda supporting remark?

> This country has a long history of discrimination against certain groups. Eventually we wind up getting it right. Right? Against women, against blacks, the civil rights movement and so on. And in justifying that discrimination when it was in place, some folks turn to the Bible and turn to their religious beliefs and said we have to have slavery because it's in the Bible. Women have to be second-class citizens because that's in the Bible. Blacks and whites can't get married > because that's in the Bible. That wound up in a case. A judge wrote that in an opinion, which the Supreme Court ultimately struck that down, saying that's not right, judge-the Equal Protection clause says you can't do that. Why is gay marriage any different?

While i can't provide video on the previous quote because it's been scrubbed from the net (interestingly enough), I can provide referenced video of Kelly's not so subtle support for the homosexual agenda here, where she makes the farcical comparison between interracial marriage and homosexual marriage and tries to excuse it with a "I'm just expressing what they're feeling" disclaimer:

> But before I get back to Richard on that, there was a time in this country in which interracial marriage was not lawful. And the Supreme Court had to step in and say, 'That's wrong. Under the U.S. Constitution, under the Equal Protection clause, whites can marry blacks and states are not free to tell them otherwise.' And those that advocate on behalf of this issue, Maggie, they say this is another, sort of, iteration of that.

She can hide behind the excuse of simply voicing an opinion for those that "advocate on behalf of this issue," but that only works when you don't voice an opinion that sounds like support every single time the issue comes up. Nice try Meg.

I can see the blood coming out of her…wherever!

For another example: Megyn displays her profound ignorance of our system of law when she arrogantly declares:

> "like it or not the SCOTUS has the final say."

With regard to the recent SCOTUS ruling on homosexual marriage, someone should ask Megyn if she still believes Dredd Scott is law.

https://youtu.be/NDWfS3Z86kw

Now let's take a moment to explore Kelly's personal past. What drew her to the attention of FOX as someone with a marketable appeal? Was it her legal career? Nope.

Her time as an ABC reporter? No.

It was the fact that she has a great pair of assets which Brit Hume became aware of in 2004.

My milkshake brings all the Brit Humes to the yard…

We got more of an understanding of the feminism that Meg secretly supports (and the looks that cover them) in a Dec 2010 GQ spread in which she stated:

> "Hmm. I respect women like Gloria Steinem who paved the way. But when you say "feminist" now, there is a message that if you are too sexy and you acknowledge that part of your personality publicly, then it's somehow an affront to women. And I reject that."

Notice she never actually rejects the feminist label, she simply rejects what it has come to represent. This is why I consider her a neo-feminist, because her own remarks paint her as a closet lipstick leftist who is skilled in the marketing of her assets, but can't very well call herself a feminist at a network largely perceived to be conservative. It would be career suicide.

From earlier this year:

> I hate to sound like I'm about 200 but half naked girls, I mean like seriously it's really in your face everywhere you turn you're trying to raise a kid in a G rated world and you can't because the world seems to be R rated everywhere.

Contrast that remark with the R rated image of her earlier…would Gloria Steinem approve?

Couldn't have said it better myself

Contrast this as well: Her petulant position over Trump's remarks about women's looks (Using the words "Hillary Clinton" as her shield) with her 2010 interview with Howard Stern, where she discussed (her) breast and (men's) penis size while he was busy objectifying her. Does anyone else besides me detect just a whiff of hypocrisy here?

https://youtu.be/IML_UGhXz2Q

And here's an interview she had with neo-feminist Christina Hoff Summers, where she proceeded to gush all over her. Take special note where Megyn describes her as "conservative author" while Christina later self describes as a "moderate liberal feminist." I would recommend a nice face-palm here but it appears Megyn beat us to it.

Megyn's numerous politically left of center remarks make her at best conservative leaning, nothing more*. Take* it from someone who used to watch FOX news religiously, not everything that sounds conservative over there actually is…Meg is no exception.

You’re fired! Just kidding! But seriously, next time you’re fired

At this point It’s become no surprise that online left wing rags like Salon have been coming to her defense, as they too recognize a feminist in need of support against the “big bad sexist” Donald Trump. I thought women were strong enough to handle themselves.

Given her much-deserved collective ass kicking from Trump and conservative giants like Mark Levin and Michael Savage over the presidential debate fiasco, it would seem rumors of female empowerment have been greatly exaggerated by the disinformation media, especially given Megyn’s sudden coincidental vacation.

Much the same way that the Canadian progressives have declared war on Roosh, so too have a lot of online feminists declared war against Trump using Megyn Kelly as an excuse. Typical. Look for her to divorce and marry for a third time. These “empowered” types can never hold down a marriage for long. You heard it here first. You won’t hear it on FOX, of course.

Read More: Why Do You Care About The News?

JD Unwin

Jack Daniels Unwin is an aspiring author currently employed in the medical field and is a former ET employee of NASA. Being fluent in 4 languages including the language of seduction makes communication a lot simpler with the human females. He once asked out a deaf girl in sign but she signed him back with a middle finger so he took it as a no. Having worked for various other government agencies during his lifetime allowed him to reach a simple conclusion: all of them sucked. Sadly he was never a secret agent although he wouldn't mind becoming one if it meant rescuing several damsels in distress, and that dress.

Cold-Sensitive Feminist Crusaders Berate Patriarchal Air Conditioning

August 25, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A study in the peer-reviewed journal Nature has postulated that females are more cold-sensitive than males and that standard air conditioning temperatures "favor" middle-aged men in work environments. Leaving to the side unresolved "non-issues" like other peer-reviewed studies showing female offenders receive 60% shorter sentences for the same crime, or the fact that men comprise at least two-thirds of homicide victims in a culture supposedly all about attacking women, media outlets have clearly taken up one of the most important and egregious calamities of our time.

Women evidently have nothing else to complain about in the Western world. Of course, defenders of the story (especially those strangely paid to first write about it) will claim it is light-hearted. But the mere act of giving this story attention makes a farce of the actual challenges facing (and derailing) society.

With the 1-in-5-women sexual assault "statistic" and the wage gap "reality" thoroughly debunked, feminists and pro-feminist media platforms have less and less at their disposal to moan about. They have consequently broken through the bottom of the barrel and are now resorting to raking up the mud with their fingertips.

No one should be surprised about this story

Male Fortune 500 CEOs, store clerks and homeless men, amongst all others, are conspiring against women both rich and poor.

Given that the vast majority of viewers and those reading the story in print have responded to this bizarre piece with a collective "riiiiiiiiight," it has served as nothing but click-bait. Feminist sources which responded sarcastically to the news, such as Jezebel, are missing the point, however. They should in no sense be surprised by this headline, which is of the kind they have directly helped to engender (pardon the pun).

Because Jezebel and other mediums see no story that falls outside the prism of "the oppressed female," preposterous wastes of energy like the air conditioning story are bound to proliferate. As rather or considerably privileged women with gender studies "degrees" like Jessica Valenti bash away on their keyboards, they eventually run out of events that even they consider important to their cause.

This "interview" on Sky News tries to give the veneer of being tongue-in-cheek but fails spectacularly at it. When Telegraph "columnist" Radhika Sanghani starts talking about flexibility, common sense, and an "issue," expect your eyes to involuntarily roll over and your head to shake from left to right uncontrollably.

When women at work move in their dresses, half the time you can see their panties

This is actually a very modest example of a woman dressed for work (and not for temperature regulation).

I call this phenomenon “white line fever” but invariably you see much, much more than just a sliver of silk or cotton lingerie. Focused on maintaining the latest fashion trends, whatever the weather, and unapologetically flaunting their sexuality, many women are lucky to have two-thirds of the surface of their body covered. So I have to say, like you, I am absolutely shocked to learn that women are cold in offices.

In the Sky News video, the female anchor’s dress has no sleeves, for example. Unlike many or most items of male clothing, the gap between female professional and casual fashion is much, much smaller. Oftentimes it is difficult to distinguish a woman going to work and one about to gallivant through a nightclub district. Only the presence of a sun or moon can usually tell you which sort of woman is which.

Oh, the outrage!

[image]
A good explanation of why countless women feel too cold in the office.

Whether by infantilizing women or trying to make men change to adapt to all of their “needs” (basically the same thing), stories like the cringeworthy air conditioning piece remind us how aggrandizing and indulgent modern society is to every female. Men are now expected to take personal blame for the incredibly small minority of men who sexually assault or rape women. Or sacrifice their own career prospects so otherwise undeserving women can balance the number of men in higher positions.

Now our unacceptable patriarchal air conditioning oppression of women needs to be addressed, too. The merry-go-round of male privilege has never stopped, it seems, and without serious redirection, women are bound to inexorably suffer in chilly office cubicles for eternity.

Or maybe, just maybe, women can enter the workplace with an extra layer of clothing or, better yet, not dress as scantily as hookers.

Read More: Jessica Valenti Insists That "Patriarchal Superstructures" Make Women Commit Suicide

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

14 Ways To Add Edge To Your Style

August 25, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Chronodos

Suppose we asked 100 men if they would rather:

1. Own a brand new Lamborghini.

or

2. Own a used Volkswagen.

What would they chose?

Obviously we all know the answer – they would prefer to own the Lamborghini.

Why?

Because looks matter – at least initially.

In my experience (dating & bedding 60+ beautiful women before turning 25) this is something that is often overlooked – yet should never be underestimated.

There are many ways to improve your looks. Getting ripped or getting a tan are two of them. I firmly believe that in addition to fixing these fundamentals, adding edge to your image can work wonders.

Just to clarify, I define an edgy style as a style that sexualizes your image and increases your likelihood to make a strong first impression.

A man with an edgy style has more sex appeal than one who doesn't. Guys with edge stand out from the crowd like that sexy ass Lamborghini. They are the 'bad boys' girls want to hook up with – over and over again.

In this article I'm going to share 14 ways you can start adding edge to your style. There is no need to implement all the suggestions – but I want to give you some ideas to get the ball rolling. In the end it's up to you to decide what fits your personality best.

1. Get inked.

It should come as no surprise that women love guys with tattoos. The media has done a fine job of creating an image in their mind of what a bad boy should look like – and rarely are tattoos not included.

2. Get a sharp haircut.

A good hairstyle can make a massive difference on your overall image. In my experience, the most edgy looks are those with an undercut or those with long hair (shoulder length). If you got curly hair – definitely go for the long-hair option. My wingman kills it simply because of this.

3. Get a necklace.

Whether it's a dog tag, a sabre-tooth or a Maori pendant, a lot of women love guys with a necklace. There is a reason you often see guys wearing one while he is fucking a beautiful girl in the movies – it sends out a badboy vibe.

4. Get a leather jacket.

Oh how I love the classics. Leather jackets perfectly fit the badboy stereotype and instantly add edge to any man. Make sure you get one made from real leather though.

5. Get leather boots.

When I say leather boots I don't mean biker boots that look like they were made in the 70s. Rather, I mean smooth boots that are both fashionable and edgy.

6. Get (leather) bracelets.

Any type of bracelet is a good way to add edge to your style. If you want to rock a beachy look go for stuff made from wood, otherwise, I would recommend you to stick with semi-shiny (leather) bracelets. Don't go overboard though – remember that less is more.

7. Get a ring.

No I don't mean get married. A simple, small black or silver ring often does the trick. For some reason it intrigues women why you are wearing one – don't ask me why.

8. Get pierced.

If done tactfully a piercing will instantly launch you in the upper echelons of sex appeal. I know a guy for example with a nipple piercing (clearly visible through his shirts) who absolutely cleans out house parties. Places to consider: nipples, eyebrows, tongue, and ears.

9. Get a beanie, cap, or hat.

Once upon a time I started a little experiment by writing down what I was wearing on days I received the highest number of looks and eye-smiles. Lo and behold, my best days were those when I would be wearing a beanie or cap.

10. Get a beard.

Personally I can't grow a beard even if my life depended on it. That being said, men with good scruff or a beard are perceived as higher value by women and suggest he is not too pre-occupied with his style and lives like a badass. Do I hear wet panties drop?

11. Get denim wear.

Whether it's a nice pair of jeans, a shirt or a button-down, anything made from denim has a high 'James Dean' factor which creates that boyish yet edgy look. Grab a cigarette to complete the look (semi kidding).

12. Get colored contact lenses.

Okay so this one is a bit controversial but let's keep an open mind here. Getting colored contact lenses can completely change your look in an instant. If you are fairly tanned and have dark hair you will destroy with light colored eyes. If you are blonde and fair skinned prepare to clean out with brownish tones.

13. Get a good pair of sunglasses.

Again the media is responsbile for this one. Show me a badass blowing shit up and I'll show you a badass wearing a good pair of sunglasses.

And last but not least..

14. Get a leather wristwatch.

One of my pet projects right now is www.chronodos.com,where we sell artisan leather wristwatches. I own several myself, and so far all our customers are ecstatic about their watches. They serve as solid conversation starters and the bold designs and leather cuffs make them easily stand out from all the others.

I understand they might not be for everyone – and that's okay.

That being said, I invite you to go ahead and take a look to see if there is something you like. The added value lies in the handmade leather cuffs.

If you want a badboy leather accessory – this is your best bet. It will certainly add solid edge to your style—and you will get noticed.

Many times women were able to come and talk to me because I made it easier for them to actually compliment me on my watch. You should expect similar effects, at the very least.

Pour conclure

As a man it is your duty to present yourself the best way possible. I highly encourage you to add edge to your style to increase your sex appeal and badboy image.

Once I started adding edge to my style my results began to skyrocket. I've seen similar results in many close friends of mine who I helped out.

Let's consider this 'sponsored' post a medium for us to discuss edge and help each other maximize our sex appeal and looks.

If you have any questions about the watches or articles don't hesitate to leave a comment in the section below.

This is me in case you are wondering. The watch I'm wearing is one of the watches we sell at Chronodos and is called "Explorer." As you can see, I actually support what I sell.

Hopefully this was helpful. Remember, if you are looking for some good leather badboy accessories our artisan wristwatches might be right up your alley.

I'll see you at www.chronodos.com

You can use the following coupon code to receive an INSTANT 5% discount:
5%CHRONODISCOUNT

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

8 Proven Methods To Stay Unattached To Your Friends With Benefits

August 26, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Whether you’re a man who has chosen to be a lifelong womanizer or indulging in some reckless slut slaying before settling down for a while, we all know that one of the main components of the player lifestyle is staying emotionally unattached to women who don’t provide value outside of notches.

Any man who has experience with women will tell you this is much easier said than done. The fact of the matter is that the longer you have sex with a woman, the greater the odds become that you’ll eventually catch feelings for her, even if she may not be all that high value—it’s a mathematical inevitability.

There are, however, quite a few ways for you to keep those feelings at arm’s length and remain the stoic pussy pirate you set out to be when you first started banging her. Here are my top eight:

8. Share very little personal information with her

This would be a good place to start

One of the main things a woman does to lock a man down is pretending to be the woman she thinks he wants her to be. Red pill awareness forces men to realize that most women within the context of a sexual relationship are actresses.

A female will quite literally mold herself into the woman she believes her man wants her to be in every way, and the way she accomplishes this is finding out what makes him tick.

To steer clear of this pitfall it's imperative that you share very little personal information with her. This doesn't mean you're not going to share anything with her. It's natural for nuggets of personal info about yourself to slip every once in a while during conversation.

But long talks about your hopes and dreams, past relationships, and the like are a no-no if you want to keep her from fine tuning her personality to trap you into committing to her.

Sometimes girls realize your lack of forthrightness and will straight up ask you: "So what are you looking for in a woman?" My go to answer for this is:

> I'm not really sure, but I'll know it when I see it.

7. Limit your time with her

Less is more

I touched on this in the introduction and this cannot be overstated. Your time, being your most valuable commodity, is also her most valuable commodity. She knows that the more she occupies your time, the more attached you'll become.

The two rules I employ to keep this from happening to me with girls I don't see as long-term contenders are: 1) don't spend consecutive nights with her and 2) don't take her out.

Now it's not always going to work out this way. When the sex is awesome and you don't have anything else lined up for the following night, you may decide to plunder her pussy for a second straight night on occasion, and sometimes you may want to let her tag along when you grab a bite to eat every once in a while.

It's no big deal to bend these rules every now and then, but so long as you're exercising discipline and not making it a habit, you'll be able to maintain frame and keep her scarcity mentality in tact.

6. Do not spend money on her

[image]
Hos aren't worth it

This should go without saying but even the most experienced players will slip on this particular banana peel.

Girls are keenly aware that man's investment of any sort is necessary to secure a commitment from him. Emotional investment is what she's after because she knows financial investment comes soon after.

If she's a low-level girl, don't let her get her foot in the door in the slightest. If you're at the movies, say "You get the tickets, I'll get the popcorn." If you're out getting food, make her pay her own way. Not only will this increase her respect for you while simultaneously decreasing any perceived thirst, this lets her know that the your arrangement is strictly sexual and nothing else.

This doesn't mean you shouldn't pony up $4 for her coffee or any other situation where it's just a few bucks for whatever she's getting. You definitely need to avoid being viewed as an ATM, but being a cheapskate is a huge turnoff.

Just remember that at the end of the day this is the ironclad rule you must adhere to in order to keep her from getting a foothold on your finances or emotions.

5. Do not name her contact on your phone

This may seem inconsequential and unnecessary but I can assure you that nothing could be further from the truth on both counts.

Assigning a name for any given FWB automatically creates an emotional commitment to her. That commitment may be small, but it’s significant nonetheless. When you replace her number with “Michelle” it psychologically elevates her status which automatically lowers your value.

However, by not assigning her name to her number keeps her status at exactly what it should be—a number. True players know that a woman they've fucked is no more important than any of the others so there's no need to give her the privilege of being given a name in your phone.

Personally, I like to assign names of objects, verbs, sex acts etc. to my stable such as "Anal on 1st," "B.J. addict," or "Swallower 2." Not only does this help me keep them straight by word association via objectification (which further disconnects you to them emotionally), it comes in handy when I get a text from one after not hearing from them for a while and texting back "who is this" which almost never fails to moisten her panties.

So whether you decide to leave her number in as just a phone number, take the Donovan Sharpe objectification method (patent pending), or put your own personal spin on it, whatever you do do not use her name. If you do, you may as well assign the name "My Everything," "Soulmate," "My Love," or whatever other name that would make the vast majority of the ROK readership to throw up in our mouths.

4. NEVER introduce her to family or friends

Huge no no

This is another obvious one but I see dudes violating this commandment on the regular and it almost always causes problems.

Once you introduce her to family or friends it a) elevates her status in everyone's eyes b) gives her a backdoor entrance to learn more about you which is essential to molding her personality to fit your desires, and c) allows her to infiltrate your inner circle, which makes it very difficult to get rid of her.

All women are cognizant of what's at stake in terms of being introduced to the people you trust and love which is why the are always pushing to meet or hang out with your family and friends.

Be especially aware of dark triad women or women with dark triad traits. These chicks will start the process of manipulation immediately because when the shit hits the fan (and it will) you'll realize much too late that everyone around you has been brainwashed to the point that they'll automatically take her side and even assist her in your dismantling.

Dark triad or not, it would behoove you to stay extremely vigilant of keeping your fuck friends away from your most stable social infrastructures like your friends and family.

3. Only text for logistical reasons

Setting up the date

This is another rule in Pickup 101. But women are very good at creating a crevice of conversation out of nothing to draw you into long conversations in order to extrapolate valuable information out of you. Even I fall into this trap sometimes.

The solutions to this are simple. When she tries to strike up conversation with open ended questions like "So what are you up to?" or "Do you have any brothers or sisters?" you can either ignore the probe completely or just give brief answers like "stuff" or "yep."

The only extended conversations via text should be setting up the time, day, and venue of your meetup and even then your texts should be short and sweet: "I'm going to xyz bar at 10pm Friday night. Meet me there."

Anything outside of logistical texting is setting yourself up for failure on many levels.

2. Assume she's fucking someone else

Don’t take it personal playa….that’s how they are

If you have a fuck buddy arrangement with even a decent looking American woman there’s a pretty good chance she’s fucking at least one other dude on the side.

Men are territorial by nature and rarely commit to women who show signs of sexual disloyalty (thirsty simps notwithstanding). As a man with a good understanding of a woman’s true nature, resolving your mind to the fact that she’s probably getting cozy with someone else will automatically disconnect your emotions.

Your logic tells you that low-investment, perfidious pussy, while good in the short term for getting your dick wet on the regular and keeping your abundance mentality operational, is a bad bet in terms of any sort of commitment. As a result, you’ll find it very difficult, if not impossible to catch feelings for her.

1. Ignore what she says

Don’t fall for this shit

Ever heard these before?

“I’ve never felt this way about anyone.”

“I feel so safe and protected with you.”

“I know we’re just fuck buddies but I swear you’re the only one I’m fucking right now.”

And the big one….

“I think I’m falling in love with you.” Or something to that effect.

Me too. I’ve bought into these statements before and after some reflection I’ve found that these proclamations were probably untrue at the time they were stated.

The best defense against this beta bait is to ignore it. All of it.

Girls throw this particular brand of bullshit out to try and rope you in and elevate themselves out of bargain basement pussy status. It’s also a subconscious shit test to see if you’re as gullible as the last mangina she played like a fiddle while she fucked her way through every member of the local cover band.

Never forget that what women say and what women do are two different things. Even if they truly believe what they are telling you at the time it’s important to keep in mind that it can and (likely) will change in a heartbeat the minute you lose frame, a better option comes along, or for no reason at all.

Do these apply to all fuck buddies?

You bet your ass it does. Any girl who agrees to be your pussy pal and nothing more needs to kept away from your emotions, your resources, and your inner circle. Access to any of these will ultimately lead to your undoing.

Keeping all of these rules in mind when running a harem will all but assure that you’ll never get emotionally roped in by a woman who deserves nothing more than a roll in the hay.

Read Next: 8 Essential Rules For Banging A Single Mom

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Labour’s Candidate For London Mayor Pledges To Ban “Sexist” Ads On Tube

August 26, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Tessa Jowell, long-serving MP and Labour candidate for Mayor of London, has promised that she will ban “sexist” adverts on the London tube if she is elected. Jowell’s vacuous promise cashes in on the recent outrage over Protein World’s “Beach Body Ready” adverts, which upset the Lobby of the Perpetually Offended as it featured a slim, attractive female in a bikini which caused hamplanets so much anger they filed nearly 400 complaints with the Advertising Standards Agency.

At a time when Her Majesty’s Most Loyal Opposition is embroiled in a major crisis over its leadership, Jowell’s opportunistic comments reveal the misplaced priorities of a Labour party in terminal decline.

Jowell, whose mayoral campaign is in full swing, told the Evening Standard that images of “emaciated and unhealthy-looking” models will be outlawed on the public transport system if she becomes mayor. “Women ought to be able to travel in an environment which doesn’t constantly demean them or present an unrealistic image of women’s bodies,” she told the Standard‘s independent, empowered special snowflake readership.

The Establishment leftist failed to specify what exactly was “unrealistic” about Candice Swanenpoel, the vegan fitness model who stars in Protein World’s controversial ad.

Candice Swanenpoel, the model behind Beach Body Ready has had her natural frame denigrated by feminists as “unrealistic”

The proposed censorship is part of a package of bizarre policies which tap into the true spirit of Loony Left, purporting to “promote equality for London women,” and includes forcing companies to check whether they are paying women employees the same as men for similar work.

Protein World: a quintessentially millennial scandal

The “Beach Body Ready” advert drew 378 complaints to the Advertising Standards Authority as well as the obligatory petition to ban. Many ads were defaced by imaginative feminists who doctored the slogan to read “every body is beach ready.” A purported “mass protest” was convened in London’s Hyde park, but the close-frame shots of assorted hambeasts published in the national betrayed that the “mass” was made up more in the blubber around the protesters’ waists than the actual numbers that showed up.

Protein World's refreshing response was to make it clear that zero fucks were given about the gripes of moping, insecure Social Justice Warriors. Head of Global Marketing Richard Staveley told Breitbart: "The campaign absolutely, categorically will not be pulled by Protein World. We have 300,000 happy customers and we will not pander to this a particularly vociferous minority.

Staveley also claimed the campaign helped his company's brand profile and increased sales:

> I couldn't have dreamt or hoped of having our advert reproduced more times across the news networks and social media as it has been done. This protest has been absolutely phenomenal for us and entirely counter-productive for them.

UK Labour in terminal decline

Jowell is milking the Protein World scandal like a pot-head desperately sucking on the last embers of a decrepit roach. After a sound general election thrashing at the hands of Cameron's Conservatives, Jowell's party has been plunged into crisis surrounding its election of a new leader.

Militant factions such as the Social Workers Party and the Communist Party of Britain as well as large numbers of Tory trolls have infiltrated Labour's leadership election by signing up as bona fide party supporters with the sole aim of electing hard-left candidate, Jeremy Corbyn. The 66 year-old MP for Islington North and is tipped to win by pollsters, having wooed voters with a platform of anti-austerity and the renationalisation of key institutions.

Hard-left candidate Jeremy Corbyn takes on the centre-left cookie cutter candidates preferred by the Labour party apparatus.

Labour's paranoid apparatchicks have started a purge so pitiless that even long-standing supporters have been surprised to see their votes cancelled in the election. And who can blame them? The Corbyn surge suggests that disgruntled voters have had enough of besuited gimps who toe the party line. While Corbyn is appealing to popular discontent, advocating a platform of withdrawal from wars of foreign aggression and refusal of domestic penury, the androgynous candidates regurgitate a bland gospel of moderation. "Labour is a party government, not a party of protest," recite the liberal chatterati in chorus.

Aspirations seem to guarantee divisive politics: Yvette Cooper, the androgynous shrike wife of Ed Balls, finance minister under Blair, is busy enlisting feminist extremist Eve Ensler to call for mandatory sex education to tar young boys as wife-beaters in primary schools. Her rival Liz Kendall was busy invoking sexism as a defence to criticism, after Labour grandee Lord Falconer questioned whether she or Cooper could tackle Jeremy Corbyn's leadership aspirations.

Over in the mayoral race, Tessa Jowell is invoking facile pleas to censorship to win votes from the young, dim and idealistic female candidates who cast their votes on the basis of feelz. Given the calibre of these contributions, can anybody blame the pundits who are consigning Labour to 20 years of opposition?

Tessa Jowell: another enemy of due process

Tessa Jowell, modelling the Lego-man haircut beloved of left-wing British women in public office.

The parroting by rote of feminist ideology should surprise nobody who does even the most cursory of research into Tessa Jowell's career. In February of last year, Jowell appeared on the BBC's Question Time programme discussing anonymity for men charged with sexual assaults.

While even other left-wing panel members, of which George Galloway was one, voiced concerns over the fallout from two cases of British soap actors who were dragged to trial on flimsy rape charges only to be acquitted, Jowell hand-waved aside the concerns over innocent men having their reputations trashed:

> ….the priority for us as a society is the protection of women who are subject to rape and putting absolutely no obstacle in the way of their coming forward and being supported to come forward and bring cases of rape where they have suffered this terrible sexual violence.

She didn't even bother to try to defend the popular and entirely spurious feminist assumption, that publishing the names of men accused of rape has encourages women to come forward to such a degree that it is "worth" the damage to innocent men's lives caused by widespread adverse publicity even in the event of acquittal.

Boris Johnson, incumbent Mayor of London, with Boris bikes.

Should she be elected London mayor, Tessa Jowell will no doubt be directing the Mayor's Office for Policing and Crime to exert pressure on the Metropolitan Police to pursue even an more zealous line on rape and sexual offences than it already pursues under the rule of feminist DPP Alison Saunders.

Tessa Jowell's deep hatred of men is also evident in a vile screed penned for the extremist think tank, "Progress," Jowell had the following to say about London Mayor Boris Johnson and his ubiquitous "Boris Bikes":

> Can you think of a single thing Johnson has done in his time in office apart from the new Routemasters and 'Boris bikes'? And his buses are so expensive that two of them would pay for Ken's entire childcare package, and bikes, which are mainly used by white men on salaries over £75,000, are hardly stories of fairness.

Not only does Tessa Jowell want to trample over the free speech of advertisers and the due process rights of men accused of rape, she also hates white men whose only apparent crime is earning money in excess of the average wage. White men whose only crime is to have ridden a bike.

With Mayoral candidates like these, the Labour party is sending out a clear message that it has dedicated itself fully to American-style identity politics for the foreseeable future, sowing division and disunity, infantilising women and demonising men.

Read Next: Why Did Caitlyn Jenner Get A Bravery Award After Her Role In A Fatal Car Accident?

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

The 12-Step Guide To Becoming A Canadian Feminist

August 26, 2015 | by John Hellmuth | Link | Original Link

1. Have a pulse and rail against patriarchy

In Canada, if you have a pulse and hate men's "constant efforts to control your body," you will be in high demand by the government and state-funded media as a paragon of wisdom and truth. Canadian feminists should contact CBC, CTV or Bell Media immediately to audition and get on the payroll.

Those who don't make the cut can apply for internships with the ham-jawed mayor of Montreal, Toronto Councillor Norm Kelly, and the Swedish media, who are reportedly taking résumés.

2. Give yourself a worthy title

Although declaring yourself a "feminist" carries much more weight than, say, "neurosurgeon" or "barrister," it won't suffice to claim you merely advocate for women. Canadian feminists shouldn't shortchange themselves by forgoing identity politics. You must adopt a title like "mixed-race, two-spirited*, half-ork, intersectional feminist." In doing so, your rainbow sprinkling of originality, sedition, and erudition will blind everyone into submission—no matter what.

3. Give infantile speeches

It helps to have an IQ lower than 80 and to lack university education beyond progressive art and gender studies. Because your Twitter activism is so ironclad, you don't need to worry about rhetoric, speeches, or logic. Any pauses or word salads only demonstrate victimization. There is no bar exam for a Canadian feminist, and there shouldn't be. After all, the inability to be coherent is persuasive to all free-thinking people, as we see here:

> um, I would even go, um, so far as saying, um oppressive to, um cisgender, and reduc-, um, reductive cisgender um, caveman behaviour…. well, yes, um, um he creates stereotypical, and generalized, um, uh, stereotypes, basically, of people…. um, I think it's problematic because, um, he basically create – like – um, um, contributes to creating these very rigid g-gender binaries…. feminist art conference and uh, Slut Walk, uh…
>
> –Fannie Gadouas to CBC
>
> "We … have been targeting and abusing individual instead of focusing on the larger issues at hand."
>
> –Megaphone Girl
>
> "Being a woman doesn't mean that I have less of a right to respect space or privacy or security…"
>
> –Aurelie Nix to CTV News
>
> "He makes an argument about why men should eat women with eating disorders."
>
> –Mike Finnerty, CBC interviewer

The translation of any microphone fart or self-incriminating statement will always remain,

“REVOLUTION! FUCK THE PATRIARCHY!” Let’s keep our eye on the ball.

4. Go for the low-hanging fruit, even if it’s the wrong type

Though Canadian feminists and SJWs live in a country ruled by a monarch and led by Stephen Harper—who eats environmentalists for breakfast, has a John Hagee-type fetish for Middle East wars and the Likud Party, pushed through the universally reviled surveillance Bill C 51, builds new prisons at a rate drawing the rebuke of Texas conservatives, repeatedly prorogues parliament, and muzzles scientists and the press—they should only target those for whom the Canadian media will back them and for whom the least effort is required.

Forced marriages, genital mutilations, Sharia law, and gangs of machete-wielding rapists are not the concern of Canadian feminism. Rather, Canadian feminists should focus on men who argue that long hair in women is correlated to beauty and femininity.

5. Use Twitter as your main vehicle of protest

Using Twitter from, say, Vancouver to disrupt speeches in Montreal should never be discounted. The bravery of pursuing wicked men through ineffectively directing armies via Twitter can’t be cast aside. Change.org petitions represent actionable views and show the world who really has skin in the game. Feminists who are otherwise unaccomplished can become extremely accomplished through Twitter activism. Social justice + social media = social progress.

6. Oppose freedom of speech

If Canadian feminists can suppress all viewpoints by straight Western men and reach a critical mass of iPhone retweets, this will usher in the next pillar of history, in which all starvation, disease, natural disasters, racism and terrorism will end and our world and the World of Warcraft will be connected by portals. It is very likely.

7. Commit assault in the name of equality, while claiming you are facing death threats

The soundness of this tactic does not need further comment. Canadian feminists should not be insulted by having this explained to them.

8. Oppose satire and impose the worst interpretations on others' writings

Following their withdrawal from Montreal and Mississauga hotels and McDonald's, some Canadian feminists are considering a Facebook group for those who want to protest at the graves of Swift, Mencken, Voltaire, and Carlin in order to impose retroactive justice on men who in past days might have stirred them from socially diverse gaming, "Slut Walks" and progressive art exhibits.

Remember: Canadian feminists should never have discourse with the enemy. Calling the enemy a rapist or Nazi as soon as possible is best. "He advocates rape!" should be screamed at any male whose brain size exceeds that of the average Montreal feminist. If there's any ambiguity in what we mean by rape, don't despair—Fannie G. gives us the best definition of rape culture so far: "when institutions and/or people use their powers and privileges to marginalize others based on race, gender, disabilities and so on." Translation: We're all being raped and should all march for justice.

9. Use words like "dehumanize" and "microaggression"

Any negative personal reaction by Canadian feminists to others proves premeditated harassment. This is a quantifiable form of abuse for which they should receive government stipends. Canadian feminists should fill out the required government forms for compensation for their pre- and post-traumatic stress and for their services to end democracy.

Canadians feminists are smart enough to know that democracy is just a plot invented by white men to enslave women and that if a public servant didn't cut her teeth living on the street, attending Young Socialist meetings, and smuggling LSD inside hollowed-out bibles—like the inspirational Ontario MPP Cheri DiNovo—then we shouldn't trust anything she says.

10. Dress like a pixie and get a peroxide-blonde pixie cut.

No one, especially not men, would be persuaded by a Canadian feminist who had natural hair and blank skin and looked how the revolting patriarchy calls “respectable.” So-called feminine women who don’t Slut Walk and shout at the top of their lungs that men are beasts will never be listened to and will be trampled on.

Remember: a full sleeve is liberation. Fashion should be influenced by cosplay and World of Warcraft, not cisgender tyrants. Aggressive language and curse words are optimal, because everyone responds better to this.

11. Do nude amateur modelling, run a blog with “My Vagina” in the title, and then claim sexual abuse when your photos are linked to

No one has the right to be made uncomfortable by a Canadian feminist’s nude photos on the Internet and her vulgar, sexualized language. Why? Because she is without shame.

On the contrary, all men in this world are born with shame and therefore bear responsibility for their actions. Canadian feminists like Aurelie Nix shouldn’t hesitate to contact Emma Sulkowicz for auditions in the burgeoning genre of anti-patriarchy art porn (WARNING: RAPE TRIGGER).

12. Go silent, or launch new e-petitions, after it’s clear to the entire world that you’re an idiot and a failure

Read More: Is The Feminist Movement Experiencing A Meltdown?

John Hellmuth
Born to a family of corporate gypsies in Singapore, John Hellmuth travelled the world in search of the finest women and then encountered the writings of Roosh.

Did The Media Drive Gay Black Man Vester Flanagan To Murder Two Journalists?

August 27, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Yesterday, unemployed gay black journalist Vester Flanagan brutally killed two of his former colleagues at Roanoke, VA TV station WDBJ during the middle of a live broadcast before turning his gun on himself. Before he went on his rampage, Flanagan sent ABC News a manifesto in which he detailed his reasons for his crimes, namely his anger at "racism" in America and purported "homophobic" discrimination he suffered at his job:

> It is unclear whose initials he is referring to. He continues, "As for Dylann Roof? You (deleted)! You want a race war (deleted)? BRING IT THEN YOU WHITE …(deleted)!!!" He said Jehovah spoke to him, telling him to act.

As is typical for the leftist media, the debate around Flanagan's killings revolves around gun control, with his race and his sexuality barely mentioned at all. Indeed, before Flanagan's race became public knowledge, #BlackLivesMatter leader DeRay McKesson attempted to blame his killings on "whiteness," and even after it became known that he was black, other #BlackLivesMatter supporters expressed glee at a black man killing white people in cold blood:

> @realmattforney Welcome to the #BlackLivesMatter movement . . . pic.twitter.com/ZYPrNZJQSm
>
> — DC Hagler™ (@Funkylikedat) August 26, 2015

The questions that no one are asking are about the roles that Flanagan's homosexuality and the leftist media played in inspiring his shooting spree. For years now, the media has been deliberately stoking enmity and hatred between blacks and whites through biased, selective coverage and outright lies about stories such as the Ferguson riots and the George Zimmerman case. Couple this with Flanagan's mental instability—a likely byproduct of his homosexuality—and we have a toxic stew of racial resentment and murderous rage.

Are Homosexuals Ticking Time Bombs?

Despite the leftist media claiming that gays are no different than straights, homosexuals are prone to a host of deviant behaviors and mental disorders that are either less prevalent or outright nonexistent among heterosexuals. For example, homosexuals suffer from mental illness at a much higher rate than straights. It's highly possible that Vester Flanagan's mental state was related to his homosexuality, as he claimed to have suffered "persecution" for being gay in his manifesto.

Additionally, the leftist media has wallpapered over a wide variety of sick, antisocial behaviors that homosexuals engage in as a matter of course. For example, because homosexuals are incapable of controlling their sexual urges, they suffer from STDs at nearly epidemic rates.

HIV is largely a gay disease; gay and bisexual men account for over 60% of all HIV infections in the U.S. despite composing only two percent of the population. These catastrophically high infection rates are due to the staggering amounts of sexual partners gay men have, as well as their refusal to use condoms:

> Prior to the AIDS epidemic, a 1978 study found that 75 percent of white, gay males claimed to have had more than 100 lifetime male sex partners: 15 percent claimed 100-249 sex partners; 17 percent claimed 250-499; 15 percent claimed 500- 999; and 28 percent claimed more than 1,000 lifetime male sex partners. Levels of promiscuity subsequently declined, but some observers are concerned that promiscuity is again approaching the levels of the 1970s. The medical consequence of this promiscuity is that gays have a greatly increased likelihood of contracting HIV/AIDS, syphilis and other STDs.

Additionally, the leftist media has openly hidden the fact that gay pedophiles are using marriage and adoption in order to procure prepubescent children to rape. In 2013, gay couple Mark J. Newton and Peter Truong were convicted of child sexual abuse after they had a son via artificial insemination solely so they could molest him and pimp him out to other pederasts:

> Police believe the pair had adopted the boy ''for the sole purpose of exploitation''. The abuse began just days after his birth and over six years the couple travelled the world, offering him up for sex with at least eight men, recording the abuse and uploading the footage to an international syndicate known as the Boy Lovers Network.

Prior to their conviction, Newton and Truong were given fawning coverage in an ABC (Australian Broadcasting Company) article on gay couples adopting children.

Given the demonstrably higher rates of mental illness that homosexuals suffer from as well as the creepy paraphilias they engage in, it's not a stretch to say that Vester Flanagan's murders were in part due to his sexual orientation. While not all gay men are potential murderers, Flanagan's homosexuality-induced mental disorders were a clear motivator in his decision to slay two white journalists on live TV.

How The Media Inspired Vester Flanagan

Another ignored aspect of the Vester Flanagan story is the role the leftist media played in stoking his delusional rage and murderous fantasies.

For the past few decades, the mainstream media has consistently pushed a narrative of poor, downtrodden blacks in America being abused, discriminated against, raped, and murdered by whites. Irresponsible journalists will seize upon any story that seemingly fits this narrative—no matter how flimsy the evidence—in search of what Tom Wolfe called the "Great White Defendant."

For example, the leftist media turned Trayvon Martin and Michael Brown, black men shot to death while committing crimes, into martyrs victimized by white racism. It doesn't matter that the evidence pointed towards Martin being a budding thug or the clear-cut evidence that Brown was a hardened killer (as shown by his attempt to tackle Darren Wilson and steal his gun); the media extensively covered these incidents, painting Martin and Brown as innocent victims of white bigotry.

By ginning up anger among blacks at purported racist mistreatment, the leftist media is actively helping foster a race war in America. The fracas over the Michael Brown shooting resulted in several days worth of race riots in Ferguson, Missouri, and now we have a gay black man openly stating that he decided to kill white people solely because the media told him that whites are out to get blacks.

The leftist media is eager to blame any case of a white man going postal on right-wingers. For example, Charleston church shooter Dylann Roof (mentioned by name in Vester Flanagan's manifesto) was blamed on American Renaissance and the Council of Conservative Citizens. Isla Vista shooter Elliot Rodger was blamed on the manosphere, despite the fact that he was a part of the anti-manosphere forum PUA Hate.

By their own logic, the mainstream media and leftists have the blood of Vester Flanagan's victims on their hands.

Read More: Irresponsible Journalists Are Using Elliot Rodger To Push A Privileged White-Girl Agenda

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

6 Tips For Pulling A Same-Night Lay

August 27, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

This weekend I went to a party at a private members club in central London, where I met an attractive girl in her early twenties who turned out to be the daughter of a wealthy British TV celebrity. After an hour or so of conversation, making out and so on, I took her back to my place where we had sex several times before falling asleep.

Meeting a girl and having sex with her on the same night — when things go smoothly — can seem like the most natural thing in the world because, let's face it, it is: if a man and a woman are attracted to one another then what more natural an outcome can there be?

And yet for the beginner the idea of pulling a girl out of a club and taking her home can seem as unachievable as taking an Uber to the moon — it certainly was for me. With that in mind, I thought it would be useful for me to codify the steps I took to demonstrate how simple and easily replicable they are.

By the way, this isn't about pumping-and-dumping girls, but simply about achieving your very-natural male desire quickly and efficiently—once you've slept with her then you can transition into a relationship if there's chemistry and you want to keep seeing her.

Here, then, are the steps I took which led to me bringing the girl home with me.

1. Achieve Momentum By Approaching Girls Before You Get to the Venue

State, vibe, mojo — whatever you want to call it, it seems to me that there's no substitute for momentum when you go out to meet girls. As much as you can study game techniques and Google opening lines and so on, a lot of game is about the subconscious vibe that you are put out as you enter the venue and walk around.

Most players know that this can have a magnetic effect, so that when you're really on form it's not really about what you say to girls at all, but more how you make them feel simply through your presence. When you're really on form this can have an almost magical effect, with previously unobtainable-seeming girls opening with ease all around you.

So how do you achieve momentum? It's actually very easy, but I'm afraid that those with approach anxiety will have to work hard to put their fears aside. The best way to get that swing in your step, that arrogant swagger that you require, is to have approached a lot of girls already that day.

So earlier in the day, before hitting the venue, I'd gone out shopping an incorporated a spot of daygame, approaching something like twelve girls in the street while going about my business. The twelve approaches yielded a few phone numbers, which of course I'll follow up with, but immediate success wasn't the point. Instead, my aim was simply to get into a sociable mood so that later when I went to the club I would be on form.

It may seem counter-intuitive to the newbie, but even rejections can help to pump up your state—in fact, in a way they can work better. After I've experienced three harsh blowouts, either on the street or in the club, then something in my brain clicks and nothing can faze me. After all, I've already been rejected, it hasn't killed me, and if I'm going to go down then it might as well be in a blaze of glory. From that point on I find myself able to approach any girl with impunity.

When I entered the club, having the twelve approaches under my belt, I noticed that girls were checking me out and smiling at me as I walked around — not something that necessarily always happens. This wasn't because anything had changed in my look and presentation, but rather that the hunter in me had been released (probably with a commensurate spike in testosterone, although I'm no scientist) and the women there picked up on it

2. Attend Carefully To Your Style

I don’t intend to get into the “do looks matter” debate here (they do and they don’t at the same time) but for God’s sake at least control what you can and make sure your style is on point. This doesn’t need to cost a lot of money. After my daygame session I went home where I changed into a white Ted Baker shirt, a light grey summer jacket from Zara and a colourful pocket-square from H&M.

I also wore an expensive but fantastic pair of heeled boots from Jeffery West that give me that all important little extra bit of height. My haircut is cheap but I style it carefully with good products (I stopped going to expensive stylists earlier this year when it became apparent that it really made very little difference.)

Through following my own tastes as well as occasionally reading style blogs and keeping an eye on what others wear and what’s in the high-end shops, I have developed a look which is striking enough for people to comment on — really important when you’re going out to meet girls.

3. Approach Directly And With Confidence

Because you are in state already, having done your pre-club approaches, you should be in a good state of mind to talk to the girls you meet in the venue with verve and determination. In a busy nightclub, particularly if it's later in the evening, I would suggest going direct—walking up to the girls you like and telling them you find them sexy.

You should also use light touch right off the bat in non-sexual areas — the forearm, the lower back and so on — in order to normalise physicality between the two of you. Of course, you will then need to transition into more normal conversation to keep the interaction going, but you should ensure that you spike this up periodically with sexual references and suggestive comments to get her turned on and curious about you.

Also, remember that all pull and no push is bad — you must occasionally signal your disapproval and hint that you are willing to walk. For example, when my girl from Friday told me she was from Chelsea I pushed her away laughingly and said it could never work out between us, since I lived in East London. Obviously she realised I was joking but it added that little frisson of doubt to the interaction that only increased her attraction.

4. Once You Find A Girl Who Likes You Then Stay With Her…But Don't Look Needy

To a degree it depends on what time in the night it is, but assuming it's relatively late then once you've found a girl who you like and who seems into you, you should endeavour to stay with her so she doesn't wander off with her friends or get swooped up by another man.

The important thing here is to strike the balance between hanging in there and not looking needy. Ideally you will have made out with her a little bit so that you know it's definitely on — remember, you don't need to make out with a girl for her to sleep with you, but on the other hand if she won't even kiss you then there's no way she's going to bed with you.

Your aim, then, should be to hang out, keeping the mood light but being ready to pull the trigger and take her from the venue as soon as possible. What you must avoid doing is looking as though you are "mate guarding" — that is, jealously trying to ward off other men. If a guy approaches and tries to chat her up while you're there then by all means lead her away, but also be prepared to walk.

If she is initiating conversations or seems especially receptive to them then your time might be better off spent with another prospect. After all, you are looking for a DTF girl who is DTF you — if the stars are aligned then things should be relatively hassle-free.

Assuming she doesn't vie for the attention of other men in the venue then the best course is to stick with her and then lead her out at an appropriate moment (i.e. as soon as possible).

5. Always Be Escalating

Absolutely 100% key when setting up a same-night lay is that you must without fail progressively escalate the encounter throughout the evening. You must do this is two ways – verbally, through conversation that gets progressively suggestive; and physically, with touch that becomes increasingly sexualised. Through this dual approach you are looking to get the girl turned on sufficiently so that when you get her back to your place she is ready to have sex.

This is not as easy as it sounds and you need calibration, which can really only be learned through practice. However, my advice to the newbie is as follows – in the context of what is socially and legally permissible, be bolder than you think possible. When you gain experience you will be amazed at how sexual you can get with a girl you've just met. Also your boldness – which will suggest sexual confidence and experience – will serve to turn her on more.

6. Deal With The Logistical Bullshit

Once the girl is turned on and ready to leave the venue with you, it is your job to get her home as quickly and efficiently as possible, dealing with any annoying occurrences that might come up. Usually I find the best way is to grab a taxi, but even that can be difficult (see my previous tale of cockblocking courtesy of Uber).

Lost taxi drivers, drunk passers-by, closed roads, lost keys, and cash shortages. Whatever it is, you have to find a solution. On Friday night I was trying to find a late-night bar with my girl but there was nothing open. More than once she suggested she should go home, before I convinced her that a better option would be a nightcap at my place. I then found an available cab and we were away. Had I not done so and allowed the moment to pass it is likely I would never have seen her again, rather than us enjoying a night of sex together.

In summary, if you are looking to achieve a same-night lay then have your style together, approach loads before hand, be upfront with girls you like in the venue, always escalate and lead her home (to your place or hers) solving impromptu issues as they come up. Fail on any of these elements and your chances will decrease significantly.

Read More: Why the Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need to Learn Game Now

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

4 Reasons To Become A WordPress Ninja

August 27, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Alex Oni

Among the many things we are taught by websites such as ROK is the need to boost our income sources. Whether it's selling products, blogging, producing online courses, or offering freelance services, the internet has made it easy for us to create a business that can reach millions of customers from all over the world.

This is perhaps the key reason why the ability to build your own website is a skill that we must all strive to acquire. Gone are the days when the ability to set up and update a website were left to the geeks. With the development of a particular content management system known as WordPress, there has never been a better time to learn how to build your own website.

A quick word about me, though. I am a professional web developer who has been building websites for the last eight years. During this time, I have worked on several web projects for major institutions and companies including Johns Hopkins, University of Maryland, Cancer Support Foundation, AVIS, and Golds Gym. I have also worked on a few projects for both Return of Kings and Reaxxion.

Below I give you four reasons why you need to learn how to use WordPress.

1. It's A Necessity For Any Online Business Venture

If you are looking to start a business, you are most certainly going to need a website; there are no two ways about it. Your website will be your largest marketing tool and knowing how to set it up will serve you greatly. Sure there are other ways of building a website besides using WordPress, but none of them are as user friendly for a beginner.

2. It’s Fast And Easy To Learn

Did you know that it takes roughly five minutes to install WordPress on any website? In fact, you can go from buying a domain name to having a fully functional website complete with design in just under three hours if you know what you are doing.

3. It Will Save You A Lot Of Money

Buying a domain name, installing WordPress, choosing the right theme, installing all necessary plugins to add functionality to your website, securing your website against hackers, and employing best SEO practices are all actions for which you will have to cough up some good money to hire a skilled web developer to do. Knowing how to do all these will not only save you some hard-earned cash, but will also save you an even more important resource – time.

4. It Can Make You Money

"The more you learn, the more you earn." These were words spoken by billionaire Warren Buffet and they are certainly true. Nearly 75 million websites today are powered by WordPress and having an idea of just how they are built and updated is a skill that will pop off any resume.

How You Can Learn

With all my years of experience, I have recently published two online courses that will teach you all you need to know about building your own website with WordPress.

The first course "From Novice to Ninja: The Complete WordPress Training Course" is designed take you from being a complete beginner to someone capable of building and managing his own website. The course is one of the most extensive on WordPress, with over 5 hours of content and over 1,000 students already registered for the course. You can read more about it here.

The second, "Build Awesome Web Pages Without Code," is suitable for those who already have a background on WordPress and are looking to build on that knowledge. The course explores in detail how to build any kind of web page using the best page builder plugin called Visual Composer.

With this plugin, you can include sliders, image galleries, videos, maps and even animation on a web page without the need to write a single line of code. Click here for more details.

I am using this opportunity to offer both courses at a 30% discount each exclusive to ROK readers only. The first course "From Novice to Ninja: The Complete WordPress Training Course "normally sells for $149 but you can buy it today for just $99, simply click on this link.

The second "Build Awesome Web Pages without Code" normally sells for $69 but you can buy it today for just $48, just click on this link.

Please be advised that both discounts ~~will expire exactly one week from now~~

~~(09/03/2015)~~ have been extended to 9/18/15, so if you are interested in either one of these courses, sign up before the coupons expire.

Just so you know my skills are for real, Roosh himself wanted to include his satisfaction with the work I have provided for ROK:

> I hired Alex because I had over a dozen programming issues to work out for Return Of Kings. From small bug fixes to more complicated re-writes, Alex successfully tackled them all. He has shown such strong expertise that I'm ready to do more complicated programming projects with him. Our communication is also excellent. I recommend his work. – Roosh Valizadeh

I should also mention that both courses come with a 30-day back money guarantee. If for any reason you are not satisfied with either program, simply ask for a refund and it will be given to you immediately, no questions asked.

Take the next steps on your path to self improvement by signing up for either one of these courses today.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How America’s New Nobility Has Forgotten Its Obligation To The Country

August 28, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Regardless of how much progressives and “conservatives” drone on about equality, every society has an elite or noble class. The nobility, also known as the aristocracy, is defined as the group of people who belong to the highest social class in a particular country.

In the past, membership in the aristocracy was based on heredity. The nobility was synonymous with duty, honor, education, refinement, and courage. The noble class wasn’t just a group of wealthy do-nothings. They were expected to live by a higher code that included concern for the well being of their country.

Today, we still have an aristocracy, but it is not based on heredity. Instead it is based on wealth, celebrity, and educational background. Unfortunately, our new aristocrats are almost the complete opposites of the old nobility.

The Old Aristocracy

Emperor Karl, last of the Hapsburg Emperors

The hereditary nobility of the past was derived from the warrior class of the middle ages. Medieval society was divided into three basic groups: the priests, the nobles, and the peasants. Each group played a role in society. The job of the nobles was to protect the peasants and priests enabling them to complete their daily functions.

The behavior of the English nobility during the First World War is a good example of this. The British aristocracy enlisted in the military to defend the country. The nobility suffered disproportionately greater casualties than any other social class. The staggering losses suffered by the nobility forever changed the political trajectory of Britain. Historian Joanna Bourke writes:

> This had a devastating impact: the prime minister's son was killed, a number of cabinet members' sons were killed and this meant that in the immediate postwar, those apprentices who were expected in the natural order of things to become leaders – particularly in politics and business – were no longer there.

For the old nobility, fighting for their country wasn't something to be avoided or just for the lower classes, these wealthy aristocrats felt that it was their primary duty.

And it wasn't just defense. The old aristocratic codes called upon the nobility to disdain wealth and to be generous with the poor.

The New Aristocracy

Business magnate and supporter of left wing causes George Soros

Flash forward to our present degenerate culture. In today's twisted society the "nobility" has become a class of wealthy, materialistic, and amoral twits. The concepts duty, bravery, and honor are completely unknown to them.

Who are the new nobility? Well, in the United States, it is the wealthy, liberal political elite such as the Kennedys, Bushs, and Clintons, Silicon Valley billionaires like Mark Zuckerberg, reality show nobodies like the Kardashian clan, professional athletes, and the handful of preachy actors and writers that dominate the Hollywood scene.

The Clintons: Representatives of our political nobility

Political Aristocrats: Revenant Bill Clinton telling President Obama about the horrifying side effects of a vegan diet.

The Clintons are an example of everything that is wrong with American politics. Of course, there are Bill's notorious affairs while he was in office, and the rumors of dalliances after he left office, but that is really inconsequential when compared to the rest of the Clinton legacy.

The most egregious example is the Clinton Foundation. Author Peter Schweizer, in his book Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich, alleges that the Clintons amassed hundreds of millions of dollars by doing political favors for their clients.

For example, Schweizer writes that a Saudi sheik who is a high-dollar Clinton Foundation donor had a lucrative relationship with Ethiopia's repressive government. Even though the State Department found that Ethiopia failed to meet transparency requirements to receive US aid, Hillary, as Secretary of State, conveniently granted Ethiopia a waiver.

If Schweizer is correct, the Clintons have turned the US government into a money making machine for themselves. This is hardly the selfless behavior that one would expect from a true noble.

But I am not singling out the Clintons here. They are only an example of how our political elite no longer has the good of the country as their goal. Their only goals are personal enrichment and power.

Mark Zuckerberg: Representative of our corporate nobility

New aristocrats Mark Zuckerberg and his wife Priscilla

Another glorified American nobleman is Facebook co-founder Mark Zuckerberg. Worth an estimated $38.6 billion, the Internet entrepreneur was listed among Time magazine's 100 wealthiest and most influential people in the world.

Zuckerberg has put his wealth and influence to use by spending an estimated $25 million for pro-amnesty candidates and causes via his pro-open borders lobbying group FWD.us. Amnesty helps large corporations by increasing the supply of low-income workers, thus driving wages down for those jobs. But lower wages hurt American workers, especially those who are the most vulnerable including poor Hispanic and Black Americans.

But Zuckerberg isn't only interested in lowering wages for poor Americans. He also wants fewer jobs and lower wages for the middle class. He supports increasing the number of H-1B visas for skilled that will increase the supply of skilled workers for corporations. That means American STEM graduates have fewer and lower paying job opportunities. Some young men despair of ever finding a good job. All this at a time when college costs have skyrocketed and the amount of student loan debt young Americans are carrying is at an all time high.

If the aristocracy is supposed to help the "peasants" of their own country, Zuckerberg is failing miserably. To him and our other corporate elites, what really matters is their own bottom line.

The Kardashian Clan: Representatives of our "celebrity" elite

Celebrity Aristocrat Kim Kardashian via Instagram

As a family unit, the Kardashians embody virtually every vice and plague our current culture glorifies: gross materialism, do-it-yourself porn videos, bastardy, multiple divorces, promiscuity, gender fluidity (see Bruce Jenner), and extreme narcissism. The family has built an impressive empire upon Kim's enormous naked ass and propensity for attention whoring.

But would this "noble" group actually do anything good for our failing country? Would the fabulous Kanye West with his titanic ego, take up arms to defend our nation if the need arose? Or would he simply hide behind one of his overpriced, Yeezy Season 1 creations? After all why worry about the "little people" when Kim can preach body fat acceptance with nude pregnancy selfies? (Warning: what has been seen, cannot be unseen.)

I do have one good thing to say about the Kardashians: as odious as they are, at least they do not lecture me about how I should pay more in taxes to save the world. I respect that.

Professional Athletes

Pat Tillman

There was a time when professional athletes weren't just about their enormous salaries, fame, scores of girlfriends, and going bankrupt five years after retiring from sports. In December 1941 after the bombing of Pearl Harbor many professional athletes were eager to enlist and fight against the Axis of Powers in World War II. And they enlisted despite the fact that serving in the military could have ended their professional athletic careers.

Bob Feller enlisted in the Navy the day after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, making him the first MLB player to enter the war. He spent 26 months as chief of an anti-aircraft gun crew on the USS Alabama. Likewise, Ted Williams served with the US Navy and US Marines during World War II, where he received his pilot's wings and commission as a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps. After a return to professional baseball he was recalled for active military service in 1952 where he flew 39 combat missions.

Compare the patriotism of these athletes of the past to the fact that only one professional athlete, Pat Tillman, felt the call of duty after the terrorist attacks of September 11th. Keep in mind that 9/11 was an attack on the US mainland, something that hasn't happened since the War of 1812, and that, unlike Pearl Harbor, it was targeted at civilians.

However, to their credit most athletes are content to live their own lives, and they don't spend much time lecturing the "smallfolk."

The Hollywood Elite

Stephen King

Perhaps the greatest of American noble hypocrites are the actors and writers of the so-called Hollywood Elite. Stephen King, whose novels I actually enjoy, has spent the last few years lecturing the middle class on why they should agree to taxes that will inevitably prevent them from getting wealthy while sitting comfortably upon his own fortune. This idea of “wealth for me, but socialism for the proles” is a familiar trope among our new aristocrats.

Likewise, a slew of Hollywood actors such as Brad Pitt, Leonardo DiCaprio, and Natalie Portman preach the evils of global warming. Through an assortment of foundations and publicity stunts like tooling around in a Prius or wearing vegan shoes, these champions of the environment will tell you the importance of taking two-minute, cold showers, and limiting your consumption of toilet paper to one square per bowel movement.

Of course, they will conveniently overlook the fact that they fly in private jets and live in houses that use enough electricity to power a third world country. In short, it’s very much like Jennifer Lawrence preaching morality and abstinence.

Conclusion

C.S. Lewis was prophetic when he wrote: “Where men are forbidden to honor a king, they honor millionaires, athletes, or film-stars instead: even famous prostitutes or gangsters. For spiritual nature, like bodily nature, will be served; deny it food and it will gobble poison.”

While we can’t do anything at the present time to remove our new aristocrats, we at least can nourish our souls with what is best: high quality art and music, classical philosophy, and sound theology.

Read More: The New Royal Baby Proves That Even A Degenerate Society Lusts For Tradition

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Would A Male Student Be Kicked Out Of College For Joe Biden-Style Kissing, Touching, And Lurking?

August 28, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

If Barack Obama were ever to be incapacitated, America would not only have a new Commander-in-Chief; it would have an inaugural Commander-in-Creepiness. Such is the reputation, largely swept under the carpet, of Vice President Joe Biden.

An entire photo album (or ten) could be made of the bizarre, forced, and frequently pathetic moments where he fondly touches women (usually without "affirmative consent"), kisses them in a cringeworthy fashion, or otherwise shows that he is obsessed with enforcing draconian expectations on male college students that he has no intention of following himself.

Biden the "protector"

Biden has been one of the chief peddler-architects of the truly Orwellian Campus Accountability and Safety Act (CASA), which is thankfully still a bill yet to pass Congress. Brought to the Senate by professional victim Senator Claire McCaskill, who suddenly realized Game of Thrones was violent after an off-camera rape scene and called for a boycott, CASA is widely deplored by civil libertarians who assert that it will result in "convictions" for "rape" with little or no evidence, let alone the standard of proof required in a court.

Worse still, in a gargantuan illustration of a conflict of interest, those colleges financially penalized for "not acting" on "sexual assault" would be punished by the same organisation, the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights, that would receive the fine monies.

Due to his widely documented predilection with touching and lurking over women without asking them, we can see that Joe Biden has a rather sadistic sense of humor. The progressive widening over decades of the definition of "sexual assault," which can include catcalling and asking for sex, will catch male college students, but not men who graduated in the 1960s like Biden.

This would be sexual assault on any American college campus

White knight lawmakers like Biden frequently talk about men in "positions of power" getting away with things. Male college students have been expelled for this.

From the very firm grip of Biden's hand and the feigned half-smile of the girl to her head moving away and her body stiffening, the photograph above screams "I do not want Joe Biden to touch or kiss me!"

Compare this to the story of Brian Ferguson, at the time a 20-year-old college special needs student from Texas. He was kicked out of college and later reinstated after hugging a girl and kissing her on the forehead because of mistaken identity. Officials knew he had autism and was in special needs classes at Navarro College. He may have been "exonerated" afterwards, but he was nonetheless kicked out of college at the outset. So where's non-disabled Biden's penalty?

I am not arguing that kissing women like Biden has repeatedly should somehow be "the new rape" and punished accordingly. The salient issue here is how and why colleges are singled out. There would be no cameras around when male college students allegedly kiss, hug or touch college women "without their consent." Yet they can be (and have been) "convicted" of "sexual assault" and banned from college for things that Biden can do in front of the world's media with absolute impunity.

Why won’t Joe Biden hold himself to what’s expected of male college students?

Women invariably respond to power, so perhaps college-style “sexual assault” is only sexual assault when the power differentials between the man and woman are closer or non-existent.

One mind-boggling case involving two gay students deserves particular attention. The “offender” was sanctioned by Brandeis University for kissing his boyfriend and regular sexual partner while he was waking up from being asleep. By that rationale, I have committed sexual assault 1,000 times and been the victim of it myself another 1,000 times. If two people consistently engaging in sex could not presume consent for kissing, how can Biden when he appears on television with all these relative female strangers?

It seems Biden would be a repeat college campus sexual offender of a much greater magnitude than me or anyone else reading this. And the power differentials between him and the women he kisses, touches, and lurks over are much greater than what you or I possess over the women we get involved with.

If there’s ever been a case of abusing “patriarchal power” to kiss or caress a woman, Biden is this case.

Joe Biden’s political skin is actually made of teflon

Imagine what beer pong with Biden was like in the 1960s.

You can be the proverbial alpha or a relatively popular person at your college and still find yourself in reputation-ruining hot water when you get involved with the wrong revenge- or attention-seeking women. But no hot water gets thrown at a Joe Biden. The falsely accused victims of both UVA's Jackie Coakley and the Duke lacrosse scandal's Crystal Mangum can attest to the disparity in how the same acts are treated, depending on whether you're a politician or a male college student.

In the UVA and Duke cases, all the men were students with good reputations, who each found those reputations sullied not only by a sadistic woman but also by an educational system that treated her convoluted story as Gospel truth. Joe Biden, Barack Obama and others are so obsessed with courting the feminist, broader female and mangina vote that they ignore these stark, distinctly anti-civil rights realities.

Selling young men down the river for his own gain

Biden courting the “Michael Moore’s sister” vote.

Biden and Obama are both concerned with “posterity” and their place in American history, however degenerate it is becoming. Obama is term-limited and Biden has yet to rule out that another Presidential bid is on the cards. Should the Vice President balk at that option, his good health means that other senior roles in American politics are likely.

Tragically, the biggest benefactors of the rabid feminist left are men like Biden, not far less well-known cat ladies like Claire McCaskill. And the routine currency they spend to win the female vote are the rights and legal well-being of young American men.

Like Governor Jerry Brown and the Californian legislature that supported his own “affirmative consent” hogwash, Biden and other Democrats refuse to countenance the possibility that they should be held to the same ridiculous codes on Capitol Hill and in the White House as male college students are bound to on college campuses already, even before the further loss of liberties that will result from any passing of CASA.

If Joe Biden ever decides to head back to college as a mature student, it’s a good thing he has a law degree. With the way he accosts women in the photos above, he’d need to have legal training whilst on campus.

Read More: Academic Advisor Accuses Male College Student Of Harassment For Sitting In A Waiting Room

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

What I Learned From The Exorcist

August 28, 2015 | by Andrew Levinson | Link | Original Link

I converted to Catholicism at the age of 24. Three years later, being an unmarried man filled with zeal for the faith, I entered the seminary to study for the priesthood. American seminaries have had a rough time over the last forty years; author Michael Rose documented some of it in his book, "Goodbye, Good Men." In short, for many years seminaries were hellholes of heresy and homosexuality. They've improved much since the dark days of the 1980s and 90s, and my own experience was mostly positive.

However, some seminaries still have notable blind spots. It's no great secret that the Catholic priesthood is disproportionately homosexual compared to the general population, despite the Church's official ban on homosexuals from Holy Orders. It creates a vicious cycle where the Church needs more good men to be ordained priests, but good men shun fields that are dominated by gays and women (80% of lay volunteers and employees at the parish and diocesan level are women).

I Meet The Exorcist

I arrived at the seminary at the ripe old age of 27, part of the smattering of white men in an institution filled mostly by young Mexicans and Asians, either Filipinos or Vietnamese. The faculty encourages the men to form small support groups: five or six who would form friendships and support each other through the trials and tribulations of priestly life.

I fell in with some of the other white guys. It was a lot of fun: going out for tacos, cigars, whiskey, movies, and griping about politics, liberal faculty, and bad liturgy.

Who says priests can't have fun?

The one time my writing has ever gotten me in trouble in real life was when I was a seminarian. I wrote to a priest friend back home about my experiences, describing both the good and the bad. Something I said pissed him off because by the end of that year the rector expressed "concerns" about me and wanted a meeting with my vocation director and me. That was the beginning of the end of my time as a seminarian.

The vocation director at the time also served as the diocesan exorcist. On the morning of our meeting with the rector, he said, "I need to make a stop along the way. You're welcome to assist if you want."

"Assist with what?" I asked.

"I need to bless and cleanse an infested house," he replied.

"Oh. Uh… what do I need to do?"

"Well, first we both need to go to confession."

The Nature Of Evil

Exorcism is a subset of "Deliverance Ministry." All baptized Christians may offer prayers of deliverance from demonic oppression, but only a validly ordained Catholic priest, with the authorization of his bishop, can perform exorcisms (as Roger Ebert once said, everybody knows that if you've got demons, you call the Catholics.)

The Church is initially skeptical of all claims of paranormal activity. Before people can speak with an exorcist, they are asked to see medical doctors and trained psychiatrists to rule out any physical or mental illnesses. Nine times out of ten, that's exactly what they're suffering. The exorcist puts on his stole for that tenth case.

According to Catholic theology, ordinarily we have free will. We are not guilty of sin unless we freely choose to do evil. Only the most hardcore psychopaths choose evil for the sake of it. Most people choose to do evil because they believe it's for a greater good: think of the woman who blows up her family because she believes she'll be happier once she ditches her boring beta schlub, or the man who embezzles money from his job because he believes he deserves better than what the company gives him.

In the normal order of things, demons cannot force us to act but can only tempt us. These mundane temptations are considered ordinary demonic activity. However, if we are immersed in a sinful lifestyle then we are more susceptible to temptation and demonic influence than a man who lives righteously. There are several levels of extraordinary demonic activity.

The Power Of Christ Compels You

Demonic oppression does not entail any loss of consciousness or involuntary actions, but what appears to be extraordinarily bad luck. An example from the Bible is the Book of Job: God allows Satan to torment Job with afflictions to his family, his business, and his health. The afflicted individual is sometimes physically struck: both St. John Vianney (1786—1859) and St. Padre Pio (1887—1968) were beaten bloody by unseen spirits, much to the consternation of witnesses.

Demonic obsession afflicts the mind in ways that cannot be explained by natural mental illness. The victim suffers from obsessive and irrational thoughts that persist no matter how energetically they fight them. Almost always it affects their dreams through night terrors. The object of this demonic assault is to wear down the victim's defenses, to shake their resolve. If the victim allows this to happen, then they often end in complete anguish, despair, and thoughts of suicide.

It happens

Of course everyone knows about the final stage: possession, the subject of countless books and movies. We're all familiar with William Peter Blatty's masterpiece, The Exorcist. The phenomena portrayed in the film are exaggerated for dramatic effect, but they are based in factual accounts of exorcisms: the possessed individual gains superhuman strength, they can speak in elegant Latin despite never studying the language before, they begin calling out the sins of everyone in the room, or they may levitate above their beds.

Demonic infestation is different: it afflicts inanimate objects, places, or animals. When people speak of haunted houses, it's possible that a demonic infestation is to blame for the preternatural goings on inside.

Vade Retro Satana

The exorcist and I pulled up to the house in a large California suburb. "Time for a smoke?" I asked.

"Sure."

As I lit up, I said, "So what's going on?"

"This couple who lives here called my office complaining about problems with the house. I came out a few days ago to meet with them. They say some rooms are freezing cold, they hear bangs and laughter at night, and there's just a heavy feeling when they're inside."

"What do you think?"

"I did some research on the house's history in addition to what they told me about it. There's definitely a good chance this place is infested. So I'm going to use some blessed salt and holy water in the four corners, and then I'll celebrate the Mass in their living room. You'll be my altar server. Ready?"

"As I'll ever be."

Crux sacra sit mihi lux, non draco sit mihi dux

This took place in the middle of June. It was about 90 degrees outside, but as soon as we crossed the threshold into the house it was like stepping into a meat locker. I went from sweating a bit to being able to see my breath, and it definitely wasn't because of any air conditioning.

The couple's infant child was in a crib in the living room. They said the baby would wail and cry uncontrollably inside its upstairs room until they took him out. I noticed that the baby, bundled up in blankets, and the pet dog spent most of that morning staring at the top of the staircase and whimpering.

A murder had taken place in the house during the Great Depression. During the 1960s, the then residents practiced Santeria. The residents immediately prior to this couple were into Tarot cards and Ouija boards. If you take nothing else from this column, hear me now and believe me later: stay away from this stuff. I don't care if you think it's all superstitious mumbo-jumbo, but whatever you do, do not screw around with the occult.

I Cast Thee Out

I literally carried the exorcist's water as we went around the house. He liberally sprinkled holy water everywhere, scattered blessed salt in the corners, reciting prayers of deliverance from the ritual book. One of the rooms upstairs was definitely the coldest. Downstairs, the dog barked as the priest entered that room.

Afterward, we celebrated Mass downstairs without a hitch. The priest interviewed the couple again. They were fallen away Catholics who weren't yet married. The priest said that he can only do so much, and that it was up to them to go to confession, get married, and begin a regular life of prayer. When we finished, I noticed that the house was much warmer. Again, the couple was with us the entire time, so nobody was messing around with the AC.

The exorcist takes it all in stride. Another time I was doing volunteer work at his parish, when he told the office staff, "I'm seeing someone today about deliverance. If you hear anything strange, don't worry, it's just the devil." His patient, so to speak, was a mousy middle-aged housewife. She went into his office with him. Later on we heard what sounded like a raspy old man screaming that he would murder us all and eat our souls. All in a day's work I suppose.

Fr. Gabriele Amorth, chief exorcist of the diocese of Rome

There Are More Things In Heaven And Earth

A few years ago there was a movie called The Rite, based on the life of San Jose exorcist Father Gary Thomas. I've met Father Thomas, and he's an awesome priest. Near the end of the film, the demon is taunting the protagonist who has been suffering terrible doubts about his faith. "Do you believe now, little atheist priest? Do you believe in me now?" the demon hisses.

"Yes, I believe in the devil," the priest admits. "And that means I believe in God too." The look on the possessed man's face is priceless.

If being "red pill" means seeing the world as it really is, then men need to understand that there is more to this world than sensory experience. You may not believe in the supernatural but that doesn't mean it doesn't exist. To borrow a line from Gunnery

Sergeant Hartman, you had best unfuck yourself or Satan’s minions will unscrew your head and shit down your neck.

Read More: What I Learned From Death

Andrew Levinson
Andrew "Beefy" Levinson is a normal man which makes him an outcast in the progressive dystopia of California. He enjoys good liquor, fine cigars, old books, and works to bring a little order to a world gone mad. He blogs regularly at Lamentably Sane.

Why Modern Men Must Become Aristocrats Of The Soul

August 29, 2015 | by Mark Citadel | Link | Original Link

If one were to compare the men of the traditional world to those of the modern world, certain differences in constitution would become readily apparent. While institutions and environment will alter the spiritual constitution of men if allowed to become influential enough, in the grand sense, a people's men will actually find more influence going in the opposite direction.

If a society succeeds, it is likely due to the character of its men. If a society fails, so too is this likely due to the character of its men. For this reason, those differences between men of two time periods before and during an epoch such as that which we find ourselves in cannot be ignored, for rather than products, they find themselves more as integral causal factors.

Where the men of our distant past were ceaselessly heroic and courageous, sure of themselves, masters of their own destiny, today men are undeniably weak in all areas to which their sex should render them adept. You ask why men today are on the verge (if not already there) of being less educated than women, and all this entails in the world of socioeconomics?

You ask why every law, most of which were written by men, are today slanted against our sex with the intention of supposedly preventing our long-held and deeply evil patriarchal privilege? You ask why white heterosexual men are the most vilified people in existence, against whom it is fine for a major television network owner to utter quotes such as that we “just have to die”?

One can blame the institutions, the schools, the government, the media, perhaps even secret conspiratorial bands such as the Frankfurt School. However, this misses the larger point. It directs critique against events and people in history whose actions and formulations were in fact only parasites latching on to a greater decline to which we were tragically blind.

The True Virility Of Man

Modern man lacks a laundry list of virtues, but only two are absolutely essential for societal health and success. These are the virtue types that correspond to what Julius Evola termed “True Virility.” They are, Heroism (warrior bravery) and Asceticism (transcendent discipline). Without some measure of these two components, man will fail to achieve true manhood.

The fewer men who achieve this state, the less stable and correctly ordered a society will become. All manner of calamities will befall a nation which has no real men, whether it be the explosion of depravity, defeat at the hands of a superior enemy on the field of combat, or the implosion of the sociopolitical order due to the lack of control exerted over both women and men of exceptionally poor character.

Problems faced by the Occidental West exist in orders of root importance, and one of the most primary, if not the primary malfunction, is the abolition of man. We are indoctrinated to believe that all violence is wrong and that young boys should observe womanly “classroom etiquette” which will help them become ‘courteous and conscientious’ men.

We are taught to abandon self-sacrifice and the ritual life, to cast off the religious beliefs of our ancestors as the crude tools of white privilege and autocratic rule. By this dismissal, what is achieved? Shells of men blindly walking from one humiliation to the next, addicts for what small pleasures they can find, and thus masters of nothing. Can an addict ever be the master of his substance?

Now that men have ceased to be men, women have an unassailable advantage in the sexual economy that is unparalleled in human experience. Modernity’s corrosive has burned right through the soul of man and as such has disarmed him of any weapon he might use to halt its destructive advance.

The Unique Breed

With this taken into consideration, we observe man in a pitifully hopeless position, not because he is so unfortunate as to be persecuted, but because he is so pathetic as to be persecuted.

Looking at the current state of affairs, light shards of hope penetrate through the darkness, the whisper in the underground of those who dare to, in a very organized fashion no less, raise objection to modernity's preeminence. Some are disappointments, believing there to be legal recourse for what is a megalithic disorder, or seeking reconciliation with those our ancestors would have considered intractable and insane enemies. Others go deeper and know with certainty that to throw off this yoke, man will have to be reborn.

You must foster these true virilities in yourself, in the knowledge that you are a unique breed. Most men, the vast majority in the West perhaps, are content with their meager lot in life as all semblance of respectability slips away in a world long since put to the flame. You do not. If you see the modern world for what it is, you already exhibit a trait that is rare: the unvexed, rightist mind.

You are perhaps the embryonic stage of what Evola called the "Aristocrat of the Soul." From this, with a staunch and unyielding opposition to modernity, ascetic in development and undoubtedly heroic in its eventual conclusion, Occidental man can once again stand tall. On that day he will live no longer among the ruins but among the new construction yards of those grand institutions leveled by the liberals. He will enter the regal stream of the new current.

Preparation Of The Inner Man

This is no call to action, but instead a call to become actionable. When manhood returns it will have no help from those forever gelded by the feminine nature of the "Enlightenment." You must cast off all illusions put upon you by our new cultural wardens, endure all pains for the cause of righteousness pursued, and find yourself proudly guilty of all 'phobias' and 'isms' heaped upon you.

In your own life, pursue the fight, the confrontation, and the opportunity to show strength. Consign yourself to contemplation and ritual in the long hours, for discipline will be essential in the times ahead. No battle can be won by men in a world where men remain extinct.

It is only through the cultivation of the stouthearted and disciplined man that the enemies of lost manhood may be unseated, for though physically, mentally, and spiritually deficient, they hold all the levers of power which prevent any kind of judicial, political, or even meaningful argumentative victory.

Any appearances of such victories are merely Pyrrhic distractions. The first and most important battle is that of the soul of man. Once this is rejuvenated and repaired, the rest will come as a necessary response. Every external action should serve to strengthen your inner resolve in contribution to the eventual return of sane traditional civilization, which may only materialize after a truly harrowing period to come.

Always remember, half measures are not enough. Through understanding the truths of men and women, it is exceptionally easy to "hack" the system for the gifts of fleeting and fleshly joys, but we do ourselves a disservice to pursue this while ignoring the greatest joys which are so unjustly denied to us, those of family, headship, the national life, ultimate purpose, and honor.

These are the greatest ends one can lay down all that ties him to the current order for. To quote the Orthodox martyr Corneliu Zelea Codreanu, “Avoid carnal pleasures for they kill the soul. Do not destroy the hero that is in you!”

Read More: You Are What You Feed Your Soul

Mark Citadel
Casual observer of all things in motion.

Woman Attempts To Shake Down Chicago Bulls Star Derrick Rose With Baseless Rape Claim

August 29, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Chicago Bulls star point guard Derrick Rose is in the middle of a civil suit against him for allegedly raping a woman at her apartment in August of 2013. You can read the "complaint" here.

According to reports, Rose and two of his friends are accused of breaking into her apartment and taking turns raping her. This, according to a friend of the accuser, was after a failed attempt by Rose to drug and rape her at a party in his Beverly Hills home earlier in the night.

Rose

The accuser, who at this point is referred to as “Jane Doe,” is seeking unspecified damages due to physical and emotional trauma, as well as post traumatic stress disorder.

In a statement, Rose’s lawyer, Lisa Cohen, states that:

> This is nothing more than a desperate attempt to shake down a highly respected and successful athlete.

I don’t know Derrick Rose so I can’t speak to whether or not he’s respectable, but we here in the ‘sphere know a potential false rape accusation when we see one, and this particular one is a layup. Here’s why we have strong doubts about it’s validity.

She didn’t go to the police

What do Emma Sulkowicz, Jackie Coakley, and most other public false rape accusers have in common? They didn’t go to the cops after the incident.

Wouldn’t going to the police be less strenuous?

Jane Doe claims she didn’t go to the police out of embarrassment and shame, and was concerned her conservative family would find out.

Doe claims she doesn’t remember much about the facts surrounding the events, but according to reports she definitely recalls every gruesome detail of her brutal rape:

> “Jane has very little recollection of the events that followed given her incapacitated state of consciousness, with a recollection of only few second flashes at a time,” the lawsuit states. “However, Jane does recall brutal details of the rape.”

If a woman was gang raped and knew she was being gang raped, she’d file a police report.

Back in January, retired porn star Cytherea was forcibly raped multiple times by three men. She immediately went to the police, filed a report, and the three suspects were apprehended and are awaiting trial in Las Vegas.

The bottom line here is that genuine rape victims go to the cops. This woman waited two years to bravely come forward and regale the world with her harrowing experience with an NBA star and his two sex hungry friends, a story that just so happens to potentially make her a large amount of money. Which brings us to…

She stands to make a large amount of money

Is there any doubt as to why she’s doing this?

This one’s not hard to figure out after reading a detailed account by Yahoo! Sports:

> “As a direct consequence of these unlawful acts, plaintiff has suffered severe physical injury, emotional distress including post-traumatic stress disorder, as well as economic, consequential, and other damages,” the suit contends.

When the 2015-2016 NBA season starts, Derrick Rose will be in year three of a five year, $95 million contract with the Chicago Bulls. He also has a $185 million shoe deal with Adidas.

So let’s unpack this, shall we?

Imagine this scenario: girl meets NBA star at a party, they exchange numbers, fuck for two years, then when she learns of his $280 million windfall from his contract and shoe deal, she decides that 24 months after they ended their consensual sexual relationship that she was gang raped by him and two of his friends. Sound plausible?

Rose’s lawyer hit the nail on the head when she called this feeble accusation a shakedown. In my opinion, the slut lost her job and decided to cash in on a two-year tryst with a professional athlete and set herself up for life.

Is this ever going to end?

Not likely. Professional athletes will always draw attention from beautiful women, so their commingling isn’t going to end any time soon.

I’ve stated before that it’s open season on professional athletes on all levels. Combine that with rape hysteria and the sports media publicizing baseless rape claims by side chicks-a-plenty, you can be sure that more are on the way.

Fellow Chicago sports star Patrick Kane is currently embroiled in his own rape ordeal

Rose's case will hopefully be open and shut because there is no evidence of rape whatsoever. But similar to walking a suspect into the courtroom in his orange jump suit while shackled at the wrists and ankles to increase the appearance of guilt, ESPN continues to scroll every single rape or domestic violence accusation or report across that famed bottom line.

Females the world over see the fame and publicity that even a thinly-veiled money grab can get them, along with interviews for their "bravery" which ultimately lead to their end game…money.

Conclusion

Based on the shaky facts of the case it appears that, aside from a few weeks of bad publicity, Rose will likely come out of this ordeal unscathed. The Bulls haven't taken the Baltimore Ravens approach by tearing up his contract (the collective bargaining agreement in the NFL allows this for any reason) and Adidas has voiced their support for Rose stating that their partnership with him is unwavering.

Derrick seems confident as well:

> "I am just focusing on staying healthy and getting ready for the season," Rose said in the statement. "I am not going to comment other than to say — I know the truth, and am confident I will be proven innocent."

At the end of the day, this appears to be another false rape claim by a woman looking to finance her useless life by exploiting a professional athlete.

Read Next: Why American Has Become Infected With Rape Hysteria

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

How I Experienced The Holy Grail Of Workplaces In A Polish Hospital

August 30, 2015 | by Jan Pechorin | Link | Original Link

I'm a trainee doctor in the UK who self-prescribes the red pill. I happened to get a travel work placement at a major hospital in Poland earlier this year. That's the kind of things medics do. They spend their limited holiday time doing more medicine. Because medicine.

For my Polish experience I was expecting some adventures on evenings and weekends, and was therefore planning on doing the bare minimum in the hospital itself, other than perhaps scoffing at how superior the British NHS is to the significantly less well funded Polish equivalent. Little did I know that this hospital experience would actually open my eyes to the criminal underinvestment in manliness in my own health service.

The realm of men

I already had some experience with the country, but had not been back there since popping the red pill. While this new world view has made me better with women, it has also made me more socially analytical, causing me to question things I previously took for granted—like why is everyone so smug and happy that the majority of doctors in the UK will soon be female?

From day one in the Polish hospital, things were different. I was assigned to a surgical team, which in England means being ignored, either by some privately educated Christopher Lee-type surgeon, when he realizes you didn't go to a school that's similar to Hogwarts, or by some privately educated Indian surgeon, when he realizes you're not Indian, from his caste, and privately educated.

Much to my surprise, I was welcomed like a lost son and thrown in at the deep end, getting more surgical experience than ever before and learning more through my broken

Polish and generous translators in a couple of weeks than I could have in England in six months. My new powers of analysis, and a beer with a friend, led me to draw the following differences between our two health systems:

Leadership

The United Kingdom

The most a British doctor can aspire to…

The patient is king. Anything they want, no matter how ludicrous ("chop off my dick, doc!") is granted them. The doctor can at best aspire to be a skilled diplomatic slave, the court eunuch who relies on persuasion and cocksucking to get his way, to do what is actually best for the patient's health, while being ever so ever so careful not to offend them or make them feel disempowered.

Poland

Your average Polish surgeon.

The doctor is king. The doctor knows what he is doing. The patient accepts and respects this. A post-op patient complained to my surgeon that she didn't sleep at night because the patient in the neighboring bed was noisy. This surgeon had saved the complainer's life the day before. He politely said "I'm sorry." She complained further. Surgeon's response: (Looking at me confused) "Is this a hotel or a hospital?" She shut the fuck up and left him a bottle of vodka when she was discharged.

Doctors

The United Kingdom

English doctors, especially the young ones, dress increasingly like rich hipsters (which they mostly are), and metrosexuals (which they also mostly are). The female doctors dress like feminists (which they also mostly are).

Poland

Polish doctors dress like they're about to do some DIY and then put a white coat on top. They know their trade. They don't need to dress like pros, because they already are pros. The female doctors under 40 dress sexy and wear skimpier white coats, and then age with dignity.

Female surgeons are few and far between, but those I met made sure to compensate for their masculine job by wearing special lady scrubs that do not exist in the UK and show off their fantastic legs. A feminist exchange student complained and asked to wear trousers like the men. She was appropriately given the status of "swamp monster" by the nurses.

Nurses

The United Kingdom

Multiculturalism is the best medicine for our dying war generation.

In the UK, nurses are either fat Africans, or fat Filipinos, or men. Many speak poor English and scare older patients with their alien accents and cultures.

Poland

Boring, homogeneous, backward Poland.

In Poland, nurses are all women (as far as I could see). The young ones are hot and flirt with anything in a white coat. I was wearing a white coat.

Hurting feelings

The United Kingdom

Medical students and doctors are given training in how to be sensitive to gay patients so they don't get emotional butthurt on top of their physical butthurt. We learn to stop using vile heteronormative language like "husband" and "wife" in interactions with all patients.

Don't assume that an old lady with a ring on her finger and pictures of her grandkids around her is a normal straight old lady, you heteronormative bigot! Ask about her partner. If she doesn't understand the question, she's a bigot.

Poland

Every Polish doctor I told this to.

Abortion

The United Kingdom

British doctors bend over backwards to refer women of any age for abortions or perform them directly, without asking for a reason, because, y'know, choice. 98% of the annual 200,000 abortions are for "social reasons," i.e "I'm too selfish not to kill my baby".

Sacrificing human beings always makes women more attractive.

Poland

Polish doctors don’t murder babies to please feminists. In fact they just don’t murder babies at all. Primitive, right?

Another dumb Polak.

Interaction between the sexes

The United Kingdom

Women will simultaneously use their bodies to gain power and status in a hospital through their senior male catches and also complain and shout “sex abuse” (not even harassment these days, always “abuse”) at the first useful opportunity. Men live in frustrated fear. Even Nobel Prize winners are lynched without trial for making the tamest jokes.

Poland

Interaction between male doctors and female doctors and nurses is healthy, classy, and flirtatious and everyone is happy.

The bonds between men

The United Kingdom

The relationship between males is one of unhealthy competition. To succeed they will deny their honorable manly nature and behave in bitchy underhand ways, reporting colleagues for minor mistakes and ranking each other as low as possible in peer assessments.

Older doctors and surgeons are nostalgic for the golden days of medicine when things were more like Poland, but they don’t fight to restore this former glory for future generations. Instead they retire early and shirk their duties to posterity.

Poland

Elder Polish doctors understand the importance of male bonding and the passing down of masculinity and skill to the next generation. They take the younger men under their wing like surrogate fathers and endow them with the capability to be successful in their trade.

They also enforce masculinity. When the hot girlfriend of a patient walked past us in the corridor, I looked the other way to be professional. My senior surgeon stopped walking, deliberately turned his head to follow her ass with no shame and then he looked at me: “Are you blind or something?”

Supervision

The United Kingdom

British doctors live in fear of litigation and professional misconduct hearings. They try to do everything by the book and cover their asses incessantly. The effect of this is that any learning or training takes years longer than it should, and precious human resources are wasted on supervision. We are broken men cowering under the weight and terror of the system we have sold ourselves to.

Poland

A wimpy medical student on exchange from Germany came into the OR one day and politely explained as a disclaimer that he could only observe and couldn't take part in any procedure because he didn't have the correct Polish insurance. The surgeon looked him up and down and said: "Germans like rules. Poles like action. Suit up." The German became a Pole. The boy became a man.

Conclusion

Polish doctors are paid considerably less than their British counterparts, but I'd rather not be paid to be a pussy. Polish lessons begin next month.

Read More: The Manipulated Man: A Holy Bible Of Red Pill Wisdom

Jan Pechorin
Jan is a medic who is fascinated by the therapeutic properties of the red pill, and its potential to save not only male lives but also Western civilization as a whole. Currently based in the UK. God save the Queen!

British Police “Investigate” Long Dead British Prime Minister Over “Sex Abuse” Claims

August 30, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Spurred on by the scandal involving late comedian Jimmy Saville, which led to the SJW lobby demanding more convictions (without emphasis on due process for the accused), five British police forces are now investigating the late British Prime Minister Sir Edward Heath for child sex abuse. Meanwhile, the central accuser, a 1990s brothel keeper, was convicted for “controlling prostitutes” and jailed for sex years, substantially undermining her credibility.

The focus on “historical sex abuse allegations” is simply out of control. Not because sexual abuse didn’t happen in the past, but rather because of the ubiquitous watering-down of “beyond reasonable doubt” to produce demanded convictions. Sir Edward is not only not here to defend himself, the allegations go so far back and would be so unsupported evidentially that any posthumous “finding” against him would make a mockery of the justice system.

The myth of rape culture is watering down the justice system

Because Jimmy Saville was never prosecuted, SJWs want more convictions of other men, with little emphasis on the evidence actually against them and how this compares to the evidence needed for convictions for other categories of crime.

You cannot secure a conviction of tax evasion against someone based on testimony or mere allegations. Short of CCTV footage or DNA and other “hard” evidence (like finding stolen money or items at a suspect’s home), it is also supremely unlikely that courts would convict someone of robbery for crimes this year, let alone 30 or 40 years ago. Why are rape and child sex accusations treated so differently, requiring much more subjective and doubtful “evidence”?

Irrespective of the outcome, the memory and legacy of Sir Edward, an already undervalued Conservative Prime Minister, will be forever besmirched. With poorly supported statistics, feminists and SJWs have created for many in the public the illusion that rape is an epidemic not only occurring in society but one reinforced by even the highest elites.

Suddenly, by taking surveys, which oftentimes additionally expand the definition of sexual assault to include “impoliteness” like “catcalling,” these do-gooders can claim that we need more convictions to reflect the true proportion of “victims.”

Devoid of context and creating witch hunts

The scales of justice are beyond skewed when it comes to unsupported sexual assault allegations.

Feminists conveniently discard the context of rape and sexual abuse allegations. Whereas an alleged physical assault that occurs in a club or on the street is much more easily proven, via CCTV and other evidence, what occurs in a bedroom or similar private location is harder to pin down.

Because of this, SJWs implicitly (or sometimes explicitly) argue that the answer is to make much more doubt acceptable in the "beyond reasonable doubt" formula, i.e. believe the woman. This is why, for example, more objective evidence like bank statements pointing to undeclared income are necessary in tax evasion cases and not with rape accusations.

Rather than the culture at large "supporting rape," it is a matter of being able to prove rape in a manner consistent with what is expected for other crimes. And if rape is so promoted by society, why does it never happen publicly? At every nightclub precinct in the Western world, "privileged" males will attack members of their own gender (but strangely not women) in front of a hundred people or more, but one never sees a man penetrate a woman against her will in a public place.

If violence is at an all-time low, how can rape and child abuse be at an all-time high?

In between writing clickbait articles, it would be nice if people like Jessica Valenti could explain why other crimes need so much more evidence than sexual assault allegations.

I believe that many in the police force secretly regret the fact that these investigations against Sir Edward have started. Many regard the police as a law unto themselves, but they are often at the mercy of outside pressures that force them to focus on particular crimes or begrudgingly support the pet projects of SJWs. Moreover, as a part of the executive arm of government, police must respond to the dictates of political considerations. The separation of police from other institutions of government is by no means total.

The whole saga with Sir Edward raises serious doubts about the veracity of "rape" and similar sexual abuse statistics. In a number of my articles I have mentioned Harvard academic Steven Pinker, who argues comprehensively that violence rates are now the lowest in history. These findings do not at all accord with the quotidian feminist promulgation of rape culture, especially in universities allergic to due process.

Despite Dr. Pinker's cogent analysis, SJWs maintain that 1 in 5 female university students are "sexually assaulted" in the space of just three to five years of tertiary education. Unsurprisingly, they do not elaborate on how many or which kinds of men supposedly commit these crimes, but they load essentially all the "blame" onto all their male fellow students.

Based on these made-up statistics, university-educated men in first-world countries, who have the most to lose from a rape allegation, commit sexual assault at the highest rate of any group in any society on planet Earth.

Like Sir Edward, other men accused of sexual assault will never get an iota of sympathy from the SJWs actively hunting them down. Not even the grave protects you nowadays.

Read More: British Police Chief Will Prioritize Online Abuse Reports Over Burglaries

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Swedish Boys Demand Apology For Not Being Able To Wear Dresses In School Photo

August 30, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The boys of class 9B wanted to wear dresses for their school photo, but they soon found out that their crossdressing wasn't allowed. Now they are demanding an apology for not being able to wear women's clothing, but their headmaster is holding surprisingly strong in his anti "gender fluid" position. The story has made headlines and upset both children and adults in Sweden.

Crossing the line

On the day of the school photo shoot, a class of ninth graders (15 and 16 years old) in the town of Ronneby decided to mix things up a bit. While the boys came wearing dresses, the girls wore jeans, shirts, and bow ties.

However, an employee intervened and told the children to change their outfits. Otherwise their photo would be replaced by a blank page in the catalogue. The students did as they were told, but first took pictures of themselves with a mobile phone.

Outrage ensues

Tuva Jarleberg, one of the girls wearing male clothing that day, had this to say to Swedish public service radio:

> I think that it was very wrong because we talk a lot about equality and hbtq in our school, and we support that.

She said that the children wearing outfits typical of the opposite sex, was at first not meant as a serious statement of any kind.

> First we saw it as a fun thing to do, to change roles in the school photo.

But when they were told to change back to their normal clothes and, allegedly, that "boys can't wear dresses," they wanted to send a message about "hbtq, equality and stuff like that."

Demanding an apology

Now Tuva Jarleberg wants the school to apologize and admit that what they did was wrong. But the principal, Rickard Andersson, said that he and his staff have nothing to apologize for.

> We don't want them to be dressed up or using the school catalogue for political or other types of manifestations.

According to him, the school cannot have students wearing anything other than their regular outfits in the photo. That's because the police and other authorities might need the picture to identify students.

> If our students go to one of the other schools and start trouble, we want to know who those students are.

The principal also noted that there is an opportunity for students to dress any way they like, be it in a humorous way or to send a political message, for another photo that is taken before the end of the fall semester.

He stressed that the children can dress pretty much any way they like during school hours.

> If a boy had come to the school wearing a dress on weekdays he would have been allowed to wear that also on the school photo.

A feminist shares her insight

Ninja Thyberg, filmmaker.

Filmmaker Ninja Thyberg, who has made several movies on the topic of gender roles, was invited to Sveriges Radio to have her say on the story. She took issue with how people are “socialized into the different binary gender categories.”

> We dress up, we mimic. It’s a masquerade, what we wear. We are not men and women, we become them.

She also said that some children at that age might want to experiment and wear clothes and hairstyles out of the ordinary.

> So I think this sounds like a very fun, good and progressive initiative by the students.

Ninja Thyberg commented on how it is often acceptable for women to wear men’s clothing and cut their hair short, thereby looking more strict and professional. But when men wear women’s clothing they become the subject of mockery.

> A dress is more decorative, it accentuates the body. It shows more clearly that > the outfit is made to enhance you as an object.

Boys will be boys

A lot can be said about this story. But let's focus on how misguided these kids' attempt at making a statement was.

Ninja Thyberg speaks out against the ridiculing of men in dresses. But if she looked at the photos taken by the teenagers, she would see that the boys are obviously fooling around.

In the photos they are striking awkward, sexual poses and making faces for the camera. Not one of them tries to look comfortable and content in their skimpy outfits. In regards to the girls, some of them are laying on the ground with one hand on the groin.

The message they are sending is not that it's fine to dress like a woman if you're a man. It's that if you do so you look silly. A man in a dress is silly, and they know it. Their little photo coup won't change that.

Furthermore, a woman grabbing her crotch is obscene and would not be tolerated in, for instance, a workplace environment. If these girls really wanted to help women succeed in society, and be treated the same way as men, they would dress sharply while posing in a more dignified manner.

Generation trans

What is most ironic is that these kids don't actually dress this way regularly. While claiming that a man wearing a dress is perfectly normal, they would never do it themselves. If they did so on a regular basis, no one would have questioned why they dressed that same way for the school photo.

While these youngsters still have a lot to learn, they're perceptive enough to understand that women look good in certain types of clothes, and men in other. That's why they normally wear clothes fitting for their gender.

Their reason for dressing up was at first to have a laugh at each others' expense. Then it became an excuse to appear in newspapers, radio and TV shows, showing how noble and tolerant (and, of course, brave) this young generation is.

Children gone awry

What is frightening is that these kids will soon grow up to be the principals, politicians, and CEO's of Sweden. A whole generation of social justice warriors, bent on making transgenderism mainstream and questioning the very idea of there being an actual difference between men and women.

Even if you're a person who wants kids to be able to express themselves in their own way, there's a case to be made for the principal's decision. He did the right thing by enforcing the rules of conduct and not letting the students play dress up for the school photo.

There's a time and place for everything. Now might be a good time to start teaching children (and a particular feminist filmmaker) about the very real differences between the sexes, and why our different bodies make us dress differently.

Read More: 3 Types Of Women Who Refuse To Wear High Heels

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

Librarian At University Of Tennessee Instructs Students To Stop Saying “He” And “She”

August 31, 2015 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

A librarian at the University of Tennessee made headlines this week when she sent a memo to university members instructing them to use “gender-neutral” language and avoid words like “he” or “she.” As director of the school’s Pride Center, Donna Braquet encouraged members at the Knoxville branch to instead use made up words like “ze, hir, hirs, and xe, xem, xyr.”

Readers of Return of Kings are aware of a long-lasting crusade by feminists against language. By manipulating language, feminists and gay-rights extremists can erase masculinity and femininity from America’s culture. Now it appears you can’t even say “he” or “him” without the local diversity officer getting on your case!

How Gay Rights Leads To Censorship

Donna Braquet's activism began innocuously enough. She became co-chair of the UT Commission for LGBT People and called for equal legal rights for homosexual couples. But delve deeper in her words and you find some unsettling ideas in this biology librarian.

In 2009, Donna speculated in a school LGBT forum whether or not the economy creates "more of a hardship for gay couples." Before that, Donna brazenly said libraries must lose all objectivity as information centers, and promote her social causes. She called for libraries to:

- "Promote advertising and marketing of available 'queer' information support services."
- "Develop the physical library and information center as a safe space for 'queer' youth via promoting workships, lectures, book talks, and other programs on 'queer topics and issues.'"

What kind of resources does Donna want to promote onto the youth? In 2013, Donna held a showing of a film about children of same sex parents. From the trailer of the film, it looks like propaganda that idealizes lesbian parents and demonizes fathers. At one point, a lesbian describes the proper way of throwing a baby in the air while footage is shown of a man balancing a baby on his hand from a rooftop.

Librarian Donna's effort to remove objectivity from information centers can only lead to censorship. A library is only so big. If you provide a large variety of homosexual-themed propaganda material, you have less books about classic literature and arithmetic. If you embrace one side of a social controversy you implicitly deny voice to the other side. Her campaign is anything but "inclusive."

How Gay Rights Leads To Harassment

Donna has also called for libraries to influence other institutions: "Build collaborations and partnerships with community agencies (schools, churches, businesses) to address abuse, homophobia, and hate crimes;"

What does Donna mean by collaboration and partnership? She wants the students to "do greater proactive marketing and networking to address equality in other community avenues such as schools and colleges, and churches and religious institutions." You guessed it, push gay "rights."

It is interesting that Donna specifically calls out schools and churches for her "proactive marketing" and "partnership." The few remaining schools and churches that oppose "equality" are under constant risk of losing accreditation or tax-exempt status. Anybody who does not agree with their leftist dogma of fluid gender and sexual depravity is a target.

Consider the uninclusive language that outraged the recent gay Virginia shooter. He seemed pretty intent on addressing equality in his community!

Activists "encourage" their contradictory notion of "equality" and "diversity" onto young impressionable minds. They demand that youth be both equal and diverse at the same time. You aren't diverse unless you address those around you with idiotic psychobabble, and you aren't equal unless you give disproportionate space to homosexual issues. This feminist and homosexual crusade against language is simply another way to deny human nature and force compliance onto others.

It is also interesting that this comes from a librarian. From a very young age, teachers do all they can to keep masculine children away from libraries. Most men hate reading and writing today because classes are geared toward girls and female issues. Masculine thinking is met with contempt. English teachers are hoping that half-way through The Bluest Eye you will give up and drop out of the class.

It is important that we not ignore efforts like Donna's as foolish nonsense. Kids go through these universities and really start believing all this. They were never taught the sublime importance of language and grammar. They never considered the artistic beauty of the human body and what an atrocity it is to deny inborn traits.

If you are a student or if you just want to become more cultured, delve into classic grammar and learn the true importance of "he" and "her." Embrace the natural human traits that come with being a man and how it is expressed in human art and nature.

In order to make it as a student today, you must be pugnaciously counter-establishment and pro-libertarian. Don't let the librarian dictate how things are going to be.

Read More: Harvard University Jumps The Shark

Amasa M. Lyman
Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

Why I Don’t Believe In Chinese Greatness

August 31, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

One of the biggest stories of recent days was the crash of the Chinese stock market. It drew headlines around the world, but not in China. The state-run media made sure that the news was safely hidden from view. As journalist Frank Langfitt noted in an interview on August 29:

> Well, it was interesting, because, initially – in the first couple of days – there was hardly any coverage at all. Take the People’s Daily – that’s the Communist Party mouthpiece – on Tuesday, when it came out – and keep in mind, on Monday, the stock had dropped over 8 percent – the stock market – and it was the worst since the global financial crisis. But if you looked at the front page of the People’s Daily, it didn’t have anything. There was a headline about a government development project in Tibet and a feature on how beautiful Haikou, this city in Hainan – China’s Hawaii – is. When you turn to CCTV – that’s China Central Television – their lead story was a press conference on plans for the celebration of the 70th anniversary of the end of World War II. So it was as though it actually didn’t happen.

Those who were prepared to believe that China was poised to take over the world got a lesson in reality this past week. But I wasn’t surprised. I never trusted anything the Chinese government or corporations said about anything. There’s just no transparency there; you can’t trust the numbers. The culture of scamming, lying, and greed is so deeply embedded that it will never be shaken.

A country can never achieve greatness when its citizens refuse to respect the rule of law, refuse to follow the rules of civilized behavior, and refuse to put the common good ahead of their own petty greed.

I'm not impressed with China. From what I've seen, there's no social glue holding the fabric of the society together. At the end of the day, there is an absolutist authoritarian system running the show that is deeply and irredeemably corrupt. There are schemes on top of schemes, and scams on top of scams, and you're never going to be able to trust the numbers that they feed you.

I agree with Donald Trump on his point. Regarding China, he has said, "They're killing us on trade. They're laughing at us. They have geniuses negotiating for them, and we have idiots." He notes—correctly—that China has destroyed US industry with the active collusion of the business class here in America. In other words, the rich in America sold out their own country's economy, and dismantled its manufacturing base, to make an easy buck with China.

To anyone with a sense of national pride, this is intolerable.

I see the same thing in Brazil, a country I visit often and means a great deal to me. In one recent trip, I was on a date with a girl who had tried to set up a clothing store in her city. But she just couldn't compete with the Chinese product dumping. The Chinese use networks of immigrants (many illegal) to import huge shipping containers full of junk, and sell it at rock-bottom prices to destroy their competition.

The Brazilian government could care less, as long as customs officials get their payoff. Meanwhile the girl I knew lost all her savings trying to keep her business afloat.

More scamming

It's the same story all around the world. One of the more incredible examples is China's canal project in Nicaragua. A Chinese company (Hong Kong Nicaragua Development Group) is currently preparing to dig a canal through Nicaragua, in order to short-circuit the American monopoly on the Panama canal. The scale of the project is staggering. It will be three times as long and twice as deep as the Panama canal, and will require the removal of over 4.5 billion cubic meters of earth.

It goes without saying that the environmental consequences will be disastrous. HKND plans to begin near the mouth of the Punta Gorda River, and then cut a channel along 55 miles of the river. It will create, in the process, a 153 square mile reservoir. It will then go another 23 miles into Lake Nicaragua, and from there another 20 miles to the Pacific.

The whole project reeks of corruption and insider dealing. Daniel Ortega, Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista leader, heads the second poorest country in the Western Hemisphere. Ortega's chief liaison with HKND is his own son, Laureano Ortega Murillo, who conducted secret meetings with the company in 2012 and earlier.

There was no bidding process. The CEO of HKND, a telecom billionaire named Wang Jing, has zero experience in engineering projects. And this canal is set to be one of the biggest in history. Wang claims to have no ties with the Chinese government, but I don't believe that for a second.

At Ortega's instigation, the Nicaraguan National Assembly "approved" the creation of a Nicaraguan Canal Authority, giving HKND exclusive control over the canal zone. But the concession gives Wang much more. He has rights to build nearly anything that is related to the canal: airports, free-trade zones, highways, railways, oil pipelines, and anything else.

The concession is a major blow to the country's sovereignty. Nicaraguan law will not apply in the canal zone, HKND will handle its own security, possibly in partnership with the Russians. The Nicaraguan government is trying to sell the whole project to the world by proclaiming how many "jobs" it will create, but the numbers are plucked from the sky.

Ortega, essentially, has sold out his country's economic future to the Chinese. Sound familiar? I'm sure the payoff was substantial.

What's even more absurd about all this is that there is no need for another canal in the region. The Panama Canal is almost finished with a major renovation; it can handle all shipping needs in the region for the foreseeable future.

But this hardly matters, since the Chinese canal project was never about rationality, it was about control. It was about gaining a commercial toehold in the Americas as a platform for commercial plunder and exploitation. The same game it is playing in Africa. And local leaders have just handed them the keys to the kingdom.

Not to be trusted

I know there will be readers who dismiss this article as an anti-China diatribe. So be it. But I don't trust the Chinese government, its business elites, or its corporations. I see them as an army of scammers and plunderers swarming around the world, who profit from the stupidity and venality of the local elites. If anything, this is a diatribe against our own leaders here in the Americas.

Our own leaders have sold us out, in this as in so many other things. They do nothing while our industry gets outsourced, dismantled, or bought out. I blame our leaders, I blame Latin American leaders, and I blame Brazilian leaders for selling their people out to Chinese money. They took the easy road, they took the quick payoff, and that was all they cared about.

This is not the stuff that great nations are made of. There's nothing wrong with commerce, and there's nothing wrong with seeking profits. That's what industry was built on. But China takes things to an extreme. In China, money is God. To me, its people have embraced greed and mendacity in business dealings to a terrible extent, to the detriment of everything else.

And this is why China, for all of its supposed economic "prowess," will never be a truly great global power. Man needs a spiritual center, a moral structure born of civilized values, to sustain him. Without this, he is nothing but an avaricious barbarian. Western values are superior to Chinese values, if only we can regain our confidence and sense of mission.

The Chinese government and business leaders have sold their souls to the idolatry of cash. And this is why their cities are drowning in pollution and poisonous gases, why their government and leaders are corrupt, and why money is worshipped as a god. Until this changes, we should be very, very alert in our dealings with them.

Read More: My Experience Building A Computer

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Why The Manosphere's Fear Of "TradCons" Is Misguided And Cowardly

August 31, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Among blogs in this part of the Internet, you'll often see men complaining about "traditional conservatives" or "TradCons," citing them as a threat to men that is equal or greater than feminism. "TradCons" are castigated because they purportedly want to force men back into rigid gender roles and because they enforce "male disposability," whatever that means.

In the views of MRAs and others who bash "TradCons," their number one enemy isn't Jessica Valenti, Amanda Marcotte, Gloria Steinem or any of the numerous feminists who've had an active role in shaping public thought and anti-male government policies, but Phyllis Schlafly. Schlafly, the kindly old lady who opposed the Equal Rights Amendment back in the 1970's—and who has almost no influence outside of conservative circles—is a favorite target of these intellectual pygmies.

Manospherians who treat "TradCons" as a greater threat to men than feminists—or even a threat at all—are not only disastrously wrong, they're total chickenshits as well. "TradCons" are a popular whipping boy for "men" who want to stick their heads in the sand and pretend that the left hasn't consistently been the sole, primary enemy of men. Indeed, a good many of the talking heads who attack "TradCons" are likely Marxist infiltrators themselves.

The Fallacy Of Moderation

The "conservatives are just as bad as leftists" argument falls apart merely by observing the power differential between the two groups. People who argue that neomasculinists are just as bad as feminists or that Return of Kings is the male equivalent of Jezebel also fall prey to this fallacy. It's a popular argument from moderates who are too cowardly to take a side in the culture wars.

Leftists and feminists have won every significant cultural battle of the past century. Just in the past six years alone, since Obama became president, the Overton window has shifted so far to the left that America is barely recognizable anymore. We've seen gay marriage rammed down the throats of every American, Christian business owners persecuted by the government itself for not wanting to act contrary to their beliefs, and the concept of rape redefined to "anything that makes a woman uncomfortable."

Does this sound like a world where "TradCons" have any power? It might have been plausible to regard "SoCons" or "TradCons" as a threat ten years ago, when President Bush and the GOP were actively courting evangelical Christian support in their successful national campaigns, but those days are long gone. The "TradCons" that manospherians castigate are a powerless minority; indeed, the impotence of mainstream conservatives is why the "cuckservative" epithet has become so popular.

Manospherians who whine about traditionalist conservatives being a threat on par with feminists are tilting at windmills. They're adopting the pose of feigned powerlessness that leftists use, the pose of those who control every important institution in the West yet still have nightmares about right-wing Republican fascists coming to murder them in their sleep. Moderates who insist that they're "above" the conflicts between feminists and anti-feminists are just weaklings who are unwilling to commit to a political stance.

The Enemy Of Your Enemy

Yet even if conservatives and leftists were equally matched in power and influence, the "anti-TradCon" manospherians would still be wrong.

MGTOW cultists and politically confused MRAs like to pretend that the right is just as misandric as the left, a claim that falls apart at the slightest examination. Almost all of the attacks on MRAs and anti-feminists come from the left, whether it's the Southern Poverty Law Center declaring manosphere sites to be "hate" groups to feminists organizing lynch mobs to hunt down and harass men who advocate masculine virtues in their writing.

While conservatives may ignore or dismiss the concerns of anti-feminists from time to time, there is no individual or group on the right that attacks the manosphere with the vitriol and hate that leftists do. There's no right-wing equivalent of the SPLC attempting to proscribe Return of Kings, and no conservative news site habitually refers to men's rights' activists as the "abusers' lobby." Indeed, in the past year, we've seen major right-wing sites like Breitbart warm up to our views.

While it's true that many so-called "TradCons" take issue with what they perceive as the licentious lifestyles we promote, most conservatives are content to let others live their lives as they please. They only want to keep unwanted influences out of their communities. It's the left—and only the left—that is intolerant of dissent and insists on forcing everyone to conform to their ideology.

Ultimately, the agita against "TradCons" in the manosphere is borne out of ignorance and malice. There are a lot of men in this part of the Internet who've learned the truth about women and masculinity yet are unwilling to abandon their "blue pill" beliefs in other areas. That's assuming that these men aren't cultural Marxist entryists who are seeking to lead us astray.

Read More: Knockout Game And Misguided Masculinity

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Women Objectify Themselves As Naked Food Platters For Money And Feminists Blame “Misogyny”

September 1, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

SJWs are calling for the boycott of Sydney’s Circular Quay Cruise Bar after naked women were employed as living food platters. As is typical for these kinds of fabricated controversies, the social justice crowd has ignored both the presence of scantily clad men and the rather huge issue about large numbers of women who willingly participated in the “misogynistic” relaunching of this business.

The women working as living food platters, who have a number of photos circulating, all look healthy. They are not starving. No one forced them to be hired as living food platters. One can easily imagine that the money they were paid for the role far surpassed the hourly rate they could achieve as a waitress or coffee girl.

It is therefore a woeful case of misapplied anger for people to be blaming Circular Quay Cruise Bar. The women had a choice to participate. Furthermore, if the event was so misogynistic, what does that say about the female guests who went to and remained at the event for hours, cheerfully using social media to highlight their presence at the establishment?

Funny how the women involved aren’t called “misogynists”

> Tonight, before I started work, I needed to dress a girls breasts in bananas. #cruisebar #sydney pic.twitter.com/lApC5P9Lz6
>
> — Kate Peck (@KatePeckme) August 26, 2015

The worst aspect of this otherwise very overhyped non-event is the steadfast refusal by SJWs to single out the many females who made the event possible, including the naked girls themselves, other women employed to organize the relaunch and the countless female guests who attended.

Among others, so-called Myer "ambassador" Kate Peck has, if you appropriate the "logic" of do-gooder feminists, thoroughly objectified women and perpetuated rape culture. Will Laura Pintur create a petition calling for her sacking, just as she and others successfully nagged supermarket chain Coles to stop selling men's magazine Zoo Weekly?

The calls by SJWs to boycott the establishment featuring the female food platters are a hundred light years away from surprising. Supposedly dedicated to advancing "womens' rights," they engage in a discourse, if you can even call it that, that reduces female autonomy to something resembling that of a common household insect. These easily offended souls are more concerned with promoting the infantilization of adult women, who should be thoroughly responsible for their actions, than actual children.

Most men can't fund their educations or lifestyles via sugar babying, prostitution or being naked food platters

If the appearance of naked female food platters was "misogynistic", Kate Peck, an "ambassador" for major department store Myer, is an unqualified misogynist. She boasted on Twitter that she "dressed" some of the women.

As mentioned above, men were employed at the Circular Quay Cruise Bar relaunch, adorned in nothing more than their underwear. In general, however, men of university or similar age are unable to earn anything close to the sort of money women can as sugar babies, prostitutes, or other "shiny things" such as promotions models.

The SJW penchant for blaming “patriarchy,” “rape culture,” and other buzzwords and concepts is just a method for distracting attention from the willing, calculated participation of innumerable women in their own profitable and ego-satisfying self-objectification.

Australia has a much better minimum wage than the United States, yet retail and hospitality work still pays amongst the lowest hourly rates in the economy. Many women do not want around $20 per hour for their efforts. It is true that these self-objectifying jobs vary in their remuneration, but the attention itself is also intoxicating. They want to feel desired. If someone wants their education or general lifestyle funded, they will find a way. It’s a matter of which way they choose.

If we excluded the legal ramifications, would anyone feel sorry for a male marijuana dealer who sells weed to put themselves through college? No. He would be told to get a real, honourable job and suck it up.

Start calling out the women furthering this “misogyny” and “rape culture”

> Just eating choc-dipped fruit off a babin model.. #dontmindme #cruisebar
>
> A post shared by Sarah 'Saz' Gillett (@sazgillett) on Aug 26, 2015 at 2:51am PDT

A woman attending the relaunch, Sarah Gillett, is an interesting example of how women bragging about their appearances in these kinds of events are spared condemnation. It is much easier for SJWs to blame amorphous ideas of “misogyny” and broader masculinity than females like Gillett.

The compulsive self-aggrandizers happily pepper their Instagram and additional social media accounts with images of them being hand fed by the poor creatures feminists claim are mere pawns for “rape culture” and “misogyny.” So isn’t Sarah Gillett promoting rape culture and misogyny by this standard?

But no, the solution selected is to blame the “patriarchy” which allegedly serves and is supported by every man, not those, male and female, there on the night. Everything is reducible to attacking men and constructing a narrative that cuts any and all personal responsibility demanded of women. This is nevertheless very good for critics of SJW crusades, as ROK has emphasized again and again. Our opponents consistently sow the seeds of their own discrediting.

SJWs are showing their true, self-serving colors

[image]
Well-paid “victims” of the indomitable patriarchy.

Overextension, whether it involves naked female food platters or men’s magazines, continues to out feminists and other SJWs. Their self-entitlement and belief in their own infallibility will expose them in story after story, like in the past. It is our job as producers and consumers of neomasculine and red pill literature to capitalize on these mistakes and disseminate them to an ever wider audience of sympathizers and those yet to be converted to the cause.

Just as my colleagues and I are vehicles for positive warning and change, so, too, are you. Be agents of improvement for both yourself and society. Spread these stories openly when you can and, fundamentally, subtly inculcate your friends and associates with our values.

Preaching can be counterintuitive but leading implicitly, by example, can work wonders and further our goals.

Read More: Why I Objectify Women

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why You Should Consider Supporting Marriage Privatization

September 1, 2015 | by Tobias Thorpe | Link | Original Link

As Americans debated whether the government should permit gay marriage over the last several years, I found myself pondering a completely different question. Why do private relationships need to be state-sanctioned at all?

I'd like to introduce you to marriage privatization, the concept that the government should have no authority over a private romantic relationship between two individuals. Any marital contract between the parties involved would exist only between them, and would be agreed upon prior to the marriage. The government's only role would be enforcing the terms of the contract, assuming one is even created.

Some of the biggest opponents of privatization were religious conservatives, who considered it a vote in favor of gay marriage. However, like it or not, gay marriage is now officially legal throughout the United States. It is highly unlikely that gay marriage will be overturned via a Constitutional amendment, so I think it would be wise to consider an alternative path forward, one compatible with the individualism promoted by the manosphere. Here are a few reasons to consider it:

It would invalidate sexist divorce laws

The terms of the marriage would be determined by the private contract, if one is created. With no state-sponsored marriage certificate, it would be far more difficult for the courts to dispossess a man from the fruits of his labor. If a man loses his ass in a divorce over a private contract, then it's his own fault. Privatization would make no difference in family courts, as child support and custody are determined by the birth certificate, not marital status.

Since the feminist agenda is primarily the dispossession of male resources through governmental intimidation and coercion, we can expect them to be some of the biggest opponents to privatization. If it were to pass, far more women would walk away from divorces empty-handed, simply because they didn't carefully consider the terms of their marital contract. In other words, women would be held accountable for their own decisions, just as men are. Marriage privatization would help bring real equality to the sexes, something most feminists fear and despise, so expect their opposition.

It may actually encourage marriage

This may seem counter-intuitive, but the current divorce laws disincentivize marriage by making it financially risky for men. The current laws also incent women to divorce whenever they become the slightest bit unhappy, given that women initiate between 66% to 90% of divorces.

Little girls don't dream about going to the courthouse and signing some government papers. Marriage has always been about a man and a woman publicly expressing their bond to each other, usually in the form of a ritual ceremony, and often recognized and approved by the religious institution of their choice. I highly doubt marriage will cease simply because they don't have to stop by the courthouse anymore.

It may help protect religious freedom

Now that gay marriage advocates have won, the next logical step is to force churches to permit gay ceremonies, or risk losing their tax-exempt status. The Leftist argument will almost certainly be that churches can marry who they want, but the government shouldn't be giving tax breaks to non-profits that "discriminate." They'll point to liberal churches that marry gays as exemplary, and focus their attack on traditional churches. By completely removing the government's role in marriage, it would be far more difficult for Leftists to use the federal government to impose their cultural agenda.

Criticisms

A common argument against marriage privatization is that it would essentially “allow” polyamory and incest.

Concerning polyamory and polygamy, there’s no way to prevent a man from having multiple consensual sexual relationships with many different women even now. A man can easily father many children from many different women today with no legal recourse, assuming he pays his child support. In other words, the current law cannot and does not prevent such behavior. Like it or not, even today monogamy is purely optional. If the 14th Amendment can be used to justify gay marriage, it can certainly be used to justify consensual polygamy. I believe it’s inevitable.

Incest is actually extremely rare. There’s evidence to suggest humans come equipped with incest avoidance mechanisms, which suggests an opposition to incest is biological, not cultural. I can’t think of a single person I know who doesn’t shutter at the thought of inbreeding with family members. Thus, I’m highly skeptical that incest will ever become a real trend. It’s just an example of fear mongering. Even the current laws cannot stop a brother and sister from procreating, assuming they’re hellbent on it. Therefore, I don’t consider this a realistic criticism either.

Conclusion

Believe it or not, there was a time when people just got married, and there was no need to ask permission from the state. The historical reasons for why the government got involved in marriage had to do, of course, with social engineering practices. Historically, if those with power didn't want certain races or religions to marry into the group, they would use the law to prevent the union from taking place. There is no reason for the state to be licensing marriages unless it's to exclude and thus "violate" the 14th Amendment. The legal precedent has been set.

The statists, of course, will try to scare you. They say we just "don't know" what will happen, although they're sure it will be something terrible. They ignore that privatization is how marriage worked for almost all of human history, and how it still works in various remote places. It's nothing more than fear mongering.

Gay marriage is apparently here to stay, so we need to plot a new course. Marriage is indeed an important institution and a vital component of the family unit. However, that does not mean it needs to be planned, sponsored, reviewed, or licensed by the ruling authorities. I believe this ultimately does it more harm than good.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Tobias Thorpe
Tobias is a defender of men and masculinity. His interests are self improvement, individualism, and culture.

ROK & RVF Subject To Persistent DDOS Attacks

September 2, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Starting on Wednesday, two servers that host many of my web sites have been subject to heavy DDOS attacks, peaking at one time to 56 Gbps but usually averaging between 2-3 Gbps. Since this attack began, ROK has been offline for 22 hours and both RVF and RooshV.com have been offline for over 12 hours. Countermeasures have been deployed as the engineers at my web host learn how the attack is proceeding, but I expect more downtime to occur in the next few days.

I don't currently have specific information on where this attack is coming from. I have so many enemies that it could have been organized by Canadian SJW's, the American homosexual lobby, the Israeli Defense Force, or the nation of Denmark. Whoever it is, I am committed to my sites and will do whatever it takes to keep them online, but I ask you to be patient during this time. On the bright side, once we're able to survive this, our armor will be strengthened in the case of future attacks.

In the meantime, we will publish articles on a limited schedule. Thanks for understanding.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Should You Live With Her?

September 3, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In general, relationships with women follow a predictable path. After the initial excitement and sexual frisson of meeting them you will enter a period of dating, during which she will probably exert pressure on you to become exclusive (or you will desire this for yourself).

After a period of exclusivity, perhaps inevitably the question of living together will come up. For many guys, particularly those still in the throes of passion, sharing a home with a woman that they find attractive seems like a no-brainer. After all, why wouldn't you want sex on tap, your meals cooked (if she has the requisite culinary skills) and the stability of a home with a woman with whom you share feelings?

However, received wisdom on men's websites in the last few years has warned sternly against cohabiting, which after all is only really one step away from marriage, the thought of which can send men into paroxysms in these parts. But the truth is that unless you are able to negotiate some form of "together-but-seperate" style relationship, this is an issue that you are going to have to consider seriously at some point.

After all, as much as some may rail against long-term relationships, few of us seriously want to be the seventy-year old player still hitting on girls at the mall. And unless anyone can propose anything else that stands up to scrutiny, a stable family remains the best environment in which to raise children.

The big step

Nevertheless, living with a woman is a big step — so big that I've only really done once, and that was by accident. In my early twenties my girlfriend at the time (with whom I had a massive, oneitis-tinged obsession) was forced to leave her accommodation, allowing me to scoop her up, white knight-style, and let her live with me. Needless to say the experiment was a disaster and she moved out around ten months later.

Since then, I have kept my living quarters resolutely female-free, rarely allowing girls to stay over for more than a couple of nights at a time. Around me, friends have got married, spawned children and generally traversed what Saul Bellow calls the "axial lines of life" in The Adventures of Augie March.

The reasons that I haven't done so are undoubtedly complex with deep psychological roots, but what it really comes down to is this: if you choose to live with a woman then you must recognise that even as you gain you will also lose much more than simply 50% of your living space. In the end this in an insoluble conundrum that each man must negotiate himself according to what he wants from life and his circumstances at the time.

My experience

I recently had a small experience of cohabiting that focused my thoughts anew on this topic. Regular readers of this column might remember an incident I related a few weeks back where I was effectively cock-blocked by Uber, messing up a sure-thing lay I had set up via daygame. Happily, there was a second act to this particular story.

I stayed in touch with Sandra, the Colombian girl from Paris and we arranged that she would return to London again a few weeks later. Due to a combination of events, and against my better judgement, I ended up agreeing that she could stay in my apartment for a week and that we would take a road trip to Brighton (a seaside resort near to London) for the weekend.

I have to report that I found the experience both good and bad, and while it was clearly only cohabiting on a micro scale it gave me some useful insights into the topic that I think can be usefully extrapolated. There may also be some handy pointers on Colombian girls here too, although I don't want to set too much store on a sample size of one!

1. Living Together Means That You Will Rarely Be Entirely Alone

During my week of living with Sandra I rarely, if at all, entirely alone. I spent fractious days in the office arguing about the work minutiae with my colleagues only to leave to have to worry about what to get for dinner for my hungry guest. The only time I was left to myself was in the bathroom, and even then I was conscious that there was someone else there waiting for me, desirous of my attention.

The issue here is around psychological rather than physical space. I currently have a demanding dayjob and one of the ways in which I'm able to negotiate it successfully is by ensuring that I have sufficient time alone (or with a few close male buddies) to recharge my batteries. Having a girl hanging around the place suddenly meant that right from the moment I woke up to when I fell asleep I had no solo downtime at all.

Granted, this was a girl I'd just met off the street, so we hadn't yet had time to develop the kind of nurturing bond that one (perhaps naively) would like to think is possible between partners. Still, my feeling is that it's pretty exhausting for a guy to lose all of his time for mental recuperation at a stroke, and something to think very seriously about.

2. Sex Is Great, But It Gets Same-y Very Quickly

Yes, sex is awesome, particularly with a cute new girl you've met by chance in the street.

However, as we all know sex gets tired pretty quickly. Here are some stats from the first few days of Sandra's visit:

Night-Morning 1: Sex four times

Night-Morning 2: Sex two times

Night-Morning 3: A blowjob

Things picked up again after that, but you see my point. Growing familiarity coupled with tiredness and work stresses etc means that sex starts to fall off pretty quickly when you are sharing the same living space.

3. OK, She Says Can Cook . . . But Is She Any Good?

For most girls cooking is something of a lost art. Sandra made a great show of cooking me dinner one night. After we'd dragged around a supermarket for over an hour (when what I really wanted to do was just sit down with my usual chicken and vegetables) she spent something like an hour and a half in the kitchen only to emerge with a plate of salmon, brown rice and broccoli covered with a little shop-bought white sauce.

Now, don't mean to sound ungrateful for the effort, and it was very nice as far as it went, but this was certainly not culinary valhalla and the man considering cohabitation might want to check his beloved's skills before signing the joint lease.

4. Intimacy Can Be Really Nice . . .

However alpha the guy, there is undeniably something very appealing about coming home to a woman's affection and actually, as she was understandably on her best behaviour for the trip there was something really nice about sitting down with Sandra and relaxing with her, watching TV and having her fawn over me.

However, it would be foolish to assume that such a state of affairs could last indefinitely. Women's — and men's — moods change, ill-feeling can arise and daily stresses and strains can contribute to unresolved resentments that lurk in a cauldron of negativity, poisoning the relationship. Be very careful.

5. But Your Independent Identity May Start to Be Eroded

During the week she was here, Sandra reorganised my bedroom and the kitchen. As the changes she made were universally positive, I had no complaints. However, if you live with a girl it's important to recognise that your physical space will change and along with it — if you're not vigilant about holding your frame — your mental space will too.

What I mean is that once a woman has entered your home then her nesting instinct will quite naturally kick in and she will (subconsciously) busy herself preparing it as a suitable venue in which to bring up young children. At the same time she will also subtly censure any behaviours you may have that don't fit in with her grand plan.

A classic example of this is stopping a man going out with his male friends at the weekend. If you make too many concessions then you will find that you are in danger of disappearing entirely.

Of course, it's easy to talk about maintaining the frame and not taking any shit in the comments section of a website, but in real life it requires constant vigilance, which is draining, and even the most alpha of guys has been known to let certain things slide for the sake of a quiet life.

I have to confess that when I waved Sandra off at the Eurostar as her trip was ending my heart sang a little. Finally, freedom to come and go as I pleased was to be mine again. That said, there is nothing wrong with choosing to live with a woman in the right circumstances.

After all, the traditional family unit has spawned great civilisations and is still at the centre of ours. It is just important that you go in knowing the risks and that you think long and hard — and get to know the woman in question as well as you can — before committing.

Read More: Game and the Problem Of Changing One's Personality

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

18 Best Quotes From Pantheon By Quintus Curtius

September 3, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Pantheon is Quintus Curtius' follow-up to Thirty Seven, where he continues historical and philosophical examinations of great men and lost ideas, bringing alive stories of hardship, survival, and masculinity. The book contains 38 essays.

Here are my favorite quotes from the book:

Modern man

> Whereas our ancestors had the strength of theological certainty, the modern man, following the star of his own caprice, is tormented by self-doubt and hesitation. Obviously, this certainty of medieval man came at a price. Yet we moderns multiple machines on top of machines, every generation more complex than the previous, with little apparent augmenting of wisdom or maturity.

The invisible eye

> People need to feel that they are being watched by invisible eyes in order for them to truly believe a doctrine. The state cannot be everywhere at all times. And religion is that unsleeping sentinel. It is a simple matter to do the right thing when people are watching. Not so simple is it to do the right thing when no one is watching.

Martyr-dom

> Doing the right thing (dying as a martyr) is not enough: for his action to be sanctified by God, it must be done in a spirit of true humility and submission to God, without thought of any personal benefit of glory. And in this sentiment, the key message of the play is made clear: it is not enough simply to do what is right. What is more important—what is more transcendent—is to do the right thing for the right reason.

Truth and uncertainty

> Did it ever occur to you that what man wants—what he really craves—is the comfort of certainty, rather than the cold, harsh "truth"? What comfort has the "truth" of science brought man, when all is said and done? People now work more than slaves did during the Abbasid Dynasty, or serfs in France in medieval Europe. What can you offer such a man, except more pain and more uncertainty?

Kindling

> There are great men all around us, with the potential to influence contemporary events in profound ways. Yet without the appropriate conditions present to act as the kindling, the fires of change would sputter and fizzle into smoky impotence.

Marriage

> Marriage should by no means be based on erotic ecstasy. "I see no marriages fail sooner, or more troubled, than such as are concluded for beauty's sake, or huddled up for amorous desires." Most successful marriages eventually evolve into some form of non-erotic companionship with the passing of years.
>
> […]
>
> Any flaw a woman has becomes magnified over time. A small problem now will become a big one later. A man must test her and carefully observe her behavior when evaluating her character. He must not rationalize, excuse, or sugar-coat bad behavior. He must be ruthless and clear-headed when evaluating her character, knowing that a life decision like marriage is a deadly serious matter.

Pursuit of wealth

> The excessive pursuit of wealth promotes effeminacy in men. Monetary pursuits are mostly sedentary and indoor, and an obsession with these types of activities causes the body to deteriorate, and the soul to atrophy. Wealth whets the appetite for delicacies, whether it be rich foods or sumptuous clothing.

Glory

> …glory is the most useless, and indeed the most harmful. Like a summer shower, it falls suddenly, and evaporates quickly in the suns of circumstance, leaving us with a damp and hollow feeling. And this is why Roman generals in the republican period, when granted a triumph after a foreign campaign, were careful to have their slaves remind them that all glory was fleeting.

A woman’s yes

> Between a woman’s yes and no I would not engage to put a pin’s point, so close are they to one another.

Bad fortune

> As Seneca the Elder says, quoting Diocles of Carystos: “There is one safeguard against Fortune: not to make an attempt of it too often.” This is true, perhaps. But can we even call this life? I for one cannot. I prefer my victories, however sparse, to be attended by a phalanx of failures, that they may taste sweeter still.

Democracy

> Democracy is the most difficult form of government because it requires an educated and engaged citizenry. As mouths multiple and education declines, so do democratic freedoms. Even modern democracy, as found in Western Europe and America, seems to be slowly reverting to authoritarian models, under the steady pressure of technological changes and the loss of privacy rights. What has been most surprising is the ease with which these rights and freedoms have been quietly appropriated in recent decades by many supposed “democratic” governments.

Fame

> He who has never lusted after fame will never fear infamy; he who holds the enticements of wealth in slight contempt will never fear the onset of financial hardships

Moral purpose

> The wise man, the man of virtue, does not derive his satisfaction from external > circumstances, but rather on the superlative qualities he has cultivated within himself through his virtuous pursuit of a moral purpose.

Exile

> We will now consider internal exile, or that form of exile produced when a man remains in his country, but finds himself alienated from his immediate surroundings. Men similarly disposed and seeking the same ends tend to find each other; like frogs scattered about along the edge of a pond, or moths fluttering about a light, they inevitably congregate. Where the knowledge being sought is not favored by the mainstream, secret societies are the result.
>
> […]
>
> Exile, whether internal or external, cannot crush the spirit of the man of virtue. Maintaining his moral purpose, and secure in his mental redoubt, he finds ways of overcoming the barriers placed before him. The mind is a fortress, its casements arranged with stones hewn from the quarry of hard experience and relentless struggle. No assault can capture this citadel, or force entry into its sanctum.

Conflict

> Conflict magnifies things, making the insignificant, significant. We can try to control some of these elements, but complete control is never possible. The better way is to learn to use this "friction" to our advantage. We must embrace fluidity, friction, disorder, violence, and uncertainty, knowing that they are inescapable parts of the conflict dynamic.

Civilization

> Civilization is a veneer, a mask attached to the face of the clothed ape that is man; and when the mask falls off, the beast behind it is revealed in all his brutishness. Each generation must nurture the gift of civilization, and pass it on, this previous gift, to ensure that the face of barbarism remains safely hidden away. And when society fails in this task, consequences must be paid.

Pantheon, just like its predecessor, serves as a gateway book to many other great works. It gives you enough to sate your palate while leaving the door open for you to continue further study. My only complaint is the extended treatment of neo-Platonism, which was more abstract and dense than the other essays. This is a small complaint in an otherwise worthy book that educates, informs, and inspires. If you liked Thirty Seven then you will surely like Pantheon.

Read More: "Pantheon" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why You Should Stop Using Pot

September 4, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

If you want to achieve anything in life, it's time to stop smoking pot. This advice runs quite contrary to the current popular culture. Recreational marijuana use has gone mainstream in the past few years as various states have legalized its use.

Celebrities such as Wiz Khalifa, Justin Timberlake, and Miley Cyrus have admitted to using it, and openly promote legalization at the federal level. Marijuana, which was once regarded as a gateway drug, is now lauded for its medicinal properties and it has been rebranded as a safe, herbal alternative to achieving relaxation.

Drugs are bad

Not too long ago, smoking pot was considered to be a bad thing. Everyone knew that it wasn't as bad as the so-called "hard drugs" like heroin and cocaine, but no one regarded it as a good thing. People who smoked lots of pot were called "burnouts" or "stoners" because the excessive marijuana consumption killed their ambition and made them stupid.

Pot was also believed to be a gateway drug that leads to the adoption of the harder drugs. If you grew up in the 80's you probably remember the "This is your brain on drugs" commercial featuring an egg sizzling in the frying pan or the D.A.R.E. program (Drug Abuse Resistance Education) that was taught in virtually every school.

The trend carried over into the nineties with a similar PSA featuring one time "it" girl Rachael Leigh Cook, slamming pots and pans to demonstrate the effects of drug use on all aspects of life. At the time, there had been a rash of Hollywood and music industry deaths related to drug abuse such as actor River Phoenix and Sublime lead singer and guitarist, Bradley Nowell. The message back then was clear—all drug use is destructive and should be avoided at all costs.

A makeover for pot

Miley Cyrus via Instagram. Hey kids, if you dress like a prostitute and smoke pot, you can be cool just like me!

At some point, attitudes towards marijuana changed. It was probably a combination of the libertarian movement to legalize drug usage and the medical marijuana movement that gave pot smoking a rehabilitation. Whatever the cause, smoking pot is no longer viewed as something reserved for life's losers. Now, smoking pot is cool.

The other night, I watched the 2015 MTV Video Music Awards. As I am not a 12-year-old girl, I wasn't terribly interested in the performances. Who wants to watch Miley Cyrus prancing around in ridiculous outfits with her disgusting tongue hanging out?

But the VMAs are a good bellwether for where our society is headed. This year's show provided an interesting glimpse into MTV's progressive and ultimately degrading message: Smoke pot, because Miley and virtually every other talentless bonehead on stage does too. Miley's entire shtick for the evening could be summed up as "the wild child who loves weed." Cyrus even closed the show with the line, "Yeah, I smoke pot."

But this passion for the Mary Jane extended to other honorees as well. Kanye West who received the Michael Jackson Video Vanguard Award, gave a rambling speech where he used the word "bro" a lot and let slip that he got high before going onstage. West then concluded with an announcement that he would be running for president in 2020. I suppose his pot use won't hurt him, as our current President was the leader of the Choom Gang when he was in high school.

If all these great "successes" are smoking weed, why shouldn't you? It turns out there are some good reasons to throw away your pipe, bong, and rolling papers.

Pot and schizophrenia

Jared Loughner

The use of marijuana has been correlated to schizophrenia. For those who are unfamiliar with the disease, schizophrenia is a horrible, disabling brain disorder that causes its sufferers to experience psychosis. Typically, people who suffer from schizophrenia hear voices and feel that some group is monitoring them. I knew a schizophrenic man who told me that the Vatican was following him. It would have been pointless to try to reason with him.

Schizophrenia frequently crops up in notorious murder cases. Almost invariably, if the perpetrators turn out to be schizophrenic, they are also heavy marijuana users. For example, Colorado theatre shooter James Holmes and Tucson shooter Jared Loughner were both pot smokers.

I once attended a lecture by Dr. E. Fuller Torrey, a psychiatrist who specializes in schizophrenia. Torrey mentioned that if he could do one thing to reduce the incidence of schizophrenia among young people, he would post a huge sign at every rock concert warning users that smoking pot increases your chance of becoming schizophrenic by ten times.

The most recent studies seem to indicate that marijuana can trigger the onset of schizophrenia in people who have a predisposition toward the disease. That is, most people will be able to smoke pot with no risk of ever developing the disease. But is it worth the risk? Are you feeling lucky?

Smoking pot can take away your motivation

All drugs have side effects, but the popular media would have us believe that pot is an exception. The worst side effect that I have noticed in heavy pot users is loss of motivation. These folks seem to be content with frittering their lives away, achieving nothing, and doing as little as possible except smoking weed. But my evidence is anecdotal.

However, there is some solid research that backs up the observation that using pot takes away your ambition. A 2013 study conducted by scientists at Imperial College London determined that long-term cannabis users produce less dopamine, a chemical linked to motivation. This study led researchers to conclude that: “Long-term cannabis use may blunt the brain’s motivation system.”

The bottom line is that if you are a man who is trying to improve his life, smoking pot is going to take you in the opposite direction.

Other side effects of cannabis usage

There is currently a debate in scientific circles of the effect of marijuana on sex. The research is contradictory. In animal studies, cannabis has been found to lower testosterone levels, but the human studies have not been conclusive.

While we are waiting for a future study to definitively settle the question, the prudent course is to avoid using anything that would negatively impact your testosterone levels. The testosterone levels of American men have already been dropping since the 1980s—you already probably have lower T levels than your father or your grandfather. It doesn't make sense to do things that might lower them even further.

To be a success don't numb yourself

Even if marijuana didn't carry of risk of triggering schizophrenia, taking away your motivation, or decreasing your testosterone levels, it would still be a bad idea. To become successful takes a lot of work. Numbing yourself, whether that comes from drinking too much alcohol or smoking pot, will take you away from your goal, and it also carries the risk that it can become an addiction that will lead to your downfall.

Truly successful people give their complete focus to achieving their goal. Real estate titan Donald Trump has a strict no drugs/no alcohol ethic that he has passed on to his children. Gene Simmons, leader of the rock band Kiss, also avoided drugs and alcohol even when the band was at its peak of popularity. Even Benjamin Franklin was a teetotaler in his younger days. It was only after he had accomplished great things in business, science, and politics that he started to enjoy the occasional bottle of wine.

Conclusion

A self-absorbed populace is easy to rule. That's why rulers have always provided diversions to keep the masses distracted. In ancient Rome, it was the games in the Colosseum. Today, the media, our celebrities, and the other members of our new "aristocracy" encourage us to enjoy life and light up our medical marijuana cigarette.

If you needed any further reason to avoid using pot, look at the voices that are pushing its use. That alone should be enough evidence to convince you to do the opposite.

Read More: Stop Associating With Losers

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Is Spiked Online Editor Luke Gittos A Sexual Cuckservative?

September 4, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

Luke Gittos, the editor of the law section of the establishment-left publication Spiked Online, has penned a short piece attacking Roosh Valizadeh. The piece is also a broadside against what Gittos calls the "pick-up industry." Into the same pot are thrown the hapless MRAs, denounced by Gittos as a "merry band of saddos."

Why is a writer who purports to be so against rape culture hysteria that he has just written a book on the subject so keen to lash out against Roosh and the broader men's movement?

Never let a good crisis go to waste

Gittos' article for Spiked coincides with the petition to ban Roosh's books from Amazon, and, tellingly, with the publication of his own book, "Why Rape Culture is a Dangerous Myth: From Steubenville to Ched Evans." The conclusion of the article is, predictably given Spiked's dogmatic stance on free speech, that Roosh's ooks should not be banned.

On the other hand, he makes sure to throw in ample scorn for Roosh and the "pick-up industry," distancing himself from such undesirable male behaviour as, er, having a sexual strategy.

MRA? PUA? Same difference.

The problems with Gittos' facile attempt to insinuate himself and Spiked within the bounds of "kosher" discourse and men's groups outside it are glaring. For starters, much like the SJW's he would otherwise like to distance himself from, Gittos misattributes Roosh's "argument" for the legalisation of rape on private property to one of his books, rather than to his website, evidencing a lack of research.

Neither has he picked up that Roosh himself told Canadian journalist Ezra Levant in an interview that the article was tongue in cheek and intended to stir debate. Further, Gittos places Roosh in the "MRA" camp, on the basis of "[A] quick perusal" of Roosh's Youtube channel." Again, the learned barrister turned solicitor shows a concerning lack of attention to detail. Roosh, as anyone who reads the manosphere will know, has distanced himself from the Men's Rights Movement.

Moreover, Gittos appears to be ideologically confused. On the one hand he has written a book entitled "Why Rape Culture Is A Dangerous Myth," and on the other hand he writes the Men's Rights Movement off out of hand as a "…merry band of saddos [that] believes that the world is being controlled by a feminist conspiracy that is enslaving men."

I presume from the title of Gittos' book that he thinks that the politically motivated drive to inflate the conviction rate for sexual offences is not a welcome phenomenon. I also presume that, as a columnist for Spiked Online, he is not blind to the fact such changes in policy do not arise in a vacuum but are rather the product of political trends of the day.

And what popular political movement could possibly be militating for increased rape convictions at any cost, including the due-process rights of innocent men?

You are all basement-dwelling neckbeard virgins

Without engaging in any further inquiry into whether the "Men's Rights Movement" has any legitimate claims or grievances whatsoever, Gittos launches into a little attack on PUAs. “Roosh V, Julien Blanc and the rest of their ilk are utter tools,” opines our moral crusader, carefully choosing his targets. In another broad brush denunciation, he writes off the thousands of men who have bought Roosh’s books as:

> likely to be lonely, desperate, web-based singletons. These men pose no threat to women. At worst, they might repulse them when they deploy Roosh’s creepy tactics.

Where have we heard this language? It’s very much the register of Social Justice Warriors, is it not? Lonely, desperate, web-based singletons. Creepy. It’s a surprise that Gittos has made no mention of basements and fedoras.

Knocking down the PUA straw man

Having completed his out-of-hand (and scantily researched) dismissal of two rather broad and diverse movements, our receding-chinned jurisprudent proceeds to give us his learned view on the “state of contemporary intimacy”:

> Today, the process of picking up women is seen by many as too risky to involve oneself in emotionally. While pick-up artists claim to be masters of charming women, their industry only exists because people are becoming more wary of the emotional risk inherent in the act of seduction. The idea that you might approach a member of the fairer sex, make a prat of yourself and walk away with your tail between your legs is coming to be seen as a needless and terrifying emotional risk.

What utter prattle. One of the very foundations of the pick-up canon is the need to embrace this very “emotional risk inherent in the act of seduction.” No pick-up guru worth his salt has ever sold a product by promising clients that he could remove the trauma of rejection.

Budding PUAs are told to grow a pair, get out there, and make themselves known to women. They are told that rejections are part and parcel of the life of a sexually active man, not something to be brushed under the carpet by retreating into celibacy or online dating.

Get out there and approach, guys.

Gittos continues:

> Endless apps, agencies and pseudo-professionals now make money from removing the risk of emotional harm and selling seduction to sad young men as a series of tricks, lines and processes. By attempting to formalise seduction in this way, the pick-up industry strips the human process of charming a woman into bed of all its meaning.

Again, Gittos shows he has not done his homework. If he applies the same rigour to preparing his legal cases, his clients should be worried. Yes, dating apps thrive on a fear of emotional involvement in the dating process. By making everything remote and impersonal, they make things easy for their core market: Western women with no social skills and an imperative towards ubiquitous comfort, and Western men who have insufficient testosterone to grapple with the trauma of the cold approach.

To say, however, that pick-up artists attempt to remove the risk of emotional harm is baloney. Pick-up artists preach the absorption of that emotional harm. They do it by telling students to man the fuck up and approach, taking rejection as a fact of life.

Thou shalt not do anything to improve thy lot!

Gittos then shows his true ideological colours by railing against PUAs employing “tricks, lines and processes.” Where else have we heard this vehement rubbishing of the very notion that men might consider integrating some direction or structure into their pursuit of women?

Oh yes, I remember now. It’s the age-old refrain of women speaking down to beta males. The same mantra which has been picked up by modern Feminists in their attempts to shame disillusioned modern men with ideas of self-determination:

Just be yourself.

Any ex-beta knows the gospel inside out: You’re not getting laid? Don’t worry about it. Just be yourself. Don’t examine what you’re doing wrong. Don’t try to change your personality. You’re a nice guy. You’ll be just fine. Eventually you’ll find a woman who likes you for who you are. Eventually a woman will end up in your life “randomly.” Don’t listen to the PUA guys. Don’t try to copy the asshole who has his pick of the 8’s, 9’s and 10’s.

Gittos is echoing the same script, beloved of overbearing mothers, female “friends” of friend-zoned beta males, feminists, and other assorted women with a vested interest in keeping “nice guys” nice (and celibate). Why is he doing this?

Well, he has a reputation as a man of letters to curate. As a Spiked columnist and advocate of “freeze peach,” he’s already a bit suspect in the eyes of the chatterati. By lashing out at Roosh, he is trying to signal to his peers on the Crouch End dinner-party circuit that he is not quite beyond the pale. He’s all for freedom of whatever, just not the freedom of men to exercise any influence on their own sex lives.

The arrival of Sexual Cuckservatism

In a sense, Luke Gittos is a Cuckservative. He rails against all the issues of the day of concern to conservatives and libertarians: sexual assault Kangaroo courts on campus, media show-trials of men accused of rape, the panic about “rape culture,” and so on.

He’s careful, however, to do it in the name of abstract values like freedom of speech and due process. Showing a breathtaking capacity for doublethink, he’s written articles entitled “Why is the CPS spinning rape stats?” and “We must not give in to the rape panic,” and then mocked MRAs for believing “that the world is being controlled by a feminist conspiracy that is enslaving men.”

Would you take dating advice from this man?

In sum, this form of Sexual Cuckservatism could be defined as a willingness to criticise the left’s abhorrent behaviour (obsession with rape culture, its propensity for social media lynchings and its militancy in banning messages they disagree with), whilst engaging in the very same male-shaming rhetoric of the left and writing off anti-feminist movements in the language of the left, rather than accepting them for what they are: a legitimate reaction to the corruption of leftist and feminist ideology of every aspect of public life.

The lesson garnered from Mr Gittos’ bizarre outburst should be clear to any reader of Return of Kings, including those who had up until now laboured under the misapprehension that Spiked Online was “on the same team”: not every voice purporting to speak in favour of free speech and due process is automatically on the side of right reason simply because it appeals to your libertarian sensibilities.

Read More: How America’s New Nobility Has Forgotten Its Obligation To The Country

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

3 Ways To Survive (And Exploit) The Slutification of America

September 5, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Whilst those of us supporting the manopshere and Neomasculinity are trying to forge positive changes in society, we cannot expect that success will materialize overnight. As we strive for a return to normality in our culture, we must simultaneously navigate our way through and make sense of a progressively sluttier, fickle and degraded world. This does not require us to betray our beliefs; it does demand dexterity and opportunism.

Here are three easily applied ways to maximize your chances and move ahead amidst the rapidly crumbling morals of your community, especially amongst women. Tailor them to your own propensities and desires. And never forget that the standard you walk past in life is the standard you accept.

1. Go for the (ex-)religious girls

Too many men pass over the religious or otherwise moral ex-religious girl, except in the context of the purity or virgin fantasy.

I want to avoid any confusion: this doesn't mean that she has to go to church or believe in Jesus Christ. Of course, there's nothing wrong with a girl who is a Christian per se. What matters here is finding a girl who was exposed to a moral background which required her to follow a particular creed or dogma. Maybe religion isn't behind it. Perhaps her parents instilled a strong work ethic in her, forced her to practice give-and-take or something else.

This one is largely a judgment call. Repeated exposure to a potentially fruitful woman, at a minimum 5-10 lengthy (>1 hour) meetings, will help you adequately gauge what sort of girl she is. Do not ever expect perfection in your assessments. Number one, girls can lie (including to themselves) about who they are and, secondly, girls can change. Yet just as you (hopefully) wouldn't date or sleep with a girl who didn't wash her body once a day, dating or sleeping with a girl who has no moral backbone, even implicitly, is simply not worth your time.

In my own life, I know that going to church in my early childhood (and having my parents force me to attend) made me a better person. Before my grandparents died, I was able to provide them with some semblance of joy during their physically excruciating final moments.

Despite not then sharing their religion, past years of going to church had taught me the importance of family, familial loyalty and gratitude to my elders, whatever disagreements I had had with them over the years. These are the types of experiences you want your prospective girl to have.

A girl having some sort of moral, probably religious history is not just functional, showing that she is more likely to have a good disposition (and loyalty). It is also instrumental. It means she is amenable to you directing her as to how to treat you and how to behave overall.

Many people misconstrue that a religious or ex-religious girl still affected by her experiences equates to a bland sex life. Far from it. Rather than take-it-or-leave-it, this can be about upgrading individual parts as you keep the chassis.

2. Show the bling (just don't spend it on her)

You don’t need to be paying for girls to jet set around the world with you like Dan Bilzerian.

Women are naturally programmed to seek out mates with the resources to sustain them and any subsequent children. And she can easily expect that the man she shacks up with will provide her (his?) progeny with these resources. In modern times, with male and female partners both typically working, these resources need not just be economic and can include time, attention, affection or just plain old social status.

What I have found repeatedly over time is that a woman responds predominantly to the resources themselves. For short-term and medium-term, sometimes even long-term relationships, giving her some of these resources, aside from trinkets, is not required. The allure of them is enough in many cases. Naturally, part of the appeal women still find in men who don’t immediately share their resources is that they’re hard to get. But that doesn’t explain everything.

Just as a man can ejaculate through masturbation, without direct contact with a girl or physically seeing one, many or most women can experience a significant lag time between seeing a man with resources and needing him to share them with her. Social status is a huge factor, but so, too, is your ability to avoid what most men fail at it: holding your resources back beyond just the hard to get phase.

There are some important caveats, however. Many Western countries nowadays have draconian cohabitation and other laws, which require men to part with ample property upon the ending of a relationship. It’s perfectly conceivable that she might argue that a purely sexual relationship was actually a romantic one. In Australia, I believe this timeframe is about two years but courts themselves can bend the rules to adapt to “modern life.” So always cover your bases on this one.

3. Show different aspects of your personality at carefully staged times

The more emotions you have and display, the more options you have.

For many of you, you won't need to change much in this regard. Just make your demonstrations of your personality more salient. For me, much of this comes naturally, having evolved from good habits I picked up in my teens. If I was with a girl at 7pm and had forgotten to call my early-to-bed grandparents that particularly day, I told (and didn't ask) her to wait five minutes and I went to call them.

She finds it sweet but dominant at the same because I've framed it as a non-negotiable. At other times, when a driver doesn't give way to me, I show him that he's a twat and make a sarcastic gesture. She will find that assertive and sticking up for myself.

Randomly, haphazardly picking times to display different aspects is not the best solution. Training them into yourself is, which means doing it when she's not around. Sometimes the only thing you need to reorient is when you do it, or subtle ways in which you do it. And remember, variety is the spice of life. You don't want to be unemotional brick wall, nor do you want to be soppier than The Notebook. Ditch mono- or dual-themed personality demonstrations and make yourself three-dimensional and expansive.

Value for both a girl and yourself means creating a quality, emotionally-laden experience. Human beings thrive and respond positively when they are exposed to a rich tapestry of life, encompassing happiness, passion, ecstasy, nostalgia, sadness, tragedy, enthusiasm, relaxation and the whole gamut of other prisms we can indulge in. You must create that tapestry for her. Make it compelling. The more you do so, the more pliable she will become.

A disclaimer: exercise caution with some emotions. Practicing total despair, for example, is not the sort of emotion you want her to see you in. Neither is bloodlust, most of the time. Be sensible with how far you go.

Are you up to the challenge?

You might feel despair that society is going the way it is. Don't. You are one person in an ocean of a world, and the best means for you to contribute to its betterment is bettering yourself. Lead by example. Challenge the present, destructive orthodoxy by improving each day and adapting yourself to the circumstances you face.

You should never lose sight of who you should be. Nevertheless, you can't take your eyes off the world you're already in.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 11 Ways To Survive A Media Shitstorm

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How I Discovered Leftism In Law School Lurking At Every Turn

September 5, 2015 | by Luke Bauer | Link | Original Link

We are all sadly familiar with how thoroughly entrenched leftism has become in Western universities. Undergraduate students spend thousands of dollars year after year, becoming increasingly indoctrinated by leftist rhetoric. But are professional degrees any better? One would hope that a graduate school at least, whose sole purpose is supposed to be preparation and training for entrance into the profession, would be less biased.

While I can't speak for medicine or accounting, I can say that Canadian law schools are just as bad, if not worse, as any undergraduate degree with the sole exception, perhaps, being women's studies.

Before law school had even begun we had a mixer the previous spring to get to know some of the faculty. I spotted the resident feminist harpy the moment I stepped into the room. Tall, gaunt, with a neck like a buzzard and eyes that screamed with the rage of thousands of years of patriarchal oppression, she simply couldn't be anything else.

And when she was introduced, yes, she was the head of the Feminist Legal Theory department and taught, you guessed it, family law. Those poor, poor students.

Moving on to orientation week, we were forced to sit through an entire week's worth of lectures on what to expect during law school. Much of the time was taken up (and by that I mean completely wasted) by explaining how we should disagree with one another without causing offense. Mostly through weakening our language and distancing ourselves from our own opinions. Naturally, I didn't pay much attention.

Critical Theories Of Law – Sponsored By McDonald's

The most interesting lecture of orientation week, however was on "Critical Theories of Law," and it was, get this, sponsored by McDonald's. The irony that a lecture aimed at destabilizing the status quo, and undermining the terribly oppressive capitalist patriarchy, would be sponsored by a multinational corporation was, sadly, lost on most of the student body.

And so the lecture on Critical Theories of Law—Sponsored by McDonald's—began. A dumpy female professor with frizzy hair and eyeglasses made for frowning over approached the lectern and immediately commenced her assault on the very foundation of our society.

She was very careful not to make direct assertions, instead, choosing to phrase all of her points as "what ifs," and "something to think abouts." Did you know that law, not even specific laws mind you, just "law" generally, has a fundamentally sexist and racist foundation?! Neither did I.

Here I thought the law was a social contract, designed to protect individual and property rights so that large groups of people can live together in a civilized society without murdering each other. But no, apparently, at its core, "the law" is all about keeping women and minorities trampled underfoot. I can't say it's doing a very good job then if you ask me, but nobody did.

Similarly ridiculous musings were promptly followed by one of the dumbest discussions of discrimination I have ever had the misfortune to witness. She actually suggested that non-differentiated aerobics standards are discriminatory against female firefighters.

That is to say, that holding female firefighters to the same physical standards as men discriminates against them. And the worst thing was, students around me were actually taking notes! No, it’s not discriminatory, you moron, it’s equal! Holding men and women to different standards is what would be discriminatory… but sensing that my thought crime might be slightly frowned upon, I refrained from interrupting.

The Onslaught Continues

Leftist bias continued to be evident in many of our lectures throughout the year. In contracts, husbands are considered to have a duty to financially provide for their wives even once divorced, nevermind that it's now the 21st century and women are perfectly capable of paying their own way.

In criminal law, minorities such as aboriginals get special treatment at sentencing, often receiving lesser punishments than a Caucasian would. In constitutional law, we were forced to endure several long lectures on "hate speech" and discrimination, while freedom of religion was mysteriously missing from the course.

A friend of mine, the poor guy, was in a criminal law class being taught by a self-identified feminist legal theory professor. She was teaching sexual assault law and claiming consent cannot be obtained unless the girl is 100% sober. One of the girls in the class (with an ass that would tempt St. Paul himself) disagreed, saying that it's more of a grey area and that if she wants to go partying, get drunk, and have sex, that's entirely consensual.

My friend couldn't stop grinning as he described to me how the furious professor lit into her for nearly 15 minutes. I think he just appreciated seeing a rampaging feminist biting a girl's head off for a change.

Refute Everything, Concede Nothing

Yes, our universities are controlled by leftists. Yes, the majority of the students are indoctrinated to one degree or another. But there is hope. There are dissidents. My own criminal law professor, especially, was surprisingly objective.

Not only did he lead class discussion on the difficulty of determining consent in sexual assault cases, but he even raised the issue of male victims of female violence. I was pleasantly shocked. Others, it turned out, were less pleased. I heard from other students that our criminal law professor actually received complaints, for "the manner" in which he taught our class about the law on sexual assault.

Apparently, his refreshingly honest, fair-handed and nuanced approach to teaching sexual assault law offended someone's feminist sensibilities.

In another discussion where the majority of the class was arguing that violence should be banned from sports (hockey, boxing, etc.) because it makes men more likely to commit violence, I was actually able to stand up and argue the exact opposite. That violent crime has been declining across the board, while violent entertainment has been increasing exponentially, and I suggested that perhaps the solution would actually be to allow more violent entertainment for adults, not less.

The professor not only allowed me to disagree without shutting me down, he supported my alternate view as something for the rest of the class to think about.

So if you are in university, don't give up. Even when it seems like every professor around you is a Marxist stooge, and the students nothing more than feminist robots, there is hope. There are good professors, there are students who think critically. It may be a small minority at the moment, but it is growing.

To paraphrase Winston Churchill, we shall go on to the end. We shall fight in the universities, we shall fight on the campuses and the podiums, we shall fight with growing confidence and growing strength in the lecture halls, we shall defend our right to speak our mind, whatever the cost may be.

We shall fight on the student boards, we shall fight on the hiring committees, we shall fight in the classrooms and in the offices, we shall fight for the minds of our fellow students, we shall never surrender.

Pick your battles carefully. Choose your professors wisely. But never surrender.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Leftists Are Clinically Insane

Luke Bauer
Luke Bauer is a law student searching for what it means to be a man in an increasingly emasculated world. He spends his time attending class, pondering the decline of western civilization, and eviscerating his peers when they spew leftist nonsense.

Always Subtract 40% From Every Woman's Appearance

September 6, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Here at Return of Kings, our columnists continually instruct men not to place women on a proverbial pedestal. Most of the time, this concerns emotional, psychological and romantic pedestalization. Yet the aspect of this phenomenon you need to know the most about and which gives life to all the others, the physical embellishment of a woman's value (via cosmetics and photographic technology), is the one most ignored.

After all, in 2015 we are very much stuck in the heyday of L'Oreal and other conglomerates making billions from the facial illusion industry.

For every female you see on the street, in a club, at your university or in the workplace, you need to manually deduct 40% from her appearance and treat her accordingly. This needs to happen until you can automatically do the subtractions yourself. I have arrived at the figure of 40% because most women don't lose the majority of their physical value when they wash off their makeup or non-digitize their visage. Plus, some women lose more than 40% (take the Mila Kunis photo above, for example) while others lose only around 20%. 40% is a very useful rule of thumb.

Women's beauty routines and online self-presentation are about self-esteem and deceiving others

This is the same person on the same day. Perception is quasi-reality, but this woman's true physical reality is much closer to the image on the left.

Don't necessarily see the chasm between a woman's made-up appearance and true appearance as some kind of malicious feminine (or feminist) conspiracy. Very few people in this world don't want to be perceived as more aesthetically pleasing, whether it's men wanting bigger biceps and washboard abs, or women desiring unblemished faces and the pretense of high cheekbones that look much less impressive sans cosmetics.

These beauty routines are also designed to improve her own confidence and perception of herself and are not only about enchanting you. For 8-16 hours a day, women want to adequately convince themselves that they are close to as alluring as the goddesses they see peppered across TV commercials and sitcoms. Like men, deep down they know it's an act, but the emotional pull of the temporary delusion for half or two-thirds of a day is just too strong.

Nevertheless, the social benefits of being perceived as attractive are intrinsically entwined with this self-delusion. When women reach a threshold level of attractiveness, the world becomes easier, more exciting and more indulgent of them. Men acquiesce to their requests, women want to befriend them and, most importantly, they garner the intoxicating overall joys of people paying (positive) attention to them.

To think that a primary reason for women inflating their appearance is not popularity, adoration and the other byproducts of being regarded as hot is analogous to denying that the sun will set at the end of the day.

The Lady Gaga Effect

Take a gander at Lady Gaga sans makeup (and utilizing a side shot to present her "best" angle):

Now juxtapose it with her singing appearance at the Oscars:

Though far from a 10 in my book despite wearing makeup, Gaga's attractiveness in the makeup-less shot is at least 60% less than the second photo. The exact figures depend on subjective evaluation, but I'd say Kunis' drop, as evidenced in the main image for this article, is more dramatic still at around 70-80%. In her case, this takes her from bangable to untouchable, even if you and her were the last human beings on the planet.

The reason I have chosen Lady Gaga is that, more than perhaps any other celebrity in the world, she is obsessed with changing and promoting her own image. Raunchy provocation (or at least that's the intention) and constant shape-shifting are behind her name being known by almost every person in the Western world under 60.

It is your job to regard practically every woman under 40 you come across as a Lady Gaga Lite, a chameleon compelled to project an image of greater color and sexual life to hide an otherwise much, much blander exterior.

The Instagram and Facebook era

Actually, this isn't reality until she takes off the face paint. So it will get even worse.

It's not just cosmetics you need to be wary of. Camera angles and filters are, after makeup, a girl's best friend and distort actual appearances much more so when combined with cosmetics. Black-and-white, monochrome, sepia and other filters are all intended to heighten a female photo subject's attractiveness and mask less appealing facial and other bodily qualities. So, too, are certain high or low angles (especially when combined with the exhibition of cleavage).

There's a strong argument for asserting that my rule of thumb should be 40-70% for online female appearances, particularly if you have met the women in question less than three times or not at all. So if you're looking for a real-life introduction to a certain friend of a friend, be warned. You're bound to either be disappointed wholesale or suffer a moderate case of false advertising.

Make it a community effort, boys

This is the kind of disparity you want between a woman's true and contrived appearances. But you never know until everything's off.

Men have to be more judicious and discerning as an entire gender. Naturally, being less easily convinced about artificial presentations is good for your own life. It is also a characteristic we should be instilling in other men. Back-of-the-brain knowledge of the harsh truths about idealized female projections is not enough and most males still, tragically, respond as if the illusion were true.

Fundamentally, no woman is truly hot until you've seen her in the shower or, to a lesser extent, woken up beside her the next day when everything has rubbed off.

What's the point of getting excited about a woman who's just not worth your time… or lust?

Read More: What's The Difference Between Posting Your Cleavage And Showing Your Bank Balance On Instagram?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Islamists Harass Swedes In Increasingly Immigrant-Filled Swedish Suburbs

September 6, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The clash of civilizations continues, and Sweden's immigrant neighborhoods have now become one of its battlegrounds. Several women have testified this summer to being controlled and harassed by Islamist men. One woman says that her neighborhood "increasingly resembles Afghanistan." Leftists have responded—by calling the concerned women "racist."

Troubling testimonies

Islamist enclaves have formed in the suburbs of Sweden, where men with beards and white dresses tell women what to do and how to dress. So says Amineh Kakabaveh in an opinion piece for Swedish tabloid Expressen.

In places like Husby, Angered and Rosengård—suburbs of Sweden's three biggest cities—the situation for women is one of increased oppression and harassment.

> Islamists and fundamentalists tell the adolescents here that they have to veil themselves, that Swedish food is 'Haram' (unclean), and that they have to read the Quran.

Amineh Kakabaveh, speaking out against Islamist oppression.

“Death to infidels”

Amineh Kakabaveh backs up her claims with testimonies from women living in those areas. Like Seve Saleh, who has lived in Husby, Stockholm for 13 years, and says that it “increasingly resembles Afghanistan.” In school, Seve Salehs children are reprimanded by fundamentalists.

Another woman who can testify to the Islamist oppresion is Helin Gül. Amineh Kakabaveh writes:

> Last week one of her friends who don’t wear a veil was told at work that those who do not follow Allah’s laws deserve to die.

In some areas, women are not welcome in cafés anymore. Young women are not allowed to go outside after noontime. And boys are being recruited to jihadist organizations like ISIS (about 300 Swedes have gone to Iraq and Syria to wage holy war). Meanwhile, authorities and politicians do nothing, says Amineh Kakabaveh.

> They just talk and worry—year after year.

More bad news

Several other tales of harassment and subjugation in city outskirts have become widely spread this past summer. Zeliha Dagli fled the imams of her home country to be free. But her childhood tormentors—whom she calls “bearded shadows”—followed her to Sweden.

> In my area, I don’t want judgmental gazes from staring men. I want to bring home whoever I want, but today I can’t when my rights are restricted and controlled in my neighborhood.

Now she’s looking to move somewhere else.

> We are many women who are very worried about the development in Husby and the threat to equality here. Isn’t Husby a part of Sweden, do the rules not apply > here?

Carina Hägg, a former Social Democratic member of the Riksdag (the Swedish parliament), is also someone who's spoken out about the rise of Islamic extremism.

> We must break the dominance of radical Islam that exists in Sweden today. It is a very small group with great influence who support a caliphate in the Middle East and who want their own societies with Sharia laws in the suburbs.

Apart from women, homosexuals are another group that face harassment. Per Pettersson has lived in Husby for ten years, and has seen a change for the worse. In the street, people shout "f*cking faggots" when he walks by with his boyfriend. Eggs are thrown at his balcony.

> I don't know what's changed in the last years, but I no longer recognize myself in Husby.

Zeliha Dagli, resident of the Stockholm suburb Husby.

The leftist response

A week or so after Amineh Kakabaveh's article was published, three senior representatives of the Left Party (formerly known as the Left Party-Communists, founded in 1917) responded. Don't blame people, they say, but blame inequality.

> It is in class divisions and disunion that reactionary fundamentalist and racist movements find nurishment to grow and prosper. To single out the suburb and a particular religion increases that disunion.

According to them, Islamism is not at fault whatsoever. The suburb is not unique in any sense, and women are oppressed everywhere.

> As feminists we know that oppression of women and homophobia exists all over the world, in all social classes and contexts, but that it manifests itself differently.

Islamists are not to be held accountable for issues facing women in the suburbs, right-wing politics is.

> For at the same time as the right have paved the way for reactionary movements by increasing segregation and poverty, they have—then as now—opposed progress that contributes to equality and women's liberation. That is—if anything—a betrayal.

Racism and class hatred

Dan Jerrestam, writing for the socialist magazine Clarté, makes the case that pointing the finger at Islamists is hateful.

> The sweeping generalizations that Amineh makes, which everyone understands are referring to male Muslims, devalue them as a group as the guardians of honor cultures and natural candidates to become jihadists. This is racism if anything!

In the same magazine, Dine Malmsten calls what Amineh Kakabaveh wrote a case of "class hatred." The real problems at hand are unemployment, low wages and a "welfare state in decline." The middle class is "licking upwards and kicking downwards."

In a perhaps somewhat surprising turn, she puts the blame on "inner city feminists" who "target the men in the working class".

> They want to divide and conquer, they say they defend the 'poor immigrant women' who are to be pitied, because they have such evil men.

Her litany over the plight of the working man (i.e., Islamists) ends with a reference to Nazi Germany.

> When Zeliha […] describes men as 'staring bearded shadows' it is hate speech plain and simple. It is the same rhetoric that was used in the thirties in Germany about Jewish, Polish and Russian men.

Karl Marx, a bearded shadow looming over the West.

Preserving freedom

It’s hard to decide which is more sickening—the religious fundamentalists who deprive native citizen of their freedom, or the leftists who cover their backs. Both form an unholy alliance to take away the freedom of not just women but men as well.

The ironic thing is, the same ideology that aims to destroy Western civilization was created within it. Leftism is like a cancer that forms and grows inside the body. It is a part of it, yet at the same time alien. Slowly the internal organs weaken and deteriorate, until ultimately the parasitical tumor dies with the rest of the body. That is, if not treated properly.

In comparison, Islamic fundamentalism is like a contagious, deadly disease which the Western world risks contracting. If the immune system of the West is weak—perhaps on account of another ailment—the risk is elevated.

Never abandon Western values

Women wearing what they want and being happy.

Freedom is a key Western value, and with it comes pluralism and openness. Pluralism in the sense that people are allowed to think differently, and to speak their mind openly and without fear of repercussions. This means that different ideas can be tested and compared, until one proves to be superior.

As Western men, we want to defeat the evil beings who come here to destroy our great society. These Islamists hate our way of living, and some would even cut our throats if they only had the power to do so. But let’s not let our anger get the best of us. Let us be guided by reason, truth and freedom—and let us remain true Westerners.

People like Zeliha Dagli didn’t come here to live the same life as she did in the Middle East. She came here because she saw that life in the West was better. Because freedom is better than tyranny, many like her are now fleeing tyranny as well.

We can perhaps consider welcoming them as new members of our team—but only when they assimilate into the native culture, obey our laws, and stop leeching off of the wealth and social support systems built by the very culture they rage against.

Until that time, they will remain unwelcome to any thinking person.

Read More: Swedish Feminists Campaign For Fatties In Clothing Ads

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

5 Questions To Identify Who Really Rules Over You

September 7, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

In a perfect world there would be no favored groups. Each man would be treated as he deserves based on his ability. Anyone demanding special treatment based on some kind of group identity would simply find that rules and standards are impartial and fair to all.

Of course, we don't live in a perfect world. Often membership of an identity group confers systematic preferences either explicitly or in practice, as if just by accident or by chance. Of course, these things are not just accidental, they occur because of differing political power or sentiment. They occur because that group is in some sense a ruling group.

Identifying our overlords can be surprisingly hard in practice. Often such groups have media and other sources of information on their side. Frequently they present themselves as victimized, discriminated against, and downtrodden in order to forestall resistance to their power and favored status.

If in doubt run this quick test. If a particular identity group is an honest and true answer to most or all of these five questions then they probably rule over you.

1. Which group is it not safe to criticize?

If you want to keep your job… smile

The first line of defense for a ruling class is to prevent opposition from gathering. Propaganda is one side of this process, relentlessly presenting material that justifies the position of the ruling class. The other side and perhaps the more important side is the suppression of contrary views.

If criticism of a group and its power or pointing out that it occupies such a position meets surprisingly powerful social, legal, and cultural resistance then that group is probably a ruling class.

2. Which group are people keen to change identity to support or join?

Say I'm a girl or you'll go home in an ambulance

The drive for power and dominance is hard-wired into the human mind. Even when the power of a ruling group is denied, people notice. For an individual it is often easier to change to join that group than it is to try to succeed outside the ruling group. Significant numbers of people willing to make big changes to join a group is a pointer to power.

3. Which group is militant about asserting its identity?

Look at me, I’m part of a favored class

People never stop trying to distinguish themselves from others and present themselves in a positive light. If a person finds themselves part of a ruling group then they have an easy way to do this. They need only start emphasizing their membership of that group. It is almost always ruling groups or would be ruling groups which do this.

4. Which group can get away with telling lies?

They can get away with this… you can’t

People and institutions often find that lies are a tempting tool to gain advantage. It is the damage to credibility which limits their capacity to lie. Ruling groups have more power to publicize or suppress the existence of a lie. Consequently members of ruling groups can tell more lies and get away with it.

5. Which group gets institutional or government-mandated preferences?

All we want is to be equal… and first too

This one is a rather more obvious point, though much denied. When a group gets power what does it do with it? Among other things it uses that power to demand special treatment from government and from institutions.

So who does rule over us?

Here at Return of Kings we are quite rightly focused on the fact that in western countries all five questions could honestly be answered with some combination of girls, homosexuals, and recently an ever-growing list of other groups who enjoy more exotic forms of sexual misadventure.

However, it is fair to say that these are not the only groups of which it is true. The list of privileged groups is often different in different countries, but a quick check of some prominent groups against the five points is definitely instructive.

A second important take away from this list is that western societies are increasingly characterized by identity group power and identity group conflict. This is the reason why the indicators of rule in the list are becoming more common, more obvious and more severe.

This fact worries me in the abstract because I prefer a society where people are treated on their merits, as individuals. It worries me even more in the less abstract sense that as a reasonably normal, healthy, competent Western male I am increasingly in the position of being ruled over by an ever-growing list of favored groups who hate what I stand for.

Read More: 23 Things I Learned From The Book "Rules For Radicals"

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

The Visionary Poems Of William Blake

September 7, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

William Blake (1757-1827) was one of the strangest and most difficult to categorize of eighteenth century British literary figures. We are not even sure that “literary figure” correctly describes him, since it was as an illustrator that he primarily earned his bread.

His early life

He came from humble origins as the son of a London hosier. From early youth he was haunted by religious and demonic visions. He claimed to have seen angels, gods, and spirits beginning at the age of four, and thereafter enjoyed a close association with the supernatural.

As a child he was withdrawn and moody, and lived in a world of his own sensations. At the age of ten, he attended a school for illustrators in the Strand; this was followed by an extended apprenticeship with an engraver. All this time he immersed himself in Romantic poetry, from which he acquired a taste for exotic themes and lush, gothic settings.

It was not long before he began to take up the pen. Unique in the annals of poetry, he illustrated his own written verses with as much ability as he wrote them. His illustrated poems thus comprise a self-contained world, in which the reader finds himself immersed entirely in Blake’s dreamscapes.

He tried to attend the Royal Academy at the age of twenty-five, but was rejected for lack of sufficient academic credentials. How old is the story of genius spurned by the establishment!

Marriage discovered him at the age of twenty-five as well. His wife, Catherine Boucher, tolerated him about as much any woman could under the circumstances; but moody, visionary geniuses do not often make for good bedfellows. But he was no prude; in fact, he condemned sexual abstinence as a mark of ignorance and repression.

And yet he must have had some redeeming human qualities, for in 1783 two moneyed well-wishers financed the private printing of a volume of his verses named Poetical Sketches. Here was first displayed the main themes of his work: moody mysticism, individuality, and a fiery religious fervor.

An innovator as well

One of the main factors in preventing Blake's work from reaching a large audience was the financial cost of printing his books: they required both engraved plates as well as regular typescript, as he insisted on illustrating his own volumes.

Inexpensive editions of his works were hard to generate with the printing technology of the day, and so the circulation of his books remained low. Art to him could never be compromised. He would later, however, invent a process of engraving both text and illustrations on the same plate.

By 1784 he had sufficient means to open his own print shop on Broad Street in London. His brother Robert gave him valuable assistance in the beginning, but perished from tuberculosis in 1787.

The year 1789 saw the publication of Songs of Innocence, which was tinged by religious themes. This was followed in 1794 with Songs of Experience, which contains a personal favorite of mine. An excerpt below gives us a taste of his mystical tendencies:

> Tyger, Tyger, burning bright

> In the forests of the night,
> What immortal hand or eye
> Could frame they fearful symmetry?…
> And what shoulder, and what art,
> Could twist the sinews of thy heart?
> And when thy heart began to beat,
> What dread hands and what dread feet?

He was an idealist at heart, and believed in the brotherhood of man; the failure of the French Revolution to produce a utopia was a crushing disappointment to him. He was darkly suspicious of science, as he believed it to be a corrupter of faith, as well as an artifice used to oppress the common man.

After 1815 he gradually drifted away from poetry, probably finding that it did little to fatten his purse. His bread and butter remained illustration. He won in 1819 a commission from a wealthy man named John Linnell to illustrate some passages in the Bible and Dante's Divine Comedy.

While hard at work on this task, he was overtaken by death. By this time he had become an obscure figure, and his funeral passed without notice. For many years the precise location of his grave-site was not known; in 1957, finally, a bronze bust of Blake was erected at Westminster Abbey.

The essence of the man

He had been so far ahead of his time that his contemporaries had lost sight of him. He distrusted political reactionaries; despised slavery; and believed that the imagination above all must be cultivated as the beating heart of the creative process.

He reminds us vaguely of Blaise Pascal, with the frequency and intensity of his religious visions, and the perhaps untreated medical issues he may have suffered from. No one quite knew how to categorize him. For many years after his death, his work, like that of Herman Melville in the United States much later, remained forgotten.

The publication of a sympathetic biography of his life in 1863 by Alexander Gilchrist changed all this, and he eventually came to be seen as a key figure in the Romantic movement. His reputation has increased steadily since the twentieth century.

He remains a fascinating figure. No poet before or since has combined such mastery of words and images. His work seems surprisingly modern: the lines of poetry are usually short, the impact is powerful, and the images stay fixed in the mind.

He was an apostle of the imagination, and a testament to the consuming power of a visionary ideal.

Read More: What I Learned From The Exorcist

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Only White Countries Are Expected To Let In Hordes Of Illegal Migrants

September 7, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> In 2013, Japan's Ministry of Justice (MOJ) approved only six asylum seekers' applications for refugee status out of 3,777 cases (0.1 percent approval rate), the lowest number in 16 years.
>
> – German news outlet DW's report on Japan's horrendously strict refugee policy. This month, on the other side of the world, Germany permitted 8,000 Syrians on trains to enter its territory for local resettlement.

The European illegal migrant crisis has "evolved" from epidemic proportions to plain farcical and surreal ones. With the Germans and Austrians opening their front doors to whomever wishes to come and the Prime Minister of Finland now offering his home for so-called refugee settlement in a calculated electoral stunt, Europe's elites are continuing a very sad tradition of Europe (and, by extension, majority-European America, Canada, Australia and New Zealand) being forced to show a tolerance (and overt indulgence) that is never expected anywhere else in the world.

White-majority countries must accommodate millions of foreigners, whether as immigrants, illegal immigrants or genuine refugees, as other non-white countries can pursue objectively and highly ethnocentric immigration policies with absolute impunity. Keen to secure a future voting base that will strangle their conservative or traditionalist enemies and eliminate indigenous European cultures, socialists, other leftists, and SJWs see national or supranational borders such as those of the EU as bigoted and oppressive demarcations, instead of sensible boundaries that make able government and local prosperity (plus intra-European cultural diversity) possible.

Any problem found outside Europe is paradoxically perceived as both Europe's problem and Europe's responsibility to fix.

European banks crush the Greeks, but the EU is indulging every arriving non-European Asylum seekers, many of them Afghans, responded to the cash-strapped Greeks' hamstrung efforts to transport them further into Europe by rioting on the island of Lesbos last week. What message does it send to later migrants when this behavior is tolerated by the EU?

Ironically, one of the two major entry points for the tens of thousands of illegal migrants arriving every month into Europe, Greece, is the same economy where unemployment is higher now than it was for many Western countries during the Great Depression. The European Central Bank and other "institutions" will happily deny and put onerous condition after onerous condition on the Greeks, but the EU and many of its member states are demanding the resettlement of potentially millions of non-Europeans setting foot upon Europe's shores and crossing its countries' borders. Brussels shows more loyalty to illegal migrants than it does to Greeks, in many ways Europe's oldest recognizable community.

Return of Kings' many critics will label this website, once again, as a supposed hotbed of inveterately "racist" activity. Yet they won't proffer any explanation as to why SJWs are not devoting 0.0001% of the attention to combating actual, institutionalized ethnocentrism in a host of non-white countries where GDP is north of US$35,000.

If the situation was really about the betterment of people suffering outside Europe, SJWs and European elites would be vociferously castigating those countries that refuse to maintain even a semblance of a proper humanitarian program, particularly Japan, Korea, Taiwan and the oil-rich Gulf countries. They would also be holding individual regimes, such as Saudi Arabia and its exclusionary Sunni Arab policies, accountable for inflaming nearby conflicts on the basis of religious or ethnic sectarianism. That sectarianism is a significant reason why Syrians and others have departed for Europe in massive numbers.

Welcome to South Korea, where copious foreign blood was spilled to keep it racially pure in 2015

Despite white, African-American, Indian and other blood having coated the fields, mountains and forests of Korea between 1950 and 1953 to keep South Korea independent, the nominally "Western" government in Seoul defiantly keeps its population homogeneous. This is what a typical Korean classroom looks like:

[image]

Contrast that with a class from London's suburban Risley Avenue Primary School, where all but four (or five?) in the photograph are Middle Eastern, mixed-race, or "pure" black:

I raise Korea as a prominent example because, unlike Japan, it does not have a modern history dominated by the colonial conquest of neighboring lands. Rather, it was saved twice from the ignominy of foreign subjugation by non-Koreans, firstly by American might in the 1940s to end Japanese rule and secondly by a US-led coalition force during the Korean War to spare it from the grasp of a Soviet and Chinese-controlled Stalinist dictatorship in Pyongyang.

Successive governments in Seoul have shown "gratitude" for both the historical and ongoing non-Korean underwriting of South Korean security by refusing to countenance any possibility of a cosmopolitan society, including additions from Syria or comparable war-torn states. That generosity is left to the same sorts of nations that sacrificed their young men to keep South Korea an independent nation.

Japan's highly racist programs pertaining to refugees and general immigration are similarly inexcusable but for different reasons. Even as its former wartime ally Germany is the most financially generous place for illegal migrants in the world, accepting more than a thousand times more asylum seekers on a single day than the government in Tokyo did in an entire year, Japan is free to keep itself as the one race nation many of its Prime Ministers have called for.

The EU illegal migrant disgrace is about internal politics, not a safer world

The US-style “you’re a racist” response when someone opposes unrestricted mass immigration is quickly being taken up by European elites.

The modus operandi of SJWs and others is that “white privilege” means Europeans cannot celebrate their cultures like other races and ethnicities. They will turn a blind eye to very wealthy non-European nations like Korea applying the most exclusionary measures possible to avoid cosmopolitanism but expect Hungary or Greece to foot the bill of unrestricted illegal migrant movement. This has everything to do with diluting local European cultures to the point of irrelevance, so that SJW “cultural” uniformity can be painted over what remains.

There is, fundamentally, one rule for Europeans, who have contributed more to the affluence and stability of the world than any other continent in human history, and a bunch of other “rules” for everyone else. The European-founded United States will accept Iranian-Armenian families like Roosh’s as legal immigrants, but would you expect Japan, Korea, Taiwan or the Gulf Arab oil states to do the same, let alone welcome illegal migrants or refugees? No, of course not.

As illegal migrants throng at the entry points of Europe and stampede across its recession-ridden heartland, the white man’s burden of Rudyard Kipling is very much alive and well in 2015.

Read More: 10 Best And Worst Countries For An American Man To Find A Wife

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Research Suggests That A Woman's Body Incorporates DNA From The Semen Of Her Casual Sex Partners

September 8, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Compelling new scientific research has shown that female insects and mammals are able to absorb foreign DNA throughout the cells of their bodies. In human beings, this phenomenon has been conclusively shown to occur in women during pregnancy where genetic material from her growing fetus becomes fused within areas of her brain, affecting her chances of developing Alzheimer's disease.

The evidence now shows that female animals can incorporate sperm DNA from her prior sex partners. This foreign DNA winds up in future children after the woman successfully reproduces with a completely different male. In the human world, this means that the children a man has with a promiscuous woman could possess genes from previous sexual partners he has never seen or met.

There are existing sociological studies that show a marriage is far more likely to fail when a woman had more than two prior sexual partners (1, 2, 3, 4), but now renewed support for the once-questionable field of telegony is showing that there are also genetic reasons not to start a family with a promiscuous woman: children you have with her may have their gene pool polluted by her random affairs and one-night stands.

Telegony is an idea first proposed by Aristotle that claims offspring can inherit genes from the mother's previous sexual partners. This idea was not scientifically supported until evidence piled up of microchimerism, the phenomenon of foreign DNA becoming incorporated into the genome of an individual. This was first noted to happen in the case of blood transfusions. If you have received blood while in a state of trauma, your donor's DNA can become incorporated into your genome. Surprisingly little research has been done on microchimerism since then, but all signs point to this being a widespread and common genetic phenomenon throughout the animal kingdom.

A groundbreaking study on flies last year showed the process of females incorporating DNA from previous male partners and then exhibiting that male DNA into future spawn they had with completely different males.

> Scientists at the University of New South Wales discovered that, for fruit flies at least, the size of the young was determined by the size of the first male the mother mated with, rather than the second male that sired the offspring.
>
> […]
>
> "Our new findings take this to a whole new level – showing a male can also transmit some of his acquired features to offspring sired by other males," she says. "But we don't know yet whether this applies to other species."
>
> […]
>
> Dr Stuart Wigby of the Department of Zoology at Oxford University added: "The principle of telegony is theoretically possible for pretty much any internally fertilising animal, but these hasn't historically been much evidence for it.

Scientists involved in the study are making the guess that sperm DNA gets absorbed into female eggs without fertilizing them:

> The researchers suggested that the effect is due to molecules in the seminal fluid of the first mate being absorbed by the female's immature eggs, and then influencing the growth of offspring of a subsequent mate.

It was already observed that the human female body acts as a sponge for foreign DNA placed within it:

> It is possible that Mc [microchimerism] in the brain is able to differentiate into various mature phenotypes or undergoes fusion with pre-existing cells and acquires a new phenotype, as suggested by murine and human studies in which bone marrow-derived cells circulated to the brain and generated neuronal cells by differentiation, or fused with pre-existing neurons.
>
> […]
>
> Although the relationship between brain Mc and health versus disease requires further study, our findings suggest that Mc of fetal origin could impact maternal health and potentially be of evolutionary significance.

The above study has two seismic implications. The first is that a woman can absorb enough DNA during her lifetime that it changes her phenotype (i.e. her appearance and overall health state). There could be some truth to the phrase "slut face" in which highly promiscuous women suffer a change to their appearance because of all the variable sperm from different males that have been deposited inside them.

The second implication stems from the fact that it's scientifically conclusive that single mothers have DNA of their bastard children residing permanently within their bodies. Any man who reproduces with a single mom will have a child that contains DNA from the bastard spawn, which of course includes DNA from the absentee father. This means that men can be genetically cuckolded without being traditionally cuckolded, and that having a baby with a single mom is essentially giving the father of her first child a bonus prize in the game of evolution.

Microchimerism has also been noted in dogs, where older siblings pass on their DNA to younger siblings, suggesting that first-borns possess the highest genetic purity, a suspicion perhaps suspected by the royalty of old. Not only that, but the mother dogs incorporated Y-chromosome material from her male children. The mother dog essentially becomes more masculine by having sons.

> The researchers found cells with Y-chromosomes in the mother after these births, meaning the mother had male cells present in her female body. The researchers also found genetically similar male cells in the mother's female puppies from a later litter. Those puppies were newborn and had never been pregnant, strongly suggesting that they acquired the cells that were left behind by their older brothers while in the womb.

If a woman absorbs Y-chromosome genes from male sperm via casual sex, this would easily explain why women with high notch counts exhibit more masculine traits, something that any international playboy can anecdotally confirm. The promiscuous girl becomes more masculine because various masculine genes are being inserted into her genome and affecting her phenotype.

Some of the older ideas on telegony, dating over a century, now don't seem so left field:

> French biologist and philosopher Felix Le Dantec in his work "Individual Evolution, Heredity and Neo-Darwinists" (1899) mentions several facts that demonstrate telegony. But the evidence was quite pseudo-scientific even for that epoch. The author gave two examples with animals and one for humans.
>
> Le Dantec wrote that some farmer told him that once his swine copulated with a boar and their pigs absolutely resembled the father in color. But when the same swine copulated with another boar some pigs of the second farrow still resembled the color of the male pig the swine had copulated first.
>
> He also wrote about Lord Morton who first interbred a mare and a zebra and got a hybrid of horse and zebra. Next time he interbred the same mare with a horse. As a result of the second copulation the lord still got a colt that had lines resembling those of a zebra.

Microchimerism is on the leading edge of genetic research that has lately included epigenetics, which is the switching on and off of certain genes due to environmental cues. Epigenetics has raised questions against evolutionary theory because it shows genetic adaption can occur within individual organisms without the need for natural selection. New research is revealing how little we actually know about how the human genome works, suggesting a more complex picture than we've imagined.

Sociological research was the first to show that marrying women with a robust sexual history increased the likelihood of a failed marriage. Now genetic research adds more evidence to show that such women will birth children that—to a degree we don't yet understand—are not entirely of the father's. Because this new field of research is politically incorrect in painting strongly negative consequences for women leading a "strong and independent" promiscuous lifestyle, we are unlikely to see liberal universities approve much in the way of further research in this area.

For thousands of years, a woman's purity was cherished above all else when it came to creating a family. Now the scientific community is confirming the validity of that practice. Until the science is settled, men who insist on reproducing with a promiscuous woman should at least demand to interview her previous sexual partners so he can become familiar with the men whose genes may be passed on to his future children.

Read Next: The Deregulation Of The Sexual Marketplace

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How I Avoided A False Domestic Abuse Charge

September 8, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A couple months back I hooked up with a girl I met at an auto parts store. I mentioned her near the end of this article then gave a little more detail in this RVF post when talking about the application of abundance mentality to move her back in my rotation when I added another chick a couple weeks later.

Even though she was an alcoholic (she drank seven days a week), she treated me quite well from beginning to end. She cooked for me, bought me cigarettes, provided me with great sex, and was actually pretty good company.

Despite the fact she did this every day, she treated me quite well

I never even considered making her anything more than a fuck buddy on account of her alcoholism, tattoos, and the fact that she was almost too easy to fuck. But I did spend a fair amount of time with her, which caused her to become more and more attached.

After a while I decided it was time to cut her loose. Normally when I cut a girl off I don't do it in one fell swoop. I usually just gradually reduce my time with her until she's completely weened off of me, which makes for a smooth and painless ordeal…unless, of course, she's crazy…..which this chick absolutely was.

The Gambit

[image]
Never bought it for a second

I started my "time reduction" process when she texted and asked what time I was coming over a couple of days earlier than she normally does. I figured then was as good a time as any to start letting her down easy so I texted her back and told her I was going to have to take the next couple of weekends off.

Predictably, she started frantically texting me and giving me the third degree about why I'm "doing this," if there's another girl, if I'm getting tired of her, etc. I texted back and told her it was none of those and that I just had some things I needed to take care of which required a little more focus and time, and that we'd pick up right where we left off.

Of course, the plan was to hook back up in two weeks, then two weeks after that, then slowly fade out of her life. Most girls know a brush off when they see one and will simply move on to the next dude on their phone to assuage their fragile egos.

But "Jennifer" was having none of that, and attempted an all-too-familiar scheme to keep me around for just a little bit longer by calling and telling me she was pregnant.

The Counter

This isn't the first time a girl has attempted to lock me down by faking a pregnancy, so I didn't freak out. I calmly and coolly told her to sit tight and that I'd be there in a bit, then drove to a drug store a few blocks from my place and purchased two pregnancy tests.

I'd was sure she was lying but it would be disingenuous of me to say I wasn't a little concerned. Although I wrapped my dick each and every time I fucked her and never let her handle my condoms, slip ups can happen from time to time.

Jennifer had no idea what was coming next when I walked into her house, which was exactly what I wanted. I instructed her to take the pregnancy test immediately. She was surprised and hesitant but she obliged lest she sees her plan blow up in her face less than an hour after hatching it.

Pro tip: Make her take it TWICE…it's worth the extra coin

It was negative, as was the second, which exposed the lie she was trying to perpetuate. Realizing my exit was imminent she turned on the water works and started the drama. I, of course, was a stoic as a statue and let her cry and ramble and apologize to me without a single word back.

When she was finished I told her I was leaving. But once again she upped the ante by picking up the phone and calling the cops to report a domestic disturbance.

Now I've been in some pretty sticky situations with women, but this was a first for me. I hadn't laid a hand on her but I knew that leaving her house was as good as admitting guilt in the eyes of the gyno-centric laws. So I kept my wits about me, calmly sat on her couch, opened an audio recording app on my phone and waited for the police to arrive.

Self Incrimination

It didn't take long for the cops to get to her house but during the fifteen minute wait Jennifer went on a verbal tirade that would be the difference between me going to jail and going home.

Long story short, she yelled and screamed and said she was going to tell the cops I had choked and slapped her and that they would believe her story without question. She even went so far as to say "even if you don't get convicted you'll be locked up for three days anyways!"

I immediately saw an opportunity to strengthen my case and pounced. I calmly said to her: "Why are you doing this? I haven't laid a hand on you."

She took the bait hook, line, and sinker and frantically said: "Because you're being a fucking asshole!" To which I replied kindly with a hint of genuine concern, "What can I do to stop this?"

"Just stop with all this bullshit," she said. "I'm sorry I lied about being pregnant but it's the only way I could get you over here to find out what was really going on."

Gotcha

I looked at her with faux concern on my face and said, “That’s all this was about?”

“Yeah,” she said softening her tone.

“If you wanted an explanation all you had to do was ask. There’s no need to lie about me beating you up because what good am I to you if I’m in jail, right?”

“I know,” she said. “I’m sorry, Donovan I just freaked out. I didn’t want to lose you in my life.”

“No big deal,” I said kicking my feet up on her coffee table. I was far from relaxed but I wanted her to think I was to dilute the extremely thick tension in the room. It seemed to work because she followed my lead and loosened up a bit…

…until we heard a knock at the door.

Exhibit A(udio)

Jennifer's eyes were as large as dinner plates as her hands covered her mouth. She had forgotten she'd called the cops.

"I'll just tell them it was a big misunderstanding," she whispered. I shrugged my shoulders and gestured to the door hoping against all hope my phone's audio recording app was as advertised.

Jennifer walked to the door then turned around and ran back where she whispered, "What if we just don't answer the door?"

The cops knocked again but this time it was harder.

"They'll break down the door because they think I'm in here beating your ass. If you don't let them in, they'll let themselves in. Just answer the fucking door." By this point we're both on edge but I kept my cool on the outside.

Finally (and reluctantly) Jennifer walks to the door and let the cops in. My heart hammered against my chest as they asked Jennifer if she was alright and a number of other bullshit loaded questions they throw at her to make me look guilty, regardless of the answers she gave them.

Lies upon lies

Jennifer had painted herself in a corner and she knew it. She told the dispatcher I had choked and slapped her, so she had to stick to her story with the police, which sounded less than convincing when she repeated it in front of them. Reading the body language of both cops (who were both men) made me extremely nervous even with the ace I had up my sleeve.

After what seemed like an eternity of Q&A between Jennifer and the cops, they turned their attention to me. I was extremely careful not to show aggressive or guilty posture, and not to interrupt them during the time they interrogated her. I had been on the couch with my feet on her coffee table the entire time and stayed completely silent until they asked me what my version of the story was.

I didn't say a word. I simply reached for my phone on the coffee table, opened the app, and played the recording silently praying to every God I could think of that it audible enough to get me off…

…and to my extreme relief, our conversation rang through the speakers on my phone as clear as a bell. With the exception of the whispering between her and I when the cops were knocking at the door, those officers heard every word.

Jennifer could do nothing but stand there with a horrified look on her face. A few minutes in she attempted to say something but was quickly shushed by one of the officers.

After the recording finished playing, Jennifer was in tears. When one of the officers placed her in handcuffs and read her her rights as she was being arrested for false accusation, she began sobbing and apologizing. Neither myself or the two cops said anything as she was led out of her house and into their squad car.

Her water works didn't faze any of us

One of the cops stayed behind and asked if I wanted to take out a restraining order. I declined because a) Jennifer didn't know where I lived and b) I knew a restraining order would be useless and unenforced on the off chance she actually tried something. I just wanted to get the fuck out of there and out of her life.

The officer shook my hand, apologized for what had happened and said "If more people do what you did and record these domestic disturbances, we'd probably be arresting a lot more accusers." I just nodded and left.

Conclusion

I could sit here and say that game saved me that night, but that would be far from the truth. If not for my phone recording what really went down, I'd have gone to jail that night regardless of the amount of game I had. And that's a fact.

I haven't seen or heard from Jennifer since. I'm not sure exactly how much time she spent in jail but I'm fairly certain it wasn't long.

Fucking with crazy girls is a mathematical inevitability. The number of emotionally damaged females in this country who can and will pull this type of bullshit is growing by the second, so it stands to reason that there's a pretty good chance you'll encounter a woman like this at some point in your pussy plundering lives.

Do yourself a favor and RECORD EVERYTHING. Otherwise you might find yourself on the wrong end of a false accusation, and that's a no-win situation for you whether you're guilty or not.

Read Next: How I Dealt With A False Rape Accusation

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Transgender Activists Report Cross Dressing Charity Fun Run To Police As Hate Crime

September 9, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A fun run organised by the Derian House Children's Hospice, in which fathers dress in drag to raise money for sick and terminally ill children, has been reported as a "hate crime" to police by a transgender activist group. The Chrysalis Transsexual Support Group reported the 5km "Dames on the Run" race as a hate crime in order to prevent the event going ahead.

The race is described by Derian house as "drawing on the much-loved Pantomime Dame character that is part of our theatrical heritage and supported by hundreds of thousands of people in every year." The transgender activists said however that the race was "dehumanising." Lancashire Police issued a statement indicating that no action would be taken in respect of the alleged "hate crime."

"Dehumanising": the latest unfalsifiable SJW allegation

A participant in Dames on the Run

Steph Holmes, of the transgender group Chrysalis, told the local newspaper Chorley Guardian:

> We get enough confusion with the word transgender, which mixes us up with transvestites. Transvestites certainly don't dress for comic purposes and I don't get up in the morning and think 'what can I put on today to give people a laugh?
>
> This race pokes fun at cross-dressing and, by association, us, reducing us to objects to be laughed at. Dehumanising us this way gives carte blanche to those that would do us physical harm, much like the gay bashers of old.

"She" added:

> It's a small step from ridicule to persecution. The current stats suggest a 34 per cent chance of beaten up, raped or killed for being trans. We do not need to give the bigots any more ammunition.
>
> I am sure that Derian House didn't intend to give offence. The very fact that it's a children's hospice should make them sensitive to potential bad publicity and the effect that this has on young trans people.

Derian House Children's Hospice said in response:

> As a children's hospice, we deal with highly sensitive and emotive issues all the time and would never have considered organising a fundraising event that might cause upset or offence.
>
> …It was intended appeal to the fathers of desperately sick children, who do so much to hold their family together in the face of their child's devastating illness > and who ask for very little support in return.

>
> We wanted to provide an opportunity for them to participate in a fun-packed event and encourage other men to show their support and raise vitally needed funds for the hospice."
>
> We were shocked to receive a complaint, and our chief executive wrote immediately to apologise for any offence caused and assure her that none was intended. She has accepted an invitation to visit the hospice on Monday."

Denials and counter-denials

In a further twist to the story, the charity Chrysalis, which purports offer help with "gender identity issues" in South Hampshire and Dorset, put out a statement distancing itself from the complaint against the hospice:

> Various news articles have mistakenly attributed statements made by a member of a transsexual support group, with a similar name, to us. The person who made the statement is not known to us and has absolutely no connection to us. The support group in question is not known to us and has absolutely no connection to us and IS NOT a registered charity.
>
> No member or beneficiary of our organisation has made any complaint or derogatory comment regarding the Derian House Children's Hospice fun run. We wish to disassociate ourselves from these reports as the views presented do not reflect our own in the slightest.

"Steph Holmes" later told homosexual news or that "she" did not report Derian House to authorities. Lancashire Police however, said: "We are aware of and investigating an incident that was reported to us as a hate crime on Thursday."

Holmes was later reported as fearing for "her" safety and claimed to have been falsely accused of trying to block a fund-raising event for sick children. "She" denied reporting the matter to the police, claiming that "she" simply thought it insensitive and wanted to ask Derian House to do a different race theme. "She" alleges, contrary to published accounts, that an individual who holds no formal position in Chrysalis Transsexual Support Group referred the matter to Lancashire Police.

A Bingo Hall Bruce Jenner

Steph Holmes

Steph Holmes underwent gender reassignment surgery to become a woman at 50 years of age. She told the Daily Star tabloid in January of this year that “her” parents bought “her” strappy black heels as a Christmas present at three years of age.

In March 2010, Holmes consulted a doctor to start “her” transition. Now, Holmes reports feeling “complete.”

Brave New Cock-Slicing World

The LGBTBBQ “community” harbours some real outliers of the human condition, men and women so tortured by hormones and psychological demons they revolt against nature by enlisting surgeons to slice them in order to become other than what nature intended them to be.

In May of this year, Roosh Valizadeh wrote in his article, People Should Not Be Allowed Unlimited Personal Freedom, that:

> Most humans are not capable of wisely using their freedom, and so they must be restrained and managed by rules or by those who know what’s best for that individual more than the individual himself.

He continued to say that:

> The more freedom you give to the average person, the more they will harm not only themselves but others whom they come across.

The freedom to employ a highly skilled surgeon to slice your penis open and tuck it up inside your body so you can prance around pretending to be the “real woman” you always wanted to be, is certainly a freedom that will have been envisaged by Roosh in his short and punchy piece.

Pushing the agenda

I have no problem with Steph Holmes or Bruce Jenner adopting whatever gender identity the felt like when they woke up this morning, and shouting it from the rooftops. Just keep your hand out of my pocket. Vice has reported with the unbridled glee of a shitlib that California had become the first state to pay for a prisoner's transgender surgery. "Shiloh Quine" is a "woman" who has been served 35 years of life sentence for murder. Californian rate-payers will foot the bill.

Serving life in prison for murder, undergoing gender reassignment on the taxpayer's dime.

What concerns me in all this charade is the coterie of single-issue extremists of all stripes, not just those espousing trans or other subsets of LGBTBBQ, who are out to stir the pot and cause trouble in the wider "normal" community.

Recent news has covered such telling tales as the Canadian bulldyke refused a haircut by a Muslim barber, the British lesbians who got upset over being barred from "Bring your dad to school day" at their kids' school," the woman who had her Planet Fitness membership revoked for complaining about a transgender "woman" using the women's locker room. That's before we get on to the numerous "gay wedding cake" cases of persecution of religious minorities.

Intolerance of intolerance is a virtue

The tolerance of difference should not include tolerance of the intolerance for norms and customs of broader society. The advocates who speak on behalf of the LGBTBBQ "community" love to portray them as a loveable and harmless circus of eccentrics, all platform shoes and glitter and lycra. The reality is that in these circles move bitter extremists with a radical agenda to attack and destroy everything that is held dear by the majority.

One glaring example is the miserly-hearted meanness of the character who tried to ruin a charity fun run in drag to the police as a “hate crime.” Meanness and a drive to subvert and destroy every institution, in a Gramscian march, inform such actions, just as they do every token fuck you to the status quo, from #KillAllMen to the NUS drive to ban gay men appropriating black women.

Bruce Jenner and Steph Holmes can dress up in skirts and wear lipstick for all I care. It does me no harm besides filling me with a queasy feeling of disgust, which I can ignore. It’s the carefully chosen attacks on the communal activities of ordinary people by miscreants of a radical stripe that requires our immediate attention and defensive action.

Read Next: Are Transsexuals Who Sleep With Straight Men Guilty Of Rape?

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a £2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

How Advice From Startup Culture Could Take Your Game to the Next Level

September 9, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I recently read Eric Ries' bestselling book The Lean Startup. First published in 2011, it has become something of a classic among entrepreneurs and the denizens of Silicon Valley. It's easy to see why. Its pared back, simple approach to efficient innovation in business provides a template that many people forming companies could learn a lot from. As I was reading, it struck me that the lessons it teaches could equally be applied to game.

Comparisons between game and business (and in particular sales) have been made frequently before, but just as Ries' book genuinely brings something new to the table in commerce, so its application could be far-reaching for those looking to improve their dating lives.

What The Lean Startup Teaches

The Lean Startup is a detailed, well-written account of Ries' innovations as as business owner, of the early successes and innovations of his tech company IMVU, which he steered from near failure to stellar, multi-million dollar success. The method that he outlines feels revolutionary simply as it is so counter-intuitive and opposed to standard business practice.

In short, Ries counsels that the fledgling company should work in the most efficient manner possible, ignoring the more lumbering processes of the larger firms they might be tempted to copy. In practice this means rather than spending ages in development, you should instead release a minimum viable product to market. In the book, Ries describes releasing an early version of his interconnectivity avatar product with bugs in it. This is against the grain – the normal practice would be to spend a long time making the product the best it can be.

Ries argues that startups operate under conditions of extreme uncertainty, especially in terms of what the customer actually wants. After all, at the beginning there are no customers. So waste time and resource on tweaks when it could be that the entire product is not popular with the market?

What you should do instead is continually test the product and refine as you go along. This saves time as it allows you to launch quicker, it saves money as you're not testing beforehand, and means that you are being responsive to the market rather than to your preconceived notions of what should be successful.

Accelerate The Feedback Loop

As in the diagram above, the company should continually accelerate the feedback loop that flows through building a new product, measuring customer responses and then pivoting, or changing direction in response.

What Does This Have to Do With Game?

At first sight this may not seem to have much to do with game, but bear with me.

In a sense, every man who steps out onto the street to talk to girls, or who hits the club, is an entrepreneur. He’s taking his product – himself – out to market and testing the response that it gets. Pick-up, like entrepreneurship, also operates within circumstances of extreme uncertainty.

The problem is that many guys want to perfect everything before they go out and actually talk to girls. This leads to the problem of what we call “mental masturbation.”

Mental masturbation is a buffer that stops guys getting results that hides beneath the garb of virtue. Men think that by watching infield videos or reading articles about game (this one included) that they are actually “doing” game. The truth is, of course, that they’re not. Game only exists when a man approaches a girl he likes and indicates that he likes her. Everything else is foreplay — and solo foreplay isn’t very much fun.

Think about your dating life as it is now. Are you getting out there into the field, or are you simply making excuses for yourself and watching endless videos, feeling like you could never do what those guys on YouTube are doing?

If so, you should remember the lessons of Eric Ries.

Face it – you’re never going to be perfect, so there is no point in waiting until some imaginary point in the future when your inner game is all fixed, your money is sorted and you have a Lambo in the driveway before you ask a girl on a date. What you should do instead is get out there, start approaching girls and take direct feedback from the marketplace.

The Field Is King

An old game expression states that “the field is king.” What that means is that the only valuable feedback comes from the people you are seeking to seduce – girls. So you can sit at home thinking you’re the world’s greatest stud or it’s biggest loser, but until you test that hypothesis you don’t know for sure.

What you should do is go out – whether you think you’re ready or not – and approach ten girls. Ten girls will give you a pretty good indicator of where you are. If you collect six numbers then all good. If all ten laugh in your face then you know you have a way to go.

Before You Go Out And Talk To Girls, Both The Problem And the Solution Are Unknown

Through careful, honest analysis of each set – try keeping a journal or a spreadsheet to help with this, or even recording yourself on a smartphone or Dictaphone – you’ll soon get a pretty good idea of what needs to be done. At this point you are measuring.

Next you pivot — that is, change the product or your approach according to the feedback. Are you talking to fast or wearing bad clothes? Or approaching in a city where the ratios are particularly bad? Switch up, go elsewhere and try again. Then, when you find strategies that do work build on them and make them fundamentals in your repertoire.

Remember, game is not about being perfect the first time you speak to a girl, or even the thousandth time. It’s about having the courage to step up to the plate, take negative feedback like a man and go back into the fray stronger. Although it is a book aimed at business-owners, The Lean Startup reminds us of this simple principle in a clear, considered way.

Read More: Should You Live With Her?

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

3 Reasons Why You Should Never Let Your Child Watch Sesame Street

September 10, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Recently, my wife started to let our two-year-old son watch Sesame Street. She figured it would be a fun way to help him learn how to read so she started to record the episodes. But after screening some episodes, we were horrified by the messages that the show is trying to teach children. We will never let our son watch Sesame Street again.

Here is why you should never let your child watch Sesame Street:

1. Forced Transsexualism

Blögg has reservations about being forced to dress as a girl.

I don't know about you but I feel like I already see enough men pretending to be women and women pretending to be men on television. I understand that the left has an agenda and that they always feel the need to push the latest front in the culture war, but I expect that they would have the decency to leave children out of it. They don't.

Sesame Street now has a set of new generation of muppets in addition to the old favorites like Cookie Monster and Oscar the Grouch. The CGI characters that appear in Abby's Flying Fairy School are one example of these new muppets.

The premise is simple enough. The muppets are attending a school to learn how to be fairies. The whole Fairy School segment seems to be geared more toward girls than boys. After all, boys usually don't want to become fairies. I find it disappointing that Sesame Street couldn't find a way to make the segment more appealing to both boys and girls. But I am not going to belabor that point.

One of the muppets who is attending the Fairy School is a character called Blögg. Blögg is a furry, purple monster who doesn't seem to be too bright. Of course, Blögg is a boy, because if he were a girl, he would be super smart.

In the episode entitled Cinderella Challenge, the characters have to participate in a challenge to earn their fairy godmother wings. Although there are female students at the school, the character that gets designated to dress up as Cinderella is Blögg.

Blögg doesn't want to dress up as Cinderella, but he is forced to do it. As a little boy, one of the most humiliating things that can be done to you is to be forced to act like a girl. Blögg is just a cartoon character, but can you imagine how you'd feel if your son went to school and was forced to dress up like Cinderella?

What is behind this nonsense? Why did the Sesame Street writers feel the need to humiliate one of the male muppets? I can't pretend to know for certain, but I doubt it is innocent.

2. Discrimination Against White People

I was raised to judge people based on the content of their character, not the color of their skin. I have no problem with people being proud of how they look or of their ethnic background. But I do have a problem with discrimination against white people.

Sesame Street had a segment called the "Color of Me Song" where there are three adults and one muppet. All four characters have brown skin: an Indian woman, a light skinned black man, a darker skinned black man, and a darker skinned muppet girl. East Asians and whites are not represented. Here are the lyrics of the song that they sang:

> Some skin is dark,
>
> Some skin is light,
>
> Some skin is brown,
>
> Some skin is white,
>
> Different colors,
>
> Different shades,
>
> It's part being human, it's how we're made.

> Leela the Sweet Indian Lady: My skin is light, light brown like caramel.
> And caramel it tastes so sweet just try and you'll tell.
> So brown is sweet, and I am sweet. Sweet as I can be.
> I love my skin, love my brown skin.
> Light brown, that's the color of me.
>
> Mando the Proud Lion: My skin it is a sandy brown, it's like the lion's mane.
> And lions you know there so proud to because lions reign.
> So brown is proud, proud as I can be.
> I love my skin, love my brown skin.
> Sandy brown, that's the color of me.
>
> Chris the Strong Black Guy: My skin it is a deep, deep brown.
> It's like a walnut tree, and trees they grow big up and strong.
> You really must agree.
> So brown is strong and I am strong, strong as I can be.
> I love my skin, love my brown skin.
> Deep brown, that's the color of me.
>
> Segi the Beautiful Muppet: My skin it is a dark, dark brown.
> It's like a chestnut horse.
> And horses are so beautiful, you know that's true of course.
> So brown is beautiful, and I'm beautiful, as beautiful as can be.
> I love my skin, love my brown skin.
> Dark brown, that's the color of me.

The clear focus is on how wonderful brown skin is. Let me anticipate two objections:

The first objection is that they mention the word white, so technically all skin colors are included. But remember, this is intended for little children. The optics are what's important. There are no white people, just brown skinned humans and a brown muppet. The message that a little kid is going to get is that it is cooler to have brown skin.

The second objection will be that Sesame Street is just trying to boost the self-esteem of brown skinned kids in a majority white culture. But why do the producers of Sesame Street, who are probably mostly privileged white people, assume that people with brown skin have self-esteem problems? Isn't that racist?

(By the way, the commenter who composes the funniest version of this song for a white person or an East Asian person gets a (figurative) gold star. Vote for your favorite.)

Interestingly enough, if you watch Sesame Street and not just this particular episode, you will notice that only about one in six children shown are white, even though 63% of the US is still white.

And the white children that are shown are often in wheel chairs, autistic, or white boys who dance ballet. Is Sesame Street engaging in a bit of wishful thinking that all whites are weak or homosexual?

This overemphasis on making darker skinned kids feel good about themselves is negatively affecting the self-esteem of white kids. A friend of mine has a white daughter who is four years old. She has grown up in daycare and watches Sesame Street and many other popular kid shows.

Recently, my friend's daughter brought home a drawing from daycare. It was supposed to be a self-portrait that she drew as part of a class project. But in the self-portrait, the little girl colored herself brown with black hair. In reality, this little girl has green eyes and dirty blonde hair. When her parents asked her about the picture she just shrugged her shoulders and said she wanted to be brown like everyone else.

Sesame Street was always inclusive, but in the old days it was done in a way without making a big deal of it. When the emphasis has gone so far as to make little white girls think that they are black, it has tilted too far.

3. Multiculturalism takes the place of learning letters and numbers

Murray Monster, who has a mullah beard, and his pet goat Ovejita are preparing your children for the inevitable Islamic takeover

I have always thought that Sesame Street was supposed to teach children the alphabet, numbers, and early reading and math skills. It may have done that in the past but its current incarnation is not as focused on these skills. The episodes I have seen have decreased the amount of math and reading and replaced it with self-esteem and multiculturalism.

For instance in an episode entitled "Rakhi Road," Leela teaches the Sesame Street gang about Rakhi, an Indian holiday "where sisters, brothers, and friends show how much they love each other by exchanging special bracelets, foods, and gifts."

I am not a cultural barbarian. My wife and I are both bilingual. We want our children to be broad-minded and we plan to expose them to many different cultures through friends and travel.

However, at a time when SAT scores are plummeting to record lows, does it really make sense to replace academic content with the multi-cultural stuff? Wouldn't it make more sense to teach children the more practical academic skills so that they are equipped to succeed in life? As it stands, Sesame Street thinks it is better to know what Ramadan is rather than knowing how to count.

Conclusion

If you have a young child, regardless of your race or ethnicity, don't let them watch Sesame Street. If children watch educational programming, it is better if they learn something practical. As a parent, you can impart self-esteem to your child as well as a healthy respect for his heritage. You don't need the pious social engineers at Sesame Street to do it for you.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Child Circumcision Should Be Banned

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

15 Important Quotes From The Predatory Female

September 10, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Published way back in 1992, The Predatory Female may be the first red pill book ever written. It warns men about the dangers of modern women well before male-centered internet communities began to do the same. While used copies of the book are expensive, PDF versions can be found via Google.

Constructed in the form of a question-and-answer dialogue, this book discusses a woman's true nature and how Western divorce laws create catastrophic problems for men f they decide to marry. Here are my favorite 15 quotes from the book:

What women want

> Q. Beyond herself and her status with other women, does anythign else pique her interest?
>
> A. Yes, any combination of money, romance, and excitement. The scent of these accommodations will have her rising like a cobra in a wicker basket. The provider of such diversions occupies center stage in her life, but his identity is > unimportant to her, and it’s a temporary position. Nobody can amuse her forever. All pied pipers eventually fade into the past.

The end game

> When you begin to fraternize with a woman, you are taking the first steps in a ritual mating dance that, if allowed to progress, will result in your moving about the floor in a semi-comatose state until you are fleeced of your money, property, and peace of mind. A predatory female will study you. She learns to know what you are thinking. She begins the strongest primeval death grip known to man.

Beta males are essential to the system

> …the matriarchal system could never operate efficiently without the hordes of male drones it has created. These men, preconditioned by their mothers and suffering from a self-imposed order of chivalry, consistently front for the system and its predatory female masters.

Invisible men

> Q. Who is the invisible man?
>
> A. Any man the predatory female has deemed to be of no further use. Althought she’ll go to extremes pleasing and cultivating a man when she’s in the acquisitive mode, she views him as untouchable once his purpose is served. He totally ceases to exist in every way. He becomes a nonperson and is fair game for the carrion birds of society.

Natural parasites

> A primary trait of the predatory female is that she deprives you of your peace of mind in direct proportion to the amount of time you spend with her. It is a natural sapping process from which there is no escape. Starting with your mind, it soon extends to your money and possessions. It’s heads she wins, tails you lose.

Rigged game

> A man, dealing with a predatory female, is like a man in the water with a shark. The environment (the matriarchal society) belongs to the predator. A man needs luck or special training to survive. Conditions permitting, a shark isn’t satisfied with just one chunk of the victim . . . it keeps coming back for more.

Slot machine rule

> Q. What is the slot machine rule?
>
> A. An extension of the principle that there is no such thing as a free lunch, the slot machine rule states that dealing with a woman on a personal level is like playing with a slot machine. It’s fun to watch, to play with, and it gives rewards.

> But the odds are against you. The longer you play the same machine, the more it will cost. It will periodically pay off in small amounts, teasers, but you will invariably > end up in the red.
>
> Q. And a date is like feeding in the first quarter?
>
> A. Yes, and you might hit a jackpot. But sooner or later the slot takes it all back with interest.
>
> Q. What if you just quit?
>
> A. Before you are even out of sight, the machine is being cranked by another sucker. Indeed, he was probably cranking surreptitiously before your departure.

Hard to win

> If an individual fails to understand that a female's charms are never given, only loaned, he is doomed to exploitation. The male must constantly remember that there is absolutely no such entity as an exclusive use of a woman's sexual favors. There are always other men, and sometimes women. The man's innate desire to possess a female, to have his own little sex doll and intimate companion, is his biggest vulnerability. A predatory female will use this weakness to lead him into a trap and destroy him.

Sexual slavery

> In the advanced stages of sexual hypnosis, the male may subconsciously want to crawl into the vagina and live there. Most normal, healthy men are capable of becoming total slaves to a well orchestrated sexual enticement and the predatory female is acutely aware of this. If necessary, she will stretch that vulva right over his head and smother him to get what she wants.

The ultimatum

> Q. My girl friend says our relationship hasn't "progressed" and if I don't let her move in, she wants to break up.
>
> A. Undoubtedly, but keep in mind . . . they all dump you sooner or later anyway. Your only elective is choosing how far the camel's head will be into the tent when you are dumped. Have you considered minimizing your losses? This female is marketing her wares and you are reluctant to put up any front money. Why not opt for a new vendor?

Alimony

> Many divorced men are sending monthly alimony checks to women bearing little resemblance, physically or mentally, to the ones they married.

Marriage simulator

> Q. Is it possible to sample real marriage without the hideous commitment?
>
> A. Fortunately, yes. Simply purchase a five hundred pound Bengal tiger and keep it in the back yard. Support it, feed it, and mount it. See for yourself if you are cut out for married life.

Only single men can be heroes

> How would Superman, The Lone Ranger, James Bond, or even Jesus Christ have come off as a married man? The answer is: terrible. Married men are hard to sell as heroes. A picture of James Bond trying to placate a shrieking wife while she threatens to have his wages garnished doesn't fit the hero image. A married man is a cornered man. He is a man who has lost something, and this makes it hard for him to be the classic, free thinking, and independent hero.

The law game

> We're a nation of litigants with the courts saying, in effect, "Ok Mr., go ahead and marry, but if she exercises the most famous of all women's prerogatives—changing her mind—we'll help her clean your clock. We'll give her your home, children, retirement, and much of your pay check for years to come. You'll even have to pay her attorney."

Religious girls

> Churches are crawling with predatory females masquerading as born again lilies of the field, but ravenously seeking willing, naive males. Those who bite on the biblical "lord and master" routine being peddled by churchgoing predatory females, being more deluded than most, will find (after the camel gets its head in the tent) their scrotum stretchings twice as miserable.

The book is written in such a plainspoken style that it may serve as a great introduction for hopeless beta males who need to be eased into a new belief system without a shock to their system, especially since it's much faster to read than The Manipulated Man. I recommend it as required reading for any man who is considering marriage in the West.

Read More: "The Predatory Female" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Vladimir Putin May Be The Last Guardian Of Traditional Values

September 11, 2015 | by James Maverick | Link | Original Link

Unless you've been living under a rock, you heard about one of the biggest events of the last couple of years, the Ukrainian "revolution," called Maidan. The result was the toppling of a democratically elected president, and the switch from a Russian-backed to a Western-backed government. As someone who was born in Ukraine, I was immensely impacted by the tumultuous events.

In order to better understand what exactly happened, it's important to look at the broader context. One of the things that's happening is that the world is becoming increasingly liberal. In Europe, country after country is being swallowed by the aggressively expanding European Union. After former Soviet Union republics (Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia) joined the EU, it was just a matter of time before Ukraine would be next.

The one that stands alone

Ukraine, however, is a unique case. While many of the former Soviet republics are rabidly anti-Russian (e.g., Estonia and Lithuania), Ukraine has always been split 50/50 between Russian speakers who align with Russia and Ukrainian speakers who favor the West. If you don't believe me, see the results of Ukraine's previous presidential elections which have always been split down the middle.

Last year I spent a summer in St. Petersburg, Russia. Right now, I'm writing this from Kiev, Ukraine. If you've ever been to both countries, you know that they traditionally have always had very strong traditional genders. The guys are tough as nails and the women exude strong femininity. It's the complete opposite of the circus—and circus is exactly what it is—that you see in the liberal North American cities such as San Francisco or Toronto. After living in America for many years, returning to Russia and Ukraine has always been a pleasant experience.

However, after the change of government, Ukraine is now firmly in the Western hands. Things are changing in Ukraine and not for the better. There's a loosening of traditional family values, introduction of gay parades (the first one lasted only half an hour), increased agitation by liberal SJW's who are recording "atrocities" against gays and posting them all over the Internet.

The frontier between East and West—between traditional family values and "anything goes"—has been pushed further East, from the Ukrainian-EU border to the Russian-Ukrainian border. I don't believe I have to explain to you what kind of goodies are introduced with Western "values": it's a cornucopia of things that we're all perfectly aware of: feminism, shaming of sexes, "social justice" and, of course, the emasculation of men.

The question is: why is Ukraine being overrun by Western values, while Russia is firmly resisting this poisonous onslaught? The answer: Vladimir Putin. Russia's president has said enough is enough. He doesn't want Western "values" to infiltrate his country. He wants Russia to remain Russian.

Not surprisingly, there has been very strong worldwide campaign to discredit Vladimir Putin. Leaders of the Russian opposition are constantly meeting—plotting an overthrow?—with US embassy employees. Not to mention that every single Western newspaper or magazine has been comparing Putin to Hitler, and claiming that he wants to launch WWIII.

Why is this happening? It's obvious that the West doesn't want a strong leader who provides a rule of law for his people. This is not even a war of West against Russia; or a war of Ukrainian-speaking people vs. Russian-speaking people—it's a war of ideologies. It's a culture war. A war between traditional values coupled with strong gender polarities, strong masculinity and strong femininity on one side and liberals, SJW's, feminists, and other wackos on the side that wants to demolish the existing model and create their own world order.

When you look around the globe, can you name another strong leader? A strong leader that stands for his own country and people? Take a moment, I can wait. Still thinking? Give up?

Do you know why you're stuck? Because there aren't any other strong leaders left besides President Putin. Do you think it's a mere coincidence that with strong leaders come strong traditional values and gender roles? Don't be so naive. As long as there are strong leader like Putin at the helm, you won't have crazy wackos like SJW's running around and shoving their half-backed propaganda down the throats of gullible citizens. Strong leaders don't let that happen.

For example, here's what happened in Belgrade, Serbia when EU forced a traditional, Christian orthodox country to hold its first ever gay parade:

This is not meant to endorse violence, but rather to show the level of opposition to leftism that exists on the ground but is being ignored by world leaders. We think that traditional gender roles will somehow magically return by some miracle from God. We think that all we need is to make a wish to the tooth fairy before going to bed. But that's not exactly how the real world works.

Femininity and masculinity don't just exist because you want them: they exist only when there's order and stability. Real order, not the chaos that we have in the West.

And who do you think provides that order and stability? A strong leader, that's who. As soon as you give people too much freedom, people will take that freedom and destroy everything that the man has painstakingly built, resulting in chaos and confusion; they'll create strange ideologies that promote unjustified shaming and reverse discrimination in the name of "tolerance" and "equality."

Call me old school, but I respect strong family values. I like when things stay normal. I'm a man, and I want to be respected as a man. Is respect really too much to ask for? I like when there's a strong masculinity counterbalanced by strong femininity. That's what fueled our civilization for hundreds and even thousands of years. That's how we're wired biologically.

I like when people are left alone and no one is feeding them propaganda replete with lies. I don't want the world be infused by morally corrupt liberal values. But we need strong leaders to make that happen.

The Russian people are very fortunate to have such a strong leader who's acting in the best interest of his countrymen. It's clearly not the case for the rest of us.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Ever Wonder What Kind Of Man Becomes A Russian Alpha?

James Maverick

James saw the light when he left America for greener pastures. His work was featured in Business Insider as well as other publications. He is the author of The Sovereign Man: Reclaim Your Masculinity. Visit his site Maverick Traveler and follow him on twitter @mavtraveler.

Female Ex-Employee Tried To Get $20 Million From Ashley Madison Over “Medical Condition”

September 11, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In 2012, Doriana Silva tried to sue Avid Life Media, the parent company of recently hacked Ashley Madison, for $20 million. She claimed, spectacularly, that she had developed a repetitive strain injury (RSI) from trying to make 1,000 fake female profiles in mere weeks for the infamous adultery website.

Silva, a Brazilian, may have filed a claim more frivolous than “asked for sex by my boss” Hanna Bouveng. Although Bouveng disgustingly won her lawsuit, at least this Ashley Madison legal action did not hand a woman the exact obscene “reward” she wanted for being a self-entitled princess.

Sadly, we cannot be sure that Silva walked away empty-handed. With the state of Western legal systems so parlous nowadays, women know they can concoct the most ridiculous claims or wholly exaggerate them and be thoroughly set for life. Companies, eager to avoid negative publicity and exorbitant legal fees, including those they often have to subsidize for the opportunistic plaintiffs, tend to make private agreements that garner the female involved nonetheless very impressive “consolation” sums.

What this tells us about Ashley Madison and other dating sites

Like Hanna Bouveng taking Benjamin Wey to the proverbial cleaners, Doriana Silva thought she had the right to name any price she wanted. In a blow to society, Bouveng largely got her sought after treasure.

Dating sites are sausage fests, by and large. That should not be a surprise to anyone. That said, they can net you some quality action from time to time (plus the messages you exchange before can act as a sort of de facto notarized document to undermine false rape claims). So, too, can they provide more discreet channels for satisfying your libido.

The downsides of online dating are arguably more potent. As the article I cited above shows, FBI security experts are indicating that the number of profiles outstrips the number of individuals thought to be creating them. The return on investment can already be lacklustre with online dating. Discretion may be a plus, but logistical issues of gaining a woman's trust and arranging conducive times to meet can be a drag. This is only exacerbated when you're trawling through a menagerie of fake profiles, a good proportion of which can be hard to identify as manufactured ones.

Remember, countless business owners, usually fellow men, are quite happy to take your hard-earned currency to finance their next vacation or boat for themselves and their wives. Your private details on these sites, especially your name, are now clearly within the reach of those determined enough to find and publicize them.

So, be warned.

What this tells us about Doriana Silva and opportunistic female ex-employee plaintiffs

You don’t need Gloria Allred to try and get your courtroom-generated fortune as a female ex-employee.

Silva was undone, like countless others, by her boastful social media presence. Photos showing her enjoying herself on holiday, including straddling a jet ski, unearthed how amazingly fraudulent her RSI allegations were. The narcissism and “me, me, me, me” factor of women like this warps their sense of proportion and reality, which makes it easier to spot their lies. But what happens when the woman in question is either more calculated or simply isn’t caught out by investigators handsomely paid for by a civil corporate defendant?

This is a dilemma shared by multiple legal contexts, such as false rape accusations, where convictions do not need anything close to classic “beyond reasonable doubt,” just “he said, she said.” And on the civil side of the law, so long as women can keep their testimony internally coherent and show their medical or emotional “symptoms” somewhat consistently, their cases have a good probability of, at a minimum, an overly generous financial settlement. They can aim for the stratosphere to begin with, demanding millions or tens of millions, and then begrudgingly accept amounts that still equate to years of guaranteed “income.”

Ironically, these manipulative individuals completely appropriate the facade of the infantilized, vulnerable female. Switching between the extremes, assertive, money-hungry plaintiff versus victimized lamb, is not so much a special art anymore because so many women have utilized it.

Hanna Bouveng and Doriana Silva are merely contemporary examples of it. Much of the time, civil defendants have behaved incorrectly (in Silva’s case, however, there is no convincing evidence that Avid Life Media wronged her, only its customers). Yet even unfair behavior towards a plaintiff does not legitimize preposterous outcomes like multimillion-dollar payouts, which can dwarf the financial verdicts provided to people paralyzed because of unmitigated malice or tragic negligence.

The less covered story is still worth pursuing

"I want THIS much, daddy!"

Enough media commentators and "experts" will be pillorying Ashley Madison and its executives for months to come. Users were clearly deceived about what was going on with both the website and their personal information. Nevertheless, this does not excuse the depravity of a Doriana Silva. Women of her caliber are a growing trend in society, steadily taught by feminism, despite not often "being" feminists themselves, that a perceived slight should be met with total vengeance and force a lifetime's worth of "apologies," typically made out of dollar signs.

The next time you hear about an astronomical lawsuit by a young woman complaining about "sexual harassment" or a "medical condition," check to see if she's walking. If so, it's a very good wager that the claims are probably fabricated or grossly exaggerated.

Read More: Female Intern Awarded $18 Million Because Her Boss Asked For Sex And Wrote Mean Things On The Internet

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Things I Learned From Being A Marxist

September 12, 2015 | by Wes Molinari | Link | Original Link

A specter was haunting the dorm halls: the specter of Marxism. And like many other college kids, it haunted me for my entire college career.

Thankfully, I have since been exorcised of the red spirit, and now can only look with shame at the cringe-inducing beliefs and attitudes I once held. It was like I was a different person back then.

Despite this embarrassment however, I did gain some valuable insight during my dance with the dialectic. For starters, I experienced what it was like to live inside the mind of a Leftist (cue shuddering), in all of its divisive, dogmatic, and excuse-making stupor.

Scary, yes. But also educational.

It allowed me to peer not only into myself, but also into the general psychological state of unfulfilled and frustrated men. It allowed me to witness firsthand why I and others could be so susceptible to a mass movement like Marxism.

I am still sometimes haunted by the ghosts (or specters) of communist past, but like Scrooge's encounter with phantoms, they also taught me some unforgettable lessons:

1. Mass Movements Make You Lazy

I honestly wasn't lazy before I was drawn under the red banner. After I entered the fold however, I started basing my self-esteem not on my personal accomplishments, as many psychologists suggest we should, but rather on identification with a belief.

Instead of going out and taking risks to achieve concrete goals (e.g. making money, getting laid, writing, working out, etc.), I got my daily dose of endorphins by raising my fist in solidarity with my ideological comrades. It was nice to be all snug in my dorm room draped in a swarm of socialist paperbacks, and having a great sense of self-worth because I could do something like debunk Trotsky's reactionary views on internationalism. I was happy because I was "right."

After all, it was much easier to raise a fist in front of a protest sign than it was to raise a barbell at a gym.

Losing myself in a larger egalitarian identity, like the Working Class, helped mask my lack of accomplishments and confidence. My "achievements" as a Marxist amounted to possessing an impressive bookshelf of revolutionary literature and having my name on a party's membership roster. I was able to shift the personal burden of ambition onto the collective.

As the witty and biting Eric Hoffer pointed out in The True Believer, "We join a mass movement to escape individual responsibility." We do it with "a passion for anonymity: to be one thread of the many which make up a tunic; one thread not distinguishable from the others. No one can then point us out, measure us against others and expose our inferiority" (31-33).

By losing myself in the masses I soothed myself and became lazy. The masses became the opiate of the masses.

2. Most Ideologies Make You Resentful

In an all-encompassing worldview like Marxism, everything in life can be explained by its doctrine. For me, the doctrine was the class struggle dialectic.

Didn’t have money? It was because of the exploitative wealthy. Didn’t have confidence? It was because of my monotonous and soul-crushing Working Class upbringing. Received a low grade in school? It was because my boss made me work the day before the test.

Nothing could ever be my fault or responsibility. The capitalists were the main culprits behind everything. And yes I mean everything.

(During the winter, I even implicated the plutocrats in ruining my day with snow. They were behind climate change after all.)

I couldn’t look at anything without my Das Kapital goggles. No matter where I turned I always saw the iron-fisted, suited-and-booted billionaire screwing me over. The rich were my enemy, and their overthrow became the focus of my life.

It made me concentrate on destroying my oppressors instead of improving myself. And it felt so good. Fantasizing about crushing the capitalist menace gave me a rush, and it felt even better when I got to shout at CEOs during protests. It was the same guilty pleasure I had experienced in high school when I saw the girlfriend-stealing jock accidentally drop his books all over the floor.

But seeing a high school alpha embarrass himself didn’t get me laid. And flinging epithets at corporate titans didn’t make me rich.

I was too busy trying to pull down my enemy instead of trying to lift up myself. All my energy and focus went towards destruction of others rather than construction of self. Or, to paraphrase a Chinese proverb, I was cutting my foot to fit the shoe, when I should have been going out and earning enough to buy a bigger shoe.

3. Too Much Politics Keeps You From Enjoying Life

A political faith charms and distracts through two primary ways: duty and guilt. As a disciple of the infamous bearded economist, I was a victim of both.

Being born in the First World, I came prepackaged with tremendous privilege, as well as an accompanying obligation to feel guilty about said privilege. My Marxism magnified this guilt, to the point where it was even more conscience-searing than Original Sin. And this is coming from someone who went to Catholic school from K-12.

How could I enjoy my morning coffee while the global majority lived in squalor? How could I go on a laughter-filled bar crawl through Manhattan with my best friends when I could be building revolution instead? Indeed, how could I even buy my clothing and shoes when they were manufactured by sleepless child laborers in Bangladesh?

It was my duty to liberate the proletariat. But I was shirking my duty by having fun.

Not even time with my family was exempt from the fog of guilt. Some people don't even have families, so it would be the grossest act of elitism to relish in my privilege. How dare I waste time with such a bourgeois construct.

And then there were all the downtrodden I was completely unaware of. I constantly read the news to make sure I knew about everyone who was oppressed, so that I could sour my soul and make sure I wasn't too happy. If I was enjoying life too much, it was a sign that I was abandoning my revolutionary obligation.

It was my duty to feel guilty. Life became part of the background. It became something I simply went through, not something I enjoyed. Family and friends, memories and moments; they were all part of the background.

Such a penitential and life-denying mode of existence is no way to live. I concur with Emerson: "I do not wish to expiate, but to live."

The Takeaway

This trip down Leftist lane doesn't vindicate conservatives. All worldviews have their enabling, resentful, and life-denying aspects. Don't let them get the best of you.

You can still become lazy by losing yourself in a larger identity, whether the identity is the Working Class, the church, the white race, MGTOW, or the feminist sisterhood.

And no one is exempt from having his ideology blind him to the beauties of life, be he Leninist or Libertarian. Do not let an abstract political cobweb bind you on your pilgrimage through life. If I accomplished anything in my socialist days, it was learning this simple lesson.

And I didn't accomplish much during those days, so that's saying something.

Read More: Millennials Exemplify The Age Of All Equal, All Useless

Wes Molinari
Wes Molinari is a self-loathing millennial schoolteacher living in the Northeast. He enjoys watching the downfall of Western Civilization as he sits in his lawn chair drinking Blue Moon and reading Camus.

Why Christianity Is Not An Enemy Of Neomasculinity

September 12, 2015 | by Brian McGonagall | Link | Original Link

"[Religion] is the opium of the people" – Karl Marx boldly declared this, as he set about creating what he perceived to be a new and better utopia. Even though Communism as an idea is nowadays morally spent, it is easy to see that its equally dangerous cousin, Socialism, lives on and has never been better.

The two share the ugly trait of militant atheism – not only aggressively discarding religion as the sum of all evils but also attempting to stamp it out in a blind rage. If a modern SJW is probed as to why his hatred of religion is so unwavering, he will more than likely fail to provide a reasonable explanation, preferring instead to hurl tired old Marxist buzzwords such as "Christian oppression."

This is to be expected. What worries me, however, is that good, intelligent men are often infected with the same virus, failing to comprehend its Marxist roots. They claim that Christianity is a religion of the weak, that it caters to people who want to lead a sheltered life, that it stifles free thought.

After the evisceration of much of organized Christianity at the hands of Marxists and their allies since the 1960s, it is easy to fall for the trap of identifying with such leftist claptrap and claim that the proof is in the proverbial pudding. In the following piece I wish to present the argument to the contrary – Christianity is a red pill religion if its precepts are abided by.

Christianity condemns laziness and encourages self improvement

St. Paul puts the matter simply: "if any would not work, neither should he eat" (2 Thessalonians 3:10.) On many levels this seems perfectly natural, but it is a truth which has unfortunately been lost on many people today. We see this affliction especially in the modern teenager (the author of this article was very much guilty himself). They laze around, looking at their phones or tablets, flicking through endless channels of mind numbing crap. There is no spark in their eyes, as if their soul was sick.

This is exactly how sloth (laziness) was viewed in early Christianity, as a sickness of the soul. Christian scholars differentiated between different types of sloth but were certain on one aspect: it is hugely damaging to the overall human being. We only get one chance at this life and it is a crime to waste it on doing nothing. Sloth breeds more sloth.

On the other hand, Christians are called to develop their strengths and create through their God-given talents. The Parable of the Minas (25 Matthew 14-30) is clear on this issue. The servants who took risks and used the money their master gave them were duly rewarded and praised. The servant who buried his talent was condemned.

However, by their fruits ye shall know them. With an emphasis on viciously stamping out sloth and contributing one's very best efforts, is it a wonder that Christianity spread like wildfire and was the cornerstone of the great Western civilization?

Christianity promotes learning

The Bible tells us to seek the truth because the truth "shall make you free" (John 8:13). Despite the left wing media's incessant drumming of the terrible Inquisition suppressing any form of free thought or the suffocating effects of Puritanism on the Protestant world, I wish to present a different picture. For centuries, Christian scholars were at the forefront of science and learning, vigorous in their task of inspecting God's handiwork.

Few remember that it was the Catholic Church of the Middle Ages which created the foundations of a higher education system, setting in motion the events which would vindicate the West as an undisputed world hegemon. It was under the patronage of the Church in medieval universities such as the one in Bologna, Italy that ideas were exchanged, priceless manuscripts compiled and civilization so laboriously built. Later, the Jesuit colleges across the world educated the brightest minds for many centuries with a curriculum famous for its breadth and academic vigor.

Even fewer remember that much of the knowledge we posses today actually comes through the efforts of Christian clergymen. In his book How the Catholic Church Built Western Civilization, Thomas E Woods mentions examples such as Nicolas Steno, a Catholic priest thought by many as the Father of Geology, Fr Athanasius Kircher famous for his work in the area of Egyptology and Fr Giambattista Riccoli, a renowned astronomer and physician. With the mantra of "seeks and ye shall find," Christianity has facilitated learning and education on a previously unprecedented scale.

Christianity promotes strength and sacrifice

What leaders used to be like.

Let's cut straight to the chase on this one. This aspect of Christianity is best illustrated when the ethos of pre – "enlightenment" Europe is considered, before everyone started receiving illusory "rights of man" from their government with no responsibilities added.

Take the Crusades. "But these evil Europeans went over to the Middle East to rape, pillage and conquer peace loving people of different faiths" – immediately exclaims the chump who has been drinking the PC cool aid all his life. Not quite. True, the Crusades did have their negative aspects (such as the unwarranted detour to Byzantium during the Fourth Crusade) but I am referring to the overall picture.

Thousands of men, rich and poor, dropped everything to fight and die for an idea – to regain the Holy Sepulcher for Christendom and help their eastern brothers who were being crushed under what seemed like an invincible tide of Islam.

Many nobles sold everything they had to buy weapons, armor, and supplies for the journey. Thousands of peasants left their villages and families to follow them. Most knew they would never come back to their homeland, yet still chose to go.

Look at the mentality of the leaders who took part. Fredrick Barbarossa of Germany was one of the most powerful people in Europe at the time. He did not have to go anywhere, he had it all. Barbarossa died as many did on the perilous journey, drowning in an attempt to cross a river on the way to the Holy Land.

Richard the Lionheart, King of England, spent three years under the walls of Acre waiting to starve the defending Saracens into submission. Three years! He was reported to personally lead assaults on the walls, scaling the siege ladders with his men under a hail of arrows. I realize that we live in different times, but leaders of such fortitude and courage are sorely missed today.

These men embodied the very ethos of Christianity. Their attitude was uncompromising – they did not try to make excuses but gave their best efforts to whatever was required of them, not afraid to pay the ultimate price.

Christianity de-pedestalizes women and encourages positive gender relations

Most people notice that something is amiss in modern gender relations. Women are often valued over and above men and unduly pedestalized. At the same time, male traits such as aggressiveness, competition, and dominance are encouraged over traditional feminine traits such as gentleness and humility in same women. Go figure. The results of this erratic social engineering have already been discussed ad nauseam.

The Christian Bible has a few interesting things to say about gender relations, going back to the Garden of Eden. Eve was created as a "helpmate" for Adam, not some kind of "soulmate" or "better half." Their union was then blessed by God, creating the first marriage.

It is clear that the Bible did not envisage women to rule over their men. One of the Biblical punishments of an unruly and unfaithful people in the Old Testament was allowing the women and children to do just that:

> As for my people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them. O my people, they which lead thee cause thee to err, and destroy the way of thy paths." (Isaiah 3:12)

I am sure this is not a popular verse amongst the politically correct. However the same motif is repeated later on by St Paul, who tells the early Christians: "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to use authority over the man: but to be in silence." (1 Timothy 2:12) Therefore, it is the man's job to be the leader, both in the Church and in the household.

At the same time this should by no means be interpreted as a license to be a tyrant. Women are not expected to be men's slaves, walk whatever amount of paces behind men, or generally be bullied. In fact, men are called to love their wives as Christ loves the Church. This is a sacrificing love, which is pure, unwavering, and understanding. Women are not there to be used and abused.

If what is described above is not a model for healthy gender relations, than I really don't know what is.

Conclusion

It is impossible not to notice that Christianity is under ferocious attack in the Western world. Its rites are mocked. Its precepts are attacked as oppressive. Its heritage is presented as an everlasting shame to mankind.

Let me remind you that this was also the case in the Soviet Union and anywhere else Communism reared its ugly head. As cultural Marxism is slowly but surely building its layer in the Occident, its communistic roots are at once discernible through the preponderance of militant atheism. It is important to know one's enemy so that he is not able to deceive.

Perhaps it is worth stopping for a moment and asking the simple, but tremendously important question: why is Christianity viewed with such hostility by our increasingly socialist governments and media? Does it hold a valid message which could inspire and uplift the men of today? Is it a threat to the ruling kleptocracy? Does it present an alternative to the mentality of servility our overlords are so keen for us to adopt?

Read More: How I Tried To Turn A Ho Into A Housewife

Brian McGonagall
Brian lives in Ireland. In his spare time he likes to sit on a pot of gold at the end of a rainbow.

Are Men To Blame For Women's Mental Health Issues?

September 13, 2015 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Over at the Guardian, there is a curious article by Laura Bates entitled, "'There is an urgent need to update adult thinking to catch up with the reality of teenagers' lives.'"

The article essentially states that according to research and polling done by a 20-something woman named Emma Gees, adolescent girls are under witheringly intense pressure in their lives. This pressure in many ways is nothing new in a world dominated by Western images, Western schooling, and "sexual liberation," but the survey and article also blame feminist topics de jour at the moment: cat-calling and body-shaming.

Is there really pressure?

While it is indubitably true that women are under intense pressure to "look a certain way"—and this pressure mostly comes from other women—the article seems to connect this pressure to a "lack of understanding from older women and mothers." Huh. The same generation that invented all the concepts described in the article—sexual harassment, everyday sexism, and misogyny—also happens to be mostly oblivious to the effects of those concepts on their daughters. Why would this be?

The fact that this article pops up in the "Life & Style" section of the Guardian says a lot about how mothers view their daughters: accessories in life whose importance ranks up there with these super serious topics:

Enough with Heston Blumenthal's puffing puddings at the Fat Duck – I'd prefer a dog's dinner

Do you have to be middle-class to like rocket? (I think it's horrible)

Tim Dowling: why does August have to go on so long?

It is very easy to mock media that is directed towards women and mothers, as it assumes some very negative things about womankind. However, since we are talking about the fate of the next generation and not displeasure with calendars and pudding, it is telling that articles they should deem serious pop up in un-serious places.

This is a quote by the sage and wise 24-year-old Emma Gees who promulgated the survey relied on by the article:

> There are so many double standards, and girls are confused about what to do and how to behave, and they don't know where to turn for advice and help.

First blush: the free-for-all of sexual liberation and second-wave feminism has some clear-cut losers and those people are called children and teenagers.

Second blush: These "depressed" girls already know one thing with perfect clarity—their mothers are completely worthless and they learned this at a very early age.

> I think it should be part of the curriculum and people like teachers and frontline staff should have training to know how to talk to young people about these issues

You mean training on how to help a girl find her way into womanhood? On figuring out who she is? What her role in life should be? You mean generational tasks for mothers, aunts, grandmothers and the rest of the decaying "family unit?" These young girls are clearly in the "Identity v. Role Confusion" stage of their life, when firm guidance from mothers might be most crucial, not some indifferent government professionals.

> And in order for girls to be fully supported, that training, Gees believes, needs to include an understanding of societal double standards.

Ah, there is some real mother/daughter bonding in 2015—hoping the problem has a penis.

When elders make no demands of the young, the young cannot grow up. When the female elders of a generation are tap, tap, tapping away on their iPads reading preposterous articles about poodles, “dadcore” fashion, and how to take better selfies, it is no wonder that their charges have no direction in life.

When grown women are wasting their time wishing that sexism is the reason that their daughters are so depressed, so alienated from life, it is no wonder their daughters are so depressed—the daughters are alienated from their own family.

> In fact, it’s not about what they’ve done at all, but they don’t have the confidence to challenge it. What kind of a world is that?

The problem isn’t a deficit of confidence, it is that the next generation of women was given nothing to believe in.

Read More: A 3 Point Primer In Modern Female Privilege

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

All Swedes Will Be Forced To Fund Female Promiscuity

September 13, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The Swedish left-wing government will make contraceptives free of charge for young women. They see it as a “women’s health” issue, a way of preventing unwanted pregnancies. The good news is that it might actually lower the abortion rate in Sweden. The bad news is that it will further subsidize female promiscuity.

New budget under way

The chairperson of the Left Party, Jonas Sjöstedt, is happy about having some influence over the budget.

Soon the Swedish government will present its proposition for next year’s budget. This administration, consisting of the Social Democratic Party and the Green Party, does not have a majority in the parliament. To get the budget voted through, it therefore needs the support of the Left Party.

This means that the former (or, in some cases, current) communists of the Left Party have been in negotiations with the government, and they have gotten through several of their demands.

Funding "women's health"

Under the headline "Important investments in women's health", it was announced last week that contraceptives will be free for women under 21. This change is planned to take effect on January 1, 2017.

Now the Left Party is celebrating it as a victory for themselves and for equality. Together with other reforms, this will contribute to closing the health gap between different groups by increasing women's well being, they say. Both good things and bad things can come of making contraceptives free of charge. Here is a list of the most important pros and cons.

Pros

Fewer abortions

Even pro-choice people can agree that fewer unwanted pregnancies leading to fewer abortions is a good thing. They look at it as a women's health issue, meaning that to them getting pregnant is basically like getting the flu.

In Sweden, women can get an abortion with no questions asked up to the nineteenth week. After that, to get it they need a special permit. Over 36,600 abortions were done in 2014, about the same amount as in earlier years.

Around 35,000 children are being killed on a yearly basis in Sweden alone. That's a big deal, and something needs to be done about it.

In Norrbotten County, they have already tried giving young women under the age of 26 free contraceptives. It resulted in the number of abortions being cut in half, from 500 to 251. A great and surprising success.

Although there might have been other reasons for the sharp decrease in abortions, the experiment in Norrbotten shows that free birth control likely has positive effects on reducing unwanted pregnancies. Everyone can agree that that is a step forward.

Less spending

The Left Party calculates that free contraceptives will cost 27 million SEK per year (about 3.2 million USD). That means more money and more power will be handed over the leftist government.

But one can easily imagine that fewer abortions will cut costs in the long run. A pill is a lot cheaper than surgery. There's a lot of money to be saved by decreasing the number of unwanted pregnancies that have to be terminated.

A suggestion that might cut government spending is always worth consideration.

Increase in female promiscuity

The pill has been hailed by feminists as a key component in their struggle for women's liberation. It gives women the ability to postpone motherhood as long as they wish—and have sex as often and with as many men as they want.

If you're someone who comes to this site for tips on how to pick up women, you should be thankful that contraceptives exist. Birth control has always been around in some form, but modern methods such as the pill have made it a lot safer to have sex without taking any consequences for it.

If one night stands is your thing, free contraceptives should only help your chances of scoring.

Cons

Increase in female promiscuity

Sleeping around a lot with different men is not an attractive thing for a woman to do. Most guys want a woman that can keep her legs together until the right man shows up.

There is also research which suggests that a woman's promiscuity might effect her child, since female animals can incorporate sperm DNA from her previous sex partners. Roosh talks about this in a recent article, how "there are also genetic reasons not to start a family with a promiscuous woman: children you have with her may have their gene pool polluted by her random affairs and one-night stands."

Now, what kind of a man would want a child that literally has its mother's sluttiness encoded in its DNA?

Drop in birth rates

It's not like there's an overabundance of Swedish children around. People are living longer and fewer children are born.

Back in the year 1900, close to a quarter of Swedes were 10 years or younger, while less than 10 percent were 65 or older. Today, the percentage of people 65 and above has doubled, and the share of children has almost been cut in half.

We are looking at a future were relatively few young Swedes will have to provide for a large number of senior citizens, and that's a problem. Many have suggested that immigration will solve the issue.

Here's an idea: the Swedes themselves could give birth to more children and thereby secure the future care of their elders. It's how it's always worked, so why not continue doing it?

Handing out contraceptives for free will certainly not solve the problem of low birth rates in Sweden, and in the West as a whole. On the contrary, it will make the situation worse.

Forced funding of promiscuity

As a pro-life person you find yourself in a tough spot. Either a woman gets an abortion, or you give her contraceptives for free so that she doesn't get pregnant in the first place. The second option does sound better.

But it is certainly not a great option. It's like paying off the mafia so that they don't set your store on fire. Sure you're happy that your store is left intact, but you shouldn't need to bribe someone for that.

Women today are figuratively speaking holding their fetuses hostage, telling you that they will kill them if you don't hand over the cash. That's not how a good society should operate.

Giving away free birth control using tax money means everyone has to fund women's promiscuity. No one gets away, even if one finds it unconscionable. All are forced to negotiate with the terrorist women holding a gun to the head of their own child.

Unprotected life.

Conclusion

People don’t have a moral obligation to give other people stuff for free, including contraceptives. If women have fewer abortions that’s great, but not in this way.

It’s time to stop treating people like children, giving them all the things they can’t afford themselves. How about teaching them responsibility the hard way, by making them live with the consequences of their own actions?

If you’re a woman who don’t want children and can’t afford birth control, perhaps you should abstain from sex until one of those two things changes. Maybe that’s hate speech, maybe it’s misogynistic and oppressive towards women. Or maybe it’s just common sense.

Read More: Sweden Continues To Fund Bizarre And Inappropriate Sex Education For Young Children

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

3 Ways The Collapsing Family Unit Is Bankrupting Society

September 14, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

In line with the you-go-girl attitude of most of today's media, a message that is drummed into our heads year after year is that women entering the workplace is good for the economy. We are told that the world's most successful economies all have the highest rates of female participation in the workplace…conveniently ignoring the possibility that the world's richest countries simply have the most money to throw away on equality schemes.

While this is part of a larger issue, one economists could endlessly debate, let's fire off a salvo with three obvious areas where women's escape from the kitchen has cost us dearly.

1. Decreasing Household Size

The size of the average American household has shrunk from 3.33 in 1960 to 2.54 today. Doing the math, there are more than 26 million extra houses today than there otherwise would be. Urban sprawl and the skyrocketing cost of living are huge issues, but what no one in today's political scene wants to mention is that one of the main drivers is the disintegrating family unit.

From what information I can find, the average cost of simply running a house is in the vicinity of $1,500 a month – and that's before you eat, drive or wear clothes.

So that's nearly $500 billion extra Americans pay each year because of how much our families have shrunk. Rather than having two adults and three or four children living in a home, you might have a single divorced parent and one or two children rattling around inside a vast McMansion.

If you're a millennial out there wondering why houses cost so much, blame the millions of baby boomers who were evicted from their homes by their frustrated spouses and promptly squeezed you out of the market.

What has caused this shift? It would seem to be an unholy alliance that is depressingly common in the modern west, that between big corporations trying to maximize their profits, and left-wing ideologues unwilling to admit their grand social experiment is failing.

Corporations, of course, want people to consume as much as possible. The more useless junk they can peddle to the average person, the more comfortable their profit margins. it's extremely good business when a family splits and nearly all of its major assets have to be duplicated. Suddenly you can sell twice as many cars, fridges, washing machines, microwaves and other products.

Sharing in general seems anathema in the modern west. We see it as some 19th century Bolshevik crap. In what I think is one of the most egregious examples, why on Earth do 70% of all households own a lawnmower? Its something you get out and use for maybe half an hour once a month. If we were just the slightest bit more organized and willing to cooperate, we could easily share lawnmowers between every twenty or even fifty households.

Left-wing politicians however, are equally culpable. They are the ones who have demonized the family and local community alike, who have encouraged people to abandon personal responsibility in favor of state-sponsored babysitting. Everyone is speshell. You deserve your own lawn mower, your own house! God forbid anyone start prodding precious little snowflakes out of their comfort zones.

2. Soaring Childcare Costs

In the aftermath of WW2, 12% of mothers with pre-school aged children were in the workforce. Today that figure is over 65%. On what I'm sure is a completely unrelated note, in 1987 there were 260,000 childcare facilities in America, today there are nearly 800,000.

Every week, more than 11 million children in America and shipped off to daycare, an industry that now brings in revenues of tens of billions of dollars annually. This industry has created more than two million completely unnecessary (and moderately shitty) jobs.

In an expensive state like New York, full-time care for an infant in a daycare center can cost you over $15,000. For working married couples this is often more than 15% of their income, and for single mothers more than 65%.

We have raised a generation of mothers who, rather than staying at home and providing their children with the loving care no one else could equal, have instead decided to go work in a meaningless, 40-hour-a-week desk job. They then have to spend a significant chunk of that income to pay a complete stranger to babysit their kids for them.

Again, this shift has been driven by the usual culprits. Childcare jobs may not pay particularly well, but in today's economy anything will go, and criticizing single mothers for irresponsible behavior is, of course, intolerable to the left. Abandoned your husband, squirreled away the kids, then found yourself unable to afford the cost of raising them? Better shower them with a bit more welfare, paid for by working couples whose marriages didn't implode.

A further element to this, though even harder to quantify, are the added medical costs of birthing a generation of children to much older mothers. In 1970 the average new mother was aged 21, today they are at least 26.

Delaying childbirth beyond your early twenties leads to increased risk your offspring will suffer from a long list of diseases, including diabetes, dementia, blindness, heart disease, sclerosis and other genetic conditions. A few of the more severe examples, like Down Syndrome, can be intercepted by the growing abortion industry, but most will surely fly under the radar in the womb and be revealed later in life.

While there are surely other causes, if you've ever wondered why we seem to be raising a generation of autistic, asthmatic, allergy-suffering little monsters, older mothers is a big, big cause.

3. Increasing Costs Of Retirement

For a generation that struggles to think beyond the purchase of their next iPhone, retirement is an unimaginably distant prospect for a millennial. Unfortunately, decisions you make when you are young, certainly no later than your twenties, can greatly affect you in your old age.

In an era when stable marriages were the norm, couples would grow old prepared to care for their spouse when they grew too feeble to do it themselves. Failing that, younger relatives, particularly their children, could do the same.

Of course, this doesn't cover all costs related to retirement. Eventually, both members of a couple will grow too old or else one will already have died, requiring outside help. It is also not always practical for an elder relative to be taken in by their descendants. However, this situation was usually delayed for many years.

In the 21st century this is no longer the case. Much like childcare, nursing an elderly person is no longer the domain of family, but has been outsourced to strangers, ones who will hardly work for free. This makes aged care a booming industry – not just because there are more old people, but there are more alone old people.

In the US today, roughly 1.4 million people live in nursing homes at any given time. The cost annually per person is around $80,000, putting the overall cost at well over $100 billion a year. It is hard to put an exact number on it, but perhaps half of this cost would be unnecessary if the bonds of family had not been so utterly frayed over the last fifty years.

Most tragically of all, this is a problem that is only going to escalate as time goes on. Already at 50%, the divorce rate can't soar all that much higher, nor the portion of working mothers, but today's elderly grew up in a word where long-term marriages were the norm.

What happens when today's youth reach that stage? What happens when you have tens of millions of individuals, utterly disconnected from their families or their community, queuing up for wildly expensive nursing homes?

And will tomorrow's taxpayers, increasingly the children of recent immigrants to whom the white man is apparently an oppressor, be willing to fund their lavish retirement?

Of all the demographic time bombs set to go off in the coming decades, this one perhaps scares me the most. We have forgotten one of the oldest lessons of the traditional family – that no ones remains young and healthy forever. Generation Y almost seems to have bet on medical science curing the aging process before they get old, but what guarantee is there of that?

Ignoring that possibility, eventually you will grow old and feeble. Eventually you will have difficulty wiping your own ass, and will require someone to wipe it for you. Once you've cut ties with family, the only group who might have done this work for free, what choice is there but to hire others? And if you can't afford it out of pocket, who else will the financial burden fall upon?

In summary

Overall, the collapse of the family unit probably costs America the better part of a trillion dollars every year. Don’t expect anyone to own up to it however. Hell will freeze over before modern society begins holding women accountable for irrational, irresponsible spending.

Still, karma is a bitch. Someday, that blue-haired, nose-ringed feminist you knew in school will be an old lady sitting in a nursing home, with no husband to care for her and no children to visit her. After a lifetime of criticizing them, her fate will finally and irrevocably be in the hands of society’s hardworking taxpayers.

Frankly, I don’t think she deserves a cent.

Read More: Society Can’t Afford The Educated Woman

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Wolf: A Crime Drama Of Self-Destruction

September 14, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Edgar Allan Poe, in his short-story The Black Cat, describes the warped mind's overpowering impulse to violence. This lust, when activated, rages with a meaningless but luminous intensity. He says:

> One night, returning home, much intoxicated, from one of my haunts about town, I fancied that the cat avoided my presence. I seized him; when, in his fright at my violence, he inflicted a slight wound upon my hand with his teeth. The fury of a demon instantly possessed me. I knew myself no longer. My original soul seemed, at once, to take its flight from my body; and a more than fiendish malevolence, gin-nurtured, thrilled every fibre of my frame.

This "fiendish malevolence" is the feeling emanated by the main protagonist in Jim Taihuttu's 2013 crime drama, Wolf. To understand the film, we must understand this irrational "fiendish malevolence" Poe talks about. Wolf wonderfully chronicles the downward spiral of a thoroughly unlikeable character; we dislike him, yet we can't take our eyes off the screen.

Majid (Marwan Kenzari) is the son of Moroccan immigrants living in Utrecht. He is an ex-con working at a flower auction warehouse who cares little about his own life, and even less about the lives of others.

The film begins with a startling scene on the late-night streets of Utrecht that showcases Majid and his friends' predatory natures. He speaks amiably to a friend for a while, and then they make small talk with a couple drunk Dutchmen. And then, with little emotion and even less hesitation, they smash the glass of a storefront and steal a motorbike.

Majid's problem is that he is a violent sociopath. His parole officer futilely tries to interest him in his own future. His father begs him to get back on the right path. He has a younger brother who genuinely looks up to him. And it is all to no avail; Majid prefers to spend his days robbing ATMs and beating up other thugs. His one redeeming quality is that he is an incredibly talented kickboxer.

Even if he can't see it, we know his days are numbered.

I was drawn to this film because I know so little about the European criminal underworld. In the past couple decades, European gangster films have been racking up a very impressive track record.

Nicolas Refn's three Pusher films broke new ground in giving a stark portrayal of this world, with the Serbian character "Milo" representing immigrant organized crime in Copenhagen. Jacques Audiard's unforgettable film Un Prophete (2007) proved that a gangster drama with an Arab protagonist could add something new to the genre.

But it would be a mistake to see Wolf as some kind of commentary on Moroccan immigration. This is not a film about the Arab immigrant experience in The Netherlands. Majid speaks Dutch to his friends, and was born in Holland. Arabic is only heard at home.

This is a criminal character study, pure and simple; unlike Audiard's Un Prophete, there is no sympathy shown for the main character, nor is any attempt made to probe his motivations. In Wolf, we are simply given a ring-side seat to a man's pointless self-destruction.

In between petty crimes, Majid needs extra money to finance his cancerous brother's medical care. At a local kickboxing gym, we discover just how good of a fighter he is, and how brutal as well. He is steered to an association with a Turkish crime boss, who obviously seeks to exploit the violent and seething Majid. The crime boss, we discover, not only promotes fights, but also masterminds armed robberies.

What we are left with is the fascinating spectacle of a brute who is unable to turn off his rages, unable to control himself, and unable to stop doing things against his own self-interest. Shot in black and white, in an apparent homage to Martin Scorcese's Raging Bull, the film is not without flaws.

The cast features many stereotyped but necessary characters. We have Majid's father (Abdelkrim Bahloul), who hates his son and can't believe God has cursed him with such criminal progeny. We have the suffering mother (Baya Belal) who can do little more than pray and hide in a corner. We have Majid's younger brother Tarik (Mohammed El Mimouni) who seems to be a good kid, and yet somehow doomed by association.

We have Majid's on-again, off-again girlfriend Tessa (Bo Maerten), who loves the drama and violence of being around thugs. We even have the angelic older brother Hamza (Nasrdin Dchar), who provides a welcome relief from the depravity shown on screen.

Despite some minor limitations in character development, Wolf is a compelling film, and very much worth seeing. Some critics have complained about the apparent clichés in the film, but these critics miss the point. The lives of criminals generally are already clichés.

There are usually no deep reasons why they do what they do, and those seeking such motives have read too many Charles Dickens novels. Inexplicable depravity is the order of the day. In the real world, criminality is only the unrestrained urge to satisfy the basest human desires. And this is something that Wolf does not flinch from portraying.

In short, this is a worthy addition to the catalogue of modern European crime dramas. Americans with little knowledge of the ethnic subcultures shown here can learn a great deal, as I did.

Some critics also found fault with the film's apparent lack of an ending. I didn't see it that way. There is an ending, and we all know what it is. The director, Jim Taihuttu, is wise enough to let us fill in the blanks on our own.

And if we've been paying attention, we know precisely what to fill in. Right down to the letter.

Read More: How I Avoided A False Domestic Abuse Charge

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Why Is Sex Change Surgery Good But Normal Plastic Surgery Is “Misogynistic”?

September 15, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

It’s okay to have a team of doctors carve someone out a pseudo-vagina, having removed their penis and testicles, but not okay to increase the volume or firmness of a woman’s breasts. Why? The former is apparently about “being your true self” and the latter is about “sexism against women and damaging expectations about their appearances.”

It is more than a little strange that surgery keeping a patient mostly the way they are (e.g. a breast enhancement or tummy tuck) is vilified, yet procedures that drastically and irrevocably alter someone’s genitalia, hormones, and other bodily functions is apt to be called bravery.

Most analogously with the issue of surgical “modification” (more like destruction) to “change” someone’s sex, so-called designer vaginas, where mostly straight women change the external appearance of their genitalia, have been attacked for being a patriarchal policing of women’s bodies. Despite challenging women to accept the current state of their vaginas as normal, I would imagine that none of these critics would urge those considering “sex change” surgery to accept their current bodies as normal.

The supreme irony is that the status quo now glorifies giving a man a “vagina” and “breasts” where he did not have them before but balks at a woman making what she sees as improvements to her existing genitalia or breasts. And what about women with children or those above 40, who are only seeking to recapture their past selves when they head to the operating table?

Conventional plastic surgery is based on something we already know

“Victim of the patriarchy” Ivanka Trump. Most women would prefer to have her post-plastic surgery body over her original one and most men would definitely favor the “augmented” Ivanka, too.

There is no doubt that most straight men are hardwired to appreciate large, firm and unwrinkled breasts and round, gravity-defying buttocks. And just as men desire for themselves the good musculature that most women find attractive in them, women would rather have the youthful qualities for their breasts and buttocks that men prefer. These complementary aspects of heterosexual bodily preferences are beyond contestation.

By contrast, on what basis can we justify sex change surgery? Psychologists may point to particular causal factors that explain someone’s continual dissociation from the gender they were born into (conveniently forgetting that almost every “sex change” candidate has no underlying chromosomal abnormalities).

Neuroscientists may take a different path and claim that a certain man or woman’s brain is either feminized or masculinised respectively (similar to how autism might be considered an example of a hyper-masculine mind).

Transgender people without “sex change” surgery should be miserable, but women with small breasts aren’t allowed to be?

So Bruce Jenner had a right to be devastated about his body before his “sex change” surgery but a woman who wants to have a fuller bust or ass just has to accept their present body?

I do not believe plastic surgery should be outlawed, but neither do I encourage it as a fix for everything. Flaws appear on human bodies almost every day and plastic surgery is a slippery slope that can easily spiral out of control. Moreover, Father Time will be ruthless with all of us in the end.

What I find especially condescending, though, is how SJWs believe they can tell a young woman with a non-existent or plain droopy butt that she should not be upset as they simultaneously exhort generally confused and isolated “women in men’s bodies” to take that final step and harvest their male genitalia with the medical equivalent of a hacksaw.

Cultural conditioning such as this has now flowed into the corporate world. Apple has been meticulous in banning the sale of “sexist” children’s apps about plastic surgery, ones it sold until being accosted by the SJW brigades. The emphasis is on politically-designing or regulating games aimed at children because, somehow, plastic surgery is super-sexist.

Yet in our society, before children have even entered puberty properly, they are being taught about people “changing” their sex without any fundamental explanation as to why it is permitted to happen.

You must challenge the SJW narrative and bring up the hypocrisy

Should she have been happy with her former self? Maybe. But this change is far more justifiable than “changing” your sex without your chromosomes being altered.

Details and specificity are anathema to SJW narratives. They focus on feel-good rationales of “being yourself”, “embracing tolerance,” and “ending the stigma.” A ten-year-old boy can’t sign a cell phone contract most of the time but he can, say the do-gooders, make an informed decision to craft himself a new vagina before he even knows his basic sexuality.

Like multiple electrical switches, SJWs seek to cut the flow of some ideas as they allow others, the ones they endorse, to circulate freely. Attacking radical leftist positions is an option you can consider, but better yet is the approach of showing through juxtaposition how very narrow their conception of tolerance and freedom of action is.

If SJWs truly believe in people being themselves, they should start applauding breast enhancement as much as they relish testicles falling off an operating table.

Read More: Progressives Use Ray Rice Scandal To Paint All Male Interests As Inherently Misogynistic

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Content Policies Are Another Symptom Of The Culture Wars

September 15, 2015 | by Adam Hobbes | Link | Original Link

> Submitting to censorship is to enter the seductive world of 'The Giver': the world where there are no bad words and no bad deeds. But it is also the world where choice has been taken away and reality distorted. And that is the most dangerous world of all. ~ Lois Lowry

The last few weeks have seen some interesting drama within a number of web communities with respect to their content policies. Reddit continues to quarantine and ban subreddits it considers offensive. Github is refining its 'Open Code of Conduct', which empowers the site to take down repositories with offensive content, including things like using the word 'retard'. Facebook has also long since banned hate speech, opting for a system that lets users flag offensive pages.

In almost every case, these policies are imbued with left-wing social justice politics. This is because there has been a sea change in Western culture on the issue of free speech, particularly among young people. The same teenagers that once lionized South Park and Howard Stern for constantly pushing the envelope have come to embrace thought policing.

Politically this generation has embraced the progressive campaign to reform social values. What we are seeing is a strategic shift where now this campaign is being waged coercively via laws, policies, and organized ideological bullying.

The Left Plants Its Flag

Literally I can't even

The interesting thing about this paradigm shift is what it implies about the progressive left's sense of just how strong their hold on the culture is. Fifty years ago no progressive would even think of supporting things like speech codes or "offensive" content restrictions. From the Beatniks of the 50's to the radicals of the 60's, the young progressives of those eras stridently defended free speech at all levels.

Back then it would have been progressives that were targeted by Christians, conservative whites, and traditionalists for supporting things like school integration, gay rights, and women's lib. They needed society to be tolerant of minority viewpoints in order to get traction. Now they believe no such tolerance is necessary. Minority, "extreme" points of view are not only to be condemned, they are not to be heard at all.

This shift in progressive ideology constitutes a major milestone – a declaration of victory even. They have won the argument on gay marriage, white privilege, feminism, and transgenderism. They have a powerful stranglehold on the public schools, universities, news media, and Hollywood.

No one can honestly think of the cultural left as being anti-establishment now; they have become the establishment. Tolerating open debate and dissent can only hurt them.

Reddit and Github practice censorship. To argue that it is not censorship because it is not the government doing it is to concoct a straw man. Free speech is not just about the 1st Amendment. The same people who link to the above XKCD comic would not have this attitude about women's rights activists being attacked in India, or gay marriage supporters having their blogs deleted in Russia.

They would not say, "Tough! Free speech doesn't shield you from consequences. It's YOUR fault for being an asshole!"

They would instead condemn the censorious practices of Russia and India regardless of whether they were carried out by private individuals or the government. This hypocrisy is what disgusts me about the social justice left. They are the most passionate defenders of free speech when it is something they happen to support. Everyone else: Too bad, shitlord!

There Are Too Many Examples

Take the recent case of Mozilla promising to fire an employee for disliking feminists. The comments on the article are instructive. There are people defending Mozilla on the grounds that an anonymous comment "does harm" to Mozilla's business, and it is therefore appropriate for Mozilla to undo the harm by firing the employee.

Other comments talk about how the anonymous employee must be "privileged," and will find a new job soon enough anyway. How would these leftists react to a gay teacher being fired by a Catholic school?

Well we don't have to wonder since it has happened recently. Surprise surprise, they are all critical of the school. None of them defend the school's "right" to protect its brand from the damage an openly gay teacher would cause. I would argue that the school is far more justified because in that case there is an explicit contract that requires staff to endorse Catholic dogma. But alas, this is what the left has deteriorated to—identity politics and doublethink.

In the 1950's, if the New York Times refused to publish an editorial because it argued in favor of school integration, we would not hesitate to call it censorship. In the 1960's, if a woman arguing in favor of birth control was denied a right to speak at a town hall, we would not hesitate to call it censorship.

In the 1970's, if a company fired a man because they discovered he wrote an essay in favor of multiculturalism, we would not hesitate to call it censorship. In the 1980's, if a man were forced to close his bakery because he received constant death threats and crowds picketing his shop because he hung a rainbow flag outside his door, we would not hesitate to call it censorship.

Public Vs. Private Censorship

Harold contemplates our bleak future.

Government censorship is vastly preferable to the examples above because it is so much simpler to identify and rally against; neocons, feminists, Muslims, and libertarians alike all condemn China's internet restrictions on its own people. When we normalize a voluntary, privately administered culture of punishing people for their opinions, we are up against a far more insidious form of censorship.

The goal is always the same – intimidation. Scare people into not questioning something too publicly. We should not embrace this sort of mob mentality. We should strive to be a society that tolerates all points of view without necessarily agreeing with them. We must stand for the maxim, "I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

We need not always be exposed to viewpoints we find abhorrent. There is nothing wrong with communities tailored to a specific culture or viewpoint. Echo-chambers are not immoral. It is fine if feminists, white supremacists, or Doctor Who fans want a space where they can commiserate free from critics and trolls. New ideologies and counter-cultures need such spaces (Return of Kings included), and there are plenty of forums, subreddits, blogs, and image boards that serve this purpose well.

However sites need to be upfront about this. Users cannot be expected to entrust their content to a site with a "case-by-case" TOS (That's the head of Gitlab embracing ideological censorship. For the coders out there, I recommend self-hosting your code – don't give guys like this a penny).

If you are going to rely on user-submitted content, you need to let users know whether you endorse free speech or not. If not, be clear about your agenda so that users do not waste their time building up communities that practice censorship. Unfortunately what tends to happen is that as websites become more popular and start worrying about monetization, they begin to embrace censorship as a “necessary evil.”

Large, successful web communities like Reddit and Github all started out being content agnostic. Tacitly they supported free speech, implicitly sending the message that people ought to just avoid content they find offensive on their own while only blocking illegal content (child pornography, spam, harassment, etc.).

Then both sites went through growing pains. Reddit had its row with /r/jailbait and Github had its feminist drama with its CEO and meritocracy motto. Both situations were an opportunity for each company to hold to its standards and fight for a principle. Both failed, mostly out of fear of bad PR.

The truly sad thing is that their fear was not unfounded. Github and Reddit (as well as Facebook, Google, and others at different times) all got beat up in the press for the issues mentioned above. We cannot be shocked by private corporations prioritizing their brand and bottom line above principle.

In the same way, we cannot be shocked when an employee keeps his opinions to himself when the rest of the company celebrates Obama’s re-election or the Supreme Court ruling on gay marriage.

Looking In The Mirror

The fundamental question is: When is it appropriate to punish others for their opinions? Is it right to organize a boycott of a local bar because the owner is a neo-Nazi? I would argue no, but I understand that mine is the extreme position. I would have no problem drinking at a bar run by a Nazi so long as the drinks and environment were enjoyable, and I say that as a black guy. I think boycotting should be reserved for cases where companies cause real harm, not for speech.

I will eat at Chick-Fil-A regardless of the CEO's opinion on gay marriage. I will continue to use Firefox no matter how leftist Mozilla becomes. If Mozilla does actually fire someone for holding an opinion they don't like, I will go out of my way to avoid giving them money.

It's also fine to vote with your wallet with respect to entertainment. You're not obligated to pay Hollywood to lecture you about the evils of American culture and how great feminism is. Refusing to give your money to producers of trashy media is not censorship—it's capitalism, in the same way that you aren't "punishing" a lousy restaurant by not eating there.

Most people unfortunately feel that it is perfectly fine to make people suffer for speaking their minds. In the right setting, you can get away with expressing opinion X. In the wrong setting, expressing opinion X can cause you to lose everything. People must accordingly choose wear they live, where they work, who they associate with, and what websites they frequent.

Right now the progressive social justice mob happens to be the loudest and most deeply supported by society's institutions. They are succeeding by blurring the line between speech and actions, asserting that politically incorrect speech is somehow "coercive" and harmful. "Trigger warnings" are derived from this idea and are popular in colleges that seek to protect students from scary ideas and disagreement.

Make no mistake: If we do not fight back, we will see a shift from privately enforced to government enforced censorship. Already we see some of it in England and Canada, where people can be prosecuted for arguing on Twitter. The social justice left most assuredly intends to make it a crime to disagree with their narrative on social and political issues.

Once that day comes, there will be no peaceful way to get back the values we have lost.

Read More: Cultural Collapse Theory: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

Adam Hobbes

5 Testosterone Tips To Attract Women And Pump Up Your Sex Life

September 15, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Six Pack Shortcuts

Hey man, it's Clark Shao. Most people recognize me as the #1 trainer on YouTube. And with over 3.5 million subscribers, you may have even watched one of my videos and tried one of our intense workouts on our Six Pack Shortcuts Channel.

Now what you may not know is that I personally train a small group of men in my local area at home. And these guys are seriously dedicated… from eating the perfect diet to never missing a workout.

However, there was a major problem that 6 out of these 8 men were facing… These guys weren't getting the same results as my other clients even though they trained just as hard.

And what I discovered, with the help of a doctor friend of mine, was that these men were suffering from low testosterone.

Now I'm sure you've heard of testosterone… but what does it really do? Well, testosterone is the main male hormone, and the exact hormone that makes us men. And the more of it you have, the faster you can get ripped and muscular.

And one more thing… more testosterone equals more sex. Pheromone research actually shows that women are genetically attracted to men with high testosterone levels. And of course they always like a guy in great shape, which comes from testosterone too.

So, if you don't have the body you want or you have a bit of belly fat that you just can't seem to lose… low test can be the reason why. Now don't worry, you won't have to see a doctor to fix this… because I have 5 simple things that you can do today to boost your test levels immediately.

So it's vital that you read this and follow these steps… because if you don't… this can happen to you if your low test gets worse:

- Fatigue and Lack of Energy
- Early Hair Loss
- Low Sex Drive
- Low Semen Volume
- Loss of Muscle Mass
- Increase in Body Fat
- Mood Swings (like a woman)
- No Desire For Sex

Now I wrote this article to stress to you how powerful this hormone is and to tell you specifically how you can get more of it today… because research has shown that women want it… so man, we've got to have a lot of it, right?

For starters, like I stated above, it's the main driving force behind your sexual urges. And testosterone helps build a man's muscles, deepens his voice, and boosts the size of your male parts. It's also what keeps a man's muscles and bones strong… so in short, it's what makes a man a man.

So the worst part about talking to my clients who had low T was that most of them didn't even know that they could suffer from that at such a young age… most of them are in their 30's! I mean, isn't that something that happens to guys in their 70's. Apparently not.

Because in doing my testosterone research I found that doctors were all saying the same thing. Dr. Edmund Sabanegh of the Cleveland Clinic, for example, said that "After age 30, testosterone levels dip about 1 percent each year. As internal stores of that hormone decline, men can experience a loss of muscle mass and strength, depression, lethargy and a waning interest in sex."

So let's get right to it. Here are the 5 ways to attract women and pump up your sex life:

5. Eat Fat, Boost Your Test

Often thought of as the ultimate "physique destroyer" when it comes to getting in shape, dietary fat is actually one of the most critical players when it comes to optimizing natural testosterone production.

Long gone are the days in which we associate fat with heart disease and elevated cholesterol levels; it's now recognized as a sure way to increase testosterone levels. In fact, a study published in the "Journal of Applied Physiology" found that diets with higher amounts of monounsaturated and saturated fats have been shown to increase testosterone levels.

And in another study, men who switched from a high-fat diet (13 percent saturated fat) to a low-fat diet (5 percent saturated fat) experienced significantly lower testosterone production rates, and lower circulating androgen levels.

“Keep in mind that when it comes to dietary fat, it’s not just the amount of fat you eat, but also the type of fat,” says Don Gauvreau, MSc, co-founder PharmaFreak.

So what I recommend is adding foods such as avocados, raw coconut and whole eggs (not just the egg whites!) to your daily diet.

4. Consume The Right Vitamins And Minerals

B	Acne	↓	★☆☆ Minor	4 studies	Orally supplemented zinc (in the dosage range of 30-130mg elemental zinc) appears to be effective in reducing symptoms of acne, although the effects are modest at best.
B	Testosterone	↑	★☆☆ Minor	5 studies	Both chronic/excessive exercise as well as a zinc deficiency are associated with abnormally low testosterone concentrations, and in these states supplementation of zinc increases testosterone. There is no inherent increase in testosterone with zinc if either of those two conditions are not met
B	LDL-C	↓	★☆☆ Minor	3 studies	A decrease in LDL cholesterol may occur when a zinc deficiency in obese persons is being normalized.

You may not realize this, but the biggest factor controlling your hormones is what you choose to put in your body. So it could be a total game changer if you know what vitamins and minerals boosts your natural levels of testosterone and which foods have them.

Here are some examples of what has worked best for me:

- Shrimp: Casting your net for seafood like shrimp is a surefire way to boost your level of vitamin D, which has a strong link to the big T. Researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health in Boston found that men with higher levels of vitamin D also had higher levels of testosterone.

- Pumpkin seeds: Great source of zinc, a mineral that plays a role in thousands of different enzymatic reactions in the body, including those involved in testosterone production. It’s no major surprise, then, that a study published in “Nutrition” found that men with inadequate zinc intake had lower testosterone concentrations.

- Strawberries: A leading source of vitamin C, higher intakes of this potent antioxidant have been associated with lowering cortisol levels in response to hardcore workouts. Cortisol is a catabolic hormone released by the adrenal glands in response to stressful situations, including intense exercise. Unfortunately, cortisol competes with testosterone, so high levels can crowd out testosterone, thereby reducing its anabolic benefits.

3. Get Hormone Boosting Sleep

Sounds simple enough, but this is where a lot of guys fall short because did you know that your testosterone levels are directly related to your sleep patterns? It's been reported that men who get a full 7-8 hours of sleep had double the testosterone than guys who slept less.

Your test levels peak in the morning and slowly plummet towards the evening…

…And when you're in the deepest stages of your sleep, the endocrine system comes to life. Your brain starts sending signals down to your balls, telling them to produce massive amounts of testosterone, preparing you for the day ahead. So go to bed on time, man.

2. Squat

Now, I know that leg day is sometimes a day that is dreaded all week long. But squats can actually induce muscle growth all over your body.

Squats are also credited for increasing testosterone levels. However, to get this hormonal boost, you need to perform the exercise at the appropriate intensity.

You see, high-volume resistance training of moderate-to-high-intensity with short rest intervals stimulates greater hormonal response than high-intensity low-volume resistance training with long rest intervals. For example, after a warm-up with a light weight for 10 to 12 reps, do 10 sets of five reps each of barbell squats. Use 70 percent of your one-rep maximum, and a two-minute rest between sets. A study at the University of Kansas, Washington University, St. Louis, reported in the July 2010 issue of, “Fiziol Cheloveka,” found that volunteers using a similar exercise protocol showed a significant increase in testosterone levels.

1. Use A Test Booster That Boosts Your Testosterone And Blocks Estrogen (what I do)

Naturally boosting your testosterone with a proven test booster is the fastest and most efficient way to safely get your test levels to highest point possible.

However, you can’t just buy any regular test booster that you find on the shelves at your local grocery store. Because, if you didn’t know, most of these cheaply-made and mass-produced boosters can cause more harm than good if you’re a man trying to lose fat and build muscle.

Back when I was first doing my research I discovered that the biggest problem with test boosters is that they don’t block the feminizing hormone that could completely undo all of your hard work. You see, your body will always try to maintain a balance… so if your test levels increase your body will automatically increase your levels of estrogen too. And it does this because your body thinks it needs the estrogen and doesn't realize that you're trying to get a ripped body.

So what do you do if you need to up your test but don't want the negative feminizing side effects of estrogen?

Well luckily, modern science has given us a safe and even more effective way of doing this without having to force down pounds of certain foods or having to spend hours in the gym everyday. Nope. My team and I have discovered a mix of all natural herbs that promote a boost in your natural occurring testosterone while also blocking any unwanted estrogen that your body may be producing.

It's called Test Reload, and it's the first dual action test booster available… Not only will it help to signal your body to increase its own testosterone production, but it'll also block any of the estrogen, or "feminizing hormone," that could be ruining your gains and your life.

Unlike other test booster supplements, Test Reload was designed with your health in mind. This means that any estrogen caused side effects won't be an issue when you take it, and you won't have to go through any post cycle testosterone therapies to get your body normal after you're done.

I personally helped to formulate Test Reload so I could guarantee it's safety and effectiveness. This is the exact stuff that helped my clients to turn around their low test conditions. Test Reload helped to get them the shredded muscular body that they've always wanted easier than they ever thought possible.

So if you want to build muscle and get women to notice you fast, Click Here to learn how you can do it the exact same way they did.

You can also Enjoy This FREE Video.

– Clark

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Phenomenon Of White Women Who Only Date Black Men

September 16, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

You know who she is. The white girl with the big hoop earrings, the (fake) diamond stud in her nose, and the tattoo on her left tit of a phoenix, butterfly, or anything else that denotes “freedom” or whatever brand of profound bullshit they want you to believe about them.

Every few seconds her phone is ringing out two second snippets of the hip hop track du jour, alerting her of another text from one of a few black men she happens to be “talking to” at the moment.

A “mud shark” is loosely defined as a white girl who exclusively dates or fucks black men. It’s a phenomenon that goes back as far as any of us can remember. As a black man, I feel obligated to give you readers my insider’s perspective on this trend.

This is an interesting topic that has many layers so let’s jump right in and see if we can figure out why these women, who polarize our culture with their supposed taste in men, do what they do.

Low Self Esteem?

The go-to explanation most people seem to use when expounding on why Caucasian females prefer black men is low self esteem, and I'm inclined to agree with this on some level.

Any man, regardless of race, will admit that white men are at the top of the food chain in terms of sexual predilection among females the world over. The reasons for this are vast and can be the subject of volumes of columns, but the fact of the matter is that white dudes are pretty much every woman's type.

The low self esteem explanation fits with a lot of girls (not just white girls) because, as we all are aware of here in the 'sphere, the vast majority of women aren't worth the paper they're printed on and they know it. Sure, they can work out and look good, but at the end of the day most females these days know they're not worth much outside of the moist holes between their collective legs.

A lot of white females who gravitate toward only black men likely have self esteem issues on account of not being able to consolidate on, date for an extended period of time, or even have a one night stand with a white male. It could be their physical deficiencies (read: fat), it could be a lack of nurturing and encouragement from one or both parents during their childhood, or any combination of many different factors.

Whatever the reasons, the fact of the matter is that women who have low self esteem often swim to the darker side of the ocean to feel what every woman wants to feel: to be desired. And if white men aren't going to wife them up, date them, or even fuck them, they've got to fulfill this need to be sexually craved somehow and black males are often viewed as their only option.

Are white men not masculine enough?

[image]

About a year ago I wrote this article about my personal experience about the benefits and detriments of game for black men in the West. One of the points I touch is is the assumed "alpha advantage" black men seem to have over white men:

> While most white men in the Anglo world have to prove their sexual fitness to women (on the "alpha fucks" side of hypergamy) there's an unspoken sentiment that black men who are at or near the extreme poles of the financial hierarchy (wealthy and poor) are natural alphas…
>
> This assumption will push women to shit test as a function of confirmation as opposed to discovery or qualification. They will poke and prod a little to make sure you live up to the perceived reputation (to what degree depends largely on frame), but women tend to give black men the benefit of the doubt as far as congruency goes.

It’s no secret that today’s man is more effete than ever and are grossly lacking in even the most basic masculine qualities. But here’s the thing:

This problem doesn’t discriminate because men of all races and nationalities in this part of the world have been victimized by the effects of feminist culture.

No matter their color, every man has been neutered by the scalpel of feminism. But white men catch the most heat here in the states because A) white men are the majority so there are more to critique B) as stated before, white males are at the top of the sexual food chain which leads to C) consistent scrutiny as a natural bi-product of A and B.

What should come as no surprise to anyone here is that females are too stupid to open their eyes and realize that the percentages are all about the same across the board with regards to the alpha to beta ratio. Their hind brains are constantly saturated by the media, which routinely portrays most black men as static alphas and most white men as latent betas.

Combine that with the fact that most white women in this country have cushy office jobs and are surrounded by and exposed to beta schlubs (most of which are white men) on a daily basis, it’s no wonder most of them foolishly believe that to get their five minutes of alpha they need to spread ’em for brothers.

Experimentation?

We’ve all heard the term “once you go black you don’t go back” and you can bet your bottom dollar this is a phrase that permeates the circles of your garden variety pumpkin-spice-loving, reality-show-binging white chicks. The pull of the so-called “forbidden fruit” is too strong for some not to try at least once.

I read an article years ago written by a white woman who explained why she now exclusively dates black men. The post has since been removed but snippets of it can be found here. This chick was looking for a change after having been on a horrible date with a white guy whom she claimed had a red face, on account of him probably taking a Viagra before their date. That was apparently the straw that broke the camel's back.

She talked about black men's natural ability to flirt, their natural rhythm in bed, and their smooth skin which, to her, felt like "satin and velvet made flesh." After her first tryst she was hooked and that, in her mind, was all she needed to only surrender her flower exclusively to black guys.

This woman's experience is certainly not an exception as it happens all over this country every day. But in order to fulfill the other side of her dualistic sexual imperative, she knows deep down that banging brothers isn't going to be a long term excursion if she wants her slice of "Americana."

[image]

That said, it certainly doesn't stop Caucasian women from crossing over to the dark side to feel the excitement that comes with pursuing sexual encounters with black men, if even for just a little while.

Rebellion and attention?

Rebellion

Over the last five decades or so it seems trendy thing to do is to rebel against "society's norms." The last decade, however, has seen this trend gain ungodly momentum as the number of females with colored hair, tattoos, and body piercing are increasing by the day.

This is their way of "sticking it to the (white) man" and showing him that they won't conform to their oppressive expectations and ideals.

While there are a shitload of other measures females have employed to remain as non-compliant as possible, one avenue that more of them seem to be openly broadcasting is their affinity for black males. In their minds, this is the ultimate middle finger to the patriarchy, whom they feel tells them who they shouldn't share a bed with.

Attention

It’s been well documented that women are nothing more than overgrown children. Their adolescent mentalities combined with their innate lack of self esteem leads them to the overt attention whoring today’s girls are known for.

It’s been said that there’s no such thing as bad publicity. To Western girls, there’s no such thing as bad attention. So long as people are paying attention to them they couldn’t give two shits whether they’re being admired or admonished.

Most of the white girls I’ve dated are serial hand holders. The moment we get out of my car and are walking around in public, they don’t hesitate to grab my hand and proudly strut around as though they were the queens of the fucking universe.

Now this could be because they genuinely liked me. But red pill knowledge tells me that a good number of them gladly soak up the attention that comes their way as a result of being seen holding hands with a tall black guy.

I’m not in their heads, but their body language screams “look, I’m being fucked senseless every night by a black guy who has a 15″ cock!” or something to that effect. I could be wrong but when a girl is holding hands with a brother with a look on her face akin to the cat that ate the canary, it’s hard to imagine many other thoughts going through their one track minds designed to hoard attention by any means possible.

Are white girls who date black guys “off limits” or “contaminated”?

I don't often read the comments on my posts, but when I do, it's because I'm looking to learn something and maybe gain some more perspective or see things through the lenses of our readers.

In my personal experience with conversations I've had with friends over the years, there does seem to be an undercurrent or unwritten sentiment that women who have slept with or been in relationships with black men are somehow contaminated or off limits.

A good female friend of mine has a good looking sister who's married to a very affluent, high-value white male. According to my friend, she dated mostly black guys all through high school and college but guards that "secret" with her life and says she will take any admission of commingling with them to her grave.

There are a couple of reasons this perceived pollution of white women come to mind such as the myth of the big black cock and the AAA (automatic alpha assumption). As a black man I can't speak to whether this is true or not.

[image]

I can, however, identify with this concept in terms of neomasculinity. Anyone who regularly reads my columns knows I used to be a raging. Omega. Male. Being that low on the sexual totem pole automatically kept me away girls who'd been on the wild alpha roller coaster ride, because I knew in my mind I'd never be as exciting and take charge as they were no matter what race he was.

In my beta brain, if I learned that a girl I was interested in had ex boyfriend who was a 6'4″ Adonis with ripped abs, a sports car, sleeve tattoos, a devil-may-care attitude about about him, and who was always surrounded by pretty women, I wouldn't so much as talk to her on account of my programmed inferiority.

The race of her ex would be of little consqeuence. The bottom line is that in my mind I'd have no chance with a girl who had ever been involved with a dude like that. I'd be very interested to see your thoughts on this unwritten rule.

What are you saying about black men???

“But Donovan! You’re black! How can you talk this way about black men! Do you hate yourself??”

Make no mistake about the fact that I’m a confident man who knows who he is and who he’s not. For me to believe that I “should” be every woman’s first choice for long term partnership is both short-sighted and delusional.

Yes, it’s important for men to approach women as though he’s entitled to fuck them and yes it’s equally important to know, believe, and walk around as though you are God’s gift to women.

But facts are facts. As a black male, I know that more often than not I’m viewed as a flavor of the week or a phase by most women I approach. Doesn’t hurt my feelings one bit. I’m simply playing the hand that I’ve been dealt.

Sure, there have been a few women in my life I’ve spent more than a few months with and there have been a few who wanted more than just a roll in the hay for a few weeks or to show me off to her friends (“look at my black boyfriend!”).

But as a man with red pill awareness, I’m aware that both the sexual market and a woman’s imperative doesn’t give a shit about what it should offer me as a man. And neither cares what’s fair and what’s not.

Short men, balding men, ugly men, and yes even black men have to have more game than the Anglo-ideals (like my friend Paul) the highest value females fawn over. This isn’t a slight on men who have the aforementioned sexual market deficiencies and it’s not to imply that I’m not a high value male.

But the strongest part of a man’s game is knowing his deficiencies in SMV and working tirelessly to overcome them, or increase his value in areas over which he has more control.

Take Away

Are there white women out there who date men of all races including brothers? Sure.

Are there high SMV women who date black men because they happen to be her type? Of course.

There are plenty of well adjusted, confident, high value women who date black guys for no other reason but that some black men turn them on and have solid game. Happens all the time.

But the sexual imperative of a female is to consolidate on the highest value male she can find. Women who consistently punch what is perceived to be below their collective weight by dating only men who are not considered to be viable long-term partners or husbands according to cultural standards means there inherent flaws that exist physically, mentally, and emotionally.

Truth be told, most of the time it's a combination of two or more of these factors playing a role in a white woman's decision to commingle with black males, whether occasionally or exclusively.

So what do you think? Why do you think "mud sharks" exist? What do you think drives them to do what they do?

Read Next: The Pros And Cons Of Game For Black Men In the West

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

7 Reasons Why Approaching Girls In Real Life Beats Tinder Hands Down

September 16, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In this digital age, the appeal of Tinder to guys seems pretty obvious. Here is an app that offers a seemingly endless supply of potential sexual partners to be accessed with a simple swipe to the right – an apparent cornucopia of hot, sexually up-for-it females just ready to be plucked from cyberspace and pulled into your bed.

Of course, anyone who's spent more than two minutes on the app will be more than aware that this somewhat idyllic portrayal is nonsensical and that pulling on Tinder is not as easy as one might have hoped. Having experimented with it extensively in the last few months I can say categorically that — for me at least — approaching girls in real life is far more effective, yielding better results.

I don't intend to get to deep into a wider discussion of Tinder and the somewhat bleak prognosis for the state of male-female relations its vast popularity invites — Roosh has covered the same here. But it has to be said that when finding a partner is reduced to a card-shuffling like exercise on your smartphone, where you scroll past one narcissistic image after another, then something isn't quite right.

My interest here is the efficiency or otherwise of the process for meeting women for sex or relationships. And while some guys are successful with Tinder and there are reputable companies out there who offer advice on how to optimise your chances (I've even written a chapter on it in a forthcoming book on text game I'm working on) I would still say that the old-fashioned, face-to-face approach works best.

1. On Tinder You Are Judged Solely on Your Looks…

Don't have a six-pack, broad shoulders and the smouldering looks of Robert Pattison or Ryan Gosling? Then bad luck — you are in female left-swipe purgatory.

Tinder is fundamentally a visual medium — this was its original USP after all — rather than have to fill in a lengthy profile you simply upload a few pics and you're away. While initially this might have been seen as attractive by guys — "Hey, I can skip the boring, getting-to-know you bit and just take my pick out the pictures of hot girls" — in fact it is a massive disadvantage.

While it is a fact that women's SMV (sexual market value) is largely determined by their looks, a man's is influenced by many other factors including his social dominance, humour, intelligence, gravitas and so on. None of which comes across in that moody five-year-old pic you plucked off Facebook because your mum told you you looked handsome in it.

Your profile description beneath your main picture? Forget it – who has time to read those?

2. While In a Face-To-Face Interaction Your Approach Itself Can Create Attraction

Contrast this with the power of the face-to-face approach. I met an ex-girlfriend of mine, a solid 8, very cute Turkish girl, through daygame on the streets of London. We had several great months together before I got itchy feet and called time on the relationship. Enraged, the girl targeted me with a volley of abuse, including the following insightful nugget:

"If you hadn't have approached me like you did I would never have gone with you — you're not even my type."

Now, granted, she was upset and deliberately trying to hurt me, but I happen to believe that on this she was telling the truth. She had already told me that she when we met she had felt my approach (a direct street-stop) showed "balls."

It is my belief that the approach in itself created much of her attraction for me as it showed dominance and a tendency to take risks to get what I want. Had she seen my picture on Tinder, however, I'm almost certain I would have been a default left swipe.

3. You Are Limited To Gaming The Girls You Match With

Even if your messaging game is really on-point, because the system only allows you to chat to those girls with whom you've matched, then you don't even get the chance to work your game (and thus potentially positively influence) those girls that you really like.

Contrast this with getting a telephone number from a "maybe" girl in the street. OK, she may not initially be that interested but your text game may just save it — and at least you know you are attracted to her since she promoted you to approach.

4. There Can Often Be A Mismatch Of Expectations

As above, you only really have the pick of girls with whom you match, and of these, only a proportion are going to be looking for the same thing as you. So if you are looking for someone to date, you might find that your matches are those girls looking for covert hook-ups.

And if you are still a young guy looking to experiment and meet a variety of women then you'll be surprised at the number of girls who are deluded enough to be using Tinder to try to find a serious partner.

Again, the beauty of face-to-face approaching is that this can be determined through a few leading questions at the outset, saving time for both parties.

5. Girls Are Exceptionally Flaky On the App, As They Have So Many Matches

Given how thirsty the male population is, girls — and especially hot girls — get matched by pretty much everyone on Tinder. This means that they are swamped with options. So when you get chatting to a girl, even if your messaging game is stellar, there's still the likelihood that she's going tho get distracted by the next shiny thing and stop replying to your messages.

A face-to-face approach, particularly through daygame, creates much more impact, meaning that you stand out from her other male orbiters and you have a fighting chance of commanding her attention for longer.

6 You Never Really Know What You're Going to Get

Tinder is rather like ordering clothes on the internet — you never know exactly what you're going to get until it turns up. That t-shirt you thought was perfect online looks baggy and turns out to be made from cheap material when it turns up.

Everyone accentuates their best selves online, and girls are obviously going to put up their best pictures on a dating app. Don't be surprised when that hot Kate Upton lookalike you thought you were chatting to turns out to be a a less attractive proposition when you meet her for a date in Starbucks.

This is where real-life approaching wins out big time — you only approach those girls who you are attracted to, and with whom there's a reasonable chance of some chemistry. OK, you may suffer a lot of rejections, but at least with those who bite you know exactly what you're getting before you invest time on a date.

7. You Invest More Time In Prospects That Were Never Going Anywhere

. . .which leads on to this point. At minimum you are going to have to chat to her for a while on the app, and then perhaps on WhatsApp, before she'll come out to meet you. When she does, and she isn't what you are looking for, you will kick yourself for the wasted time. Had you met her in person first through cold-approach you would have known precisely what you were dealing with and apportioned your time appropriately.

In summary, there's nothing wrong with Tinder as a supplement to your regular game — guys can and do have success on it on a regular basis (a good-looking friend of mine has recently been getting laid on it consistently nearly every night). But for all the reasons listed above, you should never be tempted to make it your primary tool for meeting women.

If you fear rejection then man up, read ROK and other resources, and get out there meeting girls in person anyway. I promise you it will be worth it in the end.

Read More: How to Use Your Natural Horniness For a Great Daygame Session

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at

Troy Francis.

Feminist Mental Health Czar Wants To Curtail Boys' Access To Gyms In Britain

September 16, 2015 | by Theodore Gumbril | Link | Original Link

A woman named Natasha Devon has written a piece in the Daily Telegraph demanding that boys under 16 be banned from attending gyms alone, to prevent them from becoming too concerned about developing muscles. Devon, who is the Derpartment for Education's "mental health champion" is asking for a "strict and rigorously enforced" age limit of 16 on access to gyms, unless accompanied by an adult.

Devon is a professional victim who has built two charities and wrangled herself an MBE out of the fact she once had an eating disorder. She was formerly a typist for Cosmopolitan and has zero qualifications in medicine or psychiatry. The ascendancy of pundit-turned-government advisor Devon suggests the British government is pursuing a policy of handing out appointments and honours to complete non-entities in order to appeal to feminist sensibilities.

The continuing assault on male spaces

The projected Feminist prototype of the male gym-user.

Although traditionally associated with the right wing of the British press, The Telegraph has a long tradition of giving feminists a platform to spout biased garbage.

The catalytic incident which led Devon to call for the ban of children (read: boys) under 16 from gyms has no bearing the matter she purports to discuss. Devon recounts being shown some dodgy exercise by a guy in the gym. She then says she is concerned because gyms are places where peer-to-peer advice-giving. There follows, she alleges, “a wider social significance, particularly for young men.”

So let’s recap. A man gave our “tsar” dodgy advice in the gym. Gyms are places where peer-to-peer advice is given. Teenage boys join a gym between 13 and 14 years of age. This, apparently, is a valid basis for inferring that a problem exists. Logic and reason 101 it isn’t. She continues:

> Ostensibly, there’s nothing much wrong with this. It’s incredibly difficult to be a young man in today’s society. The increasing prevalence of mum-only one-parent families, plus the relative dearth of male teachers, has left many teenage boys without real-life role models. Aspects of the new wave of feminist thinking in our culture have also meant a lot of young men are struggling to find a sense of identity.
>
> …
>
> All of these needs can be fulfilled somewhat by the gym. It’s a testosterone-fuelled space where teenage boys can find older men who will instruct and induct them into the ways of fitness culture. It’s little wonder they’re seeking gym memberships in their droves.

That’s right, folks. It’s difficult to be a boy because feminists have made any semblance of male identity anathema, unless regulated and controlled by feminists. Going to the gym has become an escape from this, because boys flock there to gain the tutelage of older, more established men.

Natasha Devon, in case you were wondering

Nevertheless, Devon demands that all gyms ban boys under 16 unless accompanied by an adult. Her "reasons" are as follows:

> Firstly, it's because young men are vulnerable and dangers lurk beneath the gym's friendly edifice.

These dangers are, and I'll spare you the direct quote, that personal trainers might push energy drinks and protein shakes onto gym users. The implicit argument is that young boys might be subject to this "up sell", as Devon calls it. Never mind that every one of these products is available to children on high street shelves. The feminist solution to this imaginary problem is, unsurprisingly, government regulation.

> Secondly, there's the potential for distorted body image.

Devon claims that the rise in male hospitalisations for eating disorders by 70 per cent over the last decade is connected to what she purports to be the mainstreaming of gyms. No attempt to establish correlation between the two is made whatsoever. It just "feels" right, right?

The third argument, and one which is utterly bizarre in its lack of logic, is that:

> …gyms are currently providing a need which should be being met elsewhere in the community.

Her point is that schools have insufficient PE lessons. Which is of course, an invalid argument for the limiting of access to gyms, even for children. It's a very reasonable argument in favour of having more sports in schools. To cite a lack of sports in schools as a reason to restrict gyms, however, is putting the cart before the horse. Czar-level reasoning is obviously at play.

When chancers blag their way into high office

Although Natasha claims that she has "the critical faculty to question the more dodgy aspects of gym culture," reading her article provides ample evidence of a worrying lack of critical or other faculties. The article is more an exercise in concern-trolling than it is rational inquiry.

No evidence at all is brought forward to show why it is that gyms are so bad for young boys. No evidence is shown to ground the numerous claims of causation made between gym-going, eating disorders in men, and the trade in and consumption of supplements. Devon's written argument is typically millennial: unrigorous and unreferenced.

It is almost as if this "advocate" is trying to concoct a basis for a policy out of thin air. Almost as if she is working backwards from a conclusion, that it is bad for young men to be in the gym, that they are exposed to a culture which is, well, male, and therefore bad. Although Devon pays lip service, as feminists are wont to do, to the troubles facing men in modernity, she is herself part of the same misandrist impulse to regulate and curtail male behaviour.

Devon, as a feminist, feels threatened by men having their own spaces. The British pub has been decimated thanks to the smoking ban and alcohol taxes. Men are now finding new spaces to commune and communicate, away from the meddlesome influence of women. Feminsts are reacting by attempting to control and regulate those spaces in any way, and under any pretext they can.

Devon's concern is really that boys in gyms might be exposed not only to the rigours of strength training, but also to a little too much masculine thought. Catch them young, as they say.

Britain, a casino for grievance-mongers

Health at every size, you see.

The real scandal here is that a professional victim, Natasha Devon, who has no medical or psychiatric qualifications, has been appointed at taxpayer's expense to lecture people on children's mental health.

Not only has the government been conned by this individual, her appointment could be positively detrimental to the health of British children. Devon and her troupe are practitioners of the extremist ideology of "health at every size" (HAES), which teaches fat people that being fat is perfectly OK and something they should be happy about.

Aside from this, even the very notion of "self-esteem," another idea which Devon promotes, is a harmful poison which should have no place in schools. Advocates of "self-esteem" promote the idea that confidence is something that one is entitled to, rather than what one earns through hard work and accomplishment.

After decades of conditioning and exposure to culture, British kids are full of it. Scratch the surface and they know nothing. But they're ready to stab you for stepping on their trainers. Snake oil sales(wo)men like Natasha Devon will only promote and encourage this.

Government non-jobs for all

Natasha Devon and the doughy mangina who appointed her.

The Cameron regime is obsessed with ingratiating itself to various grievance lobbies by making politically correct gestures. Appointing a woman here, an ethnic minority there. I have already written about the utterly unmeritorious degradation of the Honours system by awarding the OBE to professional victim Caroline Criado-Perez.

Natasha Devon got her MBE in the very same intake, which speaks volumes to the government's philosophy. Countless nameless individuals, be they police officers, nurses, doctors or firemen, might have been more deserving of honours than these chancers. For the money spent appointing Natasha Devon as a "mental health champion," the government might have appointed a real expert to the role, at least one with a modicum of capacity to egnage in rational analysis.

In modern Britain, appointments and honours are not given on merit. They are given to whoever has the greatest excess of chutzpah and talent for shameless self-promotion. Even an abject lack of qualifications does not stop you from becoming a Tsar or champion for this or that cause.

The most worrying aspect of this is that under such a porous system, where influence is given whoever has the sharpest elbows, feminist creeps like Natasha Devon now have access to your children.

Read More: How I Avoided A False Domestic Abuse Charge

Theodore Gumbril

Theodore Gumbril is a reactionary basment-dweller with Heinz bean stains adorning a

£2.99 wifebeater bought at TK Maxx. He considers tolerance a non-virtue and would abolish human rights and democracy given the opportunity. His innermost feelings are so triggering they would leave Laurie Penny foaming at the mouth in a hospital bed. Tweets at @TrueGumbril

Former “Anti Capitalist” Bono Is A Billionaire Thanks To Facebook

September 17, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

“Irish” rocker Bono has become the world’s most cashed-up pop star and is now a billionaire in US dollar terms. A well-timed investment in Facebook six years ago means that he raked in more from one investment than all his other ventures combined. But it just wouldn’t be a page from Bono’s life without some mammoth double standard being uncovered.

The highly, highly lucrative parlay into Facebook has coincided with seismic shifts in Bono’s stated economic philosophy. In the last two years he has declared capitalism as the prophylactic for global poverty, in contrast to his former anti-capitalist stance.

When celebrities ideologically rampage against capitalism or whatever else they perceive as a social ill, they are giving themselves personal advertising that money simply cannot buy. Gullible folks by the millions are willing to overlook the hypocrisy embedded in almost every sentence coming from a celebrity campaigner’s mouth.

In relation to capitalism, the irony that the most famous celebrities earn much more than the average CEO is perennially relegated to a real life version of minuscule footnotes.

Already untenable to justify his wealth vis-à-vis his political “philosophy,” recent years have probably forced Bono to come out as a supporter of “capitalism” (I see generalities, however, and no real details, probably as he’s a musician).

Bono’s shift is far from courageous

It must be a coincidence that Bono bought this manor in Dublin, just one element of his property portfolio, using CD, digital music and other royalties that depend entirely on capitalist modes of production and distribution.

A particularly audacious Forbes columnist had the marvellously stupid idea to praise Bono for changing his views on capitalism and constant foreign aid, with the Irish musician now saying that the former is a better long-term solution than the latter. The paradox is that although Mark Hendrickson says Bono has "embraced" capitalism recently, he has actually been hugging it dearly as an entertainer for an eternity.

U2 band members have had phenomenal wealthy for more years than certainly I and maybe you have been alive. Across practically all of that time, they have supported the large-scale transfer of wealth from First World countries, where the money could be spent on the working and lower-middle classes, to (largely the elites of) Third World regimes through debt relief and other aid.

And if Bono's new public position (as opposed to his private practices for decades) is now so warranted, what does that say about the damage he has done for years with his previous advocacy antics? So capitalism is the panacea and he has basically been feeding the masses poison over time?

To boot, the new course Bono is chartering dovetails nicely with post-fact justifications of his shoulder rubbing of the rich and powerful, plus a very belated rationalization of how his own gargantuan wealth can presented to the public as the legitimate outcome of his involvement in a generally fair economic system.

Throwing normal people under the bus for his own gain

If Bono had been serious about alleviating poverty and inequality in the past, he would have advocated for a reworking of the system, not redistribution after income is received, which enabled him to play “charitable” Father Christmas very publicly.

In addition to his forays into blue chip and other investments, the 2000s and 2010s have seen Bono diversify his SJW rhetoric in ways outside his normal macroeconomic and foreign aid focus. He once defended a deplorable song from the youth wing of the African National Congress (ANC) as he was searching for greater popularity in South Africa. The piece, entitled “Kill the Boer,” was widely performed by black activists to strike fear into the hearts of the white Afrikaner population, the distinctly European community created by the intermarriage of Dutch, French and German Protestants for two hundred years prior to the 20th century.

Not all Afrikaners are descended from Boers, Boer meaning farmer in Dutch and Afrikaans. Yet the confusing of the two groups within black communities and the contemporary history of white farmers (and whites in general) being murdered in alleged racial attacks in Zimbabwe and South Africa made the intention of the song clear. Bono claimed, despite the end of apartheid in 1994, that the song had connotations with historical Irish retaliation against British oppression.

And there’s the constant “do as I say, not as I do” paradox when it comes to Bono and U2’s convoluted tax affairs. He has wielded his mega-microphone to attack European governments’ “unfair” anti-austerity measures, which purportedly enable the rich to pay relatively less tax as normal people suffer much more, even as he bases a proportion of his business and other affairs in the Netherlands, where income taxes are traditionally much lower.

Is there a bigger celebrity hypocrite than Bono?

[image]

Bono’s personality and behavior reeks of “others must do this, but not me.”

A conservative answer is “probably no” but should someone find a bigger one, Bono would still be a worthy silver medalist and maybe he was just injured that day. His marked economic “transformation” is appalling as for so many years he could preach a sermon he repeatedly violated outside his own Church for Social Justice Warriors.

The nonchalance with which Bono pursues his illogical life is illuminating, though. As strange as it sounds, he may not be aware of it himself. Once again, we face the startling possibility that being a SJW is very much an illness that Bono is only helping to spread.

Read More: The One Change Facebook Can Make To Create A Better World

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Cuckservative Rick Wilson Melts Down In Response To Donald Trump Candidacy

September 17, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With the ascent of Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump showing no signs of abating, cuckservatives across the U.S. are losing their minds, and the GOP cucksultant leading the crybaby parade is Rick Wilson. This week, Wilson published an article at The Daily Beast decrying the rise of the "Troll Party," his halfwit neologism for Trump supporters and anyone else who thinks conservatives should be, you know, conservative:

> That's what is happening inside the GOP, and why the disease vector, in the form of Donald Trump, puts the entire conservative movement at risk of being hijacked and destroyed by a bellowing billionaire with poor impulse control and a profoundly superficial understanding of the world. The Troll Party puts nationalist, anti-establishment bluster before the tenets of our constitutional republic.

Wilson's temper tantrum is just the latest in a series of embarrassing meltdowns for both him and the cuck brigade of the conservative movement. Cuckservatives like Wilson claim to support right-wing values, yet now that we have a viable presidential candidate actually espousing those positions, they're scattering like roaches baking in the sun. It's clear that these Beltway "conservatives" are more concerned about staying on the cocktail party circuit then actually winning the war of ideas.

A Brief History Of Public Cucking

https://twitter.com/Ricky_Vaughn99/status/642043343355158529

No one man better exemplifies the word “cuckservative” better than Rick Wilson. A political consultant with a long history of sniping at conservatives he believes are too “extreme,” Wilson has had several major meltdowns over the summer. For example, in a move that not even social justice warriors or other professional victims have yet to stoop to, Wilson used a supposed “rape threat” against his daughter to attack Breitbart. This came after he went on CNN, a notoriously left-wing news network, and called Trump supporters “low-information voters”:

Wilson was later forced to recant his accusation after he was rightfully questioned for not reporting the threat to the police.

Despite getting collectively spanked by the Internet for this idiocy, Wilson chose to dig himself in deeper when he insulted conservative commentator Ann Coulter by asking her if Trump paid her for anal sex. This was in response to Coulter Tweeting out a link to the above-linked Breitbart article on Wilson’s false rape blustering:

Once again, Wilson was forced to back down and issue an apology for his big mouth, though he noticeably didn't apologize to Coulter, the woman he accused of being a prostitute.

Wilson's opposition to Trump is so extreme—CNN dubbed him Trump's "hardcore hater"—that he's actively encouraging other GOP candidates to spurn Trump's supporters. In appearances on CNN and in articles such as the aforementioned Daily Beast piece, Wilson has repeatedly insulted Trump supporters, calling them "trolls" and "kooks" and claiming that any Republican candidate who tries to appeal to them is "racist" or "xenophobic."

The joke is that Donald Trump is not only leading the Republican presidential field by wide margins over his competitors, his candidacy has injected a vitality into conservative politics that hasn't been seen in decades. After eight years of the faux-conservative George W. Bush and lackluster candidate selections in 2008 and 2012, Trump has both the charisma and the platform necessary to take the White House back from the radical left.

> @TheRickWilson your "conservative values" extend only as far as the "R" next to a politician's name. pic.twitter.com/t3gTAmhVYj
>
> — RWDServo (@FashyTom) September 16, 2015

None of this matters to Rick Wilson; he'd rather the GOP lose "honorably" then resort to the winning playbook that Trump is using.

The GOP's Heart Of Cuckness

https://twitter.com/Ricky_Vaughn99/status/641057721966567424

The continuing crackup over Donald Trump's campaign has revealed the true priorities of Beltway conservatives such as Rick Wilson, George Will and Jonah Goldberg. Despite claiming to fight for traditional values, these cuckservatives overwhelmingly hail from liberal metropolises, write for left-wing organs such as the Washington Post or Daily Beast, and count leftists among their circle of cocktail buddies. They are almost entirely disconnected from the reality that average Americans—and average conservatives—face, and their flustered hatred of Trump proves it.

The irony is that a few months ago, Wilson was willing to acknowledge the problem of the GOP being too accommodating to the left. In a piece for the Federalist, Wilson slammed "Acela Republicans" ("Acela" referring to the Northeast, named after the Amtrak route connecting Boston and Washington, D.C.) such as New Jersey Governor Chris Christie for their leftist policies, snobby attitude and open contempt for the party's right-wing base. Yet when given the perfect candidate to send "Acela Republicans" packing, Wilson gets so worked up he has to reach for the smelling salts.

If Trump's continued performance in the polls and other candidates such as Ted Cruz adopting his tactics is any indicator, cuckservatives such as Rick Wilson are an endangered species. The question remains whether they'll peacefully step aside in favor of a right-wing renaissance or try to burn down the GOP to assuage their hurt feelings.

Read More: Donald Trump And The Tyranny Of Feelings

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

8 Tactics Of The Occult War

September 17, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

In the wake of World War II, Europe found itself in ruins. The architects of modern Europe had already started to build the edifice of liberal democratic nation-states that comprise the EU today. Their goal was to form a new Europe based on Enlightenment ideals that would never again be torn apart by war.

However, not everyone was so sanguine about the new project. Italian philosopher Julius Evola believed that the war was just a symptom of the advancing decay of Europe, and that the decay was brought on by the destruction of the traditional hierarchical order by what he calls the “forces of subversion.”

Julius Evola

In his 1953 book, Men Among the Ruins, Evola lists eight tactics that are used by the forces of subversion to attack the traditional order. He calls this attack “the occult war” but he does not mean that this attack has anything do with witchcraft or magic. Rather, “occult” here only means that this war is hidden from the masses of men.

By learning these eight tactics, we’ll have a better understanding of what is behind the daily news stories. Instead of seeing random events, we can discern the direction of the attack by the enemies of masculinity and tradition, and we will be better equipped to counter that attack.

Who are the “forces of subversion”?

Delacroix – Liberty Leading the People

The forces of subversion are groups of people who oppose a hierarchically ordered traditional society. We usually deal with the late stage symptoms of the disease, such as feminism and political correctness. But Evola goes directly to the source of the sickness:

> The roots, as far as the historical dimension is concerned, are to be found in the subversion introduced in Europe by the revolutions of 1789 and 1848. The disease must be recognized in all its forms and degrees; thus, the main task is to establish if there are still men willing to reject all the ideologies, political movements, and parties that, directly or indirectly, derive from those revolutionary ideas (i.e. everything ranging from liberalism to democracy to Marxism and communism).

Who are these groups that spread the subversion? For some, the answer is easy—it's the Jews.

Evola recognized that Jewish intellectuals have indeed played a role in championing ideas that undermine Western culture. A few months back, Roosh wrote a summary of those ideas right here on ROK. But Evola believed that focusing solely on the influence of Jewish intellectuals would make us miss the bigger picture:

> It is true that many Jews have been promoters of the modern disorder. This, however, should not prevent a deeper analysis, capable of exposing forces that may have employed modern Judaism as an instrument. After all, despite the fact that many Jews are among the apostles of the main ideologies… of the global subversion (i.e. liberalism, socialism, scientism, and rationalism), it is also evident that these ideas would never have arisen without historical antecedents, such as the Reformation, Humanism, the naturalism and individualism of the Renaissance, and the philosophy of Descartes. Such phenomena cannot be attributed to Judaism, but rather point to a wider web of influences.

But what group could have been active during all those centuries from the Reformation to the present day? Evola never gives a clear answer, but I suspect that he would say that the forces of subversion ultimately have a spiritual origin.

However, we don't have to believe that the subversion has an underlying spiritual source to understand how the following tactics have been used to introduce changes to our culture.

Most of these tactics are designed to keep people asleep so that they do not recognize that they are being deceived. Consequently, the strategy of the anti-traditional forces is to keep people from asking questions. If they do start waking up, the strategy is to try to get them to be satisfied with only a portion of the truth or even with another falsehood.

1. Scientific Suggestion

Pay no attention to the man behind the curtain!

Modern men and women are conditioned to believe that history is made only by the most obvious players on the stage. Because most people hold this “scientific” view, it allows the behind the scenes actors to make their moves undetected.

For example, most people believe that the federal government operates in the fashion that they learned about in high school civics—with the three branches of government providing checks and balances on the others. What this assessment ignores is the high degree to which the US government is captured by corporate and other special interests.

2. Replacement

Ayn Rand

The tactic of replacement is the dissemination of a vain philosophical theory that will trap certain people who might otherwise be on the verge of waking up. Instead of being able to identify the source of the subversion, these individuals will waste years of their lives learning a dead end pseudo-philosophy.

Evola was writing for the educated classes in mid-twentieth century Europe where philosophy still may have been popular. Americans are of a less philosophical bent. Still, I wonder if an economic philosophy like libertarianism or a personal “philosophy” such as the one spelled out by Ayn Rand may not be serving as a replacement tactic to modern men.

While not an indictment of all libertarians, I notice that some of them are so stuck on the purity of libertarian theory that they are not able to see the obvious downsides to their policies.

3. Counterfeits

The tactic of counterfeits is the erecting of false traditional movements. As people become dissatisfied with our rotting culture, they may seek out traditional ideas like those found in neomasculinity. However, they may also end up subscribing to a counterfeit group.

Neo-paganism is a good example of such a counterfeit group. True paganism no longer exists in the Western world. Anything that purports to be pagan is merely a reconstruction based on scraps found in Christian sources. By joining a neo-pagan group, a person minimizes the effect that he would otherwise have in resisting the subversion.

4. Inversion

The tactic of inversion replaces true spirituality with psychology and good feelings. An example of this are the new age philosophies that go in and out of favor. Again, this tactic sidetracks people so that they never find the truth.

You can see the tactic of inversion at work in women who replace true spirituality with a morality-free pop spirituality like yoga. For these women, living the examined life is unspiritual, but drinking chai tea, wearing yoga pants, and chanting “om” is.

5. Ricochet

The tactic of ricochet is the divide and conquer strategy. The goal is to get traditional groups to oppose each other to render them ineffective. You can see this tactic at work when Catholics and conservative Protestants attack each other rather than uniting to fight the encroachment of subversive ideas.

6. Dilution

The tactic of dilution involves the substitution of a less offensive idea for a completely unacceptable one.

This tactic is used all the time. For example, when welfare was introduced, it was sold as a temporary help for people who had hit some hard times. Today, there are families where three generations have spent their entire lives on the dole.

7. Replacing Infiltrations

Freemasons have a reputation, deserved or undeserved, of infiltrating traditional institutions

The tactic of infiltration is used to undermine traditional institutions to subvert them from within.

Effective infiltration of an institution can only happen when that institution “forgets” or drifts away from its founding principles. We can see infiltration happening with the Catholic Church where, since the 1960s, many gay men entered the priesthood. An attorney who worked on the pedophile scandal confided to me that this infiltration played a large role in precipitating the crisis.

8. Misidentification of Principle with its Representatives

Marie Antoinette

The tactic of misidentification of the principle with its representatives is to criticize a traditional institution because of the behavior of some of its members.

Evola writes that this tactic was used to destroy the old European aristocracy. The abuses of certain aristocrats were used to paint the entire aristocracy as being corrupt, thus making them easier to topple.

Conclusion

We are currently in the midst of an enormous awakening. Thousands of men are realizing that they have been indoctrinated in such a way to keep them compliant with the status quo.

Some awaken only to a certain point and stop. Others will not be satisfied until they have completed the process. For these men, the ultimate goal is not just personal enlightenment but the restoration of a traditional society. Studying Evola's analysis of the weapons of the occult war gives these men the tools necessary to recognize and put an end to the subversion.

Read More: The Disturbing Relationship Between Feminism And The Occult

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

College Poster Suggests That Only Men Are Ever Guilty Of Rape By Intoxication

September 18, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

This year an “old” anti-sexual assault poster from Coastal Carolina University made the rounds online. It features two hypothetical students, Jake and Josie, who were both drunk and “hooked up.” The poster then tells readers that Josie could not consent and Jake was charged with “rape” (the college-adjudicated style).

Men are then warned that a woman who is intoxicated (a sip of alcohol, a drink, two drinks, what?) cannot consent and that “proceeding” is a crime (again, college rules or actual legal rules evaluated in a courtroom?).

Coastal Carolina University was confronted about the poster and admitted it was theirs, adding the caveat that it was “old” (implying that somehow anti-male rape culture hysteria on campus has gotten better, which is blatantly false). Talking about how the poster is seven years old and somehow outdated is just a excuse.

Because affirmative consent, which sinks male due process rights to a depth lower than the Pacific Ocean’s Mariana Trench, is even more euphemistic than the US missile dubbed “The Peacemaker,” the removal of an explicit poster about exclusive male responsibility and criminalization only of their behavior does not negate how this concept is still used to falsely label men as rapists.

A public airing of what feminist college “rape courts” have been doing for years

https://twitter.com/TheBrandonMorse/status/619858946593914880/photo/1?ref_src=twsrc%5Etfw

Some may be saying, “Hold up, David! This is ONE university amongst hundreds upon hundreds across the US! Can you really be saying this based on one poster?” Look around you, though. If your college is not saturated with speculation about which drunk woman (drunkenness usually being assessed by her, not objectively) was taken advantage of by which man (almost guaranteed to have been drunk, too), I don’t think you’ve spent enough time on campus.

In a now infamous Occidental College fiasco, an inebriated male student was expelled for having had sex with a more or less equally intoxicated female. Although Slate is usually profoundly skilled at presenting a one-sided diatribe that straw mans any non-leftist position, this piece by Amanda Hess is the one of the better ones you will read from that publication.

Despite the injection of some feel-good segues that try to distract readers, the article is a fairly damning indictment of the parlous, gender biased state of college prosecutions.

It’s not surprising that Occidental is Obama’s original alma mater

Remember when many SJWs and politicians suddenly stopped using this “statistic”? I wonder why.

The girl in question at Occidental, “Jane Doe,” was checked on by multiple people, all of whom did not believe she was ever being sexually assaulted. One student, schooled in so-called sexual assault responsiveness (“sensitivity” training which is usually administered by the same people watering down campus due process), walked in on the couple having sex. The act, as he later recounted, struck him as looking like no more than two people engaged in consensual coitus.

The Coastal Carolina University poster is simply an explicit rendering of what is practiced every day on the majority of American campuses. Of course, SJWs are unable to get their gender studies-driven overlords to prosecute every man having intercourse with a tipsy or intoxicated (but not incapacitated) woman.

The epic collapse of "sign, sealed and delivered" witch hunts like the Duke lacrosse pogrom or the uncovered lies of those suffering from relevance deprivation syndrome, such as Emma Sulkowicz and Jackie Coakley, indicate an overextension of SJW antics that even ringleaders can't control. Having observed other falsely convicted students, or those convicted without any evidence, resort to legal options, many other men are now doing the same.

Occidental is really one of countless colleges adopting such classically illiberal standards for ruining the lives of young men without evidence, yet it is befitting that Barack Obama, a strident advocate of affirmative consent, is an alumnus of Occidental.

Keep your eyes and ears alert, then exploit

We were supposed to believe the UVA fraternity "gang rape" hoax, so why should anyone believe that a girl was raped through intoxication when both she and the male were drunk?

Posters like Coastal Carolina University's, regardless of how old they are, are a veritable goldmine for exposing again the twisted, bigoted ideology of SJWs. By all means we must continue to honor the need for positive evidence to establish crimes in courtrooms, not "rape tribunals" based on perverse feminist social science theories.
Nonetheless, frequently enough, SJWs come forward with blunders that would make The Three Stooges look like very polished operators.

If anything, the moronic dissemination of the poster demonstrates how SJWs believe they are a world unto themselves. The hate is so ingrained into their mindsets that euphemisms like affirmative consent are not ones that they can forever use without slipping up. Eventually, the simmering prejudice boils up in a volcano of anti-male rage.

Oh, and doesn't anyone else find it strange that Jake is drinking in the photo and Josie isn't? I guess she's the rapist now.

Read More: One College's Bizarre Approach To Sexual Assault

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Have SJWs Gone Too Far By Defending A Known Pedophile?

September 18, 2015 | by Robert Conway | Link | Original Link

For those of you who have been keeping an eye on Gamergate for the past year, perhaps there are a few names you have come to recognize, one of which is Sarah Nyberg. For those of you unfamiliar, Sarah Nyberg has been one of the loudest opponents of Gamergate.

What might be surprising is that Sarah Nyberg is a transsexual who was given the birth name Nicolas Nyberg. Sarah-Nicolas is also an admitted pedophile. Nyberg had admitted to being a pedophile in a series of uncovered chat logs from the website FF Shrine.

Even with the chat logs, Sarah's supporters have been either been in denial or have outright stated that they support de-stigmatization of pedophiles. While many of Sarah's followers maintain that the chat logs were fabricated or taken out of context, thanks to some handy work by Milo Yiannopoulos, we can safely confirm that Sarah Nyberg is in fact a pedophile.

Back in 2005 Nyberg had a sexual fixation on his-her cousin. The chat logs go into great details about Sarah's admiration for the little girl, even detailing the fact that the parents of the little girl knew something was up with Sarah. While the chat logs had long since been common knowledge among Gamergate, it wasn't until Milo's article hit that the parent's of the little girl had corroborated the story.

Of course the fact that Sarah had filed a DMCA claim against a website that hosted a copy of the chat logs didn't help his-her case. The logs themselves are easily attainable.

A conversation about pedophilia

[00:29] <Sarah> did you just imply I'm not female :roll:
[00:29] <Smokey> i have no clue what i implied, or if i implied anything
[00:30] <Sarah> wait I'll revise it
[00:30] <Sarah> I'm a submissive male to female transsexual pedophile that's fond of ageplay and penisgirls that really misses Alice ;-;;
[00:30] <Sarah> I'll see her in about a month ;-;

Photo Credit: Brietbart; This is just a small sampling of the chat logs.

With all that's been said about Sarah Nyberg, this is a good time to discuss the possible impact that the social justice movement could have on pedophiles. In the last couple of years there have been efforts by the APA to de-stigmatize pedophilia, defining it as disorder in the DSM-V.

Pedophilia is now classified under the category of paraphilic disorders; with these types of disorders a person must: A) feel personal distress about their about their sexual interest, and B) their sexual desire involves the harm of others or inability or unwillingness of an individual. The first prong in that definition is key to understanding the DSM's definition of pedaphillic disorder. That in iself would indicate there is a level of self awareness and desire for some pedophiles to exercise control over their impulses and desires.

I would, however, also note that there are pedophiles who don't quite fall under that definition. Based on the chat logs, Sarah seems to feel no personal distress about the sexual attraction to his-her cousin. In fact, Nyberg believes that pedophilia is a sexual orientation rather than a disorder.

Keeping in mind that the chat logs are 10 years old, it is unknown if Sarah Nyberg feels any kind of personal distress about his-her attraction to children. If not, I would argue that Sarah is more dangerous than the kind of pedophile that is described in the DSM.

Will SJWs Support Pedophiles?

The idea that SJWs could support pedophiles isn't all that far fetched. If they subscribe to idea that pedophilia is an orientation than we can expect a big push in pedophile rights within the next 10 to 20 years. While the idea of a pedophile advocacy groups is hardly new (see MBLA), the widespread acceptance of pedophiles is something that society should prepare for.

Such a movement would have to mirror the LGBT movement in order to gain traction. While it may seem that such a movement would never take off, there were many people who said that about gay marriage 10 to 15 years ago.

This is not going to be an easy subject to grapple with. There are a great deal of moral questions, both legal and ethical, to take into account. While at least here in the United States, people can expect certain civil liberties to be protected under the law, do these protections undermine public safety?

It is also nearly impossible to discuss this topic without discussing age of consent laws. Age of consent is its own topic with numerous grey areas, but it will come up as long as the people entertain the idea of pedophilia acceptance.

As someone who could be fathering kids within the next 10 years, I would not want them to live in a world where pedophilia is accepted by the masses. To know there is a boundary of acceptance that people won't cross gives me some sense of optimism. Of course this scenario is what I would describe as the bottom of the slippery slope.

A few parting words

As for the people who have supported Nicolas "Sarah Butts" Nyberg: Chris Kluwe, Jay Allen, Margret Pless, Randi Harper, Kathrine Cross, Tauriq Moosa, Dan Olsen, David S. Gallant, Veerender Jubbal and Arthur Chu, if Sarah Nyberg has harmed any children, including her cousin, or any other children in the past, present, and future, I hope that weighs on your conscience.

Read More: Why Gamergate Could Be A Turning Point In The Culture War

Robert Conway
Robert is a former Reaxxion writer.

The Migrant Crisis Exposes The Hypocrisy Of The European Union And Croatian Government

September 19, 2015 | by John Fisher | Link | Original Link

With the morning news on September 18th announcing that the Croatian housing, transport and feeding capacities had been hopelessly overwhelmed by over 15,000 refugees (plus an unknown number of those that crossed without any registration), Croatia woke up and found itself in a crisis of massive proportions.

To give you some sense of scale, Croatia is ready to provide care and shelter to just 4,000 refugees at any single time, and in comparison to its population and GDP, it it in the same situation as Germany would be if it suddenly took in half a million people. However, in order to understand the situation in Croatia better, some background is needed.

Who are the migrants?

The Migrants are former residents of various countries in the Middle East, Africa and Asia, and mostly hail from Syria. The other most sizable groups are Afghan, Pakistani and Eritrean. Most migrants are arriving from Syria for the simple reason that the country is enveloped in a civil war and people are fleeing the destruction and war crimes.

However, keep in mind that being Syrian both increases sympathy and raises the chance of being granted asylum and other forms of aid, and since many countries (such as Germany, Austria and Sweden) consider any identification process "racist," there is a powerful motivation among the migrants to declare themselves as Syrian, leading to the ballooning of that nationality.

We have seen the same in Croatia, where Mr. Shoukry, a Syrian dentist who had immigrated legally decades ago and is now serving as an interpreter, told the media that "most of these migrants are not from Syria, and many do not even speak Arabic. Actually, from what I can see, Syrians are the minority."

A similar example can be seen in this tragicomic story from Sweden, where an obviously adult Afghan man has been housed in a Swedish orphanage along with 12-year old girls, simply because the government thinks that age determination by teeth examination is "racist" and "xenophobic":

What could possibly go wrong?

There is a sense of karmic justice in having an overwhelming swarm of migrants appear at Croatia's doorstep; Croatia has been one among the many USA-NATO puppets who openly financed and armed the infamous ISIS (sorry, "moderate Syrian rebels"). Together with supporting color revolutions around the world, one does not need to look far to see how Croatia is generally being aligned with strong foreign interests and social justice movements stemming from the EU, NATO and USA, and bears direct responsibility for the Syrian bloodshed, as well as the responsibility for dealing with the fallout in the form of refugees.

For that reason, and as urged by its only alternative political party Živi zid (The Living Wall), Croatia should immediately leave the NATO.

Migrants in Croatia and the brainwashing of the Croatian people

Because the ruling political party, SDP (Croatian social-democrats) and its chief and prime minister Zoran Milanović, are merely puppets of Angela Merkel who has invited unlimited numbers of migrants into the EU unconditionally, Croatian institutions and media have began a powerful propaganda campaign about the "refugees" and the need to help them. For example, any news reports about the migrants are led by images like this:

However, as clearly supported by stats from border and police agencies, most (70%) of the migrants are single adult males. Vivid descriptions of "pregnant women falling down exhausted" and "children screaming" are used to drum up public sympathy, in direct contrast to the actual situation on the ground, which can be seen in this video:

https://www.facebook.com/priznajem.HRVATsam/videos/885134608234304/

Attentive readers will notice that I am referring to the incoming people as "migrants," not "refugees." This is because, as thoroughly ignored by the media, most of them are ordinary economic migrants.

As noted before, there is a civil war in Syria that is contributing to the migrant crisis, but it is clear that most migrants actually come from countries in which not a single war condition exists. Furthermore, most "refugees"behave in ways that are not expected all from people who are truly fleeing destruction and killing. For example, here are a few incidents in the entire sea of incidents that have been recorded among the migrants so far:

- Throwing away and destroying donated clothing, food and drink
- Insisting that they be granted asylum only in the richest and most generous country in the world, Norway, and absolutely nowhere else

- On the way towards Austria, Germany and Sweden, there are at least 10 peaceful countries where “refugees” could easily stop and settle. Only two out of these countries (Turkey and Lebanon) are already overflowing with immigrants; countries like Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, Armenia, Serbia and Croatia are all available and capable of settling many.
- This is further reinforced by the fact that, out of 15,000 registered migrants in Croatia, only one ‘refugee’ has requested asylum from that country so far, which represents a staggeringly low 0.006%.
- Armed robbery of a supermarket in Germany
- Destruction of housing and shelter provided to the migrants, even high-end shelter such as in 3-star hotels

Hotel ‘Porin’ in the Dugave area of Zagreb, currently being devastated by the migrants. A news reporter was hit by a brick thrown from the hotel and almost killed.

- Refusing to be identified

Now, dear readers, your mileage may vary, but if I were on the run from slaughter, rape and destruction, I would be very grateful to anyone who gave me shelter and would never attack my own hosts, throw away their gifts or demand to be placed here or there.

My recommendation is that all countries, Croatia included, strictly monitor these people and do not hesitate to throw out anyone who is not appreciative of their efforts. That, however, leads us to the most shameful point of all:

The shameful campaign to liken illegal economic migrants to historical Croatian emigrants and refugees

A common argument heard in the Croatian media is perhaps the most insidious one: “Croatians used to emigrate a lot during the Yugoslav years (2nd half of 20th century), and many Croatian refugees fled during the Croatian War of Independence (1991-1995).” We were treated kindly, so we owe it to the Syrians and others to help them out.

Sadly, there is no similarity at all between these two cases. Croatian economic migrants in the Yugoslav era were all legal migrants, patiently applying for work visas, green cards, and residence permits, instead of just jumping the fence into Germany, USA, Australia or any other place. While residing in these countries, they worked hard and respected local laws, and had a reputation as skilled and devoted workers who caused zero trouble.

Furthermore, Croatian war refugees also didn’t insult, attack or steal from their hosts all around Europe. They were appreciative of whatever aid was provided to them, often waiting out the war in ramshackle conditions that would make Germany’s ‘refugee housing’ look like a 5-star hotel.

If the Croatian people, either economic migrants or war refugees, had been behaving like in the picture provided above, they would have been universally condemned as ungrateful barbarians, and would not have been welcome anywhere.

Some people seem to have issue with this picture, believing the “€1000” remark to be “overblown.” As hard as it might be to believe, not only is it NOT overblown, but it is actually pretty tame. Read on:

> Under the new rules, which will come into effect from September, an asylum seeker without children will receive 5,945 kroner (797 euros, $882) per month in benefits, almost half the 10,849 kroner (1470 euros) they receive currently.

As a reaction to this measure, migrants have been avoiding Denmark in favor of Sweden, both by not crossing its territory, or by crossing it but refusing to step outside their transport in order to avoid the terrible fate of accidentally being registered in a country with less than €1000 per month social support.

Now, dear readers, I don’t know about you, but as an ordinary Croatian person, I would love to live in Denmark even without any social support!

Why have the migrants chosen Croatia as their route?

Previously, the migrants used to make their way to Western Europe through Hungary. However, Hungary is led by Victor Orban, an independent politician who is not a puppet of foreign powers and who cares about his people.

In contrast to this, the Croatian Prime Minister Zoran Milanović is a puppet of the European Union as well as a fanatical SJW on his own, and has opened the country's gates to an uncontrollable migrant wave, justifying it with empty catchphrases like "these are people, not sacks of cabbages" (while ruthlessly allowing banks to foreclose people's only homes) and claimed that "Croatia would offer every refugee a job" (in a country with a staggering 17.5% unemployment rate).

Zoran Milanović, the ultimate Croatian cuckold

Zoran Milanović is simply following the leadership of his overlords, the German Chancellor Angela Merkel, and the European Commission president Jean-Claude Juncker, who have similarly invited hordes of migrants into their countries unconditionally, completely ignoring the wishes of the people they represent and silencing any opposition to their crazed goals.

Further media censorship and media misrepresentation

All major Croatian media (Jutarnji list, Večernji list, Nova TV, T-Portal, RTL…) are engaged in a relentless campaign to silence any complaints about the unbearable number of migrants and the immense hypocrisy of a government that feeds tens of thousands of migrants while letting tens of thousands of its citizens starve in the streets.

The media are behaving in a way that can only be likened to the state propaganda apparatus of the USSR, reporting only on carefully selected events and mixing in heavy political bias. Here are just some examples:

> Unhappy with the situation, a group of migrants broke through the police cordon and started walking on the railway tracks. The police managed to block them off again and return them to the train station, but they are still nervous and there's no telling how long the situation will be under control.

Sure, the issue is not the migrants being uncivilized, ungrateful and spoiled, no, the issue is that they're "nervous." Great job by Jutarnji list!

This same fanatically left newspaper ran an editorial saying that "the worst thing about the refugee crisis was that it was going to be used as ammunition for the right and far-right parties and boost their ratings". Absolutely, I can think of no bigger problem right now.

> Everyone was professional and kind to the immigrants," said the Nova TV reporter Andrija Jarak. "There were a few incidents where policemen had to use force and carry out arrests, but certainly that was caused by exhaustion.

Yeah, the policemen weren't attacked because the migrants have zero respect for law and order, but because of "exhaustion." Very objective report by Nova TV.

Regarding other countries, the media has also been busy slandering Hungary, Czech Republic and Slovakia (all countries that protected their borders and did not bow to EU pressure) as neo-Nazi strongholds and primitive barbarians. They even trotted out the example of Hungarian refugees in Austria in 1956, despite these migrants being (the same as Croatian ones) peaceful, respectful, and subjected to many harsh regulations that they had to follow in their host countries.

The reasonable idea – that every European country should take in as many migrants as they want, but only through their own independent decisions, within their own borders, and with the insistence that the migrants respect its customs and aid – has not been mentioned a single time in the Croatian media. The curtain of censorship is very thick, and very few people dare risking being blasted as racists and xenophobes.

Even if no migrant settles here, the migrant crisis is devastating Croatia

The country with an unemployment rate of 17.5% and where 21% of the population lives in poverty, cannot afford to have tens of thousands of migrants roaming through its most fertile regions and causing havoc and crime. The entire area of eastern Croatia is paralyzed, with traffic slow or blocked, international traffic completely cut off, agriculture has stopped and children are prevented from attending schools.

Medical resources and construction machinery have been completely rerouted from the local populace, which has suffered devastating floods last year, to serve the incoming migrants.

How to respond

For recklessly inviting an uncontrolled number of migrants into an already hurting country, the Prime Minister Zoran Milanović should immediately submit his resignation. Following that, he should stand trial for high treason, same as our last Prime Minister Ivo Sanader is currently being tried for corruption. You might think that the phrase "high treason" is a bit harsh, but the articles 135-141 of the Croatian Penal Law are quite clear:

> High Treason; punishment shall be applied to… whomever prevents the laws of the Republic of Croatia from functioning in an area… whomever introduces a > foreign system of government, or who leads the country into a state of submission or dependence towards any other state… whomever initiates an incident hazardous to the public and causing personal insecurity to citizens.

I am strongly urging the Croatian government to immediately close the border and to make any further acceptance of illegal migrants dependent on the will of the Croatian people, and subject to harsh oversight and possible deportation in the case of violations of local laws.

Read More: 16 Tips For Having Sex With Croatian Girls

John Fisher
John Fisher, locally known as "the sexist pig of the Balkans", is the author of a popular Croatian blog , for which he has received over a hundred of letters of thanks from both genders. His recently published book, "Umijeće Igre" ("The Art of Game)", is a comprehensive game manual for the ex-Yugoslavia area readers. Other than game, John likes writing fiction, cooking, dancing and origami. He speaks three languages.

Bristol Palin’s Second Pregnancy Proves That The American Dream Has Died

September 19, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

After the birth of her first child, Bristol Palin became a highly remunerated public speaker, especially on motherhood, teens holding off on sex, and pregnancy. Before too long, she was bringing in up to $30,000 a speech. At the time she was otherwise working in a physician’s office, which raises serious doubts as to what experience and expertise audiences were forking out for.

Now everyone’s favorite abstinence raconteur is well into another pregnancy (is a further tilt on Dancing With The Stars on the horizon?). Claims by Palin that the pregnancy was “planned” coincide very nicely with a spirited defense of her actions. She’s made a fortune preaching standards she has no intention of keeping herself, after all.

In the meantime, for most Americans, hard work 1,000 times beyond Bristol Palin’s “efforts” will reap them little more than day-to-day survival for the entirety of their lives. What’s the lesson here? Being an attention whore, particularly when your parent is über-famous, is the new embodiment of the American Dream.

Lean in, girls, Bristol’s talking!

Rewarding someone whose biggest achievement is getting knocked up by letting them on Dancing With The Stars is not really conducive to stopping teen pregnancies.

It humors me, too, as it should you also, that Palin was courted by “women’s groups” to accost rostrums across America. A bizarre proclivity exists, whereby some woman, by virtue of having a vagina and some extremely weird experiences (usually linked to intense family privilege and reckless, self-inflicted consequences that create IQ-depleting headlines), is treated like some sort of super-coach.

One generally wouldn’t pay an ex-crack addict on Main Street to speak to them about substance abuse unless that person had undergone significant and meaningful transformation (because of themselves), so why pay the scion of a very wealthy and connected political attention seeker to talk about pregnancy and motherhood?

As she read out speeches composed of words with more syllables than she’s used to, her older brother was serving in Iraq for a relative pittance. Digging latrine pits somewhere, he was not even close to earning the massive dollar signs that enabled Bristol to buy a home and then sell it for a profit by age 21.

It riles me up to say this, but at least Kim Kardashian is not prone to the level of hypocrisy of a Bristol Palin, who profited immensely (and still does) from a teen pregnancy she then encouraged thousands of other girls not to go through. Her celebrity only blossomed after this turn to “do as I say, not as I do”, which Dancing With the Stars and a treasure trove of other lucrative attention-garnering and financially stupendous exercises show.

Her biggest achievement in life is getting knocked up in a tent

Her womb is both baby-maker and money-maker.

To me, Bristol's mother, ex-Alaska Governor and Republican Vice Presidential nominee Sarah Palin, is anathema. That said, the minimum you must say about her in a positive sense is that she built up her own brand, however lobotomized it is. In defiance of this crude but self-made status, Bristol has rather openly suckled at the fame teat of her parent.

Her single most noteworthy action in life is getting knocked up in a tent. Everything else that followed, her appearances on reality television and Dancing With The Stars, plus her speaking career and God knows what else, flowed from her mother's celebrity and her own coitus meets tent escapade with a guy called Levi. This fantastical series of events has become the financial coup of a lifetime for this otherwise talentless, brain-dead waste of space.

In her 20s now, and no longer the proverbial teen mom, Bristol has endeared herself to the world by shacking up with another baby daddy, a Medal of Honor winner, and then promptly splitting with him. At least with Levi Johnston, her first sperm donor, the relationship didn't fizzle out completely until after their son was born.

If Bristol Palin had been Bristol Smith or Bristol Taylor or Bristol Noname and gotten pregnant twice to different men, she'd most likely be living in a trailer park and on welfare. The best she could probably hope for would be a turn on some MTV teen motherhood program, albeit only for the first pregnancy.

Want job and financial security? Ask Bristol

[image]
Lol.

Throughout their lifetime, millions of college-educated Americans are almost guaranteed to lose their jobs through outsourcing, hostile corporate takeovers, or automation. In one year, a professional hypocrite like Bristol Palin can earn what an engineer, lawyer, or doctor makes in ten or twenty.

And for doing what? As many categories of highly skilled and competent professionals burn themselves out and clock in the hours to pay off their mortgages and get braces for their kids, people like Bristol Palin (and this time you can add the Kardashians) own personal goldmines, purely by encouraging the regression of society through their examples of how to live and "earn."

If suffering under the oppressive heat from the bank that's financing your home (or looking over your shoulder in your work cubicle for the next round of layoffs) counts as the American Dream, then I guess it's alive and well. Should that not be the case, it's clear that Bristol Palin knows what the American fantasy is all about.

Read More: Pregnancy Is No Excuse To Be Fat And Gross

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Multicultural Narrative Is Collapsing Before Our Eyes

September 19, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

In the below video, I make the argument that the establishment is failing to keep a lid on "dangerous" ideas that oppose the narrative, and that we're in store for shameful propaganda and free speech crackdowns.

The European immigration crisis seems to have led to a tipping point. Hold on tight for the next few months.

Don't Miss: The Migrant Crisis Exposes The Hypocrisy Of The European Union And Croatian Government

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Freudian Psychology Subverted And Destroyed A Catholic Convent

September 20, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The 1960s comprised a period of great upheaval and change in the west. Two major groups that underwent significant change were the Catholic church and the field of psychology.

Psychology

Sigmund Freud's ideas of psychoanalysis were still relatively new and boundaries were being tested as his ideas became incorporated into mainstream psychology. Freud created methods of changing behavior through dialogue between patient and psychoanalyst, which included different techniques such as free association, unconscious redirection of feelings or transference, dream analysis, and various techniques of awakening the subconscious mind.

Catholic Church

The Catholic church also went through its most significant change in centuries. Vatican II, a discussion and transformation of the church that lasted from 1962 to 1965, resulted in a significant liberalization of church views and policy, including the end of Latin Mass, a change to priests facing the congregation during Mass, retiring of certain church clothing, artwork, regalia and music, a decree to open dialogue with other religions, and various decrees to the priests and laity.

The church was reacting to significant social and political changes in the aftermath of the first and second world wars, dissolution of colonies, rise of the Cold War superpowers, and the spread of industry and technology, and in 1959, Pope John XXIII convened the Council shortly after his election as pontiff.

Eliminated in Vatican II

The history of psychoanalysis and Vatican II are outside the scope of this article, but suffice it to say that both were reactions to a rapidly changing society and were attempting to solve problems facing people of the time.

The church had dominated Western religion for centuries, and was fighting the loss of believers to other religions. The church took steps to improve its image, and to be more modern and flexible. In this spirit, the Convent of the Immaculate Heart in Los Angeles, one of the largest seminaries in America, agreed to allow a group of radical psychotherapists to try a personal liberation experiment.

Encounter Workshops

Convent of the Immaculate Heart, California

The focus of the project included “weekend encounter workshops” with several hundred of the nuns, sessions of truth-telling and ice-breaking group exercises. One of the key tools in psychological control is getting someone to express secrets to you. Women use this in relationships, making the man feel comfortable so that he will open up and tell her all his secrets, weaknesses, and fears, which can later be used against him.

The Church of Scientology holds intensive sessions where the childhood and detailed sexual history of every member are probed and documented. The psychoanalysts had found a very powerful tool, and the nuns were eager to be perceived as modern, willing participants.

Carl Rogers

Carl Rogers, founder of client-centered psychology

Carl Rogers of the Education Innovation Project was the chief psychoanalyst leading the study. Rogers was one of the leading psychologists of the time, having authored “On Becoming A Person” 1961 and “Toward a Psychology of Being” with the renowned Abraham Maslow in 1962.

Rogers and Maslow received funding from the US government, especially clandestine agencies such as the Office of Naval Research. Their work was derivative of Freud’s theories, and the focus was on therapy where the client solved his own problems, with minimal interference or guidance from the analyst. This technique, known as nondirective counseling, has become very popular (see any Woody Allen movie or The Sopranos) and basically allows the patient, with very little guidance, to arrive at his own solutions and conclusions.

It was seen as a less harsh version of Freud’s clinical psychoanalysis. While much of Rogers work stands up today, and his theories were designed to help clients solve problems, not disintegrate cohesive groups, the power of his theory was about to be proven, and in 1966 the Immaculate Heart nuns were about to face a far more powerful force than any temptation they had overcome so far.

The nuns operated in a hierarchy, with a Mother Superior who unquestioningly ran the convent, and tiers of nuns who did their obligatory duties without question. During the encounter workshops, the nuns were told that they shouldn’t be reserved or shy, that they should open up, that prudence is an oversold virtue, don’t avert your eyes to the ground in piety, but to make eye contact and open up with their inner desires, feelings, and emotions.

The nuns, being people after all, and imperfect, did open up and revealed things about times of weakness, theft of drinks out of the refrigerator, secret things they had not discussed before.

Creeping Change

Innocent but not impervious

After the weekend retreats, the nuns would inevitably ponder them during the week, and slowly began questioning authority and further exploring their thoughts and decisions. One nun, Jeanne Cordova, who was sent out into Skid Row by the Mother Superior, began questioning authority and developed a bitterness for her new assignment, stating:

> They promised me monastic robes, glorious Latin liturgy, the protection of the 3 sacred vows, the peace of saints in a quiet cell, the sisterhood of a holy family. But I entered religious life the year John XXIII was taking it apart: 1966… destroying in the name of CHANGE, my dreams. Delete Latin ritual. Dump the habit. Damn holy obedience. Send nuns and priests out into the REAL world. If I had wanted the real world, I'd have stayed in it.

Taboo Temptations

And then of course, the most taboo topic of all, the analysts tapped into the nuns' repressed sexual energy. The nuns were assumedly mostly if not all virgins, and many had never been kissed before. Their sexuality was something that the church confined and restrained, and was very good at doing so. However, many of the younger nuns were impressionable and curious, and the questioning of the analysts inevitably lead them to the natural human urges of the flesh.

Some of the nuns, freed by the encounter workshops, stopped wearing their habits. As nuns were no longer required to go to Mass at 6:30 AM, some of them stopped. As the ritual and framework of religious practice faded away, the sisters turned to each other for support, and inevitably, some of these relationships turned sexual.

One of the nuns kissed and seduced a classmate, and then, finding the exciting pleasures of human sexuality, while driving back from a grocery trip, leaned over and kissed the Mistress of Novices on the lips.

As Rogers explained:

> In mixed intensive workshops positive and warm, loving feelings frequently > develop between members of the encounter group and, naturally enough, these feelings sometimes occur between men and women. Inevitably, some of these feelings have a sexual component and this can be a matter of great concern to the participants and … a profound threat to their spouses.

As the church was struggling with its new modernity, it instructed the nuns to "be open to their feelings" in the encounter groups–a reasonable enough sounding instruction. However, some of these feelings were inevitably sexual, and as the order no longer prohibited certain friendships, they flourished.

Sister Mary Benjamin stated that she turned to a priest to seek council from these growing feelings, and the priest, also bewildered by the spirit of Vatican II and the changing times, refused to pass judgment and left it up to her to decide whether her actions were good or bad. When she revealed she was worried about developing a terrible crush on Eva, Eva responded "Great! Enjoy it!" A sexual relationship ensued, followed by a painful breakup, and Sister Mary then left the Catholic Church.

Within a year, over 300 nuns petitioned the Vatican to be released from their vows. One nun, Sister Genevieve, began a sexual relationship with one of the therapists named Harry, who soon divorced his wife and had the former nun move in with him. With over half the nuns gone, the remaining nuns became radical lesbian activists. The convent soon closed, and remained vacant for years until it announced in 2015 the building will be sold to Katy Perry.

Feminism Is Destruction Of Institutions

Sexual psychology was able to obliterate a group of God-fearing, pious, virginal women who wished only to help others and serve God. The feminist beliefs postulated in this experiment have been quickly spread through the rest of our society.

It is worth noting that the US federal government funded and aided this research. If a group of hundreds of nuns can be convinced to renounce their vows and become radical lesbians within only a year of exposure, is it any wonder we are living in a sea of slutted, tatted, pierced, used up, unkind, narcissistic women?

And if the pure and innocent nuns fall victim, the rest of society has no chance. Feminism and its ideas must be stopped at their root. The fight should be directed not towards the feminist herself, but to those spreading feminist ideas in media, schools, art, culture, and religion.

For more, see:

There is a Policeman Inside All of Our Heads, He Must Be Destroyed, Adam Curtis. In the 1960s, a radical group of psychotherapists challenged the influence of Freudian ideas, which lead to the creation of a new political movement that sought to create new people, free of the psychological conformity that had been implanted in people's minds by business and politics.

An encounter between psychology and religion: Humanistic psychology and the Immaculate Heart of Mary nuns, The Journal of The History of the Behavioral Sciences, Vol 41 Issue 4 Fall 2005 p 347-365.

Read More: Cardinal Raymond Leo Burke Rebukes Feminization Of Catholic Church

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Why Does Sweden Take In More Immigrants Than Other Nordic Countries?

September 20, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The worst refugee crisis since World War II continues. People are entering Europe through Italy and Greece, many of them with the goal of reaching Germany and Sweden. But why Sweden and not the other Nordic countries—Denmark, Finland, and Norway?

Sweden lets far more immigrants get residence permits than its Nordic neighbors. This is because Sweden lacks the kind of traditional nationalism that you can still find in the other countries. It has been replaced by a reverence for equality, which will give Sweden trouble if the flood of immigrants don't subside.

Differences in solidarity

Swedish Prime Minister Stefan Löfven in agreement with German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

The newspaper Svenska Dagbladet has done the math. Last year, 34,787 asylum seekers were given residence permits in Sweden. The number of permits given each year has been consistently high compared to the other countries, also if you count per capita.

Denmark has taken in relatively few refugees, between 1,500 and 2,000 per year since the middle of the 00's. In 2014, on account of the growing pressure caused by the Syrian war, the amount rose to 6,104.

Norway has accepted between 4,000 and 6,000 refugees per year since the beginning of the century. As with Denmark the number has risen lately, to 7,540 last year.

Out of the four countries compared, Finland is the worst from the migrant's perspective, generally granting 1,000 to 2,000 people asylum every year.

Pushing back

Sweden's Prime Minister Stefan Löfven and the Chancellor of Germany, Angela Merkel, are trying their best to convince the other countries in the EU to be more generous toward refugees. The union's attempts to impose quotas for every country has so far fallen flat.

Denmark, Norway, and Finland are pushing back. They want to limit the influx of refugees as much as possible with restrictive policies. For example, Denmark has cut benefits for asylum seekers by almost half, and they won't be able to bring their family members to Denmark during their first year.

The result is that more and more migrants are heading for Sweden. Right now they are moving through Denmark, with the permission of Danish authorities, to get to the promised land up north. Syrians, who make up a large portion of the migrants, receive a permanent residence permit in Sweden since 2013.

Three big reasons

So why is there such a difference in migration policy between the Nordic countries? According to Marie Demker, a political science professor, there are three big reasons for why Sweden differs from the rest: lack of classical nationalism, long experience of immigration, and party political consensus.

> The Swedish nationalism is not of the same character as in the other countries. We take pride in democracy, equality and civil rights. In for example Denmark and Norway there is a more regular nationalism which refer to the people, the history and the culture.

About the party political consensus on the immigration issue, Marie Demker tells Svenska Dagbladet:

> There has never been a fight between the Social Democratic Party and the leading right-wing party. There has been an agreement on these issues. They > have agreed on the need for regulation, and the need for immigration.

The road to hell…

Marie Demker is spot on in her description of Sweden and what Swedes hold as the greatest virtues in society. If a classical nationalism was mainstream here at some point in history, it has by now been relegated to the far right.

Today Swedes value democracy, civil rights, and equality. But their country has been formed by nearly a century of socialist politics and propaganda. And in socialism, democracy and civil rights come second to equality.

When socialists and most Swedes talk about equality, they mean equality of outcome. Whatever a person does with his life, he has the right to get as much as every other guy in the end.

While it's fair that everyone should have the same opportunities from the start, it's anything but fair that they end up equal. But socialist ideology has made Swedes blind to this obvious fact. They have been taught self-denial and self-hatred.

To give away your hard-earned wealth to someone else means you have to deny yourself—your needs and desires must matter less than the next person's. And self-denial becomes a lot easier if you hate yourself.

Too many choices

Migrants on their way to Sweden through Denmark.

A great illustration of this point is a column in Svenska Dagbladet (9/12) by Karin Thunberg. The title is, "The latest weeks have changed the perspective."

She says that the picture of the dead boy washed up on a beach has made people more engaged in the refugee crisis, and want to help in some way.

> But close behind creeps the shame over everything that us privileged so easily take for granted. Just to have a home that we don't risk needing to leave head > over heels.

She is ashamed of herself for having more than others, completely disregarding the hard work that her ancestors and she herself did to put her in that “privileged” position. She calls it “absurd” that she has so many alternatives to choose—she can’t even pick from a menu at a fancy restaurant anymore.

> Starter, main course and dessert, or main course and dessert—or maybe just main course? […] I haven’t eating anything yet but I’m already tired to death from all of these choices that I neither can enjoy nor exploit because they are—too much.

Here we see the self-denial at work. Although she has every reason and opportunity to enjoy her life, she can’t do it if the options she has aren’t available to everyone else. Her pleasure turns into self-hatred as she’s sipping expensive wine, contemplating how unjust it is that others are sipping salt water at the bottom of the Mediterranean—“the world is still deaply unfair”.

> The most decisive thing in a human’s life is not negotiable: Like where in the world we are born. Who we get as parents. If we have a chance to survive even our childhood, reach adulthood.

She thus ends her column by going full socialist: We can’t do anything about our lives. They are fixed from the start, and you can’t change it no matter how hard you work. She hasn’t earned her wealth and prosperity, and poor people never deserve their poverty.

Some are privileged and some are not. Naturally the discrepancy has to be evened out to make the world fair. The rich must therefore give, and the poor have every right to take.

Easing the guilt.

Testing times

To view equality of outcome as the ultimate good becomes a problem when great numbers of poor refugees cross the border into your society.

As immigrants are people too, with the same human value as Swedish citizens, they also have a right to be equal. The logical conclusion is that immigrants must be equally wealthy as Swedes. When more and more refugees are asking for help, Sweden's altruistic morality, and its economy, is put to the test.

Christ himself would have been astonished by the level of self-sacrifice displayed by the Swedes. But they don't believe in him anymore. Instead they put their faith in socialism. For the original sin of white privilege, they will never cease to repent.

Read More: Freedom Of Speech Is Dying In Sweden

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

If Black Lives Matter, Blacks Need To Stop Killing Each Other

September 21, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The biggest violent threat to African-American communities is neither the "white" police (for example, the Baltimore officer allegedly most responsible for Freddie Gray's death was black) nor white people in general. It is blacks themselves. Of all the blacks killed in the United States over the last 35 years, only a fraction have been killed by law enforcement and a small minority by the broader white population.

The numbers may be "large" for these two categories of white-on-black crime (America has 320 million inhabitants) but they are spectacularly dwarfed by the rate at which blacks will shoot, stab, and otherwise maim each other.

93% of murdered blacks between 1980 and 2008 were murdered by fellow blacks. More recently, the proportion was 91%. Even Politifact, which interprets "facts" according to a leftist agenda, rated Rudy Giuliani's referencing of the 1980-2008 statistics (when he criticized last year's Ferguson riots) as "Mostly True," adding the very nitpicking technicality that blacks mostly live amongst fellow blacks. This also suggests that whites would be killed in greater numbers by blacks if neighborhoods were more racially assimilated.

Or, in other words, people will kill each other in the context they find themselves in, undermining, again, the mantra that a purported white shooter and shot black (or the reverse) is always a case of racist hate.

Victimhood depends on the gender or race of the parties involved

[image]
The tragic death of homeless man James Boyd over illegal camping allegations received, surprisingly, some ample coverage by the media. It still accounted for very little compared to Eric Garner's death. The reason? Race.

The white-on-black crime hysteria has much in common with the vitriol surrounding feminism and alleged crimes against women. Tears may flow from families but outrage is thoroughly muted, especially from the likes of the NAACP, when a black child is murdered in an area like South Central Chicago.

Why? Because the probable offender is almost guaranteed to be black, like the victim. That hypothetical black child (actually far from hypothetical if you watch the news) lying dead on the streets of urban Illinois is afforded not even an iota of the attention given to a Michael Brown, whose shooting death, albeit heart-wrenching for his relatives, was reported by many black witnesses as being a case of Officer Darren Wilson acting in clear self-defense.

I personally regard the death of African-American Eric Garner in New York as a police homicide. The facts are different in kind from those surrounding Michael Brown. Garner may well have been behaving illegally but the response from law enforcement was excessive and, in the end, fatal. That said, it is very selective to highlight Garner's death at the expense of deaths like that of James Boyd.

I chose Boyd, who was white and homeless, because his plight, dying at the hands of Albuquerque police, did receive some wide media attention. It simply paled in comparison, however, to that provided to Garner, which cannot simply be explained by the video recording of Garner's gruesome suffocation or the fact that police involved with Boyd's shooting have been put on trial.

Both were accused of "minor" crimes at the times of their deaths, with Boyd allegedly camping illegally due to his homelessness and Garner supposedly selling untaxed cigarettes.

Based on the media and popular airing of the story we can safely say Boyd is a victim, but only at the bottom of a victim's monument, whereas Garner is at the apex. Why? And God help your regular black-on-white, white-on-white or black-on-black homicide victim, who might be extremely fortunate to make the six o'clock news.

When will the "Black Lives Matter" movement go after black shooters and not Bernie Sanders?

Politically cuckolded liberal-socialist Bernie Sanders

It is conceivable that within the next ten years or so, SJWs will start to continually and explicitly blame whites for every trigger pulled by an African-American on another African-American. Right now, this allocation of direct responsibility to Caucasians is more implicit, brought up in conversations about slavery, Jim Crow and a twisting of the original civil rights movement (the actual civil rights of the 1960s, not the opportunism of a Sharpton or Jackson today).

Other mechanisms for apportioning blame includes "white privilege," which tendentiously groups together the likes of affluent Mitt Romney and Donald Trump with greatly impoverished Scots-Irish white Americans in two of America's poorest states, Mississippi and Alabama.

Meanwhile, aside from the occasional (excellent) Samuel L. Jackson video, which doesn't even mention African-Americans specifically, few are interested in perceiving black people, most notably young black men, as free agents, whatever influences may be around them.

The convenient segue is to focus on the less than 1% of black deaths caused by police, which includes a great many instances of self-defense and needing to protect the public. When the "hate the police" narrative temporarily runs out of steam, one can always confront Bernie Sanders, the "Black Lives Matter" movement's lackey, and accuse him of some sort of thoughtcrime for "not doing things right."

Will those really interested in black lives please stand up?

[image]
"Gangsta" rap's glorification of violence has probably killed many times more people than all police shootings, justified and unjustified, combined.

You do not cure cancer that has metastasized throughout most of the body by treating, say, only one's left hand. So if the rate of black deaths is an issue without any equivalent, which is already doubtful when other racial deaths are being calculatedly quarantined from the underlying discussion, a holistic approach to combating violence is what will matter and pay dividends. A politicized method designed to please a Rachel Dolezal or Louis Farrakhan only serves to divide, antagonize, and hide the facts.

Beleaguered liberals like Bernie Sanders and ex-Maryland Governor and Presidential candidate Martin O'Malley, who was booed for saying "All Lives Matter", suddenly sense that the putrid corn syrup they and their leftwing colleagues have been feeding to the African-American community and SJWs for years is now being vomited up on them. For sanity's sake, the only choice is to confront the festering wound of black-on-black crime.

No parent, boyfriend or girlfriend, spouse, child or friend deserves to have their loved ones taking from them in a homicide. Yet what a homicide is seems to change daily, according to the wishes of those pursuing their own agendas. Worse still is how a black death is only really considered a death by SJWs if a white or the "system" is behind it.

The majority of black deaths are thus deemed irrelevant by the same folks claiming black lives matter. How typical.

Read More: Why Do You Care If Black Guys Like Fat White Girls?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Interview With An Accomplished World Traveler On Life And Travel

September 21, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I was able to catch up recently with James Maverick, who readers may know also goes by the name of Maverick Traveler. I had interviewed him some time ago to explore his general ideas on travel and life. I consider him one of the few truly accomplished travelers out there.

Since then, he's published The Sovereign Man and The Way of the Maverick, and continues to turn out thought-provoking work on his blog. One gets the sense that his mind is always pondering the implications and nuances of the "stranger in a strange land" motif, and this makes for fascinating reading.

We had done a voice-to-voice interview since his last appearance here at Return of Kings. I finally was able to track him down (not an easy task) in Barcelona, in between his jaunts to Eastern Europe. Let's see what he has to tell us.

QC: You've been in Europe for a long time now. If I'm right, you've been in Barcelona for over a year, right? How has that been?

JM: Thankfully, it's been much less, around 4 months. I don't think I can live in Barcelona for a whole year (chuckling).

For me, Barcelona is a fantastic getaway from the cold and dreary Eastern Europe. The city is simply gorgeous, has fantastic sunny weather and awesome food.

However, I think the problem with Barcelona is that it's just too organized, too predictable, too modern—plus it's overrun by tourists pretty much all year. For a "Latin" and southern European city, it's nowhere near as friendly as any Latin American city.

When it comes to women, Spanish women are cute and sexy, but aren't exactly easy, especially to fly-by-night foreigners. So, if you're a single guy, do yourself a favor and do not come to Barcelona. Go find yourself a girlfriend in Eastern Europe and then come with her to Barcelona. Oh, and I had plenty of time to finish my second book.

QC: You've written about a fascinating subject, which you call the "strategically lazy mindset." Can you give us a quick breakdown of what that is?

JM: Strategically lazy means that you only expend energy where you'll have the highest ROI (return on investment). People tend to downplay laziness, but I think if you use it correctly, it can become a virtue, almost like a weapon.

The core idea is instead of chasing and convincing people to do stuff, you simply show up and announce your intent to do something. That can be asking out a girl or starting a new project. Then you step back, relax, and see if there are any takers.

If not, then you need to do something else or with someone else. This forces you to always look at reality from an objective viewpoint instead of trying to fit everyone and everything into your notion of what reality should be.

QC: How did you come up with this concept?

JM: I learned it the hard way. All my life I've been chasing people and things that simply didn't want to be chased. I started projects that failed because no one cared. I chased women who played games, but weren't genuinely interested.

After lots and lots of failures, I decided to step back and reexamine my strategy. I realized that I needed to be more nonchalant about my behavior; I needed to let people come to me and then go from there.

This is something I also noticed about other guys; they're extremely needy and chase the wrong things: money, women, etc. That never ends well. This is a topic that I explore in depth in my first book, The Sovereign Man.

QC: You've written a recent article on your site about guys who become "slaves" to the game. When did you first become aware of this concept?

JM: I became aware of this as a result of becoming a slave myself. You see, for the past eight years, I've been traveling around the world and trying to pickup women. I've done the whole "numbers game." I've toughened up against the inevitable rejections (and there are always lots of them). But no matter how much I rationalized my behavior, I was never fully content and satisfied.

Then it hit me that instead of using this skill (meeting women) to enrich me and make me a better and more capable man, what actually occurred was the reverse: I became a slave to game. That needed to stop.

Ultimately, I realized that there has to be something more to life than endless approaching. I've been spending lots of time lately trying to connect the dots.

QC: I liked reading your recent article about how every man should live in Eastern Europe at least once. Roosh has been telling me the same thing. I'm beginning to feel left out. But I got the sense that some of your Balkan travels didn't live up to expectation. Am I right?

JM: Eastern Europe is a barren, depressing and unforgiving place. The weather sucks nine months out of the year. The winters are brutally cold. The people aren't very friendly, at least until they get to know you better. There isn't much customer service and hand-holding. If you combine that with rotting Soviet-era buildings everywhere, it's very easy to feel down. Think of it as America but without all the bullshit, hand-holding, the fake smiles and confusing dating rules.

The flipside of all this is that it toughens you up because you're no longer dealing with the soft cushion, the fake and superficial veneer that we experience in the West. It makes you more assertive and resourceful. I can say for a fact that it had a positive effect me. Other guys that have lived in Eastern Europe all mention the same thing.

On the bright side, dating and relationships are relatively straightforward. Women play less games. You can actually connect with them emotionally because every conversation doesn't resemble a televised debate.

Balkans is a bit different. I refer to it as "Eastern Europe Plus": The tough Eastern European mentality with nicer weather, tastier food and friendlier people. Belgrade is one of my favorite cities in the region because it's cheap, compact and has a certain charm. I always feel extremely comfortable in Belgrade.

QC: As far as I know, you haven't written about Asia or traveled there. Any plans for that in the future?

JM: I've been to Taiwan and Thailand around ten years ago. Asia has never been on my radar for any kind of exploring or long-term living; I much prefer Latin America and Europe. I think it's because there are either guys who dig Asia and guys who don't really care much about it. I'm in the latter camp.

Though, I have a good friend who goes to Asia often. He goes there every month and always has an amazing time. He brings back tons of amazing stories. His experiences have piqued my curiosity, so I might check out the region sometime in the future.

QC: How do you see yourself having changed when compared with two years ago, if at all?

JM: Great question. For one, my traveling pace has greatly slowed down. I no longer do any kind of backpacking or even carry a backpack; I travel with a medium-size suitcase, which is much more convenient. I'm also much more interested in renting a place for 3-6 months instead of bouncing around different cities and countries.

The biggest change is that I'm also less interested in meaningless relationships. I don't really have any desire to have random one-night stands or spend lots of nights in bars or clubs. They take away the time that can be used for more productive means: working and building your empire. Building a business takes lots of time and it's almost impossible to do when you're chasing women seven nights a week.

QC: I've noticed that you generally avoid subjects like religion and the possibility of marriage. Do you have any thoughts on those subjects you'd like to share?

JM: It's funny you ask this because for the past week I've been penning a long article about the qualities that you should look for in a wife. It's a complete detour from my regular content with deals with traveling and self-improvement, so I'm very curious how it will be received. It should be out this week.

What marriage and religion have in common is that both are extremely polarizing. Religion is polarizing because it's religion. And marriage is polarizing because in the manosphere it's being treated as religion.

Many guys are doggedly against marriage. They think it's a trap. They think that their ex-wife will take all their money and fuck them over. There are also guys who are interested in getting married and want to settle down with a nice girl. Then there are the guys in between who aren't sure what they want in life.

I think it's important to find a nice balance instead of viewing something as black and white. That's why I do what I do: elucidate other men on the way of the maverick.

QC: I agree with you that a man shouldn't box himself in to any rigid conception of life. As we grow and develop, we just don't know where life will take us.

JM: Yes, very much so.

QC: All right, man. I really appreciate your taking the time to talk to us here. We'll have to hit you up again soon.

JM: Sounds good to me, man.

Read More: Why Wrestling Is The Most Masculine Sport

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Date Better Than Just 4s And 5s

September 21, 2015 | by Sponsored Post | Link | Original Link

---

The following article is sponsored by Troy Francis and written by Donovan Sharpe.

You're in the checkout line at the grocery store and standing in front of you is beautiful, long haired girl with a tight body and a pretty face. Your loins tell you that you'd like to get to know her on a carnal level, but for some reason you don't so much as say hi to her. She pays for her groceries, leaves, and with her departure there goes another opportunity by the wayside.

Every single day men everywhere encounter pretty girls but are deathly afraid of making conversation with them, or even making any sort of extended eye contact.

Why is this?

Mindset.

Most people are familiar with the aphorism "mind over matter" which applies to many different aspects of a man's life, namely approaching, talking to, sleeping with, and dating beautiful women. The bottom line is that if you aren't right upstairs, you're not going to fuck the kind of women you want to fuck. Period.

"The Glass Ceiling" as Troy Francis calls it, is exactly what separates men who regularly date high quality girls, and men who do not. Most men out there simply do not have the balls to strike up conversation with the apple-assed, yoga pants stretching blonde at the coffees shop or at the gym.

So how long have you been squatting?

Why not? Because society tells them they're too old, too young, too fat, too ugly, too poor, too bald, etc. The truth is, we've all been conditioned through advertising and the media to believe that women require certain "things" to be attracted to men—namely money, fame, height, or underwear model looks.

This is all complete bullshit.

The "PUA" community, though much maligned over the last decade and a half, has collectively and definitively proved that "having it all" has very little to do with attracting good looking girls, if at all.

If he can do this, so can you

Sure, feather boas, pick up lines, and parlor tricks had their run (albeit short-lived) but any man who employs these ridiculous and outdated techniques on today's woman is setting himself up for epic failure and embarrassment.

By the same token just "being himself" isn't going to cut it either. A man in today's world can have decent looks, a great job, and a winning personality but even that isn't enough to gain the affections of the attractive women he desires.

Hence, his need to learn some form of game and most importantly the mental aspect of game.

Regardless of how prepared you think you may be before hitting the town with your crew, you are bound to fall flat on your face when talking to attractive women if your mind isn't right—wardrobe, physical fitness, and hygiene be damned.

Doesn't mean shit if you're not solid between the ears

So how do you forge your mind into a bullet proof mechanism impervious to the potential of rejection?

For the first time ever, Troy Francis will be conducting a free workshop on how to develop a rock solid mentality that will make you absolutely fearless when approaching, talking to, and number closing beautiful girls.

Some of the valuable information you'll learn includes the principle of defiance which gives societal expectations the finger and allows you to focus on what makes you awesome and how to project that to high SMV women; approach anxiety, why it exists, and how to crush it; and ignoring the chatter by not bowing to the pressure from others and concentrating on what you want.

Francis will even share his personal story about his journey to the realization that he already had the fundamentals in place to sleep with beautiful women around the world and how he was able to bring them out to become the 10 year game veteran he is today.

There will even be a Q&A session toward the end where you will have the opportunity to have your questions answered live by Troy Francis himself.

Questions answered LIVE

That's just the tip of the iceberg, gentlemen. There's a shitload more you're going to get out of this and the end of this workshop you will not only realize that you are entitled to the highest quality pussy out there no matter who you are or what your perceived "deficiencies" are, you're going to conduct yourself as such which, incidentally enough, is immensely attractive to the opposite sex.

Aside from the unbelievable material you'll get and learn the best part about this is that IT IS ABSOLUTELY FREE. PLUS you'll get a copy of Troy's texting guide at no charge! There are no excuses not to sign up. You owe it to yourself to take full advantage of these field tested, actionable skills you can put into action this weekend and dramatically increase your results with hot girls.

[image]
Talk to her with no fear

Do not make the mistake of letting this rare opportunity pass you by.

Now if you want to keep banging 4s and 5s or worse, jerking off to porn all weekend, and not having fulfilling relationships with beautiful women, then by all means, don't sign up. That's just more pussy for the rest of us.

But for those of you want to know how to develop your mindset to the point where you have no fear or hesitation walking right up to that hot, large breasted brunette and boldly introduce yourself without a care in the world, then do yourself a favor and sign up for this free, life-changing workshop.

You're welcome.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

35 Pretty Girls Who Became Fat And Ugly

September 22, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It is a fact that thin girls destroy their beauty after substantial weight gain. The “beauty at every size” concept is a feminist fantasy that enables women to overeat and look unattractive without feeling guilt and shame. While I don’t believe in aggressively bullying women, I hope that the women below realize that they looked healthier and prettier when they had a normal human figure. There is no reason to present the worst version of yourself to the world.

Warning: the images you are about to see are deeply upsetting.

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

8.

9.

10.

11.

12.

13.

14.

15.

16.

17.

18.

19.

20.

21.

22.

23.

24.

25.

26.

27.

28.

29.

[image]

[image]

30.

[image]

[image]

31.

[image]

32.

[image]

33.

[image]

34.

[image]

[image]

35.

[image]

If you are like me, you must be devastated at how easily beauty can be taken away from the world. Number twelve especially broke my heart. This is the saddest article I've ever had to publish.

[image]If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Most of the images were sourced from the Fit To Fat subreddit.

Read Next: 10 Tell-Tale Signs She's A Secret Internet Fatty

[image]
Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Did Texas Bigots Persecute Islamic Inventor Ahmed Mohamed?

September 22, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) specialize in creating faux rage incidents to further their agenda. This usually involves selecting an "injustice" and targeting the source of the "injustice." The firing of renowned scientist Tim Hunt was a good example of faux rage. The supposed injustice was Hunt's alleged chauvinistic comments. It didn't matter that Hunt was merely joking. The SJWs were not satisfied until the man lost his job.

The latest faux rage incident involves a 14-year-old Texas boy named Ahmed Mohamed. The story is that Ahmed "invented" a clock in a small suitcase. It doesn't sound like the clock was associated with a school assignment—Ahmed indicated that he just wanted to impress a teacher.

According to the New York Times, Ahmed took his clock to an engineering teacher who said it was nice, but advised him to not show it to any other teachers. Later, the clock alarm went off during English class. The teacher mistakenly thought the "invention" could be a bomb. The police were called and they arrested the boy.

According to the local ABC affiliate, WFAA:

> Officers said Ahmed was being "passive aggressive" in his answers to their questions, and didn't have a "reasonable answer" as to what he was doing with the case. Investigators said the student told them that it was just a clock that he was messing around with. "We attempted to question the juvenile about what it was and he would simply only say it was a clock. He didn't offer any explanation > as to what it was for, why he created this device, why he brought it to school," said James McLellan, Irving Police.

After an investigation proved that the device was indeed a clock and not a bomb, police released Ahmed.

But that is not the end of the story. The Council of American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) got involved and claimed that the incident represented a case of religious and racial discrimination. CAIR spokesperson Alia Salem said: "I think this wouldn't even be a question if his name wasn't Ahmed Mohamed."

The Outpouring of Sympathy

The SJWs became completely unhinged, even by leftoid standards, in response to the alleged racism of the incident. The media, major corporations, MIT, and even President Obama gullibly swallowed the narrative supplied by CAIR without bothering to investigate the whether the details were true.

Chanda Prescod-Weinstein, an astrophysicist with MIT and someone who should have shown a bit more skepticism, invited Ahmed to tour the MIT campus. She added, "You [Ahmed] are the kind of student we want at places like MIT and Harvard."

Microsoft provided a box of expensive goodies. Judging by the picture, the goodies include a $999 3D printer and a $968 Surface Pro 3 bundle:

Mark Zuckerberg invited Ahmed to visit the Facebook campus:

Google invited him to be part of their science fair:

Twitter invited the Islamic Tesla to intern for them:

The President tweeted "Cool clock, Ahmed. Want to bring it to the White House? We should inspire more kids like you to like science. It's what makes America great."

Even Monica Lewinsky's boyfriend's wife got into the act:

A Sorry Invention

While the mainstream media and other big name players accepted the narrative that little

Ahmed was a victim of the horrible Christian bigots in Texas, people on social media and alternate news outlets were more skeptical.

The nature of Ahmed's "invention" triggered the most skepticism. Even a casual glance at the device shows that it doesn't really look like a clock. Rather, it looks like someone was trying to make a device that looked like a bomb—at least the kind of bomb that we are familiar with from the movies.

It gets worse. Some people have taken the trouble to reverse engineer the "invention" and it appears that the only thing Ahmed did was take a Radio Shack clock from the 1980s, remove it from its case, and reassemble it in a pencil box. Here is the difficult work that Ahmed had to do:

In other words, this was not really an invention at all—and therefore not something that anyone could be particularly proud of. Was Ahmed really trying to show of the brilliance of his clock? Or was he trying deliberately to cause a media sensation?

A Controversial Father

The case for it being a deliberate attempt to cause media sensation is strengthened when you consider that Ahmed's father, Mohamed Elhassan Mohamed, has a history courting controversy.

In 2011, the Washington Post described the father as:

> [A] native of the Sudan who is now an American citizen, likes to call himself a sheik. He wears a cleric's flowing white robes and claims hundreds of followers throughout Egypt, Sudan and in the United States. But he is unknown as a scholar or holy man in the state he has called home for two decades. Religious leaders in Texas say they have never heard of Elhassan, including the imam at the mosque where he worships.

Elhassan is a political activist who has run for President in Sudan twice. He also participated in a mock trial of the Koran staged by crackpot Florida pastor Terry Jones. The mock trial ended with the Koran being found guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced to be burned.

Jones performed the controversial burning. When asked why he would participate in the stupid mock trial, Elhassan said that he saw it as an opportunity to take his children to Disney World.

When you combine the facts that the clock was a dubious invention with Elhassan's status as a known provocateur, it becomes hard to believe that this was just a case of an innocent Muslim genius who "invented" a clock. If you throw in the fact that the Council of American-Islamic Relations was involved almost immediately, it becomes more likely that this was intended to be a media hoax from its inception.

SJWs unhappy that people are questioning the "invention"

"Acknowledge Creativity, #IStandWithAhmed" Shirt reads "Don't judge me because of my color."

As you may have guessed, the SJWs are not pleased that people have begun to question the Ahmed's story. It goes against their narrative that all Muslims are peace-loving inventors while Christians are ignorant, mouth-breathing, knuckle-dragging racist bigots.

This is shown by the fact that the leading progressive think-tank, Think Progress, took time out to accuse people who are questioning Ahmed's story as being guilty of "smearing" the boy.

Why should SJWs care?

The real question is why would anyone want to construct a narrative that white American Christian troglodytes are unjustly persecuting Muslims? I can think of a few reasons:

It's part of the bigger narrative. The larger narrative is that Americans are the most oppressive people on the planet. Americans have oppressed blacks (through slavery and Jim Crow laws), Japanese (through WWII internment), Chinese (through discriminatory laws), and Hispanics (I don't know how). Thus, Americans need to be punished and replaced with better people.

It serves to rehabilitate Islam. Muslims get a bad rap in the US because most of the terrorist acts perpetrated in the last 20 years have been Islamic in origin. If you can show that Muslims actually provide a positive contribution, it improves Islam's image. Bonus points if you imply that Christians are bigots while doing it.

It divides Americans. It is no secret that the Democratic Party gets its votes in part through fanning the flames of racial discord. If Black Americans and Muslim Americans feel that the white majority is persecuting them, they are more likely to vote for Hillary.

It will make the next terrorist attack easier. Whether this was an intended goal or not, this incident will facilitate future terrorist attacks. The next time a Muslim student brings what looks like a bomb to school, the teacher who discovers the device will need to make a decision: Should he call the police and risk being publicly shamed as a racist xenophobic shitlord? Or should he suppress his natural fear and hope that it is just another example of Islamic inventive genius?

Conclusion

Ahmed's clock represents a partial victory for sane people. We were able to successfully question the narrative supplied by the SJWs. I say it is a partial victory because the debunking of the incident was only done by alternate news outlets, bloggers, and by people on social media. However, most people will never hear about the details of story.

For them, the narrative remains—a bunch of stupid Texans persecuted a little Muslim boy for inventing a clock.

Read More: Terrible Mother Who Took Her Kids To Syria Now Wants To Leave

Islamic State

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Saudi Arabia Wants To Help Outbreed Non-Muslims By Building 200 Mosques In Germany

September 23, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Refusing to take in his own brother Arabs, the newly crowned King Salman of Saudi Arabia has offered to build 200 mosques in Germany for the latter's new "migrants." For years, Saudi Arabia has blatantly refused to accept any public profession of the Christian or Jewish faiths. It also readily clamps down on the practice of allegedly deviant forms of Islam, including the minority Shia denomination.

With the Saudis as the migrants' magnanimous spiritual benefactors and the self-hating German government housing them, what could possibly go wrong?

The offer by Saudi Arabia to fund mosques in Germany is part of a calculated political and religious mission to keep Saudi Arabia purely Islamic, while exporting Islam to infidel countries in Europe. Riyadh is well aware that from Israel to England, Muslim populations continually outbreed reproductively stagnant indigenous Westerners.

By offloading its co-Muslims to Germany and other self-euthanizing societies, the Saudi Kingdom avoids importing Syrian and other Arabs less amenable to their historical narrative of divine rule and can increase its significant influence in expatriate Muslim communities abroad.

It does not matter that the German government has rejected the proposal of Salman. They have already, for years on end, done the work that should have fallen squarely on the shoulders of Middle Eastern leaders: dealing with their own regional problems and hatreds, rather than passing them onto Europe.

Thanks to its plain ludicrous admission of anyone and everyone, fueled by an illogical guilt complex because of what some people did between 1933 and 1945, Germany has built the equivalent of 2,000 mosques, not 200, to make itself feel better and exorcise the long non-existent spirit of Hitler.

SJWs will defend the protection of every local culture except Western ones

The late Saudi King Abdullah attended multiple inter-faith dialogues, including this one with the former Pope Benedict. Funny how a Saudi monarch can talk about tolerance when they have all excluded wholesale the practice of non-Muslim religions and other Islamic denominations.

Detractors will again allege that ROK is sponsoring xenophobia by criticizing the migrant invasion of Europe. And, again, they will structure their so-called arguments so that inconvenient truths like Saudi Arabia and a menagerie of other grossly xenophobic and racist countries are cordoned off from any and all discussion.

For decades, Middle Eastern states have had opportunities to correct their political and social climates of dictatorial rule, religious exclusion, arbitrary administration of "justice" and other maladies. The problem is that many of these intolerant views are actually espoused by large sections of the people, many of whom claim to flee oppression but simultaneously believe in their own form of it.

The simplification of the SJW narrative knows no bounds. It's very easy for Western do-gooders to paint a blatantly anti-Western portrait without ever touching on the non-Western reasons why asylum seeker influxes into Europe occur. If we look at Saudi Arabia, just one of many local examples, it has created its own massive stream of refugees from Yemen, streams it refuses to take any responsibility for.

This year Saudi forces have indiscriminately shelled and air-raided civilian areas in Yemen. Yemeni rebels pose an intrinsic threat to the stability of the Saudi regime, which could be unseated by the sort of mass rebellions seen in its smaller neighbor. It is exactly this sort of appalling behavior, using non-combatants as pawns, that leads to Middle Eastern crises in the first place.

The Middle East is a fireplace of self-immolation

These don't look like Syrians to me, but such a distinction is never raised by SJWs. Salient events like the Syrian Civil War are only conjured up to increase further the flow of migrants, whatever their origins.

The Middle East is, to put it bluntly, full of basket case regimes and poor excuses for civil societies. Admittedly, many are dictatorships. But if you topple one dictatorship and replace it with another, or with a democracy, do you really think a real civil society will blossom? In Iraq's "democracy," even before the onset of ISIS, a Shia-majority electorate only had the effect of isolating and even punishing the large Sunni Arab and Kurdish minorities.

As I will explain in an upcoming article about the need for Europe to take almost exclusively Christian refugees from the Middle East, the overthrow of the Mubarak regime by Islamists and then the overthrow of the Islamists by the military have done nothing to improve the plight of the country's many persecuted Coptic Christians. Regime change matters very little in the present Middle East because any substituted set of elites that take power are not fundamentally different from those that they threw out.

Nazi Germany occurred more recently than much of the rather benign European mandate system which oversaw the Middle East from the time of Napoleon until the 1940s. So why is the Middle East's self-immolation suddenly Europe's problem and one which should be solved by resorting to "the white man's burden" and its corollaries?

There is zero causality in terms of Europe being obligated to take in people better suited for other countries because European nations did x, y or z in the past. Arabs and Muslims killed each other or minority groups much less in the past than today. The barbarity of local individuals and groups is to blame, not historical European colonialism.

Why is the social engineering of “intolerant” countries reserved for over-tolerant Western states?

Before the CURRENT migrant crisis, Chancellor Merkel said multiculturalism had “failed.” Why the change of tune?

This paradox is never addressed. SJWs rally in the streets to yell “Refugees welcome!” (forgetting to investigate whether many are indeed legitimate refugees) and sit idly by as opportunity after opportunity arises for them to actually try and make the world better. And making the world better involves expecting and enforcing just 2% of the tolerance found in the West in the countries that call Western states xenophobic or Islamophobic.

Due to the population explosion within Middle Eastern societies, the acceptance of hundreds of thousands of migrants into Europe does nothing to combat the systems and mindsets in the Middle East itself that enable and propel such emigration in the first place. Meanwhile, European societies are expected to bend over backwards as their communities, already shellshocked from one-way demographic change over decades, suffer the additional burden of housing, clothing and feeding large cities’ worth of migrants in a period of sustained continental economic recession. Where is the similar support for Ukraine and Greece?

It’s easy to see nowadays how an average German can feel like a peasant. Whether King Salman, Chancellor Angela Merkel or someone else, a monarch, hereditary or elected, is trying to shove something down the throat of them or their country.

And usually it’s something bad.

Read More: Germany Is A Social Graveyard

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Key To Success With Women? Controlling Your Emotions

September 23, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

When a man gets into game it is natural that his first concern is with the emotions of the women with whom he interacts. You spit a bad line on your approach and she's angry. You tease her too hard and she gets upset. Or you settle into a relationship but she is jealous and you fight.

In all of these cases the primary concern is the manner in which she reacts to whatever you're doing. "If I could only change the way she feels," the man thinks, reasonably enough, "Then all will be well." But regardless of what you want from your relations this is the wrong way of looking at it. For a man to get good with women it is his own emotions that need to be controlled first, not hers.

Fear

The most common emotion that men encounter in cold approach pick up is fear — that and anxiety, shame, and sometimes even depression. This, as we all know, is rooted in what we call "approach anxiety." You spend hours reading tips on pick-up on forums and websites and then when you steel yourself to actually try it you might get rejected rudely or simply snubbed.

For obvious reasons this creates a negative spiral of bad feelings. You have put yourself on the line in the most fundamental way and your looks, height, style, demeanour or alpha status or some combination of all of them are found lacking. The cruel smack of the sexual marketplace has shattered whatever ego protection you built up beforehand.

It is little wonder that many men tiptoe over the line into approaching, only to retreat again when the going gets tough to the safety of forums where they can safely deny the efficacy of game in a mutual circle jerk that assuages nothing.

Fear of approaching thus deters many men who could have gone on to achieve success, but who instead drop out of the market prematurely, a clear example of a negative emotion having an adverse effect.

But positive emotions can equally upset one's equilibrium. The man who is on a good run in game can feel like he is flying. The effect is literally narcotic because guys who go hard can end up sleeping with a great many more women than they were designed to and certainly more than their fathers or grandfathers ever did. This releases adrenaline and endorphins into the system that can become addictive over time.

The Dark Side Of Game

Herein lies the dark side of game. The rush that follows a successful approach or close is frequently replaced with moments of meaninglessness, loneliness, and a general questioning of the whole process. If a man has simply amassed a catalogue of one night stands then as pleasurable as these may have been, he might well find himself pondering on the overall pointlessness of the whole endeavour. In this instance, it is ironically a level of success that might encourage him to quit, the ups and downs of the game proving too much for him.

As with all elements of life, an ability to marshal one's own inner resources is what is important. This is not a self-help seminar – I'm not here to give you easy mantras or to be an online cheerleader encouraging you to go out and approach. But what I would say is that it is vital that you consider the endgame every time you walk up to a girl, or get snubbed, as you undoubtedly will from time to time.

This particular approach, this particular girl doesn't matter so much in the big scheme of things. Learn to view game as a process — you come in at a certain level and spend time building a skillset which will with application lead to greater things. You shouldn't allow individual troughs to get you down too much.

If you fall into the latter camp, and are finding the highs too high and the lows too low, I would suggest that you should incorporate regular "time out" sessions into your routine. One of the most important elements in my life is the strong group of male friends that I have. We get together frequently to talk. Yes, women will come up in those conversations, but they range much wider, taking in our respective ambitions, work lives, and hopes for the future. It is the grounding influence of male friends that has helped me through the emotional ups and downs that game almost inevitably provides.

Become Grounded

It is only when you have truly mastered your own emotions that you will become the kind of man who is grounded, and as such attractive to women. Flightiness caused by untreated emotional disturbance is a major turn off for girls. If this is something you are experiencing a lot, then perhaps it is time to sit down and truly assess where you are going and what you actually want from game, and life.

While chasing women can be a lot of fun, it is no replacement for the solid foundations that immersion in meaningful work and male friendships engender. Disregard these at your peril.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why The Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need To Learn Game

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Kratom: The Ultimate Game-Changer For Your Sex Life

September 23, 2015 | by Sponsored Post | Link | Original Link

---

The following article was sponsored by Herbal Samurai

The gents here at Return of Kings are resourceful individuals and appreciate tools that enhance their lives. Ambitious men like things that make it easier for them to achieve their objectives.

An endeavour at the top of every man's list involves creating a fulfilling sex life. While being able to pick up girls and get laid when you want to is important, retaining girls as casual partners and eventually as girlfriends is just as crucial to one's overall happiness.

Kratom is one of those resources that has proven to be tremendously beneficial for building a life filled with attractive women.

What is Kratom?

For the guys who are unfamiliar with Kratom, a quick internet search will show that it is a herbal plant from Southeast Asia has been used to drastically lower anxiety, increase motivation, and uplift mood. It has also been used to increase pro-social behaviour as well as productivity.

Kratom is cheap, natural, and completely legal in most places. It's also effective in small amounts: the recommended dosage is about 2-4 grams. Users have reported minimal downsides. Kratom is classified by different 'strains' which can be used specifically for different goals.

1. Kratom Makes The Game Easier For Introverts

[image]

Since most western women are quite boring themselves, they will often gravitate toward men they perceive to be outwardly interesting and fun. A lot of naturally introverted guys sometimes feel that picking up and dating girls is easier for their more extroverted brothers. Kratom is an excellent equalizer that levels the playing field. In addition to lowering anxiety and uplifting mood, many users have found that kratom significantly increases their pro-social behaviour. It can make even a highly introverted guy more comfortable engaging with hot girls and more relaxed around them in relationships.

Recommended Strains: Red Indo, Red Maeng Da, Green Malay

2. Kratom Can Make You Better Looking

The men who have embraced red-pill beliefs know that looks matter a lot for getting laid and also for keeping women attracted to you for a long time. A lesser known benefit of kratom that several users have reported is that it can suppress appetite and promote fat loss. With lower body fat levels, abdominal muscles become visible and facial features are more defined. The result is a man that is more physically attractive and confident in his appearance.

Recommended Strains: White Maeng Da, White Indo, Green Indo

3. Kratom Makes Physical Escalation A Breeze

Most guys agree that getting physical when talking to an attractive girl is what separates the men from the boys. Being physical right away tells the girl that you are a masculine man that is looking for sex and will give her a great time. If she is looking for the same thing, you're set. Most guys are not good with physical escalation, so if you can get past the initial anxiety surrounding it you can really stand-out. Guys have noted that kratom's ability to completely eliminate anxiety has allowed them to be more dominant, aggressive, and physical with women.

Recommended Strains: Gold Indo, Red Thai, Red Bali/Kali

4. Kratom Can Help You Build A Kick-Ass Lifestyle

In addition to shattering anxiety and drastically improving mood, kratom has been used by men as an incredibly effective productivity booster. Especially at lower doses, it has stimulatory effects and can significantly improve focus. It can straight up let guys work non-stop for longer than they otherwise would have. With more hours put in on your business or career, you can achieve greater financial success. The result for many has been a lifestyle that is more conducive to retaining the hottest girls in sexual and romantic relationships.

Recommended Strains: White Maeng Da, Red Maeng Da, White Indo

5. Kratom Can Make Sex Awesome

One of the best ways to keep girls around is to be great in bed. Tons of guys have found that kratom is amazing for sex. It makes sex a lot more fun, which can help you get out of your head and instead focus on fucking her like an animal. She will enjoy sex with you more. Another universal finding is kratom's ability to let guys last way longer in bed before climaxing. The combination of both of these benefits create incredible sex for girls and keep them around for a long time.

Recommended Strains: Gold Indo, Red Indo, Red/Green Mix

Where To Get Kratom?

Kratom can be a true game-changer for so many guys, but only if it is high quality kratom. To get the most out of kratom for your life, you need to get the best stuff.

Our friends at Herbal Samurai have the highest quality available anywhere, with clean and fresh kratom that will arrive at your door in 2-3 days. Check them out at www.herbalsamurai.com.

Kratom has been mentioned on ROK before but if you still haven't checked it out now is a great time to get on board. Men that want more out life really like kratom, and it just might be a game-changer for you too.

Disclaimer: All statements made within this article have not been evaluated by the Food and Drug Administration. This product is not intended to diagnose, treat, cure, or prevent any disease. Nothing contained in this article is medical advice. This article is written explicitly for entertainment purposes and everything written is an account of the personal experiences of individuals. Kratom is not sold for human consumption.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Why We Should Prioritize Christian Refugees From The Middle East

September 24, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

I am not a Christian but regard it as (tragically) amusing that precious little attention is paid to the declining fortunes (and numbers) of Christians in the Middle East. SJW and other "discourse" is replete with grossly exaggerated allegations of Islamophobia, whether in the context of American foreign policy debates or the purported "racism" within Western countries.

Yet the biggest existential threat to any religious group in both the Middle East and First World is actually against Christians in Arab Muslim-majority lands. Because countries like Saudi Arabia have official policies banning the free and open practicing of Judaism and Christianity, or prosecute intense de facto discrimination that ignores any constitutional or other legal lip service to "tolerance," almost every Muslim Syrian or other Islamic refugee should be resettled in the Arabian heartlands.

There are far fewer places where Christians are welcomed in the world, so the West should prioritize their resettlement above all other groups.

The sad religious demographics of Iraq

How many Arab regimes in 2015 will elevate a Catholic like Tariq Aziz to anything above a meaningless secretarial position?

Ironically, the best friend of Iraq's Christian community was Saddam Hussein. Although he definitely murdered his direct political opponents and many members of non-Sunni Arab groups, such as the Shias and Kurds, whom he found troublesome, his religious tolerance was far and away better than that now endorsed by many elements of Iraqi society (and that's not including ISIS).

One of Saddam's chief lieutenants, Tariq Aziz, who served as both Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, was a Chaldean Catholic, a group which has links with the regular Roman Catholic Church.

Iraq's Christian population prior to the 2003 American-led invasion was probably around 1.5 million, somewhere between 5 and 10% of citizens. It was estimated at 200,000-400,000 in the middle of 2014, before further waves of ISIS massacres and repressions which killed thousands and forced many of the rest to flee across or simply out of the country.

Certainly tens of thousands of Sunnis, Shias, and Kurds have died during this time, but none of these groups is facing any kind of physical or cultural extinction. That cannot be said of Iraq's Christians.

Considering that the once dominant Sunni Arab population, which constitutes about 30% of Iraq's population, is feeling sidelined by the Shia majority, the situation is even worse for Iraqi Christians, who have insignificant support from the major political blocs. These blocs are run primarily on ethnic and religious lines, not as broad parties endorsing non-sectional ideologies.

The plight of Christians in other countries

[image]

The restoration of a theoretically secular regime in Egypt has not brought it out of the doldrums when it comes to religious intolerance against Christians.

Lebanon, which has the largest proportion of Christians in the Middle East, is still limping from its years of civil war and more recent examples of sectarian tensions and bloodshed. Muslim sects in the country may have "rallied" together to condemn national and regional violence against Christians, but the writing is very unambiguously on the wall.

Like in most countries, Muslim birthrates are much higher (and their populations younger) and Christians, with their greater representation in commerce and other arenas, are less inclined to engage themselves in Christian equivalents of martial religious political parties like Hezbollah.

Nominally "secular" Egypt, whose military deposed Islamist President Mohammed Morsi, remains a hotbed of anti-Christian sentiment, irrespective of the Coptic Orthodox minority living there being relatively large. The Pew Research Center has noted a strong continuity in anti-Christian attacks between the days of Morsi and the subsequent military takeover.

Egypt's place as the Arab world's most populous country makes such a state of affairs especially shocking. One need not go to Saudi Arabia or the other more traditionally religious Persian Gulf regimes of Qatar, Bahrain, or the United Arab Emirates to find either state-sponsored religious repression or prolific street-level bigotry.

This is not meant to be an exhaustive account by any stretch, but the Palestinian Christians also deserve some recognition. They number less than 2.5% of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza today, most likely around 1%, but in 1920 were 10% of the local Arab population. Today, more than 10% of all Palestinians, those within Palestine or outside it, are professed Christians. The extent to which they are not welcome or feel like foreigners in their ancestral lands is a microcosm of the isolation and pain felt by Christians across the Middle East.

Middle Eastern Christians are victims of Western political correctness

Don’t expect photographs like these to be disseminated about Middle Eastern Christian families, who face oppression regardless of whether there’s war or peace.

Western elites and SJWs will play the Islamophobia and race card at every opportunity. It is fine to defame their own societies, which are by and large thoroughly tolerant, if not over-tolerant. Nevertheless, they will never dare take the logical and moral step, in the interests of true tolerance, of challenging why the Middle East is becoming more and more inhospitable for Christians.

Many may hate their governments in the Middle East. This should not, however, be confused with a renunciation of anti-Christian bigotry by many of these disaffected citizens. They are not mutually exclusive positions.

Already despising the traditionalism associated with Christianity in the West, SJWs and others feel there is no political capital to be gained from responding to the needs of a much more systematically oppressed Middle Eastern Christian community. In the meantime, diplomatic and other channels that could utilized on behalf of these Christians are ignored to advance realpolitik with local Arab regimes.

Should you hear the words “humanitarianism” and “tolerance” when the topic of Middle Eastern refugees or asylum seekers comes up, you can bet your bottom dollar that both are being applied unevenly, without Christians in mind.

Read More: Could The Islamic State Reorder The Middle East?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Pimping Techniques From The 1930’s Have Become Required In Modern Relationships

September 24, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Pimp is a memoir by Iceberg Slim, a black man who became a pimp in the United States during the 1930’s. He shares his background of what led up to his pimp life along with stories that took place during his career. While the book contains many useful tips on how to handle women, I wouldn’t call it a pimp manual. Instead, it shines a light on how degenerate modern relationships have become.

The pimp game is essentially seeking out girls with low self-worth who crave an exciting lifestyle. These two factors cause them to fall quickly for a pimp with flashy aesthetics, smooth style, and tight verbal game. After a pimp’s successful seduction, he pushes his new whore onto the streets to earn money for him. Most girls that pimps pursue already worked as a prostitute or decided beforehand to become a prostitute, for reasons that someone raised in a traditional household wouldn’t be able to understand. There is actually very little “turning out” a girl (making a girl go from normal Jane to a streetwalker).

Modern game is a light version of the pimp game, and shares many strategies with what pimps of old used to do. If you read this book, you'll have many moments where you think, "Hey, I do that!" Women now voluntarily seek out and prefer the behavior of men who share qualities possessed by old-time pimps.

> As I walked away I bombed her. I said, "Bitch, I'm splitting when I come out of that crapper. I know your pussy is jumping for me. I know you want me for your man. Some lucky bitch is going to steal me from you. You better toss that bullshit out of your mind . Get straight Bitch, and tell me like it is on my way out. You had your chance. After tonight you don't have any."

Most of the slang in the book is outdated so you'll have to consult with the glossary often.

> What had the pimps in the joint said: "You gotta back up from them fabulous pussys. You gotta make like you don't have a swipe [penis]. You gotta keep your mind on the scratch [money]."
>
> […]
>
> I kicked her rear end until my leg cramped. Through it all she just moaned and sobbed. I was soaked in sweat. Panting, I lay on the bear-skin beside her. I thrust my mouth against her ear. In an icy whisper I said, "Bitch, do I have to kill you to make you my whore? Get up and give me that scratch."
>
> […]
>
> The pimp's in the joint had said, "There ain't nothing more important than what makes a new bitch tick and why. You gotta scrape her brain. Find out whether the first joker who layed her was her father or who. Make her tell you her life story. "If she can remember back in her mammy's ass, good! Fit all the pieces together. Maybe then you'll know if she's a two-day package or a two-year package. Don't try to play 'em in the dark. Quiz 'em into a crack up if you have to . Wake 'em up from a dead sleep. Check the answers you got with what you get."

Pimps made sure their whores weren't talking to other pimps, and would threaten them with ass-kickings if they did. The modern game tactic of being confident of your value and never being jealous is sound in theory, but when there are 10,000 other high value men scratching at your girl's door (i.e. smartphone), you'll eventually lose her like how pimps eventually lose all the whores in their stable.

Self-control is one of the most important traits of a pimp. They deliberately control their mental state and horniness. They can't let a whore show he's weak for the pussy because then she knows that she can control him. Sound familiar?

> "I told you once, do I have to tell you a thousand times? Greenass Nigger, to be a good pimp, you gotta be icy, cold like the inside of a dead-whore's pussy. Now if you a bitch, a sissy, or something let me know. I'll put you in drag and you can whore for me. Stay outta my face Nigger, until you freeze up and stop that > sucker grinning."

>
> […]
>
> A good pimp is always really alone. You gotta always be a puzzle, a mystery to them. That's how you hold a whore. Don't get sour. Tell them something new and confusing every day. You can hold 'em as long as you can do it.
>
> […]
>
> Pimping ain't no sex game. It's a skull [mind] game.
>
> […]
>
> "A pimp is the loneliest bastard on Earth. He's gotta know his whores. He can't let them know him. He's gotta be God all the way."

Lines that worked back then would probably be called corny today, but the technique behind them is still applicable.

> She said, "I don't drink and besides I don't know you."
>
> I said , "You met me in your first hot dream, remember? You know that pretty joker in your little girl dreams that always faded when you woke up wet between the legs. You waited and wished. "You lucky bitch, I've stepped out of your dreams. I'm alive and real across the hall from you. Get over here, I'm gonna turn you on .

A pimp lays down ironclad rules and his whore must follow them, or else face the consequences.

> "Now that young bitch you got is gone lazy. She's stuffing on you. That bitch ain't sick. I ain't never seen a bitch under twenty that could get sick. Your whore is bullshitting. A whore's scratch ain't never longer than a pimp's cold game. You gotta have strict rules for a whore. She's gotta respect you to hump her heart out in the street. One whore ain't got but one pussy and one jib. You got to get what there is in her fast as you can. You gotta get sixteen hours a day outta her. There ain't no guarantee you going to keep any bitch for long. The name of the pimp game is 'Cop and Blow.'"

Pimps used social proof on their own whores.

> Take that scratch and drive to one of the whore towns close around. Go to Western Union. Send that scratch back to yourself at your hotel. Use some broad's name as the sender. "That lazy bitch you got will think she's got competition. Watch the sparks fly from her ass. She'll try to top that bitch that doesn't exist."

Some cities offered better whores than others. A pimp had to be open to re-locating.

> Detroit was the promised land for pimps all right. The town was teeming with young fast whores. The local pimps were soft competition. I was walking , but I > was sharp as a Harlem sissy. Anyway, these whores were a different breed than the ones back in the city. They were gullible, and a fellow didn't have to play his heart out to cop them.

Take your whore out of her comfort zone.

> Control is easier and tighter away from the familiar setting. A girl in strange surroundings depends more on her man. She needs his advice and guidance more. Girls copped in smaller towns have to be moved fast.

And here is an example of a false disqualification on a girl who eventually was added to his stable.

> "My whores are humping sixteen hours a day in the street. They love it. I don't figure you got the guts and heart for the street track. Chris, for the rest of my life I'll be sad when I think of you. I'll have a lump in my throat when I think of what might have been. Take this saw buck, baby, and the best of luck always. Goodbye, Chris. Please split before I get weak and let you be my whore." I reached across her and opened the car door. My skull was hitting on all hundred-and-seventy-five cylinders. I was cinching her.

Since no whore will stay in your stable for long, you want to extract the most amount of money from her in the shortest amount of time. Today, guys extract the most amount of sex from a girl before she gets bored and moves on to the next guy.

> "Slim, a pretty Nigger bitch and a white whore are just alike. They both will get in a stable to wreck it. They'll leave the pimp on his ass with no whore. You gotta make 'em hump hard and fast. Stick 'em for long scratch quick. Slim, pimping ain't no game of love. Prat 'em and keep your swipe outta 'em. Any sucker who believes a whore loves him shouldn't a fell outta his mammy's ass."

One passage that caught my attention is a whore doing her pimp's laundry. Did any of the last five girls you fuck do your laundry?

> She got up and gathered up an armful of our soiled clothing. She went into the bathroom. I heard the water sloshing in the bowl. She was doing our laundry.

What the Western cultural elite has done with feminism and the sexual revolution is "liberate" women to pursue exciting men who use the same type of game black pimps used nearly 100 years ago. Take a look at Fifty Shades Of Grey, one of the best selling books of all time. It's essentially a white man using pimp game to dominate and control a girl's mind. The movie would easily hold true if you put Iceberg Slim into the character of Christian Grey after changing the dialogue to match his street slang.

In Iceberg Slim's day, a normal woman with a stable family could not be turned out—only a girl who has already succumbed to vice would even allow him to approach her. But now we have an entire generation of women who are so broken that they race to an app like Tinder with the hope that a good looking pimp with smooth text game will turn them on for a fleeting sexual encounter. The moral defenses of women have been so destroyed by modern feminism that they mainly respond to men who use a form of game that pimps used not long ago, and this behavior is glorified in all mainstream television, books, and movies that are coming out of Hollywood and New York City.

Even worse, the whores in this book are more feminine and pleasing than what we have today. Yes, you would likely be happier dating a 1930's ex-prostitute than an entitled "strong and independent" modern woman. There was only one incident in the book about a woman resorting to violence, which I can personally top with my stay in Montreal and other encounters in Washington DC where drunk women threatened to physically attack me. The amount of affection that whores gave to Iceberg Slim appears more than modern women are able to give today. Not only do we have to simulate pimp game to get laid, but we're doing it on women who are of lower quality that actual prostitutes of old.

If you don't believe me, here are some pictures of prostitutes before 1970. If they were placed in modern times, they'd easily be the top 10% among all women in terms of beauty, thinness, femininity, and class.

© NYC Dept of Records

© NYC Dept of Records

10·14·41
56470

You know things are bad when a reformed prostitute from last century could be a better girlfriend than one you meet at a nightclub this weekend.

The downside of pimping is that you have to scheme every day and keep the pimp mask on. You can never trust a woman. You have to constantly keep your game tight. These problems are nearly identical with modern game.

Pimping also aged the author quickly:

> In a pimp's life, yesterday means nothing. It's how you are doing today. A pimp's fame is as fleeting as an icicle under a blow-torch. The young fine whores are wild to hump for a pimp in the chips. A pimp in bad shape can't get the time of day from them.
>
> […]
>
> Drugs and the pimp game had hardened away my baby face. My hair was thinning. I was turning twenty-eight but I looked forty.
>
> […]
>
> At almost forty I was ancient as a pimp. I looked like a black, fat seal in my expensive threads. For the first time in many years I had rediscovered my appetite for good food. I was slowing down. I spent most of my time reading in bed. The end of my pimping career wasn't far in the future.

Not surprisingly, the author goes into a life of sales afterwards, which uses many of the same skills as pimping. My only complaint of the book is that the author fancied himself to be a writer, so he goes overboard on the descriptions instead of telling the actual story.

While there was nothing in the book that was new to me from a technique standpoint, it was a vivid reminder of how broken gender relations in 2015 have become. We've essentially normalized pimp-whore relationships to become the defacto standard for non-married individuals. Men have to learn a variant of negro pimp game to get a girl sexually excited and women are encouraged to empower themselves by having casual sex with guys who turn them on for the short term.

Black pimping coincided with the fall of the black nuclear family, so we can safely assume that the introduction of “pimp mating” in white people won’t bode well for their societies.

Read More: “Pimp: The Story Of My Life” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Social Justice Is Satanic And We Need Religion To Defeat It

September 25, 2015 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

A small group of fanatics has risen. They are so extreme, so dangerous, and so removed from reality that the entire Western world is at stake.

These fanatics claim to be above religion. But it is important to realize that they are not devoid of religion. The feminists who are social engineering Western civilization into oblivion may not profess a personable God, but they are more religious than anyone. It will therefore take religion to overcome them. You cannot sit idly on the sidelines. It takes a belief system to overcome them.

Early Man's Struggle Against Social Justice

The top priority for social justice is to destroy the authority of men. Actually, this is nothing new. Since the dawn of developed man, fanatic minorities have sought to destroy personal liberty and dictate an "equal" society.

The Egyptians said there was the way of Thoth or the "way downward." Early Christians taught that there was the way of life which opposed the way of death. With each religion, belief falls into one of two categories, right or wrong. Each time, theology was tailored to counter the flawed human philosophy of social justice.

Yet all the successful religions turned out to be remarkably similar, indicating that the same flawed philosophy crops up time and time again.

Many people don't know that ancient Babylon was proudly feminist. Elite women held prominent positions of power and built huge monuments of themselves. Babylonian women received education, did business, rented apartments, administrated in the temple, owned property, and even got alimony.

Divorce settlements "could require husbands to compensate ex-wives" if he initiated the divorce. Wealthy women frequently went after men who did not pay up, even ordering their lawyers to acquire slave boys to wash their feet:

> "Women wrote many letters about the support men were legally obligated to send them, especially letters of complaint when the rations were not received, were insufficient, or were of poor quality or spoiled. One woman wrote a letter complaining about the quality of the sesame oil she had received and told her agent to be present when they were extracting the oil to make sure she got the best quality… One woman asked for a slave girl to grind her flour and a slave boy to wash her feet." (Elisabeth Tetlow, Women, Crime and Punishment…")

We imagine that the ancient world was primitive and superstitious, but social justice was actually more popular in ancient times than it is now. The Athenian lawmaker Solon personified his social justice reforms, as quoted in the book Social Justice in the Ancient World:

> "[Social justice] shackles those who are without justice… checks insatiability, and blackens hubris."
>
> "They are wealthy, swayed by deeds without justice, and not caring at all about sacred or public property… they do not heed the holy institutions of justice." (Solon fr. 4:32-36, 7-16)
>
> "…when the base decide to behave with hubris, and when they ruin the community and render judgments in favor of things without justice for the sake of profits and for the sake of power, do not expect that city to be peaceful for long… when the base decide on these things, namely, profits entailing public damage." (Theognis 39-52)

The "holy institutions of justice" in late Egypt and Babylon "motivated the high moral status of women" and established "legal equality between men and women."

Social Justice Opposes True Religion

In Babylon's holy institution of social justice, evil was symbolized by Tiamat, the goddess of motherhood and beauty. Just as feminists despise the motherhood role of women today, they concocted this character Tiamat, as "a mother who put her children's well-being before her own."

Tiamat was brutally killed by a shining hero named Marduk. Marduk did away with the old conservative ways and issued in progressivism. He altered the natural universe into a new order, and enslaved Tiamat's followers, which symbolized mankind. He then took a partner named Sarpanit, synonymous with Ishtar, the goddess of sex and prostitution.

In the Epic of Gilgamesh, the divine princess Ishtar gets her daddy to take revenge on Gilgamesh for refusing her sexual advances, and he ends up losing eternal life. Babylon was a feminist dream.

It is not by coincidence that Hebrew and Christian theology is a polar opposite of this myth. In their theology, motherhood and family is not evil, but is celebrated. The "woman in the wilderness" is taken care of by God and symbolizes the church. Marduk is not the hero, but is the villain Lucifer, whose plan to enslave mankind fails.

Study carefully the devil in the bible and you will find an oppressive dictator who seeks universal equality. The Hebrew religion subverted the progressivism in Babylon with its own theology of personal liberty and responsibility.

Ezekiel spoke harshly against those who supported Babylon. "And the Babylonians came to her into the bed of love, and they defiled her with their whoredom, and she was polluted with them." (Ezek 23:17) He compared these supporters to sexually addicted young whores, and upbraided young women who traveled to Babylon to be part of the flashy new culture. These apostates denied the patriarchal authority of the prophets, and they sought a code of social justice that focused on the worldly.

Patriarchy Is Social Justice's Main Target

Fast-forward to 20th century Socialism. Radical politicians mandated laws that they said empowered women, but which really destroyed the family. They attacked people who were successful, destroyed personal liberty in the name of public welfare, and tore down the "hubris" of people who did not serve the needs of the community, the way they wanted.

The veneer may have looked new, but this revolutionary movement was no different than in ancient Babylon. The secret subversive efforts in Socialism created slaves, as an oppressive government dictated every area of their lives, every behavior. Billions suffered.

Look at social justice warriors today and you see the same doctrine of universal salvation. The popular motto today is "equality," but this American value has become so twisted that anyone who stands out gets pulled down to the lowest echelon. Your behavior must fall exactly in line with their strict regiment and communal ownership.

One man recently found it hard to support both Christianity and social justice causes. You can't serve two masters. So he left his church to fight against "racism, sexism, ecological devastation, human trafficking, war, corporate and governmental corruption." Interestingly, with his embrace of social justice came a profound disgust for the priesthood. He simply couldn't believe that a "prophet is infallible." The SJW movement is the church for people who reject patriarchy.

Feminists attack patriarchy because they recognize that patriarchy in religion opposes them. Patriarchy fulfills man's need to excel above the rest and take full responsibility for his triumphs and mistakes.

> "The aggression suffered by many women as a result of an unjust social and economic system is so widespread and so heavy that we often deem it better to let them find in patriarchal religion a temporary consolation for their afflictions…

> Many women end up, by reason of their need for consolation and protection, strengthening the traditional roles of priests or pastors and of patriarchal religious institutions as a whole." (Pui-lan Kwok, Hope Abundant: Third World and….)

The indoctrination and propaganda has become so loud, I don't think people have the slightest clue about men's rightful authoritative role. The truth is, men have a natural role as spiritual leaders, a role that women do not have. Paul made it very clear that the head of man is God and the head of woman is man. It is man's right to communicate to directly with God and lead as patriarch.

This is a very liberating doctrine. We don't need a coddling government or cultural celebrity to tell us how to live or what to believe, to take responsibility for our mistakes and triumphs. As men, our ability to communicate and our right as leaders is inherent. The government's role is to provide for temporal welfare, but our western government long ago crossed the line and interfered with spiritual welfare. The inevitable result is a state-religion of social justice which tears men down, making them slaves or subject to women.

Religious patriarchy is the time-tested opposition to feminism and all forms of social justice. This is why spirituality is so important for men today. Satan is every bit as real as God, and Satan's plan for the world is feminism and social justice. Satan wants a world where men get publicly shamed for lifting too many weights at the gym or hassled by the school administrator for using gendered pronouns.

These may be small points in a big scheme of things, but hell is not some deep pit with grinning demons and flaming pitchforks. Hell is a classroom with angry, androgynous teachers and a skewed grading system.

We should not consider these social justice warriors atheists, even though they claim to be atheists. Their zealousness betrays a fanatical belief system, a religious theology that follows the same pattern all the way down human history. They are best countered the way Ezekiel boldly shamed them and the way Paul laid out the natural order of priesthood.

Our greatest potential as men is realized by embracing this idea.

Read More: One Way To Defeat Your Social Anxiety

Amasa M. Lyman
Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

White Knights Demand Custody Of Child For Woman Who Plotted To Murder Eight Ex-Boyfriends

September 25, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Do reasons exist to deprive a child of his right to feel welcomed by she who gave him life. Does a stronger law exist than the law of nature?
>
> – – – La Repubblica's editorial, expressing anger at the decision to take away convicted murder plotter Martina Levato's son

Italian woman Martina Levato, serving serious jail time for plotting the murder of eight ex-boyfriends, gave birth to a son only weeks ago. In an act of mercy for a child who should probably never know his origins, the infant was taken away from Levato. Instead of a response that emphasized the common sense (and best) interests of the baby, large and powerful sections of the Italian media reacted with unrestrained outrage.

These outlets minimized the real impact on one of the ex-boyfriends, who has been horribly disfigured for life by acid, and pushed aside incontrovertible evidence that Levato and her lover, Alexander Boattcher, tried to castrate at least one other ex-boyfriend.

Although most women do not indulge in the depravity of this cretin, the support immediately rushed to her is indicative of how family courts and interest groups around the world will defend the pseudo-right of motherhood ad nauseam and to the death.

As tens of millions of fathers around the world find their visitation rights either non-existent or reduced to sperm donor-style intervals of every two to four weeks, even felons like Levato can count on people defending their purported sacred bond with their progeny. Despite having a thankfully more family-oriented culture than the United States, large numbers of Italian children are deprived of a father, not by his choice but by the family court system.

The downplaying of female responsibility at all costs

In a flipping of switches that favors anti-male domestic violence witch hunts, Levato's moral culpability has been continually doubted. Boattcher has been blamed for corrupting and controlling her.

Worse still in the Levato debacle have been the constant attempts to shift the sole moral responsibility for the murder plots and acid attack onto Alexander Boattcher. Justifiably serving 14 years in prison like Levato (though I'd argue for 100), the ex-millionaire property broker has been characterized as forcing his lover to undertake the deeds to "purify" her. Supposedly by calling her fat, telling her to lose weight, and keeping her as one of many flames, Boattcher also psychologically knocked out all her personal agency. Bummer.

The circumstances may be different, but the outcome of many child abduction cases is the same: the fleeing woman had to take the child. Defenders of Levato are taking a more indirect route to reflect how her crimes occurred before the child was born, implying that she was an automaton at the time of the acts and that somehow this means she should have regular contact with her son in prison.

The idea is to trivialize serious female crime, especially in a context that feminists and others would describe as domestic violence-oriented and misogynistic if a male ex-partner were the perpetrator. Similarly, references to the trashy sex trilogy 50 Shades of Grey are designed to make wholly macabre, sick, and sadistic behavior appear like a B-grade black comedy on cable after midnight.

What does it take for a mother to be deprived of her child compared to a father?

[image]
Alexander Boattcher called Martina Levato fat. Oh no! Now she can't be responsible for plotting to kill her ex-boyfriends! Please give the poor woman her son back!

The unequivocal answer we can give to this question is that the threshold is invariably much, much higher for mothers than fathers. A man need only have the audacity to leave his wife or anger her during the divorce, to the point where she demands sole or primary custody. Cases of severe addiction may mean the father exercises the main responsibility for his children's care, in lieu of the drug-abusing or alcoholic mother. Yet this is the default option rarely taken up by the courts.

Levato may indeed become a sacrificial lamb for the system when the adoption proceedings for her son go to court. It is inherently bad publicity to have a mother convicted over a web of crime, involving plans to murder eight ex-boyfriends, to get any sort of access to her child. The defense of her by others has nonetheless occurred and demonstrates the polar opposite of what so many parentally responsible and distinctly law-abiding fathers can expect to garner when they contest custody of their offspring.

Do women actually ever commit crimes or do they just get punished for being forced to behave in a certain way by a man?

[image]
An artist's impression of how SJWs and white knights view female criminal responsibility. Not pictured: the man allegedly controlling her.

After being released from prison for perverting the course of justice, Vicky Pryce, the ex-wife of Chris Huhne, a former British politician, claimed that most imprisoned women are there because of the men in their lives. Pryce had consciously and calculatedly taken the fall for Huhne's driving offenses and both were put behind bars for their lies. Her pretend argument, however pathetic, is of wide applicability across the world. It has a lot more in common with Martina Levato's story than you might think.

Due to the men they are with, female offenders are viewed with less animosity, held to lower standards of responsibility and regarded with certain high levels of sympathy. Just as Vicky Pryce was purportedly badgered by her then husband to take the fall for his acts behind the wheel, Levato was coaxed into what she did. Boattcher had lowered her self-esteem and directed her like a remote-controlled cockroach (yes, they exist). So, of course, a white knight would think that there's no reason to break the inviolable bond of motherhood.

A woman who planned to kill eight ex-boyfriends, disfigured one permanently with acid, and attempted to cleave off the genitals of another can be an equally competent mother as anyone else, right?

Read More: Spoiled Girls And White Knights Demand Men Shield Women From Traffic

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Oregon State Government Bankrupts Bar Owner For Refusing To Serve Transsexuals

September 26, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

While the saying "so goes California, so goes the nation" might still be accurate, the neighboring People's Republic of Oregon also provides a glimpse into the dystopia that the radical left has planned for America. Recently, Portland bar owner Christopher Penner was convicted of violating Oregon's civil rights laws after he refused service to a group of transsexual customers whose presence would have hurt his business:

> The case hinged on a pair of voice-mails messages Penner left members of the Rose City T-Girls, a social club in Portland that includes transgender women, cross-dressing straight individuals, gay men and lesbians, in 2012.
>
> In the voice-mails, Penner was apologetic but admonished the group's members not to return to his bar, The P Club, because they were hurting business and because other customers had derisively referred to his establishment as a "tranny" or "gay" bar, according to court documents.

As part of the state's persecution of him, Penner had to pay $400,000 in damages to the customers he purportedly hurt, forcing him to close his bar in the process.

The hounding of Christopher Penner is yet another example of how the radical left is using the government to enforce their will on anyone who disagrees with their beliefs. Merely a decade ago, leftists agitated for gay marriage on the basis of tolerance and "it doesn't matter who you love"; in the year 2015, leftist-controlled state governments are actively persecuting anyone they believe is insufficiently supportive of the Gay Mafia.

The Death Of Freedom Of Association

As Penner's defense against the state of Oregon states, the reason he barred the Rose City T-Girls from his bar was because their presence was negatively impacting his business. Customers had begun referring to Penner's bar as a "tranny" or "gay" bar, giving it a reputation that was scaring away long-term customers and hurting his bottom line. Asking the T-Girls not to come back to his establishment was an act necessary for his survival.

Unfortunately, the left-wing Oregon state government has been vociferous in denying freedom of association to its citizens, particularly citizens who run afoul of cultural Marxist dogma. It was only a few months ago that the Christian owners of the now-closed Sweet Cakes bakery in Gresham were forced to pay $135,000 in damages to a lesbian couple to whom they refused to bake a wedding cake for. To further hammer the point home, the state government threatened to seize the bakers' home if they didn't pay up.

Freedom of association—the right to choose who you have personal or business relationships with—is one of the most fundamental rights of a free society. Christopher Penner was not discriminating against the Rose City T-Girls because he had a bias against homosexuals or transsexuals, but because their presence was scaring off his regular customers. Conversely, the Sweet Cakes bakery did not want to bake a cake for an event that their religion did not endorse (a gay marriage).

Neither the T-Girls nor the lesbian couple who tried to patronize Sweet Cakes were truly harmed by being excluded. The former could have gone to another bar and the latter to another bakery. The only reason either of them had for suing the respective businesses who shut them out was a sick, perverse desire to force themselves on people who don't want them around, and the state government is siding with them.

How This Ruling Will Kill Business In Oregon

Beyond being a freedom that is integral to American society, freedom of association is also necessary for a strong economic environment. Businesses need to be able to discriminate against undesirable, uncooperative or unruly customers in order to better serve their other patrons. With this ruling, Oregon has declared that the feeeeeelings of aggrieved minorities supersede the freedoms of business owners to control who they serve.

Without the liberty to eject undesirable customers, business in Oregon will slowly decline, as no business owner will want to invest in a state where the government can override your decisions at the whim of a mentally ill customer. As a former resident of Portland myself, I know that the city—and, to a lesser extent, the whole state—is crawling with mental defectives such as the Rose City T-Girls, itching to file lawsuits the minute a business owner displeases them.

Ultimately, the state of Oregon's attempts to enforce "tolerance" will hurt Oregonians by destroying the local economy. This is typical for the left, and it's unlikely they'll care; so long as they get their warm fuzzies from being "accepting," they don't care how many lives they ruin.

Read More: Planet Fitness Kicks A Woman Out For Refusing To Get Naked In Front Of A Man

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

How America Is Becoming A Real Life Sci-Fi Dystopia

September 26, 2015 | by Nick Lazzaro | Link | Original Link

Isaac Asimov's The Naked Sun was first published in 1957. In the second novel of his famous Robot series, Asimov crafts a rich and entertaining detective story set in a dystopian future in which humanity has colonized many worlds. Over the millennia this has resulted in planets whose cultures evolved in strange directions since breaking free of Earthly rule.

This story is set on the mysterious world of Solaria, a bizarre, isolationist, and technologically-driven society which bears a disturbing resemblance to our own.

One vision of the future

In Asimov's vision of the future, humanoid robots play large role in daily life on all worlds, taking care of many of the mundane tasks humans once performed. Detective Elijah Baley of Earth has been sent on a secret diplomatic mission to investigate the murder of a robotics expert on Solaria. Initially Baley is confused by his mission—Solaria is rumored to be the most advanced of all human worlds, why couldn't they solve a murder on their own? The reasons become clear once he arrives and gains a sense of Solarian culture.

Baley finds himself on a strange world completely dependent on robotic labor. Nearly every job in society is held by robots. In fact, Baley is amazed to discover that there are only 20,000 humans living on the entire planet. The Solarian people, through advances in medicine and genetics, have extended their lifespan to hundreds of years. Each citizen lives on a vast estate spanning hundreds of miles, with gardens, lakes and fertile fields tilled by an all-robotic workforce of roughly 10,000 to every 1 human.

The Solarians appear to have built a utopia. They want for nothing. They do not have to work. They have armies of robot servants who anticipate their every whim and up till now, their society has had no crime at all.

But for everything there is a price. The Solarian people placed far too much value on the high technologies and thought too little of its' damaging affects of human socialization.

As the centuries passed and more forms of labor were assigned to robots, Solarians became increasingly distant from one another, delegating all tasks that might require human interaction. Eventually, Solarians became completely isolated from one another. By the time of Baley's arrival, this societal evolution had reached an extreme. The Solarian people do not ever physically come into one another's presence, but rather communicate through real-time holographic projection, which they refer to as "viewing" (as opposed to "seeing"- speaking to one another in person).

The idea of physical contact horrifies the Solarians. They avoid it all costs, the only exception being to engage in sex on scheduled occasions with their spouse, assigned to them by the government to ensure the population does not die out. So great is their phobia of germs and real-life social contact that even sex is regarded as a revolting but necessary civic duty, and one that is carried out with great reluctance.

The reason for Baley's assignment suddenly becomes clear: if the Solarians live in complete isolation from one another, how could one of them have committed the murder?

The mystery that unfolds is gripping and thoroughly entertaining, but let us focus on relevant aspects of Solarian culture for the moment.

United States of Solaria

When reading the above description you probably noticed at least one or two aspects of Solarian culture comparable to our own. While America certainly has no aversion to sex, there are more similarities than differences.

Physical And Social Isolation

Take a look at the how the infrastructure of America is designed. In most parts of the world, living spaces, areas of commerce and public gathering areas are either incorporated or within walking distance of one another. The American suburb, by contrast, was designed to give each family dwelling within their own miniature estate—a separate house with its own yard, garden and driveway for a car.

Essentially an invention of the G.I. Bill for veterans of World War II, the suburbs exploded in the the late 1940s and have become the dominant method of residential development for the better part of 70 years. The majority of Americans today now live in suburbs.

Coupled with the midcentury “white flight” phenomenon, the dream of a “3 bedroom with a white picket fence” was sold as the ideal lifestyle, and the American people bought it hook, line, and sinker.

What has been the result of this? A complete breakdown of what people once took for granted: Community. Many Americans live in big McMansions with larger and larger yards, reminiscent of the grand estates of Solaria. To those living in the burbs, ask yourself: how many of your neighbors do you actually know? Probably those on either side of you, maybe the guy across the street. But it’s quite common for people to live within a hundred yards of each other for years, even decades, never knowing one another’s name.

Since the suburbs are designed in such a way that more often that not makes walking from point A to point B impractical, people are forced to own cars and to go about their day without passing one another on the street. While some suburban neighborhoods have parks, in general the infrastructure is simply not conducive to encouraging human contact.

By the time the average American arrives home from work (which again, he probably had a long commute from) he is likely to be dead tired and just wants to collapse on the couch and watch Netflix. Get up, drive to work, drive home, consume entertainment, go to sleep. Rinse, repeat. The atomization of human interaction brought on by the rise of the suburbs has destroyed the sense of community the once bonded neighborhoods and towns together.

Decline In Social Skills

Many people have noticed a precipitous decline in the last decade of basic social skills among people. This is particularly evident in the younger members of the Millennial generation, who have never experienced life as an adult in a world without smartphones and social media.

What has this done to in-person socializing? People are unable to sit through lunch with a friend, a date, or just engage a one another in friendly banter without constantly checking their phone for status updates and "likes."

In the book, Detective Baley questions a murder suspect via hologram who is dismissive and arrogant towards him. When Baley confronts the man in person, this suspect, a powerful and respected scientist on Solaria, is frighted into an infantile state, cowering in the corner and sucking his thumb.

An enormous percentage of young Americans seem to be afflicted with a mild form of autism, going about their days in a sort of sleepwalk, physically in the real world but psychologically in a digital one. Observe a typical 18-25 year-old American woman in a Starbucks or riding or the subway. Her eyes are fixed upon her screen, hunched over her phone in almost defensive curl.

In the event that a man asks her for directions, to share a table or, heaven forbid, spit some game at her, there's a fairly good chance she'll react with a mix of fright and socially-inept confusion.

After all, that “rando” just walked up to her in person and inserted himself into her reality. He had the audacity to enter the Solarian estate of her life without passing her smartphone screening test first.

That’s, like, “weird.” She prefers to “view” her men via Tinder first.

Spiritual Emptiness And Fetishization Of Technology

The Solarians’ society and worldview is entirely fueled by their own neuroticism and worship of technology. There is no religion or philosophy on their world. They have no real belief system to speak of at all, except in their own scientific greatness. At no point in the course of their evolution did they ask themselves, “yes, we’ve gained much with the choices we made, *but what have we lost?”

Solaria stands as a worst-case scenario of what America could become. American culture has in so many ways rejected the belief systems and traditions of its past, focusing only on the rationalist, reductionist view of the world and blindly embraces every new scientific or technological advance without first considering the long-term implications.

The decline of religion in the United States has left a spiritual void which has been filled by the decidedly poor substitutes of cultural Marxism, materialism and obsession with technology.

Streaming porn on demand has contributed to the development of a generation of sexless neckbeards who "view" a hundred different females before getting out of bed in the morning, but cower at the thought of speaking to one in real life. Teenagers and preteens now have 4G smartphones and have never known a world where they couldn't access such content at will. The deleterious affects of this will become apparent in the coming years.

Various Silicon Valley titans involved in the so-called "transhumanist" movement are attempting to extend human life by curing the "disease" of aging. Rather than making peace with death and accepting it as part of the natural order of things, they seek to extend their lifespans by centuries, if not cheating death all together.

To be sure, if such a thing is even possible it is many years away, but it is just one more similarity between our nation and a fictional world that would have seemed ludicrous only a few years ago.

Conclusion

In Foundation and Earth, set many thousands of years after the Robot series, Asimov revisits the isolated world of Solaria, forgotten by the rest of humanity as the colonization of space continued. By the time the protagonists arrive, the evolution of Solarian culture has reached new levels of decadence.

The population has dropped to barely a thousand, who by this point can no longer be considered human. The Solarian people have genetically modified themselves into a new, hermaphroditic race that gives birth on their own. Their estates now span thousands of miles, their brains completely integrated with their technology and all need for physical meeting has been eliminated.

While such a scenario is still a far cry from present life in the US, one can't help but reflect on how a mere decade ago it would have seemed unthinkable that a former Olympian would lop his jewels off and receive awards and a reality TV show for doing so, but here we are.

Only by consciously rejecting the messages, belief systems and "values" fed to us by media and power elites, as well as embracing the principles of Neo-Masculinity, can free-thinking men reclaim this country and steer it not backward, but forward in a new and healthier direction.

Until such time, we have no choice but to conclude there are far more similarities than differences between our culture and the technocratic dystopia envisioned by Asimov.

Read More: Was America Better Off Before Smart Phones, Text Messaging, And Social Media?

Nick Lazzaro
Nick Lazzaro is a free-thinking writer and traveller who got a brief taste of freedom and wants some more. When he's not working on his escape from corporate servitude, he hits the gym and reads about ancient aliens.

Failed Political Candidate Slaps Politician With Violence Order For Alleged Kiss

September 27, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The General-Secretary of the New South Wales state branch of the center-left Australian Labor Party, Jamie Clements, was slapped with an apprehended violence order (AVO) in August. Six weeks earlier in June, he allegedly kissed Stefanie Jones, a failed state political candidate in Cronulla, along Sydney's southern extremities, in a room in New South Wales' Parliament House and pushed her against a wall.

Armed with the kind of political experience you'd expect from George H. W. Bush, who was a millionaire businessman, Congressman, Ambassador to the UN, Chairman of the RNC, America's envoy to China, CIA Director, and Vice-President before being elected to the White House himself, Jones ran for public office whilst a 23-year-old student and was called Labor's "secret weapon" (I wonder why?).

In late August, police decided, due to the absolute paucity of evidence, not to lay assault charges against Clements. Despite my professed and considerable knowledge of Australian state and federal politics, I must admit that I would not have been able to quickly pick Clements' face and name his position before this media storm. Now Google is replete with search returns dominated by thoroughly unsubstantiated sexual misconduct allegations (read: spectacularly delayed revenge tactics).

The kiss attempt may or may not have happened, either in the way Stefanie Jones described it or with a different explanation. Perhaps they even fully kissed, consensually or otherwise. I will not prejudge what happened. Yet what I do believe is that the granting of the apprehended violence order makes a travesty of the policing and all-round legal systems.

Based on the reports circulating freely in the press, the severe delay in making a complaint to the police and the nature of the accusation itself point to a waste of time and other resources, not to mention an irrevocable besmirching of Clements' reputation.

Blaming the police is not the answer

There's no evidence to charge Jamie Clements but equally no indication he will be treated fairly in the court of public opinion.

Although people may be ready to criticize the police involved for granting the apprehended violence order in the first place, which may be more than warranted, there are some key distinctions between these orders and criminal convictions. There is no finding of "guilt" and no penalties, aside from stipulated constraints like staying away from the person or particular places.

The sad thing is that the amorphous nature of AVOs make them very potent weapons for getting revenge on people, especially male current and ex-lovers. If you think domestic violence can be a perfect vehicle for "he said, she said" convictions, restraining orders require a lower threshold still, without the need for a woman to testify for days in a courtroom or conduct more in-depth interviews with police (which should be required every time in the interests of due process).

As I have asserted previously, police exist in systems where political and other pressures impact upon their resources, directives from the executive arm of government and in other profound ways. The root cause of Clements' ridiculous receipt of an apprehended violence order is the "rape culture" and "sexual harassment" hysteria gripping the Western world. If catcalling and wolf-whistling, things that I myself don't have time for but certainly wouldn't want criminalized, are considered "assault", alleged kissing as pseudo-sexual battery is par for the course in these retrograde times.

Clements and Jones were previously lovers

Stefanie Jones reported alleged kissing six weeks later and then sought an apprehended violence order. Yet what violence could have been reasonably foreseen at the time the order was granted?

It never amazes me, nor should it amaze you, when younger women in the same industry or even workplace end up in relationships with older, contextually influential and just plain more powerful males. The now split Clements and Jones may be at loggerheads in the much broader media spotlight, but many a work-related romance has fallen apart to the knowledge of dozens of others working in an entire business or office. Relationship breakdowns can turn ugly at the best of times, usually in circumstances where the former parties to a relationship are not colleagues and thus can have some immediate distance afterwards.

For older, more powerful males, however, the outcome of these breakup times can fluctuate dramatically. The split can have no effects at all or career-damaging ones. In Clements' case, regardless of whether he overcomes some of the stain on his reputation, he is dealing with the latter scenario. If he planned to make the transition from behind-the-scenes political apparatchik to elected legislator in the future, that opportunity has almost certainly evaporated.

Again, we have at our fingertips a powerful lesson in why office romances are (for men) usually amongst the worst decisions you can ever make, especially within cutthroat political parties. In many ways, the situation is actually a love triangle, with Jones' new boyfriend David Latham (in a massive twist, he's reasonably close to her in age!) serving as a very senior figure in the NSW ALP as well.

This is just one of the more extraordinary cases

The people of Cronulla would have been ably served by a woman whose chief talent is posing for photos as Labor's "secret weapon."

We must uphold a consistent reverence for beyond reasonable doubt, innocence before guilt and meticulous police investigations irrespective of the circumstances. Similar conscientiousness must be applied to regulating the use (or misuse) of AVOs when there is no evidence that any reasonably conceivable threat, even a subjectively determined one, exists.

My criticism of Jones' inexplicable, shambolic delay in reporting alleged kissing that was the basis of an AVO does not mean that there aren't extreme problems with the investigation and prosecution of purported "assaults" which are reported within hours. Jones' accusations simply take the normal legal standard of bizarreness and unfairness to truly surreal heights.

I applaud the decision by police not to use Harry Potter-style divination as evidence to charge Jamie Clements. Clements' plight is nevertheless shocking, as it demonstrates the fate awaiting many men who either try to kiss or are falsely accused of trying to kiss women on a nightclub dance floor, at the end of a date or indeed anywhere else.

Let's hope the nominally leftwing Clements starts to see what his political party's broad ideology really might mean for men both now and going forward.

Read More: Why Is Outspoken Feminist Charlize Theron Dating Alleged Woman-Abuser Sean Penn?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Swedish Bath Houses Ban “Fat Shaming” Scales

September 27, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

For many years what’s called “träningshets” have been a subject of debate in Sweden. It literally translates to something like “exercise incitement,” meaning that some people feel pushed by societal norms to exercise a lot and get fit bodies. This is a bad thing, in their mind.

Now the issue of fat shaming has reached this little Nordic country. Fighting obesity in the age of the SJW means you hate fat people. To make sure no one’s feelings get hurt, bath facilities are throwing out their weighing scales.

Lawless fatness

Thina Grotmark, fat and proud.

“Fettskam” (fat shame), “fettförakt” (fat contempt) and “fettfobi” (fat phobia) are three new terms that can be added to the Swedish dictionary. People not only want acceptance for not working out and not having well-trimmed bodies, they want obesity to be accepted too.

This has been expressed in a number of articles lately. Let's read what three women (since men rarely complain about this) have to say about it.

Thina Grotmark calls fat shaming a "civil rights issue." She is the editor of Fett Magazine, a web site that promotes fat acceptance. To give you an idea of what the site is about, it's enough to quote its comment policy.

> This is a fat safe zone – We will not allow any fat phobic/racist/homophobic and or misogynistic content! Further more – Be kind to each other, any offensive or mean comments will be deleted. We also want to deter you from writing anything about diets, weight loss and or 'helpful' tips about health. We are not interested!

Thina Grotmark says she is the victim of oppression and discrimination for being fat. According to her, fat people can't find jobs, and are refused medical treatment. This is all proven by one reference—to another feminist web site.

> The problem is that we have to approach the fat haters without fighting back since you can be our potential bosses, doctors, colleagues or even members of our family and since we according to the law don't have any rights.

Tired of "fat contempt"

Another woman who says that everybody has to accept her obesity is My, 21 years old. She used to hate being overweight, but that changed when she discovered the fat acceptance movement. Now she refuses to feel ashamed.

> It should be a fact that I'm fat, just like you are thin, and just like I have brown hair.

The reporter asks her about the correlation between obesity and health issues.

> It's a complicated issue. Lifestyle has to do with more than weight. If you're living > on candy you're unhealthy no matter how much you weigh, but honestly it is also a personal choice.

Ellinor Löfgren is not fat, but has had enough of society's "fat contempt".

> I don't want to hear it anymore. I don't want to hear about your quickest ways to lose weight. I don't want to hear about 'healthier options' to all of my meals and I don't want to hear about how you will ride your bicycle home from work instead of taking the buss.

Healthiness is no longer just a trend, she says, but a norm that she feels forced to comply to. Eating food you don't actually like only because it's healthy, and being afraid to gain weight, is unsound.

> Isn't it healthier to be a free human being, unfettered by body fixation?

Fat shaming scales

Bath houses in Stockholm are now removing the weighing scales from their locker rooms. This as a result of public outrage that began with a Facebook post by a woman who didn't want children to compare and comment on their weights.

The outrage in social media has caused many municipalities to consider making their bath facilities scale free. One director of a bath house in the town of Huddinge says that people had complained about the scales before, but that the Facebook post was the last straw.

> We want our guests to focus on how they are feeling, not on how much they weigh.

The director says that reactions have been mostly positive, but some have been more critical.

> I've gotten ironic comments saying that we should remove all mirrors while we're at it.

The “brave” Facebook post.

Choices have consequences

Lovely view.

Sweden has long been a country of slender, beautiful people. But that is about to change as radical feminists like Thina Grotmark brands everyone who doesn’t adore her big body “fat phobic” and misogynistic.

The claim that obese people “don’t have any rights” is an obviously false statement. But you can have good reasons to choose a slim person over a fat one for a job position. Being fat is a sign that you’re probably lazy and careless, someone who can’t even be relied on to care for your own body. Furthermore, some jobs require a person to be in good shape and able to handle physical stress.

21-year-old My thinks that being fat should be no different than having brown hair, i.e., something you were born with. Just moments later, though, she admits that being fat is “also a personal choice.”

When you discriminate against people for their weight, you’re judging them based on their life choices, not on how they were born. Losing and gaining weight is optional.

Infuriating idiocy

Hearing the lamentations of these fatties is enough to make an otherwise calm and collected person pissed off. Like all SJW’s, these people are clearly not looking for equality, and they would never make an effort to improve themselves. Instead, they want everything to be handed to them for free—entitlements only granted to them, the oppressed ones.

They want jobs they don’t deserve, money they haven’t earned, health care they haven’t paid for, and compliments and love while being fat, ugly and stupid. All of this for doing nothing more than merely existing.

While calling men that criticize them and try to give them helpful advice “hateful,” they have no trouble causing outrage about harmless things like weighing scales. This time they won, and scales are being banished all throughout the country.

But will they stop at that, now that they know that things which upset them will be made forbidden? Fat chance.

Read More: How Female-Dominated Publishing Houses Are Censoring Male Authors

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

5 People That National Review Hates More Than Admitted Pedophile Todd Nickerson

September 28, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

This past week, the Internet exploded in justifiable rage at a Salon article titled "I'm a Pedophile, But Not a Monster" by Todd Nickerson. In the article, Nickerson claims to identify as a pedophile—though he also claims that he has never had sex with children—and argues that he deserves understanding for his sexual predilections.

Most everyone recognized Salon's article for what it was: a leftist attempt to normalize child molestation in the same way they normalized open homosexuality, transsexuality and other sexual perversions.

Everyone, it seems, except National Review.

Long considered the standard bearer of cuckservatism, National Review has decided to stand athwart humanity yelling "FUCK YOU, DAD!" In a spectacularly tone-deaf article, token Limey Charles C.W. Cooke defended both Nickerson for writing the piece and Salon for publishing it. Even more ridiculously, Cooke invokes Christianity in his pedophile apologia. I must have missed that Beatitude in catechism class: "Blessed are the kiddie diddlers, for they shalt inherit the daycare centers."

Given how absurd and suicidal it is for a "right-wing" publication to defend child molestation, Cooke's piece serves as a stark reminder of how toxic National Review is to American conservatism. National Review and its founder, the mercifully deceased William Buckley, built their reputations on purging "undesirable" elements from the conservative movement to wide accolades from the left, transforming a political movement focused on preserving American culture into a clearinghouse for Zionists and corporate whores.

To this end, here are five people that National Review thinks are worse than pedophile Todd Nickerson…

1. John Derbyshire, conservative writer

John Derbyshire is a conservative columnist who wrote for National Review up until three years ago, when outrage exploded over an article he published at Taki's Magazine (full disclosure: I have written for Takimag in the past and met Derbyshire at this year's American Renaissance conference, but we have no connections beyond that) titled "The Talk: Nonblack Version." In his column, Derbyshire made a number of rational arguments on how whites can cope with the very real threat of black-on-white crime in the U.S.

Derbyshire was subsequently targeted by social justice warriors, with Gawker dubbing his piece the "most racist article possible" and a bevy of left-wing publications calling for his termination from National Review. Editor Rich Lowry gave in to the lynch mob, announcing Derb's firing via a blog post that was so spectacularly cowardly that Lowry refused to refer to Takimag by name, instead calling it a "webzine." Derb's termination from National Review also threatened to leave him destitute, as he was undergoing chemotherapy at the time.

2. Donald Trump, businessman and politician

Along with the rest of the cuckservative movement, National Review has joined the mob of nancyboys mewling for Donald Trump's head. Most recently, Cuckmaster General Rich Lowry—the same guy who fired one of his own writers because of a left-wing lynch mob—had the audacity to go on Fox News and claim that Carly Fiorina had "cut off" Trump's balls "with the precision of a surgeon" during the last GOP presidential debate. Lowry is so prissy that he can't even spell out "balls" in a Tweet:

> .@realDonaldTrump a deal for you, Donald: if you apologize to Carly for your boorish insult, I might stop noting how she cut your b* off
>
> — Rich Lowry (@RichLowry) September 24, 2015

Lowry's flailing attempts at manliness are part of a concerted effort by cuckservatives to bring down Trump by claiming that Fiorina won the last presidential debate. Not only does it show how sad the anti-Trump conservatives have become—that their new standard bearer is a woman who lost the only other political race she competed in by a 10-point margin—it doesn't even come close to reality.

Every poll released after the debate shows Trump maintaining a comfortable lead over the other candidates; while Fiorina did receive a bump, it came primarily at the expense of Ben Carson and other minor contenders.

3. Mark Steyn, writer and free speech activist

Mark Steyn is a Canadian author known for standing up for free speech in the face of leftist totalitarianism: he successfully defended himself from Canada's nightmarish "human rights" tribunals when they tried to prosecute him for "Islamophobia," and he was also the victim of a frivolous "defamation" lawsuit filed by global warming alarmist Michael Mann. Neither of these saved Steyn's head from National Review's chopping block when he made the mistake of siding with Duck Dynasty's Phil Robertson two years ago, who was being targeted by radical leftists for his supposedly "anti-gay" remarks.

In a spectacularly screechy post, National Review managing editor Jason Lee Steorts furiously clutched his pearls in response to Steyn's "derogatory language," urging conservatives to show more "civility" in their arguments. Steyn was subsequently shoved out the door at National Review, leaving Steorts and his colleagues to keep writing scintillating pieces on why conservatives need to endorse gay marriage.

4. Ann Coulter, conservative author and spokesperson

Ann Coulter has managed to stay popular and relevant in our shifting media landscape by being unafraid to challenge societal taboos, including the taboos of the conservative movement. Most recently, Coulter drew fire after she criticized the excessive deference to Israel that Republican presidential candidates showed in the recent debate; half of the candidates responded to the question “What will America look like after you become president?” by mentioning Israel, a foreign country:

> Good grief! Huckabee is running for PM of Israel.
>
> — Ann Coulter (@AnnCoulter) September 17, 2015

> Cruz, Huckabee Rubio all mentioned ISRAEL in their response to: "What will AMERICA look like after you are president."
>
> — Ann Coulter (@AnnCoulter) September 17, 2015

> Christie also talks @ Israel in response to the question: What will AMERICA look like after you are president?
>
> — Ann Coulter (@AnnCoulter) September 17, 2015

In their indefatigable fashion, National Review immediately began sharpening the knives in response to Coulter’s comments. David French shrieked that Coulter was “pander[ing]” to “white nationalists,” then after facing a backlash for his sanctimony, followed up with an article stating that calling people “cuckservative” is bad, mmmkay?

5. Donald Sterling, businessman and former NBA team owner

Donald Sterling is an entrepreneur and the former owner of the L.A. Clippers basketball team. Last year, Sterling was banned from the NBA for life, fined $2.5 million, and forced to sell the Clippers after a recording of a private conversation in which he made purportedly "racist" remarks was leaked to the media by his mistress, V. Stiviano.

https://twitter.com/ThaRightStuff/status/646454969512517632

Unsurprisingly, National Review lit their torches and joined in the stampede to crucify Sterling. In a cringeworthy "me-too" piece, Deroy Murdock declared that Sterling's comments represented "real racism" and claimed that left-wing accusations of bigotry should meet the "Sterling Standard." How's that working out for you, bub?

Even the most cursory glance at National Review and William Buckley's career shows that both have been a cancer on American conservatism for decades. No better evidence of this can be found in the fact that it is the left—the people who conservatives are supposed to fight—who praise National Review for its "civility" and "sanity." The magazine's most enduring achievement has been shaping conservatism into controlled opposition, rolling over to the left on every issue save for Israel and corporate tax cuts.

The continuing ascent of Donald Trump in the presidential race and the ongoing meltdown of movement conservatives and GOP cucksultants shows that National Review and other, similar outlets have lost their gatekeeping power. With the rise of the alternative right and neomasculinity, countless men and women are finding an outlet for their discontent with both Western society and the impotence of its so-called defenders.

National Review's defense of pedophilia is just another data point showing their increasing irrelevance.

Read Next: Why Do Hollywood SJWs Still Defend This Admitted Pedophile?

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

How The Global Financial Market Mirrors Our Sexual Marketplace

September 28, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

The hedonistic juggernaut that is modern society indulges all our physical needs: a plethora of luxury goods and services can satisfy each and every one of our sensual desires without hardship or sacrifice.

We can also engage in meaningless sexual intercourse with countless partners without the superfluous bothers of commitment, emotion, or children. It is a culture of excess we live in, and it does not seem to be slowing down anytime soon.

Some of us, however, can see the cracks forming, the ship's exterior rattling ominously before the hull finally bursts open. There are warning signs occurring in our society which we simply cannot afford to ignore.

Everything will be fine… don't be silly.

The omens we shall examine in this article will be in the sexual marketplace and the global economy. It is striking and uncanny to see the astonishing resemblances between the two systems, and the nature of the effects they are having on modern society as a whole.

Universal Devaluation

A possible future for Western currencies?

The effects of the contraceptive pill and the emergence of dating websites can easily be likened to the consequences of fractional reserve banking and Richard Nixon taking the dollar off the gold standard in 1971.

Both assets (sex and money) have completely lost their intrinsic value as a result. For example, the American dollar could buy as much bread in 1800 as it could in 1900, but considerably less in 2000. Similarly, a bang is significantly less meaningful today than it was in 1900: it is certainly quick, fast, and a hell of a lot of fun, but ultimately has virtually no significance.

Society has experienced sexual and financial hyperinflation. Just like decadent Berlin in the bisexual, orgiastic frivolities of the late 1920s and the sky-high, hyperinflated Deutschmark, we have sunk to the same highs: although the fun might last a while longer, the risks will certainly not disappear by some miracle.

Visible Benefits And Invisible Risk

Sexual morality in the pre-Lady Chatterley era was implemented to enshrine risk as the lord and ruler: those who did not restrain themselves would incur risk onto themselves and society as a whole. Family tradition and commitment was respected to avoid sending civilization into debauchery and irresponsibility.

Many reluctantly acquiesced and repressed their sexual urges in favor of the family unit, only to feel the benefits later with loving relatives and offspring. The roles have now been completely inverted: the visible benefits now come first and foremost, while the risks are brushed under the bed, slowly growing and metastasizing into something ugly and devastating.

The fatal inversion of risk and reward can also be observed in bubble economies. Assets are artificially inflated in order to return an instant profit in exchange for credit, whilst the national debts which are used to fund such immoral economics increase, devaluing the currency and leaving the losses for our future generations to pay off.

The Gap Between Rich And Poor

The pedestalization of instantaneous reward has encouraged a predatory culture. In order to maintain a healthy living wage, we are forced to adopt a ludicrously fierce and unforgiving personality to hold a stable job, or even to get the job in the first place.

The same change of attitude is present in the sexual marketplace. There is no tolerance for even the slightest hint of beta behavior. None. We are forever one needy word too many in a text or an uncomfortable silence away from eternal celibacy.

A massive rift therefore develops in society. The rich become richer, the poor poorer, the alphas accumulate centuries of notches, the betas remain virgins into their late twenties; but this absolutely does not mean that we should turn to sexual and financial Socialism and propose an egalitarian system…

Thank God that we have been gifted with game and support from the manosphere to help manage our wealth the best we can, and also remain carnally satisfied. Without that, it is genuinely scary to contemplate a life at the bottom of the pile in both cases. It truly has become all or nothing.

The Market And Millennial Western Women Are Both Ponzi Schemes

A Ponzi scheme can be defined in economic terms as an investment in which a promise of profit is given to the newer shareholders, but then taken away from them in favor of the older, bigger investors when the scheme collapses in value.

The recent MF Global scandal was a key example: big businesses were given priority over individual accounts, therefore when it collapsed; the credit was seized from small accounts in favor of the larger investors (JP Morgan Chase being the most notable).

This definition can certainly be applied to the western woman. They whimsically throw out vague promises of commitment to thirsty betas (you're a sweet guy etc.), whilst ecstatically blowing their investment (quite literally) on the cold, the emotionless and the superficially charming.

The way to overcome Ponzi schemes and Millennial Westerners is exactly the same: get in and get out as fast as possible. Investors who cling on in hope whilst the intrinsic value collapses are left with nothing, whilst those more adept speculators run away with all the spoils.

Conclusion

The situation does indeed sound dire, but knowledge makes both the sexual marketplace and the financial markets seem easier to handle, and even luridly attractive and enticing.

It is imperative that we know the pitfalls of both and skate around them carefully, whilst maintaining a strong frame and our dignity in the process. We must also bear in mind that the current financial and sexual climate simply cannot last: the economy and the demographic simply cannot support the unbearable excesses of the present.

But for the meantime, knowledge and action are the cornerstones to our temporary success in the modern world. Let us just hope that we shall be ready to adapt when change finally does happen.

Read More: The Father Of The Term "Sexual Marketplace"

Anton Hagen
Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

Sleepless Night Is A Nonstop Adrenaline Rush

September 28, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

With some movies, you don't care so much about the plot as you care about the ride that it takes you on. The Terminator (1984) was one such classic film; Jason Statham's manic run in Crank (2006) was another. I've just finished seeing Sleepless Night (2011) for the third time and thought it was about time I reviewed it here.

This is a blisteringly paced French crime drama (actually it's a joint venture between France, Belgium, and Luxembourg) which was originally titled Nuit Blanc. It starts out like a shot out of a cannon and never loses its momentum or its sense of dread.

The plot? There is the barest outline of a plot, but who really cares? Two corrupt cops (the dubious "good guys") rob a few drug dealers of a major cocaine shipment in Paris. But things go wrong. They go very wrong. The hold-up turns into a bullet festival, and deaths result. Worse still, one of the cops, named Vincent (Tomer Sisley), is recognized.

Vincent's partner in crime, another cop named Manu (Laurent Stocker), isn't happy either. We get the sense that he will not hold up under the strain of these developments, and that it's only a matter of time before he rats someone out. The discovery of the robbery has now made them hunted by both cops and drug dealers.

Word gets back to the gangster owner of the cocaine shipment, a greasy Corsican nightclub owner named Jose (Serge Riaboukine). He's not happy about this, not at all. So he kidnaps Vincent's young son Thomas (Samy Seghir) and calls up Vincent for a little chat. The deal is this: bring me back my drugs, and I'll let your son go.

And thus the stage is set for one of the most exhilarating rides in recent movie history. Vincent agrees to meet the Corsican at his nightclub lair, which is called Le Tarmac. And it seems like things should be so simple. Vincent turns over the drugs, and he gets his son back.

Nightclub on steroids: the set of Le Tarmac

But screenwriters need grist for their plot mills, and what seems simple never really is. There is a subplot where a couple of cops from internal affairs, Lancombe (Julien Boisellier) and Vignali (Lizzie Brochere), are following Vincent. Delphine sees Vincent stash the drugs in a restroom, and things begin to unravel for Vincent from there.

Most of the film's two hours are spent in chases, fights, and double-crosses inside Le Tarmac. Never did a nightclub feel simultaneously so claustrophobic and yet labyrinthine at the same time. Director Frederic Jardin ingeniously constructed Le Tarmac just for this film, and his attention to detail shows in every frame of the shaky hand-held footage. By depriving us of our sense of spatial relationships, we are kept permanently on edge, uncertain of who is lurking around the next corner or within the crowd.

It is 41-year-old Tomer Sisley who really carries the show. His performance is nothing short of incredible. I knew nothing about this actor, but according to his Wikipedia page, he was born and raised in Berlin but has worked as a stand-up comedian in France. From watching this film, this is about the last thing you would expect from this actor in real life.

He obviously has some martial arts training, and he leaps, jumps, lurches, stumbles, and sprints around the club, clutching his wounded abdomen, while at the same engaging in some of the most intense fight scenes I can recall in recent years. The kitchen fight scene between him and Lancombe is a masterpiece of choreography.

He has a lean, rawboned Middle Eastern look about him that is able to switch from ruthlessness to sentimentality at the drop of a hat.

Vincent (Tomer Sisley) doesn't like being tailed by Internal Affairs

Every time you think you have things figured out, a new curveball is thrown at you. We think Vincent is corrupt. Is he? Or is he working undercover? Lancombe is a good cop who's chasing bad guys…or is he something more sinister?

There are even irreverent bits of humor here. In one montage, Vincent drafts illegal alien kitchen workers to help him prepare a batch of phony cocaine made from Ziploc bags of flour. In another, Vincent grabs a stunned nightclub girl and whisks her around on his arm for a few minutes of screen time as she gradually becomes attracted to him.

The last ten minutes of the film are incredible. We leave the nightclub and take to the highway on a high-speed car ride that has some brilliant action scenes and plot resolutions. All in all, this is an expertly done action film, and well worth your time.

I was disappointed to hear recently that Sleepless Night has been remade for American audiences. Don't even waste your time. See the original instead, in French with English subtitles if needed.

Read More: The Multicultural Narrative Is Collapsing Before Our Eyes

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

There Is Scientific Proof That Feminism Is Failing Women

September 29, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

It is often stated that feminism is not only bad for men, but bad for women as well. While the negative effects of feminism may be obvious to any man who has traveled abroad and seen feminine, kind, loving, happy women with long hair, heels, and a strong commitment to their family, there is now scientific evidence proving that the cock carousel is disastrous for family life and women are LESS happy when given all the freedom feminism has provided them.

The Evidence

University of Pennsylvania researchers Betsey Stevenson and Justin Wolfers studied the happiness of women in the United States from the 1970s through present day and found an astounding conclusion: the more society accommodated women, gave them jobs, and scholarships, and supported them living single, and encouraged them to pursue their own private dreams and goals, to dress and act as masculine as they wanted to, and to shun any ideas of universal beauty or happiness in pursuit of their own private desires, the LESS happy they were.

From the paper's abstract:

> By many objective measures the lives of women in the US have improved over the past 35 years, yet we show that measures of subjective well-being indicate that women's happiness has declined both absolutely and relative to men. The > paradox of women's declining relative well-being is found across various datasets, measures of subjective well-being, and is pervasive across demographic groups and industrialized countries. Relative declines in female happiness have eroded a gender gap in happiness in which women in the 1970s typically reported higher subjective well-being than did men. These declines have continued and a new gender gap is emerging–one with higher subjective well-being for men.

Life In Saudi Arabia

If you listen to Western propaganda, you believe that America is at the forefront of helping women by allowing them to vote, paying them the same as men, regardless of their performance, encouraging them to enter the workforce, giving them special advantages with divorce laws, and offering them the opportunity to be lesbians, or men, or invalids, or whatever they want to do.

Feminism not wanted or needed.

But let's examine why there are such strict rules in place for women in places like Saudi Arabia, supposed ground zero for women's unhappiness. In Saudi culture, women are required to have a male guardian or chaperone with them when in public. Driving a car alone is prohibited because it increases the chances of socializing with men, and eventually losing their virginity, and therefore ruining their chances of a happy marriage (see: every other culture on earth which has allowed women to comingle with men, ever). Is this a crazy idea?

Similar courtship rules throughout history

Despite what you have heard, the idea of romantic love and choosing who you will marry is a VERY new idea, really taking off in the West during the Victorian Era (1837-1901). Before that time, almost all marriages were arranged by the parents, and marriages occurred very early, girls as young as 12 and boys as young as 17 (note that even then a five year age difference minimum was enforced).

The man received a payment from the bride's family known as a dowry in order to help care for her. A non-virginal woman would not only never be chosen for marriage, she was actually prohibited to marry in most Christian orders. A virginal woman was absolutely required or else she became a spinster dependent on her parents for the rest of her life.

About as intimate as a date could get, pre-feminism

In the Victorian Era, what many consider the peak of Western civilization, romantic love became an option for some. However, strict rules remained in place during courtship. After meeting a woman, it was not appropriate for the man to speak to her for a period of some time. Courting took place exclusively at the girl's home, and always under the watchful eye of the parents.

The closest most couples got to an un-chaperoned date was sitting together on the front porch, with the girl's parents indoors, which was allowed by the family once the man was approved. One can imagine that if cars were common in this era, women certainly would have been prohibited to travel in them alone. We have seen plenty of evidence why women should save their virginity for marriage. And yet feminism throws all this out the window.

Up until a couple of years ago, I would have called myself a feminist. Sure, I like women, and if they want to be free to pursue whatever dream they have, you go girl! It's the standard narrative we're taught in the West that women suffered for all these years under the white man's oppression, and only now are they finally earning the freedom and equality they deserve.

Women Really Were Happier Before They Were Liberated

But, what if there is a reason that virginity is universally valued throughout the world in all cultures, that rules and customs for behavior between the sexes existed throughout history, and that religion and other institutions were established to have women subservient to men? What if women were actually happier when they didn't have to worry about writing TPS reports, multitasking, balancing a budget, and finding emotional fulfillment?

As Norah Vincent discovered in her book Self Made Man, where she spent one year living as a man, females are very unhappy when living a masculine life.

Over the past 30 years, women's education levels have risen and then surpassed men, contraception offered them control over fertility and allowed them to freely have premarital sex, technology and modern appliances have taken over many domestic duties, women have made huge advances in the workforce, and in many cases out-earn men. Social changes have accepted lesbianism, out-of-wedlock births, trannys, tattoos, piercings and neon hair.

And yet, the study shows that women's unhappiness increased by the same amount as an 8.5% increase in the published government unemployment rate. In other words, the level of unhappiness women experienced would be the same the general population experienced if the U3 unemployment rate went from its current 5.1% to 13.6%.

Feminism causes unhappiness

If feminism is not making women any happier, what is the point? It has already resulted in fatter, less pleasant, sluttier, uglier, less loyal women which makes men very unhappy. But if it's demonstrably destroying the family unit while also clearly making women themselves miserable, shouldn't it be thrown out tomorrow and the patriarchy restored?

Feminism. Bringing us all down.

As Roosh pointed out recently, an advanced, first world, modern society may not lead to happiness. Indeed, if we examine the Gross National Happiness, a phrase coined in 1972 by Bhutan's King, who balanced every modern invention with the overall impact it would have on his people, we find that first world nations score poorly.

Spiraling Further Downwards

The study found the LOWEST satisfaction rates for the following questions for women: "How satisfied are you with:"

1. Your friends and people you spend time with
2. The amount of fun you are having
3. The way you spend your leisure time
4. The way you get along with your parents

In other words, basic things every human being on the planet enjoys. Is it any wonder that so many American women are mentally ill?

The causes of these 4 problems are easily seen when the same women are asked what they value most highly:

1. Being successful in my line of work
2. Making a contribution to society
3. Having lots of money
4. Being able to find steady work

OK I'll give them #2, a fulfilling life is universally desirable, but the rest are valueless rat race goals that will only continue to deny them the four major grievances above.

Embrace Neomasculinity

Embrace neomasculinity and women who support it. Feminism is causing irreversible damage in the West, and many women are beginning to question it. Their voices should be applauded and echoed so others can join the movement to end this disease.

In Saudi Arabia, a group of women organized a campaign called "My Guardian Knows What's Best For Me" (reminds me of the old American TV Show Father Knows Best).

These women demanded “punishments for those who call for equality between men and women, mingling between men and women in mixed environments, and other unacceptable behaviors.”

Further, they are pushing for sex segregation in malls and hospitals, the only two public places where segregation currently does not exist. The only places men and women work together are medical colleges, some hospitals and some banks. One organizer states

> The image in the West is that we are dominated by men, but they always forget the aspect of love. People who aren’t familiar with Shariah often have the wrong idea. If you want stability and safety in your life, if you want a husband who takes care of you, you won’t find it except in Islam.

Let’s work to make sure that’s no longer the case.

Shaming

If feminism is a failure for both men and women, then the only logical conclusion is that every patriarchal society was correct. What can we do? While some argue that life is better overseas and that the West is a lost cause (and I will not disagree), whenever we encounter younger impressionable women we should shame and educate them that their career, snarkiness, sarcasm, and educational degree is of zero value to men.

If you have younger females in your family, stress this to them. And any time a woman mentions her job, degree, or other silly pursuit we should point out that scientifically speaking, this will only make her more unhappy, and she’d be better off watching an episode of Julia Child or learning a musical talent. The logic and reason behind this will be ignored, but the shaming and masculine scolding will make an impression on her.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: More Women Are Rejecting Feminism

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

John Boehner’s Resignation Shows That Cuckservatives Are In Full Retreat

September 29, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

With obligatory tears, John Boehner announced his impending resignation as Speaker of the House of Representatives. The mainstream Republican, constantly accused of inconsistent or plain weak attacks on President Obama, took a large swipe at his party’s rightwing representatives during his dramatic revelation. Calling them “false prophet” conservatives, he promised to prevent a government shutdown, which basically means a further massive increase in America’s astronomical, self-immolating public debt.

The demise of Boehner, which can hardly be called a choice due to the pressure he was under from congressional Republican traditionalists and Tea Party advocates, demonstrates how members of an angry Republican base are increasingly challenging the tepid, careerist moves of the GOP leadership.

Of all the major issues responsible for the Republican electoral triumphs from 2010, particularly opposition to illegal immigration and the spiraling deficit, Boehner has taken a cuckservative position on all of them multiple times. He has backtracked, negotiated on non-negotiables and spent more time fighting off his party allies than Democrats.

Barack Obama and others may lambaste Boehner but they know, like many liberals, that he is on many matters closer to them than many of his House and Senate colleagues. Supposedly balanced newsman Chris Matthews is already exhorting the retiring Speaker to push through comprehensive immigration reform before any proper Republican might take his place.

Matthews is not clutching at straws here. Given the animosity Boehner has for his more conservative detractors, coupled with his naturally centrist position, he could at the very least put his weight behind reform so that a bill is passed some time after he leaves Congress.

The perfect Republican life story wasted

Boehner, pictured as a boy in the middle of the front row, had a perfect rags to riches success story to help advance the Republican agenda. Except he didn't advance the Republican agenda.

The saddest thing about John Boehner's demise is the personal narrative he could have otherwise used to rally middle America behind him. I touched on this narrative in a previous article about the shamelessness of female “sugar babies.” While girls today get older men to fund their education or overall lifestyle, Boehner took seven years to complete his degree at Xavier University because he needed steady jobs to pay his tuition.

He comes from a mega-family of twelve children, many of whom have struggled to find work in adulthood. As a child he suffered the ignominy of having his fourteen-strong family live with just two bedrooms for everyone and a single bathroom for all the children. If anyone embodies the Republican emphasis on hard work and high aspirations, it’s John Boehner.

So what happened? John Boehner didn’t entirely kowtow to the left, but nor did he excoriate it. When the US government faced a shutdown in 2013, he skilfully cultivated the ability to both represent the Republicans and undermine them, even on the same day. He would cut into Obama over the parlous state of the nation’s finances and then quickly denigrate the proposals of Republicans to try and cut the debt as being too radical.

Whilst not a stooge for Obama, Boehner’s war on two fronts and his tendency to vacillate had the effect of giving the Commander-in-Chief exactly the sort of reprieves that he, not in control of the House (and now the Senate), should never have received. The political football of a half- and now full lame duck President has been thoroughly frittered away thanks to John Boehner.

Republicans are more obsessed with avoiding Democratic criticism than conservative ideals

Boehner has spent more public moments courting Obama than Republican colleagues representing the Republican base.

Politics is a ruthless business. No matter how centrist Boehner remained, he could always count on Obama and Co. deep-frying him for purportedly being an oppressor of the poor, women, illegals and minorities. His overtures to Obama, promising collaboration on immigration, taxes and debt, did nothing to raise the public’s opinion of Congress and zero to advance the Republican cause.

In the meantime, everything from his perpetual orange tan to his black son-in-law have been brought up to mock him ad nauseam. For the sake of a chance to not be called a misogynist, racist, or lover of wealthy fat cats, Boehner has spent more airtime courting Democrats than his legislative or electoral base. And the Democrats still hate him.

Bipartisanship, aside from the veneer of civility, clearly has no place in modern American politics. Boehner's successor would do well to pay lip service to it but abandon it in substance. With their rigged and patently false one-in-five rape statistics and oppose-illegal-immigration-and-you're-a-racist premises, leftists use the pretense of groups working together to suck in scared cuckservatives before they very publicly stab them in the back or chest.

When the smiles, handshakes and shared photo-ops don't work for Democrats, the familiar ad hominems of misogynist, racist, or corporate stooge came back into play for all to see.

America needs a Republican Speaker, not a cuckservative one

Perfect? No. But Newt Gingrich did more conservative things with less of a conservative renaissance at his disposal than John Boehner.

Say what you want about this Republican Party answer to Poppin' Fresh, but former Speaker Newt Gingrich ran a much more conservative House. This is highly ironic, too, as Boehner was for years one of Gingrich's top lieutenants on the floor. Boehner also had the additional advantage of arriving at his chair during the Tea Party ascendancy, a wellspring Gingrich could never tap into. The talent and ideology of so many of Boehner's Tea Party and other traditionalist colleagues have been suppressed, rather than encouraged.

It’s time for someone with the audacity to be a Republican to return to the Speaker’s chair. Obviously, not everything can be said in the context of winning elections. But the days of apologies, half-starts and half-measures need to be well and truly over for the GOP.

When he leaves his office for the final time, John Boehner may have packed all his things, yet he’ll still be leaving behind years of disappointments and what could have beens.

Read More: John The Baptist Syndrome

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

We’re Only Three Small Steps Away From Legalized Pedophilia

September 30, 2015 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

In a few decades, progressives were able to normalize homosexuality in mainstream culture and finally legitimize homosexual relationships in the eyes of the law. In just a few years, progressives have made great strides in their efforts to normalize transgenderism in mainstream culture, and they are currently legitimizing transgenderism in the eyes of the law.

Many non-progressives are concerned that these legal changes are less about guaranteeing the freedoms of gays and transgenders, and more about enforcing the worldview of progressives and punishing dissent. However, there is also a growing concern that the next frontier of legally-enforced moral relativism is pedophilia.

Progressives, of course, scoff at such notions. For progressives, these concerns are merely a cover that gay-hating, transgender-hating religious fanatics want to use to roll back all the “progress” that has been made. And yet, the last few years have made it clear that the slippery slope is real, and we are steadily sliding down it.

Whether the progressives of today want to admit it or not, they are currently laying the groundwork for the future legalization of pedophilia. This totally impossible, morally repugnant, never-gonna-happen upheaval in the moral and legal landscape of our society is not really impossible at all. In fact, it’s only three small steps away.

Step One: Establish a legal right for “transgender” children to receive hormone therapy

The transgender radicals are coming for your children.

This step is currently underway. Already progressives are advocating for young "transgender" children to receive hormone therapy to delay the natural changes of puberty, and then to help him or her to become more like whatever their "true" gender is. Young children are already receiving such treatments. Oregon now uses Medicaid funds to pay for puberty-suppressing hormones. It and a handful of other states even require private insurers to pay for "transgender care," which applies to children.

Of course, a lot of the advocacy for children receiving hormone therapy still comes with a lot of talk about parental consent, about families coming together to decide what is really the best course of action. But, this is only temporary. Members of the transgender lobby already lament that many parents won't consent to hormone therapy for their children. Others in the transgender lobby argue for the medical necessity of puberty-suppressing hormone therapy in order to convince private insurers to pay for it.

Once puberty-suppressing hormone therapy is deemed medically necessary, parental consent becomes irrelevant. Children who decide they want such treatment will be viewed the same as children who need insulin or blood transfusions. Not only will welfare and private insurers pay for it, but parents resistant to getting their children this treatment will be coerced into doing so by the government. This would establish deciding to receive hormone therapy as a child's legal right.

Step Two: Destigmatize pedophilia first as a mental disorder, then as a sexual orientation

This step is also underway. SJW's defense of confessed pedophile Sarah (Nicolas) Nyberg was recently covered by Return of Kings writer Robert Conway, and Salon's sympathies for confessed pedophile Todd Nickerson were covered by Milo Yiannopoulos. Progressives, as Yiannopoulos points out, have a history of defending pedophilia and challenging claims that it causes harm to children.

The terms "mental disorder" and "sexual orientation" have become loaded with progressivism's positive attitudes toward victimhood and sexual deviance. However, these terms, by their most basic definition, do apply to pedophilia. After all, the pedophile has a mind that is disordered and unhealthy, and his sexual impulses have a clearly identifiable goal toward which they are oriented. The problem is not with understanding pedophilia as a mental disorder or sexual orientation per se, but with the moral relativism that progressives heap onto madness and perversion.

No doubt there are many non-progressives who can pity someone with a pedophilic disorder or orientation, in the same way that they might pity a rabid dog even as they put it down. For progressives, though, mental disorders and sexual orientations must not just be identified and categorized, but must also be destigmatized. This process has already begun with calls for sympathy and with a few coming-out stories, and soon they'll push for the outright condoning of pedophilic fantasies and desires.

Step Three: Extend children's legal rights over their sexuality to allow pedophilic relationships

Our culture has already begun associating pedophilia with cuteness.

The final step is just a combination of the first two. After all, a child deciding to receive hormone therapy is a child making sexual decisions about his or her body. If children have a legal right to make sexual decisions about their bodies, and if pedophilic feelings are destigmatized, then progressives will begin to advocate for the legitimization of pedophilic relationships in both culture and law.

No doubt many progressives today find pedophilia undesirable as a goal or outcome. In the near future, however, pedophilia may be able to arise as the culmination of all the progressive ideas, policies, and rhetoric that came before it. Progressives will begin connecting pedophilia to ideas and rhetoric about children being oppressed. They will connect it to sexual liberation. They will connect it to personal development. They will connect it to happiness.

Progressives in the media will try to normalize it with television, perhaps with a drama set in ancient Greece that features “healthy” pedophilic relationships. And when non-progressives decry such propaganda, progressives will defend it by connecting it to multiculturalism. Like in the case of gays and transgenders, progressives will argue that any psychological problems correlating with pedophilia are not due to it being unhealthy or wrong or unnatural, but only because of the social stigma attached to it.

Possible, but not inevitable

Nearer than you might think.

Contrary to what many people today would like to believe, legitimized pedophilia is possible. Past civilizations functioned with legitimized pedophilia, at least for a time. And in the context of our own civilization, we have seen how progressivism has undermined so many things which were once held sacred, like family, marriage, religion, and national pride. It's merely wishful thinking to believe that one more part of the innocence of children is invulnerable to the destruction of progressivism.

The good news is that legitimized pedophilia is not inevitable. All three steps are necessary for it to happen, meaning that the failure of any one step would prevent it. Furthermore, feminists have a deep hate for straight male sexuality. While plenty of feminists would be fine with gay and female pedophiles, most would abhor a pedophilic relationship between a man and a little girl.

Perhaps feminist man-hating and shrieking about patriarchy would end up doing the world just a little bit of good, but it's hard to tell. After all, feminists and progressives in general are fiercely protective of their own, and so they might give a free pass to any straight male pedophile who acts feminine and says all the right things about empowering women, dismantling the patriarchy, etc.

The race is on between the forces of creation and destruction. We have seen in these last few years how the destructive impulse of progressivism has only increased in the face of geopolitical instability and internal decay; even as the temple of our nation begins to burn, the progressive death-cultists seek to knock away the last of its pillars and bring it crashing down upon our heads.

And yet, more and more people are waking up to the lies and broken promises of progressivism. They are looking at the world around them, and they're beginning to see through all the bullshit. They have been told we're approaching the summit of progress, but it's looking more and more like the edge of a cliff.

Whether progressives will succeed in dragging our society to new depths is yet unknown. Sooner than you might think, we're going to find out.

Read More: Cultural Collapse Theory: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

Jon Socrates

Jon finds purpose in the cultivation of wisdom, strength, and manly virtue.

A Nuclear Test Women Will Throw At You And How to Pass It

September 30, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Most men who know about game will be familiar with “shit tests” — a fairly unpleasant term for those niggly little test girls throw in to try to determine a guy’s fitness as a sexual partner. While they may be annoying, current game thinking posits that they are actually great opportunities to shine by smashing the test and proving your “alpha-ness” at the same time.

However there is one particular test that more experienced players are often exposed to that is particularly irksome, but that must be negotiated if you hope to progress in the higher ranks of game.

What Are Shit Tests?

To recap for anyone who wasn’t listening at the back, shit tests are those annoying little curveballs that women throw into interactions, basically to try to determine whether you are the rock solid player you’re trying to suggest you are. To guys who are just starting out it seems counterintuitive that a girl should start being deliberately obstructive when she actually otherwise appears to like you. But actually it’s entirely logical.

Girls want the highest quality partners that their SMV can attract. Therefore, when a guy walks up to her and does a pretty good job of conveying high value, she will be pleased but cautious. Is he really what he claims to be? To make sure, she will drop in “beta bait” questions like the following:

- Are you a player?
- Are you like this with all the girls?
- Does this usually work?
- Is that your chat-up line?

And so on and so forth. The danger for the newbie is to fold into the girl’s frame and say what he thinks she wants to hear, e.g. “No, I’m not a player, young lady. I’m a very nice young man who would like to wife you up and buy you a car and a nice house with a white picket fence in the suburbs.” Of course, this would be fatal. The girl is testing to see if you have the confidence of your convictions.

Generally speaking, the less advanced a guy is, the fewer shit tests he will have to overcome. Mostly this is because women tend to take pity on men they regard as weaker, and so won’t give them as hard a time. Whatever you do, never fall into the trap of imagining that not getting tests at all is a good thing — quite the opposite. In fact, it suggests that your game isn’t on point, your demeanor not sufficiently dominant.

If you are getting tests then that’s good — it indicates that you are in the game, at least. The best strategy is either to agree and amplify — “Am I a player? Hell yeah, you wanna join my six other girls back home?” — or simply to smile and ignore the tests by changing the subject.

This latter strategy is increasingly the one I employ and it yields good results. Plus it also has the advantage of not having any complicated lines to remember. There is loads of material out there on the best ways to get around these snarky little tests girls throw in, but sometimes the best policy is simply to do nothing and make her squirm with embarrassment for having been so gauche before your oak-like serenity.

The Nuclear Test

There is one particular test that is in a different league to the rest though, and it is not a test that new or even lower-intermediate guys are likely to get on a regular basis. This is because it pertains to the direct expression of sexual desire for the girl and most men are simply scared stiff (and not in a good way!) of being upfront about what they want (sex) and thus hide their true urges behind a cloud of friend zone-worthy blabber.

I recall once reading on a blog that game nirvana for a man was being able to take an elegant young woman out and over a glass of wine tell her he would like to bend her over and fuck her. At the time, new in the game, such brazen honesty seemed entirely impossible — I could have more easily conceived of knitting a stepladder to the moon than of doing any such thing.

Gentlemen, time have changed. These days, after endless repetition in similar situations, I am able to be upfront sexually with women — and arguably perhaps I go too far sometimes. As horny as you can get a girl in a bar by whispering what you're going to do to her when you get her home, it can backfire when the old anti-slut defence wall goes up, she goes home and you're left holding your dick.

However, in my louche, late-game years, I tend to follow my horniness and tell girls precisely what I'm thinking — particularly if we're on a date and the potential for sex is imminent. This practice has left me open to the nuclear shit test, though. It goes something like this:

"You just want to get laid. You're desperate for sex"

Now, there's something a little unfair about this, and not only because it's not true — these days I am never "desperate" for sex as it can so easily be acquired elsewhere. No, it's also unfair because the girl is calling me out in spite of the fact that what I'm doing is actually pretty alpha.

I'm willing to bet that most of the girls I've dated have rarely been with a man who has had the confidence to be so upfront with them right off the bat (in fact many girls have told me this themselves). However, that degree of masculine honesty is not enough — they still seek to destabilise me by aiming straight for the central pillar of my approach, undercutting the idea that it might be sheer balls that allows me to be so forthright and suggesting it's desperation instead.

The female psyche is nothing if not clever.

Passing The Nuclear Test

The first thing to say is that if you get the nuclear test you are by no means at a disadvantage. I have slept with pretty much every girl who's thrown something like this at me.

The number one strategy, as always, is simply not to back down. Whatever you do you can't, at this stage, try to back-pedal and say that you're not actually interested in sex. That would be ridiculous and counterproductive – and not true to your masculine self. What you have to decide is whether to continue on the course you've already set (i.e. rapid escalation) or whether to pull back a little and allow the situation to breathe.

Deciding this really comes down to calibration, something that cannot be taught through an online column. At the same time, if you are eliciting such a test from a girl then it is likely that you are pretty experienced already, so draw on that to decide whether or not you think she might be up for something that night. If so then proceed as before. If not, you need to apply the breaks. Here's what you say:

"Of course I want to have sex with you. I'm a man, you're a woman and I'm attracted to you. It's only natural."

Then you should lean back, ensure that you're not touching her, and turn the conversation to more neutral topics for a while. In this way you will defuse the test while still maintaining your frame, which is vital if you are to pick up where you left off later that night or on another occasion.

Remember: shit tests from girls are never a bad thing — in fact, they indicate that you're proceeding along the right lines. Keep going, and just be very careful not to bend your position to suit what you think she wants to hear. Doing so will mean you will inevitably lose the girl.

Read More: The Key to Success With Women? Controlling Your Emotions.

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Global Elites Caught Plotting The Islamic Invasion Of Europe

October 1, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Our global elites are generally very good at hiding their plans for the unwashed masses—those of us who are not blessed with immense wealth and power. They are good, but sometimes even these demigods slip up and the truth about their plans comes out.

We just had that happen on September 27th when German Chancellor Angela Merkel and Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg were caught having a side conversation on a hot mic at a United Nations luncheon.

Merkel was complaining to Zuckerberg about posts by Facebook users who were critical to the hordes of Muslim migrants who are flooding Germany and other European countries. Zuckerberg responded that:

> "[W]e need to do some work" on curtailing anti-immigrant posts about the refugee crisis. "Are you working on this?" Merkel asked in English, to which Zuckerberg replied in the affirmative before the transmission was disrupted.

What pretense will Facebook use to ban Germans from legitimately discussing the policy concerns of their country, which purports to be a democracy? Racism, of course:

> We are committed to working closely with the German government on this important issue," Debbie Frost, a spokeswoman for Menlo Park, California-based Facebook, said via e-mail. "We think the best solutions to dealing with people > who make racist and xenophobic comments can be found when service providers, government and civil society all work together to address this common challenge.

But can a true democracy exist when the public, who are supposed to be ultimate authority for the government, are not permitted to frankly debate policies?

George Soros demands Europe take in one million Muslims annually

Migrants disembark from a ship in Italy. It is sold as a Syrian crisis, but it seems like an open invitation for any Muslims who wish to invade. And where are their women?

Sometimes our global elites are very clear about their plans, but we are conditioned to think that conspiracy theories are just for kooks—so we ignore these clear statements.

A recent example of this is an opinion piece written by billionaire George Soros. In it, Soros states the EU must accept "at least" one million Muslims annually, and it must provide each "asylum seeker" $16,800 per year to cover housing, health care, and education costs.

Furthermore, Soros argues that the EU must step up funding to Islamic countries, even though many of those countries are not taking any "refugees" in response to the Syrian crisis.

Soros goes on to criticize Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orbán, whose tough stance on rejecting immigration, Soros says:

> [S]ubordinates the human rights of asylum-seekers and migrants to the security of borders, threatens to divide and destroy the EU by renouncing the values on which it was built and violating the laws that are supposed to govern it.

Fighting Homogeneity

Budapest Train Station – Why did they leave their women behind in the war zone?

The plan to flood Europe with Muslims is not new. Back in 2012, Irish businessman and Bilderberg Group attendee Peter Sutherland told the House of Lords that the leadership of the European Union needs to “do its best to undermine” the “homogeneity” of its member states.

Why is it necessary to undermine the homogeneity of European nations? Sutherland would claim that diversity somehow makes organizations and countries stronger. To prove this, advocates of diversity usually display polls of “diversity officers” from different companies who, not surprisingly, say that diversity does make organizations more effective.

But there is no actual proof that diversity, which in this context means introducing Muslims from the Middle East and Africa into the white nations of Europe, makes organizations more efficient. If it did, you would hear nations like China, Israel, Japan, and South Korea lining up to get their share of Islamic migrants. But those nations seem to be perfectly happy keeping their nations homogeneous.

The idea of resettling millions of Muslim migrants is deeply unpopular with the populations of the EU countries, but this is not going to stop the bureaucrats in Brussels from proceeding with their plans. Dimitris Avramopoulos, the EU Commissioner for Migration and Home Affairs, recently said that the EU’s leaders “do not care about the political cost” because they are not elected.

Pope Francis’ positions undermine Christianity in Europe

Camp of the Saints

The Catholic Church has historically been a bulwark in preserving the Christian culture of Europe. It was the Catholic faith that inspired the Crusades, the Reconquista, and the Battles of Lepanto and Vienna. Even as modern Europeans have abandoned their faith in Christ in exchange for a comfortable socialism, the Catholic Church has not stopped trying to rouse them from their slumber.

But Pope Francis' position on the migrant crisis threatens to further weaken Europe's already wobbly spiritual foundation rather than strengthen it. Francis issued a broad appeal to every parish and monastery to take in at least one "refugee" family.

Francis' reason for doing this is ostensibly obedience to the Gospel:

> Facing the tragedy of tens of thousands of refugees—fleeing death by war and famine, and journeying towards the hope of life—the Gospel calls, asking of us to be close to the smallest and forsaken. To give them a concrete hope.

The idea that we should not oppress the alien among us is certainly part of the teaching of the Christian faith. The Bible states: "You shall not oppress a resident alien; you know the heart of an alien, for you were aliens in the land of Egypt." But this doesn't mean that Christians are obligated to accept what amounts to an invasion by Muslim migrants.

The actual Catholic teaching on immigration, provided by Thomas Aquinas, is much more complex than Pope Francis' public statements would lead us to believe. Like the Jews in the Old Testament, Christians are to recognize that people from certain nations are more likely to be a good fit as immigrants. However, immigrants from nations who have proven to enemies of Christians should not be allowed to immigrate, but to be "held as foes in perpetuity." (cf. Summa Theologica I-II, Q. 105, Art. 3).

Why do the global elites want an Islamic invasion of Europe?

Peaceful Migrants

I suspect that the biggest reason that the global elites want to flood Europe with Islamic immigrants is that they place no value on culture—they view human beings purely as economic units. If Europeans are not reproducing at the rate necessary to sustain the current welfare state, then importing young, vibrant Muslim men who do want to reproduce will solve the problem.

Other people, like Pope Francis, are likely driven by Christian teachings of helping one's neighbor. However, these people are naively ignoring other considerations such as the continued safety and existence of European peoples.

Finally, other elites may view the destruction of European culture as a punishment for Europe's past "sins" such as its cultural hegemony. These individuals are fueled by irrational self-hatred.

Conclusion

King Jan Sobieski blessing the Polish attack on Turks in Vienna

During the Battle of Vienna, the grand vizier of the invading Ottoman Turks sent an emissary to deliver a summons of surrender to the city. The summons read:

> Accept Islam and live in peace under the Sultan! Or deliver up the fortress and live in peace under the Sultan as Christians; and if any man prefer, let him depart peaceably, taking his goods with him. But if you resist the Will of Allah, then death or spoliation or slavery shall be the fate of you all! Fight and you die! Surrender and you live!

The military governor of Vienna, Count Ernst Rüdiger von Starhemberg, told the crowd of people gathered near the town's Cathedral:

> The infidels promise us that if we surrender, all Christians will be allowed to remain Christian. But, ask the Greeks what that promise means. Ask the Serbs. Ask the Albanians. How do the people of Vienna reply to that invitation?

The crowd immediately responded with a shout "No!"

May the men of Europe find the same courage as their ancestors and resist the demands of the global elite to sacrifice their nations.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 5 Things I Learned From My First Trip To Europe

Michael Sebastian

Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The Mountain And The Valley

October 1, 2015 | by Marcus Aurelius | Link | Original Link

There was once a tall mountain that stood on a ragged stretch of coastline, where storms blew and rain blasted the beaches. Wind and wave and water had smashed at the mountain for time out of mind. Not even the hardiest seabird could live long upon its slopes for the ferocity of the storms that fell upon it.

Every green plant had been scoured from the mountain's face. But the mountain was of a great height and made of hardest stone; the winds that battered it had worn away all trace of softness from its face, and so it was undaunted by the tempests the sea and the sky hurled at it, and it stood strong.

Below the mountain, shielded from the sea and the wind, lay a green valley. The mountain broke the storms that came from the sea, and when rain fell, the valley gathered every drop of water into a river at the valley's floor. Thanks to the valley's depth and its place in the shadow of the mountain, the sun could not steal the water from the river. Thanks to the softness of its soil, trees, plants, and grass all grew there in abundance. Animals lived there, and men and women made the valley their home.

One day, the valley looked up to the heights of the mountain, where thunder rolled and stone wrestled with water. And the valley said to the mountain, “Why do you leave me here, in your shadow? Why must I lie here, never to see the sun, while you stand in the noon?”

“This is how I was made,” replied the mountain, “as surely as the creator made you. You cannot stand against the storm, but no green thing will ever grow upon my slopes, and I must forever look from afar upon the life that thrives within you. Shall we do other than as our creator formed us?”

“The creator has not spoken to us,” said the valley, “and he changes all things in time. He builds new mountains from the hot fires below the earth. When the earth quakes, he reaves new valleys. You have changed, with time, as have I; can we not change ourselves?”

“The creator has not spoken to us, but silence is not yes,” replied the mountain.

“And silence is not no,” said the valley. “I pray you, give me a little of your height, that I might glimpse the sun.”

The mountain thought long on the valley’s plea, and deemed its purpose was to work in harmony with the valley. And so the mountain allowed a little of its great height to fall into the valley, and thus the depth of the valley was a little reduced. A little sun came into the valley, and a little of its greenery became brown, and the men in the valley sought shelter for an hour of the day.

The valley spoke again to the mountain. “I see a little of the sun now, and all is well with those who shelter within me. But this light upon you is glorious; had I more of your height, more still of the sun could I bring to the men who live here, more still could bloom and flourish.”

“But if my height be lowered further, the greatest of the sea’s storms will pass over me unhindered,” replied the mountain. “There will be more water and wind upon you, and upon all the growing things in your valley, and there will be suffering among the men that make you their home.”

“You speak of something of which you are ignorant,” said the valley. “What do you understand of growing things? Nothing green stands upon your slopes. You know only war against the storm and the sea. For time out of mind I have nurtured the plants and the animals and the men who live here. I know better than you what the limits of endurance are. Do you fear a rival to your height? Is that why you deny me a little more sun, a little more light for those things growing in my valley?”

The mountain again thought long on the valley’s plea, and deemed its purpose was to preserve the valley and all it held. And so the mountain gave more of its height to fall into the valley, and more of the valley’s depth was consumed. And the greatest storms overcame the mountain, and sunlight reached the valley’s floor, and some soil dried out, and there was devastation twice in the year. Some of the animals departed, and some of the plants were inundated, and the edible grasses died and weeds took their place, and the men in the valley suffered and asked themselves why their world had changed.

The valley once more spoke to the mountain. “How wonderful is the sunlight! And the bracing breeze on my face! Had I known these would be the benefits of your height, mountain, I would have asked for your height an age ago! How is it you did not tell me of these things before? Your greed has kept these from me! I demand you make our heights equal, as recompense for the wrongs you have done me all these long years!”

“You do not know what you are asking,” said the mountain. “I cannot make you my height, without changing all that I am. And you cannot reach my height, without changing all that you are. See what your change has wrought even so far. The soil dries out. I am weakened against the onslaught of the sea’s storms. What of the greenery that lay in your depths? What of the animals, and the men who dwelt with you?”

“You still would lecture me on things that are in my keeping,” replied the valley. “And I see now you do it only for fear that I would be what you once were. I can protect that which lies within me. And I have dwelt so long in shadow that I will not return to it, and I will not stand with my freedom half-seized. Unless I am your height, nothing I am matters, and I swear if you do not make me your height, I will take it for myself, and I will give no shelter to the men within me, nor foster another green thing within my walls.”

The mountain saw that there was nothing more it could say to the valley. The mountain thought to fight the valley, but its strength had been bled away by the giving of its height. And the mountain remembered the suffering men, the struggling animals, and the wilting plants, and it could not bear to see them destroyed in battle between mountain and valley.

So the mountain gave what was left of its height to the valley, and the mountain fell, and the valley was filled.

Then the storms rolled in. The winds of the ragged coastline scoured all things green there, and the land flooded from the ferocity of the storm. The soil dried out under the merciless sun, and blew away with the wind. And where the mountain and valley had stood there lay a desert, where jackals howled and vultures rode the air. And the men who had lived in the valley suffered, thirsted, and fled that cursed place.

Read More: The Thrill Of The Mountain Makes You A Man

Marcus Aurelius
Marcus is a newly-awakened red pill hidden inside the Matrix, seeking to bring down the system from within. In the meantime he has books to read, writing to do, medieval swordsmanship to practice, and does not charge by the hour.

Why Incubators Are Set To Transform Business Development In The 21st Century

October 1, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by FDT Incubator

If you pay any mind to Silicon Valley activity, you would've likely heard the buzzword "Incubator" by now. Perhaps you think incubators are confined to software development, but they're much more than that: incubators are the next generation of talent development and are set to revolutionize the 21st century's economy.

Let's backtrack a second to provide definition for those not in the know. Incubators are, more or less, enterprises that help startup companies develop by providing services like management training or office space.
Consider the world's most famous incubator, Y Combinator. YC accepts pitches from startup companies with stellar ideas, injects them with $120,000 of capital, then works intensively with them over the course of three months to get their startup ready to pitch to investors. Of course some of these startups fail. Others, like Airbnb and Reddit, shoot to the stratosphere, and YC cashes out earning much more than their initial investment.

The model was made famous with software startups, but incubators can now be found in any industry, from hardware development to experimental restaurant design to finance. Incubators exist in different industries for different reasons. Ultimately they are the most efficient and fair ways of finding and nurturing new talent. Now why is that?

1. Incubators are data-driven

At the core of any incubator is data. What works, what doesn't. If you've taken a Gender Studies class, you'll remember lectures about how you should consider a variety of qualitative factors – not just data. But in reality, it's cold hard quantitative data that drives sales and growth.

Or consider this: a financial incubator that actively recruits people with no professional experience or finance, or perhaps no formal education in the finance sector. Through an app that allows users to competitively trade different financial markets against their friends and other players around the world, this incubator gathers data on its users, which allows them to weed out those with potential vs. those too risk-prone.

2. Incubators are about skill development

Incubators are meant to be a learning experience. They are designed to provide you with an environment where your skillset can be nurtured under the guidance of peers and experts.

This skill development can take a variety of forms. One popular method is mentorship from industry experts. These are experts late in their careers that want to see the next generation thrive and prosper. For example, Stanford's StartX incubator has executives from many of the world's great software companies as mentors. These industry experts have already seen it all, with no problem being new to them, and they are there to help you.

3. Incubators are about meritocracy

It should be refreshing for ROK readers to hear that Incubators are absolutely NOT about affirmative action or representing the "underrepresented." They're about showing that you can improve your skills and develop a plan to take your passion or profession to the next level.

Your endgame in an incubator will be unique. How you define success is up to you. It might be that your startup's app gets a next round of funding, because of its quality and market potential, or that you're invited to an interview at a big financial firm because you have proven that you have the ability to succeed through your track record of increasing profitability when trading.

A special kind of incubator

One example of an incubator that scouts out budding financial talent and gives them a leg up is FDT Incubator. Through its ForexMaster app, FDT Incubator allows users to develop their trading skills and financial literacy by competitively trading against their friends — or strangers — from around the world. For users it's entirely cost/risk-free.

Anyone that proves themselves to be a consistently profitable virtual trader has the chance to participate in FDT's free Incubator program, where they will have the opportunity to receive seed capital to manage a real, funded trading account. As users progress through the Incubator they will have more and more responsibility as a trader—and take home a bigger and bigger cut of their earnings. The best part is, many of the top traders on ForexMaster don't have traditional finance backgrounds — they got to where they are based on practice and skill alone.

To inform their talent discovery model, FDT Incubator holds monthly contests for students to prove their skills and win some cold, hard cash. Currently, FDT Is hosting a free-to-enter Trade-A-Thon where $25,000 worth of prizes (including the newest iPhone 6s Plus and iPad mini 4) are on the table.

There are many other examples of Incubators. FDT Incubator isn't the only one. But it's a model that's beginning to prove itself, allowing talent a way to reach the top – without hiring quotas to get in their way.

Learn more about FDT Trade-A-Thon 2015 here.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Twitter Feminists “Convict” Singer Kesha’s Music Producer Of Rape

October 2, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

For some time now, self-styled bad girl pop singer Kesha has been locked in a civil legal battle with her long-term producer, Dr. Luke (Lukasz Gottwald). Among other things, such as claims he forced her to take narcotics, Kesha alleges that Dr. Luke raped and abused her over a ten year period. “Rape culture” hysteria being as it is, many have rushed to take Kesha’s side, adamantly calling the respected producer a rapist. Coincidentally, Kesha is contractually unable to record or generally perform outside of her commercial partnership with Dr. Luke.

Already a multimillionaire (unless she spent it all), Kesha’s legal representatives are imploring a New York court to issue an injunction to speed up the case. She has already failed at having the suit heard in California, as her contract with Dr. Luke stipulated that disputes must be dealt with in New York. Anyone with a semblance of legal knowledge is aware that civil cases are usually protracted and, above all else, costly. Kesha is thus looking to do what few others can, as she says her career will be “ruined” if she can’t rid herself of her obligations with Dr. Luke and quickly find someone else to work with.

Twitter feminists are now bemoaning the financial loss to Kesha from speaking about her “rape,” without anything so much as a thimble’s worth of proof against Dr. Luke. Here’s an example:

> she was raped and abused by her producer for 10 years, and now she is being blackmailed. she can't speak now, but we can. #FreedomForKesha

> — avyn (@perfectalone) September 22, 2015

The media is abandoning any sense of journalistic ethics

It's very fitting that Anna Silman has worked extensively in Salon's entertainment section. Legal niceties like the presumption of innocence and the effect on someone accused of rape (without a criminal arraignment) don't gel well with focusing on poor multimillionaire Kesha's possible financial situation.

Salon's Anna Silman is representative of those writing for a wide number of media outlets (although overall ownership of the outlets themselves is much more concentrated). These writers are repeatedly focusing on what the suit costs Kesha. Completely forgotten in this context is the gargantuan cost to Dr. Luke, who has been accused of rape, a serious felony, in a civil court. Make no mistake, the civil nature of the suit is designed to a) make it much, much easier to brand Dr. Luke a rapist without the need for a higher criminal standard and b) excuse Kesha from her contractional arrangements with him. As for the branding him a rapist part, thousands of online feminists have already taken Kesha's allegations as Gospel truth.

Silman's use of title ("People are demanding #FreedomForKesha: Here's what accusing a powerful producer of rape has cost her") removes any doubt as to her partiality. Of course, Kesha is contractually obligated to work with Dr. Luke and therefore does not earn as an entertainer without him. No one challenges this.

Yet in an unresolved civil court case, why does Kesha alone matter? In our lifetimes, aside from occasional, heat-of-the-moment journalistic attacks on Sabrina Rubin Erdely UVA-style pieces of fiction, mainstream media outlets have not ever made a scene about emphasizing what a rape accusation, still to be resolved, costs a man.

Anna Silman and others have not been free to write anything they wish, but if you desire a report and not a semi-opinion piece, you won't find one from them.

Where lots of money meets rape accusations

Plenty of people have used the word “rape” without explaining how exactly rape occurred in this story. Where’s the evidence, folks?

The largest elements of Kesha’s earlier court filings concern not rape accusations, but contractual disputes. In the same suit in which she alleged rape, she claimed that Dr. Luke had reneged on a promise to renegotiate her exclusive business relationship with him. Because of the lack of any substantive evidence to even suggest rape, all we know for certain is that this is an argument about money.

And although Kesha’s contract with Dr. Luke predated these legislative changes, many states have now amended laws so that contracts can be nullified in the case of “sexual harassment” or similar situations. Making an accusation of rape in a civil court is now a ready-made vehicle for getting out of a contract, all with a much lower standard of proof than a criminal court.

Kesha is also not making any real sense in her choice of a co-defendant to Dr. Luke. Having repeated ad nauseam how Dr. Luke supposedly controlled and gagged her for ten years, she has gone to the trouble of suing Sony, which is the larger entity to which Dr. Luke’s Kemosabe Records belongs. Sony skilfully slapped down her allegations against it, questioning how it could have enabled Dr. Luke’s alleged behavior if she didn’t come to them. So, if in doubt, don’t just sue your label, sue the whole damn corporation.

If Dr. Luke is a rapist, show evidence and not Twitter rhetoric

People rushed to believe Sabrina Rubin Erdely's Rolling Stone piece on the UVA rape hoax as much as people are believing Kesha's court filings. Both were/are accusations without any accompanying proof.

"I believe women" has become the catchphrase of a generation (or three) of feminists to navigate around the distinct lack of evidence accompanying most rape allegations. Even when these allegations crop up in disputes over millions of dollars, the woman just has to be believed and those supporting the accuser do not need a court decision, especially a criminal one, to swiftly label a man a rapist. Presumed innocence is as dead as Kesha's career might soon become.

Social discourse in the United States has become so retrograde that people will moan about the potential loss of income to a vainglorious celebrity singer and not the rush to judge a man as a criminal when he hasn't even had an arraignment for a felony, let alone a criminal conviction recorded against him.

It is par for the course in our sad world that the person in this dispute who wants more money for herself, Kesha, is the one being believed. In the meantime, thousands are calling a man a rapist, despite the vast majority of them not even knowing his professional name, not to mention his legal name, before they read some feminist opinion piece masquerading as a courtroom news report.

Read More: UK Feminists Attack Barrister Because Of His Warnings About Rape Hysteria

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Good And Bad Of Henry David Thoreau’s Walden

October 2, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I originally read Henry David Thoreau’s Walden when I was about 25 years old. At that time I was so heavily invested in the consumer lifestyle that I was thinking about buying a luxury automobile. Walden made me strongly reconsider that notion, using sound arguments to put me on a minimalist and nomadic path that I’ve sustained since then. I recently re-read the book to see if there was anything I missed the first time around or if my beliefs have changed in the previous decade.

One thing that immediately struck me in my second reading is an arrogance that borders on egomaniacal delusion. He started writing Walden in his late 20’s, yet his tone is one of absolute certainty in finding an obviously superior lifestyle (one that he never re-attempted after the book was published).

> Practically, the old have no very important advice to give the young, their own experience has been so partial, and their lives have been such miserable failures, for private reasons, as they must believe; and it may be that they have some > faith left which belies that experience, and they are only less young than they were. I have lived some thirty years on this planet, and I have yet to hear the first syllable of valuable or even earnest advice from my seniors. They have told me nothing, and probably cannot tell me anything to the purpose.

Can you imagine a young man coming up to you and saying that his elders have absolutely nothing of use to say? You'd probably tell him to go right back to the cabin he is living in, and I'm sure many people actually did just that, and yet not even two pages after the above passage he cites a quote from Confucius that actually condemns his own behavior: "To know that we know what we know, and that we do not know what we do not know, that is true knowledge." Unless you lived life exactly as he prescribed, you were some kind of fool or peasant, but only the life he himself role-played for not more than two years.

In Walden, Thoreau used an extended camping trip as a device to push individualist notions of the Enlightenment age to browbeat people into living his lifestyle. It's no surprise that he was not well-liked by his peers, though if you put his arrogance aside, he did a fine job describing the problem of modern society, especially one based on blind consumerism that does nothing to further the development of man. While his anti-family and anti-tradition solutions can't be applied but for a tiny percentage of naturally hermetic men, his cultural analysis makes this book worth reading, especially for men who need a wake-up call from living an empty modern lifestyle.

On superfluous work

> I see young men, my townsmen, whose misfortune it is to have inherited farms, houses, barns, cattle, and farming tools; for these are more easily acquired than got rid of. Better if they had been born in the open pasture and suckled by a wolf, that they might have seen with clearer eyes what field they were called to labor in. Who made them serfs of the soil? Why should they eat their sixty acres, when > man is condemned to eat only his peck of dirt? Why should they begin digging their graves as soon as they are born?

>
> […]
>
> Most men, even in this comparatively free country, through mere ignorance and mistake, are so occupied with the factitious cares and superfluously coarse labors of life that its finer fruits cannot be plucked by them. (…) He has no time to be anything but a machine.
>
> […]
>
> However, I should never have broken a horse or bull and taken him to board for any work he might do for me, for fear I should become a horseman or a herdsman merely; and if society seems to be the gainer by so doing, are we certain that what is one man's gain is not another's loss, and that the stable-boy has equal cause with his master to be satisfied?
>
> […]
>
> Most of the stone a nation hammers goes toward its tomb only. It buries itself alive. As for the Pyramids, there is nothing to wonder at in them so much as the fact that so many men could be found degraded enough to spend their lives constructing a tomb for some ambitious booby, whom it would have been wiser and manlier to have drowned in the Nile, and then given his body to the dogs.
>
> […]
>
> Many are concerned about the monuments of the West and the East—to know who built them. For my part, I should like to know who in those days did not build them—who were above such trifling.

On comfort

> Most of the luxuries, and many of the so-called comforts of life, are not only not indispensable, but positive hindrances to the elevation of mankind. With respect to luxuries and comforts, the wisest have ever lived a more simple and meagre life than the poor.

On status

> It is an interesting question how far men would retain their relative rank if they were divested of their clothes. Could you, in such a case, tell surely of any company of civilized men which belonged to the most respected class? When Madam Pfeiffer, in her adventurous travels round the world, from east to west, had got so near home as Asiatic Russia, she says that she felt the necessity of wearing other than a travelling dress, when she went to meet the authorities, for she "was now in a civilized country, where… people are judged of by their clothes." Even in our democratic New England towns the accidental possession of wealth, and its manifestation in dress and equipage alone, obtain for the > possessor almost universal respect.

On self-development

> While civilization has been improving our houses, it has not equally improved the men who are to inhabit them. It has created palaces, but it was not so easy to create noblemen and kings. And if the civilized man's pursuits are no worthier than the savage's, if he is employed the greater part of his life in obtaining gross necessaries and comforts merely, why should he have a better dwelling than the former?
>
> […]
>
> "But," says one, "you do not mean that the students should go to work with their hands instead of their heads?" I do not mean that exactly, but I mean something which he might think a good deal like that; I mean that they should not play life, or study it merely, while the community supports them at this expensive game, but earnestly live it from beginning to end. How could youths better learn to live than by at once trying the experiment of living?
>
> […]
>
> Every man is the builder of a temple, called his body, to the god he worships, after a style purely his own, nor can he get off by hammering marble instead. We are all sculptors and painters, and our material is our own flesh and blood and bones. Any nobleness begins at once to refine a man's features, any meanness or sensuality to imbrute them.

On deliberate, simple living

> I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived. I did not wish to live what was not life, living is so dear; nor did I wish to practise resignation, unless it was quite necessary. I wanted to live deep and suck out all the marrow of life, to live so sturdily and Spartan-like as to put to rout all that was not life, to cut a broad swath and shave close, to drive life into a corner, and reduce it to its lowest terms, and, if it proved to be mean, why then to get the whole and genuine meanness of it, and publish its meanness to the world; or if it were sublime, to know it by experience, and be able to give a true account of it in my next excursion.
>
> […]
>
> There is some of the same fitness in a man's building his own house that there is in a bird's building its own nest. Who knows but if men constructed their dwellings with their own hands, and provided food for themselves and families simply and honestly enough, the poetic faculty would be universally developed, as birds universally sing when they are so engaged? But alas! we do like > cowbirds and cuckoos, which lay their eggs in nests which other birds have built, and cheer no traveler with their chattering and unmusical notes.

>
> […]
>
> An honest man has hardly need to count more than his ten fingers, or in extreme cases he may add his ten toes, and lump the rest. Simplicity, simplicity, simplicity! I say, let your affairs be as two or three, and not a hundred or a thousand; instead of a million count half a dozen, and keep your accounts on your thumb-nail.

On poverty

> There are a thousand hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root, and it may be that he who bestows the largest amount of time and money on the needy is doing the most by his mode of life to produce that misery which he strives in vain to relieve.

On self-awareness

> The millions are awake enough for physical labor; but only one in a million is awake enough for effective intellectual exertion, only one in a hundred millions to a poetic or divine life. To be awake is to be alive. I have never yet met a man who was quite awake.

On current events

> And I am sure that I never read any memorable news in a newspaper. If we read of one man robbed, or murdered, or killed by accident, or one house burned, or one vessel wrecked, or one steamboat blown up, or one cow run over on the Western Railroad, or one mad dog killed, or one lot of grasshoppers in the > winter—we never need read of another. One is enough. If you are acquainted with the principle, what do you care for a myriad instances and applications? To a philosopher all news, as it is called, is gossip, and they who edit and read it are old women over their tea.

On reading the classics

> A man, any man, will go considerably out of his way to pick up a silver dollar; but here are golden words, which the wisest men of antiquity have uttered, and whose worth the wise of every succeeding age have assured us of;—and yet we learn to read only as far as Easy Reading, the primers and class-books, and when we leave school, the "Little Reading," and story-books, which are for boys and beginners; and our reading, our conversation and thinking, are all on a very low level, worthy only of pygmies and manikins.

He thinks the solution to a culture of anti-intellectualism is to encourage reading and open more schools, but we've done that in the 150 years since his book was written and the actual result has been a decrease of intellectualism. It's not the availability of books or idea that is the problem, but the dumbing of minds into passive receptacles of mass-produced slop.

Thoreau genuinely believed that his complaints could be solved by a tweak here or there, but he did not understand that human beings seek the path of least resistance, and when they are presented with a classical book of some sort versus getting attention on Facebook by uploading pictures of themselves, they will always pick the latter. He thought he lived at the lowest point of America's intellectualism, but actually lived at its height.

On solitude

> I find it wholesome to be alone the greater part of the time. To be in company, even with the best, is soon wearisome and dissipating. I love to be alone. I never found the companion that was so companionable as solitude. We are for the most part more lonely when we go abroad among men than when we stay in our chambers.

On pleasure

> I believe that water is the only drink for a wise man; wine is not so noble a liquor; and think of dashing the hopes of a morning with a cup of warm coffee, or of an evening with a dish of tea! Ah, how low I fall when I am tempted by them! Even music may be intoxicating. Such apparently slight causes destroyed Greece and Rome, and will destroy England and America.

The copy of Walden I had also included his famous essay Civil Disobedience, which purportedly inspired the likes of Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr.

> Under a government which imprisons any unjustly, the true place for a just man is also a prison.
>
> […]
>
> A minority is powerless while it conforms to the majority; it is not even a minority then; but it is irresistible when it clogs by its whole weight.
>
> […]
>
> But the rich man… is always sold to the institution which makes him rich. Absolutely speaking, the more money, the less virtue; for money comes between a man and his objects, and obtains them for him; and it was certainly no great virtue to obtain it.
>
> […]
>
> For my own part, I should not like to think that I ever rely on the protection of the State. But, if I deny the authority of the State when it presents its tax-bill, it will soon take and waste all my property, and so harass me and my children without end. This is hard. This makes it impossible for a man to live honestly, and at the > same time comfortably, in outward respects.

One of the reasons that Walden persists in popularity, beyond its message of “simple living” in an increasingly complex world, is that it serves as one of the best natural experiences ever recorded. It’s a breath of fresh of air to read an outdoors tale while modern society continues its blind descent into worshiping at the altar of cosmopolitanism and technology to solve all problems of human existence. At the same time, I don’t know how seriously I can take Thoreau about his prescription of living in the woods. He sang high praises for nature and solitude but ultimately decided, after two years, to permanently live away from nature and solitude. Maybe he was trolling?

Thoreau gets mixed reviews to this day, and I believe it’s not because of his message but his abrasive contempt and hypocrisy for not living a life that he suggested for others. Had he been a bit more humble and genuine, I have no doubt his work could have at least equaled that of his mentor, Ralph Waldo Emerson, who is considered an American hero by many. In spite of that complaint, this book does have tremendous value, especially the first half, and should be read by men who have gotten sucked up by a consumer tidal wave, and who need to be reminded of the folly of that path.

Read More: “Walden” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

My Experience At A Religious Retreat In America

October 3, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Recently I attended a multi-day religious retreat with over 1,000 other members of a traditional, simple, old fashioned religious organization. Personally I do not believe in the spiritual, but understand the importance of the institution of religion, and am able to learn insights and experience stimulating thought and discussion from certain such groups, not to mention the possibility of doing a little unicorn hunting on the side.

The Setting

Similar College Setting

The event was held in a small town college, and with classes out of session, we were housed in the dormitories. My building was constructed several decades ago, and was named after a woman, and I examined the plaque dedicating this multi-story institutional structure to her, which towered over anything else for miles around, and was pleased to see she was honored for being a "devoted wife, mother, teacher, active in church and community." This was at a public university, and I cannot imagine any such woman being similarly honored today.

Typical older attendee

The attendees were a mix of traditional, plain spoken and plain dressed people, with lots of knitting and crocheting by the women, traditional folk music, shape note singing (quite an amazing experience), a plethora of board games, traditional dance, lots of homemade items, which one could either learn how to make, or purchase, and good old fashioned fun.

There were attendees from all around the nation, and I was exposed to a wide range of people from different backgrounds. The bookstore offered a great variety of selections, and one title which caught my eye was “Empire of Illusion: The End of Literacy and the Triumph of Spectacle,” written by Pulitzer Prize winner Chris Hedges about the depravity of our current society.

One of many interesting titles from the fantastic bookstore

The Positives

Overall, the experience was positive, and in particular I would single out the shape note singing as an amazing spiritual and emotional experience. About 30 people gathered in a room, and would sing in four-part harmony a cappella, beautiful pieces of music, much of which dates back to the 1700s.

Shape Note Singing

Not only is the music beautiful, but the words instill a sense of simplicity, focus, sacrifice, and meaning. It is also amazing to think that shape note singing today sounds basically the same as it would have in the 1700s. I was disappointed, but not surprised, to see that almost all of the singers were several decades older than me, with the exception of one college age guy I had met earlier. Later, a couple of younger women joined us. I moved over to the first and began a conversation with her between songs.

1. The First Woman

She was thin, feminine with shoulder length hair, wore a dress, and had an interest in the traditional art of singing, plus she seemed very receptive to my conversation with her. We talked for a bit between songs, until eventually she reached across me and grabbed her cell phone, as I had lost out to the endless supply of Facebook clowns in entertaining her.

She then told me that her “partner” was at a shape note singing class right now in another state. At this point I dropped her and moved on to the last remaining possibility in the room. What “partner” meant did not matter to me: either she was a good, traditional, woman, as she appeared, in which case her partner was someone with whom she was in a committed dedicated long term relationship, or she had a girlfriend. Either way, she was no longer an option.

2. The Second Woman

The other female was a little old for me, appeared to be in her 30s, but still friendly and feminine, and I began chatting her up. She was nice enough, until a guy from across the room said “Honey, you should pick the next song”—she had a husband (incidentally, this group is unlikely to wear much jewelry, including wedding rings, and often skips the government marriage, so it’s not always easy to tell who’s available).

I was only slightly disappointed, as women were not the focus for me— the shape note singing was for me the highlight of the retreat, with one of the songs so beautiful and lyrics so moving that it brought tears to me eyes. It was also nice to see a group of various ages and backgrounds coming together to practice an ancient art and creating something beautiful together.

The Millennials

Typical younger attendee

The younger generation, however, are not following the same path as their elders. One of my first premonitions was upon leaving the dining hall on the first day, hearing a bunch of young teens say “Yeah, I hate that fucking song…” and my heart immediately sank, fearing that this group would be not that different from the typical American millennial.

My suspicions were soon reinforced when I attended an introductory meeting of young twenty and thirty-year-olds. The group numbered approximately 80, and out of these I counted exactly 8 women who were thin and cute enough to have ANY level of attraction. Out of these 8, almost all of them had unnatural hair coloration, multiple piercings, or tattoos, which are typically deal-killers for me.

A Scary Sight

The millennial generation has been deeply infected with social doctrine that normalizes the abnormal, and I soon learned that traditional religious millennials are no exception. We went around the room introducing ourselves, and were instructed to give our name, where we were from, and our Preferred Gender Pronoun.

At this point, I was tempted to get up and leave. But I would be around these people for the next several days, so I decided to sit through this exercise in silliness. When my turn came around, I said my name is Mr. Roscoe and I prefer to be referred to by the "Royal We." There were a couple of quiet snickers, but I have to imagine most were shocked that I would make light of such a serious, important question.

Out of everyone in the room, I counted at most three masculine men: One answered "I prefer to be called Brian," another "I am masculine." Everyone else was somehow able to keep a straight face and say things like "I'm Tom and I prefer he/him/his".

Much confusion in this group

I was wondering if there was even a point to this ridiculous exercise when finally one guy did give his birth name followed by his new female name and said he preferred "she/her/hers." So basically we wasted 10 minutes of time just so everyone knew one dude who saw Bruce Jenner's photo shoot and now thinks he's a chick.

TransJenner Has Infiltrated The Church

Trans-What?

Now, the silly exercise in pronoun choice was not only disturbing, but it was also completely out of place. Recently, I was attending a philosophy group with some friends, and an out of town visitor joined in, and kept injecting things about his sexuality that were completely irrelevant such as “Well, since I’m bi, I have a different view of agricultural policy…”

Of course, no one knew or cared where he liked to stick his penis, and this was completely inappropriate, but he continued several times offending us with inferences to his sexual adventures. I did not offer a countering opinion by stating “Well, since I typically prefer to bang thin Latinas with long hair, I think we should remove farm subsidies,” because everyone would have realized that was absurd and inappropriate, but signaling that you are bi or gay communicates that you are a good, trendy, progressive person, that should be listened to, and so no one objected.

The retreat exercise in Preferred Gender Pronouns was similarly out of place. It would have been only slightly less appropriate for us to give our name, age, and which other person in the room we wanted to bang.

Rejection Of Sex Roles

Indeed, the millennials no longer have any idea of traditional sex roles. During one of the evening dances, a fun activity and great way to meet new people, an elder came over to correct a couple dancing opposite to me—we were dancing French Contra style, where four people will dance in groups of two couples together in a circle.

The millennial couple dancing with me had swapped the male and female spots, and were instructed to correct them to match everyone else in the room. Their response was “Does it really matter? It doesn’t matter. We’re gender neutral here.” I don’t think they could comprehend that the dance has different moves that the men do together, the women do together, or the couple does together, and they are all planned for a reason and have different effects. Mixing up your location and letting anybody do anything ruins the whole idea of a planned group dance.

Contra Dancing—created for two sex roles

Out of the remaining women, the only option worth pursuing was a long-haired, thin blonde girl from the northeast who wore ankle length skirts and enjoyed traditional dance, but colored the tips of her long blonde hair blue. I suppose this was not quite as bad as dying one's entire head purple (I saw that) or shaving one's head like Miley Cyrus (as several younger girls had done), so I reluctantly accepted her as the only option that remained for me.

The only female with some unicorn ancestry

Four Lessons

“You haven’t had a good night until you’ve had a Mennonite” — It’s gotten this bad.

What are the lessons to be learned here?

First, out of a traditional, religious population of 1,500, if the only real option is one woman who has partially died her hair a neon color, then unicorns must be declared extinct in North America.

Second, men are to blame for allowing things to get where they are today. While there are certainly cases of extreme hateful feminists, I think the source of the movement of acceptance and inclusiveness comes from a good place. Caring, loving people, especially women who naturally have a nurturing side, want to include and love others, and not make them feel uncomfortable.

And indeed, Jesus welcomed whores and thieves alike, and did not judge them. But he didn’t hold slutwalks and pretend that what they were doing was a “brave independent lifestyle.” I honestly believe many of the people here, including the women who hosted the “Check Your White Privilege” workshop (NB: I did not attend), are coming from a good place, but are severely misguided. Women certainly can contribute to society in a positive way but they need to be led and have their actions directed by men towards productive goals.

Third, I do not see what can save the future society in America. I know a lot of talk on ROK is negative, but after seeing how a traditional conservative upbringing failed to counter the negative effects of societal corruption on these youth, how can one have hope? Even if the movement for Neomasculinity succeeds in creating more masculine, strong, leaders, we will have no good local women to choose from.

Fourth, there are some good role models among the elderly in these types of communities, so consider seeking them out for your own personal betterment. But don’t expect their granddaughter to be of value.

And while it was refreshing to be around strangers who would smile at you, and women who were never sarcastic or condescending, it’s nothing you can’t find on any street in South America, with far more attractive and higher quality women. In the end, the retreat felt like taking a trip in a time machine back about 15 years ago, when fat girls were super friendly and had great personalities, people were more social and happy, and approaching strangers was easier.

But 15 years is simply not far enough back in US history to find quality women.

Read More: Feminism Is On The Retreat

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

A Book From The 90s That Predicted Our Degenerate Future

October 4, 2015 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

There is a tendency for people who first come into this corner of the world to be dismayed and overwhelmed by the degeneracy. I would say that this is also true of the majority of people out there, who may not be quite as aware, but instinctively know that something is wrong.

How did society get this way, seemingly in such a short period of time? How do these people think? What is the history of their radical, deconstructivist ideology? There are many articles but a surprising lack of definitive guides. I'm currently working on a project to remedy that situation. You can't fight an enemy if you don't know how.

Fortunately there is a compact, definitive, and powerful book that encapsulates some of the thought processes, tricks, and recent history (mainly the late 50's to the 90's) of the lunatic "social justice" left. That book is Thomas Sowell's Vision of the Anointed.

In Vision, Sowell expands on themes regarding the contemporary left, some of which are amazingly prescient (the book was written in 1995). The major thing to understand in Vision, according to Sowell, is that there are two visions of the world, the "tragic vision," which emphasizes the tragedy of the human condition based around incentives and trade offs (i.e.: that there is no magic bullet), and the "vision of the anointed," which proposes magical "solutions" to problems while ignoring human behavior and allowing the said anointed to make themselves feel good in the process. Those opposing the anointed, the benighted masses, are not only wrong but morally inferior.

One thing that the book is lacking is that Sowell does not provide any solutions, but it is a nevertheless crucially important read, particularly for beginners that might not have much exposure to the red pill, Neomasculinity, or political philosophy in general.

Targets vs. Mascots

This freak would be an example of a mascot in Sowell's book.

One of the anointed's keynotes is their target vs. mascot method of judging situations. We all generally know this as the privilege vs. victim dichotomy. Sowell writes:

> The ideals of "a government of laws and not of men" and "equal protection of the law" are at the heart of American constitutional law and the democratic process. Yet, increasingly, government has come to be seen as a way of benefiting particular groups adopted as mascots, often without much regard for what that does to other groups or the integrity of the system as a whole. Groups disliked, distrusted, or feared by the general public are particularly eligible to become mascots who symbolize the superior wisdom and virtue of the anointed. (pg. 149)

On the other side of the equation, you have targets:

> Just as the logic of their vision guides the anointed in their choices of mascots, so it guides their selection of targets. The prime requisite for both mascots and targets is that they must distinguish the anointed from the benighted. Just as groups disdained by others become eligible to be mascots of the anointed, so groups respected by others are eligible to become targets. These include business people, physicians, and other professionals, members of religious communities, policemen, and others whose social roles or financial success engender respect or influence in the society at large. Just as the law is stretched and strained for the benefit of mascots, so it is stretched and strained to the detriment of targets. (pg. 168)

Verbal Inflation

Her payment in inflated social coinage.

The most common tactic that the freaks use to jockey for status is what Thomas Sowell calls “verbal inflation.” What Sowell could not have foreseen was just how prescient his words were with the contemporary power of social media. If, when the book was written, the verbal inflation game was played by devaluing the metals of the verbal coinage, today’s inflation is an endless digital stockpiling of that verbal coinage, almost turning language itself into a virtual reality:

> In addition to particular words and phrases which betray the mindset of those with the prevailing vision, there is a more general tendency toward verbal inflation among the anointed. Thus ordinary vicissitudes of life become “traumas.” Any situation which they wish to change becomes a “crisis,” regardless of whether it is any worse than usual or is already getting better on its own.
>
> Verbal inflation, like monteary inflation, would have no effect if everyone understood what was happening and could adjust to it immediately. A ten-fold increase in the price level would mean nothing if everyone were free to add a zero to the sums in all contracts, laws, cash on hand, etc., and do so immediately. Inflation has an economic effect precisely because there is no such instantaneous and total flexibility. In the real world of lagging adjustments, borrowers pay back less than they owe, workers are paid less than they were promised, and the government cheats its way out of part of the national debt by paying it off in dollars that are worth less than the dollars that were borrowed. Verbal inflation likewise enables some people to cheat others. When > “harassment,” “discrimination,” or even “rape” are redefined to include things going far beyond the original meanings of these words, there would be no real change if everyone understood what the inflated words now mean and neither social stigmas nor the penalties of the laws applied to the vast range of new things encompassed by these new meanings.

>
> In both cases, runaway inflation is not just a zero-sum game. Monetary inflation not only redistributes benefits but can also reduce the sum total of those benefits, by undermining the credibility of the monetary unit and with it undermining the predictability of the whole system of which it is part, causing the economy to be less productive as people restrict what they do and plan, in order to avoid vastly increased risks. For similar reasons, human relations suffer when the verbal common currency of social interaction loses its meaning and predictability, so that people now protect themselves from new risks by various ways of withdrawing from one another and reducing their cooperation. (pg. 215-16)

Remember, this was written in 1995.

The Need For Novelty

This is their art, currently on display at Versailles. Louis XIV would be aghast.

To demonstrate their superiority to the benighted masses that aren’t as smart and sophisticated as they are, the freaks have a need to flaunt their freak-ism. If they can’t be beautiful, they’ll signal their moral superiority by celebrating vulgar things under the guise that they are “new,” and they are thus “enlightened.” This is a phenomenon we are all familiar with, and so was Sowell:

> The charge is often made against the intelligentsia and other members of the anointed that their theories and the policies based on them lack common sense. But the very commonness of common sense makes it unlikely to have any appeal to the anointed. How can they be wiser and nobler than everyone else while agreeing with everyone else? In everything from avant-garde art, music, and drama to exotic animals and "radical chic" activities, the stress is on their own differences, their specialness.
>
> Consistent with this pattern of seeking differentiation at virtually all cost has been the adoption of a variety of anti-social individuals and groups as special objects of solicitude – which is, to say, special examples of the wider and loftier vision of the anointed. From multiple murderers to smelly vagrants, these anti-social elements have been adopted as mascots, much like exotic animals. The stigmas put on these mascots by the rest of society merely provide yet another occasion for the anointed to blame society itself for failing to "solve" these people's "problems." (pg. 248)

The Future

Taking selfies while still in diapers. Get ready.

Sowell's prescient warnings were dead on target:

> The full dangers of the vision of the anointed cannot reveal themselves immediately. Even the anointed themselves are currently under at least the residual influence of traditional philosophical, religious, and moral inhibitions. To the extent that their vision prevails and endures, however, successive generations of the anointed will be less and less under the influence of these eroding traditional constraints, and the pure logic of their vision can operate more fully. (pg. 260)

Thomas Sowell, once again, wrote these words in 1995 – 20 years ago. As he wrote these words, a new generation was being educated by the older "anointed."

I have remarked upon the differences between the 80's-born Millennials (the cohort I fall into) before on the forum and on my semi-regular stream/podcast, The Bardic Circle. We both agree (as do many on the forum), that the 90's born Millennials are far more neurotic and are the main source of SJWs. With the second half of the Millennials in particular, we seem to be seeing the fruits Sowell wrote about.

It is not a coincidence that the "social justice" freak show, or the vision of the anointed, emerged into the cultural mainstream and out of the ivory towers of the intellectuals (which Sowell was mainly discussing) at the same time that this cohort came of age.

I greatly fear that as the generation behind the Millennials comes of age, the culture will get even more detached from reality, and Sowell's prophecy will echo with even more amplification. Even Millennials, and 90's ones at that, had a few tempering influences – access to attention whoring technology was still limited for the overwhelming majority of their lifetimes. It is not limited now, and the generation behind them (the so-called Generation Z), grew up with it.

We must resolve to use that technology for our own ends and to be examples of a counter narrative, a counter vision. Sowell was short on offering solutions in his book – that will be on us, but nevertheless, his book is important for our side to read. We cannot fight an enemy we don't understand, and he sheds crucial understanding in Vision.

Read More: 35 Pretty Girls Who Became Fat And Ugly

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

How The “The Big Bang Theory” And Other Mainstream Sitcoms Lie To Men

October 4, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

I used to be a fan of The Big Bang Theory. Pre-red pill, it was one of those shows I used to binge watch, along with Friends or Seinfeld. Since I hadn’t watched it in a few years, I was taken quite unawares when I heard that actress Kaley Cuoco was getting divorced. To whom, I wondered, had our dear Penny tied the knot in real life? Curious, I looked up the man in question, and immediately had to stifle a bout of laughter. Here he is –

Ok stop. Lets stop right here. I'm declaring it. Its official.

Neomasculine ideas about male-female relationships are correct.

Like a woman suspicious of a charming man's real personality, I've sought to shit test neomasculinity at every opportunity. Like many recovering betas, I still wake up in the mornings finding it hard to believe I – prince Charming incarnate, have not yet found my Rapunzel to rescue.

But every now and then, something comes along that stabs that doubting angel in the heart and throws him overboard. The whole premise of the Big Bang Theory – indeed, a story at the root of most modern sitcoms, is that nice guys can still get the girl.

We are meant to believe that Leonard Hoffstadder, the sniveling, 5'7", supremely geeky, but still possessing a heart-of-gold protagonist of the show can end up with bombshell Penny, played of course by real life hottie Kaley Cuoco. We even found out a few years ago that the two co-stars briefly dated, seeding hopes that real life could imitate art.

Unfortunately, despite filling our heads with so many hopes and dreams, sitcoms are still fiction, and can be dramatically overshadowed by real life. Kaley's apparently soon to be ex-husband – Ryan Sweeting, is a man about as far from Leonard as we can possibly imagine.

For starters, he's a muscle-bound 6-foot-5, putting him in the literal top 1% of all men. He's an internationally famous tennis star and has a savage, bearded look that hasn't been out of fashion in about twenty thousand years.

The distinction could not be clearer:

Fantasy

Reality

Fantasy

Reality

Fantasy

Reality

Rarely have we ever seen a more pure demonstration. Here we have a hot but aging actress, pushing thirty, who abandons any pretense that, like her character, she actually has a thing for nerdy guys, and instead follows her ~~gina tingles~~ heart and goes for the 6’5” international tennis star.

Clearly aware of the onrushing wall, Cuoco married Sweeting shortly after her 28th birthday and after just three months of dating. Oddly enough, I actually started penning this article before the recent news Cuoco is getting separated, but when there were already rumours circulating of Sweeting’s infidelity. Obviously Sweeting, only 28 himself, started wondering why he should restrict himself to only one woman when he could easily rack up notches in the wild.

Other Examples

Quietly smirking at all this, I found myself wondering, what about other actors and actresses we’ve seen playing similar relationships? Whatever happened to the old Leonard and Penny – Ross and Rachael off Friends?

Well, David Schwimmer and Jennifer Aniston are still both successful actors, but their personal lives have wildly diverged since 2005. After dating a string of singers and actresses, Schwimmer settled down with British artist Zoe Buchman – eighteen years his junior – and his since had a kid.

Ross! Ross! Ross!

Aniston has also been through a string of relationships, the list reading like a “Who’s Who?” of Hollywood actors in steadily descending order of fame.

After being divorced from Brad Pitt in 2005, she bounced around for a few years before settling with semi-famous (and two years her junior) Justin Theroux earlier this year.

Having once proclaimed “I’ve never in my life said I didn’t want to have children. I did and I do and I will… I would never give up that experience for a career” Aniston may finally be getting a move on. Recent news reports are that she is now pregnant with twins. At 46 years of age, it only took her 13 years (and a round of IVF) longer than her sitcom character, or 20 years if she hadn’t broken up with Ross the first goddamned time.

So best of luck to her, but I do wonder if she regrets waiting so long that, by the time her kids graduate high school, she’ll be eligible for Medicare?

Happy Endings

I can already hear a few people asking – so aside from the general Schadenfreude, what's your point Thomas? Isn't this just pointless sitcoms and celebrity gossip?

Except these shows are more than just harmless entertainment. Whether you think its part of some wide ranging conspiracy or not, millions of people are indoctrinated in the lessons these shows portray. Every second episode of Friends drilled messages into our heads like "only horrible people judge one another!" or "girls are cute for failing to control their emotions, but guys are assholes!"

Fantasy

Reality

The worst part is that these shows seem to lose touch with reality more and more as time goes on. Leonard and Penny is just Ross and Rachael on steroids. At least Friends had plotlines like Rachael falling into the arms of alpha male "Paolo" while leaving Ross alone and bewildered, but The Big Bang Theory seems to read more and more like a feminist textbook over time. It leaves me wondering what the next generation of sitcoms will feature.

Perhaps we'll watch a show about a Victoria's Secret Model who grows frustrated with her life and all the tall, hot studs that keep hitting on her. Instead she falls in love with "little Timmy"– a crippled, autistic boy, blind in one eye, who lives across the hall, but is also a world famous Starcraft player and the biggest white knight this side of Prince Charming.

Good luck Timmy.

Read More: How The Toronto Media Is Enabling Lies Aimed At Roosh's World Tour

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Why Russia Is Becoming A More Attractive Place For Neomasculine Men To Call Home

October 5, 2015 | by Arson Greyer | Link | Original Link

A man who (wisely) chooses to leave the Western world today for greener pastures in the east has to be conscientious of the likelihood and timeline of their new home inheriting the pernicious and debilitating cultural Marxism and feminism of the west. A man moving to a place like Poland (or even Western Ukraine) today moves with the knowledge that these countries are on the trajectory towards Westernization and will very likely one day become unhealthy and hostile for a man to live and thrive in.

Due to their history and a variety of current cultural factors, places like Poland will still take a number of years to get anywhere near the DEFCOCK levels of America or the UK. One who chooses to live in an "on the trajectory" nation like Poland today does so by making a calculation that it may be, say, 5-10 years behind the levels of feminism in Western Europe and that it is still worth it to enjoy the particular benefits of this society during the decline, while they still remain. It is a temporary reprieve rather than a long-term fix to the problems men face in the west.

A Possible Solution?

Enter Russia. Russia presents intriguing future prospects for the modern neomasculine man because it is perhaps the only developed nation that is not “on the trajectory” towards Westernization. In fact, not only is Russia not on the trajectory Western feminization, but it is actively making strides in many areas to become more traditional and neomasculine than it is already.

Much of the credit for this resistance to Westernization can be attributed to Vladimir Putin – a strong, masculine, and intelligent leader who appears to be primarily interested in advancing the interests of the his nation and people rather than being firstly loyal to the lobbying interests of large corporations and other dubious groups that are accelerating much of Western cultural decline.

The intention of this article is to analyze how the recent policy of the Russian government in three critical areas – food, demography, and debt – is contributing to making Russia hold out from cultural decline and how emerging policy in these areas offer hope that Russia will be an increasingly attractive place for modern neomasculine men to call home.

Food

Russian policy envy on Twitter.

The question of how to sustain and nourish oneself is an important consideration for the modern man, as the prevalence of real "food" in the West declines and is replaced by chemicals, additives, and other garbage made in a factory. The regulation of what food is "safe" and recommendations on diet makeup that come from Western governments' food agencies can seldom be trusted because these regulators and researchers are bought off by large agri-food corporations that are pursuing a specific, profit-driven agenda for our food.

While the industrial food system continues to expand its reach over virtually every aspect of the Western diet, Russia has taken steps to implement meaningful food policies that protect its citizens from some of the pseudo-food now so commonly found in the west. Under Putin, Russia has completely banned the cultivation and import of Genetically Modified Foods (GMOs) for at least the next ten years so that the impact of these foods can be more properly studied before becoming part of the diet.

While the long-term effects of GMO consumption are unknown, there are already studies which link consumption of GMOs to tumors, birth defects, endocrine disruption, cancer, and obesity. Russia is prudently erring on the side of caution and not allowing its citizens to consume this new form of food which we do not yet know enough about. By contrast, in the United States, GMO foods are not only allowed but also need not be labelled. Even aware American consumers who want to avoid them have no easy way to do so.

Russia is also moving towards an increasingly organic agriculture system and the government has begun banning the use of many of the harshest, most unnatural pesticides and chemicals. The growth in prevalence of organic food in Russia is the highest of any nation in the world right now. For those men who dream of a simpler life living on an organic farm with a Slavic beauty and starting a family of healthy, half-Slavic stock, it is worth noting that Russia has immense amounts of beautiful vacant fertile land and women.

Even the centre-left Guardian acknowledges that "Russia is a haven for would-be organic farmers as land is relatively cheap and abundant, negating the need for many intensive agriculture inputs." While in America the government often bullies and disadvantages small producers in favor of large food conglomerates, the Russian government has in place incentives and assistance mechanisms to create more small-scale food producers in rural areas.

Demography

Slavic farm girl.

Much of the western world has not had a sustainable fertility rate for at least several decades. The population growth occurring in Western countries can be attributed almost entirely to immigrants, and once inside the country these immigrant groups often have a much higher birth rate than the native population.

This has strong implications for the preservation of the culture, values, laws, and traditions of these nations. While multiculturalism and the idea of having different distinct groups and nations (sometimes even with their own laws and territories) is now commonplace throughout much of the West, Russia is going against the tide by strictly controlling inflow to Russia, forcing assimilation rather than allowing multiculturalism and is taking steps to increase the native Russian birthrate to sustainable levels.

Putin is steadfastly in support of integrating immigrants through assimilation. It is expected that immigrants to Russia will give up many of the cultural elements of their former home and adopt Russian culture, language and traditions. Russia does not make accommodations for the holidays, celebrations, traditions and rituals of non-Russian ethnic groups in the same way that most western nations do.

Multiculturalism "elevates the (idea of the) 'right of minorities to be different' to the absolute and, at the same time, insufficiently balances this right with civil, behavioral, and cultural obligations in regard to the indigenous population and society as a whole," Putin argues. Russia is intent on protecting its current culture and is even embarking upon ambitious civilization-building projects to unite ethnic Russians of various different nationalities under the banner of being "Russian" before all else.

Putin's leadership in protecting the culture of his people can also be clearly seen in his response to the recent migrant crises. Russia is not accepting hordes of migrants who won't assimilate well and promising them ridiculously large social benefits, as many countries in Western Europe are.

Russian nationalists demonstrate.

Finally, Putin has introduced a number of pro-family policies such as a benchmark expectation that Russian families have at least three children. Putin said that “for Russia to be sovereign and strong, there should be more of us.” The Russian government has bonuses in place that act as incentives for families to have more children and relieve the financial burden that children can pose to a family.

Russia has also shown its support for the traditional, nuclear family by refusing to adopt the same pro-LGBTQ-LMNOPQRS delusional agenda for degenerate families that is commonplace and quickly evolving within the Western world. Nontraditional sexual relations may not be promoted to minors in any capacity. Compare this to most western nations where sexual education curricula for kids as young as five and six are quickly being adapted to include confusing messages about a range of deviant and dangerous sexual behaviours that the state now sanctions and promotes as normal and healthy.

Russia is protecting the traditional family in a way that other modern nations are not, because Russia knows that the family unit is an important building block to the construction and preservation of a stable society that maintains Russian values. The policy of most Western nations, by contrast, is to destroy and destabilize the family at all possible junctures in favor of the state.

Putin hands out the ‘Order of Parental Glory’ to families with more than seven children in a special ceremony.

Debt

Western nations – particularly the United States – have come to acquire crippling levels of debt that pose a threat to financial health and an extremely unfair burden on future generations. Money has been wasted by left-wing and right-wing governments alike on inefficient bureaucracies, useless social programs, welfare schemes, and numerous unnecessary wars. Politicians and the elite continue to make off with immense amounts of wealth while ordinary tax-payers find it harder and harder to get ahead. Today, most Western governments cannot possibly meet all of their self-imposed obligations and self-made promises without spending well beyond their revenues.

Russia, under Putin, is the only modernized nation which appears to have at least some understanding of the harmfulness of racking up unsustainable levels of debt and has taken some actions to correct this. When Putin came to power in 2000, Russia had over $50 billion in debt owed to external banks known to be controlled by some of the world's financial elite. Putin took immediate action to pay off this debt by diverting profits from the Russian state-owned gas company during a time when it was thriving under an environment of extremely high oil prices.

By 2006, Russia had rid itself of owing anything to international, elite-owned and controlled banks. The financial elite that controls much of the money supply around the globe was none too pleased about this, and have since attempted to employ a variety of financial and media-narrative methods to try to cripple the Russian economy, currency, and the reputation of its leaders.

This is punishment for Russia's lack of participation and cooperation in letting elite-controlled banking exerting influence over its nation-state with the intention of destabilizing Russia and turning its people against its current nationalistic government, which the elite could help to replace with an internationalist regime that would be friendly to the interests of the global financial elite.

Even though recent economic tough times have forced the Russian government to incur more debt in the last year or so, a comparison of key financial metrics between the United States and Russia for 2014 shows some important differences that definitely diverge from the common media narrative about the health of the Russian economy:

- The United States has 25 times more external debt than Russia in absolute dollars and 15 times more on a per capita basis.
- The United States has 47 percent higher unemployment levels than Russia (8.1% vs. 5.5%).
- A greater percentage of the population in the United States (15.1%) lives under the poverty line compared to Russia (12.7%).
- According to the IMF, Russia has approximately three times as much in official reserve assets and foreign currency assets ($357 billion vs. $121 billion) as of the year 2015.

These statistics, although only a sample of the vast amount of comparative economic data available, surprised me a lot because they paint a different picture of Russia's financial health than that projected by the Western media, the ownership of which is concentrated in the hands of a few interests which happen to be tied to the global financial elite.

These interests would prefer Russia to foster a debt addiction similar to that of the United States and other Western nations. While the economy in Russia is far from perfect, the situation economically – especially when it comes to debt and providing for citizens – is not nearly as bad as it is often made out to be.

Russia under Putin appears to have far less of a debt addiction than the USA, more savings, and has shown a willingness to eliminate borrowing from the elite internationalist financial overlords. He has even issued standing arrest warrants for members of the Rothschild family and George Soros – widely known to be figures of the global financial elite – for their well-documented efforts to deliberately interfere with Russia's currency and economy.

There are a lot of reasons to be hopeful about the path that Russia is currently on. It is well-positioned to hold out against the most culturally destructive forces in the world today and is making meaningful policy decisions that will ensure its society may be a good place for the next generation of masculine men to live.

I've decided that I'm going to spend two months in Russia in 2016 to get a better sense of how my quality of life there stacks up to my current living situation and more accurately gauge the cost of living on a more permanent basis.

Read More: Did SJWs Cost Russia Victory In The Eurovision Song Contest?

Arson Greyer
Arson is an anti-SJW crusader and critic of sexual marketplace deregulation who has gotten filthy rich from the non-existent gender pay gap. He enjoys spending as much time as possible outside of America in places where short-haired women are viewed as social outcasts rather than strong and independent.

Is Atheism Good?

October 5, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Is religious faith normal, natural, or desirable? Does it serve an important function in the life of man, or is it, rather, an aggregation of pernicious superstitions, designed to soothe timid souls and blind man to truth by retarding his development?

A thousand treatises, setting sail on oceans of ink, have been penned in response to these questions. I personally have argued that religious faith is a necessary part of civilization, and an indispensable tool in the cultivation and taming of the wild individual ego. This view, however, is not shared by all.

Jean Meslier's Testament

We will look at the life and writings of one such man, the dour Frenchman Jean Meslier (1678-1733). His Testament remains one of the most damning indictments of religion ever written, and must be given careful consideration by every fair-minded enquirer into these matters.

He was a quiet and withdrawn parish priest in the town of Etrepigny in Champagne, France. He had not wanted this profession; in his Testament, he makes it clear that he was ordained out of a desire to please his pious parents. He was never a believer, but kept this secret carefully hidden during his life.

The strain produced by such a disconnection between belief and profession must have been overwhelming. He died at the age of fifty-five, having served his local community dutifully and uneventfully for over thirty years.

But he left an incendiary tract to the world in his will. Among his papers discovered after his death was a book inscribed to his parishoners as a “bequest.” What he was unable to say during his life, apparently, he shouted out to the world from beyond the grave. For here was the most bleak and despairing endorsement of materialism and atheism that has ever been written. Let us examine this strange book.

It was not published in full until the 1860s, as its contents were deemed too disturbing for general consumption. Some French Enlightenment thinkers such as Voltaire, d’Holbach, and Diderot had released summaries before this time, however.

Meslier begins by describing how he became an atheist. His doubts began from an examination of the Bible. He was unsettled by the contradictions, uncertainties, and absurdities found there; unwilling or unable to interpret such things allegorically, he began to fill with resentment.

Promises of immortality he found unconvincing. The idea of a God who would create Hell as a depository institution for bad souls was to him unforgiveable cruelty: “Is there in nature a man so cruel as to wish in cold blood to torment, I do not say his fellow beings, but any sentient being whatever?”

Such a God could only be a wicked, cold being, unworthy of worship. To him it was also self-evident that it was God himself who created the evils which he then sought to punish.

In response to the argument that religious belief was natural, Meslier held that just the opposite was true:

> All children are atheists—they have no idea of God…Men believe in God only on the word of those who have no more idea of him than they themselves…Very few people would have a god if care had not been taken to give them one.

Meslier even attacked the idea of Christ as a positive figure. To him, the recalcitrant Jew was nothing but a “fanatic, a misanthrope, who, preaching to the wretched, advises them to be poor, to combat and extinguish nature, to hate pleasure, to seek sufferings, and to despise themselves.”

What bitterness! And yet Meslier is not finished. There is nothing after death except the void. God, he believes, is naught but a delusion, a figment of an overactive imagination. It has been created from the dawn of history by a joint conspiracy of clerics and rulers to keep the mass of people subservient and distracted.

And does religious belief contribute to the shaping of morality? No, Meslier responds:

> The nations where this fiction is established, are they remarkable for the morality of their conduct?…We see haughty tyrants, courtiers, countless extortioners, unscrupulous magistrates, imposters, adulterers, libertines, prostitutes, thieves, and rogues of all kinds, who have never doubted the existence of a vindictive God, or the punishments of hell, or the joys of Paradise.

Even the ancient Greek and Roman sages, Meslier argued, were unwilling to the face the stark truth of this reality. Despite being philosophers, they always genuflected to the gods of their day and era.

And so what, then, does this Frenchman think the ideal society should look like? He cast his vote in favor of a communistic utopia. Man could be happy if he abolished the ideas of privilege and property, for these were the root of all evil. All property should be nationalized by the state; every man should have his health and welfare guaranteed; and possessions should be held in common.

A page of Meslier's testament

What are we to make of this testament? A man's ideas are windows of his soul. We sense immediately the bitterness of a man resentful of a life wasted in a profession unsuited to him. This alone is a lesson to us, and a cautionary tale for the ages. Unable or unwilling to seek out his life's passion, he resigned himself to secret rage, and finally, to despair.

We must grant him his due regarding some of the absurdities found in theology. And yet, it escapes him that perhaps religious doctrines exist to serve subtle moral purposes, and that scientific fact is not their major concern.

His opinions about religion epitomize all the myopia common to materialism and atheism. He forgets the profoundly inspirational qualities of faith; he ignores religion's storehouse of literature, myth, and consoling rituals; and he entirely forgets the critical importance of religion in passing on a culture's moral values.

Had he understood the nature of man more deeply, he would have understood that only philosophers and saints can be induced to do good by appeals to reason alone; for the average man, only the fears of eternal damnation will keep his baser instincts in check. Religion is the best unsleeping sentry created by history.

His suggestions for creating a perfect society have been proven wrong by experience. He seeks to replace one god with another god, that of socialism. And here again, his inexperience with government and leadership reveal themselves starkly.

Despite its imperfections, flaws, and dead ends, Jean Meslier's Testament is still worth reading as an examination of the atheistic mind. It is a disturbing picture; for here is a man not at peace with himself, a man who lacked the resolution to follow his own path, a man who has been corroded at last by hate and repressed rage.

It is, perhaps, the best admonition against the danger of living an unfulfilled life that has yet been produced.

Read More: The Mountain And The Valley

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Flaws I Have Discovered In Red Pill Game Doctrines

October 6, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Having practiced game for a few years now, I'm fairly confident that I've just about maxed out on my SMV. I've slept with a good number of females in the upper echelon of aesthetic beauty, including a handful of 10s, and have managed to steer clear of the pitfalls caused by said women that sap men financially and emotionally.

However, when thinking back on past ONSs, relationships, short to long term trysts, and everything in between, it became clear to me that there are quite a few tenets that are flawed with regards to achieving (alleged) fidelity with the fairer sex.

They had shown themselves to me over the last few years and even a couple of times during my beta days, but not consistently enough for me to put my finger on it. But they are there nonetheless and here are the first two that stuck out to me.

Dread Game

If you're familiar with red pill game you're aware of what we call "dread game." Dread game is loosely defined as completely disappearing by cutting off all contact from a girl who is engaging in unacceptable behavior such as flaking, bitchiness, and the like.

The purpose of going off the grid is to make it clear to the girl that you can and will walk at any time. The idea is that longer you maintain radio silence, the more she dreads that you are gone for good. Her emotions, ego, and insatiable need for drama are all activated.

When this happens all she can think about is you and the possibility that you could be with another woman which sends her into a frenzy that manifests itself into endless calls and texts begging you to "just call or text" her so that the two of you can "talk and work this out."

Most of the time dread game is highly effective but here's the flaw: Most girls have more options than we do…*especially the good looking ones.

No matter how many girls a man has in his phone that he could text and have there at a moment's notice, you can bet your ass that each and every one of those girls has at least twice as many dudes she could contact who would be more than willing to come and bang her brains out in three words or less from her.

One girl I was fucking a while back got stupid and threw a fit about something I was or wasn't doing (I can't remember what it was but it was probably silly) and decided to cancel our meetup we'd planned for the next day. So I cut off contact with her for a few days.

She called and texted constantly for the first day and a half but after that she, too, went radio silent. A couple days later she texted me and said she was sorry for being a brat and that she'd like to meet up for a makeup fuck. I agreed, met up, and proceeded to let her drain my balls.

Mission accomplished, right?

Maybe, but not so fast. Her phone was buzzing the entire night from what were no doubt text messages from other guys. It didn't bother me in the least because I had never considered her for anything other than a fuck doll (I fucked her on our first "date") and my territorial instinct never kicks in for sluts.

The point is that if you run dread game for too long, a woman could assume that you're no longer interested, which badly bruises their fragile egos. The need to assuage their egos overwhelms them so they grab their phones or jump on Tinder to find a guy who will reaffirm their attractiveness and desirability.

The opposite could be true, but given the state of the sexual marketplace in the West, it's probably not…at least most of the time. If you don't give a shit about the girl it doesn't matter what she does or who she does it with during your blackout period. So long as she puts her pussy on a platter for you when you start talking again, it's all good.

So what's a man to do if a girl he actually likes acts up? If dread game can backfire how do you correct her bad behavior?

Simple. Run dread game but don't overdo it.

Rather than cutting off all contact for two or three or more days at a time, cut her off for hours at a time. If she texts you wait a few hours before texting back and when you do make sure your texts are short and sweet. For example:

Her: Hey what are you up to? [11:44 AM]

You: busy day [07:01 PM]

You can put your own spin on it, but so long as you keep it short and vague and wait for a few hours before you respond you will illicit feelings of dread within her. The response above will most assuredly compel her to text you back almost immediately and ask you what your busy day consisted of because she's fishing for anything that has to do with another chick.

This approach accomplishes almost the same dread as a two day absence would, but will also keep her from spiraling out of your orbit on the assumption that you may have moved on.

Matt Forney wrote an article titled All Women Have Sex Within 24 Hours Of Breaking Up With You and it is 1000% true. The fact is that if you let too much time go by before contacting your girl she'll "break up" with you in her own mind and make her way between the sheets with another man. Count on it.

Again, if she's a slut bucket you don't give a shit about, cool. Run standard dread game and let the good times roll. But if you actually like the girl and want to keep her around for a while don't over game her. Rather, completely withdraw your attention from her for a few hours and make her earn it back little by little.

Huge difference between the dread game you run on sluts and dread game you run on girls you want to keep around.

Pre-Selection

[image]

> A standard tenet of game is that women don't want a man that other women don't want. You could be as ugly as homemade sin but if you've got an attractive female with you, your SMV always spikes. This will send their hamsters into overdrive wondering if you're rich, great in the sack, or if you have high social status.
>
> -Donovan Sharpe

The above excerpt was taken from my article 9 Benefits Of Having Female Friends. In that article, I included screen shots of a text conversation I had with a girl after number closing her.

If you take a look at our exchange via text you saw her initial hesitation to get together on account of having my on-and-off FWB with me when I approached her (my FWB was in another aisle when I opened her, but she later saw us together in the checkout line).

I passed her shit test with flying colors and ended up closing the deal the night we met up. Pre-selection worked like a charm in that case as it had many times before. However, this can sometimes work against you—especially after you've started fucking her.

Example 1:

A girl I had been seeing for a couple of weeks stopped texting all of a sudden. I figured it was because she'd met someone else or just wasn't interested anymore so I didn't sweat it. It's all part of the game.

A few weeks later I ran into her at a get together at a mutual friend's house. We briefly exchanged pleasantries and went our separate ways. After all, we'd only hooked up a few times so neither of us started to develop any sort of feelings for one another.

Later that night I was outside smoking when she came out and lit one up herself. We engaged in a little more small talk until she broached the subject of our little fling:

Her: "So I guess you're wondering why I stopped calling."

Me: <shoulder shrug> "Hadn't really thought about it….figured you lost interest."

Her: "No, that's not what it was."

I shrugged my shoulders again and took another drag.

Her: “I saw a picture of you and so-and-so at your place on Facebook. I kinda looked at her page and I saw that she tags you in a lot of pictures and I didn’t see any other guys on her page so I thought she was your girlfriend or something.”

She went on to explain that she didn’t need any drama in her life because she’d “been there and done that” and didn’t want to fuck with a dude who had a girlfriend.

Example 2:

A woman who works at a company whose building is next to the one I work in caught my attention back in January. She was a petite blonde with a great body and huge tits. She was definitely past the wall and probably headed toward cougardom. But her face was pretty enough for me to attempt to add her to my trophy mantle even if she looked to be pushing 40.

We met up a couple of times for drinks and the conversation and flirtation flowed nicely. I managed to get her back to my place twice where things physically escalated, but on both occasions I couldn’t close the deal.

Again, this was no big deal…nobody bats a thousand. I was certain to get a third opportunity where I would most assuredly penetrate that poon, so I attempted to set up another date:

Once again I was burned by pre-selection. I'm pretty sure Blondie here checked out my page shortly after I got the digits, as all girls normally do to make sure you are who you present yourself to be. But it was obvious that she continued to do so, and when she saw pictures of me with other chicks she decided to eject.

These are the only two instances that I know of where being around attractive women negatively affected the outcomes of my dealings with the second sex. What both of those situations had in common is that it didn't become a problem for either one of them until after I had gotten physical with them.

Pre-selection works wonders before you hook up, but "post-selection" can and will burn you if you don't take the necessary measures to avoid your current stable from witnessing your exploits with other girls.

Personally I've taken to putting my phone in airplane mode on occasion, deactivating my Facebook account for days at a time, and most importantly, set my account to notify me when someone tries to tag me which gives me the option whether or not I want it to appear on my feed.

There are other things you can do to keep from throwing salt into your own game but those three work for me.

Pre-selection certainly has its merits and works to a man's advantage much more often than not. But some girls react poorly to seeing pictures of you with attractive women or getting texts at all hours of the night.

Sure, it may evoke feelings of dread and compel her to step up her game and increase her worth to you as is the case most of the time. But there are females who don't want to feel like they're constantly competing for your attention. They're rare to be sure, but they're out there…trust me.

In The End…

…these two game principles are a staples in a red pill male's arsenal for a reason. That reason is that the overwhelming majority of the time, they work very well when applied accordingly.

But like I said earlier, there are exceptions to the rule. It's better to be prepared for what will happen most of the time but if you really want to realize your full potential in terms of notches it would behoove you to keep these alternative techniques at the ready should a situation warrant deployment.

My next article will detail two more game doctrines that I have also found have minor deficiencies in.

Read Next: Can A Man Ever Have Too Much Game?

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Syrian “Refugees” Fake Passports And Illnesses To Get Maximum Government Benefits

October 6, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Dutch reporter Harald Doornbos recently purchased a very high quality Syrian passport for just $825, using the photograph of Dutch Prime Minister Mark Rutte. The whole process took just over a day and a half, commencing with a simple phone call to the fake passport producer. Casting aside, however difficult, the incredible opportunity that the fake passport industry gives to terrorists, it represents a bonanza, too, for millions of future migrants.

The cost of fake documents equates to only a week or half a month’s worth of potential welfare as “refugees” in high-income European countries like Great Britain, the Netherlands, Sweden and Germany. The projected return on investment for many people aspiring to suck at European’s prodigious social security teats would be astounding. And sadly, the fake passport producer Doornbos dealt with is only one of many. Many tailor their prices to particular buyers, especially for customers keen to haggle and after manufacturing equipment has paid for itself in the first days and weeks of increased operation.

Using Rutte’s photo and fair complexion would obviously raise eyebrows at any border checkpoint (assuming the EU can even marginally police its periphery, which has been proven to be grossly false) but it is a brilliant way to virally show how easily migrants can assume identities taken as Gospel truth by self-hating European governments and SJWs.

Fake asylum claims have been going on years

So if Britain lets these people in to determine their asylum claims, how many will actually be sent back?

In the case of just one couple using fake identities to claim asylum in Britain, they were able to steal £134,438 (around $200,000 USD in October 2015) worth of welfare payments over just half a decade. The retort you would expect from SJWs, that this happens rarely, is nothing but a smokescreen for the fact that investigating authorities substantially lack the resources to test the veracity of asylum seekers' identities, let alone the claims for asylum they make.

Determination of an asylum claim rarely raises questions of how the individual is threatened or faces persecuted. Broad brush arguments like being a member of a minority are immediately invoked, with little appreciation of personal context. And the person claiming asylum is the one who reaps the underlying economic rewards of entry to a welfare system that mollycoddles them ad infinitum.

Better yet, the culture of "let them all in" disregards how asylum seekers have that funny habit of crossing incessantly into new countries until they find one with a particularly large welfare teat. They don't stop in Greece, Italy, Serbia, or Croatia, states which either have smaller welfare states or more hostile (read: common sense) attitudes to uninvited, illegally-entering foreigners.

It's not just about the deception of fake passports

https://twitter.com/cernovich/status/643388049058078720

Mike Cernovich and others have highlighted the fact that migrants to Europe are already being coached to feign illness. The internet is replete with other examples of how Western do-gooders are abetting non-lawful and oftentimes criminal exaggerations and falsifications of asylum seeker narratives.

European elites like to avoid proper conjecture on why hundreds of thousands are entering Europe (I guess those sub-Saharan looking asylum seekers are Syrian as well?), preferring to believe the fairytale that people only come if they have no choice. But the promise of generous and constant welfare payments has nothing at all to do with it, they say.

Not only do these economic migrants have the desire and ability to craft a favorable story to try and get (for them) a positive outcome, they are increasingly armed with low-cost but sophisticated means of achieving it. From lorry trucks delivering payloads of human cargo, which travel with impunity 99.9% of the time due to European Union states having open borders with one another, to the fake passport industry, there has been no better time to come to Europe with an unsubstantiated claim for asylum.

A true refugee can stop in the first safe country they arrive in

[image]
Want to stop a population's on-the-street anger about immigration from reaching critical mass? Call them "Nazis", as has happened to hundreds of thousands of Greeks who have supported Golden Dawn over the last five years.

SJWs and European elites are high on rhetoric and low on evidence and facts. We see this time and time again in areas as diverse as "rape culture" hysteria, invented allegations of Western racism and the promotion of obesity to obtain so-called self-esteem for all. What is left in the dust regarding the present European migrant crisis is a) why non-Western (i.e. non-European) countries around the world are doing nothing and getting away with it, and b) why apparent refugees do not stop their trek at the point at which they are safe from harm.

These issues will not be answered by our opponents because they force a complete rethink on why Europe is somehow obligated to house entire nations of human beings in the first place. Saudi Arabia? No. Japan? No. Korea? No. But the West? Open your borders or you're inveterate fascist-racists who institutionalize global oppression.

Europe is now the toilet expected to flush every problem in the world. The problem is, there's no plumber that can fix what will become of this sick continent in a decade or so.

Read More: Photograph Yourself In Your Prime

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

My Education Was A Complete Waste Of Time

October 7, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Looking back at my thirteen years in the American public school system and four more years at the University Of Maryland, I have come to the realization that it was an utter waste. Nothing I do today which serves me in work, women, life, or leisure can be traced back to what I was taught in school. I must therefore conclude that being educated in America was the most harmful event in my life.

My parents pushed me hard into attending university. I didn't question their well-intentioned urgings because I had no idea what else to do. I eventually picked microbiology out of a black hat, which served me for six years after college until quitting for good. On my visit to the States last year, the topic of my education came up in a conversation with my father. I remarked how I would have been better off not going to college.

"But university did help you," he said. "It taught you how to think."

I didn't question his rebuttal at the time, but now I'm certain he was incorrect, because my education didn't even teach me how to read or write.

I couldn't read properly until I was about 24 or 25 years old; I simply did not have the ability to properly parse and analyze difficult texts, and my abominable SAT verbal scores, which were below average, could verify that to you. I had trouble understanding basic assigned literature like Catcher In The Rye or The Grapes Of Wrath. My brain didn't care for understanding the symbolism, motifs, or even the plot.

I also could not write. Well, I could write for the teacher who ordered me to hit a certain word count, but my grades in English classes only proved that I was averagely literate and able to convey someone else's ideas without introducing too many grammatical errors, but not much more. A 19th century London schoolboy had more writing skill than I did when I was legally allowed to gamble and drink alcohol.

Anything else in school I developed competency on—calculus, physics, biology—was mechanical and based on stenciled learning that any average mind could handle with enough prodding. Either I copied the instructor's methods for solving a problem or memorized facts and equations as if I was a robot. Up to my graduation, I had not developed one original idea or sentence of writing that is worth exposing to you right now. You can even mention specific classes I took in college and I will be unable to relay one fact I learned from them, in spite of doing well enough on the exams. If I ever write my autobiography upon old age, I can skip the first 22 years of life when it came to my intellectual progress and not lose a speck of importance. My education taught me nothing I couldn't have achieved on my own with a basic tutor, and if anything, it greatly inhibited my development.

Did the American educational system fail me, or did I possess a sluggish mind that chose not to bloom until gray hairs started appearing on my beard? Maybe a bit of both, but I look at what my younger brothers are studying in school (one is in middle school and the other in college), and I can only shake my head at how ill-prepared they will be for a world that is frightfully changing ever year. For my youngest brother, school is essentially a babysitter that teaches him a week's worth of the most elementary math and science spread out to nine soul-numbing months under the guidance of a feminist headmaster, while my older brother is more fearful of bad grades and punishment from dad than being an apex achiever in a field that will give him self-sufficiency for life. They're both screwed, but at least they won't be alone—their classmates are floating in the same rickety lifeboats as them.

Actually there is one thing I learned in school that I use every week. It is my default approach to seeking truth and understanding this complex Earthly world. It is the scientific method:

The scientific method, which I remember learning in the 9th grade, gave me everything I needed to solve problems on my own in all areas of life. The first time I used it outside of a school setting was at 22 years of age when I wanted to improve my sex life. I made the observation that a certain type of man was getting women and so I made hypotheses and changed my behavior to conduct real-life experiments that resulted in abundant fornication.

When my observations on women or relationships could not be understood, I sought the consul of books and other men. My book Bang is essentially a lab report from studying the American female Homo sapiens. This personal enthusiasm for experimentation has stayed with me since then, and I will always seek real-life confirmation of whatever behavior I urge upon myself or others.

But besides the scientific method, it was all for nothing. I say that without exaggeration—not a single lecture, factoid, graph, or equation I've learned in school has been marginally useful in my life since graduating 14 years ago. Even when I was employed as a microbiologist, more than 90% of what I used at work was learned through practical on-the-job training. I'm confident that at 15 years of age I could have done the same job as at 25, especially since I was essentially a glorified assembly line worker in the manner at which I conducted experiments handed down to me by my superiors.

What percentage of men in the past completed a formal education? Compare that with today's perverse obsession to educate everyone using a one-size-fits-all model that jams facts into people's ears as if force feeding someone on hunger strike. It's no surprise that the only thing that accomplishes is creating adults who are good at basic trivia but not at solving problems or generating useful ideas. You can not educate thought into someone. You can not create a great thinker or an intellectual out of thin air. Education destroys original thought and muddles great minds, and mainly excels at creating zombies who march in step with all the other automatons after being indoctrinated to respect authority and, lately, Marxist ideas. Education has devolved into social brainwashing happy time for Westerners (and slut training centers for girls) and not much more.

If I have a son, he will receive a classical education from a dedicated tutor at no more than two hours a day. The rest of his time will be spent exploring nature, music, athletics, woodworking, art, and of course, the scientific method. The goal is not to fill his head with information and facts in the hopes that one day it will aid him, but to give him the tools and mental framework to tackle any problem he will face in life while allowing him to develop passions that make it all worth living. My education didn't do that for me and for many other men, and what a regrettable waste it has been for us.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 7 Things I Would Tell My Teenage Self

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why In Game You Should Act Before You Know What The Outcome Will Be

October 7, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

It is well documented that as men we are very logical beings. While not necessarily risk-averse, many of us would prefer to weigh the pros and cons of a given situation in order to make a proper risk analysis prior to talking action. But when meeting and attracting women — and in wider aspects of life — this isn't always possible, or even desirable.

In his recent book World Order, Henry Kissinger notes that political decisions "must be made before it is possible to know what the outcome may be." This philosophy is equally effective in game.

Every Aspect Of Game Is A Leap Of Faith

Here's the thing — we all like certainties and to know where we are in any given scenario. But if you want to get good at game then basically you have to approach a ton of women — there's no easy way around it. And in doing so you will quickly learn that there is no such thing as certainty. Every part of the interaction is subject to her whims as well as a myriad of other external influences.

For example, when you walk up to a girl, tap her on the shoulder and start talking you have absolutely no idea whether she's going to be receptive or not. If the conversation goes well and you whip out your phone to take her number, you can have no clue whether she will give it to you or refuse.

When you meet her for a drink then at some point you are going to go in for a kiss. Will she allow it or will she turn her cheek away? In each of these instances you are compelled to act — or , perhaps better, to lead — without having a clue whether it will be efficacious or not.

Desire To Know The Outcome Can Mess Up A Promising Interaction

It may not seem obvious, but the desire to know everything in advance and to control things can mess up what otherwise might have been a promising interaction. When we launch ourselves into game we soon realise that we are in a slipstream being buffeted about by women and circumstances. This can feel uncomfortable and it is only natural that we should seek the comfort of old certainties. But it is only by pressing forward into uncertainty that we can expect to make gains.

It is my view that in modern Western cities the key to game is flexibility. This is because, essentially relegated to playing what Roosh calls “clown game,” we have little choice but to dance to the tune that women play if we hope to get laid. In the entropic urban sprawl, girls with differing agendas and schedules come and go. The canny player will live entirely in the moment, ready to go along with the flow if that particular flow is likely to lead to sex at the end of the night.

How Flexibility Works In Practice

Some time ago, while walking through London, I came upon a pretty Swiss girl, a tourist spending a few days here with her friends. I approached her and we got talking. It turned out that her friends had abandoned her in a nightclub and that she was now walking around, looking for somewhere to eat. It was quite late and I wasn't aware of any restaurants still open in the vicinity. Still, I took her hand and told her that we would go for food together. I then led her towards Waterloo Bridge, talking the whole time.

The truth is I had no clue whether there would be food when we got to the other side of the bridge or not. What I did know was that my apartment was in that general direction. In other words I went with the flow and took action, without any certainty of how things would pan out. Luckily the strategy paid off. When we reached the centre of the bridge we made out, and shortly afterwards all talk of food was forgotten as we took a taxi back to my place.

My intention in telling this story is not to brag, but rather to illustrate my point. Had I faltered and got hung up on the girl's logical request then there's a good chance I could have lost the lay. As it was, I lead her, going with the flow and having no idea of how things might end up. It could have been that faced with no McDonalds and a long walk back to her hotel she might have slapped me round the face and walked off into the night. But by simply sticking with it, uncertain of the outcome of my strategy, I was able to turn the situation around to my advantage.

Take Out: Be Confident In Your Future Ability To Handle Situations

If you want to achieve success with today’s girls you have to be prepared to take a leap of faith. If she suggests taking a cab across town to a gig, or calls you up late at night to meet her in a park near to her place (as happened to me with another girl recently) then go with it, as long as it doesn’t conflict with anything else more important you might have lined up to do.

I don’t mean that you should supplicate yourself and do anything she wants, but I do mean that if you have made up your mind to get laid then you must commit to following events though to their conclusion.

You may not be quite certain how an individual scenario will turn out: don’t sweat it. Turn up anyway, and be confident in your ability to handle whatever comes your way. You may not score every time, but you will gain valuable experience that will help you out in the future. More often than not, though, you’ll be surprised. You don’t always need a roadmap to reach the finish line.

Read More: 7 Reasons Why Approaching Girls in Real Life Beats Tinder Hands Down

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Behave With Girls As You Would With Horses

October 8, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

There are a few things that I know well. Two of them are horses and girls. Reflecting on the way men pursue women with sex or relationships as a goal and the way men tame horses, I noticed that there are eerie similarities. So here is my advice:

Apply the same behaviour with women as you would with horses and you will be more successful in your endeavours and come out a happier man.

I know some do not want to hear this, but put on your flak jacket and saddle up.

On roles and authority

– The horse has a primary function: riding. Bring it around, it comes, you ride. Then a bit of straw and see you tomorrow.

– You are the superior and dominant one, you are in charge. The horse follows your lead. You do not switch places. Science agrees.

– The male is stronger than the female. The stallion’s goal is to sire many offspring from different mares while the mare’s goal is to be fertile and take care of its progeny.

– It will test you and will sometimes refuse to follow. Pull on the tether and show who is the boss.

– Mares will excel at breeding offspring or riding. Always fit for one or the other, rarely in both.

– If it gets mad, hold tight to the rope and let it kick the air until it tires itself out. They all calm down at some point.

– Do not pass behind it carelessly or commit a mistake. You will get kicked in the groin.

– You do not say sorry to a horse. Show that you are weak or scared, it will sense it and punish you.

– You cannot reason with a horse when it misbehaves. You have to remain calm and use a combination of skills and authority.

– Never tolerate the biting. EVER. First bite if there ever is one: swift punishment then back in the line.

– They are better behaved with a bridle and a bit on.

– Always stay on your feet. Lower your guard and you will bite the dust.

– No point beating the horse with a stick or to the blood. Displaying dominance and aloofness works wonders.

– The horse supports you in your journey. You are the one with the reins, showing the path.

On riding

Tell me that this rider is not happy

– Riding horses has always been associated with masculinity.

– It is all good to observe the horse extensively, but nothing feels like riding one.

– It is much easier to sit around, look at them, and say you do not like to ride because it requires effort, than getting out there and attempt to catch them.

– Beginners fall off horses. Seasoned riders make them turn at a click of the tongue.

– When you approach, show dominant body language and no emotion. Use your voice tone to lure it in and pass the halter on its head.

– You tame a magnificent horse in its prime. It is fascinating, exhilarating. But after all, it is just a horse. Riding a beautiful horse is amazing but it is not everything there is to life.

– Give a bit of crop for the last straight line then finish strong.

– No one said that catching a fine horse would be easy. But the reward is sweet.

– If you do not ride regularly, you get rusty.

– Ride your horse often and teach it to pace its effort

– Since man became man, he has always wanted to ride the horse. Now that the engine exists, the man becomes lazy.

– The carer spends, the jockey rides.

– Loose horses never bring any good.

On relationships

– When you fall, it is on your head or your behind, rarely elsewhere. Wear a helmet and try to avoid getting your tailbone fractured.

– Everyone has fallen off his horse. The one who denies it is a liar.

– The first thing to do when you fall off a horse is to climb back up.

– Taking care of horses is a rich man’s job, often done by poor people.

– Give a carrot once in a while to reward good behaviour. It is still a being.

– Stroke it from time to time but do not translate your affection into words. It does not understand you because it is a horse. Let it neigh with its peers. Your physical touch is your medium.

– A mad horse is a danger. Get rid of it before it kicks your children in the face, damaging them forever.

– If the horse is someone else’s now, it is not your role to feed it anymore.

– Your horse ran away. Tough. Now deal with it and get another one.

– Dealing with many horses is no easy task and is an investment of time, energy and money.

On beauty

– Not every horse is special. Not every horse is beautiful.

– Only a gentle horse in good health, with well-balanced body proportions and a long, silky, natural-looking mane, is beautiful.

– Its physical shape is the index of its quality. The horse requires regular exercise and quality food.

– Sugar spoils it and is not good for its body.

– It is normal and healthy to want to ride the beautiful horse, not the mangy fat pony.

– Only fools parade around with flea-ridden, obese horses.

– Get a horse that is in its prime, not one that is old and used.

– There is a limited period of efficiency for a horse before it becomes too old.

– A lame horse is useless. People that have money to throw out the window can keep it and feed it.

On nature

– The horse will always follow the group, not questioning its direction.

– The horse runs when confronted to danger or something perceived as dangerous. It flies and does not fight. It will fight on extremely rare occasions and only if cornered.

– In the majority of cases, they are ungrateful for the care you give them.

– The horse wants to be free. You have to keep it in its paddock or it will run away.

– Compare the man who owns a lot of horses and the man who tends to them. The first one enjoys their beauty and rides them whenever he wants. The stable lad just deals with their shit, takes them for a stroll, feeds them and gives them attention. Guess how they repay him.

– The horse is a highly-social herd animal. It is not biologically programmed to be strong and independent.

– There are different breeds of horses. They have different functions and people have different tastes. A draft horse is not an English thoroughbred. It is a fact and someone that tells you otherwise is laughed at.

– Mad activists want you to think that the horse is your equal.

– The genes talk. When a horse is an idiot, high are the chances that the one before it was not the sharpest tool in the shed.

Pour finir: Cases in which these parallels do not apply

“Millennial horse”, exhibit number one

– Nature made the horse stronger than the man.

– Do not bring it around to get inseminated by a different stud every spring.

– Do not brand it with a white hot iron.

– Do not sell the offspring to the highest bidder as soon as they reach the age to be trained.

– Do not put it down if it breaks an ankle.

– Do not put a yoke on it and plow your field with it for 15 years

– A horse that has been ridden senseless is safer than one that has never been broken or ridden before.

– A large horse is usually more docile than a slender one.

– Do not let your whole family ride your horse.

There you have it. If you can think of any other, feel free to add them.

Read More: Avoid Women With Horses

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

University Of Manchester Bans Breitbart's Milo Yiannopoulos From Debate On Censorship

October 8, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Real-world news is becoming so absurd that The Onion is practically superfluous. Case in point: a prominent journalist being invited by a university to debate censorship and free speech, only to be banned at the last minute for "inciting hatred."

That's precisely what happened to Breitbart editor Milo Yiannopoulos recently. According to Breitbart, both Yiannopoulos and his debate opponent, feminist Julie Bindel, were banned from participating in an upcoming campus debate on free speech at the University of Manchester because of their views on transsexuals:

> As such, this undermines the principles of liberation enshrined in the Students' Union, as outlined in the Safe Space policy. We believe these views could incite hatred against both trans* people and women who have experienced sexual violence. As we believe it is probable these views would be aired in this discussion should he be allowed to speak on campus, we have no choice but to ban him.

Additionally, the Students' Union also referred to Yiannopoulos as a "rape apologist" who has made comments "lambasting rape survivors."

Beyond the already sick irony of banning someone from a free speech debate with such Orwellian reasoning, the University of Manchester's student union has shown horrendous judgment when it comes to who they allow to speak. The union was unable to come to a decision on whether to sanction or condemn the terrorist group ISIS and also invited a radical Muslim preacher who calls for gays to be executed to speak, yet they barred both Yiannopoulos and Bindel—themselves homosexuals—from having a debate on free speech.

Safe Spaces Make For Dull Minds

This decision on the part of the Students' Union is part of a general trend towards censorship on college campuses across the West. By definition, colleges and universities are supposed to be places of free inquiry, where young minds are equipped with the tools they need to think critically about the world at large. However, colleges have increasingly moved in the opposite direction, coddling students and stifling non-leftist points of view, oftentimes to the point of absurdity.

For example, two years ago, a number of universities in the U.K. banned Robin Thicke's song "Blurred Lines" for its "rapey" lyrics. Additionally, "trigger warnings" (notices informing readers that a work could potentially be traumatizing), once limited to feminist blogs, are actually being incorporated into class syllabi now, as a salve to students who might have a panic attack from reading racial slurs in Adventures of Huckleberry Finn.

College students' prissiness and intolerance of non-PC viewpoints and language is so bad that personalities across the political spectrum are taking notice. Comedians such as Jerry Seinfeld and Chris Rock—themselves left-wing—have announced that they no longer perform on college campuses because students will become angry the minute they wander off the politically correct plantation.

According to Greg Lukianoff, president and CEO of FIRE (Foundation for Individual Rights in Education), college speech controls have become so stringent that merely saying something like "America is a melting pot" is viewed as a minor transgression by many students. Indeed, even using the word "crazy" is viewed as "ableist," a sign that political correctness has gone out of control in colleges.

The Extinguishing Of Free Speech

Modern academia is breeding a class of college graduates who are not only dismissive of the hard-won right to free speech that many Westerners have enjoyed, they are actively hostile to any viewpoints they disagree with. No better evidence of this can be found in the response to Roosh's "State of Man" tour dates in Canada this past summer. Feminists colluded with the Canadian media and local government in Montreal and Toronto to shut down Roosh's lawful speeches based entirely on lies about his political beliefs.

College leftists have become so extreme that they are increasingly willing to break the law in order to prevent others from exercising their right to free speech. Recently, feminist protesters attempted to disrupt a lecture by Reason's Cathy Young at St. Paul University in Ottawa, pulling a fire alarm and arguing with a policeman who told them to move their protest or risk arrest. It's only a matter of time before these SJWs explode into outright violence.

Ultimately, what happened to Milo Yiannopoulos and Julie Bindel is just a symptom of a greater sickness in Western academia. By mollycoddling young minds and shielding them from "problematic" viewpoints, academia is aiding the creation of a generation of monsters.

It remains to be seen whether the defenders of free speech will be able to mount a defense against these easily-triggered Brownshirts.

Read Next: Student Accused Of Rape By Emma Sulkowicz To Sue Columbia University

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

5 Reasons For Expats To Start An Offshore Company

October 8, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Nomad Capitalist

The location independent business has become popular among globally-minded entrepreneurs for a reason: working while traveling the world allows you far greater personal freedom than just staying in one place.

Being born in the United States doesn't mean you should live there your entire life. If you're treated better in Poland or Romania or Thailand, it only makes sense to go to the place that you like the best.

I've consulted with a lot of location independent entrepreneurs and one of the biggest disconnects that I see is that business owners who choose to live in a place that treats them well often afford the same benefits to their company.

There are some great tax and business strategies that many expats don't even know about.

If you own an internet business or some other company that allows you to work remotely, there is likely no good reason to have your company based in the United States.

Just as you wouldn't throw a dart at a map to decide where to live, you shouldn't just make "the default choice" when it comes to setting up your company. Starting an offshore company is a good idea for many e-commerce, internet, drop shipping, and other global businesses.

The benefits of an offshore company

Here's the good news: you don't have to be rich to go offshore, nor does your company have to be huge. Even if you're not a "baller" yet, you can still take advantage of the benefits of an offshore company without spending a fortune.

I imagine that for many online business owners, the prospect of having a corporation in Hong Kong or Malta or the Cayman Islands seems a little crazy, but it's no crazier than moving to Thailand for better weather or dating a girl from a different culture.

The barrier to entry to starting an offshore corporation is lower than ever. You can set up an offshore structure in as little as one day, and open a bank account without even leaving your home in some cases.

In my work helping entrepreneurs save on taxes and optimize their business practices, I frequently explain five key benefits of using an overseas business structure over a domestic one.

Whether you are currently doing business as a sole proprietor or you have an existing domestic company, it is possible to move your business operations offshore. Let's explore five major benefits of doing business offshore.

Reason #1: Tax Benefits*

If you're reading this, you no doubt already believe that living overseas affords you a much better lifestyle than slaving away in the United States. From the cost of living to personal freedom to dating opportunities, life outside of the US is simply a better option for most of us.

US citizens have the distinct disadvantage of having to pay taxes even if they live in another country. The only "opt out" on paying US taxes is to renounce your citizenship. However, if you already live overseas, you can easily qualify for what is called the Foreign Earned Income Exemption.
In simple terms, the FEIE allows you to exempt just over $100,000 in income from US income taxes each year merely by spending the majority of your time outside of the United States.

If you earn less than $100,000 and do business in your own name, your entire income could be exempt from income tax, but you'd still owe Social Security and Medicare tax of 15.3% on the entire amount.

However, there is a loophole: using an offshore company and paying yourself a salary allows you to exempt yourself from most Social Security taxes as well. Even if you earn $50,000, you could save as much as $7,650 per year if structured correctly. Even when you factor in the cost to get your offshore company started, you'd break even in a matter of months.

But what if you earn more than $100,000 each year? An offshore company can potentially help you save even more money. It's possible to have your company pay you a salary of $100,000 or less and keep any additional profits as "retained earnings."

Let's say you run a drop shipping business that nets $200,000 per year and you outsource some of the work. It would probably be fair to assume that you could hire someone to replace you in that business for a $100,000 salary.

Using that assumption, your offshore company would collect all of your profits and then pay you a salary that was exempt from US income tax. The rest of the money would remain in your company at offshore tax rates as low as 0%.

We had a client earning $500,000 a year in a "Four Hour Workweek" style business that was able to reduce his effective tax burden to almost zero by using this system. Your situation may be a little bit different, but the principle is the same.

Basically, you are in control of how your money is taxed and at what rate.

You'll note that I titled this section "Tax Benefits*" with an asterisk; while the law is clear, it's always a good idea to get a review of your specific situation to make sure you stay out of trouble. That's why I offer to bring in a real US tax lawyer to help all of my US clients.

Going offshore is NOT about breaking any laws or hiding, but rather working within the little-known benefits the law allows.

Reason #2: Greater Control

It’s only natural to think that you should set up your company where you live. And in some cases, that makes sense. For example, I know a lot of business owners in California that start Nevada companies thinking they’ll save on taxes. The reality is that a Nevada company rarely offers the tax benefits people think it does.

If every US business was able to merely set up a Nevada or Delaware corporation and then do business in a high-tax state, there would be no California companies. US companies are subject to US tax law no matter which state they are in.

However, an offshore company offers certain advantages that a domestic company doesn’t. For example, Hong Kong companies allow for much more liberal tax deductions. A US LLC or corporation might not allow you to deduct a fancy dinner for a client, while a Hong Kong company would.

Many offshore companies allow you to invest in assets like real estate that US companies don’t allow for. In this way, you maintain maximum control over your company and keep as much money as possible for yourself.

Reason #3: Asset Protection

One common misconception about offshore companies is that you can live in the United States, run all your money through the British Virgin Islands, and pay zero tax. That’s false; US residents always pay tax on their worldwide income, including from foreign companies.

Unless you run a large company with a lot of employees, the most significant tax benefits of an offshore company are had when you as the owner live outside of the United States.

However, offshore companies offer an additional benefit besides tax savings: asset protection. Most US companies protect your assets like a two-foot-tall mesh fence protects your home from trespassers. In the United States, a new business is sued every few seconds.

Basing your company offshore can protect you from frivolous lawsuits. If you run a business that sells physical products, you may be at risk for being sued at some point. And as you may know, US courts tend to favor teary-eyed plaintiffs over “greedy” business owners.

By incorporating in a country like Nevis, you build a fortress around your assets. Rather than being sued in California where any judge would practically help the plaintiff carry the bags of your money out the courtroom door, you would have to be sued in Nevis where plaintiffs are required to post a $25,000 bond.

Additionally, many offshore jurisdictions require plaintiffs to actually pay their own lawyers in advance as well as pay the legal fees of the party that wins. “Pay only if you win” lawyers don’t exist in these places, which significantly reduces frivolous litigation as well as unnecessary legal costs.

Reason #4: Less red tape

I’ve talked to hundreds of entrepreneurs from the UK to Thailand to Ghana, and almost every business owner with a company in the “first world” has a story about some hassle created by the local government.

From having to keep every receipt, to filing complicated tax returns, to the expense of paying tax, US and European companies come with a lot of hassles. Offshore companies do not have many of these hassles.

Companies in jurisdictions like the British Virgin Islands, Nevis, Belize, and Seychelles, no annual filings are required. You don’t have to keep receipts or file annual reports. That’s not to say you shouldn’t know what’s happening in your company, but at least you won’t have the burden of silly paperwork.

Reasons #5: Global Mindset

If your business only sells to customers in one country, you're likely missing out on a lot of business. This is another mistake I see many entrepreneurs make: they physically move themselves to somewhere in Southeast Asia but continue to sell to customers in only one country.

No doubt, this business model can be very effective. But when you consider the idea that "there's always a bull market somewhere," doing business globally can make a lot of sense.

For example, we've found that customers in emerging markets are far less price sensitive than customers in, say, the United States. The best market for your products and services may be one you haven't cracked yet, and having an offshore company will help you build an even more global mindset.

How to Get Started

I'm not an attorney or an accountant, and all of this is basic advice. It may or may not apply to your specific situation, and I can't stress enough that you don't want to go into this without the proper preparation.

I know too many guys who called some shady "lawyer" they found on Google only to be told that setting up a company is "easy" and "tax-free." And, done correctly, it may be. However, US citizens are at a huge risk for government fines and even jail time if they don't set up and report their offshore business activities properly.

If you'd like to discuss your business and find ways to legally reduce or eliminate your tax bill and enjoy the other benefits discussed here, I can help you plan a strategy and then do the "dirty work" of implementing a structure.

If you have a small business selling digital products, a simple one-company structure with two bank accounts and an offshore merchant account may be all you need.

If you sell stuff on Amazon, you may need a hybrid structure that involves a domestic company and an offshore company.

And if you run a large enterprise with employees around the globe, chances are you may need a more complicated structure with money moving from country to country.

You've seen companies like Google use set-ups like the now-defunct "Double Irish Dutch Sandwich” and Cayman Islands companies to pay very little tax, but the reality is that there are solutions for a small business earning $50,000 per year as well as huge multi-national companies.

Our team is well-versed in the issues US citizens deal with when going offshore. If you’d like to apply for a free consultation, click here to learn more.

Gregory Diehl is a world traveler and lifestyle entrepreneur who splits his time between Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia and Vilcabamba, Ecuador. He can be reached here.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Reflecting On One Year Of #Gamergate

October 9, 2015 | by Robert Conway | Link | Original Link

It’s been over a year since the events that led to Gamergate occurred. It’s been an interesting year, and it is amazing that the consumer revolt that popped up around the hash tag is still alive and well today.

The video game industry has had a number of minor scandals, but those seemed to have fizzled out over the course of a couple of weeks. What ultimately kept Gamergate going was the fact the movement had gained the attention of people who were outside of the typical gamer demographic. Much of that was, of course, the significance Gamergate had on the neverending culture war.

The Quinnspiracy

Perhaps the shot that was heard around the internet is the now infamous Zoe Post. The Zoe Post, for those out of the loop was a blog post made by Zoe Quinn's ex boyfriend Eron Gjoni detailing how Zoe Quinn had cheated on him with five guys, one of which was Kotaku writer Nathan Grayson, in order to further her career as a game developer.

The incident probably would have faded into obscurity had other people not come out to question to Zoe's character. Of course this was just the beginning. If you want to read good deconstruction of that incident, Billy Chubbs wrote a pretty good piece on Zoe Quinn from last August not long after the Zoe Post went public.

Not long after Zoe Quinn's drama was coat-tailed by people like Anita Sarkeesian and transsexual game developer Brianna Wu. Anita was already disliked by people for making ridiculous claims about sexism in video games and thus quickly defended Zoe. Brianna Wu of course claimed that he was harassed by people for supporting Zoe; Personally I think Brianna Wu was just trying to make a play at some easy publicity for Revolution 60.

Zoe Quinn later went on to form Crash Override with Alex Lifschitz. Their goal is to stop online harassment. In a more naive time I would have thought their goals admirable—not so much these days, considering that most online "harassment" could be avoided by turning off your computer or cell phone. I also have serious doubts that Crash Override has done anybody any good except for Zoe Quinn. For the most part Zoe Quinn remains largely irrelevant, and yes that's even with her recent appearance at the UN to discuss "cyber violence."

As for Eron Gjoni, Zoe had filed a restraining order that bars him from discussing Zoe's personal life any further. Eron Gjoni has filed an appeal and had some legal help: this amici curiae brief was authored by a couple of constitutional law professors. As of now Eron Gjoni has updated the status of his trial and the gag order has been dropped.

Eron Gjoni is currently considering further legal remedies. If he is to continue, the legal process case law could be established to protect speech such as the Zoe Post. While he is hardly the most vocal person in the Gamergate movement he still chimes in once in a while, and is expected to have an AMA on Reddit in the near future. I can empathize with the guy and I hope he continues to seek further legal action.

There Are No Ethics In Social Justice

Gamergate didn't happen because Zoe Quinn cheated on Eron Gjoni. Gamergate happened because there was a conflict of interest between Nathan Grayson's work for Kotaku and his relationship with Zoe Quinn. It wasn't just Nathan Grayson's ethics that brought into question, and several other journalists including Kotaku's Patricia Hernandez and Polygon's Ben Kuchera had both been scrutinized for ethical practices.

In Patricia Hernandez's case, she too had become romantically involved with game developers and had given them positive press. Meanwhile, Ben Kuchera had subsequently been supporting Zoe Quinn's Patreon and had written an article about Depression Quest without disclosing a possible conflict of interest.

It eventually got to the point where websites such as Polygon and Kotaku needed to update their ethics policies to either prohibit or require journalists to disclose any kind of contributions made to a game developers. Gamergate could have ended right there, but instead video game journalists decided to use accusations of sexism as a red herring to hide their corruption. It's dirty trick if you think about it, but nonetheless it backfired.

Video game journalists initially thought they could simply swat this away, but later added more fuel to fire by publishing a series of articles attacking gamers across several websites. The 17 "Gamers are dead" articles made it quite clear there was some kind of collusion going on between journalists in the industry, and it was obvious that many game journalists were more interested in social justice than actually playing video games.

Since the year has progressed, many video game websites have seen their revenue sources dry up. Gawker alone may be on its last breath, considering Gawker's writers have made the decision to unionize. Since last year a couple of video game websites have sprung up in an effort to replace sites like Polygon and Kotaku. Some have been successful, like Tech Raptor, while others didn't gain enough traction to continue.

How Long Will Gamergate Continue?

Gamergate had been a long time coming, and all it took was for game journalists to attack gamers before people became aware of the corruption in the industry. Certainly many people have become aware of the fundamentally flawed state of social justice dogma.

Perhaps a lot of this had to do with fair news coverage. The big news networks that covered Gamergate didn't even consider that there might be a legit concern being raised by the movement. Even then ABC's Nightline special was largely sensationalist and was aimed at getting ratings out of their key demographic: women.

Personally I feel that Gamergate should expand its scope to call out the non-gaming mainstream media too. Too many stories in the past year have been sensationalist hit pieces aimed at making people angry rather than informed. That in itself is a larger problem, and Gamergate could inspire more people to push for change in how the news is covered.

Certainly neomasculinists and MRAs both have a vested interest in the outcome of Gamergate, but it hasn't stopped people who don't necessarily agree with those ideas from supporting the movement. While SJWs claim to be fighting for woman and minorities, there where many woman and minorities that sided with Gamergate. This group of people didn't want the special victim status that SJWs had granted them, and they also didn't want the industry to change on their behalf either.

Where Gamergate could do better is to minimize the concern with Twitter drama. A great deal events have happened on Twitter, but as a social network now controlled by SJWs it is not the best way to communicate ideas. It doesn't help that many of Gamergate's opponents, such Randi Harper and Nicolas "Sarah" Nyberg, have connections and have gotten several Gamergate supporters banned from Twitter.

Of course there's also the infamous block bot which had somehow managed to brand KFC's twitter account as "misogynistic". Even worse was the idea that block bot could be used as a blacklist to specifically target and discriminate against Gamergate supporters. Of course Reddit hasn't fared much better. The grip that SJWs have on social media is another thing that Gamergate should consider addressing.

Gamergate will last as long as it needs to. At this point is more than a movement or hashtag; it's a community. As long as people feel discontent with SJWs trying to push their agenda on the masses, Gamergate will continue. Here's to another year.

Red More: This Is What #GamerGate Taught Us About Social Justice

Robert Conway
Robert is a former Reaxxion writer.

If Rape Culture Is So Normal, Why Haven't You Ever Witnessed A Rape?

October 9, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

When was the last rape you witnessed (and did nothing to stop)? If you're like me and 99.99% of people in the Western world, you have not seen someone committing rape and therefore never had a chance to stop a rape. Nonetheless, we are accosted nearly every day with claims by feminists that rape has been normalized because of "rape culture."

Unsurprisingly, SJWs assert that society normalizes rape when every alleged rape you hear about involves a private situation away from others who could conceivably intervene. Rape is so normalized that no one ever does it publicly.

Now compare the idea of "rape culture" with a host of other crimes. Although such acts are illegal, men punching other men, all too often to the point of permanent brain damage or death, happens in public all the time. In my native Australia, the senseless killing of 18-year-old Thomas Kelly, felled by an unprovoked assault, highlighted the propensity of men attacking other men, usually without any explanation.

During my lifetime I have observed perhaps 100 cases of serious brawling and criminal assaults in nightclub precincts, hotel bars and other related places. I have never seen either a rape or other sexual assault. Can someone please explain this contrast?

Women objectify themselves so, um, rape culture?

Action: individual woman self-sexualizes and self-objectifies. Result: society promotes rape culture. Right.

With 9,999 out of every 10,000 alleged rapes and sexual assaults involving private locations, feminists have no evidence that rape is normalized. So they clutch at straws within straws and claim that the objectification of women in Hollywood, print media, music videos and elsewhere is an embodiment of “rape culture.”

Promiscuous women who parade themselves on Instagram are usually forgotten, but even those girls featured on patriarchal billboards and in television advertisements, who are handsomely paid to exhibit their lithe bodies, are used to make sweeping statements that society promulgates the acceptance of rape. Modeling and other industries, run by disproportionate numbers of women and gay men, thus become key scapegoats in this claim that heterosexual males prop up the so-called epidemic of raped women.

Although SJWs, typically socialist, dismiss the idea of the positive “invisible hand” of capitalism, they adore the notion that hundreds of millions of men in the Western world can either secretly coordinate or faithfully follow the whims of this overarching rape culture. With varying levels of intelligence, professional success, social status and other markers, these men manage not to rape women in public, all while keeping the underlying conspiracy going.

The degree of calibration this would involve defies belief. But it is the supposed trump card of those advocating for social science theories so warped that they make moon landing conspiracies look well thought out.

Rape culture is Orwellian Newspeak at its best

Rape culture is so prevalent that women can organize in groups of several dozen or hundred to protest rape culture. That makes perfect sense.

"97% of rapists never go to prison" is a perfect illustration of how surveys, which twist the definition of sexual assault to include, among other things, catcalling, men asking for sex and other non-events, are tailor-made for continual accusations of rape culture. You may have heard before that war is peace, freedom is slavery and ignorance is strength. Likewise, according to feminists, rape is a crime but it's a crime which can feminists can conclusively determine without a criminal investigation and trial. And rape culture exists because feminists, magically, can determine how many rapes occur. Except, conveniently, none of these normalized rapes occur publicly.

It additionally speaks volumes that feminists can conjure up statistics about how many rapists don't go to jail, but refrain from indicating how many men are prima facie rapists. The problem these feminists face is twofold: 1) claiming many men (10-20%) rape a woman or two each would backfire spectacularly and 2) claiming a tiny number of men commit all SJW-defined rapes (and thus are responsible for raping between a dozen or 20+ women each) is clearly preposterous.

While feminists do not challenge the need for evidence in armed robbery, tax evasion, and other trials, allegations of male-on-female domestic violence and rape should be conducted on complainant testimony or otherwise rape culture is in full swing. In the meantime, that sticky situation of how rape almost never occurs publicly, unlike many other categories of crime, is left untouched.

Rape culture is the biggest hoax of the 21st century

If rape is so normal, why aren't women raped at SlutWalk events under the eyes of police?

Holding onto the coattails of David Icke's lizard people thesis, rape culture pundits such as University of Connecticut alumnus Holly Wonneberger are maintaining that the viral video of a drunk male UConn student demanding mac and cheese to eat is comparable to sexual violence. Reminiscent of South Park's proposition that Family Guy episodes are written by manatees pushing "idea balls" into a machine, feminists take any news event or trend and repackage it in a way that supports their self-serving narrative.

Male-on-female rape exists, typically perpetrated by the smallest minority of violent men on the smallest minority of women, yet "rape culture" is nothing but a fairytale designed to keep professional feminists and their followers angry, akin to the Two Minutes' Hate in 1984.

Or perhaps SJWs just haven't cracked the door codes to where we heterosexual men have our secret subterranean "how to rape with impunity" meetings.

Read More: 4 Things In Common Between "Rape Culture" And Roofie Hysteria

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

We’re Looking To Hire Two ROK Writers

October 9, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We’re looking for two good men to help expand our coverage:

1. Fitness columnist

We’re first looking for a guy who can share actionable tips on weightlifting and nutrition. While I greatly appreciate the advice that Mike Chang’s sponsored posts have given us, and think that most men won’t need more than a dusting of Kratom in their morning coffee to operate at peak performance, there are many other fitness topics that could be helpful to ROK readers.

2. List specialist

ROK offers heavy, sometimes depressing articles that highlight the problems facing modern society. To balance out that intensity, we’d like a contributor to post one image-heavy list a week. Here are some examples:

- 35 Pretty Girls Who Became Fat And Ugly
- 15 Important Quotes From The Predatory Female
- 9 People In The Media Who Are Upset Jackie Coakley Wasn’t Raped By White Men
- 35 Things Wrong With America
- 10 Things Men Should Never Try
- 15 People In The Mainstream Media Who Used The UVA Rape Hoax To Push A False Narrative

While many of you do not prefer lists, most of our readers found ROK because of a list that was widely shared. Long essays usually do a poor job of attracting new readers.

Hired writers are asked to submit an article each week that is at least 700 words. If you are interested, contact ROK's editor, Winston Smith, with details of your background and any writing samples. If he believes you are a good match, you'll be asked to submit two test articles to observe how the readership responds to your work. If those work out, we'll bring you aboard to the team. You will compensated if hired (Winston will give you details).

Read Next: Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Philosophical Messages Of The Watchmen

October 10, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The Watchmen is one of the most popular graphic novels of all time. It was published in 1986-1987 as a series of comics written by Alan Moore, British author of V for Vendetta, The League of Extraordinary Gentlemen, Swamp Thing, and many others. In 2009, a film adaptation was released by director Zack Snyder (Dawn of the Dead, 300, Sucker Punch, Man of Steel).

Incidentally, I have found that the primary indication of the quality of a film is its director, followed by its writer. If you enjoyed any of the above, you will enjoy The Watchmen. The dialogue, imagery, and cinematography are excellent.

Cold War Alternate History

Leonid Brézhnev and Fidel Castro

The Watchmen is set in the 1980s in an alternate history universe. Richard Nixon was elected president 5 times. The US and USSR sit on the brink of nuclear annihilation, and the world is more technologically advanced than present day earth.

Frustrated by increasing crime, corruption, and the ineffectiveness of the justice system, a group of vigilante cops formed a team of eight superheroes known as The Minutemen. The Nixon administration passes a law banning the wearing of costumes in public, designed to end the actions of the extrajudicial Minutemen and other superheroes.

All comply with the new law, except Rorschach. One by one, members of the Minutemen are murdered, and Rorschach sets out to warn the others and investigate the cause of the murders. The film opens with a monologue by Rorschach commenting on the depraved condition of society:

> This city's afraid of me. I've seen it's true face, the streets are extended gutters and the gutters are full of blood. And when the drains finally scab over, all the vermin will drown. The accumlated filth of all their sex and murder will foam up around their waist. And all the whores and politicians will look up and shout "save us". And I'll whisper "no"

Rorschach

Rorschach, uncompromising idealist

Rorschach is a principled idealist. He witnesses a brutal crime one day which turns him into a jaded extremist, who gives zero fucks about the law, political correctness, or nuance, and sees things in absolutes, right or wrong. He continues:

> Now the whole world stands on the brink, staring down into bloody hell. All those liberals and intellecutals and smooth talkers. And all of a sudden no one can think of anything to say. Beneath me, this awful city, it screams like an abbatoir of retarted children and the night reeks of fornication and bad consciences.

Attempts To Revive The Vigilante Watchmen

Night Owl II, prefers living in the Matrix

Rorschach's first visit is to the character Night Owl II, who declines to take up the life of crimefighting again. Night Owl tries to reason with Rorschach, pleading, “Nobody knows who you are. You can give it up. Try to have a normal life.” Rorschach’s response:

> When you walk down the street in a city dying of rabies, past the human cockroaches talking about their heroin and their child pornography, do you really feel normal?

Rorschach is frustrated that others are content to live out their lives rejecting the red pill, taking the path of least resistance, and following the authority’s law, right or wrong. After failing to convince Night Owl, he mutters,

> “First visit of evening fruitless. Feel slightly depressed. Soon there will be war. Millions will perish in sickness and misery. Why does one death matter against so many? Because there is good and evil. And evil must be punished. Even in the face of armageddon. I will not compromise in this.”

The Comedian

The Comedian, unprincipled, out of control vigilante

The death that Rorschach is investigating is that of The Comedian. The film begins with him at home in his apartment, in retirement, but with identity still unknown publicly, being brutally murdered. The Comedian is a twisted, sick individual, who caused the original Minutemen to fall apart. He abuses his power, and follows no guiding morals or principles, other than whatever The Comedian wants to do in this moment, he will do.

He reacts to the depraved world standing on the edge of destruction with spite and disgust, commenting, “What happened to the American Dream? It came true. You’re looking at it.” He enjoys violence and being a vigilante more than the principles behind it.

He will attack and hurt innocent civilians without giving it a second thought.

While the two characters are incredibly different in their outlook and behavior, Rorschach can relate to the Comedian.

> "[The Comedian] understood. Humans are savage in nature. No matter how much you try to dress it up to disguise it. [The Comedian] saw society's true face, chose to be a parody of it, a joke. I heard a joke once. Man goes to doctor, says he's depressed, life seems harsh, and cruel, says he feels all alone in threatening world. Doctor says treatment is simple. The great clown Pogliacci is in town. Go see him. Should cheer you up. Man bursts into tears. But doctor, he says. I am Pogliacci.

Dr. Manhattan

Dr. Manhattan, all powerful (penis edited in Puritan (USA) domestic release)

Dr. Manhattan is a difficult character to describe, and one of my favorites. He is an incredibly powerful superhuman who was altered by an accident with nuclear radiation. He is the only character with superpowers. He is almost god-like, possessing incredible wisdom and power.

He has a frame of steel, which is tested by Silk Spectre, to an entertaining and cool-as-ice resopnse. He grows increasingly detached and uninterested in humanity, bordering on apathetic as he sees the immorality and lack of logic in human actions. He, along with the Comedian, is one of two characters who cooperate with the American government, and Dr Manhattan is responsible for the highly advanced technology of the 1980s in the film, which is beyond that of today. As Manhattan states, "We're all puppets. I'm just a puppet who can see the strings."

He becomes a thoughtful philosopher, caring less and less about Earth and humanity, and more and more detached and unrelatable.

> “They claim their labors are to build a heaven. Yet their heaven is populated with horrors. Perhaps the world is not made. Perhaps nothing is made. A clock without a craftsman. It’s too late. Always has been. Always will be. Too late.”

Rorschach’s Philosophy

Rorschach directly confronts a member of the establishment, and spells out his utter disgust:

> You’re fat. Wealthy. Liberal sensibilities. What you call compassion. Wanting to understand the guilty, this rotting society, what it calls rehabilitation, nothing short of compromise… You want to know about Rorschach? Once a man has seen society’s black underbelly, he can never turn his back on it, never pretend, like you do, that it doesn’t exist, no matter who orders him to look the other way. We don’t do this thing because we’re permitted. We do it because we have to. We do it because we’re compelled.

Eventually Rorschach is able to convince one of the other Watchmen that the only way to get results is through his more aggressive methods. You forgot how we do things. You’ve gone too soft. Too trusting. Especially with women.

Rorschach assembles a small team to fight back, and without giving too much away, those that cooperate with the corrupt establishment are not rewarded, but rather brutally punished for their cooperation in working for the side of evil by their masters, while others face retribution from the remaining members of the Watchmen.

The film is very much a classic tale of good vs. evil, right vs. wrong, but told in a complex manner, where there are no absolutes. There is plenty of sharp dialogue, black comedy, fight scenes and action, beautiful cinematography, lots of symbolism and visual details which make a rewatch enjoyable, and a three hour play length that never drags on (note: see the director’s cut for the full effect)

Major Themes

Not your typical comic book story

1. Means Vs. Ends

The ending of the film raises the powerful philosophical question of whether the ends justify the means. The belief of one character that "Humanity's savage nature will inevitably lead to global annihilation" seems logical, but the moral question remains of what to do with this problem.

2. Corruption Of Power

Another theme is the corrupting force of power. The US government greedily leverages The Comedian and Dr. Manhattan and uses them readily to benefit its political goals. This reminded me of Operation Paperclip and the co-opting of Nazi scientists in order to achieve nuclear and rocket dominance in furtherance of military goals.

3. Technology

There is the theme of man's technology outpacing its moral, ethical, and spiritual means to understand and leverage technology. With different leadership, the world could have easily ended in the 1960s. Watchmen presents a world where this is an even more serious threat.

4. Absolutism

Absolutism vs practicality: Is complete dedication to an ideology courageous and bold, or futile and ineffective?

5. The Noble Lie

Finally, there is the theme of Aristotle's noble lie. Is truth of utmost importance? Or are there times when a lie told for the greater good can be justified?

The film is very thought provoking, and has many parallels to the neomasculine movement. The ending is not a typical Hollywood happy ending, and will leave the viewer with many questions and conflicting ideas.

Read More: You've Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Men Benefit From Acting Potentially Violent And Explosive Around Women

October 11, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The idea that women are attracted to bad boys typically has a lot to do with the feeling that these bad boys would be willing to use or have used physical force in expressing their badness. Oftentimes there may be no direct proof of violence, only the imputation: they're a member of a gang, they angrily called up someone they didn't like over a girl, or confronted them aggressively on the street. Nonetheless, the association itself, when harnessed and disseminated, is powerful enough to attract a large percentage of the young and fertile female population.

Feminists and women in general will deny it, but the bad boy fantasy has the most unavoidable evolutionary roots. The civil, nice guy was only going to provide a safe life in groups where a strong collection of laws and social mores prevented violence. Most of the time, these hamlets were non-existent or very short-lived.

Irrespective of whether he killed innocents, maimed them or stole what wasn't his, the capable violent man enabled more than just a semblance of security and material comfort for a fertile woman. Surrounded by concrete jungles, the image still has significant appeal today, regardless of what our rational minds say.

It is your job to be seen as potentially violent and explosive, without the regular drawbacks of spending time in prison, getting badly beaten up by five other guys, or some other event you don't particularly want to experience. The trick is to combine this perceived willingness to retaliate or strike out with a focused, measured, and successful life in multiple areas.

It is entirely possible to combine these primal and professional spheres together. And what's more, women respond sexually to either and you can have the best of both worlds.

Give the image, without the negative consequences

[image]

The overarching reason guys like Jeremy Meeks attract women is due to their association with violence or possible violence, hence the “bad boy” tag. Working as a bank clerk, his appeal would be 1% of what it is with his criminal record, with or without his baby blues and cheekbones.

There’s a distinction here, as you can see, between being violent and acting potentially violent around women and others. For those of you looking to carve out careers in medicine, law, engineering or the business world, plus a host of other industries, engaging in unprovoked attacks, however morally justified, is not going to get you far. The damage to your professional standing almost always far outweighs the extra poontang you might score on the side (unless you have aspirations to be a professional criminal).

The best part is that many women will not discern a real difference between you being potentially violent and you standing up for yourself and not apologizing. Standing up for and not apologizing for yourself takes many forms. Standing up for yourself is usually reactive, as a result of what someone has done or said and the aptness of your response. Not apologizing for yourself is basically just how you generally behave. Do you apologize, for example, for taking up space on a sidewalk or do you own that space plus some more?

Try some examples of your own

For time immemorial, men feared by other men or associated with violence, however true or not true, have been immortalized by countless women. Bikers, mafioso, and ghetto gangstas have this in common.

When you walk in large cities, you might notice the propensity of people, especially young women, not to move around you when you’re walking towards one another. Sometimes they will deliberately try and cut you off, expecting you’ll concede space. Don’t. Aside from those with infirmities, the elderly or parents with young children, plough through.

The best cases are the groups of three or four walking in line with another so that almost no one can pass them. Last month, one middle-aged woman on the end refused to make way and fall behind her colleagues. Oh well, my bag ran into her. And it hurt. Too bad for her.

When you're with your girl, a female target or just female friends, try things like this out. There's a time and place for etiquette and politeness but at least 90% of the time, barring those with mobility issues, it isn't on the streets you walk. I also (calmly) confront those who blow tobacco smoke in my face accidentally, half- or full-daring them to try again (depending on whether I'm being sarcastic or plain condescending).

Rather than being a staged action, it's who I am, someone utterly repulsed by cigarette fumes. I would do the same thing alone or with a girl. And if it weren't due to social conditioning, those of you not doing it would be doing it. The context is more like becoming who you really are, rather than what society has demanded you be: the timid, ball-less gentleman.

I am going to suggest to you that making retaliatory or wisecracking comments to abrasive males in the projects of Detroit or the Bronx, or the non-tourist suburbs of Moscow, is maybe not worth the effort (or the dental bill). Likewise, hyperaggressive attitudes in women will become a turnoff, because they're either masks for deep insecurity or a sign of severe emotional imbalance.

It is your responsibility not to tip the ship over and to modulate your approach to maximize the two-headed hydra of a primal male who has professional and other success.

Protect your interests and others'

Combative attitudes, expressed in different ways, attract women.

Did someone badly crash into you or, better yet, your friend on the street or somewhere else? Tell them to apologize. People usually stare at such actions, instead of calling them out. Be the one who does. Especially in clear moral instances, such as when I see a group making fun of a single individual, exploding (in a way you control, even if others don't see it), frequently reaps sexual dividends. The effect on your personality down the track with other girls, leading to more dividends still, is particularly important. And don't confuse pussified white knighting with anything like this.

Remember, though, balance is key. Truly violent men, through a combination of their life-limiting rap sheets, social stigma and lack of focus, rarely realize more than a fraction of their potential. As their body decays after their youth, they're mostly left with nothing good materially or sexually. You must be the proverbial hawk of your own life, your eyes keenly aware of the symbiotic relationship between the potentially violent man who stands up for himself and the effective man who gets shit done in the rest of his life.

Always recall that secret no woman will admit: men seen as potentially violent make most of them wet.

Read More: Why Are American Women Acting Like Men?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Moroccan Minors Now Live On The Streets Of Sweden

October 11, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Several hundred Moroccan children live on the streets of Sweden, reports the investigative journalism TV program Uppdrag granskning (Mission Investigation). Their main sources of income are drug dealing and theft.

Since these kids don't have any adults in Morocco to take care of them, it's impossible for Sweden to deport them. Meanwhile, the number of migrants flooding Europe is rising.

Desperate youths

Increasingly more Moroccan boys, some of them as young as 9, are coming to Sweden. They live on the streets and avoid the authorities for fear of deportation. Their parents are either dead or very poor.

In Stockholm City alone, police say there are up to 200 Morrocan youths. But no one knows exactly how many there are in the country.

The reporters of Uppdrag granskning followed a few of the boys for months, documenting their dire situation. Footage show the youths sleeping at Stockholm Central Station, on benches and stairwells. In the summer, some sleep under bushes around trash and rats. Others find rest in abandoned buildings.

Some of them don't want their faces shown, and no one wants to give up his real name. They communicate with the reporters via a translator.

Two boys, 14 and 17 years old, say they move from country to country in Europe, staying away from authorities. They say they want to work, to "have a future." But so far their lives have been spent on the street.

Even though the Swedish authorities try to locate the boys and give them shelter and food, they don't want any help. They have no trust in authorities. One of the boys says, "no one can help me, only God."

A 14 year old Moroccan.

About 1,000 Moroccans under the age of 18 have sought asylum in Sweden since 2011. Less than five percent of them have received residence permits, on account of there being no armed conflict going on in Morocco.

Despite that, only two Moroccan minors have been deported since 2011. According to Swedish law, minors can't be deported if there's no adult in their home country to take care of them.

A boy who has obviously spent a long time in Sweden, since he knows some Swedish, says, "we get no money, we get nothing. They say we're criminals, what else can we do?" Then he blatantly admits to selling drugs.

> I don't want to live on the streets like the Romanis. I want money, I want to have a family. I want a good life. If I sell drugs, I get money for me and my family.

An anonymous police officer speaks out on the prospects of these youths:

> If you live in this environment, it's hard to come back to a regular social life. […] These are children who live on the street, and they are being used by older criminals. We have seen youths who have committed burglary to support themselves. They sell drugs, commit pickpocketing and theft. They do it to stay alive.

One of the boys says that some of them get so desperate, they have sex with grown men for money.

Irresponsible parenting

It seems today that Europe has become the dumping ground for the world's poor and downtrodden. It is certainly difficult to see how this in any way improves Western countries.

Leftists would glorify them, like they always glorify the poor “working class.” But these Moroccan boys are clearly anything but saints.

Their drug peddling and stealing will serve to make Sweden a less safe place. The historically high social capital of this society will diminish as people feel the need to check their pockets now and then to see if anything is missing.

Yet the migrant Moroccans really don’t have any other option than to become criminals. If a Swede with an education can’t find a job in Sweden, how are these foreign, unskilled kids supposed to compete?

Moroccans taking shelter in an abandoned cabin.

In some sense, you can’t blame then. This is not to say that they shouldn’t be punished for the crimes they commit.

Often when children misbehave, you put the blame on the parents who are supposed to raise them at home. In this case, the boys have no home. They are forced to raise each other, and all they know is life on the streets.

Moroccan parents are not taking responsibility for their children. But isn’t it odd that the people that have the least resources to take care of their offspring, the people who live in the worst possible conditions in the world, are the ones that have the most children?

Maybe it’s not odd at all; every human being has needs. But wouldn’t it with be so much better for everybody, if these people thought to themselves, “hey, since I earn almost no money at all, and can barely feed myself, and since there’s probably some machete wielding guy behind that bush waiting to decapitate me and the rest of my tribe, perhaps it wouldn’t be such a bad idea to stop having unprotected sex, at least until my situation improves somewhat.”

Solutions

There are only two ways to solve the issue of Moroccan hoodlums coming to Sweden.

The first option is to keep doing what is already being done—letting these youths in and offering them help that they won’t accept. In the long run, though, this situation will probably make more and more Swedes lean toward the second option.

That means closing the borders. On the one hand it would keep unwanted migrants from entering the country; only letting in people with qualifications that the labor market needs. On the other hand, having border controls means Sweden would no longer be a part of the Schengen Area. Sure, it would be a great undertaking, but who said solving this issue would be easy?

Read More: Freedom Of Speech Is Dying In Sweden

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

Appearance Is Ideology

October 12, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You can easily predict the ideology of someone on the liberal-conservative spectrum by how they look. This is universal not just in Western countries but also in more traditional parts of the world.

Liberals tend to be ugly, fat, and with low muscle mass when compared to the societal average. I don't claim this to cause insult, but it's clear that liberalism is an ideology that attempts to take from the strong, beautiful, and talented to give to the ugly, weak, and talentless. If you are strong yourself, you would not want to involuntarily donate the fruits of your labor to those who are weak, especially if they are outside of your tribe, meaning that average or below average individuals naturally gravitate towards liberalism.

If a woman is ugly or fat, she wants social policies that allow her to get more attention from elite males while less goes to women who are more beautiful or lovely than her. If you are a man who has puny muscles and testosterone levels, you will want policies that take from stronger men mostly out of your own jealousy and feelings of inferiority. You don't want them to succeed because of abilities, talents, or attributes they have that you don't.

Most exceptions to this rule can be easily explained by income. If a man has small muscles but makes over $200,000 a year, he will lean conservative (unless he's Jewish, where he will continue favoring liberal policies since they typically hinder anti-Semitism).

If a girl is not happy in life because she's not getting attention from men, or has a boyfriend with an effeminate manner, she will most certainly be a liberal, even in foreign countries. I have never met a foreign woman rated an 8 or above that would share a feminist idea with me, but it's quite common to hear them from 6's in those same countries. Liberal thought promotes the mythical idea of human equality and helps boost her self esteem into incorrectly believing that she's just as deserving of life's benefits as a more beautiful woman with better genetics or upbringing.

The liberal mindset doesn't only affect mate competition, but also any sort of contest where naturals or talented individuals can beat those lacking in talent. For example, in a particular social group I was involved in, I repeatedly won a certain contest. After an unprecedented winning streak, two unattractive individuals in the group wanted to formulate a rule to specifically exclude me from competing because it was "not fair" that I kept winning. One mentioned that if she was in charge of voting, she would declare someone else the winner even if I did actually win. The lens through which a liberal views those who are better than them is to exclaim "It's not fair!" followed by rules or policies to unfairly handicap those who are better.

If you're not a winner, you will not support an ideology which allows winners to keep the bulk of their winnings. While I would in no way assert that American conservatives (Republicans) are winners, or even true conservatives, it's clear that American liberals have gravitated to their ideology because it promises a social climate where their low talent, low beauty, and low muscle features are not seen in a negative way. They become "equal" to those who are obviously superior in intelligence, appearance, talent, or wealth.

It's not uncommon for a man, as he improves himself in business and also increases his sexual market value, to gravitate from the left to the right side of the political spectrum. Otherwise, he would be going against his interests to share his hard-fought gains with those who did not work as hard as him. Therefore to understand where people fall on the political spectrum, simply look at them.

If the girl is unsightly, she's a liberal. If she's beautiful, she wants to be rightly rewarded for that beauty, and so will have more traditional beliefs where men undertake high mating investment to be with her. If a guy is also ugly in the sense that he's ugly to women (has low testosterone, small muscles, low game skill, low confidence), he is also a liberal. This shortcut will make it very easy for you to identify who to avoid and who to admit into your circle of friendship.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Lindy West Disease

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Speaking Out Against Injustice: The Case Of Jean Calas

October 12, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

France in the mid-eighteenth century was a nation with an official faith—Catholicism—which tolerated no rival. Huguenots (French Protestants) had faced nearly continuous persecution since the advent of the Reformation. Protestants were excluded from the major professions, such as medicine, law, and the pharmacy, and were required to be married by a Catholic priest in order for a marriage to be recognized.

In fairness, it must be said that Protestants proved to be just as vigorous persecutors as Catholics, perhaps more so. Calvinists, in their regions, went after every symbol of Rome they could lay their hands on; and their literal interpretations of (selected) scriptures could prompt them too to paroxysms of religious fanaticism.

Jean Calas was a Protestant textile merchant living in the city of Toulouse. This city's Parlement was dominated by Jansenists, a Catholic sect known for its severity and fatalism. In 1761, we are told, the Parlement of Toulouse sentenced a Protestant man to death after he had been accused of killing a son who tried to convert to Catholicism.

Suspicions were in the air that Protestants were capable of committing murder to prevent conversion to Catholicism. Religious faith was then far more important to people's lives than now. The death penalty for religious apostasy would in most of the world today be unthinkable, but in Europe in those days it was a matter of deadly earnest. It is only by appreciating this fact can we begin to understand the tragedy of Jean Calas.

Calas and his wife had four sons, and employed a Catholic governess for his family. One of Calas's sons had converted to Catholicism. Another son, named Marc Antoine, was a law student tormented by gambling debts, alcohol, and sectarian vacillations.

On October 13, 1761, Marc Antoine was found hanging by a rope in his father's textile store. A doctor was called, but it was too late: he had died by hanging. We must here again set aside our modern mentality and understand that, in that era, suicide was viewed as a serious crime against one's own body.

Under the law, the bodies of suicide victims were required to be desecrated by crowds, and then publicly hanged. Their property was also confiscated by the courts. Not wishing this fate for his son, Jean Calas contrived a plan to make the suicide look like either a murder or a natural death. It was an act of rash stupidity that would trigger a terrible sequence of events.

The authorities detained several family members and questioned them intensely. They changed their story of the cause of Marc Antoine's death, and admitted that it had been a suicide. The problem was that no one believed them. As previously noted, feeling against Huguenots in Toulouse ran high, and it did not take much for the mobs to demand Calas's head.

Marc Antoine now became a martyr in the eyes of the public, murdered by his father to prevent his conversion to Catholicism. The trial of the Calas family, conducted by twelve judges, was a muddled and pathetic affair, ending predictably in the conviction of Jean Calas, his wife, and a son. A friend of the deceased, named Lavaysse, was sentenced to slave labor in the galleys, and the Catholic governess received five years. She had testified as to the blamelessness of the family, but this testimony was discounted.

On appeal to the Parlement of Toulouse, the sentence was affirmed in the case of Jean Calas; for the others, it was reversed. Calas refused to confess to any wrongdoing. He was subjected to miserable tortures: his limbs were stretched on the rack, and he was filled to the bursting point with water.

But no confession would come. So on March 10, 1762, Calas had his arms and legs broken publicly by an executioner, after which he was strangled; his body was then burned at the stake. His property was forfeited to the government, and his surviving relatives quietly fled the area.

And here is where the great Voltaire became involved. He was then the most influential writer in France, perhaps also in all of Europe. After hearing about the case, he conducted his own investigation by interviewing the key witnesses. Manifest inconsistencies, inaccuracies, and errors in the case were brought to light. These convinced him that Calas had been innocent.

Voltaire

Only a man of his stature and keenness of mind could have done anything at this point. Stirred to outrage by the fanaticism and injustice of the Toulouse authorities, as well as by the smug silence of the Church authorities, he made the case a personal crusade. He hired lawyers to consult with him, and then raised funds to have the case reopened; it soon took on an international aspect as donations came in from notables and rulers from abroad.

Voltaire even arranged for the family to meet with officials of King Louis XV in March of 1763, after which the case was ordered to be reopened. To help prepare public opinion, Voltaire released a stirring work, a Treatise on Tolerance, which argued eloquently against fanaticism and bigotry.

Vindication came on March 9, 1765, when a royal decree came down annulling the conviction of Jean Calas. He was declared innocent, and his family was awarded 30,000 livres. It was one of Voltaire's greatest triumphs, and one which would help inspire him later to adopt the rallying cry, "Écrasez l'infâme!," or "Crush the infamy."

Injustices and iniquities committed by fanatics are all around us. Some of them are glaringly obvious; others, less so. It is our duty to speak out against them when we can. And if this is not possible, we must refuse to associate with, or to assist, the forces of injustice.

To do anything less would be an abjuration of our responsibilities as moral men.

Read More: 8 Tactics Of The Occult War

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

2 More Flaws I Have Discovered In Conventional Game Principles

October 13, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Last week I talked about two flaws I had noticed in the crimson capsule brand of red pill game. Though these two inconsistencies are the exception to the rule most of the time, they had shown themselves to me enough for me to take notice.

That said, here are the next two in line.

1. Maintaining Frame

It’s an open secret that women are turned on by the “strong, silent type.” A man who is in control of all his faculties in the face of unrest moistens the panties of females of all ages.

This particular aspect of game is what we call “frame control” or “maintaining frame.” When the shit hits the fan keeping your cool is what separates the men from the boys in all areas of life.

However, there are a few times where losing your shit is not only acceptable, but sometimes even necessary. Especially within the context of a sexual relationship with a woman.

The reason for this is that getting angry and yelling or swearing at a female shows her that you’re not afraid of grabbing your Y-chromosome and letting your testosterone do what it’s designed to do. Some women will also admit that being physically scared of a man is also a turn on.

Sometimes this is what's necessary for her to get the message

The fact is that sometimes being calm, cool, and collected just doesn't cut it in certain situations and women know this. Some men stay quiet out of fear or apprehension and girls sniff this out like bloodhounds. They know the difference between a quiet confidence and silent jitters.

The very first time I witnessed this in action, I was too blind to see it:

> I was in the kitchen making my coffee when she started bitching and complaining about something and I took the bait. We went back and forth and after a few minutes I'd had it. I let her talk for about 30 seconds uninterrupted when I finally yelled:
>
> "SHUT THE FUCK UP!!!!"
>
> I had never spoken to her like that before and was prepared for a veritable verbal assault. My back was turned so I couldn't see her facial expression (nor did I want to). I waited and waited for her to scream back but to my surprise she heeded my command. She didn't say another word until I stormed out the door for work when she meagerly said:
>
> "Have a good day at work, Donovan. I love you."

The reason my wife became a world class cock sucker and gourmet chef for a week is because she was turned on by the raw masculinity that came out of my pores when I yelled at her. And because I didn't realize it at the time, the porn star sex and three course meals stopped soon after.

Keep in mind that it's important to recognize her attempts at emotional manipulation or to get a rise out of you. When your girl throws a fit, maintain frame and either ignore her, or tease her for acting like a toddler.

If she pulls an adolescent stunt for the sole purpose of getting a reaction out of you (read: shit test), roll your eyes, chuckle, and tell her “try again sweetie.”

No, I’m not suggesting that you get angry and yell at your woman all the time. A man with a short temper is a man who is not in control of his emotions and has some growing up to do.

Losing your temper too often is beta

But when you show a woman you’re unafraid to raise your voice or momentarily lose your cool when she steps out of line, it lets her know that you can and will “go there” if need be.

Make no mistake about the fact that stoicism is absolutely paramount when dealing with your girl(s). But every once in a while it’s necessary for a man to bare his teeth.

2. All Women Are Like That

This particular doctrine is easily the most prevalent in this sector of the web. The belief is that all women in this part of the world are hypergamous sluts who will cheat on you with impunity for any and every reason under the sun.

While this applies to the vast majority of females in the western hemisphere it would be disingenuous of me or anyone else to say that every single woman in the U.S. is the same. I've stated before that…

> …any reasonable person knows this isn't the really the case. Even the darkest of crimson capsule males understand there are exceptions to the rule, however rare they may be.

Though "good girls" are extraordinarily hard to find (and even when found, they're likely spoken for) they do exist. In a culture that rewards sluttiness with praise and government assistance, it stands to reason that most females would opt for a lifestyle free of sexual temperance and responsibility.

But every once in a while you'll see or hear about a female who isn't an attention whore, embraces traditional sex roles, and is still a virgin. Again, these are rare birds but the fact of the matter is that the endangered species of the fabled Quality American Woman isn't extinct quite yet.

Conclusion

The application of standard game principles are successful more often than not because most Western women are alike in terms of what attracts them to men.

The slight differences between them, however, is where a man must use his instinct to discern which ones to use, and which ones to put on the shelf. Dread game may work on some females but if you run it for too long on 9s and 10s you'll likely be replaced by day #2 of your radio silence.

A girl who likes you might back off if she sees that you're in the company of good looking girls on the regular because she doesn't want to have to compete with other females.

The bottom line is that even though game has been definitively proven to work and work well, one size does not fit all.

Read Next: Flaws I have discovered In Red Pill Game Doctrines

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

French Train Hero Tries To Protect Woman And She Leaves After He Gets Stabbed

October 13, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In August, American soldier Spencer Stone was amongst those who halted a purported Islamic fundamentalist's attempt at a killing spree on a crowded French train. For his valiant efforts, he received the Legion of Honor from President François Hollande. Fast-forward mere weeks and Stone has now been stabbed in Sacramento, California after trying to help a woman he thought was being attacked by her boyfriend. In return, the hero suffered multiple stab wounds at the hands of other men, injuries he is yet to recover from in hospital.

The woman thanked Stone's intervention by promptly escaping with his suspected attackers. In a move which should not surprise any person with a red pill even still stuck on their tongue, the female cozied up again with the same man Stone allegedly saw punch her. The lesson? By now, you should be able to tell it yourself: you can risk life and limb for a woman and she nonetheless goes back to the person she wanted all manner of assistance against only moments before. The fate of the poor sucker who desperately and bravely tries to help is immaterial to her.

White knights come in all shades

I’m sure Spencer is a great dude but if he keeps trying to save the world he’ll soon be departing from it. Repeated heroes usually end up dying.

Spencer Stone is not the sort of white knight I am going to ridicule like the regular variety. Truth be told, he probably does not and will never regret intervening to help the woman. The real difficulty, though, is making so many men comprehend their literal dispensability in the eyes of a gargantuan percentage of the female population.

Many women themselves do not realize this consciously, basically because they have never had to be “saved” by another man in a violent situation. There are hints, however, that creep out in daily life. It’s your responsibility to find them and act accordingly.

The flakiness and duplicity of women is well-known. Stone should consider himself a victim of one of the more dramatic examples of this behavior. The girl you made out with passionately on the dance floor becomes the girl ignoring you the next day. People talk about “tight game” and other methodologies as a panacea to this, as if it offers some sort of bona fide daily life insurance for any male user.

Try telling that to professional asshole and supposed alpha Sean Penn, who found his texts and calls suddenly ignored by Charlize Theron, or any man drawn from a litany of sex symbol celebrities who is left to the wolves by a previously “devoted” female.

Game and other honed skills will improve your odds and numbers, sometimes drastically so, but they will not make you immune to all the vagaries of women. Nor will being a burly, strapping young man (and actual hero) who comes to a girl’s physical rescue. Irrespective of whether you’re not expecting or even thinking about romance, you will regularly be bitterly disappointed if you anticipate an iota of genuine gratitude from her. Unless someone is in mortal danger (and here, too, it’s often dumb to get involved), is intervening to help a woman really worth the effort?

Be careful of your paradigm, white knights

Just as the white knight can imagine he has armor and a steed, he can also imagine or embellish the reasons for him saving a woman.

A number of the news stories about the Sacramento stabbing have pointed to a two-way physical exchange between the woman in question and the man who punched her. Of course, any man who punches a woman in public is stupidly stoking one hell of a fire. She could have hit you with a baseball bat from behind and you're still seen as the aggressor.

Stone's miscalculation seems to have been ignoring the woman's participation in the physicality. This is significant, as a mental omission of her actions, like with many intervening men, most likely explains why he got between them.

Paradigms such as these shine a light on countless behavioral permutations in terms of not only white knights but how we usually define victims and aggressors. Men will not flinch to intervene to help a woman of the same general size as the male apparently attacking her, but may just look on when a refrigerator of a man attacks a proverbial male Hobbit outside a nightclub.

Likewise, violent or very suspect actions by a woman are deemed irrelevant for the purposes of a man deciding whether to "save" her. The problem exists on a continuum, so even we who see ourselves as inoculated against cultural lies need to be constantly reassessing our underlying presumptions.

Helping most women (or people in general) is a waste of time

Who do you really risk yourself for?

Save the vast majority of your charitable or Good Samaritan acts for actual charity cases: maybe the elderly, the disabled, or the casualties of auto accidents. Or, like Stone's first act of bravery, stopping terrorists who stand right in front of you. You might opt for being the budding hero of a woman, only to find yourself dead, in a wheelchair, beaten up or otherwise all the worse for intervening, whether physically, socially, professionally or financially.

Sadly, chances are that something detrimental like this will happen very quickly. You'll get more of a celebration amongst women by being aggressively violent, rather than aggressively defending someone else, including women themselves.

Risk yourself for a principle that you want to see live on after you're gone (preferably in 50+ years). Never risk yourself for a woman likely to spite you in spite of all your attempts to protect her.

Read More: How Women Train Men To Rape

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Italian Freelancer Elisa Murgese Slanders Roosh With False Criminal Claims

October 13, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

An Italian newspaper ironically named il Fatto Quotidiano “The Daily Fact” has recently jumped on the bandwagon of bashing Roosh. Despite the lack of any “Don’t Bang Italy” publication or comments about the country to instigate backlash, the editors of this magazine decided that, if it bleeds it leads, and what better scandal that to read about a new wave of “rapists” empowered by their leader, Roosh Valizadeh.

The Paper

“The Daily Fact” — (emphasis on Daily, less so on Fact)

First, a little about the paper. iFQ was founded way back in the year 2009. That’s incredibly young by typical standards, but in the birthplace of Western civilization, Rome, where it’s not uncommon to work and live in buildings hundreds or even thousands of years old, it’s downright infantile. This daily tabloid has a print circulation of less than 40,000, about the size of your typical small town or village. However, age and popularity are not valid criticisms of a paper, and indeed smaller independent news sources are often more reliable and free than large, institutional papers.

The Daily Fact was co-founded by Antonio Padellaro and Marco Travaglio, journalists who had worked together prior to founding the new Daily in 2009. Both were strong critics of Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi (2008-2011) who was later imprisoned for tax fraud, bribery, and corruption. Padellaro left the paper in February 2015, when Marco Travaglio took over as editor. Travaglio is a self-described fan of Reagan and Thatcher, a "European liberal," which is closer to an American libertarian or right wing.

Eliza Murgese, self described fan of Muslim feminism

While I am relatively unfamiliar with Italian politics and media, and lack the ability to judge the reputation and quality of The Daily Fact as a news organization, it was founded in 2009 with strong ideals—rejection of public tax monies, limited advertising, rules prohibiting a large controlling shareholder interest, freedom, and independence to "really give the news" and "tell what others do not tell."

Indeed, the actions of one writer do not represent those of an entire organization. Therefore, I am calling on editor Travaglio to correct and retract his slanderous article published October 1, 2015 by Elisa Murgese (facebook) titled "I suoi libri insegnano come stuprare una donna" as seen in the image below)

"Original" article and translation via google translate

Libel and Slander

It is unknown what has "triggered" this unprovoked attack. The article was penned by Elisa Murgese, a writer with a British accent (not listed on the board of 18 editors of The Daily Fact–apparently a freelancer), who seems fixated on America, with columns on Bruce Jenner, American Purity Balls, American Reality TV, and dubious rape statistics.

Murgese has been writing for the paper for at least a year, although her stories seem to be mostly translations of foreign news stories that may have some international appeal. Hence the story of Roosh, ripped directly from American site "We Hunted The Mammoth:

The new misogyny, tracked and mocked," a site which seems obsessed with sarcastically restating many of Roosh's articles, and indeed posted a critique of Roosh's thought experiment on ways to lower rape in February 2015.

One of the Italian Prime Minister's many mistresses

Murgese's article was basically a translation of the same unfounded, libelous, slanderous, and completely inaccurate claims made before, accusing a man of committing rape when no such crime has ever been seriously alleged, much less proven in a court of law.

I was hoping there would at least be some thought put into this criticism here. After all, this is Italy, where when your head of state has a mistress, it is something to smile and high five over, not call a multimillion dollar investigation and impeach your president. But no. It's the same old stupid "he wants to teach men to rape" nonsense. Murgese makes three incredibly absurd claims.

Not the same type of coverage the American media gave to Clinton's affair

1. Love tourism = rape

He calls it "love tourism". For others, however, it is true advice on how to rape a woman in foreign locations without being accused of this violence." So now meeting interesting, feminine, high quality women while on vacation is the equivalent of violently raping them. Murgese is actually calling sex rape now. This is not uncommon in the US and Canada, but I thought Europe was a little more progressive with their views on sex.

2. Sex After Wine = Rape

Murgese has a British English accent, and I seriously doubt any Italian heritage. First attacking sex and then drink? She brings up the nutty third wave feminist line that sex combined with drinking alcohol is rape! Setting aside the fact that almost everyone has had drunk sex at some point in their life, and that the majority of nightclubs and bars exist primarily to allow couples to meet, lower inhibitions, and later engage in sexual congress, she infers that Roosh raped a girl in Iceland because he told a story about having sex with an Icelandic female after drinking.

Well, if alcohol indeed causes one to rape, the only logical conclusion to this is get rid of this rape inducing drug! How many times does drinking a glass of wine lead to sex.. excuse me.. rape.. later that night? By that rationale, all wine in Italy must be smashed and destroyed.

Elisa Murgese, either retract your article or start smashing rape bottles

3. Endorsing Criminal Behavior

Murgese then states: "Roosh V meticulously explains not only how to abuse a girl, but also how to avoid being criminally prosecuted."

This accusation is presented entirely without explanation or evidence. Nowhere have I ever seen anyone condoning criminal behavior, especially violent crimes, and no instructions on how to avoid prosecution of violent crimes is ever discussed in any of Roosh's writings, nor have I seen an article written by anyone in the neomasculinity movement even begin to broach this subject.

Italy has severe laws against libel and slander, and since the author is directly calling for a boycott of Roosh's books, a case could be made she is directly financially harming him with inaccurate and baseless wild accusations.

Obama and Sarkozy committing eye-rape of a teenage girl in Italy in 2009

A misunderstanding or purposeful slander?

Elisa Murgese, time to go back to J-school

Especially when it comes to foreigners in strange lands, many of us are guilty of making accusations of others based only on others' opinions, or repeating what is heard in the media "Putin is a brutal dictator!" "Assad is a violent man who must be overthrown!" "Iran should be nuked off the map!" "The American military is grossly underfunded!" when instead we are often parroting the voices of the ignorant.

I am willing to give Elisa Murgese the benefit of the doubt here, and assume that she just reacted out of rage upon hearing of a rapist on the loose without bothering to verify if such an outlandish situation could actually exist.

Perhaps her editors found similarly libelous stories in American blogs and considered that good enough to confirm and approve the article. Therefore, I am now calling on the editor and publisher of il Fatto Quotidiano to retract its slanderous story immediately, and issue a statement clarifying that these claims are wild and baseless. If not, I expect to see them out on the streets tomorrow, smashing wine-rape bottles and pulling women out of bars and nightclubs before they can get raped.

In case they need some motivation, a refresher on slander laws in Italy, courtesy of Wikipedia:

> In Italy, there are different crimes against honor. The crime of injury (Article 594 of the Penal Code) refers to offending one's honor and is punished with up to six months in prison or up to 516 Euros in fine. If the offense refers to the attribution of a determined fact and is committed before many persons, penalties are doubled to up to a year in prison or up to 1032 Euros in fine. In addition, the crime of defamation (Article 595, Penal Code) refers to any other situation involving offending one's reputation before many persons, and has a penalty of up to a year in prison or up to 1032 Euros in fine, doubled to up to two years in prison or a fine of 2065 Euros if the offense consists of the attribution of a determined fact. When the offense happens by the means of the press or by any other means of publicity, or in a public demonstration, the penalty is of imprisonment from six months to three years, or a fine of at least

> 516 Euros.
>
> Finally, Article 31 of the Penal Code establishes that crimes committed with abuse of power or with abuse of a profession or art, or with the violation of a duty inherent to that profession or art, lead to the additional penalty of a temporary ban in the exercise of that profession or art.

More than Just Bad Reporting

While some would suggest a nefarious worldwide plot by spiteful enemies to destroy the neomasculinity movement, I was initially inclined to think this was merely lazy reporting by a part time foreign freelance journalist. However, Murgese escalates the existing "rapist" claim made recently in the wake of Roosh's Canadian masculinity talks, taking it a step further by calling him a rapist who educates other rapists on how to rape women repeatedly without getting caught.

This clearly crosses the line from laziness to fraudulent and defamatory. It is difficult to believe that Murgese came across a story of an American rapist who has a mission of spreading rape throughout the world and believed it.

Indeed, when I googled the term "rape apologist" I could not find a single real person who was identified as a rape apologist. I did, however, find a story about Pretenders singer Chrissie Hynde discussing her sexual assault at the age of 21: "Technically speaking, however you want to look at it, this was all my doing and I take full responsibility. If I'm walking around in my underwear and I'm drunk? Who else's fault can it be?"

If a real rape apologist can't even be named, it appears highly negligent for Murgese to author a story in a foreign language about an overseas "rapist and rape apologist" without any independent verification, criminal records, police reports, or other documentation. Rape apologists are not real, or if they exist, they are so rare that they are as common as the female unicorn.

But as the Bruce Jenner story has taught us, that doesn't stop news organizations from heaping disproportionate amounts of coverage on an issue if it suits their agenda. There are no rape apologists, the one in four rape statistic is a lie, and Roosh is not a rapist. Il Fatto Quotidiano must retract its story immediately.

Read More: Canadian Aurelie Nix Falsely Accuses Roosh of a Rape Threat With Help From Journalist Emily Campbell

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How To Make Out With A Girl Without Getting “The Cheek”

October 14, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the key pieces of game advice that most men would do well to internalise is to become more sexual with the women they date. In my experience, the thing that really separates successful seducers from onanistic dilettante entertainers is their ability to move things forward physically on a date or in a club. Key to this is the ability to kiss (i.e. make out with) a girl successfully at the right time.

The truth about makeouts

Unfortunately a makeout does not mean that you will sleep with any given girl. Guys new to game can get very excited about kissing new girls in nightclubs, little realising how infrequently such dalliances convert into lays. If the number of girls I’ve slept with is in the hundreds, then the number of makeouts I’ve had sits comfortably in the thousands.

Why should this be the case? My theory is that while girls of course get supremely horny (particularly just prior to their periods), because their requirement for sex is generally less urgent than men's, they can enjoy the sexual frisson that a makeout can bring without necessarily feeling compelled to follow through to sex. For this reason you should take care not to be the "club makeout guy" — essentially just an entertainer, as unmemorable for her after a night out as the cloakroom staff.

All of that said, makeouts are without a doubt very important in the seduction process. Why? It's very simple. While you can in theory sleep with a girl without having kissed her first, no girl who won't kiss you will go to bed with you. Therefore a makeout serves the dual purpose of testing her compliance while simultaneously pumping her state and getting her turned on.

Fear

For many guys starting out, though, the idea of going in for a kiss is terrifying — principally because they are afraid that the girl will turn her cheek and reject it. In a way, their fear is justifiable, as it speaks to the compliance significance of makeouts we've just discussed. As even the most sheltered chode intuits, a kiss separates a friendly, "friend zone"-type interaction from a sexually charged one. So there's a lot riding on "going in for the kill," as failure means that you have been rejected as a sexual prospect – a crushing thought for many new guys.

A lot of men — myself included when I started — would rather not risk it and so they keep chatting away about inconsequential nonsense, hopefully that something will happen naturally. But here's a pro tip: it won't. Women very rarely if ever initiate physical interactions. As the guy it's your job to do so, so you must man up and get to work.

How to go in for a kiss

One of the biggest realizations I've had in game is just how frequently girls will reject your first attempt at a kiss even when she's attracted to you. This may sound like small beans in the world's philosophical insights but it's actually incredibly freeing. I can't tell you how many times I've been on a date with a girl only for her to give me the cheek again and again, sometimes five times or more, before finally acquiescing to the makeout. If only I'd have known this back when I was a teenager, when one rejected kiss would have meant months in my bedroom listening to The Smiths, covered in shame.

In order to set things up as effectively as possible for a successful makeout you first need to ensure you're physical with her from the off. Little touches count. A kiss on both cheeks when you first meet her, touches to her lower arms and shoulders while you make points, a firm hand on her lower back as you guide her through a busy venue. All of these things, though minor in themselves, will help to build up a sense of physical intimacy between you, ensuring that the kiss, when it does come, won't seem half as jarring or unexpected.

Now that you are comfortable with one another, you are ready to make out. But when is the "right" time? While there is no exact prescription for this, I can guarantee that you can kiss her sooner than you think. In fact, given what I've already said about girls' tendencies to turn down initial attempts even when they're attracted, then you might as well start as early as possible.

These days, I will usually go in for a kiss within the first fifteen minutes, sometimes sooner. Why waste time? As a general rule of thumb though, if you're not confident in being so bold, the girl will signal that she's ready to be kissed in a very subtle way. Usually there will be a small pause in the conversation and she'll shoot you a micro-glance, as though she's expectant of something. This is the point at which you must act – if you don't then the moment will be lost and you may not recover it.

To kiss her, place your hand confidently but gently on her cheek. If you want, you can caress her face a little or stroke her hair. Then move her face so that she is looking at you. Now move in close, without hesitating, aiming your lips at hers. If you receive no resistance then go for it. After your lips have touched she should open her mouth slightly, allowing you to put your tongue in. You can now move your hand away from her face, perhaps moving it to her leg to sexualise things a little. A good way to spice the kiss up and display dominance is to bite her bottom lip gently. This stops things from getting too vanilla.

Getting "The Cheek"

What to do if you “get the cheek”? As discussed, in many cases, especially if you’ve gone in early, she will reject your first attempts by turning her head away when you try to kiss her. Many men are so horrified by this eventuality that they are scared even to make an attempt, but you shouldn’t be. Instead, just realise that it happens to everyone and that it’s part of the process.

Smirk, pull back, talk about neutral topics and then try again a little later. Sometimes it takes four or even five attempts before your kiss will be reciprocated – that’s absolutely fine, unless of course she is very angrily telling you to back off, in which case things have gone irrevocably wrong and you should apologize and leave immediately. But if she’s still sitting there then you can be confident that she’s interested and that it’s your job to persist.

In the end you can be confident that, as long as you don’t look fazed or butthurt, this tactic will work and good things will follow.

Read More: Five Reasons Why Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need to Learn Game

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Ted Kaczynski's Manifesto Predicted The Catastrophe From Technology And Liberalism

October 14, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Someone recently recommended I take a look at Ted Kaczynski's Manifesto, stating that Kaczynski foresaw a lot of problems with modern culture that we write about here. After reading it, I have to agree that the "Unabomber" clearly understood what society was up against, a full decade before the development of the manosphere.

The media has done a good of painting Kaczynski as a deranged madman, but I found his writing to be clear and perceptive. His manifesto connected some loose dots I had between Neil Postman's work, which described what we have lost through technology, and this community's observations that the juggernaut of leftism is destroying what remains of traditional culture.

Kaczynski states that leftism and technology go hand in hand, because the collectivism and control that leftism requires cannot be accomplished without technology. The more advances we have with technology, the more it will be used to further progressivism, which includes a decrease in individual rights and an increase in authoritarian state control. I recommend you read the entirety of the manifesto here. In the meanwhile, the most important passages are below.

Introduction

> The Industrial Revolution and its consequences have been a disaster for the human race. They have greatly increased the life-expectancy of those of us who > live in “advanced” countries, but they have destabilized society, have made life unfulfilling, have subjected human beings to indignities, have led to widespread psychological suffering (in the Third World to physical suffering as well) and have inflicted severe damage on the natural world. The continued development of technology will worsen the situation. It will certainly subject human beings to greater indignities and inflict greater damage on the natural world, it will probably lead to greater social disruption and psychological suffering, and it may lead to increased physical suffering even in “advanced” countries.

>
> […]
>
> This is not to be a POLITICAL revolution. Its object will be to overthrow not governments but the economic and technological basis of the present society.

The problems with leftists

> When someone interprets as derogatory almost anything that is said about him (or about groups with whom he identifies) we conclude that he has inferiority feelings or low self-esteem. This tendency is pronounced among minority rights activists, whether or not they belong to the minority groups whose rights they defend. They are hypersensitive about the words used to designate minorities and about anything that is said concerning minorities.
>
> […]
>
> They seem almost paranoid about anything that might suggest that any primitive culture is inferior to our own.
>
> […]
>
> Those who are most sensitive about “politically incorrect” terminology are not the average black ghetto-dweller, Asian immigrant, abused woman or disabled person, but a minority of activists, many of whom do not even belong to any “oppressed” group but come from privileged strata of society. Political correctness has its stronghold among university professors, who have secure employment with comfortable salaries, and the majority of whom are heterosexual white males from middle-to upper-middle-class families.
>
> […]
>
> Feminists are desperately anxious to prove that women are as strong and as capable as men. Clearly they are nagged by a fear that women may NOT be as strong and as capable as men.
>
> […]
>
> Leftists tend to hate anything that has an image of being strong, good and successful. They hate America, they hate Western civilization, they hate white males, they hate rationality. The reasons that leftists give for hating the West, etc. clearly do not correspond with their real motives. They SAY they hate the West because it is warlike, imperialistic, sexist, ethnocentric and so forth, but > where these same faults appear in socialist countries or in primitive cultures, the leftist finds excuses for them, or at best he GRUDGINGLY admits that they exist; whereas he ENTHUSIASTICALLY points out (and often greatly exaggerates) these faults where they appear in Western civilization.

>
> […]
>
> He wants society to solve everyone's problems for them, satisfy everyone's needs for them, take care of them. He is not the sort of person who has an inner sense of confidence in his ability to solve his own problems and satisfy his own needs. The leftist is antagonistic to the concept of competition because, deep inside, he feels like a loser.
>
> […]
>
> Leftists are antagonistic to genetic explanations of human abilities or behavior because such explanations tend to make some persons appear superior or inferior to others. Leftists prefer to give society the credit or blame for an individual's ability or lack of it. Thus if a person is "inferior" it is not his fault, but society's, because he has not been brought up properly.
>
> […]
>
> Helping black people is not their real goal. Instead, race problems serve as an excuse for them to express their own hostility and frustrated need for power. In doing so they actually harm black people, because the activists' hostile attitude toward the white majority tends to intensify race hatred.
>
> […]
>
> Suppose you asked leftists to make a list of ALL the things that were wrong with society, and then suppose you instituted EVERY social change that they demanded. It is safe to say that within a couple of years the majority of leftists would find something new to complain about, some new social "evil" to correct because, once again, the leftist is motivated less by distress at society's ills than by the need to satisfy his drive for power by imposing his solutions on society.
>
> […]
>
> Leftism is collectivist; it seeks to bind together the entire world (both nature and the human race) into a unified whole. But this implies management of nature and of human life by organized society, and it requires advanced technology. You can't have a united world without rapid transportation and communication, you can't make all people love one another without sophisticated psychological techniques, you can't have a "planned society" without the necessary technological base.

It's important to note that he hated leftists enough that he mailed bombs to them, killing three.

The Power Process

Kaczynski describes the “power process” as achieving fulfillment by setting meaningful goals and then having the agency and autonomy to accomplish them. The problem with modern society, he argues, is that there are so many barriers to your own agency, ranging from leftist speech policies to overreaching governmental influence in your personal life, that we are not unencumbered to pursue simple tasks that improve our lives.

A hunter-gatherer in the past could kill his dinner, not only sating his hunger but also feeling pride for catching his meal, but the modern man cannot do the same thing without having to deal with multiple government agencies concerning the legality of his hunting and gun ownership status while fending off animal rights activists and other liberals who want to levy economic violence against him for wanting to kill an animal.

The result of ditching hunter-gatherer lifestyles is that we’re all pursuing “surrogate activities” that have no relation to our survival. Becoming a bodybuilder, international playboy, or dedicated hobbyist of some sort are surrogate activities that, had we had urgent survival needs, we would not pursue. Even my own passion, writing, is a surrogate activity. Kaczynski argues that surrogate activities are essentially make-work and will never lead to lasting fulfillment.

> We divide human drives into three groups: (1) those drives that can be satisfied with minimal effort; (2) those that can be satisfied but only at the cost of serious effort; (3) those that cannot be adequately satisfied no matter how much effort one makes. The power process is the process of satisfying the drives of the second group. The more drives there are in the third group, the more there is frustration, anger, eventually defeatism, depression, etc.
>
> […]
>
> Modern man must satisfy his need for the power process largely through pursuit of the artificial needs created by the advertising and marketing industry, and through surrogate activities.
>
> […]
>
> Consider the hypothetical case of a man who can have anything he wants just by wishing for it. Such a man has power, but he will develop serious psychological problems. At first he will have a lot of fun, but by and by he will become acutely bored and demoralized. Eventually he may become clinically depressed. History shows that leisured aristocracies tend to become decadent. This is not true of fighting aristocracies that have to struggle to maintain their power. But leisured, secure aristocracies that have no need to exert themselves usually become bored, hedonistic and demoralized, even though they have power. This shows that power is not enough. One must have goals toward which to exercise one’s power.
>
> […]

> …the pursuit of sex and love (for example) is not a surrogate activity, because most people, even if their existence were otherwise satisfactory, would feel deprived if they passed their lives without ever having a relationship with a member of the opposite sex. (But pursuit of an excessive amount of sex, more than one really needs, can be a surrogate activity.)

Kaczynski predicted my own growing discontent in accumulating notches and flags. I was pursuing sex above my physical or psychological need, so I soon found it to be empty, the last stop of most surrogate activities.

> …people who are deeply involved in surrogate activities are never satisfied, never at rest. Thus the money-maker constantly strives for more and more wealth. The scientist no sooner solves one problem than he moves on to the next. The long-distance runner drives himself to run always farther and faster. Many people who pursue surrogate activities will say that they get far more fulfillment from these activities than they do from the "mundane" business of satisfying their biological needs, but that is because in our society the effort needed to satisfy the biological needs has been reduced to triviality.

Because in modern society a man cannot build his house, marry a wife, and have children without disruptive state or cultural interference, becoming a playboy is a more logical alternative, satisfying his power process need to a degree, but it eventually becomes a dead-end since it has no purpose when compared to raising and feeding a family free of outside control, which today can be quite impossible.

> What makes us FEEL secure is not so much objective security as a sense of confidence in our ability to take care of ourselves. Primitive man, threatened by a fierce animal or by hunger, can fight in self-defense or travel in search of food. He has no certainty of success in these efforts, but he is by no means helpless against the things that threaten him. The modern individual on the other hand is threatened by many things against which he is helpless: nuclear accidents, carcinogens in food, environmental pollution, war, increasing taxes, invasion of his privacy by large organizations, nationwide social or economic phenomena that may disrupt his way of life.

Today's man is also under threat to denouncers in his workplace and internet mobs that are itching to ruin the employment of someone who doesn't follow mainstream groupthink.

Social problems

We are given choice in trivial matters such as what clothing to wear, what Hollywood-produced entertainment to watch, what job we labor it, and which presidential candidate to choose, but when it comes to matters that scratch at the heels of those who have power or that come at strengthening the masculinity of men, you hit roadblocks put up by the system or by useful idiots of the system.

> Modern society is in certain respects extremely permissive. In matters that are irrelevant to the functioning of the system we can generally do what we please. We can believe in any religion we like (as long as it does not encourage behavior that is dangerous to the system). We can go to bed with anyone we like (as long as we practice “safe sex”). We can do anything we like as long as it is UNIMPORTANT. But in all IMPORTANT matters the system tends increasingly to regulate our behavior.
>
> […]
>
> The conservatives are fools: They whine about the decay of traditional values, yet they enthusiastically support technological progress and economic growth. Apparently it never occurs to them that you can’t make rapid, drastic changes in the technology and the economy of a society without causing rapid changes in all other aspects of the society as well, and that such rapid changes inevitably break down traditional values.
>
> […]
>
> In modern society an individual’s loyalty must be first to the system and only secondarily to a small-scale community, because if the internal loyalties of small-scale communities were stronger than loyalty to the system, such communities would pursue their own advantage at the expense of the system.
>
> […]
>
> The Industrial Revolution was supposed to eliminate poverty, make everybody happy, etc. The actual result has been quite different. The technophiles are hopelessly naive (or self-deceiving) in their understanding of social problems. They are unaware of (or choose to ignore) the fact that when large changes, even seemingly beneficial ones, are introduced into a society, they lead to a long sequence of other changes, most of which are impossible to predict. The result is disruption of the society. So it is very probable that in their attempts to end poverty and disease, engineer docile, happy personalities and so forth, the technophiles will create social systems that are terribly troubled, even more so than the present once.

Primitive man

> There is good reason to believe that primitive man suffered from less stress and frustration and was better satisfied with his way of life than modern man is.
>
> […]
>
> In primitive societies life is a succession of stages. The needs and purposes of one stage having been fulfilled, there is no particular reluctance about passing on to the next stage. A young man goes through the power process by becoming a hunter, hunting not for sport or for fulfillment but to get meat that is necessary > for food. This phase having been successfully passed through, the young man has no reluctance about settling down to the responsibilities of raising a family. (In contrast, some modern people indefinitely postpone having children because they are too busy seeking some kind of "fulfillment." We suggest that the fulfillment they need is adequate experience of the power process—with real goals instead of the artificial goals of surrogate activities.) Again, having successfully raised his children, going through the power process by providing them with the physical necessities, the primitive man feels that his work is done and he is prepared to accept old age (if he survives that long) and death.

>
> […]
>
> [Modern people] are disturbed by the prospect of physical deterioration and death, as is shown by the amount of effort they expend trying to maintain their physical condition, appearance and health. It is not the primitive man, who has used his body daily for practical purposes, who fears the deterioration of age, but the modern man, who has never had a practical use for his body beyond walking from his car to his house. It is the man whose need for the power process has been satisfied during his life who is best prepared to accept the end of that life.

Freedom

> Freedom means being in control (either as an individual or as a member of a SMALL group) of the life-and-death issues of one's existence; food, clothing, shelter and defense against whatever threats there may be in one's environment. Freedom means having power; not the power to control other people but the power to control the circumstances of one's own life. One does not have freedom if anyone else (especially a large organization) has power over one, no matter how benevolently, tolerantly and permissively that power may be exercised. It is important not to confuse freedom with mere permissiveness.
>
> […]
>
> It is said that we live in a free society because we have a certain number of constitutionally guaranteed rights. But these are not as important as they seem. The degree of personal freedom that exists in a society is determined more by the economic and technological structure of the society than by its laws or its form of government.

After learning about his background and reading his manifesto, it's clear that Kaczynski is a hyper-intelligent man who chose the wrong solution to the same set of problems you have probably already realized in one form or another. He mentioned that his manifesto would be read more because of the killings he did, and while it was noticed when it was published back in 1995, we can argue that it had no sizable cultural effect in the proceeding 20 years. As he mentioned, the structure of society is such that ideas dangerous to the ruling elite will not make it far, no matter how people you kill, and this is confirmed by the more recent political murder spree of Anders Breivik in Norway that has achieved nothing to change the political leanings of that small nation.

What I found interesting is that Kaczynski arrived at many of the exact same societal conclusions we have, not through sex but through the mechanisms of working in a university and living in the woods. As I've mentioned in the past, there are many paths to arriving at the truth, and we are starting to see triangulation from men living vastly different lives that modern leftism and rapid technological change have detrimental effects that are annihilating the fabric of society. While I don't entirely know how to solve the problems we face, I do know that taking the Kaczynski and Breivik route is not the answer, judging by the complete failure of their actions to make a difference to the system.

It's too bad of the path that Kaczynski took, because he was obviously a skilled thinker and writer, and could have made a more positive difference in the world had he been more patient and persistent in spreading his written ideas.

Human behavior is molded for the system

> The system HAS TO regulate human behavior closely in order to function. At work people have to do what they are told to do, otherwise production would be thrown into chaos. Bureaucracies HAVE TO be run according to rigid rules. To allow any substantial personal discretion to lower-level bureaucrats would disrupt the system and lead to charges of unfairness due to differences in the way individual bureaucrats exercised their discretion.
>
> […]
>
> The system HAS TO force people to behave in ways that are increasingly remote from the natural pattern of human behavior. For example, the system needs scientists, mathematicians and engineers. It can't function without them. So heavy pressure is put on children to excel in these fields. It isn't natural for an adolescent human being to spend the bulk of his time sitting at a desk absorbed in study. A normal adolescent wants to spend his time in active contact with the real world. Among primitive peoples the things that children are trained to do tend to be in reasonable harmony with natural human impulses.
>
> […]
>
> It is simply taken for granted that everyone must bow to technical necessity. and for good reason: If human needs were put before technical necessity there would be economic problems, unemployment, shortages or worse. The concept of "mental health" in our society is defined largely by the extent to which an individual behaves in accord with the needs of the system and does so without showing signs of stress.
>
> […]
>
> …all these technical advances taken together have created a world in which the average man's fate is no longer in his own hands or in the hands of his neighbors and friends, but in those of politicians, corporation executives and remote,

> anonymous technicians and bureaucrats whom he as an individual has no power to influence.
>
> […]
>
> …antidepressants are a means of modifying an individual's internal state in such a way as to enable him to tolerate social conditions that he would otherwise find intolerable.
>
> […]
>
> In the future, social systems will not be adjusted to suit the needs of human beings. Instead, human being will be adjusted to suit the needs of the system.

Human over-dependence on technology

> When a new item of technology is introduced as an option that an individual can accept or not as he chooses, it does not necessarily REMAIN optional. In many cases the new technology changes society in such a way that people eventually find themselves FORCED to use it.
>
> […]
>
> …technological progress marches in only one direction; it can never be reversed. Once a technical innovation has been introduced, people usually become dependent on it, so that they can never again do without it, unless it is replaced by some still more advanced innovation. Not only do people become dependent as individuals on a new item of technology, but, even more, the system as a whole becomes dependent on it. (Imagine what would happen to the system today if computers, for example, were eliminated.) Thus the system can move in only one direction, toward greater technologization. Technology repeatedly forces freedom to take a step back, but technology can never take a step back—short of the overthrow of the whole technological system.
>
> […]
>
> History shows that all social arrangements are transitory; they all change or break down eventually. But technological advances are permanent within the context of a given civilization.
>
> […]
>
> As society and the problems that face it become more and more complex and as machines become more and more intelligent, people will let machines make more and more of their decisions for them, simply because machine-made decisions will bring better results than man-made ones. Eventually a stage may be reached at which the decisions necessary to keep the system running will be so complex that human beings will be incapable of making them intelligently. At that stage the machines will be in effective control. People won't be able to just turn the machines off, because they will be so dependent on them that turning them off would amount to suicide.

> […]
>
> On those who are employed, ever-increasing demands will be placed: They will need more and more training, more and more ability, and will have to be ever more reliable, conforming and docile, because they will be more and more like cells of a giant organism. Their tasks will be increasingly specialized, so that their work will be, in a sense, out of touch with the real world, being concentrated on one tiny slice of reality. The system will have to use any means that it can, whether psychological or biological, to engineer people to be docile, to have the abilities that the system requires and to "sublimate" their drive for power into some specialized task.

You will be forced to constantly adapt your skill set to the needs of the system as technology advances, regardless of what you want. If you fail to adapt, you will suffer economic impoverishment, even if the adaption requires you to go away from your human nature.

Technology also allows the elite to reduce their dependence on humans to maintain their goal of absolute control:

> …control over large systems of machines will be in the hands of a tiny elite—just as it is today, but with two differences. Due to improved techniques the elite will have greater control over the masses; and because human work will no longer be necessary the masses will be superfluous, a useless burden on the system. If the elite is ruthless they may simply decide to exterminate the mass of humanity.

The function of entertainment

> The entertainment industry serves as an important psychological tool of the system, possibly even when it is dishing out large amounts of sex and violence. Entertainment provides modern man with an essential means of escape. While absorbed in television, videos, etc., he can forget stress, anxiety, frustration, dissatisfaction. Many primitive peoples, when they don't have work to do, are quite content to sit for hours at a time doing nothing at all, because they are at peace with themselves and their world. But most modern people must be constantly occupied or entertained, otherwise they get "bored," i.e., they get fidgety, uneasy, irritable.
>
> […]
>
> …an individual whose attitudes or behavior bring him into conflict with the system is up against a force that is too powerful for him to conquer or escape from, hence he is likely to suffer from stress, frustration, defeat. His path will be much easier if he thinks and behaves as the system requires. In that sense the system is acting for the benefit of the individual when it brainwashes him into conformity.
>
> […]

> Our use of mass entertainment is “optional”: No law requires us to watch television, listen to the radio, read magazines. Yet mass entertainment is a means of escape and stress-reduction on which most of us have become dependent. Everyone complains about the trashiness of television, but almost everyone watches it. A few have kicked the TV habit, but it would be a rare person who could get along today without using ANY form of mass entertainment.

Destroying the system

Kaczynski believes the only way to solve the problem is to go back to a pre-Industrial Revolution way of living. He argues that anything else would leave the technological and industrial systems in place, allowing them to be brought back to life in the future to resume controlling humanity. Any temporary setback to the system would be easily overcome as long as the system infrastructure remains.

The mechanism through which he believes this can be done is through environmentalism, but here he makes a grave error because the elites have hijacked environmentalism through the “global warming” scare to promote their UN-driven depopulation agenda (often termed “population control” or “sustainable development”). They have taken the global warming issue and used it as a tool for them to achieve their umbrella agenda: human control.

> Will public resistance prevent the introduction of technological control of human behavior? It certainly would if an attempt were made to introduce such control all at once. But since technological control will be introduced through a long sequence of small advances, there will be no rational and effective public resistance.
>
> […]
>
> Even if changes large enough to make a lasting difference were initiated, they would be retracted when their disruptive effects became apparent. Thus, permanent changes in favor of freedom could be brought about only by persons prepared to accept radical, dangerous and unpredictable alteration of the entire system. In other words by revolutionaries, not reformers.
>
> […]
>
> It appears that during the next several decades the industrial-technological system will be undergoing severe stresses due to economic and environmental problems, and especially due to problems of human behavior (alienation, rebellion, hostility, a variety of social and psychological difficulties). We hope that the stresses through which the system is likely to pass will cause it to break down, or at least will weaken it sufficiently so that a revolution against it becomes possible. If such a revolution occurs and is successful, then at that particular moment the aspiration for freedom will have proved more powerful > than technology.

>
> […]
>
> …while the industrial system is sick we must destroy it. If we compromise with it and let it recover from its sickness, it will eventually wipe out all of our freedom.

Costs of destroying the system

> If the breakdown is sudden, many people will die, since the world's population has become so overblown that it cannot even feed itself any longer without advanced technology. Even if the breakdown is gradual enough so that reduction of the population can occur more through lowering of the birth rate than through elevation of the death rate, the process of de-industrialization probably will be very chaotic and involve much suffering. It is naive to think it likely that technology can be phased out in a smoothly managed, orderly way, especially since the technophiles will fight stubbornly at every step. Is it therefore cruel to work for the breakdown of the system? Maybe, but maybe not. In the first place, revolutionaries will not be able to break the system down unless it is already in enough trouble so that there would be a good chance of its eventually breaking down by itself anyway; and the bigger the system grows, the more disastrous the consequences of its breakdown will be; so it may be that revolutionaries, by hastening the onset of the breakdown, will be reducing the extent of the disaster.

History is not made by the majority

> History is made by active, determined minorities, not by the majority, which seldom has a clear and consistent idea of what it really wants. Until the time comes for the final push toward revolution, the task of revolutionaries will be less to win the shallow support of the majority than to build a small core of deeply committed people. As for the majority, it will be enough to make them aware of the existence of the new ideology and remind them of it frequently; though of course it will be desirable to get majority support to the extent that this can be done without weakening the core of seriously committed people.
>
> […]
>
> …the revolutionaries should not try to acquire political power until the system has gotten itself into such a mess that any hardships will be seen as resulting from the failures of the industrial system itself and not from the policies of the revolutionaries. The revolution against technology will probably have to be a revolution by outsiders, a revolution from below and not from above.
>
> […]
>
> To many of us, freedom and dignity are more important than a long life or avoidance of physical pain. Besides, we all have to die some time, and it may be better to die fighting for survival, or for a cause, than to live a long but empty > and purposeless life.

Conclusion

Kaczynski's manifesto made me realize that the solutions I have proposed to improve modern society would not stem the tide of advances in technology and leftist degeneracy. By the time we identify one problem, isolate it, and solve it, more degenerate leftist causes would have been pushed down our throats alongside technological advances that make our counter-movement all seem fruitless. Up to this point, we're hacking at little branches, especially when we attack the useful idiots in the form of individual feminists and social justice warriors, while the roots of evil are becoming ever stronger.

As long as the system is in place, any victory we achieve will only be short-term in scope. Such a victory could last a couple generations, but once the dust settles and the globalists re-gather their footing, they will use the existing technological, industrial, and banking frameworks to not only gain what they lost, but learn from their past mistakes and control humanity even tighter.

The question we must ask ourselves before proceeding is if we want the system to die or not. Kaczynski suggests that it is all or nothing, and assuming he's right, we either have to get ready to throw away urban living, industrialization, and virtually all technology, or be reduced to putting out small fires that don't begin to reverse a worldwide societal decline. As a man who has never lived in a rural setting, I remain undecided about how best to continue.

In spite of my hesitation to hop on board with Kaczynski's message that the entire system must be destroyed, I am convinced that as long as it's in place, we will continue to see a neverending drive towards authoritarian liberalism and parasitic globalism that erodes national sovereignty and our individual humanity. A worldwide economic collapse may temporarily bruise the elite and usher in a mini-age of traditionalism, but once the world recovers, they'll likely resume right where they left off.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: How America's New Nobility Has Forgotten Its Obligation To The Country

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Reasons You Need To Flake On Women Once In A While

October 14, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

98.5% of people reading this are not flaking on women enough. Flaking, a time-honored female trait, is one men of value must appropriate to take their sexual value to the next level. An imperfect science at best, as it can and does lose opportunities with women for the sake of getting more of them later on, it requires persistence, discipline, foresight, flexibility, and confidence.

Just over every ten days, on average, you need to be doing this. Flaking can include intending to cut off all contact with a girl after cancelling a meet-up, an intention to postpone or even just keeping your options open (and her heart beating). Do you have what it takes to flake? Here are the four reasons you need to be doing it very regularly.

1. You create your own mentality of abundance

Abundance (and feeling it!) is key.

Many people cultivate a subjective sense of gratitude and abundance by giving to a charity or others they know who are in need. They could be a moderately paid teacher, butcher, or bus driver and still feel this emotion. Likewise, you can conjure up a feeling of abundance by deliberately cancelling your plans with women, often at the last moment.

Instead of being a slave to some female-related opportunity, which oftentimes damages your more long-term priorities (see below), you can focus on the sea of women all around you, ready to be baited on another day (or an hour after you flake on the first girl).

Being tied to one woman, especially in the early stages of a courtship (or what you think is a courtship), is much more likely to create feelings of anxiousness or self-consciousness. Release yourself from the possibility of this tension and be willing to postpone, cancel, or plain ignore meetings, frequently on a whim. Then, obviously being careful not to court the same or neighboring social circles of women, start bantering with or trying to attract another five to ten women in the week following the flake.

2. You need to go beyond infield negs and lowering her value

[image]
Some aspects of game go staler than others.

I and many of you were using pick-up gambits like “The Question Game” long before we read about someone else explicitly advising it. Similarly, otherwise uninformed men everywhere have autodidactically realized the power of teasing, false disqualification, and other methods to snare girls.

The beauty of flaking is that it offers a wide assortment of reasons. No flake is really ever the same, unlike a conversation trick or game which the woman is fully present for, even if she doesn't grasp the reasons for which you use it. She generally can't see you when you flake and certainly doesn't know every detail, whether you seek to explain or not. Flaking is powerful because the person flaked on usually imagines all manner of other reasons why you've flaked.

Flaking, at its heart, imitates life. We may have different social statuses, professions, or personal characteristics, but we are all united by the finite nature of our time. Flaking is about time and the unlimited ways in which we can choose to spend it. When employed appropriately, it appears spontaneous and is harder to call out as fake, even if the girl fears you're playing her along. Constantly disseminated aspects of game may go stale, while flaking does not have a use-by date. It is ubiquitous.

3. You learn to set your other priorities right and learn discipline

A girl is never worth enough to let her unseat your life.

It is, despite appearances, healthy to rearrange some of your priorities or days to fit in with women (provided that at least three-quarters of the relative compromising is coming from her). With one particular girl I knew when I lived overseas, I temporarily forsook some non-essential, non-ROK writing work I had to do on my own time.

Yet I made her come to me on her day off, pay for half of the room rate for a Western chain hotel (on her wage of roughly US$3 per hour) and throw around her sleeping schedule because she was a night shift worker. What work I sacrificed here (and only temporarily) was nothing special and her greater efforts to come to that hotel despite having fewer resources than me meant I was treating it as much less of a priority.

Now contrast the preceding paragraph with what happened after. The next time I was due to see her, I flaked, citing the need to do some "hobby writing" (actually one of my previous ROK articles) and catch up on some stock market reading. It was at this point that my need to keep a generally airtight habit of writing regular ROK articles and monitoring financial forecasts outweighed her appeal to me for the post-sex meet up.

Like going to the gym, flaking to preserve and strengthen other (neomasculine) priorities is a skill we all need to hone again and again. I caught up with her some time afterwards, by which time she wanted me even more. Which brings me to…

4. You increase a woman's attraction for you and fear of your absence

When flaking cuts, the wound is deep.

Again, I am consistently wowed by the lack of insistence in books about game or associated subjects that men routinely flake on women. It seems to come up almost as an afterthought. We hear about negs and other false disqualifiers in the field but precious little about using the ploy women unleash all the time on men, albeit for different reasons.

You will certainly burn some potential bridges with women by flaking. But the law of averages, buttressed by your own brand of solid game and judicious, sufficiently discreet courting of women, dictates that you will be able to mine for quality girls well into the future simply by cranking up the value you give to your time.

Flaking does not guarantee an individual girl will be wrapped around your finger. But it does dial down any vibe you may give to her of awkwardness, neediness or clinginess. Meanwhile, it often ramps up those same reactions in her, leaving her pining for you and desperate to know you have or have not rejected her wholesale.

The fact is that her fears will probably be based on reality, as you really have learned to treat individual opportunities with women as being thoroughly dispensable. And that makes you attractive in her eyes, even for girls who you want to pursue for more lasting relationships.

Some warnings

Receiving advice always implies the use of your own common sense in applying it.

A combination of logistics, female ego and other hurt feelings can present problems when you flake. Different girls have different psyches, however identical some of them may seem. Flaking may result in her legitimately moving away from you, rather than trying to act her way through punishing you. There is the chance you may be caught out playing multiple women. In and of itself, this is not fatal, but the life of the outed player in a small or connected community is not always as problem-free as you might think.

Nonetheless, you can minimize the bridge-burning by having plausible reasons for flaking. If you deliberately decide to go and visit your grandmother at the time you're meant to meet a girl, text it to her. You're there with your parent's mother, aren't you? A bitch might argue the point, but that's not the girl you want to be spending time with in the first place. A healthy injection of reality, even if you're wantonly aligning chances to flake, makes any complaining she does look worse.

Use your head, and not hard and fast rules, and flaking can become one of your most powerful sexual assets.

Read More: Do Girls Flake Because Your Value Is Too Low?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Was Ben Carson Right About Gun Control's Role In The Holocaust?

October 15, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

It is no secret that American progressives would love to do away with the Second Amendment of the Constitution. Conservatives, on the other hand, are adamant about protecting our right to bear arms, which they claim serves as a check on government tyranny: An armed citizenry makes it harder for a government to act against its people.

Last week, Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson created a firestorm when he used Nazi Germany as an example of a government that was able to act because it had first disarmed its citizens. He told CNN's Wolf Blitzer that: "The likelihood of Hitler being able to accomplish his goals would have been greatly diminished if the [German] people had been armed."

Carson went on to add: "There's a reason these dictatorial people take the guns first."

Although Carson's comment seems rather mild, the reaction to it was swift and overwhelmingly negative. Amanda Marcotte wrote in Salon:

> Apparently, Ben Carson didn't think blaming the victims of the Oregon shooting was going low enough, so he doubled down, reaching for what may be the most repulsive victim-blaming possible: Arguing that the Holocaust wouldn't have happened if Jewish victims had offered armed resistance… these comments verge on being a form of Holocaust denialism.

The Anti-Defamation League response stressed that talking about the Holocaust in the context of the gun control debate was offensive:

> The argument goes something like this: If Jews and others had had freer access > to more guns in the run up to Hitler's assuming power and had been able to use those guns to fight back against the Third Reich, then there wouldn't have been a Holocaust, or far fewer would have perished. This historical second-guessing is deeply offensive to Jews, Holocaust survivors and those who valiantly fought against Hitler during World War II.

Meanwhile, "actor" Seth Rogen took the high road with this tightly reasoned argument:

Could the Holocaust have been stopped if German Jews had been armed?

Prisoners at Buchenwald concentration camp

Alternate history speculation tends to be a waste of time because there is no correct answer. This case is no exception.

While Carson does not deserve the opprobrium that was heaped upon him, he was probably too optimistic about what German Jews could have done to resist the Nazis if they had been armed.

According to historian Paul Johnson, European Jews, because of their minority status, developed a tradition of negotiating with their governments to protect their communities. Organizing an armed resistance would probably would not have occurred to them until it was too late. Thus, I think that the Anti-Defamation League is correct in their assessment:

> It is mind bending to suggest that personal firearms in the hands of the small number of Germany's Jews (about 214,000 remaining in Germany in 1938) could have stopped the totalitarian onslaught of Nazi Germany when the armies of Poland, France, Belgium and numerous other countries were over-whelmed by the Third Reich.

But what was lost in the brouhaha over the Holocaust was Carson's larger point. His real point is that an armed populace is a good thing because it can be used as a check against tyranny. Therefore, Carson would argue, it would be unwise for the US to undo the Second Amendment or implement restrictive gun control policies.

The history of gun control in Germany supports Carson's argument

Nazi anti-Jewish propaganda

Carson made his case for an armed citizenry in his book, A More Perfect Union where he claims:

> German citizens were disarmed by their government in the late 1930s, and by the mid-1940s Hitler's regime had mercilessly slaughtered six million Jews and numerous others whom they considered inferior… Through a combination of removing guns and disseminating deceitful propaganda, the Nazis were able to carry out their evil intentions with relatively little resistance.

Critics of Carson have been quick to point out that he was partially wrong here. The Nazi government didn't disarm German citizens. It actually liberalized gun control laws—at least for the majority of its population.

After Germany was defeated in World War I, the victorious allies forced Germany to agree to harsh terms of surrender in the Treaty of Versailles. One of these terms required Germany to disarm, so in compliance with that term, the Weimar government passed a law in 1918 called the “Regulations on Weapons Ownership.”

The law required German citizens to surrender all their firearms and ammunition immediately. Any citizen who was found possessing a firearm could be punished with heavy fines and a sentence of up to five years in prison.

As the Nazi Party began to gain power, they were instrumental in relaxing the gun control laws with the passage of a 1928 law that allowed Germans to once again possess firearms if they first obtained a permit.

When the Nazis came to full power, they passed yet another relaxation of gun control in 1938. They completely deregulated long guns and ammunition—permits were only required for handguns. They also lowered the age when one could apply for a handgun permit from 20 to 18. Finally, the Nazis also extended the duration of the permit from one year to three.

However, the 1938 law also banned Jews from participating in the manufacture or sale of firearms or ammunition. Later that year, the Nazis went further and completely disarmed the Jews with a law that prohibited them from possessing weapons of any sort, including clubs, knives, or guns and ammunition.

The history of gun control in Germany provides a couple of lessons. First, dictatorial regimes do not necessarily disarm their citizens—only those elements of the population that are disfavored by the state.

The second lesson is that disarming a population is, as Ben Carson implied, a way of punishing and subjugating that population. After World War I, the allies wanted to completely humiliate and subjugate Germany, and one of the ways they did this was by ensuring that Germans were not armed.

Similarly, the Nazis ensured that Jews had no weapons to defend themselves. This shows that Nazis knew that allowing German Jews to have weapons would have made implementing the Holocaust at least a little more difficult.

American military policy implies that arming a population works

Osama Bin Laden with Afghan Mujahideen

In the US, the Democratic Party is strongly in favor of gun control. President Obama has gone so far as to express praise for Australia’s gun control law, where all guns, with a strictly controlled exception for rifles and shotguns, were confiscated and banned.

This is interesting because the military policy of the US suggests that arming a group can enable that group to resist or even overthrow its ruling government. The US often arms rebels within certain countries in order to destabilize those nations.

The most famous example of this was the US arming of the Mujahideen in the Afghan-Soviet conflict. The Soviet Army was trained to fight a conventional enemy, but they were unprepared to fight the low-level guerilla warfare waged by the Mujahideen. This conflict demonstrated that arming and training a highly motivated force of civilians could even overcome a super power.

Even the Obama Administration continues to make use of the strategy of arming rebel groups, albeit very ineptly. The Department of Defense admitted to spending $42 million dollars to train only 54 "moderate" Syrian rebels who were supposed to fight ISIS, or more likely, Syrian president Assad. However, only "four or five" of the fighters were actually in the field—a pretty sorry return on investment.

Again, the United State's use of arming the civilians of other countries to rebel against their government supports Carson's contention.

Conclusion

Ben Carson probably overestimated what German Jews could have done to resist Hitler, but he is correct in implying that governments are likely to disarm populations that they are bent on subjugating. The corollary is also true: An armed citizenry is more capable of resisting tyranny.

But history shows that merely having handguns is not enough to resist a heavily armed modern state such as Nazi Germany or the Soviet Union. To do that would require a motivated fighting force, a high degree of training and organization, and special equipment, such as the weapons the US provided to the Mujahideen during the Afghan-Soviet war. Anything short of that kind of organization would merely pose a mere nuisance to the firepower possessed by modern states.

Having easy access to firearms comes with a cost—it means there is an increased risk of gun violence. But it also provides a check on government tyranny. Americans would be wise to think twice before allowing the government to limit their right to bear arms.

Read More: Why Did Caitlyn Jenner Get A Bravery Award After Her Role In A Fatal Car Accident?

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

5 Insights From A Decade In Higher Learning

October 15, 2015 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

I am 28 years old. I have spent the past 10 years – my entire adult life – in academia. I have a Bachelor's degree from a large state university and a Master's degree and Doctorate from an Ivy League institution: all in engineering. I would like to share some observations, insights, and wisdom that I believe are valuable to all men, no matter their age or level of education. Whether you're currently in college, graduated years ago, or decided to avoid higher education altogether, these should prove useful to you. Due to length constraints, this article may appear in multiple installments.

1. There are innate gender differences

Gender differences are real no matter what progressives say to the contrary. I've been a teaching assistant for many introductory engineering classes. This meant I held office hours, wrote proctored, and graded exams, setup laboratory experiments and in general did the scut work that professors deemed beneath them.

Female students would routinely come to my office hours with pre-formulated questions on the homework. They turned in painstakingly completed assignments that were 10-15 pages long. The male students rarely attended my office hours and turned in assignments that were incomplete with many of the problems barely attempted and most of the work not shown.

When I wrote exams, I avoided including questions that were simply a test of memorization or vocabulary. I included more design-oriented questions that tested students' ability to problem-solve or to extend previously covered concepts. Here the situation was reversed. The female students had great difficulty with these types of problems while the male students did very well.

The female students vocally complained that these questions hadn't appeared in the homework assignments or that they departed from the previously covered material in some fashion. The same female students who had turned in masterfully completed assignments were positively flummoxed when presented with a problem that tested their ability to problem-solve. On the other hand, the male students did quite well with these types of problems.

The end result was that the male and female students ended up with approximately equal grades overall. The girls were conscientious and meticulous when it came to the assignments and did well on exam questions that tested vocabulary and things learned by rote memorization, but were hopeless when presented with something even slightly unfamiliar or that required them to innovate.

The males were sloppy and indifferent toward assignments but performed well when presented with questions that tested their comprehension and raw intelligence. Of course, some girls did not complete their assignments and some boys turned in assignments into which they had invested a significant amount of effort, but in general, there were very pronounced gender differences, in terms of attitudes and aptitudes.

2. Ethnic solidarity is real and white students do not have it

It would be impossible for me to recount the number of instances of ethnic solidarity I witnessed among minority students. Innumerable times I worked in the computer lab and saw groups of three or four Chinese students huddled together, cooperatively working on lab work, assignments, or research.

In a graduate level nanofabrication class, the final project required using semiconductor modeling software none of the students had any experience with. A female Indian student had her older Indian friend who had previously taken the class help her. In fact, collaboration is actively encouraged at my university according to the student code of academic integrity, perhaps as an acknowledgment that it is impossible to prevent or guard against.

So being a loner or the sole white guy in a graduate level STEM class filled with nothing but Chinese and Indian students means you will be on your own while everyone else will be able to bring multiple strong minds to bear on a problem set or take home exam. Black students in STEM help other Black students, Asian students in STEM help other Asian students, and white students…struggle alone.

3. Do not ask for permission to do something

Just do it and if there is a problem, deal with the consequences later. Do not ask permission only to be told no. Then you can't do it without being blatant about it. Just do it and deal with any fallout later. More than likely, there will be no repercussions. Perhaps a verbal reprimand. You'll just have to claim ignorance and offer up a mea culpa.

Asking permission, having it denied, and proceeding anyway is proof of deliberate and willful disregard. Or you get told no and have a possible course of action effectively removed. A common adage is that you don't ask a lawyer what you can or can't do but to argue why what you did was justified. Don't artificially constrain yourself by seeking permission for something you feel is necessary or the best course of action.

4. Wearing multiple hats is a very good thing

Whether that means having multiple titles, positions, bosses, or institutional affiliations, it introduces a gray area that can be exploited to your advantage. Having multiple affiliations blurs otherwise distinct boundaries. People around you won't know exactly what you're doing, your schedule, or to whom you're accountable.

You will have more freedom to operate and be able to come and go as you wish. If you collect multiple paychecks or have multiple streams of revenue, you can skirt pay caps and ceilings. It also gives you plausible deniability and a sound defense for flouting procedure. For instance, you can always claim you just made an honest mistake and confused the operating protocol or standard procedure of one institution with which you are affiliated with another. After all, the human memory is infinitely fallible, right?

5. Pick a specialization early on and stick with it

Ever wonder why Asian students seem so academically precocious? It's because they chose their specialty early in life and never wavered. They began specializing in high school. They then began undergraduate research in a lab when they were 18 or 19. They then go onto graduate school and continue the exact same line of research. By the time they are in their late 20s, they have a decade of relevant experience so of course they are consummate experts on a topic by then.

At an age when many whites are "finding themselves," discovering their true passion in life, or globe trekking, Asian students are entering the second decade of their professional careers. Asian students will not switch focus, even if they hate what they do. They will not jump ship. They will stay the course. With so much more accrued knowledge and experience, of course they appear to possess otherworldly intellect.

They are, however, just persistent and specialize at an early age. When I was just starting graduate school, I marveled at a female student from China who would absolutely dominate group meetings. She was cute and petite but was a tenacious bulldog when it came to research: she monopolized the group meeting and would shamelessly interrupt, speak over, and correct the other students.

I later learned that she was in her 30s and had worked as a research technician for a decade before embarking on her PhD. She had more than 10 years of relevant experience which accounted for why she was so self-assured. It wasn't empty bravado or chest-thumping on her part. She was genuinely competent and did know more than the other students at the progress meeting. Now, years later, I'm similarly self-assured and feel no reservations offering my input and suggestions to doctors and scientists decades my senior. Moreover, they actually give credence to my suggestions and heed my advice.

Conclusion

When I began my academic career 10 years ago, I was a much different person. I was young, naïve, and idealistic. I used to believe that academia was somehow different from other fields of human endeavor. My idealism has since been tempered and I've developed a much more jaundiced view of academia altogether.

In theory, academia is beautiful, pure, and egalitarian; in practice, it is like any other human endeavor, fraught with exasperating bureaucracy, flagrant nepotism, and irrational personal animus. And like all fields of human endeavor, there are techniques to employ to succeed and ways to gain a competitive advantage.

Read More:More Insights About A Woman's Education From Xenophon

Waldemar Pabst
29 year old academic, right of reactionary

5 Reasons Why Bisexuals Cannot Be Taken Seriously

October 16, 2015 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

The topic of bisexuality keeps cropping up time and time again. It's constantly rammed down our throats: taking the form of either vacuous gossip about the "bi-curious" escapades of an acquaintance or vapid celebrity, or the even more tiresome bilge concerning "biphobia" and bigotry.

In this article, we shall examine how refusing to take bisexuals seriously is a perfectly rational point of view to hold, after having examined certain aspects of this phenomenon in closer detail.

1. The Ludicrous myth of "Biphobia"

In the 21st Century, it is becoming increasingly more and more laughable to suggest that homophobia is rampant, when all television, entertainment and culture seem to be catered towards the tastes of gay men: just looking through a TV guide or turning on the radio confirms this assertion.

Yet it is even more ridiculous to suggest that we live in a culture of “biphobia.” There has been extremely little evidence in history which suggests that bisexuals have been more severely treated than homosexuals and heterosexuals.

Despite this fact, “biphobia” has become an accepted term. Furthermore, it is used incorrectly to describe anyone who questions bisexuality in any shape or form, as opposed to denote those who genuinely loathe and despise bisexuals (of whom there are very few).

By classing the opinions of those with whom they disagree as an irrational “phobia,” LGBT activists are able to shun counter-arguments as being inherently flawed and diseased, without having to tackle the assertion with reason and evidence. This tactic is a favorite among leftists (e.g. transphobia, homophobia, etc.)

A writer for the Huffington Post has clearly stated:

> "I think biphobia should be in the DSM, because I think it is a mental illness."

The term "biphobia" has just become a means of suppressing reasoned arguments and healthy skepticism by portraying their opponents as being mentally deranged. It could not be more typical of the totalitarian progressive movement.

There is no such thing as biphobia: there are only those who do not wholeheartedly embrace bisexuals and shower them in praise and compliments for being so open-minded and adventurous; there is absolutely nothing wrong with that.

2. They're trend-followers

Far from being a minority of poor, oppressed, counter-cultural victims, bisexuals are extolled and exalted in modern culture. From Madonna and Britney Spears' kiss at that god awful music show all the way up to the Mozart and Beethoven of our age (Lady Gaga and Katy Perry), bisexual behavior is portrayed as "cool" and fashionable.

Impressionable youths therefore gravitate to such behavior because it gives them a sense of identity and excitement. They engage in bisexuality as an expression of faux-individualism, in an attempt to distance themselves from what they believe to be the bigoted, narrow-minded majority.

They are of course, all completely deluded. They think they're unique, yet all they are doing is following a trend which has been concocted for them by MTV and record companies. Bisexuality has simply become a fashion statement, and very little more.

3. They're promiscuous

In Tuthmosis' famous article, he lists claiming to be bisexual as a major slut tell. This could not be more true. Many of the other signs mentioned in that article stem from an adolescent, pseudo-rebellious attitude (e.g. tattoos, piercings, swearing, drugs etc.)

Bisexuality is simply another form of immature revolt: by challenging the supposed "heteronormative" culture, they are trying to affirm themselves as individualistic, exciting people. This childish attitude manifests itself in bisexuality, promiscuity, and self-destructive behavior.

Very often, youths do not have any major achievements or unique personality on which to define themselves; they therefore jump at any opportunity to stand out from the crowd. Unfortunately, the "sex-positive" bisexual culture of today just happens to be the means to that end.

4. Bisexuals cannot form long-term relationships

The rebellious, childish youths described above are not fit for long-term relationships. It is impossible to be bisexual and maintain a monogamous commitment: one half of one's sexuality must be renounced before entering into a relationship with a single person. Unfortunately the bisexuals will argue that they have the right to "be who they want to be" and claim "I am what I am."

Monogamous relationships are based on self-restraint, compromise, and mutual understanding. Someone who continues to assert that they wish to sleep with members of both sexes whilst in a long-term relationship simply lacks the above virtues and has no empathy for their partner's feelings, only caring for themselves and their carnal desires.

Were someone to vow full commitment to a single partner, they would obviously have to abandon any desire for someone of a different sex to their partner. This is a perfectly moral and reasonable expectation. Bisexuality is usually confined to the pre-adult phase of sleeping around and experimentation. It is therefore very difficult to view it something mature and worthy of anything other than condescension.

5. Evidence suggests it doesn't even exist

Having said all the above, there is still reasonable scientific doubt as to the actual existence of bisexuality. A recent study investigating this naturally attracted a lot of negative attention from the liberal media powerhouse. In this study, it was determined that thirty males who identified themselves as bisexual were indistinguishable from homosexuals in their hormonal responses to pornography. The study can be read online here.

Dr. Michael Bailey, one of the conductors of the study, noted: “I’m not denying that bisexual behavior exists, but I am saying that in men there’s no hint that true bisexual arousal exists, and that for men arousal is orientation.”

Skepticism over the existence of bisexuality continues to this day. We still cannot determine at this stage whether it categorically exists or doesn’t, but it is downright foolish and disrespectful to label those who question it as having a “phobia” or being “bigoted.” The burden of proof remains on those who argue for its existence, rather than those who claim its absence.

Conclusion

It is not irrational or incorrect to hold a healthy, skeptical attitude towards bisexuality. Furthermore, those who doubt it should not be classed as intolerant or bigoted. Upon closer examination of the matter, it appears to be linked to juvenile irresponsibility and typically millennial, liberal attitudes towards sex, relationships, and politics. It is therefore perfectly reasonable to cast doubt upon it.

Undoubtedly, the leftists will jeer, howl and screech their vitriol against such an objective examination of their degenerate habits. Questionable behavior such as bisexuality should be repudiated if we are to gain a deeper understanding of ourselves and the world around us as a whole.

Read More: 3 Reasons Why America Can’t Afford Obesity

Anton Hagen
Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

How We Can Use Sun Tzu's Strategies To Implement Neomasculine Principles

October 16, 2015 | by Harlan Blackwood | Link | Original Link

A solution of neomasculinity has been proposed by Roosh V to the problems that ail our society. It is a comprehensive work backed by credible citations, and as one commenter quipped, "required reading for the modern man."

Although neomasculinity is perhaps morally and scientifically sound, we are still left wondering if it is even possible to implement within our lifetimes to help ensure the happiness and security of our offspring. It perhaps is, but it would be a monumental task requiring massive organization, time, planning, and balls.

I propose that rather than relying on anecdotal tactics, let's turn to the master of war tactics himself, Sun Tzu. Sun Tzu's The Art of War could serve as a practical guide to legal and nonviolent policy implementation. It is required reading for military generals and businessmen alike. Because of the enormity of this task, for now I'd like to examine only the first of thirteen chapters, called "Laying Plans." This is a pre-battle assessment of the playing field. It gives us an idea of whether or not we are a force to be reckoned with, and if not how we can improve our station.

In the meantime I'd recommend all readers get their hands on a hard copy of The Art of War. Due to the excellent commentary and nice formatting, I've greatly benefited from the specific referenced book in this article. However, this related ROK article by Quintus Curtius is definitely worth considering before you make any purchases.

Sun Tzu's The Art of War is believed to be at least 2,500 years old.

> The art of war is of vital importance to the State. It is a matter of life and death, a road either to safety or to ruin. Hence it is a subject of inquiry which can on no account be neglected.

This is a very straightforward introduction. No sugar coated bullshit, but rather a nugget of golden advice. We in the manosphere can no longer neglect the fact that the cultural decline will continue with exponential decay unless we begin laying plans for a nonviolent counteroffensive. With neomasculinity comes safety; with the current mainstream rhetoric and policymaking comes ruin.

Sun Tzu next moves on to describe five constant factors to be taken into account when laying plans for battle. I'll examine three of these factors that I find the most practical in this context:

1. "The Moral Law causes the people to be in complete accord with their ruler, so that they will follow him regardless of their lives, undismayed by any danger."

The beauty of Sun Tzu's writing is that it can be applied in many different ways and still be feasible in just about any situation. As such, I'd like to replace the words "their ruler" with "neomasculine principles," and "him" with "them." Simply put, the moral law is our core foundation that assures harmony between all members of the movement. If we all believe neomasculine principles to be true and practical, then we are in harmony and can proceed forward. If not, we will simply collapse over relatively petty differences.

2. “The Commander stands for the virtues of wisdom, sincerity, benevolence, courage and strictness.”

This requires somewhat of a leap of faith for manosphere readers. Most of us may never personally meet Roosh V and other major contributors to ROK and other websites. It will be the responsibility of readers to band together and voice their opinions as to who can be most trusted to be the leading figures of the movement.

If a leader is lacking in even one of the above virtues, it could spell disaster for the movement, unless other safeguards are put into place. Remember, as long as we are all in accordance with the Moral Law stated above, many of us would be capable leaders by following the above virtues.

3. “By Method and discipline are to be understood the marshaling of the army in its proper subdivisions, the graduations of rank among the officers, the maintenance of roads by which supplies may reach the army, and control of military expenditure.”

Let’s put the concept of “officers” into a little bit different context, the internet. Each manosphere website specializes in its own brand of material and advice. One of the issues I see now is that MRAs, PUAs, the Gamergate community, red pill conservatives, libertarians, MGTOWs, and neomasculinists are simultaneously offering up many different viewpoints, complaints, and occasional solutions to the problems we face.

I propose we all take a step back for a moment. We all share common enemies and I propose that it’s perhaps time to hash out our specific differences in writing and find ways to either compromise certain viewpoints in favor of movement building or convince others through rational discussion and debate.

Either way, having a wedge between these different manosphere and conservative leaning groups is what a smart enemy would do to us! Separating an opponent’s forces is in fact a tactic of Sun Tzu. Let’s not let our enemies get away with this (if indeed it’s even a conscious attack). Let’s step up and hopefully unite more men from different camps under the same Moral Law mentioned above.

Secondly, let’s put the “maintenance of roads” into the context of the internet. In this nonviolent campaign, information and educational materials are the supplies that we rely on. This is yet another reason to try to unite the several “factions” of the manosphere. We need people with internet and networking experience (overall computer and web knowledge) to help protect this valuable supply route. I’ll make the assumption that in the gaming and MGTOW communities there are some brilliant men with very valuable technological skills that could help our cause, if they choose to do so by their own free will.

The Core Principles

Here we only examine Chapter 1, Laying Plans. But 12 more chapters of tactics and strategies may be later utilized.

Sun Tzu continues the chapter by listing seven factors which he examines before doing battle, and he claims that By means of these seven considerations I can forecast victory or defeat. Considering that Sun Tzu is to this day required reading by military generals and businessmen alike, I sincerely believe in his claim. The seven considerations are as follows:

1. Which of the two sovereigns is imbued with the Moral Law?

This may currently be a toss-up, as the manosphere is currently divided into "factions" and the enemies of liberty in higher established positions seem to be united under their twisted methodology. Democrats and Republicans (mostly made up of Liberals, Progressives, RINOs, and Cuckservatives), the Supreme Court, and the Executive Branch seem to have no problem implementing culturally destructive policies. This is indeed chilling, as the destructive system and institutions in this country have become a juggernaut.

2. Which of the two generals has the most ability?

I'd like to reframe this in the context of "camps" rather than "generals," mainly because we won't be suiting up in armor and charging the battlefield under the ultimate command of one man. I would argue that we might just have this factor in our favor. Masculine men with strong principles who are continually seeking self-improvement may indeed be able to turn the tide, as many of our male opponents are becoming more effeminate by the day.

Also, most feminist “leaders” are simply a joke; they’re only taken seriously because the system backs them, not because they actually have leadership ability.

3. With whom lie the advantages derived from Heaven and Earth?

This is a bit more abstract, and of course was written in a time before many major scientific discoveries, theories, and scientific laws were in place. One interpretation is that Heaven and Earth represent polarities such as hot and cold, night and day, etc. But in my opinion, I think that this ties in with the Chinese philosophy of yin and yang, in which polar opposites are actually complementary and flow into one another.

With this interpretation, the neomasculine principle of sexual polarity seems to align quite nicely, and believers of yin and yang philosophy would most likely appreciate the neomasculine perspective of the sexes being complementary rather than being in a futile competition.

4. On which side is discipline most rigorously enforced?

We may be able to draw parallels between “discipline” and our current legal system, which is becoming more and more toxic to men. Through changing the definitions of words such as “rape” and “harassment,” our enemy is able to enforce discipline on the male population. As of this moment, the enemy has the power to enforce discipline upon the masses, and “open season” could be declared on our movement by SJWs and their ilk.

