As such, it seems a necessity that a legal aspect of neomasculinity be proposed in writing. In other words we need lawyers, law clerks, and anybody else with experience in the legal realm to help guide our cause. We must protect ourselves legally by studying the laws and examining loopholes. It is also perhaps wise to discuss the process by which we can change laws in our favor, or change the interpretation of those laws by legally resetting healthy precedents in the justice system.

5. Which army is stronger?

Unfortunately, although we may be morally and scientifically correct, right now a large chunk of the general population is under hypnosis from the mainstream agenda. Roosh has an article on some possible ways to begin educating the masses and seeding resistance. If we reach the third step of “culture war” in this article, then I believe we have a better chance of success, and as such the rest of Sun Tzu’s book may be utilized to the fullest extent to achieve our objectives.

6. On which side are officers and men more highly trained?

Our enemy has been at this for decades, perhaps centuries. He understands our weaknesses and has set up institutions to protect himself and defend against principled masculine men. While I agree that manosphere readers are one of the most educated groups of men in the country, until we further unite and peacefully organize I fear that we will be no match for the establishment.

7. In which army is there the greater constancy in both reward and punishment?

As for punishment, refer to point number (4). As for reward, our current system is interesting and somewhat frightening at the same time. Masculine men who "step out of line" risk punishment (see Roosh V in Canada and on The Dr. Oz Show). At the same time, women who act against their biological construct are rewarded with praise and adoration. Obese women and sluts are rewarded with positive attention and understanding (from the media, girlfriends, and of course "beta male orbiters"), instead of being educated and shamed for unhealthy behaviors.

Women are rewarded in divorce court through financial gain and are also awarded child custody in a majority of cases; not to mention single mothers are praised as being strong and independent, even though it's well documented that single motherhood more often leads to negative child outcomes.

To summarize, the enemy has us by the balls when it comes to unity, strength, training programs, and constancy of reward and punishment; a system in which healthy masculinity is institutionally being shamed with greater frequency, and at the same time destructive female behaviors are being rewarded. Now folks, after reading these seven considerations, it would be very naive in my opinion to assume that the enemy is not well versed in Sun Tzu's The Art of War!

More Insights

Sun Tzu concludes the first chapter in The Art of War with a few more valuable insights. We'll address a few of those here today:

> While heeding to the profit of my counsel, avail yourself also of any helpful circumstances over and beyond the ordinary rules.

I find this to be a noble gesture. In essence, if any man out there has great ideas or thoughtful insights, it would be best to fully disclose this knowledge to the manosphere and essentially go above and beyond the call of duty.

> All warfare is based on deception

This is perhaps one of the most famous lines from the entire book. The possible tactics derived from this principle are seemingly limitless, and as such it is perhaps best to leave this point alone for now.

> If he is secure at all points, be prepared for him. If he is in superior strength, evade him.

Avoidance is perhaps our best bet under the current circumstances. It may be in our best interest to avoid direct confrontation with the enemy, and instead unite quietly amongst ourselves while we lay plans. If we lose our cool and attempt to butt heads with the establishment and SJWs through noisy protests, we may further alert our opponent and force him to crack down to an even greater extent.

> If your opponent is of choleric temper, seek to irritate him. Pretend to be weak, that he may grow arrogant.

It is well established in the manosphere that feminists and SJWs are not capable of controlling their tempers. As such, if the time comes to mount a swift, blinding, massive, nonviolent campaign we may be able to force their "feewings" and their ridiculous "hamsters" into overdrive.

While the elites behind the curtain may keep their cool, the public at large will be able to witness the massive childlike meltdown of typical feminists and SJWs on a nationwide scale. This may help gather even more support from the public (which was actually a useful tactic of Che Guevara in his book Guerrilla Warfare that he eventually ignored, leading to his death). It is essential that we take our opponent's choleric temper into consideration while laying plans.

> If he is taking ease, give him no rest. If his forces are united, separate them. Attack him where he is unprepared, appear where you are not expected. These military devices, leading to victory, must not be divulged beforehand (meaning your strategy will be based upon what the enemy does)… The general who loses a battle makes but few calculations beforehand. Thus do many calculations lead to victory, and few calculations to defeat: how much more no calculation at all!
>
> It is by attention to this point that I can foresee who is likely to win or lose.

We must lay our plans carefully gentlemen if neomasculinity is to be implemented.

Conclusions

There are indeed many positive conclusions that can be drawn about our camp and about our opponent's camp as we lay our plans. That being said, it is also obvious that several factors are working against us; the main problem is that the enemies of neomasculinity and liberty are entrenched within a corrupted system and a large chunk of the general population is residing in a blue pill wonderland.

Until the negative aspects discovered while laying plans are deliberated and solved, it would be (in Sun Tzu's expert opinion) a very bad decision to move further ahead in our campaign.

I propose we take things slowly for the time being and try not to create unnecessary waves in a corrupted system. This would only alert our opponents and cause them to react emotionally (as usual), possibly leading to further crackdowns on the Bill of Rights. It would be wise to step up recruiting efforts on the web and in our daily lives to unite the factions and begin quietly laying careful plans.

If and when the time comes, the nonviolent neomasculine onslaught should be so swift and stunning that the ensuing massive emotional meltdown may indeed be the enemy's undoing.

Reference

(1) Sun Tzŭ. The Art of War Illustrated Edition. Translated by Lionel Giles. New York: Fall River Press, 2014.

Read More: The Ethical Principles Of Neomasculinity

Harlan Blackwood

I look forward to hearing constructive criticism, questions, and thoughtful ideas.

Why Do Leftists Want To Prevent White Men From Creating Art?

October 17, 2015 | by Chad Hargrove | Link | Original Link

In the progressive sphere, there is a notion that a man cannot write about anything other than his own kind. That goes double for a white man author. How dare he fill his imaginary worlds with diverse characters…sometimes not even humanoid characters? He is not a lizard person…how can he truly know what a lizard woman thinks of the goings on of lizard kind?

You can see this type of mindset in Marvel Comics stunt casting of Ta-Nehisi Coates doing a twelve issue run on the Black Panther series. Surely many of Mr. Coates' readers are also comic book fans? With his co-writers exaltation that the first issue "Won't be a Superhero script" then what is this: cynical cash grab or tokenism?

Marvel Comics isn't a stranger to this pandering, cash grab, stunt casting nonsense. In recent memory, they've made a female Thor to entice all those female social justice comic book readers out there that are under served by all these "dudebro" laden comics. Other comic book companies have fared no better.

No stranger to its share of problems with minority characters is The Walking Dead. Both the comic and television series, created by white man Robert Kirkman, has long come under attack for having poorly written female and minority characters. However, it's not because of Kirkman's limitations as a writer or creator, of course. It's because he is a white man that this series is so unwatchable and devoid of any value to pop culture.

Exactly what this calls for…more women!

The SJW cure-all for this? Adding minority voices to everything from writer rooms to director chairs, and everything in between—regardless of talent or ability! Everything is elevated when you put someone besides a (white) man in charge. Except that's not the case, and if anything else only goes to further dilute the product by unnecessary addition.

Why is this rubric only used on men? Why is no one going after Shonda Rimes and her parade of poorly characterized hunky steely gazed white dudes on her various programs? How about Lee Daniels' Empire and its cliché riddled narrative nonsense? Hell, any creator that perpetuates and continues to fill our media with tired clichés and tropes, providing nothing of substance all in the name of the almighty dollar and diversity quotas.

"It was a dark and rapey night…"

A lot of this regressive ideology seems to be coming out of click bait sweatshops like The Mary Sue and the myriad of other concern troll sites that need to gin up some sort of "feminist outrage" in order to keep the views coming. It's one thing to be take a piece of media to task for a being a little limiting in its characterizations or narratives. It's quite another to demand that men step back from creating because of the preposterous belief that they can only write about violence, rape, farts, poop, and nothing else.

All this pandering to a tiny minority of progressives has lead to a constant stream of non-issues bubbling up out of the cesspit of social justice websites. The very nature of a click bait sweatshop is that authors must write up a lot of articles every single day, so they have to file many nonsense articles that are little more than "Tsk Tsk…shame on you!" baloney. You have to wonder if these people even believe what they write.

"And then he told her to get back in the kitchen…and make him a sandwich…"

However, the notion that men perpetually think about rape and violence and therefore that is all they can truly create is also caustic. There have been plenty of male authors that have written great female characters. One example is Henry James, another white man who was nominated multiple times for the Nobel Prize in Literature and authored

The Portrait of a Lady, a literary classic with a woman as a protagonist.

Creators cannot create interesting worlds in a vacuum devoid of differing characters and conflicting ideas. I'm not saying it's impossible, but it certainly can't be too interesting.

"…then Tur Paug the Barbarian thrust his mighty broadsword into the sunless sky…"

For people espousing "progressive" ideas, how is limiting one gender in favor of the other going to progress anything? More galling is the audaciousness of telling an artist what they can and cannot do. That flies in the very face of what Art…with a capital "A"…is…subjective. Does a man have any idea what a woman truly feels? By creating art he allows himself the artistic license to explore that idea, free from outside judgment while he does so. It doesn't make what he finds objective fact, that is why it's art.

To progressives and feminists, the ideal worlds that a man can create are barbaric hellscapes where women are bags of meat with tits that men spray their seed all over. Protagonists whose only narrative goal is to rape most things and kill those who stand in the way of that goal.

Sure that makes for a fine Saturday evening, if you're a barbarian. But it certainly doesn't make for compelling art.

Read More: How To Write An Online Dating Profile That Gets You Laid

Chad Hargrove
Chad Hargrove is a pop culture junkie that just wants to enjoy his movies and television programming without a bunch on nonsense. You can find his least desirable "writings" at Chad's Toxic Dumps

Florida Medical Students To Receive Important Training In LGBT Pronouns

October 18, 2015 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

An organization at the University of Florida wants all medical students to receive required training on how to talk sensitively to transgender and "non-binary" patients. The UF HealthQueer Alliance is giving a series of workshops about homosexual, bisexual and trans-identified people. These workshops instruct the students on proper gender "pronouns" and how "sex, gender, and sexual orientation different."

Mission: To Make LGBT-Training Required

The organization is working with the associate dean of the medical school to create courses which it hopes will be "implemented into the required curriculum," reports WUFT News. Why should this training be required? Well, their president, Ansley Schulte, tells WUFT that she wants to prevent doctors from giving "faulty information, like telling lesbian patients they are at a high risk for HIV/AIDS. 'Which is like, not true at all,' she said."

Actually, Ansley, homosexual women are at risk of having HIV. The risk is not as high as male homosexuals, but they certainly need to know the danger. Maybe you need to, like, do a little more research yourself.

Even though "non-binary" groups make a very small segment of the population, the purpose of this movement is not to strengthen branches in the profession–specialty fields. All doctors need to receive the training.

> “There is no specific discipline for LGBT care at UF, but Schulte said that isn’t the point. The point is that all health care providers should be aware of how to deal with LGBT patients, not just a select few.”

Medical school is rigorous, packed with vast quantities of vital information that medical professionals absolutely need to know. They only have so long to learn and train. “Medicine is a vast field,” says Carleen Eaton, “so the ability to prioritize information is one skill that’s important to develop during med school.” Every minute that gets spent learning SJW pronouns and definitions of gender is an important piece of health information that potentially gets tossed aside. Are transgender pronouns more important than life-saving medical procedures?

Sensitivity Training

What crucial instruction have medical students been missing all this time? Well, apparently the checkboxes on the paperwork are a big problem. Male or female? That is so intolerant. Doctors need to be more “safe and nonjudgmental.” A “nonbinary trans person” tells WUFT that the “exclusionary paperwork and binary checkboxes” make them feel “uncomfortable”:

> “It’s a self-protection thing,” Jones said. “I’ll check female because I know that when people look at me that’s what they assume. And I don’t want to write anything in case I get someone who’s like, ‘ew’.””

So apparently medical students need training on inclusive checkboxes for their paperwork, and learn how to convince patients that they don’t think “ew” about them.

We also need to redefine the word “equal,” apparently. At the end of October, the group will provide an “equal access” clinic, which will only be available for “trans” patients. No straight people allowed. To them, that is “equitable” and “culturally sensitive.” These oppressed people need a safe space, after all.

This sounds like sensitivity training. LGBT courses for medical students will probably turn out to be social justice indoctrination, the kind of propaganda against traditional families that we see in many universities, government agencies, and the military. It is hard to take these people seriously when they cry about exclusionary checkboxes and demand special attention.

Do LGBT Deserve Quality Healthcare?

Yes, of course they do. We need specialists who are properly trained for this small group of people. These doctors also need to be upfront about the dangers of their deviant behavior and give them the help they need.

Why do over 40% of transgenders attempt suicide? The HealthQueer Alliance's workshop points out that the LGTB group "continues to be disproportionately at risk for negative health outcomes, including HIV infection, suicide, substance abuse, and depression."

Why? Is it because more of them use harmful drugs, because their sexual activity is dangerous, or because they have higher rates of mental disorders? No, the leftist narrative is that they are driven to it by harassment. The workshop claims: "Largely, this is a product of the barriers this community must surmount in order to obtain medical care."

I have a friend who taught a medical course for a college. He told me he had to tip-toe around the subject of human sexuality because he was worried about being punished for telling the physical damage and dangers of homosexual activity. Doctors are often punished if they tell the truth about homosexuality, such as one medical expert in Boston who faced a hearing for citing government data on homosexual dangers.

In 1973, the APA decided that homosexuality was no longer a mental illness. This began a slow escalation of acceptance for destructive behavior.

This is an important issue for all of us. Some day you will probably be in a hospital and need treatment for a life-threatening illness. Do you want a doctor who trained hard for your procedure, or a doctor who spent his time learning transgender pronouns and proper non-offensive checkboxes for paperwork?

Throughout history, each time social justice lifted its ugly head, death and suffering followed. This is partly due to the erosion of necessary services such as healthcare, which is brought about by political correctness and normalization of destructive behavior.

This HealthQueer group is on the University of Florida's medical school list of organizations. It is a worrying trend that will ultimately sacrifice healthcare for "healthqueer."

Read More: South Korea's Draft Dodging Female President Tries To Play War Using Male-Only Conscripts

Amasa M. Lyman
Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

Immigrants Are Now Occupying Private Property In Sweden

October 18, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Gypsy migrants from Eastern Europe are coming to Sweden to beg for money on the streets. They set up camps on private property, and occupy houses they don't own. But authorities are unable to do anything to stop them.

In the city of Malmö, a shantytown is developing with hundreds of gypsies living without running water or electricity. People are starting to grow tired of the situation, some who might even resort to the use of violence.

"Lawless" situation

The TV program Uppdrag granskning continues its exposé of the effects of immigration in Sweden. One recent show was about the so called "EU migrants," a politically correct code word for Gypsy beggars.

These Romani people, coming from Bulgaria and Romania, have been a common sight on the streets of Sweden for the past few years. They make their living mostly from begging for money, which must be a lucrative business, since more of them are coming every year.

While panhandling is not a crime (yet), occupying other people's property certainly is. And that's what's happening right now. Coming to Sweden dirt-poor, the gypsies set up camp in places where they have no permission to stay. Some live in caravans or abandoned buildings, others in tents or makeshift shelters.

They throw their trash in the woods, which is also where they defecate. Naturally, Swedes residing around the Gypsy encampments are not terribly happy about the situation.

One woman from a small Swedish town where gypsies have moved in, describes the situation as “lawless.” One man warns that it might get violent.

> I can tell you that most of the people living around here are hunters. So there’s basically a weapon in every home. And you know what can happen when people are partying and getting each other riled up.

Occupied land

View of an occupied summer house.

Uppdrag granskning talks to the owner of a summer house which is being occupied by a group of eight EU migrants, both children and adults. They have now lived there for several months.

The owners have reported the illegal occupation of their cottage to the police. But the investigation was closed—since nothing has been stolen, i.e. taken from the property, it doesn’t count as a break-in.

For the police to remove the occupiers by force, the owners themselves are required to identify who the criminals are. Without identification, law enforcement won’t lift a finger to intervene.

Shantytown growing

A similar situation has occurred in the city of Malmö, where four hundred gypsies have created what some call a shantytown on private property. It looks like a big, messy trailer park.

The television reporters try to talk to the people living there, but are met by an angry crowd screaming at them to turn off the camera and leave. They seem to think that they are the landowners now.

When the reporters come back with a written permit to film, one of the residents comments on the situation.

> We know that this is a private property, but what can we do? To stay where, in > the middle of the street? Do you think that I like to stay here? No, I don't.

In this case too, the authorities refuse to take action, saying that the four hundred immigrants must be identified before they can be evicted. And the landowner bears the responsibility of identifying them.

While it might sound surreal, this is actually how Swedish law operates. By not doing anything to stop the crimes taking place, police officers are following the law.

A shantytown developing in Malmö.

Leftists oppose the rule of law

On television, the subject of illegal occupations was debated. As could be expected, the leftists blame "society" for not taking better care of the illegal immigrants; "How can we let people live like this?"

According to the leftists speaking, the authorities should not evict the immigrants if they can't provide a better option for them. What they're basically saying is that the illegal occupiers should be rewarded for their crimes.

Leftists want law enforcement to be selective. They wouldn't tolerate their own inner city apartments being occupied, but when these poor gypsies do it to someone else's property, it's perfectly fine and just.

If you don't agree, and want everyone to be equal before the law, you're obviously an evil racist. And if you don't want tax money to be handed over to every immigrant that happen to cross the border, you're a selfish, capitalist scumbag.

Get them out

There’s a simple answer to the question of what should be done about the illegal occupiers: Throw them out. Not necessarily out of the country, but they should certainly not be allowed to stay on other people’s property.

Being a Gypsy doesn’t mean you get a free pass to break the law. Being poor doesn’t give you any special rights either. If the authorities can’t punish criminals, or don’t want to do it out of fear of being labeled politically incorrect, then citizens should take matters into their own hands.

Swedes must take a stand at some point, otherwise the word will spread that we are pushovers who let immigrants do whatever they want without repercussions. We need to stop fearing being called “racist” or “xenophobic.” If we don’t, how much of this country will end up occupied by foreigners?

Read More: Why Does Sweden Take In More Immigrants Than Other Nordic Countries?

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

8 Places To Meet Higher Quality Women In The West

October 19, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

While anyone who travels internationally will tell you the quality of women is far higher elsewhere, and indeed American women are perhaps the worst out there, many of us do spend most of our lives in the West, at least until we are able to work out a permanent exodus.

While I strongly encourage every single man to travel internationally within the next year, in the meantime, here are some places where you may be able to meet western women of higher caliber than your typical Americunt barslut.

1. Religious Events

The ratio is usually good at church.

Many men will tell you of sluts, feminists, and other worthless women they met at church, and I will certainly not disagree. Nevertheless a good girl is likely to be one who has some sort of spiritual upbringing, believes in a higher power, and accepts a set of rules or laws that she must follow. If you are looking for LTR material, girls with little or no sexual experience are likely to be attending a religious service of some sort, even if this same church is full of her slutty friends. Bonus: church is one of the only places you can see American women dress up nice the way most foreign women do every day, with long hair, dresses, makeup, heels, and jewelry.

2. College Campuses

Most college girls are impressionable, clueless, and hot

Looking back on my time in college, the best thing it offered me was a large number of single females thrust into my face on a daily basis. Finding any woman, whether for a one night lay or a more permanent relationship, is mostly a numbers game. You will not find better odds than your local college campus.

Consider enrolling in a class for fun. Make it something you are interested in, and that way you will come away with a new skill, new friends who enjoy that same interest, and possibly meet a good dating prospect. And it will put you on campus every week where you are presented with new opportunities to meet women.

My local college offers scuba diving, swimming, drawing, photography, and weight training as for-credit one hour courses. By taking one, you also get the benefit of technically being a “student,” getting an ID card, all sorts of discounts, and access to campus sports and other social events.

3. Meetup.com

Meetup.com – A group for every interest

Meetup is a site that allows people with similar interests to schedule and attend activities with strangers. I guarantee meetup has dozens of events in your town right now. While I have found that in my city the attendance skews towards older (lots of 40s, 50s and retired people), depending on the event, you can meet others who share your interests.

Consider one of the larger groups like a hiking or outdoor club, where there may be 30 or more people attending an event. Whether you are looking to improve your foreign language skills, learn a new hobby, see a movie, or go to a discussion group, there are plenty of meetup events, which are almost always free. If you don't see one you like, start your own. Girls will be attracted to the "leader" getting all the attention, and plus you get to decide when and where events are held.

4. Local Events Calendar

Definitely in need of help with proper hiking attire

Most midsized and larger cities in America have some sort of free newspaper. These will often list daily or weekly events going on in the area. Often there are websites also which will list free or low cost events going on in your area by calendar date. When I lived in Chicago, there was a free daily paper I always picked up called The Red Eye. It had a special section every day with two fun cheap or free activities targeted towards single people.

5. Community Sports Leagues

City league intramural sports have been around for a long time in larger cities, and in recent years have spread to smaller cities as well. I have several friends who are involved with a local kickball league that organizes teams in 14 states. For less than $50, you get a t-shirt, opening and closing season parties with free beer, and refereed games for several weeks.

The teams are typically sponsored by a bar, offering drink specials for everyone on the team after the game, where you can socialize with your teammates and opponents. This is a co-ed league with a mandatory minimum number of women on each team, and if you don't have enough players to create your own team, you can be placed on a team with strangers. I have attended these games, and it's a fun way to meet new people.

6. Dancing

Deja vu from PE class, but it can actually be fun

No, I'm not talking about the titty bar. If you're looking for higher quality women, consider what women like to do besides get drunk at bars on Saturday nights. Women love to dance. A friend of mine just married a girl (they are both foreign-born but live in America) he met at a salsa dancing group.

Even if you don't think you like to dance, try a more traditional dance. It could just be that like me, you hate the type of twerk dancing people do at American clubs to shitty music. I recently attended a square dance folk music type event, and while there were certainly some grandmothers there, there were also some good feminine prospects, and you will have little competition.

7. The Gym

Gym girls dress to impress

Exercise should be a regular part of everyone’s routine, and I think most of us prefer a fit girl who puts in the effort to build and maintain her appearance. The gym is the obvious place to look for these type of women. While it can be awkward sometimes to approach girls in the gym, and sometimes it is obvious when you walk over from the bench press to the butt machine and strike up a conversation, the gym is a good source of girls who eat well, stay in shape, and are active, all three absolute requirements in my book.

8. The Coffee Shop

Coffee shops in America are places to play games and surf the web on your Mac Book while drinking an overpriced homogenized coffee-looking drink. Where overseas coffee shops often concentrate on quality, taste, and price, and are typically full of men wanting to relax and enjoy a quick drink at a cafe, the American double venti soymilk vanilla pumpkin crème vending machines are, not surprisingly, dominated by mostly women.

This is a good place to find college girls, as many will come here to study. I have tried writing or working at a coffee shop, and the level of noise and distraction is horrible, but somehow the female millennial mind thrives in this environment. It's easy to start a conversation by asking something simple like "what's the wifi password here?" "Oh are you having the new pumpkin latte?" "What are some other coffee shops you enjoy besides this one?", although one of the biggest hurdles is dealing with the girls staring at their smartphone with headphones on.

Always Be Approaching

So there we have eight ideas for you to find above average quality women in the west. Just remember, it's still a numbers game and you should approach, flirt, and get the numbers of multiple women just as if you were out in a bar looking for a quick hookup. While the quality of women overall should be higher in these locations, the overall low quality of American women means you will need to do some serious screening.

Good luck, and post any other ideas, or your experiences in the comments.

Read More: How-to-use-your-natural-horniness-for-a-great-daygame-session

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

If You Stay In The Fight Long Enough, Your Luck Will Change

October 19, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Sometimes in life, you have no choice but to fight on, and hope that tomorrow will be better. When the odds are against you (which they usually will be), those who continue to fight will always be rewarded. The outcome may different from what you anticipate, but it will usually also be better than you anticipate.

One historical example makes this point.

Frederick II of Prussia ("The Great") was perhaps the most capable and militarily astute European king of the eighteenth century. His domain, Prussia, was not geographically contiguous; it had parts scattered here and there in northern Europe, and by necessity required a competent army to defend its borders. Geography is the mother of history.

Prussia's population in 1756 was four million, a large part of which was located in Silesia, a region he had seized by force. He was surrounded by a ring of hostile states. France, Austria, Russia, and even other German states were alarmed by the growth of his power, which threatened to upset the existing balance in central Europe. Maria Theresa, the Austrian monarch, disliked him intensely. He returned the feeling.

Frederick was thus forced to live on his wits, daring, and military aptitude. He was a remarkable man for any era. His youthful years seemed to mark him out as a worthless dandy, but he remade himself by relentless discipline into a king who actually led, rather than reigned. He believed in the need for enlightened authoritarianism, and in his case he was absolutely correct.

His army, bequeathed to him by his father, had grown from 100,000 men to 150,000 men. He had trained it to a level of perfection, such that it could maneuver en masse under combat conditions. He deployed spies in great number among his enemies, knowing that awareness of their moves would be a matter of life and death for him.

Sensing the cordon around him beginning to tighten, he resolved to strike one of them first, in order to deprive them the benefit of combined offensive action. He sought assurances from Austria that he would not be attacked. He received a vague reply, which he expected. He then ordered his forces to occupy Saxony as a measure to protect his western border, officially inaugurating the Seven Years' War.

Europe branded him the aggressor. He was not concerned. A ruler in his position could not sit idly by while hostile powers conspired to dismember his country. Captured Saxon documents did, in fact, confirm its participation in the anti-Prussian alliance.

Europe's alliance system now drew in other powers committed to destroying Prussia. England at first signed an agreement supporting Prussia, but when William Pitt was dismissed, London balked in making good on the promise.

Armies were now moving against him from all sides. Francis I, Maria Theresa's husband, publicly declared Frederick an outlaw. He had only 145,000 men at arms, and would have to fend off 105,000 Frenchmen, 20,000 hostile Germans, 133,000 Austrians, 60,000 Russians, and 16,000 Swedish. Thus the stage was set for one of the most desperate fights for survival in modern European history.

His plan was to attack the weaker states first, and then deal with the stronger ones. He first defeated the Austrians on May 6, 1757 at a desperate battle near Prague. But in response, a huge Russian force invaded East Prussia, and Swedish forces landed in Pomerania. Frederick contemplated suicide, and to the end of the war carried with him a vial of poison.

But Frederick won the Battle of Rossbach, and restored his nerve. Other victories followed, as armies from various nations maneuvered here and there. The war degenerated into a brutal slogging match , as the various belligerents hammered away at each other. Time was not on Frederick's side; despite his brilliant generalship and tactical genius, he could not long contend with the array of nations against him.

Diplomacy began in 1761, initiated by the British. Popular opinion there was against the war, and Pitt came under strong pressure to cut Frederick loose and leave him to his fate. Pitt resigned on October 5, 1761. His successor and all of Europe thought Frederick was as good as dead.

Even his venerated army was turning against him. A bloody but Pyrrhic victory against the Austrians at Torgau on the Elbe had left 13,120 Prussians dead, and this proved to be nearly the last straw. Frederick led his men personally in battle, and had three horses shot out from under him. His soldiers threatened to mutiny, and if pressed to fight, told him they would surrender to the enemy.

And now there occurred an event that can only be described as a miracle. The Russian empress, Czarina Elizaveta, died suddenly on January 5, 1762. She, along with Maria Theresa, had been his most bitter antagonist. The new czar, Peter III, was a warm admirer of Frederick, seeing him as something of a philosopher-king.

Peter concluded a separate peace with Prussia, followed by Sweden. Russia then actually changed sides and fought alongside Frederick; Peter admired Frederick so much that he put on a Prussian uniform and placed himself at Frederick's command. Although Peter was later deposed and murdered, Russia had been neutralized.

Peace followed soon after. Europe was exhausted and drowning in debt, but Frederick had accomplished a miracle by surviving. He entered Berlin in triumph, and was hailed as a hero.

There will be many times in our lives when we will be faced with struggle against seemingly impossible odds. The outcome will be in doubt. In such situations, we can only hold on and move forward. We can never know when a stroke of good luck will come.

Sooner or later, everyone's luck changes who stays in the fight long enough.

Read More: Charles Bukowski: Literature For Men

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Take Our Reader Survey To Help Improve ROK

October 19, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For the next seven days, we are conducting a reader survey to get your views on ROK and the direction you would like it to take in the future. This is the first reader survey we've ever conducted in three years of operation.

ROK is at a crossroads between publishing articles about individual self-improvement (game, fitness) and ones concerning society as a whole (politics, SJW'ism, religion, government). We are trying to strike a balance between both areas so we're soliciting feedback to see what you think of our attempts so far.

I'm open to comments from readers since ROK has already climbed the tallest mountain peaks. It has become the biggest site in the manosphere after triggering hundreds of thousands of feminists over the past couple of years. Where should ROK deliver the next death blow?

Click here to take the survey. This is an opportunity for you to input your DNA into the future of ROK. Your feedback is appreciated.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What Do Neomasculine Men Do After We Hit The Wall?

October 20, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Back in May, Roosh and Quintus held their third live Culture War Chat. Among the topics of discussion were girls, game, feminism, and Roosh's ~~ambush~~ appearance on Dr. Oz.

But something Roosh briefly opined on at about the 25:00 minute mark really got me thinking:

> …I thought that the end goal for men was basically this just to chase a lot of girls…but suddenly almost, like in the last couple years I've been unable to keep it up…
>
> ….I'm coming to the conclusion that chasing girls, a lifestyle that many guys who read me do, is a stage…
>
> …I honestly thought I would be sixty years old in the shopping mall asking girls where the pet shop is. I'm not even thirty-six and I can't even tolerate a night club…

Those statements really struck a chord with me because I know at some point in my life I won't be able to pull high SMV chicks no matter what my game level is.

Sure, there are men like Hugh Hefner who, despite being as old as dirt, fucks the tightest, youngest blondes on the planet. But we all know his fortune and his industry will give him unlimited access to high quality ass until he kicks the bucket.

But what about the every day players out here who don't have seven-figure bank accounts or celebrity status? Every man on Earth has sexual desires until the day he dies. Age and testosterone levels (natural or synthetic) play a role in the degree and intensity of those desires but they are there nonetheless.

So what do we do when we hit the wall?

A very small number of us…

…will have amassed enough wealth to live better than most of the Western population. No, I'm not talking about the top 1% who buy islands and gold plated cars. I'm talking about men who can afford to retire early and live very comfortably for the rest of their lives.

For these men, sleeping with young beautiful women will be a regular activity well into their fifties and maybe even longer. Their ability to travel and enjoy the finer things in life with their top notch homes and luxury automobile(s) serving as the backdrop to their comfortable lifestyles is a very enticing prospect for a twenty-something looking to get a taste of the good life for a while.

Every so often one might even find a hot young filly willing to cash out early and tie the knot. It's not a regular occurrence but it happens.

Eventually even these men will become too old to attract high quality ass, but their sexual shelf lives are much longer than your average red pill male.

A few more of us…

…will become expats and move abroad. Regions like South America and Eastern Europe are attractive destinations for Western men who want to sample a higher quality fare in terms of thin, feminine women.

Occasional ROK contributor James Maverick holds a special place in his for Brazilian women because of their raw beauty, femininity, and vivacious bedroom manner.

But Mav would be the first to tell you that there's nothing special about him at all. Only that he simply decided he would no longer tolerate American women and Western culture and did something about it.

Though most of us won't acquire the financial means to live the lives of our wealthy counterparts, all of us has what it takes to move to, live in, and thrive in another country. We're men after all.

There will certainly be more neomasculine men who become expatriates than those who can retire before 50 but the vast majority of us will….

…end up with a post wall slut

Sad but true. Men here know and understand that a man doesn't need today's woman nearly as much as our predecessors used to if at all. Pussy's stock (NASDAQ: PSSY) is at an all time low. As a result, men don't have to invest much to realize an ROI—sex.

But the fact of the matter is that we are all hard wired to desire not only sex from females, but companionship. Sleeping with random women for years on end gets old.

I'll be the first to admit that even though I'm fortunate enough to have fucked more girls than the average male, random romps in the sack with this chick or that without any real connection gets a little stale after a while.

The older a man gets, the less important pussy becomes to him. Subsequently the desire for a relationship of consequence becomes more important to him as far as companionship with the opposite sex goes.

And because females who grew up in his generation were heavily influenced by feminism at a young age and encouraged to sleep with dozens of men, he'll likely end up spending his golden years with former party slut.

Take Away

Keep in mind that the one and only qualifier here is neomasculinity. That is, the men who fall into each of the above categories have a strong working knowledge of a woman's true nature and simply do not put them on a pedestal. This means that women always take a back seat to other shit he's got going on in his life.

But like I stated before, all men are designed to desire female companionship. Even when we're old and gray our lives feel more complete with a female by our sides whether we admit it or not.

So unless you strike it rich, learn a new language and move abroad, or both, odds are you'll eventually end up with a woman who's notch count exceeds triple figures if you remain stateside.

Here's the good news: It doesn't have to be that way. So what are you gonna do about it?

Read Next: How To Bang A Brazilian Woman In 5 Easy Steps

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

You Are Most Certainly Deficient In Vitamin D

October 20, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the past two decades there has been a crusade by the skin care industrial complex to make you afraid of the sun, not unlike how modern woman are taught to be afraid of heterosexual men. This shaming movement has made us averse to receiving sunlight that is so critical for optimal health.

The problem in your awareness of vitamin D starts with the name: it's not just a vitamin but a hormone that is synthesized and activated in multiple locations within your body. Science still has not been able to declare a firm verdict on vitamin D's many effects and functions, meaning you won't find consistent guidelines of exactly how much of it you need per day, either via supplementation or through the sun. That leaves many of us in the dark about what the consequences are when we don't get enough.

Here are health claims that European, Canadian, and American governments allow on vitamin D supplement labels:

- normal function of the immune system
- normal inflammatory response
- normal muscle function
- reduced risk of falling in people over age 60
- may reduce the risk of osteoporosis

New research has revealed additional benefits on your mind:

> Every tissue in the body has vitamin D receptors, including the brain, heart, > muscles, and immune system, which means vitamin D is needed at every level for the body to function.

>
> […]
>
> Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD), a mood disorder featuring depressive symptoms, occurs during the dark times of the year when there is relatively little sunshine, coinciding with the sudden drop in vitamin D levels in the body. Several studies have suggested that the symptoms of SAD may be due to changing levels of vitamin D3 (link is external), which may affect serotonin levels in the brain (link is external).

If you experience the winter blues like I do in Europe where I get not one strong ray of light for months at a time, it's probably from a deficiency of vitamin D, especially if you're not drinking over eight cups of milk a day:

> Fortified foods provide most of the vitamin D in the American diet. For example, almost all of the U.S. milk supply is voluntarily fortified with 100 IU/cup. (In Canada, milk is fortified by law with 35–40 IU/100 mL, as is margarine at =530 IU/100 g.) In the 1930s, a milk fortification program was implemented in the United States to combat rickets, then a major public health problem. Other dairy products made from milk, such as cheese and ice cream, are generally not fortified. Ready-to-eat breakfast cereals often contain added vitamin D, as do some brands of orange juice, yogurt, margarine and other food products.

Here's an informative lecture at the University Of California that explains vitamin D's importance and how much sunlight you actually need:

I started supplementing with 2000 IU's in December of 2014 to combat my low mood and general lethargy. Within four days, my mood improved and I gained more pep in my step. Over two months later my mood continues to be normal (I'm not jumping off the walls but I have the state that I normally experience in summer). I also have not contracted a cold this winter season when the previous winter I was sick more than three times.

Vitamin D deficiency is serious yet few people understand it even exists:

> Studies have shown that if you improve your vitamin D status, it reduces risk of colorectal cancer, prostate cancer, and a whole host of other deadly cancers by 30 to 50 percent.
>
> […]
>
> One of Dr. Holick's studies showed that healthy volunteers taking 2,000 IUs of vitamin D per day for a few months up-regulated 291 different genes that control up to 80 different metabolic processes, from improving DNA repair to having effect on autoxidation (oxidation that occurs in the presence of oxygen and/or UV radiation, which has implications for aging and cancer, for example), boosting your immune system and many other biological processes.
>
> […]

> Vitamin D is a fat-soluble, hormone-like vitamin, which means body fat acts as a "sink" by collecting it. If you're overweight or obese, you're therefore likely going to need more vitamin D than a slimmer person — and the same holds true for people with higher body weights due to muscle mass.

I advised my sister to supplement with vitamin D (she's on 2000 IU's a day), and she reported a better mood within a week. If you only supplement with one vitamin, I'm convinced that D is the best choice.

I plan on reducing my dosage to 1000 IU's a day in the summer as an insurance policy while making stronger efforts to get at 15 minutes of direct sunlight per day beyond just my face and forearms. While I'm not too big on taking supplements or drugs to prevent health problems I may suffer from decades into the future, I see the value that vitamin D has by making the everyday quality of my life better, especially during the winter months.

Epilogue: I currently take 5000 IU's a day.

> Low vitamin D linked to mental decline: http://t.co/ZSTXOfj8H3 I take 5000 IU's a day
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) September 16, 2015

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: How Baking Soda Changed My Life

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Ways To Cultivate The Discipline Of A Neomasculine Lifestyle

October 21, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> While some men have to work less at their goals because of innate talents and abilities they were born with, work is a significant equalizer that allows one born with a lower stock to raise himself up to those men born above him.
>
> — Roosh on the hard work ethic intrinsic to being a neomasculine man.

All men can achieve great things, but few men do. Why? They lack the discipline to work hard, challenge and then eliminate their fears, and constantly extricate themselves from the always present contagion of personal complacency. It is a good bet that most ROK readers will not go further than a week or two in applying the kinds of measures I will describe here to increase and consolidate their discipline. Even amongst self-described neomasculinists, the red pillers of the red pillers, the majority will fall short, indeed far short of the mark.

You must treat your life like that of a professional athlete. The difference is, though, that you're your own coach as well. And your life extends well beyond the domain of sports. Your life is your discipline and how you apply it in all facets of your life. Consider your neomasculine beliefs as the rocket and your discipline as the fuel. Use the following three strategies (and adapt your own) to ensure that the ideology you know and love on ROK isn't just a pipe dream you live out on the internet several times a week. You must live what you support, not passively read it.

1. Write down what you do… every day

You need hard, documentary evidence of what you do in life, not selective and deceptively rosy recollections in your mind.

People regularly convince themselves that they did a lot more than they did in reality. Men will say they went to the gym, forgetting the five or ten minute intervals each and every time between different machines or weight stations. They'll mentally cast aside that the dumbbells they use feel more like doing an aerobics class than an attempt to add size and mass. Or they'll ignore entirely how they should be writing down their weights, sets and repetitions for each exercise without fail.

It is your job to get yourself a sturdy notebook (to survive being used across your many neomasculine activities) to record your pursuits, successes and, yes, setbacks. If you went to the gym, were you training like a teenage girl in spandex or like a prospective Arnie? There's a difference. Likewise, in your studies or career, did you push yourself? And for how long? Instead of just punching in your hours, did you work towards something bigger and longer-term?

At the end of every week, your aim is to have a list of activities across seven days that demonstrate you are dedicated to a never-ending use of your masculine energies. Of course, rest and relaxation are an integral part of this masculinity, so do not forget it. Yet the biggest problem for men is a lack of hard or sustained work, not an absence of idle time.

The litmus test for whether you are doing enough is to imagine that a friend with similar interests shows you the same list of things they did in a week. Would it impress you? If not, you need to do more (and be recording it).

2. Turn positive, conscious actions into easy, unconscious habits

So long as your habits serve you, there's nothing wrong with cultivating automatic behaviors and programming.

One of my favorite routines is heading to the gym at almost always the same time. Urgent work and travel commitments obviously change things from time to time, but by and large I am always going to the gym in the same three hour block of time, aside from my rest days.

As my obligations change across the year, sometimes I substitute mid-morning sessions for what used to be evening ones. Nonetheless, the general consistency I maintain makes going to the gym simple and close to addictive. My neural pathways are basically geared to being at the gym at a particular time. Instead of casual willpower dictating things, habitual programming does it for me.

In a sense, habits take you beyond discipline to more automatic behavior. The trick, though, is applying the discipline at the very beginning, when a habit is still to be formed. If your goal is to learn a language, try my habit of choice: practicing your language with a simple computer program or application every morning, immediately after you wake up. It is not unusual for me to practice for 20 to 30 days in a row before I miss one (and I know this because I record what I do, which takes only five minutes cumulatively per day).

There are simple techniques for you to harness this principle. For example, I had iPhone and iPod alarm reminders set for five minutes after my wake-up alarm ("Practise Russian and Italian for 10 minutes each.") until I no longer needed them. To make sure I kept my gym program going, I asked three friends to question me about how many times I was going to the gym every week (illustrating the power of social circles in achieving your goals).

How you program yourself is your prerogative, but there's no excuse for not being programmed. It's effectively a cheating form of discipline because your unconscious brain handles most of the work.

3. Make a $1,000 bet or just burn your goddamned bridges

You'd burn your bridges with a terrible girl, so do the same for any mediocre parts of your life. Aim for glory.

I regularly bet my friends or girls that I will do something when they say I won't or can't. It brings out my most competitive spirit and it should do the same for yours. Ideally, life is a competition with yourself so you can then outcompete others. Nevertheless, sometimes you need to jostle your ego somewhat and make it a winner-takes-all battle with someone else.

Often the bet is just for pride, although putting money on the table can be an intense motivator, especially if the wager is one-way (i.e. if you win, you get nothing and if you lose, the other person gets the cash). Of the 50 or so two-way bets I have made like this over the past few years, where the sums were on average about $50, I have lost just two or three.

Another way is to simply make a promise to someone, indicating you're putting all your chips on the table and that a failure to accomplish something would mean a humiliation or a lowering of someone's perception of you. Too many men presume they can immediately self-actualize and drive themselves based on personal willpower and desire alone. That is certainly conceivable, albeit unlikely for the majority of men with flabby discipline muscles.

Burning your bridges in a responsible way (preferably without second mortgaging your home!) harnesses your primal, simian fear of being embarrassed. You urge yourself onto more when you know others are watching.

For those who believe this is a shortcut to discipline, consider the case of the triple Olympic gold medalist in the 100 metres dash, Usain Bolt. Although undoubtedly self-motivated, Bolt's performances are furthered by a pack of capable sprinters always just behind him when he wins, literally by mere milliseconds.

Would Bolt be training harder, aiming for better and better times, if his closest competitors took between 10.5 and 11 seconds to race and not under 10? Of course not. Bolt's version of burning his bridges is that each and every time he competes, others are watching. If the 100 metre Olympic champion fails, everyone knows. It is more than healthy to be competing with a combination of both yourself and others.

Do you dare to have the audacity of Roosh?

Have the balls to face down your own life like Roosh faces down SJWs.

What you now know as neomasculinity did not simply start in someone's mind, it was lived out in reality. As we saw in the vitriolic, hateful attacks on Roosh in Canada this year, it is possible to not only pursue a proud form of masculinity, but to wear it as a badge of honor as the most powerful and vested interests attack it. Compared to those like Roosh who are publicly lambasted for promoting healthy forms of masculinity, your challenges are mostly a walk in the park.

Your attitude and the way you conduct yourself must be unapologetic in your own life, just as Roosh is unapologetic in the public sphere. You have a short few decades to make a mark on yourself and the world. So seize it. Start today. What you achieve in the next day or six months may fade into time. The discipline you commit yourself to will not fade, however, if you choose to keep it.

Talk is cheap and neomasculinity demands discipline. So have you got what it takes or are you just a pretender?

Read More: The Application Of Spirituality In A Neomasculine Lifestyle

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 Things I Learned From My English Friend With Benefits

October 21, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Despite my recent rant against Tinder, not long ago I used it to pick up a new girl from London we'll call Amelia. I've seen her three times in the last few weeks and in between sex sessions we've had long conversations that have reinforced a number of the "home truths" about male-female relations that we often discuss here on ROK.

One of the most interesting — and at times unnerving — aspects of being an aware neomasculine male is just how frequently real life (away from the websites and blogs and forums) so accurately reflects what we theorise about online. Sometimes you get a double-take moment, when a girl says something that sounds so much like it could have come out of an ROK article that it's almost funny.

What follows is a list of five things Amelia has said or done recently which are worth discussion. Take them as watch-outs — little indicators of how millennial females really think, and be sure to adjust your behaviour accordingly.

1. English Girls Test Really Hard

I start with a note on what it's like to date an English girl, for those who live in the UK or are planning a trip here.

It is something of a cliche in London that most of the players here end up sleeping with foreign girls — Polish, Bulgarian, Asian, or from the middle-East. Guys will often claim that this is because the girls are hotter. While there is some truth in this, the more cynical reason touted is that these girls are easier to pull (for English men, at least).

Amelia is in her twenties and works in a professional job in the city. She is from an upper-middle class family and went to an all-girls, fee-paying school. As such, she is high-value in her attitude and her expectations. What does this mean in practice? Constant shit tests and a lot of LMR.

If you date an English girl of her kind, then what you're likely to get is persistent prodding about your masculinity, about your social ability, perhaps even your sexuality. All of this will be delivered in rapid, high-pitched millennial-speak. Anyone who's seen the UK TV show Made in Chelsea will know exactly what I mean.

This is not because girls like Amelia are inherently evil, or that English girls are bad people. It's simply that their sense of entitlement has been raised exponentially by the culture that surrounds them. It's the player's job to become smooth at deflecting tests (simply ignoring them works well in most cases) rather than to get caught up in a spiral of negativity.

If the game is rigged then you must learn how to play it better.

2. Guys Get Disqualified Because They Are Not Forward Enough

Now we come to the first of the insights that Amelia revealed. As you would expect, she gets messaged by a lot of guys on Tinder and had been on a few dates recently — but according to her the guys she'd met had been "really nice" and "looking for girlfriends." These guys she quickly disqualified. Why? Because, as she explained to me, they simply didn't press the sexual agenda hard enough. I did, and I fucked her straight away.

The irony is that the guys she rejected were almost certainly better "relationship material" than me. But they didn't get a look in because they led with a provider frame rather than a lover frame. This is the death of romance, even if you are seeking a relationship.

It's a truism on men's websites, but if you want to get a girlfriend you really do have to be a lover first, before you commence with the lovey-dovey stuff. Only once she's hooked on your dick is it even slightly safe to let her to see you as a potential boyfriend, and any move in this direction must come from her — i.e she should be trying to lock you down, not the other way round.

The other thing to consider is, of the guys who said that they were looking for a girlfriend, to her how many of them really just wanted to fuck her? I'm guessing fairly pretty high percentage. If you are the type of man who hides your sexual desire for a girl behind a reflected purity, then stop immediately. Amelia's disdainful response to her Tinder orbiters should tell you all you need to know.

By the way, you should also watch the degree to which you invest when you are sending a girl texts or WhatsApp messages. Amelia showed me a message thread from another poor sap and laughed at the length of his messages in comparison to hers. Apparently this guy was really good looking, but his messaging communicated neediness and his failure to take the initiative and actually ask her out disqualified him, demonstrating that physical appearance alone isn't enough.

3. Girls Really Don't Like Men Crying

Amelia described an ex-boyfriend crying and her demeanour while she did so was nothing short of disgusted. "I don't think men should ever cry," she said, with visceral disgust etched deep on her face.

Guys, we all love our mothers, but it is with our mothers that female sympathy and nurturing ends. Slim, attractive young women's vaginas are dried out by emotional men. If you want to get laid then put on that poker face and don't give a fuck about anything. It's the only way.

4. They Think Asking "To Be Friends" Is Weird

Apparently, Amelia dumped her last fuck buddy when she sent him a nude picture by way of a booty call and he invited her over to his place for “cuddles.” When she arrived, wetter than the London night, he literally cuddled her — no sex was delivered at all.

After this gross display of unmanliness, Amelia rightly dumped him by text (making an excuse that things “weren’t going anywhere”). Rather than accept this dismissal and move on, three days later he texted her again and asked if they could be friends. God knows what he as thinking, but again, Amelia’s look of disgust at this weak behaviour spoke volumes.

Guys, don’t ask girls to be friends after you’ve fucked them, or after you’ve made it obvious that you’d like to fuck. She knows what the deal is and she knows that you are willingly selling yourself short. Have some self-respect and walk.

5. They Love To Be Challenged, Emotionally AND Sexually

Like all girls of her age, Amelia bangs on constantly about Fifty Shades of Grey. She has also called me as her Christian Grey, and mentioned that I’m hard to work out, or a “challenge.”

Clearly, girls like to be dominated, hence that book’s popularity. A little light dominance in the bedroom works wonders – spanking, rough sex and so on. But more than that, you must ensure that you always remain a little out of reach — and that you are consequently hard to work out — on an emotional and intellectual level too.

How to do this? It’s simple — as always, you need to ensure that you maintain abundance. And the way to do that, as you know, is to always be approaching other girls, and keeping your pipeline brimming with new prospects.

Read More: How To Make Out With a Girl Without Getting ‘The Cheek’

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why You Should Boycott the NFL

October 21, 2015 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

On Tuesday, October 19th, Cam Heyward, a player for the Pittsburgh Steelers, will be appealing a fine he received for violating the league's uniform policy. Heyward wore the words "Iron Head" on his face (with eye black) to honor his deceased father, Craig "Iron Head" Heyward. His father was a former NFL player who died in 2006 of a brain tumor.

Tries to call attention to his father's death from cancer…gets a fine.

The NFL has strict rules regarding player uniforms, and players routinely face a fine if they violate these rules.

However, Heyward's fine comes in the midst of the NFL's breast cancer awareness month. Fans of the NFL have been bombarded with nonstop displays of pink: pink pieces of uniforms, pink ribbons painted on the field, pink goal posts, pink banners, and so on. During this time, players have been free to make a litany of changes to their uniforms: pink shoes, pink gloves, pink wristbands, etc.

To the NFL, the only cancer deaths that matter are women's.

Naturally, if the NFL is trying to draw attention to breast cancer, then they will be concerned with all forms of cancer! They will be sympathetic to the men who die of cancer, as well as the women! Right? Er…wrong.

Given the fines being levied against Cam Heyward, this is clearly not the case.

So then, why would the NFL honor breast cancer, yet refuse to honor other forms of cancer? And why would the NFL go so far as fining players for honoring a former player that died of cancer?

Cam Heyward Speaks out

Heyward, in his naivety, thought that the NFL would want to honor his dead father:

> "A lot of people are struggling with cancer and that's what my message was," Heyward said Monday afternoon. "It's not just about me and my love for my father. There are a lot of people out there struggling. In a month when breast cancer is honored I think every type of cancer should be honored as well."

Heyward faces more fines if he continues to wear the message. By the time all is said and done, Heyward could collect up to $100,000 in fines. Heyward has tried to be diplomatic about the situation, using logic to plead his case:

> "I'm not trying to step on anyone's toes or upset the league office, but I want to continue to do it at least for this month," Heyward said. "I would love to be able to [do it] this month and make an awareness for all types of cancer. I'm very sincere when I say I'm not trying to be someone who is a rebel against the cause or someone who is against everybody. I care about this league, but I also care about people who are struggling. I understand the struggles they go through. My dad went through that struggle, and I saw it every day."

Heyward has shown great restraint. As the preceding quote shows, he does not just want to honor his father; he wants to honor all people who suffer from this horrible infirmity.

Analysis

This is one of those stories that speak for itself, if you have eaten the red pill. The NFL is another arm of society that has been overtaken by feminism and the social justice warrior brigade: another domino that has fallen in their quest for social supremacy. The once noble game is now serving the agenda of Team Feminism, where the lives of women matter more than those of men.

The fact that these incidents are occurring in the NFL is significant. In a country that has virtually lost its testicles, the NFL has remained one of the last bastions of American, Alpha male behavior: a place where socially-engineered androgyny has not gained a foothold. This fact infuriates Team Feminism.

Remember that feminism relies on fictional representations of superior, female strength (i.e. Jennifer Lawrence in The Hunger Games, Charlie's Angels, etc). The NFL is weekly proof that men are, in fact, stronger than women. No million dollar Hollywood budget can change this reality, and the NFL is a weekly reminder of this genetic difference. This infuriates the feminist brigade, who have made it their lifelong goal to highlight male weakness.

Consequently, the feminists have set their sights on the NFL–they will not rest until the manhood has been ripped from the game, and hurled to the street like John Wayne Bobbit's severed penis.

Summary And Recommendation

I will white knight for the NFL – I give you my pledge.

The point of all this is simple: The spotlight must always be placed on woman's victimhood. If this spotlight is removed—even for a second—then men will stop working for the feminist cause. Acknowledging a man's death from cancer—even one—is a threat to the feminist attempt at a month long grievance campaign.

The NFL, and particularly commissioner Roger Goodell, have turned into the ultimate white knight in this regard. They have allowed women to turn the NFL into an SJW platform, moving from one tabloid topic to the next. Goddell is like a beta male provider, rushing to meet a woman's ever-escalating demands regardless of how insane they are. Roger Goodell and his associates are ruining a great American sport.

Sadly, I am recommending a boycott of the NFL. This is particularly difficult for me. I am a lifelong fan, and I was an all-league player in high school. I have watched football for close to forty years, and it is my favorite sport. It runs in my blood.

However, I have to acknowledge that my support of the NFL at the moment is a form of tacit approval. By tuning in every Sunday, I am giving the NFL permission to be overtaken by the feminist brigade. I am saying that it is ok for them to disrespect the millions of men who have died of cancer. I am saying that female lives matter more than male.

Well, let me say what the feminist proponents love to claim—equality matters.

Read More: Why You Need To Boycott The NBA

Brian Logan

Brian Logan is a writer that spends more than half of the year traveling abroad. He believes in self-improvement via hard work, reason, and creativity. And oh yeah, he has a thing for hot Latinas that know how to cook.

4 Reasons Why You Should Date A Feminist

October 22, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Here at Return of Kings, feminism sometimes gets a bad rap. Even I have been guilty of mocking feminism. But this is a little bit unfair because while feminism does have its drawbacks, it also brings a lot of good things to both women and men.

That's right. Although it might not be apparent at first, men benefit from feminism just as much as women. The main way to reap these benefits is by dating them.

Of course, I am not suggesting that you date a corpulent, third-wave intersectional feminist with blue hair and ironic glasses. Rather, there are plenty of women who accept the feminist philosophy but stubbornly maintain a feminine shape—a vestige of the patriarchy. With regard to dating, these modern gals can be very enjoyable company at a very low price.

1. Feminists are easy

Feminism saved women from this type of horrible oppression.

Before feminism, women didn't have a lot of choices. Their options were to become a wife and mother who was respected by her husband and children, a spinster who lived with her parents, or, if they lived in Catholic countries, a nun.

Being a slut was not an option because most women did not work outside the home—they needed to rely on their husband to provide for them. Even women who inherited family wealth and therefore did not need a husband preferred to remain chaste because they possessed the outdated patriarchal virtues of self-respect and dignity.

Fast forward to the 21st century. Thanks to feminism, women have so many more choices. Feminism is about more than just women being able to spend ten hours per day in a cubicle farm in a dead end job, it also means that they are free to have sex with random men, women, and transsexuals.

Although feminism theoretically says that women may choose to be chaste, most feminists cave to peer pressure and "choose" to be loose. After all, being a slut is empowering.

As a man, what this means is that you are certain of getting laid by the third date. And, as feminists have become even more empowered, even a single date is not necessary any more.

Of course, you do need to remember to practice "safe sex." Safe sex means:

You must wear a condom.

You must get a signed consent form from the feminist with at least two witnesses.

You must get your sexual encounter professionally filmed.

The feminist must submit to a blood alcohol test.

Failure to practice safe sex can result in a nasty burning rash and a prison sentence for rape.

Take advantage of this wonderful liberation that feminism has given to women and enjoy gobs of unfulfilling, commitment-free sex.

2. Feminists are on birth control

Feminism is all about using cutting edge science to make women's lives better. One example of this is birth control—preferably taxpayer funded birth control.

Although most feminists are very health conscious and only eat free-range, halal, non-GMO, organic tofu, they will think nothing of flooding their bodies with powerful artificial hormones from the moment they hit puberty until they die. Today's woman regards her birth control pills as a mystical talisman that protects her from the contagion of patriarchy.

Of course, I would never encourage you to have "unsafe" sex. In fact, you should wear a condom at all times, even while you are sleeping. However, it is nice to know that feminists are on birth control. Just sayin'.

3. Feminists will pay for your date

In the bad old patriarchal days, the man was expected to pay for dates. No more! One of the most important messages of feminism is: "my equality." This means that women must pay at least 50% of any costs of a date. Any less would be unequal, and therefore, unacceptable.

Granted, dates are no longer necessary, but why not have that feminist gal buy you dinner before the amorous activities? Make sure it is that hot restaurant that just opened.

Pro tip: order wine. A good bottle of wine can double the price of dinner.

Don't worry about the feminist's ability to pay for the expensive dinner. Now that feminists have fulfilling, high power "office fauna" jobs, they are awash in cash. But don't reciprocate. After that first night, tell her you just aren't "feeling it."

At this point I have to broach a common complaint of feminists: Women earn only 7 cents for every dollar that men make doing the exact same work. Or something like that. The good news is that feminists are working hard to elect progressive politicians like Monica Lewinsky's ex-boyfriend's wife. These progressive politicians will make great gains for feminist women, just like President Obama did.

You might feel sorry for that feminist who earns only $15,000 per year, even though she is an executive vice president who works 90 hours per week. Don't. To feel sorry for a feminist is extremely patronizing. If you attempt to pay for the date, it means you are a horrible bigot. And remember, horrible bigots don't get anal later in the date. Well, at least not usually.

4. Feminists will agree to degrading sex

The great thing about feminism is that women are now free to choose to engage in sexual acts that would make the residents of Sodom and Gomorrah blush. And by "choose" I mean that they will feel empowered by doing so. You can get a feminist to do just about anything if you tell her that it will make her more empowered.

The whole degrading sex thing got a big boost from the 50 Shades of Grey books. Now, feminist women believe that it is normal to be tied up and smacked with a riding crop. Most men will not want to go down this road, but perverts will be pleased to know that feminism and the media have made it easy for them to engage in their deviant acts.

Conclusion

It is becoming clear that patriarchy is coming back soon—much sooner than I expected. Even now, there are evil men gathered in well-lit cafes discussing how to bring it back. Once it returns, it will roll back all of the heroic gains achieved by feminists over the past 100 years, and with that, all of the benefits that are listed above. Make full use of all of the wonderful fruits of feminism while they last.

Read More: 8 Reasons To Date A Former Fat Girl

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

America’s Passive Obsession With Professional Sports Is Promoting Obesity

October 22, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As the money being plowed into the NFL, NBA, MLB and NHL continues to grow, America is getting fatter and fatter. Whether or not the chilling prediction that lard-loving American youngsters today will predecease their parents comes true, people from San Diego to Augusta in Maine are shaving 5-10 years or more off their lifespans because of their significant weight problems.

The dollar signs made off professional sports, however, are only rising. A culture ravaged by obesity has an insatiable hunger to watch other people keep fit, avoiding it themselves at all costs.

After all, there are only 24 hours in a day. An obsession with sports naturally translates into less time for everything else. In high school and college, your all-round lack of genuine responsibility in life means that you have the time to play alongside your teammates and keep fit at the same time. Hit the real salaried working world and that’s a different story. Watching sportscasts or replays quickly becomes the 7 or 8pm weeknight substitute for hitting the gym after eight to ten hours at the office.

This is not to say that sport explains every aspect of the obesity crisis. Whereas obesity used to be a sign of slovenliness and disrespecting yourself (aside from some serious medical explanation), now it is culturally perceived as an indication that people are simply too stressed. Worse still, “fat acceptance” mantras spread the lie that being fat is actually healthy because slimmer people are somehow desperately malnourished.

Nevertheless, when all this collides with people vicariously living their sporting fantasies via athletes on a TV screen, the result is a culture defined by watching sports, rather than sufficiently indulging in the exercise that partaking in sports represents.

Why are so many diehard sports fans fat?

[image]
He may have diabetes, shocking blood pressure and an expected lifespan of just 52, but at least he saw every Packers game this year.

If you're a sporting nut and superfit, good for you. That said, I am perennially confronted by sports-haters with svelte physiques and sports-lovers with beer bellies the size of an actual beer keg. The paradox is hardly the stuff of magic. A person hitting a treadmill in a gym may have a TV featuring sports in front of them, but there's no slackening of the posture and no potato chips. Oh, and something called exercise is taking place. To boot, there are other people around and we generally always want to do better in front of others at the gym.

Let me stress again that it is not impossible for a genuinely healthy population to love sports as much as a squirrel loves nuts. Yet the dramatically short attention spans of the average person, combined with the instant gratification of modern fast food and snacks, makes this particularly unlikely. An obsession with sports too often becomes a cheap surrogate for being "involved" in sports. Somehow looking at x number of games and highlights packages each week becomes one's definition of healthy activity.

Stop living your own dreams through someone else

Though many are not strictly-speaking fat, sports hooligans around the world beg the question, "What are they actually doing with their own lives?"

A fixation on sports is pernicious when it dovetails with vicariously living the life of the athletes themselves. Many sports fans can remember ten times as many statistics and plays as the sportsmen who actually made them. This phenomenon is not limited to sports, but unlike remembering memorizing passages of a book (which can potentially broaden your horizons at least), watching countless sporting games adds virtually nothing in terms of improving your life or cultivating excellent standards of discipline, self-awareness and intelligence. And it certainly won't sculpt your abs or make your biceps bigger.

There's nothing inherently wrong with cheering on Team USA in the next Winter Olympics for ice hockey, or the Denver Broncos in the NFL playoffs. It's when your dedication to your favorite team or player outweighs your commitment to yourself. Are you overweight? You shouldn't be watching sports at all (except for active social gatherings, not sitting with fellow lard boys on the couch). Are you broke? You shouldn't be watching sports.

Instead, you should be out there, making your life (not hoping for it) with the same kind of hard work ethic as the athletes you see on TV. You needn't be in any of these very negative categories either for your passive, couch-dwelling sports career to become a problem weighing you down. Watching excessive sports and other idle time-wasting could be the difference between an okay or great business, social life, educational experience or rise up the company ladder.

Get away from the screen and get real (and fit)

A picture shows a thousand words, or a sports fan's diet of ten thousand calories a day.

If this piece forces you to challenge any overly passive way in which you spend your time, not just in watching sports, that's a step forward. You owe it to yourself to make the best possible use of your time and energies, day in, day out. The line between relaxation or chilling out and laziness is one people constantly blur and shift in their minds. You won't be the next Tom Brady, but you do have countless opportunities every year to show your body and life the same respect and discipline he shows his.

Meanwhile, take note of those around you. The men who let their lives fade away and then crumble by cheaply co-living the dreams of people who earn millions of dollars to set foot on a football field, basketball court, baseball diamond, or ice hockey rink. You want a life that tends towards your own version of the accomplishments of the athletes, not those who follow athletes at the expense of themselves.

Read More: How Fans And The Media Are Making Professional Sports Unbearable

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Reasons To Be A Lifelong Renter

October 23, 2015 | by Chad Hargrove | Link | Original Link

As a lifelong renter, I've never been interested in the idea of owning a house. This became increasingly prescient in the wake of the 2008 recession and many people shackled to depreciated houses they could no longer afford in neighborhoods slowly becoming ghost towns as jobs and people left the area.

All that doom and gloom aside, what's the big deal with owning a house? The "American Dream" of having a job that would sustain you long enough to make something worthwhile like a 30-year mortgage is long dead for Millennials and other generations.

I think it has less to do with "saving money for a down payment" and more some of these reasons for perpetually renting instead of owning.

1. Location flexibility

I have yet to land that "dream job" that will keep me in dollars for decades, AND I've yet to find that special someone that would make having a house ideal in the first place. Why own a house when it's just you?

On top of this, more than likely you're at an age where you're hopping from job to job. You're working at jobs a few years at a time, developing that crucial "experience" that those big jobs seem to be after. You can't hop and bop across the land if you are tied down to a house.

What if you find yourself in a neighborhood that's beginning to get a little sketchy? As a renter you can just move! You're not locked in to a neighborhood that's slowly turning in to trash heap. That's your landlord's problem now.

2. Making it a home

There this persistent myth that if you rent a place you can't paint it or work on it to suit your needs and make it a home, this is patently false. Sure, you might run in to a landlord or two that doesn't care for that kind of business. However, the obligation is on you to find a landlord that only cares if you pay the rent, keep the place in order, and keep quiet.

If you fulfill these requirements, a landlord is much more likely to allow you paint your room some other color than "institution white," change crummy fixtures, and replace that beige carpet that only Jesus Christ himself could step on and still get his whole deposit back.

3. Maneuverability

Say you lose your job or find yourself with a little less money than when you first started renting your place. Conversely, what if you get a promotion or a raise and now have much more money? You can now adjust your living space as well!

If you're the kind of man who's never home, perhaps rent a tiny place that you essentially use as an HQ and find somewhere else to bed your conquests if she finds your place a little "utilitarian" for her tastes.

Perhaps you're the kind of man who wants a yard to host parties and perhaps toss a ball around in. If so, renting is a perfect answer. You can have your yard, which you can mow at your leisure, and you still don't have to own a house.

With the onset of excess fundage, perhaps invest in a bigger pad and add all the accouterments that a man of your flush money lifestyle would demand. The sky is the limit when it comes to the maneuverability of renting.

If you were to lose your job and still own a house, what are you to do? Wait for the bank to foreclose on you, furthering ruining your life? And even then, you still have to pack all your shit and move to a smaller place anyway. Renting allows you to sail the seas of uncertainty with pride.

4. If it's broke…the landlord fixes it

Quick quiz for the homeowners reading: What's the size of the filter for your HVAC unit? What year was your house built? What's the square footage of your home? What kind of plumbing does your house contain? What's the age of the various appliances in your house?

For a renter the answer to that quick quiz is: who cares! It's not their problem…well, if you have renters insurance (which you should) you need to know the square footage and date the place was built, but other than that…nothing else is your problem. Total freedom.

I've long tested the ability of any garbage disposal in the places I've rented. For the most part, I've found that I can dispose of quite of bit of garbage. Sometimes, though, I miscalculate and the disposal needs to be fixed. No problem, I just call the landlord and they deal with it.

Clogged showers, gas leak, HVAC filters, and in one instance, a refrigerator I didn't care for was replaced with something more to my liking. This kind of nonsense is nigh impossible for a homeowner.

A homeowner has to prioritize the importance of things as they come to need addressing. They are stuck with the lone notion of hiring a professional to deal with any problems that may arise from owning a home; a renter is not. At the very least, the renter has to deal with the hassle of having a stranger all up in their place while things are getting fixed. Nevertheless, if there's a worst-case scenario the landlord is typically obligated to pay for a hotel stay.

Renting isn't necessarily for everyone, and depending on the place you live or station in life, your mileage may vary. Who's to say that in a few years you won't get the hankering for a little home owning? Renting a place is the perfect training for the time when you're ready to shackle yourself to a place for 30 years, with your dream job, trophy wife and 2.5 kids.

Read More: 7 Reasons Why Buying A House Is A Terrible Idea

Chad Hargrove
Chad Hargrove is a pop culture junkie that just wants to enjoy his movies and television programming without a bunch on nonsense. You can find his least desirable "writings" at Chad's Toxic Dumps

Watch The State Of Man: A Speech That Thousands Of SJW's Failed To Stop

October 23, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As I mentioned earlier on my blog, today I'm releasing the transcript and video of my State Of Man speech that I delivered in six cities this summer. It's the same speech that three Canadian mayors, countless politicians, and degenerate SJW's failed utterly to stop.

In a weird way, in 2015, game is the path to self-actualization, to enlightenment, to the truth, in a way that it wasn't for our fathers. Maybe for your dad, he just had to go to church every Sunday and have a good job, but for you, if you only do that, you probably won't get the good in life that he actually had, which is why it's so common for our dads to not understand what we go through. I'm sure many of your fathers have said, "Come on, why don't you just find a nice girl." Dad, you don't understand. (Laughter.) Game allows you to be the best version of yourself.

I have seven game tips because I know a lot of you guys come here because you're still out there, grinding it out every day.

Tip number one. You have to keep in mind that game is a numbers game. You have to put yourself in front of women day and night. How many girls have you guys approached in the last year? Take the number of girls you approached in a typical week and multiply that by fifty. How many do you think it is? Someone, toss out a number. (Silence.) Zero? (Laughter, 'thousand', 'two hundred', 'two hundred fifty.')

Transcript sample

Société

Mobilisation contre un blog

Des associations dénoncent la venue de Roosh V à Montréal pour ses propos misogynes

CE QU'ELLES ONT DIT...

« Le Conseil dénonce vivement les propos misogynes et ne se veut surtout pas faire de la publicité. »
- Julie Champagne, Conseil du statut de la femme

« Ce sont des propos qui incitent à la haine et qu'on ne devrait pas tolérer. Si c'était un autre groupe non les femmes qui était visé, la réaction serait plus forte, c'est trop banalisé. »
- Arlène Duplessis, Mouvement contre le viol et l'inceste

« Il faut apporter un grand nombre les parties frontalières. Il est une menace pour les hommes. On ne doit pas le laisser banaliser et encourager la culture du viol. »
- Mélanie Sarrazin, Regroupement québécois des CALACS.

« En pratique encourage une forte haine envers les femmes en ayant des propos sexistes, misogynes, et incitant à la violence »
- Romaine, Tanya, Catherine, Annie, Indépendantiste, indéterminée pour défendre les agressions sexuelles.

« C'est inquiétant parce qu'il s'adresse aux jeunes qui ont moins d'expérience concernant ce qui est vécu des expériences négatives. Ils pourront être facilement influencés »

L'auteur et blogueur Roosh V compte présenter sa conférence à Montréal malgré les protestations.

Des associations mobilisent pour Montréal d'un a controversé po comme misogy promotion du v

Marie-Ève Dumont

« PROPOS HAINEU

SES PROPOS CONTROVERSÉS

« Il faut rendre le viol légal si c'est fait dans une propriété privée »

« Combien de "non" faut-il pour entrer dans un vagin ? »

« Je n'ai pas été excité lors de cette scène, alors que je le suis normalement durant les scènes de viol »

« La valeur significative d'une femme dépend de sa fertilité et de sa beauté »

« Le féminisme abaisse la qualité des hommes en leur permettant d'être laides et d'avoir des

« Une des raisons pour lesquelles il faut sortir avec une femme qui a un trouble alimentaire, c'est que l'obsession qu'elle porte à son corps va lui permettre d'améliorer son look »

« La clé pour une bonne scène de viol, c'est de voir la fille passer du fait qu'elle déteste ça au fait qu'elle adore ça »

« Le féminisme fait croire aux femmes que leur simple présence suffit pour réussir »

ATTENTION
Roosh V aka Roosh Vorek aka Daryush Valizadeh sexual predator/prédateur sexuel encourage les hommes à violer et sera bientôt en ville-will be in town encouraging men to rape-
(Montréal le 8 août, Toronto August 15)
Protégez-vous/protégez les femmes protect yourself/protect women

SATURDAY STAR

Here's a review from an attendee in Toronto:

> As for the lecture itself, it was very wide-ranging. The lecture was representative of how broad Roosh's views are. He spoke honestly and candidly. There were parts of the event that were hilarious (Roosh's recollection of midget gimps in Germany comes to mind), and all of it was extremely enlightening. His extensive experiences following the path of game, location independence, and social awareness were very apparent. Being a pioneer in self-improvement, and following the path of game to near its conclusion, he had a lot of helpful things to say. It was especially helpful to young guys like me who would otherwise have had to take the path and learn the "seasons" of game and manhood the hard way. Roosh has been there and explained clearly and directly how life tends to play out.

The downloadable video features the speech I gave on July 18, 2015 in New York City. It's 1 hour and 8 minutes long. You also get the PDF, MOBI, and EPUB format of the 22 page transcript. You will have the option to download all the files to your hard drive or view them through your browser.

Special Weekend Deal

This weekend I'm selling the entire package for a discounted price of $7. The price will go up to $12 on Sunday at midnight.

You can also buy a limited edition USB card that contains not only the lecture package but also all of my previous books. The 4GB card is re-usable and has my signature on the back. The price for the card is $53 (shipping included to anywhere in the world). Only 36 cards are available for sale in this weekend's promotion. A total of 150 of the cards were made, meaning that it will probably be worth millions after I die.

While you wait for the card to arrive in the mail, you will receive instant access to the lecture online along with downloadable links to all my books.

Order The State Of Man

Click one of the following links to continue:

- Learn more details about the speech
- Order online lecture package for $7
- Order USB card and get online access to lecture and books for $53

I'll be online all weekend so email me if you have a question or a problem with downloading. A special thanks goes to everyone who came to the lectures this summer. Maybe we'll do it again next year.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Vladimir Putin Is Russia’s Proto-Tsar

October 24, 2015 | by Mark Citadel | Link | Original Link

No discussion of contemporary geopolitical problems seems complete without mentioning the great white east. And indeed, no discussion about Russia seems complete without mentioning Vladimir Putin. Since the end of the years of excessive plundering by the post-Soviet Yeltsin regime, a former obscure KGB agent who rose in the political ranks like a star, has held direct or indirect control over the largest nation on earth.

Putin has done this by rotating his position of presidency with that of his devoted underling, Dmitri Medvedev. He was first elected to the highest office in 2000, and won re-election in 2004. After a stint as prime minister, he was re-elected president again in 2012. Due to a constitutional change, the next Russian elections will take place in 2018, and if victorious once more, Putin will have served the longest term as Russian head of state besides Stalin… that is, since the end of the Russian monarchy in 1917.

It’s no secret of course that the West despises Putin, but not for the reasons you might think. While much has been made of his former KGB status, his statements on the collapse of the Soviet Union, and appreciation of Communist geopolitical history, Vladimir Putin is probably as far away from a red as we're likely to see, short of actually wearing the crown that Lenin's revolutionary squads trampled in the early part of the last century.

The Cold War is long over, and few people fear the fading remnants of its losing side, from the blacked out wreck that is North Korea to Bulgarian chain-smokers in their eighties, waxing poetic about the glory of the "internationale."

What the West does fear is real leadership, the kind that can somehow bypass the degenerative internal divisions of democracy, and put a population of almost 144 million at least somewhat behind their "sovereign." According to the West, the only leaders the world needs are the nameless masters of international, globalist order. Nations and old conceptions of empire are relics of the past. We are one world now, and the liberal left is to lead that world out of its dark history. This is why real leaders terrify the Western elites.

More than a politician

Vladimir Putin hasn't presented himself as a politician at all. Politicians don't pose with tranquilized tigers, or descend to shipwrecks in submersibles like Bond villains. Politicians don't have entire youth organizations devoted to them, with merchandise bearing their faces on street corners, made by the vendors' own free will in response to real demand.

Increasingly, Putin has been presented under the ambiguous title of "leader," and that is an accurate description. For all the chittering about oppression, propaganda, and a "motivated opposition," the fact is that Russia doesn't see any more of this kind of thing than many Western countries do, and certainly on a minuscule scale compared to unpopular dictatorships. Putin has more in common with the Sultan of Brunei than he does with Bashar Al Assad.

Under his leadership, Russia has reconquered a section of land that is extremely historically significant to the nation, namely Crimea, and has re-asserted itself on the global stage as a world power rather than a fading empire in the mold of the United Kingdom. Whether it is in Syria or Eastern Europe, he continually outfoxes his rivals, and comes off looking better for it in the eyes of neutral nations who have never been fully content with the status quo pecking order. He excels in making liberal presidents and prime ministers look weak and effeminate.

There is a certain magnetism to male leadership which can foster an undying loyalty, and it is this kind of male leadership which is rendered impossible via customary democratic procedure. One could in fact argue that democracy itself is a feminine procedure, and so it is no surprise that Putin and his ideological brethren have been steadily dismantling it.

While it is unlikely that Putin will ever don the regal title of monarch, he is currently laying the groundwork for such formal autocratic rule in Russia. This process is only encouraged by the increasing effeminacy and weakness of the decaying Western world. What sane leader wouldn't take advantage of such a thing? You can bet the Chinese leaders have similar designs to exploit the weakness of the current global elite, though likely through sneaky plundering of third world countries.

If Putin is the new face of the familiar "anti-West" or "anti-Atlanticist" powers, then it should be noted during his tenure that this bloc has succeeded where previously it was in shambles. Credit this to masculine vs. feminine principles, or just smart geopolitics as you will.

The return of Ilyin

Ivan Ilyin (1883 – 1954)

Ivan Ilyin, a dissident scholar banished from Russia after the Bolshevik Revolution, was no fan of democratic processes:

> Every citizen is secured the right to crooked and deceptive political paths, to disloyal and treasonous designs, to the sale of his vote, to base motives for voting, to underground plots, unseen treachery and secret dual citizenship- to all those crudities which are so profitable to men and so often tempt them.

Ilyin's body of work is highly popular within the Kremlin, as is the work of Eurasianist ideologue and prominent geopolitical critic Aleksandr Dugin, who borrows from the familiar Traditionalist school of René Guénon and Julius Evola. Though it is fair to say that oligarchic exploitation and opportunism are still the order of the day in Russia, there is a stirring current beneath the surface, an ideology to counter the West's "liberal enlightenment values."

When Russians speak of the glory of the Soviet Union, they are really speaking of the glory of the Russian Empire, the Third Rome. Whereas previously most governmental focus was on keeping the economy stable and tackling internal terrorism, now there are programs to combat low Russian birthrates, designs on foreign conquest and alliance, a build-up of military forces, and the liquidation of Russia's "liberal" left who have been denounced by Dugin as a "fifth column."

The philosopher who makes Glenn Beck cry

Because of the well-executed lobbying of those who want Russia to become a reactionary world power, laws have been passed against non-traditional sexual propaganda (infuriating the West), abortion rates may be cut in half by tough new measures on clinics, and the Russian Orthodox Church has gained back the regalia of a state institution even if not yet its old judicial power.

These changes are not oligarchic in their origin and in fact they often conflict with entrenched financial interests. Instead, they are imperial, royalist, and aristocratic. They are the resurgence of the values which animated the Black Hundreds, the last tsar's fanatical and violent loyalists.

Of course, Putin's co-operation with this ideological current has brought him problems which the Yeltsin presidency never faced. He has fallen afoul of America's toughest president, Barack Obama (note the sarcasm), and the Eurocrats, yet still he persists, not like a politician but like a king. Why? Because he can. Slowly, the advantages brought through economic and technological progress are being broken upon the rocks of an inevitable cultural Darwinism, and when this occurs, the trajectory of a state's values becomes far more important than its GDP. Strong cultures survive. Weak ones die.

Vladimir Putin has not asked for the loyalty of Russians in his venture to ensure their survival, he has seized their loyalty. The people of Russia, those present in the Priobskoye oil fields and the streets of St. Petersburg where he was once first deputy mayor, those who sleep in the earth the victims of war, famine, and revolution, and those yet to be born: they are with him, for although he is far from the tsar they hope for, he is the masculine leader who points them back to the three principles which have grounded Russia for almost all of her history. No amount of communist brainwashing could sever them from these: Orthodoxy, Autocracy, and Nationality.

Read More: Why Vladimir Putin May Be The Last Guardian Of Traditional Values

Mark Citadel
Casual observer of all things in motion.

Canada’s Gamergate-Hating Prime Minister Learned Feminism From His Gold-Digging Mother

October 25, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> The things we see online, whether it is issues like Gamergate, or video games misogyny in popular culture, it is something that we need to stand clearly against.
>
> — Justin Trudeau, the newly elected Prime Minister of Canada

In yet another sign that we may as well replace many democracies with monarchies led by champagne socialists, the liberal, extraordinarily privileged, and “I can be anything to everyone” son of a former Canadian Prime Minister has now become Prime Minister himself.

Justin Trudeau has a truly atrocious ideology, including taking potshots at Gamergate as he talks about how his unaccomplished, famous-by-spreading-her-legs mother raised him to be a feminist. With promises of huge budget deficits and making up for nine years of his Liberal Party being out of government, Trudeau’s win marks the most diabolical political shift in Canadian history.

For nearly a decade, Canada had put its trust in the Conservative Stephen Harper, an affable half-technocrat, half-kind uncle with an economics degree. This was an achievement, as Canadians have been fed a leftwing political diet of “The government can give you everything you want” for about a century. Now they have reverted back to Canada’s traditionally dominant Liberals, led by Trudeau, whose former profession as a high school teacher says more about his ability to excite a kind of national classroom (especially with his appearance) than actually build the school or run it.

His mother, a tabloid-seeking, leg-spreading gold-digger and drug smuggler, taught him about feminism

> Yes, Yes. I am a feminist. Proud to be a feminist. My mom raised me to be a feminist.
>
> — Justin Trudeau describing the woman most famous for marrying a Canadian Prime Minister and talking about how she cheated on him with Ted Kennedy.

Rocker Mick Jagger once described Margaret Trudeau as a “very sick girl,” alluding to her pathological interest in high-status men besides her husband Pierre.

I have no personal animosity towards the mother of this new Prime Minister, who is also the ex-wife of the late Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau. But Margaret Trudeau is no one to celebrate. She perfectly encapsulates how women marry into fame, wealth or status and then derive everything they have from that marriage (and the man they marry).

Trudeau junior’s mother met his father when she was just 18, a few years before his first stint as Prime Minister. She married when she was 22 and her groom was 52. Pierre, a notoriously hard worker regardless of what you might say about his policies or ideology, had spent his life eking towards the profile and station that Margaret could reap the rewards of immediately. Exactly what Margaret could teach Justin about feminism is a complete mystery, other than fucking your way into high society.

Befitting her complete lack of experience in life, Margaret hated how her husband had to work so often, as if she was somehow hard done by with the life of privilege virtually no one ever gets and those who do must spend their lifetime waiting for (after their own hard work, too). She hid drugs in the Prime Minister's travel bags, destroyed a piece of artwork she didn't like in Pierre's official (and publicly paid for) residence, and fucked Ted Kennedy, among others.

It is impossible to find anything about her remotely worth emulating. Tragically, she makes Princess Diana look like a self-made heroine of the ages. When the Trudeaus finally divorced, Margaret discovered (shock horror!) that she didn't have the requisite skills to forge an alternative career. So, instead, she gave exclusive interviews about her domestic life and juicy details about her adulterous and other sexual liaisons. She repeated this high-brow process by becoming an author, not about female trailblazing but female sexual activity as a means of social mobility.

Justin Trudeau also threw two uncharged and non-convicted male colleagues under the bus

"Is it time to pander to the female vote by throwing two uncharged, non-convicted guys out yet?"

Those familiar with my earliest ROK articles might remember my excoriation of Trudeau for his white knight expulsion of two formerly Liberal members of the Canadian House of Commons, Scott Andrews and Massimo Pacetti, from his party. Both men were roasted over the fire of an unparalleled witch-hunt for months and their political careers have been all but destroyed.

Two female members of the left-of-center New Democratic Party claimed they were victims of sexual assault at the hands of Andrews and Pacetti. In Pacetti's case in particular, the stigma he faced was truly Orwellian. The female politician he had sex with had handed him a condom.

Of course, if this tidbit of providing a condom had not been known, there remained no objective evidence to even possibly quarter-prove that the alleged assaults took place, undermining Trudeau's shocking decision to expel. Unsurprisingly, Andrews and Pacetti, who have not had the most basic police report filed against them, let alone been convicted by a court (including those observing a watered-down standard of proof–aka female testimony–never found in other categories of criminal trials), had their names and supposed actions paraded across the Canadian media.

The accusers, however, were granted typical anonymity and conveniently said they were "re-victimized" by having the story go public. As usual, this is another way to avoid proper, objective examination of grossly unchallenged claims.

When perpetuating a dynasty means more than governing the country

Trudeau's trying to be this guy.

It's no secret that enough Canadians hated fiscal rectitude for Stephen Harper and his friends to have the reins of power stripped from them. Meanwhile, Justin Trudeau has appealed to every clichéd or mainstream leftwing ploy (most notably the wage gap farce and supposedly entrenched Canadian racism) and then some of the even battier SJW talking points, such as Gamergate.

Throughout it all, he has raised his heavily sluttified and now thankfully mummified but living mother to some kind of feminist sainthood. She has no personal achievements worthy of national mentioning and nothing but a lifetime of fame only by marriage, sex, and pregnancy with high-ranking men.

Like an D-grade version of the already discredited Camelot fantasy of JFK in the United States, Justin Trudeau will project any image he can to paint himself as Canadia's liberal savior. And for that reason Canada should be deeply, deeply scared.

Read More: 7 Pictures That Show Women With Rich Men Is About More Than Gold Digging

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Last Chance For “The State Of Man” Special Deal

October 25, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You only have a few hours left to order the lecture video and transcript package at $5 off the normal price. You can instantly watch the video online or download it to your hard drive. Here’s a new excerpt from the lecture:

The special edition USB cards have sold out.

Click one of the following links to continue:

- Learn more details about the speech
- Order online lecture package for $7

Email me if you have a question or a problem with downloading.

What’s Next?

I’ve released only two books with new material in the past three years. I’m feeling the pendulum swing back to book writing so I have two projects planned:

1. Memoir of what happened in Canada. This summer was the most interesting of my life. I would like to tell the complete story in a book and also immortalize my whupping of Canadian feminists. The draft is already done. Estimated arrival: summer 2016.

2. My last game book. I want to write one final book of game that details all that I've learned since writing Bang (2007) and Day Bang (2011). I'll continue to give game advice here and there, but nowhere near the level of the past. Estimated arrival: early 2017.

My misadventure in media publishing taught me that I'm more of a writer and connector than a businessman. Most men get value from my ideas, advice, and ability to organize high-value men in moderated communities. This tells me to focus on books, blogging, ROK, and RVF while minimizing trivial distractions. The only issue is that writing books when I only had one blog to update is far easier than writing books when you have multiple platforms to maintain with the enemy at your front door. I remember leaving my corporate job because I didn't want to work too much, but now I'm working more than I ever have. Thankfully it's work that I enjoy and care about.

I'll have more to say shortly about where I see the future of the world heading (spoiler: it's bleak). In the meantime we'll resume tomorrow with three blog articles a week. Thank you for continuing to support my work.

This was originally posted on my personal blog.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

New Forecast Says 160,000 Immigrants Will Seek Asylum In Sweden This Year

October 25, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

With every day that goes by, thousands of immigrants from Africa and the Middle East pour into Europe. So far, there seems to be no end in sight to this record-breaking refugee crisis. And the crisis is hitting Sweden hard.

According to a new prognosis by the Swedish Migration Agency, 160,000 immigrants will seek asylum here in 2015, more than double the amount that was estimated a few months ago. The lowest estimate is 140,000, while the highest is 190,000. 29,000 to 40,000 of the asylum seekers are “unaccompanied children.”

To give some context to these numbers, Sweden has around 9.8 million inhabitants. The total number of asylum seekers yearly is steadily increasing, from 43,887 in 2012, to 54,259 in 2013 and 81,301 last year.

Total number of asylum seekers, from 2012 to October 2015. Chart made by the Migration Agency.

So far this year, about 100,000 persons have come to Sweden to seek asylum, more than ever before. This number surpasses the forecast made in July, which predicted that "only" 74,000 would come during the whole year. This is due to the vast increase of immigrants entering the country since the end of summer. During October, the Migration Agency has registered over 9,000 asylum applicants per week.

Magdalena Andersson, Minister of Finance.

Staggering costs

More immigrants means the Migration Agency will need more money. Comparing with the July prognosis, the funds needed for next year has nearly doubled, from 31 to 60,2 billion SEK. For 2017, immigration will cost the treasury 73 billion SEK.

The new prognosis forces the left-wing government to prioritize. Some of its goals will likely not be achieved—like Sweden having the lowest unemployment rate in the EU by 2020.

"This growth in costs is not sustainable," said the Minister of Finance at a press conference this Thursday. The government will plug the holes in the budget by cutting expenses in other programs, taking loans and increasing the national debt, and using funds that would otherwise go to foreign aid.

Immigrant homes burning

While the immigrants keep coming, their living facilities are under attack. Several homes for asylum seekers have been damaged and set ablaze this year.

It's difficult to get a good overview of how many fires there has been. One news outlet counts to fifteen different incidents connected to these facilities between March and October. But new fires seem to be erupting every day.

On Thursday, another building that was supposed to become a home for refugees was torched. The police found that someone had broken a window and poured gasoline into the cellar. This incident and several other fires are being handled as arson cases, perhaps set by some of the more militant individuals who do not wish to see others enter their country to leech off of the government.

"This is not the Sweden we know. Not the Sweden I'm proud of," says Prime Minister Stefan Löfven.

Building tents

The Migration Agency is having trouble finding housing for the immigrants. The situation is getting desperate. By the end of the year, between 25,000 and 45,000 accommodations will be missing.

Immigrants have already been placed in churches, warehouses, and gym halls. Now the agency is forced to set up camps with tents for the asylum seekers to live in, while also considering turning some of the 65,000 bomb shelters in Sweden into living quarters.

Next fall, tents will be ready for 30,000 immigrants or more.

“If this development continues month after month then we will reach a point when we cannot longer manage it,” says the Minister of Justice and Migration.

Unsustainable development

Time for Prime Minister Stefan Löfven to face the crisis.

The minister said it best: this development can’t be sustained in the long run. If this trend doesn’t turn around soon, the system will collapse at some point.

It could happen sooner than one might think. If the latest prognosis showed double the number of immigrants as the previous one, who can say that the next forecast won’t double the number again?

The left-wing government seems to be waking up now to the fact that money doesn’t grow on trees, and houses don’t build themselves. Immigration costs, and a lot of immigration costs a lot.

It’s actually pretty simple, and everybody can understand it regardless of political preferences. But leftists have been able to fool themselves for a very long time. Now the results are in, and the politicians are getting desperate.

No easy way out

But there are no easy solutions to this issue, at least none that can be considered realistic. Getting into this mess was easy, but getting out will prove much harder. Populists on the left want the borders to be completely open and all immigrants to get help, while the far right wants borders to be shut entirely. The first option is obviously not financially viable, while most Swedes still see the second alternative as morally repugnant.

Reality is hitting the government hard now, and the situation is spiraling out of control. We can only imagine what this may lead to.

Read More: Why Does Sweden Take In More Immigrants Than Other Nordic Countries?

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

Why Is There A Prolific Jewish Presence In The American Feminist Movement?

October 26, 2015 | by Harlan Blackwood | Link | Original Link

In the 1970's, a movement known as "Jewish feminism" started in the American Jewish community. It was a movement that originally sought to make Jewish woman ~~superior to~~ equal to Jewish men. One of the first major issues tackled by these feminists was the power to ~~optimize hypergamy~~ initiate divorces.

Perhaps these Jewish ladies were becoming jealous of the growing "liberation" of non-Jewish women in United States. Perhaps Jewish women, for cultural reasons, are more naturally attracted to the ideologies of feminism. Jewish writer Marjorie Ingall describes how Jewish women are receptive to feminism by quoting Jewish feminist Naomi Wolf:

> We have a political history going back to the socialist and labor movements, where women were organizers and rabble-rousers.

Or perhaps many Jewish women truly were being unfairly oppressed in certain areas of life and wanted to take action.

Third-Wave feminist Naomi Wolf

A quick Wikipedia search for “list of Jewish feminists” brings up an admittedly incomplete list of 114 names. Most of the women listed were born in the 20th century. The Jewish Women’s Archive website is a comprehensive website dedicated to key Jewish feminists, containing 1,193 profiles.

If one simply searches for “list of feminists” on Wikipedia, the page you’re directed to contains 770 names dating all the way back to the 13th century. The most comprehensive database when searching google for “list of feminists” seems to be Wikipedia.

Let’s be as fair as possible here and assume that the Wikipedia list of 770 feminists contains no Jewish feminists. So let’s add the 114 Jewish feminists to this list to get a total of 884 Wikipedia worthy feminists. We then take 114 divided by 884 and multiply by 100. The percentage of Wikipedia reported feminists of Jewish descent comes to 12.9%.

However, this quick calculation doesn’t take into account the Jewish Women’s Archive of 1,193 noteworthy feminists of Jewish descent and assumes that none of the feminists on the Wikipedia list of 770 are Jewish (when in fact many are). Also, the list of 770 feminists dates back several hundred years, whereas the list of 114 Wikipedia Jewish feminists is mostly 20th century and beyond.

Jews make up 1.7-2.6% of the American population. As such, to have adequate proportional representation in the feminist movement, there would only have to be two or three Jews at most for every 100 American feminist leaders. This doesn’t seem to be the case though, at least according to a simple internet search.

On a related note, we also need to keep in mind that disproportionate Jewish representation is also present in the US Congress – 8.4%, the Supreme Court – 33% or 3/9 Justices, the Federal Reserve Board of Governors – confirmed 40% or 2/5 current members (Janet Yellen and Stanley Fischer are Jewish and are also the Chair and Vice-Chair of Federal Reserve Board of Governors), and higher level academia.

Ginsburg, Kagan, and Breyer are the three Jewish Supreme Court Justices

The "Jewish feminism" that started within the Jewish community seems to have become part of the bigger feminist movement taking place in America. Thus, the very small demographic of Jewish women in this country (roughly 1% of the population) seems to have a ridiculously large representation within the overall feminist movement.

Let's explore only a few of these very influential feminists of Jewish descent:

Prominent Feminists of Jewish Descent:

The Key Players, Radicals, And Movement Leaders:

Judy Blume: Born 1938. Blume is an American writer with a target audience of children and young adults, with book sales over 80 million. She has written novels about racism, menstruation, divorce (It's Not the End of the World, Just As Long As We're Together), bullying, and masturbation.

Judith Butler: Born 1956. Butler is a "gender theorist" and a philosopher. She teaches at the University of California, Berkeley. Butler has written a book called Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity that was published in 1990. This book is considered the cream of the crop by many feminists when it comes to "queer theory" and "postmodern poststructural feminism" (whatever that means).

Andrea Dworkin: 1946-2005. Many of you guys have probably heard of Dworkin. She was a radical feminist. Dworkin, among other things, was vehemently anti-porn because she said it has links to rape. This is somewhat ironic, considering there is heavy Jewish influence in the pornography industry.

Radical feminist Andrea Dworkin

Shulamith Firestone: 1945-2012. Firestone was apparently schizophrenic (according to a commemorative piece in The New Yorker published after her death) and was also a key player in the formation of radical feminist ideals. She was the author of The Dialectic of Sex: The Case For Feminist Revolution which was published in 1970. This book has essentially been labeled as the boldest and clearest book ever written on radical feminism. Or, according to Naomi Wolf (another Jewish Feminist):

> No one can understand how feminism has evolved without reading this radical, inflammatory second-wave landmark.

I certainly hope Naomi Wolf didn't know that Firestone was schizophrenic…

Betty Friedan: 1921-2006. Friedan is a very big name in feminist circles. She was a leading figure of the women's movement. She was a writer, an actor, and an ardent feminist. Friedan wrote The Feminine Mystique, published in 1963, a book which many argue helped to spark second-wave American feminism. By the year 2000, the book had sold over 3 million copies.

Brenda Howard: 1946-2005. Howard was an important figure in setting the tone for the present day LGBT rights movement, especially when it came to organizing SJW rallies. She was a sex-positive feminist and a bisexual rights activist.

Manosphere readers will appreciate a quip made on July 27th, 2005 by Tom Limoncelli (a bi-sexual rights advocate):

> The next time someone asks you why LGBT Pride marches exist or why Gay Pride Month is June tell them 'A bisexual woman named Brenda Howard thought it should be.'

If Limoncelli wasn't clear enough as to just how much influence this woman had, how about this statement made by Brenda Howard's partner Larry Nelson and published on June 17th, 2014 in a piece called Remembering Brenda: An Ode To the 'Mother of Pride':

> You needed some kind of help organizing some type of protest or something in social justice? All you had to do was call her and she'll just say when and where.

Erica Jong: Born 1942. Jong was a teacher and an author. She has been divorced three times but is now married again (this seems to be a common theme among these women). She wrote a sexually controversial book published in 1973 called Fear of Flying that played a big role in second-wave feminism. The book has sold over 20 million copies worldwide.

Gloria Steinem: Born 1934. Steinem's mother was apparently not Jewish, but even so her name pops up on the Jewish Women's Archive website if you search for it. Steinem was the leader and spokesperson for the late 60's-early-70's feminist movement. Interestingly, Steinem admitted having ties to the Central Intelligence Agency on camera (yea, the CIA of all people), but she supposedly broke her CIA ties before she became a feminist leader. You'll have to travel further down the "rabbit hole" if you want more answers on this one.

Gloria Steinem throwing up that "silly Illuminati pyramid thing that all the celebs do"…

Naomi Wolf: Born 1962. Wolf was a political advisor to Bill Clinton and Al Gore. She is an author and a journalist that has covered the topics of abortion and the Occupy Wall Street movement. Wolf has essentially become the spokeswoman of third-wave feminism (the term "third-wave feminism" was coined by Rebecca Walker, a woman who identifies herself as black, white and Jewish) Wolf also just had to write about how Nazi Germany came to power in her book The End of America. If you want some entertainment, check out this YouTube video where Wolf tries to explain "why we need feminism" but is totally destroyed on stage by anti-feminist YouTuber Karen Straughan.

Jewish Feminists In The Media

Larisa Alexandrovna: Born 1971. Alexandrovna was managing editor of Investigative News at The Raw Story for about three years. She was a blogger for the Huffington Post and her own blog as well. She has reportedly had her work referenced in Rolling Stone magazine, Vanity Fair, and Newsweek.

Lisa Bloom: Born 1961. Bloom is the only child of Gloria Allred (another feminist listed below in this article). She, like her mother, is an American civil rights attorney. She was the anchor on truTV's In Session from 2001-2009. Bloom is a legal analyst for The Today Show and also contributor to NBC Nightly News and MSNBC.

Susan Estrich: Born 1952. Estrich is a political commentator for Fox News, a feminist advocate, political operative, author, professor, and a lawyer. She wrote a book published in 2005 called The Case for Hillary Clinton. (oh, great)

A "fair and balanced" report from Susan Estrich.

Jewish Feminists In Entertainment, Art, Erotica, And Pornography:

Mayim Bialik: Born 1975. Bialik is an American actress and also a neuroscientist. She played Dr. Amy Fowler on CBS's The Big Bang Theory. This is an interesting coincidence, as an article was published right here on ROK about the blue pill ills of The Big Bang Theory.

Hanne Blank: Born 1969. Blank is a historian, writer, editor and also a public speaker. Blank has written and edited erotica in the past. She believes in "fat rights" (fat acceptance).

Judy Chicago: Born 1939. Chicago is an artist, art educator, and does collaborative art instillation pieces of "feminist art." She collaborated with her third husband (here we go again with the multiple husbands theme…) to create The Holocaust Project: From Darkness into Light (1985-1993).

Eve Ensler: Born 1953. Supposedly, only Ensler's father was Jewish, but she did grow up in a Jewish community and was given the Lion of Judah Award by the United Jewish Communities in 2002. Ensler is a playwright, performer, feminist and activist. She is best known for writing the famous 1996 play The Vagina Monologues. For any college students reading this, it wouldn't surprise me if a rendition of The Vagina Monologues showed up on your campus at some point; it showed up on my campus and was hosted by the campus feminist organization in 2011.

Sarah Michelle Gellar: Born 1977. Gellar is a producer and an actress, starring or playing supporting roles in a plethora of TV shows and movies including Buffy the Vampire Slayer, I Know What You Did Last Summer, Scream 2, and as Daphne in Scooby Doo (2002).

Sarah Michelle Gellar plays her role in Scooby Doo

Nina Hartley: Born 1959. Hartley is an American author, sex educator, sex-positive feminist, pornographic film director, and American pornographic actress. She has been recognized with numerous awards throughout her career. She did an interview on "The Young Turks" and was introduced as "legendary" by Cenk Uygur. She apparently was known as "the best ass" in the business in her days of youth and specialized in lesbian scenes. Check out her Young Turks interview on YouTube.

Hartley's case struck me as somewhat more interesting because it has been suggested by many people that the Jewish community has a powerful influence on this nation's pornography industry. Dr. Nathan Abrams, a Jewish Professor at Bangor University in the UK has essentially said that the Jews were the driving force behind the modern day porn industry. In fact, he even wrote a piece about it in Jewish Quarterly called "Triple-exthnics."

Dr. Nathan Abrams

Jewish Feminists In The United States Government And Legal Realm

Bella Abzug: 1920-1998. Abzug was an American lawyer, U.S. Representative, social activist, and a leader of the Women's Movement. She helped to found the National Women's Political Caucus with Gloria Steinem and Betty Friedan. Abzug also did women's rights work under Presidents Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter.

Gloria Allred: Born 1941. Allred is an American civil rights lawyer and commonly takes high profile cases. She has been involved in many women's rights cases including representing at least seventeen women who have accused Bill Cosby of sexual assault, harassment, or other misconduct.

A gay couple celebrates with Gloria Allred (middle) under a chuppah after being granted a marriage license in California in 2008

Shulamit Aloni: 1928-2014. Aloni was an Israeli politician and founder of the Ratz party. She was also a leader of the Meretz party and served as the Israeli Minister of Education for a year. She won the Israel Prize in 2000.

Although Aloni isn't an American, I chose to include her because of the following exchange that took place in a 2002 interview with American journalist Amy Goodman; During this short video, Aloni explains that charges of anti-Semitism are "a trick we always use" to suppress criticism of Israel coming from within the United States. If the criticism is coming from Europe, Aloni suggests that "we bring up the Holocaust."

Ruth Bader Ginsburg: Born 1933. Hopefully all American readers recognize this name. Ginsburg is an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, appointed by Clinton in 1993. I highly recommend all readers review her voting record on social issues.

Elena Kagan: Born 1960. Hopefully, American readers will recognize this name as well. Kagan too is a Jewish feminist and an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. She came into power under Obama's Presidency. This article on feminist.org reveals her confirmation was in fact endorsed by a feminist majority back in 2010.

Elena Kagan in 2009 – She is now one of the most powerful judges in America

Jewish Feminists In Education And Academia:

Rachel Adler: Born 1943. Adler is the Professor of Modern Jewish Thought and Judaism and Gender at Hebrew Union College (the Los Angeles campus). She reportedly played a key role in integrating feminist perspectives into Jewish texts.

Rebecca Alpert: Born 1950. Alpert is a professor in the Departments of Religion and Women's Studies at Temple University. She is currently serving as the Senior Associate Dean of the College of Liberal Arts.

Daniel Boyarin: Born 1946. He holds dual US and Israeli citizenship (Sound familiar to any US politicians? Click here or here for more info on the dual citizenship of many US government officials). Boyarin has been a Professor of Talmudic Culture at the University of California, Berkeley since 1990.

Susan Brownmiller: Born 1935. Brownmiller is an American feminist, journalist, author, and activist best known for her work Against Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape published in 1975. She supposedly argues in the book that because rape is defined by men, women get shafted (not necessarily in those words, and no pun intended).

Feminist Author Susan Brownmiller

Aviva Cantor: Born 1940. Cantor is an American journalist, author, lecturer, and advocate of feminism and Jewish communal life. She helped fund a Socialist Zionist organization called "Jewish Liberation in New York" in 1968.

Hélène Cixous: Born 1937. Cixous is a professor, poet, writer, playwright, philosopher, etc. She was appointed as A.D. White Professor-at-Large at Cornell University from 2008-2014.

Jane Evans: 1907-2004. From 1933-1976, Evans was the Executive Director of the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods (which is now known as the Women of Reform Judaism). Jane Evans was also the President of the National Peace Conference in 1950. I encourage all readers check out the Women of Reform Judaism website and review their statements on the immigration crisis in Europe and other "social justice" issues.

Susan Faludi: Born 1959. Faludi wrote a book published in 1991 called Backlash: The Undeclared War Against American Women. She also wrote a book analyzing the 9/11 attacks and how they supposedly reinvigorated an American environment that is hostile to women.

Feminist Author Susan Faludi

Ilana Gliechbloom: Born 1986. Gliechbloom is a Judaic studies teacher at Abraham Joshua Heschel High School in New York City. She has made notable appearances at (surprise, surprise) The Vagina Monologues.

Susannah Heschel: Born 1956. Heschel teaches Jewish Studies at Dartmouth and is an American author. Her published works include Insider/Outsider: American Jews and Multiculturalism and On Being a Jewish Feminist.

And speaking of Jewish multiculturalism and massive illegal immigration, listen to what Barbara Lerner Spectre (a Jewish woman) had to say about multiculturalism in European countries in this 2010 video. I would say that after watching this video, you must ask yourself "Is it a coincidence?" that Spectre's thoughts match up nicely with the views of Women of Reform Judaism, described above.

Paula Hyman: 1946-2011. Hyman taught Jewish History at Yale University. She was the first female dean at the Seminary College of Jewish Studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary from 1981 to 1986. Hyman published many feminist oriented works.

Conclusions

This has been merely a shallow dive into the depths of Jewish involvement in American feminism. Sure, anybody can log on to Google and come up with all kinds of names of non-Jewish feminists (simply because non-Jews make up about 98% of the population); but I don't see how any reasonable person can objectively deny the fact that Jews are indeed over-represented in the feminist movement.

In the last half-century (roughly), Jewish feminists have involved themselves in every level of American cultural infrastructure including the government, justice system, media, entertainment, education and books, and even the porn industry – verifying the information presented here and following the links of this article will make this stunningly obvious.

Jewish women make up roughly 1% of the entire American population; and yet a relatively large percentage of the most powerful and influential second and third-wave feminist leaders off all time are Jewish.

Bella Abzug photographed in 1978 with New York Mayor Ed Koch (left) and President Jimmy Carter

Is it simply a cultural imperative that drives so many Jewish women to take part in feminism and culturally destructive policymaking? Some would argue it may simply be a consequence of an IQ difference that drives Jews to excel and fill leadership positions.

Others make the claim that disproportionate Jewish involvement in politics is part of a more organized conspiracy to intentionally destroy the moral fabric of mostly white, traditionally Christian societies. I'm not here to answer "the reasons why," but rather to simply point out the obvious disproportional representation of Jews in the feminist movement.

It is generally agreed upon in the manosphere (at least hopefully it is by now…) that feminism is a tool that is being utilized to destroy the family unit and to get females into the work force, which generates more tax dollars and benefits corporations and politicians through mindless consumption.

I know this is a difficult subject for some, and can even create cognitive dissonance, but the reality is becoming nearly impossible to objectively deny that Jewish influence has the lion's share of control over second and third-wave feminism, even though Jews represent only a tiny fraction of the American population.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The Damaging Effects Of Jewish Intellectualism And Activism On Western Culture

Harlan Blackwood

I look forward to hearing constructive criticism, questions, and thoughtful ideas.

One Man Rebels Against A Sexual Consent Class In The UK

October 26, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

An October 24, 2015 article on the BBC's website highlighted the sad dynamic between the radical left and the remaining pockets of resistance to its feminist-centric ideology in the West. It has something to tell us about thought control, the boundaries of acceptable discourse, and the enforcement of ideological correctness.

George Lawlor, a 19-year old student at the United Kingdom's University of Warwick, received a Facebook invitation to a "sexual consent" class. Had this been America, he most likely would have bowed his head in unthinking obeisance and shuffled his feet dutifully to the class for his indoctrination lecture.

But "consent" classes are still somewhat new in UK universities, and Lawlor chose to react as any normal, free-thinking man would. He was outraged. He called the very idea of such a class "loathsome" and "the biggest insult I've received in a few years."

Welcome to the New World Order, George.

He even published a short article on why he felt this way. Consider these choice comments:

> Let me explain, I love consent. Of course people should only interact with mutual agreement, but I still found this invitation loathsome. Like any self-respecting individual would, I found this to be a massive, painful, bitchy slap in the face. To be invited to such a waste of time was the biggest insult I've received in a good few years. It implies I have an insufficient understanding of what does and does not constitute consent and that's incredibly hurtful. I can't stress that enough.
>
> Self-appointed teachers of consent: get off your fucking high horse. I don't need > your help to understand basic human interaction. Secondly, go and do something. Real people need your help and they deserve better than you. Next time you consider inviting me or anyone else to another bullshit event like this, have a little respect for the intelligence and decency of your peers. You might find that's a more effective solution than accusing them of being vile rapists-in-waiting who can only be taught otherwise by a smug, righteous, self-congratulatory intervention.

Ah, how refreshing it is. One is comforted to know that there are at least some men with functioning genitalia left in the US-UK university system. Perhaps George should be giving classes to the chickenshit, gutless university administrators who foist such "classes" on us.

But that is a topic for another day.

At this whiff of resistance to the dominant ideology, the commissariat moved quickly first to do damage control, and then to the offense. According to the UK's National Union of Students, there is "a need" for consent "education," due to the fact that "one in seven" students claim to have been "raped."

George Lawlor

This lie is, of course, nothing new. The feminist-SJW clique has been peddling the rape mythos for so long now that hardly anyone dares question it.

What should focus our attention is this excerpt from the BBC's article, a quote from Susuana Amoah, the NUS's Women's Officer (and I'm sure she has a cushy, do-nothing government job in her future):

> NUS Women's Officer Susuana Amoah says consent courses cover legal aspects of consent as well as social situations and general sexuality education…
>
> Amoah admits there's no hard evidence that the classes, which are more common in the US but spreading rapidly in the UK, reduce the incidence of sexual assault – but she chalks this up to patchy reporting of these incidents on campus.

And herein lies the reality. By making "consent classes" embrace "general sexuality education," they are rendered so broad as to subsume just about anything. According to Ms. Amoah's logic, having to go to a "consent" class is acceptable because it covers other things as well.

Well, then, maybe we should append a "consent" class to the tail end of a physics lecture. Or maybe download it into a computer programming course. Or maybe do a performance-art version of a “consent” class in a theatre guild. Why not?

But, sorry to say, even this misses the point. Lawlor, Amoah, and the NUS are simply pawns on the chessboard, guided by hands unseen. The goal of it all is to enforce a certain paradigm useful to the ruling cliques. This little experience of Mr. Lawlor has nothing to do with “consent” (everyone already knows what it is), but everything to do with the requirements of power.

They don’t want to educate you on consent, George. They want you thrash you into obedience, to make you fear them.

The real issue here is one of power and control. The commissars who set up and put on this little “consent” pantomime are concerned with neither education nor truth. They are concerned with intimidation, power, and enforcing the reigning ideology.

Even George doesn’t really see this yet. Oh, but he will, I am sorry to say. George does not understand that he is being groomed for indoctrination to an ideology. He will eventually be expected to mouth its platitudes, genuflect to its altars, and rush to its defense in times of peril.

Systems of power and control behave this way. Attendance in a “consent” class is an indication of one’s willingness to submit to indoctrination. This is what matters, not the NUS’s fraudulent data about consent.

Historian Toby Green chronicled this pedagogy of coercion and intimidation brilliantly in his exhaustive work of history Inquisition: The Reign of Fear. In Iberian societies coming under the Inquisition’s control, no deviation from doctrinal orthodoxy could be tolerated. It cast a shadow over the lives of all citizens of Spain and Portugal, using imaginary bugbears (“heresy” or “impiety”) to enforce a uniform standard of thought.

Women are being indoctrinated to fear men and see sex as a power equation

This is why many historians count the Inquisition as among the first modern institutions. The modern feminist-SJW hack functions in the same way: through tireless repetition of threadbare mantras that have nothing to do with truth, yet everything to do with control.

Over time, this type of enforced ideology does great damage: it prevents the forward movement of ideas, the free interchange of knowledge, and dulls the sensibilities of the population.

If you think I’m exaggerating, consider Rebecca Reid, described by the BBC as a “feminist commentator from the Daily Telegraph." Once she got wind of this story, she had some choice words of her own. She actually thinks we need more classes, not less:

> But instead of eliminating them [consent classes] completely, Reid says she'd like consent education spread more widely across the university curriculum.
>
> 'If a university is going to work against sexual assault then in the first week when they talk to you about being careful where you put your money and looking after yourself, not getting meningitis, not using the neighbour's bins – that's the moment to take 15 minutes with all the young freshers (first-year students) to lay down the law and to make a clear point about what is and isn't acceptable.'

Meaning, of course, "laying down the law" to all of the young men that if they even think about stepping out of line from feminist-SJW talking points, they will be expelled from school with no due process, or falsely accused of rape.

This, of course, is the real agenda.

And coercion—whether real or just implied—can be depressingly effective, at least in the short term. Even our own brave George Lawlor seems to have backed down from his original position.

He has said that he plans to attend one of the classes. "I think it's only right and fair that if I criticize something I have to experience it. But I don't feel as if I need it, I feel that I have to go because I've written about it."

I winced when I read that last quote. One need not "experience" every evil to know it is evil. You need only life experience and a sense of history, and then you will know.

Read More: Four Reasons To Be A Lifelong Renter

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Is It Racist To Celebrate Columbus Day?

October 26, 2015 | by Rock Thompson | Link | Original Link

Every single year on Columbus Day and Thanksgiving, people blow up my Facebook feed with anti-Columbus and anti-white posts and comments. The general message that is relayed is tantamount to “White = Bad” “Natives = Good”. It’s ok to have an opinion, but we must point out that often that opinion has rose-colored lenses and completely ignores history.

I know that some of you reading will completely shut down and call me a racist and a bigot. If you are one of those that are easily “triggered”—this essay isn’t for you. This essay is for the intellectually and historically honest person that wants to put Columbus Day into a historical perspective….

In fourteen hundred ninety-two Columbus sailed the ocean blue.

He had three ships and left from Spain;
He sailed through sunshine, wind and rain.

He sailed by night; he sailed by day;
He used the stars to find his way.

A compass also helped him know
How to find the way to go.

Ninety sailors were on board;
Some men worked while others snored.

Then the workers went to sleep;
And others watched the ocean deep.

Day after day they looked for land;
They dreamed of trees and rocks and sand.

October 12 their dream came true,
You never saw a happier crew!

"Indians! Indians!" Columbus cried;
His heart was filled with joyful pride.

But "India" the land was not;
It was the Bahamas, and it was hot.

The Arakawa natives were very nice;
They gave the sailors food and spice.

Columbus sailed on to find some gold
To bring back home, as he'd been told.

He made the trip again and again,
Trading gold to bring to Spain.

The first American? No, not quite.
But Columbus was brave, and he was bright.

523 after the fact, people tend to believe that the Americas was a beautiful land full of rainbows, love, happiness, and peace-pipes which the Europeans ruined, but what was actually happening in the Americas in and around 1492?

Aztecs

> The Aztecs believed that all the gods were appeased with human blood and sacrifice and hundreds of thousands of men and women were ritualistically sacrificed in this belief. What is more troubling is the mass graves of very young children and infants that have been found to have been murdered. Victims hearts were cut out, disremembered, eaten and skinned with priests wearing their victims freshly flayed hides in gory feasts and festivals. There are ample written records of every form of torture having been performed by the Aztecs on their Captors. [source]

Scholars estimate that upwards of 50,000 people a year where sacrificed at the temples.

Incas

> The ancient Inca chose children as young as 6, but also as old as 15, “fattened them up” for a year and sent them on a sacrifice pilgrimage….. in the moment of the sacrifice children were semiconscious. Some children may have been left to succumb due to exposure to the cold. But others had a horrific death: scientists found vomit and diarrhea on their clothes, pointing to a violent death. The vomit contained the hallucinogenic drug achiote, also encountered in the stomach and feces. They were likely to have been asphyxiated, the body being crushed by their clothes, so strongly that the ribs and pelvis were sometimes broken. The bodies of the sacrificed children were mummified by the dry cold of the Andes, including hair and inner organs. In fact, Inca children represent one of the best naturally cold preserved mummies. [source]

13 Year Old Mummified Inca Child Sacrifice

Maya

> The deliberate taking of a human life was deemed necessary to sanctify certain ritual occasions, such as the ascendancy to the throne by a new ruler or the dedication of a new building…The usual method of such a sacrifice was decapitation in a public ceremony. Aside from decapitation, the favored method in Postclassic times was a trick acquired from the Mexican cultures to the north, the removal of the heart. Women and children were sacrificed just as often as men The intended victim was stripped and painted blue before being led to a courtyard or temple where the victim would be placed face-up over a convex altar-like stone also painted blue. The arms and legs of the victim were held by specially designated priests while a fourth, called the nacom, would penetrate the victim’s chest with a flint knife just below the left breast. Reaching inside the chest cavity, the nacom would pull out the still beating heart and hand it to another priest, who would then smear the blood on that idol to which the sacrifice had been made. If the sacrifice had taken place on the top of a pyramid, the corpse would be thrown to the courtyard below where priests of lower rank would skin the victim except for the hands and feet. The skin would then be worn by the officiating priest who would solemnly dance among the spectators. If the > victim had been an especially brave warrior his body might be butchered and eaten by the nobles and other spectators. [source]

Pawnee People

> The Skidi Pawnee practiced human sacrifice, specifically of captive girls, in the "Morning Star ritual". They continued this practice regularly through the 1810s and possibly after 1838, the last reported sacrifice. They believed the longstanding rite ensured the fertility of the soil and success of the crops, as well as renewal of all life in spring. The sacrifice was related to the belief that the first human being was a girl, born of the mating of the Morning Star, the male figure of light, and Evening Star, a female figure of darkness, in their creation story. [source]

The Comanche

The Comanche were considered one of the most violent and aggressive Native Tribes in all of North America, routinely practicing slavery and torturing their victims should they be so unlucky as to be captured or lose a battle:

> S C Gwynne, author of Empire Of The Summer Moon about the rise and fall of the Comanche, says simply: 'No tribe in the history of the Spanish, French, Mexican, Texan, and American occupations of this land had ever caused so much havoc and death. None was even a close second.' He refers to the 'demonic immorality' of Comanche attacks on white settlers, the way in which torture, killings and gang-rapes were routine. 'The logic of Comanche raids was straightforward,' he explains. 'All the men were killed, and any men who were captured alive were tortured; the captive women were gang raped. Babies were invariably killed.' [source]

They were infamous for their brutal and inventive tortures, a favorite was to "stake out the victim"

> He was stripped of his clothing, laid on his back on the ground and his arms and legs, stretched to the utmost, were fastened by thongs to pins driven into the ground. In this state he was not only helpless, but almost motionless. All this time the Indians pleasantly talked to him. It was all kind of a joke. Then a small fire was built near one of his feet. When that was so cooked as to have little sensation, another fire was built near the other foot; then the legs and arms and body until the whole person was crisped. Finally a small fire was built on the naked breast and kept up until life was extinct. [source]

“Native History” an untold story.

Conclusion

The reason why I bring this up is because I am a first generation American. I have had nothing to do with America’s Past. I didn’t own slaves. I din’t oppress anyone. I didn’t sacrifice anyone. And I didn’t march in any anti-minority rallies. However, because I happen to be white, minority groups immediately assume I am guilty of something—and believe me, I’ve experienced my fair share living in Alaska.

Fact is, America is a country of immigrants, most of whom were never slaves, never oppressed anyone, and do not owe anyone any apologies. Yes, Columbus and other Europeans did bad things.

So, has every significant other cultural group in North and South America.

The reason why Columbus Day should be celebrated is that he represents an ideal and an inspiration for allowing the creation of a country that worked hard, shed hundreds of thousands of lives to unite people and give them a better life.

The United States of America no longer has slavery, no longer has human sacrifices, no longer discriminates blatantly against minority groups, and by every arguable standard represents a better and more equitable society than in 1492.

So, in the future, celebrate Columbus Day with pride and remind those that have rose-colored glasses to kindly take them off.

Read More: What Happens When Colombia Meets Columbus

Rock Thompson

Rock Thompson
Rock was originally born in the Soviet Union and immigrated legally to America when he was young. He now watches the Decline of America and the Rise of Russia from his igloo in Alaska.

What Will Be The Next Great American Perversion?

October 27, 2015 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

We've witnessed how the gay agenda was successfully pushed over the past 10 years by the Left. The gay lifestyle has been mainstreamed and popularized in the media. Gay marriage is now legal in every state by decree of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Left has been roundly successful pushing the gay agenda, so much so that I would wager you would be hard-pressed to find a woman under the age of 40 against gay marriage.

More recently, we've seen Bruce Jenner lionized as a hero for deciding to become Caitlyn. The Left is now closing the noose on the transgender issue and is mopping up resistance, excoriating those who refuse to recognize Bruce Jenner as female and refer to him as Caitlyn. So what comes next? What will be the Next Great American Perversion?

I used to believe that legalizing gay marriage would lead to legalizing polygamy. Many people in opposition to gay marriage used this slippery slope argument. On its face, it makes sense. It is a logically structured argument: if requiring marriage to be between members of the opposite sex is an arbitrary convention, specifying the acceptable number in the arrangement must also be arbitrary.

If defining marriage as between one man and one woman is discriminatory on the grounds that is specifies the gender of the parties involved, then it must also be discriminatory for specifying the number of parties involved. And if we are not allowed to question whether two men or two women can really love each other, then how can society decide that a man is incapable of loving more than one woman at a time?

Moreover, just as gay marriage advocates like to claim that homosexuals have always been with us and that they are just now free to step out of the closet, so too has polygamy been part of civilization since antiquity. It certainly predates monogamy. Gay advocates also like to cite the cruelties visited upon them at the hands of society (the Stonewall Riots in response to police harassment and Alan Turing's suicide after being forced by the British government to undergo hormone therapy as "treatment" for being a homosexual come to mind) as reason for the importance of contemporary acceptance and tolerance.

The Mormons, on account of their practice of polygamy, were treated far worse than homosexuals. The Mormons lost their spiritual leader, Joseph Smith, to mob violence. They were literally banished from society: they were shunned and driven out. That is why they had to embark on a sojourn all the way to the Utah desert. The Mormons have a long list of legitimate historical grievances against American society.

But while legalizing polygamy might be logical, it will not happen. Why? Because polygamy is the personification of patriarchy. It is patriarchy on steroids. Polygamy involves a man who is so successful that he can sexually, emotionally, and materially provide for multiple wives. Polygamy allows a man to adopt the ultimate reproductive approach, combining the best elements of r- and K- mating strategies. He has the multiple partners and number of offspring consistent with an r-mating strategy, but has the resources and involvement (instilling his values, ensuring a religious upbringing, home schooling) to lavish on his offspring consistent with a K-mating strategy.

Moreover, look at how the polygamist lifestyle is portrayed in the media. Whenever a woman commits adultery, it's always her husband's fault: he worked too much, he didn't stay in shape for her, he didn't make her feel special, he wasn't attentive enough to her needs. The media would have us believe that a husband is unable to sexually, emotionally, and materially satisfy even one wife. So how could he possibly provide for multiple wives?

The Lifetime Movie Network recently debuted a new series, "Escaping Polygamy." Additionally, witness the general derision and scorn heaped upon the Duggars and the men of Duck Dynasty, who — while not polygamist (or even Mormon) — embody the core attributes of polygamy: a strong family patriarch, a large, self-sufficient family, and women (wife, older daughters, etc.) whose primary focus is on child bearing and rearing. The unequivocal message is that no woman would voluntarily enter into a polygamous relationship, and that if a woman does happen to find herself in one, she was coerced, is being held against her will, and desperately wants to escape.

So what is next?

So if polygamy isn't the Next Great American Perversion, what is? There have been a few cracks in the firmament and a few rays of light have leaked through, giving us a glimpse into what the Left has in store for society. In the past few months, the Left has been testing the waters, gauging societal response to two new and exciting perversions: cuckolding and pedophilia.

On July 16, 2015, New York Magazine published Michael Sonmore's article, "What Open Marriage Taught One Man About Feminism," in which the author recounts how he is openly accepting and supportive of his wife taking other lovers while also insinuating that he is a better man for it and that if other men are not similarly accommodating of their wives, they are not as enlightened.

Then, on September 21, 2015, Salon published Todd Nickerson's article, "I'm A Pedophile, But Not A Monster," in which the self-confessed pedophilic author recalls – in a disturbingly fond and vivid manner – his molestation as a child at the hands of a trusted adult. He goes on to paint pedophilia as just another sexual orientation or preference.

My inclination is to bet on the Next Great American Perversion being cuckolding. I can see this perversion gaining traction, promulgated under the guise of female liberation. It fits the current cultural narrative perfectly: it empowers women while simultaneously emasculating men. Female sexuality is already celebrated, à la "The Vagina Monologues." Women are already encouraged to sexually experiment in their 20's to "determine who they really are and what they like."

With females outnumbering men at university and out-earning them (through affirmative action and preferential hiring, retention, and advancement policies) in the workplace, more and more women will be the primary breadwinner. This will lead to more men becoming “house husbands,” staying at home with the children while Mommy goes off to her high power corporate job. Such a situation will naturally and inevitably lead to the wife becoming disillusioned with her husband and losing respect for him. And once respect is lost, so too is sexual attraction.

Some readers may raise the question why the next perversion will not be something more equitable like swinging (partner swapping). Why not? The same reason why it is already infinitely easier for single women to find partners for casual sex. Any single woman, whenever she wishes to, can have casual sex by going down the street to the local night club or by logging into a dating app like Tinder. The same can’t be said for the average single man.

And this dynamic does not improve with marriage. If anything, it worsens, as many men will find their social network greatly reduced in size upon marriage, while the woman maintains and even manages to expand hers. This means it will be the female who will be in a position to seek out and take lovers and it will be the already economically marginalized and emasculated male who will feel compelled to give his support.

While it is impossible to predict what the Next Great American Perversion will ultimately be, we can be certain that the Intelligentsia will not stop at gay marriage and transgenderism. There is never any rest for the wicked.

Read More: What Will The Next Great SJW Hysteria Be?

Waldemar Pabst

29 year old academic, right of reactionary

3 Reasons Why Only Unmasculine Men Vote Democrat

October 27, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Emasculation mixed with extreme masochism is the best way to describe those men who opt for Democratic candidates in local, state, gubernatorial, congressional, and presidential elections. By basically every measure, Democrats regard the most trivial issues for women (such as Twitter "abuse", manspreading, and mansplaining) as more important than the most significant issues for men (male suicide, homelessness, overrepresentation as victims of violence and many others).

In objective terms, voting Democrats only benefits those men who can publicly capitalize on defining themselves as a liberal, including authors, public commentators, Hollywood celebrities and others who need clear and incontrovertible self-promotion. And this itself depends on substituting one's own self-interest for the health of the American nation.

This all said, cuckservatives exist in growing numbers. They and even proper conservatives are not blameless, far from it, for standing by and giving declared leftists significant room to eviscerate society. The engine rooms for stigmatizing men, however, are Democratic electoral and legislative offices, Democratic rallies and all manner of other breeding grounds for the Democrats' pathological hatred of masculinity.

Lobbied by SJWs, whose demonstrations attract a minuscule number of people, the DNC and its representatives continue to make decisions that unabashedly demonize 50% of the population, most notably heterosexuals of Caucasian descent.

1. Democrats blame men for the state of American finances but court female and minority votes with welfare programs and privileges

There's no point taking a current photograph of the National Debt Clock. It's always rendered outdated less than a second later.

America is broke. End of story. With debt at over 100% relative to GDP, all that happens every time Congress avoids a debt crisis is that the proverbial can is kicked down the road. Democrats conveniently blame men, the male leadership class or (male) Wall Street bankers, forgetting that the biggest accelerant of the gargantuan US national debt has been the debilitating welfare programs initiated by liberals. The zealous faithful following the DNC Donkey have mollycoddled for years entire demographic groups with the promise of an ever flowing welfare tap.

The problem is not just that the Democrats have sucked in millions over decades to try and pursue their catastrophic policies. They have also tragically primed many in multiple generations to seek the instant gratification of welfare and spending via massive public deficits. Democrats win elections on the basis of training their targets to never care about the United States in 20 years' time. Much or most of the population is unwilling to forgo rewards now to escape disaster or ruin in the future. The teat must keep on flowing, they scream, and much like Pavlov's Dog, they salivate when Democrats ring the welfare bell.

While women of all races can play the (single) motherhood, domestic violence, and workplace discrimination cards to claw many more advantages, men of color are institutionalized into thinking that the old white capitalist and patriarchal society is against them and only the government, not their own drive and skills, can save them from abject poverty. The juxtaposition of "we believe in you, black men of America" and "but you need our support all the time" has the effect of the latter dominating and then totally eclipsing the former. Democrats need victims and they must continually create them or maintain them.

2. Democrats treat every white male as a beneficiary of immense privilege and a potential violent oppressor

Or so SJWs say…

Ignoring the vast socio-economic disparities between different Caucasians in America, Democrats play the perennial race card of white privilege, particularly for white men. Many white people, especially young students, even get a kick out of constantly emphasizing how they are unfairly privileged. This may bode well for people happy to participate in the further regression of society (or those pursuing lucrative political or SJW careers) but it speaks volumes about a growing bigotry against individuals just because they have a certain skin hue and biological sex.

If Democrats feel this way about what is a majority of men, it says enough already about why only emasculated men vote for them. According to this narrative, girls like Malia and Sasha Obama are bigger victims and non-beneficiaries of privilege than a Scots-Irish-descended trailer-park dweller in the Florida Panhandle. In less dramatic comparisons, the daughters of the American middle-class receive a cut-out pass to label themselves as eternal victims while the sons of white blue collar workers who didn't finish high school supposedly gained a winning lottery ticket at birth.

Hitherto untouchable white SJW feminists are already finding themselves on the receiving end of the "Shut up, I'm a woman who's a person of color" slingshot. To cover their bases and maintain SJW unity after an overextension that is now biting them in the ass, expect that white and other feminists will shake off many of their previous inhibitions about drawing in larger numbers of non-white male targets. And this means you if you or your recent ancestors were named Jose, DeMarcus, Ming or something similar.

3. Democrats support finding a man guilty of rape by SJW academics without a trial

It is shocking to think that Democrats like Senator Kirsten Gillibrand have sons. They support the ability of universities to publicly find someone to be a rapist without a trial and have them kicked out of college, ruining their lives.

Was your neighbor accused of dodging his taxes last year? He had to face a court. Was his wife accused of shoplifting? She had to face a court. In countless American universities, however, self-congratulating academics and other officials have handed down rape "conviction" after rape "conviction," fully supported by a vast majority of Democratic representatives in almost every state legislature and certainly in the US Congress. This legal anomaly, coincidentally, only affects men, at a time when responses to surveys are perceived as findings of fact about rape.

Despite men not being sent to jail over college "convictions," the consequences for those caught in the web of Orwellian pseudo-jurisprudence are bleak. "Guilty" defendants are thrown out of their degrees and expelled for perpetuity, exposed to a lifetime of professional blacklisting, and constantly in fear about the next exclamation of "Rapist!" Time and time again, this reality is brushed aside by the Democratic Party.

The people who fill so-called college rape tribunals come from the same crowd of folks pumping out patently false theories that all women are oppressed by all men, that society itself oppresses all women and that all men are beneficiaries of rampant male privilege, from the Walmart cashier earning eight dollars an hour to the billionaire tycoon raised in poverty.

It is terribly unsurprising that Democrats would support this mob, as every faulty university craze from the wage gap myth to the idea of systemic police brutality against African-Americans is picked up by the DNC and used as a template for crafting their purported policies.

The modern Democratic Party is an existential threat to men and the United States

…or just avoid voting for them…

In their endless quest for an era of total dominance over the Republicans, Democrats have ignored any concept of national interest in favor of politics itself. Aside from a gated elite, men and male interests are regarding as pawns to be used in keeping their power.

When the race card is exhausted, guaranteeing the votes of black and Latino men and women, the DNC and its agents move to the gender card, knowing that their minority male voters and self-loathing white male voters have already been inculcated sufficiently and will not shift.

One of the easiest ways to practice using your masculinity is to not support the party constantly trying to emasculate you.

Read More: Why American Men Should Refuse To Vote

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

25 Tweets From #BringBackThePatriarchy That Show The Tide Is Turning

October 28, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

When I first started writing for Return of Kings less than a year ago, I thought that we were in for a long, hard battle against the corrosive forces of modern society: feminism, socialism, multiculturalism, and the social justice warriors that make it all possible. The indoctrination is so entrenched in every level of society that I believed it would take a lifetime to knock it out.

I still think the battle is going to be a difficult one, but some amazing things have been happening on Twitter recently that make me feel that the battle will not be as long as I had initially thought. The latest example of this phenomenon is the #BringBackThePatriarchy hashtag.

Fatherhood

The hashtag started trending on Twitter on October 25th. The earliest tweets emphasize how important fatherhood is to children:

Cora de Vil @CoraStevenss · Oct 25

#bringbackthepatriarchy and teach our sons to be men.

RETWEETS 110 FAVORITES 129

4:41 PM - 25 Oct 2015 · Details

The Deadlock Victim @DeadlockVictim · Oct 25

#BringBackThePatriarchy Because children need fathers.

RETWEETS 46 FAVORITES 51

4:10 PM - 25 Oct 2015 · Details

Other tweets point out what happens when fathers become weak or when they are absent:

Feminism’s Effect On Women

Western girls are indoctrinated with the belief that feminism is a good thing because it provides women with choices that they lacked under the traditional patriarchal system. Thanks to feminism, we are told, women now have the choice of whether or not to be virtuous, whether or not to become mothers, and whether they become worker drones or stay-at-home moms. How could anyone oppose feminism? It seems so reasonable.

However, the people who were tweeting under #BringBackThePatriarchy pointed out the dichotomy between what feminism promises on paper and how it actually affects the lives of women.

For example, there have been some changes in dating:

Feminism has also had a tendency to make women less attractive and less feminine. Ironically, I think the best example of this was a tweet that was posted to criticize the supporters of patriarchy. I think you will agree that it inadvertently provides yet another argument in favor of patriarchy:

This tweet nicely captures what feminism means to women in one picture:

When women are diverted away from their natural instinct to nurture children, they end up nurturing animals in their place.

Beautiful Girls

Many of the tweets highlight the differences between the ugliness of most ardent feminists with the beauty and femininity that is associated with more traditional girls.

fin_lander @fin_lander · Oct 25

If you want daughters to have joyous, gratifying lives then #BringBackThePatriarchy. Feminism ruins girls' lives.

61 61

#BringBackThePatriarchy because have you ever met a happy childless woman over 40?

Jason Bergkamp(VG14) @keksec_org · Oct 25

#BringBackThePatriarchy because it's traditional and Christian values that's what really frees the woman.

46 56

Neomasculinity

Other tweets brought out the deleterious effects of feminism and progressivism on men and issue a call to return to true masculinity.

Critical Spooking @officialCritDis · Oct 25
#BringBackThePatriarchy Because a strong man in charge is the ultimate form of security for a woman & her children.
16
22
4:38 PM - 25 Oct 2015 · Details

Critical Spooking @officialCritDis · Oct 25
#BringBackThePatriarchy Because civilization wasn't built by soft men in skinny jeans, but rugged men in armor.
58
69

Alt Right @_AltRight_ · Oct 25

#BringBackThePatriarchy

1920: Man worked, woman stayed home & raised 5-10 kids

2015: Both work, can barely afford 1-2

110 106

RAMZPAUL @ramzpaul · Oct 25

#BringBackThePatriarchy confident man. Adoring wife and mother. No obesity. No diversity. Happy kids and nation.

89 109

Mary Whittier @WhittierPal · Oct 25
#BringBackThePatriarchy because REAL men know the REAL meaning of the word "Hero"
HERO:
This is Chris Mintz, a HERO who was shot while saving innocent lives
NOT a hero:
This is a man who wears dresses. NOT a hero
VANITY FAIR
56
59
4:20 PM - 25 Oct 2015 · Details

Reaction Against Migrants

Along with the criticism of feminism, the #BringBackThePatriarchy tweeters also came out against the plans of Western leaders to replace their white populations with third world immigrants.

Down With AntiWhites @prowhitesunite · Oct 25

#bringbackthepatriarchy Because these guys would never let muslims rape their women.

Conclusion

While #BringBackThePatriarchy was just a Twitter phenomenon, it is still important because it indicates we are in Stages 2 and 3 in the process of bringing back patriarchy. Campaigns like this reach out to men and women who might privately question feminism, multiculturalism, and the progressive narrative, but who are afraid to step out publicly for fear of being called misogynists or racists. It lets them know that there are other people out there who share the same views.

It can also lead them to discover the existing networks like Return of Kings and RVF, and begin implementing the principles of neomasculinity, thus further weakening the current system.

The existence of the campaign means that men and women are beginning to wake up. They are beginning to see that the progressive narrative that we have been fed for the past 50 years ultimately leads to unhappiness. Our progressive elite leaders believe that this is a fad that will eventually burn itself out. I believe they are wrong. Once a person sees the tissue of lies that undergirds the progressive narrative, it is not possible to go back to believing them.

There has been a small crack in the edifice of the prevailing narrative, but it is only a crack. It doesn't mean that we have won or that we can relax. On the contrary, we have to take advantage of the opportunity by recommitting ourselves to living the principles we hold dear. We have a lot of hard work ahead, but it is gratifying to see that glimmers of light are appearing so soon.

Read More: The Quality Of Modern Movies Signals Our Cultural Decline

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

4 Reasons You Should Consider Getting A Tattoo

October 28, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

The subject of tattoos and whether or not they help attract women comes up in the ‘sphere every now and again. By and large, most men don’t seem to feel strongly one way or the other.

There are the occasional “you don’t put a bumper sticker on a Ferrari” people and the “tattoos are an ancient art and a form of individual expression” crowd, but from what I’ve seen and heard over the years the vast majority of people fall somewhere in the middle.

Personally, I’m heavily in favor of skin ink and there are many, many reasons. This article, however, will cover the four that pertain the most to our readers.

4. It doesn’t hinder you professionally (if done correctly)

[image]

No, this doesn’t mean that if you have facial or neck tattoos you can waltz into a Fortune 500 Company and expect to be taken seriously as a candidate as a CEO or an executive.

But if you’re talented enough and good enough at your job, your bosses won’t think twice when you show up to the company picnic rocking a t-shirt revealing a few tatts.

Sure, they may do a double take and it may raise a few eyebrows. But in 2015 tattoos are more commonplace in the professional sector than ever. Employers have figured out that talent is talent regardless of a couple reasonable tattoos or piercings.

[image]

Eliminated from any white collar job

Don’t get me wrong, I’m not saying you can show up looking like this guy and score a six figure income and a cushy office job (though there are industries that couldn’t give two shits about how you look so long as whatever you bring to their company pads their bottom line).

But so long as you keep it reasonable and your skin scars are easily covered up with regular work clothes your employment prospects won’t suffer…

…in the white collar world anyway. As far as blue collar jobs are concerned, I’m fairly certain that we’re all aware that anything goes.

3. If you have a good artist they look great

There are many people who argue that getting tatted up ruins your body, and there are many examples out there that make it hard to argue against them.

If your tattoo guy is a dude who does this as a hobby and inks you up in his mom’s basement with second hand equipment, you’re asking for trouble. You could have the coolest tattoo idea of all time but it doesn’t do you any good if your artist sucks.

A good, reputable tattoo artist makes all the difference in the world. Hell, even silly tattoos look great if your artist is rock solid. Sure, you’ll definitely pay a lot more but like everything else, you get what you pay for.

2. It’s a rite of passage (of sorts)

There are plenty of skin ink detractors out there but I'd bet the farm that a lot of them are just scared of the pain. I could be wrong but I doubt it.

Tattoos hurt…badly. And anyone who says they don't is lying to you. Going under the needle for any amount of time isn't easy. People like myself who've spent dozens of hours in that chair know the sense of accomplishment (and relief) we feel when any given session is finally over.

Okay, so maybe enduring an American tattoo parlor isn't quite as intense, painful, or as time consuming as other cultural ritualistic tattoos like the Yakuza. But that doesn't make it a walk in the park either.

Getting through any period of time when a needle is penetrating your skin hundreds of times a minute is difficult and there are no two ways about it. Pushing one's self beyond their normal threshold of pain could be prove to be a turning point in one's life.

1. Tattoos arouse women

Notice I said “arouse” and not “attract.” The things that make a man attractive aren’t the same things that moisten the panties of females.

Women want to marry the man who owns a condo in the city, a house in the suburbs and drives a Mercedes. But they want to fuck the tattooed dude who rides a motorcycle, financial instability be damned.

Argue all you want but the truth is the truth. Hot chicks get soaking wet over men with skin ink and that’s just all there is to it. This doesn’t mean they don’t get turned on by guys without tattoos, but trust me when I tell you your SMV will spike when you go under the needle.

In today’s sexual marketplace tattoos represent edginess, fearlessness, and raw masculinity. Sure, there are a lot of dudes walking around with tattoos who are none of those things, but their presence definitely opens doors with the opposite sex and gets their attention.

The key is to learn game so that when a girl strikes up conversation about your tatt, you can capitalize on the opportunity your ink created for you.

Conclusion

I’m sure there are perspectives all over the map on this one, and I’ll be very interested to see the comments section.

What I’d really like to find out is how life has or hasn’t changed as a result of getting some ink. Did you get better with women? More opportunities? Did people treat you or look at you differently?

Read Next: 5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Why Facebook Is Emasculating And How To Stop It

October 29, 2015 | by Devin Stone | Link | Original Link

After a period of self-directed tough-love and personal introspection on the nature of happiness and the brevity of life, I decided that my Facebook feed had to die the True Death. There is the obvious reason why someone would want to cut back on his Facebook usage, namely that it is a perpetual black hole for one's time and attention. Facebook is a productivity vacuum, and while that fact seems to be lost on millennials, it is clear to me that my fellow gen-Y and gen-X'ers are well aware of it.

However, I believe there are deeper and more troubling reasons why we should seek to eliminate or mitigate our use of mass-social media platforms like Facebook: namely, that Facebook is a dehumanizing, emasculating, left-liberal-politically-correct-groupthink-Orwellian-nightmare. Here's why:

It's Dehumanizing

I was musing about Facebook with a close friend over a nice Thai food lunch. “You, know there’s something troubling about Facebook,” I said. “What’s that? He asked.”

“Well… it’s something very subtle. It creeps up on you. But before you know it, Facebook becomes your real life. It’s like if you didn’t post it, it didn’t happen. It’s like what Howard Beale said in the movie Network. Just replace his comments about television with Facebook, the fantasy is real life and your own life is somehow unreal. You find yourself constantly comparing what happens to you in your real life with Facebook… Facebook becomes your unconscious ‘mental basecamp’ of what your real life is.”

“Yeah exactly,” he said.

“I was at a party with some friends,” I told him, “and he had this really cute dog there, so I must have spend a few hours playing with the dog, dog-lover that I am. But in the back of my mind I kept thinking that it lacked some form of validity… it didn’t really happen until I somehow proved it to the world by posting a picture of it on Facebook. So I did, in the hopes that I would get ‘likes’ – but seeking likes is the same as seeking emotional validation from other people.”

A person who continually seeks emotional validation from others is called a codependent. Meaning, when we use Facebook and try to get “likes,” our sense of emotional validity is no longer our own, it no longer comes from inside us. Facebook is dehumanizing because, as in my personal example with the dog, enjoying the dog and my friends that were presently there wasn’t enough for me.

Experience can never be archived, preserved, or duplicated. Emotions cannot be conveyed digitally. On Facebook, we replace any true emotional connection with others in the form of “likes.” This is eerily reminiscent of Orwell’s system of Newspeak. “Double-plus good,” in Nineteen Eighty-four, was an attempt to quantify and roboticize the unquantifiability of man’s spiritual and emotional nature.

It’s hideously reductive.

Zero likes and my emotional experience was not validated. Two likes and I might feel a little more validated. Twenty likes and I am super-duper popular and allow myself to feel validated (as if I had to earn it). No machine can quantify the archaic, sensual, and deeply emotional nature of a human being, but somehow we find a system that attempts to do so comforting and relaxing. If we were to focus on the fleeting nature of life’s moments and savor them for what they are, this would be a frightening experience for us. Life’s emotions are personal and our moments are wholly unique and temporary – that’s being human, and that’s too frightening of a mystical and spiritual truth cope with, so we get to work documenting things and seeking emotional validation from the other prisoners of The Matrix.

It’s A Perpetual Left-Liberal Groupthink Tank

Another downside is that we see what our friends’ political beliefs and value systems look like. Social media: the home-turf of left-liberal and feminist mob psychology. Your friends can’t help but post and repost the latest left-leaning news article about feminism or the “scientific infallibility” of vaccine safety or global warming. Most people don’t think – they react and get angry. If you disagree, you might find yourself friendless, jobless or worse.

Just look at the case of the Minnesota dentist Walter Palmer – a man who had his career destroyed and his reputation ruined because his hunting behavior offended a morally ruthless and self-righteous digital mob. Killing a lion (who was gifted with the anthropomorphic name “Cecil”) in an area where lions were not an endangered species launched an explosion of sentimentalist outrage.

I’m a libertarian in the strictest sense of the word, however if I wish to enjoy the company of other people, I have found it necessary to enjoy others for who they are, and find other points of common interest upon which to form an equitable relationship. This is especially true with my left-leaning family members. I think this is a fine stance to take – we might not agree on political or philosophical issues, but we can still enjoy each others’ companionship on a multitude of other levels.

My philosophy of “mutual respect on all matters political when with friends and family” is not always returned in-kind. At what was intended to be a nice outing for burgers and beer, a friend (let’s call him “Bob the Liberal”), flung himself in to the restaurant and squashed his body into our booth in a sullen fury, cell-phone in hand. He didn’t waste any time meeting or greeting the rest of us with smiles, hellos or small-talk.

“[Friend X] is a fucking psycho! He’s a fucking fucker! I can’t deal with psychos. I’m gonna fucking block him,” said Bob.

“What’s wrong?” I asked.

“It’s my fucking friend [Friend X], he’s a former military guy. Figures. He’s saying it’s no big deal that Cecil the Lion got killed?! Look here.”

Bob thrusts his iPhone under my face. Bob’s “evil military friend,” whom I have dubbed [Friend X], wrote a comment on Facebook in response to a post about Cecil the Lion. He stated something that was similar to what I would have said, although he didn’t get the details quite right. Essentially, he said that if lion hunting were more legal, the conservation authorities would step up breeding to accommodate the demand and lion populations would increase.

Bob felt differently. He then pointed an accusatory finger at me, “EVEN YOU have got to agree with me on this one.” He took a moment to take a bite of a huge, greasy, medium-rare cheeseburger that he had ordered.

“You know, there are people who would tell you the same thing about the cow you indirectly killed to eat that burger,” I said.

“Oh they’re crazy. There are people who are crazy on both sides, obviously,” he responded. How conveniently the moral-absolutism of the left twists and slips about to suit one’s personal tastes. Facebook gives another wide-reaching platform for these logically inconsistent thoughts.

It’s Orwellian

Now I’ve digressed from my initial point. Facebook is a forum that encourages us to act the part of Big Brother. Bob’s friendship with [Friend X] was probably a fruitful relationship, until every thought and sensibility that [Friend X] had was on display for everyone to see. Because Facebook is home-base for a left-leaning political correctness, [Friend X] risked being “un-friended” (that’s a bit newspeak-sounding, isn’t it?), “un-followed” or otherwise distanced by my other “friend.”

Did you say something in jest once that someone could have construed as “racist,” “misogynistic” or “insensitive?” Did #HeforShe make you feel undermined, targeted and downright icky as a man? Best to not say anything…

Perhaps Orwell was wrong about one thing. It is not that “Big Brother” is watching us, well the NSA certainly is in that capacity, but perhaps the bigger danger is the leftist-collectivist mob that are now empowered by technology and play the part of “Big Brother” on a communal basis, by calling-out and black-balling anybody that offends their tastes.

Facebook makes it difficult for you to tell who your friends really are because it forces us to judge people based on quantifiable data. [Friend X] who suggested that lion-hunting was a-ok has now blackballed himself as a “horrible person,” but in real life, he’s probably a great guy. The feelings that someone gives you can’t be transmitted via this medium, so we have only a digital resume, of sorts. Remember that your “Facebook friendship” is now the primary indicator of what your “real friendship” is. Real life is secondary in validity to your digital life, at least that’s the way Facebook would like it to be.

If the digital resume offends us, we might question our friendships – this might be a good thing or a bad thing, but I hate the idea that Facebook is driving these decisions instead of in-person, human-to-human interactions. It is obvious that Zuckerberg and the folks at Facebook are aware of this, and thus we have the function of “lists.” Here’s an example: You would like to validate your relationship with your wife by broadcasting a photo of you sharing a kiss with her while on your Alaskan cruise. The problem is that you don’t want your in-laws seeing the photo because you secretly hate them.

A super-smart usability expert over at Facebook managed to take note of this “user story” (that’s what they’re really called in the web industry) and implement a feature to take care if it: specialized posting lists. All you have to do is categorize your family as “family” (people you only share Christmas shit with), and friends as “close friends” (cool people who are just as addicted to FB as you are), and some “acquaintances” that you don’t want to insult by “un-friending” but otherwise don’t care if they lived or died.

As Facebook’s popularity rose to the point of becoming the digital home-base and validation-station for first-world life, Facebook users demanded that the digital platform be capable of managing the complexities of human interaction. Oops. Now the super-simple platform was growing more and more complicated by the day. “There are things that I want some people to see but not others.” “Oh fuck,” says the female college student, “I posted something to the wrong list and now my mom knows that I wore a slutty Halloween costume!” “Oh fuck,” says the skateboarder, “The cops read my post about trading a dime bag of weed for a hit of ecstasy in the park and they arrested me!”

Telescreens, anyone? Facebook knows your face. It picks you out in photographs you didn’t even take or post. It knows where you’ve been. It probably knows where you are at this moment. It’s fucking creepy. But hey, everybody’s doing it!

Due to the fact that you will have different types of relationships with people, you must commit a fair amount of your Matrix time to managing the Matrix itself, because the Matrix can cause real social and even legal consequences for you. It's not a harmless toy anymore. Your real life is your Matrix life, and you work for it. The events of your life did not really happen unless they are archived in the Matrix. Your thoughts are continually referencing how and when and what experiences and emotions should be posted, boasted, vented and validated on the Matrix. The Matrix has you.

It's Emasculating

What would Conan the Barbarian do? I would imagine that he would take an axe to an iPad or two. Sheryl Sandberg made a video about how men need to do the dishes equally alongside women, and your Facebook feed made sure you saw it, or at least heard about it via in-stream ads and reposts. Gay marriage is federalized (yay, more federal control over relationships!) and your buddies start adding rainbow-colored filters to their selfie-pics. Are you a homophobic bigot for not jumping on the bandwagon? Did you fear that your friends might perceive you that way? Hillary is running for president, and it just so happens that you're seeing lots and lots of propaganda about the "gender income inequality gap."

Do your Facebook pseudo-friends know that this is a statistical red-herring, and that women do, (give or take about $1) earn as much as men in the same careers, but that women pick different careers than men? You might want to ask this in a Facebook post, but you might lose a few friends in the process, so pick your poison. Stick by your principles or sit by in frustrated passivity?

A Philosophy for the Use of Technology

Yes, I believe that Facebook is a blight to mankind and a festering stinkhole of nihilism and social decay. It is a bullhorn for propaganda and encourages leftist groupthink. Social media is used by governments and law enforcement personnel to help them spread propaganda and route-out dissenters and entrap those that commit victimless crimes.

Does Facebook have any redeeming qualities? I believe that it does. This brings me to my point about technology and its place in society in general. We are currently living in a period that I like to call Digital Fetishism. This basically means that we are tickled with ourselves over the many ways that digital gadgets are finding new ways to infect our lives for the sake of convenience. An anti-industrialist would say that, "technology is always bad." A Digital Fetishist would say that "technology is always good." Anti-industrialists see technology as too engrossing and dangerous, while digital fetishists are dismissive of that danger and enrapture themselves in the latest digital goodies without questioning technology's worth or intrusiveness.

I have had a few friends that, sharing my dissatisfaction with Facebook, have deleted their accounts in heroic attempts to eradicate the blight and reclaim their flesh-and-blood lives. As soon as they do, they are met with the unintended consequences of digital-ostracism. In our culture today, we don't call our friends one-by-one to invite them to a party, we create an event on Facebook. We don't email so much anymore, we text or IM on Facebook. Facebook reminds us of when our friends' birthdays are so that we don't miss them.

Has society gone completely mad? Well yes, in some ways it has, but I can't escape the fact that Facebook is a huge step forward when it comes to managing our social lives in the real world. It is a lot easier to create a Facebook event and invite everyone you know with a few clicks than call people one-by-one or send one of those annoying email chain letters. In this day and age, firing Facebook entirely is much like saying "I don't believe in having a cell phone." The cell phone does carry the risk of distraction, but it sure is convenient, and having one will do wonders for your social and dating life.

Our dance with technology is one of those cases where a balanced approach is the correct approach. Facebook is a double-edged sword: it has the power to be damaging and helpful all in the same package. The idea that we should recognize the inherent dangers of technology and moderate and manage its usage is a novel concept in an era of Digital Fetishism.

After reviewing the pros and cons of Facebook, we will see that the majority of problems that Facebook creates are centered around The Feed – let's call it "TFF" (The Fucking Feed) – either you posting to IT or IT rubbing shit in your face that you'd rather not see. If not for the poisonously addicting and captivating effect of TFF, Facebook would be little more than an events-management tool, digital contact book and email system – which is precisely what we're going to use it for.

Dealing with TFF strategy 1: "Control it"

Firstly I'd like to disclose to you that I tried this "kinder and gentler" method and it did not work for me. Essentially this "soft core" strategy is to focus your feed more toward the items of personal interest to you by unfollowing damn-near everybody, except for maybe one or two people: a spouse or significant other, perhaps. This leaves you to do interesting things with TFF, such as using it as a news source. The big problem with this "control the feed" method is that, due to how Facebook works, TFF is only partially under your control. FB injects annoying ads, trending news and other nonsense directly in to your feed, so it's guaranteed to distract and upset you.

Dealing with TFF strategy 2: "Kill it"

The only way to ensure that Facebook works for you instead of against you is to kill TFF entirely. This will eliminate your desire to "check it" constantly to see what new things are going on, and get ensnared by an ad here or a "Bernie for President" news flash there.

Switch to Google Chrome as your primary browser and install one of these Feed-blocking extensions:

I installed the first one called "Kill News Feed." Honestly, I don't know how I lived without it, as it changes the entire character of Facebook and how I interact with it.

Was it worth switching my entire browser for one silly Chrome extension? You bet your ass it was. I can't imagine how many wasted hours I've spent "just checking" Facebook, which then turned in to full-on binges and arguments with my economically-illiterate friends.

Now, as a double-bonus challenge: delete the Facebook app from your phone or tablet. Unfortunately the mobile apps won't accept extensions like the Chrome browser does, so the mobile apps will keep pushing the feed just as Facebook intended. Delete the apps. If you absolutely have to check FB on your phone, the mobile site works just fine. But what about checking events and addresses while on the go? Most calendars, such as iCal, allow you to add your FB events to your regular digital calendar, so your events and even your FB birthdays can appear on your regular calendar! How about that?

As a softer option, you could simply move the FB app to the last page on your phone or tablet app screens, so that it's more difficult to get to. This also creates the sense that using the app is not a priority. You will find the temptation to zone out at the feed will have you back to your old ways in no time, so my advice is to eliminate any sources of pain that you can't control – the apps need to go.

Now for some lifestyle adjustments: quit posting casual shit and come back to life – unless it's a page that you manage for a cause you believe in. Take my buddy's approach and accept the fleeting, impermanent, Zen-like nature of life. Feel the good emotions of enjoying life in the present moment and let that be your own validation. Tell people about what's going on in your life when you see them in person – it creates great conversation by adding a bit of mystery to your social interactions. Increase the quality and usefulness of your political opinions by writing a blog article, switching your efforts to a Facebook page for a cause or business, making a short film or giving a speech about a topic you care about to an interested audience, as opposed to contradicting and beating up on your friends (or getting beat up by them).

Why do I contradict myself about Facebook pages? Because Facebook can be just another outlet to get an audience for your own thoughts, creations and ideas – and that's a positive use of the medium. What I'm trying to do away with is our need to validate our daily lives by posting what we did or ate on Facebook – to learn to connect with our emotions and love life instead of tallying up double-plus-good "likes." As Alex Jones says (referring directly to social media), "sometimes you have to go in to The Matrix to get people out of The Matrix."

Make sure The Matrix works for you!

The Subtle, Critical Difference

How has my experience with Facebook changed? My friends are still there. I can still see their feeds and what they're posting. The critical difference is that I must seek out this information manually, and I do so when I choose to. This flips the equation of how FB is designed to operate: the information gathering process is a conscious, active choice, versus a "passive-forced-feeding" that contains all sorts of useless information. I still like and follow pages for products and Libertarian news sources that I like, and I check those sources when I want to. The "globe" icon counter lets me know when events have changed or when I'm invited to something, which is exactly what I want to focus on. Also, my Facebook home page is no longer what is bookmarked, but my events page. Bookmark this instead: https://www.facebook.com/events/upcoming?action_history=null

The next time you're out with friends or family, keep your phone in your pocket and emotionally connect with other people. Take your time and taste the food instead of documenting it for the people who aren't there. You'll be amazed at how much better you'll feel when you rescue your manhood from The Matrix.

Read More: 30 Facebook Pictures That Confirm Red Pill Truths

Devin Stone

The Reason Female Actors Get Paid Less That Nobody Wants To Talk About

October 29, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

I've often wondered, as I'm sure many of us do, just how different it is to be rich and famous. Are rich people fundamentally happier than we are? Are they constantly jumping around for joy because they found that pot at the end of the rainbow? We wonder if they are, but every now and then something comes along to remind you that actually, the rich are just like us.

They still have, for instance, an unquenchable and all-too-human desire to have something to complain about, no matter what. With this in mind, Jennifer Lawrence, the world's most highly paid actress, took to Facebook recently to complain about all those male stars getting paid more than her.

Jennifer Lawrence

October 14 at 1:40am · Edited ·

Like Page

Why Do I Make Less Than My Male Co-Stars?
(subscribe at www.lennyletter.com to read more)

When Lena first brought up the idea of Lenny to me, I was excited. Excited to speak to Lena, who I think is a genius, and excited to start thinking about what to complain about (that's not what she pitched me, it's just what I'm gonna do). When it comes to the subject of feminism, I've remained ever-so-slightly quiet. I don't like joining conversations that feel like they're "trending." I'm even the asshole who didn't do anything about the ice-bucket challenge — which was saving lives — because it started to feel more like a "trend" than a cause. I should have written a check, but I fucking forgot, okay? I'm not perfect. But with a lot of talk comes change, so I want to be honest and open and, fingers crossed, not piss anyone off.

It's hard for me to speak about my experience as a working woman because I can safely say my problems aren't exactly relatable. When the

While it may be true, yes, that male stars tend to earn a bigger paycheck, the question remains exactly why this is? Can audiences just not take women seriously in major roles? There may be several reasons, but there's one in particular that no one wants to talk about.

In regular workplaces, a big reason men tend to earn more is because they choose jobs where they experience greater risk. Its hardly surprising that, given we do the jobs that account for more than 90% of workplace deaths, us men get a few dollars an hour extra to compensate.

Like a typical working women who wonders why she gets paid less than men despite working in a comfortable, air-conditioned office 9-5 Monday to Friday, female stars just can't work out why so many more roles are available to men. Let me try and shed some light here.

The reason is because male characters – like their real world equivalents – suffer far more than their female co-stars.

This isn't hard to prove.

For instance, if there's one big show on at the moment which draws the ire of feminists because of its frequent depictions of violence against women, its obviously Game of Thrones. But here's the thing, even misogynistic, medieval Thrones shows violence that is almost exclusively between men. Don't believe me? You can check for yourself. Somebody (with way too much time on their hands) took the trouble of making a compilation of all of the onscreen deaths in the show.

The grand total comes to 373 deaths – nearly ten an episode (and that's just the first four seasons).

But here's the thing. Out of the those 373, how many depict women dying? Half? Three-quarters? A third? Actually it's a much, much smaller number. So small, I'm going to put a trigger warning on this next sentence. For those who have not yet swallowed the red pill, imminent, worldview-changing facts are about to appear.

The answer – out of those 373 deaths, the number of people who die on the show, who are women…comes to…seven.

Seven.

Not seventy. Not a hundred and seven. Seven. Against 366 men. Put another way – 98% of all the onscreen deaths in Game of Thrones are of men. Seriously, I'm going to have to put this in meme form. Please share it far and wide.

The most poignant scene of this has to be in Blackwater when King's Landing is under siege. The men are outside, fighting and dying. There's limbs getting chopped off. Men drowning. Men burning alive. Where are the women?

Inside, cowering and getting drunk…and if memory serves correct – they're still fucking complaining. Really, think of any violent movie or TV show. How many women do you see with limbs blown off? With burns covering most of their body? With a sword sticking through their chest? Can anyone name the female equivalent of Sean Bean?

People complain all the time. Oh! There's no enough women in Star Wars. Well fucking thank god! Most people in Star Wars get killed. It's why its Star Wars.

Really ladies, which part did you want to play? The guy who gets all his limbs chopped off, is horribly burned and has to live in a suit which breathes for him the rest of his life? His son, who also gets a limb chopped off, finds himself fighting some horrible monster at least once per movie and later has to compete with his father in a fight to the death?

Perhaps the guy who is horribly tortured by the empire for information, frozen in carbonite, and nearly fed to another giant monster? Or just one of those anonymous stormtroopers or fighter pilots, who are always men, and who you see for like five seconds before they get a laser through the chest and die?

You know why women didn't play those roles? Because the audience simply wouldn't accept it.

Harrison Ford can cut down twenty guys, and it's a spectacle. One woman gets a paper cut, and everyone loses their goddamn minds. In 2015, as in 1977, or probably 1348 for all I know, audiences simply won't put up with women being tortured, having limbs chopped off or otherwise suffering horrible, violent deaths the same way as men, at least not with such flippancy.

Its just visceral. Sure they can die, but if they do, it better be at the climax of the movie. Women suffering is nearly always a major plot point. Men suffering is just entertainment. Art imitates life. Whether we're talking about workplace accidents, car crashes, violence or suicide, men bare the brunt of nearly any kind of suffering, Our media reflects this. We simply won't put up with women being treated like such cannon fodder.

One tiny downside for the fairer sex, as Jennifer Lawrence is starting to become aware of even if she doesn't quite understand it, is that, yes, female actresses may be excluded from a number of the more "interesting" roles. Suffering breeds character, and without that suffering, there will be fewer roles for female actresses to play.

And to add insult to injury, its hardly the patriarchy that is enforcing these standards. Its those same feminists who screech the loudest about "violence against women" that are sabotaging their own cause. If viewers can't handle violence against women, then Hollywood directors aren't going to put female actresses in dangerous situations.

Hence, poor Jen has to put up with a smaller paycheck.

Read More: Did Sarah Silverman Lie About Getting Paid Less Than A Man?

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Groveling Confession Of Asheville Coffee Shop PUAs Shows Why You Should Never Apologize To SJWs

October 30, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Back in September 2015, it was revealed that the two men who owned the Waking Life coffee shop in Asheville, NC were also running a blog that documented their sexual exploits with various women. They were immediately branded as being misogynists. Local feminists arranged a boycott and picketed the business. How the owners reacted and the subsequent fallout shows us the frightening parallels between methods of social justice warriors (SJW) and Marxist techniques.

The "Game" Blog

Jared Rutledge and Jacob Owens

Jared Rutledge and Jacob Owens, the owners of the coffee shop, ran a blog and a Twitter account called Holistic Game. A quick review of the blog archive shows that it provided advice on how to pick up women—pretty standard fare on any manosphere website. But it was apparently one post that was entitled “A Breakdown of All My Lays” that sparked the boycott and protests.

In the “All My Lays” blog post, one of the men recounts all of his sexual encounter after he had broken up with his long term girlfriend. Here are some of the entries:

> 11. K. – Business – 6/7/7 – Played
> Late thirties MILF that I fucked in her basement while her kids were asleep. Slamming body for her age, and I’d never fucked a woman that old. We didn’t hang out again – I think she was only really interested in something serious. Her exes were abusive and I think she wanted beta comfort and stability. I still see her around – she’s single and seems to be doing well.
>
> 30. K. – Tinder – 5/5/4 – Bail
> Chubby mid-twenties blonde in town for one night, so we hooked up in her hotel room. Chubby girls are easy. No clue what she’s up to but I’d rather not see her again.
>
> 34. N. – Tinder – 6/8/2 – Rejection
> Skinny, trashy single mother in her mid-twenties. I fucked her ass, she shit on my bed, we went our separate ways and she never texted me back. I think she’s riding the carousel of bad boys until she can find a dad for her kids.
>
> 46. C. (Mexico) – Tinder – 7/7/7 – Bail
> Early twenties brunette. Curves and huge tits with pierced nipples, fucked her twice. She was moving to Mexico within a couple weeks, so I didn’t take it seriously. The second time we fucked she told me that she felt guilty about sex and didn’t really like being promiscuous, which was really offputting. She also told me she couldn’t have sex sober. I didn’t text her again and I assume she’s drinking her problems away south of the border.

There are a couple of points here: First, all of the sex was consensual. Nobody is claiming that this man forced himself on any of these women. Second, he doesn’t give out any names so he is not deliberately embarrassing these women publicly. The thing that seems to offended the feminists was the fact that the author had the audacity to document his conquests.

The Apology

In reaction to the protests, the owners of Waking Life went into groveling mode. They issued a cloying apology on their website:

> To Our Asheville Community:
>
> We know many of you are very angry right now. That anger is justified. There is nothing to balm the wound for now, and we recognize that. We validate and affirm your frustration and disappointment. We've issued separate individual apologies, and those stand more than ever.
>
> We've said terrible and demeaning things – things that belie unhealthy thought patterns that do not contribute to a stable and equal society. Things our mothers and sisters had to hear. We cannot and will not excuse these things. We grieve for the systematic and ongoing actions we've taken. We apologize to the women in our lives and the greater community for the harm we've caused, and the potential danger we've put them in with our attitudes and beliefs.

Rutledge and Owens announced that they were closing their shop for several days to allow themselves some time for silent reflection. Note their use of psychological mumbo jumbo words and phrases such as "introspection," "accountable," and "commit to that process" that are loved by the left.

> We're going to close for the next couple days so we can have some room for introspection. We want to allow ourselves to be accountable to our friends, family, employees, clergy, and counselors for our actions, and give ourselves room to be silent and reflect. These attitudes were not grown in a day, and they will not be destroyed in a day. We want to humbly commit to that process. We're not good people, but we want to be.

They even commit to providing the rest of the year's profits to a rape crisis charity called "Our Voice," even though their sexual encounters had nothing to do with rape.

The apology amounts to a complete capitulation to the SJW. Rutledge and Owens totally disown all of their red pill philosophy. They put up zero resistance to the SJW. This is ironic because they formally were quite bold at criticizing other people in the manosphere. For instance, in this Twitter post they called Roosh unmanly:

> Holistic Game (@HolisticGame)さんはTwitterを利用しています
> https://mobile.twitter.com/holisticgame?lang=ja - Translate this page
> Why the FUCK didn't @rooshv get a media coach? ... Not a fan of @rooshv (I find his bitching/clickbait unmanly) but that was more a firing squad than an ...

The Shutdown Of Waking Life

Hey, check out the plate in the middle.

Predictably, the cringing obsequiousness did not appease the SJW. Waking Life had to be closed in response to the furor. But rather than going down fighting, Rutledge and Owens prostrated themselves even lower to the SJW in their farewell posting, in which they again disown the manosphere and blame it for validating their "regrettable behavior."

> Two and a half weeks ago, blogs, podcasts, and tweets which we ignorantly assumed would be kept anonymous were linked to us. We had made an effort to stay anonymous because at times we used demeaning, harsh, and violent words that expressed hatred and fear towards women. This anonymity allowed our words to knowingly bypass the checks and balances of the community in which we live, and avoid the reactions of real people. The red pill community provided us with validation and adoration as we engaged in this regrettable behavior.

They even submitted themselves to the two minutes of public hate. It sounds like a modern day version of the pillory.

> In the aftermath of us being identified… We felt lost, ashamed, and confused. A few key community members and friends showed up and gave us the opportunity to face the anger and pain we'd caused. To lean into it… We realized that we'd quantified and objectified living, breathing people. People who deserved much better. We'd used cruel words to belittle them and relieve our own insecurities > and fears. We'd shared private memories that should have remained secret and sweet… We have discovered that some of it wasn't about us, but was about a society-wide problem for which we've become the focal point.

They promised to continue to receive counseling to aid the "process" becoming model feminists and to become evangelists to the "red pill community."

> We've begun the long process towards being better men, for ourselves and for others. We both are actively involved in counseling, and continue to be open to friends and family who speak into our lives. The firsthand knowledge of the pain and destruction our words have caused has allowed us to cast aside beliefs we previously held. We have a lot of introspection yet to do, and we're committed to doing it. We will continue to make ourselves available and support the community as we are asked. We will gladly take part in the ongoing dialogue if and when we are invited to do so. We can speak from our experience regarding the hurt we've caused, and more importantly, from where this hurt came. We are currently addressing the red pill community in order to illuminate the damage this philosophy can cause…
>
> Thanks for holding us accountable for our behavior…
>
> Thanks for rerouting our lives from the way of power to the way of grace…
>
> Thanks for giving us room to grow and change.
>
> Thanks for helping us be aware.
>
> Thanks for inspiring us to be better people.
>
> Thanks for dashing our cynicism and humbling us.
>
> Thanks for your big heart and showing up. Be well, y'all.

SJW and Marxists work in the same fashion

Roosh V forum member The Lizard of Oz noticed that the Rutledge and Owens confession is exactly the same as type of confession that Communists used to punish people who had committed "crimes" against the Party:

> It's worth noting that the mea culpa letter that these dudes wrote strikes the exact, identical tone of countless such letters of "self-criticism" and apology for "straying from the true path" written is societies like the former USSR, China, Vietnam, Cambodia under the Khmer Rouge, etc etc. It is really the exact same thing.

The forced apology is indeed a well-known Marxist technique of brainwashing. Professor Robert J. Lifton, author of a seminal book on Marxist thought control methods wrote that demanding an apology "is consistent with the whole thought-reform ethos, which focuses on confession, self-criticism and apology."

And just like the present case where the offenders were forced by the SJW to issue multiple individual and joint apologies, Marxists used the exact same technique. The first apology was never enough. Instead, the "criminal" was forced to apologize again and again, with each apology being more groveling than the one that preceded it.

If there is one difference between the SJW and the Marxists, it is that after the accused had been thoroughly humiliated, Communists sometimes freed him and he was readmitted to society. The SJW, on the other hand, are never that merciful or high-minded. SJWs are never satisfied until their victims are completely ruined.

The fact that SJW techniques are the same as those used by Marxists should not surprise any of us given that SJWs are cultural Marxists. They may not call themselves Communists or Marxists, but Marxism is the intellectual root of the modern left.

Lessons from the Waking Life fiasco

The first lesson is that feminists are puritan hypocrites. Feminists encourage young women to engage in promiscuous sex as something that is empowering. But the logical outcome of women becoming promiscuous is that men are going to take advantage of the situation. However, when feminists see the natural results of their teaching, they recoil in horror.

However, instead of addressing the real problem, which is the relaxing of morality that resulted from the Sexual Revolution, feminists attack the men who write about their experiences.

The second lesson, at least for me, is that women are not happy with the brave new world that feminism and other leftists have built. It is clear from the "All My Lays" post that what most women really want is not to be sluts, but to be in a committed relationship. The slut world that feminism has built makes that very difficult. It has caused nothing but unhappiness, broken lives, and fatherless children.

The final lesson is that if you are ever attacked by SJWs or leftists, you should adopt the rule "Never Explain, Never Apologize," because no matter what you do, it will never be sufficient to appease them. The coffee shop owners apologized repeatedly and bent over backwards to show that they were truly contrite. It wasn't enough. They had to be utterly destroyed for inadvertently revealing the sickness of modern culture.

Read More: 3 Things I Learned From Being A Marxist

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

An Afternoon With Mike During Men’s Month

October 30, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Mike rounded the corner, passing a large billboard with a picture of four men–white, black, Asian, and Latino, all smiling. At the bottom of the sign, a state employment agency with the motto “We’ll find you the right job to satisfy you—no matter what!” He barely noticed the sign as he entered the door to one of the newest establishments in town, and hopped up onto the barstool grinning.

It was men’s night at the new local taqueria, and that meant half price drinks for him and all his buddies. He had just left the nonprofit group Men’s Wellness, where he was paid an extremely respectable stipend to visit local public schools and educate the children on issues facing men in society. It was a fairly easy job, requiring just three hours a day, which left him free to attend classes at the local university where he took classes in men’s studies and woodworking (just for fun) and his income was paid by a generous government grant, with great job stability.

As Mike sat at the bar, overlooking the open kitchen area, he noticed the entire waitstaff and kitchen crew were decked out in special red sportcoats. A quick glance around the room reminded him that this was the first of April—Men's Month—how could he forget!? The many posters and flyers around the room informed anyone in the restaurant—or even walking by—that this was Men's Month, and a portion of all proceeds from the restaurant would be diverted to a special government fund used for such activities as Mike's part time wellness gig.

In addition to the red sportscoats, each employee's shirt had an individual message, from "Teaching and nursing are for MEN too!" to the classic "Father STILL knows best!"

Mike glanced around the room, waiting for a couple of buddies to show up. The room was a good mix of men, there for the Thursday special prices, and also women, who knew this was a great opportunity to possibly meet an eligible bachelor. The women were dressed stylishly, but somewhat conservatively, and many had taken extra time before heading out to freshen up their makeup, slip into a feminine dress and heels, and brush their long silky hair, as they didn't want to waste an opportunity to make a good first impression.

Soon Mike's friend Jason showed up. Jason was a high school buddy of Mike's, and they didn't have much in common anymore, but still met up occasionally in group social settings. Jason and Mike had played basketball together in high school, but since then Jason had let himself go, and had gained several pounds. He no longer worked out, and while he had been a talented debate team member, with a voracious appetite for reading, he had recently started hanging out at bars every night and dropped the gym for a heavy video game habit.

Mike didn't really approve of the lifestyle, but Jason seemed happy enough. He always had a smile on his face, a big group of friends, and women seemed to be just as attracted to him, even though his hygiene left something to be desired, and he was about 30 pounds overweight.

Jason gave Mike a high five and before they could get the bartender's attention, a couple of girls walked up and handed them each a shot of tequila. They smiled, saying "Hi guys, just wanted to wish you a happy start to Men's Month! I'm Stacy, and this is my friend Cynthia." They downed the two drinks, and as Mike stuck out his hand to greet the women, Jason blurted out "I'm busy, and my friend is taken."

The girls quickly turned and walked away quickly with a sad look on their face. "What, we just got here, can't we socialize in peace without being immediately interrupted by strangers?" Jason said.

Mike shrugged his shoulders, grabbed a menu, and asked what Jason had been up to. "Just got back from organizing a protest this Sunday after church, we're marching down Main Street to kick off Men's Month with a rally against Social Flaking. Did you know that one out of five guys will be ignored or stood up by a woman THIS WEEK?

Mike rolled his eyes slightly. Sure, he'd had girls flake on them. Everyone knew women were unreliable. But he also knew the one in five stat was a gross exaggeration, including women who took longer than five minutes to respond to a text message or phone call as a "flake." While that could be annoying, most of these women ended up replying within 30 minutes, and life went on.

Mike did his best to ignore the Social Flaking Movement, but the “No Flake” symbol of an older gentleman sternly wagging finger was ubiquitous–the latest updates for Apple iOS 10.1 included a subset of “No Flake” emojis in black, yellow, tan, white, and both light and dark brown, which Apple quickly released to respond to Android’s feature that would automatically re-send a message to a confirmed female recipient every five minutes until she responded.

Mike glanced up at the TV. They were showing his college’s women’s volleyball team. However, instead of their normal spandex and kneepads, the team was all wearing red business suits. Mike loved Men’s Month. Lots of attention, food and drink specials everywhere, free health checkups at the local hospitals, and plenty of education on the importance of fathers and the family. But he really didn’t think the girls volleyball team needed to dress up in suits to show their support. After all, isn’t being feminine one of the best ways to support your man? Oh well, not his problem!

The guys shared a chips and salsa—only red chips and salsa were available all month long, and even guacamole wouldn’t be sold until Men’s Month ended. A city bus passed by the street outside with a billboard advertising the Federal Men’s Advocacy Center. Ten years ago, the government had opened up the department with local offices in all major cities. The centers were designed to be one stop shops to meet the special needs of men in areas that didn’t overlap with women. Men could come in for free counseling and intermediation designed to help them get through issues with their spouse or partner who didn’t see things as rationally as them.

Men reporting sexual problems were first screened to eliminate the possibility of any medical problems, then a team of counselors, fitness coaches, and makeup artists would put the woman through an intensive six week program designed to improve her outlook, demeanor, and physical appearance so the husband could rekindle his desire for her.

The centers also helped men obtain a SNATCH card (Supplemental Nutritional Athletic Team Card for Health) which entitled the man to a free membership for up to five years to a local gym, who were required to have a full time male nutritionist and sports team organizer offering at least six men only sports leagues.

Finally, their buddy Brad showed up. Brad was a community organizer of the local Preservation of Virtue and Prevention of Vice chapter, charged with reviewing all new technology, fashion, and products to determine if they had any qualities which deemed them unsafe for women or children. If so, the products could not be legally sold to women married less than 20 years or children under the age of 20.

As Brad ordered his drink at the bar, a guy in a sharp business suit walked up to them, and handed them a flyer reminding them of this weekend's prostate cancer fun run. Hundreds of corporations in the city, valuing the enormous contribution the men of the city provided, had agreed to donate tens of thousands of dollars for medical research.

Brad met regularly with politicians, and was instrumental in passing the Palimony Laws of 2015. Under the new law, a woman was obligated to continue to provide sexual services to her former partner for a period of six months after termination of an exclusive relationship lasting six months or longer. The theory being that if a man had allowed a relationship to form, and emotionally and financially invested in a specific woman, he intended for the relationship to be serious, and it was unfair to punish him by ending the relationship and forcing him to quickly search for another partner.

Mike didn't take advantage of this law, feeling it was unnecessary and took advantage of women by forcing them to give up their bodies after the relationship had already ended, but many men were lazy, and gladly accepted the free and easy sex the government guaranteed. The penalty for noncompliance was garnishment of the woman's income and resources in an amount necessary to reimburse the government for its cost in providing services to the man at the public escort services operated by the county, which were available to any men who were not currently in a relationship and not actively seeking one (Some complained that the "not actively seeking one" rule severely undercounted the number of single men, but the government insisted that was the best definition for single).

As the three of them enjoyed their discounted food and drink, another group of girls approached, this time without drinks in hand. The tallest and thinnest girl, an athletic, long haired, pleasant brunette with a warm smile, but slightly nervous tone, placed her arm gently on Brad's shoulder and said "Hey, I like your shoes. Where did you get those?"

"I think the mall," Brad blurted out, clearly annoyed, as he turned back to face his buddies.

"Guys, this place is full of creepy, strange women. That girl I didn't even know touched me and asked me some dumb question about my clothes. Let's get out of here and go to Bob's—I hear he just got a new sexbot." At that, everyone's eyes lit up. They quickly paid their tab and hailed a bright red taxi—freshly painted for Men's Month—and sped down the road to Bob's house. They all knew this was going to be a fantastic Men's Month.

Inspired by the fictional writings of Roosh and the pink insanity seen one weekend in October, 2015.

Read More: Patricia's Smartphone

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

These Are The Cards You've Been Dealt

October 31, 2015 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

A while back I had an interesting conversation with a tenant of mine. He was a tall, athletic young man and during a party of inebriation he asked me,

"SAY! Yourrr're the economist…. whyyyy can't I be a baseball playyyer… It'sss all I ever wanted to be."

I wanted to believe he was joking, or at least it was the alcohol talking. But underneath it all you could tell he thought it unfair that he couldn't get into the major leagues. In further conversation he said "he tried his best" and that there was "no justice" in that they wouldn't let him in.

I didn't try reasoning with him or explaining things to him as much as I did laugh at him and give him a blunt and real world economic explanation. I explained not only did you have to be an AMAZING athlete to get into the major leagues, but that he wasn't strong or fast enough. He was no doubt STRONG and FAST, but he wasn't a professional athlete. Out of the 150 million men in this country thousands were better than him, and STILL weren't good enough to get into major league baseball.

He didn't get offended and didn't pummel the shit out of me, and even seemed to finally accept the truth I had just given him, but it got me wondering what on Earth would drive an otherwise normally-thinking, mentally-healthy young man to believe he was entitled to become a professional baseball player. And then it dawned on me. It had nothing to do with mental health or a lapse in logic, but rather a concept that has been pummeled into our brains since were were little children.

Life should be "fair."

Fair

The concept of fairness is one that applies to how society should be structured, organized, governed and managed. We should treat everybody under the law the same. Society should offer the same opportunities to everyone. Everybody should have the same rights, no more, no less than anybody else. It's all "fair." And fairness is a good thing, for without it you then have genuine victims and genuine criminals. Worse, if things aren't "fair" you deter people's production as in:

"Why would I work 80 hours a week to support my wife who is about to divorce me and take 50% of my assets and demand alimony afterwards? That's not fair."

"Why should I major in engineering while Sorority Sally majors in Early Childhood Education, yet society says she's an 'equal.' That's not fair."

And thus society's standards of living suffer.

Alas, not only because fairness is important to society, but as individuals we have the instinctual demand for self-respect, "fairness" is a concept constantly hammered and hounded upon us. At three you are told "it's not fair to steal your brother's candy." From all of K-12 your teachers insist on everything be "fair." And when you're in college your liberal arts professors do nothing but whine and complain about how the world is so "unfair." So when you graduate from college you think the real world should, ought to be, and is fair.

Oh, you foolish man.

Reality

The problem with "fair" is that it is an ideal. It is a goal. It is NOT always reality. Additionally, "fair" only applies to how we SHOULD treat each other in society. It is not a guarantee that we WILL. And the problem MANY of us have is after 23 years of brainwashing from childhood to college graduation we are all predisposed to think we're entitled to fairness.

"Why can't I be a professional baseball player?"
"How come other people have more money than me?"
"Why can't I find a job with my English Literature degree?"
"Why do men date younger women?"

etc. etc.

Of course, these are complaints that come from our standard group of single moms, SJW's, socialists, and other ROK whipping boys. But sometimes we too must look into the mirror:

"Why do women like taller men?"
"Why do whites make more money?"
"Those Asians are just better at math!"
"Why did I come from a broken home?"
"Well they don't have ADHD like I do!"

If you think about it, we, perhaps even unconsciously, find ourselves complaining a lot about how life is "unfair." And then go down the same delusional path of those we just mocked and ridiculed.

The Cards You've Been Dealt

The reason I bring this up is that I have noticed since starting Asshole Consulting there is still a (perhaps unconscious) pre-programmed entitlement and expectation among our ranks of men for "fairness." Again, this is not shocking given how much time, energy, and resources have been expended into brainwashing you to think you're entitled to fairness. But since these expectations are not based in reality you will at MINIMUM waste time, energy, and mental resources anguishing over it.

Worse, in making concrete life plans and decisions in "Should-a-Land" you doom your life to failure because they're based in fairness and not reality. And after looking at several clients who complained to me about "fairness" I think I've come to an epiphany that will benefit us all, even those of us who at times think life is unfair. Namely, "these are the cards you've been dealt."

For example take your average black man. He is likely born into poverty, has a 73% chance of being raised by a single mom. Is likely to be heavily propagandized into feeling self-pity and "woeismeism." And if he dares to improve himself his entire social network will mock and ridicule him for being an "Uncle Tom" or "Oreo."

Now, imagine instead of this black man being a separate person from you that you are witnessing in the third person, you ARE THIS MAN and these are the cards you've been dealt in the "Poker Game of Life."

What do you do?

If this was a run of a mill “guys night of poker” you would simply fold and wait for your next hand. The problem is there is no “next hand.” This is it. This is the ONLY hand you will ever be dealt.

And while you may bemoan all the unfairness that comes with having these lousy cards, it does not change the fact your ONLY OPTION is to play that hand the best you can.

Another example, your old Captain himself.

Certainly dealt nowhere near as bad of cards as your average young black man from the ghetto, but in one capacity of the “Poker Game of Life” I did get a bum card. I’m short.

This, as you all well know, is the equivalent of being a fat chick when it comes to dating. Unfortunately whereas being fat is a choice, being short is not. Does it do me any good to whine, complain, rage, and blame other men for having “height privilege” or scream at women for being “shallow” for not liking short guys? It only hurts me as I’m being delusional and wasting precious time. The best move is to accept this trait I was born with, and do the best I can in spite of it.

The whole point is that we are all born with inherent weaknesses. Nobody gets dealt five aces. And whereas society, our parents, government, and especially the education system has done their damnedest to force us to demand “fairness,” every single one of us needs to come to grips with the fact these are the ONLY cards we will ever be dealt, no matter how shitty. Because if you don’t, and live your life insisting on fairness that will never come, you will waste the one life you’ve been given, no matter how predisposed it was to be shitty.

Read More: Why You Should Not Go See “Mad Max: Feminist Road”

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Reclaiming The Lord Of Literature From Modern Leftists

November 1, 2015 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

As the left rewrites history and continues to bulldoze anything that is deemed unfit for public history consumption to “remedy the errors of the past”, let’s not forget the name of the individual that statists have deemed a proponent and god of leftist ideology. A name that has been fully captured by the left without further questioning: George Orwell.

Talk to any leftist and they unabashedly prop Orwell up as a total puppet of the left. Today, even the left would force Orwell’s dead rotting skull to nod in favor of Socialist geriatric politician, Bernie Sanders. One can only wonder if they will dig up his corpse, convert him to US citizenship, and parade him to the polls like some macabre “Weekend at Bernie’s” to vote for Socialist Sanders because, you know, that is what Orwell thought.

This must stop.

Apparently, 1984 and Animal Farm had not much to do with large government. Articles (as the one linked above) and discussions with numerous people would lead you to believe Orwell was, in fact, a Socialist. This is a distorted image of the master of political literature. Statists would like you to think that Mr. Orwell is firmly placed in the hall of the left after Antonio Gramsci and Karl Marx.

However, further research illustrates a different view. Quotes directly from George Orwell would reveal he has denounced more of leftist ideology than most would like to admit. His message was clear: large government is corrupt and intrusive.

Eerily enough, many of George Orwell's quotes below can be applied to modern America. All of these quotes are taken from one of his best works, Inside the Whale (a must read):

> …Paris was invaded by such a swarm of artists, writers, students, dilettanti, sight-seers, debauchees, and plain idlers as the world has probably never seen. In some quarters of the town the so-called artists must actually have outnumbered the working population indeed, it has been reckoned that in the late twenties there were as many as 30,000 painters in Paris, most of them impostors. The populace had grown so hardened to artists that gruff- voiced lesbians in corduroy breeches and young men in Grecian or medieval costume could walk the streets without attracting a glance and along the Seine banks by Notre Dame it was almost impossible to pick one's way between the sketching-stools.
>
> It was the age of dark horses and neglected genii; the phrase on everybody's lips was 'Quand je serai lance? (when am I launching?)". As it turned out, nobody was "launching" the slump descended like another ice age, the cosmopolitan mob of artists vanished, and the huge Montparnasse cafes which only ten years ago > were filled till the small hours by hordes of shrieking poseurs have turned into darkened tombs in which there are not even any ghosts.

The above account can be reflected with any modern Leftist city in the USA and the conformist hippy "artist". Modern Austin, Brooklyn, Denver, Portland, San Francisco, and Seattle come to mind as parallels to early 20th century Paris. Just remember, next time your pretentious dread-locked friend rolls up on his longboard with a "Feel the Bern" t-shirt, remember that Orwell would have thought him a faggy poseur.

Orwell explains how leftist ideologies dominated cultural and literary circles. This unflinching dominance of the left in the arts and culture of today (originating in 1969 America) has become vapid and cliché, just as it was in the 1930s. History is cyclical and Orwell was truly a soothsayer:

> As early as 1934 or 1935 it was considered eccentric in literary circles not be more or less "left". Between 1935 and 1939 the Communist Party had an almost irresistible fascination for any writer under forty. It became as normal to hear that so-and-so had 'been received'. For about three years, in fact, the central stream of English literature was more or less directly under Communist control. How was it possible for such a thing to happen?

Orwell goes on with the destruction of the individual. The weapons to destroy the individual are conformity, statist group thought, propaganda language, and censorship within the Left (e.g. political correctness today):

> Every Communist is in fact liable at any moment to have to alter his most fundamental convictions, or leave the party.
>
> Almost certainly we are moving into an age of totalitarian dictatorships- an age in which freedom of thought will be at first a deadly sin and later on a meaningless abstraction. The autonomous individual is going to be stamped out of existence. But this means that literature, in the form in which we know it, must suffer at least a temporary death.
>
> Consider for instance some comfortable English professor defending Russian totalitarianism. He cannot say outright, 'I believe in killing off your opponents when you can get good results by doing so'. Probably, therefore, he will say something like this: 'While freely conceding that the Soviet regime exhibits certain features which the humanitarian may be inclined to deplore, we must, I think, agree that a certain curtailment of the right to political opposition is an unavoidable concomitant of transitional periods, and that the rigors which the Russian people have been called upon to undergo have been amply justified in the sphere of concrete achievement.'

Deconstruction of the West and anti-patriotic sentiment by leftist ideology is not something new in the Modern USA (originating at the intellectual institution known as the Frankfurt School). Orwell was also attuned to it in his day:

> All through the critical years many left-wingers were chipping away at English morale, trying to spread an outlook that was sometimes squashily pacifist, sometimes violently pro-Russian, but always anti-British….If the English people suffered for several years a real weakening of morale, so that the Fascist nations judged that they were ‘decadent’ and that it was safe to plunge into war, the intellectual sabotage from the Left was partly responsible…Given the stagnation of the Empire the military middle class must have decayed in any case, but the spread of a shallow Leftism hastened the process…It is clear that the special position of the English intellectuals during the past ten years, as purely negative creatures, was a by-product of ruling class stupidity.
>
> Society could not use them, and they have not got it in them to see the devotion to one’s country implies ‘for better or worse’…high brows took for granted, as though it were a law of nature, the divorce between patriotism and intelligence. If you were a patriot you publicly thanked God that you were ‘not brainy’. If you were an intellectual you sniggered at the Union Jack and regarded physical courage as barbarous…A modern nation cannot afford either of them. Patriotism and intelligence will have to come together again.

In reference to the dangers of where leftist thought may lead and the predictions of the mass killings that followed, from Marxist writing to French Intellectuals, such as Sartre, influencing Pol Pot to the every expansion of leftist ideology in the USA today. Again, Orwell was able to identity the dangers of left-wing thought:

> So much of left-wing thought is a kind of playing with fire by people who don’t even know that fire is hot.

Ironically, not much has changed in Orwell’s critique of the left and its failures. It can fully be applied to what we are witnessing in the USA today.

I encourage you all to realize that Orwell was not a leftist; he denounced the left, the Socialist, the statist, and favored individualism in all its forms. He was an opponent of big government in all forms ranging from Fascism to Communism. So next time someone uses Orwell as a tool for their political agenda, just remember:

> In our time it is broadly true that political writing is bad writing. Where it is not true, it will generally be found that the writer is some kind of rebel, expressing his private opinions and not a ‘party line’.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Jon Bergeron

Jon is a part time misanthrope, full time American. Jon loathes modern academia, art, culture, literature, politics, television, and everything on god's green earth that has been inundated with boring, predictable, impotent, vapid Cultural Marxist horseshit which, mind you, is totally void of a single individual thought. Jon just realized he is a full time misanthrope. Anyways, Jon prays for this to change one day and something new to come along. Until then, Jon remains pessimistic with a loaded .357 next to his bed. Jon can be reached at

The Sweden School Attack Was Just What The Leftists Needed

November 1, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The left goes on and on about Sweden being a racist country, without any proof at all. In fact, any evidence you can find points to the exact opposite.

But now a murderer has gone nuts with a sword at a school, killing two and wounding another two. The police say they are convinced that he had far-right sentiments. The leftists did not wait long to use the tragedy to further their political narrative.

The killer wielded a sword

Sweden has had it's first "school shooting" in recent years. Although there must be a more appropriate term for what happened, since the only shoots fired came from the policemen's guns.

On the morning of October 22, a Thursday, children at the primary school Kronan in the town of Trollhättan were sitting in class as usual. But things were about to take a very dark turn when the man now identified as 21-year-old Anton Lundin-Pettersson entered the premises.

In a photo taken by a student inside the school, he can be seen wearing a helmet, face mask, long coat and boots, all in black. In his right hand he carries a sword.

A teacher asked the 21-year-old to leave, but was then stabbed along with three others. Two of the victims later died, one 17-year-old student and one 20-year-old teaching assistant.

The police received a call shortly after 10 a.m. When officers arrived at the scene they fired two shots at the assailant, who died from his wounds at a hospital later that day.

The killer, Anton Lundin-Pettersson.

Not long after the dust had settled, the police could confirm that the attack was likely a hate crime. “We are convinced that the perpetrator was driven by racist motives,” a spokesperson for the police said.

The killer purportedly chose his victims on the basis of their skin color. He has been described as an introverted man who didn’t talk much, with an interest in Adolf Hitler and Nazi Germany. On Facebook he supported a petition to stop immigration.

A suicide note indicates that the attack had been planned ahead, and it confirms the suspicion that it was a hate crime. The way the killer dressed and how he “marched” through the school was also reminiscent of the Nazis, according to the police.

Confirmation for leftists

Sweden now has its own Anders Behring Breivik, leftists now say, comparing Anton Lundin-Pettersson to the Norwegian far-right terrorist. And one wonders how they really feel about it.

While the attack in Trollhättan is a great tragedy to the victims and their relatives, the left can use it as a case in point that Sweden is a racist country.

To prove their point, they are surely in great need of good arguments. The World Values Survey shows that Sweden is one of the least racist countries in the world. Sweden is also the OECD’s highest per capita recipient of asylum seekers.

But facts have never mattered that much to leftists. They will further their ideology, whatever the cost may be. Now they will use this tragedy for their own political ends.

Leftist media coverage

In the days since the attack, the message in the media has been that non-white, immigrant looking people should be very, very afraid. One mentally ill guy goes crazy with a sword, and these “journalists” start acting like there’s a genocide of brown people going on.

One of them wants us to “admit” that racism is a great societal problem. The event in Trollhättan reminds him of the Holocaust, how people were selected on the basis of race, to be sent to Auschwitz. He’s probably expecting gas chambers to be put in use in Sweden any day now.

Another one blames white Swedes for not taking the problem of racism seriously enough, and thereby spreading terror among dark skinned people.

> The white elite in Sweden must start talking about how vulnerable our dark skinned citizens are right now. How afraid. They fear that their homes will be set on fire, that their children will be murdered.

Police and a crowd gathered in front of the school after the attack.

There’s never been a better time to make Swedes feel white guilt. And now they know, if they don’t comply to the narrative of a racist society, they frighten brown people.

Yet another one lay blame on the anti-immigration party, the Sweden Democrats. She goes on to describe a country permeated by racism, with a permanent “racist vein running through our society.”

> The racism […] which overflows the web and break rooms, seems to be a Swedish constant, always ready to grow stronger when opportunity is given.

Everything is racist

It really depends on how you define racism. In every serious study one can find, Sweden shows itself to be a very tolerant country.

But to a leftist, white people can barely lift a finger without showing their true racist nature. According to that standard, any society with a majority of whites will be deemed a racist society, while the crimes and indiscretions of their non-native neighbors are downplayed or ignored entirely.

To the left, the attack in Trollhättan is proof of everything they believed in so far without any proof. Now they are more convinced than ever that they are right.

But their alarmist outcries might backfire on them. If they can convince everyone that Sweden is on the brink of a new Holocaust, how many immigrants will want to come here, and how many will dare to stay?

Jews are already fleeing the country for fear of the Israel haters coming to Sweden from the Middle East. While a lot of immigrants are arriving these days, how long will they remain here if they feel unwelcomed?

Will the far-right and the left in some inadvertent way cooperate to make Sweden a homogeneous society again? Only time will tell.

Read More: Why Did Karl Halverson Pierson Attack His School And Kill A Pretty Girl?

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

8 Reasons It Doesn’t Get Better For Homosexual Men

November 2, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

For those who are not keeping up with the full range of leftist lies, the It Gets Better Project exists to promote homosexual and other deviant sexual behavior. It focuses on spinning the outright lie to children that some kind of rosy future awaits if they decide to reject a clean, healthy, and functional, girl-chasing sex life in favor of other sexual paths.

In their own words “The It Gets Better Project’s mission is to communicate to lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender youth around the world that it gets better, and to create and inspire the changes needed to make it better for them.”

A quick look at the site may leave some boys or men thinking that a journey of exploring degenerate sex as recreation and an identity is a good decision for them. Just in case anyone is still fooled by this kind of thing, here are eight things that characterize what passes for a life among homosexual men. Just so no one is left in suspense, it is not a pretty picture.

It’s not entirely clear to what extent these unpleasant outcomes are caused by the homosexual lifestyle, and to what extent they are characteristics of people who adopt it. However, it might be wise to advise young men against running that particular experiment on themselves instead of promoting it.

1. HIV/AIDS

HIV statistics for homosexual men are frightening and should be enough to make anyone pause for thought. There is a reason that the disease was initially named GRID, or gay-related immune deficiency.

In 2013 the CDC reports nearly 38,000 adolescent and adult men newly infected with HIV in the United States. Fully 81% of infections were the result of male to male sexual contact. Another 3% were male homosexual drug users where the method of transmission is not known between the two.

In 2013 nearly 20% of homosexual and bisexual men, in the United States, tested positive for HIV. Many of the men tested will be infected later in life and infected men are more likely to have already died. Consequently, the probability of a man who lives a regular homosexual lifestyle, in the United States, becoming infected in his lifetime must be much higher, perhaps up to 40%.

2. A lonely life

A lifetime is a long time for a man who is no use to anyone

One of the great joys of life is having family and children. A homosexual man has little chance of building a happy, cohesive, and enduring family unit because children are at the core of that unit. Perhaps some satisfaction can be found in simulating the motions of starting a family in the early years of adulthood. After that it becomes increasingly difficult and unlikely. That’s going to make for a very long, boring and lonely second half of life for the vast majority of homosexual men.

3. Drug use

The CDC website says “Studies have shown that, when compared with the general population, gay and bisexual men, lesbian, and transgender individuals are more likely to:

- Use alcohol and drugs
- Have higher rates of substance abuse
- Are less likely to abstain from alcohol and drug use
- Are more likely to continue heavy drinking into later life”

The Independent says that illegal drug use is seven times higher among homosexual men in England and Wales.

4. Mental illness

Feeling gay or feeling depressed? Quite likely both

According to The Guardian, homosexual men are four times more likely to suffer from depression. Other mental health problems and general measures of mental health show a similar picture. As a group men who have sex with men have poor mental health.

5. Suicide

According to Wikipedia homosexual and bisexual males have a rate of suicide between 1.5 and 14.6 times that of normal men. It's a much studied area and the range of values calculated is high, but no figure in that range is good news for men who perform homosexual acts. Indeed, according to a survey by Pink News "24% of gay men admitted to trying to kill themselves, while 54% admitted to having suicidal thoughts."

6. Pedophilia

Statistics on pedophilia indicate that attacks are disproportionately homosexual in nature. In Australia approximately 95% of such crimes against children are perpetrated by men. Meanwhile girls are victims approximately twice as often as boys. Clearly the proportion of male offenders victimizing boys must be in the range of a third of cases, homosexual acts are clearly heavily overrepresented among pedophile acts.

7. Other health problems

One consequence of homosexual acts among men is what used to be called gay bowel syndrome. Don't research this one too much if you want to enjoy your lunch.

8. Extinction

Homosexuality is the end of the line, your line

Everyone seems to agree that it is sad for some particular panda or other zoo animal that he just can't seem to get the right idea about how to successfully produce a baby animal and carry on his line or even his species.

Any man who performs a homosexual act has dramatically increased his probability of personal extinction. His future lies with that of the dodo. How sad.

Making choices

I want to confess here and now that Hesse Kassel loves cakes, chocolate, and sweets of all kinds. There is really never a time when I would not prefer cake over bread and chocolate over broccoli. For obvious reasons I mostly don't choose to eat sweets though. Instead I try, and largely succeed, in making better long run food choices. Going against my immediate, short term desires is not an impossible quest, nor is it somehow inauthentic. It is simply that when I add up the long term costs and benefits I can see which are the wiser choices.

Inevitably the old line that homosexual men don't have any choice about their behavior will come up. Perhaps this article already caused it to pop into your mind as a sort of mental defense reflex. This claim is one of the true, clear and successful examples of the big lie in action. There is little evidence for the claim and it has gained credence simply by endless repetition.

Meanwhile there is obvious and clear evidence to the contrary. Men are widely known to switch between healthy and homosexual practices, then back again when they pass in and out of prisons and other male-only environments where healthy sexual opportunities are limited. Survey data indicate that perhaps a third to half of men who report an identity that includes homosexuality say they are bisexual. At the least any man in that position could simply choose to enjoy girls and not touch men.

In the end men can make choices about who they penetrate just as much as they can make choices about what they eat. It's not easy if an inclination to make a bad choice is there, but then few good things in life come easy.

The consequences of choosing a homosexual lifestyle are clear and very bad.

It does not get better.

Read More: How Homosexual Athletes Are Ruining Sports

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

One Journalist’s Flawed Analysis Of The Migrant Crisis

November 2, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

European elites are in denial over the refugee problem. This was made clear—to me at least—after reading the many statements of European leaders, as well as articles that have attempted to discuss the issue in the popular press. I read one recent article in a popular news site that indicated just how divorced from reality much of the commentary has been on this matter.

Consider the article Refugees Will Change Europe For The Better, written by one Paul Hockenos, who is described as “a journalist living in Berlin.” Hockenos’s cheerleading on behalf of (apparently) unrestricted immigration calls attention the myopia, obfuscations, wishful thinking, and delusion that the modern European liberal is able to muster on behalf of his position. We will examine his arguments here.

Paul Hockenos

The demographics

Hockenos's first point is that unrestricted immigration will be a positive good for Germany and Western Europe because it will reverse what he calls the "demographic crisis" that is (supposedly evidenced) by the drop in German population in the past decades. With a straight face, Hockenos even mentions that migrants need to be "lured" to Germany to help pay the pensions and support the social programs of the country's current population.

What Hockenos does not tell us is that the phrase "demographic crisis" is a loaded term. The history of the world is the history of populations. They rise, they fall, they ebb, and they flow. It is actually natural in the life of a nation for its population to fluctuate, sometimes with great volatility. The fact that there has been a dip in population does not mean we should automatically import hundreds of thousands of foreigners into our borders to "rectify" a problem that may not even exist.

Indeed, it sounds like what Hockenos is really worried about is the fact that there won't be enough live bodies to staff the liberal welfare state set up by the post-WW II generation. And maybe this is a good thing. He never thinks to probe the reasons why European populations are declining. Could it be that the states there have created a toxic, hazardous environment for the raising of families?

Could it be that men have no incentive to marry and raise families, since their traditional roles are denigrated and disparaged on a daily basis by a feminist-centric cultural ethos? Such questions are, of course, not permitted to be asked, as they fall outside the permissible scope of discourse in Europe and America.

Far easier is it to import thousands of alien bodies to turn the gears and push the buttons of the existing system. Maybe, one thinks, it's irredeemably rotten and should be left to collapse.

The economy

The second "benefit" Hockenos touts with refugees is the supposed "economic" benefit. By just sliding these people into the existing economic fabric, a new boom will be created—he assures us—and Germans will eventually "get to know Syrians the same way they know Turks." Which, of course, is not at all.

Here is where Hockenos ideological bent verges on willful delusion. Vast numbers of immigrants from a foreign land, unceremoniously dumped inside another land, create more problems than they solve. Hockenos is unable to cite a single historical example where such an event actually occurred. What we get instead is the language of “could” and “might” that he apparently views as equivalent to definitive statements.

All in all, Hockenos’s views, while typical of the European elites, are revealing more in what he does not address. No one is saying that all immigration is bad. In fact, it is natural and normal, provided that it is done in a way that there is time for the host society to adjust. It should flow as a gentle stream, not as a tidal wave. Herein lies the difference.

Never once in his article does Hockenos address this reality, or provide us with any sort of metric to measure the “absorption rate” that a society can tolerate before serious social problems are created. In his world, there apparently should be no restrictions or limits.

Also not addressed is the fact that his comfortable lifestyle is dependent on a system that he is now undermining. Culture comes from populations; change the population, and you change the culture. There is something disturbingly self-negating, viscerally self-loathing, about the modern European liberal’s rush to embrace the migrant tidal waves. It is difficult to put one’s finger on, but it is there nonetheless.

Why doesn’t Hockenos advocate for the reform or abolition of the very policies that have caused the (alleged) population decline and economic stagnation that he claims to be outraged by? Why not reform or abolish the existing social and political systems that have ill-served Europeans, instead of dumping hundreds of thousands of foreigners into the mix?

Hockenos simply glosses over the fact that there are huge migrant populations in Europe that have simply never integrated, either deliberately or by historical accident. To imagine that this assimilation will automatically happen is simply wrong. One could just as easily say that the new populations will form de facto cantons, and contribute to the fracturing of the national cultural identity.

He has no answer for this, of course. And the reason is simple: he, like the European elites who are forcing their migrant policies on their people, is benefiting from the existing system. The parasitic elites in Europe have systematically sold out their countries: they have thrown away their military traditions, they have presided over vast wealth gaps among the populace, and they have been too willing to throw away tradition as the wisdom of centuries of experience. For this, the continent is paying a very high price.

Decades of wealth, affluence, and neglect of the martial virtues have rendered Western Europe vulnerable to foreign incursions. The elites there seem determined to ignore any historical or social reality that contradicts their doctrinal imperatives. That is now being revealed with disturbing clarity.

Read More: 3 Ways To Cultivate The Discipline Of A Neomasculine Lifestyle

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

An Introduction To Dominican Girls

November 2, 2015 | by Joe Schmidt | Link | Original Link

The Dominican Republic is a popular place for foreigners, and one of the main reasons is that the women here are attractive and feminine. They are superior in every way to women in Western countries such as the United States, United Kingdom, and Canada. The best part of all is that they are open to dating foreigners, and some even prefer foreigners.

But before you travel over here to meet your Dominican beauty, it's good to gather some background information and learn the best strategies for attracting them.

What They Look Like

It's difficult to describe what a typical Dominican girl looks like because they come in all different shapes and colors. There's a lot of variety here which is a good thing because you will be sure to find something you like. There are black girls, white girls, and everything in between. But one thing they all have in common is that they have great bodies.

Their bodies develop at an early age and they usually have curves—either a small subtle curve or a much larger curve for thicker girls. They also love to show off their bodies by wearing tight clothing out in public. The only negative aspect of their looks is that most of them don't have pretty faces.

How They Act

Of course every girl is different, but in general Dominican girls are fun, outgoing, and social. They are family oriented and spend a lot of time with their friends. They are somewhat superficial, as they really care about what others think of them. This is good in some ways, such as that they always dress up when leaving the house. You would never see them wearing sweat pants and flip flops like women from Western countries.

Status is important to them and they want others to know that their life is fun and exciting. This is why they take so many pictures and are constantly changing their social media profile pictures.

This country is somewhat racist and you can generally tell someone's class by their skin color and also by where they hang out. The upper-class girls have lighter skin. They speak more English but they are also more stuck-up than the lower-class girls.

What They Want in a Man

Most girls are looking for a relationship. They want a guy to to provide for them and to give them attention. Age isn't really important, as long as you aren't ugly or completely out of shape. Money talks here. Having a nice place, a nice car, and getting bottle service in clubs makes a huge difference. Most girls prefer guys who are at least conversational in Spanish since most girls don't speak any English at all aside from the upper-class girls.

And although they won't admit it, Dominican girls like bad boys. A tigre, as they call it here. They can't help but be attracted to an alpha male who may or may not be a criminal. So called "beta males" will not have as much dating success here and will probably be taken advantage of. If you are an alpha male with money then this could be the perfect country for you.

Finding The Right One

There are a lot of quality girls here, but it can be difficult to find one with the total package: looks, personality, brains, and loyalty. Perhaps the most difficult quality to get is loyalty. Attractive girls here have a lot of dating options and they have a lot of guys messaging them on Whatsapp. Cheating is common here, so you have to keep a close eye on your girl—especially at first when you are still getting to know each other.

One particular girl to avoid is the “chapiadora.” This is Dominican slang for a gold-digger, but it’s a little more than that. A chapiadora is a women who tries her hardest to extract money from guys and it doesn’t matter how old these guys are.

Chapiadoras are usually easy to spot—they can be seen wearing provocative clothing, heavy makeup, and hair extensions. And usually they are with an older guy. After living here for a while you can spot these women from a mile away. But when you first arrive you have to be careful. The music video below sums up the life of a “chapi.”

It’s also inconvenient that there are so many single moms here. Sometimes it seems like half the girls here are single moms- no exaggeration. However there are fewer single moms in the upper-class neighborhoods. It’s best to avoid dating these single moms because they will constantly ask you for money to give to their kids.

Where To Meet Dominican Girls

This is the question that guys always ask: what’s the best place to meet Dominican women? The short answer is that it’s best to meet them while living your day to day life. The nightlife scene here is not a great option for picking up women.

Daytime

I always think it’s best that you don’t go out of your way in order to meet girls. If you do, then it seems like you are trying too hard, and that can cause a girl to lose attraction for you. It’s best to just meet girls by going through your daily routine. Do you go to the gym? Well there are a lot of fit girls in the gym. Need to go to the mall and buy something? There are a lot of single girls shopping in the mall. Just go over and say hello.

It may seem difficult to go and talk to a complete stranger without the use of alcohol, but it can be fun and it gets easier with practice. You miss 100% of the shots you don’t take, and the girls here will be receptive to your approach. If they like you then you can get their number or go on an “instant date” with them. If they aren’t interested, they will politely excuse themselves.

It’s important to note that you have an advantage as a foreigner. Girls will be curious about you, and most of them won’t be shy in expressing interest. They will look at you and hold eye contact and some will even hiss at you. Make sure to take advantage of these opportunities by going over and making conversation. If you don’t act on it then you will spend the rest of the day thinking about what could have been.

Social Circle

After you've been living here a while then you're going to meet people—both friends and acquaintances. This could be from playing basketball at the park or from going to the same restaurant and getting to know the staff. Regardless, the locals will try to set you up and it doesn't matter with whom- it could be their sister, cousin, or even their mother. But most likely it will be their cousin because they all have a lot of cousins. So if you're social, then you will get dates by not even trying.

Nightlife

Surprisingly, the nightlife is not very good here and it's especially not very good for meeting girls. This is because single girls rarely go out by themselves. They usually go with guys so you will see a lot of mixed groups out at night. However there are a few good nightlife venues in Santo Domingo that are more western style.

Online Options

If you're open to online dating then it can be very effective here. In Santo Domingo there are a lot of girls with online dating profiles so you would not run out of girls to message. The negative aspect of online dating is that it's tedious and it can discourage you from talking to girls in real life. There are also a lot of poor girls who go on online dating sites in order to meet a foreigner to provide for them. The positive aspect of online dating is that it can lead to a lot of dates. The top online dating site here is Dominican Cupid.

Conclusion

Overall the girls here are nice, but they shouldn’t be the only reason you visit. You certainly have to be careful with some of these girls, especially when you first arrive and are unfamiliar with the culture. Before you arrive, you should study up on Spanish because it will certainly be helpful.

Read More: Introduction to Japanese Girls

Joe Schmidt
Joe Schmidt is a former world traveler who now lives year-round in the Dominican Republic. You can read more of his travel articles by visiting his website: Dominican Living.

How To Make Her Your Girlfriend

November 3, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There comes a time in the life of even the most hardened player when he meets a girl that he likes and wants to spend time with exclusively. This can be for a variety of reasons. Many men go into game in the first place with the sole purpose of forming a relationship, realising that a life of spinning plates is neither advisable or particularly enjoyable after a brief period. Others enjoy playing the field, but then considerations such as their career or business become pressing, and time spent chasing girls seems a waste.

Others still, for better or worse, meet a girl that they feel meets their requirements in a partner, one of those rare “good girls” they don’t want to let go of. Finally, some get tired of the carousel and decide they want to step off for a while with a girl who is especially hot, or who gives great blowjobs.

Whatever your motive, if you want to make a particular girl your girlfriend you must consider the matter carefully and ensure that you go about it in the right way.

The Counterintuitive Truth About Relationships

As with many aspects of game, the best method for getting into a relationship with a girl you like is counterintuitive. Many men, following poor advice from magazines, mainstream websites or worse, female friends, imagine that getting a girlfriend involves having “the conversation” — that is, sitting down and “telling her your feelings,” how much you like her and your plans for a happy future together.

Nothing could be less effective.

Here’s the truth — if you want to be with her in an exclusive way, she has to be the one to initiate things, not you.

Making Her Want You Long-Term

As many men on forums and in the comments sections of websites like ROK point out, women have many options these days, what with Tinder and social networking and so on, and they’re not afraid to take advantage of them. For you to stand out from the crowd and become the kind of guy she feels she’d like to hang on to, you need to demonstrate two attributes—that you are are a scarce resource and that you are a great provider of sex.

Why? Well, scarcity is a no-brainer and relates to game theory that is as old as the hills (or at least as old as Neil Strauss!). If you are too readily available then your value will drop in her eyes, and she'll be on Tinder chasing the next aloof and mysterious fellow. And as for sex—well, sex really is the glue that binds modern relationships together, at least in the beginning. Remember, girls like to get down and dirty as much as we do. If you're not giving her a great experience each and every time then she will be inclined to seek out someone else who will.

Maintaining Scarcity

So how do you remain a scarce resource in her world? It's really just as simple as not being too available, either in person or digitally. Very simple rules to follow include not messaging her every day, and when you do, ensuring that the length of your texts does not exceed that of hers. Don't be accessible every night of the week and never drop pre-existing plans to see her just because she's free.

At all times you should strive to maintain an air of mystery and detachment. Be a man in demand who always has something else to do. When you operate like this it's amazing how long women will stick around and how obsessed with you they will become.

Sex Comes Before Feelings

This isn’t a good sex guide so I don’t intend to get into a detailed explanation of how you should service your girl here, but bear in mind that each time you have sex with her you should imagine it’s the last and you must put in a suitably vigorous performance. Don’t be hold back on dirty talk and porn-like moves. Ideally you want her to feel like she’s getting something out of the ordinary from you that she won’t get from those beta-boy orbiters in her smartphone.

Remember: sex comes before feelings in relationships. Don’t make the mistake of thinking tender emotional appeals will sway her. Today’s women (and men) desire increasingly visceral and intense experiences in order to stay interested. Ensure that these are what you are delivering.

The Most Effective Way To Land a Girlfriend?

Now that you are appraised of the two most important aspects of landing a girlfriend you may be wondering how best to put them into practice. Well, the slightly perverse truth of the matter is that you are most likely to wind up with a regular girl when you are busy sleeping around.

It may sound crazy, but it’s true.

When you are having sex with a variety of women you will naturally display a noncommittal “distance” that is very hard to fake. Also, with sex as with everything else, practice makes perfect. Sleeping with a variety of women will help you pick up different techniques and will hone your skills.

It is only when you demonstrate scarcity and you are great in bed that girls will try to “pin you down” and make you their boyfriend. And a relationship will really only work if she has “shown hand” and pursued you, rather than the other way around. Don’t make the mistake of being the beta chump who expresses his feelings too early. You will only be punished for it down the line.

Consider carefully too whether you actually want to be in a relationship. If you do, is she really the right person? Relationships can be a massive pain in the ass and can significantly affect your freedom and autonomy, so don’t go into one lightly. In fact, if you are below the age of thirty, you are probably better off avoiding them altogether, at least until you have become experienced enough to truly know what you want.

Whatever you do though, bear in mind that—perhaps sadly—in a world where romance has been all but excised by societal shifts and technology, it is the committed player rather than the poetic sap who is most likely to be able to leverage a pleasurable medium to long-term relationship.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why the Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need to Learn Game Now

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Will #CuckRogen Lead To The End Of Seth Rogen's Career And Marriage?

November 3, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In the past week, actor and "comedian" Seth Rogen has been under fire for his anti-white, anti-Christian views. The hashtags #BoycottTheNightBefore and #CuckRogen have been trending on Twitter for the past couple of days, spearheaded in part by writer and First Amendment attorney Mike Cernovich. Twitter users have been airing their grievances against Rogen and calling for a boycott of his upcoming film The Night Before, a comedy about three friends who decide to throw a wild Christmas Eve party:

https://twitter.com/Iuventutem Meam/status/661415885962366976

https://twitter.com/cbanks420lol/status/661365429336600576

https://twitter.com/MGTOW_Link/status/661218860675264512

> #BoycottTheNightBefore because @Sethrogen has said he's making it to mock Christianity!
> Everyone, please retweet! #CuckRogen
>
> — Dylan E. (@DillyDally330) November 2, 2015

The popularity of #BoycottTheNightBefore and #CuckRogen displays how much power the alternative right and neomasculinity has in shaping the public discourse. As recently as last year, leftist domination of Twitter and the other barometers of social influence was all but complete, with frequent witch-hunts and mob attacks against anyone who dissented from the social justice line. Ever since GamerGate cleared the way for anti-leftist discourse to grow in popularity, the alt-right has found a voice in the public sphere.

But more importantly, #CuckRogen and #BoycottTheNightBefore may spell the end of Seth Rogen's marriage and career. For the past decade, Rogen has been riding high, buoyed by his association with Judd Apatow and the string of successful comedies he put out in the mid-2000's such as The 40-Year Old Virgin, Knocked Up and Superbad. However, his antagonistic attitude towards his predominantly white fans as well as his collapsing relationship with his wife have tarnished his public image, possibly beyond repair.

How Mike Cernovich Cucked Seth Rogen

Rogen's woes began two months ago, when he suddenly and inexplicably took a potshot at whites:

> If you think there's some conspiracy against white people, you are, I guarantee, a stupid white person.
>
> — Seth Rogen (@Sethrogen) September 17, 2015

Mike Cernovich responded with some jabs, and bizarrely enough, Rogen responded, despite the vast gulf in their popularity levels:

Cernovich then baited Rogen into admitting that he was having problems with his wife, Lauren Miller Rogen:

While it was astounding enough that someone in this part of the Internet managed to bait a major film star into an argument on Twitter, what happened next was nothing short of stunning. A couple weeks after Rogen and Cernovich's exchange, Rogen's wife replied to Cernovich with this:

While Lauren Miller Rogen has since deleted her Tweet, it's been preserved for posterity all over the Internet.

Cernovich seized on her comment, writing a post at his blog titled "Why Does Seth Rogen's Wife Want to Have Sex with Me?" Cernovich pointed out that despite his fame and money, Rogen is still an emotionally stunted, obese loser who thinks smoking pot is edgy:

> Seth's physical condition is common of men who have a self-loathing mindset. If you hate yourself for being white, black, gay, or a man or woman: How can you value yourself enough to lift weights and eat a healthy diet?

National media picked up on Cernovich's post and Lauren Miller Rogen's Tweet, sending enough traffic to Danger & Play to overload the site's servers. Cernovich then created the #CuckRogen hashtag on Twitter to further inflame the issue:

> If an SJW says something I can pounce on, that's how we play. The PC police can learn what it means to walk on egg shells! #CuckRogen
>
> — Mike Cernovich (@Cernovich) November 2, 2015

Seth Rogen will never be able to live this incident down. As Cernovich wrote in a follow-up piece:

> Seth Rogen is now known as Cuck Rogen. Whenever he attempts to release a new film, the cucking will follow him. The story went viral and the meme is forever.

Say Good Night, Seth!

#CuckRogen and #BoycottTheNightBefore aren't the only problems that Seth Rogen has had to contend with recently. Conservatives on Twitter successfully pulled off a boycott of Rogen's last movie, the biopic Steve Jobs, last month after he went on a tirade against Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson. Rogen was apparently incensed at Carson's comments that Jews could have resisted the Nazis in the 1930's and 1940's were it not for gun control:

> Fuck you @RealBenCarson.
>
> — Seth Rogen (@Sethrogen) October 9, 2015

As Breitbart's John Nolte reported, Steve Jobs was a massive box office bomb, grossing only $7 million in its theatrical run despite costing between $30-60 million to make.

With one film of his already bombing due to his anti-white, anti-Christian comments and his public reputation in tatters after being cucked by Mike Cernovich, Seth Rogen's career is in serious danger. Having alienated the bulk of his fans and publicly emasculated, it's going to be difficult—if not impossible—for Rogen to recover from these humiliations. If he can't rebuild his image, Rogen will find himself shut out of an industry that's recognized him as box office poison.

Goodbye Seth, and don't let the door hit you in the vagina on the way out.

Read Next: How To Lead The Dance Of Seduction

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Straight From The Underground: The Only Steroid Guidebook You Will Ever Need

November 3, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

---

The following article was sponsored by John Doe Bodybuilding

After months of effort, Straight from the Underground – The Underground Steroid Guidebook, is finally complete and available.

I'm really excited to be releasing this ebook on performance enhancement because it’s knowledge to you from personal experience!!!

You see, unlike the rest of the internet community who are basically a bunch of talking parrots, I talk about things I’ve actually done!!

I dispel the myths and the lies and steer you through the smoke. There is a lot of wrong information floating around now, and this information is hurting people more and more by the day.

Yes, the internet is a valuable tool for research and learning, but the issue with performance enhancers is that you pick up little pieces of info here and there and then try to put it together like a puzzle.

>> Straight From the Undergound available here <<

What if you had a comprehensive guide that would drive you straight to the answers you were looking for?

Well now you do, Straight from the Underground takes you deep into the dark side of anabolic steroids, peptides, HGH, insulin, post cycle therapy, and troubleshooting issues such as injection infections and measurements.

Straight from the Underground covers unit conversions in an easy to understand manner that is like 1,2,3!!!

“This is how much water you draw out to fill this vial of peptide, and this is what you draw your insulin syringe back to when using this peptide every day.”

Straight from the Underground is so easy to read and effective that it took my book editor from knowing NOTHING ABOUT PERFORMANCE ENHANCERS to knowing MORE THAN MOST SEASONED GYM VETS after just a couple reads.

When he told me how much he had learned about anabolics, I knew right then and there that this was going to be a great book on performance enhancement!!!

Numerous cycle layouts are explained right down to the T; everything from how many weeks to what doses to when you switch compounds, to when you add in compounds.

For every steroid, peptide, or HGH, there are cycle layouts that directly follow.

Everything from beginner cycles to intermediate, to cycles a top bodybuilder would run are covered in this read!!

Yes, I am biased towards old school cycles and moderate dosages, so you’ll see a lot of that in this guide, but you’ll also see some examples of peptide runs combined with steroid cycles that even I wouldn’t run, but someone else may, and I wanted to include everyone in Straight from the Underground.

Straight from the Underground is one of the newest reads on running steroids and peptides that you could get your hands on.

What makes this ebook so worth getting your hands on? That one is easy; it was written by the Guinea pig and not the Dr!!!

There are many guys out there with nobody to talk to on this topic, so think of Straight from the Underground as your steroid reference bible.

Everything in this book has helped launch my physique from the 140 lb. skinny kid to the 220 lb chiseled beast in the making!!

This ebook also takes health into consideration as well, because without health then there is no body right? Learn what to look out for while on cycle, what to look most at when getting bloodwork done, and the right way to go about testosterone replacement therapy.

Learn about low dose cycles that work well with testosterone replacement therapy!!

I'm telling you guys, everything from the beginner who has never even touched a needle or pill, to the older guy who just wants to use something to look and feel stronger and more youthful, is covered in Straight from the Undergound!!

There is nobody online right now who is more straight-forward and no bullshit than John Doe.

No, I don't have fancy videos or the same motivational bullshit as everyone else, but people who follow JDB follow JDB for real knowledge, not pipe dreams. I'm not selling anybody the fish here, JDB is teaching the man to fish!!

My ebooks and website have everything you need to gain an edge on life and stand out from the crowd.

I have been writing articles on fitness and life for a long time now, and I'm telling you that the money you spend on this comprehensive guide to using performance enhancers will be the best $29.99 you've spent in a long time!!

There is NO SUPPLEMENT for the same price as this ebook that will ever take you as far as this ebook will.

Straight from the Underground is like “The book of Eli” and once you have it, you better keep it safe and protected!

I don’t preach about performance enhancement on Johndoebodybuilding.com, and I welcome natural guys just as much as steroid users.

But there are a lot of natural guys who are ready to take things to the next level, and there is just nothing I can give you over website that would compare to the information in this all new performance enhancement guide!!

Are you ready to get huge and chiseled? Are you ready for real answers from a real guy who has been there and done it? Then my friend, it’s time to get your hands on a copy of Straight from the Underground!!!

See you at the starting gate!!!

Train hard – JD

> > Buy Straight From the Underground here.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Why Are Only Men Punished In “Revenge Porn” Cases?

November 4, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Rugby league player Curtis Sironen is not someone whose name means that much to me. But he has become embroiled in a bitter controversy, apparently having been found in bed with a woman who wasn’t his girlfriend. His Twitter account was commandeered and a photo of what looks to be Sironen and his blonde conquest, naked from behind, was published there. Other changes were made to the profile, including a description reading “Professional cheater living the life.”

The most telling suggestion that Sironen’s now ex-girlfriend, Patricia Hadjia, is responsible for the revenge porn act against the blonde is this tweet written by someone from his account:

Across various Facebook pages, including the one for Sydney's Daily Telegraph, most commenters are expressing merriment or feelings of schadenfreude against Sironen. Others have questioned why he was stupid enough to tattoo his girlfriend's name on himself. Although I agree Sironen's choice of ink was a catatonic one, few have turned the tables and suggested that the person sharing the photo, most likely Hadjia, has broken the law.

One of those who has, thankfully, is Herald-Sun columnist Wendy Tuohy. She makes the terribly cogent point that as the perennial do-gooders pillory Sironen for being a bad role model, many less people will emphasize the criminal act of whoever plastered the photo across the internet, aided by the hundreds or thousands of zealous anti-cheating warriors sharing it.

Australian men have been prosecuted and jailed for sharing sexual photos without consent

Footballer BJ Leilua was charged by police and found guilty for a revenge porn-themed text message… to two people. What will Hadjia face if she is the instigator of this most recent revenge porn picture?

Sydneysider Ravshan Usmanov was jailed for six months in 2012 for sharing nude photos of his ex-girlfriend online. Interestingly, he was charged under general criminal provisions related to using a carriage service (telecommunications devices and the internet) to offend, harass, or menace.

If Hadjia did indeed disseminate the naked photo of her boyfriend's sexual partner, she should be facing a comparable, if not higher penalty. Unlike in the Usmanov case, the person circulating the photo of the blonde has punished a participant who isn't one half of the couple. It may not be nice to sleep with someone else's partner, but the unknown woman has a) no obligation of fidelity owed to Hadjia and b) we do not even know if she knew Sironen was in a relationship.

In the sport of rugby league, the issue of so-called revenge porn is not a new one. BJ Leilua, admittedly not the most intelligent person to play the game, was spared a formal conviction but found himself vigorously prosecuted for sending a naked photo of his ex-girlfriend to her brother and best friend.

Leilua's act, irrespective of the embarrassment to the girl, was not a public advertisement for all to see. On the other hand, Hadjia or someone else took that much larger step of "let's let the whole world see."

What if Curtis Sironen had been naked?

Patricia Hadjia and Curtis Sironen when a couple.

If a woman purportedly posting revenge porn of her boyfriend's mistress isn't enough to warrant mass condemnation, as happens when a male shares similar photos of a female, the prospects of any measurable sympathy for a man finding his nude pictures published are beyond grim. Maybe Wendy Tuohy of the Herald-Sun would have been uninterested in the story if the person photographed naked had been the male footballer and not the blonde.

Such counterfactuals are by no means outlandish in a world where study after study demonstrates that female offenders get less severe sentences for the same crime and are less likely to be arrested, charged, prosecuted, and found guilty in the first place.

Modern feminist rhetoric, from university dorm "rape culture" to "cyber violence" summits sponsored by the UN, cannot cope with the idea that women should be regularly held to account for their over-the-top reactions. Yet feminists demand that men should always be excoriated (often over allegations that cannot be proven). The same goes for victimhood, which requires a steady stream of offended females, separated by a very occasional legitimate male victim (only for the purposes of declaring how equality-minded they are).

Patricia Hadjia, if she's the one behind the photo, will probably only find that her Instagram account is more popular and that she can make more money by parading herself both there and elsewhere.

Scorned or just angry women will always have excuses made for them

Ravshan Usmanov was jailed for posting nude pictures of his ex-girlfriend online. Will Hadjia be prosecuted, let alone imprisoned, if she's behind the naked blonde photograph?

The excuses are so rampant nowadays that virtual silence is the response to many an allegation of appalling female behavior. People may be talking about the photograph but it's not for any reason you would find if a man were holding the camera. From glassing men who text other girls to the staggering number of instances of female domestic violence, women who lose control are simply presumed to have been wronged to such an extent that what they do is either completely justified or mitigated spectacularly by the circumstances.

So don't be shocked if Patricia Hadjia or whoever else did this walk away from the situation with zero negative consequences and a lot of positive ones.

Read More: Why Feminism Is To Blame For Revenge Porn

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Women Must Have Their Behavior And Decisions Controlled By Men

November 4, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After a long period in society of women having unlimited personal freedom to pursue life as they wish, they have shown to consistently fail in making the right decisions that prevent their own harm and the harm of others. Systems must now be put in place where a woman's behavior is monitored and her decisions subject to approval of a male relative or guardian who understands what's in her best interests better than she does herself.

Women have had personal freedoms for less than a century. For the bulk of human history, their behavior was significantly controlled or subject to approval through mechanisms of tribe, family, church, law, or stiff cultural precepts. It was correctly assumed that a woman was unable to make moral, ethical, and wise decisions concerning her life and those around her. She was not allowed to study any trivial topic she wanted, sleep with any man who caught her fancy, or uproot herself and travel the world because she wanted to "find herself."

You can see this level of control today in many Muslim countries, where expectations are placed on women from a young age to submit to men, reproduce (if biologically able), follow God's word, and serve the good of society by employing her feminine nature instead of competing directly against men on the labor market due to penis envy or feelings of personal inferiority.

The reason that women had their behavior limited was for the simple reason that they are significantly less rational than men, in a way that impaired their ability to make good decisions concerning the future. This was eloquently described by German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer in his important essay On Women. He described them as overgrown children, a comparison that any man who has dated more than a dozen of them can quickly agree to after having consistently witnessed their impulsive and illogical behavior firsthand.

> Women are directly fitted for acting as the nurses and teachers of our early childhood by the fact that they are themselves childish, frivolous and short-sighted; in a word, they are big children all their life long—a kind of intermediate stage between the child and the full-grown man, who is man in the strict sense of the word. See how a girl will fondle a child for days together, dance with it and sing to it; and then think what a man, with the best will in the world, could do if he were put in her place.
>
> […]
>
> …women remain children their whole life long; never seeing anything but what is quite close to them, cleaving to the present moment, taking appearance for reality, and preferring trifles to matters of the first importance.
>
> […]
>
> That woman is by nature meant to obey may be seen by the fact that every woman who is placed in the unnatural position of complete independence, immediately attaches herself to some man, by whom she allows herself to be guided and ruled. It is because she needs a lord and master.

When you give a female unlimited choice on which man to have sex with, what type of man does she choose? An exciting man who treats her poorly and does not care for her well-being.

When you give a female choice on what to study in university, what does she choose? An easy liberal arts major that costs over $50,000 and dooms her to a life of debt and sporadic employment.

When a female lacks any urgent demands upon her survival, what behavior does she pursue? Obsessively displaying her half-naked body on the internet, flirting with men solely for attention, becoming addicted to corporate-produced entertainment, and over-indulging in food until her body shape is barely human.

When you give a female choice on when to have kids, what does she do? After her fertility is well past its peak, and in a rushed panic that resembles the ten seconds before the ringing of the first school bell, she aims for limited reproductive success at an age that increases the likelihood she'll pass on genetic defects to her child.

When you give a female choice of which political leader to vote into office, who do they vote for? The one who is more handsome and promises unsustainable freebies that accelerate the decline of her country.

When you give a female unwavering societal trust with the full backing of the state, what does she do? Falsely accuse a man of rape and violence out of revenge or just to have an excuse for the boyfriend who caught her cheating.

When you give a female choice on who to marry, what is the result? A 50% divorce rate, with the far majority of them (80%) initiated by women themselves.

While a woman is in no doubt possession of crafty intelligence that allows her to survive just as well as a man, mostly through the use of her sexuality and wiles, she is a slave to the present moment and therefore unable to make decisions that benefit her future and those of the society she's a part of. Once you give a woman personal freedom, like we have in the Western world, she enslaves herself to one of numerous vices and undertakes a rampage of destruction to her body and those who want to be a meaningful part of her life.

A man does not need to look further than the women he knows, including those in his family, to see that the more freedom a woman was given, the worse off she is, while the woman who was under the heavy hand of the church or male relative comes out far better on the other side, in spite of her rumblings that she wants to be as free as her liberated friends, who eagerly and regularly post soft porn photos of themselves on social networking and dating sites while selecting random anonymous men for fornication every other weekend.

Men, on average, make better decisions than women. If you take this to be true, which should be no harder to accept than the claim that lemons are sour, why is a woman allowed to make decisions at all without first getting approval from a man who is more rational and levelheaded than she is? It not only hurts the woman making decisions concerning her life, but it also hurts any man who will associate with her in the future. You only need to ask the many suffering husbands today on how they are dealing with a wife who entered the marriage with a student loan debt in the high five figures from studying sociology and how her wildly promiscuous sexual history impairs her ability to remain a dedicated mother, with one foot already out the door after he makes a reasonable demand that is essential for a stable home and strong family.

I propose two different options for protecting women from their obviously deficient decision making. The first is to have a designated male guardian give approval on all decisions that affect her well-being. Such a guardian should be her father by default, but in the case a father is absent, another male relative can be appointed or she can be assigned one by charity organizations who groom men for this purpose, in a sort of Boy's Club for women.

She must seek approval by her guardian concerning diet, education, boyfriends, travel, friends, entertainment, exercise regime, marriage, and appearance, including choice of clothing. A woman must get a green light from her guardian before having sex with any man, before wearing a certain outfit, before coloring her hair green, and before going to a Spanish island for the summer with her female friends.

If she disobeys her guardian, an escalating series of punishments would be served to her, culminating in full-time supervision by him. Once the woman is married, her husband will gradually take over guardian duties, and strictly monitor his wife's behavior and use all reasonable means to keep it in control so that family needs are met first and foremost, as you already see today in most Islamic societies. Any possible monetary proceeds she would get from divorce would be limited so that she has more incentive to keep her husband happy and pleased than to throw him under the bus for the most trivial of reasons that stem from her persistent and innate need to make bad decisions.

A second option for monitoring women is a combination of rigid cultural rules and sex-specific laws. Women would not be able to attend university unless the societal need is urgent where an able-minded man could not be found to fill the specific position. Women would not be able to visit establishments that serve alcohol without a man present to supervise her consumption. Parental control software on electronic devices would be modified for women to control and monitor the information they consume. Credit card and banking accounts must have a male co-signer who can monitor her spending. Curfews for female drivers must be enacted so that women are home by a reasonable hour. Abortion for women of all ages must be signed off by her guardian, in addition to prescriptions for birth control.

While my proposals are undoubtedly extreme on the surface and hard to imagine implementing, the alternative of a rapidly progressing cultural decline that we are currently experiencing will end up entailing an even more extreme outcome. Women are scratching their most hedonistic and animalistic urges to mindlessly pursue entertainment, money, socialist education, and promiscuous behavior that only satisfies their present need to debase themselves and feel fleeting pleasure, at a heavy cost for society.

Allowing women unlimited personal freedom has so affected birth rates in the West that the elite insists on now allowing importation of millions of third world immigrants from democratically-challenged nations that threaten the survival of the West. In other words, giving women unbridled choice to pursue their momentary whims instead of investing in traditional family ideals and reproduction is a contributing factor to what may end up being the complete collapse of those nations that have allowed women to do as they please.

I make these sincere recommendations not out of anger, but under the firm belief that the lives of my female relatives would certainly be better tomorrow if they were required to get my approval before making any decisions. They would not like it, surely, but due to the fact that I'm male and they're not, my analytical decision-making faculty is superior to theirs to absolutely no fault of their own, meaning that their most sincere attempts to make good decisions will have a failure rate larger than if I was able to make those decisions for them, especially with intentions that are fully backed with compassion and love for them to have more satisfying lives than they do now.

As long as we continue to treat women as equals to men, a biological absurdity that will one day be the butt of many jokes for comedians of the future, women will continue to make horrible decisions that hurt themselves, their families, and their reproductive potential. Unless we take action soon to reconsider the freedoms that women now have, the very survival of Western civilization is at stake.

This article was originally published on RooshV.com.

Read Next: People Should Not Be Allowed Unlimited Personal Freedom

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

A Brief Guide To Fitness After 40

November 4, 2015 | by Clark Kent | Link | Original Link

A few years ago I reached a significant milestone in my life: I turned 40 years old. I hear that I was supposed to get a tattoo, buy a Harley, start a few bar fights, and despair over the insignificance of my life. But a mid-life crisis was the last thing on my mind.

I've continued training into my 40's. The fact that I've lifted weights since my teenage years is no small part of my current enjoyment of life. I'd like to share some of my thoughts on building and keeping muscle and staying lean into your 40's and beyond.

Here's the bad news: your body does change somewhat as you age (I'm sure you needed my help to reach that profound conclusion). I can't stay up until 3:00 a.m. and hope to be coherent the next day. I can't binge on junk food without feeling lethargic. I'm not going to naturally put on another 20 lb. of muscle like I did when I was a novice trainee.

But there's also good news for mature trainees like myself: old muscle does respond to training. My research indicates hypertrophy (muscle growth) is possible into the 7th decade of life (you may be out of luck if you try to build muscle in your 80's, though strength gains can still occur). I intend to maintain a high level of fitness for as long as possible, and I'd encourage you to do the same.

Here are some adjustments I have made as I've gotten older. I think others will likely find them helpful–even younger trainees.

Sleep And Rest

I never have handled sleep deprivation that well. Now that I'm older I have noticed my body and mind is even more sensitive to this, so I try to get plenty of sleep. I'm not talking about taking two naps a day like your grandfather does–I mean getting 7-8 hours per night. Sleep deprivation does bad things to your hormones: it lowers your testosterone and increases your hunger. Needless to say, neither of these is good for staying lean and strong.

Speaking of rest, I try to incorporate more of it into my training routine than in my younger days. I make sure to deload (do a lighter week of lifting) or just take a complete break from training every few weeks. This gives my joints a break and helps keep my central nervous system from getting burned out.

Training And Exercise

Dumbbells can be especially useful for mature trainees.

I still train with weights at least three times a week (as I have for the past 25 years). I still lift heavy, but I'm not nearly as obsessed with pushing and pulling big weights as I used to be. Joint health is now a concern, so I have made a few adjustments for the sake of longevity. Most of the changes in my routine are designed to train my muscles effectively with less weight. Here are a few examples:

*I'm more conscientious about stretching and warming up than I used to be.

*I do front squats a lot more than I used to. This movement just as effect as the back squat for legs with less spinal compression and shearing forces on the knees.

*I limit my heavy sets and spend a little more time doing sets with higher rep ranges.

*I do more dumbbell exercises than I used to. Dumbbell bench press, for example, tends to be easier on the shoulders than the barbell version (I had shoulder surgery back in the 90's).

*I also try to incorporate more single arm and leg training than I used to.

I'm really just scratching the surface here as far as doing more with less weight. But I'm learning there are a lot of exercises and techniques that are very effective.

I am also more concerned with cardiovascular health these days. I do some interval training and/or steady-state cardio on the days I don't lift.

Nutrition

I think we are only beginning to understand the toll inflammation takes on our health–the effect of consuming too much sugar and highly processed carbohydrates. Eating a higher protein, moderate carbohydrate/fat diet seems like a sensible way to combat this, so that's what I do. I also use intermittent fasting as a way to stay lean.

Speaking of staying lean: I don't "bulk up." I haven't done that since I was in my 20's. I do find it necessary do the opposite: every year or two I spend a few weeks dieting to make sure I keep my waist narrow and my stomach flat. This keeps my body fat level from slowly creeping up–the nemesis of many men my age. Most guys my age have added a few pounds per year since high school, leaving them with terrible physiques.

Staying lean has been one of my top priorities as I get older. It is important for overall health and for optimizing testosterone–getting too fat will result in elevated estrogen levels.

Supplementation

Whey protein can help you build and keep muscle.

I consider myself a minimalist when it comes to supplementation: I use whey protein, micronized creatine monohydrate, fish oil, and a multivitamin. I think these supplements are the foundation for any trainee of any age.

I'll add something else here: whey protein is particularly helpful for older athletes because our bodies use protein less efficiently as we age (another reason to increase your overall protein intake). Supplements that are rich in l-leucine (like whey protein or branch-chain amino acids) can help combat this.

I also take vitamin D (levels of this vitamin tend to decrease with age) as well as CoQ10 (which is good for cardiovascular health and blood pressure). Otherwise I haven't changed my supplementation that much over the years.

Conclusion

Here's something you may have noticed about most of my suggestions: most of them are good for trainees of any age. You can start incorporating many of these habits into your life as a young trainee–you'll thank me now and when you get older.

Read More: Five Ways To Boost Your Testosterone

Clark Kent
Gym rat, entrepreneur, former supplement addict, and practitioner of intermittent fasting. Visit his blog: Build Muscle. Lose Fat. You can also follow him on Facebook or Twitter.

4 Morning Rituals For Neomasculine Men

November 5, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

How you spend the first three hours of your day is the lynchpin for how the rest of it goes. You can try blind luck as a means of maximizing your day, just hoping that flow or productivity will come your way. Or you can harness the power of these four simple methods, based on common sense divisions of different areas of your life.

Take what I write here as a template. Add your own ideas but always keep the core balance between the important parts of your life. You may need to set your alarm earlier and cut out more redundant activities (like TV) the night before. Commit to yourself and not ESPN, your PS4 or particularly your overbearing girlfriend (no, wait, you can just dump her). Your mornings need to start being more about you.

1. Get to the gym… or take the gym to your home

Having your gym shoes and bag ready by the bed isn't just about saving time, it's about eliminating any possible excuses for not going to lift some weights. For those men who can guarantee 100% that they will head to the gym for a purposeful, focused session every day, other than on a legitimate rest day, good for you. For the rest of those reading this, you know what you have to do.

Study after study demonstrates the superiority of exercise in the morning. Whilst this ritual should not be a Gospel truth, at least 90% of men are more than physically able to get to the gym at the crack of dawn or some time before 9am. So why aren't you?

For those who find an early morning workout is best done at home, invest in some moderately-priced gym equipment and make your commitment to sculpt your body each and every day. Even without gym equipment, there's absolutely no reason for not having an acted-on daily system of bodyweight and other simple exercises (push-ups, sit-ups and the absolute menagerie of circuits and routines you can do with nothing but yourself, a few cheap free weights, a medicine ball or other goddamned simple devices).

2. Read for 25 minutes to expand your mind

If you read quality, masculinity-furthering literature for an extra 25-45 minutes each day, six days a week (just over 300 days a year) and after jumping out of bed, what sort of positive, life-sustaining outcomes are you setting yourself up for? The answer is potentially revolutionary ones.

Naturally, you need to take the additional step of acting on what you read (for which there are plenty of articles here on ROK, including my recent article 3 Ways To Cultivate The Discipline Of A Neomasculine Lifestyle). Reading is nevertheless a means of focus. We cannot always be uncovering the nefarious dealings of our SJW enemies. We need positive, self-reinforcing outlets which bring out the best in us, especially literature promoting the unleashing of your masculine mindset.

With just a $10 or so cost for each ebook and a Kindle device, you have access to a library probably 2,000 times bigger than what your parents and grandparents had as children and young adults. So why aren't you taking advantage of it at the start of your day?

Reading is much more complicated by mid-afternoon, when the urge to lounge around, take things slower or socialize begins to take hold. By all means, socialize and relax after you've spent your day working in that tiny cubicle. The mornings, however, are the best times to be reading. Your mind is fresh and almost anyone you know is either sleeping or getting ready for the day.

If you're not repeating something, usually you either forget it or it remains out of reach at the back of your mind. Your 25 minutes of personal investment in your own education is as much about reading new material as making sure that you revisit and apply older insights you haven't fully taken advantage of. Reading and rereading ROK articles is another fabulous way to commit yourself to daily self-improvement and red pill conditioning, as is spending close to half an hour taking a look at Roosh's collected works (or watching again his groundbreaking State of Man lecture).

3. Write emails (or letters) to the people in your life you like and respect

Like you, I understand the imperative of time. We all get busy. But is the frenetic pace of your life really so frenetic? And frenetic enough to ignore the relationships and friendships that give so much joy to your life? What's more is that people typically use their perceived lack of time as an excuse not to grow their number of social contacts or strengthen their rapport with existing ones. With a few simple emails, letters, calls and texts each morning, you can reverse this sort of stagnation and search for something better: positive connection, each and every day.

You should be keeping quality contact with a minimum of five people per morning, those five people being in addition to your family, girlfriend, booty call babe or your five closest friends. Every day, you ask? Of course, there are some common sense exceptions: you have the biggest job interview of your life, your father dies, or you're about catch a plane to Venice. The rule of thumb, though, needs to be five a day. If you can't do that, are you really the social lothario you mentally make yourself out or want to be?

This morning ritual is not just about some form of written or non-face-to-face verbal contact. It is about the sort of continuity in communication that enables subsequent face-to-face meetings to take place. Face it: most people depend on electronic communication to determine who they hang out with.

If you're not conversing through these modern methods (and don't have guaranteed regular situations where you encounter these people), you're missing out on a potentially great new best friend, sex partner or cool social acquaintance. Just make sure this contact does not become a surrogate for real interaction with people.

4. Visualize and plan your work day

Walking into a busy work office or exam hall can trigger intense feelings. The mindset you cultivated outside work time to use during work time often flies out the window in the face of a unsatisfied boss, troublesome coworkers or unrealistic deadlines. This is why cultivating your mindset needs to be a daily and morning activity, not a weekly one or one revisited whenever a period of significant challenge or stress appears on the horizon. You choose to visualize yourself or negativity will visualize for you. Make your choice!

Various strategies for visualization, which often dovetail with anchoring during your work or study day, have been disseminated for years. My personal favorite is an old NLP one, where I consciously visualize a “circle of power” linked to a specific situation (such as sitting in a meeting before I make a presentation or finalizing an English to French academic translation at my desk). I attach a color to that circle of power, usually purple, and imagine that it fuels a positive performance. When the event actually comes to being in reality, I do the same thing.

There are many ways to do this and describing them all is not the subject of this article. Most are only five seconds of keystrokes away on a search engine for you to learn and memorize. Needless to say, you should be devoting 15 minutes of your morning to this visualization and “cerebral planning.” Focus may be hard to come by initially or or on certain days, but your attempts at this kind of mental rehearsal require genuine effort.

Take the 30 Day David Garrett Challenge

For 30 days, approach your life like a compulsory business or work project. Commit to these four separate investments each and every morning. This will compel you to be highly judicious with your time, cutting out activities across your day so that these more important ones can take priority.

Thanks to cultural conditioning (read: poisoning), a well-honed dedication to neomasculine principles can seem anything but natural. This is still not an excuse.

Your life is in your hands and the best way to make the most of it is to make the most of your mornings, day in, day out.

Read More: What Do Neomasculine Men Do After We Hit The Wall?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Margaret Cho’s #12DaysofRage Campaign Will Encourage Rape Hysteria

November 5, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Get ready for more rape mania, because comedian Margaret Cho is sponsoring a Twitter campaign entitled #12DaysofRage. The stated purpose of the campaign is to “end the silence surrounding sexual abuse.” While it sounds like a noble purpose, it is likely to degenerate into just another vehicle for generating more rape hysteria.

Margaret Cho: Poster Child For Progressivism’s Effect On Women

Margaret Cho from her recent appearance on the Wendy Williams Show

Margaret Cho is a Korean-American comedian who experienced quite a bit of mainstream success in the early 2000s with her stand up comedy tours. Later, she took up progressive causes with a vengeance and it seemed to have hurt her career a bit.

Cho is the poster child for what happens to women if they follow progressive philosophy to its logical end. First, she is massively tatted. While searching for a pic of her tattoos I saw—to my eternal regret—that even her butt cheeks are covered in tattoos. As ROK readers know, excessive tattoos are an indicator of emotional instability.

She thinks white people are horribly racist, but when it comes to reverse discrimination, they are "fragile."

> .@margaretcho shares what she finds the most annoying about white people. https://t.co/jDacJCdhHF pic.twitter.com/fdxhcCEs6J
>
> — GOOD (@good) November 3, 2015

Cho is strongly pro abortion.

> I do not believe in a God who would consider abortion a sin. God created abortion. As he did all of us. God created choice for all to DECIDE — Margaret Cho (@margaretcho) September 29, 2015

She was a sex worker.

> Sex work is simply work. For me it was honest work. I was a sex worker when I was young. It was hard but well paid. There's no shame in it. — Margaret Cho

> (@margaretcho) October 29, 2015

Cho has been involved in polyamorous relationships. Of course, she also claims to be bisexual.

> I am more than bisexual. I am everything. I am all love. — Margaret Cho (@margaretcho) May 13, 2014

Cho is a big advocate of the LGBTQ community. She claims to be Christian but she also thinks that Jesus was a "power bottom."

> I think Jesus is a very good teacher. Really, he's such a power bottom! Jesus was all about taking other people's pain and absorbing it, and making himself stronger because of it — absorbing all the negativity from your persecutors and taking it on for someone else. He is not at all about guilt. A lot of Christianity has been distorted by anti-gay stuff that doesn't even exist in the Bible at all. I think of Christ, at face value, is very much a power bottom. That's a really good thing to be!

Margaret is uniquely qualified to kick off the #12DaysofRage because she too claims to have been a victim of rape.

> Send me your videos – tell me your story. #12daysofrage I was a victim of rape for far too long. Now I'm a SURVIVOR! Tell me how you lived. — Margaret Cho (@margaretcho) November 1, 2015

The premise for the campaign, which started on November 1st, is that for twelve days people will tweet out about their rapes so that Cho and other Twitter people can say things like, "I support you." At the end of the twelve days, Cho will release a video entitled "I Wanna Kill My Rapist." As you can imagine with a name like #12DaysofRage and someone as flakey as Cho spearheading it, the campaign is probably not going to be a healthy exercise. Rather, it is going to be another status signaling drill in our perpetually injured therapy culture.

The Crime Of Rape

Mattress Girl and a friend

Let me just say at the outset that rape is a serious crime—it is a felony in every state. Rape occurs when a person engages in sex with another person by “forcible compulsion” or “incapable of consent by reason of being physically helpless.” Rape can also occur if the victim is underage, regardless of whether he or she consents or not. All decent men hate rapists. The man who uses his superior strength to force himself upon a weaker person simply to relieve his base passion is beyond despicable.

The harsh sentences for rape reflect society’s universal contempt for this crime. Because rape is such a serious crime, the criminal justice system also contains protections for individuals who are accused of rape. As in every other crime, the accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty. To do this, there needs to be evidence to convict the accused. It is not a perfect system. Sometimes guilty men go free and innocent men are sent to prison.

Over the past few years, though, we’ve seen a shift in society. Years of feminist indoctrination have taught us that rape can be virtually anything. The best example of this is the Rolling Stone Duke rape hoax where innocent men were punished for what turned out to be a complete fabrication.

#12DaysofRage

The most interesting thing about this campaign is that I don’t think it would be at all helpful to a real rape survivor. How are encouraging words from a Twitter “friend” going help anyone heal from a violent sexual assault? This is obvious from conversations like this which are more about status signaling and affirming the new fake genders that Facebook popularized than they are about recovering from rape.

Is there a university course that I can take to explain all of these new gender/sexual orientations?

On this next one, it sounds like the girl is claiming it was rape, but the boyfriend thinks it was cheating.

There are a lot of tweets expressing the absolute necessity of believing the rape claim, even if there is no evidence to back it up. To do anything less is hurtful.

> Nothing hurts more than people you love not believing you. ALWAYS trust and support survivors when they tell you their story. #12daysofrage — Ponta [¬º-°]¬ (@typicalfeminist) November 3, 2015

> @typicalfeminist Yes to this. You can never do wrong by believing the survivor; trying to stay “neutral” isn’t neutral at all. — Rebeca Andrade (@DarthLolita) November 3, 2015

This one made me wonder if there is an unstated implication of “It doesn’t matter if you consented and then changed your mind later on”?

Finally, a tweet from a gay man reminds us that women are not the only ones who get raped.

> #12daysofrage Male victims of sexual assault are more common than you realize, yet society tells them it never happens or gives zero support — tatsandarmylife (@nevertrustdudes) November 1, 2015

The good news is that while these people may be suffering from their rape, recovery is on its way with these soothing words from Margaret Cho herself. I found this very healing.

Rape That No One Cares About

Honduran immigrant wanted for allegedly raping a four year old girl.

While #12DaysofRage purports to be against rape, it is silent on some of the most heinous sexual assaults that are being committed today. The tweeters are silent on the 80% of women and girls who are raped while they are trying to cross into the US illegally. They are silent on ISIS rape camps, and they are silent on the rapes that the Islamic “refugees” are committing as they invade Europe. The reason that Margaret Cho and the other tweeters conveniently ignore these atrocities because they don’t fit into the narrative that most sexual assaults are being committed by straight white men in the US.

Conclusion

#12DaysofRage sounds like it has a very lofty goal, but I believe its main purpose is to give publicity to boost Margaret Cho’s flagging career. Even if we assume that it has pure motives, receiving an affirmation on Twitter is not likely to do much to heal memories of an actual rape. Instead, it is just another stunt that feeds rape hysteria and the culture of perpetual emotional butthurt. It also shows that while there are some good things happening in our culture, the majority of society is still mired in feminist indoctrination.

Read More: Why America Has Become Infected With Rape Hysteria

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The 3 Golden Rules For Getting Laid In New York City

November 5, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Naughty Nomad

Hi guys, Mark Zolo here from Naughty Nomad. Over the years, I've contributed over 100 city guides for men in our little corner of the internet, and as some of you may or may not know I've spent the last two years living in the Dirty Rotten Apple. After countless nights of research and bedding more than my fair share of New Yorkers—sometimes two at time or three in a day for good measure—I've recently published the very first Bachelor's Guide to New York City, which Neil Strauss himself described as "fucking funny".

Anyway, today I wanted to share three golden rules I've learned when it comes to getting laid in New York City.

1. Hunt In Your Backyard

Girls in New York are lazy and apathetic. Getting laid in New York is like getting take out—it’s all about speed and convenience—and nothing will cockblock you harder than bad logistics. Women here won’t bother walking ten blocks for pizza when there’s a deli on the corner. They don’t care how awesome you are; for them, it’s all about what requires the least amount of effort.

Try invite a Jersey girl back to Astoria or a Bushwick broad back to the Bronx and they’ll laugh in your face. As for Manhattanites, you have a better chance getting your granny to twerk for YouTube than getting those girls to cross a river. The primal ape within her sees a large body of water and instinctively cowers back to the safety of the island interior. As such, the minute you mention you live in another borough, her vagina will dry up like the Sahara. Oh sure, you might get lucky once and awhile; she could be super desperate or have her own place nearby and invite you home—but you can’t count on that.

The biggest piece of advice I can give anybody coming to NYC is hunt locally. That means that if you live in Brooklyn, party in Brooklyn. If you live Queens, party in Queens. And if you live in the Bronx, well, then you should consider moving.

2. Forget About Numbers

Quite possibly, you’re dealing with the flakiest women in the universe. Forget about getting phone numbers; it’s do or die in this city. There are exceptions, but generally girls here dole out their number to any guy who asks for it out of politeness to avoid an awkward interaction. By the time you text her, you’ll likely be reduced to another annoying vibrate alert, a blurry face in the cloud of cocks pining for her attention.

There are so many dudes in the race that you’re not even a contender. Even if you get some digits after making out with a girl, there’s a high probability you’ll never hear from her again. Don’t take it personally. Understand that New York females have so many options that they just don’t want to waste their time.

3. Know When to Strike, And Strike Fast

Building on the second rule, speed is everything in NYC. It's go-go-go in this city. A lot of guys who move here learn this pretty quickly, but then they make the mistake of being too direct and coming on too strong. The trick is finding a happy medium.

You need to hang back a little at the start. Approach without hesitation, but don't sexualize the conversation too early. Don't buy drinks (too many guys make that basic mistake here) and keep it fun and neutral. Wait until you feel the bite before you move forward, but the minute you feel it, put that peddle to the mother-fkin' floor! It's the same night or you can take a hike.

I don't care if you have to bang her in the bathroom or down an alleyway, just get 'er done. Even if one night stands aren't you're thing and you're looking for a serious relationship, understand that if you move slow you'll be forgotten about. Fortune favors the bold. Sometimes it's not always possible to seal the deal, but if see an opportunity, it's your job to get as far as you can, as fast as you can, because once she's released back into the concrete jungle, you'll probably never see her again.

I hoped this helped, guys.

To learn more about picking up in New York City and for a full breakdown of the women, neighborhoods, and nightlife, pick up a copy of my comprehensive 140-page guidebook, Naughty Nomad's Guide to New York City.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Two Feminist Sluts Indoctrinate America

November 6, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Corinne Fisher and Krystyna (what, mom didn't like vowels?) Hutchinson are two unfunny New York feminists who host a podcast entitled "Guys We Fucked: The Anti-Slut-Shaming Podcast." I became aware of this because their show briefly eclipsed Joe Rogan and appeared in the top 10 list on iTunes recently.

Don't they just look hilarious?

They're spreading the word that women should be able to fuck WHOEVER they want WHENEVER they want and not be ashamed or called sluts or whores.

According to SoundCloud, there are over half a million regular listeners. While it sits in the "comedy" section, I found nothing humorous about these two. Situations like this call for different tactics—normally I would just ignore or mock a couple of unfunny, crude, and disgusting feminists. After all, the world is full of bad music, comedy, culture, etc. but the disturbing thing with this duo is they have a large following and a dangerous message that can cause real harm to those who hear it.

While it has been said before that women are not funny, cannot tell a story, and are not fun, I still found it difficult to listen to one of their podcasts. They open by insulting their listeners with profanity: "Hey, fuckers! Welcome to another episode of guys we fucked (guyyyys we fuuuuuckedddd)". Girls using profanity is a big turnoff to begin with, but comedians who resort to profanity because they lack original ideas are especially lazy and boring.

A sampling of episodes follows: You jerked off to lightning? Do you want your dick owned?

Don’t poppers make your butthole loose? Would you fuck a girl in a wheelchair? Would you fuck yourself? You know we both wanna fuck you? Too late for plan B, too early for an abortion, Who wants to get cum in their eyes? Period sex: Thoughts?. Every episode seems themed on crassness, sluttiness, and a lack of self respect.

Nevertheless, for research’s sake, I did attempt to listen to the podcast, but could not make it past the 10 minute mark. Much of the following relies on articles and interviews the two have given.

Fisher and Hutchinson, host to lots of bacteria, and a podcast

Corinne Fisher describes herself as “Jewish from New Jersey, likes makeup and chubby-ish men, has issues with the concept of monogamy and only has sex with people she considers to be her friends.” Hutchinson loves watching porn, especially with her live-in boyfriend, and moved to NYC from Pennsylvania. She briefly “worked as an actress” and now does standup comedy, along with her podcast, with Fisher.

The podcast is less than two years old, and was originally started as a program to interview needy attention seeking sex partners they hooked up with, but has expanded to include interviews with other feminists and reality celebrities, like the cast of Jersey Shore, dominatrixes, and questions for listeners, who they refer to as “fuckers.”

Reading the above description makes me chuckle that anyone ever thought Howard Stern was offensive or crude.

The origin

Fisher:

> Basically, I was going through a mental breakdown because I got dumped in a Panera Bread by the guy I thought I was going to be with for the rest of my life. I would go and cry at Krystyna's house every day, and my hair was falling out, I lost 20 pounds in a month… we had been working together for a long time…anti-slut shaming, to reach a broader audience more than just our narcissistic intentions.

Prior to their podcast, the couple had a "comedy" duo called Sorry About Last Night. Here's a clip of the two performing 4 years ago. (For those wise enough to skip it, in summary, there is nothing funny or cute about these girls. They may get some attention because they are still pre-wall with semi-attractive faces, but how this performance encouraged them to continue comedy is a complete mystery).

View of feminisim

"Feminism is really just owning your shit and feeling good about your decisions and just being equal with men"

If ONLY feminism was about women being held responsible for their own actions! We won't even address the silliness that men and women are the same, for space reasons.

If you're thinking, wow, sounds like these women must have some serious personal problems if they need meaningless sex with multiple partners, excessive profanity, and an obsession with sex to cover up their weaknesses and shortcomings, well, you would be right. Fisher ran into the ex-boyfriend from Panera Bread, "who all this nonsense started because of — and I really didn't want to talk about it because I knew I was going to be sobbing. I did talk about it and I did sob, which annoyed me because I hate doing that, but it turned out to be great."

So deep down after all the cock she takes, slowly destroying her soul one night at a time, is a longing for the one alpha she had but lost years ago. I'd wager there are some daddy issues involved as well.

On pickup artists

> The pickup-artist culture is just stupid. You don't need to pretend you're a douchebag or be a douchebag to pick up women, and the quality of women you're picking up might not match with the quality of women you actually want. Pickup-artist bullshit is all a front.

Translation: We are so easy, you don't even need game to score with us. And game allows men to find higher quality women, which is bad.

Theme of the show

> Do what you want with your body and if other people can't deal with your choices then fuck 'em

Translation: Be a narcissist! If it feels good, do it. Then proclaim it loudly and shove other people's faces in it too. If others try to present values or some rules for living other than barbaric sexual freedom, yell and silence them, because they are stupid.

Their priority in life

> Our careers. They're getting better because of the podcast, which is really exciting.

'Nuff said.

On throwing all social rules out the window

> "There are many times in life to be shy, but my vagina is not shy," Fisher says in the episode. "So this guy, his idea of dirty talk was to ask when was the last time I had sex with someone and I said yesterday, because it was after midnight and—it had actually been that morning—and he was not taking that well. So mid-sex, he stopped having sex with me because I have too much sex."

Translation: A guy who was thrilled to be getting easy, free pussy from a girl he just met was so overcome by the disgust at the level of sluttiness she revealed to him, that he interrupted his pleasure mid-hookup. So, fuck that guy, right?

I can agree with this movement. If more women were honest and open about their sluttiness, more guys who don't want to waste time with whores could move on before wasting any time with such garbage. There's a reason why girls typically lie about their number of sexual partners. It disgusts us.

Breaking news: Guys are turned off by female promiscuity, for many reasons.

As Patrice O'Neal so correctly stated, women suck at telling stories. These girls are no different. Below is a clip of Krystyna telling a horribly boring and stupid story about her frustration when a guy she met did NOT want to fuck her on the first night.

The Danger

Young women are extremely mentally pliable, and when exposed to messages such as "have sex with as many guys as possible, there's nothing wrong with it!" which is scientifically untrue and damaging, many will take this horrible advice. These hosts, despite not being funny at all, have amassed a large audience, and received coverage from the HuffPo, Salon, and Elle magazine, among others, and will be viewed as role models for some.

They were able to move to the Big Apple and live life on their own terms, and now they've made it! Only the sad thing is, these women are a few short years from hitting the wall, and are already finding out that men are not interested in a used up woman who doesn't care when and how often she is penetrated.

You can't change biology and men are naturally repelled by slutty women, for anything other than a quick hookup. Their situation is disgusting enough on its own, but the fact that they have preserved almost two seasons and counting (or around 100 sexual partners) permanently on the internet, for their next boyfriend to listen to at his leisure when contemplating a LTR with one of these cum dumpsters, is a quite dismal future indeed. Beware, any who follow their advice.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Logical Fallacies of Feminists

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Why Theology Is A Man's Discipline

November 6, 2015 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

When ROK announced they were looking for a "Masculine Theologian," I was urged by a few good men to put in for the job. Some men may have come across my past articles or comments under the handle CuiPertinebit; I now take the name of Aurelius Moner, a moniker closely related to the name of my monastic vows (for St. Aurelius Augustinus of Hippo, and Bd. Dalmatius Moner of the Dominican Order).

As I contemplated the possibility of contributing more regularly, I asked myself what a "Masculine Theologian" might be. What is "Masculine Theology?"

Not a Niche or Designer Spirituality

Well, decidedly, I don't want to approach this as a "special interest" theology, for, in my mind, this is an inherently unmanly approach. I am a Catholic, and I often come across Catholic blogs or organizations that try to aim a message at men, turning manly ideas and sentiments into gimmicks. I've seen sites speak of a "New Emangelization." I've seen sites that try to jazz the fellas up by fixating on a "warrior" spirituality—Catholic Knights! Soldiers of the Lord Unite!—but, in practice, all they accomplish is a white-washing of the Faith, reducing or re-formatting every element of Christian piety to an affected and superficial affinity with martial themes—a caricature both of the Faith and of manhood.

In fairness to them, they are simply overcompensating for the pervasive feminization of Christianity, from which many Christian men seem unable to disentangle themselves. "We may be mumbling our rosaries in front of this sappy picture of Dreamboat Jesus, but as long as our rosaries are made of military-grade parachord and we call ourselves Catholic Knights, and we sometimes have a dudes-only BBQ party, we will be on the way to rediscovering the macho piety of our forebears."

Absit (colloquially: "Hell, no"), as St. Paul so often said. Men are the naturally more noble sex; long experience, and the historical record, has taught me that men aspire after noble ideals far more easily than women. The instinct for integrity, for pursuit of the ideal, for disciplining one's self to stay the course, for actually loving others and being caught up in their well-being, rather than referring everything to the emotional feelings we get from connections with other people, is a masculine instinct; and there is no ideal, no course requiring such discipline and integrity, no love that will require such fidelity, such self-forgetfulness (even self-mortification), as the soul's ascent to God.

Therefore, theology and philosophy have always been masculine disciplines, drawing on the nobility of the male spirit. I hope simply to continue in the best traditions of these disciplines, trusting them to be masculine enough as they are.

The Patriarchy Oppressing Women from Celestial Thrones of Glory

I won't turn masculinity into a gimmick or commodity, therefore; but certainly if theology and philosophy are masculine pursuits, they must comprise a treasury of masculine wisdom. In an age such as ours, where the tradition of masculinity has not been passed down very well (along with many others), a recovery of so rigorously masculine a tradition as the (authentic, Western) religious tradition will naturally benefit men.

The West Always Described Spiritual And Moral Struggle As A Manly Activity

Indeed, just by way of brief demonstration, the Western Tradition has spoken of the spiritual and moral struggle precisely in terms that denote manliness. Manliness and moral virtue are the same thing. Virtue is from Latin virtus, having the same root as vir, meaning "man." The Greek ἀρετή (aretē), "virtue or manly excellence," is related to other words with "ar" in the root, like ἀρρενικός (arrenikos, manly).

The virtue of the “incensive” aspect of the soul – the aspect that “drives” our action – is called in Greek ἀνδρεία (andreia, manliness), and in Latin fortitudo (fortitude, more than just bravery, means “manly firmness of will,” the resolve and courage to keep fighting despite fear, exhaustion, etc.). The chief vice opposed to this, is called in Latin mollities, meaning “softness,” equivalent to the Greek μαλακίας (malakias).

In both Latin and Greek, the term denotes “effeminacy,” if we are speaking politely; if we are speaking bluntly, they are used as epithets to mean “faggot” or “wanker.” This is the sense the word still has in Modern Greek, where μαλακός (malakos, “masturbator”) is a common insult against useless or weak men.

If only St. George had read the works of Elizabeth Gilbert!

Now, I don’t doubt that most men would balk at the suggestion that they struggle with effeminacy, or need to fight it! Yet, this is how the spiritual life has always been described by Pagan and by Christian authors; it may help, however, to know exactly what we mean by effeminacy. The Angelic Doctor, St. Thomas Aquinas, gives us a good definition from the perspective of both Classical Paganism and the Church:

…this pertains to the reckoning of effeminacy [mollities], for a thing is said to be “soft” [mollis] if it readily yields to the touch. Now a thing is not declared to be soft through yielding to a heavy blow; even walls yield to the battering-ram, and so a man is not said to be effeminate if he yields to heavy blows. Hence the Philosopher [i.e., Aristotle] says (Ethic. vii, 7) that “it is no wonder, if a man be overcome by strong and overwhelming pleasures or sorrows; but he is to be pardoned if he struggles against them.”

Now it is evident that fear of danger is more impelling than the desire of pleasure: for which reason Tully says (De Offic. i) that “it is inconsistent for one who is not confounded by fear to be defeated by lust, or for one who has proved himself unconquered by toil, to yield to pleasure.” Moreover, pleasure itself is a stronger impulse than is unhappiness, for the lack of pleasure is a mere privation. Wherefore, according to the Philospher (Ethic. vii, 7), he is rightly called an effeminate man, who withdraws himself from the Good because a lack of pleasure disappoints him, yielding as it were to a weak movement.

Men Must Master Themselves

So, effeminacy is that inertia, that mediocrity, which shrinks from the Good because it fears to be deprived of pleasures and comforts. This is, generally, the default state of women: to be good domestic consumers, concerned primarily with satisfying desires and being comfortable or pampered; but men have always regarded this with instinctive horror.

It erodes the qualities necessary to perceive, establish and defend the good. Now, let us also face the facts: in the past century, manly excellence has completely retreated before this encroaching darkness of mediocrity. Manly excellence has fled the field and abandoned it to an army of women and degenerates. We have submitted ourselves to castration through money, self-referential sex, porn, gluttony, abundance, sloth and entertainments. We doffed our armor and let a gaggle of Pyjama Boys pillage the culture. “That which yields easily to a light blow,” is effeminate.

I hate to say it, men, but this aptly describes late, Western man. We have been seized by a great effeminacy. We only incur blame if we remain under its sway, so let us overcome this weakness in all haste.

I hope I can help to illumine the spiritual struggle for men of ROK, both in the interior and social spheres. But the truths of this struggle can sometimes be a bitter pill to swallow. Still, on a forum for masculine self-improvement, the concept of swallowing a necessary but bitter pill should not be new. We have a difficult task ahead, if we are to set ourselves and our society straight; I have some very pointed ideas about that. I hope the men of ROK may find my contributions in this regard to be worthwhile.

Ad Astra!

St. Lawrence of Brindisi leading the Holy Roman Empire’s soldiers against the Turkish invaders at Albe-Royal (Stulweissenberg)

Read More: 3 Ways To Cultivate The Discipline Of A Neomasculine Lifestyle

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Results Of ROK's First Reader Survey

November 7, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are the results from surveying 1,580 of you recently.

1. 96% of you are male

We may have one of the staunchest male spaces on the internet.

What is your sex?

Choices	Percentage	Count
Male	95.95%	1515
Female	4.05%	64
	Total	1579

2. 52% of you are between the ages of 18-32

Older men between 33-52 make up a sizeable 37% of readership. About 10% of you are split between being under 18 and over 52.

What is your age?

Choices	Percentage	Count
23-27	19.76%	312
28-32	17.73%	280
18-22	14.44%	228
33-37	13.87%	219
38-42	9.69%	153
43-47	7.66%	121
48-52	6.14%	97
Other [View]	10.70%	169
	Total	1579

3. 76% of readers visit at least ever other day

If you read ROK, you are likely to come frequently.

How often do you visit ROK?

Choices	Percentage	Count
Daily	36.16%	571
Every other day or so	23.31%	368
Multiple times daily	16.59%	262
A couple times a week	12.16%	192
Weekly	7.22%	114
Less than weekly	4.56%	72
	Total	1579

4. Most readers prefer two or three articles a day

How many articles would you like to see every day?

Choices	Percentage	Count
2	30.84%	487
3	30.40%	480
4 or more	20.33%	321
1	18.43%	291
	Total	1579

5. Most readers are satisfied with the length of articles

How do you feel about the average length of ROK articles?

Choices	Percentage	Count
Articles are just about right	86.95%	1373
Articles are too short	6.65%	105
Articles are too long	6.40%	101
	Total	1579

6. Biggest site usability complaint is the advertisements

Many of you hate the pop-up ads, share buttons, and email list notifications. In the past three months I removed the most aggressive pop-up ad on mobile and also cut down the frequency of desktop pop-up ads. I will reduce them further. There also seems to be font size and refresh problems on mobile and tablet.

A few complained about comments loading slow on mobile. This is a Disqus issue (on desktop the comments pre-load while on mobile it only begins loading when you scroll right to the comments).

7. Requested stories focus on game, money, neomasculinity, and cultural issues

Here are some submitted headlines that I think could definitely work on ROK:

- Seventy Years Old And Still A Player
- How to beat social anxiety completely
- How Older Men can help the younger generation
- How to use a sporting event or concert for a same day lay
- How you can legally immigrate to Eastern Europe
- Top College Majors for High-Paying Jobs
- How to wean yourself off the welfare state (and become self employed)
- How to gain weight effectively
- How to create male spaces in your city/how to find other redpillers in your surrounding
- Black Men Survival Guide to the Workforce
- Why We Need Victorian-Era British Imperialism To Save Humanity
- 5 Successful Marriages from the 1900s
- The 5 most Productive Habits of the Neomasculine Man
- How to handle a high maintenance woman
- 7 Jobs/skills neo-masculine men can develop that won't be automated by computers. (In the near future)
- More lists of red flags in women.
- How to channel your inner Berserker
- Return of Kings Meetups will start
- Handling infidelity
- 10 Examples of Rich, Powerful Men Who Don't Bow to Political Correctness
- 10 Neomasculine Affirmations To Say Everyday
- Why Scandinavia is not Positive Proof of Socialism
- How to deal with liberals in the workplace/the classroom
- How to minimize the taxes you pay.
- How to tell your buddy his girlfriend is bad news
- Advice for young men looking for a monogamous relationship
- Israeli Settler Movement as an example of changing the society form within starting from zero

- The rapid decline of Brazil
- How the coming automation revolution will change the relationship between the sexes.

Here are some others interesting headlines:

- MRAs, PUAs, and MGTOW Bury the Hatchet with Mutual Respect
- Managing a Household With Multiple Girlfriends Under One Roof (or I could write it since I do)
- How Israel is fighting for Western Civilization as Europe throws it away
- Hillary and Bill Clinton Killed In Auto Accident.
- "Sarkeesian, Quinn feared dead after plane carrying 127 YouTube Feminists crash into ISIS territory en route to UN conference."
- Dumb feminist gets owned by so-and-so
- Don't be desperate and pay for webcam models.
- Roosh Finally Cracks the Jante Code and gets Pussy in Denmark
- Roosh interview with Vladimir Putin
- We won! Women are now in the kitchen looking sexy as fuck
- Lena Dunham dies of cheeto overdose.
- Lindy West Kills Herself While Trying to Self-Perform Oral Sex
- 31 ways feminism has harmed women (#17 will really make you think)

If you think you can write one of the above articles, especially in the first group, we encourage you to submit it here.

8. Many readers don't share articles on social networking because of leftist retribution

Some reasons given of why readers don't share ROK articles:

- As a girl, especially an American girl with feminist friends, I'd get a lot of backlash for it. And I mean a lot.
- Unfortunately, I am a student at a liberal school and don't want to be hounded to death or ostrcized
- I try not to share any opinions or opinionated articles with people I know via social media out of fear of losing my job/friends who disagree.
- I use facebook and twitter professionally, as a business owner, and I feel that RoK would compromise my business if I shared most of the articles on it.
- As I'm sure you're aware, reading ROK isn't seen as "socially acceptable" to a lot of feminists and unfortunately would lead to some "friends" labeling me a misogynist
- I have acquaintances on my feeds, who I need to maintain a relationship with, that would treat me unfavourably if I posted them. It's best to be stealthier and not share.

The most common reason for not sharing is simply not maintaining active Facebook/Twitter accounts.

9. Common problems among readers include money, employment, sex with attractive women, relationships, and general life malaise

Money and employment were the top problems by far, mentioned in approximately half of responses. Here is a sampling:

- Figuring out how to start up a business with minimal capital. Dealing with closed-minded people without frustration. Deciding if it's worthwhile to finish college or pursue my career goals.
- Workplace sexism. I work in healthcare and never realized how difficult it would be to even earn a living being the only male in certain work settings. Articles on safe jobs and careers for men
- I live in a town of 30,000 rednecks. There are no fuckable women anywhere.
- 1. Political correctness infecting everything from work ethics to entertainment. 2. Finding a worthy woman that isn't corrupted by the multicultural/leftist agenda. 3. Worrying about raising children in an insane world.
- 1. Daily grind, 9-5, salary is ok but burned out. 2. Lack of life partner: I want to start a family, but there are no suitable females to wife where I live. 3. A bit of lack of direction and discipline.
- No gf, depression, no energy.
- Having motivation for job, projects, etc. Working in a boring office. Increasing my income
- 1. Rat race related stress 2. Personal/spiritual problems 3. Alienation – feeling of utter incompatibility with surrounding culture and views
- I am single, have no kids, and I am a white male in a society that demands I be a thankless work horse violently kept in line by a democratically elected government voted in by women, white-hating minorities, and self-hating white males.
- DEBT from the usurious banksters that nobody ever warned me about—I had to learn about the historical crime of usury (interest) the hard way. Loneliness from the debt which keeps me from going out and doing much. Disrespected from what the courts have done to me in my two divorces from hellish American women. And totally emasculated by having come to the realization that my children are not my children, they are the State's children, and I only was ever a babysitter and sperm donor of them. Basically, I keep hoping the Russians will come carpetbomb this place with nukes, and then have the Chinese send in the invading hordes. It could not get any worse—at least those two nations still know the difference between a man and a woman, unlike this sh#thole of a society.
- Scaling up my own business. Wondering how I feel about traditions vs modernity, re: romantic relationships. Balance between finishing major projects and keeping small self-improvements on the go.

- I’m losing interest in women. My kids are growing up and after that’s done my life will have little purpose. I’m having a hard time finding a single trend in the world I don’t want to reverse.
- Affirmative action. Jews. Getting a real good job.

10. Most readers want to see less sponsored posts

Readers also want to see less political posts concerning the culture war or those related to white nationalism. Here are a few responses of what readers wanted to see less of:

- (1) Anti-Semitic themes or topics, and anti-Jewish conspiracy theories (2) Less Islamophobia and immigrant bashing (Muslim or Latino) (3) Less white racism or appeals to White Nationalists (e.g. “cuckservative” rhetoric)
- The genius of ROK is that there’s something for everyone. I don’t begrudge someone else their interests when it’s no trouble for me to simply skip articles that don’t interest me. Besides, we need as big a tent as possible.
- How American women are the worst, look man I’m an American and I don’t want to marry a foreign women. This whole you must abandon your county right now bullshit is getting old.
- Whiny bullshit about how women are horrible. We know. Let’s get on with it.
- Game for the sake of game. Nothing wrong with encouraging and advising men. But taking game so far just for the sake of another piece of ass is ridiculous.
- OK, I agreed with Roosh’s article concerning the work of Kevin MacDonald and Jewish power an influence. The reality is, and it’s an unfortunate one, is that Jewish elites have been in charge of many leftist destructive intellectual movements that have damaged the West. HOWEVER, since that article appeared, this site has become Stormfront! It’s now filled with commenters that blame literally EVERYTHING on the JOOOS! Don’t get me wrong. Jewish power and influence needs to be exposed. However, if I want to read commentary that blames the JOOS for everything, I’ll go to stormfront or the dailystormer
- Less of Mike Chang.
- Complaining, feminism – articles that call out liberals do nothing for me
- Fitness; honestly there is so much good information online for free by people who really are expert trainers; anything fitness related here has always stuck me as either bullshit or common knowledge if you do the minimal homework it takes to learn how to train properly;

11. Readers want to see more self-improvement and masculinity articles

Lots of men still want self-improvement advice that includes game, travel, lifestyle, health, nutrition, and fitness (when it’s not a sponsored post).

- More pro-father and pro-family articles
- Self improvement. The reason I liked this site in the first place was it helped me take a hard look at myself, to recognize my flaws (and strengths) and work on them. I feel like I don't see this as much as when I first started reading ROK. The article in this week's email "3 Ways To Cultivate The Discipline Of A Neomasculine Lifestyle" is exactly what I want to see more of.

- Theology, philosophy, series of articles on deep topics
- ROK has done well building a basic movement, through persuasive articles. This has to continue, both as a means of welcoming new members and continually advancing and challenging those who have 'signed on'. That being said, it now has to move to the next stage, whereby those who embrace masculinity begin to work together for the common good.
- Aging related issues…things like settling down, changing behaviors to coincide with life stages, physical training for old geezers, and handling relationships with older women who aren't so crazy any more. Yes, most women do get saner the older they get. Politics, history, warfare and skill at arms, making a living…all as they touch on male roles and behavior.
- Anything written by Quintus Curtius
- Neomasculine sporting pursuits, I.E. hunting, surfing, etc..
- Game for black guys, game for Indian guys, different strategies with Good girls
- Lifestyle, critism of jessica valenti
- Game Self improvement Mike Chang
- I understand ROK was born from the PUA movement but some of your audience is married men. So, a few articles geared toward the older male trying to lead the traditional good father role.

12. Readers offered their suggestions if they were made boss of the site

Comments ranged widely, but many included upgrading the professionalism and layout.

- I would focus the site on how men can make themselves better, and only that. Physically, mentally, emotionally, our relationships with women, etc.
- I'd give the site a clean, modern redesign with flat colors because it looks a little dated in my opinion
- Make it clear that this is a site for ALL men. There are too many white nationalists infecting this site and rooshv.com. They don't seem to understand that all men have to unite to defeat our enemy. The white nationalists are dividing men.
- Cut down on the racism. Show neomasculine examples of men of different races.
- Reduce the amount of doom and gloom articles and put out more articles that focus on what ACTIONS and steps men can take to survive and thrive in the world. More articles on what men can do. Set up a sort of "masculine" ROK meet up network so that men who follow ROK, Roosh, or other manosphere sites can more easily find like-minded friends, network professionally, and just meet up and shoot the shit.
- QUALITY over quantity. Period.
- I'd relocate the company to a small island off the coast of the Philippines and have the break room staffed with 14 year old slave girls trained to literally worship the dick.

- More articles teaching men about minor hobbies or promoting masculinity positively by explaining 'manly' pursuits, such as the 'three cooking tools every man should own article", excellent writing. More quality control on articles, certain writers were pretty terrible (such as the "how to build your own pc for the first time article), it was pretty garbage. Other novel articles, such as "how to bang chicks at conventions" was hilarious, true, and insightful and niche pieces like that bring added value.
- Take this shit less seriously. RoK is a site for masculine men, and circlejerking about the end of Western civilization is hardly a masculine pasttime. Western society did this to itself – it doesn't need saving.
- I would add more marriage building articles. It's obvious that Western women have huge problems, but as many writers point out, that is not unique in history. These problems have existed as long as there have been different sexes. I would like to see more about how to improve a marriage and encourage your potentially brainwashed wife into a better life.
- ROK seems to be moving in the direction of an echo chamber. Most of the core audience have strong conservative values so writing for that audience does make sense, but writing exclusively what your audience wants to hear will make them grow bored over time. I am NOT saying that you should let SJWs write articles, but getting more articles from rational people who don't fit the typical ROK reader mold will both allow you to broaden ROK's base audience and having your core audience's beliefs challenged once in a while will keep them from getting bored. An audience that is not challenged is an audience that will get bored and find something else.
- I would focus more on men's self improvement. Self-improvement and progress equals happiness, and people are trying to define themselves. I believe the best path to happiness and fulfilment is self-improvement: hobbies, fitness, travels. There are great articles on the site and I think that the site should still have a masculine focus.
- Get older senior writers, like (married, with children) established (with a trade) men throwing in their hard-earned experience, wisdom and advice.
- I like the breadth of material, but I'd really like to see more field reports. The best part of game sites is where the guys are detailing what actually worked. Those stories are what opens guys eyes. More field reports detailing the exact language used. That's what I want.
- Less feminist articles, because everyone hates them anyways, it just makes people bitter, more articles about being a better man, actions men can take to get the most out of life, and perhaps even moderating the comments a bit more. People here tend to get way to caught up in the "I'm Alpha, you're not" debate… BTW, overall, great site guys.
- Enough with the hard right wing bullshit. This is getting to be too much like fox news and a lot of these comments in the comment section sound like whiny bitches. The > site was better when it was about being a better man and improving life through bettering yourself. Now it's too much focus on fighting feminisim. I'm sorry but feminisim barely registers in my day to day life. If I don't succeed it isn't because feminisim held me down. Rather than wage a culture war I would rather read how to improve my life. And no, I'm not moving to some other country cause I want traditional sex roles or some shit so stop that bullshit suggestion.

The survey was eye-opening for me. It told me that the direction I'm heading in life is not necessarily the same as most of my readers, who still have unresolved financial and sex issues. In the next three months, you'll notice some changes that incorporates feedback from the survey.

Read Next: A Self-Improvement Challenge For ROK Readers

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Left-Wing Activists Tried To Shut Down This Year's NPI Conference

November 8, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last week I traveled to Washington, D.C. to attend the National Policy Institute's conference "Become Who We Are." If you don't know what NPI is, it's an identitarian think tank run by Richard Spencer, best known as the founder of Alternative Right and the former editor of Taki's Magazine (both of which I've written for in the past).

NPI's conference was focused on inspiring whites to rise above mainstream consumer culture and strive for greatness, featuring rousing speeches from the likes of French New Right figure Guillaume Faye, Way of Men author Jack Donovan, Radix European editor Roman Bernard, and many others. Return of Kings publisher Roosh also dropped by the conference for a couple hours.

While I'm no stranger to identitarian gatherings, having attended this year's American Renaissance conference, NPI's conference offered a distinctly different experience from that event. The National Policy Institute is a relatively young organization, having only been founded in 2005, and the location of the event—just one block away from the White House—gives the conference a more intimate and urbane atmosphere then AmRen's big tent.

It also makes NPI easier for leftist radicals to attack.

While anti-racist activists tried to protest at AmRen, the conference's remote location and the police protection provided by Tennessee state troopers deters the worst offenders. In contrast, mask-wearing antifas actively swarmed the National Press Building and tried to physically assault NPI attendees. While they failed to shut down the conference, I had my own run-ins with these thugs and things nearly got ugly.

Here's what happened.

NPI Is Here To Stay

The inanity began literally as soon as I stepped out of my cab. In front of the National Press Building, a group of crusties who look like they believe that bathing is capitalist oppression started jeering my friend and I.

"You here for the National Policy Institute?"

"Yeah," I replied.

They immediately started with the heckling: "Fuck off, Nazi scum!" "Racists!" "Neo-Nazis!" "Get out of my city!"

I wasn't in the mood for diplomacy, so I flipped them off as I was walking into the building. Inside, I linked up with another group of attendees that included speakers Kevin MacDonald (author of The Culture of Critique) and Sam Dickson, as well as Red Ice Radio's Henrik Palmgren and Lana Lokteff (full disclosure: Palmgren interviewed me for Red Ice Radio a few months back), where we joked about the antifas' thrift store rags and lack of hygiene.

After registering, I had to leave the building to link up with a friend of mine a couple blocks away. As I walked out, the antifas' took notice of my name tag and yelled out, "Nice to meet you, Matthew!"

"Racist, sexist, anti-gay: NPI is here to stay!" I chanted at them as I dashed up to F Street.

After meeting up with my friend, we took a wrong turn and walked into the National Press Club's parking garage, where we were cornered by a cute blonde reporter from The Daily Beast. As she grilled my friend and me on why we were attending the conference, I realized I had seen her before.

“Are you Olivia Nuzzi?” I asked.

“Yes.”

“Oh yeah, I recognize you from your work at NSFWCORP.”

“You read Not Safe for Work Corporation?” She seemed shocked that an evil racist recognized her.

After a few more questions, Nuzzi thanked us and walked off. She didn’t end up using any of our comments in her report.

My friend and I realized we couldn’t enter the building from the garage, so we went back outside. As we went up to the front doors, a particularly unclean-looking protester tried to physically block us from going inside. Whenever we tried to lunge for a door, he would slide in front of us, like a school bully who waves his hand in front of you going, “I’M NOT TOUCHING YOU! I’M NOT TOUCHING YOU!”

“Whatcha here for?” the syphilitic antifa asked.

“I’m using the bathroom,” I snapped sarcastically.

“Oh? Well, you can go right here.” His lips curled into a smug grin.

“We’re here for the National Policy Institute,” my friend piped up.

“Oh, the National Policy Institute? So you’re fuckin’ neo-Nazis, eh?” Behind us, the other five or so antifas were jeering us.

Suddenly, one of the security guards opened a door for us, saving me from losing control and snapping the antifa’s dime-stack neck.

Shit Gets Real

The antifas had planned two anti-NPI protests; one for when the conference began in the morning, and a Halloween-themed costume protest for seven at night. I was hanging with Roosh, F. Roger Devlin and a few other attendees at a bar down the street when we came back to the conference around 7pm. No protesters in sight. Roosh had to leave early, so the rest of the guys and I went inside.

Roughly an hour later, I'd stepped outside of the conference room to stretch my legs when one of the guys came up to me.

"Just so you know, Matt, don't leave the building alone. We got into a scuffle with the antifas."

"What the fuck?"

"Yeah, I stepped outside of the building. The antifas have guys posted at every entrance and a couple of them began stalking me. I had to lose them by going through alleys and I even had to duck through a restaurant—went through the kitchen, they didn't follow me in—but they kicked the shit out of one of our guys."

"Holy shit!"

"Yeah, his face is all busted up. It was four of them attacking him. These guys aren't fighting fair. They'll gang up on you, sucker punch you, attack the elderly; we're gonna have to figure out a way to leave without getting attacked. We don't want them going after our elderly or following people home on the Metro."

At the end of the final segment of the conference—a performance by neofolk musician R.N. Taylor—Richard Spencer called us all in and explained the game plan. We were all going to leave the building simultaneously through one of the back entrances, scare the antifas away through sheer numbers. Spencer advised us not to fight back if one of them tried to hit us, because we'd end up being tarred as the bad guys if we tried to defend ourselves.

Assembling in the lobby of the building, we emerged in one great mass of shitlords. There were only about four antifas at this particular exit: three masked men and an elderly hippie with a megaphone talking about how his grandfather "fought in World War II to rid the world of Nazi scum." No one took a swing at me, but I later found out that one of the antifas kicked Sam Dickson, who is nearly 70 years old.

Fighting Intolerance With Violence

The sheer irony of using physical violence to deter people who you think might engage in physical violence (based on nothing other than your own prejudices) is lost on the left. As both the response to Roosh's speeches in Canada and the antifa attacks at NPI show, the blind emotionalism and Manichean morality of the left leads them to believe that they have the right to use any means necessary to shut down "racists" and "misogynists," even means that are illegal and/or immoral.

The left's accusations against NPI in particular and alt-rightists (or neomasculinists) in general have no grounding in reality. Without exception, everyone I met at NPI was cordial, well-dressed, and intelligent. Indeed, I was recognized by a huge number of my fans, many of whom told me that my writing was what turned them on to the alternative right. Not only that, a good majority of the conference's attendees were young, easily identified by "Millennial" written on their name tags (NPI offered discount tickets for those under 30).

To believe that your ideas are so righteous that anyone who disagrees with them deserves to be fired from their job, hounded on social media, and even physically assaulted makes you far more of a "fascist" than anyone associated with the National Policy Institute.

Overall, despite the antifas' attempts to shut it down, "Become Who We Are" was a rousing success. If you're on the fence about attending one of these conferences, stop thinking about it and take the plunge. The speakers are fantastic, the atmosphere is convivial, and the experience of being in a room with close to 200 guys (and gals) who are on the same ideological wavelength like you is an experience you can't pass up.

Read Next: 3 Things I Learned At This Year's American Renaissance Conference

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Yale Students Throw Temper Tantrum Over "Offensive" Email

November 8, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With the rapidly decaying state of Western civilization, satire is almost redundant. Exhibit A: the collective meltdown unfolding at Yale University over an "offensive" email.

On Wednesday, October 28, Dean Burgwell Howard sent an email to Yale undergraduates via the college's Intercultural Affairs Committee imploring students not to wear "offensive" or "unacceptable" costumes on Halloween. One of the faculty, Associate Professor of Silliman College Erika Christakis, sent an email to Silliman's community in which she criticized Howard for being overly PC and coddling students' sensibilities:

> Is there no room anymore for a child or young person to be a little bit obnoxious… a little bit inappropriate or provocative or, yes, offensive? American universities were once a safe space not only for maturation but also for a certain regressive, or even transgressive, experience; increasingly, it seems, they have become places of censure and prohibition.

In response, Yale students have gone completely insane, with over 700 people signing an open letter accusing Christakis of "invalidating" the voices of minority students. Last Wednesday, several hundred students gathered for an open forum on institutional racism at Yale in which Christakis' email was a major topic of discussion. Finally, the day after, students staged a protest at Silliman College itself, demanding an apology from Christakis.

Christakis' husband Nicholas, himself the master of Silliman, was beset upon by angry students trying to browbeat him into an apology:

To his credit, Christakis refused to apologize for either his or his wife's comments, which has further inflamed the protesters' temper tantrums. Students are now outright demanding that the two of them resign from their positions at Silliman, and a few have even claimed that they will refuse to accept their diplomas from Christakis at graduation.

The hysterical response to Erika Christakis' email is disturbing evidence of how cultural Marxism has intellectually crippled an entire generation of students. Colleges and universities are supposed to be places of learning, where students are taught how to think, have their worldviews challenged and become fully mature adults. But as the above video shows, Yale students are explicitly demanding that the university cater to their easily bruised feeeeeelings.

The Myth Of The "White Girls Only" Party

The Sturm und Drang about "racism" at Yale doesn't end with Christakis' email. Recently, the university made national news after allegations that Yale's chapter of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity held a "White Girls Only" party on Halloween. After leftists finished gnashing their teeth in disgust at SAE's "bigotry," journalists could not find any evidence that the frat's party excluded non-whites, aside from one black student's post:

> In contrast to this account, an off-the-record undergraduate at Yale also told The Daily Beast that he was at the SAE Halloween party and doubts the story of black students being singled out and denied entrance. "I seriously doubt that happened. There were plenty of black people there," he said.

The dubiousness of the story's veracity didn't stop the New York Post and other media outlets from reporting it as fact, nor did it stop last Wednesday's open forum on institutional racism at Yale from making the supposed "White Girls Only" a major topic of discussion.

Coddled Students Make For Whiny Stormtroopers

As FIRE (Foundation for Individual Rights in Education) puts it in their report on this incident, this is yet more evidence for what FIRE President Greg Lukianoff and social psychologist Jonathan Haidt have termed the "coddling of the American mind." Universities, once focused on challenging students' perceptions of the world, now seek to reinforce them and cater to increasingly whiny demands. Lukianoff and Haidt name some particularly shocking examples of how colleges are bending over backwards for their whiniest students:

> Some recent campus actions border on the surreal. In April, at Brandeis University, the Asian American student association sought to raise awareness of microaggressions against Asians through an installation on the steps of an academic hall. The installation gave examples of microaggressions such as "Aren't you supposed to be good at math?" and "I'm colorblind! I don't see race." But a backlash arose among other Asian American students, who felt that the display itself was a microaggression. The association removed the installation, and its president wrote an e-mail to the entire student body apologizing to anyone who was "triggered or hurt by the content of the microaggressions."

As Lukianoff and Haidt point out in the article, not only is this obsession with "trigger warnings" and "microaggressions" hurting students' mental health, it's inculcating an authoritarian, anti-free speech attitude in their behavior. Watch the video above of Nicholas Christakis being confronted by an angry student. She's so consumed with emotion that she can't control herself and actually insults Christakis—the head of her college—to his face, telling him to “be quiet” and asking “who the fuck hired you?”

Coddling American students leaves them in a state of perpetual childishness, leading them to violently lash out at anyone who hurts their feelings, threatening free speech in the process. As we’ve seen with the violent response to Roosh’s “State of Man” speeches in Canada or antifas openly attacking attendees of the National Policy Institute’s annual conference, it doesn’t take much to inspire leftists to commit violent acts against their ideological foes.

Fortunately for us, Christakis and her husband have yet to apologize or concede anything to the mob that’s screaming for their heads. However, the struggle to defend freedom of speech against the perpetually offended continues. Unless we stand firm against these mewling babies, they will slowly strip us of the freedoms that our forefathers fought to obtain, all in the name of preserving their feeeeeelings.

Read More: SJWs Pile On Daily Show’s Trevor Noah Over “Offensive” Tweets

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Why Father’s Day Is The Scorn Of Swedish Feminists

November 8, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Swedish dads should not be celebrated on Father’s day, one feminist says. While the mothers are raising the children and doing all the work at home, dads lean back and never do any parenting themselves.

This attack on the patriarchy is being praised by feminists. But even if they’re right—that fathers leave a lot of the parenting to the mothers—is it really such a bad thing?

Bad dads

In Sweden, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Estonia, Father’s day is celebrated on the second Sunday of November. Now it’s that time of the year again—ties are selling better than ever, and feminists are not happy.

It’s quite understandable. Feminists spend all their waking hours hating men and spewing vitriol about how evil they are. And now comes a day dedicated to honoring men exclusively. One can only imagine the outrage they feel inside.

One feminist, or “equality activist” as Manuela Fredriksson likes to call herself, wrote a widely circulated column about it with the title, “The dads don’t need a father’s day congratulation.”

To make her case that fathers don’t deserve to be celebrated, she lists nine points which all say basically two things: In general, dads work while moms stay at home with the kids, and kids prefer to be comforted by their mom when they’re sad. Two things which actually show that fathers are doing their job right.

Men are workers

> Studies done by union organizations show that men work a lot more during the toddler years than the women they live with do. […] Stop having children you're not gonna be parents to. You suck.

It is true that men like to work. They are driven to compete, succeed, and improve themselves. As a consequence, they make money to be able to feed their family. This lets the mother be there for her children all the time, giving them a stable home environment.

Manuela Fredriksson says that fathers who go to work are bad "role models." The truth is that working dads are exactly the kind of men that young boys need to look up to. Having that can keep them away from the thuggish culture that seems so attractive to adolescents lacking guidance.

Furthermore, having a job doesn't mean that fathers are never at home. They can spend time with their kids in the morning, evening, and weekends. The little ones won't have time to miss their dads before they come home again after their shift.

Men are tough

> In a Swedish study, made with 6.000 children in the ages 8-14, 40.9 percent said that they most of all want to talk with mom when they are sad. […] Swedish children would prefer not being comforted over going to this dad we will celebrate on Father's day.

This is probably partly due to the mother being present more often than the father. But there's also another reason behind the mother being the main comforter.

In a tough world, kids, and especially boys, need to learn early on that life is not all happiness and sunshine. While the mom is the one who picks up and holds the crying child, the dad sets an example of not always showing one's feelings openly, thereby displaying weakness.

With a mother and a father, the children have both a sensitive female role model and a tough male role model. These are the natural, traditional gender roles that feminists despise. But they themselves are horrific examples of what humanity turns into when it tries to fight nature.

Leftists smother individuality

This feminist column is an example of the fundamental problem with leftists: They don't think people can or should be able to decide for themselves how to live their lives. This is evident in both what they say (or scream in your ear), and the collectivist politics they promote.

Making everything forcibly equal might work for some. There are many men out there who would happily be pussy whipped by Manuela Fredriksson on a daily basis (answering a comment on Facebook, she wrote, "No one whips the patriarchy as hard as I do.")

In the end, it should be up to the parents to decide how to organize their household, and they will all make different decisions. But leftists are not content until everyone lives the exact same lives. They must suppress individuality for their utopian pipe dream to be realized.

It's kind of sad that they don't have anything better to do.

Read More: Swedish Feminists Campaign For Fatties In Clothing Ads

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

10 Ways To Fight Back Against Feminism

November 9, 2015 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

We’re all justifiably sick of feminism, but at some point men need to either put up or shut up. It is true the average man must be careful in how he fights back due to the harsh legal realities of living in a world that promotes Girl Power, but where being a “misogynist” (the male equivalent of a feminist) can get you publicly tarred and feathered or even fired from your job.

However, if all men followed these simple guidelines, we’d be happier, healthier, and the quality of women and relationships would dramatically improve.

1. Quit Social Media And Online Dating

Need any more evidence that testosterone levels are plummeting?

We must play the relationship game on our terms, not theirs. Smartphones have their place, but spending all day on them gazing at social media and taking selfies is about as unmanly as you can get. Unless you are making money or following breaking news, social media is for chicks. There are a million more productive ways to spend your time, so get off the damn thing.

Women are gluttons for attention and compliments and the smartphone brings out the absolute worst in their personalities. Every time you praise women on social media, you are inflating their egos and making them even more unbearable than they already are. It's time we bring back the stigma of online dating: it is only for losers. Plus, meeting women in person will develop your character and social skills, so even if you are rejected you will be better placed to face future challenges in virtually every aspect of your life.

2. Don't Vote For Political Parties That Support Feminism

A fundamental goal of communism was destroying the family unit and replacing it with the State. If you vote for left-wing parties, you are supporting high-taxing, high-spending organizations that want to replace the traditional family unit with Big Government and will repeatedly bend over for feminism and political correctness. Things like quotas, victimhood, gay marriage, and man hate speech become part of the daily vernacular, and you will see insanity such as hundreds of millions of dollars being borrowed to pay for feminist "foreign aid" programs.

To keep the baying mobs of feminists happy, leftist politicians won't merely be content with maintaining the status quo on blatantly misandrist divorce, alimony, and child custody laws. They'll extend it to include things like Australia's "mistress laws," where sluts are given financial incentives to become homewreckers.

Sure, right-wing parties are far from perfect, but they are nearly always the lesser of two evils. In Australia we have "Emily's List," the official feminist arm of the Labor Party, steadfastly committed to taking money away from productive sectors of the economy to prop up women and get them financially and emotionally invested in the government. This voting support bloc has become so large it is almost impossible for a sitting government to unwind unaffordable extravagances and not get voted out. Next stop? Greece.

3. Hire Men Only

Give a fellow man the break the feminists in the HR Department won't

The modern man is up against quotas and feminist-stocked HR departments, which will push for undeserving women to get jobs at his expense. Something needs to be done to address this injustice, so help your fellow men out and hire them instead.

There are also entirely practical reasons. For example, if you are a business owner, why would you fork out for expensive maternity leave when you can pay a man to be there instead? Not only that, your workplace will be happier and more efficient as you can openly and honestly discuss issues without everybody constantly being on edge about upsetting people's feelings or a trumped up sexual harassment charge.

In my experience, the presence of women makes for a toxic workplace somewhat resembling high school, cannibalized by cliques, gossip, jealousy, undermining, sucking up and passive aggressive behaviour. Despite protests of rampant sexism in the workplace, women tend to treat each other far worse than what they receive from male bosses and colleagues.

Millennial women in particular seem to see nothing inherently anti-feminist in sleeping their way to the top. On more than one occasion I have seen an airhead rapidly rise through the ranks to a position beyond her ability purely because she polished the right knob. This causes widespread resentment, but even if the boss grows tired of being serviced he can't get rid of the greasy pole climber as they have become a "protected species"—firing them would risk a sexual harassment accusation.

These are all problems best avoided, but never openly state that you don't hire women because in doing so you will almost certainly be breaking the law.

4. Don’t Bail Out Women For Their Irresponsible Spending

This is exactly the kind of behavior that puts women into debt

Most women are terrible at managing money. In part this can be explained by evolution. Historically, women relied on men to take care of them, and feminism definitely doesn’t promote foresight and self-responsibility. You would be absolutely shocked at how many single women in their 30s have very few assets of real value and are up to their eyeballs in debt, even supposedly smart, savvy career gals on high incomes.

If they get a pay rise or promotion, they don’t pay down their home loan or credit card debt, they increase their spending on shoes, handbags, dresses, makeup, luxury apartment rentals, partying, expensive wine, and restaurants. For all their bravado about being “strong and independent,” women never truly appreciate the value of money, and assume some chump will save them when they finally decide to settle down.

Don’t be that chump. Making a long-term commitment to these women is fraught with danger. Ironically, far from being grateful for salvaging them off the scrapheap, these are the women most likely to be horrible wives, cheat on you, and divorce rape you.

5. Don’t Bring Your A-Game For Sex With Feminists

Roosh has advocated a hard line position of not having sex with feminists, but if you go down this path you are taking easy lays out of the equation: feminists wear being a slut as a badge of honour. However, with the market already flooded with these types of low quality girls, we should not encourage their degenerate behaviour. Due to the ongoing thirsty dude epidemic, your generic feminist can easily get quantity, but that doesn't mean you should reward her with quality.

You should be selfish in bed so they don't enjoy having sex with you too much and are left unsatisfied. Definitely don't go down on a feminist, for example. Instead, you should be cold, methodical, unromantic, nut as soon as you want and leave immediately after. Certainly don't let them stay the night at your place.

Feminists are easy for a reason: they are deeply flawed individuals. Like most things in life, what comes easily is rarely rewarding. You should therefore view feminists as "slump busters," something you partake in reluctantly whilst biding your time for something better.

6. Ignore Mainstream Media Feminist Commentary

Most feminists are white, middle class women who have grown up in comfortable surroundings and never experienced any real hardship in their lives, so as professional victims they can't be taken seriously. They definitely do not have your interests at heart, and worst of all, they don't even mean what they say.

For example, they'll tell you they love feminist men but they are only kidding themselves.

These wimps are the only men they can get which is why they must pretend that dating them is a “choice.” Even more galling are the multimillionaire feminists like Sherryl Sandberg who act like they are heroes, while a man slaving away for 50K per year is somehow more privileged than they are. With this in mind, you can safely disregard 99.9% of what they say.

7. Say No To Mediocre White Girls

Modern Western Women: all class!

We can’t all jet off to Eastern Europe, South America or Asia to find our dream woman, but an alternative is targeting women of relatively recent immigrant background to our home counties. These women are no silver bullet, but they are still much more likely to be attractive and have decent values.

As the proud owner of a lovely buxom girlfriend of Eastern European origin who detests feminism and puts family first, I can assure you going back to a “strong, independent woman” would feel like dumpster diving.

8. Show Displeasure When A Girl Mutilates Her Looks

You'd have to be mentally ill to look to livestock for fashion inspiration

How unattractive a feminist is tends to correlate with how extreme their misandry is. A key part of this toxic ideology has always been demonizing female beauty and trying to create guilt in men for finding some women more attractive than others, and feminists are clearly thrilled at the current trend of young women mutilating their appearance with ugly piercings, tattoos, blue hair and so on.

For us men that means less desirable women, so how can we fight back? Personally, my approach varies from indirect to in-your-face. I say things to girls like "It's a shame she got those piercings. She looked so much hotter without them!" Sometimes I just look disgusted, or put on a micro frown or confused look and ask "Oh. Why did you get that?", insinuating that they are crazy. If I see the dreaded bull-ring, surely the most unattractive fashion trend for millennial women to date, and I am feeling particularly facetious I let out a deep bellow to signal my disapproval.

9. Reward The Few Good Women

There is no doubt women of quality, honour, and virtue are becoming highly endangered in the West, but this only reiterates why men cannot afford to mistreat the precious few decent ones remaining. If you treat one of these diamonds in the rough poorly you are a piece of shit, and worst of all, potentially driving them into the ranks of the feminists.

Therefore, it is your duty to positively reinforce their desirability so they don't become part of the pro-slut cultural tsunami. Don't pump them up on how "hot" they look, they hear that all the time anyway. Instead tell them how much you love it when they make you a nice meal or wear a tasteful feminine dress. Say that you are attracted to her womanly charms and family values, and how much you prefer this to the average uncouth female who acts like a man and has had more pricks in her than a second-hand dartboard. Tell her that not checking her Facebook every 30 seconds make her stand out from all the other girls. Even if you are ending a relationship with them, make sure you do so respectfully.

10. Be A Real Man

In the end, it all boils down to this. You can complain all you like about the “modern, empowered woman,” but if you aren’t a masculine man, you don’t deserve a feminine woman. You should constantly strive to improve yourself, be strong, command respect and be able to handle yourself in a crisis.

A key component of this is how proficient you are with practical skills. Can you do handyman work? Lift heavy things? Change a tire? If not, start learning. The way society has changed for the worse makes me wonder if feminism is just one giant shit test for men. The worst thing is they are winning. The fact that testosterone levels have plummeted during this timeframe is not a coincidence. Everywhere you look there is irrefutable evidence men have lost their balls.

They can deny it all they want, but the reality is women crave a strong man who will stand up to their bullshit. Never forget that if you are a weak mangina you truly deserve nothing more than the most masculine, unpleasant feminist out there.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 3 Ways To Fight Back Against The Feminist Tidal Wave

Mark Webster
Mark Webster is an old school Australian who is dismayed by political correctness, the state of the modern woman and the decline of his once beautiful country. He believes the collapse of the family unit is directly attributable to feminism and cultural Marxism.

What Is It Like To Get Older?

November 9, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

One of the questions that I've been asked a lot these days is how one's perceptions change about things as one gets older. A lot of younger guys in their twenties or thirties want to get a glimpse of what lies around the corners of life that they will be approaching soon.

Obviously, this question is a broad one and can be responded to in many different ways. But I've been thinking a lot about it recently for some reason. My friend Winston Smith, the editor here at Return of Kings, likes to ask me questions about this sort of thing. So this one's for you, Winston.

I think one of the best ways to answer this question is to put it this way: as you get older, you become increasingly aware that people want to impose their frames (i.e., their worldviews) on you.

Frame Control

Understand, as I'm sure you do, that the world of human interactions can be seen as a motley of competing frames. Every man has his own frame. Every woman has her own frame. These frames are paradigms with which we view the world. They are our mental and emotional reference points.

And we feel good when our frames are validated. We feel less good when our frames are contradicted.

So everyone seeks to fit the world into their own frame. This is to some extent normal and natural. But it can be a problem when one man's frame imposes itself too much on another's, and restricts the other man's development.

Frames are constantly in collision with each other; they tussle, compete, crash up against each other, and struggle for mastery. In human affairs, it is the battle of the frames that rules the world.

All right. Well, you may ask, how can this be a problem? It is a problem when people seek to prevent you from developing, but imposing their limiting, lame worldviews on you. And you notice this more and more as you get older. People make decisions in their lives that limit themselves. And they don't like it when they see you succeeding.

This bothers them.

Take this as an example. Suppose you are 47 years old. You are going to run into all sorts of people who are going to tell you that you should act in a certain way. Or that you should think in a certain way. Or that you should do this, that, or the other thing. They are trying to fit you into their frame. They want you to conform to their worldview of what a 47-year-old man does.

But this is the thing, see. You might not want to do this. You might, for example, be in the top 1% of men your age in terms of physical fitness, and have a girlfriend 18 years your junior. This is going to bother some people.

Getting older means you have to fight harder and harder in the battle of the frames. Getting older means that you have to assert the mastery of your own frame constantly. Why? Because people have their own limiting ideas of what you should do or not do.

You're not supposed to do this. You're not supposed to do that.

And this can cause you a lot of frustration. Because if you're in shape and you're older, you're going to feel just as good now as you did twenty years ago. And yet you will have to suffer listening to some dork tell you that you can't do this or can't do that. Or you will be able to sense that people don't approve of your doing this or doing that. People are always trying to restrict you, to rope you into their corral. And you have to fight this.

Thou shalt not abandon thy frame, under pain of death.

I talk about conflict a lot, you might have noticed. I talk about fighting a lot. Well, this is why. You need to get into the habit of it. Getting older means more combat. So get used to it.

I've always marched to the beat of my own drummer. I've never felt the need to follow the herd. But you definitely feel the herd nipping at your heels as you run the race of life. They are desperate to impose their frames on you.

Desperate, desperate, desperate!

I can feel their hot breath on my neck right now, as I type these words out.

All right. But what are some strategies that can help you maintain and fortify your own frame? I have a few ideas about this.

Take The Shot

I was watching a soccer (football) game the other day and was surprised at how many players seemed to be waiting for the perfect time to take a shot on goal.

What a mistake this is. In life, you're never going to have a perfect alignment of cosmic factors to take the shot on goal. You aren't going to get a hundred chances, either. You may only get one shot.

Take the shot, for Christ's sake. Pull the trigger. Put some rounds down range, as we used to say. Fire for effect.

Taking the shot will reinforce your confidence. It will make you better. But most importantly, it will reinforce your own frame. It will help define your frame to the world.

So take the shot. Always.

Get Rid Of Dunces

Of the great number of people in the world, many of them are dunces, pricks, and knob-nibblers. As you get older, you become more and more aware of this. They always have something negative to say about nearly everything. And their frames are poisonous.

Get such people out of your life. You don't need them. All dunces do is drag you down, suck you dry, or try to force their lame frames on you.

Be Open To Other Ideas

The problem with frames can be that they ossify into rigid, inflexible dogmas. A frame should be flexible, strong, and resilient, but it should also be open to modification when necessary. No worldview can be a rigid stone tablet on which a dogma is written, and never changed.

So you should try to seek out experiences, people, ideas, book, and relationships that can add to your frame in a healthy way. Because if you isolate yourself inside the confines of your stagnant frame, you will cease to grow, learn, and develop. And this can be fatal.

These, then, are some of my ideas about what it's like to get older. If you want to hear them.

Read More: 4 Morning Rituals For Neomasculine Men

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Did The New Star Wars Casting Have A Racial Agenda?

November 9, 2015 | by Inigo Montoya | Link | Original Link

It's what every Star Wars fan has been waiting for since The Phantom Menace. Finally, we get a fresh, new tale of the Star Wars saga with no Jar Jar. Fans almost lost their mind when Disney bought LucasFilm. To top it off, fans were delighted to hear that Star Trek director J.J Abrams was to take command of the new film. Say what you will about the new Star Trek movies, but they did spur new interest in the series and offered significant entertainment value.

This was a new hope for fans, having an entertainment superpower get behind one of the most beloved film series of all time. But then something happened.

A Disturbance In The Force

Now we find ourselves on the brink of the release. So what's all the drama been about? From the first ever trailer we were given a glimpse of the main characters in the film. While most were new introductions, we did see some old favorites make the cut.

Most of the controversy stemmed from the casting of a black actor to play the main role for the new flagship series. Contrary to many who might be already deeming this article as racist™, it goes much deeper than race. We're talking about a deeper agenda. Out of all the millions of potential qualified lead actors, Boyega was chosen for the lead role? And a woman for the second lead? What were these two chosen for, if not based on their acting merits alone?

Here's where I think most of the scrutiny for the casting comes from: they didn't have to cast a black actor as a main role. The storyline didn't depend on it. It's not as if it was Lando Carlissian's son. As a side note, Lando is one of my favorite characters in the last two films. However, he was granted the role because of this suave demeanor and ability to deliver comically smooth one-liners—not because the director had a diversity-first SJW agenda that we've seen recently in film and other media.

Appeal To The Fans?

With easily 95% of the Star Wars fan base being white male, it's hard to believe it was done to market to it's core demographic. However, leave it to Disney and SJWs to try reaching new gender and racial markets. As we've seen with other mediums where this occurrence is happening, these are only traditional white male creations. What agenda is replacing old heroes for kids of a particular demographic?

We saw a similar scenario with Gamergate. One of the calls of the SJW left was that there were not enough women in lead character roles. Why should there be? The absolute majority of the creators and consumers are not women. Thankfully, these men understood the ridiculousness of the requests and stood their ground. You can never appease those with an irrational agenda.

What would be the response if game creators gave in to pressure and instead created an all black female cast for the upcoming Halo 5? Makes zero sense, right? However, to certain people with agendas, hijacking a traditional male media like this would be major win for them.

Reverse The Roles

Say whatever you want, but if you're honest with yourself you know people of certain groups like having characters who are like them or that they can relate to. It's why there's a whole section on Netflix dedicated to a strong female lead™. It's why BET exists, or the show Girls wasn't cancelled immediately. For a director to forgo using a character that relates to 95% of his audience demographic is a little strange. Not only that, there are no protagonists who match the core demographic.

While yes, it's certainly OK for people to take a media of one culture and modify it for another (e.g. Bollywood or China remaking American movies with their own actors), it's a totally different thing to take an original media and remake it disregarding ANY features of that core group.

How would this move look on other movies? What if a white actor was cast to play the new Will in The Fresh Prince? Twitter would explode. Perhaps a Korean man and a cholo gangster should be made head leads in the next Sex and the City movie because, Diversity. See how when we compare this to other racial and gender-based shows it gets ridiculous?

People are talking because this is becoming more common, like the new Annie, Fantastic Four, and possibly the new Bond. There are even more examples of women leads being shoehorned into traditional male media such as Mad Max and Ghostbusters. Not only do we see the replacement of traditional characters, but also political agendas behind them, such as the new Marvel comic where Captain America is black and battles conservatives on immigration.

Is it diversity for the sake of diversity or something more sinister? From the mouth of Boyega we should just "get used to it."

It’s Not The Who, It’s The Why

People will be quick to point this view as racist™ or sexist™, yet will go insane if it happened to one of their own beloved entertainment mediums. This isn’t about WHO was cast. It’s about the principal behind it. The problem is when people say we need diversity™ in an area, they just mean there are too many whites males involved. However, no one is calling for diversity™ in other ethnically and gender consistent areas.

The real irony here is that deliberately changing the demographics of a movie, medium, or group in the name of just removing the percentage of a certain race is, in fact, actually racist. In the words of Abrams himself:

Read More: The New Ghostbusters Movie Will Be Ruined By The Feminist Agenda

Inigo Montoya

A voice for reason, wisdom and truth. You killed my culture, prepare to die.

University Of Missouri SJWs Force Resignation Of President For No Particular Reason

November 10, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) have claimed another scalp. Tim Wolfe, the president of the University of Missouri System, was forced to resign in response to students who were protesting the mythological bogeyman known as “white privilege.”

The episode not only demonstrates capitulation in the face of criticism, but it also shows our universities are educating young men and women to be entitled whiners instead of productive citizens.

The Facebook Post That Started It All

Payton Head

The controversy got its start on September 12th when Payton Head, the President of the Missouri Students Association, wrote the following on Facebook:

> I just want to say how extremely hurt and disappointed I am. Last night as I walking through campus, some guys riding on the back of a pickup truck decided that it would be okay to continuously scream NIGGER at me. I really just want to know why my simple existence is such a threat to society. For those of you who wonder why I'm always talking about the importance of inclusion and respect, it's because I've experienced moments like this multiple times at THIS university, making me not feel included here.

Head doesn't indicate whether or not these were fellow college students. However, he does immediately link this to the wider list of SJW hot buttons including Islamophobia, homophobia, transphobia, and their all-time favorite, rape. If you read this description it is pretty clear who Head thinks the demon is—it is straight, cis-gendered, white, Christian males:

> Many of you are so privileged that you'll never know what it feels like to be a hijab-wearing Muslim woman and be called a terrorist or a towel head. You don't have to think about being transgender and worrying about finding a restroom where you can go and not be targeted for violence because you don't fit into the gender binary.
>
> You'll never know what it feels like to see Memorial Union every day and enter the side like a second class citizen because after 90 years, there's still no accessible way to enter the tower. You've never been spit on walking down 9th street or mis-gendered at Pizza Tree because they called out your birth name.

> You've never had to experience people throwing drinks on you and yelling FAGGOT at you from the patio at Big 12 as you walk past on the street holding hands with your partner.
>
> You might never had to think twice about what you're wearing walking around campus at night so that someone won't think it's okay to take ownership of your body because your outfit was "asking for it." If your simple existence is not a political statement I'm really going to need for you to check your privilege.

President Refuses To Address Protestors

Head's Facebook post went viral and it motivated a small group of students to block the university president's car during the homecoming parade on October 13th. The president did not respond to the protesters. To make the optics worse, a group of white people formed a line in between the car and the protesters to protect the president and his car. Finally, police were called into to break up the protest.

To be fair to the students, it sounds like this protest did not come out of the blue, and the president may have been tone deaf in addressing concerns. The students claim that they only blocked the president's car because "after years of constant emailing, letter writing, and social media outreach," the president still had not responded "to the issues of racial injustice" at the university. The students went on to say that the demonstration was not an indictment on white people but on "the structures in place that uphold white supremacy."

While the president may have been derelict in his leadership duties at other times, his refusal to address the protesters during the homecoming parade was correct. The president had no way of knowing whether the protesters were even university students. It was a very aggressive gesture, and the people in the car likely feared for their safety.

Concerned Student 1950

After the protest, the students issued a "List of Demands" that they wanted president Wolfe to comply with. The first demand was that Wolfe must hold a press conference where he would apologize to the homecoming parade protesters. During press conference, he would also be required to "acknowledge his white male privilege, recognize that systems of oppression exist, and provide a verbal commitment" to fulfilling the rest of the students' demands.

The second demand was that Wolfe resign or be fired from his job as president of the university system, and that the next president be selected by a “collective of students, staff, and faculty of diverse backgrounds.” The protesters do not provide any justification for why the president should lose his job.

The fourth demand was that the university must create and enforce “racial awareness and inclusion curriculum throughout all campus departments.” Attendance at these “racial awareness” courses would be mandatory “for all students, faculty, staff, and administration.” This curriculum “must be vetted, maintained, and overseen by a board comprised of students, staff, and faculty of color.”

The fifth demand was that the university increase its percentage of black faculty and campus staff by 10%. Note that when it comes to jobs, the students drop the pretense that this is about people “of color.” This is all about getting more black jobs doing make-work diversity nonsense. Sorry Asians and “hijab-wearing Muslim women.” When it comes to jobs, the protesters think you are not colorful enough.

The rest of the demands are along the same line. The manifesto was signed “Concerned Student 1950.” President Wolfe was given eight days to comply with the demands or face the “appropriate nonviolent actions” of the protesters.

Poop Swastika, Hunger Strike, And Football Player Strike

Jonathan Butler channeling the civil rights activists of the 1960s

On October 26 tensions were further heightened when the racists struck again. This time, the offense came in the form of a swastika drawn in feces on a bathroom wall in a dormitory. No culprit was identified. Although it is possible that this was just a hoax, it didn’t stop the news media from using the incident to fan the flames.

After president Wolfe failed to comply with the demands of the manifesto, student Jonathan Butler, who calls himself a “Liberation Activist. Human Rights Advocate,” went on a hunger strike on November 2nd.

While the hunger strike might have been somewhat compelling, what really got Wolfe to capitulate was threatening the university's coffers. Over the weekend of November 7th, the protesters were able to enlist the help of 30 members of the University of Missouri football team. The players stated that they would refuse to play as long as Wolfe remained as president.

Victory

Wolfe did nothing to defend himself. He did nothing to try to change the narrative or defend his record. He did nothing to appeal to wider body of students. He appeared completely passive. With the threat of lost revenue hanging over his head, Wolfe resigned on November 9th.

As is typical when people capitulate to SJWs, Wolfe went down sounding weak. He said he resigned "out of love, not hate" and that he hopes the university can "move forward together."

The protesters of Concerned Student 1950 are obviously jubilant over their victory, but one has to ask whether American universities really need is more diversity training and more diversity officers. What about curricula that ensure that graduates are better equipped to get jobs in a difficult market? Or more rigorous standards so that getting a degree amounts to more than just paying tuition? The protesters do not seem to be concerned with academic excellence—only entitlement.

Conclusion

The success of the Concerned Student 1950 protest guarantees that we are going to see more of these types of protests at other schools. University presidents who want to keep their jobs will unilaterally cave to protester demands.

We can also expect universities to preemptively add more SJW overhead to their already bloated administrations. A university education, which is already overpriced, will become even more costly and even more irrelevant. The triumphant march of the social justice warriors will only be stopped when someone has the courage to stand up and say, “No, I will not yield to your demands.”

Read More: Librarian At University Of Tennessee Instructs Students To Stop Saying “He” And “She”

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How Patriarchy Will Return

November 10, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Recently I published a document listing the main points of neomasculinity. From that we can now make predictions of how those ideas will interact with the environment to create noticeable gender and societal changes in the Western world. Here are the five stages that offer a possible path to the return of patriarchy.

Stage 1: Rise Of The Networks

This stage has already taken place with the spontaneous development of internet communities that serve to help men meet women, teach them entrepreneurship skills, improve their health and bodily strength, and enlighten them with counter-cultural truths. They arose because in the past forty years the singular cultural focus has been about empowering women (providing them with benefits and privileges) while giving bad advice and withholding information from men, if not outright sabotaging them. The informational black hole left by the establishment was filled by various teachers and thinkers like myself.

My teachings on game, along with the columnists on Return Of Kings and the hundreds of contributors on RVF, are but a drop in the bucket of Western men helping each other through antifragile networks that share common ideological beliefs. Each network attracts men who have become aware of societal problems that inhibit their own self development and liberty when compared to women.

Timeline: Already completed

Stage 2: Seed Resistance

There are many paths to truth, and once a man has attained what he believes is the correct reality, he will execute one of two options: (1) escape from the effects of the oppressive narrative by structuring his lifestyle to avoid its most severe faults, or (2) try to impose his righteous narrative upon society.

I tried the first option by expatriating to foreign lands, but have soon watched large components of that narrative follow me, most commonly through Western technology. I have moved to option two by actively resisting efforts of the far left narrative that is currently dominant in the West. Seed resistance can come in many forms:

- Providing basic alternative media — producing blogs, videos, podcasts, and mailing lists that disseminate subversive information
- Counter operations — producing attack pieces against far left narrative bots that expose their damaging behavior and hypocrisy
- Awakening men — enlightening men by continuing to refine and disseminate ideological talking points and memes

Each resistance group has their own style of fighting, from sharing concealed knowledge to public shaming through humorous images and comics. Collectively, they begin to push back against efforts of the dominant narrative.

Timeline: Ongoing

Stage 3: Culture War

Separate networks and groups will form natural alliances that put aside their differences to defeat the enemy. In the past year, I have exchanged friendly gestures from the men's rights sphere, religious conservatives, liberal gamers, and even white nationalists, whereas in the past there was either no communication or only hostile communication between us. These groups are currently probing each other for common ground, loyalty, and commitment.

Assuming that individual groups are ready to sacrifice and put their differences aside (a challenging task), a huge fighting force will be created that can balance out the immense power of the existing establishment. The neomasculine sphere will be but one regiment in a large army to defeat the enemy.

Culture war will involve sustained, asymmetrical, and intense informational warfare against the enemy that starts to damage their way of life, happiness, and disposable income. They will soon have sleepless nights just like I did in Canada when the full force of the establishment came down upon me. While guerrilla tactics must still be used to ensure our self-preservation, allied forces may be strong enough in the near-term to engage in open battle without having to be as anonymous as before.

Here are some additional strategies for successful culture war:

- Acute divide and conquer campaigns that target weak-willed individuals who are not ready to fight without being part of the herd.
- Sustained criticism of individuals to encourage meltdowns and bad decisions, facilitating their descent into illogical madness that makes them lose support or prestige within their group.
- Psy-op campaigns to undermine the word of women and other alternative groups by painting them as pathological liars or mentally insane
- Creation of pressure groups (i.e. mobs) to target small companies that are sensitive to even small amounts of negative publicity and profit loss.
- Stealth infiltration into intellectual circles and various institutions such as universities, media, military, and government bureaucracies.

The victories of culture war will also make it easy to attract new members to our ideology. Initially, self-improvement (e.g. "how to get laid") and dissemination of truth allowed men to find us, but now merely being seen as a "winner" will be sufficient, and I saw this first-hand with the large jump in my follower count after winning in Canada. A winner strategy may also attract women since they have an innate need to be part of groups with strong males they admire or respect.

It is difficult to estimate the start of culture war, but I want to state that it began in August 2014 with the introduction of Gamergate, a revolt against corrupt social justice gaming websites. The revolt has turned into a sustained gathering of individuals who criticize gaming websites and other sectors of the media, and which has resulted in millions of lost dollars for media companies along with career frustration for social justice journalists.

More recently, another victory over the narrative came in the form of the Hugos, a science fiction book awards show, when authors of the far left failed to exclude "Sad Puppies" authors whose disagreements with the narrative blocked them out in past awards. The cuckserative meme followed shortly afterwards to expose the traitorous social justice leanings of establishment conservatives. If we are indeed in culture war, events such as Gamergate, Sad Puppies, cuckservatism, and my battle in Canada will become more commonplace and increase in intensity in the next two years.

The current narrative is failing an increasing percentage of people, so a culture war is necessary for them to see the opposing viewpoint that is being deliberately hidden from them or outright distorted.

Timeline: 2015 – 2025

Stage 4: Culture Vacuum

After culture war, a large percentage of the population will have lost faith in the existing narrative and convert at least partially to an alternative narrative. Victory will come when approximately 20% of the American population will solidly believe in neomasculine or alternative ideals by 2025, compared to what I estimate to be 3% and lower currently. A size of 20% seems small at first glance, but it allows a tipping point that is more than sufficient to convert others at a rapid pace as the existing narrative fades away.

Culture vacuum will be highlighted by intense confusion within the population over what to believe and think. Individuals will be far more open than during culture war to give the patience and time required to understand the logic behind an alternative narrative that they were once hostile to, especially since the losing narrative utterly failed to provide them with answers on how to live and pursue happiness, and which may have even put their life at risk.

The groups that comprise the winning side of the war will now attempt to differentiate between each other and convert believers, not unlike how varying religious faiths attempt to convert those to their own church. This may result in battles where once-allied groups fight each other out for the spoils. As is said, those who start the revolution are rarely those who end it, so it is possible that the winning group will simply be less fatigued than proto-groups that were involved from the beginning stages.

It is at this stage that a winning group must position themselves to accumulate institutional power. Those who infiltrated institutions during culture war can now more readily assert their views to usher in new policies and laws that roll back the damage caused by the previous narrative. They can also open the door to allow entry of those with similar beliefs to form powerful in-groups within the institutions.

If existing institutions can't be successfully infiltrated, parallel institutions must be made. This will be easiest to do when it concerns establishing independent media organizations. We will have to improve the quality and professionalism of our entertainment and propaganda to rival that of current slick products that so easily capture impressionable minds.

Timeline: 2025 – 2045

Step 5: Return Of The Patriarchy

Over the course of a generation, there will be a gradual return to the patriarchy as at least 50% of the population believes in traditional ideals and have the voting power to usher in non-bought leaders who see patriarchy as the only way to maintain cohesion of society.

Since America is a multiracial nation, this means that minorities must be a part of those aching for patriarchy, or else the country may be split into several different countries along racial, cultural, and economic lines. I expect many minorities to come to the realization that patriarchy serves them better and provides a deeper life meaning that the consumerist and nihilistic ideals of the far left narrative that race-baits them for their own ends. While converting these more liberal groups may seem like an impossible task today, it's a requirement if the United States will continue to exist as one nation.

In this stage, neomasculine ideals will be obviously entrenched in the media, government, and academic spheres. Women will be encouraged to marry young instead of embarking on a decade or two of sexual experimentation. Men will put their labor into helping their family or society instead of spending large amounts of time trying to get laid for short term pleasure. Heuristic rules of living that stem from religion and tradition will be used instead of ever-shifting scientific “facts” and technological mandates. A swing back to puritanism may result, but families will be stable, welfare will be less encouraged, each gender will fulfill their biological roles, and society will be better off as a result.

Timeline: 2045 – 2075

Conclusion

The return of patriarchy will essentially roll back what has been added since the sexual revolution of the 1960’s, and all the damage that the far left has caused since then. Neomasculinity, and those ideologies that overlap with it, will either triumph outright in America or be a big part of republics that form as a result of secession, and I can state this without exaggeration since the current narrative is already showing severe signs of stress that will lead to outright cultural collapse of nations that have foolishly adopted it.

The process of culture change is long, and the end result may occur well after we’re dead, but since the current narrative is not sustainable, victory is inevitable. When you have the truth on your side, it becomes only a matter of time and effort. I just hope to be alive when these events do unfold in the Western world.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on RooshV.com.

Read Next: Narrative Warfare

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How You Can Make Big Money Working On An Oil Rig

November 10, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Making Oil Money

Yes oil has crashed. Badly. But there are still young guys right now who are making bank, traveling for large parts of the year, and spending their time off whatever way they want. The easy hiring times are over for now, but it is definitely still possible for you to get a job in the oil industry within the next year.

The advantages

- Nearly all-male environment

No more bullshit office politics and drama. Real male camaraderie and friendship that will last a lifetime.

- Very physical work

Great for guys who like working with their hands, keeping physical, and experiencing the satisfaction of a job well done. One year on an oil rig and you will be a jacked beast.

- Solid male friends

The oil industry is great for finding like-minded guys who love to travel, think differently about life, and focus on getting rich.

- Excellent money

If you can stay focused and work your way up fast you can be making between $100,000-$250,000 a year within 3-5 years. I personally know several guys who are making this kind of money right now, are still in there twenties and get to travel for large chunks of the year.

The Dangers

- Job Security

Oil prices have always gone up and down. Your job isn't the most secure, hence the huge salaries, but oil as a fuel source is here to stay. Learn to ride the slow years and you will be fine.

- Long rotations

Expect to work up to several weeks straight at a time. The longest job I have had was 28 days straight. The upside – one job like that is enough for a whole summer of traveling.

- Danger pay

This job isn't for the timid. Oil rigs are dangerous, oil crews are rough and the environment is harsh. From working alongside ex-cons to a night shift in freezing -40 winds, you see it all in the oil patch.

So how do you go about getting work in the oil industry this winter? This is the method that hundreds of guys have used successfully over the last few years…

1. Move

Figure out exactly where you'd like to work. For Canada it's Alberta, still the world's second largest oil reserve. If you live in the U.S., then Texas or North Dakota are the two most promising destinations. Entry-level jobs want guys who are already living locally – you will have to move before you apply.

2. Basic Qualifications

Having the right certifications before you start applying is crucial. These usually include a local driving license and some basic rig courses. Don't fall for any "training course" – all specific training is done after you are hired. Instead look for only the basic courses needed. For Canada this is First Aid and H2S Alive.

3. Physical And Mental Preparation

This isn't an ideal job for a guy who hasn't been hitting the gym on the regular and can't deal with being outside their comfort zone. Typically oil companies look for things like:

- You're in decent physical shape and can lift at least 50-80 lbs multiples times throughout the day.
- 18 years old or over.
- You are willing to work extremely long hours. It is not uncommon for entry-level employees to work 12-14 hours for 14 days straight.
- You are medically fit to operate machinery. No traces of drugs or drink in your system
- You own (or can purchase) some of the necessary protective gear such as boots, gloves, and glasses. For remote locations that also might mean owning a truck. Sometimes oil companies will provide free gear.

- You are willing to move around a lot for work. Most rig locations are remote and usually not close to towns. You have to be able to deal with isolation and tough work conditions.
- You are prepared for unstable employment. Many entry-level jobs fluctuate. You may have months of non-stop work followed by a month of being unemployed.

4. Some Experience And Savings

Many oil rig workers have secondary jobs in town while they are waiting for oil jobs. Jobs in construction, mechanics, bartending, driving, or general labour keeps you focused, builds a network, and stops you from running through your savings. Finding a second job allows you to prepare for oil work while also meeting a few girls before you start.

5. Build A Network

Once you move, and even before, start building your network. Get to know guys and girls in town who have oil field contacts. Be social to everyone you meet and try to make as many connections as possible. Many oil jobs are gotten through word of mouth. The Rooshvforums.com have a huge network of men in the oil patch that are willing to help like-minded guys.

6. Know The Industry

Read some books, watch online videos and read oil forums. Having a basic knowledge of the industry is a huge advantage in job interviews. Again the Rooshvforum.com has expansive threads on what to expect and how to find work. Most job interviews will test for some knowledge and to see if you are actually interested in the industry.

7. Suitable Resume And Cover Letter

List all the prior experience you have where the skills translate to an oil rig. Jobs such as labourer, mechanic, construction or farm work are perfect. Your resume should be one page and only focus on things relevant to oil. Mention the qualifications and skills you have that would translate to a great oil worker. Staple a photocopy sheet to your resume that includes your driving license and all your oil certifications.

8. Apply For Jobs

Try to apply for as many jobs as possible. Competition with entry-level work is high. Spend a day every week canvassing oil companies in person for jobs. Applying in person is the most effective and efficient. Don't be scared of rejection and keep going until you have the job you want.

For more info check out the full Making Oil Money eBook, sample resumes, checklists and more for finding work on an oil rig at MakingOilMoney.com

The author writes under the username Atlantic on the Rooshvforums. Along with others, he has helped hundreds of men find work in the Oil Industry in recent years.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Team Of Imprisoned Felons Out-Debates Harvard Debate Squad

November 11, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Ms. Nugent said the Harvard College Debating Union didn't respond to parts of that argument…
>
> — The Wall Street Journal

A month ago, the illustrious Harvard debate team had their backsides handed to them by a small group of New York prisoners. Whilst credit should be given to the hard work of the men from Eastern New York Correctional Facility, especially as they seek to turn their lives around, the outcome demonstrates the serious intellectual shortcomings being bred by Ivy League and other prestigious American universities.

The best part, aside from the fact the Harvard team had won a national title only a little while before, was that the prisoners had to argue for a grossly non-SJW position: denying undocumented children right of enrolment in American schools.

2015 has not been a great year for the reputations of Ivy League schools. The protracted debacle at Columbia University, where inveterate attention seeker Emma Sulkowicz was allowed to perpetually stalk and harass her innocent ex-boyfriend, demonstrates how the rule of law has now suffered its tenth death on elite American campuses.

Recently, my colleague Matt Forney covered the prima donna egos of Yale students after husband-and-wife academics decided not to lay down draconian and politically correct orders about how students could dress for Halloween.

It may be hard to directly trace what went so hideously wrong for the Harvard team but it is undeniable that the perilously pro-SJW atmosphere in Cambridge, Massachusetts has dumbed down its students. Socially and professionally, a Harvard degree still means a lot. But is it equipping its students for life in the real world?

A case in point: Harvard and Yale alumni may be grossly overrepresented in fields such as politics and wishy-washy academia, but they are less likely to lead Fortune 500 companies, where actual results, not rhetoric, matter much more.

Part of a much wider trend

Della Kurzer-Zlotnick <della.kurzer-zlotnick@oberlin.edu> 5:58 PM (1 hour ago) to Michael

Hello Professor Raney,

It has come to the attention of students that students of color, particularly Black students, who have suffered significant trauma over the past few weeks due to the Grand Jury decisions are not at all in a place to take their finals right now. I am not among these students, and as a white, middle-class person, I have to privilege of being able to step away from these events and put enough energy into schoolwork and finals to assure that I will pass my classes. That is not the case for so many of my peers.

I do not know if you have been in conversation with any other students or faculty regarding finals. I do know, though, that the college administration has done very little, if anything, to support students who are struggling and feel traumatized because of the recent (and day-to-day) acts of racism in this country. Black students and other students of color have to focus on their survival and are expected to put energy into finals, while the white students, who may also feel shaken by these events, but not to the same degree, can focus most of our time on studying and preparing for finals.

I am asking that you create an option (if you have not already done so) for students who do not feel like they are in a place, emotionally, mentally, or physically, to postpone the statistics final. Columbia Law School has already done this (http://dailycaller.com/2014/12/07/columbia-law-school-students-will-be-allowed-to-postpone-final-exams-over-grand-jury-decisions/). If this were an event which was actually recognized by the school (and country) as a national trauma, such as 9/11 or the Newtown shootings, I expect that Oberlin would have immediately taken action to prioritize student wellbeing. Just because the murders of Eric Garner and Michael Brown do not (seem to) threaten the survival or safety of white people does not mean that they are not severely affecting students on our campus. I know that you have the ability and power to make decisions like this, and I am asking that you use your power to support your students who have put so much energy into the class already. They are tired, they are hurting beyond belief, and their wellbeing needs to be prioritized.

Thank you for reading,

Della Kurzer-Zlotnick

Michael Raney 5:59 PM (1 hour ago) to Della

No.

Sadly, the Oberlin professor Michael Raney was one of only a few academics willing to openly defy the princess mentality of SJW students after the Ferguson grand jury decision.

Columbia Law School postponed exams last year after the Ferguson grand jury decision not to indict Officer Darren Wilson (but strangely declined to offer any mass commemoration for an actual tragedy, like nearly three dozen elite American soldiers dying in an Afghan War helicopter crash in 2011). Harvard and Georgetown law students rushed to join the fray for special consideration, too. In response, a Fox News column astutely highlighted that:

> This won't prepare them for tough judges, unscrupulous clients or merciless partners at the law firms they hope to work for.

And to think that this network is widely derided by liberals as supporting anything but common sense!

Going back to the prisoners and Harvard students' debate, the biggest problem the young undergraduates faced was that they didn't even address much of what the felons put forward in argument. Across the Atlantic, this was the same dilemma that the Bristol University Feminist Society's Francesca Collins found herself in during a very recent campus interview.

In trying to defend the drive to exclude Milo Yiannopoulous from campus entirely, she could not explain why Milo was in any sense a threat to the safety of students. Defeated and in total shock, she promptly hung up on her interviewer.

SJW presuppositions, drilled into undergraduates in many countries over at least several years, are elevated to a realm of incontestability, in the same vein as the law of gravity. Whether "I believe women" in the context of unverified sexual assault allegations or the automatic presumption that any police shooting is either a racist lynching by bullet or police brutality, indoctrinated students are taught that they do not need to prove something that cannot be refuted. It just is.

It will only get worse

Ivy League SJWs getting their asses handed to them, however justified, is rare in modern society. From the media to politicians, the system is designed to protect them and marginalize positions that contradict them.

Look around you and there are plenty of examples of Ivy League SJWs or their ideological allies getting away with pure nonsense. Tragically, both of the leading candidates for the 2016 Democratic Presidential nomination, Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders, are unleashing the blatantly false gender pay gap scam. Sanders may not be an Ivy Leaguer but his rhetoric is identical to the Yale-educated Hillary Clinton.

The new generation is worse still. Harvard Law School students this year slammed their own professors, many of them fundamentally liberal themselves, for arguing that sexual assault policies should have some semblance of due process found in the court system. These are the misguided or plain fascistic “leading” lawyers of the future.

Hope exists, though. The debate against the New York prison team highlights the massive limitations of the SJW narrative. When required to construct actual arguments in a setting they do not control, students educated in the most politically correct environments tend to crumble.

And long may this crumbling continue.

Read More: Harvard University Jumps The Shark

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why You Should Do Everything With 100% Commitment

November 11, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A sure way for men to fail at opportunities in life, business, and with women is by half-assing it — that is, deciding on a course of action but then not following through with sufficient commitment. This is something you should avoid if you want "deep" experiences that transcend the superficial. Whenever you do anything, you should give it all you've got in that moment to ensure that you live as a man in the most visceral, meaningful way possible.

Live Each Moment With 100% Commitment

This summer I traveled to the south of France to see a good friend of mine get married. Now, this man is no fool and he's more than aware of ROK, neomasculinity, and the concerns that many guys have over marriage. He is not naive and is fully cognizant of the pitfalls that can befall the unwary. He has also been very successful both in business and with girls.

Nevertheless, at the apex of his player days five years ago he met a girl who had all the characteristics he desired in a long-term partner—good looks, of course, but also a sweet, feminine nature as well as traditional values and the desire to raise a family. Wanting kids himself he proposed and they hired a beautiful chateau in the French countryside to tie the knot.

The ceremony was attended by this guy's player friends from NYC as well as a great many high net-worth individuals from Europe and the US. Throughout, dressed in a snappy velvet designer suit, my friend was ebullient and played the role of the dashing bridegroom with complete conviction.

When we talked about it afterwards he had something interesting to say.

> It's not that I don't have my doubts about marriage, Troy. Of course I do. But I want a family and I've chosen to stick with this girl. Now, things may not turn out the way I want them to, sure. But you saw me up there making my speech. I committed 100%. Even if you think that doubts may arise in the future, to get the most out of life you should own everything you do entirely. If you change your mind somewhere down the line afterwards, at least in that moment you've experienced whatever it was on a deep level.

Before people start going on about divorce rape in the comments section, I am of course only using my friend's wedding as an example (disclaimer: enter into marriage at your own risk!). But I think the point holds good. If you're going to do something then you might as well do it like you mean it. That way you'll get more out of the experience than if you just go through the motions.

If you want to be a player, then be a player—go out as often as you can and interact with as many girls as possible. If you like a girl and you get into a relationship with her then have fun being her boyfriend and don't get hung up on whether walking around theme parks hand-in-hand wearing matching sweaters is "alpha" or not. If you want to start a business then take a deep breath, commit, and give it everything you've got.

In each of these scenarios you should keep giving all you've got until such time as you change your mind and decide to take another course, or until the situation for whatever reason becomes unworkable (i.e. your business goes bust or things turn sour with your girl).

In Game, You Should Give Each Interaction 100% Too

This philosophy also holds good in game, and in particular when you first approach. I was recently talking to a coaching client who has had difficulty meeting women for most of his life. He told me that he normally goes in with an indirect opener, such as “Can you tell me where the nearest Starbucks is,” and then, if he senses any interest on her part, attempts to transition to a longer conversation. Unfortunately he has had little traction with this method up to now.

Now, while I have no issue with indirect openers per se and have used them successfully many times in the past myself, my sense was that this man wasn’t committed enough to his approaches and was “letting himself off the hook.”

Men (and women) generally want to avoid rejection as it can be painful and humiliating. One way of mitigating its painful sting is by pretending to ourselves and others that we weren’t actually that bothered in the first place. Say you approach a girl, make like you’re not interested, and she turns you down. No big deal, right? You didn’t care anyway.

But the problem with this strategy is that you don’t generally get a reward without some risk. The romantic gestures that get girls’ hearts (and vaginas) fluttering tend to be those where the guy has put himself on the line. In simple terms this means that it is much more impressive—because it takes more balls—to walk up to a girl in a crowded cafe, look her in the eye and tell her that you think she is hot than to ask her where the soya milk is in the hope of this leading on to something more exciting.

Walk Up To Her With Intent

Whether you go direct or indirect, make sure that you walk up to the girl with intent and that you communicate your masculinity (in contrast to her femininity) through every aspect of your presentation from the way you carry yourself (shoulders back, taking up a lot of space, walking like a CEO) to strong eye contact, a deep voice, and slow speech. The overall effect should be to make it obvious that, regardless of what is coming out of your mouth, you want to have sex with her.

When faced with a confident man who sexually desires her, a girl is either going to accept or reject him. So be it. Don't be tempted to half-ass it to let yourself off the hook. Make your interest plain, either through what you say or with your body, and let her decide.

You may think that by not committing 100% to the approach you will make things a little easier on yourself. Well, perhaps you're right, but you will also reduce your chances of getting that girl exponentially. So go to it, lay it on the line and let the chips fall where they may.

Committing 100% To Everything You Do Will Make Your More Fulfilling

Life is characterized by uncertainty and it can often be difficult to know whether we've made the right decision or not. Should you leave the company you work for? Should you take that new job? Should you move to Eastern Europe? Should you start your own business or form a relationship with that particular girl? In each of these cases there are too many unforeseen variables to calculate which call is the “right” one.

Instead of worrying, though, it is far better to embark on a course of action and proceed with 100% commitment as though you are absolutely certain that what you are doing is right. Of course, you should always take advice, but beyond that, by committing to something entirely you will enjoy a far greater depth of experience than you would by simply dipping your toe into the water without taking the plunge.

And remember, nothing is forever. If things don’t work out, you can always change tack down the line.

Read More: How to Make Her Your Girlfriend

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

5 Steps For Saving The American Economy

November 11, 2015 | by Nastimux Khan | Link | Original Link

There are only two obvious ways to lose money: charity and stupidity. Leftism works by appealing to charity of stupidity-prone drones. From feminization of the general populace to European Union endorsement of Syrian invaders, Western governments have successfully metamorphosed from charitable to cuckold. The European youth need some deep introspection to solve this infiltration and betrayal, as do us Americans.

The American public has been sold out by its politicians, wealthy elite, and professional victims. But before we solve any social and cultural issues, we must first solve the American economy. After all, how can we revert to genuine charity when nobody has any money? Here are the five steps to reinvigorating the American economy:

1. Reduce “Made in China” imports and strive for a trade surplus

Factory manager holding monthly Walmart orders. For Chairman Mao!

There is common paranoia that our new Chinese overlords are inevitable. We run trade deficits with China so habitually that American defeatists just cry their way to Walmart. Of course, people always think the grass is greener in foreign pastures. The truth is that China is anticipating its own Baby Boomer pension collapse. During Mao's "Great Leap Forward", Chinese birth rates soared to meet his agricultural and manufacturing ambitions. He wanted each Chinese household to farm and smelt iron.

Mao's economic policy failed, and China eventually enacted single child policies to relieve future pension burdens. It was too late. These Chinese Baby Boomers are now supported by China's export-based trade surpluses. The Chinese are racing against nature's hourglass, similar to our impending Social Security crisis. In order to avoid collapse, the Chinese economy depends on producing Gap khakis and Walmart toys, while rushing to switch to developed services such as finance and technology.

How does this relate to America? Our consumption of cheap textiles, toys and televisions is feeding their Maoist Baby Boomers. While nations like China operate on currency depreciation and mercantilist behavior, Western nations foolishly prop onto the moral pedestal of "free trade." Western nations used mercantilism from the 1500's until abandoning it after WWI.

Once we pull the carpet from under the Chinese and balance our trade ledgers, their welfare and pension bubble will pop. Once America revitalizes its manufacturing bases, the Chinese bubble of cheap export goods will burst. China will meet the same fate as late Rome.

How can we achieve this? The American government must offer tax incentives to corporations who shore employment to American workers. Forced employer-provided services, such as Obamacare, must be suspended. Finally, we must collect punishing tariffs on Chinese imports until they properly revalue their currency. It is time to play rough once again.

2. Reallocate foreign policy funds to subsidize nuclear power and renewable energy sources

Greatest place to build a nuclear power plant? The nation where four tectonic plates meet, of course!

Humanitarian aid and offering asylum are noble efforts, but should have no priority in times of economic turmoil. The most useful is energy, the fuel and lubricant of every economy. Israel loves boasting about their strength and independence, right? So American dollars are just scraps to them. If they are truly great allies of the American people, won't they forgive that we can't spare any missiles this fiscal year?

Liberals wet themselves over everything European, right? Well, the French get over 80% of their electricity from nuclear fission. Are Americans paranoid about nuclear power because of the Chernobyl and Fukushima disasters? Firstly, engineered products of Communist regimes were always of infamously low-quality. Chernobyl was the result of "socialize losses, privatize profits."

After all, why should an industrial firm under Communism innovate or guarantee product quality, when state owned enterprising dictates that failure is rewarded with research subsidies? Fukushima was in Japan, a nation atop multiple tectonic fault-lines, so an earthquake-induced disaster was inevitable.

The French have a perfect track record with nuclear power plants. Nuclear power plants should utilized within inland states free of frequent natural disasters. The coastal and riverside states should receive research and construction subsidies for hydroelectric and tidal energy plants.

3. Strictly enforce immigration policies

She’s here for some English learning. If you don’t support it, you’re a misogynist.

All illegal immigrants share two characteristics. Firstly, they have propensity to break the law, as their presence is already evidence of laws already violated. How can I depend on a neighbor to be well-behaved, when they broke the rules to become my neighbor? Secondly, their presence skews economic and logistical calculations. Although they are not legal citizens, their presence interferes with census data, district allotment, and native wages. I won’t even start on the high rate at which they receive welfare.

Now contrast this with the characteristics of a foreign student graduating from an American university. A graduating student obviously bothered to learn the English language. This graduating student has shown an ability to pay (or will pay) tens of thousands of dollars of tuition, as well as ensure enough earning potential to not receive welfare.

However, we are rolling foreign students through our prestigious universities before forcing them back to their home countries. This process of “brain drain” is moronic and suicidal. Why do we expel the intelligent, stable, and studious members, while ignoring potential criminals entering our borders? We should therefore offer work visas or citizenship to foreign exchange students graduating from American universities.

4. Encourage electronics recycling within the United States

While we are distracted by subjective issues such as “equality” and “patriarchy,” there is an investment that garners no attention—American supply of precious metals. Precious metals, such as gold, copper, and lithium are found in everything. American manufacturing is based on highly sophisticated goods, such as Boeing aircraft.

As we demand smarter smartphones and missiles that fly further, demand for computer chips will skyrocket. However, for a pretty view and cheaper disposal costs, American electronics are dumped into Asian and African landfills. This is an issue where only pictures can show the magnitude:

There’s more copper in that bowl than all the pennies in the USA.

The iPhone afterlife. Your next iPhone will cost much more.

This bounty should have been ours. We are playing them dollars and precious metals, to charge us more dollars later.

Those foreign recycling firms scavenge and recycle these precious metals and resell them to American manufacturers at a decent markup. As these landfill nations emerge, they will either a) hoard these precious metals for domestic technology firms, or b) hoard these precious metals and charge American firms monopoly prices. If you think a replacement battery for your laptop is expensive now, how much will it cost if China's landfills held 70% of the world's lithium reserves?

5. Abolish affirmative action quotas based on ethnicity and gender

"If I change my hair, lip, and eye color more often, could I get a raise for expanding our diversity?"

A woman trying to be even less productive.

The original purpose of affirmative action was in education for African Americans, rightfully justified by atrocities committed by a subset of Southern agriculturalists. It eventually included women and Latin Americans. Nowadays it has become the Olympiad of Victim-hood.

Let's examine Rachel Dolezal. She was the white woman who tanned and changed her hairstyle for positions in Howard University and NAACP:

1. Leftists say race is a human construct and not real. All races are therefore equal.
2. Rachel Dolezal wasn't allowed be Black. Leftists insist on separating Black and white.
3. "Separate, but equal" is also known as segregation.

So affirmative action is segregation.

Affirmative action disincentivizes both the "privileged" and "victim." The "privileged" won't be productive because of the threat of being displaced or plundered. The "victim" will receive the spoils of plunder or displacement regardless of productivity. The country thus loses two shares of productivity, all for some fairy-tale rendition of fairness, equality and sparkling unicorns. The American government needs to gradually abolish affirmative action policies, and start heading for meritorious rewards.

Conclusion

All these steps encourage self-dependence, abandoning unnecessary burdens, and accumulating resources for the future. We need a long-term energy source, a domestic manufacturing base and precious raw material. We cannot afford foreign aid, providing economic asylum or pandering to victim-hood.

I'm not saying to abandon charity or sympathy for the unfortunate, simply that it is dangerous for a government to contort economic outcomes for its own ideal of charity. It is time for America to stop feeding from the cauldron of guilt stirred by the Leftists. It is time for America to rise again.

Read More: Why The American Economy Needs The Beta Male

Nastimux Khan
The Khan is one cocky Epicurean. He only values physical and intellectual pleasures for its own sake, not for political drama. He is a recreational wrestler, economist, lecher and Devil's Advocate. Hear his latest ramblings on Twitter

4 Additional Insights From A Decade In Higher Learning

November 12, 2015 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

This is a follow-up to my first article in which I shared observations and wisdom from 10 years in higher education. What I have learned from academia is transferable to every other field of endeavor. And the additional insights I share here are relevant to the lives of all men, no matter their level of education or path in life.

1. Learn To Think Tactically

Approach your life as a military commander would approach a campaign. Have fallback options and practice triage.

We've all heard the term "safety school," in which a prospective university student sends out a slew of applications, including to a lower-tier school that is less-selective and to which his acceptance is guaranteed. Never count on a single course of action. If you don't get into your top choice school, start up at a school to which you were admitted, take care of some prerequisites, establish a solid GPA, and transfer in your second or third year to a better school.

Similarly, if you weren't directly admitted to a specific program, e.g., engineering, begin in a similar program, e.g., physics or chemistry, and transfer into the desired program later.

Rather than being routed when things don't go as planned, execute a tactical withdrawal where you can remain on the offensive, advancing your goals and aspirations in the face of adversity. You must always be maneuvering, anticipating potential obstacles and setbacks.

And when presented with competing options, choose the one that best serves your interests. If you apply for two internships and you are selected for both, choose the one that is most prestigious or pays the most. A military tactician must be mindful of logistics. You have limited time and energy: invest them where the return is greatest.

Do not let considerations of abstract ideals such as "honor" or "keeping your word" factor into your decision. No one in the real world entertains such quaint notions and neither should you. Adopt a mercenary mindset. The question you must always ask is: what's in it for me?

Implement a long-term strategy where completing one goal facilitates completion of the next, like a line of dominos. While aimlessly traipsing about campus, occasionally sitting in on a calligraphy class worked for Steve Jobs, such an irresponsible, haphazard approach to life will not cut it in today's unforgiving world.

2. You Must Be Tenacious

People will not give you anything or do anything for you if they don't have to. When I started at university, I was very meek and lacked assertiveness. I was afraid to push an issue and be forceful. If a professor didn't respond to an email, I simply let the matter go.

Young women today are encouraged to "lean in" and to "ban bossy." In a similar vein, you must not be afraid of being seen as annoying. Send email after email if necessary. If you find yourself being stonewalled, contact the unresponsive person's supervisor or boss. If you are not seen as a priority (and you most likely won't be), you must be dogged and resourceful to get a response.

Don't come across as menacing, but be firm and persistent. I've lost count of the times I've sent follow-up emails or stopped by in person requesting an update on the status of something (financial matters, authorization matters, etc.). You may be seen as obnoxious and exasperating but so what? It's more important you get your way than be likable.

3. Save And Inventory Everything

Whether you are a student, teacher, writer, musician, or machinist, save everything. Every note you jot down. Every idea that comes to you in the middle of the night. Every PowerPoint presentation you create. Every CAD file. Every email.

And have an organizational scheme for inventorying everything that you save. I highly recommend you utilize Cloud services. Do not waste a moment of your time manually synchronizing your work on multiple devices. For $99 a year, you can get a Dropbox Pro account with 1 TB (1,000 GB) of storage. It's well worth it. I have a desktop and two laptops and I can access any file on every device. I can edit a document at the office, leave my laptop behind, and pick up where I left off on my desktop at home. It makes your life much easier. In addition, back up your work regularly.

Perform a data dump to an external hard drive (do not rely solely on the Cloud) every month or so. If you ever lose your laptop or have your tablet stolen, you want to have to only replace the physical item and not all the work into which you've invested thousands of hours of effort.

I witnessed how my thesis adviser lost so much time due to his lack of organization. He was a very intelligent man but painfully absent-minded and disorganized. There were hundreds of icons scattered on his desktop. No organizational scheme to speak of. He had to complete the same form over and over because he couldn't find the one he had already filled out.

I, on the other hand, have such a tight organizational and hierarchical scheme that I can track down any file (out of tens of thousands) in less than 30 seconds. Very often the key to success is not genius: it is organization. For instance, I can reuse grant proposals with very minor revision. Something that would take weeks of effort to write from scratch I can customize and tailor in a few hours.

You will never be prolific if you have to start from square one each and every time. Remember: you want to work smarter not harder.

4. Social Justice Policies Lead To Machiavellianism

Men are waking up and realizing the deck is stacked against them in academia and corporate America. In response, they are becoming craftier and more ruthless. If the standards are systematically lowered for females in an effort to achieve parity in numbers, then the remaining males who are permitted entry into a program or given a job will simply be the elite in terms of intelligence and abilities.

It is the men of average or lesser ability (who may still be more qualified than the most qualified women), who are being shut out and disenfranchised. Preferential hiring, retention, and promotion policies thus have an enriching effect, making the competency gap between females and males even more obvious.

And if academia and corporate America kowtow to affirmative action, men will simply devote their energies elsewhere, e.g., to start-ups and entrepreneurship, where for the most part, gender and race are irrelevant. Males are also banding together in solidarity, effectively recreating the long-reviled "Old Boys' Club" by minimizing their professional dealings with female colleagues. Very often I have closed door meetings with male colleagues. And we do strike quid pro quo style arrangements that promise mutual benefit (financial compensation, co-authorship, etc.).

For example, if a competition or request for proposals (as funding opportunities in academia are often called) limits the number of entries you may submit to one per person, you may circumvent this by pulling in a friend, colleague, or underling to serve as the point man on the second entry you want to submit. It's not fraud. It's being clever.

Also, very often in technology competitions sponsored by universities or industry there will be a separate women's category, in which the entries must come from female-led teams. That shouldn't stop you either. Instead, bring in a female colleague or friend and get them to assume a nominal leadership role. You cut them in on the prize money, they get to put the experience on their resume, and you get the majority of the prize money.

Conclusion

I discovered the insights I shared here and in my previous article through trial-and-error and experience over many years. Hopefully, they can save you a good amount of effort and frustration.

Read More: 5 Insights From A Decade In Higher Learning

Waldemar Pabst
29 year old academic, right of reactionary

Study Shows Young Women Are Twice As Likely As Young Men To Be Mentally Ill

November 12, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In a joint report issued by the Black Dog Institute and Mission Australia, it has been found that young women are twice as likely to be mentally ill as young men. Conveniently, the adolescents and twenty-somethings of today comprise the first generation to have lived their entire lives within the shadow of third wave feminism, which is consistently thought of as starting in the early 1990s.

Women gained the vote and joined the workforce en masse in the 20th century, yet the newest cohort of adult women or soon-to-be adult women appears to be the most miserable and emotionally ill-equipped female bunch of all time. Why? How?

Blaming the patriarchy for the mental woes of young womanhood would be an approach as moronic as it is predictable. By that standard, women should have been slitting their wrists in unison during the 1890s, before the suffragettes launched their biggest campaigns, or in the 1970s, when radical feminism told women about their so-called extra shackles and how every morning every man woke up for the express purpose of oppressing them forever.

With men being the gender actually targeted as a sport in modern Western society, it speaks volumes about the parlous state of feminism that women are the ones most in need of serious emotional intervention.

The higher proportion of female mental illness reflects the warped theories of feminism

Yes. Oui. Ja. Sí. Da.

For years and repeated ad nauseam, feminism has promulgated schizophrenic theories emphasizing cabalistic patriarchal “superstructures” designed to keep women down. Forgetting the massive diversity in human beings’ family backgrounds, educations, incomes and social standings, gender-obsessed SJWs continue to focus on male privilege, thereby assuming that a feminist’s garbage collector, paid $5-8 an hour, is part of the same secret conspiracy of prosperity as someone like Mitt Romney, whose net worth is $250 million. Instead of pointing out the basic flaws of this paradigm, feminists have raised it to an inexorable physical law.

In the meantime, feminist ringleaders have taught women two highly contradictory precepts: 1) you’re capable, much more so than the boys and 2) you need gender quotas, female-only STEM scholarships, female-only mentoring programs and the elimination of corporate salary negotiations. However many women may agree with the self-promoting privileges of being female in the workplace, a great deal of them sense that the system is unfairly geared in their favor. Feelings of unworthiness, pressure and uncertainty are bound to emanate from society-wide circumstances such as these.

What’s more is the paranoia that feminism requires to sustain itself. Feminists take the make-up of Fortune 500 companies, which still elevate a number of women, and assume that these are the command centers of some monolithic patriarchal conspiracy more all-encompassing than the energy-producing lies created by the machines in The Matrix films.

Can you imagine having to live like this? As claimed even by mangina male feminists and white knights, all men must have rampant unconscious biases against women and switches of oppressive behavior that simply cannot be turned off. Many women who do not describe themselves as feminists are already impacted by this supernatural climate of apparently always being undermined and victimized. It’s a wonder many of them even leave the house every day with so much for them to rage spiral about.

Women are having their femininity pressed out from them, starting in childhood and leading to mental illness

No shit, Sherlock.

We live in a world where Caitlyn Jenner can supposedly transition from man to woman because it's "natural," but young girls are taught that the way women usually behave is actually a gendered construct. Despite the presence of two X chromosomes compared to a male's XY combination, somehow women have to behave like men. Constant SlutWalks, exhortations by phenomenally privileged pop stars like Beyoncé and Lady Gaga, and all manner of other feminist devices are used to command women to rise up from their "oppressed" state.

And guess what? Womankind is more depressed than ever before. Beneath the facade of liberation and self-love advertised by media outlets and mainstream commentators lies an unrecognized truth: women are acting in ways they do not like. They are told to worship their bodies but almost all of them want the body of another girl.

The chasm between their furious affirmations of happiness and their subconscious impulses to be something else is only widening. Combined with the serious factor paranoia, this is bound to lead to hatred of oneself, masked by an over-assertive and bitchy personality.

Rehabilitate the girls with moderate symptoms but forget the truly toxic fatties and SJWs

Never do this to save a woman from either her own feminist conditioning or conditioning she has regularly accepted.

You might be surprised about how many girls have only a moderate exposure to feminist ideas. Well, exposure is a bad word because all people are now constantly accosted by feminist mantras. But many girls have not absorbed this poison or may even have rejected it. A great proportion of these women do not require any form of rehabilitation, whereas some others do. And rehabilitation, at least in the way I am using it, is not the big, bad, white knight concept you may know it as.

Do not go out of your way, pretty much ever, to save a girl from herself. Good luck with that one because it's a waste of your energy, time and resources, no matter how much you "succeed" at it. What I mean by rehabilitation is implicitly reminding a woman why, beyond the SJW cultural conditioning she has had peppered past her, she wants a man in the first place. And that reminding takes the form of being the man ROK is teaching you to be.

In between the menagerie of women emotionally and cognitively enfeebled by feminism, you can find enough other girls of sound or close to sound mental constitution. In a nutshell, this means girls who actually want to be girls.

Read More: Feminists Rage Spiral When Teenager Shows What Young Women Will Do For $120

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Dan Bilzerian's Cuckolding Of Bodybuilding.Com Founder Shows No Man Is Safe From Female Infidelity

November 12, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The internet exploded this last week with news that Instagram icon Dan Bilzerian slept with the girlfriend (not wife) of Ryan DeLuca, Bodybuilding.com's mega-wealthy founder and, until recently, CEO. In the most nauseating way imaginable, Bilzerian humiliated DeLuca by posting a photograph of Ashley Soule handling a gun that nearly dwarfed her on a bed, all while sprawled in very tight lingerie.

Bilzerian's caption made it clear that he had had sex with the multimillionaire entrepreneur's girl. The eternal shaming of DeLuca is captured here, in a now deleted Instagram post:

"I fucked your bitch in my Gucci flip flops" is now the odds-on favorite for being named the verbal bitch slap of the century. Bilzerian then rubbed pounds of salt into DeLuca's rather global wounds by posting a behind picture of Ashley Soule in the same pose and a close up of his legendary flip flops.

Even with decent looks, one of the fattest wallets in the fitness world, and a very affable personality, DeLuca found himself cuckolded for the entire world to see. So what does that say about the prospects of a woman investing her loyalty in a man who belongs to the mere 99.999%, including yourself?

How did this happen?

[image]
Even a titan in the fitness industry can be publicly cuckolded.

The popular theory is that DeLuca and Soule had actually broken up prior to the latter being consensually ravaged by Dan Bilzerian. The pair then reconciled, after which DeLuca found Bilzerian's number in Soule's phone. Correspondence between the two men ensued and Bilzerian, feeling disrespected (or just malevolent), promptly aired what amounted to a savage final say.

Skeptics may say that because of this temporary break-up Bilzerian's revenge isn't nearly as bad as the Instagram and other posts make it look at first glance. I beg to differ. The esteem, or lack thereof, in which Soule held DeLuca, other than as a gargantuan meal ticket, is demonstrated in her close to immediate bedroom coupling with Bilzerian.

And once she reunited, if you can call it that, with DeLuca, informing him about the tryst obviously wasn't one of her priorities, until her beau stumbled upon the shocking sexual connection himself. It's a cuckolding in anything but technical name. DeLuca was a lovable, disposable loser, multimillionaire or not.

Following the heart-exploding revelation chuckled and gawked at by half the world, DeLuca issued this admirably delusional response:

https://instagram.com/p/940RNWOYEe/

When girls can't help but sacrifice their meal tickets

[image]
Ryan's initial public profile was far less suave than it has been in recent years. Was his new alpha-ness really just a facade, a facade Ashley Soule compulsively wanted to discard for the real thing in Dan Bilzerian?

With Soule's Tesla P90D now slated for some pimply Midwestern teenager, we can start drawing up some answers to the question of why girls put their meal tickets at risk. This is all the more mind-boggling when we consider a woman dating Mr. Ryan DeLuca, before any non-prenup marriage could deliver her a lifetime meal ticket of settlements and alimony.

The reason is that, compared to Bilzerian, DeLuca is still a nerdy Bill Gates. Yes, he's self-made, as far as we know, innovative and, according to most people rendering opinions about the two men's aesthetics, better-looking than Bilzerian. But what DeLuca couldn't give is the alpha-laced thrill of being around the King of Instagram. That, his much higher public profile and his buffer body are the only advantages Bilzerian seemingly has. Yet, in this context, they count for everything.

If anything, Bilzerian did DeLuca a massive favor before he put a ring on it. Sure, he could have done it far less publicly. But having someone point a loaded shotgun in the form of a slutty, gold-digging female away from you is always a good thing.

Face reality and improve yourself to limit the chances of straying

Each and every day, are you coming close to your own personalized and non-famous version of this man? If not, some other man is likely to grasp YOUR girl away from you.

"Limit" is the very key word here. One of the sad but true realities of the modern age is an aspect Roosh has touched on before: mobile phones and other devices give a woman access to 10,000 (and then a whole lot more) men after only a click or two. Your mission, especially for your own sake, is to improve yourself to a level where such finger-tapping or something like it in the real world is less likely to ever take place. And then go for the next level. And the one after that.

Pay careful attention over the coming months to the continued development of neomasculinity as an actionable philosophy for men. Revise those elements you have already been exposed to and make full use of whatever other resources you have at your disposal. Nonetheless, the key to your masculine development is constant and focused effort, each and every day, to better yourself and your experience of life.

And for God's sake, if you think you've met an Ashley Soule, walk the fuck away.

Read More: Why Women And Gays Should Not Be Allowed In Male-Safe Spaces

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How The Sci-Fi Series Ascension Shows The Usefulness Of Traditional Values

November 13, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Ascension (7.2 IMDB rating) is a science fiction series which aired on CBC in Canada and SyFy in the US. In addition to being an interesting and thought-provoking sci-fi series, there are some traditional values presented in the series, since it takes place in a society isolated from the rest of the world in the early 1960s.

The series consists of three episodes, sort of an extended pilot or shortened mini-series that has the potential to be extended. Note: The series originally aired December, 2014; if you have not seen it yet I will reveal one spoiler (with warning label) that is also revealed in the first episode.

The story begins in 1963 when President John Kennedy launches a secret manned space mission. The USS Ascension is constructed and launched on a 100-year multi-generational mission to colonize a planet orbiting Proxima Centauri. The idea is based on the real Project Orion, which was cancelled by JFK when it became obvious the military was more interested in using space advancement for destructive and warfare purposes than scientific exploration. The Ascension left earth with 600 volunteers–men, women, and children, all from 1960s America.

Crew of the Ascension (ie The Patriarchy)

The series begins in 2014 as the USS Ascension enters its 51st year of the 100 year journey–passing the point of no return. At this point, there is insufficient fuel or resources on board to abandon the mission and return to Earth. The Ascension is a fascinating exercise in sociology, as there is an entire generation who have been born on the ship, never lived on earth, never experienced the civil rights movement, feminism, terrorism, the internet, smart phones, the mini-skirt, birth control, inter-racial marriage, Angry Birds, etc.

All the technology they have is pre-1964, and they have access to entertainment from that era, mostly black and white television. Fashion has not changed. Old telephones, tube televisions, and games from the 1960s entertain the modern crew. There is a livestock and produce area that sustains the population with food.

Where can you find a 1960s soda fountain in 2014? The USS Ascension.

In the first episode, a homicide is discovered—a young girl is shot and killed on an artificial beach—the first killing since the ship left earth. The death starts a chain of events including questioning the true reason behind the mission. The series alternates between sequences aboard the ship and the communications staff back home on earth.

However, on earth, the existence of the Ascension is still secret, outside of those who communicate with and support the ship. A conspiracy theorist believes that the missing 600 people did leave Earth on a vessel, and tracks down the son of the original project director.

Staying true to the 1960s theme, the series is produced with little CGI and a real set, with tangible 60s era buttons and knobs. The ship is planned to have three captains—the initial captain who launches the mission, the interim and current captain, who is frustrated that he will receive no glory, and the final captain who will pilot the ship to its destination 100 years after launch.

Femininity is valued and fat-shaming enforced

There is a league of women on board who comprise the Sexual Stewardess Corps, who are managed by the captain's wife, Viondra, played by the alluring Tricia Helfer, and the women must compete for a position on this team, which is charged with entertaining and pleasing the men. Girls must weigh in, demonstrate proper etiquette, dress well, and basically compete as if they were entering a beauty pageant. Here are some other themes I noted:

Patriarchal, Monarch Style Of Leadership

I think watching Ronald Moore's Battlestar Galactica was the series that really made me question my belief in democracy. Captain Adama is a strong, authoritarian leader, and that is exactly what the crew of Galactica needed. It is no different on board the USS Ascension, and there are strict prescribed roles and duties for everyone.

There is a working class on the lower decks who have blue collar duties that maintain the ship operations, and an officer class that oversees and manages. There is no putting things to a vote or deciding things by what is popular. There is no distraction over a pending election, as the US is going to experience for the next 12 months. Business is taken care of, the rules and duties are pre-existant.

Absolute authority lies with the monarch, who rules benevolently in the best interests of the society. There is little room for individualism or "being different."

Arranged Marriage

Space is no place to ponder one’s career

I have had a couple of friends who recently entered arranged marriages, and they are both quite pleased with their wives. Throughout history, marriage was always about the families of the husband and wife, much more than the actual couple. Over many years, Western culture has trended away from outright arranged marriage towards the ultimate end result of two couples choosing to marry for love.

With only 600 people on board the ship, and no birth control, marriages are selected, supposedly by a computer algorithm, but the exact details or criteria is unclear. However, what is perfectly clear is your path and role in life–women are to become mothers, and they will have an appropriate husband matched to them, whom they must nurture and please.

Men have important duties on board the ship, and must also raise a family to ensure that the mission is completed by their children.

The Noble Lie (SPOILER ALERT)

There is a plot twist revealed early in the series at the end of the first episode related to Plato’s Noble Lie. Plato believed that a myth knowingly told by an elite to maintain social harmony or advance an agenda, is a good and necessary thing. In Ascension, it is revealed that the ship never left Earth, but instead the vessel and all its inhabitants are sitting on Earth after all these years, and remain nothing but a social experiment.

From the noble lie perspective, their outcome is not changed by this lie–what they perceive as truth is the life they have been presented with inside a vessel on a 100 year mission, whether that is actually true or not. Religion is often described as an example of the noble lie–what is more important is not whether the One True God actually exists, what his name is, or what he calls his kingdom, but the fact that people believe in this story, with all its tales of morality and messages for living is of utmost importance. Basically, Voltaire’s “If God did not exist it would be necessary to invent him.”

Traditional Femininity Is Valued

Strict gender roles are enforced

The crew have been exposed to the media and culture of the 1950s and 60s for the past 50 years, and the result has been a peaceful, stable, healthy, and productive society with traditional femininity highly valued. As Viondra is inspecting one of the girls competing for membership in the sexual stewardess corps, she weighs in one hopeful girl, accepting her with the words, “120, the acceptable weight for a girl 5’5.”

Reality Vs. Illusion

Much as the Matrix questioned the notion of how real the world is around us, there is a stark contrast between the modern society we are living in on earth in 2014 versus the world the 600 members of the Ascension live in. What is real? What is the illusion? Is life on Ascension merely a facsimile of the way things used to be?

Is life on Earth, with all its rape culture, war, intolerance, gay marriage, transgender, microaggressions, and immorality the “real” world, or is it a mere approximation of what humanity once was?

Classism And Patriarchy

On the Ascension, there are clear, distinct lines between the upper deck and lower deck. They may not love each other (but can we really say the entitled class loves the ghettho today?) but they do manage to get along, and each have their duties which they feel responsibility for in order to keep the world running.

There was a black officer, which I questioned based on the viewpoints of the time; however, keep in mind that they were in communication with earth, and at least heard about things like the civil rights movement, or the fact that America elected a black president, so it’s not unbelievable to have a black crew member.

Similarly, there are also clear lines between men and women. Women left the important jobs (especially all the lower level work) to the men, and chose supporting roles, with the big picture and the community in mind. This is in no way minimizing their importance; in fact, good, nurturing women who would raise the future generations of inhabitants who would dutifully fulfill the mission goal in 2063 was absolutely essential.

The role of the woman as supporting and nurturing was vital. Indeed, the sexual stewardess corps served as a sexual outlet for the well deserving men.

Tricia Helfer + Sci Fi Plot = Win

As of November, 2015, the series has not been adopted for further development, which is a shame. I was captivated by the idea, and looked forward to exploring the reasons behind the mission, the social experimentation being done by Mission Control on Earth to the inhabitants, and seeing how a completely different society running parallel to the one on earth would turn out.

Sci-Fi is a predominantly male domain, and series such as these are one of the few "safe spaces" where women can be fat-shamed, the patriarchy portrayed in a positive light, and traditional femininity is valued and praised. We should support such endeavors in order to encourage more entertainment counter to the anything-goes Hollywood mainstream releases.

The idea of Ascension is very appealing. As they say in the trailer, Ascension is a lifeboat for humanity. Will we have to resort to such drastic efforts soon in order to preserve our own humanity? Ascension seemed much more "alternate history" than "science fiction" to me.

If given the choice, would you rather be trapped on a ship in space stuck in 1963 or on Earth today?

Read More: The Philosophical Messages of The Watchmen

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Why Is Ronda Rousey Allowed To Get Away With Beating Her Boyfriend?

November 13, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

If you've ever doubted that there's one set of rules for men and another for women in society, just look at the case of Ronda Rousey. In her recent autobiography My Fight, Your Fight, the UFC fighter and movie star admitted to physically assaulting one of her ex-boyfriends after he purportedly took nude photos of her without her permission:

> "I punched him in the face with a straight right, then a left hook," she writes. "He staggered back and fell against the door.
>
> [Expletive] my hands, I thought. I can't hurt them before a fight.
>
> "I slapped him with my right hand. He still wouldn't move. Then I grabbed him by the neck of his hoodie, kneed him in the face and tossed him aside on the kitchen floor."
>
> The fight ended when she walked out to her car and he jumped into the passenger seat, asking her to hear him out. "I walked around the car, pulled him by the neck of the hoodie again, dragged him onto the sidewalk and left him writhing there as I sped away."

Despite openly bragging about her vicious assault in a book, not only has Rousey not been arrested on domestic violence charges, there's been virtually no mention of her violent behavior in the media. This wouldn't be a problem if it weren't for the fact that leftists and the mainstream media maintain a blatant double standard when it comes to domestic violence.

For the past few years, male athletes and other professional figures have seen their public reputations destroyed and their careers derailed due to accusations of domestic violence. Despite the fact that these allegations are sometimes unproven or have already been dealt with by the justice systems, SJWs and feminists have taken it upon themselves to ensure that any man accused of battering his wife or girlfriend will forever wear a scarlet "A." At the same time, women who abuse their partners are virtually ignored.

Ray Rice vs. Ronda Rousey

The most glaring example of the difference between how male and female domestic abusers are treated is the case of former Baltimore Ravens running back Ray Rice. Last year, Rice was indefinitely suspended from the NFL after a video of him punching his then-fiancee Janay Palmer was released by TMZ. This is despite the fact that criminal charges against Rice for the incident had already been dropped by the time the video was released. Additionally, Palmer herself married Rice not long after the attack.

These facts didn't stop feminists and social justice warriors from launching a campaign against Rice and the NFL, alleging that the NFL has had a "history" of ignoring players who beat their partners and declaring that they would ruin Rice's career. Rice's indefinite suspension from the NFL effectively did the latter. While he was eventually reinstated and became a free agent following an appeal, the incident did an incredible amount of damage to his life.

The fact that feminists and leftists were so eager to destroy Rice's life over this incident shows how much more severely society punishes men who commit domestic violence. The fact that Rice's fiancee—the woman he punched—was able to forgive him for what he did (as shown by how she married him) didn't matter; neither did the fact that the justice system saw fit to drop the charges against him. In their minds, Rice had to be punished for a “crime” he had purportedly committed.

Why Do Women Get A Pass?

Ray Rice is far from the only example. Throw a dart at a wall and you’ll hit a male UFC fighter or other athlete who was on the receiving end of public outrage over domestic violence accusations. Athletes such as Travis Browne, Anthony Johnson and others have seen suspensions and numerous other punishments for even being accused of domestic violence, without any proof.

Conversely, Ronda Rousey’s blithe admission of committing a violent assault on her boyfriend has gone almost unnoticed. As of this writing, Rousey is in Australia preparing for a fight against Holly Holm. The irony of this is that two months ago, Australia denied singer Chris Brown a visa due to domestic violence charges after he attacked his then-girlfriend Rihanna in 2009.

Despite their claims that men and women should be treated equally, it’s clear that on the issue of intimate partner violence, women are allowed to get away with it. As long as the media continues to ignore Ronda Rousey’s violent attack, their moralistic bleating over domestic violence in the NFL or among male athletes should be laughed at.

Read More: 5 Ways To Land (And Keep) A Quality Boyfriend

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Death Toll Climbs In Paris As Media Rushes To Downplay Connection To Muslim Terrorism

November 13, 2015 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

One of the worst terrorist attacks in recent history is currently taking place across Paris. According to media reports, at least seven separate sites are under siege in a coordinated operation that has claimed over 100 lives. One of the most notable venues attacked in this operation is the Bataclan concert hall, where during a concert terrorists reportedly used Kalashnikov rifles to gun down concert-goers while shouting "Allahu Akbar" (source: Breitbart).

Information continues to be sparse about the attacks, though France's President Hollande has already closed the borders and mobilized the military after declaring a state of emergency. As of Friday at 7pm ET, the death doll has reached above 140 in the Bataclan concert hall alone, with eyewitnesses describing the scene as one of utter destruction (source):

> "It was carnage," Marc Coupris, 57, told the Guardian, still shaking after being freed from being held hostage at the Bataclan, a popular concert venue.
>
> "It looked like a battlefield, there was blood everywhere, there were bodies everywhere. I was at the far side of the hall when shooting began. There seemed to be at least two gunmen. They shot from the balcony."
>
> "Everyone scrabbled to the ground. I was on the ground with a man on top of me and another one beside me up against a wall. We just stayed still like that. At first we kept quiet. I don't know how long we stayed like that, it seemed like an > eternity.

>
> "I saw my final hour unfurl before me, I thought this was the end. I thought I'm finished, I'm finished. I was terrified. We must all have thought the same. Eventually, when a few gendarmes came in slowly we began to look up and there was blood absolutely everywhere. The police told us to run."

Leftist media mouthpieces will be quick to caution sites like this one against drawing "hasty conclusions" from a heinously tragic event, but our media masters can only pretend for so long that the emperor of multiculturalism is still wearing any clothes.

Immigration has been a hot-button issue recently both domestically and abroad. Even larger than taking central stage in the US presidential election, the recent influx of Syrian immigrants across the European Union and the resulting cultural and economic upheaval has drawn massive criticism from grassroots media and native residents of the countries affected, but shockingly little mainstream media criticism. Why?

Our own Michael Sebastian reported on this issue recently, with a shocking revelation from Mark Zuckerberg and German Chancellor Angela Merkel colluding to wipe negative comments about German immigration policy from Facebook:

> Merkel was complaining to Zuckerberg about posts by Facebook users who were critical to the hordes of Muslim migrants who are flooding Germany and other European countries. Zuckerberg responded that:
>
> "[W]e need to do some work" on curtailing anti-immigrant posts about the refugee crisis. "Are you working on this?" Merkel asked in English, to which Zuckerberg replied in the affirmative before the transmission was disrupted.
>
> What pretense will Facebook use to ban Germans from legitimately discussing the policy concerns of their country, which purports to be a democracy? Racism, of course:
>
> We are committed to working closely with the German government on this important issue," Debbie Frost, a spokeswoman for Menlo Park, California-based Facebook, said via e-mail. "We think the best solutions to dealing with people who make racist and xenophobic comments can be found when service providers, government and civil society all work together to address this common challenge.
>
> But can a true democracy exist when the public, who are supposed to be ultimate authority for the government, are not permitted to frankly debate policies?

What they're not saying

Roosh's recent video about how the multicultural narrative is collapsing before our very eyes appears even more prescient in light of the last couple weeks, with refugee-accepting Sweden now counting itself as the rape capital of the West and dealing with the harassment of its citizens by Muslim immigrants. Tonight's tragic events mark the next grim reminder that forced importation of a religious fundamentalist underclass is at odds with the self-preservation of any Western nation.

But why is it so controversial to say so? The media establishment clearly has a vested interest in keeping the average person ignorant of the dangers of mass cultural manipulation. Milo Yiannopoulos was one of the first to point out the media's soft-pedaling of the Muslim terrorism angle in its coverage of the Paris terrorist attacks:

https://twitter.com/Nero/status/665313187735162881

https://twitter.com/Nero/status/665328369022578688

https://twitter.com/Nero/status/665328237048758273

It's clear that the masters of our media, who themselves promote the destruction of distinct Western national identities through massive immigration initiatives, have instructed their megaphones to remain silent on this issue. A quick control-F of the top story on the New York Times, CNN, and ABC is shockingly absent of the words "Islam" or "Muslim," despite strong circumstantial evidence and eyewitness accounts that almost inextricably link these actions to Muslim terrorism.

The only occurrence of the word came from the New York Times in this passing remark:

> There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but Twitter erupted with celebratory messages by members and sympathizers of the Islamic State, the extremist group based in Syria and Iraq that is under assault by major powers including the United States, France and Russia.

ROK's coverage on this issue will continue for the foreseeable future, but in the meantime you must question every source you see reporting on this issue. Why is the story being reported in a certain way, one that encourages "tolerance" and not "jumping to conclusions," when similarly deplorable domestic incidents are immediately ascribed to racism and gun control issues? Why are they lying to us, when the facts show a cultural disaster in the making that has already cost hundreds of innocent lives just in the last few hours?

The most chilling thing is that this may only be the beginning.

Read More: Only White Countries Are Expected To Let In Hordes Of Illegal Migrants

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

How To Apply Neomasculinity To Raising A Child

November 14, 2015 | by Panchito Cordero | Link | Original Link

How does one reply to “are you my daddy”? I have practiced safe sex since the concept was first introduced to me so there was never any concern of having an illegitimate three-year-old African American child (no that is not an underlying racial joke, I myself am of African American descent). Quickly I gathered my senses and cheerfully replied “no, just your teacher!” but the child sternly insisted “no you are my daddy.”

Before more discord could be exchanged the child’s mother picked him up while I went about my business of tending towards seventeen fertile minds. Yet as the day ensued my mind became preoccupied by thoughts on what would become of the child without a prominent father figure in his life.

As a male educator in a field that is predominantly maternal, you have no idea (unless you are one) how paramount your role in a child’s life can be. YOU essentially set the standard of what a positive male archetype should be during the quintessential “formative years.” Yet the incessant need to infantilize children in an ever-growing-I’m-offended-by-everything-PC world has left society clueless as to how detrimental this approach truly is. Be it the need to blame first person shooter games or cyber-bullying, somewhere along the way we have forgotten how important the family dynamic is.

In any event, the purpose of this article is to help those like the child I mentioned (shall he ever come across this article) along with the men that frequent this site understand an ethos that many fail to comprehend. Although being twenty five years of age maybe off-putting to some, I am confident that my chosen profession along with my life experiences make me more than qualified to speak on the subject matter at hand.

A Brief Overview

The details are hazy but my parents split after I was born. However luckily for me, my dad stood present in my life and my grandfather stepped up to the plate as well. The end result was an upbringing that for the most part was enjoyable. Looking back on what I admired about both parties was the following:

1. Both were self made men who possessed an indomitable will not only to succeed but positively affect those that they came into contact with.
2. They swiftly dealt with any form of adversity instead of using excuses or others as a means of coping or scapegoats.
3. They were healthy in body, mind and spirit. Furthermore they exuded personality traits that were naturally debonair, not forced.

Off the top of my head there are about a legitimate handful of friends I can think of whom shared similar circumstances as me and as a result have turned out to be well mannered and driven men (and as you can imagine these are why they are my friends).

Meanwhile, the contrasting demographic that I am encountering have been brainwashed by this everyone is a winner mentality. The result? The kids who I see vehemently talking back to their parents or impudent teenagers shooting up schools as a result of "affluenza."

Meanwhile In Other Parts Of The World

There is a book I would highly recommend called Their Name is Today: Reclaiming Childhood in a Hostile World. by Johann Arnold. At the core of it, the book satirizes how we on the Western side of the world have traded in a prosperous childhood for chasing an unattainable sense of perfection determined by scantron sheets.

The book goes onto highlight the benefits of home schooling, with a notable example stemming from children in Finland. With a literacy rate of 100% it is intriguing to know that normally their education begins at the age of six along with their day at 10am! The end result is a country that is notable for possessing the best education in the world.

Now I am sure many will involve politics and say that they are a socialist country, but at the end of the day no one can debate that their children are significantly happier. And as someone whose been raised by his grandparents; it is also important to note that countries like Finland make it a point to let their children view the elderly as respectable figures in society to learn from. Not the hostile disposition we have inherited when it comes to handling them over here in the states.

With That Said

Here are some values to take into consideration:

- Fitness should be instilled at an early age and go beyond a right to be vainglorious. From a spiritual standpoint, it is mentally cleansing and rewarding.
- Put down the iPad, video game controller, Kindle and learn to fall in love with literature. My father always made it a point to sit me down on Sundays to read the New York Times and if I did not understand a particular word, the dictionary was the only option.
- Spend time with your kid! Instead of having a preconceived notion of what your child should be, let him grow into himself while serving as the positive influence that will lay down ground rules to ensure both of you are on amicable grounds all the while facilitating a healthy relationship.

Peter Dolving (ex vocalist of The Haunted, Thieves and Liars, Science and House of Dolving) once stated in an interview

> PLEASE don’t fear your kid. No matter how intense they are. They are full of love, full of light, and full of capacity for great great things.(Unless they are psychopaths, in which case you will know it really quick, and you should get all the professional help you can.)
>
> But really, your kids will reflect you and what you are and what you do directly. If you think they’re fucking obnoxious, maybe you should just give them more attention? If they’re very withdrawn, give them room. But always, always, always make sure to speak with them as your equals. They are. Just smaller and with less time here on planet Earth. Parenting is about participating, ushering, and really communicating. So folks, off to the library with you, and be fucking fearless.

Praise Your Parents For Their Falling Out

All too often we hear the term “daddy or mommy issues” come from a woman’s perspective, but many fail to realize that men can come from similar circumstances as well. Instead of applying a Freudian approach as to why you feel the way you do, understand that forgiveness is key. At some point in our lives we embrace the concept of letting go, be it the random pedestrian who stifles your morning commute to the envious opposition you may encounter in any setting.

Sooner or later we learn that is simply best to shrug it off instead of brood over negative catalysts. With that said your parents equally deserve the same treatment. In retrospect it makes no sense being mortal enemies with whomever is responsible for your existence. You may have not gotten the ideal family sitcom upbringing many yearn for, but understand that it has made you are.

Their decisions were not yours to make and the life you lead is not theirs to claim. Learn from them either firsthand or from a distance. Either way your focus should be on your path, not living a life that is riddled with resentment over an outcome you had no control over.

Back In The States

Not too long ago I had to attend an obligatory sporting event for the children at my school. Each participant was rewarded medals solely for their participation. If you do not see anything wrong with this, then you represent one of the many brainwashed masses conditioned to believe everyone is a winner just for showing up.

Instead we should be helping today’s children realize the plethora of untapped potential they inherently possess, not instilling this level of subconscious complacency that governs their demeanor. I cannot speak on the future of females to come but there was once a time that boys were brought up to be men.

It is bewildering how being urbane has been traded in for man buns and other androgynous trends. Whether you plan on starting a family, have a job that pertains to dealing with children, or have been recently introduced to the red pill, be the walking advertisement for how men should be.

All it takes is one encounter for a child to be eternally grateful of how much your influence had a positive impact on their life.

Read More: The 6 Commandments Of Masculinity

Panchito Cordero
Sleez3vil is a man with no shortage of words. After an early introduction to the red pill he has been on his path ever since.

France Allows Large Muslim Population, Rewarded With Most Sophisticated Terrorist Attacks Since 9/11

November 15, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The shocking Islamic State terrorist attacks in Paris, coordinated across seven different areas, illustrates how France's compulsive appeasement of Muslim migrants has not resulted in anything like social harmony. Rather, it has led to the most sophisticated assaults on civilians in the West since September 11. Despite the national government opening its doors (and wallets) to overwhelmingly Muslim North African, Sub-Saharan African and Middle Eastern new arrivals for decades, French over-tolerance is endangering the lives of its citizens, particularly its white and historically Christian population.

In Paris in January, the appalling executions of Charlie Hebdo staff, who satirized Islam as they did every religion, failed to make mainstream politicians take up their responsibility to tackle the hard problems of immigration and Islam in France.

Long before the current European migrant crisis began, commentators across Europe and millions of French citizens began to wake up, if they hadn't already, to the out of control dangers of a burgeoning non-European migrant population. Outside and even within the Boulevard Périphérique, the carriageway demarcating central Paris from its suburbs, entire neighbourhoods became no-go zones for non-Muslims. France's ethnically non-French inhabitants had effectively erected their own de facto policies of segregation. In Marseille, the country's second city, this sorry process was applied to a greater extent still, until many argued that it was now a Muslim-majority metropolis. And these are just the largest cities.

If mass migration is so good, why don't non-Western countries welcome it?

This is Paris, not Algiers.

Roosh, ROK's founder and proprietor, has a father who comes from a Shia Muslim background. We welcome the contribution of masculinity-desiring men from all walks of life. But what Roosh and ROK's senior writers realize above all else is that mass demographic change, as vigorously pursued by European elites, augurs nothing but the degradation and destruction of European culture.

The negative effects of such mass migration are recognized everywhere in the world, aside from Europe and its cultural offshoots of America, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Outside the West, countries assiduously restrict immigration to prevent ethnic and other conflict and maintain a stronger sense of national unity.

By having massive ethnic minorities in which many extremists can operate with camouflage, the minorities already largely fenced away from the European population, attacks such as the recent ones in Paris are hard to predict, let alone stop. With large pluralities and even majorities of Muslim migrants often supporting the implementation of Sharia law in surveys, how can law enforcement possibly stop Islamic groups committed to destruction and murder?

The segregation and refusal to integrate mean that plotters do not need to use heavily monitored electronic communications. A mosque or local business can suffice as a headquarters for planning deaths in the West. In fact, Paris appears to be such a case of "undetected" activity orchestrated predominantly offline.

Why didn't the Islamist terrorist attacks occur in a Muslim-free place like Poland?

Wrocław, Poland. It has none of the daily ethnic or religious problems of a Paris or London. Why? It has virtually no non-European immigrants.

Countries such as Italy (1.5 million of 60 million) and Austria (600,000 of 8.5 million) either have a “moderate” proportion of Muslim migrants or have less violence-inclined and historically “European” or Eurasian Muslim populations (such as Bosnians and Turks). Paradoxically, this lesser racial, ethnic, and religious heterogeneity immunizes them from terrorist attacks. It would in some ways make more sense for Islamist terrorists to attack more culturally European places like this, especially those wealthier states otherwise enforcing over-the-top levels of tolerance and political correctness. But they don’t.

Now compare these only somewhat Islamized places with countries completely unused to Muslim inhabitants. In Poland, which helped invade Iraq in 2003, only 20,000 to 40,000 Muslims are thought to be residents. The most common Muslim visitors are decidedly unreligious Turkish students. There are no self-created Muslim ghettoes or segregated neighborhoods. To boot, these places like Poland, notwithstanding their declining religiosity, are unabashedly proud of their Catholic or general Christian history, or their adherence to great cultural homogeneity over time. So why aren’t the Muslims attacking them, these places least likely to host millions of Muslim migrants?

In fact, attacks are most likely to happen in places such as Britain, France and Spain, which have excessive Muslim populations. There comes a point when every additional attempt at accommodating new arrivals backfires, as those entrants and their descendants want more and more concessions and privileges. Rather than using earlier concessions and privileges as an incentive to assimilate and become virtually indistinguishable from indigenous Europeans in terms of their commitment to the national society, they insist on less “racism,” i.e. further Islamification.

Are you ready for more mainstream lies?

https://twitter.com/Nero/status/665328369022578688?lang=en

Conservatives such as Milo Yiannopoulos are meticulously pointing out the desperate attempts of mainstream outlets to either ignore the undeniable Islamic connection to Paris or clumsily try to disentangle it. Having supported the mass, egregious ethnic and religious transformation of European cities for decades, vested media interests are keen to do anything that draws attention away from the utterly failed experiments of political elites and their supporters.

Some countries have started hitting out, however. Willing to risk French and German allegations of insensitivity in the immediate wake of the Paris attacks, Poland has already said that it cannot accept the EU-demanded policy of immigration and refugee quotas in the current security environment. Although not as good as an outright refusal to meddle with their intrinsic national cohesion, it's a positive start.

As the dead lie in morgues and their blood is still being washed off the streets, powerful people are again preparing to make Europe more "tolerant" and amenable to another wave of millions of Muslim migrants.

Read More: Death Toll Climbs In Paris As Media Rushes To Downplay Connection To Muslim Terrorism

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Kill A Welfare State

November 15, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

So you're tired of living in a welfare state. Tired of the government telling you what to think, what to do and how to use your money, all in the name of "democracy" and "equality."

Well, there's a way to destroy the welfare state while at the same time posing as a proponent of it. You just have to be very pro-immigration, and make as many of your fellow citizens think the same way. (Make sure to brand all dissent as hateful, racist, neo-Nazi fascism.)

You then let the poorest people on the planet enter your country and give them everything they need using taxpayer money. Soon enough, the system will collapse. The question isn't if it happens, but when.

Big government

The way a welfare state works is that you create a big government to take care of the citizens within the state. To finance it all you increase the tax rates until people barely have any money left for their own use.

This is only possible if you can convince all the strong, working citizens that they should take responsibility for all the weak ones, who can't or won't provide for themselves.

If you can accept that the government use force to take money from people who earned it fair and square, the welfare state does sound like a nice idea. A place where no one ever takes any real risks, because one's livelihood is always secured by the state.

The welfare state is really a kind of experiment so far, since it's only been tested for the last hundred years or so. But the welfare state is more fragile than it might appear. It's kept intact by the strong, but what happens when they're outnumbered by the weak?

Logically it's easy to see how there might come a point when the working population is too small to support the overwhelming number of people in need. But before that point, increasing taxation on income will eventually lead to the strongest citizens rebelling or, perhaps more likely, emigrating.

The welfare state will collapse on account of the weakness that it intrinsically encourages. It gives people incentives to wait around for their welfare check to arrive instead of working. This kind of society is neither fit for masculine nor moral individuals, only sheepish losers.

Sweden toward collapse

The Swedish system has worked quite well so far. The country's economy has remained relatively solid throughout the financial crisis. Swedes have a good work ethic, and the high level of trust between people and the government makes this society stable.

But all of that means nothing if hundreds of thousands of poor and poorly educated immigrants are allowed to come and stay. In the short term, it will be expensive and difficult to provide for them. In the long term, one can only imagine how it will play out.

An increase in the share of immigrants means an increase in the share of weak people. We already know that refugees have a hard time finding jobs in Sweden, even after they've been here for many years. Every other person currently unemployed is an immigrant.

The Swedish welfare state simply cannot survive if this unprecedented rate of immigration is allowed to continue. 160,000 asylum seekers are expected to arrive this year alone. Around 10,000 of them are now coming every week. (Most of them are from Afghanistan, Syria and Iraq, societies far different from Sweden.)

Government finally reacting

The migration system is heading for a complete collapse, and the only ones still denying it are the “anti-racist” degenerates on the far-left.

Local governments all over the country are calling for the ministers in Stockholm to act. The Migration Agency is struggling to find accommodations for the immigrants, now resorting to putting them in tents. The situation is so desperate and extreme, that Sweden is asking for financial aid from the EU.

Meanwhile, a study has shown that the famous Swedish generosity is dwindling. 41 percent of Swedes now want fewer refugees to receive residence permits, an increase from 29 percent in just two months.

The Swedish Police Authority warns that public order and the country’s inner security is under threat.

Border controls have now been established.

Rank-and-file leftists might be stupid, but the left-wing government is smart enough to realize that this development isn't sustainable. This Thursday it decided to establish temporary border controls, with the approval of most parties.

For ten days, travelers won't be allowed to enter the country without a passport or residence permit. But refugees can still apply for asylum at the border.

The Minister of Finance also announced this week that an extra 11 billion SEK will be added to this years budget, to cope with the crisis. The government is trying to clean up its own mess, but everyone knows that their policies are to blame for this crisis escalating to uncontrollable proportions.

The politicians in charge should apologize for their incompetence and resign. But let's not set our hopes too high. It's more likely that the welfare state will collapse before they admit to any wrongdoings.

Read More: How The Welfare State Will Ruin Us All

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

Europe Is On The Precipice

November 16, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The European people do not deserve Europe. That's the only conclusion I can draw after witnessing the reaction to Friday's attacks in Paris that killed 136 people. Instead of fighting back, rescinding policies that allow millions of refugees to flood Europe, or devising concrete plans to expel an incompatible Muslim horde from their nations, the European elite are doubling down on a narrative that will surely lead to the end of Europe and the demise of their own people.

If a purple man comes up to you and punches you in the face, the suitable response is to punch him back or get aid from other individuals that help neutralize him. The wrong response is to yell "peace" and "solidarity" at the purple man, and then flood the internet with messages of "Not all purple men are violent" and "Will the brutal attack against myself increase racism and hate against purple men?" Yet in a shocking display of weakness and demoralization, the European people are doing just that. The elites controlling the show are urging prayers for peace and the commoners, in the face of their own annihilation, are going along for the ride, insisting that what Europe needs right now is more Muslims and refugees.

Believe it or not, holding peace signs while crying will not stop future attacks…

Neither will making pretty hearts with lighted candles…

And neither will attacking those who criticize open border policies…

GAWKER

Rob Lowe Thinks the Aftermath of a Tragedy Is the Perfect Time to Criticize France's Immigration Policy

Melissa Crocin

> Oh, NOW France closes its borders. #Hollande
>
> — Rob Lowe (@RobLowe) November 13, 2015

If there are not rebellions in France, Germany, or Sweden by the end of this week from groups who want to preserve their nation and people, Europe is over. If the Europeans are not ready to sacrifice their lives right now to save themselves after the Paris attacks while Muslims are themselves waiting in line to sacrifice their own lives to conquer a new land, then Europe has absolutely no chance of resisting an Islamic takeover, because there will be no other event that can help them wake up and defend themselves. I'm afraid what we're witnessing is a people who have been so feminized, weakened, and mentally controlled that they simply can't identify an enemy within their broken gates that threatens their way of life, and is instead aiding the invaders who are actively trying to replace them.

Can you imagine what the average Muslim man in Europe is thinking right now? He must be in disbelief that the European elite are welcoming him with open arms, giving him money, kicking out residents from their homes so that him and his brethren can get free housing, and making excuses for him if he happens to decide to pick up an AK-47 and do some human target practice. I'm sure he's flabbergasted that whenever an attack happens, millions of Europeans swarm social media to defend his religion as one of "peace."

If I was this man, I would no doubt believe that Allah has opened this lighted path for me, and has made me strong to take over a weak people who no longer deserve the land they've been given. I don't blame him for wanting to take over Europe since the European people and their leaders sure seem to want him to accomplish that task, even putting him on the payroll of their welfare system to help fund his violence.

Muslims are going to do what you allow them to do, along with any other group or race that possess their own interests. We must instead look at the traitorous elites in power who are enabling this horde to enter Europe. Those leaders who have welcomed Muslims into Europe and refused to put a stop to the invasion have blood on their hands and must be removed from power and imprisoned. If Europe was a sane country, here's what must immediately be done:

- Complete closure of all borders in Europe. Boats coming to Europe should be fired at on sight to send a message to other invaders wanting to come in.
- Immediate deportation of all Muslims in Europe who do not have proper documents and who have promoted ideas of jihad or who have supported previous attacks. Refugees that entered in the past year must go back home.
- Overthrow of all politicians who have sponsored or enabled Muslim immigration. These politicians should be tried for crimes against the European people.

If you wanted to defend a nation in the face of a migrant land and sea invasion, the above three measures would be the way to do it, but we all know they won't take place. Instead, more refugees will come, more "solidarity" will be preached, and more European people will die. Europeans have become so brainwashed that they will rationalize the deaths of their own family members at the hands of the invaders, meaning that we have passed the point where arguments and reason will be effective. Violence is now the future of Europe, either by the hands of the invaders or by its defenders who will have to fight against three enemies at the same time: their elite, their brainwashed countrymen, and the Muslim invaders themselves.

If I was an angry French or German man at this moment, I know what I would do:

- I would find a small town in my country with good strategic defense that has had refugees dumped within it.
- I would open a line of communication with a sympathetic government like Russia for possible military support.
- I would find at least 30 men with arms who believe that their nation is worth dying for.
- I would invade the town, kick out the invaders, and defend my position against the local police while prolonging the standoff as long as possible for maximum media effect.

The mission would put out a signal to other nationalist militia and patriots. Either we solidify our position and expand with external support or we die trying to defend our country. I could not think of a more honorable way to leave this Earth, of asserting my destiny in a world where lunatic terms are being dictated to me that harm myself, my family, and my nation. If my enemy is willing to die for my land but I'm not, it's safe to say that odds are against me holding on to that land.

The same liberals who are destroying Europe are also working on doing the same to America. Our politicians are tripping over themselves to increase the amount of Syrians who will come here (10,000 have just arrived in New Orleans), and just like in Europe, the natives are doing nothing more than impotently tweeting in protest. While Muslims are more effectively controlled in America than Europe, Americans needs to ask themselves right now what kind of country they want to live in. My family currently leaves near multiple refugee centers, and when I visit them I'm not sure if I'm in Honduras or Ethiopia. The fate of all American and European citizens are now sealed: either live in fear as you're surrounded by a foreign people who aggressively assert their interests as their population increases, or defend yourself violently against policies by the elite that are actively trying to destroy your life and displace you from your home.

The current generation of Europeans didn't fight for their land like their ancestors did. They were given functioning civilization, beautiful cities, and peaceful villages without understanding the sacrifices men of the past had to make in order for them to enjoy what they have now. Multiculturalism will prove to be their suicide, and the only question is if there are some men left who are ready to sacrifice themselves for their country like men of the past did. In the face of the Paris attack, I'm afraid that if we don't see this sacrifice soon, as in a matter of days, it will be over for Europe.

Read Next: Death Toll Climbs In Paris As Media Rushes To Downplay Connection To Muslim Terrorism

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Greed Is A Corruptor

November 16, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Pyrrhus was a powerful king who ruled Epirus and Macedon for some years during the Hellenistic period. Plutarch tells a revealing story about him in his Parallel Lives (Life of Epirus, 14).

One of Pyrrhus's valued advisors was a man named Cineas, who was entrusted on many foreign missions of great sensitivity. He had, through the agility and wisdom of his diplomacy, won over many peoples to the cause of Pyrrhus. Gradually he came to realize that his king was planning on a military expedition to Italy, to try to subdue the Romans.

Pyrrhus of Epirus

So he confronted Pyrrhus and asked him if indeed he wished to conquer Italy and bring the Romans under his empire. When the king told him this was true, Cineas then asked him, “Sire, what shall we then do after we conquer Italy?” Pyrrhus answered that of course he would seek to acquire Sicily. “And after this, what then?”, Cineas asked.

“Well, of course then Carthage and Libya would beckon,” he responded. “They would be ripe for the taking.” Cineas then asked him if he intended to attack the Greek city states as well. Pyrrhus answered in the affirmative. But he did not realize where these questions were leading.

“And after all these countries are within our power,” Cineas said, “what shall we do then?”

Pyrrhus smiled and said, “Why, then we shall relax and drink, and amuse ourselves to our hearts’ content.” And then Cineas asked him this: “Sire, what prevents us from relaxing and enjoying ourselves now? We have the ability to do it at the present moment. Is it not possible to avoid all this suffering and war which we will inflict on others and ourselves, and seek this goal now?”

Pyrrhus was unsettled by this conversation, but he did not change his plans. He was later killed in battle during one of his campaigns in 272 B.C. His inability to be satisfied with anything, his lust to gain more and more, had been his undoing. This is a story as old as history.

Greed has a corrosive power. It seeps into the consciousness and hijacks it, preventing reason and judgment from performing their proper functions. As one of the old brokers said in Oliver Stone’s 1987 film Wall Street, “That’s the thing about money, Bud…it makes you do things you don’t want to do.”

Appetite and reason are the two components of the soul. If reason does not keep a firm, guiding hand on appetite, then greed begins to take hold of the soul. So one must be subordinate to the other. What distinguishes man from the beasts of Nature is that he has the capacity to use reason to keep his appetites in check. Animals are for the most part unable to think rationally about consequences. They are concerned only with the present moment, and cannot comprehend the laws of cause and effect.

Man, on the other hand, is constructed from nobler stuff. He is always probing for the causes behind things, and investigating one problem or another. He is fascinated by life, and by the strange and unfamiliar that he may see around him. Not all men are like this, of course. In fact, there are many who behave more like animals than men. But we should strive to emulate the good and the best, rather than the worst.

Paolo Giovio

The humanist Paolo Giovio (1483-1552) stated the same principle in his treatise Notable Men and Women of Our Time:

> Nearly all the philosophers admit that our souls are free and that they moderate all the appetites of the body. It often happens that, deceived by the pleasurable stimulation of the senses, it does not know how to retain control. Impaired and corrupted by bad acts, and forgetting their excellent freedom, our souls surrender to the slavery of their worst enemies, so that they inhabit bodies that are more animalistic than human.

Examples of this type of person abound today, and we can see them nearly everywhere. We know that just recently, for example, the president of the University of Missouri resigned his position for no good reason, under pressure from some empty-headed students. He surrendered his dignity and his position (worth about $500,000 per year) because he was a man of no moral conviction.

President of the Univ. of Missouri: a man of straw, hollowed out by greed

At the moment of conflict, where a man is put to the test, he proved to be a man of straw. His greed had caused him to accept a position of leadership, but he lacked the internal fortitude to truly believe in his position. At the critical moment, when he needed to stand and fight, he collapsed, and betrayed everyone under him. This lack of moral courage is one of the defining features of modern American life.

Those who have been tasked with a sacred duty of passing on Western culture, of safeguarding our institutions, of keeping discipline, of fighting against evil influences in society, and of protecting us from the predations of the mob or the powerful elites, have done nothing. They seek all the benefits of their positions, but shirk all the responsibilities of their positions.

He was elevated by greed, and propped up by greed; he enjoyed the benefits and perks of being the top dog, but was unwilling to accept any of the responsibilities of his leadership position. And one of these responsibilities is to resist the shouting and clamor of the ignorant mob. This he was incapable of doing. Too many such spineless men occupy positions of power in our society. Their cowardice and greed put us all at risk.

What should be our guide, then? We should use this general rule as a guide: to control greed, we should keep our appetite for pleasure rationally related to health and strength. What do I mean by this? I mean that pleasure should serve health and strength, and should not be pursued for its own sake. Beyond a certain point—and every man should train himself to be aware of this point—health and strength are not helped, but are hurt.

Keeping this general principle in mind will permit our souls to perform their proper function as the controller and regulator of the appetites.

Read More: The Secret To Mastering Eye Contact

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

5 More Reasons Why You Should Learn How To Cook

November 16, 2015 | by Chad Hargrove | Link | Original Link

Cooking: every man, at some point, has to cook something to eat. My father was a manly man type, he served in the Marines, could rebuild a car engine, was good at sports, and so on. One of the biggest "man lessons" he imparted to me was "A man should know how to cook." Presumably, this was because my mother was a lousy cook, and my dad had to figure something out. His options being to just eat the dried out nigh-on-being-burnt "food"…or starve to death.

Too many men these days subsist on sodium-filled frozen food, drive-thru menus, and general food related garbage. Not only do they not know the first thing about cooking for themselves, but all that quick and easy food is making them unattractive and fat. No lady worth her salt wants that, let alone tries to procreate with it.

Let us dust off those nacho cheese chip crumbs and look in to why you should learn how to cook, shall we?

1. It's much more impressive than you think

Cooking is way more impressive to a lady than anything you could possibly show her. Fat stacks? Muscles? Vehicle? Your night-moves in the bedroom? These all pale in comparison if you find out her favorite dish to eat and MAKE it for her mouth face.

However, you don't even have to learn anything about her if you want. Make the ONE thing you're really good at and that will still be more impressive than any fine dining experience.

2. It teaches crisis management skills

Congratulations, you have now imbued your kitchen with that much sought after smoky aroma.

When you begin cooking a whole meal, you have to learn time management. But more importantly you need to learn how to handle yourself in the kitchen should the need arise.

The constant need to check the oven isn't the point of this reason. No, you needn't keep opening the door letting all that meal-giving delicious heat out. I'm talking about things on the stove-top that could catch fire. Do you know how to put out a grease fire if you get a little sloppy and spill?

It's the small flammable things like that that separate the men from the boys when it comes to cooking. There is surely nothing less sexy than immolating your own home.

3. Cooking never gets old

Learning to cook is great in that it's a perpetuating learning cycle. Getting tired of the dinner menu planning? Try your hand at making desserts, your own bread, the possibilities never cease.

Aside from the different foods, you can always learn new techniques. At the very least you can work on your knife skills, sharpening your own blades, and investing in better kitchen utensils all in the name of making your cooking top notch!

4. Total control

There is nothing better than manfully dominating something you set your mind to. While you may never truly be a master chef or give ol' orange Crocs™ wearing Mario Batali a run for his money, you'll eventually be able to exert your will over a bevy of food items and menu plans.

Once you have mastered kitchen crisis management and learned how to infuse flavor into your food without compromising taste, few things feel better. The control you have over cooking is a subtle way to let a potential lover know that you are in total control of everything and anything she throws your way will find no mercy.

5. Cooking classes are a great way to meet women

Pictured: a woman trying to use a knife.
Not pictured: couple sitting the Emergency Room because she sliced a gash in to her arm that’s not holding the vegetable PROPERLY!

In fact, many adult learning classes offered in your area are a great way to meet women and learn a new skill. Well, making a solid birdhouse is debatable, but still a few cooking classes will teach you what good!

Oftentimes a cooking class will offer a specific menu to learn on top of teaching basic kitchen knowledge (for example, “hot things are hot”), learning how to use a knife, and other skills. In between the learning, or when someone catches on fire, maybe chat up a lady in the class that you have had your eye on?

If you and this cooking class paramour actually hit it off, then nothing is better than having a partner that also knows their way around a kitchen and could lend their expertise to the proceedings! Maybe she has a familial cooking tradition or passed down technique that could really shake up a few of your dinners?

Man has been cooking things since the dawn of time, when he first brought fire back to his cave and roasted a morsel for himself and his cave nug, so nothing could be manlier than learning to cook for you. If you succeed at it, you get amazing things to eat and share with others. If you fail, you oftentimes still get something to eat, or at the very least, a great story about the time you singed off your eyebrows pan-frying some chicken!

Read More: How To Cook Four Delicious Entrées

Chad Hargrove
Chad Hargrove is a pop culture junkie that just wants to enjoy his movies and television programming without a bunch on nonsense. You can find his least desirable "writings" at Chad's Toxic Dumps

Is It Time To Rethink Universal Suffrage?

November 17, 2015 | by Dom Citizen | Link | Original Link

Ah, what an apparatus we have built for the enrichment of the poor.

It was relatively recently in the Western world that we extended the franchise to all adults, the United States gave women suffrage with the 19th amendment; in Canada, my native country, we finally, gave the aboriginal people suffrage in 1960, despite the fact that some reserves fail to acknowledge the crown as sovereign. Universal suffrage was a quixotic notion, one that came without any kind of assessment, as the old property and education requirements also fell away.

According to Elections Canada, Canada had property requirements as of 1885, but in the pattern of the British Great Reform Act of 1867 (the Second Great Reform Act) abolished requirements in all but Quebec. Meanwhile, the American founding fathers, according to the Lehrman Institute of American History, established property requirements as a means to determine the stake one had in society, but all but four states had abolished qualifications by 1860; worse yet, only eight states kept the criteria of paying taxes as a prerequisite for going to the ballot. Instead, we offered not just self-government, but the capacity to govern others directly to the electorate without concern for any sort of basic qualifications.

We are bleeding money, and they will just vote for more

These guys didn’t need a welfare state.

Since the installment of universal suffrage welfare state entitlements have grown immensely. The national debt in the United States is over 18 trillion dollars according to the treasury department; aside from a handful of years during the Clinton administration debt has consistently clambered upwards at an ever accelerating pace. Canada, likewise, has hit 1.2 trillion owed, with rapid growth since the 1960's and the establishment of a welfare state. Is there potential for a correlation here?

Perhaps people vote for what they covet. The poor may covet fiscal means and easy living; after all, the hardest working are rarely poor. The top 1% of North American income earners tend to work in jobs that demand extreme overtime according to American economist Thomas Sowell in his book Economic Facts and Fallacies.

The welfare state depends on women

Meanwhile, astute observer of culture, and founding father of neoconservatism Irving Kristol notes in his essay from the year 2000 "Two Welfare States" that the masculine conception of the welfare state as a last resort of minimal aid and maximal choice, along with a sense of paternalism, has been replaced by a maternal welfare state that is an expert in care.

Kristol writes:

> The feminine, maternal vision of the welfare state now has the support not only of public opinion, but of institutions and professions that have been nourished by the state . . . there are large numbers of working women loyal to the state . . . and men, too, who are loyal to these women [my emphasis added]. These are . . . collectively the 'helping professions,' and include social work, nursing, psychology, public health . . . teaching, and branches of tv journalism. These professions . . . are politically active. . . . the largest single contingent at the Democratic convention [was] . . . the teachers unions.

We have stripped our entitlement programs and welfare reforms of virtually all obligation and sacrifice. Prior to the great depression it was the workhouse, the labour camp, or the road crew that would earn you your daily bread until you could find someplace else.

Peter Hitchens notes in his book The Abolition of Britain, that the workhouse was considered much too cruel for single mothers, so that last sacrifice was abolished. It is reasoned the poor suffer enough, and perhaps they do, but should they be able to impart such burdens as their upkeep on the rest of society without due consideration?

What is the answer?

In Canada, 40+ dollars an hour isn't enough. . .

The privilege of voting has become holy writ. Should it be?

I offer a solution: a temporary recall of the franchise for those currently receiving welfare and income supplements from the Federal government. This recall would affect those who are currently lacking in work, (I would have been in this category a handful of times myself) not those unfit or unable, but those currently unemployed and collecting assistance on a voluntary basis. Until society can come up with a better income supplement plan, and perhaps it never will, this is the only valid course of action.

Some critics may assert that it is an injustice and that many collect from such supplemental programs who do not necessarily desire such dependence, and no doubt it is true, but not pertinent to the proposition. Why? Because the democratic process is inherently discriminatory against the established population of a society. The great masses are flooding the ballot box with their ignorant assumptions and minds placated by bribes from sophist politicians.

If we take a look at prior American elections we can see the pernicious influence of universal suffrage in action: according to polls by CNN and Gallup, in the 2012 election unmarried women 66%, non-whites 90%, and those with less than a high school education 51%, as well as 60% of those who earned less than $50,000, and 73% who earned $15,000 or less voted for Obama. Not surprising, but it is readily apparent that these demographics skew electoral outcomes significantly. The idea that a large swatch of the population that creates little economic value can act as a political power broker is dangerous indeed.

Democracy is not conservative, it does not link generations past and present; democracy concerns itself with the winning of votes, and hence why a coherent philosophy will never be found in an elected official. This same concern for the now has led to the expansion of government spending across the Western world, and damaged our economies and our societies, possibly irreparably. Dependence on the state is at an all time high. We are all Greece; it’s just a matter of time before the collapse, and who can fault the voters for such behavior? It is certainly in their own interest.

However, take away the right to vote, and I believe you would see a rapid change. Democracy would become an incentive to leave poverty, and those who have means would no longer fear that the greater portion of the population will inevitably vote against their effort and work ethic.

Certainly such a proposal is shocking, and does not cohere with our current fetishizing of democracy. But we can ill afford to accept the lie that the customer is always right when it comes to government.

Read More: You’re A Monster If You Don’t Support The Welfare State

Dom Citizen
Dominion Citizen is a Canadian he lives in Canada's most conservative province. He is doing a degree in history and politics at a local university; he advocates a return to traditionalism and hopes to alienate both conservatives and leftists in due time. You can find him at @DominionStnd on Twitter, and he blogs at The Dominion Standard .

The Age That Men Peak

November 17, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A common belief in the manosphere—and one I've stated myself—is that a man's value can peak up to his early 40's, allowing him to get a far higher quality or quantity of women than in his early 20's. This is due to the argument that women prefer a more mature man with resources and refined charisma than a bumbling young guy lacking in confidence. A closer examination of this theory, however, shows that many other variables are at play for determining a man's real-life results, and that the common man may be better served securing long-term partners before waiting for his supposed "peak" to arrive, especially if he doesn't practice game.

On the surface, it's hard to argue against the idea that a man will get the best women at an age he's likely to possess more qualities that women want. That sweet spot will likely be in his mid 30's, where he has a high level of resources, game, and social status but still maintains a hopefully youthful aesthetic that doesn't turn off the most beautiful women in their early 20's or even late teens. The problem is that this has so many conditions and exceptions that it's not at all useful for men who don't actively practice game that is mainly based on cold approaching.

The "men peak in their mid 30's" theory applies if:

- A man regularly approaches at least 25 young women each month or is an extrovert with access to high-value social circles.
- He lives in a city where 18-25 year old girls prefer mature man with resources (e.g. Southeast Asia, Colombia, Ukraine).
- He was a late bloomer and possessed practically no game ability in high school or college.

- He lies about his age to women in the 18-25 age range since many of them don't want a man 15+ years older.

You will get the best women of your life in your 30's if you started learning game in your early 20's from scratch and continue to approach actively up to 40 years of age. This constitutes less than 1% of Western men, and it doesn't even apply to me.

The most beautiful girl I ever had sex with was in Brazil back in 2008. I was a 29-year-old grungy backpacker staying in a hostel with an unkempt ponytail, but it was extremely helpful that I went out at least four times a week to approach women. My most prolific year was 2011, when I was 32 and in Poland, going out most nights of the week to approach women with beauty standards that are lower than what I prefer today.

I've since peaked. I'm getting pretty girls but not obviously hotter than the one in 2008 and nowhere near more quantity than in 2011. This is in spite of the fact that my resources and game is multiple times higher. The reason for this is simple: I'm no longer approaching a lot of girls. It turns out that access to women, regardless of your existing value, is the main determinant of the results you'll end up getting. I was meeting ten times more women each week a few years ago than now, and even if I had less game skill, resources, or even a private bed back then, I still got both higher quality and quantity.

I know what you are thinking: "But if you approach the same number of girls today as you did in 2008, you'd get hotter." That could be true, but there are two major constraints:

1. Most young girls don't prefer men in their mid 30's and beyond. Maybe in the historical past a young girl wanted a far older man, but such a girl today prefers one that is not too far from her in age. I've had to change many of my game routines to prevent my age from coming out before strong attraction is established.

2. You will not be able to maintain a consistently high level of game effort. I physically and mentally can't approach a high number of girls anymore. My energy is lower and my tolerance for the modern woman is also lower even though I'm still rather horny. I used to do ten or more approaches a night out, but now I can barely do three, and that's if I manage to go out at all. I'm unable to put in the 2-4 hours daily of work that would really maximize my current value, which suggests that the most amount of game work you're willing to do likely peaks with your energy, horniness, and female tolerance, not your value or game skill. Most guys I know maximize their game effort in their mid to late 20's and start dropping off in their 30's.

A man's paper value will be highest after 30, but this doesn't exist in isolation from the effort he's able to apply, the access to young girls he's able to meet, and the fact that those young girls don't usually prefer men over 35 as their first choice. Ironically, I find that a man's paper value actually goes up when he stops focusing on getting laid, because women are inhibitors to a man's ambition and serve as a massive opportunity cost in realizing his true potential, but then his game results will sharply decrease, suggesting an inverse correlation between personal value and sex results.

There are two different tracks a man usually follows. If he's a natural, and knew of game at a young age from an older male role model, his peak will be in college (early 20's), where he has the right game to sleep with the highest number of girls in their prime. The second track is for the man who had to manually learn game in college or after. His peak in terms of quality and quantity will likely come about five years after he started studying game, when he has the most efficient combination of raw game knowledge and horny energy. For this second group of men, their peak will be in their late 20's or early 30's. If you're using game to get laid, your peak will directly coincide with the number of approaches you're doing each week starting with the time your game is at a moderate level, not how much status you have or your theoretical knowledge of game.

There are ways that you can prolong or extend your game peak, such as moving to countries where age gaps don't bother women, injecting yourself with testosterone so you remain motivated to approach high numbers of women, lying to women about your age, and constructing Excel spreadsheets full of sex goals that motivate you when biology no longer does, but these are external inducements that only show how flawed the "men peak in their mid 30's" narrative is. Unless a man is paying for sex outright through prostitution or Russian-style "sponsorship," his ability to get 18-25 year olds will begin dropping gradually after 35, while his ability to get promiscuous mature women who had their spins on the carousel will skyrocket.

The true peak for modern men is therefore dependent on having solid game ability and access to girls during the time he's most girl-crazy. For most guys this will happen before 30, and almost never for men beyond 35. I just turned 36 and I'm so far from my peak that I am having trouble approaching even 10% of the girls I was doing just four years ago. It's getting easier for me to attract women between 25-30, but it is not easier for me to get girls in the 20-25 range than a couple years ago (it's about the same). In terms of the most desirable women of society, it will very soon become harder for me every year to attract the women I want.

We now live in a time where girls in their prime don't care about a man's resources. That trend is spreading to more traditional parts of the world, which means women will start to place more value in exciting metrosexual clowns than mature men with ample means. I still have to work just as hard as before to get them because the things we see as having value are not seen as valuable to young women. We're becoming established and wise while they increasingly prefer shiny, dancing cocks that make them feel drama, tension, and fun.

I'm satisfied at what I'm getting now based on the little amount of work I'm putting in, but in terms of peak, that has passed for me, and attracting 21-year-olds will not get easier with each new year, no matter how much I grow as a man.

This article was originally published on RooshV.com.

Read Next: Are Your Standards Too High?

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

A Brief Introduction To The City Of Tucson, Arizona

November 17, 2015 | by Kevin McNolte | Link | Original Link

I have lived in Tucson, Arizona for a few years, and I have become very acquainted with the city. It has a population of over 500,000 and is situated a little over 100 miles from Phoenix (which is the 6th most populated city in America) and around 60 miles away from the U.S-Mexico border. As with any other city, Tucson has its ups and downs. I want to share with you my objective (and subjective) view of the city..

Living

One of Tucson's main employers is the University of Arizona. Without the university, I don't think there would be anything going for Tucson. Since the city has no major league sports teams, Tucsonans are attracted to the university's sports teams, regardless of age. This makes for good social interactions when a game is on, since it is a good reason for the average Tucsonan to leave the house. Social networking is easy regardless of if there is a game on, but this makes it easier. The people are very open to outsiders.

If you are a younger reader and plan on attending the University of Arizona, you will be able to establish a good social network that meets your needs, as long as you are outgoing and not socially awkward. If that is not a good description of you, make it a good description. I'm sure that some of you who would like to go to this university have seen the pool parties posted on YouTube, but keep in mind you still need to be outgoing (and willing to participate in white trash debauchery) to have any sort of enjoyment out of such functions.

The TUC is a pretty inexpensive place to live, compared to other larger cities in the US. Rent is almost never above $1,000 regardless of what part of town you live, and you can easily find a good place for under $500. Drinks are also quite inexpensive. You can have a pretty fun night out for less than $30, and dates almost never cost more than $50. If you are spending more than $50 on a date, you are either on a very fancy date or need to cut back on the appetizers (or date skinnier women).

Tucson is a very seasonal city. I don't mean that it has four seasons; I mean that folks tend to leave town during the holidays and summer months, so expect a deserted city during those times.

Politics

The dirty T is mainly a liberal city; however, I have had chats with plenty of men and women who share traditional conservative viewpoints. The good news is that if you are not open about your views in public, you won't really hear anyone discuss theirs. People here are very laid back, and even the most radical feminists don't feel the need to tell everyone their opinions. Most people here just put their opinions on their car via stickers or on their Facebook. Expect rednecks, hippies, and "intellectuals," since Tucson is full of all of them.

But…

Arizona, specifically Tucson, has some of the highest rates of domestic violence in the country. This leads to a surge of feminists with an agenda to capitalize off of the victims of such abuse. Feminism is on the rise in this city, so understand the signs so you know who and what to avoid, as you can spot such garbage from a mile away in Tucson. If they have any politically-charged sticker on their car, avoid them.

Nightlife

Tucson nightlife is centered around either the university or downtown area, which are about a mile apart. Outside of this area are the dead suburbs or barrios. Expect to see plenty of college students. Again, you won't spend too much on a regular night out. If you live pretty far from each of these locations, it shouldn't cost more than a $20 Uber ride, since it's located in the middle of the city.

The nightlife scene has a little bit of everything; dive bars, microbreweries, billiards, regular bars, and even a few nightclubs to spit that game and get your dance on. Occasionally you may have an entrance line that could take a little more than five minutes to overcome, and sometimes you get a cover fee of $5-10. If you are really good at social networking, however, cutting lines is a very feasible possibility here. For me it probably only took a few months to get to know the managers and bouncers at all of my favorite spots, and I'll be damned if I have to wait in line again. Social networking is key in this city.

Women

If your thing is black or Asian women, I can't say much since there is an insufficient amount of them to make a judgment. The majority of women are either white or Latina, so learning Spanish can go a long ways in Tucson. My standards would say that the average (mean) woman in Tucson is a 5.5 with one of the highest standard deviations I have ever seen in a city.

For example, for every 8 and 9 (which there are plenty of), there is a 1 or 2 morbidly obese welfare recipients strolling around in an electric wheelchair at your local supermarket to buy her two-liter soda, or some crusty hippie picking off her scabs outside your favorite dive bar. Luckily you won't see these she-beasts in a nightclub.

For every 6 and 7, there is a 3 or 4 fatty barely fitting into a skin-tight dress, drunkenly hitting on men way out of their league (expect to see a fair amount of these at nightclubs). For every long haired, high-heeled-wearing feminine woman, there is a bald, tatted up woman resembling the character Edward Furlong played in American History X. Speaking of tattoos, I'd say that 60% of the women in Tucson have at least one on their body, and about 30% have many visible tattoos. If you view tattoos as trashy and unattractive, consider another city.

For every woman that looks like this, there is a she-beast

One thing I've noticed about the 7.5s and up is that they are much harder to crack than they are in other cities, they usually have boyfriends, and they usually don't have sex with someone that they just met (not saying it doesn't happen). If you are decent looking, well dressed, well accomplished, and have adequate game, however, you will have your choice of most girls in the 7.5-9 ballpark.

If you are looking for an same night lay it won't be hard to find, but it will probably be with a girl who is below a 7.5. In other words, there are plenty of good looking women here, but like every city, they don't come easy, and they are a minority. This rule applies as well for the university students, except the fact that most of the women in the university don't expect you to have a solid career or wear $400+ worth of clothing just yet.

Conclusion

I understand this city is not for everyone. It has a much slower pace compared to bigger cities, it is centered around college frat-tards, it has an increasing feminist presence, and is a hit-or-miss with the ladies. However, if you are looking to escape the big city for a more laid back environment with most of the same amenities, Tucson may be worth considering.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Chicago Is The Best City In America For Men

Kevin McNolte
Kevin McNolte is a millennial and west coast native who tries not to take the harsh realities of life too seriously. His interests are fitness, feminine women, and hoppy beers.

Why Are Female Firefighters Allowed To Graduate After Failing Physical Exams?

November 18, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Doirin-Holder also failed to run the required 1.5 miles in 12 minutes or less — even after the running course was slashed by an estimated quarter-mile, the source said, alleging that the start and finish lines were moved to shorten the run.
>
> — The New York Post

Fire Academy whistleblowers in New York have revealed that perennial failure Choeurlyne Doirin-Holder, a black woman, was allowed to graduate thanks to the fudging of her scores. It is simply the most recent gag amongst a litany of grotesquely political correct decisions from the Fire Department of New York (FDNY).

Overzealous courts, especially that of Judge Nicholas Garaufis, have previously ruled that the FDNY "must" hire more women and minorities. The result is that standards have been drastically and openly lowered. Some female candidates, like Doirin-Holder, even had fitness and other tests tailored to their sub-par abilities when they fell below the inferior gender-normed standard.

Doing the work that the ultra-liberal New York Times refuses to engage in, The New York Post previously covered how Doirin-Holder, long recognized as a repeat washout at the Fire Academy, "failed her way" into a $81,000-a-year desk job. Even though she would have only been paid $39,000 as a newly minted firefighter, the FDNY kept her on a pay scale some $26,000 higher than her previous 2013 job as an emergency medical technician (EMT). She was allowed to wait on this bloated remuneration until she could go through the Fire Academy once more.

2015 has been a sorry year for the FDNY, with Rebecca Wax becoming the first female firefighter to graduate whilst failing the vital Functional Skills Training test. The madness goes back far further, however. Wendy Tapia, called "unfireable" after failing six times to run 1.5 miles in 12 minutes or less, finally quit in 2013, but only as a result of sustained media and other pressure. Because of the priority being given to women and others, it is inevitable that many more stories of special treatment which threaten the future safety of the public will have escaped wider scrutiny and critique.

Court-sanctioned and other madness

Judge Nicholas Garaufis, whose looney tune findings of racial and other "discrimination" led to 282 "priority hires", including Choeurlyne Doirin-Holder.

We are at the stage now where the physical requirements for firefighters, whose job involves taking people to safety during otherwise fatal infernos and making their way through gutted buildings with heavy equipment, are described as "sexist" and "discriminatory" by courts and political parties alike. New York's is just one of many fire departments prioritizing female feelings over the functional requirements needed to be an effective firefighter. Four and a half years ago, a UK government study confirmed that physical standards had fallen under successive leftwing Labour Party administrations.

Faced with this incontrovertible academic and anecdotal evidence, including those of experienced firefighters, Britain's highest-ranking female in that profession, Dany Cotton, still found cause to cry fake tears of misogyny:

> People who express these views are dinosaurs and very chauvinistic and need to get with the programme. It's 2011, women are firefighters; get over it.

As is typical in these cases, "developments" which unfairly promote women and have much wider social safety repercussions are casually brushed aside or blamed on male sensitivity. The relaxed standards undoubtedly allow overweight men to join fire departments as well but, that said, an overweight male is almost always more physically competent in terms of strength than a fat female. And the relative leniency in newer fitness tests was never designed to advance the career prospects of less fit men. They aren't at all important in the context of stopping the purported employment oppression of women.

We're capable but government, please help us!

[image]
Dany Cotton has described criticisms of lowered fitness standards, empirically proven in a government study, as "chauvinistic" and sexist towards women.

In so many fields, especially conscription, which almost universally impacts men only, feminists are quite happy to use "biological differences" to lumber men with what doesn't suit them. But if women want to voluntarily work in any profession, expect a shrill call for an end to male privilege, however invisible (i.e. non-existent) and fifth-dimensional such privilege increasingly is. The ending of these so-called advantages takes the form of quotas, lower entry standards, including women-only lower standards as found in the military, and the ability to speed up one's career advancement by saying "Misogyny!", "Sexual harassment!" or "Gender discrimination!"

When everything is said and done, let's feel some sympathy for Choeurlyne Doirin-Holder, hey? After all, she's currently the recipient of terrible, terrible, terrible gender-based taunting, all because her genitals enabled her to graduate. Jokes aside, though, feminists do count calling out a woman's lower qualifications as institutionalized misogyny.

Read More: There Is Scientific Proof That Feminism Is Failing Women

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

What No One Tells You About Approaching Girls In Your Social Circle

November 18, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Almost without fail when a friend comes to me for advice about a girl he is attracted to and would like to be with, it turns out that she is a member of his social circle. Perhaps he's met her at work, through a close circle of mutual friends, or maybe they share a house or apartment. Almost invariably the friend has solicited my opinion as, even though they might get on well, he is failing to gain any traction with her.

There is a lesson here that all men should learn: if you are looking to meet a woman either for fun or to become your girlfriend then it is far better that you cold approach a stranger rather than hit on someone you already know.

The Attraction Is Obvious…

At first glance this is counterintuitive. Why shouldn't you go for girls you already know, or who are already in your social proximity? Surely this should be easier rather than harder? You probably already have an 'in' as you've been introduced by a mutual friend or by circumstances. You may well have shared interests—if, for example, you met in class at college.

Common sense would dictate that to approach such a girl with a view to dating her would be easier. Most men find the idea of approaching a new girl strange and terrifying, while the prospect of hitting on that cute girl you know who shares a house with Jim is a lot more appealing and less intimidating.

…But It’s a Flawed Strategy

There are several difficulties that make the alternative—cold approaching girls from outside your circle—significantly less doomed to abject failure.

When you hit on a girl you know, you forget that everyone else is doing the same thing. It’s the stuff of beta fantasies, isn’t it? That that girl at high school will suddenly notice you and you’ll fall in love. Or that girl in the office will magically fall in love with you over a pile of invoice queries.

The problem is that is very rarely happens.

Every social or professional situation you find yourself in is a microcosm of society at large. The office, your coding class, the house you share with five other people. Each one of these is its own social ecosystem. And if there’s one thing we can say with some certainty about girls it’s this—they are attracted to power, and in any social situation the guy with the most power (be it corporate power, social power, looks, muscle or money) is the one who is most likely to get laid.

Power

Take the UK as an example. In this country, most girls between the ages of 18-30 would probably have sex with, and marry, Prince Harry. Why? Well, he's the Queen's grandson and the most prominent eligible member of the royal family since William got hitched to Kate. And what girl wouldn't want to marry a prince?

So how come any other guy in the UK gets laid other than Prince Harry? It's obvious—because most girls don't have access to him. But say I lived in Clarence House with him and a hot twenty-one year-old girl. Do you think I'd get a look in? Of course I wouldn't. Why? Because that girl would be attracted to the most powerful man in her immediate vicinity and even with game changing that would be a hard task.

The most powerful man in the environment where your favoured girl hangs out probably isn't Prince Harry. But unless it's you then you may face a hard task in seducing her.

OK, maybe it is you—at work, say. But it won't always be you. Maybe there's a stronger, bigger guy at your gym, or a better dancer at your salsa class. Unless a man learns game he will find that more often than not he is reliant on luck with women—the luck of being the most alpha guy in the room at that particular time.

You Are Reliant On Luck

In essence, when you fancy a girl at work or in your class and you decide to get friendly with her and “see what happens” then you are simply relying on blind luck that she is attracted to you too. And blind luck is never a great strategy.

The reason? Because it’s very hard to create the kind of man-to-woman polarity required to spark attraction in a small social group like an office or a church choir. To really attract a girl you must be prepared to take risks, burn your boats, and possibly never see her again. If it’s the receptionist at your office and you’re worried about possible consequences when you ask her out then you are unlikely to do so, and even if you do you’ll do it in such a softened way as to be immediately friend-zoned.

Attraction Is Based On Speed, Risk And Brashness

Think about jerks who attract beautiful women. What do they do? They are charming, cocking and go in for the kill quickly, not caring whether someone else observes or thinks badly of them. Are you likely to behave like this with a girl who is friends with your best friend’s girlfriend? Probably not.

More likely you will be measured and careful, fearful or overstepping the mark or being impolite. But unfortunately it is that very reticence that will render you unattractive to her. Much better to have hit on her brazenly and quickly, whether your eventual goal was making her a girlfriend or a short-term fling.

You Are Much Better Taking Your Chances With Women You Don’t Know

Look, approaching strange girls can be scary, and rejection is a bitter pill to swallow for many men. But in most cases—unless you are getting definite indications of interest from the girls already around you—you are far better off going for girls with whom you have no prior connection. This will allow you to take greater risks, be cockier and funnier, and to walk away without consequences if you are rejected. Far better that than to worry about enduring months of awkwardness after your mistimed attempt with your housemate.

Whatever the doubters say, whether you are looking for a girlfriend or merely a passing bit of fun, it behoves every man to learn the rudiments of game and to hunt outside his social circle. For it is here, in the wider world, where his greatest romantic and sexual pleasures are likely to be found.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why the Skeptics Are Wrong And You Need To Learn Game Now

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

L’Europe Est Au Bord Du Précipice

November 18, 2015 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

This article was written by Roosh Valizadeh and translated into French by Jean-Batave Poqueliche.

Original article here: Europe Is On The Precipice

Les Européens ne méritent pas l’Europe. Voilà la seule conclusion que je peux tirer après avoir été témoin de la réaction aux attaques de vendredi qui ont tué 129 personnes. Au lieu de se défendre, de supprimer la politique qui permet à des millions de réfugiés d’inonder l’Europe ou de mettre en place des plans concrets pour expulser les hordes de musulmans qui refusent de s’adapter à leur nation, l’élite européenne redouble d’effort pour imposer sa doctrine qui va sûrement conduire l’Europe à sa perte et son propre peuple à l’extinction.

Si un homme violet s’approche de vous et vous met un pain dans la tronche, la réponse appropriée est de le frapper à votre tour ou de demander de l’aide à d’autres personnes pour le maîtriser. La mauvaise réponse est de crier « Paix ! » et « Solidarité ! » à l’intention de l’homme violet, puis d’inonder Internet avec des messages du type «Tous les hommes violets ne sont pas violents» et « Est-ce que la violente attaque dont j’ai été victime va renforcer le racisme et la haine contre les hommes violets ? ». Pourtant, dans un démonstration choquante de faiblesse et de défaitisme, c’est exactement ce que les Européens sont en train de faire. Les élites qui mènent la danse incitent à prier pour la paix et la plèbe, confronté à son propre anéantissement, se laisse mener à l’échafaud, insistant sur le fait que ce dont l’Europe a besoin en ce moment, c’est d’encore plus de musulmans et des réfugiés.

Croyez-le ou pas, mais brandir des pancartes pour la paix en pleurant n’arrêtera pas les attaques futures.

Faire de jolis petits coeurs avec des bougies non plus…

Et s’en prendre à ceux qui critiquent la politique d’ouverture des frontières non plus

(Au Lendemain De La Tragédie, Rob Lowe Pense Que C’est Le Moment Idéal Pour Critiquer La Politique De La France En Matière D’Immigration)

Rob Lowe

✔@RobLowe

Oh, NOW France closes its borders. #Hollande

(« Ah, MAINTENANT La France ferme ses frontières. #Hollande »)

Si il n'y a pas de révoltes en France, en Allemagne ou en Suède d'ici la fin de la semaine, menées par des groupes qui veulent protéger leur nation et leur peuple, l'Europe est condamnée. Si les Européens ne sont pas prêts à sacrifier leur vie maintenant pour se protéger après les attentats de Paris, alors que les musulmans sont, eux, en train de faire la queue pour sacrifier leur propre vie pour conquérir un nouveau territoire, l'Europe n'a absolument aucune chance de résister à un coup d'État islamique, parce il n'y aura pas d'autre événement pour les aider à se réveiller et à prendre les armes. Je crains que ce dont nous sommes témoins, c'est un peuple qui a été si féminisé, amolli et lobotomisé qu'il ne peut tout simplement pas identifier l'ennemi qui a franchi ses portes brisées, menace son mode de vie, pour au lieu de ça, aider les envahisseurs qui tentent activement de le remplacer.

Pouvez-vous imaginer ce que l'homme musulman moyen en Europe est en train de penser en ce moment? Il doit avoir du mal à croire que les élites européennes l'accueillent à bras ouverts, lui donnent de l'argent, foutent dehors les résidents de leur propre maison afin que lui et ses frères puissent avoir un logement tous frais payés, et qu'ils arrivent à lui trouver des excuses si il lui prend l'envie d'attraper un AK-47 et de faire un peu de tir aux pigeons sur cible humaine. Je suis sûr qu'il est scié, qu'à chaque fois qu'une attaque se produit, des millions d'Européens prennent d'assaut les réseaux sociaux pour défendre sa religion, car c'est une religion de « paix ».

Si j'étais ce mec-l à, je n'aurais aucun mal à croire qu'Allah m'a éclairé le chemin et m'a donné la force de renverser ce people de faibles qui ne mérite plus la terre qu'on lui a donné. Je peux pas lui reprocher de vouloir soumettre l'Europe, puisque les peuples européens et leurs dirigeants ont vraiment l'air d'avoir envie qu'il réusisse, le payant même de leur poche avec les aides sociales, pour l'aider à financer sa violence.

Les Musulmans vont faire ce que vous les laisserez faire, comme n'importe quel groupe ou race qui possèdent ses propres intérêts. Nous devons plutôt nous concentrer sur les traîtres des élites au pouvoir qui permettent à cette horde d'entrer en Europe. Ces dirigeants, qui ont accueilli les musulmans en Europe et qui ont refusé de mettre un terme à l'invasion, ont du sang sur les mains et doivent être démis de leur fonctions et jetés en prison. Si l'Europe était saine d'esprit, voici ce qui devrait être immédiatement fait:

- Fermeture totale des frontières européennes. Tirer à vue sur les bateaux de migrants voguant vers L'Europe pour que cela serve de message aux prochains envahisseurs qui veulent s'y infiltrer.
- Expulsion immédiate de tous les musulmans en Europe qui ne possèdent pas les papiers d'identité nécessaires, qui ont fait la publicité des concepts du jihad ou qui ont affiché leur soutien aux attaques précédentes. Les réfugiés qui sont entrés au cours de la dernière année doivent repartir chex eux.
- Destitution de tous les politiciens qui ont soutenu ou favorisé l'immigration musulmane. Ils devront être jugés pour crimes contre le peuple européen.

Si vous vouliez défendre une nation face à une invasion de migrants par terre et par mer, les trois mesures ci-dessus serait la marche à suivre, mais nous savons tous qu'elles ne seront pas mises en place. Au lieu de cela, plus de réfugiés viendront, plus de «solidarité» sera prêchée, et plus d'Européens vont mourir. Les Européens ont eu le cerveau tellement formaté qu'ils vont rationaliser la mort des membres de leur propre famille aux mains des envahisseurs, ce qui signifie que nous avons passé le cap où les arguments et la raison sont efficaces. La violence est maintenant l'avenir de l'Europe, soit venant des ses envahisseurs, soit venant de ses défenseurs qui auront à lutter contre trois adversaires en même temps: leurs élites, leurs compatriotes dont on a lavé le cerveau et les envahisseurs musulmans en eux-mêmes.

Si j’étais un Français ou un Allemand en colère en ce moment, je sais ce que je ferais:

- Je trouverais une petite ville dans mon pays possédant une bonne défense stratégique dans laquelle on a largué des réfugiés.
- J’établirais une ligne de communication avec un gouvernement qui comprend la situation, comme la Russie, pour un éventuel appui militaire.
- Je rassemblerais au moins 30 hommes armés qui croient que leur nation vaut la peine qu’on meurt pour elle.
- J’envahirais la ville, foutrais dehors les envahisseurs et défendrais ma position contre la police locale tout en prolongeant l’impasse aussi longtemps que possible pour un effet maximum dans les médias.

La mission aurait pour but d’envoyer un signal à d’autres milices nationalistes et aux patriotes. Soit nous renforçons notre position et nous nous développons avec un soutien extérieur ou nous mourons en essayant de défendre notre pays. Je ne peux pas imaginer une façon plus honorable de quitter cette Terre, en m’affirmant maître de mon destin, dans un monde où des conditions démentes me sont dictées, qui n’ont pour but que de me nuire, de nuire à ma famille et ma nation. Si mon ennemi est prêt à mourir pour mon pays mais que je ne le suis pas, il n’est pas difficile de dire que je ne pars pas gagnant, si je veux m’accrocher à ma terre.

Ces mêmes libéraux qui détruisent l’Europe essayent de faire la même chose aux États-Unis. Nos politiciens font des pieds et des mains pour augmenter le nombre de Syriens qui viendront chez nous (10.000 d’entre eux viennent d’arriver à la Nouvelle-Orléans), et tout comme en Europe, les locaux ne font pas grand chose en signe de protestation, à part tweeter comme des fiottes. Alors que les musulmans sont plus efficacement gardés sous contrôle aux États-Unis qu’en Europe, les Américains doivent se poser dès maintenant la question de savoir dans quel genre de pays ils veulent vivre. Ma famille vit actuellement près de nombreux centres de réfugiés et quand je leur rends visite, je ne sais pas si je suis arrivé au Honduras ou en Éthiopie. Le sort de tous les citoyens américains et européens est désormais scellé: soit vivre dans la peur parce que vous êtes entouré d’étrangers qui imposent leurs intérêts par l’agression en même temps que leur nombre augmente, ou vous défendre par la violence contre les politiques de l’élite qui cherchent activement à détruire votre vie et vous chasser de votre foyer.

La génération actuelle d’Européens ne s’est pas battu pour sa terre comme l’ont fait ses ancêtres. On lui a donné une civilisation en bon ordre, de belles villes et des villages paisibles sans qu’elle comprenne les sacrifices que les hommes du passé ont dû faire afin qu’elle puisse profiter de ce qu’elle a maintenant. Le multiculturalisme, le « Vivre Ensemble » se révélera être son suicide, et la seule question qui reste est de savoir si il y a encore des hommes prêts à se sacrifier pour leur pays comme les hommes de jadis l’ont fait. Quand je vois les attaques de Paris, je crains que si nous ne voyons pas ce sacrifice bientôt, dans les jours qui viennent, même, c’en est fini de l’Europe.

En savoir plus (en anglais): Le Nombre De Victimes Augmente Après Les

Attaques De Paris Alors Que Les Médias Font Du Zèle Pour Minimiser La Connexion Avec Le Terrorisme Musulman

---

Winston Smith

Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

What The Social Justice Coup Attempt At Yale University Looked Like

November 19, 2015 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

I am a student at Yale University. I have closely observed the events of the last three weeks unfold and would like to offer a firsthand view of what has transpired.

A Brief Recap

Two events in particular have ignited the recent firestorm:

Three days before Halloween, the Dean of Student Engagement emailed students with a request to be extra-sensitive about their selection of Halloween costumes. Erika Christakis, lecturer and Associate Master, followed up with her own email telling students to talk with each other if we find something offensive, questioning the culture of universities treating students as children rather than adults. For many students, the email puts her in the same category as David Duke and Calvin Candie.

The second incident: On Halloween, a black student visiting from Columbia University claimed she was denied entrance to a party hosted at the Sigma Alpha Epsilon house. Allegedly, a member at the door told her, “white girls only.”

The Racism Narrative

Mistook college students for adults

There is no proof whatsoever that the fraternity incident occurred. I've been to parties at every frat, including SAE, and they don't give a fuck what race a girl is as long as she's hot. Fraternities are now being pressured by both the administration and black female students to give public statements affirming their commitment to inclusion, and condemning racism and sexism.

However, it does not matter if the SAE incident occurred or not. What matters is the narrative. Fraternities are routinely accused of racism and sexism, and the accuser knew no one would dare question her accusation. These people have learned that if they shout "racism" no one will call them on their infantile behavior.

Students are now claiming that the recent protests are about more than the Christakis email or SAE—rather, it is about the "systemic racism" that exists at Yale. The students knew that no one would take them seriously if those two events were all they had, so they co-opted them into a larger narrative of racism—a primitive technique that garnered nationwide attention.

Next Yale

On Thursday, November 12th, shortly after midnight, 200 students calling themselves "Next Yale" marched to the home of Yale President Peter Salovey. They presented him a list of demands, including:

1. The requirement of an ethnic and gender studies course for all Yale students.
2. The university provide an additional 2 million dollars to each cultural center. That's 8 million dollars total.
3. Immediate removal of Nicholas and Erika Christakis from their positions as Master and Associate Master at Silliman College.

That last demand is interesting. Recently, Ms. Christakis fled New Haven as a result of receiving death threats. One wonders whether she would be willing to continue in her position even without the calls for her removal. In addition to threats of violence, Ms. Christakis's previously scheduled courses for next semester have been cancelled. This is what inclusion looks like at Yale.

Yale President Salovey's Response

Does daddy love us?

In response to the demands of "Next Yale," President Salovey announced that the university will take the following measures:

- A center on race and ethnicity studies to open this year with "significant resources"
- Four additional faculty positions on "histories, lives, and cultures of unrepresented and under-represented communities"
- A $50 million faculty diversity initiative
- Doubling the budget of each cultural center starting in 2016
- Multiculturalism training to Yale Health and Yale mental health staff
- "Renewed efforts" to increase diversity of Yale Health and Yale mental health staff
- Diversity and anti-racism training for university administrators, department chairs, directors of undergraduate and graduate studies, college masters and deans, student affairs staff, and "others across the University"

For now, Erika Christakis and her husband will remain in their positions. The student response to this decision may prove to be spectacular.

Didn’t totally cave

Students And Status

People have been discussing topics of free speech, race, and coddling, but I have not seen discussions of what I consider to be even more important: status.

We are the Selfie Generation, which means that we don’t exist unless other people are looking at us (pics or it didn’t happen). There is no internal sense of self that exists among millennials. Furthermore, we are quietly envious of people who hold traditional positions of status (e.g., fraternity members, professors, officials) and have learned that by shouting loud enough we will receive their attention. Screaming leads to instant status.

This is precisely what happened with the girl who shrieked at Nicholas Christakis in the Silliman courtyard, Jerelyn Luther. She is a very bright girl who likely would have gone on to be very successful. Still, she knew that screaming like a child at a world-renowned professor would gain the approval of her peers.

I guarantee Jerelyn is being showered by praise and treated like a goddess by students who are unfortunate enough to cross her path. I guarantee that if no one else had been present except her and Professor Christakis, her behavior would not have been as vile. We don’t exist unless other people see us.

The liberal white students want so badly to be accepted by students of color, and especially crave the approval of women of color. The bitterness of female students of color stems from their anger at the higher positions white male students tend to hold through no fault of their own. “Why can’t I have as much social status and wealth as that guy? Fuck it, I’ll blame it on racism, scream a lot, and people will sooth my ego and tell me how strong and beautiful I am.”

What I've Observed as I've Moved Through Campus:

- White students beginning sentences with "I don't want to invalidate or dismiss your experiences, I'm so sorry."
- Hearing sentences end with "You need to do better" or "Yale needs to do better." #DoBetter
- People harassed and insulted for remaining neutral throughout this ordeal
- People laughing and mocking white female students until they burst into tears, and then shouting "fuck your white tears!"
- Protesters spitting on students of color and cheering because they don't subscribe to the same ideology
- Hearing cries of "race traitor" from students directed at other students of color
- Fraternity members pressured to listen to female students of color describe their daily feelings of betrayal and hurt because they deal with the same day to day struggles as everyone else #MasculinitySoFragile
- Female students berating white male students for not coming to their rescue. In these cases the females use the males as a stand-in for all white men/"the system"/the girl's father.
- Female students not attending classes and suffer from nervous breakdowns, eating disorders, and tantrums, citing feelings of invalidation and fear
- Students claiming they feel unsafe at Silliman College, the dorm Erika Christakis oversees, because they say Ms. Christakis resides there and doesn't care about them
- Professors extending deadlines to accommodate students who choose to attend protest rallies that prevent New Haven residents from going to work

- Students quietly discussing how to remove white students, especially males, from Yale.

Why would anyone want the approval of these monsters? Even if they do approve, the will rescind it at the drop of a hat if it benefits them or if it means they'll receive social points from their peers.

The Dawning Realization

Earning the approval of her peers– somewhere outside the frame people are snapping

These events have allowed people's true motivations and opinions to be revealed. What some students are realizing is that their very existence is perceived as a threat. The encroaching ideology holds that by existing in the world as a white person, white people are unaware of the privileged status they hold. Anything short of continually reminding themselves that they are white, they are oppressors, and any interactions they have with a people of color have power struggle implications, is pure racism.

People are no longer individuals; we are representatives of our respective pasts. A white male speaking with a black female is not merely one human being interacting with another—no, it is one representative of the oppressor class speaking with another representative from the oppressed class.

White students, and to a lesser extent Asian students, are targets. I've listened to white students describe their feelings of shock and betrayal at having been accused of racism for the sin of existing. While they will readily agree that racism is a problem, many look utterly bewildered when you tell them that they are supporting "systemic racism" because they don't take the time to incorporate the experiences of every minority group into their perspective at all times. The protesters have overplayed their hand.

It's not all about race, ethnicity, or gender, however—ideology trumps all. Generally, white students who parrot the right opinions have been able to move through Yale with fewer accusations of racism than students of color who remain neutral or question the "Next Yale" movement. An undercurrent of resentment is forming among the dissenters of all backgrounds.

Keep in mind that the people at Yale are as liberal as they come. This grand university may soon no longer be worth saving. At this point many students are focusing on getting their degrees and getting the fuck out of here.

Time will tell.

Read More: Yale Students Throw Temper Tantrum Over "Offensive" Email

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

40 Pictures That Show How Modern Culture Has Damaged Eastern European Girls

November 19, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The Eastern Bloc and its women remained isolated for a while from what is known as modern Western culture. In 1991, the wall collapsed and the girls drank avidly from the poisoned chalice given to them. As some of our authors have written, the ideal of the Eastern European girl is slowly chipping away because of this.

The pictures that follow would make even Vladimir Putin cringe (then reach for his Makarov). You have been warned:

Blonde walk in Riga, Latvia. Or when “vapid” becomes a badge of honour

Plus size modeling ham planets have reached Russia. Guess where that came from

A class that teaches girls how to twerk in Siberia

Halloween in Moscow’s metro. Don’t move, maybe it will go away

Sveta Bylialova, one of the many EE Instagram attention seekers, when she is not busy getting defecated on in Dubai by an Arab sheik

More on this: Do Women Become Irreparably Damaged After Allowing Arab Princes To Defecate On Them?

Blowjob course and its students in Russia

Polish women who move to the UK become more promiscuous, new study shows

- Research finds they are also more likely to engage in risky sexual activity
- It adds they are three times more likely to get or offer sex for favours
- But it also found that 40 per cent of respondents were under stress

By ANDY DOLAN FOR THE DAILY MAIL

PUBLISHED: 10:27 GMT, 26 September 2013 | UPDATED: 10:27 GMT, 26 September 2013

Share 185 View comments

Polish women become more promiscuous and more likely to engage in sexually risky behaviour after settling in the UK, according to a new study.

The research suggests that young Polish women enjoyed four times as much sex after moving to the UK than they did in their strict Catholic homeland.

And not only were they having sex more often, young Polish immigrants were often engaging in riskier activities such as group sex and swinging - and were more likely to cheat on their partner.

I have heard this somewhere before

This is the next step: Research Suggests That A Woman's Body Incorporates DNA From The Semen Of Her Casual Sex Partners

English teacher creates sensation on the Russian-speaking web. Would this happen without Western culture?

Russian girl tattooed her boyfriend’s name on her face. Before and after

Hipster meeting in Omsk, Siberia

Elina Desaine, Latvian student in the UK. Self-proclaimed “modern day feminist” and dubbed most promiscuous student in the country

A street, somewhere in the former Soviet Union. Notice the look of the girl in blue, on the left

Zombie walk in Kiev

The music festival of Kazantip. Drugs, techno, promiscuity and bisexual poses for the social networks. Could be renamed: “The Petri dish where you leave them free and see what happens” festival

Passport made in the USSR. Mind plugged on MTV

Goth wedding in Moscow. Hope condoms from the Western world have reached them too

The self-proclaimed “Serbian Queens of Silicone”

Ukrainian football supporter. Textbook “thousand cocks stare”

The article 228 is the Russian penal code entry regarding the possession of narcotics. T-shirt says: “Beware of 228 if you powder your little nose”

Valeria Lukyanova, the “Ukrainian Barbie”, with her gran and a friend. Would you?

Russian cosplay event

Timati, mystery meat gangsta rap idol from Russia and his philosopher friends

Girls show their tits for cash in the street

Here is the story: Feminists Rage Spiral When Teenager Shows What Young Women Will Do For $120

Eastern Europe’s golden youth having fun. Kesha would be proud

Sing along: The Party Slut Anthem

This one does not start with the same chances as the others

The Ukrainian Femen members. No need to introduce them

Learn more: Is FEMEN Promoting Female Degeneracy Under The Guise Of Feminism?

These examples are luckily not the majority as stronger values than in the West still manage to hold it together. Here is what happens when the girls value their own culture:

Russian female police officers during a parade

Woman diving in an icy lake during a winter celebration

Georgian girls

LIFE magazine’s view of Soviet young people in 1967

Ukrainian girl in traditional garment

A modern-day Kazakh girl

Scene of a country wedding in Belarus

Bulgarian girls during the numerous festivals that celebrate the Bulgarian identity

Young sailor and his bride

Soviet car ad

Scene on a cruise ship during the Soviet times

Something tells me this one does not show her arse on Instagram

Another Ukrainian football fan. Observe the difference

[image]
Russian athlete during the international Student Games

[image]
Slavic girl in traditional clothes

[image]
Random Polish girls during a Slavic festival. They are happy to cook and bring water to the men

[image]
Summer party in USSR in the 60’s

Those are scenes that can still be qualified as being the “everyday life” of Eastern European girls. But for how long?

Read More: Can The Ways Of Eastern European Men Inspire Us To Revitalize Western Masculinity?

[image]
Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Idiotic Women Had Unprotected Sex With Charlie Sheen And Now Complain About HIV Risks

November 19, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Even before Charlie Sheen admitted he had been infected with HIV, mostly anonymous women were already complaining about how he had supposedly exposed them to the risk of contracting the very serious disease. Evidently, according to some, he had not told many, most or perhaps all of them about his condition. Instead of taking the precautions that authorities encourage even for people with only normal sex lives, countless female conquests of Sheen in recent years chose, if we believe the stories circulating, to be penetrated by him without some form of effective protection.

Sheen's ex-girlfriend Bree Olson has led the public charge against him. She asserted that they only used (very, very unsafe) lambskin condoms, which amounts to an admission that Olson is a complete moron (if she isn't a liar and money-hungry semi-extortionist). Sheen himself publicly admitted he is HIV positive this week and said he only had unprotected sex with two women, both of whom knew his diagnosis. He also hit back at any accusation that he failed to tell any of his other sexual partners.

This is not a mitigation of Sheen's alleged behavior, which would be selfish and reckless if true. Yet the world is full of such people. Just as a person doesn't walk about Brooklyn, Harlem, South Central LA, or South Central Chicago with their wallet out and in their hands at 1am, you don't have condom-less sex with a person many regard as a mentally unstable Hollywood womanizer, irrespective of whether he has told you he has HIV.

Contracting STDs, especially the most debilitating and dangerous ones, is not a matter of fairness. You can and will get them if you don't minimize your risks, and not having been told by your sexual partner isn't some grand form of immunity.

Are these (mostly anonymous) women money-hungry or as thick as bricks?

Bree Olson, a moron who had unprotected/half-unprotected sex with Charlie Sheen, or a calculated extortionist?

The tragic beauty of this choice is that either way we have another indication of negative female behavior in action. Sheen's version of events shows the patterns of emotional or financial blackmail many women will engage in when an opportunity presents itself. In his Today Show interview with Matt Lauer, Sheen chronicled purported instances of extortion by those threatening to reveal his HIV status. He gave no indication that these were men and only women were mentioned.

If we take the claims of the women, including Olson, seriously, we're working with an additional illustration of how women, teaching themselves to act as victims, are never even partially responsible for what position they find themselves in. They aren't obliged to practice safe sex as the man has to tell them. They can walk the streets at any time of the night they want (while many safety-conscious men choose not to) and be suddenly surprised when they are attacked.

Responsibility is different from blame, however. A person who infects someone with HIV/AIDS (or risks it) without telling their partner is criminally to blame, whereas reckless unsafe sex with someone like Charlie Sheen, if it leads to them getting the same disease, is a matter of non-criminal personal responsibility. Just as me travelling to Afghanistan's rural reaches as a tourist would be stupidity I am responsible for, a woman having unprotected sex is something she has to face up to when eventually STDs catch up with her.

Some context

I am not declaring all of you should suddenly stop having any unprotected sex. That's your decision (and one you may have to account for later). I myself have had unprotected sex less than 10% of the time and with less than 10% of my partners, and most of that was with longer-term girlfriends or booty call girls (on birth control, I double and triple-checked).

But even the sweetest girl may have unknowingly contracted chlamydia or something else at another point in time. Perception is not reality, as I'm sure at least some of you will discover or have already discovered after a pregnancy or fateful visit to the doctor.

Unprotected sex is a form of gambling. You can play, but know the rules first. A pregnancy, if the girl doesn't abort it, may very well result in a ridiculously draining hate-hate relationship between you and the state and girl for decades. An STD could signal the end of your sex life as you know it, plus create very real health consequences. And, like many games, this one can throw you many wildcards, most notably where the pristine girl you thought you were having sex with is actually a nuclear waste dump comprised of some nasty vaginal-dwelling contagions.

In terms of sympathy, you will get a lot less than girls like Bree Olson, and you won't be able to capitalize on a classless lawsuit, or get away with semi- or full-blown extortion. You're a man and responsibility, even for what she does, is your lot in life.

The vitiation of female responsibility is a sport in modern society

Said no feminist ever, at least genuinely.

Those familiar with my body of work here on ROK will know that I tend to mix and match my article topics, going from self-improvement one minute to doom and gloom the next. Alas, this is how life works nowadays. Positivity will get you nowhere unless it it utilized alongside consistent doses of reality.

Charlie Sheen’s story is a warning in so many ways—particularly the lack of female loyalty you can expect over time and the health and other pitfalls of having your own self-determined, alpha lifestyle. Amidst all of this, society will make excuse after excuse in legitimizing poor female behavior. Responsibility is not a word you will often hear when people seek to explain it.

Don’t despair, though. Just as a new convertible is fun to drive along a highway, we also need road signs to guide us to our destination. And preferably arrive there without a HIV or female-related crash.

Read More: A Brief Lesson In Game From Charlie Sheen

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Culture War Chat With Quintus: European Crisis Edition

November 20, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Quintus and I just wrapped up Culture War Chat 4 about the Paris terrorist attacks, the European migrant crisis, the Black Lives Matter coup attempts in American universities, and my recent road trip through the Midwest.

You can also listen to the MP3 and download it through Soundcloud.

Follow Quintus Curtius on Twitter: http://twitter.com/QuintusCurtius
Follow me on Twitter: http://twitter.com/rooshv

Don't Miss: Europe Is On The Precipice

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Record High Number Of Americans Renounce Their Citizenship

November 20, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

It is no surprise that frustration and discontent with life in the West is growing. Following a declining economy, America is no longer seen as a viable employment destination, as net immigration from Latin America turned negative in 2007. Indeed most foreign born residents of America are now from Asia, not Latin America.

There also seems to be an anecdotal increase in stories from people like Roosh, who have all but abandoned the West, favoring the slightly greener pastures found abroad. Indeed, my first exposure to the pre-manosphere was an article written years ago by Matt Forney about leaving behind the trash of the West in order to meet high quality females in Southeast Asia.

Poor Mexican to America: Eh, no thanks, I'm good!

It may come as little surprise that record high numbers of US citizens have renounced their citizenship. While the overall numbers are relatively low (under 14,000 renounced since 2010 out of an overseas population estimated at 8 million), there are important points to consider.

Renunciations have accelerated exponentially

Renunciation was relatively low in 2000. The Patriot Act did not yet exist. The twin towers were still standing. America was clearly on the decline socially, morally, and economically, but there was no doubt that we were the one remaining superpower, and for all our faults, still a really good place to live. In 2000, just 432 citizens renounced.

Five years later, the total climbed to 764, an increase of 77%. In 2010, the numbers spiked again, due to FATCA (see below) to 1,536. 2013 saw record numbers of renunciations–indeed an increase of 221% over the prior year. 2014 was another record, and the total for 2015 has already surpassed 2014's record and the year is not yet over. Total renouncing citizenship in 2000: 432. Total in 2014 was 3,415, an increase of 691%.

The reported numbers are undercounting

The figures above only represent cases about whom the Secretary of the Treasury has data. In other words, the majority of these cases are wealthy people who want to avoid the draconian tax rules of the US, who along with the African paradise of Eritrea are the only two nations on earth which tax income worldwide.

Consular expatriations, where the American enters the consulate and formally renounces (the way Lee Harvey Oswald supposedly did) are not counted in this number!

Renunciation is a very drastic step

Renunciation is the final step along a path that has many other options—traveling abroad, working abroad, living abroad, investing abroad, marrying a foreigner, obtaining another passport—these are all things one can do while still retaining US citizenship. Renouncing citizenship is a very serious final step, and one that the US government does not take kindly to.

Renouncing means giving up the right to vote in US elections, pass on citizenship to your children, receive government benefits, and most importantly, the right to freely enter and exit America. In order to visit America, someone who has renounced must apply for a visa the same way a goat herder from Ethiopia would request to visit.

The biggest problem is that the government typically acts out of spite and will deny these visas, meaning renunciation often means saying goodbye permanently to friends and family in the US. And to add insult to injury, the US charges a "renunciation fee" for those who tell it to go pound sand, a fee of $450—oops this has just been raised to $2,350. And even still there is a backlog of cases waiting to be processed.

Renunciation is a proxy for many others who have unofficially abandoned America

For every person who officially renounces, there are literally thousands of others who have unofficially renounced. There are currently around 8 million Americans estimated to be living abroad. Some of these, perhaps many of these, have no intention on living a life in America.

Perhaps they are on permanent vacation. Perhaps they are marrying a foreigner and choosing to live in their country. Perhaps they have obtained a second citizenship in another country, which is fully legal for Americans to do. Perhaps they are enjoying a different lifestyle while maintaining an online business. But many of them have given up on America. They simply haven't gone through the steps of formal renunciation.

Moral Reasons

As America has continued waging war on wedding parties and goat herders in the desert for the past 15 years, it has weakened its currency through bailouts and massive currency creation and below market interest rates, spied on the phone conversations and internet activities of all of its citizens, legalized abortion and gay marriage, encouraged and allowed slutwalks and gender fluidity, and endorsed a morally questionable view on morality, sexuality, marriage, and justice.

The US is incarcerating more citizens per capita than any other nation on the planet, surpassing China, Cuba, and North Korea, the supposed "axis of evil," while maintaining offshore facilities that torture and commit war crimes that America executed others for committing 60 years ago. Considering these factors, many have decided that enough is enough and that they cannot, in good conscience, continue to support a regime of evil, and formally renounced all ties.

Again, this is a proxy for thousands if not millions of others, who do the same thing through joining war tax protestors, working in the underground economy, or merely choosing to earn an income below the threshold of taxation.

As a side note, I recently returned from a trip to Costa Rica, and visited a town that was founded by American expatriates. The cloud forest of Monteverde, in northwestern Costa Rica was founded by a group of pacifist Quakers who abandoned the USA during the draft imposed during the Korean War. Costa Rica, unofficially known as the Switzerland of Latin America, is a pacifist and neutral country with no army.

The area is now a popular tourist destination, and the Monteverde Cloud Forest Biological Preserve exists due to the efforts of these former Americans. Often you will see groups of expatriates making important accomplishments in their new countries, after escaping the rat race and leaving the cubicles of America behind. Today, Monteverde is a popular destination for other Americans looking for a new place to live.

Financial Reasons (FATCA)

In 2010, the US Congress passed a draconian law which has curtailed most international banking for Americans, unless you are a billionaire or an international corporation. FATCA requires “all US persons” and their banks to issue detailed reports to the US Treasury. The law was completely unnecessary, as it is already federal law that any bank accounts of $10,000 or more must be reported on your tax form.

But this new law requires, for example, a 35-year-old man born in Korea to a Korean mom and American dad to submit detailed information on his bank account. Since this man may not even realize he is an American citizen, has never lived in or visited America, doesn’t own a US passport, and since he may not be required to pay any taxes or file a tax return, he probably won’t file the necessary forms, which means the US government can then penalize him and any bank that doesn’t comply must withhold 30% of any amounts transferred, and civil penalties can often wipe out your account in as little as 2 years.

That’s right, you could lose 100% of your assets just because you didn’t fill out a form in a country you’ve never even visited. The cost of compliance with FATCA—an American law—in the United Kingdom alone, is estimated at $80 to $150 million a year. So what did most banks do? Refuse to do business with any American. Period. And any Americans or people with American parents who have never lived or even visited the USA now choose to renounce their citizenship.

Losing the best and brightest

If you are a billionaire, you can be happy just about anywhere in the world. If I were a billionaire, my main criteria about where to live would be based on the climate and weather, as literally everything else from women to food to housing can be provided by your wealth, to the same degree abroad as in America, if not more so (I don’t think Ivory Coast is going to deny you a permit for a swimming pool along the coastline the California regularly does).

But since America does have the world's most regressive international taxation rules, being the only country outside a violent African dictatorship to tax citizens living abroad, many wealthy people, like Facebook co-founder Eduardo Saverin, decide to just say adios. Saverin took the money and ran, and although he paid all taxes he owed, the US now loses out on all future taxes from him.

And incidentally, US tax rules allow foreigners to earn as much profit as they want in America, tax free, so all that Facebook stock he owns, they can't touch now that he's moved to Singapore. This not only affects the US financially in lost revenues, but there is a real danger of a brain drain as talent leaves for countries with fairer tax systems.

The Implications

Be aware that US citizenship reported renunciations are up almost 700% from 2000, and that many more have "all but" officially renounced. This includes those who have left America with no plan to return but did not take the final step of renouncing citizenship. This includes MGTOWs, retirees, internet businessmen, and the motivated entrepreneur.

There were those who left fascist Germany in the 1930s, and those who died of starvation in camps in the 1940s. I'm not saying America is going to become a war zone, or start rounding up citizens into re-education camps. I'm simply saying to be aware of what's going on and what others are doing and understand there are reasons motivating their behaviors.

Also understand there are options out there, and you can live, work, and obtain citizenship abroad without having to renounce your own US citizenship. If you are living abroad, strongly consider consulting an accountant to make sure you are not putting your money at risk.

Finally, this fact is evidence that America needs to change. When even Mexican farm workers don't want to come here and pick watermelons in the sun for 12 hours a day, you know something's wrong with our society.

Read More: 5 Tips For Getting A Quality Foreign Woman

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

A Modern War, Of Sword And Spirit

November 20, 2015 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

I greet the men of ROK again with an eye to the future, and some requests.

We live in unusually perverse times

I don't know if many men will identify with me, but over the past 10 years I often asked myself if I might be going insane. 10 years ago, I was essentially a "moderate" Progressive; but study of the Classics, history and theology, took me swiftly over a long road, into the bosom of tradition and patriarchy.

Perhaps other men have experienced this. You start with a "red pill" about women, and it leads you to see that traditional morals had a reason for existing; or perhaps it opens your eyes to the disingenuous agenda of the establishment, and that epiphany leads to another, and so on. I find that my thinking has been so revolutionized over the past ten years, that it would be difficult to tally all the ways, in which I am now an heretic against the modern world.

Once one debunks the premises of any of the major lies of Modernity, the rest fall apart in quick succession – since they share a basic premise (indiscriminate egalitarianism) – and this fundamentally rearranges one's worldview in very short order. I was a "nice guy" even in 2008; now I find myself agreeing more with de Maistre and Evola, than Jefferson. Not long ago, such a system of beliefs as I now possess would have seemed intolerably evil to me.

What do I find evil, now? When one considers the myriad abominations celebrated by today's "respectable" people, it is quite sobering. As the love of patriarchy, justice and excellence burns brighter within me, I find modern iniquity to be so intolerable as to demand decisive action. Women murder their children and "doctors" carve them apart for profit, joking about it while swilling chardonnay.

Scantily clad, prepubescent boys dance sexually for their adoptive "fathers" and other admirers at the Folsom Street Fair. There are now tiny dildos for transitioning toddlers. The financial system is rigged; it punishes earning (tax) and saving (inflation), encourages profligacy (consumerism) and then exploits it (usury).

Mentally ill people mob together and dominate the public forum; them that are sane, the public forum often drives mad. The schools themselves loathe wisdom and learning. There is a seemingly deliberate and coordinated effort to destroy all integral cultures, especially of European peoples. The elites suffer no consequences when they perpetrate high treason or gross injustices; but what happens to you, if you violate a minor statute or go delinquent on your property taxes?

Women destroy their marriages, families and even nations, all to the applause of the crowd… but woe betide the man who would stand on his God-given authority as husband and father to encourage civilization-building behaviours. One could go on and on. There is a crushing oppression and a Satanic madness, that is not only putting everything good and decent to death, but is exalting public evils so heinous, that I often find my blood boiling.

No man likes to feel a sense of impotent rage, but I am often at a loss, when I consider how to remedy our situation. It seems clear to me that electoral politics will achieve nothing. It seems morally wrong to engage lunatic apparatchiks in debate, implying that their ideas are within the bounds of respectable opinion, when a more upright model of engagement is found in book XXII of Homer's Odyssey.

Moreover, they everywhere suppress free debate; and if debate is not appropriate or possible, only force of arms remains. This, too, is fraught with moral and practical difficulties. Yet one cannot be content to do nothing. The way forward must be found.

An Element Of My Motivation

There are only two things clear to me. 1) The first element of our crisis is spiritual, and this must be resolved before substantive and lasting progress will be made on any other front; 2) There is no clear path at present, humanly speaking, to victory for us—neither by cunning nor by arms; those who will perceive and lead the way forward, will not merely be smart men or strong men, but men of genuine wisdom and excellence.

I have always admired the hermit, because he stands out as a man who uniquely embodies the Truth, and the masculine ethos of the spirit—he is not merely a scribe who knows about the sacred, he has hard-won wisdom through spiritual combat. He is a soldier of the spirit. The lives of countless hermits and monastics recount their battles against devils, and such saints as Anthony the Great and Benedict are still invoked against them.

In Western lore, the hermit is regarded as a companion of sorts to knights, even as a knight himself, spiritually. In Arthurian legend, Mordred ousts the Archbishop of Canterbury, who retreats to an hermitage, where he will heal and counsel various knights, eventually receiving the body of King Arthur, and receiving Sir Bedevere as a disciple.

In Etienne de Bourbon's tale of Robert the Devil, Robert's murder of seven hermits is treated as the murder of seven knights. Friars (who lived a similarly ascetic life) often stood at the front of Catholic armies, and went before the soldiers into battle bearing the Cross. The hermit may not take up arms, but he is the peer of fighting men. And as we may soon have need of fighting men, we will have need also of hermits. That, is my vocation.

Saint Anthony is not impressed.

A particular legend, retold in Burger's Der Wilde Jäger (The Wild Huntsman), tells of how a feckless aristocrat's encounter with an hermit in the wild resulted in his doom. My space is limited, so I'll let you find the poem, if you're interested. It contains perennial truths, but encapsulates our situation well: those in authority have spurned wisdom; the untouchable sacred has vanished from before their eyes, and they are now hounded by their own impudence.

The hermit represents that unshakable power and sanctity, which alone knows and merits to be the touchstone of divine judgment and providence. Men sometimes thank me for sharing what I know about theology and spirituality; I hope to continue doing so at ROK and elsewhere; but if I am to share my opinion with men, I want it to be rooted in something substantive, beyond relating the wisdom that others won by their hard work (though there is some benefit in this).

I am painfully aware that my knowledge at this point is that of a scribe, not the battle-honed wisdom of the hermit, bought by blood in the spiritual combat. I am convinced that the only men who will lead the way forward, are the lucky bastards whom providence carries along willy-nilly (as is often its way), and the men who win direct connection with transcendent wisdom through fidelity to the spiritual struggle.

Perceiving that I can only offer my fellows an informed opinion, at present, as to how we must prosecute the pressing affairs of our age, it is my intent to enter upon the eremitical life and to begin the combat that imparts a keener vision, if indeed it please God to give it. I have long felt that men need to shake off mediocrity, start networking and building "parallel structures," and otherwise preparing for a drastic change in the world.

I hope to offer a discreet meeting place, a spiritual retreat and, God willing, some worthy counsel to men who walk our path of reclaiming masculinity and reestablishing Patriarchal civilization: a new symbiosis between hermits and knights, as it were!

The Dream of Sir Gawain, wherein a monk admonishes and advises him.

My Requests To The Readers Of ROK

First off, if any men are interested in helping to establish and prosper the hermitage and its mission, even if only by prayer, I'd ask them to go to the link in my author bio.

Secondly, my plan both now and in the future is to share the fruits of contemplation and study with my fellow men. The leadership at ROK wanted me to write two articles, and to gauge whether there was enough interest for me to continue writing for the site. Let me know in the comments if you are so interested, and tell me the kinds of things you would most like to learn about, from a theological perspective.

What questions do you have? What theological topics are of interest to you? I have many ideas for articles, but I'd love to get a feel for where you guys are at, in theological knowledge and interests.

Central to this article, is my own sentiment that action is needed, rooted in authentic learning and experience. I am now preparing to act in the manner that seems most appropriate to me; what obstacles do you find in your own paths, preventing you from responding to the dire needs of our times, whether spiritually or otherwise? How, brothers, can I be at your service?

Read More: Modern Culture Mirrors Jezebel's Poisonous Spirit

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Mizzou “White Privilege” Hunger Striker Jonathan Butler Is From A Family Worth $20 Million

November 21, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

University of Missouri hunger striker Jonathan Butler, who refused food so the institution’s President Tim Wolfe would resign, is yet another curious case of SJW economic and social privilege gone mad. Aside from his totally unfounded accusation that Wolfe’s car “bumped”/”hit” him, Butler literally comes from the 0.1%. His father, Eric L. Butler, earned an astonishing $8.4 million last year as a Union Pacific executive vice president for sales and marketing and his family is worth an estimated $20 million. On the back of this background, Butler junior has spent nearly a decade in higher education while poorer students, white, black and everything in between, have had to make their way in the real world.

Although Jonathan Butler was unable to hide his background (and how could he?), he has used his blackness to continue the narrative of the poor, oppressed African-American. “White privilege” and its corollaries have once again been stripped of any and all context, nuance, and reality. During his eight-day, attention-seeking hunger strike, this professional student probably gave no thought to the fact that his higher education dreams have been easier to fulfill than 99.5% of the white student body at his very own campus. He was only focused on ending so-called institutional racism at Mizzou, an accusation about as proven as the UVA rape hoax.

Why do very wealthy SJWs behave this way?

Poor oppressed Jessica.

To come to a conclusion, let's look back at another sad episode in SJW history. This year, ROK proprietor Roosh was assaulted in the street by one very spoiled Montreal native named Jessica Lelièvre. Her cowardly attack on Roosh, knowing full well he would not and could not retaliate against a woman, represented the culmination of years of constant self-victimization via her participation in Concordia University "politics." Almost every major campaign she has involved herself in has explicitly or implicitly emphasized purported male privilege, despite her hailing from a phenomenally wealthy family whose prosperity started, ironically, with her very old and very white great-grandfather Émile, a construction magnate.

Establishing your own corporation is usually very hard work. Even with the good fortune of being born to very wealthy parents, a descendant of that corporation's founder, like Lelièvre's father, who now runs the family business, doesn't have the easiest job in the world managing such a sprawling business concern. Consciously or unconsciously, children of privilege like Jessica Lelièvre and Jonathan Butler (a son of a business executive but still analogous) see this and realize that they can make a name for themselves in faster ways while they're much younger. Erupting in rage spirals about some manufactured crisis enables them to avoid the perceived drudgery of sustained work along a conventional career path.

Lying about being struck by a white man's car

One of Tim Wolfe's crimes was not getting out of his car so people like Jonathan Butler could beat him up for supporting imagined racism on campus.

It is not unusual for college and other SJWs, fixated on their microaggressions and triggers, to out themselves as liars either through video proof or similarly incontrovertible evidence. Not to be outdone by his ideological colleagues across American campuses, Jonathan Butler jumped (Or ran? Or gracefully gazelled?) his way into President Tim Wolfe's car in order to claim he was hit by a racist white man. The video and some interesting commentary can be found here. Let's hope his multimillionaire father's pittance of an insurance policy covered the massive hurt to Jonathan's ego.

What's more is that Butler and his colleagues committed the crime of false imprisonment, aggressively surrounding Wolfe's car so he could not move his car more than a few meters at a time. All this was left by the wayside in the media's reporting, which gave no balance amidst the extreme acts of provocation and intimidation perpetrated by self-proclaimed civil rights activists. As a trinket to proper coverage, some mainstream outlets documented the Melissa Click threat against a journalist but still maintained their implicit or explicit support of the Mizzou bullies overall.

Question every SJW's privilege

SJWs are irony-blind.

Are their parents millionaires? In the case of the United Kingdom especially, do they have connections in the nobility or high society? Did they get into university because of legacy or affirmative action, like Michelle Obama's admission to Princeton due to her brother's attendance and her race? And just because a SJW doesn't have gargantuan privilege, their views are not suddenly valid. The privilege many of them have is simply another layer of icing on the cake to be exploited in undermining their pernicious campaigns.

Once again, SJW ideologies go hand-in-hand with self-delusion and mental illness. The narcissism exhibited by people like Jonathan Butler sows the seeds of their own heavy fall. Buttressed by his family's largess, he will undoubtedly continue his trajectory of seeking the public spotlight. But amongst a growing body of Americans, his credibility will be forever tarnished.

That said, there are plenty more Jonathan Butlers yet to get their comeuppance.

Read More: I Was Mugged And My White Privilege Was to Blame

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Many Of You Can Ignore The 5th Commandment

November 22, 2015 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

An important lesson I learned is that “bad things” aren’t necessarily bad things in the long run. Matter of fact, sometimes the absolute worst thing to happen to you in the present could be the greatest blessing in your life. So if you…

ever get fired from a job, dumped by a girl, or can’t afford college and need to drop out chances are you likely…

avoided a career in a field you would hate, a psycho drama queen that would have divorced you anyway, and a crippling level of student debt for a law degree that is worthless.

It’s nearly impossible to tell if “tragedy” is tragedy indeed.

However, a very interesting “bad thing” that happened to me and nearly every man alive here is that of the collapse of the nuclear family. Specifically, the utter deterioration in the quality and caliber of parents and parenting in the past 50 years. Whether you want to look at divorce rates, feminism’s brainwashing of Western women, the outsourcing of child rearing to the state, or the single or deadbeat parent epidemic, parents, especially of the Baby Boomer and Gen X vintage, are absolutely atrocious.

Of course, while it was happening the absentee parenting and a general wholesale of our children to the state daycare and school industrial complex seemed like a “bad thing.” We all endured 13 years of prison known as “school.” Half of us come from broken homes. We wandered in the desert without strong, fatherly leadership suffering needlessly decades of confusion and torment when it came to dating, love, and marriage. And many of you are likely stuck under the tonnage of student loans because your parents said, “follow your heart and the money will follow.”

But ironically this collapse of the most important part of American and Western culture ended up being a HUGE blessing for me (and many men within the ‘sphere). For without it, I and all the other men who make a living in the manosphere and neo-masculinity areas would have to have regular jobs. Instead, thankfully, we get to help out our younger internet brothers by passing on the lessons we had to learn the hard way so you can have easier lives than we did. And that “career” would never have been possible if we didn’t first go through that baptism by fire.

Unfortunately, however, this “silver lining to the clouds” does not negate the fact there are clouds. And a dark and tragic trend I’ve noticed is that parents aren’t getting any better. They’re actually getting worse. A disturbingly high percentage of my clients are young men (and women) who live under a household headed up by what is nothing short of abusive parents.

Of course we have to be careful here. Just because your dad won’t let you go out past 2 AM while you live at home at 17 is NOT abuse. Or that your parents insist on you getting a job or something a child simply does not like is NOT abuse. Sadly, this is not what I’m seeing in my little world.

I have clients whose parents threaten to disown them if they change their religion.

Clients whose parents would cut them off if they dated outside their race.

Parents who are drug addicts and steal their childrens’ pittance of money they make working fast food.

Outright abuse.

And parents who demand their children live at home so they can collect more welfare or section 8 housing.

The list goes on, but the problem is that it forces young boys and girls into an impossible situation. One where they have to raise themselves. And not just raise themselves, but be able to identify that their situation is NOT acceptable, escape, SUPPORT THEMSELVES, AND know enough to undo all the damage their parents caused. It is again, an impossible situation, especially if you're under 18.

Still, like the Marines say, "We don't want to hear problems. Only solutions." And since this is a growing demographic of young men and women (sometimes, boys and girls) who are in desperate need of help, some advice on raising yourself might be in order.

You're On Your Own Now, Son!

The first thing you have to do is truly determine if your parents are indeed abusive. This is somewhat tricky, as in today's world our Millennial and younger children are such drug-induced basket cases and brainwashed into professional victimhood by their teachers, a mere NORMAL and COMMON disagreement with their parents would falsely be flagged as abuse. It's up to you to be intellectually honest to determine if your parents are genuinely abusive and you're not just being a whiny, spoiled cunt.

There are obvious cases of abuse such as physical violence, theft, drugs, and assault, whether it's against you personally or family members. In clear cut cases such as these, you are very much within the right and likely need to call child protective services, the cops, or (if you're older than 18) move out and have nothing to do with the family again.

But beyond that it gets a little gray and into the world of "mental" or "verbal" abuse. Again, because the amorphous nature of these types of abuse they are prone to be taken advantage of by petulant little children similar to a witch hunt. But a lot of times these ARE indeed genuine forms of abuse. But unlike your dad clobbering you one or your mom bringing in a new and genetically different half-sibling every 10 months, some of this is not so black and white. Especially if you are significantly younger.

If you're 5 (and you should not be on this site if you are) your parents very much have the authority and right to tell you to go to church. If you're 10 your parents very much have the right to set you a bedtime. And if you're 13, you're parents very much have the right to tell you you can and cannot date. But it gets less gray when you get into your late teens and certainly once you pass the age of 18 and become an adult. At this point your parents should have taught you independent thought and made a case for why they want you to be the way they do.

Your parents should have made their arguments for why you should go to bed before 3AM if you have school or work the next day. And your parents should have explained why it's probably not the best thing to date a socialist, teenage parent with a criminal record who's still working on their GED and on Ritalin. But if they then threaten you with ostracization, cutting you off financially, or (worse) disowning you because you "won't go to church" will "date a black guy" or "want to go to trade school instead of medical school (true story)" that is most definitely abuse in that they are tyrants who simply do not respect you as an individual, but worse, view you as a piece of property they own.

How Do You Know You're In A Prison?

The second thing that must be addressed is that many times you may not KNOW how to assess this, as your ENTIRE life and upbringing has been under this environment. The North Korean people, who nearly everybody in the Western world feels pity for, very much hate everybody in the West. The reason is that they've been brainwashed after 70 years of communist rule. Nearly every Christian girl I dated was "tormented" over pre-marital sex as their biology was telling them one thing, while their fathers and Jesus were telling them (an obsoleted) other.

Whatever the case, you are conditioned both by your genetics and your environment to love your parents and never leave them, no matter how indifferent and uncaring they are to you. Going against them takes a completely revolutionary way of thinking that you have just not been programmed to do. But if I could recommend a "test" to help determine if your parents are overly controlling, it is one where your gut instinct just tells you your parents don't love you.

Every human has this genetic instinct of self-respect. The reason why is self-respect is self-preservation and is genetically programmed into your DNA. Thus, even at the young age of three you should be able to determine whether to trust somebody (stranger in a dark van asking you if you want candy) with or without parental or environmental conditioning. And if you have that feeling in your gut that your dad who gives you a bedtime of 8PM at the age of 18 (true story) doesn't REALLY like you, chances are it's true.

Your Parents Are Just Idiots

The third and final thing you need to assess is whether your parents are just plain idiots. Being stupid is obviously not abuse, as it is not malicious nor selfish. However, it does determine whether you should follow the 5th commandment and “honor they mother and father.” This doesn’t mean you hate them, but why would you look up to a parent who’s collecting welfare? Why would you admire or respect a parent who at 55 still has student loans and a mortgage? Why would you “honor” a parent that even with social security and medicare hints that they may need you to take care of them because they so piss-poorly managed their lives?

Again, a lot of this you will not be able to assess at a young age, but when you’re 18 you should at least be able to look at your parents and say, “OK, do I want to be like them when I’m their age? And if not, what did they do so I know PRECISELY what mistakes to avoid and never make in my own life.” This is certainly a lot easier than trying to emancipate yourself from an abusive alcoholic father, but a challenge nonetheless in that you have to find alternative sources of wisdom and parenting so you do NOT end up like your loser parents.

Financial Independence

The fourth and final thing you’re going to need to do is leave. And not just leave, but support yourself financially. The cowardice I see in the parents of my clients who instead of using reason and love, threaten their children with cutting them off financially enrages me. At the age of 16, 17, or 18 you are not only still reliant upon your parents, but are likely entering the most poverty-stricken half-decade of your life – college.

Combine this with absolutely no employable skills, the threat of pulling the purse strings is one that literally threatens your livelihood. Still, it doesn’t change the fact you need to support yourself financially for 100% of ALL your needs. Food, clothing, shelter, tuition, lip balm, toilet paper, utilities, everything. It's all on you. The only other option you have is to go back to an abusive home and never really or truly live a free life.

However, as hellish this guaranteed-to-be-a-nightmare is going to be, it is better that living under an abusive home. You may not have food, but you will have freedom. You may be sleeping on a couch, but you have the right to come home when you see fit. You may be going into debt to pay for tuition, but you won't have your money stolen or be forced to tithe 10% to a ~~defunct state~~ religion. And you may be down and depressed, but you will find your own family either through friends or a spouse, and they will treat you better.

It's the best life you can live, no matter what disadvantages life gave you.

Read More: Why You Should Not Go See "Mad Max: Feminist Road"

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

3 Things That Worry Leftists More Than Global Jihad

November 22, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

France has had a bad year. After Charlie Hebdo in January, the country's capital was hit by yet another terrorist attack on the 13th of November. This time on a larger scale.

Reports say that at least 129 people were killed, while many more were wounded. The attacks were aimed at seven different targets, including the stadium Stade de France and the Bataclan concert venue. Witnesses say the gunmen, most of which blew themselves up after their bloody rampage, yelled "Allahu akbar." ISIS later claimed to be behind it all.

The leftist response

A week or so has passed since the terrible events of Friday the 13th. Now it's time to summarize the reactions from Swedish establishment media and politicians. You might think that, seeing as the perpetrators were undoubtedly Jihadists, every sane person would focus on combatting Islamic extremism after such an event.

But leftists (whose sanity is questionable) have other concerns. Below are three things that they lay sleepless at night worrying about, after fanatic Muslims go on a killing spree in a major European city.

1. Climate change

Åsa Romson.

> The very serious events in Paris right now can impede the Climate Change Conference in December when over 100 government heads have planned to participate.

This quote is from a tweet by Åsa Romson, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for the Environment. Some of you might remember her from her misandrist rant during a speech last year, where she blamed all men for climate change.

The Green Party politician posted the tweet shortly after the Paris attacks. In it she clearly demonstrates that she is not concerned about terrorism and the lives that have been terminated, but about some big shot meeting risking delay. The minister rightfully apologized for the tactless tweet. She also tried to cover the whole thing up by deleting it. But the Internet never forgets, and hopefully the voters won't forget either.

Some people, like Bernie Sanders, actually want us to believe that climate change itself causes terrorism. It is probably the most ridiculous red herring leftists use to divert attention from the real issues. It's a way of relieving the Muslim killers of their guilt, instead laying the blame on polluting Westerners. Because Muslims are never at fault for anything they do, always the victims. More on that point next.

2. Western imperialism

> You treat the terrorists like monsters because you don't want to reflect over how we have contributed to creating them and giving them nourishment.

Actually, we treat the terrorists like monsters because they are monsters. But this is a quote from one of many debaters making the case that Westerners have brought this on themselves. They call upon the West to "admit" its guilt, using the same kind of logic as claiming that a woman wearing a short skirt have herself to blame for being raped.

What they're basically saying is: if you mess with Muslims, you deserve to die. If you make them angry, you are responsible for the violent outcomes. In fact, what we need right now is more Western intervention in the Middle East. ISIS, and every other Jihadist organization out there, must be exterminated once and for all, to keep the West safe.

3. White racism

> Humanity—to not punish those who are not guilty—is the best weapon we should use.

The most usual reaction coming from the left has been this. “Oh, those poor Muslim immigrants. They are the REAL victims of this terrorist attack. Let’s welcome more of them to show how kind we are!”

There’s something seriously wrong with people who think we should combat Islamic terrorism by importing more Muslims. Surely, it could only increase the risk of some of them becoming radicalized and lashing out at the liberal democracy they’ve been taught to hate.

Not all Muslims are extremists, of course. But for humanity’s sake, save your sympathy for those who died by the hands of the terrorists, and the families now grieving their loss.

Allies against freedom

Climate change, Western imperialism and white racism. Those are the subjects you score points for talking about at leftist cocktail parties. But you lose points for mentioning the big, bearded elephant in the room, wearing a bomb belt while screaming “Allahu akbar” at the top of its lungs. We call that elephant Islamic extremism.

The establishment media and politicians have ignored it for a long time now. It has been able to feed itself and get bigger and bigger without disturbance, in the European countries who let it in. More and more people are waking up to this issue as terrorist attacks on Western soil fill news outlets. These people have learned to see beyond the leftist propaganda.

The greatest threat facing the free world today is the unholy alliance between the left and the Islamists. Their interests converge in their mutual hatred for freedom, and every other great value that Western civilization stands for.

Both of them must be combated, or else all will be lost.

Read More: Global Elites Caught Plotting The Islamic Invasion Of Europe

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

6 Types Of Men That Women Would Rather Be With Than A Normal Man

November 23, 2015 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Back in the 1950's, when men oppressed women by working all day and paying for everything, things were a lot simpler for men who wanted to attract women. The only requirement that a young man needed to find his sweetheart was that he be a decent and hard-working man. But fast-forward to today—things have changed a lot about the type of men women are attracted to.

Women today tend to hold off marriage so that they can spend their prime years slutting around focusing on their precious education and careers, and due to the deregulation of the sexual marketplace and the toxic effects of the media, modern women have developed a rather peculiar taste for dark triad men.

The consequence of this is that most men, who are merely average or normal, are considered too “boring” for the modern women to be bothered with. So, until these women are too old for bad boys and ready to “settle down,” many decent men—who would otherwise be considered good boyfriends or husbands—are forced to sit and watch on the sidelines.

So, if you are one of those average men struggling to figure out how to spark attraction in modern women, take a moment to gander at some of the types of men that women find irresistible.

1. Degenerate Entertainers

Modern women’s penchant for anyone famous is well-known. This is especially true in our degenerate society that worships talentless entertainers above thousands of ordinary individuals who work in the service of society. So it comes as no surprise that many women worship these musicians and actors regardless of how reckless, drugged-up, and sleazy they are. You have a better chance scoring an attractive woman as an unstable and shitty bass player who snorts cocaine for brunch than if you’re a medical student with a stable life and traditional family values.

Like hogs on truffle.

2. Abusive, Dominant Men

What nice guys, white knights, and male feminists can’t seem to get through their thick skulls is that women are not attracted to men who respect them. Modern Western women would rather be with a strong, dominant man who occasionally abuses them than be bored to death by a nice, supplicating beta who worships them. These same betas would be aghast to find out just how many women have fantasies of getting dominated and raped.

3. Serial Killers And Mass Murderers

Charlie Manson with his new wife. He’s happy because he knows that she can’t divorce rape him.

If women are attracted to dominant and abusive men, then it should be no surprise that there are also many who are drawn to violent criminals. In fact, the phenomenon of women being attracted to violent killers is so widespread that there is a term for it: hybristophilia.

Famous serial killers such as Ted Bundy (who was also a necrophile) used to receive hundreds of love letters from women on a weekly basis until his execution in 1989. Even homosexual killers like Jeffrey Dhamer and Luka Magnotta have been the subject of adoration from their female fans. That’s more attention than any normal man will get in his lifetime.

4. Drug Lords

On the left, we have the infamous “El Chapo,” the head of the Sinaloa Cartel. On the right is his wife, Emma Coronel. She married him when she was 18. He was 54 at the time, three times her age.

…

Enough said.

5. Communist Dictators

Living in a Communist utopia has its perks—especially if you’re the one in charge. It’s been known since the dawn of mankind that women are attracted to power. So, when you happen to monopolize all the power within the state, you know that you're pretty much guaranteed an unlimited supply of pussy.

Kim Jong-un of North Korea, just like his father before him, has the privilege of having a large pool of young harems designated as the "pleasure troupe" to entertain him. And even before the Kim dynasty, the aging chairman Mao was rumoured to have had a line of young women willing to pleasure him—often more than one at a time.

What's important to note here is that most—if not all—of these women probably did feel an immense attraction to their dear leaders. It's safe to say that no brute force was necessary to make these women worship them in bed.

6. ISIS Fighters

While millions of Syrians fled their country to escape from ISIS, these Austrian teens decided to go there to find their soulmates.

Given their worse-than-medieval treatment of women—not to mention their global reputation for barbarism and brutality—you would think that the so-called "Islamic State" would be the last place on Earth that any woman would venture to start a new life. But that’s exactly what hundreds of young women from the West have done.

Jihadi brides from the US and Australia posing with a BMW they’ll never be allowed to drive.

To be fair, some of these so-called ‘jihadi brides‘ have since regretted their utterly moronic decisions and have expressed their desire to return home. Whether or not their new husbands will grant them their wish is to be seen.

Conclusion

Seeing all this, I can already imagine many women (and some men) protesting that these are just a small minority of naive and “damaged” women who don’t represent the female population as a whole. However, study after study only confirm that the vast majority of women are indeed attracted to men with the traits listed above. This includes a study that examined the types of characters that women are attracted to on television shows and another study that was conducted with 35,000 people in 57 different countries.

With that, I think it’s safe to say that women are simply hard-wired with a deep subconscious desire for dark triad men on an evolutionary basis. No amount of denying or rationalizing will change that fact. The sooner that men realize this truth, the sooner their lives will improve.

Read More: The 4 Types Of Women

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

An Open Letter To Two New York Times Writers About The Future Of Masculinity

November 23, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I happened to come across this article in the New York Times recently, and realized immediately that I had to respond. The article ("Men's Lib!") was written by two individuals, Richard Reeves and Isabel Sawhill, who are described as "senior fellows" at the Brookings Institution.

It is so full of lies, misstatements, cowardly delusions, and deductions from inadequate premises, that my response here became something of a moral obligation.

This article will be an open letter in response to the authors. I hope you're listening, Richard and Isabel.

For those who harbored any doubt, the article represents nothing less than a declaration of war against the last vestiges of masculine virtue in the United States. Essentially, the idea here is that "men need to become more like women." In the words of the authors:

> The old economy and the old model of masculinity are obsolete. Women have learned to become more like men. Now men need to learn to become more like women.

The article drearily chronicles the marginalization of men from many sectors of American social life, such as the workforce and higher education. It continues with this bit of preaching:

> More men ought to be doing what women did historically: improving their > economic prospects by marrying well. With apologies to Jane Austen, even a man who is not in possession of a fortune will still be in want of a wife — ideally one who has a fortune of her own.

>
> The problem is that many men and women, disoriented by the shake-up of gender roles, are not marrying at all — less-educated adults, especially — resulting in a class-based marriage gap. Marriage rates among men under 35 have dropped by 23 percentage points since 1980.

Of course, the authors never pause to consider that the reasons why men are falling behind in so many fields is not because they won't "get with the program" but because their very nature and strengths are derived from things that a feminized society no longer values.

The falling birthrates in the West, as the authors see it, are simply due to male failure to "man up" and get with the new androgynous future.

Also shockingly myopic is the article's lack of historical depth. It purports to make grand, sweeping conclusions about the nature of gender roles based on the limited experience of America in the past 40 years.

But what about the past 100 years, the past 500 years, or the past 5,000 years of history? Have the authors surveyed that span of human history, to see what lessons might be there for the taking? Of course not. Because that would bring inconvenient truths to the fore.

What truths?

First, that societies built on traditional gender roles have been the unquestioned norm throughout all of history. Did you ever consider that institutions which have stood for thousands of years must have some merit? That they must have evolved for some valid reason?

What? Do you believe you can pit your own pathetic experience of 40 years on this earth with the cumulative wisdom of 10,000 years of human history? Do you not see this as the acme of arrogance?

Did it ever occur to you, authors, that your Brave New World of coming androgynization might be the last gasp of dying society, rather than the future?

Did it ever occur to you that stronger, healthier, more masculine societies might be the wave of the future, not sickly androgynous ones?

Did it ever occur to you that your destruction of your own men will open the gates of hell for you?

Did you ever stop and consider the reasons why men (and women) are growing more and more restless, and radicalized, as a result of your cruel suppression of their natures?

Who will be left to defend your pampered, effete, spoiled, androgynous existence when the masculine barbarians come to take what you have?

Who's going to defend you when your world begins to crumble? Well, who? Kaitlyn Jenner? Miley Cyrus?

Societies cannot long survive with falling birthrates and a denigration of traditional gender roles. Women need men as much, it not more, than men need women. If you destroy us, you bring down the entire building on your head.

Yes, you can use your rigged system here, your little charade, to steal jobs from us.

You can cook the books and pretend that men and women are equal. You can push us out of higher education. You can marginalize us from the military. You can insult us, denigrate us, lie about us, and call us obsolete.

You can do all of these things.

Instead of considering for an instant that the war against men has been a disaster for society, you want to double-down on the war. You want more androgyny. You want the complete eradication of male identity. Did it ever occur to you that the way forward might be a return to traditional roles? How is this "impossible," as you claim it is?

It is only "impossible" because it threatens your spoiled, soft way of life. You can't conceive of anything outside of it.

But I can.

Did it ever occur to you that the only reason this society has what it has, is because of the hundreds of years of traditional social structures that made it? Did you ever think that what you believe to be the "future" (androgyny) is only the last gasp of a dying society?

There will be a price to be paid for what you have done. And the price will be the end of your pampered little world. Oh, will there be a price!

No, you're not going to turn us into women. We're not going to be what you want us to be.

And I smell desperation in your pathetic little article. Your world is falling apart. And you know it. You want to get rid of us, but we're not going anywhere. The one doomed to extinction is you, and your pathetic world.

You know that men are opting out of your bullshit program. We aren't going to be slaves for your corrupt Orwellian society. Find someone else to hew the wood and carry the water. Let all these androgynous freaks that you love so much do the dirty work of policing the borders, defending against ISIS, and paying child support.

Without men, without real masculine men, this society will crumble and fall. America and Europe achieved what they achieved because of the thousands of years of traditional social structures which gave them life. Look now at Europe: decades of feminization of European men has left them totally demoralized and confused, and unable to resist the foreign attacks on their societies. This is your future, too.

And you know what? We will sit back and watch what happens. You wanted this world. You wanted this. You ignored our warnings. And now you're going to find out what it really means.

The family will fall apart. Marriage will fall apart. The martial virtues, which are the exclusive domain of men, will atrophy from lack of use. And what will happen to you then?

Do you not see, that by hurting us, you are sowing the seeds for your own destruction? No society, no civilization, has ever long been able to exist without being able to defend itself. By dismantling the traditional structures that gird the state itself—church, military, education, family—you have essentially destroyed the society itself.

The warning signs are all there, right before your eyes. You noted them all in your article. It should be a call to action. Men are being hounded into oblivion.

They are checking out of society. They are moving abroad. They are not reproducing with the sickening monstrosities that pass themselves off as "women" in this society. If necessary, they will revert to primitive tribalism. Who will be the slaves to run your factories then? Your precious advanced society will be no more.

You are cutting your own throat. If men go down, this whole society goes down too.

But the truth is that masculinity is coming back. Androgyny is not the wave of the future. Just the opposite. It is going to be seen for what it is: a degenerate ash-bin of history. There is an awakening around the world, and it is spreading. It is the realization that the past 40 years have been a complete disaster for both men and women.

Go preach androgyny to the hungry, aggressive mouths of the Third World, who are breeding people like you right out of existence. See how they laugh at you, before rolling right over you.

Women are miserable. Men are miserable. And it is because “senior fellows” like you at places like the Brookings Institution have no understanding of history or biology. You have tried to force us to be what you want us to be.

And we will not be this. We are coming back.

Masculinity of the old school is on the rise, in a denatured, more barbarous form.

Just you wait.

Read More: A Modern War Of Sword And Spirit

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Is Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau's Cabinet Discriminatory Against Men?

November 23, 2015 | by Hector Hérisson | Link | Original Link

The new Canadian Prime Minister vowed to achieve gender equality in his cabinet. And achieve gender equality he did. Half of the 30 ministers are women and a lot of them are visible minorities, which in Canada means that even though you might be a part of a small struggling community of Russian men, you don't count as a minority group because your skin is the wrong colour.

The obvious problem with having gender quotas is that they most likely create discrimination against the dominant group for no other reason than them being born with the wrong genitalia. I'm not one to believe that two wrongs make a right, so I'm not quite sure why Trudeau and his followers think that you can solve alleged discrimination by creating actual discrimination.

It seems to me that the way to eliminate discrimination is to enforce a strict meritocracy. If that results in a cabinet full of white men or full of black women or whatever, so be it. What matters is that they got the job because they were qualified, not because of a birth accident. Furthermore, if I were a woman, I couldn't help but wonder if I became a minister because of my qualifications or because of what I have between my legs.

Such is the paradox of women's quotas: to empower women, you have to tacitly admit that women are not good enough to rise up by themselves so they need a little boost from the establishment. Who, other than a feminist, would be misogynistic enough to believe that about women?

Quotas do not lead to equality

The worst thing about quotas is that they aren't applied equally throughout society. For example, there is a severe lack of male teachers and nurses but never do these equality advocates demand quotas in favour of men. Also, when it comes to jobs that aren't so safe, well paid, and prestigious as politician or CEO, like waste collectors (we call them garbage*men* for a reason), lumberjacks, sewer workers, and long distance truckers, to name a few, they are somehow perfectly content with having only an infinitely small minority of women doing these jobs.

It's usually at that point that the following argument comes up: women don't want these jobs! I'm sure they don't want them and I bet most men don't want them either. The reality is, they still have to be done. If women are so keen on participating equally to society, they'll have to pull their fair share of the weight there too.

Instead, we're running down a path where it would possible for a woman who has never picked up garbage once in her life to become the administrator of a public waste collecting company through gender quotas discrimination and essentially be given authority over men who are more qualified than her, simply because she has a vagina.

Women are overly represented in the cabinet

On October 19, the Liberal Party won 184 seats and 30 of these elected members of parliament (MPs) have been selected to become minister. Of these, only 50 are held by female MPs. It means that women represent a mere 26% of the elected MPs. Why then do they get 50% representation in the cabinet? Here's another way to look at it. If you're a female MP in Trudeau's party, you had 30% chance of becoming a minister, while your male colleagues only had 11% chance, for no other reason than pure discrimination. Talk about male privilege!

One might argue that it is only fair that women represent 50% of the cabinet members since they represent half of the population. This argument doesn't hold water. Ministers do not represent the population, the elected members of Parliament do. Women consistently participate in the democratic process at a higher rate than men and there are no systemic barriers preventing women from running for election, which is evidenced by the fact that there are plenty of women running for elections and that there has even been a female Prime Minister, Mrs. Kim Campbell.

Despite having all the same opportunities as men, women only manage to get themselves a representation of 50 MPs in the ruling party and 88 in total in the House of Commons, which incidentally also represents 26% of all the elected MPs.

This is not an attack against women. It has been well established by now that women in aggregate tend to make different career choices than men to more easily accommodate a family life. As someone whose grandfather used to be an MP, I can attest that the lifestyle of a politician is hard to conciliate with a family, because you're always away from home and most women don't want that. The point is, the low female representation is well explained by individual choices rooted in biology, not by systemic discrimination.

Conclusion

As with many things, it all comes down to equality of opportunity vs. equality of outcome.

Justin Trudeau’s progressive policies are an example of the latter. The scariest thing is not the rampant discrimination against men, but rather the erosion of meritocracy in Canada’s uppermost ruling body. Harper and the conservatives in general might have their flaws, but at least they didn’t play the identity politics game the Liberals are playing — and winning at the moment.

As the Sweden of North America, Canada is used to general silliness and feminist dogma in the political establishment, but I fear that the reign of Trudeau as PM will destroy what little remains of Canadian pride and respect on the international scene.

Read more: Canada’s Gamergate-Hating Prime Minister Learned Feminism From His Gold-Digging Mother

Hector Hérisson
Hailing from Canada's angriest French province, Hector is a young man currently taking head on the progressive nightmare that is university education. Return of Kings is his safe space, where he goes to escape the insanity of Orwellian social justice. He hopes to give back to the community by sharing his thoughts and perspectives on various topics.

5 Reasons To Avoid Women Who Drink Coffee

November 24, 2015 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

Look at pretty much any working woman and you will see an important companion, one that never leaves her: the coffee cup. It may be a loyal companion, but with each drop it makes her more unstable.

From a very early age, girls are becoming addicted to coffee. As the coffee drinking becomes more frequent and more sugary, it affects women in a way that coffee does not affect men. All these girls you see waiting in line will end up a wretched mess before they hit forty.

A while ago, I dated a girl who drank several cups of coffee each day. I noticed bizarre behavior and aggravated health problems, so I forbade her to touch coffee again. She recognized that she had a problem, but ended up sneaking in coffee runs anyway. Here are five problems I noticed with that experience and others:

1. Women Can’t Function Without The Drug

Between iPhones and coffee, the modern woman has completely forgotten how to do get anything done on her own. Years of Frappuccinos leave her dependent on a coffee (and sugar) pick-up just to wake up in the morning.

Caffeine is a problem for people who have high levels of anxiety—women. The caffeine in coffee releases serotonin and other hormones in the brain in the short term. But chronic intake of caffeine decreases serotonin levels in the body and inhibits hormonal functions.

The pick-up hormones give a woman's body an undeserved reward. She is being emotionally rewarded with her coffee. The high alertness, increased heart rate, and increase blood sugar make her life feel more exciting than it really is. It gives "mood states where people feel the need for coffee to keep themselves functioning properly."

2. Coffee Leads To Serious Diseases

Coffee inhibits iron absorption, which women are often deficient in. It increases chronic stress and decreases the hormone that the body uses to defend against the effects of aging and the manufacture of estrogen and testosterone.

This prematurely ages women. It also screws with estrogen levels. Just one cup a day causes estrogen dominance in women, which leads to obesity, menstrual irregularity, and serious diseases in the future.

3. Behavior Problems

It is important to practice moderation in all things. Heavy coffee drinkers exhibit behaviors of anxiety disorder and psychosis. “In turn, the coffee drinker becomes erratic, nervous, and irritable.”

From what I have seen, coffee addicts tend to be women. Women are constantly surrounded by magazines and tumblr photos that urge them to drink coffee. Magazines actually tell them coffee addictions are good for them.

Excessive coffee is also ingrained in women's social culture. Coffee in the morning, Starbucks trip with the girls during lunch, and a coffee run after work. In the 17th century, women petitioned against coffee for men. But today, it is women who have a problem.

The effects of coffee on a woman's behavior becomes more obvious over time. Women have greater sensitivity to caffeine, take longer to detoxify, and accelerate their countdown to menopause. Caffeine simply wastes their bodies, and the earlier they start drinking, the worse it gets.

One vice leads to another, and coffee-addicted woman turn to other drugs and behave like a prostitute. Smoking aggravates the effects of coffee. The pronounced hormonal problems makes her feel not like herself, suffering from depression and a lack of self-control and direction.

4. It Can Cause Weight Gain

Coffee increases estrogen metabolism in women at the sacrifice of other vital metabolisms such as carbohydrates and fat. The body consequently stops burning the fat.

But it is the incredibly sugary additives in coffee drinks such as those at Starbucks that really leads to obesity. Starbucks lures children with "Bananas & Crème Frappuccinos" with banana puree and whipped cream, and many women continue to drink such sugary drinks into adulthood.

Chronic coffee drinking also increases insulin resistance, which makes such drinks a “potential recipe for metabolic disaster.”

5. Poor Sexual Performance

Caffeine made female test animals more interested in sexual behavior. But those test animals had never drunk caffeine ever before. Caffeine is only useful for women who are not habitual drinkers. In fact, the hormonal deficiencies in women caused by coffee destroys her sexual motivation. Regular coffee drinking makes women cold and unpassionate lovers.

Coffee may be useful for men to boost testosterone levels and enhance their workout if used carefully. But for women, coffee should be used very sparingly. Society’s coffee trend is becoming a health epidemic and will lead to prematurely wasted women.

Read More: Coffee Is Good For Your Health

Amasa M. Lyman
Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

Why Becoming An Adventure Guide Is One Of The Best Jobs A Man Could Have

November 24, 2015 | by Adam Piggott | Link | Original Link

Maybe you're twenty-something years old and you don't like yourself. You don't know jack shit, you haven't got any money or prospects, you can't get girls, you're unfit and unhealthy, and you're stuck in a rut. What's worse is that you can't see a way out, and you're pretty sure that it's you; you're a loser and all the successful guys you see never had it as tough as you.

And you'd be wrong. The vast majority of us have been there, but very few bothered to make the most of those shitty times. You have few recognizable options. You could go to college and study some worthless degree while paying through the nose for doing so, all the while hoping that you'll just luck into some dream job when you finish. But you know enough by now to realize that college is just a dead end to nowhere. You could get a trade, (which I actually think is an excellent option), but you're no good with your hands and you don't relish the thought of soldering electrical wires for the rest of your life.

I was where you are right now. And I lucked upon one of the greatest ways to get paid and see the world while having the time of your life; working as an adventure guide. For fifteen years I traveled the world from Australia, to Canada, Africa, and Europe, while I worked as a whitewater rafting instructor. My peers became friends for life, I got paid to go to places that regular people pay eye-watering amounts of cash to get to, and I learned numerous skills that I have put to use in other jobs to great effect. And we got a hell of a lot of tail.

And it doesn't have to be rafting. You could be a SCUBA instructor, a climbing guide, a sea kayaking guide, a canyoning guide, a mountain bike guide, a ski instructor, the list goes on and on. You work in the great outdoors in some of the most beautiful places on the planet, your daily commute does not involve public transport, and you live and work in some of the biggest party zones in the world.

Surely this is hard to get into

So now you're sitting upright. You're wondering what you have to do to get in on this action. You're thinking that it must be blindingly hard to get one of these jobs; that people are lining up by the bucket-load to work in these industries.

Well, they're always hiring, and they're always looking for people to work for…not that much really.

And there's the catch. The money is usually pretty lousy. In some locations I did make decent coin, but a lot of the time we were doing it for the love of the job. That translates to, "the love of the lifestyle." And as I've tried to stress so far, the lifestyle is pretty bloody awesome.

This might turn you off, but think about it: right now your only option is to go heavily into debt for a useless college degree that you will hate. I'm offering you the chance to travel the world, get meaningful life skills, meet loads of girls, and get a really great tan. And you will make some money; just enough to get you a plane ticket to your next destination.

So what's the best way to go about it?

First, you need to get some basic skills in the discipline you hope to instruct. For example, if you want to be a rafting guide it would be a fantastic idea to learn how to whitewater kayak, which indecently is a macho sport that is great fun and healthy too. Find a club in your area, buy some second-hand gear, and get really good at it. By doing that you will make contacts, and through these contacts you will see doors start to open as possibilities and options emerge.

Isn't that what we were talking about at the start of this piece? A lack of options?

Back to your new career. Often you're offered a crappy job at this disreputable sounding outfit where you will be alternating between washing dishes and driving shuttle vehicles to the river. Take the damn job. When you get there you need to do a few things.

1. Work really hard.
2. Network, network, network.
3. Paddle your kayak only when you don't have an opportunity to sit in a raft (you wanted to become a rafting guide, right?)
4. Get on with the team and be humble.

Number four is the most important. At this stage in your budding guiding career, your knowledge is less than zero. You will be surrounded by skilled and confident professionals. You will inevitably feel insecure. You may well be very tempted to talk yourself up so you can compete on an equal level with your colleagues.

Don't, whatever you do, don't do this. They know you don't know shit. It's okay, really it is. Just keep your head down, ask questions, actually listen to what people tell you, take constructive criticism well even if you don't agree with it, and be humble.

Do you see what I mean about learning actual life skills? Getting on with the people you work with and being a valuable and contributing member of the team is what most of the dumb-shits coming out of college are missing. It's the number one skill that employers want, (that and turning up on time and not stealing).

It might take you a season or two, but eventually you'll get to the point where you're in charge of your own raft. It's like being a little mini-captain with your own passengers. They'll want to hear your jokes, they'll be depending on you to get them safely down the river, and you'll suddenly be living the dream.

Side Benefits

I left the best part of this until last. Do you go to the gym and see all those middle-aged fat guys desperately working out in an effort to reverse the tide? And you know just by looking at them that it's never going to happen. Because the fitness level that you obtain and keep in your twenties and early thirties is what you'll be able to reach for the rest of your life.

Being an adventure guide gets you in really great shape. Really amazingly great shape. I stopped rafting over five years ago, and I haven't really done that much exercise since then. I'm 44 years old and people ask me how much I work out. I never work out, but fifteen years of pushing a raft down a river gets you an amazing base fitness level.

Then of course there are the girls. Your frame will revolve around being an adventurer, world traveler, and rugged outdoors man. Women on holiday want to have a story to take back to work; they need to recount a juicy tale around the coffee machine. You will be the juicy tale.

If I had to return in time, back to my clueless twenty-year-old self, I would do it all over again. The years I spent guiding shaped my personality and made me the person that I am today. The question you need to ask yourself is, what sort of person do I want to be tomorrow?

Read More: The Greatest Adventure

Adam Piggott
Adam spent 15 years traveling the world as a rafting guide. He lived in Italy for 10 of those years where he was also a bar owner and consultant. He currently works in behavioral change and leadership development in Australia. His memoir of how he changed his life was published in August 2015 with the title, Pushing Rubber Downhill

Neomasculine Dialogue: “A New Beginning”

November 24, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following dialogue took place between myself (RV) and Quintus Curtius (QC) on May 28, 2015.

RV:

For an idea that is less than three months old, neomasculinity is getting a lot of exposure, and some of it has been quite heated, with even conspiratorial accusations levied against it. I did not expect such emotions.

QC:

Men commonly react with hostility to things that challenge their preconceptions. The congregation enjoys being berated, but less often enjoys being reformed. Meaningful doctrines are rarely built by committees or by the consensus of many; rather, they flow as output from the creative individual. We do not construct our worldviews around the opinions of the masses, but rather out of a consideration of the laws of history. The provenance of speculative thought is not to be found in the herd.

I found it amusing to hear the complaint that we were not advocating something “original.” What a strange statement! In the ethical and moral realms, very little is new except arrangement. Only a fool or a lunatic is completely original. And why is this? It is because it is difficult to be completely original without also being wrong. What has been proven true by experience also shows what is demonstrably false. The originality is found in the presentation of old ideas to new audiences, and this is something that requires skill. The originality of neomasculinity lies in the fact that it is both “progressive” and “retrogressive”: it looks back in time for the principles that have endowed men with worldly greatness, and at the same time, it looks forward to adapt those principles to the needs of the modern man.

The neomasculist ethic is the offspring of both old and new: the old elements are the traditional virtues of the past, such as stoicism, the acceptance of struggle, advanced problem solving, breaking through barriers, and the submerging of the identity in the idealistic pursuit of a goal. The new elements are simply the flexible, tactical means of achieving these traditional goals. And yet at heart it remains a corrective movement, in the sense that it seeks to restore a proper balance to a wildly unbalanced state of affairs.

RV:

While you would hate to see firm attacks against an idea you know is an improvement, it would be even more strange if there was no criticism at all. If something you introduced did not rouse the emotions of at least some men, that suggests you were taking a safe step to the side instead of one step forward, for it's forward movement that causes anxiety. It is not always pleasant to think of the future and the changes that are coming.

I see two big problems with the existing groups. The first is that they are unable to see beyond the tips of their noses. They usually have a firm grasp on the problems of today, but are not looking ahead, not even one year into the future. How quickly people forget the changes we have endured in the past ten years! But of course you would have to be thinking carefully of those problems for the past ten years, and based on that, make reasonable predictions of what will happen in the next ten. Existing groups were essentially ad-hoc, created spontaneously by the crowd with no defined purpose and no elders to navigate through the combustive cultural changes we're experiencing. I fail to see how they can adapt.

The second problem I noticed is that they don't give solutions that are sustainable. Game is an individual solution that will see less long-term benefits if the quality of women keep declining. Not only are you competing with more game-aware men, but you are competing for women who are getting more obese and deranged and seem to be more interested in virtual living through their smartphones than meeting decent men. Even expatriating is seeing less effectiveness as second and third-world countries become more Westernized.

Game and self-improvement is the individual solution, but without societal solutions that can also be applied, or solutions that are directly applied to women themselves, the decline will be so rapid that within only five years we may find ourselves in a situation where it will be difficult for men to improve their lot.

QC:

Virtuous men are those who take positive action to solve problems. They do not hide from the responsibilities of life behind a protective embankment of negativity.

Diagnosis is one-half of action; the other half is the cure. To go beyond merely identifying the ills of society, to hammering out a comprehensive individual solution: herein lies the great advance of neomasculinity over other systems of thought. It is sometimes necessary to robe old truths in contemporary garments, so that they may be more readily acceptable to men who do not have the leisure or inclination for speculative thought.

And I agree with your point about Westernization happening on a global scale. It is proceeding apace even now; soon it will be necessary for every man to arm himself with some form of neomasculine principles simply in order to maintain his sanity.

An unmoored generation finds itself caught in the turbulent interval between the collapse of the old world, and the advent of the new; the previous generations resigned themselves to corruption and luxury, and failed in their duty to protect the culture from the inroads of barbarism. Our ideas will become part of the new world which is currently taking shape. By helping create a cadre of men imbued with proper ways of thinking and conduct, we will be able to shape our environment. We aim to banish feelings of powerlessness, and inculcate in men a spirit of positive action.

RV:

You said that our ideas will become a part of the new world, but is this too optimistic? There is a part of me that is reluctant to cling onto hope, and while I wouldn't be embarking on this new path if I didn't have at least some hope that we can make the future better, lately I'm finding myself having to close my eyes and ears to the daily degradations the enemy is levying on our society.

Every day I can point out two news stories. The first shows us making one step forward, where someone, somewhere, unexpectedly resists the tide, and then the next story arrives and it's three steps backwards. All progress wiped out. Just the other day I read a story out of New York where two men were arrested on the subway for having their legs too far open, which just a couple months ago was the latest feminist attempt to criminalize male behavior. Two men were legally punished for a trifling feminist cause, and this is disheartening.

But I will say that even if you told me there is no hope, and that we will only change one male life, I wouldn't stop teaching the cure that is needed, because unlike so many other men, I can't "enjoy" the decline. I can't enjoy a city or a woman with the knowledge that in a short time this enjoyment will become impossible. In that case it may be better not to enjoy it at all.

Fighting is the only option, until the very end. With neomasculinity we must put forward the solutions, as intelligently and clearly as we can and then pray for a little good fortune that the wind will fill our sails and move our boat through turbulent waves to affect the world in a way that merely doing nothing does not.

QC:

Yes, this is well and truly said. It is understandable, and perhaps forgivable, that many of our brothers see a voluntary withdrawal from society as almost the only rational course. And no doubt, those looking for daily examples of injustice can find them all too easily. They are all around us: evil is of old date, and multiplies with geometric fury. Yet defeatism is unbecoming of a man.

History is replete with examples of minorities acting, against unfavorable odds, as the catalysts for positive change. The truth cannot be denied forever: an edifice built on a foundation of sand must, sooner or later, obey the inescapable laws of historical gravity. Remember that the greatest mass movements in history were begun by a conviction born of blind faith, supported by the winds and currents of fortune. We go the way that our convictions take us, and adopt the assurance born of instinct. Even modest success can be achieved just by showing men that there is an explanation for their predicament, and a prescription for their health.

And as you say, some men are constitutionally incapable of kow-towing to what they know to be lies and hypocrisy. At some point, a stand must be taken; at some point, lines must be drawn in the sand, or else there will be nothing left to defend. We also know—if I can paraphrase a famous Churchill quote here—groups that go down without a fight never rise again; and those groups which exert their zealous energies to advance their causes always rise again.

Positive labor in the service of a noble ideal is never wasted. There is always something that can be done, and there is always one more thing left to do. We refuse to abdicate our responsibility to preserve the ethics and culture of our civilizational heritage. We will not let their lies and corruptions go unchallenged. Certain things we cannot accept, and will never accept.

RV:

The balance, I believe, is to propose the big solutions for the future while teaching men the individual solutions for the present, because if we were to be honest, it's highly unlikely that all our present problems will be pleasantly and smoothly resolved within our lifetimes. Judging from my travels through Europe, we still have a way to go before the bottom is hit.

For men who want to start a family, there is a clock working against them, so sitting and waiting is not acceptable. We must help these men figure out how to realize their needs. At the same time, there are younger men who are filled with testosterone and cannot be bothered to think in terms of family. Instead, they want to fornicate to relieve a sex urge that, if not fulfilled, can be debilitating to a man's normal functioning.

While it will be far easier to help the vigorous man than the one who has passed his sexual peak, they will both be served by neomasculinity. A reader may see a contradiction of using game to serve the young man while advocating for tradition on the older, and how game, when applied for ego gratification or entertainment, can be corrupting, but it must be understood that in the modern era, the man without serious game practice won't even be able to find and keep a woman to create a family with. Game is the big metal gate through which men must pass to experience what their fathers and grandfathers so easily did.

We may have to segment men based on the stages of life they are in, the "young" neomasculist who seeks practical advice to improve his life, and the "old" neomasculist who seeks deeper meaning and understanding. It seems to me that serving the young will be far easier than the old.

QC:

Every stage of a man's life will be adequately served by the neomasculist core principles. Every man will project on to these principles that which serves him best. For just as children born from the same parents may acquire different looks and mannerisms, so too does each person contain within him perennial movements of the passions, and individual qualities, that may make him emphasize one point of neomasculist doctrine over another.

Especially important for us is to ground our doctrines on actual experience. Francis Bacon warned us that error can arise from three sources: "idols of the tribe" (fallacies common to all men), "idols of the cave" (shortcomings in an individual man), and "idols of the market-place" (errors that arise from a man's interactions with others). In your neomasculinity article, you were careful to derive each principle not from theory, but from actual practice. I believe this is important.

What is also important is that now, at least, we have a comprehensive guide that offers a realistic alternative to what is presented to us by the mass media. At least now there is a program of action, however imperfect it may be. Even the most intrepid travelers need a guide. Our goal, I think, should be that neither worldly cares, journeys, or ill health should ever hinder us from practicing these principles. Success in these matters seems to come more from diligent practice and study, than from an inheritance from Nature.

What, may I ask, do you find to be the most encouraging signs you now see, as far as the popular culture is concerned?

RV:

The main encouraging sign I see is that the establishment has lost its stranglehold upon their controlled bullhorn. The fact that our dialogue will be read by thousands of men within a month of its publication is proof that "dangerous" ideas can quickly, efficiently, and cheaply find the minds of men who value them. If the establishment was still the sole gatekeeper to media publishing like they were before the internet, our reach could only be locally based, perhaps within a small men's club, but now it's global. This tells me that the internet, for all of its disruptive influence, is the main tool we have in exposing corruption and lies, and without it this conversation may not have even taken place.

The upside leads to an immediate downside: we're not the only ones releasing ideas. With so much media content being published by both the establishment and independent creators, there is tough competition to grab a person's attention in the face of unlimited options, and the fact that we've already been attacked shows that other groups don't want us speaking to their existing followers. This means that, ironically, we'll at some point have to mimic media establishment tactics to create more appealing offerings that make us more like them. When men encounter an article or video on the internet, they make a snap judgement on its presentation, and if that judgement says "amateur quality" then we have lost a key opportunity.

While it's tempting to jump into things with big plans, I'm certain we should move slowly. For every idea we put out there, we must listen to men and see what their thoughts and concerns about it are. Yet there still has to be some friction to what we're presenting, because only through conflict and debate can the right ideas and arguments rise to the top, and have them last for generations.

QC:

This is most certainly true. It seems to me that a suitable analogy can be found in how the muscular contractions of the human heart push oxygenated blood through the body. This systole and diastole of debate over ideas will act to circulate neomasculist doctrines within the collective body of our readership, in the same way that the beating of the heart circulates blood in the human body.

And with regard to ideas, yes, what is unfamiliar requires time to assimilate. Experience and time will reveal what is acceptable and useful, and what is not.

What is most important is that men remain steady and confident in the face of the great external challenges that are almost daily imposed on them. They must remember that they are the bearers of a great tradition, and the inheritors of an esteemed mantle. Man was created for great things, and he must make his way in reliance on this fact. We should be mindful of Cicero's words in his treatise "On Laws" (I.7.22): "The animal we call man, who has foresight, wisdom, perspicacity, sharpness, memory, and a bounty of reason and counsel, was created by the supreme deity for a supreme position. Of all the living beings in nature, he is the only one who partakes of nature's reason."

This to me conveys our responsibility admirably. I know of nothing that has as much power to console as the contemplation of this idea.

RV:

While it will be hard to remain steady in the face of rapid change never before seen in the history of humanity, let us now do our best to provide the guidance and knowledge that men need to survive these times. I hope we retain both the strength and energy to improve the lives of men for decades to come.

This dialogue was originally published on RooshV.com.

Visit Next: Poznan Institute – The Official Home Of Neomasculinity

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why You Should Avoid This Fundamental Mistake With Women At All Costs

November 25, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A fatal error that too many men make in their pursuit of women is arguably not related to 'game' at all, but rather to social interaction. The error is this: failing to approach and interact when you see a solid indication of interest (IOI).

Whether you are looking for a girlfriend or simply to achieve more experience with women, when you are sure that a girl likes you then you absolutely must approach and talk to her. Doing so will not only most likely yield a sexual or romantic benefit, but it will also improve your self-confidence as a man.

Recognising Indicators of Interest (IOIs)

The first step, then, is for you to learn to recognise when a woman in genuinely interested in you. For the newbie this is perhaps easier said than done. For one thing, IOIs can be extremely subtle as women are not given to telegraphing their interest too overtly. We are all aware of the cliched actions that are meant to signal female attraction (hair-flicking and so on), but here is a handy list of the most likely IOIs you will encounter:

- Sustained eye contact

- Double take eye contact, where she looks at you, looks down, and then looks again as she passes
- Moving to stand near you even if she's not looking at you
- Talking loudly to draw attention to herself
- Flushed skin
- Dilated pupils
- Light, non-sexual touches, such as on the arm of the elbow
- Her feet facing towards yours in a standing conversation
- If seated, and her legs are crossed, her knees pointing towards you
- Her paying more attention to what you have to say than anyone else in the group
- Her initiating conversation with you, or asking questions

Without a doubt, the most important indicator is eye contact, in all its glorious forms. Like most players I've had to grind it out over the years and put the work in converting initially skeptical girls with my scintillating wit and downright dirty flirtation, but once in a while I've had success handed to me on a plate. On those occasions, I could tell instantly that the girl in question was attracted to me simply by her eye contact.

What you should be looking out for is hard to describe but easy to spot. It's that 'rabbit caught in the headlights' look, when a girl appears simultaneously surprised, curious, and almost shocked, as though she is seeing someone she half-recognises that she wasn't expecting to run into.

If you are the lucky recipient of such a glance then you must act quickly and go and talk to her.

The Hungarian "Rabbit In The Headlights"

Here's how I met Eva, a former girlfriend of mine. Eva was cute, slim-but-curvy, worked in a bank in the financial district in London and taught Zumba part time. She also had a great ass.

I first clapped eyes on her on the subway as I was going home from work one day. For whatever reason—perhaps because I'd been out talking to a lot of women at the time, and so had that post-game glow about me—she spotted me and fixed me with the most obvious "rabbit in the headlights" glance I've ever seen. Now, I had to go out that night and so I was in a hurry. Still, I could see that this was a gift from heaven and that I had to approach her. Unfortunately the train was packed and I couldn't get near, so I waited until the next stop (Sloane Square) where I saw her get out.

Thinking quickly, I jumped off the train to and hot-footed it in pursuit. The station was busy and so I followed her at a slight distance until she'd passed through the ticked barriers. Summoning up my game courage (because unfortunately approach anxiety never really goes away, no matter how many times you've done it), I ran in front of her in true London daygame style. She clearly recognised me but fixed me with a slightly stern look, clearly not having expected to see me again. I then spat the following piece of world-class game.

"Hey. I just saw you on the train and I thought you were really cute and so I just had to come and say hi. My name's Troy."

We shook hands and started talking. She was quite frosty at first, telling me she was on her way to a yoga class. I said that I didn't want to take up too much of her time and held out my phone, telling her to punch her number in, which she did. We then went our separate ways. The whole interaction took maybe three minutes at most, and it wasn't particularly sparkling, but it didn't matter. The look she'd given me had been unmistakable—I knew she was into me. My job was simply to approach her and not mess up. Everything else would fall naturally into place.

Sure enough, the next week we went for a drink. Pretty soon we were kissing and I'm not being self-congratulatory (because believe me I get plenty of knock-backs too) when I say that she was as turned on as I've ever seen a girl on a first date. Her face was flushed and she was moaning as she kissed me. She didn't come back to my place that night (like a good EE girl, she made me wait), but when we did finally have sex it was every bit as hot as I knew it would be.

… And All Those Times When I Didn't Follow Up on IOIs

To reiterate, the point of that story is not to self-aggrandise, but simply to demonstrate that by following up on a very obvious IOI I was able to initiate a very pleasurable experience for me and Eva. Had I not acted then we would never have spoken and consequently never got together. Even when a girl is strongly attracted to you, in most cases she won't do anything about it and so it's your job to initiate.

I'm not saying I never drop the ball. There have been many times that I've failed to follow up on IOIs, and I've always regretted it. And as the saying goes, rejection is better than regret. It's always better to get blown out than not to approach at all and wonder how things might have worked out. Because while you will forget rejections pretty quickly (I can barely remember them the next week) you will remember "might have beens" for years.

Here's just one example. Around eight years ago I was in an upscale club in London with some friends, on the prowl. As we walked across the dance floor a quite stunning girl clocked me and gave me the "rabbit in the headlights" look. Given how attractive she was I was not quite able to believe she'd checked me out, but one of my mates confirmed it, saying "did you see the way she looked at you?" Fear and hesitation prevented me from approaching her immediately, and by the time I had plucked up the courage to do so she had disappeared into the crowd. I never saw her again.

The fact that I still remember this fleeting incident despite having met many other girls since should tell you something.

When The Universe Presents An Opportunity You Must Always Take It

When you see that “rabbit in the headlights” look, or are otherwise getting solid IOIs from a girl, then you must take the bull by the horns and approach. Life can be pretty hard and things generally aren’t handed to us on a plate, so when they are we should be both thankful and proactive.

By the way, don’t fall into the trap of thinking that responding to IOIs “isn’t really game.” Sure, there’s the old concept of “fools mate” which denigrates going after obviously-interested women.While it’s true that you can’t rely on meeting strongly interested girls all the time as a strategy, life’s really too short for you to concern yourself with such things. And anyway, if you are getting obvious IOIs out there then it is likely because your holistic “game” is strong in terms of your appearance, body language, fashion, frame and so on.

So don’t make the fundamental mistake of leaving money on the table—when a girl makes it clear she’s interested in you, approach her. Go in strongly and confidently and tell her that you find her attractive and want to get to know her. If you don’t, you’ll only regret it afterwards.

Read More: What No One Tells You About Approaching Girls In Your Social Circle

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

3 Reasons Women Stay With Abusive Men

November 25, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: I am in no way, shape, or form, advising men to become physically abusive toward women. This article is simply pointing out a few reasons why females are drawn to abusive and violent men.

We've all heard stories about women who are in relationships with physically abusive men. During such conversations statements like "She must have low self esteem," or "She must have some sort of mental illness" are the usual discussed reasons she doesn't leave the relationship.

Granted, there may be some truth to those and other statements like them. But men who have a good understanding of the true nature of women know that in this day and age, it is that very nature combined with the degenerate feminist culture we're currently entrenched in that contributes to their decision to stick around.

I'm going to give three reasons most women (and men for that matter) would never openly lend credence to.

3. It's a turn on

1.

Call me crazy butttttttt I would let Chris Brown beat me up anyyyy day

1 minute ago via Twitter for iPhone ☆ Favorite ↻ Retweet ↩ Reply

2.

Everyone shut up about Chris brown being a woman beater... Shiiiittt he can beat me up all night if he wants 3.

Not gonna lie.. I think I'd let Chris Brown beat me #sosexy #lovehim #awkwardtweet #dontevencare

Not surprised in the least

Women are aroused by violent men whether they admit it or not. It doesn't matter if that violence is legal (boxing, MMA, etc) or if it's turned onto them, men who trade in violence, domestic, professionally, or otherwise, moisten the panties of females.

Of course females would never say this out loud. A girl would never tell her friends "My physically abusive boyfriend scares the shit out of me but it turns me on" lest she make herself look bad and be subjected to a battery of questions and furtive glances.

But we here in the 'sphere know the truth. Anyone who doubts this needn't look any further than the case of Chris Brown. He's the butt of plenty of jokes but his career hasn't suffered. In fact, since he beat the shit out of Rihanna, his celebrity has increased exponentially as most of his fans are females.

Buzzfeed and Huffington Post both posted articles in the wake of what they described as "disturbing reactions" to Brown's domestic abuse charges. They were just beside themselves with befuddlement as to why women would openly admit to being aroused by Brown's violence toward women.

It should come as no surprise to anyone here the two reconciled at one point when Rihanna decided to "put the incident behind her." But their torrid love affair is hardly the tip of the iceberg. Women have always been drawn to violent men. From women who fall for serial killers, to females who date, and even marry men behind bars this phenomenon is nothing new.

Girls can say whatever they want but their biology will always win out in the end.

2. Excitement

Put simply, women would rather be in an abusive relationship than a boring one.

When a female is in a boring relationship, it’s not long before she wants out. Women crave excitement, fun, and unpredictability. If they’re not getting it from their men, they’ll eventually find it somewhere else.

However, when a female is in a physically abusive relationship, there is very little boredom. No, there’s no fun in getting her ass beat, but the adrenaline rush that comes with the unpredictability of her lover’s volatile mood keeps her on her toes and for better or worse it keeps her around.

[image]
Battered women are never bored

My ex wife’s grandmother was married to an alcoholic who was extremely abusive. She told us plenty of stories about the late night shouting matches and beatings she took at his hands when he stumbled in at all hours of the night pissed off about this or that for little to no reason.

And at the end every story she told us about him she’d smile, shake her head, and with a slight chuckle say “never a dull moment with that one!” without fail. But what blew my socks off was when she told us she never stopped loving him even after he died.

Women might not always choose, or get the chance to choose between boredom and violence when it comes to their men. But you can bet your ass their southern regions would respond much more strongly to the latter.

1. Depedestalization

This ain’t happening in abusive relationships

Putting today’s woman on a pedestal is one of the quickest ways to move to the bottom of her totem pole of potential suitors. The reason for this is that females in this part of the world are worshiped from birth by males.

So when a man exhibits similar reverence in her presence it doesn't arouse her because she's quite literally desensitized to that kind of attention. She's been getting it all her life and get it whenever she wants. It's human nature to take something for granted if it's readily available to us and male idolatry is no different.

Women in abusive relationships are well aware that their assailants don't worship the ground they walk on. The moment he strikes her it becomes crystal clear he doesn't give a damn about hurting her feelings and couldn't care less about pissing her off.

Thanks to feminism, this utter disregard for her mental and physical well being is twisted into being viewed as a commodity by the warped and unhealthy female mind. She'll never think to herself "my boyfriend hits me so this is a good thing and I will stay with him." Subconsciously, however, she is drawn to him because he is unafraid to impose his will on her and violence is the end all, be all in that respect.

Conclusion

We all know that sluts are off limits when it comes to long term commitment. Abused women fall into that same category. Try all you want but short of beating the crap out of her you will never be as exciting, unpredictable, or as volatile as her past lovers.

There are plenty of women out there who are devoted to men who have never laid a hand on them. But the level of devotion that battered women have for their abusers is far beyond that of their untouched counterparts.

Read Next: Women In Their Prime Prefer Sex With Damaged Men

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Wells Fargo Indoctrinates TV Viewers With Pro-Immigrant Propaganda

November 25, 2015 | by Gene Hammer | Link | Original Link

Wells Fargo uses blatant pro-immigration themes to recruit illegal aliens to open accounts at its U.S. branches. The commercial below paints a rosy picture of what anchor baby families look like two generations down the road. Immigrants are depicted as the best of all worlds—assimilated in the right ways, but still grounded in their Mexican heritage. It is straight fiction designed to indoctrinate those without significant personal experience with illegal aliens.

This is intended to be a "slice of life" of an immigrant family. Just an ordinary day where the teenage daughter brings home her first paycheck to a finely appointed house bustling with people from different generations.

English and Spanish are heard in equal measures. Sometimes a combination of the two languages is used within the same sentence. Wells Fargo's message is if we just let illegals join our society, partake in the endless buffet of handouts, and go without judgment for speaking Spanish at home and in public, they will develop into the immensely proficient and impressive people we see in this ad.

The breakdown

The cast of supporting characters starts with grandma, the original immigrant who is still very ethnic in demeanor and language. She raised her children right (including either the dad or mom we see next) and now she enjoys the benefits of the lifestyle those children were able to earn.

As we see from the mom, this is a family highly focused on education. So much so, that mom is concerned her daughter's work may interfere with her studies. They have it all—a close-knit supportive family, appreciation of hard work, and prioritization of school. It's the perfect environment to raise children and participate in the American dream, and Wells Fargo won't let us forget for a second that this fertile ground started from Mexican immigrant origins.

While a liberal marketing team might have created this ad in part to promote amnesty with an idyllic immigrant family, there is probably a more insidious and profit-hungry motivation for the commercial. Wells Fargo lets illegal aliens open bank accounts by providing an ITIN instead of an SSN. Illegals do not risk identification and deportation by creating a Wells Fargo account. Many illegals are unaware of this, and hold their earnings in cash. This is an untapped market that Wells Fargo and others want a piece of.

By portraying itself as immigrant-friendly, Wells Fargo jumps to the top of the list when illegal aliens decide where to deposit their money. Another possible benefit for Wells Fargo is an increase in ATM and overdraw fees. If the consumers can't speak the language, they are less likely to understand the small actions that might nickel and dime them.

The end result

The result of successful liberal indoctrination on immigration is this: more families that liberals tell us are just like the one in this ad, but that in reality are drains on society. While liberals may do a lot of hand waving to distract from what a typical illegal alien family looks like in its home, the truth finds its way out.

The truth comes out in the form of schools flooded with Spanish speaking students that bring down the achievement of the entire class. In the form of parents either unable or insufficiently interested to assist their children with the mountains of busywork called "homework" they get each night. In the form of new curious diseases spreading among school children. In the form of foodstamp and WIC resources being funneled into the abyss. In the form of expanded r-selected ghettos, where the girl in this ad is more likely to jump on the quinceanera carousel and bring home a baby bump instead of a paycheck from an above-board business.

Wells Fargo is in it for profit first, and feel-good moral posturing second. This ad accomplishes both, and should make those who care about the future of the U.S. sick. Here are two bonus Wells Fargo ads showing a pattern of pandering to minorities:

First, Wells Fargo continues at high speed down the diversity track with its #HashtagLunchbag commercial.

In this "based on a true story" ad, we see Team Diversity in action being charitable and making the world a better place. The squad is mostly Hispanic, but with some blacks and an Asian thrown in for good measure. They spend their time and money feeding the homeless. The only white person who gets face time is the decrepit homeless recipient of the minorities' goodwill. This commercial is a true distortion of reality, designed to advance the liberal narrative of white = bad, nonwhite = good.

Finally, Wells Fargo tips its cap to gays and blacks with this ad that features an earnestly striving gay latino, and depicts a black man as the highest status person in the room.

The shoes, the rise of the pants, the ringtone choice, and the diminutive frame all scream gay, but not in an obnoxious way. Wells Fargo does not want to portray him as anything other than a positive contributor to society. In fact, we see him as a hungry go-getter, eager to get started on the path to success. And as a true mark of a superior person, he uses both English and Spanish in the same call.

As the phone rings for a final time, disrupting the room, the three white people look up with expressions varying between annoyance and anxiousness. Then it cuts to the relaxed, impeccably dressed, and non-threatening looking black man. Oozing amused mastery, he chuckles at the protagonist in a friendly manner.

Wells Fargo has gone all in on diversity. White people are nonexistent or reduced to low status props. Minorities are invariably depicted positively. Wells Fargo apparently is going for the demographic future of America, along with all the liberal self-abnegating white people who eat this stuff up.

Read More: Immigrant Single Mother Demands More Than $1,000 A Month In Welfare

Gene Hammer
Gene Hammer's blog RedPillAds analyzes television commercials from the viewpoint of a red pill aware man.

5 Ways To Start Fighting Back Against The Onslaught Of Liberalism

November 26, 2015 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

After taking the red pill, one tends to become cynical. All around us there is degeneracy; in the news, on the streets, in our literature, and in our media. It's infesting the minds of our youth, and it's getting worse every day.

"Will this degeneracy ever end?" "Will we go the way of the Roman Empire?" "Will we enter into a new era, as Huxley and Orwell predicted?" These thoughts race through the minds of unplugged men at a blisteringly fast pace.

The truth is, we don't know for sure what will happen, my friends. The gargantuan beast that is liberalism seems to have an endless supply of foot soldiers to do its bidding, an infinite amount of idiotic pawns, and an unfathomable amount of power. It may very well end up taking over the world, ushering in a new era of femininity…or it may usher in a new era of masculinity, as those who see the truth begin to fight back.

In the words of Steven Covey: "Proactive people focus their efforts on their Circle of Influence. They work on the things they can do something about: health, children, and problems at work." So, let us focus on the things that we can do to stop this plague of political correctness and deviant behavior; this is the only way that it will ever come to an end. Do not spend your days focusing on how horrible the monster is, but rather focus on what you can do to slay the beast.

Here are five things that you can start doing right now to wage war against the blight of progressivism:

1. Embody masculinity

“For me life is continuously being hungry. The meaning of life is not simply to exist, to survive, but to move ahead, to go up, to achieve, to conquer.” -Arnold Schwarzenegger

We want to eliminate all weaknesses; a major weakness is hypocrisy. Despite the leftists’ rampant contradictions, denial, and hypocrisy, they will gleefully point flaws out in us and play the victim card when we call them out on theirs. We must eliminate all of the discrepancies between what we practice and what we preach.

You preach about the values of masculinity, but aren’t even physically strong? Fix that. You talk about the value of confidence and integrity, but are meek and talk behind others’ backs? Fix that. You talk about the importance of game, but aren’t actively practicing it in your relationships? Fix that. Do all that you can to embody the archetypal man; not only is this good for you in and of itself, but it will also make it far more difficult for feminists to attack you.

2. Take control of your finances

“Beware of little expenses. A small leak will sink a great ship.” -Benjamin Franklin

You will never be a free man until you are out of debt and have your finances in order. As long as you depend on someone else for your earnings, you will never be free to say what you wish or act as you wish. Even if you're only taking baby steps, do something; everyone has to start somewhere.

If you haven't already, start by getting out of debt—this in and of itself is a gargantuan task for many Americans. Create a budget: figure out how much you earn each month and how much you spend. If you're spending more than you earn, cut back. Stop wasting a bunch of money on stupid shit like cable TV, expensive dates with women who you barely know, or your 10th pair of Nikes.

Once you're out of debt, start saving money for the future; you never know when you will be blindsided. Case in point: about three years ago, I was unexpectedly hit with a false rape accusation; I had to shell out for a lawyer to avoid going to jail. This is just one of the many injustices that could easily happen to you, so start saving.

Once you have some money saved, start working towards becoming self-employed by generating alternative sources of income. There are many ways in which you can do this: Fiverr, day trading, freelancing, and consulting just to name a few. Do whatever you have to do to attain 100% control over your financial life.

3. Don't argue with idiots

"Never argue with an idiot. They will only bring you down to their level and beat you with experience." -George Carlin

Back when I had just begun to see the problems in our society, I felt as if I had a duty to share this knowledge, and rightly so. However, rather than making an effort to only converse about the detriments of feminism with people who are on the verge of swallowing the red pill, I tried my damnedest to convince closed-minded morons of the truth.

I very quickly learned that it was a fool's errand.

You will never convince hardcore leftists of the follies of their beliefs; they simply don't listen to logic. Every statistic, example from history, or analytical piece of evidence that you present will be met with an emotional appeal of some sort; a plea to victimhood, framing you as an uncaring bastard, or a simple ad hominem.

So, rather than trying to convince brainwashed liberals why they should change, try to sway those who are on the fence to join your cause. The second that you realize somebody is having an emotional response to what you're saying, point it out; if they acknowledge their mistake, continue your discussion. If they don't, literally just stop talking and walk away. Some people are so entrenched in their own ideologies and thought patterns that you can do absolutely nothing to save them. Focus on saving the people that you CAN save.

4. Boycott everything which supports feminism, liberalism, or progressivism

"Every time you spend money, you're casting a vote for the kind of world you want." -Anna Lappé

Changing the minds of others is a great way to fight back against the scourge of liberalism. However, there comes a point where you must vote with your dollars. Hit the feminists where it hurts the most. Stop watching the NFL. Don't watch biased, liberal news stations. Rather than supporting massive conglomerates, which almost always have feminized, politically correct workplaces, buy produce from your local farmer's market, to support hard working men in your area.

Instead of pirating a manosphere ebook, actually buy it so that you can play your part in creating a stronger demand for masculine literature. Cancel your membership to Planet Fitness and join a local power-lifting gym. There's plenty of ways that you can vote with your dollars, even if you don't have that many.

5. Treat women like they should be treated

"A man's word is his honor. The feminine says what it feels. A woman's word is her true expression in the moment." -David Deida

Treat women as if they're emotional little children; they are, after all. This doesn't mean to abuse them or treat them poorly, it simply means to acknowledge the limits of their intellectual capacity.

Learn what shit tests are and how to pass them. Learn how to tell when a woman wants to be kissed. Learn how women think so that you can better game them. Stand up for yourself. If a woman talks shit to you, don't just cower away like a dog with its tail tucked between its legs. Be open with your sexuality; if you see a sexy woman, don't hesitate to hit on her, tease her, and express the fact that you're attracted to her with your body language and facial expressions.

Most importantly, however, encourage your woman to act feminine. Reward her when she is feminine, and punish her when she acts masculine (don't take her out to dinner, don't buy her things, express explicit verbal disapproval, or even kick her out of the house if she won't stop).

In summary, we must all do our part in fighting the horde of degeneracy which is invading our once great Western culture. Some men have the power to influence politics, some have large amounts of money which they can put to use, and some run blogs. I understand that not everyone has the resources or the time to do these things. Everyone can, however, implement the five principles which I have laid before you, and for the sake of the West, I hope that you do.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 3 Ways To Fight Back Against The Feminist Tidal Wave

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

How To Buy Your First Handgun

November 26, 2015 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

In these troubled times, a man should be armed. The best solution for achieving peaceful living is avoiding trouble, having good locks on your doors, and owning firearms. The specific needs (and wants) a person has for a firearm will vary from person to person, and, while no single gun will be the magic bullet to take care of them all, a good handgun will address most of them. If you're in the market for a handgun, especially for your first one, there are a few things you should remember.

No gun will do it all

You need to decide what you want from the gun. Do you want to carry it for mobile self-defense? Do you want to leave it at home (or in your vehicle) for defense of home invasion or carjacking? Do you want to hunt, or do competition shooting? Will it be a backup gun for something else or the primary weapon? What are the laws in your state or province?

All of these questions should dictate towards what you choose. Larger handguns tend to hold more rounds, recoil less, have more neat features to aid in shooting, have better sights with a longer sight radius (distance between the front and back sights; longer is better) and tend to be easier to hold on to and shoot more accurately and faster.

Smaller handguns hold fewer rounds, recoil more than their larger brothers chambered for the same cartridge, are typically a little more Spartan in their features, and have more rudimentary sights that are closer together. Shooting a smaller handgun results in more recoil, longer times to get back on target, and a less forgiving weapon that makes you work more for accuracy.

A bunch of Glocks. Carry pistols have shorter barrels, shorter grips (and magazines), and recoil more, but they're easier to hump around all day.

Home defense, car guns, and competition handguns are usually a semi-automatic, large pistol of a decently powered cartridge. Carry weapons are usually small semi-automatic pistols, or small revolvers, both shooting cartridges on the smaller end of the power range, while hunting handguns are usually large revolvers or semi-auto pistols shooting magnum cartridges.

What is good for you may not be good for others

Even if you're a one-man army and don't have to worry about getting a handgun your girl can use, any time anyone recommends any firearm to you, they are speaking from their own experience and not yours. What suits my hands and my eyes might not suit yours, and what feels good to me may not match you. The absolute best thing you can do is shoot a bunch of handguns before you buy one, and the best way to do that is have a friend with guns that will take you to the range for an afternoon. And, dudes, if you are that friend with the guns, it's practically your duty to help your brother out so that he may learn and teach those who need his help in his turn.

Can you rack the slide on a given semi-auto pistol? Can you break it down for cleaning? Will you have the discipline to get multiple magazines and swap them occasionally so they are not left loaded forever? Would you rather have a gun that you can lightly oil, load, and put in a drawer and not touch for a year? How do you take recoil? How good is your vision and do you want night sights, a light, or a laser sight? Do you want a safety? What kind of trigger pull? All of these are good questions to ask yourself, and anyone else that will be routinely using the handgun, before you buy.

Revolvers And Semi-Automatic Pistols

A handgun is a firearm held in the hand. A revolver is a manual action handgun with a revolving cylinder of multiple firing chambers, and a semi-automatic (or autoloading) pistol is a firearm that holds multiple rounds in a magazine in the grip and uses the recoil or some of the propellant gas to operate the action. Some people use the term "pistol" to mean any handgun and others use it to mean semi-automatic handgun only.

Pick your poison; both will do the job.

Revolvers come in varying sizes and can have a barrel of moderate length all the way down to a 2-inch “snub nose.” The length of the barrel and the sight radius help in accurate shooting (longer is better), but the revolver is lighter and easier to conceal with a short barrel set-up. Smaller framed revolvers have 5 shots, larger frames have 6, and some magnum frames have 8.

The most commonly used revolver ammunition out there today is the 38 special and the 357 magnum. Despite the number difference (both are actually .357 inch diameter (or caliber) bullets), the two cartridges shoot the same bullets, and a revolver chambered in 357 magnum can shoot the less powerful (and less expensive) 38 special round. The magnum round is longer than the other, and prevents it from being chambered in a pistol not set up for it. Never attempt to shoot any magnum ammo from a handgun not rated for it; it can and will blow up in your hand.

Revolvers come in three action types: single action only, double action only, and single/double action. Single action only requires you to cock the hammer each time, and has a nice, short, crisp trigger pull. Double action has a long trigger pull, but cocks the hammer for you. Single/double allows you to choose either and is the most solid choice.

Semi-automatic pistols come in large and small sizes as well. Smaller sized semi’s come in variants of 5 to 8 shots, and the larger frame semi’s of up to 18 or so. Longer barrels and better sights with longer sight radii again translate to better shooting. Semi-autos typically come in single/double action variants like above, and striker fired, which is an internal action cocked by the slide movement.

There is an absolute plethora of semi-automatic pistol ammo out there. The four most common are the .380, the 9mm Luger, the 40S&W, and the 45 ACP. The .380 (also called 9mm short) became popular in the US relatively recently with the advent of pocket sized semi-automatics like the Ruger LCP. The 9mm Luger, also called 9mm Parabellum, has decent power in standard form, can be loaded hotter, is relatively cheap, doesn’t recoil much, and you can pack a lot in a magazine due to its narrow caliber.

45 ACP or 45 AUTO is a bigger bullet than the 9mm and is a solid, good shooting choice which only limits itself by taking up more room in the magazine and reducing the round count. 40 S&W (Smith and Wesson) is a bridge between the power of the 45 and the ammo capacity of the 9mm.

Get the biggest caliber that you can shoot comfortably and well from the size and type of handgun you want. If you do not like shooting your handgun, you will not practice, and you will not take it with you when you could need it. A .380 that is there beats a .44 magnum that you left home.

Brands

Firearm brands vary in quality and price range. I typically view brands in four categories, and I'll briefly describe them below and list the common brands I see as fitting in them.

Junk

Saturday night special old brands like Lorcin and Jennings fit in here, along with the modern brand of Hi-Point. These things have a high chance of malfunction. I would not buy these, not accept them as gifts, and not go near them.

A blown up Hi-Point. You don't have to buy the most expensive gun out there; so don't feel like you have to buy the cheapest.

Budget

These are pistols on the low end of the price spectrum which, while they compromise on fit and finish, will go bang and can be relied upon. They make good training guns, truck guns, and other uses that you wouldn't want a high priced investment doing. I put Taurus, Rossi, Bersa, Kel-Tec, Chiappa, Rock Island Armory and similarly priced brands here. If you're tight on money, buy something in this range.

Mid-range

These guns have good quality, solid mechanics, and shoot well. They're a good measure of what a handgun should be, always work, and are fun to shoot. If you're going to get one handgun, and call it good, get something from this price bracket. I consider modern Colt, modern Smith and Wesson, Ruger, Glock, Walther, Kahr, Springfield Armory, Steyr, Para Ordinance, and CZ here.

These are the best, and are only beaten by custom guns. I put H&K, Sig Sauer, Browning/FNH, Kimber, old Colt and S&W revolvers, and Beretta here.

Closing

Hopefully, by now you've got a good idea of what you need a handgun to do, the features you need, an idea of a caliber choice or two, and some brands to keep an eye out for. Remember to always try before you buy, read the damn instruction manual, use good ammo, and, if you can't make up your mind between two of them, buy both.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Napoleon Bonaparte’s Rise To Power

November 27, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

On December 2, 1804, Notre Dame Cathedral echoed with the sounds of 400 musicians and singers as 35 year old Napoleon Bonaparte was crowned emperor (crowning himself, incidentally). “I found the crown of France in the gutter, and I picked it up.”

He would go on to conquer almost all of Europe, rule over 70 million people, wield more power than anyone since the ancient Caesars of Rome, and instill legal and social changes that are still evident today. He came to power based on his achievements and ambition alone, as did Adolf Hitler over a century later, and was driven strongly by a desire for glory and conquest, stating “I love power like a musician loves his music.” What lessons can we learn from this titan of history?

Corsican Birth

Born on the Island of Corsica, Napoleon grew up hating France, as they had invaded and conquered Corsica shortly before his birth. Napoleon held a grudge against his father for submitting to the French, which was the most advanced nation in the world at the time, and while some rebels retreated to the mountains to fight, accepting French rule was the obvious choice. Napoleon credits all his accomplishments with the training his mother gave him, explaining this saying “she has the head of a man on the body of a woman.”

French Education

Moving to France in his youth for education, he remained a proud Corsican and somewhat of a loner and outsider. He had little in common with his wealthy French classmates. At 15 he was promoted to the Royal Military Academy in Paris. Teachers described him as proud, ambitious, egotistical, quiet. At 16 he studied with the greatest artillery brigade in the French army.

La Révolution

He struggled with finding himself, and wrote about having thoughts of death and having a lack of purpose. But when the French Revolution came in 1789, and the powerful French monarchy, French nobles, and clergy, were suddenly threatened with losing their power, Napoleon, at age 20, while not a revolutionary, welcomed the revolution as good news. It abolished privileges and hierarchy, and instituted justice and equality for those which had been oppressed for many years. The French Republic was proclaimed in 1792.

At age 23, now an idealistic revolutionary, Napoleon took leave from the army and returned to his Corsican homeland. The former leader of the Corsican rebels, who was now governor of Corsica, met with Bonaparte, and dismissed him as self centered and ambitious, calling him “a big, inexperienced boy.”

Napoleon, a strong believer in the French Revolution, was fully aligned with the new republic, while the governor wished for Corsican independence. Napoleon was defeated and banished from his homeland by the governor. This was a turning point for Bonaparte, who had viewed the governor as a hero.

Reign of Terror

Exiled, he returned to France with his widowed mother and brothers, finding Maximillian Robespierre in charge, the Revolution turned into The Terror. Austria, Prussia, Spain and Great Britain, completely intolerant of a free republic and deposed king, were all at war with France. The city of Toulon rebelled, opening its port to the British.

Napoleon was despatched to Toulon. He had a strategy for driving out the British. As aristocratic military officers fled the country in droves, the young Napoleon had a huge opportunity to prove himself in battle. He attacked the British, sinking 10 of their ships, and receiving a wound from a bayonet as he charged the fort. Capturing Toulon, Napoleon rose from Captain to Brigadier General in a mere 3 months.

Robespierre, executioner becomes the executed

Robespierre led a brutally merciless regime, saying “liberty cannot be secured unless criminals lose their heads” and thousands of Frenchmen did indeed. Bonaparte was opposed to the Terror, but he despised chaos even more, and wrote a pamphlet endorsing Robespierre. In 1794, Robespierre’s government fell, and a new wave of beheadings, including Robespierre’s, followed.

Return to Paris

Napoleon returned to France and began attending court. “The women here are the center of importance. Here alone of all places on earth, they appear to hold the reins of government.” But the women could tell he was not from the aristocratic class, and his clothes and appearance belied this, leading to many of the women rejecting or ignoring him. He again became depressed, writing to his brother that if things didn’t change, the next time a horse carriage came barreling down the street, he would refrain from stepping out of the way.

In 1795, a Parisian mob assembled to restore the monarchy. Bonaparte was put in charge of the defense of Paris, and using a tactic never before attempted on citizens–he attacked the mobs with cannons, obliterating them. He was promoted to general at the age of 26.

Grapeshot to the face will stop a protest

Marriage

He met Josephine, a creole aristocrat from the French colony of Martinique, and a 32 year old widow with 2 children and lots of debt. Her husband had been guillotined, and she had been known to have had multiple affairs with men in French society.

She was a woman of influence, and well connected. Napoleon fell in love with her, but she was not attracted to him. She told a friend he was too young, too skinny, too serious, and when he proposed she hesitated. Recognizing that her looks were fading and her debts mounting, she finally accepted his proposal.

Older, single mom, debt-ridden, scandalous past–what could go wrong?

General Bonaparte

Napoleon’s first assignment as general and commander of all French forces in Italy, he was charged with defeating the Austrian forces. The French troops had struggled for two years in the Alps without progress. The French generals expected little from him, ridiculing and laughing at him, but upon his arrival in Italy, they immediately revised their opinions. One general stated “I don’t know why, but the little bastard scares me.”

He inspired the troops, promising them victory and riches. In his first battle against the Austrians and Piedmontese, who greatly outnumbered him, he divided and destroyed their armies. He could mobilize and control the battlefield before the enemy had time to react. “They sent a young madman, who attacks right, left, and to the rear. It’s an intolerable way of making war,” wrote one of the Piedmont generals. Napoleon soon accepted their surrender, and demanded gold to reward his troops.

Frustration at Home

Away from his wife, and still in his 20s, Bonaparte wrote daily to Josephine. Bonaparte did not have much experience yet with women, and had yet to learn their ways.

> Not a day goes by without my loving you. Not a night without holding you in my arms. I curse the glory and ambition which keeps me from the soul of my life. Whenever I am troubled as to how things will turn out, I put my hand to my heart where throbs your likeness. I have but to look at it, and my love is perfect happiness.

Josephine would often laugh and read his letters aloud to her friends, saying “Bonaparte is so amusing!” My, how little women have changed. Josephine would go on to cause him great heartache and wasted time and resources. And Bonaparte would go on to achieve even greater victory and glory. Some observations on Napoleon:

Man of order

A hard lesson Bonaparte won’t learn for years to come

He believed order must serve ideals. Robespierre and Napoleon agreed on this, feeling it is necessary to suspend liberties to preserve liberties during the Reign of Terror.

Strategy

Be bold, be unpredictable, always surprise your enemy. Do not play by the rules.

> Napoleon attacks every day. He attacks when it snows, he attacks at night, he attacks when it's cold. It's not the way the game is played. He looks for the enemy, fights it, and when they assume he will stop, he continues. And the next day he fights again. It surprises them. – Jacques Garnier, historian.

Motivation

Napoleon was a master at motivating his soldiers, and the more they won, the harder they were to stop. Garnier:

> There are no tactics at all. The troops come in so enthusiastically and quickly it surprises the enemy. It's just a question of enthusiasm. Everyone throws themselves into it. Everyone risks death.

Be courageous and fearless

Napoleon often took physical risks, and never showed fear. He would fight amongst his men, load cannons, lead charges, and won the respect and devotion of his men. He learned to impose his will on his own side and the enemy both. General Bonaparte earned the nickname “Our Little Corporal” because he took on the duties of a lower ranked corporal while commanding his troops. To be continued…

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Classical Opera Should Be Your New Masculine Hobby

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Why True Preparation For Christmas Involves Introspection And Sacrifice

November 27, 2015 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

I greet the men of ROK afresh this week with great anticipation, for we are entering upon my favourite time of year—that of Advent and Christmas.

It is sometimes easy to focus on the negative in our times; the shapers and manipulators of modernity often contrive (and succeed) at robbing men of their sense of purpose, of their conviction, of their joy in what transcends the self and the political. This demoralization is amplified by the fact that our institutions are often, now, co-opted and usurped by persons with inimical intent.

It can be tough to connect with the truths and ideals of our civilization without the assistance of the institutions whose natural role is to facilitate this, but I believe it is thoroughly worth the effort to attempt. Without a connection to beauty, to truth, to the transcendent, we die a death worse than the mere death of the body. So, I invite men to stir up their spirits at this time of year, and if it please God, let us learn how we may spite the enemies of patriarchy and civilization by striving to connect with the sublimity of the forthcoming season, even if it requires us to do all the heavy lifting ourselves.

Advent: Season of Dread

The Mother of God of the Bush Unburnt; an Icon depicting Old Testament types of the Incarnation

Advent exposits the tension between light and darkness, dread and hope, majesty and humility, joy and sorrow. Many of the Christmas carols dwell on such themes, both in the musical mood and in the lyrics (i.e., "…the hopes and fears of all the years, are met in thee tonight"). Those who reflect on the Mystery of the Nativity and the events surrounding it, will see how incongruous is a sentiment of cheap, cutesy "fun:" Caesar has brought the known world under the sword of Rome and commands the census; people are uprooted from their homes to satisfy this command.

The Holy Family is reduced to sheltering in a cave where livestock are tended. Herod commands a massacre of children and the Holy Family is forced to flee. Most of all, the uncircumsribed, the infinite, the perfect, the holy God, is about to be circumscribed and joined to a finite nature; God will become a man, and, in the midst of a freezing night, be set in a feeding trough—a fitting portent, and a dread mystery.

That is what the Liturgical texts of both the Eastern and Western Church contemplate for the feast of Christmas. In the east, the high point of Matins erupts with the megalynaria of the feast, chanting such words as these:

> Μυστήριον ξένον, ὁρῶ καὶ παράδοξον! οὐρανὸν τὸ Σπήλαιον· θρόνον Χερουβικόν, τὴν Παρθένον· τὴν φάτνην χωρίον· ἐν ᾧ ἀνεκλίθη ὁ ἀχώρητος, Χριστὸς ὁ Θεός· ὃν ἀνυμνοῦντες μεγαλύνομεν.

("I behold an alien and unthinkable mystery! A cave has become heaven, and the virgin maid a cherubic throne. Narrow is the manger wherein lies the Boundless One, Christ our God, Whom hymning we magnify.")

This Responsory, in the usual Medieval setting of the Latin Church, is the very center of Matins:

> O magnum mysterium et admirabile sacramentum, ut animalia viderent Dominum natum jacentem in praesepio. Domine, audivi auditum tuum et timui: consideravi opera tua, et expavi, in medio duorum animalium jacentem in prasepio.

("O great Mystery, and wondrous Sacrament, that beasts should see the Lord born and lying in a trough. O Lord, I have heard the rumour of Thee and was afraid; I contemplated Thy works and I shook with dread, to consider Thee lain in a trough between two beasts.")

Many depictions of the Nativity make it to appear almost "cute;" but the predominant sentiment of the Tradition is dumbfounded awe. Creator of the Virgin, born of the Virgin? He lays in a feeding trough, to Whom beasts are sacrificed? The invisible God, beyond man's swiftest thought, reflected in the eye of an ox? The Master of the house has come amongst His slaves; now there shall be peace or woe ineluctable, to every man!

Advent: Season of Doom

The Second and Final Advent

It stands to reason, that if the Lord came to save us and destroy the power of sin and death, then those sympathetic to sin and death will greet His Advent with considerable fear. "Now is the judgment of the world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out." The Truth is now present in our midst; His very presence shall prove us for what we are. And indeed, in Advent it was customary to focus on the judgment, recognizing that the first Advent of the Lord points to the second Advent. If the first Advent seems gentle, it was gentle to us while it was severe to the power that dominated us; but our Lord made it clear that when He would come again, if He found us still fraternizing with the enemy He took pains to dispel, we would receive the same traitor's treatment.

The last Sunday before Advent has for its Gospel the 24th chapter of Matthew ("when the Son of Man returns, it will be like lightning flashing from the East to the West"); the first Sunday of Advent was when the famous Dies Irae ("Day of Wrath") was sung in olden days; the theme of judgment continued right up to Christmas Eve, when one of the Canticles of the Sibyls ("Iudicii Signum") was sung:

The earth shall be soaked in sweat at the sign of the Judgment.
The King Who is to endure through the ages shall come from heaven,
For this purpose: that, being present in the flesh, He may Judge the world.
Fire shall consume the earth, seas and skies,
It shall seek out and destroy the portals of loathsome Hell.
It robs the sun of his lightspring and tramples the starry choir
Heaven is overturned, the moonlight perishes;
It shall cast down the hills and uplift the vales from their lowliness.
Moreover, when the trumpet shall peal down its grievous blast upon the earth,

The guilty man shall be weeping for his misery and sundry toils

And the earth shall shew forth the pit and hell in its yawning maw.

Then from heaven there shall fall fire and the river of brimstone.

It's not exactly "Jingle Bell Rock," is it?

Now, I'm not meaning to depress all the fellas at ROK; as great as is the sobriety before Christmas, even so great is the joy and mirth when Christmas comes. But it is a general spiritual principle that glory and peace are not simply handed to us, but are arrived at only through spiritual struggle.

My first bit of advice for men who wish to recover the ancient spirit of Christmas, then, would be to let Christmas be Christmas; the time before Christmas is a time to anticipate this dread and awful Mystery—the Imminent arrival of Truth in our midst. It is the time to contemplate our need of it, our hope of it, our fear of it. We prepare to meet the Lord when He comes, therefore, that our response to His Advent will not be to our shame, but to our very great joy and profit.

Specific Suggestions From Traditional Observance

Beginning on the first Sunday of Advent, cease eating meat and dairy; on weekdays, wait until the afternoon to eat, if possible. If not possible, stick as close to the spirit of this practice as you can. Trust me, when I say that your Christmas Feast will be all the more meaningful and merry after a month of fasting. Use the hunger for focus, penance and training in self-mastery.

Men should always limit television and frivolous entertainments, but especially at fasting seasons like Lent and Advent. Long ago, I found that if I came home from work and began my evening with some time reflecting either on that day's prayers (from the Breviary/Divine Office), or quietly meditating on the season's hymns, carols, Scripture, etc., I would enter a recollected mood that would last the whole night. Contrary to expectation, the fasting periods quickly became my favourite and most introspective times of the year.

Strive to maintain an environment conducive to this custody of mind and stomach. Try to avoid the endless stream of silly parties, even if courtesy will require you to attend some. Decorate the home liberally, but at first with simple and stark trimmings of pine, of holly, of dark green, red and violet. Stick to the carols that anticipate Christmas, (such as Veni, Veni Immanuel), or are thoughtful meditations on the theology of the Mystery (such as Lo, How a Rose E'er Blooming or The Angel Gabriel).

Save the bright lights, the gold and silver trimmings, the festive decorations, the most boisterous carols celebrating the joy of Christmas Day… for Christmas Day! As we will see in a future post, Christmas Day is only the beginning of Christmas. Until then, let everything be conducive to the mood of quiet, of recollection, of awed anticipation.

Those wishing to learn more about the traditions of Advent, can go here:

I wish you all a recollected and soul-sharpening Advent.

Read More: A ROK Christmas Benediction From Brother Cui Pertinebit

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

University Of Ottawa Bans Yoga Class Because Of "Cultural Genocide" Against Indians

November 28, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Reinforcing the image of higher education as a three to five year way to mollycoddle young adults, the University of Ottawa has banned a yoga class designed to help disabled students. The cause, if you can call it that, is that the practice of yoga creates circumstances of "oppression" and "cultural genocide." In layman's terms, Britain colonized India (as if the regime it supplanted was somehow UN compliant in the 1800s) and Canada is a British-founded white settler country. It is unfair, according to the critics of the class, for yoga to be taught when it is a spiritual practice rooted in the Hindu religion.

Disabled students, who already face massive obstacles in accessing the social opportunities of campus life, have been dealt a cruel slap to the face by the able-bodied students who represent the University of Ottawa as a whole. Jen Scharf had been generously teaching the class for seven years in a bid to help these vulnerable individuals. But that is just too shocking to SJWs, who felt the need to get offended and complain.

The real cultural genocide going on in Canada

What an oppressively racist and culturally appropriating society!

The decision is bizarre for a number of other reasons, not least of which is that Canada is a profoundly (read: overly) multicultural country evidently obsessed with diluting its European roots. The founding ethnic groups of Canada as we know it, the British and French, have been joined by utter millions of new arrivals over decades. If any cultural genocide exists in Canada, it is against the ethnically or culturally British inhabitants.

Quebec's French-speaking population has been able to assert itself as a distinct nation at risk of domination by English speakers and many, usually excessive privileges have been afforded to Canada's indigenous tribes. In the meantime, descendants of the British and those Europeans who assimilated into the initial Anglo-Saxon culture are castigated for promoting their own ethnic Canadian identity.

Indians can be Indians, Chinese can be Chinese and, to a lesser extent, Serbs and other non-British Europeans can pay homage to their roots. What about British-Canadians? Any space associated with their distinct history is subsumed in a wider civic nationalism, which all the aforementioned groups are permitted an equal stake in. But when a group of mostly non-Indians, many of them disabled, practice yoga? The cultural police are called.

What about Indian Muslims and Muslims in general?

Is the University of Ottawa going to specifically ask any Muslims to stop practicing yoga?

Yoga has distinctly Hindu roots, so is its practice by religious or secular Muslims a case of false cultural appropriation or genocide, too? After all, anyone familiar with Indian history would know that Muslims have exerted disproportionate influence on the subcontinent's political and social history. The Mughal Empire, one of Asia's finest, involved a Muslim minority ruling over a Hindu majority for centuries.

If Canada, which has none of the fraught racial and spiritual relations of India, can commit cultural genocide over the practice of yoga, this argument is only exacerbated when we consider Muslims in both India and generally, whom Hindu nationalists have regularly faced in modern eruptions of violence. And should yoga be restricted only to traditional Hindus, not nominal, non-practicing "Hindus"?

The idea that Canadians are the descendants or cousins of British oppressors and therefore cannot "own" yoga relies on a very narrow and self-serving narrative. Tenuously linking people born white today and their possible colonial ancestors not only exhibits the same bigotry SJWs claim to be fighting, it ignores oppression arguments concerning Muslims and Hindus over hundred of years. Yet that is exactly the sort of nuanced, balanced appraisal leftwing do-gooders will never engage in.

Let's return everything to where it came from, right?

Let’s give back Arabic numerals and stop oppressing them!

Isn’t the idea of the university a Muslim idea according to many scholars? It is said that universities as we know them began as religious centers of learning for Muslims. Just because mathematics and the sciences were studied there does not take away from their alleged cultural origins. So the University of Ottawa can by all means dissolve itself and stop such flagrant cultural oppression and minimization. And thus begins an endless series of debates and fistfights over who owns what and who can keep what. What is lost most of all meanwhile is common sense.

Once again, to appease the sensitivities of people who treat complaining as a sport, disabled Canadian students who want to engage in yoga for self-improvement, not mockery, have suffered. Real victims get a kick in a teeth by those who desperately want to be victims every day of the week.

This, my friends, is the world we live in.

Read More: University Of Manchester Bans Breitbart’s Milo Yiannopoulos From Debate On Censorship

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Incomplete And Flawed History Of The Human Species

November 28, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I bought The Story Of The Human Body because I thought it would give me a biology lesson on the inner workings of the human body, but instead it was an evolutionary study of human anthropological history. While I did recently post a critique of how evolution has gone off the rails in regard to modern humanity, thanks to rapid advances in culture and technology that we haven't kept up with, I do accept that evolutionary processes occurred during the history of our species.

The author, Daniel Lieberman, is a paleoanthropologist at Harvard. He has combined the latest human evolutionary research to explain the behavior of our body instead of our minds (that was covered more in the book Mean Genes). I didn't want to read a book on evolutionary theory, but I didn't mind getting an update on the current accepted science.

Lieberman begins his principal hypothesis by arguing that our ape ancestors became bipedal to better forage for food in a changing climate. At the same time he brings this hypothesis forth, he admits that the initial change to bipedalism would incur huge disadvantages. The new species would lose speed and agility, severely impacting its ability to hunt and therefore reduce it to more of a scavenger role. They'd gradually lose the skill to climb trees and be sitting ducks for predators. In spite of all this, there was a magical deus ex machina that allowed the bipedal species to survive though its initial jump to bipedalism, even though it's not clear how that could have happened.

According to current theory, not only did the first bidpedal humans survive these disadvantages, but they managed to successfully evolve to the result you are now living. Bipedalism today is taken for granted, and we are obviously more adept at surviving than our ape cousins, but this change happened before the use of tools, language, and hunting, even with spears. Until we get further evidence that shows how these first bipedals survived, I have to assume it was from some sort of miracle.

> …the benefits of foraging far and wide favored further adaptations for more habitual and efficient long-distance walking than we see in Ardi and other earlier hominins. The combination of these adaptations, which were largely driven by the exigencies of climate change, had momentous implications, setting the stage for the evolution of the genus Homo a few million years later and for many important features of the human body.

I bet in 1,000 years, absolutely nothing in the above passage will remain true, especially when explaining the why and how of evolutionary change. The problem with anthropological hypotheses like the one Lieberman provides is that they're based on a minuscule set of data. They find one partial skeleton for every 100,000 or even 1 million years of human existence, and then re-jigger their entire theory around that skeleton. It's intellectually dishonest, especially when you consider that a lot can happen in 100,000 years. If the history of humanity was a 1,000 page book, we only have one or two frayed pages of the entire story.

> As Africa became cooler and drier many millions of years ago, fruit became more scattered and scarce, favoring those ancestors who were better able to forage by standing and walking upright.
>
> […]
>
> Whenever the australopiths ventured down from trees, they were easy pickings for such carnivores as lions, saber-toothed cats, cheetahs, and hyenas that hunt in open habitats. Perhaps they were able to sweat and thus could wait until midday to move about when these predators would have been unable to cool down as effectively.

Perhaps! Yes, perhaps our guess is correct and we can explain a gigantic hole in figuring out how bipedals, who were slower and less capable of climbing trees, managed to survive at all.

And yet the apes that stayed on all fours continued to do just fine, at least up to recent times when humans finally started figuring out how to dominate its environment. How can natural selection promote the divergence of a species to bipedalism when, for at least a million years, it put them at a grave disadvantage? My argument is not that we couldn't have evolved from apes, but that the initial jump to bipedalism must have been guaranteed death during the environment of the earth at that time. It would be like if a modern group of humans evolved to walk on their hands instead of feet in order to eat weeds and plants that are on the ground, but still had to compete with existing humans to survive.

The story of the Neanderthals

We're starting to piece together the story of the Neanderthals, who were already in Europe when modern humans made it out of Africa. There was inter-breeding between them and humans (many non-Africans have Neanderthal genes) until they died out from supposed lack of food or other environmental reasons. My own guess is that they were slaughtered by modern humans. The reason we find their remains in caves is because that was the only place they could hold defensive positions.

It's also becoming likely that Neanderthals were smarter than humans at that time. I'm guessing they saw new humans as inferiors who could be easily controlled, but when they got out-bred, it was all over for them (the current European migrant crisis is probably a light simulation of exactly how that happened).

> …the last time the modern human and Neanderthal lineages belonged to the same ancestral population was about 500,000 to 400,000 years ago. Not surprisingly, human and Neanderthal DNA are extremely similar: only one out of every six hundred of your base pairs differs from a Neanderthal's.
>
> […]
>
> …all non-Africans have a very small percentage, between 2 and 5 percent, of genes that came from Neanderthals.
>
> […]
>
> My guess is that Neanderthals were extremely smart, but that modern humans are more creative and communicative.

Lieberman has been at Harvard for too long to think it takes "creativity" to destroy an enemy. Modern humans were more numerous (higher fertility) and better at fighting (physically stronger or faster). To Neanderthals, humans must have been a dreaded zombie army that just kept coming from Africa. I can only imagine what the last Neanderthal thought of when he died in his cave fortress.

The transition to agriculture

We have enough data to show that agriculture has actually hurt humans in many ways. Life got more brutish and short after we began working the land and creating permanent settlements.

> …a hunter-gatherer's chances of dying from starvation must be orders of magnitude lower than any farmer's.
>
> […]
>
> Farmers consume foods that are starchier and contain less fiber, less protein, and fewer vitamins and minerals. Farmers are also more susceptible to eating contaminated food, and they risk famine more regularly and intensely than hunter-gatherers . In terms of diet, humans have paid a high price for the > pleasure of enjoying a yearly harvest feast.

>
> […]
>
> For thousands of years after the origin of agriculture, life stank, diarrhea was common, and cholera epidemics were regular occurrences. In spite of being unsanitary death traps, cities became magnets as the agricultural economy progressed. People flocked to cities because urban areas generally had more wealth, more jobs, and more economic opportunities than impoverished rural areas.
>
> […]
>
> …there is little evidence for regular famines during the Stone Age. Hunter-gatherers rarely have massive food surpluses , but they seldom run out of food either, and their body weights fluctuate only modestly between seasons. As chapter 8 reviewed, famines became much more common and severe after farming began.

Lieberman explained how our energy needs have declined greatly since the Industrial Revolution. He used good data from early farm and industrial age workers like coal miners to make comparisons, unlike his earlier guesswork.

Modern living

Living in cities is decidedly modern, and evolution has not yet created the genetic adaptations that match a sedentary city lifestyle.

> In 1800, only 25 million people lived in cities, about 3 percent of the world's population. In 2010, about 3.3 billion people, half the world's population, are city dwellers.
>
> […]
>
> Has the industrial era caused a trade-off between lower mortality and an extension of morbidity? To some extent, the answer is unquestionably yes. Because of more food, better sanitation, and better work conditions, fewer people, especially children, contract infectious diseases and suffer from insufficient food, and so they live longer. It is also inevitable that, with age, the chance of cancer-causing mutations increases, arteries harden, bones lose mass, and other functions deteriorate. Many health problems correlate strongly with age, which makes them more prevalent as more populations grow and a larger percentage of them are middle-aged and elderly.

He provides an interesting observation of why more women are affected by cancer in the modern age:

> All told, [a woman] can expect to experience approximately 350 to 400 menstrual cycles during her life. In contrast, a typical hunter-gatherer woman starts menstruating when she is sixteen, and she spends the majority of her adult > life either pregnant or nursing, often struggling to get enough energy to do so. She thus experiences a total of only about 150 menstrual cycles. Since each cycle floods a woman's body with powerful hormones, it is not surprising that reproductive cancer rates have multiplied in recent generations as birth control and affluence has spread.

Most problems that you face, including flat-footedness, near-sightedness, back pain, allergies, and digestive ailments are mismatch diseases resulting from the fact that we have put ancestral human bodies in modern environments quicker than evolution has allowed it to adapt. The same thing is happening with technology, where advances in tech are becoming so rapid that we will face increasing psychological suffering and malaise from being forced to stay plugged into the system.

Conclusion

The early parts of the book contained too much speculation. Lieberman was essentially pulling guesses out of thin air. Can you imagine aliens coming to planet Earth in a million years and finding one partial skeleton for the past 10,000 years of humanity, since the dawn of agriculture, and using that alone to create a complete picture of how modern humans lived? It's absurd. I understand science wants to provide answers, but they're placing too much confidence on theories from a random and sparse data set.

I can't decide if it takes more faith to believe in evolutionary theories of early man or believing in the story out of Genesis with Adam and Eve. Nonetheless, if we are to try and base the ideas of humanity on science, the partial-skeleton-every-one-million-years approach must be used, and connecting dots from one skeleton to the next can at least provide the direction of evolution, but I'm hesitant to let scientific guesswork furnish me with answers on my existence.

If you set aside the speculation of the early pages, the book does a good job explaining how our bodies are evolved for hunter-gathering, and how modern living takes us away from that, creating disease and morbidity as we try to jam our bodies in environments that they simply don't belong in. Overall the book does have reasonable information that could probably assist you with modern living, so it's worth your time to check out.

Read More: "The Story Of The Human Body" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Reasons Neil Strauss And Tucker Max Abandoned The Ideas That Made Them Rich And Famous

November 29, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The news that Neil Strauss has repudiated game (at least for commercial reasons) did not come as a surprise to me. His newest book, The Truth, means that the first post-2000 mass messengers of game and the glorified frat boy lifestyle respectively have been laid to rest. Strauss joins Tucker Max, who capitalized on men's desire to frat their way through life, in endorsing marriage and fatherhood.

Neil Strauss' abrupt about-face poses a serious ethical dilemma, as he is now castigating the same ideals he made all his fame and the vast bulk of his money from. Tucker Max, on the other hand, has slid slowly but surely into his current position. In the past, both men failed to ground game and the frat boy lifestyle in wider criticisms of a society increasingly restrictive of masculinity. So when the going got tough, they scattered.

Max faded the fastest, now spending his days taking gay-themed potshots at Roosh and regularly reminding everyone about his over-domestication via photos and tweets:

> @AnikoQueen men who obsess over other the appearance of other mens women are usually latent homosexuals. Sounds like him
>
> — Tucker Max (@TuckerMax) November 12, 2015

So for what specific reasons have they left?

1. They can’t make any more money off of it

Alas, Tucker Max couldn’t get the level of work he wanted by writing more frat boy books.

Obviously, Strauss and Max can still make something from their old adventures and work. Their books will keep selling, though at a snail’s pace compared to when they were truly in the public eye. There were only so many more insights and tidbits they could provide to audiences on the themes of game and frat boy lifestyles. Strauss, the better writer, also had the advantage of not tying his work to a particular phase of life like Max, who from the outset typecast his writing in the form of idealizing the university party lifestyle.

Public interest, after a time, will wane, similar to the ebb and flow of the yo-yo crazes of the 1990s or Pokémon after God knows how long. Just because game especially was focused on kinds of male self-improvement, not idle pastimes, doesn’t make its long-term fate any different. In fact, the effort required to cultivate game, against the backdrop of a sanitized but nevertheless ruthless dating environment, is usually a short thrill for users before the hard reality of the new world they’ve entered sets in. Most then return to tricking one’s self about the true nature of many women and denying the mortality of human sexual interest.

If you need proof of this, take a look at the returns of the movie about Tucker Max, one of the biggest box office bombs the year it was released and critically regarded as a pile of radioactive cinematic manure.

2. They were surpassed by others

Roosh and a host of others soon entered the PUA market and undermined Strauss' dominance of it.

Related to the last reason, the two have additionally faced substantial competition. In the cause of Neil Strauss in particular, a veritable menagerie of writers, program creators and others caused a glut in the PUA market. Some challengers, like Roosh, became household names with strong, dedicated fan bases, while others sold dud information and achieved no real public salience. With so many people sensing the opportunities from writing and disseminating material about these related sub-cultures, people like Neil Strauss and Tucker Max basically ensured their eventual obsolescence.

Max himself had been outflanked by Strauss, whose beta backstory made many men feel like game was more within their reach. The frat boy lifestyle was narrower, while The Game peddled the idea that any nice-guy loser could catapult themselves into being sought after by any woman. Then Strauss, though recognized as the messenger of modern game, became lost amidst the thronging crowd of would-be PUA entrepreneurs. He may be the top dog in game history according to the majority of readers, but this is a far cry from ensuring he would remain equally famous down the years.

This dynamic is all the more apparent when we look at the continued audience Return of Kings is enjoying. Rather than incessantly divorcing game from a self-imploding, disintegrating society, Roosh saw the need to explain to men why game and now Neomasculinity are so indispensable. And beyond their own carnal desires, men also have a responsibility to fight back and save this society from itself.

Strauss and Max were never concerned about these issues, which explains their loss of importance, despite them never fundamentally criticizing the social status quo in a way that risked a massive backlash from SJWs and vested interests.

3. They fell for the same traps they warned men about

All men can say they found “the one” and didn’t settle.

As men age, who’s to say they don’t abandon the ideas and regimens they once staked their lives on? Even professional athletes who retire without significant injury are often fat slobs in only a few years. People like Neil Strauss and Tucker Max are no different just because they practiced game and the “eternal” frat boy lifestyle, not dunks and lay-ups. When they thought about what they would do next in life, did they start to lose the edge they claimed to have developed over the years? It’s a good bet after that they were tempted by the siren calls they had explicitly or implicitly coached men to avoid, such as one-itis or settling down.

Like the amateur PUA who finds a quasi-red pill reality difficult over time, chances are Tucker Max and Neil Strauss felt the pressure of being public spokesmen teaching men about life’s hard truths. Strauss was more upfront about these truths than Max, yet even the latter made it clear enough to his disciples that women want a man who can be the life of the party, bring them constant thrills and a slew of male attributes most have to work hard at or can never attain.

The landing was notably rough for Max, whose written maxims depended on youth and being some sort of natural alpha. Naturalness almost always loses its luster once you’re out of college.

What offers the post-game answers you’re looking for?

Roosh's Neomasculinity has two major drawcards Strauss and Max always lacked: a basic challenge to the sexual status quo and internal consistency between a man's single and family life stages.

Roosh's neomasculinity plugs the gaps that were ever-present in the writings of Neil Strauss and Tucker Max. There is nothing inherently wrong with marriage and fatherhood, provided you're doing it with the right philosophy, one which asserts your masculinity instead of the status quo trying to strangle it. Game and its offshoots are not diametrically opposed to settling down. What must happen, though, is that the hard truths discussed in game need to be carried over into marriage and fatherhood, along with actionable plans to self-improve and self-actualize.

Strauss and Max's shift to family life only confuses most men. They smell the hypocrisy of squeezing millions of dollars from disowned lifestyles. How can these men be taken seriously in peddling new philosophies when they spent so many years living radically different ones? Single life and family life may have different priorities, but with neomasculinity you have access to an ideological continuity that is powerful, not just internally consistent.

Maybe one day, perhaps silently, Neil Strauss and Tucker Max will comprehend the errors of their midlife U-turns. If not, how about they return all the money they made from preaching false Gospels? It's easier to assess and trust the genuineness of men who do that.

Read More: Neil deGrasse Tyson's 20 Greatest Musings On Love

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Two Finnish Girls Allegedly Raped By Asylum Seekers This Week

November 29, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Two teenage girls were raped this week in Finland. The alleged perpetrators are both reported to be asylum seekers, and the tension is rising between the Finns and their new neighbors.

Is it racist to be concerned that more rapes will be the outcome when immigrants pour into Western countries? Well, if you look at the statistics, it doesn't seem to be a very far-fetched idea.

Immigrant rapes cause outrage

A Finnish 14-year-old girl has allegedly been raped by an immigrant man. The crime took place in Kempele in Finland, at 10:30 pm this past Monday. The police arrested two suspected teenage men. One of them has been released while the other, a 17-year-old, is still in custody. The interrogations have so far shown that the suspect and the victim knew each other in some way.

News sources claim the alleged perpetrator was an asylum seeker and that he was arrested at a refugee camp in Kempele. The police has been reluctant to reveal which country he comes from. Cases that involve foreigners, and particularly asylum seekers, are kept secret, says one police commissioner.

Prime Minister Juha Sipilä gave a comment about the incident on Tuesday. Connecting the crime to immigration policy, he said that it should be discussed "if the convicted in these kinds of cases should automatically be deported." According to Sipilä, the staff at the refugee camps have tried to inform the asylum seekers about how to behave around women in Finland.

The rape has caused an outrage in social media, and the police have called on people to calm themselves. On Friday, the police revealed that another 14-year-old girl was raped on Tuesday. This time they didn't shy away from saying that the suspect is an asylum seeker, who arrived in Finland a year ago.

Sweden is no exception

Although mainstream media won't mention it, immigrants in Sweden are engaging in these sexual crimes as well. In March, a woman was robbed and raped by two immigrants after meeting them in a bar. One Iranian is now being prosecuted, while the other man is still at large.

In another recent case, an African boy is accused of raping a Swedish girl behind a bush in their schoolyard. Swedish girls had been harassed by immigrant boys at the school for a long time, but the faculty didn't want to intervene. The principal told a concerned father, "you shouldn't divide people into us and them."

The case is now under investigation, and the boy, who's under 15 years old, is still allowed to go to the school.

Imported rape culture (?)

So why make such a big deal about immigrants committing crimes? Ethnic Scandinavians do it too, so why put so much focus on immigrants? Isn't that racist? Well, if immigrants are committing crimes on a scale disproportionate to their numbers, there's a reason to be alarmed. Rape culture has been non-existent in the West, but maybe it can be imported.

Ingrid Carlqvist is a Swedish journalist who's lately written extensively on the subject of immigration. One of her articles, co-written by Lars Hedegaard, has to do with rape and immigration. The authors make the case that immigration has caused an enormous increase in crime in Sweden, with the number of rapes increasing by a staggering 1,472 percent since 1975, a time when the number of immigrants also started rising.

But you can think of many different explanations for that. One is that third-wave feminism has taught women that basically anything a man does that they don't like can be considered rape, and we know that their accusations might well be lies.

Immigrants are over-represented

Carlqvist and Hedegaard counter that by referring to studies showing how immigrant men are over-represented in rape cases. During the 00's, immigrants committed rape 2.1 to 19.5 times as often as Swedes. In 2002, of those sentenced to at least two years in prison for rape in the court of appeal, 85 percent were foreign born or second-generation immigrants.

The authors write:

> One possible explanation is that, on average, people from the Middle East have a vastly different view of women and sex than Scandinavians have. And despite the attempts by the Swedish establishment to convince the population that everyone setting foot on Swedish soil becomes exactly like those who have lived here for dozens of generations, facts point in an altogether different direction.

Maybe the most telling fact about all of this has to do with what the Finnish Prime Minister said after the alleged rape in Kempele; the staff at refugee camps have to tell men how to behave toward women in Finland.

It says a lot about what these immigrants have gotten used to in their native countries. One might wonder how willing they are to give up their old ways (this writer's guess: not very).

Read More: Why You Should Avoid Dating Girls Who Claim They Were Raped

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

15 More Reasons Why Toronto Sucks For Men

November 30, 2015 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

As I prepare to leave this city that I've called home for so long (too long, in fact), I can only look back and wonder why I didn't leave sooner. Roosh immortalized the reputation of this city with his original article, 15 Reasons Why Toronto Is The Worst City In North America For Men. His reason #15 in particular hit hard for me. And it was only then that I finally made up my mind to escape from this hellhole for good.

And as my farewell present, I dedicate this article to all the men who continue to live and struggle here, hoping that they too can open their eyes and realize that they don't have to bind their fate to this city.

The 15 reasons why Toronto sucks for men:

1. The Weather Is Lousy

This is what Toronto looks like four months of every year.

Among the major cities of the world, Toronto must have one of the largest seasonal temperature difference. The summers can be as hot as high 30's with humidity (just over 100°F) while winters can drop to as low as -30°C (-22°F) with the frequent wind chills. You can adapt to either heat or cold with time, but not both if they alternate on a yearly basis.

2. The Transportation System Is Terrible

Biking in the snow is often more reliable and faster than using our broken public transit system—the TTC.

When people are not complaining about the weather, you can guarantee that they will complain about the traffic or the public transportation. I'm not exaggerating when I say that Pyongyang probably has a better subway system than Toronto.

3. People Are Miserable

Not surprisingly, Toronto is often ranked the least happy city of Canada. Everywhere I go, I seem to stumble upon broken individuals who have no energy, are emotionally unstable, have been cheated on, gone through a divorce, are desperately lonely, are depressed and on drugs, etc.

4. The Sports Teams Suck

The miserable people of Toronto can't even rely on their sports teams for a bit of joy in life. These teams—particularly the Leafs—only torment their fans with disappointment after disappointment. It's actually amazing that they never fail to sell out their overpriced tickets no matter how bad they play.

5. People Are Extremely Fake And Shallow

People here seem incredibly desperate to show off how happy and exciting their lives are.

The effort they expend to demonstrate their coolness and importance, while obsessing over status, just goes to show how fragile and insecure they really are.

I personally know one chick who is miserable as fuck but can't seem to stop putting up pictures of herself on Facebook that shows her smiling with gourmet food.

6. It's Nearly Impossible To Connect With Genuine (And Normal) People

Following up on #5, good luck trying to make real friends or having any semblance of meaningful relationships. Even when you find somewhat normal individuals who are not freaks, you will be expected to deal with constant flaking, lying, broken promises, and back-stabbings. Here, other human beings are just objects to be used to feed one's ego.

To be fair, I have met some truly kind and decent people here, but they are few and hard to come by.

7. Many People Are Afflicted With Toronto Syndrome

Toronto Syndrome is similar to post-purchase rationalization or Stockholm syndrome where people—when taken hostage to a city as awful as Toronto for a long enough time—start to rationalize and grow attached to the city that is clearly sub-par and outright degenerate.

This is evidenced by the rabid fanaticism of Torontonians who claim that their city is the "best" in the world without any basis whatsoever. These zealots will denounce you and bark at you for not sharing their rainbow delusion that Toronto is a utopia (I suppose it is if you're gay).

8. The Women Are Bratty And Obnoxious

The Toronto feminist who got a man fired from his job, banned from the internet for two years, had his reputation ruined, with a possibility of a jail time. And all because he argued with her over on Twitter.

I'm not sure what makes women here think the world owes them royal treatment considering how little value they have to offer. Their snarky demeanor and entitlement complex is well known in the manosphere and there's even an entire blog dedicated to the subject.

Many foreign girls from outside of Canada have much more pleasant looks and attitude than the harpies who were born here. But the longer they stay here, the more they go native.

9. Women Use Their Headphones As Shields

Headphones + Eyes on iPhone – Smile = "Fuck off, don't talk to me."

One of the most popular topics of conversation for women in Toronto is to bitch about how men would dare to approach them even though they had their headphones on. One girl admitted to me that she sometimes wear them even though she's not listening to anything just so she could repel men.

I don't know what's sadder: men being so thirsty or women shooing them away like flies.

10. It's A Hotbed Of Progressivism

Mass of immigrants, homosexuals, trannies, feminists, SJWs, the militant Left, and all the rest are all concentrated right here in Toronto. Toronto isn't infected with progressivism, it is the disease. I live in constant fear of saying the wrong thing and facing a backlash for it.

11. It's A Boring City With Boring People

Possibly due to the long winters, Toronto is an incredibly boring city where the only hobby people seem to have is to watch television shows, going to the movies, and… talking about them. I don’t know how many times I’ve been asked whether I watch Game of Thrones or the latest Hollywood trash, only to have these people go talk to someone else when I tell them no.

12. The City Has No Soul

Toronto has no history and no culture, and therefore no identity to speak of. This is what happens when you flood a city with people from all over the world. Multiculturalism and diversity is like mixing food from all over the world into a single dish; the end result is always an unrecognizable pile of rubbish.

13. There Is No Economy

While Toronto has one the most highly educated populations in the world, there are no real jobs to speak of. The city only grows because of its continuous influx of immigrants who were lured in by false promises of prosperity. This is apparent from the fact that the only people making good money are those who build and sell the endless number of condos here.

14. It’s Full Of Entitled Crybabies

You would think that all the social programs here would make people feel grateful for what they are given, but it couldn’t be farther from the truth. Disabled people complain all the time despite the fact that they receive special treatment unseen in rest of the world.

Meanwhile, people of a certain colour lie about their income and social status to maximize their benefits and access to services. This may explain why a disturbing number of people are actively seeking their own victim status, with the more deranged ones purposely mutilating themselves by claiming to be ‘transabled‘.

15. It’s A Failed City

A ticking time-bomb…

Toronto is a failed social experiment. It’s almost as if the elites decided to flood the place with immigrants, introduce feminism and flamboyant homosexuality, and see how far things go before everything collapses—much like the mice utopia experiment done by John B. Calhoun.

People often think that Sweden is on its way to collapse as the first casualty in the West, but I disagree. Sweden is far more robust with its core European population who can easily turn things around should they finally wake up. The same cannot be said for Toronto and much of Canada.

I fully expect this city to bust once potential immigrants stop coming here after finally realizing that it’s a city built on lies with no future to speak of. As for myself, I have no desire to sit and wait for the shit to hit the fan. I have no reason to stay in this wretched city; I want to experience life in places with better climate and nicer women.

Adiós Toronto!

Read More: 6 Reasons Why Portland Sucks For Single Men

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Is Porn Star Stoya Lying About Being Raped By James Deen?

November 30, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Over the weekend, the feminist world was torn asunder with porn star Stoya's claim that she was raped by industry colleague and former boyfriend James Deen. Deen has become one of the porn industry's biggest stars in the past few years, propelled by his "female-friendly" image and his fashionable social justice beliefs: for example, he recently castigated the industry for its "racism" and attempted to shame female stars who refuse to perform with black men. Now Deen is getting hoisted on his own petard:

https://twitter.com/stoya/status/670685987601825792

https://twitter.com/stoya/status/670689154498449413

While Stoya has yet to go to the police—despite the fact that rape is a crime—the left has already set their lynch mobs on Deen. Feminist website The Frisky has already pulled his "What Would James Deen Do?" column from the site, with editor Amelia McDonell-Parry hyperventilating in response to Stoya's accusations:

> I imagine there will be some who will say, "But what about James Deen's side to this story? What about evidence?" As is the case with the vast majority of rape accusations, especially between intimate partners, Stoya's story of being raped by James Deen is very likely the only "evidence." He is certainly within his rights to deny it, though it's worth noting that he and his representatives have remained mute on the matter, and James has not responded to the text message I sent him yesterday. Like so many rape cases, this will very likely be a "he > said/she said" situation. And as I tweeted last night, today and every day, I BELIEVE WOMEN.

Other porn stars are coming out of the woodwork with their own spurious accusations against Deen.

For his part, Deen has vehemently denied Stoya's accusations in both a series of Tweets as well as a post on his Instagram page:

> There have been some egregious claims made against me on social media
>
> — James Deen (@JamesDeen) November 30, 2015

> I want to assure my friends, fans and colleagues that these allegations are both false and defamatory
>
> — James Deen (@JamesDeen) November 30, 2015

> I respect women and I know and respect limits both professionally and privately
>
> — James Deen (@JamesDeen) November 30, 2015

As Return of Kings publisher Roosh famously stated a year ago, all public rape accusations are false. Mentally unstable women such as Crystal Gail Mangum or Jackie Coakley have used false rape accusations in the past as a form of attention whoring, drawing accolades and sympathy from a left-wing media too lazy to check the facts. All the evidence points to Stoya's accusations against James Deen being completely fake.

How To Rejuvenate Your Fading Career

On Sunday, attorney Mike Cernovich posted an article in which he laid out the case for Stoya's rape accusation being false. As Cernovich pointed out, Stoya owns a porn website called TRENCHCOATx (link NSFW) which features several movies starring James Deen. Indeed, Stoya's most recent scene on the site is with Deen. Why would a woman willingly appear in a porn movie with the man who purportedly assaulted her?

Additionally, Cernovich points out that Stoya mentioned being a "feminist" in her accusation. What does her feminism have to do with the fact that she was raped? The answer is nothing:

> Stoya specifically mentions feminism is her public rape accusation against James Deen. This is proof she seeks to interject ideology into what should be a police matter. She is also sending a bat signal out to SJW hate mobs.

Additionally, Gaby Dunn, a friend of Deen's, stated that while she knows Stoya's accusations against him are false, she won't defend him because she's afraid it will deter real rape victims from speaking out:

I am not defending him because it's not my place. He hasn't said anything yet himself and frankly it's pretty cruel to demand the head of/a statement from someone in my position. I am a firm believer in believing victims. I think women should be believed when they make accusations. I just happen to know this is the rare 1 percent of situations where it is false. But more than that, I don't want to contribute to a culture where people accuse women of lying about sexual assault. I understand why people believe Stoya and they should believe sex workers can be raped. They should believe women. It has a larger impact on all victims to say she is lying so I won't do it publicly. The damage is done to him. But I don't want there to be more damage to real victims by disparaging Stoya. There's no good that can come of saying anything bad about her. Me saying "Stoya is lying" even if that is the truth, contributes to sex workers not being believed and victims not being believed.

Gaby Dunn @gabydunn · 27m
@ashcech we can all leak dms. here is what I have been saying to people who follow me. I hope this satiates you.

Not only that, Stoya has acquired an extremely negative reputation in the porn industry for her behavior. Conversely, James Deen has seen his career explode in the past few years.

With just two Tweets, Stoya has managed to revive her failing career. Her accusation has not only been picked up by numerous media outlets, James Deen is already suffering professional fallout despite the fact that charges haven't even been filed. Feminists have even created a Twitter hashtag campaign, #StandWithStoya, to further promote her cause. Getting "raped" may well have been the best thing that could have happened to Stoya.

Some Rapes Are More Equal Than Others

It’s worth contrasting the response to Stoya’s accusations with that of another porn star who was actually raped: Cytherea. Nearly a year ago, Cytherea was the victim of a home invasion in which she was violently gang raped and her family was robbed at gunpoint. The crime was so brutal that not only were Cytherea’s assailants tried as adults (two of them were minors at the time), life imprisonment was one of the sentences they could have received if found guilty.

Despite this, feminists completely ignored what happened to Cytherea. There were no #StandWithCytherea hashtag campaigns, feminist sites such as Jezebel refused to cover the story, and SJW spokescreeps such as Arthur Chu went so far as to accuse GamerGate supporters of “weaponizing” her rape. Indeed, I was one of the few journalists who even bothered to write about the story. I stated that feminists were ignoring Cytherea’s story not only because her rapists were black, but because of the class element; the kinds of rape stories feminists love involve upper-middle class white women being taken advantage of by “entitled” white men.

Feminists are celebrating Stoya and ignoring Cytherea because Stoya’s false accusation fits the social justice narrative: a tale of a preppy, “privileged” white man (ignoring the fact that James Deen is a Jewish supremacist) brutalizing an upper-middle class white woman. As Gaby Dunn’s example shows, the fact that Stoya’s story is flimsier than a $2 penis pump doesn’t matter to them: it’s about defending the narrative at all costs.

With the rapidity with which Stoya’s claims are collapsing, it’s increasingly unlikely that James Deen will see jail time for a crime he didn’t commit. But the sheer determination feminists have in pushing a clearly false accusation is disturbing and shows that we still have a long way to go before making false rape accusations becomes unfashionable once again.

Read More: Is Kacee Boswell Lying About Being Raped By Ronnie Radke?

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Genesis Of Dracula

November 30, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Some novelists write a great deal, and develop their art to a level of superlative achievement. Then there are those rare few who write much less, or very little at all, and yet manage to achieve smashing success in one great project. Bram Stoker belongs to the latter category. His novel Dracula remains perhaps the finest such creation ever written.

Stoker understood on some fundamental level that the invocation of horror has to rely on the creation of a mood, rather than on simple set-piece scenes. Everything has to contribute to that mood: words, names, locales, dialogues, even punctuation. All must advance to this crescendo of dread.

There was nothing in Bram Stoker's background to suggest that he might be suited for horror literature. He did not, unlike H.P. Lovecraft, come from an old family over which an atmosphere of decay hovered, and neither was he sickly as a youth. And, unlike Edgar Allan Poe, he was not addicted to drugs or alcohol.

He was born in Dublin in 1847 of Irish parentage and was educated at Trinity College. Upon graduation from university he took a liking to the theater and served for a time as a critic of theatrical performances. He moved to London after his marriage in 1878 in order to be closer to the acting community.

From 1879 to 1898 he managed the famous Lyceum Theater. It was perhaps due to his familiarity with the stage that he developed a taste for dramatic flourishes in his writing.

It was in London that he came to work for perhaps the most famous actor of his generation, Henry Irving. With him Stoker traveled the world; he even managed to visit the White House on at least two occasions, and was introduced to both Theodore Roosevelt and William McKinley.

At some point during his travels, Stoker met a man who would have a fateful influence on his life: Armin Vambery, a Hungarian writer, linguist, and traveler. He may even have acted as a consultant on Dracula. Vembery was steeped in the ancient folklore of the Balkans and Eastern Europe, and was perhaps one of the first to advocate for a linguistic connection between the Hungarian and Turkish languages (it is now recognized that they are indeed distant relatives).

Theater work was time-consuming, but not necessarily lucrative. Stoker was naturally curious as a man of the world, and began to write in his spare time as a way of supplementing his income. His first efforts were of unsatisfactory. He had shown little previous aptitude for literary greatness, but, as so often happens in history, genius has a way of springing up in unlikely places.

In 1897 he published a novel he called Dracula. It was originally to be titled The Un-Dead, but Stoker changed it at the last minute. We cannot be sure, but it may have originally been intended as a stage play. By either name, it is the greatest Gothic horror novel ever written.

The action of the novel is cleverly conveyed using fragments from letters, diaries, and alleged “first-hand accounts.” The general course of the action is that an ancient “undead” vampire named Count Dracula wishes to escape from his confines in the Carpathian Mountains in Transylvania and move to a more populated city (London), where he can “infect” people with vampirism.

Following closely on his heels is the stern and steady Dr. Van Helsing, who knows what vampires are and how they can be destroyed.

The novel derives its extraordinary power from a number of different sources. It plays on our fears of infection and the spread of a weird disease that can take possession of our very souls. It plays on our fascination with sexual predation and unchecked carnal appetites. It plays on our innate revulsion at having our life-blood drained away by unseen forces. And on top of all these psychological underpinnings, it is great story: the pursuit and destruction of an ancient evil makes for a fine storyline.

In this passage, from the “journal” of Johnathan Harker, a visitor to Dracula’s castle, we get our first indication that the Count may be not quite human:

> As I leaned from the window my eye was caught by something moving a storey below me, and somewhat to my left, where I imagined, from the order of the rooms, that the windows of the Count’s own room would look out…I drew back from the stonework, and looked carefully out. What I saw was the Count’s head coming out from the window…But my very feelings changed to revulsion and terror when I saw the whole man slowly emerge from the window and begin to crawl down the castle wall over the dreadful abyss, face down with his cloak spreading out around him like great wings. At first I could not believe my eyes…

Of course, things only get worse for Harker and his friends.

How much Stoker knew about the historical Dracula, or about Easter European folklore in general, is still hotly debated. Dracula was not the first novel to have vampirism as its subject. These things matter little, however; noting in literature is completely original. The greatness lies in the writer’s ability to rework the raw material he has into a form that is compelling.

It is clear that Stoker was a wonderfully creative writer who blended preexisting myths of Vlad The Impaler, vampirism, Elizabeth Bathory, and Victorian popular fears in a way that was irresistible.

The novel was instantly successful and has never been out of print. But Stoker himself was dogged with bad luck. Perhaps Vlad Dracula himself had cursed him. Stoker, not a professional writer, had failed to copyright his work outside the United Kingdom. This was also the era before international treaties automatically took care of such things.

The appearance of the 1922 film Nosferatu was a definite copyright infringement; Stoker's widow won that battle, but by then the Dracula legend had entered popular culture to such an extent that it had nearly become common property.

As an interesting side-note, the priceless original manuscript for the novel, long thought to be lost, was unearthed in a Pennsylvania barn in the 1980s. How the document came to reside in such a place has not been discussed in the articles I have found on the subject. It now is apparently owned by Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen, probably one of the few private parties in the world who could afford it.

If you are new to horror fiction, this is a great place to start. It has never been adequately filmed, in my opinion. Its special strengths and atmospheric intensity do make it ideal for a miniseries, and perhaps one day we will see it done justice on the screen.

Read More: Should You Live With Her?

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

If You Don’t Have Kids, You Don’t Matter

December 1, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Following the recent attacks in Paris, immigration and multiculturalism are again in the spotlight. This is a good thing, but the discourse is as shallow as ever. We now hear arguments over what the greatest national security threat is to the West. Is it terrorism? Is it climate change? Both of these are genuine issues, but I’d give a completely different answer – demographic decline.

Many others have covered this topic, but lets explore further.

The dilemma

Every developed western country – bar one – has a fertility rate well below the replacement rate of about 2.1 children per woman. This problem is often underrated, but it poses serious threats to our culture, our institutions, and our way of life. Questions of a shortage of labor or cultural decline are one thing, but there’s a huge political element as well.

It is an easily found but rarely mentioned fact that, the further left on the political spectrum you are, the less likely you are to have kids. In raw figures, conservative women will have on average 41% more children than their liberal counterparts.

It is also true that political preferences are strongly correlated with parental views, being the dominant factor around 70% of the time.

The short of it is that, assuming the number of conservatives and liberals is about even, within two or three generations the descendants of today's conservatives would outnumber their liberal counterparts 2:1.

The only way the left can make up for this demographic shortfall, as they are acutely aware, is to support increasingly generous immigration policies. This allows them to replace the millions of liberal babies that are never born with immigrants imported straight from the third world.

This poses an obvious question. Nearly all of them come from more conservative countries compared to the west. Polls overwhelmingly show that few Muslims are tolerant of homosexuality, abortion or sex outside marriage for instance. So how does the left guarantee their loyalty?

The key factor here is that the vast majority of these immigrants are poor. 90% of blacks and 70% of Hispanics don't vote for the Democrats because they've been brushing up on their Karl Marx (the 90% figure also predates Obama).

Left-leaning parties, from the Democrats in the US to the labor parties in the rest of the Anglosphere to the social democrats of Europe, are able to buy them out with generous handouts on the taxpayer dime. Along with the collapse of the family unit, this is one of the major contributing factors to the West's deteriorating financial situation.

Eventually however, we know the welfare spigot that keeps these votes flowing to the left is going to run dry. Trilion dollar deficits aren't sustainable forever. What happens then? Where will their loyalties lie?

The outcome

The breakdown of this uneasy alliance is going to be one of the defining political issues of our generation. Make no mistake, immigrant communities will turn on the left, as surely as the Allies turned on each other at the end of World War Two. Liberals will be typically bewildered by this—but weren't we so nice to them?

As their voter base collapses between conservative whites on the one hand and conservative immigrants on the other, I would like to pose a serious question: how on earth will the left preserve their liberal agenda?

What happens to fifty years of no-fault divorce, welfare programs, domestic violence campaigns, free contraception, gay rights, legalized drugs, prostitution, nightclub culture, topfreedom and so on?

And not all of these things are fundamentally bad of course. The fact that women can walk around in miniskirts unmolested, that someone can legally flee their abusive spouse, that gays aren't being publicly stoned—some of these things are rather nice, lets admit that.

The problem here is they may not be sustainable. They're the social equivalents of the welfare state.

The theory is really quite simple.

Society A takes the progressive route. Full of moral indignation, they let women out of the kitchen and dismantle the family unit. The birth rate promptly collapses.

Society B sticks to more traditional, if harsher, social policies, and manages to maintain a stable population.

At the end of the day, which one remains standing? Which one endures?

The average fertility rate in richer countries has been below two children per woman for decades now. The average American woman, not including ethnic minorities, has 1.8 kids. In Europe this figure is 1.5 and in Japan 1.4.

South Korea is one of the worst examples at 1.3 children per women. In 1980 it had 5.7 million elementary school students, today there are just three million. Korea is expected to go from 50 million people today to as low as 34 million by 2060 – and half of them will be over 60.

Perhaps most startling is how this contrasts with their northern neighbors. The North Koreans (famine and all) are bang on the replacement rate.

In other words, according to current trends – North Korea is going to win in the end.

This shows you the truly awesome destructive effects of cultural Marxism. It can take a country transformed so radically from a third world backwater into an economic powerhouse and run it back into the ground barely a generation later.

Deeper questions can be asked about the limits of tolerance. Can such wildly different ethnic groups really just get along? Fast forward to 2050, when today's ethnic minorities in Europe, North America and Australia might make up closer to 50% of the population. Is this not a recipe for violence?

The threat of terrorism is often exaggerated. The Paris attacks killed 130 people, but even France already averages 600+ murders per year. Its still less than a month's worth of traffic accidents.

But Muslims are currently less than 10% of the French population. What it it were 30% or 40%? That's no longer a recipe for mere sporadic violence. Its a possible prelude to civil war.

Previously this may have sounded far-fetched, but it sounds a lot less ridiculous in 2015 then even five years ago. We're in the era of ISIS, an organisation whose ranks include as many as 30,000 foreign fighters, including some 5,000 westerners.

We're also seeing something of a nationalist revival on the right, as the four million Britons who recently voted for UKIP shows. Donald Trump wouldn't have been taken seriously in 2008 or 2012, but now hits a chord with millions of Americans.

Ethnic tensions perhaps haven't been this high in the West since the days of the Second World War. I believe we're now entering an era of growing clashes between nationalists on the right and immigrant communities and their sympathizers on the left. The outcome is unclear. Like the spread of Communism last century, some countries will fall like dominoes. In others the struggle will be more protracted.

A warning

Most people, even the most vocal critics of left-wing social policies, seem blissfully unaware of the demographic and political time bombs they are slowly nesting.

To them I say this: it is all very well and good to declare yourself a “strong independent woman”™ who doesn’t need a man, but if you fail to have children and instill those same values in them, then your politics will be as much an evolutionary dead end as you are.

Unless you happen to do something that breaks new scientific ground, like curing cancer or inventing a warp drive, your spawn and the values you raise them with are the only real legacy you leave. It simply doesn’t matter how right you were in your moral leanings.

It doesn’t matter which party you voted for when you were alive, or how many leaflets for an anti-racism rally you handed out at the local train station. It doesn’t matter how high you held up that “My body! My decision!” sign at the ~~pro baby killing~~ women’s choice rally.

What matters is that, if you fail to procreate, the DNA patterns that irrevocably make up you will cease to exist the moment your corpse decomposes.

Meanwhile that asshole neighbor of yours who voted for Romney is raising three or four more little Republicans as you sit there stroking your cats, and the Muslim family down the street is pumping out another Mohammad or Fatima every other year on the taxpayer dime.

The future belongs to those who worked hard to create a stable family situation in which they could raise their spawn, while you were busy trying to overthrow the patriarchy without any thought as to what followed. As far as the world is concerned, you sucked in oxygen for a few decades, then vanished without a trace.

I'm trying to plead here, quite sincerely, about this fundamental threat to the society we've created. It is something that will affect its more progressive elements in particular.

But like a drug addict who just can't quit, you refuse to acknowledge your self-destructive actions. You either ignore, or somehow celebrate, as the west's liberal youth becomes increasingly sexually impoverished and retreats into internet pornography and spinsterhood.

As some have also pointed out, if the west is taken over by Islam, all I'd have to do is grow a beard and get up early for morning prayers. Women would be marched straight back to the kitchen. You have the most to lose, so please just listen for a moment.

Maybe all of us dream of creating a more "moral" society. Maybe someday it will be truly possible, but the current experiment appears to be failing, and the society it has created has become rotten to the core. If in another fifty or a hundred years, that society simply doesn't exist anymore, then those cultures who have chosen a more traditional mold will expand to fill the gap.

This has serious consequences not only for liberalism, but for democracy as a concept. If industrialized democracies inevitably end up suffering a demographic decline, then who does the future below to? Basic maths would seem to make the outcome inevitable.

The side that wants to win must start having more kids. Or lose.

Read More: If Black Lives Matter, Blacks Need To Stop Killing Each Other

Thomas Hobbes

Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Liberal Harvard Professors Are Now “Rape Apologists” For Defending Due Process

December 1, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Not once in their statement do they ever acknowledge that nearly 30 percent of women are sexually assaulted while at Harvard, nor do they express any concern about them. Their silence contributes to the ongoing problem of sexual assault at Harvard and Harvard Law.
>
> — The makers of The Hunting Ground using poorly crafted “statistics” to accuse Harvard Law School professors of rape apologism for daring to ridicule the film’s rehashing of a now discredited allegation against student Brandon Winston

Much can be said about liberal Ivy League law and social science professors. On the one hand, they created the retrograde academic climate in which third wave feminism, rampant affirmative action, mass, often illegal immigration and other woes could be championed and implemented in the real political world.

Most surprisingly, though, they are still capable of sensing that the slippery slope they made even wetter may have gone too far. In this vein, nineteen Harvard Law School professors, of which at least the vast majority are liberal, have signed an open letter decrying the bias and inaccuracy of the “college rape” propaganda film The Hunting Ground.

This so-called documentary, co-produced by CNN, completely misrepresents or plain fabricates information about a number of disproven campus rape allegations, plus overall sexual assault numbers. The most egregious character assassination is against Harvard student Brandon Winston, whose name has been dragged through the mud multiple times both on and off campus.

His law studies were significantly sidetracked and he is still being attacked via the cinematic potshots of The Hunting Ground after being exonerated. Like Paul Nungesser, no amount of legal and other vindication will seemingly spare Winston from this fate.

Is leftist academia finally panicking about the newest cohort of SJWs?

Kamilah Willingham, the African-American answer to Emma Sulkowicz. With her claims against Brandon Winston discredited after both Harvard and law enforcement investigations, The Hunting Ground continues to falsely portray her as a "survivor". She's now creating a career as a professional SJW.

To their credit, despite helping spawn the overall circumstances in which millennial SJWs "grew up," this is not the first time in recent memory when Harvard Law School academics have taken stances that expose them to the ire of their pupils. Nearly 30 signed an earlier exhortation for giving greater legal protections to those accused of university sexual assault.

This open letter to the Boston Globe responded to draconian college policies and procedures demanded by anti-due process fascists such as New York Senator Kirsten Gillibrand. Tellingly, the professors pointed out that these proposals contradicted the basic principles they were hired by Harvard to teach to students.

When otherwise pernicious feminist Nancy Gertner is one of those signing the most recent open letter, alongside perennial liberal Alan Dershowitz and Obama's old mentor Charles Ogletree, you begin to sense how troubling the present campus environment is. Law professors who previously either supported or acquiesced to false structuralist arguments of patriarchal legal oppression are now angrily having to put their radical student charges in their place.

But are they succeeding? If anything, the battle between SJWs and elder academics demonstrates that the former group is probably already winning. CNN's shameless showing of The Hunting Ground this week, all while claiming to be a news network, only adds fuel to an assertion that the insane are running the asylum of American college campuses.

The Hunting Ground is plumbing new lows in SJW rage-spiraling

Amy Herdy, a producer of The Hunting Ground, has shambolically tried to present the veneer of a balanced documentary whilst privately admitting she never intended to give an impartial account.

> We do not operate the same way as journalists — this is a film project that is very much in the corner of advocacy for victims, so there would be no insensitive questions or the need to get the perpetrator's side.
>
> — Amy Herdy, producer of The Hunting Ground, admitting that she made no attempt to appraise both sides of the campus sexual assault debate and essentially organized a propaganda operation

The Harvard Law School professors are not merely responding to a run-of-the-mill social justice experiment when they question the methods of The Hunting Ground. Nor are they rejecting SJW arguments after they reached a critical mass of everyday attacks on common sense. Rather, this documentary represents a brand new phase in the culture wars. Instead of theatrical political attacks at rostrums or in street protests, SJWs are moving to theater and cinema itself.

With correctly timed music, camera angles and tears, purported documentaries are often able to achieve in one three second-long vignette what several thousand words of text in Time or a five hour New York City protest can. And the overarching device used by such filmmakers is an omission of facts and the substitution of emotion, the facts omitted being those that disagree with the filmmaker's viewpoint.

This is why, for example, Kamilah Willingham is allowed to describe her "rape" without Amy Herdy and her colleagues including the raft of Harvard Law School and law enforcement findings proving that Willingham's testimony was terribly contradictory and patently false. Or that the "evidence" she provided, a condom, was actually unrelated to the crime she was alleging and therefore demonstrates she unapologetic lied.

The ability of SJWs to plow ahead despite constant rape hoaxes is never-ending Smells like false rape spirit.

Take a moment to reflect on three or four of the most infamous college rape allegations you remember. For me, the instances I recall most readily are the Duke lacrosse case, the UVA fraternity debacle, Emma Sulkowicz's eternal attention-seeking and the witch-hunt against Brandon Winston, with which I was already familiar. All of these are either rape hoaxes or thoroughly vetted stories of a man who was not guilty of an accusation.

In a deep-seated irony, Harvard and certainly other semi-sensible professors are now coming up against the feral SJWs they helped to ideologically mould. These academic-student battles will rage on over the next several years, especially as a large number of other university intellectuals are either siding with SJWs or greatly fear coming out against them.

Like the Ingsoc-supporting parents in 1984 who fear being denounced by the same children they raised to love Big Brother, many academics are presently ruing the disastrous generation they allowed to take over American college campuses. It would be very funny if the ramifications for all male students weren't so incredibly dire.

Read More: Team Of Imprisoned Felons Out-Debates Harvard Debate Squad

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

10 Important Tips For Building A Great Website On The Cheap

December 1, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Alex Oni

Imagine for a moment that websites were cars. It's a well known fact that women prefer to be with men who drive Ferraris as opposed to those who drove Mazdas and, as a result, a lot of misguided men often try to purchase or lease cars that they can barely afford all in an attempt to attract the opposite sex.

In much the same way, people often spend thousands of dollars to build a website hoping that the fancy logo and spectacular design will attract a lot of visitors and keep them coming back. Unfortunately this hardly ever works. The good news is that, just like there are cars under $15,000 that will attract Candice Swanepoel and her friends, you can also get yourself a good looking website that won't bankrupt you and still get a lot of visitors. The trick is of course to know what features you should spend money on and what features you are better off implementing yourself or leaving out entirely.

But who am I and why should you listen to me? Well after nearly seven years of building websites and working with clients including Johns Hopkins University, Gold's Gym, Tax Council, AVIS and host of bloggers including Roosh himself (I have worked on several projects on ROK), I believe I am in a position to offer some advice on how people without an IT background can employ cost effective methods when building a website.

Below I am going to give you some important points to keep to heart. They will save you time and money so please pay close attention.

1. Learn the basics of web development and WordPress

The most important point of the bunch. If you teach yourself how to build a website, you can save yourself a lot of money and time. While there are technically advanced aspects of web development that only a professional web developer would be able to work on, knowing the basics will arm you with enough knowledge to get your website up and running. Then you can proceed to hire a professional for the more complicated work.

WordPress is the world's most popular tool for building websites and its user friendly interface is perhaps the main reason why nearly 70 million websites have been built with it. The best thing about using WordPress is that you can become quite proficient at using it if you can dedicate about 6 hours to learning how to use it.

Please be sure to check the special offer I have exclusive to ROK readers only about my WordPress courses at the end of this article.

2. Develop a plan for your website

If you don't have the time to teach yourself web development, before you set out to talk to a web developer make sure you plan how you want your website to function. The best way to do this is to imagine that you are a visitor browsing through your website. What would you expect to see or do when you visit your website? As an example, if you are looking to launch a blog like ROK, some questions to ask yourself include:

- Will readers be able to subscribe to a mailing list?
- Is there an e-book that I want to offer to my readers to download?
- Will visitors be able to share my blog posts on social media?

And so on. Now you don't have to have everything all planned out from the beginning, as you can always add extra features later on, but the more information you are able to provide the developer from the very beginning, the better.

3. Look at a similar website for reference

One of my favorite recommendations. If you want a website, try to find one or two existing websites that closely match the plan you have in mind for your own website. This is the easiest way to describe to your web developer the kind of website you want.

4. Have a budget

There are two ways most web developers charge. The first is per hour and the second is a fixed amount that both of you will agree on. I highly recommend the second option if you are looking to build a website from scratch, as it ensures that you don't spend more money than you can actually afford.

Inform the developer how you want your website to function and how much you are willing to spend. If the developer feels the amount you are offering is fair, game on. If not he will negotiate for a higher budget, and both of you can move on from there. If you do have a website already and are just looking to hire a developer to make some changes or tweaks, paying by the hour is the way to go.

5. Functionality trumps design

The two main components of any website are its functionality and design. The functionality refers primarily to what visitors can do on your website—e.g read posts, sign up to a mailing list, pay for goods, etc. The design is the general look and feel of the website. Most people think of the design before the functionality, which is a huge mistake.

Take a look at Reddit and craigslist. These two websites have very mediocre designs but the millions of people who visit these websites don't care about that. Of course I am not saying the design isn't important, but if you are on a tight budget, building out the functionality of your website should be your priority while the design can be implemented later. One more thing: do not spend hundreds of dollars on your logo as a few of my clients have done in the past. Go to fiverr.com and hire one of the top logo designers out there to design your logo for about $15. Unless your logo is the Nazi swastika, no one is going to really care what it looks like or how much text shadow was applied.

6. Responsive features

A website is said to be responsive when it looks good on any device. This means your website would look just as good when viewed on a mobile phone as it would on a laptop or tablet. As most people now spend more time using their phones than computers, its a must that your website is built to be responsive.

Search engines like Google also take responsiveness into consideration when grading websites. The good news is that most WordPress themes are already built to be responsive so it shouldn't cost you that much to have it implemented on your website.

7. Keep things simple

Do you really need that image slider or animation playing in the background? Did you see some fancy scroll effect on another website and feel that it would also look good on yours? While such features may improve your website's design, they do come at a price. They not only cost extra money to implement, but they could also slow your website down. Think twice about adding such effects, or at the very least keep them to the barest minimum.

8. Use screenshots

Say you already have a website and need some work done on a particular section. Take a screenshot of the area on your existing website where you want some work done and also use arrows to point out the exact spot where the work should be done. This is one of the best ways to help your developer get the job done effectively.

9. Avoid web designers

Not to drive potential clients away from my sister profession, but individuals who know the basics of WordPress can save themselves hundreds if not thousands of dollars by simply spending 20 minutes researching themes and selecting one that they like. With tens of thousands of themes available, I am sure you will find at least one that you like. Of course if you can afford to hire a web designer to design your full website, by all means go for it—but I personally think it's a waste of money.

10. Do not spend money on SEO

There are hundreds if not thousands of companies who all claim they can get you on the first page of Google. While they certainly can, the truth is unless they employ black hat techniques (which are illegal and will get your website blacklisted if found out) they will use the very same methods that you can do yourself and quite easily too.

Did you know that if you create a sitemap and add alternative texts for all the images on your website, you will drastically improve your chances of getting your website on the first page of Google? Did you also know that you can perform both actions in less than 10 minutes if you know what you are doing and that both actions require zero experience in programming? This is how easy it is and shows the true power of knowledge, but Dick Weiner who thinks SEO is rocket science will go and spend hundreds of dollars.

Be smart and don't be like Dick Weiner. Educate yourself on the basics of SEO and save yourself some money.

There you have it. Some tips to help you build a decent website on a shoestring budget that will promote your business.

If you are interested in taking action and not just reading through this article, sign up today for my WordPress courses where you will learn everything from picking the right web host, installing WordPress, themes, plugins, widgets, WordPress SEO and security. The first course 'From Novice to Ninja: The Complete WordPress Training Course' contains 93 video lectures and is packed with content guaranteed to provide you with all the knowledge needed to be able to build and manage your own website. I am offering the course at a huge 50% discount exclusive only to ROK readers, so you pay $99 as opposed to the regular $199. I have only got 25 coupons for this price so if you want to add an extremely important skill to your resume today for less than a hundred bucks click right here.

The second course is titled 'Build Awesome Webpages Fast without Code' and is targeted at students who already know the basics of WordPress. By taking this course, you will learn how to create web pages of any design or layout without the need to write a single line of code. I am offering the same deal as well, so you pay only $34 as opposed to the regular price of $69. Click here to get the deal.

Both courses comes with a 30-day back money guarantee as well, so you have got nothing to lose. And did I mention that I also offer FREE consultation to all my students as well?

If you haven't got the time to take my courses but still want to build a website, or already have one but are in need of a professional web developer, why not contact me. I don't claim to be a web guru, rock star programmer or whatever fancy title a lot of other professionals come up with these days, but I will get the job done and won't charge you an arm and a leg either.

If you are still in doubt about the quality of my online courses or web development abilities perhaps a review from Roosh himself might convince you.

"I hired Alex because I had over a dozen programming issues to work out for Return Of Kings. From small bug fixes to more complicated re-writes, Alex successfully tackled them all. He has shown such strong expertise that I'm ready to do more complicated programming projects with him. Our communication is also excellent. I recommend his work." – Roosh Valizadeh

UPDATE: There are only 17 coupons and 18 coupons available for the first and second courses respectively. If you are interested in these courses at the huge discounts, sign up now before all the coupons are used.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Truth About Consistency And Meeting Hot Girls

December 2, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In most cultures, consistency is a highly-regarded quality. Those who don't demonstrate it through their behaviours and interactions with others are often thought of as unreliable and even suspicious. And it is common for men to castigate women for displaying inconsistency, for example when they agree to go on dates and then flake, or fail to return phone calls and texts.

But we shouldn't forget that women, having had access to magazine articles and advice from their friends since childhood, are masters at the dating game. While their behaviour may seem frustrating, in their apparent inconsistency they are simply forwarding their own agendas in the sexual marketplace, and there is something to be said for this. By learning to be a little less consistent, men can achieve better results in dating, business and even working out.

What is The Problem With Consistency?

At first glance, this idea seems entirely counterintuitive. Consistency—by which we generally mean having values and ways of doing things and sticking to them—seems like a fine masculine ideal. Surely there can be nothing wrong with staying true to a predetermined course of action?

In a meta sense, this is true. If it is your aim to become a great tennis player, then yes of course, you should practice every day and you should do everything in your power to ensure you attain that end goal. But it is at the micro level where unthinkingly maintaining habits that may not be beneficial can be harmful. In his book Influence: The Psychology of Persuasion, Robert B. Cialdini refers to a famous quote by the American essayist Ralph Waldo Emerson:

> A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall.

The utterance is well known, but Cialdini points out that the word 'foolish' is the most important—and most overlooked—here. Consistency in terms of long-terms goals is important and valuable. What is less useful is a slavish dedication to unexamined habits or procedures that actually do little to further your ambitions.

Why Consistency Can Actually Be Damaging

In some cases, consistency can actually be damaging to your results with women. This is because if you are not constantly evaluating and tweaking what you do then you run the risk of ingraining bad habits rather than developing useful ones that actually get you telephone numbers, dates, and sex. This is true whether you are looking for a relationship with a girl or simply to play the field for a while to find out what it is you really want.

In London, where the daygame scene is very fertile, there is a well-known case of a guy who has done more than 3,000 cold approaches on the streets and in coffee bars, malls and so on. From all of these interactions he has achieved only a few phone numbers (several of them fake), no dates and not even a single kiss, much less sex or a girlfriend.

While it would be difficult to fault his consistency—after all, it takes a certain dogged determination to rack up that many approaches, particularly in the face of almost unanimous rejection—clearly it has proved singularly unhelpful in helping him to achieve his goal of achieving intimacy with a woman.

Of course, this is an extreme example. But let’s consider how an element of inconsistency can help with game.

The Manchester Club Girl

Many years ago, I worked in the cloakroom of a big nightclub in Manchester in the north of England. Each week a girl used to come in—we'll call her Lisa—who I was hugely attracted to. Given that this was in my 'chode' days, before I'd learned about game concepts, I had very little in the toolbox to attract her with. I did, however, flirt with her as best as I could, and I even asked her out a few times, only to get shot down with the "I'm not interested in seeing anyone at the moment" excuse.

Because she visited every week, and I made my interest apparent each time, there was a deadly consistency to my actions that killed any hope of spark or attraction. I became 'that guy at the club' who fancied her, presumably along with many others. By politely rejecting me but remaining friendly, she had put me into the safe category of a neutered orbiter.

Or so she thought. Unintentionally, by injecting some inconsistency into our relationship, I was able to create attraction and finally get her into bed.

At risk of being fired from the cloakroom in a management shakeup, I sought work elsewhere, and became a barman in a very fashionable place just down the road.This meant that my weekly (and weak) attempts at seducing Lisa were cut off instantly. It also meant that I came into contact with a whole slew of other attractive girls.

Manchester is quite a small city, and it was perhaps inevitable that I would run into Lisa again. When she realised that I was working at the bar, she began visiting frequently, and hanging around to chat to me on my shift. Impressed by the other girls who were around me, and perhaps a little by my improved status as a barman, she made it clear that she was now interested and we began dating.

If You Do What You've Always Done, You'll Get What You've Always Got

Now, I'm not denying that other factors were involved in my finally getting together with Lisa, not least social proof and jealousy. But it's also undeniable that it was only when I broke the consistency of my strategy for getting her (weekly flirtation) and replaced it with a different—albeit unintended—strategy that I got the result I wanted.

Frequently guys will come to me and ask why they are not meeting the quality of women that they would like. In almost all cases it is because they have not been willing to change some aspect of their game or presentation that isn't working for them—it may be their appearance, their approach, the way that they speak, or the way that they hold eye contact. Or it may simply be that they are approaching game—and life—in too regimented a manner, and are afraid to inject a little randomness into their modus operandi.

If you don't feel you are getting what you want in any area of life, then don't be afraid to try something entirely new. Add inconsistency and randomness into your daily life just for the hell of it, just to see what happens. If things don't go entirely according to plan then so be it, just try something else instead. But whatever you do, don't be someone who does things by rote, just because you feel safer that way and never worry what others might think. Truly great men take risks and experiment. As Emerson finished up by saying:

> Speak what you think now in hard words, and to-morrow speak what to-morrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict every thing you said to-day. — 'Ah, so you shall be sure to be misunderstood.' — Is it so bad, then, to be misunderstood? Pythagoras was misunderstood, and Socrates, and Jesus, and Luther, and Copernicus, and Galileo, and Newton, and every pure and wise spirit that ever took flesh. To be great is to be misunderstood.

Read More: Why You Should Avoid This Mistake With Women At All Costs

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

3 Ways To Transition From Pursuing Night Club Girls To Pursuing Real Life Girls

December 2, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

You can find plenty of attractive, interesting girls in nightclubs. That said, the greater superficiality of the nightclub scene, the ability of people to act completely different in "real life" and other problems, particularly those alcohol or marriageability-related, mean that many men are not sure where to turn for something else. They intrinsically know that more normal situations are the way to go in finding girls, especially as their responsibilities in life grow. But how?

Finding normal girls should not be confused with so-called day game vs. club game distinctions. The contours of each category are rough but manageable. Pursuing normal girls can occur at night, such as at a cultural exhibition, walking by the river or savoring the cuisine of a new restaurant. Normal girls can also be girls who otherwise go to clubs; it's about context.

The general rule of thumb is that events with real life girls do not involve (copious) alcohol consumption, dancing (aside from a dance class), loud music or some kind of large celebration, which are the sorts of ingredients younger men rely on too much for finding and bedding women. And this is usually without knowing anything substantial or verifiable about the girl they're exchanging bodily fluids with!

This article assumes you have met a girl you can potentially spend a lot of time with and have preexisting tools to spark her interest. It is about crafting positive opportunities to see them more regularly and helping both of you enjoy shared moments. What it does require is a willingness to remind yourself about simple habits you must practice again and again, in addition to inserting your own individualized routines.

Have a number of things going for you that you can prove implicitly

Are you coasting at life or striving to reach your true potential?

Men underestimate this essential factor (and overestimate their fulfillment of it) all the time. In a society where the majority of adults are overweight, they think that simply being non-overweight and moderately fit is an achievement. Likewise, they believe that reading one book about learning French makes them interested in French language and culture. You need not be a total expert in an area but you need to have a demonstrable appearance, knowledge or proficiency to match what you say you like or are good at. Girls can tell this, even unconsciously.

It is much easier to fake personality and other traits in a staccato-style nightclub environment, where half-meaningful conversations are regularly interrupted by favorite songs, different dance moves and an approaching friend. Not being where you want to be in multiple areas should not stop your overall transition to finding normal girls. Nonetheless, be prepared for a significant personal evolution as you steadily build up your level of female contacts and individual experiences with each of them.

Quantify and document where you are in each area of your life, such as:

Fitness: Weight and body fat both now and for your desired level of fitness? Average number of quality gym sessions per week now and in the future (be realistic!)? What do you eat now and what should you be eating?

Career: Are you doing what you want or what's easy? For students, are you studying what Mom and Dad wanted you to or what you wanted? If you're in the workforce, are you chasing a pay check or moving towards your dream career? Instead of just earning an income, what else are you working at or studying on the side?

Experiences: Did you climb a local mountain last week or settled for storming a fortress in a Playstation game, as you do every weekend? Having your regular hobbies (gaming, mixing with friends at the bar, playing golf etc) is fine but it's what so many others do. Few people have the energy, drive, and grit to do more than live week to week. And when you vacation, do you explore voraciously or stay within a few blocks of your hotel?

Spiritual and Relaxation: When was the last time you took a walk to think about life in general, observe nature or just switch off? And what about some other perspective-giving activities?

What next, you ask? Develop a plan, for the areas I mentioned and other common sense ones, and do five things towards them, each and every day. In a little over three months, that's 500 steps towards being a guy who has multiple things going for him. Women will notice. Most importantly, you will, too.

Force her to invest and entwine your interests

Shared moments but not too many selfies.

There are plenty of ways to do this. For example, one of my favorites is to ask the girl for a book recommendation and then recommend one to her. After one or two meetings, I often steer a girl into a bookstore and we buy our recommendations for each other. If I hate her recommendation, I read a summary online and pretend I devored it, even if I later tell her I disagreed with the author's style. In fact, at least half of the time I do.

Take turns picking films at the cinema. Repeat the book exercise. Force her to think. Her expending effort thinking about what to do with and for you ensures that you live on in her mind well beyond the times you are actually with her. It shows a depth to your personality as well, one few men ever bother to create. Sure, you can impress her with abs or a fat wallet. Take it further, however.

Do not confuse this with either giving her unnecessary control or doing things you absolutely hate to please her. There are plenty of ways to avoid boredom and connect. Avoid hated activities of yours that she loves and move to something similar but more to your liking. And if she does not have enough interests that you can enjoy with her, why are you even spending time with her?

Cultivate location diversity

Today? At the top of a mountain. Yesterday? A day trip to the Grand Canyon. Tomorrow? Another exciting adventure.

You can go to many different clubs, each with their own feel, style of music or stereotypical customers, but the diversity is much less than normal game. Use this to your advantage. Depending on the respective interests of you and the girls you meet, aim to expose her to three different normal locations in your first three meetings, four in your first five meetings and at least seven in your first ten meetings. You should have regular haunts to breed some familiarity but the idea is to open up her world. Not all the different locations need to be new ones for her yet many should be. Remember, variety is the spice of life.

The idea here is to give her as many emotional connections as you can. Emotional connections are not about love, of course (at least not in the beginning). They are about the simple gut associations a girl feels about you, your presence and what you do together. You want a rich tapestry of these for girls you like.

Over a 30 day period, how many men can say they have taken a girl to at least eight of these kinds of locations, in addition to cafés, bars, cinema and obvious nature attractions like city rivers and parks:

- Museums
- Cultural days or exhibitions
- National parks
- Book signings
- Language classes
- Dance classes
- Bowling
- Horseback riding
- Go-karting

- Whitewater rafting
- Rock climbing
- Day trips to a nearby town or city
- Camping

I could add another 25 categories but you get the picture.

Ready yourself for a journey of self-improvement and learning

[image]
There’s more to life than these ones…

The buzz you get pursuing normal girls needs to be created consciously by you. Almost anyone can be excited by a party, dance to their favorite song or get Dutch courage from a couple swigs with Mr. Jack Daniels. By all means, mix and match your nightclub experiences with your normal, real life ones. Just make sure you can see a life beyond that nightclub door.

Never take your foot off the pedal when it comes to seeking out normal girls. It is as much about training the girl as it is about enjoying your time together. Ultimately, your ability to find the best girl for you requires the best version of you.

Read More: 7 Reasons Why Approaching Girls In Real Life Beats Tinder Hands Down

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Citi Encourages Women To Shun Marriage

December 2, 2015 | by Gene Hammer | Link | Original Link

Citi's popular 2012 ad featuring a female rockclimber is anti-marriage propaganda that caters to the female fantasy of perpetual courtship. The rockclimber's gravy train rolls on indefinitely thanks to free resources in the form of buying on credit, a supportive provider boyfriend, and the possibility of pivoting to a higher status man after the vacation.

Unfortunately for women who follow the example set in this ad, perpetual courtship is a dangerous game. The rock climber is on pace to slam head first into the wall in about five years. Her appearance will bear scars in the form of crows' feet, looser and rougher skin, more coarse hair, and a diminished youthful glow. At that point, it will be a challenge for her to find a man willing to commit who is half as appealing as the boyfriend in the ad.

Introduction

The commercial opens with the woman peering into a glass counter display. The height of the counter and arrangement of the room suggests a jewelry store. We cannot see what is behind the glass. The woman hands over her credit card, and continues to stare longingly at whatever it is she just purchased.

The next scene reveals that she was shopping for rock climbing supplies to bring on her expedition with her boyfriend. New shoes and nylons. The narrator makes it clear that she is no girly girl. Instead of high heels, only unsightly rockc limbing cleats.

Nylons are a clever way of referring to the climbing ropes. Yes, here we have an independent woman unburdened by societal expectations of femininity. A woman so independent that she purchased this gear on her own, enabling her to accumulate those valuable credit card points.

On second thought, she may be less self-sufficient than the ad wants us to assume. Imagine all the credit card points she would earn by putting the plane tickets, hotel room, and meals on the card. But we don't hear a word about those expenses. That's not what her Citi card is for. That's what her boyfriend is for. This vivacious, magnetic and super-independent woman splurges for the "nylons" while her boyfriend covers all the real shit.

A Woman Uninterested In Marriage

And speaking of the boyfriend, it's clear he has been trying to cajole her into marriage. "We talked about getting a diamond… but I hoisted the rock I really had in mind." You go girl!

The boyfriend's pseudo-proposal of "hey maybe we should talk about maybe someday getting engaged if you want" will always be there, but the opportunity to climb this big rock… Better act fast and do it now before several more millennia of erosion cause it to crumble into an unscalable heap.

Also, why is there a binary choice between getting engaged and rockclimbing? They can't do both? No, the reason she postpones marriage is she has no desire to be tied down.

A Woman Dominant In All Aspects Of Her Relationship

Look at the boyfriend during the climbing scenes. His girlfriend takes the lead as the kick-ass adventurer. He's just along for the ride to stare up at her supportively.

See how as she straps on all her gear, he follows her like a trained puppy. It's clear she is in control, whether it's deciding what to do on vacation or deciding how they will spend the rest of their lives.

A Woman Who Takes Male Attention For Granted

Underlying this woman's psychology is that to her, male attention is a given – a constant that will always be there. When she has her fill of the courtship dance, she can snap her fingers and accept commitment from this boyfriend, some other man from her past, or a man who she hasn't met yet.

What she doesn't realize is her ability to extract future commitment offers from men has nothing to do with her passion for rock climbing and everything to do with her being slender, pleasant looking, and youthful. Those attributes do not last, and as they diminish, so does the status of the men willing to give her the time of day.

A Woman Looking For Something Better

This woman does not want to cut off her options by committing to the man she's currently sleeping with. There may be a higher quality alpha male right around corner. After all, doesn't her rockclimbing accomplishment make her more attractive to high status men? Time to ditch that zero and find a hero! Or at least continue being open to an opportunity for superior cock, should she encounter it while still being courted by her boyfriend.

The rock structure in the commercial is undeniably phallic, and the rockclimbing woman enthusiastically covers every surface of it as her boyfriend watches from below. A subliminal nod to cuckoldry.

Thanks to free and easy resources (due in part to credit spending courtesy of Citi) and social conventions that encourage women to indulge in the endless courtship model, this woman is approaching the end of her prime fertility years without any present desire for marriage and children.

Citi’s Motivation

Why does Citi promote this lifestyle in a nationwide ad campaign? The most prolific credit spenders are single women. The longer a woman remains single, the more frivolous purchases she will rack up, and maybe she will carry a large outstanding balance on her card.

Of course someday she will extract commitment from a man who will pay it off. Greater interest charges for Citi and no default when it is all said and done.

But in reality the ad is probably just the brainchild fantasy of a female marketing professional (one who is fatter or uglier than the ad’s protagonist, with pitiful dating prospects), and everyone along the way nodded their head and conceded “good, this is empowering, let’s go with it.”

If women follow the example of this ad, they will end up with massive credit card debt and far less appealing marriage options than they have in their youth.

Read More: Why Are Men Becoming Less Interested In Marriage?

Gene Hammer
Gene Hammer's blog RedPillAds analyzes television commercials from the viewpoint of a red pill aware man.

Why The Response To Paris Attacks Will Only Destroy Europe Faster

December 3, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

French President Hollande's tough initial response to the ISIS attacks on Paris gave me hope that this time it would be different. This would mark the first time that Western governments acknowledged that multiculturalism was a bad idea—that replacing ethnic Europeans with third-world Muslims was a recipe for disaster.

However, subsequent events have demonstrated that my hope was misplaced. The events in Paris will join all the Islamic terrorist attacks that have been explained away as being a result of the "hijacking of a peaceful religion." Nothing of substance is going to change. Even worse, it appears that Western elites are going to use the events to further their own goals that have nothing to do with curbing terrorism.

Islamic immigration will not only continue, Europe will be destroyed even more quickly

French President Hollande at the National Memorial service for the attacks. Let's defeat terrorism with music.

In the words of American humorist Will Rogers, "If you find yourself in a hole, stop digging." To solve the problem of Islamic terrorism, the first step is to stop increasing your pool of potential terrorists.

Halting all Islamic immigration into the West will not prevent all future attacks because Western nations already have sizable Islamic populations, but at least it would minimize the number of people that security agencies need to track on the "watch list." While the usual suspects would call this policy "racist," it represents the only sane course of action.

However, Hollande did not opt for stemming the tide of Islamic immigration. The borders remain open. France even announced that it is taking yet more "Syrian refugees." Instead of commonsense measures, Hollande is repeating the same tired tropes. At a memorial service for the Paris victims he said:

> Music was insufferable for terrorists. We will multiply songs and concerts, we will keep filling stadiums.

And the ISIS terrorists will gladly attack those stadiums as you sing and hold hands.

Ottoman Turks Redivivus

Turkey's President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan has been gradually bringing back Islam to the country.

In Germany, Chancellor Merkel is starting to feel the pressure of her deeply unpopular open door policy towards migrants. In response, she has reversed her initial position on admitting an unlimited number of migrants and now talks about having quotas. But her solution to the problem will only hasten Europe's demise.

Merkel's solution is to pay Turkey $3.4 billion to temporarily keep two million refugees in Turkey. This deal only slows the tide of refugees—those migrants will still be allowed into Germany eventually, at up to half a million per year. More importantly, in addition to the money Turkey would also receive fast track status into the European Union and Turkish citizens will be granted the ability to travel to Europe without a visa.

But admitting Turkey, a nation of 77 million Muslims, to the EU will only cause more problems for Europe. Turkey has changed dramatically over the years. It is no longer the secular democracy that it was when it joined NATO in 1952. Rather, with the election of the Erdoğan government in 2003, Turkey is returning to its Islamic roots.

The recent downing of a Russian jet by Turkey demonstrates where Turkey's loyalties now lie. Ostensibly, the reason Turkey shot down the Russian jet was because it violated Turkish airspace for several seconds.

But Russian President Vladimir Putin indicated that there was more to the story. He accused Turkey of illegally importing oil from ISIS:

> At the moment we have received additional information confirming that that oil from the deposits controlled by Islamic State militants enters Turkish territory on industrial scale. We have every reason to believe that the decision to down our plane was guided by a desire to ensure security of this oil's delivery routes to ports where they are shipped in tankers.

Opening what remains of Christian Europe to an Islamic Turkey will deliver the final coup de grâce to European civilization.

Coopting Terrorism

The late Iraqi politician Ahmad Chalabi. He convinced President Bush and the neocons that Iraqis would greet American "liberators" with flowers.

President Obama's chief of staff, Rahm Emanuel is famous for having said, "You never let a serious crisis go to waste." What he meant was that when people are scared, it is a good time to advance your agenda, even if it doesn't really have anything to do with solving the crisis itself. The Obama Administration has not been shy about using this principle to reward supporters, punish its opponents, and implement the President's vision for the country.

While Emanuel is famous for having popularized the concept, all governments throughout the ages have used it. The Bush Administration's response to the terrorist attacks of 9-11 is a good example of this. Rather than focus on hunting down al-Qaeda and the Taliban in Afghanistan, the administration fell under sway of neoconservative political theorists who led us to believe that Iraq would be the ideal place to begin democratizing and liberalizing the Islamic world.

The ill-conceived invasion of Iraq and toppling of Saddam Hussein didn't lead to American soldiers being greeted with girls throwing flowers. Rather, it destabilized the entire Middle East and ushered in the chaos and bloodshed that we are witnessing now.

ISIS attacked Paris—So let's take out Assad!

Assad, pictured here with his wife, is probably not a nice guy. But he is better than ISIS. US allies would disagree.

In the wake of the Paris attacks, President Obama has called for the elimination of ISIS. But he also called for the removal of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. The reason that this is strange is that the Syrian government is actually an enemy of ISIS. By removing Assad, the US would be doing ISIS a favor, as it would allow them to capitalize on the power vacuum.

The US campaign against ISIS, which started in August 2014, has been amazingly weak and ineffective. This is mainly because the interests of US allies are at loggerheads with destroying ISIS.

Broadly speaking, ISIS formed due to Sunni disenfranchisement after the toppling of Saddam Hussein. As a Sunni Muslim organization, ISIS is a natural ally with Saudi Arabia and Turkey, and it is an enemy of the current Iraqi government and the regime of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, both of which are part of Shia Islam.

The Assad regime is also an enemy of Israel so it is in Israel's best interest to see him ousted. Although ISIS is no friend to Israel, it is better for Israel if all of its enemies are toppled. A bunch of bearded fanatics riding through the desert in pickup trucks looking for 9-year-olds to rape poses less of a threat to Israel than an organized state like Syria.

Thus, US policy has been half-assed in its approach to eliminating ISIS. The US's real goal has been to remove Assad. Syria poses no threat to the US so this will be sold as a way to appease Sunni Muslims and end the Syrian civil war. However, in every case where the US has toppled an Arab dictator, the result has been bloodshed and further Islamic radicalization.

The other factor in removing Assad is that Syria is allied with Russia, which has begun heavy bombing of ISIS targets. Any direct attack on Assad risks engaging Russian forces. Is the risk of starting a war with Russia over Syria really worth it? President Obama and his men seem to think so.

Conclusion

Far from forcing European leaders to confront the Islamic invasion, the Paris attacks have enabled those leaders to proceed even faster with their project of fundamentally remaking Europe.

Generations of European men laid down their lives fighting Muslim hordes to preserve their families, their faith, and their land. Right now it appears that the current batch of European leaders will allow to happen in one generation what those Muslim armies could not achieve over the course of a thousand years of aggression.

Meanwhile, the conflicts of interest that the US has over the Middle East are putting us in a very real danger of war with Russia over a country that poses no threat to Americans. As much as I disagree with President Obama, his general distaste for armed conflict in this case is a good thing.

Read More: Death Toll Climbs In Paris As Media Rushes To Downplay Connection To Muslim Terrorism

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

13 Martial Artists You Can Draw Inspiration From

December 3, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Martial arts are more than regular sports, they are a way of life. They help you transcend the limits of your condition in order to achieve something that a regular human being could not. It perfectly fits masculinity, as it embodies hard work, constant self-improvement, and humility. Every time you step in the ring, you are willing to put your past victories and skills to the test.

I purposely did not include in this list the likes of Bruce Lee, Jet Li, Helio Gracie, and other Emelianenkos as they have been covered in detail everywhere and their influence is undeniable. Those present below embody different important aspects of the study of martial arts. Many are missing from this list but I narrowed it down to thirteen particularly influential figures.

1. Alexander Karelin (born in 1967)

The greatest Greco-Roman wrestler of all time. Born a 5.5 kg baby in Soviet Siberia, his father encouraged Karelin to take up boxing and then wrestling. At the peak of his career he was 1m93, 130 kilos, could bench press more than 200 kilos and would regularly put his fridge in a bear hug and bring it up and down his eight flights of stairs.

Three-time Olympic champion in Greco-Roman Wrestling, 9-time World champion and 12-time European champion, he remained 13 years undefeated in the heaviest weight class in the sport. He was known for his reverse body lift technique where he could pick up his 130kg+ opponent, hoist him in the hair and slam him on his shoulders. He inspired fear in most of his fellow competitors, who would systematically lie on the mat, in the hope of not being thrown around.

2. Dan Kolov (born Doncho Kolev Danev, 1892-1940)

Wrestler and Bulgarian national hero, known as the “King of Wrestling” or the “Lion of the Balkan.” He emigrated to America where he became a railroad worker. His unusual strength was discovered when people witnessed him twisting rails around his neck. Twice World champion, three times European champion, with between 1500 and 2000 victories in his career, he came to fame in the times when wrestling was dirty and unforgiving, far closer to modern-day MMA than to that WWF masquerade.

He became a millionaire but gave everything to charity. Even though he emigrated to America, for him, the homeland was sacred and he refused multiple times to become an American citizen. He often said “I feel strong because I am Bulgarian.”

3. The Great Gama (born Ghulam Muhammad, 1878-1960)

Son of a famous wrestler, he was already winning renowned tournaments when he was 10 years old. He became Champion of India, when it also included Pakistan, Nepal and Bangladesh. Then, having defeated everyone around, he sailed to England where he remained unchallenged and became world champion in 1910. In a career of over 50 years, he was never defeated.

His daily routine included up to one thousand jack-knife pushups and deep knee bends. His diet included as many as six chickens, 10 litres of milk, up to half a litre of ghee and almonds crushed into an edible mixture. Bruce Lee used elements from his training, so you know that the man was an authority.

4. William E. Fairbairn (1885-1960)

Martial arts legend from England. He was, among other things, the inventor of the riot police, the bulletproof vest, the smatchet and the tactical knife Fairbairn-Sikes used by the SAS. He survived over 600 non-training street fights in his 32 year-long career as a police officer and was said to be covered from face to ankle in scars from knife wounds. Enlisted underage in the Royal Marines. Learnt how to fight in Japan and Korea.

Fairbairn once was stabbed a dozen times and left for dead. He survived and became a policeman in the dangerous city of Shangai in the early 20th century. He also studied boxing, wrestling, kung fu, savate and received black belts in Judo and Jujitsu, while bringing a scientific approach to close combat.

He also created the fighting style “Defendu” and became instructor for the British Secret Service at 55. He was notably well-spoken, never swore nor drank. I strongly recommend his book: “Get tough!”

5. Sergey Badyuk (born in 1970)

Modern-day titan, Russian legend of FSB units and hand-to-hand combat instructor for the elite military group of the GRU. Master in Kyokushin, Muay Thai and Kung Fu, you can see him as comfortable in every style, kicking a tree in Thailand or practicing Tai Chi exercises in the Chinese mountains.

Known for his sense of humour and his will to share his knowledge, he always pushes his students to the limit. I remember one of the interviews that captured his spirit :

> Basically, I am in this bar when suddenly, all these guys get in and want me dead. Had to think fast so I broke two tea glasses with a handle and start flailing in every direction trying to cut them, while progressing towards the exit and get out. Me or them, you know…

6. Ilias Iliadis (born Jarji Zviadauri in 1986)

Greek Judo practitioner. Born in Georgia to a family of skilled wrestlers and judokas, Ilias reached the top when he became Olympic champion after being three-time world champion.

His peculiar techniques are a delight to watch and display a mix of sheer strength and moves coming straight out his earlier study of Chidaoba, the Georgian national wrestling style, and the finesse acquired from the study of Judo. In addition to his talent, his vitality and good mood made him a household name in the world of international Judo.

7. Judd Reid (born in 1970)

Australian Kyokushin practitioner. When he was an 18-year old teenager, Judd's master noticed the capacities and the fire that was burning in his young apprentice. His obsession was to leave for Japan and complete the famous "1000 days of training" under Mas Oyama.

Following the path of the warrior, Judd completed in 2011 the 100 man kumite (defeat 100 black belts in a row), defying the Japanese on their own turf. He is not alone in this feat but his determination, impressive physical conditioning, and will to travel like the martial artists of old is what sets him apart from the others. The documentary on his quest, "The Journey To The 100-Man fight" is a must watch.

8. Mas Oyama (born Choi Yeong-eui 1923-1998)

His hard fighting style lead to the creation of his own discipline: Kyokushin, probably the most realistic and efficient school of Karate. Legend has it that he shaved his head before retreating to the mountains to survive and train, and swore to come back only when his hair touched his shoulders.

Deeply influenced by the biography of the sword master Miyamoto Musashi, he wandered and defeated all the renowned combatants that Japan had at the time and any opponent that presented himself to him. He was known for his capacity to break large-sized pebbles bare-handed and fight bulls, breaking their horns before fracturing their skull with a single punch. He also fought against 300 fighters in 3 days.

9. Blagoi Ivanov (born in 1989)

Bulgarian Sambo practitioner (Mastersport and world champion), Judo and MMA fighter. His successful career as a sambist found its peak when he defeated Fedor Emelianenko, which is why he found himself under the spotlight.

In 2012, Ivanov got into a fight with a local criminal figure. Some can argue about who started the fight but for anyone, that has seen the fauna that lurks in your average Bulgarian upper-end club, it could be anyone. Blagoi was stabbed in the heart and rushed to hospital. After two life-threatening surgeries and being placed in an artificial coma, he survived, never gave up, and was back to the top MMA level a year and a half later.

10. Buakaw Banshamek (formerly Por Pramuk, born in 1982)

Thai boxing and K1 Champion, he is one of the most aggressive Muay Thai competitors to ever walk this Earth, but also possesses one of the most impressive physical condition ever seen on a Thai fighter. Possessing one of the hardest kicks in his category, he has been admired for his seriousness inside and outside the ring.

His impressive record, ruggedness and inventiveness in training methods made him famous. His training videos of kicking banana trees and running in the scorching heat of Thailand never fail to motivate me to go and hit the bag when I feel lazy and it is raining outside.

11. Andy Hug (1964-2000)

K1, Kyokushin and Seidokaikan champion. From his troubled childhood, the young Andy found solace in martial arts. His natural talent quickly showed and he started representing his native Switzerland in Kyokushinkai. He then became the first foreigner to reach the final of the World Open of Kyokushin Karate.

His impressive and varied kicking abilities, his speed and his trademark kakato-geri (axe kick) brought him fame. He even gained the admiration from the Nippons and the world as he could defeat Japanese karate specialists, beat skilled boxers and rout kickboxers from various nations with the same reactivity and pugnacity. He died at the young age of 35 of leukemia.

12. Masahiko Kimura (1917-1993)

Martial arts prodigy, he became fourth Dan of judo at the age of 15. By age 20, he became the All Japan Open Weight Judo champion, a title which he maintained in undefeated fashion for 13 years. He was known for his highly intense and difficult workouts, which at one point consisted of one thousand push-ups and nine-hours of practice daily.

His o-soto-gari (judo throw with opponents side by side) was so powerful that it caused concussions and his opponents regularly asked him not to use it. He started Karate has a way to strengthen his hands and became a master in a few styles in record time. He defeated the legendary Helio Gracie and the Kimura arm lock was named after his personal favourite technique.

13. Gogen Yamaguchi (1909-1989)

This karate master and student of Chojun Miyagi had from the first day of training only one objective in life: to be the strongest. He was nicknamed “The Cat” for his agility, small stature (just over 1.50 M) and flowing hair, but this was not what made him unique. He survived the Soviet labour camps, was a master of breathing techniques, enagaged in duels to the death, and from many accounts, could project an invisible force towards his opponent that would terrorize him, without saying a word.

This old mystic was an adept of extreme meditation. He would stay hours at a time under ice cold waterfalls, would summon spirits and supposedly killed a tiger with his bare hands.

A bonus extract of his biography:

> When “leftist” groups started causing trouble at the University, Yamaguchi and his friends drove them off the Campus.

How can you not love the man?

Read More: Why Karate Is The Most Beta Martial Art

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Tips From A Special Forces Soldier On How To Become An Alpha Male

December 3, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Todd Lamb

Hey it's Todd Lamb. You might know me from my work as a tactical fitness expert and my bestselling Specforce Alpha program. Or maybe you've heard about my Million Man Mission to help guys bring back and experience the Alpha life.

And that's why I wanted to talk to you today…

You see, too many men make the mistake of thinking they need to get six pack abs or rock hard shoulders BEFORE they start acting like an Alpha Male. Truth is they've got it backwards.

There's one simple tip I'm going to share with you in a minute that actually gives you an immediate boost in testosterone, makes it easier for you to lose fat and pack on muscle, AND instantly sends out a subconscious signal to everyone around you that you are the dominant male.

Listen: humans are hardwired to "hear" this silent signal that's transferred via something called pheromones. And…

As soon as other men get a whiff they instantly tuck their tails and bow down to you. And when women sense it they immediately open up and start evaluating you as a potential mate. It's just human nature…

And it all starts with two key hormones. The first is your ally in manliness — Testosterone. The second is our enemy in your quest for Alpha status — Cortisol, which is your stress hormone. Here's why…

Science now confirms that Alpha males display high levels of Testosterone and a corresponding low level of Cortisol. And guess what…

It's acting the Alpha that CAUSES that hormonal storm. On the other hand, studies show that forcing Alphas to adopt a "Beta male" posture actually reverses these two hormones.

That's right… just allowing yourself to look like a Beta male will lower your Testosterone and raise your cortisol within 2 minutes! So…

YOU have control. You get to decide to be the Alpha. And guess what…

Once you take charge of your storm of Alpha male hormones your physique will start changing. It will be easier to lose fat. And you'll build muscle more quickly. It's simple biochemistry.

Talk about a shortcut and an unfair advantage, right?

Listen; this is how easy it is. And you can start today. Simply follow these simple body language tips and I guarantee you'll start to feel your Alpha juices flowing.

TRUTH is… you already KNOW how this feels. Think about it…

Is there something in this world you do better than anyone? Maybe you crush everyone at the pool table. Maybe you make the best martini in the neighborhood. Maybe you master the BBQ grill like nobody's business. Point is…

When you're doing that thing that you're best at… you naturally adopt Alpha male body language. However what I'm going to do right now is break it down for you so that you can practice doing it consciously ALL the time.

And when you do, you'll enjoy the biochemical storm of male hormones that kicks in and starts doing it's magic. Ok here we go:

The Alpha Sitting Posture

- Straight but comfortable
- Legs open at a reasonable width

- Occupy as much space as comfortable
- Arms over the back of the chair

The Alpha Standing Posture

- Stand straight
- Shoulders back
- Occupying maximum space (spread your legs, elbows away from body)
- Don’t rock back and forth, sway or lean
- Arms at sides — no hands in pockets
- Chest, throat and crotch exposed — never covered by hands or arms
- Eyes are up and chin is up ever so slightly

The Alpha Walk

- Avoid short choppy steps
- The Alpha has a relaxed and predatory gait
- Rhythm is predictable with a long stride that is comfortable and confident
- Erect posture with head up and eyes straight
- Relaxed back
- Heel strikes the ground first
- Smile slightly like you are thinking about something amazing

Remember, simply adopting these simple Alpha male posture traits has been proven to shift your testosterone to cortisol ratio towards the Alpha end of the spectrum. Once that happens people around you will unconsciously sense your new and dominant position in the social hierarchy.

The crazy part is, it doesn’t matter how slim, handsome or rich you are. This works for literally every man. And once your masculine hormonal storm starts raging it’ll be easier for you to build the lean and muscular body that folks expect from the Alpha. It’s a virtuous spiral that will continue carrying you upwards. However I have to tell you that there’s still a bit of extra work involved if you really want the ripped, rockhard, and manly physique that makes other men irrelevant.

There are certain workout programs that will give you even more of a boost to your male muscle building and fat loss hormones. While there are others that actually sabotage them and leave you looking puffy and soft. Unfortunately… Most of the mainstream bodybuilding style workouts give you the exact opposite of the body you desire. And I bet if you’ve tried any of them you know exactly what I mean.

No matter how hard you worked at that damn program, you always seemed to stay soft around the middle and never got the lean and muscular look you were looking for. Well luckily, I’ve used my years of Special Operations and SWAT experience — along with my extensive expertise in Tactical Fitness — to develop a unique exercise system that’s only for men who want the rugged, lean, and athletic looking physique Spec Ops guys are known for.

And because I had to build my system for men who never know where they are going to be tomorrow morning, you don’t even need to go to the gym to build the exact physique you desire.

It’s called Specforce Alpha. And it’s literally the only zero-equipment workout program designed specifically to increase your Testosterone, Growth Hormone and IGF1 naturally and without the need for dangerous and costly injections.

This system is already helping men all around the world finally achieve the Alpha male physiques they never thought possible. I’ve even had guys personally email me to let me know that Specforce Alpha literally saved their lives.

So if you want to build muscle, make other men irrelevant, and get women to notice you fast, Click Here to learn how you can do it the exact same way they did.

You can also Enjoy This FREE Video.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Media Calls For Restraint After San Bernardino Shootings Because The Suspects Aren't White Men

December 4, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Of all the potential hate crimes you could think of, gunnning down 14 people and severely injuring many others at a center for the disabled is amongst the worst. Yet this is exactly what several Muslim-Americans, including the now dead Syed Farook and his female lover Tashfeen Malik, are alleged to have done in San Bernardino, California.

However, we are not meant to see them as Muslims. That kind of group linkage is apparently only for paler people whose non-leftist views the media despise.

Whereas Elliot Rodger (ironically half-Asian) and Dylann Roof were almost immediately castigated for somehow representing angry misogynistic or racist young white men, media commentators and outlets have been very rapid in explicitly or implicitly ordering the public to remain nonjudgmental after this newest incident. "Disassociate the suspects from the Muslim community!" is the kind of mantra you can expect to hear repeatedly over the coming days.

[image]
"He's not white?! We better run the 'don't rush to judgment' piece then."

The Los Angeles Times was one of countless outlets quickly spinning the "remain calm" and judge-not-by-creed-or-race narrative:

> "Please do not implicate Islam or Muslims." #sanBernardino
>
> — Los Angeles Times (@latimes) December 3, 2015

> Farook was born in the United States in 1987. #SanBernardino

> — Los Angeles Times (@latimes) December 3, 2015

Outrage depends on the perpetrator's "privilege"

Dylann Roof was a young white man, so after just 2.3 seconds media generalizations erupted about young men, whites and anyone with a Confederate flag.

All in all, proper channels of inquiry are important. But it beggars belief that the media can help unleash spectacular generalizations about Rodger and Roof's status as young white or white-enough males with anger issues but demand more thought and deliberation when the alleged perpetrators are Muslims.

And not only were the deceased Farook and Malik supposedly murdering innocents at a disability center, they were doing so in tactical attire. I wonder how restrained the media would have been about matters of race, religion or gender if Dylann Roof had arrived in San Bernardino to kill, as outfitted as a SWAT team member and with a Confederate flag draped over the hood of his car.

Forgetting that whites are the majority of the US population and mass shootings over five people are only part of the overall homicide rate, the media is charmed by stories and opinion pieces exploring America's apparently white racist and sexist underbelly. We don't hear about as many Muslim-perpetrated shootings because Muslims are a small minority and white shootings are more politically salient for news outlets, maintaining the veneer of Caucasian privilege and obsessive racism towards minorities.

San Bernardino will probably continue to be turned upside down to promote an agenda of calling out Middle America's "prejudices" against Muslims, instead of asking deeper questions and focusing on the victims. The San Bernardino tragedy is also interesting as the media dashed to humanize Farook's relatives and, by proxy, Muslim-Americans in general. They rolled out his brother-in-law, for example.

This gesture was meticulously avoided with Dylann Roof's family, even though Roof's sister was so instrumental in having her brother taken into custody after identifying him to authorities. Farook and Mailk's family may be fine and upright individuals but there is nothing to suggest they are any more fine and upright than the relatives of Dylann Roof.

News stories aren't simply about reporting the news

The majority of Elliott Rodger's victims were actually male but the Isla Vista killings were deliberately re-rendered as misogyny.

Focus is oftentimes a cheap reality. Media outlets have a clear choice about what they air or publish. It is impossible to convey every detail of the authorities' responses, show every person fleeing from the disability center or speak to every concerned relative. These are understandable issues but what crosses the line is an obsession with mixing facts with very selective and pre-planned political roadsigns for readers and viewers.

Like a "turn left" or "turn right" on your car's Tomtom, the decision of a major newspaper to focus on quotes like "Please do not implicate Islam or Muslims" is designed to lead you to a chosen destination. In this case, it's a very politically correct one. Conversely, when a young Dylann Roof has the finger pointed at him, the roadsigns take you to a rundown suburb called "Fuck White and Male America".

Restraint only makes sense if you don't apply it selectively

[image]

Imagine the furore if Syed Farook had been Thomas Wilson or James Anderson.

Fact-based investigations, with enough room for healthy questioning, should be a hallmark of all official and public reactions to alleged crimes. This is a theme Return of Kings has dedicated itself to for its entire existence, especially in relation to allegations of rape and the need to avoid witch-hunts.

Giving the benefit of the doubt to the Muslim community only makes sense if the same courtesy is afforded to all groups, no matter what their so-called historical or privileged status is. But expect that advice to fall on deaf ears so the 24-hour news cycles can have another dig at the rape-loving, minority-hating white men of America.

Read More: Muslim Killer Craig Hicks Followed Far-Left Outlets HuffingtonPost And SPLC

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why We Should Reinstitute The Dowry

December 4, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Marriage rates are declining, and some sociologists fear that an entire generation is choosing to opt out of marriage. While there are many causes, from the financial and personal risk of divorce, to the fact that men can today receive any benefits a woman could offer him without marrying her, to the simple fact that virgin brides are in such scarce supply, one step that would go towards reinforcing a patriarchal family unit is to reinstitute the Dowry.

What is a dowry?

Dowry is money or property delivered to a husband by the bride's family upon marriage. Typically, dowry would consist of real assets of hard value, including gold, silver, diamonds, property, or other valuables. Dowry was a custom practiced throughout the world in many cultures, and can be traced back to Biblical times (Genesis 31 tells the story of Jacob being deceived by Laban, who tricked him into marrying first one of his daughters, and then the other. Withholding the dowry he was due, Laban squandered the money on himself).

Dowry provides a safety net for women

One of the original purposes of a dowry was to provide for the woman in cases of death of the husband, divorce, or extreme cases of abuse. This was in a time where women could not legally hold property, with the exception of dowry. The dowry could revert back to the woman in certain circumstances, and the woman would have an insurance policy knowing that she was not totally and completely dependent on her husband.

Code of Hammurabi

The Code of Hammurabi, Babylonian law written in the 1750s BC, provides one of the earliest forms of written law in human history. Indeed, fully one third of this code details rules for marriage, divorce, inheritance, and sexuality. The code states: “If a woman quarrel with her husband, saying ‘You are not congenial to me’, the reasons for her prejudice must be presented. If she is guiltless, and there is no fault on her part, but he leaves and neglects her, then no guilt attaches to this woman, she shall take her dowry and go back to her father’s house.”

While one must chuckle at the attempts to use logic and reason in dealing with female behaviors, this was nevertheless an early protection for women who were abused or abandoned.

The code further laid out rules, such that marriage was a contract, like any other sales contract, for the man and wife to be together, in exchange for the dowry. It was allowed that a husband could have sexual relations with a maid provided by the wife, and concubines were almost equal to wives, with the caveat that the first wife always had priority.

Men were also free to sire children by any of their slave girls, and these children would be free. (Perhaps the USA could have avoided the whole civil war if we relied on this rule, as importing of slaves was no longer allowed, and siring slave children who then became free is a far easier way of ending slavery).

The code, while primitive in some respects by today's standards in requiring equivalent punishment fitting the crime "an eye for an eye," was nevertheless more advanced and progressive in other ways than our laws today. Intent, for example, was of supreme importance, which would knock out the majority of the "regret rape" cases we hear about today–if a guy didn't think he was raping a girl, and didn't intend to violate her, it would be very difficult for her to prove that a sexual assault happened just because the woman later regretted the experience.

Dowry in the Roman Empire

Dowry was a part of almost every marriage, and was seen as the bride's family's contribution to the costs involved in setting up a new household, that the husband would now be expanding. Logically, we all know that we can live simpler, cheaper, and more frugally alone than with a woman, and ancient elders recognized the financial costs of bringing a woman into the household, with dowry being the assistance.

The dowry was a substantial financial burden, and often would be paid over a three-year period by the bride's family. One cannot help but note the impact this would have on the father of the bride, and how seriously he would consider the vows to marriage and the importance of ensuring the virginity of his daughter.

Dowry in Europe

St Nicholas in an early Christmas legend, 1425

Dowry was practiced throughout Europe for much of its history until recently. In England, a marriage would be cancelled if the bride's father failed to deliver the dowry. Rapists would be required to pay the dowry of a woman they violated, and if debts were unpaid, you went to debtors prison.

The Christmas story of Santa Claus comes from St. Nicholas throwing gold into the stockings of three poor sisters in order to provide for their dowries. Remember the next time you see “stockings hung by the chimney with care” that this is a celebration of dowry.

Some of the larger dowries paid throughout history included the entire cities of Mumbai, India and Tangier, Morocco, which the Portuguese king offered as the dowry to King Charles II of Britain to marry his daughter. Dowry continued in many European societies, ending only recently. Greece outlawed dowry in 1983.

Dowry in the USA

Dowry existed both in native tribes and the American colonists. When Pocahontas married an English settler, she brought considerable land and assets as her dowry. When John Hull, mintmaster in Boston in the 1600s, gave his 18-year-old daughter in marriage, he paid her weight in silver to the groom. In the 1900s, dowry continued primarily among the wealthy, and American daughters who wished to marry aristocrats from Europe would be expected to deliver a large dowry.

Dowry in Asia

Dowry was practiced throughout many Asian societies. Ironically, while western nations began removing the custom of dowry, it only grew in acceptance in much of Asia. Today, dowry is relatively common in India, Bangladesh, Nepal, Egypt, Morrocco, etc. As these nations have developed, and many southeast Asian men have obtained advanced training and skills, their families have demanded greater dowrys from brides who will share in the financial rewards of their husbands.

Practical reasons for the dowry

What are some reasons to bring back the dowry?

1. Recognition of the true costs of marriage

Dowry recognizes that the groom is taking on a financial (not to mention emotional) burden by taking a bride, and dowry attempts to level the playing field a bit.

2. A wiser use of dad’s money

"I've fully costed my wedding plans, Daddy."

The new family could start out with a nice nest egg, land to build a house on, assets, and cash, or they could just blow 20 grand on a crappy DJ and some overpriced dresses.

3. Reinforces the value of virginity

A dowry is a significant financial commitment, and a father would not risk the loss of this investment because his daughter was impure.

4. Clearly states the value of marriage

While this was more obvious in the past, when a woman would be more of a burden on her father or husband, a dowry recognizes that marriage is the end goal, because the father will have to keep supporting the daughter financially until she finds a husband.

5. Protects women in case of neglect, abandonment, or divorce

A dowry is an insurance policy for women who are in a truly bad marriage.

6. Discourages divorce

Women today can financially benefit from divorcing a husband, and there is no test of love or neglect required. A woman can divorce “Cause feelings” and find herself receiving a free income for life. In the case of dowry, a woman would forfeit her dowry, and have to pay again to a second husband if she attempted to divorce and remarry.

7. Feminists hate dowry

Finally, if feminists hate it, it must be good. Social media is full of anti-dowry propaganda. Considering that dowry was originally instituted as a protection for women who upheld their end of the marriage contract, one must be very suspicious of this opposition.

Indeed in several countries, men are threatened with imprisonment for taking part in this institution that is fundamentally a part of marriage itself. It’s a shame we don’t see any of the “defense of marriage” types rally to support dowry.

We’re gonna need to see some stats on that…

Read More: Traditional Marriage Is How Past Societies Prevented Drama

Max Roscoe

is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

The Fountain Of Patriarchy

December 4, 2015 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Two of my chief aims with my articles on ROK, are to give glory to God, and to aptly describe theological truths in terms suited to men. Today's article, I hope, will do both by touching upon a theme suitable both to the season and to this website: Christ the King. While this topic has many particularly Catholic meanings, today I use a broader brush.

"Patriarchy" is much maligned in our days, despite being the ennobling and civilizing force that it is; while many men have shaken free from much of the bogus propaganda against masculinity, some men remain sympathetic to complaints against the source of patriarchy—God, the King and All-Father. The Feast of Christ the King comes near the end of the Liturgical year, on the last Sunday in October, emphasizing that the divine Kingdom which will be fully realized on Earth at the Parousia, exists even now and has rights over the world.

The world is in a disastrous state at present; the noblest and manliest principles in society have been besieged with special ferocity for five centuries now, at the hands of a revolutionary action against legitimate authority. Whether of King, Priest, Husband or Father, perverse revolutionaries wish to abolish the offices of manly headship; we have inherited a culture almost entirely lacking them, in any authentic form.

Men Must Lead In Private And Public Life

A woman flourishes only under the protection and supervision of a man. Women generally lack a certain self-sufficiency, and their beliefs and sentiments are influenced largely by their emotional ties to others. Men can more easily stick to reason and principle despite pressures and attachment. A man can trust a woman to be sensible only so far, nearer or farther based on her quality; but in the end, a man understands that he cannot, must not, rely on a woman to stay the course indefinitely, piloting herself by the ship of reason.

He must provide an attractive and compelling pre-eminence in himself, to which she may uplift her gaze and give her loyalty. Then, when her inner resources falter, her devotion will have been trained towards him habitually. In a good man, the effort so to acclimate a woman to himself has her benefit equally in mind as his own, and both in accord with reason and justice.

Carrie Nation: “Bible-Believing” Church Lady, or Herald of the Dawning, Satanic Age?

The concept of “game” hits upon this perennial truth about the sexes. Some men use “game” contrary to reason and nature; I think that, so long as “game” puts a man in touch with the facts of nature, grants him a more masculine comportment, and imparts a sensitivity to his role and responsibilities as a man, a natural leader of women, it is a good thing.

In this sense, what we call “game,” our great-grandfathers called simple horse-sense. Every good husband should give his wife the gift of a stalwart but benevolent leader. He loves his wife, but knows that she neither wants nor is able to be free from the ennobling guidance and prudent protection of her lord husband. He must be the man to whom her instincts are trained, and he should strive to be worthy of that position; he must manage her emotions wisely and manfully. Certainly he must not meet her emotional needs in the manner she insists upon, which is likely not only to be wrong, but even to be a (perhaps subconsciously) calculated attempt at probing him for weakness, or at self-justification.

Masculinity Is An Analogue Of Divine Sovereignty

In one sense, we can say that God is “beyond gender.” But in another, equally true sense, masculinity, maleness, paternity, are qualities more likened unto the divinity, whereas femininity, womanliness and motherhood are qualities more likened unto the whole order of creation. This is because masculinity is the active and fecundating principle; femininity is the passive and fecundated principle.

The more a thing is ruled and acted upon, the more feminine it is; the more it is (authentically) active, the more masculine. God is Actus Purus, Pure Act, pure Fatherhood; He is the Father "from whom all fatherhood in heaven and earth derives its name," of which our manhood is a proportioned manifestation. Creation exists along a spectrum of being more or less feminine, more or less masculine, in a sense, as it aligns with act or potential.

No, I'm not saying that every man has a "feminine side," but I am saying that every man, in relation to His Maker, is a subject, is ruled, is in a dependent position, and that this is more analogous to the feminine than the masculine. But of course, as a man, the particular nature of his sex is an analogue of the Fatherhood, the Kingdom, the Priesthood, of God.

In future articles I'll talk more about this, and about how—in Christianity, at least—the spiritual life is described as a direct participation in God… i.e., how God helps the creature to become more manly, more excellent, more free, more strong, more active, more like Himself by participation in Himself. The spiritual life is a deifying, and therefore a masculinizing, process. And the services for many of the female saints praise precisely this element of their character: that they became more manly than many men.

"O God, Who, amongst other wonders of Thy power, hast conferred the martyr's triumph even upon the fragile sex; grant propitiously, that we who remember the birth unto eternal life of Blessed Agatha, Thy virgin and martyr, may advance towards Thee by her example." – For the Commemoration of St. Agatha

One also sees that God has given men a special insight into His relationship to the creation, by virtue of our intermediary position as male creatures; we have something of the ruler and something of the subject within ourselves. Our experience as the masters of womankind gives us some insight into God's experience with all of us; our experience as subjects of God gives us insight into a woman's subordination (and, often enough, inconstancy).

This should make us better subjects of God, and better rulers of women and society. Sometimes I find men drawing near to the Red Pill who still have flatly immature ideas about God and atheism—ideas fully supported by the same propagandists that brought us Feminism, Socialism, etc. Often this involves objections to God's rigidity, His intolerance, His use of force, His jealous mastery that brooks no rival.

But these are the complaints by which a feminist derides the actually beneficial qualities of patriarchy. "Red Pill" men usually see the crisis caused by the absence of male influence, but male influence is a shade of the Divine: the Supreme Masculine, the forceful vindicator of Good and punisher of evil, from Whom there could be no appeal. If society needs a king, if it needs a priest, if it needs husbands and fathers, let it look to Him from Whom these offices proceed. If we wonder why the world rejects patriarchy and authority, I will tell you: it is because it first rejected the High King Himself.

Christ Crowns Holy Roman Emperor St. Henry II, while angels bestow sword and scepter upon him, and sainted clergy support him.

The Feast of Christ the King stands at the center of the Church's reaction to an aggressive liberalism. It came in the wake of centuries of ideological and military revolutions in the West—Protestantism, Humanism, Atheism, Republicanism, Democracy, Socialism and Communism. The Church took pains to affirm that God had rights not only over the spiritual realm and the Church, but over all society, over all men, over all nations, which absolutely trump any imagined "human right" formed in abstraction from the principles of Truth and Justice.

To attempt to establish a system of "rights" abstracted from what is Right, is to aid the rebellion of infirmity and folly against Strength and Wisdom. And this is why our times are literally perverse (from Latin perverto, "turn all the way around"), that is, upside-down; Democracy and Republicanism exalt demagogues and mobs over justice itself; Feminism inverts the natural dynamic of the sexes; Socialism and Social Marxism demand the forfeiture of the fruits of a society's creators to its venal consumers; the gay agenda attempts to equate health and fecundity with disease and sterility. The theme is the same: Righteous, Manly Authority is bad; it wants to stop us from voting for free dildos.

I invite men to reflect on the great right and dignity of being a man, of belonging to the sex upon whose brow lordliness and mastery sit by right. I encourage them to reflect on what obligations and duties this involves; to reflect upon what a man must strive to be, if he is worthy of the title, man.

I encourage them to reflect on the limitations of the fairer sex, and how we should strive to purge any womanliness from our character, and to grow manlier, more like God, by virtue. If we value authority, justice, truth, mastery and excellence in the created order, let us direct our gaze to the supreme Masculine, the supreme Origin of all Fatherhood, and to the highest of all Kings. To reject Him, especially for His quality of inflexible dominion, is to reject a particularly masculine quality of our own souls, and to be allies of the Revolution against noble patriarchy.

Reconciliation with the principle of righteous authority – rather than “democratic fairness” – is an indispensable precedent to a true return of kings.

Read More: Why We Need To Fight For The Patriarchy

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Germany Finds Homes For Migrants As Penniless Greek Women Sell Their Bodies For Pennies

December 5, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As Germany focuses its attention on accommodating at least 800,000 new Syrian arrivals, 75%+ of whom are not Syrian, cash-strapped Greek women are working as prostitutes for as little as two euro ($2.12). Having refused to help its fellow EU state anymore, Berlin has hypocritically sought to appease self-hating Germans, who relish the prospect of extinguishing traditional German ethnic identity, and already lavished billions in government funds on finding homes, jobs and social security for Middle Eastern migrants. These migrants are usually unwilling or unable to prove who they even are.

You might remember, just prior to the massive spike in hundreds of thousands of young, able-bodied Middle Eastern men seeking "asylum" in Germany, that Chancellor Angela Merkel's government refused to give more money to Greece. The Greek people, especially its young adults, students, pensioners and disabled, had labored under the weight of onerous austerity measures for over half a decade. Yet Berlin was, aside from a few common sense extensions to Greece's debt deadlines, unwilling to ever budge. So what sinister game is now being played with all the money being splurged on non-Europeans at the expense of poverty-stricken EU citizens?

Merkel's about-face

The only thing more in-your-face than Merkel's cleavage is her newfound disdain for traditional German and European identity.

At the time, having strong ethnic links to Germany myself, I completely supported Merkel's hardline attitude. After all, if Berlin was coming down strongly on the Greeks, this would surely flow to non-European immigration and similar maladies as well. Readers may call me naive for having had that perception, but I had good reason. Anyone familiar with native German media, not the BBC or CNN, would have sensed the groundswell that began in earnest five years ago. PEGIDA and other expressions of the average German's fury at political correctness are merely the result of long-term debates within the country.

As early as 2010, Merkel herself was publicly criticizing Germany's failed multiculturalism. Even the former Socialist federal minister Thilo Sarrazin and other nominal left-wingers joined establishment figures in castigating Germany's essentially suicidal policies of immigration. Sarrazin's book, Deutschland Schafft Sich Ab ("Germany Abolishes Itself"/"Germany Does Itself In"), was unsurprisingly the best-selling book of the decade. German-language reports in particular evinced what seemed to be a rapid change in German elites' feelings towards foreigners arriving in Germany for thinly veiled economic reasons.

What Greeks? What Europeans? We see only Middle Easterners

Ladies and gentlemen, I give you women and children refugees.

Meanwhile, Greek women selling sex are now trying to subsist based on the price of a sandwich. Of course, mainstream commentators will always put the spotlight on females suffering from Greece's spectacular implosion, hence the prostitute angle emphasized by The Washington Post and other media outlets. However, we should not dismiss this narrower lens because it still speaks volumes about the skewed priorities of Berlin, Brussels and the SJWs clamoring for both these governments to accept another 10 million "refugees."

If Greeks were not worthy of further monies from Berlin and other richer European governments (and I'm not saying this isn't the case), 800,000+ Middle Easterners are certainly not deserving of the gargantuan assistance they are presently receiving. That is, of course, unless Merkel and others are seeking to spiritually expand the European Union's borders well beyond Europe itself, in some sort of macabre nod to the very senile George Soros.

What about East Germany?

East Germany's housing, unemployment and other economic crises are being deliberately ignored by Berlin, which is preferencing non-German illegal immigrants and "refugees".

Forget Greece and its penniless new prostitutes for a moment. East Germany, which has only been reunited with West Germany for a quarter of a century, still lags behind the rest of the country. Nonetheless, this is the part of Germany where the biggest load of so-called Middle Eastern refugees have been officially resettled. That PEGIDA's headquarters is in Dresden, a city in the Free State of Saxony in the east, is no mistake at all. East Germans have incessantly sought better living conditions, only to be slapped in the face by a central government more interested in providing for the needs of non-Germans.

Britain's Financial Times is one of the reputable publications that has called out East Germany's stagnant position. Its per capita output is only two thirds that of the average of western and southern German states, unemployment is nearly twice as high and the real economic gains it made from its low 1989 base leveled off a decade and a half ago. None of this matters, though, as Merkel and her CDU cronies have no solid electoral base in East Germany. And by dumping a greater proportion of new non-European arrivals there, they don't risk alienating or losing their voter heartlands.

Welcome to George Soros' Brave New Europe

Decrepit billionaire financier George Soros is not the only powerful person who wants to see a borderless Europe from the outside, not just within. This is a view increasingly shared by Angela Merkel and others, such as French President François Hollande, who will not face the demographic crisis boiling up for years within their respective countries. In conjuring up fantastical dreams of peaceful side-by-side co-existence between Europeans and anyone else from the rest of the world, they are throwing languishing people in East Germany, Greece and elsewhere out of their sights and into an economic abyss.

Japan is free to keep its population ethnically stable. So, too, is Korea. Arab countries are even permitted to prevent the entry of other Arabs. But not Europe or its offshoots in America, Australia, New Zealand and Canada. It is only we who are expected to sacrifice the well being of large segments of our own population so that millions of foreigners can live off our national largesse.

A sad result of this, among many, is Greek women whoring themselves out for spare change on a Monday or Tuesday night.

Read More: Why We Should Prioritize Christian Refugees From The Middle East

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Are We Unconsciously Submitting To Concealed Totalitarianism?

December 5, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Prisoners Of Ourselves is a compilation of lectures given by by Gunduz Vassaf, a Turkish man educated in America. His main thesis is that we accept invisible totalitarianism into our lives without realizing it. The standardization of culture, food, and consumer products all forces us into a mold, and what we may think of as creative expression is still within a model forced upon us under the guise of personal freedom. If you choose not to participate in this model, which is becoming increasingly impossible thanks to how it's intertwined with consumerism, you're ostracized and then exiled for not conforming.

> …the variety in human behaviour with respect to all its aspects ranging from type of sexual activity to paradigms of thinking is becoming one-fold. People are to be judged against a world consumer's standard totalitarian criterion of normalcy.

When you standardize life and culture, you also standardize thought, ensuring it stays within a sphere that doesn't threaten those with power, who are actively encouraging the standardized model. Such standardization is an effective method of wealth extraction and human control.

Vassaf takes the concept "everything about modern life is totalitarian" and applies it to anything he can find, even the structure of our homes, stating that it is totalitarian to have living spaces that are already delineated with a room to cook, a room to sleep, and so on. As you can imagine, sometimes his idea works, but often it doesn't, especially when he advocates for social justice ideas of gender fluidity and other labels that critique features of advanced civilizations as "oppressive."

While Prisoners Of Ourselves had some good spots, a work like this could possibly be used as a justification for leftist ideologies by gangs of women with blue hair, especially since it pushes subjectivity by advocating for what doesn't feel totalitarian and oppressive instead of having rigid moral and quality standards.

Daylight is totalitarian

> Daylight is a decoy. Light blinds us. It is at night that our eyes are wide open. All our other sense are also more attentive, for the forces of order have shut down their machines. At night we listen to silence, see into darkness, give free reign to our bodies and imagination. One is no longer the consumer of countless messages that try to imprison our senses during the day. The constant humming of the oppressive megamachine has stopped. Now, the source of energy is within. The night is the background for man's performance of the mind.
>
> […]
>
> The "meaning of life" is felt and questioned at night. Nobody talks about it over lunch. Life is a subject of the night.

Judgement is totalitarian

> An independent man will never get himself into a situation where he will allow himself to be judged.

If we substitute "independent man" with "500 pound man," would he still make this assertion?

Language is totalitarian

> From birth on, the more the child is trained in the use of spoken language, the more he wears a "straight-jacket" in terms of his relationship with life. The infinitely immense capability of the brain to differentiate, to see things both singly and in interchanging relations on the basis of their particular qualities and characteristics, becomes more limited when the child gradually confines himself to our words, to abstraction and to generalization.
>
> […]
>
> Because of the spoken word, because of the exaggerated dominance of the spoken word, we consciously experience less. We see, hear, smell, touch, taste less. We bypass many experiences. We attend less to life and more to our simplification and particular abstraction.
>
> Of the infinite variety that we could experience, the few that we actually do > experience are immediately codified and standardized in words.

>
> […]
>
> Speechlessness leads to an expansion of the senses, silence to a heightened form of communication. For in silence we share a bonding that encompasses and goes beyond verbal exchanges. Silence is the gestalt of all that is sensed. The spoken word is an intrusion into silence, an intrusion into wholeness. It disturbs, differentiates, categorizes and finally reorders a minute part of our total experience.
>
> […]
>
> Speech is a futile act of "momentary immortality." A cry of, "I exist." Silence is a consciousness of our relation to both time and timelessness. It is the infinite and the speck of dust at the same time. Silence is many dimensional, multi-sensual. Speech, in its categorical, ordering fashion, can only convey some of the experiences of the five senses.
>
> […]
>
> The moment we reduce a multi-dimension, multi-sensual experience to one spoken word, we destroy the infinite richness surrounding us. We castrate the imagination of man and impose a totalitarian order. We have imprisoned the world with words. In the process we have also become prisoners of our own words.

Words and language are being used by globalists to control the masses, so voluntarily relinquishing the use of words to fight back would then automatically lead to a self-imposed imprisonment of your own "free will." Silence in the face of words is a pacifist strategy that will likely only increase the oppression he speaks of.

Psychology is totalitarian

> The role of the psychiatrist is oppressive. His duty is to help people conform to the norms and standards set by the ruling elite. Whether he is successful in his work with the individual is of no great importance for society. If he is "successful," the "patient" returns to society as a docile, co-operative citizen. If the psychiatrist is unsuccessful, the "patient" is ostracized, either locked up and put away in a hospital or drugged up and banished to the streets.
>
> […]
>
> The role of the psychiatrist is oppressive because his primary interest is not in the health or so-called sanity of the individual. His main obligation is to uphold the accepted standards of behaviour established by the ruling elite, class, part or culture. In upholding such standards, the psychiatrist reinforces those very institutions that limit man's growth and freedom.
>
> […]
>
> "Understanding, predicting and controlling behavior" is the unwritten logo of our > social sciences—especially psychology as a behavioural science. That is the purpose of psychology. Whose interests does it serve? The collected information with respect to our behaviours is the basis of power for the post-industrial (post-modern) establishment(s). Information about our behaviour enables them to control society, to control their “citizens,” to control and exploit us. Information is power.

Standardization of man is oppressive

> The standardization of man, madness, and freedom in the twentieth century has removed any sense of intensity in the life itself. Nothing is intensely felt. There is no time for depth. All experiences must be fleeting. Experiences are like chattel—to be bought or gotten ride of, to be experienced at will. We choose experience as if buying something from a department store.
>
> […]
>
> In spite of the permeation of standardization and totalitarianism, those who can still be made are indeed very strong and unique individuals. One should not use the word “mad” lightly, for there are very few who can be accorded that privilege. It is a privilege accompanied by great suffering. It is a suffering that is rarely alleviated. The path of the mad is so lonely that although he may have empathy with the world and the cosmos, he is also beyond praise and punishment.

Modern apartments are oppressive

> The space-efficient apartments of recent origin, reflects the utmost in the totalitarianism of living space. When looked in from the outside, one often sees that all TV sets are in the same place in one apartment building after another. The couch where one sits to watch television is also in the same place. We eat, defecate, and have sex exactly in the same surroundings. It is very simple for a complete stranger to walk into a flat and find everything as if he had been living there for years. The living spaces of today no longer reflect the individual nor the cultural differences of their occupants.
>
> […]
>
> A bird’s nest, which is the result of instinctive behaviour, shows more variation and use of natural surroundings than the block apartments we are building throughout the world today.

Hero-worship is totalitarian

> Not daring to live in freedom, we delegate it to heroes whom we worship. Heroes are characteristic of the totalitarianism in us. They are also an absolute must for totalitarian regimes.

> […]
>
> Heroes are as clearly defined and as standardized as a McDonald's hamburger. The hero in all his details must meet with all the prejudices and value judgments of society.
>
> […]
>
> All the attributes of a hero must meet the ideals, values, doctrines of the establishment of the ruling class(es). There must be nothing ambivalent or ambiguous about him. All images of those who are presented to us as heroes are totalitarian.
>
> […]
>
> Without heroes we are individuals. With heroes we are a group. Individuals have consciences and principles. Groups adjust and have laws. Individually we live, collectively we survive.
>
> […]
>
> Communists write stories about brave children fighting the enemies of the people, capitalists have their "rags to riches" heroes, Jesuits tell tales about the lives of the saints, nation-states worship their liberators.
>
> Public relations agents representing sports figures, actors and singers pimp their clients to children and the young.
>
> It is critically important for totalitarian rule to "capture" or "kidnap" the child's mind with a hero. The child unquestioningly assumes a system of values and a particular ideology through heroes. As adults we often continue the allegiances we had as children.
>
> […]
>
> A free man can have no heroes, for a hero implies the status quo. It implies a model to be emulated.

Information is totalitarian

> Our so-called information society has a shorter memory span and knows less history than perhaps any society of previous centuries. This is not because of censorship or a major calamity like the ancient library in Alexandria burning down. Rather, we are faced with an information overflow that makes us unselective in what we hear, see or read. There is so much news that it has become a background noise in our daily lives. Just like fast food, fast sex and fast culture, fast news is also totalitarian in that it leads to a people who are desensitized and who can no longer discriminate.
>
> […]
>
> Before printing presses news passed by word of mouth. In a way, there were as many newspapers, as many journalists, as there were people. The eyewitness > accounts and reactions became the collective information of the people. News was indeed by the people for the people of the people. Media specialists and technology have facilitated the establishment's control over news and information.

>
> […]
>
> The refined totalitarian societies have discovered that what works for children is also valid for adults. What is new and fast will always arouse our attention and in emphasizing the present, eradicate the past. A society with little or no sense of history is easy to govern. Such a society is uncritical and easily led by the establishment.
>
> […]
>
> The greatest fear of those who rule is not the opposition but not to be taken seriously.

Most of the author's essays were published in 1986, well before the age of the internet, which has only amplified the problems he spoke of.

Sexual identity is oppressive

Vassaf takes a hard left turn on sexual identity by adopting a 100% blank slate position (i.e. gender is a social construct). I doubt he could have imagined the tranny horror show that would happen 30 years later, because he seems to sincerely believe that allowing men to become women would free them from totalitarianism.

He fails to understand that our biological destiny would make this change lead to psychological suffering, mental disorders, drug addiction, and promiscuity. He also did not consider that the ruling elite can foster sexual confusion in order to create weak individuals that won't pose a threat to their power.

> The enforcement of sexual identity is one of the most oppressive uses of power.

The elite he so hates is now using his ideas to keep their elite position. He missed when failing to consider that nuclear families with rigid sex roles is a far greater threat to the elite than sexually confused individuals who pick identities that they "feel" are correct before becoming a slave to their sexual wants.

He also sympathizes with feminism but at least saw how it could lead to a new form of totalitarianism. The "seeds" he spoke of has indeed become all grown up.

> "Look at me as a person not as a sexual object," is a statement of revolt against the existing order. It however denies the existence of sex and carries seeds of yet a great totalitarianism. Our technological innovations along with notions of sexual egalitarianism are taking us towards the denial of evolution based on male and female potentialities.

If we deny male identity and masculinity, would that help the elite maintain power?

Consumer choice is totalitarian

> Like consumer preferences, all types of allegiances are also the result of one-sided relationships. They are simply chosen. The one-sided choice is the most complete power relationship. Is it the ultimate in domination. But it is also a fantasy. For although our choices and support is wooed by political parties, sellers of consumer goods, entertainers and religious sects, it is actually they who control us by offering, limiting and defining our choices. In decided to choose we assign rulers. It is they who amass fortune and power through our support.

The increase in choice that we have is an illusion, since that choice is centered around trivial matters of pre-packaged experiences and entertainment junk that does not threaten the power holders. We have what Vassaf calls “material and psychological obesity.”

Seeking immortality is totalitarian

> The American psychiatrist Robert Lifton holds that the motivating force behind all our actions is to seek immortality. He cites four types: religious (the eternal soul), genetic (our seed living on through our offspring), creative (our names will live on through our works), and historical (with each action, each one of us is creating and becoming part of history). Against, another typical contemporary view that man must somehow belong forever, leave his imprint in history and dominate the future. Nothing about love, joy, sharing or merely playing.

Hey guys, stop trying to change the world and play with each other instead.

Setting goals is totalitarian

> Once one has a fixed goal—a goal to be reached at all costs with dedication, determination and sacrifice—it seems that one has become subordinate to one’s goal, that life itself has become subordinate to the goal.

Even if he is right, he offers no alternative besides going on to state that goal-setting interferes with “love.” Then wouldn’t love be the goal, and wouldn’t you be subordinating yourself to that? A lot of his ideas were not completely thought through.

Pre-recorded music is totalitarian

> Musical instruments for example left our houses to be replaced by records and discs. The family no longer makes music together. We still dance, but it is no longer an expression of our lives. Our dances come and go out of fashion in accordance with the dictates of the music industry.

Photography is totalitarian

> Our relationship with the camera manifests how the push button image is > substituted for the real. With each relentless snapshot, all that is photographed is consumed, exhausted from its natural setting to become part of a series of unconnected images.

>
> […]
>
> We in our century have become image consumers.
>
> […]
>
> With the first recorded images of man in cave painting some 35,000 years ago, image and magic were intertwined. The image had an all encompassing life giving presence, before which man was humble. In our century it is the image that is endlessly manipulated by man. The image is no longer lasting, being constantly created and destroyed. By ruling over images one rules over people. The image makers and the image destroyers are one and the same. They are the rulers.

Conclusion

There are enough leftist ideas in the book that I suspect Vassaf would give lukewarm support to today's social justice world order that is being used by the elite to destroy the family unit and traditional society while depopulating certain races, but it came in bursts and wasn't entirely distracting from his more reasonable points. We shouldn't be surprised of this since Vassaf has spent too much time in toxic academic atmospheres.

While Vassaf does have a handful of good ideas, he tries to apply one model for everything, forcing square pegs into holes that don't quite fit. I'm not sure if he's trying to be an agent of destruction to the traditional and godly order or if he's just an idealistic academic who wants peace, love, and sharing for all mankind. Either way, his work is not especially useful for masculine men who are finding themselves in the minority.

Read More: "Prisoners Of Ourselves" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Things John Lennon Should Have Imagined About A World With Virtual Reality

December 6, 2015 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

It appears that 2016 will be the year that virtual reality (VR) will start to matter in the mainstream. Both Sony PlayStationVR and the much talked about Occulus Rift headsets are planned to be unleashed on the consumer market in the first half of the year. It remains to be seen how much actual content there will be initially, but once the hardware is released we can expect it to flow more and more rapidly.

No doubt the hardware will also improve quickly too. All sorts of tricks will be added to turn what is now basically a wrap around screen in a helmet into a more total sensory experience.

One interesting feature of commentary about VR is that it is almost entirely concerns itself with two areas. First, games and entertainment—we hear about the even more exciting ways we can watch or participate in even more immersive fantasies. Great stuff I'm sure, and certainly worth experiencing, but of limited importance to anyone not, at that moment, wearing a silly helmet.

Amazing! I really can see through it

The second group make comments about the impact on people and society. Strangely though the focus is always on the negative, depicting people engaging in an orgy of game playing and simulated sex while completely losing interest and motivation for real life. A trap to be sure and some will fall into it, but it's very much a Luddite view of what may prove one of the great life improving technical advances. For people who are not seduced into losing the difference between reality and fantasy, VR may present an opportunity to forge a better life.

John Lennon's song imagine goes through a list of things which could be eliminated in his imaginings of a better time or place. Socialist nonsense mostly appealing to totalitarians and their useful idiots, but a handy format for looking at some impacts of VR. It's always easier to predict the areas eliminated by change than it is to predict the new uses of technology. So we will focus on the impressive list of present day things which virtual reality might eliminate or dramatically reduce.

1. Imagine no schools

Is this the real school of tomorrow?

School, college, university, and training are mostly about learning rather than doing. The student aims not to produce a real world impact or product so much as to change his own mind into a form which might be productive and influential in the future.

Imagine migrating education to VR with little need to leave home at all. Over time it should be possible for every student to take classes from the best teacher in the world. The need for land, buildings, teachers and equipment could be reduced to a fraction of what is required today.

2. Imagine no offices

Will physical offices go down the drain?

Offices work is paper, computer and mind work. Presently it requires huge and expensive buildings, equipment, and infrastructure.

Imagine migrating office work to VR with little need to leave home at all. Visit your tax accountant while getting a back massage. Have a chat with your boss wearing a perfectly pressed, automatic suit avatar. Meanwhile you are at the gym, on an exercise bike. All those impressive, but now obsolete, office towers in the center of cities? That's where your new apartment is.

3. Imagine no down time

Among the more annoying features of life at present are the inevitable gaps between value adding activities. Mobile phones and other technology have already made some progress in using up this time, but so far it is really more about eliminating boredom than doing useful things for most people.

Imagine a world where VR offers genuinely worthwhile or productive ways to use down time for work or leisure. Just set the alarm on the VR headset and it starts. Spend a few minutes polishing that report at the office, socialize, attend a class or just watch the running of the bulls as if you were really there right next to that poor guy who gets a horn through some private part of his body. It remains to be seen whether the elimination of down time is a feature or a bug of VR, but it is one change that will take place.

4. Imagine no first times

I broke my leg on the first jump but it didn't even hurt

One of the big problems in life is that people have to learn to perform a task before they can be good at it. Many of the failed and shoddy jobs that gets done result from this learning process.

Imagine the process of learning by doing was migrated to VR in many instances. From changing a light bulb, to changing an engine, to building a house, to creating your own gigantic stone sculpture. A wide range of tasks could be done, without the risks to self and property, in VR and with the best instruction. Then do them in real life as a second, or more, timer. It would even be possible for children to learn to do such tasks before they are old enough to be capable of taking them on.

5. Imagine no commute

A large fraction of time spent on working is really just time getting to and from home and different tasks, meeting and viewings. Trips from home to work and back again are an important part of this, but only a part.

Imagine a world where a large fraction of trips involving offices, schools, retail and many other tasks are no longer needed. Many of the remaining trips would be quicker because of reduced congestion. Less danger, less cost, less noisy vehicles and a world where walking is pleasant again.

… and that’s just the beginning

Why oh why didn’t I take the blue pill?

It is a consistent feature of new, broadly applicable technologies that they throw up applications no one thought of. Quite likely the most important applications of VR are yet to be thought of. After all, who would have predicted that the invention of the laser would eliminate the need for price tags, or that wood pulp based writing paper would lead to a more pleasant experience in the bathroom?

Sadly some people really will use VR to live degenerate, fantasy lives. Natural selection will do its usual work in reducing such problems over time along with drug use, homosexuality, contraception, abortion, low birth rates and other false trails fostered by the modern world. So just relax and get ready for a whole new world of opportunity.

Read More: 5 Things The Corporate World Taught Me

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

3 Keys To Meditation For A Beginner

December 6, 2015 | by Zeus Storys | Link | Original Link

The power of meditation is incredible. Just meditating for a mere ten minutes can significantly reduce your stress and boost your mood. However, the biggest reason I do it is to become content with myself. With all the bullshit that surrounds me every day from all aspects of life, it is key to set time aside just for me.

Once you can focus on the current moment everything becomes clearer. Social interactions, working out, your vision, and your family all become more lucid after meditating. It also helps you not worry about things as much.

As humans we are programmed from our ancestors to worry, because that's what kept us alive as species for so long. Thousands of years ago we had to worry about all sorts of things: predators, foreign armies, and even your own tribe killing you. In our current day in age, it can actually hurt us more than it helps us.

Today humans don't have much to worry about, so we make up things to worry about. We worry about irrelevant things like what others think about us, what our boss thinks about us, and what is completely out of our control. All this worrying can put a drain on your mind and prohibit you from growing yourself. With the power of meditation you can block out these negative worrying thoughts and begin to focus on what really matters.

As for meditation its self-there are many different forms and names, but for the beginner I have three keys to have a successful session.

1. Have The Right Setting

A big part of meditation is the ability to connect with yourself and only yourself. This is hard to do when you have outside distractions hindering you. That's why I suggest you meditate in a quiet place that you know you won't be bothered. It doesn't have to be absolute silence, but it should be a place where you find peace in.

Also it should be a place that has somewhat dim light. You want your mind to be at peace, and that is hard to do when you have a bright light shining right at you. Some people like to meditate in absolute darkness; while this is better than a bright light, it is not ideal. A lot of the time having no light whatsoever can put a sense of fear in our subconscious, and can hurt your chances of having a good meditation session.

When you're in your ideal room it is crucial to find a spot that is comfortable to sit for an extended period of time. A floor with carpet is great because it provides stability for your back, but at the same time does not put too much discomfort on the bones in your butt. Another option you might have is a bed. While this does cushion your butt, it can put unnecessary strain on your back, so I do not advise this spot.

2. Set A Time And A Timer

One of the things a beginner to meditation struggles with is the ability to stay focused for an extended period of time. The beginner's mind wanders easily because it has not yet been trained through meditation. That's why I suggest beginners start with short sessions and build their way up. A good baseline for the first few sessions is five minutes. While this might not seem that long, it is actually very hard to stay focused on your mantra for this amount of time if you're a beginner. Once you become more experienced you can go for more time, but at first you must start small so you can train your brain to stay focused.

In order to know when you've completed your time you're going to need to set a timer.

Many people advice against this because they say it distracts you from the meditation and more on the timer and when it goes off it abruptly ends your session. While this may be true, if you leave it up to the beginner to time it by himself the sessions will be shorter than intended. A session that he thought felt like was five minutes might have been closer to three or four. There is no cheating with timers.

Once the timer goes off it is important not to suddenly stop meditating. If you just suddenly stop, your results from that session will suffer. Instead when that timer goes off you should continue meditating until you feel content with it. It might be just one more minute of meditating or five more, but the point is that you should go until YOU feel satisfied with the session.

3. Have Something To Focus On

This is probably the most important part of meditating. This could be a mantra or it could just be your breathing, but you have to always return to that to stay on track. A mantra is a word or sound repeated to aid concentration such as “hummm,” but it can also be an word that calms you. In my experience I have always found it best to focus on my breathing, but it is different for everyone. You just have to experiment with all of them to find out which one is best for you.

Once you have that mantra or your breathing to focus on, you’re going to have hold on to that focus through the entire session. This may be really hard for a beginner, and you will find that your mind will wander onto other things about your daily life, but recognize those thoughts and shut them down and return to your focus.

In those first couple sessions these thoughts are going to pop into your head all the time, but don’t let that discourage you. The key for the first few sessions is having the ability to recognize these outside thoughts.

Switching up your focus throughout sessions can also be beneficial. Try switching up a focus to every other session to experiment with what fits best.

Conclusion

All of these things above are great pointers, but the best learning material is experience. Through experience you will find what fits best for you and what your goals are with meditating. Use this article for help, but don’t rely on it and also don’t get discouraged if you don’t find success in your first few sessions. It will come to you it’s a matter of time and persistence.

Read More: The Top 5 Benefits Of Meditation For Men

Zeus Storys
I'm just a man with one purpose. To discover the unknown and master myself in the process. I also like writing on my site ZeusStorys.com. You can also find me on Twitter and Facebook.

Feminist Book Is Being Handed Out To Thousands Of Swedish Teenagers

December 6, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Over 100,000 copies of We Should All Be Feminists are being sent to Swedish students in their second year of high school. A number of organizations, including two big unions and a women's lobby group, have decided to hand Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie's book out for free.

The generous organizations say they want it to be "an introduction for girls and boys who never before thought about injustices between the sexes."

> We do it with the hope that they will read Adichie's words and understand that feminism is the key to unlock their narrow cages. Feminism makes it possible for both girls and boys to be themselves.

It's a move reminiscent of how the government in Nazi Germany gave all newlywed couples a free copy of Mein Kampf. But is it really fair to compare this piece of literature to Hitler's notorious manifesto? Let's find out.

A Nigerian perspective

Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie was born in Nigeria. She studied in America and received Masters degrees in creative writing and African studies. Today she's a critically acclaimed novelist.

In 2014, We Should All Be Feminists was published. It is based on a speech the author held in December 2012 at TEDxEuston. You can watch the talk here, and it differs little from the printed version.

Earlier this week the short book came out in a Swedish translation. As it is now being passed out to teenagers all over the country, this writer read the Swedish print to figure out if it's any good. And it does start off quite well.

To explain why she became a feminist, the author tells us about her experiences as a woman in Nigeria. For example, only boys were allowed compete for the role of class monitor at her primary school. This rule was clearly discriminatory, and one can sympathize with Adichie as she expresses her wish to be something forbidden to her kind.

> These are little things, but sometimes it's the little things that sting the most.

Acknowledges differences

She continues by acknowledging the fact that men and women are biologically different, having their own types of hormones and genitals. This is important, since many feminists today seem to think that gender is purely an illusion constructed and promoted by the faceless, evil entity known as "the Patriarchy."

After these passages, though, Adichie starts sounding like every other feminist you've heard since the third wave of their movement came along. Men have all the power, women are seen as second-class citizens, and in every imaginable situation they get the short end of the stick.

The fact that the author's experiences mostly come from Nigeria is a problem. How is her critique of Nigerian society pertinent to the way we live in the West? Another problem is that a lot of what she promulgates as fact is either unconfirmed by any proof, or feminist myths that have been falsified a long time ago, like the wage gap myth (she claims that women in the US get paid less than men for the same work).

The biggest flaw in the book is also the main point she's trying to make; that masculinity is the Great Satan that must be banished from the world if men and women shall live in peace. This, she says, would improve the lives of both sexes.

Although she admits that our bodies are different, she doesn't make the connection from that to men and women behaving differently as well. She claims that masculinity and femininity are social constructs. And in this modern world, masculinity only breeds trouble.

Men are too "hard"

Muscles—only useful a 1,000 years ago?

A thousand years ago, she writes, it was reasonable for men to be in power. But today, other qualities than physical strength are necessary to rule, like intelligence and creativity. Those traits can be found equally in both men and women. Therefore, men having more power is unfair.

In her mind, masculinity is like an evolutionary by-product, no longer needed but only harmful. Because we are taught to be either masculine or feminine, we must begin to teach our children (especially boys) differently.

> We do a great disservice to boys in how we raise them. We stifle their humanity. We define masculinity very narrowly.
>
> Masculinity is a hard, small cage, which we put our boys into.
>
> We teach boys to not show fear, weakness, vulnerability. We teach them to mask their true selves because they have to grow up and become a hard man, as they say in Nigeria.

In contrast, Adichie wants us to make boys weak, soft, sensitive and neurotic. One would guess that she models her perfect man after a Woody Allen character.

The truth is that masculinity serves men well. It has for thousands of years, and it still does. It makes us strong, resilient, competitive, logical and rational. In a word, hard. None of us would be here if our ancestors weren't hard. Neither do we achieve any success today if we don't acquire some degree of masculinity. Our superior physical strength might not do much for us in our working lives, but it certainly makes us more attractive to women.

That's one important inconsistency in Adichie's message. She calls on women to raise their children to be Woody Allen, but she doesn't say that they should marry a Woody Allen. Hence, she wants to turn the next generation of boys into beta males, while knowing that these are not the men that women typically go for.

We would do a great disservice to boys if we raised them the way Adichie tells us to do. It would make them less competitive compared to masculine boys, which would ultimately impede their chances of procreating. Natural selection would discard their substandard genes to the landfill of history.

While We Should All Be Feminists starts off somewhat agreeable, it ends up expressing the same sort of Marxist adoration for weakness that we've heard time and time again.

The face of the ideal modern man?

Graded F For Feminist

Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie deserves credit for laying out the basics of modern feminism in a plain and accessible language. She avoids, perhaps purposely, loaded words like patriarchy, misogyny, and all the different varieties of shaming.

The book is also short, and therefore even a teenager with the attention span of a goldfish can finish it. But kids shouldn't be reading it at all, and it should not be passed on to them through the school system. This piece of feminist propaganda is something teenagers can find on their own, if they're interested in the subject.

Although it might be less than applicable to compare it to the Third Reich Führer's autobiography for many reasons, as a manifesto for third-wave feminazis, this book is as good (bad) as any.

Read More: How Feminist Linda Tirado Lied Her Way To $60,000 In Donations And A Book Deal

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

Why You Should Avoid Women Who Claim Rape And Sexual Abuse At All Costs

December 7, 2015 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

When a nation is torn apart by war, it can be rebuilt. Foundations can be re-poured and made with stronger concrete; buildings and bridges can be reconstructed using modern materials and updated practices; and infrastructures can be improved upon and modernized—things can be made better and stronger than they were in the past due to technological advancements and the know-how provided by men.

But what about the people? Sadly, the ravages of war will be etched into their minds until death. The passage of time will certainly ease old wounds, but ultimately, people can't be rebuilt, they must be replaced. Only a new generation can come along to provide a fresh start and relieve the pain that was once endured. And even then, history will always be there to remind everyone of the past.

It's no different than a war being waged against feminist indoctrination and "equality." There are no buildings, bridges, and monuments to rebuild or resurrect. But there are millions of battle hardened women with cum-drenched souls, mental disorders, and everlasting baggage. If every woman in America stood up today and said she wanted to end the war and return to traditionalism, it wouldn't change a thing. You would still have the same amount of women worthy of commitment, marriage, and bearing your children as you do right at this moment: practically zero.

A new generation of women would have to be brought up in order to see an improvement, but who would be the mothers and role models for this new crop of females? Who would we entrust to raise respectable young girls who would grow into traditional women with good values? The same degenerate losers we have at our disposal right now? The same women we deliberately avoid impregnating in the first place?

They would be the ones to pull it all together and steer the ship back on course? I don't fucking think so. The foundations and infrastructures between the sexes are far too fractured and fragmented for things to ever be what they once were—never mind being improved upon or strengthened. This is a war that isn't even close to being over, and we're losing.

It's not going to get better, it's just that simple—this is it. Women are not going to magically become friendly, feminine, chaste and well-mannered just because that's what men want them to be. Mental illnesses are not going to miraculously disappear with a pill or therapy. The carnage from all of the drugs, alcohol, and promiscuity is a permanent fixture on the American dating landscape—it's not a bug, it's a feature. This is not some passing storm that one can just ride out and there are no clear blue skies just beyond the horizon. And I wouldn't count on this forecast changing anytime during our lifetimes, either, if I were you.

Additionally, we have to accept that women are fine with this—they like the storm. They have their beta male raincoats and their government sponsored umbrellas: they're drier than a Jewish girl's pussy when she's surrounded by men who don't make good money. They're high, they're dry, and they don't have anything to worry about. And why would they?

No matter how bad life gets for a woman, no matter how much of a fuck-up she becomes and no matter how much destruction she leaves in her wake—some dickhead will be there ready and willing (and enthusiastically) to break her fall. This is why they don't take their jobs seriously; it's why they don't take their finances seriously; it's why they don't take anything seriously—because they know if things start to get the least bit difficult, men will always be be there to apply tourniquets to the most hemorrhaging areas of their lives. And the worst part is: they'll never appreciate or be grateful for any of it.

That's not easy to accept, especially since men have no such luxury: it's either make it or break it, sink or swim. No matter which direction you turn, the guns of failure are aimed directly at your temple, and, in many cases, it's women with their dirty little fingers comfortably nestled on the triggers, patiently waiting for the opportune moment to squeeze.

The modern woman is not going to take care of you. She's not going to pick you up when you fall and she's not going to be there for you when you fail. A supportive, decent woman is something your grandfathers and, perhaps, your fathers got to enjoy. But for you? Nope, you're on your own, buddy. It's on you, as a man, to step it up and get to where you want to be.

Women aren't taught to appreciate your efforts and sacrifices. Your success as a man will always be reduced to "privilege," luck, or some other make believe advantage or benefit that you wish like hell you truly had. Women either hate you for your success or want to use you because of it—loving you for it never enters the equation. This is the default setting on the modern female, and there's no way to reprogram the bitch.

And that is what you are up against. You're surrounded by a very sick group of battle-worn women, and it's from this pool of women that you're supposed to—somehow—find someone decent and respectable with whom you can build a solid relationship and start a family. The odds of finding a good one aren't in your favor, and the majority of us aren't going to make it.

Despite this unfortunate reality, we still have lives to live. We still have our biological needs and those must be met one way or another. For better or worse, these are the women we have at our disposal. So, it's in our best interests to be proactive in our defenses, and to ensure our future and well-being stay firmly in tact. We do this by sniffing out red flags and knowing when it's best to just walk—or run, if necessary—away. It is my goal to provide this knowledge to the very best of my ability.

With that said, let's get this show on the road and start with the red flag that should have you lacing up your running shoes and getting the fuck out of dodge with the quickness. I wrote about this topic extensively last year, but it must be re-visited again if we're going to cover all bases.

Rape Fables

It takes a special kind of asshole to play the "I was raped" game, but there are plenty of women out there who play it, and they play it well, especially if you're a sucker. Men are thoroughly brainwashed to believe a woman's word is sacrosanct and to never question the veracity of her claims, particularly when it comes to sexual assault. All inquiries are strictly off limits, and she must be believed no matter what.

After all, "Why would a woman ever lie about being raped, right?" Because she's a bottom of the barrel, attention craving, low-life, self-serving piece of mentally ill shit, that's why. But you can't actually say that out loud, of course. You pretty much have to keep your mouth shut and your opinions to yourself unless you want to be labeled a victim blame, rape apologist, or misogynist.

However, just because you have to keep your opinions to yourself, doesn't mean you have to be the same way with your actions. And the best action to take whenever this subject comes up is to get to work immediately. If a woman claims to have been raped, then start digging to find out whether she's being honest or not. This is accomplished by questioning the whereabouts of the alleged rapist right off the bat.

Example

Girl: "It's very hard for me to talk about this… but… I was raped."

You: "That's too bad, but at least the guy who did it is locked up and can never hurt you, or anyone else, ever again."

Saying something along these lines puts her on the spot: she has no choice but to provide you with the status of her so-called assaulter. If she replies with "Oh, he's not in jail," or, "He's my ex-boyfriend," or, "We were drunk at a party; I didn't press charges," then you know she's a fucking bullshit artist and that it's time to pull the plug on your interactions with her.

If she says the perpetrator is in jail (I've personally never had this happen, and I've heard a lot of rape claims), then that leaves you with a decision to make as well.

Breaking It Down

When it comes to this rape stuff, one must develop a personal policy. Mine is one of zero tolerance, and it's the one I'm going to recommend to you as well. Point blank: don't date rape victims, period. Real, perceived, concocted or flat-out imagined—you honestly shouldn't care. You should take your ball and go home, regardless.

Will doing this make you a dick or a bad person? I'm sure to the majority of people it probably will, but you know what? You still shouldn't fucking care. Do the majority of people care if you end up with a crazy broad who makes your life miserable or tries to take her issues out on you? Do the majority of people care if you lose your career or wind up in prison (where "rape culture" actually exists)? Nope, they sure don't, so you know what? Fuck'em.

Rape is considered a "societal problem," and if you don't rape women, then you are making your contribution to society, you can't be asked for much more than that. You should never feel guilty for not "manning up" and absorbing somebody else's issues. A woman's problems—prior rape or otherwise—are her fucking problems. They are her property and her responsibility; they belong to her and her alone—they have nothing to do with you. Consider it "equality" if it makes you feel better: if you have never been raped, then only date women who have never been raped. Sounds pretty egalitarian to me.

Now, at this point you might be thinking, "This guy is is a sociopath!" Wrong—what I am is a guy who has something to lose. What takes a man years to build can be shattered immediately by one mentally unstable broad heading down to the police station with a bullshit story to tell: that can't be, and won't be, me. The last thing I'm going to do is play amateur psychologist at best, or be dragged through the mud and risk possible imprisonment due to some crazy woman's whims at worst. These women are liabilities, and like most men, I already have enough shit to worry about. A woman has to make my life better if she's going to be a meaningful part of it, and women with this type of baggage don't make things better.

"Come on, A.V. Yader, is it really necessary to be such so ruthless and cold-hearted?" Yes it is, and here's why: because "it" is always your fault. It doesn't matter what "it" is, because no matter what "it" is—"it" is your damn fault. We all know if a man cheats on a woman, he is considered a scumbag, a piece of shit, and an asshole. We also know if a woman cheats on a man, it's because she was pushed away from that man because he was a scumbag, a piece of shit, and an asshole.

You can't win, so if you're going to be considered an asshole no matter what you do or how you do it, then you may as well take the asshole route that is in your best interests and ensures your future is safeguarded. Which would you rather be: an asshole who's on top and continuing to climb, or an asshole who's scraping the bottom? Thought so. There are plenty of "good" men out there who will gladly fill your shoes and do the "right thing," let them be the ones to take the loss.

Exit Strategy

Fake rape victims have to go, and they have to go quickly. Here's a guideline to follow that should keep you covered.

Mentally break up with the woman the second you find out, but don't dump her ass for real just yet. Do the actual dumping quietly and without commotion. Slowly taper off contact and limit any interactions you have to text messages only, which you should save. If you've slept with the woman, then get some sexual texts from her (nude pics too if you can get them). Send some messages saying how you can't wait to fuck her again, get some enthusiastic responses demonstrating reciprocation in return, and then cut her off.

Don't meet again in person, and ignore all contact from her once you have satisfactory evidence showing that she loved taking your cock and looks forward to taking it again. Show some discipline and pass up the easy pussy if she offers it.

As for the gentlemen out there with hearts of gold who can't envision themselves being so heartless and cut-throat: I understand your position. I don't support it, but I do understand it. So, if you meet a woman with a legit rape—and only a legit rape—in her past, and you want to proceed with the relationship, then that's on you.

But don't be surprised when problems and baggage comes with the territory. Proceed with caution and bail if there are hang-ups with intimacy, rage issues, or if it's clear that she hasn't gotten over what happened to her. You didn't do anything wrong, so don't suffer as if you did.

Claims Of Physical Abuse By Former Lovers

A close relative to the rape fable is the "he beat me" claim. Even more common are claims of verbal abuse or being "controlled" in some manner. Here are couple of question for you, gentlemen: When was the last time a woman said to you, "It was my fault that my previous relationships didn't work out," or, "I fucked things up, but I've learned my lesson"?

When was the last time a woman actually took some responsibility, came clean, and admitted that her relationship failures were primarily a by-product of her own conduct? In my experience, the answer to these questions is never. Sure, a woman might admit some wrong doing here and there, but she will never admit to being the instigator or the antagonist.

And that's because "it" is always your fault—no matter what "it" is.

With that in mind, here's how this nonsense plays out in the real world. In a bid to win pity points and look like a little angel who does no wrong (get used to this shit, especially if you make good money), a woman will tell you vivid stories about being terrorized at the hands of some evil, abusive psychopath. Just how bad is this motherfucker? Well, just imagine Ted Bundy, the Predator, and a great white shark all rolled into one. "He's fucking crazy," or, "He's been stalking me," or, "He threatened to kill me," are lines that you will more than likely hear at some point.

However, what she'll fail to mention is the part about how she would get in this guy's face without provocation, call him a cock sucker, slap him, punch him, try to kick him in balls, destroy his house, key his car, flatten his tires, brag about fucking his friends, call his mother a whore, and then call the cops on him all before heading off to her workplace to receive a good old fashioned eye watering throat-fuck from one of her bosses in the parking lot.

Those little details never seem to make the final cut in any of these stories, for some inexplicable reason. And yes, I'm joking a bit there; however, the point is that a woman will never mention inciting things, being passive aggressive, or pushing a man's buttons until he snaps and calls her some bad names or tells her her shut the fuck up.

That will never happen because then she runs the risk of looking like a bad person, and we can't have that, now can we? "He used to call me a bitch all of time, it really hurt my feelings," said the poor little snowflake. Yeah, I'm sure he did—it's probably because you are one.

Breaking It Down

Here's what you need to remember when you hear these abuse stories: it's tough out there for the majority of men these days. Most guys are not slaying pussy on the regular. Very few men are getting laid frequently with thin, good looking women, and that's the reason why you should always be on your toes when any claims of abuse come to light.

If an average guy has found himself a decent looking girlfriend, and he's laying some pipe on a somewhat regular basis, is he going to beat the shit out of her, verbally abuse her, or treat her like dirt? Is he going to potentially ruin his access to the only pussy that's available to him? Of course not. He's going to treat her like gold, like a princess. He's going to give her everything she wants. This is the type of man who will sacrifice his time, his sanity, and even his soul to ensure that his prized pussy-possessor is a happy camper.

So, when a woman says she was “abused” by a man who fits the above description, here’s what she’s really trying to say: “He said some things I didn’t like sometimes,” or, perhaps, he did the unthinkable and tried to hold her to some kind of standards; or, he wanted her to be accountable for her actions; or—gasp!—he occasionally asked her to do things she didn’t want to do.

Things like not coming home drunk at four o’clock in the morning, ceasing communications with men who used to fucked her, or simply requesting that she pick up after herself and clean up her messes—all of those things could be considered “verbal abuse” or “controlling behavior” simply because it’s shit she doesn’t want to hear.

On the other side of the coin, perhaps she has dated men who have been abusive towards her. If that’s the case, then the question becomes: “Why the fuck did you stay with the guy?” If a woman says she’s been hit or abused by a man, ask her how many times it happened. If the answer is more than once, then she’s a God damn idiot. What’s more: the very ugly and very real possibility may exist that she enjoys being abused.

That’s right: it’s a dirty little secret that few women will admit, but it’s true—some of them get turned on by abusive behavior. Some women live for the drama: they love it, they crave it, and they require it. And sadly, there are a lot more of them out there than you might think. Women will stay with abusive men for years on end and never once call the cops or even entertain the thought of leaving them, and that’s because they truly like what they have. In fact, many of these women are fiercely protective and have undying loyalty to these men. They would even defend them to the death if it came down to it.

“But you don’t understand, I was scared to leave!” said the pity party throwing woman who secretly loves a good ass whoopin’. Scared of what, exactly? The cops will come at a moments notice, taze and cuff the bastard, and then haul him off to jail. After that, she can head to one of the numerous women's shelters available to her, or she can call one of her many friends for help; or she can go stay with a relative—the options are endless.

This idea that women have nowhere to go when they're being abused is fucking ridiculous, especially if they're good looking. A good looking woman who has no orbiters with free couches available? Bitch, please.

Women who date abusive men, choose those men. That's all there is to it and don't you ever think otherwise. Women have options in the dating world, and the option many of them choose is the piece of shit loser. Even to the most casual observer, the warning signs are there right off the bat that the vast majority of these guys are scumbags, yet women will get involved with them anyway because they get off on the danger and uncertainty.

These women are defective, plain and simple. And don't let it slip it into your head that because a woman is "educated" or "intelligent" it somehow makes a difference in her choices—it doesn't. Smart women are still women, which means they're pretty fucking stupid.

Assessing Which Is Which

You might be wondering how you can tell the difference; how can you tell which men were truly abusive towards a woman and which ones were not? It's easy: the ones who were abusive will be the ones who didn't have jobs, were in and out of jail, or had drug and alcohol problems (even then, you should still be skeptical). The good men will be "boring," hardworking, and most likely college educated or have decent a trade.

Women will volunteer information about their ex's without much trouble, so there's no need to stress about finding any of this out—they'll spill the beans eventually. Additionally, get the guy's name and look him up online if possible. I can just about guarantee that once you find him and see what he looks like, your reaction will be one of the following: "Yeah… there's no way she didn't know this guy was a piece of shit from the get-go," or, "There's no way this dude was beating up on a woman."

"He used to beat me and call me a cunt! I've never been so scared of someone in my entire life!

He seemed like such a great guy when we first got together; he was very sweet and nice… but then he started beating me and calling me a cunt.

Exit Strategy

These women are completely unsuitable for any kind of serious relationship. If you're a good dude who has no intentions of beating up women—which, lets be honest, you should be—then you're either going to get dumped by a woman who prefers abusive men, or you're going to get dragged through the mud by a woman who likes to make up bullshit stories to make herself seem like a perfect saint.

The latter will especially paint you out to be a terrible human being if she cheats on you and leaves you for another man. She needs to make her reasons for betraying you seem valid to any bystanders who may be looking on, and she'll accomplish that by saying whatever it takes to make you out to be the bad guy—no matter how good you treated her in reality. "It" is always your fault, after all. Also, this behavior will be dialed up to 10 if you share a social circle or have the same colleagues, so beware.

On the other hand, if you're the type of guy who has no problem beating on a woman, then you don't really need any advice because you're probably going to end up in prison for something anyway. Here's the thing with beating up women: in order to abuse a woman, you have to either really love her, or really hate her. American women aren't worthy of either of those emotions. So, if you have a mean streak or proclivities towards criminal conduct—don't let it be a woman you go down for, they're nowhere near worth it. Go rob a bank instead.

As for actually dumping these women: if they reveal any of this shit early on—as in the first few times you meet—then remove them from your life in the same way you would a rape claimer. As for the less extreme cases, keep things short term and bail if it looks like she's catching feelings for you, and really get the hell out of there if you start catching feelings for her. Keep things to fuck-buddy status and never waver from that.

Your relationships with these women shouldn't last more than eight weeks or so, and they must be kept away from anyone who is either: (A) important to you, or (B) can affect your livelihood—friends, workmates, bosses, family, etc. Save any and all text correspondence, and slowly fade out over time (she'll probably drift off on her own anyway).

Personally, I cut and run right off the bat in the same way I do with the rape chicks. The sex just isn't worth it at this stage in my life and I have a very hard time pretending to believe this nonsense anymore—my mind jumps right into "here we go with this shit again" mode and I bail. However, I can see how guys might want to keep some decent pussy around if the chick isn't too bonkers. Just trust your gut and hit the bricks immediately if you sense trouble brewing.

In Closing

I'm just getting started, gentlemen. This article marks the beginning of what will become a regular series known as "The Red Flag Master List." It began as an idea for a book, but it needs to be accessible to anyone who can make use of it. The top dogs here at Return Of Kings have been gracious enough to give me the space to publish this material, which will give it a much larger audience than it would receive otherwise.

As for what to expect—in each installment we will take a look at a particular deal breaker characteristic (or two) in detail, break it down, and examine your options when encountering a woman who possesses such a trait(s). The ultimate goal will be the completion of a comprehensive guide cataloging everything a man should be aware of when forming relationships with the opposite sex.

By the time this series is complete, you'll be much more knowledgeable about damaged women and how to either avoid them, or turn their bullshit against them and use it to your advantage. We are at war here, after all, and it's time to start winning a few battles (even if it's just on an individual level).

Read More: The Major Flaw In Today's Perception Of Domestic Violence

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

A Primer On The Best Exercise You're Not Doing

December 7, 2015 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

I'm Larsen Halleck, and I have a question for you: What if there was an exercise that could heal spinal pain, rejuvenate vertebral discs, add definition and size to muscles most people don't even know exist, tone the arms and legs, strengthen the toes and ankles, expand lung capacity, and promote circulation?

And, what if variations of this same mythical exercise strengthen the neck, literally making you more difficult to punch out? The answer is: there is one, and it is one of the oldest exercises documented in human cultures: the bridge.

As Yogic Pose And Healing Method

Many ancient peoples, such as those of the Indian Subcontinent were well versed in this exercise. From this book:

> "…Strengthens back muscles, tones adrenals, helps kidneys, front part of the body is being stretch entirely, which…may work on their heart chakra…The muscles on the front part of the thighs are stretched and the calves are strengthened while doing and holding the pose… This pose is extremely beneficial for those who sit long hours. The backward bend in the pose relieves tension or stress from the body and help in decreasing the ailments arising out of it. This pose will also help in toning and strengthening the back"

While I have my doubts about some of these claims, I can personally vouch for the usefulness of the bridge for pain relief, as well as strengthening the back and shoulders.

I mastered bridging when I was in my sophomore year of college, at a time when I had never once attempted to deadlift. A year or two later, when I no longer bridged and started to deadlift, I lifted with horrible form, as most people do when they first attempt that exercise. It took me about two months to realize that I was getting persistent lower back pain.

Once I began to bridge again, it took the edge off my back pain. Once I shored up my form, continuing to do rounds of bridging afterwards, I have literally never had any back pain from deadlifting again, and in that timespan I have gone from deadlifting 95 pounds to deadlifting 350 pounds.

Many lifters complain about throwing their backs out, having herniated vertebral discs, and other spinal suffering, but these are fates I have completely avoided, which I attribute to bridging. As a side benefit, bridging gave me these (literally and figuratively) groovy erector spinae muscles snaking up the middle of my back a defined muscle that you will rarely see at the gym.

The back of yours truly

And needless to say, women find a man that can bend backwards and touch the ground to be mighty sexy.

There’s more benefits to bridging, such as…

Combat Sports, Martial Arts, And General Athletics

“How does this fruity yoga shit help me kick a dude’s ass?!” you might be asking. Plenty of ways…most of which are defensive and preventative in nature.

Many grappling arts, such as wrestling, judo, jiu-jitsu (both traditional and Brazilian), shua jiao, mixed martial arts, etc. extensively bridge, predominantly for escaping pinfalls, extricating oneself from a mounted position, and maneuvering yourself to positions of superiority.

Neck bridging (discussed below) has a more direct application to combat: strengthening your neck keeps your head from flopping around and thus getting concussed (it’s the brain slamming into the inside of the skull that knocks you out, and the neck essentially acts as a lever-a stronger neck means less movement of the lever.) In addition, making your neck stronger gives you a harder headbutt. Training to hold neck bridges for long periods of time trains your mental fortitude as well.

In terms of general athleticism, anybody that is capable of proper-form kip-ups or back handsprings is by definition athletic, and increased explosiveness and coordination won't hurt your athletic endeavors, whatever they may be.

Learning To Bridge

"I need to learn how to bridge!" you might be saying, "But I've never been taught how!"

One of the most damning criticisms I can give to modern fitness training is just stating that nobody bridges, despite the fact that so many ailments of modernity can be solved with regular bridging. Allow me, your knight in "spining" armor, to teach you.

The first bridge you'll be doing is the static bridge. Lay down on the floor on your back. Put your feet flat with your knees up. Put your hands flat, palm down, near your temples. Now, simultaneously thrust the hips up as you push down on the floor with your hands and feet. Allow your head to go back between your shoulders.

A proper bridge has 4 components: 1) Arms and legs as straight as possible, 2) Arch in the back, 3) Head tilted back in a relaxed position, and 4) Breathing is natural and deep.

If you are incapable of doing a bridge in your first go (most people can't), then begin with short bridges-laying down, crossing your arms over your chest, and then pushing the legs and hips up without moving the arms.

Ignore the fact that you can't see my feet.

Once you have mastered that (holding it 10+ seconds) do half bridges. Get in the bridge position, then roll a basketball or soccer ball under your lumbar vertebrae. Then push off the ground just like the true bridge, but it's easier because you don't have to lift off all the way from the floor. Once this is mastered, attempt the static bridge again.

Step 1

Step 2

When the static bridge is done, work on active bridges. The first of these is the downward wall walk: Stand with your back to a wall, and bend back until your hands touch the wall (palms down, naturally). Then “walk” down the wall on your hands, slowly bending the legs and occasionally stepping forward if needed. If you can’t walk down all the way, go down as far as you can, then stop. Do not twist the back, keep it oriented properly.

Step 1

Step 2

Step 3

Once you accomplish that, walk up the wall.

Next step is an active bridge without the wall-stand up, put your hands on your hips and your feet shoulder width apart. Get on the balls of your feet, thrust the hips forward, and bend back, until you see the floor behind you. Continue bending and place your hands on the floor. Land gently.

Step 1

Step 2

Step 3

And finally, you're going to stand up from a bridge position-press down hard with both your hands and the balls of your feet, shift the weight forward, and stand yourself up. It's kind of hard to describe, but it is a highly distinctive feeling. Again, avoid twisting the torso.

Step 1

Step 2

Step 3

From here, you can begin learning back handsprings and kip-ups. But as a word of advice, you will not be capable of doing those without complete mastery of bridging. Work on the steps I've given above, and do them to end your day of resistance training.

Neck Bridging

Neck bridging has less variations, but is more painful than standard bridging. As the name implies, the weight is borne entirely on the neck.

You will likely not be able to do neck bridging your first try, so do headstands instead. Then gradually remove your hands from the headstand (ie: remove one hand first, then the other later), and you will have the neckstand. Once you can hold a neckstand for at least 10 seconds, you can try the neck bridge.

The Neckstand

Lay down in the standard bridge position, but with your hands off the floor (I put them across my chest). Then, put pressure down on the head and roll back, bearing all the weight upon your scalp and feet (your forehead should almost be touching the floor). Flex the neck muscles to make sure your head goes straight back, and from here you can either hold for time or do repetitions (ie: roll back to the starting position, and then to the bridge position again, keeping the head aligned and straight).

The neck bridge

Conclusion

My suspicion is that if people did 20-30 minutes of bridging just one day a week, back maladies would be halved, no matter how many hours you spend sitting over a computer. Increased mobility, flexibility, endurance, and sex appeal—what other reasons do you need to bridge?

Read More: The Single Most Effective Exercise Any Man Can Do

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

The Spartacist Revolt Shows Why Force Must Often Be Met With Force

December 7, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Social justice warriors (SJWs) come in all shapes and sizes, but their methods and mentalities are similar enough to draw meaningful conclusions about such things if a long enough timeline is studied. Although the modern social justice warrior might seem on the surface to bear little resemblance to his 20th century Bolshevist ancestor, a close look at the record suggests otherwise.

There is a direct line of descent which runs from the bespectacled Bolshevist butchers of early 20th century Europe, and the blue-haired, overweight, shrill monitors of political correctness that haunt the college campuses, media outlets, and workplaces of the West today. Not to understand this fact is to miss something of central importance in predicting future outbursts of SJW violence.

We will examine here a historic event that has slipped into obscurity, Germany's Spartacist Revolt of 1919. Who instigated it, how it came about, and—most importantly—how it was dealt with will be instructive for readers interested in social order, stability, and tradition.

Armed Spartacists on the march

Germany in 1918 was in chaos. The war had been lost; the Kaiser had abdicated; and the reins of power were being contested by various groups on the right, the left, and the center. Some of these groups cared about the future of the nation.

Some, inspired by the Bolshevist Revolution which had seized control of Russia, were ideological fanatics of the very worst type. They cared nothing about Germany, only about turning the country into a Communist hellhole of the type then being shaped in the East. All over Europe, Bolshevist agents were fomenting insurrection as part of a Moscow-directed scheme to control Europe.

It is easy to forget now, in 2015, that Bolshevism was the worst catastrophe to befall Western civilization. By any reasonable measure, this is a fact as inescapable as 1+1=2. Much like modern SJWs, Bolshevists liked to trumpet their alleged “ideas” of freedom, justice, and equality.

In practice, these slogans were code-words for exterminating people they did not like and destroying thousands of years of Western culture.

Knowing what we now know about the uncounted millions of Bolshevist atrocities, these “revolutionaries” should be recognized for what they were: a plague virus. No measures could be too harsh in dealing with them. Luckily, some governments in those days had the backbone to eradicate the virus. In Hungary, for example, a Communist rat and Comitern agent named Bela Kun staged a revolution in 1919, which fortunately was suppressed.

One of the groups in postwar Germany seeking to seize power was the so-called “Spartacist League.” It renamed itself the Communist Party of Germany in 1919 and joined the Comitern in that year (the Comitern was Moscow’s front organization dedicated to international revolution). The Spartacist League was founded by Rosa Luxemburg, Karl Liebknecht, and Clara Zetkin. Here are their photos:

Karl Liebknecht

Rosa Luxemburg

They look much like hateful modern social justice warriors. It is interesting, in fact, to note that SJWs of all eras look roughly the same. Luxemburg has been to some extent elevated as some sort of secular saint by the media, but she was little more than another vindictive Bolshevist commissar.

And just like the modern SJW, these people were traitors to their homeland and their culture. They spent the war years (1916-1918) locked in German jails for trying to foment antiwar demonstrations.

Had they taken power in Germany, they would have embarked on the same bloody program that all other Communist parties undertook. But they were able to conceal their schemes behind angelic-sounding phrases and slogans, much like the modern SJW.

At the end of the war in 1918, Liebknecht had taken advantage of the chaos to declare Germany a “socialist republic.” No one was interested in his or Rosa Luxemburg’s brand of radicalism except a vocal minority. But as often happens, the vocal minority can make itself appear larger than life by the acquiescence of those in power.

In 1919, Luxemburg and her cuckish lackey Liebknecht organized street demonstrations that were intended to destabilize the new Weimar Republic. The chancellorship was held at that time by Friedrich Ebert. Although Ebert was generally a centrist and a man of order, he despised the Communists and was determined to put down the revolt.

His job was essentially a thankless one: the new republic was not really satisfactory to anyone on either the right or the left, and it was for him to try to balance often irreconcilable differences. But he was a decent man, and was horrified at the stories of Communists attacking the traditional symbols of authority in Germany. Had there been more like him in Russia, perhaps Bolshevism would never have taken root there either.

A communist saboteur facing a Freikorps firing squad, 1919.

And so Ebert called in the Freikorps to smash the Communist revolt by force. The Freikorps were units of demobilized soldiers who had retained their organizational structure and weapons from the war. They were not men to be trifled with. Most of them had spent years in combat, were conservative by nature, and truly loathed the Communists.

In Berlin, the Freikorps units blasted the Communist rabble out of the streets beginning on January 8, 1919. The death toll was modest, around 150 Spartacists and 17 Freikorps soldiers. But there was no other way to deal with people who were ideological fanatics and determined to seize power by force.

Liebknecht and Luxemburg were found holed up in a hotel on January 15. They were taken into custody and handed over to the Garde-Kavallerie-Schützen-Division, commanded by Captain Waldemar Pabst. Both of them were interrogated, beaten, and shot soon after. Luxemburg's body was thrown into a canal, and Liebknecht's corpse was sent anonymously to a morgue.

Waldemar Pabst

Pabst was never prosecuted for the killings, and thereafter faded into obscurity. Knowing what we know about Communist regimes and their bloody conduct, there were no doubt many in Germany who breathed a sigh of relief that a Communist takeover had been thwarted.

But, of course, it would have been distasteful to say this openly.

Pabst believed he had done the right thing in disposing of Liebknecht and Luxemburg, and never apologized. In a published interview given with a West German newspaper in 1962, he said the following:

> In January 1919, I attended a KPD [German Communist Party] meeting where Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht were speaking. I gathered that they were the intellectual leaders of the revolution, and I decided to have them killed. Following my orders, they were captured. This decision to have them killed did not come easy to me… I do maintain that this decision is morally and theologically legitimate.

We should note that the West German government in 1962 fully agreed with Pabst. The German Federal Republic's Press and Information office issued a statement that Pabst had acted rightly, and that the executions were "in accordance with martial law."

When people are trying to destroy you, the West German government reasoned, you have to do what is necessary to defend yourself.

I fully agree.

Read More: Why We Should Reinstitute The Dowry

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

20 Things You Can Do Instead Of Playing Video Games

December 8, 2015 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

I had played video games in all forms and all genres for 20 years before I decided to quit. I had to—it was simply taking too much time away from me while I was neglecting everything else in life. Trying to moderate my play time never worked. I had to go cold turkey.

Quitting wasn't easy. I failed few times before I finally sold my custom-made PC for a cheap netbook to liberate myself. There's nothing inherently wrong with video games, but in the end, I can safely say that it was the best decision I ever made in my life. It was was my big first step towards becoming a better man.

I know there are many men who are perfectly happy playing games while leading a balanced life, but if you are one of those individuals going through the same agonizing feeling of emptiness that I did and want to experience a fuller life, here are 20 things (one for every year I wasted) you can do instead of playing video games:

1. Read, Read, And Read More

Never before in human history has so much information been available for us. Reading non-fiction is especially important. History and biography books will enable you to learn about great men from the past while philosophy, psychology, and sciences will expand your mind.

2. Learn A New Language

Learning a new language is a great challenge that takes dedication and discipline, but the rewards are great as it opens up new opportunities for you to explore the world and meet new people.

3. Go For A Walk

Walking can provide you with the serenity to relax your mind and contemplate the world. It’s far better than staring at a screen all day.

4. Work Out

I seriously hope there aren't any readers of ROK who don't work out. If you are one of those who abstain or don't work out on a consistent basis, you need to get off your ass now.

5. Play A Team Sport

Instead of slouching on your couch to play sports on your console, go out and play the real thing. You'll meet new people and get exercise out of it.

6. Go Hunting

You like shooting at targets? Go get a real gun and shoot at real things.

7. Learn To Play A Musical Instrument

Playing a musical instrument is an artistic skill that requires dexterity that can only come with long hours of practice. There are many gamers out there wasting their potential talent by fiddling controllers all day.

8. Cultivate Friendship With Other Men

In today's increasingly individualistic society, many men seem to think that they're too Alpha to be friends with other men, opting to go the way of lone wolf instead. What they fail to realize is that, in the wild, when a wolf breaks off from his original group to go his own path, it is so that he could start his own gang.

Take time to connect with other like-minded men. Men are supposed to operate in groups. The reason why feminists run wild today is precisely because our world is bereft of male-bonding and brotherhood.

9. Learn To Cook

Unless you have a nice housewife, maid, or an overindulgent mother, you should learn to cook so that you can feed yourself decent food instead of junk.

10. Learn To Fix Things

Get down and dirty and learn to fix things on your own. It’s a useful skill and you gain a greater appreciation for how things work.

11. Write

Yes, there actually is a game about being a writer.

Writing just might be the highest art form. Almost anyone can write, but only a few can write great. The only way to become better at writing is by writing daily, over and over again.

12. Go Visit An Art Gallery Or A Museum

Go appreciate history and human creativity throughout the ages. Be in touch with your cultural and ethnic roots. You just might develop a renewed sense of identity.

13. Learn To Sketch Or Paint

Besides simply viewing art, you can get few tools and start to create your own. You don't have to be good at it, it's all about appreciating the process of creation.

14. Go Outdoors To Appreciate Nature

It’s a tragedy that the vast majority of men today are so alienated from nature. Get out of your house and get out of the concrete jungle to take time to appreciate the natural world. You’ll feel refreshed.

15. Build Something

One of the most defining feature of a man is that he is a builder. Go get some tools and materials and start making something using your hands.

16. Practice Debating And Public Speaking Skills

Oratory is another lost art form in our modern world where people prefer to message each other short lines of texts instead. Make yourself stand out by joining a debating society or the Toastmasters to develop your oratory skills. You'll also gain a lot of confidence, charisma, and leadership skill along the way.

17. Learn Martial Arts

Can you call yourself a man when you can't even defend yourself? Learn how to fight by taking martial arts classes. But make sure you sign up for ones where they let you spar with full contact. Otherwise you might as well take Tai-chi.

18. Learn To Dance

Level up your charm by learning some moves. Salsa and tango classes are good places to meet women.

19. Practice Meditation

As many have said before, meditation is a workout for your mind. Gain greater focus, discipline, and awareness through meditation. Even just 20 minutes a day can make all the difference in your life.

20. Game Women

“The true man wants two things: danger and play. For that reason he wants woman, as the most dangerous plaything.” —Friedrich Nietzsche

Go out and meet women to hone your game instead of staying home and playing with your joystick by yourself. It’s far more challenging than video games, but much more rewarding.

Conclusion

I live my life without regrets, but I know for a fact that my life would be much better now had I spent all the time, money, and effort I put into games doing the above things that I mentioned. It’s okay to have mindless fun once in a while, but men, especially young men, should invest much of their precious time into things that bring value to their lives.

Life is short, and often much shorter than you might think. Don’t squander it.

Read More: Video Games Are Limiting Men’s Potential

Corey Savage

Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

London Men Investigated By Police For Telling Fat Women They Are Fat

December 8, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

British Transport Police are investigating after women were handed detailed cards calling them “fat” and “ugly” on the London Tube public transport system. From the facts so far, these cards come from a group called “Overweight Haters Ltd”. At least two women, including Essex’s Kara Florish, contacted law enforcement about being presented with these rather lengthy anti-fat person statements. Mind you, this is months after British police said they will prioritize online abuse and “threats” over crimes like burglaries.

Is this anti-fat person behavior on the Tube rude? Certainly. But rudeness and a perceived lack of manners have always encompassed a much broader range of words and actions than criminal matters. Critics of the cards and those distributing them are more than entitled to attack the idea of embarrassing these women. But their rage is selective to the bone. In a country like Great Britain, fully ten to twenty million instances of such rudeness happen every day. From schools to workplaces, on the street to nightclubs, people are humiliated in breathtaking ways.

Here is one of the cards:

How many times have you been similarly insulted in the past and not resorted to calling the police?

Man cuts in front of another man. Second man calls the first one a “fat loser,” which results in a police call. Excellent outcome!

I would hope that most Return of Kings readers, after the copious fitness and self-improvement advice we have given you, are healthy and trim individuals, minus any conditions outside your own control. But perhaps you used to be fat. Did you call the police if you were humiliated at a party because a girl called your overweight? I think not. And being shamed audibly for your weight or appearance is a lot worse in almost anyone's books than being silently handed a card by a stranger.

Imagine how the police would react if you, a male, had been at a club and some girl you approached called you "a fat ugly loser" and told you to "fuck off," only for you to respond by calling the police! It's a fair bet you would be warned or actually punished for wasting police resources.

The same goes for other epithets, like being called a "creep" (basically female parlance for "likely rapist"). Cops would laugh in your face and anyone else who knew about your call to the authorities would regard you as the biggest crybaby on the planet.

There are a plethora of other ways to be bullied as well. Have you ever been excluded from a university or work social circle or, worse yet, been the recipient of insults about your achievements, your family, a disability or something similar? I knew one particularly maligned guy with a very "lazy eye" who found himself the butt of constant jokes, most notably from disinterested girls, for at least two years of college.

While I might be able to have a conversation with 3-400 people I went to school or college with, this poor person would be able to talk with maybe five before the memories became too much for him.

Transport authorities are calling for the wastage of police time

The guy was rude, Kara Florish, but please build your own London Bridge and get over it.

A senior official with Transport for London, Steve Burton, says that all passengers have the "right to travel with confidence," whatever that means. There should of course be rules for using the Tube, such as the expectation that seats are vacated for the elderly.

Transport staff can even justifiably reserve the right to remove disruptive passengers from stations or train compartments for infractions that fall short of criminality.

But it is when Burton advises offended commuters to contact the police over anti-social behavior without restriction that a line is crossed. I have been accosted by many drunks on the Tube during my travels, been abused for my skin color (by minorities) or my accent (by white British and non-white British alike). I don't take it personally, as I know plenty of others have been in my situation. And these miscreants don't represent even 5% of the people you see and sit or stand near on the Tube.

Real victims of (violent) crime are being left by the wayside

Politically correct senior officials like Sara Thornton have led the charge for "Twitter policing," with their policies advising burglary and other victims to email in evidence or not necessarily expect a police response.

Crimes of hurt feelings now trump crimes of (non-sexual) assault and robbery, despite the hurt feelings the latter categories almost always create. This is the end result of savagely politically correct attitudes towards law enforcement and criminal justice. SJWs would be most proud.

Why pursue armed robbers, fiends who terrorize old ladies or vicious thugs when men handing out "you're fat" cards can be chased all over the London Tube?

Read More: British Police Chief Will Prioritize Online Abuse Reports Over Burglaries

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Reasons Taller Men Have It Easier, And What To Do About It

December 8, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Add Height

Height, like race, sex, or facial appearance, is something that you're born with and have very little control over. It also factors into how people perceive you and how you feel about yourself. From the famous "Tall CEOs make more money" canard to the stereotype of the tall guy getting all the girls, it's a well accepted truth in game and in life that tall men have things just a little bit easier.

Whether it's due to evolutionary preference for taller men, societal conditioning, or some combination, many of us have caught ourselves looking at our taller friends from time to time and wishing that we had a couple more inches.

Here are a few of the ways that people with above average height have a slightly easier road than the rest of us, and a tip about how shorter guys can even the playing field:

1. Increased confidence

Towering over someone enables you to be more confident. Perhaps this is a deep-rooted reaction of our animal ancestors, whose main qualification for dominance of their domain was their physical stature.

We constantly see taller guys who are more able to approach women and best others in many types of athletic competition. There are obvious exceptions to this (sports like wrestling, polo, etc.), but a deficit in height is something that many men have to overcome internally even more than externally. The world around them tells them they are less adequate for being short in stature, and they must get out of their own heads to compete with the natural confidence of the taller guys.

2. More attention from women

Have you ever gone out with a much taller friend and noticed that girls seem to gravitate to them more? You’re not imagining things. The OKCupid data blog studied this issue, and found that taller men get more unsolicited messages. They also found the following nugget about sex partners:

> As for whether it even makes sense for people to make such an obvious and > easily disproved exaggeration, the jury is out. We've found that taller people, up to a point, have more sex.

Interestingly, and likely as a response to this intuitive understanding, height the number one thing people lie about on their online dating profiles:

> Almost universally guys like to add a couple inches. You can also see a more subtle vanity at work: starting at roughly 5′ 8″, the top of the dotted curve tilts even further rightward. This means that guys as they get closer to six feet round up a bit more than usual, stretching for that coveted psychological benchmark.

While everybody seems to be exaggerating everything online these days, height is the one thing that consistently gives men a clear edge over the dating competition.

3. You Make More Money

Many studies have found that taller people, on average, earn more than their shorter counterparts.

> Our estimates suggest that if the average man of about 178 centimeters [5 feet 10 inches] gains an additional five centimeters [2 inches] in height, he would be able to earn an extra $950 per year – which is approximately equal to the wage gain from one extra year of labor market experience," said study co-author Andrew Leigh, an economist at the Australian National University.

Taller people are also more likely to be perceived as having other good qualities regardless of their actual abilities.

4. Easier life overall

Even factoring out the specific factors here, taller people rate their happiness as being higher:

> As you can see, there's a pretty steady relationship between well-being and height for men. The taller men are, generally speaking, the happier they are. (Remember, as always, correlation is not causation.)

Of course, there are numerous was an average or shorter man can improve his stock and compete with his larger brothers. If you're a shorter guy, everything we preach related to game and self-improvement is about doing the work necessary to address any of your perceived deficiencies. As many interesting men can tell you, "height privilege" can be overcome by hard work, learning social skills, and cultivating interesting hobbies.

However, if you're a guy looking for an immediate slight advantage over the competition, you may want to give yourself a boost. A new product, Add Height™, can help you discreetly gain a couple of inches of height without having to wear bulky shoes, high heels or boots.

This specially molded insole takes into account your weight, activity level, and foot flexibility, delivering support to your arch while showing the world a taller version of you.

Click here to get your customized Add Height insoles.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Personality Trait That May Be Hurting Your Chances With Women

December 9, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the chief difficulties with entering into the project of self-improvement, as is often (rightly) recommended to men who are hoping to improve their prospects in life, is that constantly working on and thinking about oneself can cause an excess of self-awareness that is often counterproductive.

In the arena of seduction in particular too much self-awareness is a pussy repellent that drives women away. As many men who get into game (myself included) are ex-betas who study up on alpha behaviours to get girls, it is perhaps inevitable that a certain degree of cerebral naval-gazing surrounds the practice.

Realise, though, that even if your natural inclination is towards self-analysis, the archetypal alpha jock from high school who pulled the cheerleader was unlikely to have troubled himself too much with introspection. Therefore you should make an effort limit or conceal this aspect of your persona, at least in the early stages of an interaction.

It’s Just Not Sexy

The truth, gentlemen, is that too much self-awareness just isn't sexy. However much you might like to think of yourself as a deep and fascinatingly unique character, to girls you will more often than not come across as unconfident and weak.

A classic fictional example of this can be taken from Woody Allen's movie Crimes and Misdemeanours, which I wrote about in more detail for ROK here in 2014. Here Woody plays Clifford Stern, a classic Allen creation who is beset with fear, neurosis and self-doubt. In the film he falls in love with Mia Farrow's character Halley Reed, a TV executive, only to lose her to the brash, unthinking alpha Lester (played by Alan Alda).

The are many differences between Clifford and Lester, not least Lester's higher status as a top-flight producer against Clifford's struggling would-be documentary-maker, but the most marked in terms of personality is Allen's crippling self-awareness set against Alda's careless social dominance.

Get Out Of Your Own Head

Ideally, when you are approaching women you should not be '"stuck in your own head." You should not be considering what she might be thinking about you. Ideally, you should walk up to her without a single thought in your head. Why?

Well, think again about the high school jock. When he approached the cheer leader was he worried her opinion of her? No of course not—it wouldn't have occurred to him that she wouldn't have liked him, and even if it had, he wouldn't have cared because he wouldn't have had the required level of introspection to get cut up about it. He is able to do this because he lives in the moment, and so should you too.

Remember—the problem many men have is that they second-guess the basis of the rejections they imagine they might get from girls before they've even happened. This is not merely counterproductive, it's actually insane.

So if you are the self-aware type, what should you do? Below are five tips that you might find helpful.

1. Drink Alcohol

Bit of a trick one, this, as I don't drink alcohol these days, although I used to. But many men do, and with good reason – it temporarily silences those voices in their heads and alleviates their self-awareness.

There are quite a few people serious about gaming who claim that it's better not to drink if you want to get really good. While I agree with this to a certain extent – and you certainly don't want to be using alcohol as a crutch of any kind – my view is that as long as you're not somebody with a propensity towards dependency, a couple of drinks will do no harm and will get you into a social mood, which is all-important.

2. Do Physical Exercise

It's an obvious one, but it works damn well. After you've done some heavy compound weight training, in particular for big muscle groups like the legs, the resultant release of testosterone will make it all but impossible for you to remain in your head for long.

3. Act Without Thinking

It's easier said than done, but many situations in life don't need to be considered too painstakingly, as whatever you do will lead to an experience, and experiencing something is always better than stasis. And with that said, it is always better to go for the decision that will make your life more, rather than less, interesting.

So if the decision is whether or not you should approach that girl in Starbucks, then of course the answer is that yes, you should. Whatever interaction you have with her, whether it's a quick rejection or a coffee that eventually leads to sex and a relationship, you will learn something and your life will have been made more interesting as a result.

For this reason it's sometimes better not to think too carefully before taking a leap. Simply take a deep breath, think about which option will make for the best story afterwards and go for it.

4. Write Morning Pages

This is a tip from a book called The Artist's Way by Julia Cameron. In the book, Cameron presents a course to help the aspiring artist or writer unlock their budding creativity. In practice, most people seem to skip all of it and just focus on doing morning pages. These are three pages-worth of freehand, unstructured automatic writing. Yes, that's right, just sit down at a desk and write for three pages without thinking about it.

The benefit of doing this is that it will clear your subconscious of niggly, annoying thoughts and obsessions, in the short-term at least. By getting them out on the page and leaving them there you'll free yourself up to enjoy your day without the 'interference' of a too-busy self-hectoring mind to bother you.

5. Be A Good Actor

In the end, if you are an extremely self-aware person then that is unlikely to change overnight. Therefore, perhaps the most foolproof short-term fix is to be aware of the problem and to act like you don't have it. Any given situation you find yourself in, imagine how the alpha jock would act and then do the same thing yourself.

OK, you may not be being congruent to your true self in that instant, but needs must supersede genuineness from time to time. This is about faking it to make it. You can be as self-aware as you like the rest of the day — when you are standing in front of a pretty girl you want to impress, drop the Woody Allen shtick and act from the gut.

Do so enough times and it will become natural, and that will only increase your success rate in both romantic matters and most other social interactions.

Read More: How To Get More Sex With Alpha Douchebag Club Game

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How Conservatives Betrayed America

December 9, 2015 | by Vox Day | Link | Original Link

The following is an excerpt from Vox Day's new book, Cuckservative: How "Conservatives" Betrayed America.

For most of the 50 years since the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, it has been an article of faith for Democrats and Republicans alike that more immigration, and more diversity, was good for this "Nation of Immigrants". But in 2015, a well-funded American presidential candidate called this 50-year narrative into question for the first time by vowing to deport all 12 million illegal immigrants within two years, shut down the annual $53 billion flow of remittances to Mexico and other Latin American countries, and use the money to fund an impenetrable wall across the length of the southern border. As a result, Donald Trump shot to the top of the polls and shocked the world by becoming the leading candidate for the Republican presidential nomination.

Nor was Trump the only outsider to use immigration as a way to surmount the many challenges posed to those who take on the American political establishment. In the Democratic Party, former First Lady and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was widely assumed to be the rightful successor to Barack Obama, but U.S. Senator Bernie Sanders, the socialist from Vermont, correctly called into question the false assumption that immigration creates new jobs for native workers and rode that pro-labor position into early leads in the Iowa and New Hampshire polls.

These developments indicate a massive shift in public opinion over the course of the last decade. David Brooks of the New York Times observed that there hadn't been much difference between how Democrats and Republicans viewed overall immigration levels during the Bush 43 administration, before lamenting that 84 percent of Republicans and 44 percent of Democrats now believe they are excessive.

What is now taking place in Europe is a microcosm of what is happening, on a larger scope and timescale, in the United States of America. Although the European population of 508 million is larger than the U.S. population of 320 million, the 28 member nations of the E.U. fit into about half the land taken up by the 50 united States. Moreover, unlike the heterogeneous American "nation of immigrants", the European nations are homogeneous and distinct, with long histories, traditions, and collective memories that stretch back for centuries. That is why a much smaller number of immigrants arriving in a much shorter period of time has triggered the powerful nationalistic response that is already overturning governments and will ultimately shatter the European Union.

That is why it is important to realize that the same divisive process is well underway in the United States, albeit at a larger order of magnitude. And one of the tragic ironies of American politics is that it is the very group of people who most proudly proclaim their loyalty to the U.S. Constitution and to the traditional values of America's founding fathers, conservatives, who have helped lead the way to America's decline and eventual collapse. They have done so by forgetting the central purpose of the very document they revere.

The Preamble to the Constitution of the United States of America contains an extremely important phrase that is almost always ignored by those who appeal to it, or to the men who wrote it, in defense of immigration. It states:

> We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The key phrase is this: "to ourselves and our posterity." The blessings of liberty are not to be secured to all the nations of the world, to the tired and huddled masses, or to the wretched refuse of the teeming shores of other lands. They are to be secured to our children, and their children, and their children's children.

To sacrifice their interests to the interests of children in other lands is to betray both past and future America. It is to permit an alien posterity, like the newly hatched cuckoo in another bird's nest, to eliminate our own, and in doing so, defeat the purpose of the Constitution. It is, like the cuckolded husband, to raise the children of another man instead of one's own sons and daughters.

It is, in a word, cuckservative.

Note from Vox Day: Cuckservative was published this week by John Red Eagle and myself. Presently it is the #1 bestseller in Politics on Amazon. If you are a Man of the West, I would encourage you to read it, as it will explain to you how the nations of the West have been betrayed, and how many of the arguments that have been used to justify immigration for decades, from economics to theology, are absolutely and utterly false. Cuckservative: How "Conservatives" Betrayed America is 190 pages, DRM-free, and sells for $4.99 on Amazon.

Vox Day

7 Things I Require In The Future Mother Of My Child

December 9, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's common in these parts to make fun of women for having a delusional shopping list when seeking out a mate, but is it possible that our lists for finding women are also unreasonable? I asked myself this question while constructing a list of requirements I need in a woman who I think would be suitable for reproduction (and not necessarily state-sanctioned marriage). I ask you, dear reader, if my list is as deranged as that of a woman's.

The following is what I require in a woman for a long-term relationship that involves having children:

1. She must be between 18-25 years old

In the case I want to have more than two kids, I need to find a woman who is substantially younger than myself so she is biologically able to keep popping them out. This requirement also accounts for the fact that single women over 25 are emotionally damaged in some way, are alpha widowed, or are professional daters who are incapable of making the proper relationship sacrifices.

2. She must have less than three prior sexual partners, though I prefer a virgin

Studies show that the more sexual partners a woman has before marriage, the more likely that marriage will fail. I also don't want to marry a woman who has voluntarily accepted being used as a cum dumpster by other men, or who kisses my child with lips that have been previously wrapped around many other cocks. My child will not have a "reformed" slut mother.

For a woman who has had sexual partners before me, I must be the absolute best man she has ever been with in terms of appearance, personality, and resources. Otherwise, once the honeymoon is over and the relationship hits an inevitable low point, she will get a "Could I have done better?" itch and sabotage the relationship or test me to the point where I have to play "dread game" just to keep her in the kitchen. There must be no doubt within her mind that I am the best that she could possibly get.

3. Her physical attractiveness should hover around the 7 range

Thanks to technology and modern cosmopolitan society, a woman who is an 8 or above in beauty has been exposed to more toxic situations and experiences where she's achieved some level of e-fame, been validated incessantly for her appearance, and been offered money, consumer products, and trips for her vagina (and likely accepted those offers). She has also fully utilitized her beauty to get her way in life, including prime seating for manipulating men for personal gain. Not only is such a woman harder to manage, but her entitlement is far higher. For a life partner I will purposefully aim lower than what I could get for casual sex.

4. Her skin tone should be within two shades of myself

I would like to have kids that look like me, so I will not reproduce with a woman who is black, Asian, or Indian. Acceptable races are South American, Persian, Armenian, and European (non-Northern). The average Croatian or Romanian girl is more similar to my appearance than Spanish or Italian.

5. She must be feminine

She must be a woman who takes great pride in her appearance and the feminine abilities that nature bestowed upon her. I don't want her to be a mindless weakling who needs me all the time, but she should look and act like a woman and not try to compete with me in terms of mental or physical strength.

6. She must want to be a traditional stay-at-home mother

Once the kids arrive, she should have no desire to pursue a pointless office career in place of taking care of our growing brood. She may have some freedom to pursue hobbies like yoga or knitting, but her place will be in the home while I tirelessly work on my internet ebook hustle to bring home the bread that gives her everything she needs.

When I come home from work (at the cafe), I expect the kids to be clean, the house to be in good order, and preparations for dinner planned. I shall not participate in more than 5% of household duties outside of home improvement. In exchange, she will never have to worry about money or work outside the home. She can live a pleasant middle-class lifestyle that can even include dog and car ownership.

7. She must believe in a god

My experience shows that a woman who doesn't believe in god has a value system taught to her by corporations and progressive degenerates. She will certainly be addicted to internet attention, alcohol, casual sex, material possessions, or food. She has relativistic morality, and what she thinks of as morality is actually built upon her feelings. When faced with any type of stress, she will almost always follow the herd or make the wrong decision. A woman who believes in god, while still prone to making mistakes, makes less of them and at least has a mental system encouraging her to perform good.

Conclusion

I believe the seven things above are quite reasonable, and something that would have taken no more than a 6-month search two generations ago, but based on my last decade of intensive fornication, I've encountered maybe two girls who fit the bill, especially when it comes to girls being a virgin and eager to stay at home. Part of this reason is that most of my time hunting for women was spent in big cities where such values are rapidly disappearing.

The decision I have to make now is how badly I want kids. If I don't want kids, I should live in a place like Poland where I can attain a comfortable life of easy sex with "strong and independent" sluts, but where it's close to impossible to meet girls who meet the above requirements (in the Polish cities I have lived in). If I do want to have kids, I should immediately move, because I'm surely not getting any younger. The two countries that seem to best accomplish my list are Ukraine and Russia, though there are huge obstacles and difficulties with living there long term instead of just going for two months of adventure and fun.

While I can honestly state that I'm not crazy about having kids right now, I know that my desires can change and so I have to guess if I will want them within five years time. Only five years ago I was still in the middle of nonstop casual sex, thinking the party would never end, and of course the music did stop and it's something that no longer drives me. If being a father is in my future, I must prepare for it now.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The Age That Men Peak

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

All State’s Safe Driver Discount Commercial Illustrates The Inanity Of Girl Logic

December 9, 2015 | by Gene Hammer | Link | Original Link

All State’s popular ad for its Safe Driver Discount shows how a feminine-primary society is focused on eliminating risk, propping up fictional world views, and stomping out dissent. It also illustrates how when the rubber meets the road, women rely on men, not other women, to enforce the existence of their fantasy world.

The woman starts her attack with “remember when you said men are superior drivers?” The term “superior driver” doesn’t mean the same thing to men and women. When men imagine the best drivers, they picture precise high speed maneuvers. They envision hitting apexes on an F1 circuit and white knuckle NASCAR battles. They conjure the glory of the podium celebration. To men, the most superior drivers are those who take risks and reap the rewards.

To women, driving represents something else entirely. It is transportation, not competition, and success is measured by safety, not the checkered flag. When the man in this ad said at some point in the past that men are superior drivers, it’s doubtful he bragged about men’s talent for maintaining the speed limit with hands at 10:00 and 2:00, while the kids watch Dora the Explorer in the back. It was more likely in the context of discussing Danica Patrick’s career. So right off the bat, the woman misses the mark with her attempt to connect “men are superior drivers” to her safe driver check.

Minimizing Risk

In feminine-primary Girl World, safeguarding against risk is a matter of great importance. This is an extension of female nature wired to secure the survival of offspring, especially when offspring is young and vulnerable. In a state of nature where life is brutal and uncivilized, assuring continued survival for the present day is far more important than implementing a carefully thought out plan for achievement that enables a higher quality of life months and years down the road.

Furthermore, female nature is not so concerned with acquiring resources beyond those needed for immediate survival, or those provided by a male. The drive to acquire resources through risk taking behavior is primarily a male trait. To the feminine-primary psychology, risk taking is foolish because it can threaten the well-being and survival of a woman's children. The man brings home the resources anyway so there is no need for a woman to jeopardize her safety trying to do the same. Therefore, to women, superior equals safer. Superior does not necessarily mean achievement or demonstrated excellence.

Minimizing risk taking behavior sounds good on the surface, but it leads to societal stagnation and collapse. Without risk taking, we would have little of the technology and creature comforts that exist today. When Girl World becomes overly focused on risk avoidance, it smashes the fruits of success by disincentivizing potential risk takers through onerous red tape and regulations.

This is a recipe for sharp decline. The underlying psychology of risk avoidance is a reason why feminine-primary societies fail to rise to greatness in the first place.

The second fallacy of the woman in this ad is the idea that a single exception disproves a statistical probability. Without arguing the merits of whether men or women are better drivers on average, she presents her safe driver check as evidence that men can't be superior, because if they are, no woman could receive such an award. It's the equivalent of declaring victory over someone who says men are taller than women by producing Brittney Griner's driver's license showing she's 6'8″.

Furthermore, the level of accomplishment that a driver must achieve to get a safe driver check is paltry. The woman in this ad carries on about six months without an accident. Does she expect that her male companion, or that most men across the country, aren't able to meet this low standard? To assert that men can't be superior drivers because women receive safe driving checks is the same as arguing men aren't taller than women because look at all the women who are tall enough to ride the kiddie roller coaster at Six Flags.

When the man is about to stammer out his reply to the woman's attack, she shuts him down by channeling the voice of the President from 24. Her own voice would be insufficient to abruptly stifle the response. This illustrates how when women find themselves in conflict, or if someone comes along who challenges their fantasy world view, the knee-jerk reaction is to get a man with authority to take her side, and use that authority to defeat the opponent. In this case, the authoritarian voice bestowed upon her is from a man who any viewer knows could physically crush her companion.

Rather than have an honest discussion about what "superior driver" means, and how her own situation doesn't outweigh averages across an entire population, this woman chooses to present her meaningless evidence, declare victory, and shut down the conversation. This is the same mindset that leads to the "equal pay for equal work" cohort continuing to parrot the same false and misleading statistics that have been debunked time and time again. For them, it's not about being correct, it's about using rhetoric to advance their own interests.

Whether in the form of winning a fleeting girls vs. boys argument, or winning victimhood status as supposedly oppressed members of the workforce, this arguing tactic comes from the same underlying scheme. Win through rhetorical means, and at a minimum receive the good feelings that come from perceived victory.

In the more socially harmful cases, a rhetorical win results in lavish wealth transfers for the poor victims, courtesy of policies adopted and enforced by the predominantly male government.

Read More: Firestone's Newest Commercial Continues The Anti-Male Media Narrative

Gene Hammer
Gene Hammer's blog RedPillAds analyzes television commercials from the viewpoint of a red pill aware man.

Leftists Go Crazy Over Donald Trump's Call To Ban Muslim Immigration

December 10, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

After it became apparent that the shootings in San Bernardino, which left 14 dead, constituted another act of Islamic terrorism, Americans looked to their leaders to provide a way reducing the likelihood the next attack. The response from both Democrats and Republicans was disappointing. None of them had any tangible ideas except for one candidate—Donald Trump.

On December 7th, the anniversary of the bombing of Pearl Harbor, Donald Trump dropped his call for a "total and complete shutdown of Muslims entering the United States until our country's representatives can figure out what is going on." His reason is that a lot of Muslims really hate Americans:

> Most recently, a poll from the Center for Security Policy released data showing "25% of those polled agreed that violence against Americans here in the United States is justified as a part of the global jihad" and 51% of those polled, "agreed that Muslims in America should have the choice of being governed according to Shariah." Shariah authorizes such atrocities as murder against non-believers who won't convert, beheadings and more unthinkable acts that pose great harm to Americans, especially women.

Not surprisingly, progressives suffered an aneurism in response to the proposal. But it wasn't just liberal heads that exploded—mainstream "conservatives" also went into full meltdown mode. Here is a sampling of the reactions.

Trump is “literally Hitler”

No HuffPo. Trump is not proposing internment camps for Muslims.

The knee-jerk reaction of the left to any idea that they don’t like is to compare the author of the idea to everyone’s favorite bogeyman, Hitler. Liberal newspapers like HuffPo and Philadelphia Daily News carried pictures of Trump gesturing with his hand outstretched. The implication being that Trump is doing the Nazi salute.

Astute people on Twitter also noticed that Trump was “literally Hitler.”

Trump is so evil that even comparing him to Hitler fails to capture the full darkness of his black heart. Trump is worse than even literary villains. Harry Potter author J.K. Rowling chimed in with this comparison:

The Hitler comparisons didn't faze Trump supporters who demonstrated that comparing someone to Hitler, like calling someone a racist, is losing its power:

The Republican Response

Most of the Republican candidates were quick to distance themselves from Trump's position. Jeb Bush tweeted out: "Donald Trump is unhinged. His "policy" proposals are not serious." Marco Rubio echoed the sentiment saying:

> I disagree with Donald Trump's latest proposal. His habit of making offensive and outlandish statements will not bring Americans together.

The only candidate that didn't attack Trump's position was Ted Cruz. While Cruz did not endorse Trump's proposal, he complimented Trump for having the courage to broach the topic:

> In the media, there has been no shortage of criticism for Donald Trump, and I do not believe the world needs my voice added to that chorus of critics. And listen, I commend Donald Trump for standing up and focusing America's attention on the need to secure our borders.

Speaker of the House Paul Ryan abandoned his neutrality to condemn Trump's proposal saying that a religious test for immigration is "not what [the Republican] party stands for, and more importantly, is not what this country stands for."

Even former Vice President Dick Cheney came out of retirement to condemn Trump. In an interview with Hugh Hewitt he said:

> I think this whole notion that somehow we can just say no more Muslims, just ban a whole religion, goes against everything we stand for and believe in.

Democrats joined mainstream "conservatives" in rejoicing over Cheney's condemnation. This is odd because up until yesterday, Democrats regarded Dick Cheney as more evil than Darth Vader. As the proverb goes, "the enemy of my enemy is my friend."

Republican Alternatives

Marco Rubio @marcorubio · Dec 7

The next President better be somebody who can unite our country to face the great challenges of the 21st Century.

So if the Republicans are unwilling to embrace Trump's ban on Islamic immigration, what are they willing to do to stop Islamic terrorism?

Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio opt for a two part approach: (1) Increasing surveillance of Americans through the Patriot Act, and (2) Destroying ISIS in Iraq and Syria (and probably following neocon recommendations to take out Assad in the process).

Ted Cruz rejects increasing surveillance of Americans saying. "It is absolutely critical for Congress to balance the privacy interests of law-abiding citizens against the public's interest in national security." However, he does promise to "carpet bomb [ISIS] into oblivion."

There are two problems with the Republican alternatives. The first is that Islamic immigration is forcing the United States to gradually evolve into a police state. If the government is mining everyone's meta data, it is just a matter of time before the information is used for purposes that are unrelated to uncovering potential terrorists, such as finding dirt on political enemies.

And as more Muslims enter the country, the surveillance will need to become ever more invasive. What George Orwell foresaw in 1984 will become a reality, if it is not already.

The second problem is that destroying ISIS does not solve the problem of Islamic terror. The San Bernardino terrorists came from Pakistan, not Syria. Fort Hood shooter Nidal Hasan was born in Arlington Virginia to Palestinian parents. The 9-11 terrorists came from all over the Middle East, including Saudi Arabia, Egypt, UAE, and Lebanon.

Also, if ISIS ceases to exist, who is to say that there will not be some other radical Islamic group that will take its place? In other words, the "destroy ISIS" approach neglects to account for the fact that there is something within Islam itself that lends itself to violence.

Media Reactions

Joe Scarborough @JoeNBC · Dec 7

I'm listing GOP condemnations of his statement. Every candidate that wants to be president needs to speak out.

> John Legend @johnlegend
> @JoeNBC Donald Trump just proposed we ban Muslims from entering the country.

There was a time when journalists took great pride in trying to report the news in an unbiased way. Those days are long gone. The media joined the Democrats and Republicans in condemning Trump. Every news program grilled Trump on his proposal.

Joe Scarborough of MSNBC went so far as taking an unscheduled commercial break to cut Trump off. Later, he tweeted that each candidate who wanted to become president must condemn Trump. Very unbiased.

Chris Cuomo of CNN took to Twitter to argue how awful and un-American a ban on Islamic immigration would be. He also promised to challenge Trump saying, “We have never given [Trump] a pass. All should be tested and good to see others following suit.” I wish journalists had held themselves to such lofty principles when Barack Obama was running for president.

Conclusion

The Scandalous DJT @AceofSpadesHQ · 6h

Let's have it said clearly and plainly. No more hinting about it.

I believe the US may and should make decisions in the US interest. You?

Trump’s proposed ban on Islamic immigration is not a pleasant topic for anyone. If it were to go into effect, many good Muslims would be at least temporarily precluded from entering the US. It is not fair that these good people should be penalized for the actions of their coreligionists.

But life is not fair. Anyone who does a cursory survey of the history of Islam will find that it has been spread through the sword. There is no good way of screening out the 25% of Muslims who believe that violence against non-Muslims is justified. There is also no way of screening out those Muslims who are moderate, but who will later become radicalized.

Until we can figure out exactly what it is within Islam that is causing this propensity to violence, it is perfectly reasonable to limit our exposure by restricting Islamic immigration. Donald Trump has done us all a favor by having the courage to say what we were forbidden from saying before.

Read More: Donald Trump And The Tyranny Of Feelings

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Who Cares If Islamic State Bride Samra Kesinovic Was Killed For Trying To Escape?

December 10, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Bosnian-Austrian teenager Samra Kesinovic, 17, has reportedly been beaten to death for trying to flee the ISIS stronghold of Raqqa in Syria. You may remember Kesinovic and her friend, fellow teen Sabina Selimovic, for their calculated journey from a leafy European suburb to the Middle East in order to become jihadi brides and ISIS recruiters.

Although media outlets are treading cautiously, the tone of many articles, at a time when bigger issues like the downing of a Russian plane by Turkey should be explored, is so far either sympathetic or non-condemnatory of the once proud terrorism poster girl.

With the entry of well-equipped and determined Russian military units into the conflict with ISIS, jihadist-held areas have come under increasing bombardment and their hegemony across many districts is now tenuous at best. Coupled with symbolic Western strikes such as the lethal drone attack on public executioner Jihadi John, it is obvious that many Western-born or raised jihadi girls are becoming scared.

Many will have already died from coalition airstrikes if they haven't been snuffed out yet by either the Syrian army or anti-government rebels. And who should fundamentally care? I don't. The world is a better place without a pathetic creature like Samra Kesinovic, irrespective of whether she died at the hands of her erstwhile side.

"A change of heart" in the context of a girl whose new home is being regularly bombed speaks of nothing but a cry for self-preservation. Her young age is irrelevant as well. This was not a sympathy-deserving female with Down's Syndrome, whose now fatal choices came about through something like an IQ deficiency or serious genetic abnormalities. A choice to leave Austria for Syria would have no doubt been dumber if she were 25 and not a teen, but she is responsible for what she did and has paid the price for it.

Poor, “brainwashed” girl

Sabina Selimovic accompanied Kesinovic to Syria. She died months before her friend. And she looked a lot better with Western make-up and Instagram filters.

The vitiation of any and all female responsibility is a common theme in many Return of Kings articles. The story of Samra Kesinovic is no exception. Austrian officials have long blamed an admittedly virulent Bosnian Muslim preacher based in Vienna, Mirsad O., also known as “Ebu Tejma”, for brainwashing Kesinovic and her friend. The brainwashing thesis is a common device to appease the sensitivities of local Muslim communities in Europe but has taken on an especially troublesome form when it comes to female ISIS supporters.

I guess ideas of girl power have their limitations once they pass the threshold of criminal acts and the moral conundrum of backing a group which makes a living off of rape, general murder, and the systematic genocide of those who do not support a certain Sunni Muslim creed.

A combination of global rape culture, so-called violence against women and basic patriarchy arguments makes authorities reluctant to label despicable and narcissistic individuals like Kesinovic as exercisers of unbridled free choice. How can women support a group whose members openly rape other women, most notably non-Muslim ones? How can women join a death cult where they embrace a twisted form of male dominance?

Mainstream politicians, security officials and others cannot face the real answers, so diminished capacity ideas are routinely bandied about to explain the poor, deliberate behavior of female Islamic fundamentalists.

The perils of Muslim immigrant families in the West

Strangely, there are no pictures of Kesinovic and Selimovic around which show their reactions to ISIS beheadings, reports of rape and other crimes.

Both Samra Kesinovic and Sabina Selimovic were born to Bosnian Muslim refugee families in Austria. The do-gooders will certainly cast the blame onto “racist” Austrian society for producing these pampered, middle-class jihadi girls. What they will not acknowledge is that it is a failure of these families to fully integrate in the first place that creates first or second-generation criminal (and terrorist) threats.

In Austria, a country with which I am greatly familiar, the major problem is not with Serbs or other traditionally Christian south-eastern Europeans but ethnic Bosnians and Turks. Cultural infirmities are the root cause here, even when families cease regular observance of their ancestral faith.

And if social disaster is already brewing amongst these European and Eurasian migrant groups, what catastrophe does the mass arrival of millions of Middle Eastern migrants, almost all of them sexually mature young men, portend? The danger is amplified by the continual appeasement of Muslim communities by governments. Mirsad O. and others will be the only scapegoats, a shortsightedness which forgets the deep reach fervently religious Muslim activists have in nominally secular Muslim homes all across Austria and elsewhere.

Prepare for an even weirder twilight zone

Commentators were quick to label Hasna Ait Boulahcen as a pawn in her male cousin's terrorist games. How could a woman willingly blow herself up for Islam unless she was abused or controlled?

You will notice that few, if any articles chronicling the death of Samra Kesinovic are mentioning the mass rapes of ISIS or other atrocities meticulously committed by its forces. This looks bad in trying to explain, however feebly, Kesinovic and her friend's sociopathic choice in friends and holiday activities. Journalists, instead of excoriating Kesinovic in death, will assiduously minimize or hide her culpability to retain the image of ISIS as a collection of purely male-inspired and always female-imprisoning monsters.

People may say that her dying from a Western airstrike or, better still, the rifles of Kurdish fighters would have been a more appropriate swan song. I disagree. Irony is the most powerful way to send a message to would-be female morons wanting to emulate two deceased Bosnian-Austrian schoolgirls.

The hand that helps take you into a new world is the same hand that can strangle or throttle you later. In her final moments, Samra Kesinovic maybe sensed this for the first time.

Read More: Understanding The Ideology Behind The Islamic State

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Get In Shape And Practice Your Fighting Skills

December 10, 2015 | by Jake Li | Link | Original Link

Throughout every station in a man's life, they are expected to be capable of holding their own. It doesn't matter if you're a grown man protecting your family from a mugger, a boy squaring off against a bully on the playground, or you're protecting yourself against a horde of beer-throwing Canadian feminists. You need to know how to defend yourself.

Unfortunately, in today's culture, fighting is looked down upon as unnecessary or simply for entertainment purposes. Many men go about their day-to-day routine without ever giving it a thought. They are in for a rude awakening when a little violence comes their way and they are totally unprepared.

Enter Fighting Fit

Fighting Fit is a system I have been working on for some time now. Its primary purpose is to train individuals to be able to defend themselves in the shortest amount of time. It focuses on simple, gross motor movements and bodyweight exercises, so anyone can train anywhere with little to no equipment.

Some of you may be thinking, "I hit the gym regularly. I'm already in good shape and don't need to do any kind of specialized training." As an avid martial artist, I respectfully beg to differ. Size and power is great, don't get me wrong, but it's even better if you know how to maximize its potential. I have about 30-40 pounds on my instructor and am about 15 years younger, yet he can still throw me around like a rag doll all day long.

Fighting Fit is a hybrid between two principles: strength and skill. It's going to kick your butt into shape as well as familiarize you with some basic techniques that you can instantly apply in an encounter. No fancy Shaolin monk stuff here; just simple, effective, and brutally devastating techniques to end a fight as quickly as possible.

Note: What I am providing here is NOT a comprehensive self-defense routine designed to handle every situation you may encounter. These are just a few simple techniques that anyone can work on. Let's keep the keyboard warriors to a minimum…or at least focused on legitimate issues.

A Basic Fighting Fit Circuit

This is a simple circuit that you can do right now. You can go through the circuit once for a quick warm-up before your main workout, or you can do it multiple times as a workout all its own. As we go through the different exercises, I will provide substitutions to help accommodate all levels of fitness as well as what equipment you have access to.

What You Will Need

For this circuit, you will need only a few items:

1. A jump rope
2. A standing heavy bag -or- a partner with training pads
3. A pull-up bar or something else to do pull-ups on

You will do each exercise for 30 seconds followed by a 15 second rest before starting the next exercise. If you are going through this circuit multiple times, give yourself about a 60 second rest between circuits.

1. Squat Jumps

This exercise is pretty straightforward but great for building leg strength and stamina. From a standing position, squat down low and then explosively jump up into the air. If you are not fully warmed up, keep it slow and low. Also, be sure to land on the balls of your feet to keep things gentle on the knees.

If you unsure about the jumping aspect, simply perform regular body-weight squats. Alternatively, if you want to make this exercise more difficult, perform a 180 degree spin during each jump (or a full 360 degree spin if you're feeling especially ambitious).

2. Low Roundhouse Kicks

Be sure to pivot on the standing foot or you risk hurting your knee.

This kick is aimed at either your opponent's knee, the inside of their leg, or their IT band which runs up the outside of the leg just behind the quadricep. Swing your kicking leg around, pivot your standing leg in the direction of your kick, and aim to hit with the top of your foot (about where the tongue of your shoe sticks out). Kick hard and follow through the point of impact. The idea is to completely demolish their leg.

Be sure not to lag between kicks either. As soon as you land a kick, you need to be resetting for the next one.

3. Push-ups

Not much to say here. Everyone knows what push-ups are. If standard push-ups are too easy, try one of the many variations out there. I personally prefer knuckle push-ups as they help strengthen the wrists. It's hard to go wrong here so get creative.

4. Shadow Boxing or Punches on a Heavy Bag

Now that your arms and shoulders are burning, it's time to hit the bag. We're going to focus on the three basics; the jab, cross, and hook. Keep your hands up protecting your face and go to town. Don't forget to mix up the tempo between big knockout punches and quick flurries. Also, be sure to switch your lead so you're comfortable on both sides.

If you are worried about injuring your hands or wrists, you can either practice with open hands (palm strikes) or don't use a bag at all and just shadowbox.

5. Pull-ups

Again, not much to say here. All variations are fine. I personally prefer neutral-grip pull-ups (palms facing each other), but chin-ups and standard pull-ups work just as well. If you're not quite strong enough to do a full pull-up yet, work on doing negatives or Aussie pull-ups.

6. Thai Clinch With Knee Strikes

We're going to further strengthen your back and grip by working the Thai clinch. Having a partner helps with this drill but isn't necessary. Wrap your hands around both sides your partner's head. Do not interlink your fingers!

From there, try to pinch your elbows together. It isn't necessary to get your elbows to completely touch though. Doing this keeps your opponent from pulling their head free from your grip. From there, pull them in for knee strikes to the groin. If you're training with a partner, be kind and pull your strikes.

This can also be practiced using a heavy bag or simply throwing them in the air, shadowboxing style. Elbow strikes to the temple and jaw add an extra element to your training.

7. Elongated Plank

This is just like the standard plank except you increase the distance between your hands and feet. It doesn't take much distance for you to start feeling this. If you are just starting off, begin with the standard plank (hands placed directly below your shoulders) and progress from there.

Another great option is to use an ab wheel. Whichever option you prefer, be sure to brace your abs and don't let your hips dip.

8. The Shrimp Scoot

This is a great drill that will blast your hips and abs as well as help you get comfortable working from the ground. Lay on your back with your legs bent in the sit-up starting position. From there, push your hips up like you're doing the hip bridge exercise. Now, you're going to use your arms and feet to slowly work your way backwards. Keep your elbows close to your body and your hands up to defend yourself (even when training by yourself it's good to develop those good habits).

The yellow arrows signify movement of the left arm and leg while the orange arrows signify movement of the right side.

9. Jump Rope

The boxer's secret weapon. This is great for improving your stamina, coordination, and rhythm. Honestly, whether you're a martial artist or not, you should be jumping rope regularly. There's countless variations, but you don't need to get fancy. Jumping with both feet together is perfectly fine. It won't take long for your calves to be screaming.

Wrapping Up

Depending on your goals and fitness level, you can apply this circuit in a few different ways. Go through this circuit once if you're just wanting a quick warm-up or multiple times if you're looking to get a full workout with some self-defense training mixed in. Increase the difficulty by increasing the work times for each exercise or by cutting down on the rest times.

Regardless whether this is your primary workout or merely a warm-up, you will see improvements to your general fitness and fighting technique. Remember, you get out what you put in. You should be pushing yourself in every exercise trying to go faster and harder. You never know when you might need to defend yourself and training routines like this might very well save your life!

Stay tuned for more training routines, tips, and variations. Got questions or concerns? Leave them in the comments section and I will be happy to address them.

Read More: Fighting Another Man Could Change Your Life

Jake Li
Jake is an avid martial arts practitioner with over 16 years experience. He believes that every man should be capable of defending himself and his loved ones. Jake's articles focus primarily on merging martial arts with tried and true strength-building principles so you leave your workouts not only stronger, but more prepared. Visit his site, MACE to see more of his content.

Why Do Millennials Oppose Free Speech?

December 11, 2015 | by Kevin McNolte | Link | Original Link

In a recent Pew Research poll, 40% of American millennials favor limiting offensive speech, in particularly speech offensive to minorities. The problem with limiting speech is that it can be a slippery slope as to what is deemed okay and what is deemed offensive. As we all know, it MUST fit the narrative to be deemed acceptable speech.

Although there are already hate speech laws in Europe, the numbers are even higher across the Atlantic Ocean. You would think with the current issues that millennials, especially college students, face on a day-to-day basis that their mind would be occupied with more pressing issues, but you would be wrong. College debt, terrorism, and a depressed job market apparently aren't as important as policing your words. There are a few reasons why I believe that millennials don't want you to say or think anything that is deemed offensive by society.

Lack Of Argument Skills

We all (should) know this by now. Individuals who lack basic argument skills usually turn to name calling, logical fallacies, or antagonizing when they lose an argument. They do this so that they can silence the opponent in an argument.

With an untrustworthy mainstream media, it is hard to gather hard facts that can be debunked. Nowadays we have a new method of silencing the opponent: literally SILENCING the opponent. To hell with the first amendment.

Growing Up In Smaller Households (At Most Two Siblings)

This type of family is much less common nowadays

During the baby boomer era, it was common for children to grow up with several brothers and sisters. Within a large family, a child does not get much of a voice. Their opinions must be muted and they must bite their lip, not necessarily because their parents were the thought police, but to avoid conflict within the family. They learned to accept diverse opinions of their family members.

Nowadays, it's very common for millennials to grow up as the only child. When they had an opinion or a dream, their parents support it, no matter how kooky it may be. Parents these days are taught to always support their children's dreams, which leave the child without any sort of opposing thoughts.

Place that same child in a real world diverse setting, such as a public university, they cannot cope with the fact that others may disagree with them (or think that they are outright delusional).

Lack Of Power

Every day the western leaders get stronger, the citizens get weaker. Their votes count less and less, leaving them feeling powerless and voiceless. Their opinions seem to be irrelevant. If they happen to agree with the politically correct narrative, however, then the only issue is making sure everyone else is on board with their delusions and those who aren't remain silent.

I'm sure you wonder why rap music, particularly that made by Black Americans, is virtually immune to scrutiny. I've wondered this for a while myself. If you watched Roosh's video of the Georgetown "Black Lives Matter" protest, he mentions that around 50% of the participants were indeed white.

What were they doing there you ask? Did the white participants actually care about black lives? Of course not. They cared about one thing and one thing only: the politically correct narrative and silencing anyone who disagrees with it.

The reason why rap music never receives criticism is because it would come off as antagonizing towards blacks, which is who the left needs in order to help enforce their ideology. They excuse the misbehavior of blacks and minorities in hope to gain their support.

Kinda like the one parent that lets you stay up late or eat cookies when the other parent isn't around. If the left really cared about black lives, they would tackle issues that affect them, offensive speech not being one of them.

In fact, I would go as far as to say that they encourage behaviors that hurt black America. You think rap music, "Black Lives Matter" protests, welfare, feminist indoctrination that drives the women to choose single motherhood, obesity, excessive use of the N-word, and ignoring high murder rates in their neighborhoods helps Black America in any way? This is how they successfully gain power over Black Americans and other minorities as well.

Political Correctness Indoctrination At An Early Age

We see this in our media, our schools, and sometimes, even our churches. Children these days are exposed to political correctness at a very early age, and this ties everything above together into one free speech limiting bundle.

Think about it like this: if you were told that there were certain guidelines as to what you can and cannot say in public, wouldn't you think that the same should apply to everyone else? This obviously doesn't apply to the decreasing amount of politically incorrect households that raise their children traditionally, but to the children raised in far left households, they feel obligated to make sure that everyone else follows the rules of limited speech that they have been taught to abide by their entire lives.

Conclusion

I don't believe that millennials are to blame entirely for their views on free speech. Sure, they have internet access via laptops and smartphones to where they can look up other viewpoints, but when they have had a certain indoctrination embedded in their brains their entire life, along with coddling parents and lack of argument skills. In a society so diverse they feel voiceless, it shouldn't be a mystery as to why they can't handle opposing views.

We can point the blame at many other people for this phenomenon of entitled millennials, but that won't solve the issue. The problem is not those who make a living off of the freedom of speech, but those who are unaffected by political correctness. The majority of Americans tend to be moderates who do not have such views that by society's standards are deemed to be politically incorrect, so therefore they are likely to not pay any attention to this issue.

I'm afraid to say that until this trend starts to affect the majority of the population, it will only get worse.

Read More: People Oppose Anonymity Because They Can't Think For Themselves

Kevin McNolte
Kevin McNolte is a millennial and west coast native who tries not to take the harsh realities of life too seriously. His interests are fitness, feminine women, and hoppy beers.

The Problem Of “Spiritual, But Not Religious”

December 11, 2015 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

In my past two articles, I was eager to explore some of the themes of Advent, especially those of interest to the men of this forum. Advent, as we’ve seen, is a season for Judgment, a season for the advent of Truth in our midst, the Truth Who is King and Priest. Today, I’d like to focus on a topic that ties these two themes together; in the phrase “I’m spiritual, but not religious,” the “spiritual” is an inferior and effeminate mockery of religion’s inherent virility.

Of course, we ascribe various meanings to each of these terms in our days, some positive and negative. How am I using them? The more common opinion of the ancients, is that religion is derived from religare, “to bind fast; to fasten,” giving it sometimes the same force of a related term, obligatio (“obligation”). Religion is our “bounden duty,” fastening us together, and to the divine.

“Spirituality,” thus framed as an alternative to religion, is the pretense of making contact with the Transcendent, without all the clear and fixed ideas of what It is, and how we commune with It. This lack of clear ideas allows the basest forms of self-pandering and casual blasphemy to occur.

The Commodification Of “Spirituality”

Take a second, head on over to Google, and search for “Philosophy.” When I do it, the first three results—two of which are paid advertisements—are for a line of “skin care” products. Of course, nobody needs these for “skin care;” they are just pretexts for separating money from foolish women.

I first became aware of them a few years ago at Christmastime, funnily enough, when I came to visit my family for the holidays. Showering in my parents' bathroom, I saw that my mother had these things all over, in the shower and on the counters. I very nearly threw them all out.

For you see, these products are insultingly titled after philosophical ideals and virtues, even the specifically theological virtues and Divine Operations, amounting to literal blasphemy. The products are named such things as "hope," "miracle worker," "living grace" and "unconditional love," all with trite, infuriating messages written on the containers.

If you find that their products are not suffusing your soul with the theological virtues as well as you would like, have no fear: they also make a facial firming serum called "When Hope is not Enough." It's sure to get you through some tough times.

Check your privilege, St. Augustine; it's about time concubines started writing the theological tractates!

Irreligious "Spirituality" Is Simply A Mirror Of Our Superficial Selves

This company's foundress describes her business as the result of an "epiphany" which she had on Christmas Day—in the desert near my home in Arizona, funnily enough (it only occurred to me to use these products as an illustration of my point this past weekend, and the coincidences sure are piling up). Her epiphany came, when she realized that she was the only one "serious" about her concubinage to a man who had better things to do than hike with her on Christmas Day.

But this sad moment was turned to joy when she looked up and saw a rainbow! "Something in me completely shifted, as if I had a healing," she told an LA Times reporter, who further added that "she is in a new phase of her life—one that emphasizes inner, not outer beauty. She refuses to join a gym or diet." Need I say more?

There are two possibilities, here. On the one hand, this woman may actually be so pitiable as to think that she received a “religious healing,” which inspired her to become an even worse version of herself, eating more and exercising less, and to “focus on inner beauty” by selling blasphemous products with a literally skin-deep purpose. On the other hand, she may simply understand how easy it is to bilk other women with this kind of nonsense… in which case, she’s right.

Certainly my mother and my aunts, who all describe themselves as “spiritual, but not religious,” love her products. And what is the message? “Don’t do anything hard to improve yourself; affirm yourself as you are… but DO spend money on my product, because it provides what is missing from your life.”

Even when the “spiritual but not religious” approach has not been reduced to a marketing gimmick, it is still a narcissistic bit of flim-flam. When I first went to college (a few years before I became a monk), a girl I took out asked me why I “limited myself” to just one religion, rather than picking and choosing the things I liked best from all of them. Picking from all of them would be more “open minded,” she explained. I told her that nothing was less open-minded than destroying the integrity of a culture’s religious practices, reassembling the ones you already liked into a new, personal mish-mash. An open-minded person would allow a religious tradition to impact him as it is, not hack away at it until only a reflection of his preconceived notions remained.

Moreover, I told her that religion was about Truth, and involved many fine distinctions in the exposition of momentous questions; it was impossible to preserve such integrity of thought with a buffet-style approach. Her statement implied that spirituality is simply a collection of practices designed to produce a feeling or state of mind, to entertain or to flatter one’s self. I told her that a person who approached the divine in this was simply worshipping himself, rather than rising above himself by contact with what is higher than himself.

Her reply was that if I could only hear myself, I would see how my narrow religious views had already given me a very judgmental attitude; it was not my place to tell other people which spiritual ideas and practices were right, they had to find what was “true” for them.

This humble yoga mistress can feel the force flow through her.

Liberalism Applied To The Supernatural Is Inherently Effeminate

A man should not cheapen himself by submitting to such an hypocritical and self-refuting concept—to preach an intolerant tolerance. My “spirituality” was wrong because I thought some people’s “spirituality” was wrong! This is the same philosophy held by leftists on political matters – tolerance for me, but not for thee. Hey, you hateful, judgmental asshole! Didn’t anyone teach you not to pass judgment? Though our Lord does warn people in the Gospels not to judge the state of another man’s soul, or his real worth, it is quite clear that the Lord believed in judging the objective morality of acts and ideas. Rational discrimination—good judgment—is the basis of right action.

The result of political leftism is thus to offer a justification for whatever people happen to want at present, by wrapping it in the high-minded ideas of tolerance and freedom… while providing a justification for vilifying unpopular ideas, by associating them with the ideas of intolerance and totalitarianism. But it should be obvious that this aggressive “tolerance” is itself a totalitarian ideology that uses “freedom” and “oppression” as mere buzzwords. It is an incoherent system devoid of any positive substance, and God help you if such persons are in charge of creating and enforcing the “principles” of your society.

Likewise, the “spiritual, but not religious” approach provides justification for spiritual masturbation, and for bad-mouthing religion, under pretense of similarly high-minded ideas. It provides easy slogans that feign virtue and wisdom (like “meat is murder” for veganism, or “two wrongs don’t make a right” against the death penalty) but fears to arrive at the clarity of natural religion (which can explain why we don’t incarcerate lions, and why we do punish criminals), because this clarity dispels the ambiguity they require in order to turn liberty into license.

But a serious man will search for the coherent system of truths, that holds the moral and spiritual life together; his religious practices will have the expression and practice of these truths for their aim. There is a legitimate way in which serious religion transcends finite concepts… but this is because it transcends them as the shadows of a more brilliant Truth, not because it finds them false in the first place.

“Omne verum, a quocumque dicatur, a Spiritu Sancto est.” “Well, Tom, that may be true for you…”

If any men on this site are interested in developing their spiritual sides, I would exhort them to keep this in mind. If you think of the spiritual life as an emotional experience, or a set of practices focused on you, your “personality,” your aspirations, I encourage you to reconsider. The way of men has always sought a more authentic spirituality, in the excellence whereof loftier ideals shine forth, such as Truth, clarity, ascesis, sacrifice, reverence, and duty. God grant us to progress in these, during this holy season.

Read More: My Experience At A Religious Retreat In America

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Australian Schools Step Up Feminist Indoctrination Of Children

December 11, 2015 | by Nikolai Vladivostok | Link | Original Link

I had the pleasure of attending a rough-as-guts Australian state school at the peak of 1990s feminism. The dumpiest and grumpiest female teachers, apparently unconcerned about life-threatening peer violence against weaker boys, attempted to ideologically seduce the girls, succeeding in winning over a few gangly suck ups who obediently wore trousers (in the 1990s, gasp), and who took up science challenges in which they had no interest.

In the meantime, a thin, talkative pretty boy a year above me who was a little too popular with the cute girls was held down by some jealous classmates and had his mouth thoroughly smashed in with a brick. He spent a month in hospital. One perpetrator was expelled and the other fled. The incident, not atypical for our institution, attracted no other attention from school authorities and the police were not involved.

Instead, the feminist phenomenon reached its zenith at about the same time when the butch teachers organized girls-only self defense classes and held an assembly exclusively for female pupils (the content secret), and when the (male) Vice Principal thundered at the entire student body about how proactive and dedicated girls were and what awful losers boys were, thus ensuring that any boy who had been considering taking up an academic opportunity avoided doing so lest he be called a fag.

Feminist posters went up celebrating girls in non-traditional fields, warning them to focus on their career rather than marriage, and about the dangers of the male members of our shared species.

Artist's impression of Vice Principal.

I lived in terror amid this unpoliced chaos until I reached fifteen or so and was large enough to defend myself. Throughout, we were berated for being the cause of the world's problems by the very adults who were supposed to be protecting us. Then we were gone, moving on to further study or prison in approximately equal numbers.

Recently, the sneering, severely shorn harridans of Australian secondary education have again emerged from their tree, pioneering a program to indoctrinate children in feminist ideology.

A hyperventilating 'news' piece in the once respectable paper, The Age, begins with a bossy, bitchy, sixteen-year-old feminist complaining that people call her a bossy bitch. It continues by explaining that a teacher and some of her students have begun a Feminist Collective which has subsequently turned into an elective class.

The girls, together with a tiny troupe of "boys," receive political instruction in such feminist falsehoods as "systemic sexism" (illegal in Australia since 1984), the mythical hordes of wife-beating thugs, and the venerable wage gap.

Ferocious husbands.

The next section of the article is best quoted in excruciating detail, together with English translations.

> The students were angry that good friends were falling victim to eating disorders . .

Yes, men made them do that. What red-blooded bloke doesn't savor that bitter, bilious taste of kissing a bulimic?

> . . . that white middle class men dominated their reading lists . . .

Drink! Around a third of the authors on the official reading list are female, and they make up half of the novelists.

> ". . . that objectifying images of girls they knew were circulating on Facebook . . ."

Yes, and who put those images there? Did those rascally boys sneak into those girls' bedrooms and secretly snap them in their knickers? Or, perhaps, did those girls put sexy selfies of themselves up there as they are hopelessly prone to do?

A woman posts a sexy selfie because of sexism.

> The collective also faced opposition in the playground . . . Male students argued that they should form a "men's rights collective" to protect themselves against the feminists.

What was most upsetting about that was, it was the cool boys who were trolling them so. The naughty recalcitrants won't really turn into MRAs – they're too busy having fun with prettier girls. It's good to know the red pill has sunk so deeply into Australian society, however. I suspect some of those young hooligans are presently reading this very article. Nice work, lads.

Remember: your cheeky antics are making those spluttering, red-faced educators quite damp. You'll get away with murder so long as you never, ever apologize. See: Trump.

> It got increasingly aggressive . . . I tried to stay calm, but when I left, I just about to burst out into tears [sic], because these were a couple of my really good friends who had just yelled at me, for simply saying that I want rights.

I'm guessing no one was yelling except the young Kommissar. More sensible friends probably pointed out that she is denied not a single opportunity and that she enjoys a freer, safer, and more privileged existence than ninety-nine percent of the world's population.

A word to the wise: you don't get to run the world if you flee in hysterics when someone disagrees with you. Could you image Vladimir Putin doing that? Neither can anyone else, sweetheart. That's why he's got the job.

Vladimir Putin responds to his critics.

> . . . a growing number of boys . . . support the collective.

Boys who will not lose their virginity until they either pay for it or stumble upon a site like this, whichever comes first.

I'm not at all opposed to high school kids learning about feminism. Let a hundred flowers bloom, as Mao briefly said. Students should be exposed to the classic feminist texts. They should also be exposed to anti-feminist views such as those put forward by articulate MRAs (they do exist), and to neomasculinist values promulgated on Return of Kings.

Having read widely and debated without the straightjacket of feminist censorship, would adolescents follow the example of their desperately sad, feminist teachers? Or would they notice who is happier and more successful among the peoples of the world?

Read More: Tactics For The War Against Cultural Marxism In 2015

Nikolai Vladivostok

Nikolai Vladivostok is a writer, Socialist and denouncer of reactionary elements. He has faith that the efficiency of Soviet industry and agriculture will inevitably lead to the collapse of the West and the liberation of its Peoples. Nikolai blogs at SovietMen on topics such as economics, sex, and debauchery.

How Cinderella Shows The Harsh Realities Of The Sexual Marketplace

December 12, 2015 | by Marcus Aurelius | Link | Original Link

"Shakespeare said that art is a mirror held up to nature. And that's what it is. The nature is your nature, and all of these wonderful poetic images of mythology are referring to something in you."
— Joseph Campbell

Most of us know the rough plot of Cinderella, by virtue of Walt Disney's 1950 film: Cinderella is an orphaned child under the "care" of a wicked stepmother and two even more wicked stepsisters. Cinderella is denied a chance to go to a grand ball at which the local prince will choose his bride, but a fairy godmother endows the girl (temporarily) with beautiful trappings, and gets her to the ball.

While Cinderella and the Prince fall in love when they meet at the ball, circumstances intervene and Cinderella flees home at midnight. The Prince scours the land for Cinderella, and eventually identifies her by the glass slipper she left behind at the ball. The Prince and Cinderella marry, and (literally) live happily ever after.

The plot of Disney's version is taken near-verbatim from a 1697 story called Cendrillon by Charles Perrault, which Perrault describes as the retelling of a much older folktale from out of southern Italy. The earliest known version of the story is the Greek myth of Rhodopis, recorded in Herodotus's Histories around 700 BC.

Perrault said the moral of the story was "While it's good to have intelligence, good sense, and good breeding, you likely don't get anywhere without a fairy godmother". That is, success in life basically comes down to preparation plus a bit of luck. This is certainly a profound truth on its own for men to absorb. Luck is a major factor in success, no matter what the American Dream might say to us. But there are much more significant messages about gender roles and gender relations hiding beneath the Cinderella story, ones men should understand as well as if not better than women.

A woman's sex appeal is magic

To get to the ball, Cinderella is endowed by her fairy godmother—i.e. by magic—with all the exterior trappings, allure, and clothing needed to catch the attentions of the prince. In Disney's film the fairy godmother is a fat old babuschka, implying the wisdom of older women is what transforms Cinderella. But the magic that makes Cinderella into a beautiful princess is not wisdom or fairy dust. It's a metaphor for something far more powerful and primal: the magic of a young woman reaching adulthood and the peak of her sexual attractiveness, at age 18-25.

As all men know, this attractiveness is godlike in its potency. In the Cinderella story, the magic is powerful enough to arrest the prince's mind at first sight; powerful enough to make him search his entire realm to find her. In the real world, sexual attractiveness has brought down governments, as well as inspired most modern music. Cinderella's stepmother and stepsisters (all significantly older than her) cannot achieve it despite all the artifice of poise and finely-tailored clothing (and, perhaps, three years in a Gender Studies degree).

A woman's sex appeal is magic that runs out

This is the most important part of the story: the magic that transforms Cinderella is strictly limited by time. At midnight, Cinderella is returned to rags. In real life, around age 30, women's physical attractiveness tanks. In both cases, the magic is gone, forever.

Women don't realize the magic is running out until it's too late

Cinderella is too swept up in the prince's eyes and the glamour of the ball to notice the passing of time. Consequently she is caught out by the clock chiming midnight and has to flee for home, panicking at the loss of her glamours.

Women—especially when feminism dishonestly presents natural childbearing as practical or possible past forty—also don't hear the clock chiming midnight. They, too, are too swept up in a different diversion: typically, riding the cock carousel through their most fertile years. Such women invariably are the ones bitterly complaining they are invisible to men and bitterly regretting their empty wombs when they've turned 40.

The glass slipper

When the magic fades, it spares one thing: Cinderella's glass slippers. This seems to be a plot hole given the rules of magic in the story, but makes sense symbolically. Leave aside the sexual subtext of the prince's servants going around his entire kingdom "trying on" every maiden to see if the slipper fits: the glass slipper is a potent symbols of fertility, good genes, good breeding.

A slipper made of glass is beautiful but delicate – one false step, one heavy footfall, and it shatters, irreplaceable. Is childhood any less delicate, any more replaceable? And the slippers also symbolize Cinderella's youthful beauty: again, irreplaceable, gone with one false step, one descent into slutdom. The slippers are symbols of the prince and Cinderella's children to be.

Single fathers should not remarry

Cinderella's troubles only begin when her father, a widower, remarries. Versions of the story differ on whether it's for love or so Cinderella has a mother figure, but either way it's a mistake from Cinderella's point of view. Statistically, single fathers are better at parenting than single mothers. Child abuse is most prevalent among the children of divorced women—and when it does occur, it's typically at the hands of a partner not biologically related to the child.

…Especially not to single mothers

Cinderella's stepmother has two children of her own already, and she is never said to be a widow — implying she's either an unmarried mother or divorced. The match does not end well for Cinderella or her father, who dies shortly after he marries the stepmother. It is well-understood in the manosphere that (a) you can't turn a hoe into a housewife, and (b) a bad woman can easily shorten one's life.

Cinderella's stepsisters are vain, unfuckable bitches, ugly inside and out—and willing to abuse the traditionally feminine Cinderella. This is entirely consistent with the behaviour we see from the daughters of single mothers. Statistically they are not competent at holding down relationships and often have major mental issues, in no small part because their mothers never taught them any better.

Cinderella's stepsisters are the daughters of the West at large: girls with no fathers physically, emotionally or spiritually present in their lives.

A wise prince understands he is the prize

Cinderella's prince embodies traditional masculinity. Despite the pressure from his family and society at large to marry, the Prince refuses to settle for just any girl: no stepmothers or stepsisters for him. He settles only for a girl that he deems worthy, even if he has to turn over the whole kingdom looking for her.

Men in the West have, to their disgrace, reversed this situation. Women ride the cock carousel on the (in many cases justified) expectation that some thirsty sucker will be picking them up after they choose to get off the ride. Women are permitted to "wait" for their "soulmate"; men are permitted to settle.

The prince, then, embodies good advice for men: screw who you will on a casual basis, but be selective and be careful who you marry or live with. Because the wrong choice will fuck you up six ways to Sunday and ruin your whole kingdom.

On the other hand, if you do manage to identify a woman who's at peak sexual attractiveness and has a good character, the prince has good counsel as well: move mountains to wife that shit up, because such a woman is rare if not extinct, maybe only one in the entire realm, and there's a godawfully big pack of ugly stepsisters out there looking to snare you.

A good myth, like any good story, teaches us things about human nature without us realizing it. Myth, therefore, is worth seeking out; worth reading; worth contemplating. Never doubt that myth is under attack from vested interests, especially in the modern era. Consider the sterility and destructive themes of Frozen as compared to its parent fable, The Snow Queen.

Cinderella, fortunately, endures. The story has come under revisionist attack over the years, but none of these pale, ungrateful versions have persisted in the public mind or overturned its lessons. Even as late as 2015, Hollywood still had sufficient courage to produce the story essentially unchanged from the 1950 version, with all of these messages intact.

The red pill, for women, is a glass slipper: an understanding that what they have is incredibly seductive and beautiful—but fragile and only good for a limited time.

Read More: 3 Reasons Why You Should Never Let Your Child Watch Sesame

Street

Marcus Aurelius

Marcus is a newly-awakened red pill hidden inside the Matrix, seeking to bring down the system from within. In the meantime he has books to read, writing to do, medieval swordsmanship to practice, and does not charge by the hour.

Mattress Girl Threatens To Sue Newsweek For Telling The Story Of The Man She Falsely Accused Of Rape

December 12, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Paul Nungesser's complaint is filled with lies. I want to warn you to be conscientious about what you publish as 'fact' for I may work with a lawyer to rectify any inaccuracies and misrepresentations.
>
> — Emma Sulkowicz

Confirming her hostility towards any serious investigation of her false rape claim, perennial attention-seeker Emma Sulkowicz has made a thinly veiled legal threat against Newsweek. Choosing to (finally) take at least a two-dimensional look at the campus "rape" hysteria, the publication had the gall to interview the man Sulkowicz stalked for months, Paul Nungesser, and get his side of the story. German national Nungesser has previously been interviewed by both American and German outlets, but the overall airtime and newspaper space he has received from the media amounts to a pittance compared to Sulkowicz and her increasingly bizarre antics.

Yes, that's right, a mainstream features writer, Max Kutner, has decided to buck the trend of journalists effectively banning any account from Nungesser. In terms of the overall fabrications about a purported lack of campus safety, this blacklisting is unsurprising. Newsweek itself had been a repeat offender, disseminating the widely debunked "one in four or five" rate of college sexual assault, as reported by Ashe Schow of The Washington Examiner.

For what seems like an eternity, Emma Sulkowicz has been afforded all the privileges of someone whose grossly unfounded (read: false) accusation is taken as Gospel truth. Columbia University, even after an aborted police investigation and multiple college tribunal decisions, acquiesced to her continued slandering, stalking, bullying and harassment of the exonerated Nungesser. The fascistic Senator for New York, Kirsten Gillibrand, resorted to calling Nungesser a rapist and invited Sulkowicz to Obama's State of the Union address. Countless others shielded and justified ever more unhinged behavior as well.

The rhetoric is becoming more and more Orwellian

Because Kirsten Gillibrand and others take the results of gerrymandered surveys as rape convictions, there's no rationale for letting accused men even tell story their story, let alone have it heard during impartial investigations.

With "I believe women", there is no need to tell an accused's story. It's why, for example, Sulkowicz resorted to saber-rattling in her response to Newsweek. The statement from her quoted above screams, "Listen and believe! Facts are determined by the accuser!" In addition, if this were Nungesser replying to a publication (after all, nothing was ever proven by Sulkowicz), the backlash would be merciless.

Some readers may be half-rejoicing at what seems to be Newsweek's turn for the better. A word (or several paragraphs) of caution is needed, though. Because Sulkowicz herself has been on the defensive for a while (the reaction to her mock-rape "art piece" from her powerful backers was underwhelming), anticipate the same from the broader rape hysteria crowd after this Newsweek piece. And then wait for the counterattack.

Disassociating from the poster girl to keep the false narrative going?

Newsweek could actually still be incredibly biased. Sulkowicz went off the rails completely with her streamed rape acting and the publication probably senses this, hence the Nungesser interview to save journalistic face.

As I recently reported, feminists and their white knight pets are delving into new and dumbed down ways of trying to butcher due process and castigate all men as would-be rapists. The Hunting Ground, a convoluted pile of fiction, will be followed by numerous other attempts to further emotionalize discussions about rape accusations at the expense of objectivity. Sulkowicz is fast becoming a liability for even Kirsten Gillibrand, so the emphasis will shift to new methods or new, less superficially extreme poster girls.

Plus, the media itself is acutely aware that many Americans, a silent majority, are not swallowing the "rape is everywhere" mantra. CNN, which produced The Hunting Ground and was entirely receptive to Sulkowicz, has long been a hotbed for incredulous and condemnatory reader comments which question the network's distinctly anti-male bias. Newsweek's apparently non-partisan coverage regarding Nungesser this time may just be a tokenistic gesture or a one-off nod to the skepticism about "rape culture" from the American public.

We must not relent in our exposure of false rape frauds

In the aftermath of Jackie Coakley being exposed as a false rape artist, no major figure questioned the official platform given to “advocate” Emily Renda. Our enemies have powerful resources that are not cut off when they fail spectacularly.

Whatever its intentions, Newsweek has been forced to temporarily change its tune. This is the culmination of intense non-mainstream pressure, of which Return of Kings has been an integral part. The exposure of Sulkowicz and her ideological contemporary, UVA student Jackie Coakley, among numerous other instances, has led to significant delays in the enactment of more draconian college rape tribunal laws. Nonetheless, there is still a great deal of work to be done.

Under no circumstances can we take our foot off the accelerator. Without the watchful eyes of those committed to the rights of men accused of sexual assault, what little legal and social protections remain will quickly evaporate.

We cannot count on desperate fruit-loops like Emma Sulkowicz in challenging campus rape lies.

Read More: Mattress Girl Emma Sulkowicz Makes A Rape Sex Tape

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How History Shows Us The Evil Of Western Masochism

December 13, 2015 | by Bryan Paul Rouleau | Link | Original Link

In the wake of the Paris attacks, there is a rather frantic movement afoot in the Western media to whitewash anything about the attacks that might impugn the religion of Islam – the espoused religion of all the attackers and the primary impetus for their attack, as asserted by the attackers themselves.

Most of these attempts come as editorials in the biggest Western newspapers and new media sites. The argument, generally, is that the attackers in Paris did not represent "true" Islam.

Never mind how this illustrious coterie of rabidly anti-theist journalists all became PhDs in Islamic theology; their purpose is little more noble than to ensure Western nations keep their doors open to Muslim refugees, regardless of the extent of their radical Islamist persuasions; about 200,000 Syrian refugees are expected to arrive in the U.S. over the next two years.

Over social media, false equivalencies are made and spent as frivolously as trillion-dollar Zimbabwean bank notes. All Americans are immigrants, it is said. The Native Americans even welcomed Puritan refugees in the 17th century. Jesus Christ was a refugee, others assert.

Some have claimed Anne Frank would have lived if the U.S. had taken her in as a refugee during World War II. Many Americans opposed Jewish refugee resettlement in the U.S. during World War II, others observe without so much as indicating how such an argument pertains to present situation.

Still others argue that since the U.S. invasion of Iraq was the impetus for instability in the region, it is now our responsibility to clean up our mess by accepting refugees. Some have even taken up arms with avowed Satanists, who declared their support for the resettlement of refugees in the United States, and argue that the Satanists understand Christian compassion better than do Christians.

Again, let us temporarily stow away our amusement at the sudden theological prowess of avowed atheists and other perennial antagonists of Christianity. Instead, take these arguments at face value. What does the character of these arguments say about the people making them?

Many false equivalencies

It seems to me that in order to make each of these false equivalencies, one must subscribe to a common notion that the interests of Americans must always be a subordinate interest, regardless of circumstance. People who make these bizarre arguments seem to retain a massive and pervasive sense of guilt that they feel can only be assuaged by a pathological preference to being dominated. In other words, they suffer from a sort of masochism: "enjoyment from being hurt or punished."

Take, as an example, the argument that the U.S. destabilized Iraq. A valid argument, for sure. But that we should accept refugees from the region does not logically follow, foremost because the United States of America is not a single person who can singularly be held responsible; it is a democracy full of a thousand competing interests.

If the U.S. were in fact a single individual who in 2002 invaded Iraq and created the instability that gave rise to Islamic State and permitted a sustained campaign by the Islamic State against civilian populations, which caused an exodus of civilians from the region, a court of law might be able to make the case that the U.S. should bear responsibility for the consequences of those precipitating actions in 2002. But even that argument would be difficult to make because there are so many other influencing factors in the region that have little to do with U.S. meddling.

Now consider that the U.S. is not a single man to whom blame can be assigned, but rather a democratic republic comprised of nearly 320 million people. Subjecting these objectively innocent people to the inherent dangers of accepting 200,000 Syrian refugees is horrific enough; but it is equally repugnant to subject even those American citizens who we might hold morally culpable for the rise of ISIS (that is to say, everyone else).

But I reject the notion that your grandmother or your daughter ought to pay with her life for the geopolitical miscalculations of her government. To argue that accepting Syrian refugees is a necessary condition of U.S. foreign meddling is to accept the same argument that the Islamic State makes for butchering civilians; that we are all to blame, individually, for the collective actions and folly of a government we implicitly support.

Pathological guilt

And this is exactly what proponents of refugee resettlement in the U.S. believe, on a pathological scale. The guilt they experience over the U.S. government's foreign policy blunders can only be satiated through a good paddling of their own bare, prostrated asses. To chase away their guilt, they must occasionally burn the effigies of U.S. imperialist overreach and oppression—a noble cause, perhaps, if the effigies weren't their own living, breathing countrymen.

Yet, even after such rituals, the masochists will remain unsatisfied because there is no punishment severe enough to heal what they perceive as voluminous ancestral sins.

Perhaps the American refugee resettlement proponents find this masochism to be noble or just. I find it rather barbaric in its current pathological form. These people would gladly suffer the deaths of another 3,000 innocent Americans if it would, even temporarily, satisfy selfish notions of their own internal righteousness and sense of personal virtue (so long as it isn't their own head, or the heads of their friends and families). What else can explain the willful disregard of the very evident dangers of transporting Muslim refugees into the United States?

Enter Western Masochism

So this is what I mean when I say Western Masochism; the compulsion to enjoy endless punishment, embarrassment, and even death to atone for perceived sins of the West. It is not a new phenomenon by any means, but every significant emergence of it is worth close study.

Where did it originate?

Who knows – it could be the final throes of a degenerate culture, or it could be genetic defect of the white, European people. But perhaps another historical example of the phenomenon is instructive. Consider, for example, the analogy that suggests Native Americans happily took in European refugees in North America some four hundred years ago. John Smith and Pocahontas, right?

Well no, not exactly. Even a cursory study of the early colonial era in America becomes rather grim. It is true that Native Americans were hospitable to some very grateful European settlers, whether out of good will, mutual survival, or out of the hopes of trading for food imports brought in by English ships during seasons of bad harvest.

Either way, there certainly were early alliances and many years of peaceful interaction. The amicable relationship between the Plymouth colony and Massasoit, leader of the Wampanoag tribe, is one such gleaming example.

However, many more Native American tribes participated in the wholesale slaughter of the European invaders, and the Europeans (including the Puritans at Plymouth) would occasionally conduct rather barbaric raids on hostile Native American tribes, slaughtering men, women and children alike.

As the American colonies expanded, Native Americans began experiencing resentment toward their new neighbors, who had better weapons, goods, and superior access to food and wares.

Despite the relative opulence and power that the English settlers exhibited, the Massachusetts Bay Colony eventually enacted a rather magnanimous law (which bound all other colonies, except Rhode Island) requiring colonial subjects to trade fairly for Native American land.

In other words, it was illegal for settlers to steal or conquer land from the Native American tribes. Your history book might not say this; it might have you believing that the English stole everything they got, but this is not true. As it turns out, most of the Native American-held land ceded to the English settlers was purchased.

In a bid to obtain superior European goods, not least important of which were firearms to maintain an edge over rival tribes, Native Americans sold off massive swaths of land to the settlers. This had several effects.

One, it drove some tribes into alliances with the colonies, and drove other tribes into conflict with the colonies and each other. Second, it drove internal instability within individual tribes; young tribesmen grew furious that their leaders were selling their future down the river, purchasing weapons in exchange for their ancestral land, political clout and ultimately, pride. Some tribal sachems (or "chiefs") would sell their tribes' land almost exclusively for enhancing his or her own personal wealth.

The result of this was King Philip's War, a little-studied American conflict that erupted across Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York in 1675.

"King Philip," originally known as Metacomet, was the sachem of the Wampanoags and the son of Massasoit. Facing his own waning power within the tribe because of his frivolous sale of Wampanoag land to the English for personal gain, King Philip was eventually forced to go to war against the English colonies to save face with not only his own urging tribesmen, but with neighboring tribes who were also hostile to the English.

Long story short, King Philip lost. He was captured and killed. His head was mounted on the gates of Plymouth colony.

Masochistic proponents of Syrian resettlement in the United States see the English settlers as horrible villains whose actions can only be atoned for in the modern age by engaging in indefinite bouts of prostration to everyone in the world who is not a white Christian, everywhere, at all times, regardless of circumstance.

Realists who oppose Syrian resettlement in the United States see the English settlers, rather more accurately and with much more nuance, as radical Puritan invaders who came to the North American continent under a refugee banner, but who in 50 years' time placed the severed head of the Native American leader on a pike and radically transformed the culture of the nation.

The Puritan influence in the United States, and in New England in particular, hangs heavy even over the modern era. A particularly interesting essay by G.K. Chesterton notes the superficiality of American morality and the compulsion of Americans to view material things as inherently evil, as opposed to a realist view of humans as conduits of evil. Such is the legacy of Puritanism.

If the parallels between this historical example and the present predicament remain unclear to you at this point, you might be too sufficiently prostrated.

So what's the problem?

The modern problem of Syrian refugee resettlement in America has less to do with the possibility of a single refugee carrying out a deadly or destructive attack on the American people in the name of Islam, although this is certainly a concern.

The more troubling problem is that we are now sowing the seeds of something much more terminal. The children and grandchildren of the current refugees may not remember the horrors that militant Islamists inflicted upon their parents. They will, however, be members of a growing minority in a nation still largely at odds with their religion and culture.

And they will be equipped with an understanding of English, a birth-right American citizenship and all its associated Constitutional protections, a decent standard of living, and likely an iPhone 47-s by that point. Yet some will retain many of the archaic beliefs of Islamist ideology that are deeply at odds with American values.

If the situation in France is any portent of America's future, how much longer before American gays and women become Republicans?

The only possible outcome of the current masochist affliction of the West will be a rising violence and instability in the United States, if it is not stopped. It will not be a Twitter fight, like so many of the tame, modern clashes of culture. It will be fight using bombs, bullets, and beheadings, if history is any guide.

Read More: Why Western Men Prefer Foreign Women Over Their Own

Bryan Paul Rouleau
Bryan is a fiction writer from New England. He can be found at bryanpaulrouleau.com or on Twitter

Why We Should Strive For Mass Unemployment

December 13, 2015 | by JD McGuigan | Link | Original Link

The goal of an advanced economy in the 21st century and beyond should be mass unemployment, with one estimate putting the ideal number between 75-80%. Now that you've spit your coffee all over your computer, here's why far fewer jobs would be mean a much better world.

The Day From Hell

Having recently survived another Black Friday "beautiful disaster," we once again bore witness to the prominent embodiment of everything wrong with today's capitalist machine. In a display which perfectly exemplifies irony, tens of millions of Americans gathered around a table to be "thankful" together, while simultaneously watching the clock for "doorbusters" to commence—many of which no longer begin on Friday morning, but rather on the evening of Thanksgiving itself.

Every holiday season we see a PG-version of The Purge come to life. If you haven't seen the movie, it's a representation of a very different America—a "cleansed" utopian version where unemployment remains steadily under 1%, and crime is virtually non-existent.

Trailers allude to perfect suburbian families; briefcase-wielding men in suits, feminine women minding the home, and little kids skipping past white picket fences towards approaching school buses. The American Dream is back! The catch happens to be that one day out of the year all law enforcement and military activity are suspended, and for 12 hours the American people are allowed to engage in mass murder, rape, robbery, and arson.

Instead of this comical exaggeration we see in the movies, real life recently saw millions put on their coats, rush to the stores, and stand in the freezing cold before feverishly wrestling and trampling each other in a dangerous relay race to the front of the store. And while murder and rape weren't government sanctioned, robberies and lethal violence are always a sure thing on this day, to the deranged amusement of corporate overloads and the news anchors who relay the footage with poorly contained smirks on their faces.

Black Friday represents a watered down version of this idea of catharsis, and shows The American Dream on display in all its glorified stupidity.

Adapt Or Perish

In a world where hotels in China are effectively being run entirely by robots, we must ask why we still have real people working cashier, toll booth, or teller positions upwards of 60 hours per week in a first world country. With mass technological advancement, a strong argument can be made that if robots and efficiency of modern distribution means there is less need for humans to do menial tasks, there would consequently be more time for leisure and creativity at people's disposal.

The result would be a more fulfilling life of purpose and a higher level of understanding, which by extension curtails the compulsion to act like an uncaged animal on Black Friday.

Of course, there are caveats to this unemployment utopia. The reason for the ideal 80% number as opposed to 100% is we will always need warm-blooded humans to fill certain positions that require elite critical thinking skills or the ability to offer people a humane service. Certain occupations exist for the sole purpose of one person alleviating various burdens from the shoulders of another.

There will always be a need for doctors, lawyers, suicide hotline receptionists, and prostitutes, but the fact that we still have grown adults working at fast food and retail joints en masse is troubling. Unfortunately, they are wrongly propped up as martyrs and the hardest working among us, when in reality they frequently took the easy way out to varying degrees.

This is an inconvenient truth and emotional hot button for a lot of people, when you assert that the single mom who raised them by always “working 2 or 3 jobs” wasted her life, but swallowing the red pill means calling a spade a spade.

When they came to that proverbial crossroad in life, instead of finding something to contribute, many just found something to do with their time. The more benign of those with a martyr complex simply walk around with a chip on their shoulder, demanding respect for their “sacrifice” in order to convince themselves it was all worth it, while the particularly loathsome weaklings blame patriarchy or white privilege for their own misery.

Have Both Sides Lost Their Mind?

At the same time, it is easy to understand that the inverse of capitalism is no better alternative. Socialism and communism are the workings of the Social Justice Warrior mindset, and represent the mortal enemy to enlightened males with the entrepreneurial gene.

While America’s pop culture and universities have gone so far to the left that it’s no longer worth owning a TV or maybe even going to college, America’s government has moved to a position where anything but infinitely more productivity is labeled left of Bolshevik. Consider that William Taft, the conservative Republican president in 1910, advocated 12 weeks vacation by law for every American.

He understood that if a century later we had a workforce in which 70% of Americans despised their jobs, there would be a much greater need for time off to allow for spiritual healing and contemplative perspective. Given this potential model, one could venture that the average person could garner enough sense through introspection to avoid the consumerist “hot mess” known as Black Friday and shopping-season hysteria every year that perpetuates this vicious cycle.

There Is A Middle Ground

While certain countries in Europe represent the poster child for social justice to the extent it is now virtually illegal to be a white male, some do have certain ideas about the workforce which are far better than the system we have now. Countries that implement shorter work weeks and higher wages consistently rank among the most content populations in the world. Holland, with its 29 hour work week, consistently ranks high on the list. It is no coincidence that its libertarian system of small government and emphasis on personal freedom goes hand in hand with a shorter workweek.

The system of government which represents the best alternative to capitalist slavery and communist utopia is that of Goldwater conservatism, where we can both walk and chew gum by resisting the accumulation of power by the corrupt, while at the same time holding true to the traditional ideals and principles that once made America a good place to be a man.

Read More: Permanent Unemployment Is America's Permanent Future

JD McGuigan
JD is a 27 year old travel bum who jumps from job to job recklessly usually just before getting fired. He is also the author of a short e-book called The Pink Doughnut Phenomenon, which is a thesis on masculinity in the 9-5 workforce.

Christians In Europe Need Safe Spaces From Muslims

December 13, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

There have been numerous reports of Muslim migrants harassing and even acting violent against their Christian counterparts. Whether travelling on boats over the Mediterranean or living in refugee camps, Christians find themselves in a minority and under attack.

The governments of Europe should take responsibility for their bad policies and act soon to protect Christian immigrants. If something isn't done about the issue, the genocide of Christians and other non-Muslims in the Middle East might spill over to Europe.

Killed for their faith

A group of Christian asylum seekers has had to move from their home after fundamentalist Muslims harassed and threatened them. They were living together in a facility for asylum seekers in Sweden, but two of the Christian families decided to move away on account of a group of aggressive Syrians.

The majority of the 80 asylum seekers living at the facility were Syrians. The few Christians were not allowed to wear their religion's symbols, like crosses around their necks. They also weren't allowed in communal areas if Muslims were present. It got to the point where the Christians feared for their own safety.

At least Angela Merkel is having a good time.

The majority of asylum seekers overall are Muslim, and this is not the first time the Migration Agency has received complaints about religious intolerance at their facilities. In Germany, Christian immigrants have also had troublesome encounters with Muslims. An Iraqi immigrant, called Said, says he can't be open about his Christian faith. He lives in a facility were most of the asylum seekers are Syrian Sunnis.

> They woke me up before dawn during Ramadan and said that I should eat before the sun comes up. If I refused, they called me "Kuffar," non-believer.

Many Christians coming to Germany can testify to how Muslims are trying to enforce Sharia law among asylum seekers. Christians who have converted from Islam are the most endangered group.

There has also been reports of Muslim attacks on the boats coming to Europe over the Mediterranean. In one case, they threw twelve Christians overboard when they refused to pray to the "right" god. "Here, we only pray to Allah," the Muslims said before their murdering rampage.

In Syria and Iraq, Christians along with Yazidis and other religious minorities have been under attack for many years. Thousands of women have been taken as sex slaves. Christian women and men are raped and beheaded by ISIS jihadists, when they refuse to convert.

The Assyrian Christians in Iraq have a history of inhabiting the region dating back 6.700 years. They were among the first in the area to convert to Christianity. Now it seems they are on the verge of extinction. Only 300.000 Christians remain in Iraq and Syria.

The religion of peace picks a fight

It all seems a bit counterintuitive. Why would fundamentalist Muslims, with their seething hatred of Christianity, move to the predominantly Christian continent of Europe? Why are they not joining ISIS in creating a caliphate that would be perfectly suited for them? Is it a part of some grand plan, or are they just immensely ignorant? Whether they are stupid or not, they have proved themselves to be very dangerous.

Another strange thing is the fact that the followers of the religion of peace tend to pick a fight with anyone who simply isn't like them. It's as if they're intolerant or something. The European governments have ignored this great threat so far. They've been placing Christian asylum seekers in the same facilities as Muslims, which is like putting sheep in a cage full of wolves. Sooner or later, the wolves have to feed.

The least the European governments can do now is to segregate the asylum seekers, so that Christians and Muslims live in seperate facilities. This solution is not ideal—concentrating all Muslims to one place might increase the risk of radicalization—but it would certainly be an improvement when considering the direct safety of Christians.

An extreme situation

Europe used to be one big safe-space for Christians. However, that has been compromised by the flood of hundreds of thousands of immigrants over the past years. Now it might be necessary to create safe-spaces for Christians within Europe. Places were they can live, work, and raise a family without needing to worry about Muslim violence. These areas would therefore be off limits to Muslims.

Another idea would be to put the Muslim immigrants in one big compound, sealed off from the rest of society. That way, both Christians and other people living in the West can feel safer. The Muslims will be under surveillance, and if someone shows signs of radicalizing, that person will be deported. When the general situation in their home countries improves, all of them will be sent back.

These are just a few proposals and they might sound extreme. But when people are killed for their religious believes in Europe, the situation has already gone too far. Something must be done about it.

Read More: Why Women And Gays Should Not Be Allowed In Male-Safe Spaces

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

12 Mental Habits You Must Fix To Become A Better Man

December 14, 2015 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

I'm a firm advocate of action over thoughts. Disciplined action will always allow you to accomplish more and make you a better person than any amount of mental masturbation like affirmations, mantras, or visualizations. That said, I do believe that there are some mental habits that you can implement in your daily life to mold yourself into a better man.

To have a positive mindset, you must eliminate negative thought patterns

In spite of all the "positive thinking" bullshit that is popular out there, I believe that eliminating negative thought patterns does much more to improve our state of mind than spoon-feeding fake positive messages. This is due to our negativity bias, where negative things affect us much more strongly than the positives. As an example, think of how a small fly in an otherwise excellent soup can ruin an entire meal.

We humans have already been endowed with a healthy mind; it is the toxic external influences that plant negative thinking patterns within us. The following is a list of mental habits that you can fix to improve your mindset. Try and see if you can identify any that strongly resonates with you.

1. Victim Mentality

What do chronic complainers, underachievers, feminists, fat advocates, BlackLivesMatter mob, homosexuals, school shooters, Zionists, and terrorists all have in common? Answer: They are all miserable, noxious, and hateful because they identify themselves as victims.

Thinking of yourself as a victim is one of the worst things you can do to yourself and the root cause of number of other negative mental habits—many of which are listed below. It's unfortunate that many men today are behaving just like angry feminists because they suffer from victim mentality.

If you are one of those people, snap out of it before it consumes you. As a man, you must never feel sorry for yourself. And don't think that you can cover it up with anger; it's obvious to everyone around you.

2. Expecting The World To Be Fair

The world is not fair, get used to it. It’s an ugly world out there and complaining about it is not going to fix it. You must always strive to make the best out of the situation you are faced with without complaining.

3. The Rhetorical Whys

Why won’t women like me? Why are people such assholes? Why do I have to work at this shitty job? Why is my life so lousy? Why do I feel so miserable? Why me? Why, why, why… As you can see, rhetorical whys are expressions of powerlessness that do absolutely nothing to help you.

Instead of thinking in terms of why, think in terms of what: What are you going to do to resolve the situation? What is the best way to respond? What will you do to achieve the best possible outcome?

4. Regrets

What's done is done. If you learned your lesson, get over it and move on. The longer you dwell on your mistakes, the more you'll be held back from moving forward.

Regrets usually come in the thought form of should've-could've-would've. If you ever catch yourself thinking or using these words, give yourself a nice slap in the face and snap out of it.

5. Self-Denigration

This usually appears in the form of "I am so [lazy, dumb, weak, unmotivated, etc.]". Don't ever place negative labels like these on yourself. And if what you're thinking happens to be true, stop beating yourself up and do something about it.

6. Envy And Other Unhelpful Comparisons

Envy is for women. Stop comparing yourself with other more accomplished men just to feel inadequate. Why would you put yourself down like that?

It's good to learn from other men who are accomplished, but don't measure yourself against them. If you want a comparison, compare yourself with who you were a year ago or five years ago to see how much you've improved as a man.

7. Complaining, Blaming, And Making Excuses

These are classic traits of losers with victim mentality. Instead of taking responsibility, they would rather opt to protect their fragile egos by blaming someone or something else for their failures. I see far too many men giving feminists imaginary power by using them as scapegoats for their problems.

One of my favorite films is Papillon. In that movie, in spite of being wrongfully imprisoned under hellish conditions, I have never seen Steve McQueen's character complain or blame once. Instead, he always does his best to endure his situation and is relentless in his pursuit for freedom.

8. Belief In Luck

Belief in luck is epidemic in the US where people pay billions in ‘stupid tax’.

Luck doesn’t exist. In fact, it’s not even a concept worth thinking about. Look at it this way: You either have control over things or you don’t, so why even think about something you can’t control? You might as well focus your energy on things that you do have control over rather than on things that hinge purely on probability. As Erasmus puts it: fortune favours the audacious.

One of the most insulting thing you can say to an accomplished man is to tell him how “lucky” he is—as if he reached his current status by pure chance instead of hard work and discipline. The same is also true when you tell someone who spent countless hours of preparation for an exam or performance to have “good luck.”

9. Wishing And Hoping

Much like luck, wishing and hoping assumes that you have no power to change your circumstances. There is no point wasting your mental energy thinking "I wish…", "I hope…", "If only…", etc. Either do something about it or forget it.

10. Nostalgia And Wishful Fantasies

Some people take wishing and hoping to another level and start engaging in thoughts about the good ol' days when things used to be better or fantasize about living in a better world.

Again, either do something to improve your current reality or forget about it. You'll never escape your reality of now, so you might as well make the best of it.

11. Sense Of Entitlement

The world doesn't owe you anything. You don't deserve to be respected and your precious feelings don't mean shit. Only women and spoiled children feel entitled to freebies or special treatment. As a man, you must earn your respect and fight for what you want.

12. Confidence And Self-Esteem

Another pair of useless concepts. Only people with no confidence and self-esteem obsess over them. You can only gain these qualities by plunging yourself into action and learning from the experience.

It’s laughable that so many people do the opposite and seek confidence and self-esteem first (usually by overloading themselves with information) before they finally decide to take a step. Stop thinking, stop talking, and just do it.

How To Eliminate The Negative Thought Patterns

First, you must become aware of them. Because these thought patterns are habitual, they will often appear automatically without you ever noticing them. Hopefully this article has done enough to make identifying them easier.

And once you have become aware of these thought patterns, it is all a matter of refocusing your attention to productive thoughts. Focus on what you have control over and what you can do to improve your life situation. It will take some time to re-wire your neurons to fix your mental habits, but it is easily doable if you are persistent.

If you have any tips of your own, feel free to share them in the comments section below.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Corey Savage

Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Men Should Start Recording Sex With A Hidden Camera

December 14, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

False rape accusations have reached such a fever pitch, as recently signified by a mattress-carrying attention whore and liar being rewarded for her phony story with an invite to the State Of The Union address, that it's time men take extra-legal measures to protect themselves from Western women.

Not only is a woman's word being taken above that of a man's, often with full media encouragement and provocation, but 1 in 4 women are now certifiably mentally ill, at nearly double the rates of men. We've just started a storm of male persecution that may take years to resolve, and instead of waiting for everything to become rosy again, you must take the proper precautions today to not be victim of a bogus accusation that could ruin your life.

Many of you already have the awareness to save all text communications from women. In the past, this was especially important for black men having sex with white women, since blacks were seen as "savages" who violated white purity, but today's rape hysteria has a fixation on white men like we have seen recently in the Duke Lacrosse, UVA, and mattress girl rape hoaxes. White men are now a "privileged" class who must be punished for historical wrongs by accusing them of fake crimes, but even men of other races are seen as privileged as well, especially when faced with an accusation by a white woman. We're now all vulnerable to false accusations by predominately white women who are mentally ill and brainwashed to think that consensual sexual encounters are rape.

I recommend that from this point on you strongly consider recording casual sexual encounters with a hidden camera. If a he-said-she-said dispute concerning rape occurs, your word will carry less weight than that of a hysterical woman, even if there is not one sign of violence against her. Your situation will become dire if the media gets involved and destroys your character without even asking for your side of the story. Therefore to immediately destroy any accusation, you should provide a video recording that disproves it. Video is far more reliable in disproving rape than friendly text messages or having witnesses confirm the girl was flirting with you in the bar before the sexual encounter.

In many states, recording hidden video with sound is illegal, but recording video alone is not. Legal experts stop one step short of encouraging men to record their sex acts:

> Two college students in New Mexico had a gang rape charge against them dropped earlier this year after they turned over video of the reported victim giving lap dances in her underwear and grabbing a man's crotch. Experts predict an uptick in video as defense in court as an unexpected consequence of the Obama administration's toughening of sexual violence policies.
>
> John Banzhaf, a law professor at George Washington University, researched dozens of cases of rape defendants successfully suing to repair their reputations, with evidence increasingly consisting of video introduced to show that the woman actively cooperated in the sexual encounters. "Changes in technology make video recording more effective and readily available," Banzhaf explains. "It's cheap, easy to hide, and the cameras shoot well in low light."

There was also a case in San Francisco where a man was falsely accused of three rapes. Because he secretly recorded the sex acts, all charges were dropped. Even if you break the law with your recording, that punishment is lower than a rape charge (research your state's law for clarification on the matter). The best advice I can give is not to show any hidden recordings to your friends and only use it when you're facing a genuine accusation.

Hidden cameras are getting cheaper and many models even have night vision. Here's one that costs under $100 on Amazon:

Alarm clock or hidden camera?

If your budget is higher, you can visit a site like SpyGadgets.com and try for a camera that is wireless and can be switched on through your smartphone. The technology is here to make recording your sex acts cheap and simple enough that it won't disturb the progression of your sexual encounters.

When you are recording a girl during sex, it would be wise to have her riding you on top for a while with your hands laying to your sides to clearly show that she is engaged in the sex act and loving your cock, regardless of how many Jager bombs she later claims impaired her mind. Once a DA prosecutor sees that footage, you're as good as free and can then pursue a civil case against her if she has rich parents.

The men who are in the most amount of danger from a false accusation are those in college, because girls there are being fed a daily diet of rape hysteria. I recommend college-aged males to put as much importance in buying a hidden camera as textbooks, especially if they're sleeping with girls after alcohol consumption.

The threat is less for men out of college, but $100 is a trivial cost for complete peace of mind when a girl starts acting weird on you after sex or when you aren't quite sure if she's a feminist or mentally ill (the two seem to go hand in hand). The odds of a false rape accusation are still minuscule, but it happens enough that you should take the inexpensive steps to prevent it, just like how you are careful not to walk down a dangerous alley at night. A hidden camera is insurance that allows you to pursue sex without having the bad luck of getting caught up in a girl's twisted fantasy, like has happened to a Return Of Kings writer.

Even though I live in Eastern Europe, where false rape accusations don't exist, I'm ready to implement the camera precaution if conditions change. If rape hysteria doesn't taper down in the USA soon, I’m afraid it will begin spreading outside of the Anglo world. Not only will we be required to have bedroom hidden cameras, but even dashcam-style cameras we wear when speaking with women in public locations to prevent accusations of sexual harassment. Things are about to get weird, but don’t count on anyone else to help defend you from the sexual dystopia we’re now facing. It’s entirely up to you to protect yourself.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: All Public Rape Accusations Are False

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Do Ivy League Schools Give Remedial Classes To Some Minority Students?

December 14, 2015 | by Tom Swyft | Link | Original Link

Admission to America's Ivy League universities is a heated topic of discussion for both high school students and society at large, since the policies and beliefs started in these Ivy-covered towers often trickle down to the rest of society through academia and the media.

It is for this reason that entrance policies at these schools—such as admitting sub-par students and giving them remedial English classes before freshman year—are of interest to the public, since they signify a broader trend in our society to ignore incompetence and grant undeserved benefits to the "marginalized".

While I do not claim to be an expert on admissions to these schools, I do attend one of them and my experience there has shed some light on the consequences of their entrance policies.

Scholars Must Be Smart

Recently I heard about a program at Princeton called "Freshman Scholars," where a select group of students takes classes for a few weeks before they begin freshman year. I thought it odd that some kids would be part of this and not others, and I decided to look into the program and similar ones at other schools.

I soon realized that the program essentially offers remedial classes to certain affirmative action admits who were not as prepared for college as their peers. At first this came as a shock to me, since the Ivy League administrators lead us to believe that all students who are accepted “deserve” to be there, but I must admit that I can’t really be surprised.

Must… Have… Every… Color…

Since the talking heads at Ivy League schools can never admit that, on average, third-world citizens, inner city minorities, or athletes drag down the intelligence of the entire school, the programs are of course not advertised as remedial classes for unintelligent students, but rather billed as an honor for select scholars among the freshman class.

You might ask how I know these are remedial programs—after all, I could just be a jaded, racist white kid who’s flying high on the male privilege that made it so easy for me to get in.

Look At The language

My answer is that the proof is in the language. Much like the Party members in Orwell’s 1984, the useful idiots running these schools use duplicitous and subversive language in an effort to doublethink their way out of the cognitive dissonance required of a progressive ideologue.

In addition to exposing the violation of the principles of scholarship these institutions are supposed to stand for, I will also analyze the Orwellian language with which they disguised the true nature of these programs. Hopefully, this will serve as a good case study on the use of language in liberal propaganda.

While there are plenty of selective schools in this country, Princeton and Yale are two of the most elite. It thus seems like no coincidence that they both have almost identical programs for affirmative action freshman. At Princeton it is called the Freshman Scholars Institute, and at Yale it is called the Freshman Scholars Program. I will discuss these two since they are the only college remedial programs I could readily find through internet research.

The linguistic inspiration of college administrators everywhere

According to the Yale site, “FSY will provide students with an introduction to the rigors and expectations of academic study at Yale.” At first glance, that seems nice of them to make the transition less difficult for students. However, keep in mind that this is for about 50 kids, which is at best 5% of the incoming freshman class.

What makes those 50 so deserving? It’s possible that these are just randomly selected kids who get a lucky leg up before the semester starts, but it is more likely that these are kids who are in the unique position of having not attended a high school that actually prepares them to study at a difficult university.

And of all the hundreds of incoming students, it is comprised of the farthest behind affirmative action admits that would otherwise be unable to cope with the difficulty of adjusting to college life like everyone else.

Translating PC Language

I don’t want to draw conclusions too early, so let’s take a look at the criteria for selection. According to Princeton, they > consider factors like intellectual curiosity, qualities of leadership and resiliency, the educational enrichment opportunities offered by the student’s high school, and familial educational background.

First note the incredibly vague language—this is the first sign that they are trying to hide something. Next let’s look at the first criterion, “intellectual curiosity.” The stated goal of these schools is to admit “intellectually curious” students; in fact, the first time I ever heard that term was when I applied in high school. It’s plastered all over their admissions criteria. So if all hundreds of their incoming freshman are intellectually curious, this criterion does not inform the selection of a small number of them.

On to point two. As schools that produce Future Leaders of America™, they only select students who have shown leadership ability (whatever that means), so that doesn't add anything new. However, note the word resiliency. This connects to another word admissions committees love which is adversity. In fact a popular choice for entrance essays is to write about a time you "overcame adversity."

It's so difficult being a law school student

Of course the Black kids from the ghetto or the children of recent Mexican immigrants have dealt with the most adversity, and thus they are selected by this criterion. And while I do not wish to belittle the achievements of those kids who manage to escape (I sincerely applaud those who do), the point of this article is to demonstrate how some of them may not be adequately prepared to go to America's most challenging schools.

The third point is fairly obvious. Good high schools have a lot of resources for "educational enrichment." Good high schools largely come from wealthy areas with high property taxes, and they are attended by predominantly white students. Thus schools without such resources are from poor areas, which include inner cities with mostly minority students or depressed rural areas with a lot of poor white students.

So we can see right there how students lacking in "educational enrichment opportunities" translates into low income, largely minority students. And of course it need not be said that students from inner cities and rural white areas are less likely to be academically prepared for challenging colleges.

Lastly, they look at how many members of the student's family went to college. By default, educated people have educated kids whereas it is less common that high school students capable of studying at these colleges will come from uneducated families. And since it is these students who are most likely to be unable to cope with the rigor of studying at these schools, it is no surprise that students from uneducated families will be selected for remedial programs.

We can now conclude that that if certain affirmative action students, who are not as academically prepared as others, all attend the same pre-orientation program that provides "an introduction to the rigors and expectations of academic study," then this program is in fact remedial with the intent of helping them play catch-up mere weeks before college. Alright, so what?

The Consequences

There are two big issues here. First, it shows that the decision makers at these schools are willing to put their progressive political agendas ahead of maintaining academic rigor. In a country where the best students do not go to the best schools, intelligence and productivity by definition is allocated inefficiently.

It then starts to make sense why American education is falling behind that of other countries where admission to top schools is based on merit alone. When education takes a back seat to politics, it is only obvious that our students will be in a worse position to succeed in the global or national job markets in fields such as engineering, computer programming, and scientific research.

They're beating us…

Many of my peers in the humanities disciplines often speak of the relaxed expectations of their instructors as well as grade inflation, whereby some majors are made easier in order for less gifted students to succeed in them. Although humanities are claimed by many to be unnecessary compared to STEM fields, as the political push for minorities and women in STEM grows stronger, I can only expect that the academic standards in these technical majors will lessen as well.

Campus Racism Or Inferiority Complex

The second major consequence of these policies is something that has been called the cascade effect. When under-prepared students get admitted to tier 1 schools (like Yale and Princeton), they of course choose to attend even though they might be better off academically at a tier 2 school.

Since those schools need people to fill their own diversity quotas, they admit those students who would be better off at tier 3 schools, and so on. Thus, none of the affirmative action admits are well-suited to the schools they actually attend, and the problem cascades down the line of colleges in order of selectivity, such that many of the minority kids are always one tier below the other students academically.

Now the reason this is bad is because those students will have a hard time adjusting to coursework that they are not adequately prepared to deal with. I can personally attest to the difficulty of college classes and I went to a more challenging high school than most. When classes are too hard to handle, you experience self doubt and are forced to either drop to a lower level or leave the school altogether.

This can be humbling and even beneficial for students who can honestly wrestle with their own academic imperfections. However, since no one tells the minority students that they are having a hard time because they perhaps shouldn't have been there in the first place, they seek another explanation for their academic failures.

Maybe if they studied more they wouldn't need to protest about racism…

For these students who grew up so oppressed that they get full tuition paid for them, it only makes sense that they interpret their experiences through the lens of victimhood and blame their failures instead on bogeymen like racism, the patriarchy, or microaggressions.

Of course the other, more well prepared students are rarely actually racist, and thus animosity between the two groups is perpetuated: the more intelligent students see some of the minority admits as not deserving their place at such a school (and even taking away entrance spots from more qualified students), and the minority students think everyone else is racist against them.

I personally witness this vicious cycle on a daily basis, and we see it in outbursts like the black student protests from a few weeks ago at Dartmouth, Yale, and other schools.

In Conclusion

Clearly this is a problem, but what is an Ivy League institution to do? Acknowledge the error of affirmative action and start admitting students based on intellect alone? Of course not. No good progressive can ever reverse their own decisions that created the problems in the first place; rather, they must make more policy and try and solve the issue in a roundabout way.

We must keep on truckin' in the name of progress and at the expense of academic rigor, social order, and fairness in order to preserve the narrative. Therefore, the best solution is to just give everyone remedial English classes and hope for the best.

Read More: Librarian At University Of Tennessee Instructs Students To Stop Saying "He" And "She"

Tom Swyft
Tom is a programmer who spends most of his time hiding from the NSA. He is also a university student, and tries to stay under the radar of the consent commies on campus. You can find him on Twitter or at cryptocaveman.com.

Two Overlooked Noir Films That Are Worth Seeing

December 14, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Think of good movies as being part of your education. That's how I look at cinematic art.

One of the joys of the cinematic experience is stumbling on some forgotten gem that may have unfairly tarnished with bad reviews. Good movies can catch us on a bad day, and vice versa. I'm a fan of old-school, dark noir films, and I thought readers would want to hear of a couple suggestions that are worth their while.

If you find yourself saying, "There just aren't that many good movies out there now," I'd recommend you check these two out.

Cutter's Way (1981)

Director: Ivan Passer

Cast: John Heard, Jeff Bridges, Lisa Eichhorn

No one has heard of this tense and unsettling study of obsession, self-destruction, and class distinctions. When it was first released in 1981, the studio chose the remarkably inept title Cutter and Bone, and (unsurprisingly) people thought it was a comedy about surgeons.

Bad marketing didn't help things. To add insult to injury, the studio inexplicably (United Artists) spent only about $60,000 on promotion before the film's release in New York City. Even in those days, this was a paltry sum.

As a result, critics got the impression that the studio lacked confidence in the movie. Their reviews reflected this, and were almost uniformly bad. Sometimes critics just like to torpedo a movie, for the fun of it. But it's amazing what a few decades can do. This is a great film. It's dark vision of humanity matches the mood of our own times much better than the world in 1981. It has, as one might say, come of age.

The plot: Cutter (John Heard) is an alcoholic, crippled Vietnam vet who believes he has witnessed a crime. His suspect is a rich, yacht-owning party boy named Bone (Jeff Bridges). The pair also happen to be friends.

The film is awash in ambiguity, and this is one of its strengths. Cutter's wife may be having an affair with Bone; Bone may in fact be a criminal; and Cutter may be clinically insane, a man with a death wish. We are just not quite sure. Everyone uses words to conceal his true feelings, and everyone is nursing some hidden agenda.

But Cutter's rage is real, and it escalates with coordinated precision: this is a masterpiece of sustained tension. At the same time, these characters are not just cardboard cut-outs: they are believable, and their struggles resonate with us. Cutter is on a downward spiral, and knows it. Everyone around him seems to know it as well, and yet no one really does anything. This has the ring of truth: in real life, we often just go with the flow, and the consequences can be deadly.

This being a noir film, we know it can hardly end well. Paranoia, delusion, and repressed rage make for a toxic mix, and this is a masterful study of the dark corners of a wounded psyche.

Night Moves (1975)

Director: Arthur Penn

Cast: Gene Hackman, Jennifer Warren, Melanie Griffith, James Woods

The 1970s were a golden age for American film. Gene Hackman came into his own with The French Connection and The Conversation, and continued his winning streak with this dark little detective story.

Has there ever been a better film noir set-up than the detective story? The hapless investigator who is lied to, and sent off on a quest that ends in the darkest of revelations? This is classic noir, but told with a 1970s twist. We know the detective formula, but we still can't resist watching.

The Plot: An obnoxious former football player (Gene Hackman) becomes a private detective. He is plunged into a murder mystery whose outlines are fuzzy and whose characters are all bottom feeders.

Hackman, of course, plays a flawed character driven by his own inner demons. In his case, he has an explosive temper, likely compounded by frustrations at having had to quit his athletic career. He seems to hate everyone and everything; this, of course, just makes things worse. Hackman is best at playing characters with volcanic temperaments, and this makes him perfect for this role.

And herein we have one of the classic noir motifs: a wounded protagonist unable to connect with the world, driven by internal demons, and hurtling towards ruin. He knows he has issues, but lacks either the will or the capability to reach out to others for help. This is why noir resonates so well in today's environment: it is the perfect way to express the modern man's frustration, confusion, and alienation.

Hackman is on a quest to find a runaway daughter (a very young Melanie Griffith in her prime). Hackman may, or may not, be a voyeur; but he seems to spend a lot of time chasing down his father and spying on his ex-wife. James Woods also appears in one of his first film roles.

As often happens in private eye noir films, the plot is just an excuse to probe the psychological motivations of the characters. And that is what we get here. As in Cutter's Way, dialogue does not so much reveal intentions as it does conceal them.

The ending is, in many ways, far ahead of its time. It anticipates the empty futility of the 1980s and 1990s, and strikes the viewer as far more intellectually honest than most of the overly optimistic films of the era.

Read More: How Bad Logistics Can Ruin Your Game

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Why It’s Not That Hard To Eat Well In America

December 15, 2015 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

The title says it all, folks: It is not that goddamn hard to eat a healthy and balanced diet in America. You will find this article to be short: that’s because eating healthy is incredibly simple, and it doesn’t take more than 1200 words to explain how it’s done.

I’m directing this article at everybody who blubbers about it being “impossible” to eat healthy in the USA…most of whom are either fat acceptance biddies that talk about how “society” made them fat while shoving cookies into their mouth, or the occasional “goodwhite” writing about food deserts in TIME or some other periodical.

Yes, America is a nation full of fatty fat fatties. Yes, the portion sizes at restaurants are too big. Yes, many people in America eat a bad diet that turns them into disgusting fatbodies. But for fuck’s sake, people talk as if there’s just lard and instant macaroni and cheese flying through the air, forcing themselves down people’s gullets and dooming them to a lifetime of sexual inadequacy, low-testosterone, and physical weakness. According to these people, this is all part of an insidious plot to make us weak and impotent and thus declare martial law.

This is predominantly a woman's complaint (I have yet to find a single man formally involved in fat acceptance), but one occasionally sees it in the manosphere as well (most notably my roommate in my last year of school who adamantly refused to ever learn how to cook).

It is, in fact, incredibly easy to avoid crappy food and enormous restaurant portions.

How To Avoid Eating Crappy Food Or Giant Portions

Step 1: Don't buy crappy food or go to crappy chain restaurants!

Who the hell wants to go to Applebee's anyway? Applebee's sucks. Why don't you patronize a privately owned restaurant instead and support your local economy, or better yet, learn how to cook? Knowing how to cook is a cheap and easy way to wine and dine a woman, and then get to the debauchery that you really want.

It also makes you a person worth knowing, which is of course something that this website advocates, my own website advocates, and most other websites in this subculture do as well.

Refusing to patronize chain restaurants also jabs a needle into the palm of the Cheap Labor Lobby: the service industry is one of the biggest employees of illegal immigrants (in the United States at least, I admit I don't know the statistics for other countries). While it likely won't affect too much change, it's more of a worthwhile symbolic gesture then voting.

"I may not go to shitty restaurants anymore, but I still can't cook!" you might say "I need to eat frozen garbage that is loaded with preservatives!" Once again, learn how to cook. Patronize used book stores, I picked up a copy of this cookbook for 75 cents.

Or, considering that you're on the internet right now, find some recipes for 0 dollars and 0 cents! Buy some cheap cookware (most cookbooks list all of the supplies needed for their recipes, which are more than enough for the average kitchen) and get on your way to making healthy food, fatty!

"But The Grocery Store Doesn't Sell Healthy Food" Or "It's Too Expensive!"

I hear this excuse way too much, and it's complete nonsense. I'm going to give you a very simple rule of food purchasing, one that my parents taught me to use, and I have used since I moved out: If your great-grandfather wouldn't recognize it as food, it's not food. Don't buy anything Gramps wouldn't recognize. And obviously, if you yourself have children, add another "great" onto that when you teach it to them, and so on for their children and future descendants.

Any grocery store worth its salt should have perfectly healthy food. If your local ShitMart doesn't have any, find a farmer's market or a green grocer (once again, use the internet for something useful, that's what it's there for). "Food deserts" only exist because the clientele makes the surrounding environs so dangerous that respectable food producers don't sell there. If that's the case for you, drive until you find a decent grocer.

I really shouldn't need to tell you what constitutes "healthy food"—even if you had idiot parents that fed you junk food, you all went to elementary school, you've seen the food pyramid, and while the portions listed on that pyramid are highly skewed towards the grains (due to the economic politics of agricultural business), the other foods listed on it are still the foods you should be eating—meat of all kinds, dairy, fruits, and vegetables.

Bear in mind that when I mention "avoiding overly processed foods," I'm not saying you have to be anal retentive and only buy organic food. While organic food is probably slightly more nutritious, conventionally grown and raised agricultural products still have to meet minimum safety and nutritional standards. By overly processed, I mean foods loaded with preservatives (sugar, salt, MSG, etc.) As a (literal) rule of thumb, if the list of ingredients is longer than your thumb, be wary of it.

One can live quite comfortably on spending 50 dollars a week on groceries (and that's being generous) provided you cut out desserts and other junk food, buy food that has all the essential nutrients that you need to function, and ration your food to last the week (and without even trying, I just gave you an effective method of dieting for weight loss: eat less by buying less food). You don't need as much food as you think you do.

I'm aware of the fact that, for you weightlifters out there, you won't be as strong on a calorically restricted diet as you would be with a more calorically dense diet. But eating a common-sense, "don't eat shit" diet has all of the essential nutrients, and it's a lot healthier than most of the garbage American people eat nowadays.

And I can give you my personal promise that, if you combine this diet with daily exercise, you will lose weight and, for the most part, retain your muscle mass as well (meaning "As well as you would on a specialized "cutting" diet").

So what are you waiting for? Quit making excuses and do it. And if you're still struggling with this "buying decent food" concept, ask the people who work at the grocery store. It's what they get paid to do.

Read More: Let Hard Experience Be Your Teacher

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Is Obese “Model” Tess Holliday Stealing Money From Domestic Violence Charities?

December 15, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Some months ago, Return of Kings brought you the story of delusional and morbidly obese “model” Tess Munster, now married as Tess Holliday. She claims to teach women “body positivity,” despite distorting her real face with countless layers of make-up, using Photoshop, and suffering from a host of debilitating, weight-related conditions, including gallstones. Now literally hundreds of people are accusing her of criminal fraud.

Some time ago, Holliday, whose real name is Ryann Maegen Hoven (so many names, so many red flags), began selling T-shirts. These were priced at a rather ludicrous $40 (or something similar, depending on the item) and she promised to donate a portion of the proceeds to domestic violence charities. Unfortunately, many are claiming they were charged an exorbitant fee for shipping as well.

Tess and those working with her have previously used bizarre excuses like not receiving email correspondence from those who allege they are owed products already paid for, such as in this exchange:

Holliday initially said there were no outstanding orders left to shipped, just as more people were coming forward and asserting they were duped.

People offered refunds continue to say they have “bounced,” indicating Tess Holliday is probably facing financial problems she has not disclosed to her “customers”:

Whatever your opinion of domestic violence “charities,” we are still dealing with alleged mass fraud

I share the incredulity of many of you reading this. Was the money promised to these organisations really of a charitable nature, considering the myths spread by feminist-led domestic violence campaigns?

That said, we must suspend such judgments and focus on the warranties Tess Holliday made to try and induce people to buy her products so she made a tidy profit. Whatever your opinion of her supporters, they are entitled to see their money go to where it was promised, plus obviously receive the items they paid for!

What makes this story even more sinister-looking is that Tess Holliday, after months of leaving people in the lurch regarding emails they had written her, finally admitted (using her non-professional modeling name) that none of the promised funds would be going to domestic violence charities:

Is Tess Holliday the new Belle Gibson?

Cancer and charity fraudster Belle Gibson.

Return of Kings correctly suggested cancer-faker Belle Gibson, who swindled hundreds of thousands of dollars “earmarked” for charity, was a fraud. Evidence is mounting that Tess Holliday may be of the same moral hue.

Again, we are accosted by an example of a feminist darling being outed for her alleged misdeeds. Unsurprisingly, the zeal with which this “role model” was celebrated for her body image crusade has not been replicated when it comes to the mainstream media investigating her for months (maybe even years) of potential financial impropriety. What gives?

Women activists only need to employ the typical boilerplate of “inspiration,” “self-confidence,” and “female empowerment” to successfully make others, overwhelmingly fellow females, part with their hard-earned currency for dubious or downright plain dishonorable ventures. And this is evidently exacerbated by the lack of interest from media outlets in presenting possible narrative problems as they develop. A journalist interested in probity could have nipped this Tess Holliday issue in the bud months ago. After all, alleged victims have been seeking justice for a long time.

The Dirty pointed out in June of this year, when more and more purchasers were becoming agitated, that Holliday was afforded the publicity of a People Magazine cover shoot and laudatory coverage by The Daily Mail and Huffington Post. Zero comparable articles have emanated from these same kinds of publications about her alleged charity and sales fraud. So much for fair and balanced reportage!

Just be careful, Mike. Taking Tess Holliday down may triple the effects of the 1994 Los Angeles earthquake.

It is becoming more and more apparent that the pasts and whole picture of feminist darlings like Tess Holliday are woefully untouched by those who have a responsibility to deal in facts, not feel-good (and unhealthy) hype. Whether she is of the same calibre of the confirmed charity fraud Belle Gibson remains to be seen, but the indications are not looking good. These worrying examples of unquestioned female “role models” only add themselves to a preexisting pack of wrongly celebrated feminists, including compulsive liar Emma Sulkowicz.

After so many instances of dishonesty and narcissistic self-aggrandizement, it’s time for a radical change in how we appraise so-called heroines.

Read More: Obese Size 24 Woman Shows That Any Woman Can Be A Model

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

An Old Schoolteacher's Reflections On The Failure Of Modern Education

December 15, 2015 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Several weeks ago I went home to visit my parents for a wedding – my cousin was getting married. Despite the lingering thoughts about how the couple would probably get divorced, and about how marriage is a horrible deal for a man, I still genuinely hoped that it would work out for them.

As the procession ended, my family and I funneled out through the narrow front doors of the church, and I was surprised to see my Kindergarten teacher standing there. "Jon!" she exclaimed.

I was always impressed at how she could remember every one of her students' names, despite the number of years that had passed. She seemed like one of the few teachers who actually got into teaching for the sake of helping young children grow into responsible young adults.

Mrs. Clark, my Kindergarten teacher, stood at about 5'3" – she was a little old lady with blondish-greying hair, and she was dressed in attire that a woman should be dressed in (a dress that went down to her ankles, a nice sweater, a scarf, and some other female accessories). Despite how many might feel about running into an old teacher, I was actually glad – I remembered many of the lessons that she had taught me, and how they were applicable to real life.

After chatting with her for a while, I found out that she was still a Kindergarten teacher. I asked her how long she'd been teaching for, and she said almost 50 years, now. Curious as to what I could learn from her, I asked if she'd noticed any changes in the educational system over the last five decades (since 1965).

Immediately, her normally joyful, rosy-cheeked expression transformed into a grimace.

"It's changed a lot, Jon – and not for the better. Things that used to be common sense are being thrown out the window," she said. "It's becoming more and more bureaucratic – we have to please the parents to a much greater extent than we ever had to when I first started teaching. It's become more about politics than it has about actual teaching."

We chatted for quite a while, and as she began to drop more and more gems of wisdom on me, I decided that it would be a good idea to ask her if I could record our conversation. I told her that more people needed to know the truth, and that I was a blogger who could give it to them. After asking me what in the hell a "blogger" was, she consented.

After a long discussion about the current state of the American educational system, I went home and sifted through my recordings. I have compiled here a list of the three core points which Mrs. Clark Made.

Masculinity is being weeded out of children at an alarming rate

"I don't want to hear this feminist bullshit."

As most ROK readers know, schools are now essentially nothing more than brainwashing, "grooming" grounds which exist to churn out droves of good little beta male citizens. From a young age, any time that a boy tries to express his masculinity, he is viciously reprimanded and made to feel guilty about his natural biological tendencies. Meanwhile, little girls are eagerly rewarded for every single thing that they do, thus inflating their already bloated egos.

> I can't even let boys roughhouse anymore, because it could mean a lawsuit for the school. I used to let the boys play with toy swords and shields, too. They would make up their own games and fight with each other – I thought it was good for them. It taught them to have courage, it exercised their creativity, it showed > them the value of teamwork, and it gave them an outlet. All of that went away in the mid 90's, Jon.

As most of us are aware, this is how it all started. At first, the liberals pressured schools to stop letting boys rough play, under the guise that it was dangerous and violent. The public ate it up. However, not satisfied with simply depriving young boys of their right to roughhouse, an activity that is crucial for a young boy's development, they moved on to attack anything that was even remotely perceivable as being masculine.

> As if it isn't enough that they can't roughhouse anymore, our principal banned toy soldiers from the school! They aren't allowed to make the gun symbol with their fingers, they can't read anything about soldiers, knights, or warriors…they can't even say anything even slightly perceivable as being offensive.
>
> The other day one of my boys got a detention, because he said he wanted to be a firefighter when he grew up. The VP [vice principal] was attending a special little presentation that our classroom had put on; each of the kids drew a picture of what they wanted to be when they grew up, and said a few words about why they chose that profession. One of my boys said that he wanted to be a firefighter, because that's what his daddy does, and it's a job for men. He said that he wanted to be a man like his daddy, and that being a firefighter would make him a stronger, braver man.

Uh oh. Brace yourself for the shit storm, kid.

"The VP became furious and told him that he had just earned himself a detention for being sexist. The kid just started to cry; he was so confused. It was heartbreaking," said Mrs. Clark.

This level of hyper-speech control really struck a chord with me—I felt bad for the kid, because I could relate. I had a similar "speech-control" incident when I was in 7th grade. I was playing with a basketball during recess. The class bully came up, took it from me, kicked it as far as he could, and ran. I yelled after him: "You're dead meat!"

Immediately following recess, I was brought into the Vice Principal's office and questioned about a death threat. They told me that I had threatened to kill another student, and that they took matters like this very seriously.

I was completely dumb-founded; I never actually threatened to kill him, it's just a figure of speech. Apparently they were too stupid to understand this, so I told them that I didn't really mean it. They let me off with a warning, but told me that if I ever said anything like that again, I would probably be expelled.

Egalitarianism has infected our schools

George Orwell was startlingly accurate

Egalitarianism, as defined by the pussified, Orwellian newspeak-promoting Merriam Webster, means: "a belief in human equality especially with respect to social, political, and economic affairs."

The ACTUAL, more realistic definition of egalitarianism, is something like: "The belief that all human beings should be treated equally, regardless of any differences, and that their beliefs should also be treated equally, regardless of their validity." If you can't see why this is clearly a bad thing, let's allow Mrs. Clark to elaborate.

> I used to teach my kids to color in the lines, because that's the way it should be done. I taught them how to hold a pencil, and the proper way to write letters and numbers with it. I taught the girls how to sit when wearing a skirt, so that they didn't expose themselves. I taught the boys to be gentle with the girls, because they were stronger, and it was their responsibility to protect them.
>
> Now I'd probably get fired for teaching these things. We've abandoned teaching cursive, because nobody writes anymore, and I'm not allowed to correct kids either, because that means that their way of doing things isn't good. The other day, I got in trouble for teaching a young boy to color in the lines; for teaching him to color in the lines! Nowadays, I can't even say that 'This is the right way to do it,' because I'm supposed to value everyone's opinions equally, no matter how wrong they are.
>
> A decade ago I got in trouble for teaching a young boy how to use a folder. He had been stuffing worksheets into his backpack, leaving them all crumpled up and disorganized, so I bought him a little two pocket Spiderman folder and showed him how to use it.
>
> The next day, his parents chewed me out. I told them that he was disorganized and lost everything. They told me that their son had ADHD, and that 'His medical disorder causes him to do things differently sometimes. You're being insensitive to his disability, and it's barbaric; he has his own way of doing things, and it has its advantages and its disadvantages, and you need to accept that.'

Mrs. Clark was astonished at their grossly offensive idiocy and irresponsible parenting:

> They were using his ADHD as an excuse to let him stay disorganized and cluttered. I couldn't say anything though, because they were threatening to sue the school. Even though the kid would have been much better off organized, I > was forced to tolerate his complete lack of organization, because 'It's just his way of doing things.' Give me a break.

Still think that egalitarianism is a good thing?

We aren't preparing kids for the real world

Most children grow up thinking this is what it's like

I remember my class with Mrs. Clark – vaguely of course, but there's definitely some things that stick out in my mind. Perhaps the clearest thing which I recall, is being bullied by a kid named Robbie. Every day, for no apparent reason, he would push me down onto the ground. I would get upset, run away, and then resume playing.

Mrs. Clark saw this several times, but didn't intervene. She pulled me aside one day, and asked: "Why don't you ever push him back?" My world was shattered. It had never even occurred to me that I could stand up for myself, thanks to years of Barney brainwashing and maternal coddling.

So, the next day, I pushed him back. He seemed shocked that I was standing up for myself. Mrs. Clark was watching; she came over and told Robbie that "If you push somebody, they might just push you back." After that, Robbie never bothered me again.

This was probably one of the most valuable lessons that I've ever learned. It taught me to be brave, even when you're scared. It taught me to stand up for myself. It taught me that sometimes a man has to solve his own problems.

Nowadays, this would probably be deemed as child abuse, according to Mrs. Clark:

> If two boys in my class ever got in a fight nowadays, I would probably be fired. I'm supposed to helicopter parent them every second of every day, and it's not preparing them for the real world. Kids can't even stand up for themselves anymore – I remember two kids that got in a fight, I think about 8 years ago, maybe 9; Colby and Patrick.
>
> One day, Colby decided it would be a good idea to slap Patrick in the face. Patrick told him to stop, but Colby just slapped him again. I was watching the whole thing, and didn't get involved. I used to let kids work things out for themselves – it prepares them for the real world. Colby then picked up a handful of mulch and smeared it all over Patrick's shirt…Patrick got really mad. He swung a mean right > hook and knocked Colby onto the ground – he started crying and throwing a temper tantrum.

>
> I pulled them aside and explained to Colby that if he's going to provoke another student, he might just get what he's asking for. I told Patrick that he did the right thing, and that he should always stand up for himself.
>
> Within the next week, I was told by the principal that Colby's parents were filing a class action lawsuit against the school, and had already reported Patrick's…'assault,' to the police. The principal told me that Patrick was being suspended for his actions.

"I couldn't believe it!" exclaimed Mrs. Clark. "The little shit, pardon my language, had been harassing and humiliating Patrick, and when Patrick stands up for himself he gets in trouble? I tried to stand up for him, but the principal threatened to fire me. I almost lost my job that day, Jon, and it's never been the same since."

In Summary

The American educational system has deteriorated into a colossal lump of shit. 14 years of education, from preschool to graduating high school, and what are our children taught? Boys are taught to suppress their masculinity, and instilled with a deep-seeded victim complex. Girls are taught that they're God's gift to this earth, and that they deserve to be treated like princesses, regardless of their actions.

Both boys and girls are fed lie after lie, until they have no choice but to accept the false reality being forced upon them.

School doesn't teach our children basic financial responsibility, how to socialize, how to change a tire, or any other basic life skills. What it does teach them, however, is that men are evil, women are goddesses, and that the world is a soft and cushy place that will cater to their needs.

So, if you have a kid, it's best that you don't raise him in America. If you don't have a choice, send him to a private school, but do your research first, because some of them have been infected (Mrs. Clark taught at a Catholic school). If you can't afford to give your kid a private education or to move out of the country, try to move to a more conservative area, where the schools haven't been completely overrun by liberals.

At the very least, you should be teaching your child the truth from a young age, so that by the time that the school system tries to bullshit him, he'll have a weak, but functioning, bullshit detector. Some other writers have already discussed how to instill your son with neomasculine values, such as here and here.

If you don't have a son, then do your best to pass on red pill knowledge to young boys. Whenever I get together with my family for Thanksgiving or other holidays, I always play football with the young boys, and impart masculine wisdom onto them. One of my nephews, who I've been subtly implanting with red pill truths over the years, is now a total player in 8th grade; he has girls chasing after him, but prefers to go deer hunting with his buddies.

We need more young boys like this in the world, and you, my friends, have the power to create them. We must combat the school system ourselves, because nobody else will. We have a responsibility to pass down our wisdom to the younger generation, so that we may have a hope of one day reclaiming the patriarchy of our ancestors.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

5 Proven Ways To Stop Obsessive Thoughts

December 16, 2015 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

If you are at all the analytical type then it is likely that you will have experienced obsessive thoughts more than once in your life. Perhaps these were about a particular girl that you liked (something we more commonly term “oneitus”). Or maybe they were about something your boss said to you, or around a sporting event in which you wish you’d performed better.

Whatever the subject matter, if you find that thoughts keep repeating themselves in your head, or if you keep returning to the same mental scenario trying to find a different way around it in vain, then you need to snap out of it. Obsessive thoughts are exhausting, drain your brain of the RAM necessary to tackle other, more important issues, and generally have an adverse effect on the quality of your life. Luckily, there are a few simple hints that will help you to keep the problem under control.

What Are Obsessive Thoughts?

For many mental health professional, obsessive thoughts are a symptom of anxiety just as much as physical symptoms such as nervous tics, sleeplessness, sweating, and so on. Therefore, if you are given to “catastophising” when you give in to obsessive thought—that is, imagining the very worst outcome possible in a given situation, then the first thing you must realise is that what your mind is telling you is the result of a condition and is therefore not necessarily objectively “true.”

It is a mixed blessing that our minds are extremely powerful instruments that are able to fabricate the most dire and inordinate consequences from the smallest of triggers. Thus, if you think you might have left the gas on then you will then imagine your house being burned down, your financial and insurance documents going up in smoke, and important property from your company being damaged, leaving you penniless and sleeping under a bridge, doing card tricks (or worse) for cash to survive. If you want to elaborate further you may then imagine picking up some disease and dying horribly of it in the street.

Of course, none of this is in any way close to the reality of the situation. It is a spiral of fantasy that the obsessive thinker allows himself to get into, partly because such a downward spiral of thought can be oddly addictive and compelling, producing a trance-like state in the sufferer.

If you find yourself entertaining such patterns of thought then you need to strike back with evasive action in order to seize control again.

1. Identify the distortions in your thinking

First, monitor your thinking at all times and be aware when it is not presenting facts or situation as they really are.

In The OCD Workbook, Bruce M. Hyman, Ph.D., and Cherry Pedrick, RN list the following ways in which obsessive thinkers can warp reality when they fix on a particular person or situation.

- Overestimating risk, harm and danger
- Over-control and perfectionism
- Catastrophizing
- Black and white or all-or-nothing thinking
- Persistent doubting
- Magical thinking
- Superstitious thinking
- Intolerance of uncertainty
- Over-responsibility
- Pessimistic bias
- What-if thinking
- Intolerance of anxiety
- Extraordinary cause and effect

If any of these sound familiar to you then take note and realise that your thinking may well be at fault. Simply by recognizing this intellectually, you will do much to quell the tide of unhelpful thought and speculation.

2. Accept, and know that it will pass

As with many things in life, once you have identified that your thinking is obsessive and out of control around a particular topic, accept that this is the case. Don't try to fight it immediately. Just realise that you are prone to a very common phenomenon, and don't give yourself a hard time. Accept, too, that obsessive patterns of thought can be difficult to break. Cut yourself some slack.

In accepting your faulty thought patterns, though, you should also take some solace from the fact that "this too shall pass." On average, I will think really obsessively about something for maybe two, three days maximum. After that it will lose something of its sting, and my mind will slowly move on to other things. So no matter how bad things seem at the moment, it will get better naturally in time.

3. Change your physical state

A great way to break the pattern of obsessive thoughts is to change your physical state. The most obvious—and best—way of accomplishing this is through exercise, of course. Going out for a run or going to the gym for a weights session will help no end. The endorphins that exercise introduce into the body are brilliant for breaking up unhelpful thought patterns and offering a new perspective.

Another technique that is very powerful is going into water. This could mean swimming, but equally, a jacuzzi or plunge pool is great too. Saunas and steam rooms can also help.

There is something about changing the elements around the body that seems to have a deep effect on the way thought patterns emerge and progress.

4. Substitute

Don’t leave this one to chance. What you should plan to do is to have a substitute thought ready to focus on when the thing you’re trying not to dwell on enters your mind.

For example, right now I have a legal dispute going on. For days the particulars of the case would keep coming into my mind and I would imagine all the possible consequences of this or that eventuality. All a complete waste of brain RAM, since I can’t accurately guess exactly what is going to happen in the future.

Then, when I found out about this concept of substitution, I resolved that whenever the case came into my mind, I would substitute it with the though “I’m on holiday,” and would dwell instead on the more positive fact that it is nearly Christmas and I am indeed on vacation.

While this can be tricky to do effectively at first, once you’ve practised a few times you’ll find that the mind shifts more easily into the area that you want it to.

5. Keep Busy

Perhaps the most effective way of avoiding pointless obsessive thoughts is simply to focus on something else. Ideally, this should be challenging and involved enough to “turn your head off” to the other subject matter, at least for the duration of the time you’re working on it. Anything sufficiently engrossing will do—designing, writing, playing or composing music, learning a language, building a website.

The other advantage of this approach is that you will actually be doing something constructive. Rather than focusing on something uncertain, which you are obsessing about precisely because it is something you can’t control, you are instead working on something that should give you satisfaction, and will thus increase the overall quality of your life.

Read More: The Personality Trait That May Be Hurting Your Chances With Hot Women Right Now

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Will Mizzou Students Protest Islamic Misogyny?

December 16, 2015 | by Jeff Bruins | Link | Original Link

After the students of Mizzou devoted multiple protests—spanning an entire month—to successfully oust Tim Wolfe, the crusade for social justice must march forward. For those who missed the previous fiasco, Tim Wolfe resigned from his position as System President of the University of Missouri due to unfounded accusations of "racism." Lord knows it's tough to intimidate a president into resigning without evidence, but they did it.

So what would happen if the students of Mizzou got word of actual evidence of bigotry? What if this bigotry was in fact misogyny, directed towards a high school student? And what if this bigot is employed by the very university that they attend? Could social justice warriors prove once and for all that patriarchy is alive and well in some corners of America? Enter Youssif Omar.

Professor Arrested For Abusing 14-Year-Old Relative For Not Wearing Her Hijab

[Patriarchy intensifies]

Youssif Zaghwani Omar is an assistant professor at the University of Missouri. As the Daily Mail reports, Omar was allegedly seen dragging his 14-year-old relative "very violently by the hair" outside Hickman High School, where she attends. Officer Latisha Stroer informed the Columbia Tribune that Omar also slapped the girl across the face and forcefully shoving her into his car.

The impetus for such behavior arose when Omar noticed she was not wearing her hijab at school, which as we all know is absolutely haram. The following day, Omar was greeted by local police authorities and held in Boone County Jail. Shortly after, Omar posted the $4,500 bond and was subsequently released. According to his Facebook and LinkedIn accounts, Omar is originally from Libya, and was the head of the English department at the University of Benghazi from 2003-2007.

Sexism Or Islamophobia? Take Your Pick.

"I'm not sure about Sharia law, but I do like this hat."

This isn't quite the narrative that social justice warriors would like. Don't get me wrong, there is a lot going for this incident that they could happily rally against: misogyny, professor, religious extremism. Think of it as being one number away from the grand prize of the SJW Sweepstakes Lottery. All of the winning numbers have fallen into place, but this one incorrect digit has rendered your entire ideological pursuit defunct. That wrong digit is the fact that Omar is a Muslim.

Historically, Feminism and Islam have had an awkward relationship together. Feminists nonsensically apologize for all of the wrongs committed under the name of Islam, while Islam is devoutly committed to destroying the very notion of women's rights that feminists allegedly fight for.

If only the majority of Muslims were a slightly lighter shade of skin color, perhaps this double-standard would disappear entirely. From an outsider's perspective, one cannot help but laugh at the cognitive dissonances that feminists commit on a daily basis. If I hear "Western imperialism" as a response to "stoning adulterers is wrong" one more time, I'm going to explode. Figuratively of course. I'm not actually wearing a vest.

It is precisely this sort of hypocrisy that rational people need to make the public aware of. Roosh appropriately parodied this contradiction in his YouTube video titled "Canadian Feminists are dangerously Islamophobic". After weeks of protest leading up to his scheduled appearance in Toronto, Roosh toyed with the idea of holding his conference inside a mosque, an area where neon-haired feminists dare not protest, out of fear of being branded Islamophobic.

As Ali A. Rizvi might say, this behavior is indicative of "Islamophobia-phobia": the fear of being called Islamophobic. Considering that sharia law is a legitimate fear, and not an irrational phobia, this rise of Islamophobia-phobia is indeed a frightening one.

Poke The Progressive Stack. Watch It Collapse.

By now it is blatantly obvious that Social Justice Warriors lack any sort of noble principles. Their sole objective is to divide and conquer: draw lines between identifiable groups, convince them they are all marginalized, and pit the minorities against the oppressors.

Marxism tends to entice the masses this way because just about anybody can convince themselves that they are victims. This is why feminists and Muslims are placed into the same victimized category, despite the widely different belief systems between the two. In spite of this, feminists (though likely not Muslims) are steadfastly convinced they are in this fight together, to ultimately overthrow their white, male, capitalist overlords. So how is a rational individual to react to this information?

Poke the stack. Shine a light on the wild inconsistencies between these alleged "allied groups" and let them fight amongst each other. Keep in mind these discrepancies do not exist solely between feminism and Islam. Feminists and Transgenders have recently collided when radical feminist Germaine Greer refused to accept the trans orthodoxy that men are women. This is good news. Let's have more of these.

Read More: Mizzou "White Privilege" Hunger Striker Jonathan Butler Is From A Family Worth $20 Million

Jeff Bruins
Jeff is a computer programmer, traveler and avid reader. He engages in hetero-normative male behavior in the current year. Follow him on Twitter.

Why Leftists Are Stunned At The Wise Words Of Friedrich Nietzsche

December 16, 2015 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

If any of you have ever studied philosophy, you have most likely heard of the German naturalist Friedrich Nietzsche (1844-1900), infamous for his proclamation that "God is dead!" and his philosophy regarding the will to power. These aspects of his philosophy alone make it one of the most masculine philosophies to ever exist.

In a nutshell, Nietzsche believes that "God," or all of the cultural standards and "truths" that are imposed upon us are bullshit, and that it is up to man to forge his own destiny and to determine what he believes to be right and wrong. Is this not what the manosphere's inhabitants strive to do?

In regards to the will to power, Nietzsche believes that the ultimate goal of life is to "…strive to grow, spread, seize, [and to] become predominant," (Beyond Good and Evil, §259). He claims that it is expansion which gives us a sense of fulfillment; man must constantly strive to improve himself in every way possible, whether it be physically, financially, intellectually, spiritually, emotionally, or by learning a language, traveling to mysterious, far-off lands, or by taking up a new hobby.

Despite his insightful thoughts on life's purpose, however, this is not what I plan to focus on in this article. Instead, I have chosen to write about…

Why Leftists hate Nietzsche (his opinion on women)

Even if you haven't heard of Friedrich Nietzsche, you may have heard about his views on women; many regard them as extremely offensive, hateful, and deeply misogynistic. Dozens of modern day pseudo-intellectuals love to skewer Nietzsche's view on women, painting him as an irredeemably angry and bitter old man, despite the fact that half of these so called "intellectuals" are probably divorced and the other half are probably in unhappy marriages.

One of the more popular Nietzschean quips which is thrown around is: "Ah, women. They make the highs higher and the lows more frequent," which is generally true. Another, more offensive quote which is oft thrown around is: "When a woman has scholarly inclinations there is usually something wrong with her sexuality," which is also generally true. Are you starting to see why leftists hate him so much?

A Lesser Known Passage

All of the hate that Nietzsche gets aside, he still had a profound level of influence on Western philosophy, and an incredibly accurate insight into the nature of women, over a century before the manosphere even existed. It is my hope that we can learn from this sage's deep wisdom. Today, I have chosen to analyze one of his lesser known "sexist" passages:

Someone took a youth to a wise man and said: 'Look, he is being corrupted by women!' The wise man shook his head and smiled. 'It is men who corrupt women,' he exclaimed, 'and the failings of women should be atoned for and set right in men.

(The Gay Science, §68)

…wait a minute. What? Where's the rambling on about how women corrupt even the best of men? Of the Delilahs and Jezebels? Where are the truthful words about succubae and gold-diggers? Men are the ones who corrupt women? How is this? Women are the most manipulative creatures on the planet, are they not?

Women are in fact gold diggers, but Nietzsche's words are still true

The wise man goes on:
'…for man makes for himself the image of woman, and woman shapes herself according to this image.' 'You are too gentle towards women,' said one in the company; 'you do not know them!' The wise man replied, 'the way of men is will; the way of women is willingness – that is the law of the sexes; truly a hard law for women! All human beings are innocent of their existence; women, however, are doubly innocent. Who could have oil and mercy enough for them?' 'Forget oil! Forget gentleness!' shouted someone else from the crowd; 'one has to raise women better!' 'One has to raise men better,' said the wise man and beckoned the youth to follow him – but the youth did not follow him.

(The Gay Science, §68)

This is quite the opposite of what most men would expect. Instead of harping on women for being manipulative creatures or berating them for their vanity, he blames MEN instead! To those who have fully embraced neomasculine principles, Nietzsche's words will seem quite sagacious. They peer so deep into the psyche of men and into the nature of women with so few words.

Men…or women?

In this parable, there are clearly two opposing parties: the wise man (arguably the embodiment of Nietzsche's opinion) and the foolish villagers who argue that a woman has corrupted some youth.

Ask yourself right now: which are you?

Do you blame women for the state of our society, or do you blame men?

If you blame women, here's the harsh truth: you're part of the problem.

“What?” you might ask. “Are most women nowadays not validation-seeking, narcissistic sluts?”

You figured it out!

They most certainly are, however this is not entirely their fault. It’s not even half their fault. Women are followers, and they accept the path that men have laid down before them. As Nietzsche said: “…the way of men is will; the way of women is willingness.” Men will for certain things to happen, and women are willing to help make these things happen.

How can one expect a woman to be a faithful, chaste, kind-hearted soul, when her father was most likely a pathetic, weak beta male who gave into her every demand? How do you expect her to develop any semblance of humility, when every man who she dates grovels at her feet, and treats her like a goddess?

Those men laid down the path before her; they laid down a path of arrogance, vanity, promiscuity, and misery – and she followed it, for women seldom forge their own paths.

He is laying down the wrong path for her to follow

It’s quite simple, really. When a woman has a strong, masculine father who sets firm boundaries for her, she naturally becomes a feminine nurturer. When she doesn’t have a strong father, she turns to her friends and the media for the guidance which her father has deprived her of.

A slut only becomes a slut when she does not have the firm, masculine guidance which she needs. Nobody can give this to her but a man. It is a man's responsibility to raise a daughter who is chaste and kind, and who embodies feminine virtues. If he fails to do this, he has deprived his daughter of the joy that comes with being a faithful wife and mother.

Again, Nietzsche's words ring true.

Advanced frame manipulation: nuanced game

Your frame, in essence, is the way that you interpret reality – it's what you feel, what you think, what you believe, it's the way that you understand and navigate the world.

For instance, a standard American male's frame might go something like this: "The world is a scary place. Women want nice guys. Men are perverted assholes. I'm not very special." Pretty depressing, isn't it?

Can you guess what this guy's frame is?

To contrast, a player's frame might go something like this: "I'm the shit. The world is a playground. Women want confident, assertive men. Most men are fucking pussies, but not me. I'm the shit."
Do you see the massive difference?

Women want a man who has a strong frame.

Women want to know that their man has a very strong internal sense of purpose, and that he's 100% confident in himself, but it's sometimes hard to tell if a man is actually confident, or if he's just acting that way. So what's a woman to do?

Shit test you. This is why women shit test men: they want to see if they can shake your frame. When a woman realizes that you have a stronger frame than her, she will slowly accept your frame to be true.

So what does this have to do with Nietzsche?

Again, let us refer to this philosopher's words: "'…for man makes for himself the image of woman, and woman shapes herself according to this image.'"

Man creates his image of woman, and she shapes herself accordingly. This is what advanced frame manipulation is.

"But Jon!" I can hear you say, "I'm 35, and I don't want to fuck sluts anymore. I want to find a wife!"

It doesn't matter. Frame manipulation works. Men lead, and women follow. If you want your wife to be faithful, then act and think as if she is faithful. Set the frame that she's a chaste virgin, and she will act like a chaste virgin when she's with you.

Act as if you expect women to be motherly and nurturing, and your girlfriend will act this way. It's that simple, and I cannot emphasize this highly simple, yet so-frequently overlooked concept: women shape themselves according to men.

What frame do you think her boyfriend has?

Now, this doesn't mean that you should come to believe that your woman is actually like this. If you have the frame that she's a chaste virgin, but when she's alone she runs into a player with a strong "all girls want to fuck me" frame, it will be very tempting for her to get sucked into his reality. At this point, whether or not she sleeps with him comes down to the values she was raised to value, social pressure, and logistics.

Don't become delusional. Just because you set a frame for a woman doesn't mean that she actually becomes what you think she is. Women are chameleons—that's Nietzsche's whole point. They follow whichever man has the strongest frame.

I am advocating something known as “reality selection.” In a nutshell, reality selection is training yourself to get rid of disempowering beliefs and learning how to accept empowering beliefs. It’s probably one of the most powerful ways to improve your life, because instead of fixing the external factors (have better posture, work out, eat well, etc.) it fixes the very ROOT of the problem: your negative beliefs about yourself.

I personally used reality selection to reprogram my mind after an abusive childhood left me feeling absolutely worthless, and I’ll be talking more about how you can use reality selection to transform your life once I launch my blog.

One Last Nietzschean Lesson…

If there’s only one lesson I impart to you today, I hope that it is this: we must create more high quality men who embody the principles of neomasculinity if we wish to see the West survive.

“‘Forget oil! Forget gentleness!’ shouted someone else from the crowd; ‘one has to raise women better!’ ‘One has to raise men better,’ said the wise man and beckoned the youth to follow him – but the youth did not follow him.”

The man in the crowd, or many of those new to the manosphere, advocate that we raise women better, and I agree. However the problem is that unless we raise men better, raising women better isn’t even possible. In order to raise women better, our society must value traditional gender differences and have a strong sense of morality. This can only be accomplished by raising men better.

Eventually, feminism will be viewed as a verminous plague which is rotting our culture from the inside out, women will be expected to be maternal nurturers again, and men will reclaim their past glory and honor as the strong, wise providers and protectors that they are.

Conclusion

We must realize that the current state of the West is not the fault of women. Men must step up to the plate. We must embrace neomasculine principles and encourage others to do so as well. We must develop our minds and bodies. We must cultivate core confidence and create rock solid frames. We must fight against the progressivist machine. We must raise men better—even a long-dead German philosopher saw this to be true.

Read More: Parting Words From A Dying Man

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Is Marion Maréchal-Le Pen The Future Of Right-Wing Politics?

December 17, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Recently, the French political party, Front National, suffered a defeat, failing to win a single region in the second round of municipal voting. The defeat was a disappointment, as the party had done well in the first round of voting thanks to anti-immigration sentiment. However, one bright note is that the election saw the rise of an attractive new political star: Marion Maréchal-Le Pen.

What is Front National?

Jean-Marie Le Pen, founder of Front National, and his granddaughter Marion Front National was founded in 1972 by Jean-Marie Le Pen to unite various French nationalist movements. Because the party's anti-Semitic and anti-immigration stances, Front National had a bad reputation in the French media and Le Pen was dubbed the "Devil of the Republic."

When she took over leadership of the party in 2011, Jean-Marie's daughter Marine sought to remove the offensive elements of the party in an effort to make the party more palatable to the general public. This included softening the party's xenophobic image and purging it of anti-Semitism. That meant that she purged her own father, the founder of the party.

Today, Front National is characterized by being anti-immigration, especially against Islamic immigration. The party opposes the European Union as infringing upon France's sovereignty. It has also adopted a mildly protectionist stance.

Marion Maréchal-Le Pen

Marion, who is the granddaughter of the founder of Front National, became the youngest French MP in modern history when she was elected at age 22 back in 2012. In the most recent election, she won the first round by capturing 40% of the vote—the second highest percentage in France.

However, she lost in the second round because the Socialist party candidate dropped out and encouraged her supporters to vote for Nicholas Sarkozy's "center right" Republican party candidate. In other words, the so-called leftwing party, and the so-called rightwing party, are so terrified of Front National that they are willing to work together to block it from coming into power. This makes me wonder how much tangible difference there is between the Socialists and Republicans in France—sort of like the Democrats and the Republicans in the US.

Despite her loss, Marion remains extremely popular. She is arguably more popular than her aunt Marine Le Pen, who is the head of the Front National party. Since she is only 26 years old, she will continue to be a force to be reckoned with in French politics.

But Marion's appeal goes further. She's become an inspirational figure for nationalist movements in other countries as well.

The secret of Marion's popularity

Of course, the fact that Marion is young and attractive is part of her appeal. But if her popularity was merely the result of looks, we could just run beauty queens for political office. The real secret of Marion's appeal comes from the fact that she is bold and unapologetic about her beliefs.

In a country that is highly secular and atheistic, Marion is a devout Catholic. She is openly pro-life and against gay marriage even though we are regularly told that those positions are on the "wrong side of history."

She is highly critical of Islam and how it relates to the French Republic. She has stated that Muslims could only be considered French if they adopt French "customs and a lifestyle" that have been shaped by 1500 years of Christianity, and if they speak French as their first language. She even opposes schools providing substitute meals to conform to Muslim's halal rules.

In a recent speech, Marion sounded very much unlike American politicians who reduce American culture to nothing more than consumerism:

> 'We are not a land of Islam,' she declared. 'In our country, we don't wear djellaba clothing, we don't wear a veil and we don't impose cathedral-sized mosques.'

How Marion's message applies to American politics

Mos Eisley Cantina or your local Starbucks

Democrats and the “cuckservative” GOP establishment are horrified by the bold language that Marion uses. Their vision of the United States is the Star Wars Mos Eisley Cantina—a hodgepodge of different peoples and cultures holding nothing in common except the compulsive drive to buy more stuff. American politicians are terrified of offending any group of potential voters so they make no demands upon anyone.

This wasn’t always the case. There was a time when being a US citizen resulted in real benefits, but it also entailed real responsibilities. President Theodore Roosevelt wrote:

> We should insist that if the immigrant who comes here does in good faith become an American and assimilates himself to us he shall be treated on an exact equality with every one else, for it is an outrage to discriminate against any such man because of creed or birth-place or origin.
>
> But this is predicated upon the man’s becoming in very fact an American and nothing but an American. If he tries to keep segregated with men of his own origin and separated from the rest of America, then he isn’t doing his part as an American. There can be no divided allegiance here. . . We have room for but one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, of American nationality, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding-house; and we have room for but one soul loyalty, and that is loyalty to the American people.

The lesson that the popularity of people like Marion Le Pen and Donald Trump have for American politicians is that the voters are tired of being ignored. They want their governments to put citizens first and globalist and corporate concerns second.

Time is running out for France

While an appealing politician like Marion should give us hope, we should not delude ourselves into thinking that the future is inevitably bright. The window of opportunity for nationalist parties to win an election is becoming smaller every day due to demographic trends.

RVF poster Samseau noted that after this election, the left and “center-right” parties will likely increase Islamic immigration. Following French law, these immigrants will be eligible for French citizenship after five years. The probability that these new citizens would ever vote for a nationalist party is nil.

If Front National is not able to mount a victory in the 2017 presidential election, we may safely write off France as no longer being a distinctively Christian European country. It's fate will be sealed. It will slowly but inevitably morph into another outpost of the Muslim Ummah.

It is no different in the United States. Although Donald Trump is not a nationalist in the same sense as Front National, he represents the last hope that the United States will see a government that desires to "promote the general welfare" of American citizens first.

If 2016 marks the election of Hillary or one of the globalist, donor-approved GOP candidates, immigration, both legal and illegal, will be increased. By the 2024 presidential election, the US will be reduced to a bunch of squabbling minorities, all vying against each other to grab the remaining government benefits.

Conclusion

Marion Maréchal-Le Pen represents a refreshing trend in politics: politicians who reject political correctness and who are unabashedly nationalistic. If these politicians are elected, they may be able to roll back the globalist policies that have made their citizens feel like foreigners in their own countries.

But the establishment forces are not going to give up easily. If they can collude to block the election of a beautiful, charismatic woman like Marion, they will do the same to any other politician who threatens to challenge their hegemony. If there was ever a time to register to vote and to be politically active, this would be it.

Read More: 8 Reasons Why The Future Is Going To Suck

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Study Shows Girls Get Better Grades For The Same Work As Boys

December 17, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

This year the OECD released a report which admitted, amazingly, that schoolboys receive worse grades for the same quality of work as their female peers. When even the unabashedly biased BBC is reporting on anti-male academic inequality, you know there's a huge problem raging across societies. Just as surprisingly (in a refreshing way), both the report's authors and most journalists were willing to lay the blame on blatant teacher bias in favor of girls.

And which gender predominates amongst the ranks of teachers? Women, of course. Female teachers favoring female students, who would have guessed!

With so many female teachers working in education, especially in the crucial early childhood years, and with feminist bureaucrats breathing down school leaders' necks, the discrimination wielded against boys has been an open secret for years. Even when the methods of teaching the curriculum have been consistently gerrymandered to advantage girls, teachers are still finding ways to grossly penalize boys.

Boys study less but perform better on standardized tests

The individuals on the far right and second from left are recipients of intense structural academic privileges.

Another report by the BBC (have they finally started to report non-leftwing, objective pieces?!) sketched out how boys perform better at internationally-benchmarked Pisa science tests than girls. By contrast, girls outdo boys in science-based GSCEs, which are qualifications most British students meet by around the tenth grade. Unlike the GSCEs, Pisa tests are more standardized and cannot be studied for in the same way as regular coursework.

The implication is that when you strip girls of their female-biased teachers, boys outdo them, irrespective of male students paying less attention to their studies in the first place. The blame for girls' poorer Pisa results was, as you would expect, laid at the feet of poor female self-confidence, a trigger term for "society discriminates against women, boo hoo!"

But with boys less likely to take performance in school science seriously, how can a lack of self-confidence suddenly be the resort of feminists?

Undermining the "discrimination against women in science" myth

With educational institutions pandering to women like Emma Sulkowicz, classroom and coursework-based discrimination against male students is par for the course.

In a recent debate, hosted by a journalism society from the University of Bristol, Milo Yiannopoulos throttled Rebecca Reid for the unsupported idea that "science," apparently some sort of conscious, misogynistic entity, discriminates against girls. He cited a compelling Cornell University study, which found that women applying for STEM-related jobs were twice as likely to be hired than men with the same qualifications.

But are these qualifications even the same to begin with? After all, if the OECD is finding that girls are getting better grades for the same work simply because of their gender, the preferential treatment uncovered by Cornell is likely to be even larger. With inflated grades in both science and non-science subjects, such as English, girls' GPAs in the United States and A-Level results in the United Kingdom increase their chances of being accepted into the universities and degree structures they apply for. A better degree then means a better chance of impressing future employers.

Cornell found women with STEM degrees were twice as likely to be hired than men with the same qualifications. This in addition to the higher grades they receive in school for the same work.

And what happens in university itself? To argue that the kinds of anti-male trends in primary and secondary schooling do not flow to tertiary education would be the scam of the decade. Remember, universities are the same institutions that would have students and the wider public believe that, based on “statistics,” campuses are many times more rape-prone than the Congo or South Central Chicago.

By proxy, male students undertaking law, medicine, and other degrees are therefore many times more likely to rape than unemployed and uneducated men in the world’s worst social and economic ghettos. It’s hardly a leap of faith to suppose that academics who label male students as routine rapists would shortchange their grades, too.

There is, additionally, the snowball effect of being explicitly or implicitly praised as being “smart.” Teachers are clearly treating girls with the same ability as boys as more gifted, rather than just awarding them better marks. This will, naturally, impact upon the academic trajectory of each gender. Boys will think that higher education, or certain forms of higher education, are simply not for them. Conversely, girls will aspire higher, despite not actually producing objectively better results than their male peers.

Boys put less time into their literacy skills and suffer grade discrimination but end up basically just as good

Feminists throw around words and hope they form a coherent argument.

> But the OECD has come up with the unexpected finding that this [female] advantage in school does not last into adulthood. When young men and women get to the end of their twenties, their reading skills are not that much different.

The OECD study, as reported by the BBC, makes it clear that with less time and effort invested in their earlier studies boys still end up essentially par with their female contemporaries in terms of literacy by the end of young adulthood. Boys are also less likely to pursue tertiary education in the first place, making the parity by around age 30 more impressive still.

In this sense, the OECD report shows the great, untapped promise of male students. Having already been the victims of decades' worth of systemic barriers, they are still able to reach the same level as more mollycoddled female students. Amidst the savage vitriol of man-hating feminists, we need to be able to recognize and then channel the abilities of men.

When statistics ever prove a gender gap, it will be against males

No, men work longer hours, choose much harder careers, and take less vacation time.

For years, society has been fed the lie of the female pay gap. To quote Yiannopoulos, "no serious economist believes this stuff." What we do have is incontrovertible evidence that there is a pro-female grade gap.

And what will likely happen? Nothing. Why? Because a person with testicles runs Goldman Sachs, significantly more able male soccer players earn more than their inferior female counterparts or something similar. In the meantime, millions of boys who perform as well as their female peers will be discriminated against. Feminism wins, right?

Read More: This Is Why Girls Go For Bad Boys

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

10 Things You Must Do If The Great War Breaks Out

December 17, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Since last November, three words have been ringing in my head: “It is war.” What I hear around me is mainly about who will attack first. But the issue seems inevitable. It sounds just like the discussions at the eve of World War II, an elderly man told me. Add the recent Culture War Chat with its ominous forecast.

Then I hear about Baba Vanga, the blind “Nostradamus of the Balkans” and her prediction that “in 2016, there will be a Great Muslim War followed by the establishment of a caliphate, with Rome as its capital, in 2043.”

I don’t believe in psychics, only in what I see. But in these times of flag burning, tomb desecrating, and racially-motivated rape, better be safe than sorry. Islam is not my enemy, but the ones that attack me and my people on my soil are. It could be the Mongols, the Leftists, or The Vegan Front of Liberation for all I care.

So here are 10 things you will have to figure out in this eventuality:

1. Know what you fight for

Or if you will fight at all. This question kept me awake a few nights. Stay and fight for an ungrateful country or join a place where the lifestyle corresponds to what you envision and live an other day? You have to know if you have what it takes. Each man much prepare himself.

2. Determine your foes and your allies

The investigation on who you associate with should be thorough. Demand proof of their integrity. Not asking complete disclosure on the subject from your friends is taking a huge risk. See past differences with your possible allies and recognize the wolf in the sheep skin. Do not spend one more second of your precious time interacting with leftists, trying to convince them. They are lost, just burn the bridges.

3. Surround yourself with the worthy

Lead by example, reward faithful friends who uphold your values and cultivate their friendship. Weed out the paper tigers and keyboard warriors. Find a strong common denominator: faith, flag, freedom, neomasculinity, family, friends, the love for your land… The man next to you is what makes the difference between victory and defeat.

4. See your women and children as one of your most precious resources

Protect them physically and mentally. Educate them, now or in the future. Leave a legacy. No point losing your life in the struggle if the enemy will breed you out in a few generations. Roosh was right when he pointed out that “the future belongs to those who breed.”

5. Cut the sinews of war

Stop taking drugs. You are financing them and you are not in a state to fight. Stop eating their exotic fast food in street shops which are known to be easy ways to launder money.

Stop financing corporations that represent what you fight against. Throw away your television. Stop buying global movies that promote the cultural decline. There are many more ways. Every dime counts

6. Remember that self defense starts with the mind

Quintus is right. You must detach yourself from the pre-digested information you have been fed with. Study your history and the one of your enemy. Investigate their goals and their social fabric. Know the odds.

Read books about the wars of old. History is bound to repeat itself. Get off social media, they know your every move. Unless it is for business, stay away from it.

One exchange from Merkel to Zuckerberg tells it all:

> (To Zuckerberg) Are you working on this*? (*millions of anti-immigrants posts on Facebook)
>
> "Yes!" – Mark Zuckerberg.

7. Perfect your physical shape and skills

Learn how to shoot, how to clean and disassemble a gun. Get an advanced first aid certificate. Study martial arts. Learn how to filter water and hunt. Survival techniques never hurt. Learn how to create improvised tools, weapons, and shelter. Examine and know your legal system. Develop your knowledge about the legislation on weapons of your country.

8. Realize that the enemy is everywhere among us

We have to resist on many fronts. The media and their brainwashed SJW lackeys, the government that does not want you to open your mouth, the footsoldiers… It is something that society has never encountered before. The enemy is disguised, all the laws of logics have been ignored and he walks freely among us. And he wants you dead.

9. Do your part

“A walking brute goes further than two sitting intellectuals.” Michel Audiard

Change the tendency. Act, write, expose politicians when they lie, bring people together, educate yourself, banish traitors. Do something, don’t wait for it to blow over. Yes, posting memes and sighing reading the paper shows your disapproval. But what does it actually do? Words are good, action is better.

The battlefield is everywhere. Stop procrastinating, time is one of our most precious resources.

While you post memes, Sergei is in Latakia, dropping Vladimir's Christmas presents to ISIS

Want to get in the thick of it? Join the Russian army (they now accept foreigners) or the Peshmergas (Kurdish forces) instead of believing in the smoke screen "drone attacks" launched by leftists leaders on empty warehouses.

French volunteers fighting ISIS with the Peshmergas

10. Understand that the Western elites will not help you

Their worst nightmare would be strong, nationalist, culturally homogenous societies with a common history. More migrants, muticulturalism, and gay propaganda equals more votes for the left. It stays in place with a divided population, easy to control.

Understand that they stand for nothing and would sell their mother (and even deliver her for a few more shekels).

I vow to do my part. Will you?

Read More: 8 Things To Expect When Dating A Muslim Girl

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

A Modern Day Horror Story On The Origin Of The Transgender Movement

December 18, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Today David Reimer would be 50 years old. He would be at the peak of his career, perhaps with a couple of teenage kids, whom he could look forward to sending off to begin their own lives, and could look forward to retirement, becoming a grandfather, and enjoying the life he built for himself. Only David Reimer is dead, because of an evil sexual experiment that was performed on him years ago.

Crime 1: Male Genital Mutilation

David (originally named Bruce) and his twin brother Brian were born in 1965 in Winnipeg, Canada. His parents, two farm kids barely out of their teens, were concerned about how the boys were urinating, and they were referred for circumcision at 7 months.

The twins were misdiagnosed with phimosis, a failure of the foreskin to fully retract. However, this is perfectly normal for infants, and the foreskin often does not fully retract until age 10. The doctor performing the male genital mutilation experienced a malfunction in his equipment, and David's penis was almost completely burned off. They left the hospital. David's brother Brian was not circumcised, and his phimosis naturally resolved itself.

Crime 2: Sexual Experimentation

Mom with David/Bruce and Brian

The parents, deeply concerned about the trauma and pain this would cause David, traveled to Western medicine's premiere institution: Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, Maryland, where they met with Dr. John Money, a pediatrician and psychologist (I would also credit him as having one of the largest effects in the field of linguistics of anyone in the last century).

Dr. Money had begun working at Johns Hopkins in 1951 and opened a groundbreaking clinic there—the Johns Hopkins Gender Identity Clinic, in 1965, around the time of David's birth. The parents had seen Money on TV talking about new treatments for people with sexual disorders.

Dr. John Money

Money had a quite extreme suggestion for David's parents. He told them they should surgically remove what remained of David's penis and raise him as if he were a girl. Money theorized that sexuality was primarily caused by social learning from early childhood, and that it would be in David's best interest to simply be raised as a woman, since penile surgery at the time was very limited.

Money was an expert in hermaphrodites (now called intersex), people born with multiple or mismatched sexual organs, and it was far easier to create a vagina for them than a penis, so this is what he recommended for David.

A Brief Bio Of Dr. John Money

Money was born in New Zealand, moving to the USA to earn a PhD at Harvard in 1952, after writing a dissertation on hermaphrodites (Hermaphroditism: An Inquiry into the Nature of a Human Paradox). Money was married briefly in the 1950s, but quickly divorced and would never marry again.

He is almost fully responsible for modern day usage of the word "gender" to refer to sexuality. He focused on abnormally developed sex organs and had a special interest in hermaphrodites. He theorized that gender was a learned trait, of which having a penis or vagina was only one of many factors. In addition to the typical factors of chromosomes, type of genitalia, presence of sex hormones, etc., Money theorized there was an additional factor that decided one's sex: "Gender role and orientation as male or female, established while growing up."

At the time, the word gender was not used to refer to human sexuality, and Money explained gender role as:

> all those things that a person says or does to disclose himself or herself as having the status of boy or man, girl or woman, respectively. It includes, but is not restricted to sexuality in the sense of eroticism. Gender role is appraised in relation to the following: general mannerisms, deportment and demeanor; play preferences and recreational interests; spontaneous topics of talk in unprompted conversation and casual comment; content of dreams, daydreams and fantasies; replies to oblique inquiries and projective tests; evidence of erotic practices, and, finally, the person's own replies to direct inquiry.

Both Patients Recovering Normally

Change-of-Sex Operations Performed On 2 Apparent Males at Johns Hopkins

The first sex change operations were performed at Money's clinic

For Dr. Money, gender included not only a man-woman decision, but also one's behavior and attitude that went beyond biology. No longer was a boy who picked up a doll just being curious, expressing interest in the human body, or merely picking up a toy he didn't understand the sexual and social ramifications of.

No, according to Money, this boy was expressing his feminine side. The John Hopkins Gender Identity Clinic was the first attempt at considering that sex was something that humans had control over.

The Power Of Language

Language is incredibly powerful. As is often said, one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter, and the words used to describe a person, idea, or event, strongly shape how that person or idea is seen by society. Dr. Money has altered the American language more than perhaps anyone else in the latter half of the 20th century. Among his successes:

- Advocating the "nurture" in the nature versus nurture argument regarding sexuality
- Creating the word "gender" and making it something fluid and controllable
- Changing "sexual perversions" to 'sexual paraphilias"
- Changing "sexual preference" to 'sexual orientation"
- Stated there were two kinds of pedophilia – one based on love and another on harm
- Suggested the name "fuckology" for the scientific study of having sex (I actually like this one)
- Published Gay, Straight, and In-Between: The Sexology of Erotic Orientation
- Changed the discussion on intersex, trans-sex, and sexual psychology from helping > those facing horrible problems such as workplace accidents, genetic defects, and deformities to a discussion on how to help narcissists like Bruce Jenner fulfill their dream of becoming a princess.

Some of these are difficult to accept even today. For example, Money said there was "affectional pedophilia" and "sadistic pedophilia" and that "If I were to see the case of a boy aged 10 or 11 who's intensely erotically attracted towards a man in his twenties or thirties, if the relationship is totally mutual, and the bonding is genuinely totally mutual… then I would not call it pathological in any way."

The Treatment

Dr. Money saw a great opportunity to test out his theories on the infant David. Not only would Money have a perfect experiment, an infant not even at his first birthday who had not developed any sexuality yet, but his twin brother provided the perfect control subject. Money insisted that he would personally oversee David's treatment and counsel and monitor him.

Who else was fascinated with experimenting on twins? Angel of Death Dr. Mengele

At age 22 months, David's remnant of a penis was surgically castrated, and he was given the name Brenda, and regularly saw Dr. Money, often along with his twin brother Brian, for around 10 years. Keep in mind at all times during treatment the children were prepubescent. Some of the treatment involved David getting on the ground on all fours while his twin brother Brian placed his crotch up against David's ass and simulated fucking him by making thrusting motions.

Money would also force David to lay down and spread his legs while Brian climbed on top of him. He would make the two twins take off all their clothes and inspect each others genitals, and Money photographed them naked. He showed David graphic photographs of a seven year old girl giving birth.

Money proclaimed his theory was proven correctly, that Brenda acted and behaved as a girl, and that behavior could indeed overcome biology and determine sex. He reported on the case (anonymously, to protect David's secret) as a success, and said "the child's behavior is so clearly that of an active little girl and so different from the boyish ways of her twin brother."

Money's writings on gender, his new vocabulary, and his theories on nature vs. nurture were celebrated and adopted. He received national awards and honorary degrees, was featured in Time magazine, and included a chapter on the Reimer twins in one of his textbooks.

But the truth was a completely different story. As Money started pressuring the parents around age 10 to have an operation to surgically create a vagina, the parents balked and slowly the truth emerged.

The Reality: You Can't Alter Sex

David (living as Brenda) was terrified of the visits to Dr. Money. As early as a few months after the initial operation, at age 2, Brenda would angrily tear off her dress, refused to play with dolls, would beat up her twin brother and steal his toy cars and guns. She complained to her teachers and parents that she felt like a boy. She loved running and climbing and fighting and hated playing with dolls. She had no friends, and was constantly teased and ridiculed by classmates for her masculine looks and interests.

Both twins complained they were sexually abused during their treatment sessions with Money. Brenda had to pee through a small hole surgeons had created in her abdomen. She was taking female hormones, but they only caused some physical changes and did not make her feel female.

The mother, overcome with guilt and the pain of hiding this secret, attempted suicide. The father became a serious alcoholic and rarely spoke. Twin brother Brian began using drugs and stealing things. At age 13, Brenda was experiencing suicidal depression, and said she would commit suicide if forced to return to Dr. Money's office again.

Brenda / David

At age 14, a local psychiatrist convinced the parents they had to tell Brenda the truth. That he was really a man. He decided to take the name David. David later recounted: “Suddenly it all made sense why I felt the way I did. I wasn’t some sort of weirdo. I wasn’t crazy.”

It was a long and difficult road to reclaim his masculinity. David had a double mastectomy to remove his breasts grown by the estrogen. He took regular testosterone injections, and had multiple operations to create an artificial penis. David was relieved to hear the truth, but incredibly hurt and damaged by years of experimentation, and depression at the thought that he would never find a woman. He attempted suicide twice in his early 20s

David, after reclaiming his true sex

The Aftermath

Unbelievably, Dr Money was still taking credit for the experiment as a success. Money's ideas were just what feminists were looking for–proof that there is no biological reason for boys to be better at math, more productive, or earn more than a woman, and that nurture, not nature, determines whether we feel masculine or feminine.

David's brother Brian, traumatized by this lie and the sick things he was forced to do to his twin brother, became extremely angry, began using drugs, developed schizophrenia, had two failed marriages and died of an overdose of antidepressants in 2002 at the age of 36.

David, around the age of 30, met Dr. Milton Diamond, a psychologist and critic of Money's who had followed the case closely in journals until Money mysteriously stopped publishing updates when Brenda became David. Dr. Diamond revealed everything to David, including how Money used the supposed success of David's operation to legitimize widespread infant sex changes in cases of genital injury. David was horrified and outraged.

In 1997 Dr. Diamond wrote a paper shattering Money's false story which received national attention, and David was interviewed for Rolling Stone, and the reporter later published a biography of his life "As Nature Made Him."

David found work as a janitor in a slaughterhouse, married a woman at age 25 and became stepfather to her three children, but was chronically depressed, unemployed, angry, filled with thoughts of his brother's death, and obsessed with his inability to be a real husband and father. Marital problems spiraled, his wife discussed separating, and two days later David took his shotgun, sawed off the barrel in the garage, drove to the parking lot of a nearby grocery store, and blew his brains out at age 38.

Epilogue

In 1979 the Hopkins clinic closed. It had focused mainly on transsexuals, and this was not the direction Johns Hopkins wanted to go. Dr. Money worked the rest of his career at John's Hopkins, and died peacefully one day before his 85th birthday in 2006.

He continued to receive international awards for many years, most recently in 2003 when New Zealand Prime Minister Helen Clark opened a John Money Wing at an art gallery.

New Zealand Prime Minister honored Dr. Money in 2003

It is important to know the history behind feminism, gender, and sexual fluidity. It would be nice to just think that Bruce Jenner is an obscure rare nutball, that feminism is mostly about being nice to women, and that old societal rules and norms, especially concerning sexuality, promiscuity, and marriage, are just outdated bad ideas like slavery, leeching, and believing in a flat earth.

But the truth is, the history behind many of these changes is sickeningly evil. I am personally opposed to male genital mutilation, regardless of horrible tragedies like this. If you are not, I encourage you to think really hard about who advocates for continuing it and why. The history of gender fluidity, third wave feminism, nurture overcoming nature sexually, and pedophilia can be traced back to a horrible story about two twin boys, both of whom died after leading miserable, short lives.

Not all the news is bad. Dr. Paul McHugh, former psychiatrist in chief at Johns Hopkins, and its current Distinguished Service Professor of Psychiatry, exclaimed earlier this year that "transgenderism is a mental disorder that merits treatment, and that sex change is biologically impossible."

He referenced studies that the suicide rate among transgendered surgical patients is 20 times higher than normal people, as well as studies that of children who expressed transgendered feelings, 70% to 80% spontaneously lost those feelings. We should echo and amplify such truths, and support brave men like Dr. McHugh who have the courage to speak up.

The next time you hear someone use the word gender, think of Dr. Money, who is directly responsible for its usage. And think of David Reimer.

RIP David, poor, tortured soul

A BBC documentary on David Reimer can be viewed here.

Read More: Why Gender Equality Is So Bothersome

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Girls Want Guys To Be Honest But Spend Their Whole Lives Lying About Their Looks

December 18, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Of any mantra you're bound to hear from girls, "What happened to all the honest guys?" or something like it will be the most common. In addition to their hypocritical and perennial whines about men they like not calling them back, the honest man gripe illustrates just how delusional many women are in the age of L'Oreal and Instagram filters upon Instagram filters.

On the flip side, honest male appraisals about women are regularly punished, even as women cake themselves in cosmetic products to pretend they're the movie goddesses they'll never be. Feminists, like Twitter nuisance @dorAMYfasol, whose before and after shots give the feature image for this article, are amongst the worst perpetrators, whilst at the same time they lambaste the body pressures on women.

And, like Amy and Adele, women do not have to be stunners either before or after their beauty routine for the effects of their physical dishonesty to be very large:

[image]

Blame men and forget what women do

As we know, focus is reality, so women are instead foot-rubbed into thinking that male honesty is what is lacking. Self-appointed or Huffington Post-anointed dating experts, both male and female, chastize men for any reluctance, real or imagined, to shoot straight from the hip. They claim that boyfriends and husbands have no reason to fear being honest and every advantage in being so.

Ken Solin, in an article entitled "Playing it Straight With Women", outed himself as one of those very bombastic lecturers:

> I've never met a woman who didn't appreciate emotionally honest men. I'm not referring to men who whine pointlessly, but rather men who feel secure enough in their manhood to articulate their feelings confidently and skillfully without concern about the reaction.

I'm sure that pony trick worked for the man giving his constructive input about his fiancée's wedding dress, after she gave her own thoughts on his planned attire. Or the twenty to thirty million American men each month who try and explain to their partner that they're allowed to enjoy the same weekend or after work time with their friends as she enjoys with hers.

And these are just the banal examples. Like rape culture, mansplaining, and manspreading, the publicly uninterrupted ability of women to rant about such an apparent issue means that what might often be fantasy becomes a socially-reinforced mental reality.

Tellingly, women probably spend more time throughout their romantic lifespan concocting a physical illusion of themselves in front of a mirror than investing in the quality male-female connections that enhance two-way honesty in the first place. Go figure.

"Be honest, but don't be honest"

Candidness is gleefully lapped up (and applied) by women when it suits them. You praised her Instagram pic? She loves it, even if there's a good chance she will ignore your adulation (please learn from this guys!). She gets a flurry of likes or retweets? She loves it, too. And when tears won't have negative consequences, she happily cries. That's honesty that suits her.

However, honesty that crosses her line, which is about a mile into a five-day road trip, is much more expansive. You call out her foul behavior? Expect pouting and concealed venom for days, unless you've firmly and consistently established boundaries for her. This is especially so if you have weaker or newer attachments to a girl. And it's a powerful reminder as to how negging or refusing to take shit from a girl at the outset positively colors your later dealings with her, or abruptly ends what would have been a thoroughly useless interaction anyway.

Then there's that lovely and seemingly contagious "fat is beautiful" mental illness. Chunky or just plain obese girls are apparently the undiscovered supermodels human history has forgotten for millennia. Feminists and others can't pull off this fraud by ideology alone, so L'Oreal, fashion illusions and digital photography come to the rescue.

Bovine-sized women or female mammals with the same mass as the ones Greenpeace tries to protect literally prop up their bodies with shape-shifting spandex (is titanium how the scientists do it?!) and try to obscure cellulite that would make the Grand Canyon jealous. But their boyfriends weren't "honest" in some way and only that matters.

Beyond just the fatties, in female logic land, this:

…is actually hiding that:

[image]

There's always a game behind it, conscious or not

[image]
Women blame men for "high expectations" on them to look a certain way but studies show women are instead focused on outdoing female rivals.

Feminists would have you believe that women randomly inserting one no makeup selfie for every one thousand artificial ones somehow and suddenly makes them sages of honesty. Obviously, by ignoring an extreme lack of daily female physical honesty, the time is then ripe to go after perceived male lapses in genuineness, such as questioning the loyalties of male feminists.

Again, focus is reality and clouding out their own personal inconsistencies is the name of the feminist game. This was the theme of one of my previous articles, where I explored the irony of attacking people who showed their wealth online while women gratuitously exhibit their photoshopped and Wonderbra-enhanced cleavage.

Because reality and truth are bent in nearly all public arenas, the rewards and lack of punishment for lying about one's appearance are only enhanced. In all fields women can find excuses to make their own "truth," discard real truth and selectively label what others say and do as either accurate or inaccurate.

We live in a social machine that is oiled so as not to impede the further accumulation of increasingly overt female vanity. Go through the Twitter and other profiles of @dorAMYfasol and her contemporaries and you will find this plastered across and embedded in almost every they say or don't say.

Fishing for compliments, validation, and subservience

“Model” Stina Sanders was genuinely surprised when she lost thousands of Instagram followers for finally revealing what she really looked like.

Human beings are routinely selfish creatures. Women are not inoculated against this and constant social and political denials of female self-interest only makes female self-interest much more pernicious compared to when men try to look after only themselves. The most innocuous male behavior is described as misogynistic and selfish, whereas pandering to female narcissism (hello, Emma Sulkowicz!) is viewed as some sort of emancipation of womanhood.

Both bad and good news comes with this. The bad news is that the problem and self-delusion amongst many women is only getting worse, poisoning many female connections you could have otherwise pursued. Oh, and that regressing all of society thing. The good news, though, is that with the advent and now heyday of social media this hypocrisy is increasingly laid bare in agonizing detail. More and more men are becoming aware of it, ROK readers or not.

Sadly, there’s only so much popcorn we can eat.

Read More: Fat Girls Who Have Sex With Drunk Guys Are Rapists

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

A Reflection On The Antiphons During The Season Of The Advent

December 18, 2015 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the good men of ROK as we enter the final week before Christmas. To those especially who have been fasting and preparing with quiet of soul for the Feast, I dedicate this article on “Sapientiatide” (or “Wisdomtide”) – the time of heightened expectation in the week before Christmas.

As I’ve said before, it certainly is my intention to be broad in my writing here, generally; but in the midst of such seasons as Advent/Christmas, and Lent/Easter, I would be remiss not to discuss our civilization’s highly developed traditions. So, this article and the next will deal closely with Christmas. This article is also longer than normal, as it has elements that are intended to be consumed one day at a time in the upcoming week.

The O Antiphons

The very, very old melody of the first O Antiphon, “O Wisdom”

Each day of the week preceding Christmas, Western Christians since at least the 8th century have chanted the “O” Antiphons” at Vespers. Christianity reckons the beginning of the day from sundown, so the evening service of Vespers marks the passage from the old day into the new. The canticle of the Magnificat, which the Virgin sang upon visiting her cousin, is thus rightly set in Vespers to reflect the end of the Old Covenant (St. John the Baptist) meeting the beginning of the New (Christ, in the Blessed Virgin).

This canticle is the "high point" of the service, especially on solemn occasions; while singing it, more lights were sometimes lit, incense was brought forth, and the clergy removed their head-coverings. During this week before Christmas, the O antiphons are doubled, the Church is incensed, the bells are rung continuously and all remain standing throughout the whole Magnificat.

The antiphons provide rich material for meditation and reflection. Each antiphon moves forward through all God's works for man's salvation, beginning with the eternal, pre-existent plans of Providence, and ending on Doomsday; but, working backwards, they form an acrostic that points forward: ERO CRAS ("Tomorrow I shall be;" many local, medieval variants had a longer, eight-day usage that spelled out VERO CRAS, "Truly, Tomorrow"). This sets the tone – the antiphons contemplate the penetration of the eternal into time, seeking to save mankind. "Truly, tomorrow," the All-Maker shall be upon us; let our hearts be ready!

I had gone and written a lengthy article on this, at the end of which I was going to recommend to the men the Fish Eaters website for some further information. But upon heading to the webpage myself, I saw that a great deal of information on the antiphons is already there, along with midi files that play the melody, and a clickable musical note that will open musical notation. So, I will include only my thoughts on the themes of the antiphons, below, and some further resources for those who wish to pray them this week.

Some Reflections on the Antiphons

17th December: O Sapientia

This speaks of the Wisdom of God, Alpha and Omega, the first cause and final end of all creatures, the embodiment of that providence which sees and rules and arranges all things. The verse cites the famous "fortiter et suaviter" ("strongly and suavely," key concepts, I think, to masculinity), taken from Scripture to describe God's providence (Wisdom of Solomon 8:1). This finds echoes in St. Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy, and St. Thomas Aquinas' discussion of providence in the Summa.

18th December: O Adonai

This antiphon addresses Christ the Lord, Adonai in Hebrew. Adonai is a title of great significance, for it became the word used in place of the ineffable name of God, the "tetragrammaton," YHWH. In the same way, Christ is the "image of the invisible God," and "the exact figure of His substance." Additionally, the burning bush, in which God appeared to Moses, was understood from ancient times in the Church as a prefiguration of the Incarnation.

The bush ablaze with godly fire, yet unharmed thereby, is an image of the blessed Virgin, from whom and in whom the Deity came to dwell; whose substance He joined to Himself, when He united the human and divine natures in His one Person. She was suffused with the Divine Presence as no other creature before or since, yet was not destroyed thereby.

Shortly after God reveals Himself to Moses in the bush, He says: “I am the Lord who will bring you out from the work-prison of the Egyptians, and will deliver you from bondage: and redeem you with a high arm, and great judgments.” Similar terms are used in Moses’ canticle after crossing the Red Sea. The return to Sinai resulted in the giving of the Law – thus, in all these ways, the Adonai antiphon points to Christ the Lord Incarnate, Giver and the Fulfillment of the Law, the New Covenant ministered by God in the flesh rather than mediated through angels on Sinai, “a mountain that might be touched, and a burning fire, and a whirlwind, and darkness, and storm.”

19th December: O Radix Iesse

This antiphon refers to Christ as being of David’s blood, from the root of Jesse, bound up in the history of Israel and the Jews, yet coming forth for all people.

A Medieval Illumination, with typical absence of shyness in depicting the descendants of Jesse coming out of his “root.”

20th December: O Clavis David

We saw that the Exodus story was a prefiguration of the salvation Christ would bring to all men, fulfilling what was done only politically and for the Jews in ancient times. The theme continues here; the prior antiphon hinted at the “prison-houses of Egypt,” but now treats of the prison-house of death and hell. Christ calls Himself “the Holy One and True, he that hath the key of David; he that openeth, and no man shutteth; shutteth, and no man openeth.” And again: “I am the First and the Last; alive, and was dead, and behold I am living forevermore, and I have the keys of death and of hell.” From ancient times, Christians depicted Christ’s victory over hell by showing hell’s gates and locks shattered and strewn at his feet.

Continuing the theme of the universal salvation, prefigured in the political history of Israel: as David was King of Israel, so of His line would come the King of all. Thus the prophesy of the Patriarch Jacob over his son, Judah would be fulfilled: “The scepter shall not be taken away from Juda, nor a ruler from his thigh, till He come that is to be sent, and He shall be the expectation of nations” (Genesis 49:10).

Christ hinted that if the Messiah was the Son of David, yet He was greater than David. He asked, “How say they that Christ is the son of David? And David himself saith in the book of Psalms: ‘The Lord said to my Lord, sit thou on my right hand, Till I make thine enemies thy footstool.’ David then calleth him Lord: and how is he his son?” That is the subject of this antiphon – Christ, son of David, God of David, with the key of David to destroy hell and rule as king of all.

21st December: O Oriens

The antiphons now pass from the pepole of Israel to all mankind. The last antiphon referred to Him as the son of David, the Sceptre of the house of Israel, and entreated him to lead forth the prisoner, singular (i.e., Israel); this antiphon refers to Him as the “dayspring,” i.e., the rising sun, ascending from the East to traverse all the way to the West, shining upon all men.

Those who formerly were of Israel rejected their King, the Heir of David; now people from all nations shall be grafted into Israel, and confess Him as King of All. Therefore, this antiphon no longer asks for deliverance of “him” that sits in darkness and the shadow of death,” but “they that sit” therein. The terms (“Sun of Justice,” “Dayspring”) point to the book of Malachi, last in the books of the prophets, referring to God’s relationship as Lord and Saviour of all the Gentiles, beyond just the people of Israel.

Most importantly, “oriens” literally means “rising,” – i.e., the rising sun, the East – and form ancient times the Christians used this title for Christ in His Resurrection (rising up from the earth, like the sun from the horizon); this Antiphon points to His Resurrection.

Summing up the themes of O Clavis and O Oriens, this Stained Glass depicts Christ as He shows Himself in the Apocalypse – the Morning Star and Sun of Justice, holding the key to death and hell, surrounded by seven golden candlesticks and holding seven stars, breathing forth the sword of truth.

22nd December: O Rex Gentium

This antiphon, after the Resurrection of Christ as the Rising Sun of Justice, comes in the place of the Ascension. The corresponding antiphon for the Ascension begins “O Rex Gloriae,” with the same melody as “O Rex Gentium,” and is the only other antiphon beginning with the words “O Rex” in all the Church year.

The connection, therefore, is strong; it is made all the more striking by its exposition of Christ, Who “makes two into one,” and formed man “from the mud of the earth,” for these are themes the Fathers continually mention in discussing the Ascension: how Christ united two natures into one, bringing the divine nature down to man, Whom He formed from the mud of the earth, and raising our nature up to the heights, seating it in Himself upon the throne of God. Let all mortal flesh keep silence before such a marvelous exchange.

23rd December: O Emmanuel

This antiphon addresses Emmanuel, “God among us,” God present, hinting both at Christmas, and at the Lord’s return to once again stand in our midst as the Just Judge. In both cases, judgment is implied – the first time, in gentleness, the second time, in the dreadful day of Doom, the Last Day. As with the antiphons O Clavis David and O Oriens, where the antiphon is slightly modified to reflect a subtle change in meaning, this antiphon is similar to yesterday's; but whereas yesterday refers to the "desideratus gentium" (the one Whom the gentiles desired, past tense, and now have), this antiphon refers to the "expectatio gentium" (the one Whom the Gentiles await, i.e., Christ as the Judge Who shall come again).

Praying The Antiphons

For those who wish to observe this ancient tradition in some way, I recommend following the general advice on the Fish Eater's page, which has the Latin and English texts, recordings, printed music, etc., for the antiphons, along with the text of the Magnificat, here.

More specifically:

1. Around sundown, go to a suitable, quiet place (before an image of Christ or the Cross, the Christmas Tree or Wreath, etc.)
2. Reflect for a bit on the theme of that evening's Antiphon – read related Scripture passages, listen to hymns and carols related to it, meditate quietly, or whatever strikes you as appropriate
3. Chant the Antiphon, then the Magnificat, then the Antiphon again (intone or read them aloud if you won't be chanting them);
4. Pray the Lord's Prayer;
5. Add, if you like, the proper prayer from the website below
6. Conclude your prayer, and don't be in a rush to dissipate your recollection or quiet. I usually listen to carols, read, pray, take a walk, work quietly at Christmas preparations, etc., afterwards.

Incidentally, I know that you all will get this at least a day late to start with O Sapientia; you can catch up on whatever you missed on the first day you have this, and go from there.

This site has a “chapter” (related Scripture passage, for meditation) and an oration corresponding to each Antiphon, with which you may wish to conclude your prayer:

(Be aware that he is discussing a German variation, where “O Sapientia” begins on the 13th; for our purposes, it begins on the 17th, and the others follow in order).

In Closing

I hope this article is actually interesting to the men of ROK, and I’ll ask forgiveness if it is not. I wanted to offer a method for observing each day of this week in preparation for Christmas, as a gift to you all, so that you may be keener of mind and spirit when the day arrives.

Don’t forget to peruse the other pages of the Fish Eaters website for Christmas Traditions – you won’t be able to keep all of them (nobody does – some were popular in one place, some in another), but now is the time to find some that resonate with you, and to be prepared for them when the day arrives.

May God grant you all to come safely to Christmas Day, and give you great joy on it. Our effeminate and commercialized world will speed by it half-consciously; but for the man that makes time for it, it is a time when the heavens are thrown open and the things above will gladly communicate their joys to men on earth.

Yes, this is “Wisdomtide!” When I contemplate Christ in the crèche, I always think of the last Antiphon (“Emmanuel, God with us”) and these words spoken by Wisdom, with which I now conclude:

> The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his ways, before he made any thing from the beginning. I was set up from eternity, and of old before the earth was made. The depths were not as yet, and I was already conceived, neither had the fountains of waters as yet sprung out: the mountains with their vast bulk had not as yet been established: before the hills I was brought forth. He had not yet made the earth, nor the rivers, nor the poles of the world. When he prepared the heavens, I was present; when with a certain law and compass he enclosed the depths, when he established the sky above, and poised the fountains of waters, when he compassed the sea with its bounds, and set a law to the waters that they should not pass their limits, and when be balanced the foundations of the earth. Yea, even then I was with him forming all things: and was delighted every day, cavorting before him at all times and making merry throughout the whole orb the world: and my delights were to be amongst the sons of men. – Proverbs 8:22-31

Read More: A ROK Christmas Benediction From Brother Cui Pertinebit

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Why Men Have No Choice In Being Breadwinners

December 19, 2015 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

I happened to catch Milo Yiannopoulos's debate with feminist Rebecca Reid at the University of Bristol the other week. About 30 minutes in the topic turned to the "gender pay gap," with a questioner asking why men still end up doing all the undesirable jobs in society.

After an excellent response by Milo pointing out that, yes, 97% of workplace fatalities affect men, Rebecca Reid gave a curious explanation, slightly paraphrased –

> I think its absolutely true, there are a lot of unpleasant jobs that are done by men, and that is not a nice thing for them. I think part of the problem now is, often if you take a job that is very unpleasant, like burning…dead limbs…its because you need money, and usually if you need money, its because you're perceived to be a breadwinner.
>
> This idea that you're raised, that you have to provide, you have to earn, you have to be the breadwinner, is really unfair on men. I don't think I does them any good. If you more broadly suggested that people have to earn, people have to provide, then it would be men who are funneled into these things less.

I thought this answer was so stunningly ignorant, so fundamentally out of touch with reality, that I immediately lit the warning beacons of Gondor, mustered the Rohirrim, and logged on to ROK to write a response.

Hi Rebecca

So I imagine you're getting a lot of critical emails at the moment. Since I like to try and keep these conversations civil, and I also don't think people ought to be getting doxxed and losing their job because of an internet argument, I'll try and refrain from overt name calling.

There's just one area I'd like to comment on. You said at one point in the debate that men tend to perform riskier jobs simply because society "perceives" them to be the breadwinner. I agree with the sentiment – this is unfair to men, but I also think it isn't just a social construct. It remains the case as of 2015 that men are rarely valued for their bodies or looks alone, while women posses this advantage as much as ever (if not moreso).

I'm a young man in my 20s. I can only vouch for the fact that no girl has ever approached me or asked me out on a date herself, and it would be extraordinary for one to pay for my meal. Most guys my age I've asked are in the same boat. Its simply not an option for me to wait around and expect a member of the opposite sex to come and start showering me with gifts or start paying the bills.

Here's the thing – being a breadwinner is my only option as a man.

Unlike men, women in our society still have all these entirely separate sources of income and support that have evolved over the centuries, as they are desired for their looks and femininity alone. Yes, a minority of girls (and generally the ones that don't take care of themselves in the first place) may not be able to take advantage of this, but it is certainly vastly higher than the portion of men.

The real “gender pay gap”

Basically – men don’t undertake more risky jobs for shits and giggles. Its a very rational calculation on our part, as we can’t just sell our bodies (whether indirectly through marriage or more directly through sex or modelling-related industries) to earn a living. Literally trillions of dollars are transferred from men to women each year because of the latter’s control of access to sex.

This is the real “gender pay gap.”

Honestly – I’d be happy to see things change in this area. I’d love a women to ask me out someday and offer to take me to a bar. I’d love the idea of one marrying me, putting me in a house to raise a couple of kids and working her ass off for decades to support me.

Even if one offered to pay me money for sex, I’d at least be flattered, and would probably accept as long as she didn’t seem completely bitchy or hideous – which is probably the same criteria as most voluntary sex workers after all. Forced prostitution is, of course, one of the worst crimes there is.

On an even softer level than prostitution, women can gain considerable value from their femininity without having to touch a single penis. Is it mere coincidence that so many of the people you see manning the front counter of a business are perky, smiling, young girls aged 16-25?

Maybe this is the reason that, when handing out resumes aged 18, I tried handing one in at my local newsagents, only to be refused with the explanation that – "Oh, you shouldn't bother. They only hire girls here."

Is it any wonder young women in their twenties now earn around 10% more than young men? Women have always had these advantages, they have always reigned supreme in the home.

So since they now earn direct wages comparable to men, when are we going to start seeing equality not just in the office, but in the bedroom as well? While women now make 45% of society's direct income, stay-at-home dads still only compose around 3% of such parents, and less than 5% of alimony goes to men. These figures have barely budged in decades.

So what gives? Why it is that women have achieved near parity with men in the workplace, but so few women will support men at home? What about the billions of dollars which should be flowing from hardworking, corporate wives to their docile, homemaker husbands? Why is something like 80% of consumer spending still the domain of women?

Where are all the sugar mamas supporting some cute young piece of male ass? Where are the women on Airbnb willing to provide accommodation in return for a bit of quick cunnilingus? Where are the rich billionaire women willing to tie me up and spank me in a pink room of pain?

Hell, I'll settle for one lousy drink paid for by a woman. All those who have experienced this, raise your hands?

Sure there are a few examples. You do hear of the occasional lonely, middle aged divorcee jetting off to Jamaica for a week of wild sex with handsome, young, ~~HIV positive,~~ local men, but these incidents are few and far between compared to the hundreds of billions of dollars that flows the other way worldwide.

So what gives? What are we doing wrong?

Am I not pretty enough?

If women truly desire sex as much as men, and it is only society that has somehow "suppressed" their sex drive, where are all the new brothels opening up to serve them? Where are the cashed-up young women cruising around downtown on a Friday night, looking for scantily clad men standing on street corners?

The only refuge you may have at this point is the excuse of "slut-shaming." If women are still shamed for their sexuality, it is surely to a lesser extent than any other period in human history. I also don't think its too hard to hide your liaisons with the speed and efficiency of modern communications. An anonymous ad on Reddit or Craigslist, an account with a hidden photograph on okcupid or plentyoffish – surely these things are not difficult?

In the era of Miley Cyrus's twerking and Kim Kardashian's ass, how much of an excuse is "slut-shaming" really?

So what is happening here? I can only conclude that this has a fundamentally biological basis. Male sexual desire is still something like three times greater than women's on average (we can debate the specific ratio).

Most women today have the options of either supporting themselves with their labor or with their bodies (and now a third option in the welfare state). As a man, I only have my labor, and that is growing increasingly difficult in a workforce where women are being handed every possible advantage, on top of their looks.

Women may be approaching financial parity with men, but since our wildly different levels of sexual desire haven't changed, the equation remains unbalanced. This is at the root of many of the western world's growing social problems.

Of course, most people don't want to hear this. Usually the only people who'll dare mention it out loud are comedians.

But millions of men are slowly coming to this realization of their own accord. If society won't play fair, we're either going to fight against it, or check out entirely. This is the sort of society we're heading towards. The ancient exchange of marriage is sex for security, be it in the form of wealth or physical protection.

In 2015, women can largely support themselves, and have the police to protect them. Most men come to the negotiating table with very little to offer, no matter how hard they work or work out. Likewise, new technologies are reducing men's dependence on women for sex. Internet pornography is one thing, but sexbots and VR will be the next big steps.

Hence, the family unit collapses, along with the birth rate. And then our society.

We're the canary in the coal mine that is third wave feminism, and the rest of the world is calmly watching us suffocate.

Sincerely,
Thomas Hobbes

Read More: Why Is Rebecca Sparrow Attacking Young Moms For Staying Slim and Pretty?

Thomas Hobbes

Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Does Ancient Muslim Wisdom Have Answers To Modern Western Problems?

December 19, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Western civilization was not the only producer of wisdom. I stumbled upon some useful Islamic quotes, many of which are from Ali ibn Abi Talib, the leader of the Islamic caliphate from 656-661 AD and cousin of the Prophet.

Addiction

> The slave of the lust is humiliated more than the slave of enslavement.
>
> […]
>
> O slaves of desires, cut them short because he who leans on the world gets nothing out of it except the pain of hardships. O people, take charge of the training of your own souls and turn them away from the addiction to their habits. (Iman Ali)

Greed

> Greed takes a person to the watering place but gets him back without letting him drink. It undertakes responsibility but does not fulfil it. Often the drinker gets choked before the quenching of his thirst. The greater the worth of a thing yearned for the greater is the grief for its loss. Desires blind the eyes of understanding. The destined share will reach him who does not approach it. (Iman Ali)

Sex differences

> ‘The good characteristics of women are the bad characteristics of men: pride, cowardice and stinginess. If a woman has pride she will not allow herself to be taken advantage of; if she is stingy she will guard her wealth and her spouse’s wealth; and if she is cowardly she will be cautious of everything that confronts her.’ (Iman Ali)

Obeying

> Obeying women is the ultimate ignorance.
>
> […]
>
> Obeying desire corrupts the mind. (Iman Ali)

Self-control

> It is the duty of a king to manage his own self before his army. (Iman Ali)

Sexual pleasure

> Beware of too much passion for women and being seduced by the sweet temptations of this world, for passion for women is trying and being seduced by worldly temptations is humiliating. (Iman Ali)

A good life

> Three things spoil one’s lifestyle an oppressive ruler, a bad neighbour, and a loathsome wife. (Iman Ali)

Five essentials of life

> “There are five things which if one were to lose just one of them it would render his life incomplete, his intellect short-lived, and his heart preoccupied. The first of these is health of the body; the second is security; the third is ample sustenance; the fourth is a compatible companion.”
>
> [The narrator says], “What is a compatible companion?”
>
> “The virtuous wife, the virtuous son and the virtuous friend. And the fifth one, which sums up these four things, is mild-temperedness.” (Imam al-Sadiq)

Marriage

> There is no institution in Islam more beloved and dearer to Allah than marriage. (The Prophet)

Virgins

> ‘The archangel Gabriel descended to the Prophet (SAWA) and told him, ‘O

> Muhammad, verily your Lord extends salutations on you and says, ‘Verify the virgins from among your women are as fruits on a tree, which when they ripen must be plucked otherwise the sun rots them and the wind alters them. So when young women reach marriageable age, they have no other recourse apart from husbands, otherwise they will not be safe from corruption.’ (Iman al-Rida)

A suitable wife

> He who marries a woman solely for her beauty will not find anything he likes in her, he who marries her for her wealth will be deprived of it as soon as he marries her, so look to marry women of faith.
>
> […]
>
> The beauty of a woman’s faith must be given priority over the beauty of her face. (The Prophet)

An evil woman

> ‘Beware of the verdure growing in manure.’ When asked what verdure growing in manure was, he replied, ‘It is the beautiful woman that comes from an evil environment.’ (The Prophet)

Happy husband

> Woe unto the woman who angers her husband, and blessed is the woman whose husband is pleased with her.
>
> […]
>
> If I was in a position to command anyone to prostrate in front of anyone else, I would command the woman to prostrate in front of her husband. (The Prophet)

Husband’s duty

> The right of a woman on her husband is that he feeds her, clothes her, and does not cause her to lose face [by insulting her or chiding her].
>
> […]
>
> Verily the man who lifts a morsel of food to his wife’s mouth is well rewarded (The Prophet)

A woman’s jihad

> The sacred war (jihad) of a woman is to be of excellent service to her husband. (Iman al-Kazim)

Marital mistreatment

> If a man has a wife who mistreats him, Allah does not accept her daily prayer, nor any other good deed she performs, even if she was to fast all her life, until and > unless she relieves him and pleases him…and the husband will bear the same burden and punishment if he mistreats or oppresses his wife. (The Prophet)

Cursed woman

> Cursed! Cursed indeed is the woman who troubles and distresses her husband; and blessed! Blessed indeed is the woman who honours her husband, does not trouble him and obeys him in all matters. (Iman al-Sadiq)

Cursed man

> Every man who is controlled by his wife is indeed cursed. (Iman Ali)

Nobility

> Habituate yourself to performing noble deeds and tolerate the burdens of losses, and your self will be noble. (Iman Ali)

Knowledge

> O Kumail, no doubt these hearts (i.e. minds) are containers, and the best of them are those who retain most. Remember from me what I say; people are of three categories: the learned men (of piety), the students on the path of salvation, and (the third one) the riffraff of the society, following every croak of the crows, bending as the wind blows; never benefiting from the light of knowledge, nor finding a refuge with a strong supporter.
>
> […]
>
> O Kumail, dividend from wealth disappears with its loss, O Kumail, the hoarders of wealth have died, while the learned men exist for ever; their bodies have disappeared but their teachings and wisdom are ingrained in the hearts. (Iman Ali)

Ownership

> Asceticism (Zuhd) is not that you should not own anything, but that nothing should own you. (Iman Ali)

Learning

> It is incumbent upon the knowledgeable man to act upon what he knows, and then to seek to learn that which he does not know. (Iman Ali)

While many of us here do not agree with the sometimes violent spread of Islam to European lands, their views on the sexes and marriage fully account for the true nature of women that we're all too aware of.

Islamists understand that a woman can become feral if not constrained by a strong patriarch in the home. When a culture fails to incorporate this understanding, the result is what we have in the modern West, of women who trade having a healthy family to become degenerates and sterile freakshows. Islam is not without its problems, but if their higher birth rates are of any indication, their gender strategies should be duplicated to some degree in the West.

Read Next: Women Must Have Their Behavior And Decisions Controlled By Men

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Predictions For Our Dystopian Future

December 20, 2015 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

As much as I would like to be optimistic that the current social order will soon crumble and give way to a return to patriarchy, traditionalism, and masculine virtues, I think that unfortunately the pendulum will continue to swing even further to the left before it starts to swing back.

I'm reminded of that scene from The Simpsons where Police Chief Wiggum gets his tie caught in the hot dog rolling machine at the Kwik-E-Mart and says, "This is going to get worse before it gets better."

The key to being a good futurist is being able to entertain scenarios that one doesn't necessarily want to see come to pass. Sound prognostication is based on the ability to divest oneself from the matter at hand and deal with issues in an objective and impersonal manner. It also becomes increasingly difficult to accurately anticipate trends the further out one looks.

Predictions about what life will be like 100 years in the future are almost always comically wrong. Consequently, I constrain myself in this article to events that I think will come to pass in the near future. Here then are five predictions for what I think we will see in the United States in the next decade or two.

1. There will be a large increase in the number of male-to-female (M2F) transsexuals.

We will see a dramatic uptick in the number of males undergoing sexual reassignment surgery. Those who are young boys now will have grown up marinating in a culture that is openly anti-male. They will have grown up seeing the adoration bestowed upon women by society for no other reason than for being women. They will not have failed to notice the countless free passes and dispensations given to women.

This has, in fact, been offered as an explanation for what motivated Bruce Jenner to become Caitlyn: he envied how the media lavished attention on his daughters and step daughters while his Olympic triumphs were long forgotten and no longer meant anything to the world. It's natural to want to be on the winning team. Why not play for the team that starts off with a huge point advantage, doesn't get called on fouls or for traveling, and scores 10 points per basket to your 1?

Moreover, massive immigration that consists overwhelmingly of young assertive males who can use the muh culture excuse for any inappropriately forward or lascivious behavior will make competition for existing women even fiercer. It will be seen as much easier to be a woman than to get a woman.

There's actually a precedent for this in nature: when female parrotfish are kept in a single-sex environment with no males, the largest and most dominant female parrotfish spontaneously change gender and become male. Also, it's well established that some males will assume a female role when confined to a single sex environment for an extended period of time, e.g., mariners and prisoners.

2. More spree killers

While some frustrated young men will ease their sexual frustration and social isolation by gender bending, others will lash out violently against the society from which they feel alienated and blame for their lack of happiness. Expect more Breiviks, Chos, Klebolds, Lanzas, Rogers, and Roofs. Growing frustration, rage, and despair will drive more young men to seek revenge against real or perceived injustices.

Inability to get a girlfriend was explicitly mentioned as a primary motivation in Elliot Rodger and Chris Harper-Mercer's rampage killings. But not a single spree killer of the past 15 years was known to have been in a physical relationship with a woman. Most – if not all – were virgins. One of the Columbine shooters, Eric Harris, even mused in his journal, that "maybe I just need to get laid." Spree killings will become increasingly common over the next decade or two.

And it will not make any difference if guns are confiscated or outlawed. With the proliferation of drones, those committed to wreaking havoc can do it in far more creative ways than with a gun. I imagine something along the lines of Bill Williamson driving a remote-controlled truck bomb into a police station in Uwe Boll's Rampage.

3. Hillary Clinton will be elected the next President of the United States

Likely, for two terms. She has the support of women, minorities, and a good number of liberal white men. Even if Trump could win the support of all white men, he cannot win the election. The numbers just aren't there. Politicians know that they no longer have to cater to white males. White male voters can no longer decide the outcome of elections. If you secure the female vote, you win. Secure the minority vote as well and it's a landslide victory. It's that simple.

George W. Bush will go down in history as the last straight white man to serve as President of the United States. The first black president will be followed by the first female president, likely followed by the first openly gay president. Look at how Ben Carson pulled ahead of Donald Trump in Idaho in recent polls. Idaho! White men are now seen as unelectable in their own country.

Expect Republicans and Democrats to run opposing black candidates. It will be our black candidate versus their black candidate, sort of like how the Space Race pitted America's German rocket scientists against the Soviet Union's German rocket scientists.

4. The government will crack down on homeschooling

Expect either the outright banning of homeschooling or the enacting of intrusive regulations. Government inspectors may sit in on homeschooling classes to ensure political correctness is observed. They may mandate the teaching of certain doctrines regarding history or gender relations. The system will not allow any young minds to escape indoctrination.

Expect the government to mandate that even home schooled children learn about homosexuality, the oppressive patriarchy, and the evils of white people. Expect curricula to be dictated; for instance, Henrik Ibsen's feminist play, A Doll's House, may become required reading for homeschooled children.

The federal government will intervene under the pretense of protecting children. Expect parents who homeschool their children to be derided as reactionaries with questionable motives and even labeled mentally abusive. It's no coincidence that the only country in the world (Sweden) to ban homeschooling is also the most ideologically suicidal and the most culturally self-loathing.

5. Employers will be forced to pay for female workers to freeze their eggs

As women continue to be installed in top positions in government, academia, and the corporate world, expect the next push to be for mandatory coverage of egg freezing procedures. Silicon Valley companies like Facebook and Apple are already offering their female employees these services free of charge so they may focus on climbing the corporate ladder rather than heeding their ticking biological clock.

We've recently seen how employers were forced to cover birth control for their female employees. Birth control is a lifestyle choice. No one is forcing women to engage in sexual activity. Yet employers are required to pay for it just the same.

With subsidized egg freezing allowing more and more women to postpone motherhood into their 30s and 40s, expect a concomitant rise in the number of sickly children. Expect more autistics and aspies. The incidence of autism will continue to rise. From 1 in 500 in 1950 to 1 in 250 in 1990 to 1 in 50 today to 1 in 10 or worse in 10 to 15 years. Having healthy children will become an increasing rarity.

Conclusion

My intention in writing this article is not to cause ROK readers further lamentation or despair. But hoping that the future will somehow miraculously improve is naive and downright dangerous. It's like hoping that a listing ship will suddenly right itself in the middle of a raging storm.

Read More: One Historian's Dystopian Vision Of Our Near Future

Waldemar Pabst
29 year old academic, right of reactionary

12 Ways Dads Can Stay Lean And Muscular Year Round

December 20, 2015 | by Demmy James | Link | Original Link

It’s easy to become a father. It’s hard to be a dad, to help your children grow strong and healthy while taking care of yourself. Being a good dad takes a tremendous amount of time and energy, and sometimes at the end of the day, you don’t have any time and energy left for you.

Great dads keep themselves strong and healthy. When it comes to getting and staying muscular and lean, there are plenty of ways to do it, while staying present for your kids.

1. Keep It Lean With The Kids

Get your kids away from the TV or their phones and go be active together. Find a few hours on a weekend to check out places like outdoor themed parks for zip-lining and hiking, or spend a few hours at public swimming pools or local parks.

Make plans to do something with other families. The accountability of plans made with other people will help you stick to getting out of the house on time.

2. Keep Adventuring

If you want a real adventure, download the free version of the Geocaching app to your phone and go for a treasure hunt! It's really a treasure hunt, and you can do it anywhere in the world—there are even several geocaches on the continent of Antarctica. There are probably some within a mile of your house. The thrill of finding a geocache becomes addictive, and it may turn out to be the active new hobby your family needs.

3. Keep It Colorful

Every parenting book tells you to make sure your children are getting a variety of whole foods, fruits, and vegetables, but what about you? When you think of meal planning: think color. And for Pete's sake, eat breakfast! For a quick protein-rich breakfast, go with a microwave omelet or some scrambled eggs and add pre-chopped veggies like tomatoes, avocado, peppers or spinach.

4. Keep Up With Your Macronutrients

Take some time and figure out the macronutrient ratios[1] that can help you balance your meals more easily. It’s a great way to lose weight, build muscle, and maintain your weight loss, especially if you’ve plateaued.

5. Keep Drinking Water

Soft drinks taste great, but they’re not doing you any favors. Stop drinking your calories, and you’ll find that you can meet your weight loss goals faster. You’re already encouraging your kids to drink water, so set a good example. Add fresh sliced cucumbers, strawberries, oranges, lemons or limes to water to add a little zing, which will also help fight food cravings.

6. Keep Track of Your Alcohol

Craft beer is delicious, and it contributes to the spare tire many Dad Bods sport. While beer has a lot of carbs, clear liquors don't—but any added mixers contribute calories and sugar. Choose a lighter carb beer or glass of wine.

If you're an unwind with a cocktail kind of guy, resist the urge to mix with juices and try mixing flavored vodka and soda or sparkling water instead. And whatever you are planning to have, try to prevent hangovers at any cost.

7. Keep Eating Lean Protein

When meal planning, opt for lean protein like chicken and turkey. Tuna, salmon, tilapia, cod, are all great lean protein options. Red meat is okay to include sometimes, if you choose the leaner cuts of meat and opt for grass-feed beef.

8. Keep Getting The Family Involved

This isn't a one-man show. Surround yourself with little minions of health by encouraging family meal planning, and cooking together on nights when your schedules allow it. Or discover great recipes for healthy snacks, such as homemade protein bars.

9. Keep Making Healthy Choices

"Abs are made in the gym, but revealed in the kitchen."[2] To get and stay lean and muscular, it requires diligence to stay on track with healthy meal choices and carving out time for being active. Set alarms to remind you to stop what you're doing and drink a full glass of water, to do 20 pushups or 50 jumping jacks.

Small increments always add up to a whole. Committing to an entire hour of working out in the morning is hard. Committing to 25 crunches is easy.

10. Keep Feeling Supported

There's no way you'll stick to a plan for getting lean and muscular unless you know you have support and accountability. Find websites and forums for people you identify with and then feel free to share your ideas with like-minded users. You may discover a new potential and, source of motivation!

11. Keep It Fast When You Don’t Have Time

Some days, the plan is going to go out the window. If you can’t make it to a gym, try a fast, full-body, fat-burning workout. Turn your favourite workout music on and you can improvise by combining any kind of body-weight fitness moves you can think of.

How about a quick circuit of pushups, bicycle crunches, burpees, lunches, squats and high knee jumps? That’ll get your heart racing.

12. Keep Away From Quick Fixes

Your Dad Bod didn’t happen overnight, and the fix isn’t going to be found in a pill or a special supplement or in a bottle. Focus on taking each small step, and making it count. It’s just like when you helped your baby learn to walk. It’s just one foot in front of the other. Sometimes you fall down, but the important thing is you get back up again.

What’s one small step you can take right now?

1. com,. ‘Free Bodybuilding Macronutrient Calculator’. N.p., 2015. Web. 1 Nov. 2015.
2. org,. ‘Understanding Why Abs Are Made In The Gym But Revealed In The Kitchen’. N.p., 2013. Web. 1 Nov. 2015.

Read More: 3 Ways To Make Better New Year’s Resolutions

Demmy James

Demmy James is a fitness buff as well as a strength and conditioning specialist. He is also a content contributor for Muscle&Strength.

Why Star Wars: The Force Awakens Is A Social Justice Propaganda Film

December 20, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> …you look around that room and you see the whitest fucking room in the history of time. It's just unbelievably white. And I just thought, we're casting this show and we have an opportunity to do anything we want, why not cast the show with actors of color?
>
> — JJ Abrams revealing how he chose actors for the color of their skin, not for who he thought were the best actors or actresses. These preferences flowed into gender as well.

Spread my warning across the galaxy, Padawans.

The Force Awakens is spectacularly replete with the handiwork of the avowed Social Justice Warrior JJ Abrams. So where can I possibly start in my criticisms? From the casting, which puts minorities and women incessantly and ridiculously in your face to make a political point (not tell a story), to the laziest of all space battles, the problems with the Episode 7 are more than numerous.

Let's make no mistake: Abrams is a capable filmmaker, when he wants to be. Parts with General Hux, especially his speech and the destruction of the Hosnian system, are glorious. The visuals, not just those with CGI, are stunning. Abrams' mission, though, is to distract viewers with impressive scenes and some chunks of capably written dialogue so as to implant his take on "girl power" and safe spaces for non-whites.

The Mary Sue of all Mary Sues

Is there anything she can't do after reading a third wave feminist tract?

The female Rey, who it is heavily implied is Luke's daughter, is the most underdeveloped character yet in over 14 hours of Star Wars films. Her story arc is practically-speaking non-existent and only the veneer of her sadness about her family leaving her on Jakku is painted over it. Whereas with other major Force-wielders in the series their abilities have previously developed or are developed over years, Rey seemingly does it in less than 12 seconds, rather than parsecs. Her whole trajectory in the film reeks of "god mode", which for non-gamers like myself refers to the cheat codes that make a game character invincible.

Big question: did she fart in the wind on Jakku and the blowback from the desert winds grew her Force powers to monolithic proportions? That's the only possible explanation.

In the case of Anakin Skywalker in the prequels, by contrast, we learn that he is the only human pilot to engage in pod racing. His mechanical know-how has been honed over some years, culminating in his construction of both his own pad racer and the droid C-3PO. And when he destroys the droid control ship above Naboo, it is largely as a result of his good fortune, not just long-acquired skill. A decade later and with continuous training, he additionally fails to best Count Dooku on Geonosis.

Two hours into the first film, with no training, Rey beats Kylo Ren. Four hours into the original trilogy, and with the training of Ben Kenobi and Yoda, Luke loses his right hand. Go girls!

Cast your mind back to the original trilogy, too. Aside from a little kid's play with his father's lightsaber at Ben Kenobi's hermit pad and onboard the Millennium Falcon, Luke does not wield the weapon at all in A New Hope, let alone in combat against the likes of a Vader. He does destroy the Death Star as a very novice X-wing pilot, but this is after years of him taking out his stuck-on-bloody-Tatooine frustrations on womp rats in his T-16. Moreover, Luke would have been burnt space toast without the intervention of Han Solo and the Falcon. Oh, and in The Empire Strikes Back, after the tutelage of Yoda, he still gets his hand cleaved off by Vader.

So I am meant to believe that Rey could savage and nearly kill her presumed cousin Kylo Ren, whether he is injured or not? Ren is not yet a Vader in his powers. That much is clear. But this is the man who helped slaughter, as a boy or teenager, basically all of the talented pupils of Luke Skywalker. Luke then disappears and Kylo Ren is given more or less free rein, only to be wounded once by Chewbacca's crossbow, once by apparently non-Force-sensitive Finn ("This is for slavery, whitey!") and three times by Rey ("Fuck the patriarchy!"). Fuck off—that's a plot fueled by meth.

To boot, Rey's piloting and mechanical skills, to the point of knowing everything, is mind-boggingly "get more women in STEM" in its motivations. When she starts teaching Han Solo about the Falcon, things become breathtakingly contrived. It's as if Abrams was paid by a female science scholarship foundation to drum up some public service announcements via film.

The plot is IQ-damagingly dumb

They put twenty times more effort into the parade than organizing the base defenses. And they didn't learn from either the first or second Death Star debacles. Or Abrams and his writing team were too busy making Rey a goddess.

I take no issue with some of the artistic license Abrams uses in The Force Awakens. How the First Order managed to create a sun-sucking super weapon on a preexisting ice planet can be explained one day by some talented PhD graduate from the University of Coruscant. So, too, can the appearance of the Starkiller's death beams and the destruction of the Hosnian system in the sky above far removed Takodana.

What matters, though, is the plot. Scientific ambiguities and inaccuracies can be tolerated if the story functions. But it's entirely lacking here. For a start, the film borrows from or plain copies so many elements of A New Hope that I lost count. A non-exhaustive list would include a girl being held captive at the flagship facility of a military junta, a space battle to prevent the noble guerrillas' base from being obliterated, and the death of an older character just as the younger infiltrators are about to leave for home. For the sake of free words, I cannot mention them all.

Beyond just the formulaic plot, here are a few of the frankly stupid elements of the story:

- Finn just happens to be an ex-sanitation worked at Starkiller Base, in a galaxy where the First Order forces are now so numerous and powerful that the New Republic has to use the Resistance as a weak proxy to fight it. So he knows where to find the oscillator, which will destabilize and then obliterate the planet if destroyed. Makes perfect sense!
- Both in its size and complexity, Starkiller Base makes the two Death Stars look like plasticine renderings. Yet there is no fleet to protect it? And a paucity of very ineffective turbolaser batteries and TIE fighter squadrons? A Resistance member at their headquarters light years away mentions them losing half their X-wings during the battle, as if that was so hard when they launched about, um, three and a half of them.

- The amazingly overblown female character Captain Phasma is held at gunpoint and forced to lower Starkiller Base's shields. These shields can be lowered so easily and without the immediate knowledge of General Hux or someone else? Oh, please, spare me.
- Han Solo exits hyperspace no more than a few hundred metres from the surface of the Starkiller planet. And he announces it with "Now!" Hooray! Base infiltrated with common sense!
- Finn is likeable but nevertheless a glorified white knight. Trained from just after birth to be a fighting machine, he does nothing relative to Rey and devotes the whole film to trying to protect her.

Tick the boxes with plenty of female and non-white characters

Game of Thrones' Jessica Henwick was a cast a female X-wing pilot. Again, cast for her race and gender.

You can sniff out Abrams' leanings from the start. As First Order troopships prepare to land to take out a village on Jakku, the first villager who pulls out a a blaster in defense is a woman. And it is some sort of big, mounted-looking one! This girl power is really paralleled in our world, where millions of young Western girls are so keen to protect their village or country that they won't even join up, as their male contemporaries are forced to, in places like Finland and South Korea during peacetime. Or make the slightest squeak about the double standard. Well done, JJ.

Captain Phasma is given command of the First Order's elite stormtroopers but she has the same biology as in our world, where no woman has ever passed the Marine Corps' Infantry Officer Course. Another female stormtrooper reports to Ren about the failed attempt to locate Rey. And, after years of pretty much male-only recruitment, the New Republic's affirmative action policies have been copied by the First Order, with large numbers of female military panel operators, technicians and officers.

The same goes for the racial choices. Insert a token female Asian and black male pilot. Black and Asian pilots were actually first done long ago (in Return of the Jedi) but JJ needs more, more, more! All while the plot suffers. Funny how an overwhelmingly male military combat force in a film is considered "unrealistic" when it is almost a carbon copy of our own reality in 2015.

Do not watch this film (at least by paying)

Pretty much sums it up.

Somebody has to watch it and for ROK that person is me. Our proprietor Roosh has refused to and all power to him and anyone else who has abstained. It helps when a limited few of us view it, to pick it apart piece by piece. An understanding of how entertainment is being used to propagandise acceptable social narratives is important.

It's laughable how critics can butcher the revelation in the prequels that the Force is just the interaction of symbiotic organisms called midi-chlorians and other living things but laud The Force Awakens as a piece of sophisticated, "progressive" filmmaking. Some outlets have even resorted to naming and implicitly shaming critics who disliked this new addition. For a good parody of the pro-SJW obsessions of The Force Awakens, see Steven Crowder's recent takedown.

For the time being, when it comes to deciding whether to see this film, take evasive action. It's a trap.

Read More: Did The New Star Wars Casting Have A Racial Agenda?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

38 Pictures That Show The Decline Of America Since The 1950s

December 21, 2015 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Although not so much now, I used to enjoy watching films from the past as a way of traveling through time to watch people and culture from different eras. And of all the decades, America in the 1950s always struck me as a time of stability, decency, and optimism. It is also quite refreshing to watch feminine and classy women who were around just few generations ago.

Of course, the reality wasn't as rosy as what is shown in the films. As with all other decades, America faced number of problems with the issue of race and the Cold War being notable examples. That said, I don't think any era was ever "perfect" or great for everyone and I don't think there ever will be such thing.

So, without getting too caught up in nostalgia, I think the 1950s stands as a prime example of how stability and prosperity, in combination with traditional family values, can facilitate a harmonious society. And the following pictures and graphs will show just how quickly things can change when the government and subversive social elements decide to alter the existing order by experimenting with ideas of 'equality' and using the citizens as objects for profit.

Family

A nuclear family is the most basic unit of a healthy society and the 1950s was the last time America as a whole witnessed stable family units.

AllPosters

Women back then were happy being wives and mothers unlike the hags today who are slaving away in cubicles.

You can criticize anything else about the 50s, but it is hard to argue against the quality of family life back then.

Marriage, however, has been experiencing a rapid decline since.

Why such decline you wonder? See below.

It's inevitable for marriage to suffer and the sexes to become antagonized when women decide to abandon family life for careers. It may have seemed like a good idea at the time, but as they say, the rest is history.

Life

People in the 50s lived simple and happy lives where they enjoyed actual face-to-face interactions. There was no need for superficial online status comparisons. Other human beings were people to interact with and not just sources of validation to get "likes" from.

SUPPLEE
ICE CREAM

Crime And Safety

The 50s experienced an extremely low crime rate to a point where families didn’t feel the need to lock their doors or windows at night.

Figure 3

The recent drop in violence probably has more to do with the complete emasculation of men starting in the 90s than any improvements in society.

The rise of prison nation.

Parents felt safe enough to allow their children to play outside.

Rape rate was lowest when women were being ‘oppressed’ by the patriarchy, only to shoot up with the rise of feminism. Coincidence?

I’m sure feminists will just argue that all sex was rape back in the day.

Women

Women back then were thin, healthy, and feminine without the trashy tattoos and piercings you see today.

LIFE

TWA

But of course, it was the 1950s that gave birth to the fast food culture with disastrous consequences for American health and beauty.

Maybe they need to do more chores around the house instead of sitting at a desk job.

And perhaps more importantly, women were happy being women because they didn't have to constantly lie to themselves that they were happier with a career.

Today, many women rely on antidepressants just to function on a daily basis without breaking down. Is that really what feminists fought so hard to achieve?

The rise of antidepressants. American women today are miserable and mentally ill thanks to feminism forcing them to juggle work and family life. About 1 in 4 are currently on psychiatric drugs.

Health

Besides obesity and depression which I've already mentioned above, American health has been in steady decline since the end of 1950s.

If the trend continues, 1 out of every 3 Americans are expected suffer from diabetes by 2050.

National health expenditure, as a consequence, has been growing like a tumour.

What’s shocking is how fast children’s health have been declining in the past couple of decades.

These children didn’t needed to be ‘cured’ of ADHD.

I wonder if the sudden rise of learning disorders has anything to do with the fact that women are delaying marriage as much as possible for their careers?

This is only for Down syndrome, but I wouldn't be surprised if it were true with many other developmental disorders.

Dating

Dating and forming relationships were simple back in the day without the need to play games.

Many men today fare poorly when it comes to dating because they interact with women as if it’s still the 1950s. It’s also ironic how many male feminists claim to respect women based on values that were formed back in patriarchal times. Sorry to burst your bubbles chumps, but your chivalry doesn’t work today.

Economy

United States during this time was at the peak of its economical dominance in the world, representing about a third of the entire world’s economy.

Then they decided that it would be great to flood the job market with women so that wages could stay low.

As you can see, male employment has been plummeting since the 50s. When you disenfranchise those who are the backbone of your society and take away any incentive for them to marry and raise a family, you can be sure that everything else will start to fall apart.

Welfare = Single Mothers = Children Without Fathers = Increased Crime and Social Decadence.

Interestingly, taxes on the rich were at its highest during this era.

Conclusion

America has been decaying rapidly since the 1950s with almost every aspect of society failing—and things are only about to get even worse. While this is a showcase of how good things can be lost so easily, it is also a demonstration of what can be possible under a patriarchal order with proper social values.

While things may seem impossible to change at the moment, remember that history has always been full of unanticipated events that quickly turned things around to transform the society at large. Think of how much China has recovered (and now thriving) since their devastating Communist past from just a few decades ago.

Anything is possible, you just need to be ready for it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: 40 Pictures That Show The Decline Of American Women

[image]
Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

The Ethic Of The Surveillance State

December 21, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

On October 25, 2015, the BBC reported that the Chinese government was establishing a "social credit" system (called Sesame Credit) that would attempt to "rate" a citizen's "trustworthiness." While the system is not entirely operational, the groundwork is already being laid by using commercial companies as social Petri dishes:

> Details on the inner workings of the system are vague, though it is clear that each citizen and Chinese organisation will be rated. A long list of people in certain professions will face particular scrutiny, including teachers, accountants, journalists and medical doctors. The special list even includes veterinarians and tour guides…
>
> A national database will merge a wide variety of information on every citizen, assessing whether taxes and traffic tickets have been paid, whether academic degrees have been rightly earned and even, it seems, whether females have been instructed to take birth control.

Although such systems sound wonderful in theory, it is capabilities that matter, not intentions. Every system of oppression and control masks its power with talk about how it is keeping us secure and safe.

Why is this system a threat to individualism and persona liberty? Because it steers everyone towards a stultifying conformity. If everyone's value is dependent on how well they conform to what the establishment says is good, then innovation would slow to a halt. Very often, it is the outsider, the misfit, and the wayward genius who acts as the creative catalyst for positive change. This new surveillance and rating system cannot help but discourage innovative thinking and acting.

China has a long history of Confucian tradition, which arguably elevates obedience and social harmony over all other virtues. People were traditionally encouraged to obey the example of their ancestors, their parents, their local notables, and ultimately the emperor.

Some of this, of course, is a good thing: social stability must to some extent depend on a conservative continuity of tradition. But innovation matters as well; and when one is afraid to do anything for fear of social reprisal, innovation creeps to a halt.

An enervating stagnation sets in, and a blissful sense of one's own superiority. Many volumes have been written to answer the question of why China stagnated and fell so far behind the West after producing so much innovation during the medieval period. The short answer, I believe, is to be found in a social system that valued conformity over creativity.

The stifling effect of conformity

Other societies have suffered from the same disease, and settled into a long period of stagnation. In the Islamic world, there was a time after the advent of the philosophers Averroes (Ibn Rushd) and Avicenna (Ibn Sina) when it seemed as if a real revolution in critical thinking might take place against theological orthodoxy. Scientists and scholars in Islam had produced a great deal of innovation and syncretic thought during the early centuries of Islam.

But it was not to last. In Islam, the theologians triumphed over the philosophers. In 1150 the caliph at Baghdad, Mustanjid, ordered the books of these great men to be burned; a similar order was issued in 1194 by the emir at Seville in Andalusian Spain.

Averroes (Ibn Rushd)

Independent thought thereafter was strongly discouraged, and any criticism of theological orthodoxy became dangerous. The result was centuries of stagnation, from which the region has not yet fully emerged.

Are the "social ratings systems" in the West any better? They certainly exist, but are far more embedded and hidden. Social media, the workplace, and the entertainment industry have a silent agreement among themselves to enforce the doctrinal controls mandated from their corporate Mandarins.

Those who stray too far from the bounds of permissible thought are quickly educated on the dangers of independent thought. I was speaking to a friend this weekend who had taken his son to see the new “Star Wars” film. He was literally shocked at what he saw. “The entire film,” he told me “was about indoctrination into political correctness, cultural Marxism, and social engineering. They basically just remade the original film to put women and minorities in all the top roles.”

It was also telling, he continued, that nearly every reviewer had gushed at how great the movie was. “Of course,” I said. “They have to praise these movies. They know that if they don’t toe the party line, they’ll be out of a job.” He then went on to describe how he took his son to an child’s amusement place called Legoland, where entrants are required to pay a $20 entry fee for the privilege of being bombarded with corporate consumerist propaganda.

It all comes back to the surveillance state

The surveillance state exists for a definite purpose. It is there to ensure the compliance and docility of the citizenry. The job of the corporate “citizen” is to be a diligent and reliable consumer, and not to question anything outside the established orthodoxy. Those who perform this function will be hailed as heroes by the mob. Those who do not find out very quickly how much their input is appreciated in the public discourse.

The warnings are there for us to see, if only we have the courage to look. If we combine the power of modern technology with the insatiable need for those in power to enforce conformity, the result will be stagnation and decline. The modern surveillance state has aggregated to itself terrifying power; whether it will use this power responsibly is doubtful.

History suggests that the temptations of power and control will override abstract notions of personal freedom and liberty. The West’s traditions (especially in the United States) of freedom of thought provide some protections, but without the support of enlightened leaders, even these traditions can be tossed aside in the name of security and stability.

Gene Hackman in “The Conversation” (1974)

This theme—the moral implications of the surveillance state–has been dealt with masterfully in Francis Ford Coppola’s 1974 film The Conversation. Gene Hackman plays a detached and repressed surveillance man who seeks nothing more out of life than anonymity. He is suspicious of emotion and emotional attachment.

But in a world of constant surveillance and voyeurism, anonymity is hard to come by, and even harder to maintain. This film was far ahead of its time in anticipating some of the key moral problems of our age: the inescapable presence of the government and large corporations, the sinister implications of cooperation with the system, and the growth of paranoia, whether real or unjustified.

The film's conclusion seems to suggest that it is still possible for a society to preserve the privacy and freedom of its citizens, but only if it is willing to bear the high costs which must inevitably be paid by all of us.

It remains to be seen whether we, as citizens, are willing to bear such costs. The issue becomes, as H.G. Wells once said, a matter of "a race between education and catastrophe."

Read More: These Are The Cards You've Been Dealt

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

What Is The Hegelian Dialectic?

December 21, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A term that kept coming up in my research on modern governments was “Hegelian Dialectic.” I spent some time studying it to understand not only what it was, but how it is being used by the ruling class to manipulate the public into fulfilling a pre-determined agenda.

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel

First described by Enlightenment German philosopher Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, the Hegelian Dialectic is a mechanism to arrive at a final truth or conclusion. Right now you probably use the Aristotelian method for arriving at truth, which is to observe all the facts of the situation and then make the most logical conclusion based from those observations. Hegel explained a process where truth is instead arrived through the friction and conflict between one force (the thesis) and its opposite (the antithesis). The final result from that clash, the synthesis, is the best conclusion.

In all likelihood, the synthesis is not the final and absolute truth. It becomes the new thesis where a new antithesis forms to oppose it. The conflict between them leads to a second synthesis. This process repeats until the final synthesis is revealed, which theoretically is absolute truth.

In plain terms, the Hegelian Dialectic is the battle of two extremes to get a result that is somewhere in the middle. That result will develop an opposing force of its own and the ensuing battle yields another result. The objective reality we have right now has incorporated within it all previous “battles” of thesis and antithesis since the beginning of time, meaning that—according to the theory—we are living in a progressive arc to absolute truth and world perfection.

Examples of thesis and antithesis

Thesis: British and French power hegemony after World War 1
Anti-thesis: Hitler
Synthesis: USA hegemony

Thesis: Traditional conservatism
Anti-thesis: Marxism
Synthesis: Globalism

Thesis: USA government losing domestic power
Anti-thesis: 9/11
Synthesis: Patriot act, NSA spying

Thesis: Feminism

Anti-thesis: PUA, MRA, neomasculinity
Synthesis: ?

The nation dialectic

Hegel proposed his dialectic as a natural way of arriving at the truth, but had in mind that the nation itself was the vehicle to create new syntheses. Like most Enlightenment thinkers, he threw god away and made the nation-state god instead. The modern elite has taken this a step further by pre-determining a synthesis (a specific agenda) and then developing events that arrive at that synthesis through artificial means.

If the elite has a result they would like to have, whether it be increased authoritarian rule or a war that solidifies their power, all they have to do is devise an anti-thesis that will lead to the outcome they want. This is commonly done through false flag attacks, where the government of a nation attacks itself so that it can respond in the way that it had wanted to all along, because it's only through that attack would citizens agree to the planned synthesis. False flag attacks are in fact a common way for governments to fulfill their goals.

Here are two Hegelian loops we may be currently living through:

Problem (thesis): Russia refuses to enter the New World Order
Reaction (anti-thesis): Destabilize Ukraine and Syria, forcing Russia to act aggressively Solution (synthesis): Create pretext for removing Russian leadership and installing Western rulers,

Problem: Nationalism in Europe
Reaction: Allow millions of Afro-Islamists
Solution: Strengthening of United Nations and European Union to "protect" people from social unrest

People use the dialectic in their own lives when trying to solve problems:

Problem: Not receiving enough attention
Reaction: Invent drama, catastrophes, diseases
Solution: Receive attention from family, friends, strangers

What the ruling elite does, and have been doing for centuries, is create reactions which requires solutions they had wanted all along. The reaction (e.g. 9/11) puts citizens in a state of fear and anxiety that allows easily implementation of the solution without resistance. Would Americans have protested the Patriot Act more strongly if 9/11 had never occurred? They'd probably laugh at its proposal, just like how they laughed at George W. Bush's attempts to privatize Social Security at the start of his second term.

Beware of government "solutions"

One way you know the government is using the Hegelian dialectic to fulfill their agenda is when they have a ready-made solution immediately after an event, all without public debate. This is most commonly seen in the United States with gun control, where after every mass shooting, calls for limiting sales of guns are made by the media and government. Strict gun control or outright confiscation is a pre-determined solution in the USA that will certainly be attempted in the future.

> From Nero burning Rome to Hitler burning the Reichstag, power-mad leaders across the decades have manufactured crises in order to present the public with situations where their Police State solutions "make sense".
>
> "Give up your rights — it's for your safety…"
>
> […]
>
> Every major financial crisis America has experienced in her history has followed this same Hegelian dialectic pattern with the outcome being another incremental step toward world financial domination by an elite few. [Source]

A related use of the Hegelian dialectic is to create the appearance of healthy governmental opposition. We see this in the United States where both Democrats and Republicans are two heads of the same body. They create a theater show for the public that two opposing forces are debating and compromising to serve the interests of the nation when they are actually both controlled by the same globalists who donate money to both parties. The cuckservative phenomenon has shown that mainstream conservatives are nearly identical to the left besides a few hot button issues like abortion and religion (they have even converged on homosexual marriage).

> In the West the choice is basically between a controlled 'left-oriented' information, and a controlled 'right-oriented' information. The conflict between the two CONTROLLED groups keeps an apparent informational conflict alive. Unwelcome facts that fall into either camp are conveniently forgotten. Books that > fall into either camp can be effectively neutralized because they will incur the wrath of both ‘right’ and ‘left’. The faster the cattle run, the faster the treadmill takes them to nowhere.

>
> […]
>
> The Hegelian dialectic is being employed to secure and sustain absolute world power and authority to an elite. [Source]
>
> […]
>
> …the Hegelian dialectic requires a thesis and an antithesis, a pro and a con. Are these not absolutes? Is not the very concept of left and right, east and west, black and white, etc., required by the dialectic a confirmation of absolutism itself? [Source]

A reasonably titled policy like “sustainable development” is part of a dialectic to control human behavior and reproduction

It’s effortless to rule when you have citizens programmed to demand the changes that match your agenda:

> The disturbing aspect to Alinsky’s approach for “radical social change” is his belief in the Marxist-Leninist method of always keeping the masses demoralized so they will demand change, or even insist the system be abolished altogether. [Source]

Many of us are already aware of what the elite is doing to society in order to maintain control. The Hegelian dialectic allows us to see how they are doing it, adding an important piece of the puzzle to more easily recognize their authoritarian schemes.

Whenever a crisis occurs that politicians, governments, world organizations like the United Nations, IMF, World Bank, US Fed, or countless other quasi-governmental entities have a solution for, three things are certain:

1. Their solution will not solve the original problem.
2. The problem was possibly created themselves in order to introduce their desired "solution."
3. The engineered process of Problem-Reaction-Solution is reducing your liberty and making you more dependent on the state.

After violent catastrophes and global events, think for a moment to see what their real agenda is based on the reaction by those in power, and consider resisting if you have the strength to do so. To be on the safe side, you can assume that just about any non-local solution by the government is part of a plan to hurt you, and that it will have the opposite stated effect if allowed to be implemented.

Read Next: How America's New Nobility Has Forgotten Its Obligation To The Country

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Sweden Showcases The War Of Two Nationalist Narratives

December 21, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

There is a war going on between two national narratives in Scandinavia and other European countries. In Sweden, the central question is how to define "Swedishness," what it means to be Swedish, and if it's possible to define the term at all. The subject has popped up in debates from time to time, at least in the past fifteen years.

As the big nationalistic party, the Sweden Democrats, has gained more and more support, so has the topic of Swedishness climbed higher on the political and cultural agenda. The recent migrant crisis has pushed nationalistic ideas and parties to the forefront all over Europe. The political polarization seems to increase as more and more migrants enter what was in a not-too-distant past quite homogeneous societies.

Exclusive vs. inclusive

The two narratives are both nationalistic in the sense that they attempt to define what the particular nation is, what it stands for and how it differs from other nations. They are mutually exclusive, with one being excluding and the other being including. One focuses on the historical and cultural roots of the nation, the other advocates immigration and multiculturalism.

While normally we attribute the first to the political right and the other to the left, the distinction is not always that simple to make. The nationalistic Sweden Democrats is now the biggest party among working class voters, taking the place held for so long by the Social Democrats. Blue-collar workers have shown themselves to be surprisingly conservative.

Jimmie Åkesson's nationalistic party, the Sweden Democrats, seems bound to become the biggest party in Sweden.

Proponents of inclusive nationalism say Sweden should be a country of openness and tolerance. Another word they like to use is solidarity, meaning that the affluent Swedes must aid the people who suffer around the world. As the world becomes increasingly globalized, the socialist idea of caring for the weak and downtrodden in society is being applied also to people living beyond the Swedish borders.

In the US, some say that America is a nation of immigrants. Therefore it's un-American to be against immigration in any way. It's nonsense, of course, since the mostly European migrants that made America what it is today arrived a long time ago. In Sweden it would be even more nonsensical for someone to claim such a thing, so no one does.

But they present other reasons for why immigration is such an important aspect of Swedishness. It's morally wrong to keep people out who have done nothing wrong. And not helping someone you know is suffering is even worse. It's thoroughly un-Swedish to be selfish at all.

Everything can be Swedish

But what's also significant in this inclusive narrative is the idea that Swedishness is constantly changing and infinitely malleable, like a pot of clay that will never solidify. That means whatever people do or think within the Swedish borders is what constitutes Swedishness. Since Swedishness is in transition, the very proposition that there exists a particular Swedish ethnicity that can be preserved over time is met with accusations of racism and xenophobia. It's seen as a dog whistle for white supremacists. After all, if a black person moves to Sweden, being black is also included in the definition of Swedishness.

The other national narrative, the one which some would call exclusive, see the clay pot of Swedishness as solid but fragile. It must be kept protected lest it will break and disappear, its fragments being discovered years from now by archaeologists and examined as remains of a long-lost culture.

That is why you'll hear some of these nationalists proclaiming "Sweden for the Swedes!" In the end, it's a matter of survival. And who can blame someone who's proud of his heritage for wanting to pass it on to future generations?

A Swedish ethnicity actually exists, say proponents of exclusive nationalism. It consists of components like a common language, religion, traditions, values etc. It's what Swedes are used to and something they don't even notice until they encounter cultures that are far different.

And that leads into another point—multiculturalism doesn't work. Different peoples will experience difficulties in cohabiting the same country. A better solution would be that every ethnicity had its own state in which people who share the same culture can live together. A society like that would be more stable than one with a mix of peoples who don't trust or understand each other, and whose goals are opposing.

Flawed but growing

Marine Le Pen's National Front won in six of mainland France's twelve regions in the first round of the recent elections.

Both types of nationalism have their flaws. The exclusive kind, inevitably isolationist to some extent, seems out of touch with the current globalizing trend where communication, relationships and trade become globally integrated. Minorities also tend to be treated badly in these kinds of societies. The wars and genocides of the 20th century are reminders of what can happen when one ethnic group claims superiority and hegemony over others.

In the case of inclusive nationalism, on the other hand, there is a naive and unrealistic notion that people from different cultures will get along fine. Instances of terrorism and the failure of integrating immigrants into Western societies showcase the difficulties at hand. It is also common in multicultural societies that minorities receive privileges and are treated as protected groups, while the dominant group is denied equal rights. Hate speech laws practically forbid any utterance that might offend groups deemed "oppressed."

Borders are trending once again

One thing is for certain: nationalism will not die out any time soon. These days, exclusive nationalism seems to be gaining ground all over the map. It is and will continue to be fueled by the migrant crisis for as long as it lasts. Borders are being erected once again between the European countries, and the discontent with the EU is growing. Soon the British might decide to leave the union, and if they do, others might follow.

Even if the flood of immigrants can be halted, many of them have already come, and their presence will be a strain on the national economy as well as the relationship between groups of citizens. The "Old Swedes" will see their country changed by the "New Swedes" and doubt if it's for the better.

Balkanization will make natives turn to the exclusive type of nationalism for security, as they see the social cohesion of their formerly homogeneous country deteriorate. Inclusive nationalism will receive pushback as its flaws become all too apparent.

Read More: The Final Verdict On Swedish Girls

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

Why You Should Avoid Women Who Complain About Their Health

December 22, 2015 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

Many years ago I earned my flight and ground instructor certificates, and one of the subjects I was required to study were the "Fundamentals of Instruction," or FOI for short. The FOI is one of the many written examinations prospective instructors must pass in order to receive their credentials, and it's based on the principles outlined in the FAA's Aviation Instructor's Handbook. It essentially boils down to a synopsis of basic psychology, proper teaching techniques, and understanding how people learn and absorb information.

One of the focal points covered in the FOI were the "Levels of Learning," and what they entail are the steps one must go through in order to achieve a certain level of mastery over of a particular subject or theme. They are the following:

1. Rote
2. Understanding
3. Application
4. Correlation

Rote is the level of learning most people have about a given subject, especially when the subject is uninteresting or has very little relevance in the real world. How one might approach an extraneous college course that is compulsory for fulfilling a degree requirement is a good example: a person studies some nugatory information, makes a half-assed attempt to devote it to memory, regurgitates it for an exam, and then quickly forgets about it once its utility has been exhausted.

Understanding is what happens when you combine fascinating subject matter with giving a shit. You can see the information being presented in the rote stage has some merit to it, and therefore a concerted effort will be made to extract as much knowledge from the material as practicable. Pieces start coming together, things begin to “click,” and a clearer picture begins to emerge at this stage.

Application is when you get your feet wet and put your new found knowledge into practical use. You implement the prescribed theories and principles, try things out, and experiment. You take the useful components that apply to you and what you want to accomplish, and you discard the non-essential bits that do little or nothing to aid you in your goals.

Correlation is when an advanced level of comprehension is attained—everything comes into focus and you truly “get it.” And not only do you “get it,” but you understand how the knowledge procured has both mobility and relevance in closely related spheres. You have a clear grasp of the “big picture” at this final stage. However, it’s important to note that correlation must be continually built upon and expanded. One should never operate under the misapprehension that they know it all.

How it could save your life

The reason I bring all of this up is because the majority of men reading this red flag series will fall into one of two categories: those who have plenty of application with minimal understanding, and those who have plenty of understanding but little to no application.

The men who have dated a lot or have previous long term relationships know firsthand what happens when one has no understanding of female nature. These men know the feeling of pain; they know the feeling of agony and confusion one experiences if they aren’t discerning when it comes to choosing a decent mate. They are fully aware of how a woman can make a man pay dearly if he allows ignorance or idealism to obscure reality.

These men will gain the most from this series: they will have moments of clarity when things that were previously obfuscated by inexperience (or denial) become crystal clear through reading. Understanding and correlation will be acquired by these men simply from exposure to the information being presented.

It’s the second group of men that concerns me the most. These men—by and large—have their heads screwed on straight and have a great deal of rudimentary knowledge when it comes to females and their idiosyncrasies. Perhaps these men are shy or still working on self improvement to get their confidence up to snuff before getting their feet wet in the dating world. Regardless, they've done a lot of reading and possess a firm understanding of how things operate with women from a theoretical standpoint—they just don't interact with women to apply any of it.

Once you do finally decide to step out into the world and begin applying what you've learned, you will have many "Aha!" moments when things instantly come together upon your exposure to them. And what I'm trying my damnedest to emphasize here is that once those moments of exposure come to fruition—and they will, I assure you—that you don't fucking shrug them off, ever.

The introductory article to the Red Flag Master List series discussed rape and domestic violence. This piece will focus on a red flag that correlates with those two major deal-breakers, but isn't quite so alarming (in the short term, anyway). If you catch wind of a woman trying to pull this particular shit-move on you, then you should anticipate the possibility of bigger issues arising in the future. With that said, let's get on with it.

Hypochondria Or Valetudinarianism

Hypochondria, for those unfamiliar with the term, is basically when somebody blows their medical problems out of proportion. A headache is turned into an inoperable malignant brain tumor; a slightly stubbed toe becomes a compound metatarsal fracture requiring immediate reconstructive surgery; and a case of diarrhea somehow morphs into catastrophic internal organ failure—it's all bullshit.

These are extreme examples, but you should always have an open ear for crap like, "My back hurts," "I suffer from migraines," or, "I was in a bad accident when I was a kid." When you're assessing this sort of thing in person, it's important to pay attention to how a woman presents these issues to you: listen to her voice and watch if she makes sad, puppy dog-like eyes whenever the subject comes up—she's fishing for empathy and gauging your susceptibility to guilt trips.

You can always tell when women are pity pandering and looking for attention by their tone and facial expressions. They will often combine exaggerated demonstrations of pain with whiny, almost baby-like voices. In other words, they act like children do when they have a "boo-boo." It's also crucial to take note if a woman goes to the doctor on a routine basis for innocuous issues or misses a lot of work.

People who live with chronic pain or illness mention it matter-of-factly, not in a petulant, faggoty way. They are accustomed to feeling like crap and have come to grips with their afflictions—it's just a fact of life and they are used to it. They don't try to make a show or spectacle out of it because it’s serious business, not show business.

Breaking It Down

You’re probably wondering: Why do women do this and why is it such a big deal? Well, garnering attention and sympathy from unsuspecting men are the primary reasons. But playing the hypochondria card as a way to weasel out of pulling their weight in a relationship setting is also a major factor. These losers will use their bullshit medical excuses to get out of doing the cooking, the cleaning, going out on dates, having sex—you name it.

In short: they’re lazy fucks who don’t want to exert themselves, and they’ll find any excuse in the book to get out of performing their duties.

Calling in sick is the best way to stay at home and get out of work, and calling in sick at home is the best way to get out of doing work there, too. If a woman shows signs of hypochondria early in your interactions, then you can expect this behavior to intensify as your relationship progresses. In other words: I hope you enjoy doing all of the chores, making all of the money, and jerking off in your “man cave” you poor no-life-having motherfucker, because that’s exactly what you have to look forward to.

And God help you if impregnate one of these flunkies because she will raise your children to be exactly like her: a bunch of whimpering, useless little turds. Every time your son’s nose dispenses a single droplet of snot she’ll be hauling the poor little son of a bitch off to the emergency room; then on to a pediatrician; then on to an ear, nose, and throat specialist; then on to a pediatric ear, nose, and throat specialist; and then on to CVS or Walgreens to get 13 fucking prescriptions filled to treat a bunch of shit he doesn’t even have. This hypochondria garbage always rubs off on the kids—always.

The children created by these women suffer greatly: they grow up thinking there’s something wrong with them, when in reality they’re perfectly normal, healthy kids. These women will also make you and your wallet suffer greatly with all of the doctor’s office visits, copayments, and pharmaceutical related expenses—even if you have good medical insurance (men living in countries with decent socialized medicine programs needn't worry much here, I assume).

But the worst part of all is how these women seem to do everything in their power to turn their sons into wimpy little faggots. I don't know about you guys, but I would hate to have to beat the faggot out of my own son just because I did a poor job choosing his mother.

Oh walk it off you pussy.

Hypochondria can also be used as a soft gold digger tactic. Why pay your bills or spend your own money on food and entertainment when you can get a man to do it by playing the sick card? Women will generally pull this crap after having sex with you for the first time, then start dropping subtle hints about their "medical issues" and corresponding financial difficulties.

This is their sneaky way of attempting to extract cash from you when meeting up in the future: they rope you in with sex, then start the guilt tripping and manipulation. It could be for gas money, rent money, cell phone bills, electric bills—it doesn't matter. They just want some sort of remuneration for letting you fuck them.

You should really be on the look out for this if you were able to bone a chick without spending too much money on her in the beginning. She might feel as if she didn't "get enough" for giving you access to her beat-up pussy. If you've been seeing some broad for less than a month and she starts complaining about money problems while missing a lot work due to some mysterious illness—then it won't be long for she asks you to "help her out." You should "help her out" by telling her to go fuck herself.

A Flaking Mechanism

Many women will use hypochondria as a go-to excuse for flaking on you. "I don't feel good," or, "My 'condition' has really been bothering me lately," said the whiny, mellow dramatic dipshit broad. However, all of these medical problems and malingering demonstrations will miraculously melt away when something "fun" or "cool" pops up—and that's exactly how you catch them/call them out on their little charade (this only applies if you've been seen a woman a few times).

Example

> You: "Come over this afternoon, I have something fun in mind."
>
> Girl: "I don't know… I'm really not feeling good… my Terminal Cancerous Brain > AIDS has really been acting up today."

>
> You: "No problem… I was just thinking about flying us to the coast in my buddy's plane, checking us into a suite at the Hilton, and then having dinner at a Michelin starred restaurant with a great view. I know someone else who will want to go, so it's no big deal at all. You really should get some rest—hope you feel better soon."
>
> Girl: "Uh, but, ummm, I'm sure I'll be feeling better later today. I just need to take some medicine. What time should I come over and should I pack a small bag? And what's this someone else shit you're talking about?

Gotcha, bitch.

And that's all you have to do, gentlemen. Throw out the opportunity to do something fun and exciting—and free for her, of course—then just sit back and watch all of these medical problems disappear faster than a Dubai dookie whore's dignity.

You'll feel like one of those con artist television evangelists when he says "Praise Jesus!" and then some prick magically hops out of a wheelchair and starts doing cartwheels and somersaults. "It's a miracle, I tell you!" Nah, it's just some good-for-nothing woman doing what she does best—being good for nothing.

An Encounter With A Real Life Hypochondriac

Once upon a time, yours truly here briefly dated a strong-and-independent woman who said she couldn't suck my dick because she had Temporomandibular Joint Disorder of the jaw, or TMJ for short. Apparently, TMJ causes jaw pain, limited range of motion of the mandible, and clicking and popping when chewing. All I know is that blowjobs were off the table with this chick, and, needless to say, I wasn't too impressed when she broke the news to me. We were out having a few drinks when she told me this, and my WWO (Wallet Won't Open) Syndrome and my FTIL (Fuck This I'm Leaving) Disorder almost kicked in right there at the bar.

Now, I know some of you are probably thinking: "What's the big deal, A.V. Yader? Getting your dick sucked by a typical strong-and-independent woman is like calling a customer service help desk and having some fucker named Sandeep in Bangalore troubleshoot your problem: after about 45 minutes of fumbling around, trying different things, exercising extreme patience and getting no results—you end up taking matters into your own hands, saying ‘fuck it’ and finishing the job yourself.”

And you would be right, I certainly don’t expect the typical strong-and-independent woman to be capable of sucking the skeleton out of a Gaboon viper, but here’s the bottom line: a woman’s mouth does four things….

1) Eats: which costs a man his money.

2) Drinks: which costs a man his money.

3) Talks: which costs a man his time and his sanity.

4) Sucks Dick: the reason a man puts up with all of the God damn eating, drinking, and talking.

If a woman is going to use a man for numbers one, two, and three—then her ass better be enthusiastic about number four as well (unless she’s a virgin or highly inexperienced). A woman who says, “I don’t do that,” when it comes to giving head is the equivalent of a man who says, “I don’t do that,” when it comes to having a fucking job and going to work. So bear that in mind the next time you interact with some slut who says she doesn’t suck dick—she’s a bum.

And that’s exactly what I was thinking as I was sitting there sipping on my Manhattan: “This bitch is a bum.” But hey—I’m a gentleman, and I did the gentlemanly thing to do in this situation: I made fun of her, and her useless piece of shit jaw. It was done in a humorous, light-hearted way, of course; but in a way that also let her know that, despite joking, I was actually skeptical of her “TMJ” claim and didn’t totally believe her.

My derision tactics had the desired effect: it made her feel insecure. This resulted in her emphatically assuring me that she would “make it up to me” when we got back to my place. We had already slept together once before, and it wasn’t too bad, so I was interested to see what she had in mind.

Come to find out, “making it up to me” consisted of her acting like a fucking weirdo and mewling out a series of frightening, high-pitched moaning (I guess they were moaning) noises while we engaged in some fairly vanilla sex. To this day, I still have no idea what the hell that was all about or what she was thinking. I didn’t know whether to cum or wheel the bitch out of my house on a dolly with a biter mask and straight jacket. She sounded a lot like the owl from the movie My Cousin Vinny.

Now, despite all of this, she and her behavior reinforced a valuable lesson, and it’s a lesson that you guys should learn as well: whenever a woman says she’s going to “make it up to you,” prepare to be pretty disappointed. Women are good at “making shit up” (stories, lies, etc.), they’re not good “making shit up to you” (favors, anal, and so on). Anyways, back to the story…

So a couple of days after we’d slept together that last time, this woman told me about how she and her donkey-faced work colleagues all chowed down on a huge bag of jerky at the office one day. “Oh my God, Jacky brought in this amazing bag of turkey jerky today. It was so good and amazing. Have you ever had it before? I mean, I ended up eating almost the whole amazing bag by myself! Hehehe…” Welcome to conversations with American chicks.

I appreciated the fact that she was an annoying idiot, though, because did me a huge favor by divulging that information—she exposed herself as a liar. It obviously goes without saying that if this broad had the jaw strength to stuff her face with some chewy-ass turkey jerky, then she certainly had the jaw strength to stuff her face with my cock. “I don’t wanna,” she said. “My jaw hurts,” she said. Ha, and who says women aren’t funny? That bitch was hilarious—I even told her so when I ditched her lying ass.

This story does have a happy ending, though. Quite a bit of time has passed since Miss Lockjaw and I had our brief little tryst, so it should come as no surprise that she went on to find herself a good man and is now happily married. I imagine that she and her husband have a very loving, trusting, and affectionate marriage. A marriage built on mutual respect and equality; one of true love that will stand the test of time.

There is little doubt that they’re both very happy, and her husband must consider himself to be a very lucky man. In fact, do you know what her doting, wonderful husband is probably doing right now? Not getting his dick sucked—that’s exactly what that fucking loser is doing.

Exit Strategy

Suitability for a long-term relationship is non-existent—you’re going to be responsible for anything and everything, and, worst of all, she will have the moral high ground on you because “she’s sick.” It doesn’t matter if she doesn’t give you sex or help you out in any way, shape, or form—“it” is always your fault, no matter what.

So, if you accumulate any mutual friends during a relationship with this type of woman, you can expect to lose them when you break up. She will tell everybody about how you’re such a terrible person because you left her when she was “ill,” thus leaving you looking like a total scumbag. If it ever comes to that, then you’ll just have to take the loss when it comes to those friendships.

These women are the path to misery, and they’re most likely hiding bigger issues. Rape fables, domestic abuse claims, and hypochondria all come from the same mentally ill place—they’re the same shit, just a different bull. And it’s for this reason that you should save any text correspondence between you and any woman who exhibits this type of behavior.

Always make sure that you have documented proof showing that, for the time you two were together, she was your cock's biggest cheerleader. A woman of this nature could be building her way up to rape claim status, and you just might be her first target if you piss her off or make her "feel" bad. This is correlation, gentlemen—please take it seriously.

In Closing

Medical issues aren't anything to joke about—real or imagined. If a woman reveals any major issues in the beginning that turn out to be true, then that gives you a tough choice to make. If your goal is to find a woman for the long term and have children, then you must take her medical history into serious consideration. Genetics are real, and you should want to maximize your chances of producing the healthiest offspring possible. There are no guarantees in life, but stacking the deck in your favor by choosing a woman who takes care of herself and has a clean bill of health is, without question, the wisest decision you can make.

A sickly woman won't be able to care for your kids in a way that is ideal—she will be too busy with her own problems to truly focus on anyone else, with your needs as a man being very low, to non-existent, on her list of priorities. One of the most miserable situations I can imagine would be coming home to a house full of unhealthy people who need constant care and attention. It would be heartbreaking, as well as terribly burdensome.

It's unfortunate, because you can't help the way you are born. But as I've said before: a woman's problems are her problems; they are not your cross to bear. It doesn't make you a dick for ditching a woman who has issues, it makes you smart. You should be smart in the beginning, and let your heart come into the picture after you've done your due diligence.

Most guys do it backwards: they fall in love, then they start thinking. And that's precisely why so many men fuck up their lives. Don't fuck up your life: memorize, understand, apply, and correlate—it's the best way to keep yourself covered and out of trouble.

Read More: Dealing With Dangerous Game: Fatty Edition

A.V. Yader
A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

What’s The Difference Between SJW Witch Hunts And Racially Motivated Lynchings?

December 22, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In one of the bigger ironies of modern times, SJWs pursuing unsubstantiated rape allegations are resorting to the same tactics and lowest common denominator politics as Southerners and others who once took “justice” into their own hands against black criminal suspects. The only distinction really is that modern do-gooders on university campuses especially have not (yet) resorted to killing those accused but not convicted of rape. Well, at least in the West and there’s always a first for everything.

Of all the race-based lynchings recorded in American history, the 1930 deaths of Thomas Shipp and Abram Smith in Indiana are the most infamous. Shipp and Smith stood accused of involvement in a robbery, rape and murder incident. Townsfolk from the town of Marion removed the duo from the local jail, viciously beat them and then gruesomely strung them up for all to see. SJWs, along with plain regular people, have rightfully decried this appalling outcome many decades later. Most tellingly, neither of the men were ever convicted.

Yet fast forward 85 years and SJWs believe that one doesn’t need firm evidence and a proper, fair court process to “convict” someone of the crime of rape. The testimony of a white person in Marion would not have satisfied a finding of guilty against Shipp and Smith in the eyes of leftists (or anyone with any sense of due process) but nowadays a woman accusing a man of rape constitutes a finding of rape.

Seriously, what world are we living in?

In 1930 and 2015 people “convict” just as quickly

Just because the Duke lacrosse players weren't lynched doesn't make the mob that attacked them any less virulent in their hatred of due process.

Look what the lynch mob mentality, sans execution, has wrought upon fairness over the past decade alone. A lynch mob identical in its virulence to the pack in Marion sought to paint a group of Duke lacrosse players as rapists just because an unbalanced, drug-addicted black stripper said so. Unproven accusations of racism and sexism converged to produce a miscarriage of justice of truly shocking proportions. The fact that none of the innocent players died is somehow meant to mitigate the disemboweling of common sense and, to boot, the need for an impartial investigation.

But did those quick to judge learn from their loss of control? Of course not. Along came a carbon copy accusation at the University of Virginia, courtesy of the supremely sadistic Jackie Coakley. With the same opportunism of the mob leaders in Marion, "journalist" Sabrina Rubin Erdely strove to make a name for herself in the eyes of her peers and ideological drinking buddies. And all this was at the expense of even a half-hearted research process, let alone a responsible facts-based appraisal.

Due process is a buzzword that SJWs apply based on ideological grounds alone. Members of a UVA fraternity do not deserve it but Shipp and Smith did. Supposedly, because the former group were both white and male, there cannot be a question of unfairness in labeling them rapists based only on hearsay. Similarly untenable justifications for perpetrating the spirit of the Marion, Indiana conviction standards have appeared in other incidents ad nauseam.

As long as they don't kill them, SJWs believe they can ruin non-convicted men's lives as much as they want

[image]

Did SJWs have any more basis for calling Paul Nungesser a rapist than the mob at Marion had for calling Shipp and Smith rapists?

From the Duke lacrosse players to Paul Nungesser, reputations and livelihoods have been sullied for life because SJWs are beyond trigger-happy in branding men as guilty. In many cases, police have had no evidence to even detain these men, unlike the booked Shipp and Smith. Yet that doesn't matter when, like a series of 1930s show trials, something resembling a quota system is initiated by zealous leftists. "Not enough convictions! More!" they bellow.

Usually, SJWs take the uncompromising approach of never admitting their mistakes. When both Emma Sulkowicz and Jackie Coakley were exposed as malicious frauds, for example, professional retrogrades like Jessica Valenti still clung to the idea that the men they accused of rape were still guilty. When such a position fails, Stalinist legal observers like Ezra Klein seize upon notions of utilitarianism, accepting that innocent men will be caught up in the net to ensure that the "rapists" are rooted out, typically through unapologetically woeful kangaroo courts.

They may not wear the everyman clothing and have the same genial rural manners of the Marion mob participants, but SJWs are just as committed to undermining social and legal civility.

A fraud of a movement dedicated to conviction by social media and demagoguery

SJWs decided "War is Peace", "Freedom is Slavery" and "Ignorance is Strength" weren't convoluted enough.

Black Lives Matter. Civil rights. Feminism. Due process. Meet the new (and old) euphemisms used to selectively champion the pet projects of SJWs. And it's only going to get worse. After stripping these concepts of their common sense meaning and then polluting them incessantly, the opponents of decency and fairness will always move onto bigger and badder aims.

It’s sad indictment on modern society that we even have to wonder if 1930 was a better time for due process than a dystopian 2015.

Read More: She Hands You A Condom, Then Insinuates Rape? Canada’s New Political Witch Hunt

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Is The USA Wasting $172M Of Taxpayer Money On Penis Pumps?

December 22, 2015 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by LA Pumps

The penis pump market is a massive industry that reportedly cost Medicare $172,000,000 between 2006 and 2011. According to a Government watchdog report into Medicare expenditure, 474,000 American men have so far claimed costs for their medical penis pump systems. But are these guys just wasting tax payers' money? After all, it's the Doctors and Surgeon themselves that are prescribing vacuum pumps for men…

Leftists and women will argue that this is nonsense spending. What they won't mention is that Medicare spends an exorbitant amount on relatively cosmetic procedures such as the labiaplasty and rhinoplasty. If we delve further past the current onslaught of anti-male literature, we will find, for example, that the Australian public health funding scheme, also known as Medicare, spends $40,000 to $70,000 per procedure on labiaplasties. A labiaplasty is generally a cosmetic procedure where women see their family doctor and raise the issue that the size of their vagina lips are unfortunately not the same as the ones in hardcore pornography, or after years of brutal usage, have deteriorated into a state where they believe it's time to get a designer vagina… paid for by ours truly.

I don’t know where to start…

In forums across the web, women who’ve passed their uneternal youth share sentiments such as “I had [a labiaplasty] done a while after my second daughter was born,”. Another similar confession in the femisphere by a mother of 3 who seems to be unable to properly manage her hygiene says: “I had it done due to medical reasons – I was constantly getting sore/red/infected!”

Until we add Kratom to the public health system, it’s up to the common man to vet out procedures that are being claimed for health reasons, when in fact they are for cosmetic purposes only.

A 2009 British report featured in the Journal of Obstetrics and Gynaecology determined that 57% of the main reasons of having the expensive tax funded labia surgery was due to physical discomfort, 21% due to pain during intercourse and 15% as a result of their labia being uncomfortable with their choice of underwear or clothing.

Since over 50% of women are dissatisfied with the appearance of their labia, we should be very wary of a major increase in the amount of women falsifying reasons to have a procedure to mutilate their vaginas that will be fully paid for. If any such increase if observed, we should immediately add all forms of penile enlargement surgery to all national health schemes across the Western world – it’s only fair. Furthermore, although male hair loss is a sign of coming of age, if more men are at all concerned about the growth or loss of their hair, we should also immediately add surgical hair restoration procedures to publicly funded health. Heck, let’s socialize all forms of cosmetic surgery and live in a plastic world.

But I digress; we should be asking a more important question now: if Doctors and Surgeons really are prescribing high quality vacuum pumps to half a million men in the USA alone to assist with erections and growth, then they must work right?

Permanent Growth, Guaranteed

Fortunately, penis pumps do in fact work. They work because bloods engorges into the penis as a result of vacuum pressure and it genuinely makes your penis firmer, longer and crucially – wider. Most readers who would engage in weight training know how important the “pump” is after a set. It’s the increased blood flow, muscle & capillary breakdown and subsequent repair of the muscle that grows the penis over time. Since the penis is a muscle (corpus cavernosum & corpus spongiosum) it has been medically proven that using a high quality penis pump can massively increase blood flow to the area and, over time, grow the penis is length and width permanently. The scientific word for this phenomenon is angiogenesis which means “new blood vessel growth”. The only reason there would be new blood vessels growing in the penis is if there was a need to accommodate a massive increase in blood flow, and in turn, increase the size of the muscles within.

Grow it like your biceps.

The benefits of a larger penis are innumerable:
– Increased sexual performance
– Increased confidence
– Increased blood flow
– Increased sensitivity
– Increased stamina
– Non-invasive medical treatment
– Once-off cost (Viagra is expensive!)

Some men who suffer diabetes and have blood flow issues find that using a penis pump allows them to gain a massive erection that they otherwise would not be able to achieve. After the penis reaches maximum size, a good way to keep that erection and blood flow in the member is to then place a rubber or silicone cock ring over the penis which acts as a torniquet and can keep you erect for an hour or more.

The best way to think of this is as an enhanced erection. Any erection is caused by blood flowing into the penis and using a pump simply ensures you’re getting as much in there as physiologically possible. Your erections actually vary each time you get one – and sometimes your penis will be slightly larger or slightly smaller depending on how aroused you are, how beautiful the girls is, your circulation and various other factors. Using a penis pump is just a matter of stacking the deck in your favor and getting the very best from your biology.

In fact, due to the benefits of penis pump technology, we have also developed clitoris pumps and pussy pumps too. A clit pump will increase the size of the clit and, in turn, raise sensitivity. Any man who knows the ins and outs of a female’s body knows how important attacking the clitoris is to get her off too.

When to Use an LA Pump Penis Pump

For guaranteed money-back permanent penis growth, the best course of action is a 15 minute pumping session per day where the organ is fully engorged with blood. As a penis pumper myself, using a pump for even 30 minutes a day has allowed me to achieve an overall 1.5 inch growth in length and 0.5 inch growth in girth.

The second best use case scenario for a penis pump is going to be just before sex, probably with a girl you're already comfortable with. Being a lifehacker, I find this is the best way you can ensure you both get the best possible experience any time. Sensation is improved for you and your ability to hit certain parts inside of her are the main benefits in this case scenario. When a woman orgasms, her brain is loaded with a chemical called Oxytocin. This chemical is what makes a woman's knees weak and makes her feel satisfied and loved. If you could make a girl feel more satisfied and loved simply by improving your sex life, why wouldn't you? LA Pump are the brand of choice when it comes to pumps and a high quality vacuum pump setup can literally give you the best erections of your life.

Two penis pump cylinders, a pump, and a pair of nipple pumps too.

Diamond Cut, Flame Polished Cylinders

If you've never used a penis pump before, then we must advise ask that you take it easy when using one for the first time. While it is very exciting to see a 20% increase in size immediately after using the pump, we always remind users that the muscles (corpus cavernosum & corpus spongiosum) need time to adapt to the increased blood flow and allow for angiogenesis to occur.

The results of a $10-50 penis pump are lacklustre. LA Pumps are diamond cut, flame polished cylinders that are made in the USA and a full system will set you back around $150-300. However, this is a one-off cost and more of an investment because we find that customers usually burn through 2-3 low-quality/high-turnover pumps before they find us. All customers become life long customers and they usually come back every 2-3 months to buy the next size up pump as they grow in size. We also guarantee permanent growth and if a Doctor recommends a pump to you, you can claim costs back through your private health fund. Prices on the site are in US Dollars, but you can adjust the price when you click through to each pump. Shipping is free worldwide with DHL and lastly, here is a $50 off coupon when you buy a cylinder and pump together: ROKFIFTY.

Click here to see the world famous LA Pump Penis Pump System. If you penis doesn't grow, we will give you your money back.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Roosh Attacker And Mob Instigator Jessica Lelièvre Is Now Trying To Become A Lawyer

December 23, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Keen to keep the flame of SJW hypocrisy eternal, feminist Jessica Lelièvre, best known for physically attacking Roosh, leading a violent mob against him, and being rich because of old white men, is now seeking to become a lawyer (archived version here). She has finished her studies at Concordia University and has enrolled in an LLB degree program at the Université de Montréal. Did she share her recent nighttime co-curricular activities during the admissions process?

For those of you have not seen or have forgotten this unstable woman's mental and emotional implosions, which led to her wiping her social media presence, I refer you to this earlier and very viral ROK article. You can find the video of the violent altercation here, a video in which Lelièvre and her cronies happily behave in ways they would describe as criminal if it happened to almost anyone else. Comments on the video were almost immediately disabled when even Roosh detractors described the mob's actions as illegal and absurd.

In addition to assaulting Roosh with a drink (behavior which has been declared criminal by multiple Canadian courts), helping to organize a mob and falsely imprisoning Roosh (as the end of the video proves), Lelièvre posted a boastful admission of her assault and what she thought was Roosh's address in order to drum up further illegal acts against his person:

The backstory of Jessica Lelièvre's attempt to dox Roosh to encourage violence against him

People knew where Jessica Lelièvre and her kitty lived but decided to take the high ground and not behave as ridiculously (and illegally) as her. She owes Roosh apologies for all her actions, including the dox.

After her assault of Roosh and attempt to instigate street violence against him, people quickly located Jessica's Facebook, her sibling's and other family members'. Within an hour of the video going up, her residential address had been figured out (privileged girls are much easier to find than poor, working-class ones). This location was then confirmed by others. Unlike Lelièvre, who gleefully gave out what she thought was Roosh's place in Montreal, no one associated with Return of Kings stooped to her level and publicized her residence details, despite tens of thousands of very active readers and many millions of visits every year. Ironically, she would have been the quickest person to cry "misogyny" and "imminent threat" if someone posted her personal details like that.

When she's either bragging about or seeking sympathy for her antics against Roosh in between classes at the Université de Montréal, it would be nice if someone could ask her, as a freshman legal assignment, to explain how her actions were innocuous and not criminal.

Is there some sort of long-established legal precedent that if you don't like someone enough you can do to them what you want? Montreal Police's reluctance to pursue charges against her had everything to do with overall inadequate court and law enforcement resources, not any fundamental issue of illegality.

The "heroine" who went underground

And if Lelièvre was so proud of what she did, why did she disappear so suddenly? Was there a flash in her mind that maybe such self-created criminal publicity would prejudice her legal ambitions? The only person who was at risk of physical danger was Roosh himself (or anyone accompanying him), yet I seem to recall him continuing his groundbreaking World Tour instead of ending it by erasing his social media accounts and disappearing.

It's clear Lelièvre still realises that what she did was wrong, at a minimum in the eyes of sober legal minds if not her own. And this is well after the initial backlash of certain media commentators criticizing her vigilanteism and the condemnation of many level-headed private individuals across the internet.

This poster girl for the violent reactions toward Roosh, unsurprisingly, previously faced academic charges from Concordia University over student strikes. She and her fellow troublemaking students, put in their place by the university, had deliberately intimidated other students and professors. Non-striking students, many of whom did not have the luxury of having a phenomenally wealthy father like Lelièvre and therefore struggle to get through college, also had crucial learning time wasted.

If people like this become lawyers, what does that say about the future?

I guess her dad would always handle any legal fees.

Some positions, from doctors to justices of the peace, are naturally reserved for people deemed to be of a higher character than the general population. Moreover, the most common pre-political profession amongst politicians is as a lawyer. It's one thing to have an ideologically radical lawyer without the baggage of an assaulter, mob leader and violence-encourager become a pernicious leftist politician. But what happens when someone like Jessica Lelièvre is permitted to follow this path without restriction?

Her antics represent the basic mob mentality we are very used to observing and reporting on here at ROK. Roosh will be by no means the last person subjected to this kind of disgusting treatment by self-entitled SJWs.

Another point, which should act as a warning for any male Montreal student sadly interested in Lelièvre, is that she and her friend "Jennifer" arranged a "honey trap" so that Lelièvre could assault Roosh at a bar. If she orchestrates such a stunt to assault someone, is sleeping with her really an option? A woman that calculating can easily unleash a false rape accusation.

Whatever the case, Jessica Lelièvre has brought any damaging publicity expertly and compulsively upon herself.

Read More: Feminist Jessica Lelièvre Assaults Roosh V On Street And Brags About It On Social Media

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

A Beginner’s Guide To Carrying A Handgun

December 23, 2015 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

The following will be a brief introduction into the art of concealed carry of a handgun. Ever since Florida introduced a Carrying Concealed Weapons (CCW) Permit, with the other 49 states following, more people are legally packing heat as they go about their daily business in this country, and you need to be one of them, too.

Concealed Carry vs. Open Carry

Concealed carry is when someone cannot observe that you are carrying a gun. This can vary from lightly concealed, with your shirttail flipped over a semi-noticeable bulge on your hip, to deep concealed under a tucked in shirt. If the outline of the gun is visible, this is called “printing” and may be illegal in some states, whereas if the gun becomes exposed for any period of time, and that is illegal in some states, too.

Open carry is when you are not attempting to conceal a weapon. Some states allow open carry; some don’t. As an example, a policeman in uniform open carries; a detective in a suit carries concealed. Open carry is a personal choice that cannot be taken lightly, as I’ll explain later. Here, we will be discussing mostly the mechanics of concealing a handgun on your person.

Open Carry, properly done. (Dress nicely, and be discreet.)

You'll note that I have said "legal in some states" a few times. Folks, you MUST know the laws of all states you intend to carry in. Cops can and will be ignorant of the laws they are supposed to enforce, and you could well end up dead if you don't know them. Please do your research on the laws, and I recommend handgunlaw.us as your first stop. It will tell you what you can and can't do, what states do and don't have reciprocity with your own, and where you can and cannot go with your gun.

Methods Of Carrying A Handgun

I'll touch briefly on the four popular carry methods: on your belt, suspended from your shoulder, in your pocket, and on your ankle. There are also "belly bands" for under your shirt deep carry, and there is even "codpiece carry" devices like Thunderwear if you want your junk to be of a higher caliber.

Women sometimes use "bra carry" and "purse carry" and I suppose a man can use "bag carry," but I hesitate to recommend depending on a gun you have in a bag as you 're going to put that thing down at some time.

Belt Carry

The most popular method is to belt carry, and what position you use will depend on your style and your body. "Strong hand" or "trigger hand" means what side is your dominant hand, and "off hand" or "support hand" is your other side.

Starting at your front and going around your trigger side, we have Appendix Carry, 3 o'clock, and 4 o'clock. These are all variations of carrying near your hip bone. Appendix is in front of your hip, 3 o'clock is on it, 4 o'clock is just behind. Appendix and 4 o'clock are easier to conceal than it being right on your hip, and allow you to sit in vehicles with a little more clearance, and 3 o’clock is a good one for large, open carry holsters.

The pistol can have varying degrees of cant, from forward to neutral to reverse.

Outside the waistband (OWB) holster at the 3 o’ clock position. Neutral cant.

Crossdraw is slightly ahead of appendix carry, but on the weak side, with the butt of the gun facing your belt buckle so you can draw it across you. This one is really good for sitting in a vehicle. Small of the back (SOB) carry is often the most concealable, but can be hard to draw fast. Sitting while wearing a gun like that can hurt, and, if you fall on your back with one there, the chance of back injury is higher.

Do not carry Mexican, which is not using a holster and tucking the barrel of the gun into your pants with the butt hanging out. Pretty much every thug out there carries without a holster, and the prevalence of Glocks and their clones means that piece can and will blow your dick off while you’re fumbling for it if you hit the trigger.

The Mexicans had a legitimate reason to not use a holster during their revolution; if they got caught with a gun, they went to prison, and a holster meant “gun.” Same thing with thugs today, and you find guns everywhere from their shoes, their hoodies, and some women have even done “vagina carry.” Criminals don’t use holsters, law abiding citizens do; use a holster.

Homes here might be doing us a favor by carrying this way and possibly shooting his balls off; don't be like him.

Let's discuss "Outside of Waistband" (OWB) and "Inside of Waistband" (IWB). OWB means the pistol holster is either hooked to your belt via loops, or is attached to a paddle shaped piece that hooks over your pants. OWB is more comfortable than IWB, most people find, but you have to cover the whole gun as opposed to what sticks out above your pants in IWB. That means a long shirt or a jacket. OWB holsters carry bigger guns, have drop leg variants, and sometimes have retention latches.

In Waistband (IWB) 4:30 position carry with a slight forward cant.

IWB holsters fit inside the belt, and usually use belt loops to attach to your belt. You can flip your shirt over the whole thing, or tuck in behind the gun for partial concealment and wear something on top of it. “Tuckable” IWB holsters are relatively new, use clips, and allow room for the shirt to be tucked in in front of the gun. IWB holsters are a lot easier to conceal, but they do take some room in the pants.

Shoulder Carry, Pocket Carry, And Ankle Carry

The most common alternative to belt carry is shoulder carry. Shoulder carry relieves a lot of the space and ergonomic problems of belt carry and is done via a harness you put on like a backpack which holds your gun in a crossdraw position, and your spare magazines on the opposite side.

Shoulder rigs are very comfortable, but they pretty much require a jacket or a heavy, unbuttoned shirt to be concealed. They can handle the biggest handguns out there; Clint Eastwood packed the S&W Model 29 in Dirty Harry in one.

Although the 70’s most powerful handgun is a bit much for anyone but Clint, you can carry it in a shoulder rig. Early Galco Jackass shoulder rig was used.

Pocket carry is for little pistols. They make holsters that basically occupy your pocket and have a rough surface and are a pouch for the pistol. Reach in, pull iron, and the pocket holster should stay put with the gun coming out. Be sure to practice this a lot, and do not carry other things in the pocket, or fail to use a holster (see above comments about getting dick-shot.)

Ankle carry has its pros and cons. It’s easy to carry pistols, doesn’t bother your hips, and is fairly concealable, but is hard to draw fast from and is fairly size limited. It’s a good spot for backup guns, or when you have to deep conceal.

Loadout

You need spare magazines (or speedloaders for revolvers). Whether or not you are a big firefight thinker, or just want to get back to your rifle you should have never left (both common arguments in the gun world), you AT LEAST want 12 rounds or so, which means a spare mag, and a mag holder for it.

Multiple mags are a good step up to aspire to, and you can generally put a two mag holder on your weak side opposite the gun. Be sure to practice mag changes.

Magazine pouch on belt. This one is angled.

What about a backup gun? Semi-derisively called the New York Reload, sometimes pulling more iron is faster than reloading, plus it covers mechanical failure of your primary gun. Backup guns are often smaller versions of your main carry gun of the same caliber, or a small revolver or semi-auto of a smaller caliber. Some modern semi-autos like Glocks will run their “duty size” pistol magazines in their compacts just fine, which cuts down on your mag count needed.

Holsters themselves come in a variety of compositions. Leather is traditional, Kydex is an alternative, and nylon is cheaper. Make sure, if the pistol HAS a safety, that the holster COVERS it. Another holster of somewhat minimalist thinking is a clip on the frame of the gun itself for your waistband. This works, but be sure to get a little kydex cover for the trigger guard with a loop to attach to your belt. You pull iron, the loop pulls the cover off as you draw, and you’re good to go, otherwise you might (say it with me) get shot in the dick.

A variety of holster materials: Kydex, carbon fiber applique over kydex, leather over plastic, and leather.

You'll need some wardrobe changes. Definitely a strong, thick belt to hold the holster up, maybe some larger pants if you want to IWB carry. You may need to untuck that shirt, or wear a light jacket when you would normally forgo. Start small, and get into it slowly.

Legality And Mentality

Carrying a gun is your right, but it's also a massive responsibility. The fifty shades of grey bullshit of passive aggressive society gets reduced to black and white in a real hurry. You will have the ability to kill damn near anyone you meet, but your ass will go to jail for at least manslaughter if not murder two if you are wrong in your actions.

The key words to remember here is "I was in fear for my life." Someone jacking your car is not something for which you can blast them, except maybe in Texas. However, if you are fairly certain that you or someone in the area is about to get wrecked or killed, either by the fact that the soon-to-be perpetrators have weapons of their own, or there is something called "disparity of force" (five of them and one of you) going on, feel free to use that weapon.

I cannot, in this article, articulate what to do if you are involved in a shooting. Call the cops, file a complaint, remember to say "I was afraid for my life" or "he was going to kill me" and then shut up and lawyer up. Do not just run off and hope no one notices; calling in establishes you as the victim. I highly recommend ANYTHING Massad Ayoob writes on this; start with In the Gravest Extreme and go from there. I'm an engineer, not a lawyer, so do your homework.

Your carry piece is not a status symbol and is not for anyone to know about until you have to use it for defense of life. Never start stuff when carrying.

There are certain places you cannot go with a gun, and that varies from state to state. A good general guideline is no schools, no government buildings, no bars. Restaurants serving alcohol is ok, but you should really not be drinking while carrying.

Your place of employment is up to you and your corporate masters; I leave mine in the truck. If you open carry, be prepared for people to notice; bad guys will try to take it from you or shoot you first, and others might call the cops for a MWAG complaint (man with a gun.) Never be an asshole when you are carrying, and this goes double for open carry.

I'm not going to get too political here, but this country does not have a gun problem; it has a problem with a lack of respect for human life. I'm not a sociologist; I don't know how to fix it, but we need more pro-gun good people out there who can stop bad shit as or before it happens. Carry legally and quietly, and don't get into arguments and fights just because you "got yo piece wid choo."

But, for the sake of the dwindling number of good citizens and the American Way, if you happen to be in the position to stop a terrorist, wait until he's not paying attention to you, get a good shooting rest if you can, give him an "Aloha Snackbar," and send him straight to hell.

Read More: How to Buy Your First Handgun

Luke Stranahan

Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

The BBC And Reggie Yates Release Their Hit Piece On The Manosphere

December 23, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following article was published this week on Roosh V.

Over the summer I agreed to let the BBC and their host Reggie Yates attend one of my lectures for their "masculinity in Britain" documentary. Knowing how leftist the BBC is, we can't be surprised that they ignored the bulk of my most relevant work to paint me as a rapist and rape instructor, using out-of-context quotes that they found on social justice websites. One-third of the documentary focused entirely on me and the wildest things I've written in the past ten years. Here's the full documentary:

Here's a cut of the documentary that contains just the parts I'm in:

At one part in the documentary, I ask Reggie if he's gay, because he evaded my question on how fame has allowed him to have groupies. He claimed to be straight, but I don't know a single straight man who would pose for this sort of photo:

Here's my video response to the documentary:

Even though we shouldn't be surprised that the BBC hired a non-masculine man to report on masculinity, their underlying social justice agenda should be called out and the conclusions made in the documentary should be ignored. What the BBC did with the above documentary is essentially hire a carpenter to review an Italian opera. Besides a handful of exaggerated facial expressions made for the camera, the carpenter will not be able to analyze the opera on a level above that of even a grade-school trumpet player.

Many men have asked me what I expected from the BBC. I didn't expect anything, and as you can see in my response video, I can't say I'm angry at their coverage. The reason is that there is nothing the media can do anymore to hurt me, and even if they paint me as a baby murderer, I will still gain readers because of it. When you are in an anti-fragile position, you're immune to all manner of attacks, and so it's the coverage alone that helps me because it gets my ideas across to those who have yet to see it. Even if 0.1% of people who watched the BBC documentary become readers of mine, it's still a huge win, since doing it only cost me a couple hours of time.

[redacted] 4:05 AM (19 hours ago)

to roosh

Hi there!
This is a bit of a random for me but I saw you on Reggie Yates: Extreme UK and I was so fucking happy I did! Personally, I am an anti-feminist. I despise the whole 'culture' of it. You're views are perfect, and much aligned with my own. I believe in the traditional values which had been passed down throughout history (although these are now being dismissed, much to my hate). There is nothing wrong with being submissive to men... Nothing.

[redacted] 4:23 PM (6 hours ago)

to roosh

Roosh,
I have recently discovered you and what you do via a Reggie Yates programme on the BBC. I just wanted to email you to say that after watching a few of your videos, you have inspired me to not pursuit my goals and to be frank, not give a damn about what other people say or think. Your videos are great, and I feel I can relate to a lot of the issues and topics that you raise. I don't find what you do offensive or vulgar at all and I intend to purchase "30 bangs" very soon! Anyway, keep up the good work man, your hilarious!

On the other hand, people who are fragile are dependent on a constant stream of positive coverage from the media. They cannot have whispers and rumors that paint them as less pure than their public image. My image has already been dragged through the mud, so the only direction for me is up, regardless of what is said about me from this point on. I can be accused of torturing women in dungeons on live television and I wouldn't lose a single reader, but if the same happened to Reggie, he would lose his job and his BBC-sponsored fame.

I did a Twitter poll the other week that asked men what would happen to their lives if they were falsely accused of rape. It shows that most men are still in a fragile position.

As the narrative loses steam and we enter a chaotic period where the mentally ill run the asylum, you must make the attempt to be as anti-fragile as possible so that when a false accusation is thrown your way, or a BBC host of questionable sexuality announces to its audience that you must be a rapist after reading an out-of-context quote, you don't lose a single minute of sleep. The BBC program tried to paint me as a criminal, but instead I gained more fans and sold more books. As long as my name exits the mouth of my enemies, I win, and I will continue to win. I hope a growing percentage of my readers can find themselves in this position as well.

Read Next: Review Of Antifragile By Nassim Taleb

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How The Christmas Truce Of 1914 Shows The World Has Become Less Civil

December 24, 2015 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

It was the first Christmas of World War I. German and British troops had already been dug into the trenches of the Western Front for five months when something of a miracle occurred. Men on both sides spontaneously stopped fighting and ventured out to the middle of the battlefield to greet each other as brothers.

That event, which we now call the Christmas Truce of 1914, gives us a glimpse into what Western civilization was like before the last vestiges of Christendom were snuffed out. And it also points the way forward for those of us who are not satisfied to just enjoy the decline.

The Truce

Leading up to Christmas, 1914, there were several calls for a truce between the warring factions. In December, Pope Benedict XV, who had only been elected to the papacy three months before, called for a truce “that the guns may fall silent at least upon the night the angels sang.” His request was officially rejected, but the idea of a Christmas truce started to be discussed in Europe’s newspapers.

The Christmas Truce happened spontaneously. On Christmas Eve, German soldiers decorated their trenches with candles and even set up Christmas trees in celebration of Christmas. The Germans then began singing Christmas carols. The English, seeing the displays and hearing the carols, responded by singing carols of their own.

On Christmas day, the Germans the two sides started to shout Christmas greetings to each other. The guns then went silent and men from both sides left their trenches to meet in the bullet-riddled “no man’s land” in between. The Germans and the English combatants met each other as brothers. They shook hands and exchanged food and souvenirs. English soldier Bruce Bairnsfather described the degree of camaraderie:

> I wouldn’t have missed that unique and weird Christmas Day for anything… I spotted a German officer, some sort of lieutenant I should think, and being a bit of a collector, I intimated to him that I had taken a fancy to some of his buttons… I brought out my wire clippers and, with a few deft snips, removed a couple of his buttons and put them in my pocket. I then gave him two of mine in exchange… The last I saw was one of my machine gunners, who was a bit of an amateur hairdresser in civil life, cutting the unnaturally long hair of a docile Boche, who was patiently kneeling on the ground whilst the automatic clippers crept up the back of his neck.

The truce did not last long. By the next day, the killing had started again. But for a brief moment, these men lived out true Christian brotherhood in spite of their leaders.

The death of the old world

Czar Nicholas of Russia

The Christmas Truce probably could not happen today. Our enforced diversity, which is supposed to bring everyone together, has the opposite effect. It creates an atmosphere of mistrust where no one feels connected to anyone else. We are all atomized economic units.

World War I was in many ways the birth of our modern world. It washed away what remained of the old order, with its patriarchy and hierarchy, and set the stage for feminized, egalitarian society.

The war decimated the nobility of the European nations. The nobles assumed their traditional role as warriors to protect their nation, but suffered heavy losses as a result. In this way, Europe lost many of its best and brightest young men.

The Great War put an end to several monarchies. Notably, Czar Nicholas of Russia, Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany, and Emperor Karl of Austria lost their crowns as a result of the war. This was an important development for several reasons.

The first is that monarchy in the West is bound up closely to Christianity. Kings are crowned by bishops and they are expected to live in obedience to the gospel. The monarchs of the past saw it as their duty to propagate Christianity within their own realm ensuring that the people had strong morals.

The connection between monarch and Christianity is still evident even today, although to a greatly diminished degree. Queen Elizabeth of England is set to give the “most Christian” Christmas address that she has ever delivered this year to reiterate the importance of faith in England’s heritage. Thus it is not surprising that faith in Christ began to decline in Europe after the monarchies were abolished.

The second way that the end of monarchy is important has to do with attitudes towards war. The best monarchs viewed themselves as the fathers of their nations. Therefore, sending their people into war was not a decision that they took lightly. Emperor Karl wrote to his wife, “I am an officer with all my body and soul, but I do not see how anyone who sees his dearest relations leaving for the front can love war.”

Compare this to the modern view of our politicians who think nothing of putting their citizens in harm’s way for dubious wars—and even hobbling the military’s ability to effectively fight back with unreasonable rules of engagement.

The meaning of the Christmas Truce for today

In the Christmas Truce, the German and English soldiers realized that what they held in common was more important than the artificial political distinctions that were imposed from above.

Although we are not in a shooting war, we’ve been placed in a similar position. We are engaged in a culture war where the patrimony of Western culture is being reduced to free trade and sexual license.

Our cultural elites tell us that we are allies with certain groups that are identified as the good guys: feminists, degenerate celebrities, pushers of pedophile acceptance, Saudi princes who force their non-Muslim staff to strip naked, countries that support the Islamic State, and Islamic “refugees” who rape the women of their host nation.

Meanwhile, we are told that our enemies, the bad guys, are Christians, political candidates who want to have borders, masculine men, gun owners, supporters of patriarchy, secular Arab leaders who protect their minority Christian populations, and a certain Russian leader.

We few, we happy few, we band of brothers

The Christmas Truce means that we should unplug from the diktats of our elites. Instead, associate with those people with whom you have the most in common, even if they are on the official "enemies" list. These people are your true allies. There are some tangible ways you can support your true allies:

- Challenge pundits and oppose politicians who beat the drum to go to war with countries who pose little threat to the US. This especially applies to a Christian nation like Russia.
- "Supporting" a good politician is not enough. Get registered and vote for politicians who agree with your viewpoints.
- Don't be afraid of sharing your views with others. If you are intelligent in your presentation, you will embolden friends who agree with you but who are afraid of expressing their views.

Finally, vote with your pocketbook. The cultural Marxists own the media and the large corporations. They are the well-funded Goliath. The people who are promoting a return to patriarchy, on the other hand, are the less powerful Davids. Therefore:

- Stop buying from companies that want to eradicate you, your people, and your way of life. This may mean some sacrifice on your part, but what kind of warrior is not willing to sacrifice a little comfort and convenience?
- Support businesses and individuals who are on your side by buying their products and using their services.

Conclusion

The Christmas Truce took place in a world that is now long dead. The civility, honor, and trust that made it possible have been replaced by the cult of excessive consumption. But it doesn't need to be that way. This Christmas is a good time to renew our efforts to restore what was lost.

Read More: A ROK Christmas Benediction From Brother Cui Pertinebit

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

8 Things Women Can Do To Be More Attractive

December 24, 2015 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

While women are affected by life experiences, and particularly number of sexual partners, far more severely than men, there are always steps that can be taken to preserve and cultivate the dormant femininity that lies within every woman.

If you are working on a LTR with a woman, demand these behaviors. If you know females, encourage and reward this behavior in them. And if you are a lurking female, take these to heart.

1. Stop cursing

If it really makes you feel all “equal and empowered” to talk like an ex-con, then go home and do it into your pillow. Men don’t want to hear a woman curse. It’s not feminine. It’s rude. It’s trashy. Men want to hear a pleasant, calming, soothing voice, and to look at a smiling, kind woman.

Besides, if you really want to be all individual and cool, try standing out from the crowd by smiling and using gentle language. I guarantee you'll stand out, and in a good way.

2. Hit the gym

A woman's physical appearance is more than half of her attractiveness. And over 90% at the beginning of a relationship. While a woman can't do much about her face, height, or skin, losing weight will make a woman more attractive in almost every single case.

3. Quit eating out and hit the cookbooks

Processed food is unhealthy, and often expensive. The quality of the ingredients used in all but the top restaurants is quite poor. The meats are laden with chemicals, hormones, and even sprayed with viruses, and the produce coated in pesticides. Fat-free food, the latest craze, is unhealthy, and loaded with sugars and other fillers to counteract the poor taste that results when natural fats are removed.

Eliminating eating out will benefit a woman by reducing her waistline as well as her financial expenditures. And of course, what better way to express your love and admiration for the important man in your life than to cook him a healthy, delicious meal from scratch? The old adages are rarely wrong, and indeed it is true that “the way to a man’s heart is through his stomach.”

4. Learn a hobby

In more traditional times, women were expected to take up a hobby or develop a talent, the same way pageant participants do today. An idle mind is the devil’s playground, and instead of filling their head with garbage like the latest anti-male movie on the Lifetime network or glorifying talentless sluts like the Kardashians through pop culture media, a woman can bring happiness and joy to those in her life by learning a skill such as singing, dancing, playing an instrument, or any artistic endeavor.

Bonus points if you are young, as such skills are rarely seen in girls in their 20s.

5. Grow your hair

The other day a woman complained to me about how cutting her hair costs about five times what my local barber charges. There's a simple solution: grow your hair longer. Long hair is feminine, attractive, and the opposite of men, which is the whole reason we are attracted to you in the first place.

We don't want to date a muscular, cursing, bald person with tits who looks like Hulk Hogan. We want a woman to contrast and complement us, to be the yin to our yang. Long hair is almost always more attractive than short hair on a woman. Whatever you do, do not cut your hair shorter than a man.

6. Smile

It may sound trite and silly, but guys in the West rarely have a woman smile at them, other than (hopefully) their girlfriend or wife. Even then, make a point to smile more often, and it will only help.

I can't remember the last time a Western girl smiled at me spontaneously, without me having to tell her a joke or "make" her smile. A woman who flashes a friendly smile at guys will set herself far apart from her competition.

7. Think before speaking

Last night I was out with a couple of girls socially. One is a former FWB, the other just a friend. They were to be my social proof for meeting other women. While talking to them, I realized why the “friend” had never been anything more. She wouldn’t shut up about herself, and her ridiculous life.

She went on and on about her job, her social events this week, the number of dates she was having, how she makes poor decisions about men and it never works out. In my head, I was thinking “of course, no reasonable guy will go out with you, when you just admitted you are dating (i.e. banging) five guys this week.”

But more than that, it was just incredibly boring. Think about why the other party would have any interest in what you are about to tell them before opening your mouth.

8. Dress like a girl

Guys are visually attracted to women, and first impressions make a big difference. Nothing says “feminine, nurturing, sexy, available woman” like a girl who dresses like one. Dresses, skirts, heels, clothing that accentuate your body = good. Anything that a guy can wear = bad.

Reinforce Traditional Femininity

Part of neomasculinity is that we encourage, support, and reinforce traditional feminine values and virtues. Any time you see a girl displaying these behaviors, compliment and encourage her. Make remarks to girls you meet encouraging these behaviors. Respond to any bad traits with “That’s not very feminine.” Show women that despite what MTV and Cosmo tell her, her grandmother is actually a positive role model.

Read More: Girls With Skrillex Haircuts Are Like Sick Parrots

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

21 Quotes Of The Vikings' Havamal To Guide A Masculine Lifestyle

December 25, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Havamal is the words of wisdom which served as spiritual provisions for the Vikings on their long journeys over the rough sea to discover new lands. It is one of the more famous and certainly one of the most popular of the so-called Eddaic poems. Those chosen parts of Havamal are neither heroic nor mythological, but rather of a didactic nature.

Although more than a thousand years old, it seems incapable of becoming outdated, since in important respects man himself has hardly changed in the course of the centuries. The essential qualities of life, too, are still the same as they were in the day that the Havamal was written: a man who has fire, a view of the sun, good health and personal integrity is better placed than one whose life is spent in pursuit of wealth, of luxury, and impressing others. Nothing can take such a man's life away, for although death is inescapable, his posthumous reputation will never die.

The ethics of the Havamal are relevant to the neomasculine lifestyle, above all rooted in belief in the value of the individual, who is nonetheless not alone in the world but tied by inextricable bonds to nature and society. In the old philosophy of the North, each individual was responsible for his own life, shaped by his own fortune or misfortune and created a life for himself from his own resources.

1. Worldliness

> The traveller must > train his wits.
> All is easy at home.
> He who knows little > is a laughing-stock
> amongst the men of the world.

2. The Nature Of Friendship

> A bad friend > is far away
> though his cottage is close.
> To a true friend
> lies a trodden road
> though his farm lies far away

3. A Home Is a Castle

> Better a humble
> house than none.
> A man is master at home.
> A pair of goats > and a patched roof > are better than begging.

4. Caution

> Never walk > away from home > ahead of your axe and sword.
> You can’t feel a battle > in your bones > or foresee a fight.

5. How To Cultivate Friendship

> A true friend > whom you trust well > and wish for his good will:
> go to him often > exchange gifts
> and keep him company.

6. Experience

> He is truly wise > who’s travelled far > and knows the ways of the world.
> He who has travelled > Can tell what spirit > governs the men he meets.

7. Prosperity

> The brave and generous > have the best lives.
> They're seldom sorry.
> The unwise man > is always worried, > fears favours to repay.

8. The Importance Of Appearances

> Two wooden stakes > stood in the field,
> there I hung my hat and cloak.
> They had character > in fine clothes.
> Naked I was nothing.

9. The Early Bird

> Wake early > if you want > another man’s life or land.
> No lamb
> for the lazy wolf.
> No battles won in bed.

10. The Nature of Secrecy

> Ask you must > and answer well
> to be called clever.
> One may know your secret > never a second.
> If three, a thousand will know.

11. The Basics Of Life

> A man needs warmth, > the warmth of fire
> and of the shining sun.
> A healthy man > is a happy man > who is neither ill nor injured.

12. Poor – But Alive…

> It is better to live
> than lie dead.
> A dead man gathers no goods.
> I saw warm fire
> at a wealthy man’s house > himself dead at the door.

13. Everyone Has His Use (as opposed to everyone is equal™)

> The lame rides a horse > the maimed drives the herd > the deaf is brave in battle.
> A man is better
> blind than burried.
> A dead man is deft at nothing.

14. Keeping Your Name Alive

> A son is better > though late begotten > of an old and ailing father.
> Only your kin > will proudly carve
> a memorial at the main gate.

15. Hospitality

> The newcomer > needs fire
> his knees are numb.
> a man who has made > his way over mountains > needs food and fresh linen.

16. Renown

> Cattle die > kinsmen die
> all men are mortal.
> Words of praise
> will never perish
> nor a noble name.

17. Independence

> It is fortunate > to be favoured > with praise and popularity.
> It is dire luck > to be dependent > on the feelings of a fellow-man.

18. Responsibility

> A king’s son should be thoughtful > thorough and silent > brave in battle.
> A man should be happy > and in good humour > to his dying day.

19. Financial Sense

> Become not > a beggar
> to the money you make.
> What’s saved for a friend > a foe may take
> Good plans often go awry.

20. Extravagance

> Load no man
> with lavish gifts.
> Small presents often win great praise.
> With a loaf cut > and a cup shared
> I found fellowship.

21. Foresight

> A man should know > how many logs
> stubs and strips of bark > to collect in the summer > to keep in stock

> wood for his winter fires.

This book should be on everyone's nightstand. Its words have a significant influence in the way I lead my life as a man and the decisions I take. One day, I will give a copy of it to my sons.

The edition I possess is the translation made by Björn Jonasson, with an foreword by Matthias Vithar Saemundsson, senior lecturer in Icelandic literature at the University of Iceland.

Read more: What You Can Learn About Being A Man From The Vikings

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Waes Hael, Drinc Hael, And Merry Christmas To All

December 25, 2015 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Christ is born, and a Merry Christmas to all!

I greet the men of ROK with an article composed solely to share a bit of Christmas cheer. I have little of my own to say, for this day speaks enough for itself, in the beauties that it hands down to us from ages past. I will present an (expurgated) homily of St. John Chrysostom, some of my favourite, largely forgotten Christmas tunes, and a link to the "Carols at King's" from the year 2000; it has been my tradition for the past few years, at the end of Christmastide days, to enjoy a bit of brandy or wassail (with brandy, obviously), watching Carols at King's by the light of the Christmas Tree. God grant you all joy on the feast!

First, an expurgated version of a Christmas sermon by St. John Chrysostom:

> I behold a new and unthinkable Mystery! My ears resound to the shepherds' song, piping no soft melody, but chanting full forth an heavenly hymn. The Angels sing! The Archangels blend their voice in harmony; the Cherubim hymn their joyful praise. The Seraphim exalt His glory. All join to praise this holy feast, beholding the Godhead here on earth, and man in heaven. He Who is above, now for our redemption dwells here below; and he that was lowly is by divine mercy raised.
>
> Bethlehem this day resembles heaven; hearing from the stars the singing of angelic voices; and in place of the sun, enfolds within itself on every side, the Sun of justice.

> What shall I say to you; what shall I tell you? I behold a Mother who has brought forth; I see a Child come to this light by birth. The manner of His conception I cannot comprehend. Nature here rested, while the Will of God labored. O ineffable grace! The Only Begotten, Who is before all ages, Who cannot be touched or be perceived, Who is simple, without body, has now put on my body, that is visible and liable to corruption.
>
> Christ, finding the holy body and soul of the Virgin, builds for Himself a living temple, and as He had willed, formed there a man from the Virgin; and, putting Him on, this day came forth; unashamed of the lowliness of our nature. For it was to Him no lowering to put on what He Himself had made. Let that handiwork be forever glorified, which became the cloak of its own Creator. For as in the first creation of flesh, man could not be made before the clay had come into His hand, so neither could this corruptible body be glorified, until it had first become the garment of its Maker.
>
> What shall I say! And how shall I describe this Birth to you? For this wonder fills me with astonishment. The Ancient of days has become an infant. He Who sits upon the sublime and heavenly Throne, now lies in a manger. And He Who cannot be touched, Who is simple, without complexity, and incorporeal, now lies subject to the hands of men. He Who has broken the bonds of sinners, is now bound by an infants bands. But He has decreed that ignominy shall become honor, infamy be clothed with glory, and utter abasement be the measure of His Goodness.
>
> Come, then, let us observe the Feast! Truly wondrous is the whole chronicle of the Nativity. For this day the ancient slavery is ended, the devil confounded, the demons take to flight, the power of death is broken, paradise is unlocked, the curse is taken away, sin is removed from us, error driven out, truth is brought back, the speech of kindliness is diffused, and spreads out in every direction. A heavenly way of life has been planted on the earth, angels communicate with men without fear, and men now hold colloquy with angels.
>
> To Him, then, Who out of confusion has wrought a clear path, to Christ, to the Father, and to the Holy Ghost, we offer all praise, now and forevermore. Amen.

Very much worth a listen, in connection with this, is the Byzantine Office composed by St. John Damascene, which is based in part on this homily of St. John. Readers may remember I quoted from it in my post at the beginning of Advent; “I behold a new and unthinkable Mystery” begins at the one minute mark, but all of it is impressive (moreso if you understand Greek, I’ll admit).

And, for good measure, one of the best renditions of the Latin hymn I also quoted at that time (“O Magnum Mysterium”), so similar in spirit.

And now, for some of my favourite, lesser-known Christmas music. There are many very great Christmas carols, which we all know – God Rest Ye, Merry Gentlemen; O Little Town of Bethlehem; Silent Night – so, I don’t mean to detract from these. But one of my favourite things about Christmas, is how steeped it is in the glory and traditions of our ancestors, reaching back in time to music and customs that feel like “home” when we find them, even if we hadn’t known them before. So, these are some miscellaneous bits from Christmases past, which I enjoy most.

Circa Canit Michael

From a long, long time ago this Rundellus was part of a Medieval Christmas play (sometimes also appearing at Eastertide), and I can’t help but smile at its ebullience. The song tells how Michael proclaims the news of Christ’s birth, the angels sing ‘Gloria’ on high, the Fatherland of manly excellence is returned to us, so we must now strive to leave vice and effeminacy behind; now the Virgin’s chastity has blossomed with the flowers of integrity and impassibility.

In Dulci Iubilo

You'll find the original text and plenty of translations on the web. Here's one of my favourite recordings of it – some may say it is baroque, eccentric, opulent, and excessive. Yes, it is, and to God be the glory. I like to turn it up on full blast while surveying all the Christmas decorations with satisfied, good cheer (and a bit more brandy). Sweet jubilation, indeed! Our cause is just! And indeed, the lyrics were probably written by Blessed Henry Suso, an holy Dominican contemplative, so honi soit qui mal y pense.

Personent Hodie

You'll find the original text and many translations for this one, too. The prince of hell is ruined, and we enjoy the spoils! Raise your glasses, men! There are lots of glorious versions of this around, but I like this simple version sung by the distinctive voice of Maddy Prior (best known as lead singer of Steeleye Span) for its clarity, Medieval style and good-heartedness.

Joseph est Bien Marié

I like this song for its charm and understatement, which rather highlights the grandeur of its themes, understating them with such sentiments as: "Joseph sure did marry into a good family," and "it's a rather novel thing, to be both a mother and a maiden."

Christmas is a time when fathers often get forgotten, since the focus is primarily on the children and on the busy activity of the womenfolk. Also, men usually don't spend the month ahead of time dropping hints about all the stuff they want for Christmas… so, while he buys what everyone else wants, he often gets stuck with socks or a tie. A superficial judgment may think the man is getting the raw end of the deal, but, truly, they have the better part: the focus is entirely off them, and they experience the greater joy of selflessness and providing for their loved ones; men more naturally penetrate into the meaning of the feast, and raise their minds above the things that women and children are rather more taken with. So, I like that this carol focuses on St. Joseph, who is also often forgotten amidst the songs of Virgin and Child. There are cleaner and crisper versions of this song online, but I like this one for the all-male choir (Franciscans, in fact) and its heart.

Go away

Last but not least, how better could I bid you all farewell on this day, than by sharing Leonin's meditative setting of the deacon's dismissal from Christmas Day Mass? "Go ye, (the oblation) is offered," to which the people respond, "thanks be to God" (or, pithily translated: "Go away, Mass is over." "Thank God!" – though, if they still sang Mass like this, we wouldn't mind hanging around). This setting takes the most solemn melody for the dismissal, adds some simple polyphony, and turns five words into a four-minute musical meditation (chiefly on the response, "thanks be to God").

Now, as promised, I bid you farewell and offer you the Carols from Kings, from the year 2000; they have a similar policy to ROK: no women allowed! (Okay, sometimes a woman does a reading; but at least none of them ruin the singing. Speaking of, you may want to skip the readings, since they reflect modern Anglicans' thoughts, and are sometimes more "Churchian" than Christian.)

Now: there are 12 days of feasting, brothers; pour the brandy, and may you have good cheer for them all!

Waes hael for Lord and Dame, o merry be their dole!
Drinc hael in Jesu's name, and fill the tawny bowl!

Merry Christmas to all.

Read More: A ROK Christmas Benediction From Brother Cui Pertinebit

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

4 Reasons Why You Should Go To The Philippines While You Can

December 26, 2015 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As ROK readers already know, I'm a big fan of the Philippines, having lived there for part of last year. Indeed, I just released Do the Philippines, a book on how to pick up Filipinas. The Philippines' surfeit of easygoing, feminine, "white fever"-addled women make it a strong contender for poosy paradise, but paradises don't last forever. Here are five reasons why you should book your flight to the Philippines sooner rather then later…

1. The Philippines will soon have an obesity epidemic

It may seem strange that a “third-world” country could have a problem with obesity, but the Philippines has somehow managed to snatch defeat from the jaws of victory. Not only is native Philippine cuisine horrible for the waistline—imagine the worst elements of Chinese, Malaysian and American food tossed in a blender—fattening fast food franchises such as McDonald’s and KFC are ridiculously popular among middle-class Filipinos.

Filipinos as a whole are already naturally chubbier than other Asians, so adding cholesterol-laden fast food to the mix all but ensures the ones growing up today will blimp up to horrifying proportions. While I was in the country, I saw countless little kids who were packing enough pounds to give American brats a run for their money. The Philippines’ obesity epidemic could begin in as little as a decade, so you’ll want to get in before the fatness takes over.

2. Filipinas are becoming sluttier and bitchier

When I relocated from Davao City to Manila during my trip, I was a little surprised at how I had to alter my game tactics. Girls in Manila are more promiscuous, have bigger egos and are more difficult to impress than Davao girls, half of whom will fall in love with you after just a few bangs. Don't get me wrong: I didn't have to use a tenth of the game I would have needed back in the U.S. in order to nail Manila girls, but the difference was still notable.

As Filipinas become increasingly exposed to American culture, they're going to adopt the habits of American girls: bad attitudes, stupid haircuts, and loose lifestyles. Since English is one of the Philippines' national languages, Western degeneracy has a major vector that it lacks in other Americanized countries such as Poland. While the sluttiest girl in Manila is still more nurturing and feminine than the average American girl, things are only going to get worse from here on out.

3. Australian tourists are ruining the Philippines

Australians are to Southeast Asia what Brits are to Eastern Europe: boorish, classless jerks who drink too much and make asses of themselves. Wherever Aussies go, they leave devastation in their wake, pissing off the locals and making all whites look bad by proxy. Even Australian women are horrifying: they're overweight, have nasty attitudes and brim with a creepy sexual desperation.

For years, the Australians have been content to embarrass themselves in Thailand or Bali, but hordes of them have started moving into the Philippines to loot and pillage. I fully expect the streets of Manila to be full of convulsing Ozzies bathing in their own vomit in five years. As xenophilic as Filipinos are, even they have their limits, so plan your visit before Britain's retarded cousins from Down Under ruin it all.

4. The Philippines is becoming a flashpoint for the U.S.-China conflict

The Philippines' strategic location in the Pacific means that it's historically been occupied and/or colonized by regional powers such as the Spanish, the Japanese and the Americans. Now China is flexing its muscles, putting pressure on the Philippines and violating the country's territorial waters. The Philippine government is so spooked that President Benigno Aquino has been seeking closer military cooperation with the U.S., reversing decisions made by his mother Corazon Aquino that asserts the country's independence from American influence.

While it's unlikely that the Philippines will become the battleground for World War III, the increasing political tension in the region will kill tourism and make the area less safe. To be on the safe side, you'll want to book your stay before the mushroom clouds start rising.

Overall, the Philippines is easily one of the best countries for men—whether you're looking to plow your way through miles of vagina or settle down with a feminine girl—but the country's prospects for the future are grim. If you want to get the most out of your Philippine adventure, you should head over there as soon as you can. If you want a complete guide to picking up Filipino girls—as well as other important aspects of the Philippines—check out my book Do the Philippines.

Read Next: Will The Philippines Become The Next Poosy Paradise Lost?

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Why Homosexual Marriage Matters For Straight Men

December 27, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been seeing a lot of comments from men wondering why allowing homosexuals to marry in the United States in such a big deal. "Let them do what they want, it doesn't affect us," they say. I wish that was the case. Not only is the legalization of gay marriage a full frontal attack on heterosexual men, it is part of a larger war to remove legal rights and behaviors that you are currently able to enjoy without state or mob interference.

Legalizing gay marriage is one phase of a degenerate march to persecute heterosexuals, both legally and socially, while acclimating young children to the homosexual lifestyle. The Supreme Court ruling in June 2015 allowing gay marriage doesn't affect your life one hour, one day, or one month after, but it is part of a long war that will eventually criminalize or socially forbid certain aspects of heterosexual behavior at the same time it over-sexualizes young children in order to introduce them to homosexuality. I absolutely guarantee that your life will be negatively affected from the fallout of this ruling within a 5-10 year timespan.

The reason for this is simple: the societal reorganization that is necessary to allow gay marriage automatically elevates homosexuals to a special class of citizenry. To hoist one class you must demote another, meaning that heterosexual men are by default the enemies and oppressors of homosexuals. It is a foregone conclusion that these oppressors, which includes both straight men and women, must be ordered to give tribute, benefits, and submission to the "victim" class. You will eventually kneel whether you like it or not.

Masculine and straight behavior will be more aggressively modified through social shaming and re-education in schools, where young boys will be enthusiastically taught the superiority of homosexual lifestyles and the shameful privilege of heterosexuals, especially concerning the types of relationships that lead to nuclear, stable families. In addition, straight men will be forced under the barrel of the state's gun to pay taxes for the AIDS drugs of gays, their impulsive sex changes, their mental and medical treatments resulting from sleeping with hundreds of partners, and also the salaries of politicians that continue to vote against traditional family values and basic morality standards. Your tax money already goes to Planned Parenthood and pharmaceutical companies to sterilize the female population so what's a few more billion more to empower gays to continue their bathhouse behavior?

I'm also certain that gays will be exempt from dystopian divorce laws. Men's rights activists genuinely think that allowing gays to marry will somehow put the spotlight on straight men getting raped in courts by women, but nothing of the sort will happen. Instead, courts will use two separate books. Gay marriages will be dissolved in an equal manner right down the middle while straight men will continued to be screwed by the system. We're already seeing this dual-book approach with yes-means-yes rape laws that are entirely focused on persecuting men for consensual sex while letting women off the hook for sleeping with drunk men (1, 2, 3). Theoretically, yes-means-yes laws should apply to women just as equally, but we all know it won't, as any man who gets physically assaulted by a woman in public already knows how dangerous it is to fight back to defend himself. Due process was long ago eliminated to favor women, and now it will favor homosexuals.

The increasing limits on heterosexual free speech was clearly shown in my Berlin lecture this summer. I had to hide the venue until the day before to prevent the sort of left-wing censorship that a month later led to thousands of Canadians trying to ban me from the country. On the day of the Berlin lecture, one block away from the hotel, there was a massive gay pride parade where half-naked men under the influence of alcohol and drugs were dancing and humping each other like they were in a nightclub. They dressed up at least one midget as a gimp and put him on a leash. Their hypersexual displays was done out in the open, in full view of families who picked the wrong day to go for a walk in the city, while a group of forty men including myself had to conceal their own behavior and essentially hide in one room, even though the content of my entire speech was more family friendly that witnessing even one minute of the homo display.

Within all the work, school, or co-ed social groups you're a member of, denigrating the nuclear family or masculinity will not get you ostracized or fired. You can make a comment about "toxic masculinity" at work and not get written up by human resources. You can make fun of "lame pick up artists" in your co-ed social circle and get pats on the back. But what happens if you say that homosexuals are degenerates who are spreading HIV to the general population? What happens if you say gay marriage is state-sponsored anal sex? What happens if you say that children should be raised in a nuclear family? You already know the answer. It won't be long until you will be forced to declare your allegiance to the homosexual lifestyle to retain your job, to pretend that you're a believer in social justice just to keep bread on the table.

Even more sinister than modifying our speech and behavior is that the homosexual agenda aims to convert children by sexualizing them at a young age. The media normalizes homosexuals as loving and lively characters by showing their lifestyles as exciting, adventurous, and fun instead of the disease-ridden cesspool of drugs and medical horrors that it really is. Millions of boys who grow up to experiment with “cool” anal sex thanks to the propaganda will grow up to lead sterile and disturbed lives because of it—if they’re lucky enough not to avoid getting abused through adoptions by homosexual men.

Child abuse and pedophilic sex rings will skyrocket, but I hope you’re not expecting this abuse to be covered by the media. Instead, they will push fantastical new rape hoaxes that try to portray straight men as evil. Crimes by homosexuals will be not be pursued or publicized while false crimes done by heterosexuals will be manufactured. Homosexual crimes won’t even be properly recorded by government bureaucrats—statistics on abuse will conveniently stop recording the family makeup of the abuse victim once it becomes clear that homosexuals perform abuse at greater rates than heterosexuals. You just need to close your eyes and remember homosexuals “love” just like heterosexuals.

Once heterosexuals such as yourself are persecuted and shamed for preferring vanilla sex, and children are converted to bisexuality or homosexuality with the aid of a gay and transsexual obsessed media, marriage will decline from its already pathetic rate, birth rates will plummet, and society itself will collapse… unless we find some third-world shithole where we can keep importing immigrants to further destabilize what remaining social fabric is left. Along with feminism, abortion-on-demand, and birth control for all healthy women, gay marriage is a necessary step for destroying American society, and so the man who claims that “gay marriage doesn’t affect me” is like the child who doesn’t understand that eating ice cream every day is a bad idea that will put his future health in jeopardy. It is already affecting your freedom of speech and soon it will affect your sex life and employment.

The dust from gay marriage hasn’t even settled before the establishment has begun forcing transsexual acceptance down our throats with ABC, ESPN, and Starbucks leading the charge. The media has also started attempts to promote pedophilia as a reasonable alternative lifestyle. While I don’t even want to think of what comes next, I do know that if this degenerate march is not halted, we will see a complete inversion of American society where most masculine behaviors are made illegal and the traditional family becomes a relic of the past. Homosexual marriage will only embolden the degenerate forces that have power in America today. Unless they are stopped, I fear great catastrophe, not only for us men, but the country itself.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The Rise Of Heterophobia

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

A Year In Review For Sweden’s Failed Immigration Policies

December 27, 2015 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

2015 will be remembered by Swedes as the year that the migrant crisis hit them with full force. The left-wing government has arguably had the toughest first year that a Swedish government has ever had. Although it’s still in power, it has taken a lot of damage.

The last months especially have been a test on the migration system, and also on the policies of Prime Minister Stefan Löfven and his ministers. We can now conclude that their leftist message of solidarity and openness might get you elected, but doesn’t work in practice.

No room for open discussion

It’s hard to believe that only months ago, it was taboo to say anything remotely negative about immigration or multiculturalism. You couldn’t have a reasonable discussion about it without being called names and subjected to ad hominem attacks. When a number of women this summer tried to spread awareness of the situation in Swedish suburbs, where Muslim men are trying to control women's behavior, they were met not with sympathy but rather accusations of racism.

The irony is that these accusations came from the socialists who also claim to be for the empowerment of women. But when one "oppressed" group (women) criticized another "oppressed" group (Muslims), the leftists took the side of the latter. These are of course the same leftists who said that the terrorists killing the Charlie Hebdo journalists in Paris weren't "real" Muslims.

The amount of immigrants we let in has not been up for discussion either. Dissent of this kind could only find an outlet on the Internet, where you can commit your thoughtcrimes anonymously. But the discontent has also been picked up by the Sweden Democrats, a socially conservative and nationalistic party which first made it into the parliament in 2010. Since then, the seven other major parties, both left and right, have done everything they can to prove how much they oppose them.

Immigration without limits

The main objective the Sweden Democrats is to limit immigration to a minimum, thereby making Sweden more homogeneous. For this they have often been called racist and xenophobic by politicians and commentators. The Prime Minister himself a year ago called them a "neo-fascist" party. His Minister of Finance followed up by saying that they "don't stand for basic values about all people having an equal worth."

To want to limit immigration has been synonymous with hatred for "the other." The Deputy Prime Minister and her party, the Green Party, said that they "will never make it more difficult for people to come to Sweden." When asked in an interview how many refugees Sweden could accept, the Prime Minister said that "there is no limit."

Then the migrant crisis came into full swing. Scores of migrants started flooding the shores of Greece and Italy. At least a million people came to Europe this year, and most of them came on boats over the Mediterranean. Many wanted to go to Germany and Sweden, where they were greeted with open arms.

In the beginning of September, just when the immigration curve started turning sharply upward, 15,000 Swedes gathered at a square in Stockholm to welcome the “refugees.” The Prime Minister made a fiery speech in front of the cheering masses. “Sweden will continue to take responsibility for this,” he said, claiming that it was a matter of human rights. “My Europe welcomes people who flee from war.”

Collapse followed

But being “responsible” was easier said than done. Thousands upon thousands of immigrants arrived in a constant flow, and their numbers grew for every week that passed. At one point, ten thousand of them applied for asylum every week (but only about half of the immigrants actually seek asylum, while the other half stays under the radar). It all led to what can be described as a system collapse.

Local governments all over the country reported that the situation was quickly reaching critical levels. Health care and social services were under enormous pressure. Schools couldn’t find enough teachers to match the great number of new immigrant students.

The police were under pressure too. They had to spend a lot of their resources on keeping the immigrants under control and breaking up fights at asylum facilities. Common crimes like theft and assault were given a lower priority.

End to illusions

But perhaps the biggest issue was the shortage of accommodation. Without any room left at the usual facilities, asylum seekers slept in gym halls, churches, warehouses and other places. Putting up tent camps was an option, but organizing everything and getting the right permits took a long time. Some, mostly unaccompanied men, were forced to sleep outside in the cold.

Finally, the government had to cave in to the pressure. Border controls were erected. At a press conference at the end of November, The Prime Minister and his deputy announced new policies to make fewer immigrants come to Sweden. Swedish migration laws were adapted to the “minimum level” of the EU. The Deputy Prime Minister was close to tears as she explained that it was the right thing to do.

In December, the two government parties with support from the Sweden Democrats passed a law stating that everyone traveling into the country had to show a valid ID. This law was also meant to reduce the number of asylum seekers. During the weeks after these decisions, their numbers did drop considerably, to about 3,000 per week.

The Deputy Prime Minister could barely hold back the tears.

Honesty will be rewarded

It's amazing what a few months of crisis can do to politicians. Those beautiful words about responsibility and solidarity didn't seem to mean much when things got tough. The government said there were no limit to how many immigrants could come. That turned out to be untrue, and in the end, the leftist government passed laws with the approval of the "neo-fascist" Sweden Democrats. The open arms that first greeted the migrants were replaced with laws basically telling them to go someplace else.

The moral of the story is, don't make promises you can't keep. But the very reason that these kinds of politicians get elected is that they promise a lot and say nice things, with no connection to reality. In the real world, you constantly have to make hard decisions, but people are stupid enough to vote for those who make things sound easy.

If there's one thing we can learn from this year, it's that honesty and realism ultimately pays off. Polls show that the Sweden Democrats' support has increased dramatically over the year. The party got 19.9 percent in one poll, 7 percentage points more than it got in last year's election. The two government parties, the Social Democrats and the Green Party, dropped 3.4 and 1 percentage points respectively. 58 percent of Swedes have little confidence in the current administration.

Today, the Sweden Democrats are the third biggest party. But at this rate, when it's time to sum up 2016, they will easily have become the biggest of them all.

Read More: New Forecast Says 160,000 Immigrants Will Seek Asylum In Sweden This Year

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

4 Things We Should Always Be Grateful For

December 28, 2015 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

As we close yet another year, it's easy to look back and feel bad about all that's been happening around the world and of the social realities that men are currently facing. Instead of dwelling on these negative aspects of life, I think it's important for us to appreciate all the things that we do have and be grateful that we still have them. Gratitude is something we can all have more of and an important aspect of living life fully.

1. Family And Friends

Assuming your family and friends are not completely toxic, take the time to appreciate all the times they've been there for you. If you don't think much of them now, try to rekindle your relationship and find out new things about them. If you feel that they have wronged you in any way, forgive them and try to understand them. It's important to get out of your head once in a while to put your focus on other people instead of on yourself. Our social connections are one of our prime sources of happiness and they should not be neglected.

2. Wealth Of Knowledge

Know how great it is that we live in an age where so much knowledge is available to so many. If you are reading this right now, it means that you have access to the internet where you can learn just about anything for free. And with a small fee, you can have access to online courses to learn useful skills instead of going in debt to go to college or university. All that knowledge is right there online and within your reach only if you have the curiosity to search for them.

Then there are the public libraries where you have access to more books than you could ever read in your lifetime. Great works of literature and books on history, philosophy, science, and so on, that are not available on the internet, are all in your local library. Take advantage of them.

Last, don’t neglect the lessons of life. You can’t learn the important life lessons just by reading about them; oftentimes, experience is the greatest teacher that you can have. Instead of living blindly, live consciously with full awareness. You can choose to view your past failures with regrets and self-pity, or as experiences to learn and grow from—the choice is yours to take.

3. A Healthy, Functioning Body

Nick Vujicic was born without arms or legs and is living life to the fullest. What’s your excuse?

If you can read this with your eyes, if you can walk and talk and are free from a serious illness or disability, then consider yourself blessed. You don’t realize how great you have it right now until you lose your body with age or accident. You don’t realize the gift of health until you become sick and diseased. You don’t have to wait until any of those misfortunes happen; you can start to be grateful for having a healthy and functioning body right this moment.

If you ever feel like life is not fair and think you have it bad, watch the video below. You’ll realize that you have nothing to complain about.

4. Opportunities

Our world is full of endless opportunities. It's easy to overlook just how much choice and options we have in this world when you limit yourself to what you've been taught and live by the way society expects you to do. The catch is, you must be willing to put yourself out of your comfort zone. Without risk, you won't gain much. Without breaking the routine, you will not change.

Don't like your job? Find an alternative source of income. Don't like where you live? Leave and find a better place. Don't like your life? Learn about yourself and the world and make the change. In spite of all the bitching about having to live in a feminist or 'socialist' society, the truth is that we have more opportunities than those who live in third world squalors and have more options and mobility than almost all human beings that have ever existed since the dawn of civilization.

Conclusion

Some of you may balk at the very idea of living a life of gratitude, thinking that gratitude is for the weak who are without passion, or that it is antithetical to striving for greatness, but I can tell you right now that none of that is true. You can be grateful for the things that you have in your life and still be ambitious and realistic without succumbing to complacency.

By appreciating what you have, you bring in greater satisfaction to your life and may even lead you to set proper priorities.

One small thing you can do to practice gratitude is to just take couple of minutes every night before you go to bed to think about something or someone you are grateful for. It's important not just to think and remember it, but to feel it through your body as you do this. Just give it a try for few weeks and see how you feel.

It’s okay to take some moment to appreciate the simple things in life; your goals and troubles won’t go away, but you just might find more satisfaction and joy.

Read More: 10 Things Every College Student Needs To Know

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Star Wars Lost $4.2 Million Because Of Our Reporting That Identified It As SJW Propaganda

December 28, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Fifty-five percent of respondents to a Return of Kings Twitter poll have said that online reporting of the social justice nature of The Force Awakens influenced their decision whether to see the film. Extended across our readership, with over 900,000 users accessing ROK between November 21 and December 21, this amounts to a potential direct impact of $4,219,456.54 (55% x $8.38 x 915,482) on total revenues. $8.38 is based on the average cinema ticket price in the US, which is now an all-time high.

This figure does not include those men who haven't visited in the past month but know to stay clear away from Hollywood propaganda films thanks to our previous reporting. They have been learning to question the narrative of popular culture, and many would have done so without reading ROK's recent commentary concerning The Force Awakens. The $4.2 million estimate also does not include future sales that will be surely lost from Star Wars DVD's, collectibles, and other promotional tie-ins.

[image]

My review of the Star Wars sequel was not this site's only take on this year's über-SJW film release. Guest contributor Inigo Montoya also opined about its non-white and female agenda. Whilst ROK regards itself as a unique media outlet, we are not the only positive source of non-mainstream news, self-improvement advice, and cultural commentary. What happens when we add together the reach of Breitbart, The Daily Caller, Gotnews.com and a host of other sources with our own?

SJWs and their sycophants can speculate all they wish about the veracity of the $4.2 million figure for ROK, but the fact remains that total revenues for The Force Awakens have been lowered in demonstrable terms by our balanced, critical reporting and those of our common sense allies. A fair estimate when all this alternative commentary is combined would be in the tens of millions of dollars.

Meeting the SJW retort head on Irrespective of the power of the Galactic Disney Empire, The Force Awakens will sputter compared to the much more limited release of, say, Gone with the Wind or even the original Star Wars.

SJWs, including long-time critics of ROK, have been quick in trying to mock calls to boycott The Force Awakens. They argue the money the film has already made and will make before it leaves cinemas points to a "failure." But is this really what they are saying it is? With hundreds and sometimes thousands of employees, large media conglomerates are able to saturate the airwaves, printed pages, and websites with fawning praise of The Force Awakens' feminist undertones. Possessing much smaller numbers of contributors and without the financial largesse of media tycoons or corporations, the manosphere and other voices have nevertheless successfully and markedly chipped away at the revenues of the film.

For those of you still wanting to laugh at such a proposition, remind yourselves that the world we live in is more populated, wealthier (due to technology and connectedness), and English-speaking than in the past. Film companies also flood consumers' minds with exhortations to watch their works in ways unheard of in the past. Because of this, even Avatar, the second most successful film of all time after inflation (and significantly due to more expensive 3D tickets), is an underachievement compared to far less marketed earlier films released in the "smaller" world of old. Many more people were able to watch it and it failed to really streak away from its predecessors. Likewise, relative to 2015, The Force Awakens will not be the financially spellbinding piece of cinema it is being made out as.

Avatar, which SJWs pilloried as perpetuating "white messiah" syndrome, where a Caucasian appropriates an indigenous culture and then ironically saves them from fellow Caucasians, still made over $2 billion at the box office. So if leftists equate box office success—albeit success which is artificially inflated by a larger world—with being in the "right," their logic needs some serious fine-tuning. By that standard, is the Transformers series a cultural and moral masterpiece because it made billions in ticket sales?

If SJWs didn't fear the power of our message, they wouldn't try to suppress it and spend millions promulgating their own

Armed with the largest bullhorns and supernova-level self-entitlement, SJWs still cannot drown out more thought-out messages like ours.

Compared, ironically, to the Rebel Alliance or Resistance, operating with less sophisticated equipment and a small number of audacious political pilots, ROK and its friends continue to strike blows against the bloated mass of SJW rhetoric. Even as SJWs meticulously use methods of doxing and attempting to get people firedto discourage free speech against their positions, their lies continue to be challenged (Thunderf00t, we salute you).

Multibillion-dollar film companies may acquiesce to SJW cravings, releasing films that don’t offend real or fictitious groups that include women, minorities, and hairier-than-usual Wookies. Yet the proponents of constant political agendas convince themselves they succeed through their grit and skill alone. When their millionaire and billionaire patrons are stripped from them, what are they left with?

The release of The Force Awakens will only increase the esteem in which our contrarian reporting is held. And many more men will act on similar advice of ours going forward.

Read More: Why Star Wars: The Force Awakens Is A Social Justice Propaganda Film

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why A Cashless Society Is A Bad Thing

December 28, 2015 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

It will probably come as no surprise to readers to learn that Sweden, that paradise on earth, is leading the way into another Elysium of social "freedom" and "equality." You might even mockingly call it "financial social justice." A recent New York Times article discusses Sweden's push to get rid of cash entirely. It paints a disturbing picture.

Despite the fact that the number of electronic fraud cases in the country reached 140,000 (more than double the number from ten years ago, according to the Ministry of Justice), officials are determined to force the population to use plastic, credit, or electronic means to pay for goods and services. Some banks, apparently, don't even dispense or accept cash.

The threat, of course, lies in the fact that now every single financial transaction will leave a record, and will be monitored. If something is being recorded, then by definition it is being monitored, despite attempts by the authorities to massage away this distinction. It is simply a matter of degree. And as always, such an "innovation" is being wrapped in peals of praise about how much it is going to "help" everyone.

Why This Is Not Good

Besides the privacy problem, which alone should be sufficient reason not to implement the plan, there are other compelling reasons “going cashless” is not a good idea:

1. It will marginalize elderly people and poor people who are used to paying for things in cash, and are deeply suspicious (with good reason) of electronic payment systems.

2. It will encourage people to spend frivolously, since paying for things on one’s smart phone is fast and easy. This will likely contribute to debt problems, gambling problems, and all sorts of irresponsible behavior. A student interviewed at the University of Gothenberg admitted that if she had a 500 krona note, she would think twice about spending it; electronic payment brought little to no psychological hesitation.

3. Holding physical currency (paper money or coin) doesn’t really cost the holder anything besides inflation. But digital currency in banks can get eroded very, very easily with fees, charges, and all the other games that banks like to play.

4. Are banks really willing and capable of handing all the millions and millions of tiny transactions that would happen every day? From my fifteen years’ of experience with dealing with banks, I’ve learned that the average bank dork can’t even organize a roll of toilet paper. It’s difficult to see how the average bank is going to be competent enough to handle all these transactions efficiently. They are going to charge everyone though the teeth for their learning curve. Just you wait.

5. Digital currency would be vulnerable to disruption by fraud or terrorist attacks.

6. Moving to digital currency might even speed up the demise of the US dollar as the world’s reserve currency. There are huge amounts of dollars in circulation abroad. It is possible that holders of dollars abroad would sell them quickly, as a reaction to the uncertain future of the electronic world.

Not surprisingly, the government and big business are working hand in hand to see that this dream becomes a reality. What is the real reason it is being pushed? It all comes down to power, control, and profits: that is, the government wants more power, and big business wants to make more money.

Government And Big Finance Loves It

By turning everything into a digital transaction, the banks are guaranteed the ability to make huge amounts of money on fees. They will be taking a cut on everything that moves in and out of their hands, which means every single thing. Leif Trogen, an official at the Swedish Bankers’ Association, has basically admitted as much.

Of course, the plan is being lauded by claiming that not having cash around helps to “protect” people from random robberies. But now the entire population is going to get robbed by the banks and the government.

Apparently, cash now represents only about 2 percent of Sweden’s financial transactions. In the United States, this figure is supposedly 7.7 percent, and in the Eurozone, 10 percent (I find these figures hard to believe).

Regardless, the government has given the plan its tacit approval by doing nothing to stop it. As noted above, electronic payments leave a crystal-clear record, and this assists in population control and tax collection.

People are also now going to be bombarded with intrusive solicitations for money for all sorts of things. Picking electronic pockets is even easier than picking regular ones. This whole idea of “safety” is a lie promoted by the government to justify its policies.

One disturbing story tells us all we need to know. During one recent church service at the Filadelfia Stockholm church, the church’s bank account number was projected onto a large screen, and parishoners were asked to take out their smartphones and donate. Anyone not complying would attract attention. Churches are noticing that donations have increased dramatically as a result of these new types of collection tactics.

The last thing Sweden needs is more conformist pressure.

A lot of this talk reminds thoughtful observers of the days when governments told us how great it would be for everyone if we de-coupled our currencies from the gold standard. Paradise, we were assured, was just around the corner. Governments would be able to print more money. More liquidity would mean more prosperity. All sorts of spending could take place without any financial discipline.

And yet people today work harder and harder for less and less. Maybe what they really should have said was that getting off the gold standard would be good for the elites and for governments, but not for the citizens. I am not necessarily saying that we should go back to the gold standard, but there should at least be some way of imbuing a currency (even a fiat one) with confidence.

It is difficult to feel confident about a glowing number on a computer screen that you can’t see or touch.

Currencies Need One Of Two Things

But perhaps the best analysis here is to look at history. As I see it, any form of currency must have one of two things to succeed:

1. People must believe in it, and have faith in its integrity. This is the basis of all paper money (i.e., fiat currencies) issued by governments today. Whether such faith in governments is justified is a separate question.

2. The currency must have some intrinsic value itself (i.e., gold, silver, copper, etc.). This is the old-fashioned type of money. In the old days (at least in theory), all money was backed by some precious metal.

When we look at digital currency, we could argue that it possesses neither of these requirements. At least paper money could be held in the hand or in the pocket. Digital currency is about as ethereal as one can get. It is difficult to see this as more “trustworthy” than paper money. And it goes without saying that digital currency will not be backed by precious metals.

When all is said and done, it is difficult to see this as yet another scheme by governments and banks to control us, monitor us, and make us pay for the privilege.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Is Theranos A Girl-Powered Scam?

December 29, 2015 | by Justin Puck | Link | Original Link

Elizabeth Holmes was supposed to be the grrl powered answer to Steve Jobs, black turtleneck and all. At the encouragement of a professor, she dropped out of Stanford University at 19 years old to continue the startup that she (wait for it…) founded in her dorm room. She opened offices in Palo Alto, garnered high profile board members, heavy hitting financial backers, Ted conference appearances and eager media cheer leading as the dollars rolled in and she became America's youngest female billionaire.

Her stratospheric rise was a shot across the bow to the male dominated tech industry (the medical tech industry, at least) demonstrating that yes, women can do it too and you'd better be ready for us.

Bug eyed and bushy tailed.

Disruptive technology, they say

The revolutionary product at the core of Theranos (a company name beget from "therapy" and "diagnosis") was a proprietary blood test method that only required drops of blood through a pin prick at the pharmacy versus big needles and vials full of blood, a doctors visit and a lab order. Results would be delivered within a few hours, versus days, be more affordable, less intimidating and accessible to the masses.

This was the disruptive answer to the $75 billion dollar a year market dominated by lab testing giants Quest Diagnostics and Laboratory Corporation of America (LabCorp.) A deal was struck with Walgreens to offer Theranos tests in select locations, with more on the way.

The “one tiny drop” line is no longer on their web site.

Then, right before the IPO, the balloon popped. In October, a series of reports emerged ranging from FDA allegations of uncleared medical devices to employee allegations that Theranos isn’t using the technology they claim to have. What happened?

The list of board members at Theranos is impressive, albeit one comprised mostly of DC insiders and people completely disconnected with the medical technology industry. What interested them? A strong likelihood is the desire to corner the market on less expensive lab tests, especially since both LabCorp and Quest have both been prosecuted for diagnostic testing fraud before.

Moreover, Theranos technology ostensibly replaces visits to primary care doctors, a welcome relief to existing federal programs as well as the imminent costs of Obamacare. Hence, the ability to get on board was probably too big a temptation for the early adopters to ignore. Throw in a blond female Stanford dropout in silicon valley as the face of the company, and it looks like nobody even bothered with basic due diligence – it was just too good to be true.

Due diligence?

What about Elizabeth Holmes, the illustrious founder? Yes, she’s a billionaire—but only if you take in the exuberant valuations of Theranos, of which she is 51% owner. The “self made billionaire” line is watered down a bit more considering it was all men who gave her the 400 million in actual cash raised. Her mother was a congressional staffer while dad held several executive positions at USAID, undoubtedly facilitating access to connected men like Henry Kissenger, an early Theranos board member.

Holmes is a child prodigy who, while living abroad at age 9, claims to have sold C++ compilers to Chinese customers (citation needed), and also got the privilege of working at the Genome Institute in Singapore the summer after her freshman year at Stanford, since she speaks Mandarin, they say.

Whether or not she speaks any Mandarin (props to anyone who can find a clip of her doing so), the gleeful writers trumpeting this grrl power accomplishment neglected to realize that Singapore's native language is English, not Chinese. Even the Genome Institute web site is English-only, and none of the student programs require Chinese language. Because Holmes is a Silicon Valley fixture with a Chinese connection, she's recently been paraded around as America's answer to Jack Ma.

Reality check: she quits school at 19 years old to run a medical technology startup in several areas where PhDs spend decades researching just one aspect of each, and we are supposed to accept the fact that she's got it all figured out, just like that? Got it.

This ain't the taxi business, honey

Most Theranos tests use the same needle and diagnostic machines you are used to.

Fast forward past the Tech Crunch presentations, the black turtlenecks and mystery shrouded secret-sauce technology at Theranos and exaggerated business relationships, and people are finally starting to wonder. Walgreens recently halted the addition of any more Theranos machines at their pharmacies until questions about their accuracy are answered.

The scientific community is finally questioning the science behind the tests, and while Thernanos talks transparency they have yet to deliver the goods. Hopefully by now they at least have a lawyer good enough to identify when they might actually be selling medical devices, but who knows.

Not quite Steve Jobs, in spite of the turtleneck.

In the end, the Silicon Valley community and the media in general fell in love with the story. After the firing of Ellen Pao from her short stint at Reddit, the likely canning of Marissa Mayer from Yahoo in the not-too-distant future, it hasn't been looking too good for females in senior tech roles lately.

If Theranos fails, given all of the smoke and mirrors and the backing from several rich powerful men on both coasts, it would be ridiculous for Holmes to blame the patriarchy – and truthfully, she doesn't seem the SJW type. But that doesn't mean someone else won't do it for her. Stay tuned.

Read More: The Truth About Women In STEM

Justin Puck
Slickyboy is a lawyer but hates to admit it, a veteran who can't stand yellow ribbon stickers, and a well traveled hack with a reasonably accurate bullshit detector. You can follow his random musings on Twitter.

Why Don’t SJWs Call Bill Clinton A Rapist?

December 29, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Well, I would say that everybody should be believed at first until they are disbelieved based on evidence.
>
> — Hillary Clinton, in response to a question about whether her husband’s sexual assault and rape accusers, Juanita Broaddrick, Paula Jones and Kathleen Willey, should be believed.

In recent years, Hillary Clinton has tried to jostle her way into becoming the nation’s premier sexual assault grandstander. For this mantle she faces stiff competition, particularly in the form of perpetual due process haters like Senators Claire McCaskill and Kirsten Gillibrand. Clinton has told “survivors” (read: accusers) of sexual assault that they have “the right to be believed.” Apparently, though, this right does not extend to those who have previously alleged that her husband Bill sexually harassed or raped them.

Hillary was asked after a recent address whether Bill Clinton accusers Juanita Broaddrick, Paula Jones and Kathleen Willey should be believed. She responded that women should be believed initially and provided they are not “disbelieved based on evidence.” She then laughed broadly, without stipulating how exactly the allegations against Bill Clinton had been disproven, especially since her husband paid Paula Jones $850,000 in the 1990s to stop pursuing her sexual harassment claim. Ironically, Clinton’s answer came within days of literally thousands of people declaring James Deen a rapist due to tweets and other social media posts.

Cranking up the feminist rhetoric in the lead-up to her 2016 Presidential run, Hillary has attached herself to everything both rape-related and leftwing, from the Mattress Girl debacle to the fabricated 1-in-5 campus sexual assault statistic. The media will happily try to fact-check Donald Trump on matters like New Jersey Muslims allegedly celebrating the 9/11 attacks, but patently fails to give the same attention to a woman who calls for guilty until proven innocent for every man accused of rape, bar her husband.

Why doesn't the powerful man, vulnerable woman thesis ever apply to Bill Clinton?

If there's any reason to "disbelieve" Paula Jones and Juanita Broaddrick, and to a lesser extent Kathleen Willey, why isn't it public knowledge? How do the Clintons benefit from ambiguity?

We constantly hear about how powerful men accused of sexual assault and/or rape, from Bill Cosby to Jian Ghomeshi, supposedly get away with it because of their position, wealth, or fame. Conversely, one is supposed to believe that Bill Clinton's accusers have fallen away because he is actually innocent. So, in other words, an African-American sitcom star with chronic arthritis is powerful enough to act with impunity for years but the President of the United States wasn't able to potentially suppress or force his way out of rape allegations?

Clinton's social and political capital as the most powerful man of the 1990s more than eclipsed any financial or celebrity clout possessed by a middle-aged and then decrepit Bill Cosby. Even when we look at the least credible Clinton accuser, Kathleen Willey, who said Bill fondled her in 1993, it is easy to see her as a "non-perfect victim" in feminist parlance.

Coming up against the most formidable leader in the world, can we really expect she would hold her story together? Remember, Jackie Coakley and Emma Sulkowicz are forgiven by SJWs for massive delays in accusing and blatant changes in their stories, and this is when their falsely accused targets are mere students.

The power game, not justice, is what Hillary Clinton wants

[image]
Imagine the outcry if Bill Cosby paid one of his accusers $850,000 to shut up, as Bill Clinton did to placate Paula Jones.

As a well-known lawyer, Hillary Clinton defended a man accused of child rape and she was recorded laughing about the trial later. Then, when she was even older and her husband was campaigning for President, she labeled sexual harassment and rape allegations against her husband as "bimbo eruptions". Purported slut-shaming and other attempts to undermine women were part of Hillary's own political toolkit well before she started excoriating so-called misogynists for doing exactly the same thing.

Fundamentally, her desire for rape convictions by social media is designed to win her the crucial backing of the rabid SJWs so accustomed to stealing both the media's spotlight and bias. Her husband, who has a history of lying about extramarital affairs outside the other criminal accusations, will conveniently have his alleged rape antecedence brushed aside. Meanwhile, men without Bill's history of overall deceit, including Paul Nungesser, will continue to be crucified in print, on television and online as "rapists".

Expect the worst when Hillary is elected

A small glimpse of how Hillary will act as President.

For the record, I do not believe Bill Clinton harassed, raped, or sexually assaulted any of these women. If I did, it still wouldn't remove the onus on his accusers and the state to secure any convictions via the courts. One can only sigh at how Bill Clinton is excused from the SJW mob mentality that literally hunts down and destroys the career prospects and lives of men never found guilty by the system, from Paul Nungesser to the Duke lacrosse team.

We live in a surreal world where the characters of powerless male students are impugned but the most influential members of the left will be afforded all the formal and informal protections of classical liberal jurisprudence. One can be sure that other Democratic political figures have been privately accused of sexual assault or rape but managed to stifle the voices of their accusers.

Is it just me or is the end of 2016 and the likely ascension of Hillary Clinton to the White House going to mark another Brave New World for trials by public opinion?

Read More: In Praise Of Alpha Male Bill Clinton

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Ways To Keep Your Woman From Cheating

December 29, 2015 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A couple months back, Roosh posted the results of ROK's first reader survey. One bullet point in Section 7 grabbed my attention like a fake tittied brunette: Handling Infidelity.

I'll go ahead and save everyone the time and an unnecessary article and reveal the one and only way to handle sexual disloyalty from your woman:

Y*ou don't.*

Drop her like the cheating slut she is and don't look back. Easier said than done, but we all know taking back a cheating woman will turn your life upside down in a hurry.

The best way to handle infidelity is to prevent it from happening in the first place. So here are my tried and true, three best remedies to keep your girl from spreadin' em for other dudes.

1. Flirt with other girls in front of her

Don’t be afraid to mix it up with a broad or two when you’re with your main chick

No, this doesn’t mean number closing a girl in front of your woman (though you should be doing this when you’re not with her anyway vis-à-vis keeping your abundance mentality intact).

But striking up a conversation and lightly flirting with pretty girls and allowing them to flirt back will do three things: 1) Create drama (which girls love), 2) elicit feelings of dread within her, and 3) show her you can and will find her replacement if she doesn’t keep her shit together.

When a female is embroiled in drama due to feeling like her boyfriend is “becoming distant” and “may be straying” because he consistently shows he isn’t afraid to flirt with or eye fuck other chicks when she’s with him, all she can think about is what he might be doing when he’s not around. This leaves her very little energy or time to think about much else, let alone other men in her orbit.

Yeah, she’ll be pissed, and yeah she’ll throw fits. Hell, she may even call you out in public to attempt to rattle you. But so long as you maintain frame and remain unapologetic and nonchalant about the whole “ordeal” she will make all three of her luscious holes available for the taking at your discretion to keep you from poking other chicks.

After her tantrum, she WILL turn up the heat

Within the context of a sexual relationship in 2015, feminism combined with their hard wiring has rendered females powerless against this technique. They quite literally and involuntarily reward behaviors conducive to infidelity. More availability, less clothing, ass to mouth, it’s all on the table when she thinks you’re about to step out on her.

But remember, if you apologize or promise it won’t happen again you’re fucked. Not only have you shown zero backbone, you’ve allowed her to emotionally manipulate you which means the script has been flipped.

So flirt away, don’t feed into the ensuing emotional shenanigans, be utterly unapologetic for your exploits, and watch her transform from a bitchy prude to an insatiable, degenerate porn starlet who all of a sudden can’t get enough of your cock right before your very eyes.

2. Never say “I’m sorry”……EVER

A man likely headed for blue balls

Outside of those three little magic words (when being the first to say it) the phrase “I’m sorry” ranks up there as the most sniveling, beta-fied garbage you can utter to a female.

When you apologize to a woman for anything you have or haven’t done, you’re telling her that you regret your actions and would do things differently if given the chance…which reeks of fear, pandering, and oneitis—all of which make her resent you with a seething contempt like you’ve never seen.

Girls want a man who does what he wants, when he wants, and how he wants without reservation or apology, even if she happens to be in his line of fire. Like the flirting, she’ll throw a tantrum and call you every name under the sun when you don’t give her the apology she’s looking for.

When the smoke clears you may have a headache but you’ll definitely have her respect, which is probably the single most important element to keep your woman from running around on you.

[image]

Women almost never respond well to “I’m sorry”

If you’re at your girl’s place and you drop and break one of her glasses or dishes: “My bad.” Admitting or acknowledging fault is very different from being sorry.

Forget to pick up whatever useless thing she squawked about on your way home from work? “My fault. I’ll get it tomorrow.” And leave it at that.

Even if she catches you balls deep in another female DO. NOT. APOLOGIZE.

“But Donovan, there’s nothing wrong with saying you’re sorry about something you’re sorry about, right?

Wrong. Dead fucking wrong. Are you really sorry you broke her dinner plate? Did you really regret slaying that slut? Of course not. So if you're not sorry about something, don't fucking apologize.

Further, women know when you're truly remorseful and when you're not. Apologizing for something you both know you're not sorry about is like failing a shit test she didn't deploy.

No apologies from this guy

The bottom line is that when you apologize to your woman for anything, right or wrong, she loses respect for you. Be a man, stay disciplined, and don't succumb to the instant perceived gratification that comes with a heartfelt apology.

Weather the storm and reap the benefits that come with being the man she wants and needs. Doing the opposite too often almost guarantees she'll be swallowing the salty loads of someone who doesn't even apologize when he smacks the shit out of her for mentioning your name.

3. Be unabashedly selfish

[image]
Make it all about you

Show me a man who says "It's all about her" when referring to his woman and I'll show you a man who is being or is about to get cheated on.

Females have it easy in this part of the world, and they know it. Just about everything is handed to them from the cradle to the grave—most notably, male attention, deference, and subservience. Girls have been steeped in all of this their entire lives and as a result they are desensitized to it and take it for granted.

I touched on female indifference to the abundance of male adoration in a column I wrote last month:

> …when a man exhibits similar reverence in her presence it doesn't arouse her because she's quite literally desensitized to that kind of attention. She's been getting it all her life and can get it whenever she wants. It's human nature to take something for granted if it's readily available to us and male idolatry is no different.

The reason women cheat with impunity on men who "live for them" is because he's putting her on a pedestal. Deep down women know they're not worthy of such reverence and any man who doesn't recognize this will be punished with bitchiness, neurotic behavior, and of course, cuckoldry.

Females want nothing more than to surrender to a masculine, confident man who would be just fine with or without her. They project this desire by treating men like extensions of themselves because they long to be an extension of a man.

A man who exhibits overt selfishness tells a woman in no uncertain terms that he lives for himself. And when she gets it through her thick skull that her man is the captain of the ship, she begins to make emotional (and sometimes even financial) investments into the relationship.

It is infinitely harder for women to be unfaithful to a man she's invested time and emotion into. Remember, females are accustomed to getting some sort of ROI so they rarely walk away from or jeopardize something they've put so much time and work into.

[image]
Fuck her feelings….do what you want

Making all the decisions on movies and restaurants, paying zero attention to her "needs" in bed, making her change her plans to suit your schedule, and doing only what you want to do on date are just a few of an ocean of examples blatant selfishness.

I'll reiterate that like the flirting and lack of apologies, your "me first" attitude will rub her the wrong way and she may very well voice her discontent. But we all know a shit test when we see one and this is no different. Stand your ground and you will have her respect and loyalty.

A personal anecdote

The following conversation happened a week before Thanksgiving at a shopping center with a girl I've been seeing for a few months:

Her: Did you just look at her with me standing here?!

Me: Yeah <my tone and posture reflected a "it's no big deal" attitude>

Her: You disrespectful asshole!

Me: Calm down…you're bein' a drama queen.

Her: You look at some random girl in front of me and instead of apologizing you call me a fucking drama queen?!

Me: Grab your shit, we're leaving. And you're making stir fry tonight.

Her: <laughing> You expect me to cook for you after this? Fuck you, I'm not making you shit.

Me: Fine. I'm taking you home.

Her: Good!

I didn't say a word to her the entire ride to her place even though she bitched the entire time calling me names, telling me I wasn't shit, and that she "can't do this anymore." I dropped her off, went home and proceeded to make my stir fry.

She acts up, I handle dinner myself

She held out longer than I thought she would but she eventually called and came over that night, apologized for being a drama queen, and turned on the slut antics.

I held frame at all costs, including her possible departure, and she ended up apologizing for a situation I created with what may or may not have been disrespectful behavior I inflicted on her. That's the power of this brand of next level game.

Even if she had decided to never to talk to me again after the fiasco (which was a real possibility as this was not an isolated occurrence), I would not have called and apologized. I'll admit it would have sucked to lose the guaranteed pussy, but that loss pales in comparison if I had lost her respect—which would have ultimately resulted in losing her anyway.

Does this work all the time?

Of course not. No strategy is bulletproof. Besides, a lot of girls will cheat on you anyway regardless of how tight your game is. That's just how it is in today's sexual marketplace.

But along with standard red pill game, I've personally found that utilizing these three tactics not only drastically reduces a woman's desire or even thoughts of cheating, it keeps them on their toes and triggers her to exhibit good behavior to keep you around.

It's absolutely paramount that you not cave into the pressure she will inflict on you when you deploy this style of game. If you try to console her with an apology for looking at the pert ass of a passerby, and then ask her what restaurant she'd like you to take her to in order to "make it up to her," you're in for big problems down the road—count on it.

So long as you withstand the initial verbal assaults and tantrums, you'll be well rewarded in the long run. Delayed gratification and discipline is an effective mindset when dealing with your finances. The same applies when dealing with your woman.

Read Next: 12 Reasons Your Woman Will End Up Cheating On You

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

5 Things That Will Not Happen In The Future

December 30, 2015 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

Anticipating what will not happen in the future is just as important as attempting to predict what will happen. Here then are five things the future will not bring.

1. An Admission Of Fault From The Left

If history is any guide, the left's response to the failure of its own policies will not be acknowledgement of wrongdoing, acceptance of blame, and reversal of direction but rather a doubling down, a claim of liberal policies and initiatives not having gone far enough, and accusations of reactionary elements thwarting progress.

In the 1930s, when peasant farmers failed to meet unrealistic grain quotas, Stalin blamed the kulaks for resisting collectivization of their farms. Rather than reduce quotas and attempt to modernize the Soviet Union over a more reasonable timescale, Stalin instituted an uncompromising campaign of deportation, mass execution, and grain confiscation that resulted in the starvation of millions (the Holodomor).

A similar policy existed in the Gulag, where prisoners who failed to meet their daily quotas of timber or gold were denied food, further weakening them and making it impossible to meet the next day's quota in a murderous spiral that led to collapse from exhaustion and hunger. As part of the Great Leap Forward, Mao initiated a campaign to industrialize China that involved peasants attempting to forge high quality steel in small backyard furnaces. These backyard furnaces were only capable of producing useless low-quality pig iron, yet Mao decided not to order the halt of the practice so as not to dampen the revolutionary fervor sweeping the countryside.

Recently, we have seen the refusal of the left to acknowledge its own mistakes in the manner in which campus officials responded to the demands of the Black Lives Matters protesters: not with suspensions and expulsions, but rather with concessions. University administrators responded with more funding for student cultural centers, the hiring of more minority faculty, and even their own resignations. To do otherwise would be to forsake the legacy of their SDS forebears.

Consequently, even when confronted with a demographic winter and an entire generation of autistic and aspie children borne of career women whose bodies are incapable of yielding healthy children, do not expect the left to admit that pushing women into the workforce and delaying motherhood was anything other than a good thing.

2. Improvement Of The American Public School System

For a number of reasons, there will be no improvement to the American K-12 educational system. First, there is no imperative for America to improve its own public school system so long as it can continue to rely on external talent. The United States will continue to reap the fruits of the far superior preparatory educational systems of other countries (China, South Korea, India). If America can import foreign talent, it has no need to cultivate domestic talent.

Second, demographic trends dictate that American student performance will only worsen. There are now more minority students than white students at the Kindergarten level. This numerical superiority will propagate like a wave along a jump rope held at both ends, through the elementary school, then middle school, and finally high school level. With many students coming from a background that is often staunchly anti-intellectual and deeply resentful of any attempts to academically uplift them, average student performance will plummet.

The wealthy will continue sending their children to private schools and preparatory academies and will be insulated from this trend. White children of poor and middle class backgrounds will suffer the most: unless they summon the self-discipline to challenge themselves by supplementing what they learn at school through independent learning, they will not be able to compete and will be condemned to meager university and job prospects.

The American public school system will continue its devolution into a government-run daycare. It will be a holding pen for juvenile delinquents too young for prison. It will be a plantation where the female teachers get their jollies with the varsity athletes that excite them in ways their beta husbands never could. In response to free-falling student performance, expect the usual appeal from the teacher's union for ever more funding.

3. Legalization Of Marijuana For Recreational Use On A National Level

We will not see the federal legalization of marijuana for recreational use. We won't see the legalization of recreational cannabis on a widespread state level either. Populous states like New York, California, and Florida will not join the ranks of Colorado, Oregon, and Alaska.

There is a reason why drugs have been outlawed. A $5 joint is more enjoyable and mind-expanding than a $5,000 vacation. Legalizing marijuana would drastically curtail material consumption. The American economy is driven by crass consumerism. The taxes raised by recreational drugs would be far outweighed by the loss in consumer spending.

Why spend money on a vacation when a stroll around the neighborhood while under the influence is more fulfilling? Why buy that new video game when lying beneath a tree in the dappled sunlight is more enchanting? Why dine out at an expensive restaurant when a bag of potato wedges satisfies the munchies? As much as the American elite want a drugged and complacent populace, they want them to be good consumers more.

4. Artificial Wombs

Contrary to the expectations of MGTOWs like Sandman, artificial wombs will not be part of the futurescape. The litmus test in determining whether a trans-humanist enhancement will be politically viable is this: Will it empower men? Will it provide men with more options? Will it make men less dependent on women? If the answer is yes, then it will be deemed socially unacceptable.

If artificial wombs do arrive, expect them to be reserved solely for women, even women who are otherwise fertile. Witness the rise in the practice of C-sections. A surgical procedure previously employed only when necessary to save the mother's life has been increasingly done for lifestyle reasons (comfort, aesthetics).

We are already seeing surrogacy being regulated in India where the practice is legally restricted to heterosexual couples (single men and homosexual couples are not allowed to take advantage of the service). It is completely reasonable to expect similar discriminatory restrictions to be implemented when it comes to artificial wombs.

5. Space Colonization

Much to the disappointment of Star Trek and Firefly fans, there will be no outward expansion into space. There is no economic justification for it. It would be more economically feasible by orders of magnitude to colonize the tallest mountain tops, the most arid deserts, and even the ocean floor here on Earth than to colonize the Moon or Mars.

Moreover, cheap access to space would mean loss of control by the global elite. If every disaffected person, every ideological outcast, every person who just wanted to be left alone could simply leave the planet, it would mean loss of centralized control.

It is important to remember that America has never been a live-and-let-live nation. Whether it was Lincoln's tyrannical preservation of the Union in response to Southern secession, Congressional investigators prompting Jim Jones and his Peoples Temple congregation in Guyana to commit mass suicide, or ATF agents raiding the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, the lesson is clear: the system would rather you dead than permit you to go your own way on anything other than an individual level. The moment you attempt to form a community of like-minded people with an alternative morality or ideology, it will crush you.

Conclusion

While it is common to speculate on what the future holds, it is equally important to consider what it doesn't hold. Only by considering both can we effectively navigate our lives and plot a sound course.

Read More: 5 Predictions For Our Dystopian Future

Waldemar Pabst
29 year old academic, right of reactionary

Do You Believe The Official 9/11 Story?

December 30, 2015 | by Tom Swyft | Link | Original Link

Most of us remember September 11, 2001 as a tragic and world-changing day. In the only major attack on US soil since Pearl Harbor, over a dozen Muslims hijacked planes and crashed them into the Twin Towers, collapsing the buildings and killing thousands of people in New York.

While the explosions and fires were put out soon after, the social and political consequences for American and global citizens alike are becoming ever more severe. We spent trillions of taxpayer dollars to replace priceless civil liberties and security in our own country with draconian surveillance systems and militarized police.

Domestic spying is just one of the many benefits of perpetual war with a global enemy…

More specifically, here is a summary of the borderline treasonous measures the government has implemented in response to the attacks:

- The Patriot Act, which eroded fourth-amendment provisions and made it almost impossible to conduct financial transactions and digital communications without government surveillance
- The Military Commissions Act, which confers "justice" to military prisoners without due process
- The War on Terror, which was not only unsuccessful in even reducing Islamic terrorism but has cost taxpayers $1.7 trillion and killed thousands of American soldiers
- The Department of Homeland Security (DHS), which wastes exorbitant amounts of money while stripping away civil liberties and labeling all sorts of deviant groups (like white nationalists and people with too many bumper stickers) as "domestic terrorists"
- The Transportation Security Administration (TSA), the airplane security mafia that extorts law-abiding citizens who want to avoid cancer machines and full body pat downs, all while profiting from smuggled cocaine and fees for "easy access" lines
- The National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), which legalizes indefinite detention for supposed "terrorists" and consolidates surveillance powers for unnamed defendants without due process

It is obvious that we lost a lot in the fourteen years since the attacks, and the potential future restrictions on our civil liberties in the name of stopping "terrorism" are seemingly neverending.

With so much at stake now and in the future, it is therefore imperative that we know the full truth of the event that started it all– the 9/11 attacks themselves.

Questionable Evidence

You might think that case has long been settled, but in what follows I will introduce several important facts that are left out of the official narrative.

While they seem to suggest more sinister motives at play than simply "Ay-rabs who hate 'Murica," the reader can draw his own conclusions based on the physical evidence. However, may the reader be warned: this article will pose more questions than answers.

Disclaimer: The remainder of this article is based heavily on the work of Architects and Engineers for 9/11 Truth. I am not affiliated with this organization in any way, although I encourage the interested reader to support them however possible.

Steel Skyscrapers Don't Collapse

Steel has a melting point of approximately 1370º C, while the typical temperature of building fires has been found to be 900-1000 degrees. This is why steel, and more specifically steel-reinforced concrete is chosen to build modern skyscrapers: it is unlikely to be structurally compromised from hydrocarbon fires, ensuring the building will not collapse even if all of its contents burn.

This is not just theory; in 1991, the majority of a 38-story building in Philadelphia burned for over 19 hours in a raging office fire of much larger magnitude than that of any of the WTC buildings. Yet it remained standing for 9 years afterward, despite minor structural damage caused by the extensive fire.

There are in fact countless documented cases of burning skyscrapers, and they have one thing in common: they do not collapse.

This modern skyscraper in Madrid burned much longer and much hotter than the WTC buildings without collapsing.

In contrast, the WTC buildings collapsed after only the upper portions burned for a few hours. Although they were hit by planes, the major cause for collapse was determined to be structural damage due to the fires. However, even with the added jet fuel the fire could not have burned hot enough to melt steel.

Although it receives little mention, WTC building 7 also collapsed in addition to the other two towers. A modern steel-frame skyscraper like the one in Philadelphia, the NIST report claims it fell after structural weakening due to office fires ignited from burning debris.

But in order for it to collapse, all or most of its steel support columns must have been structurally compromised. This poses a problem, as a few hours of moderate fires could not have caused such damage when similar buildings haven't collapsed after being subjected to much longer and hotter fires.

Even if we pretend that the flames could have melted critical support structures, that would not have been enough to bring the entire buildings down at the speed with which they collapsed.

Which brings us to the next major point…

They Fell At Free Fall Speed

You may remember from high school physics that an uninhibited object will fall with constant acceleration due to gravity, while the presence of resistive forces like drag or friction will reduce this acceleration.

This is intuitive, but it may come as a shock to you that all of the WTC buildings fell with acceleration close to freefall. Video analysis of the WTC 7 and the two towers shows that they fell with constant acceleration due to gravity, much like a baseball in a high school physics problem.

The building's height plots a parabola because it fell with constant acceleration

For all three buildings to fall at this rate, there must have been little to no resistance under the upper floors that could have slowed down the collapse.

But buildings don't have zero resistance, particularly steel-framed buildings whose columns have not been melted or even weakened by ordinary fires. And since the planes hit the towers on the upper floors, and the fire spread up, the lower columns were left untouched.

That the buildings did not collapse immediately suggests that the collision itself did not weaken the structure enough to bring it down. But the burning jet fuel and office furnishings could not have done the requisite damage to cause sudden freefall collapse either.

However, there was evidence of another material that might have been capable of doing so…

Evidence Of Thermite And Explosives

Thermite is a highly reactive mixture of aluminum and iron oxide (rust) that burns hot enough to melt steel and iron. There are two pieces of evidence that suggest this material was present at the World Trade Center explosions.

The first is actual unburned thermite that was found in the dust and debris. This material would not have been present unless it was put there specifically to aid in destroying the buildings.

High-tech forms of unburned thermite were found in the WTC dust

The second reason is evidence of melted steel and iron. As discussed above, the steel beams would have barely been weakened, much less melted by the jet fuel and other materials that were supposedly present.

However, there is incontrovertible evidence that steel did melt: remnants of the I-beams themselves were eaten away and in some parts evaporated by a molten liquid slag. Not many materials can do that to steel, but thermite (or other explosives) certainly can.

The additional evidence for melting is the iron "microspheres" found among the dust that fell all over the city. These tiny spheres are formed by liquid iron droplets rapidly cooling.

Therefore, there must have been some fuel present capable of liquefying iron. This suggests thermite or another compound was used specifically to melt it.

Possible Explanation

Imagine investigating the collapses as if you knew nothing about the official story. Here we have three modern, steel framed skyscrapers collapse from fires when no such building has ever collapsed in the history of skyscrapers.

Planes flew into the two taller towers, impacting 2/3 and 5/6 of the way up. They remained standing for a few hours while oxygen-starved fires (read: low temperature) fueled by jet fuel and office furnishings raged on the upper floors.

Suddenly they collapsed, neatly and symmetrically falling on top of their own footprints at close to free fall speed despite the lower portions of the buildings remaining structurally sound and untouched by fires.

Meanwhile a third building, with fires supposedly ignited by debris and untouched by flying planes, collapsed in a sudden onset and at close to free fall speed, even though its dozens of steel support columns remained unharmed by the seemingly inconsequential fires.

In the aftermath, residue of explosives and evidence of liquefied steel and iron were found in the dust spread all over the city.

If NIST's claim that the ordinary fires brought the buildings down is incomplete, as we have shown above, what could explain all these peculiarities of the collapse that are unanswered by their theory?

The only logical conclusion to the above evidence is that another motive force, separate from the fires or the plane's impact, caused the buildings to fall. In fact, these circumstances are not that uncommon. In fact, old and defunct buildings are frequently imploded using controlled demolition.

Buildings are brought down all the time via controlled demolition

Lined with explosives, the main columns are sequentially cut one floor at a time such that all the support structures are rendered ineffective. This is timed very carefully such that the penthouse falls in first and the rest of the building collapses on top of it.

It lands in its own footprint, and while dust and debris spread out, the bulk of the building lands on top of itself. Many examples on Youtube can be found of controlled demolitions of buildings.

These examples all have one thing in common: they almost exactly resemble the manner in which the three WTC buildings collapsed.

Conspiracy Theory?

I myself am not entirely convinced of the veracity of this theory. There are some good counterarguments to many of the points made in favor of it. On the other hand, there are other points that the government report does and cannot logically counter.

Particularly, WTC 7 is the smoking gun of the 9/11 farce. Its collapse cannot be explained by plane crashes, yet it uncharacteristically collapsed due to routine office fires. This is by far the strongest piece of evidence in favor of the coverup theory.

Compelling as that may be, the evidence presented here still poses more questions than answers. If explosives were used, who planted them? How were the attacks coordinated with the Muslim terrorists? Who organized the attacks?

We know that the CIA supported al-Qaeda-connected Muslims fighting against Russia in the '80s. 9/11 also would not be the first time the CIA joined forces with foreign rebel groups at the expense of the American people and managed to keep it secret.

America and al-Qaeda were not always enemies…

Despite fairly obvious motives and the potential for the government to have successfully carried out the attacks, it is still hard to imagine how exactly they would have been able to carry out and cover up this false flag event.

Of course, the improbability of the events is no reason to assume impossibility; we must continue to suspend judgment until more satisfying answers can be found.

In Conclusion

To that end, another investigation into the collapse of the World Trade Center that accounts for the additional evidence ignored or denied by the official report must be carried out.

This investigation should be conducted by multiple cross-disciplinary governmental and non-governmental agencies with unrestricted access to all of the evidence yet remaining.

Although this interpretation of 9/11 has been labeled a conspiracy theory by the government and media, it is often the very ideas most vilified by the popular opinion that are necessary to think about. They use the term conspiracy theory in the same way as they use “racist” or “sexist”; that is to say, as a way to silence dissent and uncomfortable ideas.

But we have lost a lot since the attacks and the government has and continues to gain even more at our expense. We citizens have an obligation and a right to learn the truth, whether that be the official narrative has been correct all along, or that the government has duped us out of our essential liberties.

Only then will we have a better grasp of the truth and be in a better position to determine the value and necessity of the legal and social changes that have taken place since the attacks.

Read More: Inside The Mind Of The Social Justice Wanker

Tom Swyft

Tom is a programmer who spends most of his time hiding from the NSA. He is also a university student, and tries to stay under the radar of the consent commies on campus. You can find him on Twitter or at cryptocaveman.com.

It’s A Hundred Times Easier To Come Out As Gay Or Transsexual Than As A Conservative In Hollywood

December 30, 2015 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Hollywood is relentlessly making it hostile to be a conservative entertainer. Far from plateauing out, this situation is becoming more retrograde still. As if to mock it, gay, lesbian and transgender individuals who “come out” often receive a financial windfall for their revelation in the form of a bigger and better career, plus inevitable paid interviews and photoshoots.

ESPN, Vogue and damn near every mainstream publication would have you believe that Bruce Jenner is the paragon of bravery for publicly making his “transition” (snip-snip, Brucey!) to womanhood. Forget the massive dollar signs that came with the shift, not to mention the chance to outdo his previously much more famous ex-wife Kris.

The same goes for gay NBA referee Bill Kennedy, who announced his sexuality very recently and was lauded as if he were some sort of whistleblower fearing for his life. Yet whose career would suffer the most from “coming out”: a conservative celebrity who supports Donald Trump or Ted Cruz, or a gay or transsexual celebrity? We know the answer.

Having multiple surgeons hack off or hack into your genitals is far more acceptable in Hollywood than supporting a political candidate who dares that America aim for more.

When one looks at American voting trends, party registrations and other indicators, conservatives are not just underrepresented in Hollywood; they are, categorically, a hunted species. Nevertheless, the British gay advocacy group Stonewall, which has every interest in seeing a high estimation of non-heterosexual numbers, says that a mere 5-7% of people are gay, lesbian or bisexual, an estimate presumably extending across the Atlantic to the States. Non-LGBT industry figures hover around just 3-4%.

The paucity of conservative actors, singers and other entertainers is shocking. Nominally "conservative" celebrities like Bruce Willis and Gary Sinise either claim a half-liberal bent (Willis) or tend to make pronouncements that avoid the most contentious issues, such as Sinise's interest in foreign policy but general disinterest in discussing issues of abortion, gay marriage, and immigration (and even then we do not know his underlying ideology).

As a nod to tokenism, a small number of conservative elder statesmen are permitted in Hollywood, including Clint Eastwood and Jon Voight (and the latter in particular has become increasingly marginalized).

Gay entertainers, anyone?

[image]
Sir Elton Hercules John is one of countless celebrities who can count on Hollwyood support and still getting work for being who they are. Conservative actors, paid to play other people, ironically, cannot, along with similarly-minded singers and others.

The path to coming out as gay, lesbian or bisexual is comparatively a piece of cake. If you don't think so, check how familiar these names sound: Billie Joe Armstrong (Green Day), Drew Barrymore (a lot of bad films), composer Leonard Bernstein, Chris Colfer (Glee), CNN presenter Anderson Cooper, Ellen DeGeneres, Stephen Fry (Blackadder), Lady Gaga, Neil Patrick Harris (How I Met Your Mother), Elton John, Kesha, Ian McKellen (The Lord of the Rings), Ricky Martin, Wentworth Miller (Prison Break), Cynthia Nixon (Sex and the City), Jim Parsons (The Big Bang Theory), Zachary Quinto (Star Trek), RuPaul (my editor and I will need a few years to describe this person) and George Takei (the older Star Trek franchise). By all means check the wider Wikipedia listings, which run for pages and include hundreds and hundreds of celebrities.

Finding conservative celebrities is the harder task. Figures like James Woods, who seems to have been punished by Hollywood ever since he identified himself as a conservative Blue Dog Democrat, exist as outliers. The person who makes a list of dozens of conservative names to try to prove this assertion wrong forgets that probably ten to twenty thousand celebrities of some sort exist in the public consciousness. We may not know all of their names personally and some have died, but even a hundred names is insufficient. Furthermore, only a few of these individuals are truly top-tier actors, singers or other showbiz royalty.

Attempted political indoctrination, which starts with the fact that the vast majority of college professors are liberal, still produces a population where the majority of college graduates, like in 2012's Presidential election, can vote Republican. But we are denied a celebrity environment where as little as one in twenty people who declare their political beliefs can be conservative.

The limits of "tolerance" are growing tighter and tighter

[image]
Still in the fold now, will Vince Vaughan be eventually punished for his views? Whatever the case, others following his example can expect a significant backlash.

Expect a lot more hostility to more well-known celebrities with the boldness to evade leftist positions. Responses to libertarian Vince Vaughan's suggestion about school employees having guns were tepid, probably reflecting the esteem in which the affable comedic actor is held. Yet Hollywood is unlikely to make room for more men of his caliber, especially younger ones.

Going forward, it will be useful for those of us critical of sheep-like celebrity conformity to keep tabs on the relationship between the number of LGBT, liberal and conservative celebrities. Although regular people sense a Hollywood bias, their understanding needs to be made explicit. When they see further how Tinseltown tries to make cookie-cutter political mouthpieces, they are better placed to know to spend their money elsewhere.

Bring back the days of Gary Cooper and John Wayne the actors, not RuPaul the cross-dresser.

Read More: Why Do Hollywood SJW's Still Defend This Admitted Pedophile?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why Women Shouldn’t Work

December 31, 2015 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

How essential are women in the labor force? How critical are the job functions they perform when compared to men? I wondered about these questions while the American establishment uses the might of their bullhorns to persuade everyone that having women in higher education and corporate positions is absolutely essential for society. A simple thought experiment, however, can definitively show the opposite: women are not at all serving critical or important job functions at a level above men, and society is better of with them not participating full time in the labor force.

One way to approach this problem is to look at job statistic numbers that quantify how many women work in a particular field while also measuring the quality of labor they contribute. The problem with this method is that it doesn’t clue us in on how essential a woman’s production is. Women can be 20% of the electrical engineering force, for example, but such a number does not explain the contributions they’ve made to engineering and what would happen if that number was decreased or increased, especially when they are working alongside productive men who get the job done regardless of their failures.

I instead propose a simple thought experiment that will offer a clear and instinctual answer to even those who are firmly on the side of “equality” (i.e. the disempowerment of straight men). Imagine that a new law is about to be passed that forbids one particular sex from engaging in any type of employment or labor. Which of the following would lead to the greatest amount of economic harm to the country?

- Men are forbidden from working, and are forced to tend the home
- Women are forbidden from working, and are forced to tend the home

If women stopped working, there would be measurable harm to the economy overnight, because they make up a significant part of the service sector, especially in fields related to PR, marketing, education, waitressing, and human resources. The absence of women in most jobs outside of day care and nursing, however, could not only be replaced by a man, but one that is at least comparable to her ability, and not inferior to a significant degree, especially if you gave him the training and time to improve. The less communicative skill that men have to “read body language” and be a “people person” would be balanced out by massive productivity gains from a lack of office gossip, sexual harassment trainings, female sick days related to the menstrual cycle or irritable bowel syndrome, pregnancies, and distracting interoffice affairs.

Any economy that prevents women from working would in my estimation recover in 4-10 years once currently idle men are enticed by a sudden increase in job salaries and benefits along with the opportunity to work in male-only environments where their every statement is not placed under the microscope of the HR gestapo that is overeager to blacklist men for daring to make a politically incorrect statement.

On the other hand if men stopped working, there wouldn’t be enough talented and skilled women to take over their positions, even with dedicated training. You could give it a full generation of time, but it still wouldn’t provide enough women to cover even a minority of the positions lost, especially in STEM fields where strong analytical and logical ability is needed to even begin a rigorous education. The programs that have sprung up in the past two decades to encourage women to study fields they are not good at (science, computer programming) have barely caused their participation to increase, and not at all stopped women from dropping out entirely for reasons that can often be summarized as “YOLO” or “it was boring.”

In the scenario preventing men from work, manual labor jobs in construction could not be filled unless we dose women with testosterone. The safety of communities would decrease as only women became policemen and firemen. We’d have to increase the salaries of garbage men to over half a million dollars per year to entice women to work in them, possibly leading to diseases caused by bad sanitation not seen in centuries. A shortage of specialist surgeons would decrease the life expectancy rate. The all-female media would provide stories and news entirely based on feelings and emotions instead of facts. Any field you pick besides day care, nursing, and education would not be able to recover even 50% from a lack of men not working. Take a minute to try imagining all female farmers, truck drivers, and mechanics. A film depicting this scenario would start off as a comedy before quickly turning into doomsday horror.

No matter what society managed to do to train the all-female workforce, the economy would never recover, and this only concerns the economical effects. In terms of the societal effects, birth rates would certainly plummet or, if women insisted on having the occasional baby, there would be such a critical shortage of labor that basic functions of society wouldn’t be fulfilled. There would be food shortages so severe that two-hour Soviet bread lines would be seen as utopian.

While the door could be open to any female immigrant who was willing to plug the gaps, it’s unlikely they could fulfill even the most basic jobs above working as a bartender, because the issue with female employment is not one of quantity but quality. In spite of our best efforts to encourage women into science by giving them two legs up in the system, they still prefer easy majors that don't involve any math, and even women who pursue medicine pick the easiest specialty like dermatology because she covets time off more than having to play real doctor by being on-call in the middle of the night when a patient has an emergency.

If men were prevented from working, the family unit would have to invert to something that has never been sustainably done in human nature. Women would have to sacrifice their natural role for a new role that wouldn't come close to sustaining the economical or social basis of society.

Imagining all these scenarios in your head couldn't lead to a more vivid result. Forbidding men from working would lead to a definite economic and demographic collapse of a nation and fast accession to third-world status while forbidding women from working would lead to only short-term economic harm while quickly increasing the demographic status of a nation that would then require less third-world immigrants. The likelihood of a cultural collapse would be eliminated. The economic basis of the economy would be strengthened in the long term as a tighter supply of labor prevents the corporate elite from keeping wages depressed while shuttling profits to overseas accounts, which has been steadily happening in America since the 1960's.

Therefore a man's labor, when measured collectively, is essential for society, while a woman's labor, outside of the home, is not. While there are three or four women who have made great contributions to science and human resources over the past century, the absence of those women would not have led to a societal collapse, while the absence of all the men who made great contributions certainly would have. Extending this argument further, it doesn't take much effort to conclude that besides working in niche fields, women are not needed to participate in the labor force on the level we currently have in America. Forcing themselves to do so is perhaps the greatest misallocation of resources that the Western world has seen since World War 2.

The results of this thought experiment displays the set of naturally given sex roles of the human species. Men are the mules of the species, with an analytical mind and focused determination that facilitates their constant labor. Women are the nurturers of the species, with a more sociable and cooperative mind that facilitates maintaining the hearth and raising children. I'm not making the argument that men are "superior" to women, but that men have strengths over women when it comes to the labor required to maintain at least the economic basis of any society that ensures its proper functioning and even survival. Women have strengths over a man when it concerns other duties that are just as essential to a society's survival, but it is not working in offices and doing a man's job to a fraction of the capability and competence that he could do with the same encouragement and training.

Civilization did just fine before women starting working en masse starting in the middle of the 20th century. Most advances since then have come from improvements in medicine, hygiene, transportation, and communication, all of which men were essential in creating while women primarily serve as the end users of those benefits instead of innovators who advanced them. The big steps backwards we've taken have been cultural, based on forcefully pushing women into roles that they are not naturally made for, all to benefit the parasitic elite who enjoy cheaper labor and easier population control thanks to diminished family and nationalist bonds.

Western society is actually engaging in a soft version of the thought experiment I've proposed, where women are encouraged to work and are given preferential treatment over men in the labor market while men are increasingly shamed and discouraged to work in a way where their merit and effort is rewarded.

Since the current society we now have is one that goes halfway towards the harmful experiment I've conducted here, that means we will see severe economical, societal, and cultural problems that would not have come about had we not inverted traditional roles by denying men the roles they naturally excel at while encouraging women in roles they naturally don't excel at. Until this grotesque societal experiment ends, one that no historical civilization can vouch for, the only result of a nation that takes it on is a complete economical and cultural collapse.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Women Must Have Their Behavior And Decisions Controlled By Men

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Muscle Building Mistakes From A Man In His 40s

December 31, 2015 | by Clark Kent | Link | Original Link

As I've mentioned in previous articles, I have been training with weights now for 25+ years. I don't regret all those hours I've spent in the gym. I've never joined a bodybuilding or powerlifting competition, but I've built and maintained a decent physique. Being bigger, stronger, leaner, and healthier than the average person has enhanced my life tremendously.

But I did make quite a few mistakes along the way. I'd like to share three of these with you so that you can learn from my mistakes:

1. I had unrealistic expectations

I grew up watching Arnold on the big screen. It made sense to invest in his Encyclopedia of Modern Bodybuilding in order to learn more about building muscle (I'm sure my copy is still in the basement somewhere). I remember flipping through the pages, awestruck at pictures of him and other bodybuilders. One of my favorite photos was of him doing curls on an incline bench.

Pictures and videos of professional bodybuilders did inspire me to work harder in the gym. But here's the problem: I was completely naive regarding the significant role anabolic steroids had in building their physiques. If Arnold could build 19-inch arms, surely I could build 17 or 18-inch arms naturally–right?

I would later learn that steroids are the ultimate game-changer, and comparing myself to someone using gear is an exercise in futility. These drugs do make a big difference, and anyone who says otherwise is delusional. Don't believe me? Well, consider this study in which subjects gained more muscle by sitting on the couch and taking steroids than those who trained without them.

In other words, I had unrealistic expectations about what a genetically typical, drug-free trainee could achieve naturally. Looking back I see two problems this caused:

It made it more difficult for me to celebrate my achievements

There's nothing wrong with pursuing goals and challenging yourself to be better. But I had a tendency to constantly compare myself to my before-mentioned idols. If I had it all to do over I would have just enjoyed what I had accomplished (which is what I do now).

It gave me an obsession with being bigger

Here's one other thing I should mention regarding getting big: women like guys who are lean and muscular, but only to a point (research backs this up, by the way). Most women aren't looking to date a 250-pound bodybuilder, and none of them care how much you bench press. Let that sink in before you spend too much time obsessing over your one-rep max.

2. I spent way too much money on supplements

I graduated college and became gainfully employed in the early 90's. This era was pretty wild as far as the bodybuilding supplement industry goes. Just to give you an idea, GHB (the “date rape” drug) was once widely available online. The deep sleep it induced was thought to help with growth hormone secretion.

I should point something out before I go any further: not all the supplements I discovered during this time were worthless. One of the first I learned about, for example was the “EC Stack” (Ephedrine and Caffeine) for fat loss. This was back before the meth epidemic, and you could buy ephedrine over the counter at any convenience store. Creatine monohydrate and whey protein also came out in the 90’s, and both of these turned out to be worthwhile.

But most of the other stuff I bought was a complete waste of money. I was all too eager to buy the latest pill, powder, or potion that promised new gains. I’m not sure exactly how much money I wasted, but I’d love to have all that cash back in my pocket.

3. I didn’t invest enough time and money in solid training information

Much of what I learned in the weight room came through trial and error during the early years. I mindlessly threw around weights without really putting much thought into how heavy I should lift, how many sets and reps I should do, how I should cycle my intensity, etc. This is unfortunate, because there was already a plethora of information available during that time.

I eventually learned about periodization, deloading, and other training methods that powerlifters have been using for decades. I would have reached my goals much more quickly if I had been more intentional in learning what works.

Now there’s really no excuse to be ignorant of effective training methods. There is plenty of good training information available online (both free and in the form of books and digital products).

Hopefully you can learn from some of my muscle building mistakes. Use your mind when you build your body.

Read More: The Truth About Anabolic Steroids

Clark Kent
Gym rat, entrepreneur, former supplement addict, and practitioner of intermittent fasting. Visit his blog: Build Muscle. Lose Fat. You can also follow him on Facebook or Twitter.

12 Methods America Is Using To Turn France Into A Globalist Nightmare

December 31, 2015 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Recently, Roosh shared with me an article in three parts on a conference that took place in Paris in 2010, initiated by the US ambasador to France, Charles Rivkin and aimed at many influencal figures of the state. The goal of this confidential conference was to deconstruct the French identity and sovereignty through different actions.

The document was released on Wikileaks and can be found here. It is a written proof of the will of the American government and investors to interfere in the domestic affairs of our sovereign state, something that we see in our daily lives. Here are the fields on which the multicuturalist and globalist decisions maker focus:

1. School

Being a former teacher, I noticed the introduction of constant changes since my youth and the education I received. An even stronger cultural masochism is taught to our kids at school. Racist and racism are the almighty go-to words that instantly discredit the hour-long argumentation of anyone, even when backed with research and scientific proof.

Educational lobbies are changing the school programs to teach the glory of African kingdoms and the expansion of Islam, instead of French history and civilization. Leftists call anyone who wants to focus on native history and its figures a “neo-colonialist.” As French polemicist Eric Zemmour puts it, destroying “the French National epic” and its heroes is the goal. The Rivkin program also includes redefining French history in the school curricula to give attention to the role of non-French minorities in French history.

Najat Vallaud-Belkacem, Education Minister

The decision of teaching more about Arab kingdoms than French kings belongs to the current Minister of education, formerly Minister of Women’s rights, Najat Vallaud-Belkacem, a short-haired Arab woman born in Morocco who became French because her dad worked in France. She is fighting against sexism and inequality, is pro-abortion and stumps for the rights of the gay and transsexual lobby. I am obviously expecting an unbiased decision.

Rivkin states in the report of the conference, that the 1,000 American English language teachers employed at French schools will be provided with the propaganda materials necessary to inculcate the desired ideals into their French pupils.

2. Kids shows

The earlier the better. Back when I was a child, the cartoons I watched depicted mighty heroes crushing the enemy, often bloodily. There was a conflict between good and evil and a lesson taught. The story had a beginning, a chain of events, and an end. Now every episode has too many characters (all diversity-approved) who are often weak, but that’s ok because everyone is nice and worrying about the unknown is intolerant. The creators teach children that being a weakling is not a problem and that working on your looks is not important because true beauty is in the heart.

As the son of an ambassador, Rivkin had no experience in foreign policy and diplomacy. He was appointed because he had experience in including multiculturalist propaganda in kids' shows and being the CEO of the Wildbrain company, which created Yo Gabba Gabba! among other things. Watch an extract of the show if you don't know it, you will understand what I mean.

3. Language

People in France will be fooled into thinking that by promoting multiculturalism, they carry the French ideals of the Revolution and the Enlightenment brought by the French spirit of democracy. They would be insulting the memory of the Siècle des Lumières and the reputation of the "land of the human rights" by refusing more migrants or not adapting to all the tantrums thrown by the minorities on French soil.

The pledge for equality starts with our language. America brought us the political correctness. It is not politically correct to call a black man "noir" which is the name of the black color in french. Now it is better to say "un black," since the English term apparently makes it ok. We cannot call a homosexual man "homosexuel," so now we have to use "gay."

And the list goes on. WTF, lol, parking, shopping, wifi, buzz, tweet, swag, like etc. now invades the language of our children and adults, already under the attack of ghetto slang. I have a deep love for English and pride myself in the knowledge I have of it, but like Sebastien Chabal, proud Gaul, said:

4. Food

The phenomenon of “malbouffe” (junk food) is smearing our rich culinary culture and became an essential part of our young people’s social life and diet. Coca Cola, McDonald’s, and other giants advertise everywhere and fast food “restaurants” just pop out of nowhere, even in the remote countryside. So does liquid sugar merchant Starbucks and its open support to homosexuals.

Our national agrarian system is now invaded by pesticides and automated agriculture. The opponents of it are quickly silenced. With the GMOed Frankenstein turnips and corn created in American labs, the plants mutate and the people will soon pay the price.

Small local producers disappear and the large companies put what they want in the food. We are still slightly protected by our national laws on food quality and protected labels. But for how long?

5. Influence on native youth

The Hipster-loving, tattoo-sporting, slut-celebrating culture as reached them and they love it. It makes them feel so special. So did lesbian and pansexual attention whoring of the girls, taught by pornography and the Hollywood crowd.

Promiscuity is on the rise, thanks to apps such as Tinder, the fashion of selfies, likes, attention-whoring, nudes sent on smartphones, Sex In The City, Instagram and the promotion of the hook-up culture, even if the young girls become more feminists. It goes only one way: against men.

The destruction of the nuclear family model and healthy relationships between men and women is the objective. The global culture turns our girls into unfuckable modern art masterpieces and our lads into fragile chicken-legged boys in skinny jeans and snapbacks for the urban predator to rob and attack.

6. Hollywood culture

The Hollywood sphere keeps unloading its filth in France. Open homosexuality, metrosexuality, narcotic abuse, along with Pitt-Jolie and their adopted African kids, brought around like a new handbag are everywhere in our tabloids. Everything they do is cool—changing religion like you change underwear, becoming a woman because you are bored, mudsharking, being gay as a three pound note. The words they say are followed by the mass like the bloody Gospel.

7. Destruction of nationalism

The civil rights and feminist movements that trampled the ideas of freedom of association and patriarchy inspired the plague that are the anti-whites of SOS Racisme (oh, the irony) and the anti-heterosexual male feminists of Ni putes, Ni soumises ("Neither Whore nor Submissive").

Regionalists and nationalist movements and their sympathizers are filed by the police and intelligence services like they supposedly do with the potential jihadis.

Observe what happened in Corsica lately. The police services are moving heaven and earth to find the handful of men that broke into the Mosque and smashed the kebab place, but leave the youths that attacked the two firemen and the police officer that sparked the gatherings of the patriots in the first place. When a handful of Corsicans show more patriotic balls than millions of hand-holding JE SUIS CHARLIEs, there is an issue.

The objective detailed in Rivkin's report is to monitor and counter any party that does not satisfy their agenda, namely nationalists and traditionalists, dubbing them "racist" and "xenophobic." The words verbatim: "focusing on the decrease in popular support for xenophobic political parties and platforms." This is to ensure that the program is working as it should to block the success of any "extreme" or "xenophobic" party that might challenge globalization.

8. Consumption

The consumerism brilliantly orchestrated since the end of World War II started with GIs distributing cigarettes and chocolate to French children after four years of rationing during the Occupation, and continues with the giant American corporations pushing us to purchase things we don't need. Inside every French, there is an American trying to get out.

The explosion of advertising budgets of the likes of Pepsi, Kellogg's, or McDonald's shows it. Some courageous peasants lead by Jose Bové, seeing the threat, tried to take McDonald's influence apart physically, by crushing one of their joints with their tractors. They failed, as they had limited means compared to the gigantic reserves of cash the corporation had.

Before, the French were champions of recycling and inventiveness. Now they throw away without repairing. There is an obsession with novelty and the newest gadgets. This also helps them collect your data and know your taste so they can propose more things to buy. "Oh you bought X Item, you will also like Y and Z item! Buy, buy, buy!"

9. Influence on non-native youth

The Quick burger chain in France now wants to have the cool halal image and will only serve halal meat in a few years. McDonalds France already serves halal meat but does not advertise it and admits serving it without explicitly warning their clients. So do KFC

France and Flunch.

The halal market is a gigantic and lucrative one, as the client that buys it pays a tax directly to the mosques and their private funds on the pretext that they are the authorities that validate every kilogram of halal meat produced. Some large chains of supermarkets focus more and more on their halal clientele. In addition to the sanitary risks of halal slaughtering, the problem is that the natives have to adapt to the non-natives' diet in the name of equality.

There is also a strong phenomenon of "thugization" of the black and Arab youths in the housing estates of the big cities. All of that thanks to the rap and gang culture, brought by American television shows and the gangsta clips on MTV.

"They confirm their deep culture of violence! Quick, give them more love and integration!"

10. Communication tools

The tablets and smart phones reach us younger and younger each year. Every schoolkid that can barely read already has a smartphone, an open door to porn, and the rest. Every family has one, and they replaced the baby-sitters.

Your position is always known thanks to your phone and they will listen to what you say if they want to. They know how many of you are in the house, what is your daily routine, what you buy, and what you read. The algorithms and data are kept.

The policy of "état d'urgence," initiated following the Paris attacks, allows the government to bypass all the laws about digital privacy on the internet and is directly inspired by the Patriot Act that followed 9/11.

With the development of smartphone video games, more entertainment online, more immersive and time-consuming games where the mind is put on pause, you have fewer people thinking and questioning whoever is in charge.

11. Celebrations

Ah, Halloween. Another hardly disguised consumerist celebration. Occulting the autumn equinox and All Saints' Day, trampling the tradition of family meals and flowering the graves of our loved ones, one pack of cheap lollies at a time. Overpriced costumes and diabetes for the kids, slutty behaviour and bad decisions for the grownups. Well, at least the pumpkin farmers thank you.

Santa Claus, invented by Coca Cola, pulverized Saint Nicolas that my father used to sing about and greet as a child. The cries of ungrateful brats under the Christmas tree because Barbie's caravan does not include the picnic table replaced the Christmas carols. My grandfather used to say "When I was a child, we got an orange and a candy stick for Christmas. If we did not behave, we got a bag of coal. So don't complain."

12. Work

The salaries often drop to the legal minimum since Mr. Ford introduced his magic recipe for greater profit. You don't want to work? We'll hire someone more desperate that will. You are a number, we are a corporation and we have goals. The employees are highly replaceable cogs in this ugly new machine.

Back in the day, we could call a spade a spade in the workplace. The hard workers, with their fists like anvils that were the pride of our nation, getting smashed on red wine in the morning while smoking Gauloises and farting before whistling at the nice girl that was passing by, are muzzled or slowly replaced by robots.

With political correctness, you can't joke, you can't fart without offending the office's year-round victim. Work used to be a place of manliness and brilliant banter, now it is a circus of tap-dancing haughty wusses, hypochondriacs, and harpies always between two pregnancy leaves.

Don’t be fooled—you are next on their list. Their end game is to submerge us into one big melting pot of global consumerism, to uproot every individual from an identity and heritage and replace that with the global shopping mall, and the “global village.”

Read More: 6 Ways Poland Is Becoming Degenerate Like America

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

10 Things My Dog Taught Me About Women

January 1, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

I discovered ROK around the same time I became the owner of a puppy, and there are many parallels I have noticed while I am out with my dog about women and relationships. Here are a few observations:

1. Always be the master, not the slave

Who’s in control here?

While I allow my dog the occasional freedom of running off-leash, at all times it is clear that I am his master, and he has certain boundaries. He knows he must stay within eyesight of me at all times. No barking or aggressive behavior towards others will be allowed.

He is constantly looking back to me for approval that what he is doing is allowed. With women, it is important to maintain frame at all times. If you are successful with establishing yourself as the dominant partner in the relationship (you make the calls, you decide the dates), then your woman will be far less likely to attempt reversing the roles and become dominating and vindictive.

2. A well trained partner will cause fewer problems

I enrolled my dog in a six-week training course, where we learned basic commands. More than the simple act of learning that the English pronunciation of “sit” means to place the rear end on the ground, however, is the importance that the dog learns that you are the master and you have certain expectations.

A well trained dog will know when it misbehaves, and will sense the disappointment or anger of its owner when it breaks the rules. Likewise, a woman should be trained to behave properly. Since Western civilization has abdicated its role in training members of both sexes how to behave politely and what proper roles are, men must take up this duty on our own.

If you firmly but politely lay out your expectations for your partner (no flaky behavior, I appreciate you cooking meals for me that we can enjoy together, you are to dress feminine but not slutty when we are in public, etc.), in my experience, the woman enjoys doing her part, the same way we enjoy our masculine role.

3. Slight corrections are needed from time to time

My dog knows how to walk on a leash, next to me, without dragging me all over the place. However, smells, sights of other dogs, and outside stimulus often get the better of him and he will wander too far away. A gentle tug on his leash and a verbal correction will quickly bring him back in line. Paying attention to the small details and “nipping it in the bud” before he’s off the sidewalk will bring him back to my side.

Likewise, it is far easier to maintain a happy relationship by addressing small missteps as they occur, before letting them blossom into major problems. Tell her to hit the gym when she's gotten a bit out of shape, but don't wait until she's gained 20 pounds. Give her a limit on how much alcohol she can drink. Tell her she must inform you who she is going out with and where.

As we know, women are essentially large children, and like a teen who will gradually test the limits of his boundaries, a woman will push the rules to see how much she can get away with. Treat her like a father would his child, and let her know she is not to behave this way in the future. She will not only stop the harmful actions, but come to respect you even more.

4. Positive reinforcement works

Happy owner, happy dog.

The best way to train a dog is by offering treats, and giving strong, enthusiastic, loving verbal reinforcement when it does what is expected. The dog is happy that it is making its owner happy, and any owner can see this. Likewise, a woman's instinctual nurturing side will blossom and she will be happy when she is pleasing her man. Kind of the inverse of happy wife, happy life.

The wife is happy because she is pleasing her husband, and she enjoys fulfilling her role in the relationship, the same way we naturally enjoy the rewards of hard work, the satisfaction of fixing things, and kind actions which bring a smile to the face of a woman who earns and has our affections.

5. Pay attention to details

The next time you see a dog, look closely. Does it have well groomed hair, or a matted, dirty, coat full of debris? Does it have a face of enthusiasm and happiness, or is it aggressive and violent? Does it playfully engage its owner and strangers, or is it skittish and anti-social? Does it respond well to its owner?

Likewise, there are visual clues that let us know the quality of women we are approaching. Does she groom herself well, with long, feminine hair, trimmed and painted nails, and conservative clothing? Does she smile? Does she interact socially with others, or is she glued to her smart phone screen and unable to hold a real conversation?

Does she have clear, radiant skin, or is her body mutilated with shrapnel and graffiti? Some women, and some dogs, simply are too far gone, and should be avoided, due to their unpleasant past.

6. The laws of Nature are supreme

Even a bad dog owner who has taught his dog no discipline, and has no control over his pet, cannot get around the fact that the dog relies on the owner for food, shelter, and water. The dog is subservient to its owner, and even in the worst of owners, this fact of nature cannot be reversed.

Likewise, a woman is naturally and normally the submissive partner to the man. No amount of short haircuts, business suits, you-go-girling or education can reverse the natural role than women play in the world. Women are different from men, and men are the more physically powerful, mentally strong, and emotionally caring of the two sexes. The unhappiness feminism has wrought on society is due to its attempt to subvert the natural order of things.

7. Dogs will test boundaries

My dog greets me every day when I come home by enthusiastically running to greet me in the yard, smiling, and begging to play, much the way a traditional father from the 1950s would be greeted by his family when he returned home from work. His time is a rare commodity, and the family was excited to talk to him, and to be in his presence.

Occasionally when I arrive, my dog will fail to rush out to meet me, and will just sit in the porch, wagging his tail, waiting for me to approach. When this happens, I will stop, and wait until he runs out to greet me, as I am accustomed, before walking any further. Likewise, with a woman, when she slowly stops the nice little extra things you appreciated, cleaning your bed after sex, making you a snack, whatever it is, you must immediately address and reinstate before things slip further.

8. Dogs don’t understand you

You can talk in a kind voice to a dog, and he will understand your loving happiness, and reciprocate, but beyond that, dogs are incapable of understanding you, interpreting your thoughts, empathizing, or using logic.

Likewise, it is a waste of time to get into deep discussions with women, expect them to rationalize or understand things, or even to truly empathize or love a man. This may upset you, but it is true. While a dog or woman can respect and honor you, and make you feel good, they cannot truly understand you, or love you the way you love them.

9. They appreciate small treats

A tiny reward can go a long way. The item itself is of less importance than the meaning behind it. Dogs respond well to a new toy or special treat like a bone for learning a new trick, or behaving especially well.

Likewise, when your woman deserves it, or just because you are happy with how she is treating you, feel free to give her a small token of appreciation. Cook a special meal she likes. Take her out to a movie. Have a picnic with her. Make her feel special. When you are rewarding good behavior, you are encouraging it to continue.

10. Dogs are accessories meant to bring happiness

One of these will be around a whole lot longer than the other

A dog is an optional thing a guy can bring into his life if he wants something to occupy his time, and reward him emotionally. The same should be true with women. Never enter into a relationship simply because “you’re single” or due to outside pressure from family. Never stay in a relationship that is not productive or meeting your needs.

Having a dog is a hobby, one that requires a little work every day to maintain, but should always be pleasurable to the owner. Having a significant other is the same. If the woman is not doing things for you that make you happy, move on. If she is unresponsive to the basic training that a dog would adopt, then she is failing at a very fundamental level, and you would like be much happier with a pet than a nagging girlfriend.

Conclusion

Finally, remember that while having an obedient one by your side is rewarding and comforting, there are thousands and thousands of them available, so never become too attached to one.

However, when speaking of dogs, they are incredibly loyal, protective, and offer unconditional love, and will in some ways be more consistent, reliable, and rewarding than a woman. It’s often said that sexbots will be the end of the modern feminist. Dogs provide most of the positive benefits of women except sex, and owning one can benefit a man greatly.

They are also a great yardstick of comparison. If your woman is not making you happier than your dog, it’s time to next her.

Read More: 38 Pictures That Show The Decline Of America Since The 1950s

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Masculine Strengths And Weaknesses In Germanic Tribes

January 1, 2016 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

Roman historian Tacitus wrote Germania in the first century A.D. as a study of the strengths and weaknesses of Germany's tribes. He observed men who failed to lead their families and nations, but also strong marriage bonds that kept the people united.

Strict Marriage Code

Tacitus was most impressed with Germanian marriage customs. He noted that women remained devoted wives and mothers due to this arrangement, and that "every mother suckles her own offspring," leading to healthy childhood development. Dowry gifts were a crucial part of the religious marriage ceremony.

While women today look forward to the wedding and put little thought into the actual marriage, the German wedding served as a life-long reminder of their duties.

> "Their marriage code, however, is strict, and indeed no part of their manners is more praiseworthy. Almost alone among barbarians they are content with one wife, except a very few among them, and these not from sensuality, but because their noble birth…
>
> The parents and relatives are present, and pass judgment on the marriage-gifts, gifts not meant to suit a woman's taste, nor such as a bride would deck herself with, but oxen, a caparisoned steed, a shield, a lance, and a sword. With these presents the wife is espoused, and she herself in her turn brings her husband a > gift of arms. This they count their strongest bond of union, these their sacred mysteries, these their gods of marriage.

>
> Lest the woman should think herself to stand apart from aspirations after noble deeds and from the perils of war, she is reminded by the ceremony which inaugurates marriage that she is her husband's partner in toil and danger, destined to suffer and to dare with him alike both in in war…
>
> She must live and die with the feeling that she is receiving what she must hand down to her children neither tarnished nor depreciated, what future daughters-in-law may receive, and may be so passed on to her grandchildren.
>
> Thus with their virtue protected they live uncorrupted by the allurements of public shows or the stimulant of feastings. Clandestine correspondence is equally unknown to men and women. Very rare for so numerous a population is adultery, the punishment for which is prompt, and in the husband's power. Having cut off the hair of the adulteress and stripped her naked, he expels her from the house in the presence of her kinsfolk, and then flogs her through the whole village.
>
> The loss of chastity meets with no indulgence; neither beauty, youth, nor wealth will procure the culprit a husband. No one in Germany laughs at vice, nor do they call it the fashion to corrupt and to be corrupted. Still better is the condition of those states in which only maidens are given in marriage, and where the hopes and expectations of a bride are then finally terminated.
>
> They receive one husband, as having one body and one life, that they may have no thoughts beyond, no further-reaching desires, that they may love not so much the husband as the married state. To limit the number of children or to destroy any of their subsequent offspring is accounted infamous, and good habits are here more effectual than good laws elsewhere."

Women Led Battles

Women were venerated as symbols of freedom, and they were respected to such a degree that women stood before soldiers and made passionate speeches to urge them forward. This caused massive slaughter as men mindlessly charged forward against an obviously stronger foe. The women were in turn raped and subjugated. Tacitus wrote:

> "Tradition says that armies already wavering and giving way have been rallied by women who, with earnest entreaties and bosoms laid bare, have vividly represented the horrors of captivity, which the Germans fear with such extreme dread on behalf of their women, that the strongest tie by which a state can be bound is the being required to give, among the number of hostages, maidens of noble birth.
>
> They even believe that the sex has a certain sanctity and prescience, and they do not despise their counsels, or make light of their answers. In Vespasian's days we saw Veleda, long regarded by many as a divinity. In former times, too, they venerated Aurinia, and many other women…"

It is certainly commendable to fight as a soldier for one's family, however such worship of women is not positive. Unfortunately, today we see the same nonsensical ideas that women have special prescience or nobility.

Women's involvement in war matters breeds extremism, as evidenced by the female jihadists involved in the Paris and San Berandino attacks. David Chelsey's daffy defense of Farook's wife just goes to show how irrational this extremism still broods today.

Need For Patriarchy

> "Whenever they are not fighting, they pass much of their time in the chase, and still more in idleness, giving themselves up to sleep and to feasting, the bravest and the most warlike doing nothing, and surrendering the management of the household, of the home, and of the land, to the women, the old men, and all the weakest members of the family. They themselves lie buried in sloth, a strange combination in their nature that the same men should be so fond of idleness, so averse to peace."

It seems that the main issue here is that men surrendered of leadership to women and the elderly. This brought weakness to families and the community. Patriarchal leadership has been established from the beginning of time, and patriarchy is important in modern advanced urban societies as well as ancient migratory communities. It is no coincidence that matriarchal societies and religions have always toppled, one by one.

Less Distinction Between Sexes

Tacitus seemed unimpressed with the way women dressed. They looked too much like men. Still, at least they had different roles for men and women, and never even considered "gender equality" like our culture does today.

> "The women have the same dress as the men except that they generally wrap themselves in linen garments, which they embroider with purple, and do not lengthen out the upper part of their clothing into sleeves. The upper and lower arm is thus bare, and the nearest part of the bosom is also exposed."

Willful Enslavement

Tacitus was shocked that barbarians willingly became slaves through gambling. Slavery was not very serious, though. It was only temporary until a debt was repaid, somewhat similar to accumulating credit card debt today. His warning is therefore applicable to many of us today.

> "Strangely enough they make games of hazard a serious occupation even when sober, and so venturesome are they about gaining or losing, that, when every other resource has failed, on the last and final throw they stake the freedom of their own persons. The loser goes into voluntary slavery; though the younger and stronger, he suffers himself to be bound and sold. Such is their stubborn persistency in a bad practice; they themselves call it honour. Slaves of this kind the owners part with in the way of commerce…
>
> The other slaves are not employed after our manner with distinct domestic duties assigned to them, but each one has the management of a house and home of his own. The master requires from the slave a certain quantity of grain, of cattle, and of clothing, as he would from a tenant, and this is the limit of subjection. All other household functions are discharged by the wife and children.
>
> To strike a slave or to punish him with bonds or with hard labour is a rare occurrence. They often kill them, not in enforcing strict discipline, but on the impulse of passion, as they would an enemy, only it is done with impunity."

Arminius

Tacitus presented barbarian hero Arminius as a pillar of masculinity. In the first century A.D., the Roman empire swept across Europe until one man stood up to them. Due to his intimate knowledge of Rome's military, Arminius subverted the empire and ended their conquest.

Defeated tribal chiefs were forced to give up their firstborn sons to Rome as hostages in case their tribe attempted a rebellion. At a very young age, Arminius was given up by his father Segimer of the Cheruscans, and subsequently transported to Rome, where he received a classic education and military training to fight for Rome.

This story causes me to reflect. Do we not see a similar characteristic of today's education system? Traditional parents are forced to put their children in public schools, where they are indoctrinated by social justice proponents to hate their parents and fight for a revolution. Is Rome's strategy for conquest much different today?

When he witnessed the brutality of Rome's governor Quintilius Varus, Arminius rejected his pro-Roman indoctrination and turned to the people of his birth. He gained the trust of the barbarians, united the tribes in a ruthless subversion of Rome's military, and kept their plans secret until his sneak-attack at Teutoburg Forest. His small force led a sustained campaign, which took advantage of his home terrain and knowledge of Roman military tactics.

All this came at great cost to Arminius, however. His wife's pro-Roman father handed his wife over to Rome, where she and her son eventually died in captivity. Arminius was "driven frantic by the seizure of his wife and the subjugation to slavery of her unborn child." But Tacitus notes that her devotion to Arminius remained steady, as she stood "unconquered to a tear, without a word of entreaty, her hands clasped tightly in the folds of her robe and her gaze fixed on her heavy womb."

Arminius serves as a model of a man who thinks beyond the propaganda of his education, who unites and leads, and who sacrifices for his nation.

Read More: How To Be Masculine Like The Zaporozhian Cossacks

Amasa M. Lyman
Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

5 Things You Should Be Doing If You Consume Porn

January 2, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Several months ago, Roosh outlined the debilitating effects of readily accessible porn on men. Whilst I agree with basically all of what he said, it's safe to assume even some regular ROK readers are still feeding semi-rampant porn-related addictions. In addition to the literally hundreds of hours every few years men waste by indulging in porn, the damage to your underlying psychology is immense and in many cases neurological.

Asking non-ROK readers in particular to go cold turkey on porn, however, would appear to be a Herculean task for most. As our community grows and our ideology is disseminated further afield, more men may find it easier to leave the world of online and other smut because their social environment reinforces our ideals. Until that time, we need a framework men can meet more easily.

A useful starting point, therefore, is to compare porn with behaviors a man should be engaging in. If you're finding kicking the porn habit especially taxing but have the rest of your shit together, the prospects of gradual improvement are much more real.

When you find yourself watching porn and not doing these things, don't whinge or become defensive. Just commit to change.

1. Going to the gym three to four times per week

A yearly holiday to Europe, serious sickness, or some professional or familial crisis are amongst the few genuine reasons that should prevent you from doing this. If you're beating off three times a week to porn, that's more than enough time to go to the gym. Those wanting to argue about this might be better off reading the male version of Cosmopolitan and forging a new career as a professional victim.

Because you're going to the gym regularly, your BMI should almost always be somewhere between 20 and 25, or above 25 if you're naturally muscular and still healthy. BMI has received significantly bad press over the years for being arbitrary and not accommodating different body frames. Whatever. You still know, if you have the balls to admit it, whether your weight and shape is unhealthy; BMI measurements are just a rule of thumb to help you apply common sense.

2. Getting girls to send you intimate or nude pics

[image]

Yes, bedding a good-looking girl is preferable to getting her pictures. But her sending you those pictures is a whole lot more preferable to wanking over some amateur cam girl you will never meet. If you want the gratification of seeing sexual images or videos of a girl, how about refining and then using the skills that encourage a woman to share them with you?

Texting and game involving related technologies have become indispensable in the modern world. Not only does your life persistently take you away from girls you're chasing, the same phone she uses to text, call, and instant message you is just as useful for responding to the literally thousands of local men at her fingertips across Facebook, Skype, Instagram, Tinder, and other platforms.

3. Traveling long-haul in your own country and internationally

[image]

Broaden your horizons instead of expanding your internet browsing history. Part of the appeal of porn is that it enables men to "find" and ogle different girls. Why not do that at a bar in Bordeaux or a club in Prague? And "ogle" them there for a millisecond before you approach. You could even take an outdoors trip to Maine from California and find someone new to strike up a conversation with, flirt with, and then hopefully bed.

Traveling exposes you to new people, situations, and demands, plus enhances your cultural and social finesse. It is also an unmatched way to rejuvenate yourself in the face of the otherwise depressing reality of a retrograde national and international political climate. Porn is the same old shit you did when you were twelve or thirteen. You're a man now, so how about cultivating the sort of varied experiences that come with adulthood and self-determination?

4. Learning a new skill (or five) every year

How's that promise you made five years ago to become fluent in French? Or learn to code? Yeah, I thought so. Half an hour times 50 adds up to 1500 minutes. In the space of six months, roughly 180 days, it's a gross underestimate that the average man will spend about about 1500 minutes looking for porn, watching it, and masturbating.

There are 1440 minutes in a day, so that 1500 minutes is over 24 hours that could be better spent developing a skill to use in the job market or one to simply make yourself a better man.

When you add that conservative figure to all the other areas where you waste time (mindless Facebook use, watching pointless sitcoms or zoning out with televised sports etc.), you have a veritable goldmine of personal development opportunities being squandered.

5. Going out

Travel may be the most exciting way to leave your house but most people never have the luxury to do it more than 10% of the time. Pornhub or Redtube steal chances to socialize, develop your game, and just be yourself and happy. If you can imagine yourself ejaculating over an online video or DVD and think that's better than spending time with friends over a round of beer, please vacate my planet.

Your ability to go out may depend on a range of factors, from friends' availability to work and familial commitments, yet you have profound influence over what you can and can't do. You can find new friends, make time and date compromises with your friends, or explore a place that's closer for everyone. For every time someone watches porn, they should be going out at least fifteen times with others.

Move from reading to acting

Neither I nor my fellow columnists, nor others reading this, can check up on how you spend the short life allotted to you. What I will counsel, though, is that you ask yourself ten times a day, “Am I reading or acting?” The “reading” may be figurative. Perhaps you’re observing life, rather than having others observe you in your prime. Porn is a classic case of observation at the expense of channeling your masculine energies.

Notice that I haven’t included some other obvious things you should be doing instead of watching porn, like bedding women. This list is deliberately designed to be easy, despite so many, many men (did I say many men?) failing to ever do the bare minimum consistently.

It’s time to kick your porn habit so you can kick goals in real life.

Read More: Stop Watching Porn

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

What Will Happen To Western Society In 2016

January 3, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

As we approach the end of year, the media typically gives us a rehash of what happened over the past year. While that can be a fun exercise, at ROK we like to be different. Instead of a look back, here is a look forward as to what we can expect in the New Year.

Donald Trump

As we go into the end of the year, Donald Trump is dominating the race for the Republican presidential nomination. He leads the field with 39% of the likely Republican and Republican leaning voters.

Trump has a double-digit lead over his nearest competitor, Ted Cruz, who polls at 18%. Mark Zuckerberg's Senator and GOP establishment darling Marco Rubio only rates 10%.

Prediction: Assuming that Trump doesn't make a major mistake, he will become the Republican nominee for president. And he will easily defeat the corrupt, unlikable, and low-energy Clinton to become the 45th President of the United States. Contrary to the prevailing opinion, Trump will draw unprecedented numbers of black and Hispanic voters to his side.

That is unless the Establishment pulls something to prevent the democratic process from working.

The Establishment

It is no secret that that Trump ruffles the feathers of America's ruling oligarchs. As Roosh pointed out in this insightful essay, we are ruled by a powerful elite. While voters do have some clout with their elected representatives, it comes second to the interests of the big money donors who keep the politicians in office.

Trump upsets this dynamic. He is self-funded so the oligarchs are not able to buy him. Trump also opposes illegal and uncontrolled illegal immigration. This strikes at the cheap labor that many of the donors rely on.

For this reason, the Establishment has been trying to figure out a way to railroad Trump without appearing that they are being undemocratic. For example, the Virginia Republican Party recently implemented a rule that would require voters to sign a loyalty pledge to vote in the primary. This is intended to undermine support for Trump who polls well with voters, such as blacks, who do not traditionally vote GOP.

Meanwhile, GOP political analyst William Kristol suggested that if Trump wins the Republican nomination, it would be necessary to start a new party. Of course, a third party candidate from the conservative side would mean that Hillary Clinton would win by default—but that just demonstrates that the Establishment prefers a candidate who will color within well-defined lines, even if that candidate is a progressive.

Prediction: If the Establishment does something to derail Trump, and does it in an obviously unfair way, there will be civil unrest as it dawns upon Americans that they do not really control their own government.

Black Lives Matter

Black Lives Matter is a movement that started as a Twitter hash tag in 2012 after the shooting of Trayvon Martin. However, the movement really exploded onto the national scene as a driver for the Ferguson protests in 2014.

Black Lives Matter (BLM) is ostensibly about calling for police to treat blacks more fairly. In reality, it is an enormously polarizing movement. It seeks to agitate rather than to find real solutions to the black crime and police violence.

The "black brunch" protests from earlier this year were a good example of BLM's desire to incite anger. Protestors targeted restaurants that had a largely white clientele to enter while people were eating brunch to read off the names of black people who had been killed by police. Imagine if you were eating brunch with your small children—would you feel threatened if a large group of angry people stormed in and started chanting about unjust deaths?

If BLM really was concerned about black lives, one would expect that they would also protest black on black violence, which accounts for significantly more deaths of blacks than does police brutality. But they are silent on this point.

So if it is not really about black lives, what is the reason for BLM? The biggest reason is polarizing blacks and whites. This has several benefits. First, Hillary Clinton needs the black vote to capture the White House in 2016, but it is doubtful that she could generate the same kind of ardor as that Obama did in 2007. By making blacks feel like they are under attack, they are more likely to get out and vote for Hillary.

A second reason is that if blacks and whites are battling each other it keeps them from noticing that their political representatives are not particularly responsive. At the national level, globalist concerns seem to always take priority over the good of the nation.

Prediction: The agitation produced by BLM (and by extension George Soros) will result in unnecessary loss of life in 2016. Blacks and whites who are incited by the movement will lash out at innocent victims.

To minimize the damage from this movement we should remember that this is a deliberate attempt by the people who are funding BLM to keep us distracted by fighting each other. Don't fall for the deception. Instead, focus on the puppet masters.

Migrant Crisis

Apart from a few countries like Poland and Hungary, Europe shows no signs of reversing its suicidal policy of taking in hordes of Islamic immigrants.

Prediction: Europe will have to experience several more Paris-like attacks before its inhabitants realize that candlelight vigils will not stop Muslims from having a desire to conquer the continent.

Feminism

Feminist philosophy is now deeply ingrained in every aspect of our culture. All women seem to be infected with it to a greater or lesser degree.

That said, I've spoken to several young women who will identify as feminists even though their views are quite traditional. The new development is that some women are now openly rejecting feminism and embracing patriarchy. They are still a minority, but they are vocal. They will gradually influence their peers.

Prediction: Feminism has reached its maximum expansion. 2016 marks the year when it will begin to lose ground, but it will be a slow battle at least in the early stages.

Conclusion

When we look back, 2016 will represent a turning point in the culture war. It will be the year when progressive forces are halted and traditional values begin to return. It will not be easy and it may even become unpleasant in some places. One thing is certain though, 2016 will not be boring.

Happy New Year to the entire ROK community!

Read More: Why You Should Vote For Hillary Clinton In 2016

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Scientific Research Confirms That Women Lie About Their Sexual History

January 3, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

In this article I'll review findings from two different studies. The first is on the responses women give about their sexual behavior when connected to a lie detector versus not being connected to one. The second study is about sexual regret differences between men and women.

Women Lie About Their Number Of Sexual Partners

In this community we've long known women have no trouble being deceitful if it suits their needs. Nowhere is this clearer than the domain of sex. "I'm not going to sleep with you," "I've never done that before," and "I've only had sex with two guys" are just a few of the many lies any man in the game has heard multiple times.

In a study at Ohio State University, researchers used a lie detector to determine if it would influence responses to different types of behaviors. The respondents were heterosexual college students in the Midwest, aged 18-25.

Women not connected to a machine gave these answers:

- Age at first intercourse: 16.36
- Number of sexual partners: 2.70
- Number of one-time sexual partners: 0.82

Women connected to a lie detector gave these answers:

- Age at first intercourse: 16.15
- Number of sexual partners: 3.35
- Number of one-time sexual partners: 1.01

Data supports the hypothesis: She's a lying slut.

As we can see, women's numbers increase for each answer when they were connected to a lie detector. In fact, women have 41% more sexual partners than men. Men in the lie detector condition reported having 1.96 partners on average compared to 3.35 partners for women. Feminists claim that women are sexually oppressed and shamed by society, but the numbers don't show it.

If this is how they behave with the supposed "patriarchal" restrictions, we can only imagine the amount of cock they'd seek out if these shackles were lifted. Revealed preference has shown that women not only have more sex than men, but they also lie about it.

The researchers also investigated other types of behaviors and participant responses. They found that there was no difference in the responses given for other types of common, non-sexual behaviors. Only in the domain of sexual activity did women lie.

Your girl is different— she'd never lie.

Women need to be shown how to behave. Right now they're getting their behavior cues from feminism and the media, which tells them they should have lots of casual sex and in their early thirties give their calloused womb to a man who patiently waited until the seventh date to have sex.

Without an incentive to be truthful, women will present a tidied up version of their sexual history. Keep this in mind when interacting with them, and understand that they have told multiple lies to conceal their joy ride on the cock carousel.

Women Regret Their Slutty Past

In a different study, researchers recruited 200 participants to determine if sex differences existed concerning sexual regret. First, the participants were asked to list their top five life regrets, top five action and inaction regrets, and top five romantic or sexual action and inaction regrets. Next, they read two different scenarios. In the first two scenarios, they read about an actor who either encountered an unexpected opportunity to have casual sex, or missed an unexpected opportunity to have casual sex.

The casual sex scenario emphasized that the actor never saw his or her sex partner again. The scenario with the missed opportunity for casual sex emphasized the interest of the person the actor could have had sex with.

The actor in the scenarios matched the sex of the participants and each participant rated their beliefs about the regret experienced by the actor, followed by their own regret if they were to find themselves in the scenario on a 9-point scale (1 = no regret; 5 = moderate regret, 9 = extreme regret).

Results

For casual sex, women assigned a regret level of 8.89. Men gave a rating of 5.

For missing a chance at casual sex, men gave a regret level of 7.40. Women have a rating of 3.

So what does this mean? For men, it means to take action. For women, it means to stop spreading your legs or you will become regretful and bitter. It also shows the reality that women have many more opportunities for casual sex than men, something they rarely take into account when shaming men for learning how to improve their sex lives. They have little regret at missing a chance for casual sex because they know there's always another shiny cock around the corner.

Another interesting finding was the differing items on the Top Five Sexual Regrets list for men and women. This data was taken from an anonymous online survey of thousands of men and women:

Men

1. Too shy to indicate sexual attraction to someone
2. Was not more sexually adventurous when young
3. Was not more sexually adventurous when single
4. Did not experiment enough sexually
5. Cheated on past or present partner

Women

1. Lost virginity to "wrong" partner
2. Cheated on past or present partner
3. Relationship progressed "too fast" sexually
4. Unsafe sex
5. Sex with a stranger

Our culture has encouraged women to sit on as many dicks as possible, setting them up to regret their slutty sexual past leaving them unfit for motherhood. As a man, you can see that you will have your share of regrets as well if you don't take the steps necessary to improve yourself and play the field as a young man, so that you will no longer have regrets when you wish to settle down. Years from now, you won't remember the rejections, only the times you didn't take action.

Rejections are minor annoyances; regret is crushing.

We have seen that women have more sex than men, lie about how many men they've had sex with, and later live to regret it. Our culture has created a situation where women are encouraged to behave in ways that are damaging to themselves. These findings support what our community has known for a long time: Women lie about their sexual history and regret their slutty past.

Read More: Should Women Get To Decide What Men Find Attractive?

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

What Kind Of Belief System Is Behind The European Migrants?

January 3, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

With so many people from the Middle East and Africa coming to Europe, it's no wonder that the news these days are filled with stories on incidents involving immigrants. Although it produces some anxiety over what will happen in the future, it's not surprising that problems arise when civilizations clash.

> It isn't what we don't know that gives us trouble, it's what we know that ain't so.

People who think they know more than they do can be dangerous. That's something to keep in mind before you invite strangers into your home, which Europeans have been doing for many years now. The following list contains three things that the migrants seem to believe, that ain't true.

1. Ghosts are real

A group of asylum seekers have fled their home in Grännaforsa, Sweden. 35 of the 58 residents left after convincing themselves that the facility was haunted by ghosts. The children noticed it first, says one of the former residents, Hamid Alojaili.

> At first we thought that it was just childish stories but now us adults have also heard sounds and seen things like locked doors being unlocked and someone showering without anybody being there.

Noteworthy is that the rampant phasmophobia among these immigrants have gone practically unnoticed by the leftist mainstream media. Not even the #GhostLivesMatter movement on Twitter has brought this story to light. This is evidence of a bias toward privileged immigrants, where their needs and comfort trump the safety and security of the marginalized ghost community.

Joking aside, while this might seem ridiculous at a first glance, what if there's some truth to it that us narrow-minded Westerners just don't understand? Is this article expressing toxic Eurocentrism? Return of Kings has assembled a team of scientists to figure out if the asylum seekers' claims hold water. After a thorough study, their unanimous conclusion is that there's "no good reason" to think that ghosts exist. According to their report, only children and "mentally retarded" persons are able to believe such nonsense. Fascinating.

Because of the current lack of accommodation, the authorities haven't been able to find a new home for the escaped refugees. Hopefully they will feel more safe and content on the cold, snowy streets of Sweden.

2. Rape is okay

After a number of rapes were committed by immigrants in Finland last year, the national radio and TV network Yle has published texts in Arabic prescribing how women should be treated. The three articles contain information on “cultural differences,” and are supposed to help avoid “misunderstandings” that can occur when Arabic men interact with Finnish women.

According to one expert interviewed, a smile alone from a woman can be taken as a sexual invitation by an Arab. The Finnish migration agency has also tried to inform asylum seekers about the laws and sexual norms in Finland.

In Norway and the German region of Bavaria, immigrants are now being offered courses on how to behave around women. Coming to the West is an adjustment for these men, since they’re used to women not showing any skin and not displaying affection in public. Seeing all of these sexy Western girls in skimpy outfits, and not being allowed to rape them, makes the men terribly confused.

There can really be now question about it anymore—rape culture is being imported to Europe. Anyone denying that will have to explain why these media campaigns and courses are needed, and why immigrants feel it necessary to take them. All of the women cheering on multiculturalism, and trashing “racist” nationalists and conservatives, will also have to accept the ramifications of their actions.

One wonders how easy it will be for them to say “refugees welcome” while pinned down to the ground and penetrated by a gang of Somalis.

3. Sweden gives immigrants everything they want

While it certainly seemed true just a few months ago, things have changed rapidly. Politicians on both left and right promised a lot, but in the end couldn't deliver. The very generous asylum laws that made so many migrants come to Sweden before, have now been changed with the explicit purpose of keeping them away.

As the Deputy Prime Minister (shown above) announced the government's new stricter asylum policies, she was visibly emotional and nearly started crying. No doubt was she lamenting all of those exciting, multicultural rapes that she was going to miss out on.

Some of the immigrants have complained that Sweden did not offer them as much as they expected. While they thought that they could stay here forever on the government dole, now they will only get a limited residence permit. Around 3,500 of them retracted their asylum applications last year.

While it's a shame that they had to come all this way to realize that Sweden is not the Promised Land—not for them anyway—it's a good thing that some of them are now returning in disappointment. They can tell their peers that they are not welcome in the European welfare states anymore.

Maybe that could finally put an end to this crisis.

Read More: Germany Finds Homes For Migrants As Penniless Greek Women Sell Their Bodies For Pennies

John Hydenius

John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

7 Reasons You Shouldn’t Try To Save A Woman You Don’t Know

January 4, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

There is no denying that humans can be altruistic beings who are often willing to help others in need. But many men specifically seem to be hard-wired by genetics to want to help women even if it means putting their own lives at risk. Whether this is due to biological drive or cultural conditioning is of little importance. What is important is to understand the implications of helping a woman who you have no previous connection with so that you are not putting yourself in unnecessary danger.

Know that we are living in a modern society where most other people you encounter are complete strangers whom you know nothing about. It is understandable to protect and save someone you know and care for, but there is no reason for you to jump in and be the knight in shinning armor to save some nameless person just because she happens to lack a Y chromosome.

Of course, it all depends on the specific situation you are faced with. But if you find yourself habitually white-knighting for women, here are 7 reasons to pause and reconsider your motives and what you’re getting yourself into.

1.You Don’t Even Realize That You’re Thinking With Your Dick

Most men who help female strangers are completely oblivious to the fact that their altruism is heavily influenced by their subconscious desire for sex. For a demonstration, experiments done using college-aged women found that men were much more likely (82-83% compared to 42-47%) to comply with a request for a survey and offer help if the woman making the request was wearing high-heels as opposed to flats.

If something as simple as feminine shoes are able to elicit much more altruistic response from men (female subjects, on the other hand, were not affected by the types of shoes that were being worn and were much less likely to offer help than the men), then you know that you are more than likely thinking with your dick and doing something that you normally wouldn't do.

2. She's Not Going To Fall For You

The secret desire of all white knights.

Continuing on with the first point, helping a woman out will never make her fall in love with you. You're just some random nobody who happened to be there at the right moment when she needed you. Once she's got the service she needed from you, you are a nobody once again. You are expected to disappear.

All the poor, desperate simps who believe that a woman will fall in love with him for his heroism are only bound to be rewarded with disappointment. Look at it this way: You are more likely to have a woman fall in love with you by using violence to take her hostage (via Stockholm Syndrome) than by being the one rescuing her.

3. She Will Likely Bail On You

Not only is a woman unlikely to fall for you, she is also likely to bail on you. Whenever a man jumps in to “save” a woman from another man, you can almost guarantee that she will simply run away and treat the situation as if she was never involved in it the first place.

We have already covered how the French train hero was stabbed when he stepped into help a woman who was being “attacked”—only to have her run away with the same men who supposedly attacked her. You have to understand that while you are driven by your male instinct to save her, she’s driven by her female instinct to preserve herself by using you.

4. You’re Degrading Yourself As A Utility To Be Exploited

It’s no secret that women see men as utilities to be exploited. For women, men are not human beings, but drones to be manipulated to do their bidding. Many men today are so desperate for female validation that they’re willing to shovel snow for some entitled princess on Tinder with full knowledge that they will get nothing in return.

Can you imagine the sort of reaction you would get from women if you asked them to iron your clothes, with “no strings attached” on Tinder? It’s simple: don’t be a tool.

5. She Would Never Do The Same For You

Feminists continue to propagate their garbage about equality because it enables them access to male privileges without giving up any of their female privileges. One of that privilege is the ability to have men risk their lives to save them while they're not expected to do the same for men.

For a dramatic demonstration of just how little women care about men—especially when they're being abused and attacked by another woman—take a look at the following videos:

Note how gleefully they smile and laugh when men are the ones being abused, claiming that he must be guilty and deserve it (excuses that would never fly for men who abuse their partners).

6. You'll Be Accused Of Being A Sexist

"You saved Princess Daisy? Sexist! She should be able to save herself without a man's help!!" —Says the woman begging the UN for protection while being guarded by armed men.

As if all the above points are not insulting enough, you're likely to be demonized as a sexist prick by the feminists instead of being praised for helping a woman. Why? Because it's benevolent sexism. Feminists love to harp about how strong and independent they are and how they don't need a man. Give them their wish and let them help themselves the next time you see them in trouble.

7. You're Putting Yourself At Needless Risk For Nothing

The man in the blue jacket died while saving the woman. And for what?

In the end, what are you really trying to accomplish? Are you not simply acting upon your male instinct in a knee-jerk reaction? And for what? To save some ungrateful broad you don't know anything about? Do you even understand what the situation is?

One man got out of his car and onto the train tracks only to get killed by the incoming train while trying to save a woman who jumped there to kill herself—he couldn't even save her. Is that how you want to throw away the only life you have?

Or how about the man who was stabbed and bled to death when he jumped in to save a woman he knew nothing about? The woman just ran away (see point #3) while he bled to death on the street with more than twenty people just walking past him.

Congratulations stranger, you just earned a posthumous title of "hero" which will be forgotten in a week.

Conclusion

All that said, I'm not suggesting that you should never help anyone in need no matter the circumstances. But you should consider each scenario carefully and make the right judgement instead of letting instincts from your penis take over you. Trying to help or save someone just because the person happens to have a vagina is both incredibly foolish and risky.

Always put your needs first—because she most certainly is putting her needs above yours.

Read More: Women Should Save Their Virginity For Marriage

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

International ROK Meetup Day: February 6, 2016

January 4, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On February 6, 2016 at 8PM, readers of Return Of Kings, Roosh V Forum, and my blog will have the opportunity to meet other like-minded men in their cities. The meetup on February 6 will hopefully be the start of fixed and regular meetups that serve men in their local communities in a way that internet platforms do not.

The Problem

The internet is great for sharing information and building e-relationships, but it often does not bridge the gap to create real friendships, allow for male bonding, and offer concrete aid or help. I hope you agree that having 100 e-friends does not surpass having one real friend who understands you, shares your world view, and is accessible with a phone call or short drive away.

While many of you certainly have normal friendships, chances are those friends are moderates who may not be dependable in times of crisis, and who may not defend you if a hostile enemy approaches. It's important to develop the right friendships of men who have your back no matter what, just like men in Canada had my back last summer.

I'm in touch with a German man whose small city is currently the site of a government-sponsored relocation program for Afro-Islamists. He stated to me that his city has become more unsafe after dark and he's starting to feel like a prisoner in his own home, especially since he does not have friendships there with men who are against the immigrant invasion. If he was connected to a tribe within his city, I have no doubt that he'd feel more safe while having the means to improve the situation caused by his government to displace him and reduce his standard of living.

The Solution

I aim to help men create tribes in cities throughout the world that operate independently of each other. Each tribe will be maintained by a chief that runs it in a way he sees fit. Very little information will be given to me, especially concerning personal information of the tribe's members. If I get shut down for whatever reason, the tribes will be able to continue operation. If one tribe dissipates from inactivity, it will not affect other tribes.

During peace-time, I advise tribes to meet at least twice a month on a regular schedule over coffee or drinks (e.g. every 1st and 3rd Thursday of the month at 8pm). The atmosphere will be relaxed and you'll be able to talk about women, politics, travel, work, or whatever else interests you. During times of crisis, however, when members are threatened due to the actions of outsiders or their own government, the tribe will be utilized to offer concrete support and defense. Hopefully that day will never come, but odds are it will, and you need to establish relationships with men you trust before a threat arrives.

Tribal meetings will not tolerate the promotion of illegal actions and will not engage in violence. Any man that suggests violent activity will be seen as a provocateur or government agent.

The First Meeting

To get the ball rolling, I will help organize your city's first meetup on February 6. What I ask is for men who can host the meetup in their city to click here and fill out this form. A potential host should be able to…

- Arrive on time to a public landmark of his choosing (the landmark location will be posted publicly). Important: submit an outdoor landmark to initially meet, not the actual bar or cafe you will walk to and sit in. It would be very helpful if you include an image link to the meeting point within the form.
- Gather attendees through the use of a code phrase
- Direct men by foot to the meeting location that you choose (e.g. a nearby cafe or bar)
- Be a welcoming host
- Gather contact information of attendees (email or phone number) to invite them to potential future meetups

Once a host has four meetups in a row, I will add his tribe to the Tribal Meeting map so future men can contact him and join.

The Next Step

If you would like a tribe in your city then I ask you to step up by volunteering to host the meeting on February 6. If a city has no host on that date, there can be no meetup. Big cities like New York City, London, and Los Angeles may have multiple hosts in different parts of town. If you can host, fill out this form no later than January 16 and wait for word back from me.

If you would like to attend the meetup on February 6 but are unable to host, simply wait for a follow-up article that gives further instructions.

Here is the operation schedule:

January 4-16: Open call for hosts
January 19: Publication of public landmark meeting locations
February 6: Meetup at 8pm in your city

Conclusion

There are currently three tribes, located in Chicago, Washington DC, and Poznan (Poland). I've participated with two of them, so I've seen firsthand how valuable they are in providing a venue for men to be men, reviving the "men's club" idea of old. I can state that my time spent in these two cities is better because of the tribes' existence.

Each of the three tribes currently serves a masculine function, but if economic collapse, internal decline, and mass migration accelerate, negatively affecting members' quality of life, they will serve as much more. At that critical juncture, I hope the tribe will be able to counterbalance hardships on its members by giving them a means to take the right actions to support and defend themselves, their family, and their city.

Every man gets to choose his level of involvement. I present the idea and the logistics today, and now it's up to you to decide where to take it.

View The Hosting Form For Tribal Meetup Day

View Next: Full City Listing And Meeting Points For International Meetup Day On February 6, 2016

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What We Must Learn From The Hungarian Communist Revolution Of 1919

January 4, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Historians of twentieth century Europe, I have noticed, tend to gloss over or minimize the atrocities and crimes of leftists, anarchists, and communists. We hear constantly about the excesses of the right; and yet the left is portrayed as the perennial victim, never stepping beyond the boundaries of civilized conduct.

And yet nothing could be further from the truth. The growth of the far right in Europe after the First World War was often traceable to the disorder, chaos, and fear generated by leftist and communist crimes. In country after country, the pattern was the same: outside agents or internal traitors seeking to destabilize the societies in which they lived.

The reader will perceive that there is a direct line of descent from the communist-Bolshevist agitators of yesteryear and the militant social justice warrior (SJW) of today. They are cats of the same stripe. Both of them sought to undermine and destroy the societies in which they lived, and did not care much how they went about doing it.

We have recently discussed one such example, the Spartacist revolution in postwar Germany. We will now turn to another such example, that of the communist revolution in 1919 Hungary. It was the second communist republic to come into existence, after Russia; and while its longevity was mercifully brief, its advent was marked by vindictive violence and bloodshed.

The author of the 1919 Hungarian revolution was a cunning, treacherous man named Bela Kun. His birth name was Bela Kohen or Kohn, and he was born in 1886 in what is now Lelei, Romania. Sometime around 1904 he changed his last name to Kun.

Kun: A lying, murdering rat who hated European civilization and wanted to destroy it.

Before the First World War, he was engaged in work as a newspaper journalist in Austria-Hungary, much like the militant social justice warriors (SJWs) of today. He was known for his combative nature, and was apparently accused of embezzlement at one point.

He served in the military forces of Austria-Hungary in the First World War, but was captured by the Russians in 1916. When Russia became convulsed in revolution in 1917-1918, he willingly allowed himself to become an agent of the Communist International.

He was a committed communist and found its methods and promises attractive. He knew Lenin and approved of his brutal methods, and thought that exporting this brand of terror to the country of his birth would be a good thing.

The Bolsheviks sent him back to Hungary in 1918 with a large sum of money and several hundred cadres for the specific purpose of undertaking a coup. In this he was greatly helped by the post-war dislocation and chaos caused by the collapse of the old monarchy. Like a plague bacillus, he and his followers sought to infect a weakened society with an evil ideology that cloaked itself in the language of liberation.

His tactics were those of fear and intimidation: he and his group organized strikes, demonstrations, and employed the use of violence against dissenters. Hungary was in chaos and many in government were opposed to the Allies' plans to redraw the country's borders. At some point, Kun was asked to take part in a coalition government with the Social Democrats; his known ties to Soviet Russia were expected to be a useful card in negotiations with the Western allies. Kun promised that he could bring Russian support to a new Hungarian coalition government.

And here we see the truth illustrated in stark clarity once again: trying to appease or negotiate with SJW fanatics is a losing proposition. This proved to be the case with Kun in 1919.

As the price for his support, Kun demanded the declaration of a Soviet republic in Hungary, as well as the domination of the Social Democrats by the communists. Like fools, the traditional forces of the old order allowed a snake to enter the tent; and once there, the snake quickly took over.

Lenin talking to one of Kun's ministers (named Szamuely) in 1919.

The Hungarian Soviet Republic was declared in March 1919. Kun was the dominant force in the new government and immediately embarked on a radical program, such as the nationalization of all private property. He used gangs of thugs known as the "Lenin Boys" to murder and terrorize anyone who was thought to be insufficiently enthusiastic for the regime. All the usual Bolshevist apparatus was brought into Hungary: secret tribunals, secret police, and revolutionary "courts."

But events would soon spiral out of control. Hungary became involved in border disputes, then open war, with Romania and Czechoslovakia. Romania then invaded Hungary and marched on Budapest, deposing Kun and his retinue of flunkies in August 1919. The government had lasted only 133 days. The Soviet Red Army in Russia, too preoccupied with its own problems, could do little but offer rhetorical support for Kun.

But Kun's blood-stained career was not over. He was briefly interned in Vienna, but later released as part of a prisoner exchange; thereafter, he found his way back to Russia, where he could find additional opportunities to commit violence and atrocities against innocents.

Kun participated in Russia's civil war in the 1920s, and according to historians was directly responsible for the execution of about 50,000 White Russian prisoners and civilians (with the approval of Lenin). These were people who had been promised amnesty if they would surrender.

Kun later took charge of the Crimea, and there he undertook a vigorous program of murder, torture, and mass deportations. It is estimated that he supervised the execution of 60,000 to 70,000 Crimean inhabitants.

For the rest of the 1920s, he worked as an agent of the Comintern, traveling around Europe and trying to foment revolutions. One he organized in Germany ended in complete failure (the "March Action" program). Thereafter his credibility in communist circles waned; he was arrested in Vienna and deported to Russia. There he spent his time denouncing former comrades and planning future projects.

But history seems to have a perverse sense of humor, and Kun would eventually see some measure of justice. The advent of Joseph Stalin changed the game in Russia; he distrusted foreign communists, especially those with ties to the old Bolsheviks.

Around 1937, Kun was arrested, tortured, and shot by Stalin's NKVD, for the stated reason of being a "counter-revolutionary terrorist." So perished the diabolical and cruel engineer of the deaths of so many others, by the very hand of the people he had sought to elevate. There is a crude, but fitting, sort of justice in this outcome.

Readers may draw their own conclusions from the Bela Kun story, and what those lessons mean for the present day. At the very least, his career suggests the following: (1) making alliances with people of this sort is a useless exercise; (2) the vindictiveness and cruelty of such people cannot be underestimated; (3) physical force is often needed to confront them.

Read More: 5 Insights From A Decade In Higher Learning

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Will Ammon Bundy's Oregon Uprising Herald A Revolt Against The U.S. Government?

January 4, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Over the weekend, the Internet exploded following news that 150 armed militiamen had taken over the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge in rural Harney County, Oregon, near the border with Nevada. The dispute has its origins in a long-standing conflict between local ranchers and the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) over the pending imprisonment of two men accused of arson. Ammon Bundy and two other sons of Cliven Bundy, a Nevada rancher known for leading a standoff against the BLM two years ago, are leading the occupation:

> "We're going to be freeing these lands up, and getting ranchers back to ranching, getting the loggers back to logging, getting the miners back to mining where they could do it under the protection of the people and not be afraid of this tyranny that's been set upon them," Ammon Bundy, who appears to be the leader of the group, said in a Facebook video posted by Sarah Dee Spurlock on Saturday.

As of this writing, federal agents are continuing to negotiate with the militia, which is refusing to back down unless their demands are met.

Notably, the incident has sent leftists into a tizzy, with major figures such as Montel Williams calling for President Obama to send in the military to clear out the militiamen with "shoot-to-kill" orders. Other progressives have claimed that the government's supposedly light treatment of Bundy's group compared with the supposedly harsh punishments meted out to #BlackLivesMatter protesters and Muslims as indicative of white privilege, mockingly referring to the militia as “Y’all Qaeda” and “Vanilla ISIS.”

While neither I nor Return of Kings condone violence, the Oregon incident is the result of the BLM and other government agencies abusing their power. Unbeknownst to most Americans, the federal government has been waging a war on white ranchers in the American West for the decades, systemically stripping them of their ability to make a living. With their way of life threatened—and attempts to solve the problem peacefully failing—Ammon Bundy and his ilk have been forced to make their point in other ways.

A Brief History Of Environmentalist Tyranny

The genesis of the Oregon standoff involves the federal government’s persecution of two ranchers from the area: Dwight Lincoln Hammond, Jr. and his son Steven Dwight Hammond. In 2006, the Hammonds were arrested and convicted of arson after setting a fire on their land in order to clear out invasive plant and animal species, a fire that spread to adjacent federal-owned land. (Some have argued that they actually set the fire to cover up illegal hunting; since none of us were there, we can’t say for sure what happened.)

The Hammonds were sentenced to five years in prison, served their time and were released. However, several months ago, Bureau of Land Management Field Manager Rhonda Karges and her husband Chad (the manager of the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge) filed an appeal to send the Hammonds back to prison for the same charges.

Last October, the 9th District Federal Court re-sentenced the Hammonds to five more years in prison on domestic terrorism charges, claiming that the two had not served enough time according to minimum mandatory sentencing guidelines for arson. The Hammonds were due to report to prison on January 4, 2016.

It gets worse. The Bureau of Land Management has been waging a campaign against the Hammonds and other ranchers for years, including arbitrarily revoking grazing permits and blocking off access to portions of their property, despite the fact that the Hammonds' ownership of their ranch predates the creation of the BLM. Since the vast majority of land in the West is owned by the federal government, ranchers have had to utilize federal lands to graze their cattle for generations:

To put it simply, the Hammonds and other ranchers are in a fight for their survival. The federal government's constant power-grabs and harsh treatment of ranchers has severely crippled their ability to make a living. The Hammonds, Bundys and other ranching families have tried to obey the law and work with the government for years, and the feds have responded by spitting in their faces. A reaction of this kind was inevitable.

The Tree Of Liberty, The Blood Of Tyrants?

While it's too early to say if the Oregon uprising is evidence of a full-scale revolt against the U.S. government, it shows that American society has reached its breaking point. As Ammon Bundy has repeatedly stated, the takeover of the Malheur Wildlife Refuge was not a spur-of-the-moment incident, but had been planned for years. When law-abiding citizens resort to actions such as this, it's indicative of deep, abiding rot in our social framework.

Leftists who are howling for the government to put down the Oregon revolt with violent force would do well to remember what happened the last time that happened. The Clinton administration's horrifying response to the Waco siege in 1993—bombing the Branch Davidians' compound and killing nearly a hundred people—helped carry the Republicans to a congressional majority in the midterm elections of 1994. Additionally, Cliven Bundy's successful resistance against federal agents two years ago was a massive embarrassment for the government.

While assisting Ammon Bundy's forces is illegal, given the massive outpouring of support they've received from many ordinary Americans, many readers might be tempted to do so. While we cannot condone or endorse any acts of treason or violence against the government, it's worth remembering that the United States of America itself was founded as a result of independent citizens resisting a tyrannical government. Take this for what you will.

Read More: Oregon State Government Bankrupts Bar Owner For Refusing To Serve Transsexuals

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

What Is The Alternative Right?

January 5, 2016 | by Paul Ramsey | Link | Original Link

In 1969 my Dad and Mom loaded my little brother and me into the family station wagon and we took a drive to Boulder, Colorado. Our goal was to drive slowly through the University of Colorado campus. It was our cheap alternative to taking the family to Yellowstone Park to look at the bears. But instead of looking at bears begging for food, we looked at hippies sitting on the campus lawn smoking dope.

At that age I was part of a fundamentalist Christian family. We believed in Jesus, Israel, demons and The Rapture. The world was a scary place full of evil, demonic activity and sins. And some of the greatest sins of that time were rock music and boys with long hair. These long haired, dope smoking freaks were called “hippies.” They were the degenerate counter culture (freaks) that fought against The Establishment (squares).

These hippies opposed the war in Vietnam—the peace symbol was their emblem. They were young and didn’t trust anyone over 30. And their politics was a mishmash of anarchism and Marxism. But, above all, it was about smoking dope and fucking. Sex, drugs and rock & roll baby!

I had a flashback of the hippie era as I read a recent BuzzFeed news article lamenting that the Alt Right is a bunch of degenerate young kids who are the counter culture. As such, I have come full circle. From the “square” kid laughing at the counter culture to now being seen as a leading figure of this movement. Jack Kerouac has become RAMZPAUL.

How to define an informal movement?

Hippie Chick (8/10, WB).

Part of the problem of defining an informal movement is that such an entity lacks precise boundaries. I think most of us have a mental image that comes to mind when we think of "hippie." I think of some dude with long hair, wearing a tie dye T-shirt with a peace sign in one hand and a marijuana joint in the other. But does that description DEFINE a hippie? Could a man have short hair and be a hippie? Could a Republican be a hippie?

The same debate rages as to who is the "real" Alt Right. Can Christians be Alt Right? Can homosexuals? Jews? Bronies?

Like the hippie movement, it is impossible to make rigid definitions. However, the concept of Alt Right is useful in that it describes a certain political sub culture that is outside of the mainstream. To this end it can be useful to compare and contrast the Alt Right to more old school political movements.

Traditional Republicans

Traditional Republicans tend to see the world as a battle between "Conservatives" vs. "Liberals." The Alt Right sees the battle in terms of "Nationalism" vs. "Globalism."

Your typical "conservative" Republican believes in:

- low taxes
- smaller government (in theory)
- a strong military to defend Israel
- guns
- opposition to abortion

These conservatives believe that Jesus loves all the little children of the world. And, as such, we are really all the same. We can import a million Somalis and if we just lower their taxes and "get the government off their backs" they will make great Republicans.

Typically these folks are also "pro-morality," which, in practice, means that their moral compass is whatever the Democrats supported 20 years ago. As such, they tend to oppose gay marriage (for now) and believe race is "only skin color." But these moral positions always move to the left as the Republicans "grow" in office. I am sure that the Republicans will soon defend the sanctity of gay marriage as a “conservative value” and claim that race is real and we must fight “white privilege.”

As the Traditional Republicans tend to be older, internet memes and jokes tend to confuse them. Basically the only meme they understand is that of the “kick ass” middle aged woman with big tits holding a rifle. (Women with guns is a fetish for these types.)

Boobs and Guns!

The Alt Right Is About Identity

People on the Alt Right are primarily concerned with identity. This means:

- Hungary belongs to the Hungarians
- Germany belongs to the Germans
- France belongs to the French

Syrians that flood into Germany may become citizens but they will never be Germans. For a nation is based on a common blood, language and culture. Years ago this was known as self-determination and common sense. Now it is known as “WHITE SUPREMACY” by the left and establishment Republicans.

However, curiously, the one exception is Israel. Both the Democrats and the Republicans affirm the Israel has the right to remain a Jewish ethno-state. As such, no Democrat or Republican politician is demanding that Israel accept Syrian refugees. But these same politicians insist that white countries have a moral obligation to accept endless refugees.

It has been something of a pastime for the globalists to excitedly predict when a country will no longer have a white majority. Germany will no longer have a white majority by 2020! The USA will no longer be White by 2030! The destruction of the white majority is always seen as inevitable and a good thing. And to oppose it means you are a “White Supremacist” or a “Nazi.”

But some people no longer want to be dispossessed from their homelands. And, yet, they also don’t want to exploit or harm other races. They just want self-determination for their people as the Jews have self-determination in Israel. These are the ideologically refugees that have migrated to the Alt Right.

14/88, SIEG HEIL, KKK, Neo-Nazis, Racial Holy War, etc.

(Disclaimer – I do not advocate white girls damaging our precious wheat)

"NO ENEMIES TO THE RIGHT!" is the cry I frequently hear when I criticize the Hollywood Nazi styled groups. Of course, that assumes that such people are sincere. Hal Turner, a famous radical on the Right, was an admitted FBI informer. Brian Holland was the Presidential Candidate of the NSM (Neo-Nazi) Party. He later also admitted to being a government informer. Are such informers really to the right?

The above are just two examples of the long history of ADL and SPLC shills and government informers in such groups. As President Obama has declared the "Radical Right" to be the REAL terrorist threat, you can bet many people are paid to play the neo-Nazi role both on-line and in real life.

I have personally received more threats from the "neo-Nazi" crowd than from anyone on the left. After doing some investigation I discovered that many of these characters previously had zero interest in politics or were actually "anti-racist." But prison time (and the promise of an early release) can "flip" such people to play a desired role with the associated funding.

The primary goal of the ADL and SPLC in using such shills is to associate any sort of white identity with "Nazism" and "White Supremacism." Guilt by association might be a logical fallacy, but it is effective in transforming public opinion and obfuscating the real goals of a movement.

Of course, I often hear the argument that the Democrats and Republicans will call the Alt Right "Nazis" anyway so we might as well embrace the Heil Hitler crowd. But that is a mistake. We must define our own values and live in our own times. Despite the desire of the ADL and SPLC, the world is not perpetually circa 1933 Germany.

Frank Collin (Cohen). The Best Neo-Nazis have been Jews

The future

The Hippies of the 1950s and 1960s were never a formal political movement. But the basic philosophy gave birth to organizations and influenced public policy. Hillary Clinton is basically a relic of the hippie generation. And they are now the establishment.

We on the Alt Right are the hippies of our time. We are the counter culture. And while we are not a formal organization we do have organizations such as American Renaissance (AmRen) and National Policy Institute (NPI) that represent many of our values. The primary of these values being self-determination for all people.

We are also starting to see mainstream pundits such as Ann Coulter and mainstream politicians such as Donald Trump tap into many Alt Right themes. As we continue to grow, we will see more famous people reject the globalism of the Democrats and Republicans and embrace nationalism.

The wheel will turn and we will one day regain the institutions and be the establishment. But for now, enjoy the creative freedom and fun of being part of the counter culture.

Peace and Love.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: 10 Signs You Might Be A Cuckservative

Paul Ramsey
RAMZPAUL is now an always sober guy that makes YouTube videos. Claimed to be the third most dangerous propagandist in America. RAMZPAUL. You can also follow him on Twitter.

Why Women Stopped Having Children

January 5, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Many people have pointed to the collapsing birthrate in Western societies and questioned why middle-class young women aren't having children at the same rates as their mothers and grandmothers. Some people have pointed to factors including careerism, feminism, and an orchestrated plan directed by the elite. This article will discuss why the system wants women to see motherhood as a low-status pursuit.

Education, Fertility, And Status

More education = fewer children (Source: The World Bank)

It is widely known that less educated young women have children at much higher rates than middle-class women. For women with a high school education or less, 62% have children by age 25. For women with bachelor's degrees, that number drops to just 26%. For women with advanced degrees, the number drops still further.

One reason for this is because for poor girls, motherhood elevates their status. It's better to be poor with a kid than poor without one. Women with few prospects in life realize that having a child affords them a certain respect and status in their communities that single women don't have.

While it may offend our more noble sensibilities, motherhood is a sort of status characteristic. It either increases their status or reduces it depending on their environment. Women care about what the people around them care about—they are susceptible to pressures of conformity. This then boils down to a simple question: What does the community value?

If it values motherhood and elevates it to a position of importance, women will pursue it. If it values degrees in sociology and a corporate or government career, women will pursue that. In a sterile, career-driven environment, motherhood is not assigned the high status lower-class communities give it. Mothers tend to be seen as less competent in the workplace. They are also seen as less suitable for positions of authority.

Women are trained to value these things and if motherhood is an obstacle, than it has to go. Increasingly in the West, being a mother is at best neutral in terms of social status, but more often a negative.

Women think the new iPhone is higher status than a newborn baby.

Additionally, women having kids prior to grinding out their peak childbearing years in college to get a worthless degree is seen as a waste of “potential.” Our society has conditioned women into thinking that they have more to offer society by becoming a drone to make their (likely male) corporate masters more money. Giving their best years to their families and shaping young human lives are not afforded nearly the same social status as becoming a paper pusher in a cubicle.

I’m sure that when a career woman is on her deathbed, her last thoughts will revolve around whether she reached the highest levels of the career ladder and made her bosses and shareholders enough money. Certainly she won’t think of their husband, children, or grandchildren—that’s nothing compared to the fulfillment won by spending time in soul-sucking meetings with people she hates.

Being “Just A Mom” Isn’t Enough, So Get To Work

The perfect way to spend your childbearing years.

Furthermore, motherhood is not seen as a point of pride anymore. Take a look at the vast array of articles with titles like “I Love My Son, But I’m More Than Just A Mom.” Notice the “just” in the title, suggesting that being a caretaker for the next generation is a trivial matter. These articles frequently include the word “just” in the title as if people in society actually dismiss these women with phrases like, “You’re just a mom.” Have you ever heard anyone say that? Me neither.

In these cases, what is happening is that these women have developed feelings of insecurity and inferiority. They themselves have fallen into society’s trap of thinking motherhood isn’t special enough. They then project these feelings into the world, thinking everyone views them as merely a mother.

Young women pick up on these signals and shift their behavior accordingly. Seeing popular media articles bashing motherhood leads to women either not becoming mothers at all, or spending a few years working and then dividing their time between their families and their office job.

More important than your stupid career.

But why might these articles exist in the first place? Why would the media disseminate content proclaiming that motherhood isn't enough—that women must also be career-driven workhorses? The answer is that the system knows it can't completely scrub away the motherhood instinct from women, so instead women are told that being a mother isn't enough.

The system knows that women must not be encouraged to draw satisfaction solely by raising a family and caring for her loved ones. She must be a producer for the system. Every moment you spend with your children is a moment you aren't producing for a corporation, another moment you aren't making money for someone else, another moment you aren't feeding into the system.

Now back to work, slave. You need fulfillment.

Read More: American Women Are Mad They Aren't Courted Anymore

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

Return Of Kings Podcast #1 Is Now Here

January 5, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Return of Kings has decided to add a regular podcast to its lineup of features. Hosted by myself, this will allow an entire new dimension to the ROK experience.

In this first episode, there's a brief news roundup before discussion about Reggie Yates, the BBC, Sweden's immigration policies, and some weightlifting advice for older men.

The podcast is available on iTunes, YouTube, and Soundcloud.

iTunes

Get it on iTunes

Youtube

Soundcloud

Feel free to offer comments, suggestions, and questions in the comments section.

Read More: 5 Crucial Beliefs Every Man Should Internalize

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Be Seen By Women As An Alpha Male

January 6, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

As we begin a new year, men should remember that standing one's ground—with women in particular—is a central tenet of masculinity. Far too many guys allow women to get away with irritating nonsense, or worse, borderline-abusive behaviour for fear of missing out on sex. This can happen when a man is approaching women, dating, or in a full-blown relationship or marriage.

It's not good enough. Let's all resolve this year to call out bad or disrespectful behaviour when it occurs and and not to fall into the trap of kowtowing to girls just because of their beauty.

Frame Control

A way of talking about this issue that will be familiar to anyone who has a passing interest in game is "frame control"—as it is frequently remarked, the person who controls the frame in any given interaction has the most power and will most likely get their way. Frame, defined simply, is the way in which individuals (or groups like businesses and governments) organize and communicate reality.

As a man, you should be very certain of the types of behaviour you are prepared to tolerate, as well as those that you won't. If you find it irritating when the girl you are with speaks to you rudely, is dismissive, or plays with her iPhone during dinner then you must be sure to let her know that these behaviours negatively affect you and that you will not accept them. Control the frame—as far as you relation to her is concerned—by setting out your version of reality and ensuring that it remains dominant.

It is good practice, by the way—and also only fair—that you also avoid whatever behaviours you proscribe yourself. That way, not only are you able to maintain the upper hand morally, but also you set out by example what is acceptable and what is not. Be fair-handed, in other words, but don't be a pushover. When she crosses the line you must speak up.

An Extreme Example Of Frame Control In Action

I was recently reminded of an incident that I witnessed many years ago that for me perfectly encapsulates frame control in action. I once had a friend by the name of Stevie. Stevie may have been well-groomed, but he was not the best looking guy on the planet. His eyes bulged out of his skull like a toad's, his hair was cut too short and plastered down into a (then unfashionable) side parting, and he was on the wrong side of five foot nine. However, his quick-witted sense of humour, his job in a nightclub, and his rock-solid frame control meant that he was a hit with the girls nonetheless.

One morning I went round to Stevie's apartment to find him having a huge row with this cute brunette Dora, possibly the best looking girl I'd ever seen at that time (I was 21). This girl, who Stevie had been banging for a month or so, was bawling her eyes out and screaming at him as he had not come to meet her the night before, nor had he called her to explain why.

It was Stevie's reaction to this outburst that impressed me and that has stayed with me ever since. Rather than attempting to pacify her, or to apologise for his behaviour, he stuck firmly to his guns and wouldn't concede any of her criticisms. He'd been out all night? Why not—he was a free agent, after all, and they hadn't made firm plans to meet. He hadn't called? He hadn't had an opportunity to do so. Everything was very simple—Stevie was calmly and collectedly putting forward his version of reality.

But after Dora screamed and shouted some more, Stevie held up his hand.

“That’s it. I’ve had just about enough of this. Get out and don’t come back.”

Dora was astounded and so was I. Here was Stevie, a man certainly not blessed with male model-like looks, throwing a gorgeous girl who at that time I would have killed to be with out of his apartment and out of his life.

Enraged at his dismissal, Dora stormed out, but then returned again later, broke in by climbing through a window, and cut up a selection of Stevie’s suits. While I would never recommend that anyone incite burglary and vandalism in a woman, there’s certainly no surer sign that you’ve rattled her cage.

Stevie’s stoic upholding of the standards of behaviour he required in a woman, even to the point where he was prepared to relinquish the relationship, drove a huge emotional response in Dora. A week of so later Stevie was in the arms of another hottie, Dora conveniently forgotten.

If You Want To Be An Alpha, Behave Like One

So how did this happen? How did an average-looking guy like Stevie summon up the brass kahunas to reject a hot girl like Dora? I think we can break it down to these three elements:

1. Believing unquestioningly in his own value
2. Abundance—knowing that after Dora another girl would be just around the corner
3. Rock-solid frame

But what if you aren’t jacked, you’re not good looking, or you don’t earn Zuckerberg bucks? Well, Stevie didn’t have those things either. Here’s the trick. If you want to be perceived as an alpha then you must simply behave like one. Keep the three elements above in your head at all times and embody them whether you believe them or not.

With a bit of faking-it-to-make-it you will create a virtuous circle where, appearing more alpha, people will defer to you more and with time you will gain natural confidence.

As we get into the swing of 2016 remember that the true measure of a man is his ability and willingness to live up to his own standards, and to ensure that those around him do the same. This year, let’s be in no doubt that we are in control of the narrative going on around us and act accordingly.

Read more: The Personality Trait That May Be Hurting Your Chances With Women

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Sexual Predator Lena Dunham Convicts Comedian Bill Cosby Of Rape

January 6, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Bill Cosby has been criminally charged with sexually assaulting one of his many accusers. Hooray! Therefore he's guilty of all the other "rapes," plus this one. No need for a trial to call him a serial rapist—or that's what the Twitter witch hunters and others would have us believe. Celebrities have joined the typical SJW crowd in celebrating the arraignment of Cosby after using their Harry Potter divination techniques to verify his guilt.

With the idea of contempt of court all but dead, these leftist do-gooders have flooded the internet with claims that Cosby is a serial rapist. They have promulgated what they feel are immutable laws of dealing with rape accusations, such as "listen and believe" and "women do not gain from lying." As they do this, Bill Clinton, a hero for many of them, continues to have the many rape and sexual misconduct allegations against him swept under the carpet.

Here comes the witch hunt

> Grateful that Bill Cosby's criminal record will be marked forever, like the lives of the women he raped. They deserve justice and peace.
>
> — Lena Dunham (@lenadunham) December 30, 2015

Cosby had only just taken his first step outside, accompanied by police, when a torrent of "I told you so"'s began emanating from the Court of Twitter. The Instigator-in-Chief was, unsurprisingly, Lena Dunham, who has admitted to playing around with her sister's vagina.

> One day, as I sat in our driveway in Long Island playing with blocks and buckets, my curiosity got the best of me. Grace was sitting up, babbling and smiling, and I leaned down between her legs and carefully spread open her vagina. She didn't resist and when I saw what was inside I shrieked.
>
> My mother came running. "Mama, Mama! Grace has something in there!"
>
> My mother didn't bother asking why I had opened Grace's vagina. This was within the spectrum of things I did. She just got on her knees and looked for herself. It quickly became apparent that Grace had stuffed six or seven pebbles in there. My mother removed them patiently while Grace cackled, thrilled that her prank had been a success.

Joining the fray was Judd Apatow, whose activism might be explained by his biggest hits, The 40-Year-Old Virgin and Knocked Up, being long behind him.

Really, what is the point of a trial anymore? If Lena Dunham and Co. have the crystal ball that can determine guilt (clue: it involves always siding with the female accuser), why don't we dismantle the courts? Another element that mainstream commentators haven't raised is how on Earth anyone can now ensure a fair trial for Cosby. Rape memes involving him now permeate the internet and every major media outlet has sprayed their viewers with pieces sympathetic to the accusers, a group that includes often bankrupt ex-supermodel Janice Dickinson, who spent most of the 1980s high on her own drugs but still claims Cosby drugged and raped her.

And then there's that tricky issue of the standard of proof. Anyone familiar with rape accusations and convictions will be aware that the requirement of "evidence" to convict is artificially lowered for women accusing men of rape or sexual assault. Accused of a bank robbery? DNA evidence and bags of unexplained millions found in your home are the sorts of things usually needed to put you in jail. For rape and sexual assault, pure testimony and being at a particular place at a particular time is enough.

What about Woody Allen?

So Woody's fine because he tows the Hollywood liberal line and continues to generate millions from his artsy films?

Unlike Cosby and his recent history of attacking the cult of African-American self-victimization, acclaimed director Woody Allen has stuck to the distinctly pro-liberal official line of Hollywood. Remember that Woody, who is certainly entitled to innocence before guilt, stands accused of molesting his adoptive daughter Dylan Farrow when she was a child.

His career as a director has also continued at a very consistent rate, whereas the acting presence of Cosby, for whatever reason, declined substantially from the 1990s. Bill kept largely to conventional comedy, which, despite its status as a segment of the wider entertainment industry, is treated separately from and less royally than film and television. In fact, unless you're a comedic actor or presenter on TV, as opposed to mostly being a stand-up comic, making people laugh is seen as more like clown material than having genuine A-lister status.

Because Allen is still producing and remains an avowed Democrat, he's largely immune to any calls for him to be charged or to "resign" from Hollywood, let alone being chased out. This is why Judd Apatow is too spineless to "listen and believe" Dylan Farrow and call for Allen's head. He can conveniently hide behind "there's truth in numbers" assertions because the director of Annie Hall has, as far as I am aware, only been accused of sexual misconduct by daughter Dylan, compared to Cosby's many accusers. So Bill's in the rapist bin for Apatow now that so many angry women have surfaced and Allen remains out of it. Unless the latter changes his party registration to Republican, joins the birther movement against Obama, or criticizes gun control, of course.

What this shows is that your popularity and value to elite communities insulates you from social witch hunts. We see a similar theme with Roman Polanski, a self-admitted pedophile who is protected due to his avant garde cinematic image and liberal, non-contrarian beliefs. Irrespective of whether his victim did not look like a child, she was rightfully deemed a child legally and cognitively.

Cosby denies any wrongdoing, whereas Polanski was very open about the fact that he plied a 13-year-old girl with drugs and alcohol before penetrating her in the anus. The Polanski case was undoubtedly a case of both statutory rape and rape from an inability to consent through intoxication and being drugged. So why do the hearsay claims against Cosby generate so much outrage?

Are we moving even more towards popular justice instead of objective justice?

The answer has actually been "yes" for years, but recent times have evinced a particularly sinister turn. Almost all the time, the basic logic of a Judd Apatow or Lena Dunham is that once the number of accusers reaches a vague definition of critical mass, whether 3, 5 or 50 women yelling "sexual assault," the allegations just have to be true.

On that basis, you don't have to wait for a court decision and can quickly strip people of their reputations, jobs, and income streams via "justified" mob actions. This is, ironically, how the principle of justice works too often in the acclaimed rule of law state of Pakistan, where a slew of blasphemy allegations and convictions have invariably pitted accused minority Christians against the much larger groups of more socially powerful Muslim neighbors accusing them.

To boot, US conceptions of justice have always been undermined by the election of district attorneys. Populist candidates for office can very publicly promise to chase after high-profile potential scalps. The district attorney investigating Cosby even campaigned on dealing with him. There are serious questions about how this accords with fairness and objectivity as it basically enshrines the overt politicization of criminal prosecutions. For all the elitism sometimes associated with judges, at least their secure tenure was designed to protect them from the more volatile opinions and demands of the masses.

Found guilty or not, Cosby's life is ruined

Guilty because the SJWs said so.

Thankfully, the escalation of personal attacks against him have come at the end of Bill Cosby's life. Unfortunately, though, these attacks will shave at least five years off his lifespan and rob him of any real financial means to support his aged care needs. He has lost, other than probably meager royalties and passive income from his investments, millions in anticipated earnings. And much, if not all of what remains will be plowed into his legal defense.

With the watered-down requirements for rape convictions vis-à-vis other crimes, Cosby will be found guilty. Not that this matters, as millions of very judgmental people will ensure he endures all the consequences of being guilty, even if a miracle occurs and he's exonerated by a court. Like a prison, they'll keep him confined to his house as he seeks to avoid the angry mob always waiting outside, both figuratively and literally.

Read More: Why Don't SJWs Call Bill Clinton A Rapist?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Most Important Book Of 2015: SJWs Always Lie

January 6, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As someone who has been the target of SJW attacks for years, and who has helped bring awareness to their totalitarian interpretation of "justice," I began reading Vox Day's SJWs Always Lie with enthusiasm. Not only does it go into depth about what SJW's think and how they behave, it also gives you a strategy for fighting back when they come after you or your organization.

SJW's have so infected Western institutions and corporations that it is inevitable you will come face-to-face with an SJW who hopes to harm you and your livelihood. For that reason, SJWs Always Lie amounts to essential reading for all men. It's the most important book I read in 2015.

> In the universities, in the churches, in the corporations, in the professional associations, in the editorial offices, in the game studios, and just about everywhere else you can imagine, free speech and free thought are under siege by a group of fanatics as self-righteous as Savonarola, as ruthless as Stalin, as ambitious as Napoleon, and as crazy as Caligula. They are the Social Justice Warriors, the SJWs, the self-appointed thought police who have been running amok throughout the West since the dawn of the politically correct era in the 1990s.

Vox methodically breaks down the enemy that we have been fighting for years, including their strengths, weaknesses, and modes of attack. While information on fighting SJWs are available on various sites and forums, this is the first time it has been assembled in one cohesive work.

Either you're with them, or you're an oppressor

> If you don't unquestioningly accept the SJW Narrative, then you not only cannot be oppressed, but you have taken the side of the privileged, and in doing so, have become an oppressor yourself.

Submit or fight back

> And it is because so many institutions have been made to converge to the social justice cause that sooner or later, no matter what you are or what you do, you will be faced with a choice. Either submit to the SJWs and accept their policing of your every word and thought, or stand against them and endure their attacks.

What is the "narrative"?

> The Narrative is the story that the SJWs want to tell. It is the fiction they want you to believe; it is the reality that they want to create through the denial of the problematic reality that happens to exist at the moment. And there is no one definitive Narrative. Instead, there are many Narratives, all of them subject to change at any time, thereby requiring the SJW who subscribes to them to be able to change his own professed beliefs on demand as well.

SJWs are pathological liars

> SJWs Always Lie is a truism because you cannot make social justice arguments without purposefully omitting crucial facts. You cannot, in other words, be a social justice warrior in good faith.
>
> […]
>
> [When called out on a lie], instead of coming clean in one way or another, the SJW will instead double down and attempt to shore up his lies by concocting an even larger framework of deceit and misdirection to support them.

The 3 Immutable Laws Of SJWism

1. They always lie
2. They always double down when confronted with their lies
3. They always project

Vox gives examples of how SJWs perform these three laws in action, most notably with John Scalzi, a cross-dressing science fiction writer who has achieved enough power in the sci-fi writer's sphere to exile non-SJW writers.

What a man who subscribes to social justice looks like

SJW's project their inner fears and insecurities

> The accusations made by SJWs when they attack others usually reflect, on some level, something they know to be true about themselves. An SJW with creepy tendencies will tend to accuse others of sexual harassment. One who is unsettled in his sexual orientation will often accuse others of homophobia. Female SJWs who feel inferior will accuse men of sexism. And since they are all habitual liars, SJWs find it almost impossible to believe that anyone is ever telling the truth.

SJW females are easy to classify. If she's obsessed with rape, she loves to be choked in bed. If she's obsessed with the "wage gap," she's looking for a money grab because she knows she can't compete on the labor market. If she's obsessed with race, she prefers to live in an all-white neighborhood (and likely already does). If she's obsessed with Islamophobia, she hates her submissive boyfriend and wishes a savage would take her to bed without asking for permission every step of the way. And if she spends hours a month hating on me specifically, she wants me to make love to her.

Common SJW behaviors

> [An SJW] is inclined to thought-police, speech-police, and even race-police everyone around him and will try to marginalize, discredit, and destroy anyone who fails to conform to his thought-policing with sufficient obedience and enthusiasm.
>
> [...]
>
> ...they prey on the naïve and the unsuspecting. They prey on the moderates, the > middle-grounders, and the fence-sitters. They prey on people like you: good, decent individuals who try to treat everyone fairly and who can't even imagine having done anything that anyone could possibly find objectionable. Why? Because soft targets are always easier to destroy than hard ones.

If they go after a bigger target like Vox or myself, they need greater organization and support. To challenge me in Canada, they had multiple Facebook groups (public and private), support from mayors and politicians, demonstrations in city squares, and nonstop favorable coverage in the media. And they still lost. The main reason they keep winning is that people don't stand up to them, but now more people are learning how.

The 8 Stages Of An SJW Attack

1. Locate or Create a Violation of the Narrative. Trivial violations are sufficient when a target has some public or organizational influence.

2. Point and Shriek. "The next step is to summon other SJWs by pointing at the target and shrieking about how terrible, outrageous, and completely unacceptable he is."

3. Isolate and Swarm. The target is isolated from his allies while SJW's recruit more foot soldiers in the attack.

4. Reject and Transform. An apology is elicited from the target, which only makes matters worse. "[The apology] is promptly rejected because it is not the action, but the actor, that is the real target."

5. Press for Surrender. They begin going for the kill: getting the person fired from a job or ejection from an organization.

6. Appeal to Amenable Authority. The company or organization is heavily petitioned to punish the target.

7. Show Trial. The target is accused of every wrong imaginable, almost always falsely, and the media becomes an ally in publishing those lies, fed to them directly by the SJWs involved.

8. Victory Parade. "[SJWs] repeatedly display the corpse in a ritual manner, to demoralize anyone else who might otherwise be inclined to challenge their Narrative." If the target has a Wikipedia page, it will be promptly updated with their latest thoughtcrimes.

The easiest way to stop this attack cycle is to gather support from allies and not apologize. The apology plays into their hands and makes the situation worse, which is why Vox implores his readers to never apologize to SJWs.

> Look at Hunt. Look at Eich. Look at everyone in your personal experience who has come under attack by SJWs. Did apologizing do them any good at all? Did apologizing reduce the intensity of the attacks on them, or did the SJWs keep attacking? An apology is not going to relieve the pressure on you, it is only going to increase it.

Moderates are not your friends

> How can you identify a moderate? He is the man who only shoots at his own side and never at the enemy. Moderates merit friendly civility, but no respect. They are often useful, if irritating allies, but do not permit them any input into strategy and tactics or decision-making.
>
> […]
>
> I am an evangelical Christian with hermitic inclinations. We may not agree on many things, but I'd rather have Roosh, an experience-hardened veteran of many a public relations battle, at my back than a company of evangelical Christians who will burst into tears and flee as soon as the first barrage of "racist sexist homophobia" begins to land.

Their biggest weakness is their mental illness(es)

> You should be aware that you have a very important strategic advantage vis-a-vis the SJWs with regards to morale. A large percentage of SJWs are prone to various forms of mental illness; being competitive with regards to their victimhood, it is not at all uncommon for them to openly brag about being on various antidepressants and other psychiatric medications… Because so many of them are miserable and depressed, the strategy of repeatedly hammering SJW morale with dark messages of inevitable failure, doom, and defeat tends to be considerably more effective than it is when aimed at normal, happy, self-confident individuals.

You can't win if you don't fight

> SJWs are winning the cultural war because no one has been fighting them. No one has been resisting them. But now you know why you need to resist them. Now you know why you need to defeat them. And, most importantly, now you know how to do it.

Conclusion

The strength of SJW's Always Lie is that people who have never heard of an SJW will immediately be able to understand and recognize them after reading the book, which is free of jargon or insider terminology. It gets you quickly up to speed on their traits and behaviors so you're not blindsided by an SJW who may seem subtle to the layman, but blindingly obvious to someone like myself. Vox includes word-for-word examples of SJW offensive tactics along with how you should respond.

The biggest flaw of the book is that the examples could be uneven, where some were far more interesting or helpful than the others. I also didn't get too much use out of his explanation comparing dialectic and rhetoric, since it was more based on theory than practicality. Besides that, the book was a fast read and accomplished the task it set out to do of informing readers about the dangers of SJW's while giving actionable advice to fight them. I predict this book will save hundreds of jobs for those who are attacked. My only regret while reading it is that I didn't write it first.

Already with a popular follow-up, Cuckservative: How "Conservatives" Betrayed America, Vox is cementing his position as an influential thought leader whose historical and strategic knowledge is being put to devastating use in the culture war. With men like him on our team, victory is just about certain.

Read More: "SJWs Always Lie" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Congratulations To Feminists For Helping Import Actual Rape Culture To Germany

January 6, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

On New Year's Eve, 1,000 men described as Arab and North African sexually assaulted 90 women in the German city of Cologne. Instead of being random, separate assaults dispersed across a very large city in the country's most populous state, they all occurred in the vicinity of the Central Station, or Hauptbahnhof. Wolfgang Albers, the local police chief, called the incident (more like, dozens of incidents) "a completely new dimension of crime."

Very unsurprisingly, the same feminists supporting ridiculously open borders are now using the pain and suffering of 90 German women to tackle "rape culture" and supposed German racism against foreigners. They have already started marching across the city in "anti-racism" protests that do not mention immigration, a sinister example of macabre opportunism. Whether before or after the entry of some 800,000+ economic migrants in 2015, any event or trend is twisted by feminists and other SJWs to support their narrative.

The German establishment can do nothing but blame others for their own mistakes

German SJWs allowed these rapes to happen with their cartoonish over-tolerance. And now they're using them to try and prove their preposterous allegations of Western "rape culture."

German police are clearly in damage control but under huge political pressure to avoid castigating either new foreign arrivals or established migrant communities. Justice Minister Heiko Maas of the Social Democratic Party (presently in a coalition with Merkel's CDU) has made it his mission to clamp down on any legitimate outcry about Germany's self-destructive open borders and mass immigration policies. Rather than blaming the men responsible, the male migrants his government accepted, he is doing everything he can to downplay the connection. He has even previously demanded Facebook eliminate "abusive content," a poorly coded phrase for any commentary that emphasizes Germany's right to preserve its indigenous culture and the social cohesion of its inhabitants.

Forgetting that his government unleashed the 800,000+ problem which German police are meant to tackle with the same, not more resources, Interior Minister Thomas de Maizière is blaming the police themselves. The comedy of errors that is Angela Merkel's government failed to heed any number of warnings about the destabilization of Germany's social fabric. Cautionary advice from even socialist politicians like Thilo Sarrazin fell on deaf ears. And the nightmare in Cologne, which also suffered numerous robberies and other non-sexual assaults on New Year's Eve, is one of the results.

Is Mayor Henriette Reker "victim-blaming"?

Henriette Reker is so obsessed with accommodating tens of thousands of “refugees” in her city that she’s demanding women take responsibility for not being raped by them.

The answer is an unequivocal “yes.” Because the perpetrators are men of Arab and North African descent, the female Mayor of Cologne, Henriette Reker, is now issuing guidelines for women so they can avoid being raped. Let’s stop here for a moment. She would never issue these guidelines to prevent incidents involving indigenous male Germans allegedly sexually assaulting or raping women. The men would be held responsible, even without the documentary evidence and sheer volume of complaints accompanying the Arab and North African mass sexual assaults in Cologne.

We should also reflect on the fact that when a Toronto policeman, Michael Sanguinetti, called for women not to dress as “sluts,” it resulted in hundreds of feminist protests around the world. Sanguinetti is a Canadian beat cop, not the mayor of one of Germany’s largest and most recognized cities. If you object to Reker’s blaming of the 90 violated women in Cologne, feel free to contact her with some well thought-out correspondence or via Twitter. Reker is getting a pass for her incendiary comments purely because she is a female and a leftist, not to mention that the perpetrators are exclusively minorities and therefore a protected species.

So, feminists of Germany and the world, when will you call out Henriette Reker? Or will the Orwellian Newspeak of enforced cultural tolerance for culturally intolerant migrants continue?

The German governments, along with SJWs, deserve criminal sanctions for allowing these sexual assaults to happen

[image]

With this sort of disorder at the border, how can mass rapes be prevented? This is the question the German national government will not and cannot answer.

The sexual assaults and rapes in Cologne, like all the other crimes that night, were entirely predictable. For over a decade, from Norway to Italy, Spain to Russia, the overrepresentation of Arab, African, and North African migrant men amongst European rapists has been well known. So, too, has the presence of disproportionate numbers of able-bodied men, not women and children, on boats and other convoys of people either crossing the Mediterranean or making their way to Europe through places like Turkey.

Angela Merkel's administration, together with the pro-mass immigration governments of certain German states, have done nothing to credibly increase police funding and resources, maintain systems to register and monitor migrant arrivals, or demand any semblance of integration into German society and conformity with German culture. Minority communities that arrived in Germany from the 1970s have not been properly held to account, let alone the hundreds of thousands of economic migrants arriving in 2015.

And so the slow (or not so slow) demographic death of Germany marches on.

Read More: If Rape Culture Is So Normal, Why Haven't You Ever Witnessed A Rape?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

ROK Hits Primetime With A Segment On The Jimmy Kimmel Live Show (Video)

January 7, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On Tuesday night the Jimmy Kimmel Live show created a segment to ridicule the undeniable influence we've had in steering men away from seeing the social justice reboot of Star Wars.

The segment was in response to David Garrett's article stating that we cost the Star Wars movie at least $4.2 million dollars in sales:

> Fifty-five percent of respondents to a Return of Kings Twitter poll have said that online reporting of the social justice nature of The Force Awakens influenced their decision whether to see the film. Extended across our readership, with over 900,000 users accessing ROK between November 21 and December 21, this amounts to a potential direct impact of $4,219,456.54 (55% x $8.38 x 915,482) on total revenues.

Not only did Jimmy Kimmel misidentify us as a men's rights organization, but the stereotype his writers applied to us has nothing to do with the neomasculine and self-improvement ideas (1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7) that we promote daily. Nonetheless, we appreciate the efforts of Disney, which owns both Star Wars and Jimmy Kimmel, in spreading the word of Return Of Kings. As an anti-fragile entity, any publicity will allow us to reach even more men.

Read Next: Star Wars Lost $4.2 Million Because Of Our Reporting That

Identified It As SJW Propaganda

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Never Date A Woman Who Takes One Of These Prescription Drugs

January 7, 2016 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

One out of every four—that's how many women in America are on some type of antidepressant. How many of the remaining 75 percent should be on meds, but aren't for any number of reasons, is anyone's guess. Judging by how crazy and delusional most women are nowadays, it's probably a pretty sizable percentage. Especially for women under the age of 30.

What's more: a recent study out of Canada reveals that pregnant women taking the most common form of antidepressants—Selective Serotonin Reuptake Inhibitors, or SSRIs—increase their risk of having a child born on the autism spectrum by 87 percent. Eighty-seven percent! To say that is completely ridiculous would be a massive understatement. One would like to think these women feel ashamed of themselves for producing an entire generation of little "Rain Mans," but they're most likely too drugged up feel anything at all—never mind shame.

It’s scary as hell out there, gentlemen. Even scarier is the fact that a lot of the women taking these drugs seem to have their acts together. I mean, we all expect the 250 pound piece of shit with the weird hair, Tumblr account, and see-through earlobes who breathes like a dehydrated Saint Bernard whenever she traverses a Golden Corral parking lot to be on antidepressants—it’s a given. She’s an unlovable loser who has no friends and no prospects. This article won’t focus on women like this at all because nobody wants to fuck them, talk about them, talk to them, look at them, or even think about them.

The sole focus of this article will be on the stealth losers: the women who are generally attractive, successful, and have everything that feminism says should make them happy, yet are miserable to the point that they have to pop pills like a high school kid pops zits just to stay sane.

If you haven’t dated a woman like this yet, then it’s only a matter of time before you stumble upon one. They’re very common, and it’s important as a single man entering 2016 to have—at a minimum—a rudimentary understanding of the crap these women are putting into their systems just to appear normal and make it through the day. But first, let’s start with a few target rich locations for gathering your intelligence.

The Obvious Choice: The Medicine Cabinet

When you're at a woman's place on your first or second visit, excuse yourself to the bathroom and take a look around her medicine cabinet. If you're a pussy and you're saying to yourself, "I would never disrespect someone's privacy like that!" then you need to adjust your attitude. Women aren't in the business of helping you, they're in the business helping themselves.They're not going to give you the answers. Crazy women don't think they're crazy, sluts don't think they're slutty, and losers don't think they're losing—it's on you to figure all of that out on your own and act accordingly.

You're never going to hear a woman say: "I would make a terrible girlfriend and an even worse wife or mother: you should avoid me like a fresh pile of dog shit because I'm going to make your life completely miserable if you get serious with me." Candor is not in a woman's best interests, so you should never expect it.

And this is why you should view snooping around as your privilege. If a woman has worked her way into your life in some capacity, then you owe it to yourself to find out absolutely everything you can about her. That means if the opportunity presents itself, you should always take a peak at her personal effects: phone, laptop, tablet, purse, closet—whatever. Nothing is off limits when it comes to your pursuit of the truth, and a woman's medicine cabinet is no exception. It is your responsibility to find out who she really is as a person, not who she wants you to believe she is. If that means you have to play Sherlock Holmes, then so fucking be it.

Naturally, women aren't going to be very pleased or impressed if they catch you playing amateur DEA agent. "Why don't you trust me you fucking jerk?!" said the pill popping psycho who's hellbent on keeping her issues a secret from you. Because unless her name is "Mom," then her ass isn't to be trusted, that's why. On the rare occasions when I've been busted snooping around, and a woman has asked me why I don't trust her, I've always answered nonchalantly with, “Because you’re not trustworthy,” while sporting a dismissive grin coupled with a zero-fucks-given shoulder shrug.

Women say they value honesty, so in this situation, I give it to them (what I’m really giving them is maximum drama). And surprisingly enough, despite being offended and losing their shit, they’ve never “dumped” for me for my actions. Sure, they huffed and puffed and said a bunch of nonsense, but they eventually calmed down and asked what they can do to earn my trust.

If you handle things properly, and can talk your way out of a jam using humor and playing to a woman’s emotions, then you don’t have anything to worry about. With that said: look in the bitch’s medicine cabinet and search for drugs. To hell with what she thinks of it and never apologize if you get caught.

Nightstands And Dresser Drawers

I’ve found just as many prescription bottles in nightstands as I have in medicine cabinets. A lot of these losers start popping pills before they take their morning piss; it’s the first thing they do when they wake up. So for convenience purposes, a woman might keep her drugs close to her bed. The best time to get down to business and start gathering your intel is when she’s taking a shower or cleaning up after sex.

Purses And Handbags

You’ll need a little bit of time to inspect these items—at least five to ten minutes—so make sure your girl is side-tracked or busy doing something when you go snooping around. A lot of women will keep a “universal” pill bottle in their purses. At first glance, it will appear to be an innocuous over-the-counter container for something like Ibuprofin or Midol. But contained within will be a miniature CVS with everything from heavy hitting pain killers and anti-psychotic meds to birth control pills or vitamins. You should also look for written Rx forms for refills in her wallet or stuffed in the various hidden pockets of her purse.

Glove Compartments And Center Consoles

You would be surprised by how many Ziploc baggies full of pills women keep hidden in their cars. Most women are scatter-brained (especially druggies), and as a consequence they will keep a small supply of meds stashed away in their cars as a back-up just in case they forget to take them at home.

If you're out and about with a woman while she's running some errands, simply wait in her car while she heads into a store, and then begin your investigation. Since these medications won't be labeled in most cases, you'll need to become familiar with what they look like.

Without further delay, here are ten common drugs women take that should be a huge red flag when it comes to dating them…

1. Cymbalta (Duloxetine)

Cymbalta was the number one prescribed antidepressant in 2014, and continues to be one of the most prescribed in America. It is used to treat depression, anxiety, and the biggest bullshit medical condition in history—fibromyalgia.

The pill itself is easy enough to spot, with the name "Lilly" prominently displayed in white lettering on a blue background. This name was most likely chosen to pay homage to the Hebrew demoness "Lilith"; which translated into English means "night hag," or "monster of the night," and is therefore a perfect description for the type of wacko bitch who ends up taking Cymbalta.

2. Lexapro (Escitalopram)

Out of all the antidepressants I've personally seen women take, Lexapro has been the most common. It is used to treat general anxiety and depression. The pill itself is small and rather unassuming in appearance: one side is marked with the letters "FL," while the other contains the dosage information in milligrams.

I don't know what "FL" means, but if I had to guess, I would say it most likely stands for "Fucked-up Life," because that's exactly the kind of life every woman taking Lexapro has. (In all seriousness, "FL stands for Forest Laboratories—the makers of Lexapro)

3. Prozac (Fluoxetine)

Another very popular choice among the batshit crazy ho-bags of America is Prozac. It is used to treat a myriad of afflictions ranging from depression and obsessive compulsive disorder (OCD), to bulimia and anorexia. The pills are very easy to spot: they are green and white with “Prozac” prominently displayed along with the corresponding milligram dosage (typically 20mg).

4. Xanax (Alprazolam)

If a drug features the letter “X” multiple times, then you know it’s some pretty potent shit. Xanax is a sedative that is used to treat panic attacks and other anxiety related issues. Washing down “Zannies” with a nice tall glass of cheap pinot grigio is one of the modern American woman’s favorite pastimes, so keep your eyes peeled for the signature “Xanax bar” while conducting your snooping missions.

The pills, as you can see in the above photo, typically come in 1/4 sections that can be split-off if necessary, hence the term “bar.” In most cases, the pills are white with “Xanax” displayed on one side, and the dosage on the other. They are very distinctive and easy to identify.

5. Paxil (Paroxetine)

Paxil is another very common SSRI that is used to treat depression, anxiety, and OCD. The pills themselves are very easy to recognize: they are color coded by their milligram content, thus making it easy to judge just how crazy the bitch is at a glance, which is convenient. “Paxil” is also clearly marked on the tablet.

6. Zoloft (Sertraline)

A fan favorite amongst the mentally ill crowd, Zoloft is designed to treat OCD, PTSD, and every man's favorite—Premenstrual Dysphoric Disorder (PMDD). For the unfamiliar, PMDD is PMS on steroids. If you've ever dated a woman who turns into an insufferable asshole when she's on her period, then just wait until you come across one with this PMDD nonsense. Per WebMD, here's the list of things you get to look forward to when you encounter such a woman:

- Mood swings
- Depressed mood or feelings of hopelessness
- Marked anger, increased interpersonal conflicts
- Tension and anxiety
- Irritability
- Decreased interest in usual activities
- Difficulty concentrating
- Fatigue
- Change in appetite
- Feeling out of control or overwhelmed
- Sleep problems
- Physical problems, such as bloating, breast tenderness, swelling, headaches, joint or muscle pain.
- Being a cunt

That's sounds like lot of bullshit to put up with just for some pussy, doesn't it? I thought so, too. So whenever you see that little sky blue, light green, or off-white colored pill with "Zoloft" displayed on it—run.

7. Effexor XR (Venlafaxine)

Effexor, as opposed to SSRI medications like Lexapro or Paxil, is in the Serotonin-norepinephrine Reuptake Inhibitor (SNRI) family (Cymbalta is in this group as well). This means that instead of affecting only the serotonin receptors like a typical SSRI, it targets the norepinephrine receptors as well. In other words, the women who take it are losers.

It's commonly prescribed to treat major depression, panic attacks, and general anxiety issues when typical SSRIs aren't enough to get the job done. The capsules themselves are easy to recognize—the lower dosage pills (75mg) are white with red lettering, while the higher dosage ones (150mg) are red with white lettering. A large "W" along with "Effexor" are clearly marked on each capsule as well.

8. Abilify (Aripiprazole)

This one is a heavy hitter: it is used to treat bi-polar disorder, schizophrenia, and major clinical depression. Additionally, in an attempt to reign in the craziest of bitches, Abilify is typically prescribed in conjunction with other SSRIs and SNRIs to create the proverbial antidepressant "chemical cocktail." So if you spot Abilify tablets during your investigative work, then be on the lookout for the other drugs on this list as well. Simply put: think of Abilify as Robin—because Batman probably won't be too far away.

The pills themselves can be a bit tricky to identify, though. Much like the numerous cocks the average Abilify user has taken, the pills come in a variety of colors, shapes, and sizes. But there is a saving grace: the distinctive "00–" engraved into the pills. Make Ian Fleming proud: think of James Bond when you're performing your clandestine drug hunts as a helpful reminder.

9. Celexa (Citalopram Hydrobromide)

Most likely named after a syphilitic stripper who took part in the drug's initial trial phases, Celexa is an antidepressant that is used to treat major depressive episodes and panic disorders. The pills are very basic looking, and blend in easily with other medications, so make sure to keep an eye out for letters "FP" when conducting your searches.

As a little reminder, think of "FP" as standing for "Fucking Police," because that's exactly who will be showing up on your doorstep if your Celexa-popping psycho girlfriend gets pissed-off at you for some reason.

10. Lithane, Lithobid, or Eskalith (Lithium Carbonate)

Last, but certainly not least, is our good old buddy Lithium. Keeping bi-polar skanks somewhat tolerable since 1948, Lithium works by decreasing norepinephrine release and increasing serotonin synthesis, and is often prescribed when other antidepressants fail to yield positive results. Lithium users and male feminists talking to women they find attractive can expect the same common side effects: increased urination, shakiness of the hands, and increased thirst.

Out of all the drugs listed here, Lithium is the most difficult to identify. The pills may or may not be labeled, and can come in tablet, capsule, or caplet form. If you have difficulty figuring out what a particular pill is being used to treat based off web searches, then steal one and take it down to your local pharmacy. Show the pill to the pharmacist and say: "I found this in my 'daughter's' (niece's, nephew's, cousin's–whatever) room and I have no idea what it is. I know she isn't on any prescribed medications, and I'm worried about what she is putting into her body. Can you help me out?" He or she should be able to give you an answer.

Exit Strategy

These pill popping broads are not to be taken seriously in any way, shape, or form—they're losers. And what do losers do? They fucking lose, and they'll bring your ass along for the ride if you let them. Just because these women get their drugs from a pharmacist, and not some low-life drug dealer working a street corner, doesn't mean their issues have legitimacy.

Doctors write out bullshit antidepressant scripts to whiny women every single day, so don't get suckered in by a woman's sob stories about her "mental issues" or her oh-so difficult life. Women create their own problems due to their inherent impetuous nature, their severely lacking logical reasoning skills, their inability to understand cause and effect, and their refusal to accept responsibility for their actions—they bring this shit on themselves. They are not to be pitied, they are to be avoided.

Granted, avoiding these basket cases can be difficult since the sex is usually phenomenal—nothing fucks better than crazy, after all. But women have the bad habit of turning their problems into your problems, and if you're with a woman who looks to drugs whenever the going gets tough, then it will only be a matter of time before you're saddled with a shit-ton of somebody else's problems. That's no way to live. Just remember that your future well-being is more important than busting a good nut, and pull the rip cord at the first sign of trouble.

In Closing

We've been told that women have never been better; that they are the strongest and most empowered in human history. We've been told that they can "do it all," while they've been told that they can "have it all." We've been told that we have the best women the world has ever produced; that we're surrounded by a group of pipe-swinging bad-ass bitches who make tons of money, raise great children, and maintain tip-top homes.

Everyday, the media reminds us of these "superwomen," and they'll remind us of it again tomorrow. We're told that these almighty goddesses should be celebrated, and that we should feel privileged to share the earth them.

But what did we get in reality? Well, sadly, what we got is what we have: a bunch of drugged up flunkies who can't even organize a healthy morning shit, never mind organize their own lives or the lives of anyone else. We are a generation of men that has been completely misled, ripped off, and screwed over—and there are no refunds. All we can do is keep trudging through the wasteland, and hope for the best.

It’s only going to get worse, so stay safe out there, gentlemen.

Read More: Why You Should Avoid Women Who Complain About Their Health

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

Is The Anonymous Hacker Collective Promoting Dangerous Cyber Fascism?

January 7, 2016 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

Anonymous again finds themselves in news headlines. This time they are targeting none other than The Donald. This internet "hacktivist" group has known to target police and supposed members of the KKK; whom today is anyone who dares to dissent anything that does not fit the grand statist, leftist, or Marxist narrative.

[image]
Anonymous is usually present at every statist or leftist protest.

According to Wikipedia, the group Anonymous:

> ...has no strictly defined philosophy, and internal dissent is a regular feature of the group. A website associated with the group describes it as "an Internet gathering" with "a very loose and decentralized command structure that operates on ideas rather than directives

However, the group's actions totally contradict the above statement. Anonymous has an extremely defined philosophy and group mentality, especially in recent years that completely "operates on directives." They were a clear presence at Occupy Wall Street. They also cyber attacked many police stations before due process was completed on the cases.

The group functions on the whims of the mass media and large government. One would go as far as to speculate that large government and media might fund Anonymous. Though a minor threat, the group also deems who is allowed to have the "right" ideas and the "wrong" ideas, as in the most recent incident with Trump illustrates.

Anonymous deems which individuals are allotted free speech and who are not allowed to exercise free speech. They serve their own brand of justice with force. They decide who is guilty of “incorrect thought.” The group has their own revision of the US constitution, to replace the “outdated” US Constitution. This new constitution is “more in line with modern times.”

If you did not know by now, the new constitution for “modern times” is the Communist Manifesto. Grown men in masks somehow feel that they know far better about political philosophy then the founding fathers, and are acting as cyber henchmen for the leftist and Marxist narrative. They are what you could call a totalitarian internet organization or “cyber totalitarians.”

This organization recently has become even more politically ideological in their hacking. At first, Anonymous was far more loosely based and relied on pranks (much like the merry pranksters of the 60s). Now, as the left has risen among nerds and the herds, they base their targets along strict political ideologies. They back the large federal government and big media in nearly all decisions of who are the “enemies of the state.”

They bully, threaten, and cause cyber injury to anyone who does not embrace their “perfect” ideology. This is the equivalent of using physical harm toward someone they may disagree with. Though they claim to support freedom of speech and are “pro-democracy,” their activities illustrate otherwise. If you do not agree with them, they will attack. They are the thought police and, historically speaking, represent the modern day cyber descendants of KGB men and SS officers.

In light of many Anonymous attacks, individuals speaking out and dissenting on issues may apply self-censorship in fear they may be targets of these cyber persecutions (bank accounts hacked, personal data manipulated, etc.). This limits free thought and free speech out of fear. These “hacktivists” are nothing more than the thought police, dictating what may or may not be discussed or investigated in our modern world.

The irony here is that they claim their fascist actions as an attack against fascism. Let us take for instance their recent attack on Donald Trump. Regardless of whether you agree with Trump’s speech on Muslims, he has the right to speak under our First Amendment and individuals also have the right to support him under our system of democracy (I do not need to debate his large base of support).

However, fascist Anonymous is causing cyber harm to men that exercised their first amendment rights and garnered democratic support. This is because Anonymous knows more than you at what you should think and do. They know more than you on what should be discussed. They know because they are the only ones with the “right” ideas. You have been warned of what to think.

Orwell made a great statement about such “fascism”:

> …almost any English person would accept ‘bully’ as a synonym for ‘Fascist’. That is about as near to a definition as this much-abused word has come.

In the eyes of Anonymous, individuals are not protected by freedom of speech under the constitution nor laws, but should rather be dictated and pressured by cyber violence and an unruly mob into what they deem as “correct thought”. In the end, they are nothing more than the bullies that they claim to fight against.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Jon Bergeron

Jon is a part time misanthrope, full time American. Jon loathes modern academia, art, culture, literature, politics, television, and everything on god's green earth that has been inundated with boring, predictable, impotent, vapid Cultural Marxist horseshit which, mind you, is totally void of a single individual thought. Jon just realized he is a full time misanthrope. Anyways, Jon prays for this to change one day and something new to come along. Until then, Jon remains pessimistic with a loaded .357 next to his bed. Jon can be reached at

10 Reasons Why You Must Study Body Language

January 7, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

In this article, I will use a broad definition of body language that includes, among other things, clothes and the messages they send, posture, walk, facial expression, eye contact and movement, voice tone, eloquence, handshake, facial hair, hair, body modifications, etc.

My personal study of body language started about five years ago with the excellent The Definitive Book Of Body Language by Allan and Barbara Pease, two Australian body language specialists. It was an eye opener and I have studied the subject since then. It has radically changed my life and brought me more success in many different fields.

> Man is by nature a social animal
>
> Aristotle

We are social animals but we are nonetheless animals. Man always analyses the impact of someone on himself and on society. But because he is an animal like any other, he reacts mainly through visual stimuli. It can not be repressed.

It is a great asset for one to be able to guess what kind of human their interlocutor is before any word has been pronounced. It is a talent that must be cultivated and has intangible value. We give clues and signals by our appearance. One is what he is through his actions and looks.

More than ever, we are our faces. We are what we look like. Here is how this science will help you:

1. You can be more successful with women

Let’s start with the big guns. You will have the ability to scan the women around you before they open their mouth. Is she looking for a one night stand? Can you sleep with her fast? How does she react to your hand brushing hers?

You will also learn more about how to display a confident and dominant body posture that will create interest and attraction. Doesn’t matter what you say, as long as the attitude is dominant and confident. I once slept with a girl after introducing myself as a squirrel fight promoter and weasel merchant.

You will feel that you can score if you escalate even if there is no verbal confirmation. You will get laid more and have more successful relationships with women. Mental health, sexual availability, sluttiness, level of attraction… you will know hundreds of things by observing and analyzing what you see before and during the interaction.

You will skim faster fruitless prospects, charge on when the lights are green, read the slut signs and hopefully avoid the kind of mentally ill women that would try to kill you in your sleep.

2. You can avoid potential danger

You can read the aggressiveness in someone's pace or if they get in position to strike you. By displaying a strong posture, athletic looks, and a confident gaze, the potential attacker or conman would think twice about choosing you as a target and will probably prefer an easier prey.

You could notice the eyes of the teenager at the end of the train carriage that has been looking twice at your bag on the floor, avoiding your glance when you catch him doing it. Or you could see a quarrel broiling from far by the body postures of the ones involved and steer clear of it. You will be sharper at seeing what people try to conceal and their hidden intentions.

3. You can know the men you deal with Political opinions, occupation, taste in entertainment, self-discipline, sexual orientation, level of fitness, religious beliefs, past injuries, self-confidence, success with the opposite sex, relationships with others, social background, hierarchy in the group. People send us messages to read 24/7 without saying a word.

Men are no exception. Analyze a man's physical shape, his outfit, his haircut, his gaze.

Observe the way he sits, walks, smiles, talks and looks at someone. Then confirm your first impression by engaging verbally with him and confirm your theory. Even if your analysis is accurate, you can not always be right.

Can he be trusted? Is he lying to me about his accomplishments or is he genuine? Should I sign up for a gym if the instructor is fat and has poor posture? I do not think so. You will know who you choose to associate with and who are the trouble makers and the empty suits.

4. You can improve your business skills

You will know faster who is embellishing the figures, boasting, or shows true drive in the way their body behaves. You can know how to follow your progress during an interview or a sales pitch, adjust your attitude to what is visibly working and backtrack if necessary. You will appear calm and in control even if the situation is stressful. Smirk, use a calm and low voice tone, relax your shoulders, display confidence. This is what makes the difference.

Learning these principles will help you become a better negotiator as you will get better prices and protect your money from crooks when you feel the scam. You could use it to haggle like a champion, get more contacts, and gauge people’s reactions better.

5. You can become a leader

You can convince a group with your relaxed attitude and your eloquence. They will see you as a natural ruler. “Join me and my cause!”, cries the potential leader from the stage.

With the same arguments, who will seduce the crowd? Someone crouched on himself, sweating and looking at the floor or someone standing with a composed, strong posture and a burning gaze, directly looking in the eyes of the mob?

6. You can be healthier

You will improve your well-being and your general happiness by seeing the positive changes it brings you. Standing straight instead of having a slouched posture will protect your spine in addition to making you look taller.

You will breathe easier by relaxing your shoulders and you will protect your joints and bones by walking properly. Muscle tension will disappear, your moves will be more fluid and you will simply feel better.

It will also improve the way you can physically help people. You will be able to see when they are in pain, if they limp, or if a child is not sitting properly. You could detect wounds and ailments and be able to assist your common man quicker.

7. You can analyze the media better

You will process information in a better manner and interpret it with more scrutiny. Lying leaders, new faces that are or not trustworthy, reporters that say what they have been told to, even if they do not believe a word of it.

You will be able to see who is born to be a leader and who will be forever the victim that was bullied at school and will take his revenge on the big meanies once he is in power. If he has his hands in his pockets, his arms crossed, blinks too much, adopts a defensive position in his seat or hugs the walls, it is not a good start. Wait till he starts speaking.

Can you hear the little farts of fear yet?

Textbook dominant body language

Your sharp eye will make you a better citizen and will help you take the right decision when the moment comes.

8. You can kill it at sports

It will make you a better sportsman and will improve your results in many leisure activities. You may be able to intercept the shot of the striker because he betrayed his intentions by his eye movement and the unconscious orientation of his body. You could also know where the ball carrier wants to run and tackle him more efficiently.

Martial arts champions would not be were they are if they could not read the moves of their opponent. You too could know when you have sown doubt in your opponent's brain, which shot hit him hard and shook his confidence. If you perceive weakness in his eyes, it will give you an undeniable psychological advantage.

Games like poker rely heavily on these ideas. Beginners about to take a huge risk twitch, breathe faster, and have trouble staying still. Pros know how to control their nerves and keep the famous “poker face,” which is the ability to keep one’s body language neutral.

9. You can learn a new, useful hobby

It is, in many aspects, a language that you learn to read and speak. But like every language, you can improve or you can also become rusty. It demands constant practice, mental and physical. The written material available on the Internet is gigantic but nothing beats physical training.

Body language study can be turned into a competition with your friends by placing bets on what they guess about the people in the crowd. With girls, you can then approach them and ask to know the truth. It is a great opener.

And most importantly, it is fun.

10. You will be smarter overseas

You will know who is who, having done a bit of research on the demographics of the country you are in. You will recognize ethnic features and sensibilities, giving you the ability to address your interlocutors in a better way.

It will allow you to tilt your game and behavior in accordance with the social background and culture of the locals, reducing the “clueless gringo” factor.

You can then speak, even poorly, in their own language. With the right attitude, people would be more forgiving and it will dramatically improve the first impression that they will have of you.

Body language is universal and everyone understands it. You cannot speak a word of Hungarian? No worries. Wave at Zsófia, do the universal “follow me” gesture, take her hand and you are sorted, my boy.

Conclusion

You can learn more about it everywhere. Watch Don Draper or Hank Moody at work. Read some of the countless volumes that have been written on the matter. Some Youtube channels focus specifically on body language.

Many writers on Return of Kings extensively wrote on the subject, so did members of the RooshVForum that shared priceless information. Swooptheworld.com and Chateau Heartiste are also goldmines of tips, field research, and effective methods.

Time to hit the books and the streets. Good hunt and good luck, gentlemen.

Read more: 15 Language Learning Tips For Self-Study

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Germany Proves That “Rape Culture” Is Merely A Political Weapon Against Western Men

January 8, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For several years the liberal establishment has been pointing out that “rape culture” has made the West as dangerous for women as an African slum. We’ve been told that native-born men, because they weren’t taught how not to rape, have been raping with impunity in universities, clubs, bars, and on dates. So much raping has been going on that by now you’ve certainly stumbled on dozens of rapes while they were in progress. Even I’ve been called a “rape teacher” and “rape instructor” more times than I can count, all because I give men tools for having consensual sex in the most efficient (and legal) way possible.

This week, news broke of a Syrian refugee rape mob assaulting dozens of women in Cologne, Germany:

> On New Year’s Eve, 1,000 men described as Arab and North African sexually assaulted 90 women in the German city of Cologne. Instead of being random, separate assaults dispersed across a very large city in the country’s most populous state, they all occurred in the vicinity of the Central Station, or Hauptbahnhof. Wolfgang Albers, the local police chief, called the incident (more like, dozens of incidents) “a completely new dimension of crime.”

I expected the establishment to immediately start programs or make posters that teach Syrian men how not to sexually assault German women. Instead, they have instructed women how to take responsibility for their safety, an action that they’ve been insisting for years is the same as “blaming the victim.” Because of this blatant double standard, we can conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that “rape culture” is nothing more than a political weapon to harm and marginalize Western men. It has nothing to do with keeping women safe and everything to do with emasculating Western men and removing their due process when it comes to sexual encounters.

Immigrants and refugees can quite literally roam the streets and grab whichever German woman they want without getting criticized by politicians while a woman who falsely claimed to have been raped in a dorm room by a German man (ironically enough) gets invited by an American Congressman to the State Of The Union address. Welcome to insanity.

Full government honors for a girl who wasn’t even raped

The double standard is so ridiculous that German liberals are using my talking points

One year ago, I posted a thought experiment about how if we made rape legal, women would have no choice but to keep themselves safe and take the proper actions to minimize the chances they will be raped. Here is the take-home message from that article:

> If a woman is indeed a child then maybe we really need to keep promoting “rape culture” as a way to keep them safe, but if they are actual adults, which is often claimed, then we can start treating them like adults by allowing them to take responsibility for the things that happen to them which are easily preventable with barely a strain of cognitive thought, awareness, and self control.

The article went viral and I was roundly criticized by the media and their feminist foot soldiers of being a monster and evil person who wants women to be violently ravaged. Because of it, I was accosted by a mob in Montreal that repeatedly called me a "rapist," even though I have never been accused of rape.

It's important to note that my work has also never been linked to a single sexual assault conviction out of the 100,000+ men who read my work. Therefore not a single rape has ever been attributed to me or my writing, which statistically must be below the average, and yet because I demand women account for their own personal safety while simultaneously teaching men game tools that take advantage of the sexual dystopia that feminists helped create, I'm attacked alongside my readers.

Cologne has dealt a body slam to the narrative

Based on the unrelenting criticisms we've received in the manosphere, you would think that the Western establishment is singularly focused on reducing harm to women by changing the behavior of men. Of course you would be wrong. On New Year's Eve in Germany, mobs of refugees went around molesting, grabbing, and in some cases outright raping German women. Instead of outrage directed at these men for their crimes, many of which had multiple witnesses, the German authorities have told women that they need to protect themselves. Useful idiots in the media said we shouldn't be so racist to the refugees. The rapists have been given a pass because the assailants are a protected class in the perverse multicultural narrative.

Instead of re-consider their open-borders policy from the bowels of the Middle East, German politicians told women that they should defend themselves more properly and have a "code of conduct" to not get raped.

> Speaking on live television this afternoon, [Cologne] mayor Henriette Reker, who was near-fatally stabbed in the run up to October elections by an anti mass migration campaigner, said in future women would have to be better prepared in > her city to deal with migrants. She remarked: “The women and young girls have to be more protected in the future so these things don’t happen again.

>
> “This means, they should go out and have fun, but they need to be better prepared, especially with the Cologne carnival coming up. For this, we will publish online guidelines that these young women can read through to prepare themselves”. [Source]

Even more absurd, the Cologne mayor advised German women to remain at an “arm’s length” from strangers. Refugees get exempted for their behavior and women are told to accommodate their predation, while American, British, Canadian, Australian, and European men are assumed to be born rapists who must be taught how not to rape, even when they’ve never been accused of a crime or any prior act of wrongdoing. What happened to stopping rape culture? What happened to “toxic masculinity”? What happened to safe spaces? All gone in the same amount of time it takes for a New Year’s Eve firework to explode in the German atmosphere.

The scam of “rape culture”

What’s happening in Germany reveals that there never was a rape culture in the West, and there never was concern for women’s safety, but that promoting it was but one means to allow the establishment to expedite their subversion of Western societies, to weaken and demoralize the men, to sterilize the women with “empowered” careers, abortions, and casual sex, and to break up the family unit and make everyone dependent on corporations and the welfare state instead of each other.

Today, I am a vindicated man. I’m vindicated because the establishment of an entire country has exposed the lie which I’ve been pointing out for years. This week they were forced to contradict their own narrative, one that we’ve long been claiming is obviously false, by enabling, promoting, and protecting a genuine rape culture of Middle Eastern refugees who are invited, fed, and sheltered by the state. Are you feeling enriched yet?

Now that the whole world sees the double standard through which “rape culture” is being applied, only one of two outcomes can happen. The first is that the establishment completely drops the rape culture narrative, stops treating Western men like criminals who need to be taught how not to rape women, scales back the anti-male "affirmative consent" laws, and kicks out the refugees that are turning European cities into third-world hellholes.

The second outcome is that they continue to selectively use the rape culture weapon against Western men while giving refugees a pass, a mammoth contradiction that will infuriate the citizenry and accelerate the collapse of the multicultural narrative and those who use it to hold power. Millions will move over to nationalism, the only antidote that can put a stop to the sociopathic liberals currently in power. I think we all know which road we're about to go down.

Read Next: Congratulations To Feminists For Helping Import Actual Rape Culture To Germany

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Are You Ready To Live In A Society That Pressures Toddlers To Become Transgender?

January 8, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

I sometimes find it difficult to accept the rapid changes our society has seen. My grandparents were born shortly after the First World War, when Western culture began its decline. And I grew up watching old reruns of Leave it to Beaver and The Brady Bunch, where mothers played a much more traditional feminine role, only to enter the dating world, where aggressive, masculine butch women shunned all of their femininity and presented me with their rude, sarcastic, overweight, abrasive selves.

Yet perhaps the most rapid change of all has been in the realm of sex and gender. Gender is a word created by Dr. John Money only a few short decades ago, and the idea of gender being an arbitrary and capricious element of our humanity, like our hair color or personal style, was rapidly introduced. While there are still members of society alive that remember concentration camps, segregation, and other relics of the past, I honestly don't know how they can process the light speed changes in the realm of sexuality.

It's hard to believe that after all we've seen, society still has the ability to shock and mortify. This happened most recently to me when a story came on my radio about a toddler tranny. (Oh, the politically correct word is transitioning or transgender, which sounds less twisted and perverse). I could barely continue driving my car, questioning whether I was dreaming or not.

Even writing this article, a part of me wants to believe these are fictional stories, meant to indoctrinate, enrage, or distract the public. But sadly, I believe them to be real. Let's examine one such case.

3 Year Old Jack Transitions To Jackie

A Georgia couple who recently moved to California with their two children decided that the youngest, Jack, wasn't really happy being a boy, and really should be a girl. How old was Jack when they made this decision? Three years old. I have cousins approaching three, and they can barely talk. When they do talk, they often don't make sense. I've never heard them express any sort of independent thought, and they are easily distracted.

Their thoughts range from “let’s play with my action figure over here” to “lets go color or draw something over here” to “lets go watch TV in here.” They essentially have no awareness of themselves, or what we call consciousness.

Curiosity does not equal a desire to be sexually mutilated

They certainly don’t have any sort of sexuality, and whatever sexual organs they have are not yet developed. They are, in a way, asexual. They can’t even understand what the difference is between a male and female. Sure, they know what daddy looks like, and mommy looks like something different, but there’s no understanding of sexual correlation.

Nothing sexual is going on here, feminist perverts!

You can see this from the way young children will play with each other. Boys will play with girls just as freely as with other boys–there's no realization of a difference, primarily because the differences haven't yet developed. A baby boy has no significantly higher upper body strength, deeper voice, or logically developed mind than a baby girl.

The idea of ascribing sex to them at such a sickeningly young age is perverse enough. What's sicker is to decide for them that a mistake was made, and instead of becoming a man, they should become a woman or vice versa.

In the past, all baby boys wore dresses.

Jack's mom allowed Jack to wear his older sister's dresses, but a three-year-old has no concept of what a dress is, and there is nothing inherently sexual about a dress—this is all societally contrived. The Scottish wear skirts and this doesn't mean they want their penis lopped off. Jack also would wear pink boots (one would assume his parents bought him pink boots, encouraging this behavior, and again, there is nothing inherently feminine about a color–society has simply decided that baby boy = blue and baby girl = pink).

One day, when Jack's mom was driving his older sister to Kindergarten, his mother decided he "looked really sad" and had > this weight that looked like it weighed more than she (sic) did, something she (sic) had to say and I didn't know what that was. So I asked "Jack, are you sad that you're not going to school today? And Jack was really quiet and put her (sic) head down and said "No, I'm sad because I'm a boy."

You want to drive? Sure! Why not! You're a fully developed, rational human being with logic and reason.

The mom continued, "I thought a little bit longer and I said, 'Well, are you happy being you?' And that made Jack smile," she says. "And I felt like for that moment, that was all that really mattered. That was 'The Day.'"

So, there you go. If you hand a boy a doll, and instead of throwing it down, he analyzes or plays with it, and he agrees that he is "happy being himself," then that is a clear sign that his penis must be immediately cauterized, he should be shot up with hormones, dressed and treated a certain way, and his name changed.

As anyone who has been around toddlers knows, they are silly, easily distracted or amused, illogical, and lack self awareness. Yet, this mother treats her son like he is a wise prophet trapped in a child's body, mysteriously issuing her secretive coded messages about how he wants her to change him.

The mom drove Jack to a drugstore, bought him elastic hair bands, and put Jack's hair in a ponytail. The mom took this as a clear sign:

> I've never seen such a happy child. To go from maybe an hour before this, this child who looks so sad, to that, I felt like I'd done something right by her (sic).

The mom soon decided Jack should be called Jackie, and from that moment on, referred to him as a her. The older sister, Chloe, doesn't understand this, and will still sometimes refer to her brother as "Jack" "he" and "brother."

I don't have any memories of age three or earlier, and I'd guess chances are fairly high, that much like the story of David Reimer, Jack won't know or remember that he was a boy, and if he ever finds out will be incredibly angry and confused. If the David Reimer story isn't a warning about what can happen when doctors alter the sex of children (hint: both twins committed suicide after struggling with depression, drug abuse, and crime), I don't know what is.

This is a clear case of child abuse, and mental illness by the parents.

The double standard–this is completely normal, while the opposite is a birth defect

When they are infants and toddlers, it is normal for children of both sexes to be interested in and learn about everything they come across. The way they learn the difference between a masculine G I Joe and a feminine My Little Pony is by examining and playing with each.

The tranny movement is mental illness, as Johns Hopkins lead psychologist Paul McHugh stated (since Johns Hopkins has closed Dr. Money's gender clinic). It is a pure attack on men and masculinity. Notice how these stories are always about baby boys, and the solution is to chop off their penis and treat them as women. If a girl wants to pick up an action figure or a gun, she is "empowered." But if a boy is curious about a Barbie or the color pink, he is a disfigured and defective, and must be corrected by hormone treatment and surgery.

A World Of Regret

Author and anti-sex change activist Walt Heyer

Walt Heyer, who was treated as a girl by his parents, had sex surgery, and later returned to identifying as a man, has documented many cases of regret, suicide, reverse sex change operations, and stories about children and gender reassignment at his site Sexchangeregret. Recent studies have shown that having sex surgery increases your risk of suicide by 20 TIMES. Furthermore, even if one did take children at their word, pretending that they are rational, developed adults, studies from Vanderbilt University and London's Portman Clinic indicate that over time, children who expressed transgender feelings, "spontaneously lost those feelings 70% to 80% of the time."

This is all-out war on men and masculinity. As mass sexual mutiliation of most boys occurs through hospital circumcision, men have been targeted since birth to be brought down in order to raise up other groups. Childhood sexual reassignment is child abuse and must be stopped. If not, we are in for a sick, dark future.

Listen to the original radio story here.

Read More: A Modern Day Horror Story On The Origin Of The Transgender Movement

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Future Leaders Of America Call For Abolishing Freedom Of Speech And The Press

January 8, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The very convincing US satirist Ami Horowitz has gotten dozens of Yale University students to support his petition to stop free speech by repealing the First Amendment of the US Constitution. Horowitz has a history of outing some very sad college hypocrisies, such as when students at UC Berkeley, obsessed with rooting out the real evils of mansplaining and manspreading, reacted indifferently to him waving an ISIS flag on campus. They resorted to attacking him for waving an Israeli flag that same day.

His latest experiment portends very badly for college campuses already clamping down on free speech, even with the current constitutional protections of the First Amendment. Focused on their pet projects of avoiding microaggressions and erecting an ideological missile defense shield of trigger warnings, the Yale students signing the petition seemed to forget that the First Amendment also protects both freedom of religion and the press.

For political rookies, this includes the ability of Jezebel and Feministing to publish articles, however retrograde, and the safety of Muslims in practicing their religion. No matter. I'm sure the Yale crowd had the best of intentions.

Is anyone sounding the alarm bells yet?

Horowitz was ignored at UC Berkeley when he waved an ISIS flag and accosted when he waved an Israeli one.

I'm happy to be corrected (more than happy), but I see Hillary Clinton winning the 2016 and probably 2020 elections. If she serves two terms, this means that from 1988 to 2024, 28 out of 36 years will have seen an American President who went to Yale for at least part of their education. The other eight years will have witnessed a President (Obama) whose university education culminated in him going to Harvard, a school about as different to Yale as Heineken is to Becks.

The political environment in which George W. Bush, Bill Clinton, Hillary Clinton, and George H. W. Bush (the latter in particular) went to Yale was nowhere close to as radical as it is today. So if the distant past can produce a woeful Hillary Clinton, what ideological filth will classes graduating in the 2010s spawn?

Some of my previous work has exposed you to the student charges now trying to overthrow their ideological parents and grandparents, such as the Harvard activists labeling liberal academics like Alan Dershowitz as rape apologists. Why? The professors had the gall to suggest that disciplinary procedures for "sexual assault" should resemble courts more than 1930s Stalinist show trials when it comes to evidentiary standards and due process. This reverse filial cannibalism is showing no signs of abating, to the utter delight of SJWs.

In trying to end free speech protections, what SJWs really have in mind is the criminalization of any speech which does not accord with their viewpoints. So they get rid of the First Amendment (pretend for a moment it happens). What next? Well, criticism of Black Lives Matter, even their most violent antics, becomes criminal hate speech.

So, too, does pointing out the continent-sized holes in theories of male "privilege" and the "oppression" of females (under the umbrella of a new offense called "reinforcing the patriarchy"). Using the comments section below, feel free to share your own predictions about what new thoughtcrimes would emerge when SJWs soil the Constitution.

A wider case of mass censorship

Jack Dorsey says that Twitter is about free speech, yet meets BLM "leaders" at the same time he oversees a clampdown on accounts disseminating unfavored views.

Note the paucity of mainstream outlets which covered this anti-free speech debacle at Yale. As far as I can tell, CNN did not, nor did USA Today, The New York Times, or The Washington Post. Yet so many mainstream journalists and commentators covered the farce at Mizzou, for example, usually giving the protesters laudatory coverage, including the praise showered on car hit-hoaxer and privileged rich kid Jonathan Butler.

The issue with media bias is arguably much more about the refusal to cover certain stories, rather than the admittedly very extensive partisanship found in pieces actually written. Twitter has already committed itself to making its platform "safe," exemplified in the utter obsequiousness of founder Jack Dorsey when he met the "leaders" of the Black Lives Matter scam and stuck his proverbial middle finger at anyone who criticizes it.

This is despite Dorsey claiming that Twitter "stands for freedom of expression." Expect in the coming year or so that Twitter, Facebook, Youtube, and Reddit will all double down in restricting a wide range of views and ideological clusters deemed "unacceptable," using more or less the same reasoning as the petition signers at Yale.

The next few decades might be very, very bad

Obligatory George Soros photo in section describing overarching media and SJW machinations.

Here at ROK we see some very positive signs within populations in the US, Europe, and elsewhere. Signs of fighting back, throwing up the standard media narrative, and taking to the streets to show disgust at political elites. Nevertheless, the fascistic efforts of vested interests are by no means slowing down.

What matters right now is that we remain ceaseless in cataloging both examples like the Yale anti-free speech bigotry and the compliance of the media in not reporting incidents like it. The advent of YouTube and other mediums has paradoxically opened up a whole new world for exposing the mendacious intentions of the SJW crowd and their powerful enablers.

Read More: Yale Students Throw Temper Tantrum Over "Offensive" Email

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How The Viral Hashtag #WasteHisTime2016 Will Spectacularly Backfire On Women

January 9, 2016 | by Marcus Aurelius | Link | Original Link

The number one trending topic, one week into 2016, has turned out to be the charming hashtag of #WasteHisTime2016. If you're on social media it's more or less a given that you're wasting your time, but it appears the lady philosophers of Facebook have decided to take the next step in bringing horrible men seeking companionship or sex to heel by…wasting their time. Apparently the motive for this wonderful social innovation is "to get back at fuckboys" (i.e. for women to treat men the way they've apparently been treated when strung along for a while by a guy).

[image]

Le sigh. Not a sigh of exasperation, mind you — rather, a contented sigh from all of us here at Return of Kings, if not manosphere sites generally. This hashtag is likely to bring even more men to our cause. Why? In brief, the Law of Unintended Consequences. But let's break it down for the ladies into five simple insights:

1. If he's a player, you're not his only partner

If you're dealing with a "fuckboy" or, in more technical terms, a player, you should understand that he's not just into you. He's not so fixated on the prospect of sex with you that you're the only one he's trying to (or having) sex with. Odds are on that there's any number of women he's interacting with similarly in the hopes of getting into their pants.

Little sister @Ellsafriqa, above, suggesting that her victim is not the only one she's contacting, gets this because that's the exact behaviour she's modelling. She just hasn't thought through what that behaviour means. The reality is that while you think you're causing the player a major inconvenience or a broken heart, you've at best caused him to lose a few text messages when he's going after—and banging—other women than you.

2. A player doesn't care if he doesn't get to fuck you

This is partially a consequence of you not being the only girl he's fucking, but the sort of men you are getting annoyed with usually have what we call an abundance mentality. The attitude is similar to that taught to good salesmen: you don't care about, or indeed you enjoy, the 10, 20, 30, or even 99 times you didn't get laid because each failure gets you closer to a bang.

That being so, the sort of "fuckboy" you're pissed at isn't affected if you waste his time. He simply moves on to the next prospect. So: who are you inconveniencing, if not players? Read on.

3. The guy you're deceiving is unlikely to be a player

The majority of Western men have been conditioned by thirty to forty years of feminist browbeatings not to escalate relationships with women — or if they do, to escalate it timidly and ineptly. Men have been screamed at over twelve years of their public school educations that they're all rapists and exploit women by their very existence. And they've been given contradictory if not flat-out wrong information about how a woman wants them to behave that does not match up with how she acts.

They are conditioned to not take the relationship further because they've been frightened into incompetence. Simply put, most of the good men orbiting you on social media have no idea how to seduce you or even to escalate their relationship without making you feel uncomfortable in the process.

Never doubt there is an art to seduction, an art we teach here — but it's hard to master that art or submit to it when you've been screamed at for decades (and still are) by feminist idiots that all sex is rape, the Ars Amatoria is Mein Kampf, and a relationship is more like an MMA bout than a tango.

The point being: the next guy you treat this way is not likely to be a fuckboy. He will much more likely be a guy crippled by years of indoctrination that he's a sexual predator, consequently insecure about his interactions with you, and often unsure of himself or his masculinity. But worst of all – for you ladies – he's still going to be a better prospect for a relationship than the player you're trying to hurt will ever be.

4. If he's not a player, you're likely to hurt him

Despite what feminists will tell you, men are not, in fact, emotionless. The sort of man willing to put in the time to talk to you for weeks or months without escalating anything is often the sort of man who likes you and is praying that that somewhere in your solipsistic brain you'll figure that out and maybe give him a chance to make you come. Or did you think all those likes and tweets of support were because he wanted to be nothing more than your friend?

When you fuck him over like that, he's not likely to empathize with your rationalization that it's justified because it was in payback to Chad Thundercock. What he will perceive is that you, a woman—supposedly the kinder sex—chose to coldly lead him on for weeks or months. And you didn't even do it to spite him, you did it to spite a guy who fucked you and left you.

This is doubly humiliating for such a man, because not only are you rejecting him, you're doing it because you can't get over the guy who rejected you.

5. When you do, he's going to look for a solution

This is how you send that man to us. For all the attempts the education system makes to drug it out of them, men are solution-oriented. As a group we try to fix shit when it's not working. The man you do this to won't ask you how (he still has some pride, after all). When he gets this sort of stunt pulled on him, he's going to turn to Google. He's going to punch in search phrases like: "How can I succeed with women?" or "Why is she mean to me?" or "How to pick up girls?" or "Why do women behave like they do?"

That's when he finds us, ladies. That's when he learns the difference between what women say and what they do. That's when he learns there's a lot more to life than just a relationship with you. That's when he learns the art of seduction. That's when he accepts the principles of neomasculinity.

And that's when he learns to treat low-quality women the same way they once treated him.

Read More: Women Are Experts At Wasting Men's Time

Marcus Aurelius

Marcus is a newly-awakened red pill hidden inside the Matrix, seeking to bring down the system from within. In the meantime he has books to read, writing to do, medieval swordsmanship to practice, and does not charge by the hour.

The Attacks On German Women Over New Year's Eve Appear Organized And Planned

January 9, 2016 | by Nomen Nescio | Link | Original Link

When you read the official press release of the Cologne police force on January 1st, you'll get the impression that that particular New Year's Eve was in no way remarkable. It was a night of peaceful celebration on the bridges over the Rhine river and in the down town area. The police handed out some tickets for vandalism (five more than in 2015) and assault (two more than in 2015). Shortly before midnight, the area in front of the central station was cleared to avoid mass panic being caused by fireworks.

There was no mention of the staggering amount of sexual assaults and robberies that had taken place. Now that the smoke is clearing, more reports are pouring in, not just from Cologne but from all over North Western Europe. So far, sexual assaults have been reported in Cologne (109), Hamburg (39), Frankfurt, (7) Bielefeld (5), Stuttgart (3), Stadtlohn (2) as well as in Salzburg (Austria), where Afghans and a Syrian were arrested for sexual assaults, Zurich (Switzerland) and Helsinki (Finland). This strongly suggests coordination and planning, possibly by Islamic terrorist groups. What we saw over New Year's Eve may have been the first terrorist "rape bombing" of Europe.

Number of police reports filed by 1/7.

Identical premeditated attacks in multiple countries

The attacks all followed the same pattern. Groups of Middle Eastern men converged en masse in a public place, surround young women, sexually assault them and steal anything that is not bolted down. The nature of these attacks—multiple attacks in multiple cities in multiple countries, all with the same modus operandi—raise the possibility that these attacks were centrally organized and coordinated. This is confirmed by the Helsinki police, who received word that large groups of Iraqi asylum seekers were planning to converge from several refugee centers on down town Helsinki, planning to assault and rob women.

Meanwhile, local German media reported that the Cologne police found handwritten translation aids in German-Arabic on several of the suspects they arrested, helpfully translating phrases and terms such as “I want to kiss you”, “I want to fuck you” and “I want to kill you”.

German-Arab translation aid found on NYE suspects, showing them how to say I want to fuck you, I want to kiss you and I want to kill you in German and Arabic

A witness report (in The Guardian, of all places) from Cologne describes how the men were coordinated on New Year’s Eve. Describing what she called “coordination tactics” among the men, Shabani said: “I watched for some time as three men who were smartly dressed gave out instructions. One time a group of three or four males would come up to them, be given instructions and sent away into the crowd. Then another group of four or five would come up, and they’d gesticulate in various directions and send them off again. It looked to me like they were clearly directing the events,” said Shabani, describing the evening as “chaotic”.

Together, these pieces of evidence suggest that the NYE attacks were premeditated and, likely, centrally organized. However, chances are that we won’t hear about that until it is too late, especially in the light of recent reports that the German police are under strict government orders to hide crimes involving refugees (unless refugees are attacked by nationalists). Bild writes: “In 2015, there were over a 1000 incidents involving refugees in the state of Saxony, including sexual assaults involving children and 11 murders. Only three of these murders were reported in the press, the rest was hushed up.”

In that light, the press release after Cologne’s NYE comes as no surprise. And the German authorities will never admit if the NYE sex attacks were centrally organized.

Systematic rape is a weapon of war

If these attacks are indeed centrally organized, they are a game changer. In the Arab world, there is no greater dishonor to a man than when a woman under his protection is violated. The shame is so great that men will kill their daughters or nieces, or force them to marry their rapists, in order to regain face. So when men from a culture that kills its violated women engage in mass sexual assaults, all at the same time in different countries, this can only be seen as a declaration of war. Systematic rape has long been used as a weapon of war and as a tool for ethnic cleansing. And now Europe finds itself invaded by hundreds of thousands of military age men, invited by its leaders, who rape and pillage as if they already conquered the continent.

As an act of terror, the mass sexual assault on that New Year’s Eve in Europe is different, as it is an attack on the women, daughters and nieces of Europe. Every man knows girls of that age, and every European man was already familiar with the groups of Middle Eastern hyenas prowling the streets and bothering girls. When European girls are attacked in an organized mass assault, this more than anything feels like an attack on our closest, most intimate tribe. It triggers our most primal instincts.

A low cost, low risk yet highly effective tactic

This attack, directed at what Europe (and every tribe) cherishes the most, was achieved without the need to procure weapons or explosives. All you need is a group of liquored up Middle Eastern men, urge them to follow their natural instincts and set them loose on the local population. It is low cost and, for the organizers, risk free. And it enrages the European men in a way that the other terrorist attacks never could, for their failure to protect their own women humiliates them, fills them with shame. As such, it comes as no surprise that German men are now forming vigilante groups.

But maybe these events were not organized at all. Maybe this is just what Middle Eastern men do, when they have the feeling they can get away with it. Perhaps they need very little encouragement to form mobs and assault women. We have all seen the videos of women—their own women—being attacked on Tahrir square, during the Arab Spring, or the videos of girls being chased through the streets of Cairo by hundreds of men. Frankly,

I don’t know what is worse. Were these attacks organized or are they just something that happens, once the number of frustrated, entitled Arab men reaches a certain threshold?

Regardless of whether these sex attacks are part of an organized campaign, we will see more of them in the very near future. Carnival is widely celebrated in Europe, and while it doesn’t the scantily clad dancers seen in South America, it is a week of drunken celebrations, where masked revelers flood the streets and clubs. The only difference is that now Europe’s men have been warned. We’ll see whether they can protect their women this time.

Read Next: Germany Proves That “Rape Culture” Is Merely A Political Weapon Against Western Men

Nomen Nescio
Nomen Nescio was born naked, screaming and covered in someone else's blood. Eventually he overcame those odds, left his cave and became a mercenary mad scientist, traveling the world and sampling its women. He writes on ROK sporadically. Follow him on Twitter: @The_Dr_Caveman

New Yorkers Can Now Be Fined $250,000 For Not Using Loony Gender Pronouns Like “Ze” And “Hir”

January 9, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

New guidelines issued for New York City “anti-discrimination” laws now permit a $250,000 fine for “maliciously” not using someone’s prefered gender pronoun. The New York Commission on Human Rights has made some fabulous errors previously, but this is by far the worst. Preposterously, these pronouns include “ze” or “hir” for people who opt for “gender-neutral” identities.

So if a person says “use ze for me instead of she” and you refuse to more than a couple of times, you are guilty of malicious or wanton misgendering and liable for the $250,000 fine.

Apologists for this kind of SJW fascism will contend that the $250,000 fine is not mandatory and is a maximum, as if it somehow eliminates the farce of the laws’ new interpretation. You can find the legal guidance here and the following excerpts give a basic overview of how the laws are meant to work, if that even makes sense in this surreal situation:

> III. VIOLATIONS OF THE NEW YORK CITY HUMAN RIGHTS LAW’S PROHIBITIONS ON GENDER DISCRIMINATION
>
> …
>
> 1. Failing To Use an Individual’s Preferred Name or Pronoun
>
> The NYCHRL requires employers and covered entities to use an individual’s > preferred name, pronoun and title (e.g., Ms./Mrs.) regardless of the individual's sex assigned at birth, anatomy, gender, medical history, appearance, or the sex indicated on the individual's identification.

>
> Most individuals and many transgender people use female or male pronouns and titles. Some transgender and gender non-conforming people prefer to use pronouns other than he/him/his or she/her/hers, such as they/them/theirs or ze/hir.
>
> …
>
> IV. PENALTIES IN ADMINISTRATIVE ACTIONS
>
> The Commission can impose civil penalties up to $125,000 for violations, and up to $250,000 for violations that are the result of willful, wanton, or malicious conduct.

Some (big) questions for readers

Imagine this muppet, current Mayor Bill de Blasio, leading NYC during 9/11 instead of Rudy Giuliani. He'd be too busy trying to get free surgery for transgender individuals than organizing an emergency response to the terrorist attacks.

It is clear from both a reading of the legal guidance and the general context of the laws that calling a transgender woman a "man" is illegal. So what happens when a woman repeatedly calls a man a "girl" or a "pussy"? Surely gendered pronouns are not the only concern but also actual nouns. We have all heard it before on the streets or in a bar: a fighting pair, not necessarily a romantic couple, trading insults. Such a verbal dispute frequently results in the female questioning the male's manhood. The same can be said of two men locking horns in public. Can you think of other examples? I sure can.

Already, we start to see the plethora of circumstances in which these draconian laws are currently being violated, beyond anything to do with transgender individuals or whatever other sexual identity is the new Baskin Robbins flavor of the month. Unfortunately, we all know that these types of laws will too readily dismiss the common sense scenarios either I or readers will come up with.

In addition, how can one prove discrimination? Once again, the testimony-only nature of many allegations of gender discrimination will lead to accused parties being prima facie guilty. The witch hunt hysteria of modern times, “listen and believe,” and other pure codswallop concepts make guaranteed victimhood for transgender accusers par for the course.

This sad state of affairs is only exacerbated by the fact the the New York Commission is not a court and, as the issuing of new guidelines demonstrates, operates via quasi-fiat instead of being required to impartially interpret laws.

“Healthcare” for transgender individuals will cost everyone else in NYC big bucks

Employers in NYC must provide costly genital mutilation, voice training and other measures or risk massive fines.

> 5. Providing Employee Benefits that Discriminate Based on Gender
>
> The NYCHRL prohibits covered entities from offering employee benefits that discriminate on the basis of gender. To comply with the law, entities must offer benefits equally to all employees regardless of gender.
>
> …
>
> It is unlawful for an employer to provide health benefit plans that deny or exclude services on the basis of gender.
>
> …

> Transgender care is medically necessary, effective, and even life-saving for many transgender people. Transgender care includes a range of treatments, including, for example, hormone replacement therapy, voice training, or surgery. What a particular individual will seek differs according to their needs and overall health.

Another tragic aspect of the new guidelines is how they reinforce expectations that employers should cater to all the whims of transgender employees, well above what is afforded to others. Transgender "healthcare" is much more expensive than the average healthcare of heterosexuals and even gays and lesbians. Why should employers foot the bill for these much larger costs? And this is without raising the still very justifiable question of whether transgender individuals are a dangerous financial burden on their employers from the outset when it comes to medical overheads.

Voice training in particular strikes me as a huge joke. And how does this compare to, say, the healthcare requirements of a masculine straight man? Hundreds of thousands of straight New York men lift weights and regularly purchase supplements. Why shouldn't their supplements be included as something intrinsic to their gender-related needs and physical wellbeing, especially as the city faces an obesity crisis?

Actual harm to life and safety doesn't result in a $250,000 fine, so why this?

His name is Bruce and the correct pronoun for him is "he." Oh no, are the NYC laws extraterritorial in application?

When was the last time a murderer or brain damage-inducing thug was given a $250,000 fine? It doesn't happen. Victims or their families have to pursue costly civil action to get that sort of justice. Yet here we have a New York City administrative body handing out financial penalties for errant letters and words. Spare me.

When we see developments like this in America's largest city, is it really worth wondering why America cannot contain ISIS or stave off the ascent of China?

Read More: The 3 Golden Rules For Getting Laid In New York City

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Sundog Pictures & Fabia Martin Wrongfully Censor Our Video That Slams Their BBC Hit Piece (UPDATE 3)

January 10, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Last month, the BBC aired a hit piece against myself and other manosphere figures in a program called Extreme UK: Men At War, hosted by male feminist Reggie Yates. The program not only distorted my work, but obsessively discussed the false accusation that I was an abuser of women. I replied to the propaganda piece to clear my name through a Youtube video, using fair-use excerpts of the program. Three weeks later, an employee for the production company that produced the BBC program, Sundog Pictures, filed a DMCA takedown order against it. The video was removed from Youtube, effectively censoring my response.

Censorship, British style

On January 9 I logged into my Youtube account to see that my response video against the BBC program was taken down due to a copyright claim by Sundog Pictures

My response video showed short clips of the BBC program, particularly the excerpts that made false or distorted claims about me, along with new commentary I delivered personally on camera. According to copyright law, the commentary that I provided alongside the excerpts falls under fair use.

> …a fair use is any copying of copyrighted material done for a limited and "transformative" purpose, such as to comment upon, criticize, or parody a copyrighted work. Such uses can be done without permission from the copyright owner. [Source: Standford]

The fair use guide on Vimeo also shows that my video is firmly within the realm of fair use:

> In other words, does your video alter the original work to give it a new meaning or shed new light on it? Uses that directly appraise or comment on the original work are more likely to be transformative because they add a new meaning or message. On the other hand, are you using the material because you needed to put something in a particular scene and the copyrighted work happens to fit? Such uses will probably point away from fair use.
>
> Your use doesn't necessarily have to be "transformative" to qualify for fair use (although it definitely helps). Any use that furthers the public interest could potentially tip this factor in your direction. Parody, criticism, news reporting, scholarship, and commentary are all areas where courts have traditionally recognized fair use.

My video was transformative in nature, did not use excessively long clips from the original program, could not be confused for the original, and produced completely new commentary and content. There is zero doubt that my video is legal and does not break any copyrights held by Sundog Pictures or the BBC, yet they still filed a claim against it.

Was the takedown a Sundog Pictures corporate directive or the result of a rogue employee?

The email left on the takedown notice was  A staff profile on the Sundog site reveals it to be Fabia Martin, a middle-aged woman who works as assistant producer, with no apparent training on copyright or legal issues. Further inspection of her LinkedIn profile suggests she's a feminist spun from the same cloth as Reggie Yates, hinting towards a motive of leftist censorship instead of a genuine violation of copyright law.

Fabia Martin
Assistant Producer, Brand and Social

Official title as Assistant Producer… she makes sure the coffee stays hot during filming

Influenced by a privileged "feminist" who would be a nobody without rich men to help her

Did the Sundog Pictures leadership command Fabia to wrongfully take down my video or did she act on her own accord? I asked Sundog through their official Twitter account, but have not yet received a response.

> .@sundog_pictures: was taking down my video a company directive or did your employee Fabia Martin go rogue?
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) January 8, 2016

Since they have not distanced themselves from Fabia's actions, we have to assume that the management team agrees with her wrongful takedown of a video that did not violate any established copyright law. Both Fabia and Sundog's leadership are complicit in this censorship act.

Sundog Pictures took down another video critical to their program

A DMCA takedown request was also used against Diana Davison, who uploaded a video critiquing the production. Like myself, she believes her video falls within fair-use doctrine, and notes that I can certainly claim fair-use since I was responding to my own appearance on the program.

Davison rightfully points out the hypocrisy of Sundog's mission statement encouraging "social production" and "engagement" while using wrongful DMCA takedowns to silence rebuttals.

"We can take your videos for our big-budget program, but you can't excerpt ours to defend against false claims"

The Reggie Yates program used extensive clips from my Youtube channel and lecture in order to create their program. I did not charge for the use of these clips in a production that earned Sundog and its staff hundreds of thousands of dollars from the BBC. Yet when I produced a basic video that defended myself against their false accusations, using less than two minutes of clips in a legal manner that is clearly classified as transformative under copyright law, they slap me in the face by wrongfully censoring me and my critiques of their program. That's the thanks I get for giving them full access to my London lecture and free content for their program.

In the face of actions by Sundog and its employees, who would agree to appear on their programs now? Not only would you have no control about how you are portrayed, you're not even allowed to publicly respond to the claims they air about you without facing censorious retribution. I sincerely hope that by publishing this article, I can warn others who may be offered an interview for a Sundog production in the future. They have no concern for displaying objectivity or practicing fairness, and will attempt to harm your reputation and silence your speech if it's convenient for their agenda.

Reggie Yates, host of the Sundog Pictures program

Sundog and Fabia Martin won this censorship battle

The actions of Sundog Pictures and Fabia Martin show how rigged the game is when you deal with the mainstream media. Not only do they spin and twist your words and ideas, but they will also find a way to bludgeon you upside the head if you try to defend yourself against them. I want to be upset at their censorship, but we all know that their action is part of a desperate last gasp of the mainstream media as they lose control over their carefully constructed narrative.

In five years, Sundog Pictures will go out of business, the BBC will see record low ratings, and Fabia Martin will be waiting in line for food at a soup kitchen while our beliefs will reach a tipping point to begin dominating the culture and causing real pain and retribution for the totalitarian leftists we currently have to endure. They may have won this battle, but we will win the war.

UPDATE 1:

I re-uploaded my original video on another platform. Here's the video that Sundog Pictures is trying to censor…

Video link: http://dai.ly/x3loypq

UPDATE 2:

Youtube will reinstate my video unless Sundog Pictures files a court order against me. This means that they must state under oath that my video is not fair use. Your move, Sundog.

Dear Roosh V,

Thank you for your counter notification. It has been forwarded to the party that sent the takedown notification.

Keep in mind that by submitting this counter notification, you've initiated a formal legal dispute process. As such, YouTube will handle this process in accordance with the law. This process takes some time, so we kindly ask for your patience.

Upon forwarding your counter notification to the claimant, we will allow them 10 - 14 business days from this date to respond with evidence that they have taken court action against you to prevent the reinstatement of the video(s) in question.

If we receive no response, after that time period your videos will be restored and the associated penalties on your account will be resolved.

UPDATE 3:

Sundog Pictures has declined to pursue legal action against me, meaning that Youtube has restored my video:

Hello,

We've completed processing your counter notification regarding these video(s):

- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-Q9F_CPb99g

This content has been restored unless you have deleted the video(s). Your account will not be penalized.

Regards,

The YouTube Legal Support Team

This is a great victory for fair use and legal speech. I will always fight against any unjust attacks to my videos and writing.

Read Next: The BBC And Reggie Yates Release Their Hit Piece On The Manosphere

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Your Life Changes After You Start Listening To Classical Music

January 10, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Medical disclaimer: I am not a doctor. I am just a man with personal experience and personal research.

Classical music has always been one of the hallmarks of the upper class, the intellectuals, and the conscious. Even today, in a world where sub-par rap and unintelligent lyrics dominate the face of the music industry, there is still a small, but steady group of men and women who listen to classical music; mainly college professors and other artsy types.

But why should you listen to classical music? I will admit that there is a time and a place for everything; listening to Mozart before a workout isn't the best idea, and neither is listening to death metal when you're trying to read a book on how to attain happiness.

However, listening to classical music has been shown to have numerous benefits, and thus it is a powerful weapon to add to anyone's arsenal of self-improvement and biohacking.

1. Lowers blood pressure

Have high blood pressure, but don't want to start taking diuretics, ACE inhibitors, or beta blockers? Just listen to some classical music. A study conducted by the University of San Diego found that after listening to classical music, listeners had lower blood pressure. If inquiring minds wish to see the study, it can be found here.

This can also be especially useful if one is angry – anger has a very intense physiological effect on the body. It leads to vasoconstriction, or the constriction of the blood vessels, which shoots blood pressure through the roof. So the next time you're angry at that biased pro-feminist story the media is airing, just pop in some Bach.

2. Relieves chronic pain

Instead of destroying your body with these, try some classical music instead

Whether your chronic pain is due to a muscle imbalance, osteoporosis, or a pinched nerve, taking opiates or other powerful painkillers on a regular basis are absolutely detrimental to health. So, instead of wrecking your kidneys, toasting your liver, and increasing your risk of depression, just listen to some classical music. A study in the Journal for Advanced Nursing showed that listening to music can help reduce chronic pain. Here is the study.

3. Fights depression

What do they all have in common? They were on anti-depressants.

I have harped on prescription antidepressants numerous times, but I'll do it again. I have tried literally almost every prescription SSRI on the market, and none of them work. All that they did was zombify me; in some cases I couldn't even function due to so much brain fog.
So, instead of demolishing your serotonin receptors, simply opt for a simpler solution. Listen to classical music. A study conducted at Glasgow University shows that it can help fight depression.

4. Helps you fall asleep

As an insomniac myself, I can appreciate anything that improves the quality and quantity of sleep. Classical music is one of these things. A study conducted by a team of Hungarians found that listening to 45 minutes of music before bedtime helped students from 19 to 28 who reported having problems falling asleep.

Another study conducted by a group of Dutchmen found that by listening to classical music containing the harp, piano, and orchestra, improved relaxation and sleep quality in adults and elders alike.

5. Heightened IQ (The Mozart Effect)

Do your part – help raise a bunch of super genius boys to combat the next generation of feminists

This is perhaps one of the most famous and powerful effects of listening to classical music. It all began when a team of researchers published a study which drew a correlation between listening to Mozart and having a higher IQ. Thus, an industry of products claiming to improve you and your baby's intelligence (Baby Mozart, anyone?), experienced exponential growth in just a few short years.

The effects are not limited to Mozart, however. A Northumbria University study found that subjects listening to Vivaldi's "The Four Seasons," particularly "Spring," responded to tasks more accurately and faster than the control group; the type of tasks performed indicates that the subjects must have had enhanced alertness and memory.

6. Promotes emotional openness

Shakespeare might be right after all in saying that "If music be the food of love, play on," as a 2001 study conducted at Southern Methodist University found that listening to classical music heightened emotional awareness and made subjects more forthcoming with their emotions. The same study also found that the emotional language that the subjects used was far richer than the control group's.

Emotional openness is something that I struggled with for a very long time, but through meditation, working out, listening to good music, and dozens of other esoteric practices, I've improved my emotional expressiveness and state at least 30 fold.

7. Helps reduce anxiety

It's okay…just pop in some Vivaldi and breathe

Nearly 40 million Americans suffer from anxiety, including me (at one point). However, instead of turning to those little white pills, why not just indulge in some Purcell or Bach? An article published in the Journal of Clinical Nursing in 2008 showcased a study done on pregnant woman. The study found that anxiety, depression, and stress levels were all decreased after listening to a mere 30 minutes of classical music.
On the same topic, a Russian study published in Human Physiology found that children who listened to classical music for just one hour a day over a six month period exhibited brain changes indicative of greater levels of relaxation.

So the next time you're trying to relax, and you happen upon a feminist news story, just turn it off, turn on some Bach, and unwind.

8. Discourages crime

It is no secret that many criminals are visceral creatures; they operate based off of primal impulses and desires. Thus, it makes sense that certain external stimuli which change your basic biology could thwart crime, does it not?

Well, in 2003 London city officials started playing classical music at several train stations; the results were startling. After just 18 months, robberies had dropped by 30%, assaults on staff by 25%, and vandalism by a whopping 37%. Likewise, Portland implemented a similar strategy in a high-crime rail station; police station calls dropped by a massive 40%.

9. Helps premature babies grow faster

A study done at Tel Aviv University found that exposing prematurely born children to Mozart for 30 minutes a day caused them to grow “far more rapidly.” They are still unsure as to the reason why, however it is postulated that by causing a decrease in stress, the immune system’s capability is boosted. Regardless of the cause, this clearly has enormous application potential all throughout the medical community.

10. Improves visual attention

In one study, published in the American Journal of Occupational Therapy, researchers found that stroke patients who listened to classical music had improved visual attention; the control groups were white noise and silence, both of which were shown to have less of an effect on visual attention than classical music.

Even if you haven't had a stroke, classical music is sure to help your visual attention, by activating areas in the prefrontal cortex known to increase willpower. Music therapy is already becoming a popular form of treatment for children with ADHD, who have trouble paying attention.

Bonus: Revives culture

He would be proud of the manosphere

You didn't expect me to write an article completely devoid of rants pertaining to our degenerate culture now, did you? By listening to classical music you are keeping the art of the past alive. We all have our part to do in combating the current age of decline that we live in; I try to do my part by blogging and guest posting on ROK.
And altruistic motives aside, isn't it simply wonderful to indulge in the music of our great ancestors?

Read More: 5 Reasons To Take Up Classical Music

Jon Anthony

Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Will Swedish Men Rediscover Their Balls Before Sweden Becomes A Matriarchal Hellhole?

January 10, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

There are large warning signs indicating that Sweden is heading for a matriarchy—a society ruled by women with the intent to hurt men and further their own interests. Both in business and in politics, women are grabbing power. They are aided by their loyal manginas, who actively take steps to bring their fellow men down. There are no indications that Sweden's horrifying descent into matriarchy will be stopped.

"Women are taking over"

Swedish businessman Jan Carlzon said in a recent interview that "women are taking over, we are entering a matriarchy." In the world of business, women are elbowing their way into "position after position."

Jan Carlzon sees both positive and negative aspects of this development. On the one hand, a new generation with hunger and ambition is taking the place of the old one. On the other hand, he fears that men will have a tough time competing in this new situation.

> I think we need a law that says that there must be fifty-fifty in boards, because if we don't do that there will soon be 70 percent women and 30 percent men, he told the astounded interviewer.

So is he right? Is matriarchy upon us? Will men soon need affirmative action to not be relegated to the margins of society, subordinated by female overlords? Looking at the facts of the matter, it does seem a bit exaggerated.

94 percent of CEOs of listed companies in Sweden are men. Directorial boards consist of 71 percent men, and 95 percent of the chairmen on these boards are men. In the private sector, 69.6 percent of companies are led by men. Only in companies involved in health care are female bosses in the majority, with 64.5 percent.

In the national parliament, 56 percent of the members are men. Furthermore, men are more active than women in political parties and union organizations, and 76 percent of professors are men. (All statistics can be found here.)

They are gaining power in politics

The Swedish parliament, the Riksdag.

Now, it's safe to say that men still hold more formal power in society than women. This is the case even after decades of women being active in the workforce with no laws to keep them from reaching the top. But Jan Carlzon's point is that things are changing, and soon women might surpass men in leading positions.

While women have a long way to go before they become dominant in the private sector, they will soon become equal in the political sphere. The government administration is already divided equally, with 12 out of 24 ministers being women, and one of them in charge of finance. Just 30 years ago, 75 percent of ministers were male. Sweden's mandates in the European Parliament are also divided fifty-fifty.

Women today hold 44 percent of seats in the parliament, while 30 years ago they held 31 percent. Female representation also looks roughly the same on the municipal level. In one instance they have a majority: Women vote to a slightly higher degree than men.

So women are quickly catching up and gaining political power with every election. It probably won't be long before Sweden becomes a matriarchy in its literal sense, where the executive and the legislative powers are in the hands of women. Whether they will use this power to hurt men—maybe as a revenge for past injustices they think they've suffered—will certainly depend on what kind of women will rule.

The feminist government leads the way toward matriarchy

The current self-proclaimed feminist government proves that women don't have to have a numerical advantage to get their way. They only need to bring a number of political manginas to their side and these gender traitors will do the job for them. Of course, there is an obvious advantage for any politician to pander to the larger female demographic.

Prime Minister and mangina-in-chief Stefan Löfven's administration has four stated goals: men and women shall have equal power and influence, equal financial opportunities, do an equal amount of unpaid household work, and "men's violence against women" shall end. 239 million SEK will be spent in 2016 on particular policies aimed at gender equality.

One way in which the government enforces their brand of feminist equality is to determine that a certain percentage of professors at universities must be female, even though 60 percent of students are women. Another example is that the government is pushing for affirmative action for CEOs of listed companies. Only six percent of them are women, and if the number hasn't skyrocketed to 40 percent at the end of 2016, legislation will be used to even out the difference.

In the spirit of socialism they aim to push down one group of people to elevate another. Rather than stepping back and giving everyone a fair chance of succeeding—which would be the proper role of government—they will socially engineer society to meet their politically correct standards. All without shedding a drop of blood. It's Marxism with a smiley face, and its purpose is to bring men down.

The MSM pushes for matriarchy

Actual matriarchy is thus not a prerequisite for men to be burdened by matriarchal (i.e. feminist) policies, since we already see it happening. And while women seem to be slow at reaching the heights of men in the business world, affirmative action will fix that perceived inequity soon enough.

Finally, an article on this topic mustn't neglect the influence of the media. What the mainstream media tell people guides them in their decision-making, like when they put a ballot in a box every four years. A great range of voices can find an outlet on the internet, but TV channels and newspapers are filled with leftist, anti-masculine messaging. Studies also confirm that a clear majority of Swedish journalists are left-leaning.

While men are still dominant in many fields, women are slowly building up their power and do not hesitate to use government force for their own interests. Men must be aware of this and act upon it, if the dystopian future of matriarchy is to be avoided.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Cultural Marxism Produces Matriarchy

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.

@johnhydenius on Twitter

8 Things That Make A Girl Stupid And Useless

January 11, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

The vast majority of modern women in the West are irreparably corrupt. And while many of us blame the toxic influence of feminism, I believe that feminism is merely a symptom of a decadent society rather than the disease itself.

Even without feminism, there are aspects of our society that lure and corrupt women with disastrous consequences for the society as a whole. It starts with the creation of snarky and entitled women who place their careers and riding the cock carousel above being wives and mothers, which leads to dysfunctional matrimonial relationships, which leads to divorce and men shunning marriage.

This then leads to the destruction of nuclear families, which leads to the decline in population due to low birth-rates, which in turn makes governments resort to importing millions of foreign immigrants to replace the native population, and also all the consequences for the children being raised by single mothers, and so on.

The following are the biggest offenders that are currently corrupting women today:

1. Bars And Clubs

Bars and clubs are the sort of places where women congregate to bring out their worst. The male attention they get from these places is so great that they end up bloating their egos to a point where it refuses to deflate even into their 30's.

Although they're the sort of places frequented by women who are already tainted, any decent woman who enters them will succumb to their toxic influences over time.

2. Social Media

Women love receiving attention and validation without accomplishing anything, and social media is their weapon of choice. Facebook, Instagram, Tinder, and more, have turned into male-attention buffet for the attention whores everywhere who feed their vanity by fishing for “likes.” The more shameless ones use them to engage in real-life depravity, where they allow rich Arabs to defecate in their mouths to satisfy their materialistic orgy.

You can expect any woman who makes a habit of putting up her selfies online to be a narcissistic shell of a human being devoid of any humility or decency. I think it’s safe to say that social media is the worst thing to happen to women since the sexual liberation of the 1960’s.

3. Careers

Perhaps the most devastating social change to occur in recent times is having women turn from loving, caring wives into career women who are more interested in their desk jobs than in raising children. The more time that a woman prioritizes her career, the more she is likely to delay marriage or not marry at all, resulting in decreased number of available women for men to marry—which of course leads to the subsequent decline in nuclear families.

Careers also tend to make women more entitled, materialistic, and narcissistic. Their attitude suffers as well as they believe that acting up like a bitch equates to being a competent leader.

4. Colleges And Universities

Colleges today have transformed from being giant money-making schemes to breeding grounds for militant feminists and the social justice rabbles. Any woman who go to one of these “educational” institutions are infantilized with “safe spaces” that offer bubble, Play-Doh, and videos of puppies to soothe empowered female feelings after being triggered from facing opposing views. (You know things are bad when even Obama thinks the students are coddled).

And when a place of education turns into nothing but a giant day-care centre for privileged cry babies, these sort of shrieking goblins shouldn’t come as a surprise:

I myself have witnessed a sweet, bubbly girl I know transform into a short-haired, feminist bitch after spending just few years in a university in Toronto (the same one that started Slutwalk). Today, colleges no longer serve as places for intellectual growth, but are, instead, places that indoctrinate women with warped, progressive world-view. Women should be discouraged from attending them.

5. Smartphones

Smartphones may be useful in many ways, but when you consider the way most people use them most of the time (i.e. texting, social media, games, mindless browsing, etc.), it's by far the worst technological innovation to have infested our society in recent times.

And while these devices affect both men and women, it seems to be having a worse impact on women who seem to have merged with the machine to become one with it. Much like crack addicts, women who are addicted to their phones are irritable and short-tempered as anything that distracts them from their phones is seen as an annoyance.

6. Shopping Malls

Shopping malls were made for women, to exploit women, thus spoiling them in the process. You have to understand that women don't go to shopping malls to merely buy something; for them, it is a way of indulging in their materialistic hedonism—and also a way for them to resolve their psychological anxieties of beauty and status.

You can almost guarantee that if we were to draw a graph that shows the relationship between how often a woman goes shopping and her level of narcissism, it would be a straight line.

7. Movies And Television Shows

Women reach both their sexual peak and photoshop peak when they hit their 30's.

The messages in movies and television shows today do nothing but harm women by distorting their view of reality. From the unrealistic and lavish lifestyle portrayed in Sex and the City to the ridiculous girl power films like the new Max Max and Star Wars, the only thing these brainless fantasies "empower" is women's complete irresponsibility and delusion. That is, until reality hits them—hard.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VCyzhzWOF-U

8. White Knights And Male Feminists

One of the main reasons why women feel bolstered enough to be as crass as they are now is because of all the loser white-knights and male feminists who jump in their defense like well-trained dogs. If all men united to express their disapproval at the state of women today, many of the problems we face might be mitigated significantly.

But the fact of the matter is that there are far too many supplicant men who kowtow to every whim of the opposite sex, thereby indirectly contributing to their skyscraping egos and bitch behaviour.

Conclusion

While there isn't awful lot we can do to stop these toxic influences, we can use them as a reference to decide which women to avoid—especially if you are looking for a stable relationship. You can argue that it's virtually impossible to find any woman who is clean of all these influences, but the point is to find one close to it as possible.

And for that, you might have to look outside the cities or head overseas. But as long as women today remain unchecked to do as they wish while the above mentioned factors remain in place, I don't expect things to improve anytime soon in the West.

And last, it's also worth noting that the majority of men are also guilty of the things that I've listed above in one form or the other. If you do happen to be guilty, limit and fix what you can as much as possible.

Read More: 5 Things That Enable Women To Avoid Personal Responsibility In Their Relationships

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

How Men Are Being Socialized To Act Like Women

January 11, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's well-established that human beings are like monkeys when imitating and copying social behaviors such as mannerisms, speech, and even ideas. Birds of a feather flock together, so if you know one individual within a tight social group, you probably also know the others (this is why self-help gurus strongly advise you to choose your friends carefully). There's nothing stopping this social mimicry from crossing gender lines, meaning that the more time males spend with females, the more they become like them.

My sister has three brothers who she has spent thousands of hours with. Without her even realizing it, she has developed a genuine sense of humor, giving her a personality that leans away from elegance and more towards entertainment, similar to what her oldest brother does when attempting to bed women and publish web articles. At the same time, my younger brother has picked up on a few of her mannerisms, making him less masculine in the process. This phenomenon is normal among mixed-sex families, but can you imagine the effect on people if they were forced to interact with the opposite sex not only in the home, but outside of it as well?

Thanks to feminism, and the penis envy it installs in women, men no longer have spaces where females are not present. They have invaded education and workplaces at all levels. They are present in coffee houses, formerly male clubs, and even barber shops. Not only are men no longer able to "practice" being a man around other men without fear of offending the opposite sex, they are unconsciously picking up female mannerisms and ideas at the same time that females are picking up on male mannerisms.

Because the sexes are not segregated, women are becoming masculinized and men are becoming feminized. This is greatly harming male development and creating a generation of feminized men who are confused about their identity and masculinity.

We need to ask ourselves two questions:

1. How much time does a male need to spend around females during adolescence to gain sufficient socialization ability to procure female mates?

2. After adolescence, how much non-intimate socialization with females is required to maintain his well-being and happiness?

If you look back to the generation of our fathers or grandfathers, masculine and feminine spheres were significantly more segregated than what we see today. Each sex kept to their own and were only brought together in a handful of situations outside of family. Even family, if you go back to agrarian times, consisted of men working the fields or engaging in hunts for most of the day while women (and little children) attended to household duties. They did not sit down together and watch movies all day or gossip endlessly about other people. That sort of business is too trifling for a man to endure.

In modern times, men are constantly forced to interact with women

Not only do men have to infantalize their speech and behavior to not trigger the ever-present politically correct police, but they are passively absorbing female behavior through chronic daily interactions. This assault on males begins from their first day in kindergarten, and continues without relief for the next several decades. By the time the average Western man is 20-years-old, he has spent at least half of his entire history of socialization with women.

Is it a coincidence that the increased visibility and flamboyance of homosexuals tracks with the social integration of men and women in all spaces? Of course I'm not stating that this integration is the sole cause for the homo-obsession we have in the Western world today, which has recently culminated with the sanctioning of anal marriage, but it's hard to deny that men whose masculinity has been diluted since childhood find favor in behaviors that are decidedly feminine.

Even men who pursue casual sex with women have to be careful about being feminized

I spent an extended period of time talking to thousands of women in my life, trying to excite and please them through trial and error. I have come to understand women more than most men, so I wasn't surprised recently when I caught myself speaking in a feminine uptalk cadence that only girls and manginas use. I was horrified. I've since become more conscious about blocking other female mannerisms that want to slip into my being.

It's no shock that the most successful players I know are not ultra-masculine at all, but have many feminine traits that actually allow them to connect more easily with women who prefer a more cosmopolitan man than one who looks like he just came from the Siberian tundra. While masculine men have no problems getting a woman, I'm starting to suspect that men without feminine personality traits will find it hard to gather the ability and motivation to lay a lot of them in a playboy manner.

Every man should do a preventive check-up to see if his social interactions with women are actually making him more feminine, and if more masculine interaction is needed to tip the balance. Because humans adopt traits of the individuals they spend the most time with, we need to be more conscious about what influences we are allowing into our lives that take us away from masculinity and strength.

I personally see little need for a man to work with women, go to school with them, or even maintain asexual relationships with them, especially with women who don't give him sexual access to her friends. While there are many problems in modern society that are difficult to solve, excising needless social interaction with females outside of sexual relationships is an easy one to fix. Choose to spend your free time with men so your masculinity remains strong and steady.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Two Strategies For Having A Good Sex Life

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Finally, A Masculine Hollywood Movie That Won’t Make You Cringe

January 11, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I’ve been disappointed so many times by mainstream Hollywood movies that in recent years I’ve come to expect very little. And this is what makes my viewing of Alejandro G. Iñárritu’s brilliant The Revenant such an unexpected joy: the awareness that great films can still be made in America, if only the right perspective is taken.

There is a story—possibly apocryphal—that British general James Wolfe, after having heard Thomas Grey’s Elegy Written In A Country Churchyard, told his officers, “Gentlemen, I would rather have written that poem than take Quebec tomorrow.” Now I know what he felt like. I so wish I could have been involved in the composition of this cinematic masterpiece.

And make no mistake. The Revenant is a truly great film, a creation of surpassing and harrowing beauty. This is the film that every man should see, right now.

There is no “you-go girlism” here. No “girl-power” nonsense. No in-your-face political correctness. No subtle social engineering agenda lurking in the background. No corporate product endorsements.

There are only the stark, unvarnished themes of man’s eternal struggles: courage, adversity, suffering, redemption, and revenge, related with engaging honesty and simplicity. The Revenant achieves philosophic grandeur without one single word of preaching.

It just does it by telling its story. And all of these themes are played out against the vast panorama of Nature's terrifying vastness, which makes all our endeavors seem so pitiful by comparison.

Background

The film is based on a 2002 novel by Michael Punke, who apparently based his work on the actual experiences of a frontiersman named Hugh Glass. The plot is a simple one, as it should be. The year is 1823, and an expedition of fur-trappers the Western territories is getting ready to transport its haul of pelts (very valuable in those days) back to civilization.

But then disaster strikes. The camp is attacked by a war party of Ree Indians (in what surely must be the most graphic scene of frontier warfare ever filmed), and most of the men are killed. A small party is left to try to make its way back to civilization. We thus have that eternal, great theme, which goes all the way back to Xenophon's Anabasis: the fight through hostile territory to return home.

But this is a human drama as well.

The surviving band of trappers is forced to rely on their experienced tracker Glass (Leonardo DiCaprio) to lead them back. Glass is a mysterious, taciturn man. He obviously has lived among the Indians and knows their ways; he speaks their languages, had an Indian wife, and has a half-Pawnee son named Hawk (Forrest Goodluck).

We are never told the whole story of Glass's life, but he is haunted by recurring flashbacks of the apparent slaying of his wife during one of the many frontier Indian wars of the era.

His wife's voice speaks to him in poetic riddles, a wonderful technique that recalls the profound and brooding voice-overs of Terence Malick's 1998 masterpiece The Thin Red Line. Maybe this is not just a coincidence, since The Revenant's cinematographer, Emmanuel Lubezki, has worked on Terence Malick's most recent films.

Within the party itself, there is tension and conflict. Our interest is immediately focused on the other main protagonist of the film, John Fitzgerald (Tom Hardy). Hardy plays this character with such subtlety and precision that he nearly steals the movie.

The great quest, played out against a stark landscape

Fitzgerald is one of those personality types we find in nearly every large collection of adventurers or soldiers. He is not lacking in physical courage, but nevertheless is entirely without a moral compass. He cares about his own money and his own survival, and not very much about anything else.

And when the chips are down, his egoism dominates his every action. Perhaps his background has something to do with it: we learn that he was once attacked by Indians and scalped. If so, his trauma has turned him into a self-seeking monster, able to lie, cheat, and kill without hesitation.

Hardy has been everywhere in film in recent years, yet this role must rank among his best. His accent and demeanor are so impeccable that we barely recognize him. Hardy can do accents: those who doubt this should hear his Welsh accent in his 2014 film Locke.

Soon after the attack by the Ree tribe, Glass is mauled by a bear in one of the most incredible and unique fight scenes every put on film. I have no idea how this scene was put together, but it is entirely convincing, to the extent that I could nearly feel the grizzly's teeth scraping against my skull.

Glass survives the attack, but just barely. The remaining members of the party then are forced to decide whether to carry him or leave him to his fate. Carrying him soon proves impossible. So the plan is to have a few men stay behind, for a promised reward, and try to nurse him back to health. Fitzgerald is among those chosen, along with Glass's son and another hapless young hunter.

As might be expected, Fitzgerald soon turns to treachery. He murders Hawk and tricks the other hunter into abandoning Glass to his fate. And thus the stage is set for the most epic story of survival and suffering ever put on film.

Abandoned and left for dead

We are told that The Revenant took nine months of grueling location shooting to piece together. The cast and crew flew to remote locales in Argentina, Canada, and the United States, and all filming was done in natural light. We are thus immersed completely in the blood-freezing beauty and power of Nature, with no filters or barriers between us and the great Reality.

There is no sentimentality here. The Indians are neither glamorized or idealized (as in Dances With Wolves). They are presented exactly as what they were: a people like any other, with the capacity to inflict extreme cruelties as well as the most transcendent kindnesses.

None of the characters are one-dimensional, either. They all act with the logic of their own internal voices; and even Fitzgerald, after a time, seems to elicit a small measure of sympathy. As for Glass, his quest for vengeance becomes all-consuming, and by the end of the film he has been transformed into almost an agent of Fate.

Like any great film, The Revenant is not perfect. Its running time may be too long for some, and some of the characters overlook obvious holes in Fitzgerald's lies that are too stark to ignore. But these points are very minor, and do not diminish to impact of the whole.

Immerse yourself in the immensity of Creation, and allow Nature's frozen gray and white colors to grip you by the throat. Feel the poetry of the limitless scenery, and the mystical mantras that appear in the voiceovers.

The final scene is just right. For we are left with an agent of Fate that has accomplished its purpose, but must now dare to search for a new reason for being.

Read More: How To Create Your Own List Of Precepts

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Human Resources Departments Are Ruining STEM Jobs For Men

January 12, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

Due to the infiltration of political correctness and diversity into most American job fields, it's harder than ever for a man to get or hold a job. The last bastions of traditional meritocratic careers are the STEM fields, and they are that way simply because they're hard and require more effort and intelligence than the average desk chair job. They're a little more resistant to the spreading virus of "everyone's equal and women more than most" that the PC crowd is pushing—but not for long.

I work in production engineering for the largest car company in the world, and, although the women-driven PC crap doesn't fly back in Japan, the American operations branches of the company are about halfway zombified with it. Here are four ways that Human Resources and the PC culture are ruining the technical fields of America, and how to fight it.

1. Hiring Lazy Idiots

When I interviewed for the job, I was interviewed by HR. The only technical things were to study a simple part and sketch from memory, then identify which part of a car was represented in a print. No questions about your aptitude, or whether you're a gearhead or afraid to get your hands dirty.

HR can't ask the right questions in an interview because they don't know how much work, dirt, and sweat goes into keeping the plants running. No questions about technical problem-solving, mechanical skills, or work ethic are ever asked. When a loser does the hiring, you see a lot of losers getting hired.

The entry salaries are driven down to a level where top-tier people won't apply for the jobs. When the co-ops who come to you for a term during their college end up going someplace more profitable, you know that "lean manufacturing" is not a term to apply to the salaries of your people that matter.

How To Fight It:

In an interview you should strike a balance between a "people person" who can communicate, and an "expert" who has the technical knowledge to actually do the job. Nerd engineers are out, but poseurs have never been in. You can never go wrong talking up your work ethic and desire to learn new things.

Know what you're worth, and negotiate for it up front. The ONLY time you will have any say over your pay is at the hiring table, because, once you're in, you're playing by their rules. Engineers get pay raises by jumping companies; you can't negotiate out of college because you have to get a job, but once you have a job already, hold out for what you're worth at the offer stage; if they're serious, they'll play ball.

2. Pushing Diversity To An Unrealistic “Balanced” Standard

Because your skin color and vagina will help you design stuff that works.

There are more positions available in a corporation than just the technical ones. I live and work in the Midwest, and the cars are built by white, straight, Christian men, the machines are maintained by the same, and the equipment is sourced by engineers who are that also. This is seen as a problem by HR, which wants the overall demographics in the company to fit some arbitrary national standard, even if it means hiring all five or so black people that live in the area.

All the non-technical areas get stacked with women and minorities. Any job that doesn’t require intelligence or work ethic, and can be filled by anyone, gets filled by someone “of diversity.” When you’re slammed on a deadline for a project, you get to explain to someone who was just hired for their vagina why they are personally imperiling the chances of the plant actually running tomorrow and then watch them not give a shit because they can’t understand real work and never will.

It is also not enough to have your company represent the national demographic averages, but the management has to as well. This means that racial minorities, women, and the GLBBQ get promoted for irrelevant traits instead of their merit.

How To Fight It:

The key here is to get your contacts and know who is competent and who is isn’t. We have a lady in each plant location in our department, and each one of them controls the keys to the kingdom by knowing all the shortcuts. Likewise, your talented industrial maintenance guy, or fabricator, out on the plant floor will help you, as well as fellow engineers in other areas. Once you have found the competent people, help them with their issues in a fast and correct manner, and they will remember and return the favor. Be sure to thank them.

The solution for people that suck is to go around, over, or through them. Never use profanity or be at all inappropriate, but if they’re holding you up, pass it to your superiors or burn them down in a meeting. You are not the hammer, but sometimes you can select the rock to be pounded.

3. Everyone Is Of Equal Importance

Now that rating on intelligence or skill is considered discrimination, people are evaluated on their “passion.” This causes “promotion of the loudest,” and means the people in charge are the ones that are the most worked up. Logical thought goes out the window and it’s replaced by the measure of your worth being how much you act like you care.

Caring about your job enough to work hard is great, but, if you’re not actually any good, your stuff won’t work no matter how much you cry. The real world is a meritocracy, and eventually in these jobs the narrative fails and shit gets real. This causes salaries to be re-balanced to be “fair,” and means that a glorified secretary can get paid the same as the engineers as they both hold the same job title (usually called something like “specialist.”

How To Fight It:

The solution for this area is to remain grounded in reality. Knowledge is still king, and you will learn more in thirty minutes on the shop floor than you will in eight hours of meetings. Avoid the meetings when you can, know more about the technical problems and the people out there actually dealing with them when you DO have to go to them, and you’ll be able to win. Sweat, dirt, and the shop uniform beats business casual any day of the week; you can tell someone’s worth by how beat up their boots are.

4. You Can’t Get Fired For Incompetence

Grabbing boobs, or punching dudes; about the only way to get walked out.

Since passion has replaced performance, any actual performance reviews have to use such vague language like “commitment to company values.” This allows your supervisor to tweak your review based on his like or dislike of you, but it doesn’t really matter as they never fire anyone anymore for fear of lawsuits. This causes the work to be piled on the ones that can, and the ones that can’t are just sort of there.

About the only thing that can get you fired is violence, sexual harassment, flagrant inappropriate internet use, espionage or theft, or blatant intentional safety violations. They can, however, berate you till you quit, transfer you to shitty projects, or put you out on the road on business travel until your ears bleed, so keep that in mind.

How To Fight It:

Be able to account for your time, and always have something to print out for the boss. Your boss will often only ask for updates from you when he is asked for updates on his people; make him happy. A lot of people work hard at looking like they work hard; coming in early and leaving early is seen as more committed than coming in late and staying late, even if it is the same amount of time. Keep personal stuff off your desk, and take personal calls elsewhere.

If you don’t have enough to do, ask for more if you feel like it, and go out on the plant floor or some place away from the desk if you don’t. Perception is everything.

Conclusion

It’s a different world than it used to be, but being good at your job in these industries still trumps any diversity quota once you get hired. Once you cut through the layers of bullshit, you'll find that the ones that are there at three in the morning on the last nights of the shutdowns making sure the place will run on Monday are the ones that matter.

If you're one of them, or whatever equivalent your particular job field has instead, and if you can keep your mouth shut, you can still make it in these last few job fields still standing.

Read More: We're All Living The Human Resources Nightmare

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

If You Proclaim White People As “Awful,” You’re Good Enough For Harvard’s PhD Program

January 12, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Holly Michelle Wood’s Harvard dissertation focuses on the dating habits of Boston’s singles. She wants to dissect the modern trials of going out.
>
> — Boston Magazine illustrating why fewer and fewer folks are reading Boston Magazine

Harvard PhD candidate Holly Michelle Wood, an anti-free speech extremist (i.e. anything that doesn’t accord with her politics is blatant harassment, racism or sexism), has resorted to repeatedly calling white people “animals.” Hers is a name many readers will be familiar with after the sensational, ideologically motivated Twitter unverification of Milo Yiannopoulos. Feminists have accused Yiannopoulos of “harassing” women by simply retweeting their butthurt responses to his work, including a recent article on start-up guru Paul Graham.

Graham’s quite frankly common sense views on how capitalism and wealth inequality provide the incentive for entrepreneurship and innovation stirred intense hatred. Thousands were sent into a rabid frenzy because Graham, who has operated in the real world and not cloistered avant-garde communes populated by trust fund babies and other socially insulated individuals, made sensible claims that challenge the basic political platform of SJWs.

These are just two of Holly Michelle Wood’s most recent rants on her Twitter profile:

https://twitter.com/girlziplocked/status/685916286556176384

> White people are awful!
>
> Look at Donald Trump or David Cameron!
>
> Ugh beasts. https://t.co/SFAzs61Sl3
>
> — holly wood phd □□ (@girlziplocked) January 9, 2016

Try tweeting “Black people are awful! Look at Idi Amin and Robert Mugabe!” and see how Twitter responds.

And here is the original unacceptable misogyny supposedly engaged in by Yiannopoulos towards Holly Michelle Wood:

https://twitter.com/Nero/status/685142015961645057

After his very violent screencapping of what Holly Michelle Wood herself had said, fellow feminist Catrin Cooper sounded the misogyny alarm:

> .@Support, @Jack,
>
> How many more women does this guy's account need to target before you do something? pic.twitter.com/ytinO5nXUK
>
> — Catrin (@catrincooper) January 7, 2016

With Holly Michelle Wood having tweeted publicly her response to Yiannopoulos’ article, she and Catrin Cooper alleged that he was engaging in harassment by simply redistributing her non-private announcement.

Then along came white knight and Twitter manager Michael Margolis, a Hillary Clinton supporter and long-term Yiannopoulos hater, who also follows Anita Sarkeesian and tranny Brianna Wu, among others:

> @catrincooper @Support @jack reporting him now
>
> — Michael Margolis (@yipe) January 8, 2016

After I asked Catrin Cooper how Milo’s tweets were harassing, she promptly blocked me. Here’s my highly abusive tweet to her:

> .@catrincooper oh so @girlziplocked says "white people are animals" & you think Milo is harassing by screencapping what she says? @Nero
>
> — David Garrett Brown (@DissidentDavid) January 10, 2016

Oh, it’s just Sociology 101

White Zimbabwean couple attacked under the ruthless Mugabe regime. Can’t be racism cos sociology says so.

Holly Wood's take that white people cannot experience racism is unsurprising. Plenty of left wing people, not just those calling themselves sociologists, have appropriated that warped view. But explicitly calling them animals is more unusual, even if most of us suspect that the agenda of many SJWs is a hatred of white men and whites in general.

Michael Margolis, whose Twitter handle @yipe has now become synonymous with Chinese Communist Party-style online censorship, is yet to report Holly Michelle Word with the same public pride he exhibited when turning in Milo Yiannopoulos. Perhaps he's done sociology, too. Nevertheless, it would seem he has been relegated to desk duty, his stupidly public actions having led to the number one Twitter trend, #jesuismilo, until it was halted by Twitter itself.

The fundamental question is whether Harvard itself or Harvard's Sociology Department support Wood's contention that "white people are animals." Return of Kings will be seeking comment from both in the coming days, including from the Dean of Sociology, Dr. Claudine Gay.

Twitter is clamping down on any speech expressions fighting the SJW narrative

> But first, let me take a #selfie
>
> …with @HillaryClinton pic.twitter.com/0XHQ8cQFsQ
>
> — Michael Margolis (@yipe) July 22, 2014

Harassment now includes retweeting or screencapping someone's own publicly accessible words. So says Michael Margolis, the Engineering Manager of a platform which has shed any remaining pretensions about supporting objectively non-threatening free speech.

The days ahead for non-SJW users of Twitter, Reddit, Facebook, and a plethora of other mediums are looking even bleaker than before. Harassment has become the most gerrymandered term for "abuse" in the history of humankind. The threshold for conservatives and traditionalists to be branded as harassers is simply showing the fallacies and histrionics of any SJW they come across.

For SJWs like Holly Michelle Wood, even blanket-labeling ca. 800 million people as animals is perfectly acceptable language.

Postscript: As of publication, Dr. Claudine Gay of Harvard's Sociology Department has not returned my request for comment.

Read More: 9 People In The Media Who Are Upset Jackie Coakley Wasn't Raped By White Men

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 Smells That Will Put A Woman In The Mood

January 12, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Climax University

C'mon then chaps, it's time to own up, we all know the feeling. You're walking down the street and a woman passes you. Though she's pretty, what really turns your head is when she passes close enough for you to get a strong blast of her scent. Some incredible mix of fruity coconut shampoo, body wash, or moisturiser will hit you and you'll suddenly feel a very intense blast down below.

But, this sort of thing isn't just exclusive to men. It's easy for us to think it's just because of our sex drives that we find the scent of a woman so incredibly alluring, but the truth is that there's some genuine biological principles at work here. Men find the scent of a woman incredibly attractive, but it works both ways—women find the scent of a man incredibly attractive too!

Your scent is an absolutely vital part of how attractive your desired partner will find you, and it's a factor that you should be loathe ignoring if you decide you want to pursue a certain person. Money spent on great clothes, hair products, and fancy meals won't do you any good if your intended isn't feeling that unmistakable biological attraction to you deep in the pit of her stomach. Your confidence coach won't get you out of that one.

In your brain smell is a powerful memory trigger, so if you associate a particular scent with sex itself or memories of sexual experiences, the next time you come across that smell your brain will automatically stimulate you in response to your memories. Smell is directly linked to emotions and feelings. The incredible power of smell when it comes to the mating rituals of all species, humans absolutely included, has been scientifically attested for more than thirty years.

This is yet another reason for you to ditch that revolting rubbish they sell in big chain stores and catalogues that masquerades as ‘cologne’ or ‘animal pheromones’, when in fact it should be called ‘petrochemical, solvent, dye and alcohol ridden gunk’. We admit that isn’t much of a catchy name, but it’s certainly more informative when it comes to accurately explaining what those bottles of cologne actually contain.

So not only do you smell like a freshly varnished floor or a second hand car salesman, we’ll let you decide which is worse, in doing so you are actively sabotaging your chances of inspiring sexual interest in members of the opposite sex. Your natural pheromones are what she really wants to smell, so stop covering them up! Now we’re absolutely not saying you should just stop washing altogether, that certainly won’t help, but there are certain products out there that use only natural essences to enhance our natural aromas, rather than covering them up.

The natural scent

Generally speaking, women respond even more strongly to these scents than males do – favouring men with a strongly natural/musky scent. You could argue this is because they seem biologically more powerful/protective/likely to provide strong children, going by our deeply embedded biological instincts. Men too favour the scent of young women as they send of signals of maximum health and fertility – just another reason why granny’s perfume doesn’t do much for you.

Enter Elena Vepritskaya, Ukrainian-born sexologist and aroma-therapist now based in New York. She has concluded that one of the main reasons Americans seem to be having less sex than South Americans and Europeans is directly traceable to more fastidious grooming and hygiene habits.

Western culture, by and large, is highly focused on being hygienic and there are millions of products designed to make us ‘smell clean’. But this almost fetishist focus on being ultra clean is leading us to wash our body’s natural pheromones off every single day, leading to a massive dulling of this innate sexual instinct.

It’s for this exact reason that she has created her own line of attraction scents using only the most natural essential extracts from a variety of plants, flowers, trees and roots. For the last decade she has been advising her male clients on the best way to wash and use her products – shower with natural soap, free of fragrance, towel off and then place a drop of her natural scents on the neck and in the bend of the arms.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zIPcPTQJvwI

So, what top 5 scents make for the most attraction?

1. Lavender

Known for being and incredibly relaxing scent, it could be just the perfect solution to encourage your partner to settle and relax in your company.

2. Bergamot

A strong and citrusy scent that is already used in a massive amount of perfumes and colognes and extremely popular in aroma-therapy.

3. Jasmine

Has been found to be helpful in reversing impotence in men as a result of its ability to stimulate blood circulation in both you and her. Stimulated blood circulation is never unhelpful.

4. Black Pepper

Hot spices can induce sweating and lead to a marked increase in your heart rate. A similar response to what you may find during sexual peaks.

5. Sandalwood

Earthy, woody aroma and part of tantric sex rituals for thousands of years. The clear but not overpowering scent will help stimulate you both in all the right places.

So with this in mind, have a little further think about just how important your scent is when it comes to finding your perfect partner. The science of your scent has been in place for generations and is a powerful force you’ll do well to embrace rather than ignore.

Of course, we’ll say it again; this doesn’t mean that you can get away with just not washing!

You do still have to be clean in order to attract a woman; just don’t let yourself smell like you’ve just crawled out of a vat of petrochemicals.

If you're interested in learning more about Elena's natural scent enhancers, please feel free to visit this website.

So please remember; always keep clean, but let your scent do the real talking!

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

You’ll Have A Hard Time Meeting Girls If Your Style Is Missing These Two Elements

January 13, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the oldest questions in the seduction book is whether or not looks and appearance count when meeting women. To put an end to the years of debate around this issue let me answer it for you unequivocally now: yes, the way you look when you approach women matters. A lot. And the easiest way to look better is to dress well.

But because there are a myriad of different styles and tastes out there, game writers often find it difficult to provide cogent advice in this area. After all, what works for a guy into heavy metal living in the Midwest is unlikely to fly on the boulevards of Paris. In this article, though, I reveal two concepts you should keep in mind when you choose clothes, whatever your individual style or taste may be.

Looks Are Important, But…

The way you look may be important, but you don’t need to be the equivalent of Ryan Gosling or British male model David Gandy. One of the reasons that game is so effective—whether you’re looking for a girlfriend or simply a little low-key female company—is that, fortunately for us, a man’s value extends considerably further than his aesthetics. Confidence, charm, ambition, and social and sexual dominance are all attributes that girls find exciting and attractive. If you can communicate these effectively in interactions with them, then you are likely to be rewarded for doing so. This, in a nutshell, is the essence of game.

However, what some men forget, or perhaps don't fully grasp, is that "game," as we speak of it today, is really a holistic discipline. Yes, the refinement of one's social and interpersonal skills are crucial, but we should all also be striving to improve every aspect of ourselves, from our fitness, to our finances to—yes—our looks.

Of course, there's not a great deal we can do about our facial features (short of plastic surgery) or height, but beyond that almost everything is a realistic candidate for improvement. And one thing's for sure—an ugly dude who is well-groomed and stylish will do a hell of a lot better than one who isn't.

Some might argue that an undue consideration for one's appearance is kowtowing to women. I disagree. Looking good is predominantly about having respect for oneself. And just as the underlying point of game is the effective communication of value, this should also underpin the way you dress.

Think about yourself as a brand. Every element of the way you present yourself externally should have meaning, and that meaning should say something good about you. In this regard, your clothes are every bit as important as whatever clever line you dropped last night in the bar.

Look The Part

But you also need to be realistic. If you want to get with the most attractive girls then you need to look the part. A friend of mine who is just getting into game has steadfastly refused to alter his appearance—perhaps best described as “sporty-slacker-chic”—believing that charm and seductive qualities alone will see him through.

Unfortunately this is just not the case.

At the moment I am seeing a hot and classy English girl who is extremely well-presented and wears elegant clothes, some of them designer. I used all the normal game tactics I espouse here to get with her, but would the deal have been sealed were I not also well-dressed? I doubt it. She’s not a snob and she’s certainly not a gold digger, but she expects a guy who’s with her to “have his shit together.” Wearing ill-fitting, unfashionable clothes or looking like you’re just stepped out of a gym in the 1990s would not have worked.

Think about what the guy you imagine your ideal girl would most realistically be with. What is he wearing? If you don’t measure up, then go back to the drawing board (or the clothes store).

By the way, don’t blame women for this. Would you date a skank in a pair of loose dungarees with tattoos? Probably not. Think about clothes first and foremost as a mode of expression for your own personality, and take them seriously. That they will raise your SMV (sexual market value) in the process is a side-benefit, but a valuable one. Just like when you go to a company to make a sale, secure a job, or raise investment you might as well give yourself the best possible chance by looking presentable.

So, what should you consider when you are out selecting clothes to wear? Forget about the old-school PUA idea of peacocking. If that ever worked then you can bet it was because the guys using it had more going for them that a feather boa and a flashing belt, and it most likely made many more look like fools. In my view it is these two things you should keep in mind: power and mystique.

1. Power

Remember, game is all about communicating value, and what better value is there to display than power?

Now, before people get the idea that this is all about wearing Armani suits and Tag watches, remember that power can mean a variety of things. Yes, there is the power that comes with wealth and influence, either political or commercial. But there is also the muscular power of the male body. Or the creative power of the rock musician, or the sporting power of the pro-athlete.

Have a look at what you're wearing now and ask yourself honestly whether it makes you look powerful in any way. If you're wearing a baggy old polo shirt, some chinos and a pair of old sneakers then the answer is probably no. I'm not suggesting you have to jettison these for a blazer and pocket square, as that may not be your thing, but what you must do is ensure that your clothes tell people that you are a together individual who possesses power of some kind.

This looks sharp and communicates power in terms of money, influence, and confidence

And this does not. Based on clothes alone who do you think will get the most tail?

A very simple was of doing this is to ensure that your clothes fit well. This is also dependent on local fashions, but I would suggest that in general tight and well-fitting trumps baggy. For one thing, a slim-cut pair of jeans will show off your physique much better than a baggy pair. This in itself will make you look more masculine and powerful. And a sharp-fitting suit jacket or a classic biker jacket will look a lot better than a hoodie (despite the billionaires of Silicon Valley).

2. Mystique

The pocket square and the sunglasses are interesting details that add a little mystique to Craig's look here

An ill-fitting and generic hoodie like this does not do the same for this guy

Which leads on to the second point – never be generic. You should instead always try to ensure that your clothes look just a little bit different, just a little bit unique, to communicate a little mystique. This is different to the old concept of peacocking in that you shouldn't allow it to take over your whole outfit. Instead, you should just add little splashes of colour or detail—such as a designer pocket square, or cufflinks, or an unconventionally-cut coat—that mark you out as an individual rather than a neck-bearded loon.

Women love a man who is hard to pin down. If you're an open book then you are not creating enough attraction. So try to bear this in mind when you are choosing clothes and incorporate little touches that make her wonder about you.

Above all, you must get into the habit of thinking seriously about your wardrobe and remember that everything that you wear is not only a reflection of your personality, but that this is also being communicated loud and clear to everyone around you. I'm not saying don't do casual or dressed down, but I am saying make sure that it's well-fitting and stylish.

Work on this area of your life to make yourself stand out—and why not give yourself the best chance of succeeding with women possible?

Read More: How to Be Seen By Women As An Alpha Male

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Coming Soon To A Society Near You: Polygamy And Incest

January 13, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

On the issue of homosexual marriage, there have been many dissenters pointing to the dissolution of tradition and the elevation of one class of people over another, and why this matters for straight men. One other aspect worth thinking about is where the arguments supporting same-sex marriage will lead.

A Thought Experiment

Let's see where this all leads

"Consenting adults should be able to do whatever they want if they're not hurting anyone."

This has been the rallying cry for homosexual marriage advocates over the last two decades, along with “why do you care what people do if it doesn’t affect you?” In this article, I’ll take this rationale to its logical conclusion: Incest and polygamy.

Support for homosexual marriage has been buttressed by the idea that loving, consenting adults should be allowed the same status as traditional couples. They’re “born this way” and by denying them the right to marry society is treating them as second-class citizens. Consent has been of utmost importance to same-sex marriage supporters, as it has been in other debates centering on sex. But consider the following scenario:

John is a 58-year-old man who is on vacation with his 30 year-old son. One day they decide it would be fun if they tried making love. They both found they enjoyed it and after a few more sessions decide they want legal recognition in the form of marriage for their newfound commitment to each other. Should they be allowed to do this?

Provide some reasons why they shouldn’t, and they’ll likely be the same reasons opponents of same-sex marriage have given for why homosexuals shouldn’t get married. “It’s disgusting,” “It’s wrong,” “It’s unnatural.” Yet by the reasoning of allowing same-sex marriage, this scenario should be perfectly fine. Incest between opposite sex family members can be shot down by citing biological deformities that can occur in their offspring.

But why shouldn’t a man be allowed to marry his grandson if they’re both adults? Why shouldn’t a woman be allowed to marry her mother? These are ideas that can’t be refuted if we accept that consenting adults should be allowed to do whatever they want, the standard refrain from homosexual marriage supporters. By the way, bestiality, the idea that leftists point to and laugh at, does not fit into this framework—animals can’t consent, but a man and his brother can.

Polygamy Is Around The Corner

The new normal

Plural marriage, or polygamy, is on the horizon as well. This is something that is guaranteed to happen for three reasons. First, if a group of adults want to get married, they can co-opt the reasons homosexuals used and apply it to their own situation. They'll claim that loving, consenting adults should have their marital arrangement recognized by the state. Supporters of homosexual marriage must acknowledge that this is where their reasoning leads.

A second reason is distribution of finances and time. While some might claim that polygamy will negatively impact the well-being of children, they could refute that argument by pointing to the fact that this was also something homosexual marriage opponents claimed. Moreover, even if this were true and could justify restricting plural marriage rights, they could claim that polygamy is good for children, because more adults are available to share the physical, financial, and emotional demands of caring for them. For them, any difficulties would be outweighed by this benefit.

Bear in mind that a generation ago, a worker with a steady job could support a family, own a house, and send a child to college. At a certain point some may deem it necessary to have three workers to be a successful family unit. Some may respond to the changing economy by forming economic groups of several people in one marriage. One income used to be enough to raise and provide for a family, now families require two incomes. Soon it will be three or more.

This leads to the third reason why polygamy will be legalized: the benefit of the state. Isn't it interesting that as soon as women started entering the workforce in droves, households required two incomes to sustain themselves? The system understood that by encouraging women to work, they would increase the amount of producers and taxpayers. Expect to see wages continue to dwindle as support for plural marriage rises and the state co-opts the polygamy movement. The system will be able to pay workers less while simultaneously appearing "progressive" and "enlightened" on the issue of polygamy and appeasing the supporters of the upcoming movement.

Broken Families = Mindless Consumers

Be a good little producer for one corporation, so you can give money to another one for entertainment

Along the same lines, polygamy will destabilize families, and cause each person to care less about any member of their family. With multiple parents and offspring not bonded by blood living together, the natural connection that forms within nuclear families will collapse. They'll look for fulfillment in another way: By consuming— trendy foods, the newest iPhone, Taylor Swift, franchise movies, Netflix binges, Instagram, celebrity gossip, etc. This is already happening as families have broken apart, and it will accelerate.

In sum, arguments supporting homosexual marriage can also be used to support incest and polygamy. Furthermore, as support for these movements grows, the system will seize this opportunity to co-opt the movement in order to pay workers less while maintaining an equal amount of producers and consumers, all under the guise of progress.

Read More: We're Only Three Small Steps Away From Legalized Pedophilia

Rod Berne

Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

Black Cricket Player Fined $10,000 For Asking White Reporter Out On A Date

January 13, 2016 | by Jack Package | Link | Original Link

Over the past week, another example of non-issue hysteria has been created in the Australian media, further feeding the need for female indignation. The following interview is what started the response:

The man being interviewed is Chris Gayle, a professional cricketer from Jamaica. The interview was held shortly after Gayle left the field after being dismissed in a T20 match for Melbourne vs. Hobart. Gayle currently holds the record for the highest score in a domestic T20 game of 175 not out. This is only one of the many records that Gayle currently holds. His full player bio can be found here.

Off the field, Gayle has always been known as a smooth “ladies’ man.” It is his on-field performances, and his laid-back attitude and flamboyant lifestyle off the field, that have made him one of the more known and likable characters in world cricket today. It is also because of his character that he behaved in this way in the interview with Mel McLaughlin

The response from Mel McLaughlin

The response in the days after the event from the journalist who interviewed Gayle has to be applauded. McLaughlin could have easily used this to set herself up as a professional victim. However, her take on this is that while she was uncomfortable at the time, it isn’t a big a deal. Notice in the interview here she was continually trying to get those interviewing her to get over it as she wanted to talk about what she is actually paid to talk about… cricket.

Even though McLaughlin has accepted that Gayle didn’t mean to cause offence and she wants to move on, others in the media couldn’t accept this and are continuing with their assault on Gayle. While pretending to care about the welfare of McLaughlin, the people interviewing her in the video above don’t seem to care that she was feeling uncomfortable in continually having to answer the same question as to whether she felt harassed or not.

The media response

Chris has currently been fined $10,000 for this “offence,” but even the most novice of fortune tellers could have predicted that wasn’t the end of it. There are currently countless articles vilifying Gayle’s actions from a plethora of media channels on this issue, but the worst of all these is that the most respected source for cricket news the world over (ESPNCricinfo) has published these articles.

Much in the same way that Gamergate began with articles claiming that “gamers are dead,” cricket journalist Dan Brettig is also trying to lecture to men that we need to bend over backwards to accommodate women into another section of what used to be a male space. This was then backed up by a “cricket feminist” claiming that women’s cricket is just as good as men’s, as well as the usual garbage of wanting to introduce quota systems onto cricket administration boards.

Out of fear of becoming the next target for feminist sabotage, the chairman of Cricket Australia Jamie Sutherland has shown support for those wanting harsh penalties on Gayle. The media are currently and quite successfully calling for Gayle to be sacked, and it is now likely that Gayle won’t be part of the next season. Similar to how Bill Cosby had his name tarnished by claims of harassment in the name of publicity, so too has someone come out months after the event allegedly occurred to say that Gayle exposed himself to a female journalist in Sydney during the Cricket World Cup in February 2015:

This journalist is from the same company (Fairfax media) where Gayle was previously employed as a guest columnist. Even though Gayle has denied the allegations and there hasn’t been a single piece of evidence shown to prove this allegation, we can safely assume that Gayle won’t be employed to contribute any columns to this paper in the future.

The public response

The public response to this has been much polarized. After reading the comments sections from various new sources, there have been a surprising amount of people who are getting sick of being lectured to by leftist PC thought police. A lot of people are seeing this “incident”—a man complimenting a woman and then asking her out for a drink. There are, of course, those of the public who have joined the media in blowing this out of proportion.

People are now rightly so comparing this incident to one of Maria Sharapova flirting with a male journalist in a press conference:

This issue has nothing to do with whether Gayle made the journalist uncomfortable or not. The PC zombies are instead outraged that a man would take steps to fulfill his own sexual strategy rather than passively waiting in line so that women have full control in fulfilling theirs. Gayle putting a woman on the spot scares women and manginas because he is showing that they don’t always have full control. This is also why the red pill is so offensive to most women.

This issue will more than likely blow over in the next couple of days. However, with more and more examples of issues like this coming up each day, it might have the same effect of opening the eyes of a number of men to the feminizing of society.

Read More: Congratulations To Feminists For Helping Import Actual Rape Culture To Germany

Jack Package
Jack Package is an avid cricket enthusiast watching and playing the game for over 20 years.

International Meetup Day: Do You Live In One Of These Cities?

January 13, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Over 200 men have signed up to be hosts for International Meetup Day On February 6, meaning it will be one of the largest single-day meetups the world has seen. The only problem is that we're missing hosts for a handful of cities that are in our top 50 most trafficked. If you're from one of the below cities, I ask that you fill out the hosting form so that your city also has a meetup on February 6.

North America

Charlotte, North Carolina, USA
Columbus, Ohio, USA
Edmonton, Canada
Houston, Texas, USA
San Francisco, California, USA

Other

Adelaide, Australia
Brisbane, Australia
Dublin, Ireland
Helsinki, Finland

I can't accept any new hosts if your city is not on the above list because I've reached a limit before the logistics really get out of hand.

The hardest part of planning so far is identifying meeting points that are unambiguous and make it easy for you to find other tribesmen. Statues, fountains, squares, and small parks work best. I've been spending a lot of time making images like this:

For the meetup in Brussels

Of course we can't predict how many people will show up, and in the case of smaller towns, if anyone will show up at all, but this risk is worth it if a successful meetup allows men to connect with each other in a way they couldn't before. Read my introductory post on the meetup to understand why I'm doing this.

Hosts have stepped forward from exotic locations in China, Japan, India, Bahamas, and Nepal. We also have a lot of smaller towns covered in the American heartland and throughout Europe. Once the finalized city list and instructions are published here on January 19, I will promote it vigorously to ensure the word gets out. If you are a host, I will email you on January 18 with further information.

Don't Miss: International ROK Meetup Day: February 6, 2016

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Kratom Can Make 2016 Your Best Year Yet

January 13, 2016 | by Sponsored Post | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Herbal Samurai

Kratom is something that was featured prominently here on ROK in 2015. A lot of forward thinking men got their hands on kratom and made excellent use of it to improve their lives in a multitude of different ways.

2016 could be the year that you absolutely shatter your financial, sexual, and personal goals. Kratom is one of the rare compounds that actually works and has had life-changing benefits for thousands of men. Guys find that it makes their goals much easier to achieve.

For the newcomers to ROK, and the guys who have not yet experienced Kratom's profound benefits, now is the perfect time to join the club.

[image]

What Is Kratom?

Kratom is a natural herbal plant from Southeast Asia has been traditionally used to drastically lower anxiety, increase motivation, and uplift mood. It has also been historically used to increase pro-social behaviour as well as productivity. In fact, it's been relied upon for centuries for these exact purposes in Asia. They swear by it.

Most users find that lower doses of 2 – 4 grams are quite energizing, and higher amounts at 4 – 7 grams are sedating and calming. A quick internet search will show some ways of using it, with the most common being simply mixing it with water.

It comes in a variety of different strains, with red strains typically being the most relaxing, green strains being uplifting and motivating, and white strains being stimulating and pro-social. Users across the board report virtually zero negatives and it's legal just about everywhere.

[image]

How Kratom Can Help You Accomplish Your Big Goals This Year:

1. Kratom Can Help You Build A Successful Online Business

The reality today is that more and more young guys are making a significant amount of money on the internet. If you are not, you are missing out big time. The positives of having a successful online business are numerous: money, no schedule, and the ability to act like a man without fear of losing your job due to lunatic SJW's and chubby feminists.

Men that are younger and less intelligent than you are making good money online. Whether it's e-commerce, blogging, affiliate marketing, or something else… online business is not difficult. It does require consistent time put in though.

Kratom is the very best compound most ever find for focusing for long periods of time. It can make it much easier to put the work in on one's business. It's a powerful productivity tool, and it could very well be the #1 reason that you succeed this year at building a highly profitable online business.

Best Strains For Building A Business: Productive Green Samurai, Swift Samurai, Energetic White Samurai, Strong Samurai

2. Kratom Can Help You Finally Shatter Approach Anxiety

Just like you do not want to rely on a job for your income, you absolutely do not want to rely on social circle as your sole source of sex. That's an inefficient and unreliable road to take. Just like online business is a fantastic path to financial freedom, beating approach anxiety is key to a great sex life for most guys.

Knowing you can meet attractive girls whenever and wherever you want to is a game-changer. It is not that uncommon for guys to go from tagging 5 girls one year, to 25 girls the next after beating approach anxiety.

[image]

Kratom can be dynamite for men with lingering approach anxiety (that's all of us at some point or another). Guys find that the anxiety-reducing effects allow them to get out of fear mode and initiate confidently with hot girls in both bars and during the daytime. It also makes them more pro-social, so the interactions tend to flow better right up to actually banging her. As a bonus, most find it lets them last a lot longer in bed too.

Best Strains For Beating AA: Chiller Samurai, Golden Samurai, Calm Red Samurai, Sleepy Samurai

3. Kratom Can Let You Have More Fun In 2016

[image]

Maybe 2015 wasn't a great year for you. Maybe you live North of 40 latitude and winter blues got you down. Maybe you live in a crappy city but you're not set to move just yet.

In any case, really killing your goals this year will be exponentially easier if you're having a good time doing it. Guys agree that kratom can keep the good moods constant and help a man stay relaxed.

You've probably thought about what you want out of 2016. If you are serious about it, 2016 will be a challenging but rewarding year. Kratom can make it easier and more fun for you.

Best Strains For Overall Lifestyle Enhancement: Bali Samurai, Elite Samurai, Tranquil Green Samurai

Where To Get Kratom?

If you want Kratom to be your sparkplug in 2016, you need to use the highest grade available.

You can buy elite quality kratom from Herbal Samurai. They carry the very best product, which will enable you to experience Kratom's full benefits.

[image]

You'll get your order in 2 or 3 days tops and the products will be fresh, clean, and well packaged.

They've got the perfect starter pack that offers three versatile strains for productivity, approach anxiety, and relaxation all for a great deal.

Check them out at Herbalsamurai.com. You're in good hands.

Disclaimer: All statements made within this article have not been evaluated by the Food and Drug Administration. This product is not intended to diagnose, treat, cure, or prevent any disease. Nothing contained in this article is medical advice. This article is written explicitly for entertainment purposes and everything written is an account of the personal experiences of individuals. Kratom is not sold for human consumption.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

How Your Feelings Of Guilt Are Being Weaponized Against You

January 14, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Recently, I was chatting with a German friend about the sexual assaults in Cologne of women by the “rapefugees” that had been invited into the country by Chancellor Merkel.

I asked my friend if he thought that public opinion was turning against Germany’s open door policy for third world immigrants. He said that while people were beginning to question the wisdom of the policy, most Germans still felt guilty about what happened in World War II. Germans have been so brow beaten for events that happened 70 years ago, that they feel obligated to commit civilizational suicide.

Collective guilt has been effectively used by our elites to engineer Western societies to fit their utopian vision. If we are going to make any progress in rolling back these transformations, we need to get rid of toxic collective guilt. Here are some examples of collective guilt.

World War II

A citizen of a country cannot be held responsible for the actions of his government. For example, I opposed the US invasion of Iraq by President Bush, but my opposition had no bearing on his decision. Even those citizens who supported the war are not to blame because Americans were sold a rosy picture of how the war would proceed. The blame for the war lies solely with President Bush and his advisers.

Similarly, the German people are not responsible for the actions of Hitler and the National Socialists. Hitler ran on a platform of restoring the dignity of Germany after its humiliation under the Treaty of Versailles—not on a platform of conquering Europe or murdering Jews.

Japan is another nation that was made to feel guilty for its role in World War II. As part of its surrender, Japan, like Germany, was forced to give up its martial character even though this was an integral part of Japanese culture. The rise of effeminate men in both Germany and Japan is partly the result of the evisceration of the martial culture of both countries after the war.

The Holocaust

German women in lying in the streets of Berlin after having been raped and murdered by the Red Army.

The Holocaust weighs heavily on everyone’s conscience. Some have argued that Europeans and Americans must take on millions of African and Arab “refugees” because they failed to take in Jewish refugees who were fleeing the Holocaust.

While the Holocaust was a terrible event, it is far from the worst of the mass murders that occurred even just in the twentieth century. Approximately 12 million people—6 million Jews and 6 million Christians and Gypsies—lost their lives in the Nazi death camps, but murders perpetrated by Marxist regimes were far worse.

Conservative estimates put the number of people murdered by the Soviet regime at a staggering 61 million. The People's Republic of China killed 76.7 million of its own people. And in Cambodia, Pol Pot and his followers murdered 2 million people out of a population of 7 million.

By the way, the WWII Allies don't have anything to be proud of either. They were unnecessarily merciless with the defeated enemy. Journalist Michael Walsh wrote:

> Typically, British administered prisoner-of-war camps were worse than [Nazi death camp] Belsen long after the war had ended and war disruption ceased. Tragically even civilians were illegally held, deported and murdered in the tens of thousands.

Walsh recounts other atrocities inflicted on the German POWs including starvation, torture, and slavery.

The Soviets were even more monstrous towards Germans. Soviet troops raped over 2 million German women—some of them up to 70 times. About 240,000 women died as a result of those rapes.

Rather than feeling guilty about these atrocities, learn lessons on how to avoid them in the future—and move on. Don't select one and hold it above all the others.

Slavery

Muslims have a rich history of slavery down to the present day.

American slavery is a similar situation. It is most definitely a black mark (no pun intended) upon American history. The guilt that some white Americans have over slavery is so acute that it probably played a large reason in them voting for Obama—even though he is not descended from slaves.

I've spoken to college graduates—products of the American educational system—who think that Africans are the only people who have ever been held as slaves. The truth is that slavery was widely practiced in history and almost every group of people was enslaved at one point or another.

The Romans had Greek, British, English, and German slaves. The Persians held slaves from all over their empire. The Arabs were notorious slave traders. The Turks preyed on white Christians and enslaved them. And some etymologists speculate that the Slavic peoples derive their very name, “Slav,” from the fact that they were slaves at some point.

If you really want to get your shorts in a bunch about slavery, don’t vote for some incompetent black guy—work to stop the slavery that still exists today. About 35,800,000 people are still held as slaves throughout the world. Muslims are responsible for much of this modern slavery, but because Islam is the darling of the Left, there is very little reporting on the topic.

Feminism

Every battle that feminism has won has been the result of guilt. Early feminists lobbied to be allowed to vote because, how can you love your mother, but deny her the vote?

The liberalization in divorce laws was also supposed to help women. Back in the patriarchal days, women who were abused by their husbands had no way out of terrible marriages. They were stuck with a philandering or physically abusive husband. Men felt guilty so they liberalized the divorce laws. Now, women are not stuck in terrible marriages. They are free to get a divorce so that they can escape a philandering or physically abusive boyfriend.

Guilt also drove the affirmative action policies that women now benefit from. Because women were oppressed homemakers in the past, companies and universities must now give them preferential treatment in hiring and admissions. Now women are free to spend their reproductive years toiling in a cubical to increase the bottom line of a multinational corporation. So much win!

Conclusion

There are many other things that we feel guilty about: climate change, starving children in Africa, Asian sweatshops, colonialism, the crusades, the Iraq War, and paying Jennifer Lawrence less than her male co-stars. But the truth is that all of this is fake guilt because there is nothing that you could have done to change the outcome.

Fake collective guilt is toxic because it gets us to accept the bad policies of the social engineers. They promise that if we just make this one change, all of our fake guilt will be expiated. But we find that no matter how many changes we make, the fake collective guilt remains like Lady Macbeth's spot.

This year, drop all of your collective guilt. Instead, feel guilty only about things that you have personally done wrong. By taking responsibility for our own actions, we will make the world much better than any of the legislation pushed by the social engineers.

Read More: Understanding The Difference Between Guilt And Shame

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

14 Essential Subjects That We'll Teach Children At The ROK International School

January 14, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

As I get older, I need to plan ahead and choose between a life of casual sex, a life focused on family, or reconcile the two. But whatever the choice, I intend to have children. Once I turn again into soil, I want my name to live on.

A debate is raging among us who want to have children about education. Some are strong partisans of home schooling. I for one have seen the damage caused to children who did not socialize with others. I cannot imagine an education for my progeny without being with their peers. On the other hand, there is no way I will drop them into today's toxic school system.

The solution? Welcome to the newly created ROK K-12 International Boarding School. The courses for our students will span from the age of 5 until they reach 18.

Our Board Of Education (B.O.E.)

The board is the supreme authority in matter of education and the choice of the subjects. Once fathers read our conditions and sign, they have no right to influence what we teach or not. We will closely monitor the child's progress with them.

There will be no interventions by parents regarding our disciplinary procedures. We are the law. They can always choose another school. We insist on the fathers completing the education of their children at home as much as humanly possible.

Our school will not be free, but it will be cheaper than the zombie factories they call schools nowadays. Should our school prove successful in results and satisfaction of the parents, we can think about creating a University. Now we move on to the main subjects taught at the school.

1. Practical knowledge and economy

It will include life lessons and tips with subjects as broad as “How to generate stable income?”, “How to pay your taxes (or not)?”, “1001 methods for success in life and in battle,” “How the system is rigged,” and “Stop buying shit you don’t need.”

2. Oratorical arts, eloquence, and politeness class

How to speak well in public. Good manners, etiquette and respect of the elders. The keys to convince your audience. How to establish an argumentation based on facts (does not apply to green-haired landwhales).

3. Manual crafts

Optional course if the fathers sign a note ensuring that this is being taught at home. It will include wood working, plumbing, how to repair a roof, build a house or a boat, change tires, metalworking, welding, and how to fix a car.

4. Foreign languages

Courses will be given in English, as it will be the native tongue of the majority of the parents and children, but foreign language options will be included. Chinese, German, Spanish, French and others can be taught as a second language. A Latin or Ancient Greek option is available.

5. English

A tremendous part of our school's program. It will include dictation, reading, creative writing, handwriting, and calligraphy, plus spelling classes.

It will also focus on how to correctly address people and write spotless correspondence without spelling mistakes. The literature used as a resource will have to be approved by the B.O.E.

6. Sports

Compulsory course. Mens sana in corpore sano.

Sports for boys will include effective martial arts (boxing, jiu jitsu, wrestling, sambo, muay thai), weightlifting (adapted to their young age and growth), fitness, shooting etc. The board is currently discussing incorporating football, basketball, rugby and medieval fencing or proposing them as optional. Fathers' suggestions are welcome.

Sports for girls will include gymnastics, fitness (limited weight training), equestrian sports, and dancing. Regular competitions and school carnivals will be held.

7. Mathematics

The basics will be taught: addition, subtraction, multiplication, division, spatial geometry, percentages. If more is needed, a maths club could be created as an extracurricular activity. Personally, you will find my sons at the game workshop.

8. History

A dominant subject which will not be squashed in a joint course with geography. It will teach the glory of Ancient Rome, Ancient Greece, the Middle Ages, the Renaissance (how we softened up), and the Revolutions (mainly listing traitors and the dark forces that work behind the curtain), the World Wars, and our vision of contemporary history and how it all went bloody head over biscuit.

Focus will be brought on historical figures such as great leaders, war chiefs, tactical geniuses, male explorers and scientists and European History without neglecting great minds from abroad.

Fathers are strongly advised to bring additional historical knowledge to their children in the comfort of their own home. But if you want the history of softies or feminists, you are more than welcome to choose another school.

9. Outdoor activities (for boys)

Navigation, trek, botanical knowledge, tracking, shelter building, fire making, survival techniques, first aid, etc.

10. Game (for boys)

Neomasculinity, frame keeping, the history of the red pill, “zero fucks given” course, night game, day game and University game. Basics in dancing. Escalation 101 and body language studies. Dads are required to do their part at home.

11. Feminine values (for girls)

Cooking, being a good host, sewing, childcare, infant first aid, etiquette, child nutrition, manners, eloquence, household economy, how to behave and not to behave in society, the keys on being feminine, art class. No focus will be given on a hypothetical professional career. The school will focus on making future wives and mothers out of them.

12. Theology, morals, and justice

This one has to be discussed by the B.O.E before including it or not in our curriculum, as every man has a different approach to it and a different idea of what good is.

Also which religion(s) will be taught and to what extent? It could be an optional course chosen by the fathers, or it could be entirely their responsibility.

13. Cultural and travel studies

This one is self-explanatory. Geography, civilizations, capitals, landscapes of the world etc. However, the school will not teach students everything. They will have to complete the study on their own. Our school will include a dedicated program of overseas excursions, to prepare our young minds to study abroad if they wish. Girls will not be allowed to study abroad.

14. Sciences

Biology, physics, anatomy, archaeology, why does my head hurt when I bang it on the table… the works.

FAQs:

Q: Will my children watch television at school or have access to the Internet?

A: No television or internet available at school apart from the video resources necessary for the lessons, under strict control of the teachers and the B.O.E.

Q. Where will the school be situated?

A: In a country where school is not compulsory, or where we can use the local laws on home schooling to our advantage. There we can create and fund our school. It will be implanted in a land that respects traditional family values and models.

Q. Why should I choose the ROK school for my children?

A: The school will protect your progeny from the toxic influence of modern multicultural society. Our goal is to run in autonomy from the rest of the world while the child's mind is still developing. After that, it is up to you.

Q. Is this project realistic?

A: If the degenerates from Gaia Democratic School have the legal right to teach after taking kids on a field trip to a sex shop, so do we.

Q: Who are the teachers?

A. Our method of recruitment for the best teachers available will be drastic and merciless. Main subjects will be taught by male teachers except the board-approved feminine activities teachers. Extracurricular activities can be taught by approved female teachers provided that they are capable, young, pretty, and feminine.

Q. How about discipline?

A. Discipline will be dealt with internally. It will be severe but just. If the teacher does not have authority, how can he be expected to teach?

Q. How does my child qualify for the school?

A: A long and thorough inquiry on the father will be lead by the board. The application reviewed by the board will be accepted or not based on the father's criteria and interview, but also the physical and mental abilities of the child.

Q. Should the mother be present during the inquiry?

A: No, since the school's kitchen will be closed during the father's interview.

Additional questions will have to be addressed:

- Should our teachers use corporal punishment?
- Should there be an uniform?
- Should girls be able to attend the school at all? Should they have common classes with the boys?
- Should we aim at awarding a diploma that complies with international standards?
- How close should it be to the Prussian Education system?
- Who among our eminent writers should teach and which subjects?
- Should the school be guarded by armed security? (Our program would make more than one feminist froth to the mouth and create more enemies that we already have.)

We welcome your suggestions on the additional courses that should be implemented in our future school's program.

Read More: Being Popular In School Is Overrated

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

ROK Podcast: Interview With Roosh About The Year Ahead

January 14, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We’re proud to bring you the second Return of Kings Podcast, recorded January 12, 2016.

This episode features an all new interview with Roosh, as well as discussion of recent articles, recent events, and reader comments.

Tune in!

On YouTube:

iTunes

Read More: Return Of Kings Podcast No. 1 Is Here

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

5 Simple Steps For Not Getting Raped

January 15, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Periodically, I feel drawn to take time from my personal life to serve others. This week in place of an article for men about neomasculinity, I will be presenting a public service for American women facing the threat of rape.

Background

Recently, Germany has allowed thousands of refugees from the Syrian war, where Western powers are assisting rebels allied with the Islamic State to overthrow the sovereign leader of Syria, Bashar al Assad, in a bloody and violent conflict that has raged on for years. Interestingly, refugees only began appearing in significant numbers over the last few months, while the war in Syria began almost 5 years ago in 2011.

These refugees have fled in large numbers to western Europe, with Germany, as of November, accepting over 57,000, with an expected total of over 100,000 once existing applications are processed. Meanwhile they housed over 700,000 asylum seekers temporarily in 2015, paying them a stipend of 143 euros for basic needs. These immigrants, arriving in large numbers and over a short time period, have overwhelmed the ability of the relatively small nation of Germany to accept them. There have been problems housing, placing, and integrating them into German life.

After New Year's celebrations ending early January 1, 2016, "about 1,000" men, mostly immigrants from Syria, were accused of sexually assaulting, mugging, and raping a group of around 80 women in and around the Cologne railway station. Germany's published annual crime statistics reveal that approximately 7,500 to 8,000 rapes and sexual assaults take place there every year.

Based on crime figures released by the German government, the average annual sexual crimes committed from 2011-2013 were 7,659, or approximately 21 per day. The following chart compares the average statistical number of rapes and sexual crimes per day as compared to the New Year's attack by immigrants in only one city.

Typical # of sexual crimes per day in Germany versus Jan 1, 2016 in Cologne

In one city alone (Cologne), Germany saw a sexual crime rate over 47 times the average for the entire country. Germany has a population of over 81 million, and therefore its incidence of rape or sexual assault stands at 0.009% (and I believe this is based on accusations and not convictions). However, with a 47-fold increase in one city alone in one day, rape has suddenly moved from a Twitter problem to a real one.

The Solution

In light of this, Cologne mayor Henriette Reker has quickly responded with some guidelines for women in order to prevent crime.

This is a common and effective police tactic–when a swarm of car break-ins occurred recently in my neighborhood, the police issued bulletins reminding neighbors to always lock their doors, keep valuables out of plain sight, remove all objects from your vehicle when it is not in use, etc.

Is this victim blaming?

It is important to realize that while the wealth and prosperity of a first world society creates a lifestyle where the biggest issues a woman might face include misinterpreting friendly conversation as microaggressions, being offended at a statue that accurately depicts the origins of a product she is purchasing, or just plain complaining about her own ignorance, the immigrant crisis has suddenly placed women in the situation of actually facing a real and potentially dangerous problem. This problem cannot be defeated using the tools modern feminism has equipped them with, namely tweeting, using sarcasm or snark, making threats and false accusations, and appealing to white knights.

Therefore, as a public service to these women, I am providing guidance on how to avoid being the victim of a sexual crime. There is no need to wait until after an incident like Cologne, Germany, to adopt these reasonable and logical crime prevention steps that the women of Germany are now implementing.

1. Maintain An Arm’s Length Distance From Strangers

As recently as 50 years ago, even a couple on a first date maintained a safe distance

Anyone in their 30s or later remembers a time where a guy would have to get to know a woman over a period of time before she would be comfortable with him being close to her, touching her, or being alone with her. Perhaps over a series of weeks one could interact with a girl he liked, show interest and signs of time commitment, and gain her trust and acceptance.

In 2016, the same applies, although game can now be used on most millennial women to achieve this same acceptance in minutes. Women who are so readily accepting of men's first physical advances will encourage and accelerate the subsequent steps that lead to sex.

Typical greeting between a millennial and a stranger, 2016

Men judge women by their behaviors. A stripper, who will happily and quickly hop into a guy's lap completely naked, is putting forth entirely different signals than a girl who is uncomfortable with physical contact with a stranger, and projects a shy or conservative demeanor.

Game is a logical set of steps that a man follows in order to achieve success with a woman, with the end goal typically being sexual congress. Each step that the woman skips brings the man that much closer to his goal. Men will always choose the woman with the shortest number of steps, when looking for quick sexual release.

A woman who is perfectly fine with immediately making close physical contact with a complete stranger is putting herself at risk and sending a signal to others that she has a higher tolerance for aggressive sexuality.

2. Don’t Go To Certain Areas At Night

There are certain areas of town that should be avoided, especially at night. If you are unsure where these are, ask an older person. They will know, because they never go to these areas. Also, while drinking alcohol can be fun, be aware that alcohol incites violence, increases sexual urges, and reduces inhibitions. Combined with the fact that most men are going out to bars with the explicit intent to meet women, the later you stay out near pubs, taverns, and bars, the more you will be seen as a woman looking to meet up for sexual purposes.

As the night drags on, singles will couple up, exchange numbers, or leave together, and every minute that you remain will advertise you as a single and available woman more loudly. After midnight, most people are heavily intoxicated and become targets for crime, as they are unable to respond adequately and have slowed reaction times.

In Cologne, authorities have stated that the area around the train station is unsafe at night. Avoid unsafe areas, especially when the authorities advise you to. The bottom line is, avoid dangerous areas, don’t stay out late, and don’t put yourself in risky positions around groups of intoxicated men at night.

3. Stay With Your Own Group

I can’t tell…are the authorities being snarky and victim blaming, or are they serious?

College sororities are not known to be bastions of wisdom and learning. But one of the basic lessons they teach every girl is to always stay in groups when going out and never leave your sisters alone at the bar. This is a basic crime prevention tactic that everyone would benefit from. If thieves, criminals, or rapists are looking for a victim, they will always choose the single victim over the group. The single victim is always the easier target. Don’t make yourself an easy target.

4. Wear Modest Clothing

Despite the dangerous false teachings that women can dress like porn stars without eliciting a sexual response from drunken, horny men congregated in groups in places like bars and parties where they are actively searching for women to meet, any woman from outside the first world knows that the amount of skin shown directly corresponds to the amount of sexuality.

This is why one would not wear a miniskirt when going to church with their grandmother. And, conversely, this is why sexy lingerie intended to be used in the privacy of one's bedroom with a significant other is so small and often even see-through, precisely because it is designed as a method of foreplay by showing large amounts of skin not typically seen publicly.

Feminism would have you believe these are equally sexy images

And of course more conservative societies know this. Saudi Arabia takes the theory to such an extreme that it discourages women from showing ankle skin in public. And girls naturally know this. Every girl has felt more shame when wearing a more skimpy outfit, and even the thinnest supermodels have body image problems.

Indeed, one woman in Cologne reported that her choice of clothing protected her from more serious assault: “Fortunately I wore a jacket and trousers. A skirt would probably have been torn away from me.” Body language is at least as important as verbal language in human communication, and if you dress like a sexual object, don’t be surprised when you are treated like one.

5. Don’t Get Drunk

Most people have been intoxicated at some point in their life, and the dizzy feeling can be fun. But alcohol is one of history's oldest aphrodisiacs. It lowers inhibitions, increases sexual urges, and often leads to behaviors the drinker regrets. Not to mention the fact that alcohol is a highly addictive depressant, and we know that Western women are already seriously depressed. Getting drunk is probably the #1 thing a woman can do to increase her chances of sexual assault or rape. Don't do it.

Conclusion

Fucking nanny state patriarchy!

Here we have five simple steps American women can adopt today to drastically lower their odds of being a victim of sexual assault. An added benefit of not dressing like a slut, not drinking to the point of intoxication, not being physically intimate with complete strangers, and not going to shady neighborhoods is that you drastically increase your chances of meeting a decent guy who is interested in more than one night stands and drug abuse.

The choice is simple: take the five common sense steps above, stay safe and sane, and perhaps even meet a good man—or continue using snark and sarcasm while putting your body, health, and mental state at risk. It's a simple choice, but something tells me that, sadly, American women are going to have to learn this lesson the hard way.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How One Of King Arthur’s Tales Shows A Vital Masculine Lesson

January 15, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the men of ROK, with best wishes for the New Year! I hope Christmastide has gone well for you all. This season also brings us through the New Year, a “liminal” time. The concepts of “liminal time” and “liminal space” are important in many religions; “liminal” is from the Latin “limen,” meaning a boundary or border, especially the threshold of an house.

Such things as rivers, caves, temple perimeters, the times of dawn and dusk, the transition from old to new year, are “liminal” places or periods of transition and ambiguity. The month of January itself is named for the Roman god, Janus, looking backwards and forwards, who was the god of doors, gates and other liminal spaces.

The Christian feasts as well, reflect on the liminal character of Christ—God-Man, Eternal and Newborn, Infinite and Finite, Himself the fulfillment of the Old, and Author of the New Covenants, etc. One of my favourite stories, drawing on Christianity and Christianized elements of old pagan lore to exposit these themes, is the tale of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. I re-read it every year around New Year's Day.

As a man who has read the greats from Homer to Shakespeare and beyond, I do not speak lightly in calling Sir Gawain and the Green Knight one of the very finest works of Western Literature. But it is so often overlooked, that I don't know if I should second-guess my opinion, or assume that most men are too far removed from Medieval culture to understand all the tale's riches. In any case, upon the whole story, more than any other I have found, the piercing glory of the Christmas spirit rests.

I thought seriously about dedicating an article or four entirely to this tale, which is so fitting for this time of year, and is one of the greatest stories of virility ever written. But I will do this next year, I think. For now, I'll give a brief synopsis; those who want the great pleasure of reading the tale should skip what follows (major spoiler alert), and can come back to read the last couple paragraphs of the article. I recommend Tolkien's translation.

The Story

On New Year's Eve a young King Arthur is at court with his merry knights and their ladies, in the middle of Christmastide feasting. Everyone has been served, but Arthur has the custom of not eating his first meal of the year until he has heard a tale of some marvel or feat.

Suddenly a gigantic man, green from head to toe, with green eyes and beard, on a green horse, rides into the hall and challenges the "beardless young lads" (a knock at the fresh youth of Arthur and his knights) to a game: he will let one man of the hall take a swing at his head with his great, green axe; but on New Year's day of the coming year, that man must come to find him at the Green Chapel, and offer his neck to the axe in turn.

After a dumbfounded moment, Gawain winds up cleaving the Green Knight's head clean off… but then the knight arises, picks up his head, and arranges to meet Sir Gawain a year and a day hence. Gawain, true to his word, sets off next year and endures a few days of trial before finally going on to meet his doom at the end of the Green Knight's axe. He survives the encounter, but I'll let you read how on your own.

In the end, the whole story is a tale of virtue and manliness, and how mature manhood is not the result of blunting, diminishing, suppressing or escaping our raw virility, but of shaping it into a truly keen and constructive instrument through virtue and good character. The Green Knight is a Christianization of the Green Man, a similarly "liminal," trickster figure from English lore. The Green Man is often depicted as a human face emerging from foliage, but just as often as foliage emerging from an human skull.

The Green Man represents the vigor of merely biological life of ambiguous morality, a raw force, that could be put to good or bad purposes, which ends naturally in death, and emerges renewed from death. Gawain's struggles with courage, with lust, with mortality and humility, are centered upon his contest with the Green Man. The man who is not afraid to die, and who does not abuse his natural faculties contrary to nature, befriends death and nature; the man who fails, loses his head.

Many men have asked me to write some articles on how to pray; strange as it may seem, directing you to this story, and to reflect upon this liminal time of year, situated in the balance between old and new, life and death, is my way of beginning this topic: for prayer and spiritual life comprise the greatest "liminal" space or time of them all. The articles I have written thus far were also all designed to hint at some basic concepts before doing so.

In Gawain's encounter with the Green Knight, the Green Knight acts as a touchstone: he reveals the mettle of the men who enter his contest. Similarly, prayer is first and foremost a contact with the Source and Sustainer of our being. In prayer, we meet our origin, and our last end. We meet Truth so true, that the most honest men begin to see all the ways in which they lie to themselves. It is a thing worse than death in some ways, especially for the proud man who thinks strength consists in never owning his own weakness. Any real attempt at prayer will bring us to confront our weakness; as Gawain found with his green garter (read the story!), the acknowledgment of our ultimate, inevitable weakness, can itself become the perfection of strength.

Life Imitates Art

I knew a monk at the monastery who had gladly given up all he had to come there. Very quickly after arriving, within just a few months, he had thrown himself at prayer so completely that he came to a kind of threshold in the contemplative life. He told me that he had gotten to a point where his state of prayer was so constant and so focused, that there seemed to be a vast amount of time in each, small moment. He always had "enough time" to consider everything he was doing, every faintest movement of thought—and, moreover, he had a great clarity, and a certain knowledge of what was right and wrong, what he should and should not do, in each fleeting moment of time.

He said that this exposure to an hyper-aware state terrified him. It asked everything of him. It was a state of mind that did not allow him a moment to himself; never an unguarded instant; never an easy excuse for indulging in some light sin or imperfection, since every moment was a moment of full life and perfect clarity. He was no longer free to get so much as a drink of coffee when he liked. He admitted that he knew this was the first time he was truly being himself; yet he was so attached to what he thought of as "himself"—his "personality," his "character"—that he felt like he was losing "himself" in order to become himself. He said it felt like being asked to die; in reality, he knew that this was exactly what it was.

As we enter the New Year, I am glad to go into the life of prayer. But the articles heretofore have been designed to impress a few ideas upon us: prayer and the encounter with God is a masculinizing experience because it joins us to the Supreme Patriarch. It is not easy or pleasant, but hurts and requires discipline and exercise. It is not a self-pandering, emotional process. Prayer is itself a liminal time and space—that place between the "Cloud of Forgetting" and the "Cloud of Unknowing," between the lies or unworthy thoughts we leave behind and the Truth we do not yet know.

Brothers, I am a man who takes the spiritual life seriously, and I'll tell you the truth: I have been living the lie for about six years, because when God made me look this thing in the maw, I could not—no, would not—pay the price. I'm not speaking lightly. Every day, I live in the shadow of my failure to yield myself to the all-consuming fire, and try to chip away at the bonds that hold me back.

But do not think it will all be so bitter at first; long before we really come to it in earnest, God often gives us consolations in prayer, makes it sweet for us, draws us to Himself, even if the pleasure must be taken away at some point to ensure our fidelity is true. So, if you want to begin the life of prayer, I ask you during this liminal time of the New Year: are you ready to encounter the Being who is nearer to you, than you are to yourself? And, are you ready to be made willing to rise to the demands this experience will make of you?

Can you be honest, true to yourselves, and to Him? For that, is the essence of prayer: radical honesty with self and God, Who will show us things about ourselves, and about Himself, that may be hard. I will not sell you an effeminate, “nice” version of prayer.

Next week we can begin discussing the “how.”

Read More: The Problem Of “Spiritual But Not Religious”

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

If Big Bertha Is Not Satisfied, A Man Will Be Executed

January 15, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

With California on the verge of state bankruptcy, politicians looked for creative ways to balance the budget. One idea was to put out a call to the entertainment industry for partnerships that would ease the financial strain. A television producer responded with an idea to use the male prison population as contestants for a new type of game show. Desperate for any revenue, the governor signed off on the deal, in spite of his reservations about having to perform live executions on air.

American sex relations had long since descended into confusion and chaos. The phrase "check your privilege" became "bleed your privilege," and so the institutionalization of anti-male hatred became common in the media, academia, and the government. Controversial new "discomfort" laws meant that a woman could point a finger to any man in the vicinity if she was feeling agitated or unhappy, forcing him to prove beyond a reasonable doubt to the authorities that he was not the cause of her pain. Prisons were abolished for women and even the most heinous of crimes committed by them were only met with community counseling. The harmless men's rights movement was deemed a terrorist organization and any man who used "game verbal assault tactics" were immediately assigned to an equality training camp. It's in this climate that the show "Did He Satisfy You?" appear on television.

The premise was simple. An inmate would appear on the program, while still in his orange jumper, and face a panelist of four women. He was then required to satisfy each of the four women with their requests, no matter how degrading or difficult. If he satisfied them all, his criminal record would be expunged and he would be set free. If he did not satisfy even one of them, he would be executed on live television.

It was no surprise that thirty-seven episodes in, not a single man satisfied all four women on the panel, leading to the execution of every man who played. Two men came close to freedom by satisfying three of the four women, but they failed to satisfy the last panelist, Big Bertha, who possessed a double PhD in women's and transsexual studies. She was seen as the foremost expert in America on Bible Belt rape culture.

At a cost of $100,000 per year to incarcerate an inmate, the state government estimated that the show saved them $12 million during the first two seasons, and with advertising revenue thrown in, the state ran a healthy profit. The show became a number one hit in America on both TV and internet streaming, partly due to it being broadcasted live. The mostly female audience liked seeing a male die in real time.

Episode 38 was by far the most memorable of "Did He Satisfy You?" The contestant was Jack, a white man who was serving a ten year sentence for dealing meth. He was arrested for operating three labs in the northern part of the state after a tip to the police from his girlfriend came in when she became angry from his refusal to perform oral sex on her.

Jack legally agreed to be set free if he satisfied all four women or be electrocuted if he did not. Once he signed the show's contract, there was no backing out. With thirty-seven previous executions in a row, it was a foregone conclusion to most viewers that he would die. They wanted to see an insanely privileged human jiggle and shake and cook on the chair and die for all the past sins of his race and sex.

—

Jack was eerily calm when the announcer called him onto the stage. With his unassuming appearance and slouched posture, he looked more like a meek accountant than a convicted drug dealer. The audience of mostly women already hated him. They started chanting: "Make the scumbag satisfy you! Make the scumbag satisfy you!" The four panelists looked down from an elevated platform at the contestant. Big Bertha gave him the hardest glare, her nostrils fully open.

The announcer began the show: "Welcome ladies and privileged gentlemen to Did He Satisfy You? Our contestant today is Jack, a lowlife drug dealer and monster who was caught by the police thanks to a woman who freed herself from Jack's emotional abuse, sexual abuse, and force feeding of low-grade meth." The crowd booed. "This man has caused harm to society and to women with his behavior, and so today he must face our panel of intelligent and beautiful women. If he satisfies all women, he will be immediately set free to terrorize more women, but if he fails to satisfy just one of our panelists, he will be executed in our electric chair. The sponsor for today's show is Pepco electric company, keeping the lights on when you need it most. Now let's get started!"

The studio light shined on panelist number one, signaling that she was about to state her demand. "I want Jack to cook a meal that will satisfy my hunger using only six ingredients that I choose. The ingredients are vinegar, lemon, sardines, olives, bacon, and green tea."

A mobile kitchen was rolled out on the set and Jack began working. He started with the bacon first, frying it just enough to release the grease, then added lemon, the sardines, and barely a drop of vinegar since he was required to use at least some of it. He then gave a dusting of green tea to infuse the dish with an earthy flavor. He finished it off by wrapping the bacon around the sardines and using more of the green tea as an attractive plate garnish.

In and out came the random "boyfriends" throughout her childhood. Her mom impulsively selected a rotating coterie of men to make life more exciting, not considering the effect it would have on her little daughter. Number one would be awoken by her mom's yells of pleasure at odd hours of the night, and one boyfriend in particular got too close to her, forcing her to sit on his lap. Her mom yelled at her, demanding she stop flirting with her man.

The dish was presented to number one as Big Bertha looked on, licking her thin lips. The first panelist chewed on the first bite and made a slight moan, signifying at least some satisfaction. It seemed that Jack's experience cooking meth for so long helped him in creating a tasty meal. "Panelist number one, are you satisfied?" the host asked.

The camera zoomed in on number one's face. "Yes, I am satisfied with this dish."

The crowd yelled, "A man's actions must lead to female satisfaction!"

Jack took a deep breath, but continued to hide any emotion to the audience. He didn't want to let them know he was nervous from having his life in the hands of four women who would feel no loss if he died.

The mobile kitchen was remove from the set and the studio lights shined on the second panelist, the thinnest of all four. She stated her demand: "I want you to satisfy me by singing 'Single Ladies' by Beyonce in perfect key." A karaoke machine was brought out and Jack was given a microphone.

When Jack first started getting into trouble at the age of 12, his mother thought it would be a good idea to enroll him in Catholic school. One of the required activities was choir. For the next three years Jack was able to refine a naturally proficient singing voice that was enough to impress a handful of girls as he got older.

Soon after her 18th birthday, number two started receiving propositions for sex on her popular Instagram account. She ignored them at first, but she wanted the fancy purses and clothing like some of her friends. She accepted an offer to fly to Switzerland to have sex with a Saudi prince and seven of his closest associates. It turned out to be more intensive than she could have imagined. She was able to gain the material possessions she coveted for the short term with these types of transactional encounters, but since then she found it impossible to develop healthy emotional connections with men.

With his life at stake, Jack belted out "Single Ladies" almost as good as Beyonce herself. The females in the crowd sang along, waving their bare left ring finger during key moments of the chorus. Even the panelists started getting into it, bobbing their heads to the beat. Only Big Bertha remained still, though a slight smile developed on her face as she realized that Jack had what it took to be put to death by her doing.

The song ended and the announcer asked, "Panelist number two, are you satisfied?"

The camera focused on number two. She was trained to delay her answer ever so slightly to build anticipation for the audience. After a three second pause she said, "Yes, I am satisfied with his singing."

The crowd yelled, "A man's actions must lead to female satisfaction!"

Jack was noticeably sweating after his performance. The camera got in close to his face and focused on the beads crawling down his temple. The announcer said, “Is Jack about to buckle under pressure? Will he be able to satisfy our next panelist or will he fry on the chair? We’ll find out after a word from our sponsor Chipotle and their new chocolate sizzle burrito.”

The oldest member of the panel was number three. She was looked up to by the other women because she was the one who invented the term “I bathe in male tears,” which gave the feminist movement renewed focus after so many activists were lost to attention whoring on social networking instead of fighting for all the victimized university-educated white females in the Western world.

Number three said, “I want you to satisfy me by sucking on my toes.” Before the crowd had time to respond, she added, “I’ve had a fungus nail disorder since I was a teenager.” With that the crowd gave an equal measure of laughter and cries of “Ewwwww.” A camera that was always focused on Jack did catch his nose twitch upwards when the demand was stated. Number three was brought out on a chair and her shoes were removed. Jack stared at her crinkled and calloused feet with yellow nail discoloration. A pungent sour odor began to fill his nostrils.

She did everything in her power to get him to like her. She sat next to him in lecture class, twirled her hair, and as a last ditch effort, offered up her notes after he was absent, but he still ignored her. “Was he gay?” number three thought. Then one day, walking around campus, she saw him kissing a sorority girl, a blonde bimbo who didn’t have half the intelligence she had. She couldn’t believe that a man is so easily capable of picking an artificial beauty over someone as smart and strong as she, in spite of her physical flaws.

Unlike with the singing challenge, Jack had no experience sucking on toes infected with onychomycosis fungus, but when your life is at stake, you realize skills you hadn’t known about beforehand. He got down on his knees and started sucking on number three’s infected toes like they were ripe strawberries, with a primary focus on the big toes. He maintained intimate eye contact to make her feel the control that she so desperately craved, dragging the tips of his fingers across the base of her feet. The light tickling added to her pleasure and caused her to close her eyes and tilt her head back. Jack continued sucking until the tension in her foot released. It seemed that she fell asleep.

The announcer said, “Wow Jack, it looks like you have experience sucking on fungus toes. Maybe you could suck mine after!” The crowd laughed on cue and number three was wheeled back to her position on the panel. “So number three, did Jack the misogynist and convicted criminal give you satisfaction?” Not sure of what to say, she looked to her left. Big Bertha nodded her head up and down.

“Um, yes, I am satisfied with his toe sucking.”

The crowd yelled, “A man’s actions must lead to female satisfaction!”

The studio lights shining on the electric chair became brighter. “Ladies and gentlemen,” the announcer started, “as you may know, not a single creep contestant in this show’s history has satisfied Big Bertha. That means that in all likelihood we will see the rightful execution of a man who has hurt women and our society. What do you think of that?" A bloodthirsty round of cheers and applause commenced. Cook him! Take his life! I'm not satisfied!

"Jack, do you have any comment before Big Bertha demands satisfaction?"

The microphone was put into Jack's face. "No comment," he said.

"Well, at least society won't lose a charming man!" The announcer looked over to Big Bertha and asked her to state the challenge.

"I want Jack to…" Big Bertha moved her eyes from the camera lens to Jack. "I want Jack to make me love him." Gasps were heard from the audience as the reality of the death sentence settled in.

He didn't call her back. He said he had a great time yet one week passed and he hadn't heard from her. He told Bertha such nice words of affection, had even given her a sweet gift from the candy shop, but all that had been a lie just to fuck her, because once he got what he wanted, he left, like all the others. All men are liars. All men are capable of hurting a woman who only wants to be happy. All men deserve to be punished for the pain they cause. Big Bertha knew in her heart that the world would be better off without them.

The announcer gave Jack a look that seemed to say "it was nice knowing you," because how could he possibly make Big Bertha capable of loving a heterosexual man? The electric chair operator could be seen in the background preparing the machine, ready to execute losing contestant number thirty-eight. Then Jack grabbed the microphone from the announcer and said, "I can provide Big Bertha with satisfaction. I can make her love me."

Confused murmurs came from the audience and even the announcer was surprised. He asked, "And how will you do that, Jack?"

"Big Bertha, I want you to place a call to your home."

"Now Jack there is no need to delay the…"

"Look, the rules state that I could do anything reasonable to fulfill a challenge that is not illegal or an undue financial burden on the show. Making a phone call abides by these rules."

Big Bertha's eyebrows raised high as she looked at Jack with contempt. Once she received the green light from the producer, she reached for her bag underneath the podium and retrieved her phone. She dialed her home. Hello. Fifteen seconds passed. Okay. Her hand began shaking. The studio audience was in complete silence, not sure of what was going on, and even the announcer began looking uncomfortable. Then Jack leaned towards the microphone. "Do you love me?"

Big Bertha tightened her lips. "I…" The announcer glared at the producer, who could only shrug his shoulders. Never before had the outcome of an execution been uncertain.

"I…

“I…

“I love you.” It was the first time she said those three words to a man.

No one in the studio knew how to react. The announcer, after a long delay, asked Big Bertha for confirmation. “Are you sure that you love him? Are you sure that you are satisfied?”

“Yes I love him. I’m satisfied, goddamnit! Let him go!”

“Okay so Big Bertha is, apparently, satisfied. Congratulations Jack you have delivered satisfaction to all the women on our panel and will now be set free. Do you have anything to say?”

He nodded and positioned his mouth directly over the microphone. “I just want to say that I am satisfied.” Big Bertha, breathing heavily, refused to look at him.

Jack signed a few papers, was given a pair of clothes to replace his prison jumper, and was set free.

—

Six years later a man traveling to the Colombian coast caught sight of someone at a beach bar who looked familiar. It was Jack. The traveler approached him and said how happy he was that he was able to live by satisfying Big Bertha. They got to talking for a while until finally the traveler felt comfortable asking Jack a question that has been on his mind for years. “How did you satisfy her?”

Jack was eager to tell the tale.

“I figured that I could satisfy the first three panelists and it would come down to Big Bertha. I knew a hacker friend on the inside who had friends on the outside. What they did was hack the phone company to temporarily forward anyone who dialed her home number to one of their devices. When she made the call, she fully expected the babysitter watching her two adopted Somalian kids to answer, but instead it was a man with a distorted voice who played a sound recording of muffled whimpering. He told her to say she was satisfied or else her kids would be killed.”

“Why didn’t she go on to expose your trick after that?”

“The contract stated that all decisions are final.” Jack took a sip of his aguardiente. “I read it carefully before signing.”

The show went on after Jack but they changed the rules to forbid outgoing phone calls. Eighteen more men in a row were killed until the ratings went south and the show was cancelled. A new show was created to replace it, where men were executed immediately without any of the foreplay. Big Bertha was hired to pull the switch. By the time she died of complications from diabetes, she performed fifty-seven successful executions.

This short story was originally published on RooshV.com.

Previous Story: The Rise Of The Narcissicopter

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Donald Trump’s Business Advice Can Change Your Life

January 16, 2016 | by Rock Thompson | Link | Original Link

Having worked in state government for three years, I am a political junkie. I have become addicted to talk radio, podcasts, and follow the news constantly. With that said, I didn’t vote in the 2012 Presidential Election or in my 2014 State Governor Election because I was so disenfranchised with the candidates, the corrupt state of our so-called “Government,” and the political parties. So, it was a pleasant surprise that while browsing the news channels this summer I stumbled unto Donald J. Trump’s Presidential Announcement Speech and was blown away by his sheer balls and charisma.

> I don’t do it for the money. I’ve got enough, much more than I’ll ever need. I do it to do it. Deals are my art form other people paint beautifully on canvas or write wonderful poetry. I like making deals, preferably bid deals. That’s how I get my kicks.
>
> Most people are surprised by the way I work. I play it very loose. I don’t carry a briefcase. I try not to schedule too many meetings. I leave my door open. You can’t be imaginative or entrepreneurial if you’ve got too much structure. I prefer to come to work each day and just see what develops.

Watching his rise in the polls and the negative Mainstream Media spin, I became curious of the man and wanted to see if I could get a peek into his character, from his very own words. Donald Trump famously said that the single greatest book every written (besides the Bible) was his own The Art of the Deal and that everyone should read it. I figured, why the hell not?

Background of the Trump Family

Fun fact: Trump's Grandfather Friedrich Drumpf, a German Immigrant, started a couple of 'decadent' restaurants (aka brothels) during the Gold Rush Era on the West Coast

Donald Trump was born in 1946 to Fred and Mary Trump in Queens, New York City. Donald's father Fred had an interest in construction and at the ripe age of sixteen he started building garages for people in his neighborhood. In his early 20's he decided to go full time into real estate construction and development, founding "Elizabeth Trump & Son Co." which later was renamed to Trump Organization LLC.

Donald was a pretty rebellious kid growing up, so his father Fred decided to send him to the New York Military Academy where he graduated from as a "captain of the cadets." He later applied to the Wharton School of Finance at the University of Pennsylvania, where he ended up graduating with a Bachelors of Science Degree in Economics. He immediately became involved with his father's realty business and after several successful deals with his father, he decided to move to Manhattan and make his millions.

He was clearly successful but what character traits lead to his success? Surprisingly, his book reads like a game manual, which many similar concepts used to make the deals.

> When I look back at the deals I've made—and the ones I've lost or let pass—I see certain common elements. But unlike the real estate evangelists you see all over television these days, I can't promise you that by following the precepts I'm about to offer you'll become a millionaire overnight. Unfortunately, life rarely works that way, and most people who try to get rich quick end up going broke instead.

Think Big

> To me it’s very simple: if you’re going to be thinking anyway, you might as well think big. Most people think small because most people are afraid of success, afraid of making decisions, afraid of winning. And that gives people like me a great advantage.

How often, have you passed on a job opportunity because you where afraid of the unknowns?

How often, have you passed on talking to the 9/10 hottie at the bar and settled for the 7/10 because you were damn right intimidated by the perfectly sculpted body?

You may respond, “those two little words, ‘Think Big’ are easy to say and much different to put into action” and I would agree with you. However, the more you practice and the more you put explicit effort into raising your standards in all aspects of your life—the easier and more natural it will come to you.

Protect The Downside And The Upside Will Take Care Of Itself

> It’s been said that I believe in the power of positive thinking. In fact, I believe in the power of negative thinking. If you plan for the worst—if you can live with the worst—the good will always take care of itself.

In terms of game, what are the worst things that can happen? She will reject you. In terms of relationships what is the worst thing that happen? You decide to get married and she divorces you.

Roosh wrote about the “Elephant in the Room” and the article struck a chord with me. If you decide to settle down, you must wrestle with the hazards of a long term relationship and know what to do in case of a divorce.

Know Your Market

> Some people have a sense of the market and some people don’t. I like to think I have that instinct. That’s why I don’t hire a lot of number-crunchers, and I don’t trust fancy marketing surveys…The other people I don’t take too seriously are the critics—except when they stand in the way of my projects. What very few of them have is any feeling for what the public wants. Which is why, if these critics ever tried to become developers, they’d be terrible failures.

This why websites like these are so invaluable for waking up men and feeding them the red pill. From our birth, men have been lied to about the real “dating market” and we’ve been stumbling around trying to buy goods that are essentially damaged and ‘deregulated’.

Enhance Your Location

She’s touching my hand, that means I’ll get some tonight!

> Perhaps the most misunderstood concept in all of real estate is that the key to success is location, location, location. Usually, that’s said by people who don’t know what they’re talking about. First of all, you don’t necessarily need the best location. What you need is the best deal. Just as you can create leverage, you can enhance a location, through promotion and through psychology.
>
> My point is that real money isn’t made in real estate by spending the top dollar to buy the best location. You can get killed doing that, just as you can get killed buying a bad location, even for a low price. What you should never do is pay too much, even if that means walking away from a very good site. Which is all a more sophisticated way of looking at location.

On chat rooms and Facebook, you constantly hear complaints from men who just can’t understand why they wine and dine their women for months at high end restaurants and still can’t get laid. They shell out hundreds of dollars for meals, dates, etc…and get absolutely no return on investment.

Learn to maximize the best ways you can excite a woman (and land her at your bedside manor) by introducing her to different events, venues, and restaurants while minimizing your expense—but also know that if you have the best girl and she likes you, it doesn’t matter where you take her on a date.

Get The Word Out

> One thing I’ve learned about the press is that they’re always hungry for a good > story, and the more sensational the better. It's in the nature of the job, and I understand that. The point is that if you are a little different, or a little outrageous, or if you do things that are bold or controversial, the press is going to write about you. I've always done things a little differently, I don't mind controversy, and my deals tend to be somewhat ambitious.

There's a reason why the "jerkboy" mentality scores with the ladies, they love a man who is different from the mold.

> The other thing I do when I talk with reporters is to be straight. I try not to deceive them or to be defensive, because those are precisely the ways most people get themselves into trouble with the press. Instead, when a reporter asks me a tough question, I try to frame a positive answer, even if that means shifting the ground.

> The final key to the way I promote is bravado. I play to people's fantasies. People may not always think big themselves, but they can still get very excited by those who do. That's why a little hyperbole never hurts. People want to believe that something is the biggest and the greatest and the most spectacular. I call it truthful hyperbole. It's an innocent form of exaggeration—and a very effective form of promotion.

One cannot have bravado if one isn't confident in himself, Andrian Red wrote a great article on "5 Proven Ways to Become More Assertive."

Fight Back

> Much as it pays to emphasize the positive, there are times when the only choice is confrontation….One of the problems when you become successful is that jealousy and envy inevitably follow. There are people—I categorize them as life's losers—who get their sense of accomplishment and achievement from trying to stop others.

A man's character and reputation is gained by what he does, and it can just as easily be slandered if you don't stand up for yourself and fight back.

Deliver The Goods

> You can't con people, at least not for long. You can create excitement, you can do wonderful promotion and get all kinds of press, and you can throw in a little hyperbole. But if you don't deliver the goods, people will eventually catch on.

One of life's little ironies are people who claim that they are an "expert" at something and then when it comes time for them to deliver, they fail monumentally. The reason is because a majority of people are frauds who hide behind a layer of ego.

Have Fun

> I don't kid myself. Life is very fragile, and success doesn't change that. If anything, success makes it more fragile. Anything can change, without warning, and that's why I try not to take any of what's happened too seriously. Money was never a big motivation for me, except as a way to keep score. The real excitement is playing the game. I don't spend a lot of time worrying about what I should have done differently, or what's going to happen next.

Men are for the most part logical and calculating—when we learn something new, we put that knowledge into action very seriously—almost robotically—and forget to have fun. What's the point of living, if we don't have fun and enjoy ourselves once in awhile?

Conclusion

The Art of the Deal was a fun book to read and very educational. As the political season heats up in 2016 Donald Trump may very well end up becoming the Republican nominee. If he does, he did so because he understands game.

Read More: Donald Trump and the Tyranny of Feelings

Rock Thompson

Rock Thompson

Rock was originally born in the Soviet Union and immigrated legally to America when he was young. He now watches the Decline of America and the Rise of Russia from his igloo in Alaska.

Why Hasn't Jackie Coakley Been Punished For Starting The Biggest Rape Hoax Of The Decade?

January 16, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The Washington Post, to its credit, is reporting that University of Virginia rape hoaxer Jackie Coakley faked a terminal illness and pretended to be a man to try and get her romantic interest to date her. The gang rape lies she produced were also part of that same protracted attempt to enter into a relationship with Ryan Duffin. Although T. Rees Shapiro has sadly only included Jackie's first name in his article, its publication is a very positive development that will help correct the great damage done to the reputations of various UVA fraternity members.

Despite never having set foot at UVA, let alone attended it, the Jackie Coakley false rape debacle became deeply personal to me. My first ROK article was actually about then Jezebel writer Anna Merlan's shrieks of sadness that Coakley had not been gratuitously raped. A lot has happened since then, including the unexpected condemnation of Rolling Stone "journalist" Sabrina Rubin Erdely and editor Will Dana in a report by the Columbia University School of Journalism, which had launched an investigation into the frankly horrendous excuse for journalism that the UVA article was.

Some lessons in stalking and psychopathy

Don't forget Emily Renda, who acted as a conduit for Sabrina Rubin Erdely's article by introducing her to Jackie Coakley. Renda is committed to destroying college "due process" for male students.

Jackie Coakley's determination to date Ryan Duffin, irrespective of his repeated turning down of her advances, evinces some clearly unbalanced and psychotic behavior. What's more is that instead of the usual pattern of punishing the man who spurned her, she took the arguably even more reprehensible act of using uninvolved fraternity members to make false gang rape claims designed to win Duffin's heart.

Coakley went further, however, and used a fictitious man named Haven Monahan to text Duffin and goad him into returning feelings for her. Police have confirmed that the Monahan character is nothing but an invention. Pictures of him texted to Duffin were of a former classmate of Coakley's from northern Virginia. Eventually Coakley made her now well-known accusations of gang rape by a group of fraternity brothers, including Monahan.

Duffin rushed to be with her after she told him about the "rape," as she clearly wanted him to. Coakley's "hysterical" reactions made her seem believable to him and his fellow comforting friends. He also drew closer to her when she fabricated having a terminal illness, news the character Haven Monahan had relayed to him. Nevertheless, the numbers of male students participating in the rape changed, as did the first name Jackie attributed to Monahan. In fact, she told Duffin she could not tell if his real name was John or Jake or something else. Duffin understandably grew suspicious.

The wider implications

Anna Merlan was devastated that fabulist Jackie Coakley was not raped.

Let's set aside the holes in Jackie Coakley's story. Here we have a seemingly well-adjusted and intelligent young man, Ryan Duffin, who was led to trust her, in spite of the gargantuan lies she was telling. Women are, in their own twisted way, capable of delivering performances that superficially match what they are claiming.

This case provides another demonstration of the utter minefield of trusting testimony alone. By false rape standards, Coakley's reporting to others was sudden. None of the usual delays accompanied her histrionic behavior. Yet the allegations were equally as invented as those of an Emma Sulkowicz or Lena Dunham.

What happens when an accusing woman combines the maximum believability of a Jackie Coakley with a greater level of consistency and the ability to stop herself from overreaching? Gridiron player Brian Banks' tormentor Wanetta Gibson is one of those individuals, only undone by her own later and unsolicited admissions. The idea of being able to discern deceit based on face-to-face contact and an appraisal of someone's testimony is purely fanciful.

In broader terms, the Coakley case shows the desperate need for due process and beyond reasonable doubt after rape accusations to approximate the standards expected when other crimes are alleged. A person is extremely unlikely, for example, to be convicted of an armed robbery without CCTV evidence, the recovery of what is stolen, proof of injury, or multiple witness statements of the same individual incident (i.e. not the Bill Cosby witch hunt of disconnected allegations being bundled together as one "truth"). Both courts and non-judicial discussions are engaged in a perpetual cycle of watering down thresholds to secure more convictions and social condemnation.

All this is even more important when we consider the UVA hoax consisted of claims circulating freely without any trial having taken place. Feminists and SJWs seem to think that the absence of a trial, which requires police evidence (or politicized pressures to create it), means mere accusations are allowed to stick as a de facto branding of guilt for accused individuals.

Some much needed rain

UVA President Teresa Sullivan suspended Greek Life after the false gang rape allegations but did nothing to sanction Jackie Coakley when her lies were exposed.

Jackie Coakley is yet to face the comparatively token threat of a university Honor Code trial. UVA was more than happy to suspend Greek Life activities across the whole university, not just for the fraternity at the center of the hoax, but the person conclusively outed as a fabulist escaped unscathed. Some things never change.

In the end, the continued willingness of even CNN and The New York Times, not just the more conservative Post, to air this saga illustrates a marked qualitative change in how many reporters respond to rape hoaxes. Sure, perhaps a majority of journalists, a notoriously left-leaning profession, remain unwilling to tackle such egregious issues. Regardless, T. Rees Shapiro's piece is an excellent vindication of the truth and should be welcomed by anyone supportive of justice and not mob mentalities.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 9 People In The Media Who Are Upset Jackie Coakley Wasn't Raped By White Men

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Reasons Why European Women Should Welcome More Migrants

January 16, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Some have pointed to the recent events in Germany, Denmark, and across Europe and gently wondered whether Western women are under increased threat. Some have even gone so far as to say that women's odds of being raped have surged as a result of allowing limitless numbers of men to enter their countries and enrich their culture. In this article, I will show why this is false and give three reasons why welcoming several million more migrants is in fact the best possible choice for women.

1. More Dating Options

They can’t wait to meet you.

The demographic make-up of the refugees is overwhelmingly male. About 62% of the 1.5 million migrants that have traveled to Europe in 2015 are young, strong, self-confident men. Is it any wonder why women should welcome them? A little under a quarter, 22%, are children and only 16% are women. That means that European women have an additional 1 million men for potential consenting sexual partners.

Choice is a good thing, and by urging more young men to voyage to Europe women will have more options.

2. Less Patriarchy

They do not support male domination.

In our free and open society, these migrants would fit in. They’ve proven to be fans of group sex not only with women, but young males as well. This sort of sexually libertine behavior is healthy for post-sexual revolution modern women.

It’s obvious that the patriarchy is a constricting system that suppresses women’s right to express their sexuality. The migrants have no problem having group sex in a public square with one or more women, signaling that they are not suppressors of female sexuality, but rather benevolent enablers. Allowing more sexually open migrants into the West will allow us to dismantle the patriarchy once and for all.

3. More Respect For Women

Respectful migrant courtship.

Of all the regions in the world, by far the most dangerous for women is the modern West. We have a problem, and it's called rape culture. One in four women are viciously raped in college, which is why the enrollment numbers for female students is dwindling. At an Ivy League college a woman has a higher chance of being raped on her way to class than she does living to the age of 25. Compared to the only 6,000 reported rapes since the start of the Syrian civil war, our colleges are terrifying. The men coming from these lands will follow their religious code of peace and show women more respect, as they have already proven.

These men have never trivialized rape.

Over the last decade, Syria has experienced a massive rape crisis. One Syrian woman described how a group of Syrian army soldiers had come to her house in Homs, tied up their father and brother, and raped her and her sisters in front of them. The woman cried as she went on to describe how the soldiers opened their legs and burned their vaginas with cigarettes.

We should understand that this is the sort of violence from which migrants are desperately trying to escape. Islam, the religion of peace the migrants follow, is a well-known supporter of women's rights. If you visit Islamic countries in the Middle East, you will experience a liberated feminist utopia that the West could only dream of.

Soon you won't even need a passport to experience the benefits of this new and exotic culture.

Read More: Only White Countries Are Expected To Let In Hordes Of Illegal Migrants

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

Hollywood Hypocrites: Socialist Rations For You, $40,000 Dresses For Them

January 17, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Even as they lambaste Republicans and keep up the ideological war on Wall Street, red carpet-trotting, socialism-loving celebrities spent upwards of $40,000 getting ready for this week's Golden Globes. The average American household income for a year is just $52,000. Award winner Amy Adams' "budget" for the evening, which was used as a model, is nothing special. Her main items, including her dress and jewellery, were rentals, despite costing so much to hire.

Another celebrity, Kate Hudson, wore $1 million worth of diamonds at the event, hot on the heels of her November endorsement of Hillary Clinton, who was ripping into Wall Street at the time. Mentioning her and Adams doesn't even reach the tip of the tip of the iceberg.

The men certainly joined in on the act as well, the lower cost of their tuxedos and designer shoes made up for by their arrival in luxury limousines and their attendance at glamorous after-parties. Throughout the night, these budding socialists, almost universally registered Democrats or Democratic donors, had their every whim satisfied by minimum-wage ushers, waitresses, and servers, not to mention the retinue of poorly paid assistants who helped them prepare for the festivities.

Calculated moves?

[image]

Compare the social value of this car to the social value of the latest reality TV show.

As you've probably figured out by now, Hollywood starlets frequently use very left-leaning rhetoric and affiliations as a way to draw attention to themselves, thus increasing their multimillion-dollar incomes, all while offsetting any potential backlash about their ostentatious displays of wealth.

By certain measures, wealth inequality in the US is the highest it has ever been. And the wealth inequality doesn't just concern the typical excoriated CEO of Goldman Sachs or McDonald's. For instance, actor Robert Downey Jr. recently earned 1,200 times more in a year than the average worker in the film industry, the same disparity found between certain CEOs and their employees.

What's more is that the output of, say, General Motors or Nike can be measured in much more objective terms than Hollywood film or silver screen companies. You can determine how useful a car or shoe is with greater ease than the latest avant garde film seen by every hipster. And with ambassadors like the vacuous Kardashians, celebrities are often of dubious or socially cancerous worth to society as a whole.

Always question the narrative, especially one involving champagne socialists vying for camera time

While the film crew struggled to raise their kids and pay their mortgages, George Clooney earned millions for his role in the box office bomb Tomorrowland, spending the rest of his time doing things like trumpeting socialism for Barack Obama.

The Golden Globes is a microcosm of how celebrities flaunt their wealth but strive to deflect criticism for their accumulation of it. Minus a few major exceptions, like Russia's October Revolution, elites have largely learned from the tumult of 1789 and the toppling of the French monarchy.

Unlike Marie Antoinette, celebrities today actively court association with common causes, like wealth redistribution and attacks on market-based speculation. The energy required is not only minimal but dovetails nicely with ample camera time, an indispensable commodity for any savvy film star, television regular or other performing artist.

When we hear a celebrity is “down to Earth,” the threshold for this is usually a few smiles to a reporter or giving a trinket to an adoring fan, the star knowing full well that there’s a 90% probability the fawning recipient will report the good deed to the media. Or maybe, in the age of the iPhone, the whole thing will be filmed, translating into a steady financial return for the celebrity down the track.

Part of the allure for the common people is that they want to believe they, too, could be famous and want to think, therefore, that celebrities are somehow just like them.

The champagne drowned the socialism long ago

The champagne never tasted so good.

There’s no point getting angry at this sad state of affairs. Pointing it out is always necessary, though, especially as almost everyone you see on the street is either dazzled by celebrities or dumbed down to the entertainment industry’s rampant hypocrisy.

As we resist the relentless SJW narrative, it is useful for us to channel this double standard. A new Occupy Wall Street movement creeps up again? Well, Kanye needs to slash his royalties by 75% and redistribute them to the recording engineers and receptionists at the music studio. Tom Cruise wants $25 million for his next sci-fi romp? Too bad, the boys and girls working for the catering company need a few extra bucks per hour to pay their water and gas bills.

So many arguments against the leftist agenda have been underemployed for far too long. It’s high time that we take a more active role in raising them, particularly when Hollywood’s elite are right in the middle of taking their predictable potshots at everyone else but themselves and actively engaging in hastening our society’s decline.

Maybe then the champagne bottles will start to run a little dry.

Read More: Why Do Hollywood SJW's Still Defend This Admitted Pedophile?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How The Homosexual Takeover Of The West Was Predicted Forty Years Ago

January 17, 2016 | by Ray Coleman | Link | Original Link

One of the main practices men are encouraged to take up on this site is the nearly forgotten art of reading. While many will tell you that only non-fiction will do, it doesn't hurt to catch up on works of fiction as well. Science fiction in particular can give you a unique glimpse at how we got where we are, and where we are headed.

H.G. Wells predicted today's world of socially oblivious, barely lingual lotus-eaters in his 1895 novel The Time Machine. Isaac Asimov predicted the isolation wrought upon us by smartphones and laptops in his 1957 novel The Naked Sun. In that same vein, Joe Haldeman predicted the LGBT's hijacking of the West in his 1974 novel The Forever War.

The Plot

The story's main protagonist is a physics student named William Mandella, and the entire story is told in the first person perspective. He's conscripted into the United Nations Exploratory Force (UNEF), which is waging a war against a mysterious alien race called Taurans. To reach their objectives, Mandella and his brothers in arms must travel through wormhole-like phenomena called "collapsars," which allow them to move thousands of light-years in a matter of seconds.

There's a catch, however: inherent in this mode of travel is a substantial time dilation effect, which means as days pass for those who travel through the collapsars, months and even years pass for those back on Earth. The bulk of the story deals with Mandella's back-and-forth travels between Earth and the front lines. Each time he comes back to Earth—which occurs every few decades in real time—he is leveled by an almost overwhelming culture shock:

> "But to Tell you something about this world, I'm going to turn you over to Captain Sin, who just arrived from Earth. Captain?"
>
> "Thank you, General." It looked as if there was something wrong with his skin, his face; and then I realized he was wearing powder and lipstick..
>
> "I'm twenty-three, so I was still in diapers when you people left for Aleph [a planet thousands of light-years from earth]…to begin with, how many of you are homosexual? Nobody, huh? That doesn't really surprise me. I am, of course. I guess about a third of everybody in Europe and America is. Most governments encourage homosexuality—the United Nations is neutral, leaves it up to the individual countries—they encourage homo-life mainly because it's the one sure method of birth control."
>
> That seemed specious to me. Our method of birth control in the army is pretty foolproof: all men making a deposit in the sperm bank, and then vasectomy.

At this point in Earth history, crime is rampant due to lack of jobs, and health care has become such a highly-politicized racket that the entire system has basically collapsed upon itself. Mandella comes home to see his mother, only to find that since his father's death, she has taken a female lover.

Disoriented and disillusioned by the world he's come back to, Mandella goes back on active duty, only to receive another shocking revelation when he gets to the other side and meets with a temporal orientation guide tasked with catching him up on current events:

> "I want to prepare you for meeting your Strike Force."
>
> "What, they're all cyborgs? Clones?"
>
> He laughed. "No, it's illegal to clone humans. The main problem is, uh, you're heterosexual."
>
> "Oh' that's no problem. I'm tolerant."
>
> "Yes, your profile shows that you…think you're tolerant, but that's not the problem, exactly."
>
> "Oh." I knew what he was going to say. Not the details, but the substance.
>
> "Only emotionally stable people are drafted into UNEF. I know this is hard for you to accept, but heterosexuality is considered an emotional dysfunction. Relatively easy to cure."
>
> "If you think they're going to cure me–"
>
> "Relax, you're too old." He took a delicate sip of his drink. "It won't be as hard to get along with them as you might–"

> “Wait. You mean nobody…everybody in my company is homosexual? But me?”
>
> “William, everybody on earth is homosexual. Except for a thousand or so; veterans and incurables.”

The temporal orientation officer goes on to explain to Mandella how Earth’s population has stabilized at just under a billion people, and that humans no longer reproduce by conventional means: they’re incubated in artificial wombs and “born” in a matter of days, to which Mandella derisively responds, “O brave new world…no birth trauma, just a billion perfectly adjusted homosexuals.”

During a conversation with the ship’s doctor and several other officers, our protagonist also learns that decades prior to his arrival, an aversion to homosexuality was deemed a crime, until it was later deemed a “curable dysfunction.”

Where We’ve Been, Where We Are Now, And Where We’re Being Dragged Off To

Anybody over age fifty is probably experiencing culture shock akin to what William Mandella did throughout Haldeman’s novel. Think about it for a moment. Forty years ago, the Sexual Revolution was about men and women experimenting with drugs and free love with one another, and the LGBT was a nascent, fledgling offshoot of that revolution that people rarely heard from outside of the Stonewall Riots.

